Haan, Carolus de, was born at Arnheim Aug. 16, 1590. Becoming acquainted with the Reformation, he resolved to leave the Roman Catholic Church and his legal studies, and repaired to Geneva, where he studied theology under Calvin and Beza. In 1599 he became a minister of the Reformed Church at Deventer. Driven from thence by persecution, he was invited to Han by William, duke of Cleves, and exercised his ministry there for sixteen years, until persecution again compelled him to depart. Count Jan van Nassau, stadtholder of Gueldersland, and his son, Lodewijk Willem, stadtholder of Friesland, then secured his services to effect a reformation of the Church in their respective provinces. He afterwards returned to Deventer, but was again compelled to leave it in 1587, when it fell into the hands of the Spaniards. He repaired the same year to Leyden, where he was temporarily appointed professor extraordinary of theology. This position he held for four years. He was then called to Oldenbroek, where he exercised his ministry till he had passed the age of eighty. He died at Leyden Jan. 26, 1616. He wrote an exposition of the Revelation of St. John in Latin, and a work in Dutch against the Anabaptists. See Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland, l. (P. W.)

Hans, Gerardus de, D.D., was born in 1736. After completing his theological studies at Utrecht, and receiving the doctorate in theology in 1761, he was set- tled successively at Amersfoort, Middelburg, and Amsterdam. His works are chiefly exegetical and dogmatic. The most important of them are, Ammerenkerken over het eeneboeck der Godsdiensten van Jesus (Utr. 1773);—Het rijtje en drie volgende hoofstukken uit Paulus brief aan de Romeinen verklaard (Amst. 1780-38, 3 parts).—Verhandeling over de toenemende wereld (Amst. 1785);—Over de Opgewaard van Johannes (Amst. 1807, 3 parts). He also completed the commentary of Prof. Nahins on the Epistle to the Philippians. It was published at Amsterdam in 1783 in 3 vols. See Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland, l. (P. W.)

Haba’tiah (Heb. Chabayah’), הָבָהְיָה הָבָהְיָה, protected by Jehovah; Sept. Ὠψαλά and Ἑβαασά, a priest whose descendants returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel, but were degraded from the priestly office on account of not being able to trace their genealogy ( Ezra ii, 6; Neh. vii, 68). Habak’kuk [many Habak’kuk] (Heb. Chabol’kuk), מֶּה הַבוֹלָקַקְעֵן, endures; Sept. Ἀμβακόος, Vulg. Haba- once; Jerome, Prov. in Heb. translates παρακλήσις, and Susias παράκλησις; other Graecized and Latinized forms are Ἀμβάκοοκ αμβάκοοκ, Ἀμβάκοοκος, Ἀμβάκοοκος, etc.), the eighth in order of the twelve minor prophets (q. v.) of the Old Testament. 1. As to the name, besides the above forms, the Greeks, not only the Sept. translators, but the fathers of the Church, probably to make it more sonorous, corrupt it into Ἀμβάκοοκος, Ἀμβάκοοκος, or, as Jerome writes, Ἀμβάκοοκος, and only one Greek copy, found in the library of Alcalá, in Spain, has Ἀμβάκοοκος, which seems to be a recent corruption made to suit the Hebrew text. The Heb. word may denote, as observed by Jerome, as well a "favorite" as a "straggler." Abarbanel thinks that in the latter sense it has allusion to the patriotic zeal of the prophet fervently contending for the welfare of his country: but other prophets did the same; and in the former and less distant signification, the name would be one like Theophilus, "a friend of God," which his parents may have given him for a good omen. Luther took the name in the active sense, and applied it to the labors and writings of the man, thus: "Habakkuk had a proper name for his office; for it signifies a man of heart, one who is hearty towards another and takes him into his arms. This is what he does in his prophecy; he comforts his people and lifts them up, as one would do with a weeping child or man, bidding him be quiet and content, because, please God, it would yet be better with him." But all this is speculation. See Keil and Delitzsch, Coment. ad cap. l.

2. Of the facts of this prophet's birth-place, parentage, and life we have only apocryphal and conflicting accounts (see Delitzsch, De Habacucii vita et ataque, Lips. 1842, 1844). The Rabbinical tradition that Habakkuk was the son of the Shunammite woman whom Elisha restored to life is repeated by Abarbanel in his commentary, and has no other foundation than a fanciful etymology of the prophet's name, based on the expression in 2 Kings iv, 16. Equally unfounded is the tradition that he was the sentinel set by Isaiah to watch for the destruction of Babylon (comp. Isa. xxxi, 16 with Hab. i, 1). In the title of the history of Bel and the Dragon, as found in the Sept. version in Origen's Tetrápola, the author is called "Habakkuk, the son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi." Some have supposed this apocryphal writer to be identical with the prophet (Jerome, Proem. in Dan.). The psalm in ch. iii and its title are thought to favor the opinion that Habakkuk was a Levite (De-
HABAKKUK

Habakkuk before the invasion of Judaea by the Chaldeans. Knobel (Der Propheletum, de Hebr.) and Meier (Gesch. d. post. nat. Liter. d. Hebr.) are in favor of the commencement of the Chaldean era, after the battle of Carchemish (9.20) when Jehoiakim was the same age as was Nebuchadnezzar, the king. Some interpreters are of opinion that ch. ii was written in the reign of Jehoiachin, the son of Je- hoikim (2 Kings xxiv, 6), after Jerusalem had been besieged and conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, the king made a prisoner, and, with many thousands of his sub- jects, carried away to Babylon. If this is the case, it could imply that Jehoiachin was the same age as the father of Nebu- chadnezzar, the king of Babylon, and that the Jews saved the poor class of the people (2 Kings xxiv, 14). But of all this nothing is said of the book of Habakkuk, nor even so much as hinted at; and what is stated of the violence and injustice of the Chaldeans does not imply that the Jews had already experienced it. It is also a supposition equally gratuitous, accord- ing to which some interpreters refer ch. ii to the period of the last siege of Jerusalem, when Zebediah was taken, his sons slain, his eyes put out, the walls of the city broken down, and the Temple burned (2 Kings xxv, 1-10). There is no special relation to any of these incidents in the third chapter of Habakkuk.

But the question of the date of Habakkuk's prophecy has been discussed in the most exhaustive manner by Delitzsch (Der Prophet Habakkuk, Einl. § 3), and, though his arguments are rather ingenious than convincing, he is still considered by many to be the founder of the tradition. There is also a little internal evidence. The conclusion at which he arrives is that Habakkuk delivered his prophecy about the twelfth or thirteenth year of Josiah (B.C. 630 or 629), for reasons of which the following is a summary. In Hab. i, 5 the expression "in your days" shows that the fulfilment of the prophecy would take place in the lifetime of those to whom it was addressed. The same phrase in Jer. xvi, 9 embraces a period of at most twenty years, while in Ezek. xii, 25 it denotes about six years, and therefore, reckoning backwards from the twelfth or thirteenth year of Josiah's reign, the prophecy would involve no violation of probability, though the argument does not amount to a proof. From the similarity of Hab. ii, 10 and Zeph. i, 7, Delitzsch infers that the latter is an imitation, the former being the original. He supports this conclusion by many collateral arguments. Now Zephaniah, according to the superscription of his prophecy, lived in the time of Josiah, and from ii, 5 he is supposed to have prophesied after the worship of Jeh-ovah was restored, that is, after the twelfth year of that king's reign. It is thought that he wrote about B.C. 624. Between this period, therefore, and the twelfth year of B.C. 630, there would have been forty years. But Jeremiah began to prophecy in the thirteenth year of Josiah, and many passages are borrowed by him from Habakkuk (compare Hab. ii, 13 with Jer. ii, 58, etc.). The latter, therefore, must have written about B.C. 620 or 629. This view receives some confirmation from the position of his prophecy in the O.T. Canon.

On the other hand, while it is evident, from the constant use of the future tense in speaking of the Chal- dean desolations (i, 5, 6, 12), that the prophecy must have been written before the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, there are passages (Hab. ii, 6, 7) which were written about the beginning of the reign of Josiah (Olymp. 82), as contemporary with Zephaniah and Nahum; and again in the beginning of the reign of Cyrus (Olymp. 42), as contemporary with Daniel and Ezekiel in Persia, with Haggai and Zechariah in Judaea, and with Baruch in Egypt. In Daniel's "prophesying in the vision of Nebu- chadnezzar," Keil, decides in favor of the early part of the reign of Josiah. Calmet, Jäger, Ewald, Rosenmüller, Maurer, and Hitzig agree in assigning the commencement of Habakkuk's prophecy to the reign of Jehoiakim, though they are divided as to the exact period to which it is to be referred. Ranitz (Introd. ad Hebr. Vatic. p. 24, 59), Stierkel (Prolog. ad interp. tertii cap. Hab. p. 22, 27), and De Wette (Lehrbuch der Historischkritischen Einleitung. Berlin, 1840, p. 338) justly place the age of Haband refers the prophecy not to Nebuchadnezzar, but to "Ezechiel. But in such an arbitrary arrangement the true character of the composition as a perfectly developed poem is entirely lost sight of.

The prophet commences by announcing his office and important mission (i, 1). He bewails the corruption and idolatry of the Jews by which they rendered themselves and their country accessible to Jehovah for his help (2, 4). Next follows the reply of the Deity, threatening swift vengeance (5, 11). The prophet, transferring himself to the near future, foresees the destruction of Jerusalem, the sanctuary, and the house of God, which is enabled to do this by the instruments of correction, assumes (ii, 1) an attitude of hopeful expectancy, and waits to see the issue. He receives the divine command to write in an enduring form the vision of God's retributive justice as revealed to his prophetic eye (ii, 3). The door of the Chaldeans is first foretold in general terms (ii, 6-11), and the announcement is followed by a series of denunciations pronounced upon them by the nations who had suffered from their oppression (ii, 6-20). The strophical arrangement of these "woes" is a remarkable feature of the prophecy. They are divided into three strophes of six verses each, separated by a certain regularity of structure. The first four commences with a "Woe!" and close with a verse beginning with "wv" (for). The first verse of each of these contains the character of the sin, the second the development of the woe, while the third is confirmatory of the woe denounced. The fifth strophe differs from the others in form in having a verse introductory to the woe. The prominent vices of the Chaldeans' character, as delineated in i, 5-11, are made the subjects of separate denunciations: their insatiable ambition (ii, 6-8), their corruption (ii, 9-11), cruelty (ii, 12-14), drunkenness (ii, 15-17), and idolatry (ii, 18-20). The whole conclusion is a review of the prophet's predictions and a personal closing verse ("Hail, Zab Judah's Pindaric eode (Ewald), a composition univalued for boldness of conception, subtlety of thought, and majesty of diction. This constitutes, in Delitzsch's opinion, "the second grand division of the entire prophecy, as the subjective reflex of the two subdivisions of the first, and the lyrical recapitulation of the whole." It is the echo of the feelings aroused in the prophet's mind by the divine answers to his appeals; fear in anticipation of the threatened judgments, and thankfulness and joy at the promised retribution. But, though intimately connected with the prophet's personal woes, it is in itself a perfect whole, as is sufficiently evident from its lyrical character, and the musical arrangement by which it was adapted for use in the Temple service.

The style of this prophecy has always been much admired. Lowth (De Poen. Hebr., p. 267) says: "Poeius est hastabuccii stilus; sed maxime in oda, quae inter absolutissimam in eo genere merito numerari posset." Eichhorn, De Wette, and Rosenmuller are loud in their praise of Habakkuk's style; the first giving a detailed and animated analysis of the construction of his prophecies (Comment. ad Ann. Test. iii, 350). He equals the most eminent prophets of the Old Testament — Joel, Amos, Nahum, Isaiah; and the ode in ch. iii may be placed in competition with Ps. cxviii and lviii for originality and subtlety. His figures are all great, happily chosen, and properly drawn out. His denunciations are terrible, his derision bitter, his consolation cheering. Incidents of borrowed ideas (iii, 19; comp. Ps. xlvii, 34: ii, 6; comp. Isa. xiv, 7; ii, 14; comp. Is. xii, 9); but he makes them his own in drawing them out in his peculiar manner. With all the boldness and fertility of his imagination, his language is not overcharged with his verse melodicous. Eichhorn, indeed, gives a considerable number of words which he considers to be peculiar to this prophet, and supposes him to have formed new words or altered existing ones, to sound more energetic or feeble, as the sentiments to be expressed might require; but his list needs sifting, as De Wette observes.

Hab'bacuc (何必巴客; Vulg. Habacuc), the form in which the name of the prophet Habakkuk (q. v.) is given in the Apocrypha (Bel, 33, 34, 35, 37, 39).

Habergeon, an old English word for breastplate, appears in the Auth. Vers. as the rendering of two Heb. terms: כִּבֵּשׁ (Job xlii, 26, where it is named by Zerubbabel with offensive weapons), or כִּבֵּשׁ, shiryon (2 Chron. xxviii, 14; Neh. iv, 16), a coat of mail (as rendered in 1 Sam. xviii, 5, 38); and כִּבֵּשׁ, tachara' (Exod. xxviii, 32; xxxix, 28), a military garment, properly of linen strongly and thickly woven, and furnished around the neck and breast with a mailed covering (see Herod., ii, 182; iii, 47; and comp. the λατώσαγος of Homer, Il. xi, 529, 830). Haberkorn, Peter, a German divine, born at Butzbach in 1604. After filling various other posts, he was made professor of theology at Giessen, and died there, April, 1676. He was distinguished as a polemic, especially against the Romanists and Synergetists (q. v.). He wrote (1) Vindiciae Luth. fidei:— (2) Heptas disputationum Anti-Walburgen-collection (1650, 1652, 2 vols. 8vo.)—Tholuck, in Herzog, Real-Encyclop., v. 488, 439.

Habert, Isaac, doctor of the Sorbonne, the first Parisian theologian who wrote against Jansenius. He was a native of Paris, studied at the Sorbonne, was appointed canon of the cathedral of Paris, and in 1654 bishop of Vaires. He filled this post for twenty-three years, was reputed a very pious man, and died at Pont de Salars, near Rodez, in 1668. In 1641 he accused Jansenius of holding heretical doctrines on forty points, and thereby provoked Antoine Arnauld to answer him in his Apologie, in which he sought to prove the identity of the doctrines of Jansenius and St. Augustine. Habert nevertheless remained a declared enemy of Jansenius, and to him is ascribed the authorship of the letter sent to pope Innocent X in 1651, and signed by eighty-five bishops, praying him to decide the question finally. The most noteworthy of his works are: De gratia ex partibus graciae (1646):—De menuea hierar-
HABOR

Halah, and Habor, and hara, and to the river Gozan." About seventeen years later, Shalmanezer, the successor of the former monarch, "took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor, on the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medo-sul (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 56; Schultens, Index Geogr. in vitam Saladinii, s. v.). Many suppose this to be the Habor of Scripture for the following reasons: 1. It is within Assyria proper, which Ptolemy says was bounded on the west by the Tigris (vi, 1). 2. It is affirmed that the Assyrian monarch would place his captives in a central part of his kingdom, such as this is, and not in the outskirts (Keil on 2 Kings xvii, 4–6). 3. Habor is termed a "river of Gozan" (יחנך יִנְבֻּס), and Gozan is supposed to signify "pasture," and to be identical with the word Zan, now applied by the Nestorians to the pasture-lands in the highlands of Assyria, where the cattle takes its rise (Gaisford, Christians, p. 124). 4. Ptolemy mentions a mountain called Chabor (Χαβορια) which divides Assyria from Media (vi, 1); and Bochart says the river Chabor has its source in that mountain (Opera, i, 194, 242, 362). Some have supposed that the modern Nestorians are the descendants of the captives the Jews (Grant, L. C.). See Gozan.

2. The other and much more celebrated river, Khabarib, is that famous affluent of the Euphrates, which is called Abror (אַבֹר) by Strabo (xvi, 27) and Ptolemy (Bell. It. vii, 5); Abur (אָבּוּר) by Isaaiah of Charax (p. 4); Abor (אָבּוֹר) by Zosimus (iii, 12); and Chabor (Χαβορία) by Ptolemy (Χαβορια, v, 18) and Pliny (ii, x. xxx, 3). "It rises about lat. 36° 40', long. 40'; flows only a little south of east to its junction near the Khabir with the river of Nisibis, which comes down from Mous Masius. Both of these branches are formed by the union of a number of streams. Neither of them is fordable for some distance above their junction; and below it they constitute a river of such magnitude as to be navigable for a considerable distance by steamers. The course of the Khabir below Kankuk is tortuous (through rich pasture) with flowers, having a general direction about S.W. to its junction with the Euphrates at Karkeisa, the ancient Ceresium. The entire length of the stream is not less than 300 miles" (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, i, 286; see also Annals of Travels in the Tigris Country, p. 79; Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 304). Ritter (Erkundungen, x, 248), Gesenius (Thebais), Layard, Rawlinson, and others, maintain that this is the ancient Habor. There can be no doubt that Assyria proper was confined to the country lying along the banks of the Upper Tigris, and stretching far back toward Media. But its territory gradually expanded so as to include Babynia (Herodetus, iii, 92), Mesopotamia (Pliny, H. N. vi, 26), and even the country westward to the confines of Cilicia and Phoenicia (Strabo, xvi). At the time of the captivity the power of Assyria was at its height. The Jewish captives were more secure in the western than in the eastern Habor. The ruins of Assyrian towns are scattered over the whole of northern Mesopotamia. "On the banks of the lower Khabir are the remains of a royal palace, besides many other traces of the country, perhaps 729–839, 329. There can be no doubt that the Khabir was in Assyria, and near the centre of the kingdom, at the time of the captivity, further, Ptolemy mentions a province in Mesopotamia called Gauzemnis (καυζημής, v, 18). It lay around the Khabir, and was doubtless identical with Gozan, hence the phrase "the river of Gozan" (2 Kings xxvi, 6), Chalde-za, appears to be identical with Halah, mentioned in the same passage, adjointed Gauzantus. It is a remarkable fact that down as late as the 12th century there were large Jewish communities on the banks of the Khabir (Benjamin of Tudela, in Early Travels in Pers. p. 92 sq). The district along the river would seem to be from a comparison with 1 Chron. v, 26. Ptolemy mentions a town called Chabor (χαβόρ), 18). The Khabir occurs under that name in an Assyrian inscription of the 9th century before our era (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 534). See Cu-niform Inscriptions.

It seems doubtful whether Habor was identical with the river Chobar (גּזַּן), on which Ezekiel saw his visions. The latter was perhaps farther south in Babynia (Ezek. i, 8, etc.). See CHEBAR.

HACCEREM. See BETH-HACCEREM.

Hachchi'ah (Heb. Chakchugh, חָקְכָּע, according to Gesenius, whose eyes Jehovah eleuens, according to Fürst, ornament of Jehovah or Ṣeph. Ἀγγίας, t. x. Ἀγγίας, the father of Nehemiah, the governor after the captivity (Neh. i, 1, x, 2). B.C. ante 447.

Hachsilah (Heb. Chaksilah, חָקְסִלָה, according to Gesenius, darkæmme; according to Furst, drought; Sept. ἕξιλα, t. x. ἕξιλα), the descriptive name of a well-wooded hill (הַשִּׁילָה) near ('on the south of', below, "by the way of") the wilderness (Joshua) probably of Ziph, where David lay hid (2 Sam. viii) and Saul pitched his tent at the information of the Ziphites (1 Sam. xxix, 19; xxvi, 3). This is doubtless the Tell Zif reported by Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 190, 191) as 'a round eminence situated in the plain, a hundred feet or more in height,' on which David once pitched the tent of his mother, and containing several cisterns lying a short distance west of the site of the town of Ziph. See ZIPPH. The identification proposed by Schwarz (Palest. p. 113) with "the village Beth-Chachill, 21/2 miles west of Hebron," is unsuitable and out of place.

Hach'moni (Heb. Chakmoni, חָקְמ֥וֹנְי, pl. חָקְמֹנֵי), a name only known to the father (or ancestor; comp. 1 Chron. xxvi, 9) of Jashobeam, the chief of David's bodyguard (1 Chron. xi, 11), where the name Hachmoni is rendered "Hachmonite," for which the parallel passage, 2 Sam. xxii, 8, has "Tachmonite"); and also of Jehiel, the companion of the princes in the royal household (1 Chron. xxvi, 82). B.C. considerably ante 1046. Hachmon or Hachmoni was no doubt the founder of a family to which these men belonged; the actual father of Jashobeam was Zabdiel (1 Chron. xxvi, 2), and he is also said to have belonged to the Korhites (1 Chron. xii, 6); possibly the Levites descended from Korah. But the name Hachmoni nowhere appears in the genealogies of the Levites. See Konen, Ders. p. 72, 82, who can challenge from the fact that names given in Chronicles with Ben are in Samuel given without the Ben, but with the definite article. A less probable view is that which makes this term a title of office, q. d. counselor. See JASHBEAM.

Hach'monite (1 Chron. xi, 16). See HACHMONI.

Hackett, John, an English prelate, distinguished for his talents as a law reformer, was born at London in 1592. He studied at Westminster School, and entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1608. He took orders in 1618, and soon after became chaplain of the bishop of Lincoln. At the beginning of the Civil War he was one of the divines chosen to prepare a report of church reforms, to be submitted to the House of Lords. This plan failed from the opposition of the bishops. Hacket was a zealous partisan of Charles, and his house became the head-quarters of the Royalists in his neighborhood. This brought him into trouble, and he was even imprisoned for a short time. After the Restoration he was appointed both to the bishopric of Schiedam and to Gouda, and promised an archbishopric, and he came to the cathedral of Lichfield, which had been much injured during the war, to be repaired, mostly at his own expense. He died at Lichfield in 1670. Hacket was a Calvinist; yet his writings abound, says Coleridge, "in fantastic rags and Lappets of Pugilistic composition," and Jonathan Swift was preoccupied before the King March 22, 1660.—A Century of Sermons upon several remarkable Subjects (published by Thos. Plume, with a life of the author, 1675, fol.):—The Life of Archbishop Williams (1653, fol.). See Bihor, Britannica, 6. The Bishops and Bishops, Magazine, vol. Ixvi; Hook, Eccles. Biography, v. 471; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 752; Coleridge, Works (New York edition), v. 123.

Hacket, William, an English enthusiast and fanatic of the 16th century. He was at first the servant of a gentleman named Hussey, but married a rich widow, whose fortune he soon spent in dissipation. He next appears at York and in Lincolnsire, giving himself the name of Charles, and announcing the downfall of the papacy; that England would suffer from famine, pestilence, and war unless the consistorial discipline were established. He was whipped and driven out of the county, but continued his prophecies elsewhere. According to Coleridge, he was a very ready and grandiloquent speaker, so that many among the people thought that he had received a special gift of the Holy Ghost. He affected to place great reliance on his prayers, and asserted that if all England were to pray for rain there should fall none if he prayed for dry weather. Edmund Coppinger and Henry Arthurington became associated with him, the former under the name of Prophet of Mercy, the latter Prophet of Judgment. They proclaimed Hacket the true king of the world, and next in power to Jesus Christ. On Jan. 16, 1591, he sent his disciples through the streets of London crying that Jesus had arrived, was stopping at a certain hotel in the town, and that this time none should undertake anything against him. They ended with the cry, Repent, England, repent! They were finally arrested and put in prison. Coppinger let himself die of starvation: Arthurington published a recantation and was forgiven. As far out as a prophet, and announcing the downfall of the death as guilt of impiety and rebellion, and hung in London in July, 1591. Even on the scaffold he prayed God for a miracle to confound his enemies. Hackley, Charles W., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and late professor of mathematics and astronomy in Columbia College, New York, was born March 9, 1808, in Herkimer County, N. Y., and died in the city of New York Jan. 10, 1861. Prof. Hackley graduated at the Military Academy, West Point, in 1829, and was assistant professor of mathematics there until 1832, when he engaged in the study of law, but subsequently abandoned it for theology, and was ordained in 1835. He was professor of mathematics in the University of New York until 1838, then became president of Jefferson College, Mississippi, and subsequently rector of St. Peter's Protestant Episcopal Church, Auburn, N. Y. He was elected professor in Columbia College in 1843, and continued in that post until his death. He was the author of several excellent mathematical works, and a contributor to scientific periodicals and weekly and daily journals.—American Annual Cyclopaedia, 1861, p. 362; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 753. Hackspan, Theodor, an eminent Lutheran theologian and Orientalist, was born in 1607 at Weimar, and died at Altorf Jan. 19, 1659. He was educated at Jena, where he studied philosophy, and then went to Altorf, to profit by the instructions of the able Orientalist Schwenter, and thence to Helmstadt, where he studied theology under the famous Calixtus. In 1636 he returned to Altorf, and for many years filled the chair of Hebrew in its university, where he was the first to publicly teach the Oriental languages. In 1654 he was appointed professor of theology in that institution. Hackett was the first to give the chair of Oriental languages. His close application to study and to the duties of his professorships so impaired his health that he died in the fifty-second year of his age. Hackspan is said to have been the best scholar of his day in Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Aramaic. The liberty of Jolostrud Schmidtmairer, an advocate of Nuremberg, who established in his own house a press, with supplies of types in the different languages, enabled him to publish most of his learned works. Among these we name Tractatus de usi Liberorum Rabbinicorum;—Syllogis Disputations theologicae et philosophicae;—Interpretis Errabundus;—Disputatwos de locutionibus sacris (Altorf, 1648);—Observations Arabico-Variscas in quodam loci Veteris et Noxii Testamenti (ibid. 1663);—De Anglorum demonstrum noxibus (ibid. 1661);—Fides et Leges Mohommediae, etc. (ibid. 1646);—Maximamorum Superiorum (ibid. 1660);—Ecclesiasticae Judicata (ibid. 1669);—Nota philologico-theologica in varia et difficilia Scripturae locis (ibid. 1666, 3 vols.);—Rose, New Gen. Hadad, a name which occurs with considerable confusion of form in the Heb. The proper orthography seems to be הָּדַּד, Hadad (according to Gesenius from an Arab. root signifying to break forth into shouts; but Furst makes it הָּדַּד, Hadad), which appears in Gen. xxvi, 35, 36; 1 Chron. i, 46, 47, 50, 51 (in all which passages it is rendered by the Sept. Adad, Adon, Adad). In 1 Kings xi, 14-25 (where the Sept. has 'Adap, Vulg. Adad). The other forms are הָּדַּד, Hadad (1 Chron. i, 30, Sept. 'Adad, Vulg. Hadad), הָּדַּד, Hadad (Gen. xxvi, 39; Sept. 'Adap, Vulg. Adar, Eng. "Hadar"), הָּדַּד, Hadar (Gen. xxv, 19, Sept. 'Adad, Vulg. and Eng. and Hadar), and הָּדַּד, Hadad (1 Kings xi, 17; Sept. 'Adap, Vulg. Adad). It was the name of a Syrian idol, and was thence transferred to the king, as the highest of earthly authorities, in the forms Hadad, Ben-Hadad, Lord of Hadad (1 Kings xxii, 40). "Under cover of Hadad," ("assisted by Hadad," Gesenius, Thesaur., p. 218). The title appears to have been an official one, like Pharaoh; and perhaps it is so used by Nicolaus Damascusus, as quoted by Josephus (Ant. vii, 5, 2), in reference to the Syrian king who aided Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii, 5). Josephus appears to have used the name in the same sense, where he substitutes it for Henadad (Ant. ix, 8, 7, compared with 2 Kings xiii, 24). See also HADAD-RIMON.

1. Adad (q.v.) is the indigenous name of the chief deity of the Syrians, the sun, according to Macrobius (Saturnalia, iv, 28). Moreover, Pliny (Hist. Nat. xi, 59, 71), speaking of remarkable stones named after parts of the body, mentions some called "Adadunpheres, ejusdem ocular ac digitus dei," and adds, "et hic colitur a Syris." He is also called Αδάδως βασιλείς θεός by Philo Bythinus (in Eusebius, Praep. Evan. i, 10). The passage of Hesychius which Harbou adds in his note to Pliny concerning the worship of this god by the Phrygians, Jabloslani declares to be inadmissible (De Ling. Lyconicoe, p. 64).

This Syrian deity claims some notice here, because his name is most probably an element in the names of the Syrian kings Hadiad and Hadadzezer. Moreover, several of the older commentators have endeavored to find this deity in Isa. lxv, 17; either by altering the text there to suit the name given by Macrobius, or by adapting the name he gives to his interpretation and to the reading of the Hebrew, so as to make that extract bear testimony to a god Achad (q.v.). Michaelis has argued at some length against both these views; and the modern commentators, such as Gesenius, Hitzig, Botta, and the late Professor Alsat. Schrader, and I, hardly do not admit the name of any deity in that passage.

2. Hadar (q.v.), one of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 30). His descendants probably occupied the western coast of the Persian Gulf, where the names Atite (Psal. vi. 7; 5 Atite), Atzine, and Chalmo (Psal. vi. 32) bear affinity to the original name. See ARAMA.

3. Hadad, king of Edom, the son of Belad, and successor of Hashum: he established his court at Avith, and defeated the Midianites in the intervening territory of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Chron. i. 46). This is the only one of the ancient kings of Edom whose exploits are recorded by Moses. B.C. ante 1618. See AVITH.

4. Hadad, another king of Edom, successor of Baal-Hazon: he established his palace at Pat, and his wife's name was Mehetebel (1 Chron. i. 50). He is called Hadad in the Septuagint, xxxvi, 39, and with him the list of these Edomitic kings closes, it may be conjectured (Turner's Companion to Genesis, p. 326) that he lived about the time of the Exode, and in that case he may be the identical king of Edom who refused a passage to the Israelites (Num. xx. 14). B.C. prob. 1309. See Pat; 1 Chron. i. ante 1053. See B.C. 1618.

5. Adad, a king of Syria, who reigned in Damascus, at the time that David attacked and defeated Hadadezer, king of Zobah, whom he marched to assist, and in whose defeat he shared. B.C. cir. 1040. This fact is recorded in 2 Sam. viii. 5, but the name of the king is not given. It is supplied, however, by Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, 2), who reports, after Nicolas of Damascus, that he carried succours to Hadadezer as far as the Euphrates, where David defeated them both; and adds other particulars respecting his fame.

6. Hadad, a young prince of the royal race of Edom, whose country was conquered by David, convinced in the heart of the massacre committed by Joab, to escape with some of his father's servants, or, rather, was carried off by them into the land of Midian. B.C. cir. 1040. Thence Hadad went into the desert of Parna ("Midian," ver. 18), and eventually proceeded to Egypt (1 Kings xvi. 31), ver. 17, the father of the tribe of Gad was called "Gad of Haddar" (2 Sam. xxii. 42; 1 Chron. ii. 54). He was there most favorably received by the king, who assigned him an estate and establishment suited to his rank, and even gave him in marriage the sister of his own consort, by whom he had a son, who was brought up in the palace with the sons of Pharaoh. Hadad remained in Egypt till after the death of David and Joab, when, although dissatisfied by Pharaoh, he returned to his own country in the hope of recovering his father's throne (1 Kings xi. 21). B.C. cir. 1012. The Scripture does not record the result of this attempt further than by mentioning him as one of the troubleurs of Solomon's reign, which implies some measure of staying success (see Ezek. ili. 23, "IIl. 58, ad loc."). After relating these facts the text goes on to mention another enemy of Solomon, named Rezin, and then adds (ver. 25) that this was "besides the mischief that Hadad did: and he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Syria." Our version seems to make this apply to Rezin; but the Sept. refers it to Hadad, reading שדָ נָ הָיָמָ א, instead of שדָ נָ הָיָמָ א, "Aaron or Syria," and the sense would certainly be improved by this reading, inasmuch as it supplies an apparent omission; for without it we only know that Hadad left Egypt for Edom, and not how he succeeded there, or how he was able to trouble Solomon. The history of Hadad is certainly very important, as it shows that the continual pressure of the enemy forced Solomon to allow Hadad to reign as a tributary prince, and that he ultimately asserted his independence. Josephus, however, seems to have read the Hebrew as our version does, "Syria," not "Edom." He says (Ant. viii. 7, 6) that Hadad, on his arrival in Edom, found the territory too strongly garnished by Solomon's troops to afford any hope of success. He therefore proceeded with a party of adherents to Syria, where he was well received by Rezin, then at the head of a band of robbers, and with his assistance seized upon a part of Syria and reigned there. If this be correct, it would have been a different part of Syria from that in which Rezin himself reigned, for it is certain, from ver. 24, that he (Rezin) did reign in Damascus. Carriers supposes that Hadad reigned in Syria after the death of Rezin; and it might reconcile apparent discrepancies to suppose that two kingdoms were established (there were more previously), both of which, after the death of Rezin, were consolidated under Hadad. That Hadad was really king of Syria seems to be rather corroborated by the fact that every subsequent king of Syria is, in the Scripture, called Ben-Hadad, "son of Hadad," and in Josephus simply Hadad, which seems to denote that the founder of the dynasty was called by this name. We may observe that, whether we read Aram or Edom, it must be understood as applying to Hadad, not to Rezin (Pictorial Bible, on 2 Kings xi. 14).—Kitto. The identity of name suggests a common origin for the Edomitic and Assyrian-Syrian dynasties. Josephus, in the outset of his account, appears to call this Hadad by the name of Adar. In any case, however, the preceding must be regarded as distinct persons from each other (see Hengstenberg, Pentateuch, ii, 298), the last probably being the son, or, rather, grandson of No. 5. See SYRIA.

Hadad-ezer (Heb. id., הַדַּדְאַזְרָא, Hadad is his help [see Hadad, No. 1], Sept. Αδαπαζοτ in 2 Sam. viii. 7, but Αδαπαζοτ v. r. Αδαπαζο in 1 Kings xi. 20, Vulg. Adarker in both passages), less correctly Hadad-ezer (Heb. id., הַדַּדְאַזְרָא [see under HADAD; yet some MSS. have Hadadezer throughout]), 2 Sam. xv. 16, 19, 1 Chron. xviii. 3-10; xix. 16, 19; 15. Αδαπαζο v. r. Αδαπαζο, Vulg. still Adarker). king of the Aramite state Zobah, a powerful opponent of David. He was defeated by the Israelites in his first campaign, while on his way to "establish his dominion" (B.C. cir. 1035) in the neighborhood of the Euphrates, with a great loss of men, war- riors, horses, and chariots, and was driven from his towns (2 Sam. viii. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 3), and driven with the remnant of his force to the other side of the river (xix. 16). The golden weapons (גַּלְו, A.V. "shields of gold") captured on this occasion, a thousand in number, were taken by David to Jerusalem (xviii. 7), and dedicated to Jehovah. The foreign arms were preserved in the Temple, and were long known as king David's (1 Chron. xxii. 9; Cant. iv. 4). A division highly serviceable to him was made by a king of Damascus: Syria [see Hadad, 5], who compelled David to turn his arms against him (2 Sam. x. 6-14; 1 Chron. xix. 6-14). The breathing-time thus afforded Hadadezer was turned by him to such good account as to enable his allies of Hanun, king of the Ammonites, and to take a leading part in the confederacy formed by that monarch against David. B.C. cir. 1034. The first army brought into the field was beaten and put to flight by Abishai and Joab; but Hadadezer, not yet discouraged, went into the country of the Euphrates, and was defeated and overthrown by the forces of all his allies and tributaries, which he placed under the command of Shobach, his general. The army was a large one, as is evident from the numbers of the slain; and it was especially strong in horse-soldiers (1 Chron. xix. 18). They crossed the Euphrates, joined the other sides of the field and encamped at a place called Helam (q.v.). To confront so formidable an array, David took the field in person, and in one great victory so completely broke the power of

Haddarzére, that all the small tributary princes seized the opportunity of throwing off his yoke, of abandoning the Ammonites to their fate, and of submitting quietly to David, whose power was thus extended to the Euphrates (2 Sam. vii. 5, 15-19; 2 Chron. xiv. 15-19).

But one of Haddarezére’s more immediate retainers, Rezon ben-Eliadah, made his escape from the army, and, gathering round him some fugitives like himself, formed them into one of those marauding, ravaging “bands” (לטְרַמְשׁוֹר) which found a congenial refuge in the thinly peopled districts between the Jordan and the Euphrates (2 Kings vii. 7, 10, 17) (2 Chron. xxv. 20, 22). Making their way to Damascus, they possessed themselves of the city. B.C. cir. 980. Rezon became king, and at once began to avenge the loss of his countrymen by the course of “mischief” to Israel which he pursued down to the end of Solomon’s reign, and which is summed up in the emphatic words, “He was an adversary (a ‘Satán’ to Israel”)... he abhorred Israel” (1 Kings xi. 23-25).

Hadad-rimmon (Heb. Haddad ’Rimmon; הָדָד־רִמְמוֹן), the names of two Syrian idols: Sept. κύριοῦς θεόνος; Vulg. Adorammon), the name of a place in the valley of Megiddo, alluded to in Zech. xii. 11 as a type of the future punishment of the Jews; probably by a proverbial expression from the lamentation for Josiah, who was drily laid to rest (see 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22, 25). (There is a treatise by Wchinmannsen, De planctu Hadad, in the Nov. Theol. Theol.-phil. i, 1101; exegetical remarks on the same text have also been written in Dutch by Vermast [Gonda, 1792, 1794], in German by Maurits [Rost, 1764, 1772], and in Latin by Forsius [1764]). According to Jerome (Comment, on Zech. i. c. and Hos. i), it was afterwards called Maximinopolis (see Ireland, Palest., p. 891), which, according to the Jews, Israel, lay 17 Rom. miles from Cæsarea, and 10 from Esdraelon; being situated, according to Dr. Robinson (new ed. of Researches, iii, 118), a little south of Megiddo (now Leijun) (see Bibliotheca Sacra, 1844, p. 220). The name has been thought to be derived from the worship of the idol Hadad-rimmon (Hitzig on Is. xvii. 9; Movers, Phon., p. 297); but, according to the Targum of Jonathan (followed by Jarchi), it is the ellipsis for Hadad, son of Tab-rimmon, the alleged opponent of Abah at Ramoth-Gilead. As it contains the names of two principal Syrian deities, it may have been an old Syrian stronghold, and hence Josiah may here have made his last stand in defence of the plain of Esdraelon. Such a site, therefore, does not ill agree with being the source of the modern town, a village situated at the foot of the Megiddo hills, in a notch or valley about 1¼ hours of S. of Tell Metzemmim” (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 338; comp. Narratives, ii, 355; De Saulz, Dead Sea, ii, 311). Schwarz’s attempt (Palest. p. 150) to identify Hadad-Rimmon with Gath-Rimmon of Josh. xx. 25, as the Kefar Ubbi of the Talmud (Gitt. fol. 76a), and a present Kafar Guth, said by him to be located about 24 miles from Leijun, beyond Sephoris, is without foundation. Hadar, a various reading of two Heb. names. See also Ets-Hadar.

1. Chadar (חָדָד), perhaps chamber; Sept. Χαδάδ; Vulg. Hadar), a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxxvi. 15); written in 1 Chron. i. 50, Chadad (חָדָד), (Xoðîας, Hadad, but Gesenius supposes the former to be the true reading of the latter in 1 Chron. i. 50 and is unhappily justified by the appellation of any tribe or place in Arabia, or on the Syrian frontier; but names identical with, or very closely resembling it, are not uncommon in those parts, and may contain traces of the Ishmaelite tribe sprung from Hadar. The mountain Hadad, belonging to Tyrem [see Tema], on the borders of the Syrian desert, north of el-Medineh, is perhaps the most likely to be correctly identified with the ancient dwellings of this tribe; it stands among a group of names of the sons of Ishmael, containing Dumah, Kedar, and Tema. See also Haddad, 2.

2. Hadar (חָדָר), perhaps ornament; Sept. ἀράθος v. ἀράθος; Vulg. Adare), one of the Edomitic kings, successor of Baal-Hanan ben-Achbor (Gen. xxxvi. 39); and, if we connect with the statement of ver. 31, about contemporary with Saul. The name of his city, and the name and genealogy of his wife, are given. In the parallel list in 1 Chron. i, he appears as Hadad. We know from another source (1 Kings xi, 14, etc.) that Hadad was one of the names of the royal family of Edom. Indeed, it occurs in this very list (Gen. xxxvi. 35). See also Haddad.

Hadarazer, the form of the name of the town mentioned in the account of David’s Syrian campaign, as given in 2 Sam. x, and in all its occurrences in the Heb. text (as well as in both MSS. of the Sept. and in Josephus), except 2 Sam. viii. 5, 12; 1 Kings xi, 28, where it is more correctly called Haddarezer (q.v.).

Hadassah (Heb. Chadassah; חַדָּסָה, new; Sept. Αἰασσα v. τ. Αἰασ(634,254),(929,278)(634,278),(929,292), city in the valley of Judah, mentioned in the second group between Zenan and Migdal-gad (Josh. xv. 37). It has generally been thought (Winer, Realbi. s.v.) to be the same as the Adasa (Ἀδάσα) of Josephus (Ant. xii, 10, 5) and the Apocrypha (1 Macc. vii, 40, 45), and likewise of the Onomasticon (s.v.), which, however, must have lain rather in the mountains of Ephraim, apparently near the town of Joppa, which, according to the Mishna (Erub. v. 6), it evidently contained 50 houses only (Rashad, Pelist. p. 701). See Judah, Tribe of.

Hadasah (Heb. Chadassah; חַדָּסָה; myrtle; comp. the Gr. names Myrto, etc.; Sept. omits, Vulg. Elissa), the earlier Jewish name of Esther (Esth. ii, 7). Gesenius (Theaur. p. 360) suggests that it is identical with Arusa, the name of the daughter of Cyrus (Herod. iii, 183, 184).

Hadathah (Heb. Chadattah; חָדַתָּה, a Chaldaizing form of new; Sept. omits, Vulg. serab), according to the A.V. one of the towns of Judah in the extreme south—“Hazor, Hadathah, and Keriob, and Hezron,” etc. (Josh. xx. 25); but the Masoretic accents of the Hebrew connect the word with that preceding it, as if it were Hazor-chadathah, l.e. New Hazor, in distinction from the older Hazor as mentioned in ver. 23. This reading is expressly sanctioned by Eusebius and Jerome, who speak (Onomast. s. v. Asor) of “New Hazor” as lying in their day to the east of and near Ascalon. (See also Raddad, Palest. p. 708.) But Ascalon, as Robinson has pointed out (Researches, new ed. ii, 34, note), is in the Shefelah, and not in the south, and would, if named in Joshuas at all, be included in the second division of the list, beginning at ver. 33, instead of where it is, not far from Ke-desh. Still the total (29) in ver. 32 requires as much abbreviation in the enumerated list of cities in this group as possible. See Hazer-Hadattah.

Haddock, Chaik R., D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Salisbury, N. H., in the summer of 1796. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1816. Immediately after graduating, he entered Andover Theological Seminary, where he remained two years. He was then compelled to desist from his studies, and made a journey to the South. He returned in 1819 invigorated in health, and was at once chosen the first professor of rhetoric in Dartmouth College; a position which he held till 1838, when he was chosen professor of intellectual philosophy. In 1830 he received the appointment of charge d'affaires at the court of Portugal, which Hades, a Greek word (ᾍδης), derived according to the best established and most generally received etymology, from privative a- and ἄδης, hence often written ᾄδης, means strictly what is out of sight, or possibly, if applied to a person, what puts out of sight. In earlier Greek this last word, if not its only, at least its prevailing application; in Homer it occurs only as the personal designation of Plutus, the lord of the invisible world, and who was probably so designated—not from being himself invisible, for that belonged to him in common with the heathen gods generally—but from his power to render men invisible to his ends—the invisibility (see Cusius, Homerica Lexicon, s. v.). The Greeks, however, in process of time abandoned this use of ᾄδης, and when the Greek Scriptures were written the word was scarcely ever applied except to the place of the departed. In the classical writers, therefore, it is used to denote ὁρατός, or the invisible, in the regions. In the Old Testament it is the common rendering for the Heb. בּוּהֲנָא, sheol, though in the form there often appears a remnant of the original personified application; for example, in Gen. xxxvii, 35, "I will go down to my son, תִּיָּכָא גֹּזֶעַ, i. e. into the abodes or house of hædes (בּוּוֹאָר or בּוּוֹוֹאָר being understood). This elliptical form, ᾄδης being the classic rendering in the Greek Scriptures, even after ᾄδης was never thought of but as a region or place of abode.
Hades

1. The appropriation of ἁδεσ by the Greek interpreters as an equivalent for sheol may undoubtedly be taken as evidence that there was a close agreement in the ideas conveyed by the two terms as currently understood by the Greeks and Hebrews respectively—a substantial, but not an entire agreement; for in this, as in all other terms which related to subjects bearing on things spiritual and divine, the different religions of Jew and Gentile necessarily exercised a modifying influence on each. The idea of the departed, coupled with the conception of the departed spirits, of good as well as bad; second, that it was divided into two compartments, the one containing an Elysium of bliss for the good, the other a Tartarus of sorrow and punishment for the wicked; and, thirdly, that in respect to its locality, it lay under ground, in the mid-regions of the earth. So far as these points are concerned, there is no material difference between the Greek ὅδεσ and the Hebrew sheol. This, too, was viewed as the common receptacle of the departed: patriarchs and righteous men spoke of going into it at their decease, and the mention of the subject was a justification for crucifixion as being in it their proper home (Gen. xlii, 38; Psa. cxxix, 8; Hos. xiii, 14; Isa. xi, 9, etc.). A twofold division also in the state of the departed, corresponding to the different positions they occupied, and the courses they pursued on earth, is clearly implied in the revelation of Scripture. The subject, though with the Hebrews less prominently exhibited, and without any of the fantastic and puerile inventions of heathen mythology. Yet the fact of a real distinction in the state of the departed, corresponding to their spiritual conditions on earth, is in various passages not obviously indicated. Divine retribution is represented as pursuing the wicked after they have left this world—pursuing them even into the lower regions of the earth (Deut. xxxii, 22; 2 Sam. xiv, 2); and the bitterest shame and humiliation are described as awaiting there the most prosperous of this world’s inhabitants, if they have abused their prosperity to the dishonor of God and the injury of their fellow-men (Psa. lxxx, 14; Isa. xiv). On the other hand, the righteous remain in his own peace, and are assured that, in the viewless regions of sheol, as well as amid the changing vicissitudes of earth, the right hand of God would sustain him; even there he would enter into peace, walking still, as it were, in his uprightness (Prov. xiv, 22; Psa. xxxix, 8; Isa. lii, 2). That sheol, like hades, was regarded as a lower region compared with the present world, is so manifest from the whole language of Scripture on the subject, that it is unnecessary to point to particular examples; in respect to the good as well as the bad, the passage into sheol was contemplated as a descent; and the name was sometimes used as a synonym for the very lowest depths (Deut. xxxii, 22; Job xi, 7-9). This is not, however, to be understood as affording anything of the actual locality of disembodied spirits; for there can be no doubt that the language here, as in other cases, was derived from the most remote assurances of things not seen. The idea of death was committed to the lower parts of the earth, so the soul was conceived of as also going downwards. But that this was not designed to mark the local boundaries of the region of departed spirits may certainly be inferred from other expressions used regarding them—that God took them to his sepulchre; or that it was to be their place to see the path of life; that he would make them dwell in his house forever; or, more generally still, that the spirit of a man goeth upwards (Gen. v, 24; Psa. xvi, 11; xxiii, 6; Eccles. lii, 21; xii, 7). During the old dispensations there was still no representation of heaven respecting the person of the righteous condition or external relationships of departed spirits; the time had not yet come for such specific intimations; and the language employed was consequently of a somewhat vague and vacillating nature, such as spontaneously arose from common feelings and impressions. For the same reason, the ideas entertained even by God’s people upon the subject were predominantly sombre and gloomy. Sheol wore no inviting aspect to their view, no more than hades to the superstitious heathen; the very men who believed that God would accompany them thither and keep them from evil, contemplated the darkness and silence, and shrank from it with instinctive horror, or gave hearty thanks when they found themselves for a time delivered from it (Psa. vi, 5; xcv, 3, 9; Job iii, 13 sq.; Isa. xxxviii, 16). The reason was that they had only general assurances, but no specific light on the subject; and their comfort rather lay in overlooking the gulf of sheol, and fixing their thoughts on the better resurrection some time to come, than in anything they could definitely promise themselves between death and the resurrection-morn.

In this way one important point of difference between the Jewish and the heathen hades, originated by the diverse spirit of the two religions, that to the believing Hebrew alone the sojourn in sheol appeared that only of a temporary and intermediate existence. The heathen had no prospect beyond its shadowy realms; its only contemplation was the immanent satisfaction of the desire, the satisfaction of the intellect was utterly strange alike to his religion and his philosophy. But it was in connection with the prospect of a resurrection from the dead that all hope formed itself in the breasts of the true people of God. As this alone could effect the reversion of the evil brought to pass in by sin, and really destroy the destroyer, so nothing less was announced in that first promise which gave assurance of the crushing of the tempter; and though as to its nature but dimly apprehended by the eye of faith, it still necessarily formed, as to the reality, the great object of desire and expectation. Hence it is said of the patriarchs that they looked for a better country, which is a heavenly one; and of those who in later times resided unto blood for the truth of God, that they did it to obtain a better resurrection (Heb. xi, 16, 55). Hence, too, the spirit of prophecy confidently proclaimed the arrival of a day when the temple should be cast down, when the sheol itself should be destroyed, and many of its inmates be brought forth to the possession of everlasting life (Isa. xxvi, 19; Hos. xiii, 14; Dan. xii, 2). Yet again, in apostolic times, Paul represents this as emphatically the promise made by God to the fathers, to the realisation of which our countrymen as with one heart were hoping to come (Acts xxvi, 7); and Josephus, in like manner, testifies of all but the small Sadducean faction of them, that they believed in a resurrection to honor and blessing for those who had lived righteously in this life (Ant. xviii, 3). This, however, cast a gleam of light across the darkness of hades for the Israelite, which was altogether unknown to the Greek. Closely connected with it was another difference also of considerable moment, viz., that the Hebrew sheol was not, like the Gentile hades, viewed as an altogether sepulchral and indecent region, without the hope of a future resurrection. The Hebrews, in fact, deriving the term from the principal fountain of life, and subject to another dominion than the world of sense and time, Pluto was ever regarded by the heathen as the rival of the king of earth and heaven; the two domains were essentially antagonistic. But to the more enlightened Hebrew there was but one region of the dead, and the chamber of sheol was as much open to his eye and subject to his control as the bodies and habitations of men on earth; so that to go into the realms of the deceased was but to pass from one department to another of the same all-encompassing sway of Jehovah. See Sheol.

2. Such was the general state of belief and expectation regarding hades or sheol in Old-Testament times. With the introduction of the Gospel a new light breaks in, which shoots its rays also through the realms of the departed, and relieves the gloom in which they had still appeared shrouded to the view of the faithful. The term hades, however, is of comparatively rare occurrence in New-Testament scripture; in our Lord's own discourses it is found only thrice, and on two of the occasions it is used in a somewhat rhetorical manner, by way of contrast with the region of life and blessing. He said of Caperneum, that from being the gate of life, it should be brought down to hades (Matt. xxi, 23)—that is, plainly, from the highest point of fancied or real elevation to the lowest abasement. Of that spiritual kingdom, also, or church, which he was going to establish on earth, he affirmed that "the gates of hades shall not prevail against it" (Matt. xvi, 18). Except the allusions to the keys of death and of hades; ch. vi, 8, where death is symbolized as a rider, smiting all around him with weapons of destruction, and hades following to receive the souls of the slain; ch. xx, 18, 14, where death and hades are both represented as giving up the dead that were in them, and afterwards as being themselves cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death. In every one of these passages hades stands in a dark and forbidding connection with death—very unlike that association with paradise and Abraham's bosom in which our Lord, as Pilate, exhibited the hope of a future reanimation of people's souls to the eye of faith; and not only so, but in one of them it is expressly as an ally of death in the execution of judgment that hades is represented, while in another it appears as an accursed thing, consigned to the lake of fire. In short, it seems as if in the progress of God's grace a real, spiritualised sphere or region be reserved in darkness and misery to the judgment of the great day, and other names, with other and brighter ideas, were employed to designate the intermediate resting-place of the redeemed. It was meet that it should be so; for by the personal work and mediation of Christ the whole Church of God rose to a higher condition; all things passed away, all things were new; and it is but reasonable to suppose that the change in some degree extended to the occupants of the intermediate state—the saved becoming more enlarged in the possession of bliss and glory, the lost more sunk in anguish and despair. See DEATH.

3. Such being the nature of the scriptural representation on the subject, one must not only condemn the fables that sprung up amid the dark ages about the limbus or antechamber of hell, and the purgatorial fires, through which it was supposed even redeemed souls had to complete their ripening for glory, but also reject the form in which the Church has embalmed its belief respecting the personal history of Christ, when it said "descended into hell." This, it is well known, was a later addition to what has been called the Apostles' Creed, made when the Church was far on its way to the gloom and superstition of the Dark Ages. Though the words are capable of a rational and scriptural explanation, yet they do not present the place and character of our Lord's existence in the intermediate state as these are exhibited by himself; they suggest something painless, rather than that it should be a bleeding and lamentable; and, if taken in their natural sense, they would rob believers of that sure hope of an immediate transition into mansions of glory, which, as his followers and participants of his risen life, it is their privilege to entertain. See HELL.

4. There are two other terms so often associated in Scripture with hades as to render their signification in some measure synonymous.

(1) ἀβαγία (ἀβαξογία, without bottom). The use of this word to represent three different Hebrew words: 1. הַבַּעַל, a depth or deep place (Job xli, 23); or ולֵפָה, the deep, the sea (Isa. xxiv, 27). 2. בָּבָל, a broad place (Job xxxvi, 16). 3. בָּבָל, a mass of waters, the sea (Gen. viii, 2, etc.), the chaotic mass of waters (Gen. i, 2; Ps. civ, 6), the subterraneous waters, the "deep that lieth under" (Gen. xlix, 25), "the deep that coucheth beneath" (Deut. xxxii, 13). In the N. T. it is used always with the article, to designate the abode of the dead, hades, especially that part of it which is also the abode of devils and the place of woe (Rom. vii; Luke viii, 31; Rev. ix, 5, 11; xi, 7; xvii, 6, 8; x, 3). Revelation 20:13, translated in the A. V. "bottomless pit," by Luther "Abgrund." In ix, 1, mention is made of "the key of the bottomless pit" (οῖς λειτομαῖς τοῦ θανάτου τῶν ἄνθρωπων), the key of the pit of the abyss, where hades is represented as a bottomless depth, which is entered by means of a shaft covered by a door, and secured by a lock (Alford, Stuart, Erdw, De Wette, Diderieck). In ver. 11 mention is made of "the angel of the abyss," by whom some suppose is intended Satan or one of his angels. See AVRA.

(2) ἠδωρισμόν, from the Heb. הָדוֹרְשׁ, destruction, the place of the dead, Job xxvi, 6; Prov. xv, 11), the name given in Rev. ix, 11, to "the angel of the abyss," and explained by the writer as equivalent to the Greek ἢδος, destroyer. The term may be understood either as a personification of the idea of destruction, or as denoting the being supposed to preside over the place of the dead. The Rabbins frequently use this term to denote the lowest regions of sheol or hades (Ezrubal, fol. xix, 1; Sohar Num. fol. 74; Sohar Choddash, fol. 22; comp. Eissennegger, Bemerkungen zu Jüd. ii, 224 sq.) and the addition, "an angel of the abyss," seems to favor the former position or the king of this place is alluded to here. But it may be doubted whether the angelology of the Rabbins finds any sanction from the N. T. and it accords better with the general character of the passage to suppose a personification here of the idea of destruction, so that the symbol may find many realizations in the history of the Church: as there are many Anti-christs, so there are there also many Apollonys. The identification of Abaddon with the Asmoderus of the Apocrypha and the Talmud rests upon no solid basis. See ABADDON.

5. A full view of the extensive literature of this subject more appropriately belongs to the present volume, where notice is specially borne upon the opposite states of the dead: Jour. Sac. Lit. October, 1852, p. 85 sq.; April, 1853, p. 56 sq.; July, 1853, p. 418 sq.; Hiebsteracht, Hades and Heaven (London 1866). See HEAVEN.

Had'id (Heb. חָדִיד, pointed, perf. from its situation on some craggy eminence, Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 446; Sept. Ἀδαίος in Neh. xi, 81, elsewhere unites with prec. word, ἀδιδότε; Vulg. Hidid, placed in the tribe of Benjamin, in the vicinity of Lod and Ono, whose inhabitants returned from the captivity to their old seat under Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 33, where some copies read ἀδιδότης, Ἀριάδνη in Neh. vii, 37; xii, 34). It is probably the same with one of the cities called Ἀδίδα (q. v.) by Josephus (War, iv, 9, 1), but not that of the Apocrypha (1 Mac. ix, 40). Comp. Josephus, Ant. xiv, 5, on the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ἀδειά), a town called Æditha (Ædæn) existed to the east of Dissopas (Lydda). According to Schwarz (Phys. Description of Palestine, p. 134), it was identical with the present village el-Chariduka, situated 5 Eng. miles east of Lod, on the summit of a round mountain: probably the same with that seen by Dr. Robinson, and called by him el-Heidiek, a large village just at the mouth of a wady, as it issues from the hills east of Ludd into the plain" (new ed. of Researches, lli, 143, note). This district, although within the territory of Dan, belonged to Benjamin. The same place is described by the old Jewish traveller ha-Parchi as being "the summit of a round hill," and identified by him, no doubt correctly, with Hadid (Zinz, in Asher's Benj. of Tudea, i, 439).

Hadj (Hadj, Haji, Arab.), pilgrimage, especially to Mecca. The name hadj is also given to the body of pilgrims to Mecca; and the word is defined to mean "aspiration." Every Mohammedan, male or female, is bound, once at least in his lifetime, to make the hajj to Mecca. Some of the Mohammedan authorities, however, hold that a substitute may be employed; while lunatics, slaves, and minors are free from the obligation. The solemnities at Mecca are held in the twelfth month of the Mohammedan year; and the male pilgrims, arriving at certain points near Mecca, put on the sacred habit and prepare their minds for the ceremonies. Arriving at Mecca, each pilgrim walks seven times around the Kaubah; next he visits Mount Arafat, twelve miles from Mecca, for prayer and instruction. The next night is spent in devotion at Mugdalipah, and the next day the pilgrim visits a sacred monument at the spot where Mohammed went to pray. The ceremonies end with sacrifices. Every returning pilgrim is styled Ha:gij (Haji) thereafter.

Had'in (Heb. חָדִיד, "defectively" דָּבֵדְיָם in Chor.); First suggests [Heb. Lex. s. v. דָּבֵדְיָם, "Badman" [L. & S. for Ador, the fire-god; see Hadram] (xvii); see Hadram]. The Sab. at Gen. x, 27 has Adoron; Sept. in Gen. x, 27, Ædorsj, Vulg. Aedors; in 1 Chron. i, 21, Ædorj; in 1 Chron. xiv, 10, Ædors; in 2 Chron. x, 18, Ædors; Vulg. in all these last, Aderon), the name of three men.
HADRACH

1. HADRACH, the fifth son of Joktan, and progenitor of a tribe of the same name in Arabia Felix (Gen. x., 27; 1 Chron. vi., 21). E.C. post 241 B.C. B. C. 180 B.C. (Philo's, ii, 20; Josephus, Ant. xiv. 4, 3). HADRACH or DRAKE or Dracon is in the Persian Gulf (Plin. vi., 32), and the promontory Kopodamat (Ras el-Hai) of Prov. vi. 7, 11. Michaelis (Spicileg. ii, 162) despairs of all identification of the tribe in question. Schultess (Parad. p. 83) and Gesenius (Thes. Heb. v. 28) believe HADRACH or Adracon are mentioned from Pтолeman (Alcaeitara, Geog. vi. 7) places on the southern shores of Arabia, between the Horemites (Hamarites) and the Socharites, an account with which Phiny ("Aram.ios"), Hist. Nat. vi. 28, 32; xii. 14, 30) substantially agrees.—Winer, i, 433. Frenzel cites an Arab author who identifies the tribe with the Jordan; but that being a contraction of Jehoram, which contains the name of Jeho- vah, is peculiarly an Israelitish appellation. By Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, 4) he is called Alobomos. 3. ADONIRAM (q. v.), as he is elsewhere more fully called (1 Kings iv. 6; vi. 14; Josephus constantly Alobomos) the son of Abda, the treasurer of taxes under Solomon, and who was stoned to death by the people of the northern tribes when sent by Rehoboam to exact the usual dues (2 Chron. x., 18). Ha'adrach (Heb. Chadorack, הדרּךָ, signif. unknown, but possibly connected with Hador—see HADRACH; Sept. Zechar, Vulg. Hadrach), apparently the name of a country, and (as we may gather from the parallel member of the sole and obscure passage where it occurs) near or identical with Damascus (Zech. ix. 1). The meaning seems to be, "The utterance of the word of Jehovah respecting the land of Hadrach; and Damascus is the place upon which it rests." On the locality in question, great division of opinion exists. Adin- chenius says, "Adra, or Hadrach, alias Adra . . . is a city not far from Damascus, about twenty miles from Babylon, and from it the adjacent region takes the name of Land of Hadrach. This was the land which formed the subject of Zechariah's prophecy" (Theorum Terrarum Sanctarum, p. 75). Rabbi Joseph, a Damascene, according to Darchi, declared he knew a place of this name east of Damascus; and Michaelis says (Stephens, p. 627), "To this I may add what I learned, in the year 1769, from Joseph Abbasi, a noble Arab of the country beyond Jordan. I inquired whether he knew a city called Hadrak . . . He replied that there was a city of that name, which, though now small, had been the capital of a large region called the land of Hadrak," etc. The two names, however, are entirely different (מער, Hadrach; Arab, Edraa), and there is no historical evidence that Edraa's ever was the capital of a large territory. See EINIEL. Yet corroborative of the existence of the place in question are the explicit statements of Cyril and Theodoret in commenting on the above passage. But to these it is objected that no modern traveler has heard of such a place in this region; Gesenius especially (Theaur. Heb. p. 449) urges that the name could not have become extinct. Yet no other explanation of the word Hadrach hitherto offered is as all satisfaction. Movers (in his multiplication of the names of Israel, a. v.) suggests that Hadrach may be the name of one of the old deities (compare Adon, Justin, xxxvi, 2, and Atergattis) of Damascus (Die Philosoph., i, 478); and Bleek conjectures that reference is made to a king of that city (Studien u. Kritiken, 1852, ii, 258). Henderson (Comment. ad loc.) supposes it to be only a corruption of מער, the common names of the kings of Syria. See HADRACH. Jarchi and Kimchi say, "Rahbel juda interpreted it as an al- legory, relating to the blessing of the Messiah, Who was kdrach (מער) to the heathen, and mow (מער) to Israel." Jerome's interpretation is somewhat similar: "Et est ordo verborum; assumptio verbi Domini, aveti in pec- cateores, molla in justos. Adracip quippe hoc resonat ex duobus integris nomen compositum: Ad (מער) acutum, RACH (מער) mole, tenequum significans" (Comment. in Zuch. ad loc.). Hengstenberg (Christol. iii, 372) adopts the same etymology and meaning, but regards the word Hadrach as a symbolical appellation of the Persian empire, whose power should be overthrown by Alexander Zechariah here foretells. He says the prophet does not mention the real name, because, as he lived during the supremacy of Persia, such a reference would have exposed him to danger. See ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF.

Looking at the passage in which appears to be its plain and natural meaning, no scholar can deny that, according to the usual construction, the proper name following 711s is the name of the "land" itself, or of the nation inhabiting the land, and the analogy presented by all the other names in the section is sufficient proof that this must be the case here (Hengstenberg, iii, 372; Hitzig, iv, 348). Other names mentioned in the same connection—Damascus, Hamath, Tyre, Zidon, Gaza, etc.; it is natural to infer that Hadrach is also the name of a place known to the prophet. Its position is not accurately defined. The words of the passage do not connect it more closely with Damascus than with Hamath. It is remarkable that no such name is elsewhere found in ancient writers. The translators of the Sept. were ignorant of it. So was Jerome. No such place is now known. Yet this does not prove that there never was such a name. Many ancient names have disappeared, as it seems to be the case with this (see Alföldi, Plac. de terris Chadrach, Tr. ad Rhen. 1762; also in Uglino, vii). See DAMASCUS.

HADRIAN, T. See ADRIAN.

HADRIANUS, P. EMMILIUS, the 14th Roman emperor (from A.D. 117-138), was a relative and the ward of Trajan, and married Julia Sabina, the granddaughter of Marciana, sister of that emperor. In regard to the place of his birth, the statement of Spartianus (De vita Hadriani, i) that he was born at Rome Jan. 24, A.D. 76, is not corroborated as the most reliable, though others name Italia in Spain, where his ancestors had settled in the time of Scipio (see Eutrophius, vii, 6, and Eusebius, Chronicon, No. 2155, p. 166, ed. Scaliger). Aid- ed by the preference of Trajan's wife, Plotina, and showing himself capable in the positions intrusted to him, he rose rapidly, and on the death of Trajan succeeded to the empire, having been either really adopted as his suc- cessor by that emperor, or palmed off as such by Plotina and her party. For a statement of the conflicting opin- ions on this point, see Spartianus (De vita Hadriani, iv.) and Dinn Cassius (Ixix, 1). When Hadrian assumed the reins of empire, his name was Dinius (A.D. 117), he found the quiet of the empire threatened at several points, but, adopting a general policy of peace, he succeeded in preventing out- break and invasions in nearly every instance. In fur- therance of this peaceful policy, he withdrew the legions from some of the provinces of his predecessor in Syria, the Tigris and Euphrates, and would have also abandoned Dacia had not populous Roman colonies existed there. Impelled by curiosity, or, more probably, by a desire to see for himself the condition of the empire, he jour- neyed extensively through it, leaving everywhere monu- ments of his munificent liberality, besides other useful or ornamental works. He made many improvements in the laws, and the Exspectum perpetuum Hadriani (a codification of prudential edicts made by his orders) marked a era in the historical development of The Roman law. Hadrian, though a volupturny in private life, was a patron of the arts and of learning; was fond of the society of artists, poets, scholars, philosophers, etc., and even aspired to rank among them; but his inferior taste, his jealousy, his overweening vanity, and his imprudent frankness and contradiction led him to acts of cruel injustice towards the learned men he gathered about him.

His conduct towards the Christians was marked by a sense of justice. The pronouncement of Asia Minor having compelled Hadrian that the people at their festivals demanded the crucifixion, the Christians had a script forbidden such executions, and requiring that all complaints against the Christians should be made in legal form. Though this edict failed to secure immunity to Christians from persecution, since the fourth persecution occurred during his reign, Hadrian was not blamed by Melito, Tertullian, or Eusebius among their persecutors, and his reign is regarded as in general favorable to the progress of Christianity.

The peace of his reign was broken by one serious war. Among the Jews a spirit of discontent had been kept alive ever since the capture of Jerusalem by Titus. Wishing to eradicate this spirit by the destruction of the Jewish nationality, Hadrian issued an edict forbidding the practice of circumcision, and determined to erect on the ruins of Jerusalem a new Roman city, to be called after himself, Elia Capitolina. Consequently a furious revolt of the Jews broke out under the lead of Bar Cochba, a pretended messiah, and it was only after having suffered great losses, and having almost exterminated the Jewish nation (500,000 Jews are said to have perished), that the imperial armies succeeded in crushing the revolt, although the able general, Flavius Silva, had been recalled from distant shores of Britain to lead them. Elia Capitolina rose over the ruins of the Holy City, but the Jew was forbidden, on the pain of death, to enter it, and from that time the race was dispersed through the world. Antoninus Pius yielded the prohibition of circumcision. Hadrian died at Baiae on July 19, 138; but his last days had been marked by such outrageous cruelties that Antoninus, his successor, with difficulty secured the customary honors to his memory.

Hemorrhage. See Isura.

Hemorrhoids (αναπορεία, techoriai), prob. tumors mucos, i.e. the piles, so called as protruded (the root is ἀπορία, to stretch) from the fundament, or from the straining or tenesmus with flow of blood, which the Mucosities have everywhere inserted in the margin for the textual [he apparently more vulgar and less proper] in the beginning of the edition of 1644. In the beginning of the edition of 1644. In the beginning of the edition of 1644.

References: Orig. Heb. ii. 14; Sibylline, and Medullar. p. 23; and Sept. and Vulg. understand a see in the secret parts, a painful disease with which the Philistines were afflicted by God as a punishment for defiling the sacred ark at Ashdod after they had captured it in the battle (2 Sam. v. 6). The word occurs among the physical curses denounced among the Israelites by Moses in case of apostasy (Deut. xxviii, 27). Interpreters are not agreed on the exact signification of the original terms, or nor on the nature of the disease, although most think that those painful tumors in the fundament are meant which sometimes turn into ulcers. e. the piles (id. xxviii, 66). Other passages with the name of the fundament itself, podex (Bochart, Hieroz. i. 382; see Fuller in Miscel. Sac. v. 8; Kanne, Die goldene Aere der Philist, Nurim, 1820). The Sept. and Vulg. add to ver. 9 that the Philistines made seats of skins, upon which to sit with more ease, by reason of their incontinence. The cause of this disease is no more known than the effect of it. The Philistines, perhaps, thus related the story: but it is evidently passed for truth that this disease was ancient, and had been sent among them by some avenging deity. To remedy this suffering, and to remove the ravages committed by rats, which wasted their country, the Philistines were visited by the images of the emperors to return the ark of God with the following offerings (1 Sam. vi, 1-18): five figures of a golden emerald, that is, of the part afflicted, and five golden rats; hereby acknowledging that this plague was the effect of divine justice. This advice was followed; and Josephus (Ant. xii. 7, 6, 1, for a description of the image see J. ii. 19.) says that the images of the emperors were also set up in the sanctuary (see Frey, De more simulacrorum innumeros conservandii, Alt. 1746); and such kinds of ex votos are still frequent in Catholic countries, being consecrated in honor of some saint who is supposed to have wrought the cure: they are images of wax or of metal, exhibiting those parts of the body which had been diseased, and seated. The scholar on Aristophanes (Acharn. 231) mentions a similar plague (followed by a similar subsequent prophitiation to that mentioned in Scripture), as sent upon the Athenians by Bacchus. The opinion is also often mentioned by the Jews (esp. by Philo). Lichtenstein (in Eichhorn's Biblioth. vi. 405-467), that the plague of emerods and that of mice are one and the same, the former being caused by an insect (olypgas) as large as a field-mouse, is hardly worth serious attention. Kito thinks that they were rather infamias specially occupying the field-mice, and he determined the cause of obviating the effects of the disease (Daily Bible Illustr. at loc.). The words of 1 Sam. v. 12, "The men that did not were smitten with emerods," show that the disease was not necessarily fatal. It is clear from its parallelism with "both" and other diseases in Deut. xxviii, 27, that τασπόμος is a disease, not a part of the body (see Beyer, De hemorroidibus ex lege Moabici, Lips. 1792). Now 1 Sam. v. 11, how the images of the emperors were set up, after they were actually made and placed in the ark. It thus appears probable that the former word means the disease and the latter the part affected, which must necessarily have been included in the actually existing image, and have struck the eye as the essential thing represented, to which the disease was an incident. As some morbid swelling, then, seems the most probable nature of the disease, so no more probable conjecture has been advanced than that hemorroidial tumors or bleeding piles, known to the Romans as warseae (Juv. i. 18), are intended. These are very common in Syria at present, Oriental habits of a want of cleanliness, and the improper food, producing derangement of the liver, constipation, etc., being such as to cause them. See Disease.
ers of the Reformed faith in the Netherlands, was probably born about the year 1525 in Schouwen. The parents of Adrian van Heiden seem to have been among the earliest in Zealand to embrace the Reformed faith. He understood several languages, wrote in both Latin and Dutch. His Dutch style is remarkable for perspicacity and strength. Adrian van Heiden was in 1557 ministering to the Reformed church in Antwerp, and his labors there were eminently successful. Deeply sympathizing with the persecuted Protestants in France, he wrote in Latin a letter to Henry the Second of France, in which he remonstrates with him and pleads with him to exercise clemency. This letter is dated Dec. 1, 1557, and is thus in advance of the measures set on foot by Calvin and Beza in behalf of these persecuted followers of Christ. Van Haemstede in this letter suggests a conference such as was held at Paderborn in 1530. Van der Heiden, sent at his request by the church at Emden to assist him at Antwerp, having arrived, he took occasion to leave for a time (Feb. 1558). During his absence dark clouds gathered, and soon after his return the storm burst. Van der Heiden, whose place of preaching had been betrayed by a woman, was seized. Van Haemstede remained, though a price was set upon his head, and certain death awaited him if captured. His two faithful helpers, Gillis and Antoine Verdikt, were both burned at Brussels. He left Antwerp probably in March, 1559, and sought refuge in Ost Friesland. Subsequently he labored for a short time at Groningen, and was thence sent to England to take charge of a Reformed church in London. He espoused the cause of the better class of Anabaptists, so far as to maintain that they should not be punished for their doctrinal error respecting the humanity of Christ, since they acknowledged his divinity and depended on him for salvation. This view was in direct conflict with the views and practice of Cranmer and Ridley, who had in 1551 condemned to the flames Joris van Parre, a Netherlander of irreproachable morals, simply on account of his doctrinal belief. As the church in England at that time under the supervision of Edmund Grindal, bishop of London, he was called to account for his views, and, adhering to them, was banished from the kingdom. On his return to Holland he was deprived of all his property. Em- den, too, refused to receive him. He bore his trials and patiently submitted to the cruel and Christian manner in which the earnest request of many of the London congregation, he finally went thither again. The bishop of London demanded a recantation. He refused. Again he was banished.

With a heavy heart he returned to Friesland, where he soon after died. His death occurred in 1562. In his view he was living in liberty, and far in advance of his age, and fell a victim to the reigning spirit of intolerance. He was the author of the first Book of Martyrs published in the Netherlands. It is conjectured that it was first published at Antwerp during the persecution, and issued in sheets as it was prepared. The original edition, which is extremely rare, is in small quarto, bearing the author's name, but not the place of its publication. It met with great favor, and for two centuries it was the manual of thousands, having passed through many successive editions. See an able and interesting monograph of Rev. John Jacob Utrecht in the vith vol. of Kist and Raynard's Archief voor Kerkeleid Geschichte, zuonderhoud van Nederlant (Leid. 1835); Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland, D. ii. (J. W. W.)

Haereticum combruredo, a writ which, in English, "anciently lay against a heretic, who, having once been convicted of heresy by his bishop, and having abjured it, afterwards falling into it again, or into some other, is thereupon committed to the secular power. The common law does not apply the common law itself; however, the conviction of heresy by the common law was not in any petty ecclesiastical court, but before the archbishop himself, in a provincial synod, and the delinquency was delivered up to the king, to do with him as he pleased; so that the crown had a control over the spiritual power; but by 2 Henry IV, cap. 15, the intervention of a synod, might convict of heretical tenets; and unless the convict abjured his opinions, or, if after abjuration, he relapsed, the sheriff was bound, ex officio, if required by the bishop, to commit the unhappy victim to the flames, without waiting for the consent of the crown. This writ remained in force, and was actually executed on two Anabaptists in the seventh of Elizabeth, and on two Arians in the ninth of James I. Sir Edward Coke was of opinion that this writ did not lie in his time; but it is now formally taken away by statute 29 Car. II, cap. 9. But this statute does not extend to take away or alter the jurisdiction of Protestant archbishops, or bishops, or any other judges of any ecclesiastical courts, in cases of atheism, blasphemy, heresy, or schism; but they may prove and punish the same, according to his majesty's ecclesiastical laws, by excommunication, deprivation, degradation, and other ecclesiastical censures, not extending to death, in 1563, and 1571, and no other, so they might have done before the making of this act."—Buck, Theological Dictionary, s. v.

Hafnerreffer, Matthias (also Hafenerreffer), a Lutheran theologian, was born June 24, 1561, at Lorch, in Württemberg, and died Oct. 22, 1619 at Tubingen. He studied philosophy and theology at the last-named place, and in 1580 was made court-preacher and counsellor of the City of Tubingen: in 1592 became professor of theology, and in 1617 chancellor and provost at Tubingen. To a profound and comprehensive learning, he united a sweet and peace-loving disposition, which led him to keep aloof for the most part from the theological strife of his age, and to find his pleasures in directing the studies of his pupils, and in that affectionate appreciation of him Val. Andrei and others bear testimony. His chief work, Loci theologici certe methodo ex ratione in tres libros tribuit (Tubingen, 1600; an improved and enlarged ed. 1603), published at the request of Frederick, duke of Württemberg, for the use of prince John Frederick, was regarded as a model not only of Lutheran orthodoxy, but also of clearness and definiteness in conception, and expression and simplicity in style. It was the text-book of theology at Tubingen up to the end of the 17th century, supplementing Heerbrand's Compendium, which had almost symbolical authority there. By royal decree it was, in 1615, made the official text-book of dogmatics in the University of Upsala and other Swedish institutions of learning. Charles XII is said to have almost known it by heart. Hafnerreffer wrote also some controversial works against the Romanists and Calvinists, and a work entitled Tempel Zerstöret (Tubingen, 1613, fol.).—Hertzog, Real-Encyklopädie, v. 409. (J. W. M.)

Haffner, Isaac, a French Protestant minister and distinguished humanist, was born at Strasbourg in 1751. After studying at Paris and visiting several of the German universities, he was ordained, and soon acquired great reputation as a preacher. He came successively dean of the theological faculty of that city, and died there May 27, 1831. He had been instrumental in restoring in part the old university of Strasbourg under the title of Protestant theological academy, which was afterwards changed to Protestant seminary. On his inauguration he delivered an address, printed under the title Des Secours que l'étoile des langues, de l'histoire, de la philosophie et de la littérature offtre à la théologie (Strasb. 1783, 8vo); he wrote also De l'éducation littéraire, ou essai sur l'organisation d'un établissement pour les hautes sciences (Strasb. 1792, 8vo). His Discours on the importance of education in the ministry were published under the title Jubilé d'Haffner (French and German, Strasb. 1831, 8vo). See
HAGAR

Hagar (Heb. Ḥagar), a stranger, from her foreign birth [comp. Hagar-ken]; Sept. and N. T. Ἀγαρ, a native of Egypt, and servant of Abraham (Gen. xxix, 9, 10), perhaps one of the female slaves presented to Abraham by Pharaoh during his visit to Egypt (Gen. xii, 15), although she properly belonged to Sarah (Gen. xxh, 16). This continued sterility of Sarah suggested to her the idea (not uncommon in the East) of becoming a mother by proxy through her handmaid, whom, with that view, she gave to Abraham as a secondary wife (Gen. xv). B.C. 2075. See ABRAHAM; CONCUBINAGE.

This honor was toogreat and unexpected for the weak and ill-regulated mind of Hagar; and no sooner did she find herself likely to become the mother of her master’s heir than she openly indulged in triumph over her less favored mistress. The feelings of Sarah were severely wounded, and she broke out into her usual rather in complaints of the servant’s petulance. Abraham, whose meek and prudent behavior is strikingly contrasted with the violence of his wife, left her with unfettered power, as mistress of his household, to take what steps she pleased to obtain the required relief. (See Kirk’s "Daily Bk. of Illust. ad loc.") In all Oriental states where concubinage is legalized, the principal wife has authority over the rest; the secondary one, if a slave, retains her former condition unchanged, and society thus presents the strange anomaly of a woman being at once the material of her master’s household, and mistress of the partner of her master’s permission, however, was necessary in an Eastern household, but it is worthy of remark that it is now very rarely given; nor can we think from the unchangeable-ness of Eastern customs, and the strongly-marked national character of those peoples, that it was usual antici- pately to allow a wife to deal harshly with a slave in Hagar’s position. Left with this authority over her dowal maid-servant, Sarah was neither reluctant nor sparing in making the minion reap the fruits of her in- solence; but whether she actually inflicted blows (Augustine, Epist. xlvi), or merely threw out menaces to that effect, cannot be determined from the limited evidence (to "afflicere"); there employed. Sensible, at length, of the hopelessness of getting the better of her mistress, Hagar determined on flight; and having seemingly formed the purpose of returning to her relations in Egypt, she took the direction of that country, which led her to what was afterwards called Shur, through a long tract of sandy uninhabited country, bringing on herself the destruction of Zipporah, the wife of Jethro, to the extent of 150 miles between Palestine and Egypt. Here she was sitting by a fountain to replenish her skin-bottle or recruit her wearied limbs, when the angel of the Lord appeared, and in the kind-liest manner remonstrated with her on the course she was pursuing, and encouraged her to believe the promise that she would ere long have a son, whom Prov-idence destined to become a great man, and whose wild and irregular features of character would be indubitably impressed on the mighty nation that should spring from him. Oblivious to the heavenly visitor, and having distinguished the place by the name of Beer-lahai-roi (q. v.), "the well of the visible God," Hagar retraced her steps to the tent of Abraham, where in due time she had a son; and, having probably narrated this remark- able interview to Abraham, that patriarch, as directed by the angel, took her, and exchanged her name at the child Ismael, "God hath heard" (Gen. xvi). B.C. 2075. Fourteen years after the birth of Ishmael the appearance of the long-promised heir entirely changed the relations of the family, though nothing materially affecting Ishmael took place till the weaning of Isaac, which, as is gener- ally thought, and was then and at the end of his 8th year. B.C. 2061. Ishmael was then fully capable of understanding his altered relations to the inheritance: and when the newly-weaned child, clad, according to custom, with the sacred symbolic robe, which was the badge of the birthright, was formally instated heir of the father, see Bibilh. Bbl. vol. i; Icasis, Amm. p. 92; Bush on Gen. xxvii, 15), he inconsiderately gave vent to his disapfeeling points by an act of mockery (Gen. xxii, 9— the Hebrew word כּוֹרָה, though properly signifying "to call") is frequently used to express strong derision, as in Gen. xix, 14; Neh. iv, 19; iv, 1; Ezek. xxxii, 32; accompanied, as is probable on some of the occasions referred to in these passages, with violent gestures, which might very justly be interpreted as persecution, Gal. iv, 28-31. The sonry of Abraham's inheritance to Isaac was guided by the special command of God, and, moreover, was in harmony with the immemorial practice of the East, where the son of a slave or secondary wife is always supplantet by that of a freeborn, even if born long after. This insulting conduct of Ishmael's sons gave offence to Sarah, who herself insisted upon his expulsion from the family, together with his mother as conviving at it. So harsh a measure was extremely painful to Abraham; but his scruples were removed by the divine direction to follow Sarah's advice (see Kito's Daily Bible Illustr. ad loc.). "for," adds the Targum of Jonathan, "she is a prophetessa" (compare Gal. iv, 30). Accordingly, "Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water (and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder), and the child, and sent her away" (Gen. xxii, 14). In spite of the instructions, the two exiles made their way. Overcome by fatigue and thirst, the strength of the young Ishmael first gave way, and his mother laid him down in complete exhaustion under one of the stunted shrubs of this arid region, in the hope of obtaining some momentary relief from smelling the cool bow (Gen. xxii, 21). See Ishmael. In a little distance, unable to witness his lingering sufferings, and there "she lifted up her voice and wept." In this distress, the angel of the Lord appeared with a comforting promise of her son's future greatness, and directed her to a fountain, which, concealed by the bushes, had escaped her notice, and from which she was revived the almost lifeless Ishmael. This well, according to the tradition of the Arabs (who pay great honor to the memory of Hagar, and maintain that she was Abraham's lawful wife), is Zemmzem, near Mecca. (See Well's Bibl. Legens., p. 82.) Of the subsequent history of Hagar, we have no account beyond what is involved in that of Ishmael, who established himself in the wilderness of Paran, in the neighborhood of Sh Hai, was married by his mother to a countrywoman of her own, and maintained both himself and his family by the produce of his flocks (Gen. xxvi, 20, 21). In Gen. iv, 24, the apostle Paul, in an allegory, makes Hagar (רְאוּ 배) represent the Jewish Church, which was in bondage to the ceremonial law, as Sarah represents the true Church of Christ, which is free from this bondage. (See Bloomfield's Note, ad loc.) Some commentators, however, have discovered an allusion in the name here with the Arab, word for stone (been). According to Mohammedan tradition, Hagar (Hujir) was buried at Mecca! (D'Herbelot, Bib. Or. s. v. Hagar.) Mr. Rowlands, in travelling through the desert of Beersheba, discovered some wells and a camel's hump, which he declares the Arabs still designate as the "beast of Hagar." (Williams, Holy City, i, 465 sq.) See Abraham.

Hagarene or Hagarite [commonly Ha'garite] (Heb. Ḥaqr, נבגּ, נבגּית, compare Hagar, from the same root as the Arab. Ḥagirah, i. e. flight); but, according to Flurst, s. v., a patriarch from some ancestor Hagar, otherwise unknown; 1 Chron. xi, 38, Sept. Ḥagirah, Vulg. Agarai, A. V. "Haggar," xxxii, 31, Ḥagar, Agarina, Hagarine; "the pl. Ḥagarites," in the plur. Ḥagešni. ፏaska lxxiii, 6, Ḥagarpe, Ḥagarite, Ḥagarenes; fully Ḥagaritea, Ḥagarites; ʿfather a. v., 1 Chron. vi, 10, 19, 20, Sept. in ver. 10 ʿṭarok, in ver. 19, 20 ʿṭarokat, Vulg. Agarari, A. V. "Hagarites; Baruch iii, 28, ʿrrem Aya, filii Agar, Agerenes," occurs apparently as the national or local designation of this people, and also of a tribe or region, probably the same Arab people who appear at different periods of the sacred history as foreigners to the Hebrews. See Arabia.

1. Of individuals it is twice used in connection with the royal staff in the time of David (q. v.).

In 1 Chron. xi, 38 of Mibhar (q. v.), one of David's mighty men, who is described as ʿŷ ayapi, ʿŷ ayapi, Ḥaga, the son of Haggari, or, better (as the margin), "the son of Haggari," is the "father of the whores," as the rendering of the LXX is not given. This hero differs from some of his colleagues, "Zeluck the Ammonite" (ver. 39), for instance; or "Ithnah the Moabite" (ver. 46), in that, while they were foreigners, he was only the son of a foreigner—a domestic of the king of Moab. See Hagarite.

In 1 Chron. xxvii, 31 of Jazar (q. v.), another of David's retainers, who was "over his flocks." This man was himself a "Hagarite," ʿŷ ayapi, Agera, Ageret. A comparison of the next paragraph (v. 2) will show how well qualified for his office this man was likely to be from an extraction from a pastoral race. "A Hagarite had charge of David's flocks, and an Ishmaelite of his herds, because the animals were pastured in districts where these nomadic people were accustomed to feed their cattle" [or, rather, because their experience made them skilful in such employments], Berthau on Chronica et Istriensiumis (C. I. s. 166) comments on this: one of the effects of this great victory over the Hagarites of Gilead and the East was probably that individuals of their nation entered the service of the victorious Israelites, either voluntarily or by coercion, as freemen or as slaves. Jazar was no doubt among the former, a man of eminence and position, as the name indicates; in one of the districts where he attracted the attention of his royal master, who seems to have liberally employed distinguished and meritorious foreigners in his service. See Hagarite.

II. Of a people three times who appear in hostile relation to the Hebrews, nation.

Our first passage treats of a great war, which in the reign of king Saul was waged between the trans-Jordanic tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh on the one side, and their formidable neighbors, the Hagarites, aided by the kindred tribes of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodah, on the other. (Kindred tribes, xiv. 14, 15.) In the evidence of Gen. xxxv, 15. The Arab tribes derived from Hagar and Ishmael, like the earlier stocks descended from Cush and Joktan, were at the same time generall known by the common patronymic of Ishmaelites or Hagarites. Some regard the three specific names of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodah, on the one hand, and his Hagarites with whom the two tribes and a half successfully fought were the clans of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodah. See Forster's Geop. of Arabia, x, 186-189.) The result of this war was extremely favorable to the eastward Israelites: many of the enemy were taken and many slain in the contest (ver. 21, 22); the victorious two tribes and a half took possession of the country, and retained it until the captivity (ver. 22). The booty carried on this occasion was enormous: of sheep 50,000, of camels 3,000, of oxen 500, and 500 sheep and goats (i, 3). Mecha, king of Moab, paid to the king of Israel a tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (2 Kings iii, 4). In further illustration of this wealth of cattle, we may quote a passage from Stanley's Jewish Church, i, 215, 216: "Still the countless flocks and herds may be seen in this very region conquered from the Hagarites, droves of cattle moving on like troops of soldiers, descending at sunset to drink of the springs—literally, in the language of the prophet, 'rams and lambs, and goats and bullocks, all of them fettings of Bashan.' By this conquest, which was still more firmly ratified in the subsequent reign of David, the promise, which was given as early as Abraham's time (Gen. xv, 18) and renewed to Moses (Deut. i, 7) and to Joshua (ii, 4), began to receive that accomplishment from the large and rapidly increasing area of the tribes and confederate states (1 Kings iv, 21). The large tract of country which thus accrued to Israel stretched from the infinite frontier of the pastoral tribes, to whom were formerly assigned the kingdoms of Sion and Og, to the Euphrates. A comparison of 1 Chron. v, 9-20 with Gen. xxxv, 12-20 shows that the line of the boundary marked by the Tigris (as the history informs us) extended eastward of Gilead and Bashan in the direction of the Euphrates, was substantially the same as that which Moses describes as peopled by the sons of Ishmael, whom Hagar bore to Abraham. "They dwell," says Moses, "from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt as thou goest towards Assyria"—in other words, across the country from the junction of the Euphrates with the Tigris to the isthmus of Suez; and this is the spacious tract which we assign to the Hagarites or Hagarans. The booty taken from the Hagarites and their allies proves that much of this territory was well adapted to pasturage, and therefore valuable to the nomadic habits of the conquerors (Num. xxxii, 1). The brilliancy of the conquest, moreover, exhibits the military prowess of these shepherds. Living amid races whose love of plunder is still ill-defined, and with their enemies in this line of work, they were obliged to erect fortresses for the protection of their pastures (Michaelis, Lausa of Moses, art. xxiii), a precaution which seems to have been resorted to from the first. The sons of Ishmael are enumerated, Gen. xxxv, 16, "by their towns and by their cattle;" and some such defensive erections were no doubt made by the children of Reuben and Gad inNum. xxxii, 16, 17. See Ishmaelites.

2. Though these eastern Ishmaelites became lords paramount of this vast tract of country, it is not necessary to suppose that they exclusively occupied the entire region, nor that the Hagarites and their kindred, though subdued, were driven out; for it was probably in the same neighborhood that "the Hagarans" of our second passage were living when they joined in the great confederacy against Israel with, among others, Edom, and Moab, and Ammon, and Amalek (Psa. lxxiii, 6 [Heb. 21]), which, if it be true that Amalek is the place of little importance here; Mr. Thrupp (Psalms, ii, 60, 61) gives reasons for assigning to it the reigns of Jehoshaphat and of his son Jerobeam II. The psalm was probably written on the triumph of Jehoshaphat over the trans-Jordanic Besouins (2 Chron. xxi). See Psalms. The name Edom, according to the neighborhood of the Euphrates and the three Hagarans with the Hagarites, seem to confirm our opinion that these were still residing in the district, where in the reign of Saul they had been subdued by their Israelitish neighbors. Rosenmuller (Hiss. Geogr., p. 68) state that the Hagarans when vanquished migrated to the south-east, because on the Persian Gulf there was the province of Hagar or Hajr. This is the district which the Arab geographers have carefully and prominently described (compare De Sacy's Chrétomathie d'Abbe, i, 123). Abulfeda [by Reinhard], i, 137, who quotes Jakut's Arabisches Dictionarium, and gives the following commentary on Abulfeda, "In Prope. Hajar, sive Bohr-ruis, p. 87, 88, 89, D'Herbelot, s. v. Hajr." We will not deny that this province probably derived its name and early inhabitants from Hajr and her son Ishmael (or, as some, have supposed, from Solomon, from the same tribe); but we are not of opinion that these Hagarans of the Arabian Gulf, whose pursuits were so different, were identical with the Hagarites of the Psalms before cited, or with the Hagarites of 1 Chron., whom we have identified with the Persian gulf maritime tribe; Rommel quotes two from Arabic geographers, Taifashi and Baki, who both describe these Hagarans of the coast as much employed in pearling and such pursuits. Niebuhr (Reisen in Arabien [Engl. tr.], ii, 151, 152) confirms their statement. Ge- senius is also inexact in identifying these "maritime Hagarans" of the east with the "sanctified" Ebarothesenes, in Strabo, xvi, 767, and Pliny, vi, 24. If the tribes indicated in these classical authors be the same (which is doubtful), they are much more correctly identified by an older writer, Dr. T. Jackson (Works [ed. Oxon.], i, 220), who says: "The seat of such as 18, says the Scripture calls Hagarites, which is on the desert Asia, betwixt Gilead and Euphrates (1 Chron. v, 9, 10). This people were called by the heathen 'Ayybaytun, Agrei, rightly placed by Ptolemy in the desert Arabia, and by Strabo in that very place which the Scripture makes the eastern bounds of Ishmael's posterity, to wit, next into the inhabited sea of Bih-east. And the difficulty of identification, some modern geographers have distributed the classical Agrei in various localities. Thus, in ForSTER'S map of Arabia, they occupy both the district between Gilead and the Euphrates in the north, and also the western shores of the Persian Gulf. The fact seems to be that these districts in Arabia were called by the generic appellation of Hagarites or Hagarans, no doubt after Hagar: as Kutarah, another of Abraham's concubines, occasioned the rather vaguely-used name of Keturans for other tribes of the Arabian peninsula (the Arabic, ii, 31). Forster, Geogr. des Orient, p. 393, mentions the ancient town of Abulbada which we have above quoted, that geographer (after the author of the Moslem) reminds us that the name Hajr (Hagar) is as extensive in meaning in Arabia as Shem (Syria) and Irak elsewhere; in like manner Rommel, within a page or two, describes a Hagar in the remote province of Yemen; this, although an unquestionably different place (Reinhard, ii, 187, note), is yet confined with the maritime Hajar. In proof of the uncertainty of the situation of places in Arabia of like name, we may mention that, while Abulfeda, Eritri, Giauari, and Golias distinguish between the Hagarans of the Greek coast, and those of the remote south-west district which we have just mentioned, Nasir Edin, Olugheig, and Busching confound them as identical. Winer, Recher. s. v. Hagarites, mentions yet another Ojar, which, though slightly different in form, might be written much like our word in Hebrew נך' and is actually identical with it in the Syriac (Assenmann, Bibl. Orient. III, ii, 750). This place was in the province of Hezaj, on the Red Sea, on the main route between Damascus and Mecca. Such being the uncertainty connected with the sites of these Arab tribes, we have no hesitation in placing the Hagarans of the neighborhood of the Persian Gulf, in the situation which was in Saul's time occupied by the Hagarites, "near the main road which led [or, more correctly, in the belt of country which stretched] from the head of the Red Sea to the Euphrates" (Smith's Hist, of Geog., s. v. Agrei; see also Bochart, Phaleg [edit. Villemain], II, ii, 225). The mention both of Ishmaelites and Hagarans in this Psalm has led to the opinion that they are separate nations here meant. The verse, however, is in the midst of a poetic parallelism, in which the clauses are synonymous and not antithetic (comp. ver. 5-11), so that if "Edom and the Ishmaelites" is not absolutely identical in geographical signification with "Moab and the Hagarans," there is at least a poetical identity between these two groups which forbids our separating them entirely from each other in any sense (for the dispersed condition of the Hagarans, see also Fuller, Misc. Dei, p. 215). The Krimchi Fullah, 194, 79, ascribes this identity to the unrelenting hostility of their neighbors towards the Jews to a very late period. One of these is mentioned in 1 Mac. v, as dispersed by Judas Maccabaeus. "The children of Bean" (uay Bayy) of ver. 4 have been by Hitzig conjectured to be the same as those of the Hagarans; there is no sufficient ground for this opinion than their vicinity to Edom and Ammon, and the difficulty of making them fit in with any other tribe as conveniently as with that which is the subject of this article (see J. Olsenhaus, _The Psalms_, p. 325).

In the passage from Baruch iii, 23 there are attributed to "the Agarenes" qualities of wisdom for which the Arabian nation has long been celebrated, skill in proverbial philosophy (comp. Freytag, _Arab. Proev. tom. iii, pref.); in this accomplishment they have associated with them "the merchants of Meran and of Theman." This is not the place to discuss the site of Meran, which some have placed on the Persian Gulf, and others on the Red Sea; it is enough to observe that their mercantile habits gave them a shrewdness in practical knowledge which rendered them worthy of comparison with "the merchants of Tyr and Gaza" (Ezek. xxi, 26), an attainment which makes the Themanese to be inhabitants of the maritime Bahrain, and therefore Hagarenes (i, 303); but in this he is flagrantly inconsistent with his own good canon (i, 291):

"The name of the son of Eliphaz and of his descendants [the E-lomites] is uniformly written Teman in the original antquus, and family [the Hagarenes or Ishmaelites] as uniformly Tema [without the n]." The wisdom of these Themanese merchants is expressly mentioned in Jer. xlix, 7, and Obadiah, ver. 8. The Hagarenes of this passage we would place among the inhabitants of the shores of the Persian Gulf, where (see i, 291, 292) the scribes place the Hagaretes after their conquest by the trans-Jordanian Israelites. The clause, "That seek wisdom on earth" [that is, "who acquire experience and intelligence from intercourse with mankind"] (the Sept. of _κοιτησμόνι την σίοναν ει τις της γης,_ is surely corrupt, because meaningless: by the help of the Vulgate and the Syriac it has been conjectured by some [by Havernick and Fritzsch, _ad loc._ for instance] that instead of _οι τις_ we should read _ρητι τις_, q. d. "the wisdom [or common sense] which is cognizant of the earth—men and manners," an attainment which mercantile people acquire better than all else), seems to best fall in with the habits of a seafaring and mercantile race (see Fritzsch, _das Buch Baruch_, p. 192; and Havernick, whose words he quotes: "Hagareni terram quasi perlanstrantes discurrant, quippe mercantes longo celebrantem tempore, et habebant eum tempore.

Hagenaus, Conference of, a theological conference called by the German emperor in 1389 in order to bring about a reunion between Protestants and Roman Catholics. Having originally been convoked to Worms, it was transferred to Hagenaus in consequence of an epidemic prevailing in the former city. It lasted from January 15th to March 16th. It was convened in order to send Luther without a special protection, and as Melancthon fell sick during the journey, the Protestants were represented by Brenz, Osiander, Capito, Cruicerig, and Myconius; and the Roman Catholics by Eck, Fasber, and Coelebues. The conference led to no definite results. It was agreed that an equal number of representatives, chosen by the two parties, should meet at Worms, and resume the negotiations for a union.—HERZOG, xix, 569. (A. J. S.)

Haggadah (Heb. _anecdote, legend_), in the Talmud, and with the Rabbis the name for traditional stories, legends, etc. used in the interpretation and elucidation of the law and the prophets. Many of the _haggadot_ in the Talmud are absurd and preposterous, and they are not held by the best Rabbins as authoritative. Maimonides says of them: "Beware that you take not these words of Hermogenes (wise) literature, which would be degrading to the sacred doctrine, and sometimes to contradict it. Seek rather the hidden sense; and if you cannot find the kernel, let the shell alone, and confess 'I cannot understand this'" (_Peroth Hamishnahgoth._)

First, _Kulturgeschichte d. Juden_, i, 74; _Ethiopisches, Introduction in Hebreo_, i, p. 192; Joseph, _Gesch. d. Juden_, i, 178; ii, 213. The Haggadah is frequently referred to in the Mishnah (rule, norm), the oral law of tradition, brief sentences established by the authority of the Sanhedrin, in which the law was interpreted and applied to individual cases, and which were designated as the "sentences of the elders." See MIDRASH: (J. H. W.)

_Hagga(i) (Heb. _Chaggogi, _ו, festive_; Sept. and Joseph. _Avayauf_; Jerome and Vulg. _Agapeus or Haggaus_, the tenth in the order of the twelve minor prophets, and the third in the three who, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian exile, proved themselves distinguished for their prophetical gifts. Of the place and year of his birth, his descent, and the leading incidents of his life, nothing is known which can be relied on (see Oehler, in Herzog's _Enzyklo_, v, 471 sqq.). The more fabulous traditions of Jewish writers, who pass him for an ancestor of the _Phasagous Maga_, and enlarge on his literary avocations, have been collected by Carzov (Introduction in V. T., iii, 426). Some interpreters, indeed, taking in its literal sense the expression _ברב ראשות_ (malak Yehkabod) i, 1, 13, have imagined that he was an angel in human shape (Jerome, _Comm. ad loc._). Some ancient writers assert that he was a priest, and in that capacity he came to Jerusalem, when Cyrus, in the year B.C. 538, allowed the Jews to return to their country (2 Chron. xxxiv, 23; Ezra i, 1); the new colony consisting chiefly of people belonging to the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, with a few from other tribes. According to the same tradition, he was buried with honor near the sepulchres of the priests (Isidor. Hispal. c. 49; Pseudo-Dorotheus, in Chron. Pasch. 151, d.). It has hence been conjectured that he was of priestly rank. Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, according to the Jewish writers, were the men who were with Daniel when he saw the visions relating to the rebuilding of the temple, and were admitted to the sanctuary of the priests (Isidor. Hispal. c. 49; Pseudo-Dorotheus, in Chron. Pasch. 151, d.). The Seder Olam Zuta places their death in the 52d year of the Medes and Persians, while the extravagance of another tradition makes Haggai survive till the entry of Alexander the Great into Jerusalem, and even till the time of our Saviour (Carzov, _Intro._). In the Roman martyrlogies Hosea and Haggai are joined in the catalogue of saints (Acta Sanctor., 4 Julii). See _Ezra_.

This much appears from Haggai's prophecies (ch. i, 1, etc.), that he flourished during the reign of the Persian monarch Darius Hystaspis, who succeeded the throne B.C. 521. It is probable that he was one of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel and Jeshua: and Ewald (die _Proph. d. Alte B._), is even tempted to infer from ii, 3, that he may have been one of the few survivors who had seen the first Temple in its splendor (Bleek, _Einleitung_, p. 540). The rebuilding of the Temple, which was commenced in the reign of Cyrus (B.C. 535), was suspended during the reigns of his successors, Cambyses and Pseudo-Smerdis, in consequence of the determined hostility of the Samaritans. On the accession of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 521), the prophets Haggai and Zechariah urged the renewal of the undertaking, and obtained the permission and assistance of the king (Ezra v, 1; vi, 14; Josephus, _Ant._, xi, 4). Animated by the high courage (magni spiriatus, Jerome) of these devoted men, the people prosecuted the work with vigor, and the Temple was completed and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius (B.C. 516). See _Temple_.

The names of Haggai and Zechariah are associated in the Sept. in the titles of Psalms xxxvii, cxlv—cxxxviii; in the Vulgate in those of Psalms cxvii, cxxv—cxxxvii; in the Peshito Syriac in those of Psalms cxviii, cxxv—cxxxvii, cxlv, cxxxvii, cxliv, cxxxvii. It may be supposed that to these prophets the arrangement of the above-mentioned psalms for use in the Temple service, just as Psalms cxlv is in the Vulgate attributed to Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and the name of the former is inscribed at the head of Ps. cxxxvi in the Sept. According to Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Prophec.), Haggai was the first who chanted the Hallelujah in the second Temple: "wherefore," he adds, "we say 'Hallelujah, which is the hymn of Haggai and Zechariah.' It is Haggai who is mentioned in the Apocrypha as Agokus, in 1 Esdr. xiv, 7; 2 Esdr. i, 40; and is alluded to in Ecclus. xlix, 11 (comp. Hag. ii, 23), and Heb. xii, 26 (Hag. ii, 6). See Zechariah.

HAGGAI, PROPHECY OF. These vaticinations are comprised in a book of two chapters, and consist of discontinuous and ampliative summary; the latter being a German theologian to suspect that they have not come down to us in their original complete form, but are only an epitome (Eichhorn, Einleitung in das A. T. iii, § 598; John, Introductio in libros sacros Vet. Test. edit. 2, Vienna, 1814, § 156).

Their object generally is to urge the rebuilding of the Temple, which had, indeed, been commenced as early as B.C. 535 (Ezra iii, 10), but was afterwards discontinued, the Samaritans having obtained an edict from the Persian king (Ezra iv, 7) which forbade further procedure, and incontinently the former pretenders to rebuilding the Temple had not arrived, since the seventy years predicted by Jeremiah applied to the Temple also (Zech. i, 2). As on the death of Pseudo-Smerdis (the "Astarteuxoxes" of Ezra iv, see ver. 24), and the consequent termination of his interdict, the Jews still continued and reached the seventh year of the second temple; they were merely engaged in building splendid houses for themselves, Haggai began to prophesy in the second year of Darius, B.C. 520.

His first discourse (ch. i), delivered on the first day of the sixth month of the year mentioned, denounced the idleness of the people and the profanation of the Temple (verses 5, 7-12), and exhorted them to起来 (v. i. 9), and twenty-four days afterwards the building was resumed. The second discourse (ii, 1-9), delivered on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, shows that a month had scarcely elapsed when the work seems to have slackened, and the enthusiasm of the people to have diminished. The prophet, ever ready to reclaim his zeal, encouraged the flagging spirits of the chiefs with the renewed assurance of God's presence, and the fresh promise that, stately and magnificent as the temple of their wisest king, the glory of the latter house should be greater than the glory of the former (ii, 3-9). The third discourse (ii, 10-19), delivered on the twenty-fourth day of the month, refers to a period when building materials had been collected, and the workmen had begun to put them together. Yet the people were still comparatively inactive, and after two months we thus find them again censoring their slowness, which rendered worthless all their ceremonies and observances. But the rebuke was accompanied by a repetition of the promise (ii, 19). The fourth and last discourse (ii, 20-25), delivered also on the twenty-fourth day of the month, is exclusively addressed to Zerubbabel, the political chief of the new Jewish colony, who, it appears, had asked for an explanation regarding the great political revolutions which Haggai had predicted in his second discourse: it comforts the governor by assuring him they would not take place very soon, and not in his lifetime. As Zerubbabel was prince of Judah, the representative of the royal family of David, and, as such, the local ancestor of the Messiah, this closing predic-

English and German. He was instrumental in the conversion of not a few men of ability, who became ornaments of the ministry. He located, owing to the sickness of his wife, in 1730 instead of 1728, in Baltimore, where he continued to preach with great acceptance. He was one of the original elders of the Church, and died in the faith, Sept. 4, 1823, aged seventy-six years.—Stevens, History of the M. E. Church, ii. 66, 496; iii. 144, 146.

Haggi (Heb. Chagggi, כֹּחַגִּי, festire; Sept. Ἀγγί, the second of the seven sons of the patriarch Gad (Gen. xlvii, 16), and progenitor of the family of Haggrites (Numb xxvii, 15; Sept. Άγγι). B.C. prob. ante 1784.

Haggia (Heb. Chagggiyaḥ, חֲגַגִּיָה, festival of Je- rovaḥ: Sept. Ἀγγύα, a Levite of the family of Merari, apparently the father of Shubael and of Gildad. Aasiah, which last seems to have been contemporary with Da- vid (1 Chron. vii, 30 [Heb. 15]). B.C. ante 1048.

Hag'ite (Heb. only as a collect, with the art. Ha- Chaggii, חֲגַגִּי, [for נְפָרִי]; Sept. Ἀγγί, Vulg. Agiti, A.V. “the Haggites”), the family title of the descendents of the son of Gad of the same [Heb.] name (Numb xxvii, 15). See Haggai.

Hag'ith (Heb. Chaggith, חֲגַגִּית, Sept. Ἀγγίθ, v. r. 471γ, but Ἀγγίθ in 1 Chron. ii, 3; Josephus Αγγίθ, Ant. vii, 14, 4), a wife of David, only known as the mother of Azariah (2 Sam. iii, 4; 1 Kings i. 11, 12; ii. 11, 1 Chron. iii, 2), but apparently married to David after his accession to the throne. B.C. 1038. See David.

Her son was, said Absalom, renowned for his handsomeness of presence. In the first and last of the above passages Haggith is fourth in order of mention among the wives, Adonijah being also fourth among the sons. His birth happened at Hebron (2 Sam. iii, 2,5) shortly after that of Absalom (1 Kings i, 6, where it will be observed that the words “his mother” are inserted by the translators) (Smith, s. v.). The Heb. name is merely the fem. of the adj. that appears in the names Haggai, etc., and seems to be indicative of festivity in the religious sense [see Festival]. First renders it “born at the Feast of Tabernacles” (Heb. Lex. s. v.), and Mr. Grove (in Smith, ut supra) regards it as = “a dancer,” from the primitive sense of the root ־השֵּׁפֶל.

Hagigápha. Ἁγιγήφορα (Holy Writinga), a term first found in Epiphanius (Panarion, c. 255), who used it, as well as ἁγαγιά, to denote the third division of the Scriptures, called by the Jews הַגִּיֹּרַה, or the Writers, consisting of fire books [see Miqra'oth], viz. the three poems (יִתְנָה), Job, Proverbs, and the Psalms, and the two books of Chronicles.

These divisions are found in the Talmud (Baba Bath- rah, ed. 1, ed. Amsterdam), where the sacred books are classified under three heads, the Law, the Prophets, and the Writ- ings (Ketubian). The last are divided into three major classes (c. 10, Ruth, the book (perger) of Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Eccle- siastes (Koheleth), the Song of Songs, Lamentations, Daniel, and the books (megillot) of Esther, Ezra, and Chronicles. The Jewish writers, however, do not uniformly follow this arrangement, as they sometimes place the Psalms or the book of Job first among the Hagi- gra. Jerome gives the arrangement followed by the Jews in his time. He observes that they divided the Scriptures into five books of Moses, eight prophetic book (viz. 1. Joshua; 2. Judges and Ruth; 3. Samuel; 4. 1 Kings; 5. Isaiah; 6. Jeremiah; 7. Ezekiel; 8. The twelve prophets), and nine Hagiographa, viz. 1. Job; 2. David, five parts; 3. Solomon, three parts; 4. Kohe- leth; 5. Canticles; 6. Daniel; 7. Chronicles; 8. Esdras, and two books [viz. Ezra and Nehemiah]; 9. Esther. Some, however, he adds, “place Ruth and Lamentations among the Hagiographa rather than among the prophetic books.”

A rabbi reckons thirteen prophetic books, and four con- taining hymns and moral precepts (Apion, i, 8), from which it would appear that after the time of Josephus the Jews comprised many books among the prophets which had previously belonged to the Hagiographa. It has, however, been considered as more probable that Jo- sephus had no authority from manuscripts for his classification.

The earliest notice which we find of these divisions is that contained in the prologue to the book of Eccle- siasticus, written B.C. cir. 140, the author of which re- fers to the Law, the prophets, and the hagiographa, which last were most probably the Hagiographa. Philo also speaks of the Laws, the Prophets, the Hymns, and the other books, but without-classifying them. In the New Testament we find three corresponding divi- sions mentioned, viz. the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms; which did not receive their knowledge to have been divided into the second division, from the circum- stance of the first being the first in the catalogue (Luke xxi, 44). Havercorn, however (Handbook, p. 78), supposes that Luke calls the Hagiographa by the name of the Psalms, rather than by account of the books of the Psalms, or of several of its parts. The “book of the Prophets” is re- ferred to in the New Testament as a distinct volume (Acts vii, 42, where the passage indicated is Amos v. 25, 26). It is well known that the second class was divided by the Jews into the early Prophets, viz. Joshua, Judges, and Kings; and the later Prophets, viz. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel (called the major prophets), and the book of the twelve (minor) prophets.

When this division of books was first introduced it is now impossible to ascertain. Probably it commenced after the return from the exile, with the first formation of the council of elders, and more difficult is it to determine the principle on which the classification was formed. The rabbinical writers maintain that the authors of the Ketu- binah enjoyed only the lowest degree of inspiration, as they received no immediate communication from the deity, like that made to Moses, to whom God spoke face to face; and that they did not receive their knowledge through the medium of visions and dreams, as was the case with the prophets or the writers of the second class; but still that they felt the Divine Spirit resting on them and inspiring them with suggestions. This is the view maintained by Abushuel (Tiferet in Psalms, 19, 20, 1), Kings, etc. (in Psalms), Maimonides (More Nebuchim, ii, 45, p. 317), and Elias Levi (Tibbat); which last writer defines the word הִנְנָה to mean a work writ- ten by divine inspiration.

The placing of Ruth among the Hagiographa, and especially the separation of Lamentations from Jeremiah, seems, however, to be irreconcilable with this hypothesis; nor is it easy to assign a satisfactory reason why the historical books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings should be placed among the Prophets, and the book of Chronicles among the Hagiographa. The reasons generally assigned for this, as well as for placing in the third class the books of Psalms, Daniel, and Jos. are so fanciful and unsatisfactory as to have led Christian writers to form other and more defi- nite classifications. It will suffice to mention the reason assigned by Rabbi Kimchi for excluding Daniel from the book of Prophets, viz. that he has not equaled the other prophets in his visions and dreams. Others as- sign the same reason for excluding the Psalms, on the insertion of it, as well as of some historical books, in the Hagiographa, inasmuch as the collection of the prophets was closed at the date of the composition of this book (De Wette, § 255). Berkholtz, who is of this opinion (Eindehungen, 6, 79 sq.), thinks that the word Ko- tuban must have been borrowed into the Hebrew from the Greek (p. 81). Hengstenberg (Authentik des Danie|, etc., p. 29 sq.) follows the ancient opinions of the Rabbins, and maintains that the book of Daniel was placed in the Hagiographa in consequence of the lower degree of inspiration attached to it; but herein he is opposed by Havermick (Handbuch, p. 62). De Wette (§ 19) supposes that the first two divisions (the Law and the Prophets) were closed a little after the time of Nehemiah (compare 2 Macc. ii. 13, 14), and that perhaps at the end of the Persian period, the time of the formation of the Hagiographa, which long remained "changeable and open." The collection of the Psalms was not yet completed when the two first parts were formed. See KETHEMUS.

In 1787 he entered the University of Göttingen, and in 1788 he became a professor of philosophy at the University of Halle. He was appointed to the chair of theology at the University of Breslau in 1802, and in 1807 he became a professor of philosophy. He was a liberal and enlightened thinker, and his works were widely read and admired. He was a frequent contributor to the "Jahrbuch für Theologie." His works include: "Die Lehre von der göttlichen Offenbarung," "Das Evangelium Marcionis," and "Die Lehre vom göttlichen Recht." His influence was great, and he was a defender of the principles of Christianity against the attacks of rationalism.

The word 'Hagiographa' is once used by Jerome in a peculiar sense. Speaking of Tobit, he asserts that the Jews cut off this book from the catalogue of the divine Scriptures, because it contained among those books which they call Hagiographa. Again, of Judith he says, "By the Jews it is read among the Hagiothrapha, whose authority is not sufficient to confirm debated points": but, as in the latter instance, the greater number of MSS. read 'Apocrypha,' which is doubtless the true reading, it is highly probable that the word 'Hagiographa,' used in reference to the book of Tobit, has arisen from the mistake of a transcriber. The two words were in the Middle Ages frequently used synonymously. See DICTYON.-CANONICAL. "Hagiographa" has also been used by Christian writers in a synonymous with Holy Scripture.

The Alexandrian translators have not been guided by the threefold division in their arrangement of the books of Scripture. The different MSS. of the Sept., also vary in this respect. In the Vatican Codex (which the printed editions chiefly follow) Tobit and Judith are placed between Nehemiah and Esther. Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus follow Canticles. Baruch and Lamentations follow Jeremiah, and the Old Testament concludes with the four books of Maccabees. Luther (who introduced into the Bible a peculiar arrangement, which in the Old Testament has been followed in the English Authorised version) first separated the canonical from the non-canonical. Not only do the Alexandrian translators, the fathers, and Luther differ from the Jews in the order of succession of the sacred books, but among the Jews themselves the Talmudists and Masoretes differ. The German and Spanish MSS. follow each a different arrangement. See BIBLE.

Hahn, August, a distinguished German Protestant theologian, Orientalist, and opponent of rationalism, was born at Grossostheim, near Querfurt, in Prussian Saxony, March 27, 1792. His father died before he was nine years old, but his pastor, Stütsen, generously instructed the orphan with his own son, and secured his admission to the gymnasium at Eisleben. In 1810 Hahn entered the University of Leipsic, where, he tells us (Preface to Lehrbuch des christlichen Glaubens, 2nd ed.), he lost his early faith and peace, the fruits of a pious, loving mother's teaching, became imbued with the prevailing rationalism. After a three-years' course, in which, besides adding to his stock of classic and theological learning, he studied Oriental languages and literature, especially Syriac and Arabic, he engaged in the study of theology. In 1817 he entered the recently founded theological school at Wittenberg, where, under happier religious influences and inspirations, he regained his lost faith and peace, and was henceforth active in seeking to impart them to other minds and hearts. In 1819 he was appointed professor extraordinary, and in 1821 ordinary professor of theology in the University of Königsberg, and during his occupancy of that post published Barlaeines, Gnostics, Syripernous and pseudomonoglosus (Leipsic, 1819), a work which earned for him the doctorate of theology. This was followed by several other publications in patristic literature, viz. De gnostiaca, Moræsiana (1822); Asterisks (1823); Das Evangelium Marcionis, etc. (1823); De Canone Moræsiana (1824); Chronologie der christlichen Gesch. (1824); and Sitzungsberichte der Königlichen Preussischen, etc., (in conjunction with Seiffert) (1825); besides treatises in several periodicals. Being called in 1826 to the professorship of theology in the University of Leipsic, Hahn was thrown into the midst of theological controversy, and gave expression to his antagonism to the Rationalists in his treatise De Rationalismi, qui dictur, vera Indole et quae censurum Naturalismo continuat raetionum (Leipsic, 1827), in which he asserts the necessity of a supernatural revelation, and the inability of man by nature to attain "certain and complete knowledge of religious truths," and aims to show historically that rationalism had always been regarded by the Church as hostile to Christianity, and that it was the offering of naturalism and deism. He developed this antagonism still further in his Observatio pacis ecclesiasticae, in which he shows the necessity of a supernatural revelation, and the inability of man by nature. In 1827 he was made general superintendent for Silesia, which post he filled until his death, May 13, 1863, and in which he was able to exert considerable influence in behalf of the evangelical party among the clergy. The most important of his writings not already mentioned are, Bibelwissenschaft und Glaubensregeln der apostolisch-katholischen Kirche (1842); Theologische Kirchliche Annalen (1842-44); Das Bekenntnis der evangelischen Kirchen und die ordinaturische Verpflichtung ihrer Diener (1847); Das Bekenntnis der evangelisch-katholischen Kirche in seiner Verhältnisse zu dem von der römisch und griechischen (1853); Predigten und Reden unter den Begegnungen in Kirche und Stadt seit dem J. 1830 (1853). See obituary notice of Hahn in the Allgemeine Kirchen-Zeitung for 1863, No. 75-77, and an autobiographical sketch of his life, in his Obersicht in Dietzsch's Himmel, Journal, 1838, vol. ii, pp. 1; Herzog, Reel-Encykl. xix., 593 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii., 164; New Amer. Cyclop. viii., 634. (J. W. M.)

Hahn, Heinrich August, eldest son of August Hahn, was born at Königsberg June 19, 1821, and died Dec. 1, 1861, at Greifswald. After having studied at Breslau and Berlin, he devoted himself to Old-Testament exegesis and theology. He was tutor (privatdocent) at Breslau in 1845, went thence in 1846 to Königsberg as professor ad interim on the death of Havernick, and in 1851 became professor extraordinary, and in 1860 ordinary professor at Greifswald, succeeding Königsegg. He edited Havernick's Kritischen über die Theologie des A. Testaments (1848). His chief works are, a dissertation De Spie immortaliitate sub Vet. Test., etc.; Vetsrer testam. sentimenta de Natura hominis (1846)—Commentar über das Buch Hiob (1860)—Über- setzung und Erklärung des Hohen Liedes (1865)—Er- klärung von Jesu Kapitel 21—46 (forming vol. ii of Drebach's commentary on Isaiah, 1857)—Commentar über das Predigerbuch Salomo's (1869). His work evince the care and fidelity which characterized the man, but his criticisms are sometimes marked by great boldness. He was a man of mild temper and great purity of char- acter. Hahn, Michael, a German theologian, was born Feb. 2, 1758, at Altdorf, near Böblingen, Württemberg. The son of a peasant, he was from early youth under the influence of profound religious convictions, and devoted himself, in retirement, to the study of the Bible, and the preparation of prominent theological works, as Beheim und Oetingre. He claimed to receive from God special revelations, and wrote down their contents. As a speaker in the meetings of the Pietists he attracted large crowds, was several times summoned before the consis- tory to defend himself against the charge of heresy, but was finally allowed to spend the last twenty-four years of his life without further annoyance upon an estate of the duchess Francisca of Württemberg. There he died in great peace in 1819. The followers of Hahn, called the Michelians, constitute an organized communion which has never separated from the State Church, but the members of which annually meet for consultation, and, in particular, for making provision for the poor. The celebrated colony of Kornthal (q. v.), near Stuttgart, was organized under the direct influence of Hahn. The works of Hahn, which contain a complete speculative theosophy, have been published at Tübingen in 12 vols. (1819 sq.). Several of his hymns were received by Albert Knapp into the hymn-book which he prepared for the use of the State Church. Like many of the Württemberg Pietists, Hahn believed in the final restoration of all things—Haug, Die Sekte der Michelianer, in Studien über die Pietisten Württembergs vom übrigen W. vol. xi: Hiegen, Hist. theolog. Hail. See Ben-hail.

Hail! (χίλιος, ροζος, as often rendered; "farewell!" also), a salutation, importing a wish for the welfare of the person addressed (Luke i, 28; in mockery, Matt. xxvii, 29, etc.). It is now seldom used among us, but was customary among our Saxon ancestors, and import- ed as much as "joy to you!" or, "health to you!" including in the term health all kinds of prosperity. —Cal- met, s. v. See GREETING.

Hail (!!I, barad), χιλιαζω, or congealed rain, is the symbol of the divine vengeance upon kingdoms and nations, the enemies of God and of his people. As a hail-storm is generally accompanied by lightning, and seems to be produced by a certain electrical state of the atmosphere, so we find in Scripture hail and fire, i.e. lightning, mentioned together (Exod. ix, 23; comp. Job xxxix, 25; Ps. cvi, 32; lxxvii, 48; cxlvii, 8; xviii, 13). See PLAGUES OF EGYPT. That hail, though uncommon, is not absolutely unknown in Egypt, we have the testimony of Mansleben and Manconys, who had heard it thunder during their stay at Alexand- ria, the former on the 1st of January, and the latter on the 17th and 18th of the same month; on the same day it also hailed there. Perry also remarks that it hails, though seldom, in January and February at Cairo. Po- cocke even saw hail mingled with rain fall at Fium in February (compare Exod. xxi, 34). Korte also saw hail fall. Jomard says, "I have several times seen even hail at Alexandria."" Since his time, view of Mount Sinai into that country, some of whose frozen stones he gathered; "and so," he says, "I drank iced water in Egypt." Hail was also the means made use of by God for defeating an army of the kings of Canaan (Josh. x, 11). In this passage it is said, "The Lord cast down upon them an exceeding great hail with fire upon the ground"—i.e. hail-stones of an extraordinary size, and capable of doing dreadful execution in their fall from heaven. Some commentators are of opinion that the miracle consisted of real stones, from the cir- cumstance that stones only are mentioned in the pre- ceding clause; but this is evidently erroneous, there are many instances on record of hail-stones of enormous size and weight falling in different countries, so as to do immense injury, and to destroy the lives of animals and men. In Palestine and the neighboring regions, hail-stones are frequent and severe in desertous districts and among the coasts; but in the plains and deserts hail scarcely ever falls. In the elevated region of Northern Persia the hail-stones are frequently so vi- olen as to destroy the cattle in the fields; and in Com. Porter's Letters from Constantinople and its Environs (i, 44) there is an interesting account of a terrific hail- storm that occurred on the Bosphorus in the summer of 1831, which fully bears out the above and other Scrip- tural representations. Many of the lumps picked up af- ter the storm weighed three quarters of a pound. In Isa. xxxviii, 2, which denotes the approaching de- struction by Shalmaneser, the same images are employ- ed. Hail is mentioned as a divine judgment by the prophet Haggai (ii, 17). The destruction of the Assy- rian army is pointed out in Isa. xxx, 30. Ezekiel (xiii, 11) represents the wall daubed with untempered mortar as being destroyed by great hail-stones. Also in his prophecy against Gog (xxxvii, 22) he employs the same symbol (compare Rev. xx, 9). The hail and fire mingled with blood, mentioned in Rev. viii, 7, are supposed to denote the commotions of nations. The great hail, in Rev. vi, 19, denotes great and heavy judgments on the enemies of Christ and his church; and the grievous storm, in xvi, 21, represents something similar, and far more severe. So Horace (Odys., i, 2); comp. Virgil (En. iv, 120, 161; ix, 669) and Livy (ii, 62, and xxvi, 11).

Haimé, John, a soldier in the English army, and one of Mr. Wesley's preachers. He was born at Shaftesbury, Dorsetshire, in 1710, and was bred a gardener, and afterwards a button-maker. From early life he lived in great wickedness, and in constant agony of convic- tion. In 1739 he enlisted in a regiment of dragoons, and some time after he was converted; but, being very ignorant, he alternately lost and regained his hope, but constantly labored to save others. At last he heard and conversed with Mr. Wesley, much to his comfort. The regiment was sent to Flanders in 1743, from which time till Feb. 1746, he was in despair and misery. At that time, while marching into Germany, his evi- dence of pardon returned, and, encouraged by Mr. Wes- ley's letters, he began to preach in the army. At the battle of Dettingen he showed great gallantry. In May, 1744, the army went to Brussels, and here his labors were continued (Exod. ix, 29; comp. Job xxxix, 22, 23; Ps. cv, 32; lxxvii, 48; cxlvii, 8; xviii, 13). See PLAGUES OF EGYPT. That hail, though uncommon, is not absolutely unknown in Egypt, we have the testimony of Mansleben and Manconys, who had heard it thunder during their stay at Alexand- ria, the former on the 1st of January, and the latter on the 17th and 18th of the same month; on the same day that date he lived for twenty years "in agony of soul," yet all the time, in Germany, England, Ireland, he ceased not with all the energy of despair to labor, preaching often 20 or 30 times a week, and seeing thousands of souls converted under his efforts, while his own soul was filled with anguish and darkness. At the end of this time he once more obtained the evidence of acceptance with God. He died Aug. 18, 1784, at Whitchurch, in Hampshire. — Jackson, Lives of Early Methodist Preachers, i, 147; Stevens, History of Methodism, vol. ii.

Hair (properly נָעַר, nār, ūnār) is frequently mentioned in Scripture, chiefly with reference to the head. In scarcely anything has the caprice of fashion been more strikingly displayed than in the various forms which the taste of different countries and ages has prescribed for disposing of this natural covering of the head. See Head.

1. Of the more ancient nations, the Egyptians appear to have been most uniform in their habits regarding it, and, in some respects also, the most peculiar. We learn from Herodotus (ii, 86, iii, 12) that they let the hair of their head and beard grow only when they were in mourning, and that they shaved it at other times. Even in the case of young children they were wont to shave the head, leaving only a few locks on the front, sides, and back, as an emblem of youth. In the case of nubile children, those on the sides were covered and indeed in a bag, which hung down conspicuously as a badge of princely rank (Wilkinson, ii, 327, 328). "So particular were they," says Wilkinson, "on this point, that to have neglected it was a subject of reproach and ridicule; and whenever they intended to convey the idea of a man of low condition, or a slovenly person, the artists represented him with a beard" (Ancient Egyptians, iii, 357). Slaves also, when brought from foreign countries, having beards on them at their arrival, "were obliged to conform to the cleanly habits of their masters; their beards and heads were shaved, and they adopted a close cap." This universal practice among the Egyptians explains the incidental notice in the life of Joseph, that before going in to Pharaoh he shaved himself (Gen. xii, 14); in most other places he would have combed his hair and trimmed his beard, but on no account have shaved it. The practice was carried there to such a length probably from the tendency of the climate to generate the fleas and other vermin which nestle in the hair; and hence also the priest, who were to be the highest embodiments of cleanliness, were wont to shave their whole bodies every third day (Herod. ii, 37). It is singular, however, and seems to indicate that notions of cleanliness did not alone regulate the practice, that the women still wore their natural hair, long and plaited, often reaching down in the form of strings to the bottom of the shoulder-blades. Many of the female mummies have been found with their hair thus plaited, and in no observation. The modern ladies of Egypt come but little behind their sisters of olden time in this respect (see Lane's Modern Egyptians, i, 60). Yet what was remarkable in the inhabitants of a hot climate, while they removed their natural hair, they were accustomed to wear wigs, which were so constructed that "they far surpassed," says Wilkinson, "the comfort and coolness of the modern turban, the reticulated texture of the groundwork on which the hair was fastened allowing the heat of the head to escape, while the hair effectually protected it from the sun" (Anc. Egypt. iii, 304). Josephus (Jr. 6, § 11) notices an instance of false hair (συντελετὴς κεφαλής) being used for the purpose of disguise. Among the Medes the wig was worn by the upper classes (Xenoph. Cyrop. i, 3, 2). See Head-dress.

2. The precisely opposite practice, as regards men, would seem to have prevailed among the ancient Assyrians, and, indeed, among the Asians generally. In the Assyrian sculptures the hair always appears long, combed closely down upon the head, and shielding itself in a mass of curls on the shoulders. The beard was allowed to grow to its full length, and, descending low on the breast, was divided into two or three rows of curls. The mustache was also carefully trimmed and curled at the end (Layard's Nineveh, ii, 327). Herodotus likewise testifies that the Babylonians wore their hair long (i, 196). The very long hair, however, that appears in the figures on the monuments is supposed to have been partly false, a sort of head-dress to add to the effect of the natural hair. The excessive pains bestowed by the ancient nations in arranging the hair and beard appears almost fantastic in contrast with the stern, martial character (Layard's Nineveh, ii, 254). See Beard. The practice of the modern Arabs, with regard to the length of their hair varieties; generally the men allow it to grow to its natural length, the tresses hanging down to the breast, and sometimes to the waist, affording substantial protection to the head and neck against the violence of the sun's rays (Burckhardt's Notes, i, 49; Wellsted's Travels, i, 38, 55, 78).

3. Among the ancient Greeks, the general admiration of long hair, whether in men or women, is evidenced by the expression καρυστορόφωντος άγαλματις ("well-combed Greeks"), so often occurring in Homer; and by the saying, which passed current among the people, that hair was the cheapest of ornaments; and in the representations of their divinities, especially Bacchus and Apollo, whose long locks were a symbol of perpetual youth. But the practice varied. While the Spartans in earlier times wore the hair long, and men as well as women were wont to have it tied in a knot over the crown of the head, at a later period they were accustomed to wear it short. Among the Athenians, also, it is understood the later practice varied somewhat from arose a variety of superstitious and emblematic observances, such as shaving parts of the head, or cropping it in a particular form; parents dedicating the hair of infants (Tertullian, De Animis) to the gods; young women en their marriage in hair, after a sacred campaign: sailors after deliverance from a storm; hanging it up on consecrated trees, or depositing it in temples; burying it in the tomb of friends, as Achilles did at the funeral of Patroclus; besides shaving, cutting off, or plucking it out, as some people did; or allowing it to grow in sorcery, as was the practice with others, according as the calamity that befall them was common or extraordinary, and their grief was mild or violent. See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH

4. The Hebrews were fully alive to the importance of the hair as an element of personal beauty, whether as seen in the “curled locks, black as a raven,” of youth (Cant. vii. 4), or in the “crown of glory” that enshrined the head of old age (Prov. xvi. 31). Yet, while they encouraged the growth of hair, they observed the natural distinction between the sexes by allowing the woman to wear it long (Luke vii. 37, John xii. 2, 1 Cor. xi. 6 sq.), while the men restrained theirs by frequent clippings to the moderate length. This distinction between the Hebrews and the surrounding nations, especially the Egyptians, arose, no doubt, partly from natural taste, but partly also from legal enactments, and to some extent from certain national usages of wide extent.

(b) In addition to these regulations, the Hebrews dreaded baldness, as it was frequently the result of leprosy (Lev. xiii. 40 sq.), and hence formed one of the disqualifications for the priesthood (Lev. xxii. 20, Sept.). See BALINESS. The rule imposed upon the priests, and probably followed by the rest of the community, was that the hair should be polled (בְּשַׁבֵּע, Ezek. xlv. 20), neither being shaved, nor allowed to grow too long (Lev. xxii. 5; Ezek. Lc). What was the precise length usually worn we have no means of ascertaining; but from various expressions, such as הַשָּׁבֶע (šāḇe’), lit. to let loose the hair or the head (=solevere crines, Virgil, Æn. iii. 68; xi. 85; demus laetus more capillos, Ovid, Ep. x. 137) by unbinding the head-band and letting it fall dishevelled. The same word is used as a V., unweave, your hair or your robe, as when it was done in mourning (compare Ezek. xxvi. 17); and again הַשָּׁבֶע, to unweave, the ear previous to making any communication of importance (1 Sam. xx. 2; xxi. 8, A. V., margin), as though the hair fell over the ear, we may conclude that men wore their hair somehow what longer than is usual with us. The word בְּשַׁבֵּע, used as hair (Numb. vi. 5; Ezek. xlv. 20), is especially indicated by the phrase מָשָׂה תְנַעֲרָה, on Lev. xxi. 10). In 2 Kings 1.8, “a hairy man:” literally, “a lord of hair,” seems rather to refer to the flowing locks of Elijah (q. v.). This might be doubtful, even with the support of the Sept. and Josephus—av-
HAIR

The approach of age was marked by a sprinkling (κοπάσμα, Hom. vii, 9; comp. a similar use of spargere, Propert. iii, 4, 24) of gray hairs, which soon overspread the whole head (Gen. xiii, 38; xlv, 29; 1 Kings ii, 6, 9; Prov. xvi, 31; xx, 29). The reference to the almond in Eccl. xii, 5, has been explained of the white blossoms of that tree, as emblematic of old age: it may be observed, however, that the color of the flower is pink rather than white, and that the verb in that passage, according to high authorities (Gesen. and Hitzig), does not bear the sense of blossoming at all. See ALMOND. Pure white hair was deemed characteristic of the divine majesty (Dan. vii, 9; Rev. i, 14). See GRAY.

The chief beauty of the hair consisted in curls, whether of a natural or artificial character. The Hebrew terms are highly expressive: to omit the word "locks"—rendered "locks" in Cant. iv, 13, 3; vi, 7; and Isa. lxvii, 2; but more probably meaning a veil—were "locks" (Cant. vii, 11), properly pendulous flexible tresses (according to the Sept., βαρεία, the shoots of the palm-tree) which supplied an image of the comata pendula; הַפְּרַח (Ezek. viii, 8), a similar image borrowed from the curve of a blossom; מַחְלֵק (Cant. iv, 9), a lock falling over the shoulders like a chain of ear-pendants (in uno crine colli sui, Vulgate better, perhaps, than the A. V., "with one chain of thy neck"); והַפְּרַח (Cant. vii, 5, A. V. "galleries"), properly the channels by which water was brought to the flocks, which supplied an image either of the comata flaminis, or of the regularity in which the locks were arranged. הַפְּרַח (Cant. viii, 6), again an expression for comata pendula, borrowed from the threads hanging down from an unfinished roof; and, lastly, הַפְּרַח (Isa. iii, 24, A. V. "well set hair"), properly poised work, i.e. gracefully curved locks. With regard to the mode of dressing the hair we have no very precise information; the terms used are of a general character, as of Jezebel (2 Kings ix, 30), בַּעַר אַתִּיה, i.e. she adorned her head; of Judith (x, 3), בַּעַר אַתִּיה, i.e. arranged (the A. V. has "braided"), and the Vulg. discriminans, here used in a technical sense in the reference to the discriminans or hair-pin: of Herod (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 9, 4), κομμουμινὸς τῆς συνθέσεως τῆς κούρας, and of those who adopted feminine fashions (War, iv, 9, 10), κόμας συνθέτομεν. The terms used in the N. T. (Acts, ii, 3, 4; 31 Pet. iii, 3) are of a general character: Schleusner (Lex. s. v.) understands them of curling rather than plaiting. The arrangement of Samson's hair into seven locks, or more properly braids (ῥαφής, from ραφέω, to interexchange; Sept. κοιμάω; Judg. xvi, 18, 19), involves the practice of plaiting, which was also familiar to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii, 36) and Greeks (Homer, Iliad, xiv, 176). The locks were probably kept in their place by a fillet, as in Egypt (Wilkinson, L. c.).

Ornaments were worked into the hair, as practised by the modern Egyptians, who "add to each braid three black silk cords with little ornaments of gold" (Lane, i, 71): the Sept. understands the term מִשְׂרָסָה (Isa. iii, 18, A. V., "cauls") as applying to such ornaments (judgings.). Ver. 22. ἅπαξ λειτουργίαν. Hoyland approves of this, and conjectures that they were sun-shaped, i. e. circular, as distinct from the "round tires like the moon," i. e. the crescent-shaped ornaments used for necklaces. The Arabian women attach small bells to the tresses of their hair (Niebuhr, Trau, i, 138). Other terms, sometimes understood as applying to the hair, are of doubtful significance, e. g. מִשְׂרָסָה (Isa. iii, 22; "cauls; "crimping-pins"); more probably парти (as in 2 Kings v, 29; מְשֶׁרֶס, Isa. iii, 29; "head-bands"); bridal girdles, according to Schröder and other authorities: מַנָּנָה (Isa. iii, 20, Vulg. discriminativa, i. e. pins used for keeping the hair parted; comp. Jerome in Refia, iii, cap. ult.), more probably turbans. Combs and hair-pins are mentioned in the Talmud; the Egyptian combs were made of wood and double, one side having large, and the other small teeth (Wilkinson, ii, 348); from the ornamental devices worked on them we may infer that they were worn in the hair. Each of the above terms in its place. In the Talmud frequent references are made to women who were professional hair-dressers for their own sex, and the name applied to whom was מַנָּה (probably from mainah; Schottl., "beautifying, ornamenting") (Maimon, in Tr. Shabbath, 6, 6; comp. also Wagenseil, Sotah, p. 137; Jahn, Archsel, pt. i, vol. ii, p. 114). The Hebrews, like other nations of antiquity, anointed the hair profusely with ointments, which were generally compounded of various aromatic ingredients (Ruth iii, 3; 2 Sam. xiv, 2; Ps. xcvii, 3; xlv, 7; xxii, 10; Ezek. xvi, 12; Hosea ii, 24); more especially on the occasion of festivities or hospitality (Matt. vii, 17; xvii, 7; Luke vii, 46; comp. Joseph. Ant. xix, 4, 1, χρυσόμυς μορός τῆς κεφαλῆς, ὡς ἀπό συννομισμοῦ). It is, perhaps, in reference to the glossy appearance so imparted to it that the hair is described as purple (Cant. v, 7). See OINTMENT.

It appears to have been the custom of the Jews in our Saviour's time to swing the hair by the hair (v. 36), much as the Egyptian women still swing by the side-lock, and the men by their beards (Lane, i, 52, 71, notes). See OVAL.

Hair was employed by the Hebrews as an image of what was least valuable in man's person (1 Sam. xiv, 45; 2 Sam. xiv, 11; 1 Kings i, 30; Matt. x, 30; Luke xii, 7; xxii, 18; Acts xxxvii, 34); as well as of what was inexpressible (Ps. xi, 12, lxix, 4), or particularly fine (Judg. xx, 16). In Isa. vii, 20, it represents the various productions of the field, trees, crops, etc. like ἄνθος εὐσεβέστατος of Callim. Dion, 41, or the human comans of Stat. Theb. v, 502. White hair, or the hoary head, is the symbol of the respect due to age (Lev. xiv, 22; Prov. xvi, 31). Hence we find in Dan. vii, 9, God and upon him the title of "Ancient of Days" (comp. Rev. i, 14), the gray locks there represented being the symbol of authority and honor. The shaving of the head, on the contrary, signifies affliction, poverty, and disgrace. Thus "cutting off the hair" is a figure used to denote the entire destruction of a people by the righteous judgments of Providence (Isa. vii, 20). "Gray hairs here and there on Ephraim" portended the decline and fall of the kingdom of Israel (Hos. vii, 9). "Hair like women's" forms part of the description of the Apocalyptic locusts (Rev. ix, 8), and is added to complete the idea of ferocity of the anti-Christian troop of cavalry, bristling with shaggy hair (comp. "rough caterpillars," i. e. hairy locusts, Jer. ii, 27); long and undressed hair in later times being regarded as an image of barbaric rudeness (Hengstenberg, ad loc. Rev.).

Halek (Heb. Chalak, הַלַּכָּה, smooth; Sept. Χαλακίαν and Χαλικη, the name (or, rather, epithet) of a hill (הַלַּכָּה, both with the art. = the bare mount) near the territory of Seir, at the southern extremity of Canaan, among the conquests of Joshua (Josh. xi, 17; xii, 1); so called, doubtless, from its bald appearance, making it a landmark in that direction. Hence it is used by Joshua, as Beersheba was used by later writers, to mark the southern limit of the country—"So Joshua took all that land . . . from the Mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad, in the valley of Lebanon, under Mount Hermon." The situation of the town is unknown; probably near Edom. It lay east of Edom, and lay on the southern border of Palestine; it must, consequently, have been in, or very near, the great valley of the Arabah. The expression, "that goeth up to Seir" (יהוה נַעֲשֵׂה כָּלָּה, is worthy of note. Seir is the mountainous province of Edom [see Seir]; and Mount Halak would seem to have been connected with it, as if running upwards to it, or joining it to a lower district. About ten miles south of the Dead Sea a line of white cliffs, varying in height from 50 to 150 feet, runs completely across the Arabah. As seen from the north, the cliffs resemble a ridge of hills (and in this aspect the word יְבִי might perhaps be applied to them), bursting in deep valleys, and connecting the mountains of Bashan with the mountains of Seir on the east. It is possibly this ridge which is referred to in Num. xxiv, 5, 4, and Josh. xv, 2, 3, under the name "Ascent of Akrabbim," and as marking the south-eastern border of Judah; and it might well be called the bald mountains, which extends to Seir. It was also a national and religious boundary, and was the mark of the boundary of Palestine, as it is near Kadesh-barnea on the one side, and the northern ridge of Edom on the other. To this ridge, bounding the land in the valley on the south, is appropriately opposed on the north, "Baal-gad, in the land of Bashan, under Mount Hermon" (Keil on Josh. xi, 17). The cliffs, and the scenery of the surrounding region, are minutely described by Robinson (Bib. Res. ii, 113, 116, 120). Still, the peculiar term, "the bald mountain," seems to require some more distinctive eminence, perhaps in this general range. Schwarz thinks it may be identified with Jebel Madura, on the south frontier of Judah, between the south end of the Dead Sea and wady Gaian (Palestine, p. 29); marked on Robinson's map a little south of the famous pass Nukh es-Sufah.

Haldane, James Alexander, brother of the following, was born at Dundee July 14, 1768. Having imbibed the family passion for the sea, he was appointed captain of the Melville Castle in 1798. The vessel, however, did not sail for four months, and during that interval a great change took place in captain Haldane's character. He became serious and thoughtful on the subject of religion, and, having determined to follow the example of his brother, who had already relinquished the seafaring life, he disposed of his command for £5000, and his share in the property of the ship and stores for £2000 more. With this fortune of £15,000 he retired with his wife to Scotland in 1794, and gave himself up to a laborious course of study, chiefly on the Old Testament. Several years elapsed before his views were established; but at length he attained to a knowledge of the truth as well as peace in believing. Mr. James Haldane, having plenty of time at command, oc- cuivered himself with many plans of Christian usefulness; among which was the opening of a Sabbath-school at the Kirkkir; in- cipient preaching, at first in the villages around Edin-burgh, and afterwards in the other large towns of Scot- land, were the chief. His principal coadjutor in these labors of love was John Campbell, the African traveller. In company with the zeal of these Christian friends Mr. Haldane made successful tours throughout all Scotland as far as Orkney, and those who were awakened by their preaching were, through the liberality of Mr. Robert Haldane, accommodated with suitable places of worship. Mr. James eventually accepted the office of stated pastor in the Tabernacle, Rose-bank Walk, Edinburgh, and in that capacity he exercised, without any emolument, all the public and private duties of a minister with unbroken fidelity and zeal for a period of fifty years. Although he vacillated on some points of Church government, he and his brother remained steadfast in their adherence to the general principles of the Scotch Baptists. He died in Edinburgh Feb. 8, 1851. Besides a number of controversial tracts, he published A View of the social Worship of the first Christians (Edinb. 1805, 12mo)—Men's Responsibility and the Extent of the Atonement (Edinb. 1842, 12mo)—Inscriptions from Egypt (Edinb. 1842, 12mo)—The Inspiration of the Scriptures (Edinb. 1846, 12mo).—Jamesion, Religious Biography, p. 242; Rich, Biog. See Independents, III.

Haldane, Robert, an eminent Christian philanthropist, was born in London (of Scotch parents) Feb. 29, 1764, and inherited a large estate. His manhood was spent in the navy; he was afterwards an enthusiastic Democrat in politics, and welcomed the French Revolution. After this excitement subsided he was converted, and resolved on dedicating his life to missionary work in India. He was chosen field-preacher, and having secured the promised co-operation of Misses. Innes, Ewing, and Bogue, of Gosport, to whom he guaran- teed adequate stipends, he applied to the Indian gov- ernment to sanction his enterprise. The East India Company directors, after much deliberation, resolved that the superintendents of Hindostan should not be dis- turbed. Mr. Haldane now determined to employ his resources in spreading the Gospel at home, and, in con- junction with Rowland Hill and other eminent evan- gelists, he was instrumental in awakening an extensive revival of religious spirit throughout the Scotch Assembly (1800) on field-preaching, and discour- aged the revival. Mr. Haldane therefore seceded from the Established Church, and at his own expense erected places of worship, under the name of Tabernacles, in all...

See Du Hale.

Hale, Sir Matthew, was born at Alderley, Cheshire, Nov. 1, 1699, admitted at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1626, and at Lincoln's Inn in 1629. In 1633 (under the Commonwealth) he was made one of the judges of the Common Bench, and in 1671 he was elected to be chief justice of the King's Bench. He died Dec. 25, 1675. He was a learned lawyer, an upright judge, and a Christian. The only cloud on his memory as a criminal judge is the notorious fact of his having condemned two wretched women for witchcraft, at the assizes at Bury St. Edmund's, in the year 1665. Hale, in the course of the trial, avowed himself a believer in witchcraft, and the jury found the prisoners guilty, notwithstanding many impartial by-standers declared that they disbelieved the charge. No reprieve was granted, and the prisoners were executed. Hale was a voluminous writer. Of his legal publications we make no mention here; besides them he wrote An Abstract of the Chief Decisions:——A Discourse of Contemplations, Moral and Divine:——The Knowledge of Christ crucified (new ed. Glass, 1828, 12mo). These and other minor pieces are gathered in his Works, Moral and Religious, edited by the Rev. T. Thirlwall, M.A. (London, 1839, 2 vols., 8vo). See Burnet, Life of Sir M. Hale (London, 1862, 12mo) also prefixed to his Works, above named); Baxter, Notes on the Life and Death of Sir M. Hale (London, 1862, 12mo); reprinted, with Hale's Thoughts on Religion, London, 1805, 12mo; Campbell, Lives of the Chief Justices; English Cyclopaedia; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, n. s. v. a.

Hales, John, of Eton, usually called the "ever-memorable," an eminent English scholar and divine, was born in Bath, 1584, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In 1606 he was elected fellow of Meriton College, and was employed by Sir H. Savile in the preparation of his fine edition of Chrysostom, published in 1613. His attainments in Greek gained him the professorship of that language at Oxford in 1612, and in 1619 he was ordained and became fellow of Eton. In 1618 he accompanied Sir D. Carleton to the Hague as his chaplain, and attended him to the Synod of Dort (q. v.). He went to that celebrated body a Calvinist, and left it an Arminian, as is shown by a letter of Farindon (q. v.), prefixed to Hale's Golden Remains, in which he says: "I well know that the general synod of Dort at Emaus, as I have often told me" (see Jackson, Life of Farindon, p. xlix). In 1636 he wrote for Chillingworth a tract on Schism, in which he rebuked the claims of high Episcopacy. Laud sought to gain over the great Greek scholar, and offered him any prevenient he pleased. In 1639 he was made canon of Windsor, but was deprived in 1642. Refusing to subscribe to the "covenant," he was compelled to wander from place to place, and at last he had to sell his library for bread. He died May 19, 1656. No man of his time had greater reputation for scholarship and piety. Bishop Pearson speaks of him as a "man of so great a sharpness, quickness, and subtility of wit as ever this or perhaps any nation bred ... a man of vast and illimitated knowledge, of a severe and profound judgment." He wrote unwillingly, and published but few tracts in his lifetime; but after his death, a number of his sermons and discourses on pieces were collected under the title of Golden Remains of the Ever-memorable John Hales (London, 1659, 8vo; best ed. 1673, 4to); his Letters concerning the Synod of Dort are published in the edition of 1678. An edition of his Whole Works (with the language modernized) was published by Lord Halies in 1765 (3 vols. 12mo). See Des Maizeaux, Life of Hales (London, 1719, 8vo); General Biog. Dictionary; Jackson, Life of Farindon (prefixed to Farindon's Sermons, vol. i); Wood, Athenae Oxonienses, ii, 124; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. v, 476-7; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, n. s. v.

Half-covenant, the withholding the cup from the laity in the Lord's Supper. This practice of the Church of Rome was first authorized by Innocent III., and then made obligatory by the Council of Constance; and one motive for the innovation appears to have been to exalt the priesthood by giving them some exclusive privilege even in communion at the Lord's table. Tran-substitution, or half-covenant, in one kind only, are ingeniously linked together. Romanists believe that Christ, whole and entire, his soul, body, and divinity, is contained in either species, and in the smallest particle of each. Hence they infer that, whether the communicant receive the bread or the wine, he enjoys the full benefit of the sacrament. Therefore, to support the monstrous dogma, the sacrament is divided in two: transubstantiation justifies communion in one kind, and communion in one kind proves the truth of transubstantiation. In thus denying the cup to the laity, the institution of Christ is mutilated, the express law of the Gospel perverted, and the practice of the apostles abandoned. The withholding the cup was one of the grievances which induced the Hussites to resist the usurpations of the Church of Rome" (Farrar, Eccles. Dict. n. s. v.). See Lord's Supper.

Half-way Covenant, a scheme adopted by the Congregational churches of New England in order to extend the privileges of church membership and infant baptism beyond the pale of actual communicants at the Lord's table. Stoddard, of Northampton, vindicated it, and Jonathan Edwards opposed it. This struggle caused Edwards' removal from Northampton. It is now abandoned by the New England Congregationalists—Hurst, Rationalism, p. 538; Upham, Ratio Disciplinæ, xxii. See Congregationalists; Edwards, Jonathan.

HALL occurs in the A.V. of the N.T. three times; twice (Matt. xxviii, 27; Mark xv, 16) in reference to the πρατηρίων, prætorium, or residence of the Roman governor at Jerusalem, which was either the palace built by Herod, or the town abode of Caesar (Acts xxiii, 23). Mark adds to the word αἰγίλ, as he is wont in other cases, an explanatory phrase, δὲ ἐν πρατηρίῳ (Vulg. atriium prætorii). In Luke xxi, 65, αἰγίλά means the open court or quadrangle belonging to the high-priest's house, such as was common to Oriental dwellings. It has the same meaning in Matt. xxxvi, 69, and Mark xiv, 66, and in both passages is incorrectly rendered "palace" in the A.V., as the adverb ἡκώ and κατώ plainly distinguish the αἰγίλα from the αἰγόω to which it was attached (Luke xxi, 54). So in Luke xvi, 21. In John x, 16, it means a "sheep-fold," and in Rev. xvi, 2, the outer "court" of the Temple. The αἰγίλα was entered from the street by a παρασκεύα or vestibule (Mark xiv, 68), through a πύλη or portal (Matt. xxvi, 71), in which was a δύο or wicket (John xviii, 16; Acts xii, 13).—Kitto, s.v. Αἰγίλα is the equivalent for Στέπα, an inclosed or fortified space (Geisensow, Thes. p. 512), in many places in the G.T. where the Vulgate uses Α. V. The verb νεῖλος, "village," or atrium, "court," chiefly of the temple or Temple. See Court. The hall or court of a house or palace would probably be an inclosed but uncovered space, impluvium, on a lower level than the apartments of the lowest floor which looked into it. See House.

HALL, Charles, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Williamsport, Pa., June 23, 1797, and graduated at Hamilton College in 1824 with great distinction. He passed his theological studies at Princeton, was licensed in 1827, and appointed soon after assistant secretary to the Home Missionary Society. In 1832 he went to Europe for his health, visited most of that continent, and returned after a short absence to his accustomed duties. He died Oct. 31, 1853. He edited for several years The Home Missionary; and published A Treat on Plans and Motives for the Extension of Sabbath Schools (1829);—The Daily Verse Expositor (1832);—A Plan for systematic Benevolence; and A Sermon on the World's Conversion (1841).—Sprague, Amos, iv, 730.

HALL, Gordon, a Congregational minister and missionary to India. He was born in Granville (now Tolland), Mass., April 8, 1781, and graduated from Williams College in 1809 with the first honors of his class. At college he was acquainted with James Wilson, Ebenzer Porter, J. Mills and James Richards, afterwards missionaries. He commenced the study of theology under Ebenzer Porter, afterwards president of Andover Theological Seminary, was licensed to preach in 1809, and supplied for a time a church at Woodbury. But from the time of his acquaintance with Mills it seems he had purposed to become a missionary. In 1810 he went to Andover, was ordained at Salem Feb. 6, 1812, and sailed on the 18th from Philadelphia with Nott and Rice, arriving in Calcutta on the 17th of June. The East India Company refused the privilege of landing in its territory, and Messrs. Hall and Nott embarked for Bombay, where they arrived Feb. 11, 1813. Orders from the governor general followed, commanding them to be sent to England; but by the courage and wisdom of Mr. Hall's memorials, the governor was influenced to repeal his order, and Mr. Hall remained at Bombay zealously and with great success until March 20, 1826, when he was suddenly cut off by cholera. Mr. Hall possessed fine abilities, ardent piety, great courage and self-sacrifice. His inimitable spirit, and the ability of his appeals to the governor general, were the means by which they obtained the way for the furtherance of Christianity in India.—American Missionary Memorial, p. 41. (G. L. T.)

HALL, Joseph, D.D., bishop of Norwich, was born at Asby-de-In-Touch July 1, 1574, and educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge. While rector of Halsted,
In Suffolk, he composed his "Contemplations," which procured him the patronage of prince Henry and the rectory of Waltham. In 1616 he went to Paris as chaplain to the English ambassador. On his return he was appointed to a James to the deanery of Worcester (1617), and in the following year he accompanied his royal master into Scotland, when that monarch made a progress into the northern part of his kingdom to prosecute his irremediable scheme of erecting Episcopacy on the Scottish model. Northerners, as the most unpopular, however, of that measure fell upon Hall, whose character and principles secured him the esteem and respect of the most eminent Scotchmen of the day. He was commanded to go over into Holland to attend the Synod of Dort in 1618; but the protracted meetings of that convocation made so much and so great impressions on his health, and after two months he returned with an impaired constitution to England. In 1627 he was raised to the see of Exeter, and afterwards, without any solicitation, to that of Norwich in 1641. Amidst all the ecclesiastical tyranny of Laud, bishop Hall preserved his moderation. The bishop, however, had himself no sense of trial. When the popular outcry "No bishops" was raised, and an armed mob marched against the House of Lords, Hall, with eleven of the lords spiritual, joined in protesting against the measures which were passed in their absence; and the impeachment which had long been made a ground of impeachment, he, with his protesting brethren, consigned to the Tower. He was released in June following on giving bail for £5000. He continued for a year to exercise his episcopal functions in Norwich; but the popular tide again set in, his house was attacked, his property sequestered, himself insulted, and in mock resignation he retired into a small place called Higham, in Norfolk, where he spent the remainder of his days in acts of piety and charity, and at length died Sept. 8, 1656, in the eighty-second year of his age. Bishop Hall was "a man of very devotional habits, to fortify which, he spent long and rigid fasts. At this time he had set hours for praying, for reading divinity, for general literature and composition; and so intense was his study, in the pursuit of intellectual and spiritual improvement, that for a time he observed the strictest abstemiousness, taking for a while only one meal a day."

His depth of thought and of a graceful and modest eloquence, he has been called the "Christian Seneca." His writings consist, besides the "Contemplations," of sermons, polemical and practical theology, and correpondence; the best edition is Works, with some account of his life and sermons. Hall, Oxford. Many editions of the Contemplations have appeared. See Hughes, Life of Bishop Hall; Hook, Eccles. Biography, v; 514; Rich, Cyclop. of Biography, s. v.; Jamieson, Religious Biography, p. 240; Wordsworth, Eccles. Biography, iv, 253.

Hall, Peter, an English divine and theological writer, was born in 1803. He studied first at Winchester College, and entered Branscoze College, Oxford, in 1820. He was ordained in 1828, and became successively curate of St. Edmund's, Salisbury; rector of Millston, Wilt, in 1834; minister of Tavistock chapel, Drury Lane, London, in 1840, and of Longfleet in 1841. In 1843 he removed to Bath, and became minister of St. Thomas's chapel, Walcot. He died in 1849. Hall wrote Religion illustrata: Documents connected with the Liturgy of the Church of England (Bath, 1847, 5 vols. 18mo) — Formæ sacrae: Documents illustrative of the Liturgy of the Church of England (Bath, 1848, 7 vols. 18mo); and a number of Sermons. Mr. Hall published a new English edition of that valuable work, The Harmony of the Protestant Confessions (1841, 8vo), the two previous English editions of which (Camb., 1866, 12mo; London, 1867, 4to) had become very scarce. He also edited the 8vo. edition of his ancestor, bishop Hall (Oxford, 1837, 12 vols.), and wrote Congregational Reform, four Sermons with notes (London, 1855, 12mo). — Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliog., i, 1873; Allibone, Diction-

the public in the discourse entitled Sentiments suitable to the present Crisis, which raised Mr. Hall's reputation for large views and powerful eloquence to the highest pitch. In November, 1804, owing chiefly to a disease of the spine, attended by want of sufficient exercise and rest, the health of Mr. Hall was so far impaired that he and who had so long been the theme of universal admiration became the subject of as extensive a sympathy. He was placed under the care of Dr. Arnold, of Leicester, where, by the divine blessing, his health was restored in about two months. But similar causes produced a relapse in his constitution, that of his recovery, from which he was soon restored, though it was deemed essential to the permanent establishment of his health that he should resign his pastoral charge and remove from Cambridge. Two shocks of so humiliating a calamity within the compass of a year deeply impressed Mr. Hall's mind. His own decided purpose to be never before experienced a thorough transformation of character; and there can be no question that from this period his spirit was habitually more humble, dependent, and truly devotional. It became his custom to kneel every morning in a solemn attitude of submission of himself to God, on evangelical principles, and in the most earnest sincerity of heart. In 1807 he became pastor of the Baptist church in Leicester, where he soon after married, and where he labored most successfully for nearly twenty years. At no period was he more highly regarded as the church was in the city, it being larger than the whole congregation when he took the charge of it. But his influence was not confined to the limits of his parish. He took an active part in all the noble charities of the age, and by his sermons, speeches, and writings exerted a wide influence on society, not only in England, but on the continent of Europe, in America, and in India. His review of Zerub'utilisation, his tracts on the Terms of Communion, and his sermons on the Advantage of Knowledge to the Lower Classes, on the Discouragements and Support of the Christian Ministry, on the Character of a Christian Baptism, on the Death of Prince Charles, and of Rev. Dr. Ryland, with several others, were given to the public while residing there. Here also, in 1823, he delivered his admirable course of lectures on the Scriptural Controversy, partially preserved in his Works. At 1829 he removed to a small old congregation at Broadmead, Bristol, and here he remained till his death, which took place at Bristol on the 21st of Feb., 1831. Besides occasional contributions to various dissenting periodical publications, Hall published various tracts and sermons in the last twenty years of his life, in which he concurred with those aforementioned, since his death been collected under the title of The Works of Robert Hall, M.A., with a Brief Memoir of his Life by Dr. Gregory, and Observations on his Character as a Preacher by John Foster, published under the superintendence of Oliphant Gregory, L.L.D., professor of mathematics in the Royal Military Academy (London, 1831-32, 6 vols. 8vo; 11th ed. 1858). It was intended that the Life should have been written by Sir James Mackintosh, but he died (in May, 1832) before beginning it. Dr. Gregory's Memoir, from which we have abstracted the materials of this article, was afterwards published in a separate form. See Gregory, Oliphant. The first volume of Hall's Works contains sermons, charges, and circular letters (or addresses in the name of the governing body of the Baptist Church); the second, a tract entitled On Terms of Communion (1815, in 2 parts), another entitled On the Conflict between Christian Baptism and the Baptism of John (a defense of what is called the practice of free communion, which produced a powerful effect in liberalizing the practice of the Baptist community) (1816 and 1818, in 2 parts); the third, political and miscellaneous tracts, extracts from the works of other authors, and miscellaneous pieces; the fifth, notes of sermons and letters. The sixth, besides Dr. Gregory's memoir, contains Mr. Foster's observations, and notes taken down by friends of twenty-one sermons. The American reprint (New York, Harper and Brothers, 4 vols. 8vo) contains, besides what is given in the English edition, a number of additional sermons, with anecdotes, etc., by Rev. Joseph Bolcher.

Robert Hall was one of the greatest preachers of his age. His "excellence did not so much consist in the predominance of one of his powers as in the exquisite proportion and harmony of them all. The richness, variety, and extent of his knowledge was not so remarkable as his absolute mastery over it. There is not the least appearance of straining after greatness in his most magnificent excursions, but he rises to the loftiest heights with the most childlike ease. His style as a writer is one of the clearest and simplest—the least encumbered with its own beauty—of any which ever has been written. His noblest passages do but make truth visible in the form of beauty, and "clothe upon" abstract ideas till they become palatable in exquisite shapes. Whoever wishes to see the English language in its splendor, may find it in Doctor Hall's masterly and the writings of Rev. Robert Hall. He combines the beauties of Johnson, Addison, and Burke, without their imperfections." He is distinguished, however, rather for expression and exposition than for invention; he was an orator rather than a great thinker. But as an orator he will rank among the masters of his art. For critical estimates of him by Mackintosh and other eminent men, see Life of Hall, by Gregory, prefixed to his Works; also Eclectic Magazine, vii, 1; North British Review, iv, 454; North American Review, lixv, 384; Methodist Quarterly Review, iv, 516; Quarterly Review (London), xlii, 100; English Cyclopaedia; Jamieson, Religious Biography, p. 246.

Hallel (םהל, Gr. ἡλληλῶν), the designation of a particular part of the hymn service, chanted in the Temple and in the family on certain festivals.

1. Origin of the name, contents of the service, etc. The name hallel, hendal, which signifies praise, is καὶ ἀυξον, given to this distinct portion of the hymn service because it consists of Psalms cxviii-cxviii, which are Psalms of praise, and because this group of Psalms begins with ἡλλαλεῖν, ἡλλαλεῖν, the Egyptian Hallel, because it was chanted in the Temple whilst the Passover lamb was first eaten in Egypt, were first eaten in Egypt, and the Lord is among us. There is another Hallel called ἡλλᾶλη, the Great Hallel (so called because of the reiterated response after every verse. "Thy mercy endureth forever," in Ps. cxxxvi, which is part of this Hallel), which, according to R. Jehudah (Peschch, 118) and Maimonides, comprises Psalms cxviii-cxviii (Yod Ha-Cheshuah, Hilchot Chames 1, Moed, viii, 10). Others, however, though agreeing that this Hallel ends with Psalm cxxxv, maintain that it begins with Psalm cxxix or Psalm cxxxv, 4 (Peschch, 118).

2. Time and manner in which it was chanted. This hymn service, or Egyptian Hallel, was chanted at the sacrifice of the first and second Passover, after the daily sacrifice on the first day of Passover (Mishna, Succa, iv, 8), and the eight days of the Feast of Dedication (Mishna, Toah, v, 5), making in all twenty days in the year. On twelve days out of the twenty, viz., at the sacrifice of the first and second Passover, the first and last days of Passover, the Feast of Pentecost, and of the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles, the flute was played before the altar when the Hallel was chanted (Mishna, Pesachim, ii, 8), whilst after the morning sacrifice during the eight days of the Feast of Dedication the Hallel was chanted in the temple without this accompaniment of the flute. The manner in which these hymns of praise were offered must have been very imposing and impressive. The Levites who could be spared from assisting at the slaying of the sacrifices took their stand before the altar, and chanted the Hallel verse by verse; the people responsively repeated every verse, or burst forth in solemn and intoned Hallelujahs at every pause, whilst the slaves of the priests, the Levites, and the respectable lay people assisted in playing the flute (comp. Psachim, 64, a; Erachim, 10, a, b; and Taispia on Cap. i; Sotah, 27, b; Tonzik, 28, a, b). No representatives of the people (בּּעַרְּבּּיַּים) were required to be present at the Temple at the morning sacrifices on the days when the Hallel was chanted (Mishna, Tonzik, iv, 4). See Sacrifices.

The Egyptian Hallel was also chanted in private families at the celebration of the Passover on the first evening of this feast. On this occasion the Hallel was divided into two parts; the part comprising Ps. cxii. and cxv was chanted during the partaking of the second cup, whilst the second part, comprising Ps. cxv. and cxvi, was chanted over the fourth and finishing cup (לָּדוּשׁוּ בְּכֶסֶת הלָּדוּשׁוּ, Mishna, Psachim, x, 7). It is generally supposed that the singing of the hymn by our Saviour and his disciples at the conclusion of the Passover supper (Matt. xxvi, 30; Mark xiv, 26) refers to the first part of this Hallel. Dean Alford [Greek Testament, ad loc.] strangely confounds this Hallel with the Great Hallel. In Babylon there was an ancient custom, which can be traced as far back as the 2d century of the Christian era, to recite this Hallel on every festival of the new moon (Tonzik, 28, 8), omitting, however, Psas. cxv, 1-11, and cxvi, 1-11.

The great Hallel (הלָּודֻשׁוּ יִלְּדוּשׁוּ) was recited on the first evening at the Passover supper by those who wished to have a fifth cup, i.e., one above the enjoined number (Maimonides, Jod Ho-Chezaka, Hilkhot Channes u. Maza, vii, 19). It was also recited on occasions of great joy, as an expression of thanksgiving to God for special mercies (Mishna, Tonzik, iii, 1-10).

3. Present use of the Hymnal Service.—The Jews to the present day recite the Egyptian Hallel at the morning prayer immediately after the Eighteen Benedictions (בְּכֶסֶת הלָּדוּשׁוּ) on all the festivals of the year except New Year and the Day of Atonement, omitting Psas. cxv, 1-11, and cxvi, 1-11, on the last six days of the Feast of Passover, and on the new moon. Before the Hallel is recited the reader recites the following prayer: "Blessed art thou, Lord our God, King of the world, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and enjoined upon us to recite the Hallel!" At the Passover supper, on the first two evenings of the festival, both the Egyptian Hallel and the great Hallel are now recited; the former is still divided in the same manner as it was in the days of our Saviour.

4. Institution of this Hymnal Service.—It is now impossible to ascertain precisely when this service was first instituted. Some of the Talmudists affirm that it was instituted by Moses, others say that Joshua introduced it, others derive it from Deborah, David, Hezekiah, or Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah (Psachim, 117, a). From 2 Chron. xxxv, 15, we see that the practice of the Levites chanting the Hallel while the Paschal lamb were in the act of being slain was already in vogue in the days of Josiah, and it is not at all improbable that it was customary to do so at much earlier periods.

5. Literature.—Maimonides, Jod Ho-Chezaka, Hilkhot Channes u. Maza, sections vii and viii, i, p. 263-265; Buxtorf, Lexicon Chaldaicum Talmudic et Rabbinicum, s. v. הלודשׁו, col. 613-616; and Bartolocci, Bibliotheca Magna Rabbinica, ii, 227-248, have important treatises upon this subject, but their information is most uncertainly put together, and no distinction is made between earlier and later practices. A thoroughly masterly and critical investigation is that of Krochmal, More Neebone Hissenam (Leopoli, 1851), p. 135 sq.; comp. also Edelman's edition of the Siddur (with Landschut's Critical Annotations (Königspurg, 1845), p. 423 sq.; Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volks Israel (Nordhausen, 1857), ii, 169 sq.

Halleluyah (Heb. hallelu-'yah, הַלָּדוּשׁוּ הַלָּדוּשׁוּ, Praise ye Jehovah, i.e. Jehovah?) (or in its Greek form) Hallelu-iah (Ἀλλαλοῦια, a word which stands at the beginning of many of the Psalms. See Müller, De notione Hallelujah (Cyn. 1890); Wernsdorf, De formula Hallelujah Vitis funeris: from its first use in this position it grew into a formula of praise, and was chanted as such on solemn days of rejoicing. (See Crítica Biblica, ii, 448.) This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the church, and is still occasionally heard in devotional psalmody.—Kitto. The Hebrew terms are frequently rendered "Praise ye the Lord," and so in the mighty chunds, cxv, 1-11; cxvi, 1-11, i.e., 1 (comp. Psas. cxii, 9; cxv, 1-18; cxvi, 19; cxvi, 2). The Psalms from cxiii to cxvii were called by the Jews the Hallel, and were sung on the first of the month, at the Feast of Dedication, and the Feast of Tabernacles, the Feast of Weeks, and the Feast of the Passover. See HO- SANNI. On the occasion Psas. cxiii to cxvii were sung at the school of Hillel (the former only according to the school of Shammai), were sung before the feast, and the remainder at its termination, after drinking the last cup. The hymn (Matt. xxi, 30) sung by Christ and his disciples after the last supper is supposed to have been a part of this Hallel, which seems to have varied according to the feast. See Hallel. The literal meaning of "hallelujah" sufficiently indicates the character of the Psalms in which it occurs, as hymns of praise and thanksgiving. They are all found in the last book of the Bible, and bear marks of being intended for use in the Temple service, the words "praise ye Jehovah" being taken up by the full chorus of Levites. See Psalms. In the great hymn of triumph in heaven over the destruction of Babylon, the apostle in vision heard the multitude in chorus like the voice of the last book of the Bible, and bearevidentall marks of being intended for use in the Temple service, the words "praise ye Jehovah" being taken up by the full chorus of Levites. See Psalms. In the great hymn of triumph in heaven over the destruction of Babylon, the apostle in vision heard the multitude in chorus like the voice of the last book of the Bible, and bear marks of being intended for use in the Temple service, the words "praise ye Jehovah" being taken up by the full chorus of Levites. See Psalms. In the great hymn of triumph in heaven over the destruction of Babylon, the apostle in vision heard the multitude in chorus like the voice of the last book of the Bible, and bear marks of being intended for use in the Temple service, the words "praise ye Jehovah" being taken up by the full chorus of Levites. See Psalms.

HALLELUJAH, a doxology used frequently in the ancient Church, and derived from the Old Testament. The singing Hallelujah sometimes means the repetition of the word, in imitation of the heavenly host (see Rev. xix.); at other times it has reference to one of the psalms beginning with Hallelujah. In the early Christian Church "the more common acceptance of 'hallelujah' is for the singing of the word itself in special parts of divine service, as a sort of mutual call to each other to praise the Lord. In some churches the Hallelujah was sung only on Easter day and the fifty days of Pentecost; in others it was used more generally. Augustine says it was not used in time of Lent (Augustine, Epist. 119, 178). In the fourth Council of Toledo it is mentioned under the name Landes, and appointed to be sung after the reading of the Gospel (Concil. Tota, iv, can. 10, 11). In the 1st century it was occasionally sung at funerals as St. Jerome speaks of it as being sung at the funeral of Fabiola, and says the people made the golden roof of the church shake with echoing forth the Hallelujah (Contra Vigiliant. cap. 1, Epist. xxx, cap. 4). The ancient Church retained the Hebrew word, as also did the Church of England in its first Liturgy; though it is translated "Praise ye the Lord," to which the people reply, "The Lord's name be praised." See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xiv, ch. ii, § 4; Procter.

Haller, Albrecht von, one of the greatest of modern physiologists, was born in Berne Oct. 16, 1708, and was an able man in childhood, and a man of extraordinary talents. He studied medicine first at Tubingen, and afterwards at Leyden, under Boerhaave. After extensive travels he became professor of anatomy, surgery, and botany at Götttingen in 1736, and remained there until 1743, when he returned to Berne. There he was re-elected, by his fellow-citizens, for nearly a quarter of a century; continued to benefit science by his literary labors; filled several important offices in the state, and adorned the Gospel by his life. He died in Oct., 1777. A great part of the modern science of physiology is due to the labors and genius of Haller. But his place in our pages is due to his steady religious life, to his constant recognition in his works, of the great truths of Christianity, and especially to his religious writings, viz., Briefe über die wichtigsten Wahrheiten der Offenbarung (Berne, 1772); Briefe zur Vertiefung der Offenbarung (Berne, 1773-77, 3 parts), consisting of letters to his daughter on the truth and excellence of Christianity. See Zimmermann, Leben Hallers (Zürich, 1755, 8vo); Biographie de Haller (Paris, 1846, 2d ed.);

Haller, Berthold, one of the Reformers of Berne, was born at Aldingen, Württemberg, in 1492. At Freiburg he had Melanchthon for a fellow-student, and graduated in 1522. In 1524 Cologn, where working at some time at Rottweil he was invited by Rubulus in 1518 (1518 ?). He became assistant to Dr. Wittlenbach in St. Vincent’s church, and in his society, his knowledge of the Scriptures and his religious character were greatly cultivated. About 1520 he made the acquaintance of Cranach, who was always close to his faithful friend and counsellor. Shortly after he succeeded Wittlenbach as cathedral preacher, and soon began to expound Matthew, instead of following the usual Church lessons only. His eloquence and zeal made him extremely popular. When the strife began in 1522 Haller was a member of the commission, and distinguished himself in the conference by his opposition to the bishop of Lausanne. His hold upon the popular mind was so great that in the subsequent years of strife he held his place as preacher in spite of all opposition, and was supported greatly, not so much by enthusiasm as by his personal force of character, to the establishment of the Reformation in Berne. Even with the Anabaptists, on their appearance in Berne, he obtained great influence. In 1525 he courageously abandoned the Mass. In the Grand Council he defended himself so vigorously that he was still kept in his office as preacher, though he lost his canonicity. In 1527 a number of Reformers were elected to the “Grand Council.” The venerable Francis Kolb, full of fire and energy, was now in Berne, ready to aid and stimulate the more prudent Haller. The “M tratizes” of 1525 and 1526, the former for the latter against the Reformation, were submitted to the people, and they decided for the first. In the “Conference” of 1528, at Berne, Haller took the leading part, aided by Zwingli, Ecalampus, and Bucer. It was finally decided by the Conference that the Mass should be abolished. In 1529 he married. His labors for the Reformation extended to Solothurn, and to other parts of Switzerland; but his chief activity lay in Berne, where he held his pre-eminence as preacher and Reformer until his death, Feb. 25, 1536. He left no writings. See Kirchhofer, Haller oder die Reform. v. Bern (Zurich, 1865); Die Reformierer Berne (Zurich, 1878); D’Aubigné, History of Reformation, ii, 349; iii, 536; iv, 296, 306; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. v, 479.

Haller, Karl Ludwig von, was born at Berne Aug. 1, 1766. In 1795 he became secretary of the city council, and in 1800 emigrated to Germany. In 1806 he resumed, and became professor of history and statiscount, and in 1818 made a journey through Italy and to Rome. Having secretly become a member of the Roman Church in 1820, he joined it publicly in 1821, and was discharged from his office. He then went to Paris in 1824, and was employed in the ministry of foreign affairs. Having lost that situation in consequence of the Revolution of July, 1830, he finally went to Sobt-dur, where he was in 1844 appointed member of the lesser council, and elected to the head of the Carma-montane party, and died May 20, 1845. Haller was an ultra-conservative in politics, and was drawn into the Church of Rome by his fanatical hatred of all liberal reforms. His chief work, entitled Restauration der Staats-wissenschaften (Winterthur, 1815-1834, 6 vols.), was written with the design to annihilate all revolutionary principles in politics. Even many Roman Catholic writers expressed a decided dissent from the antiliberal doctrines of this work. The most important among his other works are, Lettre a un famille pour lui declarer son retour a l’Eglise catholique (Paris, 1821; in German by Paulluss, Stuttgart, 1821; by Studer, Berne, 1821)—Theorie der geistl. Staaten u. Gesellschaften (Winterthur, 1822); Die Freiuauerrei u. ihr Einfluss auf d. Schweiz (Schaffhausen, 1840); Gesch. der kirchl. Revolut. des Cantons Bern (Laurens, 1829, 4th ed.); See Tschirch, der Untritt des Herrn (2d ed.); Zaehringen Kirche (Zurich, 1850); Krug, Apologie der protestantischen Kirche (Leipzig, 1821); Escher, Uber die Philosophie des Staatsrechts mit bes. Beizeh. auf d. Hallersche Restauration (Zurich, 1825); Scherer (ultramontane), Die Restauration der Staats-wissenschaften. (Laurens, 1845); Hallet, Joseph, an English Nonconformist, was born at Exeter in 1609, ordained in 1718, and succeeded his father as co-pastor with Mr. Pierce over the Independant congregation at Exeter in 1722. Here he discharged his pastoral duties faithfully until his death in 1744. As a writer, he was marked by industry, learning, and critical acumen. He wrote a number of polemical tracts on the Evidences of Christianity in reply to Tindal and Chubb, and on the Trinity. Besides these, he published A Free and impartial Study of the Holy Scriptures recommended, being notes on peculiar texts of Scripture (London, 1736, 3 vols.); A paraphrase and Notes on the three last Chapters of the Episdel to the Hebrews (London, 1733, 4to.). In theology he was a semi-Arian. See Bogue and Bennett, History of Dissenters, ii, 179, 222; Jones, Christian Biography.

Hallifax, Samuel, bishop of St. Asaph, was born at Mansfield, Derbyshire, in 1738. He was made at Jesus College, Cambridge, and at Trinity Hall, and became successively rector of Chaddington, Buckinghamshire, in 1765; professor of Arabic at Cambridge in 1768; professor of jurisprudence in 1770; chaplain of George III in 1774; master of Doctors’ Commons in 1775; rector of Warap, Nottinghamshire, in 1778, and bishop of Gloucester in 1781. He was transferred to the see of St. Asaph in 1775, and died in 1780. He wrote An Analysis of the Roman Civil Law compared with the Laws of England (1774, 8vo)—Twelve Sermons on the Prophecies concerning the Christian Religion, and in particular concerning the Church of Papal Rome, preached in Lincoln’s Inn Chapel at Bishop Warburton’s Lecture (1776, 8vo)—An Analysis of Butler’s Analysis—Discourses on Justification (Camb. 1762, 8vo). See Rose, New General Biog. Dict.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiii, 197; British Critic, vol. xxvii, 35. Hallow (haw), or, rather, Lochesh (Heb. Lochesh, אֶלֶכֶם, with the article הָלָו, הָלָכֶה, the whispper—Sept. ἀλασκιος and ἀλασκυς, Vulg. Alcoho), the father of Shallum, which latter assisted Nehemiah in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 12, where the name is Anglicized "Halothes"). He was one of the popular chiefs that subscribed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. xii, 44). Ecclus. cir. 410. xxii, 2; Numb. v, 10). The English word is from the Saxon, and is properly to make holy; hence hallowed persons, things, places, rites, etc.; hence also the name, power, dignity of God is hallowed, that is, reverenced as holy (Matt. vi, 9). See Holy. Haloheesh (Neh. iii, 12). See Halloheesh.

Halt (ḥaṭṭ, ḥaṅōl), lame on the feet or legs (Gen. xxxix, 31; Psa. xxxviii, 17; Jer. xx, 10; Mic. iv, 6; vii, 1; Zeph. iii, 19). Many persons who were hale were cured by our Lord. See Lamb. To halt between two opinions (Job xxvii, 20), should, perhaps, be translated to the other? it is perhaps sometimes in its meaning: we sometimes say it is an allusion to birds, who hop from spray to spray, forwards and backwards, as the contrary influence of supposed convictions vibrated the mind in alternate affirmation and doubfulness.

Haliburton, Thomas, professor of divinity in the University of St. Andrew's, was born at Duplin, near Perth, in the subject of frequent but ineffectual religious convictions. In 1689 he began to be perplexed respecting the evidence of revealed religion, till, after having experienced some relief from Robert Bruce's Fulfilling of the Scriptures, he received further aid from Mr. Donaldson, an excellent minister who came repeatedly to Perth and paid a visit to his mother. He inquired of his young friend if he sought a blessing from God on his learning, remarking at the same time, with an austere look, "Sirrah, unsanctified learning has done much mischief to the Kirk of God." This led him to seek divine direction in extraordinary difficulties; but this exercise, he acknowledges, left him still afar off from God. He studied at St. Andrew's, and became domestic chaplain in a nobleman's family in 1696. His mind, long disquieted about the evidences of Christianity, was finally settled, and he wrote an Essay into the Principles of Modern Deists, which is still valued. In 1698 he was thoroughly converted; in 1700 he became minister of Ceres parish. In 1711 he was made professor of divinity at St. Andrew's; and died Sept. 23, 1712. He was an excellent scholar, and a very pious man. A sketch of his life is given, in his Works, edited by Robert Bryson, D.D. (London, 1805, 8vo), which volume contains the following, among other writings, viz. The great Concern of Salvation. - Natural Religion insufficient: - Essay on the Nature of Faith. - Inquiry on Justification, and Sermons. Haliburton's Memoirs, with an introductory Essay by W. H. Hume, M.A. (Glasgow, 1824). The volume has been often reprinted, both in Great Britain and America.

Ham (Heb. Cham, כִּפָּה [see below]; Sept. Χαμ [Josephus Χαμας, Ant. i, 4, 1], Vulg. Cham), the name of a man and also of two regions.

1. The youngest son of Noah (Gen. v, 32; comp. ix, 24). B.C. post 2613. Having provoked the wrath of his father by an act of indecency towards him, the latter cursed him and his descendants to be slaves to his brothers and their descendants (ix, 25). B.C. cir. 2514. To judge, however, from the narrative, Noah directed his curse only against Canaan (the fourth son of Ham) and his race, thus excluding from it the descendants of Ham's three other sons, Cush, Mizraim, and Phut (Gen. x, 6). How that curse was accomplished is taught by the history of the Jews, by whom the Canaanites were subsequently exterminated. The general opinion is that all the southern nations derive their origin from Ham (to which the Hebrew root בֹּקֵר, to be hot, not unlike the Greek ἄληθος, lends some force). This meaning seems to be confirmed by that of the Egyptian word Belk, of a minister, which is believed to be an Egyptian equivalent of Ham, and which, as an adjective, signifies "black," probably implying warmth as well as blackness. See Egypt. If the Hebrew and Egyptian words be the same, Ham must mean the swarthys or sun-burnt, like Αθηνης, which has been derived from the Coptic name of Ethiopia, ἐθνος, but which we should be inclined to trace to ἔθνος, "a boundary," unless the Sahidic ἐθνος may be derived from Kish (Cush). It is observable that the names of Noah and his sons appear to have had prophetic significations. This is stated in the case of Noah (Gen. v, 29), and implied in that of Japheth (ix, 27), and it can scarcely be doubted that the same was intended as to Shem, who therefore have been so named as progenitor of the sunburnt Egyptians and Cushites. Cush is supposed to have been the progenitor of the nations of East and South Asia, more especially of South Arabia, and also of Ethiopia, Mizraim, of the African nations, including the Philistines and sons which Greek flabbler and tradition connect with Egypt; Phut, likewise of some African nations; and Canaan, of the inhabitants of Palestine and Phoenicia. On the Arabian traditions concerning Ham, see D'Herbelot (Bibl. Orient. s. a.). See Noah.

A. Ham's Place in his Family. Idolatry connected with his Name. - Like his brothers, he was married at the time of the Deluge, and with his wife was saved from the general destruction in the ark which his father had prepared at God's command. He was thus, with his family, a connecting link between the antediluvian population and the nations of the world. The least fact of his impiety and dishonor to his father had also caused him to be regarded as the transmitter and representative in the renovated world of the worst features of idolatry and profaneness, which had grown to so fatal a consummation among the antediluvians. Lactantius mentions this ancient tradition of Ham's idolatrous degeneracy: "[Cham] profugus in ejus tempore parte conceedit, que nunc Arabiam nominatur; eaque terra de nomine suo Chanaan dicta est, et posteri ejus Chanaeae. Hic fuit prima gens quae Deum ignoravit, Quoniam mense posse [Cham] et conditorem cultum Dei a patre non accipit, maloedicit ob eum; itaque ignornantiam divinatia minores suis religiit" (De origine, errore, i 13; De falsa Relig. 23). See other authors quoted in Beyer's Add. ad Selden Syngogae, de Syria Sylva (Ungoli, Thes. xxiii, 288). This tradition was rife also among the Jews. R. Manasse says, "Moreover Ham, the son of Noah, was the first to invent idols," etc. The Tyrian idols called נושא, Chanaanim, are supposed by Kircher to have their designation from the degenerate son of Noah (see Spencer, De logg. Hb. [ed. Pfaff] p. 470-482). The old commentators, full of classical associations, saw in Noah and his sons the counterpart of Крёсе, or Seraph, and of Γιάγκας, and in three divisions identified Jupiter or Ζεύς with Ham, especially, as the name suggested, the African Jupiter Ammon (Ἀμονός [or, more correctly, Ἀμον], so Gaisford and Bihir) γὰρ Αἰγύπτου καλλιότα τὸν Δία, Herod. Eucter, 42: Plutarch explains Αμονός by the better known form Αμών, Ισρ. et Ost. ix. In Jer. xlix, 25, "the multitude of No" is Νας Να. Amon of No; so in Nahum iii, 8, "Populous No" is No-Αμών, Νας Να. For the identification of Jupiter Ammon with Ham, see J. Conr. Dammhauer's Politica Bibliorum, i; Is. Vossius, De Idol. lib. ii, cap. 7). This identification is, however, extremely doubtful; eminent critics of modern times reject it; among them Ewald (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i 975 (note)), who says, "Mit dem griechischen Gott Ammon oder Hammon ihn zusammenzubringen hat man keinen Grund," u. s. w. One of the reasons which leads Bochart (Phaleg, i, 1, ed. Willemend, p. 7) to identify Ham with Jupiter or Zeus is derived from the meaning of the name. נא (from the root נָבָט, to be hot) combines the ideas hot and swarthiness (comp. ἄθιοπος); accordingly, according to St. Jerome, the name Belk, of a minister, is believed by the Egypians (Omnost, p. 108) by νεπρ, not incompatible. In like manner, Λατζ is derived a ferrovo, according to the etymology of the etymol. Magn., παρὰ τὴν Σωσ, Σταρυμαρας γάρ ἐν άπο, ἦ ἐν τῷ Σωσ, to thee, or boil, forre. Cyril of Alexandria uses Σταρυμαρας as synonymous (i. ii, Ophthalm. in Genes.). Another reason of identification-section, according to Bochart, is the fanciful one of comparative age. Zeus was the youngest of three brothers, and so was Ham in the opinion of this author. He is not alone in this view of the subject. Josephus (Ant. i, 6, 3) expressly calls Ham the youngest of Noah's sons, ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων τετράυς. Genesius (Thea, p. 489) calls him "filius natu tertius et minimus;" similarly First (Hebr. Wurterb., i, 408), Knobel (De Gen. erklär. p. 101), Delsitz (Comment. über die Gen. p. 280), and Kalisch (Gen. p. 229), which last lays down the rule in explanation of the ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων ἐπὶ οὖσαν in Genesis x, 4, "If there are more than two sons, ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων is the eldest, ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων ὁ πιθανότερος is the younger son;" and he aptly compares 1 Sam. xiii, 13, 14. The Sept., it is true, as the LXX., renders by the comparative—ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων ὁ πιθανότερος, "his younger son." But, throughout, Shem is the term of comparison, the central point of blessing from whom all else diverges. Hence not only is Ham ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων, ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων ὁ πιθανότερος, in comparison with Shem, but Japheth is relatively to the same ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων, ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων ὁ πιθανότερος (see Gen. x, 21). That is this the proper meaning of this latter passage, which treats of the age of Japheth, the eldest son of Noah, we are convinced by the consideration just adduced, and our conviction is supported by the Sept. translators, Symmachus, Rashi (who says, "From the words of the text I do not clearly know whether the elder applies to Shem or to Japheth."). But, as we are afterwards informed that Shem was 100 years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the Deluge [xi, 10], it follows that Japheth was the elder, for Noah was 600 years old when he began to have children, and the Deluge took place in his 600th year. His eldest son must consequently have been 100 years old at the time of the Flood, whereas we are expressly informed that Shem did not arrive at that age until two years after the Deluge (Gen. x, 10), Aben-Enzra, Luther, Junius, and Tremellius, Piscator, Mercerus, Arius, Montanus, Clericus, Dathius, J. D. Michaelis, and Mendelssohn (who gives a powerful reason for his opinion: "The tonic accents make it clear that the word ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων, ὁ τῶν ἄνδρων ὁ πιθανότερος, applies to Japheth; wherever the words of the text are obscure and equivocal, great respect and attention must be paid to the tonic accents, as their author understood the true meaning of the text better than we do." De Nala, Lindenthal, and Raphael's Trans. of Genesis, p. 43). In consistency with this seniority of Japheth, his name and genealogy are first given in the Tobeh Bemi Noah of Gen. x. Shem's name stands first when the three brothers are mentioned together, probably because the special blessing (afterwards to be more fully developed in his great descendant Abraham) was bestowed on him by God. But this prerogative by no means affords any proof that Shem was the eldest of Noah's sons. The obvious instances of Seth, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, Joseph, Ephraim, Moses, David, and Solomon (besides this of Shem), give sufficient ground for observing that primogeniture was far from always securing the privileges of birthright and blessing; and other distinctions (comp. Gen. xxxv, 23; xlvi, 14, 15, 19, and 1 Sam. xvi, 6-12).

These are the sons of Ham, after their families, or classes, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations, Gen. x, 20.
Menologia Graeco, part ii, p. 197. "Felix Arabia Indi vocatur... ubi felix vocatur India Arabica, ut ab Ethiopica et Gangetica distinguatur," Assemani, Bibl. Orient., III, ii, 509), especially the Yemenese; Jones, indeed, on the ground of Sanscrit affinities ("Cua or Cus or Gu as Aryan equivalents of the name of Brahman, being a part of the Hindustan as in west, and east of the river Indus (Greg. Abrubharaghi, Hist. Dynast. [ed. Pococke, Oxon. 1673]), Dyn. i, p. 17.

The sons of Ham are stated to have been "Cush," and Mizrael, and Phut, and Canaan" (Gen. x, 6, comp. 1 Chr. v, 21). It is remarkable that the recognition of the "land of Ham" in the Bible (Ps. lxxxviii, 51; cv, 29; cvi, 22), and this, though it does not prove the identity of the Egyptian name with that of the patriarch, certainly favors it, and establishes the historical fact that Egypt, seen as a descendant of Ham, is peculiarly his territory. The name Mizrael we believe to confirm this. The restriction of Ham to Egypt, unlike the case, if we may reason inferentially, of his brethren, may be accounted for by the early civilization of this part of the Hamitic territory, while much of the rest was comparatively barbarous. Egypt may have been the first settlement of the Hamites whence colonies went forth, as we know was the case with the Philitines. See CAPTIVI.

1. CUSH (Josephus Antiq. "reigned over the Ethiopians" [African Cushites]; Jerome in quest. Hebr. in Genesis, "Both the Arabians, the Ethiopians", which was the parent country, and the Africans, its colony") [Abyssinia = Cush in the Vulg. and Syr.]; but these gradations (confining Cush first to the western shore of the Red Sea, and then extending the nation to the Arabian Peninsula) require further extension; modern discoveries tally with this most ancient ethnographic record. In placing Cush on the Ethiopians and the Persians and the Gulf. When Rosemiller (Scholii in Gen. ad loc.) claims Josephus for an African Cush as well as an African one, he exceeds the testimony of the historian, who says no more than that "the Ethiopians of his day called themselves Cushites, and not only they, but all the Africans also gave them that name" (Ant. i, 6, 2). But Josephus does not specify what Ethiopians he means: the form of his statement leads to the opposite conclusion rather, that the Ethiopians were African merely, excluded all from the Asiatice [voir tawaw vs kaww by 'Ain tawaw, the tawaw referring to the Aksumite just mentioned. (For a better interpretation of Josephus here, see Volney, Systeme Geogr. des Hébreux, in *Quar. v, 224.) The earliest empire, that of Nimrod, was Cushitic, literally and properly, not per cachatreis, as Herodotus, Diodorus, and others would have it. "Nubia and Sudan" (On the Origin of Families of Nations, in Works, ii, 309) shows an appreciation of the wide extent of the Cushite race in primaeval times, which is much more consistent with the discoveries of recent times than the speculation of the theological school prevt. to this. This distinction of "Ham," he says, "founded in Iran (the country of the lower Euphrates) the monarchy of the first Chaldeans, invented letters, etc." (compare Rosenmiller, as above quoted). According to Volney, the term Ethiopian, coextensive with Cush, included even the Hindus; he seems, however, to mean the southern Arabians, who were, it is certain, sometimes called Indians (in

"The Rositt al-Sufish it is written that God bestowed on Ham nine sons," the two which are mentioned at the head of the list. (Wet, cited, with which comp. Abulfaraghi as quoted in one of our notices above), expressly connected the Hindus with Ham, although not through Cush, who occurs as the sixth among the Hamite brethren. See the entire extract from the Khelemeut al-Akhbar of Khondemir. (Bibl. Gregorii Kipemippiii, exe. ii, vol. i, p. 109 ["Bibl. Cusa."] Bohlen (Genev. ad loc.), who has a long but indistinct notice of Cush, with his Sanscrit preludes, is for extending Cush "as far as the dark India," claiming for his view the sanction of Rosem, Winer, and Schumann. When Job (xxviii, 19) speaks of "the tops of Ethiopia" (장*Gamaliel 5, 21*), Bohlen finds a Sanaari word in *Gamaliel, and consequently a link between India and Cush (장*Gamaliel 5, 21*). Bohlen refers to the Syrian, Chaldean, and Saadia versions as having India for Cush, and (after Braam, De Vet. Sacr., i, 115) assigns it to a Semitic authority. Am- mani, who is by Bohlen referred to a futile hope of extracting evidence for the identification of Cush and India (of the Hindus), has an admirable dissertation on the people of Arabia (Bibl. Or. III, ii, 552 sq.): one element of the Arab population he derives from Cush (see below). We thus conclude that the children of Ham, in the line of Cush, had very extensive settlements in Asia, as far as the Egyptians and Persian Gulf at least, and probably including the district of the Indians; while in Africa they both spread widely in Abyssinia, and now are scattered through a large part of the continent. The Egyptians: this we feel warranted in assuming on the testimony of the Arabian geographers; e. g. Abulfeda (in his section on Egypt, tables, p. 110 in the original, p. 151 transl. by Reinard) mentions a Cush, or rather Kus, as the most important city in Egypt after the capital Thebes, and the Red Sea was contiguous to it. It was a place of great resort by the Mohammedans of the west on pilgrimage. "The sons of Cush, where they once got possession, were never totally ejected. If they were at any time driven away, they returned after a time and recovered their ground, for which reason I make no doubt but many of them in process of time returned to Chaldea, and mixed with those of their family who resided there. Hence arose the tradition that the Babylonians not only conquered Egypt, but that the learning of the Egyptians came originally from Chal- dea; and this like account that the Egyptians were people of the country had come Babylon, and that the wisdom of the Chaldeans was derived from them" (Bryant, On Ancient Egypt, in Works, vi, 290). See CUSH.

1. Seba (Josephus Antiq. "is universally admitted by critics to be the ancient name for the Egyptian [Nu- bia?]." Ant. II, ii, 10) however, more accurately says that Saba was "a royal city of Ethiopia [Nubia], which Cambyses afterwards named Meros, after the name of his sister." Bohacht would have Saba to be *Saba-Main Arabia, confounding our Seba (אבל) with Sheba (אבל). Meroë, with the district around it, was no doubt settled by our Seba. (See Gesen. s. v., who quotes Bochart, loc. cit., and the article on Egypt and Seba in the Encyclopædia Britannica.) See also Bochart, who also identifies Sheba with the modern Arabian Sabāa; Heeren throws his authority into the scale for the Ethiopian Meroë; so Knoch. It supports this opinion that Seba is mentioned in connection with the other Nubian kingdoms (Egypt and Egypt) in Isa. xiii. 3, and xlv. 14. (The Sheba of Arabia, and our Ethiopian Seba, as representing opposite shores of the Red Sea, are contrasted in Psa. lxxii. 10.) See Feldhoff (Volkerkunde, p. 71), who, however, discovers many Sabas both in Africa (even to the southwest coast of that continent) and in Asia (on the Persian Gulf), a circumstance from which he derives the idea that, in this, grandsons of their patriarch, the Hamites displayed the energy of their race by widely-extended settlements. See Saba.

2. Harund (Josephus Bithia, not to be confounded (as he is by Rosem. and apparently by Patrick, after Bochart) with the son of Joktan, who is mentioned in ver. 29. Joseph. and Jerome, as quoted by Corn. a. Lap., were not far wrong in making the Gattelina (the people in the central part of North Africa, between the modern Niger and the Red Sea) to be descended from the Cush of Genesis, and the Nubia of Patrick. (Bibl. Antiq., b. 6, v. 1).) Rightly puts our Havilah in East Abyssinia, by the Straits of Bob el-Mandeb. Gesen. who takes this view, refers to Piny. vi, 28, and Pтол. iv, 7, for the Avallata, now Zehal, and adds that Saadias repeatedly renders ביהילא by Zehal. Bohlen at first identifies the two Havilahs, but afterwards so far corrects himself as to admit, very properly, that there were probably two coasts of the Red Sea a Havilah as well as on the east of it—"just in the same way as there was one Seba on the coast of Arabia, and another opposite to it in Ethiopia." There is no such difficulty as Kalisch (Genesis, Pref. p. 88) supposes in believing that occasionally kindred peoples should have like names. It is not more incredible that there should be a Havilah both in the family of Ham and in that of Shem (Gen. x. v. 7, comp. with ver. 29) than that there were Enochs and Lamechs among the posterities of both Cain and Seth (compare Gen. iv. 17, 18, with ver. 16, 20). Kalisch's cumbersome theory of acontemporary extent of communication of the Persian Gulf running to the southwest and crossing the Red Sea, of the general name of Havilah (possessed at one end by the son of Joktan, and at the other by the son of Cush), removes no difficulty, and, indeed, is unnecessary. The hard "apparent difference" (Bohren, p. 249) in the Mosaic statement of two Havilahs of distinct races, nor any violation of consistency when fairly judged by the nature of the case. Michaelis and Feldhoff strangely founded about in their opposite conjectures: the former supposes our Havilah to be the land of the Cheredit, on the Caspian, the latter places it in China Proper, about Pekin (1). See Havilah.

3. Sabta (Joseph. Σαβθα, Σαβθα) is by Josephus, with great probability, located immediately north of the preceding, in the district east of Meroë, between the Assabara (Tissaque), a tributary of the Nile, and the Red Sea, by the coast of which, as it is called, "the Sabatai, so called from (Σαβθα) Σαβισθα το αποφωτηρος απο ιατρητοεις ποτομος (Gen. vi. i. 6, 2)." Kalisch quite agrees in this "opinion," and Gesenius substantially, when he places S Barth in the southeast coast of the Red Sea, where was the Ethiopian city Saba. (See Strabo, xvi. p. 770 [ed. Casel.], and Pтол. vi. v. 10.) Rosem., Bohlen, and Knoch, with less propriety, place it in Arabia, with whom Delitzsch and Keil, while Feldhoff, with his usual extravagance, identifies it with Thibet. See Saba.

4. Ramsak (Josephus Ρημσοκ, Ρημσοκ) and Dedan (Ιουδα) are separated by Josephus and Jerome, who place the last-mentioned in West Ethiopia (Africa rec, Ἐρυθραίας ἔρημος, Ρᾶμσαῦ, which Jerome translates Gena Ethiopiae in occidentali plaga). Ezekiel, however, in xxvii. 20, 22, mentions these three names together in connection with Arabia. According to Niebuhr, who, in his map of Yemen, has a province called Subeii, and the town of Subbe (in longitude 16° 34′ lat. 16° 18′), the country south to the coast of Yemen, is the country known to the ancients by the name of Ἐρυθραῖας. In his map, the term Subba, which is given to the countries east of the Persian Gulf, the present seat of the Persian Gulf, across Arabia, comprises the territories of Raamkah and his two sons. The city called Ρημσοκ, or Ρῆμυσα, by Pтолemy (vi, 7), is considered to be the present city of Raamakah, as it is written in the original (Ῥῆμα) . . . as one of the islands, Bades, in the Persian Gulf, resembles the name of one of the sons, Dedan. See Dedan.

5. Sabaatka (Joseph. Σαβακαθα, Σαβακαθα) is by Kalisch thought to have settled in Ethiopia, and the form of the word favors the opinion, the other compounds of Seb being apparently of Ethiopia or Cushite origin. It is supposed to be a reference to Seba, the name Subadot, discovered on Egyptian monuments (comp. the king Νύρω, in 2 Kings xvii, 4, and the Sebchos of Manetho), renders its position in Arabia, or at the Persian Gulf, improbable; but Sumgoier, in Gedrosia (as Bochart supposes), or Tobochaster, in Persia (as Bohlen suggests), or Saiotakos, are out of the question. The Targum of Jonathan renders it here "the island of Zirg, which is the Arabic name for the African district Zirgebar, and which is not inappropriate here" (Kalisch). See Sabaatka.

6. Nimrod (Joseph. Νυμρωός), the mighty founder of the earliest imperial power, is the grandest name, not only among the children of Ham, but in primeval history. He seems to have been divined under the title of Βῆλας-Νύρω, or Bel-Nimrod, which may be translated "the god of the chase," or "the great hunter." (The Greek forms Νυμρως and Νυμρωθ serve to connect Νυρω with Νυρωθ.) The native root is thought to be ναρρω, "to pursue," or "to cause to flee," Rawlinson, p. 186.) He is noticed here in his place, in passing, because around his name Nimrod has gathered and exploited an Eastern tradition from all sources, which entirely corroborates the statement of Moses, that the primitive empire of the Chaldeans was Cushite, and that its people were closely connected with Egypt, and Canaan, and Ethiopia. Rawlinson (Fire Great Mon., chap. iii) has collected much of this tradition, and shown that the hints of Herodotus as to the existence of an Astarte Ethiopia as well as an African one (iii. 94; vii. 70), and that the traditional belief which Moses of Chorone, the Armenian historian, has, for instance, that Nimrod is in fact Dieus, and grandfather of Cush by Mizraim (a statement substantially agreeing with that of the Bible), have been too strongly confirmed by all recent researches (among the cuneiform inscriptions) in comparative philology to be set aside by criticism based on the mere conjectures of ingenious men. It would appear that Nimrod not only built cities, and conquered extensive territories, "subduing or expelling the various tribes by which the country was previously occupied" (Rawlinson, p. 150; comp. Gen. x. 10-12 [marginal version]), but established a dynasty of some eleven or twelve monarchs. By and by (about 1500 B.C.) (see Rawlinson, p. 268) the ancient Chaldeans, the stock of Cush and people of Nimrod, sank into obscurity, crushed by a foreign Semitic stock, destined after some seven or eight centuries of submission to revive to a second tenure of imperial power, which culminated in grandeur under the magnificent Nebuchadnezzar. See Nimrod.

II. MIZRAIM (Joseph,梅尔太,梅尔太), that is, the father of Egypt, is the second son of Cush. Of this dual form of a man's name we have other instances in Ephraim and Shahkaraim (1 Chron. viii, 8). We simply call the reader's attention to the fact, vouched for in this genealogy of the Hamites, of the nearness of kindred between Nimrod and Cush. This point is of great value in the study of ancient Eastern history, and will reconcile many difficulties which would otherwise be insoluble. "For the last 3000 years it is to the Semitic and Indo-European races that the world has mainly been indebted for its advancement; but it was otherwise in Egypt and Asia. Egypt and Cush, Mizrak, Merv, Miao, and Nimrod, both descendants of Ham, led the way and acted as the pioneers of mankind in the various untrodden fields of art, literature, and science. Alphabetic writing, astronomy, history, chronology, architecture, plastic art, sculpture, navigation, agriculture, and textiles industry, seem, all of them, to have had their origin in one or other of these two countries" (Rawlinson, p. 75).

If, as some suppose, Mizrak in the lists of Gen. x, and 1 Chron. i, stands for Mizrak, we should take the singular Mazor to be the name of the progenitor of the Egyptian tribes. It is remarkable that Mazor appears to be identical in signification with maz or mizz, that it may be but another name of the patriarch. See Egypt.

In this case the mention of Mizrak (or Mizirm) would be geographical, and not indicative of a Mazor, son of Ham.

The Mizrakes, like the descendants of Ham, occupy a territory wider than that bearing the name of Mizrak.

We may, however, suppose that Mizrak included all the first settlements, and that in remote times other tribes besides the Philistines migrated, or extended their territories. This we may infer to have been the case with the Hebrews (Ludim) or Libyans, for whom we speak them as in the remote period of the Egyptian history subject to the Pharaohs. He tells us that under the first king of the third dynasty, of Memphis, Nechores, or Nechochos, "the Libyans revolted from the Egyptians, but, on account of a wonderful increase of the moon, submitted through fear" (Cory's Anc. Frag. 2d edit. p. 100, 101). It is unlikely that at this very early time the Memphis kingdom ruled far, if at all, beyond the western boundary of Egypt. See MIZRAIM.

Land of Hm.—By this and similar poetic terms the Psalmist designates Egypt in Ps. cvi, 25 ("Jacob saw and cried in the land of Hm.") (Gen. xxxxi, 52), and in the plural, synonymous with יָם הנְגְּלָה, which with compare ver. 27, and cvi, 22, 29, and in Ps. lxxviii, 51 (where "the tabernacles of Hm.") יָם הנְגְּלָה, is again parallel with יָם הַנּוֹגְלָה.

What in these passages is the poetical name of Egypt in Hebrew, was among the Egyptians themselves probably the domestic and usual designation of their country (Gesenius). According to Gesenius, this name of Hm ("Coptic Chemi," for which Lepsius, however, substitutes another word, Hem [Memphis] or Hm [Memphite]) is derived from the swarthy complexion of the people (what Gesenius calls Coptic Lepsius designates by the now more usual term Memphitic). Gesenius adds the Sahidic (Lepsius's Thebaic) form of "our word Kene [from ken, black]"; but Lepsius denies that the name of Egypt, Hm [חָי], has "any direct connection" with this word, he substitutes the root hem, or hem [Memphite], which is softened into iken, or ikeen, in the sister dialect of Thebes; the meaning of which is to be hot (Tattam, Lex. Egypt. Lat. p. 658, 671). Chemi, however, and Kene, are, no doubt, the constantly used terms for the name of the country (see Tattam, p. 150, 156, and Uhlemann, Phot. Gr. et Lat. p. 154), while Lepsius speaks of the contrast in the color of the sand, which was red, but that of its soil, which formed a strong contrast with the adjacent countries." (Comp. Herodotus melagyn, ii, 12, and Plutarch's Ἀλμυρος ἐν τοῖς μελαστοῖς μελαγγοῦσιοι...Χρήσις καλεσθε, De Isid. et Osir. [Heisek], vii, 487.) In the hieroglyphic language the name occurs as KM. The inscription of it, as it frequently occurs on the Rosetta stone, is pronounced by Champollion, Akerblad, and Spohr, Khn (Gesen. Theor. p. 489). The name by which Egypt is commonly called in Hebrew, יָם הַנּוֹגְלָה should probably be translated Egypt in 2 Kings xix, 24; Isa. xix, 6; xxxvii, 25; and Micah vii, 12; Gesen. and Fürst, s. v.), was not used by the Egyptians (Bühler, He- rodot. p. 348), but by Axarites it appears to have been much used of the land of the Nile, as is evident from the cuneiform inscriptions. The Median form of the name was Mitzarqqa; the Babylonian, Mizir; the Assyrian, Mzeri. The Arabic name of the present capital of Egypt is Misir, and the country is called Mesir (Sir H. Rawlinson, Jour. R. A. Soc. vol. xiv. p. i, p. 18; Lepsius, in Herzog, s. v. Egypt). Josephus (Ant. i, 6, 2) renders the Hebrew name of Egypt by Mitzryp, and of the people by Μηθαια, Whether, however, we regard the native name from the father, or the Asiatic from the son, they both vouch for the Hamite character of Egypt, which probably differed from all the other settlements of this race in having Ham himself as the actual ἀργυρύς of the nation, among whom also he perhaps lived and died. This circumstance would afford sufficient reason both why the nation itself should regard the Hamite race as their εἶναι εἰς τὸν Ἰσραήλ, who only succeeded him in the work of settlement, and why, moreover, foreigners with no other interest than simply to distinguish one Hamitic colony from another should have preferred for that purpose the name of the son, which would both designate this particular nation, and at the same time distinguish it from such as were kindred to it.

On the sons of Mizrak we must be brief. Josephus noticed the different fortune which had attended the names of the sons from that of the grandsons of Ham, especially in the family of Mizrak; for while "time had not hurt" the name "him" (Gen. iv, 2), "we know nothing but their names." Jerome (who in these points mostly gives us only the echo of Josephus) says similarly: "Catene sex gentes ignote sunt nobis...quia usque ad oblivionem preteritorum nomenclum pervenero." They both, indeed, except two names from the obscurity which had oppressed the other six, Lubitum and Philius, and give them "a local habitation with their name." What this is we shall notice soon; meanwhile we briefly state such identifications of the others as have occurred to commentators. Josephus, it will be observed, renders all these plural Hebrew names by singular forms, which would seem to indicate "they were speaking their own languages" (comp. ver. 20, which surmounts our table), centered around their patriarch, from whom, of course, they derived their gentile name: thus, Ludim from Lud: Pathrarium from Pathras, etc. (Feldhoff, p. 94). Lenormant notices the fact of so many nations emerging from Egypt, and spreading over Africa (C. Sis. Occidentale, p. 214), for he understands these names to be of peoples, not individuals; so Michaelis, Spicileg. p. 254, who quotes Aben-Ezra for the same opinion. Aben-Ezra, however, does not herein represent the general opinion of the Jewish doctors. The relative בּוּנָה...בּוּנָה misled him; he thought it necessarily implied locally, and not a personal antecedent. Mendensohn declares him wrong in this view, and refers to Gen. xiv. 24, "It is probably," he adds, "that Ludim and the other names were those of men, who gave their names to their descendants. Such was the opinion of Rashi, etc.," who takes the same view as the old Jewish historian.

1. Ludim (Josephus Aosadusos) is not to be confused with Shem's son Los (ver. 22), the progenitor of the Shechinians of the ancient inhabitants of Scripture (Isa. xxvii, 19; Jer. xlvi, 9; Ezek. xxxvii, 10; xxx, 5) as a warlike nation, skilled in the use of spear and bow, and seem to have been employed (much as the Swiss have been) as mercenary troops (Gesen, Jastius, iii, 911). Bochart (who placed Cush in Arabia) reserved Hammath, or realpath, is one of his reasons being based on their use of the bow, as he learns of Herodotus, Strabo, Ptolemy, and Diodorus Siculus. But the people of North Africa were equally dexterous with this implement of war; we have therefore no difficulty in connecting the Libyans with the country through which the river Satara passes, as is said in 2 Kings 19. In 2 Kings 14:18, the province of Taphrain (Tangier); so Bohlen, Delitzsch, and Feldhoff, which last writer finds other names of cognate origin in North Africa, e.g., the tribe called Ludyata, inhabiting one of the oases, and the district of Dusbaram, in Nigmia. Delitzsch suggests the Egyptian Lotepe or Lote, and Clarke the Moor of Egypt, while Knobel suggests the Berber tribe Luddath, and Lenormant (L'ère Océan. p. 244) the Nubians; they think a proximity to Egypt would be most compatible with the fact that the Ludii were Egyptian auxiliaries (Jer. xlvi, 9).

2. Assamit (Josephus 'Assamit) are, with unusual unanimity, placed by the commentators in Egypt. Calmet represents the older opinion, quoting Jonathan's Targ. for the Mevortis. Knobel (who with agree Delitzsch, Keil, and Feldhoff) places them in the Delta, the Septuagint rendering 'Assamit of Socin, is supposed by Knobel, and Lenormant, the Egyptians or for north country. The word occurs nowhere else in the Old Testament. See Assamit.

3. Lébañum (Josephus 'Laënian, 'Laënian) is, with absolute unanimity, including even Jerome and Josephus (who says, 'L. tōu katókoukranovn kai týn týn aífr aífr anáklousa), identified with the shorter word ἱππαῖος, Labin, in 2 Chron. xii. 3; xvi. 9; and called Lābân in Nahum iii. 9, Dan. xi. 45. They are there the Lébañim; Bochart limits the word to the Lébañia- nis, on the western front of Egypt; so Knobel. The Hebrew word has been connected (by Bochart) with πιθανόν, and the plur. of ἵππαῖος, which means 'horse.' Rashi supposing that they are so called "because their faces were inflamed with the sun's heat" (Isa. xiii. 8), from their residence so near the torrid zone. Hitig's idea that the Lébañim may be Nubians is also held by Lenormant (L'ère Océan. p. 244). The opinion of the latter is based upon the general principle entertained by him, that, as Cush peoples Ethiopia, and Phut Libya, and Canaan Phenicia, so to Mizrayim must be appropriated Egypt, or (at least) the vicinity of that country. There is some foundation for this view, although the application of it in the case of Lébañum need not confine his choice to Nubia. Libya, with which the name is associated by most writers since Josephus, is contiguous to Egypt, on its western frontier, and would answer the conditions as well as Nubia. See Lébañum.

4. Niksah (Josephus 'Niksa) according to Bochart and Rosenmuller, should be identified with Nebyssus, in the north of Egypt; Bohlen suggests the Nubota, in Libya: Corn. mit S. Lap. the Numidians; Patrick (after Grotius) represents it, in N. Erod. viii. 14, 16, and Jer. xliv. 46, and the Hebrews the peoples of Jehovah (Ezek. xxxvi. 20). See Naphthuchim.

5. Pathrusha (Josephus 'Pathriot) are undoubtedly the people of Upper Egypt, or the Thebaid, of which the capital, Thebes, is mentioned, under the name of No and Napata, in Numb. xvi. 36, 37, Jer. xlix. 2. Pathrusha is an Egyptian name, signifying the South country (pet-ret), which may possibly include Nubia also; in Isa. xi. 11, and probably Jer. xlv. 15. Pathrus is mentioned as distinct from, though in close connection with, Egypt. By Greek and Roman writers the Thebaid is called Nubia Phutirtides (Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 9; Ptol. iv. 5, 69). So Bochart, Bohlen, Delitzsch, Kalisch, Keil, Knobel. Brugsch's suggestion that our word comes from Pa-Hathor, that is, the Name of Hathor, is an Egyptian deity of the nether world, is an improvable one. See Pathrusha.

6. Casba Bumin (Josephus Hēleos) is, in addition to what is said in 2 Kings 19, probably the name of the district called Casiotis, which Rosenmuller writes Chasriotelo, is compounded of ρες, a "mount," and ὁ λυκός, "to burn," and well indicates a rugged and arid country, out of which a colony may be supposed to have emigrated to a land called so nearly after their own home. (Comp. Mēnebēt, and Chelebok, and Kolhâis, with the metathesis which Gesenius suggests.) This proximity to southwest Palestine of their original abode also exactly corresponds to the relation between these Casbhum and the next mentioned people, expressed in the parenthetical clause, "Out of whom came Philistim" (Gen. x. 14); i.e., the Philistines were a colony of Casbhum, probably not drawn off into the neighboring province in consequence of the poverty of their parental home, the very cause which we may suppose impelled some of the Casbhum themselves to seek a more favorable settlement on the south-east shore of the Black Sea, in Colchis.

Philistim (Josephus Pholostmioi, who, according to Josephus, supposed to the Greeks the name of Palestine. We here advert to the various readings of the Hebrew text suggested by Michaelis (Spicerly, p. 278), who, after Rashi and Masius, would transpose the sentence thus: פִּילִיסְתִּים וּפִילִּסְטִים, that is, "And Casbhum, and Chaphthornim (out of whom came Philistim)." This translation makes the subject, 'origin of the Philistines, according to Amos ix. 7, and perhaps Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4. Rosenmuller, Gesenius, and Bohlen assent to this change, but there is no authority for it either in MSS. Targums, or Versions; and another rendering of the passage, "Out of whom came Philistim and Chaphthornim," is equally without foundation. In the Hebrew text, as well as the Targums and the Sept., Philistim alone appears as a subject, all the other proper names (including the last, Chaphthornim) have the objective sign יִשְׂרָאֵל, יִשְׂרָאֵל, יִשְׂרָאֵל. This is decisive. See Philistines.

7. Chaphthornim (Josephus Χαφθορνίου εἰς Οντκόλος is rendered "Cappadocia," in the Peshito also "Cappadocia." So the other Targums, and (according to some), the ancient versions call this country "Chaptoria," a reminiscence of the origin of the Philistines, to Amos ix. 7, and perhaps Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4. Rosenmuller, Gesenius, and Bohlen assent to this change, but there is no authority for it either in MSS. Targums, or Versions; and another rendering of the passage, "Out of whom came Philistim and Chaphthornim," is equally without foundation. In the Hebrew text, as well as the Targums and the Sept., Philistim alone appears as a subject, all the other proper names (including the last, Chaphthornim) have the objective sign יִשְׂרָאֵל, יִשְׂרָאֵל, יִשְׂרָאֵל. This is decisive. See Philistines.

Hitzel, Kel, and Kelisch. The versions corroborate it also, for in Jer. xvi. 9 [Sept. xxvi. 9], וָלֵי (Phut) is rendered "Libyans" in the A.V., Libyans in the Vulg., and Αἰγύπτιος in the Sept. Similarly the וָלֵי of Ezek. xxx, 5, is "Libya" in the A.V., Libyans in the Vulg., and Αἰγύπτιος in the Sept. (so xxxviii. 5). Like some of their kindred races, the children of Phut are celebrated in the Scriptures "as a warlike, well-armed tribe, sought as allies, and dreaded as enemies" (Kaisch). Phut and his nation seems to have been skilled in archery, according to the statements of the Bible. We may add, in confirmation of the preceding view of the locality of Phut, that the Coptic name of Libya, nearest to Egypt, was Πυθαί. The supposition of Hitzig that Phutus was Φερος, west of Libya, on the north coast of Africa, and of Kelisch that it might have been Βυτος, the capital of the Delta, on the south shore of the Butic lake, are unlikely to find much acceptance by the side of the universal choice of all the chief writers, which we have indicated above. (Thinly, Hist. Nat. v. 1, has mentioned the river, rendered by Josephus, as the Φυτος; χειροκοπης, and Poleney, in like manner, as the Ψαυσοις, iv, 1, 3; comp. Michaelis, Specieig. l. 160.) It must be admitted that Josephus and those who have followed him are vague in their identification. Libya was of vast extent; as, however, it extends to the Egyptian frontiers, it is perhaps best to fulfill all the conditions of the case, keeping in view the military connection which seems to have existed between Phut and Egypt, if we deposit the postricity of Phut in Eastern Libya contiguous to Egypt, not pressing too exactly the statement of Josephus, who probably meant no more, by his reference to the country of the Moors and the river Phut, than the readily allowed fact that in the vast and unexplored regions of Africa might be found traces, in certain local names, of this ancient son of Ham. The only objection to this extent of Libya is that this part of the country has never a reality assigned to it by the Jews (see above). To us, however, it seems sufficient to obviate this difficulty, to hold that while the Lehabim impinged on the border of Upper Egypt, the children of Phut were contiguous to Lower Egypt, and extended westward along the north coast of Africa, and into the very interior of the continent. Phut was no doubt of much greater extent than the Lehabim, who were only a branch of Mizraim; for it will be observed that in the case of Phut, unlike his brothers, he is mentioned alone without children. Their settlements are included in the general name of their father Phut, without the subdivisions into which their other brothers' children were arranged. The designation, therefore, of Phut is generic; of Λεδαι, Λεβαθίμ, etc., specific, and in territory limited.

IV. Canaan (Josephus Ἀσανίαν, so the Sept.) was the youngest of the sons of Ham, and there is less obscurity concerning his descendants. "Canaan, the fourth son of Ham," says Josephus (Ant. i, 6, 2), "inhabited the country now called Judea (την και κωλομοντι λωνας)." In the time of Josephus, it must be recollected, this included the entire country which we loosely call the Holy Land), and called it after his own name, Canaan. This country is most distinctly described by him, and by other in Holy Scripture, and in the record of Ham's family in Gen. x, its boundaries are sketched (see ver. 19), excluding the district east of the Jordan. The name Canaan, however, is sometimes used in a more limited sense than is indicated here and elsewhere. Thus, in Numb. xiii, 29, "the Children of Israel dwelt by well by well and by the coast of the Jordan" (i.e. obviously in the lowlands, both maritime and inland), in opposition to the Hittites and others who occupy the highlands. This limitation probably indicates the settlements of Canaan only—as a separate tribe, apart from those of his sons—afterwards to be enlarged for a similar reason, by the addition of a more extensive name, Cæsar, De Bell. Gall. i, 1, where Gallia has both a specific and a generic sense; comp. also the specific as well as generic meaning of Angle or Engle in the Saxon Chronicle (Gibson, p. 18; Thorpe, i, 21) of "Angle comon ... East Engla, Middel Angla). On the much- vexed questions of the curse of Noah (who was the object of it, and what was the extent) we can here only touch upon the dominant of Josephus. What he discovered, however, of the power, energy, and widely- spread dominion of the sons of Ham, whom we have hitherto mentioned, offers some guidance to the solution of at least the latter question. The remarkable enterprise of the Cushite hero, Nimrod, his establishment of imperial power, as an advance on patriarchal government; the strength of the Egypt of Mizraim, and its long domination over the house of Israel; and the evidence which now and then appears that even Phut (who is the most obscure in his fortunes of all the Hamitic race) maintained a relation to the descendants of Shem which was far from servile or subject—all clearly tend to limit the application of Noah's maledictory prophecy to the precise terms in which it was intimated: "Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he [not Cush, not Mizraim, not Phut; but he] be to his brethren" (Gen. ix, 25). The mention of "Amen-Enar, of Cush, Mizraim, and Phut, his father's sons"—with remarkable innuendo to the context: "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japhet ... and Canaan shall he his servant" (ver. 26, 27). If we, then, confine the imprecation to Canaan, we can without likelihood account for its accomplishment by the subjugation of the tribes which issued from him, to the children of Israel from the time of Joshua to that of David. Here would be verified Canaan's servile relation to Shem; and when imperial Rome finally wrested "the sceptre from Judah," and "dwelling in the tents of Shem" occupied the East and whatever remnants of Canaan were left in it, would not this accomplish that further prediction that Japhet, too, should be lord of Canaan, and that (as it would seem to be tacitly implied) mediately, through his occupancy of "the tents of Shem?"

1. Sidon (Josephus ἅσανοι ὑπ' οὐδάμων καὶ νανιὰς ἐλικτῶν) was the father of the well-known Hittites, who lived in the south of Palestine around Hebron and Beersheba; in the former of which place the sepulchre of Abraham was purchased of them (Gen. xxiii. 3). Essau married "two daughters of Heth," who gave great sorrow to their husband's mother (Gen. xxvi. 16).

3. The Jebusite (Josephus ἰδουβανωτικος) had his chief residence in and around Jerusalem, which bore the name of the patriarch of the tribe, the son of Canaan, Jebus. The Jebusites lost their stronghold only in the time of David.

4. The Amorite (Josephus Αμωριομεναος) seems to have been the largest and most powerful of the tribes of Canaan. (The name "Amorites" frequently denotes the inhabitants of the entire country.) This tribe occupied portions of territory on both sides of the Jordan, but its strongest hold was in "the hill country" of Judah, as it was a long time before the Jebusites were subdued.

5. The Girgasite (Josephus Ἡπαγασια) cannot be for certain identified. (Origen conjectured that the Girgasites might be the Gergasenes of Matt. viii, 18.)

6. The Hivite (Josephus Ἠβινοι) lived partly in the neighborhood of Shechem, and partly at the foot of Hermon and Lebanon.

7. The Arkite (Josephus adds for once a locality—'Ἀρκατικοι δι' ἑξενον) ἀρμον τιν ρι τη' Διαίσια, Ant. i, 6, 2) lived in the Phoenician city of Areis, north of Tripolis. Under the emperors of Rome it bore the name of Caesarea. It was the scene of a notable jubilee celebrated in the time of the Crusades. Its ruins are still extant at Tel Arka (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 162).

8. The Sinite (Josephus Σωτιαῖος) probably dwelt near his brother, the Arkite, on the mountain fortress of Σωτιαῖος, mentioned by Strabo (xy, 756) and by Jerome. The Areadiac (Josephus Ἀραδιαῖος) is mentioned by Josephus as occupying the island that is later called Crete is celebrated in Phoenician history. (Strabo describes it in xvi, 756.) The men of Aread became celebrated by Ezek., xxvii, 11. See AYVAZ.

10. The Sannite (Josephus Σαννιαῖος) inhabited the town of Sannia (Σαννια, mentioned by Strabo), near the river Eleutherus, at the western extremity of the mountains of Lebanon; extensive ruins of this city are found at the present day bearing the name of Sumurub.

11. The Hamathite (Josephus Ἀμαθιαῖος). The entering in of Hamath indicates the extreme northern frontier of the Holy Land, as 'the great city of Egypt' does its southernmost limit (1 Kings viii, 65 sq.).

In the verse following the enumeration of these names, the sacred writer says, 'Afterwards were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad.' This seems to indicate subsequent conquests made by them previous to their own subjugation by the Israelites. 'To show the great goodness of God towards Israel,' says the Jewish commentator Mendelssohn, 'Moses records in Gen. x the original narrow limits of the land possessed by the Canaanites, which they were permitted to extend by conquest from their neighboring nations. In the case of the Amorite Sihon, Num. xxiii, 26) up to the very time when Israel was ready to take possession of the whole. To prepare his readers for the great increase of the Canaanitish dominions, the sacred historian, in this early chapter, where he mentions their original boundaries, takes care to state that subsequently to their primitive occupation of the land, the families of the Canaanites spread abroad, until their boundaries became such as are described in Numbers xxxiv.' The Hamathites alone of those identified were settled in early times wholly beyond the land of Canaan. Perhaps the ground for the large extension of the Hebrew tribes after their establishment in the land called after their ancestor. One of their most important extensions was to the north-east, where was a great branch of the Hittite nation in the valley of the Orontes, constantly mentioned in the wars of the Pharaohs, and in those of the kings of Assyria. These passages which have occasioned much controversy may here be noticed. In the account of Abraham's entrance into Palestine it is said, 'And the Canaanite [was] then in the land' (Gen. xii, 6); and as to a somewhat later time, that of the separation into the two parts, Philistia and the Perizzites dwelt then in the land (xiii, 7). These passages have been supposed either to be late glosses, or to indicate that the Pentateuch was written at a late period. A comparison of all the passages referring to the primitive history of Palestine and Judæa shows that there was an earlier population expelled by the Hamitic and Abrahamite settlers. This population was important in the time of the war of Chedorlomer; but at the Exodus, more than four hundred years afterwards, there was but a remnant of it. It is most natural, therefore, to infer that the two passages under consideration mean that the Canaanitish settlers were already in the land, not that they were still there.

C. General Characteristics. Such were Ham and his family, notwithstanding the stigma which adhered to that section of them which came into the nearest relation with the Israelites; they were the most energetic of the descendants of Noah in the early ages of the postdiluvian world—at least we have a fuller description of their enterprise than of their brethren's as displayed in the primitive ages. The development of empire among the Euphrates Cushites was a step much in advance of the rest of mankind in political organization; nor was the grandson of Ham less conspicuous as a conqueror. The only coherent interpretation of the important passage which is contained in Gen. x, 10-12, is that which is adopted in the margin of the A.V. After Nimrod had laid the foundation of his empire ('the beginning of his kingdom,' Gen. x, 10, 'as the first ripe in the fig-tree מָנָב הַכַּפֶּרֶת at her first time,' that is, when the tree first begins to bear—Gesenius), in his native Shinar, not satisfied with the splendid acquisitions which he took at first, no doubt, from his own country, he invaded the kingdom of the Hamitic countries, where the children of Shem were for the first time disturbed in their patriarchal simplicity: 'Out of that land [even Shinar, Nimrod] went forth to Ashur [or Assyria], and built Nineveh, and the city Reho-both, and Calah, and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah; the same is the beginning of the Assyrians,' i.e., the combination of the four mentioned, with their interjacent spaces, the 'great city.' The objection to this rendering is based by Rosendtiller (Schol. ad loc.), after other commentators, on the absence of the מִכְלָא local spapended to the מַעֲשֶׂה [which they say ought to be מִכְלָא נַעֲשֶׂה to produce the meaning to Assyria]. The מִכְלָא [local] is, however, far from indispensable for the sense we require, which has been advocated by authorities of great value and weight (e.g., the re-constructed Akkadian of inquiries [which he himself holds our view] mentions Urukku, Targ. Jonathan, Bochart, Clericus, De Wette, Tuch, Baumgarten, Dietrich, as supporting it. He might have added Josephus, who makes Nimrod the builder of Babylon (Ant. i, 4), and Kalisch, and Keil. To make the passage Gen. x, 10-12 descriptive of the Semitic Ashur, is to do violence to the passage itself and its context. Ascher, moreover, is mentioned in his proper place in vers. 22, without, however, the least indication of an intention of describing him as the founder of a rival empire to that of Nimrod. Gesenius admits the probability of our view, without any objection of grammar or of sense. (See, for instances of the accus. noun (without the suffix of local מִכְלָא) after verbs of motion, Num. xxxiii, 4; Gen. xxxiii, 18; 2 Chron. xx, 86. Compare Gesenius, Gram. p. 130, 172, and Nordheimer's Gram. sec. 841.) This is the opinion of Knobel, answering to the theory which has connected the ruins of Khorsabad, Koyunjik, Ninevah, and Keremli to the remains of a vast quadrilateral city, popularly called Nineveh. (For a different view of the whole subject the reader is referred to Mr. Rawlinson's recent volume on The Five Great Monarchies, i, 811-315.) But the genius which moulded imperial power at first, did not avail to retain it long; the scepter, before many ages, returned to the race of Shem (for the Semitic character of the Arabian tribes who crushed the primitive Cushite power of Babylon, see Rawlinson, Great Empires, i, 222, 228. The Arabian Hamites of Yemen seem also to have merged, probably by conquest, into a Joktanite population of Semitic descent [see for these Gen. x, 29-29, and Assemani, Bibl. Orient. III, ii, 558, 544]), except in Africa, where Mizräim's descendants had a longer tenure of the Egyptian monarchy. It is well to bear in mind (and the more so, inasmuch as a different theory has here greatly obscured plain history) that in the primeval Egyptian empire of Babylon considerable progress was made in the arts of civilized society (an early allusion to which is made in Josh. vii, 21; and a later in Dan. i, 4: see Rawlinson, First Monarchy, chap. v). In the genealogical record of the race of Ham (Gen. x) reference is made to the "languages" which they spoke (ver. 20). Comparative philology, which is so rich in illustrations of the unity of the Indo-Germanic languages, has done next to nothing to elucidate the linguistic relations of the families of Ham. Philologists are not agreed as to a Hamitic class of languages. Recently Bunsen has given the term Semitic to the "Hamitic," or, as he writes it, Chalmitism, to the Egyptian language, or, rather, family. He places it at the head of the "Semitic stock," to which he considers it as but relationship of tongues of different classes. Among these, divergences must needs be wider; but when occasional affinities crop out they will be proportionately valuable as evidences of a more ancient and profound agreement. It seems to us that the facts, which have thus far transpired, indicate that the term Semitic has been applied for the ancient language of the southern coast of Arabia. This terminology depends in every instance upon the race of the nation speaking the language, and not upon any theory of a Hamitic class. There is evidence which, at the first view, would incline us to consider that the term Semitic, as applied to the Syro-Arabic races, should be changed to Hamitic; but, on a more careful examination, it becomes evident that any absolute classification of languages into groups corresponding to the three great Noachian families is not tenable. The Biblical evidence seems, at first sight, in favor of Hebrew being classed as a Hamitic rather than a Semitic form of speech. It is called in the Bible the "language of Canaan," נֵפֵל נַעֲמָת (Isa. xix. 18), although those speaking it are elsewhere said to speak הָרָעָם, Haraas (2 Kings xviii, 26, 28; Isa. xxxvi, 11, 13; Neh. xiii, 24).

But the one term, as Gesenius remarks (Gramm. Introd.), indicates the country where the language was spoken; the other as evidently indicates a people by whom it was spoken: thus the question of its being a Hamitic or a Semitic language is not touched. The circumstance that it was the language of Canaan is agreeable with its being either indigenous (and therefore either Canaanite or Rehebite), or adopted (and therefore perhaps Semitic). The names of Canaanish persons and places, as Gesenius has observed (6. c), conclusively show that the Canaanites spoke what we call Hebrew. Elsewhere we might find evidence of the use of a so-called Semitic language by nations either partly or wholly of Hamitic origin. This evidence would favor the theory that Hebrew was Hamitic; but, on the other hand, we are unable to discover a Semitic language from Semitic peoples. The Egyptian language would also offer great difficulties, unless it were held to be partly of Hamitic origin, since it is mainly of an entirely different class from the Semitic. It is mainly Nigritic, but it also contains Semitic elements. It is the opinion of the latest philologists that the ground-work is Nigritic, and that the Semitic part is a layer added to a complete Nigritic language. The two elements are mixed, but not fused. Some Iranian scholars hold that the two elements are mixed, and that the ancient Egyptian represents the transition from Turanian, and the same term has been used for the ancient language of the southern coast of Arabia. The only solution of the difficulty seems to be that we call Semitic is early Noachian.

Theories more or less specious have been formed to account for these affinities to the Hebrew from so many points of the Hamitic nations. Not to rise above the degree of precarious hypothesis, nor could it be expected that they should in the imperfection of our present knowledge. It is, indeed, satisfactory to observe that the tendency of linguistic inquiries is to establish the fact avouched in the Pentateuch of the original Hamitic speech. The obvious advantage of comparative philology hitherto has been to prove the affinity of the members of that large class of languages which extend from the Eastern Scandic to the Western Welsh; parallel with this is the comparison among themselves of the various members of the Semitic and Sabeo-Canaanitic languages, which has demonstrated their essential identity; but greater still will be the work of establishing, on certain principles, the natural relationship of tongues of different classes. subsequent history of the Hebrew nation in its relations to the rest of mankind. The intelligent reader of Scripture will experience much help in his study of that history, and indeed of prophecy also, by a constant recurrence to the particulars of this authoritative ethnological record.

We conclude with an extract from Mr. Rawlinson’s Five Great Monarchies, which describes, in a favorable though hardly exaggerated light, some of the obligations under which the primitive race of Ham has laid the world: “Not possessed of many natural advantages, the Chaldean people yet exhibited a fertility of invention, a genius, and an energy which place them high in the scale of nations, and more especially in the list of those descended from the Hamitic stock. For the last 2000 years the world has been mainly indebted for its advancement to the Semitic and Indo-European races; he was otherwise in the first ages. Egypt and Babylon, Mmaram and Nimrod—both descendants of Ham—led the way and acted as pioneers of mankind in the various unexplored fields of art, literature, and science. Alphabetic writing, astronomy, history, chronology, architecture, plastic art, sculpture, navigation, agriculture, textile industry, and so on, are all of Ham’s origin in one or other of these two countries. The beginnings may often have been humble enough. We may laugh at the rude picture-writing, the unseemly brick pyramids, the coarse fabric, the homely and ill-shaped instruments, as they present themselves to our notice in the remains of these ancient peoples; they are really worthier of our admiration than of our ridicule. The first inventors of any art are among the greatest benefactors of their race... and mankind at the present day lies under infinite obligations to the genius and industry of these early ages” (p. 73, 74).

2. “THEY OF HAM” [or Cham] (בָּשָׂם, Sept.* Ec 5:22*; Vulg. de stirpe Cham) are mentioned in I Chron. iv, 40—in one of those historical fragments for which the early chapters of these Chronicles are so valuable, as illustrating the private enterprise and valor of certain sections of the Hebrew nation. On the present occasion a considerable portion of the tribe of Simon, consisting of thirteen princes and their clansmen, in the reign of Hezekiah, sought to extend their territories (which from the beginning seem to have been too narrow for their numbers) by migrating “to the entrance of Gebor, even unto the east side of the valley, to seek pasture for their flocks.” First to be mentioned are the Gedorim, who, it would seem, a secure and defenceless population of Hamites (the meaning of I Chron. iv, 40 receives illustration from Judg. xviii, 7, 28), the Simeonites attacked them with a vigor that reminds us of the times of Joshua, and took permanent possession of the district, which was well adapted for pastoral purposes. The Gedor (g.v.) of Josh. xv, 58, there is strong ground, however, for supposing that it may be the Geerah (g.v.). of Judg. xxv, 40, and read הָגָּר for הָגָר, it would be the well-known Gebor. This last would, of course, if the name could be relied on, fit extremely well; in its vicinity the patriarchs of old had sojourned and fed their flocks and herds (see Gen. xx, 1, 14, 15; xxvi, 1, 6, 14, and especially ver. 17-20). Bertheau (die E. der Chronik) on this passage, and Ewald (Gesch. des Völker Israel [ed. 2], i, 322) accept the reading of the Sept., and place the Simeonite conquest in the valley of Gebor, and not of Gebur (Ezech. xxxv, 13) as is usual. Here is a note, contributed by the Rev. J. Rowlands, on the Southern Border of Palestine, and containing an account of his supposed discovery of the ancient Gebar (called Nebot al-Gebar, the ruins of Gebar); see also Van de Velde, Memor, (p. 314). In the determination of the ancient Gebor, with which this Gebor is supposed to be identical, it matters but little which of these two localities we accept as the residence of those children of Ham whom the Simeonites dispossessed. Both are within the precincts of the land of the Philistines: the latter, perhaps, may be regarded as on the border of the district which we assigned in the preceding article to the Cushite; in either case “they of Ham,” of whom we are writing, in I Chron. iv, 40, must be regarded as descended from Ham through Gebor and not through Gebaim.

3. HAM (Heb. *עִבְרִי, with k€, prob. meaning a multitude; Eust. [Lex. s. v.] compares the Laut. Turbo and Copia as names of places; the Sept. and Vulg. translate vita vastaria [כְּמָנָה], in Gen. xiv, 5, if a proper name at all, was probably the principal town of a people whose name occurs but once in the O.T., “the Zuzim” (as rendered in the A.V.). If these were “the Zamzumims” of Deut. ii, 20 (as has been conjectured by Rashi, Calmet, Patrick, etc., among the older writers, and Gesenius, Rosenmüller, Ewald [Volks Israel, i, 308], Delitzsch, Knobel, and Keil among the moderns), we have some clue to the site; for it appears from the entire passage in Deut. that the Zamzummim were the original occupants of the country of the Ammonites. Such and others have accordingly supposed that our Ham, where the Zuzim were defeated by Chedorlaomer on his second invasion, was the primitive name of Raboboth Asmon, afterwards Philadelphia (Jerome and Eusebius, Onomast. s. v. Amman), the capital of the Ammonite territory. It is still held by some as the ruins of Rameth, according to Robinson (Researches, iii, 168). There is some doubt, however, whether the word in Gen. xiv, 5 be anything more than a pronoun. The Masoretic reading of the clause, indeed, is הַבָּשָׂם הַמּוֹסְרִים, the last word of which is pointed, הַמּוֹסְרִים (A.V. “In Ham”), as if there were three battles, and one of them had been fought at a place so called; and it perhaps makes for this reading according to Kennicott (I Chron. iv, 20*;* read הַבָּשָׂם with Heth), which can produce no other meaning than in Ham, or Cham with the aspirate. Yet the other (that is, the pronounal) reading must have been recognised in ancient Hebrew MSS, even as early as the time of the Sept. translators, who render the phrase “together with them;” as if there were but two conflicts, in the former of which the great Eastern invader “smote the Rephaim in Ashteroth-Karnaim, and the Zuzim [which the Sept. makes an appellative— צִיִּים־יַעַיְיָה, strong nations] along with them,” as their allies. Jerome’s Quast. Hebr. Opera (ed. Bened., Ven. 1767, III, ii, 267) proves that the Hebrew MSS, extant in his day varied in their readings of this passage. This reading he seems to have preferred, הַמּוֹסְרִים, for in his own version [Vulgate] he renders the word like the Sept. Onkelos, however, regarded the reading evidently as a proper name, for he has translated it by בַּשָּם, “in Hentu,” and so has the Pseudo-Jonathan’s Targum; while the Jerusalem has בַּשָּם, “with them.” Saadia, again, has the proper name, in “Hama.” Hillerus, whom Rosenmuller quotes, identifies this Hlam with the famous Ammonite capital Ribkah (2 Sam. xi, 1; 1 Chron. viii, 42), the two names being synonymous—Ribkah meaning populous, as in Lament. i, 1, where Jerusalem is בַּשָּם, the city [that was] full of people, while the more ancient name of the same city, הֶבַּשָּם, has the same signification as the collective word בַּשָּם, that is, a multitude.” See Git. 1.

HAMAKER, Heinrich Arex, a Dutch Orientalist, was born at Amsterdam Feb. 25, 1789; became professor of Oriental languages in the Academy of Franeker in 1815, assistant professor in 1817, and in 1822 professor or ordinarius of the same in the University of Leyden, where he died Jan. 10, 1835. He was the most noted ex- trordination, and was regarded as one of the first Oriental scholars of Holland. His works are not free from marks of negligence, due probably to hasty composition and homon, magnificant, or the Sansar, hemen, the planet Mercury: Sept. "Aqav), a favorite and chief minister or chief of Persia, whose history is involved in that of Esther and Mordecai (Esther iii, 1 sq.), B. C. 473.

See Haraseus. He is called an Agagite; and as Agag was a kind of title of the kings of the Amalekites (see Agag, it is supposed that Haman was descended from the royal family of that nation (see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. in the Bible, p. 99). Haman's parents probably took their way to Persia as captives or hostages; and that the foreign origin of Haman was no bar to his advancement at court is a circumstance quite in union with the most ancient and still subsisting usages of the East. Joseph, Daniel, and Mordecai afford other examples of the same kind.
After the failure of his attempt to cut off all the Jews in the Persian empire, he was hanged on the gallows which he had erected for Mordecai. Most probably he is the same Aman who is mentioned as the oppressor of Achichiarius (Tobit xiv, 10). The Targum and Josephus (Ant. xi, 6, 5) interpret the description of him the Agagite—as signifying that he was of Amalekite descent; but he is called a Macedonian by the Sept, in Esth. ix. 24 (comp. iii, 1), and a Persian by Sulpicius Severus. Prideaux (Connex, anno 438) computes the sum which he offered to pay into the royal treasury at the king of Persia, for 2,000,000 drachmas; and says he was in the habit of designating any Christian enemy by his name (Eisenmenger, Ent. Jud. i, 721).
The circumstantial details of the height which he attained, and of his sudden downfall, afford, like all the rest of the book of Esther, a most faithful picture of the customs of an Oriental court and government, and furnish invaluable materials for a comparison between the regal usages of ancient and modern times. (See Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr., &c.). See Esther, Book of.

Hamann, Johann Georg, an eminent German writer; he was born at Konigsberg, in Prussia, on the 27th of July, 1685. His early education was mis cellaneous, and to it he attributed the want of taste and elegance of his style. At last, when about sixteen years old, his father decided on sending him to the school. He there acquired a knowledge of Latin and of other liberal sciences. For a while in 1725, he promoted his course of study at Konigsberg with a philological dissertation entitled De somno et somnis, and turned his attention to teaching. After teaching for about eighteen months in Courland he returned to Riga, where he be came a friend of John Christopher, son of a rich merchant named Berens, at whose house he met all the cele brities of the day, and for whom, some years after wards, he made a journey through Hamburg, Bremen, and Amsterdam, and then returned to Konigsberg with great celebrity. Before he set out on this journey, however, he lost his mother, which event deeply affected him. While in London he consulted a distinguished physician, hop ing to have the obstruction in his speech removed; dis appointed in that hope, he spent some months in dissi pation, and then, feeling himself much disheartened, he retired to an obscure part of London, procured a Bible, and applied himself diligently to its study. His eyes were opened, and he beheld his past life in its true col ors, of which he gives evidence in his Gedanken iiber meines Lebensabend (Thoughts on My Life). He then returned to Riga, where he resided with his friend Be rens until family circumstances led to an estrangement between them, and in 1759 he returned to his parents' house.
There he wrote his Sokratiscbe Denkverbiigkei ten, which were severely criticised at their first appear ance by the literati of the day, but which gained him the esteem and respect of such men as Clau dius, Herder, and Moser, to whom we must afterwards add Lavater, Jacobi, and Goethe. His writings did not suffice for his support, and he had to take other employ ment, first as copyist, afterwards as clerk in a public office.
On the outbreak of the Seven Years War he was derived from his position, and Hamann married in 1763; but, unfortunately, this marriage cost him many of his friends, and shortly afterwards he lost his situation. In 1754 he took a journey to Swit serland in the hope of meeting his friend Moser, who was to obtain him employment; but, not meeting with him, he not only filled a small clerical position, but in 1756 he married the daughter of his employer, and was appoin ted to a good position in the custom-house. From that time date his finest epistolary and miscellaneous writ ings, among which we find his admirable Golgotha and Schlachtninsins.—"Seat thee at my right." His prospects now brightened; one of his admirers, Francis Buchholz, offered him a handsome fortune, with $1,000 towards the education of each of his four children, on the condition of his adopting him. The well-known princess Galit zining having in 1784 become acquainted with his writ ings, was brought over by them to a positive Christian belief. In 1767 he came to Munster with his adopted son Ernst. The princess became acquainted with the princess of Solms, from thence he went to Pempfert to the philosop her Jacobi, with whom he remained a short time. He intended to return there once more, but was prevented by his death, which occurred on the 20th of June, 1788. He was, by order of the princess Galitzin, interred in her garden, from whence, in 1851, his remains were trans ferred to the cathedral at Munster.

Among the great men of his country, Hamann is wor thy of a place alongside of Copernicus, Kant, Herder, and kindred intellects. Although he cannot be called a classical writer, yet he has claimed for himself his place among the patriots of the modern school, the uniting link between the old and the new German literatures. "Hamann is one of those men of whom it is difficult to give an estimate correct and satisfactory in all respects. Our estimation of his character and work is new and uncertain; for a great part of the age, as may be done with many other men, because he stood rugged and alone, like a rocky island in the midst of the waves of the surrounding ocean.
We cannot wholly praise or blame that age, we shall not admire Hamann." (Hagenbach, German Rationalism, tr. by Gage, p. 267.)

laboriously woven web of pithy expressions, of hints, and flowers of rhetoric. "His understanding," says F.
H. Jacob, "was penetrating like lightning, and his soul was of more than natural greatness." Most of his writings are collected in Roth's edition of his works (Berlin, 1821-48, 8 vols.). See A. W. Müller's work entitled (1)
"Kodex der Christen in der Hebräischen, Chaldäischen, Hamath (Heb. Chamath, γαμαθος, fortress; Sept.

Japheth, Iaphet, and Hamath, a large and important city, capital of one of the smaller kingdoms of Syria, of the same name, on the Orontes, at the northern boundary of the Holy Land. Thus it is said (Numb. xii, 21) that the spies "went up and searched the land, from the wilderness of Zin unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath." Geography is probably right in deriving the word from the Arabic root Chmaus, "to defend." With this agrees the modern name of the city, Hamah. The city was at the foot of Hermon (Josh. xiii, 5; Judg. iii, 3), towards Da-amascus (Zech. ix, 2; Jer. xlix, 20; Ezek. xviii, 16).
The kingdom of Hamath, or, at least, the southern or eastern part, appear to have been associated with what was afterwards denominated Cade-Syria (q. v.). It is more fully called Hamath the Great in Amos vii, 2, Haramath-Zobah in 2 Chron. viii, 3. The country or district around is called "the land of Hamath" (2 Kings xxii, 33; xxv, 21).

Hamath is one of the oldest cities in the world. We read in Gen. xvi, 18 that the youngest or last son of Caavan was the "Hamathite" (q. v.)—apparently so called because he and his family founded and colonized Hamath.
It was a place of note, and the capital of a principality, when the Israelites conquered Palestine; and its name is mentioned in almost every passage in which the northern border of Canaan is defined (Numb. xii, v. 22; xxiv, 8; 1 Kings viii, 65; 2 Kings xiv, 25, etc.).

Toi was king of Hamath at the time when David conquered the Syrians of Zobah, and it appears that he last reason to rejoice in the humiliation of a dangerous neighbor, as he sent his own son to congratulate the victor (2 Kings xi, 9, 10) and to put Hamath under his protection. Hamath was conquered by Solomon (2 Chron. viii, 8), and its whole territory appears to have remained subject to the Israelites during his prosperous reign (ver. 4-6). The "store-cities" which Solomon "built in Hamath" (2 Chron. vii, 4) were perhaps for staples of trade: the importance of the Orontes valley as a line of traffic always being great.
On the death of Solomon and the separation of the two kingdoms, Hamath seems to have regained its independence. In the Assyrian inscriptions of the time of Ahab (R.C. 900) it appears as a separate power, in alliance with the Syrians of Damascus, the Hitites, and the Phoenicians. About three quarters of a century later Jeroboam the second "recovered Hamath" (2 Kings xiv, 20); he seems to have dismantled the place, whence the prophet Amos, who wrote in his reign (Amos i, 1), called it "a city of the Great" with the same instance of desolation (ib. vi, 2). At this period the kingdom of Hamath included the valley of the Orontes, from the source of that river to near Antioch (2 Kings xxii, 33; xxv, 21). It bordered Damascus on the south, Zobah on the east and north, and Phoenicia on the west (1 Chron. iv, 21; Ezek. xiv, 17; xviii, 1; Zech. x, 2).

In the time of Hezekiah, the town, along with its terri-ory, was conquered by the Assyrians (2 Kings xvii, 24; xviii, 34, 13; Isa. x, 9; xi, 11), and afterwards by the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxix, 2). It is mentioned on the conform inscriptions (q. v.). In the time of Antiochus the land and influential kingdom, for Amos speaks emphatically of "Hamath the Great" (vi, 2); and when Babshakoh, the Assyrian general, endeavored to terrify king Hezekiah into unconditional surrender, he said,

"Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed, as Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph? Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arpad, and the king of the city of Apamia, and Ivah?" (2 Kings x, 12-14; 2 Kings xii, 8 sq.). See ASHISH. The frequent use of the phrase, "the entering in of Hamath," also shows that this kingdom was the most important in Northern Syria (Judg. iii, 8). Hamath remained under the Assyrian rule till the time of the Medes who overthrew the Great, who were in the hands of the Greeks. The Greeks introduced their noble language as well as their government into Syria, and they even gave Greek names to some of the old cities; among these was Hamath, which was called Epiphania (Ἐπιφανεία), in honor of Antiochus Epiphanes (Cyril, Comment. ad Amos).

This change of name gave rise to considerable doubts and difficulties among geographers regarding the identy of Hamath. Jerome affirms that there were two cities of that name—Great Hamath, identical with Antioch, and another Hamath called Epiphania (Comment. ad Amos, vi). The Targums in Numb. xxii, 22 render Hamath Aphanah, and Pael. 1391, Epiphania calls it "a city of Damascus," and affirms that it is not the same as Epiphania; but Jerome states, after a care-f ul investigation, "reperi Erasmuth urbes Syriae appelliari, quae nunc Graeco sermo Epiphaniam dictur" (homest. ad Amos. iii, 8). There are inscriptions that Great Hamath was Enessos, and the other Hamath Epiphania (Comment. ad Jerem. iv). Josephus is more accurate when he tells us that Hamath "was still called in his day by the inhabitants Αρμανη, although the Macedonians called it Epiphania" (Ant. i, 6, 2). There is reason to believe that the ancient name Hamath was always retained and used by the Aramaic-speaking pop-i lation; and, therefore, when Greek power declined, and the Greek language was forgotten, the ancient name in its Arabic form Hamah became universal (ςαμα in in Ezek. xviii, 16, first occurrence). There is no ground whatsoever for Ireland's theory (Palest. p. 121) that the Hamath spoken of in connection with the northern border of Palestine was not Epiphania, but some other city much further south. The identification of Riblah and Zedad places the true site of Hamath beyond the possibility of doubt (Porter, Damascus, ii, 355, 554).

Epiphania remained a flourishing city during the Roman rule in Syria (Ptolomy, v, 15; Piny, Hist. Nat. v, 19). It was a city of some name, and still continued as a bishop of the Eastern Church (Caroli a. sen. Poulou, Geog. Sac. p. 288). It was taken by the Mohammedans soon after Damascus. On the death of the great Saladin, Hamath was ruled for a long period by his decendants, the Eyyubites. Abullesta, the celebrated Arab historian and geographer of the 14th century, was a member of this family and ruler of Hamath (Bohadin, Vita Saladini; Schulten's Index Geographicus, s. v. Hamata).
He correctly states (Tab. Syriac, p. 108) that this city is mentioned in the books of the Israelites. He adds: "It is reckoned one of the most pleasant towns of Syria.
The Orontes flows round the greater part of the city on the east and north. It boasts a lofty and well-built cit-
ad. Within the town are many dams and water-machines, by means of which the water is led off by canals to irrigate the gardens and supply private houses. It is remarkable of this city and of Schulten that they abound more in water-machines than any other cities in Syria."

This description still, in a great degree, applies. Hamath is a picturesque town, of considerable circumference, and with wide and convenient streets. In Burckhardt's time the attached district contained 126 inhabit-te d villages, or 80 that had between 500 and 3000 inhabitants, of whom about 2500 are Greek Christians, a few Syrians, some Jews, and the rest Moslem. It is beautifully situated in the narrow and rich valley of the Orontes, thirty-two miles north of Emesa, and thirty-six south of the ruins of Assamea (Antonini Itinerarium, edit. Wesseling, p. 188). Four bridges span the rapid river, and a number of huge wheels turned by the current, like those at Verona, raise the water into rude aqueducts, which convey it to the houses and mosques. There are no remains of antiquity now visible. The mound on which the castle stood is in the centre of the city, but every trace of the castle itself has disappeared. The houses are built of sun-dried bricks and timber. Though plain and poor externally, some of them have splendid interiors. They are built on the rising banks of the Orontes, and on both sides of it, the bottom level being planted with fruit-trees, which flourish in the utmost luxuriance. The west end part of the district forms the granary of Northern Syria, though the harvest never yields more than a tenfold return, chiefly on account of the immense numbers of mice, which sometimes completely destroy the crops. The inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in silks and woolen and cotton stuffs with the Belaunin. A number of noble but decayed Moslem families reside in Hamath, attracted thither by its beauty, salubrity, and cheapness (Pococke, Travels, ii, pt. i, p. 143 sq.; Burkhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 146 sq.; Handbook for Syria and Palestine, ii, 620; Richter, Waldvahrten, p. 231; comp. Rosenmüller’s Bib. Geogr. ii, 243-46; Biblioth. Sacra, 1848, p. 990 sq.; Robinson's Bos. new ed. iii, 501, 568),

The entrance of Hamath, or entering into Hamath (תַּמַּת; Sept. στις τροχούσαν τον Αἰγαί, Vulg. introitum Emath), is a phrase often used in the O. T. as a geographical name. It is of considerable importance to identify it, as it is one of the chief landmarks on the northern border of the land of Israel. There can be no doubt that the sacred writers apply the phrase to some well-known "pass" or "opening" into the kingdom of Hamath (Numb. xxxiv, 8; Josh. xiii, 5). The kingdom of Hamath embraced the great plain lying along both banks of the Orontes, from the fountain near Riblah on the south to Apamea on the north, and from Lebanon on the west to the desert on the east. To this plain there are two remarkable "entrances," one from the south, through the valley of Cœle-Syria, between the parallel ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon; the other from the west, between the northern end of Lebanon and the Nusaitrye Mountains. The former is the natural "entrance" from Central Palestine, the latter is the sea-coast. The former is on the extreme south of the kingdom of Hamath, the latter on its western border.

Until within the last few years sacred geographers have almost universally maintained that the southern opening was the "entrance of Hamath." But not a few supposed that the entrance described in Numb. xxxiv, 8, 10, did not extend further north than the parallel of Sidon. Consequently, he holds that the southern extremity of the valley of Cœle-Syria, at the base of Hermon, is the "entrance of Hamath (Palestina, p. 118 sq.)." Kittel set forth this view in greater detail (Die Kudur Mafatil, and he would identify the "entrance of Hamath" with the expression used in Numb. xiii, 21, "as men come to Hamath." Of late, however, some writers regard the latter as only intended to define the position of Beth-rehob, which was situated on the road leading from Central Palestine to Hamath—a "men come to Hamath," that is, in the great valley of Cœle-Syria. Van de Velde appears to locate the "entrance of Hamath" at the northern end of the valley of Cœle-Syria (Travels, ii, 470; and Stanley adopts the same view (Sinai and Palestine, p. 399). Dr. Keith would place the "entrance of Hamath" at that submarine gate through which the Orontes flows from Antioch to the sea (Land of Israel, p. 112 sq.). A careful survey of the whole region, and a study of the passages of Scripture on the spot, however, leads Porter to conclude that the "entrance of Hamath" must be the opening towards the west, between Lebanon and the Nusair, or "entrance of the sea from the (southern) border, till a man come over against Hamath;" and ver. 16, where the "way of Hethlon as men go to Zedad" is mentioned, and is manifestly identical with the "entrance of Hamath," and can be no other than the opening here alluded to. The "entrance of Hamath" must have been to the north of the entire ridges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon (Josh. xiii, 5; Judg. iii, 3); but the opening from Cœle-Syria into the plain of Hamath is not so. 4. The territory of Hamath was included in the "Promised Land," as described both by Moses and Ezekiel (Numb. xxxiv, 8-11; Ezek. xlvi, 15-20; xlviii, 1). The "entrance of

Hamath" is one of the marks of its northern border; but the opening from Cela-Syria is on the extreme south of the territory of Hamath, and could not, therefore, be identified with the entrance of Hamath. 5. The "entrance to Hamath" was on the eastern border of Palestine, but north of Riblah (Numb. xxxvi. 10, 11), and is still extant between Humsa and the seat of Abelhamet. See RIBLAH. 6. This position agrees with those of the other names associated on the north-ly and easterly boundaries, e.g. Mount Hor, Hazar-Edan, etc. (see Porter’s Danuca, ii. 344 sq.; also Robinson, Biblical Res. iii. 566). These arguments, however, will be found, on a closer inspection, to be incapable of defense (see Keil and Delitzsch, Comment. on Pentat., ii. 256 sq.). The only real force in any of them is that derived from the supposed identity of Zedoth (q. v.) and Siphron (q.v.); and this is counterbalanced by the facts (i) that this district never was actually occupied by the Israelites, and (ii) the more defensible description of the boundary of Asher and Naphtali in Josh. xix. 24–39 does not extend so far to the north.
Hence we incline to the older views on this question.

Ha-mathite (Hebrew Chamathiti, with the article Hamath, Sept. 6 Apa). A designation (Gen. x. 18; 1 Chron. i. 16) of the last named of the families delivered from Egypt. Nothing is recorded of them; doubtless as having been selected (foundation-ed) the city Hamath (q. v.). The Hamathites were thus a Hamitic race, but there is no reason to suppose with Kenrick (Phoenicia, p. 60) that they were ever in any sense Phoenicians. We must regard them as closely akin to the Hitites (q. v.), on whom they bordered, and with whom they were generally in alliance. See Canaanite-Zobah (Heb. Chamath Thobah, וֹמַת te.

, i. e. Hamath of Zobah; Sept. Ajash Zobāh v. r.
Bawוז̂, Vulg. Emath Suba), a place on the borders of Palestine, said to have been attacked and conquered by Solomon (2 Chron. viii. 9). It has been conjectured to be the same as Hamath (q. v.), here regarded as included in Aram-Zobah, a geographical expression which has usually a narrower meaning. The conjunction of the two names here probably indicates nothing more than that the whole country round Hamath was brought by Solomon under the power of Judah. The possessions of David extended to Hamath, and included Zobah (1 Chron. x. 6). Under Solomon, probably added Hamath also to his empire; certain it is that he had possessions in that district, and that part of it, at least, was included in his dominion (1 Kings xix, 19). See ZOBAH.

Hambrooke, Antony, a Protestant missionary, surnamed the "Dutch Heghns," was born in the early part of the 17th century. He went as missionary to the East Indies, and settled in the island of Formosa, then the most important establishment of the Dutch in the China Sea. He converted a large number of natives, and the mission was prospering, when the celebrated Chinese pirate Coxinga, driven away by the Tartars, landed in Formosa, and set siege to Tai-Ouan with an army of 25,000 men, April 30, 1661. Hambrooke, his wife, and two of his children, were made prisoners, and the former was sent by Coxinga as envoy to the commander of the town, Frederick Covent, to advise him to surrender. Instead of this, he advised him to defend the city to the last, and then returned to the camp of Coxinga, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Covent, and the prayers of his two daughters, still in Tai-Ouan, saying that "he would not permit heathen to say that the fear of death had induced a Christian to forbear:", Coxinga, enraged at his courage, caused him to be beheaded on his return (1661), together with the other Dutch prisoners, some 500 in number. Covent was nevertheless obliged to capitulate in Jan. 1662. See Hamelmann, Hermann, a German Protestant theologian and historian, was born at Osnabruck in 1525.

He was brought up in the Roman Catholic Church, and became curate of Camern. Having subsequently embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, he left his situation, and went to Wittgenberg, where he lived some time in intimacy with Melancthon. He afterwards preached the Protestant doctrines at Bielefeld and Lemgo, and in the counties of Waldecker, Lippe, Spiegelberg, and Prüm, and in Holland. He acquired great renown as a scholar and orator, and was appointed (1555) by William of Orange, as chargé d’affaires, to Antwerp, to participate in the preparation of a new ecclesiastic discipline. In 1569 duke Julius of Brunswick appointed him first superintendent of Gandersheim, and his aid was requested by the counts John and Otho of Oldenburg, to introduce the Reformation in their states. He spent the last years of his life in this occupaton, acting as general superintendent of the Protestant churches of Oldenburg, Elmenhorst, and Jever.
He died at Oldenburg June 26, 1595. His theological and historical works are valuable for the history of the Reformation. Amongst them are: De Traditionibus varia fultique (Frankfort, 1546), and the Buchkan-archis

Hamilton, James, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born in Strathblane, Scotland, in 1814.
He commenced his ministry at Abersyne, Scotland, and after a short time was called to Edinburgh. In 1841 he was called to be pastor of the National Scotch Church, Regent’s Square, London, and was soon known as one of the most eloquent and powerful ministers of the metropolis. He died in London November 24, 1867. Dr.
Hamilton’s labors as a minister were very successful, and he was equally eminent in the field of authorship, especially in the field of experimental and practical religion. Of his Life in Earnest, scores of editions have appeared in England (sixty-fifth thousand, Lond. 1862) and America; and his Mount of Olives (sixty-fifth thousand.
London, 1863) has been almost as widely circulated.
He was not only one of the most popular religious writers of the day, and master of one of the most fascinating styles in which Christian truth and feeling were ever clothed, but he was also no ordinary theologian in the proper scientific sense of that term, though he never wrote any theosophical work in scientific form. A complete edition of his works in six volumes is now (1869) publishing in London, as follows: vol. i, Life in Earnest; Mount of Olives; A Morning beside the Lake of Galilee; Happy Hour; vol. ii, Light for the Path; Emblems from Eden; The Parable of the Prodigal Son;
The Church of the Nazarens; The House; vol. iii, Of Hinduism and Judaism; vol. iv, The Royal Preacher; Lessons from the Great Biography; vol. v, Notes on Job and Proverbs; Reviews, Essays, and Poetical Pieces;

Hamilton, Patrick, the first Scotch reformer, was nephew to John and Andrew Hamilton. He was born at Paisley, 1563, and was educated at St. Andrew’s, where he went to Germany, where he imbibed the opinions of Luther, and became professor at Marburg. On his return home he was made abbot of Ferne, in the shire of Ross, where he promulgated the doctrines of the Reformers, and used such real as to excite the wrath of the clergy, who caused him to be apprehended and sent to Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's. After a long examination he was burnt at the stake, opposite St. Salvador's College, Mar. 1, 1527, in his 24th year. At the place of execution he gave his servant his garments, saying, "These are the last things you can receive of me, nor have I anything now to leave you but the example of my death, which I pray you to follow," and though in the flames, and fearful before men, yet it is the entrance into eternal life, which none shall inherit who deny Jesus Christ before this wicked generation." The fire burning slowly, his sufferings were long and dreadful, but his patience and piety were one and his sorrow fully displayed thereby, in somuch that many were led to inquire into his principles, and to abjure the errors of popery. "The smoke of Mr. Patrick Hamilton," said a papist, "infected as many as it blew upon." His writings called Patrick's "Places may be found in Richmond's Fathers of the Eng- lish Church, i, 475. Hamilton, Richard Winter, D.D., an English Independent minister, was born in London July 6, 1794, and died in 1848. His mother had been a member of one of the most important of the Quakers, and was mentioned (as Miss Hesketh) in Wesley's Journal. At sixteen he entered the theological college at Hoxton, and even while he was a student his talent for preaching and the remarkable exuberance of his style attracted great attention. Soon after leaving the college (1812 or 1813) he was called to the charge of an Independent congregation at Leeds, and he held this position during the remainder of his life. He attained great eminence as a preacher, and still greater as a platform speaker. With great excellences he combined grave defects: he was deficient in taste, and his style was often extravagant and pompous; but there was a wide sweep in his thoughts, and he was sometimes eloquent even to sublimity. During his life he was a diligent student. He was president of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Leeds, and contributed for it many valuable papers, some of which were published in his Nove Literaria (1841, sm. 8vo). His other writings are, The Little Sacra- tuary (domestic prayers and offices; Lond. 1838, 8vo): Sermon, first series (1837, 8vo; republished by Carlton and Lanahan, N. York, 1869); second series, 1846, 8vo: -3. Institutions of popular Education (2d ed. 1846, post 8vo; republished with several Additions and Par- titions (Lond. 1847, 8vo; N. Y., Carlton and Lanahan, 1869, 12mo): -Hora et Viducia Subbata (1848, 12mo): Missions, Their Authority, Scope, and Encouragement, a prize essay, second after Harris's Mission (2d ed. 1846, post 8vo; republished with additional Decrees and Social Decisions (2d ed. 1848; also Carlton and Lanahan, N. York, 1869, 12mo): besides occasional sermons, etc. There is a poor biography of him by Stowell (1850, 8vo). (J. B. L.)

Hamiltor, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal min- ister, was born in Monongahela Co., Va., Dec. 17, 1791, and removed to Ohio in 1806; was converted in 1812; entered as a probationer at the Conference in 1813, and died May 4, 1833. He was a pioneer of Western Methodism, and a widely known and excellent minister. As a preacher, presiding elder, and delegate to General Conference, he was in all respects "a workman that needed not to be ashamed." He was "shrewd, sarcastic, and eloquent," and his labors were abundantly successful among all classes of society.—Min. of Conferences, v, 298; Wake- ley, Heroes of Methodism, p. 337. (G. L. T.)

Hamilton, Sir William, a recent Scotch thinker, who will probably be regarded as the most subtle logician and the most acute metaphysician produced in Britain since Duns Scottus and William of Ockham. (He must not be confounded with his less distin- guished contemporary, Sir William Rowan Hamilton, the Irish mathematician.) He is included, and included himself, among the adherents of the Scotch school of psychology, but he is not of them, having remodelled, interpreted, expanded, and transmuted their doctrines in such a manner as to elevate their character and entirely change their nature. His potent influence is manifested in nearly all the current speculation of the Brit- ish School. After the death of his anti-sceptic, the late Anne of Holy, he died at Edinburgh on May 6, 1856. He thus lived through the whole of the revolution which convulsed the governments, societies, industries, and opinions of modern Europe, and prepared the new earth which is yet to be revealed. He was the son of Dr. William Hamilton, professor of anatomy at Glasgow; of a long-descended line. He claimed a hereditary bar- onety, and deduced his lineage from the ducal and almost royal house of Hamilton and Chastelherault. The illustration of his birth was obscured by the splendor of his intellectual career. He received his early education at the University of Glasgow, from which he was expelled; he passed Balliol College, Oxford, and distinguished himself by his attainments in both classics and mathe- matics. Here he gained his acquaintance with the writings of Aristotle, which have never been disregard- ed in this ancient seat of learning. In the competition for great prizes he professed his enthusiasm, and they were examined on most of the recognised Greek and Latin classics, including many of the works of Plato and Aristotle, and of the writings of the Neo-Platonists and the peripatetic scholars. He had, moreover, already ob- tained some knowledge of Arrows and Avicenna; of the Latin fathers and the great schoolmen; of Cardan, Agricola, Laurentius Valla, and the Scaligers; and had formed a less questionable intimacy with Des Cartes, Leibnitz, and other luminaries of the Cartesian school.

The elucidation of Hamilton commenced early, and was extended throughout his life. It was vast, curious, and recondite. It produces amazement by the continual array of forgotten names and unexplored authors—omne ignotum pro mirabilibus. But it is needlessly ostentatious and frequently deceptive. It is received without challenge, from the inaccessibility of the authorities alleged, and is rarely attempted to be verified, not to mention works. Here has shown that the imputations against Luther rest on invalid quotations taken at second-hand. It is alleged that, in his attack on mathematical studies, he has employed wangled extracts without regarding the context. His references to Aristotle, and his rep- resentations of the doctrines of the Stoic, are illusive, being fragmentary, distorted, or misapprehended, from ignorance of the tenor of his writings. There is too much reason for believing that Hamilton's familiarity with "many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore" was derived from the diligent consultation of indexes, and the hasty appreciation of passages thus indicated.

The young philosopher had been designed for the legal profession. He removed to Edinburgh in 1812 to prosecute his judicial studies, and was called to the Scotch bar in 1815. In 1819, on the death of his friend John Thomas Brown, he was a candidate for the chair of moral philo- sophy in the University of Edinburgh. John Wilson, the poet, and editor of Blackwood's Magazine, was a Tory, and, as such, was preferred by the Tory town council, which constituted the electoral body. In the course of the present year, the defeated candidate, rich in brains and various accomplishments, but poor in purse, was appointed by the Faculty of Advocates to the chair of history. His lectures on this great branch of knowl- edge, which is philosophy in its concrete and dynamical aspects, are reported to have been ingenious, original, learned, and acute. This period of Sir William's life exemplified his indefatigable industry, patient research, versatility of talent, and zealous solicitude for truth. George Combe had attracted much attention in Edinburgh to Phrenology—a suspicious province of speculation lying along the indistinct boundary between intellectual and physical science. The profession of Hamilton's father, and his own youthful associations, may have cherished in him some aptitudes for anatomical and physical science; he had been associated in his youth with the Edinburgh Surgeons' Society with the earnest pertinacity that had been displayed by Des Cartes when tracing the mechanism of vision and endeavoring to discover in the pineal gland the domicile of the mind. With saw and scalpel, and tape and balance, he dissected, measured, and weighed their contents. The reports of his operations were communicated to the Royal Society of Edinburgh in 1826 and 1827, and dissipated the pretensions of Phrenology by demonstrating the falsity of the facts alleged as its foundation. These researches also rectified some physiological misapprehensions, and enabled Sir William to make those delicate observations on the composition and action of the nerves which are introduced into his notes on Reid.

In 1829, his friend, professor Napier, requested from him a philosophical article to inaugurate his literary magazine. On advertising the appearance of his paper, he refused to submit his first, and still remains the most satisfactory exposition of Hamilton's metaphysical views. It purported to be a notice of Victor Cousin's eclecticism, but it presented in broken outlines the "Philosophy of the Conditioned." No metaphysics were practiced. The essay was an experience of religious convictions. It recited the ancient stories of the 13th and 14th centuries. It united the speculative subtlety of Berkeley with the dialectical skill of the schoolmen. It attracted universal admiration at home and abroad, and was promptly translated into foreign languages. It placed its author at once among the great minds of the age and restored the British Isles to their place among the combatants in the shadowy arena of abstract disputations. This remarkable production was followed by others scarcely less remarkable, and similarly distinguished by comprehensive erudition, logical perspicacity, analytical precision, breadth of reasoning, and profundity of thought. Thus his claims were immeasurably superior to those of any other aspirant when the professorship of logic and metaphysics in the university became vacant in 1836. He was not elected, however, to this position, and the hesitancy was removed chiefly by the earnest testimonials of Victor Cousin, and professor Brandis, of Bonn.

In his new domain Sir William commenced the rehabilitation of logical studies, and the restoration of the prince of philosophers to the throne from which he had been removed by more than two centuries of ignorant and uninquiring clamor. So far, indeed, as originality pertains to his own logical and metaphysical speculations, it is obtained by recurrence to the instructions or to the hints of "the master of the wise." He held his chair for twenty years, till his death. To the discharge of his academic duties the length of thought and research on metaphysics. They afford a very imperfect exhibition of either his abilities or his philosophy. They were the first-fruits of his service, hurriedly prepared to satisfy immediate requirements, and precariously modified at intervals by the necessity of augmenting the text by a sort of systematic revision, and were published posthumously from such sketches and loose notes as had been preserved. Throughout the period of their recurrent delivery, their development was restrained and distorted by the traditions, associations, and expectations of the world. He could not resist the allegiance to Reid, or proclaim an independent authority, or render liege-homage to Aristotle. Hence there is throughout his career a continual effort to reconcile by ingenuous tours-de-force his own more profound and comprehensive views with the narrow, shallow, and timid utterances of the Reidian brotherhood. There is nothing in the history of philosophy more grotesque, more inconclusive, and better calculated to mislead, than thearray of the hundred and six witnesses to the universality of the philosophy of common sense. What these depositionsn unanimously attest is not the truth of Reid's characteristic dogmas, but the necessity of admitting indemonstrable principles—a thesis which may be, and has been, argued in many dissimilar ways. This is the true account of his life. Sir William would have been wise to desert this fallacy so well expressed by an Improvviso elenchi been detected in any victim of his critical rash.

Though the lectures of Sir William Hamilton give an imperfect idea of his services and teaching, he efficiently promoted the cause of philosophy by the spirit and breadth of his instructions, by his wonderful display of learning, by the penetration and precision of his distinctions, by attracting earnest attention to the highest walks of speculation, and by training up a generation of enthusiastic inquirers in a branch of knowledge which had been misconceived and degraded by disregard of its loftiest developments. He was untiring in encouraging and guiding the studies of his pupils; he was exacting in his demands upon their powers; but he was remarkably successful in securing their confidence and the esteem of his pupils; and he deepened his influence by the affability of his demeanor and by his imposing bearing. "Sir William," says one of his reviewers, "enjoyed physical advantages almost as uncommon as his intellectual attainments. ... His frame was large and commanding; his head was cast in a majestic face; his voice possessed great compass and mellifluous sweetness." With such a fortunate combination of natural endowments and cultivated acquirements, he was well adapted to become the "magnus Apollo" of a new sect of adorers. System, however, was foreign to his nature: the pursuit of knowledge was more of a pastime than a profession. He never evinced any desire to be the founder of a school: he may have been conscious that such a desire would have been futile, since he built on the substructions of Aristotle, or repainted with his own colors and devices the ruinous walls of the peripatetic temple.

The years of Sir William's scholastic duty were illustrated by other and more important productions than his lectures—productions which reveal more decisively the depth of his genius, and supply the best means for ascertaining the complexity and constitution of his philosophy. It seems extraordinary that he should produce a book either as a title to office or in vindication of his appointment. In accordance with this custom, if not in compliance with it, Sir William signalized his induction into his chair by an edition of Reid's works, accompanied with observations and illustrative discussions. The manner in which this task was executed is characteristic of his habits. The notes were written as the text passed through the press; the supplementary dissertations were added some years afterwards: they were never completed; the last that he published "breaks off in the middle," like the celebrated canto of Hudibras; and the "conceited indices unjoined," which had been announced in the title-page, remains an announcement—to eternity. Sir William has nowhere given any systematic view of his doctrine, either in detail or in summary. He has left behind him elaborate essays on a few cardinal topics; many fragmentary notices of others; and numerous suggestive, but unopened hints. His relics are like the fossil remains of the mighty monsters of remote geological periods: here a thiba, there a maxilla; here a huge vertebra, there a ponderous scapula; here a tusk, there a claw; but nowhere is found the complete form, or even the entire skeleton. Still, from the fragments preserved, the philosophy of Hamilton may be reconstructed. The incompleteness of his labors may be ascribed in part to the polemical character of his procedure; in part to the absence of distinct originality; in part to the vast and unmanageable extent of his information, to the variety... of his meditations, and to the fastidiousness of his judgment, which sought unattainable fulness and perfection in all the details; but much must be attributed to a more mournful cause—to the paralyzism which crushed his strength and deprived him of the use of his right hand. After ten years of his life compelling him to avoid himself of the assistance of his wife and family for his correspondence and literary labors.

During his later years Sir William was chiefly occupied with the extension and application of his logical innovations. These were expounded to his class as early as 1836, and his work was published in 1846. They provoked a bitter controversy with professor De Morgan.

It is unnecessary to enter into the examination of a dispute in which the parties are satisfied neither with themselves nor with each other, and in which the language is so tortured, rugged, and peculiar as to be almost equally unintelligible to both.

Some critics have commented the style of Sir William, Hamilton as "inequaled for conciseness, precision, and force"—as a "model of philosophical clearness, conciseness, and energy" (non cincumque datum est habere numen). Mr. De Morgan characterized the Hamiltonian style as "inveterate" whatever that term means; and of one expression he says that it is "hard to make sense or English of it." The censure may be applied to both the combatants in this unseemly controversy. Sir William's dialect may be clear, precise, significant, when he has been mentally occupied with his own thoughts. It is not specific of his own compounding, requiring special study just as much as any archaic patois. Berkeley and Hume, Stewart and Spencer, have shown that it is possible to write philosophically, and yet maintain a pure, transparent, natural English idiom. This Sir William rarely does.

Writing. The published works of Hamilton enunciate the lectures on logic and on metaphysics; an edition of Reid, never completed; an edition of the works of David Stewart; and a volume of Discourses on Philosophy and Literature, Education and University Reform (1822; 2d ed., enlarged, 1839; reprinted by Harper and Brothers, N. Y.). There is little evidence of any taste for literature, properly so called, in the volume.

The only essay connected even remotely with polite letters is that on the authorship of the Epistle Obscurorum Virorum, which is, in some respects, his most curious contribution to periodical literature. A writer who separates this from the instructive and entertaining maps, On the Revolutions of Medicine, and on Mathematics not Philosophy. Both of these readily consort with the laborious and learned investigation of the history, condition, objects, and possible ameliorations of university education. The first chapter of the "Discourse" is devoted beginning on the subject of logic and metaphysics. The former science is illustrated by the essay on Logic contributed to the Edinburgh Review in April, 1833; and that on Syllogism, its kinds, causes, notations, etc., contained in the appendix.

The peculiar views of the author are further expounded in the Prospectus of an Essay on the New Analytic of Logical Forms, and in the First Essay of Thomas Spencer Bayes on the same subject, to which should be added the appendix to the lectures on logic.

The principal metaphysical papers in the Discussions are those on The Philosophy of the Conditioned, on The Philosophy of Perceptions, and On Identity of Thoughts in the appendix On the Conditions of the Thinkable. In the editorial labors on Reid, besides many important notes elucidating, rectifying, developing, or altering the statements in the text, which merit careful consideration, should be studied: Note A, On the Philosophy of Common Sense; Note B, On Presentative and Representative Knowledge; and Note D, Distinction of the Primary and Secondary Qualities of Body, which has an intimate relation to the theory of immediate and presentative perceptions.

Philosophy. Logic, metaphysics, and ethics are comprised under the general designation of philosophy. The last of these divisions is untouched by Sir William Hamilton. In the other two he has pushed his inquiries far beyond any of his British contemporaries, and with much more brilliant success. In both he evinced signal acuteness; in both he rendered good service: and in both he deemed himself an inventor and reformer, and not merely an innovator.

The character of his metaphysical doctrine is manifestly determined by the designation which he bestowed upon it—The Philosophy of the Conditioned. It is critical in its procedure; it is mainly negative in its results. In these respects it resembles the philosophy of Kant, to which it is very much indebted. It is certainly a crusade against all theories reposing on the absolute and the unconditioned. It sets out with affirming the essential relativity of all knowledge; it concludes with the restriction of philosophy to the determination of the conditions of thought. In this there is nothing new but the mode of exposition. It was a familiar aphorism of the schoolmen, founded upon the teachings of Aristotle, that all thought was bounded by the limits of the thinking mind—"omnia perceptum est secundum modum percepientis."—"omnia scivit in sciente secundum modum scientis." From this Hamilton was not only a departure, but an innovation: his conceptions pretending to be absolute, and hence denies the possibility of any positive conception of the infinite. Herein he merely repeats Aristotle, but with less moderation in his doctrine. This thesis has been violently assailed by Carlyle, a man not unrepresented by Sir William's own compounding, requiring special study just as much as any archaic patois. Berkeley and Hume, Stewart and Spencer, have shown that it is possible to write philosophically, and yet maintain a pure, transparent, natural English idiom. This Sir William rarely does. The tenet, however, is not presented as an axiom, but receives interpretation, if not demonstration. It is the inevitable consequence of the dualism of our knowledge—a thesis contained in Aristotle. Every act of consciousness "gives a knowledge of the ego in relation and contrast to the non-ego, and a knowledge of if all acts of consciousness in relation and contrast to the ego. The ego and the non-ego are thus given, in an original synthesis, as connected in the unity of knowledge, and in an original antithesis, as opposed in the contrariety of existence." This synthesis as considered is the beginning of an antagonistic scheme of philosophy. With Hamilton it is made to rest upon the basis of immediate perception, and thus he led to the affirmation of direct or presentative perception in opposition to the other theory of indirect or representative perception. This brings him into accordance with the school of Reid—though Reid and his school would scarcely have understood, and certainly could not have appreciated his delicate distinctions; and it must be acknowledged that it is a coarse and materialistic conception of species, images, and impressions which requires any deadly opposition. The present conception involves a negative perception. To one cultivating such divisions and differences, the treatise of Roger Bacon, De Multiplicatione Specierum—the most marvellous result of mediæval science—would be utterly unintelligible.

One of the principal principles of the whole system is the determinative limits and requirements of thought, or, as he phrases it, "the Conditions of the Thinkable." On this subject he has left an admirable and most suggestive paper; but his whole scheme of speculation is without any basis for certainty, without any "support of the Spirit bearing witness to our spirit." It is thus built upon the void; and, like the eclecticim of Cousin, and the transcendentalism of He-
HAMILTON

| Hamilton, Lewis Kent, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Burlington, Conn., May 10, 1797. His early education was obtained with some view to the Christian ministry; but, arriving at manhood, he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Lancaster, Ohio. He married in Zanesville, Ohio, and settled there to practice his profession. The death of a little child in 1822 led him to consider his own moral state, and he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in the autumn of 1828. Soon after he was licensed to exhort, then (1829) to preach. In 1832 he was received on trial in the Ohio Conference, and appointed to Granville Circuit. In 1838 he traveled Athens Circuit, and in 1854 and 1855 he pastored Wesley Chapel, Cincinnati. In 1856 he was elected assistant editor of the Western Christian Advocate, with the Rev. Dr. Charles Elliott. When the Ladies Repository was established in January, 1841, Hamilton was assigned to the work of editing that journal. He remained in this position until, in 1844, he was elected one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This office he filled with great usefulness for eight years, when ill health compelled him to resign it to the General Conference of 1852. His name was reattached to the list of members of the Ohio Conference as a supernumerary, in a supernumerary relation. In 1857 he removed to Mount Pleasant, Iowa, his former confidential friendship with Dr. Elliott, who resided in that place, leading to this change. In an account of his life which bishop Hamilton wrote for his family, he refers to the years from 1802 to 1806; in eight years he had been enabled to make these intelligible very briefly to persons acquainted with the outlines of the sciences in its received forms. 1. Hamilton insists on having, in all propositions through common terms which are set forth for logical scrutiny, a sign of quantity prefixed to predicate as well as to subject. 2. Instead of recognizing only four forms of propositions, the A, E, I, O of the old logicians, he insists on admitting all the eight forms which are possible. (See Thomson and Solly.) 3. He widens the range of the religion by advising all who are capable of making it, to form associations with others who are ambitious of forming a church. 4. The Port-Royal doctrine of the inverse ratio of the extension and comprehension of terms is worked out by him in reference to the syllogism. This application of the doctrine has certainly not been anticipated by any logician; and, when elaborated to its results, it throws many new lights on the characters and mutual relations of the syllogistic figures. The value of these innovations has not been definitely settled, nor has it been ascertained whether they were overlooked by Aristotle, misapprehended by him, or deliberately rejected from his Analytics.

Authors. — An earnest discussion of Hamilton's doctrines may be found in the Methodist Quarterly Review for 1857; a sketch of his metaphysical views is given in the Princeton Review for 1853. One of the most unfortunate figures in the literary history of Sir William was his attack on the reputation of Luther, which was fully answered by Hare in his Vindication of Luther. Hare convicts Hamilton of using second-hand knowledge as if he had studied the original sources. See N. Br. Rev. HAMMALEKOTHI. See SCLA-HAMMALEKOTH.

Hamman, or rather CHAMMAN (ךֵּמָן), only in the plur. "hammanim), signifies "images," idols of some kind for idolatrous worship (and so the Sept. and Vulg. understand it). It is rendered "images" in Lev. xxvi, 30; 2 Chron. xiv, 5; xxxiv, 7; Isa. xvii, 8; xxvii, 9; Ezek. vi, 4, 5; but in the margin almost invariably "sun images." In these passages "hammanim" is several times joined with Asherim—statues of Astarite; while from 2 Chron. xxxiv, 4, it appears further that the "hammanim" stood upon the altars of Baal. See ASHERAH; BAAL.

Kimchi, and the Arabic of Erpenius, long ago explained the word by near. "images of the sun"; and both this interpretation and the thing itself are now clearly illustrated by ten Panic cippi with inscriptions, conseccted to Baal Hamman, i.e. to Baal the solar, Baal the sun. (See the whole subject discussed in Gesenius's Thees. Heb. p. 493-491.) The form chammam, solar, is from חָמָן, chamm'ah, the sun; and the plural Hammah-im, in the Old Testament, is put elliptically for Baalim Hammanim, and is found in the same context as elsewhere where Baalim, images of Baal.

Ham'math (Heb. Chammath, חַמָּת, ḫammath), springs warm; Sept. "אֲשָׁרָא (יִבְדִּיל, Vulg. Emth), one of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, mentioned between Zer and Rak-kath (Jos. xix, 35); generally thought to be the hot springs near Abu Joseph in the desert (Heb. iv, 1), under the name Ananom (Ἀνανός), near Tibersias (Ant. xviii, 3, 3); which latter is, no doubt, the same with the famous warm baths still found on the shore a little south of Tibersias, and called Hamman Taborigheh ("Bath of Tiberrias"); properly Hamnah-rakkah (the Tamin of Genath), or Tamar. This "Hamnah-rakkah" has been thus described by Robinson (Resecheches, iii, 258 sq.; see also Hackett's Script. Illust. p. 815). Pliny, speaking of the Sea of Galilee, says, "Ab occidente Tiberiade, aquas calidias salubri." (Hist. Nat. v, 15.) Spacious baths were built over the principal spring by Iriaham Pasha; but like everything else in Palestine, they are falling to ruins. Ancient ruins are strewn around it, and can be traced along the shore for a considerable distance; these were recognised by Ibr and Mangles (p. 80, b) as the remains of Vespassian's camp (Josephus, War, i, 4, 3). There are also warm springs at this place. The water has a temperature of 144 Fahren. This hot bath taste is extremely salt and bitter, and a strong smell of sulphur is emitted. The whole surrounding district has a volcanic aspect. The warm fountains, the rocks of trap and lava, and the frequent earthquakes, prove that the elements of destruction are still at work beneath the surface.
It is said that at the time of the great earthquake of 1837 the quantity of water issuing from the springs was greatly increased, and the temperature much higher than ordinarily (Porter, Handbook for S. and P. ii, 423; Thompson, Land and Book, ii, 68; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii, 237). Mr. Lambert, Palaest., p. 302, says, "This spot is also mentioned in the Talmud (Schwartz, Palæst., p. 182), as being situated one mile from Tiberias (Lightfoot, Opp. ii, 224). The Hammothi- dor of Jos. xxi, 32 is probably the same place. See HEMATH; HAMMAN.

The name of Gadara, however, located by the Talmudists (see Lightfoot, iib.), at the mouth of the Jordan, is a different place (see also Zanz, Appendix to Benj. of Tuseila, ii, 408; doubtless the Amathah (q. v.) of Josephus (Ant. x, 5, 2), and the modern Amath on the Yarmuk (Van de Velde, Mop).

Ham'medath (Heb. Hammedatha', חַמֶּדָתָה, ḫamedathah), Sept. "Aqathoth, Vulg. Amandaathas, but both sometimes omit the first two letters of the infamous Hamath (q. v.), and com-omically designated as "the Agarites" (Ant. xii, i, 188, viii, 5; ix, 24), though also without that title (ix, 10). By Gesenius (Lex. 1855, p. 530) the name is taken to be

Medatha, preceded by the definite article: but First (Lex. a. v.), with more probability, identifies it with the Zendic āhumaēdatē, e. i., "given by Horn," one of the Izedas. For other explanations, see Simonis (Onomastoi-con, p. 586), who derives it from a Persian word meaning "double." For the termination, compare ARITA-DAS, Lex. Z., p. 474.

Ham'melech (Heb. ham-Melek, חַמֶּלֶךְ, ĥamelekh, which is merely ĥa-me-lek, king, with the article prefixed to the name; Sept. "βασιλιακ, Vulg. Aneolek), the father of Jerahmeel, which latter was one of those commanded by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. xxxvi, 26). B.C. ante 605. It is doubtful whether this was the same with the Hammelech, father of Malchiah, into whose dungeon Jeremiah was afterwards cast (Jer. xxxvii, 6). B.C. ante 595. Others, however, regard the word in both cases as an appellative, referring in the first passage to Jehoiakim, and in the latter to Zedekiah. Compare HAMMOLKEKETH.

Ham-menuchoth. See MASHAHTHE.

Hammer, an indispensable tool designated by several Heb. terms: 1. Pa'tith (_parallel, connected etymologically with maritios, to strike), which was used by the gold-beater (Isa. xii, 7, Sept. φθόρα) to overlay with silver the "gold of the surface" of the image, as well as by the quarryman (Jer. xxiii, 29, Sept. πελατός), metapherically of Babylon as a destructive agent (Jer. i, 23, Sept. φθόρα). This seems to have been the heaviest instrument of the kind for hard blows. 2. Makkabah (מַכַּבָּה), properly a tool for following, hence a stonecutter's mallet (1 Kings vii, 7), and generally any workman's hammer (Judg. iv, 21 [where the form is מַכַּבָּה, makkab'ah]; Isa. xiv, 12; Jer. x, 4). In Isaiah the Sept. takes ῶπορτος, a girdle, in all the rest φθόρα; Vulg. martellum. This Hackett describes (Script. Illust. p. 815), used only in Judg. v, 26; Sept. φθόρα, Vulg. marte lulm. This was also rendered "embittered" (q-
l. 4, 17), and then with the addition of the word "workmen's" by way of explanation, as this is a poet-cal word, used instead of the preceding more prosaic term. The pins of the tent of the Bedouin are generally driven, and are driven into the ground by a mallet, which is probably the "hammer" referred to in this passage (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 187). Dr. Hackett observes (Amer. ed. of Smith's Dict. a. v.) that "it is spoken of as 'the hammer,' being the one kept for that purpose;" but the Hebrew term used in Judg. v, 26 (to which he refers) is without the art. which, is employed, however, with that found in Judg. iv, 21. See NAM.

A kind of hammer, named nuppa'ts (נָפְפַגַ'ס, Jer. ii, 20 (A. V. "battle-axe"), or mehphits (מֵּפַיתס, Prov. xxv, 19). A. V. "maul," was used as a weapon of war. 5. Only in the plur. מַגְפִּים, kegbophets, Sept. λακεύριαν, Vulg. nucet, a poetic term equivalent to the preceding (Psa. lxixv, 6). See HANDICRAFT.

Hämmerlin or Hammerlein, Felix (Lat. Mul-colius), a Swiss theologian, was born at Zurich in 1389. He studied canon law at Erfurt, in 1421 appointed canons of Zolingen, and in 1422 provost of Solothurn. With the income of these offices he bought a large li-Brary, and applied himself earnestly to study. He subsequently took part in the Council of Basle, where he showed great zeal for the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline, and thus made himself a number of enemies. An attempt was made to assassinate him in 1489, but he escaped, though not without being dangerously wounded. He died in his fifty-seventh year, and his name has been perpetuated by his De Nuzelis, in which he abused the confessional cantons which had waged war on Zurich in 1443, made him an object of hatred to a large party of his countrymen. A number of these, having gone to Zurich on the occasion of the Carnival of 1457, sought to arrest Hämmerlin, dragged him to Constance, and had him thrown into prison. As he returned to retrieve anything he had said or written, he was condemned. et to imprisonment for life in a convent. He was accordingly placed in a convent of barefooted monks at Laurenz, where he died some time after 1457, a victim to his zeal for justice and truth. He wrote Variar Observationes Opuscula et Tractatus (Basle, 1497, fol.), containing a number of treatises on exorcism, on monistic dogma, against the Bechaghis, on the punishments of the hereafter in three writings against the prevailing corruptions of the clergy and the convents. He also left some MSS., which are preserved in the collegiate library of Zurich.

Hammer-Purgstall, Joseph von, a German Orientalist of great celebrity, was born July 9, 1774, at Graz, in Styria, and died in Vienna Nov. 24, 1856.
His family name was Hammer, and he is frequently referred to under that name, or as von Hammer; but having inherited in 1837 the estates of the counts of Purgstall, he added that name to his own, and was made a baron.
He entered at an early age the Oriental Academy at Vienna, and acquired a knowledge of Arabic, Persian, and Turkish. Having subsequently employed in various diplomatic missions, he greatly extended his acquaintance with Oriental languages and literature.
It wrote and spoke ten foreign languages, viz. the three above named, Greek, Latin, Italian, Spanish, French, Swiss, and Russian; but his works show rather varied and extensive research and learning than profound mastery of his subjects. They are free from many errors, though his careful reference to authorities makes corrections of mistakes comparatively easy. His writings, including contributions to journals and scientific announcements, would make more than 100 octavo volumes, and on the whole, he regarded himself as the author of valuable contributions of the present century to Oriental history and literature. They are noticed here because of the information they give as to the religious history and condition of Oriental nations. The most important of his works in this respect are Encyklopädische Über-Sichten der Wissenschaften des Orients (Lpz. 1864, 2 vol. in 1, 8vo), a work based on seven Oriental works, especially the bibliographical dictionary of Hadji Khalifa:—

ens explodivii (Vienna, 1809-18, 6 vol. in 3, fol., of which Hammer-Purgstall was the chief editor):—Morgen-the author herein seeks to prove from emblems on monuments once belonging to the Templars that their order was guilty of the crimes charged to it. Bayrowart (Jourнал для наук, 1819) refuted this opinion, but Hammer-Purgstall defended it with new arguments in a paper in the the de l'Assemblée (Paris, 1833, 8vo, and an English ed. by Wood, History of the Assassins, Lond. 1835, 8vo).

The author makes various comparisons between the Assummfi, the Templars and the Freemen generally extant Geschichtec des Osmanischen Reich (best ed. Pesth, 192, 35, 10 vols. 8vo; French translations by Dancher, tables, Histoire de l'Empire Ottoman, Paris, 1835-38, 4 vols. 8vo);—Brief chronicles of the Jesuits in Turkey with the Bagdad caliphate, and contains about 10,000 biographical and bibliographical notices)—Die Arab-bische Hohe Lied der Liebe, etc., with commentary, and an introduction relative to mysticism among the Arabs

Hammond, Henry, D.D., a learned divine of the English Church, was born Aug. 18, 1805, at Chertsey, Surrey. He was sent at an early age to Eton, whence he removed to Magdalen College, Oxford, and became a fellow of that society in 1825. In 1833 the earl of Lichester presented him to the rectory of Penshurst, Kent, where he resided till 1843, when he was archdeacon of Chichester. „By birth and education a confirmed Royalist, he retired to Oxford soon after the civil war broke out, continued to reside there while that city was held by the king, and attended the king's commands to his court at Oxford and at Uxbridge, where he discussed with Vines, a Presbyterian clergyman. He was appointed examiner of students of Christchurch and public orator in 1645, and attended Charles I as his chaplain from the time when he fell into the hands of the army until the end of 1647, when the king's attendants were sent away from him. Hammond then returned to Oxford, and was chosen sub-pulled in March, 1648, by the parliamentary visitors, and placed for some time in confinement. On his release he repaired to Westwood, Worcestershire, the seat of Sir John Packwood, where the remainder of his life was spent. He died in a very good state of health, the day of his death, in which time he had the disposal of great charitable reposes in his hands, as being the most zealous promoter of almstiving that lived in England since the change of religion. . . . He died after long suffering from a complication of disorders, April 25, 1660.

It is said that Charles II inquired for his death at the bishopric of Worcester. Hammond was a man of great learning, as well in the classics and general philosophy as in doctrinal and school divinity, and possessed great natural ability" (Jones, Christ. Biogr. p. 210). Of his writings the following are some of the most important: Practical Catechism (1644): — Paraphrase and Annotations on the New Testament (Lond. 1655, 8vo; often reprinted; last edition 1845, 4 vols. 8vo). It was translated into Latin by Leclerc (Amster. 1698), with observations and criticisms. Dr. Johnson was very fond of Hammond's Annotations, and recommended them strongly. The theology of the work is Arminian. Hammond's miscellaneous theological writings are reprinted in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology (Oxford 1847–51, 4 vols. 8vo).

Ham-moth-dor (Heb. Chammahot-dor, כֵּמִּזָּה), prob. for כְּמִזָּהזָו, Hammath of Dor, but the reason of the latter part of the name is not clear; Sept. Ἀμματο-ύφος, Vulg. Hamath Dor), a Levitical and refuge city of Naphtali (Josh. xxxi, 32); probably the same elsewhere called simply Hammath (Josh. xix, 35).

Hamon. See BAAL-HAMON; HAMON-GOG.

Hamon, JÉAN, a distinguished French moralist, was born at Cherbourg in 1618. He was a graduate philosopher of the University of Paris. He had already established a great reputation, and offered a good charge by his pupil, M. de Harlay (afterwards presbyter of the Parliament); but, by the advice of his spiritual director, Singlin, he sold all his goods, gave the proceeds to the poor, and became a hermit of Port Royal in 1651. He nevertheless continued practicing medicine, visiting the poor in the neighborhood of Port Royal, and administering to them both spiritual advice and remedies. The Néorolge de Port Royal says: "After a life as carefully guarded as though each day was to be the last, he ended it joyfully by a peaceful death, as he had wished to enter into eternal life," Feb. 22, 1687. He wrote Discours de la Prétention des Paris, 1675, 2 vols. 12mo: — Sur la Prière et les Devoirs des Pasteurs (Par. 1689, 2 vols. 12mo); — La Pratique de la Prière continue (Paris, 1702, 12mo); — Explication du Cantique des Cantiques, with an introduction by Nicole (Paris 1708, 4 vols. 12mo); — Instructions pour les Religieuses de Port Royal (1727 and 1730, 2 vols.); — Instructions sur les Sacraments, sur le Jubile, etc. (Paris, 1734, 12mo); — Explication de l'Oraison Dominicale (Par. 1735), besides other practical and controversial writings. See Néor-

Hamon'nah (Heb. Hamon'nah, חָמוֹןְנָה, multitude Sept. translates Πολυταύνυσαν, Vulg. Amon), a name figuratively assigned to the sepulchral "city of the valley in which the slaughter and burial of the forces of Gog are prophetically announced to take place (Ezek. xxxix, 16), emblematical of the multitude of graves (compare Joel iii, 14). See HAMON-GOG.

Hamon-gog (Heb. Hamon'-Gog, חָמוֹן גְּג), multitude of Gog; fully with גְּג, valley, prefixed; Sept. τοῦ Γογ τῶν πολυταύνυσαν τοῦ Γαγ, Vulg. Πολυταύνυσαν Γγογ, the name prophetically ascribed to the valley in which the corpses of the slaughtered army of Gog are described as to be buried (Ezek. xxxix, 11, 15); represented as situated to the east of the Dead Sea, on the thoroughfare of commerce with Arabia (comp. the route of the caravans which were shown to Joseph by Jesecuwan, Gen. xix, 17, 25), probably the present Haj road between Damascus and Mecca, but scarcely referring to any particular spot. (See Havernick, Comment, ad loc.; Stuart's Comment, on the Apocalypse, ii, 367.) See GOG.

Hamor (Heb. Hamor, חָמֹר, a he-cass; Sept. Ἑμωρ, Ν. T. Ἑμωρ, a Hivite, from whom (or his sons) Jacob purchased the plot of ground in which Joseph was afterwards buried (Gen. xxxiii, 19; Josh. xxxiv, 22; Acts vii, 15; in which last passage the name is Anglicized EMMON), and whose son Shechem seduced Dinah (Gen. xxxiv, 2), B.C. cir. 1905. As the latter appears to have founded the city of Shechem (q. v.), Hamor is also named as the representative of its inhabitants in Judges xix, 24. Josephus (Ant. vii, 29) gives the character and influence are indicated by his title ("prince" of the Hivite tribe in that vicinity), and his judicious behavior in the case of his son; but neither of these saved him from the indiscriminate massacre by Dinah's brothers. See Jacob.

Hampden, Rev. R. Dickson, D.D., bishop of Hereford. England, a descendant of John Hampden, was born A.D. 1729, in the island of Barbadoes, where his family had settled in 1670. He entered Oriel College, Oxford, as a commoner, in 1810, and subsequently was admitted a fellow, appointed a tutor, and, in 1829 and 1831, was public examiner in classics. He delivered the Bamptont lecture in 1832, choosing for his subject The Scholasitic Philosophy considered in its relation to Christian Theology (3d edit. Lond. 1848, 8vo), and in 1833 was appointed principal of St. Mary's Hall. In 1834 he was elected White's professor of moral philosophy (Oxford), and published a pamphlet entitled Observations on Regienets of Political Economy; the publication of which work, and in his Bampton lecture were made the grounds of opposition to his confirmation in 1836 as regius professor of divinity (Oxford), to which Lord Melbourne, then premier, had appointed him. The controversy over this appointment in 1836 occasioned a change in the student government of the university, and is known as the First Hampden Case, apppears to have been based on political feelings as well as theological grounds. His principal opponents were To-ty and High-Churchmen, among whom were Dr. Pusey and J. H. Newman, now a Roman Catholic. A remonstrance against the appointment was sent to the archbishop of Canterbury, to be presented to the crown. A declaration, condemning Hampden's "mode of viewing the doctrines of the Bible and the Articles of the Church" was numerously signed by residents of the university, and an effort was made in the House of Convocillaries to have the same written expressing want of confidence in his views, which was only frustrated by the interposition of the proctors. The struggle was renewed in the Second Hampden Case, occasioned by Hampden's appointment to the see of Hereford by lord John Russell in 1847. Thirteen of the bishops remonstrated against the appointment, "appealing to the former controversy, and urging the inexpedience of placing over the clergy one whose opinions were rendered suspicious by the decision of a body like the University of Oxford." Hampden's friends replied that a change had taken place in the scholarship of the Conventicle of the University, reducing the proportions of 474 to 94 in 1836, to 380 to 219 in 1842, on the proposition to repeal the expression of censure; and further, that many who censured Hampden "objected to the university as an arbitriator of doctrine in the case of Tract x, and of Mr. Ward's Ideal of the Church." The opposition, as in the former case, arose mainly from political and religious considerations.

The government refused to yield, and Dr. Hampden was installed as bishop of Hereford, and thenceforth devoted himself to his episcopal duties, the attacks upon him gradually ceasing. He died April 23, 1806. His position was that of a moderate churchman, and the expression of his views at this day could hardly provoke so fierce an opposition as in 1806. A list of the most important pamphlets relating to the Hampden cases is given by Albemine, a. v. Hampden. Besides the works mentioned above, Dr. Hampden's most important writtings are, Philosophical Evidence of Christianity, etc. (1827, 8vo);-Lectures on Moral Philosophy (8vo);-Parochial Sermons (1836, 8vo);-Lecture on Tradition (1841, 8vo);-

Hamut'el (Heb. Chammuoil, חּוֹמְעָל, heat (? anger or light) of Joram; Sept. Ἀμαθί, Vulg. Heman), the son of Minasha and (apparently) father of Zacchur, of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. i, 26). B.C. ante 1046.

Ham'uil (Heb. Cha'umel, חֹמֵעַל, sparrow; Sept. Ἐρημηλ, the second of the two sons of Pharez, son of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 5). He could not have been born, however, before the migration of Jacob into Egypt (as appears to be stated in Gen. xxvi, 12), since Pharez was not at that time grown up (Gen. xxxviii, 1). His de-Hammulate (Heb. Chamal, חֶמֶל), a descendant of HAMAN (q. v.), the grandson of Judah (Numb. xxvi, 21).

Hamut'ael (Heb. Chammuoiel, חָמְמַעְל), the son of Shalum and cousin of Jeremiah, to whom, before the siege of Jerusalem, he sold a field which he possessed in Anatioch, a town of the Levites (Jer. xxxii, 6-12). If this field be really a Levitical estate of 50, it would imply that an ancient law had fallen into disuse (Lev. xxxv, 34); but it is possible that it may have been the property of Hamanamel in right of his mother. Compare the case of Harnahos, who was also a Levite; and the case of Gottius on Acts iv, 37. Henderson (on Jer. xxxii, 7) argues that the property of the Levitical estate might be sold within the tribe. Fairbairn (s. v.) sug-HANUNIAH probably along with his brother, and, together with one Hananiah, was appointed to take charge of the gates of Jerusalem, and see that they were opened in the morning and closed in the evening at the appointed time (Jer. xxxvi, 22). The circumstances of the time and place rendered this an important and responsible duty, not unattended with danger. B.C. 446.

1. A "son" of Shashak, and chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 24). B.C. apparently between 1612 and 1093.

2. One of the sons of Heman, who (with eleven of his kinsmen) was appointed by David to superintend the sixteenth division (blowers on horns) of Levitical musicians (1 Chron. xxx. 4, 23). B.C. 1014.

4. The father of Shelemiah and grandfather of Irijah, who was the guard of the gate of Benjamin who arrested Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvii. 13). B.C. considerably ante 589.

5. Father of Zelekiah, which latter was one of the "princes" to whom Michaiah reported Baruch's reading of Jeremiah's roll (Jer. xxxvi. 12). B.C. 590.

6. A false prophet Gibion, who, by opposing his prophecies to those of Jeremiah, brought upon himself the terrible sentence, "Thou shalt die this year, because thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord." He died accordingly (Jer. xxviii. 1 sq.). B.C. 586.

7. The high priest in the Temple that within two years Jeconiah and all his fellow-captives, with the vessels of the Lord's house which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away to Babylon, should be brought back to Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvii.): an indication that treacherous negotiations were already secretly opened with Pharaoh-Hophra (who had just succeeded Psammis on the Egyptian throne), and that strong hopes were entertained of the destruction of the Babylonian power by him. The preceding chapter (xxvii. 3) shows further that a league was already in progress between the Jews and the neighboring princes of Edom, Ammon, Moab, Tyre, and Zidon, for the purpose of organizing resistance to Nebuchadnezzar, in combination, no doubt, with the projected movements of Pharaoh-Hophra. Hananiah corroborated his prophecy by taking off from the neck of Jeremiah the yoke which he wore by divine command (Jer. xxxvi. 10). It was a token of the subjection of Judaea and the neighboring countries to the Babylonian empire, and breaking it, adding, "Thus saith Jehovah, Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, from the neck of all nations within the space of two full years." But Jeremiah was bid to go and tell Hananiah that for the wooden yokes which he had broken he should make yokes of iron, so firm was the dominion of Babylon destined to be for seventy years. The prophet Jeremiah added this rebuke and prediction of Hananiah's death, the fulfillment of which closes the history of this false prophet. In the history of Hananiah is of great interest, as throwing much light upon the Jewish politics of that period, this time, divided as parties were into the partisans of Babylon on one hand, and Egypt on the other. It also exhibits the machinery of false prophecies, by which the irreligious and the religious sought to govern by their own policy, in a very distinct form. At the same time, too, that it explains in general the sort of political calculation on which such false prophecies were hazarded, it supplies an important clue in particular by which to judge of the date of Pharaoh-Hophra's (or Apries') accession to the Egyptian throne, and the commencement of his ineffectual effort to restore the power of Egypt (which had been prostrate since Necho's overthrow, Jer. xlv. 2) upon the ruins of the Babylonian empire. The leading to Egypt indicated by Hananiah's prophecy as having been to Zedekiah, had only the faint shadow of his reign issued in open defection from Nebuchadnezzar, and in the guilt of perjury, which cost Zedekiah his crown and his life, as we learn from Ezek. xlvii. 12-20; the date being fixed by a comparison of Ezek. viii, 1 with xxvi, 1. The temporary success of the intrigue, which is described in Jer. xxxviii., was speedily followed by the return of the Chaldaean and the destruction of the city, according to the prediction of Jeremiah. This history of Hananiah also illustrates the manner in which the false prophets hindered the mission, and obstructed the beneficial effects of the ministry of the true prophets, and affords a remarkable example of the way in which they prophesied smooth things, and said peace when there was no peace (compare 1 Kings xxiii, 11, 24, 25). See Jeremiah.

7. The original name of one of Daniel's youthful companions and of the "three Hebrew chieftains" better known by his Babylonian name Shadrach (Dan. i; vi, 7).

8. Son of Zerubbabel, and father of Rephaiah; one of the paternal ancestors of Christ (1 Chron. iii. 19, 21).

9. See Zerubbabel, b. of Rephaiah; one of the patriarchal ancestors of Christ (1 Chron. iii. 19, 21).

10. The "ruler of the palace" (I Kings xxiv. 15), and the person who was associated with Nebemiah's brother Hanani in the charge of the gates of Jerusalem. See Hanani. The high eulogy is bestowed upon him that "he was a faithful man, and feared God above many" (Neh. vii. 2). His office seems to have been one of authority and trust, and perhaps the same as that of Eliahim, which means "God's house" in the name of Zelekiah. See Eliakim. The arrangements for guarding the gates of Jerusalem were intrusted to him with Hanani, the Tirshatha's brother. Pridaux thinks that the appointment of Hanani and Hananiah indicates that at this time Nehemiah returned to Persia, but evidently without sufficient ground. Nebemiah seems to have been continuously at Jerusalem for some time after the completion of the wall (vii. 5, 65; viii. 9; x. 1). If, too, the term נְבָעָנְיָה, as Gesenius supposes, and as the use of it in Neh. ii, 8, makes not improbable, not the palace, but the fortress of the Temple, called by Josephus αἰενοῦς, there is still less reason to imagine Nebemiah's absence from Jerusalem. Hananiah would have been a member of the families of the same family as the preceding. The rendering, moreover, of Neh. vii, 2, 3, should probably be, "And I enjoined (or gave orders to) Hananiah . . . . and Hananiah, the captains of the fortress . . . . concerning Jerusalem, and said, Let not the gates," etc. There is no authority for rendering נְבָעָן over Jerusalem." The passages quoted by Gesenius are not one of them to the point.

11. The son of "one of the apothecaries" (or makers of the sacred ointments and incense, Exxx. xxx, 22-38), who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 8) possibly the same with No. 9. B.C. 446.

12. A son of Shelemiah, and one of the priests who repaired those parts of the wall of Jerusalem opposite their houses (Neh. iii, 30). B.C. 446.

13. A priest, apparently son of Jeremiah, after the captivity, "of the fifth course" (Neh. vii, 52), possibly the same with one of those who celebrated the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (ver. 41). B.C. 446.

Hanbury, Thomas, an English Wesleyan preacher, was born at Carlisle Dec. 16, 1783; was left an orphan at seven, apprenticed to a trade at twelve. He had little education, but had serious thoughts from infancy, and was confirmed at thirteen. Some time after, through HANCOCK

Methodist influence, he was converted. In 1754 he began to preach, and, during his first year of work, was often in danger of violent death from mobs. In 1758 he was admitted into the itinerancy. He afterwards preached in most of the cities of the kingdom. He died at Nottingham Dec. 29, 1786. Mr. Hancock's labors tend-greatly to the spread of vital religion among some of the most abandoned and violent districts of England.

Hand (γῆς, γῆς, the open palm; ἐπώπῃ, the hollow of the partly-closed hand; Greek χεῖρ, χεῖρα, γάμινον, the right hand, dēka, dekè, spemol, the left hand, dēka, spemol; ἐνόπῃ, the principal organ of feeling, rightly described by Cicero as the oriflamme of the instrument of sciences, since this member is wonderfully adapted to the purposes for which it was designed, and serves to illustrate the wisdom and providence of the great Creator (The Hand, its Mechanism and vital Endowments, as evincing Design, by Sir Charles Bell, 1838). Consideration of the facilities of the human hand, the control which it has given man, the conquest over the external world which it has enabled him to achieve, and the pleasing and useful revolutions and improvements which it has brought about, are not surprised to read the glowing eulogy in which Cicero (Deor. ii. 100) speaks of the hand, and the subject, not how important is the part which the hand performs in the records of divine revelation.
The hand itself serves to distinguish man from other terrestrial beings. Of the two hands, the right has a preference derived from natural endowment. See Leave-Hand.

Hand are the symbols of human action; pure hands are pure actions; unjust hands are deeds of injustice; hands full of blood, actions stained with cruelty, and the like (Ps. xc. 17; Job ix. 30; 1 Tim. ii. 8; Isa. i. 10).
Washing of the hands was the symbol of purification (Prov. xxv. 11, xlvii. 18). Of this Pilate furnishes an example (Matt. xxvii. 24). It was the custom of the Jews to wash their hands before and after meat (see Mark vii. 4; Matt. vi. 2; Luke xi. 38). Washing of hands was a symbol of expiation, as might be shown by numerous references in the Old Testament, as examples from several passages (1 Cor. vi. 11; Isa. i. 16; Ps. xxiv. 3, 4). See Washing of Hands. Paul, in 1 Tim. ii. 8, says, "I will therefore that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands," etc. (see Job, xi. 13, 14). The elevation or expression of the right hand was also the ancient method of voting in popular assemblies, as indicated by the Greek term χειροτονίας (Acts xiv. 25; 2 Cor. viii. 19).
In Ps. lxxvi. 2, for "sore," the margin of our version has "hand," and the correct sense is, "My hands in the right were spread out, and ceased not.
To raise the hands together over the head was a gesture of despairing grief (2 Sam. xvii. 19; Jer. ii. 87). The expression in Jer. ii. 37, "Thy hands upon thy head," may be explained by the act of Tamar in laying her hand on her head as a sign of her degradation and sorrow (2 Sam. xvii. 19). The expression "Though hand justified by law," in Prov. xi. 21, is simply "hand to hand," and signifies through all ages and generations, ever:
"through all generations the wicked shall not be unpun-ished."

To the right hand signified to the south, the southern quarter, as the left hand signified the north (Job xxiii.
9; 1 Sam. xxiii. 19; 2 Sam. xxv. 6). The term hand is sometimes used for a monument, a trophy of victory (1 Sam. xv. 12); a sepulchral monument, "Ababolon's Place," literally Ababolon's Hand (2 Sam. xviii. 18; see Erdmann, Monumentum Ababoloni, Helmst. 1740). So in Isa. i. 5, 6: "to them will I give a place within my walls —a monument (or portion) and a name" (Genesius, Thesaur. Heb. p. 242). Hand signifies motion and is used to strike hands as a pledge of suretship (Prov. xxvi. 18; xxii. 26; 2 Chron. xxx. 8, margin). The right hand was lifited up in swearing or taking an oath (Gen. xiv.
22; Deut. xxxii. 40; Ezek. xx. 28; Ps. cxxii. 11; Isa. viii. 8); similar is the Arabic oath, "By the right hand of Allah." (Gen. xii. 1, 27).

Hand in general is the symbol of power and strength, and the right hand more particularly so. To hold by the right hand is the symbol of protection and favor (Psa. xxviii. 35). To stand or be on one's right hand is to aid or assist any one (Psa. xvi. 8; cix. 31; cx. 5; xxvi. 5); so also, man of the right hand is, as thou sustainst, achild (Psa. lxxx. 17): "my hand is with any one," i.e. I aid him, am on his side (1 Sam. xxii. 17; 2 Sam. xxiii. 12; 2 Kings xxiii. 19); and to take or hold the right hand, i.e. to sustain, to aid (Psa. lxxxi. 29; Isa. xili. 10; xiv. 1). So the pledge of fellowship (Gen. xiv. 19) signifies a communication of the same power and authority. To lean upon the hand of another is a mark of familiarity and superiority (2 Kings
v. 17, 18). To give the hand, as to a master, is the token of submission and future obedience. Thus, in 2 Chron. xxx. 8, the words in the original, "Give the hand unto the Lord," signify, Yield yourselves unto the Lord. The like phrase is used in Ps. lxxvi. 31; Lam.
vi. 6, "Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God." (Ps. cxvii. 2), which refers to the watchful readiness of a servant to obey the least sign of command (Kittto's Daily Bible Illustr. ad loc.). To kiss the hand is an act of homage (1 Kings xix. 8; Job xvii. 27). To pour water on any one's hands signifies to serve him (2 Kings ii. 11). "To seal up the hand" (Job xxxvii. 26) signifies to make one in charge of any special business, for which he will be held accountable. Marks in the hands or wrists were the tokens of servitude, the heathen being wont to imprint marks upon the hands of servants, and on such as devoted themselves to some false deity. Mark vi. 7, in the man, when chaldlenged for the scars visible on his hands, would deny that he had proceeded from an idolatrous cause, and pretend that they were the effects of the wounds he gave himself for the loss of his friends. The right hand stretched out is the symbol of immediate exertion of power (Exod. xxv. 18); sometimes the exercise of mercy (Isa. lv. 3; Prov. x. 24).

The hand of God is spoken of as the instrument of power, and to it is ascribed that which strictly belongs to God himself (Job xxvii. 11; Psa. xxxi. 16; xxv. 4; Isa. lxxii. 8; Prov. xi. 14; Acts xxvii. 26; 2 Tim.
iii. 11). The hand of the Lord being upon or with any one notes divine aid or favor (Ezra vii. 6, 28; viii. 18, 22; Neh. ii. 8; Isa. i. 25; Luke i. 66; Acts xi. 21); further, the hand of the Lord is upon or against thee, denotes punishment (Exod. ix. 5; Deut. ii. 15; Judg. ii.
15; 1 Sam. vii. 8, 13; Ezek. x. 5, 12; Ps. cvi. 37; Acts xi. 11). In Job xxxiii. 7, "my hand shall not be heavy upon thee," the original term is ἔριπη, sakph, and the passage signifies "my dignity shall not weigh heavy upon thee" (Genesius, s. v.). The hand of God upon a prophet signifies the immediate operation of his Holy Spirit on the soul or body of the prophet, as in 1 Kings xviii. 46; 2 Kings ii. 13; 2 Chron. vii. 13; Ezek. xi. 3, 13; Ps. cxliii. 6; Prov. xvi. 22; Jer. iii. 18; 2 Tim.
xxxiii. 13; 1 Epp. iv. 13; 1 Cor. xiv. 30; 2 Epp.
iv. 30; the hand, so also the finger of God denotes his our Saviour cast out devils or demons by his bare command, whereas the Jews cast them out only by the invocation of the name of God. So in Exod. viii, 19, the finger of God is a work which none but God could perform. See Axt.

The hands of the high-priest were laid on the head of the scape-goat when the sins of the people were publicly confessed (Lev. xvi, 21). Witnesses laid their hands on the head of the accused person, as it were to signify that they charged upon him the guilt of his blood, and freed themselves from it (Deut. xii, 9; xvi, 7). The Hebrews, when presenting their sin-offerings at the tabernacle, confessed their sins while they laid their hands upon the victim (Lev. i, 4). To "fill one's hands," is to take possession of the priesthood, to perform the functions of that office; because in this ceremony those parts of the victim which were to be offered were put into the hand of the new-made priest (Judg. xvii, 5, 12; Lev. xvi, 52; 1 Kings xiii, 33). Jacob laid his hands on Ephraim and Manasseh when he gave them his last blessing (Gen. xlv, 14). The high-priest stretched out his hands to the people as often as he recited the solemn form of blessing (Lev. xix, 22). Our Saviour laid his hands upon the children that were presented to him and blessed them (Mark x, 16). (See Tiemeier, De χιτώνατι et χιτώλογι, Erford. 1734.)

Imposition of hands formed an early period a part of the ceremonial observed on the appointment and consecration of bishops, and held by the early Church. Numb. xxvii, 19, Jehovah is represented as thus speaking to Moses, "Take thee Joshua, the son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit, and lay thine hand upon him, and set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation, and give him a charge in their sight," etc.; where it is evident that the laying on of hands did neither originate nor communicate divine gifts; for Joshua had "the spirit" before he received imposition of hands; but it was merely an instrumental sign for marking him out individually, and setting him apart from the congregation. Similar appears to be the import of the observance in the primitive Church of Christ (Acts vii, 15-17; 1 Tim. iv, 14; 2 Tim. i, 6). A corruption of this doctrine was that the laying on of hands gave itself of divine powers, and on this account Simon, the magician (Acts viii, 9, 13), obtained money, every one of whom gave me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands he may receive the Holy Ghost," intending probably to carry on a gainful trade by communicating the gift to others. See IMPOSITION OF HANDS.

The phrase "sitting at the right hand of God," as applied to the Messiah, is derived from the fact that with earthly princes a position on the right hand of the throne was accorded to the chief place of honor, dignity, and power: "a upon thy right hand did stand the queen" (Ps. civ, 9; comp. 1 Kings ii, 19; Ps. lxxx, 17). The immediate passage out of which sprang the phraseology employed by Jesus may be found in Ps. cx, 1: "Jehovah said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool." Accordingly the Saviour declares before Caiphas (Matt. xxvi, 64; Mark xiv, 62), "Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven;" where the meaning obviously is that the Jews of that day should have manifest proof that Jesus held the most eminent place in the divine favor, and that his present humiliation would be succeeded by glory, majesty, and power (Luke xxiv, 26; 1 Tim. iii, 16). So when this same figurative expression occurs in Col. i, 20; Rom. i, 3: 1 Pet. iii, 22; Heb. i, 1, 3: viii, 1) that Jesus "sits at the right hand of God," "as the right hand of the Majesty on high," we are obviously to understand the assertion to be that, as his Father, so he worketh always (John xvi, 17) for the advancement of the kingdom of heaven, and for the salvation of souls in the whole world.

In Col. ii, 13, 14, "the law of commandments contained in ordinances" (Ephes. ii, 15) is designated "the handmorizing of ordinances that was against us," which Jesus blotted out, and took away, nailing it to his cross; phraseology which indicates the abolition, on the part of the Saviour, of the Mosaic law (Wolffius, Curia Philolo. in N. T. iii, 16).

Hand-breath (Heb. נְפָח, te' phach, or נְפָחָה, to' phach), the palm, used as a measure of four fingers, equal to about four inches (Exod. xxv, 26; 1 Kings vii, 26; 2 Chron. iv, 5; Ezek. xx. 4, 5; Jer. lii, 21). In Ps. xxxix, 5, the expression "Thou hast made my days palm-breath," signifies very short.

Händel, Georg Friedrich, one of the greatest of musical composers and musicians, was born at Halle, in the Prussian province of Saxony, Feb. 24, 1684. He manifested in early youth an extraordinary passion for music, and at the age of eleven was a good player on the violin, and could sit down and play it as well as a master. In 1698 he was sent to Berlin, where he enjoyed the instruction of Attilio. An offer by the elector of Brandenburg was declined by his father, and in 1701 Händel went to Hamburg, where he played a violin in the orchestra of the opera, and composed his first opera, Almira. He next visited Italy, where he wrote operas for Florence, Venice, and Rome. On his return from Rome he was, in 1709, appointed chapel-master by the elector of Han- sard short violet, and in 1712 he took up his permanent abode in that country. He composed, in honor of the peace of Utrecht, his celebrated Te Deum and Jubilate, and numerous operas. A Royal Academy was established (1720) and placed under his management, but his violent temper involved him in many troubles; an opposition house was started, and soon both failed, with a loss to Händel of £10,000. Soon after he quitted the stage altogether, in order to devote himself wholly to the composition of oratorios. His oratorio Esther had appeared as early as 1720; in 1732 his Judas Maccabaeus was produced. He completed this and other oratorios, and in 1755 being repeated annually, brought to the Foundling Hospital, from 1749 to 1777, £10,800. In 1751 Händel became blind, but he still continued to compose and to play on the piano. He died, as he wished, on Good Friday, April 15, 1759, "in hopes," he said, "of meeting in his good God, his sweet Lord and Saviour, on the day of his resurrection." Among his works, which are in the queen's library, are 50 operas—2 German, 26 Italian, 16 English; 20 oratorios, a great quantity of Church music, cantatas, songs, and instrumental pieces. He was a wonder of the age; his compositions are often full of grandeur and sublimity. His operas are seldom performed, but his oratorios hold the same place in music that in the English drama is accorded to the plays of Shakespeare; and the Händel festivals, lasting several days, in which they are performed by thousands of singing-people, are always a great attraction with the public, and abundant seats are reserved for the Queen, and other members of the royal family for the performances at our own national theatre. Handicraft, a general term (not occurring, however, in the Bible) for any manufacture. See Artificer. Although the extent cannot be ascertained to which these arts were carried whose invention is ascribed to Tubal-Cain (Gen. iv. 22), it is probable that this was proportionate to the nomadic or settled habits of the antediluvian races. Among nomad races, as the Bedouin Arabs, or the tribes of Northern and Central Asia and of America, the wants of life, as well as the arts which supply them, are few, and among the Hebrews both that of them are multiplied and make progress. The following particulars may be gathered respecting the various handicrafts mentioned in the Scriptures. See Craftsman.

1. The preparation of iron for use either in war, in agriculture, or for domestic purposes, was doubtless one of the earliest applications of labor; and, together with iron, working in brass, or, rather, copper alloyed with tin, bronze (יוֹקָר, Geeseus, Theb. Heb. p. 875), is mentioned in the same passage as practiced in antediluvian times (Gen. iv. 22). The use of this last is usually considered as an art of higher antiquity even than that of iron (Hammars and Deugs, p. 150; Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii, 132, abridgment), and there can be no doubt that metal, whether iron or bronze, must have been largely used, either in material or in tools, for the construction of the ark (Gen. vi. 14, 16). Whether the weapons for war or chase used by the early warriors of Syria and Assyria, or the arrow-heads of the archer Ishmael, were of bronze or iron, cannot be ascertained; but we know that iron was used for warlike purposes by the Assyrians (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 194); and, on the other hand, that stone-tipped arrows, as was the case also in Mexico, were used in the earlier times by the Egyptians, as well as by the Semites and Greeks, and that stone or flint knives continued to be used by them, and by the inhabitants of the desert, and also by the Jews, for religious purposes, after the introduction of iron into general use (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. iii, 324, 354; ii, 163; Prescott, Macc. i, 118; Exod. iv. 22; Josh. v. 2; 1st Egypt. room, Brit. Mus. case 36, 37). In the construction of the tabernacle, copper, but no iron, appears to have been used, though the utility of iron was at the same period well known to the Jews, both from their own use of it and from their Egyptian education, while the Canaanitish inhabitants of Palestine and Syria were in full possession of its use both for warlike and domestic purposes (Exod. xx. 23; xxxv, 3; xxvii, 19; Numb. xxxv, 16; Deut. iii, 11; iv, 9; Josh. viii, 31; 16, 18). After the establishment of the Jews in Canaan, the occupation of a smith (גָּבֹּר) became recognised as a distinct employment (1 Sam. xxviii, 13). The designer of a higher order appears to have been called specially גָּבֹּר (Geeseus, p. 531; Exod. xxxv, 50, 55; 2 Chron. xvii, 15; Salehblut, Arch. Heb. c. 14, § 16). The smith’s work (including workers in the precious metals) and its results are often mentioned in Scripture (2 Sam. xii, 31; 1 Kings vi, 7; 2 Chron. xxvi, 14; Isa. xlix, 12; iv, 16). Among the captives taken to Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar were 1000 "craftsmen" and smiths, who were probably of the superior kind (2 Kings xxiv, 16; Jer. xxix, 2). See Charashim.

The workman in gold and silver (יוֹקָר, אֲרוּפָהָא), following the instructions and the examples sent by Abraha to Rebekah (Gen. xxvii, 22, 55; xxxiv, 4; xxviii, 18; Deut. vii, 25). But, whatever skill the Hebrews possessed, it is quite clear that they must have learned much from Egypt and its "iron-furnaces," both in metal-work and in the arts of setting and polishing precious stones; arts which were turned to account both in the construction of the Tabernacle and the making of the priests’ ornaments, and also in the casting of the golden calf as well as its destruction by Moses, probably, as suggested by Goguet, by a method which he had learnt in Egypt (Gen. xii, 42; Exod. iii, 29; xii, 35; xx, 4, 24, 25; xxviii, 17, 24; xxviii, 4; 24, 24, 25; xxxi, 6, 39; Neh. iii, 8; Isa. xiv, 12). Various processes of the goldsmiths’ work, including operations in the raw material, are illustrated by Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii, 106, 102, 162). See Goldsmith.

After the Jewish exiles, frequent notices are found both of moulded and wrought metal, including soldering, which last had long been known in Egypt; but the Phoenicians appear to have possessed greater skill than the Jews in these arts, at least in Solomon's time (Judg. viii, 24, 27; xvii, 4; 1 Kings v, 5, 46; 2 Chron. xv, 4; Ecclus. xxxviii, 28; Bar. vi, 50, 55, 57; Wilkinson, i, 162). See Zarephath. Even in the desert, mention is made of beating gold into plates, cutting it into wire, and also of setting precious stones in gold (Exod. xxxiii, 5, 6, etc.; Beckmann, Hist. of Int. ii, 414; Gesenius, p. 1290). See Metal.

Among the tools of the smith are mentioned tongs (יוֹקָר, 'לֹּזָפ, Foropa, Geeseus, p. 761; Isa. vi, 7), hammer (יהֶבֶר, 'סְפָא, malleus, Gesen. p. 1101), anvil (נָצֶפ, Geeseus, p. 1108), bellows (יַבָּרוֹר, παναρ, sufflatorium, Gesenius, p. 896; Isa. xii, 7; Jer. vi, 29; Ecclus. xxxviii, 28; Wilkinson, i, 316). See each word.

In the N. T. Alexander "the coppersmith" (ὁ χαλκωτής) of Ephesus is mentioned, where also was carried on that trade in "silver shrines" (Βασίλειας ἀργυραίας) which was represented by Demetrius the silversmith (ἄργυροποιος) as being in danger from the spread of Christianity (Acts xix. 24, 28; 2 Tim. iv, 14). See Coppersmith.

2. The work of the carpenter (יוֹקָר, רֹאשׁ, rīṣaw, תָּמִי) was probably a common occupation among the Jews from a very early time. "Carpenters" (Wilkinson.)

*yull, a hole in the seat of a chair; yull, a leg of a chair; yull, a nail; yull, a square; yull, man planing or polishing the leg of a chair.

The workman in gold and silver (יוֹקָר, אֲרוּפָהָא) is often mentioned in Scripture (e.g. Gen. vi, 14; Exod. xxxvii; Isa. xlix, 13). In the palace built by David for himself, the workmen employed were chiefly Phoenicians sent by Hiram (2 Sam. v, 11; 1 Chron. xiv, 1), as most probably were those, or at least the principal ones, who were employed by Solomon in the construction of the Temple, executed under Joash, king of Judah, and also in the rebuilding under Zerubbabel, no mention is made of foreign workmen, though in the latter case the timber is expressly said to have been brought by sea (2 Chron. xii, 7; Ezra iii, 7). That the Jewish carpenters must have been able to carve with some skill is evident from Isa. xii, 7; xlv, 13, in which last passage some of the im

The Hebrew (2 Kings xii, 12) were probably master-masons (“builders,” ver. 11). Among their implements are mentioned the saw (ירש, p. 215), the plumb-line (סנה, Gesen. p. 215), the measuring-reed (ינון, Job xxxvi, 5; Zech. i, 16) and the axe (עקר, 1 Kings vi, 7). See each word. Some of these, and also the chisel and mallet, are represented on Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, "Anc. Egyptians, 319, 314), or preserved in the British Museum (1st Egypt room, No. 6114, 6088). The large stones used in Solomon’s Temple are said by Josephus to have been fitted together exactly without either mortar or cramps, but the foundation stones to have been fastened with lead (Josephus, "Ant. viii, 3, 2; xxv, 11, 3). For ordinary building, mortar, כנה (Gesen. p. 182b), was used; sometimes, perhaps, bitumen, as was the case at Babylon (Gen. xvi, 3). The lime, clay, and straw of which mortar is generally composed in the East requires to be very carefully mixed and united so as to resist wet (Lave, "Mod. Eq. i, 27; Shaw, "Travels, p. 296). The wall “daubed with untempered mortar” of Ezekiel (xiii, 10) was perhaps a sort of cob-wall of mud or clay without lime (BM, Gesenius, p. 1516), which would give way under heavy rain. The use of whitewash on tombs is remarked by our Lord (Matt. xiii, 27; see also Mishnah, "Masser Shenai, v, 1). Houses infected implements used in the trade are mentioned: the rule (יענית, mi'troso, norma), possibly a chalk pencil, Gesenius, p. 1387), measuring-line (סנה, Gesenius, p. 1201), compass (נגלת, παραγωγίς, cæculea, Gesenius, p. 490), plane, or smoothing instrument (יחל, kaila, rançina) (Gesenius, p. 1234, 1386) axe (עקר, Gesenius, p. 302, or וקר, Gesenius, p. 1236, ἀξίνη, secun-). See each of these words.

The process of the work, and the tools used by Egyptian carpenters, and also cooperers and wheelwrights, are displayed in Egyptian monuments and relics; the former, including dovetailing, veneering, drilling, gluing, varnishing, and inlaying, may be seen in Wilkinson, "Anc. Eq. ii, 111–119. Of the latter, many specimens, including saws, hatchets, knives, awls, nails, a hone, and a drill, also turned objects in bone, exist in the British Museum, 1st Egypt room, case 42–43, Nos. 6946–6188. See also Wilkinson, ii, p. 118, fig. 205. See Carpenter.

In the N. T. the occupation of a carpenter (τεκτόν) is mentioned in connection with Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary, and ascribed to our Lord himself by way of reproach (Mark vi, 3; Matt. xiii, 55; and Just. Mart. dial. Tryph. c. 88).

3. The masons (ברון, 2 Kings xii, 12 [18], wall-builders, Gesenius, p. 269) employed by David and Solomon, at least the chief of them, were Phoenicians, as is implied also in the word ברון, men of Gebal, Jebail, Byblus (Gesen. p. 258; 1 Kings v, 18; Ezek. xxvii, 9, Burchardt, "Syria, p. 179). Other terms employed are ברון, "workers of stone-wall" (2 Sam. v, 11; 1 Chron. xxii, 15); ברון, "stone-cutters or masons (1 Chron. xxii, 2, 15, "workers of stone;" Ezra iii, 7, etc.).
HANDICRAFT

Tyropeon probably derived its name from the occupation of the cheese-makers, its inhabitants (Josephus, War, v, 4, 1). Butchers, not Jewish, are spoken of in 1 Cor. ix, 25.

Trade in all its branches was much developed after the Captivity, and for a father to teach his son the trade was reckoned not only honorable, but indispensable (Mishna, Pirke Ab. ii, 2; Kiddush, iv, 14). Some trades, however, were regarded as less honorable (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 84).

Some, if not all, trades had special localities, as was the case formerly in Europe and is now in many cities (Jer. xxxvii, 21; 1 Cor. x, 25; Josephus, War, v, 4, 1, and 8; Mishna, E secor. v, 1; Russell, Aleppo, p. 20; Chardin, Voyages, vii, 274, 304; Lane, Mod. Eq. ii, 145). See BAZAR.

One feature, distinguishing Jewish from other workmen, deserves peculiar notice, viz. that they were not slavers, nor were their trades necessarily hereditary, as is and so often the case among other, especially heathen nations (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. c, v, § 81-84; Saalschütz, Hebr. Arch. c, 14). See MECHANIC.

Handkerchief or napkin (σωνάκια; Vulg. sudarium) occurs in Luke xix, 20; John xi, 44; xx, 7; Acts xix, 12. The Greek word is adopted from the Latin, and properly signifies a sweat-cloth, or pocket-handkerchief, but in the Greek and Syriac languages it denotes chiefly napkin, wrapper, etc. In the first of the above passages (Acts xix, 12) it means the handkerchief by which the "wicked servant" had laid up the pound entrusted to him by his master. For references to the custom of laying up money, etc, in σωνάκια, both in classical and rabbinical writers, see Wetstein's N. T. on Luke xix, 20.

In the second instance (John xi, 44) it appears as a handkerchief, or cloth attached to the corpse. It was perhaps brought round the forehead and under the chin. In many Egyptian mummies it does not cover the face. In ancient times, among the Greeks, it did (Nicolaus, De Gvoevo. Luctu, c. iii, § 6; Thiel, 1637). Maimonides, in his comparatively recent times, describes the whole face as being covered, and gives a reason for the custom (Tract Ṭaḥal, c, 4).

The next instance is that of the σωνάκων which had been "about the head" of our Lord, but which, after his resurrection, was found rolled up, as if deliberately, and put in a place separate from the linen clothes. It is the instance of the Biblical use of the word (and the only one in which it is rendered "handkerchief") occurs in the account of the "special miracles" wrought by the hand of Paul (Acts xix, 11): so that σωνάκα (handkerchiefs, napkins, wrappers, shawls, etc.) were brought together by the sick; and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them. The Ephesians had not unnaturally inferred that the apostle's miraculous power could be communicated by such a mode of contact; and certainly cures thus received by parties at a distance, among a people famed for their adders and widows, i.e. magical skill, etc., would serve to convince them of the truth of the Gospel by a mode well suited to interest their minds. The apostle is not recorded to have expressed any opinion respecting the reality of this intermediate means of those miracles. He had doubted sufficiently explained that these and all the other miracles "wrought by his hands," i.e. by his means, were really wrought by God (ver. 11) in attestation of the mission of Jesus. If he himself did not entertain exactly the same ideas upon the subject as they did, he may be considered as consenting to, or, rather, not opposing this unnecessary popular notion, rendered harmless by his previous explanation, and affording a very convenient medium for achieving much higher purposes. If the connection between the secondary cause and the effect was real, it reminds us of our Saviour's expression, "I perceive that virtue has gone out of me" (Mark v, 30); which is, however, regarded by many critics as a popular mode of saying that he knew that a miracle had been wrought by his power and efficacy—a mode of speaking in nation at least with the belief of the woman that she should be healed if she could but touch the hem of his garment unperceived by him, and perhaps even conceded to, in accordance with the miracles wrought through the medium of contact related in the Old Testament (1 Kings xvii, 21; 2 Kings iv, 29, etc.), and in order, by a superior display, in regard both to speech and extensiveness, to demonstrate his supremacy by a mode through which the Jews were best prepared to perceive it (Luke vi, 19; see Schwartz, ad Olear. de Stylo N. T. p. 139; Soler. De Puteo, p. 17; Pierson, ad Mer. p. 348; Lydel. Flor. Spars. ad Pass. J. C. p. 5; Drusius, Quaest. Heb. c. 2; Rosenmüller and Kuinöö on the passage). See KERCHER; NAPKH; HOLY HANDKERCHIEF.

HANDLE (as a noun) occurs but once (Cant. v, 5) in the plural (יַעַשְּנֵיהוֹ, kappōth, lit. hands), for the thumb-pieces or knobs of the bolt or latch to a door (compare יַעַשְּנָה, arma of a throne, etc., 1 Kings x, 19). See LOCK.

Handmaid or HANDMAIDEN (יָעַשְנֵיהו, shiphakah, or יָעַשְנָה, amakh, Gen. xvi, 1, etc.; Ruth iii, 9, etc.; 1 Esd. ii, 48), a maid-servant (as both Heb. terms are often translated; the latter being rendered "handmaid" only in a metaphorical or self-depreciatory sense). We find on the paintings in the tombs of Egypt various representations of female domestics employed in waiting on their mistresses, sometimes at the bath, at others at the toilette, and likewise in bringing in refreshments and aliy rendered), a spear or javelin (Ezek. xxxix, 9). See ARMOR.

HANNAH

Handshuch, John Frederick, was the fifth of the earlier ministers sent from Halle to America to labor among the German population, and to build up the Re- deemer's kingdom in this Western hemisphere. He was born of honorable and pious parentage in Halle Jan. 14, 1714. He was educated at the university, and set apart to the work of the ministry in 1744. He commenced his duties in the large and laborious parish of Grab, and labored with great success. But when he heard of the spiritual destitution of his brethren in America, and that the earnest appeals of his sympathies were strongly awakened, and he earnestly desired to go to their relief. He landed in Philadelphia April 5, 1748, and was welcomed at the Trappe by Dr. Muhlenberg with the salutation, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." He was placed at Lancaster, Pa., where he labored for several years with great success. The congregation increased, and under his direction a flourishing school was established and sustained. "Our school," he says, "consists of English, Irish, and Germans, Lutherans and Reformed; and so anxious are the people to have their children instructed, that it is impossible to receive all who apply for admission." He subsequently took charge of the churches at New Providence and Hanover, and thence was transferred to Germantown, Pa., and subsequently to Philadelphia, where he died Oct. 9, 1764. (M. L. S.)

Ha'nes (Hebrew Chânâs, חַנָּה, doubtless of Egyptian etymology), a place in Egypt only mentioned in Isa. xxx, 4: "For his princes were at Zoan, and his messengers came to Hanes." The Septuagint renders the latter clause καὶ ἄγγελος αὐτοῦ πονηροῖς, "And his ambassadors worthless." The copy from which this translation was made may have read רָכָּנִים instead of רָכָנִים; and it is worthy of note that the reading רָכָנִים is still found in a number of ancient MSS. (De Rossi, Varia Lectiones Vét. Test. iii, 29), and is approved by Lowth and J. D. Michie. The old Latin version follows the Sept., "Nuncius pessimi," but Jerome translates from a text similar to our own, rendering the clause as follows: "Et nuncii tui usque ad Hanes pervererunt." (Sabbattier, Biblio. Sacrorum Latin. Versa, ad loc.). Jerome adds, in his commentary on the verse, "Intelligimus ultimam juxta Ethiopias et Blemmianas esse Egyptiae civitates: et lingua Huruaria, qui heptamerum "Asvnicus" (Asvnicus) of Herodotus (ii, 137; compare Champollion, L'Egypte, i, 309; Quatremere, Mémoires, i, 500), which he, with Gesenius and others, supposes to be the same as Herculeopolis (City of Hercules) of Strabo (xxvii, 812), the ruins of which are now called Andez (Edrisi, Atlas, p. 512). The Coptic name was Hnes or Hunes, and it was one of the ancient royal cities of Egypt. Anaích stands on a high mound some distance west of the Nile, near the parallel of Benissa. The great objection to this theory is the distance of Anaích from Zoan, which stood in the eastern part of the Delta, near the sea. Gesenius remarks, as a kind of apology for the identification of Hanes with Herculeopolis Magna, that the latter was formerly a royal city. It is true that in Manetho's list the 9th and 10th dynasties are said to have been of Egyptian kings; but it has lately been suggested, on strong grounds, by Sir Gardner Wilkinson, that this is a mistake in the case of the 9th dynasty for Hermomithes (Rawlinson, Herod. ii, 348). If this supposition be correct as to the 9th dynasty, it must also be so as to the 10th; but the circumstance of Hero- cepolis being a royal city or not, a thousand years before Isaiah's time, is obviously of no consequence here.

Handing them round to visitors. An upper servant or slave had the office of handing the wine, and a black woman sometimes followed, in an inferior capacity, to receive an empty cup when the wine had been poured into the goblet. The same black slave also carried the fruits and other refreshments; and the peculiar mode of holding a plate with the hand reversed, so generally adopted by women from Africa, is characteristically shown in the Theban paintings (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i, 143 sqq.; abridg.) See BANQUET. It appears most probable that Hagar was given to Sarai as her personal attendant while she was in the house of Pharaoh, and that she permitted to retain her when she departed. Jewish tradition reports that Hagar was a daughter (by a concubine, as some say) of Pharaoh, who, seeing the wonders wrought on account of Sarai, said, "It is better that my daughter should be a handmaid in this household than a mistress in another," and therefore gave her to Sarai. She was, no doubt, a female slave, and one of those maid-servants whom Abram had brought from Egypt. These females among the Jews, as they still are in the East, are entirely under the control of the mistress of the family. See SLAVE; HAGAR.

Hand-mill. See MILL.

Hand-staff (מֶשֶׂנָה, makkel; a rod or staff) as usual a white and a black female slave waiting upon an ancient Egyptian lady at a party.
The prophecy is a reproof of the Jews for trusting in Egypt; and, according to the Masoretic text, mention is made of an embassy, perhaps from Hosea, or else from Ahas, or possibly Hezekiah, to a Pharaoh. As the king whose assistance is asked is called Pharaoh, he is probably not an Egyptian of the 25th dynasty, but a sovereign of the 22nd dynasty, which, according to Manetho, was of Tanite kings. It is supposed that the last king of the latter dynasty, Manetho’s Zeti, was the Seba of Herodotes, the king in whose time Sennacherib’s army perished, and who appears to have been mentioned under the title of Pharaoh by Rabshakeh (Isa. xxvi. 6; 2 Kings xxviii. 21), though it is just possible that Tahhakah may have been intended. If the reference be to an embassy to Zom, Sennacherib was probably his successor, and in any case then the most important city of the eastern part of Lower Egypt. Hames was most probably in its neighborhood; and we are disposed to think that the Chal. Parth. is right in identifying it with Tsupanes (ספואנה, ספואנה, once written, if the Ktob be correct, in the form דפאה, Daphne), a fortified town on the eastern frontier. Grorius considers Hanes a contraction of this name (Commentar. ad loc.). With this may be connected the remark of De Rossi—Codex meus 380 notat ad Marg. esse ספואנה (Jer. ii. 16 (Ver. Lect., l. c.). On the whole, this seems to be rather probable theory. Tahpanes was situated in the eastern part of the Delta, and was one of the royal cities about the time of Isaiah. See TAPANES.

Hanging (as a punishment, בְּנַחֲלִית, to impale with dissection of the limbs, Num. xxvi. 43; 2 Sam. xxii. 6, 9: בָּנַחֲלִית, to suspend, as among the Hebrews, Deut. xxi. 22; the Egyptians, Gen. xiii. 19; and the Persians, Esdr. vii. 10; v, 14: κρατέων, suspender). See CRUCIFIXION. Hanging on a tree or gibbet appears to have been a mark of infamy, inflicted on the dead bodies of criminals, rather than a punishment, as modern nations employ it. The person suspended was considered as a curse, an abomination in the sight of God, and as receiving this token of infamy at his hand. The body never was taken on the wall, or justly, was that which the law prescribed, was governed by the phrase, "He shall die the death," but without cause. See PUNISHMENT.

HANGING (as a curtain) is the rendering of three Heb. terms, two of them having reference to the furnishing of the tabernacle and Temple. 1. The "hanging" (בָּנַחֲלִית, suszakh; Sept. eternovra-ropoV, Vulg. eternum) was a curtain or covering (as the word means indeed, and as it is sometimes rendered) to close an entrance. It was made of variegated stuff wrought with needlework (compare Esth. i, 5), and in one instance, at least, was hung on five pillars of acacia wood (Esth. i, 14), and at least six are implied as supporting it; it was suspended before the successive openings of entrance into the tabernacle and its parts. Of these, the first hung before the entrance to the court of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvii. 16; xxxvii. 18; Num. iv. 26); the second before the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 36, 37; xxxix. 38); and the third before the entrance to the Most Holy Place, called more fully בְּנַחֲלִית ("veil of the covering," Exod. xxxiv. 12; xxxix. 34; xxi. 21). See CURTAIN.

2. The hangings (בָּנַחֲלִית, kelaim; Sept. eieria, Vulg. eternorum) were used for covering the walls of the tabernacle, just as tapestry was in modern times (Exod. xxvii. 9; xxxvii. 17; xxxviii. 9; Num. iii. 26; iv. 26). The rendering in the Sept. implies that they were made of the same substance as the sails of a ship, i.e., as explained by Rashi) "meshy, not woven:" this opinion is, however, incorrect, as the material of which they were constructed was "fine twined linen." The hangings were carried only five cubits high, or half the height of the walls of the court (Exod. xxvii. 18; compare xxi. 16). They were fastened to pillars which ran along the sides of the court (xxviii. 18). See TABERNACLE.

3. The "hanging" (בָּנַחֲלִית, botim; 2 Kings xxiii. 7, margin house which is the lateral section of a doublet or double hood). The word implies two sorts of women: one that these women wore might be probably clothes for tents used as portable sanctuaries. See IDOLATRY.

Han’iel (1 Chron. viii. 39). See HANIEL.

Hammer, MEREDITH, an English Church historian, was born at Parklington, Shropshire, in 1845. He became chaplain of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and afterwards rector of St. Leonard, at Shoreditch. Here he sold the brass ornaments which decorated the gravi of the church, which so displeased his parishioners that he was obliged to resign about 1853. He then went to Ireland, where he was finally made treasurer of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Dublin. He died in 1864, not without suspicion of suicide. He was a skilful Greek scholar, and well acquainted with Church history. He wrote Translantion of the ancient ecclesiastical Histories of the first six hundred Years after Christ, originally written by Eusebius, Socrates, and Eusebius (1754; reprinted in 1856 with the addition of The Lives of the Prophets and Apostles by Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre):—The Epiphania of the Saints of Ireland; and the Chronicle of Ireland (Dublin, 1853, fol.):—A Chronography (London, 1856, fol.). Han’nah (Heb. Channah; הַנַּחֲנָה, graciosissimus; Sept. Ἀσψία; comp. ANNA, a name known to the Phoencians [igos, Men. Phoen. p. 400], and attributed by Virgil to Didio’s sister), wife of a Levite named Elkanah, and mother of Samuel (1 Sam. i. 11). She was very dear to her husband, but, being childless, was much aggrieved by the insults of Elkanah’s other wife, Peninnah, who was blessed with children. The family lived at Ramah-zin-zaphim, and, as the law required, there was a yearly journey to offer sacrifices at the sole altar of Jehovah, which was then at Shiloh. Women were not bound to attend; but pious females free from the cares of a family often did so, especially when the husband was a Levite. Every time that Hannah went there childless she declined to take part in the festivities which followed the sacrifices, being then, as it seems, peculiarly exposed to the taunts of her rival. At length, on one of these visits to Shiloh, while she prayed before returning home, Hannah vowed to devote all her offerings to the ministry the son which she so earnestly desired (Num. xxxi. 1 sq.). It seems to have been the custom to pronounce all vows at the holy place in a loud voice, under the immediate notice of the priest (Deut. xxi. 28; Psa. xxi. 14); but this vow was thus applied as a solemn promise, so that her lips only were seen to move. This attracted the attention of the high-priest, Eli, who suspected that she had taken too much wine at the recent feast. From this suspicion Hannah easily vindicated herself, and returned home with a lightened heart. Before the end of that year Hannah became the rejoicing mother of a son, to whom the name of Samuel was given, and who was devoted to a life of self-sacrifice under the condition of Nazariteiit to which his mother had devoted herself. B.C. 1142. Hannah went no more to Shiloh till her child was old enough to dispose with her maternal services, when she took him up with her to leave him there, as it appears was the custom when one was a Nazarite, unless the parents had been ordained under the obligations of Nazaritish. When he was presented in due form to the high-priest, the mother took occasion to remind him of the former transaction: "For this child," she said, "I prayed, and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of him." (1 Sam. i, 27). Hannah's greatness afterwards found vent in an exultant dance, which furnishes a remarkable specimen of the early lyric poetry of the Hebrews (see Schlosser, Cantica Hannei, Erlangen, 1801), and of which many of the ideas and images were in after times repeated by the Virgin Mary on a somewhat similar occasion (Luke 1:46-52). It is especially remarkable as containing the first designation of the Messiah under that name. In the Targum it has been subjected to a process of magniloquent dilution, for which it would be difficult to find a parallel even in the pompous vagracy of Eichhorn (Eichh. Hebr., 1808). After this Hannah failed not to visit Shiloh every year, bringing a new dress for her son, who remained under the eye and near the person of the high-priest. See Samuel.

Hannah. John, D.D., an eminent Wesleyan minister, was born at Lincoln, Eng., Nov. 5, 1792. After receiving a Christian education, he entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1814 at Bruton, Somersetshire. From 1815 to 1817, inclusive, he was on the Gainsborough Circuit; 1818 to 1820, Lincoln; 1821 to 1823, Nottingham; 1824 to 1826, Leeds; 1827 to 1829, third Manchester Circuit; 1830 to 1833, Liverpool; 1833 to 1838, he became theological tutor at the Wesleyan Training Institution at Hoxton. In 1842 he was removed to the college at Didsbury, where he remained as theological tutor till he became a supernumerary at the Conference of 1867. In the year that he was removed to Didsbury he was elected a member of the Convocation (Loudon), and he was again president in 1851, when the Conference met at Newcastle upon Tyne. He was Conference secretary in the years 1840, 1841, 1849, 1850, and 1854 to 1856. On two occasions he represented the Wesleyan Conference, once with the Rev. R. Reece, and the second time with Dr. J. F. Jobson, at the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. His full term of service as a Methodist minister extended without interruption from 1814 to 1867—fifty-three years. After becoming supernumerary in 1867 he continued to reside at Didsbury, under an arrangement devised by Mr. Jowett and other prominent Wesleyan laymen. He died in Didsbury from congestion of the lungs, after a brief illness, Dec. 29, 1867. "For about thirty-three years he was a chief instructor of the young Wesleyan ministry, sending out such men as Arthurt, Harrison, Calvert, etc.; men who have attested their salutary power throughout the United Kingdom, and in the hardest mission fields of the Church. Nearly three hundred preachers were trained by him. His influence over the connection through these men has been beyond all estimation. As a religious writer as well, he was exceedingly ingenious and effective—not remarkably 'fanciful,' seldom rising into declamation, but full of entertaining and impressive thought, and a certain sweet grace, or, rather, graciousness andunction, which charmed all devotee listeners. He was singularly pertinent, and often surprisingly beautiful in Scripture citation; his discourses were mosaics of the finest gems of the sacred writings. He was a fond student of the imaginative, and could Amuseus of the book of poetry. In his vacation excursions, to make pilgrimages to their old churches and graves, and his sermons abounded in the golden thoughts of Hooker, South, and like thinkers. He was constitutionally a modest man, in early life nervously timid of responsibility; but, whether in the pulpit or in the parlour, the public was charmed by his cordiality and modesty, and his characteristic talent to kindle into a divine glow that rapt himself and his audience with holy enthusiasm. For fifty-three years his labors for Methodism had no interruption; they were unobtrusive, steady, quietly energetic, and immensely useful. With Thomas Jackson, he was one of the last of that second and mighty rank of Wesleyan preachers, headed by Bunting, Watson, and Newton, who, when Wesley's immediate companions were rapidly disappearing, caught the Methodist standard from their trembling hands, and kept the banner of the advance in the hands of the earth. He was, withal, a model of Christian manners—a perfect Christian gentleman; not in the sense deprecated by Wesley in his old Minutes, but in the sense that Wesley himself so completely exemplified. His humility and modesty, his kindliness and armless envy. No prominent man passed through the severe internal controversies of Wesleyan Methodism with less criticism from antagonists. The whole connection spontaneously recognised him as unimpeachable, amid whatever rumors or clamors. All instinc tively turned towards him as an example of sincerity, purity, and assurance, in whatever doubtful exigency. The influence of Dr. Hannah's character, aside from his talents, on the large ministry which he educated, has been one of the greatest blessings Wesleyan Methodism has enjoyed in this generation.―Methodist (newspaper), Jan. 25, 1848; A Manual American Cyclopaedia for 1867, p. 601; Wesleyan Minutes, 1868, p. 14.

Han'nath: Heb., Cham'math, חָנְנָתָ, graciously regarded; Sept. Ἀνανᾶ, v. Ἀνανᾶς and Ἄνανας, a place on the northern boundary of Zebulun, apparently about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the valley of Jiphthah-Ei (Josh. xix. 14); probably among the range of Jebel Jermik, not far from el-Maghur.

Han'niel: Heb., Chan'ziel, חָנְצֵיל, grace of God; Sept. Ἀνάνιης, Vulg. Haniel and Haniei), the name of two men.

1. Son of Ephod and physhar of the tribe of Manass, appointed by Moses at the divine nomination as one of the commissioners to divide the promised land (Num. xxxiv, 23). B.C. 1618.

2. One of the sons of Ulla and chief of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. viii, 9, where the name is less correctly Anglicised "Haniel"). B.C. ante 790.

Ha'noc'thite: Heb. Chan'okhî, חָנְוקִיתָ; Sept. Ενώκη, Vulg. Ienoclitus, Eng. Vers. "Hanochite"), a descendant of Enoch or Hakon, the son of Reuben (Num. xxvi, 5).

Ha'nun (Heb. Cham'un, חָנְעָן, favored), the name of three men.

1. (Sept. Ἀνανίης and Ἀνανία) The son and successor of Nahash, king of the Ammonites (2 Sam. x, 1-4; 1 Chron. xix, 2-6). David, who had in his troubles been befriended by Nahash, sent, with the kindest intentions, an embassy to console with Hanun on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his own accession. B.C. cir. 1085. The rash young king, however, was led to misapprehend the motives of this embassy, and to treat with gross and inexcusable indignity the honorable personages whom David had charged with this mission. Their beards were half shaven, and their robes cut short by the middle, and they were dismissed in this shameful trim, which can be appreciated only by those who consider how reverently the beard has always been regarded (Proverbs, iv. 20). When the news of this affront was brought to David, he sent word to the ambassadors to remain at Jericho till the growth of their beards enabled them to appear with decency in the metropolis. He vowed vengeance upon Hanun for the insult; and the vehemence with which he revealed his feelings to his courtiers is interesting from its antiquity, of the respect expected to be paid to the person and character of ambassadors. Hanun himself looked for nothing less than war as the consequence of his conduct; and he subsidized Hadarezer and other Syrian princes to assist him with their armies. The power of the Syrians was broken in two campaigns, and the Ammonites were left to their fate, which was severe even beyond the usual severities of war in that remote age. B.C. cir. 1084. See AMMONITES; DHUYAD.

3. (Sept. 'Avuy.) A son who repaired (in connection with the inhabitants of Zanoah) the Valley-gate of Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. iii. 13). B.C. 446.

Hanway, Jonas, an English philanthropist, was born at Portsmouth in 1712. He established himself as a merchant at St. Petersburg, and became connected, through his Russian dealings, with the trade into Persia. Business having led him into that country, he published in 1725 A Historical Account of the British Trade over the Caspian Sea, with a Journal of Travels from London through Russia into Persia (4 vols. 4to), "a work of no pretension to literary elegance, but containing much information on the commercial subjects of which he speaks, and on the history and manners of Persia. The latter part of his life was spent in supporting, by his pen and personal exertions, a great variety of charitable and philanthropic schemes; and he gained so high and honorable a name that a deputation of the chief merchants of London made it their request to goven-ment that some substantial mark of public favor should be conferred on him. He was, in consequence, made a commissioner of the navy. The Marine Society and the Magdalene Charity, both still in existence, owe their establishment mainly to him; he was also one of the great promoters of Sunday-schools. He died in 1785. He published also The Importance of the Lord's Supper (London, 1782, 12mo) - Reflections on Life and Religion (Lud. 1761, 2 vols. 8vo). See Pugh, Remarkable Occurrences in the Life of Jonas Hanway (London, 1787, 8vo); English Cyclopedia; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 782.

Haphar'am (Hebrew Chapharah'm, כַּפָּרָה, two parts; Sept. Διαφαραί, Vulg. Hopharim), a place near the boundary of Bashan and Gilead (Josh. xix. 19). Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Alpharim) appears to place it six Roman miles north of Le- gio: the Apocrypha also possibly speaks of the same place as Apularea (Apuliaea, 1 Mac. xi. 54; compare xvi. 30, 36). Schwarz (Palestine, p. 165) was unable to find it. Kiepert (Wandkarte von Palästina, 1857) locates it near the river Kishon, apparently at Tell el-Thurah (Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii. 110). Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, i, 592) imagines it may be the modern Shafe' Shema' (the Shafta of Robinson, Reseaux, new ed. i. 103 "on a ridge overlooking the plain of Megiddo"), which, he says, "in old Arabic authors is written Skephram." See ISHCHAR.

Hapharath, pl. HAPTAROTH (חפורת, dissimilation, ḫabhegh). This expression, which is found in foot-notes and at the end of many editions of the Hebrew Bible, denotes the different lessons from the prophetic books read in the synagogue every Sabbath and festival of the year. As these lessons have been read from time immemorial in conjunction with sections from the law, and as it is both "the reading of the law and the prophets" (Acts vii. 50), "the reading of the law and the prophets is the commandment of God" (Romans xix. 15, etc.), we propose to discuss both together in the present article.

1. Classification of the Lessons, their Titles, Significations, etc.—There are two classes of lessons indicated in the Hebrew Bible: the one consists of fifty-four sections, into which the entire law or Pentateuch (תנ"ך) is divided, and is called Parshah (תנ"ך פסוקים, plur. תן פסוקים, from תן פסוק, to separate); and the other consists of a corresponding number of sections selected from different parts of the prophets, to be read in conjunction with the former, and denominated Haphtaroth. As the signification of this term is much disputed, and is intimately connected with the view about the origin of these prophetic lessons, we must defer the discussion of it to section 4. The division of the Pentateuch into fifty-four sections is to provide a lesson for each Sabbath of those years which, according to Jewish chronology, have fifty-four Sabbaths (see sect. 2), and to read through the whole Pentateuch, with large portions of the different prophets, in the course of every year. It must be observed, however, that this annual cycle was not universally adopted by the ancient Jews. There were some who had a triennial cycle (comp. Megillah, 29 b). These divided the Pentateuch into one hundred and fifty-three or fifty-five sections, so as to read through the law in Sabbatical lessons once in three years. This was still done by some Jews in the days of Maimonides (compare Jos Ha-Chayyâb Ha-Rishôn of Rejchel Pexkhilah, xiii. 1), and Benjamin of Tudela tells us that he found the Syrian Jews followed this practice in Memphis (ed. Asher, i, 148). The sections of the triennial division are called by the Masorites Sehalim or Sedaroth (תנ"ך סיורים), as may be seen in the Masoretic note at the end of Exodus: "Here endeth the book of Exodus... it hath eleven Parshah (תנ"ך פסוקים, i.e. according to the annual division), twenty-nine Sedaroth (תנ"ך סיורים, i.e. according to the triennial division), and forty chapters (תנ"ך פרקים)." It is the Sabatian lessons of the law and prophets are also read on every festival and fast of the year. It must be noticed, moreover, that the Jews, who have for some centuries almost universally followed the annual division of the law, denominated the Sabbatical section Sidra (תנ"ך סידרא), the name which the Masorites give to each portion of the triennial division, and that every one of the fifty-four sections has a special title, which it derives from the first or second word with which it commences, and by which it is quoted in the Jewish writings. To render the following description more intelligible, as well as to enable the student of Hebrew exegesis to identify the quotations from the Pentateuch, we subjoin on the two following pages the chronological table of the Sabatian Festival and Fast Lessons from the Law and Prophets, and their titles. (See Clarke's Commentary, s. f. Deuteronomy.)

2. "The Reading of the Law and Prophets" as indicated in the Hebrew Bible, and practiced by the Jews at the present day.—As has already been remarked, this division into fifty-four sections is designed to provide a lesson for every Sabbath of those years which have fifty-four Sabbaths. Thus the intercalary year, in which New Year falls on a Thursday, and the months Marchesvan and Kislev have twenty-nine days, has fifty-four Sabbaths which require special lessons. But as ordinary years have not so many Sabbaths, and those years in which New Year falls on a Monday, and the months Marchesvan and Kislev have thirty days, or New Year falls on...

* The first reference always shows the Haphtarah according to the German and Polish Jews (דFindObject); the second, introduced by the disjunctive particle on, is according to the Portuguese Jews (דFindObject).

A Saturday, and the said months are regular, i.e. Marcheshvan having twenty-nine days and Kislev thirty, have only forty-seven Sabbaths. Fourteen of the fifty-four sections, viz. 22 and 23, 27 and 28, 29 and 30, 32 and 33, 39 and 42, and 43 and 51, and 50 have been appointed to be read in pairs either wholly or in part, according to the varying number of Sabbaths in the current year. Thus the whole Pentateuch is read through every year. The first of these weekly sections is read on the first Sabbath after the Feast of Tabernacles, which is in the month of Tisri, and begins the civil year, and the last is read on the concluding day of this festival, Tisri 23, which is called The Rejoicing of the Law (תירבעת יום הברית), a day of rejoicing, because on it the law is read through. See Tabernacles, Feast or. According to the triennial division of the reading of the law it seems to have been as follows: Gen. i, 1—Exod. xiii, 16, comprising history from the creation of the world to the Exodus, was read in the first year; Exod. xiii, 17—Num. vi, 27, embracing the laws of both Sinai and the tabernacle, formed the lessons for the Sabbath of the second year; and Num. vii, 1—Deut. xxxiv, 12, containing both history (i.e. the history of thirty-nine years' wanderings in the wilderness) and law (i.e. the repetition of the Mosaic law), constituted the Sabbath lessons for the third year (compare Megilla, 29b, b, and Volklehrer, ii, 209).

3. The manner of reading the Law and the Prophets.

—Every Sabbath lesson from the law (דFindObject) is divided into seven sections (evidently designed to correspond to the seven days of the week), which, in the days of our Saviour and afterwards, were read by seven different persons (דFindObject), who were called upon for this purpose by the congregation or its chief. Mishna, Megilla, iv, 2; Maimonides, Yad Ha-Chazakah, Hilkoth Tephitah, xiii, 7). Great care is taken that the whole nation should be represented at this reading of the law and prophets. Hence a Cohen ("72") or priest is called to the reading of the first portion, a Levi ("72") to the second, and an Israel ("72") to the third; and after the three great divisions of the nation have thus been duly represented, the remaining four portions are assigned to four others with less care. "Every one called to the reading of the law must unroll the scroll, and, having found the place where he is to begin to read, pronounces the following benediction—Bless ye the Lord, who is ever blessed; to which the congregation respond, 'Blessed be the Lord, who is blessed for evermore.' Whereupon he again pronounces the following benediction—Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast chosen us from among all nations, and hast given us thy law. Blessed art thou, O Lord, giver of the law, to which all the congregation respond 'Amen.' He then reads the seventh portion of the lesson, and when he has finished, rolls up the scroll, and pronounces again the following benediction—Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast given us thy law, the law of truth, and hast planted among us everlasting life. Blessed art thou, O Lord, giver of the law" (Neh. xii, 3-5). The other six, who are called in rotation to the reading of the other six portions, have to go through the same formulas. Then the maphtir (מָפְחִית), or the one who finishes up by the reading of the Haphtarot, or the lesson from the prophets, is called. Having read the few concluding verses of the lesson from the law, and passed through the same formulas as the other seven, he reads the appointed portion from the prophets. Before reading it, he needs the following preface—

"Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who has chosen good prophets, and delighted in their words, which were spoken in truth. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who has chosen the law, thy servant, and protected all the children of Israel, and the righteous, from among the wondrous prophets." And after reading, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, Rock of all ages, righteous in all generations, the faithful God who promises and performs, who decrees and accomplishes, for all thy words are faithful and just. Faithful art thou, Lord our God, and faithful are thy words, and not one of thy words shall return in vain, for thou art a faithful King. Blessed art thou, O Lord, thou art the faithful in thy words." "Have mercy upon Zion, for it is the dwelling of our life, and save speedily in our days the afflicted souls." Blessed art thou, O Lord, who will make Zion rejoice in her children. Cause us to rejoice, O Lord, our God, and let thy servants and the servants of thy house, the house of David thine anointed. May he speedily come and gladden our hearts. Let no stranger sit on his throne, and let others no longer inherit his glory, for thou hast sworn unto him by thy holy name that his light shall not be extinguished forever and ever. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the shield of David." "For the law, the divine service, the prophets, and for this day of rest" [or of memorial], this goodly day of holy convocation which thou hast given to us, O Lord, for sanctification and rest [on the Sabbath], for honor and glory; for all this, O Lord our King, we thank and praise thee. Let not the light of the moon, the moon of every living creature forever and ever. Thy word, O our King, is true, and will abide forever. Blessed art thou, King of the whole earth, who hast sanctified the Sabbath, and Israel, and the day of memorial." (Maimonides, ibid.).

After the Babylonian captivity, when the Hebrew language became an unknown tongue to the common people, an interpreter (עֲבָדֵי ה' בָּבֵל) stood at the desk by the side of those who read the lessons, and paraphrased the section from the law into Chaldee verse by verse, the reader pausing at every verse, whilst the lesson from the prophets he paraphrased three verses at a time (Mishna, Megilla, iv, 4); and Lightfoot is of opinion that this was the general custom so far as to this xii, 13 (see also, the Hanhavot, xii, 4, 5): The lesson from the law on these occasions rendered into Chaldee quite literally, owing to the fear which both the interpreters and the congregation had lest a free exposition of it might misrepresent its sense, whilst greater freedom was exercised with the lesson from the prophets. Hence loose paraphrases and lengthy expansions were tolerated and looked for both from the professional interpreter and those of the congregation who were called up to read, and who felt that they could do it with edification to the audience. The Sabbath lesson from the law was, as we have seen, divided into seven sections or chapters, each of which had at least three verses, according to the verses of those days, so that the whole consisted of at least twenty-one such verses. The lesson from the prophets was not portioned out to seven different individuals, but has also at least twenty-one verses (Mishna, Megilla, iv, 4), and therefore perhaps the division (baitzot, הביתות, in the Topkhiba, xii, 13). The lesson from the law for the Day of Atonement is divided into six chapters, for festivals into five, for new moon into four, and for Mondays and Thursdays into three chapters or sections. The number of persons called up to the reading of the law always corresponds to the number of sections. For Mondays and Thursdays, new moon, and the week days of the festivals (in the calendar), there are no corresponding lessons from the prophets (Mishna, Megilla, iv, 1-3).

4. The Origin of this Institution. — The origin of this custom may easily be traced. The Bible emphatically and repeatedly enjoins upon every Israelite to study its contents (Deut. iv, 9, xxxii, 46), Moses himself ordered that this should be done publicly at the end of every Sabbath year, xxxi, 10-13. And it does not seem that it should be studied day and night (b, comp. also Psa. i, 2 sq.). Now the desire to carry out this injunction literally, and yet the utter impossibility of doing it on the part of those who had to work for daily bread and support themselves and their families, necessarily required the invention of specially expensive scrolls, gave rise to this institution. On the Sabbath and festivals all were relieved from their labor, and could attend places of worship where the inspired writings were deposited, and where care could be taken that no private interpretation should be balm'd upon the Word of God. Hence both James (Acts xv, 21) and Josephus (Contra Apion, ii, 17) speak of it as a very ancient custom, and the Talmud tells us that the division of each Sabbath lesson into seven sections was introduced in honor of the Persian king (Megilla, 20), which shows that this custom obtained anterior to the sabbath rule. Indeed Maimonides quite freely asserts that Moses himself ordained the hebdomadal reading of the law (Hilchot Topkhiba, xii, 1). Equally natural is the division of the law into Sabbath sections, as the whole of it could not be read at once. The only difficulty is the question positively when the annual or the triennial division was the more ancient. A triennial division is mentioned in Megilla 29 b, as current in Palestine; with this agree the reference to 155 sections of the law in the Midrash, Esther 116 b, and the Masoretic division of the Pentateuch into 154 Stekarim. But, on the other hand, R. Simeon b. Eleazar, a Paltinum, declared that Moses instituted the reading of Lev. xxvi before the Feast of Pentecost, and Deut. xxviii before New Year, which most unquestionably presuppose the annual division of the Pentateuch into 54 Parshoth. This is, moreover, confirmed by the statement (ibid. 31 a) that the section יַעֲמֹר יְדֵי יְהוָה (Deut. xxxiii, 1-xxxiv, 12) was read on the ninth day of the Feast of Tabernacles, thus terminating the annual cycle, as well as by the fact that the annual festival of the rejoicing of the law נוֹרֵא נְשָׁר (i.e. Jonathan) which commemorates the annual finishing of the perusal of the Pentateuch [see Tabernacles, Feast of] was an ancient institution. We must therefore conclude that the annual cycle which is now prevalent among the Sopherim was one general division, for the Maimonides, whilst the triennial, though the older, was the exception. Usage, however, probably varied, for we find that our Saviour (Luke iv, 16-21), in accordance with this custom, on invitation read and expounded, apparently on a Sabbath in January, 1 a, a passage not contained at all in the present scheme of Haphtaroth.

It is far more difficult to trace the origin of the Haphtarot, or the lessons from the prophets, and its significance. A very ancient tradition tells us that the Syrians had interdicted the reading of the law, and carried away the sacred sections containing it, and that appropriate sections from the prophets were therefore chosen to replace the Pentateuch (Mishna, Gittin, ii, 9; Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vor., p. 5). While Elias Levia traces the origin of the Haphtarot to persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes. In his Leh. (s. בּוּד) he says, "The wicked Antiochus, king of Greece, prohibited the Jews to read the law publicly. They therefore began to interpret a certain number of chapters from the same import as the Sabbath lessons . . . and though this prohibition has now ceased, this custom has not been left off, and to this day we read a section from the prophets after the reading of the law," and we see no reason to reject this account. The objection of Vitringa, Frank, Hefter, etc., that Antiochus wished to exterminate Judaism, would not wage war against the Pentateuch exclusively, but would equally destroy the prophetic books, and that this implies a knowledge on the part of the soldiers of the distinction between the Pentateuch and the other inspired writings, is obviated by the fact that there was an external difference between the rolls of the Pentateuch and the other sacred books that the Jews claimed to be their law and rule of faith, and that this was the reason why it especially was destroyed. (The law has two rollers, i.e. has a roller attached to each of the two ends of the roll on which it is written, and every weekly portion when read on the Sabbath is unrolled from the right roller and rolled back on the left; so that when the law is opened on the next Sabbath the portion appointed for that day is at once found. Whereas the prophetic books have only one roller, and the lesson from the prophecies has to be sought out on every occasion [compare Baba Bathra, b. 83, 3].) This is corroborated by 1 Mac. i, 35, where the law only is said to have been burned. Accordingly ḡeḇiṣ, from ḡib, to liberate, to free, signifies the liberating lesson, the portion from the prophets which is read instead of the portion from the law that could not be read, and which liberates from the injunction of reading the Pentateuch. For the other opinions about the significance of Ḥophakharai, we refer to the literature quoted below.

Ha'ara (Heb. Ha'ara, חֶּרָא, a local name of a province of Assyria. We read that Tiglath-pileser "brought the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh unto Ha'ala, and Habor, and Ha'ara, and to the river Tigris" (1 Chron. vi, 26). The parallel passage in 2 Kings xviii, 11, omits Hara, and adds "in the cities of the Medes." Bochart consequently supposes that Hara was either a part of Media, or another name for that country. He shows that Herodotus (vii, 62) and other ancient writers call the Medes Arians, and their country Aria. He further supposes that the name Hara, which signifies mountainous, may have been given to that northern section of Media subsequently called by the Arabs El-gabal ("the mountains," see Bochart, Oppt., i, 184). The words Aria and Ha'ara, however, are totally different both in meaning and origin. The Medes were a very ancient and great Aryan family who came originally from India, and who took their name, according to Muller (Science of Language, p. 237 sqq., 2d ed.), from the Sanscrit word Arga, which means noble, "of a good family." Its etymological meaning seems to be "one who tills the ground," and it is thus allied to the Latin arane (see also Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, 401).

Hara is joined with Hala, Habor, and the river Gozan. These were all situated in Western Assyria, between the Tigris and Euphrates, and along the banks of the Khabur. We may safely conclude, therefore, that the region where the rivers have been far distant from that region. It is somewhat remarkable that the name is not given in either the Sept. or Peshito version. Some have hence imagined that the word was interpolated after these versions were made. This, however, is a rash criticism, as it exists in all Hebrew MSS., and also in Jerome's Latin version (see Robinson's Notes on Isaiah); and Grant's Notes on Jeremiah, p. 120. The conjecture that Hara and Haran are identical cannot be sustained, though the situation of the latter might suit the requirements of the Biblical narrative, and its Greek classical name (Carpes) resembles Hara. See Hara. The Hebrew words נַחֲרָא and חֶרָא are radically different. Hara may perhaps have been a local name applied to the mountainous region north of Gozan, called by Strabo and Ptolemy Mons Marixius, and now Karja Baghlar (Strabo, xvi, 23; Ptolemy, v, 18, 2).—Kittô, s. v.

Har'adah (Heb. with the article ha-Charadah, חַּרְדָּה, the height; Sept. Xarpados), the twenty-fifth station of the Israelites in the desert (Num. xxxvii, 24); perhaps at the head of the wady north-east of Jebel Araf in Nakhah, on the western brow of the high plateau east of Ain el-Mazen. See Exode.

Haram. See House.

Har'an appears in the Eng. Bible as the name of a place and also of three men, which, however, are represented by slightly different Hebrew words. See also Beth-Haran.

1. Haran (Heb. Haran', חַרְדָּן, mountainer; Sept. Ἀφίπαρος), probably the eldest son of Terah, brother of Abraham and Nahor, and father of Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. He died in his native place before his father Terah (an event that may in some degree have prepared the family to leave Ur), which, from the manner in which it is mentioned, appears to have been much a later case than the days that at the time of Gen 11, 27 sqq.). B.C. 2229–ante 2088.—Kitto. His sepulchre was still shown there when Josephus wrote his history (Ant. i, 6, 5). The ancient Jewish tradition is that Haran was burnt in the furnace of Nimrod for his waving conduct during the fiery trial of Abraham. See the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan, Jeroboam's Quelle, note on the notes thereto in the edition of Migne). This tradition seems to have originated in a translation of the word Ur, which in Hebrew signifies "fire." See Abraham.

2. Charan (Heb. Charan', חַרְדָּן, probably from the Arabic, parched; Sept. Xarpados, also Josephus, Ant. i, 16, 9, 5, where it is Anglicized and "Carrene" the name of the place where Abraham, after he had been called from Ur of the Chaldees, tarried till his father Terah died, when he proceeded to the land of Canaan (Gen. xi, 31, 38; Acts vii, 4). The elder branch of the family still remained at Haran, which led to the interesting journeys thither described in the patriarchal history (see Hauck, De profectibus Abrahami e Charris [Lips. 1754, 1770]—first, that of Abraham's servant to obtain a wife for Isaac (Gen. xxiv), and, next, that of Jacob when he fled to evade the wrath of Esau (Gen. xxviii, 10). It is said to be in Mesopotamia (Gen. xi, 10, or, more definitely, in Padan-Aram xxx, 20), which is the cultivated district at the foot of the hills (Staunley, Spr. and Pol, p. 129, note), a name well applying to the beautiful stretch of country which lies below Mount Masius, between the Khabour and the Euphrates. See Padan-Aram. Haran is enumerated among the towns which had been taken by the predecessors of Semancherib, king of Assyria (1 Kings xix, 12; Isa. xxxvii, 12), and it is also mentioned by Ezekiel (xxvii, 23) among the places which traded with Tyre. It is alluded to in the cuneiform inscriptions (q. v.). Jerome thus describes Haran: "Cvitana, a city of Mesopotamia beyond Eddessa, which to this day is called Charrwa, where the Roman army was cut off, and Crassus, its leader, taken" (Onomaix, s. v. Charran). Guided by these descriptions and statements, which certainly appear sufficiently clear, and in the geographical point of the most universally identified Haran with the Carra (Kaphrin) of classical writers (Herodian, iv, 18, 7; Ptol. v, 18, 12; Strabo, xvi, 747), and the Harrān of the Arabs (Schulten, Inde Geogr. in Vitam Salamini, s. v.). The plain bordering on this town (Ammian. Marc. xxiii, 9) is celebrated in the scene of a battle in which the Roman army was defeated by the Parthians, and the triumvir Crassus killed (Plin. v, 21; Dio Cass. xi, 25; Lucan. i, 104). Abulfeda (Tab. Sprir, p. 164) speaks of Haran as formerly a great city, which lay in an arid and barren tract of country in the province of Dair Modhar. About the time of the Christian era it appears have been included in the kingdom of Eueass (Mo. Chor. ii, 32), which was ruled by Argobus. Afterward it passed with that kingdom under the dominion of the Romans, and appears as a Roman city in the wars of Caracalla (Mo. Chor. i, 72) and Julianus (Io. Maj. l. p. 329). It is remarkable that the people of Harran remained to a late time the Chaldean language and the worship of Chaldean deities (Asemanni, Bibl. Or. i, 327; Chwolson’s ‘Sebrer und der Sebasinien’, ii, 39).

About midway in the district above designated is a town called Harras, which really seems never to have changed its appellation, and beyond any reasonable doubt is the Haran or Charran of Scripture (Bochart’s Thalag, i, 14; Edwald’s Geschichte, iii, 384). It is only peopled by a few families of wandering Arabs, who are led thither by a plentiful supply of water from several small streams. Its situation, by major Bennell as being twenty-nine miles from Orpha, and occupying a flat and sandy plain. It lies (according to D’Anville) in 36° 40’ N. lat., and 39° 2’ 45’’ E. long. (See Niebuhr, Travels ii, 410; Ritter, Erdk. x, 244; xi, 251; Cellier, Notiz ii, 728; Mannert, v, 280; Michaelis, Suppl. 39). The river, which stands on the few banks of a small stream called Belik, which flows into the Euphrates about fifty miles south of the town. From it a number of leading roads radiate to the great fords of the Tigris and Euphrates; and it thus formed an important station on the line of commerce between Central and Western Asia. The river was so named by the Greeks, because the Taurus came to it, and why it was mentioned among the places which supplied the flours of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii, 29). Cursus was probably marching along this great route when he was attacked by the Parthians. Dr. Beke, in his Origines Biblical (p. 122 sq.), remarks the somewhat startling statement that Haran must have been near Damascus, and that Aram-Naharah is the country between the Abana and Pharpar. After lying dormant for a quarter of a century, this theory was again revived in 1860. The Rev. J. L. Porter visited and described a small village in that plain, four hours east of Damascus, called Harran el-Awwamidt (‘Harran of the columns’). The description having met the eye of Dr. Beke (in Five Years in Damascus, i, 376), he at once concluded that this village was the site of the real ‘city of Nahor.’ He has since visited Harran el-Awwamidt, and travelled from it to Gilgal, and found that many remains in his way appear to stand alone. His arguments have not been sufficient to set aside the powerful evidence in favor of Harran in Mesopotamia. The student may see the whole subject discussed in the Athenaeum for Nov. 28, 30; Feb. 16, 1861; March 1, 22, 28; April 6, 19; and May 24, 1862; also in Stanley’s Lectures on the Jewish Church, i, 447 sq.

3. CHARAN (Heb. same as last, meaning here noble, according to Fürst; Sept. ἀριστής v. ἀριστός). The son of Caleb of Judah by his concubine Ephah, and father of Gazez (1 Chron. i, 46). I.C.C. between 1618 and 1085.

4. HANAN (Heb. same as No. 1; Sept. ἀριστής v. ἀριστός). One of the three sons of Shimee, a Levite of the family of Gershon, appointed by David to superintend the offices at the tabernacle (1 Chron. xxiii, 1). B.C. 1014.

HARARITE, the (Heb. always [except in 2 Sam. xxii, 11] with the art. ha-Ḥarari,חרארי, probably as natives of the mountains, but according to Fürst from some town of the name of Ḥaram). See David.

1. ἍΘΙΜΑ (ἐθίμα, the son of Agee) (2 Sam. xxiii, 11 [Sept. ἀριστής v. ἀριστός, Vulg. de Areari, A. V. ‘the Hararite’], 33 [Ἀριστήρα v. ἀριστοτήρα, ‘Aristotites’], which latter verse shows that it was a designation of the son and not of the father); a different person from the Harorite (q.v.) (1 Chron. xxi, 27), or ‘Shammah the Harorite’ (q.v.) (2 Sam. xxiii, 25). See Agee.

2. ‘JONATHAN [q.v.], the son of Shahage’ (1 Chron. xi, 34, Sept. ἄριστος, Vulg. Araritis), mentioned in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxiii, 32) without any such distinction. See SHAAGE.

3. ‘AKIM of the son of Sacar’ (1 Chron. xi, 35, Sept. ἄριστος v. ἀριστής, ‘Ariap, Vulg. Arurites’), or, in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxiii, 33), less accurately, ‘Ahiam, the [son of] Skurar [q.v.] the Ararite’ (Heb. with the art. ha-Ḥarari,חרארי, Sept. ἀριστήρα v. ἀριστός, etc., Vulg. Arorites, A.V. ‘the Hararite’). See SACAR.

Harbaugh, Henry, a prominent minister and writer of the German Reformed Church in the United States, was born Oct. 28, 1817, near Waynesborough, Pa. He was descended from a German family, whose name was Her- mach, and which had come to this country in 1736 from Switzerland. His father was an elder in the German Reformed Church at Waynesborough. In early youth he manifested a desire to study for the ministry, but his father was unwilling to allow him to do so. He therefore found employment first with a carpenter, and subsequently on a farm. At the same time he became a teacher in a primary school. The money saved in these positions enabled him to enter in 1840 Marshall College, Mercersburg, which was at that time under the direction of Dr. Nevin. Both the students’ societies of Mercersburg College desired to have him a member. "We have no money to remit," the German students said, "but we want to help you; the others have no religion." For Harbaugh this was a reason to join the other society, that they might have one to do the praying for them. His financial means did not allow him to finish his course in the college and the Theological Seminary. He spent two years in the former, and one in the latter. After having passed his examination, became in 1843 pastor of the congregation in Lewisburg. In 1856 he accepted a call from the congregation in Lancaster, which he left again in 1860 for Lebanon. In 1868 he was elected by the synod of the Reformed Church in America (two votes). At the time of his death he was editor of the Mercersburg Review, and also a regular contributor to the columns of the Reformed Church Messenger, which latter relation he sustained during the last six years. He was likewise the originator of the Guardian, and editor for seventeen years, to the close of 1866, during four of which it was published under the direction of the Board of Publication of the German Reformed Church. In addition to this, he furnished the reading matter for several almanacs published by this board, and edited the Church Review for the first year. For all after he came under the direct control of the Church Board.

Dr. Harbaugh also contributed a number of biographical articles to this Cyclopaedia. While, for the works thus far mentioned, he used the English language, he is also the author of several excellent poems in the German language, which, like many diatonic tunes, Harbaugh belong among the best that have ever been written in this dialect. In his theological views Harbaugh...

was one of the foremost representatives of the school which emphasizes the efficiency of the sacraments, and the priestly character of the ministry. In the Order of Wardens of the German Reformed Church, which was published in 1866, the burial service was from the pen of Harbaugh.

Harbo'na (Heb. Harbonah, נֵבָה, prob. Pers. for as-driver; Sept. Όαοβάνα v. r. Όαοβάνα), one of the seven eunuchs of king Ahasuerus or Xerxes, commanded by him to exhibit the beauty of Vashti (Esth. 1,10). He was probably the same with the one called Harbo'na (Heb. Harbonah, נֵבָה, ed.; Sept. changes to בָּרְדָות), who suggested to the king the idea of hanging Haman on his own gallows (chap. vili, 9). B.C. 498-473.

Hardenberg, Albrecht, an eminent divine, was born at Hardenberg, in Overwesel, 1510. While studying theology at Louvain, he imbibed the reformed theology, and became a friend and follower of Melanchthon, who sent him to Cologne. The disturbances there drove him to Basle, and in 1542 he was laced in the University of Basle to 1574. He is noted in Church History for his attempt, in 1566, to introduce into the republic of Bremen Calvin's doctrine respecting the Lord's Supper. For the controversy to which this gave rise, see Herzog, Reiff-Encyklopädie, s. v.; also Mosheim, Ch. Hist. Compar., sec. iii, pl. ii, ch. ii; Planck, Hist. Prot. Theol. vo. v.

Hardenberg, Jacobus Rutsen, D.D., an eminent minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Rosendale, N. Y., in 1737. His early opportunities of education were limited, but by persevering industry he became a very creditable scholar. He was ordained by the "Gesellschaft in 1757, and in the long strife between that party and the "Conferenties" in the Dutch Church, he sided with the former. His talents and reputation gave him great influence in the final settlement of these disputes. In 1758 he became pastor of the church at Karien, N. J. Queen's College (now Rutgers) obtained its charter in 1770. It languished during the Revolution, but was resuscitated, with Dr. Hardenberg at its head as president, in 1786. He died Oct. 20, 1790. — Sprague, Amnals, ix, 28. See Reformed (Dutch) Church.

Harding, Stephen, a religious reformer of the 12th century, of a noble English family. After making a pilgrimage to Rome, he entered the Benedictine convent of St. Claude de Joux. He subsequently was chosen abbot of the monastery of Bèze, with a view to the reformation of its discipline. From Bèze he was transferred to Citéaux, of which monastery he was elected abbot in 1109, on the death of Alberic. In 1119 he drew up, conjointly with St. Bernard (of Clairvaux) and other members of the brotherhood, the constitution of the Cisterian order, entitled Carta Caritatis. He remained at the head of the order until his death in 1134. See Cartierans. (A. J. S.)

Harding, Thomas, Jesuit, was born at Comb-Martins, Devonshire, England, in 1585, was educated at Barnstaple and Winchester, whence he was removed to New College, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1556. In 1542 he was chosen Hebrew professor of the university by Henry VIII; but no sooner had Edward VI ascended the throne, than Harding became a zealous Protestant. He seemed, indeed, merely to be restrained by prudence from proceeding to great extremes. In the country zealous Protestants were edified by his instructions. At Oxford, he himself received instruction from Peter Martyr. From St. Mary's pulpit he delivered the Trinitarian tracts, "polycytry," and inveighed against Romish peculiarities." On the accession of Queen Mary he became again a papist, and was made chaplain and confessor to Gardiner, bishop of Winchester. In 1555 he was made treasurer of the cathedral of Salisbury. "When Elizabeth came to the crown he could not muster face for a new recantation, and being deprived of his preferment, fled to Louvain, where it was opened to him. He died in 1567, and was buried in a warm controversy with bishop Jewel, against whom, between 1554 and 1567, he wrote seven pieces." He died in 1572. Hardouin (Hardunus), Jean, a Jesuit, one of the most learned, but most eccentric members of his order, was born A.D. 1646, at Quimper, in Brittany. His paradoxes on ancient history are well known, and had their origin chiefly in the vanity which prompted him to obtain celebrity at any cost. He endeavored to prove that the chrisi ascended his eth, and they attacked to Horace, were really composed by some monks during the Middle Ages! He edited an edition of the Councils to the year 1714 (12 vols. fol.), which is much esteemed. See Concilia. This may appear singular, considering that Hardouin looked upon all councils preceding that of Trier as spurious. Father EMS of the Oratory, knowing the opinions of the Jesuit on that point, asked him one day, "How did it happen that you published an edition of the Councils?" Hardouin answered, "Only God and I know that." He died at the College of St. Louis, Paris, Sept. 3, 1729. His most noted work is his Chronologie ex Nuptiis in Roman Catholica, instituto Prouto de Nunnis Herodiacum (Paris, 1659, 4to), in which he labors to show that, with few exceptions, the writings ascribed to the ancients are wholly spurious. He wrote also Chronologiae Velt. Testamenti (Paris, 1697, 4to). — Commentaria in Nov. Test. (Amst. 1741, fol.) — De ino Paradisi Terraequorum Disputatio (in his edict of Pinye): — Plinius Historiarum Naturalis (in the classinum classis); — Opera selecta (1709, fol.). His Opera Omnia (Amsterdam, 1758, fol.) contains some curious pieces, among which are his Pseudo-Virgins, Pseudo-Havvans, and his Pseudo-Theists. See Hardin, Anourlie, Pascal, Quesiel, Des Cartes, etc. A posthumous work of his, Prolegomena ad Consenrum Scriptorum Veterum (1766, 8vo), contains his full theory of the production of the classics by the monks of the Middle Ages. Hardwick, Charles, a minister of the Church of England, was born at Slingsby, Yorkshire, September 22, 1821. At fifteen years of age he became pupil assistant teacher in Thornton Grammar-school, and in 1838 he was made assistant tutor in the academy at Malton. In 1840 he entered the University of Cambridge (Catharine's Hall), graduating in 1844 as first senior optime. In 1845 he obtained a fellowship in Catharine's Hall; in 1851 he was appointed Cambridge preacher at the Chapel Royal, Westminster, and in 1856, perpetual curate in Queen's College, Birmingham, where he held only for a few months. In 1855 he was made lecturer in divinity in King's College, Cambridge, and "Christian Advocate." In fulfilling the latter office, he prepared a work (incomplete, but yet of great value to the new science of Comparative Theology), under the title Christ and other Masters; An Historical Inquiry into some of the chief Parallelisms and Contrasts between Christianity and the Religious Systems of the Ancient World (London and Cambridge, 2d edit. 1855, 2 vols. fcp. 8vo). During a summer tour he was killed by a fall in the Pyrenees, Aug. 18, 1859. His literary activity was of the very great, and it was accompanied by thorough scholarship and accuracy. Besides editing a number of works for the University press and for the Percy Society, he published the following, which are likely to hold a durable place in theological literature, viz., A History of the Thirty-nine Articles (Cambridge, 1851; 2d ed. revised, 1859; reprinted in Philadelphia, 12mo)—Twenty Sermons for Town Congregations (1853, 8vo)—A History of the Christian Church, Middle Age (Cambridge, 1853, 3d ed. revised, 8vo)—A History of the Christian Church during the Reformation (Cambridge, 1856, 3d ed. revised, 8vo).—Sketch prefixed to second edition of Christ and other Masters (1868).

Hardy, Nathaniel, D.D., an English divinity, was born in London in 1635, and became a Master of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and became rector of St. Dionis Biax, London. He was a decided Royalist, and yet remained a popular preacher during the Commonwealth. In 1660 he became archdeacon of Lewes and dean of Rochester. He died in 1670. His publications are, The first Epistle of John unfolded and applied (Lond. 1656, 4to)—Sermons on solemn Occasions (Lond. 1658, 4to)—Sermon on the Fire of London (Lond. 1666, 4to).—Darling, Cyclopa. Bibliographica, i, 1394.

Hardy, Robert Spence, an English Methodist missionary, was born at Preston, Lancashire, July 1, 1809, and was trained in the house of his grandfather, a printer and bookseller in York. In 1825 he was admitted to the British Conference, and appointed missionary to Ceylon, in which field he labored with great zeal for twenty-three years. In 1862 he was appointed superintendent of the South Ceylon Mission. To the ordinary labors of a missionary Mr. Hardy added an amount of literary activity sufficient to have occupied the whole life of an ordinary man. It is not too much to say that he and his colleague Gogerly (q. v.) have thrown more light upon the Buddhism of Ceylon, and upon Pali literature, than all other English writers. His culture, in the course of his studies, became wide; he read Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, Portuguese, and Sinhalese; and his acquaintance with the Pali and Sanskrit was not only large, but accurate. Towards the end of his life he returned to England, and served as minister on several important circuits. He died at Heddingley, Yorkshire, April 16, 1866. At the time of his mortal seizure he was engaged upon a work entitled Christianity and Buddhism compared. His most important publications are Eastern Monachism, an Account of the Origin, Laces, Discipline, Sacred Writings, etc., of the Order of Monks, or Jesuit Order founded by Gotama Buddha (London, 1856, 8vo)—A Manual of Buddhism in its Modern Development, translated from Sinhalese MSS. (Lond. 1858, 8vo)—The Legends and Theories of the Buddhists compared with History and Science (1867, cr. 8vo).—Wesleyan Minutes, 1898, p. 25.

Hardy, Samuel, an English divinity, was born in 1729, and educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He was for many years rector of Blakenham, Suffolk, and died in 1793. He published Nature and Ends of the Eucharist (London, 1784, 8vo)—Principal Prophecies of the O. and N. Test. compared and explained (London, 1770, 8vo)—Novum Testamentum cum scholii theologicae, etc. (3d ed. Lond. 1830, 2 vols. 8vo), the annotations in which are chiefly taken from Poodle's Synopsis.—Darling, Cyclopa. Bibliographica, i, 1395.

Hare ((gen. arneth; according to Bochart [Hieros. i, 994], from γαν, to crop, and κατά, fruit; Arab. ambëb and Syr. amnib, a hare; Sept. γαναριδας, vulgar. vulg. lagus and scaringulius, both versions interchanging it with cunremm) occurs in Lev. xi, 6, and Deut. xxv. 7, and in both instances it is prohibited from being used as food because it chews the cud, although it has not the hoof divided. But the hare belongs to an order of mammals totally distinct from the ruminants, which are all, without exception, herbivora, and whose hoof always offers a decided modification (Ehrenberg, Mammalia, pt. ii). The stomach of rodents is simple, and the motion of the mouth, excepting when they masticate some small portion of food re- served in the hollow of the cheek, is more that of the lips, when in a state of repose the animals are engaged in working the incisor teeth upon each other. This practice is a necessary condition of existence, for the friction keeps them fit for the purpose of nibbling, and prevents their growing beyond a proper length. As hares do not subsist on hard substances, like most of the genera of the order, but on tender shoots and grasses, they have more cause, and therefore a more constant craving, to shave their teeth; and this they do in a manner which, combined with the slight titration of the occasional contents of the cheeks, even modern writers, not zoologists, have mistaken for real ruminations.

Physiological investigation having fully determined these questions, it follows that both with regard to the shaphan ("coney") and the hare, we should understand the original in the above passages, rendered "chewing the cud," as merely implying a second mastication, more or less complete, and not necessarily that faculty of true ruminants which derives its name from a power to draw up aliment after deglutition, when worked into a ball, from the first stomach into the mouth, and there to submit it to a second grinding process. The act of "chewing the cud" and "re-chewing" being considered identical by the Hebrews, the sacred lawyer, not being occupied with the doctrines of science, no doubt used the expression in the sense in which it was then understood (compare Michaelis, Anmerk. ad loc.). It may be added that a similar opinion, and con-
Hare, Francis, bishop of Chichester, was born at London about 1665. He studied at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge; and, having been employed as tutor to lord Blandford, son of the duke of Marlborough, the latter caused him to be appointed general chaplain of the army. In consequence of services rendered to the Whig party, he was successively made dean of Worcester in 1708, of St. Paul's in 1726, bishop of St. Asaph in 1731, and transferred in the same year to the see of Chichester. He died in 1740. He wrote a work on  The Difficulties and Discrepancies attending the Study of the Scriptures in the Way of private Judgment, which was condemned for its tendency to scepticism. He is chiefly famous for his Book of Psalms, in the Hebrew, put into the original poetical Metre (Psalmorum Liber in Versiculis metrice Divinis, Lond. 1736, 8vo), an attempt, now deemed hopeless, to reduce Hebrew poesy to metre, in which he was defended by Dr. Edwards, and assailed by Dr. Lowth. His Works were published in 4 vols. 8vo (Lond. 1746), containing, besides the writings above named, a number of Sermons. See Chalmers, General Bioy. Dict.; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, l, 788.

Hare, Julius Charles, one of the brightest ornaments of the Church of England in the present century, was born Sept. 13, 1795, at Hurstmonceux, Sussex, his father being lord of the manor. After a brilliant preparation at the Charter House, he went to Cambridge in 1812, where he graduated B.A. 1816, M.A. 1819, and became fellow of Trinity. He was instituted to the rectory of Hurstmonceux (the advowson of which was in his own family) in 1822; was called to a prebend at Chichester in 1851; was appointed archdeacon of Lewes by bishop Otter in 1840; and nominated one of her majesty's chaplains in 1855. He died at the rectory, Jan. 29, 1855.

In 1827 he published the first edition of Guesseis at Truth, but his name was first distinguished in the literary world as one of the translators of Niebuhr's History of Rome, in conjunction with Mr. Connon Thirlwall, the present bishop of St. David's. Their version was made from the second German edition, which materially differed from the first, and it was first published in the year 1828. It extends to the first and second volumes only of the standard English edition; the third and fourth were translated by Dr. William Smith and Dr. Leonard Schack. In 1829 Mr. Hare published at Cambridge, A Vindication of Niebuhr's History of Rome from the Charges of the Quarterly Review. Archdeacon Hare's published works extend over a period of nearly thirty years. The most important of them are, The Children of Light: a Sermon preached before the University of Cambridge, 1828, 8vo;—Sermons preached before the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford (Feb. 1839);—The Victory of Faith, and other Sermons (Cambridge, 1840, 8vo);—The Better Prospects of the Church: a Charge (1840);—Sermons preached at Hurstmonceux Church (1841, 8vo); 2d ed. 1849);—The Unity of the Church: a Sermon preached before the Chichester Diocesan Association (1845, 8vo);—The Mission of the Comforter, and other Sermons, with Notes (1846, 2 vols. 8vo); Amer. ed. Boston, 1854, 12mo);—The Means of Unity: a Charge, with Notes, especially on the Institution of the Anglican Bishopric at Jerusalem (1847, 8vo) — A Letter on the Apostles' Creed, written by the Archbishop of Canterbury to Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford (1848, 8vo);—Life and Writings of John Sterling (1848, 2 vols. 12mo);—Guesseis at Truth, by two brothers (3d ed. 1848, 2 vols. 12mo);—The Conflict with Rome, especially in reply to Dr. Newman's Essay (Cambridge, 1852, 8vo);—Vindication of Luther (Lond. 1854, 8vo). This last is a book of vigorous controversy, and refutes, both on critical and moral grounds, the charges brought against the memory of Luther by Hallam, Newman, Ward, and Sir William Hamilton. These writers are handled by Hare with great, but not unjust severity. There are two admirable articles on Hare, giving a candid and judicious criticism of his career as philosopher, controversialist, and theologian, in the Methodist Quarterly Review, April and July, 1856;| reprinted by the author, Rev. J. H. Rigg, in his Modern Anglican Theology (London, 1858, 12mo). Harel (Heb. with the art. ha-Harel', הַחֲרֵל, the mount of God; Sept. Ῥαραή, Vulg. Arel, Engl. Vers. "the altar," marg. "Harel"), a figurative name for the altar of burnt-offering (Ezek. xliii, 15, first clause), called (in the last clause and in ver. 16) Arelt (Engl. Version also "altar")."

Junius explains it of the leporia or hearse of burnt-offering, cared for by the network on which the sacrifices were placed over the burning wood. This explanation Gesenius adopts, and brings forward as a parallel the Arab. irveh, "a hearse or fire-place," akin to the Heb. זַנָּה, uz, "fight, flame." First (Handb. s. v.) derives it from an unused root נָרָה, darâ, "to glow, burn," with the termination -eth; but the only authority for the root is its presumed existence in the word Harel. Ewald (Die Propheten des A. L., i, 378) identifies Harel and Ariel, and refers them both to a root נָרָה, darâ, akin to זַנָּה, uz, "fight, flame."

Haren, Jean de, a Belgian theologian, was born at Valenciennes about 1540. While yet a youth he went to Geneva, where he was well received by Calvin. He was present at the death-bed of the reformer (1564), and was for eighteen years a Protestant minister in several cities. He finally joined the Roman Catholic Church at Antwerp, March 3, 1586, and preached at Venlo, Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, Nancy, etc. He returned to Calvinism in 1610, and died about 1620. He wrote Brief Discours des causes justes et équitiés qui ont menées M. Jean Haren, jadis ministre, de quitter la religion protestante et se ranger au giron de l'Église catholique, etc. (Anvers, 1587, 12mo)—thirteen Catechismes contre Calvin et les calvinistes (Nancy, 1599, 12mo)—Profession catholique de Jean Haren (Nancy, 1599, 12mo)—Épitre et Demande chrestienne de Jean Haren à Ambroise Wille, ministre des étrangers veuils retirés en la ville d'Aix-la-Chapelle (Nancy, 1599, 12mo) —See Cambes, Bibl. de Lorraine, p. 479; Hoefer, Nouv. HARLOT count all of the synos held by his predecessors. See Legendre, Vie de Harlay (Par. 1720, 4to); Sévigné, Let-

Haret, whose, etc., are terms used somewhat promiscuously in the Auth. Vers. for several Heb. words of widely different import.

1. Properly יִמָּזְרוּ (yimzreu), participle from יִמָּזֵר (yimser), to play the harlot, Sept. ξανδρός, Vulg. meretricis, both these latter terms referring to prostitution for meretricious motives), which occurs from time to time in Greek literature, and is otherwise found only in the New Testament. The adjective is the first of the above English words, as in (Gen. xxxiv, 31, etc., and sometimes, without apparent reason for the change, by the second, as in Prov. xxiii, 27, and elsewhere. In Gen. xxxviii, 15, the word is the

"harlot," which, however, becomes changed to מִכּוּרָה, "harlot," in vers. 21, 22, which means, literally, a concubine, a female (perhaps priestess) devoted to prostitution in honor of some heathen idols. The distinction shows that Judah supposed Tamar to be a heathen, if the facts, therefore, do not prove that prostitution was then practiced between Hebrews.

That this condition of persons existed in the earliest states of society is clear from Gen. xxxviii, 15. From that account it would appear that the custom was a thing peculiar to harlots. Judah thought Tamar to be such "because she had covered her face." Mr. Buckingham remarks, in reference to this passage, that "the Turoman women go unveiled to this day" (Travel in Mesopotamia, ii, 77). It is contended by Jahn and others that in ancient times all females wore the veil (Joh. Archseol. p. 127). Possibly some peculiarity in the size of the veil, or the mode of wearing it, may have been (Prov. vii, 10) the distinctive dress of the harlot at that period (see New Translation, by the Rev. A. De Sola, etc., p. 116, 248-9). The priests and the high-priests were forbidden to take a wife that was a harlot (Lev. xxi, 14) a harlot. Josephus extends the law to all the Hebrews, and seems to ground it on the prohibition against obligations arising from prostitution, Deut. xxiii, 18 (Am. iv, 23). The celebrated case of Rahab has been much debated. She is, indeed, called by the word usually signifying harlot (Josh. ii, 1; vi, 11; Sept. first, Vulg. meretricis: and in Heb. xi, 31; James ii, 25; but it has been attempted to show that the word may mean an innkeeper. See Rahab. If, however, there were such persons, considering what we know of Canaanitish moral morality (Lev. xxii, 27), we may conjecture that they would, if anything, have been of this class. The next instance introduces the epithet of strange woman. It is the case of Jephthah's mother (Judg. xii, 2), who is also called a harlot (σεξπτή, meretricis; but the epithet θέρειν (acherei), strange woman, merely denotes foreign extraction. Josephus says Σωτος τύχη μερετριται, a stranger by the mother's side. The passage in Prov. vii, 6, etc., may possibly be that of an abandoned married woman (ver. 19, 20), or of the solicitations of a courtesan, fair speech," according to a certain pretension. The mixture of religious observances (ver. 14) seems illustrated by the fact that "the gods are actually worshiped in many Oriental broths, and fragments of the offerings distributed among the frequenters" (Dr. A. Clarke's Comment, ad loc.). The representation given by Solomon is no doubt founded upon facts, and therefore shows that in his time prostitutes plied their trade in the "streets" (Prov. vii, 12; ix, 14, etc. Jer. iii, 2; Ezek. xvi, 43, 25, 31). These conclusions are supported by the factious involved in the practise, similar outward marks seem to have attended its earliest forms to which we trace in the classical writers, e. g. a distinctive dress and a seat by the way-side (Gen. xxxix, 14; compare Ezek. xvi, 16, 25; Bar. vi, 43; Petenor. Arch. Sivi. xvi, Juv. vii, 8; Euseb. 16, 31, 31). Public singing in the streets occurs also (Isa. xxxii, 16; Ecclus. ix, 4). Those who thus published their infamy were of the worst repute; others had houses of resort, and both classes seem to have been known among the Jews (Prov. vii, 8-12; xxxii, 28; Ecclus. ix, 7, 8); the two women, i Kings iii, 16, lived as Greek hetaerae sometimes did, in a house together (Smith, Dict. Or. and Roman Ant. s. v. Hetera). The heathen and the harlot are described to them in Prov. vii, 21-23, may be compared with what Chardin says of similar effects among the young nobility of Persia (Voyages en Perse, i, 163, ed. 1711), as also may Luke xv, 30, for the sums lavished on them (ii, 162). In every instance the price of a kid is mentioned (Gen. xxviii, 18), and one great advantage of the doublet is sometimes ascribed to them (Ezek. xvi, 33, 39; xxii, 26). But lust, as distinct from gain, appears as the inducement in Prov. vii, 14, 15 (see Douce's Anal. Sacra, ad loc.), where the victim is further allured by a promised sacrificial banquet. Hence in the Talmud it is said that the "harlot" are classed with "publicans," as those who lay under the ban of society in the N. T. (Matt. xxxii, 29). No doubt they multiplied with the increase of polygamy, and consequently lowered the estimate of marriage. The corrupt practices imported by Gentile converts into the Church occurred among most of the other heathen nations. As regards the false allusions to the subject there occur, I Cor. v, 1, 9, 11; 2 Cor. xii, 21; 1 Thess. iv, 3; 1 Tim. i, 10. The decree, Acts xxv, 39, has occasioned doubts as to the meaning of τυρπάσσα there, chiefly from its context, which may be seen at length in Day's Die Wissenschaft, Sacra ii, 470; sqq.; Schmoller, Alterth. ii, 489, 498. The prophetic allusions, esp. in 1 and 21, and Hammond, ad loc. The simplest sense, however, seems the most probable. The children of such persons were held in contempt, and could not exercise privileges nor inherit (John viii, 41; Deut. xxiii, 2; Judg. xii, 1, 2). The term "harlot" is not, however, applied to any illegitimate offspring born out of wedlock, but is restricted by the Rabbis to the issue of any connection within the degrees prohibited by the law. A mazmér, according to the Mishna (Yebamoth, iv, 13), is one, says R. Akiba, who is born of relations between whom marriage is forbidden. Since the Talmud says it is the same whose parents are liable to the punishment of "cutting off" by the hands of Heaven; R. Joshua, every one whose parents are liable to death by the house of judgment, as, for instance, the offspring of adultery. On the general subject, Michaelis's Laws of Moses, b. v. art. 268; Selden, De Lex. Hebr. i, 16; iii, 12; and De Jur. Natur., v, 4, together with Schiftgen, and the authorities there quoted, may be consulted.

The words בְּנֵיהֶּן (benēn) A. V. "and they washed his armor" (I Kings xxxii, 39), should be, "and the harlot washed," which is not only the natural rendering, but in accordance with the Sept. and Josephus.

Since the Hebrews regarded Jehovah as the husband of his people, by virtue of the covenant he had made with them (Jer. iii, 1), therefore to commit fornication is a very common metaphor in the Scriptures to denote defection on their part from that covenant, and especially by the practice of idolatry. See FORNICATION. Hence the depiction of Jerusalem is illustrated by the symbol of a harlot (Isa. i, 21), and even that of heathen cities, as of Nineveh (Nah. iii, 4). Under this figure the prophet Ezekiel delivers the tremendous invectives contained in chaps. xvi, xxiii. In the prophecy of Hosea the illustration is carried to a startling extent. The prophet seems compelled by the Lord to "take a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms" (i, 2), and "to love an adulteress" (iii, 1). It has, indeed, been much disputed whether these transactions were real, or passed in vision only; but the idea itself, and the diversified applications of it throughout the prophecy, render it one of the most effective portions of Scripture. See HOSHEA.

2. בְּנֵיהֶּנ (benehen), from בְּנֵי (bnei), to consecrate, occurs (Gen. xxxviii, 15, 21, 22; Deut. xxiii, 17; Hos. iv, 14). It has already been observed that the proper meaning of the word is consecrated prostitute. The very early harlot to such persons, in the first of these passages, agrees with the accounts of them in ancient heathen writers. Herodotes refers to the "abominable custom of the Babylonians, who compelled every native female to attend the temple of Venus once in her life, and to perform certain ceremonies of a disgraceful nature" (i. 19; Pau-the transaction related in Numb. xxv, 1-15 (comp. Num. xxvi, 100); seems connected with idolatry.

with the deities of the worship of Jehovah (see other allusions, Job xxvi, 14; 1 Kings xiv, 24; xx, 12). The law forbids (Lev. xix, 29) the father's compelling his daughter to sin, but does not mention the case of a maid of fifteen as many.., a circumstance of the Dei, ii, 4, whose votaries, as idolatry progressed, would be recruited from the daughters of Israel; hence the common mention of both these sins in the Prophets, the one, indeed, being a metaphor of the other (Deut. xxii, 13, 29; Jer. ii, 20; Ezek. xxiii, 15; Jer. iii, 1, 2, 6; Hos. i, 2; ii, 4, 5; iv, 11, 13, 14, 15; v, 3). The latter class would grow up with the growth of great cities and of foreign intercourse, and hardly could enter into the view of the Mosiac institute.

3. "I will open thine eyes" (Heb. xx, 34, 35) from "I will open thine ears," the strange woman." (1 Kings xi, 2; Prov. vi, 24; viii, 3; xxii, 27; Song of Sol. ii, 4; Song of Sol. viii, 2; Prov. xxiv, 1, 2; Prov. xxvii, 13-15; I. 199; He-

14, and of particular portions of both. Harmonies of the Old Testament exhibit the books disposed in chronological order, as in the Life of the Author in his Introduction to the Old Testament, and by Townsend in his Old Testament arranged in historical and chronological order. Harmonies of the New Testament present the gospels and epistles distributed in like order, the latter being interspersed among the Acts of the Apostles. In this way Townsend has proceeded in his valuable work entitled The New Testament arranged in chronological and historical order. Books, however, of this kind are so few in number that the term harmony is almost appropriated by usage to the gospels. It is this part of the New Testament which has chiefly occupied the attention of those inquirers whose object is to arrange the Scriptures in their true order. The memoirs of our Lord written by the four evangelists have chiefly occupied the thoughts of those who wish to show that they all agree, and mutually authitute one another. Accordingly, such compositions are called Concordances. The four generalists narrate the principal events connected with our Lord's abode on earth, from his birth to his ascension. There must therefore be a general resemblance between them, though that of John contains little in common with the others, being apparently compiled from the xv, 14. The description in Prov. xiv, 14, etc. illustrates the character of the female so designated. To this may be added דָּלָה (ra, wrong), "the evil woman" (Prov. v, 24).

In the New Testament פְּרָע occurs in Matt. xxii, 31, 32; Luke xv, 30; 1 Cor. vi, 15, 16; Heb. xii, 31; James ii, 25. In none of these passages does it necessarily im-

the difficulty of weaving the accounts of the four into a continuous and chronological history. Those portions of the gospels that relate to the resurrection of the Savour have always presented the greatest obstacles to the compilers of harmonies, and it must be candidly admitted that the accounts of this remarkable event are not easily reconciled. Yet the labors of West and Townson, especially the latter, have served to remove the apparent contradictions. In addition to them may be mentioned Cranfield and Hales, who have endeavored to improve upon the attempts of their predecessors. See Diatessaron.

In connection with harmonies the term diatessaron frequently occurs. It denotes a continued narrative selected out of the four gospels, in which all repetitions of the same or similar words are avoided. It is thus the result of a harmony, since the latter, properly speaking, exhibits the entire texts of the four evangelists arranged in corresponding columns. In popular language the two are often used synonymously. See DIATES-

1. Have all or any of the evangelists observed chronological arrangement in their narratives? It was the opinion of Osianer and his followers that all the evangelists had faithfully kept the true order. When, therefore, the same transactions are placed in a different order by the writers, they were supposed to have happened more than once. It was assumed that they took place as often as they were differently arranged. This principle is too improbable to receive refutation, for if even the best of the evangelists failed to solve difficulties, it boldly meets them with a clumsy expedient. Improbable, however, as the hypothesis is, it has been adopted by Macknight. It is our decided conviction that all the evangelists have not adhered to chronological arrangement.

2. When such arrangements have all neglected the order of time? Newcome and many others espouse this view. "Chronological order," says this writer, "is not precisely observed by any of the evangelists; John and Mark observe it most, and Matthew neglects it most." Bish-

3. Bishops Marsh supposes that Matthew probably adhered to the other time, but that the latter is imperceptible because he was blind to the facts of the truth, the facts he, therefore, neglected the succession of events. The reason assigned by the learned presbyter in favor of Matthew's order is of so weight as long as the inspiration of Mark, Luke, and John. If the events were infallibly directed in their compositions, they were in a condition equally favorable to chronological narration. A close inspection of Matthew's Gospel will show that he did not intend to mark the true succession of events. He gives us no definite expressions to assist in arranging his materials in their proper order. Very frequently he passes from one occurrence to another without any note of time; sometimes he employs a rōs, sometimes in ταίς ημέρας κείμενον, ἐν κείμενῳ τῷ καιρῷ, ἐν κείμενῳ ἐν τῷ φως. Rarely is he so minute as to use μὲν ἡμέρας ἐκ (xviii, 1). In short, time and place seem to have been almost forgotten to them as the principal object of his attention. Chronological order is not observed in his gospel, except as far so that gospel agrees with Luke's. Yet Cartwright, in his Harmony, published about 1850, makes the arrangement of Mark his rule for method. With regard to Luke, it is probable that he intended to arrange everything in its true place, because at the beginning of his work he employs the term καθηκόν. This word is frequently referred to as a term without involving time; but it seems clearly to imply chronological succession (compare Acts xi, 4). Although, therefore, Grotius and many others oppose the latter view, we cannot but coincide with Beza when he says: "In harmonia Evangelistarum scrinia, rectorem ordinem servavit, ut si in quibusque ejus scripturis reliquit ad Lucam potius accommodetur, quam Lucas ad ceteros" (comp. also Olshausen, Die Echtheit der vier Canon, Excav., etc., i, 82-3, 3d ed.). We may therefore conclude that this evangelist usually follows the chronological order, especially when such passages as iii, 1 and iii, 29, are considered, where exact notes of time occur. But as the gospel advances, those expressions which relate to time are as indeterminate as Matthew's and Mark's. Frequently does he pass from one transaction to another without any note of time; and again, he has μεν ραχα, ἐν μεν κείμενῳ τῷ καιρῷ. It is very difficult, if not impossible, to make out a complete harmony of the gospels according to the order of Luke, because we have no precise data to guide us in inserting the particulars related by Matthew and Mark in their proper places in the third gospel. All that can be determined is that the probability is that Luke's order seems to have been adopted as the true, chronological one. Whether the writer has deviated from it in any case may admit of doubt. We are inclined to believe that in all minute particulars chronological arrangement is not observed. The general body of facts and events seems to make a break of this character, not every special circumstance noticed by the evangelist. But we are reminded that the assignment of dates is distinct from chronological arrangement. A writer may narrate all his facts in the order in which they occurred, without specifying the particular time at which they happened; or, on the other hand, he may mark the dates without arranging his narrative in chronological order. But attention to one of these will naturally give rise to a certain opinion with regard to the other. The more indeterminate the notation of time, the less probable it is that time was an element kept before the mind of the writer. If there be a few dates assigned with exactness, there is a presumption that the true arrangement is observed in other parts where no dates occur. In the succession of events Luke and Mark generally agree.

With regard to John's Gospel, it has little in common with the rest except the last two chapters. It is obvious, however, that his arrangement is chronological. He carefully marks, in general, whether one, two, or three days happened between certain events. His gospel is therefore of great use in compiling a synopsis.

It thus appears that no one gospel taken singly is sufficient to form a guide for the Gospel harmonist; nor is he justified in selecting any one evangelist as a general guide, modifying that single narrative only as absolutely demanded by the statements of the other three. He must place them all together, and select from them the occurrences in each particular case may require. Of course he will take definite notes of time as a peremptory direction wherever they occur, and in the absence of these he will naturally follow the order of the majority of the Gospel narratives. Nor in this matter is he at liberty, as Stier has too often among others. (Words of Jesus, Am. ed., i, 31), to prefer one evangelist's authority to another, e.g. Matthew or John to Mark or Luke, on the ground that the former were apostles and the latter not, for they are all equally inspired. Again, the same liberty or discretion that is called for in arranging the oracles and journeys of our Lord must be exercised in adjusting his words and teachings; that is, the simple juxtaposition of passages is not absolute evidence of coincidence in time and immediate connection in utterance without some express intimation to that effect; so that incoherence, where palpable, or want of unanimity in this particular among the Gospel reports or summaries them- selves, is the strongest harmonizer that exercise the same judgment in the adjustment as in other particulars. (See the Meth. Quart. Review, Jan. 1864, p. 79.) With these points premised and duly observed, there is no greater difficulty in adjusting the four accounts of our Lord’s life and teaching with a reasonable degree of certainty than there would be in harmonizing into one consistent account the separate and independent depo- sitions of as many honest witnesses in any case of law. The real only questions of serious dispute in fact, aside from the main one presently to be mentioned, are those of a purely chronological character affecting the genuine- date of Christ’s ministry as a whole, and the particular spot where certain incidents or discourses transpired; the relative order and position of nearly everything is but little disturbed by the various theories or views as to even these points. Hence is evident the rashness of those who attempt to set Stier [Pref. to Matt. and Mark, in Words of Jesus], that the construction of a Harmony of the Gospels is impracticable; for in the very same work he forthwith proceeds to construct and publish one himself!

2. What was the duration of our Lord’s ministry? This is a question upon which the opinions of the learned have been much divided, and which cannot be settled with conclusive certainty. In order to resolve it, it is necessary to mark the different Passovers which Christ attended. Looking to the gospels by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, we should infer that he was present at no more than two: the first at the time of his baptism, the second immediately before his crucifixion. But in John’s gospel three Passovers at least are named during the period of our Lord’s ministry (ii, 13; vi, 4; xii, 55). It is true that some writers have endeavored to adapt the gospel of John to the other three by rectifying the Pass- overs mentioned in the former to two. So Priestley, Vossius, and Mann. In order to accomplish this, it was conjured that παραγη, in ch. vi, 4, is an interpolation, and then that ἱπποτήριον denotes some other Jewish festival. Bishop Pearce went so far as to conjecture that the enti- re period of the Passover was interpolated, but these rash speculations there is no authority. The received reading must now be followed (Litchte’s Commentar über Johannes, 3d ed. ii, 104). In addition to these passages, it has been thought by many that another Passover is referred to in the raising of Lazarus (John xi, 1); although, as Umbach does not occur, ἱπποτήριον is supposed to denote the same feast. But this is a subject of dispute. Ireneaus is the oldest authority for explaining it of the Passover. Cyril and Chrysostom, however, referred it to the Feast of Pentecost, an opin- ion approved of by Erasmus, Calvin, and Beza; but Luther, Chemnitius, Calovius, Scaliger, Grotius, and Lightfoot returned to the ancient view of Ireneaus. Kepl er seems to have been the first who conjectured that it meant the Feast of Purim immediately preceding the second Passover. He was followed by Petavi, Lamy, D’Orelli, Dacier, Succacius, followed by Kaiser, referred to it the Feast of Teepemades; while Kepl er and Pe- tau intim ated that it may possibly have been the Feast of Dedication. Bengel defended the opinion of Chry- sostom; while Hug, with much plausibility, endeavors to show that it alludes to the feast of Purim immedi- ately preceding the Passover. The latter view is adopted by Tholuck, Olschhausen, and Clasius, though Greswell and others maintain that the Passover is meant. It would occupy too much space to adumbrate the various considerations that have been urged for and against the two leading opinions, viz. the Passover and the Feast of Purim. The true account of the latter is negligently omis- sed the article from before it; see Tischendorf, Nov. Test. 7th ed. ad loc.), is still indeterminate (see especially Alford, Gr. Test. ad loc.). To us it appears most prob- able that the most ancient hypothesis is correct, al- though the circumstances urged against it are neither few nor feeble. The following arguments, however, seem to determine the question in favor of the Passover: 1. Had any less noted festival been meant, it would, as in other cases, have been named by Christ, or在他者 have been specified; but in the present case not even the article was required to distinguish it; whereas John in one instance only (vi, 4) uses παραγη to qualify a following ἱπποτήριον, when the latter is thus defined by ἱπποτήριον. 2. The en- suing Sabbath (John vii, 41), when Luke vii. 51, may be that which was second after the offering of the wave- sheaf, and first after the Passover-week, and, however interpreted, shows that a Passover had just preceded, for the harvest was just ripe. See Passover.

Sir Isaac Newton and Macknight suppose that free use has been made between our Lord’s ministry and the Passover. This assumption rests on no foundation. Perhaps the term ἱπποτήριον in John vii, 2 may have given rise to it, although ἱπποτήριον is explained in that passage by ἱπποτήριον.

During the first three centuries it was commonly be- lieved that Christ’s ministry lasted but one year, or one year and a few months (Routh, Reliq. Stor. iv, 218). Such was the opinion of Clemens Alexandrinus (Stro- mata, i, 21; vi, 11) and Origen (de Principii, iv, 5). Eusebius thought that it continued for about three years, which hypothesis became general. The ancient hypothesis is supported by the time to which the parables were attributed. These were vouched for by Mann and Priestley; but Newcome, with more judgment, defended the common view, and refuted Priestley’s arguments. The one-year view has found few late advocates except Jarvis (intro. to History of Church) and Browne (ordo Sacrorum). It has been well remarked by bishop Marsh that the Gospel of John presents almost insuperable obstacles to the opinion of those who confine Christ’s ministry to one year. If John mentions but three Passovers, its duration must have exceeded two years; but if he mentions four, it must have been longer than one. In any case, during the gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke with that of John, the intervals between the Passovers are filled up by various transactions. Were the number of these feasts determinate and precise, there would be a general agreement in the filling up of the times between them; but in consequence of the uncertainty attaching to the subject, Harmonies are found materially to differ in their modes of arrangement. One thing is evident, that the moderns, in their endeavors after a chronological disposi- tion of the gospels, adopt a far more rational course than the ancients. The latter strangely supposed that the first account of Christ’s ministry had been a period of Christ’s ministry prior to that with which the other three evangelists begin their accounts of the miracles. Thus John alone was supposed to narrate the events be- longing to the earlier part of his ministry, while Matthew, Mark, and Luke related the transactions of the last year.

The most ancient Harmony of the Gospels of which we have any account was composed by Tatian of Syria in the 2d century, but it is now lost (see H. A. Daniel’s Tattiani der Apologisten. Halle, 1867, 8vo). In the 3d century, Ambrose was the author of a Harmony supposed to be still extant. Eusebius of Cesarea also com- posed a Harmony of the Gospels about A.D. 315. In it he divided the Gospel history into ten canons or tables, according as different facts are related by one or more of the evangelists. These ancient Harmonies, however, differ in consequence of the uncertainty attaching to the subject. They are summaries of the life of Christ, or indexes to the four gospels, rather than a chronological arrange- ment of different facts, accompanied by a reconciliation of apparent contradictions. (See Scrivener, intro. to Hist. of the N. T. p. 60.) The oldest writer who published his Harmony of the Gospels in 1587. He adopted the principle that the evangelists constantly wrote in chronological order. Cornelius Jansenius’s Concordia
COMPARATIVE TABLE OF DIFFERENT HARMONIES.

Note.—This Table comprises only a few of those adjustments of the Gospels (whether tabular or in full), which have become best known in America. The figures refer to the sections as they are numbered in Strong's Harmony, and their order in each column shows the relative position assigned by the several authors to the corresponding events. An asterisk [] points out a marked difference from the arrangement of the same text in the particular Harmony. A double dagger [††] indicates a clear repetition of some of the prominent incidents in another place; a double dagger [][][] is prefixed to those sections in the arrangement of which the majority of harmonizers coincide; and parallels [†] are set to those concerning the position of which there is little or no dispute.

Evangelica was published in 1849. Martin Chemitz's Harmony was first published in 1555, and afterwards, with the continuations of Leyer and Gerhard, in 1628. Chemitz's Harmony was the first that class of harmonists who maintain that in one or more of the four gospels chronological order has been neglected, while Osiander is the head of those harmonists who maintain that all the gospels are arranged in chronological order. Other harmonies were published by Stephens (1553), Calvin (1558), Calix (1558), Osiander (1567), Cluster (1568), Lightfoot (1554), Cradock (1668), Calov (1690), Sandburg (1848), Bunting (1689), Lamy (1689), Le Clerc (1699), Toinard (1707), Whiston (1702), Burmann (1712), Russ (1727–8–30), Bengel (1756), Hauber (1757), Büsching (1766), Dodriddle (1789 and 40), Filkington (1747), Macknight (1756), Burting (1767), A. Eschbach (1776, 1789, 1809, 22), Newcome (1783), Priestley (1777 in Greek and 1780 in English), Michaelis (1788, in his Introduction), White (1789), Keller (1802), Mutschelle (1806), Sebastiani (1806), Planck (1809), De Wette and Lücke (1818), Hess (1829), Matthaei (1829), Kaiser (1829), Rodiger (1829), Clausen (1830), Nowack (1838), Carpenter (1838), Reischel (1840), Gehring (1842), Overbeck (1843), Robinson (Greek, 1845; English, 1846).

Harms, Claus, a German revivalist, was born at Fahrstadt, in Holstein, May 25, 1778. He showed at an early age signs of a deep and devotional piety. He made rapid progress at school, and at eighteen entered the University of Kiel. Young and ardent, the skeptical spirit of the time could not but have some effect on him; its influence, however, was counteracted by Schleiermacher's Reden ib. d. Religion, which brought him back to the simple faith of childhood, from whence he never afterwards strayed. In 1802 he passed his examination in theology, and in 1806 was appointed professor in Lunden. The fame of his talent as a preacher, and of his devotion to pastoral labor, soon spread abroad. His first publication was Winter-Postille (Kiel, 1808), which was followed by Summer-Postille (Kiel, 1809). Two more postils, published byHamberg, and afterwards ran through many editions. In 1816 he was appointed archdeacon of St. Nicholas at Kiel. In this position he was at first highly esteemed, and afterwards bitterly opposed on account of his so-called Pietism. The opposition against him culminated at the occasion of the jubilee of the Reformation held in 1817. It became daily more apparent to him that the Church in Germany was steadily receding from the principles of the Reformation and of the Holy Scriptures. He therefore gave out that he was prepared at any time to sustain, demonstrate, and defend Luther's 95 theses, with 95 additional ones of his own, and to engage in controversy with him. His first point, "When our Lord Jesus Christ says 'repent,' he means that we shall conform to his precepts, not that his precepts shall be conformed to us, as is done in our days to suit the public mind," was striking at the very root of the then widely spread religious indifference. The discussions which ensued gave rise to a vast number of publications, many of which were very bitter. The effect, on the whole, was a deep awakening in the Church. The theological faculty of Kiel, with which, except the celebrated Kleuker and Zweiten, had bitterly opposed Harms, was in after years almost exclusively brought over to his side. His publications after this (showing his theological views more fully) include the following, viz., Predigten (1820, 1822, 1824, 1827, 1838, 1852) —Religionsanweisungen der Lutherschen Kirche (1809) —Christliche Gläube (1830—1834) —Vatervolk (1838) —d. Bergrede d. Herrn (1841) —d. O.Jennerung Johannis (1844) —Reden an Theologiestudenten (3 vols.; i, d. Prediger; ii, d. Priest; iii, d. Pastor, Kiel, 1830—34). Many beautiful hymns by Harms may be found in the Gesänge f. d. gemeine Unterricht in die Gemeinde Ausdacht (1841). In 1841, on the 25th anniversary of his entering on his pastoral duties at Kiel, a great jubilee was held there, and a fund having been formed to defray his travelling expenses, he was named "Oberconsistorialrath." His eyesight failed him a few years after, but he still continued writing, and published a revised edition of his works (1851). He died peacefully Feb. 1, 1855. See Harms' Selbst-biographie (Jena, 1818); Reuter's Repertorium (1849); Baumgarten's Ein Denkmal f. C. Harms (1855); Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, v, 567.

Harms, Louis, usually known as Pastor Harms, one of the most eminent among the Lutheran pastors in Germany.

He was born in Herrnsburg, in the kingdom of Hanover, March 1, 1748. His father was pastor of the church in Herrnsburg before him, and was remarkable for the strict discipline of his family.

As a boy, Louis excelled all his comrades in wrestling, boxing, and other athletic sports. He prepared for the university at the gymnasium of Celle, completing the course in two years. From 1827 till 1830 he studied at the University of Gottingen with signal arder and success. He was expelled from theology at this time partly on account of the most efficient advertisement of his motto: "I shall never in my life," said he, "know what fear was, but when I came to the knowledge of my sins, then I quaked before the wrath of God, so that my limbs trembled." A Christian hope soon took complete and ever-increasing possession of his mind, and in 1844 we find him engaged, in preaching at Herrnsburg, beginning his labors as an assistant to his father.

With the settlement of this young minister, a mighty influence began to go forth from the little German village, which soon changed the aspect of the country around, so that he who had been a hermit in the mist of the world, found himself to be virtually the pastor of a region ten miles square, containing seven villages, which in an incredibly short time he brought into a state of working religious activity.

And now, having regulated affairs immediately around him, this extraordinary man began to feel the care of the whole world upon his mind. He felt responsible even for Africa and the East Indies. But how to bring the moral force of his little German village to bear upon the continent of Africa was the problem. The result formed one of his most remarkable feats of spiritual enterprise ever recorded. Harms first worked through the North German Missionary Society. But he soon became dissatisfied, and resolved to have a mission which should carry out his own ideas and be under his own control. He proposed to select pious and intelligent young men, and to send them as missionaries to the heathen. Twelve young men presented themselves at once, but Harms had not the means of educating them. His best friends hinted to him that he was a little out of his senses. Then, to use his own expression, "knocked on the door in prayer." His mind had been powerfully impressed by the words of a courtier, spoken to duke George of Saxony, who had lain on his death-bed hesitating whether to flee for salvation to the Saviour or to the pope. "Your grace," said the courtier, "straightforward is the best runner." In a few moments the purpose of Harms was formed so completely that no doubt ever again occurred to him. His plan of action was struck out once. Without ever asking a single man, he prayed to God for the money. Funds poured in upon him. He built a large edifice for his missionary college. More students came than he could accommodate. He prayed for more money. It came to him from Germany, Russia, England, America, and Australia. He erected another building. The fact of his not asking any money at all became the most efficient advertisement of his cause which could be made. He called his mission school "Swimming Iron." Soon the first class of missionary candidates graduated and were ready for Africa, but the pastor had no means of sending them there. "Straitenlade," he prayed to God for counsel, and decided to build a ship. The project was rather original, as Herrnsburg was sixty miles from the sea, and most of the people had never seen a ship. Again Harms painted for the necessary money. Funds came as usual, and the ship was built and launched. As the day of sailing approached, the simple Herrmansburgers brought to the vessel fruits and flowers, grain and meats, ploughs, harrows, hoes, and a Christmas-tree, that the missionaries might have the means to plant a garden up on the hill. The day of sailing, Oct. 18, 1853, was held as a gala by the simple people; but soon news came that the ship was lost. "What shall we do?" said the people. "Humble ourselves, and build a new ship," said the minister. The report proved untrue, and that vessel is still plying her water trade to this day. The missionary work in Africa, and Harms' preachers have also penetrated to Australia, the East Indies, and our Western States.

In 1863 Harms felt the need of diffusing missionary intelligence among his own countrymen, and arousing a more universal interest in the cause. He desired to establish a journal devoted to missions, but his friends did not see how it could be published. "Let us have a printing-press upon the heath," said Harms. At once he asked God for the money, and it reached him as usual. The missionary journal was soon established, and soon issued a circuit in every place. Out of a thousand copies, only two periodicals in all Germany had a larger edition. It still abounds with pacy letters from the missionaries, and the stirring essays of Harms formed its chief attraction until his death. He also established a missionary festival, held annually in June. It continued for a longer time. Some years this festival was attended by six thousand people, including strangers from all parts of Europe. "How enchanting," said he, "are such Christian popular festivals, under the open sky, with God's dear Word, and accounts of his kingdom and prayer, and loud-sounding hymns, in a verdant field!"

The peculiar character and enormous amount of Pastor Harms' work can be better understood from the account of a traveller from our own country who spent a Sabbath with him in the autumn of 1863. The description which follows may be considered a specimen of his usual Sabbath-day's work. After speaking of his church edifice, which was nine hundred and seventy-five years old, and which Harms refused to have pulled down, considering its antiquity a means of influence, the writer proceeds: "Strangers were obliged to take seats at half past nine on Sabbath morning; in order that those who arrived later might commence at half past ten. When the pastor entered, the vast audience rose with as much awe as if he were an apostle. His form was bent, his face pale and inscrutable solemn. He appeared utterly ex- hausted, and leaned against the altar for support. In a low, tremulous tone, he chanted a prayer. Without looking at the Bible, he then recited a psalm, commenting upon every verse. He then read the same psalm from the Bible, by the inflections of his voice gathering up and impressing his previous comments. He next administered the ordinance of baptism to those infants who had been born since the previous Sabbath, and ad- dressed the sponsors. After announcing his text, he gave a rich exposition of it; a prayer followed, and he preached his sermon, which was very impressive and direct, though the voice of the preacher was often shrill. At another prayer, he administered the Lord's Supper to about one hundred communicants, which was the concluding part of the ordinance of every Sabbath day. The female communicants were dressed appropriately for the occasion. The people were dismissed after a service of three hours and forty minutes in length. After an hour's interval, the audience assembled again. The pastor recited a chapter from the New Testament, commen- tating upon each verse, and then read from the book before. After singing by the congregation, he cate- chized the audience, walking up and down the aisle, questioning children and adults. The audience seemed transformed into a vast Bible-class. This service of three hours lasted, closed with singing and prayer. At seven in the evening, the minister held his usual pulpit in the hall of the parsonage, and he preached to them in Low German, after which he held a missionary concert, reading letters from his missionaries, dated from Africa, Australia, and the United States. He seemed to have his hand upon all parts of the earth. Evidently conscientious, he carried the responsibility of the task. At the close of the service he shook hands with each one of the people in turn, saying, "May the Redeemer bless you." At ten in the evening the neighbors as- sembled at the parsonage to join with the pastor in family prayer. He recited from the Bible, commenting upon it as before, and then held a prayer which thrilled the listeners, though distressing to listen to, so great was his fatigue."

Besides these enormous labors on each Sabbath, Pastor Harms wrote incessantly for his missionary magazine, published a large number of books, and sent about three thousand letters a year, mostly to his missionaries. His method of keeping his missionary accounts was to take what money he got and pay what he owed; nor was he ever troubled, though the expense of his mission was about forty thousand dollars a year. He rec- ords a hundred instances of the exact amount of money he spent in reaching the time of the book. For four hours every day he held a levee for his parishioners, who consulted him freely, not only about religious sub- jects, but upon everything which interested them—the state of their health or the tillage of their land. So crowded were these levees, that often a stranger waited in the street for four days for the chance to see the pastor a few minutes. The religious doc- trine of Pastor Harms was singularly manifested. The king of Hanover, at one time, knowing that his eminent subject was in the city, sent a high officer of government, with one of the state carriages, to invite him to the palace. "Give my regards to the king," said Harms; "I would obey his order, if duty allowed; but I must go home and attend to my parish." The officer was indig- nant as he delivered the message; but the king said, "Harms is the man for me." Though a rigid monarch- ist, the pastor often preached against the government, and prepared his people to resist it. He often entered into sharp conflict with the government, especially in regard to the observance of the Sabbath, and was reported by them sixty-five times, but escaped un- hurt. With characteristic boldness, he warned the churches not to endure unbelieving ministers in the pul- pits, although the ministers held their own by the king. He defied the democracy as well as the court, and publicly advised them, if they were discontented, to go to Africa in a body. He was vehemently opposed to the popular amusements, declaring that men "acted themselves into hell from the theatre, and danced themselves into hell from the ballroom." The Calvinistic doc- trines and the Congregational polity were objects of his marked aversion. He declared that the Baptists who postponed the baptism of their children were robbers and murderers of those children's souls. Nor would he ever insure his seminary buildings, thinking that God would protect them, and he had an idea that insurance against accident involved a certain defiance of Jehovah. When he catechised the congregation, and children fail- ed in the exercise, he would sometimes punish them in public. He required his missionary students to perform a daily task of manual labor, not only for economical reasons, but also "that they might be kept humble, and not be ashamed of their work, any more than Paul was of his tent-making." As he never asked from any one but God, he had a violent antipathy to beggars, and none were ever found in his parish. Almost adored by his people as a species of rural pope, he maintained the utmost care and watchfulness to preserve his own hu- mility while breathing the atmosphere of their homage. He yielded not a particle of his activity to the very last. When he could no longer ascend his pulpit, he preached standing at the altar; when he could not preach stand- ing, he preached sitting; when he could no longer sit, he prayed that God would take him away as a burden. He died on the 14th of November, 1866, at the age of fifty-seven, and was buried amid the tears of his people on his beloved Lüneberger Heath.

It is difficult to form a just estimate of this remarkable man. The keynote of Harnoch's character was his union with God. Yet so rare is any high degree of this union that the possession makes his character stand original and alone, and it seems as though "one of the prophets had risen again." Another world had laid hold with a strong grasp upon his mind, so real was it to him that he appeared to walk not by faith, but by sight. He lived among us like a being of another race detained here from other worlds, and acted with an air of directness which no human standard can comprehend. Yet this wonderful spirituality was often marred by bigotry; sometimes it bordered upon the superstitious; at times his apostolic fervor was tinged with self-will, and we are astonished at the absolute breadth and narrowness of his mind. He made his most opposite powers assist each other; to carry out the moral intention of an angel, he brought a worldly wisdom which no one could surpass; in comprehension of detail and fertility of expedients he could have taught the ablest men of business. His life was devoted upon the warfare of an unending, almost morbid activity. He saw nothing before him but a succession of duties, yet his mind found an unconscious delight in the extent and variety of its own efforts, and his zeal was doubtless enhanced by the continual joy of attempt and success. It is hard to acquire a conception of him. No one who sat in his presence could lift his eyes from the ground before him. His amazing spirituality, the closeness to another sphere with which he lived, would have elevated him beyond our sight; but the eccentricities which slightly marred so grand a character showed that he was human, and lowered him to a point nearer the sympathy of mankind. To the last, the world must stand astonished at the moral power of a man who could make a little country church in a remote part of Germany the circle of his life with its influence, and Harnoch alone is an answer to the Saviour's question, "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" At intervals God gives such a one to the Church, to show to the world the spiritual power of one soul which is really in earnest. Harnoch has lived, and Germany, Africa, and the East Indies have felt the consequence. He was one of those blocks from whom, in earlier ages, the Catholic Church would have hewn her saints and her martyrs; he was a Protestant Loyola; had he left the world a few centuries before, he would assuredly have been canonized as a Doctor or St. Francis; his remains would have performed miracles without end; romantic tradition would have sprung from and twined around his memory; orders of priests and stately cathedrals would have borne his name; and thousands of devotees might to-day be worshipping at shrines. (WCV; 7.)

Harnoch (Heb. Har-ôôkho, הַרַּנוֹךְ, perhaps mssor; Sept. Ἀραγόν, Vulg. Harnochus), one of the sons of Zophah, a chief of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 36). B.C. between 1612 and 1058.

Harness occurs in several senses in the Eng. Vers., as the rendering of different Heb. words.

1. נְשִׁי (nashiy, prop. to bind, as it is generally rendered) is sometimes applied to the act of fastening animals to a cart or vehicle, e. g., skóing kine (1 Sam. vi, 7, 10, "tie") or horses (Jer. xlv, 4, "harness"), gearing a chariot (Gen. xlv, 29; Exod. xiv, 6); 2 Kings ix, 21, "make ready," or absolutely (1 Kings xviii, 44; 2 Kings ix, 21, "prepare"). From the monuments we see that the harness of the Egyptian war-chariots was composed of leather, and the trappings were richly decorated, being studded with a great variety of colors, and studded with gold and silver. See Chariot.

2. In the old English sense for armor (רָכָב כְּלָב, ne'shék, warlike equipments, elsewhere "armor," "weapons," etc.), 2 Chron. ix, 24. See Armor.

3. In a like sense for "vessels of the Lord" (הָרִים, חַוִּים, 1 Kings xxii, 34; 2 Chron. xviii, 33); a coat of mail (בְּשִׁירָת, "breastplate," Isa. lx, 17). See Armor.

4. "Harnessed" (מְחַבְּשֵׁם, chamashim, from השים, in the sense of being fierce for battle) is the expression used to represent the equipped condition of the Israelites as they passed out of Egypt (Exod. xiii, 18, "armed," Josh. i, 14; iv, 12, Judg. vii, 11), and seems to denote the state of full preparation and intrepid disposition, an insight and a foresight (the ancient versions interpret generally fully armed). (See Genesis, Lex. a. v.)

Harod (Heb. Charód, חָרֹד; Sept. Ἀρόδ t. v. Ἀραδός, a brook or place (ኢ syslog, spring or fountain, "well," Sept. ποταμός) not far from Jezreel and Mount Gilboa ("Gilead," Judg. vii, 3), by which Gideon and his great army encamped on the morning of the day which ended in the rout of the Midianites (Judg. vii, 1), and where the trial of the people by their mode of divination and the event itself took place. The name means "polli nation," and it has been suggested that it originated in consequence of the alarm and terror of most of the men who were here tested by Gideon (ver. 3, 5); but this supposition seems very far-fetched, and the name more probably arose from some peculiarity in the shape or color of the stream, or from the circumstance otherwise unknown. The word, slightly altered, recurs in the proclamation to the host—"Whosoever is fearful and trembling (יוֹרָד, charad), let him return" (ver. 3); but it does not follow that the name Charad was, as Prof. Stanley proposes, bestowed on account of the trembling, for the mention of the trembling may have been suggested by the presence of water, and the fountain: either would suit the paraphrastic vein in which these ancient records so delight. The word charad (A. V. "was afraid") recurs in the description of another event which took place in this neighborhood, possibly at this very spot—Saul's last encounter with the Philistines—when he "was afraid, and his heart trembled greatly" at the sight of their fierce hosts (1 Sam. xxviii, 5). It was situated south of the hill Mochr, where the Midianites were encamped in the valley of Jezreel (ver. 1), and on the brow of the hills overlooking that plain that on the south (ver. 9). As the camps were not far distant from each other (compare ver. 10-19), it must have been in a narrow part of the valley, and probably near its head (for the invaders came from the east, chap. vi, 3, and fled down the eastern defiles, chap. vii, 22). Hence the position of the present Ain Jezzial, south of Jezreel, is very probably that of the fountain in question (Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, p. 384-386). This spring, which gives rise to a small stream flowing eastward down the wady of the same name, is evidently the representative of the ancient name Gilead applied to this spot [see Gillead, 2], and has thus supplanted the other name Harod. Indeed it is probable that the latter was rather the name of a town in the neighborhood, since we find mention of its inhabitants (2 Sam. xxiii, 25). See Harodite. "The valley of Jezreel" referred to is an eastern arm of the great plain of Esdraelon, bounded on the south by Gilboa, and on the north by a parallel range (compare ver. 10-19). It is about three miles wide. See Jezreel. The Midianites were encamped along the base of Mochr, and probably near the town of Shunem. On the south side of the valley, at the base of Gilboa, and nearly opposite Shunem, is the fountain of Ain Edid. It is about a mile east of Jezreel, and hence it was also called the "fountain of Jezreel." The water bursts out from a rude grotto in a wall of conglomerate rock, which here forms the base of Gilboa. It first flows into a large but shallow pond, and then winds away through the rich green vale past the ruins of Bethshean to the Jordan. The side of Gilboa rises over the fountain steep and rugged. Some have thought it strange that the Midianites should not have seized on this fountain: but, as many of the Israelites probably lurked in the mountain, the Midianites may have deemed it more prudent to encamp in the open plain to the north, where there are also fountains. The Jerusalemite Itinerary makes no mention of the Galian. Williams of Tyre calls it Tuhibius (Gesta Dei per Francos, 1037; Bohadin, Vita Suladini, p. 53). The valley of Jezreel still forms a favorite haunt of the wild Bedawin, who periodically cross from the east side of the Jordan, as in Judg. vi, 5: "They came up with their cattle and their tents, and they came as grasshoppers for multitude: both they and their camels were without number" (Porter, Handbook for Syr. and Pal. ii, 555; Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 324).

Harodite (Heb. Chaqrô'dî, יָרָדִית, Sept. Ἀρόπος), an epithet of Shammah and Ella, two of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii, 25), probably from their being natives of Harod, a place near the fountain of the same name (Judg. vii, 1). See Harorite.

Haro'ēth (1 Chron. ii, 82). See Rehaim.

Harorite (Heb. Chaqre'rî, יָרָרִית, prob. by errore- transcription for יָרָדִית, Harodite; Sept. Ἀρόπος, Vulg. Arorites), an epithet of Shammath, one of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii, 27; 1 Chron. ii, 37); for which the passage (2 Sam. xxiii, 25) more correctly reads Harodite (q.v.).

Harosheth (Heb. Cha'arosh'thêth) of the Gentiles (יוֹרְשָׁתָם, workmanship of the nations, i.e. city of handicrafts; Sept. Αρωσόθω τῶν ἱδρυῶν, Vulg. Haro- sheth gentium), a city supposed to have been situated near Hazor, in the northern parts of Canaan, afterwards called Upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles, from the mixed races inhabiting it. See Galilee. Haro- sheth is said to have been the residence of Sisera, the general of the armies of Jabin, king of Canaan, who signed in Hazor (Judg. iv, 2). Here the army and chariots of Jabin were marshalled under the great captain before they invaded Israel, and defied from the walls of Harosheth (ver. 16). The city is not again mentioned in the Bible, nor is it referred to by Josephus, Jerome, or any ancient writer. It was at the extreme of Jabin's territory, opposite the Kishon (ver. 13), and also at a good distance from Tabor (ver. 14). It is supposed to have stood on the west coast of the lake Merom (א-חלוף), from which the Jordan issues forth in one unbroken stream, and in the portion of the tribe of Naphtali. Jabin's capital, Hazor, one of the fenced cities assigned to the children of Naphtali (Josh. xix, 30), lay to the north-west of it. Probably from intermarriage of the conquerors with the natives, the name of Sisera afterwards became a family name (Exx. ii, 53). Neither is it irrelevant to allude to this coincidence in connection with the moral effects of this decisive victory: for Hazor, once "the head of all those kingdoms" (Josh. xi, 8), had been taken and burnt by Joshua. In kind, Joshua brought out to the sword; and the whole federation of the Canaanites of the north broken and slaughtered in the celebrated battle of the waters of Merom (Josh. xi, 5-14)—the first time that "chariots and horses" appear in array against the invading host, and summarily disposed of, according to divine command, under Joshua, but which subsequently the children of Joseph feared to face in the valley of Jezreel (Josh. xvii, 16-18), and before which Judah actually failed in the Philistine plain (Judg. i, 19). Herein was the great difficulty of subduing plains, similar to that of the Jordan, beside which Harosheth stood. It was not till the Israelites had asked for and obtained a king that they began "to multiply chariots and horses" (Judg. xii, 18), and to turn homage to themselves, contrary to the express words of the law (Deut. xvi, 18), as if to fight the enemy with his own weapons. (The first instance occurs 2 Sam. viii, 4: comp. 1 Chron. xviii, 4; next in the histories of Absa- lom, 2 Sam. xv, 1, and of Adonijah, 1 Kings i, 5; while David himself was touched with the same feeling, 2 Sam. xxiv, 25.) Then it was that the Hebrews' decedence set in! They were strong in faith when they hamstrung the horses and burned with fire the chariots of the kings of Hazor, of Madon, of Shimron, and of Achshaph (Josh. xi, 1). Yet so rapidly did they decline when their illustrious leader was no more that the city of Hazor had risen from its ruins; and, in contrast with the kings of Mesopotamia and Moab (Judg. iii), who were both foreign potentates, another Jabin, the territory of whose ancestors had been assigned to the tribe of Naphtali, claimed the distinction of being the first to revolt against and shake off the dominion of Israel, and raised itself in his own name to the dignity of a nation (Judg. i).

The victory won by Deborah and Barak was well worthy of the song of triumph which it inspired (Judg. v, and of the proverbial celebrity which ever afterwards attached to it (Psa. lxxxiii, 9, 10: a passage which shows how little the fugitives were overawed as a whole by their defeat), and which the whole territory was Gregory was inclined to be held permanently, as it would seem (Judg. iv, 24); at all events, we hear nothing more of Hazor, Haro- sheth, or the Canaanites of the north in the succeeding wars. The etymology of the name Harosheth, q. d. "woodcutting," is not well fitted with the above texts, may justify us in localizing the city on the upland plains of Naphtali, probably on one of those ruined-crowned cemeteries still existing, from which the mother of Sisera, looking out from her latticed window, could see far along that road by which she expected to see her son return in tri- umph (Judg. v, 29). Deborah, in her beautiful ode, doubtless depicted the true features of the scene. Remnants of the old forests of oak and terebinth still wave here over the ruins of the ancient cities, and travellers may see the black tents of the Arabs—fit representatives of the ancient states (ver. 17)—pitch their tents within their shade (Porter, Handbook for Syr. and Pal. ii, 446; Stanley, Jewish Church, i, 389). Schwarzs (Palestine, p. 184) thinks it identical with the village Gîrîh, situated on a high mount one English mile west (on Zimmerman's map north-west) of Jacob's bridge across the Jordan, and nearly destroyed by an earthquake in 1857. Dr. Thomson (itineraries) gave a vivid description of the geographical features of Barak's victory (Land and Book, ii, 142 sqq.), regards the site as that of the present village Haravîk (a name, according to him, giving the exact Arabic form of the Hebrew), an enormous double mound or tell along the Jordan, about eight miles from Megiddo, covered with the remains of old walls and buildings.

Harp is the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the following terms in the original: usually נָעַר, kinner (whence the Greek κινάρι), the lyre or cithara (invariably rendered "harp"), N. T. εἰφίδα (1 Cor. xiv, 7; Rev. v, 8, 11, 9, 20, 16), whence the verb εἰφίδει (1 Cor. xiv, 7); Rev. xv, 2; with the compound εἰφίδον ("harp"), Rev. iv, 2; xviii, 22); elsewhere only of the Chal. מַכְרָה, kitharos (text of Dan. iii, 5, 7, 10, 15), or מַכְרָה, kitharos (margin), from the latter Greek term. See Music.

The "harp" was David's favorite instrument, on which he was a proficient (see Dreschler, De cithara David, Lips. 1712; also in Uogolina, xxxii). It probably did not essentially differ from the modern Arabic cithara (Niebuhr, Trav. x, 177; pl. 36; Descrit de l'Egypte, xvi, 866, pl. BB, fig. 12, 18). See David.

Gesenius inclines to the opinion that "נַעַד is derived from "נַעַד, kinnor," an unused onomatopoetic root which means to give forth a tremendous and stridulous sound, like that of a string when touched." The kinnor was the national instrument of the Hebrews, and was well known throughout Asia. There can be little doubt that it was the earliest instrument with which man was acquainted, as the writer of the Pentateuch assigns its invention, together with that of the בַּצָּא, נַעַד, incorrectly translated "organ" in the A.V., to the antediluvian period (Gen. iv, 21). Kalisch (Hist. and Crit. Com. on the Old Test.) considers kinnor to stand for the whole class of stringed instruments (neopolo), as yaph, says he, "is the type of all wind instruments." Writers who connect the kinnor with כִּינְיָרָא יָדָם, kinnor me (to kinnor), conjecture that this instrument was only employed by the Greeks on occasions of sorrow and distress. If this were the case with the Greeks, it was far different with the Hebrews, amongst whom the kinnor served as an accompaniment to songs of cheerfulness and mirth, as well as of praise and thanksgiving to the supreme Being (Gen. xxxi, 27; 1 Sam. xxxi, 28; 2 Chron. xx, 28; Psa. xxxiii, 2), and was very rarely used, if ever, in times of private or national affliction. The Jewish bard finds no employment for the kinnor during the Babylonian captivity, but describes it as put aside or suspended on the willows (Psa. cxxxvii, 2); and in like manner Job's harp "is changed into mourning" (xxx, 81) while the hand of grief pressed heavily upon him. The passage "my bowels shall sound like a harp for Moab" (Isa. xvi, 11) has impressed some biblical critics with the idea that the kinnor had a lugubrious sound; but this is an error, since כִּינְיָרָא נַעַד refers to the vibration of the chords, and not to the sound of the instrument (Gesen. and Hitzig, in Comment.).

Touching the shape of the kinnor, a great difference of opinion prevails. The author of Shilite Haggidborim (c. 6) describes it as resembling the modern harp; Pfeifer gives it the form of a guitar; and St. Jerome declares that it resembled in shape the Greek letter delta (quoted by Joel Brill in the preface to Mendelssohn's Psalms). Josephus records (Ant. vii, 12, 3) that the kinnor had ten strings (compare Theodoret, Quest. 34 on 1 Kings), and that it was played on with the plectrum; others assign to it twenty-four; and in the Shilite Haggidborim it is said to have had forty-seven. Josephus's statement, however, ought not to be received as conclusive, as it is in open contradiction to what is set forth in the 1st book of Samuel (xvi, 23; xviii, 10), that David played on the kinnor with his hand. As it is reasonable to suppose that there was a smaller and a larger kinnor, inasmuch as it was sometimes played by the Israelites whilst walking (1 Sam. x, 5), the opinion of Munk—"On jouait peut-être des deux manières, suivant les di-

The כִּינְיָרָא יָדָם—"harp on the Sheminith" (1 Chron. xv, 21)—was so called from its eight strings. Many learned writers, including the author of Shilite Haggidborim, identify the word "sheminith" with the octav; but it would indeed be rash to conclude that the ancient Hebrews understood the octave in precisely the same way in which it is employed in modern times. See SIMMATRE. The skill of the Jews on the kinnor appears to have reached its highest point of perfection in the age of David, the effect of which can be traced even into our own day. The names of the "schools of the prophets" are described as truly marvellous (compare 1 Sam. v. 5; xvi. 23; and xix. 20). Two instruments of the lyre species are delineated on a bas-relief of the Assyrian monuments, representing the return of a monarch celebrated by the presence of musicians (Layard, Nineveh and Bab., p. 388 sqq.). The lyre of Harpdescribes a harp of ten strings. The distinct sounds uttered by these strings or chords are alluded to by Paul in 1 Cor. xiv. 7. Its soothing effect was exemplified in calming down the furious spirit of Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 17, 24; xviii. 9; xix. 9). The spirit of prophecy appears to have been excited by instrumental music of this kind (2 Kings iii. 15). Harpers held the instrument in the hand, or placed it on a pillar, or sat down by a river side (Ovid, Fasti, ii. 115). Sometimes they were even taught from the strings which are an allusion in Psa. cxxxvii. 1, 2. The harp was used in processions and public triumphs, in worship and the offices of religion, and was sometimes accompanied with dancing (Psa. cxlix. 9). They were also used after successful battles (see 2 Chron. xx. 39; 1 Macc. xiii. 51). Isaiah alludes to this custom in the text quoted above (22). So in the victory of the Lamb (Rev. xiv. 1, 2): "I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps;" the Church in heaven being represented as composing a grand chorus, in celebration of the triumphs of the Redeemer. At solemn feasts, and especially of the type, harps were employed. To this the prophet Isaiah alludes (v. 11, 12). The use of harps in worship has already been adverted to, and that the heathen employed them on such occasions appears from Dan. iii. 5, 7, 15. "Harp of God" (Rev. xv. 2) are either a Hebraism to show their excellence, as the adjectives of God often signify (the most excellent things in their kind being in the Scriptures said to be of God), as a prince of God (Gen. xxiii. 6, in the original), the mountains of God (Psa. xxxvi. 6, in the original), cedars of God (Psa. lxxxi. 11, in the original), and the like; or else they mean harps given from God; or harps given from God, for they may be harps used in the service of God, in opposition to harps common and profane (1 Chron. xvi. 42; 2 Chron. vii. 6).

Harpnus, H. H., a Flemish mystic, was born at Erp (whence he is sometimes called also Erpius or Enpius), in Brabant, towards the beginning of the 15th century. He entered the order of St. Francis, in which he soon became distinguished for his learning, particularly in mystical theology. He attained the highest dignities of the order, and succeeded in restoring the discipline in several convents of grey friars where it had been relaxed. He died at Mechlin Feb. 29, 1476. The Franciscans count him among the blessed; yet Bossuet seems to have considered him only as an enthusiast and visionary. He wrote Le Directoire des Contemplatifst (first published in Low Dutch, then in Latin by Biomevert, under the title Directorium aurum Cordis: Modus legatus vastrum Virginis Mariae:—Remedia contra Distractiones. HARP ancient Babylonian instrument is probably that represented in a single instance on the Assyrian monuments at Khorsabad, depicting three short-bearded performers on the lyre ushered into the greatest chamber, and a young eunuch. The musicians are clad in a short tunic held fast by a girdle, and their hair is drawn back, and terminates above the shoulders in a single row of curls. They proceed with measured step, singing and twangling their wires, which are suspended by a broad band passing over the right shoulder. The instrument itself somewhat resembles the Greek lyre: it has a square body and upright sides, the latter being connected by a crossbar, to which are fixed strings that have been called numer- ous, for we can count eight at least, and in the part that is corrododed away there is room for three or four more. Exactly similar instruments are now seen in Nubia and Dougolay; and the mode of playing is that the right hand holds a short plectrum to strike the intervals, while the left is used to stop and twang the cords (Bonomi’s Nineveh, p. 187).

Harp or guitar is constantly, in the Holy Scriptures, instruments of joy. They are mentioned in every ancient country, used both by Jews and Gentiles, and their employment in the Temple worship frequently occurs. Moses has named their original inventor in Gen. iv. 21, viz. Jubal; and in Gen. xxxi. 27, Laban says to Jacob, "Why did you not tell me, that I might have sent you away with mirth and songs, with tallow and with harp?" Even in that very ancient writing, the book of Job (xxii. 12), that patriarch, speaking of the prosperity of the wicked, says, "They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ." So, when complaining of his own condition (xxiii. 30), he says, "My ear also is turned to mourn- ing, and my organ to the voice of them that weep." Isaiah speaks of the harp under the same character, as an instrument of joy (xxiv. 8). Divine subjects used to be brought forward with the accompaniments of the harp (Psa. xlii. 5), and the high praises of God were so celebrated (Psa. xxxii. 2; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Ivi. 8; see also Psa. lxii. 23; xxiv. 4; xxvii. 5; cxlii. 7; cl. 3). That harps are used to celebrate the praises of heroes is well known. Harps, in Solomon’s day, were made of the algum-trees; as our translators have it (1 Kings x. 12). They were often gilded, and hence called golden harps (Rev. v. 8). A harp of eight strings is mentioned (1 Chron. xv. 21), called in our version "harp on the Sheminith." But amongst the Greeks it had, for the most part, seven strings. Josephus (Ant. vii. 12) Harpsfield, or Harpsfield, John, was born about 1510, and died in London in 1578. He was educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford, where he was admitted fellow in 1534. He became chaplain to Bishop Bonner, whose bitter persecuting spirit he shared, and was collated to St. Martin's, Ludgate, in 1554, but resigned in 1558, on being presented to the living of Lyndon in Essex. Shortly before the death of Queen Mary he was made dean of Norwich, but on the accession of Elizabeth was deprived of that post, and committed to the Fleet Prison until he gave security for his good behavior. His published works are Concordia ad Clerum (London, 1558, 8vo) — Homilies (London, 1554-56); he wrote 9 of Bonner's Homilies) — Suppeditum temporum a diloario ad a. D. 1535 (London, 1590). He wrote also some Disputations and Epistles to be found in Fox's Acts and Monuments. — Rose, New Gen. Biog. Dict. viii, 212; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii, 442; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 788; Wood, Athen. Oxon. i. (J. W. M.)

HARPSFELD, Nicholas, an English Roman Catholic historian, and brother of the preceding, was also educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford; where he was admitted fellow in 1532. He was bachelor of arts in 1548. He was made principal of Whitehall in 1544, regius professor of Greek in 1546, archdeacon of Canterbury and prebendary of St. Paul's in 1554. He also received the living of Lyndon, but resigned it to his brother John in 1558. He was a very zealous Romanist, and on the accession of Elizabeth, refusing to acknowledge her supremacy, he was deprived of his prebends and imprisonment, or at least kept under restraint until his death in 1583. During his imprisonment (receiving every needful help from his custodian, bishop Parker) he composed his Historia Anglicana Ecclesiastica (Douay, 1622, fol.). To this there is appended, according to Nutt's catalogue (1837), a treatise entitled Brevis Narratio de Dicario Heresici V.V. . . . ab E. Campiun, which may be the "Treatise concerning Marriage" mentioned by Wood (see Appendix to Butler's Hist. of Reformation). His other works are Historia heresici Wickhifferae (published with Hist. Ang.); Chronicon a Dicario Noce ad annum 1559; and a very bitter attack upon the Protestant ecclesiastical historians, Fox in particular, which was conveyed secretly to the Netherlands, and published by his friend Alan Cope under his inspiration, to screen the real cause of the punishment at the hands of Elizabeth — the title in full in Alani Capi Dialogi et contra Summi Pontificatus, Monasticae Vita Sacramentorum, S. Imaginum oppugnatores et pseudo-Martires: in quibus Centumsevemto, Auctorium Apologia Anglicae, Pseudo-Martyrum defensio, sacrosanctae et sacrae officii, legum, usus, temporum minorum, suos uocatos, et ecclesiae veritatem Sanctorum, et nostrae catholicae, refutandos (Antwerp, 1556, 4to). He left also many MSS. — Rose, New Gen. Biog. Dict. viii, 212; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii, 442; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 788. (J. W. M.)

Harris, John, D.D., F.R.S., an English divine, was born about 1687. He studied at St. John's College, Cambridge, and became successively rector of St. Mildred's, London, master of Queen's College, Oxford, curate of St. Margaret, Woolster, and fellow, secretary, and vice-president of the Royal Society. He died in 1719. Dr. Harris was the first compiler of a dictionary of arts and sciences in England (1708, 2 vols. fol.), and was a careful and able editor; but he was impatient and died completely destitute. He wrote A Refutation of the Character and Opinions against the Being and Attributes of God (London, 1698, 4to) — Sermon, John xvi, 2: — The Wickedness of the Pretext of Treason and Rebellion for God's sake (Nov. 4th) (London, 1715, 8vo); and compiled a Collection of Voyages and Travels (Lond. 1702; revised by Campbell, 1744, 2 vols. fol.) — Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1403; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 790.

Harris, John, D.D., an eminent Independent minister and scholar, was born at Ugborough, in Devonshire, March 8, 1802, and was admitted a student at the Hoxton Academy for the education of ministers belonging to the Independent denomination in 1821. In 1827 he settled as a minister among the Independents. His first literary work, entitled The Great Teacher, was favorably received; but he became most widely known as the successful competitor for a prize of one hundred guineas, offered by Dr. Conquest for the best essay on the subject of Covetousness. Mr. Harris's essay was entitled Mammon, and had a wide circulation, upwards of thirty thousand copies having been sold in a few years. He subsequently obtained two other prizes for essays — one entitled Britannia on the Condition and Claims of Sailors; the other on Missions, with the title The Great Commission. On account of the reputation thus brought to him, he was elected a fellow of Amherst College, and was also invited to fill the post of president in lady: Huntington's Theological College at Cheshunt. Here he remained till the union of the three Independent colleges of Highbury, Homerton, and Coward in New College, in which he was the office of principal, and conducted several of the theological courses in that institution. He filled this position with efficiency, and by his industry and amiable character contributed to the success which has attended this establishment. Whilst at Cheshunt, Dr. Harris published the first of a series of volumes which was intended to illustrate the history of man from a theological point of view. The first volume was entitled The Pre-Adamite Earth (1847). In it he displayed a great amount of learning, and especially an acquaintance with the natural sciences, which he brought to bear on his theological views. The second volume of the series was entitled Man Primordial (1849), in which the intellectual, moral, and religious character of man is discussed. A third volume, entitled Patriarchy, or the Family, appeared the same year. Harris completed the series, and to have been devoted to the 'State,' or the political condition of man, and the 'Church,' or his religious relations; but the plan was cut short by the death of Dr. Harris, Dec. 21, 1856. These writings evince careful study and a broad range of thought. Dr. Harris's practical writings have had an immense circulation both in England and America. See Fish, Pulpit Eloquence (1857); Gilliland, Modern Masterpieces of Pulpit Oratory; Hoefer, Neue. Bibl. Génerale, xxix, 450; British Quarterly Review, v, 387; N. American Review, lxxx, 391; Albion, Dictionary of Authors, i, 791.

Harris, Robert, D.D., a pious and learned Puritan divine, was born in Gloucestershire, 1758, and was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. He afterwards took orders, and obtained the living of Hanwell, near Banbury, Oxfordshire, where he was extremely useful in confirming the people's minds in the Protestant faith. On the commencement of the Civil War he removed to London, and became a member of the Assembly of Divines, which appears to have taken no active part in their proceedings. He officiated at the church of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate Street, until 1648, when he was appointed president of Trinity College, which office he retained until his death in 1638. His works include The Way to True Happiness, in twenty-four sermons on the Beatitudes; and A Treatise on the New Covenant, which, with other writings, were published in his Works, revised and collected (Lond. 1654, fol.).—Hook, Hist. Bibl., v, 546.

Harris, Samuel, D.D., "was born in the county of Middlesex about the year 1633. He was educated in Merchant Taylors' School, of which he was head boy in 1657, and was admitted a pensioner of Peter House, Cambridge, May 15, 1700. Upon the foundation of the chair of Modern History in the University of Cambridge by George I in 1724, Harris was appointed the first professor. He died Dec. 21, 1733. He was the author of, 1. Scripture knowledge promoted by catechising (London, 1712, 8vo);—2. A Commentary on the Fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, with an appendix of Queries concerning Divers Ancient Religious Traditions and Practices, and the sense of many texts of Scripture which seem to allude to or express them (Lond. 1736 [not 1739, as frequently stated], 4to);—3. A discourse on the first page, namely, Observations, Critical and Miscellaneous, on several remarkable Texts of the Old Testament, to which is added a Commentary, etc.—Prefixed are three dissertations. 1. *On a Gazer or Advocate; 2. On a Dour or Generation; and, 3. On the ancient method of propounding important points by way of question. This work was published shortly after the death of the author by his widow. It exhibits much curious learning, and is several times referred to by Doddridge in his lectures."

Harris, Thaddeus Mason, D.D., a Unitarian divine, was born in Charlestown, Mass., in 1760, graduated A.B. at Harvard in 1784, and became pastor at Dorchester in 1788. He was librarian of Harvard College from 1791 to 1793, and afterwards librarian of the Massachusetts Historical Society till his death in 1842. His most important publication is a Natural History of the Bible (1795, 12mo; again in Boston, 1821, 8vo); also published in London 1795, and in the same year. Miscellaneous Observations on the Natural History of the Bible, 1824; new ed. by Conder, 1833, 12mo). This work received great praise for its accuracy and utility (see Horne, Bibliographical Appendix). Dr. Harris also published Memorials of the Massachusetts Historical Society (Boston, 1811, 8vo);—Discourses on Freemasonry (Charlestown, 1801 [1801], 8vo). See Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 792.

Harris, Walter, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Lebanon, Conn., in 1761. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1787, was ordained pastor at Dunbarton Aug. 28, 1789, and died Dec. 25, 1843. Dr. Harris published An Address before the Pastoral Convention of New Hampshire (1834), and a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, ii, 277.

Harris, William, D.D., an eminent English dissenting divine, is supposed to have been born at London about 1675. He became pastor of a church at Cruchted Friars, London, in 1698. He was also for some thirty years one of the preachers of a Friday evening lecture at the Westminster or Shrewsbury Mr. Tong and succeeded Dr. Salter at Salter's Hall. He died in 1740. "He was a concise, clear, and nervous writer; his works evince a strong sense joined to a lively imagination, and regulated with judgment." He was one of the continuators of Matthew Henry's Commentary (those on Philippians and Colossians). Besides a number of occasional sermons, he wrote Funeral Discourses, in two parts: (I) Consolations on the Death of our Frias; (II) Preparations for our own Death (London, 1736, 8vo).—The Life and Character of Dr. Thomas Morton (London, 1726, 8vo);—A Practical Illustration of the Book of Job (London, 1737, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclopedia Bibliographica, i, 1406; Bogue and Bennett, History of Dissenters, ii, 372.

Harris, William, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Springfield, Mass., and passed A.B. at Harvard College in 1786. He was first licensed as a minister in the Congregational Church, but, on perusing a compend of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, his mind and feelings were drawn to the Protestant Episcopal Church, in which he was shortly after ordained. He then took charge of St. Michael's Church, Marblehead, and in 1802 became rector of St. Mark's, New York. In 1811 he was made president of Columbia College, and in 1816 he resigned his rectorship, and attended thereafter exclusively to the presidency of the college. He died Oct. 18, 1829. He published several occasional sermons. —Sprague, Annals, v, 388.

Harrison, William Henry, D.D., was born Jan. 12, 1815, in Frederick County, Md. He entered the preparatory department of Pennsylvania College in 1838, and was graduated in 1843 with the valedictory of his class. He early developed a taste for literary research; and, while others were often engaged in recreation and amusement, he was in his room busyly engaged in the investigation of some question of interest, and in the acquisition of information in his especial line of study. In the latter, perhaps, he excelled all others was the moral influence which he exercised over his companions. His very presence, even when he kept silent, was felt. Immediately after his graduation in college he commenced his theological studies in the Theological Seminary at Gettysburg. On their completion in 1845 he was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Synod of Maryland. He was elected assistant professor of ancient languages in Pennsylvania College, and served for a season as general agent of the Parent Education Society. The following year he accepted a call to the English Church of Cincinnati, as he felt that he could be more useful and efficient in the pastoral work. Here he labored with great success to his death. His labors were unwearyed and abundant. His life was regarded as a sacrifice to the cause of humanity and religion. He died of Apolitical complaint. He was buried in Cincinnati, Nov. 3, 1866, and, although comparatively a young man, he was at the time of his death the senior pastor of the city. He was a good scholar, a sound theologian, and a clear, practical, and instructive preacher. He resided at Wittenberg College in 1861. (N. L. S.) a tribulum or threshing (q. v.) sledge (2 Sam. xii, 31; 1 Chron. xx, 3); elsewhere only the verb ʿānūn, nudad’ (lit. to level off), to harrow a field (Job xxxix, 10; “break the cloths,” Isa. xxviii, 4; Hos. x, 11). See Kittto, Daily Bible Illustr., iii, 39, vi, 397. The form of the ancient Roman, their religion dyed in blood; their juggling and feigned miracles, of which he wrote a book against them, and their equivocations.” He concluded by proclaiming that in his view the Church of England came nearest to the primitive Church, and that its principles were not derived from Wickliff, Huss, or Luther, but from the four first centuries after Christ. This defense was considered valid, and in 1628 Dr. Harvett was translated to the archbishopric of York. He died in May, 1631. Among his works we notice A Discovery of the fraudulent Practices of John Darrell, Bachelor of Arts, etc. (London, 1599, 4to) — Declaration of egregious Popish Impositions, etc. (London, 1603, 4to), against an exorcist named Edmonds, alias Weston, a Jesuit. HART ( paginate, always masc., but in Ps. xiii, 1, joined with a fem. noun to denote a hind), a stag or male deer, but used by the Hebrews also to denote all the various species of deer and antelopes which resemble large rams. See Deer. The hart is reckoned among the clean animals (Deut. xii, 15; xiv, 5; xv, 22), and seems, from the passages quoted, as well as from 1 Kings iv, 23, to have been commonly killed for food. Its activity furnishes an apt comparison in Isa. xxxv, 6, though in this respect the hind was more commonly selected by the sacred writers. The proper name Aylon is derived from ayil, and implies that harts were numerous in the neighborhood. See Goat. The Heb. masc. noun ayil, which is always rendered ḥēbēs by the Sept., denotes, there can be no doubt, some species of Cervus (deer tribe), either the Damus vulgaris, fallow-deer, or the Cervus Barbarus, the Barbary deer, the southern representative of the European stag (C. elephas), which occurs in Tur- nias and the coast of Barbary. We have, however, no evidence that the Barbary deer ever inhabited Palest- nine, though it may have done so in primitive times.

Modern Egyptian Khnowad, or cloz-crushing machine after ploughing.

Hebrew harrow, if any instrument properly corresponding to this term existed, is unknown. Probably it was, as still in Egypt (Niebuhr, Trav. i, 151), merely a board, which was dragged over the fields to level the lumps. Among the Romans it consisted of a hurdle (craete) of rods with teeth (Pliny, xviii, 43; comp. Virg. Georg. i, 94). See generally Ugolini, Comm. de re rustica vet. Hebr. v, 21 (in his Theaurus. xxix, p. 332 sq.); Paulsen. Ackerb. p. 96. “In modern Palestine, oxen are sometimes turned in to trample the cloths, and in some parts of Asia a bush of thorns is dragged over the surface; but all these processes, if used, occur (not after, but) before the seed is committed to the soil.” See Agriculture.

HARSA. See Tel-Harasa.

Har’sha (Heb. Charsa’ha), ḥarṣāḥa, a Chaldaizing form, worker or enchanter; Sept. ἁρσάχα and ἁρσάος, one of the Nethinim whose descendants (or rather, perhaps, a place whose inhabitants) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 62; Neh. vii, 54). B. C. ante 530. Schwarz (ibid. p. 116) thinks it may be identical with the ruins called by the Arabs Charsa (on Zimmerman’s map, Khuras), situated south of wady Sur, about half way between Beit-Jibrin (Eleutheropolis) on the W., and Jedur (Gedor) on the E.

Harnet, Samuel, archbishop of York, was born at Colchester in 1561; was educated as a sizar at King’s College, Cambridge; and was subsequently elected fellow of Pembroke Hall. In 1580 he took the degree of B.A., and in 1584 that of M.A. He then applied himself to theology, in which he soon made his mark by a sermon preached in 1584 at St. Paul’s Cross (first printed at the end of three of Dr. Stewar’s sermons in 1609), in which he boldly attacked the doctrine of unconditional predestination, then to some extent prevailing in the Church of England. He became successively proctor of the university in 1592, vicar of Chigwell, in Essex, in 1593, and archdeacon of Essex in 1602, but resigned all these offices on being appointed rector of Shenfield, in Essex, and of St. Margaret’s, New Fish Street, London, in 1604. He became master of Pembroke College in 1605, and bishop of Chichester in 1609. He was translated to Norwich in 1619. While in the latter see, the Dissenters prevailing in the House of Commons, he was accused before the last Parliament of James I of several misdemeanors, and of Romanist tendencies. He made a defense, in which, among other points, he says “that popery is a fire that never will be quiet; he had preached a thousand sermons, and nothing of popery can be imputed to him out of any of them. That there were divers obstacles to keep him from popery: among them, the usurpation of the pope of Hesselquist (Trans. p. 211) observed the fallow-deer on Mount Tabor. Sir G. Wilkinson says (Ann. Egypt. i, 227, abridgment), "The stag with branching horns figured at Beni Hassan is also unknown in the valley of the Nile, but it is still seen in the vicinity of the natron lakes, as about the oasis, though scarce in the desert between them and the Red Sea." This is doubtless the Cerbus Barbarus. See Stag.

Most of the deer tribe are careful to conceal their calves after birth for a time. May there not be some allusion to this circumstance in Job xxxix., 1, "Canst thou mark when he doth calve?" etc. Perhaps, as the Sept. uniformly renders aydal by ἀνασκός, we may incline to the belief that the Cerbus Barbarus is the deer denoted. The feminine noun ἀνασκή, aydalē, occurs frequently in the O. T. See HIND.

Hart, Levi D.D., a Congregational minister, was born April 10, 1738, at Southington, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1760, studied under Dr. Bellamy, was licensed June 2, 1761, and was ordained pastor at Gristfield, Conn., Nov. 4, 1762, where he labored until his death. During his long pastorate he trained many young men for the ministry. In 1784 he was made a member of Dartmouth College Corporation, and of Yale in 1791. He published several occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, i, 590.

Hart Oliver, a Baptist minister, was born in Watertown, Mass., July 5, 1725, joined the Baptist Church in 1741, was licensed to preach in 1746, and was ordained in 1748. In that year he became pastor of the Baptist church in Charleston, S. C., and remained in that office thirty years, with eminent success both as preacher and pastor. In the Revolution he espoused the Whig cause with great ardor, and had to flee from Charleston in 1790 to avoid falling into the hands of the British. He settled near the Baptist Church at Rocky Hill, N. H., where he died Dec. 31, 1795. He published a Discourse on the Death of W. Tumer—Dancing Exploited:—The Christian Temple:—A Gospel Church portrayed.—Benef. Hist. of the Baptists, vol. ii; Sprague, Annals, vi, 47.

Hartley, David, an English practitioner of medicine, and a philosopher of considerable, but transitory reputation. The Scotch school of metaphysics borrowed much from his conclusions; and long posterior theory of Beauty, which was elaborated and amplified by Locke and D'Alembert, Principles of Taste, derived from them its cardinal doctrines. Dr. Hartley occupies a notable position in the history of speculation on other grounds. He presented a curious example of the partial conciliation of Descartes and Locke; he was insensibly to a popular system which transmitted the system of the last of these great men into the materialism of the French Encyclopaedists; he preceded Bonnet, of Geneva, in applying physiological observation to psychological discussion, and thus became the precursor of Cabanis and Brocauissis, of Mole-schott and Hume. He was contemporary with Collier, and Berkeley, and Hume, and Reid. While the two first were undermining the philosophy of Locke by questioning the credibility of the senses, and Hume was achieving a similar result by impugning the evidences of consciousness, to be imperfectly refuted by Reid's exaggeration of the reliability of external perception, Hartley was still further invalidating the authority of Locke by proposing a purely mechanical explanation of the processes of thought. He is thus even more noteworthy for his relations to the revolutions of opinion in the eighteenth century, for the suggestive additions he is supposed to have made to the science of the human mind. He was one of the dominant spirits of that agitation of the intellectual waters which heralded and produced the political convulsions of the last century. At the same time, he is the link between widely separated doctrines. He published works on ethics, on metaphysics and science; connecting Locke with Condillac and French sensationalism; reviving neglected positions of Aristotle, and prefiguring many of the latest manifestations of scientific materialism.

Life.—The biography of Dr. Hartley is singularly devoid of salient incidents and of general interest. He belonged to that numerous class of very worthy men who run their eminently useful career without experiencing or occasioning any excitement of the first order. But for his philosophical productions, his epitaph might have been Virtus morumque firmitate. He was the son of a respectable clergyman, and was born Aug. 30, 1703, at Armley, Yorkshire, of which parish his father was vicar. He completed his education at Jesus College, Cambridge, and was designed for the paternal vocation. But he was induced to divert his attention to medicine, in consequence of scruples about subscribing the XXXIX Articles, for religious opinion within the bosom of the Anglican Church was much divided at the time by the recent issues of the "Bangorian Controversy." His experience was frequently repeated in other cases in the ensuing years. He retained, however, the fervent but simple piety appropriate to his meditated profession, and never withdrew his interest from the subjects which attract the intelligent theologian. He informs us that the seeds of his doctrine began to germinate when he was twenty-five years of age, though their elaboration was not completed till he was more than forty. His views were given to the world in 1749, in a work entitled Observations on Man, his Frame, his Duties, his Expectations. He survived its publication about eight years, and on the first of August, 1757, which was but a fortnight of completing his fifty-third year. His life had been expended in the diligent and kindly pursuit of his calling at Newark, Bury St. Edmund's, Loudon, and Bath.

Macintosh and Coleridge, while presenting diverse views of Hartley's doctrine, are lavish of encomiums upon his virtues and purity of character. A very brief and very dry biography was composed by his son, with filial regard and quaint delineation. A few fragments from this recondite production will present the philosopher "in the habit and manner as he lived." His person was of middle size, and well proportioned. His complexion fair, his features regular and handsome. His countenance open, ingenious, and animated. He was peculiarly neat in person and attire. He lived in personal intimacy with the learned men of his age, among whom was light, bishop of Durham; Butler, bishop of Durham; Warburton, bishop of Gloucecester; Hoadley, successively bishop of Bangor, Hereford, and Winchester; Pope and Young; Dr. Jortin and Dr. Byron; Hawkins, Browne, and Hooke, the forgotten historian of Rome. The list is sufficiently heterogeneous. "His mind was formed to benevolence and universal philanthropy. His genius was penetrating and active, his industry indefatigable, his philosophical observations and attentions unremitting. His natural temper was gay, cheerful, and sociable. He was addicted to no vice in any part of his life, neither to pride, nor to sensuality, nor intemperance, nor ostentation, nor envy, nor to any sordid self-interest; but his heart was replete with every contrary virtue." Philosophy.—Hartley neither proclaimed nor produced any scheme of speculation, nor did he pretend to consciousness of that his views were characterized by the siggle of originality. He investigated and endeavored to explain certain phenomena of the human mind, and to discover the machinery of thought. He has bequeathed a doctrine which has been in part generally adopted, and which has been frequently exaggerated by admirers who have misunderstood, misrepresented, and have been ignorant of the characteristic ground-work on which it had been erected. The source and filiation of his tenets have been indicated by him with what Sir James Mackintosh conceives to have been extravagant generosity. Hartley's acknowledgments are, however, made in ignorance of his much larger, but more remote obligations to Aristotle. "About eighteen years ago," says he, in the preface of his work, "I was informed that the Rev. Mr. Gay, then living, asserted the possibility of deducing all our intellectual pleasures and pains from association. This put me upon considering the power of association, and my disquisitions foreign to the doctrine of association, or, at least, not immediately connected with it, intermixed themselves. "I think, however, that I cannot be called a system maker, since I did not first form a system, and then suit the facts to it, but was carried on by a train of thoughts from one thing to another, frequently without any express design, or even any previous suspicion of the consequences that might arise." Assuredly this is neither a systematic nor a philosophical method of procedure. But this easy dissertation of thought explains the instability, want of consistency, and partial incoherence of Hartley's musings. It also explains the suspected inconsequence with which a portion of the doctrine has been separated from its accompaniments for special acceptance and development.

The characteristic tenets of Hartley have been very clearly and concisely stated by Morell. "The objects of the external world affect in some manner the extreme ends of the nerves, which spread from the brain as a centre to every part of the body. This affection produces a vibration, which is continued along the nerve by the agency of an elastic ether until it reaches the brain, and sets up the phenomena of the sense of sensation. When a sensation has been experienced several times, the vibratory movement from which it arises acquires the tendency to repeat itself spontaneously, even when the external object is not present. These repetitions, or relics of sensations, are ideas, which in their turn affect the properties of the nerve by virtue of mutual association among themselves. . . . The subordinate effects of these principles are easy to be imagined. If all our ideas are but relics of sensations, and all excited spontaneously by the laws of association, it is abundantly evident that the power of the will is totally destitute of reality, that man really has no control of his own mind, that he is the creature of irresistible necessity. Hartley was accordingly a firm necessarian. Another natural effect of the theory of vibrations is materialism." The pernicious consequences of their dogmas are peregrinately displayed by Coleridge, who had at one time been so devoted to the teaching of the Church of England, that he bestowed the name of their author upon his son, Hartley Coleridge.

In this speculation there are three distinct but intimately connected doctrines. 1. The theory of the association of ideas. 2. The physiological and physical mode of producing for this association of perception by the vibrations of an elastic ether through the medullary substance of the nerves. 3. The assertion of the necessity of human actions. The last of these connects itself with the optimism of Leibnitz and the fatalism of Spinoza, through King's Origin of Evil. The second dogma was early abandoned, at least in the form in which it was presented by this author. It was not entirely novel, but it was the most original portion of Hartley's labors, and through it he mainly influenced the development of the French philosophy. It was suggested by one of the queries in Newton's Optics, and may be traced through the animal spirits of Locke and Des Cartes, and the vortices and elastic ether of Des Cartes to the earlier philosophers, and up to Epicurus and Leucippus. It may merit renewed consideration if the physiological psychology now in prospect should give it a new shape. The doctrine of the vibration is regarded as being peculiarly Hartley's own. It was not altogether novel: he himself ascribes its first suggestion to Gay. It is presupposed in many suggestions of Locke, and is descended from a more remote and illusory association, which runs back to the Stoics—"the reputed fountain of so much error, the father of so much wisdom. It received, however, such an ingenious and extensive development from Hartley that Sir James Mackintosh rightly disregards the claims of Gay, but wrongly neglects earlier origins. It is largely incorporated into recent schemes of metaphysics, ethics, and aesthetics, but severed from the mechanical hypothesis which it originated, and has become an integral part of the impossible and unanswerable problem of the nature of human action. In this mutilated form it possesses a unquestionable truth; but still it is only an imperfect explanation of a limited class of mental and moral phenomena, and is easily pressed, as it has often been pushed, to absurd and hazardous conclusions. Coleridge has forcibly signalized its danger, without any express declaration that, wherever it deviates from the simpler exposition of Aristotle, it declines into error and immoral courses.

Literature.—Hartley, Observations on Man, his Frame, his Duty, his Expectations, with Notes and Additions by Herman Andreas Paulus. (London 1791, 3 vols. 8vo.) An abridgment of the original edition had been published by Dr. Priestley (London 1775), with the omission of the doctrine of vibrations and vibratimules. It is from this mutilated presentation that the theory of Association has been principally derived. Hume, Inquiry concerning the Human Understanding, sec. ii. vii. Reid, On the Intellectual Powers. Hartlib, Samuel, an English writer of the 17th century, was born of Polish Protestant parents. He came to England about 1640, took an active part in the theological questions of the day, and endeavored to bring about a union of the different churches. He afterwards devoted himself to the improvement of agriculture, etc. Having spent all his fortune in these attempts, he received from Cromwell a pension of £300, which was suppressed at the Restoration. He spent the latter part of his life in retirement, and perhaps in want. The exact time of his death is unknown. He wrote A Relation of that which hath been lately attempted to procure Ecclesiastical Peace among Protestants (London 1641).—Considerations concerning England's Reformation in Church and State (1647, 4to) — Fiseua's doubting concern's proceed (1652, 8vo); some works on Husbandry, etc. Millington has edited his Essays on Agriculture and other subjects. See Gentleman's Magazine, lxxii; Cassius literaria, vol. iii; Chalmers, General Biographical Dictionary.

Hartmann, Anton Theodor, a German Protestant theologian and Orientalist, was born at Dusseldorf June 25, 1774. He studied at Osnabruck, Dortmunt, and Göttingen. After being successively co-rector of the gymnasium of Sest in 1797, rector of the gymnasium of Herford in 1799, and professor in that of Oldenburg in 1804, he was appointed professor of theology in the University of Rostock in 1811. He died at Rostock April 21, 1838. He is especially known for his works on antiquities, and Arabic and Hebrew literature, the principal of which are Aufklärung u. Arien f. Bibelforscher (Oldenburg 1806-7, 2 vols. 8vo) —Die Hebrew in der Putschfische u. des Braut (Ams 1809-1810, 3 vols. 8vo) — Supplement ad J. B. Buxtorf et W. Gesenii Lexic. Hartwig, John Christopher, came to America as chaplain to a German regiment in the service of England during the first French war, as it is called. He was a member of the first Lutheran synagogue held in this country in 1748. His first regular charge combined several congregations in Huntingdon Co., N. J. He labored for a brief period in Pennsylvania, but the larger portion of his ministry was spent in the state of New York. He died in 1786. The manner of his death furnishes a remarkable instance of the power of the imagination. Forty years before, the impression from a dream on his birthday, that he would live just forty years longer, had become so strong that he felt persuaded the dream would be fulfilled, and his life protracted to the close of his eightieth year. On the day preceding its completion he came to the residence of the Hon. J. R. Livingston, and announced that he had come to his house to die. In the evening he conducted the family devotions, and the next morning arose in apparent health. He breakfasted with the family, and entered freely into conversation until the approach of the hour, as he supposed, for his departure, 11 o'clock A.M. A few minutes before the time, he requested permission to retire. Mr. Livingston, unobserved by him, followed, and noticed that he was undressing. Just as the clock tolled the hour, he was in the act of removing the stock from the neck; at that moment he fell back and expired. Notwithstanding his eccentricities, he possessed many noble qualities, and his name will ever be associated with the institution in Otego Co., N. Y., which bears his name, and of which he may be said to be the founder. The tract of land he received for his services as chaplain he bequeathed principally for the establishment of a theological and missionary institution for the instruction of pious young men for the Lutheran ministry, and for the education of Indians in the Christian religion as missionaries among their own tribes. Harum (Heb. Harūm', חָרֻם, elevated; Sept. ʻı̇s̱̊i̇p), the father of Aharal, the "families" of which latter are enumerated among the posterity of Cox, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8). B.C. post 1612.

Harumaph (Heb. Charumarph), חָרֻמָרָפ, mub-nosed; Sept. ʼē̂rmāph v. r. ʼē̂rmāph, "father" of Jedahah, which latter was one of the priests who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10). B.C. ante 446.

Haruphite (Heb. Charuphē, כָּרֻפֶּה, with the art.; for which the Masoretic margin more correctly reads ʼi̇r̄it, Haruphite; Sept. ʻārōphē v. r. ʻārōphē, Vulg. Haruphites), an epitaph of Shephardiah, one of the brave adventurers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5); so called, probably, as being a native of Haruph. "Jomada the Gederathite," of the preceding verse, was probably from the same place; and as he was so called from being a resident of Gedor (q. v.), it would seem that the epitaph "Haruphite" was an equivalent one, as a descendant from Hareph (q. v.), the founder of Gedor (1 Chron. ii. 51).

Haruz (Heb. Ḥaráz, Ḥáraz, eager, as in Prov. xxii. 27, etc.; Sept. Ἀροῦς, a citizen of Jothab, and father of Meshelemeth, who became the wife of king Manasseh, and mother of king Amon (2 Kings xxi. 19). B.C. ante 604.

Harvard, John, founder of Harvard College, Cambridge, Mass., was born in England, studied at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he became A.M. in 1655, and entered into the ministry among the Dissenters. Emigrating to America, he became pastor of a Congregational society at Charlestown, Mass., where he preached but a short time, and died Sept. 14, 1658. In his will he left a legacy of nearly $2000 to the high-school of Cambridge. This bequest laid the foundation of the college, to which the trustees gave the name of its benefactor.

Harvest (חָרְסָה, kātser, L. e. reaping; ἀκρούς), the season of gathering grain or fruits. In general, this fell, as now in Palestine, in the middle of April or Abib (John iv. 35), although in many parts, e. g. at Jericho (whose inhabitants were the first to present the first-fruits, Mishnah, Pesach, iv. 8), it began as early as March (Shaw, Trav. p. 291). (See Gerdes, De tempore messis Hebrenorum, Utrecht, 1720.) Dr. Robinson says: "On the 4th and 6th of June, the people of Hebron were just beginning to gather their wheat; on the 11th and 12th, the threshing-flows on the Mount of Olives were in full operation. We had already seen the harvest in the same state of progress on the plains of Gaza on the 19th of May; while at Jericho, on the 12th of May, the threshing-flows had nearly completed their work" (Bib. Res. ii. 99, 100). On the sixteenth day of the first month, Abib or Nisan (Josephus, Ant. iii. 10, 5), a handful of ripe ears was offered before the Lord as the first-fruits; after which it was lawful to put the sickle to the corn (Lev. xxiii. 9-14). (See Schramm, De manipulo hordeaeo, Freiburg. a. O. 1706.) The harvest is described as beginning with the barley, and with the festival of the Passover (Lev. xxiii. 9-14; 2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10; Ruth ii. 23), and ending with the wheat (Gen. xxx. 14; Exod. xxxvi. 22), and with the festival of Pentecost (Exod. xxi. 16). (See Otho, Lex. Robb. p. 684.) In the most ancient times the corn was plucked up by the roots. When the sickle was used, the wheat was either cropped off under the ear, or cut close to the ground; in the former case, the straw was afterwards plucked up for use, and in the latter, the stubble was left and burnt on the ground for manuse (Isa. xvii, 5; Job xxiv, 34). The sheaves were collected into a heap, or removed to the threshing-floor (Gen. xxxvii, 7; Lev. xxiii, 10-15; Ruth ii, 7-15; Job xxiv, 10, Jer. ix, 22; Mic. iv, 12; Amos ii, 13). In Palestine at the present day, the grain is not bound into sheaves, but is gathered into two large bundles, which are carried home on either side of the backs of animals (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 323). The reapers were the owners and their children, and men and women servants (Ruth ii, 4, 8, 21, 23; John iv, 36; James v, 4). Refreshments were provided for them, especially drink, of which the gleaners were often allowed to partake (Ruth ii, 12, 13, 14). Some of them were Egyptians; see reaper drinking, and the gleaners applying to share the draught. The time of harvest was a season of very great enjoyment, especially when the crops had been plentiful (Psa. cxxvi, 1-6; Isa. ix, 5). The harvest in Scripture is likewise put for a time of destruction (Hos. vi, 11), according to the word of the Lord, addressing the remnant of Israel in his anger (Jer. ii, 26). The reaper strips off the whole bulk of corn, and the remnant shall be no more in proportion than the scattered ears left to the gleaner. In Joel iii, 18, the last words explain the figurative language which precedes: they are ripe for excision. The same comparison is used in Rev. xiv, 14; xv, 18, where the person referred to as exercising vengeance is Jesus Christ himself, though angels assist in the execution. But harvest is also used in a good sense, as in Matt. ix, 37; Luke x, 2; John iv, 35. So in Jer. vii, 20, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved;" i.e. the time in which we expected to be saved is past. The harvest, in agricultural reckoning, is considered to be the end of the season, being the time appointed for gathering in the fruits of the earth, and finishing the labors of the year. So, in Matt. xiii, 39, our Lord says, "The harvest is the end of the world, and the reapers are the angels." In Matt. ix, 36-38, according to multitudes coming to hear him, remarks, "The harvest truly is plentiful;" i.e. many are willing to receive instruction. See AGRICULTURE.

Harwood, Edward, a learned Unitarian minister, was born in 1729 in Lancashire. In 1754 he became master of a school at Congleton, in Cheshire, from whence he removed in 1763 to Bristol, where he was ordained over a Baptist congregation in 1771. He obtained his degree of D.D. from Edinburgh, through the interest of Dr. Chandler, whose daughter he married. His character, however, was so immoral that his congregation dismissed him; on which he came to London, where he supported himself by teaching the classics and mathematics. In 1782 he obtained the so-called "mystical" school of Stillig and Lavater. He also wrote against Semler and other rationalists, who feared his influence, and his publications were condemned as "unprofitable and pernicious." See U. die verduenkte Aufklarung (Duish, 1789) — Briefe uber Propheten (Duish, 1791), etc. He died in 1795.

Johann Heinrich, another brother, was born Sept. 19, 1760. After helping his parents until he was sixteen years old, he began his studies, was from 1776 to 1779 rector at Emmich, and, having been appointed pastor of a small congregation near Altona, remained there ten years. He returned to Berlin, and spent the last third of his life in the solitude of his remote parish influenced his character, yet he is the most genial of the three brothers, as is seen in his Christliche Schriften (Munster, 1816-19, 2 vols.). He died July 17, 1814.—Herrn, Real-Encyklop. : Pierer, Universal-Lezikon, s. v. (J. N.).

Hasenau, or rather Senehu (Senehu), a briefing [Gesen.] or hates [First], with the art. "aha, Senehu," the name of two Benjamites (but the name has the fem. termination).

1. (Sept. 'Aravvou, Eng. Ver. "Hasenau.") Father of Hodaviah and ancestor of Salli, which last was a chief resident of Jerusalem, apparently after the Captivity (I Chron. ix, 7). B.C. ante 586.

2. (Sept. 'Aravvou, Eng. Ver. "Senehu.") Father of Joebah, which latter was "second over the city," after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi, 9). B.C. cir. 440.

Hashab'ah (Heb. Chaschabah), חָשְׂכֵּבָּה, and in 1 Chron. xxv, 3; xxvi, 29; 2 Chron. xxvii, 9, the prolonged form Chaschabahu, חָשְׂכֵּבָּה, regarded by Jeroboam; Sept. 'Aṣṣib, 'Aṣṣib, ו'אֶֽסַ֣יָּב, 'Aṣṣib, etc., the name of at least nine descendants of Levi.

1. Son of Amaziah and father of Malluch, of the family of Merari (1 Chron. vi, 45). B.C. long ante 1014.

2. A son of Jeduthun, appointed by David over the twelfth course of Levitical singers (1 Chron. xxv, 9, 19); B.C. 1014.

3. Son of Kemuel, of Hebron, appointed by David at the head of the officers to take charge of the sacred revenue west of the Jordan (1 Chron. xxviii, 30; xxvii, 17); B.C. 1018.

4. One of the chief Levites who made voluntary offerings of victims for the renewal of the Temple services under Josiah (2 Chron. xxx, 9). B.C. 623.

5. Son of Bunu and father of Azrikam, of the family of Merari (1 Chron. ix, 14; Neh. xi, 18). B.C. considerably ante 440.

7. One of the chief priests intrusted by Ezra with the bullion and other valuables for the sacred vessels at Jerusalem (Ezra viii, 24). He is probably the same whose father Hilkiah is mentioned in Neh. xii, 21. B.C. 488.

8. A descendant of Merari, who complied with Ezra's summons for persons to perform the proper Levitical functions at Jerusalem (Ezra viii, 19). B.C. 486.

9. A chief of the Levites (Neh. xii, 4), "ruler of the half part of Keilah," who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (iii, 17), and subscribed the covenant of fidelity to Jehovah (x, 11). B.C. 486-440.

Hashabnath (Heb. Chaschabnayku, חָשְׂכֵּבָּנַ֖יַּךְ, q. r. חָשְׂכֵּבָּנָּךְ, Hashabonah), Sept. 'Aṣṣib, "Son of the Levite, a Valley." The name of two men about the time of the return from Babylon.

1. Father of Hattush, which later repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 10). B.C. ante 440.

2. (One of the Levites appointed by Ezra to interpret the law to the people (Neh. ix, 5). B.C. cir. 410.

Hashbadana (Heb. Chaschhadanahu, חָשְׂכֵּבָּדָֽןָּה, consideration in judging, prob. q. d. considerate judge; Sept. 'Aṣṣib, Vulg. Hasebonana), one of those who stood at Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the people (Neh. vii, 4). B.C. cir. 410.

Hash-Baz. See MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ.

Ha'shem (Heb. Hashhem, הַשֵּׁם, prob. q. r. הַשֵּׁם, fud; Sept. 'Aṣṣib, Vulg. Asamem), a native of Gideon, and ancestor of two of David's heroes (1 Chron. xi, 94; the Jashen (q. v.) of 2 Sam. xxvii, 32). B.C. ante 1014.

Hashshim. See ASSASSINS.

Hashmannim (Hebrew Chaschmannim, חָשְׂכֵּמִים, probably from חָשְׂכֵּמֶל, Vulg. ignitum), a plural form occurring only in the Heb. of Ps. lxxviii, 31: "Hashmannim [A. V., princes] shall come out of Egypt, Cush shall make her hands to hasten to God." The word has usually been derived from the Arabic Mashkan, rich, hence influential or noble; but a derivation from the civil name of Hermon, "the great mountain in the Shephelah," preserved in the modern Arabic Aschmanan, "the two Ashmans," seems more reasonable. The ancient Egyptian name is Nosamon or Hashmonim, "the abode of eight," the sound of the sigil for eight, however, we take alone from the Greek, and Brugsch reads them Senen (Grec. Inschr. c, 219, 230), but hardly on conclusive grounds. If we suppose that Hashmannim is a proper name and signifies Hermopolites, the mention might be explained by the circumstance that Hermopolis Magna was the great city of the Egyptian Hermes, Thoth, the god of wisdom; and the meaning might therefore be that even the wisest Egyptians should come to the Temple, as well as the distant Cushites.—Smith, s. v. We may add that the name Hasmonean, which was given to the Maccabees or Jewish princes in the interval between the O. and N. T., was, it is supposed, derived from Hashmannim (Hengstenberg, Psalms, ii, 369).

Hashmona'nah (Heb. Chaschmona'nah, חָשְׂכֵּמְנָּה, father; Sept. 'Aṣṣimbetha, יְרֵא אֶשֶׁם בֵּית, Sepherim, a child-smotherer, and in 1 Chron. xxv, 29, 30; apparently near the intersection of wady el-Jerach with wady el-Jeib, in the Arabah. See EXODUS.

Ha'shub (Heb. Chaschab, חָשְׂכָּב, intelligent; Sept. 'Aṣṣib, in Neh. xi, 15 'Aṣṣib, in 1 Chron. ix, 14 'Aṣṣib; Vulg. Hasb, in 1 Chron. ix, 14 Hasb), the name of two or three men about the time of the return from Babylon.

1. A Levite of the family of Merari, son of Azrikam and father of Shemaiah, which last was one of those resident in the "villages of the Netophathites," and having general oversight over the Temple (Neh. xi, 15; 1 Chron. ix, 14, in which latter passage the name is more accurately anglicized Ha'shab). B.C. ante 410.

2. A person who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem opposite his house (Neh. iii, 21); perhaps the same with the foregoing. B.C. 446.

3. "Son" of Pahath-Moab, and one of those who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 11). B.C. ante 446. He is probably the same with one of the chief Israelites who joined in the sacred covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. x, 23). B.C. cir. 410.

Hash'sban (Heb. Chaschban, חָשְׂכֶּבָן, esteemed, a Chaldaizing form for לְשֻּׁבִּין, Lechobin), one of the five sons (exclusive of Zerubbabel) of Pedaiah, the descendant of David (1 Chron. iii, 20; not of Zerubbabel, as at first appears (see Strong's Hymnary and Expos. of the Gospels, p. 17). B.C. cir. 530.

Ha'shum (Heb. Chaschum, חָשְׂכָּם, opulent; Sept. 'Aṣṣib, 'Aṣṣib, 'Aṣṣib, 'Aṣṣib, 'Aṣṣib, the name apparently of two or three men about the time of the Captivity.

1. An Israelite whose posterity (or rather, perhaps, a place whose inhabitants), to the number of 223 males, or 328 in all, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 19; Neh. vii, 22), some of whom were regarded as "descendants of the heads of the242.312; and a few occasional disconsolate. He also edited Mc Culloch's Geographical Dictionary, published by the Harpers (1843-44).—Sprague, Annals, ii, 526.

Hasmoneans. See ASMONAEAN.

Haspeya (חֵסְפְּיָא), a river and town of Palestine, HASRAH
near Lebanon, mentioned in the Talmud (Demay, iii); according to Schwarz (Palest. p. 60), identical with the modern Arabic Korom, near the source of the Jordan; evidently the modern Hasbeia, an important place in that region (Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii, 880).

Has'tah (Heb. Chaštah, חַשְׁתָּה, poverty; Sept. 'Es'-hê, v.r. Ἀσάς, Vulg. Haaor), the father (or mother) of Tikhath, and grandfather of Shallum, which last was husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 Chron. xxiv, 22).

The parallel passage (2 Kings xxii, 14) gives the name, prob. by transposition, in the form HARIAS (חָרִיָּס, Sept. 'Athôs, Vulg. Arosas). Hasrah is said to have been "keeper of the wardrobe," perhaps the sacerdotal vestments; if, indeed, that epithet does not rather refer to Shalum. Hasrah is, consequently, ant. 629.

Hassan. See AASSASIN.

Hasse, FRIEDRICH RUDEL, a German theologian, was born at Dresden June 29, 1808. After studying at Leipzig and Berlin, he established himself, in 1834, at the university of the latter city as privatdozent; in 1838 he became extraordinary professor of Church History at the University of Greifswald, and in 1844 ordinary professor at the University of Bonn. Subsequently he was also appointed consistorial councillor. He died in 1862.

His principal work is the excellent monograph Ansat von Canterbury (Leips. 1843–52, 2 vols.), one of the best works of this class, and which had the merit of causing a more generous treatment of the subject of scholasticism. His Geschicthe des alten Bundes (Leips. 1863) is a course of lectures, and, as such, is meritorious. His Kirchengeschichte was published after his death by Köhler (Leips. 1864, 3 vols.). See Krafft, F. R. Hasse (Bonn, 1865); Studien u. Kirkritik, 1867, p. 823.

Hasse', (Neh. iii, 3). See HASSAH.

Has-shub (1 Chron. ix, 14). See HASHAH.

Hat (Heb. Chatshah, חַטְשָׂה, un covered; Sept. Ἀσάς, 'Aσάς; Vulg. Haresia), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Exra ii, 43; Neh. vii, 46, in which latter passage the name is less correctly Anglicized "Hasheupha"). B.C. ante 536.

Hat is the rendering of the Eng. Bille for the Chald. ܚܛܐ (karbela), according to Genesis from ܓܕܓܕ, to gird or clothe, as in 1 Chron. xv, 27, a mantle or pallium (Dan. iii, 21; marg. "turbans"). See DRUS.

Hat'ah (Heb. Hathok, חַתֹּכ, perhaps from Persic, herkyt; Sept. Ἀρχαστος, Vulg. Alhach), one of the eunuchs of the palace of Xerxes, appears to wait on Esther, whom she employed in her communications with Mordecai (Esth. iv, 5, 6, 9, 10). B.C. 474.

Hatamen, a word corrupted from achievement, and signifying, in heraldry, the armorial bearings of any person fully embazoned with shield, crest, supporters, etc. The word is used in England for the escutcheon hung up over a door after a funeral, and often in the church. Heraldry is thus supposed to have been formerly connected with religion. The coat was said to be assumed with religious feeling, and at length restored to the sanctuary, in token of thankful acknowledgment to Almighty God. Farrar, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v.

Hate (properly מַהֲרָה, ma'ürah), to regard with a passion contrary to love (Jer. xlix, 4). God's hatred is towards all sinful thoughts and ways. It is a feeling of which all holy beings are conscious in view of sin, and is wholly unlike the hatred which is mentioned in the Scriptures among the works of the flesh (Gal. v, 20), See Anger. When the Hebrews compared a stronger affection with a weaker one, they called the first love, and the other hate, meaning to love in a less degree—"Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated" (Rom. ix, 13); i.e. on Jacob have I bestowed privileges and blessings such as are the proofs of affection; I have treated him as one treats a friend whom he loves; but from Esau have I withheld these privileges and blessings, and therefore treated him as one is wont to treat those whom he dislikes. That this refers to the bestowment of temporal blessings, and the withholding of them, is clear, not only from this passage, but from comparing Mal. i, 2, 3; Gen. ix, 26; xxxii, 27; 27, 58. Indeed, as to hated, its meaning here is rather privative than positive. So, "if a man have two wives, one beloved and another hated" (Deut. xxx, 15); i.e. less beloved. When our Saviour says that he who would follow him must hate father and mother, he means that even these dearest earthly friends must be loved in a subordinate degree; so, in the same sense, the follower of Christ is to hate his own life, or be willing to sacrifice it for the love and service of the Redeemer (Gen. xxxix, 30; Deut. xxxi, 16; Prov. xiii, 24; Matt. vi, 24; x, 57; Luke xiv, 26, xxv, 39; see Love.

Hathath (Heb. Chatshah, חַתְשָׂה, terror, as in Job vi, 21; Sept. 'As'shah, son of Othniel and grandson of Kenaz, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 18), consequently also grand-nephew and grandson of Caleb, son of Jephunneh (see ver. 15, and comp. Judg. i, 18). B.C. post 1612.

Hath'ipha [many Hat'ipha], [Hebrew Chatshiphô, חַטְשִׁפֹּה, captured, Sept. Ἀσάπος, 'Aspôs], one of the Nethinim whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 54; Neh. vii, 56). B.C. ante 536.

Hatt'ite [some Hatt'ite], [Hebrew Chatshitā, חַטְשִׁית, exploration; Sept. 'Aretâ], one of the "porters" (i.e. Levites, הַנְּפִלָיו, 'Nefilâ, who their posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 42; Neh. vii, 45). B.C. ante 536.

"half of the Menuchoth," or "Hatsbam-Menuchoth"), one of the two sons of Shobal, the father of Kiriath-jearim (1 Chron. ii, 52); whence the patronymic for his descendants, Hatasi-ham-Manuchothites (חַטָּסִי מְנַעְחוֹת, Sept. Ἀσάς τῆς Μανιδίου, Vulg. dimidium requisitiones, Eng. Ver. "half of the Manahethites," or "half of the Menuchoth"), in verse 54. B.C. between 1612 and 1098. See MENUCHITE.

Hattemists, a Dutch sect, named from Pontianus van Hattem, a minister in Zeeland towards the close of the 18th century, who imbibed the sentiments of Spinoza, and was degraded from the pastoral office. He wrote a treatise on the Heidelberg Catechism. The Verschoorists (q. v.) and Hattemists resemble each other. While Van Hattem tried in vain to unite the Verschoorists with his own followers. "The founders of these sects followed the doctrine of absolute decrees into its farthest logical results; they denied the difference between moral good and moral evil; they denied the corruption of man's nature from whence they further concluded that the whole of religion consisted, not in acting, but in suffering: and that all the precepts of Jesus Christ are reducible to this one—that we bear with cheerfulness and patience the events that happen to us through the divine will, and make it our constant and only study to maintain a perfect tranquillity of mind. Thus far they agreed; but the Hattcimists further affirmed that Christ made no expiration for the sins of men by his death, but had only suggested to us, by his mediation, that there was nothing in us that could offend the Deity: this, they say, was Christ's manner of justifying himself and of forgiving our sins before the tribunal of God. It was one of their distinguishing tenets that God does not punish men for their sins, but by their sins."—See MOEHEIM, CH. HISTORY.
HATTIL (Heb. Chattil', שַׁחֵל, weaving; Sept.'Arril, Εὐράκη), one of the descendants of "Solomon's servants" i.e. perh. Gibeonitish Temple slaves), whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 57; Neh. vii, 58). B.C. ante 536.

Hatto, bishop of Basel, was born 763, made bishop in 835, and abbot of Reichenau in 865. He was employed by Charlemagne in an embassy to the Greek emperor Nicephorus, to settle the boundaries of both empires. Having, in 825, laid aside his titles and dignities, he died in 836 as a simple monk at Reichenau. Two of his works have descended to us: De visione Wetlinii (Visions of his disciple Wetlini on those suffering in Purgatory and on the Glory of the Saints, done into verse by Walfrid Strabo, and printed in Mahillon, Acta S. Benedicti, iv, 1, 273); 25 cupitata (D'Achery, i, 584).—Herzig, Real-Encyclopädie, s. v.; Clarke, Succession of S. Liter. ii, 471.

Hatton or Otho I, tenth archbishop of Mentz. The time and place of his birth are unknown. In 888 he succeeded Rudolf as abbot of Reichenau, then one of the richest monasteries in Germany. He was in such favor with king Arnulf—thanks to his skill and utter want of principle—that he is said to have held at the same time eleven other abbies. In 891 he was elected archbishop of Mentz: here he built a church to St. George, having obtained the head and another part of the body of the saint from pope Formosus! In August, 893, he presided at the Council of Tribur, where the emper and 22 bishops were present. They voted 58 canons, mostly for the repression of crime. The 8th canon gives an idea of the power Rome held even at that period over the German churches: Honorem sancti romani et apostolici sedem, ut quis nobis sacerdotalis maior dignitas, debeat esse magisra ecclesiasticae ratione quare. . . . . . In verticem ererarum ubi sancta ecclesiae sanctorum hostis adducatur, &c. After Louis's death, in October, 911, Hatto was retained in the council of his successor, Conrad. Hav- ing departed on a journey to Rome, March 13, 918, he died a few days after of fever, according to one account; but, according to others, he was killed at the battle of Hermansteyn by the Danish hero, Hoder. Hatto or Otho II, surname Bonose, 15th archbishop of Mentz. He was abbot of Fulda, and, at the death of archbishop William of Saxony, March 2, 968, was appointed his successor by Emperor Otho I. Hatto died in 965. The Magdeburg Chronicles state that he was eaten alive by rats as a punishment for his avarice, and because he had, during a famine, compared the poor to these animals; and he is the subject of the well-known legend of the Rat Tower on the Rhine.—See Gallia Christiana, v, col. 456; Hoefer, Nouv. Haṭṭuṣ (Heb. Chattuṣ, כַּחַת, prob. assembled [Farn, contester]: Sept.'Ar'ṭā, but Xerōxog in 1 Chron. iii, 22, and v. Artaxō in Ezra viii, 2), the name of several men about or after the time of the return from Babylon.
1. A priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii, 2). B.C. 536.
3. Son of Ishahannah, and one of those who rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 10). B.C. 446. He was possibly the same with No. 2.
4. One of the priests who united in the sacred covenant with Nebemiah (Neh. x, 4). B.C. cir. 410.
5. One of the sons of Neb-zai, among the posterity of of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii, 29), and contemporary with the Nagge of Lake iii, 25 (seeStrong's Hts., and Exs. of the Gospels, p. 17). B.C. somewhat post 406. By some it is identified with No. 2 above, reading Ezra vii, 2 (after the Sept.) thus: "of the sons of David: Hattush, of the sons of Shekaniah." This, however, is not only forbidden by other chronological notices [see Dan., Zech. chs. 6, 7], but rests on the same obvious support for the genuineness of the text itself in question; where, as in vers. 5, we may suppose that a name is missing, or that the name Shekaniah itself has crept in from the latter verse, since it appears nowhere else than as that of a family head. See SIYAM (Heb. Shekhaniah) (Heb. Chavvaonna, Haan Nielsen Haune was born in Rennes, France, April 3, 1771. He had strong religious impressions in youth, which produced a gloomy state of mind. But in 1795 he passed through a change which filled him with joy. Ever after, amid all vicissitudes, he was a cheerful Christian. He soon began to preach, and made a powerful impression on the public mind. He travelled extensively in Norway and Denmark, wrote many tracts, and in 1804 established a printing-office in Christiansand to disseminate his sentiments. He obtained many followers, but finally, through the influence of the clergy, was punished with a heavy fine and imprisonment. In this he lived in Rennes until his death in 1824. In doctrine, Haune differed from evangelical Protestants in general in but few points: e.g. he held that the ministry is a common duty, and that specially ordained and separated ministers are unnecessary: also that Church creeds and Confessions are of no great account. He properly placed great stress upon faith and its effects, but it was in a one-sided way. Nevertheless, his labors contributed largely to the revival of evangelical religion. The party called Hauganeness is still numerous in Norway: they contend against the laxness of Church discipline and against Rationalism, and have much influence on the people. Hau' ran (Heb. Charram') [7727]; Sept. Ἀναφάντις and Ἰμνικής, the Auranitis of Josephus and others, the Haoran of the Arabs, so called prob. from the multitude of caves, discovered there, which even at the present day deeply shadow the district or region of Syria, south of Damascus, east of Gaulonitis (Golan) and Bashan, and west of Trachonitis, extending from the Jabkob to the territory of Damascus-Syria; mentioned only in Ez. xlvii, 16, 18, in defining the north-eastern border of the Promised Land. It was probably of small extent originally, but received extensive additions from the Romans under the name of Auranitis. Josephus frequently mentions Auranitis in connection with Trachonitis, Batanea, and Gaulonitis, which with it constituted the ancient kingdom of Bashan (War, i, 29, 4, ii, 17, 4). It formed part of that "gigantior ymasas" referred to by Luke (iii, 1) as subject to Philip the tetrarch (comp. Joseph. Ant. xvii, 11, 4.). It is bounded on the west by Gaulo- nitis, on the north by the wild and rocky district of Trachonitis, on the east by the mountainous region of Batanea, and on the south by the great plain of Gilead. It is represented by Burckhardt (Travels in Syria, p. 51, 211, 285, 291) as a volcanic region, composed of porous tufa, pumice, and basalt, with the remains of a crater on the tell Shoba, which is on its eastern border. It produces, however, crops of corn, and has many patches of luxuriant herbage, which are frequented in summer; by the Arab tribes for pasturage. The surface is perfectly flat, and not a stone is to be seen save on the few low volcanic tells that rise up here and there like islands in a sea. It contains upwards of a hundred towns and villages, most of them now deserted, though not ruined. The buildings in many of these are remarkable for the great trees that grow around them, and the roofs and doors are of stone, evidently of remote antiquity (see Porter’s Five Years in Damascus, vol. ii.). According to E. Smith (in Robinson’s Researches, iii. Append. p. 130-157), the modern province of Hauran is regarded by the natives as consisting of three parts, called el-Menah, el-Lejah, and el-Abel. The first of these terms designates the plains of Hauran as above defined, extending through its whole length, from wady el-Ajam on the north to the desert on the south. On the west of it is Jeidur, Jaulan, and Jebel Ajlin; and on the east the Lejah and Jebel Hauran. It has a gentle undulating surface, is arable throughout, and, in general, very fertile. With the rest of Hauran, it is the granary of Damascus. The soil belongs to the government, and nothing but grain is cultivated. Hardy a tree appears anywhere. The region still abounds in caves, which the inhabitants have excavated partly as cellars for the collection of water, and partly for granaries in which to secure their grain from plunderers. Edhemisken is considered the capital of the whole Hauran, being the residence of the chief of all its sheiks. The inhabitants of this district are chiefly Muslems, who in manner of dress resemble the Bedouins, and there is sprinkling also of professed Christians, and latterly of the Druses (Murray’s Handbook, p. 499). The second division, or el-Lejah, lying east of the Nukrah and north of the mountains, has an elevation about the same as that of the Nukrah, but it is said to be almost a complete labyrinth of ravines among the rocks. The Lejah is the resort of several small tribes of Bedawin, who make it their home, and who continually issue forth from their rocky fastnesses on predatory excursions, and attack, plunder, or destroy, as suits their purpose. They have had the same character from a very remote period. The third division is the portion of Hauran, and appears from the north-west, as an isolated range, with the conical peak called Kelb and Kuleib Hauran (the dog), which is probably an extinct volcano, near it southern extremity. But from the neighborhood of Busrat it is discovered that a lower continuation exists according to our usual idea, the lower range stands the castle of Sulhadt, distinctly seen from Busrat. This mountain is perhaps the Aladsamas of Ptolemy. (See Lightfoot, Op. i., 316; ii. 474; Reland, Palest. p. 190; Journal of Soc. Lit. July, 1854; Graham, in Journ. Roy. Geol. HAUSMANN, NICOLAUS, an intimate friend of Luther, and the reformer of the city of Zwiekaun and the duchy of Anhalt, was born in 1479 at Freiberg. He became at first preacher at Schneeburg, subsequently at Zwiekaun, where he had many and severe controversies with the adherents of Thomas Münzer. In 1532 he was appointed pastor of Dessau, having been warmly recommended by Luther. In 1538 he accepted a call as superintendent to his native town Freiberg, but while preaching his first sermon (Nov. 6) he was struck with apoplexy, which caused his immediate death. Luther deeply bemoaned his death, and praised him as a man of God. Two opinions are common on the reformation in Zwiekaun have been published by Pfeiler (Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1852). See O. G. Schmidt, Nic. Hausmann, der Freund Luther’s (Lpz. 1860). (A. S.)

HAUETAGE, JEAN, a French Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Puy Morin, near Toulouse, in 1735. He was educated by the Jesuits, but left them, and became a Jansenist. Having been ordained priest, he became vicar in a country church of the diocese of Toulouse, but his opinions being suspected, he was suspended. In 1766 he became sublector of the college of Auxerre, and canon of that city, but his Jansenistic views caused him to be again prosecuted, and in 1773 he was condemned to be whipped, branded, and sent to hard labor for six years. In 1779 he was banished. Hauetage had travelled through Southern Europe in company with another abbot, Duparc de Bellegarde, preaching his doctrines everywhere. While at Lausanne in 1775 and the following years, they published l’Exvra d’Astone Arnaud (4 vols. 8vo., 1773). In 1776 Hauetage published an abridgment of the Institution et Instruction chrétiennes (1785, 12mo.), and the 3d part of the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, 1761-1790 (1791, 4to.). During the Revolution, and until his death, Feb. 18, 1816, he devoted himself to teaching. See Silvy, Éloge de M. l’abbé Hauetage (Paris, 1816, 8vo.); Barher, Dict. des Anonymes; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. HAVELOCK, HENRY, an eminent English soldier and Christian, was born at Bishop Wearmouth, April 5, 1785. He was educated under the Rev. J. Bradley, curate of Dartford, Kent, until 1804, when he was sent to the Charterhouse. He afterwards became a pupil at the Bedowin school; there he was a special pleader of the day, to study law; but in the following year he followed his brother William into the army, and was appointed to the Rifle Brigade, where he became the 59th. After serving in England, Ireland, and Scotland, Havelock embarked for India in 1823. To serve in that part of the world was his own choice, for which he had qualified himself by studying Hindostanee and Persian before leaving England. During the voyage a great change passed on his religious views, and on arriving with his regiment in India, he determined to devote his attention to the spiritual welfare of his men, and to assemble them in public services, an opportunity that he met with during the Scriptures and devotional exercises, which he continued to do throughout the whole of his after career. In 1841 he was appointed Persian interpreter to general Elphinstone, and took part in the memorable defence of Jellalabad. On the completion of the works, Havelock suggested to general Sales to assemble the garrison and give thanks to Almighty God, who had enabled them to complete the fortifications necessary for their protection. "The suggestion was approved, and the command given. 'Let us pray,' said a well-known voice among the men. 'Let us pray.' Before the sun rose before the presence of the great God those soldiers reverently bowed, one and all of them, whilst the impulsive of a devout and grateful heart he poured forth supplication and praise in the name of the Great High-Priest." This incident is an illustration of Havelock's religious life during the whole of his military career. In the great Indian rebellion of 1857 he distinguished himself among a series of the most brilliant achievements in the annals of warfare; but still he was distinguished most by his personal piety, which shone resplendently amid the horrors of war. He died of dysentery at Alumbagh, Nov. 25, 1857, on the very day before the announcement of his elevation to the baronetcy under the title "Havelock of Lucknow," which was inherited by his eldest son, Henry Marshman Havelock (born 1805). He wrote, History of the Ava Campaigns (London, 1827)—Memoirs of the Afghan Campaign (Lond. 1841). See Brock’s Geographical Sketch of Havelock (Lond. 1858, 12mo.); Marshman, Memoirs of Sir Henry Havelock (Lond. 1868).

HAVEN (חֹוֶן, Choph, Gen. xlv. 13, a sea-side or "coast," as elsewhere rendered; בֹּאֵן, mabhasa', a refuge, hence a harbor, Ps. cvii. 90; λιμαναν, Acts xxvii. 12). The Phoenician part of the coast of Palestine had several fine harbors [see PHOENICIA], and some such were also in possession of the Hebrews: such were Cesarea and the others were Caesarea Philippi, which were afterwards used for coastwise communication (1 Macc. iv. 5, 34; Josephus, Ant. xx, 9, 6). The port (נְּבֵא נְבֵא) of Tyre

(q. v.) was the most famous on the whole Mediterranean shore (Ezek. xxvii, 8). A harbor is called the W. in Chaldee, also in Samaritan. See Navigation.

The Cretan harbor called Fair Haven (q. v.), Kaloai Amyntas, is incidentally mentioned in the N.T. (Acts xxvii, 8). See CRETE.

HAVENAS, James, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Mason Co., Ky., December 25, 1735. At eighteen he received license to preach, and in 1816 he entered the traveling ministry in the Ohio Conference. He served twelve years in circuits, and twenty-four as presiding elder. Possessing a strong constitutional and vigorous intellect, he taxed them both to the utmost in remedying the defects of his early education, and in making "full proof of his ministry." He became one of the most powerful preachers of his time, and contributed perhaps as much as any other man to build up the Church in the West, especially in Indiana, where the last forty years of his life were spent. He died in November, 1864. —Minutes of Conference, 1865, p. 190.

Hävernick, Heinrich Andreas Christoph, a German theologian, was born at Steinfurt, near Kevelaer, in 1805. He studied at Halle, and was one of the two students whose notes on the theological lectures of Wegscheider and Gesenius were used to institute a trial against those prominent champions of Rationalism. At the University of Berlin he closely attached himself to Heugenstengel. In 1834 he established himself as privatdozent at Rostock, and in 1841 he became ordinary professor of theology at Königsberg. He died in 1845 at New Strelitz. The exegetical works of Hävernick are counted among the most learned of the modern school. The most important of them are Commentarii über das Buch Daniel (Hamburg, 1832); —Mililungen de theologia reformata (Geneva, 1833); —Handbuch der krit. Einleitung in das A.T. (Erangen, 1836-39, 2 vols.; 2 ed. by Keil, 1849-54); —Neue Krit. Untersuchungen ü. das Buch Daniel (Hamburg, 1844); —Einleitung in das Buch Daniel (Leipzig, 1847); —d. Theologie des A.T. (ed. by Hahn, Frankf., 1848); 2d ed. by Schurz, Frankf., 1863). Translations: Gen. Introd. to G. T. (Edinb., 1852); —Introd. to the Pentateuch (Edinb., 1859).

HAVILAH (Heb. Chavilah', חַוֵ'לָה, signif. unknown; Sept. Χαβίλη, but Ewald in Gen. x. 29, Χαβίλα in Gen. ii. 11, and 1 Chron. i. 29; Vulg. Hevilia, but Heuita in Gen. ii. 11), the name of one of three regions; also perhaps of two men (B.C. cir. 2400).

1. A land rich in gold, bdellium, and shaham, mentioned in Gen. ii. 11, as flowed around (or through) by the river Pishon, in the geographical description of Paradise. Some identify this Havilah with one of those following; but others take it to be the Chwala, on the Caspian Sea, whence it seems to have said that it derived the name of Chalassiankyre (Sea of Chwala); and others suppose it a general name for India, in which case the river Pison, mentioned as surrounding it, would be identified with the Ganges, or even the Indus. Others again, who regard the Pishon as the Phasis, make Havilah to be Cockhis, for which some think there is the distinctive name in Scripture of the "Cardham" (q. v.). In Gen. ii. 11, 12, it is further described as the land where the best gold was found, and which was, besides, rich in the treasures of the bdellium and the stone shaham. That the name is derived from some natural peculiarity is evident from the presence of the article with all the terms. Whatever may be the true meaning of bdellium, be it carmuncula, or similar, balsamum, ebony, pepper, cloves, beryl, pearl, diamond, or emerald, all these detect its presence, under or one of these forms, which they select as the Havilah most appropriate to their own theory. As little difficulty is presented by the shaham: call it onyx, sardonix, emerald, sapphire, beryl, or sardius, it would be hard indeed if some of these precious stones could not be found in any conceivable locality to support even the most far-fetched and improbable conclusions. That Havilah is part of India through which the Ganges flows, and, more generally, the eastern region of the earth; that it is to be found in Susiana (Hopkinson), in Ava (Bottmann), or in the Ural region (Rauzer), are conclusions necessarily following upon the assumptions with regard to the Pison, Hartmann, Ficcarelli, and Rosenmüller, which are a sort of Colchis, the scene of the legend of the Golden Fleece. The Phasis was said to flow over golden sands, and gold was carried down by the mountain-torrents (Strabo x i, 2, § 19). The crystal (bdelloch) of Scythia was renowned (Sol. v. 13), and the emerald of this country were as far superior to other emeralds as the latter were to other precious stones (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxvii, 17), all which seems to prove that Havilah was Colchis. Rosenmüller argues, with much force, if the Phasis be the Pison, the land of Havilah must be Colchis, supposing that by this country the Hebrews had the idea of a Pontic or Northern India. In like manner Leclerc, having previously determined that the Pison must be the Chryssorhaxos, finds Havilah not far from Coele-Syria. Hasse (Entdeck. p. 49, 50, quoted by Rosenmüller) compares Havilah with the "Yasia of Herodotus (Strabo x i, 2). In the neighboring regions are Scythians, and the dragon which guarded the land of gold. Discussions about the site of Havilah will be found in all the chief Biblical commentators ancient and modern, as well as in Hottinger (Genesis Disserta.,) Huett (De Ist. Parad.,) Bochart (Pleynii, ii. ii, p. 493; Michaelis (Spicilegium, i. xiii, 298; Spenner (Parables, p. 105), Niebuhr and many other writers. The clearest and best account of any may be derived from Kalisch (Genesis, p. 239, 249, 267, etc.), who also gives a long list of those who have examined the subject (p. 109-102). The idea that the Phasis is not the Pison, and that the Phasis belong to the Fucurla has not been. Discussion HAS been made, but, in the light of the discoveries of the day, it is not at all probable that Havilah can be identified with either of those places mentioned, since they were evidently in or near Arabia; and the associated regions in the Elenic account are all in the neighborhood of Armenia or Ararat, near the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates. The most consistent conclusion, therefore, is that the Fucurla locates the Havilah in question at the north-eastern corner of Asia Minor, i.e. substantially Colchis. See PISON.

2. A district in Arabia Felix, deriving its name from the second son of Cash (Gen. x. 7); or, according to others, from the second son of Joktan (Gen. x. 29; compare xxxvii, 10). Some find in the other nameless son of that word occurs it is always used to designate a country, some doubt whether persons of this name ever existed; the more so as other names of countries (Ophir, Mizraim, Canaan, Sidon), and the collective names of tribes (Kittim, Dodanim), are freely introduced into the genealogy, which is undoubtedly arranged with partial reference to geographical distribution, as well as direct descent [see Sheba; Dedan, etc.] (see Kalisch, Genesis, p. 287). On this supposition it is not difficult to account for the fact that the people of Havilah appear as descendants both of the Hamites and of the Shemitic tribes. If they were originally of Shemitic extraction (and on this point we have no data which could enable us to decide), we must suppose that by peaceful emigration or hostile invasion they overflowed into the territory occupied by Hamites, or adopted the name and habits of their neighbors in consequence (as, e. v., Kittim, v), the name as a sign of mingled origin, and are therefore mentioned twice over by reason of their local position in two distinct regions. It would depend on circumstances whether an invading or encroaching tribe gave its name to, or derived its name from the tribe it was possessed, so that whether Havilah was originally Khitite or Dedanite might be a matter of mere conjecture; but by admitting some such principle as the one mentioned we remove from the book of Genesis a number of apparent perplexities (Kalisch, Genesis, p. 254). See UN. To regard the repetition of the name as due to carelessness or error is a method of explanation which does not deserve the name of criticism. See H.A.M.

Assuming, then, that the districts indicated in Gen. x, 7, 29, were contiguous, if not in reality identical, we have to fix on their geographical position. Various derivations of the word have been suggested, but the modern Arabic form Halab (Gen. xxxii, 29), is too vague to give us any assistance. Looking for preciser indications, we find in Gen. xxxv, 18 that the descendants of Ishmael "dwelt from Haran unto Shur that is before Egypt as thou goest towards Assyria;" and in 1 Sam. xvi, 7 we read that Saul "smote the Amalekites from Haran until thou comest to Shur that is before Egypt." Without entering into the question why the Amalekites are represented as possessing the country which formerly belonged to the Ishmaelites, it is clear that these verses fix the general position of Havilah as a country lying somewhere to the southward and eastward of Palestine. Further than this, the Cushite Havilah in Gen. x, 7 is mentioned in connection with Seba, Sabathah, and Raamah; and the Joktanite Havilah (Gen. x, 29) in connection with Ophir, Jobab, etc. Now, as all these places lay on or between the Arabian and Persian gulfs, we may infer, with tolerable certainty that Havilah in both instances designates the same country, extending at least from the Persian to the Arabian Gulf, and on account of its vast extent easily divided into two distinct parts* (Kalsisch, Gen. p. 93). See Shur.

The only method of fixing more nearly the centres of these two divisions of Havilah is to look for some trace of the name yet existing. But, although Oriental names linger with great vitality in the regions where they have arisen, yet the frequent transference of names, caused by trade or by political revolutions, renders such indication very uncertain (Von Bohlen, on Gen. x, 7). We shall therefore leave out of consideration that Havilah in both instances designates the same country, extending at least from the Persian to the Arabian Gulf, and on account of its vast extent easily divided into two distinct parts (Kalsisch, Gen. p. 93).

The district of Khawan lies between the city of Sanaa and the Hijaz, i.e. in the north-western portion of Yemen. It took its name, according to the Arabs, from Khawan, a descendant of Khatib [see Joktan] (Marzabili, s. v.), or, as some say, of Kahlan, brother of Hinyer (Caussin, Essæi, i, 118, and Tab. ii). This genealogy says little more than that the name was Joktanite; and the difference between Khatib and Kahlan may be neglected, both being descendants of the first Joktanite settlement and the whole of these early traditions pointing to a Joktanite settlement, without perhaps a distinct preservation of Joktan's name, and certainly none of a correct genealogy from him downwards.

Khawan is a fertile territory, embracing a large part of myrrhiferous Arabia, mountainous, with plenty of water, and containing a large population. It is a trade of Arabia better known to both ancients and moderns than the rest of the Yemen, and the eastern and central provinces. It adjoins Najran (the district and town of that name), mentioned in the account of the expedition of Elia Galles, and the scene of great persecutions of the Christians by Dha-Nawas, the last of the Tubaabs before the Abyssinian conquest of Arabia, in the year 529 of our era (compare Caussin, Essæi, i, 121 sq.)

Ha'voth-Jafr (Heb. Chavoth' Yitv' "בַּהֲוֹת יִתְוָה לָעֲרָה", "the dwelling places of a desert", or possibly "the beautiful city", a title full of poetry). This place is probably the modern Fahwah, on the chief road between the Hadramaut and the coast, and it is mentioned as a notable place in the biblical history (see above).

Hawes, Thomas, an English theologian, was born at Truro (Cornwall) in 1734. He was first apprenticed to a druggist, but afterwards studied at Christ College, Cambridge, and took the degree of B.L. He soon after entered the ordination course, and became assistant preacher to the chaplain of Lock Hospital. The latter afterwards gave him the rectoryship of All-Saints (Northamptonshire); and the countess of Huntington gave him also the direction of several chapels she had erected, and of her seminary for theological students. He became director of the London Missionary Society at its foundation, and died Feb. 11, 1820. He published several books of practical, but not of scientific value; among them are History of the Church (Lond. 1800, 3 vols. 8vo) — Life of the Rev. William Romaine (Lond. 1798, 8vo) — State of the Evangelical Expositor, and the Evangelical Expositor, a Comment on the Bible (Lond. 1765, 2 vols. fol. of little value) — New Translation of the New Testament (Lond. 1765, 8vo) — Communicant's Companion (Lond. 1763, 12mo; often reprinted) — Fifteen Sermons (new ed. Oxford, 1855, 12mo). See Rose, New Gen. Eclog. Dict. i, 123; Rose, Essays, Gen. iii, 124; xxiii, 694.

Hawes, Jacob, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Medway, Mass., Dec. 22, 1789. His parents were poor, and his early opportunities of education were therefore limited. After his conversion in 1807, he gave all the time he could spare from his trade to study, and in 1809 he entered Brown University. During his college course he supported himself chiefly by writing books and by teaching school in vacation. He graduated A.B. with honor in 1813. After completing the theological...
Hawk course at Andover (1818), he was settled as pastor of the First Congregational Church of Hartford, in which he remained until 1862, when the Rev. G. H. Gould was instilled as pastor. Dr. Hawes, however, remained as pastor emeritus, preaching frequently, as his strength would admit. He died at Gilead, Conn., June 5, 1867. His long pastorate at Hartford was eminently successful: more than 1500 persons joined the Church under his ministry. The great Christian enterprises, such as the Foreign Mission cause, Home Missions, Bible and Tract Distribution, the Christian Press, Education for the Ministry, lay near his heart, and occupied a very large share of his time and labors. His writings were chiefly practical, and included Lectures to Young Men (1828, which had an immense circulation both in America and in Great Britain)—Tribute to the Pilgrims (1830)—Memoir of Normand Smith (1839)—Letters on Universalism (1840)—Character everything for the Young (1843)—The Religion of the East (1845)—An Offering for Home Missionsaries (a volume of sermons, of which he gave 800 copies to the Home Missionary Society for distribution).—Independent, June 13, 1867; Congregationalist, June 1867.

Hawk (♀, nēs, from its swift flight; Sept. Hāpā; Vulg. acipiter), an English name in an altered form of the old word fæc or fæk, and in natural history representing several genera of raptorial birds; as does the Arabic nās, and no doubt, also, the Hebrew nēs, a term expressive of strong and rapid flight, and therefore highly appropriate to the hawk: the similarity of the Latin name nāsus is worthy of notice. The hawk is noticed as an uncivil bird (Lev. xi, 16; Deut. xiv, 13), and as "stretching her wings toward the south" (Job xxxix, 36)—an expression which has been variously understood as referring either to the migratory habits of the bird, one species alone being an exception to the general rule in this respect (Pliny, x, 9); or to its mourning, and seeking the warmth of the sun's rays in consequence (Bochart, Hieroz. iii, 9); or, lastly, to the opinion prevalent in ancient times, that it was the only bird whose keen eye could bear the direct rays of the sun (Elian, II. A. x. 14). The hawk, though not migratory in all countries, is so in the south of Europe and in parts of Asia. It was common in Syria and the surrounding countries. In Egypt one species was regarded as sacred, and frequently appears on the ancient monuments. Western Asia and Lower Egypt, and consequently the intermediate territory of Syria and Palestine, are the habitations or transitory residence of a considerable number of species of the order Raptiformes, which, even including the shortest-winged, have great powers of flight, are remarkably enterprising, live to a great age, are migratory, or followers upon birds of passage, or remain in a region so abundantly stocked with pigeon and turtle-dove as Palestine, and affording such variety of ground to hunt their particular prey, abounding as it does in mountain and forest, plain, desert, marsh, river, and sea-coast. See Night-hawk.

Falcons, or the "noble" birds of prey used for hawking, have for many ages been objects of great interest, and still continue to be imported from distant countries. The Falco communis, or peregrine falcon, is so generally diffused as to occur even in New Holland and South America. As a type of the genus, we may add that it has the two foremost quills-feathers of almost equal length, and that when these quills are closed they nearly reach the end of the tail. On each side of the crooked point of the bill there is an angle or prominent tooth, and from the nostrils backwards a black streak passes beneath the eye and forms a patch on each side of the throat, giving the bird its congeners a whiskered and menacing aspect. Next we may place Falco Acreoris, the sacred hawk of Egypt, in reality the same as, or a mere variety of the peregrine. Immemorial representations of it occur in Egyptian monuments, in the character of Hor-hat, or bird of victory; also an emblem of Re, the Sun, and numerous other divinities (Sir J. G. Wilkinson, Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, 24 series). The hobby, Falco subbuteo, is no doubt a second or third species of sacred hawk, having similar whiskers. Both this bird and the tractable merlin, Falco aquilon, are used in the falconry of the inferior Moslem land-owners of Asiatic Turkey. Besides these, the kestrel, Falco tinnunculus, occurs in Syria, and Falco tinnunculoides, or lesser kestrel, in Egypt; and it is probable that both species visit these two territories according to the seasons. To these we may add the gersalcon, Falco ger- falco, which is of third larger than the last, it is imported from Tartary, and sold at Constantinople, Aleppo, and Damascus. The great birds fly at antelopes, bustards, cranes, etc.; and of the genus Astur, with shorter wings than true falcons, the goshawk, Falco polambarus, and the falcon gentilis, Falco genalis, are either imported, or taken in their nests, and used to fly at lower and more game. It is among the above that the seven species of hunting hawks enumerated by Dr. Russell must be sought; though, from the circumstance that the Arabic names of the birds alone were known to him, it is difficult to assign their scientific denominations. The smaller and less powerful hawks of the genus Niaus are mostly in use on account of the sport they afford, being less fatiguing, as they are employed to fly at pigeons, partridges, quails, pternoles, katta, and other species of ganges. There are various other raptorial birds, not here enumerated, found in Syria, Arabia, and Egypt. See Eagle; Gladius; Kite; Osprey; Vultures.

The generic character of the Heb. word nēs appears from the expression in Deut. and Lev. "after his kind," as including various species of the Falconidae, with more especial allusion, perhaps, to the small diurnal birds, such as the kestrel, Falco tinnunculus, or the owlet, Falco peregrinus. These are peculiarly fitted for taking partridges, snail-grouse, quails, heron, gazelles, hares, etc. Dr. Russell (Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, i, 186; 2d ed.) has given the Arabic names of several falcons, but it is probable that some at least of these names apply rather to the different sexes than to distinct species. See a graphic description of the sport of falconry, as pursued by the Arabs of N. Africa, in the 1664, i, 284. No representation of the Monument of Aset, of ancient Egypt (see Wilkinson, Anc. of Egypt, i, 221), neither is there any definite allusion to falconry in the Bible.

Hawker, Cicero Stephen, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Newbern, N. C., in 1812. He passed A.B. at the University of North Carolina in 1839, and studied law, but never practiced. In 1834 he was ordained deacon, and in 1835 priest, in the Protestant Episcopal Church. His parish was Trinity Church, Sangert's, N. Y. (1856); in 1837 he removed to Buffalo, N. Y., and shortly afterwards to Christ Church, St. Louis, Mo. In 1844 he was consecrated bishop of the diocese of Missouri, in which office he labored diligently and successfully until his health gave way. He died at St. Louis April 19, 1860.

Hawks, Francis Lister, D.D., an eminent minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Newbern, N. C., June 10, 1798. He passed A.B. at the University of North Carolina in 1815; afterwards studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1819. In 1823 he was elected to the Legislature of N. C., and at once distinguished for eloquence. After a few years of very successful practice as a lawyer, he determined to enter the ministry, and became a student under Dr. Green, of Hillsboro' (afterwards bishop Green). In 1827 he was ordained deacon; in 1829 became the assistant of Dr. Crowell, rector of Trinity Church, New Haven, Conn. In the same year he was called to be assistant to bishop White, then rector of St. James's Church, Philadelphia. In 1830 he was elected professor of divinity in Washington College (now Trinity), Hartford, Conn.; in 1831 he was elected to the presidency of the College. His name was recognised as among the chief pulpits orators of the city. In the same year he was called to the rectorship of St. Thomas's Church, N.Y. In 1835 he was elected missionary bishop of the South-west, but declined the appointment. In the same year the General Convention appointed him to collect documents on the history of the Church, and to act as conservator of the same. He spent several months in England in 1836, and returned with eighteenfolio volumes of manuscript, illustrative of the planting and early history of the Protestant Episcopal Church. From these materials he prepared his Contributions to the Ecclesiastical and History of the United States (vol. i, Virginia, 1836; vol. ii, Maryland, 1839). It is greatly to be regretted that Dr. Hawks did not continue this valuable work. In 1837, in connection with the Rev. C. S. Henry, he established the New York Historical Society, and became one of its first presidents; the character of which ten volumes were published. In 1839 he founded a school called St. Thomas's Hall, at Bushing, L. I., and made heavy outlays upon the buildings, grounds, etc., which involved him in serious financial embarrassments, ending in the ruin of the school in 1845. He was at this time threatened with extravagance, his character was compromised; but no one now believes the latter charge. However, he resigned his charge of St. Thomas's Church, and removed to Mississippi, where he established a school at Holly Springs. In 1844 he was elected bishop of Mississippi; objections were made on account of his troubles in connection with St. Thomas's Hall, but his vindication was so complete that the Convention adopted a resolution declaring his innocence. Nevertheless, he declined the bishopric, and accepted the rectorship of Christ Church, New Orleans, where he remained for five years, during part of which time he served as president of the University of Louisiana. In 1849 he accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Mediator, New York, which was afterwards merged in Calvary parish, of which he remained rector until 1862. His friends raised $30,000 to clear his church of debt, and adjust certain old claims from St. Thomas's Hall; they also settled upon him a liberal salary. Here he regained his old pre-eminence as a preacher, and at the same time devoted himself to active literary labors. In 1862 he was elected bishop of Rhode Island, but declined the office. In 1862, owing to differences of opinion between him and his parish concerning the Civil War, he resigned the rectorship of Calvary; and, after a short stay in Baltimore, he was called to take charge of the new parof Our Saviour in New York. His last public labor was a service at the laying of the corner-stone of the new church, Sept. 4, 1866; on the 26th of that month he died. Dr. Hawley's writings include, besides Law Reports, the following: Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of the United States (1830-39, 2 vols. 8vo); — Contributions to the favourite insular and continental Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States (1841, 8vo): —Egypt and its Monuments (N. Y. 1849, 8vo): —Auricular Confession (1849, 12mo): —Documentary History of the Prot. E. Church, containing Documents concerning the Church in Connecticut (edited in connection with W. S. Parker, N. Y. 1849, 8vo); besides various historical and juvenile books. He also contributed largely to the New York Review, the Church Record, and other periodicals. —Amer. Quarterly Church Review, 1867, art. 1; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 804.

Hawley, Gideon, a Congregational minister, was born Nov. 5, 1727 (O. S.), in Bridgeport, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1749, and, having entered the ministry, went to Stockbridge in 1752 as missionary to the Indians. In May, 1753, in company with Timo-thy Woodbridge, he started through the wilderness, and reached the Susquehanna at Onohoghawgwe, where he planted a mission, but was compelled to leave it by the French War, May, 1756. Having returned to Boston, he went again under command of Gen. Crown Point; and April 10, 1758, was installed pastor over the Indians at Marshpee, where he remained until his death, Oct. 3, 1807. —Sprague, Amera, i. 495.

Hay, "flax", "chat", "grass", Job viii, 12; xl, 15; Psa. civ, 14; leeks, Num. xi, 13; also a court-yard, Isa. xxxiv, 13; xxxv, 7; Greek χαλκός, fiddle, i. e. grass or herbage, Matt. vi, 30, etc., or growing grain, Matt. xiii, 28, etc.). We are not to suppose that this word corresponds in the Bible, denotes what it does with us. The management of the grass by the Hebrews, as fodder for cattle, was entirely different from ours. Indeed, hay was not in use, straw being used as provender. The grass was cut green, as it was wanted; and the phrase mouz-grass (Psa. lxix, 6) would be more properly rendered grass that has just been fed off. So in Prov. xxv, 25, the word translated hay means the first shoots of the grass; and the whole passage might better be rendered, "The grass appeareth, and the green herb showeth itself, and the plants of the mountains are in their place." In Isa. xxxvi, 6 hay is put for grass. In summer, when the plains are parched with drought, and every green herb is dried up, the nodules proceed northwards, or into the mountains, or to the banks of rivers; and in winter and spring, when the rains have recoiled the plains with verdure, and filled the water-courses, they return. See Grass; Lenx; Fuel; Mowing.

Haydn, Joseph, one of the greatest composers of music in modern times, was born March 31, 1732, at Bohra, in Austria, the son of parents who were very fond of music, he showed from his earliest youth a remarkable talent for the art. He studied first with a relative in Hainburg; and, from his eighth to his sixteenth year, he was in the choir of St. Stephen's Cathedral at Vienna. After this, for a time, he supported himself by giving private instruction. The first six piano-sonatas of Em. Bach fell into his hands by accident, and filled him with enthusiasm. The celebrated Italian singer Porpora, whom he accompanied on the piano in musical circles, introduced him into the highest musical circles of Vienna. In 1750, he wrote several quartets (which, however, did not escape censure) and trios, and his first opera, Der hlende Triftel, for which he received 24 ducats. In 1759 he received from count Morzin an appointment as musical director, and soon after contracted a marriage, which, however, remained without children, and was, in general, not a happy one. In 1760 he was appointed by prince Esterhazy as chapel-master, which position allowed him for thirty years to give free play to his musical genius. During this time, which was mostly spent at Eisenstadt, Hungary, or (during winter months) in Vienna, he composed most of his symphonies, many quartets, trios, etc., 163 compositions for the baryton (the continuo of the violin), and 92 operas. He was one of the favorite composers for the court of Joseph II, and of the oratorio Il Ritorino di Tobia (1714), fifteen masses and other ecclesiastical works, music for Göthe’s Goethe von Berlichingen, and the composition of the Seven Words, which in 1795 was ordered from Cadiz as an instrumental composition to be played between the lessons of the 7th and 8th of the Seven Days of Creation. Having known the death of prince Esterhazy (1790), but retaining his title and his salary, he went as concert director to London, where he attained the zenith of his artistic career. During his two stays in London (1790-92 and 1794-95) he wrote the operas Orfeo and Euripides, his 12 so-called English symphonies, quartets, and other works. He was constantly employed as leader in concerts and societies, and was overwhelmed with marks of love and affection. After returning to Vienna, he composed, in 1797, his great oratorio The Creation, which was finished in April, 1798, and produced for the first time on April 19, 1799, in Vienna and soon after in all the large cities of Europe, with immense applause. It remains to this day the greatest of sacred oratorios, except Händel's Messiah. In the mean while he finished his last oratorio, The Four Seasons (text by Ven Swieten after Thomson), which was first produced for the first time in May, 1801. He died May 31, 1809. According to a list of his works, prepared by Haydn himself, they comprise 118 symphonies, 88 quartets, 24 trios, 19 operas, 5 oratorios, 163 compositions for the baryton, 24 concerts for different instruments, 15 masses, 44 piano sonatas, 42 German and Italian hymns, 30 church cantos, 10 songs in three or four parts, the harmony and the accompaniment for 365 old Scotch airs, and several smaller pieces. In the library of the Esterhazy family at Eisen-stadt, many unpublished manuscripts are said to be still extant. See Fronte, Notice sur J. H. (Paris, 1819); Pohl, Mozart und Haydn in London (Vienna, 1867, 2 vols.). (A. J. S.)

Haymo, Haimon, Haimo, or Aimo, a theologian of the 9th century, the place of whose birth (about A.D. 778) is uncertain. In his youth he embraced the rule of St. Benedict in the abbey of Fulda; afterwards he studied under Abbot, at St. Martin of Tours, with Rabanus Maurus. He then appears successively as teacher at Fulda, as abbot of Hirschfeld, in the diocese of Mentz, and finally bishop of Halberstadt (Saxony) in 841. He was present at the Council of Mentz in 847, and died March 23 (or 26), 865. His writings, which are chiefly compilations from the fathers, enjoy ed great reputation; they consist of, Glosses continua super Psalmiera (Col. 1523, 8vo; 1561, 8vo): — In Cantica Cantorum (Col. 1519, fol.; Worms, 1651, 8vo, etc.): —Glossa in Isaiam (Col. and Paris, 1531, 8vo): —Glossen in Jeremia, Ecclesiem, et Danieleam (so scarce that some doubt their having been printed at all): — In duodecim Prophetas minores (Col. 1519, et al.): —Homiliae super Evangelia totius anni (Col. 1531; Paris, 1533; Antw. 1559): —In Epistolas S. Pauli (now generally supposed, however, to be by St. Remy of Auvergne) (Col. and Paris, 1531, 8vo): —De Corpore et Sanguine Christi (D'Achery, Spicilegium, i, 42): —De varietate librorum tres libri (Paris and 1531, 8vo): —Breviarium Historie ecclesiasticae (Col. 1531, 8vo; often reprinted). Among his other works have been ascribed to him by Johannes Trithemius, but it is not certain that they were by him, and, at any rate, they are now lost. His writings are collected in Migne, Patrol. Latina, vol. cxvi, xvii, xviii. See Lelang, Bibl. Sacra; Trithemius, De eccles. Script.; Hist. litter. de la France, v, 111-126; Hoefer, Neue Bibl. (Göttingen, xiii, 121; Clarke, Succession of Soc. Haynes, Lemuel, a Congregational minister of New England, a mulatto. He was born at West Hartford, Conn., July 18, 1758, and was educated in the family of Mr. Rose, of Granville, Mass. In 1774 he enlisted in the Continental army, and in 1775 was in the expedition against Ticonderoga. Soon after this he commenced studying, and went to Pomfret, Conn., and thence to Vermont, and spent thirty years as pastor of a Congregational church at Rutland, whence he removed to Manchester, where he was involved in a very singular and noted trial for murder, not as accomplice, but as a defender of the accused. In 1822 he was called to the charge of the church in Granville, N.Y., an offshoot of the former in Massachusetts. Here he remained till his death in September, 1834. Mr. Haynes was characterized from early life by a swift and subtle intellect, and a restless thirst for knowledge. He read with critical attention. His wit was proverbial and refined. In Vermont he was very successful in opposing infidelity. Many anecdotes of his shrewd and sensible wit are on record. — Sherman, New England Divines, p. 267; Sprague, Amillas, ii, 176.

Hayti, a name sometimes given to the second largest island in the West Indies. The more usual name is San Domingo, under which head all that is common to the whole island will be treated. Hayti proper is the western and French-speaking part of the island, which in 1808 was organized as a separate commonwealth under president Christophe, who in 1811 had himself crowned emperor. The neighboring papal empire under the name of Henri I. In 1822 the French and the Spanish portions of the island were again united into one republic under general Boyer. This union lasted until 1844, when not only the Spanish portion became again an independent state, but the French part split into two, which were harassed by almost uninterrupted conflicts between the blacks and the mulattoes. The brief and beneficent administration of general Richer (1846 47) was followed by that of general Faustin Soulouque, who undertook an unfortunate campaign against the Dominicans, and in August, 1848, proclaimed a false idea of the doctrine of Henry I. He was in 1858 overthrown by general Geoffrard, who, as president, introduced many reforms, and was, in turn, overthrown in February, 1867, by Salavine, under whose administration the country was disturbed by uninterrupted civil wars, until his overthrow and execution, January, 1870.

The area of the republic is estimated at 20,203 square miles, the population at about 570,000. Nominaliy near the entire population belongs to the Roman Catholic Church; but even according to Roman Catholic writers, many of the population are even to-day more pagan than Christian. The religious, moral, and moral condition of the people is attributed by Roman Catholic writers to the habit of the French government of not establishing regular bishops, but of leaving the administration of ecclesiastical affairs in the hands of apostolic prefects, who had neither the influence nor the power of bishops, were more dependent upon the colonial government, and could not defend the interests of the Church and of religion against the secular power and the planters, who were chiefly intent on making the most out of slave labor. The care of the plantations, was, before the beginning of the rule, almost entirely in the hands of the Capuchins and Dominicans. In 1708 the Capuchins left their parishes, and were succeeded by the Jesuits, who took charge of the districts from Samana to the Atarabone, while the Dominicans assumed the administration of those from the Atarabone to Cape Tiburon. Secular priests were left only in the churches of Yaque Island. When the Jesuits were expelled in 1768, they were again followed by the Capuchins. During the war of independence nearly all the churches were closed, and the celebration of divine service was almost wholly suspended; but, the war being ended, the Constitution of 1807 declared the Catholic Church the only form of religion permitted by law. On Nov. 7, 1870, his credentials as a minister were granted. Soon afterwards he received a call to take charge of the Granville church. Here he labored five years with great acceptability. In 1878 he married Miss Elizabeth Bolidt, a white lady of good intellect and heart, and went to Pomfret, Conn., and thence to Vermont, and spent thirty years as pastor of a Congregational church at Rutland, whence he removed to Manchester, where he was involved in a very singular and noted trial for murder, not as accomplice, but as a defender of the accused. In 1822 he was called to the charge of the church in Granville, N.Y., an offshoot of the former in Massachusetts. Here he remained till his death in September, 1834. Mr. Haynes was characterized from early life by a swift and subtle intellect, and a restless thirst for knowledge. He read with critical attention. His wit was proverbial and refined. In Vermont he was very successful in opposing infidelity. Many anecdotes of his shrewd and sensible wit are on record. — Sherman, New England Divines, p. 267; Sprague, Amillas, ii, 176.

of God went; and when Hazael respectfully inquired the cause of this outburst, Elisha replied by describing the vivid picture then present to his mind of all the evils which the man now before him would inflict upon Israel. Hazael exclaimed, "But what is thy servant, the [not a] dog, that he should do this great thing?" The prophet answered, "The Lord hath showed it to his servant Elisha, saying, 'See, the Lord hath heard that thou hast smitten Ahab thy master, thy servant will do likewise.' And now, behold, thou seest what the Lord hath said. If it be peace, then prepare to meet the battle; but if it be Jehovah's sword, then prepare for it, for there the Lord will bring thee." Hazael then removed, and delivered to his master that portion of the prophetic response which was intended for him. But the very next day this man, cool and calculating in his cruel ambition, took a thick cloak, and, having dipped it in water, he rushed to the face of the king where, in his feebleness, and probably in his sleep, was smothered by its weight, and died what seemed to his people a natural death (2 Kings viii, 15). We are not to imagine that such a project as this was conceived and executed in a day, or that it was suggested by the words of Elisha. Discomposure at the earnest gaze of the prophet, and other circumstances, show that Hazael at that moment regarded Elisha as one to whom his secret purposes were known. (See Kicto's Daily Bible Illustr., ad loc.). He was soon engaged in hostilities with Ahaziah, king of Judah, and Jehoshaphat of Israel, for the possession of the city of Ramoth-gilead (2 Kings viii, 28). The Assyrian inscriptions show that about this time a bloody and destructive war was waged between the Assyrians on the one side, and the Syrians, Hittites, Hamathites, and Phœnicians on the other. See CHLOROS. Benhadad (q. v.) had recently suffered several severe defeats at the hands of the Assyrian king, and upon the succession of Hazael the war was speedily renewed. Hazael took up a position in the fastnesses of the Anti-Libanus, but was there attacked by the Assyrians, who defeated him with great loss, killing 16,000 of his warriors, and capturing more than 1100 chariots. Three years later the Assyrians once more entered Syria in force; but on this occasion Hazael submitted, and helped to furnish the invaders with supplies. After this, internal troubles appear to have occupied the attention of the Assyrians, who made no more expeditions into these parts for about a century. The Syrians rapidly recovered their losses, and towards the close of the reign of Jehu, Hazael led them against the Israelites (B.C. cir. 860), whom he "smote in all their coasts" (2 Kings x, 32), thus accomplishing the prophecy of Elisha (2 Kings ii, 13), who had told his master that "at that time shall there come a little green (Phoenician) vine out of Syria, and shall cover the mountain of Carmel." His main aim was to control the eastern provinces, where he ravaged "all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, and the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan" (2 Kings x, 35). After this he seems to have abandoned all his conquests and to have become a subject of Assyria. (2 Kings xii, 3, 7, and 22), and towards the close of his life he even threatened the kingdom of Judah. Having taken Gath (2 Kings xii, 17; comp. Amos vi, 7), he proceeded to attack Jerusalem, defeated the Jews in an engagement (2 Chron. xxiv, 24), and was about to assault the city, when Jehoash induced him to retire by presenting him with "all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and in the king's house" (2 Kings xii, 18). This able and successful, but unprincipled usurper left the throne at his death to his son Jehoahaz (2 Kings xiii, 24). B.C. cir. 835. Such was his prosperity and influence of his reign that the phrase "house of Hazael" occurs in prophetic declarations (Amos i, 4) as a designation of the kingdom of Damascus-Syria. See DAMASCUS.

HAZAZIH (Heb. Chasazah), חֶזָּזָּה, whom Jehoshaphat be suffix; Sept. 'O'Gia', son of Adahiah and father of Jehoshaphat, a descendant of Pharez (Neh. xi, 5). B.C. cir. 400 B.C.

HAZAR (also HAZON) is frequently prefixed to geographical names in order to indicate the geographical origin of villages ('כּתר, a hamlet, or town; see VILLAGE) upon some town or other noted spot, or in order to distinguish them from it; e.g. those following. "The word Hazar, when joined to places situated in the desert or on the outskirts of the inhabited country, as it frequently is, probably denoted a piece of ground surrounded by a rude but strong fence, where tents could be pitched, and cattle kept in safety from marauders. Such places are very common in the present day in the desert districts of Palestine. In other cases Hazar may denote a 'castle' or 'fortified town.'" Comp. HAZEL.

HAZAR-ADAR (Heb. Chatzer-'Adar), חַצֶּר-עָדָר, a village of Addar; Sept. Ἀσσύριαν Ἀράβα, v. r. Ἀδαρ and סְגָּרָה, a place on the southern boundary of Palestine, between Kadesh-Barnea and Azmon (Numb. xxxiv, 4); elsewhere called simply ADAR (Josh. xv, 3). See HAZEREM. It probably lies in the desert west of Kadesh-Barnea (q. v.), perhaps at the junction of wadys El-Fukreh and El-Madurah, east of Jebel Madurah. See TRIBE. Rev. J. Rowlands thought he discovered both this locality and that of the adjoining Azmon in the wadys which he calls Adeeirat and Aesinet, west of wady el-Arish (Williams, Holy City, i, 467); but the names are more correctly Kudeirat and Kussameh, and the locality is too far west.

HAZAR-ENON (Heb. Chatzer-'Enon), חַצֶּר-עָנֹן, a village of fountains, also [in Ezek. xlvii, 17] HAZAR-enon, חַצֶּר-עָנֹן, מָרַע, id.; Sept. Ἀσσυρική και ἄνθρωπος, a place on the boundary of Palestine, apparently at the north-eastern corner, between Ziphron and Shepham (Numb. xxxiv, 9, 10), but near from the district of Hamath, in Damascus Syria (Ezek. xlvii, 17; xlviii, 1). Schwarz (Palestine, p. 20, note) thinks it identical with the village Deir-Hanon, in the valley of the Jefeh or Amanah, near Damascus; but there is no probability that this was included within the limits of Canaan. "Porter would identify Hazar-enan with Kureytein=the two cities, a village more than sixty miles eastward of Damascus, the main ground for the identification apparently being the presence at Kureytein of 'large fountains,' the only ones in that 'vast region,' a circumstance with which the name of Hazar-enan well agrees (Damascena, i, 252; ii, 556). The great distance from Damascus and the body of Palestine in which this has no important relation to the reception of this identification" (Smith). We must therefore seek for Hazar-enan somewhere in the well-watered tracts at the north-western foot of Mount Hermon, perhaps the present Hasbeqen, near which are four springs (Air Kuneig, A. Tinta, A. Atas, and A. Herba). See HAZEREM.

HAZAR-GADDAH (Heb. Chatzer-Gaddah), חַצֶּר-גַּדַּדְתָּה, a city on the southern border of Judah, mentioned between Moladah and Heshbon (Josh. xv, 27). Modern writers (see Reland, Palest. p. 707), following the suggestion of Jerome (Onomast. a. v.; who, as suggested by Schwarz, Palestine, p. 100, has probably confused this place with En-Gedi), have sought for it near the Dead Sea; but the statement of Josephus appears to locate it nearer midway towards the Mediterranean. See HAZEREM. Mr. Grove suggests (Smith, Dict. a. v.) that it is possibly the modern ruined site marked as Jurana on Van de Velde's Map, west of el-Melh (Moladah), "by the change so often so frequent in the East (7) of D. to R." See JUDAH. TRIBE OF.

HAZAR-HAT'TICON (Hebrew Chatzer-'Tikdon), חַצֶּר-הַצִּיתִיכִון, hamlet of the midway, q. d. middle village; Sept. confusedly Elatxon και του Ελτασόν υ. τ. αὐλή του Σαυμου, Vulg. donum Tichen), a place on the northern boundary of Palestine, near Hamath, and in the confines of Hauran (Ezek. xlvii, 16); apparently, therefore, on the northern brow of Mount Hermon, which has given origin to the name as a point of division between Coele-Syria and Damascus Syria. It is possibly only an epithet of the HAZON (q. v.) of Nahalati.

HAZARMAVETH (Hebrew Chatzer-Ma'veth, חַצֶּר-מַאֲבֶתִּים, a village of fountains, also [in Ezek. xlvii, 17] HAZAR-enon, a village of fountains, asleep [in Ezek. xlvii, 17] HAZAR-enon, a village of fountains, asleep court of death; Sept. Σαρμώδας and Ἄρωμώδας, Vulg. Asaromoth), the name of the third son of Joktan, or, rather, of a district of Arabia Felix settled by him (Gen. x, 26; 1 Chron. i, 20), supposed to be preserved in the modern province of Hadramaut, situated on the Indian Ocean, and abounding in frankincense, myrrh, and aloes; but (as intimated in the omissions) noted for the beauty of the climate of the ancient state (Abulafia, Arubin, p. 45; Niebuhr, Beschreibung der Arab. p. 283; Kitter, Erdk. XI, iii, 609). It was known also to the classical writers (Xαραμωφίται, vii, 708; Χαραμωφίται or Xαριμωφίται, Pol. vii, 7, 25: Atramedes, Dion. Perip, 351; Χαριμωφιτος, Steph. Byz. 755). Her. ii, 39. Has. (1 Sam. xxvii, 9.)

Hazar-ata'am (2 Chron. xx, 2). See HAZOR-TAMAR.

Hazel (').'t, त्र, of doubtful etymology [see Luz]; Sept. Υαζελ, Vulg. umgadolias), apparently a nut-bearing tree, which occurs in Gen. xxx, 37, where it indicates one of the kinds of rod from which Jacob peeled the bark, and which he placed in the water-troughs of the cattle. Authorities are divided between the hazel or oaknut and the almond-tree, as representing the त्र; in favor of the former we have Kimmich, Jarchi, Luther, and others, while the Vulgate, Sadius, and Gesenius adopt the latter view. The rendering in the Sept. is equally applicable to either. On the one hand is adduced the fact that in the Arabic we have louz, which is indeed the same word, and denotes the almond. Thus Abu-Fadil, as quoted by Celsius (Hierob. i, 254), says, "Louz est arbor notor, et magnis foliis mollibus. Species due, hortensia et silvestris. Hortensia quoque duntas species, dulcis et amara;" where reference is evidently made to the sweet and bitter almond. Other Arab authors also describe the almond under the name of louz. But this name was well known to the Hebrews as indicating the almond; for R. Sadius, in Ab. Ezra's Comment, as quoted by Celsius (p. 253), remarks, "Luz est amygdales, quia ita eam appellante Arabes; nam ha duae linguae, et syraciae, ejusdem sunt familias." It is also alleged that there is another word in the Hebrew language, agla (אַגְלָא), which is applicable to the hazel or express statement that they existed before and up to the time of David" (Smith). Stanley suggests, "In Bethmarakoth, 'the house of chariots,' and Hazar-susim, 'the village of horses,' we recognise the dépôts and stations for the horses and chariots, such as those which in Solomon's time went to and fro between Egypt and Palestine" (Sin. and Pol. p. 160). "It is doubtful whether there was any such communication between these countries as early as the time of Joshua; but may not the rich grassy plains around Beersheba (Robinson, Bib. Res. i, 200) have been used at certain seasons by the ancient tribes of Southern Palestine for pasturing their war and chariot horses, just as the grassy plains of Jau- lian are used at the present day by the Druse chiefs of Lebanon, and the Turkish cavalry and artillery at Damascus?" (Kitto). "Still it is somewhat difficult to ascribe to so early a date the names of places sit- uated, as these were, in the Bedouin country, where a chariot must have been unknown, and where even horses seem carefully excluded from the possessions of the inhabitants—camels, sheep, oxen, and asses" (1 Sam. xxvii, 9).

HAZAR-SHUAL (Hebrew Chatserh-Shuail, חָצְרֶה שְׁעַל, "village of the jackal; Sept. Ασαροντέλα, Βασι- σονάδα and Ασαρονάδα"). a city on the southern border of Judah (Josh. xv, 28; Neh. xi, 26, where it is mentioned between Beth-palet and Beer-sheba), afterwards included in the territory of Simeon (Josh. xix, 3; 1 Chron. iv, 28, where it is mentioned between Moladah and Balah); hence probably midway between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. See HAZERIM. Van de Velde, on his Map, conjectures the site to be that of the ruins Sereel, which he locates nearly half way between Beer-sheba and Moladah. But see SHENA.

HAZAR-SUSAH (Hebrew Chatserh-Susah, חָצְרֶה שָׁעַה, "village of the horse, Josh. xix, 3; Sept. Ασαρονόια, Vulg. Hesareaus), or HA'ZAR-SU'SIM (CHAT- serh-Susim), כְּצֶר הָאֶכֶס, village of horses, 1 Chron. iv, 31; Sept. הָאֶכֶס, Vulg. Hesareaus), a city of the tribe of Simeon, mentioned between Beth-marcaboth and Beth-lebaoth or Beth-birei; doubtless, as thought by Schwarz (Palest. p. 124), the same as SANSANNAH, in the south border of Judah (Josh. xv, 31), one of Solomon's "chariot-cities" (2 Chron. i, 14). See HAZERIM. It is true that neither it nor its companion, HEBEL-MARCABOTH, the 'house of chariots,' is named in the list of the towns of Judah in chap. xv, but they are included in those of Simeon in 1 Chron. iv, 31, with the waist. See Nut. The strongest argument on the other side arises from the circumstance of another word, słaked (צחה), having reference to the almond; it is supposed, however, that the latter applies to the fruit exclusively, and the word under discussion to the tree; Rosenmiller identifies the słaked with the cultivated, and היע with the wild almond—tree. See Fruit.

The almond is diffused by culture from China to Spain, and is found to bear fruit well on both sides of the Mediterranean; but there is no region where it thrives better than Syria, or where it so truly at home. Accordingly, when Jacob was sending a present of all the products of the land which were likely to be acceptable to an Egyptian grandee, "the best fruits of the land," besides balm, myrrh, and honey, he bade his sons take "nuts and almonds" (Gen. xlii, 11); and the original name of that place so endeared to his memory as Bethel, originally called Luz, was probably derived from some well-known species of this tree. To this day "Jordania almonds" is the recognised market-name for the best samples of this fruit, in common with Telafite dates, Elmensa, etc. The name, however, is little more than a tradition. The best "Jordania almonds" come from Malaga. See Almond.

Hazelepno1, or rather Zelipmon (צליבפונ), slake looking upon me [or protection of the presence, so God. Fuss.], is a word, the article, היע, host, Telipmon, is a proper noun, rather an epithet, the Zelipmonite, q. d. vorehekehen, Sept. 'אנהלפפכ, Vulg. Seldelpho, the sister of Jezreel and others, of the descendants of Heron, son of Judah (1 Chron iv. 9). B.C. cir. 1612.

Haazelus, ERNEST LEWIS, D.D., was born in New- iberia, Prussia, Sept. 6, 1777. He was descended from a line of Lutheran ministers. His theological studies were in the university of Hesse Niesky, a Moravian institution under the superintendence of bishop Anders. In 1800 he was appointed teacher of the classics in the Moravian Seminary at Nazareth, Pa. The position he accepted in the wishes of his friends, and at once embarked for America. In this institution he labored with efficiency for eight years, and was advanced to be head-teacher and professor of theology. Differing from his brethren in their views of church government and discipline, he concluded to change his ecclesiastical relations, and to unite with the Luther Church, in whose service his fathers had so long lived and labored. In 1809 he removed to Philadelphia, and for a time had charge of a private classical school. For several years he labored as a pastor in New Jersey, and in 1815 was elected professor of theology in Hartwick Seminary, and principal of the theological department. In 1890 he was chosen professor of Biblical and Oriental literature, and of the German language, in the seminary at Gettysburg, Pa.; and in 1834 he accepted the appointment of professor in the theological seminary of the Synod of South Carolina. All these positions he filled with ability and great satisfaction to the Church. He died Feb. 20, 1853. As a scholar he occupied a high rank. The doctorate he received simultaneously from Union and Columbia Colleges, N.Y. His attainments in literature were varied and extensive. He published Life of Luther (1813); Materials for Catechismation (1825); Augustus Confession, with annotations—History of the Christian Church (1842); Hist. of the American Lutheran Church (1842); Life of J. H. Stillings (1831). (M. L. S.)

하서 (חזר, Chatzer, from של, to surround or inclose), a word which is of not uncommon occurrence in the Bible in the sense of a "court" or quadrangle to a palace or other building, but which topographically seems generally employed for the "villages" of people in a region, not an unsettled collection of dwellings described by travellers among the modern Arabs as consisting of rough stone walls covered with the tent-cloths, and thus holding a middle position between the tent of the wanderer—so transitory as to furnish an image of the sudden termination of life (Isa. xxxvii, 12)—and the settled, permanent town. See Topographical Terms.

As a proper name it appears in the A. V.: 1. In the plural, Hazereth, and Hazeroth, for which see below. 2. In the slightly different form of Hazeroth. 3. In combination with other words, giving a special designation to the particular "village" intended. Thus when in union with another word the name is Hazar (q. v.), it should not be overlooked that the place is not all in the wilderness, itself, or else quite on the confines of civilised country.

Hazerim [many Hazerim] (Hebrew Chatzerim, צֵּ֣רֶים, villages; Sept. Ἀσθρεῖον, Vulg. Hazerim), the name of a place, or, rather, a general designation of the temporary villages in which the nomad Avrams resided, especially between Gaza and "the river of Egypt" or el-Arish (Deut. ii, 23). Schwarz suggests (p. 93) that these "Hazerim" may be a general designation of the many towns by the name of Hazer and HAZAR found in this region; if so, these probably all lay near each other; and it is a singular fact that the sites of at least two of them, Hazara-goddah and Hazar-susah, seem to have been immediately adjoining each other.

Hazeroth [many Hazeroth] ( Heb. Chatzeroth, צֵּ֣רֶות, villages; Sept. Ἀσθρεῖον, but Ἀσθρίων in Deut. i, 1), the sixteenth station of the Israelites, their third after leaving Sinai, and either four or five days' march from that mountain towards Canaan (Numb. xi, 35; xii, 16; xxxiii, 17, 18; Deut. i, 1; comp. Numb. x, 38). It was also the first place after Sinai where the camp remained for a number of days. Here Aaron and Miriam attempted to excite a rebellion against Moses; and here the guilty Miriam was smitten with leprosy (Numb. xii). Burckhardt suggested (Travels, p. 495) that it is to be found in Ain el-Hudhera, near the usual route from Sinai to the eastern arm of the Red Sea; an identification that has generally been acquiesced in by subsequent travellers. It is described by Dr. Robinson as a fountain of tolerably good water, the only perennial one in that region, with several low palm-trees around it; he also remarks that the identification of this spot with Hazeroth is important as showing the route of the Israelites from the north to the Arabah, if, which it passed through this place, must have continued down the valley to the Red Sea, and could not have diverged through the high western plateau of the wilderness (Researches, i, 223). See EXOD. It's distance from Sinai accorded with the Sinai name, and would probably warrant us in identifying it with Hazeroth. There is some difficulty, however, in the position. The country around the fountain is exceedingly rugged, and the approaches to it difficult. It does not seem a suitable place for a large camp. Dr. Wilson mentions an unfortifying plain about fifteen miles north of Siwan, and remarks (p. 418) that "the long way to the eastward," called el-Hudherah; and here he would locate Hazeroth (Lords of the Bible, i, 256). Stanley thinks that the fountain called el-A'in, some distance north of the fountain of Hudherah, ought rather to be regarded as the site of Hazeroth, because 'Ain is the most important springing in this region, and it is possible that the Israelites may have been here, and the name may have been given to a wide district (Porter, Handbook for Siwan and Pal., i, 37 sq.).—Schwarz, however (Palast. p. 212), regards the site as that of 'Ain el-Kudurrah, a large fountain of sweet running water at some distance beyond the ridge which bounds the western edge of the interior plateau of the desert et-Tih (Robinson's Researches, i, 286); a position far too northward.

Haṣzon-taʿmar (Hebrew Chatataoni-Tamar; זָזוֹן, Gen. xiv, 7; Sept. 'Aṣzon Tsamūr, or HAZZON-TAʿMAR (Heb. [precisely the converse of the root ṭ-m-r; see A.V. 1 Chronicles xxvii, 16; אַשָּׂזֹן; 2 Chron. xx, 2; Sept. 'Aṣzon Tsamūr), the name under which, at a very early period in the history of Palestine, and as known in belief by many to be the oldest of all these early records, we first hear of the place which afterwards became En-gedi (q. v.). The Amorites were dwelling at Haṣzon-Tamar when the four kings made their incursion, and fought their successful battle with the five (Gen. xiv, 7). This occurrence only once again—in the records of the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xx, 2)—when he was warned of the approach of the horde of Ammonites, Moabites, Medunim, and men of Mount Seir, whom he afterwards so successfully destroyed, and with whom no doubt he was now pursuing, not at the appropriating and making known to the Saggars and the east, the place as the Amos refer to have done a thousand years before them. Here the explanation, which is En-gedi, is added. The existence of the earlier appellation, after En-gedi had been so long in use, is a remarkable instance of the tenacity of these old Oriental names, of which modern instances are frequent. See ACCHO; BETHSAIDA, etc. Schwarz, however, unnecessarily supposes (Pales, p. 21) the two passages to refer to different localities, the earlier of which he assigns (on Talmudical evidence) to Zoar (q. v.).

Haṣzon-tamar is interpreted in Hebrew to mean the "pruning or felling of the palm" (Gesen. Thes. p. 512), or perhaps better, "a row of palm-trees" (Furst, Lex. s. v.). Jerome (Quast. in Gen.) renders it urba palmarum. This interpretation of the name is borne out by the ancient reputation of the palms of En-gedi (Eccles. xxviii, 14), and the illustration of the same in the Psalms (ps. lxviii, 16). The Samaritan Version has זָזוֹן הַר, "the valley of Cadia", possibly a corruption of En-gedi. The Targums have En-gedi. Perhaps this was the "city of palm-trees" (Ir hat-lenamar) out of which the Kenites, the tribe of Moses's father-in-law, went up into the wilderness of Judah, after the conquest of the country (Judg. i, 16), the allusion to the ancient connexion between the Kenites (Numb. xxvii, 21) is at once explained. Standing as he was on one of the lofty points of the highlands opposite Jericho, the western shore of the Dead Sea as far as En-gedi would be before him, and the cliff, in the cliffs of which the Kenites had fixed their secure nest, would be a prominent object in the view. This has been alluded to by Prof. Stanley (Sinai and Pal, p. 225, n. 4). De Saulcy (Narratir, i, 149) and Schwarz (Palestines, p. 199) think that a trace of the ancient name is preserved in the tract and wady el-Hus-sush (Robinson's Researches ii, 243, 244), a little north of Ain-July.

Haʿziel (Hev. Chaziel, חַזְיֵיאל, vision of God; Sept. 'Aṣṭaf v. r. Ḥaṣzi, a "son of the Gershonite Shimei, and chief of the family of Laadan (1 Chron. xxiii, 9). B.C. 1014.

Haʿzm (Hev. Chazam, חַזָּמ, perhaps for Ḥaṣam; vision; Sept. Ṭāqam, Vulg. Asarum), one of the sons of Nahor by Milcah (Gen. xxii, 22). B.C. cir. 2040. The only clue to the locality settled by him is to be found in the identification of Chazam, and the other sons of Nahor; and hence he must, in all likelihood, have been in Ur of the Chaldees, or the adjacent countries. Bunsen (Bibelwerk, i, ii, 49) suggests Chatams by the Ephrathites (Stephen, Ryzant.), in Mesopotamia, or the Chazame (Xa-Qui) in Assyria (Strabo, xvi, p. 736).

Haʿzor (Hev. Chatser, חַצְצֵר, village [see Haʿzor-], Sept. 'Aṣor, but יָבַיֵר in Jer. xlix, 28, 30, 33), the name of several places. See also En-Hazor; Baal-Hazor; Hazor-Hadattah; Hazirim.

I. A city near the waters of the lake Merom (Huleh), the seat of Jabin, a powerful Canaanitish king, as appears from the narratives sent him by all the surrounding kings to assist him against the Israelites (Josh. xi, 1-5). He and his confederates were, however, defeated and slain by Joshua, and the city burned to the ground (Josh. xii, 10-13; Josephus, Ant. v, 5, 1); being only one of those northern cities which was unshaken by Joshua, doubtless because it was too strong and important to leave standing in his rear. It was the principal city of the whole of Northern Palestine, "the head of all those kingdoms" (Josh. x, 10; see Jerome, Onomast. s. v. Asor). Like the other strong places of that part, it stood on an eminence (Josh. xii, 13, A. V. "strength"), but the district around must have been on the whole flat, and suitable for the manoeuvres of the "very many" chariots and horses which formed part of the forces of the king of Hazor and his confederates (Josh. xi, 4, 6, 9; Judg. iv, 3). But by the time of Deborah and Barak the Canaanites had recovered part of the territory they had lost, had fortified it again, and were ruled by a king with the ancient royal name of Jabin, under whose power the Israelites were, in punishment for their sins, reduced. From this yoke they were delivered by Debora and Barak, after which Hazor remained in quiet possession of the Israelites, and belonged to the tribe of Naphtali, to whom Joshua allotted it (Judg. iv, 36). Solomon did not overlook so important a post, and the fortification of Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer, the points of defence for the entrance from Syria and Assyria, the plain of Esdraelon, and the great maritime lowland respectively, were two of the chief pretexts for his levy of taxes (1 Kings x, 16). Later still it is mentioned in the list of the towns and districts whose inhabitants were carried off to Assyria by Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xv, 29; Josephus, Ant. ix, 11, 1). We encounter it once more in 1 Macc. xi, 67, where Jonathan, after encamping for the night at the "water of Gennesar", advances to the "plain of Asor" (Josephus, Ant. xii, 260); the Greek text of the Macceabees has prefixed an from the preceding word rēvōn; A.T. "Nazor") to meet Demeutrius, who was in possession of Kadesh (ib. 68; Josephus as above). See NAZOR. Raumer queries whether it may not have been the ancient Hozor of which King Baldwin IV passed on his way from Tiberias to Naphtali (Will. Trr., p. 1014); and his reason for this conjecture is that the Vulgate gives Nason for the Asor (Apostal) of Tobit i, 1 (Raumer, Palestin. p. 114, n.). See Asor.

The name Hazor still lingers in several places around the upper valley of the Jordan (Robinson, B. R. iii, 68, 81, 401). There is one Hazor by a commanding site above Cesarea Philippi, and close to the great castle of Subwchel. Here Keith (Land of Israel, p. 384) and Stanley (Sinai and Pal. p. 399) would place the ancient capital of Canaan. But the territory of Naphtali hardly extended so far eastward. Another Hazir is in the plain, a few miles west of the site of Dan; but neither does this site quite accord with the Scripture notices (Porter's Damascus, i, 304; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 318). Strabo (Palestine, p. 91) thinks of a village which he calls Aalor, between Banias and Meshchela (Mejei), may be the ancient Hazor; he probably refers to the Ain el-Hazour marked on Zimmerman's Map a little north-east of Banias, which, however, is too far east. There is a place marked as Azur on Zimmerman's Map, a little north of the Kenite places (Kadesh), which may questionably lay in Naphtali; but M. De Saulcy (Narratir, ii, 406) denies that this can have been the seat of Jabin (which he distinguishes from the Hazor of Solomon), and in a long argument (p. 400-405) he contends that it was situated on the site of some extensive ruins, which he reports at a place called indefinitely el-Khom, on the hills skirting the north-eastern shore of the lake.

e-Hulch, in the direction of Banias. Van de Velde (Memor, p. 318) likewise thinks the Hazor of Joshua different from that of Judges (although both were ruled by a Jabin, evidently a hereditary title), and inclines to regard En-Hazor (Josh. xix. 37) as identical with the latter, and with a ruined Hazor in the middle of the town of Tell el-Hulch (Bint后期); while he seems to acquiesce in the identification of the external Hazor with a Hazor (Porter, Domains, c. iii, 304) or Kuur Asar (Seetzen), or, as he himself calls it, Tell Hazor, covered with remains, and jutting out from Merj Ayun towards the Huleh plain. The Hazor of Judges, xix. 36, he identifies with Tell el-Hazur, southeast of Ramah. This, however, is vague and confused. Mr. Thomson, who visited this region in 1843, believed Hazor may be identified with the present castle of Junus, north of the Huleh (Bibl. Sacra, 1846, p. 202). The editor (Dr. Robinson), however, adds the arguments adduced more plausible than sound (ib. p. 212), and advocates the opinion of Rev. E. Smith, that Tell Kaurebeh, at the southeast end of the plain of Kedes, is better entitled to be regarded as the site of Hazor (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1847, p. 493). Accordingly, in the new ed. of his Researches, after noticing several other localities proposed (iii. 68, 81, 492), he at length fixes upon this as a best agreeing with the ancient notices of this city (ib. p. 363). There are, as the name Kaurebeh, "ruins," implies, some ancient ruins on the tell, but they are those of a village. There are still other ruins of an ancient town somewhat west and northwest of the south bank of wady Heniah, overlooking the valley and lake of Merom, and about six miles south of Kedesheh, which is not a improbable site for the ancient Hazor (Robinson, Bibl. Res. iii, 363, 365); and the plain beneath, stretching to the shore of the lake, might take the name of the sar, as Josephus seems to indicate (L. c.), as Ritter (Erdk. xvi, 260) accepts the Hazor proposed by Burchett (Tract. p. 44); apparently the inconsiderable ruin on the rocky declivity above Banias (Robinson, Res. new ed. iii, 402). Captain Wilson prefers the isolated Tell Harah, covered with ruins, about two miles south-east of Kedesheh (Jour. Sac. Lit., 1866, p. 245). But none of these last cited places retain the ancient name. Finally, Dr. Thomson is confident (Land and Book, i, 435) that the true spot is Hazor (the above Hazor of Van de Velde, east of a more northern Ramah), in the centre of the southern contiguous region around lake Huleh on the north-west, containing numerous ancient remains, and locally connected with tradition by the Israelitish victory; although Dr. Robinson (incorrectly) objects to this site (Bibl. Res. new ed. iii, 63) that it is too far from the lake, and within the territory of Asher.

2. A city in the south of Judah (but probably not one of those assigned to Simeon, since it is not named in the list, Josh. xix. 1-9), mentioned between Kedesh and Ithnaan (Josh. xvii, 23, where the Vet. MS. of the Sept. unites with the following name, Argotharias, Alex. Mus. omits, Vulg. Asor). We may reasonably conjecture that this was the central town of that name, the other Hazors of the same connection (Hazor-Halastath, and Kerioth-Hezron or Hazor-Amm) being probably so called for distinction sake; and in that case we may perhaps locate it at a ruined site marked on Van de Velde's map as Tell Eski el-Kesab (Robinson, Res. iii, Appendix p. 114), on a tell around the south-west base of which runs the wady ed-Dheib, emptying into the Dead Sea. See Nos. 3 and 4.

3. HAZOR-HADATTAH (for so the Heb. נַחֲצָר הַדַּתָּה, i.e., New Hazor, should be understood; since there is no article between the words, and the sense in verse 32 requires this condensation; Sept. omits, Vulg. Asor, more rarely). A city in the south of Judah (not the extreme Simeon portion), mentioned between Bealoth and Keriorth (Josh. xv, 25); probably, as suggested in Keil and Delitzsch's Commentary, ad loc. (Edinb. ed. 160), the ruined site א-ל-ד-ח-ה (Robinson's Researches, iii, Appendix p. 114), south of Hebron, in the immediate vicinity of el-Beydud (the Beiydud of Van de Velde's Map, about half way between Keritho and Arad). See Nos. 2 and 4.

4. HAZOR-AMM (to be so joined to find the same reasons as in No. 2), probably identified with the Chesheth Hezron (in the Heb, the four names stand چارسدل حضران which is Chateotheo Ammon, Sieg. loc. cit. "Asmōj, και Αμμόν, [v.r., Asmōjapha]; Vulg. Carioto, Hauron, hac est Asor, Amam), a town in the south of Judah (but apparently not in the Simeon territory), mentioned between Bealoth and Shema (Josh. xv. 24-26); no doubt (if thus combined) the modern Jebel Regen, as suggested by Robinson (Researches, iii, Appendix p. 114). See KEROTHI.

5. (Vat. MS. of Sept. omits; Vulg. Asor). A city inhabited by the Benjamites after the Captivity, mentioned among Ananiah and Ramah (Neh. xi, 38); possibly the modern Gazor, a short distance east of Jaffa (for others of the associated names, although likewise within the ancient territory of Dan, are also assigned to Benjamin), since Ezechieius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Asor) mention a Hazor in the vicinity of Ascalon, although they assign it to Judah, and confound it with those in the south of that tribe (Robinson's Researches, l, 370, note). From the places mentioned with it, as Anathoth, Nob, Ramah, etc., it would seem to have lain north of Jerusalem, and at no great distance therefrom. Schwarz thinks it is called Chazar (בֶּזֶר) in the Talmudic writers (Pilat. p. 162). Robinson suggests the identity of Hazor and the modern Tell Asur, a ruin on a little hill about six miles north of Bethel (Bib. Res. x. 264, note). This, however, appears to be too far from Ramah. Tobler mentions a ruin called Khurbet Aror, near Ramah, a little to the west, the situation of which would answer better to Hazor (Topogr. ii, 409; Van de Velde, Memor, p. 319). The place in question is probably the same with the Bala-Hazor (q. v.) of 2 Sam. xiii, 27.

6. A region of Arabia, spoken of as an important place, in the vicinity of Kedar, in the prophetic denunciations of desolation upon both by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xlix, 28-33). It can hardly be Petra, as supposed by Vitringa (en. Eut., p. 624), nor the Asor placed by Eusebius 8 miles west of Philadelphia (Histig. Jeosias, p. 190), but probably is a designation of the confines of Arabia with south-eastern Palestine, inhabited by nomad tribes dwelling in more encampments. See HAZOR.

Head (properly שְׂנָה, rosh, שֵׁם, the) the topmost part of the body.

I. Anatomically considered, the general character of the human head is such as to establish the identity of the human race, and to distinguish man from every other animal. At the same time, different families of mankind are marked by peculiarities of construction in the head, which, though in individual cases and when extended to the other, to the entire loss of distinctive line, yet are in the general broadly contrasted one with the other. These peculiarities in the structure of the skull give rise to and are connected with other peculiarities of feature and general contour of face. In the union of cranial peculiarities with those of the face, certain clear marks are presented, by which physiologists have been able to range the individuals of our race into a few great classes, and in so doing to afford an unintentional corroboration of the information which the Scriptures add regarding the nation and descendants of the patriarchs. Camper, one of the most learned and clear-minded physicians of the 18th century, has the credit of being the first who drew attention to the classification of the human features, and endeavored, by means of what he termed the facial angle, to furnish a method for distinguishing different nations and races of men, which, be-ING himself an eminent limner, he designed for application chiefly in the art of drawing, and which, though far from producing strictly definite and scientific results, yet affords views that are not without interest, and approximations at least prepared the way for something better (see a collection of Camper’s pieces entitled Oeuvres qui ont pour Objet l’Histoire Naturelle, la Physiologie, et l’Anatomie comparée, Paris, 1803). It is, however, to the celebrated J. F. Blumenbach, whose merits in the entire sphere of natural history are so transcendent, that we are mainly indebted for the accurate and satisfactory classifications in regard to cranial structure which now prevail. Camper had observed that the breadth of the head differs in different nations; that the heads of Asiatics (the Kalmucks) have the greatest breadth; that those of Europeans have a middle degree of breadth; and that the skulls of the African negroes are the narrowest of all. This circumstance was by Blumenbach made the foundation of his arrangement and description of skulls. By comparing different forms of the human cranium together, that eminent physiologist was led to recognize three great types, to which all others could be referred—the Caucasian, Mongolian, and Ethiopian. These three differ more widely from each other than any other that can be found; but to these three, Blumenbach, in his classification of skulls, and of the races of men to which they belong, added two others, in many respects intermediate between the three forms already mentioned. In this way five classes are established, corresponding with five great families, 1.

The Caucasian family, comprising the nations of Europe, some of the Western Asiatiques, etc., have the head of the most symmetrical shape, almost round, the forehead of moderate extent, the cheek-bones rather narrow, without any projection, but a direction downwards from the molar process of the frontal bone; the alveolar edge well rounded; the front teeth of each jaw placed perpendicularly; the face of oval shape, straight, features moderately prominent; forehead arched; nose narrow, slightly arched; mouth small; chin full and round. 2.

The second is the Mongolian variety. 3. Ethiopian. 4. Malay and South Sea Islanders. 5. American. The description of their peculiarities may be found in Pichard’s Recherches into the Physical History of Man, 2d ed. 2.

Buch der Physiologie. But the most recent, if not the best work on the subject before us is Pichard’s Natural History of Man (1843), a work which comprises and reviews, in the spirit of a sound philosophy, all that has hitherto been written and discovered on the origin, physical development, and historical progress of man. In this invaluable work full details may be found of the methods of studying the human head of which we have spoken, and of some others, not less interesting in themselves, nor less valuable in their results (see particularly p. 116 sq.).

II. Scriptural References.—This part of the human body has generally been considered as the abode of intelligence. In the head, or the parts peculiar to it, have been accounted the place where the affections lie (Gen. iii, 15; Psa. iii, 3; Eccles. ii, 14). The head and the heart are sometimes taken for the entire person (Isa. i, 5). Even the head alone, as being the chief member, frequently stands for the man (Prov. x, 6). The head also denotes sovereignty (1 Cor. xi, 8). Covering the head, and cutting off the hair, were signs of mourning and tokens of distress, which were enhanced by throwing ashes on the head, together with sackcloth (Amos viii, 10; Job i, 20; Lev. xxxvi, 5; Deut. xiv, 1; 2 Sam. xxii, 10; Exod. xix, 5). While accounting the head was practised on festive occasions, and considered an emblem of fertility (Eccles. ix, 8; Psa. xxiii, 5; Luke vii, 46). See ANOINT. It was not unusual to swear by the head (Matt. v, 56; Kitt, s. v.). The phrase to lift up the head of any one is, to exalt him (Psa. iii, s, cx, 7); and to return or give back upon one’s head, is to be requited, recompensed (Psa. vii, 16; Joel iii, 4; Ezek. ix, 10; xi, 21; xvi, 39; xvii, 19; xxii, 33). So, your blood be on your own head (Acts xvii, 6); the guilt of your destruction rests upon yourselves (2 Sam. i, 16; 1 Kings ii, 33, 37).

The term head is used to signify the chief, one to whom others are subordinate; the prince of a people or state (Jug. x, 18; xi, 8; 1 Sam. xv, 17; Psa. xviii, 43; Isa. vii, 8, 9); of a family, the head, chief, patriarch (Exod. vi, 14; Numb. vii, 2; 1 Chron. vii, 24); of a husband in relation to a wife (Gen. iii, i6; 1 Cor. xi, 3; Eph. v, 23). So of Christ the head in relation to his Church, which is his body, and its members his members (1 Cor. xii, 27; xi, 8; Eph. i, 22; iv, 15; v, 23; Col. i, 18; ii, 10, 19); of God in relation to Christ (1 Cor. xi, 3). Head is also used for what is highest, uppermost: the top, summit of a mountain (Gen. xvii, 5; Exod. xvii, 9, 10; xix, 20). The mountains of the Lord’s house shall be established at the head of the mountains, and shall be higher than the hills, i.e. it shall be a prince among the mountains (Isa. ii, 2). Four heads of rivers, i.e. four rivers into which the waters divide themselves (Gen. ii, 10). Headstone of the altar (Psa. xcvii, 22), either the highest, forming the top or coping of the corner; or lowest, which forms the foundation of the building. See CORNER.

III. Hair of the Head ("קְנֵי") was by the Hebrews worn thick and full as an ornament of the person (comp. Ezek. viii, 3; Jer. vii, 29): a bald head, besides exposing one to the suspicion of leprosy (Lev. xiii, 48 sq.), was always a cause of mortification (2 Kings ii, 23; Isa. iii, 17, 34; comp. Sueton. Caes. 45; Dion. 18; Homer, Head, ii, 219; Hariri, 10, p. 59, ed. Sacy) among the priests or order it therefore amounted to a positive disqualification (Lev. xx, 29; Mishna, Beorokoth, vii, 2); among the Egyptians, on the contrary, the hair was regularly shorn (Gen. xii, 14), and only allowed to go uncut in seasons of mourning (Herod. ii, 86). Hair as it ascends to the shoulders, however, seems only in early times to have been the habit, in the male sex, with youth (2 Sam. xiv, 6; Joseph. Ant. viii, 7, 3; Horace, Od. ii, 5, 21; ii, 20, 14). Men cropped it from time to time with shears ("קְנֵי", קְנָה; comp. Ezek. xiv, 20, and the ezkay pefit of the Babyloniens, Strabo xvi, 746). See, however, NAZARENE. Among the late Jews long hair in men was esteemed a weakness (1 Cor. xi, 12; and to the priests any curtailment of it was forbidden (Orto, comp. 424 sq.); but in the Persian period, remains, see Niebuhr, Trar. ii. 128; and for that of the Asiatic priests in general, see Movers, Phlaec. i. 682: on the Assyrian monuments it is always, in the case of natives at least, represented as long and elaborately curled; see Layard, passim. Only in cases of religious vows did males suffer it (Aristot. De vi. xvi. 18; see Kuniol, ad loc.). Females, on the contrary, set great value upon the hair (1 Cor. i. c.; compare Cant. iv. 1;Luke vili. 38; John xi. 2 [Rev. ix. 8]; Phile. Ep. 28; Plutarch, De vir. arei. iii. 1; Harner, iii. 31; Rosenmüller, Morgend. vi. 198; Kype, Obersen, ii. 29). There were various modes of putting up the hair (Ezek. xiv. 15; comp. Herod. iv. 175, 191); and it was a custom that men should not cut off the earlocks (1 Kings 15. 27, Lev. xiv. 27; A.V. "round the corners of the head"). Women, especially, were wont to curl the hair (Isa. iii. 24; see Gesean, ad loc.; comp. Serv. ad En. xiii. 90), and to braid it (2 Kings ii. 30; Judith xiii. 3; 1 Pet. iii. 3; Tim. i. 9; comp. Joseph. War. iv. 9, 10; Homer. Ili. iii. 185; xiv. 176; Harner, ii. 381: to go with dishevelled hair (homousia) was a mark of folly (1 Cor. x. 2; 2 Kings iv. 39); comp. Luke xii. 38; Lightfoot, Opp. p. 1801: but rustic maidens often let the hair fall in loose tresses (2 Sam. vii. 6; comp. Anacr. xxii. 7), merely bound with a ribbon, or even to interweave it with gems or other finery (Huid, xvii. 52), and in later times to ornament it most elaborately (see Lightfoot, Opp. p. 438; Hartmann, Hede, ii. 286 sq.). See HEAD-DRESS. Even men sometimes appear with curls (Joseph. War. iv. 9, 10; Philo, Opp. ii. 479; Plutarch, Lycurgus. 22), which, however, was generally disapproved (Philo, Opp. ii. 306, 479; Cicero, Suet. 8; Artemid. ii. 6; Martial, ii. 36; Phyl. Scent. 194 sq.): Clement Alexander. Ped. iii. p. 161. Both men and women are shown in the O.T. (other nations knew them, Ovid, Fast. i. 495; Petron. Sat. 122. Apul. Ap. ii. 213; comp. Huid, xiv. 76), although they, as well as hair-pins, are referred to in the Talmud (Hartmann, p. 224 sq.). Hair-powder was unknown to the ancients. On the other hand, they used to anoint the hair with oil (Joseph. War. iv. 122; Matt. vii. 14; Luke xvi. 23; 2 Peter vii. 17; Luke vii. 46; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 4, 1; comp. Plutarch, De sent. 91; Herod. ii. 11). Jewish nations, Plutarch, Tariceps conjig. 29; Horace. Od. ii. 11, 16; iii. 29; Ovid, Ars Am. i. 505; Tibull. i. 73; Suetonius. Cesar. 67; Apul. Metam. ii. 30, Bip.). and gave it a brilliant lustre by a mixture of gold-dust in these respects. Joseph. Ant. viii. 7, 4; comp. Lamprid. Comm. 17), as the hair of Orientals is generally black (Com. iv. 1; v. 11: David's rufous hair is named as pecu- lar, 1 Sam. xvi. 12). A common method of dressing the hair among many ancient nations (Pliny, xv. 24; xxi. 12; 24; xxi. 60; 38; xxi. 51; Athen. xii. 542; Val. Max. ii. 13; 25; Diol. Sic. vi. 28; but not among the Greeks, Plutarch, Aegopht. reg. p. 19, Tauchan), and one highly esteemed by modern Orientals, namely, to stain it reddish-yellow by means of henna (see CAMPBELL), but although perhaps not unknown to the Hebrews (see Cant. viii. 13), as an imitation of the generally prized golden-hued locks (Garr. of the famous of the best kumissi). Modern Egyptian Head-dresses. (From Lane.)

Various Forms of the modern Turban.

Bedouin Head-dress, or Keffiyeh.

(Acts xix, 12, A.Vera. “apron”), as explained by Suidas term used for putting on either the tannīf or the peēr is ὑπάρχειν, “to bind round” (Exod. xxi, 9; Lev. viii, 13); hence the words in Ezek. xvi, 10, “I girded thee about with fine linen,” are to be understood of the turban; and by the use of the same term Jonah (ii, 5) represents the weeds wrapped as a turban round his head. The turban, as now worn in the East, varies very much in shape (Russell’s Aleppo, i, 102). It appears that frequently the robes supplied the place of a head-dress, being so ample that they might be thrown over the head at pleasure: the radid and the tannīf, at all events, were so used [see Dress], and the veil served a similar purpose. See Vitt. The ordinary head-dress of the Bedouin consists of the keffiyeh, a square handkerchief, generally of red and yellow cotton, or cotton and silk, folded so that three of the corners hang down over the back and shoulders, leaving the face exposed, and bound round the head by a cord (Burckhardt, Notes, i, 48). It is not improbable that a similar covering was used by the Hebrews on certain occasions: the “kerchief” in Ezek. xiii, 18 has been so understood by some writers (Hamer, Observations, ii, 228), though the word more probably refers to a species of veil; and the στάμφλιον to the description of a turban (Lueys obesidad, Gessnerina, Theaurus, p. 542). The associated term serachet expresses the flowing character of the Eastern head-dress, as it falls down over the back (Layard, Nineveh, ii, 308). The word rendered 'hats' in Dan. iii, 21 (םִּשְׁבָּשִׁים) properly applies to a cloak! The Heb. שְׁבָּשִׁים, shebshim (Isa. iii, 18), rendered in our version "cauls," or, as in the margin, "networks," were most probably some kind of reticulated head-dress, and so the word is understood in the Talmud. See CAUL.

A very peculiar kind of head-dress worn in some parts of Palestine, especially by the Druses of Mount Lebanon, and thought to be referred to by the כֶּרֶם, ke-re'm, or "horn" of 1 Sam. ii, 1, is the tannura. It is made of gold or silver, frequently of other metal either gilt or silver-plated, and sometimes of mere wood. The more costly ones are highly ornamented, and occasionally set with jewels; but the length and position of them is that upon which the traveller looks with the greatest interest, as illustrating and explaining a familiar expression of Scripture. The young, the rich, and the vain wear the tannura of great length, standing straight up from the top of the forehead; whereas the humble, the poor, and the aged place it upon the side of the head, much shorter, and spreading at the end like a trumpet. See Horns.

Head of the Church, a title which properly belongs only to Christ (Ephes. v, 23), as the Supreme Governor of the whole body of the faithful. It is applied to the sovereign of Great Britain as the ruler of the temporalities of the Church. "Some have imagined (the members of the Romish Church, for instance) that the Christian world is 'permanently,' and from generation to generation, subject to some one spiritual ruler (whether an individual man or a Church), the delegate, representative, and viceregent of Christ, whose authority should be binding on the conscience of all, and decisive on every point of faith." But, had such been our Lord's design, he could not possibly have failed, when promising his disciples "another Comforter, who should abide with them forever," to refer them to the man or body of men who should, in perpetual succession, be the depository of this divine consolation and supremacy. It is also incredible, had such been our Lord's purpose, that he himself should be perpetually spoken of and alluded to as the Head of his Church, without any reference to any supreme head on earth as fully representing him, and bearing universal rule in his name. It is clear, therefore, that the Christian Church universal has no spiritual head on earth (Eden, Churchman's Dictionary, s. v.). See Pope; Papacy; Primacy.

Heal (properly ἅξιος, ἱπποραίω) is used in Scripture in the wider sense of curing in general, as applied to diseases, and even to inanimate objects. It occurs also in the special sense of restoring from apostasy. See Disease; Cure.
HEAP

The Hebrew word תַּגָּדֶשׁ, tagdockh, rendered "tomb" in Job xxx, 32, and "heap" in the margin, properly signifies a stack; a heap, tumulus, a sepulchral mound that was made by a pile of earth or stones. The ancient tumuli were heaps of earth or stone, and probably such a pile was usually made over a grave as a monument. Travellers in the East have often seen heaps of stones covering over or marking the place of graves. The Hebrew word תַּגָּדֶשׁ, tagdockh, rendered "a great heap of stones," refers to the heaps or tumuli which were raised over those whose death was either infamous or attended with some very remarkable circumstances. Such was the monument raised over the grave of Achan (Josh. vii, 26); and over that of the king of Ai (Josh. xix, 29). The building of Absalom was distinguished by a similar erection, as a monument of his disgrace to future ages (2 Sam. xviii, 17). The same word תַּגָּדֶשׁ, tag, is commonly used in reference to the heaps or ruins of walls and cities (Job viii, 17; Isa. xxxv, 2; 2 Is, 37; Jer. ix, 10). Modern travellers abundantly testify to the accurate fulfillment of Scripture prophecy in relation to the sites of vanished cities, particularly such as were doomed to become desolate heaps (Bastow). See PILAR; STONE.

Other Heb. terms translated heap are: דֶּשֶׁת, sheker, a pile (Exod. viii, 14, elsewhere a homer, as a measure); דֶּשֶׁת, mei, a heap of rubbish (Isa. xxii, 11); דֶּשֶׁת, ned, a mound (Isa. xxi, 11; poet. of waves, Exod. xv, 8; Josh. iii, 11, 13; Psa. lxxxi, 7; lxxx, 13); דֶּשֶׁת, arenamh, a pile (e.g. of rubbish, Neh. iii, 34; of grain, Cant. vii, 3; of sheaves, Ruth iii, 7; Neh. viii, 13; Hag. li, 16, etc.); דֶּשֶׁת, a hill (Josh. xii, 13, espec. a mound of rubbish, Deut. xii, 17; Josh. viii, 28; Jer. xix, 2, etc.); with others of a more miscellaneous signification. See MOUNT.

Hearers (audientes), a name given to a class of men in the early Church who were admitted to hear sermons and scriptures read in the church, but were not allowed to share in the prayers. The Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii, c. 5) orders the deacons to dismiss them with the words Νέες οйκίαν αὐθεντέων, Νέες οйκίαν αὐθεντέων ("Let none of the hearers, let none of the unbelievers, be present"), before the public liturgy began. See Bingham, Orig. Ecles. bk. viii, c. 4; bk. xi. ch. 2; bk. xvii. ch. 1.

Hearse or Horse (from Lat. heres, Low Lat. hercia, French herse, a hurdle). The Low Latin hercia also signified a candelabrum, shaped like a hurdle, which was placed at the head of a grave, a coffin, or a cenotaph. In the Middle Ages the name herse was applied to a canop- py (in Italian, catafald), which was placed over the cof- fins of the distinguished dead, while they were kept in the church previous to interment. Horses were also frequently prepared to receive the bodies of the dead in churches, at stations along the route, where they were being borne to a distance for final interment. Horses were often made with great magnificence. They were frequently adorned with illustrations of the last judg- ment, and other subjects taken from the Scriptures. Candles were set in sockets in great numbers, and were kept burning as long as the corpse remained in the horse. The name herse was also applied to a frame of wood or of metal that was placed over some of the re- clining statues which were so frequently put over the tombs of distinguished persons. Over this horse a pall was frequently hung. The modern use of the word hearse is confined to a frame-work or a wagon to bear the dead to the grave. The hearse varies greatly in form and ornamentation in different countries.—Dier, Etymologisches Wörterbuch (1861); Parker, Dic. of Architecture (1850); Migne, Dictionnaire des Origines (Paris, 1864). Heart, in the Biblical sense (καρδία; בַּמֶּר or בַּמֶּר, often exchanged for בַּמֶּר, in a more extended sense, as in Psa. xxxix, 3, 4; cix, 22; 1 Sam. xxv, 37, the whole region of the chest, with its contents; see Delitzsch, System of Biblical Psychology, § 12, 18). According to Hupfeld, בַּמֶּר, in Psa. xvii, 10, and lxxiii, 7, means simply the heart, which is not very likely.

1. In the Biblical point of view, human life, in all its operations, is centred in the heart. The heart is the central organ of the physical circulation; hence the necessity for strengthening the body as a support for the heart (2 Sam. xvi, 5; Judges xix, 3; Psa. cvi, 15); and the exhaustion of physical power is called a drying up of the heart (Psa. cii, 5; xxii, 15, etc.). So, also, is the heart the centre of spiritual activity; for all spiritual aims, whether belonging to the intellectual, moral, or pathological spheres, are elaborated in the heart, and again carried out by the heart. In fact, the whole life of the soul, in the lower and sensual, as well as in the higher spheres, has its origin in the heart (Prov. iv, 23, "For out of it are the issues of life"). In order to follow this train of thought, and to establish in a clearer light the Biblical view of the heart, it will be best to consider the relation the heart bears to the soul (ψυχή, ψυχή). This is one of the difficult questions in Biblical psychology; Olschowski (in the Abh. der naturw. und kathol. freunde, opus. theol. p. 158) says, "Omnia longum difficillimum est accurate definire quidnam discrimi- nent in N. T. inter ψυχήν et καρδιαν intercedat." Never- theless, the task is facilitated by the fact that there is essential agreement on this point in the anthropologies of the Old and New Testament.

(1) We first note that, while, as before said, the heart is the centre of all the functions of the soul's life, the terms "heart" and "soul" are often used interchangeably in Scripture. Thus, in Deut. vi, 5 (compare Matt. xxii, 37; Mark xii, 30, 33; Luke x, 27), and xxi, 16, we are commanded to love God and obey his commandments with all our heart and all our soul (compare 1 Chron. xxxviii, 9); the union of the faithful, in Acts iv, 12, is designated as ἡν ἡ καρδια καί ἡ ψυχή μια ("in these passages, as in others, for instance, Deut. vi, 18; xxx, 2; Jer. xxxii, 41, there is, moreover, notice not that the heart is always named alone.

Thus the indecision and division of the inner life can be designated either by ἱλασθείς (James i, 8) or by καρδία ἑαυτοῦ (James i, 8) or by καρδία ἑαυτοῦ (James i, 8) or by καρδία ἑαυτοῦ. It is said of both ἱλασθείς καρ- δία (James i, 8) and ἱλασθείς ψυχή (1 Pet. i, 22); also καρδία ἑαυτοῦ (Psa. xiii, 5; comp. Job xxx, 16) and καρδία ἑαυτοῦ (Lam. ii, 10; Psa. liii, 9), the self-impelling to the love of God applies as well to the soul (Psa. ci) as to the καρδία, of which the heart is the centre, etc. But in the majority of passages, where either the heart or the soul are separately spoken of, the term "heart" or "soul" may or may not be exchanged at all for the term "soul," or else only with some modification in the mean- ing.

(2) Note also the following fundamental distinction: The soul is the bearer of the personality (i.e. of the ego, the property of man, in virtue of which a living spirit "soul," (Proverbs, 27, 1 Cor. ii, 11)), but yet is not itself the per- son of man; the heart, on the contrary (the γινώσκω, (Proverbs, 27, 22), is the place where the process of self-con- sciousness is developed, in which the soul finds itself, and thus becomes conscious of its actions and impressions as its own "in corde actiones animae humanae ad ipsam reducunt," as is concisely and correctly said by Roes in his "De insigne, expl.t, xii, 770, p. 99). Ac- cordingly the soul, not the heart, is spoken of when the whole human being as such, and his physical or spiritual welfare or perilment are meant. This is seen on comparing such passages as Job xxxii, 18, 22, 28; Psal. xxiv, 17; and the expressions of the New Testament poets (Heb. xii, 39; ἀπολοία τετυφυος Mark vii, 35; comp. Matt. x, 35; James i, 21; σωτηρία του φυσιον (1 Pet. i, 5); ἀπολοία τοις (Acts i, 24); nor could we substitute ‘heart’ for ‘soul’ regarding with the oath in 2 Cor. i, 29); neither can ἄχρηστος be said of the δύναμις (Psa. xxi, 30), instead of ἀτυχής ἢ ἁμαρτήσας, for ἄχρηστος δυνάμις (Psa. xxiii, 27; lxix, 35) has an essentially different meaning from ἄχρηστος (comp. Jer. xxxviii, 17, 20).

When Nabu lost consciousness in consequence of fear, his soul still dwelt in him (see Acts xx, 10); but yet, according to 1 Sam. xxxv, 37, his heart died within him. When fear suspends consciousness the heart fails (Gen. xiii, 26). On the other hand, ‘μυαλός, νοον’ (Cont. v, 6), which commentators combine with ἄνοιξις, has an entirely different meaning, namely, that the very self is affected by the love of the other man. When expressing inward contemplation, some feeling or action taking place within man, the elaboration of a plan or resolution, we find almost invariably the heart named, and not the soul (Roos, Fundam. psychol.); ‘Όμως ἐπεί ημὶ ἵνα καταλάβῃς ἀληθίνην μονήν, καὶ εἰς καθαρλόν ἅγιον σώματι τυλιγμόνα (Rom. vi, 14); πάντας τινας καταλαβόν (Rom. i, 17). When the passage Psa. cxix, 32, and the variously interpreted passage 2 Kings v, 26, are also to be understood in that manner. The Sept., therefore, often translates ὁρούσιον simply by νοος (Exod. vii, 23; Isa. x, 7, etc.). On the close connection between these two views, see Beck, Christl. Lehrbuch (s. vi, 233). There are, of course, exceptions. The soul is also presented as the subject of perception (Prov. xix, 2; Psa. cxxix, 14); the thoughts which influence man are also called the language and thoughts of the soul (Lam. iii, 20, 24; 1 Sam. xx, 4). The soul is the seat of imagination (Ezek. xi, 13), the place where counsel is taken (Psa. xii, 2 sqq). Yet such passages are comparatively few (comp. Delitzsch, § xii), and even in them the soul sometimes appears to be mentioned, as in the lust-named passage, only in consequence of the necessity of a second expression in the parallelisms. (4) On the other hand, the disposition of mind and passions are as often attributed to the soul as to the heart, according as they are considered either as pervading the whole personality of man, or a disposition governing the whole inner nature of man. It is said in Matt. xxxiv, 18, πρὸς τὸν ἁγιόν ὑμῶν τοῦ φυσιον, that in John xv, 6, it says ὁ λόγος ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ ὑμῶν καὶ καρδία ὑμῶν τοῦ φυσιον (comp. Rom. ix, 29: xi, 1, μὴ παρασκευάζον, ὑμῶν καρδία; 2 Cor. ii, 4, ἀρεταί καὶ καρδικά, etc.) We find also grief and care, fear and terror, joy and confidence, etc., attributed differently to the heart or to the soul in the O. T. (see Deut. xvii, 2; Prov. xlii, 6; Ezek. xii, 16; 1 Sam. ii, 1; Psa. lvii, 7; Exod. xiv, 9 (where Luther translates δύναμις by heart)); Psa. vi, 4; xlii, 6, 7; Isa. lxii, 10; Psa. lxii, 10; cxxxii, 6; cxvii, 7). Custom has here established arbitrary distinctions between the different expressions: thus ἄχρηστος and its derivatives are generally connected with ὁρούσιον, and νοος and its derivatives with καρδία. The passage Prov. xiv, 10 is of especial interest in this respect. On the contrary, we find ὁρούσιον instead of καρδία when speaking of those functions in which the subject is apprehended as acting on an object. A remarkable passage in this sense is found in Jer. iv, 19: the soul hears the noise of war, and the heart is pained and heavy (Jer. iv, 19). Even in such a passage as Jer. iii, 9: ἡ καρδία μου ἀκύρωσι τῆς ἁμαρτίας (Psa. i, Kings iii, 9). Here we must, however, notice that, as Delitzsch (p. 162) very correctly remarks, in the conception of καρδία, the idea of desire is evidently prevalent over all others. All the impulses by which human actions are governed (see Exod. xxxxxv, 5, 22, 29), the disposition of mind which regulates them, the wishes, desires, etc., originate in the heart (comp. Ezek. xii, 1; Deut. x, 16; Job xxxii, 7, 9, 27; Psa. lxvi, 18; Prov. vii, 2; Matt. v, 28); but as soon as the disposition of the will turns to an outward manifestation of the desires, the καρδία, comes into play. Yet the root καρδία and its derivatives are almost exclusively connected with καρδία (only in Psa. xxxi, 3 do we find καρδία; comp. ἵσυμα τῶν καρδιῶν, Rom. ii, 4; see other passages, like Psa. lxxxiv, 3; cxix, 20, 81; Isa. viii, 8, 9; Jer. xxii, 7). We even find καρδία used sometimes to signify the desire itself, as particularly in Exod. vii, 7, 9. Thus we can explain καρδία (Isa. v, 14; Hab. ii, 5, 20; Prov. xxxii, 2) and καρδία (Proverbs xxviii, 29); the latter is distinct from καρδία (Psa. ci, 5), which Ewald erroneously translates by "covetous heart," while in Prov. xxv, 4 it signifies the soul itself.

2. From the foregoing explanations we can deduce the ethical and religious signification of the word heart. (1) As the heart is the home of the personal life, the workshop where all personal appropriation and elaboration of spiritual things have their seat, it follows that the moral and religious development of man—in fact, his whole moral personality, is also centred in it. Only that which has entered the heart constitutes a possession, having a moral worth, while only that which comes from the heart is a moral product. From the nature and contents of the heart, by a law of natural connection—similar to that which exists between the tree and its fruits (Matt. xii, 33 sqq)—results the individual's course of life as a whole; and from them all his personal acts derive their character and moral signification. Hence καρδία is applied to whatever is of a real moral nature in contradistinction from mere outward appearance (Rom. vi, 17; comp. Matt. xv, 8; 1 Tim. iv, 5). Even in passages where we find it said, in order to express the distinction between what is essential to his nature and the appearance as perceived by man, "He doth not μεταφέρει willingly afflicte" (Lam. iii, 23). That the divine judgment on man will be directed by what he is, not by what he may appear to be, is described as a looking upon his heart (1 Sam. xvii, 7; Jer. xx, 12); a knowing or trying of the heart (1 Kings viii, 39; Luke xvi, 15; Prov. xvi, 8; Ps. viii, 10; xvii, 3; Jer. xi, 20). Therefore also man is designated according to his heart in all that relates to habitual moral qualities; thus we read of a wise heart (1 Kings v, 12; Prov. x, 8, etc.), a pure heart (Ps. lxxvii, 10; 1 Tim. ii, 3; 2 Tim. ii, 22), an upright and righteous heart (Gen. xx, 5, 6; Ps. xi, 2; lxiv, 72, q.e. 2), a single heart (Eph. v, 5; Col. iii, 22), a pious and good heart (Luke viii, 15), a lowly heart (Matt. xi, 29), etc. In all these places it would be difficult to introduce αὐλανηθή or ἄσθενος.

(2) We must also observe that the original divine rule of the heart for man was implanted in his heart, and therefore the heart is the seat of the ευφήλεια, or conscience, which has a mission to proclaim that rule (Rom. ii, 15).

All subsequent divine revelations were also directed to the heart (Deut. vi, 6); so the law demands that God should be loved with the whole heart, and then, as though by radiation from this centre, with the whole soul (comp. Deut. xii, 18; Ps. cxix, 11, etc.). The teaching of wisdom also enters into the heart, and from thence spreads its healing and vivifying influence through the whole organism (Prov. iv, 21–23). The prophetic consolations must spring from the heart (Isa. xi, 2), in contradistinction from such consolations as do not reach the bottom of human nature; thus also, in Matt. xiii, 9; Luke viii, 15, we find the heart described as the ground on which the seed of the divine Word is to be sowed. That which becomes assimilated to the heart constitutes the θυματικός τῆς ψυχής (Matt. xii, 30; John xiv, 22).

This, however, is not only λαμπρός, but also κοινή for the heart is not only a recipient of divine principles of life, but also of evil.

(3) In opposition to the superficial doctrine which makes man in regard to morals an indifferent being, Scripture presents to us the doctrine of the natural wickedness of the human heart, the ὑπερασπισμός (Gen. viii, 21), or, more completely, ὑπερασπισμὸς καὶ ὑπερασπισμός (vi, 5; compare 1 Chron. xxviii, 9), and considers man as having penetrated the centre of life, from whence it contaminates its whole course. “How can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks” (Matt. xxi, 44; comp. Eccles. viii, 11; Ps. lxxii, 7); and those things which come out of the heart defile the man (Matt. xv, 18). The heart is described as deceitful (or, more properly, ὑπερασπισμός, the opposite of ἀληθεία, straight) above all things, and desperately wicked (ὑπερασπισμός, John xxvi, 9); so that God alone can thoroughly sound the depths of its wickedness (compare 1 John iii, 20). Hence the prayer in Ps. cxxxx, 23.

In this natural state of unsatisfactory for good the heart is called uncircumcised, ἄπραματα (Numb. xxvi, 41; compare Deut. x, 16; Ezek. xxiv, 9). Man, frightened at the manifestation of divine holiness, may take within himself the resolution of fulfilling the divine commands (Deut. xiv, 24); yet the divine voice complains (v, 29), “Of that there were such a heart in them that they would fear me!” etc. Therefore the whole Revelation has for its object to change the heart of man; and its whole aim is to destroy, by virtue of its divine efficacy, the unsatisfied heart-restlessness, that constant anxiety, that restless agitation of the heart as Roos expresses it, p. 158) and the antagonism of the heart, and to substitute for them the fear of God in the heart (Jer. xxxii, 40), so that the law may be admitted (Jer. xxxii, 33). This is the effect of the operations of the Holy Spirit, whose workings, as shown in the O.T., produced the new nature, the operation of the heart, the new creation in Christ (Ezek. xxxvi, 26 sq.; xi, 19). Transforming the prophets into new creatures by means of a change of heart (1 Sam. x, 6, 9), and implanting a willingness to obey God’s Law in the pious (Ps. xii, 14–15).

(4) On the part of man, the process of salvation begins in the moment of his acknowledgment of his testimony revelation; which, as giving a new direction to the inner life, belongs entirely to the sphere of the heart, and is described as a fastening (according to the original meaning of εὐπήλεια), a strengthening (γαμογίας, Ps. xxvi, 14; xxxii, 24), a supporting of the heart (comp. particularly Ps. xxvi, 7) on the ground which is God himself, the Δυνάμεις (Psa. lxxiii, 26). The N. T. says in the same manner: καρδιά παρετήσεται (Rom. x, 9, 10), παρετθύνεται εἰς ἡδύναμιν καρδιάς; faith is a μιακίνησις (Matt. xii, 31). As also in the case of the heart by faith in Christ (Acts xv, 9), for by the sprinkling of the blood of atonement the heart is rid of the bad conscience (Heb. x, 22; compare 1 John iii, 19–21), and the love of God is shed in it by the Holy Ghost (Rom. v, 5). The same spirit also works in the heart in the assurance of being a child of God (2 Cor. vii, 17); the heart becomes the abode of Christ (Eph. iii, 16), is preserved in Christ (Col. iii, 15; Phil. iv, 7), and strengthened in sanctification (1 Thes. iii, 15, etc.).

When, on the contrary, man rejects the testimony of revelation, the heart becomes hardened, turns to stone (Ps. xvi, 8; Prov. xxviii, 14; Jer. xxiv, 2). As so many people do not only be διαφανές, but also παντοκράτορ of; for the heart is not only a recipient of divine principles of life, but also of evil.

5. Finally, the question of the position of the heart, as centre of the spiritual life of the soul, holds in regard to the heart considered as the centre of the organic (physical) life, cannot be fully treated except in a thorough investigation of the relations between the body and soul in general. We will only remark here that the Scriptures not only draw a parallel between the body and the soul, by virtue of which the bodily actions are considered as symbols of the spiritual, but also establish the position that the soul, which is the bearer of the personality, is the same which directs also the life and actions; and thus the bodily organs, in their higher functions, become its adjuncts. Now, in view of the well-known fact that emotions and sufferings affect the physical economy— for example, that the pulsations of the heart are affected by them—no one will consider it a mere figure of speech when the Psalmist says, “My heart was hot within me” (Psa. xxxix, 3), or Jeremiah speaks of a “burning fire shut up in his bones” (Jer. xx, 9; comp. iv, 19; xxiii, 9).

But still more worthy of consideration is the position in Biblical anthropology, namely, the specific relation the Bible establishes between certain parts of the bodily organism and particular actions (see what Delitzesch, Biblical Psychology, § 12, 15, deduces from the Biblical significance of the τῇ καρδιᾷ, the hear, the kidneys), and then the part attributed to the heart in knowledge and will, considered aside from the heart and brain. It is well known that all antiquity agreed with the Biblical views in these respects. In regard to Homer’s doctrine, see Nigelsbach’s Homer, Theologie, p. 332 sqq. We may also on this point recall the expressions cordatus, recordari, occrus, occrus, etc. (see especially Cicero, Tusq. i, 9, 18, and Plato, Phaed. c. 45, and the commentators on these passages). As Delitzesch correctly observes, the spiritual signification of the heart cannot be traced back to it from the mere fact of its being the central organ of the circulation. The manner in which that writer has made use of the phenomena of somnambulism to explain this is distinctly unsound, yet physiological science has far been unable to throw any light on the subject...thetis, in Herzog, Real-Encyclop., vi, 15 sq.

4. The heart expresses the middle of anything: “Tyre is in the heart,” in the midst, “of the sea” (Ezek. xxvii, 14). “We will not fear, though the mountains be carried by the waves of the sea” (Ps. lxxxii, 6). As Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale’s bely, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matt. xii, 40). Mos- saes speaking to the Israelites, says, "And the mountain lake shall rise up unto the heart of heaven," the flame rose as high as the clouds.

To "say in one's heart" is a Hebrew expression for thinking (Ps. x, 6; xlv, 1). See SOUL.

5. Of special religious importance are the following practical uses of the word: The heart is that state in which a sinner is inclined to and actually goes on the rebellion against God. This state evidences itself by light views of the evil of sin; partial acknowledgment and confession of it; frequent commission of it; pride and conceit; ingratitude; unconcern about the Word and ordinances of God; insensitivity to divine providences; stilted convictions of conscience; shunning reproof; presumption, and general ignorance of divine things.

Keeping the heart is a duty enjoined in the sacred Scriptures. It consists, says Flavel, in the diligent and constant use and improvement of all holy motions and duties to preserve the soul from sin, and maintain communion with God; and this, he properly observes, supposes a previous work of sanctification, which hath set the heart right by giving it a new bent and inclination. It includes frequent observation of the frame of the soul (Lev. x, 19). Under injuries received (Rom. iii, 26), the heart is ready for baking, a corner of the heart is swept, the bread is laid upon it, and covered with ashes and embers; in a quarter of an hour they turn it. Sometimes they use cozen plates of iron (Arabic atgez, whence the Gr. riyavou), which are most common among the nomadic tribes, as being the easiest way of baking and done with the least expense, for the bread is extremely thin and soon prepared. See BREAD.

This iron plate is either laid on, or supported on legs above the vessel sunk in the ground, which forms the oven. See OVENS. (See note on Bed. i, 18; P. della Valle, Viaggi, i, 436; Harmers, Obs. i, 477, and note; Rauwolf, Travels, ap. Ray, ii, 163; Shaw, Travels, p. 231; Niebuhr, Descr. de l'Arabie, p. 45; Schleusner, Lex. V. Testamenti, s. V. riyavou; Gesenius, s. V. הַרְשִׁו, p. 997). See FIRE.

He-Ass, מֵאָשׁ, chamár' (Gen. xii, 16; elsewhere simply "as"), the general designation of the donkey (Exod. xiii, 13, etc.) for carrying burdens (Exod. xiii, 26) and ploughing (Isa. xxx, 24), being regarded as a patient (Gen. xlix, 14) and contented animal for riding in time of peace (2 Sam. xix, 27; Zech. ix, 9); different from the proud (Exod. xiii, 5). As a beast of burden, it was eaten only in times of famine (2 Kings vi, 25). See Ass's HEAD.

The prohibition of the use of horses to Israel caused the "as" to be held in higher estimation than it holds in our times. It was, at least down to the days of Solomon, the principal beast of burden. But we must not attribute this election wholly to the absence or scarcity of the horse, for in Western Asia the ass is still largely used for the saddle. Though inferior in dignity to the horse, he is still, in his native regions, a very superior animal to the poor, weather-beaten, stunted, half-starved saddle horse of the West. In ancient times the Arabian ass as a really elegant creature. The coat is smooth and clean, the carriage is erect and proud; the limbs are clean, well-formed, and muscular, and are well thrown out in walking or galloping. Asses of this Arab breed are used exclusively for the saddle, and are imported into Syria and Persia, where they are highly valued, especially by the ballists or lawyers, the sheiks or religious teachers, and elderly persons of the opulent classes. They are fed and dressed with the same care as horses, the head-gear is highly ornamented, and the saddle is covered with a fine carpet. They are more spirited, and yet sufficiently docile. Other breeds are equally useful in the more humble labors of ploughing and carrying burdens. White asses, distinguished not only by their color, but by their stature and symmetry, are frequently seen in Western Asia, and are always more highly valued than those of more ordinary hue.

The editor of the Pictorial Bible says that these "are usually in every respect the finest of their species, and their owners certainly take more pride in them than in any other of their asses. They sell at a much higher price; and those hackney ass-men who make a livelihood by hiring their asses to passengers in a hired ride, always expect better pay for the white ass than for any of the others." After describing their more highly ornamented trappings, he observes, "But, above all, their white hides are fantastically streaked and spot-

The constitution of the ass is formed for a dry, rugged region, a rocky wilderness. Its hoofs are long, hollow beneath, with very sharp edges, a peculiarity which makes it sure-footed in ascending and descending steep mountain passes, where the flat hoof of the horse would be insecure. It prefers aromatic, dry, prickly herbs to the most succulent and tender grass; is fond of rolling in the dry dust; suffers but little from thirst or heat; drinks seldom and little; and seems to have no sensible perspiration, its skin being hard, tough, and insensitve. All these characters suit the arid, rocky wildernesses of Persia and Western Asia, the native country of this valuable animal. See Ass.

Heath (usually פּלָש, chôm, קְמָמָחְנ, chammakh'; or פּלָש, chemah'), besides its ordinary meaning, has several peculiar uses in Scripture. In Is. xliv, 10, and Rev. vii, 16, there is a reference to the burning wind of the desert, the zizim or samim, described by travellers as exceedingly pestilential and fatal. It is highly probable that this was the instrument with which God destroyed the army of Sennacherib (2 Kings xix, 7, 35). Its effects are evidently alluded to in Ps. ciii, 15, 16, and in Jer. iv, 11. Then the term mentions a wind, which in 1658 suffocated 20,000 men in one night, and another which in 1655 suffocated 4000 persons. It sometimes burns up the corn when near its maturity, and hence the image of "corn blasted before it be grown up," used in 2 Kings xix, 26. Its effect is not only to render the air extremely hot and scorching, but to kill it with poisonous and suffocating vapors. The most violent storms that Judea was subject to came from the deserts of Arabia. "Out of the south cometh the whirlwind," says Job (xxxvii, 9); "And there came a great wind from the wilderness" (Job i, 19). Zech. ix, 14: "And Jehovah shall appear over them, and his arrow shall go forth as the lightning; and the Lord Jehovah shall sound the trumpet, and shall march in the whirlwinds of the south." The 91st Psalm, which speaks of divine protection, describes the plague as arrows, and in those winds where there are observed flashes of fire. In Numb. xiii, 3, the place in which the plague was inflicted upon the Israelites is for that reason called Taborah, i.e., a burning. A plague is called קִרְצא, dicer, as a desert is called קְמָמָחְנ, mîlîbar-, because those winds came from the desert, and are real plagues. This hot wind, when used as a symbol, signifies the fire of persecution, or else some prodigious wars which destroy men. For wind signifies war; and scorching heat signifies persecution and destruction. So in Matt. xxi, 6, 21, and Luke viii, 6-13, heat signifies persecution, and in 1 Pet. iv, 12, burning tends to temptation. A gentle heat of the sun, according to the Oriental interpreters, signifies the favor and bounty of the prince; but great heat denotes punishment. Hence the burning of the heavens is a portent explained in Lirev. (ii, 5) of slaughter. Thus in Ps. cxxxi, 6: "The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night," is in the next place explained thus: "Jehovah shall preserve thee from all evil; he shall preserve thy soul." See Fire.

Heath (יוֹרָן, arar; Jer. xvii, 6; Sept. ὑπορμίσχυ, Vulg. myrrice; or נֶרֶן, aravah; Jer. xlviii, 6; Sept. ἱσχος ἵππος, persh, by reading יִרְמָה, a wild ass; Vulg. myrurca) has been variously translated, as myrrice, tamarisk; tamarus, which is an Indian tree, the tamarind; retama, that is the broom; and also, as in the French and English versions, bruire, heath, which is, perhaps, the most incorrect of all, though Hesychius mentions finding heath near Jericho, in Syria. Gesenius, however, renders it ruins in the latter of the above passages (see Jer. xlvii, 13, and severely in the former (as in Ps. cxxii, 18). As far as the context is concerned, some of the plants named, as the retam and tamarisk, would answer very well [see Tamarisk]; but the Arabic name, arar, is applied to a totally different plant, a species of which has been clearly shown by Chabas (Hierobot. ii, 195), who states that Arias Montanus is the only one who has so translated the Hebrew in the first of the passages in question (Jer. xlvii, 6): "For he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh, but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land, and not inhabited." Both the Heb. words are from the root נָרָה, to be naked, in allusion to the bare nature of the rocks on which the juniper often grows (comp. Ps. cxxii, 17, נָרָה, the prayer of the destitute, or ill-clad). Several species of juniper are no doubt found in Syria and Palestine. See Cedar; juniper.

Dr. Robinson went with some in proceeding from Hebron to wady Musa, near the romantic pass of Nemela: "On the rocks above we found the juniper-tree, Arabic arar; its berries bear the appearance and taste of the common juniper, except that there is more of the aroma of the pine. These trees were ten or fifteen feet in height, and hung upon the rocks even to the summits of the cliffs and needle." (Fibb. Researches, ii, 606). In preceding S.E. he states: "Lambiris, their juniper becomes more yellowish in the wadys and on the rocks." It is mentioned in the same situations by other travellers, and is no doubt common enough, particularly in wild, uncultivated, and often inaccessible situations, and is thus suitable to Jer. xlviii, 6: "Flee, save your lives, and be like the heath in the wilderness." This appears to be the Juniperus Sabina, or savin, with small scale-like leaves, which are pressed close to the stem, and which is described as being a gloomy-looking bush inhabiting the most sterile soil (see Exoah (Zeph. A. Hiat, iii, 311); a characteristic of which, so well suited to the dashed or destitute tree spoken of by the prophet. Rosenmuller's explanation of the Hebrew word, which is also adopted by Maurer, "qui destitutus versatur" (Schol. ad Jer. xlvii, 6), is very unsatisfactory. Not to mention the tameness of the comparison, it is evidently contradicted by the antiquities named, 8: "Cursed is he that trusts in the wood... he shall be like the juniper that grows on the bare rocks of the desert: Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord... he shall be as a tree planted by the waters." The contrast between the shrub of the arid desert and the tree growing by the waters is very striking; but Rosenmuller's interpretation appears to spoil the whole. Even more unsatisfactory is Michaelis (Supp. Lex. Heb. p. 1971), who thinks "Guinea-hens" (Numida melanoleuca) are intended! Gesenius (Thes. p. 1073 4) understands these two Heb. terms to denote

"paritena, ediccia evera" (ruins); but it is more in accordance with the scriptural passages to suppose that some tree is intended, which explanation, moreover, has the sanction of the Sept. and Vulgate, and of the modern use of the word. Most modern travelers do not mention the species; but those which have been named as growing in Palestine are the Phoecian juniper, the common sabin, and the brown-berried juniper. The first of these is a tree of about twenty feet high, growing with its branches in a pyramidal form. Rosenmuller et al. think that Forskal found it frequently in the sandy heaths about Suez. The caravans use it for fuel." The species best known in America are the common red cedar (Jun. Virginiana) and the Bermuda cedar, from which the wood of lead-pencils is manufactured. They all have long, narrow, prickly leaves and bear a soft, pulpy berry, from which a carminative oil is extracted. The wood is light, highly odorous, and very durable. See JUNIPER.

Sanhe, Aza, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hillsdale, N. Y., July 81, 1776. His parents were Congregationalists. At thirteen he was converted, under the minster of the Rev. F. Garretson (q. v.). He began to preach in 1797 on Cambrai Mission work, under the direc- tion of the Rev. Sylvester Hutchinson. In 1798 he was stationed at Pomfret, Conn., with Dan-iel Orrander. In 1799 he was sent to the province of Maine, and stationed on the Kennebec Circuit, embarking all the territory from Watervill to the Canaan line, making it two hundred miles to reach all the appointments. In 1800 Portland was his field of labor: 1801, Readfield; 1802, Falmouth; 1804-5, Scar- borou. In 1806 he located in consequence of body in- ferminities. In 1818 he re-entered the traveling connec- tion, and was appointed presiding elder of Portland dis- trict, which position he occupied for three years; 1821, 1822, Kennebec; in 1823 he again located, and removed to Monmouth, Me.; in 1827 he re-entered the travelling ministry again, and held an effective re- lation to the Conference fifteen years. In 1842 he be- came supernumerary, and this relation continued until Sept. 1, 1880, when he died in peace. As a preacher, he was noted in doctrine, clear in exposition, simple yet forcible in illustration, and impressive in delivery. Zim's Herald, Oct. 5, 1880.

Heathcothe, Ralph, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1721, and died May 28, 1795. He was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge; took degrees in 1748 was made vicar of Barkby, near Leicester; assistant preacher of Lincoln's Inn in 1753; succeeded his father as vicar of Sileby in 1755; became rector of Sawtry-all Saints, Huntingdonshire, in 1756; a prebend in the collegiate church in Southwell in 1758; and in 1778 vicar- general of Southwell Church. Besides works on other subjects, he wrote Cursory Animadversions upon the Midde- ltonian Controversy in general (1752); Remarks upon Dr. Chapman's Charge (1752); Letter to Rev. T. Fother- gill (1753); Sketch of Lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy (1756, 8vo); The Use of Reason asserted in Matters of Religion (1756, 8vo); and a defence of the same, in 1759, 8vo; Discourse on the Being and God, against Atheists, in two Sermons (being the only ones of his twenty-four Boyle sermons which he published, 1763, 4to.) Dr. Heathcote wrote several articles for the first edition of the General Biographical Dictionary, and assisted Nicho- las in editing a new edition of the same, published in 1784, 12 vols. 8vo.—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 814; Rose, New Gen. Heathen. The Hebrew word ṭ̄érən, goy (plur. כְּפָהֵים, goyim), together with its Greek equivalent ἐθνος (ethnos), has been somewhat arbitrarily rendered "nation," "people," and "gentiles." Nevertheless, the Heb. word will be interesting to trace the manner in which a term, pri- marily and essentially general in its signification, ac- quired that more restricted sense which was afterwards attached to it. Its development is parallel with that of the Hebrew people, and its meaning at any period may be taken as significant of their relative position with regard to the surrounding nations (2).

1) While among the Jewish nation had no political existence, goyim denoted generally the nations of the world, especially including the immediate descendants of Abraham (Gen. xvii, 18; compare Gal. iii, 16). The latter, as they grew in numbers and importance, were distinguished by the most marked manners and usages by which they were surrounded, and were pro- vided with a code of laws and a religious ritual which made the distinction still more peculiar. They were essentially a separate people (Lev. xxi, 23); separate in habits, morals, and religion, and bound to maintain their separate character by denunciations of the most terrible judgments (Lev. xxvi, 14-38; Deut. xxvii, 11-30). On their march through the desert they encountered the most obstinate resistance from Amalek, "chief of the goyim" (Numb. xxiv, 20), in whose sight the deliverance from Egypt was achieved (Lev. xxii, 25). During the conquest of Canaan the goyim were rapidly exterminated and the "people" of goyim never again there were to be found. The goyim were a nation of enemies to the Israelites on all occasions that the goyim were fighting, the fate of the nation of Ca- nan was constantly kept before their eyes (Lev. xvi, 24, 25; Deut. xvii, 12). They are ever associated with the worship of false gods and the foul practices of idol-aters (Lev. xxi, xxv), and these constituted their chief distinction, as goyim, from the worshipers of the Jehovah, the people of Jehovah (Num. xv, 4; Deut. xxvii, 10). This distinction was maintained in its full force during the early times of the monarchy (2 Sam. vii, 23; 1 Kings vi, 4-8; xiv, 24; 2 Sam. vii, 35). It was from among the goyim, the degraded tribes who submitted to their arms, that the Israelites were permitted to pur- chase their bond-servants (Lev. xxv, 34, 45), and this special enactment seems to have had the effect of giv- ing to a national tradition the force and sanction of a cloth (comp. Gen. xxi, 15). In later times this regulation was strictly adhered to. To the words of Eccles. xi, 7, "I bought men-servants and maid-servants of the Jews in the gowm adin, "sons of the children of Ham, and the rest of the foreign nations," not only were the Israelites forbidden to intermarry with these goyim, but the latter were virtually excluded from the possibility of becoming naturalized. An Ammonite or Moabite was shut out from the congregation of Jehovah even to the tennis genera- tion (Deut. xxiii, 3), while an Edomite or Egyptian was admitted in the third (verses 7, 8). The necessity of maintaining a separation so broadly marked is ever more and more pressing as we follow the Israelites through their history, and observe their constant recurring tendency to descend. Offence and punishment followed each other with all the regularity of cause and effect (Judg. ii, 12; iii, 6-8, etc.).

2. But, even in early Jewish times, the term goyim received by anticipation a significance of wider range than the national experience. (Lev. xxvi, 38, 39; Deut. xxi, 1); and, as the latter was gradually developed dur- ing the gradual subjugation of the monarchy, the goyim were the surrounding nations generally, with whom the Israelites were brought into contact by the expansion of their commerce, and whose idolatrous practices they readily adopted (Ezek. xxiii, 30; Amos v, 26). Later still, it is applied to the Edomites (Isa. v, 1; 6, 10), to the destroyers of Moab (Isa. vi, 8), and to the several nations among whom the Jews were scattered during the Captivity.
HEATHEN

(Ps. cvi. 47; Jer. xlvii, 28; Lam. i, 8, etc.), the practice of idolatry still being their characteristic distinction (Isa. xxxvi. 18; Jer. x. 2, 3; xiv. 22). This signification it retained after the return from Babylon, though it was used in a more limited sense as denoting the mixed race of colonists who settled in Palestine during the Captivity (Neh. v, 17), and who are described as foreign to the Israelites while serving their own gods (2 Kings xvi. 29; Ezra vi. 21).

Tracing the synonymous term ἱθνα through the apocryphal writings, we find that it is applied to the nations around Palestine (1 Macc. i, 11), including the Syro-Palestinian lineal descendants of the army of Gorgias (1 Macc. iii. 41, iv, 7, 11, etc.), as well as the nations of the Philistia, Tyre, and Sidon (1 Macc. v, 9, 10, 16). They were image-worshippers (1 Macc. iii. 48; Wind. xv. 15), whose customs and fashions the Jews seem still to have had an unconquerable propensity to imitate, but on whom they were bound by national tradition to take vengeance (1 Macc. ii. 68; 1 Esth. xvi. 8). Following the customs of the γαλαταί at this period denoted the neglect or concealment of circumcision (1 Macc. i, 15), disregard of sacrifices, profanation of the Sabbath, eating of swine's flesh and meat offered to idols (2 Macc. vi. 6-9, 18; xv. 1, 12), a feature of the Greek national games (2 Macc. iv. 12, 14). In all points Judaism and Hellenism were strongly contrasted. The "barbarous multitude" in 2 Macc. ii. 21 are opposed to those who played the man for Judaism, and the distinction now becomes an ecclesiastical one (comp. Matt. xxviii. 17). In 2 Esth. iii. 33, 34, the "gentiles" are thus defined with as much facility in aecule (comp. Matt. vii. 32; Luke xii. 30).

As the Greek influence became more extensively felt in Asia Minor, and the Greek language was generally used, Hellenism and heathenism became convertible terms, and a Greek was synonymous with a foreigner of any nation. This is singularly evident in the Syriac of 2 Macc. v, 9, 10, 13; comp. John vii. 35; 1 Cor. x. 22; 2 Macc. xi. 2.

In the N. T., again, we find various shades of meaning attached to ἱθνα. In its narrowest sense it is opposed to "those of the circumcision" (Acts x. 45; comp. Esth. xiv. 15, where ἱθνεῖς is implied), and is contrasted with Israel, the people of Jehovah (Luke iii. 82), thus representing the Hebrew דַעַן at one stage of its history. But, like γαλαταί, it also denotes the people of the earth generally (Acts xxii. 26; Gal. iii. 14). In Matt. vii, 7, Ἰησοῦς is applied to an idolater.

But in addition to its significance as an ethnographic term, γαλαταί had a moral sense which must not be overlooked. In Ps. ix. 5, 15, 17 (comp. 2 Sam. xxii. 17, 21, 21) the word stands in parallelism with ἀθρόον, ῥαδχός, the wicked, as distinguished by his moral obliquity (see Hupfeld on Ps. i. 1), and in verse 17 the people thus designated are described as "forgetters of God," that know not Jehovah (Jer. x. 25). Again, in Ps. lix. 5, it is to some extent synonymous in meaning with נְבָשִׁי, "iniquitous transgressor," and in these passages, as well as in Ps. xix. 15, it has but a deeper significance than that of a merely national distinction, although the latter idea is never entirely lost sight of.

In later Jewish literature a technical definition of the word is laid down which is certainly not of universal application. Elias Buber (quoted by Eisenmenger, Ein Irrlichter Judentum, i, 665) explains the as ἁθνεῖς denoting one who is not of Israelitish birth. This can only have reference to its after signification; in the O. T. the singular is never used of an individual, but a collective term, applied equally to the Israelites (Josh. iii. 17) as to the nations of Canaan (Lev. xx. 25), and denotes simply a body politic. Another distinction, equally unsupported, is made between ἱθνα, γαλαταί, and ἄνθρωπος, the former being defined as the nations who had served Israel, while the latter were those who had not (Jalalk Chaudas, fol. 20, note 20; Eisenmenger, i. 667). Abarbanel, on Joel iii. 2, applies the former to both Christians and Turks, or Ishmaelites, while in Sepher Jachan (fol. 148, col. 2) the Christians alone are distinguished by this appellation. Eisenmenger gives some very curious examples of the disabilities under which a γαλατας laboried. One who kept Sabbath, who lived according to the usages of death (ii. 206), and the study of the law was prohibited him to undergo the same penalty, but on the latter point the doctors are at issue (ii. 209). See Gentiles.

3. In modern use, the word heathen (probably a corruption of ἱθνα, ἱθναται, of which it is a translation; or derived from heath, that is, peculiar to the wilderness, as pagan from paga, a village) is applied to all nations that are strangers to revealed religion, that is to say, to all except Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans.

It is nearly synonymous with Gentiles (q.v.) and Pagan (q.v.). At the time of the Crusades the Moslems were also called heathen; but as they receive the doctrine of the one God from the O. T., they are not properly so called. On the relation of the heathen to Judaism, see above, and also the article Gentiles in the same article (vol. iii, p. 789) for their relation to Christianity at its origin. We add the following statements:

"The Oriental forms of heathenism, the religion of the Chinese (Confucius, about 550 B.C.), the Brahminism, and the later Buddhism of the Hindoo (perhaps as early as 1000 B.C.); the religion of the Persians (Zoroaster, 700 B.C.), and the Egyptians (the religion of Osiris), have only a remote and indirect connection with the introduction of Christianity. But they form to some extent the historical basis of the Western religions; and the Persian dualism, especially, was not without influence on the earlier sects (the Gnostic and the Manichean) of the Christian Church. The idea of paganism appears in the two great nations of classic antiquity, Greece and Rome. With the language, morality, literature, and religion of these nations these apostles came directly into contact, and through the whole first age of the Church most of the basis of these nationalities. These, together with the Jews, were the great nations of the ancient world, and shared the earth among them. The Jews were chosen for things eternal, to keep the sanctuary of the true religion. The Greeks prepared the elements of a new culture, of science and art, for the use of the Church. The Romans developed the idea of law, and organized the civilized world in a universal empire, ready to serve the spiritual universality of the Gospel. Both Greeks and Romans were unconscious servitors of Jesus Christ, the 'unknown God.' These three eras, in sum, are the at bitter enmity among themselves, joined hands in the superscription around the cross, where the holy name and the royal title of the Redeemer stood written, by the command of the heathen Pilate, 'in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin' (Schafr, History of the Christian Church, i, 44).

4. As to the religion of heathenism, it is a 'wild growth on the soil of fallen human nature, a darkening of the original consciousness of God, a defacement of the rational and irrational creation, and a corresponding corruption of the moral sense, giving the sanction of religion to natural and unnatural vices. Even the religion of Greece, which, as an artistic product of the imagination, has been justly styled the religion of beauty, is deformed by this moral distortion. It lacks the true conception of sin, and consequently the true conception of holiness. It regards sin not as a perverseness of will and an offence against the gods, but as a folly of the understanding, and an offence against men, often entirely a transgression from the gods themselves; for 'infatuation is a daughter of folly, for these gods themselves are mere men, in whom Homer and the popular faith saw and worshipped the weaknesses and vices of the Grecian character, as well as its virtues, in immensely magnified forms. They have bodies and senses, like mortals, only in colossal proportions. They eat and drink, though only nectar and ambrosia. They are lim-

Heaven, like men, to time and space. Though sometimes honored with the attributes of omnipotence and omniscience, yet they are subject to an iron fate, fall under delusion, and reproach each other with folly. Their heavenly happiness is disturbed by all the troubles of earth, and by their own sins. They consider themselves as born, as living, and as dying, and makes Olympus tremble when he shakes his dark locks in anger. The gentle Venus beams from a spear-wound on her finger. Mars is felled with a stone by Diomedes. Neptune and Apollo have to serve for hire, and are cheated. The gods are involved by their own sins, and are afflicted with the same things that befell men. Though called holy and just, they are full of envy and wrath, hatred and lust, and provoke each other to lying and cruelty, perfidy and adultery. Notwithstanding this essential apostasy from truth and holiness, heathenism was religion, a groping after the unknown God. By its superstition it betrayed the need of faith. Its polytheism rested on a dim monothetic background; it subjected all the gods to Jupiter, and Jupiter himself to a mysterious fate. It had at bottom the feeling of dependence on higher powers, and reverence for divine things. It preserved the memory of a golden age and of a fall. It knew the voice of conscience, the voice of nature, obscure though it was, of guilt. It felt the need of reconciliation with deity, and sought that reconciliation by prayer, penance, and sacrifice. Many of its religious traditions and usages were faint echoes of the primal religion which appeared in the Old Testament. Even Jews, with men of semidemigods, of Prometheus delivered by Hercules from his helpless sufferings, were unconscious prophecies and flaky anticipations of Christian truths. This alone explains the great readiness with which heathens embraced the Gospel, to the shame of the Jews. These elements of truth, morality, and deity in heathenism may be ascribed to three sources. In the first place, man, even in his fallen state, retains some traces of the divine image, a consciousness of God, however weak, conscience, and a deep longing for union with the Godhead, for truth, and for righteousness. In the second place, with Tertullian, we cannot be faithful to the true sentiments of the classics of a Socrates, a Plato, an Aristotle, of Pindar, Sophocles, Plutarch, Cicero, Virgil, Seneca, 'the testimonies of a soul constitutionally Christian, of a nature predestined to Christianity. Secondly, some account must be made of traditions and recollections, however faint, coming down to us from the remote and distant times since the alleged apostle of all nations, the apostle of heathendom. The Church, perhaps, of the majority of the latter.' He adds in a note: "The Presbyterian Confession of Faith (chap. x. § 4) uses language of remarkable boldness on this point, saying, 'Others not elect, although they may be called by the ministry of the Word, and have some commercial operations of the Spirit, yet they never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved; much less can men not professing the Christian religion be saved in any other way whatever, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature, or to the dictates of the God of nature, or to the apostles, or to any church, or to the ministers of Christ, or to any form of Christian worship, or to any form of Christian profession to assert and maintain that they may be very pernicious and to be detested.' This is sufficiently positive, especially as it contradicts both our Saviour and the apostle Paul. It represents heathen who live according to their light as 'much less' possible than the children of men who receive Christ, and reject it, thus directly contradicting our Saviour, who declared that those who rejected his words would receive a heavier condemnation than even the depraved, unrepentant inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, or Tyre and Sidon (Matt. xi. 20-24). The 'Confession of Faith' declares the salvation of conscientious heathen to be 'much less' possible than that of unbelieving hearers of the Gospel; while Christ asserts that even the most flagrant sinners of the heathen shall find it 'more tolerable' in the day of judgment than such unbelievers. Equally at variance with the 'Confession of Faith' is the declaration of Paul in Rom. ix. 27, 28: 'He that had not the law sinned likewise, which shows how those 'having not the law may be a law unto themselves,' and how their 'uncircumcision shall be counted for circumcision.' ... "The facts of human history and the declarations of the Bible alike declare that mercy is a prominent feature in the character of the Father, and that this world is for some reason, known or unknown, under its care. We cannot, therefore, resist the conviction—it is an affirmation of the moral sense of all men—that, guilty though the human race may be, and deserving of destruction, yet every man lives under a dispensation of mercy, and has the opportunity and the capacity for salvation. To assert gravely, then, that the heathen who have never heard of Christ are shut out from all possible hope of pardon, and are not in a salvable position in their present circumstances, is to offend the moral sense of the thoughtful men as well as that of the common multitude. It is worse than denying that an atonement has been made for all mankind, and restricting it to a few, for that denies the practical untruth, is saved from much of its practical evil by our inability to point out the elect in advance, so that our hopes are not cut off for any particular man. But this theory points to actual masses of men, to the entire population of whole countries, and dooms them to a hopeless existence without hope of deliverance, and it extends this judgment backwards to generations in the past who are represented as having had no share in that mercy which we have such reason to believe to be universal in its offers. Such a theory practically denies the divine grace by suspending its exercise, so far as the heathen (the majority of the human race) are concerned, upon the action of those already enlightened. It declares that there is no possible mercy for the heathen unless Christians choose to carry the Gospel to them. Does it seem rational, or in harmony with the universality and freedom of God's grace, that the only possibility of salvation for the mass of mankind should be suspended, not on anything within their control, but on the conduct of men on the opposite side of the globe? By such representations the minds of men are shocked, and a reaction takes place, which is unfavorable not only to heathenism, but to doctrine in religion, both new and old. They are led to think of evangelical religion as a severe, gloomy, remorseless system, which represents God as without mercy, or which confines that mercy within an exceedingly narrow compass. By describing the salvation of pagans as absolutely impossible, an influence is exerted in favor of universal and infinite benevolence. The writer further asserts that no passage in the Bible asserts this theory, nor does any doctrine of the Bible imply it. John Wesley's views on this subject are given in his sermon on Living without God, from which we extract the following: "I have no authority from the sacred page to judge of those that are without, nor do I conceive that any man has a right to sentence all the heathen and Mohammedan world to damnation" (Works, N.Y. ed. ii, 105). Again, the Minutes of Aug. 8, 1770, declare that "he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, according to the light he has, is accepted of God." For this Wesley was attacked by Shirley and others, and defended by Fletcher, in his First Check to Antinomianism (New York ed., i, 41). See, besides the works above cited, Watson, *Theol. Heathenism. See PAGANISM.

Heaven. There is, says Daubuz, a threefold world, and therefore a threefold heaven—the invisible, the visible, and the political among men, which last may be either civil or ecclesiastical. We shall consider these in the inverse order.

A. Territorially and Figuratively regarded. Wherever the scene of a prophetic vision is laid, heaven signifies symbolically the ruling power or government; that is, the whole assembly of the ruling powers, which, in respect to the subjects on earth, are a political heaven, being over and ruling the subjects, as the natural heaven stands over and rules the earth. Thus, according to the subject, is the term to be limited; and therefore Artemidorus, in the time of the Cimmerian pirates, makes Italy to be the heaven: "As heaven," says he, "is the abode of gods, so is Italy of kings." The Chinese call their monarch Tienmu, the son of heaven, meaning thereby the most powerful monarch. And thus, in Matt. xxiv. 30, heaven is synonymous to power and glory; and when Jesus says, "The powers of the heavens shall be shaken," it is easy to conceive that he meant that the kingdoms of the world should be overthrown to submit to his kingdom. Any government is a world; and therefore, in Isa. li. 15, 16, heaven and earth signify a political universe, a kingdom or polity. In Isa. lxxv. 17, a new heaven and a new earth signify a new government, new kingdom, new people. See HEAVEN and EARTH.

B. Physically treated.—I. Definitions and Distinctions.

The ancient Hebrews, for want of a single term like the Greek κόσμος, and the Latin mundo, used the phrase heaven and earth (as Gen. i. 1; Jer. xxiii. 24; and Acts xvii. 24, where "H. and E." = "the world and all things therein") to indicate the universe, or (as Barrow, "Sermons on the Creed, Works" (Oxford ed., iv. 556, expresses it) "those two regions, superior and inferior, which are divided, and in which the whole creation is divided, together with all the beings that do reside in them, or do belong unto them, or are comprehended by them" (compare Pearson, On the Creed, who, on art. i ["Maker of H. and E."*], adds the Rabbinical names of a triple division of the universe, making the sea, *צָרָ Дан, distinct from the *כּלִים, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִבָּשָׂא, יִb this censure is premature: for (1) it is very doubtful whether this hebdomadial division is as old as Paul's time; (2) it is certain that the Rabbinical doctors are not unanimous about the number seven. Rabbi Judah (Chagig., fol. xii, 2, and Aboda Nathan, 37) says there are "two heavens," after Deut. x. 14. This agrees with Glossa's statement, if we combine his subiferum (ἡμέρα) and astriferum (ἡμέρας) into one region of physical heaven: (as indeed Moses does himself in Gen. i, 14, 15, 17, and reserve hisangeliferum for the ἑώρασθαι, "the heaven of heavens," the superem region of Spirit, Ps. lxxiii, 8 [P. L. viii, sup. fin.]). See bishop Pearson's note, On the Creed (ed. Chevallier), p. 91. The learned note of De Wette on 2 Cor. xii, 2 is also worth consulting. (3) The Targum on 2 Chron. vi. 18 (as quoted by Dr. Gill, Comment. 2 Corinth. l. c.), expressly mentions the triple distinction of supreme, mediæ, and lower heavens. Indeed, there is an accumulation of the threefold classification. Thus, in Targ. Hanoum, fol. i, 4, and iii, 2, and lxxiii, 3, three worlds are mentioned. The doctors of the Cabbala also hold the opinion of three worlds, Zechar. Numbl. fol. lxxvi, 3. And of the highest world there is a further distinction, of angels, ἄγγελοι; of souls, ânârê̂; and of spirit, πνεῦμα. See Buxtorf's Lex. Rabba, col. 160, which refers to D. Kimchi on Psax. xix, 9. Paul, the well-known 2 Cor. xii, 2, refers again, only less pointedly, to a plurality of heavens, as in Eph. iv. 10. See Osiusden (ed. Clark) on the former passage.

2. Accordingly, Barrow (p. 558, with whom compare Glossa and Drusius on 2 Cor. xii, 2) ascribes to the Jews the notion that there are three heavens: Calum subiferum, or the firmament; Calum astriferum, the starry heaven; Calum angeliferum, or "the heaven of heaven," where the angels reside, "the third heaven" of Paul. This same notion prevails in the fathers. Thus St. Gregory of Nyssa (Hexazel, i, 42) describes the first of these heavens as the limited space of the denser air (τοῦ ἀέρα τοῦ παραμύτιστου ἀέρα), within which range the clouds, the winds, and the birds; the second is the region in which wander the stars and the planets (ἐν τῇ πλανῆτα τῶν ἀστρων ἀπαραστατῶν), hence aptly called by Hesychius κατάραμμα τῶν ἀστρων, locum sideris; while the third is the very summit of the visible creation, εἰς τὸν ἀείσωμα, place of everlasting. Paul's third heaven, higher than the aerial and stellar world, cognizable [not by the eye, but] by the mind alone (ἐν σώματι καὶ νοητῇ φύσιν γενόμενον), which Damascus calls the heavens of heavens, the prime heaven be- yond all others (ἀπέως τοῦ ὁμοίου, ὁ πρῶτος ὁμοίως), Orthed. Subl, lxi, 2, xlvi, 83; or, according to St. Basil (In Jeanism, visione ii, tom. i, 818), the throne of God (τῶν Θεοῦ Θρόνοι), and to Justin Martyr (Quest. et Resp. ad Grecos, ad ult. Quest. p. 238), the house and throne of God (ἐυκαιρίας καὶ θρόνον τοῦ Θεοῦ).

II. Scripture Passages arranged according to these Distinctions. This latter division of the celestial regions is very convenient and quite Biblical. The first heaven, calum subiferum, the following phrases naturally fall—("owl" or "owls" of the heaven of the air,) see Gen. ii, 19; vii, 23; ix, 2; Deut. iv, 17; xxvii, 26; 1 Kings xxii, 24; Job xii, 7; 21, 26; xxxvi, 11; Ps. viii, 18; lxiii, 2; civ, 12; Jer. vii, 30 et passim; Ezek. xxv, 5 et passim; Dan. ii, 38; Hos. ii, 18; iv, 8; vii, 12; Zeph. i, 3; Mark iv, 3 (τὰ στῖνιον τῶν ὡρα- ρόιοι); Luke viii, 5; ix, 88; Acts x, 12; xi, 6— in all which passages the same original words are found in the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Greek Scriptures (ὑφηγεὶς, ὑφηγείς, ὑφηγαῖς). Here we have equal propriety rendered indiscriminately "air" and "heaven,"—similiarly we read of "the path of the heavens," (Ps. cxli, 3 [Prov. cxlvii, 19]) and "the steps of the heavens" (Lev. iv, 19): of "the stork of the heaven" (Jer. viii, 7): and of "birds of heaven" in general (Eccl. xii, 20; Jer. iv, 25). In addition to these zoological terms, we have meteorological facts included under the same original words: e. g. (b) "The dew of heaven" (Gen. xxvii, 28, 38; Deut. xxxiii, 28; Dan. iv, 15 et passim; Hag. i, 10; Zech. viii, 12): (c) "The clouds of heaven" (1 Kings xvii, 5; Ps. cxlviii, 8; Dan. vii, 13; Matt. xxvii, 50; xxxvi, 64; Mark xiv, 62): (d) "The frost of heaven" (Job xxviii, 29): (e) "The winds of heaven" (1 Kings xii, 34; Job xxxvii, 14; Ps. lvii, 5; Ez. viii, 1; Zeph. viii, 5 [see margin]); Matt. xxxii, 31; Mark xiii, 27): (f) "The rain of heaven" (Gen. vii, 2; Deut. xi, 11; xxxvii, 12; Jer. xiv, 22; Acts xiv, 17 [ἄνατικών ἀτακτών]; Jas. v, 18; Rev. xviii, 6): (g) "Lightning, with thunder" (Job xxxvii, 5, 4; Luke xvi, 24). (ii) Calum angeliferum. This vast space of which Manonon takes cognizance are frequently referred to: e. g. (a) in the phrase "hoát of heaven," in Deut. xvii, 3; Jer. viii, 2; Matt. xxiv, 29 [ἄνατικῆς τῶν ἀνατακτῶν]; a sense which is obviously not to be confounded with another signification of the same phrase, as in Luke ii, 13 [see ἀνατολή]. (b) Lights of heaven (Gen. i, 4, 15, 16; Ezek. xxxii, 8): (c) Stars of heaven (Gen. xxii, 17; xxxvi, 4; Exod. xxxiii, 13; Deut. i, 10; x, 22; xxvii, 62; Judg. v, 29; Neh. ix, 23; Isa. xiii, 10; Nah. iii, 15; Heb. xi, 12, (iii.) Calum angeliferum. We could exceed our limits if we were to collect the scripture phrases which give us of heaven in its sublimest sense; we content ourselves with indicating one or two of the most obvious: (a) The heaven of heavens (Deut. x, 14; 1 Kings viii, 27; 2 Chron. ii, 6, 18; Neh. ix, 6; Ps. cxv, 16; cxlviii, 4: (b) The third heaven (2 Cor. xi, 14 [saith Paul, nowhere trusted, yet at Ephes. iv. 10]; (c) The highest (Matt. xxii, 9; Mark xi, 10; Luke ii, 14, compared with Ps. lxxiii, 1). This heavenly sublimity was graciously brought down to Jewish appreciation in the sacred symbol of their Tabernacle and Temple, which they revered especially in the edifying of "the Holy of Holies" (as the place where God's honor dwelt) (Ps. xxxvi, 8), and amidst the sculptured types of his celestial retinue, in the cherubim of the mercy-seat (2 Kings xix, 15; Ps. lixx, 1: Isa. xxxvi, 16).

III. Meaning of the Terms used in the Origin. By far the most frequent designation of the heavens in the Hebrew Scriptures is אֹטַח (אָטַח), a name of the older lexicographers (see Cocceius, Lex. n. 4.) regarded as the dual, but which Gesenius and Furst have restored to the dignity, which St. Jerome gave it, of the plural of an obsolete noun, אָטַח as (םֵ֜אָטַח plfr. of מַוָּה and מַוָּה from פָּרֶ֝ל). According to these recent scholars, the idea expressed by the word is height, elevation (Gesenius, Theor. p. 1453; Furst, Hebr. Wort, ii, 467). In this respect of its essential meaning it resembles the Greek ἐξανάστημι [from the Greek radical denoting height] (Pott, Etymol. Forsch. l, 128, ed. 1). Pott's rendering of this root is, by "sich erheben," reminds us of our own beautiful word heaven, which thus enters into brotherhood of significance with the grand idea of the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Greek. Professor Bosworth, in his Anglo-Saxon Dict., under the verb ἔβλεπε, to raise or elevate, gives the kindred words of the whole Teutonic family, and deduces therefrom the noun hefen or hefen, in the sense of heaven. And although the primary notion of the Latin caelest (akin to κολλᾶν and our follow) is the sublum of one of a covered or vaulted space, the latter is still the same (see White and Riddle, s. v. Celim) and in the derived languages (comp. French ciel, and the English word ceiling).

2. Closely allied in meaning, though unconnected in origin with וָמַ֖ב, is the oft-occurring וָמַ֖ב, marâm. This word is never used of English church, but "heights," or "high places," a sense of elevation has prevailed, both in the original (see White and Riddle, s. v. Celim) and in the derived languages (comp. French ciel, and the English word ceiling).
"It was a common belief among all ancient nations that at the summit of the shadow of the earth, or on the top of the highest mountain of the earth, which reaches with its crest into heaven... the gods have their palace or hall of assembly," and he instances "the Babylonian Abarbakh, the chief abode of Ormuzd, among the heights and the convents of Mount Meru; and the Chinese Kulson (or Kan-en-lun); and the Greek Olympus (and Atlas); and the Arabian Caf; and the Parsee Terek." He, however, while strongly and indeed most properly censuring the identification of Mount Meru with Mount Moriah (which had hastily been conjectured from the 'accidental resemblance of the names'), adds that it seems improbable that the Israelites should have entertained, like other ancient nations, the notion of local height for the abode of his whom "glory the heaven and the heavens of heavens cannot contain," and this he supposes on the ground that such a notion rests essentially on polytheistic ideas. Surely the learned commentator is premature in both these statements. (1.) No such improbability, in fact, unhappily, can be predicates of the Israelites, who in ancient times (notwithstanding the divine prohibitions) exhibited a constant tendency to the ritual of their קֶדֶשׁ, or "high places." Gesenius makes a more correct statement when he says [Racov. Hebr., p. 395]: "The Sibyls, like most other ancient nations, supposed that sacred rites performed on high places were particularly acceptable to the Deity. Hence they were accustomed to offer sacrifices on mountains and hills, both to idols and to God himself (1 Sam. ix. 12 sq.; 1 Chron. xii, 29 sq.; 1 Kings iii, 41; 2 Kings xii, 2, 3; Isa. xiv, 7); and also to build there chapels, fanes, tabernacles (תֵּרוֹת [קֶדֶשׁ], I Kings xii, 32; 2 Kings xvii, 29, with their priests and other ministers of the sacred rites (תֵּרוֹת [קֶדֶשׁ], 1 Kings xii, 32; 2 Kings xvii, 32). So tenacious of this ancient custom were not only the ten tribes, but also all the Jews, that, even after the building of Solomon's Temple, in spite of the express law of Deut. xxi, they continued to erect such chapels on the mountains around Jerusalem. (2.) Neither from the character of Jehovah, as the God of Israel, can the improbability be maintained, as if it were of the essence of polytheism only to localize Deity on mountain heights. "The high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy," in the proclamation which he is pleased to make of his own style, does not disdain to use the celestial symbols; in one of the finest passages of even Isaiah's poetry, God claims as one of the stations of his glory the shrine of "a con- trite and humble spirit" (Isa. lii. 15). His loftiest attributes, therefore, are not compromised, nor is the amplitude of his omnipresence compressed by an earthy residence. Accordingly, the same Jehovah who "walks on the high places, קֶדֶשׁ, of the earth" (Amos iv, 13); who "treadeth on the fastnesses, קֶדֶשׁ, of the sea" (Job ix, 8); and "who ascendeth above the heights, קֶדֶשׁ, of the clouds," was pleased to consecrate Zion as his dwelling-place (Ps. lxxxvii, 2), and his rest (Ps. cxxxiii, 18, 14). Hence we find the same word קֶדֶשׁ, which is often descriptive of the sublimest heaven, used of Zion, which Ezekiel calls "the mountain of the height of Israel," קֶדֶשׁ [קָדָשׁ], xviii, 23; xx, 40; xxxiv, 14. 3. קַדְשֵׁי, galgot. This word, which literally means a wheel, admirably expresses rotary movement, and is actually rendered "heaven" in the A.V. of Ps. lxxvii, 15, "The voice of thy wheel" and the window of the heavens. The Sept. agrees with the A.V. in Himmel; and Darthe renders per orbem, which is ambiguous, being as expressive, to say the least, of the globe of the earth as of the circle of heaven. The Tarqum (in Walton, vol. iii) on the passage gives קַדְשֵׁי (in rota), which is as inde-terminate as the original, as the Syriac also seems to be. De Wette (and after him Justus Olhausen, Die Ps. ernus, T. s. v., we refer Ps. lxxxiv, 35 also to it. More probably in Deut. xxxii, 26 (where it is parallel with יָרֵא, and in the highly poetical passages of Isa. xlv, 8, and Jer. li, 9, our word יָרֵא may be best regarded as designating the empyreal heavens. 5. We have already noticed the connection between יָרֵא and our only remaining word יָרֵא, רָבִּי, from their being associated by the sacred writer in the same sentence (Job xxxvi, 18); it tends to corroborate this connection that, on comparing Gen. i, 6 (and other passages in the sense) with Deut. xxxii, 26, we find יָרֵא of the former sentence, and יָרֵא of the latter, both rendered by the Sept. στροφήμα and firmamentum in the Vulg., whence the word "firmament" passed into our A. V. This word is now a well-understood term in astronomy, synonymous with sky or else the general heavens, undivined by the discoveries of science of the special signification which it bore in the ancient astronomy. See FIRMAMENT. For a clear exposition of all the Scripture passages which bear on the subject, we may refer the reader to professor Dawson's Arkana, especially chap. viii, and to Dr. McCaul on The Mosaic Record of Creation (or what is substituted for the same in a more accessible form under the title Notes on the First Chapter of Genesis, sec. ix, p. 32-44). We must be content here, in reference to our term יָרֵא, to observe that, when we regard its origin (from the root יָרֵא, to spread out or expand by beating; Gesen. s. v.; Fuller, Misc. Sacr., i, 6; Fürst, Hebr.-ar. s. v.), and its connection with, and illustration by, such words as יָרֵא, יָרֵא, יָרֵא, the verbs יָרֵא (Isa. xlvi, 18), "My right hand hath spread out the heavens") and יָרֵא (Isa. xl, 22, "Who stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain; literally, like a net, (and spreadeth them out as a tent") we are astonished at the attempt to connect the meaning of an intelligible term, which fits in easily and consistently with the nature of things, by a few poetical metaphors, that are themselves capable of a consistent sense when held subordinate to the plainer passages of prose. The fuller expression is יָרֵא יָרֵא יָרֵא (Gen. i, 14 sq.). That Moses understood it to mean a solid expanse is clear from his representing it as the barrier between the upper and lower waters (Gen. i, 6 sq.), i.e. as separating the reservoir of the celestial ocean (Ps. civ, 3; xxiii, 3) from the waters of the earth, or those on which the earth was supposed to float (Ps. lxxvii, 6). Through its open plates (יָרֵא יָרֵא יָרֵא, Gen. vii, 11; 2 Kings vii, 2; Isa. x, 4; xxxiii, 19; compare κόσμον, Aristophanes, Nux nux 798) or doors (יָרֵא יָרֵא יָרֵא, Ps. lxxviii, 22), the dew, and snow, and hail are poured upon the earth (Job lxxviii, 27, 22, where we have the curious expression "bottles of heaven," "utes corii"). This firm vault, which Job describes as being "strong as a molten looking-glass" (xxxvii, 18), is transparent, like lucid sapphire, and splendid as crystal (Ps. xii, 3; Exod. xxiv, 10; Ezek. i, 22; Rev. iv, 6), over which the exalted and licentious of God (Isa. lxvi, 1; Ezek. i, 26) and which is opened for the descent of angels, or for prophetical visions (Gen. xxxvii, 17; Ezek. i, 1; Acts vii, 56; x, 11). In it, like gems or golden lamps, the stars are fixed to give light to the earth, and regulate the seasons (Gen. i, 14-19); and the whole mass of matter, and the complex structure (Jer. xxx, 37) is supported by the mountains as its pillars, or strong foundations (Ps. xviii, 7; 2 Sam. xxii, 8; Job xxiv, 11). Similarly the Greeks believed in an ὑπωρευτικὸς ὀρέως (Hom. Il. v, 504), or σφήμα (Hom. Od. xv, 220), or σφενία (Orph. Ημιοιτατον και Κεμιοτατον), which is the philosophers' αἰσθητική (Empedocles, pl. de Phil. phil. pl. ii, 11; Artemid. ap. Sen. Nat. Quaest. vii, 13; quoted by Gesenius, s. v.). It is clear that very many of the above notions were metaphors resulting from the simple primitive conception, and that later writers among the Hebrews had arrived at more scientific views, although, of course, they retained much of the old phraseology, and are fluctuating and undecided in their terms. Elsewhere, for instance, the heavens are likened to a curtain (Ps. civ, 2; Isa. xi, 22). See COSMOCOPY.

IV. Metaphorical Application of the Visible Heavens. — A door opened in heaven is the beginning of a new revelation. To ascend up into heaven signifies to be in full power. Thus is the symbol to be understood in Isa. xiv, 14, 14, where the king of Babylon says, 'I will ascend into heaven; I will exalt my throne above the stars of God.' To ascend into heaven with a sense of elevation, symbolically, to act by a commission from heaven. Thus our Saviour uses the word "descending" (John i, 51) in speaking of the angels acting by divine commission, at the command of the Son of man. To fall from heaven signifies to lose power and authority, to be deprived of the power to govern, to revolt or apostatize.

The heaven opened. The natural heaven, being the symbol of the governing part of the political world, a new face in the natural, represents a new face in the political. Or the heaven may be said to be opened when the day appears, and consequently shut when it is covered by night (Ps. xxvi, 1). "The gates of heaven unfolded," etc. Thus the Scripture, in a poetical manner, speaks of the doors of heaven (Ps. lxxviii, 23); of the heaven being shut (1 Kings viii, 35); and in Ezek. i, 1, the heaven is said to be opened.

Mists of heaven may be the air, or the region between heaven and earth; or the middle station between the corrupted earth and the throne of God in heaven. In this sense, the air is the proper place where God's threatenings and judgments should be denounced. Thus, in 1 Chron. xxxi, 16, it is said that David saw the angel of the Lord standing between heaven and earth, and the heaven was shut, and he was just going to destroy Jerusalem with the pestilence. The angel's hovering there was to show that there was room to pray for mercy, just as God was going to inflict the punishment: it had not as yet done any execution.

C. Spiritual and Everlasting Sense, i.e. the state and place of blessedness in the life to come. Of the nature of this blessedness it is not possible that we should form any adequate conception, and, consequently, that any precise information respecting it should be given to us. Man, indeed, usually conceives the joys of heaven to be the same as, or at least to resemble, the pleasures of this world; and with such hopes as to obtain with certainty, and to enjoy in full measure beyond the grave, that which he holds most dear upon earth — those favorite employments or particular delights which he ardently longs for here, but which he can seldom or never enjoy in this world, or in the enjoyment of which he is never fully satisfied. But one who reflects soberly on the subject will readily see that the happiness of heaven must be a very different thing from earthly happiness. In this world the highest pleasures of which our nature is capable satiate by their continuance, and soon lose the power of giving positive enjoyment. This alone is sufficient to show that the bliss of the future world must be of an entirely different kind from what is called earthly joy and happiness, if we are to be there truly happy, and happy for ever. But since we can have no distinct conception of those joys which never have been and never will be experienced by us, how can we in any extent, we have, of course, no words in human language to express them, and cannot therefore expect any clear description of them even in the holy Scriptures. Hence the Bible describes this happiness sometimes in general terms, designating its greatness (as in Rom. viii, 18-22; 2 Cor. iv, 18), and sometimes it is alluded to in the full images and modes of speech, borrowed from everything which we know to be attractive and desirable. The greater part of these images were already common among the Jewish contemporaries of Christ; but Christ and his apostles employed them in a purer sense than the great multitude of the Jews. The Oriental are rich in such figures. They were employed by Mohammad, who carried them, as his manner was, to an exaggerated excess, but who at the same time said expressly that they were mere figures, although many of his sayings are euphemisters, and are presented literally, as has been often done in a similar way by many Christians.

The following are the principal terms, both literal and figurative, which are applied in Scripture to the condition of future happiness.

a. Among the literal appellations we find "Heaven, Lory aiónov," which, first coming to Hebrew usage, signifies a happy life," or "eternal well-being," and are the words rendered "life," "eternal life," and "life everlasting" in the A. V. (e. g. Matt. vii, 14; xix, 16, 29; xxv, 46): ἀϊόνιον ἀῖον τοῦ κόσμου, "the glory of God" (Rom. ii, 7; 10, v. 2); and εἰρήνη, "peace" (Rom. ii, 10). Also ἀἰώνιον καιρὸν ἐρήμον, "an eternal weight of glory" (2 Cor. iv, 17); and σωτηρία, σωτηρία ἀἰώνιον, "salvation," "eternal salvation" (Heb. v, 9), etc.

b. Among the figurative representations we may place the word "heaven" itself. The abode of departed spiritus, to us who live upon the earth, and while we remain here in the body, is but a foretaste of that glorious residential and material, of that real home of the children of the visible world, and entirely separated from it. There they live in the highest well-being, and in a nearer connection with God and Christ than here below. This place and state cannot be designated by any more fit and appropriate name than that which is found in almost every language, namely, "heaven"—a word in its primary and material signification denoting the region of the skies, or the visible heavens. This word, in Heb.
_caption: 107
In Greek, the word αἰώνιον, therefore frequently employed by the sacred writers, as above exemplified. It is there that the highest sanctuary or temple of God is situated, i.e. it is there that the omnipresent God most gloriously manifests himself. This is the place and abode of God's highest spiritual creation. Thither Christ was transported: he calls it the house of his Father, and says that he has therein prepared an abode for his followers (John xiv, 2).

This place, this "heaven," was never conceived of in ancient times, as it has been by some modern writers, as a particular planet or world, but as the wide expanse of heaven, high above the atmosphere or starry heavens; hence it is sometimes called the third heaven, as being neither the atmosphere nor the starry heavens.

Another figurative name is "Paradise," taken from the word that in the original state of the Garden of Eden was the royal residence, and the seat of divine worship; the "kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xxv, 1; Jas. ii, 5); the "heavenly kingdom" (2 Tim. iv, 18); the "eternal kingdom" (2 Pet. i, 11). It is also called an "eternal inherance" (1 Pet. i, 4; Heb. ix, 15), meaning the possession and full enjoyment of happiness, typified by the residence of the ancient Hebrews in Palestine. The blessed are said to "sit down at table with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," that is, to be a sharer with the sants of old in the joys of salvation; "to be in Abraham's bosom" (Luke xvi, 22; Matt. vii, 8), that is, to sit near on the right hand of the carnal Christ; "to be in the bosom of Christ;" "to reign with Christ" (2 Tim. ii, 11), i.e. to be distinguished, honored, and happy as he is—to enjoy royal felicities; to enjoy
"a Sabbath," or "rest" (Heb. iv, 10, 11), indicating the happiness of pious Christians both in this life and in the life to come.

All that we can with certainty know or infer from Scripture or reason respecting the blessedness of the life to come may be arranged under the following particlars: I. We shall hereafter be entirely freed from the sufferings and adversities of this life. II. Our future blessedness will involve a continuance of the real happiness of this life.

I. The entire exemption from suffering, and all that causes suffering here, is expressed in Scripture by words which denote rest, repose, refreshment, after performing labor and enduring affliction. But all the terms which are employed to express this literally, as has been done in a similar way by many Christians.

The deliverance from the evils of our present life includes,

1. Deliverance from the body, the seat of the lower principles of our nature and of our sinful corruption, and the source of so many evils and sufferings (2 Cor. vi, 1, 2; 1 Cor. xiv, 42-50).

2. Entire separation from the society of wicked and evil-disposed persons, who in various ways injure the righteous man and embitter his life on earth (2 Thess. iv, 18). It is hence accounted a part of the felicity even of Christ himself in heaven to be "separate from sin-ers" (Heb. vii, 26).

3. Upon this earth everything is inconstant and subject to perpetual change, and nothing is capable of complete and final development; this is the life of hopelessly and expectantly waiting for the realization of the promise. But in the world to come it will be different. The bliss of the saints will continue without interruption or change, without fear of termination, and without satiety (Luke xx, 37; 2 Cor. iv, 16, 18; 1 Pet. i, 4; v. 10; 1 John iii, 2 sq.).

II. Besides being exempt from all earthly trials, and having a continuance of that happiness which we had begun to enjoy even here, we have good reason to expect hereafter other rewards and joys, which stand in no natural or necessary connection with the present life; for our entire felicity would be extremely defective and deprive were it to be confined merely to what we carry with us from the present world, to that peace and joy of soul which result from reflecting on what we may have done which is good and pleasing in the sight of God, since even the best men will always discover great imperfections in all that they have done. Our felicity would also be incomplete were we compelled to stop short with that meagre and elementary knowledge which we take with us from this world—that knowledge so broken up into fragments, and yielding so little fruit, and which, poor as it is, many good men, from lack of opportunity, and without any fault on their part, never here acquire.
Beside this the reward of general holiness, and even therefore others which are positive, and dependent on the will of the supreme Legislator.

On this point almost all philosophers are, for the above reasons, agreed—even those who will admit of no positive punishments in the world to come. But, for want of accurate knowledge of the state of the soul or the futuro world, we can say nothing definite and certain as to the nature of the positive rewards. In the doctrine of the New Testament, however, positive rewards are considered most obviously as belonging to our future felicity, and as constituting a principal part of it; for it always represents the joys of heaven as resulting strictly from the favor of God, and as being undeserved by those on whom they are bestowed. Hence there must be something more added to the natural good consequences of our actions here performed. But on this subject we shall only consider the comfort that is given that God will so appoint and order our circumstances, and make such arrangements, that the principal faculties of our souls, reason and affection, will be heightened and developed, so that we shall continually obtain more pure and distinct knowledge of the truth, and make conformal us to the image of Christ.

We may remark that in this life God has very wisely allotted various capacities, powers, and talents, in different ways and degrees, to different men, according to the various ends for which he designs them, and the business on which he employs them. Now there is not the least ground to suppose that this will always remain the same in the future world; it will rather com-the image is taken from Oriental princes, to see whose face and to be in whose presence was esteemed a great favor (Matt. v, 8; Heb. vii, 14). "Without holiness, οὐδεὶς ὁμολογήσει τῷ Κυρίῳ. The opposite of this is to be removed from God and from His face. But Christ is represented as one who will be personally visible to us, and whose personal, familiar intercourse and guidance we shall enjoy. Herein Christ himself places a chief part of the joy of the saints (John xiv, xvii, etc.); and the apostles often describe the blessedness of the pious by the phrase being with Christ. To his guidance has God intrusted the human race, in heaven and on earth. And Paul says (2 Cor. iv, 6), we see "the brightness of the divine glory in the face of Christ:" he is "the visible representative of the invisible God" (Col. i, 15).

According to the representations contained in the holy Scriptures, the saints will dwell together in the future world, and form, as it were, a kingdom or state of God (Luke xvi, 38; Rom. viii, 10; Rev. vii, 9; Heb. xii, 22). They will there partake of a common felicity. Their enjoyment will doubtless be very much heightened by friendship, and by their continued intercourse with each other. We must, however, separate all earthly imperfections from our conceptions of this heavenly society. But that we shall there recognize our former friends, and shall be again associated with them, was uniformly believed by all antiquity. And when we call each other by the name of brother, and by the name of friend, and by the name of father, and by the name of mother, in the presence of Christ, it will be in company with our friends who died before us (αδελφοὶ καὶ μαθηταὶ, 1 Thess. iv, 17); and this presupposes that we shall recognize them, and have intercourse with them, as with Christ himself. See Eternal Life.

Heaven and Earth is an expression for the whole creation (Gen. i, 1). In prophetic language the phase often signifies the political state or condition of persons of different ranks in this world. The heaven of the political world is the sovereignty thereof, whose host and stars are the powers that rule, namely, kings, princes, counselors, and magistrates. The earth is the pleasantry, plebeians, or common race of men, who possess no power, but are ruled by superiors. Of such a heaven and earth we may understand that the greatest part of mankind will be made in Hagg. ii, 6; vii, 21, 22, and referred to in Heb. xii, 26. Such modes of speaking were used in Oriental poetry and philosophy, which made a heaven and earth in everything, that is, a superior and inferior in every part of nature; and we learn from Maimonides, quoted by Mede, that the Arabsians in his time, when they would express that a man was fallen into some great calamity, said, "His heaven has fallen to the earth," meaning his superiority or prosperity is much diminished. To look for new heavens and a new earth (2 Pet. iii, 13) may mean to look for a new order of the present world.

Heave offering (χορήγησις), a term including all that the Israelites voluntarily (Exod. xxv, 2 sq.; xxxvi, 24; xxxvi, 3) or according to a precept (Exod. xxx, 15; Lev. vii, 14; Numb. xv, 19 sq.; xviii, 27 sq.; xxi, 20 sq.; comp. Exek. xlv. 3) contributed of their own prop- erly or commodiously, whether it was (as an offering (θυσία), but) as a present (Isa. xl, 20), to be applied to the regular cultus, i.e. for the establishment and maintenance of the sanctuary and its accessories (Exod. xxxv, 2 sq.; xxxix, 13 sq.; xxxvi, 5 sq.; xl, 21 sq.; xxxiv, 5, 6; Ezra viii, 25, etc.), or for the support of the priests (Exod. xxxviii, 28; Num. xxviii, 15 sq.; xxxviii, 9). Presumably God's offering was made in addition to the annual temple-tax (see Temple), chiefly that share of the booty taken in war which belonged to the priests (Numb. xxii, 29 sq.), the yearly first-fruits (Numb. xv, 19 sq.; comp. 2 Sam. i, 21), and the tithes which the Levites were required to make over to the priests out of the natural tithes paid to them (Numb. xxiii, 21), and the Levites retained for their own use not being thus styled). The term הרווח seems to stand in a narrower sense in Neh. x, 37; xii, 44; xiii, 3 [see FIRSTLING], and the Talmudists so call only the agricultural first-fruits appropriate to human use, together with the Levitical tithes (see the tract Terumah in the Mishna, i, 6). Heave-offerings are coupled with first-fruits in Ezek. xx, 40, and with tithes in Mal. iii, 8. In Ezek. xlv, 1; xlviii, 8 sq., 12, 20 sq., the same word is applied to that portion of the Holy Land which is represented as set apart for the maintenance of the sanctuary and the priests. For the care of all such contributions, as well as for voluntary offerings and tithes in general, a special class of officers was (from the time of king Hezekiah) detailed, of whom a higher priest had the superintendence (2 Chron. xxii, 11, 12, 14; Neh. xii, 44; xiii, 5). Heave-offerings could be used or consumed only by the priests and their children (Neh. xxiii, 10). Later regulations are detailed in the Talmudic tract Terumah. Compare Wave-offering.

Heave-shoulder (יווח ים, Sept. βαρύχιον δομινικος) is the name applied to (the right) shoulder that fell to the priests in the presentation of animals as a thank-offering (Lev. vii, 34; Num. vi, 20; xviii, 18), which could be eaten only by such of their families as were in a ceremonially clean state (Lev. x, 1).—See OFFERING.

Hebard, Elias, a Methodist Episcopal minister. He was born at Cossackie, N.Y., Sept. 8, 1778; was converted at thirteen; entered the New York Conference in May, 1811; in 1819 was appointed to New Haven; in 1820 and 21 to New York; in 1834 was transferred to Genesee Conference, and stationed at Rochester; was presiding elder on Ontario District in 1837-40; in 1846 he superannuated; and died at Geneva, N.Y., Jan. 25, 1858. He was a diligent student, a sound theologian, and a good scholar in Greek and Hebrew.—Minutes of Conferences, vii, 205.

Heber, the name of seven men, with a difference of etymology in the original. See also EMMAN.

1. Ezechias, (Heb. יואש, in 2 Chron. xxxv, 22, or יואש, his signifier, i.e. of the river, q. d. immig. Sept. יאש and אסף, Vulg. Heber), son of Salath, who became the father of Peleg at the age of 54 years, and died at the age of 464 (Gen. x, 24; xi, 14; 1 Chron. i, 25). His name occurs in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii, 35, אסף, Heber); Heber is mentioned in Matt. i, 18-19. There is a degree of interest connected with him from the notion, which the Jews themselves entertain, that the name of Hebrews, applied to them, was derived from this alleged ancestor of Abraham. No historical ground appears why this name should be derived from him rather than from any other personage that occurred in the catalogue of Shem's descendants; but there are so many other suggestions to every other hypothesis, that this, perhaps, is still the most probable of any which have yet been started. (See Gesenius, Geschichte der Heb. Sprache und Schrift, p. 11.) Hence "the children of Eber" (יואש ויהו, Gen. x, 21), and simply in poetry Eber (Yiias, Numb. xxiv, 34; Sept. EQUIP, Vulg. Hebrew), i. e. Hebrews (Yiias). Several other persons of this (Heb.) name occur, but no other person is where Anglicized "Heber," or "Eber." 2. "Ener" (same Heb. word as above; Sept. Ιαπή, Vulg. Heber), the last-named of the seven chiefs of the Gadites in Bashan (1 Chron. v, 13, where the name is Anglicized "Heber"). B.C. between 1612 and 1698.

3. "Ene" (same Hebrew word as above; Sept. Ιαπή, Vulg. Heber), a chief of one of the tribes of Bashan, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 22, where the name is Anglicized "Heber"). B.C. ante 598.

4. "Heber" (Hebrew, יואר, community, as in Hosea vi, 9; Prov. xxi, 9; or a spell, as in Deut. xvii, xi; Isai. xix, 12; Sept. Ἠρβωτα, Ἠρωπα, son of Beriah, and grandson of Asher (Gen. xli, 17; 1 Chron. vii, 32). B.C. apparently ante 1873. His descendants are called Hebrehtes (Heb. חָבָרֵה, Sept. Ἠρωπα, Numb. xxvi, 45, where the name of the progenitor is written יואר)." Tweiss the offer was declined on account of his wife and child, but immediately after the second refusal he wrote (Jan. 12, 1823) stating his willingness to go to India. He congratulated himself upon the fact that no worldly motives led him to this decision. The prospects of usefulness in so grand a field as India overbore all pecuniary considerations, and they had no influence in determining the future path of his life. He would like to go to that country was first made to him. Besides, he had often expressed his liking for such a sphere of action, and he had “a lurking fondness for all which belongs to India or Asia.” On the 22d of April he saw Hodnet for the last time, and, after having heard the acceptance, he embarked for his diocese on the 16th of June, 1823. The diocese of Calcutta extended at this time over the whole of India, and embraced Ceylon, the Mauritius, and Australasia. In India the field of the bishop’s labors was three times larger than Great Britain and Ireland. The number of chaplains who constituted his staff at Bengal was fixed at twenty-eight, but this number was never completed, and of the number who were appointed several were on furlough. The bishop had no council to assist him, was required to act on his own responsibility, and to write almost every official document of the church on his own hand. On the 1st of June, 1823, bishop Heber began the visitation of his vast diocese. He visited every station of importance in the upper provinces of Bengal and north of Bombay, and after an absence from Calcutta of about eleven months, during which he had seldom slept out of his cabin or to his heart at Bombay. During which he kept during his visitation (published under the title Narrative of a Journey in Upper India, Lond. 1823, 3 vols. 8vo, since reprinted in Murray’s Home and Colonial Library) shows the extent of his observations on general subjects, and the rapidity with which he possessed of describing the novel scenes in which he was placed. From April to August he remained at Bombay to investigate and superintend the interests of the western portion of his diocese. On the 15th of August he sailed for Ceylon, and after remaining there two weeks he proceeded to Calcutta, which he reached on the 21st of October. If it had been possible to have educated his children in India, he was now prepared, he states, to end his days among the objects of his solicitude. In February, 1826, he left Calcutta for Madras to visit the southern provinces. On the 1st of April he arrived at Trincomalee, the capital of Ceylon, and on the 5th April, after investigating the state of the mission and confirming fifteen natives, on whom he bestowed the episcopal benediction in the Tamil language, he retired to use a cool bath, in which he found dead about half an hour after his arrival. He was less than thirty weeks he would have completed his forty-third year. The sudden, modest, and simplicity of bishop Heber’s manners, his unwaried earnestness, and his mild and steady zeal, combined with his talents and attainments, had inspired veneration and respect not only among the European, but the native population of India (English Cyclopaedia, s. v.). In theology he was an Armenian. His whole life, after his elevation to the episcopate, was devoted to its great duties. He had a profound faith in the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, and of their adaptation to the heathen. His heart daily breathed the most earnest wishes for the diffusion of its precious truths. His tastes and pursuits were all subordinated to that grand object, and, had he been spared to the usual term of life, there is no doubt that a career, begun in the spirit and prosecuted on the system of itineracy he had adopted, would have yielded a rich harvest of spiritual fruit to the Lord of his vineyard. Besides the works above mentioned, his Poetical Works are printed in various editions. Hebrew (Heb. Heb., płur. בָּנָיִם, וּבָנָיָם or בְּנוֹי). Exod. iii, 18; fem. בָּנָתָהּ, Hebrewess, płur. בָּנָיתָהּ. Greek Ἐβραῖος, a designation of the people of Israel, used first of their progenitor Abraham (Gen. xiv, 19; Sept. τῷ Ἰσραήλ: this name is never in Scripture applied to the Israelites except when the speaker is a foreigner (Gen. xxxix, 14, 17; xii, 12; Exod. i, 16; ii, 6; 1 Sam. iv, 6, 9), or when Israelites speak of themselves to one of another nation (Gen. xi, 15; Exod. i, 19; Jonah i, 5, etc.), or when they are contrasted with other peoples (Gen. xxxii, 32; Exod. i, 8, 6, 17; Deut. xvii, 12; 1 Sam. iii, 3, 7). See Gesenius, Thes. Hebr. s. v. (The only apparent exception is Jer. xxxiv, 9; but here there is probably such an implied contrast between the Jews and other peoples as would bring the usage under the last case.) By the Greek and Latin writers this is the name by which the descendants of Jacob are designated when they are not called Jews (Pausan. v. 5, 2; vi, 24, 6; Plut. Sympos. iv, 6; 1 Tacit. Hist. v, 1); and Josephus, who affects classical peculiarities, constantly uses it. In the N. T. we find the same contrast between Hebrews and foreigners (Acts vi, 1; Phil. iii, 5): the Hebrew language is distinguished from all others (Luke xxiii, 38; John v, 2; xix, 13; Acts xxii, 40; xxvi, 14; Rev. ix, 11); while in 2 Cor. xi, 22 the word is used as only second to Israelites in the expression of national peculiarities. On these facts two opposing hypotheses have been raised; the one that Israelite or Jew was the name by which the nation designated itself (just as the Welsh call themselves Cymry, though in speaking of themselves to a Saxons they would probably use the name Welsh); the other that "Hebrew" is a national name, merely indicative of the people as a people, while Israelite is a sacred or religious name appropriate to them as the chosen people of God. This latter opinion Gesenius dismisses as "without foundation" (Lexicon by Robinson, s. v.), but it has received the deliberate sanction of Ewald (Auszführ. Lehrb. der Heb. Spr., p. 18, 5th ed.).

Derivation of the Greek from Arama. Abraham, Hebrew, by euphony Hebræi (August, Ambrose). Displaying, as it does, the utmost ignorance of the language, this derivation was never extensively adopted, and was even rejected by Augustine (Retract. 16). The euphony alleged by Ambrose is quite imperceptible, and there is no parallel in the languages of the Semitic family.

II. According to the sacred writer, בָּנָיִם, Hebrew, is a derivative from בֶּן, Eber, the ancestor of Abraham; at least the same persons who are called Hebrews are called בָּנִים, sons of Eber (Gen. x, 21); and בֶּן, Eber (Num. xxiv, 24); and this is tantamount to a derivation of the name Hebrew from Eber. In support of this, it may be urged that בָּנִים is the proper form which a patronymic from בֶּן would assume; according to the analogy of בָּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, a Moabite, בָּנֵי דָם, a Damite, בָּנֵי כָּלָה, a Calebite, etc. (Hiller, Onomast. Sac. c. xiv, p. 231 sq.). What adds much force to this argument is the evident antithesis in Gen. xiv, 13, between בָּנִים and בָּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל; the former of these is as evidently a patronymic as the latter. This view is supported by Josephus, Suidas, Bochart, Vatablus, Drusius, Vossius, Buxtorf, Hottinger, Usuclid, Whiston, and Bauer. The odor of Questa (Gen. xvi, 13) is sufficiently strong to show that the Hebrews were not the only descendants of Eber, and, therefore, could not appropriate his name; and the objection has often been repeated. To meet it, recourse has been had to the suggestion, first adduced, we believe, by Ibn Ezra (Comment. ad Jon. 1, 9), that the descendants of Abraham retained the name Hebrew from Eber, because they alone of his descendants retained the faith which he held. This may be, but we are hardly entitled to assume it in order to account for the fact before us. It is better to throw the same probandi on the objector, and to demand of him, in our ignorance of what determined the use of such patronymics in one line of descent and not in another, what he should show. Why is it inconceivable that Abraham might have a good and sufficient reason for wishing to perpetuate the memory of his descent from Eber, which did not apply to the other descendants of that patriarch. Why might not one race of the descendants of Eber call themselves by pre-eminence of Eber just as one race of descendants of Abraham called themselves by pre-eminence sons of Abraham. But Eber, it is objected, is a name of no note in the history; we know nothing of him to entitle him to be selected as the person after whom a people should call themselves. But is our ignorance to be the measure of the knowledge of Abraham and his descendants on such a point? Because we know nothing to distinguish Eber, does it follow that they knew nothing? Certain it is that he was of sufficient importance to reflect a glory on his father Shem, whose highest designation was the son of Jehovah (Gen. x, 21); and certain it is that his name lingered for many generations in the region where he resided, for it was as "Eber" that the Mesopotamian prophet knew the descendants of Jacob, and spoke of them when they first made their appearance in warlike force on the borders of the land of Ham (Num. xxiv, 20).

On the other hand, it is contended that the passage Gen. x, 21 is not so much genealogical as ethnographical; and in this view it seems that the words are intended to contrast Shem with Ham and Japheth, and especially with the former. Now Isael is plainly fixed as the extreme east limit of the posterity of Ham (ver. 10), from whose land Nimrod went out into Assyria (ver. 11, margin of A. Vers.): in the next place, Egypt (ver. 13) is mentioned as the western limit of the same great race; and these two extremes having been ascertained, the geography succeeds (ver. 15-19) to fill up his ethnographic sketch with the intermediate tribes of the Canaanites. In short, in ver. 6-20 we have indications of three geographical points which distinguish the posterity of Ham, viz. Egypt, Palestine, and Babylon. At the last-mentioned city, at the river Euphrates, their posterity were not affected by the national movement of Asshur, terminated, and at the same point that of the descendants of Shem began. Accordingly, the sharpest contrast that could be devised is obtained by generally classing these latter nations as those beyond the river Euphrates; and the words "father of all the children of Eber," i.e. father of the nations to the east of the Euphrates, find an intelligible place in the context.

It must also be confessed that in the genealogical scheme in Gen. xi, 10-26, it does not appear that the Jews thought of Eber as a source primary, or even secondary, of the national descent. The genealogy neither starts from him, nor in its uniform sequence does it rest upon him with any emphasis. There is nothing to distinguish Eber above Arphaxad, Peleg, or Serug. Like them, he is but a link in the chain by which Shem is connected with Abraham. Indeed, the tendency of the Inerellsic retrospect is to stop at Jacob. It is with Jacob that the history as a nation begins; beyond Jacob they held their ancestry in common with the Edomites; beyond Isaac they were in danger of being confounded with the Ishmaelites. The predominant figure of the emphatically Hebrew Abraham might tempt them beyond the visible unity with the rest of posterity, disunited, so dishonorable, so anti-national; but it is almost inconceivable that they would voluntarily originate and perpetuate an appellation of themselves which landed them on a platform of ancestry where they met the whole population of Arabia (Gen. x, 25, 30).

III. Hence others (as Jerome, Theodoret, Origen, Chrysost., Arian Montan., J. Bechai, Paul Burg, Munster, Grotius, Scaliger, Selden, Rosenm., Gesenius, and Eiehhorn) prefer tracing קָנָבָה to the verb קָנֵב, to pass over, or the noun קָנָב, the region or country beyond. By those who favor the former etymology, "Hebrew" is regarded as equivalent to "the man who passed over;" by those who favor the latter, it is taken to mean "the man from the region beyond;" and under both suppositions it is held to be applied by the Canaanites to Abraham as having crossed the Euphrates, or coming from the region beyond the Euphrates to Canaan. Of these etymologies the former is now generally abandoned; it is felt that the supposition that the crossing of the Euphrates was such an unparalleled achievement as to fix on him who accomplished it a name that should descend to his posterity and become a permanent appellation, is somewhat too violent to be maintained; and, besides, as the verb קָנֵב signifies to pass from this side to that, not from this side to this, it would not be the term applied by the Canaanites to designate the act of one who had come from the other side of the Euphrates to them. The other etymology has more in its favor. It is supported by the Greek transliteration (Sept. τὸ παραβρέσιον, Αραβοράβαν) it is in accordance with the usage of the phrase קָנָב יִשְׂרָאֵל, which was employed to designate the region beyond the Euphrates (Josh. xxiv, 2, 3; 2 Sam. x, 16; 1 Chron. xix, 16); and it is not improbable that Abraham, coming among the Canaanites from beyond the Euphrates, might be designated by them "the man from the region beyond," just as to Hebrews might well call an American "transatlantic." But, though Bleek very confidently pronounces this view "without doubt the right one" (Einleitung in A. T. p. 73), it is open to serious, if not fatal objections.

1. There is no instance of קָנָב by itself denoting the region beyond the Euphrates, or any other river; the phrase invariably used is קָנָב יִשְׂרָאֵל. Rosenmüller, following Hyde (Hist. Relig. Vet. Pers. p. 51), seeks to supply this desiderated instance by taking קָנָב as epe-ceptual of יִשְׂרָאֵל in Num. xxiv, 24 = the affluent As-syrian et totem transfusivem regionem. But the learned writer has in his zeal overlooked the second קָנָב, which might include his exposition avoids this error by simply taking קָנָב = Mesopotamia; but in this case it is the proper name קָנָב, Eber, and not the preposition קָנֵב, trans, which is in question. 2. If קָנָב was the proper designation of those who lived on the other side of the Euphrates, we should find that name applied to such as continued to dwell there, not to a race descended from one who had left that region never to return. 3. Though Abraham, as having been originally a transfluvian, might be so called by the Canaanites, it is improbable that they should have extended this name to his posterity, to whom it in no sense applied. No one would think of continuing the term "transatlantic" to persons born in Britain on the ground that a remote ancestor had come from across the Atlantic to settle in that country! As to the second, this etymology is confirmed by the Sept., no great weight can be attached to that when we remember how often these etymologies have erred in this way; and also that they have given βεσανως as the rendering of קָנָב in Num. xxiv, 24; "Plus vice simplici hallucinati sunt interpretes Greci eorum ut nos;" simum cadendum num non sit autoritate" (Carpozov, Crit., 21. 178, 179; V. T. p. 171). We may add that the authority of the Sept. and Aquila on such a point is mixed with a bad grace by those who wish to treat contempt the etymologies of the Hebrew text as resting on mere Jewish tradition; if a Jewish tradition of the time of Moses is subject to suspicion, it is for the one of the Polybius Læg and of Alexandrian origin. The vocalization of קָנָב pronunciation "quite uncertain." 4. This
HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS

In the Edeite this language is nowhere designated by the name Hebrew, but this is not surprising when we consider how rarely that name is employed to designate the nation. See Hebrew. If we except the terms "lip of Canaan" (יָדָ֣ה לֵ֑אָנָא) in Isa. xix, 18—where the diction is of an elevated character, and is so far no evidence that this designation was the one commonly employed—the only name by which the Hebrew language is mentioned in the Old Testament is "Jewish" (יִשְׂרָאֵל), used adverbially, Judaism, in Jewish, 2 Kings xviii, 29; Isa. xxvii, 11, 19; 2 Chron. xxxix, 18 (in Neh. xiii, 24, perhaps the Aramaic is meant), where the feminine may be explained as an abstract of the last formation, according to Ewald's Hebr. Gram., § 844, 457, or as referring to the us and gender of יִשְׂרָאֵל understood. In a strict sense, however, "Jewish" denotes the idiom of the kingdom of Judah, which became the predominant one after the through a course of Greek, Latin, French, and in the Greco-writings of the later Jews that "Hebrew" is first applied to the language, as in the β'ασιαρί of the prologue to Ecclesiasticus, and in the γνωσα των Ἑβραϊων of Josephus. (The β'ασιαρί διάλεκτος of the New Testament is used in contradistinction to the idiom of the Hellenist Jews, and does not mean the Jews, and does not mean the Jews, but the the vernacular Aramaic dialect of Palestine.) The title of all Hebrew language was therefore founded on the fact that the nation which spoke this idiom was properly distinguished by the ethnographical name Hebrews.

The Hebrew language belongs to the class of languages called Semitic—so called because spoken chiefly by nations enumerated in Scripture among the descendents of Shem. The Sanscrit, Persian, Greek, Latin, with the Germanic and Celtic languages, are the principal members of another large class of languages, to which we have already alluded the various names of Japhetic, Indo-European, Indo-Germanic, and Aramaic. This latter class embraces most of the languages of Europe, including course of our own. The student, therefore, who, besides mastering his own language, has passed through a course of Greek, Latin, French, and is an Englishman (and few of our students, except with a professional view, extend their linguistic studies further), has not, after all his labors, got beyond the limits of the same class of languages to which his mother tongue belongs, and of which it forms one of the most important members. But when he come to the study of the Hebrew language he enters a new field, he observes new phenomena, he traces the operation of new laws.

1. Characteristics of the Semitic Languages, and in particular of the Hebrew. 1. With respect to sounds, the chief peculiarities are the following:

(1.) The predominance of guttural sounds. The Hebrew language has four or (we may say) five guttural sounds, descending in the order of strength and position from laryngeal to throat-breathing represented by the first letter of the alphabet (א) through the decided aspirate ר, to the strong מ and gurgling ג. To these we must add ג, which partakes largely of the guttural character. Nor were these sounds sparingly employed; on the contrary, they were in more frequent use than any other class of letters. In the Hebrew dictionary the four gutturals Acts ii, 13 occupy considerably more space than the fifteen more common letters, or at least in the whole volume, the remaining eighteen letters occupying considerably less than three fourths. This predominance of guttural sounds must have given a very marked character to the ancient Hebrew, as it does still to the modern Arabic.

(2.) The use of the very strong letters ג, פ, which may be represented by ג or פ, in pronouncing which the organ is more compressed and the sound given forth with greater vehemence. These letters, especially the last two, are also in frequent use. When the Greeks borrowed their alphabet from the Phoenicians, they softened or dropped these strong let-
The Semitic languages do not admit, like the Indo-European, of an accumulation or grouping of consonants around a single vowel sound. In such words as craft, crush, grind, strong, stretch, we find four, five, and six consonants clustering around a single vowel. The Semitic alphabet, on the other hand, usually interposes a vowel sound more or less distinct after each consonant. It is only at the end of a word that two consonants may stand together without any intermediate vowel sound; and even in that case various expedients are employed to dispense with a combination which is evidently not in accordance with the genius of the language.

The vowels, although thus copiously introduced, are nevertheless kept in strict subordination to the consonants; so much so that it is only in rare and exceptional cases that any word or syllable begins with a vowel. In Hebrew we have no such syllables as ab, ag, ad, in which the initial sound is a pure vowel; but only ba, ga, da. If Sir H. Rawlinson is correct, it would appear that the Assyrian language differed from the other Semitic languages in this particular. In his syllabic alphabet a considerable number of the syllables begin with a vowel.

If we endeavor to calculate the effect of the foregoing peculiarities on the character of the language, we cannot avoid the conclusion that the Semitic languages are of a more primitive type than the European; much less refined and developed, connected with a natural utterance of a mind vehement and passionate, impulsive rather than calmly deliberate.

2. With respect to roots and words, the Semitic languages are distinguished in a very marked manner:

(a) The consonants of the main root. This is one of the most striking characteristics of these languages, as it does not appear that there is any language not belonging to this class in the formation of whose roots the same law has been at work. It is very difficult to ascertain the origin of this singular phenomenon. It may possibly be regarded as a kind of equivalent for the compound roots of other languages (which are altogether wanting in the Semitic); an original two-letter root being enlarged and expanded into a greater or less number of three-letter roots, for the purpose of giving expression to the various modifications and shades of the primitive root idea. The formation of these roots is not a mere addition of an added root, the Semitic indicates by a sign, by simply laying additional stress on one of the root letters. And thus again the observation made under the heading sound recurs, viz., that in the formation of the Semitic languages the dominant influence was that of instinctive feeling, passion, imagination—of the nature of activity, while the e and o sounds are the symbols of rest and passiveness. In the Arabic verb this characteristic is very marked, many of the roots appearing under three forms, each having a different vowel, and the significance being modified in accordance with the nature of the vowel. The same law appears in the formation of the passives. Thus kutala—pass. kutela.

(b) Doubling of consonants, usually of the middle letter of the root. By means of this most simple and natural device, the Semitic languages express intensity or repetition of action, and also such qualities as repeated action, as righteous, merciful, etc. By comparing this usage with the expression of the corresponding ideas in our own language, we observe at once the difference in the genius of the two languages. We say merciful, sinful, i.e. fully of mercy, full of sin. Not so the Semitic, for we express them more formally by adding to the root an added root, the Semitic indicates by a sign, by simply laying additional stress on one of the root letters. And thus again the observation made under the heading sound recurs, viz., that in the formation of the Semitic languages the dominant influence was that of instinctive feeling, passion, imagination—the hand of nature appearing everywhere, the voice of nature heard in every utterance: in this, how widely separated from the artificial and highly organized languages of the Indo-European family (Adelung, Mährheiten, 1, 361).

(4) The influence of the imagination on the structure of the Semitic languages.

(a) The further growth and expansion of the three-letter root itself into a variety of what are called conjunctive forms, expressing intensity, reflectiveness, causation, etc. A similar formation may be traced in all languages; in some non-Semitic languages, as the Turkish, it is very largely and regularly developed (Max Müller, Lectures on Science of Language, p. 318, etc.). In English we have examples in such verbs as set and set, lie and lay, set being the causative of sit, lay of lie, or we may say sit is the reflexive of set, and lie of lay. So in Latin sedo and sedes, jacio and jacet, etc., in which latter root the conjunctive formation is still farther developed into jacto and jactio. But what in these languages is fragmentary and occasional, in Hebrew and the cognate languages is carried out and expanded into a regular process, and regularity occupies a large space in the Semitic grammar. The conjunctives are of three sorts: (a) Those expressing intensity, repetition, etc., which are usually distinguished by some change within the root; (b) those expressing reference, causation, etc., which are usually distinguished by not returning to the root, the present being distinguished by the presence of the u or o sound in the first syllable.

(3) A prominent distinction of the Semitic languages is the extent to which modifications of the root idea are indicated, not by additions to the root, but by changes within the root. "The Semitic roots," says Bopp (Comparative Grammar of the Indo-European Tongues, i, 90), "on account of their construction, possess the most surprising capacity for indicating the secondary ideas of grammar by the mere internal moulding of the root, while the Sanscrit roots at the first grammatical movement are compelled to assume external additions." These internal changes are principally of two sorts:

(a) Vowel changes. Nothing is more remarkable in the Semitic languages than the significance of their vowel sounds; the sharp a sound, formed by opening the mouth to its widest capacity, is associated with the idea of a great flow of activity, while the e and o sounds are the symbols of rest and passiveness. In the Arabic verb this characteristic is very marked, many of the roots appearing under three forms, each having a different vowel, and the significance being modified in accordance with the nature of the vowel. The same law appears in the formation of the passives. Thus kutala—pass. kutela.
HEBREW LANGUAGE

HEBREW LANGUAGE

The Hebrew language is a complex and ancient language, with a rich history and a unique structure. In the Old Testament, the Hebrew language is often described as being 'divine' or 'sacred', reflecting its importance in the religious and cultural life of the Israelites. The Hebrew language has influenced many other languages, and its principles of grammar and syntax have been studied by linguists and scholars for centuries.

3. In the syntax and general structure of the Semitic languages and related languages, we observe the same principles, the same tendencies of mind which manifest themselves in the structure of words. In this respect the Hebrew language exhibits a more simple and primitive type than any of the sister tongues. The simplicity of the Hebrew composition is very obvious, even to the reader of the English Bible, or to the scholar who compares the Greek Testament, the style of which is formed on the model of the Old Testament, with the classical Greek writers. We observe at once that there is no such thing as the building up of a lengthened period, consisting of several propositions only superadded and connected as they stand. The Hebrew composition consists rather of a succession of co-ordinate propositions, each of which is for the moment uppermost in the view of the speaker or writer, until it is superseded by that which follows. This results at once from the character of the Semitic mind, which was more remarkable for rapid movements and vivid glances than for large and comprehensive grasp. Such a mind would give forth its thoughts in a rapid succession of independent utterances rather than in sustained and elaborated sentences.

The Hebrew language is also extremely pictorial in its character—not the poetry only, but also the prose. In the history the past is not described, it is painted. It is not the ear that hears, it is rather the eye that observes. The course of events is made to pass before the eye; the transactions are all acted over again. The past is not a fixed landscape, but a moving panorama. The reader of the English Bible must have remarked the constant use of the word behold, which indicates that the writer is himself, and wishes to make his reader feel also, a spectator, and to participate in the events. The use of the tenses in the Hebrew historical writings is especially remarkable. To the young student of Hebrew the constant use of the future tense in the description of the past appears perhaps the most striking feaculiarity of the language. But the singular phenomenon admits of an easy explanation. It was because the Hebrew viewed and described the transactions of the past, not as all past and done, but as in actual process and progress of evolution, that he makes such frequent use of the so-called future. In imagination he quite often goes beyond the time, and anticipates the future. With his reader he sails down the stream of time, and traces with open eye the winding course of history. It is impossible always to reproduce exactly in English this peculiarity of the Hebrew Bible.

Further, in writing even of the commonest actions, as that one went, spoke, saw, etc., the Hebrew is not unthinking as to the simple fact that the thing was done, he must describe also the process of doing. We are so familiar with the style of our English Bibles that we do not at once perceive the pictorial character of such expressions as these, recurring in every page: he arose and went; he opened his lips and spoke; he put forth his hand and took; he lifted up his eyes and saw; he lifted up his voice and wept. But what we do not consciously perceive we often unconsciously feel; and doubtless it is this painting of events which is the source of part at least of the charm with which the Scripture narrative is invested to all pure and simple minds.

The same effect is also produced by the symbolical way of representing mental states and processes which distinguishes the Hebrew writers. Such expressions as to bend or incline the ear for to hear attentively, to set on the neck for to be stubborn and rebellious, to uncover the ear for to reveal, are in frequent use. Even the acts of the Divine Mind are depicted in a similar way. In the study especially of the Old Testament we must keep this point carefully in view, lest we should err by giving a symbolical expression a literal interpretation. Thus, when we read in xxxiii. 19 that the Lord spake unto Moses face to face as a man speaketh unto his friend, we must remember that it was a Hebrew who wrote these words, one who was accustomed to depict to himself and others the spiritual under material symbols, and thus we shall be guarded against irreverently attaching to them a meaning which they were never intended to bear. But, though such modes of expression are open to misapprehension by us, whose minds are formed in so very different a mould, nevertheless, when rightly understood, they have the effect of giving us a more clear and vivid impression of the ideas which they embody than could be conveyed to us by any other mode of representation or expression.

The simplicity and naturalness of the language further appears in the prominence which is constantly given to the word or words embodying the leading idea in a sentence or period. Thus the noun stands before the adjective, the predicate stands before the subject, unless the latter be specially emphatic, in which case it is not only put first, but may stand by itself as a nominative absolute without any syntactical connection with the rest of the sentence.

The constant use of the oratio directa is also to be specially noted, as an indication of the primitive character of the language. The Hebrew historian does not usually inform us that such and such a person said such and such things; he actually, as it were, produces the parties and makes them speak for themselves. To this device (if it may be so called) the Bible history owes much of its freshness and power of exciting and sustaining the interest of its readers. No other history could be so often read without losing its power to interest and charm.

Lastly, in a primitive language, formed under the predominating influence of imagination and emotion, we may expect to meet with many elliptical expressions, and also with many redundancies. Not a little which we think it necessary formally to express in words, the Hebrew allowed to be gathered from the context; and, conversely, the Hebrew gave expression to not a little which we omit. For example, nothing is more common in Hebrew than the omission of the verb to be in its various forms; and, on the other hand, a very striking characteristic of the Hebrew style is the constant use of the forms יִהְיֶה yihye, יֵהָיָה yehaya, and it came to pass— and it shall come to pass, which, in translating into English, may be altogether omitted without any serious loss. In the Hebrew prose, also, we often meet with traces of that echoing of thought and expression which forms one of the principal characteristics of the poetic style; as in Gen. vi. 22, "And Noah did according to all that God commanded him—so did he;" and similar passages, in which the verb is repeated twice, recording the same fact combined into one, thus: "And Noah did according to all that God commanded him;" "According to all that the Lord commanded him, so did he."

II. History of the Hebrew Language. I. Its Origin. — The extant historical notices on this point carry us back to the age of Abraham, but no further. The best evidence as to the formation of the Hebrew language prior to its first historical period tend to show that Abraham, on his entrance into Canaan, found the language then prevailing among almost all the different tribes inhabiting that country to be in at least dialectical affinity with his own. This is gathered from the following facts: it is manifestly nearly all the names of the persons relating to those tribes admit of Hebrew etymologies; that, amid all the accounts of the intercourse of the Hebrews with the nations of Canaan, we find no hint of a diversity of idiom; and that even the comparatively recent remains of the Phoenician and Punic languages retain the same affinity to the Hebrew.

But whether the Hebrew language, as seen in the earliest books of the Old Testament, is the very dialect which Abraham brought with him into Canaan, or whether it was the common tongue of the Canaanites, nations which Abraham only adopted from, and which was afterwards developed to greater fulness under the peculiar moral and political influences to which its posterity were exposed, are questions which, in the absence of conclusive arguments, are generally discussed with some dogmatical presuppositions. Almost all those who support the former view also that Hebrew was the primitive language of mankind. S. Morinus (Ling. Primerae, i. 399) and Lischner (De Canitis Lingeb.) are among the best champions of this opinion; but Hänsernic has more recently advocated it with such modifications as make it more acceptable (Einleitung, in den Alten Text, 1, 1, 148 sq.). The question is founded on two points: first, Hebrew is the name of the most important proper names in the first part of Genesis (as Cain, Seth, and others) are evidently founded on Hebrew etymologies, the essential connection of these names with their etymological origins involves the historical credibility of the records themselves, and leaves no room for any other conclusion than that the Hebrew language is coeval with the earliest history of man. The evidence on the other side is scanty, but not without weight. (1.) In Dcut. xxvi, 5, Abraham is called a Syriac or Aramean (אֲבָרָהָם), from which we naturally conclude that Syriac was his mother tongue, especially when we find, (2.) from Gen. xxxii, 47, that Syriac or Chaldee was the language spoken by Laban, the grandson of Nahor, Abraham's brother. Moreover, it has been remarked (3.) that in Isa. xix, 18, the Hebrew is actually called the language of Canaan; and (4.) that the language itself furnishes internal evidence of its Palestinian origin in the word וַאֲנָה, which means also the west, and has this meaning in the very earliest documents. (5.) Finally, Jewish tradition, whatever we may attach to it, is in accordance with the same conclusion (Genesich, Geschicht, sect. vi, 71.)

If we inquire further how it was that the Canaanites, of the race of Ham, spoke a language so closely allied to the languages spoken by the principal members of the Semitic family of nations, we shall soon discover that the solution of this difficulty is impossible with our present means of information; it lies beyond the historic period. It may be that long before the migration of Abraham a Semitic race occupied Palestine; and that, as Abraham adopted the language of the Canaanites, the so-called Canaanite language, the present scholars have adopted the language of that earlier race whom they gradually dispossessed, and eventually exterminated or absorbed. However this may be, leaving speculation for fact, it is not possible to discover a wise purpose in the selection of the language of the Hebrews. The great consciousness of antiquity—as the language in which was to be embodied the most wonderful revelation of himself and of his law which God made to the ancient world? When we remember the constant intercourse which was maintained by the Phoenicians with the most distant regions both of the East and of the West, it is impossible to doubt that the sacred books of the Hebrews, written in a language almost identical with the Phoenician, must have exercised a more important influence on the Gentile world than is usually acknowledged.

The Canaanitish language, when adopted by the Hebrews, did not remain unchanged. Having become the instrument of the Hebrew mind, and being employed in the expression of new and very peculiar ideas, it must have been modified considerably thereby. How far that modification may possibly have occurred, is beyond the power of the present scholar to determine. Still it is evident that the more ancient monuments of the Phoenician nation, which may still have survived the entombment of centuries.

2. Influence modifying the Form of the Hebrew Language, and the Style of the Hebrew Writings—(a) Time. The history of the Hebrew language, as far as we yet know its course by the changes in the dictionary of the books in which it is preserved, may here be conveniently divided into that of the period preceding and that of the period succeeding the Exile. If it be true, which is a matter of surprise, that the thousand years which intervened between Moses and the Captivity should not have produced sufficient change in the language to warrant its history during that time being distributed into sub-divisions, the following considerations may excuse this arrangement. It is one of the signal characteristics of the Hebrew character that the whole of the books prior to the Exile, that, notwithstanding the existence of some isolated but important archaisms, such as in the form of the pronoun, etc. (the best collection of which may be seen in Havemann, c. 2, p. 183 sq.), it preserves an unparalleled general uniformity of structure. The extent to which this uniformity prevails, this may be estimated either by the fact that it has furnished many modern scholars, who reason from the analogies discovered in the changes in other languages in a given period, with an argument to show that the Pentateuch could not have been written at so remote a date as is generally believed (Gessner, Gesch. der Heb. Sprache, § 8), or by the conclusion, ä fortiori, which Havemann, whose express object is to vindicate its revered antiquity, candidly concedes, that "the books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah are the earliest in which the language differs sensibly from that in the historical portions of the Pentateuch" (Einl. I, 180). Even those critics who endeavor to bring down the Pentateuch as a whole to a comparatively late date allow that a portion at least of its contents is to be assigned to the age of Moses (Ewald, Lehrbuch, sec. 5, c); and indeed it can be shown that this most ancient portion bears in its language and style the stamp of high antiquity, and is distinguished in a very marked manner from the other portions of the Pentateuch (which has not been shown), the phenomenon still remains unexplained. But, indeed, the phenomenon is by no means unexampled. It does not stand alone. It is said, for example, that the Chinese language displays the same tenacity and aversion to change still more decidedly, the books of the great teacher Confucius being written in language not essentially different from that of his commentators fifteen hundred years later. So we are informed by a writer of the 16th century that the Greeks, at least the more cultivated class, even in his day spoke the language of Homer. It may be that the same and similar conditions have been influenced in the ancient standard of elegance and purity (Gibbon, viii, 106). Or, to take another example more closely related to the Hebrew, it is well known that the written Arabic of the present day does not differ greatly from that of the ancients after the Muhammad. In each of the cases just mentioned, it is probable that the language was as it was stereotyped by becoming the language of books held in highest esteem and reverence, diligently studied by the learned, frequently committed to memory, and adopted as a model of style by succeeding writers. Now, may not the sacred writings of the Mosaic age have had a similar influence on the written Hebrew of the following ages, which continued undisturbed till the Captivity, or even later? We know how greatly the translations of the Bible into English and German have affected the language and literature of England and Germany, since many other countries all over the world. But among a people like the ancient Hebrews, living to a certain extent apart from other nations, with a literature of no great extent, and a learned class specially engaged in the study and transcription of the sacred writings, we may well suppose that the influence of these circumstances on the Hebrew original language must have been much more decided and permanent. The learned men would naturally adopt in their compositions the language of the books which had been their study from youth, and large portions of which they were probably able to repeat from memory. Thus the language of these compositions would differ in some respects from that spoken by the common people, would naturally become the language of the learned and of books, especially of those books on sacred subjects, such as have alone come down to us from ancient Israel. In explanation of the fact under discussion, appeal has also been made (a) to the permanence of Eastern customs, and (b) to the simple structure of the Hebrew language, which rendered it less liable to change than other more largely developed languages (see Ewald, Heb. Gram., § 7). It has also been remarked that some of the archaisms, which may be concealed from view by the uniformity of the system of punctuation adopted and applied to the Scriptures by the Hebrew grammarians.

In the canonical books belonging to the first period the Hebrew language thus appears in a state of mature development. Although it still preserves the charm of freshness and simplicity, yet it has attained great regularity of formation, and such a precision of syntactical arrangement as insures both energy and distinctness. Some common notions of its laxity and indeliteness have no other foundation than the very inadequate scholarship of the persons who form the middle-class, to which the language is to be assigned. When the details in the language which is spoken in the historical portions of the Pentateuch (which has not been shown), the phenomenon still remains unexplained. But, indeed, the phenomenon is by no means unexampled. It does not stand alone. It is said, for example, that the Chinese language displays the same.

The Babylonian Captivity is assigned as the com-

cementation of that decline and corruption which mark the second period in the history of the Hebrew language; but the Assyrian deportation of the ten tribes, in the year B.C. 720, was probably the first means of bringing the Aramaic idiom into injurious proximity with it. Henceforward, however, for a time, during which the language shows evident signs of encroachment of the Aramaic on its integrity, which afterwards ended in its complete extinction. The dicton of the different books of this period disclosures various grades of this Aramaic influence, and in some cases approaches so nearly to the type of the first period that it has been ascribed to mere imitation.

The writings which belong to the second age—that subsequent to the Babylonian Captivity—accordingly differ very considerably from those which belonged to the first; the influence of the Chaldee language, acquired by the Jewish exiles in the land of their captivity, having gradually corrupted the national tongue. The historical books belonging to this age are the books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. In the prophetic books which preceded during and after the Captivity, with the exception of Daniel, the Chaldee influence is by no means marked; and we may fairly assume that they having evidently formed their style on that of the older prophets. It is important, however, to observe that the presence of what appears to be a Chaldaic is not always the indication of a later age. Chaldee words and forms occur at all ages in even the most ancient Hebrew compositions, especially the poetical, the poet delighting in archaic and rare words, and substituting these for the more usual and commonplace. But between the Chaldaic archaisms and the Chaldeism of the later Scriptures there is marked distinction, that the former are only occasional, and lie scattered on the surface; the latter are frequent, and give a peculiar color and character to the whole language.

A still more corrupt form of the language appears in the Mishna and other later Jewish writings, in which the foreign element is much more decided and prominent.

(2.) Place.—Under this head is embraced the question as to the existence of different dialects of the ancient Hebrew. Was the Hebrew language, as spoken by the several tribes of Israel, of uniform mould and character? or did it branch out into various dialects corresponding to the reading divisions of the nation? In attempting to answer this question, there is no direct historical testimony of which we can avail ourselves. From Neh. xiii, 23, 24, we learn nothing more than that the language of Ashdod differed from that of the Jews after their return from captivity, which is only what we might have anticipated. The notices in Judges, xii, 6 and xviii, 3, which are more to the purpose, refer rather to a difference in pronunciation than in the form of the language. Notwithstanding it seems prima facie probable (a) that the language of the trans-Jordanitic tribes was in course of time modified to a greater or less extent by the close contact of these tribes with the Syr-rians of the north and the Arab tribes of the great eastern desert; and (b) that a similar dialectic difference would gradually be developed in the language of Ephraim and the other northern tribes to the west of the Jordan, especially after the political separation of these tribes from the tribe of Judah and the family of David. Possibly in the Jewish language of 2 Kings xxvii, 28 we may discover the trace of some such difference of dialect; for we can scarcely suppose the name Pious was to have been introduced in the very brief period which interceded between the taking of Samaria and the trans- action in the record of which it occurs; and, if in the language of the ten tribes, it must have been restricted to the form of the Hebrew language prevailing in Judæa, which, being thus distinguished from some of the language of the northern tribes, was probably distinguished in other respects also. It is not improbable that some of the linguistic peculiarities of the separate books of Scripture are to be accounted for on this hypothesis.

3. When the Hebrew Language ceased to be a living Language.—The Jewish tradition, credited by Kimchi, is to the effect that the Hebrew language ceased to be spoken by the body of the people during their captivity in Babylon and Persia; but the opinion is not held by all scholars also, among whom are Buxtorf and Walton. Others, as Pfeiffer and Lösch, argue that it is quite unreasonable, considering the duration and other circumstances of the Exile, to suppose that the Jews did not retain the partial use of their native tongue for some time after their return to Palestine, and may have even retained it at a low degree at least. There can be no doubt that the Hebrew was never spoken in its purity after the return from captivity; but that it ceased altogether to be the language of the people after that period, and was retained only as the language of the learned, and has not been established. The principal evidence relied on by those who hold this opinion is derived from Neh. viii, 8: "So they read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading." Distinctly, כֹּלְכָּהָה, i.e. says Hengstenberg, "with the addition of a translation" (Griovinass of Daniel, cii, sec. 5). But, though this gloss is marked in the Jewish translation, it is a variance both with Hebrew and with Chaldee usage. כֶּדְכָּה means made clear or distinct, as is evident from Numb. xv, 34 (the meaning of כֶּדְכָּה, in Ezra iv, 18, is disputed); and כֶדְכָּה נַפְּלֵית can scarcely be otherwise rendered than "they read distinctly" (see the Lexicons of Cocceius, Gesenius, and First; Buxtorf and Gesenius render by explain, explicate). This, indeed, is evident from the context, for if we should render with Hengstenberg, "They read it with the addition of a translation," to what purpose the clause which follows, "and gave the sense," etc.? At the same time, though this passage does not furnish sufficient evidence to prove that in the time of Nehemiah Hebrew had ceased to be the language of every-day life, it does seem to point to the conclusion that at that time it had considerably degenerated from its ancient purity, so that the common people had some difficulty in understanding the language of their ancient sacred books. Still we believe that the Hebrew element predominated, and, instead of a Greek lexicon () and a Latin lexicon (24), the language of the Jews on their return from exile as "Chal- dea with a certain admixture of Hebrew," we should rather describe it as Hebrew with a large admixture of Chaldee. Only on this hypothesis does it appear possible satisfactorily to account for the fact that Hebrew continued even after this period to be the language of the prophets and preachers, historians and poets, while there is no trace of any similar use of the Chaldee among the Jews of Palestine (compare also Neh. xiii, 24).

At what time Chaldee became the dominant element in the national language it is impossible to determine. All political influences favored its ascendency, and with these coincided the influence of that large portion of the nation still resident in the East, and maintaining constant intercourse with a Chaldee-speaking population. To these influences we cannot wonder that the Hebrew has been losing the ascendancy which it possessed, with the Jews of Babylonia. The coins of the Maccabees, indeed, the ancient language still appears; but we cannot conclude from this circumstance that it maintained its position as a living language down to the Maccabean period (Rénan, Langages Séri-ques, p. 83, 84). We may, however, regard one of the popular language which we find in the New Testament are all Aramaic, and even since the Hebrew has been preserved and cultivated as the language of the learned and of books, and of not common life. On the history of the post-Biblical Hebrew we do not now enter.

III. Of the Written Hebrew.—The Semitic nations have been the teachers of the world in religion; by the Mention of the alphabet they may likewise lay claim to the honor of having laid the foundation of the world's literature. The Schemitic alphabet, as is well known, has no signs for the pure vowel sounds. All the letters are consonants; some, however, are so weak as easily to pass into vowels, and these letters we accordingly find in manuscripts of Babylonia and Syria marked with a dot above, or a short horizontal stroke of ι, and other calligraphical minutiae.

The characters in use before the Babylonian exile have been preserved by the Samaritans even to the present day without material change (Gesenius, Monum. Phen. sect. ii, 1; comp. on this subject also Kopf, Bilder und Schriften, ii, sect. 60-101; Zwald, Lehrbuch, sect. lxvi; Geschichtliche Geschichte der Hebräischen Sprache u. Schrift, sect. 41-43).

2. As to the origin and authority of the punctuation, the controversy which raged so fiercely in the 17th century may be said now to have ceased; and the views of Ludovicus Cappellus, from the adoption of which the Buxtorfs anticipated the most dangerous consequences, now meet with almost universal acquiescence. The two following conclusions may now be regarded as established: (1.) That the present punctuation did not form an original part of the inspired record, but was introduced by the Jewish doctors into the sacred Scriptures after the canon had been closed, for the purpose of preserving, as far as possible, the true pronunciation of the language; and (2.) That the present pointed text, notwithstanding its comparative recency, presents us with the closest possible approximation to the language which the sacred writers actually used. Jewish doctors of a later age, of course, would be able to arrive at a correct knowledge of the language by the use of theSeptuagint and the Talmud. Keeping these conclusions in view in interpreting the ancient Scriptures, we see neither, on the one hand, to neglect the traditional text, nor, on the other hand, servilely to adhere to it when a change of the points would give a better sense to any passage.

The origin of the vowel-points is to be ascribed to the effort which the Jewish learned men made to preserve the pronunciation of their sacred language at a time when its extinction as a living tongue endangered the loss of the traditional memory of its sound. Every kind of evidence renders it probable that these signs for the pronunciation were first introduced about the 7th century of the Chaldee era, from a desire to fix the pronunciation of the Talmud, and that the minute and complex system which we possess was gradually developed from a few indispensable signs to its present elaborateness. The existence of the present complete system can, however, be traced back to the 11th century. The skilful investigation of Hupfeld (in the Studien und Kritiken for 1830, p. 549 sq.) has proved that the vowel-points were unknown to Jerome and the Talmud; but, as far as regards the former, we are able to make a high estimate of the degree to which the traditional pronunciation, prior to the use of the points, accorded with our Masoretic signs; for Jerome describes a pronunciation which agrees wonderfully well with our own vocalization. We are thus called on to avail ourselves thankfully fully of the Masoretic punctuation, on the double ground that it represents the Jewish traditional pronunciation, and that the Hebrew language, unless read according to its laws, does not enter into its full dialectal harmony with its Syro-Arabian sisters. See Massorah.

Although it may be superfluous to enforce the general advantages, not to say indispensable necessity, of a sound scholarly study of the Hebrew language to the systematic student, yet it is also allowed to suggest some of those particular reasons, incident to the present time, which urgently demand an increased attention to this study. First, the English-speaking race have an ancient honorable name to retain. Selden, Castell, Lightfoot, Pocock, Walton, Spencer, and Hyde, were once contemporary ornaments of its literature. We daily see their names mentioned with deference in the writings of German scholars; but we are forcibly struck with the fact that, since that period, Great Britain has hardly, with the exception of Lowth and Kennicot, produced a single Hebrew scholar who has signally advanced Biblical philology; while America, although possessing some well-qualified teachers, has produced but little that is original in this direction. Secondly, the bold inquiries of the German theologians will force themselves on our notice. It is impossible for us to ignore so much evidence, for the grounds on which they have not yet been brought to bear, with such force, on the most important Biblical queries. The grounds which they deal in the ancient traditions cannot be healed by reference to commentators whose generation knew nothing of our doubts and difficulties. The cure must be sympathetic; it must be effected by the same weapon that caused the wound. If the monstrous disproportion which books relating to antiquity and criticism bear, in almost every theological bookseller's catalogue, over those relating to Biblical philology, be an evidence of the degree to which these studies have fallen into neglect, and if the few books in which an acquaintance with Hebrew is necessary, which do appear, are a fair proof of our present small stock of Germans with Hebrew weapons, then there is indeed an urgent necessity that theological students should prepare for the increased demands of the future.

III. History of Hebrew Learning.—It is not till the closing part of the 9th century that we find, even among the Jews themselves, any attempt at a formal study of their ancient tongue. In the Talmudic writings, indeed, grammatical remarks frequently occur, and of these some indicate an acute and accurate perception of the usages of the language; but they are introduced incidentally, and are to be traced rather to a sort of living sense of the language than to any scientific study of its structure or laws. What the Jews of the Talmudic period knew themselves of the Hebrew they communicated to Origen and Jerome, both of whom devoted themselves with much zeal to the study of that language, and the latter of whom especially became proficient in all that his master had taught him concerning its vocabulary and its grammar (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl.); Jerome, Adv. Rufino, i. 363; Epist. ad Damas.; Prof. ad Joahum, ad Paradisum, etc.; Carpuzio, Crit. Soc. vi, 2). As represented by Jerome, the Church was quite on a par with the synagogue in acquaintance with the language, and the spirit which had imparted to it was in many respects may be seen from the strange etymologies, which even Jerome adduces as explanatory of words, and from his statement that from the want of vowels in Hebrew "the Jews pronounce the same words with different sounds and accents, pro evoluta lectorum us varietate nominum" (Ep. ad Evagium).

Stimulated by the example of the Arabians, the Jews began, towards the end of the 9th century, to bestow careful study on the grammar of their ancient tongue; and with this advantage over the Arabian grammarians, that they did not, like them, confine their attention to one science, but took into account the whole of the Semitic tongues. An African Jew, Jehuda ben-Karish, who lived about A.D. 880, led the way in this direction; but it was reserved for Saadia ben-Joseph of Fuyum, gaon (or spiritual head) of the Jews at Sora in Babylonia, and who died A.D. 942, to bring to the utmost power of Hebrew grammar and philology. To him we are indebted for the Arabic version of the O.T., of which portions are still extant [see ARABIC VERSIONS]; and though his other works, his commentaries on the O.T., and his grammatical works, have not come down to us, we know of them from references to them, and have still some of their contents in, the citations of later writers. He was followed by R. Jehuda ben-David Chajug, a native of Fez, who flourished in the 11th century, whose services have procured for him the honorable designation of "chief of grammarians." From him the succession of Jewish grammarians embraces the following (for details, see separate articles) :—

Salomo Issaki (ירסא), a native of Troyes in France, d. ab. 1105; Abul Walid Mervan ibn-Ganach, a physician at Cordova, d. 1120; Moses Gikatilla, ab. 1100; Ibn-Esra, d. 1194; the Kimchis, especially Moses and David, who flourished in the 13th century; Saen ben-Mose (Ephodheus, so called from the title of his work work), who flourished in the 12th century; and Jarchi (Yochanan ben Zakkai), which has for the seven conjunctures of verbs as now usually given; Abraham de Balmez of Lecce; and Elias Levi (1472-1549). The earliest efforts in Hebrew lexicography with which we are acquainted is the little work of Saadia Gaon, in which he explains seventy Hebrew words; a codex containing this is in the Bodlician library at Oxford, from which it was printed by Dukes in the Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, V, i, 115 sq. In the same codex is another small lexicographical work by Jehuda ben-Karish, in which Hebrew words are explained from the Talmud, the Arabic, and other languages; extracts from this are given in Wilken, Histor. der Bibl. Litt., iii. 591-590. More copious works are those of Ben-Ganach, where the Hebrew words are explained in Arabic; of R. Menahem ibn-Saruk, whose work has been printed with an English translation by Herschell Philopougos (Lond., 1864); of R. Samael Porouch (about 1160), specimens of whose work have been given by De Rossi in his collection of Various Readings, and in a separate work entitled Lexicon heb., select, quo ex antiquo et inedito R. Poruchonis Lexico novis et diversarum variorum et difficiliorum vocum significaciones astit, d. B. De Rossi (Farm., 1865); of David Kimchi, the second part of his commentary on the Pentateuch, אפרים, often printed; best edition by Biesenrath and Leberecht, 2 vols. Berl. 1883-47); and of Elias Levi (Talhà, Bas. 1527, and with a Latin translation by Bagtus, 4to, 1541). The Concordance of Isaac Nathan (1437) also belongs to this period.

The study of the Hebrew language among Christians, which had only casually and at intervals occupied the attention of ecclesiastics during the Middle Ages, received a new impulse from the revived interest in Biblical exegesis produced by the Reformation. Something had been done to facilitate the study of Oriental literature and to call attention to it by the MSS. Hebrew and Arabic, which the emperor Frederick II brought into Europe after he had crossed the 1225, de Gemmata, p. 419; Bochart, Hist. Univ. p. 779); and a few men—such as Raymund Martini, a native of Cata- lonia (born 1256), Paulus Bugensis, Libertas Comitunctis, who is said to have known and used fourteen languages, etc.—appeared as lights in the otherwise beclouded horizon of Biblical learning. But it was not until the beginning of the 16th century that any general interest was awakened in the Christian Church for the study of Hebrew literature. In 1506 appeared the grammar and lexicon of Reuchlin, which may be regarded as the first successful attempt to open the gate of Hebrew learning to the Christian world; for though the work of Conrad Pellican, De Modo legendi et intelligendi Hebrae (Basel, 1503), had the precedence in point of time, it was too imperfect to exert much influence in favor of Hebrew studies. A few years later, Santius Pagnini, a Dominici- can of Lucca, issued his Instiitum Hebraicarum Literarum, in (1526), and his Theussarum Loci, Sanct. (ibid., 1529); but the former of these works is inferior to the Grammar of Reuchlin, and the latter is a mere collection of excerpts from David Kimchi's Book of Roots, often erroneously understood. No name of any importance until, in the history of Hebrew learning in this till we come to those of Sebastian Müntzer and the Buxtors. The former translated the grammatical works of Elias Levi, and from these chiefly he constructed his own Dictionarium Hebr., adj. Chald. vocabulli (Basel, 1823), and his Opus Grammaticum ex variis Elieris libris concinnatum (Basel, 1842). The latter rendered most important service to the cause of Hebrew learning. See Rixtor. The grammars and lexicons of the older linguists were of course the starting point of the study of Hebrew in the Christian Church, and one of them, his Lexicon Chald. Talmud. et Rabbinicum (Basel, 1640), is still indispensable to the student who would thoroughly explore the Hebrew language and literature. The names also of Förster and Schindler may be mentioned as having been important in the early studies. Previous to them scholars had followed almost slavishly in the track of rabbinical teaching. By them, however, an attempt was made to gather materials from a wider field. Förster, in his Diet. Hebr. Non. (Basel, 1857), sought to determine the meaning of the words from the comparison of the different passages of Scripture in which they occur, and of allied words, words having two consonants in common, or two consonants of the same organ. Schindler added to this the comparison of different Semitic dialects for the illustration of the language, and also the use of the Chaldee, which has a history of its own (pp. 615, following). The example thus set was carried forward by Sam. Böhle, a Rostock professor (Disertt., pro formali Signif. S. S. erundum, 1637), though by his fondness for metaphysical methods and conceits he was often betrayed into mere trifling; by Christian Nolke, professor at Coppenhagen, the author of this book (Christian Nolke und seine Schule. P. Hamb. 1769); by Joh. Coccieus (Coch.), professor at Leyden (Lex. et Comment. s. Hebr. Lond. 1669); by Castell (Lex. Heptaglot. Lond. 1669); by De Dieu in his commentaries on the O. Test.; and by Hottinger in his Synopsis heb. sive lexicon hebraicum heptaglot. (Frankf., 1661). Sol. Glass also, in his Philolaus Suecicus, 1636, rendered important service to Hebrew learning and O.-T. exegesis.

Meanwhile a new school of Hebrew philology had arisen under the leading of Jakob Alting and Johann Matth. Danz. The former in his Fundamenta punctum linguæ sactæ sive Grammat. Hebr. (Grin. 1654), and the latter in his Nucifragibulum (Jena, 1686), and other works, endeavored to show that the phenomena which the Hebrew exhibited in a grammatical respect, the flexions, etc., had their basis in essential properties of the language, and not in arbitrary rules or ex-principles. Peculiar to them is the "systema morum," a highly artificial method of determining the placing of long or short vowels, according to the number of more appertaining to each or to the consonant following a metrical unit which led to endless dialectics, and no small amount of learned trifling. The fundamental principle, however, which Alting and Danz asserted is a true one, and their assertion of it was not without results. Nearly contemporary with them was Jacques Gouset, professor at Gröningen, who devoted much time and labor to the preparation of a work entitled Commentarius Ling. Heb. (Amst. 1702), in which he follows strictly the method of deducing the meanings of the Hebrew words from the Hebrew itself, excluding all aid from rabbinus, versions, or dialects. The chief merit of Goesset and his followers, of whom the principal is Ch. Steck (Chossea Linguæ S. V. sive Lexicon Lips. 1725), consists in the close attention they paid to the usus loquendi of Scripture, and Havernick thinks that adequate justice has not been done to Gouset's services in this respect (Intro. to O. T. p. 221. Eng. trans.).

Gouset had not much attention had been paid to etymology as a source for determining the meaning of the Hebrew words. This defect was partly remedied by Caspar Neumann and Valentin Löschner, the former of whom in different treatises, the latter in his treatise De Consonis Ling. Heb. (Frankf. and Leipzig, 1706), set forth the theory that the Hebrew roots are built upon these "characteres significationis,"as he was designated by Löschner, and that from them the trillitets, of which the Hebrew is chiefly composed, were formed. They contended also that the fundamental meaning of the biliterals is to be ascertained from the meaning of the letters composing each, and for this purpose they assigned to each letter what the former called "significatio hieroglyphica," and the latter "poetic" (pp. 7 and 18). This last is the most dubious part of their system; but, as a whole, their views are worthy of respect and consideration (see Hupfeld, De emendanda lexico. Semit. ratione, p. 9).

A great advance was made in the beginning of the 18th century by the rise almost simultaneously of two rival schools of Hebrew philology—the Dutch school, headed by Albert Schultens, and the school of Halle, founded by the Michaelis family. In the former the predominating tendency was toward the almost exclusive use of the Arabic for the illustration of Hebrew grammar and lexicography. Schultens himself was a thorough Arabic scholar, and he carried his principle of appealing to that source for the elucidation of the Hebrew to an extent which betrayed him into many mistakes and extravagances; nevertheless, to his labors we are indebted for an important contribution. Besides his commentaries on Job and Proverbs, which are full of grammatical and lexicographical disquisition, he wrote Origines Hebraeae sive Heb. Ling. antiquissima natura et iudices ex Arabice penetrabulissimae revo-centa (Frankfort, 1725), and Institutiones ad fundamenta Ling. Heb. (Halle, 1744), the Supplement ad lexicon Hebraicum pondus (Leiden, 1744), professor at Gröningen, who published in 1776 a Hebrew grammar of great excellence, and which has passed through many editions, under the same title as the second of the works of Schultens above noted; and Robertson, professor at Edinburgh (Grammaticæ Hebr. Edinb. 1798, 2d ed.), who undertook these works with the object of Schultens in clearness and simplicity, and in neither is the Arabic theory so exclusively adhered to. Venema, as a commentator, was also one of the luminaries of this school.

The school of Halle was founded by Johann Heinrich and Christian Benedikt Michaelis, but its principal ornamen in its earlier stage was the son of the latter, John David, professor at Göttingen. See Michaelis. The principle of this school was to combine the use of all the sources of elucidation for the Hebrew—the cognate dialects, especially the Arabic, the Talmud, the rabbinical writings, etymology, and the Hebrew itself, as exhibited in the sacred writings. The valuable edition of the Hebrew Bible, with exegetical notes, the joint work of J. H. and Christ. B. Michaelis, some grammatical essays by the latter, and the Hebræische Grammatik (Halle, 1744), the Supplement ad lexicon Hebraicum (parts, Gott. 1785-92), and several smaller essays of John David, comprise the principal contributions of this illustrious family to Hebrew learning. To their school belong the majority of recent German Hebraists—Moser (Lex. Mon. Heb. et Chald. Ulm, 1795), Vater (Hebr. Sprachlehre, Lpz. 1797), Hartmann (Anfangsgründe der Heb. Sprachlehr, Marburg, 1798), Jahn (Grammatica Ling. Heb. 1809), and the faciles priscopos of the whole, Ge niuss (Hebr. Deutsches Handwörterbuch, Lpz. 1810-12, and later; Heb. Grammatica, Halle, 1813, and often since; Ge niuss. Geenius has been followed closely by Moses Stuart in his Grammar of the Hebrew Language, of which many editions have appeared. Under the Halle school may also be ranked Joh. Simonis (Onomast. V. Test. Halle, 1714; Lexicon Man. Heb. et Chald. 1756; re-edited by Eichhorn in 1759, and with valuable improvements by Winer in 1829); but, though a pupil of Michaelis, Si mön. He shows a strong leaning towards the school of Schultens.

Among recent Hebraists the name of Lee (Grammar of the Heb. Lang. in a Series of Lectures, Lond. 3d edit. 1844; Lexicon Heb. Chald., and Eng. 1840, Ewald (Kritis, Gramm. der Heb. Spr. Ausführlich bearbeitet, Lpz. 1827; 7th ed. 1853, under the title of Ausführliches Lehrb. der Heb. Spr. des Ab. E.), and Husfeld (Ezecratismus aethiopicae, 1829; Theologie, Jena, 1829). See also Rychner's Hebrew Comment, 1830, and works of the Heb. Grund in Theol. Studien und Kritiken for 1828: Ausf. Hebr. Gram. 1841), are the most prominent. Each of these pursues an independent course, but all of them incline more or less to the school of Alting and Dantz. Lee avows that the aim of his grammatical labor is to "study the language as it is, that, as its own analogy collected from itself and its cognate dialects exhibits it" (Grammar, Pref. p. iv, new ed. 1844). Ewald has combined with his philological analysis of the language, as it exists in its own documents, a more extended use of the cognate dialects; he contends that, to do justice to the Hebrew, one must first be at home in all the branches of Semitic literature, and that it is by combining these with the old Hebrew that the latter is to be called from the dead, and piece by piece endowed with life (Grammatici, Pref. p. ix). Husfeld's method is eclectic, and does not differ essentially from that of Lee, except that the latter attaches a larger influence to the philosophic element, and aims more at basing the grammar of the language on first principles analytically determined; by him also the Japhetic languages have been called in to cast light on the Semitic, a course to which Gesenius too, after formally repudiating it, has since returned. Among the Jews, the study of Hebrew literature has been much faster through rabbinical and traditional prejudices. Many able grammarians, however, of this school have appeared since the beginning of the 16th century, among them, the names of the brothers David and Moses Poromenza, Loew, Nathan, and Hirsch, Schick, Solomon, and Lemberg are especially to be mentioned. A more liberal impulse was communicated by Solomon Cohen (1709-62), but Mendelssohn was the first to introduce the results and methods of Christian research among his nation. From (1843) A. Ramm, Idumea mit Ephraim auf die Indo-Germ. Spr. I. Chald. Gram. 1855; Churcz Feininger, 1836; Concordizanz Lex. Vet. Test. 1840; Hebr. und Chald. Handwörterbuch über der A. T. 2 vols. 1887) seeks to combine the historical with the analytical method, taking note of all the phenomena of the Hebrew grammar, and applies to it even to a large extent, the same kind of work as those of the Indo-Germanic class, and at the same time endeavoring on philosophic grounds to separate the accidental from the necessary, the radical from the ramified, the germ from the stem, the branch from the branches, as to arrive at the laws which actually rule the language. All his works are of the highest value. Mr. Horwitz has also published an excellent Heb. Grammar (Lond. 1834). We especially notice the philosophical method pursued by Nordeheimer (Hebr. Gramm. N. Y. 1888-42, 2 vols. 8vo). The latest Jewish production in English is Kaish's Hebrew Gramm. (Lond. 1863, 8vo). See generally Wolf, Biblioth. Hebr. 1713-58; Locher, De Consul. Ling. Ebr. HEBREWS, THE EPISTLE TO THE, the last of the Pauline Epistles, according to the arrangement of the Revised English New Testament. I. ITS CANONICITY.—The universal Church, by allowing it a place among the holy Scriptures, acknowledges that there is nothing in its contents inconsistent with the rest of the Bible. But the peculiar position which is assigned to it among the epistles leads to a more of doubts as to its authorship or canonical authority, two points which were blended together in primitive times. Has it, then, a just claim to be received by us as a portion of that Bible which contains the rule of our faith and the rule of our practice, laid down by Christ and his apostles? Was it regarded as such by the primitive Church, to whose clearly expressed judgment in this matter all later generations are referred? Do we ourselves possess a declaration by our Lord and Master that this Epistle is canonical? If all discussion would be superfluous. But the interpretation (by F. Spanheim and later writers) of 2 Pet. iii, 15 as a distinct reference to Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews seems scarcely tenable. For, if the "youth" to whom his address is all Christians (see 2 Pet. i, 1), the reference cannot be limited to the Epistle to the Hebrews; or if it include only (see 2 Pet. iii, 1) the Jews named in 1 Pet. i, there may be special reference to the Galatians (vi, 7-9) and Ephesians (ii, 5-7), but not to the Hebrews. Was it, then, received and transmitted as canonical by the immediate successors of the Western Church this book underwent a somewhat singular treatment. The most important witness here, Clement of Rome (A.D. 70 or 95) refers to this epistle in the same way as, and more frequently than, the book given by its name. Its introduction was called "wholly transfigured," says Mr. Westcott (On the Canon, p. 82), into Clement's mind. After his time it seems to have come under some doubt or suspicion in the West. It is not cited or referred to by any of the earlier Latin fathers except Tertullian, who ascribes it to Barnabas, and seems to have considered it as "apt the purpose of the pastor moschuror," that is, the pastor of Hermas (De Pudicit. c. 20). Irenaeus is said by Eusebius to have made deductions from it in a work now lost (Hist. Eccl. vii, 26), but he did not receive it as of Pauline authorship (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 252, p. 984, cited by Lardner, ii, 182; 1 Tim. iii, 16) that is, the Widen of Solomon with the Epistle to the Hebrews, as cited by Irenaeus, it is probably the latter viewed the two as on the same footing. It is omitted by Caius, who only reckons thirteen Pauline epistles (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii, 26; Jerome, De Vir. illust. c. 59); Hippolytus expressly declares it not to be Paul's (Phot. p. 301); it is omitted in the Muratorian fragment; and by the Roman Church generally it seems to have been suspected (Euseb. H. E. iii, 3; vii, 20). Victorinus has one or two passages which look like quotations from it, but he does not mention it, and other copies predating his time contain it (Lardner, iii, 300). In the 4th century it began to be more generally received. Lactantius, in the beginning of the century, apparently borrows from it; Hilary of Poitiers, Lucifer of Cagliari, Faustus, and Marcellinus (who cites it as divinos Scripturos); Victorinus of Rome, Ambrose, Philaster (though admitting that some passages were added to the epistle); Gaudentius, Jerome, and Augustine, in the latter half and the end of the century, attest its canonicity, and generally its Pauline origin.

In the Eastern churches it was much more generally, and from an earlier date, received. It is doubtful whether any citation from it is made by Justin Martyr, though in one or two passages of his writings he seems to have had it in his eye. Clement of Alexandria held it to be Paul's, originally written by him in Hebrew, and translated by Luke (Eusebius, E. H. vi, 14). Origen wrote homilies on this epistle, which he regarded as canonical, and as the work of Paul, and he tells us he had intended to write a treatise to prove this (Lardner, ii, 472 sq.). Origen further attests that the ancients handled it down as Paul's (Euseb. E. H. vi, 23), by which, though he cannot be understood as intending to say that it had any less authority than the others were, it was esteemed as canonical, and as the work of Paul, and he tells us he had intended to write a treatise to prove this (Lardner, ii, 472 sq.). Origen further attests that the ancients handled it down as Paul's (Euseb. E. H. vi, 23), by which, though he cannot be understood as intending to say that it had any less authority than the others were, it was esteemed as canonical; and as the work of Paul, and he tells us he had intended to write a treatise to prove this (Lardner, ii, 472 sq.). Origen further attests that the ancients handled it down as Paul's (Euseb. E. H. vi, 23), by which, though he cannot be understood as intending to say that it had any less authority than the others were, it was esteemed as canonical; and as the work of Paul, and he tells us he had intended to write a treatise to prove this (Lardner, ii, 472 sq.).
in one place among the ἀποκρύφια, in deference to the custom of mentioning it in the Roman Church, nevertheless asserts its apostolic authority, and includes it among the books generally received by the churches.

In public documents of the Eastern Church also, such as the Epistle of the Synod at Antioch, the Apostolical Constitutions, the Catalogue of the Councils, its canons, documents recognized by the Church everywhere, and professedly received, as was received; it is found in the Peshito version; it is quoted by Ephrem as Paul's; and it is included among the canonical Scriptures in the catalogue of Ebedjesu (Lardner, iv, 430, 440). To this uniform testimony there is nothing to oppose, unless we accept the somewhat dubious explanations of the Canons of the Lateran, or suppose that it was rejected by the heretical teacher Basilides (Proem. in Ep. ad Tit.; but compare Lardner, ix, 305).

At the end of the 4th century, Jerome, the most learned and critical of the Latin fathers, reviewed the conflicting opinions as to the authority of this epistle. He considered that the prevailing, though not universal, view of the Latin churches was of less weight than the view not only of ancient writers, but also of all the Greek and all the Eastern churches, where the epistle was received as canonical and read daily; and he pronounced that in the latter day which the Church everywhere, the great contemporary light of North Africa, St. Augustine, held a similar opinion. And after the declaration of these two eminent men, the Latin churches united with the East in receiving the epistle. The third Council of Carthage, A.D. 397, and a decretal of pope Innocent, A.D. 416, gave a final confirmation to their decision.

Such was the course and the end of the only considerable opposition which has been made to the canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Its origin has not been ascertained. Some critics have conjectured that the Montanist or the Novatian controversy that was then in progress, and that the Arian controversy dissipated so much opposition as proceeded from orthodox Christians. The references to Paul in the Clementine Homilies have led other critics to the startling theory that the author of the epistle is so nearly contemporaneous with the epistle of Paul that the former was written by the apostle himself. The former of these positions does not, it is true, necessarily depend upon the latter, and the book may be canonical, yet not be the production of any individual whose name we know; but, as the case stands, the external evidence for the canonicity of this book is so nearly contemporaneous with that of the Pauline authorship that we cannot make use of the one unless we admit the other. This gives immense importance to the question on which we now enter; for if it could be shown that this epistle is not Paul's, the entire historical evidence for its canonicity must be laid aside as incredible.

1. History of Opinion on this Subject. In this epistle the superscription, the ordinary source of information, is wanting. Its omission has been accounted for, since the days of Clement of Alexandria (apud Euseb. H. E. vi, 14) and Origen, by supposing that the author held his name lest the sight of it should repel any Jewish Christians who might still regard him rather as an enemy of the law (Acts xxii, 21) than as a benefactor to their nation (Acts xxiv, 17). Panteleus, or some other predecessor of Clement, adds that Paul would not have written to the Jews an apostle because he regarded the Lord himself as their apostle (see the remarkable expression, Heb. iii, 1, twice quoted by Justin Martyr, Apol. i, 12, 63).

It was the custom of the earliest fathers to quote passages of Scripture without naming the book which supplied them. But there is no reason to doubt that at first, everywhere, except in North Africa, Paul was regarded as the author. "Among the Greek fathers," says Olshausen (Opuscult, p. 90), "no one is named either in Egypt, or in Syria, Palestine, Asia, or the farthest parts of Greece, who supposes that this epistle proceeds from Paul." The Alexandrian fathers, whether guided by tradition or by critical discernment, are the earliest to note the discrepancy of style between this epistle and the other thirteen. They received it in the same sense that the speech in Acts xxii, 1-21 is received as Paul's. Clement ascribed to Luke the translation of the epistle into Greek from a Hebrew original of Paul. Origen, embracing the opinion of those who, he says, preceded him, believed that the thoughts were Paul's, the language and composition Luke's or Clement's of Rome. Tertullian, knowing nothing of any connection of Paul with the epistle, names Barnabas as the reputed author according to the North African tradition, which in the time of Augustine had taken the less definite shape of a denial by some that the epistle was Paul's, and in the time of Isidore of Seville appears as a Latin opinion (founded on the dissension of style) that it was written by Barnabas or Clement. At Rome Clement is the author, as of the other epistles which he quoted; and the writers who follow him, down to the middle of the 4th century, only touch on the point to deny that the epistle is Paul's.

The view of the Alexandrian fathers, a middle point between the Eastern and Western traditions, won its way, and has been adopted as the most probable opinion by Eusebius (Blunt, On the Right Use of the Early Fathers, p. 439-444); and its gradual reception may have led to the silent transfer, which was made about his time, of this epistle from the tenth place in the Greek Canon to the fourteenth, at the end of Paul's epistles, and before those of other apostles. This place it held everywhere till the time of Luther; as if to indicate the deliberate and final acquiescence of the Universal Church in the opinion that it is one of the works of Paul, but not in the same full sense as the other ten epistles addressed to particular churches.

In the last three centuries every commentary and phrase in the epistle have been scrutinized with the most exact care for historical and grammatical evidence as to the authorship. The conclusions of individual inquirers are very diverse, but the result has not been any considerable change in the general tradition. The only new kind of difficulty has been discovered; no hypothesis open to fewer objections than the tradition has been devised. The laborious work of the Rev. C. Forster (The Apostolical Authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews), which is a storehouse of grammatical evidence, advocates the opinion that Paul was the author of the language as well as the thoughts of the epistle. Professor Stuart, in his Introduction to his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, discusses the internal evidence at great length, and agrees in opinion with Mr. Forster. Dr. C. Wordsworth (On the Canon of the Scriptures, Lect. ii) leans to the same conclusion. Dr. S. Davidson, in his Introduction to the New Testament, gives a very careful and minute summary of the arguments of all the principal modern critics who reason upon the internal evidence, and concludes, in substantial agreement with the Alexandrian tradition, that Paul was the author of the epistle, and that, as regards its phraseology and style, Luke co-operated with him in making it what it now appears. The tendency of opinion in Germany has been to ascribe the epistle to some other author than Paul. Luther's conjecture that Apollo was the author has been widely adopted by Le Clerc, Bleek, De Wette, Tholuck, Bunsen, Alford, and others. Barnabas has been named by Wieseler, Thiersch, and others. Luke by Grotius, Silas by others. Neander attributes it to "some apostolic man" of the Pauline school, whose training and method of stating doctrinal truth differed from Paul's. The distinguished name of H. Ewald has been given recently to the hypothesis (partly anticipated by Wetstein) that it was written neither by Paul nor to the Hebrews, but by some Jewish teacher residing at Jerusalem to a church in some important Italian town, which is supposed to have sent a deputation to Palestine.

2. What can be said of the different Author proposed, other than the Apostle Paul.—Most of these guesses are quite destitute of historical evidence, and require the support of imaginary facts to place them on a seeming equality with the traditioinal account. They cannot be expected to rise out of the real probability into that of probability, but they are such as any man of leisure and learning might multiply till they include every name in the limited list that we possess of Paul's contemporaries.

(1.) Silas.—The claims of this companion of Paul to the authorship of one epistle find no support from the testimony of antiquity. The suggestions of them are entirely modern, having been first advanced by Böhme in the introduction to his commentary on this epistle (Lips. 1825), and by Mynster in the Studien und Kritiken, ii, 944; but they have added nothing in support of these claims which might not with equal plausibility have been urged on behalf of any other of the apostle's companions as of the other epistles which he quoted; and the writers who follow him, down to the middle of the 4th century, only touch on the point to deny that the epistle is Paul's.

(2.) Clement of Rome.—Origen tells us that the tradition which had reached him was that some held this epistle to have been written by Clement, bishop of Rome, while others said it was written by Luke the evangelist (ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi, 25). Erasmus espoused the same view. Chrysostom and Cyril of Alexandria held the same view. Some evidence in favor of this hypothesis has been thought to be supplied by the resemblance of some passages in Clement's first epistle to the Corinthians to passages in one epistle; but these have much more the appearance of quotations from the former, or reminiscences of it on the part of the author of the latter, than such similarities of thought and expression as would indicate a community of authorship for the two. A close comparison of the one with the other leaves the impression very strongly that they are the productions of different minds; neither in style nor in the general cast of thought on any previous passage of Scripture. Clement also was in all probability a convert from heathenism, whereas the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews was undoubtedly by birth and education a Jew. Perhaps what Origen records means nothing more than that Clement had reduced the epistle to writing, leaving the question of the authorship, properly so called, untouched. His whole statement is—"not needlessly (oikei) had the ancients handed it down as Paul's; but who wrote the epistle God truly knows. But the story which has come down to us from certain among the ancients, who, as bishop of Rome, wrote the epistle; from others, that it was Luke who wrote the Gospel and the Acts." Jerome also, in referring to the tradition, explains it thus—"quem [Clementem] aiunt ipsi adjunctum sententias Pauli propriam ordinane et ornasse sermonem" (De Viris illust., c. 9).

(3.) Luke.—The claims of Luke apparently rise a degree higher from the circumstance that, besides being named by Origen and Jerome as dividing with Clement the honors which, as these writers testify, were in certain quarters assigned to the latter, there is a character of similarity in respect to language and argument between this epistle and the acknowledged productions of the evangelist. This has led several eminent scholars to adopt the hypothesis that, while the thoughts may be Paul's, the composition is Luke's. But against this conclusion the following considerations may be urged. Where there is no other evidence, or at least none of any weight, in favor of identity of authorship, mere general similarity of style cannot be allowed to possess much force. Luke, however, is known to have been in such a connection with Paul as to justify in some sort the assumption of his having written on the apostle's behalf. 2. Assuming the epistle to be the production of Paul, it is easy to account for the resemblance of its style to that of Luke, from the fact that Luke was for so many years the companion and disciple of Paul; for it is well known that when persons for a long time associated closely with each other, and especially if one of the parties is an individual of powerful intellect whose forms of thought and modes of speech imperceptibly impress themselves on those with whom he associates, they fall insensibly into a similarity of tone and style both of diction and thought; and that even in the best of hands, as quoted by Forster, Apostolical Authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews, p. 648). The resemblances, however, in this case (see them pointed out by Alford, vol. iii, passim) are too striking and minute to be fully explained in this general manner. 3. It is not in the Epistle to the Hebrews alone that a resemblance to the style of Luke may be detected: the same feature pervades all Paul's epistles, especially those of a later date, as has frequently been observed by critics. In fine, while there are such resemblances of style, etc., as have been referred to between this epistle and the writings of Luke, there are "dienses of a nature so weighty as to completely to overbalance these resemblances, and authorize the conclusion that the author of the latter could not also be the author of the former. Or, take the 'Epistles of London, 1828' and Eichhorn (Eisn. iii. 465) justly lay stress on the greater predominance of Jewish feelings in the Epistle to the Hebrews than in any of Luke's writings, and still more on the marked familiarity with the person and labors of Paul. We hold the Pauline authorship of the writer of the epistle, but of which no traces are apparent in any of the writings of the evangelist. Both writings display the combined influence of the Palestinian and the Hellenistic character on the part of their author; but in the Epistle to the Hebrews the former so decidedly predominates over the latter, while the reverse is the case with the writings of Luke, that it seems to the last degree improbable that the same person could have written both. Luke, moreover, was a convert from heathenism, whereas the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews evidently a Jew. It appears, therefore, that the man who, though Luke had no share in the composition of this epistle to Luke as of his own dictation, there is no evidence of any kind which will bear examination, but, on the contrary, not a little against it. 4. Nevertheless the association of Luke with Paul, and the many marks of style which this epistle did, is so strong as to give to the thought of the author of this epistle, a strongly color of probability to the supposition the evangelist had something to do with its authorship, doubtles as assistant or under another's authority; for it cannot be presumed that he would have personally assumed the responsibility of a work of so weighty a character as Paul such a share in the writings of Luke himself—what is the share of the "eye-witnesses and ministers of the word" (Luke i, 2), or what is the share of Paul himself in that gospel which some persons, not without conventionalism from tradition, conjecture that Luke wrote under his master's eye in that prison at Caesarea; or who shall assign to the following the seven characteristic portions respectively in those characteristic sections of Antichrist, Lystra, Athens, Miletus, Jerusalem, and Caesarea? If Luke wrote down Paul's Gospel, and condensed his missionary speeches, may he not in this afterwards take a very important share in the composition of this epistle? (4.) Barnabas.—The hypothesis which claims the authorship of this epistle to Barnabas has in its support the testimony of Tertullian (De Prud. c. 20), with whom, as we learn from Jerome (Epist. 129, ad Dardan.) and others, the epistle itself was not unmixed. For this opinion Tertullian, in the passage referred to, assigns no reasons, and Jerome appears to have treated it as a mere conjecture resting upon Tertullian's authority alone; for, in his catalogue of ecclesiastical writers (c. 5), he refers to this opinion as one "juxta Tertullianum," while he says that the opinion that Luke was the author was one "juxta quodam." Hug is of opinion (Intro d. p. 596, Foedelck's transl.) that in this passage we have not Tertullian's own view so much as a concession on his part to those who he was opposing, and who, because of the very passage he is about to quote from the Epistle to the Hebrews (vi. 4-8), were inclined to reject the claims of that epistle to be esteemed the production of Paul. This conjecture is of use, as it tends to show that Tertullian did not have any part in inscribing this epistle to Barnabas than his total ignorance that it had ever been imputed to Paul, as has been confidently inferred by several writers from the fact that it was obviously to the interest of his argument to uphold the Pauline authorship of the epistle. It is the origin of this. In recent times the ablest defender of this hypothesis is Ullmann, who has devoted to it an article in the first volume of his journal, the Studien und Kritiken; but the evidence he adduces in favor of it is very feeble. After enlarging on the testimony of Tertullian, he proceeds to the internal evidence in favor of Barnabas; but of the six reasons he assigns for ascribing the epistle to him, none possesses any force. The first, viz. the traces in the epistle of an Alexandrian education on the part of the author, supposing it granted, would not apply particularly to Barnabas, who was a native of Cyprus, and could not, therefore, have had the advantage of the Alexandrian, for about we know had never seen that seat of allegorical learning. The second, viz. that Barnabas, being a Levite, was more likely, on that account, to understand the Jewish ritual, as we see the author of this epistle did, is very probably; but it is not a reason why the author of this epistle on the head which any intelligent Jew might not have known, whether a Levite or not. The third, viz. that the author of this epistle says concerning the law, divine revelation, faith, etc., is very Pauline, and such as we might expect from a companion of Paul's, viz. Barnabas was; the fourth, viz. that the tenor of the epistle is worthy such a man as Barnabas; the fifth, viz. that the writer of this epistle speaks of the Saviour very frequently by the appellation ό Προφητε, which Dr. Ullmann thinks indicates that the writer must have known our Lord during his personal ministry, which was probably the case with Barnabas; and the sixth, viz. that the names of persons mentioned in this epistle are names which Barnabas might have referred to had he written it—are reasons such as it would be idle to refute, and such as fill us with surprise that a point of Ullmann's reasoning can have so easily been adduced against him. With regard to the fifth also, Oehler has justly observed (Ops. Theol. p. 115) that if it were certain that Barnabas had enjoyed the advantage of our Lord's personal ministry, it would clearly prove that he was not the author of this epistle, for the latter distinctly marks himself with those his advantage had not been enjoyed (ch. ii. 3). Stuart and some others have laid great stress on the contrast afforded by this epistle to the extant epistle which passes under the name of Barnabas, with respect to style, tone, and general character, as supplying indubitable evidence that the former is the production of a different and a far superior mind. Of this there can be no question, and, were we quite certain that the epistle ascribed to Barnabas was really his production, the argument would be conclusive. But, though some very distinguished names may be cited in support of its authenticity, the greater weight, both of authority and evidence, is against it. See Barnabas, Epistle of. The total absence of any reason in favor of imputing the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews to Barnabas affords sufficient ground for rejecting this hypothesis without our attempting to adduce dubious and untenable evidence. (5.) Some Alexandrians Christian.—This hypothesis rests on certain features of the epistle which are said to betray Alexandrian culture, habits, and modes of thought on the part of the writer. These have been much insisted upon by Eichhorn, Schulz, Bleek, and others; but they are not such, we think, as carry with them the weight which these writers have allowed to them. The standard of comparison by which the supposed Alexandrian tone of this epistle is evinced is supplied by the writings of Philo, between which and this epistle it is affirmed that there is so close a resemblance that it can be accounted for only on the supposition that the author of the latter was, like Philo, an Alexandrian Jew. Now, before this reasoning can be so much as looked at, it becomes those who use it to point out clearly how much of Philo's peculiar style and sentiment was owing to his Jewish, and how much to his Alexandrian education or habits of thought; because, unless this can be done, it will be impossible to show that any alleged peculiarity necessarily belongs to an Alexandrian writer, and not possibly have appeared in the writings of a pure Jew of Palestine. No attempt, however, of this sort has been made; on the contrary, it has been assumed that whatever is Philoian is therefore Alexandrian, and hence all resemblances between the writings of Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews have been urged as certain proofs that the latter must have been written by a converted Jew of Alexandria. Such an assumption, however, we would by no means concede; and we feel confirmed in this by an examination of the evidence adduced in support of the Alexandrian character of this epistle. As Stuart has, we think, clearly shown (1, 321), and as even Tholuck, though obviously inclining the other way, has candidly admitted (Comment. on the Hebrews, 1, 68, § 7), there is nothing in this evidence to show that this epistle might not have been written by a Jew who had never been in the heart of Alexandria. Notice that several of the points on which Eichhorn chiefly insists as favoring his view, such as the prevalence of typical expositions of the Mosaic ritual in this epistle, and the greater elegance of its language and style (Eisler, ii. 46 sq.), are given up by Blass and that of the two chief enemies upon the latter, viz., the close affinity between this epistle and the writings of Philo, and the alleged mistake in regard to the furniture of the tabernacle which Bleek charges upon the author of this epistle in chap. ix, 3, 4, and which he thinks no Jew of Palestine could have committed, both are relinquished by Tholuck as untenable (comp. the valuable remarks of Hug, Introd., p. 584, note, Fosdick's transl.). With regard to the latter, it may be remarked that, even supposing it proved that the writer of this epistle had erred in asserting that the pot containing the manna and Aaron's rod, was placed in the ark of the tabernacle as a token that, supposing byvapaporov to denote the altar of incense, and not the censer, he had fallen into the mistake of placing this within instead of without the vail, nothing could be thence deduced in favor of the Alexandrian origin of the author. For, with regard to the former of these, it was a matter on which the Jews of Palestine had no means of information than those of any other place, since, in the Temple as then standing, none of the furniture of the Holy of Holies had been preserved; and with regard to the latter, as it could not be the result of ignorance either in a Jew of Palestine or in a Jew of Alexandria, but must have been a piece of mere inadvertence on the part of either, it seems rather too much to conclude that it was such as the latter alone was capable of committing. That, however, there is no blunder in the case, has, we think, been very satisfactorily shown by Deleying (Misc. Soc. tom. ii, No. 47) and others (comp. Stuart, Tholuck, and Delitzsch, ad loc., (6)). A. pollos.—The first to suggest Apollos as the probable author of this epistle was Luther (Werke, ed. Walch, iii, 294, 1906, etc.). He has been followed by the majority of recent German scholars, many of whom have supported his conjecture with much and undoubtedly been shown by them that Apollos may have been the writer; and they have, we think, proved that of all Paul's companions this one was the one who was most fitted by education, life-circumstances, modes of thought, and political position, to have accomplished such a task had it fallen to his lot. Beyond this, however, their arguments seem to us signal to fail. What weight they have is derived almost entirely from the supposed Alexandrian tone of the epistle; so that in setting aside this we of necessity invalidate what has been built on it. But it may be permitted us to remark that, even supposing the former established, the latter would by no means follow, any more than because a work produced in Germany in the present day is decked out with Hegelianism, it would follow from that alone that it must be the production of some certain individual rather than of any other disciple of Hegel's school. The adoption of this theory by Tholuck, after his exposure of the unhappiness of Bleek's conclusions, is matter of surprise. "Still," says he (i, 69), "one cannot but wonder how a man of such an originally tolerant disposition as Paul could have entertained the idea of any distinguished person having intercourse with Paul were an Alexandrian, and of Alexandrian culture, we might, with the greatest appearance of truth, regard him as the author of the epistle. Now such a one is found in the person of Apollonius. We are thus inclined to say, "The arguments for the Alexandrian origin of this epistle, I must confess, prove nothing; but show me an end to be gained by it, and I will admit them to be most conclusive." Such a statement affords, we think, very clear evidence that the disposition to ascribe the epistle to an Alexandrian origin, is the result of a constraining force of evidence, but exclusively to what Olshausen, in his strictures on Bleek (Opusc. p. 92), justly denotes as the main source of that able writer's errors on this question—"Quod non ab omni partim studio alium animum servare ipsis contigit." It may be added, it may be added finally, that the theory of Apollos standing as the convert of an other Alexandrian convert, is it very strange that no tradition to this effect should have been preserved in the church at Alexandria, but, on the contrary, that it should be there we find the tradition that Paul was the author most firmly and from the earliest period established. 3. We now pass on to the question of the Pauline origin of this epistle. Referring our readers for particulars to the able and copious discussion of this question furnished by the works of Stuart (Commentary, Introd.), Forster (The Apostol. Authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews, etc.), and Hug, we shall attempt at present a condensed outline of the evidence both for and against the Pauline authorship of this epistle. a. Internal evidence, i. In favor of the Pauline origin of the epistle. (1) A person familiar with the doctrines and usages of Christianity in the days of apostolic tradition, and the Christian churches of any order of the time, could readily perceive that there is such a correspondence in this respect between these and the Epistle to the Hebrews as supplies good ground for presuming that the latter proceeded also from his pen. That Christianity as a system is superior to Judaism with respect to cleanness, simplicity, and moral efficiency, is a fact that the former is the substance and reality of what the latter had presented only the typical adumbration; and that the latter was to be abolished to make way for the former, are points which, if more fully handled in the Epistle to the Hebrews, are familiar to all readers of the epistles of Paul (comp. 2 Cor. iii, 6-18; Gal. iii, 22; iv, 1-5, 21-31; Col. ii, 16, 17, etc.). The same view is given in this epistle as in those of Paul of the divine glory of the Mediator, specifically as the reflection or manifestation of Deity to man (compare Col. i, 15-20; Phil. ii, 6; Heb. i, 3, etc.). Hebrews 2:9 is as having consisted in an impoverishing, and lessening, and lowering of himself for man's behalf (2 Cor. viii, 9; Phil. ii, 7, 8; Heb. ii, 9); and his exaltation is set forth as a condition of royal dignity, which shall be consummated by all his enemies being put under his footstool (1 Cor. xv, 25; Gal. iii, 21). "When he had by his own blood discharging the office of a 'mediator,' a word which is never used except by Paul and the writer of this epistle (Gal. iii, 19, 20; Heb. viii, 6); his death is represented as a sacrifice for the sins of man; and the peculiar idea is announced in connection with this, that he was honored by the sacrifices of the Mosaic dispensation (Rom. xii, 22-26; 1 Cor. v, 7; Eph. i, 7; v, 2; Heb. vii, 4)." adultery to Paul and the author of this epistle is the phrase "the God of peace" (Rom. xv. 38, etc.; Heb. xii. 20); and both seem to have the same conception of the spiritual "gifts" (1 Cor. xii. 4; Heb. ii. 4). It is worthy of remark, also, that the momentous question of a man's personal acceptance with God is answered in this epistle to the Hebrews, as it is in the other epistles of Paul. All is made to depend upon the individual's exercising what both Paul and the author of this epistle call "faith," and which they both represent as a realizing apprehension of the facts, and truths, and promises of the gospel. The method of his making them bear on the point under discussion (comp. Rom. iii. 10–18; ix. 7–33, etc.; Heb. i. 5–14; iii. 5–17) both are fond of linking quotations together by means of the expression "and again" (compare Rom. v. 9–12; 1 Cor. iii. 19, 20; Heb. v. 5; ii. 15, 16; iv. 4; Heb. vi. 12; Gal. iv. 30). On the other hand, another passage, and that occasionally in a sense not naturally suggested by the context whence they are quoted (1 Cor. xiv. 27; Eph. i. 22; Heb. ii. 8; Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11; Heb. x. 38); and both, in one instance, quote a passage in a peculiar way (comp. 2 Cor. iii. 19; Heb. vi. 17; Heb. iv. 13); inexperienced Christians are children who need milk, and must be instructed in the elements, whilst those of maturer attainments are full-grown men who require strong meat (1 Cor. i. 1, 2; xiv. 20; Gal. iv. 9; Col. iii. 14; Heb. v. 12, 13; vi. 1); redemption through Christ is a new and another thing altogether (Rom. v. 2; Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12; Heb. x. 19); affictions are a mister or a trial, a δαίμον (Phil. ii. 30; Col. ii. 1; 1 Cor. xii. 32); the Christian life is a race (1 Cor. ix. 24; Phil. iii. 14; Heb. xii. 1); the Jewish ritual is a λατρεία (Rom. x. 5; Gal. iv. 10); the law has the constraint of some unworthy feeling or principle is "the bond of the flesh" (Gal. v. 1; Heb. ii. 15, etc.). (3) Certain marked characteristics of Paul's style are found in this epistle. This department of the internal evidence has more, perhaps, than any other been canvassed by recent critics, and the most of the long lists which have been drawn from the same phenomena. Thus the occurrence of ὀρθὸν λόγον in this epistle has been adduced by the German scholars against the Pauline origin of it, whilst Stuart and Forster have both rested on this fact as strongly in favor of that conclusion; and as it appears to us with justice, for it if be made out from Paul's acknowledged writings the use of unusual words is a characteristic of his style (and this has been placed by these writers beyond all question), it is obvious that the occurrence of the same characteristic in this epistle, so far from being an argument against is, as far as it goes, an argument for our ascription to T. V. G. V. a translation or revision, however, based on such minute phenomena, we are not disposed to rest much weight on either side. Every person must be aware that an author's use of words is greatly modified by the circumstances under which he has written, or the design he has been called on to serve. Hence caution; and the literature of every country presents us with the numerous cases of authors whose works, written at different periods, and with different designs, present far greater diversities of expression than any which have been pointed out between the Epistle to the Hebrews and the acknowledgments which are made of it. The critics have declined to rest much in questions of literary precedence upon what Bentley calls (Dissert. on Philo-

duced; the materials are arranged in the strictest order, and carefully wrought out according to this disposition, and conclusion follows conclusion with the greatest regularity; the language also is rotund and choice, and the representation unusually clear. All this is unlike "Paul" (Ecclesiast. 4:6). The object, then, is to make respecting the author of the Epistle to the Romans, a production characterized most eminently by these traits, excepting, perhaps, a less degree of calmness, which the special object of the present epistle may have more peculiarly called for. (3.) While we occasionally keep in mind, then, the leading ideas of the epistle a terminology different from that of Paul" (Tholuck, i, 39, English transl.). The instances specified by Tholuck are the use of ἔργῳ, ποιήμα, and σώματος, as designations of Christ; of ἀληθής, which he says is confined to this epistle; of οὐκ ἴτις τῷ θεοί; and of τῆς κοινωνίας, with its derivatives of the sense in which it is used, Heb. vii. 11. Now, with regard to this objection, it may be observed, 1st, That supposing all the instances adduced by Tholuck to be unimpeachable, and supposing no reason could be assigned why we should not use such instances from Hebrews as Tholuck does in Tholuck as Tholuck does in Hebrews, though when he did not use them in writing to others, still the objection cannot have much weight with any person accustomed to weigh evidence, because not only is the number of Pauline terms found in this epistle far greater than the number of termini which, according to Tholuck, are peculiar to the apostle to the gentiles: besides, it is always less likely that the peculiar phrases of a writer should be borrowed by another, than that a writer noted for the use of peculiar words and phrases should, in a composition of a character somewhat different from his other productions, use terms not found elsewhere in his writings. But, 2dly, let us examine the instances adduced by Tholuck, and see whether they bear out his reasoning. "Paul nowhere calls Christ priest." True; but though Paul, in writing to churches composed more or less of Gentile converts, whose previous ideas of priest and priestly rites were anything but favorable to the receiving under sacrificial terms right notions of Christ and his work, never calls Christ a priest, is that any reason for our concluding that in writing to Jews, who had amongst them a priesthood of divine organization, and writing for the express purpose of showing that Jewish priestages in that typical sense (see Heb. vii., 18) is it incorrect to suppose that the apostle should have applied the term priest to Christ? To us the difficulty would rather seem to be to conceive how, in handling such a topic, he could avoid calling Christ a priest. "Paul nowhere calls Christ a shepherd and an apostle, as the writer of this epistle does for Paul, and based upon the whole weight of the evidence to the Pauline origin of this epistle must rest on the assumption that Paul never uses figurative appellations of Christ in his writings; if he does, why not here as well as elsewhere? Now it could only be the grossest unacquaintedness with the apostle's writings that could lead any to affirm this. The very opposite tendency is characteristic of them. Thus we find Christ termed τομος γονος (Rom. x. 4), δικαιους περιπτωμας (xv. 8), τω πατη των (1 Cor. v. 7), η περιπτωμα (x. 4), οπτερως (xv. 28), εις την (2 Cor. xi. 2), περιουσιας (Eph. ii. 20), etc. Was it before we knew why should it be deemed so utterly incredible that Paul could have called Christ οαντοανας and ποιημα, that the occurrence of such terms in the epistle before us is to be held as a reason for adjudging it not to have been written by him? With regard to the use of ἀληθής in the sense of reserved, the reader may compare the passages in which it occurs in this epistle with Rom. x. 2; 2 Cor. ix. 13; 1 Tim. vi. 12, and judge for himself how far such a usage is foreign to the apostle. The phrase γινεται τῳ θεῳ occurs once in this epistle (vii., 19), and once in Jas. iv. 8; Paul also once uses the verb actively (Phil. ii. 15); the case here, then, in this epistle, once uses it intrinsically (x. 25). As there is thus a perfect analogy in the usage of the verb between the two, why it should be supposed improbable that Paul should use it in reference to God, or why a phrase used by James should be deemed too Alexandrian to be used by Paul, we feel ourselves utterly at a loss to conceive. With regard to the use of τῆς κοινωνίας, Tholuck himself does not make any special objection. The assumption that this epistle retains the idea of completing; but he cannot understand how Paul could have contemplated the work of redemption under this term in this epistle, since in no other of his epistles is it so used. This difficulty of the learned professor may, we think, be very easily removed, if we move the objection directly in the way Paul himself does in his other epistles, and show that this has been the design elsewhere, so fully at least as here, to represent the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, as that arises from the former being sufficient, whilst the latter was not sufficient to complete men in a religious point of view, i.e., to supply to them all they need, and advance them to all of which they are capable. That this is the theme of the writer, the passages in which the word in question occurs show; and we see no reason why such an idea might not have occurred to Paul as well as to any other man. Arguments drawn from the use of τῆς κοινωνίας are far from conclusive. It is curious when urged as objections, because they are not only indefinite, but are mostly negative in their character. A minute examination shows that they are not of much force in the present case; for if the expressions referred to do not occur in the same form in Paul's other writings, they are of such a character that the variation here is sufficiently accounted for by the different character and object of this epistle. See this and all the other questions connected with this epistle amply reviewed by Dr. Davidson (Intro. to the N. T. iii. 163-295), who, however, inclines to the opinion that these peculiarities indicate the influence of other hands upon Paul in the composition of the epistle.

b. It yet remains that we should look at the external evidence bearing on this question. Passing by, as somewhat uncertain, the alleged testimony of Peter, who is supposed (2 Pet. iii. 16) to refer to the Epistle to the Hebrews as the composition of Paul, we turn also to the testimonies of the apostolic fathers, which, though very decisive as to the antiquity and canonical authority of this epistle (see Förster's Inquiry, sec. 18), yet say nothing to guide us to the author, we come to consider the testimony of the Western, or as we may call it, the churches upon this subject. As respects the former, there are two facts of much importance. The one is, that of the Greek fathers not one positively ascribes this epistle to any but Paul; the other is, that it does not appear that in any part of the Eastern Church the Pauline origin of this epistle has been suspected (compare Olshausen, Opusc. Theolog., p. 95).

In the Western Church this epistle did not, as we have seen, meet with the same early and universal reception. But of what value is the state of opinion in the early churches of the West in the question of evidence now before us? To judge of this, we must bear in mind that the sole amount of evidence arising from the testimony of the Latin churches is negative; all we can conclude from it, at the most, is that they had no sufficient evidence in favor of this epistle being Paul's; they do not seem to have had a shadow of evidence against its being his. The claims of Barnabas, Clement, and Luke rest upon mere individual conjectures, and have no historical support. Supposing, then, that the rejection of this epistle by the Latins cannot be accounted for by circumstances peculiar to the m, still the evidence of the Western churches and the testimony of the unanymity of the Greeks and Asiatics. Had the Latins been as unanimous in favor of Apollos or Clement as the Eastern churches were in favor of Paul, the case would have been different. The value of Paul's claims would in that case have been equal to that of the Western churches; the case would have been decided in favor of the composition and the value of the Western. This would have furnished a somewhat puzzling problem; though ever is that the superiority of the Eastern witnesses to the Western would have materially advanced the claims of the apostle. As the case stands, all the positive external evidence extant is in favor of the Pauline authorship of this epistle; and the only thing against it is that in the Latin churches there appears to have been no common use of it before the Latin, or those who have generally, formed a great Jewish-Christian Church in the proper sense; the other is, that for the loosening of these from their religious sense of the Temple-worship there was an immediate and pressing necessity (Apostol. Zeit. 64, 176). We know of no purely Jewish-Christian community such as that addressed in this epistle, out of Palestine, while the whole tone of the epistle indicates that those for whom it was intended were in the vicinity of the Temple. The inscription of the epistle, πρὸς Ἑβραίους, which is of great antiquity, favors the same conclusion (Roberts, Discussions on the Gospels, pp. 215 sqq.). Ezra limits the primary circle of readers even to a section of the Church at Jerusalem. Considering such passages as v, 12; vi, 10; x, 32, as probably inapplicable to the whole of that church, he conjectures that Paul wrote to some neophytes whose conversion, though not mentioned in the Acts, may have been partly through the influence of the style of the epistle in the time of his last recorded sojourn in Jerusalem (Acts xxi, 22). This, however, is unnecessary.

V. In what Language was it written?—Like Matthew's Gospel, the Epistle to the Hebrews has afforded ground for considerable dispute concerning the language in which it was originally written. The earliest statement is that of Clement of Alexandria (preserved in Euseb. H. E. vi, 14), to the effect that it was written by Paul in Hebrew, and translated by Luke into Greek; and hence, as Clement observes, the identity of the style of the epistle and that of the Acts. This statement is repeated, after a long interval, by Eusebius, Theodoret, Jerome, and several later fathers; but it is not noticed by the majority. Nothing is said to lead us to regard it as a tradition, rather than a conjecture suggested by the style of the epistle. No person is said to have used or seen a Hebrew original. The Aramaic copy, included in the Peshito, has never been regarded otherwise than as a translation. Among the few modern supporters of an Aramaic original, the most distinguished are Joseph Hallet, an English writer in 1727 (whose knowledge is more of rabbinical than of Greek), and a Latin translation in Wolf's Curia Philologica, iv, 803-837). The same opinion has found in Michaelis a strenuous defender (Intro. iv, 221). The arguments he adduces, however, are more specious than sound; and it has been abundantly shown by Lardner, Hug, Eichhorn, and others, that this opinion is untenable. Bleek (1, 23) argues in support of a Greek original on the grounds of (1) the purity and easy flow of the Greek; (2) the use of Greek words, which could not be adequately expressed in Hebrew without long prepositions; (3) the use of paraphrases,—under which head he dismisses the inference against an Aramaic original which has been drawn from the double sense given to ἐκθέμενος (ix, 15); and (4) the use of the Sept. in quotations and references which do not correspond with the Hebrew text. Why Paul should have written in Greek to persons residing in Judea is purely a matter of conjecture. (Intro. p. 326 sqq.) and Diodati (De Christo Graeco loquenti exercitato, etc., edited by O. T. Dobbin, LL.B., London, 1843, and republished in the Biblical Repository for Jan. 1844) have adduced to show that Greek was at that time well known to the mass of the Jews (compare Tholuck, i, 455).

VI. Some have doubted whether this composition be justly termed an epistle, and have proposed to regard it rather as a treatise. The salutations, however, at the close seem rather to favor the common opinion, though it is of little moment which view we adopt.

VII. Condition of the Hebrews and Scope of the Epistle.—The numerous Christian churches scattered throughout out Judæa (Acts ix, 31; Gal. i, 22) were continually exposed to persecution from the Jews (1 Thess. ii, 14), which would become more searching and extensive as churches multiplied, and as the growing turbulence of the nation ripened into the insurrection of A.D. 66. Persecution was directed against persons and places, the synagogue, and domestic strife were the universal forms of persecution. But in Jerusalem there was one additional weapon in the hands of the predominant oppressors of the Christians. Their magnificent national Temple was the pride of every Jew. Its ancient historical and by gentler personal recollections, with its irresistible attractions, its soothing strains, and mysterious ceremonies, might be shut against the Hebrew Christian. And even if, amid the fierce factions and frequent oscillations of authority in Jerusalem, this affliction was not often laid upon him, yet there was a secret burden which every Hebrew Christian bore within him—the knowledge that the end of all the beauty and awfulness of Zion was rapidly approaching. Paralyzed, perhaps, by this consciousness, and enfeebled by their attachment to a lower form of Christianity, they became stationary in knowledge, and in faith, void of energy and even in danger of apostasy from Christ. For, as afflictions multiplied round them, and made them feel more keenly their dependence on God, and their need of near, and frequent, and associated approach to him, they seemed, in consequence of their Christianity, to be receding from the Temple, its glory, and losing all the charm of covenant union with him which they used to enjoy. Angels, Moses, and the high-priests—their intercessors in heaven, in the grave, and on earth—became of less importance in the creed of the Jewish Christian; their glory waned as he grew in Christian experience. Already he felt that the Lord's day was superseding the Sabbath, the New Covenant the Old. What could take the place of the Temple, and that which was behind the veil, and the Levitical sacrifices, and the holy city, when they should cease to exist? What compensation could Christianity offer him for the loss which was pressing the Hebrew Christian more and more?

James, the tushop of Jerusalem, had just left his place vacant by a martyr's death. Neither to Cephas at Babylon, nor to John at Ephesus, the third pillar of the Apostolic Church, was it given to understand all the greatness of his own person, and speak the word in season. But there came from Rome the voice of one who had been the foremost in sounding the depth and breadth of that love of Christ which was all but in comprehensible to the Jew—one who, feeling more than any other apostle the weight of the care of all the churches, was his own people's pastor, and ready to break out in impassioned words, and unsought and ill-required deeds of kindness. He whom Jerusalem had sent away in chains to Rome again lifted up his voice in the hallowed city among his countrymen: but with words and arguments suited to their capacity, with a strange, borrowed accent, and a tone in which reigned no apostolic authority, and a face veiled in very love from whatsoever children who might refuse to hear divine and saving truth when it fell from the lips of Paul.

It meets the Hebrew Christians on their own ground. His answer is, "Your new faith gives you Christ, and in Christ all seek, you all your fathers sought. In Christ, the Son of God, you have an all-sufficient Mediator, nearer than angels to the Father, eminent above Moses as a benefactor, more sympathizing and more present—in him high-priest, in him intercessor: his Sabbath awaits you in heaven; to his covenant the old was intended to be subservient; his atonement is the eternal reality of which sacrifices are but the passing shadow; his city heavenly, not made with hands. Having him, believe in him with all your heart—with a faith in him as the best assurance of things as yet unseen, of old, patient under present and prepared for coming woe, full of energy, and hope, and holiness, and love."

existed in the time of David, serve, with other circumstances, to identify the modern with the ancient site (Gen. xxxvii, 14; 2 Sam. iv, 12). Much of the life-time of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was spent in this neighborhood, where they were all entombed, and it was from hence that the patriarchal family departed for Egypt by the way of Beersheba (Gen. xxxvii, 14; xlv, 1). The site of the Israelites' valley was taken by Joshua and given over to Caleb, who expelled the Anakim from its territories (Jos. x. 36, 37; xiv; 6-15; xv, 13-14; Judges i, 20). It was afterwards made one of the cities of refuge, and assigned to the priests and Levites (Jos. xx, 7; xxxi, 13). David, on becoming king, removed to Hebron his royal residence. Here he reigned seven years and a half, here most of his sons were born, and here he was anointed king over all Israel (1 Sam. ii, 8, 11; 1 Kings ii, 11; 2 Sam. v, 1, 3). On this extension of his kingdom Hebron ceased to be sufficiently central, and Jerusalem then became the metropolis. It is possible that this step excited a degree of discontent in Hebron which afterwards encouraged Absalom to raise in that city the standard of rebellion against his father (2 Kings xv, 9, 10). Hebron was one of the places fortified by Reoboam (2 Chron. xi, 10) and afterwards, the Temple, the house of the Lord, was removed to Jerusalem. The occupied Hebron and the surrounding villages (Neh. xi, 15). Hebron is not named by the prophets, nor in the New Testament; but we learn from the Apocalypse, and from Josephus, that it came into the power of the Edomites, who had taken possession of the south of Judah, and who had carried them off by judaeo-macedonians (1 Macc, v, 65; Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 6). During the great war, Hebron was seized by the rebel Simon Giorides, but was recaptured and burnt by Cerealis, an officer of Vespassian (Joseph. War, iv, 9; vii, 9). Josephus describes the tombs of the patriarchs as existing in his day; and both of them, Abraham and Jacob, are in the city itself, till in the time of the Crusades the names of Hebron and Castle of Abraham were used interchangeably. Hence, as Abraham is also distinguished among the Moslems by the appellation of el-Khull, "the Friend" (of God), this latter epithet is applied to the tomb of the patriarchs in the city; and they now know Hebron only as el-Khull (Robinson's Researches, ii, 456). Soon after the Crusaders had taken Jerusalem, Hebron also appears to have passed into their hands, and in 1100 was bestowed as a fief upon Gerhard of Avennes; but two years after it is described as being in ruins (Wilken, Gesch. der Kreuz, ii, 44; Sasuwel, Pergrina, p. 269). In 1167 Hebron was raised to the rank of a bishopric (Will. T. xx, 8), and the title of bishop of Hebron long remained in the Romish Church, for it occurs so late as A.D. 1365. But it was merely nominal; for after the capture of Jerusalem by Saladin in 1187, Hebron also reverted to the Moslems, and has ever since remained in their possession. In the modern history of Hebron, the most remarkable circumstance is the part which the inhabitants of the town and district took in the rebellion of 1884, and the heavy retribution which it brought down upon them. They held out for some time, but were finally and gavel over to the Khedive Pasha near Solomon's Pools. They were defeated, but retired and entrenched themselves in Hebron, which Ibrahim carried by storm, and gave over to sack and pillage. The town has not yet recovered from the blow it then sustained. In the 14th century pilgrims passed from Sina to Jerusalem direct through the desert by Beersheba and Hebron. In the following century this route seems to have been abandoned for that by Gaza; yet the pilgrims sometimes took Hebron in their way, or visited it from Gaza. The travellers of that period describe as existing here an immense charitable establishment, or hospital, where 1200 loaves of bread, besides oil and other confections, were daily distributed to all comers, without distinction of age or religion, at the annual expense of 20,000 ducats. Hebron continued to be occasionally visited by European travellers down to the latter part of the 17th century, but from that time till the present century it appears to have been little frequented by them. In the 18th century it was taken by Turko-Persian invaders. Recently there are Sezized, Ali Bey, Irby and Mangles, Poujoulat, Monro, Stephens, Paxton, Lord Lindsay, Russégger, Schubert, Dr. Robinson, Dr. Olin, de Saulcy, Stanley, etc.

The site of Hebron lies on the sloping sides of a narrow valley (of Mamre), surrounded by rocky hills. This is thought to be the "valley of Eschol," whence the Jewish spies got the great bunch of grapes (Num. xiii, 23). Its sides are still clothed with luxuriant vineyards, and its grapes are considered the finest in Southern Palestine. Groves of grey olives, and some other fruit-trees, give variety to the scene. The valley runs from north to south; and the main quarter of the town, surmounted by the lofty walls of the venerable Haram, lies partly on the eastern slope (Gen. xxxvii, 14; comp. xxiii, 19). The houses are all of stone, solidly built, flat-roofed, and open at the rear to the Palestine landscape. The road has no walls. The streets are narrow, seldom more than two or three yards in width; the pavement, where one exists, is rough and difficult. The shops are well furnished, better indeed than those of towns of the same class in Egypt, and the commodities are of a very similar character. The manufacture of glass, which is the produce of the glass-works, for which the place has long been celebrated in these parts. Gates are placed not only at the entrance of the city, but in different parts of the interior, and are closed at night for the better preservation of order, as well as to prevent communication between thedifferentquarters.

There are nine mosques in Hebron, none of which possess any architectural or other interest, with the exception of the massive structure which is built over the tombs of the patriarchs. This is esteemed by the Moslems one of their holiest places, and occurs rigorously excluded from it. The only Europeans who, until a late period, have found their way to the interior, were Ali Bey and Giovanni Finati, the Italian servant of Mr. Bankes. The best account of it is that furnished by the Rev. V. Monro, who states that the "mosque, which covers the cave of Machpelah, and contains the tombs of the patriarchal tombs, is a square building, with little external decoration, at the south end of the town. Behind it is a small cupola, with eight or ten windows, beneath which is the tomb of Esau, excluded from the privilege of lying among the patriarchs. Ascending from the street, at the corner of the mosque, you pass through an arched way by a flight of steps to a wide platform, at the end of which is another short ascent; to the left is the court, out of which, to the left again, you enter the mosque. The dimensions within are about forty paces by twenty-five. Immediately on the right of the door is the tomb of Sarah, and beyond it that of Abraham, having a passage between them into the court. Corresponding with these, on the opposite side of the mosque, are those of Isaac and Rebekah, and behind them is a recess for prayer, and a pulpit. These tombs resemble small basilicas, with a window on each side, square doors in front, the lower parts of which are of wood, and the upper of iron or bronze bars plated. Within each of these is an imitation of the sarcophagus that lies in the cave below the mosque, which no one is allowed to enter. Those seen above resemble coffins with pyramidal tops, and are covered with green silk, lettered with verses from the Koran. The doors of these tombs are left constantly open; but no one enters those of the women—at least men do not. In the mosque is a baldaquin, supported by four columns, over an octagonal figure of black and white marble inlaid, around a small hole in the pavement, through which a chain passes from the top of the canopy to a lamp continually burning to give light in the cave of Machpelah, where the actual sarcophagi rest. At the upper end of the court is the chief place of prayer; and on the opposite side of the mosque are two larger tombs, where are deposited the bodies of Jacob and Leah." (Summer's Ramble, i. 245).

The cave itself he does not describe, nor does it appear that the vaulted chamber is of stone (a Spaniard travelling as a Moslem) does not even mention the cave below while describing the shrines of the mosque. John Sanderson (A.D. 1601) expressly says that none might enter, but that persons might view it, as far as the lamp allowed, through the hole at the top, Mackensie (1829) describes the construction of the tombs of Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Abraham in one set of coffin-like structure, about six feet high, built up of plastered stone or marble, and hung with three carpets—green embroidered with gold. Within the area of the church or mosque were shown the tombs of Isaac and Rebekah. They are placed under separate chapels, in which are windows with mosaics of green which the gates are grated, not with silver, but iron bars. Their situation, planted as they are in the body of the mosque, may indicate their Christian origin. In almost all Mussulman sanctuaries, the tombs of distinguished persons are placed, not in the centre of the building, but in the corners. To Rebekah’s tomb the same decorous rule of the exclusion of male visitors naturally applied as in the case of Sarah’s. But on requesting to see the tomb of Isaac, we were entreated not to enter. The chapel, in fact, contains nothing of interest; but I mention it for the sake of the observation it expresses, and because it well illustrates the peculiar feeling which has tended to preserve the sanctity of the place—an awe, amounting to terror, of the great personages who lay beneath, and who would, if it were not for the intervention of the Arab guard, and the strong sensation of the place, which the guardians of the shrine of Jacob and Leah were shown in recesses, corresponding to those of Abraham and Sarah, but in a separate cloister opposite the entrance of the mosque. It will be seen that up to this point no mention is made of the tombs of Isaac and Rebekah; namely, the sacred cave itself, in which one at least of the patriarchal family may possibly still repose intact—the embalmed body of Jacob. It may well be supposed that to this object our inquiries throughout were directed.

One indication of the cavern beneath was visible. In the interior of the mosque, at the top of the shrine of Abraham, was a small circular hole, about eight inches across, of which one foot above the pavement was built of strong masonry, but of which the lower part, as far as we could see and feel, was of the living rock. This cavity appeared to open into a dark space beneath the pavement of the mosque believed to extend under the whole platform (can hardly be anything else than the ancient cavern of Machpelah). This was the only aperture which the guardians recognised. Once, they said, 2500 years ago, a servant of a great king had penetrated through some other entrance. He descended in full possession of his faculties and of remarkable corpulence; he returned blind, deaf, withered, and crippled. Since then the entrance was closed, and this aperture alone was left, partly for the sake of suffering the holy air of the cave to escape into the mosque, and be breathed by the faithful; partly for the sake of allowing a lamp to be lighted by a chain, which we saw suspended at the mouth, to burn upon the sacred cave. We asked whether it could not be lighted now. "No;" they said, "the saint likes to have a lamp at night, but not in the full daylight." With that glimpse into the interior, we were satisfied, and the world without must for the present be satisfied. Whether any other entrance is known to the Moslems themselves must be a matter of doubt. The original entrance to the cave if it is now to be found at all, must probably be on the southern face of the mountain, between the mosque and the gallery containing the shrine of Joseph, and entirely obstructed by the ancient Jewish wall, probably built across it for this very purpose." This account is somewhat at variance with the results of the researches of M. Pierotti, who states, in a letter to the London Times, April 30, 1862, "The true entrance to the patriarchs’ tomb is seen close to the western wall of the enclosure, and near the north-west corner; it is guarded by a very thick iron railing, and I was not allowed to go near it. I observed that the Mussulmans themselves did not go very near it. In the court opposite the entrance-gate of the mosque there is an opening, through which I was allowed to go down for three steps, and I was allowed to ascend by daylight and touch that the rock exists there, and to conclude it to be about five feet thick. From the short observations I could make during my brief descent, as also from the consideration of the east wall of the mosque, and the little information I was able to obtain from the chaldean, who jealously guards the sanctuary, I consider that a part of the grotto exists under the mosque, and that the other part is under the court, but at a lower level than that lying under the mosque." See MACHPELAH.

The court in which the mosque stands is surrounded by an extensive and lofty wall, formed of large stones, and strengthened by square buttresses. This wall is the greatest antiquity in Hebron, and even Dr. Robinson supposes that it may be substantially the same which is mentioned by Josephus (Ant., i, 14; War, iv, 9, 7), and by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Arboch), as the scene of the murder of Absalom. A common tomb in the neighborhood of Hebron passes as the tomb of Abner, He was certainly interred in this city (2 Sam., iii, 32), and the head of Ishbosheth, after his assassination, was deposited in the same sepulchre (2 Sam., iv, 12); but there is slight evidence in favor of the tradition which places the burial out this locality to the western traveler. Besides this venerable wall, there is nothing at Hebron bearing the stamp of antiquity save two reservoirs for rain-water outside the town. One of these is just without the southern gate, in the bottom of the valley. It is a large basin 138 feet square, and 21 feet 8 inches deep. It is built of hewn limestone of very solid workmanship, and obviously of ancient date. The depth of water of course varies at different times of the year: in May it is 14 feet. The descent is by flights of steps at the four corners, by which the water is brought up in vessels and skins, and poured out into troughs for the flocks, or carried away for domestic uses. Just at the north end of the main part of the town is another and smaller pool, also occupying the bed of the valley, and measuring 85 feet by 56, with a depth of 18 feet, containing (in May) 7 feet of water. These cisterns, which are numerous, and have no perennial supply, are fed which are filled only by the rains, seem (at least in summer) to be the main dependence of the inhabitants for water, although that of the larger pool is neither clear nor clean. As these pools are doubtless of high antiquity, one of them is in all likelihood the "pool of Hebron" over which David hanged up the assassins of Ishbosheth (2 Sam., iv, 12).

The present population of Hebron has not been clearly ascertained, but is probably about 5000. Most of the inhabitants are Moslems, of fierce and intolent character. There are no resident Christians. The Jews amount to about 50 families, mostly natives of different countries of Europe, who have emigrated to this place for the purpose of having their bones laid near the sepulchres of their illustrious ancestors. They have two synagogues and several schools. As usual, they have a quantity of the clay to themselves, where the streets are narrow and filthy, and the houses mean. In a few instances, however, they are in tolerable repair, and whitewashed. The environs of Hebron are very fertile. Vineyards and plantations are the capital, is instead of trees, covering the valleys and arable grounds; while the tops and sides of the hills, although stony, are covered with rich pastures, which support a great number of cattle, sheep, and goats, constituting an important branch of the industry and wealth of Hebron. The hill-country of Judea is by itself productive, and under a paternal government would be capable of sustaining a large population. That it did so once is manifest from the great number and extent of ruined terraces and dilapidated towns. It is at present abandoned, and cultivation ceases at the distance of two miles north of the town. The hills then become covered with prickly and other stunted trees, which furnish Bethlehem and other villages with wood. About a mile from the town there are large stunted trees in Palestine. It stands quite alone in the midst of the vineyards. It is 23 feet in girth, and its branches cover a space 30 feet in diameter. This, say some, is the very tree beneath which Abraham pitched his tent; but, however this may be, it still bears the name of the patriarch (Porter's Handbook, p. 67 sq.). See OAK.

2. The third son of Kohath the Levite, and hence the uncle of Moses (Exod. vi, 18; 1 Chron. vi, 2, 18; xv, 9; xxiii, 12, 19). B.C. ante 1738. His descendants are called HEBREW HOUSES (Numb. iii, 27, etc.).

4. (Heb. Ebron', Ἱσσὼν, prob. for Ἱσσών, ABDON, as many MSS. read; Sept. Esipwov, Vulg. Abram.) A town on the northern border of Asher (Josh. xix, 28); possibly the same (Keil, Comment. in loc.) elsewhere (Josh. xxii, 39) called ABDON (q.v.).

Hebron (Heb. 'Cherithron', Ἱσσὼν, Sept. Xiipwov, and Xiipwov, Vulg. HEBRONITE), a designation of the descendants of HEBRON, the third son of Kohath, who was the second son upon Levi the youngest brother of Aaron, father of Moses and Aaron (Exod. vi, 18; Numb. iii, 19; 1 Chron. vi, 2, 18; xxiii, 19). The immediate children of Hebron are not mentioned by name (comp. Exod. vi, 21, 22), but he was the founder of a family (misipuchad) of HEBRONITES (Numb. iii, 27; xxvi, 61; 1 Chron. xxiv, 23, 30, 31; 2 Chron. i, 12; 1 Chron. vi, 9; xxii, 19), who are often mentioned in the enumerations of the Levites in the passages above cited. JERAH was the head of the family in the time of David (1 Chron. xxiii, 19; xxiv, 31; xxiv, 20; 1 Chron. xxvii, 19); in the last of these passages the name of Hebron does not now exist in the Hebrew, but has been supplied in the A.V. from the other lists. In the last year of David's reign we find them settled at Jazer, in Gilead (a place not elsewhere named as a Levtical city), "mighty men of valor" (יִשְׁמָעֵל), 2700 in number, who were superintendents for the king over the two and a half tribes in regard to all matters sacred and secular (1 Chron. xxvi, 31, 82). At the same time 1700 of the family of Jashobeam held the same office on the west of Jordan (ver. 30).

Heckewelder, JOHN GOTTLIEB ERNESTUS, a distinguished Moravian missionary among the Indians of North America, born at Bedford, England, Mar. 12, 1748, where his father, who had fled from Moravia for the sake of religious liberty, was engaged in the service of the Church. On the 2d of April, 1754, young Heckewelder came to America with his parents. At the age of nineteen years (1762) he accompanied Christian Frederick Post, an Indian teacher and colonial agent, to the Tuscarawas Valley, in Ohio, where they attempted to establish a mission among the natives. This enterprise proving a failure, Heckewelder labored for some time as the assistant of David Zeisberger, on the Susquehanna. In the spring of 1771 he joined this illustrious evangelist at Friedenstadt, on the Beaver Creek, Pa., and for the next fifteen years shared all the hardships, sufferings, and triumphs of the Indian mission, at the head of a mission station at Zeisberger, David. In the course of this period he married Miss Sarah Ohnberg (July 4, 1780), at Salem, Ohio, which was probably the first wedding ever solemnized in that state. Having severed his connection with the mission (October, 1786) on account of his wife's feeble health, and the necessary reduction of the fee's of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen" [see ETWEB, JOHN], and made repeated but unsuccessful attempts, in consequence of the Indian War, to survey a tract of land in the Tuscarawas Valley, granted to the Christian Indians by Congress as an indemnification for their losses in the Revolution. In 1792 and 1793 he was twice appointed as a justice of the peace commissioner by the United States government, and was active in aiding the other commissioners to bring about a pacification. These humane efforts, however, proved abortive, and the war continued, ending in the total defeat of the Western tribes. In 1801 he settled at Gnadenhutten, Ohio, and devoted himself to the duties of his agency until 1810, when he resigned. The rest of his life he spent at Bethlehem in literary labors, producing two works, namely, An Account of the History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania and the neighboring States (Philadelphia, 1818); and Narratives of the Mission of the United Brethren among the Delaware and Mohican Indians (Philadelphia, 1830). He died January 31, 1823. General Casue criticized his writings in the North American Review, vol. xxvii. See also Rondthaler, Life of the Rev. David Casue (Philadelphia, 1871), 1st ed. 1818.

HARRIET ELIJAH, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Pine Plains, N.Y., June 7, 1788. Trained religiously by a pious mother, he was converted on the Vergennes Circuit, Vermont, in 1788, and in 1800 was licensed to preach. His early labors in the itinerant ministry were full of toil and privation; and he offered his services with sincere purpose of heart for religious revivals followed his ministry, especially in Vermont and New Hampshire. On the 16th of June, 1801, he was admitted on trial in the New York Annual Conference, and appointed to Plattsburg Circuit; in 1802 to Fletcher; in 1803 to Bridgewater Circuit, New Hampshire; after which he served as a preacher in what is now the New York Annual Conference. In 1807 he was made presiding elder of the New Hampshire District. The country was mountainous, newly settled, and poor; and Mr. Heddings' whole receipts for the first year were $4 25, besides his travelling expenses. In 1829 he was elected a delegate to the General Conference held at Baltimore. A plan for a "delegated" General Conference was discussed by this body, and at first rejected; a rupture seemed imminent, but a reconsideration was brought about, largely through Heddings' influence, and the plan was finally adopted. In 1832 he was appointed to the London District, and in 1810 he married. In the ten years before his marriage he travelled 3000 miles a year, and preached nearly every day. His pay for this time averaged $45 per annum. "The circuits were large, often requiring three to five hundred miles to complete one round, and this round was completed in from two to six weeks, during which a sermon was to be preached and a class met daily; and often three sermons and three classes to be attended on the Sabbath. The journeys, too, were performed ... on horseback, through rough and miry ways, and through wildernesses where no road as yet had been cast up. Rivers and swamps were to be forded. Nor could the journey be delayed. On, on, must the itinerant press his way, through the drenching rains of summer, the chilling sleet of spring or autumn, and the driving blasts or piercing cold of winter; and often amid perils, wearing weather, and almost nakedness, he carried the Bread of Life to the lost and perishing. And then, when the day of toil was ended, in the creviced hut of the frontier settler, the weary itinerant, among those of kindred hearts and sympathies, found a cordial though humble place of repose." ... For twenty years before his appointment to the episcopacy he received his annual appointments at Conference, and prosecuted the duties assigned him on circuits, and stations, and presiding elders' districts. The fields of his labor lay, after the first few years, wholly in the New-England States; and when the New-England Conference was separated from New York, he became identified with that work. In the introduction and establishment of Methodism in New England—itself one of the most romantic, as it is perhaps the best recorded portion of Methodist history—he was an active and most efficient agent, and in its stirring scenes and forlorn but heroic labors he spent the flower of his manhood; and upon it, no doubt, he left the impress of his genial spirit, which remains his noblest and most enduring monument." From 1808 to 1824 he was a delegate to every General Conference, and was always eminent in influence and power at the sessions of that body. In the "Presiding Elder Question" at the Conferences of 1820 and 1821 stood, with the other episcopal nominees, in the election of presiding elders by the Conferences; but his zeal in the cause never degenerated into rashness, or became liable to the charge of disloyalty. In 1824 he was elected bishop. He accepted the office with great reluctance, and filled it with the most distinguished ability and acceptance for 26 years. "In the exercise of the episcopal functions he developed rare qualifications as a presiding officer, and especially as an expounder of ecclesiastical law. The soundness of his views upon the disciplines and discipline of the Church was so fully and so universally conceded, that in the end he became almost an oracle in these respects, and his opinion was regarded with profound veneration. As a theologian and divine, his views were comprehensive, logical, and well matured. Not only had they been elaborated with great care, but the analysis was very distinct; and the successive steps were not only clearly defined in the mind, but they were so clear and distinct even in the minutiae of their detail. His discourses were after the same pattern—an example of neatness, order, perspicuity, and completeness. From the year 1844, age and increasing infirmities compelled him to seek relief from the heavy burden of labor he had previously sustained, and his vocation in the Church Annual Conferences became less frequent. Yet his labors and responsibilities are very great. He has been very accustomed to undertake the major duties of a presiding bishop, and has held the office in a manner which has brought him great honor and glory, and the glorious triumph of his abiding faith. The Rev. M. Richardson came in, and inquired whether his prospect was clear; he replied with great emphasis, 'Oh yes, yes, yes! I have been wonderfully sustained of late, beyond the usual degree.' After a pause, he added, 'I trust in Christ, and he does not disappoint me. I feel him, I enjoy him, and I look forward to an inheritance in his kingdom.'" A full account of the labors of this great and good man will be found in the Life and Times of the Rev. E. Heddins, D.D. by W. H. Clark, D.D. (New York, 1854; reviewed by B. M. Anderson of the Quarterly, Oct. 1855); see also Stevens, History of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Sprague, Annals, vii, 504; North American Review, xxxii, 349.

Hedge, the rendering in the A. V. (besides derivatives from הָנַךְ and הָנָךְ, rendered as a verb), I, of three words from the same root (הָנַךְ), which, as well as their Greek equivalent (φημάρχης), denotes simply that which surrounds or encloses, whether it be a stone wall (הָנַךְ, pe'cher, Prov. xxiv, 31; Ezek. xiii, 10) or a fence of other materials. "Hedger", "gader", and הַנָּךְ, gederah, are used of the hedge of a vineyard (Num. xxiii, 24; Isa. xxxix, 40, 1 Chron. iv, 29); and the latter is employed to describe the wide walls of stone, or fences of thorn, which served as a shelter for sheep in winter and summer (Num. xxxii, 16). The stone walls which surround the sheepfolds of modern Palestine are frequently crowned with sharp thorns (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 299), a custom at least as ancient as the time of Homer (Od. xiv. 547). One of prickly pear (Arctocereus) was used for that purpose, as well as for the fences of cemeteries at a later period (Arist. Eclog. 355). In order to protect the vineyards from the ravages of wild beasts (Psal. lxxx, 12), it was customary to surround them with a wall of loose stones or mud (Matt. xxv, 30; Mark xii, 1), which was a favorite haunt of serpents (Eccles. xvi, 8), and a retreat for locusts from the cold (Nah. iii, 17). Such walls are described by Maundrell as surrounding the gardens of Damascus. "They are built of great pieces of earth, made in the fashion of brick and hardened in the sun. In their dimensions they are only two yards long, somewhat more than one broad, and half a yard thick. Two rows of these, placed one upon another, make a cheap, expeditious, and, in this dry country, a durable wall" (Early Travels in Pal., p. 487). A wall or fence of this kind is clearly distinguished in Isa. v, 5 from the tangled hedge, 2, 732, 2, 735, men'okh' (מְנַוְּכָה, Mic. vii, 4), which was planted as an additional security by the foreigner (Lam. iv, 29). The thorns and was composed of the thorny shrubs with which Palestine abounds. The prickly pear, a species of cactus, so frequently employed for this purpose in the East at present, is believed to be of comparatively modern introduction. The aspersion of the comparison of a tangled hedge of thorns to the difficulties which a slothful man conjures up as an excuse for his inactivity will at once be recognized (Prov. xv, 19; comp. Hos. ii, 6). The narrow paths between the hedges of the vineyards and gardens, "with a fence on this side and a fence on that side" (Num. xxii, 24), are distinguished from the "high" or "more frequented tracks" (Lk. xvi, 23) (Hackett, Illust. of Scripture, p. 106; Trench, On the Parables, p. 198).—Smith, s. v.

Hedge, Levi, LL.B., a professor in Harvard University, was born in 1777 at Hardwick, Mass. He graduated at Harvard University in 1792. "His whole life, from his childhood, may be said to have been connected with the University. In 1795 he was appointed tutor, and subsequently received the appointment of permanent tutor; in 1810 he was made college professor of logic and metaphysics; and in 1827 he was transferred to the Alford professorship of natural religion, moral philosophy, and politics. In 1831 he was compelled by an attack of paralysis to resign his position. He died Jan. 3, 1844. He is remembered by many pupils as a faithful instructor and kind friend." He published a "System of Logic" (1818, 1820), which passed through several editions, and has been translated into German. He was the father of Dr. F. H. Hedge, an eminent Unitarian minister.—Christian Examiner, xxxvi, 299.

Hedio, Gaspar or Caspar, one of the early German Reformers, was born at Ettlingen, Baden, in 1494. He studied theology at Freiburg and Basle, where in 1519 he sustained, in presence of Capito, the theses afterwards printed under the title Conclusiones ex Evangelio, Scriptura et veteri traditione (Zurich, 1519). They are 24 in number, treating on the attributes of God and predestination, and evince a decided tendency towards the Reformations. In 1520 he began to correspond with Luther on the question of Grace; in the same year he was called to Mentz on the recommending of Gomarus, and was made court preacher and vicar to the archbishop. He resigned his offices in 1523, and retired to Strasbourg. The chapter of that city offered him the pallium of the cathedral, but the bishop refused to confirm the offer until Hedio was prepared to confine himself to preaching the Word of God. His preaching was very popular, because it was simple and Biblical. He was naturally timid, and incapable of taking a leading part in the religious movement then going on; but his services as coadjutor to Bucer and Capito in consolidating the Reformation in Strasbourg were very great. In 1561 he was sent, with Lenglin and Soll, to confer with the German theologians on the subject of the Confession of Faith. He died at Strasbourg Oct. 17, 1562. All his works, except Chronicon Germanicum, oder Beschreibung aller alien christlichen Kirchen bis auf Jahr 1545 (Strasb., 1580, 3 vols. fol.)—Smaragdi abbatis Commentarius in Evangelia Et Epistolae, which he translated himself into German:—Chronicon abbatis Ursprungsbergis correctum, et Paralipomena addita ab anno 1562 ad annum 1587, translated also into German by himself:—Sententia Phil. Melanchthonis, Mart. Buceri, Gamp. Hedelioni et aliorum de pace Ecclesiae, ann. 1584 (1607, 8vo). Melchior Adam considers him also as the transator of the histories of Eusebius, Hegesippus, and Josephus, and was worst. Hedwig, Sr., was the daughter of Agnes and Berthold, duke of Carinthia. She married Henry, duke of Bohemia, by Polack, Archbishop of Prague, xxviii, 34, 35, and bore him three daughters. They afterwards made a vow of chastity, Henry becoming priest and subsequently bishop, while Hedwig entered a Cistercian convent near Trebnitz, without, however, taking the veil. She died there October 15, 1453, and was buried in the convent. She was canonized by pope Clement IV in 1267 (or 1269). She is commemorated on the 17th of October. See Arnaud d'Andilly, Vie des saints illustres; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii, 728.

Heerbrand, Jakob, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Giengen Aug. 12, 1921. After studying at Ulm and Wittenberg, he was ordained at Tubingen, from where he was expelled for objecting to the liturgy; but he was soon recalled, and made pastor of Herrenberg. In 1554, duke Christopher sent him as one of the theological delegates to the Council of Trent. Charles, prince of Baden, employed him in reforming the churches in his dominions, and in 1560 he was chosen professor of divinity at Tubingen, where he died May 22, 1600. Of his works, which are numerous both in German and Latin, the principal is Compendium Theologiae (Tubingen, 1578, fol., often reprinted), a work which long held its place as a text-book. The negotiations between the Tubingen theologians of that time and the patriarch of Constantinople, in which this compendium was inserted into Greek (by M. Crusius), and is to be sent to Constantinople. The Greek translation was published, together with the original, at Wittenberg in 1782. His opponents used to call him, on account of his polemical zeal, Huldbrand ("hell-fire"). See Melchior Adam, Vit. Theologorum, i, 137; Hook, Eccl. Biography, vol. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. v, 627.

Heermann, Johann, a Silesian Protestant pastor and hymn writer, was born at Rauten, Silesia, Oct. 11, 1855. At school he displayed early talent. In 1611 he became pastor at Koben. During the Thirty Years' War Silesia was the scene of war and plunder, and Heermann was often obliged to conceal himself to save his life. He gave up his pastoral charge at Koben in 1638, and died Feb. 17, 1647. In the height of his troubles in 1608, he published a volume of hymns under the title Deseri Musica Cordis, and his productions afterwards were numerous. He selected and published from Capito, and was made court preacher and vicar to the archbishop. He resigned his offices in 1623, and retired to Strasbourg. The chapter of that city offered him the pallium of the cathedral, but the bishop refused to confirm the offer until Heermann was prepared to confine himself to preaching the Word of God. His preaching was very popular, because it was simple and Biblical. He was naturally timid, and incapable of taking a leading part in the religious of the life of Heer mann. Others are given in Miss Winkworth, Lyra Germanica, and in Schaff, Christ in Song (N.Y., 1899). A selection from his hymns, in German, may be found in Wackernagel, Heer mann's psittaculide Lieder (Stuttgart, 1856). Of his other works we mention Heptolayos Christi (on the cross), Brussail, 1819, new edit. Berlin, 1856.

Hegel (Heb. Hegyaj, "phil. eunuch, Esth. ii, 8; Sept. Tal., Vulg. Euph.) or Hegesippe (Heb. id. 373, "law, Esth. ii, 3; Sept. omits, Vulg. Winer (Worterb. s. v.) thinks he may be the same with Hegiai (Hysias), who is mentioned by Ctesia sus (Perseus, 34) as present at the check of the Persian army at Thermopylae.

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, the greatest of modern German metaphysicians. The following sketch of his life is modified from the English Cyclopaedia. He was born at Stuttgart Aug. 27, 1770, and was educated at the gymnasium of his native city. From 1786 to 1788 he studied at Tubingen, where he had for his teachers Schelling and Hegelian philosophy, and in 1790 he acquired not only a knowledge of the history of philosophy, but also a thorough acquaintance with the natural and political sciences. Upon being admitted doctor in philosophy, he accepted an engagement as private tutor, in which capacity he lived for some years, first in Berlin, and then at Frankfort-on-Main, until, on the death of his father in 1800, he was enabled, by the inheritance of a small patrimony, to devote himself to the study of philosophy. He accordingly proceeded to Jena, where Schelling was teaching his system of "Absolute Identity," in which Hegel was at this period one of the warmest partisans. "Here he composed his first philosophical work, entitled Uber die Herkunft der Fichte'schen und Schelling'schen Philosophie (On the Difference of the Systems of Fichte and Schelling); which treatise, notwithstanding the sincerity with which Hegel then advocated the views of the latter, contained the germ of that dissent which was afterwards expanded into a peculiar theory. He was also associated with Schelling in conducting the Kritische Journal der Philosophie (Critical Journal of Science); and among the most important of the articles contributed by Hegel to this periodical was one which contains a luminous review of the doctrines of Kant, Jacobi, and Fichte, whose several systems are represented as nothing more than so many forms of a purely subjective philosophy. In 1806, when Schelling went to Wurzburg, Hegel was appointed to supply his place as lecturer. Now for the first time Hegel opened the "philosopher's chase," and from that period of his life one can trace his dissatisfaction with the system of Schelling. The difference between the ideas of the master and disciple was marked still more strongly in the Phaenomenologie des Geistes (Phenomenology of Mind), which was published at Bamberg, whither Hegel had retired after the battle of Jena. This work he used to call his "Voyage of Discovery," as indicating the researches he had passed through in order to arrive at a clear knowledge of the truth. It contains an account of the several grades of development through which the "self," or "ego," proceeds: first of all from corporeal to the self-consciousness; next into reflective and active reason, from which it becomes philosophical reason, self-cognizant and self-analyzing, until at last, rising to the notion of God, it manifests itself in a religious form. The title 'Phaenomenology' points out the limits of the work, which is confined to the phenomena of mind as displayed in the elements of its immediate existence, that is, in experience. It traces the course of mind up to the point where it recognizes the identity of thought and substance, of reason and reality, and where the opposition of a rational essence and mind develops itself as pure thought or simple science, and the several forms it successively assumes, which differ only in their subject-matter or contents, are the objects of logic, or 'dialectic.' In 1808 he was called to preside over the gymnasium of Nurnberg. In 1812 he published his Logic (Wissenschaft der Logik), which was designed, with the 'Phenomenology,' to complete the whole body of science. Hegel employs the term logic in a very extended sense, and it does not conform, as is usually the case, to the account of the abstract forms of thought and the laws of connection of ideas, but understand by it the science of the self-sufficient and self-determining idea—the science of truth and of reality. From this fundamental principle that thought and substance are one and identical, it followed that whatever is true of the former is true also of the latter, and consequently the laws of logic become ontological. From this point of view Hegel describes in this work the progress of reason; how, by virtue of a peculiar and inherent impulse, it passes constantly onwards, until it returns into itself. The general merits of this work were at once admitted, and the high powers of philosophical reflection which it evinced were acknowledged by the offer of a professorship at Heidelberg in 1817. His first course of lectures was attended by a numerous class, attracting universal attention, and establishing the originality of his views, notwithstanding the great obscurity of his style. By the publication of the Ency clopédie der phil. Wissenschaften (Encyclopedia of Philosophical Sciences) in 1817, his reputation as a philosopher was established, and Hegel was invited by the University of Berlin to fill the Chair of Philosophy, which had remained vacant since the death of Fichte in 1814. This work, being designed as a manual for his class, takes a general view of his whole system, and exhibits in the clearest manner the ultimate tendency of his views as a consideration of the base of all ontology, and starting from the idea in itself or potentially, he considers it as the essence and primary substance. He then examines thoughts as at first existing in itself, then in other or in nature; next in the mind of the individual, in a purely subjective point of view; and then objectively, in its outward realization; and, lastly, as it terms it, absolutely, that is, as manifesting itself in art, religion, and philosophy. From 1817 until death terminated his career there is nothing to relate in the life of Hegel beyond the constantly increasing celebrity of his lectures and the publication of several works. He successively elaborated in the Phaenomenologie des Geistes two new editions of the Encyclopaedia, the first volume of the second edition of his Logic, and several articles in the Annals of Scientific Criticism, which he had established as an organ of his system, and of its application to every branch of art and science (Enc. Cyclopedia.). He died Nov. 14, 1831, of cholera.

Hegel's influence upon the philosophy and theology of Germany has been very great. It is impossible, in brief space, to give a full idea of the Hegelian system. "The transcendental idealism of Kant formed the transition from the empiricism of the 18th century, and effected, as it were, a compromise between the ancient realism and the scepticism of Hume. To the system of Kant succeeded the pure and absolute idealism of Fichte, destined to be displaced in its turn by Schelling's system of absolute identity and intellectual intuition, which was itself to be further modified and displayed in the diaphanic momentum of Hegel. Essentially the systems of Hegel and Schelling are both founded upon the same principle, namely, the absolute identity of thought and being; for there is evidently but little difference between the doctrine of Schelling, which supposed that the human mind contained within it the fulness of reality and truth, the consciousness of which it may attain to simply by contemplating its own nature, and that of Hegel, according to whom the concrete notion, or the reason, comprises within itself all verity, and that, in order to arrive at the science through which it can itself employ logical thought, or dialectic. The difference is purely a difference of method. For the rigorous for-malsion of Fichte, Schelling had substituted a sort of poetical enthusiasm, and, banishing from philosophy the scientific form it had received from Wolff, had introduced into it the rapturous mysticism of the intellectual intuition. Hegel, however, insisting that the scientific system is the only form under which truth can exist, re-established in himself the fundamental and authoritative utility of the doctrine of the dialectical momentum, or development of the idea. Indeed, with Hegel the method of philosophy is philosophy itself. This he defines to be the knowledge of the evolution of the concrete. The concrete is the idea, which, as a unity, is diversely determined, and the act of this diversity is the idea of its own nature. The origin of the activity, the action itself, and the result are one, and constitute the concrete. Its movement is the development by which that which exists merely potentially is realized. The concrete in itself, or virtually, must become actual; it is simple, yet different. This inherent contradiction of the concrete is the spring of its development. Hence arise differences, which, however, ultimately vanish into unity. There is both movement, and repose in the movement. The difference scarcely becomes apparent before it disappears, whereupon the whole becomes a full and complete unity. Of this he gives the following illustration: the flower, notwithstanding its many qualities, is one; no single quality that belongs to it is wanting in the smallest of its leaves, and every portion of the leaf possesses the same properties as the entire leaf. He then observes that all thinking and acting substances in the world of objects is in a degree admitted, is denied in immaterial objects, and held to be irreconcilable. Thus it is said that man possesses liberty, but that freedom and necessity are mutually opposed; that the one excluding the other, they can never be united so as to become concrete. But, according to Hegel, the mind is, in reality concrete, and its properties are liberty and necessity. It is by necessity that man is free, and it is only in necessity that he experiences liberty. The objects of nature are, it is true, subject exclusively to necessity; but liberty without necessity is an arbitrary abstraction, a purely formal liberty (English Cyclopedia, s. v.).

Hegel "rejected the intellectual intuition of the philosophy of nature, and studied to make philosophy an intelligible science and knowledge by means of dialectics. He called philosophy the Science of Reason, because it is the consciousness of the necessity of its own necessary development. It is his principle to include all particular principles in it. Now as the Idea is reason identical with itself, and as, in order to be cognizant of itself, or, in other words, as, in order to be self-existing (für sich sein), it places itself in opposition to itself, so as to appear something else, without, however, ceasing to be one and the same thing; in this case philosophy becomes divided: 1. Into logic considered as the science of the Idea in and for itself. 2. Into the philosophy of nature considered as the science of the Idea representing itself externally (reason thrown out in nature). 3. Its third division is that of the philosophy of mind, expressing the return of the Idea within itself, after having thrown itself without externally. All logic, according to Hegel, presents three moments: 1. The abstract or intelligible moment, which seizes the object in its purest, most distinct and determinate features, and distinguishes it with precision. 2. The dialectic or negative rational moment consists in the annihilation of the determinations of objects, and their transition to the opposite determinations. 3. The speculative momentum perceives the unity of the determinations in their opposition. Such is the method of philosophy. Hegel, it is said, "was more influenced by his immediate surroundings than his predecessors; all his system tended to a lower, more empirical, and mechanical result (St. John)."

Hegel's view of the philosophy of religion is thus stated by Schwegrer: "All religions seek a union of the divine and human. This was done in the crudest form by (a). the natural religions of the Oriental world. God is, with them, but a power of nature, a substance of nature, in comparison with which the finite and the individual disappear as nothing. (b.) A higher idea of God is attained by the religions of spiritual individuality, in which the divine is looked upon as subject—a transcendental subjectivity, full of power and wisdom in Judaism, the religion of sublimity; as a circle of plastic divine forms in the Greek and Roman religions of beauty; and as the absolute end of the State in the Roman religion, the religion of the understanding or of design. (c.) The revealed or Christian religion first establishes a positive reconciliation between God and the world by beholding the actual union of the divine and the human in the person of Jesus Christ. The God of the philosophies is again as triumphant, I. e., as himself, as incarnate, and as returning from this incarnation to himself. The intellectual content of revealed religion, or of Christianity, is thus the same as that of speculative philosophy; the only difference being that in the case of Christianity the content is represented in the form of the representation, in the form of a history, while in the other it appears in the form of..."
the conception" (Schwegler, Hist. of Philosophy, transl. by Seelye, N.Y., 1864, p. 364).

If, now, after having acquired a general idea of Hegel's philosophical system, we ask what solution that system gives to the questions which most interest humanity: what becomes in it of a just and merciful God, of the individuality and agency and morality of his acts, his hopes of another life, of a brighter future, we shall find no satisfactory answer. The system claims to agree completely with true Christianity, yet its tendencies seem to be pantheistic and anti-Christian. For himself he confesses that his philosophical system is in no way contradictory to the Christian religion, and only differs from it in its forms and expressions. Yet in his system the absolute idea, whose evolution constitutes both the spiritual and the material world, becomes, in its last development, the universal mind, the absolute and infinite subject; and this absolute subject is put in the place of God, who therefore can have no self-conscious existence except in finite and individual subjects. And since this system has no substance but the idea, no reality but the development of the idea, and no absolute reality except the mind of the individual agent, because finite and individual subjects themselves are but fleeting forms of the universal mind, which is their substance. What becomes, then, of the immortality of the soul, which presupposes in it an independent substantiality, a true personality, an essential individuality? If the mind of the human soul is to be but the local manifestation of finite minds, without other consciousness than what it finds in individuals, it follows that pantheism can only be avoided by falling into atheism; our personality can only be saved at the expense of that of God himself. Hegel's moral system seems to float between two extremes such as are dangerous as the other. In either case free agency and morality appear equally endangered. While actually destroying all distinctions—which, it is true, he considers as continually reproduced by universal motion, the single existing actually—does not Hegel at the same time obliterate all distinction between good and evil, and destroy one of the surest pledges of a future life? If all is but evolution, the evolution of a given content, then all is virtually determined; and freedom, though proclaimed by the very essence of the mind, becomes necessity, in finite beings: all that they consider as their own work, the fruit of their own actions, becomes really but a part of the universal work, an effect of the eternal activity of the general and absolute mind.

The essence of Hegel's religious philosophy is found in the doctrine that the world, including nature and human life, is only the realisation of the Absolute. The system, presented with the wonderful dialectical skill that Hegel possessed, could not fail to exert a great effect upon the theology of his age. Soon after he commenced the publication of The Journal for Scientific Criticism (1817), the Hegelian philosophy began to show its power. This magazine was at first exclusively devoted to the external propagation of Hegelianism, and it added greatly, during Hegel's lifetime, to the number of proselytes. Immediately after the death of Hegel his orthodox followers effected the publication of all his works (G. W. F. Hegel's Werk: durch einen Verweis von Vorlesungen über Naturphilosophie, Berlin, 1830). Disputes soon arose in the Hegelian school concerning the Person of God, the Immortality of the Soul, and the Person of Christ, which terminated in the division of the school into two camps. Daumer, Weisse, Gneis, Rosenkranz, Schaller, and others (called the right wing), attempted to connect the-theistic idea of God with the common notion of the divinity contained in the Hegelian philosophy, and to prove the former from the latter; whilst Michelet, Strauss, and others (the left wing), maintained that the pantheistic idea of God, the immortality and the divinity of the Hegelian philosophy, and represented God as the universal substance or the eternal universe, which becomes first absolutely conscious of itself in humanity. Göschel, Heinrichs, Rosenkranz, Marheinecke, and others, attempted, besides, to justify the ecclesiastical idea of Christ, as specifically the only God-man, on philosophical grounds, whereas Bauer, Conradi, Michelet, Strauss, and others, maintained that the unity of the divinity and of humanity was not realized in one individual, but in both worlds of humanity, so that the latter in reality is the God-man. Finally, Strauss and Feuerbach (the extreme left) developed Hegelianism into full-blown atheism and infidelty. "The Hegelian school pretended to find an equivalent for the God of the orthodox religion, a higher manifestation of the ideas of Christian theology in the dogmas of their system. The latter were said to be the pure and final rendering of that which Christianity presents in a popular form. The substantial contents of both were avowed to be identical. The Trinity, the Atomeon, and the other doctrines of the orthodox creed had now—so it was claimed—received a philosophical vindication, and the vulgar rationalism which had flippantly impugned those high mysteries was at length laid low. These sounding pretensions could only mislead the undiscerning. A philosophy which denies the distinct personality of God, and a God-man in particular, must, if it would not be accepted for nothing, be supported by arguments which, if they can by no legienderman be identified with Christian doctrine. The appearance of the Life of Christ by Strauss, and the subsequent productions of Baur and his school, through the applications which they made of the Hegelian tenets in New Testament criticism and the teaching of the apostles, placed this conclusion under a 'doubt' (Fisher, Essays on the Supernatural, p. 587).

It is not to be understood that Hegel's system is now universally held to be pantheistic or even anti-Christian in tendency. An analysis and translation of Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit, also Outlines of the Philosophy of Right, were given in the Journal of Spec. Philos. vols. i, ii, iii (St. Louis, 1868-9), by the editor, W. T. Harris, which journal demands the careful study of all who profess to judge of Hegelianism. The points made in the Journal are also summed up by a writer in the Amer. Quart. Church Revue, Oct. 1869, who maintains not only that Hegel's system is not pantheistic, but that it is the widest and deepest system of thought yet offered to mankind, and that, too, in full harmony with Christianity. We cite from this article the following passages: "To help us to the highest education of our works, the aim of Hegel, and this help is the inestimable gift he offers to us all who shall stand him. To his philosophy is not philosophy unless it 'stands up for all those great religious interests to which alone we virtually live.' Every step of his system is towards the deep truths of the faith; these systems are not mere intellectual abstractions, but the logical results of the most logical systems" (Journal of Speculative Philosophy, i, 266).

"In the Christian religion," says Hegel, "God has revealed himself, that is, he has given us to understand what he is; and the possibility of knowing him thus afforded us renders such knowledge a duty. God wishes no narrow-hearted souls or empty heads for his children, but those whose spirit is of itself, indeed, poor, but rich in the knowledge of him, and who regard this knowledge as their only valuable possession" (Am. Ch. Rev., Oct. 1869, p. 415). "They who regard God as negative unity, and the creature not as self-determined, but as a result unmotivated, unjust to the Wight, that God which God should only seem to be; we should only be 'modes' of that substance.' But man, being a self-determining creature, is his own negative unity, and hence his immortality. 'He cannot be a mere phase of a higher being, for he is essentially a real substance, and are made in God's image, and in him spiritually we see ourselves: who does not see, then, that the highest thought in Hegel's philosophy is only an elucidation of the central dogma of the Christian faith, God is this ideal unity, and each person of the Holy Trinity is that one God in the consciousness of the universe and of the persons of this comparison: We have found that Hegel's doctrine of Being is the direct converse of the pantheistic theory; for whereas the latter considers pure being identical with the All, Hegel regards it as equivalent to non-entity. Secondly, pantheism has always held fast to the abstractions of the understanding; and hence it has attacked all forms of Becoming; but Hegel’s inductive method has opposed this strong position, and led us up to the higher ground of the concrete notion. Thirdly, the pantheistic view of the Negative is abstract.
Being alone is, and non-being is not.” But with Hegel the ultimate form of the negative is immanent contradiction; the negative is not a form of positive but out of positive, the negative. (This leads to the view of the Universal as the only real, independent individual, the I Am that I Am.) Fourthly, the true panthe-ists held Distinction to be impossible, while the theory of the materialistic pantheists was Atomism, the abstantial separate identity of Identity and being. But Hegel leaves both theories far behind him when he permeates to the inmost depths of the subject, and arrives at Self-determination as the origin and principle of all distinction whatever. (This again, leads to the self-determination of the Absolute—the spirituality of God.) Hegel’s unity of pantheism is Hegel’s ‘negative unity,’ which annuls the independence of multiple factors; but with Hegel the true unity, the unity of the Absolute, is purely affirmative, subsisting through the very independence of its members. (And here we reach a development of the great Christian idea of the Triinity.) Pantheism taking a new dress, but pantheism receiving a flat contradiction upon its cardinal principles” (ibid. p. 403–4).

Hegesippus, one of the earliest historians on Church History, about A.D. 150 and 180, was originally a Jew, born near the beginning of the 2nd century.
He was converted to the Christian faith, and came to Rome about A.D. 168, where he died, according to the Alexandrian Chronicle, in the reign of Commodus, about A.D.
190. He wrote a collection of Trypoyygraro, or Memorials of the History of the Church, in five books, from the birth of our Lord to the time of Eusebius, bishop of Rome, who succeeded Anictites in A.D. 170. This work is all lost except a few fragments preserved by Eusebius, and one in the Bibliotheca of Photius. Several passages of this work, which have been translated by Larcher (Sociol. vol. ii). All that remains of Hegesippus is given by Routh (Reliquiae Sacrae, 2d edit. i, 205 sq.), and also by Grabe (Spicilegium, i, 203 sq.) and by Galland (Bibl. Patr. ii, 59).
“The reports of Hegesippus on the character and martyrdom of St. James the Just, Simeon of Jersom, and other Christian martyrs, the and the preservation of the orthodox doctrine in Cor-thin and Rome, as embodied in the history of Eusebius, command attention for their antiquity; but, as they show that his object was apologetic and polemical rather than historical, and as they bear a somewhat Judaistic tone (this is far from being an objection), must be received with critical attention” (Schaff, Church History, vol. i, § 123).

The Socinians of the 17th century use his brief statements as evidence of the general spread of Judaizing tendencies in the 1st and 2d centuries, and Baur, of Tubingen, and his school, have recently reproduced this view. Bishop Bull answered the charges in his Times of Christ, and Dr. Johnn Christ, in 219 (Edinburgh trans., i, 139 sq.), has replaced the latter.
“The evidence tends to prove that he was not even a Hebrew Christian in the sense of observing the law, and there is the most complete proof that he did not regard the observance of the law as essential to salvation.
With the above Atonism, has come out of the two theories of the early Unitarians and of Baur is utterly destroyed. The Unitarians maintained that Hegesippus was an Ebionite or Nazarene, and that consequently the whole Church was in his day Ebionitic, though, unfortunately, the few Platonizing writers, who form a misleading exception to the facts, have been only writers that a subsequent corrupt age has preserved to us. Baur finds in Hegesippus a most determined antagonist of Paul, and his testimony is appealed to as proof that the Petrine faction had gained the predominance not only in the churches of the East, but even in those of the Western Church. But the facts are not contemporary to the repeated testimony of Eusebius, and to all the information which we have in regard to the Western churches, and they both fall to pieces unless it be proved that Hegesippus insisted upon the observance of the laws as essential to salvation. (Dom. Christian. Literature, i, 188 sq.) See also Clarke, Suc-

An Address of the Day, 1865, 2d ed., now used to designate the epoch from which the Mohammedans compute time. The flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina is fixed by the Mohammedans on July 15, A.D. 622. The process of converting the years of the Hegira into the date after the birth of Christ is as follows: Divide the given number of years in the Hegira, an A.D. date, by 10, and the quotient expresses the intercalary cycles elapsed since the Hegira, the remainder represents the number of years elapsed in the current intercalary cycle); multiply the quotient by 10,531 (the number of days contained in an intercalary cycle), adding to the product the sum of the days contained in the egregular months of the cycle, the cycles of the elapsed months of the cycle, the days of the elapsed months of the cycle, the days of the current year up to the time of reckoning, and to the result add again, 227,015 (the number of days elapsed between Jan. 1 of the year 1, and July 15, 622, the date of the Hegira). The sum of this date and the number of the Hegira, converted into Julian years by dividing it by 1461 (the number of days in a Julian intercalary period), then multiplying the quotient by four, and adding to the product the number of whole years contained in the remainder of the division, which is obtained by dividing this remainder by 365. The number of days still remaining shows the day of the month in the current Julian year. Or else the following proportion may be made use of (T representing any date in the Turkish calendar, and C the corresponding date in the Julian calendar): C = 0.970923 T + 0.03156785, and T = 1.030712 C
- 0.635745. If the date is subsequent to the Gregorian reform in the calendar, which can only be the case for modern times, then the Turkish date must first be converted into the Julian, which is then altered to the Gregorian by adding ten days to it for the period extending from Oct. 5, 1582, to the end of February, 1700; eleven days to it for the period extending from March 1 of the year of our Lord, 1583, to the end of February, 1701; twelve days for all subsequent dates. In making this reduction, the difference between the time at which the day begins in the Turkish and in the Christian calendar must be taken into consideration whenever the time day of the month is calculated, as it may make a difference of one, or even of two, days. Then, the Turkish year begins at the end of July. The year 1859 A.C. is in their calendar 1275-76. A simpler mode of reduction, but not strictly accurate, is as follows: The Mohammedan year = a lunar year of 354 days, and therefore 33 Mohammedan years = 82 Christian. To reduce years of the Hegira, therefore, to years of the Christian era, subtract 1343. In the year 1667 A.D. the date would be 622. Thus A.D. 1861 = 1277 of the Hegira.—Pierer, Universal Lexikon, vii, 721.

Hegius, Alexander (the name, according to some accounts, being Latinized from the name of his native village, Heck), a German humanist of the 16th century, was born in 1498, and died in the year 1543 (the exact date is undetermined), and died at Deventer, Holland, in the latter part of 1498. He claims notice here because of his influence in reviving classical learning, especially by means of the celebrated college which he established at Deventer. This school is named by Hallam (Life of Erasmus, 1, 109, Harpers' ed.) as one of the three schools thus early established in Western Europe, outside of Italy, for instruction in the classic languages, "from which issued the most conspicuous ornaments of the next generation." Hegius is said to have been a friend of Rudolph Agricola, and to have himself received instruction in classical literature from Thomas à Kempis. Among his pupils may be named Erasmus, Hermann von dem Busche, Murmellius, and others, whose labors and success in literature added lustre to the teacher's fame. Hegius' writings were but few, and those main for the form of poetry, in an practical and philosophical treatises; one of a theological type is found in a miscellaneous collection of writings by him, published at Deventer, 1580, 4to, and entitled De Institutione Mystegio Dialogus duo, quibus additionem de Paucke et Celebiratione et inventione. Hallim (i.e. note) attributes to him a small tract entitled Conjugationes and which he regards as the first book printed this side

Heidus abraham, professor of theology at Leyden, was born at Frankenthal, in the Palatinate, Aug.
10, 1567. He was educated at Amsterdam and Leyden, and in 1627 was appointed to a pastoral charge in the latter city. He is said to have been ordained to the ministery of theology, and to have been a professor in the university of Leyden. Heidus held a mild view of the doctrine of predestination, and adopted the Cartesian philosophy, of which he became a strong advocate. This involved him in various controversies, in which he bore himself admirably. Yet, when nearly eighty years old, he was dismissed from his professorship by the curators of the University. He died at Leyden Oct. 15, 1678.
His Corpus Theologiae Christianae was posthumously published (1666, 2 vols. 4to).

estant theologian, was born near Zurich July 1, 1635.
He studied at Heidelberg and Göttingen, and was pro-went to Steinfurt as professor of t eology and ecclesiastical history, "War having disturbed the people of Steinfurt, Heidegger returned to Zurich in 1665, and was professor of theology in that city until 1667. He died at Zurich Jan. 18, 1698. He was the compiler of the famous Formula Consensus, adopted by the Synod of Zurich in 1675. See Helveti-

Heidelberg Catechism, one of the symbolic books of the Reformed Church. Its name is derived from the city in which it was compiled and first printed. It also sometimes styled the Palatinate Catechism, from the territory (the Palatinate) of the princes of Heidelberg and the Palatinate under whose auspices it was prepared. The original German title of the (évito princeps) is Catechizm, or Christlicher Underricht, wie der in Kirchen und Schulen der Christlichen Pfalz getrieben wird. It was the result of the ancient and ancient and ancient Orthodox Church of the Church. Johannmayer, 1553 (Catechism, or Christian Instruction, according to the Usages of the Churches and Schools of the Palatinate).

I. History. — Soon after the introduction of Protastianism into the Palatinate in 1546, the controversy between Lutherans and Calvinists broke out in this territory; and thus, especially under the elector Otto Heinrich (1556-69), it raged with great violence in Heidelberg. Frederick Iii, who came into power in 1559, adopted the Calvinist view on the Lord's Supper, and favored that side with all his princely power. He reorganized the Sa-pier College (formerly by the elector's will in the theo-ological school, and put at its head (1662) Zacharias Ursinus, a pupil and friend of Melancthon, who had adopted the Reformed opinions. See URSINUS. In order to put an end to religious disputes in his dominions, he deter-ned to separate the divinity faculty of the university into three parts (as distinguished from the five parts in the Catechism of Calvin and the previous draft of Ursinus), and the genial warmth and union of the whole work, are chieflly due to Olevianus" (Schaaf, in

When the Ursinus draft was completed, Frederick laid it before a synod of the superintendents of the Palat-inate (December, 1652). After careful examination it was approved. The first edition, whose full title is given above, appeared in 1653. The preface is dated January 19 of that year, and runs as in the name of the elector Frederick, who probably wrote it. A Latin ver-ion appeared in the same year, translated by Johannes Lagius and Lombertus Pithopeus. The German version is the authentic standard. Two other editions of the German version appeared in 1563. What is now the eightieth question (What difference is there between the Lord's Supper and the Roman Mass?) is not to be found in the first edition; part of it appears in the second edition, but that is necessary to give the revision in full as follows: What difference is there between the Lord's Supper and the Popish Mass? The Lord's Supper testifies to us that we have full forgiveness of all our sins by the one sacrifice of Jesus Christ, which he himself has once accomplished on the cross; and that by the Holy Communion we are affixed to a cony who has his true body is now in heaven at the right hand of the Father, and is to be there worshipped. But the Mass teaches that the living and the dead have not forgiveness of sins through the sufferings of Christ, unless Christ is still daily offered for them by the priest; and that Christ is invisibly under the form of bread and wine, and is therefore to be worshipped in it. (And thus the Mass at bottom is nothing else than a denial of the one sacrifice and passion of Christ, and an accursed idolatry.)

The occasion for the introduction of this eightieth question appears to have been the decree of the Council of Trent concerning the Mass, the 17th of September, 1562. This declaration, and the anathemas pronounced at Trent against the Protestant doctrine of the sacraments, had not time to produce their effect before the issue of the first edition of the Catechism. But in 1564 the necessity for a declaration on the Protestant side, and such a declaration is furnished in this eightieth question, which was added to the Catechism in 1563. The first edition of 1563 was for a long time lost; that given by Niemeyer (Collectio Confessiorum, p. 390) is the third of that year. But in 1564 Pastor Wulff found a copy and reprinted it, with a history of the text. (Der Hein. Katechismus in seiner ursprünglichen Gestalt, Bonn, 1864, 4to.) This cleared up all doubt as to the various editions of 1563.

In 1865 Professor Schaff published a very valuable edition, revised after the first edition of 1563, with an account of the origin of the church of Christ, which was published in parallel columns. The Introduction gives an admirable account of the literature and history of the Catechism. The text used is that given by Niemeyer, and not that of the first edition of 1563, which, as has been stated above, was reprinted in 1864. See also Dr. Schaff's edition of the Heidelberg Catechism as it is by him in the form of a public church confession and the instruction of youth. (American Review, June, 1863, p. 571.)

The 300th anniversary of the formation and adoption of the Heidelberg Catechism was celebrated in 1863. One of the most important and permanent fruits of this celebration was the publication of The Heidelberg Catechism, Tercentenary Edition (New York, 1863, sm. 4to). This noble volume gives a comprehensive Introduction (by Dr. Nevin), and a critical edition of the Catechism in four texts—Old German, Latin, Modern German, and English. The text of the English version is that of 1563, with the minor corrections of 1566. The Latin text (with the German of the 3rd ed. of 1653) is given in Niemeyer, Collectio Confessiorum, p. 390 sq.; also in an edition by Dr. Steiner, Catechesis Christianae seu Catechismus Heidelbergerensis (Baltimore, 1862). Another valuable edition in English is The Tercentenary Monument (Chamburgh, 1863, 8vo), containing twenty essays by eminent Reformed theologians of Germany, Holland, and America, on the Catechism, its origin, history, its special relations to the German Reformed Church. HEIDENHEIM 161

Heidenheim (Heidenheim), WOLF, or BENJAMIN SPINOZA, a Hebrew scholar and typographer, is distinguished in Hebrew literature by his exertions to provide editions of the Pentateuch free from the errors which marred preceding copies. Indeed, the city in which he lived, Rodolcin, near Frankfurt on the Main, became in his day the centre of attraction for Hebrew typography. But he has also left us works of his own which betoken a thorough acquaintance with Hebrew philology. Just even assigns him a place by the side of Mendelssohn. Heidenheim died in 1692, at a very old age. His most important works are: the Hebrew grammar (Rödelheim, 1690, 12mo)—השלמ לב אנקדדס,—a treatise on different parts of Hebrew grammar (Rödelheim, 1692, 12mo)—השלמ לב אנקדדס,—the Pentateuch, with a Hebrew commentary, etc. (Rödelheim. 1818-1821, 8vo). We have also from him a catalogue of his works, containing 800 in number, under the title of Heidenheim (Rödelheim, 1833, 8vo).—Furst, Bibl. Judaica, i, 369; Eidehoffer, Introduct. to Hebr. Lit. p. 422; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Heb. p. 69; Jost, Gesch. des Judenth. p. 361; Kittro, ii, 267. (J. H. W.)

Heifer (הָאָלֶף, eglah, fem. of בַּשֵׁל, calf). The name of the “heifer” is, in the Moab. and Par. texts, applied to the female of the ox, and in the Vulg. to the female of the bull. The Hebrew language has no expression that exactly corresponds to our “heifer,” for both eglah and parah are applied to cows that have calved (Isa. vi. 7-12; Job xxxi. 10; Isa. vii. 21); indeed, eglah means a young animal of any species, the full expression being נְבִיקָה, a "heifer of kind," (Deut. xxii. 3; 1 Sam. xvi. 2; Isa. vii. 21). The heifer or young cow was not commonly used for ploughing, but only for treading out the corn (Hos. xi. 1; but see Judg. xiv. 18), when it ran about without any headstall (Deut. xxii. 4); hence the expression "do not smite the heifer in the "backside," (Deut. xii. 20, 21). To which Israel is compared. A similar sense has been attached to the expression "calf of three years old," (Deut. xii. 20, 21), i. e. unweaned, in Isa. xv. 5. Jer. xlviii, 34; but it has by some been taken as a proper name, Eglah Shelachiyah, such names being not very uncommon. The sense of "distaste" is conveyed undoubtedly in Amos iv. 1. The comparison of Egypt to a "fair heifer" (Jer. xlvii. 20) may be an allusion to the well-known form under whichApis was worshipped (to which we may also refer the words in ver. 15, as understood in the Sept. "Why is the bullock (μουρος καλυπ- της) exempt away?"), the "destruction" threatened being the bite of the gad-fly, to which the word keros would aptly apply. "To plough with another man's heifer" (Judg. xiv. 18) implies that an advantage has been gained by unfair means. The proper names Eglah, Enqa'il, and Parah are derived from the Hebrew terms at the head of this article. See RED HEIFER.

Heilmann, JOHANN DAVID, a learned German theologian, was born at Osnabrick Jan. 18, 1727. He studied at Halle, became rector of Hameln in 1764, and professor of theology at Göttingen in 1754, where he died Feb. 28, 1780. He was the author of several pious works, the Specimen obser. ad illustr. N. T. (Halle, 1748, 4to)—Parrallele entw.rsp. irrijion d'evbngiualitb und die ancien adver.-I-V.---

Heilepfn, JACOB, a distinguished Jewish philologist and historian, flourished in the first part of the 18th century. He is said to have been born at Minden in 1728, but the time of his death is unknown. He wrote a History of the Jews, divided into three parts: Chronicles of Historic Events, from the Creation to his own time. 2. Alphabetical Catalogue of the 3. Miscellanies and Addenda. Heineccius, JOHANN MICHAEL, a Lutheran divine, was born at Eisenberg Dec. 12, 1674, and was educated at Jena, Frankfort, and Giessen. After a visit to Holland and Hamburg, he settled for a time in Heimsstadt as tutor (1695), but in 1699 he took up a benefice at Goslar. In 1709 he removed to Halle as pastor, and in 1720 was appointed consistorial counsellor and ecclesiastical inspector of the circle of the Saal (Staakkreis). He died Sept. 11, 1722. His chief work, Eigentliche und wahrhaftige Abildung der alten und neuen griechischen Kirche nach ihrer historischen und geschichtlichen Gliederung (Leipzig, 1711), presents historically the doctrines, government, liturgy, and morals of the Greek Church, ancient and modern. It is still a work of great value. Besides works in the departments of antiquities and history, Heineccius wrote Prüfung der sogenannten neuen Propheten und ihres ausserordentlichen Aufstandes (Halle, 1715), against the French prophet (q. v).—Send schreiben an Thomas Itig wegen des Termin Graft, on the Terminist controversy: —De Jurisconsult. Heinricke, SAMUEL, a German philanthropist, "the most distinguishing mark of the clergy of the Protestants in Germany," was born April 10, 1729, at Nautschitz, near Wissenfelde, in Prussia, and died at Leipzig April 30, 1770. He passed his early life as a farmer and soldier, then pursued a course of study in the University of Jena, was subsequently for ten years a tutor of the children of count Schimmelmann at Hamburg, and then removed to Eppendorf. In this latter place, as early as 1754, he became much interested in a deaf and dumb child, and devised a system of instruction for it, which proved so successful as to attract other deaf mute to him for instruction, and led to the establishment by the elector of Saxony in 1772 of a school at Leipzig for the education of deaf mutes. This school, "the first ever established or supported by the civil government," was placed under Heinricke's charge, was continued after his death under the charge of his widow, and is still existing and prosperous. The "method of instruction" was by articulation and repeating "lip," and is said to have been superior in some respects to that of the abbé de l'Epee. Heinricke's labors and noble character gained for him deservedly the affection of the German people, though his method of treatment was much ridiculed by the rabbinical schools. Some of his writings were marred by coarse and ill-natured criticisms of opinions differing from his own. He wrote upon the Heir (some form of the verb ἡρί, to possess; Gr. ηρίων, a receiver by lot). The Hebrew institutions relative to inheritance were of a very simple character. The patriarchal system, in which the property was divided among the sons of the legitimate wives (Gen. xxii, 10; xxiv, 36; xxxv, 5), a larger portion being assigned to one, generally the eldest, on whom devolved the duty of maintaining the females of the family. See Bertho. The sons of concubines were portioned off with presents (Gen. xlix, 1 sq.), but this may have been restricted to cases where the children had been adopted by the legitimate wife (Gen. xxx, 3). But Ja-ocab made the sons whom he had by his concubines heirs, as well as the others (Gen. xlix, 12-27). Moses laid no restrictions upon the choice of heirs in this respect, and we may infer that the sons of concubines, for the most part, received an equal share with the other sons, from the fact that Jephthah, the son of a concubine, complained that he was excluded from his father's house without any portion (Judg. i, 1-7). Daughters had no restrictions upon the choice of heirs, for...; a marriage property, consisting of a maid-servant (Gen. xxiv, 24, 29) or some other property. As a matter of special favor they sometimes took part with the sons (Job xiii, 15). The Mosaic law regulated the succession to the property of women. It was to be divided among the sons, the eldest receiving a double portion (Deut. xxii, 17), the others equal shares: if there were no sons, it went to the daughters (Numb. xxvii, 8), on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (Numb. xxvii, 6 sq.; Tob. vi, 12; vii, 13), otherwise the patrimony was forfeited (Josephus, Ant. iv, 7, 5). If there were no daughters, it went to the brother of the deceased; if no brother, to the paternal uncle; and, failing these, to the next of kin (Malachi, chap. iv, 9-11). In the case of a widow being left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her, and, in the event of his refusal, the next of kin (Ruth iii, 12, 13): with him rested the obligation of redeeming the inheritance. If it had been either sold or mortgaged: this obligation was termed ἱερὸν ἀνατίθημα ("the right of inheritance"), and was exercised in other cases besides that of marriage (Jer. xxxi, 7 sq.). If none stepped forward to marry the widow, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin. See Wawaw. The object of these regulations evidently was to prevent the alienation of the land, and to retain it in the same family: the Mosaic law enforced, in short, a strict entail. Even the assignment of the double portion, which under the patriarchal regime had been at the disposal of the father (Gen. xlviii, 22), was by the Mo-

Oasis, into the hands of the eldest son (Gen. xlviii, 17). The case of Achenas, to whom Caleb presented a field (Josh. xvi, 18, 19; Judg. i, 15), is an exception; but perhaps even in that instance the land reverted to Caleb's descendants either at the death of Achenas or in the year of Jubilee. The land being thus so strictly tied up, the notion of a temporal enjoyment being understood, it would be known to the Jews: succession was a matter of right, and not of favor—a state of things which is embodied in the Hebrew language itself, for the word ἱερόν (A.V. "to inherit") implies possession, and very often forcible possession (Deut. ii, 12; Judg. i, 29; xx, 24), and a similar idea lies at the root of the words ἱερός and ἱερίων, generally translated "inheritance." Testamentary dispositions were, of course, generally superstitious: the nearest approach to the idea is the blessing, which in early times conveyed temporal as well as spiritual benefits (Gen. xxvii, 19, 37; Josh. xvi, 19). It appears, however, that eventually the father had at least the right of expressing his last wishes or will in the presence of witnesses, and probably in the presence of the heirs (2 Kings xx, 13). The wills in the apostle Paul's writtings are borrowed from the usages of Greece and Rome (Heb. ix, 17), whence the custom was introduced into Judaea: several wills are noticed by Josephus in connection with the Herods (Ant. xiii, 10, 16; xviii, 2, 3; War, ii, 3, 2). With regard to personal property, it may be presumed that the owner had some authority over it, at all events during his life-time. The admission of a slave to a portion of the inheritance with the sons (Prov. xviii, 2), probably applies only to the personalty. A presentation of half the personally formed the marriage portion of To-bit's wife (Tob. viii, 21). A distribution of goods during the father's life-time is implied in Luke xvi, 11-13: a distinction may be noted between ὀικία, a general term applicable to personality, and Ἐπώκοιος, the landed property, which could only be divided after the father's death (Luk. xiv, 17). There is a striking resemblance between the Hebrew and Athenian customs of heirship, particularly as regards heiresses (ἱηθηγορος), who were, in both nations, bound to marry their nearest relation: the property did not vest in the females even for his life-time, but devolved upon the son of the deceased, and their sons, who also bore the name, not of his father, but of his matternal grandfather. The object in both countries was the same, viz. to preserve the name and property of evey family (Smith, Dict. of Class. Ant. a. v. Epicerius).

In Col. i, 15, Christ is called the "first-born of every creature," i.e. "the heir of the whole creation," as in Heb. i, 2 he is called the "heir of all things." Believers are called "heirs of the promise," "of righteousness," "of the kingdom," "of the world," "of God," "joint heirs with Christ," i.e. so-called partners of the blessings which God bestows upon his children, implying admission to the kingdom of heaven and its privileges (Gal. iii, 29; Heb. vi, 17; xi, 7; Jas. ii, 5; Rom. iv, 13; viii, 17), and finally possession of the heavenly inheritance (John xvii, 22-24; Rev. vii, 22). See ADOPTION.

Hel'ah (Heb. Chele'ah, תַּלָּא, "place of abundance," 2 Sam. x, 16; but in ver. 17, Chele'ah, תַּלָּא, with hé "directive," תַּלָּא המ at the end, Josephus Χελαώνας), for which the margin prefers תַּלָּא (Sept. Ablhá, Vulgate Helana), a place "beyond the river" (i.e. either east of the Jordan or west of the Ephraimites, although Josephus, Ant. viii, 6, 3, understands it to "near the Euphrates"). But it is better to accept the view of the Samaritans who put a city so named on the north side of the Euphrates), where David gained a victory over the combined forces of the Syrians under Hadadezer, apparently between Damascus and the country of the Ammonites. Edward (Isr. Geen, ii, 629) compares the Almahata (Ἀλμαχώτα) of Ptolomy (iii, 15, 29), on the west bank of the Euphrates near the mouth of the Phraates, but this is not probable.

Hel'bah (Heb. Chele'bah, תַּלָּב, "flatness; Sept. Ἐλ- βα in r. Χηλβα and Χιλβα), a town in the tribe of Asher, from which the Canaanites were not expelled. It is so named between Achzib and Aphihek (Judg. i, 31), but not (as Gesenius suggests) identical with Alalah, which is also mentioned in the same verse. Perhaps it was situated in some fertile tract (as the name implies) in the valley of the Kishon, possibly at the east.

Hel'bon (Heb. Chele'bon, תַּלָּבון, פַּי, i. e. fertile; Sept. Ἐλβόν in r. Χαλβόν), a name which occurs only in Ezek. xxi, 18, where "the wine of Helbon" is named among the commodities brought from Damascus to the great market of Tyre. The Syriac, Symmachus, the Chaldee, and the Vulgate, all regard the word as an appellative descriptive of the quality of the wine as piscus ramosus or vinum distinctum. But it is better to accept the indication of the Sept., which, by giving the proper name Χαλβόν, must be supposed to have had in view a place which has hence generally been inferred to be the same with that old city of Syria that appears under the form of Halab (Χαλβόν) in Ptolomy (Geo. v, 15) and Strabo (xv, 560). The latter authority assigns this Halabony as a place famous for wine; and in describing the luxury of the kings of Persia, he says they would have wheat brought from Assos in Zelia, Chalbonian wine out of Syria, and water from the Enlatus (the river Ula of Dan, viii, 2), which was the lightest of any. Both Hesychius and Plutarch (Vit. Alex. ii) speak of this famous wine. It has generally been thought that the name was derived from Halbon, where it was supposed the wine was produced. But it is not strange that Damascus should be represented as supplying the wine of Helbon to the marls of Tyre, if we consider that the native merchants themselves carry it thither. A passage which Bochart quotes from Athanasius (i, 51) throws light on this point: "The king of the Persians drank Chalbonian wine alone; which, says Poseidonius, was also produced in Damascus" (Bochart, Opp. ii, p. 496). We are thus led, both by the testimony of the Arabians and by that of Poseidonius, who was himself a native of Syria, to look for a Helbon or Halbon at or near Damascus. Senecus Nicator is said to have changed the name to Berea (Niceph. Callist. xiv, 39), but the old name, as we see from Plutarch, was not forgotten, and on the capture of the city by the Arabs in the 7th century it was again resumed (Schultens, Index Geogr. in vitam Saladiuin, i. e. Halemba). The city referred to has usually been identified with the modern Aleppo, a large city of Syria, called Helb by the Arabs; but Russel states (Natural Hist. of Aleppo, Lond. 1794, i, 80) that but little wine is made there, and that the white wines especially are poor and thin, and difficult to keep; nor has this place any pretension to celebrity for its vintages. Hence Prof. Hackett is inclined to adopt the suggestion made to him while visiting this region in 1852 by Dr. Paulding, one of the American missionaries there, that the Biblical Helbon should rather be sought in the ruins of one of the principal villages of the same name lying in the waste of Antipatris on the eastern slope of Anti-Lebanon, north of the Baramda. He was informed by those who had visited the place that the grapes produced there are remarkable for their fine quality, and that the wine obtained from them is regarded as the choicest wine of that part of Syria (Illustrations of Scripture, N. York, 1855, p. 214). Dr. Robinson, to whom he mentioned this suggestion, visited the place in his last journey to Palestine, and fully accords with the identification. He thus describes the valley and town: "Wady Helbon is a valley an hour or more in length, shut in by high and rugged sides. The bottom is a strip of level ground, everywhere well cultivated. Throughout the whole extent of the valley there are well-kept vineyards. Even places so steep that the vine-dresser can approach them with difficulty are made to produce an abundance of grapes. In Damascus the grapes are sold by estate proprietors and obtained flavor, and from them is made the best and most highly-priced wine of the country. The village of Helbon is nearly midway up the valley. There are many ruins in and around it, but mostly dilapidated; and hewn stones, capitals and pilasters, and broken columns are built into the walls of the modern dwellings. On the west of the village is an extensive ruin, supposed to have once been a temple. On some of the blocks are fragments of Greek inscriptions no longer legible" (new ed. of Researches, iii, 471, 472).

Helch'ia (Χαλκείας, 1 Esd. vii, 1) or Helchi'as (Χαλκίας, 2 Esd, i, 1), the Greek and Latin forms of the name of the high-priest Hilkiah (q. v.).

Hel'dai (Heb. Cheldai, צֶלֶדַי, worldly; Sept. Xekal, but οἶκος τοῦ Ἱλιασα in Zech. vi, 10; Vulg. Holida), the name of two men.

1. A Netophathite and descendant of Othniel, chief of the twelfth division (24,000) of David's forces (1 Chron. xxvi, 15). B.C. 1014. In 1 Chron. xi, 30 (where he is called Heldeo) his father's name is said to be Baanah; and in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxii, 29) he is called Heldai.

2. One of those lately returned from the Captivity whom the prophet Zechariah was directed to take with him when he went to crown the high-priest Joshua, as a symbol of the future Messiah's advent (Zech. vi, 10). B.C. 530. In ver. 14 the name is written Hellem.

Hel'dua, the first station mentioned in the Jerusalem Itinerary south of Berytus and north of Phophyreton; now probably khan el-Khudra (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 453).—Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 320.

Hel'eb (Heb. Chele'eb, תַּלָּב, "flatness; Sept. Ἐλεά, Vulg. Helaoz), son of Baanah the Netophathite, and one of David's warriors (2 Sam. vii, 30); elsewhere more correctly Helked (1 Chron. xi, 30), or, still better, Heldei (1 Chron. xxvi, 15).

Hel'ed (Heb. Che'ed, תַּלָּד, "this world, as thrasir; Sept. Ἐλεάς, Vulg. Helaoz, son of Baanah, a Netophathite, and one of David's warriors (2 Sam. vii, 30); called in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxii, 29) Heldei, but more accurately Heldei in 1 Chron. xxvi, 15.

Hel'ek (Heb. Chele'ek, תַּלָּא, a portion, as Sept. Χαλβεὶς and Χαλβα, Vulg. Helaoz), the second son of Gilead of the tribe of Manasseh (Jos. xvii, 28), whose descendants were called Helkites (Hebrew Cheleki, תַּלָּכֵי, etc., Num. xxvi, 30; Sept. Xalekai). B.C. cir. 1612.

Hel'ekite (Num. xxvi, 30). See HELEK.

He\'lem, the name of one or two men, variously written in the Hebrew.

1. He\'lem (הצֵּלֶם, a stroke; Sept. 'Ελαμ, Vulg. He\'lem), a brother of Shemer (or Shemiram) and great-grandson of Judah. The number of sons of whose are enumerated in 1 Chron. vii. 35; perhaps the same with Hotham, ver. 32. B.C. prob. cir. 1608.

2. Che\'lem (כְּלֶם), in Chaldæa a dream, as often in Dan.; or robust; Sept. או כְּפַרוֹנְתָּא כִּרֹת, Vulg. Helen), one of those associated with Zechariah in the typical crowning of the high-priest, or, as it appears, himself also crowned (Zechar. vi. 14, "Heled," prob. by emendation of Heled or Helvel, ver. 10), he was actuated by deep earnestness, a childlike piety, and a kindly spirit. He preached in both the German and English languages. (H. H.)

HELEN

He\'len(a)\'na, a minister of the German Reformed Church, and son of Rev. J. C. A. He\'lenstein, was born March 29, 1781. He spent his youth as a printer, and afterwards studied theology with Rev. Dr. Becker, of Baltimore, Md. He was licensed and ordained in the German Reformed Church in May, 1801, and was pastor successively at Allemang, Berks County, Pa.; Goshenhoppen, Montgomery County, Pa.; Ephrata, Lancaster County, Pa.; Hanover and Berlin, York County, Pa.; Lockingham County, Pa.; and Mechanicsburg, Cumberland County, Pa. He died Oct. 18, 1842, leaving a large family, with which many innocent eccentricities, he was actuated by deep earnestness, a childlike piety, and a kindly spirit. He preached in both the German and English languages. (H. H.)

HELENSTEIN, John Conrad Albert, one of the fathers of the German Reformed Church in the United States, was born at Mönchengladbach, Germany, Oct. 27, 1748. He studied theology at the University of Heidelberg, and was sent by the Synod of Holland, in company with Rev. J. H. Helferich and Rev. J. G. Gebhard, as missionaries to America. He arrived in New York Jan. 14, 1772, and soon after took charge of the congregation at Germantown, Pa., and remained there until 1778, when he returned to his native country, and labored there until his death, May 17, 1790. He was an eloquent and successful preacher, and his ministry, both at Lancaster and Germantown, proved a great blessing. Several small volumes of his sermons have been published. (Harbaugh, Fathers of the Reformed Church, ii. 222 sq.)

HELENSTEIN, John Henry, a minister of the German Reformed Church in the United States, was born at Mosbach, Palatinate, Oct. 22, 1739. After studying theology, he was licensed Sept. 22, 1761, and labored for a time in his own country. In January, 1772, he arrived in New York as a missionary, together with Rev. J. C. A. He\'lenstein and Rev. J. G. Gebhard, and remained after the Revolution at Westober, Lehigh County, Pa., where his labors comprehended as many as seven congregations at one time. Here he remained, declining all calls from other churches, and labored faithfully until his death, Dec. 5, 1810. "During his ministry Mr. Hel\'enstein baptised 5630, and confirmed 4000 souls. He may be regarded as the father of the German Reformed Church in the field over which his labors extended. Though that part of the Church did not escape the general stagnation of a later period through German rationalism and indifference, yet the vestige-ground upon which it was placed, by means of his labors, has been a blessing to it down to our day."—Harbaugh, Fathers of the Reformed Church, ii. 241 sq.)

HELFERICH, John, a son of Rev. John Henry Hel\'ferich, was born in Weissenberg, Lehigh County, Pa., Jan. 17, 1755. He completed his theological studies with Rev. Dr. Samuel He\'lenstein in 1801. He was licensed and ordained in 1819. He became pastor of the same congregations in Lehigh County, Pa., which his father had served for many years, in which field he continued to labor with much zeal and success to the end of his life. He died suddenly, April 8, 1832. During his ministry he baptised 4501, and received into full communion with the Church, by confirmation, be-between two and three thousand persons. He preached out of the German language. (H. H.)

He'li, or rather Eli (Eli', in some ed. 'Hali) or Ha'li, Heb. נֶאֶל, a name that occurs once in the N. T. and once in the Apocrypha.

1. The third of three names inscribed between Achitob and Amarias in the genealogy of Ezra, in 2 Esd. i, 2, for which there is no corresponding name in the Heb. list (Ezra vii, 2, 3).

Hell'as, the Latin form (2 Esd. vii, 89) of the name of the prophet ElijaH.

HeiIo'dorus (Ἡλιόδορος, i. e. gift of the sun, not unfrequent Greek name), the treasurer (Ο ἵδι τῶν ἱερομαντών) of Seleucus Philopator, who was commissioned by the king, at the instigation of Apollonius (v. c), to carry away the private treasures deposited in the Temple at Jerusalem. According to the narrative in 2 Macc. iii, 9 sq., he was stayed from the execution of his design by a "great apparition" (τινάς ανάμονας), in consequence of which he fell down "hidden in great darkness," and speechlessness. He was afterwards restored at the intercession of the high-priest Onias, and bore witness to the king of the inviolable majesty of the Temple (2 Macc. iii. i). The full details of the narrative are not supported by any other evidence. Josephus, who was acquainted with 2 Macc., takes no notice of it (Ant. xi, 3, 8) ; and the author of the so-called iv Macc. attributes the attempt to plunder the Temple to Heliordus, and differs in his account of the miraculous interposition, though he distinctly recognizes it (De Macc. 4, πέφυγω στὴν ἑορτάσαν έλεγχον . . . κατασκεύαζον ετί ἔφασεν ο Απόλλωνις . . .). Heliordus afterwards murdered Seleucus, and made an unsuccessful attempt to seize the Syrian crown (App. Syr. 46). B.C. 173. Comp. Wernsdorf, De fide Lbr. Macc. § lv. Raffles's great picture of "Heliordus" has often been copied on the engraving.

HeiLo'dorus of Emeza, in Syria, flourished in the latter part of the 4th century after Christ. He was the author of the celebrated romance entitled Αθηνόποικ, or account of the love and adventures of Theogenes and Charicles, the oldest and best of the Greek romances, and the model of many subsequent ones. A letter attributed to Heliodore afterwards Heliordus became a Christian, and was made bishop of Tricosa, in Sicily, where he introduced the regulation that every married priest should, upon his ordination, separate from his wife or be divorced (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. v, 22). Nicophorus states (Hist. Eccl. v, 54) that a provincial synod, because of the injurious tendency of the Αθηνόποικ upon the minds of the young, decreed that Heliordus should either condemn and disown it, or resign his bishopric. This statement is generally rejected as improbable, since it is made by no other author, and the Αθηνόποικ contains nothing of a corruptive tendency. The best edition of the Greek text is that by Corcos (Paris, 1804, 2 vols. 8vo).—Smith, Diet. Grk. and Rom. Bioog. and Mythology, ii, 373; Dunlop, Hist. of Fiction (London, 1845, 1 vol. 8vo), p. 18-24; Phoebus, Cod. 73; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, v, 699. (J. W. M.)

Helio'galabauus (Ela'galabauus), emperor of Rome, was born at Emesa about A.D. 295. His name was va'rus Auitus Bassianus, but he was made priest of Elagabalus (El-Gabal), the Syro-Phoenician Sun-god, about A.D. 217, and took that name. In May, 218, through the intrigues of his mother, Julia Messa, with the soldiers, he deposed the proclaimed emperor; and, soon after, Marcinia, who was marching to put down this usurpation, was defeated. His reign, which lasted not quite four years, was characterized by superstition, licentiousness, and cruelty to a degree hardly rivalled by the worst Roman emperors. He introduced the worship of the Sun-god into Rome, and even passed a decree that no other celestial power should be worshipped. The praetorius slew him in camp, A.D. 222. As he himself introduced a new religion into Rome, it was not his policy to persecute, and so, during that time, the Christians had "rest."

Hel'ki'as (Heb. Chelok'ay), יְהוֹשֵׁעׁ, for יְהוֹשֵׁעׁ, Jehohra in his portion; Sept. Ἰφαὶ, son of Merioth, and one of the chief priests in the time of the high-priest Joia'kim (Neh. xii, 15). B.C. post 588.

Hel'kath (Heb. Chelatkit'h, יְהוֹשֵׁע'ת,' יְהוֹשֵׁע'ת, Josh. xix, 55, but יְהוֹשֵׁע'ת, even without pause-accent, Josh. xxi, 31; "construct of יְהוֹשֵׁע'ת, smoothness, as in Gen. xxvii, 16, or por'tion, as in Gen. xxxiii, 19, etc.; Sept. Xeïl(e)52), a town of Asher, on the eastern border, mentioned as the starting-point in the direction (apparently southward) to Achealph (Josh. xix, 25); assigned as one of the Levitical cities (Josh. xxi, 31). In 1 Chron. vi, 75, it appears to be erroneously written Hukok. See HUKKOK. In the Onomasticon it is simply mentioned by Eusebius as Ελικάν, by Jerome as Elocath; but neither seems to have known it. De Sauly claims to identify it with a village called Kerkhe, which he reports not far south-east of Akka (Narratives, l, 68) ; and Schwarzs (Palestine, p. 191) thinks that it may be the modern El-rak, about seven miles north-east of Akka; but neither of these positions is in the neighborhood indicated by the text, which rather requires a locality nearer the north-eastern angle of the tribe, not unlikely at the ruined village Ukrit, about twelve miles S.E. of Tyre, as proposed by Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 220). See HELKAT-HUKKOK.

Hel'kath-has'urim (Heb. Chelkath's hate-Turim', יְהוֹשֵׁע'ת הַהַטַּעְרִים, plot of the rocks), a designation of the plain just below the pool of Gibeon, on the east, acquired from the deadly combat between twelve of Ishbosheth's men and as many of David's, which formed a prelude to the general engagement (2 Sam. ii, 16). See HUKKOK. As to the name, "Ewald approves the reading which the Sept. seem to have followed, Ἰάολος τίνος σπηλαίων, apparently from their reading Σπήλαις, as that which alone gives a suitable meaning to the name (Gesch. ii, 1, 275, note 1).GENENUS renders 'the field of swords,' which can hardly be admitted; for, though ἱμερός is used in the sense of an 'edge,' it is never used simply for 'sword.' First gives Φεσελακάθητη, 'rock—smoothness,' as the meaning, the place being smooth and level as a surface of rock. Aquila gives ἄλαος τῶν σπηλαίων, and the Vulg. 'Ager roburatorum, takingUNC in a figurative sense, of which, however, there is no other instance.

Hel'ki'as (Xa'kius), a still different Greek form (1 Esd. i, 8) of the name of the high-priest HILKIAH.

Hell, a term which originally corresponded more exactly to Hades, being derived from the Saxon hailen, to cover, and signifying merely the covered, or invisible place—the habitation of those who have gone from this visible terrestrial region to the world of spirits. But it has been so long appropriated in common usage to the place of future punishment for the wicked, that its earlier meaning has been lost sight of. In the English Bible it is used in the wider sense.

1. Hebrew and Greek Terms.—The three words, which all but monopolize the subject, are ΥΔΝ, Sheol, in the O. T.; and Αύη, Hades, and Πάνω, Gehenna, in the N. T. ΥΔΝ occurs 63 times; in 61 of these it is rendered in the Sept. by Αύη; twice by θέλων (2 Sam. xxii, 14); and twice once by θέλω in the common text (Job xxvi, 19; Ezek. xxxix, 21). In the Vulg. ΥΔΝ is translated 48 times by Infernus, and 17 times by Infernus[a mostly Inferi (plur.)]. In our A. V. it is represented 31 times by Grave, 31 times by Hell, and 8 times by Pit. In the N. Test. our word Hell occurs 28 times; 12 times it stands for Infernus, and in the other 3 has been translated, as Tischendorf and Bruder (Concord.) on Rev. iii, 7) for Αύη. The Vulg.
allows the learned authors of Liddell and Scott’s Greek Lex. [s.v. Ἀδησ] throw some doubt on this view of the origin of the word, because of its aspirated beginning, in Attic Greek. But surely this is precarious ground. Is it certain that even in the Hellenistic period ἀδησ was invariably aspirated? Ἐφεσιος [Sept. c. Theb. (Paley) 810] has ἀδησ προίφασις [with the loan], according to the best editing. It is true that this is in a chorus, but in the ἄγμα, 1605, also a chorale line, we read μην ἐν Ἀδω μεταλιθησθεν [with the aspirate], as if the usage were uncertain. Possibly in the elliptical phrase ἐν Ἀδω [soil ἀδησ] the aspirate occurs because the genitive is really the name of the God [not of the region, which might, for distinction, have been then unaspirated]. Phthisar accordingly explains it by αἰσθε καὶ ἀδησον [De Ind. et Ost. p. 382], and in the Ἕβρων Ἀδησ ἄγμα is defined as χωμάτων ἀδησ, στερεάν αὐκίνων ἀδησ φοινικιοι. Ἀδων is thus "the invisible place or region?" Locus invisus nostris subterraneus, as Grotius defines it.

3. Ἐφεσιος (Ἐφεσία) is composed of the two Heb. words הַוָּשְׁא (valley) and בַּיִלְת (Himmon, the name of the proprietor of the valley). In the Sept. Παρασεία is used in Jos. xliii. 6, to account for the valley mentioned as Παρασεία ἄγμα, the full expression of which is ἡ Παρασεία ἄγμα. The shorter appellation ἄγμα occurs in the same verse. The Rabbinical writers derive ἄγμα from ἄγγος, quarire [zu grom or morn, in Ezek. xxiv. 33], as if indicative of the cries of the children in the horrid rites of the Moch-boat worship (see Buxtorf, Lex. Rab. p. 108; Glassiaw [ed. Dathan], Philolog. Sacii, i. 806). The etymological remarks have paved our way to the next section of our subject.

(11.) Biblical Meaning of these Three Terms.—1. Meanings of ἄγμα, Sheol.—(1.) The "Grave." Much controversy has arisen whether within the meaning of Sheol should be included "the grave," indeed this is the only question of difficulty. The fact, which we have already stated, that our A.V. translates ἄγμα quite as often by "grave" as by the general term "hell," supplies a prima facie reason for including it. Without, however, insisting on the probability that polemical theology, rather than Biblical science, influenced our translators, at least occasionally, in their rendering of the word, we may here adduce on the other side the telling fact that the other of all the ancient versions not one translates in any passage the Hebrew Sheol by the equivalent of grave. The other of the ancient versions, like the versions in the midst of the fragments show (see Origin, Hexaplia, passim), everywhere give ἄδησ for ἄγμα (sometimes they use for the locative case the older and better phrase σιγ., in Ἀδων, sometimes the more recent and vulgar σιγ. τον Ἀδων, in τον Ἀδω), The Samaritan text in the seven passages of the Pentateuch has either בַּיִלְת (Sid) or בַּיִלְת. Onkelos and Jonathan everywhere, except in five passages, retain בַּיִלְת. The Peshito everywhere in both Testaments renders the Hebrew Sheol and the Greek Ἰδαιος by בַּיִלְת [Sheol]; and, as we have already seen, the Vulg. translates the same words in both the O.T. and the N.T. by infernum (plur. Inferni mortalium) and, above all, Infernus (see above for particulars). It is to the later Targumists (the pseudo-Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum), and afterwards to the Rabbinical doctors of the Middle Ages, that we trace the version of the "sepulchre" and "the grave" (thus in Gen. xxxvii. 85; xliii. 38; xlviii. 79. 31), these Targumists rendered Sheol by בַּיִלְת [the house of burial]; similarly did they render Πειλις, 7; Job vii. 9; xlv. 13; xviii. 14; 13, 16; xxi. 13; Eccles. ix. 10, and other passages, in which it is observable how often they have been followed by our translators). See, for more information on this point, archbishop Usher, Works [by Elrington], iii. 310-321; see also, to fully, Böttcher (p. 158), who cites, sec. 184 (149), who quotes Kashi and Aban Ezen [on Gen. xxvii, 2]. or digging down in the earth; but every place besides a man's body lieth either entire or as parts; otherwise they which are not committed to burial, nor laid in graves, but have ended their life in shipwrecks, deserts, and such like ways, should not seem to be reckoned among those which are said to be raised from the grave'.

We have here, then, the first meaning of the Hebrew בְּנֵי נֶבֶל, largely applied, as we have seen, in our A. V. to "the grave," considered as a universal sense of the grave, as in the last note), commensurate with death itself as to the extent of its signification. (Comp. "the grave and gate of death" of the English Liturgy, Collect for Easter Even.) Though we carefully exclude the artificial grave, or בְּנֵי נֶבֶל, from this category, there is no doubt, as bishop Lowth has well shown (De Sacra Poesi Hebr. Proli. vii. ed. Oxon. with notes of Michaellis and Rosenmüller, 1821). p. 65-69), that the Hchrewe poets drew all the imagery with which they describe the state and condition of the dead from the funeral rites and pomp, and from the vaulted sepulchres of their great men. The bishop's whole treatment of the subject is quite in the worth perusal; he only uses his final summary: "You will see this transcendent imagery better and more completely displayed in that noble triumphal song which was composed by Isaiah (xiv. 4-27) ... previous to the death of the king of Babylon. Ezekiel has also grandly illustrated the same sense by the machinery of the last prophecy concerning the fall of Pharaoh (xxxii. 18-29)."

For an excellent vindication of the A. V. in many of its translations of the grave, we refer the reader to the treatise of archbishop Usher (Answer to the Jesuit's Challenge, Works [ed. Ellington], iii. 319-342 and 329-340). We doubt not that, if grave is an admissible sense of בְּנֵי נֶבֶל, our translators have, on the whole, made a judicious selection of the passages that will best bear the sense: their purpose was a popular one, and they accomplished it, in the instance of uncertain words and phrases, by giving them the most intelligible turn they would bear, as in the case before us. We undertake not to decide whether it would be better to leave the broad and generic word Sheol, as the great versions of antiquity did, everywhere; whether, e. g., Jacob's lament (Gen. xxxvi. 35; xlii. 38) and like passages would be more suitably, if not correctly, rendered by the simple retention of the original word. The question is equally involved in the force in the observation often made (see Corn. a Lapide, on Gen. xxxvii. 35; Bellarmine and others, aduced by Leigh, Crit. Sacra, i. 299) that it was not the grave of Joseph which Jacob meant, for he thought indeed that his son was devoured of wild beasts, and not buried." See more on this passage in Pearson, Creed [ed. Chevalier], p. 437; Fulke, Translations, etc., p. 814; both of whom writers defend the version of grave. Ainsworth ad loc. (among the older commentators) and Knobel (among the moderns) contend for the general word של in [Knobel, Schottentrich]. Rosenmüller learnedly states both views, and leans in favor of שֶׁׁמֶל muti moriuminar star devastum (Schol. i. 576).

(2) The other meaning of בְּנֵי נֶבֶל, "Hell," so rendered in thirty-one passages of A. V., according to the more ancient and, as it seems to us, preferable opinion, makes it local, i.e. the place of disembodied spirits. (orious & tius hēmis mere διώκειν ἀμφότεροι καὶ ἀνώτατος, o τὸς μακρὸς ημῶν ἁμαρτίας τεταρτάς ἵδονας, Ἀπόκ. Cesareus in Apocal. c. 63.) A later opinion surpasses the word to indicate "not the place where souls departed are, but the state and condition of the dead, or their permission in death," as bishop Pearson calls it (Cred [ed. Chevalier], p. 495). On this opinion, which that the great divine "not admit" of a full "loci definitio," we shall say nothing more than that it is at best only a deduction from the foregoing local definition. That definition we have stated in the broadest terms, because in reference to Dr. Barrow's enumeration (Serm, on the Creed [Art. "He descended into Hell"], Works [Oxford, 1880], p. 416, 417] of the questions which have arisen on the subject before us, we believe that Holy Scripture warrants the most ample of all the positions suggested by that eminent writer, to the effect that the Shoel of Hades is "the place of good and happy souls," or that of bad and miserable ones, but "indifferently and in common of both those.

We propose to arrange the Biblical passages so as to describe, first, the state of the occupants of Shoel, and, secondly, the locality of it, in some of its prominent features. As to the first point, Shoel is (a) the receptacle of the spirits of all that depart this life. (Among the scriptural designations of the inhabitants of Shoel is מַּיְצֵל (in Prov. xxvi, 16) is rendered "congregation of the dead" (or "departed") in the A. V. This is better than the Sept. rendering συναγωγή γειώντων, and Vulg. "coetus gignantum." There is force in the word מַיְצֵל thus applied, derived from the use of the word to designate the great "congregation" of the Jewish nation; see CONGREGATION.

For the use of the word מַיְצֵל, as applicable to the dead, see especially Böttcher, De Int., p. 348, etc. The word מַיְצֵל also occurs in the grand passage of Isa. xiv. [In ver. 9 "Shoel stirs up its Riphaim on the entrance of the spirit of the king of Babylon." ריפאים is met with in six other places in the same sense of departed spirits. It is connected withINED, "weak," which occurs in Numm. xiii, 18, and other passages [see Firsts, Hebr. W.-b, i, 388]. The gentile noun [mentioned in Gen. xiv, 5 and elsewhere, and rendered Riphaim and Giants] is of the same form, but probably of a different origin [see Gesenius, Thes. p. 1309.]. This general signification appears from Psa. lxxxix, 47, 48, and Isa. xxxviii, 18, 19 (in which latter verse the opposition in its universal sense between Shoel and the state of life in this world is to be observed). We do not hesitate, with archbishop Usher (Works, iii, 319), to translate לְיֵצְל in these passages "hell" or "sheol," instead of "grave," as in the A. V. Shoel, therefore, is (b) the abode of the wicked, Num. xxxii, 18; Job xxiv, 19; Psa. ix, 17 (Hebr. 18); xxxii, 17 (18); Prov. v, 5; ix, 18; Isa. lvi, 9; and (g) of the good [both in their "embodied" condition] in Psa. xvi, 10, comp. with Acts ii, 27, 31; Psa. xxx, 3 (4); xlix, 15 (16); lxxvi, 13; Isa. xxxv, 17, compared with Job, xxx, 14; Hos. xi, 14; with 1 Cor. xv, 55. With regard to the second point, touching some local features of Shoel, we find it described as very deep (Job xi, 8); dark (Job x, 21, 22); (yet confest and open to the eye of God, Job xxvi, 6); with "valleys" (Gesenius, Thes. p. 1549) or depths of various gradations (Psa. lxxvi, 18; compared with Deut. xxxii, 22); Prov. ix, 18; with bars (Job xvi, 17, comp. with Jon. ii, 6) and gates (Isa. xxxviii, 10); minister before us; hence the dead are said "to go down" יֵלֵד to Shoel, Num. xvi, 30, 33; Ezek. xxxi, 15, 16, 17 (compared with Job vii, 9; Gen. xii, 30). Comp. Josephus (Ant. xvii, 1, 9), who, when describing the tenets of the Jewish sects, attributes to the Pharisees the belief of a future state, in which "rewards and punishments" are to be dealt out "to men in their disembodied state" (רַחֲבָא צַעַדְתֵּא) "under the earth" (יוֹם צוֹרָהָא דַּעַסִיָּאָאָא נאֶא הָאָא דַּעַסִיָּאָא נאֶא הָאָא דַּעַסִיָּאָא נאֶא הָאָa לוֹא נאֶא הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa הָa Hades (in Greek) is devoted to the happy happiness of Hades, but embraces in certain passages the ultimate blessedness of heaven, so there is no violence in supposing that Геенна (from the final signification which it possibly bears in Matt. v, 29, 30; xxiii, 15, equivalent to the Тηράσος referred to by Peter, 2 Epist. ii, 4, as the place where the fallen are reserved unto judgment, or "until sentence," comp. Jude v, 6) goes on to mean, in perhaps most of its occurrences in the N. T., the final condition of the lost, as in Matt. xxxiii, 33, where the expression ἡ κρίσις τῆς γέινσις probably means the condemnation [or sentence] to Gehenna as the ultimate doom. See GEHENNA.

IV. Synonymous Words and Phrases.—Most of these are given by Eisenmenger, Entdeckte Juden, i, 294, and Galatians, De Arcanis, vi, 7, 345.) 1. טּוֹבֶד, Dumah, in Psa. cxxv, 17, where the phrase הָיֵצִכֶל "all that go down into silence," in the Sept. παντὸς ὁ αἰματρικοῦ ἡ τίνις γέινσις, while the Vulg. has omnes qui descendunt in infernum (comp. Psa. cxxv, 17). 2. אֲבַדְדָּה, in Job xxvi, 5, is in poetical apposition with לְיֵצְל.
HELL

(comp. Prov. xxvii. 20 [Kethib], where ה is in conjunction with ב, forming an hendiadys for destructive hell; Sept. אֲדֹנָי וּאֱלֶהוֹ; Vulg. Infernus et persidio; A.V. "hell and destruction"). 3. הָרָעָץ, Beir Shadon, Psal. iv. 24; A.V. "pit of destruction;" Sept. פּוֹרִי לְהַר שָׁדְוָה; Vulg. Patet interita (see also passages in which הָרָעָץ and הָרָעָץ occur separately). 4. הָרָעָץ, Tadmor, with or without בּ, in Ps. cvi. 10, and other passages; Sept. Σατια Σατία, Vulg. Umbra mortis; A.V. "shadow of death." 5. הָרָעָץ, Tachyphyl Eres, in Is., xlii. 23; A.V. "lower parts of the earth" [Shod or Hades, Gesen.]; Sept. Τού ταύτης τῆς γης τρόχαν. 6. loc. cit., 20, 26, etc., where the phrase is inverted, הָרָעָץ הָרָעָץ, of similar meaning is הָרָעָץ הָרָעָץ; Ps. cxxxvii. 6 (7). 7. הָרָעָץ, Topothè, in Is., xxx. 33 [according to Eisenhenger]; for another application of this word, see Genesis, Thee, s.v.; and Rosenmuller, ad loc. The phrase first used of Abraham, Gen. xxxv. 8 (where it occurs, in the solemn description of the holy patriarch's end, when between death and burial), "He was gathered to his fathers;" it expresses the transition of the soul to Hades to the company of those who preceded him thither (see Cajan, ad loc., and Gesen. Thees. s.v. נֵפֶשׁ [Niphal], p. 131, col. 1). 8. To σκότως το τι ζωήν, the "outer darkness" of Matt. viii. 12, and pass.; refers probably to what Josephus (War, iii. 25) calls φύλακες κοιλωσίας, "the darker Hades." 9. Ecclesiastical Statements as to the Condition of Those in Hell. The dreadful nature of the abode of the wicked is implied in various figurative expressions, such as "outer darkness," "I am tormented in this flame," "furnace of fire," "unquenchable fire," "where the worm dieth not," "the blackness of darkness," "torment in fire and brimstone," "the ascending smoke of their torment," "the lake of fire that burneth with brimstone," etc. (Matt. xi. 12; xiii. 42; xxi. 13; xxx. 30; Luke xvi. 24; comp. Matt. xvi. 4; Mark ix. 43-48; Jude 13; comp. Rev. xiv. 10, 11; xix. 20, xx. 14, xxi. 8). The figure by which hell is represented as burning with fire and brimstone is probably derived from the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah, as well as that which describes the smoke as ascending from it (comp. Rev. xiv. 10, 11, with Gen. xix. 24, 28). To this coincidence of description Peter also most probably alludes in 2 Pet. ii. 6. See Fines.

The names which in many of the other instances are given to the punishments of hell are doubtless in part figurative, and many of the terms which were commonly applied to the subject by the Jews are retained in the New Testament. The images, it will be seen, are generally taken from death, capital punishments, tortures, prisons, etc. And it is the obvious design of the sacred writers, in using such figures, to awaken the idea of something terrible and fearful. They mean to teach that the punishments beyond the grave will excite the same feelings of distress as are produced on earth by the objects employed to represent them. We are so little acquainted with the state in which we shall be hereafter, and with the nature of our future body, that no strictly literal representation of such punishments could be made intelligible to us. Many of the Jews, indeed, and many of the Christian fathers, took the terms employed in Scripture in an entirely literal sense, and supposed there would be actual fire, etc., in hell. But from the words of Christ, who, as the apostles nothing more can with certainty be inferred than that they meant to denote great and unending miseries.

The punishments of sin may be distinguished into two classes: 1. Natural punishments, or such as necessarily follow a life of servitude to sin. 2. Positive punishments, or such as God shall see fit, by his sovereign will, to inflict.

1. Among the natural punishments we may rank the privation of eternal happiness (Matt. vii. 21, 28; xxii. 18; xxxv. 41; compare 2 Thess. i. 9); the painful sensations which are the natural consequence of committing sin, and of an impendent heart; the propensities to sin, the evil passions and desires which in this world fill the human heart, and which are doubtless carried into the world to come. The company of fellow-sinners, and of evil spirits, as the natural results of such conditions, may be accounted among the natural punishments, and must prove not the least grievous of them.

2. The positive punishments have already been indicated. It is to these chiefly that the Scripture directs our attention. "There are but few men in such a state that the mere nature of the natural punishments will appear to them terrible enough to deter them from the commission of it." Experience also shows that to threaten positive punishment has far more effect, as well upon the cultivated as the uncultivated, in deterring them from crime, than to announce, and lead men to expect, the merely natural consequences of sin, be they ever so terrible. Hence we may see why it is that the New Testament says so little of natural punishments (although these, beyond question, await the wicked), and makes mention of them in particular far less frequently than of positive punishments; and why, in those passages which treat of the punishments of punishment, and images are constantly employed as suggest and confirm the idea of positive punishments" (Knapp's Christian Theology, § 156.

As the sins which shut out from heaven vary so greatly in quality and degree, we should expect from the justice of God a corresponding variation both in the natural and the positive punishments. This is accordingly the uniform doctrine of Christ and his apostles. The more knowledge of the divine law a man possesses, the more his opportunities and inducements to avoid sin, the stronger his incentives to faith and holiness set before him, the greater will be his punishment if he fails to make a faithful use of these advantages. "The servant who knows his lord's will and does it not, deserves to be beaten with many stripes." "To whom much is given, of him much will be required" (Matt. x. 15; 21, 22, 24; xxi. 15, 16; Luke xii. 48). Here Jesus says that the heathen who acted against the law of nature would indeed be punished; but that the Jews would be punished more than they, because they had more knowledge (Rom. ii. 9-29). In this conviction that God will, even in hell, justly proportion punishment to sin, we must rest satisfied. We cannot now know the precise degree; the precise degrees, as well as the precise nature of such punishments, are things belonging to another state of being, which in the present we are unable to understand. For a naturalistic view of the subject, with a copious review of the literature, see Alger, Doctrine of a Future Life (Bost. 1860). For the theological treatment of this topic, see HELL. PUNISHMENTS.

HELL, CHRIST'S DESCENT INTO (descensus ad inferos; κατάβασις εἰς ᾠδῶν), a phrase used to denote the doctrine taught, or supposed to be taught, in the fifth article of the Apostles' Creed.

1. History of the Clause.—The clause is not found in the Nicæo-Constantinopolitan Creed (A.D. 381), nor in any creed before that date. Pearson states that it was not "so anciently used in the Church" as the rest of the Apostles' Creed; and that it first appears in the Creed of Aquileia, 4th century, in the words of the Apollinarist Theodoret, in the Insermo, King, in his Histor. Symbol. Apost. c. iv, asserts that it was inserted as a testimony against Apollinarianism; but this view is controverted by Whenge in his Commentatio on this article of the Creed (1836). It is certain, however, that the clause was afterwards used by the orthodox as an argument against the Apollinarian heresy which denied to Christ a rational human soul (see Neander, Church History, Torrey's ed., ii, 438). Rufinus (+ 410), while stating that it is found in the Creed of Aquileia, denies that it existed before that time in the Creed as used in the Roman or Eastern churches. Rufinus adds that "though the Roman and Oriental churches had not the words, yet they had the sense of them in the word buried," implying that the words "he descended into Hades" are equivalent to "he descended into the grave." Socrates, Hist. Eccl. ii, 37, 41, gives it as stated in the Arian church to have been recited at Sinope in 390. It is given in the Athanasian Creed (8th century). It fails to be found, except in the Arian church and in a few MSS., before the 6th century, but became quite common in the 7th, and is universal after the 8th century (Pearson, The Creed, 271). It is also found in the Apostles' Creed as used in the Greek and Roman churches, the Lutheran Church, and the Church of England. It is also retained in the Creed as used by the Protestant Episcopal Church, with a note in the rubric to "any churches may omit the words He descended into hell, or may, instead of them, use the word present in the place of departed spirits, which are considered as of the same meaning in the Creed." The clause was omitted by the Convention of 1785, but the English bishops objecting, it was replaced, with the qualification named, after a great deal of discussion in 1786, 1787; and 1792, when White, "He descended into Hades," was added, at Ottawa, in 1792, of the Protestant Episcopal Church (Munnscher, in Bib. Sac. April, 1850). It is omitted in the Creed as used by the Methodist Episcopal Church.

II. The Doctrine.—I. Scripture.—There is no passage in which it is expressly stated that Christ descended into hell, but there are expressions which, in some sense or other, imply his descent. After his death, into the "place of departed spirits." (1) Thus David says (Ps. xcvii, 9, 10): "Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth; my flesh also shall rest in hope. For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." (2) And Peter applies this passage to Christ (Acts ii, 22-25): "For David speaketh concerning him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face; for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved: therefore did I set my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad; moreover also my flesh shall rest in hope: because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." (3) (2 Peter iii, 5-8) ("Now he ascended," etc.), is supposed by some writers to imply the descent into Hades, but the better interpreters apply it to the incarnation. (3) Paul, in Rom. vi, 23 ("Who shall descend into the deep, etc."—"who shall descend into Hades"), speaks of the descent of Christ into the abyss. (4) 1 Pet. iii, 18-20: "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit: by which he was also made partaker of the glory in promise, and because he suffered and was put to death in the flesh, that in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water." This passage is relied on by many, not only as strongly asserting that Christ descended into Hades, but also as explaining the object of that descent. But the weight of interpretation, from Augustine downwars, seems to be against this view. Dr. A. Schweitzer, in a recent monograph (Hinwendung zur Hölle als Mythos, etc., Zurich, 1898, p. 43), interprets the passage to mean that the preaching of the word was "addressed to the spirit imprisoned in the days of Noah, while they were yet in the flesh; and this preaching consisted, to a great extent, in the building of the ark. By this work, undertaken at the command of the Spirit of Christ, and prosecuted, through many years, to completion in the sight of the people, they were warned to remove themselves in the ark, in the days of Noah, while the last flood swept them away" (Quarterly Review, July, 1893, p. 384). This view accords with that held by Augustine, Aquinas, Scaliger, Beza, Gerhard, Hammond, Leighton, and others, and which has of late been adopted by Dr. Hofmann (Schriftenwerke, ii, 1, 335), of the influence of the pre-existent Spirit of Christ at the time of the Deluge. It is also the interpretation of the passage given by Dr. A. Clarke (Comm. on 1 Pe. 170 HELL)

So also Dr. Bethune: "Christ, in Noah, by his Spirit, preached to them before the Flood, just as in his ministers he preaches to us by his Spirit now" (Lectures on the Heidelberg Catechism, i, 400). Alford (Comment. ad loc.) refers to the passages (e.g. Meyer) of the view of various commentators, ancient and modern, on the passage, and subjoins his own view. as follows: "I understand these words to say that our Lord, in his disembodied state, did go to the place of detention of departed spirits, and did there announce his work of redemption to the disembodied spirits of those who refused to obey the voice of God when the judgment of the Flood was hanging over them. Why these rather than others are mentioned—whether merely as a sample of the like gracious work on others, or for some special reason unimaginable to our understanding, I do not pretend to determine. I only add that the plain words of Scripture, and to accept its revelations so far as vouchsafed to us. And they are vouchsafed to us to the utmost limit of legitimate inference from revealed facts. That inference every intelligent reader will draw from the fact here announced; it is not purgatory, it is not universal restitution, but it is one which throws blessed light on one of the darkest enigmas of the divine justice—the cases where the final doom seems infinitely out of proportion to the lapse which has incurred it; and as we cannot say to what other cases this ex nihilo may be appropriately applied, it is perfectly consistent with the divine will to limit its occurrence or its efficacy. The reason of mentioning here these sinners above other sinners appears to be their connection with the type of baptism which follows. If so, who shall say that the blessed act was confined to them?" (Comm. on N. T. vol. iv, pt. 1, p. 968).

3. The Fathers.—In several of his homilies, he says that the fathers find the doctrine that "Christ descended into Hades to announce to the souls of the patriarchs and others there the accomplishment of the work of redemption, and to conduct them to his kingdom of glory." So Justin Martyr (167?); Diod. cum Tyrkh. § 72, cites a passage from Jeremiah (cut out to deal with the plain words of Scripture, and to accept its revelations so far as vouchsafed to us). Therefore, Irenæus (200?), Adam. Her. iv, 27, 2: "The Lord descended into the regions beneath the earth, preaching his advent there, and declaring the same to be accomplished by those who believe on him" (see also v, 81, 2). Clement of Alexandria (c. 220) devotes chap. vi of book vi of the Stromata to the preaching of the Gospel to Jews and Gentiles in Hades. See also Tertullian, De Anim., vii, 4; Origen, Cels. vii, 19; Gregory, Hist. Egl. iv, 26: "Christ, in the beginning of his kingdom, in a certain sense, denied the descendens ad inferos; but Marcion (21st century) regarded it as intended to benefit the heathen who were in need of redemption. The later fathers were still more distinct in their utterances; see Cyril, Catech. iv, 11; xiv, 19; Ambrose, De Inerr. 37, 42; Augustine, Epist. cliv et al.; Jerome, Epist. xxii et al.; the latter fathers generally adopted the notion that, till Christ's death, the patriarchs and prophets were in Hades, but afterwards (from the time that Christ said to the thief on the cross that he should be with him in Paradise) they passed into Paradise, which, therefore, they distinguished from Hades. Indeed, the latter fathers looked on as a place of rest to the just, but Paradise as far better. Here, of course, we begin to perceive the germ of the doctrine of the Limbus Patrum. Yet the notion entertained by the fathers was vastly different from that of the medieval Church. Another opinion, however, prevailed in the church in the earliest centuries; Christ not only translated the pious from Hades to more joyous abodes, but that even some of those who in old times had been disobedient, yet, on hearing Christ's preaching, believed, and so were saved and delivered from torment and had a place of rest. This is the prevailing opinion of Augustine. He was evidently puzzled as to the meaning of the word Hades, and doubted whether it ever meant a place of rest and happiness (although at times he appears to have admitted that it did); and, thinking it a place of torment, he thought Christ went thither to save some souls, which were in torment, from thence. Some, indeed, went so far as to think that hell was cleared of all souls that were there in torment, and that all were taken up with Christ when he rose from the dead and ascended to heaven, but this was reckoned as a heresy. . . . One principal reason why the fathers laid great stress on the belief in Christ's descent to Hades was this. The Arians and Apollinarians denied the existence of a natural human soul in Jesus Christ. 'Nor the time of our Lord's humanity, namely, that he was perfect man, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting,' was most strongly maintained by asserting the article of his descent to Hades. For whereas his body was laid in the grave, and his soul went down to Hades, he must have had both body and soul. Accordingly, the fathers with one consent maintain the descent of Christ's soul to hell' (Brown, On the Thirty-nine Articles, p. 98). Nevertheless, it was not opposition to Apollinarianism that originally led to the adoption of the clause into the Creed; the Gnostic, long before, had denied the descensus ad inferos, but Apollinarianism was the first to make an issue of it. (Hagenbach, *Hist. Aquinas, to De Doctrina; Summa Theol., III, 3, 3.)

What may be called the mythology of Christendom, the "descensus into hell" has always played an important part. The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus contains a vivid description of it, very highly colored. A voice like that of Moses is heard crying: "Lift up your gates, and be ye lifted up," etc. But the act of descent is not performed on a repetition of the call were opened, "and the King of glory entered, in form as a man, and all the dark places of Hades were lighted up." And straightway Hades cried out (ch. xxii.), 'We are conquered. Woe unto us!' But who is this that hath such power and privileges? And what art thou, that comest hither without sin, small in seeming but excellent in power, the humble and the great, slave at once and master, soldier and king, wielding power over the dead and the living, sailed to the cross, and the destroyer of our power? Truly, the grace of whom the patriarch Rebekah spake to us, that by thy cross and death thou shouldst purchase the universe!' Then the King of Glory, holding Satan by the head, delivered him to the angels, and said, 'Bind his hands and feet, and neck and mouth, with irons.' And giving him over to Hades, he said, 'For they were hid in the darkness of the abyss, and my hand did not touch them.' (ch. xxiv.) Then the King of Glory stretched out his right hand, and took the forerather Adam, and raised him up, and turning to the rest also, he said, 'Come with me, all of you, as many as have died by the wood which this place - the earth; for I. I upraise you all by the aid of the cross, and raise them up in whose hands he has these things that he has done and all the fathers Adam, filled with exceeding joy, said, 'I render thee thanks, O Lord, that thou hast brought me up from the depths of Hades. Thus, too, were all the prophets and saints: 'We thank thee, O Christ, Saviour of the world, that thou hast redeemed our life from corruption.' And while they were saying these things, the Saviour blessed Adam in the wilderness with the sign of the cross, and did the like to the patriarchs and the prophets, and the martyrs and forefathers, and taking them with him, he rose up out of Hades. And, 'Laetis, in mundum, the holy Father accompanying him, sang, 'Praised be he who hath come in the name of the Lord. Hallelujah!' (Thilo, *Cod. Apocryph. i, 667 n. 6. Forbes, On the Thirty-nine Articles, i, 52 sq.) A dramatic representation of the "descensus into hell," in imitation of the above picture in Nicodemus, is given in the Adventus et communio sancti Joannis Baptist, ep. Epistoles, commonly ascribed to Eusebius of Emesa (c. 300); see Augustus' edition of Eusebius of Emesa, p. 1 sq. (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 184).

3. Middle Age.—These images took possession of the popular accent and were even given pictures by many of the clergy. In the medieval mysteries, the "battering of hell" was one of the most popular representations. Death and hell were pictured as dismayed at the loss of their victims, as Christ was to set all the captives free. So the Vision of Pieri Floreman declares that Christ "Would come as a Kyng, Crowned with auriol, As haveing ascended into heaven, and this world, and Alle mennees souls."

The subject was also a favorite one in the religious art of the 14th and 15th centuries.

The scholastic divines divided Hell into three different apartments or regions: (1) The Limbus of Hades, where souls are kept, where the devils and the damned are confined; (2) Those suherranean regions which may be regarded as the intermediate states between heaven and hell, and be again subdivided into (a) Purgatory, which lies nearest to hell; (b) The limbus infirmitum (psororum), where all those children remain who die unbaptized; (c) The limbus patrum, the abode of the Old Testament saints, the place to which Christ went to preach redemption to the souls in prison. The limbus last mentioned was also called Abraham's bosom; different opinions obtained concerning its relation to heaven and hell* (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 185.) Therefore, the limbus of souls in prison was becoming a more and more popular theme. The limbus patrum (Summa Speul. qu. 69, art. 5).

4. Modern.—(1) The Greek Church holds that the descensus was a voluntary going down into Hades of the human soul of Christ united to his divinity; that he remained there a period between his death and his resurrection, and devoted himself to the work he had performed on earth: i.e. that he offered redemption and preached the Gospel to those who were subject to Satan's power in consequence of original sin, releasing all believers, and all who died in Christ under the O. T. dispensation, from Hades (Conf. Orthodox. i, 49, ed. Kummel, 1840, p. 118).

(2) The Roman Church rests its doctrine in tradition alone. It teaches that Christ, in his entire personality, including his divine and human natures, descended voluntarily, for the sake of the Saints of Israel, into the limbus patrum, or into the ignus purgatorius (fire of purgatory), and there demonstrated himself Son of God by conquering the demons, and by granting to the souls of the ancients who dwelt in Hades their freedom from the limbus, and admission to felicity in heaven. "His soul also was put to death. After he had suffered and been put to death, he entered into Hades, where those who were in prison he had purchased, etc. (Cf. Conc. Trid. art. x.)"

(3) Lutherana.—Luther himself did not speak positively on this topic. He agreed at first with Jerome and Gregory in supposing a limbus patrum whither Christ went. But whenever he mentioned the subject after 1538, he was accustomed to remark that Christ destroyed the power of the devil and of hell, whither he went with soul and body. The later Lutheran theology recognised the descent as a real descent into hell. Christ, the God-man, after the resurrection and the reunion of his soul with his body, immediately before his reappearance on earth, i.e. early on Easter morning, went, body and soul, to the hell of the damned, the time which elapsed between his death on the cross and the resurrection having been spent in Paradise. The "descent into hell" was the first act accomplished by the God-man after his entrance into his divine unlimited power, and is therefore considered as the first degree of the state of exaltation. It thus constitutes also his first entering into possession of the kingdom of his power, and in the revelation of his victory over the devil, and the consequent inability of the latter to prevail against believers, whereas the "descent into hell" is also designated as "the triumph over the devil and his angels." His preaching in hell is designated as condemnatory (legalis and damnatoria, to see corruption, so he left not his soul in hell, and thereby gave sufficient security to all those who belong to Christ of never coming under the power of Satan, or suffering in the flames prepared for the devil and his angels. And this is the fruit of Christ's descent into hell, but to that of humiliation, his soul suffering the punishments of hell while his body remained in the grave. He denied that I Pet. iii, 18 refers to the "descent into hell" at all.

(4.) Reformed.—In the Reformed theology in general, the doctrine of the "descent into hell" has been interpreted metaphorically, or as meaning simply either the burial of Christ or his sufferings. So Calvin: "It was necessary for Christ to contend with the powers of hell and the horror of eternal death." ... He was treated as a criminal himself, to sustain all the punishments which would have been his if he had descended into hell, only with this exception, that it was not possible that he should be held of the pains of death. Therefore it is no wonder if he be said to have descended into hell, since he suffered that death which the wrath of God inflicts on transgressors" (Institutes, bk. ii, ch. xvi, § 10).

The Heideggerian interpretation substantiates follows Calvin: "Quest. 44. Why is there added 'he descended into hell'? That in my greatest temptations I may be assured, and wholly comfort myself in this, that my Lord Jesus Christ, by his inexpressible anguish, pains, torments, and hellish agonies, in which he was plunged during his suffering, but especially on the cross, hath delivered me from the anguish and torments of hell." Dr. Nevin remarks on this answer that it gives the words of the Creed a "signification which is good in its own nature, but, at the same time, notoriously at war with the historical sense of the clause itself." The doctrine is stated in the Westminster Catechism (Larger), answer to question 50, as follows: "Christ's humiliation after death consisted in his being buried and continuing in the state of the dead, and under the power of death, until the third day, which has been otherwise expressed in the words 'he descended into hell.'" Thus, Nevin maintains that the descent into Hades simply meant the burial of Christ; and in this opinion he was followed by Drusius, by Dr. Barrow, and other English divines; and so Fiscator, and several of the Remonstrants (Arminius, Carrolianus, Limborch), refer it to the state of death being part of Christ's humiliation to which the Prince of Life was subjected.

Church of England.—The third article of religion runs as follows: "As Christ died for us, and was buried, so also is it to be believed that he went down into hell." In the 39 articles of 1563 it is more fully stated as follows: "The body of Christ lay in the sepulchre unuttered to his resurrection; but his ghost departing from him, was with the ghosts which were in prison, or in hell, and did preach to the same, as the place of St. Peter doth testify." And in the Creed in Metre, given at the end of the old version of the Psalms in the Prayer-book, it is stated as follows:

"His body then was buried
As is our use and right;
His spirit after this descent
Into the lower parts,
Of them that long in darkness were,
The true light of their hearts.

Pearson, after an elaborate but not always luminous examination of the clause, sums up his own view of the doctrine as follows: "I give a full and undoubted assent unto this as to a certain truth, that when all the sufferings of Christ were finished on the cross, and his soul was separated from his body, though his body were dead, yet his soul died not; and though it died not, yet it underwent the condition of the souls of such as die; and being he died in the similitude of a sinner, his soul went to the place where the souls of men are kept who died for their sins, and so did wholly undergo the law of death; but because there was no sin in him, and he had fully satisfied for the sins of others which he took upon him, therefore, as God suffered not his Holy One

HELL PUNISHMENTS, Nature of.—The term Hell (Hölle), as stated above, originally denoted the 'sether world,' the 'place of departed spirits.' It came to be associated with the idea of fire and the idea of suffering. The phrase 'the place of torment for the wicked' is a scholastic division distinguished between the Limbo, or place of the souls of departed spirits, and Hell, properly so called, where the damned suffer their punishment (Aquinas, Summa, q. 1). The nature of the punishments of hell has been very variously understood in different times. In the early Church the fire of hell was generally considered as a real, material fire. So Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Cyprian. Orig. however, observed, 'believed that the fire of hell to be the punishment which is inflicted by God, the remorse of conscience, etc. (De Princ. ii, 10, opp. 1, 192).' The eternal fire is neither material nor kinded by another person, but the combustibles are our selves, of which conscience reminds us: thus the fire of hell resembles the fire of passions in this world. The separation between the soul and God may be compared with the pain which we suffer when all the members of the body are torn out of their joints. By 'outer darkness' Orig. does not so much understand a place devoid of light as a state of complete ignorance; he thus appears to adopt the idea of black bodies only by way of description to explain popular notions. It should also be borne in mind that Orig. imagined that the design of all these punishments was to heal or to cor-correct, and thus finally to restore the sinner to the favor of God' (Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 78).

From the latter part of the 3d century onward to the rise of scholasticism, the punishments of hell were generally described by material images, and, indeed, were considered, to a large extent, as material punishments.
Gregory of Nazianzus († 389?) supposed the punishment of the damned to consist essentially in their separam from God, and in the consciousness of their own material destination (Orat. xvi, 9, p. 306: Tοιοi δε ει ματά των αδιαλειας, μαλλον δε ποι των αδιαλεια των αδιαλειας, και ον τω των αδιαλειας αδιαλειας αει έροτα). Basili, on the contrary, gives a more vivid description of that punishment (Hom. in Ps. xxiii, Orat. cxxvii, 7). In 1679, the Council of Trent presented the torments of the damned in a variety of horrid pictures in Theol. Iursum, i, c. 6, Opp. iv, 560, 561). Nevertheless, in other places (e. g., his Ep. ad Rom. hom. xxxii, Opp. x, 380) he justly observes that it is of more importance to know how to escape hell than what it is and what is its nature. Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. Cate-cek, 40) endeavors to divest the idea of hell of all that is sensuous (the fire of hell is not to be looked upon as a material fire, nor is the worm which never dies an őrimas ουρα). Augustine imagines that separation from God is in the first instance to be regarded as the most sennuous (De mort. et non.

regard these expressions as figurative representations of the positive penalties of hell. Doddridge remarks that, "On the whole, it is of very little importance whether we say there is an external fire, or only an idea of such pain as arises from burning; and should we think both doubtful, it is certain God can give the mind a sense of a fiery nature of hell, which should answer all. And even on the terrors of those descriptions; and care should certainly be taken so to explain Scripture metaphors as that hell may be considered as consisting more of mental agony than of bodily tortures" (Lect. on Deuc. cxxxiii).

Of similar tenor are the following remarks by Dr. Watson: "On the nature of hell (Acts xix.); and even the thought of it is vain for us to attempt to conjecture. It has been conceived that if we suppose clear apprehensions of God and sin in the understanding; an unshimmering conscience; an unceasing conflict between full, irresistible convictions of all that is awful in truth, and an eminence of heart remaining in all its virulence; passions raging in their unmitigated violence; regrets as unavailing as they are torturing; conscious desert and unavailing hopelessness; with the entire removal of all, in whatever form, that on earth enabled the sinner to banish that conviction, to indulge his materials, or to substitute a sufficient hell. I will not deny it. . . . I cannot but think, therefore, that there must be something more than conscience, something of the nature of positive punitive infliction: conscience attesting its justice, certifying its being all deserved. What shall be the products of this infliction is another question. It may surely be something of the nature of punitive infliction without adopting the theory of literal fire, of a lake of fire, a lake burning with brimstone. I have no more belief, as I have just said, in a literal fire than in a literal worm; and no more belief in either than in the existence, for that reason of the Bible, of a literal and not a spiritual, in the centre of which grows the tree of life, or of a literal city, of which the length, and breadth, and height are equal, of which the foundations are precious stones, the gates of pearl, and the streets of gold, with a pure river of living water flowing through the midst of it. But the mind of fallen man is in love with sin, and in selfish hatred of God and holiness. In a mind of this character the difficulty may amount to impossibility of awakening any adequate sense of future suffering, or any salutary alarm in the anticipation of it, by any representations of a directly spiritual kind, however mentioned. In these circumstances, then, if an impression of extreme suffering is to be made, it seems as if figure, taken from what is still in the midst of all the perversions of depravity felt to be fearful, were almost, if not altogether, indispensable for the purpose. The figures of Scripture on this subject are felt, and felt powerfully, by every mind. The very mention of the "worm that dieth not" awakens a more thrilling emotion, undefined as it is (perhaps, indeed, the more thrilling that it is undefined), than anything you can say to an unregenerate man about the operations of conscience, and the "fire that never shall be quenched" than any representation you can ever make to him of sin, and the absence of God, and the sway of evil passions, and the pangs of remorse, and horribleness of sin-loving and God-hating company. Such images have the full effect intended by them, as the impression of extreme suffering; although what proportion of that suffering shall be the native and necessary result of the constitution of human nature when placed in certain circumstances, and what proportion of more direct penal infliction, the Scriptures do not tell us, there is not much discussion. And it would be useless for us to conjecture, or to attempt the adjustment of such proportions" (Systematic Theology, Edinburgh, 1857, iii, 700). For a copious list of books on the subject, see Abbot's bibliographical appendix to Alger, History of the Doctrine of a Future Life, iii, 3, 5.

HELL 174 HELLENIST

Hellenist (Ἑλληνιστής, A. V. "Grecian", comp. Ἑλληνισμός, 2 Macc. iv. 13). In one of the earliest notices of the first Christian Church at Jerusalem (Acts vi, 1), two distinct parties are recognised among its members, "Hebrews" and Hellenists, who appear to stand towards one another in some degree in a relation of jealous hostility. It was a national distinction, and even after his conversion, he spoke and disputed with the Hellenists (Acts ix, 29), as if expecting to find more sympathy among them than with the rulers of the Jews. The term Hellenist occurs once again in the N. T. according to the common text, in the account of the foundation of the church at Corinth (1 Cor. i, 12). The possible sense of the context, as well as the form of the sentence (καὶ πρὸς τοὺς Ἐ., though the καὶ is doubtful), seems to require the other reading "Greeks" (Ἑλληνες), which is supported by great external evidence as the true antithesis to "Jews" (=Iouiois, not Ἰουθαίως, v. 19). See HEBREWS.

The name, according to its derivation, whether the original word (Ἑλληνιστής) be taken, according to the common analogy of similar forms (μυθικός, ἀρχομένος, Φιλιππικός), in the general sense of adopting the spirit and characteristics of those, the party is regarded as limited, especially in the sense of using the Greek language (Xenophon, Anab. vii. 3, 25), marks a class distinguished by peculiar habits, and not by descent. Thus the Hellenists as a body included not only the proselytes of Greek (or foreign) parentage (οἱ σημειούμενοι Ἑλληνες, Acts xvii. 14; ὁ Ἕλληνες προσελκυόμενος, Acts xiii. 16), but also (1) those who, by settling in foreign countries, had adopted the prevalent form of the current Greek civilization, and with it the use of the common Greek dialect, to the exclusion of the Aramaic, which was the national representative of the ancient Hebrew Hellenism was thus Chrished out of origin. Hellenists might be Greeks, but when the latter term is used (Ἑλληνισμός, John xii. 2), the point of race and not of creed is that which is foremost in the mind of the writer. (See Jour. Soc. Lit. Jan. and April, 1857.) See GREECE.

1. As to the particular class in question, referred to in the Acts, the following are the different opinions that have been held: 1. That the distinctive difference between them was simply one of language, the Hebrews speaking the Aramaic of Palestine, the Hellenists the Greek language. 2. That the distinction was one of race, country, partly of language: the Hebrew being a native of Judea, and using the Aramaic language; the Hellenist born among the Gentiles, and using the speech of the country of which he was a native. So Erasmus, Lightfoot, Bengel, Wahl, De Wette, Davidson, Alford, Baumgarten, etc.

3. That the difference was one of religious history, the Hebrew being a born child of the covenant, the Hellenist a proselyte from heathendom. So Beza, Salmasius, Pearson, Bunsen, Pfannkuche, etc.

4. That the difference was one of principle, the Hebrew adhering to one set of beliefs or modes of thought, the Hellenist adopting another. According to some, this difference had the effect of constituting the Hellenists into a distinctive sect among the Jews, such as the Essenes; whilst others, without going this length, regard the two classes as standing to each other very much in the relation of the partisans in the party desiring different political views, or parties in the same Church having different aims and modes of regarding religious truth in modern times, may stand to each other; the Hebrews being like the Conservative or High-Church party, while the Hellenists advocated a more progressive, unfettered, and comprehensive scheme of thinking and acting. This latter view, in its substance, has recently found an able advocate in Mr. Roberts (Discussions on the Gospels, p. 148 sq.). According to him, "the Hellenists were those Jews, whether belonging to Palestine or not, who willingly yielded to the influence of Gentile civilization and habits, and were thus distinguished by their free and liberal spirit; the Hebrews, again, were the rigid adherents of Judaism, who, in spite of the providential agencies which had been long at work, endeavored to keep up those peculiar and exclusive usages by which the Jews had for so many centuries been preserved distinct from all other nations."

We are not in a position to reject entirely any of these opinions. Each of them seems to have an element of truth in it, though the contributions they make to the whole truth on this subject are by no means of equal importance. The last alone points to what must be regarded as the fundamental and formative characteristic of Hellenism among the Jews. There can be no doubt historically that some such distinction as that to which it refers did subsist in the Jewish nation (see Josh, Gesch, des Judenthums, i, 99 sq., 545 sq.), and had to come to a height at the commencement of the Christian era; and nothing can be more probable than that the existence of such a distinction as has been indicated, in the way in which the distinction between the Hebrews and the Hellenists is asserted to have shown itself in Acts vi,1 sq. It is in agreement with this, also, that Paul should have entered into discussion chiefly with the Hellenists. It is not improbable that as his early Hellenic culture pointed him out as the person most fitted to meet them on their own ground, he may have been specially set upon this work by the other apostles. - Kitto, s. v.

Still different views could hardly of itself have constituted so marked and obvious a distinction as is noticed in the various texts above cited, unless it had been exhibited in some outstanding characteristic; and no external sign could have been more certain, natural, and palpable than that familiar use of the Greek language which at once betrayed a foreign Jew, to whom it was vernacular, in contrast with the Palestinian Jew, by whom Greek, although too prevalent in that age everywhere to have been unknown to any, was nevertheless always spoken with a Hebrew coloring and accent. See Dispersion.

II. It remains to characterize briefly the elements which the Hellenists contributed to the language of the N. T. and to ascertain the objects which they produced upon the apostolic teaching:

1. The flexibility of the Greek language gained for it in ancient times a general currency similar to that which French enjoys in modern Europe; but with this important difference, that the natural and native language of education and literature, and also the language of the great centres of commerce. The colonies of Alexander and his successors originally established what has been called the Macedonian dialect throughout the East; but even in this the prevailing power of Attic literature made itself distinctly felt. Peculiar words and forms adopted at Alexandria were undoubtedly of Macedonian origin, but the later Attic may be justly regarded as the real basis of Oriental Greek. This first type was, however, soon modified, at least in common use, by contact with other languages. The vocabulary was enriched by the addition of many implied in the vayatsa with new constructions. In this way a variety of local dialects must have arisen, the specific characters of which were determined in the first instance by the conditions under which they were formed, and which afterward passed away with the circumstances that had produced them. But one of these dialects has been preserved after the ruin of the people among them it arose, by being consecrated to the noblest service which language has yet fulfilled. In other cases the dialects persisted together with the communities who used them in the countries in which they were born, but the Jews, as the Alexandrine version of the O. Test., acting in this respect like the great vernacular versions of English, and Germany, gave a definiteness and fixity to the popular language which could not have been gained without the existence of some recognized standard. The style of the Sept. itself is, indeed, different in different parts, but the same general character runs through the whole, and the variations which it presents are not greater than those which exist in the different books of the N. T.

The functions which this Jewish-Greek had to discharge were of the widest application, and the language itself combined the most opposite features. It was essentially a fusion of Eastern and Western thought; for, disregarding particularities of inflections and novel words, the characteristic of the Hellenistic dialect is the combination of a Hebrew spirit with a Greek body, of a Hebrew form with Greek words. The conception belongs to one race, and the expression to another. Nor is it too much to say that this combination was one of the most important preparations for the reception of Christianity, and one of the most important aids for the adequate expression of its teaching. On the one hand, by the spread of the Hellenistic Greek, the deep, theocratic aspect of the world and life, which distinguishes Jewish thought, was placed before men at large; and, on the other, the whole truths which are gained from the analysis of mind and action, and enshrined in words, were transferred to the service of revelation. In the fulness of time, when the great message came, a language was prepared to convey it; and thus the very day of the N. T. forms a great lesson in the true philosophy of history, and becomes the monument of the providential government of mankind.

This view of the Hellenistic dialect will at once remove one of the commonest misconceptions relating to it. For it will follow that its deviations from the ordinary laws of classical Greek are the result of a change by some common law, and that irregularities of construction and altered usages of words are to be traced to their first source, and interpreted strictly according to the original conception out of which they sprung. A popular, and even a corrupt dialect is not less precise, or in other words, is not less human than a polished one, though its interpretation may often be more difficult from the want of materials for analysis. But in the case of the N. T., the books themselves furnish an ample store for the critic, and the Sept., when compared with the Hebrew text, provides him with the history of the language which has made itself visible to us. 2. The adoption of a strange language was essentially characteristic of the true nature of Hellenism. The purely outward elements of the national life were laid aside with a facility which history offers few examples, while the inner character of the people remained unaltered. In every respect, the thought, so to speak, was clothed in a new dress. Hellenism was, as it were, a fresh incorporation of Judaism according to altered laws of life and worship. But, as the Hebrew spirit made itself distinctly visible in the new dialect, so it remained undestroyed by the new conditions which regulated its action. While the Hellenistic Jews followed their natural instinct for trade, which was originally curbed by the Mosaic law, and gained a deeper insight into foreign character, and with this a truer sympathy, or at least a wider tolerance towards foreign opinions, the same time they found means of adapting their knowledge of the principles of their divine faith, and to gain respect and attention even from those who did not openly embrace their religion. Hellenism accomplished for the outer world what the Return accomplished for the Palestinian Jews: it was the necessary step between a religion of form and a religion of spirit, the necessary step against Judaism as final and universal, and it witnessed for it as the foundation of a spiritual religion which should be bound by no local restrictions. Under the influence of this wider instruction, a Greek body grew up around the new life, and was fitted into the Jewish Church, and yet held a recognized position with regard to it-which was able to apprehend the apostolic teaching, and ready to receive it. The Hellenists themselves were at once missionaries to the heathen and prophets to their own countrymen. Their lives were an abiding protest against polytheism and pantheism, and they retained with unshaken zeal the sum of their ancient creed, when the preacher had popularly occupied the place of the priest, and a service of prayer, and praise, and exhortation had succeeded in daily life to the elaborate ritual of the Temple. Yet this new de-development of Judaism was obtained without the sacrifice of national ties. The connection of the Hellenists with the Temple was not broken, except in the case of some of the Egyptian Jews. Unity coexisted with dis-ension; and the organization of the Church was foreshadowed, not only in the widening breadth of doctrine, but even externally in the scattered communities which looked to Jerusalem as their common centre.

In another aspect Hellenism served as the preparation for a catholic creed. As it furnished the language of Christianity, it supplied also that literary instinct which counteracted the traditional reserve of the Palestinian Jews. The writings of the N. Test., and all the writings of the apostolic age, with the exception of the original Gospel of Matthew, were, as far as we know, Greek; and Greek seems to have remained the sole vehicle of Christian literature, and the principal medium of Christian worship, till the Church of North Africa rose into importance in the time of Tertullian. The Canon of the Christian Scriptures, the early creeds, and the liturgies are the memorials of this Hellenistic predominance in the Church, and the types of its working; and if in later times the Greek spirit descended to the investigation of painful subtleties, it may be questioned whether the fulness of Christian truth could have been developed without the power of Greek thought tempered by Hebrew discipline.

The general relations of Hellenism to Judaism are well treated in the histories of Ewald and Jost; but the Hellenistic language is as yet, critically speaking, almost unexplored. Winer's Grammar (Gramm. d. N. T.
Sprachtdienst, 7th ed. 1869) has done great service in establishing the idea of law in N. T. language, which was obliterated by earlier interpreters, but even Winer does not investigate the origin of the peculiarities of the Hellenistic dialect. The idioms of the N. T. cannot be discussed apart from those of the Sept., and no explanation can be considered perfect which does not take into account the origin of the corresponding Hebrew idioms. For this work even the materials are as yet deficient. The text of the Sept. is still in a most unsat-sactory condition; and while Brunner's Concordance leaves nothing to be desired for the vocabulary of the N. T., Trem's Concordance to the Sept., however useful, is quite untrustworthy for critical purposes. See Heller, Yom Tov Lipman B.-Nathan, a distinguisished Rabbi of the Polish school, born at Wallenstein, duchy of Anspach, Germany, in 1578. He filled the appointment of Rabbi to the great synagogues at Vienna, Prague, and Krakau. While at Prague (1629) he was prosecuted by the government upon a charge that he had written in praise of the Talmud to the injury of the Christian religion, was imprisoned, and fined 10,000 florinas. After his release he went to Poland, where, in 1644, he became Rabbi of the synagogue at Krakau.

Here he died in 1654. Heller wrote his autobiography (הנויה וקנעם), printed in 1836, which contains a complete list of all his works. Among the most important of them are his glossaries to the Mishna (ם-varargin "ם" "ם")

These are considered by Oriental scholars as very val-able. — Jost, Gesch. d. Juden. iii, 248; Etheridge, Intro-to Heb. Literature, p. 448.

Helm, פִּינָה, the rudder of a ship (Jar. iii, 4).
See Rudder.

Helmet (םֶבֶּל or רֹטֶב, kodai, παραμυθανίο), a military cap for the defence of the head in battle (1 Sam.
ing was characterized by great unction and overwhelming pathos, and often produced wonderful results. During the prevalence of the yellow fever he visited the sick and dying without fear. He buried 626 of his members.

He died in the 80th year of his age, Feb. 5, 1824. He was the author of a work on Baptism and the Sacred Scriptures, published in 1798; also of a practical treatise on Communion with God; numerous devotional books for children, and a volume of Hymns. He edited likewise the Evangelical Magazine, published for some years in Philadelphia in the German language. (M. L. S.)

Hel'ion (Heb. Cheleon', הליון, strong; Sept. Χαλύων), the father of Eliab, which latter was phylarch of the tribe of Zebulon at the Exode (Num. 1, 9; ii, 7; vii, 24, 29; x, 16). B.C. ante 1658.

Help, besides its ordinary signification of assistance in general, has in two passages of the N. T. a technical application.

1. Help (Βοήθεια), nautical apparatus for securing a vessel, when leaking, by means of ropes, chains, etc., which were passed around the "underwater" of the ship, in the emergency of a storm (Acts xxvii, 17). See SHIP.

2. Help (ἀντιληψις; Vulg. opulatioines; 1 Cor. xii, 28). This Greek word, signifying aids or assistance, has so a meaning, among others, corresponding to that in this passage, in the classical writers (e. g. Diod. Sic., i, 87).

In the Sept. is answered to יָזָא (Ps. xxii, 19), to יָזָא (Ps. cxxiii, 19), and to יָזָא (Ps. lxxxiii, 8). It is found in the same sense, Ezek. iv, 12; 2 Mac., xi, 26; and in Josephus (War, iv, 5, 1). In the N. T. it occurs once, viz. in the enumeration of the several orders or classes of persons possessing miraculous gifts among the primitive Christians (ut supra), where it seems to be used by metonymy, the abstract for the concrete, and mean help, τονομάζεσθαι, "miracles," i. e. workers of miracles; κυριονι, κυριονios, "governments," i.e. governors, etc., in the same enumeration. Many persons in this country, by a similar idiom, call their servants "help." Great difficulty attends the attempt to ascertain the nature of the office so designated among Christians. Theophylact explains αντιληψις by αντιληψις των δοσινων, helping or supporting the infirm. So also Gennadius, in Ecumenius. But this seems like an inference from the etymology (see the Greek of Acts xx, 35). It has been assumed by some eminent modern writers that the several "orders" mentioned in verse 29 correspond respectively to the several "gifts" of the Spirit enumerated in verse 8, 9. In order, however, to make the two enumerations tally, it is necessary to make "divers kinds of tongues" and "interpretation of tongues" in the one answer to "diversities of tongues" in the other, which, in the present state of the received text, does not seem to be a complete correspondence.

The result of the collation is that αντιληψις answers to "prophecy;" whence it has been inferred that these persons were such as were qualified with the gift of "lower prophecy," to help the Christians in the public devotions (the kubernéses). Bishop Wordsworth has adopted this classification of the gifts and office-bearers, and points out as "helps," i. e. persons gifted with "prophecies or predictions," such persons as Mark, Tychicus, Onesimus. Vitringa, from a comparison of ver. 28, 29, 30, infers that the αντιληψις denote those who had the gift of interpreting foreign tongues (De Synag. et ii, 505, Franque, 1696); which, though certainly possible, as an arbitrary use of a very significant word, stands in need of confirmation by actual instances. Dr. Lightfoot also, according to his biographer, adopted the same plan and arrived at the same conclusion (Strype's Life of Lightfoot, prefixed to his Works, p. 4, Lond. 1684). But Lightfoot himself explains the word "persons who accompanied the apostles, baptized those who were converted by them, and were sent to places to which they, being employed in other things, could not come, as Mark, Timothy, Titus." He observes (ii, 781) that the Talmudists sometimes call the Levites מ handwritten כותרים, "the helpers of the priests." Similar catalogues of miraculous gifts and of officers occur Rom. xii, 6-8, and Eph. iv, 11, 12; but they ever correspond in number nor in the order of enumeration. In the former, "prophets" stands first, and in the latter "teachers"; and in the former many of the terms are of wide import, as "ministering," while minute distinctions are made between others, as between "teaching" and "exhortation," "giving" and "showing mercy.

" Other writers pursue different methods, and arrive at different conclusions. For instance, Hammond, arguing from the etymology of the word, and from passages in the early writers, which describe the office of relieving the poor as peculiarly connected with that of the apostles and bishops by the deacons, infers that εὐ-δρομος, "denotes a special part of the office of those men which are set down at the beginning of the verse." He also explains εὖδρομος as another part of their office (Hammond, Comment., ad loc.). Schleusner understands "deacons who had the care of the sick." Rosenberg, "Diaconi qui pauperibus, peregrinis, agrois, mortuis, procurandis preceant." Bishop Pearce thinks that both these words may have been originally put in the margin to explain διάμωσης, "miracles or powers," and urges that εὐδρομος is nowhere mentioned as a gift of the Spirit, and that it is not recapitulated in ver. 29, 30. Certainly the omission of these two words would nearly produce exclusiveness to the recapitulation. Bower adopts the same conjecture, but it is without support from MSS. or versions. He also observes that to the end of ver. 28 some copies of the Vulgate add "interpretationes sermo-norum," εὐμαρκήσεις γιανωσία; as also the later Syriac, Hilary, and Ambrose. This addition would make the recapitulation perfect. Chrysostom and all the Greek, interpreters consider the εὐδρομος and εὐδρομος as importing the same thing, namely, functionaries so called with reference to the two different parts of their office: the εὐδρομος, superintending the care of the poor, sick, and strangers; the εὐδρομος, the burial of the dead and the effectiveness of their offices, including the care of their widows, or rather managers than governors (Blomfield's Recensio Synopt.). After all, it must be confessed, with Doddridge, that "we can only guess at the meaning of the words in question, having no principles on which to proceed in fixing it absolutely." (Family Expositor, on 1 Cor. xii, 28). (See Alberti, glossar., p.
123; Suicer, Thesaurus, in voc.; Salmassius, De Fideis, Trapesico, p. 409, Wollii Curia Philolog., Basil. 1741.) Stanley remarks (Comment., ad loc.) that the word
"εὐδρομος, used in the Sept., is not (like διάμωσης) help ministered by an inferior to a superior, but by an inferior to an superior (comp. Ps. lxxxix, 18; Ecclus. xxi, 12, ii, 7), and thus is inapplicable to the ministrations of the deacon to the presbyter." Probably it is a general term (hence the plur.) to include those occasional labors of evangelists and special laborers, such as Apollos in ancient times and eminent revivats in moderan days, who have from time to time been raised up as powerful but independent promoters of the Gospel. See was called to this revised Confession as a standard under which they could all agree. By the year 1578 the Confession had received the sanction of the Swiss cantons, and had also been approved by the Reformed churches of Poland, Hungary, Scotland, and France (the latter receiving it in Beza's translation). It adopts Calvin's doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and the Roman Catholic doctrine of election in a mild form, far behind Calvin" (Gieseler, Church History, ed. H. B. Smith, iv, 422). No Reformed Confession has been more widely diffused. The title of the Confession is Confession et Expositio Dre- rie et Simplex Sinceri Religiosi Christiani, i.e., a compendium of the tenets and teachings of the Scriptures, Tradition, etc., iii, of God and the Trinity; iv and v, of Idols or Images of God, Christ, and the Saints, and of the Worship of God through Christ, the sole Mediator; vi, of Providence; vii, of the Creation of all Things, of Angels, Devils, Man; vii, of Sin and the Fall of Man; ix, of Free Will. The condition of man after the fall is thus stated: Non sublatus est quidem hominis intellectus, non eretis ea voluntas, et prorsus in lapidem redundum est commutatus (The intellect of man was not taken away by the fall, nor was he robbed of will, and completely turned into a stone). Article xii, of the Church, of the Sacraments; xxi and xxiv, of Assemblies, Worship, Feasts, and Fasts; xxv- xxix, of Catechism, Rites, Ceremonies, etc.; xxx, of the Civil Magistracy. This Confession is given in Latin in the Cyphose Confessiones (Oxen, 1872, 8vo); by Nie- meyer, Collectio Confessionum, p. 402 sq.; by Augusti, Collectio Confessionum, p. 474; 2nd edition, 1878, 8vo; by Beza, 2nd edition, 1890, 8vo; and finally by Helvetius, A. S. R., ed. J. A. F. v. 2, 1869, 8vo. This chapter has been the subject of much controversy, both Calvins- tins and Arminians finding their own doctrine in it. Chap. xi of Treatise of Christ as God-man, the only Saviour; xii and xiii, of the Law and the Gospel; xiv-xvi, of Repentance and Of Justification by Faith; xvii-xviii, of the Church, the Ministry, the Sacraments; xxii and xxiv, of Assemblies, Worship, Feasts, and Fasts; xxx- xxxix, of Catechism, Rites, Ceremonies, etc.; xxx, of the Civil Magistracy. Helvetius, Claude Abriem, a French infidel, was born in Paris in January, 1715, and was educated by the Jesuits at the College of Louis-le-Grand. He afterwards studied law and finances in Paris, and the influence of queen Maria Leszczinska became a farmer-general. His life was disorderly up to the time of his marriage in 1751. In 1758 he published his De l'esprit, which was a summary of the doctrines of the Encyclopedie. The work was quickly denounced; and, to re- gain the favor of the court, Helvetius successively pub- lished three letters of apology which gradually advanced in humility and submission. Notwithstanding the confession which they contained of a Christian faith, and his disclaimers of all opinions inconsistent with its spirit, the doctors of the Sorbonne drew up a formal condemnation of the work, which they declared to be a compendium of all the evil contained in all the bad books that had yet appeared. It was publicly burned, according to a decree of the Parliament of Paris. The style of the book is vicious and declamatory. Helvetius died at Paris Dec. 26, 1771, leaving for d. H. S. (1766), 122; Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, ed. H. B. Smith, § 229, and references there.

Niemeyer (Collectio Confes., p. 729). Within a year from its promulgation it was adopted by the magistrates of Bâle, Zurich, Berne, etc., but it was not received at Geneva until 1769. It was finally made authorita- tive throughout Switzerland: all ministers, teachers, and professors were bound to subscribe to it; and it was ordained that no candidate for the ministry should be admitted except upon declaration that he received it ex amino (Augusti, l. c. p. 464). But these strong mea- sures, together with the influence of the French clergy, and especially the intercession of Frederick William of Brandenburg, produced a reaction; and in 1686 the magistrates of Bâle allowed the adoption of another without subscription to the Formula. By 1706 its strict obligation had fallen into disuse at Geneva. In the other cantons it was still retained, but gave rise to less con- flicts. In 1722 the kings of Prussia and England sent letters to the Swiss Cantons, for the sake of the unity and peace of Protestantism, to drop the use of the Formula as a binding creed. In 1728 they renewed these letters to the same purpose. By 1740 the Formu- la had fallen entirely into disuse. "It never ac- quired authority outside of Switzerland. Within about fifty years in the Diocese of Zürich, the Formula was disused by the advocates of this last measure was Turrettin's own son, Alphonsus Turrettin, who was as zealous in opposing as his father had been in advocating it. If there was ever a creed which deserves to be called the manifesto of a theological party rather than a confession of faith or the expression of the mind of the church, it is that of the Formula" (Fish, in New Englander, July, 1868, p. 502). there is consequently nothing which is either absolutely good, or absolutely evil. The happiness and enlightenment of the people he makes to be the true end of all human government; and, denying a divine Providence in the government of the world, he declares all religion to be a cheat and a prejudice" (Eng. Cyclopaedia, a. v.).

His system is the boldest form of materialism. There have been several editions of his complete works (Lond. 1777, 2 vols. 4to; 1794, 5 vols. 8vo; Paris, 1795, 14 vols. 18mo, ed. by Lefebvre; Paris, 1818, 3 vols. 8vo). Helveticus (Helveticus) Christopher, was born Dec. 25, 1581, at Sprelingen, Darmstadt, where his father was minister. He studied at Marburg, and was able to teach Hebrew at twenty. It is said that he spoke Hebrew as freely as his mother tongue. In 1605 he was made professor of Greek and Hebrew at the School of Giessen, which in 1606 was erected into a university by the landgrave. In 1610 he was made professor of divinity. He died Sept. 10, 1617. His most important work was Grammatic et Philologorum ac Chirologorum ac Chronologiae Systema novum (1610, often reprinted, and translated into English); also a Chronologia Universalis (1612).

Helvidius, a so-called heresarch of the 4th century, a layman who opposed the growing superstitions of the Church, and especially the nascent worship of the Virgin Mary. He was a pupil of Auxentius, bishop of Milan, and the precursor of Jovinian (q. v.). Jerome was at the time preaching the "gospel of celibacy," and Helvidius opposed this tendency also. He maintained that Mary had other children besides Jesus, and supported his opinion by the N. Test., and by the authority of Helvidius. "He had also advanced that by this opinion he in no wise infringed on the honor of Mary. He attacked also the exaggerated undervaluation of married life. He quoted the examples of the patriarchs, who had maintained a pious life in wedlock; while, on the other hand, he referred to the examples of such virgins as had by no means lived up to their calling. These opinions of Helvidius might lead us to conclude that the combating of a one-sided ascetic spirit was a matter of still more weight with him than the defence of his views with regard to Mary. Perhaps, also, he had been led into these views simply by exegetical inquiries and observations, and so had been drawn into this opposition to the overvaluation of celibacy merely for the purpose of defending his opinion against an objection on the score of propriety" (Neander, Ch. Hist., Torrey's ii, 340). Augustine (De haeres. c. 84) calls his followers Helvidianus. Jerome wrote a treatise against him (ad Helvidium), in which we find some passages of Helvidius's writings. See Epiphanius, Haeres. c. 70, 78; Augustine, Haeres. c. 56, 94; Neander, 1, c.

Helyot, Pierre, a Franciscan monk of great learning (known also as father Hippolytus), was born at Paris in 1699, and died in 1716. He went twice to Rome on business of the order, and travelled through the whole of France. He is chiefly distinguished as the author of the Histoire des ordres monastiques religieux et militaires (Paris, 1714-21, 8 vols. 4to), of which he gathered the materials during his travels, and which is to this day the most complete of its kind, though several of the orders are not treated in it. He died during the publication of the fifth volume, and the work was finished by Bullo. A new edition by Migno appeared at Paris in 1847-50 (4 vols. royal 8vo). See Lefebvre, Hist. de la France; Querard, La France littér. ; Hoefer, Nouv. Bush, Général, xxiii, 893.

Hem of a Garment (הֵם, ἑβά, Exod. xxviii, 33, 34; xxxix, 24-26; elsewhere the "skirt" of a robe; בּוֹרֵד, Matt. ix, 39; xiv, 30; elsewhere "border"). The importance which the later Jews, especially the Pharisees (Matt. xxiii, 5), attached to the hem or fringe of their garments was founded upon the regulation in Numb. xv, 38, 39, which ascribed a symbolical meaning to it. We must not, however, conclude that the fringe owed its origin to that passage; it was in the first instance the ordinary mode of finishing the robe, the ends of the threads composing the woof being left in order to prevent the cloth from unraveling, just as in the Egyptian cilastiris (Herod. ii, 81; see Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, ii, 90), as such a fringe was presented in the bas-reliefs of Nineveh, the blue ribbon being added to strengthen the border. The Hebrew word תָּשׁ, τασιθ , "fringe" (Numb. xv, 38, 39), is expressive of the fivetted edge: the Greek εἰσίτεσι (the etymology of which is uncertain, being variously traced to κωστίς, ἄκρας τινός, and ἄρητος) applies to the edge of a river or mountain (Xenoph. Hist. Gr. Gr. iii, 2, § 15; iv, 6, § 8), and is explained by Hesychius as τὸ ἀνὰ τὸν ἄκρας πετάλωμα ρυμιᾶ καὶ τὸ ἀκρον αὐτοῦ. The beaded or outer robe was a simple quadrangular piece of cloth, and generally so worn that two of the corners hung down in front: these corners were ornamented with embroidered scenes and names. There is another fragment in the Chronologia Systema nova (1610, often reprinted, and translated into English); also a Chronologia Universalis (1612).

Hemdan (Heb. Chemdum, נַפְחַד, pleasanl; Sept. Αὐραά, Vulgate Hemdum), the first named of the four "children" of Dishon, which latter was a son of Seir and one of the Horite "dukes" antecedent to the supremacy of the Edomites in Mt. Seir (Gen. xxxvi, 20). B.C. cir

In 1 Chron. i, 41, the name is, by an error of in-scribers, written Haman (Heb. Chamran, יַמְרָנ, Sept. correctly יַמְרָא, Vulg. Hamron, Eng. Vers. "A-man"). The name Hemdian is by Knobel (Genesis, p. 236) compared with those of Humidy and Hamadly, two of the five families of the tribe of Omran or Ammon, who are reckoned, the most learned of E. and S. E. of Syria, in the "Decem, i, 268); also with the Beu-Hausage, who are found a short distance S. of Kerek (S.E. corner of the Dead Sea); and from thence to El-Busairah, probably the ancient Buraah, on the road to Petra. (See Burck-Hemerobapstes (ὑμεροβαπτιστής). Eusebian (Euseb., Euseb. Vita Euseb., cap. vi, cap. vii. Hemlock appears in the Author. Vers. as the render- ing of two Heb. words in some of the passages where they occur.

1. Rosh (rush) and (seem) is thought originally to sign- ify "poison," and is therefore supposed to indicate a poisonous, or, at least, a bitter plant. This we may infer from its being frequently mentioned along with launah or "womwood," as in Deut. xxii, 18, "Let there should be among you a plant that beareth wormwood with it as a sign of the vine of Sodom, and their grapes" be grapes of "womwood" (launah); so also in Jer. ix, 15; xxiii, 15; and in Lam. iii, 19, "Remembering mine affliction and my mis- ery, the wormwood and the gall." That it was a berry- lying plant has been inferred from Deut. xxxii, 52, "For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and their grapes are grapes of" "womwood" (rosh); their clusters are bitter. In Jer. viii, 14; ix, 15; xxiii, 15, "water of" "gall" (rosh) is men- tioned, which may be either the expressed juice of the fruit or of the plant, or a bitter infusion made from it. That it was a plant very evident from Hosea x, 4, where it is said that their judgment springeth up as hem- lock (rosh) in the furrows of the field; also in Amos vi, 12, "For ye have turned judgment into gall (launah, 'wormwood'), and the fruit of the earth into hemlock (rosh)." The only other passages where it occurs are speaking of the "poison" (Job xx, 16) or "venom" of the dragon (Ex. lix, 33), or "gall" in a figurative sense for sorrow (Lam. iii, 5), or as food (Ps. lix, 21). See GALL; PoISON.

Though rosh is generally acknowledged to indicate some plant, yet a variety of opinions have been entertained respecting its identification: some, as the Author. Vers. in Hosea x, 4, and Amos vi, 12, consider cedrus or hemlock to be the plant intended. Tremellius adopts this as the meaning of rosh in all the passages, and is followed by Celsius (Hieron, ii, 49). The cicuta of the Romans, the κωπούς of the Greeks, is generally acknowl- edged to have been what we now call hemlock, the name of "wormwood" of botanists. There can be no doubt of its poisonous nature (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxv, 13). Celsius quotes the description of Linnaeus in support of its growing in the furrows of fields, but it does not appear to be so common in Syria. Celsius, however, adds Bocchius, who, in his continuation of Balsamius, is of the opinion that rosh was conium or hemlock. But there does not appear any necessity for our considering rosh to have been more poisonous than launah or "womwood, with which it is associated so frequently as to appear like a proverbial expression (Deut. xxii, 18; Jer. ix, 15; xxiii, 15; Amos vi, 12); nor is it possible that the translators render it agrimont, intending some species of grass. Hence some have concluded that it must be a mandium, the zizania of the ancients; while others have thought that some of the solanum or lurida of Linnaeus, as the belladonna or the solanum nigrum, common nightshade, or still, again, the henbane, is in- cluded. But no proof appears in fact of the connection of this tribe, and their sensible properties are not so remarkably disagreeable as to have led to their being employed in what appears to be a proverbial expression. Hiller, in his Hortophyctum (ii, 54), adds the centaury as a bit- ter plant, which, like others of the tribe of gentians, might answer all the passages in which rosh is mentioned, with the exception of that of Deut. xxxii, 32 where it is supposed to have a berried fruit. Dr. Harris, quoting Blayney on Jer. viii, 14, says, "In Ps. ixxix, 21, which is justly considered as a prophecy of our Saviour's suf- ferings, it is said, 'They gave me rosh to eat,' which the Sept. have rendered xalóv, gall. Accordingly, it is recorded in the history, Matt. xxxii, 34, 'They gave him vinegar to drink, mingled with gall,' ἐξεσπέραζεν μεθί χολᾶς. But in the parallel passage (Mark xv, 23) it is said to be 'wine mingled with myrrh,' a very biter ingredient.

From whence I am induced to think that χολᾶς, and perhaps rosh, may be used as a general name for whatever is exceedingly bitter: and, consequently, when the sense requires, it may be put specially for any bitter herb or plant, the infusion of which may be called ' wa- ters of rosh.' See Myrrh.

2. Laasaxi (τηλασασχ) occurs in the passages above cited and in a form of it is translated "womwood" (Deut. xxiii, 18; Prov. v, 14; Jer. xxii, 13; xxiii, 15; Lam. iii, 19; Amos v, 7); and only in a single passage it is rendered "hemlock" (Amos vi, 12). See WORMWOOD.

Hemmenway, Moses, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in 1735 at Framingham, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1756, and was ordained in the Congregational Church, at Westfield, Aug. 25, 1759, and continued in that pulpit until his death, April 5, 1811. He published Seven Sermons on the Obligation and Encouragement of the Unregenerate to labor for the Meat which endureth to everlasting Life (1767) — Vindication of the Power, Obligation, etc., of the Unregenerate to attend the Means of Grace, against the Exceptions of Samuel Hopkins in his Reply to Mills (1772) — Remarks on Rev. Mr. Hopkin's Answer to a Tract entitled "A Vindication," etc. (1774) — A Discourse concerning the Divine Institution of Water Baptism as a standing Ordinance of the Gospel (1781) — A Discourse on the Nature and Subjects of Christian Baptism (1781) — Discourse on the Constitution of the Church, in which the several Acceptations of the Word are explained, etc. (1792) — Remarks on the Rev. Dr. Ennemos' Dissertation on the Scriptural Qualifications for Admission and Access to the Christian Sacraments, and on his Discourses on Besler's Church (1793); and several occasional sermons — Sprague, Ammaile, l, 541.

Hemmerlin or Hämmerlein, Felix (Mollers- bo), a Swiss theologian, was born at Zurich in 1809. After studying the canon law at the University of Er- furt he went to Rome. On his return to Switzerland in 1421 he was appointed canon at Zofingen, and the year after he was made provost of St. Ursus, in Solothurn. With the revenues of these livings he collected a large library. He took part in the Council of Basle (1441-3), and was conspicuous there for his zeal in forming ecclesi- astical discipline. He made many bitter enemies, and in 1439 they made an attempt on his life, and wounded him seriously. This did not, however, deter him from continuing his work of the destruction of the ancient canons, and the general kof discipline. After long continued disputes with his colleagues at Zurich, he was stripped, through their influence, of all his emoluments. He also drew upon himself the hatred of a party of his country- men by the thirteenth chapter of his treatise De Nobilita- tate, in which he inveighed against the professions of canonesses, who in 1442 made war on his native city. Some mem- bers of this party, who attended the Carnival at Zurich in 1554, seized Hemmerlin and carried him to Constance, where he was thrown into prison, and treated with great cruelty. He was unwilling to retract any of his writings, and was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in a convent. He was taken to a monastery of bare-footed monks at Lucerne, and died there in 1457, a martyr to his devotion, not, indeed, to evangelical, but to ecclesiastical discipline. Many of his writings are collected in Variae Objectiones Opuscula et Tractatus (Basel, 1497, fol.).—Hoefer, *Nova. Bibl. Gen. fol. xxiii, 209; Reber, Patr. Hamburg. (Zurich, 1746); Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, v. 732.

Hemming (Hemmingius), Nicolas, an eminent theologian of Denmark, was born in the isle of Lolland in 1518. He studied four years at Wittenberg under Melanchthon, and imbibed his mild spirit. Returning to Denmark, he became preacher, and afterwards professor of Hebrew and theology at Copenhagen. In 1557 he became professor of theology and vice-chancellor. He was a voluminous writer in exegetical, dogmatical, and practical theology, and his Latin style is highly praised. Opposing the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity, he was greatly reproached by the Lutherans as a Crypto-Calvinist. (See Jesuit, Cal. 1474) He expressed himself on the Eucharist in a conciliatory way; but this so-called recantation has been interpreted in accordance with the Calvinistic doctrine, as well as with the Lutherans. In 1579 he was made canon of Roskilde, where he died in peace in 1600. His Opuscula Theologica, including his shorter treatises, were edited by Gouart (Geneva, 1866, fol.).

Hemsen, Johann Tychsen, a German theologian, was born at Bolsilixum (Schleswig) Oct. 15, 1792. He studied at Copenhagen and Göttingen, where he graduated in 1821. In 1823 he became extraordinary professor of theology in the University of Göttingen, and died there May 14, 1874. He wrote Aurea aureae Aureum (Leips., 1824); Die Authenticität der Schriften des Evangelisten Johanneae (Schleswig, 1823); against Breitschneider's Probabilism:—De Christologia Joannis Baptistae (Götter, 1824);—Der Apostel Paulus, sei Leben, Wirken, und seine Schriften, posthumous (Götter, 1830, 8vo), etc. He also wrote in the _telete Ausagein of Göttingen, and the Neue Kritik, Bibliothek of Seebold; and edited Statullin's Gesch. u. Literatur der Kirchengesch. (Hanover, 1827), and Berenjanya Turonensis Liber de sacra Cana, adaeros Laurinianus (Leips., 1830). See Newer Neukritik and Theologen (1800; 1832).—9th, 357, x, 219, B. G. (1824).—*Xt, 219, B. G. (1824).—9th, 357, x, 219, B. G. (1824).

Hen (Heb. 'en, 'a bird, especially the domestic fowl, Matt. xxiii, 37; Luke xiii, 34). We have no evidence that the ancient Hebrews were accustomed to the breeding of poultry, but that the later Jews were acquainted with it (Chald. תנינא is evident from 2 Esdras i, 29; Matt. xxiii, 37; Luke xiii, 34; xxii, 60, 61. Michal. is of his head the 1. The location of the common hen is referred to in Jer. xvii, 11. The original country of the common poultry fowl is India, where it is called the jungle bird. See Cock. The metaphor used in the passages of the Gospels where the term "hen" occurs has always been admired for its beauty.

When the hen sees a bird of prey coming, she makes a noise to assemble her chickens, that she may cover them with her wings from the danger. The Roman army, as an eagle, was about to fall upon the Jews; our Lord expresses a desire to guard them from threatened calamities, but they disregarded his invitations and warnings, and fell as a nation into captivity. The word "hen" is used in the same specific sense in classical Greek (Aristoph. Afr. 102, Vesp. 811. That a bird so intimately connected with the household, and so common in Palestine, as we know from Rabbinical sources (Otho, Lex. Robb. p. 256), should receive such slight notice, is certainly singular (see Reland, De gallis canv. Hier. au- dio, Rotterd. 1709; Detharding, 2d. Ross. 1723); it is almost equally singular that it is nowhere represented in the paintings of ancient Egypt (Wilkinson, i. 234). See Fowl.

He'na (Heb. Hena, 'a bird; signif. unknown; Sept. 'Awi, but in Isa. xxvii, 13, blends with the following name into Avavyyouqua, q. d.; Avat-ara; Vulg. Ama, a city (apparently of Mesopotamia) mentioned in connection with Avaraim and Ivah as one of those overthrown by Sennacherib before his invasion of Ju- dea (2 Kings xxvii, 34; xix, 18; Isa. xxxvii, 13). Ac- cording to the conjecture of Busching (Erdbeschri. xi, 283, 757), it is the town which is still called by the Arabs Awaq. It lies on the Euphrates, amid gardens, which are rich in dates, citrons, oranges, pomegranates, and other fruits. The modern site is on the right bank of the stream, while the name also attaches to some ruins a little lower down upon the left bank; but between them is a string of islands* (Cheyne's Eupha- rtes Expedition, i, 180), upon one of which stands a castle. Perhaps it is the ancient Avath, perhaps the ancient Avat, or, in ancient times, the city lay, for the most part, or entirely, upon this island, for Abufelde says that "Avat is a small town on an island in the middle of the Euphrates" (see Assemanni, *Bell. Orient. III, iii, 717; Mi- chaelis, Suppl. p. 562. The inhabitants are chiefly Arabs and Jews. Conjecture further identifies Awaq with a town called Awaq († merely the feminine termina- tion), which is mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions as situated on an island in the Euphrates (Fox Talbot's Assyrian Texts, p. 21; Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, p. 355), at some distance below its junction with the Cha- bour, and which appears as Anatho (Avatho) in Isidore of Charax (Mansi. P. P. p. 4). Hititaw, however (Com- ment. on Isa. Lc. 67), is a more probable appellation, equivalent to "the Lowland," and in this signification Furst (Heb. Leckion, s. v.) concurs (q. d. 722; see Canaan. Comp. Sepharvaim.

Hēnadād (Heb. Chenadād, probably for hē- nēdād, fuvor of Hodiad; Sept. 'Ha'ad, a Levite whose sons were active in the enterprises of the restoration after the captivity (Ezra iii, 9); two of the latter, Bavi and Binnui, are named (Neh. iii, 18, 24; x, 9). B.C. ante 585.

Hendel, William, D.D., one of the pioneers of the German Reformed church, born in N. Y., in the Palatinate in the first half of the 18th century. Having completed his theological studies, he came to America in 1764, and in Jan. 1765 became pastor of the German Reformed congregation at Lancaster, Pa. During the years 1769-1782 he had charge of the congregation at Tulpehocken, and neighboring congregations. Indeed, he served as many as nine at a time, besides making frequent missionary excursions. In Sept. 1782, he accepted a call to return to his Lancaster congregation. He was made D.D. by the College of New Jersey in 1788. In February, 1794, he removed to Philadelphia, which was the last station. Shortly before his death, yellow fever broke out the second time, and while faithfully ministering to the sick and dying, he died of the fever Sept. 29, 1798. Dr. Hendel was a good scholar, and a man of great public talents.—Harbaugh, Fathers of the Reformed Church, ii, 129 sq.

Henderson, Alexander, a minister of the Church of Scotland, was, in 1765, an appositor in Fifeshire about 1583. He studied at St. Andrew's, where he passed A.M. in 1603, and where, about 1610, he was professor of philosophy. About 1615 (according to McCrie) he was presented to the parish of Leuchars by archbishop Gladstanes. As the episcopal government employed every means to secure with the people, they resisted Mr. Henderson's settlement, even to the extent of closing the church doors against him. In a few years, however, Henderson became convinced that "episcopacy was unauthorized by the Word of God, and inconsistent with the reformed Constitution of the Church of Scotland." He entered into the strife against presbytery with great vigor. In 1619 he was called before the High Commission at St. Andrew's, but defended himself successfully. When the episcopal liturgy was restored to the Church of Scotland, he joined the resistance made to it. He was one of the writers of the renewed "League and Covenant," sworn to by thousands at Grayfriars' Church, Edinburgh, March 1, 1638. He was moderator of the famous General Assembly of that year, and he executed the functions of his office with great ability. At the nineteenth session Henderson preached a powerful sermon, and at its close pronounced the sentence of deposition (against the bishops) which had been adopted by the Assembly. He was removed, much against his will, in 1638, from the church at Leuchars to Edinburgh. In 1640 he was made master of the University of Edinburgh. During 1642 he was employed in managing the correspondence with England regarding reform and union of the churches. In 1643 he was again moderator of the General Assembly; and in that year he was put to sea and carried to the Scilly Islands as a minister, Assembly, and he resided in London for three years. In 1645 he was appointed to assist the commissioners of Parliament to treat with the king at Uxbridge, and also at Newcastle in 1646. In the papers on episcopacy delivered by him in these conferences he displayed great eloquence and ability. He was moderator of the Assembly of Divines in Germany in his time. He was not an elegant writer, and his translations of Scripture are not always in good taste; but most persons competent to judge will agree to Dr. W. L. Alexander's judgment that "his contributions to Biblical literature are among the most valuable... he has produced, either by his lectures on inspiration, and his commentaries on Isaiah and the Minor Prophets." His writings include Iceland, Journal of a Residence in that Island (Edinb. 1818, 2 vols, 8vo); — Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia, with Observations on the Rabindral and Corish Jews (Lond. 1826, 8vo); — A translation of M. F. Boss, Exposition of Daniel (1811, 8vo); — The Mystery of Godliness, on 1 Tim. iii, 16 (Lond. 1830); — Divine Inspiration (Lond. 1836, often reprinted, 8vo); — Commentary on Isaiah, with a new translation (Lond. 1840, 8vo); — Comm. on Jeremiah, with tr. (Lond. 1853, 8vo); — Comm. on Ezekiel (Lond. 1855, 8vo). He edited, with additions, Stuart's translation of Ernesti, Elements of Interpretation (1827, 12mo), Agell. Guttini Lexicon Sacri (1836, 24mo), and a new edition of Buck, Theological Dictionary (Lond. 1843). His life of Dr. Henderson has recently been issued (1869).

Henderson, John, a Scotch merchant and philanthropist, was born in 1782 at Borrowstoun — was bred to business, and was eminently successful in trade. His religious life was even more eminent than his mercantile zeal, and he devoted a large part of his time to benevolence. He took especial interest in the observance of the Lord's Day, and offered prizes to working-men for essays on Sabbath observance (St. Louis). He was one of the most active promoters of the Evangelical Alliance (q. v.), and contributed largely to its funds. The Waldensian churches, as well as Foreign Missions, received large benefactions from him; while at home, he was a constant and liberal contributor to the churches, and for all works of benevolence. It is said that for years his charitable outlays amounted to more than £43,000 a year. He died at his residence, The Park, near Glasgow, May 1, 1867. — Evangelical Christendom, June, 1867.

But he found work in the north of Europe in the circulation of the Bible, which occupied him for twenty years. After several years spent in this way in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, he was deputed by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1814 to proceed to Iceland on a similar mission; and in 1819 he was sent through Russia on the same errand. In 1826 he was appointed president of the Missionary College at Hoxton; and in 1830 he was made professor of theology and Biblical literature at the Highbury College. he became earnestly interested in religion and theology. In 1824 he became privatscienent in theology at Berlin; in 1826, professor extraordinary; in 1828, ordinary professor; and in 1829, doctor of theology. For many years his organ was the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, begun in 1827, which he conducted during its active and often stormy career, has rendered great service against Rationalism, but has also been noted for its violent polemical spirit in favor of Lutheranism, and, of late, even of Idealism, as well as of absolutism in Church and State. He was, after 1834, a bitter opponent of the union of the Lutheran and Reformed churches in Prussia, so much desired by Frederick William III, and by Neun der and other leading theologians, against whom Hengstenberg’s severity of language was often inexcusable. His contributions to the Kirchenzeitung, during his four or five years’ connection with it, are noticeable to make many volumes; but he was, besides, a laborious writer, especially in exegetical theology. He died June 3, 1869.

Henhöfer, Alloys, a German divine, was born at Völkenbach, near Ettingen, of Roman Catholic parents, July 11, 1789. His mother destined him for the Roman Catholic priesthood, and hoped that he would become a missionary. He studied at the University of Freiburg, and at the Roman Catholic Seminary of Meersburg. After his ordination as priest, he was tutor for some years in a noble family, and in 1818 became pastor at Mühlhausen. Here he soon found the need of a deeper personal religious life, and was greatly edified by the conversation of Fink, one of Salder’s disciples, and by reading the Life of Martin Boos. His preaching became earnestly evangelical, and crowds flocked to hear him. He orthodoxy was soon questioned, and, on examination, he avowed his doubts as to the Romanist doctrine of the Mass. His excommunication followed (Oct. 16, 1822), and gave occasion to his book Christisches Glaubenber- kennniss d. Pfarers Henhöfer’s. A flock of his converts speedily gathered around him, and in 1823 he was installed as its Evangelical Protestant pastor. In 1827 he was called to Speck, near Carlsruhe, where he labored as pastor for thirty-five years. His influence was felt widely in the revival of evangelical religion throughout Baden. He died December 5, 1862. Besides numerous pamphlets on the Roman Catholic controversy, and on practical questions, he published Der Kampf des Un- glaubens mit Aberglauben u. Glauben (Leipzig 1833). — Zeit (Heidelberg, 1861). — Predigten (posthumous), Heidelberg, 1863. See also Frommel, Aus dem Leben des Dr. Alloys Henhöfer (Carlsruhe, 1855, 8vo).

Henke, Heinrich Philipp Konrad, a German theologian, was born at Hehlen, in Brunswick, July 3, 1792. His early proficiency was so great that before he went to the university he was employed as a gymnasium teacher (1771–72). After studying philosophy and theology at Helmstadt, he was made professor of philosophy there in 1777, and in 1780 professor of theology. In 1787 he became a canon at Helmstadt, where he remained thirty years. After a very successful career, both as teacher and writer, he died May 2, 1809. In theology he belonged to the rationalistic school of Semler, and his Church History is written in a spirit of bitter hatred of ecclesiastical authority. His Life by Bollmann appeared at Helmstadt in 1791, and has made great merits, but his rationalistic views have made his writings shortlived. His reputation chiefly rests on his Allgemeine Geschichte der Christlichen Kirche (Brunsw. 1799–1808, 6 vols. 8vo; finished by Vater, 1813–20, 20 vols. vii and viii). It is "a clever and spirited work; but the Church appears in it, not as the temple of God on earth, but as a great immorality or bedlam" (Schaaf, Ch. History, i, 22; see also Kahnis, German Protestantism, p. 177). He wrote also, Lociamenta institutionum fidei christianae historic-criticarum (Helmstadt, 1788; 2d ed. 1793; German, 1803). — Magazin für d. christlichen Bibliothek, etc. (Berlin, 1806, 2 vols.). See F. A. Lubowitz, Aloris einer Lebenvegetz. Henke; Hoeft, Nov. Biog. Générale, xxiii, 933.

Henkel, Charles, was descended from a long line of ministerial ancestors in the Lutheran Church. He was born May 18, 1796, in New Market, Va. He studied theology under the direction of his father, the Rev. Paul Henkel, who was licensed to preach in 1790, and became pastor in 1818, and immediately commenced his ministry in Mason County, Va. In 1820 he removed to Columbus, Ohio, and in this field continued, amid many deprivations and toils, till 1827, when he took charge of the Somerset par- torate. His health, however, gradually failed, and he died Feb. 2, 1841. He was a man of high moral worth, and a diligent student. Several of his sermons were published. On one occasion he engaged in a public controversy with a Roman Catholic priest, and was very successful in exposing the absurdities of that false sys- tem. (M. L. S.)

Henkel, Paul, a divine of the American Lutheran Church, was born in Rowan County, N. C., Dec. 15, 1754. In 1776 he was awakened under the preaching of Whitefield. At that time was exciting deep interest throughout the country. He commenced a course of study under the direction of pastor Krich, of Frederick, Md., with a view to the Lutheran ministry. He was licensed to preach by the Synod of Pennsylvania, and in 1792 became pastor at New Market, Va. His labors extended to Augusta, Madison, Pendleton, and Wythe counties. His position was very much that of an itinerant missionary, visiting destitute portions of the Church, gathering together the scattered members, instructing and confirming the youth, and administering the sacra- ments. In 1800 he accepted a call to Rowan, his native county, N. C.; but, the location being unfavorable to the health of his family, he removed in 1805 to New Mar- ket, and labored as an independent missionary, preaching wherever his services were required, and depending for his support solely upon the good-will of the people. He was a popular tourist, and in the following years visited Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio. In 1809 he wrote a work on Christian Baptism in the German lan- guage, which he subsequently translated into English. In 1810 he published a German hymn-book, and in 1816 one in English. He died in 1823, in Hanover, on his own composition. In 1811 he published his German, and, so in after, his English Cat. chism. He also published a German...
Man work in rhyme, entitled Zeitschriften, designed to satirize the fanaticism, the folly, and vices of the day. Mr. Henkel adhered with great tenacity to the standards and usages of his Church. In the earlier part of his ministry he approved of some of the alterations made by Melanchthon in the Augsburg Confession, but at a later period his doctrinal position returned to the Confession. As a preacher he had more than ordinary power. He educated a large number of candidates for the ministry, who have occupied responsible positions in the Lutheran Church. His habits of life were plain and simple, and, although opposed to everything that looked like excitement in the discharge of his official duties, he invariably wore his clerical robes. In person he was large and well formed, measuring nearly six feet in height. Five of his sons became ministers in the Lutheran Church. Towards the close of his life he was attacked with paralysis, and died November 17, 1825. (M. L. S.)

Hennepin, Louis, a Recollect missionary and traveler, was born in Flanders about 1640. In 1675 he was sent to Canada, and in 1678 started to accompany the traveler Lasalle. He founded a convent at Fort Carillon, and with two other monks followed Lasalle in his tour among the Indians. In 1680, he returned to France, and in 1689, with another person named Dacan, to find the sources of the Mississippi. They followed the stream up to the 46° lat. north, but were stopped by a fall which Hennepin called Sault de St. Antoine de Padoue. He was then for eight months a prisoner among the Sioux, but was liberated by the French, and returned to Quebec April 5, 1682. After his return to Europe he was for a while keeper of the convent of Renty, in Artois, and finally retired to Holland. The date of his death is not ascertained. Hennepin disparaged the Jesuits as missionaries, and was, in turn, disparaged by the Jesuits. He wrote Description de la Louisiane, etc., with the carte du pays, les mœurs et la manière de vivre des savages (1688 and 1688, 12mo; 1688, 4to):—Nouvelle Découverte d'un très grand pays situé dans l'Amérique, entre le Nouveau Mexique et la mer Glaciale, avec cartes, etc., and the advantages which one can profit from this establishment of the colonies (Utrecht, 1697, 12mo); and in the Recueil des Voyages au Nord, vol. 11, etc.:—Recueil des voyages dans le Nord, etc., 1678, 12mo. Henninger, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Washington Co., Va.; was converted while young; entered the Western Conference in 1807; was made presiding elder in 1816 on French-Broad District, located in 1816, and yet labored with zeal until he entered the itinerancy in Holston Conference in 1825, and so labored until his death, Dec. 3, 1829. Mr. Henninger was a faithful, popular, and successful minister, and a consistent and devout Christian. During the latter part of his life he was very efficient as presiding elder, and as agent for Holston College—Ministerial Conference, 1823: 56; Radford, Methodism in Kentucky, iv, 57.

He'noch (1 Chron. i. 3, 33). See ENOCH.

Henoticon (Gk. ἕνοτικον, unifying into one), the name given to a "Decree of Union" issued by the Greek emperor Zeno, A.D. 482, by the advice of Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, with a view to reconcile the Monophysites and the orthodox to the profession of one faith. It recognised the Nicene and Constantinopolitan creeds, but did not name the decrees of Chalcedon. It thus required a sacrifice of opinion on the part of the Monophysites; but, at the same time, it deprived the orthodox of the advantages they had gained at the Council of Chalcedon. The Roman patriarch, Felix II, condemned it in 462, and in 518 it was suppressed.—Moebius, Church Hist. cent. v, pt. ii, ch. v, § 19. The Henoticon is given, in Greek, in Gieseler, Ch. Hist. i, § 106. See Monophysites.

Henry of Ghent (Henricus de Gandavo; proper name Gothael), a theologian of the 18th century. He was born at Ghent in 1217, studied at the University of Paris, and was a pupil of Albertus Magnus. Admitted to lecture at the latter's faculty, he was required to become, in addition to his work as a teacher of philosophy and theology, and obtained the surname of Doctor Scolenius. "He was endowed with great sagacity of understanding, attached to the system of the Realists, and blended the ideas of Plato with the formularies of Aristotle; attributing to the first a real existence of the divine Intellect, and, to the second, a true knowledge of the divine Intelligency. He suggested some new opinions in the philosophy of natural theology, and detected many speculative errors, without, however, suggesting corrections for them, owing to the faultiness of the method of the philosophy of his time" (Tennemann). Henry became canon, and afterwards archdeacon of Tourna, and died there A.D. 1283. His writings are, Quaestiones in lib. Sententiarum (Paris, 1518, fol. reprinted, with commentary by Zucolli, 1613, 2 vols. fol.);—Summa Theologiae (Paris, 1520, fol.);—De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis (in Fabricius, Bibl. Ercl.). See Duppl., Eccles. Writers, cent. xiii; Ritter, Greek, d. Philosophus, xi, ii, p. 138; Mommsen, Monumenta Graec., ii. 97; etc.

Henry of Gorcum (Henricus Gorcumensis), so named from his birthplace, Gorcum, in Holland, a philosopher and theologian of the 15th century, vice-chancellor of the Academy of Cologne. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle, Aquinus, and Peter Lombard; also Tract. de ceremoniis Ecclesiasticis:—De Celebrat. Festorum:—Contra Hussitae.

Henry of Huntingdon, an early English historian, was born about the end of the 11th century. He became archdeacon of Huntingdon before 1123. At the request of Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, he wrote a general history of England, from the landing of Julius Caesar to the death of Henry I (1154), in eight books. It is to be found in Savin's Scriptores post Bedam procati (Lond. 1596, fol.; Franc. 1601); also in English, The Chronicle of Henry of Huntingdon, etc., edited by T. Forester (Lond. 1863, sm. 8vo).—Warton (Anghia Sacra, ii, 694) gives a letter of Henry of Huntingdon to the abbot of Ramsey, advising Waldensians not to be contemptuous, which contains many curious anecdotes of the kings, nobles, prelates, and other great men who were his contemporaries. It is given at o. in D'Achery, Spicilegium, iii, 503.—English Cyclog. adiut. Darling, Cyclog. Bibliographica, 1613; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. (Anglo- Norman Period).—Henry of Lausanne (frequently called Henry of Cluny), founder of the sect of Henriicans in the 12th century. He is represented by Papal writers as a heretic and fanatic, but the truth seems to be that he was one of the "reformers before the Reformation." He is said to have been an Italian by birth, and a monk of Cluny. Disgusted with the corruptions of the times, he left his order, and became "a preacher of repentance." At first he was held in high honor even by the clergy. The field of his labor was the South of France; the time between A.D. 1116 and 1148. His first efforts were made at Lausanne and its neighborhood (hence his surname). His piety, modesty, and eloquence soon gained him a wide reputation. He preached vigorously against that "sham Christianity which did not prove its genuineness by the fruits of good living; and warning against the prevalent vices. This led him next to warn men against their false guidance, whose example and teaching did more to promote wickedness than to put a stop to it. He restated the clergy as they actually were with what they ought to be: he attacked their vices, particularly their unchastity. He was a zealot for the observance of the laws of celibacy, and against this, in his time, a promoter of the Hildebrandian reformation. It was to the contrary. His practical, restless activity, and the opposition that he met with on the part of the higher clergy, which led him to proceed further, and, as he traced the cause of the corruption to a deviation from the primitive apostolic teaching, to attack errors in doctrine. He must have possessed extraordinary power as a speaker, and he was an enthusiastic and strict moralist. Many men and women were awakened by him to repentance, brought to confess their sins, and to renounce them. It was said a heart of stone must have melted under his preaching. The people were struck under such conviction by his sermons, which seemed to lay open to them their own hearts, that they attributed to him a sort of prophetic gift, by virtue of which he could look into the very souls of men (Neander, Church History, Torrey's, iv, 599).

He was invited to Mrs., where Hildebert, the bishop, favored him at first; but his preaching soon excited the people against the priests to such a degree that even the monasteries were threatened with violence. Hildebert drove him from Mans; and, after various wanderings, he joined the disciples of Peter of Bruys, in Provence. The archbishop of Arles arrested him, and at the second Council of Pisa, 1134, he was declared a heretic, and condemned to be expelled from the kingdom. Subsequently, however, he was set at liberty, when he betook himself again to South France, to the districts of Toulouse and Alby, a principal seat of anti-churchly tendencies, where also the great lords, who were striving to make themselves independent, freed him from their enmities from hatred to the innovations of the clergy. Among the lower classes and the nobles Henry found great acceptance; and, after he had labored for ten years in those regions, Bernard of Clairvaux, in writing to a nobleman and inviting him to put down the heretics, could say, 'The churches are without flocks, the flocks without priests; the priests are nowhere treated with due reverence, the churches are levelled down to synagogues, the sacraments are not esteemed holy, the festivals are no longer celebrated.' When Bernard says, in the words just quoted, that the communities are without priests, he means that the priests had gone over to the Huguenists, so far as he complains in a sermon, in which he speaks of the rapid spread of this sect: 'Women forsake their husbands, and husbands their wives, and run over to this sect. Clergymen and priests desert their communities and churches; and they have been found sitting with long beards (to mark the libri apostolici) among weavers' (Neander, l. c.).

Bernard of Clairvaux opposed him earnestly. Pope Eugene III sent Bernard, with the cardinal of Ostia, into the infected district. Henry was arrested, and condemned at the Council of Rheims, A.D. 1148, to imprisonment for life. He died in prison A. H. 1171, of hunger, M. E. (1171, in prison at Rheims, Neander, Ch. Henry of St. Ignatius, a Flemish theologian, was born at Ath in the 17th century. He joined the Carthusian community at Arras city, and for many years taught theology in their schools. During a tour he made to Rome in 1701-1709, he acquired great influence with pope Clement XI. On his return he wrote a number of books of Jansenist tendency, and in which he showed himself especially severe on the Jesuit casuists. He died about 1729. The most important of his writings are, Theologiae vetus, fundamentalis (Liege, 1677, fol.).—Molitoris professiorum (Liege, 1715, 2 vols. 8vo):—Artis Jesu- listica (Bras, 3d ed. 1710; 4th ed. 1717, 12mo):—

Henry IV, king of France and Navarre, son of Antoine de Bourbon and Jeanne d'Albret, was born at Pau, in Bearc, Dec. 15, 1553. He was carefully educated in Protestant principles by his excellent mother, who recalled him to her home at Pau from the French court in 1566. In 1569 he joined the Huguenot army at La Rochelle, and was acknowledged as their leader, the actual commander in chief being his father (see Henry IV, v.). The peace of St. Germain (1570) allowed him to return to court, and in 1572 he married Margaret, sister of Charles IX. The massacre of St. Bartholomew followed soon after, and Henry's life was only spared on that awful night on his promise to become a Roman Catholic. The Gallican faction, however, suspected his sincerity, and in 1588 all France was peaceably subject to him. "Henry was censured for his change of religion, and by none more earnestly than by his faithful friend and counselor, Duplessis Mornay. On the other hand, many of his enemies charged him with insincerity to be sincere. But the truth probably was, that Henry, accustomed from his infancy to the life of camps and the hurry of dissipation, was not capable of serious religious meditation, and that he knew as little of the religion which he forsakes as of that which he embraced. In his long conferences at Chateau in September, 1589, with Duplessis Mornay, which took place after his abjuration, he told his friend that the step he had taken was one not only of prudence, but of absolute necessity; that his affections remained the same towards his friends and subjects of the Reformed communion; and he expressed a hope that he should one day be able to bring about a union between the two religions, which, he observed, differed less in essentials than was supposed. To this Duplessis replied that no such union could ever be effected in France unless the pope's power was first entirely abolished (Mém. et Correspondance de Duplessis Mornay depuis l'an 1571 jusqu'en 1625, Paris, 1824-34)" (English Cyclopedia, s. v.).

His reign was a very successful one, but we are concerned here only with its relations to the Church. On the 18th of April, 1598, Henry signed the Edict of Nanterre (April 6). See Duplessis Mornay, Hist. et Con- sens, and liberty of conscience. During Henry's life no public persecution of Protestants was possible, but the ignorant intolerance of the rural functionaries and priests often frustrated his good wishes and commands. On the 14th of May, 1619, he was assassinated in his carriage by one Ravailliac, supposed to have been a fool of the Jesuits.

Henry VIII, king of England, was born in Green- wich June 28, 1491. He was second son of Henry VII and queen Elizabeth (of York). His elder brother Arthur, prince of Wales, dying in 1502, Henry became heir-apparent. At 15, a dispensation was granted by Pope Julius II (pope) to allow Henry to marry his brother Arthur's widow (Catharine of Aragon) —a match which turned out sadly enough. Henry came to the throne April 22, 1509. The early years of his reign were comparatively peaceful. He married Catherine in 1509, and governed, for about fifteen years, with a view to his own ambition as well as to the passions of his master; but, on the whole, England prospered under his administration. See Wolsey. Henry was at this time an ardent advocate of Roman views; in 1521 he published his Adversus septem Sacramentorum adversus Martinum Lutherum (4to), for which service the pope conferred on him the title of Defender Fidei, which the sovereigns of England still retain. (See, for details of the controversy between Henry and Luther, Waddington, History of the Reformation, ch. xxi.) In a few years Henry began to grow weary of his queen. His male children died, and he fancied that Provence deprived of his heir was more valuable than the gratification of his passions. Moreover, the Spanish queen was unpopular in England. Henry had recourse to an expedient suggested by Cranmer, "namely, to consult all the universities of Europe on the question 'whether the papal dispensation for such a marriage was valid, and to act on their decision without further appeal to the pope.' The question was accordingly put, and decided in the negative by the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Paris, Bologna, Padua, Orleans, Angiers, Bourges, Toulouse, etc., and by a multitude of theologians and canonists" (Palmer, Ch. History, p. 159). Henry vaguely repudiated purposes and policies. The proceeds as soon as the divorce from Catharine could be accomplished. "Anne was understood to be favorably disposed towards those new views on the subject of religion and ecclesiastical affairs which had been agitating all Europe ever since Luther had begun his irrepressable career, and he now prepared to act as soon as possible years before. Queen Catharine, on the other hand, was a good Catholic; and, besides, the circumstances in which she was placed made it her interest to take her stand by the Church, as, on the other hand, her adversaries were dressed in like manner by their interests and the course of events. A new dispensation was accordingly granted, and all errors, heresies, and abuses in the Church: and ordering first-fruits and tenth of all spiritual benefices to be paid to the king. After this, various persons were executed for refusing to acknowledge the king's supremacy; among others, two illustrious victims, the learned Fisher, Archbishop of Winchester, and the melancholy began the dissolution of the monasteries, under the zealous superintendence of Cromwell, constituted for that purpose visitor general of these establishments. Lati-nator and other friends of Cranmer and the Reformation were now also connected with the king's party, so that not only in matters of discipline and polity, but even of doctrine, the Church might be said to have separated itself from Rome. One of the last acts of the Parliament under which all these great innovations had been made was to petition the king that a new translation of the capitatures might be made by authority and set up in churches. It was dissolved on the 18th of July, 1536, after having sat for the then unprecedented period of six years. The month of May of this year witnessed the trial and execution of queen Anne—in less than six months after the death of her great rival, Catherine of Aragon—and the marriage of the brutal king, the very next morning, to Jane Seymour, the new beauty, his passion for whom must be regarded as the true motive that had impelled him to the deed of blood. Queen Jane dying on the 14th of October, 1537, a few days af-er giving birth to a son, was succeeded by Anne, sister of the duke of Cleves, whom Henry married in January, 1540, and put away in six months after—the subservient Parliament, and the not less subservient convocation of the clergy, on his mere request, pronouncing the mar-rriage to be null, and the former body making it high treason 'by word or deed to accept, take, judge, or believe the said marriage to be good.' Meanwhile the ecclesiastical changes continued to proceed at as rapid rate as ever. In 1536 Cromwell was constituted a sort of lord lieutenant over the Church, by the title of vicar general, which was held to invest him with the king's authority over the spirituality. The dissolution of the monasteries in this and the following year, as carried forward under the direction of this energetic minister, produced a succession of popular insurrections in different parts of the kingdom, which were not put down without great destruction of life, both in the field and afterwards by the executioner. In 1538 all incumbents were ordered to set up in their churches copies of the newly-published English translation of the Bible, and to teach the people the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, in English; the famous image of our Lady at Wasingham, and other similar objects of the popular veneration, were also, under Cromwell's order, removed from their shrines and burnt" (English Cyclopaedia, s. v.).

But Henry never abandoned the special Romanist opinions in which he had committed himself personally by controversy. "When, in 1538, the princes of the League of Smalcald offered to place him at its head, and even to alter, if possible, the Augsburg Confession so as to make it a common basis of union for all the elements of opposition to Rome, Henry was well inclined to accept the political advantages of the position tendered him, but hesitated to accept it until all doctrinal questions should be settled. The three points on which the Germans insisted were the communion in both elements, the worship in the vulgar tongue, and the marriage of the clergy. Henry was firm, and the ambassadors of the Holy Roman Empire were asked to make him a conference with the English bishops and doctors without result. On their departure (Aug. 5, 1538) they addressed him a letter arguing the subjects in debate—the refusal of the cup, private masses, and sacerdotal celibacy—to which Henry replied only with a defense of his position on these topics with no little skill and dexterity, and refusing his assent finally. The Reformers, however, did not yet despair, and the royal preachers even ventured occasionally to debate the propriety of clerical marriage freely before them in his sermons, but in vain. Aug. 1538, and later. Mar. 1539. The court of Maranthon addressed him in April, 1539, arguing the same questions again, had no better effect. Notwithstanding any seeming hesitation, Henry's mind was fully made up, and the consequences of endeavoring to persuade him against his prejudices soon became apparent. Confirmed in his opinions, he proceeded to enforce them upon his subjects in the most arbitrary manner; 'for, though on all other points he had set up the doctrines of the Augsburg Confession, yet on these he had committed himself as a controversialist, and the worst passions of polemical authorship—the true cudgel theology—acting through his irresponsible disposition, rendered him the most cruel of persecutors. But a few weeks after receiving the letter of Melanthon, he answered it in his own savage fashion' (Lea, Sacerdotal Celibacy, p. 481). In 1539, under the ascendency of bishop Gardner (q. v.), the "Six Articles" were enacted, in favor of transubstantiation, communion in one kind, celibacy, private masses, and auricular confession. See ARTICLES, SIX, vol. I, p. 442. Cromwell endeavored to mitigate the severity of the government in its cruel persecutions of all who would not accept these articles, and lost his own head for his temerity in 1540. In the same year Henry married Catherine Howard, who, in 1541, was herself repudiated and executed for adultery. He then married his sixth wife, Catharina Parr, who survived him. The licentious monarch died Jan. 28, 1547.

Much has been made by Roman Catholic controversialists of the bad life of Henry VIII as an argument against the Reformation. On this point we cite Palmer, as follows: "The character of Henry VIII, or of any other temporal or spiritual promoters of reformation, is a subject of controversy (even when not exaggerated) no proof that the Reformation was in itself wrong. Admitting, then, that Henry and others were justly accused of crimes, the Reformation which they promoted may in itself have been a just and necessary work: and it would have been irrational and wrong in the Reformation to have reduced the system of the church to refusal to re-form themselves laudable, merely because the character of the king or his ministers were unsuitably, and his or their private motives suspected to be wrong. Such conduct on the part of the Church would have been needlessly offensive to temporal rulers, while it would (in the supposed case) have been actually injurious to the cause of religion, and an uncharitable judgment of private motives. It must be remembered that although Henry and the protector Somerset may have been secretly influenced by avarice, revenge, or other evil passions, they have never made them public. They showed no desire for supporting the Church in the desire of removing usurpations, establishing the ancient rights of the Church and the crown, correcting various abuses prejudicial to true religion, and therefore the Church could not refuse to take into consideration the specific object of reformation proposed by them to her examination of the questions tendered. The judgment of the Church of England in any degree depend on the question of the lawfulness of Henry's marriage with Catharine of Aragon or with Anne Boleyn; such matters, as Bossuet observes, "are often regulated by mere probability," and there were at least abundant probabilities that the marriage with Catherine of Aragon was null ab initio; but this whole question only affects the character of Henry VIII and of those immediately engaged in it; it does not affect the reformation of the Church of England" (Palmer, On the Church, part II, chap. i). See ENGLAND, CHURCH.

Henry, Matthew, a celebrated English nonconformist divine and commentator, was born at the farmhouse of Broad Oak, Flintshire, the dwelling of his maternal grandfather, Oct. 18, 1662. His parents had retired to that place because his father, Rev. Philip Henry (q. v.), had been ejected from his living in April, 1660, and the family's influence in 1662. His early education was obtained in the school of Mr. Doddellt at Elington. In 1685 he entered Gray's Inn as a student of law; but his religious life had been settled at an early age, and his bent of mind was towards the ministry. While at Gray's Inn he devoted much of his time to religious studies. In 1688 he returned to Broad Oak, and soon began to preach, by the invitation of his friend, Mr. Killighe, at Nantwich. The fame of his discourses having spread, he was invited to Chester, where he preached in the house of a Mr. Hen- thorne, a squire, or, to a small audience which formed the nucleus of his marriage congregation. But in 1687 King James granted license to dissenters to preach. Mr. Henry accepted a call to a dissenting congregation in Chester, where he remained twenty-five years. During this period he went through the Bible more than once in exppository lectures. In 1712 he accepted the charge of a chapel in Hackney, London. "At the commence- ment of his ministry, therefore, he began with the first chapter of Genesis in the forenoon, and the first chapter of Matthew in the afternoon. Thus gradually and steadily grew his 'Exposition' of the Bible. A large portion of his explanation of the parables of our Lord was written there. Not only was the fruitfulness of the quaint sayings and pithy remarks with which it abounds, and which give so great a charm of raciness to its pages, were the familiar extempore observations of his father at family worship, and noted down by Matthew in his boyhood." He suffered much from the stings in his later years, but his labors continued unabated. It was his habit to make a visit to Chester once a year. In 1714 he set out on this journey, May 31. On his return he was taken ill with paralysis at Nant- wich, where he said to his friend, Mr. Killighe, "You have seen me--you thought you had seen me--I am more, I am more--a life spent in the service of God, and communion with him, is the most pleasant life that any one can live in this world." He died June 22, 1714. Mr. Henry was a faithful pastor, a discriminating preacher, and a laborious, versatic, and original author. Although possessed of a genius for abstractive definition, in a literary point of view, than do the works of many who are justly designated 'fine writers,' they possess a vigor which, without the least endeavor to arrest, awakens and sustains the attention in an uncommon degree. In a single sentence he often pours upon the reader a flood of words, but he never gives to the wonders contained in God's law occasions excitement not unlike that which is produced by looking through a microscope. The feelings, too, which his Henry, Philip, an English dissenting divinity, was born Aug. 24, 1631, at the palace of Whitehall, where his father was page to James, duke of York. He was educated at Westminster School, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he obtained a scholarship in 1648. He was ordained as a Presbyterian minister in 1657, and settled at Werbourn, Flintshire. He married Miss Mathews, a lady of fortune, and became possessed of the estate of Broad Oak, Shropshire. He was driven out of his church by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. He was imprisoned in Newgate, and while there was sentenced to transportation to Georgia. After the year 1664, the saddest day for England since the death of Edward the Sixth, but even this for good." By the Convocation and Five-mile acts he was driven from his house, and compelled to seek safety in concealment. In 1667, when king James proclaimed liberty of conscience, Mr. H., who had already immediately put up part of his own house for worship. His labors were not confined to Broad Oak, but it was his habit to preach daily at different places in the neighborhood. But his labors hastened his rest; for, when writing to a friend who anxiously inquired after his health, he says, "I am always habitually weary, and expect no other till I lie down in the bed of spices." He died June 24, 1696, expressing, "O death, where is thy sting?" An account of his Life of Henry, to which a new introduction and other improvements have been added, and has often been reprinted (see Henry, Miscellaneous Works, vol. i; N. York, Carters, 1855, 2 vols. 8vo). A volume of his Sermons, with notes by Williams, was first published in 1810 (London, 8vo), and has since been reprinted in the Miscellaneous Memoirs of Henry, above cited. See Life by Matt. Henry; Jones, Christian Biography; Bogue and Bennett, History of the Dissenters, i, 433.

Henry, Thomas Charlton, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia Sept. 22, 1750, and educated at Middlebury College, Vt., where he graduated in 1814. After studying theology at Princeton, he was ordained in 1816; became pastor of a Presbyterian church in Columbia, S. C., 1818; and removed to the Second Church, Charleston, in 1824. In 1826 his health failed, and he spent several months travelling in Europe. He died in Charleston of yellow fever, Oct. 4, 1827. He published "For the West (1814) and an Inquiry into the Consistency of Popular Amusements with Christianity" (Charleston, 1825, 12mo) — "Eigitings from the Religious World" (Charleston, 1825, 8vo) — "Letters to an Anxious Inquirer" (1826, 12mo; also London, 1829, with a memoir of the author). — Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 826; Sprague, Annals, iv, 538.

Henschenius, Godfrey, a Dutch Jesuit and ecclesiastical historian, was born at Venrui, Flanders, Jan. 21, 1601. In 1635 he was appointed assistant to Bolandus in compiling the Acta Sanctorum (q. v.). After the death of Bolandus in 1665, when only five volumes of that work had made their appearance, father Daniel Paperbarch was charged with a very great part of completing it. Henschenius continued the work until his death in 1681.—Alegambe, Script. Soc. Jesu, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, xxv, 231.

Henshaw, John K., D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Middletown, Conn., June 17, 1832, and passed A.B. in Middlebury College in 1858. He was ordained a deacon of D. D. was conferred upon him by Middlebury College. In 1848 he was elected bishop of Rhode Island, and made rector of Grace Church, Providence. He was alike energetic and successful in his parish and in his diocese, and during his administration the Church grew not only in numbers, but in power. In 1852 he was called to perform episcopal functions in the diocese of Maryland during bishop Whittingham's absence; and on the 19th of July, 1852, he died of apoplexy, near Frederick, Maryland. Bishop Henshaw was a man of clear, sound, and vigorous intellect; he was trained to the patient labor of a Congregationalist, but, under the influence of Rev. Dr. Kewley, then of Middletown, he became religious, and entered the Protestant Episcopal Church. Bishop Griswold appointed him a lay reader, and by his zealous labors several congregations were established in different parts of Vermont. On his twenty-first birthday he was ordained a priest. After he was called to St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., where, on his twenty-fourth birth-day (June 13, 1816), he was ordained priest. In 1817 he was called to St. Peter's, Baltimore, where he served as pastor with uninterrupted success for twenty-six years.

(1 Kings iv, 10). The locality thus indicated would seem to be in the vicinity of Um-Burj, south of Suwei-chen.

2. The youngest son of Gilead, and great-grandson of Manasseh (Numb. xxvi, 82). He was the father of Zelophhehad (Numb. xxvii, i; Josh. xvi, 3, 3), and his descendants are called HERHERITES (Numb. xxvi, 82).
B.C. ante 1618.

3. The second son of Ashur (a descendant of Judah) by one of his wives, Naharah (1 Chron. iv, 6). B.C. cir-1612.

4. A Mecherathite, one of David’s heroes, according to 1 Chron. xi, 36; but the text is apparently corrupt, so that this name is either an interpolation, or identical with the ELIPHALET of 2 Sam. xxiii, 34. See UR.

He'pherite (Heb. Chephrite, חֵפֶרִי, Sept. Otepē, a descendant of HEPHER 2 (Numb. xxvi, 82).

Hep'zi-bah (Heb. Chephzī-bah, חֵפֵצִי בָּה, my delight is in her), a (fem.) real and also symbolical name.

1. (Sept. Ἔψαβα, Vulg. Hephzibah.) The mother of king Manasseh, and one of the concubines of king Hezekiah (2 Kings xxii, 1). Notwithstanding the piety of her husband, and her own amiable name, her irreligion may be inferred from the character of her son.
B.C. 709-696.

2. (Sept. Θησάμα Ιωάννης, Vulg. Valentus maior in ea.) A
favor (in the return from the Captivity, and especially in the Messiah’s advent), in contrast with her predicted desolation (Isa. liii, 4).

Heracles, ST., patriarch of Alexandria, was a brother of Philarch, who was martyred about A.D. 204, under Septimius Severus. They had both been heathen, but were converted by Origen, who was then teaching at Alexandria. After escaping from the persecution to which his brother fell victim, Heracles became an ascetic, but still continued to study Greek philosophy under Ammonius Saccas. He was next associated with Origen as a catechist, and when the latter was compelled to leave Egypt on account of his difficulty with Demetrius of Alexandria, Heracles remained alone in charge of the theological school of that city. He retained this position until he became himself patriarch.
He died in 246. The Roman martyrlogy commemorates him on the 14th of July. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vi, 15; Tillemont, Mémoires Écclés. vol. iii; Baillet, Vie des Saints, July 14th.

Heracleon. See HERACLEONITES.

Heracleonites, a Gnostic sect of the 3rd century, so named from Heracleon (a disciple of Valentinus), who was distinguished for his scientific bent of mind. "He wrote a commentary on the Gospel of St. John, considerable fragments of which have been preserved by Origen;
and physical world is also the law of the individual; whatever, therefore, is, is the wisest and the best; and it is not for man's welfare that his wishes should be fulfilled; sickness makes health pleasant, as hunger does gratification, and labor rest.

Heracleus formed no inconsiderable portion of the ecclesiastical system of the later Stoics, and in times still more recent there is much in the theories of Schelling and Hegel that presents a striking though general resemblance thereto. Hegel declared that the doctrine of Heracles, that all things are "perpetual flux and reflux," was an anticipation of his own dogmas. "Being is the same with non-being." The fragments of Heracles that have been collected from Plutarch, Stobaeus, Clemens of Alexandria, and Sextus Empiricus, and explained by Schleiermacher in Wolf and Böttmann's "Museum der Athentischenwissenschaft," vol. 1 (English Cyclopaedia. Prof. Bernays, of Bonn, gathered from Hippocrates a series of quotations from Heracles, and published them under the title Heracles (1848). The "Epistles which bear the name of Heracles are spurious, growing up and, with values (Gen. ii, 11, 12, 129), the physical doctrines of Heracles, as certain to be added in support of other interpretations, and as there are fruits, such as that of the egg-plant, which are used as articles of diet, and for which the fruit of the plinkyth, or wild gourd, might have been mistaken by an ignorant person" (Kirk's "Greek Mythology," 181). If this be of great famine, the suffering went out to gather any green vegetable likely to contribute towards the savoir" and nutritiveness of the broth, and his mistake may have arisen not so much from any resemblance between the plinkyth and any particular kind of oroth of which he was told but rather from seeing whatever vegetable he met with, without knowing its noxious properties. Thus we may regard oroth in both passages as a general designation of esculent plants, in this case wild ones. See Gourd.

The "bitter herbs" (πιππουρία, merorim) with which the Israelites were commanded to eat the Passover bread (Exod. ii, 8; Numb. ix, 11; the Heb. πιππορία, merorim), sec. iii. occur also in the LXX. He has filled me with bitterness, he hath made me drunken with wormwood" (Job vii, 15)." He hath filled me with bitterness, he hath made me drunken with wormwood" (Job vii, 15). The Group of the nightshade (Kniph.) is used in the LXX. to render the Heb. words in Isaiah xxvi, 19, viz. green herbs. The future restoration of the Hebrew people is there announced under the type and figure of a revival of the dead. "Thy dew is a dew of green herbs," says the prophet, i.e. as by the dew the green herbs are revived, so shall thou, being revived by God's strengthening power, flourish again. The other passage, however, appears an obscure one with respect to the meaning of oroth. Celsius has, with his usual learning, shown that mallows were much employed as food in ancient times, and that there can be no doubt, but there is no proof adduced that oroth means mallows; there are many other plants which were and still are employed as articles of diet in the East, as purslane, goosefoot, chenopodiums, lettuce, endive, etc. But oroth should be considered in conjunction with plinkyth; for we find in 2 Kings iv, 39, that when Elisha came again to Gilgal, and there was a dearth in the land, he said unto his servant, 'Set on the great pot, and seethe pottage for the sons of the prophets; and one went out into the field to gather herba (oroth), and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds (plinkyth) his lap full, and came and shewed them into the pot of pottage, for they knew them not.' As plinkyth is universally acknowledged to be the fruit of one of the gourd tribe, it is not unreasonable to conclude that oroth also was the fruit of some plant, for which the plinkyth had been mistaken. This may be admitted, as the use of green herbs has been adduced in support of other interpretations, and as there are fruits, such as that of the egg-plant, which are used as articles of diet, and for which the fruit of the plinkyth, or wild gourd, might have been mistaken by an ignorant person" (Kirk's "Greek Mythology," 181). If this be of great famine, the suffering went out to gather any green vegetable likely to contribute towards the savoir" and nutritiveness of the broth, and his mistake may have arisen not so much from any resemblance between the plinkyth and any particular kind of oroth of which he was told but rather from seeing whatever vegetable he met with, without knowing its noxious properties. Herbert, Johann Friedrich, an eminent German philosopher, was born at Oldenburg May 4, 1776. He became professor of philosophy in the University of Göttingen in 1805, afterwards at Königsberg in 1809, and finally returned to Göttingen in 1810. He died there, Aug. 14, 1841.

Herbert's most important works are:

- Kurze Darstellung eines Pflanzen, z. Philosoph. Vorlesungen (Götting, 1804).
- Allgemeine Physik der Wissenschaften (Königsburg, 1824, 2 parts).
- Abhandlungen der Königlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften (Königsburg, 1829, 2 vols.).

Herbert's philosophical and pamphlets were published by Hartenstein (Lpz. 1841-43, 3 vols.), who also published a complete collection of his works (Stämmliche Werke, Lpz. 1850-52, 12 vols.).

Herbert was at first a Kantian, but afterwards, influenced by the study of ancient Greek philosophy, he created a philosophical system of his own, which is distinguished by ingenuity above all the other post-Kantian systems. Although Herbert occasionally professed to be a Christian, he is absolutely immaterial. That Kant's Critique of Pure Reason is almost without any objective value, and that its method must be entirely abandoned if metaphysics are to be founded on a secure and permanent basis, is Herbert's realistic tendency further removed from the ideas of the German philosophers. According to Herbert, there is no secure scientific subject which is of its own accord to its own preservation. The last subject is the principal question in Herbert's psychology, and he endeavours to deduce and calculate the whole life of the soul, with the aid of mathematics, from those mutual disturbances, and its reactions against them. Hence he is obliged to deny man's moral or transcendental freedom, although he allows him a certain free character. He maintains the immortality of the soul, because the simple principles of all things are eternal; but he denies the possibility of acquiring any knowledge whatever of the Deity. (English Cyclopedia, v. v.) On the whole, it may be said that Herbert was a careful observer of psychological phenomena; but that speculation, in the proper sense, was not congenial to him. Herbelot, Bartholomew D' (or D'Herbelot), a distinguished French Orientalist, was born at Paris Dec. 4, 1625. He studied at the University of his native city, where he acquired a good knowledge of Hebrew, Chaldees, Syriac, Persic, and Turkish. He then visited Italy, in order to establish relations with the po ple of the Oriental countries, of which there were a large number at Genoa, Leghorn, and Venice. At Rome he became acquainted with Lucas Holstenius and Leo Al-latius, and was highly esteemed by the cardinala Barberini and Grimoldi, as well as by queen Christina of Sweden. On his return to France he received a pension of 1500 francs from Fouquet, and was appointed royal secretary and interpreter of Oriental languages.

On a second journey to Italy in 1666, the grand duke of Tuscany, Ferdinand II, endeavored to persuade him to remain, and presented him with a number of Eastern MSS. He returned to Paris, and in 1673, where Colbert granted him again a pension of 1500 francs, and Louis XIV appointed him professor of Syrian at the College of France, after the death of James d'Auvergne in 1692. Herbelot died Dec. 8, 1695. He wrote Bibliothèque Orientale, ou dictionnaire universel contenant tout ce qui fait connaître les peuples de l'Orient. It was published after his death by Ant. Galland (Paris, 1697, fol.; Maestricht, 1776, fol.; supplement, 1781, etc.; best ed. Paris, 1782, 8vo).

The title of this work gives a good idea of its character: it is a storehouse of whatever belongs to Oriental literature. The book, however, is meant very much more as a manual of life, than an ordinary encylopedical work, from Haiji Khalifa's bibliographical dictionary, and of some hundred and fifty MSS. Herbelot did not take the trouble to compare their statements with those of other writers, so that it contains only the views of the Mohammedans on themselves and their neighbors. Yet it is a very useful book to a person who can understand, one of its kind, is still highly considered. Des ossars has given a popular abridgment of it (Paris, 1782, 6 vols., 8vo); it was translated into German by Schultz (Halle, 1785-1790, 4 vols., 8vo). Herbelot also wrote also a catalogue of part of the MSS. contained in the Palisen Library at Florence, which was translated into Italian and, is to be found in Schellhorn's Ammaeuta literaria. Herbert, Edward (Lord Herbert of Cherbury), a distinguished English Deist, was born at Eton, Shrewsbury, in 1581 or 1682. He was educated at Oxford, served with great credit in the war in the Netherlands, and was one of the council of war composed gentlemen at the court of James I, who made him a knight of the Bath, and sent him minister to France in 1618. On a second mission to France he published a work expressing the principles of deism, entitled Travels in Flanders, and Prussia. On a Revolution. etc. (Paris, 1624, 4to). In 1631 he was on a diplomatic mission, and in 1643 he published a new edition of the Travels, adding to it De Religione Gentilium (also published separately at Amsterdam, 1683, 4to; and in an English translation, by Lewis, The Ancient Religion of the Greeks and Latins, London, 1705, 8vo.). He died at London Aug. 20, 1654. His Life, written by himself, and continued to his death, was published by Horace Walpole (London, 1764; new edition, with additions, London, 1826, 8vo).

"Herbert of Cherbury was the contemporary of Hobbes of Malmesbury, to whose principles of philosophizing he was directly opposed, not without the striking coincidence of many of the results at which they respectively arrived. He maintained the theory of innate ideas, and made a certain instinct of the reason (rationalis instinctus) to be the primary source of all human knowledge. Accordingly he did not, with Aristotle and the Stoics, compare the mind to a tabula rasa of the schoolmen, but to a closed volume which opens itself at the solicitation of outward nature acting upon the senses. Thus acted upon, the mind produces out of itself certain general or universal principles (com- munes naturales) by which all debatable questions in theory and philosophy may be determined, since upon these principles, at least all men are unanimous. Consistently with these views, he does not, with Hobbes, make religion to be founded on revelation or historical tradition, but on an immediate consciousness of God and of divine things. The religion of reason, therefore, resting on such grounds, is, he argues, the criterion of every positive religion which claims a foundation in revelation. No man can accept revelation as an immediate evidence of the reasonableness of his faith, except those to whom revelation has been directly given; for all others, the fact of revelation is a matter of mere tradition or testimony. Even the receipt of a revelation may himself be easily deceived, since he possesses no means of convincing himself of the reality or authenticity of his admitted revelation. Herbert made his own religion of reason to rest upon the following grounds: There is a God whom man ought to honor and reverence; a life of holiness is the most acceptable worship that can be offered him; sinners must repent of their sins, and strive to become better; and after death every one must expect the rewards or penalties befitting the acts of this life. Lord Herbert is one of the numerous instances on record of the little influence which speculative opinions exercise upon the conduct of life. He was a nobleman, and which is imparted to a portion only of mankind, he nevertheless claims the belief of his hearers when he tells them that his doubts as to the publication of his work were removed by a direct manifestation of the divine will." (English Cyclopedia.) He states the phenomena of this revelation, following only fully when the light was, on a bright summer day, sitting in my room; my window to the south was open; the sun shone brightly, not a breeze was stirring. I took my book On Truth into my hand, threw myself on my knees, and prayed devoutly in these words: 'O thou one God, thou author of this light which now shines upon me, and gives me, and thou giver of all inward light which now shines upon me, thou giver of all inward light, I implore thee, according to thine infinite mercy, to pardon my request, which is greater than a sinner should make. I am not sufficiently convinced with what effect I may publish this book or not. This publication shall be for thy glory. I beseech thee to give me a sign from heaven; if not, I will suppress it.' I had scarcely finished these words when a loud, and yet, at the same time, a gentle sound came from heaven, not like any sound on earth. This comforted me in such a calm manner, and gave me such satisfaction, that I thought to have said, my prayer as having been heard." His style is very obscure, and his writings have been but little read, in spite of the talent and subtility of thought which they evince. He is properly regarded as the founder of the school of English Deists, although he was himself a sceptic of the very high and pure sect rather than an infidel. Herbert did not profess, in his writings, to oppose Christianity, but held that his "five articles" embraced the substance of which is taught in the Scriptures. "The ideas which his writings contributed to Deistical speculation are two, viz. the examination of the universal principles of religion, and the appeal to an internal illuminating influence superior to revelation, the inward light," as the test of religious truth. This was a phrase not uncommon in the 17th century. It was used by the Puritans to mark the appeal to the spiritual instincts, the heart, to the feeling of divine perfections, like the founder of the Quakers, to imply an appeal to an internal sense. But in Herbert it differs from these in being universal, not restricted to a few persons, and in being intellectual rather than emotional or spiritual" (Farrar, Critical History, p. 138). For an examination and refutation of his theory and writings, see Deistical Writers, letter i, and Halyburton, Nat. Religion (Works, 1835, 8vo, p. 233). But it was introduced directly from Phenicia by Ahab (marriage with the Sidonian princess Jezebel (1 Kings, xvi, 31)). In like manner, the establishment of this idolatry in Judah is ascribed to the marriage of the king with a daughter of Jezebel (comp. Josephus, Ant., viii, 15, 1; ix, 6, 6).

The worship of Moloch, which was worshipped under the form of the Tyrian Hercules, Melkart, Baal, Adonis, Moloch, and whatever his other names are, was that which originates, sustains, and destroys life. These functions of the Deity, according to the Phenicians, were represented, although not exclusively, by the sun, the hereditary god, which animates vegetation by its genial warmth, and scorches it up by its forvor (see Davis, Carthage, p. 276–9).

Almost all that we know of the worship of the Tyrian Hercules is preserved by the classical writers, and relates chiefly to the Phenician colonies, and not to the mother state. The eagle, the lion, and the thorn-dish were sacred to him, and are often found on Phenician coins. Pliny expressly testifies that human sacrifices were offered up every year to the Carthaginian Hercules (Hist. Nat., xxxvi, v, 12), which coincides with what is stated by Josephus (Ant., viii, 15) as to his worship of Moloch. Mention is made of public embassies sent from the colonies to the mother state to honor the national god (Arrian, Alex. ii, 24; Q. Curt. iv, 2; Polyb., xxxi, 30), and this fact places in a clearer light the offense of Jason in sending envoys to his festival (2 Macc., xix, 26). Movers endeavors to show that Herakles and Heracles are not merely Greek and Latin synonyms for this god, but that they are actually derived from his true Phenician name. This original name he supposes to have consisted of the syllables nαν, liōn, and in other words, meaning strong, and ἱλιόν, to conquer; so that the compound means Ἀριστόκρατος. This harmonizes with what he conceives to be the idea represented by Heracles as the destroyer of Typhonic monsters *(e. p. 430). Melkarth, the Molokos, king of Sanchoniathon, occurs on coins only in the form Μωλοκέας. We must in this case assume that a κυπριακὸν has been absorbed, and resolve the word into μωλοκέας, king of the city, χωροκέας. The bilingual inscription renders it by Αριστόκρατος, and it is a title of the god as the patron of the city. See Baal.

Herd (prop. νικίλη, of neat cattle; νικίλης, a flock of smaller animals; κόκκιλη, as property; δαβην, a drove). The herd was greatly regarded both in the patriarchal and Mosaic period. Its multiplying was considered as a blessing from the Lord (Gen. xxvii, 17, 18; Deut. vii, 14; xxviii, 4; Ps. lxxvii, 38; cxlv, 14; Jer. ii, 28). The ox was the most precious stock next to horse and mule, and (since those were rare) the thing of greatest value which was commonly possessed (1 Kings xviii, 5). Hence we see the force of Saul's threat (1 Sam. xix, 7). The herd yielded the most esteemed sacrifice (Num. vii, 8; Ps. cxix, 31; Isa. lxvi, 3); also flesh-meat and milk, chiefly converted, probably, into butter and cheese (Deut. xxxiii, 14; 2 Sam. xxvii, 29), which such milk yields more copiously than that of small cattle (Arist. Hist. Anim., iii, 20). The full-grown ox is hardly ever slaughtered in Palestine except for sacrificial or ceremonial purposes, the young animal was preferred (Exod. xxix, 1)—perhaps three years might be the age up to which it was so regarded (Gen. xv, 9)—and is spoken of as a special dainty (Gen. xvii, 8; Amos vi, 4; Luke xi, 41). The case of God's sacrifice, which was given in place of expiary (Judg. vi, 26), and exceptional. So that of the people (1 Sam. xiv, 32) was an act of wanton excess. The agricultural and general usefulness of the ox in ploughing, threshing, and as a beast of burden (1 Chron. xiii, 40; Isa. xlvi, 1), made such a slaughtering seem wasteful; nor, owing to difficulties of grazing, fattening, etc., is beef the product of an eastern climate. The animal was broken to service probably in his third year (Isa. xv, 5; Jer. xlviii, 34; comp. Pliny, H. N. viii, 70, etc.). In the moist season, when grass abounded in the waste lands, especially in the "south" region, herds grazed there; e.g. in Carmel, on the west side of the Dead Sea (1 Sam. xxv, 2; 2 Chron. xxvi, 10). Dothan also, Mizpah, and Sharon (Gen. xxxvii, 17; comp. Rob- inson, iii, 122; Stanley, S. and Pal. p. 247, 290, 484; 1 Chron. xxvii, 29; Isa. lxv, 10) were favorite pastures. For such purposes Uzziah built towers in the wilderness (2 Chron. xxvi, 19). Not only grass, but foliage, is acceptable to the ox, and the woods and hills of Bashan and Gilead afforded both abundantly; on such upland (Psa. lxv, 12) pastures cattle might graze, as also, of course, by river sides, when driven by the heat from the regions of the "wilderness." Especially was the eastern table-land (Ezek. xxix, 18; Num. xxxii, 4) a "place for cattle," and the pastoral tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, who settled there, retained something of the nomadic character and handed down some image of the patriarchal life (Stanley, S. and Pal. p. 234, 325). Herdsmen in Egypt were a low, perhaps the lowest, caste; hence, as Joseph's kindred, through his position, were brought into contact with the highest

Jordan to share the toils of conquest (Deut. iii, 19), i.e. probably in some pastures closely adjoining, like the "suburbs" appointed for the cattle of the Levites (Num. xxxv, 2; Josh. xxvi, 2). Cattle were ordinarily allowed as a prey in war to the captor (Deut. xx, 14; Josh. viii, 2), and the case of Amaelek is exceptional, probably to mark the extreme curse to which that people was devoted (Deut. xxv, 14; Josh. x, 24; 1 Sam. xxxi, 10; 1 Chron. xxviii, 19). The occupation of herdsmen was honorable in early times (Gen. xlvii, 6; 1 Sam. xi, 5; 1 Chron. xxvii, 29; xxviii, 1). Saul himself resumed it in the interval of his cares as king; also Doeg was certainly high in his confidence (1 Sam. xi, 7). Pharaoh made some of Joseph's brethren "rulers over his cattle." David's seven sons were among his chief officers of state. In Solomon's time the relative importance of the pursuit declined as commerce grew, but it was still extensive (Eccles. ii, 7; 1 Kings iv, 20). It must have greatly suffered from the inroads of the enemies to which the country under the last kings of Judah and Israel was exposed. Uzziah, however (2 Chron. xxvi, 10), and Hezekiah (xxiii, 28, 29), resuming command of the open country, revived it. Josiah also seems to have been rich in herds (xxix, 7-9). The prophet Amos at first followed this occupation (Amos i, 1; vii, 1). A goad was used (Judg. iii, 31; 1 Sam. xiii, 21, 25; 2 Sam. 17, 7), being, as mostly, a staff armed with a spike. For the word Herd as applied to swine, see SWINE. On the general subject, Ugolini, xxxix, De Re Rust. vett. Hebr. c. ii., will be found nearly exhaustive. See CATTLE.

Herder, Johann Gottfried von, one of the most variously gifted of German writers, was born August 23, 1744, at Mogreningen, in East Prussia, where his father kept a little girls' school. His early training was strict and religious. A preac-cher named Treschau taught him Greek and Latin: and the pastor's books of theology were devoured by the young student. A complaint in the eyes brought him under the notice of a Russian surgeon, who offered to instruct him in surgery gra-

ing command of the open country, revived it. Josiah also seems to have been rich in herds (xxix, 7-9). The prophet Amos at first followed this occupation (Amos i, 1; vii, 1). A goad was used (Judg. iii, 31; 1 Sam. xiii, 21, 25; 2 Sam. 17, 7), being, as mostly, a staff armed with a spike. For the word Herd as applied to swine, see SWINE. castes, they are described as "an abomination," but of the abundance of cattle in Egypt, and of the care there bestowed on them, there is no doubt (Gen. xliv, 6, 17; Exod. iv, 4, 20). Brands were used to distinguish the owner's herds (Wilkinson, iii, 8, 195; iv, 123-131). So the plague of hail was sent to smite especially the cattle (Psa. lxxviii, 48), the firstborn of which also were smitten (Exod. xii, 29). The Israelites departing stipulated for (Exod. x, 26) and took "much cattle" with them (xii, 35). See EXOGEN. Cattle formed thus one of the traditions of the Israelization nation in its greatest period, and became almost a part of that greatness. They are the subject of providential care and legislative ordinance (Exod. xx, 10; xxxii, 28; xxxiv, 19; Lev. xix, 19; xxv, 7; Deut. xi, 15; xxii, 1, 4; 10; xxv, 4; Psa. civ, 14; Isa. xxxv, 22; Joel, iv, 11), and the Levites, though not holding land, were allowed cattle (Num. xxxv, 2, 3). When pasture failed, a mixture of various grains (called, Jb. vi, 5, 25, rendered "fodder" in the A. V., and, Isa. xxx, 24, "provender," compare the Roman farrago and organism, Pliny, xviii, 10 and 42) was used, as also (Gen. xxiv, 26) "chopped straw" (Gen. xxiv, 25; Isa. xi, 7; lxv, 25), which was torn in pieces by the threshing-machine, and used probably for feeding in stalls. These last formed an important adjunct to cattle-keeping, being indispensable for shelters at certain seasons (Exod. ix, 6, 10). The herd, after its harvest duties in the field, would naturally cause it to be in high condition, was especially worth caring for; at the same time, most open pastures would have failed because of the heat. It was then probably stalled, and would continue so until vegetation returned. Hence the failure of "the herd" from "the stales" is mentioned as a feature of scarcity (Hab. iii, 17). "Caves of the stall" (Mal. iv, 2; Prov. xv, 17) are the objects of watchful care. The Reubenites, etc., bestowed their cattle "in cities" when they passed the

As a theologian, Herder is noted not for science or system so much as for his freedom of thought and his general spirit. In some respects he was the precursor of Schleiermacher, and his rationalism, though low enough, was of a totally different school from that of Semler, Paulinus, and the neologists generally. He sought especially the religious truth, and thereby rendered it profitable by making them more free, and by investing them with a human and scientific interest. In his work on the Geist der ehrbäumen Poesie (1782; translated by Dr. Marsh, of Vermont, under the title Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1688, 2 vols. 12mo), he dwelt especially on the aesthetic and humanitarian aspects of the Bible, which, instead of weakening its claims to divine authority, greatly strengthens them. He was the first to show critically the poetical beauties of the Bible, which he did not consider as mere ornaments, but rather as being grounded in the inner nature of the revelation, and not to be separated from a correct view of the inspiration of the contents of the O.T. Though others, Lowth for instance, had already treated this subject of the poetry of the Hebrews, none had seen so deeply into its nature, or shown so plainly the true spirit which pervaded it. By this poetical consideration of the O.T. history, and of the religious principles on which it is founded, Herder discharges the Biblical Church from the mistakes of such interpreters as Melchior and others. His älteste Urkunde d. Menchenkechts, eine nach Jahrhunderten entfaltte heilige Schrift, which appeared in 1774, revolutionized the system of O.T. criticism by showing the influence of Hellenism on the Hebrews, and the Jewish influence of the O. T. from a different stand-point from the one which generally prevailed. In his Erläuterungen z. N. T. aus einer neuer eröffneten morgenländischen Quelle (the Zend Avesta), which he published in 1775, he also endeavored to render the exegesis of the N. T. more accurate by showing the influence of Hellenism on the Hebrews during the Christian age. He worked especially on the books of James and Jude, under the title of Briefe über Bruder Jesu in unserm Kanon (1776), and on the Apocalypses in Das Buch der Zukunft des Herrn (Riga, 1779). In the former work he considers James and Jude as the real brothers of the Lord according to the flesh, while in the second he maintains that the predictions of the Apocalypse were fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem. Herder also wrote on various points of the history of the New Testament revelation and of Biblical dogmatics, especially in his Christliche Schriften. In these he treats of the gift of tongues on the first Christian Pentecost; of the resurrection as a point of faith, history, and dogma; of the Redeemer as presented in the three gospels; of the Son of God, the Saviour of the world; of the spirit of Christianity; of religion, doctrinal meanings, usages, etc. "One of the chief services of Herder to Christianity was his persistent labor to elevate the pastoral office to its original and proper dignity. He held that the pastor of the church should not be solely a learned critic, but the minister of the common people. In his day the pastor was considered the mere instrument of the state, a sort of theological policeman—a degradation which Herder could hardly permit himself to think of without violent indignation. In his Letters on the Study of Theology, published in 1780, and in subsequent smaller works, he sought to evoke a generation of theologians, who, being imbued with his own ideas of humanity, would betake themselves to the edification of the human mind. He would reject scholasticism from the study of the Bible, and show to his readers that simplicity of inquiry is the safest way to happy results. He would place the modern pastor, both in his relations to the cause of humanity and in the respect awarded him by the world, close to the patriarch and prophet of other days; and that man, in his opinion, was not worthy the name of pastor who could neglect the individual requirements of the soul. According to Herder, the theologian should be trained from childhood in the knowledge of the Bible and of practical religion. Youth should have ever before them the example of pious parents, who were bringing them up with a profound conviction of the doctrines of divine truth. To choose theology for a profession from mercenary aims would preclude all possibility of pastoral usefulness. Let prayer and reading the Bible be your first study; and learning more and more is not profitable by preaching. Some of the most eloquent words from his pen were written against the customary moral preaching which so much afflicted him. "Why don't you come down from your pulpits," he asks, "for they cannot be of any advantage to you in preaching such things? What is the use of all the words of God's word always, anywhere, and in all matters? No, indeed! Religion, true religion, must return to the exercise of its original functions, or a preacher will become the most indefinite, idle, and indifferent thing on earth. Teachers of religion, true servants of God's word, what have you to do in our century? The harvest is plenteous, but the laborers are few; pray the Lord of the harvest that he will send out laborers who will be something more than bare teachers of wisdom and virtue. More than this, help yourselves! The counsel given by Herder to others was practised first by himself. He lived among critical minds, who sneered at the obscurity of the Biblical history, and scoffed at the idea of the nature and fate of the Messiah. He did not disapprove of the popular discussion, but corrected their ideas of the Messiah, and endeavored to render the study of the Holy Scriptures more comprehensive, more digestible, and more persons, those gifted men who thought with him arose from their seats profoundly impressed with the dignity and value of the Gospel. A witty writer of the time, Sturz, gives an account of Herder's preaching that throws some light upon the manner in which the plain, earnest exposition of the words of God's word always affected the indifferent auditor. 'You should have seen,' says this man, 'how every rustling sound was hushed and every curious glance was chained upon him in a very few minutes. We were as still as a Moravian congregation. All hearts opened themselves spontaneously; every eye hung upon him and was wont unawares to shed a tear from every breast. My dear friend, nobody preaches like him! Herderman (prop. והדר, a tender of oxen; in distinction from וֹּהֶר, a feeder of sheep; but practically the two occupations were generally united). From the earliest times the Hebrews were a pastoral people. Abraham and his sons were masters of herds and flocks, and were regulated in their movements very much by a regard to the necessities of their cattle, in which their wealth and prosperity consisted. In Egypt the Israelites were known as keepers of cattle. When they left Egypt, they, notwithstanding the oppressions to which they had been subjected, took with them "flocks and herds" (Exod. xii. 39); and though during their wanderings in the wilderness their stock was small, all probability greatly reduced, before they entered Canaan, they had so replenished it by their conquests in the pastoral regions beyond Jordan that they took with them a goodly number of animals wherewith to begin their new life in the land that had been promised them. Of that time the manual labor of all the Israelites was almost exclusively devoted to pastoral occupations; and traces of a nomadic life among other tribes than those settled on the east of the Jordan are found even as late as the time of the monarchy (compare 1 Chron. iv. 48).
The pastoral life has always had a charm for the Semitic peoples; and among them, as well as among other nations, it has always been held in honor. In the open and spacious fields bordering on the Jordan and in the hill country of Palestine it is a life of comparative ease and of great independence even in the present day; men possessed of flocks and herds become quietly and gradually rich without any severe exertion or anxiety; and but for feuds among themselves, the oppression of superiors, and the predatory tendency of their less respectable neighbors, their life might flow on in an almost unbroken tranquillity. The wealth of sheikhs and emirs is measured chiefly by the number of their flocks and herds; and men who would count it an intolerable indignity to be constrained to engage in any handicraft occupation, or even in mercantile adventure, fulfill with pride and satisfaction the duties which their pastoral life imposes upon them. It was the same in ancient times. Job’s substance consisted chiefly of cattle, his wealth in which made him the greatest of all the men of the East (1, 3). The first two kings of Israel, Saul and David, came from “following the herd” to ascend the throne (1 Sam. ixi: xi, 5; Psa. lixviii: 70). Men “very great,” like Neba, derived their riches from their flocks, and themselves superintended the operations connected with the care of them (1 Sam. xxv: 2 sq.). Absalom, the prince of Israel, had a sheep-farm, and personally occupied himself with its duties (2 Sam. xxi: 23).

Neha, king of Moab, was “a sheepmaster” (נער הצאן, 2 Kings iii: 4). The daughters of chiefs and wealthy proprietors did not think it beneath them to tend the flocks and herds of their family (Gen. xxix: 9; comp. xxiv, 15, 19); Exod. ii: 16; comp. Homer, H. vi: 429; Odys. xii: 121; xiii: 221; Varro, De Re Rust. ii: 1). The proudest title of the kings of Israel was that of shepherds of the people (Jer. xxviii: 4; Ezek. xxiv: 2, etc.; comp. σπουδαῖος ἱερεύς in Homer and Hesiod, posain, and Plato, De Rep. ii: 15, p. 440, D.), and God Himself condescended to be addressed as the Shepherd of Israel (Psa. lxv: 1), and was trusted in by his pious servants as their shepherd (Psa. xxiii: 1). In later times the title of shepherd was given to the teachers and leaders of the synagogue, who were called βασιλιάς (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Matt. iv: 23); but this was unknown to the times before Christ.

By the wealthy proprietors their flocks and herds were placed under the charge of servants, who bore the designation of בזריאן (Bazriyan), אבזריאן (Abazriyan), or בזריאן (Bazriyan). These were sometimes armed with weapons, to protect themselves and their charge from robbers or wild beasts; though, if we may judge from the case of David, their furniture in this respect was of the simplest description. Usually they carried with them a staff (כְּרָכָה, ke'rah) furnished with a crook, which might be used for catching an animal by the foot; those who had the charge of oxen carried with them a sharper instrument (Judg. iii: 31; 1 Sam. xiii: 21). See GOAT. They had also a wallet or small bag (ņepi, ṇep) in which to carry provisions, ammunition, or any easily portable article (1 Sam. xvii: 40, 48; Psa. xxxiii: 4; Micah vii: 14; Matt. x: 10; Luke ix: 3, 10). Their dress consisted principally of a cloak or mantle (the burqa of the modern Arabs) in which they could wrap the entire body (Jer. xiii: 12). For food they were obliged to content themselves with the plainest fare, and often were reduced to the last extremities (Amos vii: 14; Luke xvi: 15).

Their wages consisted of a portion of the produce, especially of the milk of the flock (Gen. xxx: 5 sq.; 1 Cor. ix: 7). That they cultivated music is not unlikely, though it hardly follows from 1 Sam. xvi: 18, for David’s case may have been exceptional; in all countries and times, however, music has been associated with the pastoral life. When the servants belonging to one master existed in any number, they were placed under a chief (רֹאשׁ צאן, Ṝašṭān, Gen. xlvii: 6; ἔρφυρομαι, 1 Pet. v: 4); and under the monarchy there was a royal officer who bore the title of βασιλιάς, “chief of the herdsmen” (1 Sam. xvi: 7; compare 1 Chron. xxvii: 29, and “magister regi pecoris,” Livy, i: 4).

The animals placed under the care of these herdsmen were chiefly sheep and goats; but besides these there were also neat cattle, asses, camels, and in later times swine. It would seem that the keeping of the animals last named was the lowest grade in the pastoral life (Luke xvi: 15); and probably the keeping of sheep and goats was held to be the highest, as that of horses is among the Arabs in the present day (Niebuhr, Arabes, i: 226). The herdsmen led his charge into the open pasture-land, where they could freely roam and find abundant supply of food; the neat cattle were conducted to the richer pastures, such as those of Bashan, while the sheep, goats, and camels found sufficient sustenance from the scantier herbage of the more rocky and arid parts of Palestine, provided there was a supply of water. While in the fields the herdsmen lived in tents.

(Ἑρεσις, Song of Sol. i, 8; Isa. xxxviii, 12; Jer. vi, 9), and there were folds (Ῥωμᾶς, Numb. xxxxi, 16; 2 Sam. vii, 8; Zeph. ii, 6), and apparently in some cases tents (Ῥωμᾶς 2 Chron. xiv, 15) for the cattle. Watch-towers were also erected, whence the shepherd could discern any coming danger to his charge; and vigilance in this respect was one of the shepherds' chief virtues (Mic. iv, 8; Nah. iii, 18; Luke ii, 8). If any of the cattle wandered he was bound to follow them, and leave no means untried to recover them (Ezech. xxxiv, 12; Luke xv, 5); and harsh masters were apt to require at their servants' hands any loss they might have sustained, either by the wandering of the cattle or the ravages of wild beasts (Gen. xxxi, 38 sq.), a tendency on which a partial check was placed by the law, that if it was torn by beasts, and the pieces could be produced, the person in whose charge it was should not be required to make restitution (Exod. xxii, 13; comp. Amos iii, 12). To assist them in both watching and defending the flocks, and in recovering any that had strayed, shepherds had dogs (Job xxx, 1), as the modern Arabs; not, however, “like those in other lands, fine, faithful fellows, the friend and companion of their masters ... but a mean, sinister, ill-conditioned generation, kept as a dog, kicked about, and half-hungry, with nothing noble or attractive about them” (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 301), a description which fully suits Job’s disparaging comparison. The flocks and herds were regularly counted (Lev. xxvii, 32; Jer. xxxiii, 15), as in Egypt (Wilkinson, ii, 177).

The pastures to which the herdsmen conducted their flocks were called ἁράκι, the places without, the country, the desert (Job xi, 10; xviii, 17; Prov. viii, 36; comp. 10: ἀράδινα, Mark i, 43; see also 10: ἀράδινα, Jer. xxvi, 57; Amos i, 2); ἡράδινα (Psa. lxv, 13; Jer. ix, 9, etc.), ἱεραία (Psa. lxv, 13; Isa. xlii, 11; Jer. xxiii, 10; Joel ii, 22, etc.). In summer the modern nomads seek the northern and more hilly regions, in winter they betake themselves to the south and to the plain country (D’Arvieux, iii, 315; v, 428); and probably the same usage prevailed among the Hebrews. In leading out their flocks, the shepherd went before them, and they followed him obedient to his call; a practice from which our Saviour draws a touching illustration of the intimate relation between him and his people (John x, 4). The young and the sickly of the flock the shepherd would take in his arms and half-hungry careful to adapt the rate of advancement to the condition and capacity of the feeder or burdened portion of his charge, a practice which again gives occasion for a beautiful illustration of God’s care for his people (Isa. xi, 11; comp. Gen. xxxii, 13). These usages still prevail in Palestine, and have often been described by travellers; one of the most graphic descriptions is that given by Mr. Thomson (Land and Book, i, 301 sq.; compare Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii, 322).

As the Jews advanced in commercial wealth the office of shepherd diminished in importance and dignity. Among the later Jews the shepherd of a small flock was precluded from bearing witness, on the ground that, as such, then their flocks on the pastures of others, they were infected with dishonesty (Maimon. in Deut. ii, 9, 8). See SHEPHERD.

HERES, part of the name of two places, different in the Hebrew. See also KIR-HERES; TIMATHI-HERES.

1. Har-Cheres (חרחרים, mountain of the sun; Sept. τὸ ἱππὸν ὕπαρχος, Vulg. montes Iheres, quod interterpretatur testatoris, i. e. of titles; Auth. Vera, "mount Heres," Iheres, in the valley, according to the text, but in a part of Mount Ephraim, according to the name) of Dan, near Ajalon, of which the Amorites retained possession (Judg. i, 35). It was probably situated on some eminence bordering the present Merj Ibn-Omeir on the east, possibly near the site of Emmaus or Nicopolis. We may even hazard the conjecture that it was identical with Mt. Jearim (q. d. Ir-Shenesh, i.e. sun-city); i.e. Chesalon (q. v.).

2. In Na-Heres (נהריה, city of destruction; Sept. ἁράκις) in the valley of Aroer; Vulg. civitas solis, evidently reading נויה, city of the sun, a name that occurs only in the disputed passage Isa. xix, 18, where most MSS. and editions, as also the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, the Syriac, and the English, read, one (of these five cities) shall be called The city of destruction, i.e. in the promised city of Isaiah, one of these cities shall be destroyed, a signification (from נויה, to tear down) for which Iken (Disser. phil. crit. 16) contends. The Jews of Palestine or of the parapet, referred it to Leontopolis and its temple, which they abhorred, and the destruction of which they supposed to be here predicted. But instead of נויה, heres, the more probable reading is נויה, cheres, which is read in sixteen MSS. and some editions, and is expressed by the Sept. (Complut.), Symmachus, Vulgate, Saadia, and the margin of the English version, and has also the testimony of the Talmud in fol. 110. A. (T. Dærer, comm. ad loc.) Whichever interpretation may be chosen, this reading is to be preferred to the other.

Heresh (Heb. חֵרֶשׁ, חֵרֶשׁ, εἰρήνη, εἰρήνη, Sept. Αἰρής), one of the Levites that dwelt in the "villages of the Netophathites" near Jerusalem, on the return from Babylon (1 Chron. xxv, 26). See HERESARCH.

Heresy, in theology, is any doctrine containing Christian elements, but along with them others subversive of Christian truth.

1. Origin and early Use of the Word. — The word αἵρεσις (heresias) originally meant simply choice (e. g. of a set of opinions); later, it was applied to the opinions themselves; last of all, to the sect maintaining them. "Philosophy was in Greece the great object which divided the opinions and judgments of men; and hence the term heresy, being most frequently applied to the adoption of that or that part which he had been longed, and to give their system the preference over every other system of Judaism, both with regard to soundness of doctrine and purity of morals. In the Epistles the word occurs in a somewhat different sense. Paul, in Gal. v, 20, puts αἵρεσις, heresies, in the list of crimes against the church, with the words διαφθοράς (Διαφθοράς, etc.) in 1 Cor. xi, 19 (though there also may be heresias among you), he uses it apparently to denote schisms or divisions in the Church. In Tit. iii, 10 he comes near to the later sense; the "heretical person" appears to be one given over to a self-chosen and divergent form of belief and practice. John Wesley says: — "Heresy is inherently evil. It is taken for an 'error in fundamentals' or in anything else, nor schism for any separation made from the outward communion of others. Both heresy and schism, in the modern sense of the words, are sins that the Scripture knows nothing of" (Works, N. Y. ed. vii, 286). In the early

Heresy and Schism. - Near akin to heresy is the idea of schism or Church division, which, however, primarily means a separation from the government and discipline of the Church, and does not necessarily include departure from her orthodoxy. Thus the Ebionites, Gnostics, and others were heretics, while the Arians, Donatists, and Modalists, schismatics. By the standard of the Roman Church, the Greek Church is only schismatic, the Protestant both heretical and schismatic. Of course, in different branches of the Church there are different views of heresy and truth, heterodoxy and orthodoxy, schism and schismatics, and the like. The Church, § 165). "Heresy, as distinguished from schism, consists in the adoption of opinions and practices contrary to the articles and practices of any particular church, whereas schism is secession from that church, the renouncing allegiance to its government, or forming a church with its own leaders, and ceasing to give cash to the divisions who did not openly renounce allegiance. Neither schism nor heresy, then, is properly an offence against the Church universal, but against some particular church, and by its own members. Of the two, schism is the more properly called either heretic or schismatic; for churches, being independent establishments, may indeed consult with each other, but if they cannot agree, the guilt of that Church which is in error is neither schism nor heresy, but corrupt faith or bigoted narrowness. Accordingly, our best churchmen, of the Church, regard heresy and schism in every state; and in the same sense, the Church as one that has erred, have very properly avoided the misapplication of the terms 'schismatic' and 'heretic' to it. Nevertheless, if a Church has been formed by the secession of members from another Church, on disagreement of principles, each seceder is both a schismatic and a heretic because of his separation from the Church; but the crime does not attach to the Church so formed, and accordingly is not entailed on succeeding members who naturally spring up in it. If the Church was founded in error, the guilt of error would always attach to it and its members, but not that of schism or heresy. He who is convinced that his Church is essentially in error is bound to secede; but, like the circumstances which may be supposed to justify the subject of any realm in renouncing its country and withdrawing his allegiance, the plea should be long, and seriously, and conscientiously urged; but when a Church, or a group of churches, as they can form alliances, so they can secede from this alliance without being guilty of any crime. So far from the separation between the Romish and Protestant churches having anything of the character of schism or heresy in it, the Church of England (supposing the names of Rome or Hilder to be changed) has been the only way to bring the Churches, as they can form alliances, so they can secede from this alliance without being guilty of any crime.

III. List of the principal Early Heresies. - The following list includes the chief heresies of the first six centuries; each will be found in its alphabetical place in this Cyclopaedia: Century I. Nazarenes, who advocated the observance of the Jewish law by the worshippers of Christ. Simonians, followers of Simon Magus, who prided themselves in a superior degree of knowledge, and maintained that the world was created by angels, denied the resurrection, etc. Nicolaitans, followers of Nicolas of Antioch. Cerinthians and Ebionites, followers of Cerinthus and Ebion, who denied the divinity of Christ, and adopted the principles of Gnosticism. Many of them were Millenarians. Century II. Elecennians, the followers of Elias of Eleasa, who was reputed to have discovered the Christian religion, and whose tenets were mostly of philosophic origin. Gnostics, so called from their pretences to γνωσία, superior knowledge: this seems to have been the general name of all heretics. (1.) Among Syriac Gnostics were the followers of Saturninus, who adopted the view of the two principal beings of the world, supposed the evil nature of matter, denied the reality of Christ's human body, etc. Bardeanians: their principles resemble those of Saturninus, Tattianists and Eucratists, who boasted of an extraordinary continence, condemned marriage, etc. Apatactici, who, in addition to the opinions of the Tattianists, renounced property, etc., and asserted that any who lived in the manner of priests were eligible for holy orders of Asia Minor. Cerdonians, who held two contrary principles, denied the resurrection, despised the authority of the Old Testament, and rejected the Gospels. Marcionites, who resembled the Cerdonians, and in addition admitted two Gods, asserted that the Saviour’s body and soul were crucified. The followers of Apelles may be classed among the Marcionites.

(3.) Among Egyptian Gnostics were the Basilidians, followers of Basilides, who espoused the heresies of Simon Magus, and admitted the fundamental point on which the whole of the hypotheses then prevalent may be said to hinge, namely, that the world had been created not by the immediate operation of the divine being, but by the agency of aons. Carcopolitans, Antitacaet, Adamites, Prodicians, the followers of Secundus, Potlemus, Marcus, Colobarnas, and Heracleon. (4.) Inferior sects of Gnostics are Cainites, Camachites, Ophites.

Heresies not of Oriental origin: Patrissipians, whose principal leader was Praxais; Melchizedechians, under Theodotus and Artemon; Hermogoniens, Montanists, Chilicians or Millennials. Century III. The Manicheans, the Hieracites, the Patrissipians, under Nolius and Sacy, the Marcionites under Plutarus, the Basilidians under J. of Samosata, Novatians, under Novat and Novatian; the Monarchici, the Arabici, the Aquarions, the Originalians. Century IV. The Arians, Colliothians, Macedonians, Agnosites, Apollinarism, Collyridians, Seleucians, Anthropomorphites, Jovinianists, Messalians, Timotheus, Valentinianists, Postilionists, Donatists, Novationists, Nestorians, Eutychians, Theopiscites. Century V. The Pelagists, Nestorians, Eutychians, Theopiscites. Century VI. The Aphthardocetes, Severianists, Corrupticos, Monotheolists.

IV. Punishment of Heresy. — Soon after the triumph of Christianity over paganism, and its establishment by the State, there arose a very severe and ageten heresies. Those of the State, made by the Christian emperors from the time of Constantine, are comprised under one title, De Hereticiis, in the Theolosian code. (See below.) The principal are the note of infamy affixed to all heretics in common; commerce forbidden to be held with them; privation of all offices of dignity and public disqualification to dispose of their property by will, or to receive property; pecuniary multas; proscription and banishment; corporal punishment, such as scourging. Heretics were forbidden to hold public disputations; to proclaim their opinions; their children to inherit patrimony, unless they returned to the Church, etc. The laws of the Church consisted in pronouncing formal anathema, or excommunication, against them; forbidding them to enter the church, so much as to hear sermons or the reading of the Scriptures (this was but partially observed); the prohibition of all person, under pain of excommunication, to join with them in any religious exercises; the enjoining that none should eat or converse familiarly with them, or contract affinity with them; their names were to be struck out of the dipychy; and their testimony was not to be received in any judicial cause. (Bingham.) Augustine's view of heresy is deserving of special notice, as it forms the basis of the doctrine and practice of the Middle Ages. In De Civ. Dei, xix, 51, he says: "Qui ergo in ecclesia morbidus aliquod praevaricante saeculo, sicut corrupt, saeptum rectumque reipublicam, restitutus contumaces, suasse pestifera et mortifera dogmatas emendare nonult, sed defensor perpetuorum, heretici fuit, et forte exsecutus habeatur in eversantibus inimicis." The earlier fathers of the Church had steadily refused using force in opposing heresy (Hilarian, Victor, ad Constant., vii, 18; ib. infra, Hilar., Ad Arian., § 33), and at most permitted the secular powers to interfere to prevent the organization of heretical communities (Chrysost. Homil. 29, 46, in Matth.), and even this was often censured (see Socrates, Hist. Ecces, vi, 19, where it is said that the misfortunes which befall Chrysostom were by many considered as a punishment for his having caused churches belonging to the Quarrodecim inedias, &c. (A.D. 372) to be erected without the permission of the ecclesiastics and the citizens); Augustine, on the contrary (Retract. ii, c. 5; ep. 98, ad Vincentianum, § 17; ep. 185, ad Hes. Epist. 21; Opp. imperf. 2, 2), basing himself on the passage Luke xiv, 23 (cogite et recurre, etc.), completely reversed his former opinion that heretics and schismatics were not to be associating with the faithful, or of using secular power, and stated explicitly, as a fundamental principle, that "damnata heresia ad episcopem non advac erudimincendo, sed corredenda est potestas Christian." He only rejects the infliction of capital punishment, yet more on account of the general opposition of the ancient Church to this mode of punishment than from lenity towards heresy. It is, consequently, not strange if even this protest against the execution of heretics came subsequently to be disregarded, and the punishment even approved (see Leo M. ep. 15, ad Turribiam; Hieronymus, ep. 87, ad Bishops in the Middle Ages we find the Roman Church, on the one hand, condemning capital punishment by its canon law, and at the same time demanding the application of this punishment to heretics from the secular law. Julian the Apostate had long before reproached the Christians of his time for persecuting their heretics, which, he said, ought to be less scrupulous. As to the principles which guided the conduct of the secular powers towards heretics, we find that it wavered long between an entire liberty in establishing sects, submitting them to mere police regulations, restricting them in the carrying out of their system of worship, depriving them of their property, formally prohibiting them, and finally punishing them as criminals. Through all these variations the fundamental principle was adhered to that the secular power possesses in general the right to punish, repress, or extirpate heresy. Hesitation is shown only in the mode of applying this principle, not in the principle itself. Moreover, the exercise of this right was in no way subject to the decision of the Church, and the secular power could by itself decide whether and how far a certain heresy should be tolerated—a right which the states retained without opposition until the Middle Ages. The numerous laws against it are in the Code Theodosianus, Codex Theodosianus, to which we may add xvi, tit. i, 2, 3, are the principal sources for the history of the laws concerning sects in antiquity. History shows us that in the use of compulsion and punishments against heretics the secular princes did not in any way take part, and that doing more than the latter was at first disposed to approve. Julian the Apostate granted full freedom to heretics with a view to injure the Church. Augustine first succeeded, in the 5th century, in establishing an agreement between Church and State on this question, yet without contesting the right of the State to use its independent authority. This is proved by Justinian's Institutes (compare cod. i, tit. 5), which interfere directly with the private rights of heretics; and in case of mixed marriages, they order, regardless of the patria potestas, that the children shall be brought up in the orthodox faith (ih. infra, Hilar., ad Arian., § 18).

In the Middle Ages the notion of heresy and of its relations to the Church and the State acquired a further development. At one time, in view of the authority of the pope in matters of faith and of the doctrine of filius inspirata, the notion of heresy was so extended that the act of disobedience to the pope in refusing to accept or reject some distinction according to his command, was considered almost as its worst and most important feature. The Scholastics treated the doctrine concerning heresy scientifically. Finally the Church, instead of seeking to make the Scholastics repeat the errors it had condemned. It even compelled the secular powers to repress and extirpate heresy according to its dictates by threats of ecclesiastical censure, by inviting invasion and revolution in case of resistance, and by compelling the application of secular punishments, such as the sequesterment of property, and the deprivation of all civil and political rights, as was especially done by Innocent III. Nevertheless, the Church continued in the practices, whenever it handed over condemned heretics to the secular power for punishment, recommending to all countries that they should be punished, which might endanger their lives; but this was a mere formality, and so far from being made in earnest that the Church itself made the awfulness of such punishment one of its dogmas. Thus Leo X, in his bull Sacra et inviolata, declares that such sentence, that which says that heretics can be condemned as condemned spirits (Spiritus, art. 38), and recommended the use of such punishment himself. About the same time, a special form of proceedings was adopted against heretics, and their persecution was rendered regular and systematic by the establishment of the Inquisition (q.v.). Thus, in course of time, a number of secular penalties came to be considered as inevitably connected with ecclesiastical condemnation, and were even pronounced against heretics by the Church itself without further formalities. The Church, whenever any individual suspicion of heresy was made known to it, would, in the first instance, declare him (in full court, after a public abjuration released either partially or fully from the ecclesiastical and secular punishment he had ipso facto incurred. This implied the right of still inflicting these punishments after the revocation of the sentence, especially in cases of sequestration of property, deprivation of civil or ecclesiastical offices, and degradation, while a return to heresy after cantemation was to be punished by death). See the provisions of the Canon Law as found in X. de hereticis, tit. 7; c. 49; X. de mot. ecclesiasticis, v. 39; tit. de Heret., v. 2; De heret., in Clement, v. 3; De heret., in Extravag. comm. v. 3; and comp. the Liber septimus, v. 5, 4, and the laws against heretics of the emperor Frederick II, which are connected with the ecclesiastical laws (in Pertz, Monum. ii, 244, 287, 298, 327, 328); and the regulations concerning mixed marriages and the marriage of heretics. All these are yet considered by the Roman Catholic Church as having the force of law, though, under present circumstances, they are not enforced (comp. Benedict XIV, De synod. Dioc. vi, 5; ix, 13, 3; xiii, 24, 21).

Even in the 18th century Muratori defended the assertion that the Church has a right to enforce the most severe secular penalties against heretics (De ingenn. moderatione in religiosis negotiis, ii, 7 sq.). In the beginning of the 19th century, pending the negotiations for the crowning of Napoleon I, pope Pius VII declared that he could not set foot in a country in which the law recognized the freedom of worship of the different religions. The same pope wrote in 1805 to his nuncio at Vienna, "The Church has not only sought to prevent heretics from using the properties of the Church, but has also established, as the punishment for the sin of heresy, the sequestration of private property, in c. 10, X. d. heret., (v. 7), of principalities, and of feudal tenures, in c. 16, cod.; the latter law contains the canonical rule that the subjects of a heretical prince are free from all usury of faith as well as from all fidelity and obedience to him; and there is none at all acquainted with history but knows that the council of Constance establishes the councils against obstinately heretical princes. Yet we find ourselves now in times of such misfortune and humiliation for the bride of Christ that the Church is not only unable to enforce these, its holiest maxims, against the obstinate heretics, with whom they should be, but it even cannot compel them openly without danger. Yet, if it cannot exert its right in depriving heretics of their estates, it may," etc. With this may be compared the permission granted in anticipation, in 1724 (Bullar. Propagandae, ii, 54, 56), to the Rhenishen, in case of conversion, to take possession of the properties they had lost by her apostasy; the satisfaction manifested by the Church on the expulsion of the Protestant bishop, on German soil, by the Emperor, in 1648; and many things happening every day in strictly Roman Catholic countries, under the eyes of the Roman See. Quite recently, Philippi, in his Canon Law, honestly acknowledged the validity of the old laws against heretics, and asserted their correctness. Even now, in every country, not only in the old, but even in the new, the laws of heretics are firmly and actively applied; and the bishops, now as heretics, promise, in taking the oath of obedience to the pope, heretics, schismatics, et rebelles edem Dominio nostro vel successoribus predicti pro posse persecurari et impugnandum. Yet the Roman See has re- nounced, since 1767, 1783, 1784, the use of the expression of "Protestant heretics" in its official acts; and it has even admitted that, under the pressure of existing circumstances, the civil powers may be forgiven for tolerating heretics in their states! Still, as soon as circumstances will permit, the Roman See is prepared to apply again the old laws, which are merely temporarily suspended in some countries, but in nowise repealed.

Governments, however, naturally take a different view of these laws. The secular power, even while it freed itself from its absolute subjection to the Church, still continued to persecute in various ways the Protestants whom the Church announced as heretics; but they deprived them under Louis XIV of the right of emigration; while, in refusing to recognize the validity of their marriage, the civil authorities showed themselves even more severe than the Church. But, becoming wiser by experience, and taught by the general reaction which its measures produced in the 18th century, the State has confined itself to interfering with heresy so far only as is necessary to promote public order and the material good of the State; thus claiming only the right to repress or exel those whose principles are opposed to the existence of a national or, or might endanger the State. This right, of course, has been differently understood in different countries according to local circumstances, and has even become a pretext for persecutions against denominations which a milder construction of it would not have deprived of the toleration of the State, as in some parts of Sweden.

Let us now compare this practice of the Romish Church and of Roman Catholic states with the dogmatic theory of the Middle Ages. Thomas Aquinas treats heresy as the opposite of faith, connecting it with infidelitas in communi et apostasia a fide. He treats schism, against the Church, as infidelitas species pertinens ad eos, qui fidei Christi profrentur, sed ejus dogmata corrumpunt (1, q. ii, art. i), yet (art. ii) he remarks at the same time that some holy fathers themselves erred in the early times of the Church on many points of faith. In art. iii he comes to the question whether heretics are to be tolerated. He asserts that they also have their use in the Church, as serving to prove its faith, and inducing it diligently to search the Scriptures, yet their usefulness in these respects is involuntary. Considered for themselves only, heretics are not only deserving of being cut off from communion with the Church, but also with the world, by being put to death. But the Church must, in her mercy, first use all means of converting heretics, and only when it desairs of bringing them back must cut them off by excommunication, and then deliver them up to secular jurisdiction which frustrates them by condemnation to death." He only admits of toleration towards heretics when persecution against them would be likely to injure the faithful. In this case he advises sparing the tares for the sake of the wheat. He further maintains that heretics, on their first offense, be entirely pardoned, and all ecclesiastical and secular punishment remitted, but asserts that those who relapse, though they may be reconciled with the Church, must not be released from the sentence of death incurred, lest the bad example of their inconstancy might prove injurious to others.

HERETICS, BAPTISM BY

The Reformation protested against these doctrines. Luther, from the first, denounced all attempts to overcome heresy by sword and fire instead of the Word of God, and held that the civil power should leave heretics to be dealt with by the Church. On this ground he opposed Calvin. Yet it was clear with all the Reformers, that governments are bound to prevent blasphemy, to see that the people receive from the Church built on the Word of God the pure teaching of that word, and to prevent all attempts at creating sects. This led to the adoption of preventive measures, in the shape of the formerly permitted confessions, censure, excommunication, banishment, and death. These preventive measures confined the heresy to the individual, and extended as far as banishment, when no other means would avail. Luther admitted the use of secular punishment against heretics only in exceptional cases, and then not on account of the heresy, but of the resulting disorders. Even then he considered banishment sufficient, except when incitations to revolution, etc., required more severe punishment, as was the case with the Anabaptists; yet he often declared against the application of capital punishment to such heretics. Zwingle took nearly the same stand on this point, but was more inclined to the use of forcible means. The Anabaptists were treated in a summary manner in Switzerland. Calvin went further, and with his theocratic ideas considered the state as bound to treat heresy as blasphemy, and to punish it in the severest manner. His appendices, and their interpretation of the execution of Servetus gave rise to a controversy on the question whether heresy might be punished with the sword (compare Calvini Defensatis orthodoxy fidei, etc.). Calvin's views were attacked not only by Böseck, but also by Castet. A history of heretics by Bellièrs wrote on this occasion his De hereticis (Mâcon, 1554), quoting against Calvin the opinions of Luther and of Bretonius. Lâlius Socinus, in his Disputas inter Calvinum et Vaticanam (1574), also advocated toleration. Among all the German theologians, Melancthon alone sided with Calvin, consistently with the views (Corpus, Ref. I, 18, an. 1530; and III, 195, an. 1535) which he had long previously defended against the more moderate views of Bretonius (see HARTMANN AND JÄGER, JAHRESBÚND., 1, 299 sq.).

In England, in the first year of queen Elizabeth, an act of Parliament was passed to enable persons to try heretics, and the following directions were given for their guidance: "And such persons to whom the queen shall by letters patent under the great seal give authority to execute any jurisdiction spiritual, shall not in any wise be bound to adjudge any matter as heresy, but only such as heretofore have been adjudged to be heresy, by the authority of the canonical Scriptures, or by some of the first four general councils, or by any other general council wherein the same was declared heresy by the express and plain words of the said canonical Scriptures, or such as hereafter shall be judged or determined to be heresy by the high court of Parliament, with the assent of the clergy in their convocation."

This statute continued practically in force, with certain modifications, till the 29 Charles II, c. 5, since which time heresy has been left entirely to the cognizance of the ecclesiastical courts; but, as there is no statute defining in what heresy consists, and as, moreover, much of the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts has been withdrawn by the various toleration acts; and, above all, as the effect of various recent decisions has been to widen almost indefinitely the construction of the doctrinal formulæ of the English Church, it may now be said that the jurisdiction of these courts in matters of heresy is practically limited to preventing ministers of the Established Church from preaching in opposition to the doctrine and the articles of the establishment from which they derive their emoluments, and that, even in determining what is to be considered contrary to the articles, a large toleration has been judicially established. See the recent trial of Dr. Rowland Williams, and the judgment given by Dr. Lushington in the Court of Arches (Chambers, Cyclopædia, n. v.). The Protestant churches generally, in the 19th century, deny the power of the State to punish heresy. The Roman Church retains its old theory that the subject is of the utmost importance, and the progress of civilization is limited by the Toleration. The history of the various heresies is given, with more or less fulness, in the Church histories. Walch's Entw. einer vollst. Geschichte d. Ketzereien, etc. (1762-1785, 11 vols.), gives a history of doctrines and heresies (see also church to the sixth synod). Historical and religious controversies, it is still indispensable. Walch is free from polemic zeal, and bent upon the critical and pragmatic representation of his subject, without sympathy or antipathy" (Schauf, Apost. History, § 31). Heretics, Baptism by. When the line between the orthodox and the heretics [see HERESY], was clearly drawn in the early Church, the question whether baptism performed by heretics should be regarded as valid by the orthodox began to be mooted. It afterwards became of great moment, especially with regard to the claims of the Church of Rome.

1. As early as the 3d century heretical baptism was pronounced invalid. Clemens Alexander calls it false (畜牧, i. 357). Tertullian declared that it was of no value (De Baptismo, cap. xv). "Cyprian, whose epistles afford the clearest information on this subject, followed Tertullian in rejecting baptism by heretics as an ineptive mock baptism, and demanded that all heretics coming over to the Catholic Church be again baptized, on the ground that it is caused by the Schism of the Church. A heresy there was due to his High-Church exclusivism and his horror of schism. As the one Catholic Church is the sole repository of all grace, there can be no forgiveness of sins, no regeneration or communication of the Spirit, no salvation, therefore no valid sacraments, out of her bosom. So far he had logical consistency on his side. But, on the other hand, he departed from the objective view of the Church, as the Donatists afterwards did, in making the efficacy of the sacrament depend on the subjective holiness of the priest. How can one consecrate water? he asks, who is himself unholy, and has not the Holy Ghost given him his position in the North African Church, which, in several councils at Carthage in the years 255-6, rejected heretical baptism; and by the Church of Asia Minor, which had already acted on this view, and now, in the person of the Cappadocian bishop Firminus, a disciple of him, he extolled the great merits of Origen, for having stood against the intolerance of Rome. The Roman bishop Stephen (253-257) appeared for the opposite doctrine, on the ground of the ancient practice of the Church. He offered no argument, but spoke with the consciousness of authority, and followed the practice of his see. This is the objective nature of the sacrament, the virtue of which depended neither on the officiating priest nor on the receiver, but solely on the institution of Christ. Hence he considered heretical baptism valid, provided it had been administered in the right form, to wit, in the name of the Trinity, or even of Christ alone; so that heretics coming into the Church needed only confirmation, or the ratification of baptism by the Holy Ghost. 'Heresy,' says he, 'produces children and exposes them; and the Saviour was not afraid of being reproached with the name of a heretic, when sent them as her own, though she herself has not brought them forth.' The doctrine of Cyprian was the more consistent from the churchly point of view, that of Stephen from the sacramental. The one preserved the principle of the exclusiveness of the Church, the other that of the endurance of another tribe, or rather, of the growth of the Churches to the borders of the opus-opus operatio theory. Both were under the direction of the same hierarchal spirit, and the same hatred of heretics; but the Roman doctrine is, after all, a happy inconsistency of liberty, an inroad upon the principle of absolute exclusiveness, an involuntary concession that baptism, and, with it, the remission of sins, and regeneration, therefore salvation, are possible outside of Roman Catholicism. The controversy itself was conducted with great warmth. Stephen, though advocating the liberal view, showed the genuine papal arrogance and intolerance. He would not even admit to his presence the deputies of Cyprian, who brought him the decree of the African Synod, and called this bishop, who in every respect far excelled Stephen, and whom the Roman Church now venerates as one of her greatest saints, a 'pseudo-Christus, pseudo-apostolus, et obdamnum operatio.' He himself broke off all intercourse with the African Church, as he had already done with the Asiatic. But Cyprian and Firmilian, nothing daunted, vindicated with great boldness, the latter also with bitter vehemence, their different view, and continued in it to their death. The Alexandrian bishop Cyprian endeavored to bring about a peace between the two parties, but with little success. The Valerian persecution, which soon ensued, and the martyrdom of Stephen (257) and of Cyprian (258), suppressed this internal discord. In the course of the 4th century, however, the Roman practice gradually gained on the other, was raised to a degree of importance by the Council of Nicæa, in 325, although without the consent of the East, and was afterwards confirmed by the Council of Trent, with an anathema on the opposite view" (Schaff, History of the Christian Church, ch. vi, § 104).

2. The decrees of the Council of Trent as to baptism by heretics is as follows: "If any man shall say that the baptism which is given by heretics in the name of the Father, and of the Holy Ghost, with the intention of doing what the Church doth, is not true baptism, let him be anathema" (sess. vii, can. iv). This, at first view, may appear liberal; but the indirect intention of it is to claim all baptized persons as under the jurisdiction of Rome. Canon vii affirms that the baptized are bound "by all the precepts of the Church, whether written or transmitted." Canon xiv declares that any one who shall say "that those who have been baptized when infants are to be left to their own will when they grow up, and are not meantime to be confirmed to a Christian life by any voluntary seclusion from the Eucharist and the other seven sacraments till they repent," is to be anathema.

3. Luther admitted the validity of Romish baptism, and in this he is followed by Protestants generally, who do not repudiate from Rome. The Protestant churches (except the Baptist) admit the validity of each other's baptism to be Heretic, Real-Party, and with the consent of the Eucharist and the other seven sacraments till they repent, it is to be anathema.

Gen. xxi, 10; xxxii, 36; xxxv, 5 sq.). Joseph (as no exception, Judg. xii, 7; see BASTARD), had any legal title to the paternal inheritance, according to ancient usage among the Israelites; and amongst these the first-born, who might be of the favorite or a less favored wife, enjoyed a double portion (Deut. xxil, 15 sq.).

Hermann of Cologne (prince archbishop), son of Frederick I, count of Wied, was educated for the priesthood, elected archbishop in 1516, and confirmed by pope Leo X as Hermann V. Having imbued the principles of the Reformation, he first attempted a Roman Catholic reform in Cologne, but, finding it, as he imagined, too late assumed a Protestant position, and invited Bucer and Melancthon, in 1542, to assist him. Had he succeeded in his plans, the whole Rhine country would probably have become Protestant; but he was excommunicated by the pope, removed by the emperor, and expelled by his estates. He finally resigned his office in 1547, and retired to his estates in Wied, where he died Aug. 15, 1552. He was belied by his people, honored by the emperor Charles V, and esteemed by the great leaders of the Reformation. An account of Hermann's relation to his times is given in Dechamps' History of Wied (Cologne, 1840). His Form of Service was made use of in the framing of the English "Book of Common Prayer." See Hase, Church History, § 337-340; Hardwick, History of the Reformation, p. 65, 218. See COMMON PRAYER.

Hermann of Fritzlar, a mystic, was born at Fritzlar, in Hesse, towards the middle of the 14th century. Nothing certain is known of his position or so-eternal relations: it is probable, however, that he was a rich layman, like Nicholas of Basle, who retired from the world to devote himself to reading and writing theological works. One of his earlier works, to which he refers himself, Die Blume der Schauung (doubtless of speculative tendency), appears to have been lost. We have, however, Heiligenkreuz. In 1688 he became a member of Pfeiffer's Deutscher Mystiker des 14. Jahrh., i, 1-298, from the Heidelberg MS. executed under his supervision in 1643-1649. It is an extensive work, compiled from sources now mostly lost.—Herzog, Real-Encyklop. (J. N. P.)

Hermann or H. H. Hermannus, Contractus, so called from disease having shrunk up his limbs, was a monk of Reichenau, and one of the learned men of the 11th century, being well skilled in Latin, Greek, and Arabic. He was born in 1013, and was the son of the count of Weringen in Suria. He wrote a Chronicle (De Secetatibus mundi), which commences at the Creation and ends A.D. 1002. The events occurring before the Christian era are very briefly noticed, but afterwards he enters into more details, and amplifies as he approaches nearer to his own times. The "Chronicle" was published in an English translation of Constantine’s, with notes, and published at Basle in 1536, and again at St. Blaise in 1790 (2 vols. 4to). It may be found also in Bihl. Max-Patr. vol. xviii. Thriemichus ascribes the hymn Alba Reformationis mater et Salve Regina to Hermann. See Dupin, Eccl. Writers, iv, 102.

Hermann or H. H. Hermannus, abbot of Tours, A.D. 1127, resided his office in consequence of long-continued illness. He wrote Tractatus de Inseuacione Christi (ed. O. Oudin, Vet. Sac. Lugd. Bat. 1692); three books of the Miracles of Mary of Laon, and a History of the Monastery of St. Martin in Tours, which are given in D’Achery’s, Speigel. ii, 488.—Dupin, Ecclistorical Writers, x, 181.

Hermann von der Hardt, a German Protestant theologian and philologist, was born at Melle (Westphalia) Nov. 15, 1660. He studied at Osnabruck, Jena, and Hamburg. In 1681 he began to lecture privately at Jena, but, not succeeding as well as he had expected, he went to Leipzig in 1686, where he joined the celebrated Goeze. In 1690 he was made literary secretary and secretary of duke Rudolph August of Brunswick, and the latter caused him finally to be appointed professor of Oriental languages at the University of Helmstadt in 1696. He afterwards became senior of the University and provost of the convent of the Cathedral, and died Feb. 28, 1746. Hermann was a very active and ingenious scholar, but his tendency to paradoxical assertions caused him to fall into errors, which, however, were perhaps too severely condemned by his adversaries. He wrote Autographu Latheri aliorumque celebrium virorum, etc. (Brunsw. 1696-1699, 3 vols. 8vo).—Ephemerides Philologicae, quibus difficillima quadrans loca Pentateuchi ad Hebraicorum fontium tenorem explicata, etc. (Helmstadt, 1693, 1696, and 1703).—Hosea illustratus chaediacum Jonathanis versione et philologico celebrius rubricum Aenon, Athen. Hermann, Nikolaus, one of the earliest evangelical hymnologists, flourished about the middle of the 16th century. His intimate relation with the minister of the church of his place (which he served as organist), Mathesius, the biographer of Luther, gave to his compositions a true, forsooth spirit and the child-like simplicity of a Christian mind. They have been preserved in general use even to our own day.—Brockhaus, Conversations Lexicon, vii, 841; Gervinus, Gesch. d. poetischen Nationaliti. d. Deutschen, iii, 10, 32.

Hermaphroditic Orders. See Monasticism.

Herma (Ἑρμα, from Εἰρμος, the Greek god of gain, or Mercury), the name of a person to whom Paul sends greeting in his Epistles to the Romans (xvi, 14), and consequently then resident in Rome and a Christian (A.D. 55); and yet the origin of the name, like that of the other four mentioned in the same verse, is Greek. However, in those days, even a Jew, like Paul himself, might acquire Roman citizenship. Ireneus, Tertullian, and Origen agree in making him identical with the author of "the Shepherd" of the following article, but this is greatly disputed. He is celebrated as a saint in the Roman calendar on May 9.—Smith, s.v.

Hermas, one of the so-called apostolical fathers (q. v.), the supposed author of a tract that has come down to us under the title of Hermas, The Shepheard, or a General Exposition, generally designated by the title Pastor Hermas. The authorship of the tract is uncertain, but it is clearly not the work of the Hermas (Ἑρμα, mentioned in Rom. xvi, 14, as Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome believed, and as the tract itself seems to pretend. The author appears to have been a layman of the 2d century, probably a Roman tradesman "who had lost his wealth through his own sins and the misdeeds of his neglected sons" (Hilgenfeld; Schaff, History of the Church, § 121). Others ascribe it to Hermas or Hermes, brother of Pius, bishop of Rome from A.D. 142 to 157. Of the Greek original we have nothing left but fragments, which are given in Fabricius, Cod. Apgoraph. N. Test. ii, 375, and in Grabe, Speigel, i, 303. M. d’Abbadie claims (1860) to have discovered a third in Ethiopia, which he has transcribed and translated into Latin (Lpz. 1860); but whether the text from which it is taken is correct is a matter of debate. The text of the English version is at an early period translated into Latin, and, since the beginning of the 15th century, often published (Paris, 1513, fol.; Strasb. 1522, 4to.; Basle, 1555 and 1569, fol.; Oxford, 1685, 12mo; with additions by Le Clerc, Amst. 1698, 1724; Paris, 1715, 1724). The various readings of the fathers of Coteler, Patres avi apostolici (Paris, 1672, 4to.), and in French in Desprez's Bible (Paris, 1715, fol. iv.) is also given in the various editions of the Apostolical Fathers (q. v.). Of late years this tract has been the subject of more editing and literary criticism than almost any relic of the early Church. In 1857 Dressel published at Leipzig a new Latin translation of the Pastor which he found in a MS. at Rome, and which differs from the other. The edition contains also a Greek text of the Iaou, revised by Tischendorf. This text, it is claimed, was found in a convent library in Constantinople. Tischendorf considers it, however, only a retransliteration from the Latin into Greek, and places its origin in the Middle Ages. Tischendorf himself discovered, in the Codex Sinaiticus, the Greek text of book 1 of the Shepherd, and the first four chapters of book 2, is given in the critical edition of Dressel, Patres Apost. (Lips. 1863); also by Hilgenfeld, who has carefully edited the Pastor Hermas in his Nov. Test. extra Canonom receptum (fasc. iii, Lips. 1866). The Anti-Nicene Christian Library, vol. i (Edinb. 1867), contains a new and complete edition of the Shepherd, following the text of Hilgenfeld, who makes use of the text found in the Sinaitic Codex.
The Pastor is written in the form of a dialogue, and is divided into three parts: 1. Visiones; 2. Mundata; 3. Similitudines. Hermas, in his childhood, had been taught up with a young slave. In after life, and when he was married, he met her again, and experienced for her the pure love which he had previously been hidden by the Church under the circumstances. Soon afterwards the young slave died. One day, as Hermas was wandering in the country, thinking of her, he sat down and fell asleep. "During my sleep," says he, "my mind carried me away to a steep path, which I followed, where I met a blind guide, with a white staff in his hand, and I could not see his face. He held up his staff on all sides, and cried, "This is the way." I followed him, and the path gradually became broader and straighter. At last we came to a house, where there was a great crowd of people. When they saw me, they said, "This is the holy man."

"Have I been called here," she answered, "to disclose thy sins before the Lord." 'What!' exclaimed I, 'and wilt thou accuse me?' 'No; but listen to me.' etc. The conversation goes on with a blending of severity and tenderness. 'Pray to the Lord,' says the young maiden, and be patient; and when you see a sight, "he will heal thy soul, and will efface the sins of all thy house, as he has done those of all the saints." One cannot help noticing the striking similarity which exists between this vision and the celebrated passage in the Divinae Consolationis where Beatrice appears to Dante. This vision is followed by three others, which are invitations to penitence, and though in the first it appears as if the invitation was especially directed to Hermas, it clearly applies also to the Church in general. This becomes more evident in the following visions.

The Mundata begin also with a vision. An angel appears to Hermas under the form of a young boy, wearing a white cloak, and bearing a staff in his hand. This shepherd is the angel of penitence, and gives Hermas twelve precepts, which embrace the rules of Christian morality. They are given under the different headings: 1. De filio novi dieum; 2. De fidei judicatae, et eleemosyna ferciendae in simplicitate; 3. De fideiendo venduto; 4. De dissimulato adulterio; 5. De tristitia corde et paenitentia; 6. De magnesia univocaeque hominis docta genetum et trilusioe inspirationibus; 7. De Deo timendo non semine non timendo; 8. Declinandum est a malo et ferciendae seculum; 9. De animis mortuorum; 10. De anima tristitia et non contristandae Spiritui Dei, qui in nobis est; 11. Spiritus et prophetos prodiere ex operibus, et de duplici spirito; 12. De duplici capitate. De mundata non esse impossibili et divino non metandum credentibus.

There is a series of parables and allegories. The vine, with its rich fruits and felicitous boughs, is used to symbolize the fruitfulness of the Church. The willow is made the emblem of divine law. This latter image is made by Hermas the ground of a most graceful allegory. Similitudines 1 to 4 are short and simple images or descriptions; Simil 5 to 9 are visions of the approaching completion of the Church, and of judgment, as well as invitations to penitence on that account; Simil 10, finally, is a sort of conclusion of the whole.

This work was perhaps the most popular book in the Christian Church of the 2d and 3d centuries. Yet, while it pleased the masses, it did not always satisfy the teachers. Irenæus (adv. Haer. iv. 3), Clement of Alexandria (Strom., I. 29), and Origen (Epist. ad Rom. 16) held it in high estimation. Eusebius asserts (Hist. Eccl. v. 2) that he himself often transcribed it and tested its authenticity. Jerome, after praising Hermas in his Chronicon, accuses him of foolishness (stultitia) in his Comment. in Habacuc (i, 1), and Tertullian treats him no better, designating the book as apocryphal in De Pudicitia (I. 39). The learned Duguet, in his Conférences ecclésiastiques, shows how erroneous is the assertion that the Pastor is the germ of all heresies which troubled the Church in the 2d century. Others among modern theologians, and especially Moischele, have violently attacked the Pastor, and considered Hermas as an impostor. The book "knows little of the Gospel, and less of justifying faith: on the contrary, it talks much of the law of Christ and of repentance, enjoins fasting and voluntary poverty, and teaches the merit, even the supererogatory merit, of good works, and the sin-atoning virtue of martyrdom" (Schaaff, l. c). Hermeneutae (ἐρμηνευται, inter preters), officers in the ancient Church, whose business it was to render one language into another, as there was occasion, both in reading the Scriptures, and in the homilies that were made to the people; an office chiefly used in those churches where the people spoke different languages, as in Palestine, where some spoke Syrian; others Greek; and in the churches of Africa, where some spoke Latin and others Punic. "So far was the primitive Church from encouraging ignorance, by locking up the Scriptures in an unknown tongue, that she not only translated them into all languages, but also appointed a standing office of interpreters, who were employed to enable men understand what was read, and not suffer them to be barbarians in the service of God, which is a tyranny that was unknown to former ages."—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. iii. ch. xiii, § 4.

Hermeneutics (from ἐρμηνεύω, to explain), the technical or scientific name of that branch of theology which consists in exposition in general, as distinguished from exegesis (ἐξεγεῖσα), from exogesis (ἐξεγείρομαι). The first mention of the natural and obvious principles of a careful and conscientious exposition to the passage and all its terms. This may be called the PHILOLOGICO-HISTORICAL rule. It embraces the following elements:

1. The diligent and discriminative use of an accurate and judicious lexicon.

2. The painstaking and constant reference to the best Grammars.

A well-grounded knowledge of the language is implied in these prescriptions, yet the interpreter needs to confirm or modify his judgment by these independent authorities.

3. An intimate acquaintance with the archaeology involved, including geography, chronology, and Oriental usages.

4. The context should be carefully consulted; and the general drift and purposes of the writer should be considered; for, if the author's special design in writing, must be kept in mind.

5. Especially is a cordial sympathy with spiritual truth a prerequisite in this task. A deep religious experience has enlightened many an otherwise ill-instructed mind as to the meaning of much of Holy Writ.

3. Parallelism. What are passages from the same book or writer, or if these are not to be had from other parts of Scripture, are to be attentively considered, on the principle that Scripture is its own best interpreter. This is pre-eminent true of types, metaphors, parables, prophetic symbols, and other figurative representations. For this purpose "reference Bible" should especially be superfluous, and the examination should include an extensive comparison of doctrine, theory, and topic, as well as of example, fact, and expression.

III. When various meanings are assignable to a given passage or word, that should be selected which is the broadest in its import and application; if possible, one that is inclusive of all or most of the others. This rule should especially be superfluous, and the examination and the language of Christ, of God directly, or the more cardinal statements of inspiration.

In prophetic and eschatological passages of Scripture especially must the fact be borne in mind that one event or circumstance is often made the type or image of another; the two being generally related to the same essential principle as proximate and remote, or as personal and national, or as temporal and spiritual manifestations of the divine economy. In some cases this correlation runs through an entire piece or book, e.g. the Canticles and most of the Psalms. See Double Sense (Of Scripture).

IV. The consensus of the universal Church in past and present time should have its due influence; not as being of absolute authority, but as an exponent of the aggregate and deliberate judgment of good and unprejudiced men. This will guard the expositor against fanciful, extravagant or dangerous impressions. To this end creeds, confessions, and articles of faith are useful, as well as the study of exploded or living heresies, but more particularly a collation of the views of preceding commentators. In weighing none of these, however, there is an imperative reverence to be indulged, for the word of God itself is superior to them all, and it is not only possible, but certain, that in some points they have alike erred, as in many they have fluctuated or conflicted with each other. Even the objections and cavils of infidels and rationalists should not be of less weight to the expositor as hostes doctores.

V. Where different interpretations are possible, that must be selected which is most consistent with common sense. Especially must those be set aside which lead to a psychological or theological impossibility or contradiction. Such a principle we always feel bound to apply to the communication of a friend, and to every other thing on which a rational writer, from overlooking this rule, have often increased rather than explained the difficulties of the sacred text. For example, to understand Paul as meaning in Rom. ix, 5 that he was willing to forfeit his title to eternal bliss, is to attribute to him a sentiment incompatible with mental and moral sanity; and to refer the preference in I Cor. vii, 21 to a state of slavery, is to outrage the spontaneous instincts of the human mind.

VI. It will sometimes become necessary to modify our conclusions as to particular passages in consequence of the discoveries and deductions of modern science. Instances in point are the theories respecting the creation and deluge, arising from the progress of astronomical and geological knowledge. All truth is consistent with itself; and although the Bible was not given for the purpose of determining scientific questions, yet it must not, and need not be so interpreted as to contradict the "elders or scripture writ by God's own hand" in the volume of nature. In like manner history is often the best expositor of prophecy.

Hermeis (Ἐρμης, i.e. the Greek Mercury [q. v.]), the name of a man mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans as a disciple at Rome (Rom. xvi, 14). A.D. 55. "According to the Greeks," says Calmet (Dict. n. v.), "he was the leading orator of a school of orators who collected disciples, and afterwards bishop of Dalmatia." His festival occurs in their calendar upon April 8 (Neale, Eastern Church, ii, 774).

Hermes, Georg, a distinguished modern Romanist theologian and philosopher. He was born at Dreieckwärde, near Münster, April 22, 1758, became gymnasium teacher in 1778, priest in 1779, and professor of theology at Münster in 1807. The best of his mind was to carry philosophical ideas toward philosophy itself. His education should be extended to include a philosophical explanation of all. He was appointed to the chair of philosophy in the new University of Bonn, where he so far advanced greatly to his reputation, and his system, before his death, had found its way into most of the Roman Catholic schools of Prussia. He died at Bonn May 26, 1811. His followers have since been called Hermesianes. The writings of an imperialist, published in his lifetime, have come to light. His followers have since been called Hermesianes. The writings of this latter, published by permission from a private collection, have become famous. After his death appeared his Christianisches Katholische Dogmatik (Münster, 1805, 3 vols. 8vo). In 1882 the Hermesianes established a journal at Cologne as their organ. During the lifetime of Hermesi there had been many complaints of the heretical tendencies of his system by the orthodox, and he had been accused of introducing into the faith, as the basis of theology. Hermesi admitted all the dogmas of the Church, but held that the ground of belief in these did not necessarily have to be laid in a philosophical proof, first of a divine revelation; and, secondly, that the mind is the medium through which belief is received. At Rome the question was put into Perrone's hands, whose report strongly condemned Hermesi and his doctrines. On 26th of September, 1805, a papal brief was issued against them. The Hermesianes, however, maintained that the doctrines censured were not contained in the system of Hermesi but were the result of their request to be allowed to present in Rome a Latin translation of the works of Hermesi, and to plead their orthodoxy, in 1807 two of their prominent spokesmen, Professor Braun, of Bonn, and professor Elvenich, of Breslau, arrived in Rome, but, finding that they would not get a hearing, on the advice of the pope withdrew and published a series of writings against the philosophy of Hermesi. This was given in Migne's Declarations Evangeliques, ii, 945 sq.; see also Stupp, Die letzten Hermesianer (Cologne, 1844-5); Hagenbach, History of 18th and 19th Centuries, tr. by Hurst, ii, 444; and art. Günther.

Hermes Trismegistus, or Mercurius (Ἑρμῆς, Ερμής ὁ Τρισμεγίστου), the putative author of a large number of Greek works, many of which are still extant. The Greek Hermes was in the time of Plato identified with the Egyptian Thot, Thoth, or Thaut (as it was also with the Alexandrian Thoth), a mythical personage regarded as the discoverer of all sciences, especially as the original inventor of the alphabet, the art of writing; of geometry, arithmetic, astronomy, etc. In Egypt, all works relating to religion or science bore the name of Thoth or of Hermes. According to a passage in Clement of Alexandría (Strom. l. vi.), two of Hermes' books contained the hymns of the gods and rules of conduct related to astronomy, etc. These expressions used by Clement of Alexandria imply that there was a much larger number of so-called Hermetic books than he mentions. As for the 36,525 mentioned by Iamblichus (De Myst. Egypt.), a number which corresponds to the great sacred period of Egypt, Goerres supposes that it was due to the habit of repeating verses, not to an extensive, popular work. All this leads to the belief that Hermes Trismegistus was but a personification of the Egyptian priesthood. According Hermia\ldots, a heretical sect of the 24th century, which, according to Augustine, denied baptism by water on the pretense that this was not the kind of baptism instituted by Christ; for John the Baptist, comparing his own baptism with that of our Lord, says, "I baptize you with water; but he that cometh after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." (Augustine, De Haer. c. 59.) They affirmed that the souls of men consisted of fire and spirit, and therefore a baptism of fire was more suitable to their nature. Early ecclesiastical writers are not agreed as to what was meant by this expression. Chrysostom and Alexander mention some who, when they had baptized men in water, also made a mark on their ears with fire, so joining together baptism by water, and, as they imagined, baptism by fire (apud Combes, Auctorium, i. 202). Others, by some deceptive art during baptism, made fire to appear on the person of the water, and confirmed this by a reference to some apocryphal writing of their own invention called "The Preaching of Paul or Peter," in which it was said that, when Christ was baptized, fire appeared on the water. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. iv. xiii. ii. § 8.

Hermias, a writer, supposed to have lived from the 24th century; nothing is known of his life. He is supposed to have written one of which we possess but the Latin translation (Venice, 1492, fol.; latest edit. Ulm, 1672, 12mo)--- \textit{Libri physico-medicini Kirianum Kiriani, id est regia Farsamum, vere aureus genitus,} another astrological work, which is known to us only in the Latin translation published by Andr. Privat, through the courtesy of the MSS. at Madrid. Some of the books bearing the name of Hermes Trismegistus were evidently productions of the Middle Ages; these are \textit{Tractatus aureus de Lapidis philosophici Decreto,} i. e. on the philosopher's Stone (Lyon, by D. Gnoisius, Leips. 1616, 1616, 8vo); and translated into French by G. Joly and F. Habert, Paris, 1626, 8vo; \textit{Tabula maragardina,} an essay on the art of gold-making, published in Latin (Nuremburg, 1541, 4to; Strasbourg, 1560, 8vo; \textit{Pier betaouellis} \textit{vovis}, published at the end of Ruther's edition of L. Hermit (Gr. Ἱερέως, desert), one devoted to religious solitude; properly, the solitude of a wilderness. It became, at a later period, the name of certain classes of monks. See Monasticism; Monk.

Hermogénès (Equoyoung, Mercury-born), a disciple of Asia Minor, and probably companion in labor of the apostle Paul; mentioned, along with Thygeius, as having been brought up by Paul and impressed at Rome, doubtless from alarm at the perils of the connection (2 Tim. i, 13). A.D. 64. In the Roman Breviary (in Fest. S. Jac. Apost. Pars. aestivo, p. 465, Milan, 1851) the conversion of Hermogénès is attributed to St. James the Great, and in the annals of the early history of Abadia, the so-called bishop of Babylon (Fabricius, Cod. Apocryph. N. T. p. 517 sq.), Hermogénès is represented as first practising magic, and converted, with Philutus, by the same apostle. Grotius, apparently misled by the circumstance that the historian or geographer Hermogénès, mentioned by the scholiast of Apollonius Rhodius (ii, 722, Frag. Hist. Graec. Didot. ed., iii, 592), wrote on primitive history, and incidentally (?) speaks of Nannacus or Anacucus—and may therefore probably be the same as the Hermogenes whom Josephus mentions as having treated on Jewish history (Apion, i, 29)—suggests that he may be the person mentioned by the apostle Paul. This, however, is not likely. Nothing more is known of the Hermogenes in question, and he cannot be identified either with Hermogenes of Tarsus, a historian of the time of Domitian, who was put to death by that monarch (Suid. Domit. 10; Hoffman, Lex. Univ. s. v.; Alfred ed. 2 Tim. i, 15), nor with Hermogenes the painter, against whom Tertullian wrote (Smith's Dict. of Class. Biography, s. v.), nor with the sains of the Byzantine Church, commemorated on Jan. 24 and Sept. 1 (Neale, Eastern Church, ii, 770, 781).

Hermogénes, a heretic of the 2d century. Our knowledge of him is chiefly derived from a treatise against him by Tertullian (adv. Hermogéneum), and from an account in the newly-discovered MS. of Hippolytus. He was living, probably in Africa, when Tertullian wrote against him, and was a painter by profession. Tertullian charged that Hermogénes was a believer in the doctrines of the heathen philosophers, and especially in those of the Stoics, and especially that he taught the eternity of matter. Hermogénes argued that God must have made the world either out of his own substance, or out of nothing, or out of pre-existent matter. The first, he thought, was inconsistent with God's immutability; the second with the origin of evil; and therefore the third must be received as true. "He rejected both the Gnostic Emanation doctrine and the Church doctrine of Creation: the former contradicted the unchangeable nature of God, and necessitated attributing to him the origin of evil: the latter was contradicted by the nature of the Creator. God must have conditioned his being by nothing, a perfect world must have been the result. Hence he believed that creation supposed something conditioning, and this he thought must be the Hyle which he received from Platonism in connection with the Christian system. He did not think that he gave up the doctrine of the μορφή as long as he admitted a ruling, all-powerful principle, and ascribed to God such a supremacy over the Hyle. He regarded the Hyle as altogether undetermined, unpredictable, in which all the contrarieties that afterwards appeared in the world were as yet unseparated and undeveloped; neither motion nor rest, neither flowing nor standing still, but an inorganic confusion. It was the receptive, God alone the creative; his formative agency called forth the determinant existence. But with this organization there was a residuum which withheld the divine formative power. Hence the defective and the offensive in nature; hence also evil. Had he been logical he must have had admitted a creation without a basis. In his system all things have regarded the Hyle as an impenetrable and inscrutable act of God, but as immanent, and resulting immediately from the relation of God to matter. He said God was always a ruler, consequently he must always have had dominion over matter" (Neander, Hist. of Dogma, Ryland's transl., i, 118). The account in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 17. 13, and Tertullian, Adv. Hermog. is, as the north-western precedent, in the main, with that given above, and adds that Hermogénes taught that Christ, after his resurrection, when he "ascended to heaven, leaving his body in the sun, proceeded himself to his Father." See Augustine, De Haer. xii. 1; Tertullian, Adv. Hermog. passim; Ritter, Gr. Gesch. des Hellenismus und des Christentums, ii, 178; Neander, Gesch. des deuts. Theo. der neuesten Zeit, i, 568; Mosheim, Comm. vol. i. Lardner, Works, ii, 203; viii, 579; Hagenbach, History of Dogmatik, vol. i, § 47.

Her'mon (Heb. Hermon), according to Ge'senius, from the Arabic Charram, a peak; Sept. Aσπιος, a mountain which formed the northernmost boundary (Josh. xii, 1) of the country beyond the Jordan (Josh. xi, 17) which the Hebrews conquered from the Amorites (Deut. iii, 4), and which, therefore, must have belonged to Anti-Libanus (1 Chron. v, 29), as is, indeed, implied or expressed in most of the other passages in which it is named (Deut. iv, 48; Josh. vi, 3, 17; xii, 4; xiii, 5, 11; Ps. lxix, 12; cxlvii, 3; Cant. iv, 8). It has two or more summits, and is therefore spoken of in the plural. (וֹרֶם, Paas. xii, 7, 8; Sept. Apocrypha, Eng. V. Hermon). In Deut. iii, 26, it has been called by the Sidonians Siron (יֵרְום), and by the Amorites Shemir (שֵׁם), both of which words signify "a coat of mail," as glittering in the sun. In Deut. iv, 48 it is called Mount Smion (יוֹרֶם), meaning "an elevation," "a high mountain"—which it was well entitled to be designated by way of excellence, being (if correctly identified with Jebel es-Sherb) by far the highest of all the mountains in or near Palestine. In the later books of the Old Testament, however (as in 1 Chron. v, 22; Sol. Song, iv, 8), Sherib is distinguished from Hermon properly so called. Probably different summits or parts of this range bore different names, which were applied in a wider or narrower acceptance at different times (see Schwartz, Palestine, p. 56). See HIVTTE. Hermon was a natural landmark. It could be seen from the "Dead Sea Mount" be the Dead Sea, the heights of Nebo, from every prominent spot, in fact, in Moab, Gilfead, and Bashan—a pale blue, snow-capped peak, terminating the view on the northern horizon. When the people came to know the country better—when not merely its great physical features, but its towns and pastures, its rivers and oases, its mountains and valleys, and its boundary of the old kingdom of Bashan, as Saelah was the south-eastern. We read in Josh. xii, 5 that Og rejoined in Mount Hermon, and in Saelah, and in all Bashan? l. e. in all Bashan, from Hermon to Saelah, HERMON

Another notice of Hermon shows the minute accuracy of the topography of Joshua. He makes it "Lebanon towards the sun-rising," that is, the range of Anti-Lebanon, extend from Hermon to the entering into Hamath (xiii, 5). Every Oriental geographer now knows that Hermon is the southern extremity of this range. The beauty and grandeur of Hermon did not escape the attention of the Hebrew poets. From nearly every prominent point in Palestine the mountain is visible, but it is when we leave the hill-country of Samaria and enter the plain of Esdraelon that Hermon appears in all its majesty, shooting up on the distant horizon behind the graceful rounded top of Tabor. It was probably this view that suggested to the Psalmist the words "the north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name" (lxxix, 12). The "dew of Hermon" is once referred to in a passage which has long been considered a geographical puzzle; "as the dew of Hermon, the dew that descended on the mountains of Zion" (Psa. cxxxiii, 8). Some have thought that Zion ( görüntü ) is used here for Sion ( görüntü ), one of the old names of Hermon (Deut. iv, 48), but this identification is unnecessary. The snow on the summit of this mountain condenses the vapors that float during the summer in the higher regions of the atmosphere, causing clouds to move downward in vast masses and creating a continuous cloud above the mountain. One of its tops is actually called Abu-Nady, i.e. "father of dew" (Porter, Handbook ii, 463). Since modern travellers have made us acquainted with the little, previously unknown coves beyond the Jordan, it has been realized that the Mount Hermon of those texts is no other than the present Jebel es-Sheikh, or the Sheik's Mountain, or, which is equivalent, Old Man's Mountain, a name it is said to have obtained from its fancied resemblance (being topped with snow, which sometimes lies in lengthened streaks upon its sloping ridges) to the bony head and beard of a venerable sheik (Elliot, i, 317). This Jebel es-sheikh is a south-eastern, and in that direction culminating, branch of Anti-Libanus. Its top is partially covered with snow throughout the summer, and has an elevation of 8076 feet (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 170, 176). Dr. Clarke, who saw it in the month of July, says, "The summit is so lofty that the snow entirely covers the upper part of it, not lying in patches, but investing all the higher part with that perfectly white and smooth violet-like appearance which snow only exhibits when it is very deep." Dr. Robinson, in the season of such snow, describes it as "an expanse of snow all over the mountain, and the snow in some distance down the sides, while on the peaks of Lebanon opposite there was none." In August, 1852, Rev. J. L. Porter, of Damascus, ascended Jebel es-Sheikh from Rasheb, and spent a night near its summit. He describes the highest peak as composed strictly of three peaks, so near each other as to appear one, the southernmost of these peaks is the most interesting remains, called Kulab Antel, probably relics of an ancient Syro-Phoenician temple, consisting of a circular wall around a rock about 15 feet high, which has a rude entrance upon it, and heaps of bevelled stones adjoining it. These ruins explain the realization of the ancients, who made it a place of drinking in Tyre and Sidon (Bibliotheca Sacra, Jan. 1845). The summit is about 9000 feet above the Mediterranean (Lieut. Warren, in the Quarterly Statement of the "Pioneer Exploration Fund," No. 5, p. 210, where also a description and cut of the ancient temple). In two passages of Scripture this mountain is called Baal-hermon ( görüntü ), 22 Judg. iii, 3; 1 Chron. v, 25), and the only reason that can be assigned for it is that Baal was there worshipped. Jerome says of it, "Dicti.-O.

HEROD

It has been suggested that one of the southern peaks of Hermon was the scene of the Transfiguration. Our Lord travelled from Bethsaida, on the northern slope of the Sea of Galilee, "to the coasts of Cesarea-Philippi," where he led his disciples "into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them," and afterwards he returned, going towards Jerusalem through Galilee (comp. Mark vii, 22-28; Matt. xvi, 13; Mark ii, 18-20, 38-38). No other mountain in Palestine is more appropriate to the circumstances of that glorious scene, except Tabor, to which many centuries of tradition has assigned this honor (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 358); but if it be assigned to this locality, it will give additional celebrity to the prince of Syrian mountains (Porter's Damascus, i, 806).

The mention of Hermon along with Tabor in Psa. lxxix, 12, to its being sought near the latter mountain, where, accordingly, travellers and maps give us a "Little Hermon." But that passage, as well as Psa. cxxxiii, 8, applies better to the great mountain already described; and in the former it seems perfectly natural for the Psalmist to call upon those mountains, respectively the most conspicuous in the western and eastern divisions of the Hebrew territory, to rejoice in the name of the Lord. Besides, we are to consider that Jebel es-sheikh is seen from Mount Tabor, and that both together are visible from the plain of Esdraelon. There is no reason to suppose that the so-called Little Hermon is at all mentioned in Scripture. Its actual name is Jebel ed-Duhy; it is a shapeless, barren, and uninteresting mass of hills, in the north of the valley of Jearzel and opposite Mount Gilboa (Robinson, Researches, iii, 174).

Her'od ( HIDING, hero-like, a name that appears likewise among the Greeks, Dio. Cass. lixi, 35; Philost. Soph. ii, i., etc.), the name of several persons of the royal family of Judaea in the time of Christ and the apostles (see Nolius, "Herod," i. of Havercamp's edit. of Josephus; Reland, Palest. p. 174 sq.; Jost, Gesch. d. Israeliten, i, 160 sq.) Other monographs are named by Volbeding, Index Programmatum, p. 167, 177, and by Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaica, i, 886; ii, 127-130. See also De Salency, Hist. d'Herode, Par. 1867; Gildner, Heroes, Bern, 1869), whose history is incidentally involved in that of the N. Testament, but is copiously detailed by Josephus: notices of it also occur in the classical writers, especially Strabo (xvi, c. ii, 16). We therefore devote a large space to consideration of the subject.

The history of the Herodian family presents one side of the last development of the Jewish nation. The evils which had existed in the hierarchy that grew up after the Return, found an unexpected embodiment in the tyranny of a foreign usurper. Religion was adopted as a policy; and the helenizing designs of Antichus Epiphanes were carried out, at least in that spirit, by men who professed to observe the law. Side by side with the spiritual "kingdom of God" proclaimed by John the Baptist, and founded by the Lord, a kingdom of the world was established, which in its external splendor recalled the traditional magnum opus of the potters as the two principles, national and spiritual, which had long variously influenced the Jews, in the establishment of a dynasty and a church, is a fact pregnant with instruction. In the fulness of time a descendant of Esau still held a false counterfeit of the promised glories of the Messiah. Various accounts are given of the ancestry of the Herods. The Jewish partisans of Herod (Nicolas Damascus, ap. Josephus, Ant. xiv, 1, 5) sought to raise him to the dignity of a descent from one of the noble families of the east (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 1, 5). In the other hand, early Christian writers represented his origin as utterly mean and servile. Africans has preserved a tradition (Routh, Rel. Serr. ii, 235), on the authority of "the natural kinsmen of the Saviour," which makes Antipater, the father of Herod, the son of one Herod, a slave of a commoner, the son of a slave of a commoner, who soon afterwards was made governor of Acalon, who was taken prisoner by Idumean robbers, and kept by them, as his father could not pay his ransom. The locality (comp. Philo, Leg. ad Caium, § 80), no less than the office, was calculated to fix a heavy reproach upon the name (comp. Routh, l.c.). This story is associated with great inaccuracy by Epiphanius (Hist. xx). Neglecting, however, these exaggerated statements of friends and enemies, it seems certain that the family was of Idumean descent (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 1, 3), a fact which is indicated by the forms of some of the names that were retained in it (Ewald, Geschichte, iv); or, as some supposed, his parents were Jew of Idumean stock and came to be settlers in the land. The Herods were in faith. The Idumean had been conquered and brought over to Judaism by John Hyrcanus (B.C. 190; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 9, 1); and from the time of their conversion they remained constant to their new religion, loyally supporting it as their mother city, and claiming for themselves the name of Jews (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 7; War, i, 10, 4; iv, 4, 4). The general policy of the whole Herodian family, though modified by the personal characteristics of the successive rulers, was the same. It centred in the en- demic fear of the powers of the Hellenistic race, and in the value of the Jewish state, with the power to produce the benefits of the Jewish state, with the power of the Jewish nation, in which the power of the Jews to secure the consolidation of a state. The protection of Rome was in the first instance a necessity, but the designs of Herod II and Agrippa I pointed to an independent Eastern empire at their head, and not to a mere subject monarchy. Such a consummation of the Jewish hopes seems to have found some measure of acceptance at first [see Hermas]; and by a natural reaction the temporal dominion of the Herods opened the way for the destruction of the Jewish nationality. The religion which was degraded into the instrument of unscrupulous ambition led the Jews to look for a saviour, though there was no saviour. The high-priests were appointed and deposed by Herod I and his successors with such a reckless disregard for the character of the office (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenkuhlna, i, 322, 325, 421), that the office itself was deprived of its sacred dignity (compare Ant. xxiii, 2 sq., i, 1, 430, etc.). The nation was divided, and amidst the conflict of sects a universal faith arose, which more than fulfilled the hopes that found no satisfaction in the treacherous government of a court. See the name of each member of the family in its order in this CYCLOPEDIA. 1. HEROD THE GREAT, as he is usually named, mentioned in Matt. ii, 1-22; Luke i, 5; Acts xxii, 35, was the second son of Antipater and Cypros, an Arab-ian lady of noble descent (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 7, 8). See Antipater. In B.C. 47 Julius Caesar made Antipater protector of Judea, and the latter divided his territo- ry into three parts, ruling over Galilee to Antipater (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 9, 3; War, i, 10, 4). At the time when he was invested with the government he was fifteen years of age, according to Josephus (Ant. xvi, 9, 2); but this must be a mistake. Herod died, aged about 60, in B.C. 4, consequently he must have been twenty-six or twenty-five in the year B.C. 47, when he was made governor of Galilee (πιστής και χρύος, given by Dindorf in the ed. Didot, but not stated authority). (one of his first acts was to repress the brigands who were infesting his provinces, and to put many of their leaders to death upon his own authority. This was Herod was married to no less than ten wives, by most of whom he had children. He died a few days before the Passover, B.C. 4, his death-bed being the scene of the most awful agonies in mind and body. According to the custom of the times, he made his sons the heir to his kingdom by a formal testament, leaving its ratification to the will of the temple census. Augustus, according to its main provisions, Archelaus became tetrarch of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea; Philip, of Trachonitis and Iturea; and Herod Antipas, of Galilee and Peraea. His body was conveyed by his son Archelaus from Jericho, the place where he died, to Herodium, and there reposed 200 stadia distant, and he was there buried with great pomp (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 8, 2; War, i, 28, 9).

On the extirpation of the Asmonean family, finding that there was then no one who could interfere with him, Herod had introduced heathen customs, such as days, shows, and chariot-races, which the Jews condemned as contrary to the laws of Moses (Josephus, Ant. xv, 8, 1); and on the completion of the building of Cæsarea he also introduced Olympic games and consecrated them to Cæsar, ordering them to be celebrated every fifth year (Josephus, Ant. xv, 9, 5; xvi, 5, 1). With his own heathenize devolution he was smitten with a great contempt for public opinion as in the execution of his personal vengeance. He signalized his elevation to the throne by offerings to the Capitoline Jupiter (Jos. Gesch. d. Judenm. i, 318), and surrounded his person by foreign mercenaries, some of whom had formerly been in the palace of Herod the Great. Augustus, who recognized this, said (Josephus, Ant. xxv, 1, i, 8, 3). His coins and those of his successors bore only Greek legends; and he introduced heathen games even within the walls of Jerusalem (Josephus, Ant. xv, 8, 1). He displayed ostentatiously his favor towards foreign kings, and persecuted a number of Zeno- niani for leaguing himself with the Arabs, and given to Herod. In return, Herod adorned this place by erecting a temple, which he dedicated to Augustus (Josephus, Ant. xv, 10, 8; War, i, 20, 4; Dion Cass. liv, 9). Not long after this, the death of his wife was followed by other misfortunes. Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Mariamne, were put to death; and at last, in B.C. 4, Herod ordered his eldest son, Antipater, to be killed. (See Alexander; Aristobulus; Antipater.) Herod's painful disease no doubt maddened him in his later years, and in anticipation of his own death he gave orders for the nobility and Jews, whom he had shut up in the Hippodrome at Jericho, should immediately after his decease be put to death, that mourners might not be wanting at his funeral (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 6, 5).

Near his death, too, he must have ordered the murder of the infants at Bethlehem, as recorded by Matthew (ii. 16-18). The number of children in a village must have been very few, and Josephus has passed this story over unnoticed; yet it is worthy of remark that he has given an account of a massacre by Herod of all the members of his family who had consented to what the Pharisees foretold, viz. that Herod's government should cease, and his posterity be deprived of the kingdom (Ant. xvii, 2, 4). A confused account of the massacre of the children and the murder of Antipater is given in Macrobius: "Augustus cum audisset inter pueros, quis in Syriâ Herodes, rex Judaearum, intra bimatum jussit interfici, filiumque suum vocavit, ait: Julius est Herodis por- cum? (sive, nece) esse quam filium (sive, son)?" (Sat. ii, 4). Macrobius lived in the 5th century (c. A.D. 420), and the words intra bimatum (at bimatum et infra, Matt. iii, 16, Vulg.) seem to be borrowed; the story, too, in wrong, as Antipater was of age when he was executed (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 6, 7). Hence the time of the death of Herod, in B.C. 4, according to the true chronology. This beautiful Temple, though built in honor of the God of Israel, did not win the hearts of the people, as is proved by the revolt which took place shortly before Herod's death, when the Jews tore down the golden eagle which he had fastened to the Temple, and broke it in pieces (Josephus, Antiq. xvii, 6, 2, 3).

The divinity of Herod's nature is remarkable. On regarding his magnificence, and the benefits he bestowed upon his people, one cannot deny that he had a very beneficent disposition; but when we read of his cruelties, not only to his subjects, but even to his own relations, one is forced to allow that he was brutal and a stranger to humanity. Josephus, Ant. xvi, 9, 5. His servility to Rome is amply shown by the manner in which he transgressed the customs of his nation and set aside many of their laws, building cities and erectors temples in foreign countries, for the Jews did not permit him to do in Judea, even though they were under so nominal a dependence as that of Herod. His confessed apology was that he was acting to please Caesar and the Romans, and so through all his reign he was a Jewish prince only in name, with a Hellenistic disposition (comp. Josephus, Ant. xvi, 9, 5; xiv, 7, 3). It has even been supposed (Jose, Gesch. d. Juden, ii, 328) that the rebuilding of the Temple furnished him with the opportunity of destroying the authentic collection of genealogies which was of the highest importance to the priestly families. Herod, as appears from his public designs, affected the dignity of a second Solomon, but he joined the license of that monarch to his magnificence; and it was said that the monument which he raised over the royal tombs was due to the fear which seized him after a sacrilegious attempt to rob them of secret treasures (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 7, 1). He maintained peace at home during a long reign by the vigor and timely generosity of his rule. Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5. See the will of the Romans under circumstances of unusual difficulty. His ostenta:ious display, and even his arbitrary tyranny, was calculated to inspire Orientals with awe. Boul and yet prudent, oppressive and yet profuse, had many of the characteristics which make a popular hero; and many of which may have been first given in admiration of successful despotism now serves to bring out in clearer contrast the terrible price at which the success was purchased.

Josephus gives Herod I the surname of Great (Ἡρῴδης ὁ μεγάλος), as it is only intended to distinguish him from the younger Herod (Antipas), and compares the cases of Ελείας ὁ μικρός (Ant. xvi, 8, 4) and Agrippa the Great, in contrast to Helcas, the keeper of the sacred treasures (Ant. xx, 11, 1); and to Agrippa II. The title Ἐλειάς ὁ μικρὸς (Jos. Ant. xvi, 4, 4) is probably a misprint for Eleas (Echkel, Doct. Num. Vet. ii, 492; Akerman, Num. Chron. ix, 23), and so says Ewald, "it may similarly have been given upon the coins of Herod, and from this the origin of the surname may have been derived" (Geschichte, iv, 575, note). There are, however, no coins of Herod I with the title great. It is best to suppose that the title in Josephus is merely a distinguishing epithet, and not meant to express greatness of character or achievements.

2. Herod Antipas (Ἡρῴδης ὁ ἀντίπας, Matt. Mark, Luke; Antipas, Josephus, Ant. xvi, 4, 5, 6). His father had already given him "the kingdom" in his first will, but in the final arrangement left him the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peraea (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 4, 1; War, ii, 1, 1; Matt. xiv, 1; Luke iii, 1; iii, 19, 19, 5). He visited his brother Philip, and commencing an intrigue with his wife Herodias, daughter of Aristobulus, the son of Mariamne, he afterwards incestuously married her. He had previously been married to a daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, who avenged this insult by invading his dominions, and defeated him with great loss (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 8, 1). An affront to the king of Perea, and the hope of revenging the death of his son, had made Aretas go over to Herod; he was not the man, however, to yield to a personal injury. Aretas was haughtily ordered by the emperor to desist from the prosecution of the war, and Herod accordingly escaped the expected overthrow. Josephus says that the opinion of the Jews was that the defeat was a punishment for his having imprisoned John the Baptist on account of his popular activity as a denunciat of vice and sin. John, however, being put to death, but does not mention the reproval that John gave him, nor that it was at the instigation of Herodias that he was killed, as recorded in the Gospels (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 5, 4; Matt. xiv, 1-12; Mark vi, 14-16; Luke iii, 19, 19, 7-9). The evangelists evidently give the true reason, and Josephus the one generally received by the people. In A.D. 38, after the death of Tiberius, he was persuaded, especially at the ambitious instigation of Herodias, to go to Rome to procure for himself the royal title. Agrippa, who was high in the favor of Caligula, and already received a part of it, consented to this with such success that Antipas was condemned to perpetual banishment at Lyons, a city of Gaul (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 7, 2), and eventually died in Spain, whither his wife Herodias had voluntarily followed him (War, ii, 9, 6). He is called (by courtesy) king by Matthew (xiv, 9) and Mark (xv, 14) in this place. Herod Antipas was in high favor with Tiberius; hence he gave the name of Tiberias to the city he built on the lake of Gennesareth (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2, 3). He enlarged and improved several cities of his dominions, and also built a wall about Sepphoris, and round Bethanath, the latter town he named Nazareth, in honor of the wife of the emperor (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 1; comp. War, ii, 9, 11). It was before Herod Antipas, who came up to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover (comp. Joseph. Ant. xviii, 6, 3), that our Lord was sent to the temple examination when Pilate heard that he was a Galilean, as Pilate had already had several disputes with the Galileans, and was not at this time on very good terms with Herod (Luke xii, 1; xxii, 6-7), and "on the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together" (Luke xxiii, 12; comp. Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4); the Galileans were called shepherds of Galilee, and Herod Antipas is coupled with that of Pilate in the prayer of the apostles mentioned in the Acts (iv, 24-30). His personal character is little touched upon by either Josephus or the evangelists, yet from his consenting to the death of John the Baptist to gratify the malice of a wicked woman, though for a time he had "heard him gladly" (Mark vi, 20), we perceive his cowardice, his want of spirit, and his fear of ridicule. His wicked oath was not binding on him, for Herod was bound by the law of God not to commit murder. He was in any case desirous to see Jesus, and "hoped to have seen a miracle from him" (Luke xii, 18). His artifices and cunning are specially alluded to by our Lord, "Go ye and tell that fox" (τῇ ἄγωνίᾳ τοῦ λύγγου, Luke xiii, 32). Coins of Herod Antipas bear the title ΤΕΤΑΡΡΑΧΟΥ. See Antipas.

3. Herod Archelaus (Ἀρχέλαος, Matt.; Josephus: Ἀρχέλαιος, Dion Cassius: coins), son of Herod and Cleopatra, and greater and Malthace, tetrarch and younger brother of Herod Antipas, and called by Dion Cassius Πελαστήριος (iv, 57). He was brought up with his brother at Rome (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 1, 3). His father had disinherited him in consequence of the false accusations of his eldest brother Antipas, and had the son of Doris, Herod's tutor, bringing a new will, altered his mind, and gave him "the kingdom," which had before been left to Antipas (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 8, 1). It was this unexpected arrangement which led to the retreat of Joseph to Galilee (Matt. ii, 22). He was saluted as "king" by the army, but refused to accept that title till it should be confirmed by Augustus (Joseph, Ant. xvii, 8, 2, 4; War, i, 1). Shortly after this a sedition was raised against him, which he quelled by killing 3000 persons, and then set sail with his brother Antipas to Rome (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 9, 2, 4; War, i, 2, 33). Upon this the Jews sent an embassy to Augustus, to request that they might be allowed to live under Roman laws under the Roman governor. Our Lord seems to allude to this circumstance in the parable of the nobleman going into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom: "But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us" (Luke xix, 12-27). Shortly after, at Rome, Jerusalem was in care of Sabinus, the Roman procurator, and a quarrel ensued in consequence of the manner in which the Jews were treated. Quiet was again established through the intervention of Varus, the president of Syria, and the authors of the sedition were punished (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 10). Augustus, however, raised the mopsus of Herod's will, and gave Archelaus Judea, Samaria, and Idumea, with the cities of Cesarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem, the title of ethnarch, and a promise that he should have the royal dignity hereafter if he governed virtuously (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 11, 4; War, i, 6, 3). Archelaus never really had the title of king (βασιλεὺς), though at first called so by the people (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 8, 2), yet we cannot object to the word βασιλεὺς in Matthew, for Archelaus regarded himself as king (Josephus, War, ii, 1, 1), and Josephus speaks of the province of Judaea and Samaria, only as aota, as seems the ἀνακαλούσα τῶν Αὐτοκράτων (War, ii, 11, 5). Herod (Antipas) the tetrarch is also called ὁ βασιλεὺς (Matt. xiv, 9; Mark vi, 14). When Archelaus returned to Judea he rebuilt the royal palace at Jericho, and established a village, naming it after himself, Archelaus (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 13, 1). Long after Archelaus's return he edited the Mosaic law by marrying Phylaphya, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and the Jews complained again loudly of his tyranny. Augustus summoned him to Rome, and finally, A.D. 6, sent him into exile at Vienna in Gaul, where he probably died, and his dominions were attached to the Roman empire (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 18, 2; War, ii, 7; compare Strabo, xvi, 765; Dion Cassius, lv, 25, 27). Jerome, however, relates that he was shown the tomb of Archelaus near Bethlehem (Onomasticon, s. v.).

4. Herod PHILIP I (Φιλίππος, Mark vi, 17; Ἱρόδη, Josephus) was the son of Herod the Great by a second Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-priest (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4), and must be distinguished from Philip the tetrarch, No. 6. He was the husband of Herodias, by whom he had a daughter, Salome. He married Rodia, however, contrary to the laws of her country, divorced herself from him, and married her uncle Antipas [see Nos. 2 and 5] (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4; Matt. xiv, 3; Mark vi, 17; Luke iii, 19). He was omitted in the will of Herod in consequence of the discovery that Mariamne was conscious of the plots of Antipater, Herod the Great's son by Doris (Josephus, War, i, 30, 7). See Philip.

5. Herodias (Ἡρώδεια, Matt. xiv, 1-11; Mark vi, 14-16; Luke iii, 19) was the daughter of Aristobulus, one of the sons of Herod I by the first Mariamne, and of Berenice, the daughter of Salome, Herod's sister, and was consequently sister of Herod Agrippa I (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4; War, i, 28, 1). She was first married to her uncle, Herod Philip I, the son of Herod I and the second Mariamne, by whom she had a daughter Salome, probably the one that danced and pleased Herod Antipas, and who afterwards married her uncle Philip II. Herodias soon divorced herself from him, and married Herod Antipas, who was also her uncle, being the son of Herod I and Malthace, and who agreed, for her sake, to put away his own wife, the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4; War, i, 28, 1). Having been divorced from the Baptist, she repented for her crimes in thus living in adultery and incest, and she took the first opportunity to cause him to be put to death, thus adding thereto the crime of murder. Her marriage was unlawful for three reasons: first, her former husband, Philip, was still alive (ἱππάστασα Ζωντος, Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4); secondly, Antipas's wife was still alive; and, thirdly, by her first marriage he had a son thereby, who according to the Roman law was the heir of his father. He rejoined his Antipas, who was consequently forbidden by the Jewish law to marry his brother's wife (Lev. xviii, 16; xi, 21; comp. Alford on Matt. xiv, 4). When Antipas was condemned by Caius to perpetual banishment, Herodias was offered a pardon, and the emperor made her a present of 100 talents (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 11, 4; War, ii, 6, 3). He is only mentioned once in the N.T. (Luke iii, 1, ὁ ἀνακαλούσα τῶν ἀνακαλούσων), he was married to Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip I and Herodias, but left no issue. His title of king was diminished to that of ethnarch, and his dominions for 37 years (B.C. 4-A.D. 34), during which time he showed himself to be a person of moderation and quietness in the conduct of his life and government (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 4). He built the city of Panos and named it Cesarea, more commonly known as Cæsarea, enlarged it (Josephus, Matt. xiv, 17), and also advanced to the dignity of a city the village Bethsaida, calling it by the name of Julius, in honor of the daughter of Augustus. He died at Julius, and was buried in the monument he had there built (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 1, 4; War, ii, 9, 1). Leaving no children, his dominions were annexed to the Roman province of Syria (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 5). Coins of Philip II bear the title ΤΕΤΡΑΧΟΥ. See Philip.

6. Herod Agrippa I (Ἡρώδης, Acts: Ἱεροσαλημιτης, Josephus) was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and the grandson of Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 1, 28, 3). He is called "Agrippa the Great" by Josephus (Ant. xvii, 2, 9). A short time before the death of Herod the Great he was living at Rome, and was brought up with Drusus, the son of Tiberius, and with Antonia, the wife of Drusus (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 1). He was one of the Roman warmongers. He was born in B.C. 10, and they were bred up together in the closest intimacy. The earlier part of his life was spent at Rome, where the magnificence and luxury in which he indulged involved him so deeply in debt that he was compelled to fly from Rome, and betook himself to a fortress at Malathia, in Idumea. Through the mediation of his wife Cyprus and his sister Herodias, he was allowed to take up his abode at Tiberias, and received the rank of aetile in that city, with a small annuity (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 6, 2). But, having quarreled with his brother-in-law, he fled to Flaccus, the procurator of Syria. Soon afterwards he was convicted, though the influence of his brother Aristobulus, of having received a bribe from the Damascenes, who wished to purchase his influence with the proconsul, and was again compelled to fly. He was arrested, as he was about to sail to Italy, for a sum of money which he owed to the Roman treasury, but made his escape and reached Alexandria, where his wife succeeded in procuring a supply of money from the Alexandria the alabarch. He then set sail, and landed at Puteoli. He was favorably received by Tiberius; but he one day inadvertently expressed the wish that he had been born a Roman citizen. For this reason he was being reported to Tiberius, he was arrested and thrown into prison, where he remained till the accession of Ca-
Coimbra shortly after gave him the tetrarchy of Philip, the iron chain with which he had been fastened to a soldier being exchanged for a gold one (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 10). He was also invested with the consular dignity, and a league was publicly concluded between Claudius and Antipas. Claudius went to take possession of his kingdom, and at Alexandria he was insulted by the people, who dressed up an idiot, and bore him in mock triumph through the streets to denounce the king of the Jews (Philo, in Flaccum, 6). The jealousy of Herod Antipas and his wife Herodias was excited by the four marriages of Claudius that he had contracted with four different women, all of them Roman princesses (Josephus, Ant. xix, 9, 2; Tacit. Hist. v, 9). After the death of his uncle Herod in A.D. 48, Claudius bestowed upon him the small kingdom of Chalcis (Josephus, Ant. xx, 5, 2; War, ii, 12, 1), and four years after it took away from him, giving instead the tetrarchies of Philip and Lydia to Antipas. He afterwards gave Antipas by the Romans, and they sailed to Rome in the hope of supplanting him in the emperor's favor. Agrippa was aware of their design, and anticipated it by a countercharge against Antipas of treasonous correspondence with the Parthians. Antipas failed to answer the accusation, and, after his exile, Agrippa received from Claudius the tetrarchy of Galilee and Perea (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 7, 2); and in A.D. 41, for having greatly assisted Claudius, he received his whole paternal kingdom (Judea and Samaria), and, in addition, the tetrarchy of Lycaonia (comp. Luke iii, 1). Josephus says in one passage that Claudius had a great attachment for Antipas (Josephus, Ant. xx, 10, 4); but afterwards, in two places, that Claudius gave it to him (Ant. xix, 5, I; War, ii, 11, 5). Claudius probably promised it, and Claudius actually conferred it. Agrippa now possessed the entire kingdom of Herod the Great. At this time he begot of Claudius the kingdom of Chalce for his brother Herod (Josephus, Ant. xix, 5, 1; War, ii, 11, 5). Agrippa loved to be at Jerusalem, and was a strict observer of the laws of his country, which will account for his persecuting the Christians, who were hated by the Jews (Josephus, Ant. xix, 7, 3). Thus influenced by a strong desire for popularity, rather than from innate cruelty, "he stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the church." He put to death James the elder, son of Zebedee, and cast Peter into prison, no doubt with the intention of killing him also. This was frustrated by his brother's intercession, and the Roman Senate's reply, which was not to send for Peter, but "your law." Agrippa, moreover, does not mention those of Tyre and Sidon as recorded in the Acts (xii, 20). Though Agrippa was "highly displeased," it does not appear that any rupture worthy of notice had taken place. On the second day Agrippa appeared in the theatre in a garment interwoven with silver. On closing his address to the people, they salute him as a god, for which he did not rebuke them, and he was immediately seized with violent internal pains, and died five days after (Josephus, Ant. xix, 8, 2). This full account of Josephus agrees substantially with that in the Acts. The silver dress (δέσμης ἱππορίου) is added by Josephus; ἱππορία (Acts); and the disease (πέσας ἁπάντως) is added by Josephus; ἁπάνη (Acts). The owl (δεινόντως ἴππων τίγρις), which on this occasion appeared to Agrippa as the messenger of ill omens (ὁρίζων κύριος, Josephus, Ant. xix, 6, 2), though on a former one it had appeared as the messenger of good news (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 7), is converted by Eusebius (H. E. ii, ch. 10), who professes to quote Josephus into the angel of the Acts (καὶ ἰδοὺ ἐκ τῆς ἀναγέννησις Κυρίων). For an explanation of the confusion, compare Eusebius, L. c., ed. Heimrich. He-rōdian (only in the plur. Ἱεροδιανοὶ), the designation of a class of Jews that existed in the time of Jesus Christ, evidently, as the name imports, partisans of Herod, but whether of a political or religious description it is not easy to say. It is not want of data, to determine. The passages of the New Testament which refer to them are the following: Mark iii, 6; xii, 13; Matt. xxii, 16; Luke xx. 20. From these it appears that the ecclesiastical authorities of Judea held a council against our Saviour, and, associating with themselves the Herodians, even an embassy to him with the express design of ensnaring him in his speech, that thus they might compass his destruction, by embroiling him. But what additional difficulty did the Herodians bring? Herod Antipas was now tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, which was the only inheritance he received from his father, Herod the Great. As tetrarch he was not only a king, but the ruler of Jesus, whose home was in that province. The Herodians, then, may have been subjects of Herod, Galileans, whose evidence the priests were desirous of procuring, because theirs would be the evidence of fellow-countrymen, and of special force with Antipas being the heir of his own immediate subject. (Luke xxiii, 7.) Herod's relations with Rome were in an unsafe condition. He was a weak prince, given to ease and luxury, and his wife's ambition conspired with his own desires to make him strive to obtain from the emperor Caligula the title of king. For this purpose he took a new wife, a lady from Gaul. The Herodians may have been favorers of his pretensions; if so, they would be partial hearers, and eager witnesses against Jesus before the Roman tribunal. It would be a great service to the Romans to be the means of enabling them to get rid of one, who aspired to be king of the Jews. It would equally gratify their own lord should the Herodians give effectual aid in putting a period to the mysterious yet formidable claims of a rival claimant of the crown. If the Herodians were a Galilean political party who were eager to procure the death of the honor archly professed for their Lord (Mark vi, 14, the name of king is merely as of courtesy), they were chosen as associates by the Sanhedrim with especial propriety. This idea is confirmed by Josephus's mention of a party as "the partisans of Herod" (οἱ τα Ἰεροδίανοι φασινόττες, Ant. xiv, 15, 10). The deposition was being made from themselves in "τὴν Ἰουδαίαν καὶ τὴν Ἰωάννην Αραμαίον, Ἧππος τοῖς ταῖς οὖσαιν ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ" (see Mark x, 9). That men whose sympathies were entirely Jewish, and, as such, anti-heathen: they were to intimate their dislike of paying tribute, as being an acknowledgment of a foreign yoke; and by flattering Jesus, as one who loved truth, feared no man, and would say what he thought, they would have him afford them a profession and practice. In order to carry those base and hypocritical designs into effect, the Herodians were appropriately associated with the Pharisees; for as the latter were the recognized conservators of Judaism, so the former were friends of the aggrandizement of a native as against a foreign prince. (Comp. Frischke and Walch, ad loc.)

Herōdias (Ἡρώδια, a female patronymic from Ἰοβαλίματις and Ἱοβαλίμως, see Matt., 1:82, 20; Gen. xlii, 10, 18), the name of a woman of notoriety in the N. T., daughter of Aristobulus, one of the sons of Mariamne and Herod the Great, and consequently sister of Agrippa I. She first married Herod, surnamed Phileus, another of the sons of Mariamne, named in the plen. Ant. xvii, 9, 9, 10, 11; comp. I. A. 4, 9, 4), and therefore her full name; then she eloped from him, during his lifetime (ibid.), to marry Herod Antipas, her step-uncle, who had long been married to, and was still living with, the daughter of Aeneas or Aretas—his assumed name—king of Arabia (Ant. xvii, 9, 4). Thus she left her husband, who was still alive, to connect herself with a man whose wife was still alive. Her paramour was, indeed, less of a blood relation than her original husband; but, being likewise the half-brother of that husband, he was already connected with her by affinity—so close that there was only one case contemplated in the law of Moses where it could be set aside, namely, when the father had married his brother's childless daughter (Lev. xviii, 16, and xxii, 21, and for the exception Deut. xxv, 5 sq.). Now Herodias had already had one child—Salome (the daughter whose dancing is mentioned in the Gospels)—by Philip (Ant. xviii, 5, 4), and, as he was still alive, might have had more. Well therefore may we be with Josephus to speak of confounding her country's institutions (Ant. xviii, 5, 4); and we well may John the Baptist have remonstrated against the enormity of such a connection with the tetrarch, whose conscience would certainly seem to have been a less hardened one (Matt. xiv, 9 says he was sorry; Mark x, 12 says he was angry) (Matthew xiii, 57, note). It was to the iniquity of this act, rather than to the immorality of that illicit connection, that, the historian says, some of the Jews attributed the defeat of Herod. In the closing scene of her career, indeed, Herodias exhibited considerable magnanimity, as she might be brought up to the tribunal and there sharing his exile and reverses, till death ended them, to the remaining with her brother Agrippa I, and partaking of his elevation (Ant. xvi, 7, 5). This town is probably Lugdunum Convarum, a town of Gaul, situated on the right bank of the Garonne, at the foot of the Pyrenees, under the name of "Aurum."" (Dr. Murray, Handbook of France, p. 314); Eusebius, H. E. 1, 11, says "Vienne, confounding Antipas with Archelaus." Burton on Matt. xiv, 3, Alford, and moderns in general, Lyons. In Josephus (War i, 9, 6), Antipas is said to have died in Spain—apparently, from the context, the land of his exiles, according to the advice of the above, would satisfy both passages. See Herod.

There are few episodes in the whole range of the New Testament more suggestive to the commentator than this one scene in the life of Herodias.

1. It exhibits one of the most remarkable of the undesigned coincidences between the N. T. and Josephus: that there are some discrepancies in the two accounts only enhances their value. More than this, it has led the historian into a brief digression upon the life, death, and character of the Baptist, which speaks volumes in favor of the genuineness of that still much celebrated passage in which he speaks of "Jesus," that "wise man, if man he may be called" (Ant. xviii, 3, 5; comp. xx, 9, 1, unhesitatingly quoted as genuine by Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 1, 11). See John the Baptist.

2. It has been warmly debated whether it was the adulterous woman, or the adulterous woman's nameless husband, who drew down the reproof of the Baptist. It has already been shown that, either way, the offence merited condemnation upon worse grounds than one.

3. The birthday feast is another undesigned coincidence between Scripture and profane history. The Jews celebrated the birthday of Herod (Ant. xiv, 1, 20; comp. ii, 4, 9) as the birthday of the Roman emperor (Bland on Matt. xiv, 6). On the other hand, it was usual with the Egyptians (Gen. xl, 20; comp. Josephus, HERODION 217

Aw. xii, 4, 9), with the Persians (Herod. i. 138), with the Greeks, even in the case of the dead, whence the Christian custom of keeping anniversaries of the martyr (Bähr ad Herod. iv. 26), and with the Romans (Per. Sitt. ii, 1-3). Now the Herods may be said to have gone beyond Rome in the observance of all that was Roman. Herod the Great kept the day of his accession; Antipas—as we read here—and Agrippa I, as Josephus tells us (Ant. xix, 7, 1), their birthday, with such magnificence that the “birthdays of Herod” (He- rodis dies) had passed into a proverb when Persius wrote (Sat. v, 180). See Birthday.

4. Yet dancing, on these festive occasions, was common to both Jew and Gentile, and was practised in the same way: youths and virgins, singly, or separated into two bands, but never intermingled, danced to honor their deity, their hero, or to the day of their solemnity. Miriam (Exod. xv, 20), the daughter of Jethro (Judg. xi, 34), and David (2 Sam. vi, 14) are familiar instances in Holy Writ: the “Carmen Seculare” of Horace, to quote no more, points to the same custom amongst Greeks and Romans. It is plainly owing to the elevation of the woman in the civil scale that dancing in pairs (still unknown to the East) has come into fashion. See DANCE.

5. The rash oath of Herod, like that of Jethro in the O.T., has afforded ample discussion to casuists. It is now ruled that all such oaths, where there is no reservation, are not improper, for peculiarly irritable, God or man, are illicit and without force. So Solomon had long since decided (1 Kings ii, 20-24; see Sanderson, De Juris, Oblig. Prelect. iii, 16). See Oath.

Herondheim (Herodius, a deriv. from Herod), a Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation as his kinsman (Rom. xvi, 11). A.D. 55. According to Hippolytus, he became bishop of Tarsus, but according to others, of Patra.

Herodion (Herodow), the name of a fortress (Josephus) or town (Pliny), built on a conspicuous spot by Herod the Great (Reland, Palest. p. 820), probably the site ancienly occupied by Bet-Tachcerem (Jer. vi, 1; Neh. iii, 14), which the authority of Jerome has led some modern travellers to identify with the well-known eminence called by the natives Jebel el-Fara'id, and by Europeans the “Frank Mountain.” If this identity be correct, the site has been the scene of many a remarkable change. Two great kings, in different ages and different ways, probably adorned it with magnificent works. From their lofty city the old inhabitants must have seen stretched before them, up the green vale of Urah, the beautiful gardens and fountains of king Solomon, which suggested to the royal poet some of the exquisite imagery of the Canticles; and nearly a thousand years later, Herod the Great erected, probably on this very hill of Beth-tachcerem, a “fortress with its round towers, and in it royal apartments of great strength and splendor” (Josephus, Ant. xv, 9, 4), making it serve as an acropolis amidst a mass of other buildings and palaces at the foot of the hill (War, i, xxii, 20). To this city, called after him Herodion, the Idumean tyrant was brought for burial from Jericho, where he died (Ant. xvii, 8, 3). The locality still yields its evidence of both these eras. Solomon’s reservoirs yet remain (Stanley, p. 165), and the present state of “the Frank Mountain” will agrees with the ancient description of Herodion (Robinson, Researches, ii, 173; Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 427).

Herold, Johann, a German divine, was born at Hochstädt, Swabia, in 1511. His early history is not known. In 1539 he made his appearance in Basle as a defender of Protestantism. He was pastor of a parish near Basle for some years, but in 1546 retired from it and returned to Basle to devote his time entirely to literary labors. The date of his death is unknown; it was probably about 1570. Among his numerous writings are the following: Heikensweilt und ihrer Göter anfänglicher Ursprung (Basel, 1544, fol.; also under the title, in a 2 ed., Theatrum Divorum Deorum Panis (Basel, 1628, fol.): — Orthodogogul Thologiæ Doctores LXVI, laminae clarissima (Basel, 1555, fol.); — Hæresiologia, see Syntagma veterum theologicorum per quos grasse in Ecclesias hereses confutatur, etc. (Basel, 1556, fol.).

Heron (Ἡρών, anaph), Lev. xi, 19; Deut. xiv, 18), an unclean bird, for which the kite, woodcock, curlew, peacock, parrot, crane, lapwing, and several others have been suggested. But most of these are not found in Palestine, and others have been identified with different Hebrew words. The root ἀναφ, anaph, signifies to breathe, to snort, especially from anger, and thence, figuratively, to be angry (Genesius, Thea. Heb. p. 127). Parkhurst observes that “as the heron is remarkable for its angry disposition, especially when hurt or wounded, this bird seems to be most probably intended.” But this equally applies to a great number of different species of birds, and would be especially appropriate to the goose, which hisses at the slightest provocation. The heron, though not constantly hissing, can utter a similar sound of displeasure with much meaning, and the common species, Ardea cinerea, is found in Egypt, and is also abundant in the Hauran of Palestine, where it frequents the margins of lakes and pools, and the reedy watercourses in the deep ravines, striking and devouring an immense quantity of fish. The herons are wading-birds, empty, and very remarkable for their vanity; frequenting marshes and oozy rivers, and spread over the regions of the East. Most of the species enumerated in English ornithology have been recognized in the vicinity of Palestine, and we may include all these under the term in question—"the anaph of his kind." One of the commonest species in Asia is Ardea russata.

Little Golden Egret (Ardea ruseata), which is beautifully adorned with plumage partly white and partly of a rich orange-yellow, while the beak, legs, and all the naked parts of the skin are yellow. Its height is about seventeen inches. This is the cobeg or cow-heron so abundant in India. Several kinds of heron, one of which, from its form, would serve well enough to represent this little golden egret, are commonly depicted on those Egyptian paintings in which the subject—a favorite one—is the fowling and fishing among the paper-reeds of the Nile.

Bochart supposes that heron may mean the mountain falcon, called doraeta by Homer (Od. i. 820), because of the similarity of the Greek word to the Hebrew. But if it meant any kind of eagle or hawk, it would probably have been reckoned with one or other of those species mentioned in the preceding verses. Perhaps, under all the circumstances, the traditional meaning is most likely to be correct, which we will therefore trace. The Talmudists evidently were at a loss, for they describe it indefinitely as a "high-flying bird of prey" (Chalim, 83 a).

The Septuagint renders the Hebrew word by γαργάλα, however, has been thought to lose what little weight it might otherwise have had from the probability that it originated in a false reading, viz. ἡγαρά, which the translators connected with ἡγαρά, "a bank." Jerome adhered to the same word in a Latin form, carbarynam and carbarum. The Greek and Roman writers, from the earliest authors who refer to a bird which they call charadrius. It is particularly described by Aristotle (Hist. An. vii, 7), and by Ælian (Hist. An. xxv, 26). The latter derives its name from ἕλκανα, a hollow or chasm, especially one which contains water, because, he says, the bird frequents such places. The Roman name the charadrius was also called iterus, which signifies the jaundice, from a notion that patients affected with that disease were cured by looking at this bird, which was of a yellow color (Flinty, xxxiv; Cæl. Aurel. iii, 5), and by the Greeks. Ælian's description and the addition to the same fabulous notion, ῥεγαγος (Aristotle, Hist. An. ix, 13, 15, and 22; Ælian, Hist. An. iv, 47). These writers concur in describing a bird, sometimes of a yellow color, remarkable for its voracity (from which circumstance arose the phrase ἔφαγαυς ἄλογον, applied to a glutton), migratory, lintearious, and favors watery, marshy places, and especially mountain torrent and valleys. Now it is certain that the name charadrius has been applied by ornithologists to the same species of birds from ancient times down to the present age. Linnaeus, under Order IV (consisting of waders or shore birds), places the genus Charadrius, in which he includes all the numerous species of plovers. The ancient accounts may be advantageously compared with the following description of the genus from Mr. Selby's British Ornithology, ii, 230: "The members of this genus are numerous, and possess a wide geographical distribution; several species being found in every quarter of the globe. The habits of the greater part of the year are the inhabitants of open districts and wide wastes, frequenting both dry and moist situations, and only retire toward the coasts during the severity of winter. Others are markedly migratory, and others inhabit the banks and about the mouths of rivers (particularly where the shore consists of small gravel or shingle). They live on worms, insects, and their larvae. The flesh of many that live on the coasts is unpalatable." The same writer describes one species, Charadrius pintllivus, called the golden plover from its color, and mentions the well-known fact that this species, in the course of moulting, turns completely black. Analogous facts respecting the charadrius have been established by observations in every part of the globe, viz. that they are gregarious and migratory. The habits of the majority are littoral. They obtain their food along the banks of rivers and the shores of lakes; "like the gulls, they beat the moist soil with their pattering feet, to terrify the incubant worms, yet are often found in deserts, in green and seedy meadows, or on upland moors." Their food consists chiefly of mice, worms, caterpillars, insects, toads, and frogs, which of course places them among the class of birds cerem}

HERRON, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1052 at Walden, Norfolk, of which his father was rector. He studied at Jesus and Bemnet colleges, Cambridge, and was made fellow of Corpus Christi in 1716. After having possessed various living, he was raised in 1737 to the see of Bangor, whence in 1743 he was translated to York. After the defeat of the king's troops at Preston Pans in 1745, the archbishop exerted himself in his diocese with so much ardent zeal that he repelled the disaffected, inspired the responding, and procured at a county meeting a subscription of £40,000 towards the defense of the country. His zeal for the Hanoverian cause procured him the facetious title of the "reigning heretic." In 1747 he was removed from the see of Canterbury, and he died at Croydon in 1756. Herring was a man of great celebrity as a preacher. His Sermons on Public Occasions were published in 1763 (Long, 8vo), with a memoir of Herring by Duncombe; followed by his Letters to W. Duncombe (1727, 12mo). See Biographical Dictionary; Rich, Cyclopaedia of Biog.

HERRNUTH, a town of Saxony, in Upper Lusatia, in the circle of Dresden, at the foot of Hinterberg Mountain, and about fifty miles from the city of Dresden. It was built by Zinzendorf in 1722 for the Moravian Brethren, who, from this town, are often called Herrnhutters. See MORAVIANS.

HERRON, FRANCIS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Shippensburg, Pa., June 28, 1774. His parents were Scotch-Irish. Their high regard for knowledge induced them to send him to Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., then under the care of that distinguished Presbyterian, the Rev. Dr. Nesbitt. Here he graduated May 5, 1794. He studied theology with Robert Cooper, D.D., and was licensed by Carlisle Presbytery in 1797. He commenced his ministry in the backwoods of Ohio. In 1800 he became pastor of the Rocky Spring Church, where he labored for ten years with great success. In June, 1811, he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Penn. He found his new church embarrased with debt, and the people "conformed to this world" to a degree almost appalling. But his earnestness and activity relieved the church of debt within a few years, and awoke the members to a sense of their spiritual danger. In 1825 the General Assembly resolved to establish a theological seminary in the West. Dr. Herron, with his naturally quick perception, urged Alleghany City, Pa., as the best location, and by great exertions obtained the decision to locate it there. He then undertook the toils and anxieties of its sustenance; and to no one does the Western Theological Seminary owe its success in a greater degree than to Herron. In 1827 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly held in Philadelphia. In 1829 and 1832 his ministrations were blessed by gracious revivals of religion; and in 1835 another revival occurred, marked by great excitement. In 1850 he resigned his charge, to the great regret of his people. Being then in his eighty-sixth year, he removed to his farm, where his work was ended. He lived ten years longer; though the infirmities of age grew upon him, his cheerfulness never failed. He died Dec. 6, 1860. Such was two he became curate of Weston Fawel, and a few years after curate of Biddeford. During that time he wrote his celebrated Meditations and Contemplations (1746, 8vo), which obtained immense circulation. It was followed by City Sermons on great Occasions, and A Winter Piece (1747, 8vo). In 1750, on the death of his father, he succeeded to the livings of Weston and Collingtree; and he devoted himself earnestly to his clerical duties. In 1758 he published Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke’s Letters on the Study and Use of History, so far as they relate to the History of the Old Testament, etc. in a Letter to a Lady of Quality (1758, 8vo). In 1755 he published Theron and Aspasia, or a Series of Dialogues and Letters on the most important Subjects (1758, 3 vols. 8vo), which was attacked by Robert Sandeman, of Edinburgh, on the nature of justifying faith, and other articles connected with it, a work entitled Letters on Theron and Aspasia. See SANDEMAN. John Wesley wrote a brief review of his Theron and Aspasia, and Hervey wrote in reply Eleven Letters to John Wesley, but before his death he directed that the MS. of this work should be destroyed. His brother, however, judiciously judged that it would be a desirable pecuniary speculation to publish it, and placed it in the hands of Cudworth, an erratic dissenting preacher, to be finished, giving him liberty ‘to put out and put in’ whatever he judged expedient. Cudworth’s Antinomian sentiments led him to abuse Hervey’s opinions; but Hervey’s interpolations were relentlessly by his interpolations of Hervey’s pages, and sent forth in Hervey’s name the first and most reckless and odious caveat against Methodism that ever emanated from any one who had sustained friendly relations to it. It was republished in Scotland, and tended much to forestall the spread of Methodism there. Hervey felt keenly the injustice and heartlessness of this attack, but his sorrow was mitigated by the knowledge that the most of the abuse in the publication was interpolated, and that Hervey, who had delighted to call him his ‘friend and father,’ knew him too well to be thus struck at him for his connection with it. He revised the book; but time has answered it more effectually—time, the invincible guardian of the characters of great men.”

He died Dec. 28, 1758. Mr. Hervey’s writings are viciously turgid and extravagant in style. He was eminently pious, though not deeply learned; his composition was dryly intellectual; his correspondence was published separately (1760, 2 vols. 8vo). See Ryland, Life of Hervey; Letters of Hervey, and Life prefixed; Chalmers, General Biog. HESER. GEORGE, a German ecclesiastical writer, was born at Weyern, near Passau, Austria, in 1609. He joined the Jesuits in 1625, and taught rhetoric, dialectics, and controversy at Munich and Ingolstadt. In 1642 he became preacher at St. Maurice’s Church, Augsburg, and in 1645, 26, Kohler Weg, the same capacity having ceased at the Church of Munich, Ingolstadt. In 1662 he retired to Munich, where he was still living in 1675. The exact time of his death is not ascertained. He is especially noted for his efforts in proving Thomas a Kempis (q. v.) the author of De institutione Christianae. His letters have gathered a number of testimonies, and describes pretty accurately a number of editions and of translations of Kempis, which appeared during the 16th

Heshbon (Hebrew Chebon), ז"עבון, intelligence, as in Eccles. vii, 25, etc.; Sept. Ξαβοί (Josephus), a town in the southern district of the Hebrew territory beysion the Jordan, on the western border of the high plain (Mishnp, Josh. xiii, 17). It originally belonged to the Moabites, but when the Israelites arrived from Egypt it was found to be in the possession of the Amorites, whose king, Sihon, is styled both king of the Amo-rates and king of Heshbon, and is expressly said to have "reigned in Heshbon" (Josh. iii, 10; comp. Numb. xxi, 26; Deut. ii, 9). It was taken by Moses (Numb. xxi, 23-26), and eventually became a Levitical city (Josh. xxii, 31, 32). It was also the residence of the tribe of Reuben (Numb. xxiii, 37; Josh. xiii, 17): but, being on the confines of Gad, is sometimes assigned to the latter tribe (Josh. xxi, 39; 1 Chron. vi, 81). After the Ten Tribes were sent into exile, Heshbon was taken possession of by the Moabites, and hence is mentioned by the prophets in their prophecies against Moab (Isa. xiv, 5; Jer. xiv, 2, 34, 45). Under King Alexander Jannaeus we find it again reckoned as a Jewish city (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 4). Pliny mentions a tribe of Arabs called Esbonites the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Esabo) it was still a place of some consequence under the name of Ebasus (Ebasoq), but at the present day it is known by its ancient name, in the slightly modified form of Hasbon. The region was first visited in modern times by Seetzen. The site is twenty miles east of the Jordan, on the parallel of the northern end of the Dead Sea. The ruins of a considerable town still exist, covering the sides of an insulated hill, but not a single edifi-cle is left entire. The view from the summit is very extensive, embracing the ruins of a vast number of cities, the names of some of which bear a strong resem-lance to those mentioned in Scripture. These envirous, occupying the elevated plain, are the remains of the cities of Jazer and the Jabbock, seem to be referred to in Josh. xiii, 16. There are reservoirs connected with this and the other towns of this region. These have been supposed to be the "fish-pools" (ץ"עבון, צ"עבון, cisterns) of Heshbon mentioned by Solomon (Cant. vii, 4) [see Batte-lehrer]; but, says Irby and Mangles, "The ruins are uninteresting, and the only pool we saw was too insignificant to be one of those mentioned in Scripture" (p. 472). In two of the cisterns among the ruins they found about three dozen of human skulls and bones, which they justly regarded as an illustration of Gen. xxxvii, 20 (Travels, p. 472; see also George Robinson, lord Lindia, Schwarc, Tristan, etc.) Macmichael and his party went to look for these pools, but they found only one, which was extremely insignificant. This is probably the reservoir mentioned by Burckhardt (Syria, p. 305). Mr. Buckingham, however, says, "The large reservoir to the south of the town, and about half a mile from the foot of the hill on which it stands, is constructed with good masonry, and not unlike the cisterns of Solomon, near Jerusalem, to which it is also nearly equal in size." Towards the western part of the hill is a singular structure, whose crumbling ruins consist of a mass of small, more or less, of workmanship of later ages—the massive stones of the Jewish period, the sculptured corncue of the Roman era, and the light Saracen arch, all gathered together (Porter, Handb. for Palest., p. 298).

Heshmon (Heb. Chebennon), כְּבֶנֶן, fitness; Sept.
Ἄξυρίων, a city on the southern border of Judah (Sim-non), near Idumaa, mentioned between Hazor-Gaddah and Beth-Palet (Josh. xv, 27); hence probably whereby between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean.
It is presumably the same as the Azaon (v. v.) elsewhere (Josh. xv, 4) located in this vicinity. See HAZAN-AD-DAR.

Hess, Johann, one of the German Reformers, was born in Nuremberg about 1490, studied at Leipzig from 1506 to 1510, and at Wittenberg from 1510 to 1512. In 1518 he became secretary to the bishop of Breslaus.
After travelling and studying in Italy, he returned in 1529 to Wittenberg, and there became connected with Luther and Melanchthon. Returning to Breslaus with reformatory views, he found no opposition from his bishop, who was imbued with the new humanistic learning, and was a friend of Erasmus. But the bishop (Turzo) died in 1520, and his successor (Jacob of Salza) was a strenuous Romerist. He left Breslaus for a time, but the seed had taken root, and the magistrates recalled Hess as pastor in 1528. Thenceforward he was the soul of the Reformation in Breslaus. In 1529 he married, and continued his labours in reforming the Church and the schools, and in providing for the comfort of the reforming poor. He died in 1547.—Herzog, Beth-Engkelgesch. (1864).

Hess, Johann Jakob, an eminent Swiss divine, was born at Zurich Oct. 21, 1741, where he studied theody with his uncle, the pastor of Nefenthal, to whom he became assistant in 1760. In 1777 he was called to the church of Notre Dame in Zurich; and in 1786 (contrary to his own wishes) he was chosen, in preference to Lavater, to be the successor of the well-known and popular pastor of the St. Peter's church in Zurich. He died May 29, 1828. His long life was faithfully dedicated to his work as a pastor, and to literary la-or. Hess was to Switzerland what Reinhard was to the Saxony Church, and Storr to that of Wurttemberg.

His clear and mild, yet fixed and safe convictions, as expressed in his more sacred writings on Biblical and theological subjects, and especially on the life of our Lord, found a hearty reception in many a pious domestic circle in Germany, and in the soul of many a young theologian" (Hagenbach, Hist. of the Church in 18th and 19th Centuries, transl. by Hurst, ii, 403). In 1767 he published a Geschichte der drei letten Lemnischehe Jesus (Zurich, 6 vols.). This work was adapted to the use of Roman Catholics by J. A. von Krapf (Münster, 1872, 2 vols.). Hess cont'd to study the subject, and wrote Jugendgeschichte Jesu (Zurich, 1773), and finally his Leben Jesu (1828, 3 vols.). His other works are: Geschichte der Reiche Gotteti (Zurich, 1774, 2 vols.; 5th ed. 1826);—Gesch. u. Schildr. der Apostel Jesu (Zurich, 1775, 3 vols.; 4th ed. 1820-1822); this work was also adapted to the use of Roman Catholics (Münster, 1794, 2 vols.; 3d ed. Salzburg, 1801;)—Geschichte
d. Israelitern vor d. Zeiten Jesu (Zurich, 1776-1788, 12 fol.;—Gesch. Juda. (Zurich, 1779, 2 vols.);—Predigten d.

Hesse, a country in central Germany. The name is for the first time mentioned in a letter of St. Boniface to the pope (766), and the pupils of Boniface introduced Christianity into the country. At the beginning of Charlemaigne it belonged to the dominions of the counts of Franconia; in the 10th century, a number of Hessian nobles established their independence: in the following, all of them recognised the sovereignty of Ludwig I of Thuringia; Ludwig the Debonair was the daughter of one of the Hessian princes. This line became extinct in 1497, and long civil war ensued; the result was the confirmation of the rule of Heinrich of Braabant, the son-in-law of the last ruler of the extinct line. His son Heinrich ("the Child of Brabant") became the ancestor of all the branch- ings of the House of Hessen. His descendants, sometimes divided among several princes, were again reunited at the beginning of the 16th century under Wilhelm II, the father of Philip I the Magnanimous, who played so prominent a part in the history of the Reformation of the 16th century. Philip divided his dominions among his sons, among them the hereditary Maurice, the leaving only the two chief lines of the Hessian duchies, Hesse-Cassel and Hesse-Darmstadt.

The landgraves of Hesse-Cassel in 1803 received the title of elector; but in 1806, in consequence of the German war, in which the elector had taken sides against Prussia, the country was conquered by the Prussians, and annexed to Prussia. The landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt in 1806 received the title of grand-duke. From both main lines others branched off from time to time, but at the establishment of the German Confederation in 1815, only one, the landgrave of Hesse-Homburg, a branch of Hesse-Darmstadt, became a member of the Confederation. It became extinct in March, 1866, fell to Hesse-Darmstadt, but in September, 1866, was ceded by Hesse-Darmstadt to Prus- sia. Thus, in 1870, the only Hessian line retaining sover- eignty was the grand-duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, which was divided into the two principal branches, the North-German Confederation, not for the whole territory, however, but only for one of the three provinces. The zeal of Philip the Magnanimous for the success of the Reformation made the Hessian territory one of the strongholds of German Protestantism. But the vac- illed influence of the preceding princes betrays a certain lethargy, and the Reformed Creeds caused considerable trouble, especially in Hesse-Cassel, the State Church of which was often left in the dark as to whether it was Lutheran or Reformed. Theological controversies on this sub- ject have been continued up to the present day. In the grand-duchy in that year 643,881 Evangelical Christians (67.3 per cent. of the total population), 278,440 Roman Catho- lics (29.1 per cent.), 26,114 Israelites (2.7 per cent.). In the class of "other Christians" were included, in Roman Catholics, 626 Membrances, 11 Baptists, 31 Free Religious, 24 Separatists, 22 Greek Catho- lic, 20 United Brethren in Christ, 6 Darbyites, 4 Piestas, 2 Orthodox Catholics.

The Evangelical Church comprises the members of the United Evangelical Church as well as the non-united Lutherans and Reformed. The Church con- stitution, introduced at the time of the Reformation, with two consistories and four superintendents, was changed in 1803. The office of superintendents was abolished; the two consistories were supplanted by Church and School councils which had no consistorial ju- risdiction. The new consuls were subordinate to the state ministers of the Interior and of Justice, who, in the exercise of their functions, were aided by inspectors. As in other parts of Germany, the Church lost the last rem-nant of self-government, and became wholly subject to the state. A reorganization of the constitution took place by a decree of June 6, 1852. The superintendents of the National Evangelical Church was transferred to a Supreme Consistory (Oberconsistorium) at Darmstadt, which consists of a president (a layman), three ministerial counsellors, two lay counsellors, and of one or several assessors. Only in rare cases the Supreme Consistory has to report to the state ministry for a final decision. Each of the three provinces of the grand-duchy has a superintendent. The superintendents are the organs through whom the Supreme Consistory exer- cises its functions. Subordinate to the superintendents are the deans, thirty in number, who are appointed by the Supreme Consistory for the term of five years. Every congregation has a local church council to assist in the management of the church. The consistory discloses the state of the local church property. This Church council has two official members, the pastor and the burgomaster (or his representative), and from three to five extraor- dinary members, who are chosen by the former in union with the council of the civil community. Every par- ish is to receive official membership in the consistory. A pre- vious ordination to the presbyterate does not prevent a clergyman from being ordained to the order of deacon, or from being appointed to a new parish within three years. The highest dignitary of the Church is the "prelate" (prülat), who is also, by virtue of his office, a member of the First Chamber. A theological faculty is connected with the University of Marburg besides the church diocesan theo- logical seminary at Friedberg. The theological faculty of Giessen has been and still is (Jan. 1870) under the control of the Rationalistic party; among its best known professors were Credner (q. v.) and Knobel (q. v.). As may therefore be expected, a considerable portion of the clergy belong likewise to the Rationalistic party; of late, however, the reaction in favor of evangelical prin- ciples has gained ground.

The Roman Catholics belong to the ancient diocese of Mentz (q. v.), which is now a suffragan see to the archbishopric of Freiburg. The diocese, which besides the Grand-duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt comprises the former principality of Nassau and the former landgraviate of Hesse-Homburg, had (1865) 158 parishes in 17 deaneries. A faculty of Roman Catholic theo- logy was formerly connected with the University of Giessen; but in 1848 the bishop of Mentz forbade all students of theology to attend the theological lectures of the (prominently Protestant) University, and es- tablished a new theological seminary at Mentz. The theological faculty, deserted by all the students, had soon to be suppressed. Of monastic institutions, there were in 1865 houses of the Jesuits, Capuchins, Brothers of the Christian Schools, Englishe Friaulein, Sisters of Charity, and other female congregations, with 244 members. At the beginning of the century, the most liberal senti- ments prevailed among the majority of the clergy, in- cluding even the canons of the cathedral church, and the professor of theological faculty of the University; but since the appointment of the ultramontane bishop of Ketteler (1850), these liberal sentiments have been to a very large extent weeded out or repressed. Hesse von Hessentstein, Johann, born at Nu- remberg Sept. 21, 1497, studied theology at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and was a priest during the Reformation. On his return to Germany his relations became intimate with Luther, to whose influence is attributed the deep Christian experience which characterize the pro- ductions of his pen. Hesse is considered one of the first German sacred poets, and many of his hymns are sung in the German churches of the day.—Wolff, Encyklop. d. deutsch. Nationalitt. iv. 85. (J. H. W.)

Hesshusen (Hesshuiusius), Tilmann, a Lutheran theologian, was born November 8, 1527, at Wesel, in Cleves. In his youth he travelled over France, England, Denmark, and Germany; after which he went to Wit- tenberg, where, in 1550, he became master of arts, and soon made his mark as a preacher. In 1552, when but twenty-five years of age, he was elected rector of the univer- sal, and in 1553 was M.A. But his peculiarities of mind and temper prevented his remaining long in any post. Always in conflict with the authorities, his friend Melancthon in vain procured him several advan- tageous situations, securing him, when but thirty years old, the nomination as professor of theology at Witten- berg, superintendent of the Palatinate, and president of the Church Council, which he lost again two years after, in 1559, after a bitter controversy with Kleibitz (q. v.) on the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. He fought the same battle again with A. Hardenberg at Bremen. See CRYPTO-CALVINISM. Having finally sought a refuge in his native city of Wesel, he was driven from it in 1564 for writing his Unterschied zwischen dem wahren katholischen Lehre d. Kirche u. d. Irrthümern d. Papisten u. d. römischen Antichristen, which highly displeased the government. After various fortunes, he was in 1578 ap­pointed to the see of Mainz; but, having awakened great opposition, his doctrines were condemned by a synod in 1577, and he himself was afterwards driven out of the country. Shortly after he entered on his last situation as the leading professor of theology of the University of Helmstedt, where he died, Sept. 25, 1586. During his life he was as a controversialist. He was a strong advocate of extreme Lutheranism, against the Melanchthonian Synergists. See SYNERGISMS CONTROVERSY. After the promulgation of the Formula of Concord (q.v.), he opposed it (having subscribed it in 1578) on the ground that certain changes had been made in it before publication. Under his influence, the University of Helmstedt withdrew its sanction from the Formula. Among his writings, the most important are his Commentarius de. Psalms. De justificatione peccatorum coram Deo (1587) — Examinatio Theologica (Helmstedt, 1586). See Jno. Ge. Lenzfeld, Hst. Helmsdtticum (Quedlinburg, 1782, 2 vols. of 8°, vol. i. p. 444). Gries, d. Prot. HESYCHAITES (Greek ἡσυχασταί, ἡσυχαστί), to be quiet, a party of Eastern monks of the 14th century, on Mount Athos. They taught a refined and exagerrated mysticism. Their mysticism (q.v.), seeking only the quiet and the extinction of all the lower passions by contemplation. They believed that all who arrive at the blessedness of seeing God may also arrive at a tranquillity of mind entirely free from perturbation, and that all enjoying such a state may have visual perception of divine light, such as the apostles saw when they beheld His glory shining forth in the transfiguration. The monk Barlaam (q.v.), who afterwards became bishop of Gerace, during a visit to the East, learned the doctrines and usages of these quietist monks, and attacked them violently. They were bitterly defended by Palamas, afterwards bishop of Thessalonica. The charges brought against them were not merely that they professed to seek and obtain a divine and supernatural light not promised in Scripture, but also that the means they used were fanatical and absurd. These means included contemplation, introversion, and ascetic practices; and it was said that those who were accustomed to sit themselves in some secret corner, and fix their eyes steadfastly upon the meadow, whence they were called ἐμβαλόντες. As the fruit of such contemplation, a divine light, they said, such as that which shone on Tabor, was diffused through their souls, and Palamas defended this theory by making a distinction between the essence of God and his activity (ἰσινητία), asserting that the latter, though eternal and uncreated, is yet communicable. To the charge that they thus claimed directly to see God, inasmuch as this uncreated light must be either of the substance or of the attributes of God, they replied that the divine light radiated from God by ἐσινητία, but was not God. The whole matter was brought before a council at Constantinople in 1541, and the decision tendering favorably to the Hesychasts, Barlaam retreated to Italy. But his cause was taken up by another monk, George Monophysites, who attacked the doctrine of Palamas and the usages of the Hesychasts. He also lost his case before a synod at Constantinople. After the death of the emperor Andronicus, however, who had favored Palamas and the Hesychasts, things took a different turn for a while in favor of the Barlaamites; but after the triumph of the emperor John Cantacuzenus, who favored the other side, a synod at Constantinople, in 1351, approved the doctrine of the Hesychasts, especially the distinction between ὁσιά and ἑσυχία, and excommunicated Acydnus and Barlaam. The sources of information on these proceedings are the Historia of John Cantacuzenus (ii, 34, etc.), which is on the side of the Hesychasts; and the Historia Byzantina of Nicophorus Gregorakes, which takes the other side. Hesychius, an Egyptian bishop of the 3d century, who was mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. viii. 13) as a reviser of the text of the Septuagint (see also Jerome, De vir. illust. 77). He also published an edition of the New Testament, which Jerome does not appear to have formed a favorable opinion of, and he claimed the crown of martyrdom in the Diocesan persecution about A.D. 311. Nothing of his works is now extant. See Clarke, Succ. of Suc. Literature, s. v.; Lardner, Works, iii. 306; Hody, De Bibl. testim. originalibus (Oxf. 1705).

Hesychius, the grammarian of Alexsandria, is of uncertain date, but probably lived about the end of the 4th century. He compiled a Greek Lexicon, which appears to have been the model for all subsequent dictionaries. The best edition is that of Alberti and Ruhnken (Leyden, 1746-66, 2 vols.), with additions by Schow (Leipsic, 1792, 8vo); newly edited by Schmidt (Jena, 1857-64, 4 vols. 4to). See Ranke, De Lezici Hesychii historia originis et genuinae forma Commentatio (Leipzig and Quedlinburg, 1830, 8vo).

Hesychius of Jerusalem, a Greek ecclesiastical writer of the 6th century (supposed to have died about A.D. 434). Consecrated priest by the patriarch of Constantinople against his wishes, he spent the remainder of his life in that city. This is about all that is known with any certainty concerning his life. He appears to have enjoyed great reputation, and wrote a number of books, the principal of which are: 1. Hesychius, Liber septem (Latin only, Basle, 1527, fol. Paris, 1581, 8vo); and in Bibliotheca Patrum, xii. 52. Στηριγμον (or Κρι­λαίαν) τῶν ἐν προφήταις καὶ Χειρών, Soterion (or Κα­πτος) in duodecim prophetarum minores et Exarser, publish- ed by David Hoeschel with Adrian's Isagoge (Augsburg, 1602, 4to), and inserted in the Curiosissimae Sacrae Libri septem (Latin only, Basle, 1527, fol. Paris, 1581, 8vo); and in Bibliotheca Patrum, xii. 52. — Αγγελουργια or Θεοφιλ. published by Marcvs Eratmia's Opera (Paris, 1683, 8vo), and reprinted in the Bibliotheca veterum Patrum of Fronton Ducatus (Paris, 1624, fol.). A Latin translation of this work was inserted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, xii. 194, under the title Ad Theodulm Sermones octo; compendii anima perutilis de Temperantia et Virtute, etc. — Homilia de Sancta Maria desparva, published by F. d. Duc in Biblioth. veterum Patrum, ii. 417; — Τό τι τῆς ἐνενόμον Ἀναγλυφία τιμημίων, Oratio demonstrationis in S. Andre­ am Apostolam: a Latin translation of this work was in- serted in the Biblioth. Heath (Heb. Cēth, "deed;" Sept. ἔργος, and so Josephus, &c.), 6, 8), a son (descendant) of Canaan, and the ancestor of the hittites (Gen. v, 20; Deut. vii, 1; Josh. i, 4, who dwelt in the vicinity of Hebron (Gen. xxiii, 7, 17, 10). The "kings of the Hittites" is spoken of all the Canaanitish kings (2 Kings vii, 6). In the genealogical tables of Gen. x and 1 Chron. i, Heath is named as a son of Canaan, youngest of the firstborn, but preceding the Jebusite, the Amorite, and the other Canaanitish families. The Hittites were therefore a Hamitic race, neither of the "country" nor the "sired of" Abraham and Isaac (Gen. xxiii, 3, 4; xxvii, 1, 3). In the most historic memory of the nation, the beautiful narrative of Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah—they are styled, not Hittites, but Bene-Chehet (A. V. "sons and children of Heath," Gen. xxiii, 5, 7, 10, 16, 18, 20; xxxv, 10; xlix, 32). Once we hear of the "daughters of Heath" (xxvii, 46), the "daughters of the land," at that early period still called, after their less immediate progenitor, "daughters of Canaan" (xxvii, 1, 8, compared with xxxvii, 46, and xxvi, 34, 35; see also 1 Kings xi, 1; Ezek. xvi, 3). In the Egyptian monuments the name Chat is said to stand for Palestine (Busen, Ägypten, quoted by Ewald, Gesch. i, 317, note). See HITTITES.

Hetherington, William M., a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, was born June 4, 1803, near Dumfries. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, where he distinguished himself in Greek and in moral philosophy. His first service in the ministry was at Hamilton, where he was assistant to Dr. Meek, whose sermons he copied. In 1836 he became minister of Torphichen, and in 1844 at St. Andrew's. At the "disruption" he went out with the Free Church. In 1848 he was appointed to Free St. Paul's Church, Edinburgh, and in 1857 he was called to the chair of Apologetics in theology in the Free-Church College, Glasgow, where his labors as lecturer were excessive. In 1862 he was struck by paralysis, and on the 254 of May, 1865, he died. His writings, besides the editorship of the Free-Church Magazine (1844-48), and numerous contributions to the Presbyterian Review and the North British Review, include the following: Dramatic Sketches (poems, 1829-30);—The Fulness of Time (1834), characterized by Southey as a very original and able treatise;—Roman History (in Encyclop. Brit.; separately printed, 1852, 12mo);—The Minister's Family (1851, 8vo);—History of the Church of Scotland (1841, 8vo; last edit. 1855, 2 vols. 8vo);—History of the Westminster Assembly (1843, 12mo);—posthumous, The Apologetics of the Christian Faith; being a course of University lectures, with Introduction including a brief biographical sketch of the author by Dr. Alexander Duff (Edinburgh, 1867, 8vo).

Hethlon (Heb. Cēthlōn, "τόπος"; wrapped up, i. e. a hiding-place; Eng. Hethlon), a place the approach (τόπος, "way") to which lay on the northern border of Palestine, between the Mediterranean and the Arabian marina, the direction of Hethlon (Ezek. xlv, 15; lviii, 1). In all probability the "way of Hethlon" is the path at the (N. or S.) end of Lebanon, from the sea-coast of the Mediterranean to the great plain of Hamath, and is thus identical with "the entrance of Hamath" (q.v.) in Numb. xxxiv, § , etc. See Porter, Five Years in Damascus, ii, 356.

Hetzel or Heszel, Johann Wilhelm Friedrich, a German Orientalist and theologian, was born at Künigsberg May 16, 1754. He studied at the universities of Wittenberg and Jena, and was appointed professor of Oriental languages in Göttingen. In 1766, in 1768 he was made librarian of the University of that city, and in 1801 was called to the professorship of Oriental literature in the University of Dorpat, which office he held until 1820. He died Feb. 1, 1829. Hetzel wrote a number of works on the study of Oriental languages, the principal of which are Ausführliche Beiträge zur Sprachenkunde (Halle, 1777, 8vo);—Nominumsformenlehre d. hebr. Sprachen (Halle, 1778, 8vo);—Institutio Philologi Hebræi (Halle, 1783, 8vo);—Gesch. d. hebr. Literatur (Halle, 1776);—Syrische Sprachlehre (Leem, 1786, 8vo)—A raubische Grammatik des arabischen Christentum (Jena, 1776, 8vo). Among his theological works, the most important are Die Bibel, Alte u. Neues Testament mit vollständig erklärenden Bemerkungen (Leem, 1780-1791, 10 vols.);—Neuer Versuch d. Briefs auf den Hebräer (Lpz., 1786, 8vo);—Bibliae Hebræorum Lxix. Hetzér, Ludwig, was born in the canton Thurgau, Switzerland (date unknown). When the Reformation broke out in Switzerland he was in the vigor of youth, and he threw himself into the movement with great zeal and energy. He was chaplain at Wädenswyl on Lake Zurich, in 1528, and in September of that year he published a tract against images, under the title Untert Gottes wie man si mit allen Götzen und Bildnissen haltsoll, etc., which ran through several editions, and greatly stirred the popular mind. In October of the same year, when the second conference on the use of images, etc., took place at Zurich, he was appointed to keep the minutes, and to publish an official account of them. Zwingle and Ecolampadius appreciated his talents, especially his Hebrew learning, and, in spite of a certain heat and vehemence which marked him, they hoped much from his activity in the Reformation. In 1524 he went to Augsburg, with a recommendation from Zwingle, and there his learning and eloquence soon made him popular. But within a year, owing to a theological dispute with Urbanus Rhegius, in which Hetzer maintained Arminianist views, he was compelled to quit Augsburg. Returning to Switzerland, he was kindly received at Basle by Ecolampadius, and was employed early in 1526 in translating Zwingle's reply to Bugenhagen into German. He seems to have satisfied both Zwingle and Ecolampadius on this visit that he was not an Anabaptist; but before the middle of the same year he was expelled from Zurich for preaching the new doctrine. At Strasburg he agreed with Johann Denk (q.v.) to issue a translation of the Prophets of the O. T. It appeared in the spring of 1527, and passed in four years through 15 editions. The book was of very scarce; two copies, however, belong to the library of the Crozer Theological Seminary, Upland, Pa. Hetzer seems to have imbued the theological views of Denk, so far, at least, as the doctrine of the Trinity is concerned, and to have aided him in spreading his doctrines in Württemberg, and other parts of Germany and the Hebräisches, he had previously been charged with looseness of morals, and in 1827 the crime of adultery was charged upon him. He was brought to trial and beheaded at Constance, Feb. 3, 1529. Such is the common account of Hetzer's life, founded on contemporary writings and letters of Ambrose Blarer, Zwingle, and others of the Reformers. See Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xvii, ch. iii, § 5; Trechsel, slaves, their tribute being the required personal service. See Gibbonite. In 1 Kings 15, we read that Solomon "had fourscore thousand Hewers in the mountains."

The forests of Lebanon only were sufficient to supply the timber required for building the Temple. Such of these foresters as were nearest the war was, doubtless, the contribution of the Phoenicians, among whom timber was in such constant demand that they had acquired great skill in the felling and transport of it. See Lebanon.

It was therefore of much importance that Hiram consented to employ large bodies of men in Lebanon to Hew timber for the king, and to bring it down by sea to the seacoast, whence it was to be taken along the coast in floats to Joppa. The forests of Lebanon have now in a great measure disappeared, but Akka Dagh and Jawur Dagh (the ancient Amanus and Rhosus), in the north of Syria, still furnish an abundance of valuable timber, though some quantities have been forfeited of late years by the Egyptian government. Hewit. Nathaniel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New London, Conn., August 28, 1788. He graduated A.B. at Yale College in 1806. He commenced the ministry soon after he became a Presbyterian, and was in a few years associated with the ministry, and devoted himself to theology, under the tuition of Dr. Joel Benedict, of Plainfield, Conn.

In 1811 he was licensed to preach by the New-London Congregational Association, and, after preaching for a while in Vermont, went to the new theological seminary at Andover, and was the first graduate of that institution. In 1815 he was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Plattsburg, N.Y. After some years of very successful labor there, he was called to the Congregational Church at Fairfield, Conn. Here he became known as one of "the most eloquent and powerful preachers in the country, and in all the land it was that his voice from Sabbath to Sabbath sounded out that clarion blast of God's truth against intolerance, which, with a similar and equally powerful series of sermons at the same time from Dr. Lyman Beecher at Litchfield, soon aroused the whole Church and ministry of the land." He and Dr. Beecher were apostles of the American Temperance Reformation. In 1828 he resigned his charge at Fairfield to become agent of the American Temperance Society, then newly formed. "He addressed himself to this work with the spirit alike of a hero and a martyr, and prosecuted it with amazing ability and success. For two years he labored in the New York Assembly, and when he was released from that body, as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, with invincible logic, with bold earnestness, with fearless fidelity, with torrent—often cataracts—of burning eloquence, he moved, and fired, and electrified the people. The reform made rapid headway. It enlisted the sympathies of every class and every condition of society, the aged and the young, reclaiming many and guarding multitudes against intolerance. "The astounding eloquence and effects of these discourses I have often heard, in forms and from quarters so various as to leave little doubt that what Luther was to the Reformation, Whitefield to the Revival of 1740, Wells to primitive Methodism, that was Nathaniel Hewit to the early Temperance Reformation" (Atwater, Memorial Discourse). In 1830 he became pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Bridgeport, Conn. In 1831 he was a delegate in behalf of the cause. His powerful and his great powers of eloquence were never more signally displayed than on this visit. In power of logical argument and impassioned delivery few orators of the time exceeded Dr. Hewit. Returning home, he resumed his labors at Bridgeport, where he served until 1843, when he removed to Catskill, and was the first pastor of a new Presbyterian Church formed by members of his old parish. He had always been an adherent to the doctrines of the Westminster Confession. The East Windsor (now Hartford) Theological Seminary owed its existence and maintenance largely to him. In 1862 he was expelled from the church for withdrawing from active duty, and an associate pastor was appointed. He died at Bridgeport February 3, 1867.
Heywood, Olive, an English Nonconformist divine, was born at Bolton, 1630, and admitted at Trinity, Cambridge, 1647. He became rector at Halifax in 1652, and was deprived at the Restoration. After much suffering from poverty, he died in 1702. His writings on practical religion were quite numerous, and may be found in his "Whole Works now first collected" (1687, 2 vols 8vo). See also Hunter, Life of Heywood (Lond. 1844, 8vo).

Heylyn (or Heylyn), Peter, was born Nov. 20, 1621, at Burford, Oxfordshire. At fourteen he entered Hart Hall, Oxford, and there received a sound education. In 1648 he was chaplain to Lord Danby, and, some time after, king's chaplain. He obtained various livings and clerical offices through the patronage of Laud, from which he was expelled by the Republicans; was the editor of the Mercu- rius Aulicus, the Royalist paper; recovered his prefer- ments at the Restoration; and died in 1692. He was the author of a powerful and bitter opponent of the Puritans, and through these qualities he obtained his various rapid preferments. He even went so far in his opposition to Puritanism as to write a History of the Cabals, vindicating the employment of the leisure hours and evenings of the Duke of York's court day in the service of the Crown. In theology he was an Arminian of the latitudinarian sort (see his Historia Quinqu-Articularia, 1659). His Excer- tum Historiarum contained an attack on Thomas Fuller which brought on a bitter controversy with that eminent writer. He wrote The History of St. George and of the Order of the Garter (2d ed. Lond. 1683, 4to); Ecclesiastica Rerum: the History of the English Reformation (1674, 4to; new ed. by Robertson, Lond. 1849, 2 vols, 8vo); Sermons (Lond. 1659, 4to): A Life of Abp. Laud (Lond. 1647, fol.; several editions) -- Historia Religiosa, or History of the Presbyterianism of the English Nation (I. 1682, fol.); Theologia Veterum, on the Apostles' Creed (Lond. 1673, fol.); with many controversial tracts, etc. His life is prefixed to the Ecclesiastica Rerum (ed. of 1689). Heylyn, Joux, D.D., an eminent English divine and prebendary of Westminster. He was deeply read in the Mystical divines, and was himself called "the Mystic doc- tor." He died about 1760, leaving Theological Lectures at Westminster Abbey (Lond. 1740-61, 2 vols, 4to), containing an "interpretation of the New Test." -- Sermons (1677, 2d ed., 1702, 8vo). HEZEKIAH 226

How necessary this was in such times may be inferred from the fact that "the brazen serpent" is, or was, venerated in the Church of St. Ambrose at Milan (Prideaux, Connect, i, 19, Oxed, ed.). The history of this Reformation, of which 2 Kings xviii, 4 sq. gives only a concise summary, is copiously related, from the Levitical point of view, in 2 Chronicles xxvii, 2 sq. and xxix, 1-7, where the cleansing of the Temple in the first month of Heze-kiah's first year, i.e. in the month Nisan next after his accession, and was followed in the next month (because at the regular season neither Levites nor Temple were in a due state of preparation) by a great Passover, over-to which now all Judah was summoned, but also the "remnant" of the Ten Tribes, some of whom accepted the invitation. Some writers (as Jahn, Keil, and Caspari) contend that this passover must have been subsequent to the fall of Samaria, alleging that the mention of the "remnant" (2 Chron. xxx, 6) is unsuitable to an earlier period, and that, while the kingdom of Samaria still subsisted, Hezekiah's messengers would not have been suffered to pass through the land, much less would the destruction of the high places in Ephraim and Manasseh have been permitted (xxx, 1). It is true, the chronicler says, that the Passover was not perfect enough: the connection of xxxix, 17, "the first month," with xxx, 2, "the second month," admits of but one construction—that both are meant to belong to one and the same year, the first of the reign. Accordingly, Thelenius, in the Krg, Ezra, Hdb. 2 Kings, p. 579, urges this as an argument in favor of the view of 2 Chronicles xxv, 3 of the chronology. The narrative of this passover, which, he thinks, "rendered antecedently improbable by the silence of the Book of Kings, is perhaps completely refuted by 2 Kings xxiii, 22. The author of the story, wishing to place in the strongest light Hezekiah's zeal for religion, represents him, not Josiah, as the restorer of the Passover after long desuetude, and this in the very beginning of his reign, without, perhaps, caring to reflect that the final deportation of the Ten Tribes, implied in xxx, 6, had not then taken place." But 2 Kings xxiii, 22, taken in connection, as it ought to be, with the preceding verses, is perfectedly compatible with the account in the Chronicles. It says: "Surely such a Passover"—one kept in all re-spacts "as it is written in the Book of the Covenant"— "was not holden from the time of the Judges," etc.; whereas Hezekiah's Passover, though kept with even greater solemnities and partial observances (under Tidglate-Pileser), with respect to which they might well be called a "remnant" (comp. the very similar terms in which even Judah is spoken of, xxxix, 8, 9), and scorfully rejecting the last call to repentance, brought upon themselves their final judgment and complete overthrow (Bertheau, Krg, Ezra, Hdb. 2 Chron. p. 380 sq.). "Though, however, of the Ten Tribes who had taken part in the solemnity were thereby (such is evidently the chronicler's view of the matter, xxxix, 1) inspired with a zeal for the true religion which enabled them, on their return home, in defiance of all opposition on the part of the nor-merc or of Hoshia, to effect a destruction of the high places and altars in Ephraim and Manasseh, as complete as was effected in Jerusalem before, and in Judah after the Passover.

That this prudent and pious king was not deficient in judicium and abilities is shown by his successes against the Philistines, seemingly in the early part of his reign, before the overthrow of Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii, 8), and by the efficient measures taken by him for the defence of Jerusalem against the Assyrians. Hezekiah also assiduously cultivated the arts of peace, and by wise management of finance, and the attention which, after the example of David and Uzziah, he paid to agriculture and the increase of flocks and herds, he became posses-ed, even in troubled times, of an ample exchequer and treasures of wealth (2 Chron. xxxii, 27—29; 2 Kings 15, 13; Isa. xxxix, 2). Himself a sacred poet, and probably the author of other psalms besides that in Isa. xxxvii, he seems to have collected the psalms of David and Asaph, and employed capable scribes to complete the collection of Solomon's Proverbs (Prov. xxv, 1). He appears also to have taken order for the preservation of genealogical records (Browne, Review of Lepasian or Ilkhe Chronology, in Aram. and Trans.). And he compiled, or partly com-

By a rare and happy providence, this most pious of kings was confirmed in his faithfulness and seconded in his endeavors by the powerful assistance of the noblest and most eloquent of prophets. The influence of Isaiah was, however, not gained without a struggle with the "scomful" remnant of the former royal counselors (Isa. xxviii, 14), who in all probability recommended to the king such alliances and compromises as would be in unison rather with the dictates of political expediency than with that sole unhesitating trust in the arm of Jehovah which the prophets inculcated. The leading man of this party was the high-priest Amos, of the house of Zareah, whose father's name, and the expression in Isa. xxiii, 16 (see Blunt, 'Undes, Cointidences'), was probably a foreigner, perhaps a Syrian (Hitzig). At the instance of Isaiah, he seems to have been subsequently degraded from the high post of prefect of the palace (which office was given to Elah, son of Jezebel, in the time of Ahaz, the son of the honorable station of state secretary (Ezek. x, 18); the further punishment of exile with which Isaiah had threatened him (xxvi, 18) being possibly forgiven on his amendment, of which we have some traces in Isa. xxxvi, sq. (Ewald, 'Ezech, iii, 617).

At the head of a repentant and united people, Hezekiah ventured to assume the aggressive against the Philistines, and a series of victories followed, which removed for ever all fear of the cities which his father had lost (2 Chron. xxviii, 18), but even dispossessed them of their own cities except Gaza (2 Kings xviii, 8) and Gath (Josephus, Ant. ix, 13, 3). It was perhaps to the purposes of this war that he applied the money which would otherwise have been used to pay the tribute exacted by Shalmaneser, according to the agreement of Ahaz with his predecessor, Tidglat-Pileser. When the king of Assyria applied for this impost, Hezekiah refused it, and omitted to send even the usual presents (2 Kings xviii, 7), a line of conduct to which he does not appear to have been enccouraged by Tidglat-Pileser or any of his predecessors.

Instant war was averted by the heroic and long-continued resistance of the Tyrians under their king Elu-leus (Josephus, Ant. ix, 14), against a siege, which was abandoned only in the fifth year (Grote, 'Greece,' iii, 359, 4th edit.), when it was found to be impracticable. This must have been a critical and intensely anxious period for Jerusalem, and Hezekiah used every available means to strengthen his position, and render his capital impregnable (2 Kings xx, 20; 2 Chron. xxxii, 3, 5, 30; Isa. xxxii, 8—11; xxxiii, 18; and to these events Ewald also refers, Psa. xlvi, 13). But while all Judea trembled with fear at the approach of the Assyrian invasion, the Jew-na and others were relying "in the shadow of Egypt," Isaiah's brave heart did not fail, and he even denounced the wrath of God against the proud and sinful merchant-city (Isa. xxiii), which now seemed to be the main bulwark of Judea against immediate attack.

At what time it was that Hezekiah rebelled against the Assyrians, according to Josephus, and served him not, we do not learn from the direct history: in the brief summary, 2 Kings xviii, 7, 8 (for such it clearly is), of the successes with which the Lord prospered him, that particular statement only introduces what is more fully detailed in the sequel (xviii, 19, xix, 67). It precedes the notice of the overthrow of Samaria (ver. 9 sq.), does not warrant the inference that the assertion of independence belongs to the earliest years of Hezekiah’s reign (see Wi-<nner, Real-Wörterb. i, 497, n. 2). Ewald, however, thinks otherwise: in the absence of direct evidence, making history, as his manner is, out of his own peremptory interpretation of certain passages of Isaiah (ch. i and xxvi, 1-4), he forms what is called the "Ammonian Scholium," obliterating the death of Ahaz from the obligations contracted with Tigrath-Pileser, prepared himself from the first to resist the demands of Assyria, and put Jerusalem in a state of defence. (It matters not to Ewald that the measures noted in 2 Kings xx, 20; 2 Chron. xxiii, 5-8, 31 correspond in point of fact with the time of Sennacherib’s advance upon Jerusalem.) "From Shalmaneser’s hosts at that time stationed in Phoenicia and elsewhere in the neighborhood of Judah, forces were detached which laid waste the land in all directions: an army sent against them from Jerashualem seized the panic-stricken at the sight of the unwonted enemy, took to flight, and Jerusalem now lying helplessly exposed, a peace was concluded in all haste upon the stipulation of a yearly tribute, and the ignominious deliverance was celebrated with feastings in Jerusalem" (Gesch. des V. Israel, iii, 330 sq.): all of which would place the supposition that Ew-ald’s interpretation of Isa. ix, 22 is the only possible one: it cannot be said to be on record as history.

As gathered from the Scriptures only, the course of events appears to have been as follows: Ahaz had placed his kingdom as tributary under the protection of Tigr-ath-Pileser. When, according to Isaiah, x, 27, and xxvii, 22, that in the time of Shalmaneser, to which the latter passage certainly, and the former probably, belongs, Judah was still under the yoke of this dependence. The fact that Sargon (whether or not the same with the Shalmaneser of the history), in his expedi- tion against Egypt, left Judah untouched (Isa. xxvii), implies that Judah had not yet asserted its independence. A powerful party, indeed, was scheming for re-volt from Assyria and a league with Egypt; but there appears no reason to believe that Hezekiah all along fav-ored a policy which Isaiah in the name of the Lord, the last, sternly condemned. It was not till after the accession of Sennacherib that Hezekiah refused the tribute, and at the instigation of his nobles made a league with Egypt by ambassadors sent to Zaan (Tanis) (Isa. xxx, xxxi; compare xxxvi, 6-9). (Some, indeed [i.e., Ewald and Keil], place the supposition of a league before the fall of Samaria, to which time ch. xxviii must unquestionably be assigned. Possibly ch. xxix may be- long to the same time, and ver. 15 may refer to plottings for a league with Egypt already carried on in secret. Knobel, Kgy. exp. Bibl. p. 215, 225, decides too peremptor-ily for the reference of both clauses to the time of Sennacherib, and insists that to xxix falls only a little earlier than the following chapters, where the league is openly denounced, viz. in the early part of the reign of Sennacherib.)

The subsequent history, as gathered from the Scriptures, compared with the notices on the ancient monuments, is thought to be as follows. Sargon was suc- ceeded by his son Sennacherib, whose two invasions occupy the greater part of the Scripture records concerning the reign of Hezekiah. The first of these took place in the third year of Sennacherib, and occupies only the first half of the year (Isa. xxx vi, 3-10), though the latter part of the year, the advance of the Assyrians may be traced in Isa. x, 5; xi. The rumor of the invasion redoubled Hezekiah’s exer-tions, and he prepared for a siege by providing offensive and defensive armor, stopping up the wells, and diverting the watercourses, conducting the water of Ghion into the city from a distant source. For a similar precaution taken by the Mohammadans, see Wil. Tyrv. vii, 7, Keil. But the main hope of the political faction was the alliance with Egypt, and they seem to have sought it by presents and private entreaties, but the negotiations were doubly galling to obtaining their aid. Isaiah (Isa. xxx, i-3), warns Hezekiah against entrusting the weakest arm of the Jewish service, as we see from the decision which it excited (2 Kings xviii, 23). Such overtures kindled Isaiah’s indignation, and Shebna may have lost his high office for recommending them. The prophet clearly saw that Egypt was too weak and faithless to be serviceable, and the applications to Pharaoh (who is compared by Rabshakeh to one of the weak reeds of his father, 1 Kings xxi, 19) impli- cated a ruin of the entire city, and denial of the help of God. But Isaiah did not disapprove of the spontaneous proffered assistance of the tall and warlike Ethiopians (Isa. xviii, 2, 7, acc. to Ewald’s transl.), be- cause he may have regarded it as a providential aid.

The account given of this first invasion in the mem- orials of the time is chiefly derived from Heze- kiah because the Eronitides had sent their king Padiya (or "Hadiya," acc. to Col. Rawlinson) as a prisoner to Jerusalem (comp. 2 Kings xviii, 8), that he took forty-six cities ("all the fenced cities" in 2 Kings xviii, 13 is apparently a corruption of a con- version; Jer. xix, 13, mentions 200,000 prisoners; that he besieged Jerusalem with mounds (comp. 2 Kings xix, 32); and although Heze- kiah promised to pay 800 talents of silver (of which perhaps only 300 were ever paid) and 30 of gold (2 Kings xviii, 14; but see Layard, Nine. and Bab. p. 148), yet, not content with this, he mulcted him of a part of his dominions, and gave them to the kings of Ekron, Ash- dod, and Gaza (Rawlinson, Herod. i, 476 sq.). So im-portant was this expedition that Demetrius, the Jewish historian, even attributes to Sennacherib the Great Captivity (Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 147, ed. Syll.). In almost every instance therefore this sanguinary notice in Scripture, and we may see a reason for so great a sacrifice on the part of Hezekiah in the glimpse which Isaiah gives us of his capital city driven by desperation into licentious and impious mirth (xxxi, 12-14). This campaign must at least have had the one good result of proving the worthlessness of the Egyptian alliance; for at a place called Alttagh (the Eltekon of Josh. xv, 59?) Sennacherib inflicted an overwhelming defeat on the combined forces of Egypt and Ethiopia, which had come to the assistance of Ekron. But Isaiah regarded the treaty as a mere purchase made in days of treachery, and this, in his view, was a part of his fellow-citizens gazing peacefully from the house-tops on the bright array of the car-borne and quivered Assyrians filled him with indignation and despair (Isa. xxii, 1-7, if the latest explanations of this chapter be correct).

Hezekiah’s bribe (or fine) brought a temporary re- lease, for the Assyrians marched into Egypt, where, if Herodotus (ii, 141) and Josephus (Ant. x, 3-4) are to be trusted, they advanced without resistance to Pelusium, owing to the hatred of the warrior- caste against Sethos, the king-priest of Thoth, who, had in his priestly predi- cation been an enemy to the Egyptians in general, and this advantage, Sennacherib was forced to raise the siege of Pelusium, by the advance of Tirhakah or Tar- kos, the ally of Sethos and Hezekiah, who afterwards united the crowns of Egypt and Ethiopia. This magni-fi cent Ethiopian hero, who had extended his conquests to the Pillars of Hercules (Strabo, iv, 472), was indeed a formidable antagonist. His deeds are recorded in a temple at Melinet-Abu, but the jealousy of the Mem- phitites (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, i, 141) concealed his as- sistance, and attributed the deliverance of Sethos to the arms of his own gods, without any mention of an army of mice (the eth. 141). This story may have had its source, however, not in jealousy, but in the use of a mouse as the emblem of destruction (Horapoll. Hierogl. i, 50; Rawlinson, Her- rod. ad loc.), and of some sort of disease or plague (? 1 Sam. vi, 19; Jahn, Arch. Bibli. § 186). The legend is found from Egypt and Babylonia in the earliest historical circumstances which ruined the army of Sennacherib.

Returning from his futile expedition (ἀποπραξίας ἀνα- ψιγμός, Josephus, Ant. x, 1, 4), Sennacherib “dealt treacherously” with Hezekiah (Isa. xxxix, 1) by attack- ing the strongholds of Lachisch. This was a turning point in the history of the invasion, which we have such full details in 2 Kings xviii, 17 sq.; 2 Chron. xxxix, 9 sq.; Isa. xxxvi. That there were two invasions (contrary to the opinion of Layard, Bosanquet, Vance Smith, etc.) is clearly proved by the details of the first given in the Assyrian annals (see Rawlinson, Herod, i. 477). Although the annals of Sennacherib on the great cylinder in the British Museum reach to the end of his eight year, and this second invasion belongs to his fifth year, yet no allusion to it has been found. So shameful a disaster was naturally concealed by national vanity. From Lachish he sent against Jerusalem an army under two officers and his cup-bearer, the orator Rameshakeh, with a blasphemous and insulting summons to surrender, which Judah’s hopes of Egyptian succor, and apparently endeavoring to inspire the people with distrust of his religious innovations (2 Kings xxviii, 22, 25, 30). The reiteration and peculiarity of the latter argument, together with Rameshakeh’s fluent mastery of Hebrew (which he used to tempt the people from their allegiance by a glowing promise, ver. 31, 32), give countenance to the supposition that he was an apostate Jew. Hezekiah’s ministers were thrown into anguish and dismay; but the undaunted Isaiah hurled back threatening, in effect and force, and He even prophesied that the fires of Tophet were alight in Hezekiah’s capital. He sent messengers to the Egyptian captains, which were destined to feed their flame. Meanwhile Sennacherib, having taken Lachish (an event possibly depicted on a series of slabs at Mosul, Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 148-152), was besieging Libnah, when, alarmed by a “rumor” of TIRAKHA’s advance to avenge the defeat, he was forced to set out on his homeward march, and left Hezekiah in possession of his immediate designs, and contented himself with a defiant letter to Hezekiah. Whether on the occasion he encountered and defeated the Ethiopians (as Prudeaux precariously infers from Isa. xx, Connect. i, 26), or not, we cannot tell. The next event of the campaign about which we are informed is that the Jewish king, with simple piety, prayed to God with Sennacherib’s letter outspread before him (comp. 1 Macc. iii, 48), and received a promise of immediate deliverance. Accordingly “that night the angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians 185,000 men.”

There is no doubt that some secondary cause was employed in the accomplishment of this event. We are certainly “not to suppose,” as Dr. Johnson observed, “that the angel went about with a sword in his hand stabbing them one by one, but that some powerful natural element was at work.” The Babylonians were famished, and some of the Targums attribute it to storms of lightning (Vitrings, Vogel, etc.); Prudeaux, Heine (De causa Strag. Asgr. Berl. 1701), Harmer, and Faber to the moon; R. Joe (in Seder Olam Rabba), Marshall, Usher, Freiss (De causa Final. Asgr. Gottingen, 1776), to a nocturnal attack by Tirakha; Paulus to a poisoning of the waters; and, finally, Josephus (Ant. x, 1, 4 and 5), followed by an immense majority of ancient and modern commentators (including Michaelis, Didierlein, Dathe, Heusler, Bauer, Ditmar, Gesenius, Maurer, Knobel, etc., and even Keil), to the pentecost (compare 2 Sam. xxiv, 15, 16). This would be a cause not only adequate (Justin, xix, 11; Diodor. xix, 439; see the other instances quoted by Rosenmiiller, Keil, Jahn, etc.), but most probable in itself, from the crowded and terrified state of the camp. There is, therefore, no necessity to adopt the ingenious conjectures by which Döderlein, Kruppe, and Wesseler endeavor to get rid of the large number 185,000. It is not said where the event occurred: the particulars concerning it, Isa. x-xxxvii, seem to denote the neighborhood of Jerusalem, as would Ps. lxvi, if it was written at that time. On the other hand, the narrative would probably have been fuller had the historian thrown, with its attendant opportunities of beholding the bodies of their dreaded enemies and of gathering great spoil, befallen near Jerusalem, or even within the immediate limits of Judah. That version of the story which reads Isa. xii, 14-20, is probably the one which Josephus would hold with Flav. (Groc. iii, 330) that the story is not substantially the same—indicates the frontier of Egypt, near Ptolemais, as the scene of the disaster. The Assyrian army would probably break up from Libnah on the tidings of Tirakha’s approach, and advance to meet him. In ascribing it to a vast swarm of field-mice, which, devouring the quivers and bow-strings of the Egyptians, compelled them to flee in the morning, Hezekiah may have misinterpreted the symbolic language of the Egyptians, in which the mouse denotes annihilation (ἀπονεμώνυμη, Horappol. i, 50); though, as Knobel (u. p. 280) has shown by apposite instances, an army of mice is capable of committing such ravages, and Hezekiah was in no position to know of it. That the destruction was effected in the course of the night is clearly expressed in 2 Kings xix, 35, where “that night” is plainly that which followed after the delivery of Isaiah’s prophecy, and is evidently implied alike in Isa. xxxvi, 36 (“when men arose early in the morning”), and in the story of Hezekiah’s illness. After this reverse Sennacherib fled precipitately to Nineveh, where he avenged himself on as many Jews as were in his power (2 Ob. i, 18), and, after many years (not fifty-five days, as Tobit says, i, 21), was murdered by two of his sons as he drank himself drunk in the house of his drunkenness (2 Kings xxix, 24; 2 Chron. xxxii, 25; 2 Esd. 695, for his 22d year is mentioned on a clay tablet (Rawlinson, L. c.); he must therefore have survived Hezekiah by at least one year. It is probable that several of the Psalms (e. g. xlvi-xlviii, lxxxvi) allude to his disappointment.

“IT IS NOT SEEN TO WHAT DEGREE THE HEZEKIAH sick unto death.” So begins, in all the accounts, and immediately after the discomfiture of Sennacherib, the narrative of Hezekiah’s sickness and miraculous recovery (2 Kings xx, 1; 2 Chron. xxxii, 24; Isa. xxxviii, 1). The time is defined, as by the promise of his recovery, which is added to the life of Hezekiah, to the fourteenth year complete, or fifteenth current, of his reign of twenty-nine years. But it is stated to have been in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah that Sennacherib took the fenced cities of Judah, and thereafter threatened Jerusalem and came to his overthrow. The two notes of time, the express and the implied, fully accord, and place beyond question, at least, the view of the writer or last redactor in 2 Kings xxviii, xix; Isa. xxxvi, xxxvii, that the Assyrian invasion began before Hezekiah’s illness, and lies in the middle of his reign. In the received chronology, as the first year of Hezekiah (comp. 9, 16) is the twenty-first year of Nebuchadnezzar (i. e. B.C. 604 in the Canon, B.C. 606 in the Hebrew reckoning) by 29, 55, 2, 81, 3, 120 years, the epoch of the reign is B.C. 724 and 726, and its 14th year B.C. 711 and 713. But it is contended that so early a year is incompatible with definite and unquestionable data of contemporary history, Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian. From these it has been inferred that during the siege of Samaria Shalmanezer died, and was succeeded by Sargon, who, jealous of Egyptian influence in Judea, sent an army under a Tartar or general (Isa. xx, 1), which penetrated Egypt (Nah. iii, 8-10) and destroyed Edom-Asop; although it is clear from Hezekiah’s rebellion (2 Kings xviii, 7) that it can have produced but little permanent impression. Sargon, in the tenth year of his reign (which is regarded as parallel with the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah), made an expedition to Palestine in the fifth year of Hezekiah, but we know of no conquests from Hezekiah on this occasion, and he appears to have occupied himself in the siege of Ashdod (Isa. xx, 1), and in the inspection of mines (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. i., x.). This is therefore thought to be the expedition referred to in 2 Kings xviii, 10; Isa. xxxvi, 1; an expedition which is supposed to have led to no result. But if the Scripture narrative is to be reconciled with the records of Assyrian history, it has been thought necessary to make a transposition in the text of Isaiah (and therefore of the book of Kings). That is, that the narrative in Isa. xxxvi, 1-16 is a more or less accurate report of the events of the first year of Hezekiah, and that the Assyrian army invaded the land of Judah, and was repulsed by Hezekiah, and that it returned home in despair. But the Scriptures in the narratives of the Assyrian invasion of Judah, and of the destruction of Jerusalem, are not to be read, as was the history of the Babylonian conquest of Judah, as mere narratives of historical events, but as sacred Scriptures, and the authenticity of which is not to be questioned. which the newly-discovered Apis-stele reveals necessary (in Journ. of Soc. Lit. Oct. 1868)."

"As it originally stood, was probably to this effect (2 Kings xviii, 13): Now in the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah the king of Assyria came up (alluding to the attack mentioned in Sargon's "Annum,", xx, 5—14). In these days was king Hezekiah sick unto death, etc., xx, 1—19. And Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, came up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them, etc., xviii, 13; xix, 37.

It has been conjectured that some later transcript, unaware of the earlier and unimportant invasion, confused the allusion to Sargon in 2 Kings xviii, 13 with the detailed story of Sennacherib's attack on Judah in 2 Kings xix, 32. The narrative suggests that the account of Hezekiah's illness broke the continuity of the narrative, removed it to the end. According to this scheme, Hezekiah's dangerous illness (2 Kings xx; Isa. xxxvii; 2 Chron. xxxxi, 24) nearly synchronized with Sargon's futile invasion, in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, eleven years before Sennacherib's invasion. That it must have preceded the attack of Sennacherib has also been inferred from the promise in 2 Kings xx, 4, as well as from modern discoveries (Layard, Nin. and Bab, i, 145); and such is the view adopted by the Rabbis (Seder Olam, cap. xxiii), Usher, and other authorities. But no such synchronism is noted in the Talmud (Kil, ed. loc.; Pirke Avoth, i, 29). It should be observed, however, that difficulties experienced in reconciling the scriptural date with that of the Assyrian monuments rests on the synchronism of the fall of Samaria (2 Kings xix, 37) with the year of Sargon's invasion (2 Kings xix, 36).Rawlinson has lately given reasons himself (Lond. Archaeum, No. 1869, Aug. 22, 1868, p. 246) for doubting this date; and it is probable that further researches and computations may fully vindicate the accuracy of the Biblical numbers.

Tirhakah is mentioned (2 Kings xix, 9) as an opponent of Sennacherib shortly before the miraculous destruction of his army in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, corresponding to B.C. 713. It has lately been proved from the Apis tablets that the first year of Tirhakah's reign over Egypt was the vague year current in B.C. 720, asfix. Dr. Hinks, in the Journ. of Soc. Lit. October, 1858, p. 190).

There is, therefore, a prima facie discrepancy of several years. Bunsen (Bibelwerk, i, p. 241) unhesitatingly reduces the reign of Manasseh from fifty-five to forty-five years. Lepsius (Königsmen, p. 104) more critically takes the thirty-five years of the Septuagint (2 Kings xix, 20) as the submission of the Seleucid king referred to, and accordingly reduces the reign of Manasseh from fifty-five to forty-five years. The evidence of the chronology of the Egyptian and Babylonian kings is, however, we think, conclusive in favor of the sum of fifty-five.

In the Bible we are told that Shalmaneser laid siege to Samaria in the fourth year of Hezekiah, and that it was taken in the sixth year of that king (2 Kings xvii, 9). The Assyrian inscriptions indicate the taking of the city by Sargon in his first or second year, whence we must suppose either that he completed the enterprise of Shalmaneser, to whom the capture is not expressly ascribed in the Scriptures, or that he took the credit of an event which happened just before his accession. The first year of Sargon is shown by the inscriptions to be 722 B.C. To designate by 722 the first year of Merodach-Baladan, i.e. Mardocampus: there fore it was current 721 B.C. 720, and the second year, 720 or 719. This would place Hezekiah's accession B.C. 726, 725, or 724, the first of them being the very date the Hebrew chronicles give. Again, Merodach-Baladan sent messengers to Hezekiah immediately after his sickness, and therefore in about his fourteenth year, B.C. 712. According to Ptolemy's Canon, Mardocampus reigned 721—710, and, according to Berossus, seized the regnal power for six months before Eblisus, the Bellius of the Canon, and therefore in about 705, this being, no doubt, a second reign. See MERODACH-BALADAN. Here the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the other dates of Hezekiah. Thus far the chronological data of Egypt and Assyria appear to clash in a manner that seems at first sight to present a hopeless knot, but not on this account to be rashly cut. An examination of the facts in the history has afforded Dr. Hinks (Journ. of Soc. Lit. Oct. 1858, p. 190) what he believes to be a satisfactory explanation. Tirhakah, he observes, is not explicitly termed Pharaoh or king of Egypt in the Bible, but king of Cush or Ethiopia, from which it might be inferred that at the time of Sennacherib's disastrous invasion he had not assumed the crown of Egypt. The first year of his reign corresponds with Assyrian inscriptions of the fourteenth year of Hezekiah in B.C. 718, and its contemporaneity with the reign of Tirhakah, who did not ascend the Egyptian throne till B.C. 689, we have only to suppose that the latter king was the ruler of Ethiopia some years before his accession over Egypt itself. See TIRHAKAH.

In this way, however, we may fall into the other difficulty as to the coincidence of this date with that of Sennacherib's invasion. It is true, as above seen, that the warlike operations of Sennacherib recorded in the Bible have been conjectured (Rawlinson, Herodotus, i, 363) to be those of two expeditions. See SENNACHERIB.

The warlike operations of Sennacherib recorded in the Bible have been conjectured (Rawlinson, Herodotus, i, 363) to be those of two expeditions. See SENNACHARIB.

The fine point in this case is the historical veracity of the accounts as a result of an expedition of Sennacherib's third year, which, by a comparison of Ptolemy's Canon with Berossus, must be dated B.C. 700, and this would fall so near the close of the reign of the king of Judah (B.C. 697) that the supposed second expedition, of which there would naturally be no record, could not be placed much later. The Biblical account would, however, be most reasonably explained by the supposition that the two expeditions were but two campaigns of the same war, a war but temporarily interrupted by Hezekiah's illness. The appeal to this coinage of the names is made on an admission that in two experimentations of Sennacherib fell in B.C. 700, it would be thirteen years later than the synchronism of Tirhakah and Hezekiah as above arrived at. It is probable, therefore, that there is some miscalculation in these dates from the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, as indeed seems to be betrayed by the discrepancy between Sennacherib's invasion (B.C. 700) and Tirhakah's reign (not earlier than B.C. 689), as thereby determined, whereas the above Biblical passage makes them contemporaneous. Dr. Hinks (ut sup.), however, proposes to solve this difficulty under the historical supposition that the name of Sennacherib has been inserted in the Biblical account of the first Assyrian invasion of Judah (2 Kings xviii, 13; Isa. xxvi, 1; 2 Chron. xxxiii) by some copyist, who confounded this with the later invasion by that monarch, whereas the Assyrian annals of the latter refer to the former (Isa. xxxvii). A less violent hypothesis for the same purpose of reconciliation, and one in accordance with the custom of these Oriental kings, e.g. in the case of Nebuchadnezzar, is that Sargon sent Sennacherib as viceroy to execute this campaign in Palestine, and that the annals of the reign of the former are the account of the events of his expeditions when actually king. See CHRONOLOGY.

Some writers have thought to find a note of time in 2 Kings xiii, 9; 2 Chron. xxxvii, 30, 'Ye shall eat this year such as growth of itself,' etc., assuming that the passage is only to be explained as implying the intervention of a sabbath-year, or even of a sabbath-year fol-owed by a year of jubilee. All that can be said is that the passage does not happen that according to that view of the order of sabbatic and jubileean years which is the best attested, a sabbath-year would begin in the autumn of B.C. 713 (Browne, Ordo Secolorum, sec. 372-280), i.e. on the per-phaps precarious assumption that the cycle persisted without interruption, however, it cannot be fixed by the fourteenth of Hezekiah to the year B.C. 718, than it does to 706, or 699, or any other year of the series. But, in fact, it is not necessary to assume any reference to a sabbath-year. Suppose the words to have been spoken in the autumn, then, the produce of the previous harvest (April, May) having been destroyed or carried off by the invaders, there remained only that which sprang naturally from the dropped or trodden-out seed (דנפנפ), and as the enemy’s presence in the land hindered the au-natural tillage, there could be no regular harvest in the follow ing spring (only the דנפנפ, איירגא). Hence, there is no need to infer with Thenius, ad loc. that the enemy must have been in the land at least eighteen months, or, with Ewald, that Isaiah, speaking in the au-natural harvest, means that the invasion had lasted through the following year (Die Propheten des A. B., i. 301), and similarly Knobel, u. a. p. 278.

There seems to be no ground whatever for the vague conjecture so confidently advanced (Jahn, Heb. Common. § xii.), that the king’s illness was the same plague which had destroyed the Assyrian army. The word נִינִיב is not elsewhere applied to the plague, but to carbuncles and inflamatory ulcers (Exod. ix. 9; Job ii. 1, etc.). Hezekiah, whose kingdom was still in a dangerous state from the fear lest the Assyrians might return, who had at that time no heir (for Manasseh was not born till long afterwards, 2 Kings xxix.,) and who regarded death as the end of existence (Isa. xxviii.), “turned his face to the wall and wept sore” at the threatened approach of dissolution. God had compassion on his anguish, and heard his prayer. Isaiah had hardly left the palace when he was ordered to promise the king immediate recovery, and a fresh lease of life, ratifying the promise by a sign, and curving the bole by a plaster of ligs, which were often used medicinally in similar cases (Georgius, Thes. i. 311; Celsius, Hierobot. ii. 377; Bartholinus, De Morbis Biblicis, x. 47). What was the exact nature of the disease we cannot say; according to Meade, it was fever terminating in abscess. On this remarkable passage we must here be content to refer the reader to Carpzo, App. Crit. p. 581 sq.; Hawlinson, Hier. ii. 382 sq.; the elaborate notes of Keil on 2 Kings xx.; Rosenmüller and Gesenius on Isa. xxxviii., and especially Ewald, Ge-archive, i. 368.

The sign given to Hezekiah in the going back of the shadow on the "sun-dial of Ahaz" can only be interpreted as a miracle. The explanation proposed by J. von Gumpach (Alt. Test. Studien, p. 181 sq.) is as incompatible with the terms of the narrative (Isa. xxxviii., 8, especially the fuller one, 2 Kings xx., 8-11) as it is insulting to the character of the prophet, who is represented as not only managing the evening of the Lord’s life and its shadow by the trick of secretly turning the movable dial from its proper position to its opposite! Thenius (u. a.
p. 405 sq.) would naturalize the miracle so as to obtain from it a note of tone. The phenomenon was due, he thinks, to a cloud, very small, viz. the one of 26th November, B.C. 713. Here, also, the prophet is taxed with a deception, to be justified by his wish to inspire the despairing king with the confidence essential to his recovery. The prophet employed for this purpose his astrological knowledge of the fact that the eclipse was about to take place, and of the further fact that "at the beginning of an eclipse the shadow (e.g. of a gnomon) goes back, and at its ending goes forward:" an effect, however, so minute that the difference amounts at most to sixty seconds of time; but then the "degrees" would mark extremely small portions of time, possibly even 1090 to the hour (like the later Hebrew Chalikin), and be the exact definition of the locality of the sun. Not now successfully, Mr. Bosanquet (Trans. of R. A. S., Soc. xxv., 277) has recourse to the same expedient of an eclipse on Jan. 11, 689 B.C., which, in this writer’s scheme, lies in the fourteenth of Hezekiah. "Whoever truly believes in the Old Testament, as Mr. Bosanquet evidently does, must not consult his astrolabe, but be fixed by the just comment made by M. v. Niebuhr, Gesch. Assyri. und Pers. p. 49. Mr. Geswell’s elaborate attempt to prove from ancient astronomical records that the day of this miracle was preternaturally lengthened out to thirty-six hours, in order to arrive at one any but himself (Foot Tempora Catholici, etc.) carried for the writer’s Remarks on the same, 1852, p. 23 sq.) See Dial.

Various ambassadors came with letters and gifts to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery (2 Chron. xxxii., 20), and among them an embassy from Merodach-Bakadan (or Berothad, 2 Kings xx., 12; 2 Bar. 4, Josephus, l. c.), the viceroy of Babylon, the Mardokempados of Ptolemy’s canon. The ostensible object of this mis-ion was to compliment Hezekiah on his convalescence (2 Kings xx., 12; Isa. xxxix., 1, and "to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land" (2 Chron. xxxiii., 31), a rung that the prophecy could not fall to influence devo ted to astrology. But its real purpose was to discover how far an alliance between the two powers was possible or desirable, for Mardokempados, no less than Hezekiah, was in apprehension of the Assyrians. In fact, Sargou expelled him from the throne of Babylon in the following year (the twenty-first of Hezekiah), although at the time he seems to have returned and re-established himself for six months, at the end of which he was murdered by Belblos (Dr. Hincks, l. c.; Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geograph. ch. viii.; Layard, Nin. and Bub., i. 141). Communication between the two monarchs is no doubt here, and, perhaps, to enhance the opinion of his own importance as an ally, he displayed to the messengers the precious treasures which he and his predecessors had accumulated. These stores remained even after the largesses mentioned in 2 Kings xviii., 14, 16. If ostentation were the motive it received a terrible rebuke, and he was informed by Isiah that from the then tottering and subordinate province of Babylon, and not from the mighty Assyria, would come the ruin and captivity of Judah (Isa. xxxix., 5).

This prophecy and the one of Micaiah (Mic. iv., 10) are the more remarkable from the position of the locality of the writer, however, where the clouds of exile so long threatened (Lev xxxvi., 33; Deut. iv., 27; xxi., 3) were beginning to gather. It is an impressive and fearful circumstance that the moment of exultation was chosen as the opportunity for warning, and that the prophecies of the Asyri-delivrance are set side by side with those of the Babylonian captivity (Davidson, On Prophecy, p. 256). The weak friend was to accomplish that which was impossible to the powerful foe. But, although pride was the sin thus vehemently checked by the prophet, Isaiah was certainly not blind to the political motives (Josephus, Ant., x., 2) which made Hezekiah so complaisant to the Babylonian ambassadors. Into those motives he had inquired in vain, for the king met that portion of his question ("What said these men?") by emphatic si-cence. Hezekiah’s meek answer to the stern denunciation of the writer has been most unjustly represented as "a false resignation which combines selfishness with silliness" (Newman, Heb., Mon. p. 274). On the contrary, it merely implies a conviction that God’s decree could not be otherwise than just and right, and a natural thankfulness for even a temporary suspension of its invitable fulfilment.

After this embassy we have only a general account of the peace and prosperity in which Hezekiah closed his days. No man before or since ever lived under the certain knowledge of the precise length of the span of life before him. "He was buried in the going up (פּוּץ)" to the sepulchres of the sons of David," 2 Chron. xxxii, 33: 3 from this, and the fact that the succeeding kings were not buried in their own city, it may be inferred that after Absa, thirteen times from David, there was no more room left in the ancestral sepulchre (Thenius, u. s., p. 410). In later times, he was held in honor as the king who "had after him none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him" (2 Kings xviii, 3); in Jer. xxxvi, 17 the elders of the land cite him as an example of pious submission to the word of the Lord spoken by Micah; and the son of Siraach closest his recital of the kings with this judgment—that of all the kings of Judah, "David, Hezekiah, and Josiah alone transgressed not, nor forsook the law of the Most High." (Heb. ter awkward has Hieke, Helms. 1749, Taddei (Precicio Chiaske, Wit- tenh, 1704). For sermons, etc., see Darling, Cyclopaedia bibliographica, col. 380, 340, 341.

Hezekiah's Pool, the modern traditional name of a cistern or reservoir in the western part of the city of Jerusalem, referred by Robinson (Latter Researches, p. 112) and Bartlett (Walks about Jerusalem, p. 82) to the military preparations of that king (2 Chron. xxvii, 3 sq; compare 2 Kings xx, 20; Eccles. xlviii, 17 sq; Isa. xix, 9-11; Psa. xlviii, 12, 13), but disputed by Ritter (Erbk., xxvii, 371 sq). Sprague, Annals, iv, 298. 2. Hicks, Geocon, D.D., a nonjuring bishop of great learning and eminence, born June 29, 1649, at Newlyn, in Yorkshire; was educated at St. John’s College, Oxford, and in 1644 was elected fellow of Lincoln College. He became chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale in 1676, king’s chaplain in 1682, and dean of Worcester in 1688. He was disappointed of the bishopric of Bristol by the death of Charles II. After the Revolution of 1688, refusing to take the oaths to William III, he was deprived in 1689, and became an active enemy of the government. He was consecrated bishop of Thetford by the Nonjurors in 1694, and died in 1715. His scholarship is shown in his work, Synopsis Letterarum Sacrarum Thesauri in Anglia, (Oxford, 1705, 3 vols. fol.), and his * Institutionum Grammaticarum Anglo - Saxonicarum* (Oxford, 1689, 4to). Among his theological and controversial writings, which were very numerous, are The Christian Priesthood, and the Dignity of the Episcopal Order (new ed. Oxford, 1847, 3 vols. 8vo). See Hook, Ecles. Bibl. vi, 82 sqq.; Lathbury, History of the Nonjurors. 3. Hicks, Elias, a member of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, and the author of a schism in that body, was born at Hempstead, L. I., March 19, 1748, and in early life became a preacher in the society. Imbidding Socinian opinions as to the Trinity and the Atonement, he began to preach them, cautiously at first, and with little sympathy from his brethren. By “degrees, however, the boldness of his views and the vigor with which he repelled assailants began to attract attention, and to win hearers over to his opinions, which, proclaimed without faltering, in public and private for years, at length found large numbers of sympathizers, who, with Mr. Hicks himself, unable to impress their convictions upon the denomination at large, in 1802 seceded from the body, and set up a distinct and independent denomination, but still holding to the name of Friends. In this secession were members from the Yearly Meetings of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Ohio, Indiana, and New England.” He was a man of great acuteness and energy of intellect, and of elevated personal character. He died at Jericho Feb. 28, 1830. He published *Observation with that river at Korna, fifty miles above Basrah (Basarrah). The Tigris is navigable for boats of twenty or thirty tons' burden as far as the mouth of the Ordo-neh, but no further; and the commerce of Mosul is consequently carried on by rafts supported on inflated sheep or goats' skins. See Float. The rafts are floated down the river and when they arrive at Bagdad the wood of which they are composed is sold without loss, and the skins are conveyed back to Mosul by camels. The Tigris, between Bagdad and Korna, is, on an average, about two hundred yards wide; at Mosul its breadth does not exceed three hundred feet. The banks are steep, and overgrown for the most part with brushwood, the resort of lions and other wild animals. The middle part of the river's course, from Mosul to Korna, once the seat of high culture and the residence of mighty kings, is now desolate, covered with the relics of ancient greatness in the shape of fortresses, mounds, and dams, which had been erected for the defence and irrigation of the country. At the ruins of Nimrud, eight leagues below Mosul, is a stone dam quite across the river, which,

when the stream is low, stands considerably above the surface, and forms a small cataract; but when the stream is swollen, as it is often, and shooting over it like a rapid, and boiling up with great impetuosity. It is a work of great skill and labor, and now venerable for its antiquity. The inhabitants, as usual, attribute it to Nimrud. It is called the Zikr-ul-Awaze.
At some short distance below there is another Zikr (dike), but not so high, and more ruined than the former. The river rises twice in the year: the first and greatest rise is in April, and is caused by the melting of the snows in the mountains of Armenia; the other is in November, and is produced by the periodical rains. (See Kinney, Geog. Mem. of Persian Empire, p. 10; Rich's Key, and Overton's 'Copies Expedition; Sir R. K.
Potter's Travels; etc.) See Tigris.

Elhîl (Heb. Chîl, см, life; i.e. from God, or perhaps, см, God shall live; Sept. 'A'phîlî'), a native of Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho (B.C. post. 915), above 700 years after its destruction by the Israelites, and who, in so doing (1 Kings xvi, 34), incurred, in the death of his eldest son Abram and his youngest son Jeph, the effects of the imprecation pronounced by Joshua (Josh. vi, 16):

"Accursed be the man in the sight of Jehovah,

Whom shall arise and build this city, even Jericho;

With the loss of his first-born shall he be slain,

And with the loss of his youngest shall be his gates."

See Jericho. Strabo speaks of such cursing of a destroyed city as an ancient custom, and instances the curses imprecated by Agamemmnon and Cresus (Gro-tius, Annal. ad Jos. vi, 26); Masius compares the cursing of Carthage by the Romans (Pol. Syn.). The term Bethelite (מַיִלְעִי) here only is by some rendered family of cursing (Pet. Martyr), and also house or place of cursing (Ar., Syr., and Chald. versions). qu. יִלְעִי, יָלִי; bu-ter there seems no reason for questioning the accuracy of the Sept. In Ephes. vi, 17, it frequently is approved by most commentators, and sanctioned by Genevan (Lec. n. v.).
The rebuilding of Jericho was an intrusion upon the kingdom of Jehoshaphat, unless, with Peter Martyr, we suppose that Jericho had already been detached from it by the kings of Israel. See ACCURSED.

Hierapolis (Ἱεραπόλης, sacred city), a city of Phrygia, of which the isolation and distance are most evident from the course of rivers Lyccouis and Messander, not far from Colosse and Laodicea, where there was a Christian church under the charge of Epaphras as early as the time of the apostle Paul, who commends him for his fidelity and zeal (Colos. iv.
12, 13). The place is visible from the theatre at La-odicea, from which it is five miles distant, northward.
Its association with Laodicea and Colosse is just what we should expect, for the three towns were all in the basin of the Mesander, and within a few miles of one another. It is probable that Hierapolis was one of the "illustres Asiae urbe" (Tacitus, Ann. xiv, 27) which, with Laodicea, were simultaneously desolated by an earthquake about the time when Christianity was established in this district. There is little doubt that the church of Hierapolis was founded at the suggestion of that of Colosse, and that its characteristics in the apostolic period were the same. Smith, in his journey to the Seven Churches (1671), was the first to describe the ancient sites in this neighborhood. He was followed by Poecike and Chandler; and more recently by Richter, Cockerril, Hartley, Arundel, etc. The place now bears the name of Panbâk-Kalek (Cotton-Castle), from the white appearance of the cliffs of the mountain on the lower summit, or, rather, an extended terrace, on which the ruins are situated. It owed its celebrity, and probably the sanctity indicated by its ancient name, to its very remarkable thermal springs of mineral water (Dio Cass. lxxviii, 27; Pliny, Hist. Nat. ii, 96), the singular effects of which, in the formation of stalactites and incrustations by its deposits, are shown in the accounts of Poecike (ii, pt. 2, c. 13) and Chandler (Asia Minor, c. 68), have been accurately described by Strabo (xiii, 429). A great number and variety of sepulchers are found in the approaches to the site, which on one side is sufficiently defended by the precipices overlooking the valleys of the Lycus and Mesander, while on the other sides the town walls are still observable.

The most clearly marked and of the ancient importance of the place. The main street can still be traced in its whole extent, and is bordered by the remains of three Christian churches, one of which is upwards of 300 feet long. About the middle of this street, just above the mineral springs, Poecike, in 1741, thought that he distinguished some remains of the Temple of Apollo, which, according to Damascius, quoted by Pho-tius (Biblio. p. 1054), was in this situation. But the principal ruins are a theatre and gymnasium, both in a state of uncommon preservation; the former 346 feet in diameter, the latter nearly filling a space 1000 square yards. Strabo (loc. cit.) and Pliny (Hist. Nat. v, 29) mention a cave called the Plutonium, filled with pestilential vapors, similar to the celebrated Grotto del Cane in Italy. High up the mountain-side is a deep recess far into the mountain; and Mr. Arundell says that he should have supposed that the mephitic cavern lay in this recess, if Mr.
Cockerell had not found it near the theatre, the position anciently assigned to it; and he conjectures that it may be the same in which Chandler distinguished the area of a stadium (Arnold, Asia Minor, ii, 210). The same writer gives, from the Orient Christianus, a list of the bishops of Hierapolis down to the time of the emperor Isaac Angelus. (See Col. Leake's Geogr. of Asia Mi-or, p. 252, 253; Hamilton's Res. in Asia Minor, i, 514, 517 sq.; Fellows, Lyc. p. 270; Asia Minor, p. 283 sq.; Crane's Asia Minor, p. 37.)

Apolinaris, bishop of the see, and 26 other bishops, odotus.—Landon, Man. of Councils, p. 265.

Hierarch, (ἱεραρχ, from ἱερός, sacred, and ἅρχος, ruler), a term used to denote, in churches in which the whole ruling power is held by the priesthood, a sacred principality instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ in Coin of Hierapolis.
his Church, and consisting of orders of consecrated persons, with gradations of rank and power, who constitute exclusively the governing and ministering body in the Church. It implies the transmission, under what is called the Apostolical Succession [see Succession], of the doctrine, the ethics, the faith by the Church, and of the traditions, by Christ to his apostles; and thus the hierarchy, as a corporation, perpetuates itself. The hierarchy on earth is supposed to correspond with the hierarchy of "angels and archangels, and all the hosts" of heaven, with the Virgin Mary at their head. The Christian hierarchy, again, is supposed to correspond to the Jewish institution of the high priest. See Church. The notion of a "continuity of plan running on from the Jewish hierarchical system into the Christian, i.e. the Romish spiritual monarchy, is an ideal analogy which has captivated many an ardent imagination, from Cyprian down to Manning and Newman. For an exposure of its fallacy, see Taylor, Ancient Christianity (London, 1844, 2 vols. 8vo), ii, 409.

1. Roman Catholic.—According to the Roman Catholic theory, the hierarchy is divinely ordained, and was established in the Church by Christ, who gave the primacy of authority to Peter, and instituted in subordination to him the other apostles and bishops, priests, and deacons. The primacy of Peter is perpetuated in the popes, from whom bishops hold their authority to govern their dioceses, and to ordain priests and deacons. This monarchical-hierarchical system grew up gradually in the course of the first five centuries of the Christian church, on the part of the bishops of Rome in succeeding centuries. In the Greek Church the hierarchy is oligarchical, not monarchical, no patriarch having supreme authority over all other prelates (see Schaaff, in Brit. and Foreign Evangelical Review, Oct. 1865 and Jan. 1866). The Roman hierarchy is divided into the hierarchy of orders and the hierarchy of jurisdiction. The hierarchy of orders, again, includes the hierarchy by divine right (juris divini) and the hierarchy by ecclesiastical right (juris ecclesiastic).

(1) Hierarchy of Orders.—(1) The hierarchy juris divini includes: 1. Bishops (sacerdotes primiti ordinis, episcopi et principes omnium), who are successors of the apostles, and by whom alone, through ordination, the ministry of Christ is preserved among men. As to order, the bishops are only a fuller form of the order of priests, with governing and ordaining power superadded. Some Roman Catholics hold that bishops have the authority, by divine right immediately, others (these are now the majority) that they have it mediately through the pope. See Episcopacy. 2. Priests (presbyters), who receive from the bishop, by ordination, the power to administer the sacraments, to preach the word of God, to administer the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, and to absolve penitents from their sins. The place in which they shall exercise these functions is not optional with themselves, but depends entirely upon the will of the bishop. 3. Deacons, who serve as helpers to bishops and priests in the administration of the sacraments, and in the pastoral care of the sick and poor.

(2) The hierarchy of ecclesiastical right includes the minor orders of subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, lectores, and doorkeepers, being all extensions of the diaconate downwards, so to speak.

2. Jurisdiction.—This embraces the manifold "principalities and powers" which have been constituted in the Church in the course of her progress towards universal dominion. It includes archdeacons, archpriests, deans, vicars, inferior prelates, and cardinals. In the order of bishops, again, there are archbishops, metropolitan, exarchs, and patriarchs. The pope is at the head of all, the bearer of all the functions of every office, and the source of authority for each. See Papal System. The Roman hierarchy is a vast political-eclesiastical corporation, with the pope at its head, claiming universal dominion over all men, and over all governments. See Curia Romana; Popes. It is a great power, more important, as De Maistre, one of the greatest modern Roman writers remarks, than sound doctrina, inasmuch as it "is more indispensable to the preservation of the faith" (Lettres, ii, 285). This idea of a hierarchy with a universal dominion, and with an infallible head, constituting a visible prinicpality on earth, and of the hierarchy being held by Christ to have the institution of the twelve princes of tribes and the seventy elders, who, with Moses, governed God's ancient people, in order to show that his Church is the true spiritual Israel of God. St. Paul gave authority to Timothy and Titus to constitute authorities in the churches. This hierarchy is divided into dioceses, each with a number of priests and deacons under one head, the bishop, to regulate the faith and manners of the people, and to minister to them in God's name. The hierarchy embraces the power of jurisdiction and of order, considered as a principality. The hierarchy of order was established to sanctify the Body of Christ, and is composed of all persons in orders. The hierarchy of jurisdiction was established for the government of the faithful, and to promote their eternal holiness, and is composed of prelates. The hierarchy of order by ministration of the sacraments and preaching, and the hierarchy of jurisdiction, in this case the spiritual life; the hierarchy of jurisdiction is for the promotion of exterior discipline. The hierarchy of order confers no jurisdiction, but simply power to perform ecclesiastical functions and administer sacraments, whereas the hierarchy of jurisdiction, in order to preserve the spiritual life, confers the power of making ordinances concerning the faith and ecclesiastical discipline, and to correct offenders. The principal duty of ministers of the Church is to lead men to the knowledge and worship of God, and the Church therefore requires laws and rules for the guidance of its ministers. The hierarchy of order, that is, the ministration of the Word and sacraments, appertains to all clergy according to the measure of their power; the hierarchy of jurisdiction, which is, in fact, the hierarchy, being the chief power of the Church, pertains to prelates alone, but cannot exist without the other hierarchy for the purpose of discipline. The latter can be wielded only by the former, which it presupposes, and is its foundation. In the one the clerical character or order, i.e. the ecclesiastical office, only is regarded; in the other the degree, the rank in jurisdiction of a prelate, is alone considered. Both have one origin and one object, and both flow from the clerical character; but order is the condition of jurisdiction, and jurisdiction the condition of ecclesiastical necessity, with its differences of chief bishops, prelacies, and ranks of ministers. The Protestant Episcopal Church retains the hierarchy of order, viz. bishops, priests, and deacons, together with the claim of apostolic succession and jurisdiction over all subjects; but the power of jurisdiction is divided with the laity, who are represented in the highest judicature, the General Convention, and in Hierax or Hieraclus, an Egyptian ascetic philosopher, native of Leontus or Leontopolis, classed among the heretics of the 3d century. Epiphanius, Photius, and Peter of Sicily considered him a Manichean. He was, at all events, a perfectly original phenomenon. He distinguished for his varied learning, allegorical exegesis, poetical talent, and still more for his eccentric asceticism. He taught that, as the business of Christ on earth was to proclaim a new law, more perfect and strict than that of Moses, he prohibited the use of wine, flesh, marriage, and whatsoever was pleasing to the senses. Hierax denied the historical reality of the fall and the resurrection of the body; excluded children dying before years of discretion from the kingdom of heaven; distinguished the substance of the Son from that of the Father, taught that the Multiform Holy Ghost; obscured the sacred volume with allegorical interpretations; and maintained that paradise was only the joy and satisfaction of the mind. His followers were sometimes called Abetines, because of their scrupulously abstaining from the use of wine and certain meats. He wrote some commentaries on Scripture, and hymns, which are only known by quotations in Epiphanius. See Labride, Works, iii, 253; Mosheim, Comm. ii, 404; Neander, Church History, i, 718; Schaff, History of the Christian Church, p. 510; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv, 417.

Hier'moth (ἱερόμοθ), given (1 Esdr. ix, 21) as the name of one of the "sons of Emmer," who divorced their brethren wives after the Captivity; evidently the Jēmā (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Ezra x, 21).

Hier'mōn (ἱερόμον), the name of two men in the Apocrypha.

1. A "son of Ela," who divorced his Gentile wife after the Captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 27); the Jeremmoth (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Ezra x, 26).

2. One who did not do the same (1 Esdr. x, 30); the Rammoth (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Ezra x, 29).

Hier'īs (ἱερίς) v. g. Iɛrǐs (ἱερίς), another of the "sons of Ela," who in like manner divorced his wife (1 Esdr. ix, 27); the Jerihel (q. v.) of Ezra x, 26.

Hier'ma'c (ἱερίμας), one of the "sons of Phoros" who did the same (1 Esdr. x, 26); the Ramiah (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Ezra x, 25).

Hierocles, governor of Bithynia, and afterwards of Alexandria (A.D. 306), is said by Lactantius (Inst. Divin. v. 2; De Mort. Pers. c. 17) to have been the principal author of the Arian or Monarchian heresy of the emperor Diocletian (A.D. 302). He also wrote two books against Christianity, entitled Λόγοι σαμαριτάων (Truth-loving Words to the Samaritans), which, like Porphyry's (q. v.) work, have been destroyed by the mistaken zeal of the later emperors, and are known to us only by the replies of Venantius of Cesarea. In these, according to Lactantius, he endeavored to show that the sacred Scriptures overthrew themselves by the contradictions with which they abound; he particularly insisted upon several texts as inconsistent with each other; and indeed so many, and so distinctly, that one might suspect he had some time professed the religion which he now attempted to expose. He chiefly reviled Paul and Peter, and the other disciples, as propagators of falsehood. He said that Christ was banished by the Jews, and after that got together 900 men, and committed robbery. He endeavored to overthrow Christ's miracles, though he did not deny the truth of them, and aimed to show that like things, or even greater, had been done by Apollonius of Tyana" (Inst. Divin. v. 3, 3). Eusebius's treatise above referred to is "Against Hierocles;" in it he reviews the Life of Apollonius written by Philostatius (published by Wiggers, with Lat. notes, by Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graeca, i, 792; Cave, Hist. Lat. anno 306; English Cyclopedia; Farrar, History of Free Thought, p. 62, 64; Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 173; Schaff, Ch. Hierocles, a Neo-Platonist of the 5th century at Alexandria. He is said to be the author of a Commentary upon the Golden Verses of Pythagoras, which is still extant; and also a Discourse on Foreknowledge and Fate, of which Photius has preserved large extracts. Stobeus has also preserved the fragments of several other works which are ascribed to Hierocles. The Greek text of the Commentary on the Golden Verses of Pythagoras was first published by Martyr of Tours, (Paris, 1551; reprinted at London, 1654; also 1742; and Padua, 1744). The fragments of the Discourse on Foreknowledge and Fate, in which Hierocles attempts to reconcile the free-will of man with the foreknowledge of God, have been edited by Morel (Paris, 1695, 1697), and by Pearson (London, 1655, 1678); the latter edited and collected the fragments of the other works of Hierocles. A complete edition of his works was published by Needham (Cambridge, 1709). Both Pearson and Needham confound this Hierocles with Hierocles, the prefect of Bithynia. The Discourse on Foreknowledge and Fate was translated into French by Regnault (Lyons, 1650). Grotius translated part of this work into Latin in his Sententiae Philosophorum de Fato (Paris, 1624; Ams. 1648; reprinted in the third volume of his theological works, 1679). The Commentary on the Golden Verses has been translated into English by Hall, London, 1657; Nott, London, 1659; Regnauer, Norw. 1747; and into French (with life) by Dacier, Paris, 1706. See English Cyclopedia, s. v.; Smith, Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, ii, 453; Augusti, Dogmengeschichte, 1 and 2; Lardner, Works, vii, 127.

Hieroglyphics (from ἱερός, sacred, and γλῶσσα, to carve), the term usually applied to the inscriptions in the so-called sacred or symbolic characters on the Egyptian monuments. See Egypt. "They were either engraved in black ink on the stone monuments, or painted in bright colors on the walls of tombs and temples, or written in hieratic in brief ligatures and hard materials suited for the glyptic art, or else traced in outline with a reed pen on papyrus, wood, slices of stone, and other objects. The scribe, indeed, wrote from a palette or canons called pens, with pens, koul, from two little ink-holes in the palette, containing a black ink of animal charcoal, and a red mineral ink. The hieroglyphics on the monuments are sometimes sculptured and plain; at others, decorated with colors, either one simple tone for all the hieroglyphs, which are then called monochrome, or else ornamented with a variety of colors, and then called polychrome; and those painted on canvas were painted with different objects; and in that are written out, and then colored in detail. On the papyri and some few inferior materials they are simply sketched in outline, and are called linear hieroglyphs. The hieroglyphics are arranged in perpendicular columns, separated by lines, or in horizontal, or diagonal manners; are separated in the direction of the figures to which they are attached. When thus arranged, the reliefs and hieroglyphs resemble a MS, every letter of which should also be an illumination, and they produce a gay and agreeable impression on the spectator. They are written very square, the spaces are neatly and carefully packed, so as to leave no naked appearance of background.

"The invention of hieroglyphs, called Neter kharu, or 'divine words,' was attributed to the god Thoth, the Egyptian Logos, who is repeatedly called the scribe of the gods and lord of the hieroglyphs. Attributing their invention to Menes. The literature of the Egyptians was in fact called Hermaic or Hermetic, on account of its supposed divine origin, and the knowledge of hieroglyphs was, to a certain extent, a mystery to the uninitiated, although universally employed by the sacred and instructed classes. To foreign nations, the hieroglyphs always remained so, although Moses is supposed to have been versed in the knowledge of them (Philo, vita Mosis); but Joseph is described (Gen. xiii, 25) as conversing with his brethren through interpreters, and does not appear to allude to hieroglyphic writing. The Greeks, who had settled on the coast as early as the 6th century B.C., do not appear to have possessed more than a colloquial knowledge of the language (Diod. Sic. lxxxii, 3, 4); and although Solon, B.C. 538, is said to have studied Egyptian doctrines at Sebennytus and Heliopolis, and the doctrines of Pythagoras are said to have been derived from Egypt, these assertions could only have acquired their knowledge from interpretations of hieroglyphic writings. Hecataeus (B.C. 521) and Herodotus (B.C. 466), who visited Egypt in their travels, obtained from similar sources the information they have afforded of the language or monuments of the country (Herod. ii, 47; Diod. Sic., v, 69). Demetrius of Abonothus, about the same period (B.C. 450), had described both the Egyptian hieroglyphs and the Babylonian cuneiform, but his work has disappeared. After the conquest of Egypt by Alexander, the Greek rulers began to pay attention to the language and history of their subjects, and Eratosthenes, the keeper of the museum at Alexandria, and Manetho, the high-priest of Sebennytus, had drawn up accounts of the national chronology and history from hieroglyphic sources. Under the Roman empire, in the reign of Augustus, one Charemmon, the keeper of the library at the Serapeum, had drawn up a dictionary of the hieroglyphs; and both Diodorus and Strabo mention them, and describe their nature. Tacitus, later under the empire, gives the account of the monuments of Thebes translated by the Egyptian priests to Germanicus; but after his time, the knowledge of them beyond Egypt itself seems to have been limited, and does not reappear till the third and subsequent centuries A.D., when they are mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus, who cites the translation of one of the obelisks at Rome by one Hermapias, and by Julius Valerius, the author of the apocryphal life of Alexander, who gives that of another. Herodotus, a novelist who sketched A.D. 400, described a hieroglyphic letter written by queen Candace (iv, 8). The first positive information on the subject is by Clem. of Alexandria (A.D. 211), who mentions the symbolic and phonetic, or, as he calls it, cyriologic nature of hieroglyphs (Strom. v). Porphyry (A.D. 304) divides them also into enigmatic or phonetic, and enigmatic or symbolic. Horapollo or Horus-Apollus, who is supposed to have flourished about A.D. 500, wrote two books explanatory of the hieroglyphics, a rude, ill-assorted confusion of truth and fiction, in which are given the interpretation of many hieroglyphs, and their esoteric meaning. After this writer, all knowledge of them disappeared till the revival of letters. At the beginning of the 16th century these symbols first attracted attention, and, soon after, Kircher, a learned Jesuit, pretended to interpret them by vague esoteric notions derived from his own fancy, the supposition that the hieroglyphs were ideographie, a theory which barred all progress, and was held in its full extent by the learned, till Zoega, at the close of the 18th century (De Origine Orientalorum, fol. Rom. 1717), first enunciated that the duals or cartouches contained royal names, and that the hieroglyphs, or some of them, were used to express sounds" (Chambers, Cyclopedia).
The figure following them: besides these there is nothing to mark the difference between a letter and a pictorial symbol. In some words the meaning is expressed twice; once by a phonetic combination, and again by a pictorial symbol; in others the more important part is symbolical, and the grammatical termination is spelled. Sometimes also we find a species of abbreviation; thus the word ox would be expressed by the first letter of the Coptic word signifying ox.

"But for the purpose of writing, strictly so called, there was a less ornamental and more rapid way of forming the characters, which is always found in the MSS, and which would be the natural consequence of using the pen or stylus. This is called by Strabo and Pliny hieratic writing, the hieroglyphics being, as the name imports, peculiar to sculpture. It is chiefly by means of the hieroglyphics that we are enabled to read the hieratic writing, the latter being, for the most part, an abbreviated form of the writing the former. The Rosetta stone contained the inscription in yet another set of characters, the demotic or enchiorial. It is to Dr. Young that we owe the greater part of our knowledge on this subject. He was greatly assisted by the discovery of two or three papyri written in this character with Greek transliterations, the date of which dates in the reign of Psammetichus, about B.C. 650. An alphabet has been formed from Greek proper names, from which it appears that the few words which we can decipher are Coptic. In this writing the hieroglyphics have almost wholly disappeared, though some still appear scattered here and there."

A popular account of the mode in which the Rosetta stone was used as a key for deciphering the hieroglyphics may be found in Dr. Hawkes’s Egypt and its Monuments (N. Y. 1856, 8vo), and a more critical statement in Osburn’s Monumental History of Egypt (London, 1854, 2 vols. 8vo). A complete set of the cartouches of the kings is given by Poole in his Hora Egyptiace (London, 1851, 8vo). Great progress has been made in the decipherment of these records, another stone having quite recently been discovered with a bilingual inscription (Lepsius, Das bilinge. Decret rogo. Kempten, texts and interlinear translation, etc., Berl. 1867 sq., 4to), and many papyri having been brought to light and read by European Egyptologists, among whom Wilkinson, Lepsius, Dümichen, and Brugsch may be especially named. The annexed view of the hieroglyphical alphabet is taken from Gildon’s Lectures on Egyptian History (N. Y. 1843, imp. 8vo), and will be found sufficient for deciphering most of the royal names. A brief account of the language which these characters represent may be found in Rawlinson’s Herodotus, vol. ii. A tolerably complete view of the subject and its literature is contained in Appleton’s New Americans Cyclopædia, s.v. The following are some of the latest works of importance on the subject: Sharpe, Egyptian Hieroglyphics (Lond., 1861, 8vo); Parrot, Nouvelle Traduction des Hieroglyphes (Paris, 1857, fol.); Tattam, Grammar of the Egyptian Language (London, 1865, 8vo); Brugsch, Hieroglyphisches-Demotsches Wörterbuch (of an extensive character, with a full hieroglyphical grammar, Leipzig, 1867 sq.). Hieromax, a river of Palestine (Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 16), the Jaroom of the Tal-mud; now Nahar Yarmuk (Edrisi and Abulfeda), or Sherkat el-Manhur (Ritter, xv, 372). The principal sources are near Mazzeh, where they form a lake of half an hour in circumference.—Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 321.

Hieronymémon (Gr. ἤιερωμώμος). I. The title in ancient history of that one of the two deputies sent by each tribe to the Amphictyonic Council who superintended the religious rites. II. An officer in the Greek Church, who, during service, stands behind the bishop, and points out to him in order the psalms, prayers, etc. He also dresses the patriarchs, and shows the priests to their places.—Pierer, viii. 968. Brande, ii. 124. (J. W. M.)

Hieron, Samuel, a clergyman of the Church of England, somewhat inclined to Puritanism, was born in 1572, was educated at King’s College, Cambridge, and was presented to the living of Modbury, Devonshire, which he held till his death in 1617. He was very eloquent as well as pious. His sermons, in two volumes, were published in 1635.—Darling, Cyclopedia. Biog. i, 1470.

Hieronymites, or Eremites of the Order of Jerome, a monkish order which was first established about 1370 by the Portuguese Vasco and the Spaniard Peter Fred. Pech, and was accredited by Gregory XI in 1374. Their dress is a white habit and a black scapulary. In Spain and the Netherlands this order became very popular, being possessed of many convents; Charles V belonged to this order after his abdication. They spread also into the West Indies and Spanish America. At present they exist only in the latter country. Besides these, there exists also another order by the same name, with, however, but few members, founded by Peter Gam- bacorti, of Pisa, about 1380.—Helyot, Ord. Monast. ed. Migne, iii, 568; Brockhaus, Encyclop. viii, 916. (J.H.W.)

Hieronymus (Ἱερώνυμος, sacred in name, Vulg. Hieronymus), a Syrian general in the time of Antiochus V. Eupator (2 Mac. xii, 9). The name is made distinguishing honor among the Asiatic Greeks by Hieronymus of Cardia, the historian of Alexander's successors.—Smith.

Hierophant or Mystagōgus (Γ. ἱεροφάντης, σωτηρικός). I. The high-priest of Demeter who conducted the celebration of the Eleusinian Mysteries and initiated the candidates, being always one of the Eumolpidæ, and a citizen of Athens. The office was for life, and regarded of high religious importance, and the hierophant was required to be of mature age, to be without physical defects, to possess a fine, sonorous voice suited to the character and dignity of the office, and was forbidden to marry, though that prohibition may have been only to contracting marriage after his in- stallation. He was distinguished by a peculiar cut of his hair, by the strophion, a sort of diadem, and by a long purple robe. In the Mysteries he represented the Demiurge or World-creator, was the only authorized custodian of the secrets of the mysteries, (hence also styled ἱεροφάντης), and the utterance of his name in the presence of the initiated was forbidden. II. The name is also given in the Greek Church to the prior of a monastery.—Chambers, s. v.; Pierer, viii, 570; Smith, Dict. of Grk. and Rom. Antiq. s. v. Eumolpidæ; Brande, Dict. iii, 125. Higden, Ranulph or Ralph, an English writer of the 14th century, was a Benedictine monk of the monastery of St. Werberg, in Cheshire, who died at a very advanced age in 1367 according to Bale, or in 1375 according to Pits. His Polychronicon, a chronicle of events from the Creation to A.D. 1337, was written originally in Latin, and translated into English in 1387 by John of Trevisa. From this translation Caxton made his version, and, continuing in an eighth book the Chronicle to 1460, published the whole under the title of The Polychronicon, containing the Historie and Doles of all Fyft and Sixth Books, etc. (Caxon.) Trevis- a's translation "contains many rare words and expressions, and is one of the earliest specimens of English prose." The first volume of a new edition (containing also a translation by an unknown writer of the 16th century), edited by C. Babinson, B.D., appeared in 1855. The Polychronicon is frequently cited by Eng- lish historians. Bale published the part relating to the Britons and Saxons in his Scriptores Quindecinem, etc. (Oxford, 1691). Some have assigned the authorship of the Chester Mysteries (1882) to Higden, but on doubtful grounds. Bale, Illust. Maij. Brit. Scriptum, s. v., Pits De illust. Ang. Script., Hoefer, Nov. Bibl. Higgain (Heb. הִגְגַיָּן, ἡγών) occurs in Ps. xxi, 8, where, according to Gesenius, it signifies the murmuring (Furst, low or solemn) tone of the harp, Sept. μῦτρα ὑγιάν κατὰ παθήσειν. In Psa. ixx, 17, Higgain Selah is a musical sign, prob. for a pause in the instrumental interlude, Sept. μῦτρα διὰ φαλάγματος; and so Symm. Aquil. and Vulg. See SELAH. In Psa. xix, 16 the term signifies the meditative, in medit. in the Psalms, the voice. "Mendelssohn translates it meditation, thought, idea. Knapp (Die Psalmen) identifies it in Psa. ix, 17 with the Arabic خليل, 'to mock,' and hence his rendering 'What a shout of laughter!' (because the wicked are entrapped in their own snares); but in Psa. xxii, 4 he translates it by 'Lieder' (songs). K. David Kimchi likewise divides it into two separate parts, in Lam. 2: 14, 15 he renders it to the word; on Psa. ix, 17, he says, 'This aid is for us (a subject of) meditation and thankfulness,' while in his comment on the passage, Psa. xxi, 4, he gives it to the same word the signification of melody. 'This is the melody of the hymn when it is recited (played) on the harp. 'We will meditate on this forever' (Rashi, Com- ment. on Psa. ix, 17). In Psa. ix, 17, Aben Ezra's comment on 'Higgain Selah' is, 'this will I record in truth;' on Psa. xxii, 4 he says, 'Higgain means the melody of the hymn, or it is the name of a musical instru- ment. We will meditate on them, then, that we may not be ashamed.' Selah's meanings, one of a general character implying thought, reflection, from ד novità, comp. בּוֹדֵי, Psa. ixx, 17, and דֶּרְשָׁא (Lam. iii, 62), and another in Psa. ix, 17, and Psa. xxii, 4, of a technical nature, bearing on the import of musical sounds or signs well known in the age of David, but the precise meaning of which cannot at this distance of time be determined." See Psalms.

Higginson, Solomon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maryland in January, 1799. In his twenty- second year he began to preach, but failing health compelled him to quit the ministry, and for several years he was employed as a clerk in Philadelphia. In 1821 he resumed his pastoral connections, and the remainder of his life was spent in the service of the Church as past- or and as Sunday-school agent. He was several times stationed in Philadelphia, and was a member of the General Conferences of 1828, 1832, 1836, and 1840. He died Feb. 12, 1867.—Minutes of Conferences, 1867, p. 24.

Higginson, Francis, a Congregational minister and first pastor of Salem, Mass., was born in England in 1687, graduated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, and served as a minister of a church in Massachusetts. After some time he became a nonconformist, and was excluded from the parish church. In 1629 he received letters from the governor and company of Massachusetts invit- ing him to proceed with them to New England. He accordingly sailed, and on his arrival at Salem he was appointed pastor of the church. He died of hectic fever in August, 1630. He wrote New England's Plantation, or a short and true Description of the Commodities and Dis- commodities of that Country (London, 1630, 4to). See Allen, Am. Biog. Dictionary; Sprague, Annals, i, 6.

Higginson, John, son of the preceding, was born in England in August, 1626, came to Massachusetts with his father in 1629. In 1636 he removed to Con- necticut, engaging in teaching and in theological stud- ies. From 1659 until his death in 1708 he was minister of the church at Salem, Mass. He was zealously en- gaged in controversy with the Quakers, but subsequ- ently regretted his ardor in persecution. He published several sermons and pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals, i, 91.

High-Churchmen, a name first given (circa 1700) to the nonjurors in England who refused to acknowl- edge William III as their lawful king. It is now usu- ally applied to those in the Church of England and in the American Protestant Episcopal Church who hold exalted notions of Church prerogatives, and of the powers committed to the clergy, and who lay much stress upon ritual observances and the traditions of the fa-

HIGH MASS. The Mass in the Church of Rome consists in the “consecration of the bread and wine ‘into the body and blood of Christ,’ as they say, and the offering up of the same body and blood to God by the ministery of the priest for a perpetual memorial of Christ’s sacrifice upon the cross, and a continuation of the same unto the world’s end.” HIGH MASS is the same service, accompanied by all the ceremonies which custom and authority have annexed to its celebration, and read before Sundays, fast-days, and particular occasions. See Mass.

HIGH PLACE (אהל, baḥē; often in the plural, āḥel): Sept. in the historical books, וֶהָלָה, וֶהָלָהָ; in the Prophets, בֵּיתוֹ; in the Pentateuch, שֵׁלִית, Lev. xxvi, 30, etc.; and once around, Ezek. xvii, 16; Vulg. erexit, fissa often occurs in connection with the term grove. By “high places” we understand natural or artificial (הַרְכָּס, 1 Kings xiii, 22; 2 Kings xiv, 29; comp. 1 Kings xi, 7; 2 Kings xxiii, 10) emi-ences where worship by sacrifice or offering was made, usually upon an altar erected thereon; and by a “grove” we understand a planting of trees around a spot in the open air set apart for worship and other sacred services, and therefore around or upon the “high places” which were set apart for the same purposes. See Grove.

We find the use of these cures so soon after the delutage that it is probable they existed prior to that event. It appears that the first altar after the deluge was built by Noah upon the mountain on which the ark rested (Gen. viii, 20). Abraham, on entering the Promised Land, built an altar upon a mountain between Bethel and Ephraim (Gen. xii, 7), and called there upon the name of the everlasting God (Gen. xxv, 3). The same patriarch was required to travel to the Mount Moriah, and there to offer up his son Isaac (xxvii, 2, 4). It was upon a mountain in Gil-

The external religion of the patriarchs was in some outward observances different from that subsequently established by the Mosaic law, and therefore they should not be condemned for actions which afterwards became sinful because they were forbidden (Heidegger, Hist. Patr. ii, ii, 5 sq.). It is, however, quite obvious that if every grove and eminence had been suffered to ites; and their inordinate attachment to this mode of worship was such that even pious kings, who opposed idolatry by all the means in their power, dared not abol-become a place for legitimate worship, especially in a country where they had already been defiled with the sins of polytheism, the utmost danger would have resulted to the pure worship of the one true God (Havernick, Einl. i, 592). It would infallibly have led to the adoption of nature-goddesses and “gods of the hills” (1 Kings xx, 25, 26; 2 Kings iv, 25, 26; xiii, 16-23), and it is quite clear from the tone of the book of Judges that the law on the subject was either totally forgotten or practically obsolete. Nor could the unsettled state of the country have been put as an excuse for the ordinary to have been most fully understood, even during the life of Joshua, that burnt-offerings could be legally offeted on one altar only (Josh. xxiii, 29). It is more surprising to find this law absolutely ignored at a much later period, when there was no intelligible reason for its violation—as by Samuel at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii, 10) and at Bethelthem (xvi, 5); by Saul at Gilgal (xiii, 9) and at Ajalon (7 xiv, 35); by David at the threshing floor of Ornan (1 Chron. ii, 26); and by David on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xvii, 30); and by other prophets (1 Sam. x, 5). It will, however, be observed that in these cases the parties either acted under an immediate command from God, or were invested with a general commission to offer sacrifice with reference to such transactions. It has also been suggested that greater latitude was allowed in this point before the erection of the Temple gave to the ritual principles of the ceremonial law a fixity which they had not previously possessed. This is possible, for it is certain that all the authorized examples occur before it was built, excepting that of Elijah; and that occurred under circumstances in which the sacrifices could not possibly have taken place at Jerusalem, and in a kingdom where no authorized altar to Jehovah then existed. The Rabbins have invented elaborate methods to account for the anomaly: thus they say there were two separate altars until the building of the tabernacle; that they were then illegal until the arrival of Gilgal, and then during the period while the tabernacle was at Shiloh; that they were once more permitted while it was at Nob and Gibeon (compare 2 Chron. i, 9), until the building of the Temple at Jerusalem (8, ii. 3); and that the altar at Shiloh was at length suppressed (Abarbanel, etc., quoted in Carpzov, App. Crit. p. 383 sq.; Reland, Ant. Heb., i, 8 sq.). Others content themselves with saying that until Solomon's time all Palestine was considered holy ground, or that there had existed a recognized exemption in favor of high places, private or public, sanctioned by the people, and spontaneous, though not for the stated and public sacrifices. Such explanations are sufficiently unsatisfactory; but it is at any rate certain that, whether from the obvious temptations to disobedience, or from the example of other nations, or from the ignorance of any definite law against it, the worship in high places was organized and all but universal throughout Judea, not only during (1 Kings iii, 2-4), but even after the time of Solomon. The convenience of the temple was evident, because, as local centres of religious worship, they obeyed the unpleasant and dangerous necessity of visiting Jerusalem for the celebration of the yearly feasts (2 Kings xxviii, 9). The tendency was engrained in the national mind; and, although it was severely repressed by the later historians, we have no proof that it was known to be sinful during the earlier periods of the monarchy, except, of course, of those which were directly connected with idolatrous abominations (1 Kings xi, 7; 2 Kings xxiii, 13). In fact, the high places seem to have supplied the need of synagogues (Psa. lxxiv, 8), and have obeyed the extreme self-denial involved in having but one legalized locality for the highest forms of worship. Thus we find that Jehoaba established a definite worship at the high places, with its own peculiar and separate priesthood (2 Chron. xi, 15; 2 Kings xxiii, 9), the members of which were still considered to be priests of Jehovah (although in 2 Kings xxiii, 5 they are called by the opprobrious term ἐπάργυρος). It was therefore no wonder that Jeroboam found it so easy to seduce the people into his symbolic worship at the high places of Dan and Bethel, at each of which he built a calf and set up altars. Such chapels were, of course, frequently added to the mere altars on the hills, as appears from the expressions in 1 Kings xi, 7; 2 Kings xxii, 9, etc. Indeed, the word ἐπάργυρος became so common that it was used for any idolatrous shrine even in a valley (Jer. vii, 31), or in the streets of cities (2 Kings xvii, 9; Ezek. xvi, 31). These chapels were probably not structures of stone, but mere enclosures hung with colored tassels (Ezek. xvi, 16; Aqu. Theod. ἤμβαλενα; see Jer. ad loc.; Sept. δέωνων ματάτων), like the σκεφν ιεροί of the Carthaginians (Diol. Sic. xx, 65; Creuzer, Symbol. v, 176), and like those mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii, 7; Amos v, 26. Many of the pious kings of Judah were either too weak or too ill-informed to repress the worship of Jehovah at these local sanctuaries, while they of course endeavored to provide a very severe punishment to those who profaned the high places. It is therefore appended as a matter of blame or a (perhaps venial) drawback to the character of some of the most pious princes, that they tolerated this disobedience to the provisions of Deuteronomy and Leviticus. On the other hand, it is mentioned as an aggravation of the sin of the people in the second coming of the Messiah (compare the places (2 Chron. xxii, 11; xxviii, 25), which are generally said to have been dedicated to idolatrous purposes. It is almost inconceivable that so direct a violation of the theocratic principle as the public existence of false worship should have been tolerated by kings of even ordinary piety, much less by the highest religious authorities (2 Kings xii, 3). When, therefore, we find the recurring phrase, "Only the high places were not taken away; as the people did sacrifice and burn incense on the high places" (2 Kings xiv, 4; xv, 5, 55; 2 Chron. xiv, 17, etc.), we are forced to limit it (as above) to private and not to public altars. However, it is made more difficult by a seeming discrepancy, for the assertion that Asa "took away the high places" (2 Chron. xiv, 3) is opposite to what is stated in the first book of Kings (xxv, 14), and a similar discrepancy is found in 2 Chron. xiv, 13 (xxv, 17; xx, 33). Moreover, in both instances the chronicle is apparently at issue with himself (xiv, 3; xv, 17; xvii, 6; xx, 33). It is incredible that this should have been the result of carelessness or oversight, and we must therefore suppose, either that the earlier notices express the presence of altars of private or public use, of which the latter ones recorded their failure in the attempt (Ewald, Gesch. iii, 468; Keil, Apolog. Versuch. p. 290), or that the statements refer respectively to Banomoth dedicated to Jehovah and to idols (Michaelis, Schulz, Bertheau on 2 Chron. xvii, 6, etc.). "Those devoted to false gods were removed, those misdoubted to the true God were suffered to remain. The kings opposed impiety, but winked at error" (bishop Hall). At last Hezekiah set himself in good earnest to the suppression of this prevalent corruption (2 Kings xviii, 4, 22), both in Judah and Israel (2 Chron. xxix, 1); and he ordered the destruction of all the evil, that even his sweeping reformation required to be finally consummated by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii), and that, too, in Jerusalem and its immediate neighborhood (2 Chron. xxxiv, 3). The measure must have been attended with the destruction of a large number of people, and we have a curious and almost unnoticed trace of this resentment in the fact that Rabshakeh appeals to the discontented faction, and represents Hezekiah as a dangerous innovator who had provoked God's anger by his arbitrary impiety (2 Kings xxii, 21; 2 Chron. xxxii, 13). After the time of Josiah we find no further mention of these Jehovistic high places. As long as the nations continued to worship the heavenly bodies themselves, they worshipped in the open air, holding that no walls could contain infinitude. Afterward the symbol of fire or of the altar brought in the use of temples, they were usually built in groves and upon high places, and sometimes without roofs. The principle on which high places were preferred is said to have been that they were nearer to the gods, and that on them the priests was more apt to receive the prayers of the valley (Lucian, De S. sacr. iii, 4). See Hill. The ancient writers abound in allusions to this worship of the gods upon the hill-tops; and some of their divinities took their distinctive names from the hill on which their principal seat of worship stood, such as Mercurius Cyllenius, Venus Erycina, Jupiter Capitolinus, etc. (especially Sophocles, Trachin. 1297, 1298; Appian, De Bel. Mithrid. § 131; compare Creuzer, Symbol. i, 150).

We find that the Trojans sacrificed to Zeus on Mount Ida (Hesiod, i. 171), and we are repeatedly told that such was the custom of the Persians, Greeks, Germans, etc. (Herod. i. 131; Xen. Cyrop. vii. 7; Mem. iii. 8, § 10; Strabo, xvi. 732). To this general custom we find constant allusion in the Bible (Isa. lxv. 7; Jer. iii. 6; Ezek. vi. 13; xviii. 6; Hos. iv. 13), and it is especially attributed to the Moabites (Isa. xx. 2; xvi. 12; Jer. xlviii. 13). Evident traces of a similar usage are depicted on the Assyrian monuments. The groves which ancient usage had established around the places of sacrifice for the sake of shade and seclusion, idolatry preserved, not only for the same reasons, but because they were found convenient for the celebration of the rites and mysteries, often obscene and abominable, which were gradually superadded. According to Pliny (book xii), trees were also consecrated to particular divinities, as the eucalyptus to Jove, the laurel to Apollo, the olive to Minerva, the myrtle to Venus, the poplar to Hercules. It was also believed that as the heavens have their proper and peculiar deities, so also the woods have theirs, being the Fauns, the Sylveys, and certain goddesses. To this it may be added that groves were enjoined by the Roman law of the Twelve Tables as part of the public religion. Plutarch (Vener. i. 61) calls such groves áγαθα ἄγαλμα, "groves of the gods," which he says Numa frequented, and thereby gave rise to the story of his intercourse with the goddess Egeria. In fact, a degree of worship was, as Pliny states, transferred to the trees themselves. They were sometimes decked with ribbons and rich cloths, lamps were placed on them, the spoils of enemies were hung from them, vows were paid to them, and their branches were encumbered with votive offerings. Traces of this arborality still exist everywhere, both in Moslem and Christian countries; and even the Persians, who abhorred images as much as the Hebrews ever did, rendered homage to certain trees.

The story is well known of the noble plane-tree near Sardis, before which Xerxes halted his army a whole day while he rendered homage to it, and hung royal offerings upon its branches (Herod. vi. 31). There is much curious literature connected with this subject which we leave untouched, but the reader may consult Sir W. M. Thesiger's learned dissertation on Sacred Trees, appended to the first volume of his Travels in the East. See IDOLATRY.

Mr. Paine remarks (Solomon's Temple, etc., Bost. 1861, p. 21), "the 'high place,' מִשְׁרַד, mound, was small enough to be made and built to every street, at the head of every street (Ezek. xxiv. 24, 25), in all their cities (2 Kings xvii. 9), and upon every high hill, and under every green tree (1 Kings xiv. 25). It could be torn to pieces, by a single small as dust, and burnt up (2 Kings xxiii. 15). Thus it often was of combustible materials. But these mounds, with their altars, were built in the streets, where people could assemble around them. When on the hills out of the city they lasted many years; for the mounds built by Solomon on the right hand or south side of the Mount of Destruction before the captivity (Jer. xxvii. 7), which were destroyed by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 13, 14; 1 Kings xi. 7), nearly four hundred years after they were built. But mounds of earth no larger than Indian-corn or potato-hills will last a great number of years, and those sometimes larger for centuries (compare the Indian mounds in the West). That the mounds destroyed by Josiah had lasted so many centuries is a proof that they were not wholly of wood; that they could be burnt is a proof that they were not wholly of stone; that they could be beaten to dust indicates that they were made of anything that came readiest to hand, as earth, soil, etc. For the houses of the mounds, or high places, in which were images of their gods, see 2 Kings xvii. 29; priests of these places of worship, 1 Kings xi. 32; xii. 32; 2 Kings xvii. 32, xxiii. 3, 20; beds for fornication and adultery, in the tents about the mounds, Isa. vii. 3-7; Ezek. xvi. 16, 25, etc. Some of these houses were tents, for women wove them (2 Kings xxviii. 7). The people—men, women, children, and priests—assembled in groves, on hills and mountains, or in the streets of their cities: threw up a mound, on which they built their altar; set up the wooden idol [Asherah] before the altar; pitched their tents around it under the trees; sacrificed their sons and daughters, sometimes on the altar (Ezek. xvi. 20), and committed fornication and adultery in the tents, where also they had the images of their gods."

invention of the Rabbis. The anointing of the high-priest is alluded to in Ps. cxxxiii, 2, "It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments." The composition of this anointing oil, consisting of myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, cassaia, and other spices, is described in Exod. xxx. 34. It was used for any other purpose but that of anointing the priests, the tabernacle, and the vessels, was strictly prohibited, on pain of being "cut off from his people." The manufacture of it was intrusted to certain priests, called apothecaries (Neh. iii, 8). But this oil is said to have been sanctified to the second Temple by the Pristaeus, i.e., 151; Selden, cap. ix). See ANOINTING OIL.

2. The high-priest had a peculiar dress, which, as we have seen, passed to his successor at his death. This dress consisted of eight parts, as the Rabbis constantly note, the breastplate, the ephod with its curious girdle, the robe of the ephod, the mitre, the breasted coat or diapler tunic, and the girdle, the materials being gold, blue, red, crimson, and fine (white) linen (Exod. xxviii.). To the above are added, in ver. 42, the breeches or drawers (Lev. vii, 11) of linen; and to make up the number eight, some reckon the high-priest's mitre, or the plate (יָכִית) separately from the bonnet; while others reckon the curious girdle of the ephod separately from the ephod itself. In ver. 12, there is a peculiar arrangement of the putting on of these garments by Aaron, and the whole ceremony of his consecration and that of his sons. It there appears distinctly that, besides the girdle common to all the priests, the high-priest also wore the curious girdle of the ephod. Of these eight articles of attire, viz., the coat or tunic, the girdle, the breeches, and the bonnet or turban, קָנָּרַת, instead of the mitre, קְנָּרַת (Josephus, however, whom Bihur follows, calls the bonnets of the priests by the name of קְנָּרַת. See below), belonged to the common priests. It is well known how, in the Assyrian sculptures, the king is in like manner distinguished by the shape of his head-dress; and how in Persia none but the king wore the cedars, or erect tiara. Bihur connect also the spicery of the flamen Dialis. Josephus speaks of the robes (ינָּרָּת) of the chief priests, and the tunic and girdles of the priests, as forming part of the spoil of the Temple (War, vi, 8, 3). Aaron, and at his death Eleazar (Numb. xx, 26, 28), and their successors in the high-priesthood, were sung, i.e., invested into their office by being clad in these eight articles of dress on seven successive days. From the time of the second Temple, when the sacred oil (said to have been hid by Josiah, and lost) was wanting, this putting on of the garments was deemed the official investiture of the office. Hence the robes, which had used to be kept in one of the chambers of the Temple, and were by Hyrcanus deposited in the Baris, which he built on purpose, were kept by Herod in the same tower, which he called Antonia, so that they might be at his absolute disposal. The Romans did the same till the government of Vitellius, in the reign of Tiberius, when the ceremony of the robe was restored to the Jews (Ant. xxv., 11, 4; xxvi., 4, 8). Taking the articles of the high-priest's dress in the order in which they would naturally be put on, we have

(1) The "breeches" or "drawers, קָנָּרַת, milnesinim", of linen, covering the loins and thighs, for purposes of modesty, as all the upper garments were loose and flowing.

(2) The inner "coat," קָנָּרַת, kutto'neth, was a tunic or long shirt of linen, with a tesselated or diaper pattern, like the setting of a stone (קָנָּרַת, tashkhet), "broi-

The subjoined cut (also from Braun, p. 376) will illustrate its probable form (not different from that of the ordinary Oriental under-garment), with its sleeves and mode of fastening around the neck. See Coat.

"Brodered Coat" of Linen worn by the Priest.

(3.) The girdle, שֵׁרָן, שֵׁרָן, also of linen, was wound round the body several times from the breast downwards, and the ends hung down to the ankles. Its form and mode of wearing may be illustrated by the subjoined cuts (from Braun, p. 404). See GIRDLE.

(4.) The "robe," שֵׁרָן, שֵׁרָן, of the ephod. This was of inferior material to the ephod itself, being all of blue (ver. 31), which implied its being only of "woven work" (אֶתְנָו שֵׁרָן,.xxxix, 22). It was worn immediately under the ephod, and was longer than it, though not so long as the brodered coat or tunic (פַּרְפָּר שֵׁרָן, פַּרְפָּר,xxxix, 22). According to most statements (Bähr, Winer, Kalisch, etc.), nor do the Sept. explanation of שֵׁרָן, שֵׁרָן, and Josephus's description of it (War, v, 5, 7), seem to outweigh the reasons given by Bähr for thinking that the robe only came down to the knees, for it is highly improbable that the robe should thus have swept the ground. Neither does it seem likely that the sleeves of the tunic, of white diaper linen, were the only parts of it which were visible, in the case of the high-priest, when he wore the blue robe over it; for the blue robe had no sleeves, but only slits in the sides for the arms to come through. It had a hole for the head to pass through, with a border round it of woven work, to prevent its being rent. The skirt of this robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately. The bells were to give a sound when the high-priest went in and came out of the Holy Place. Josephus, in the Antiquities, gives no explanation of the use of the bells, but merely speaks of the studied beauty of their appearance. In his Jewish War, however, he tells us that the bells signified thunder, and the pomegranates lightning. For Philo's very curious observations, see Lightfoot's Works, ix, 25. Neither does the son of Sirach very distinctly explain it (Ecclus. xlv), who, in his description of the high-priest's attire, seems chiefly impressed with its beauty and magnificence, and says of this trimming, "He compassed him with pomegranates and with many golden bells round about, that as he went there might be a sound, and a noise made that might be heard in the Temple, for a memorial to the children of his people." Perhaps, however, he means to intimate that the use of the bells was to give notice to the people outside when the high-priest went in and came out of the sanctuary, as Whiston, Vatablus, and many others have supposed. See ROME.

(5.) The ephod, ἔφοιδα (5 En), consisted of two parts, of which one covered the back, and the other the front, i.e., the breast and upper part of the body, like the ἐσωτικα of the Greeks (see Smith, Dict. of Antiquities, s.v. Tunica). These were clasped together on the shoulder with two large onyx stones, each having engraved on it six of the names of the tribes of Israel. It was further united by a "curious girdle" of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen round the waist. Upon it was placed the breastplate of judgment, which in fact was a part of the ephod, being included in the term in such passages as 1 Sam. ii, 28; xiv, 3; xxiii, 9; and was fastened to it just above the curious girdle of the ephod. Linen ephods were also worn by other priests (1 Sam. xxii, 18), by Samuel, who was only a Levite (1 Sam. ii, 18), and by David when bringing up the ark (2 Sam. vi, 14). The expression for wearing an ephod is "girded with a linen ephod." The ephod was also frequently used in the idolatrous worship of the Israelites (see Judg. viii, 27; xvii, 5, etc.). See Ephod.

(6.) The breastplate, χειρήμα, chō'šen, or, as it is further named, verses 15, 29, 30, the breastplate of judgment, χειρήμα τῶν κρίσεων (or τῆς κρίσεως) in the Sept., only in ver. 4 πιστολήμαν. It was, like the inner curtains of the tabernacle, the vail, and the ephod, of "cunning work," ἀρχὴν συμβρατέων (Vulg. opus plumarius and arte plumariae). See Embroider. The breastplate was originally two spans long and one span broad, but when doubled it was square, the shape in which it tached to the lower corners of the plate for passing through the other two rings of the lid, and then tying to the hip-rings of the ephod, as at g, fig. 3. 2. (Deut. xxiii, 13), with the breastplate inserted, and the two straps, constituting the girdle, דַּקָּרָה, ches'abeh (left), of the ephod.

was worn. It was fastened at the top rings and by chains of weathen gold to the two onyx stones on the shoulders, and beneath with two other rings and a lace of blue to two corresponding rings in the ephod, to keep it fixed in its place, above the curious girdle. But the most remarkable and most important part of this breastplate were the twelve precious stones in four rows, three in a row, thus corresponding to the twelve tribes, and divided in the same manner as their camps were, each stone having the name of one of the children of Israel engraved upon it. Whether the order followed the ages of the sons of Israel, or, as seems most probable, the order of the encampment, may be doubted; but, unless some appropriate distinct symbolism of the different tribes be found in the names of the precious stones, the question can scarcely be decided. According to the Sept. and Josephus, and in accordance with the language of Scripture, it was the twelve stones which constituted the Urim and Thummim, nor does the notion advocated by Gesenius after Spencer and others, that these names designated two little images placed between the folds of the breastplate, seem to rest on any sufficient ground, in spite of the Egyptian analogy brought to bear upon it. For an account of the image of Thmei worn by the Egyptian judge and priest, see Mielich's note on Exod. xxviii.; Hengstenberg's Egypt and the Books of Moses; Wilkinson's Egyptians, ii, 27, etc.) Josephus's opinion, on the other hand, improved upon by the rabbins, as to the manner in which the stones gave out the oracular answer, by preternatural illumination, appears equally destitute of probability. It seems far simpler, and most in agreement with the different accounts of inquiries made by Urim and Thummim (1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18; xxviii., 2, 4, 9, 11, 12; xxviii.; 6; Judg. xx, 39; 2 Sam. v, 23, etc.), to suppose that the answer was given simply by the word of the Lord to the high-priest (comp. John xi, 51), when he had inquired of the Lord, clothed with the ephod and breastplate. Such a view agrees with the true notion of the breastplate, of which it was not the leading characteristic to be oracular (as the term λευκός supposes, and as is by many thought to be indicated by the descriptive addition "of judgment," i.e. as they understand it, "decision"), but only an incidental privilege connected with its fundamental meaning. What that meaning was we learn from Exod. xxviii., 30, where we read, "Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually." Now לַעֲדֵיהוּ is the judicial sentence by which any one is either justified or condemned. In prophetical vision, as in actual Oriental life, the sentence of justification was often expressed by the nature of the robe worn. "He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels" (Isa. lxi, 10), is a good illustration of this: comp. lxi, 3. In like manner, in Rev. iii, 5; vii, 9; xix, 14, etc., the white linen robe expresses the righteousness or justification of saints. Something of the same notion may be seen in Esth. vii, 8, 9, and on the contrary ver. 12. The addition of precious stones and costly ornaments expresses glory beyond simple justification. So, in Isr. i, 22, 3—"Thou shalt be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God." Exactly the same symbolism of glory is assigned to the precious stones in the description of the ephod in Jerusalem (Rev. xxi, 11, 12-21), a passage which ties together with singular force the arrangement of the tribes in their camps and that of the precious stones in the breastplate. But, moreover, the high-priest being a representative personage, the fortunes of the whole people would most properly be indicated in his person. A striking instance of this, in connection, too, with symbolical dress, is to be found in Zech. iii: "Now Joshua (the high-priest, ver. 1) was clothed with filthy garments and stood before the angel. And he answered and spake unto those that stood before him, saying, Take away the filthy garments from him. And unto him he said, Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment. And I said, Let them set a fair mitre (יִשָּׁרֶת) upon his head. So they set a fair mitre upon his head, and clothed him with garments." Here the priest's garments, יִשָּׁרֶת, and the mitre, expresses typify the restored righteousness of the nation. Hence it seems to be sufficiently obvious that the breastplate of righteousness or judgment, resplendent with the same precious stones which symbolize the glory of the New Jerusalem, and on which were engraved the names of the twelve tribes, worn by the high-priest, who was then said to bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart, was intended to express by symbols the acceptance of Israel grounded upon the sacrificial functions of the high-priest. The sense of the symbol is thus nearly identical with such passages as Num. xxiii, 21, and the meaning of the Urim and Thummim is explained by such expressions as יִשָּׁרֶת, יִשָּׁרֶת, and "Arise, shine; for thy light is come" (Isa. lx, 1). Thummim expresses alike complete prosperity and complete innocence, and so falls in exactly with the double notion of light (Isa. lx, 1; lxii, 1, 2). The privilege of receiving an answer from God bears the same relation to the general state of Israel symbolized by the priest's dress that the promise in Isa. liv, 18, "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord," does to the preceding description, "I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires, and I will make thy windows of agate, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones," ver. 11, 12; comp. also ver. 14 and 17 (Heb.). It is obvious to draw how entirely this view accords with the blessing of Levi in Deut. xxiii, 8, where Levi is called God's holy one, and God's Thummim and Urim are said to be given to him, because he came out of the trial so clear in his integrity. (See also Bar. v, 2.) See BREAESTPLATE.

(7.) The "bonnet," מַשְׁפָּחִי, mishpakh, was a turban of linen covering the head, but not in the particular form which that of the high-priest assumed when the mitre was added to it. See BONNET.

(8.) The last article peculiar to the high-priest is the mitre, מַשְׁפָּחִי, mishpakh, or upper turban, with its
in the vail (Lev. xvi). He is said by the Talmudists, with whom agree Lightfoot, Selden, Grocius, Winer, Bähr, and many others, not to have worn his full pontifical robes on the occasion, but to have been clad entirely in white linen (Lev. xvi, 4, 32). It is singular, however, that, on the other hand, Josephus says that the great fast-day was the chief; if not the only day in the year when the high-priest wore all his robes (War, v, 5, 7), and, in spite of the alleged impropriety of his wearing his splendid apparel on a day of humiliation, it seems far more probable that on the one occasion when he performed functions peculiar to the high-priest he should have worn his full dress. Josephus, too, could not have been mistaken as to the fact, which he repeats (cont. Ap. ii, 7), where he says the high-priests alone might enter into the Holy of Holies, "propria stola circumambiti." For although Selden, who strenuously supports the Rabbinical statement that the high-priest only wore the four linen garments when he entered the Holy of Holies, endeavors to make Josephus say the same thing, it is impossible to twist his words into this meaning. It is true, on the other hand, that Lev. xvi distinctively prescribes that Aaron should wear the four priestly garments of linen when he entered into the Holy of Holies, and put them off immediately he came out, and leave them in the Temple; no one being present in the Temple while Aaron made the atonement (verse 17). Either, therefore, in the time of Josephus this law was not kept in practice, or else we must reconcile the apparent contradiction by supposing that in consequence of the great jealousy with which the high-priest's robes were kept by the civil power at this time, the custom had arisen for him to wear them, not even always on the three great festivals (Apt. xviii, 4, 3), but only on the great day of expiation. Glad in this generous attitude, he would enter the Temple in presence of all the people, and, after having performed in secret, as the law requires, the rites of expiation in the linen dress, he would resume his pontifical robes, and so appear again in public. Thus his wearing the robes would easily come to be identified chiefly with the day of atonement; and this is, perhaps, the most probable explanation. In other respects, the high-priest performed the functions of a priest, but only on new moons and other great feasts, and on such solemn occasions as the dedication of the Temple under Solomon, under Zerubbabel, etc. See Atonement, Day of.

4. The high-priest had a peculiar place in the law of gold plate, engraved with "Holiness to the Lord," fastened to it by a ribbon of blue. Josephus applies the same Heb. term (μεταμυτησθής) to the turbans of the common priests as well, but says that in addition to this, and sewn upon the top of it, the high-priest had another turban of blue; that besides this he had outside the turban a triple crown of gold, consisting, that is, of three rings one above the other, and terminating at the top in a kind of conical cup, like the inverted calyx of the herb hyssopus. Josephus doubtless gives a true account of the high-priest's turban as worn in his day. It may fairly be conjectured that the crown was appended when the Askonaeans united the temporal monarchy with the priesthood, and that this was continued, though in a modified shape, after the sovereignty was taken from them. Josephus also describes the virgula, the lamina or gold plate, which he says covered the forehead of the high-priest. In Amt. vii, 8, 8, he says that the identical gold plate made in the days of Moses existed in his time; and Whitson adds in a note that it was still preserved in the time of Origen, and that the inscription on it was engraved in Samaritan characters (Amt. iii, 2, 6). It is certain that R. Eiezer, who flourished in Hadrian's reign, saw it at Rome. It was doubtless placed, with other spoils of the Temple, in the Temple of Peace, which was burnt down in the reign of Commodus. These spoils, however, are especially mentioned as part of Alaric's plunder when he took Rome. They were carried by Genseric into Africa, and brought by Belisarius to Byzantium, where they adorned his triumph. On the warning of a Jew the emperor ordered them back to Jerusalem, but what became of them is not known (Reland, de Scriptor Templo). See Mirraa.

3. Aaron had peculiar functions. To him alone it appertained, and he alone was permitted, to enter the Holy of Holies, which he did once a year, on the great day of atonement, when he sprinkled the blood of the sin-offering on the mercy-seat, and burnt incense with-the manse, and his taking sanctuary in the cities of refuge. The manse might not leave the city of refuge during the lifetime of the existing high-priest who was anointed with the holy oil (Numb. xxxv, 25, 29). It was also forbidden to the high-priest to follow a funeral, or rend his clothes for the dead, according to the precedent in Lev. x, 6. See MANSLEY.

5. The other respects in which the high-priest excercised superior functions to the other priests arose rather from his position and opportunities than from distinctively sacred ceremonies. He was the religious head, so to speak, of the temple, and took the leading part in all religious transactions in connexion with the personal character and abilities of the high-priest. Such were the reforms in religion, restorations of the Temple and its service, the preservation of the Temple from intrusion or profanation, taking the lead in ecclesiastical or civil affairs, judging the people, presiding in the Sanhedrin, and generally the high-priest was supposed to have done, and other similar transactions, in which we find the high-priest sometimes prominent, sometimes not even mentioned. (See the historical part of this article.) Even that portion of power which most naturally and usually fell to his share, the rule of the Temple, and administration of the priests of the Temple who ministered there, did not invariably fall to the share of the high-priest. For the title “Ruler of the House of God,” מנהלבב (KJV), which usually denotes the high-priest, is sometimes given to those who were not high-priests, as to Phasur, the son of Immer, in Jer. xx, 1; compare 1 Chron. xii, 27. The Rabbinists speak very frequently of the anointing of the king, King David, whom they call the Sagan, and who often acted in the high-priest’s room. He is the same who in the O. T. is called “the second priest” (2 Kings xxiii, 4; xxv, 18). They say that Moses was sagan to Aaron. Thus, too, it is explained of Amans and Caiaphas (Luke iii, 2), that Amans was sagan to Caiaphas, and that Caiaphas, whom they call the Sagan, and who often acted in the high-priest’s room. In like manner they say Zadok and Abiathar were high-priests and sagan in the time of David. The sagan is also very frequently called מנהלבב, or prefect of the Temple, and upon him chiefly lay the care and charge of the Temple services (Lightfoot, poza). If the high-priest was incapacitated from officiating by any accidental unclesness, the sagan or vice-priest took his place. Thus the Jerusalem Talmud tells a story of Simon, son of Kamith, that “on the eve of the day of expiation he went out to speak with the king, and some fell upon him and despoiled him: therefore Judah his brother went in on the day of expiation, and served in his stead; and so their mother Kamith saw two of her sons high-priests in one day. She had seven sons, and they all served in the high-priesthood;” (Lightfoot, 1x, 35). It does not appear that these sagan, to whom their office, before there were kings of Israel; but, if we find it invariably done by the civil power in later times, it is probable that, in the times preceding the monarchy, it was by the elders, or Sanhedrin. The instillation and sanctification of the high-priest, or clothing him with the eighth garments, which was the formal investiture, is ascribed by Maimonides to the Sanhedrin at all times (Lightfoot, i, 29).

It should be added that the usual age for entering upon the functions of the priesthood, according to 2 Chron. xxiv, 14, was 28 years (by the later Jews thirty, Numb. iv, 3; 1 Chron. xxii, 2), though a priest or high-priest was not actually incapacitated if he had attained to puberty, as appears by the example of Aristobulus, who was high-priest at the age of seventeen. Onias, the son of Simon the Just, could not be high-priest accordingly because he was but a child at his father’s death. Again, according to Lev. xxii, no one that had a blemish could officiate at the altar. Moses enumerates eleven blemishes, which the Talmud expands into 142. Josephus relates that Antigonus mutilated Hyrcanus’s ears, to incapacitate him for being restored to the high-priesthood. Illegitimate birth was also a bar to the high-priesthood, and the subtlety of Jewish distinctions extended this illegitimacy to being born of a mother who had been taken captive by heathen conquerors (Josephus, c. Apion, i, 7). Thus Eleazar said to John Hyrcanus (though Josephus says, falsely) that he was not fit to assume the high-priesthood according to the precedent in Lev. x, 6. See MANSLEY.

II. The theological view of the high-priesthood will be treated under the head of Priest. It must suffice here to indicate the considerations of the powers, functions, and ministrations of the high-priest, as typical of the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and as setting forth under shadows the truths which are openly taught under the Gospel. This has been done to a great extent in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and is occasionally done in the parts of Scripture which are described, wherein theĪσχυρος, and the girdle about the paps, are distinctly the robe, and the curious girdle of the ephod, characteristic of the high-priest. It also embraces all the moral and spiritual teaching supposed to be intended by such symbols. Philo (De viris illustribus, Origen (Hom., in Levitt, Eusebius (Dem. Evang., Eusebius (Ant.) of Melchizedek, iv, etc.), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. i, Elin Creten. and Comment. p. 155), Augustine (Quast. in Exod.), may be cited among many others of the ancients who have more or less thus treated the subject. Of moderns, Bähr (Symbolae mysticae cultus), Fairbairn (Typology of Scripture), Kalsch (Comment. on Exod.), have entered fully into this subject, both from the Jewish and the Christian point of view.

III. The history of the high-priests embraces a period of about 1272 years, according to the opinion of the best chronologers, and a succession of about 86 high-priests, from the beginning with Aaron, and ending with Phasur, the son of Eli, father of Abiathar, number of all the high-priests (says Josephus, Ant. xx, 10) from Aaron ... until Phasur ... was 83,” where he gives a comprehensive account of them. They naturally arrange themselves into three groups,— (a) those before David; (b) those from David to the captivity; (c) those from the return from the Babylonian captivity till the cessation of the office at the destruction of Jerusalem. The two former have come down to us in the canonical books of Scripture, and so have a few of the earliest and the latest of the latter; but for the larger portion of the latter group we have only the authority of Josephus, the Talmud, and occasional notices in profane writers.

(a) The high-priests of the first group who are distinctly made known to us as such are, 1. Aaron; 2. Eleazar; 3. Phinehas; 4. Eli; 5. Abihud (1 Chron. xxiv, 11; Neh. xi, 11; 1 Sam. xiv, 2); 6. Ahiah; 7. Ahitub; 8. Phinehas, the son of Eli, and father of Ahitub, died before his father, and so was not high-priest. Of the above the first three succeeded in regular order, Nadab and Abihu, Aaron’s eldest sons, having died in the wildness (Lev. x). But Eli, the 4th, was of the line of Phinehas, and he was the successor of the father of Phinehas and the accession of Eli, what led to the transference of the chief priesthood from the line of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, and whether any or which of the descendants of Eleazar between Phinehas and Zadok (seven in number, viz. Abisha, Bukki, Uzzi, Zerubab, Merioth, Amariah, Ahitub), were high-priests, we have no positive means of determining from Scripture. Judg, xx, 28 leaves Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, priest at Shiloh, and 1 Sam. i, 3, 9 finds Eli high-priest there, with two grown-up sons priests under him. The only clue to be found in the genealogies, by which it appears that Phinehas was in succession from Levi, while Eli, supposing him to be the same generation as Samuel's grandfather, would be 10th. Josephus asserts (Ant. viii, 1, 3) that the father of Bubki—whom he calls Joseph, and (Ant. v, 11, 5) Ablezer, 1. e. Abishua—was the last high-priest of the house of Phinehas's. This is an acceptable tradition, since Josephus does not allude to it in the above passage of his 5th book, where he makes Bubki and Uzzi to have been both high-priests, and Eli to have succeeded Uzzi; or in book xx, 16, where he reckons the high-priests before Zadok and Solomon, to have been thirteen (a reckoning which includes apparently all Eleazar's descendants down to Abi- tub), and adds Eli and his son Phinehas, and Abiathar, whom he calls Eli's grandson. If the last of Abihu's line died leaving a son or grandson under age, Eli, as the head of the line of Ithamar, might have become high-priest as a matter of course. But, before, or he might have been appointed by the elders. His having judged Israel 40 years (1 Sam. iv, 18) marks him as a man of ability. If Abi- ah and Ahimelech are not variations of the name of the same person, they must have been brothers, since both were sons of Abiathar. Of the high-priests, then, before David, mention is made in Scripture only of Zadok, high-priest, and one by Josephus alone. The bearing of this on the chronology of the times from the Exodus to David is too important to be passed over in silence. As in the parallel list of the ancestors of David (q. v.), we are compelled by the chronology to count as incumbents of the office in regular order the four others who are only named in Scripture as lineal descendants of the pontifical family. The comparative oversight of these incumbents receives an explanation from the nature of the times. It must also be noted that the tabernacle of God probably rose to high-priesthood of Aaron's son (the first of this group, was pitched at Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim, a fact that marks the strong influence which the temporal power already had in ecclesiastical affairs, since Ephraim was Joshua's tribe, as Judah was David's (Josh. xxiv, 30, 33; Judg. xx, 27, 38, xxxi, 21; 1 Sam. i, 8, 9, 5; ii, 25, etc.; xiv, 60). The strong influence and interference of the secular power is manifest throughout the subsequent history. This first period was also marked by the calamity which be- fell the high-priests as the guardians of the ark, in its connection with Solomon. This probably suspended all inquiries by Uriam and Ahimelech. They were not mentioned before the ark (1 Chron. xiii, 3; comp. Judg. xx, 27; 1 Sam. vii, 2; xiv, 18), and must have greatly diminished the influence of the high-priests, on whom the largest share of the humiliation expressed in the name Ithabod would naturally fall. The rise of Samuel as a prophet at this very time, and his paramount influence and impor- tance in the state, to the entire eclipsing of Ahiah the priest, coincides remarkably with the absence of the ark, and the means of inquiring by Uriam and Thummim. (A. P.) Passing to the second group, we begin with the unpleasing circumstance of the death of two priests in the reign of David, apparently of nearly equal authority, viz. Zadok and Abiathar (1 Chron. xv, 11; 2 Sam. vii, 17). Indeed it is only from the depostion of Abi- athar, and the placing of Zadok in his room by Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 21), that we learn certainly that Abiathar was the high-priest, and Zadok the second of the line of Ahitub, of the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. vi, 8), and the first mention of him is in 1 Chron. xii, 28, as "a young man, mighty in valor," who joined David in Hebron after Saul's death, with 22 captains of his father's house. It is therefore it may be inferred that after the death of Ahime- lech, and the decease of Abiathar to David, Saul may have made Zadok priest, as far as it was possible for him to do in the absence of the ark and the high-priest's robes, and that David may have avoided the difficulty of deciding between the claims of his faithful friend Abi- athar and his new and important ally Zadok (who, per- haps, was the means of attaching to David's cause the 4000 Levites and the 3700 priests that came under Je- hoioahí and Absalom's captivity, verse 16). In appointing a joint priesthood: the first place, with the ephod, and Urim and Thummim, remaining with Abiathar, who was in actual possession of them. Certain it is that from this time Zadok and Abiathar are constantly named to- gether, and, singularly, Zadok always with the phrase, in book vi, 19, of the tent of Kiriath-jearim. We cannot however, trace very clearly up to a certain point the division of the priestly offices and dignities between them, coinciding as it did with the divided state of the Levitical worship in David's time. For we learn from 1 Chron. vii, 1, 7, 37, compared with 33, 40, that only insinu- cinctly from 2 Chron. i, 3, 4, 5, that the tabernacle and the brazen altar made by Moses and Bezeel in the wil- derness were at this time at Gibeon, while the ark was at Jerusalem, in the separate tent made for it by David. See Ginece. Now Zadok the priest and his brethren the priests were brought before the tabernacle at Gibeon to offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord morning and even- ting, and to do according to all that is written in the law of the Lord (1 Chron. xvi, 39, 40). It is therefore obvi- ous to conclude that Abiathar had special charge of the ark and the services connected with it, which agrees ex- actly with what we find in the times of King Solomon. He kept his previous position with David before he became king of Israel, as well as with what we are told 1 Chron. xxvii, 34, that Jehoiada and Abiathar were the king's counsell- ors next to Ahitophel. Residence at Jerusalem with the ark, and the privilege of the inquiring of the Lord be- fore the ark, both well suit his office of counsellor. Abi- athar, however, forfeited his place by taking part with Adonijah against Solomon, and Zadok was made high- priest in his place. The pontificate was thus again con- solidated and transferred permanently from the line of Ithamar to the line of Eleazar. The last mention of Zadok, he being very old at Solomon's accession (being David's con- temporary), should have lived to the 11th year of his reign; and, moreover, 1 Kings iv, 2 distinctly asserts that Azariah, the son of Zadok, was priest under Solo- mon; and 1 Chron. vi, 10 tells us of an Azariah, grandson of the former, "he it is that executed the priest's office in the Temple in that Solomon built in Jerusalem," as if meaning at its first completion. If, however, either of these Asariahs (if two) was the first high-priest of Solomon's Temple, the non-mention of him in the accoun- t of the dedication of the Temple, who was about to have most expected it (as 1 Kings viii, 3, 6, 16, 11, 62; 2 Chron. v, 7, 11, etc.), and the prominence given to Solo- mon—the civil power—would be certainly remarkable. Compare also 2 Chron. vii, 14, 15. In constructing the list of the succession of priests of this group it was found most useful to compare the genea- logical list in 1 Chron. vi, 8-15 (A.V.) with the notices of high-priests in the sacred history, and with the list given by Josephus, who, it must be remembered, had ac- cess to the lists preserved in the archives at Jerusalem, which probably the text as it stands is apt to produce the ordinary rules of genealogical succession. Now, as regards the genealogy, it is seen at once that there is something de- fective; for whereas from David to Jehoshiah there are 20 kings, from Zadok to Jehozadak there are but 18 priests. Moreover, the passage in question is not a list of high-priests, but the pedigree of Jehozadak. Then, again, while the pedigree in its first six generations from Zadok inclusive seems at first sight exactly to suit the historical movements, it is not, as is well known, part of the history (2 Chron. xix, 11) tells us he lived in Jehoshaphat's reign, who was the sixth king from David, inclusive; and while the same pedigree in its last five generations also seems to suit the history—inauthentic as it places Hilkiah, the son of Shallum, fourth from the end, and in the reign of Josiah, it is highly improbable that the fourth king from the end—yet is there certainly at least one great gap in the middle. Between Amariah, the high-priest in Jehoshaphat's reign, and Shallum, the father of Hilkiah, the high-priest in Josiah's reign—an interval of about 240 years—there are but two names, Ahitub and Zadok, and these liable to suspicion from their reproducing the same sequence which occurs in the earlier part of the same genealogy—Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok. Besides, they are not mentioned by Josephus, at least not under the same names. This part, therefore, of the genealogy is useless for our purpose. But for the historical books supply us with four or five names for this interval, viz. Jehoiada, in the reigns of Athaliah and Joash, and probably still earlier; Zechariah, his son; Ahaziah, in the reign of Uzziah; Uziah, in the reign of Ahaz; and Azariah, in the reign of Hezekiah. If, in the meantime, the Azariah of the high-priestly genealogy have been accidentally transposed, as is not impossible, then the Azariah who was high-priest in Hezekiah's reign would be the Azariah of 1 Chron. vi, 13, 14. Putting the additional historical names at four, and deducting the two suspicious names from the genealogy, we have 16 high-priests indicated in Scripture as corresponding with the 20 kings, with room, however, for one or two more in the history. Turning to Josephus, we find his list of 17 high-priests (whom he reckons as 18 [Ant. xx, 10], as do also the Rabbinical lists) in places exceedingly corrupt, a corruption sometimes caused by the end of one name adorning the beginning of the following (as in Azliora-mus), sometimes apparently by substituting the name of the contemporary king or prophet for that of the high-priest, as Joel and Johatham (both these, however, confirmed by the Rabbinical list). Perhaps, however, Nebuzar, who corresponds to Zedekiah, son of Nebiud Odem, and Odeas, who corresponds to Hoshaijah, in the reign of Manasseh, according to the same Jewish chronicle, may really represent high-priests whose names have not been preserved in Scripture. This would bring up the number to 17, or, if we retain Azariah, the father of Seraiah, to 18, which, with the addition of Joel and Johatham, finally agrees with the 20 kings.

Reviewing the high-priests of this second group, the following are some of the most remarkable incidents:

1. The transfer of the seat of worship from Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim, to Jerusalem, in the tribe of Judah, effected by David, and consolidated by the building of the magnificent Temple of Solomon.

2. The organization of the Temple service under the high-priests, and the division of the priests and Levites into courses, who resided at the Temple during their term of service, and the seating up of a schismatical priesthood at Dan and Beersheba (1 Kings xii, 31; 2 Chron. xiii, 9, etc.).

3. The revolt of the ten tribes from the dynasty of David, and from the worship at Jerusalem, and the setting up of a schismatical priesthood at Dan and Beersheba (1 Kings xii, 31; 2 Chron. xiii, 9, etc.).

4. The overthrow of the usurpation of Athaliah, the daughter of Ahahab, by Jehoash the high-priest, whose near relationship to king Joash, added to his zeal against the idolatries of the house of Ahahab, stimulated him to the force of priests and Levites in his command. (5) The boldness and success with which the anti-Samaritan party were attacked by the high-priest of Jericho, or the temple of the Exile, as the O.T. guides us, were Joashim, Elisibah, Joiada, Johanan (or Jonathan), and Jaddua. Of these we find...
Elisha hiding rather thanseconding the zeal of the devout Tirthah Nebheimah for the observance of God's law in Israel (Neh. xiii, 4, 7); and Johanan, Josephus tells us, murdered his own brother Jesus or Joshua in the Temple, which Josephus says was burnt by the king of the general of Artaxerxes Mardonion's army (Ant. xi. 7). Jaddua was high-priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Concerning him, Josephus relates the story that he went out to meet Alexander at Sapha (probably the ancient Mizpeh) at the head of a procession of priests; that the high-priest saw the toulit clothed in white, and the priests in their linen garments, and the high-priest in blue and gold, with the mitre on his head, and the gold plate, on which was the name of God, he stepped forward alone and adored the Name, and hastened to embrace the high-priest (Ant. xi. 8, 5). Josephus adds many other particulars, but they have no same connection; and the narrative, though sometimes disputed as savouring of the apocryphal, derives support from the circumstances of the times, especially the enmity of Alexander toward the Jews. See Александр the Great. It was the brother of this Jaddua, Manna słeh, who, according to Josephus, was at the request of Sanballat, made the first high-priest of the Samaritan temple by Alexander the Great. (See on this whole period, Herzfeld, Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, 1866, 1, 688 sq.)

Jaddua was succeeded by Onias I, his son, and he again by Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue, as the Jews speak, and to whom is usually ascribed the completion of the Canon of the O.T. (Prid. Connect, i, 545). Of him Jesus, the son of Sirach, speaks in terms of most glowing eulogy in Eccles. i, ascribing to him the repair and fortification of the Temple, with other works. The passage (1-21) contains an interesting account of the ministrations of the high-priest. Upon Simon's death, his son Onias being under age, Eleazar, Simon's brother, succeeded him. The high-priesthood of Eleazar is memorable as being that under which Jesus was born. It is said in the Talmud to have been made at Alexandria for Ptolemy Philometor, according to the account of Josephus taken from Aristaeus (Ant. xii, 2). This translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, valuable as it was with reference to the wider interests of religion, and marked as was the provision which was made to transcribe the sabbath, was introduced for the approaching advent of Christ, yet, viewed in its relation to Judaism and the high-priesthood, was a sign, and perhaps a helping cause of their decay. It marked a growing tendency to Hellenism utterly inconsistent with the spirit of the Mosaic economy. Accordingly, in the spirit of the spirit of the Mosaic economy, and Onias, we find their very names changed into the Greek ones of Jason and Menaæus, and with the introduction of this new feature of rival high-priests we find one of them, Menaæus, strengthening himself and seeking support from the Syro-Greek kings against the Jewish party by offering to forsake their national laws and customs, and to adopt those of the Greeks. The building of a gymnasion at Jerusalem for the use of these apostate Jews, and their endeavor to conceal their circumcision when stripped for the games (1 Macc. i, 14, 15; 3 Macc. iv. 13-15; Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 1), show the length to which this spirit was carried. The acceptance of the spurious priesthood of the temple of Onias from Ptolemy Philometor by Onias (the son of Onias the high-priest), who would have been the legitimate high-priest on the death of Menaæus, his uncle, is another striking indication of the religious policy of the Greek kings. Onias introduced into Egypt the succession of high-priests in the family of Jozadak ceased; for although the Syro-Greek kings had introduced much uncertainty into the succession, by deposing at their will obnoxious persons, and appointing whom they pleased, yet the dignity had never ceasing to pass from the general of Artaxerxes Mardonion's army, or, according to Ruffinus (ap. Selden), Joachim, and who was made high-priest by Antiochus Eupator on Menelaus being put to death by him, was the first who was of a different family. One, says Josephus, that "was indeed of the stock of Aaron, but not of this family."

What, however, for a time saved the Jewish institutions, infused a new life and consistency into the priesthood and the national religion, and enabled them to fulfill their destined course till the advent of Christ, was the cruel and impolitic persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. This thoroughly aroused the pious and national spirit of the Jews, and drew together in defense of their Temple and country all who feared God and were attached to their national institutions. The result was that after the high-priesthood had been brought to the lowest degradation by the apostasy and crimes of the last Onias or Menelaus, and after a vacancy of seven years had followed the brief pontificate of Alcimus, his no less infamous successor, a new and glorious succession of high-priests arose in the Asmonean family, who united the dignity of civil rulers, and for a time of independent sovereigns, to that of the high-priesthood. Josephus, who is followed by Lightfoot and his Seldens and others, calls Judas Maccabaeus "high-priest of the nation of Judah" (Ant. xii, 10, 6), but, according to the far better authority of 1 Macc. x. 20, it was not till after the death of Judas Maccabaeus that Alcimus himself died, king of Syria, and that Alexander the Great had made the brother of Judas, high-priest. Josephus himself, too, calls Jonathan the "first of the sons of Asmoneus, who was high-priest." (Life, 1). It is possible, however, that Judas may have been elected by the people to the office of high-priest, though never confirmed in it by the Syrian kings. The Asmonean family was descended from the course of Joarib, the first of the twenty-four courses (1 Chron. xxiv, 7), whose return from captivity is recorded 1 Chron. ix. 10; Neh. xi. 10. They were probably of the house of Eleazar, though this cannot be affirmed with certainty; and Josephus tells us that he himself was related to this family. He is said to have married a daughter of Jonathan, the first high-priest of the house. The Asmonean dynasty lasted from B.C. 155 till the family was damaged by intestine divisions, and then destroyed by Herod the Great. Aristobulus, the last high-priest of his line, brother of Mas- dones, was murdered by order of Herod the Great, B.C. 85. The independence of Judea, under the priest-kings of this race, had lasted till Pompey took Jerusalem, and sent king Aristobulus II (who had also taken the high-priesthood from his brother Hyrcanus) a prisoner to Rome. Pompey restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, and forced him to abjure Judaism. Everything Jewish was now, however, hastening to decay. Herod made men of low birth high-priests, deposed them at his will, and named others in their room. In this he was followed by Archelaus, and by the Romans when they took the government of Judea into their own hands; that there were no fewer than twenty-eight high-priests from the reign of Herod to the destruction of the Temple by Titus, a period of 107 years. Josephus tells us of one Ananus and his five sons who all filled the office of high-priest in turn. One of these, Ananus the younger, was deposed by Herod; and Josephus says "the party for the part he took in causing "James, the brother of Jesus who was called Christ," to be stoned (Ant. xx, 9, 1.) The N.T. introduces us to some of these later and oft-changing high-priests, viz. Annas and Caiaphas—the former high-priest at the commencement of John Baptist's ministry, and of whom Caiaphas was the latter high-priest himself at our Lord's crucifixion (see Somme, De Annas et Caiapho, Lund. 1772) —and Annanias (erroneously thought to be the Ananus who was murdered by the Zealots just before the siege of Jerusalem), before whom Paul was tried, as we read Acts xxiii, 5, 6, and of whom he said, "God shall smite you, and your wall shall be whitened." The same Caiaphas was the high-priest from whom Saul received letters to the synagogue at Jerusalem.

Scribes, Josephus, and an Old Jewish chronicle, the Seder Olam. Details may be found under their respective names.

Highway (usually הַמַּלֶּל, mesilla), or [Isa. xxxv, 8] הִרְצָע, muzzal, a raised road [see CAUSEWAY] for public use; elsewhere simply יָרְחָה, o’rach, a path, or הַרְצָא, de’rek, dök, a "way" in general; once [Amos v, 16] הָרְצָע, chuts, outside.

Travellers have frequently noticed the lack of roads in Palestine. Travel and transport being all performed on the backs of beasts of burden, which usually move in single file, the most important routes are only marked by narrow winding paths; and the soil is so often hard as to take no impression from the feet of animals, so that the eye of an unpractised traveller there perceives, even upon a common thoroughfare, no evidence that others have passed along the same way. No repairs are ever made, no labor employed to remove obstacles.—Bastow. Hence the striking character of the figure by which the preparation for the return of the captives and the Messiah’s advent are announced as the construction of a grand thoroughfare for their march [Isa. xi. 6; xxxvi. 8; xi. 3; xxiii. 10]. The Romans, however, during their occupancy of Palestine, constructed several substantial roads, which are laid down in the ancient itineraries, and remains of which subsist to this day.

Higuerra, Hieronymus Romanus de L.
Spanish Jesuit and historian, was born at Toledo in 1538. He established his reputation by fabricating supposed histories. Thus he composed Cronicones, fragments, which he announced as copies of MSS. found at Worms, and the work of Flavius Lucius Dexter, Marcus Maximus, etc. He proposed to throw the Inquisition of Christianity into Spain. Father Bivar, who believed these chronicles genuine, added a commentary, and published them at Saragossa in 1619. They were reprinted at Cadiz (1627), at Lyons (1627), and at Madrid (1640, fol.).—Tichnor, Hist. of Spanish Lit. iii. 156; Hoefler, Nachtr. Nouv. Biog. Générale, 658 sq.

Hilaire. See HILARIUS.

Hilali Codex of the O.T. See MANUSCRIPTS.

Hilaria, a festival among the ancient Romans, which they observed in the Kalends, April 8, or on March 25, in honor of the goddess Cybele. Its name it derived from the occasion, which was one of general mirth and joy. The citizens went in procession through the streets, carrying the statue of Cybele. Masquerades, and all sorts of disguises, were also permitted. The day preceding the festival, in contrast with the festive day which was to follow, was a day of mourning. The reason for this is that "Cybele represented the earth, which was thought to have been created by a widow. Consequently the month of April was called Aprilis," according to Macrobius referred to the month in which Apollo Leo, but Hilarus refused to acknowledge the papal jurisdiction in the matter. Pope Leo, jealous of his own authority, and always anxious to extend his power, was very wrathful at Hilarus's summary proceedings, nor could Leo be appeased, though the bishop of Arles had on a journey on foot to Rome in order to set matters right. Each saint adhered to his own opinion, and they parted with mutual ill will, and by a rescript of Valentinian in 415, the metropolitan of Gaul was made virtually subordinate to the papal see. Hilarus died A.D. 449. His works extant are: De Sacris Institutionibus; a panegyric: Epistola ad Eucherium, both of which may be found in Bib. Nat. Patr. vol. vii. Waterland attributes the composition of the Athisanaxis Creed to Hilarus (in Treatise on Athanasian Creed). See Cave, Hist. Lit.; Hook, Eccl. Biog. vi, 54; Moehme, Ch. Hist. i, 549; Clarke, Succession of Sacred Literature, ii, 191; Waterland, Works, ii, 8; iii, 214 sq.; Milner, Ch. Hist. Christ., ii, 317; Riddle, Christ. Antiquities, Milman, Latin Christianity, i, 272 sq.

Hilarius Dacicus, a deacon of the Church of Rome in the 4th century, who was sent by pope Liberius, with Lucifer of Cagliari and others, to plead the cause of the orthodox faith before Constantius at the Council of Milan. His object was so to charm the emperor that he might be scourged and banished by the order of the emperor. He afterwards. supported the violent opinion of Lucifer (p. v) that all Arians and heretics must be republized upon applying to be restored to communion in the Church. Two treatises, of doubtful authenticity, are attributed to him: (1) Comm. in Epist. Pauli (published often with the works of Ambrose); (2) Quest. in Vet. et Nor. Test., published with the works of Augustine (Benedictine edit. t. iii, App.). The Benedictine editors of St. Ambrose inform us that the manuscripts of the "Commentary" on St. Paul's Epistles differ considerably, and that in some parts there appear to be interlacements of long passages. This commentary is said by Dupin to be "clear, plain, and literal, and to give the meaning of the text of St. Paul well enough; but it gives very different explanations from St. Augustine in those places which concern the sanctification of grace, and free will."—Lardner, Works, iv, 382; Moehme, Ch. Hist. cent. iv., pt. ii, ch. ii, n. 43; Dupin, Eccles. Writ. cent. iv; English Cyclopaedia.

Hilarium Pictaviensis (HILARY, SR., bishop or PORTIA), one of the most distinguished opponents of Arianism in the 4th century, was a native of the city whose name he bears. He was of noble descent, but a heathen. Having come under the influence of faith, he was baptized, together with his wife and daughter. He was subsequently made bishop, about 350, notwithstanding his being a married man. In 556 he defended Athanasius, in the Council of Bezieris, against Sab. turnius, bishop of Arles (said to have been an Arian, and to have held communion with Ursatius and Valen.

). For this he was exiled from his see, but he never abandoned his faith, and he died in 557.

He afterwards freed the bishops from the emperor's court, and presented a petition to Constantius, in which he desired permission to end his official duties as bishop and return to his home, which was in Egypt.

In the meantime, Hilarius maintained the Athanasian doctrine with much vigor. He was appointed a bishop and sent to Gaul to replace the banished bishop Valens. He was successively Bishop of Milan, and then of Rome, where he died in 567.

His theological system is a major influence in the development of Christian thought, particularly in the East. He is often referred to as the 'Arius of Rome' because of his continued support of the Athanasian position against the Donatists and Nestorians.

Hilaris, pope, or rather, bishop of Rome, was a Saradian by birth, and succeeded Leo I, the Great, when the latter died. He is said to have been well versed in the Scriptures and to have had a profound knowledge of the Church's teachings. He is said to have been an exponent of the doctrine of the Trinity and to have opposed the heresies of the Donatists and Nestorians.

He is considered one of the greatest of the early popes, and his pontificate is marked by his vigorous defense of the Church's teachings and his opposition to the heresies of the time.
against the Eutychians, and was well versed in matters concerning the discipline of the Church, which he displayed leadership in the election and consecration of bishops by their metropolitan in France and Spain, and justified his interference by alleging the pre-eminen tence of the see of Rome over all the sees of the West, a pre-eminence which he, however, acknowledged, in one of his letters, to be derived from the power of the see of Rome. He also forbade bishops nominating their successors, a practice which was then frequent. He, however, did not declare elections or nominations to be illegal merely from his own authority, but assembled a council to decide on those ques-

Hilda, St., the celebrated abbess of Whitby, was grand-niece of Edwin, king of Northumbria, and conspicuous for piety and devotion to the Christian faith from the age of thirteen. When, after the death of Edwin, the Northumbrians relapsed into idolatry, Hilda withdrew probably, into East Anglia, but returned to Northumbria on the accession of Oswald, and, devoting herself to a life of celibacy, founded a small nunnery on the Wear. She subsequently (about A.D. 650) became abbess of Hexham, now Hartlepool, where she remained seven years. Oswy, the brother and successor of the gentle and virtuous Oswald, when marching to defend his throne and faith against Penda, the pagan king of Mercia vowed that if the Lord vouchsafed to him the victory, he would devote to his service in holy virginity his infant daughter, the princess Eilifra. Having defeated his rival, he claimed his duchy for his niece, and in Yorkshire, Oswy, in pursuance of his vow, committed Eilifra, with princely gifts in lands, etc., to the care of Hilda. Soon afterwards Hilda purchased ten "hides" of land at Stroneshala, now Whitby, and erected a new monastery, in which she, as abbess, took up her abode with her royal charge. The wealth of this monastery, and the dignity and high religious character of Hilda, made it the most celebrated in England, and a nursery of eminent men, among whom may be mentioned Hedda, Willifrid, and Ceddmon, the poet. Dugdale (as quoted by Mrs. Jameson) says that Hilda "was so just and en- lightened in her government, that the whole jurisdiction in this country, and opposed with all her might the tenure of priests and the celebration of Easter according to the Roman ritual." She died in November, 680, aged sixty-three years, and was succeeded as abbess by Hilda. Among the many relics of her are a nun at Hakenes saw angels convening her soul to bliss, and that certain fossils found near Whitby having the form of coiled snakes were those reptiles thus changed by the power of her prayers.—

Hildebert of Tours (HILDEBERTUS TURONENSIS), in 1097 bishop of Mans, and in 1125 archbishop of Tours, was born about 1055 at Lavardin. Though accused of licentiousness before his admission to the Church, he became one of its brightest ornaments for piety and learning. During the time of his being bishop of Mans, he and his church suffered much from the contests of William Rufus and Helice, count of Mans; nor was he much more fortunate in his archbishopric, for he fell under the displeasure of Louis the Fat because he refused to disavow the emperor's dogma, as a result of which the dissenions were at last settled, and Hildebert restored to favor. He wrote with great severity against the vices of the court of Rome. Hildebert had great "independence of mind, practical sense, and a degree of taste which preserved him from falling into the vain and puerile discourses of his contemporaries." His Tract

Hildesham. latus Philosophicus and his Moralis Philosophica, which are considered his best productions, are the first essays to wards a popular system of the Christian religion. He died A.D. 1124. His epistles and sermons were quite numerous; they are collected in the best edition of his works, Opera tam ed-ita quam inedita, studio Beugendry (Benedictine, Paris, 1708, fol.). See Mosheim, Ch. Hist. centi. xi, pt. ii, ch. ii, n. 74; Vidi Hildeberts, prefixed to his works (com-

Hildegarde or Hildegards, abbess of St. Ru-pert's Mount on the Rhine, was born at Bockelheim, in Germany, A.D. 1098. She attracted much attention by her pretended revelations and visions, which were held to be supernatural, and obtained the countenance of Bernard and others, and at last the approval of Eugenius III and thi327 he acting pope, together with se-numeral prelates. She wrote Three Books of Revelations (Colonia, 1628) — Life of St. Robert: — three Episles, various Questions, and an Exposition of St. Benedict's Rule (all Colom. 1566). Most of them may also be found in Biblia: Pseudol. xxii. She died A.D. 1189.

Hildersham, Arthur, a plious and learned Puritan divine, was born at Stechworth, Cambridgeshire, October 6, 1653, of an honorable family. He was brought up a papist, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge; but while there he avowed himself a Protestant, and was, in consequence, cast off by his father. The earl of Hunting-ington, a distant kinsman, on hearing of the circumstances, became his patron, and carried him through the univerbe unmistakable. For instance, in Ezek. xxiv, 4, the "hill" is the same which is elsewhere in the same chapter (ver. 12, 13, 18, etc.) and book consistently and accurately rendered "mount" and "mountain." In Numb. xiv, 44, 45, the "hill" is the "mountain" of verse 40, as also in Deut. i, 41, 45, compared with 24, 44. In Josh. xv, 9, the allusion to the mountain region of Israel is called "mountain" in the preceding verse; and so also in 2 Sam. xvi, 13. The country of the "hills," in Deut. i, 7; Josh. ix, 1; x; 40; xi, 16, is the elevated district of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, which is correctly called "the mountain" in the earliest descriptions of Palestine (Numb. xiii, 29), and in many subsequent passages. The "holy hill" (Psa. iii, 4), the "hill of Jehovah" (xxiv, 3), the "hill of God" (lxviii, 15), are nothing else than "mount Zion." In 2 Kings i, 9, and iv, 27, the use of the word "hill" obsesses the allusion to Carmel, which in other passages of the life of the prophet (e.g. 1 Kings xvii, 19; 2 Kings iv, 25) has the term "mount" correctly attached to it. Other places in the historical books in which the same substitution weakens the force of the narrative are as follows: Gen. vii, 19; Deut. viii, 7; Josh. xii, 6; xviii, 13, 14; Judg. xvii, 3, 4; 1 Sam. xxii, 14; xxv, 20; xxvi, 19; 2 Sam. xiii, 4; 1 Kings xiv, 17; xxv, 22; 2 Kings xxvii, 6; xxviii, 17, etc. See MALAKI.

3. On one occasion the word מִשְׁכָּב, mishkib, is rendered "hill," viz. 1 Sam. ix, 11, where it would be better to employ "ascend," or some similar term. See MALAKI.

4. In the N. T. the word "hill" is employed to render the Greek word ἄφινοις; but on one occasion it is used for ὄρος, elsewhere "mountain," so as to obscure the connection between the two parts of the same narrative. The "hill" from which Jesus was coming down in Luke ix, 36, is the same as "the mountain" into which he had gone for his transfiguration the day before (comp. verse 29). In Matt. xvi, 14, and Luke iv, 29, ὄρος is also rendered "hill" but not with the introduction of an article. In Luke x, 39, the "hill country" (ἡ ἄφινοις) is the same "mountain of Judah" to which frequent reference is made in the Old Testament. See JUDAH, TRIBE OF.

HILL-GODS (יוֹרֵא לְשֹׁנַי, "gods of the hills") are mentioned (1 Kings xx, 25) by the heathenish Syrians as being those of the Hebrews, because more powerful; and such deities (די ומונים), i.e. those that have their dwelling or throne on hills, whence they command control of all the region within view, were generally worshipped by the ancient pagans (see Dougall Anal. i, 178; Deyling, Observ. obs., iii, no. 12), sometimes in general (Gruner, Inscriptioni. f. 21; Lae, Mort. postcr. 11), sometimes in a more special sense (Curtius, Symbolik, i, 186 sq.; Greenu, Jena, ii, 282; Gramberg's Religionsd. i, 80). Hill, George, D.D., a divine of the Church of Scotland, born at St Andrews in 1748. He was educated at the university of his native place, where he obtained the Greek professorship, and afterward that of divinity. He subsequently became principal of St. Mary's, chaplain to the king for Scotland, and fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and was long an ornament of the Church of Scotland. He died in 1819. Among his publications are: Notes on the xxvii, 27, 28; 286; Dougall s. t. 1, 108; Rimpach, De sacris gentium in monastibus, Lipsia, 1719; Cuvier, Symbolik, i, 186 sq.; Gessius, Jena. ii, 282; Gramberg's Religion d. i, 80). See HILL PLACE.

Hill, Rowland, brother of Sir Richard Hill, a popular and pious, though eccentric minister, was born at Hawkstone Aug. 13th or 23d, 1744. His views were early directed towards the ministry in connection with the Church of England, and his religious life was greatly developed during his residence as a student at Eton College, under the tuition of Mr. J. E. G. Whitefield, where he studied both the principles of Whitefield and the Calvinistic Methodists, which he strenuously maintained throughout life. His religious zeal at college was strongly marked, but he did not allow it to interfere with his studies. He experienced the greatest difficulty in obtaining admission into the Church of England, as his ecclesiastical views excluded him, and he succeeded at length only through family...
Influence. After his ordination he resumed itinerancy, much against the wishes of his father. In 1773 he obtained the parish of Kingston, Somerset, and was married in the same year, yet still kept up his itinerant ministry. His vigor of thought, earnestness, econ- creteness, and wit drew thousands to listen to him. In 1798, when he left that work, with the aid of his numerous friends, he built Surrey Chapel, London, in 1782. Here he preached to vast congregations for many years. He died April 11, 1833. In the controversy between the Arminian and Calvinistic Meth- ods Hull took an active part, and wrote several bitter pamphlets against Wesley. He was detected (Bristol, 1777) — Full Answer to John Wesley (Bristol, 1777). When the strife ended Hull regretted his severe language, and suppressed one of his bitterest publications. See Sidney, Life of Rowland Hill (London, 1835, 8vo); Stevens, History of Methodism, vol. ii, ch. i and ii; Wesley, Works, iv, 473; vi, 193, 199.

Hill, William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Cumberland Co., Va., March 3, 1799. In 1785 he entered Hampden Sidney College. While there he em- braced religion, and decided to study for the ministry. He graduated in 1788, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover July 10, 1790. After acting for a time as a missionary, he settled in Berkeley, Va., and in January, 1800, assumed charge of the Presbyterian An Church in Winchester. In February, 1834, he became pastor of the Briery Presbyterian Church in Prince Edward Co., where he remained only two years, when impaired health obliged him to resign, and he returned to Winchester to pass the last days of his life. He died there Nov. 16, 1852. Dr. Hill was engaged on a History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, intended to make two 8vo vols. He decided to publish it in num-ers, but only a single number of it appeared. "In the great work assigned in the division of the Church, Dr. Hill's judgment, sympathies, and acts were fully with the New School."—Prob. Quarterly Review, 1853; Sprague, Annals, iii, 563.

Hillel I, Ha-Zaken (The Great), ben-St-mon, was born at Babylon about B.C. 75. He was one of the most eminent Jewish rabbis, founder of a school which bore his name, and by his self-denying, holy life, and great wisdom and learning, exercised a very remarkable influence both upon the theology and literature of his nation. About B.C. 26 he came to Jerusalem, where, while obliged to work for his daily bread, he attended at the same time the lectures of Shemaha and Abtalion, then the presiding officers of the Sanhedrin. About B.C. 90 he was himself chosen president of the Sanhedrin. This office he held for forty years with great suc-sess. Etheridge says: "His administration, along with his coadjutor Shammai, forms an era in the history of rabbinical learning. His scholars were numbered by thousands. The Talmud commemorates eighty of them by name, among whom are the celebrated R. Johanan ben-Zachai, and Jonathan ben-Uzziel, the Chaldean Targum of the Prophets, John Wycliffe, especially famed (Gune-burg in Kitto, among others) that by his teachings he prepared his people for the coming of Christ, but we are inclined to believe that, while Hillel was a most noble leader of the Jews, teaching as he did that the cardinal idea of his life is "to all meekness to all men," and "when reviled not to revile again," yet his views of the prophecies rather inclined him to give warning to his nation—especially prepared, by their social and political dishonesty, to look more intentively for the coming of that mysterious king who, according to their idea, was to free them from the oppression of Herod as well as Caesar, and establish in the land of Judah a throne that should have supremacy over all others—by asserting that "no such king will ever appear" (Sanhedrin). But it is undoubtedly true that he foresaw the dispersion of his nation, for the Talmud informs us that he drew up civil and political ordinances intended to regulate their relation to each other and their treatment by the Gentiles. His greatest aim was to give greater precision to the study of the law. Before his time tradition-learning had been divided into six hundred, or, as some have it, seven hundred sections. He simplified the subject by arranging this once complicated mass under six (Sedairim) treatises. He is reported to have said: "I have caused great excitement among the Jews. Hillel's party finally prevailed, in consequence, it is said, of a bath kol (q. v.) in his favor. Jerome and some other writers have considered Hillel as the founder of the sect of the Pharisees, and Shammai as the first Scribe. This, however, is not true. The Scribes and the Pharisees constitute two distinct sects, and, moreover, were anterior to these two teachers. Hillel died when Jesus was about ten years of age. It seems strange that Josephus makes no mention of Hillel. Arnold in Herzog, Real-Enzyklop. vii, 57, thinks that Pollio (Ant. xvi, i, 10) stands for Hillel. To the school of Hillel he is ascribed the authorship of Megillath Beth Hasmamonim, a work on the history of the Maccabees, now lost. See Bartoloci, Magna Biblioth. Robbin, ii, 783-796; G. E. Geiger et H. Gissman, Brevis Commentatio de Hillel et Schammai, etc. (Altorf, 1707, 4to); Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. Géné-

Hills, Peter (or Peter) the Jew of Jerusalem (sometimes called the younger, because a descendant of Hillel I, or the elder, q. v.), came to the presidency of the Sanhedrin about A.D. 330 (some say A.D. 238), which he held for about thirty-five years. As president of the Sanhedrin, he was, of course, the head of the Jewish school of Tiberilas, and it is said that while in this position he was often consulted by Origen. Some think him the Elledimentionned by Epiphanius (adver. Hieros. xxx, 4 sq.), who embraced the Christian faith on his death-bed. But this fact is unlikely, as the Jews of Hillel's time make no mention of it whatever. Had it occurred they would undoubtedly have excrated his name. An interesting fact, however, connected with Biblical literature to learn from Epiphanius that a Hebrew translation of the Gospel of John, of the Acts of the Apostles, and of Christ's genealogy as recorded by Matthew, existed at this early period of Christianity, for it is said of that for the Hebrews; that the title of parts of the N. T. just mentioned was found secrated in the cabinet of the nasi (president), subsequently to his death. Hillel is said to have convoked a rab-bimcal synod which adjusted the period of the sun with the moon, a calendar then in use. It was not used until the change introduced under Alphonso, king of Castile (Barbococi, Magna Bibliotheca Rabbinorum, ii, 415 sq.). This calendar, while it greatly facilitated the uniform observance of the Paschal festival and other great festivals, tended to promote unity among a people dispersed through so many lands. If the acts of this synod had been handed down in a written form, we should probably have had in them some light on the present discrepancies between the chronology of the Hebrew text and that of the Septuagint. It is generally believed that the rabbins of this synod fixed the epoch of the Creation at the vernal equinox, 3761 years before the birth of Christ. Considered in this respect, the month, year, and attention is also paid in it to the Halachic matters connected with the Jewish festivals. It is based upon the cycle of nineteen years (יומつきיו), introduced by the Greek astronomer Meton, in which occur seven intercalary days. Each year has ten unchangeable months of alternately twenty-nine and thirty days; the two autumal months, Cheshvan and Kislev, which follow the important month Tishri, are left changeable [see הפסח], because they depend upon certain astronomical phenomena and the following points of Jewish law: 1. The month of Tishri is never to begin with the day which, to a great extent, belongs to the former month. 2. The Day of Atonement is not to fall on the day before or after the Sabbath; and, 3. That the Ḥosannah Day is not to be on a Sabbath. It is impossible now to say with certainty how much of this calendar is Hillel's own, how much he took from the universal traditions, since it is beyond question that some astronomical rules were handed down by the presidents. This calendar Hillel introduced A.D. 359. A similarity of names has caused him to be considered as the author of a MS. copy of the O. T., which was preserved until the close of the 19th century, and was used to correct later copies. He died towards the close of the 4th century. — Rossi, Dizion. storico degli Autori Ebrei, p. 170, 171; Wolf, Biblioth. Hebraica; Hoffer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv, 688; Etheridge, Introd. Hiller, Matthias, a German Protestant theologian and Orientalist, was born at Stuttgart Feb. 15, 1646. He became professor of logic and metaphysics in 1692, and of Oriental languages and theology in 1698. In 1716 he exchanged these offices for the priory of Königshorn, where he died, Feb. 11, 1725. He acquired great reputation for his works on language, grammar, and metaphysics. He wrote Synagogae Germaniae Hebraeorum; —Lexicon Latino-Hebraicum (1685) : —De Arcano Keri et Kethub (Tubingen, 1792, 8vo), on the accentuation and punctuation of the Bible; —Institutiones Linguae Semiticae (several times reprinted, as Tusingen, 1790, 8vo) ; —Onomasticon Scerotum (Tubingen, 1706, 4to, transal. into German by himself): —Synagogae hermeticae quibus lora S. Hiller, Philip Frederick, one of the best and most prolific hymn writers of the Evangelical Church of Southern Germany, was born at Milhausen in 1699; educated under J. A. Bengel; became pastor at two or three Lithuan villages and finally at Neuburg in 1729; lost his voice in 1751, and died in 1769. After his retirement from the pulpit he devoted himself especially to sacred poetry, and produced over 1000 hymns, many of which have great excellencies. It is said that, next to the Bible, his spiritual songs are perhaps the most widely sung in the languages of Germany and Switzerland. A complete edition appeared at Reutlingen in 1844 and 1851. —Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vol. vi; Ilagcn- bach, Hist. of the 18th and 19th Centuries (translated by Hurst), ii, 393; Winkworth, Christian Singers of Germany, p. 273.

Hillhouse, Augustus L., author of the beautiful hymn beginning "Trembling before thine awful throne," was born at Lebanon, Conn., about 1792, and died in Paris March 14, 1859. He was a younger brother of James A. Hillhouse, the poet. —New Englander, xviii, 557.

Hilliard, Timothy, a Congregational minister, was born in 1746 in Kensington, N. H. He graduated at Harvard College in 1764, and in 1768 was appointed tutor, in which he continued until his resignation to be ordained pastor at Barnstable. This charge he resigned April 1783, and was installed co-pastor at Cambridge Oct. 27, where he remained until his death, May 9, 1790. He published the Dudmilian Lecture at Harvard College (1780), and several occasional sermons. —Sprague, Annals, i, 660.

Hillyer, Asa, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Sheffield, Mass., April 6, 1763; entered Yale College in 1782, and graduated in 1786. He was licensed to preach by the old Presbytery of Suffolk, L. I., in 1788, and was appointed to the churches at Connecticut Farms and Bottle Hill (now Madison, N. J., the seat of the Drew Theological Seminary and short distance from the depot, 29, 1789) was ordained and installed as pastor at the latter place. In the summer of 1800 he accepted an invitation to the church in Orange, "one of the largest and most influential in the state." Here he labored with great acceptance and success for more than thirty years. In 1818 he received the degree of D.D. from Allegheny College. In the disruption of the Presbyterian Church (1837), Dr. Hillyer sided with the New School. "But, though he regarded the division as an unwise measure, it never disturbed his pleasant relations with those of his brethren with whose common brother he differed from his own" (G. N. Judd, in Sprague's Annals). He was a trustee of the College of New Jersey from 1811 to his death, and from 1812 until the division of the General Assembly one of the first directors of the theological seminary at Princeton. This school, too, he contributed to the last with an unremitted interest.—Tuttle, (Rev. Samuel L.), History of the Presbyterian Church, Madison, N. J., p. 39 sq.; Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, iii, 383.

Himerius (Ιμηρίου), a celebrated Greek sophist and rhetorician, was born at Prusa, in Bithynia, A.D. 316. He received his education of Proerusius, whose rival he afterwards became. After travelling considerably in the East, he settled in Athens as teacher of rhetoric. He became very famous in his profession, having among his pupils Basil, Gregory of Nazianzen, and other distinguished men. The emperor Julian, during his visit at Athens, A.D. 355, attracted by his learning and eloquence, invited him to his court at Antioch, and made him his secretary (A.D. 362). After the death of his rival, Proerusius, in A.D. 368, he returned to Athens and resumed his former calling. He became blind toward the close of his life, and died in a fit of epilepsy A.D. 368. Himerius was a pagan, but exceedingly kind to the Christians. Of his works, only a part are now extant. —Lardner, Works; Smith, Dict. Greek and Rom. Mythol., ii; Pierer, Universal Lex. viii, 883; Hoffer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv.

Himerius, bishop of Tarragona, Spain, known by a letter which was addressed to him by Siricius, bishop of Rome (385-398), and in which the latter tolerates supreme ecclesiastical authority, and seeks by flattery to gain Himerius's consent to his pretensions. See Hard, Concil. i, 484; J. A. Cramer, additions to Bossuet, iv, 597. —Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vi, 98, 99. The Roman Catholic views may be seen in Wetzer u. Himyarites (the classics called Homerites or Homericus), an Arabian people, claiming to be descendants of Himyar, a grandson of Saba, one of the mythic al fathers of the Arabians, who is said to have been a prince in South Arabia about 3000 before Mohammed's time. They established in that part of Arabia some very flourishing towns, including Saba and Aden (Athana), the former noted more especially from its mention in the Bible, and extended their dominion nearly over the entire coast of South Africa. At the time of Constantine the Great this people inclined to Christianity, but in 292 they were subjected by the Ethiopians, and were obliged to forsake their Christian faith.
About seventy years later the Persians took the most important cities from the Himyarites, and in A.D. 692 they returned to the Mohametans, and embraced Islamism. The Himyarites had a language of their own [see ARABIC LANGUAGE], the so-called Him-yratice, of which traces have lately been found in the ancient remains to which the Oriental scholar Gesenius, and, later, Rödiger, have given much study. Of late Osiander has undertaken this task, and apparently has been much more successful. The results of his investigations are found in Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländ.
Gesell. (vol. x. and xix. Lpz. 1856 and 1865). — Brockh, bauzeit. Lex. vii. 929. See Jews.

Hin ("777, hîn, Sept. eîv, av, or wv), a measure of liquids, containing the seventh part of a “bath” (Numb.
25, 4 sq.; xxvii, 5, 7, 14; Ezek. iv. 11), i. e. twelve Roman sextarii, according to Josephus (iv. Ant. ii. 5, 31.
ix. 439. 445). The word corresponds with the Egyptian hn, hno, which properly signifies a vessel and then a small measure, sextarius, Greek tvov (see Leemans, Lettre et Salcolini, p. 154; Böckh, Metrolog.
Untersuch. p. 244, 260). But it is not certain that the Hebrew and Egyptian measures were of the same size.
Gesenius. According to the Rabbinists, it contained only the sixth part of the bath. See MEASURE.

Hinchcliffe, John, D.D., was born in Westminster in 1731. He was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1764 he was appointed head master of Westminster Seminary, in 1766 vicar of Greenwich, and in 1769 bishop of Peterborough. Hinchcliffe was a man of sound scholarship, and especially celibrated as an orator both in the pulpit and in the forum.
He died in 1794. He only published three sermons de-ivered on public occasions. A collection of his Sermons (London, 1796, 8vo) is not without merit, but they certainly did not meet the expectations of his contemporaries. — Hook, Eccles. Digg. vi. 73; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 850.

Hinnom, Abraham, a distinguished German theologian and Orientalist, born at Doebeln, near Hamburg, May 2, 1832, was educated at the University of Wit-
tenbergh. After filling several important appointments as minister, he was, in 1867, made court preacher to the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, and honorary professor at the University of Giessen. But in the year immediately following he resigned these positions and returned to Hamburg. Here he was accused by some ministers of sympathy with Millenarians and Pietists, which so upsetted upon his constitution and mind that he died afta short illness, February 11, 1885. Among his works are especially worthy of note, Stiilge vorn und physisrubiocene obscurorum (Lübeck, 1675, 4to) — De Scholia et pactiosa iuter Muhammadem et Christiana filia Colu-tor (Arab. and Lat., Hamb. 1690, 4to). He published also Alcoran and first edition of the Koran, as that of Paganini (Ven., 1580) was wholly destroyed by order of the pope. He also left in MS. Lexicon arabico-latinum in Alcoranum. — Jöcher, Allgem. Gelehr. Lex. ii, Hinckley, John, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in Warwickshire in 1617, and was educated at St.

Alban's Hall, Oxford. He filled successively the vicariate of Calcashill, Berkshire, and the rectorships of Drayton, Leicestershire, and Northfield, Worcestershire. He died in 1685. He published Four Sermons (Oxf., 1657, 6to; also in the Verulam (1638, 8vo). — Persuasive to Conformity (1670, 8vo), addressed in the form of a letter to the Dissenters. — Fisculiae literarum, or Letters on Several Occasions (1680, 8vo). The first half contains letters exchanged between him and Richard Baxter on the divisions in the Church. — Hook, Eccles. Biog. vii. 74; of Authors, i. 850.

Hincks, Edward, D.D., a clergyman of the Church of England, and a distinguished Assyrian scholar, was born in August, 1792, and was prepared for college under his father's care. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, at a very early age, and obtained a fellowship before he was twenty-one, being vicar pro tempore of all the candidates. After graduation he became rector of Andrea, one of the college livings, whence he was promoted to Kilkeigh, in the diocese of Down (north of Ireland), and there he spent the last forty-one years of his life. Dr. Hincks was considered one of the best philosophers in Europe. He contributed not a few of the papers, especially on Egyptian hieroglyphics and Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions, to the Royal Irish Academy, the Royal Society of Literature, the Asiatic Society, and the British Association. "His talent for deciphering cuneiform characters and languages was wonderful. It was applied to the study of Egyptian hierogly-phics, and to the inscriptions in the cuneiform character found in Persepolis, Nineveh, and other parts of ancient Assyria. In this field especially he labored for years with great perseverance and success, having been the first to ascertain the numeral system, and the power and form of its signs by means of the inscriptions at Van. He was one of the chief restorers of Assyrian learning, throwing great light on the linguistic character and grammatical structure of the languages represented on the Assyrian monuments. Living in a remote country village, where his means at his command means at his command, he yet contended with great difficulties. In London, beside the British Museum, he would have accomplished more than he did" (London Athenaeum, December, 1866).
He died December 3, 1866. See CUNEIFORM INScriptions; HIEROGLYPHICS. (J. H. W.)

Hincks, John, a Unitarian minister, born in Cork, Ireland, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and the Belfast Academical Institution, and in 1827 was called to a Unitarian Church at Liverpool. He died in 1881. The only published writings of his are Sermons and occasional services, with Memoir by J. H. Thorn (Lond. 1829, 8vo). — Darling, Cyclop. Bibl. i. 1484;

Hinmar or Laon was nephew of Hinrmac, archbishop of Rheims, who at first patronized him, and had him elected bishop of Laon, about A.D. 856. He soon showed an obstinate and refractory spirit; set at naught his uncle, who was his metropolitan; rebelled against his king, and scorned the decrees of synods, whose sentence of condemnation he at some time met at appealing to Rome;
but at length he was summoned, heard, condemned, and deposed from his see of Laon. He was also imprisoned and his eyes cruelly put out, A.D. 871.
Two years later, at the Council of Troyes, he obtained access to the pope, who reinstated him, assigned him a portion of the episcopal revenues, and induced him even to resume his pontifical functions in part. He died about A.D. 880. He wrote many Letters, etc., which are lost; but a few may be found with his life, defence, etc., in Labbe, Concil. tom. vii, and in Simondon's edition of the works of the bishop of Rheims (q. v.). See Clarke, Succussion of Sacred Literature, vol. ii. Collet, Vie d'Hinmar de Laon; Biddle, Hist. of the Papacy, ii. 24—27; Neander, Church Hist. iii. 864; Wetzer and Welte, Kirchen- Lex.

Hinmar, bishop of Rheims, one of the most learned divines of his age, was born about A.D. 805, of a noble family, related to the counts of Toulouse, and was educated in the Monastery of St. Denis, near Paris. After finishing his studies he was summoned to the court of Louis le Debonnaire, to whom he faithfully adhered, and who employed him, after his restoration, in settling the ecclesiastical affairs of the empire; after this he retired to his monastery, whence he was again summoned to pursue his clerical life by being made a canon and bishop of Rheims, A.D. 845. On the accession of Lothaire, an attempt was made to depose him from his see, without success. He was a zealous supporter of the rights of the Gallican Church. In 847 the controversy with Gottschalk (Godeschalcus) (q. v.) about predestination arose, and when the case of Gottschalk came before him, he drove it on with too great heat, and Gottschalk by his means was condemned and punished with much and unjust severity. One of the most important events in Hincmar's life was his controversy in 862 with pope Nicholas I, one of the most learned men of the Roman Catholic Church. Rothadus, bishop of Soissons, and suffragan of Hincmar, deposed a priest of his diocese, who appealed to Hincmar as metropolitan, and was ordered by him to be restored to office. Rothadus, who resisted this order, was, in consequence, condemned and excommunicated by the archbishop, who appealed to the pope, who at once ordered Hincmar to restore Rothadus, or to appear at Rome either in person or by his representative, to vindicate the sentence. He sent a legate to Rome, but refused to restore the deposed bishop; whereupon Nicholas annulled the sentence, and required that the pope should have another hearing, and this time in Rome. Hincmar, after some demurral, was forced to acquiesce. The cause of Rothadus was re-examined, and he was acquitted and restored to his see. But perhaps more historically interesting is Hincmar's opposition to the temporal power of the medieval papacy. See PAPACY. Under the successors of Adrian II, the succession to the sovereignty of Lorraine on the death of king Lothaire was questioned; the pope favoured the pretensions of the emperor Louis in opposition to those of Charles the Bold of France. Adrian addressed a mandate to the subject of Charles and to the nobles of Lorraine, accompanied by a menace of the censure of the Church. To this Hincmar offered a firm and persistent opposition. He was equally firm, ten years later, in resisting the undue extension of the royal prerogative in ecclesiastical affairs. Louis III, in opposition to the judgment of the Council of Vienna, wished to have another hearing, and Hincmar, according to the opinion of some, was inspired with the desire to bestow upon his favourite, Odoacer, the see of Beauvais; but Hincmar boldly remonstrated, and fearlessly denounced the attempt as an unjustifiable usurpation. He died A.D. 882. His works consist chiefly of Letters about local ecclesiastical affairs, and his treatise De Firmatione Dei et liber arbitratione, and small tracts on discipline. A former treatise of his, De Prodestatione, is lost. In the controversy with Gottschalk he maintained that "God wills the salvation of all men; that some will be saved through the gift of divine grace; that others are lost, owing to their demerit; Christ suffered for all; whoever does not appropriate these sufferings has himself to blame." All his remains are to be found in the careful edition of his works edited by Sirmond, Opera, duos in tomos digesta, etc. (Paris, 1614, 2 vols. fol.). See Noorder, Hincmar, Erzbischof v. Hind (हिंद, ayaksh, Gen. xlix, 21; 2 Sam. xxii, 34; Job xxxvi, 1; Ps. xviii, 33; 2 Sam. xxix, 9; Cant. ii, 7; iii, 5; Hab. iii, 19; or हिंद, ayakbeth, Prov. v, 19; Jer. xiv, 5; "Ajaileth," Psa. xxii, title), the female of the hart or stag, "doe" being the female of the fallow-deer, and "roe" being sometimes used for that of the roebehc. All the females of the Cervids, with the exception of the reindeer, are females. See DEER. The hind is frequently noticed in the poetical parts of Scripture as emblematic of activity (Gen. xlix, 21; 2 Sam. xxii, 34; Psa. xviii, 33; Hab. iii, 19), gentleness (Prov. v, 19), feminine modesty (Cant. ii, 7; iii, 5), earnest longings (Psa. xlii, 1), and maternal affection (Jer. xiv, 5). Its shyness and remonstence from the haunts of men are also noticed (Job xxxix, 1), and its timidity, causing it to cast its young at the sound of thunder (Psa. xxix, 9). The conclusion which some have drawn from the passage last quoted, that the hind produces her young with great difficulty, is not, in reality, deducible from the words, and is expressly contradicted by Job xxxix, 3. It may be remarked on Psa. xviii, 33, and Hab. iii, 19, where the Lord is said to cause the feet to stand firm like those of a hind on high places, that this representation is in perfect harmony with the habits of mountain stags; but the version of Prov. v, 19, "Let the wife of thy bosom be as the beloved hind and favorite roe," seems to indicate that here the words are generalized so as to include under roe monomorous species of antelopes, whose affections and consortship are permanent and strong; for stags are polygamous. The Sept. reads בְּן יִשֶׂעַ (in Gen. xxv, 21) rendering it πρόβατον δρακόν, "a luxuriant terebinth," an emendation adopted by Bochart. Lowth has proposed a similar change in Psa. xxix, but in neither case can the emendation be accepted. Naphthali verified the comparison of himself to a "graceful or tall hind" by the events recorded in Judg. iv, 6-9; v, 18. The inscription of Psa. xxii, "the hind of the morning," probably refers to a tune of that name. See AJEELETH.

Hind, SAMUEL, bishop of Norwich, was born about 1798, on the isle of Barbadoes. At an early age he was sent to England, and educated at Oxford. In 1822 he took orders in the Church of England, and in 1849 he was appointed bishop of Norwich. Later, he was made vice principal of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford. He died in 1870. Bishop Hind wrote The three Temples of the true God contruted (1830; 3d ed. 1857, 8vo) — Inspiration and Authority of Scripture (1831, 8vo) — Script. and the Authorized Version of Scripture (1858, 12mo) — Catechist's Manual (2d ed. 1855, 12mo) — Hist. of Christianity (1829, 1846, 1859, 1859, 2 vols. 8vo), which was originally contributed to the Encycol. Hinduism or Hindu religion, the name of the variety of creeds derived from Brahmanic sources. It is the religion of the East, professed, in some form or another, by nearly half the human race (see Max Muller, Chips from a German Workshop, i, 23), especially if Buddhism (q.v.) is included, or considered as a development of it. The different sects into which the Hindus (on the origin of the Hindus, and their gradual occupation of India, see Lassen, Ind. Alterth., i. 511 sq.; Müller, Science of Language, p. 240 sq.; Donaldson, New Crutypus, p. 118, 119, 24 ed.; Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, q.v.) are divided, are of modern origin, and the system of theology taught by them differs very much from the religion of their forefathers.

I. History.—For brevity’s sake, we will divide Hinduism into three great periods, the Vedic, Epic, and Puranic. The first is described in the sacred books of the Hindus, the Veda (q.v.); that of the second from the epic poem Rāmāyana, and the great epics Mahābhārata; and that of the third chiefly from the mythological works, the Purānas and Tantras.

1. The Vedic Period.—According to the hymns of the Veda, the Hindus of that period regarded the elements of nature as heavenly beings, and worshipped and revered them as such. Among these were first in order Agni, the fire of the sun and lightning; Indra, the bright, cloudless firmament; the Maruts, or winds; Sūrya, the sun; Usas, the dawn; and various kinds of nature-spirits, the luminous beings, and nature in general. "They are supplicated to confer temporal blessings upon the worshipper, riches, life, posterity—"the shortsighted vanities of human desire, which constituted the sum of heathen prayer in all heathen countries." (Huxley, The Ratio of Science, p. 9, 10.) That contrast in this particular between heathen and Christian worshippers has been well commented upon by Stuhr (Religions-Systeme d. hindischen Volker d. Orienta, Einleitung, p. xii). Indeed, it is a fact worthy the notice of philosophers and of scholars in comparative science of religion that only a very small fraction of heathen prayers are offered for spiritual or moral benefits (compare Crozeur, Symbolik, iv, 162; Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, i. 181, 182). "We proclaim eagerly, Maruts, your ancient greatness, for the sake of inducing your prompt appearance, as the indication of (the approach of) the shower of benefits;" or, "Offer your nutritious viands to the great hero (Indra), who is pleased by praise, and to Vishnu (one of the forms of the sun), the two invincible deities who ride upon the radiant summit of the clouds as upon a well-trained steed. Indra and Vishnu, the devout worshipper glorifies the radiant approach of your two viands, who are the grantees of the fruits of the earth, and who bestow upon the mortal who worships you an immediately receivable (reward), through the distribution of that fire which is the scatterer (of desired blessings)." Such is the strain in which the Hindu of that period addressed his gods. Ethical considerations are foreign to these religious outbursts of the mind. Sin and evil, indeed, are often adverted to, and the gods are praised because they destroy sinners and evil-doers; but one would err in associating with these words our notions of sin or wrong. A sinner, in these hymns, is a man who does not address praises to those elementary deities, or who does not gratify them with the oblations they receive at the hands of the believer. He is the foe, the robber, the demon—in short, the borderer infesting the territory of the "pious" man, who, in his turn, injures and kills, but, in adoring Agni, Indra, and the other deities, who are far more elevated than the rest; and he is satisfied with regulating the detail of the Soma and animal sacrifice according to the rank which he assigns to his deities. A real answer to this great question the theologians attempt who explain the "mysteries, doctrine" held in the utmost reverence by all Hindus, and laid down in the writings known under the name of Upanishads, which relate not only to the process of creation, but to the nature of a supreme being, and its relation to the human soul. In the Upanishads, Agni, Indra, Viṣṇu, and the other deities of the Vedic hymns, become symbols to assist the mind in its attempt to understand the true nature of one absolute being, and the manner in which it manifests itself in its worldly form. The human soul itself is of the same nature as this supreme or great soul; its ultimate destination is that of becoming reunited with the supreme soul and ceasing to exist, as far as it emanated from this being, is already clearly laid down in these Upanishads, though the language in which it is expressed still adapts itself to the legendary and allegorical style that characterizes the Brahmanic portion of the Veda. The Upanishads became thus the basis of the enlightened faith of India. They are not a system of philosophy, but they contain all the germs whence the three great systems of Hindu philosophy arose; and like the latter, while revealing the struggle of the Hindu mind to reach the comprehension of one supreme being, they advance sufficiently far to express their belief in such a being, but at the same time acknowledge the invalidity of the human mind to come to the presence of essence (Chambers, Encyclopaedia). See UPANISHADS.

The Veda also teaches the two ideas so contradictory to the human understanding, and yet so easily recognized in every human heart: God has established the eternal laws of right and wrong; he punishes sin and red-wards virtue; and yet the same God is willing to forgive: just, yet merciful: a judge, and yet a father (Miller, i, 38).
But there is no trace, at least not in the Veda, of metempsychosis, which has generally been sup-pposed to be a distinguishing feature of the Indian religion, especially of the Vedic period. "Instead of this, we find what is really the sine qua non of all real religion, a belief in immortality, and in personal immortality ... passages wherein immortality of the soul, personal immortality, and personal responsibility after death are clearly proclaimed" (Müller, i, 45). Professor Booth (Journal of Theosophical Society, January 1907) says that we find in the Veda "beautiful conceptions of an immateriality expressed in unadorned language with childlike conviction. If it were necessary, we might find here the most powerful weapons against the view which has lately been revived and proclaimed as new, that Persis has taken away the immortality of the soul and that even the nations of Europe had derived it from that quarter—as if the religious spirit of every gifted race was not able to arrive at it by its own strength." We find also in the Veda vague allusions to a place of punishment for the wicked. "In verse it is said that the dead are rewarded for their good deeds; that they leave or cast off all evil, and, glorified, take their new bodies. ... A pit is mentioned into which the lawless are said to be hurled down, and into which Indra casts those who offer no sacrifices. ... In one passage we read that 'those who break the commandments of Varuna, and who speak lies, are born for that deep place'" (Miller, i, 47; comp. Dr. Muir, Yama, in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, p. 10).
2. "The Epic period of Hinduism is marked by a similar development of the same creeds, the general features of which are characteristic of the Vedic age; but, to him, have presented the more cer-popular creed strives to find a centre round which to group its imaginary gods, whereas the philosophical creed finds its expression in the groundworks of the Sāṅkhya, Nyāya, and Vedānta systems of philosophy. In the for-mater, we find two gods in particular who are rising to the highest rank. Vishnu and Siva are for as Brahmān (the masculine form of Brahman), though he was looked upon now and then and superior to both, he gradually disappears, and becomes merged into the philosophical Brahma (the neuter form of the same word), which is a further evolution of the great soul of the Upanishads.
In the Edāsmita, the superiority of Vishnu is admitted without dispute; in the great epics, the Mahābhārata, however, which, unlike the former epics, is the product of successive ages, there is an apparent rivalry between the claims of Vishnu and Siva to occupy the highest rank in the pantheon; but Saneéret philologists will first have to unravel the chronological position of the various portions of this work, to lay bare its groundwork, and to show the gradual additions it received, before it will be able to determine the successive formation of the legends which are the basis of classical Hindu mythology. Yet so complete is the pantheon that the name is already predetermined during this Epic period for the supremacy of Vishnu, and that the policy of incorporating rather than combating antagonistic creeds led more to a quiet admission than to a warm support of Siva's claims to the highest rank. For the character of these gods, and their relation to the Vedic and the Epic period, see below. "We will point, however, to one remarkable myth, as it will illustrate the altered position of the gods during the Epic period. In the Vedic hymns, the immortality of the gods is never matter of doubt: most of the elementary beings are invoked and described as everlasting; as liable neither to decay nor death. The offer-tings they receive may add to their comfort and strength; they may invigorate them, but, as it is sometimes said, they are indispensable for their existence. It is, on the contrary, the pious sacrificer himself who, through his offerings, secures to himself long life, and, as it is sometimes hyperbolically called, immortality. The same nomination occurs elsewhere about the oldest Brāhmaṇas. It is only in the latest work of this class, the Satapatha-Brāhmana, and more especially in the Epic poems, that we find the inferior gods as mortal in the beginning, and as becoming immortal through external agency. In the Satapatha-Brāhmana, the juice of the soma plant, offered by the worshipper, or at another time clarified beer, or even animal sacrifices, impart to them this immortality. At the Epic period, Vishnu teaches them how to obtain the Amrīta, or beverage of immortality, without which they would go to destruction; and this epic Amrīta itself is merely a compound, increased by various elements, and that the various elements of the epic writings are called or likened to Amrīta, i.e. a substance that frees from death." It is obvious, therefore, that gods like these could not strike root in the religious mind of the nation. We must look upon them more as the gods of poetry than of real life; nor do we find that they enjoyed great veneration. As a hero they was allotted to the two principal gods, Vishnu and Siva.
"The philosophical creed of this period adds little to the fundamental notions contained in the Upanishads, but it frees itself from the legendary dross which still imparts to them a deep tinge of mysticism. On the other hand, it conceives and teaches that the union of the individual soul with the supreme spirit may be aided by penances, such as peculiar modes of breathing, particular postures, protracted fasting, and the like; in short, by those practices which are systemized under the name of Yuga doctrine. The most remarkable work which inculcates this doctrine is the celebrated poem Bhagavadgītā, which has been wrongly considered by European writers as a pure Sāṅkhya work, whereas Sāṅkara, the great Hindu theologian, who commented on it, and other native commentators after him, have profoundly ascertained that it is in reality a revelation. The doctrine of the reunion of the individual soul with the supreme soul was necessarily founded on the assumption that the former must have become free from all guilt affecting its purity before it can be remerged into the source whence it proceeded; and since one human life is apparently too short for enabling the soul to attain its accomplishment, the Hindu mind concluded that the soul, after the death of its temporary owner, had to be born again, in order to complete the work it had left undone in its previous existence, and that it must submit to the same fate until its task is fulfilled.
This is the doctrine of metempsychosis, which, in the ab-nence of a belief in grace, is a logical consequence of a system that holds the human soul to be of the same nature as that of an absolute God." This doctrine, as we have already stated, is foreign to the Vedic period. It is in some of the Upanishads, which have been developed by means of the Vedas, but their development belongs decisively to the Epic time, when it pervades the legends, and affects the social life of the nation. See METEMPSYCHOsis; CARAJA, III, 8.
3. "The Purānic period of Hinduism is the period of its decline, so far as the popular creed is concerned. Its pantheon is already in the som of the vast composition of the period. The triads of principal Hindu gods, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, remain still at the head of its imaginary gods; but whereas the Epic time is generally characterized by a friendly harmony between the high-cast occupants of the divine spheres, the Purānic period shows discord and destruction. The popular adoration has turned away from Brahma to Vishnu and Siva, who fore the vina, or lute, is her attribute; Sri, Kubehni, etc., wife of Vishnu, dispenser of blessings. But the most important of all is Siva's female partner, Durga, Kali, or Cales, goddess of evil and destruction, whose worship is far the most extensive. Aside from these, there is yet a multitude of inferior gods, demigods, etc., the principal of which are the seven or ten Brahma-nidhis or 'Gates of Brahma,' the seven or ten Dabahkas, with Diti and Aditi for wives; from Diti come the Daityas or Asuras, the demons (of destruction), but from Aditi the Suras or Devas (i.e. gods). The Gandharvas are the musicians and dancers of heaven; the Aputaras, the heavenly nymphs; the Yakshas, the hosts of evil spirits; and the Yakshezas, the enemies of mankind and of all good. The earth is, besides, inhabited by a multitude of evil spirits. The existence of the three worlds (of the gods, the earth, and the lower world) is not considered eternal; it is to be destroyed by Kala, the god of time, who, in regard to this act, is called Mahapralaya, or the great end. Some animals also are the objects of religious adoration or fear, particularly the bull; also the snakes, whose connection with the demigods brought forth the monkeys, which are the objects of superstition and dread.

Among these, the cow is the most honored, and the Buffalo among trees.

II. Deities.—It has been stated above that the original worship of the Hindus appears to have been addressed to the elements. The heavens, the sun, the moon, fire, the air, the earth, and spirits are the objects most frequently addressed. In fact, the deities invoked appear to be as numerous as the prayers addressed to them. It would be impossible to give any account of the numerous inferior deities, whose number is said to amount to 330,000,000. The most important are the Lakshapalas, who are 'guardians of the world,' who are the eight gods next in rank to the Triad: 1. Indra, the god of the heavens; 2. Agni, the god of fire; 3. Varuna, the god of hell; 4. Surya, the god of the sun; 5. Taru-n, the god of water; 6. Purana, the god of the wind; 7. Karsa, the god of wealth; 8. Soma, or Chandru, the god of the moon. Many other deities were afterwards included in the list; among them, Geena, god of wisdom and science; Kamas, god of love; Ganga, goddess of the river Ganges; Ganad, messenger of the gods, etc. Each of the gods besides has his legal spouse. The most important among these goddesses are Saraswati, wife of Brahma, goddess of eloquence, the protector of arts and science, and particularly of music, where
The Sauras and Ganapatyas are not very numerous. The religious sects of India are divided into two classes, which may be called clerical and lay. The priests may also be divided into two classes, the monastic and secular clergy, the majority belonging to the monastic order, of which they are supported, according to the rules given by laymen to teachers who lead an ascetic life.

The sects which have already been enumerated profess to follow the authority of the Veda, but there are other sects which disavow its authority, and are therefore regarded as forming no part of the Hindu Church. The people believe that the divinity is present in some form in all things, and that all those who eat all kinds of flesh except that of cows; willingly admit procreated from every caste; and consider the profession of arms the religious duty of every individual. An interesting account of this sect is given in Malcolm's Sketch of the Ancient History of India, xi. The Vaisnavas are a sect of Hindus, Sikhs. For the distinctions of caste, see INDIA.

IV. DOCTRINE AND WORSHIP.—As already intimated, a broad distinction exists between the religion of the people and that of the learned. The popular religion is a debased polytheism, without unity of belief or worship. The people believe in the gods, but they are of no certain forms, the only and sure means of salvation, and that those who observe these things will, at a fixed time after death, be admitted into the joys of paradise. The religion of the learned class, on the other hand, professes to rest upon pure contemplation; its theory of the universe is pantheistic, and its religious observances, apart from abstraction of mind in the universal mind, are of no value. The daily duties of the Brahmin consist of five religious occupations, considered as five sacraments: the study of the Veda (brahmajjiguma, or ahuta, i. e. not offered); offering for the progress of the honor of the gods (huta, i. e. offered); maintaining the fire of the dead (pratishthi) in honor of the man (pratishthi); offering the Bali in honor of the spirits (prakruti), and of hospitality, in honor of mankind (brahmanda-huta). Offerings and prayers for all possible objects follow each other from morning till night. Prayers are recommended either by the Veda of the occasion.

The number of ablations the Hindus consider as obligatory is immense; near every temple a pond is provided for that purpose; but the most sanctifying ablations are those performed in the Ganges, particularly at the five points where it unites with other streams. The holiest of all, according to the popular belief of the Hindus, is Allahabad, where, besides the Jumna, the Sarasvati also unites with the Ganges. The most important act of worship consists partly of bloody sacrifices. The principal among these is that of Asvamedha, or sacrifice of horses. Bloody sacrifices are mostly made to Siva and Kali, while the worship of Vishnu is generally that of water, oil, butter, fruit, flowers, etc. All sins of commission or of omission may be effaced by penances described in the laws, and provided for every caste and every case; a thorough fast of twelve days' duration (Puraka) cancels all sins. The prescribed penances must be observed by all, and if sin is not avoided the penalty of his sin in a new form of existence. There are therefore a great number of penitents and hermits in India, who seek merit by the renunciation of all enjoyment and the mortification of the flesh. In fact, Eastern monasticism, in many respects, the type of that of the Buddhist Church. See Monachism.

The ghosts of the learned Hindus consists in regarding union (Yoga) with God as the highest aim of man; this doctrine is further developed in the philosophy of the Veda. The liberation following death is twofold. Such souls as have arrived at high perfection are admitted into the Brahmic heavens (Paradise), where they enjoy a much higher degree of bliss than in the pure state of Indra, but after a time they are sent back again to undergo another period of probation. But when man has by contemplation identified himself with the divinity, or Nirvana, his soul enters into, and becomes part of the immense soul (Atma), and enjoys everlasting felicity, not having to pass through any new forms of human life. Those of this class who aim at reaching this unity with the divinity are called Yogi. An essential means of arriving at this result is found in the penances or Tapa. On certain occasions (fasts) all the practices of the religion are united, sacrifices, offerings, prayers, etc. There are eighteen such fasts considered obligatory. The feast of Hora or Holaka, is the oldest and most important. The Vaisnavas are the offering to all gods. It consists, as has already been stated in our treatment of the Vedic period, in throwing melted butter (ghee) on the flame of the sacred fire, which must be carefully kept burning. The Brahmins offer it every morning, both in their own house, for the first to the god of fire, and the moon, then to all the other gods and goddesses. Each particular feast presents some peculiarities, and they are differently observed in the various localities. Aside from these general feasts, there are many more observed in some districts or of a local character. The most important are those of Jaggernaut, Benares, Guja, Allahabad, Tripety, Dvaraka, Somnath, Ramisaran, the sea Manasarovara, Gangotri, Omerkuntuk, Trimbuck-Nasser, Pervuttum, Parkur, Mathura, and Binduruband.

V. Images, Temples, etc.—The Hindus have images of a great number of gods; they are of a grotesque or fantastic kind; some are represented with heads of animals (as Ganesh), others with superabundant limbs (as Brahma, with four arms), or disfigured, etc. Antiquity was more sparing in this line, but afterwards the arts of India were applied to the production of innumerable monstrosities. The lower orders of divinities are often represented under the form of animals (thus Hanuman is represented as an ape, Mundi as a bull, etc.), and are generally considered as the steeds of the higher deities. These images of the gods are placed in the temples, which originally were groves; they now are pagodas, built in the shape of a pyramid ornamented with columns, statues, etc. These are said to have mystical significance; they are divided into courts by means of colonnades, surrounded by high walls, and by the habitations of the priests. In the vestibule there is always an image of some inferior deity confronting the worshipper. Admission is permitted to all without distinction of race or creed, but the right to worship is only granted to the Kshatriyas and the Vaisyas; the inner part of the temple is reserved for the Brahmans or priests, which, in each pagoda, are under the control of a head Brahmin, who admits as many assistants as the income of the pagoda will permit. In some of these temples there are as many as 3000 Brahmans. Their priestly duties consist in offering sacrifices and reading the Veda. The worship is accompanied by songs and dances from the two higher classes of dancing girls, the Dervadina and the Natakas.

Hindu Philosophy is divided into six systems or astas, namely, the Nyaya, Vaisesika, Sankhya, Yoga, Mimamsa, and Vedanta. The Sankhya and Yoga agree in all essentials, except that the former is atheistic and the latter theistic. The systems generally unite on certain points: 1. The Mimmansa, excepted, their end is to inculcate expedients for “salvation,” which is deliverance from bondage. 2. The soul, though distinct from the mind, the senses, and the body, yet identifies itself with them. As a consequence of this delusion, it conceives the thought of ownership in itself, and others, and supposes it receives pleasure and pain through the body. As a farther consequence, it engages in good and evil works, which have merit or demerit. As this merit or demerit must be awarded, the soul must pass to Elysium or Hell, and repeatedly be born and die. This is bondage caused by ignorance, from which, when the soul is delivered, it gains absorption into the deity. 3. As a consequence of the foregoing, good deeds and their reward are only a less curse than their opposites, and are to be deprecated, as they compel the soul till the reward is experienced to abide in the body of a god, or a man, or other superior being. 4. Release from transmigration can only be had through “right apprehension,” which consists in recognizing the body of the soul itself as distinct from the mind and all. To gain this “right apprehension” one must study the Sthastras; and, in order to clearness of intellect and heart for this work, such good works as sacrifices, alms, pilgrimages, repetitions of sacred words, and the like, are to be performed, but without desire for reward. 5. They all maintain that the soul has existed from everlasting, and that it is exempt from liability to extinction, though it may be again and again invested with a corporeal body. 6. All the systematists teach the eternity of matter. 7. They all receive the words of the Veda as unquestionable authority. See Refutation of Hindu Systems, by N. Gore (Calculta, 1862); Aphorismes de la Yoga, Sankhya, etc. (Allahabad, India, 1864). (J. T. G.)

Hindus, Modern, a term recently used to designate a class of Hindu reformers, who call themselves Brahmins, and represent a school of thought which originated fifty or sixty years ago with Ram Mohun Roy, who undertook to reform Hinduism on the basis of the Veda alone, the religion of which he held to be a pure theism. In 1846 they became dissatisfied with the Veda, and adopted Intentionalism. They have planted societies throughout Bengal, Madras, the North-West Provinces, the Punjab, and Bombay. They ignore idol worship, caste, metempsychosis, and all Brahminical ceremonies. The Tutus Book-Keepery Press, of Calcutta, has issued a great number of their publications (see Dr. Duff, in Christian Work for 1862; Foreign Missions, by Dr. Anderson). See Ram Mohun Roy. (J. T. The allusion in Pro. xxvi, 14 is thus clearly explained. The hinges mentioned in 1 Kings vii, 50, were probably of the Egyptian kind, attached to the upper and lower sides of the door (Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 177; Porter, Damascus, ii, 22, 192; Macmurdell, Early Travels, p. 447, 448 [Bohn]; Shaw, Travels, p. 210; Lord Lindsay, Letters, p. 292; Wilkinson, Anc. Himnan, Clara F., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Kortright, Delaware Co., N. Y., Aug. 3, 1819. He graduated at the Wesleyan University in 1839, and spent several years in teaching, at one time as principal of Newbury Seminary, Vt. In 1849 he was elected principal of the Wesleyan Seminary at Albion, Michigan, and early in 1853 president of the North-western University. In this position he devoted his whole energy to the work of putting that institution on a proper footing, and his labors in its behalf exhaust his strength and broke his constitution completely. Yet he refused to suspend his exertions until a pending list of engagements was fulfilled, and while thus employed he was prostrated at Troy, N. Y., and died on the 21st of October, 1854. Dr. Himnan distinguished himself in every relation of life, from boyhood to his death, by capacity, energy, and piety. He was a good scholar, an earnest and eloquent preacher, and a very successful edtocator of youth. His early death was a great loss to the cause of Christian education in America.—Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, vii, 817.

Hin'nom (Ib., Himnon, for הִנָּם, gracious, or for הִנָּה, abundant), or, rather, Ben-Himnon (בֵּין הִנָּה, son of Himnom; Sept. νιὸς Ἑμώνι, also in the plur. "sons of Himnon"), an unknown person (prob. one of the original Jebusites), whose name (perh. as resident) was given to the valley ("Valley of Himnom," otherwise called "the valley of the son" or "children of Himnom," "הֵמֹּן", "הֵמֹנֶּה", "הֵמֹנֶּהַת", variously rendered by the Sept. φαραγῆ Ἑμώνι, ου τοῖον Ἑμώνι, ου Τιμωρίαν, Josh. xvii, 16; ου γῆ Βιβενομ, 2 Chron. xxvii, 8; xxviii, 6; το ποιμαντήρου ου το οικείων αὐτῶν, Jer. xix, 3, 6), a deep and narrow ravine, with steep, rocky sides, on the southerly side of Jerusalem, separating Mount Zion on the south from the "Hill of Evil Counsel," and the sloping, rocky plateau of the "plain of Rephaim" on the north, taking its name, according to NA's note, from the place where those of Molech and Chemosh first having encamped in it (S, and Pol, p. 172). The earliest mention of the valley of Hinnom in the sacred writings is in Josh. xv, 8, where the boundary-line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin is described with minute topographical accuracy, as passing along the bed of the ravine from Jerusalem to the town of Bethel, "that lieth before the valley westward," at the north end of the plain of Rephaim. It is described in Josh. xviii, 16 as on the south side of Jebusi, that is, Mount Zion, on which the ancient stronghold of the Jebusites stood. The valley obtained wide notoriety as the scene of the barbarous rites of Molech and Chemosh, first introduced by Solomon, who built a "high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem (Olivet); and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon" (1 Kings xi, 7). The inhuman rites were continued by the idolatrous kings of Judah. "The children of Judah set up their sculptured images there... and burned their sons and daughters in the fire," casting them, it is said, into the red-hot arms of the idol (Jer. vii, 31; 2 Chron. xxviii, 6, xxix, 6). No spot dared entered by the king of Judah. A mount of obelisks was set up in this valley, where he threw the bones of his children, and called the place Gehenna. In the time of the Romans the valley was a scene of hideous cruelty: the deep, retired grotto, shut in by rugged cliffs, and the bleak mountain sides rising over all. The worship of Molech was abolished by Josiah, and the place dedicated to him was defiled by being strewed with human bones. He defiled Tophet, which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter pass through the fire to Molech... and he brake in pieces the images, and cut down their groves, and filled their places with the bones of men" (2 Kings xxiii, 10, 14). The place has never been entirely ruined. There is a small flat of land, where he now stands in the bottom of this valley and looks up at the multitude of tombs in the cliffs above, and around him, thickly dotting the side of Olivet, will be able to see with what wonderful accuracy the curse of Jeremiah has been fulfilled: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that it shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the children of Hinnom, to which the children of Jerusalem go to walk every one on the high road to burning; for they have made its dripping a place of burning." See Tophet. For the consumption of bodies of criminals, carcasses of animals, and whatever else was combustible, but the rabbinical authorities usually brought forward in support of this idea appear insufficient, and Robinson declares (4, 274) that "there is no evidence of any other fires than those kept up in this valley," referring to Rosenmüller, Biblisch. Geogr. ii, 116, 164. For the more ordinary view, see Hengstenberg, Christol., ii, 454; iv, 41; Keil on Kings ii, 147, Clark's edit.; and comp. Isa. xxx, 33; lxvi, 24. See Moloh. It is called, Jer. ii, 23, "the valley," kar 'eçwîn, and perhaps the "valley of stones," an old expression "valley of fire," or "valley of Nitro's vision," Isa. xxii, 1, 5 (Stanley, S. and P, p. 172, 482). The name by which it is now known is (in ignorance of the meaning of the initial syllable) Wady Jeheannim, or Wady er-Rubbé (Williams, Holy City, i, 56, Supplem.), though in Mohammedan traditions the name Gehem is applied to the Valley of Kidron (Ibn Battuta, 12, 4; Stanley, ut sup.). See Gehenna. The valley commences in a broad sloping basin to the west of the city, south of the Jaffa road (extending nearly to the brow of the great wady on the west), in the centre of which, 700 yards from the Jaffa gate, is the large reservoir, supplied by the earth opened in the floor of the opening of the valley, facing the steep side of Olivet, and where the infatuated inhabitants of Jerusalem burnt their sons and their daughters in the fire—casting them, it is said, into the red-hot arms of the idol (Jer. vii, 31; 2 Chron. xxviii, 6, xxix, 6). No spot dared entered by the king of Judah. A mount of obelisks was set up in this valley, where he threw the bones of his children, and called Tophet, natio-

The place thus became abominably clean; no Jew could enter it (2 Chron. xxxiv, 4, 5). From this time it appears to have become the common cesspool of the city, into which its sewage was conducted, to be carried off by the waters of the Kidron, as well as a, by the, all, which, all its solid, was collected. It was afterwards a pasture for the beasts of the field, a place of destruction, of which the word Hinnom means "abomination." Robinson, one of the earliest travelers in Babylonia, cultivates. About 400 yards from the south-west angle of Mount Zion the valley contracts still more, becomes quite narrow and stony, and descends with much greater rapidity towards the "valley of Jehoshaphat," or the "valley of Kidron," before which it opens out again, forming an orifice in the side of the valley, devoted to gardens irrigated by the waters of Siloam. Towards the eastern extremity of the valley is the traditional site of "Aceldama," authenticated by a bed of white clay still worked by potters (Williams, Holy City, i, 495), opposite to which, where the cliff is thirty or forty feet high, the tree on which Judas hanged himself was located during the Frankish kingdom (Barclay, City of Great King, p. 208). Not far from Aceldama is a conspicuously situated tomb with a Doric pediment, sometimes known as the "white sepulchre," near which are a number of burial caves, with a large sepulchral recess, with an arch at the top, and the native rock, is known as the "Latium apostolorum," where the Twelve are said to have concealed themselves during the time between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. The tombs continue quite down to the corner of the mountain, where it bends off to the south along the valley of Jehoshaphat. None of the sepulchral recesses in the vicinity of Jerusalem are so well preserved; most of these are very old—small gloomy caves, with narrow, rock-hewn doorways. See Jerusalem. Robinson places the "valley gate," Neb. ii, 13, 15; 2 Chron. xxvii, 9, at the north-west corner of Mount Zion, in the upper part of this valley (Researches, i, 220, 229, HINRICHS, HERMANN FRIEDRICH WILHelm, a German philosopher of the old Hegelian school, was born at Karlsbach, in Oldenburg, August 25, 1794. In 1812 he entered the University of Strasbourg as a student of theology, but changed for law in 1813 at Heidelberg. Here he studied under Creuzer and Hegel, and became a privadoecent in 1814. In 1822 he was called to the University of Breslau as a professor of philosophy. In 1824 Hinton gave him a call, which he accepted, and here he remained until his death, August 17, 1861. The work which gave him particular prominence as a Hegelian was his Die Religion im unserm Verkehrsleben zu Wissenschaft (Heidelberg, 1822), an essay that gained him a prize sustained by Hegel himself.—Brockhaus, *Conn. Lex., vii., 943; Vapereau, Dict. des Contemp., p. 885. (J. H. W.)

Hinton, ISAAC TAYLOR, a Baptist preacher and author of note, was born at Oxford, England, July 4, 1796. His father, who was teacher in a boy's school of considerable repute, superintended his son's education. At the age of fifteen young Hinton was apprenticed to the "Clarendon Press," and in 1820 he set up as a printer and publisher. He edited and printed the Sunday Scholars' Magazine. In 1821 he was converted and baptized. He was soon licensed to preach, continuing, however, in business, which he removed to London. He also assisted his brother, John Howard Hinton, in preparing a History of the United States, in two quarto volumes, with 100 engravings. While thus engaged, his republican feelings were so developed that he decided to emigrate to this country. He arrived at Philadelphia in 1832. His services as a preacher were much sought, but he had resolved on fixing his residence in the West. He was, however, induced to accept the pastorate of the First Baptist Church in Richmond, Va. The church had a large colored membership, a fact from which some embarrassment was experienced by him in the consistent application of his principles. This, in connection with his original predilections, led to his removal in 1835 to Chicago, then in its infancy. The Church was unable to give him a sufficient support, and he was Oxford, England, engaged in teaching. His congregations were large, and he delivered a course of lectures on the Prophecies, which attracted much attention. The financial disasters of 1837, however, depressed the material prosperity of his Church, and observations on the slavery question divided it. In 1841 he removed to St. Louis, where he labored for about three years, and enjoyed repeated seasons of revival and ingathering. In 1844 he accepted a call to New Orleans, where he had every prospect of success and usefulness, but his labors were cut short by the yellow fever. He died Aug. 28, 1847. His Lectures on Prophecy, above referred to, were repeated in St. Louis, and were published afterwards under the title The Prophecies of Daniel and John illustrated by the Events of History. He also published a History of Baptism, from Inspired and Uninspired Sources. He was diligent, enthusiastic, yet calm and pacific in his habits of mind, genial in his private intercourse, and an impressive public speaker. His ardor and energy fitted him for the work of which he did so much, that of a pioneer, founding and building up churches. (L. E. S.)

Hkommen-tsong, a celebrated Buddhist traveller of China, was born A.D. 933. At the age of twenty he took the principles of Buddhism. Even at this early age he had become famous for his vast information, especially in the Buddhist faith, and in the doctrines of Confucius and Laotse. A desire to study the origin of Buddhism made him overcome all the obstacles in his way, and he set out on a journey to Colla in the first half of the 7th century (629). He travelled for sixteen years through that country, and on his return wrote a work describing his travels, which were published under the auspices of the Chinese emperor of his time. In this work he gave a very detailed and interesting account of the condition of Buddhism as it prevailed at that period in India. His inquiries having been chiefly devoted to Buddhism, he did not enter much into details concerning the social and political life of the country; but merely gives notices which he gives on other matters, besides those of Buddhist interest that came under his observation, and the high degree of truthfulness which his narrative possesses, makes it one of the most important works on the history of India in general, and of Buddhism in particular, during that period. He travelled alone, or with a few occasional companions, wearing the garb of a religious mendicant, from China to India. He brought with him on his return to his native country, besides images of Buddha and various sacred relics, an immense collection of works, the extent of which may be estimated from the statement of Miller, "It is said that the number of works translated by Hsiouen-tsang, with the assistance of a large staff of monks, amounted to 740, in 3333 volumes" (Chips, i, 272). He died A.D. 664. Two of his friends and pupils have left an account of his life, by the Rev. E. M. Stanistreet, who has lately translated the travels of Hsiouen-tsang from Chinese into French (Voyages des Pèlerins Bouddhistes, 2 vols., Svo, Paris, 1853-1857), prefixes a translation of this biography to the translation of the travels of Hsiouen-tsang. An abstract of this work, by the late Professor H. L. Cattell, appeared in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, xvii, 106-137. A very full account of the life and works of Hsiouen-tsang is given by Max Müller (Chips, with a review of the translation of M. Julien.—Müller, Chips from a German Workshop, i, 282-274; Julien, *Histoire de la Vie de Hsiouen-tsang; Memoires sur les Contes Orientaux, par Hsiouen-tsang; Homère, Nouv. Biot. Hipp (πῆπ, abk, usually "shoulder") occurs in the A.V. only in the phrase "hip and thigh" (lit. leg upon thigh), in the account of Samson's slaughter of the Philistines (Judg. xii.) e.g.: evidently a proverbial phrase, i.e. "he cut them in pieces so that their limbs, their legs and their thighs, were scattered one upon another, q. d. he totally destroyed them" (Gesenius). See SAMSON.

Hipp, in architecture, is the external angle formed by the meeting of the sloping sides of a roof which have their wall-plates running in opposite directions; thus, when a roof has the end sloped back, instead of finishing with a gable, the pieces of timber in these angles are called hip-rafter, and the tiles with which they are covered are called hip-tiles. The internal angles formed by the meeting of the sides of the room valley, whether the latter be horizontal or sloping, and the pieces of timber that support a sloping valley is termed the valley rafter. Such a roof is called a hip-roof.

Hippicus (Ἱππίκος, equestrium), the name given by Herod (in honor of one of his generals) to that one of the three towers (Josephus, War, ii, 17, 9) along the first wall of Jerusalem, overlooking Mount Zion on the north, which lay westernmost, and at its junction with the third wall (War, iv, 5, 2), being built up with immense strength (ib. 3). Its remains are still a very prominent object in the city (Robinson, Researches, i, 453, sq.; Bartle--Leeds about Jerusalem, p. 86 sq.). Schwarz ab- surdly identifies Hippicus (ib. 10, 5) with the tower of Han- aneel (q. v.) of Jer., xxxi., 38, on the authority of Jon- than's Targum, which has there the "tower of Piphus (Πίπος)." Hippocastanum, the name of several saints and martyrs of the early Church, especially that celebrated one of the fathers of the Church who probably lived in the early part of the 3rd century. Every particular of his life has been made a point of controversy. The ecclesiastical writers who make any mention of him, Eusebius and Jerome, give him the title of bishop, but without stating of what see, the latter even saying that he was unable to ascertain this point. "The Chronicon Paschale, our earliest authority, makes him 'bishop of the so-called Portus' before the time which he assigned to his great consecration," writes the author of the Calendar of 650, "by the authority of Cyril, Zonaras, Anastasius, Niphonorus, and Syncellus (see Bunsen's Hippolytus, i. 205), and as Prudentius (lib. viii, vii, Hymn ix) describes his martyrdom as having taken place at Ostia, close by Portus, most critics will probably regard this point as first-council held in 350, which was attended by Aegyptus and Jacobus, and would render him peculiarly fit to be a 'bishop of the nations,' who frequented the harbor of Rome in multitudes. In spite of Jacob's assertion (see below) to the contrary, there seems to be no reason why he should not at the same time have been (what the Εὔγερχος shows him to have been) a bishop and head of a party at Rome. We know, further, that he was a disciple of Ireneus (Phot. Cod. 121), and was engaged in some warm disputes with Callistus on points of doctrine and discipline, which are graphically described in his recovered book, εἰς τοὺς ἁγιασμούς (Kitts, Cyclopedia, s. v.). On the other hand, the treatise, De Synecdotis, attributed to pope Gelasius I, gives Hippolytus the title of metropolitan of Arabia. Le Moyne even indicated a town of the district of Aden, called Portus Romanus, on account of its being the great mart of Roman trade in the East, and the synecdotis of Ireneus's author. The con- tainment exists with regard to the time in which he lived. Eusebius places him in the first half of the 3rd century. Photius states that he was a disciple of Ireneus; Baronus says, of Clement of Alexandria; two assertions which appear equally well grounded. Portus adds that Hip- polytus was the intimate friend and zealous admirer of Origen, and that he invited him to comment on the Scriptures, furnishing him for that purpose seven amanuenses to write under his dictation, and seven copyists. Hippolytus himself testifies to his acquaintance with Origen. As for the other, we are based on a misinterpretation of the passage. According to this father, Ambrosian of Alexandria, with the reputation Hippolytus had acquired by his commentaries on the Scriptures, invited Origen to attempt the same task, and furnished him with a number of copyists. The name of St. Hippolytus is not mentioned by Eusebius. Jerome, Hippo- lytus, and other writers, however, call him a martyr, and his name appears with that title in the Roman, Greek, Coptic, and Abyssinian calendars. Yet these martyro- logies differ so much from each other that they appear rather to refer to different parties of the same name than to one individual only. Prudentius, a Christian poet of the 4th century, wrote a long poem on the martyrdom of St. Hippolytus, but it is evident that he also confounded several parties of that name, and his pious legend is devoid of all historical authority. The date of St. Hippolytus's death is very doubtful. It is gen- erally believed to have occurred under Alexander Severus, yet it is well known that this emperor persecuted Christians. If we admit that the Euchortaria ad Severinum, mentioned among Hippolytus's works, is the same which Theoderet states was addressed to a certain queen or empress (ἡ βασίλισσα τις), and, further, that this Severina, according to Drilling (see below), was the same as the empress Afra of the emperor Decius, this would bring the martyrdom of the saint to the time of Decius's persecution (about 250), and perhaps later. In that case, Hippolytus, having been a disciple of Ireneus, who died about 200, must have been quite advanced in age at the time of his death. It is generally supposed that he suffered martyrdom at Rome, probably in the mouth of the Tiber. According to general opinion, it is thought he was thrown into the sea with a stone tied around his neck. In 1551 a statue was discovered at Rome, near the church of St. Lorenzo, which appeared to date back to the 4th century, and which represented a man in monastic garb, in a sitting posture. The inscription bore the name of Hippolytus, bishop of Portus, and on the back of his seat was found inscribed the canon or paschal cycle which he introduced into Rome, and also a list of his principal works. Some of these works, men- tioned by Eusebius, Jerome, Photius, and the other ecclesiastical writers, or named on the statue, are yet extant, and we have extensive fragments of several others. A number of them have been published separately. Fab- bricius gave a complete collection of them under the title S. Hippolytis, episcopi et martyrise, Opera omnia collecta et parum in primitiva ed. M. M. de Gries et Latiis (Hamb. 1716-1718, fol.). This was reprinted, with additions by Galland, and inserted in his Bibliotheca Patrum (Venice, 1766, fol.), vol. ii. A collection of frag- ments of Syriac translations of Hippolytus is given in the Analecta of Lagarde. The same scholar, in an ap- pendix to his ed. ad Hippocratem, gives a translation of the ita Appendicis (Lips., 1858),), gives Arabic fragments of a commentary of Hippolytus on Revelation. A recent discovery has directed general attention to this old ecclesiastical writer. In 1842 M. Myniole Mi- nas, on his return from a mission to the heathen, and which was sent by M. Villeneuve, minister of public instruction in France, brought back from Mount Athos, among other unpublished works, a mutilated Greek MS. of the 14th century, written on cotton paper, without name of au- thor, and containing a Breviary of all Hiereses (carm. praef. aipotein eis Ίωάννηκα τῆς ιεραίς προσευχῆς). This MS. was presented to the Imperial Library at Paris, where it remained undis- turbed until M. Emmanuel Miller found it to contain the last part of a treatise, the beginning of which was printed in the works of Origen. At Miller's request, the University of Oxford consented to publish it, under his direction, at their own press, with the title, Ῥωμαίων Φιλοσοφούμενος καὶ κατὰ τῶς αισθητῶν Ἰησοῦς (Ori- gentes Philosophorum sive omnium Hierosolymitanus Refutatio: e Codice Parisino nunc primum edidit Emmanuel Miller [Oxford, 1851, Svo]). This work attracted great at- tention among the theologians and philosophers of Grec- many and France, as well as England. The first argument published to show that Hippolytus was the author of the MS. may be found in the Methodist Quar- terly Reivew for October, 1851, in an article by professor J. L. Jacob, of the University of Berlin. After prov- ing that Origen was not the author, the writer was "contemporary with Origen. "He places himself in that age, and all his statements harmonize with this view. Taking him, then, to have lived in the first quarter of the 3rd century, at the time of Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome, and of Callistus, we should be led by Eusebius to identify him with the learned presbyter Caius, or with Hippolytus. It is eas- ily shown, however, that Caius could not have been the author of the book, for he was specially distinguished for his writings against Cerinthus, and for his peculiar views with regard to that Gnostic leader; while our author has nothing of his own to offer about Cerinthus, and borrows all that he does say (and that is not much), word for word, from Ireneus. Cainus ascribed the Apocalypse to Cerinthus—our author assigns it to the apostate Irenaeus. The Gospel was a strong component of the Gnostic Chiliasm; the latter, while he blames much in Montanism, does not include Chiliasm under it, and indeed it is more than probable that he was a friend of that doctrine. On the other hand, there are the following, among other reasons, for ascribing the work to Hippolytus. Montanism, work bearing the same or a similar title was ascribed by Eusebius, Jerome, Epiphanius, and Nicephorus to Hippolytus. (2.) The monument dug up at Rome (see above) has on it the names of writings which the author of the treatise on heresies claims as his own. (3.) The internal evidence is all in favor of Hippolytus. Professor Jacobi developed the argument at greater length in the Deutsche Zeitschrift für Christl. Wissenschaft (1859), and Dr. Duncker followed in the Göttinger gelehrte Anzeigen (1851). But the most earnest work on the subject was done by the Chevalier Bunsen, who canvassed the whole question with great learning, acumen, and skill, and whose great work, Hippolytus et son Age, or the Doctrine and Practice of the Church of Rome under Commodus and Alexander Severus, and ancient and modern Christiandity and Divinity compared (Lond. 1852, 4 vols., 8vo), in this work it is, we believe, beyond a doubt that the Refutation of all Heresies was written by Hippolytus, according to the Gospels of Portus, near Rome, in the first quarter of the 3rd century. Several writers, however, objected to some of Bunsen's conclusions, and he replied to them by republishing his work, greatly enlarged, under the title Christiandity et Montreal (Lond. 1854, 7 vols., 8vo). This work is a fulness of erudition, but often advanced hasty statements and unauthorized conclusions.

The importance of this newly-discovered work of Hippolytus in the sphere of Church History and archaeology can hardly be overstated. It throws great light upon the Gnostic and other heretical sects of the early Church. Names and even facts are given of which we knew absolutely nothing before; while others that were held to be as unimportant as they were obscure are brought out into light and prominence, illuminating many dark nooks of Church History. The book tells us, for instance, of a Gnostic by name Justus, of whom we had not before heard; and describes at length Momoamone and the Peraticians, of whom we knew only the names. The Simonians, and the strange, fragmentary, and enigmatical ideas generally attributed to Simon Magus, are here treated with something approaching to orderly and clear connection. That part of the work which treats of the morals of the Roman Church and of its clergy is full of interest. Hippolytus censures them for unchastity, and casts it up to them as a great reproach that many, even of the higher orders of clergy, were married out of that more than once. His account of Callistus throws much light upon the state of society and of religion in Rome at the time. The work shows us also that the received doctrine of the Church at that time—a century before the Council of Nice—was the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity and the person of Christ. An account is also given of the revolts and revolutions of the claims of the papacy. Romanist writers, therefore, have sought to invalidate the conclusions drawn by Jacobi, Bunsen, and the Protostates generally. Professor Döllinger seeks to refute the "calumnies" of the book against Callistus in his Hippolytus und Callistus (Paris, 1853, 8vo), and to settle the question of the authorship of the Philosophoumena. He undertakes to show also from the character of the work itself that the author was not a Catholic, but a heretic, in the judgment of the Church of the age when he wrote it. The abéd Cruces, of Paris, published Études sur... Philosophoumena (Paris, 1853, 8vo), to show that the book is neither genuine nor authentic; and he has since followed it up by his Histoire de l'Église de Rome sous les Pontificats de St Victor, St. Zephyrin, et St. Calliste (Paris, 1856). He has also published an elegant edition of the Philosophoumena, with Latin version, notes, and indexes (Par. 1851, 8vo). The best edition of the work, however, is that of W. Scheidewin (Götingen, 1859, 8vo). Another edition, which enables one to compare work of Hippolytus, was published by Lagarde (Hippolyt Romanus qui feruntur omnibus Graecis, Lips., 1688). The subject is very ably treated in its theological aspects, especially in their bearing on the Roman controversy. See also Tod's Hippolytus and the Church of Rome (Lond. 1852, 8vo).

A very great part of the history and contents of the book, with an English translation of the most important parts, is given by Taylor, Hippolytus and the Christian Church of the Third Century (Lond. 1858, 12mo), and by Volckmar, Hippolytus u. d. röm. Zeitgenossen (Zürich, 1858). The leading reviews have generally given articles on the subject: see especially Methodist Quarterly Review, Oct. 1861; Jan. 1863, p. 160; Quarterly Rev. (Lond.) Ixxiv., 87; Journ. of Sacred Literature, Jan., 1858, and Jan., 1864; N. Brit. Rev., Nov. 1854; Edinburgh Review, Jan. 1858; Ilijen, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie, 1860, pp. 96, 143; Journal des Débats, Dec. 1852; Baur, Theol. Jahrbächer (Tübingen, 1858); Studien u. Kritikten, by Gieseler (1853).

Another important work ascribed to Hippolytus, a collection of canons, has lately been published for the first time in an Arabic translation, by Dr. Hamberg (Coptic, Arabic, and Latin. Amsterdam 1857, 12mo, 4th edition. Editio Latina, annotationibus et prolegomenis, Munich, 1870). The collection contains thirty-eight canons which are known to have been in use in the 12th century in the Coptic Church. Before this time no mention is made of this work by the fathers; but the editor regards this as no argument against its authenticity (which he defends), as all the works of Hippolytus had fallen into oblivion. In case it is genuine, its contents are of considerable importance for the history of Christian doctrines and on the constitution of the Christian Churches of the east.

Lipsius, in his work Zur Quellenkritik der Epiphanius (Vienna, 1865), has shown that the work of Hippolytus against thirty-two sects, the conclusion of which is still extant under the title of a homily against the heresy of Niconet, is the basis of the Philosophoumena, and can, to a large extent, be reconstruted from it. See also Lipsius, Church History, vol. ii, § 125; Hare, Contest with Rome, p. 214; Neander, History of Dogmas, i, 51; Milman, Lut. Christ., i, 66 sq.; Lardner, Works, ii, 409 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vi, 131 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Early monographs on Hippolytus were written by Frommann, Intrepid, New Test. et. Extr. Hippol. (Coblentz, 1785, 4to); C. G. Hinnell, De Hippol. (Götting, 1858, 8vo); Hehnmann, Ubi et quanta episcoporum fuisset Hippolytus (Götting, 1787, 4to); Woog, Fragment. Hippol. Martyria (Lips. 1762, 4to). On the earlier writings of Hippolytus, see Clarke, Succession of Sacred Literature, i, 158; Eusebius, Hist. Ecclesi. vi, 20-23; Lardner, Credibility of the Gospel History, ii, 35; Tillemon, Mémoires, etc., li, 104; Nies, Realencyclopaedie der christl. Alterthumskunde, i, ii, iii, 7. Hippolytus, Brothers (or Hospital. Monks) of the Christian Love of, a monastic order of the Roman Catholic Church, established about 1855 by Bernardin Alvarez, a citizen of Mexico, for nursing the sick. It was sanctioned by the popes Sixtus V and Clement VIII, and received the same rights as the order of the Brothers of Charity which had been established by St. Johannes a Deo, and with which it had statutes, aim, and dress in common. It only differs from it by the color of the monastic dress. The order was named after the patron saint of the city of Mexico, in commemoration of the fall of pugilism, and the capture of the city of Mexico.

HIPPODAMUS

an animal regarded by Bochart (Hieroz. iii, 705), Ludolf (Hist. Ethiop. i, 11), Shaw (Trav. ii, 293, Lond. 8vo), Scheuwer (Phys. Sac. on Job xi), Rosenmuller (Not. ad & Beob. crit. Hieroz. iii, 706, and Schol. ad Vet. Test. in Job xi), Taylor (Appendix to Cal- ne's Diet. Bibl. No. 1xxv), Harmer (Observations, ii, 319), Gesenius (Thes. s.v. θαλασσον), Fürst (Concord. Heb. s.v.), and English commentators generally, as being design- nated by the Heb. word בֵּית הַזָּרוּעַ (behemoth) in Job xi, 15, by which, however, some writers, as Vatlandus, Drusius, Grotius (Cal. Sac. Annotationes ad Job, xi), Pfeiffer, (Dulcius reussi S. S., p. 594, Dresden, 1679), Castell (Lex. Hygii, p. 232), A. Schultens (Comment. in Job, xi), Mi- chaelis (Suppl. ad Lex. Heb. No. 208), have understood the elephant; while others, again, amongst whom is Lee (Comment on Job, xi, and Lex. Heb. s.v. בֵּית הַזָּרוּעַ), consider the Hebrew term as a plural noun for "cattle" in general; it being left to the reader to apply to the scrip- tural allusions the particular animal, which may be, ac- cording to Lee, "either the wild ass, or wild bull". Compare also Reiske, Conjecturae in Job, p. 167. Dr. Mason Good (Book of Job literally translated, p. 478, Lond. 1712) has hazarded a conjecture that the behemoth denotes some extinct pachyderm like the mammoth, with a view to combine the characteristics of the hippopotamus and the elephant, and so to fulfill all the scriptural demands. Compare with this Michaelis (Suppl. ad Lex. Heb. No. 208), and Haseus (in Dissertat. Syllog. No. viii, § 37, and § 38, p. 506), who rejects with some scorn the notion of the identity of behemoth and mammoth. Dr. Kitto (Pict. Bib. Job xi) and Colonel Hamilton Smith (Kitto's Cyc. Bib. Litt. 2d ed., Behemoth), from being un- able to make all the scriptural details correspond with any one particular animal, are of opinion that behemoth is a plural term, and is to be taken as a poetical personi- fication of the great pachydermata generally, wherein the idea of hippopotamus is predominant. The term behemoth would thus be the counterpart of the elephant, the animal mentioned next in the book of Job; which word, although its signification in that passage is restricted to the crocodile, does yet stand in Scripture for a python, or a whale, or some other huge monster of the deep. See Leviathan. According to the Talmud, behemoth is some huge land-animal which daily consumes the grass off a thousand hills; he is to have, at some future period, a battle with leviathan. On account of his gazing on the mountains, he is called "the bull of the high moun- tains." (See Levysohn, Zool. des Talmuds, p. 853). "The fathers, for the most part," says Cary (Job, p. 402), "surrounded the subject with an awe equally dreadful, and in the behemoth here, and in the levia- than of the next chapter, saw nothing but mystical rep- resentations of the devil: others, again, have here pic- tured to themselves some hieroglyphic monster that has no real existence; but these wild imaginations are sur- passed by that of Bolducius, who in the behemoth actu- ally beholds Christ!"

The following reasons seem quite sufficient to identify it with the hippopotamus. 1. The meaning of the original word itself. Gesenius (Thesaurus, p. 183), with whom also Fürst agrees (Heb. Lex. s.v.), holds it not to be a Heb. plur., but the Coptic be-hemont, "the water-ox" (see Jablonsky, Opposci, i, 52), equivalent to the θαλασσος or χαλασσος of other writers of the ancients (Herod. ii, 71; Arrian. 12, ii, 12 [4]; Dioscorid, i, 35; Pliny, viii, 39; Ammian. Marcell. xxii, 15; Ambulatory, Denker, p. 146 sq.; Prosper Alpinus, Res Erg. iv, 12; Ludolph, Hist. Aeg. i, 11, and Comment. i, 159 sq.; Hasselquist, Trav. p. 280 sq.; Sparrmann, Reise durch süd. Africa, p. 562 sq.; Rüppell, Ar. Petr. p. 55 sq.; comp. Schneider, Hist. hippop. nat. crit. in his edit. of Artedi Sympum, p. 247 sq., 316 sq.; Bochart, Hieroz. iii, 705 sq.; Oken, Zool. ii, 718 sq.) Rosenmuller's objection to the Coptic origin of the word is worthy of observation—that, if this were the case, the Sept. In- terpreters would not have given δεικος as its representa- tive. Michaelis translates δεικος by jumenta, and thinks the name of the elephant has dropped out ("Mithi videtur nomele ephemeris forte δεικος excidisse"). Many critics, Rosenmuller amongst the number, believe the word is the plural majestatis of δεικος. But in that case it would hardly be employed with a verb or adj. in the singular, and that would, as it is.

2. A careful examination of the text shows that all the deserts are the characteristic of the behemoth accord entirely with the ascertained habits of that animal. Gesenius and Rosenmuller have remarked that, since in the first part of Jehovah's discourse (Job xxxviii, xxxix) land animals and birds are mentioned, it suits the general purpose of that discourse better to suppose that aquatic or amphibious creatures are spoken of in the last half of it; and that since the leviathan, by almost universal consent, denotes the crocodile, the behemoth seems clearly to point to the hippopotamus, his associate in the Nile. Harmer (Observations, ii, 319) says, "There is a great deal of beauty in arranging the descriptions of the behemoth and the leviathan, for in the Mosaic pavement the people of an Egyptian bark are represented as darting spears or some such weapons at one of the river-horses, as another of them is pictured with two striking near his shoulders. . . . It was then a customary thing with the old Egyptians thus to at- tack these animals (see also Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii, 71); if so, how beautiful is the arrangement: there is a

might be represented as going on with his expostulations something after this manner: 'But dreadful as this animal is, barbed irons and spears have sometimes prevailed against him; but what wilt thou do with the crocodile? Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons?' In Psalms xxviii.14 Mr. Harmer refers, there are two crocodiles, associates of three river-horses, which are represented without spears sticking in them, though they seem to be within shot. Behemoth "eateth grass as an ox" (Job xi,15)---a circumstance which is noticed as peculiar in an animal of aquatic habits; this is strictly true of the hippopotamus, which leaves the water by night, and feeds on vegetables and green crops. Its strength is enormous, ver. 16, 18, and the notice of the power of the muscles of the belly, "his force is in the navel of his belly," appears to be strictly correct. The tail, however, is short, and it must be conceded that the first part of verse 17, "he moveth his tail like a cedar," seems not altogether applicable. Its mode of attack is with his mouth, which is armed with a formidable array of teeth, projecting incisors, and enormous curved canines; thus "his Creator offers him a sword," for so the words in ver. 19 may be rendered. But the use of his sword is mainly for pacific purposes, "the beasts of the field playing" about him as he feeds; the hippopotamus being a remarkably inoffensive animal. With these apparently combined teeth the hippopotamus can cut the grass as neatly as if it were in the "thin the sycamore," and is able to sever, as if with shears, a tolerably thick and stout stem" (Wood's Nat. Hist. i, 792).

Hippopotamus Amphibius. It has been said that some parts of the description in Job cannot apply to the hippopotamus: (1.) The 20th verse, for instance, where it is said "the mountains bring him forth food." This passage, many writers say, suits the elephant well, but cannot be applied to the hippopotamus, which is never seen on mountains. In answer to this objection, it has been stated, with great reason, that the word הַרִים (harîm) is not necessarily to be restricted to what we understand commonly by the expression "mountains." In the Psalms another vegetation alluded to above, there are to be seen here and there, as Mr. Harmer has observed, "hillslopes rising above the water." In Ezek. xxxii.15 (marg.), the altar of God, only ten cubits high and fourteen square, is called "the mountain of God." "The eminences of Egypt, which are of an imituation of the mountains of Arabia, may undoubtedly be called mountains in the poetical language of Job." But we think there is no occasion for so restricted an explanation. The hippopotamus, as is well known, frequently leaves the water and the river's bank as night approaches, and makes inland excursions for the sake of the pastureage, when he commits sad work among the growing crops (Hassellquist, Trav. p. 188). No doubt he might often be observed on the hillsides near the spots frequented by him. Again, it must be remembered that the "mountains" are mentioned only by way of contrast with the natural habits of aquatic animals generally, which never go far from the water and the banks of the river; but the behemoth, though passing much of his time in the water and in "the covert of the reed and fens," eateth grass like cattle, and feedeth on the hillsides in company with the beasts of the field. According to a recent traveller in Egypt, the Rev. J. L. Errington, "the valley of the Nile in Upper Egypt and Nubia is in parts so very narrow, that the mountains approach within a few hundred yards, and even less, to the river's bank; the hippopotamus, therefore, might well be said to get its food from the mountains, on the sides of which it would swim." There is much beauty in the passages which contrast the habits of the hippopotamus, an amphibious animal, with those of herivorous land-quadrupeds; but if the elephant is to be understood, the whole description is, comparatively speaking, a snare.

(2.) Again, the 24th verse---"his nose pierceth through snares"---seems to be spoken of the trunk of the elephant, "with its extraordinary delicacy of scent and touch, rather than to the obtuse perceptions of the river-horse." With respect to this objection, there is little doubt that the marginal reading is nearer the Hebrew than that of the text, and views the animal in his usual state, or bore his nose with a gin?" Perhaps this refers to leading him about alive with a ring in his nose, as, says Rosenmuller, "the Arabs are accustomed to lead camels," and we may add the English to lead bulls, "with a ring passed through the noster." The explication in verse 17, "he bendeth his tail like a cedar," has given occasion to much discussion; some of the advocates for the elephant maintaining that the word צַנְדָּב (znâdâb) may denote either extremity, and that here the elephant's trunk is intended. The parallelism, however, clearly requires the posterior appendage to be signified by the term. The expression seems to allude to the stiff, unbending nature of the elephant's tail, which in this respect is compared to the trunk of a strong cedar which the wind scarcely moves.

(4.) The description of the animal's lying under "the shady trees," amongst the "reeds" and willows, is peculiarly applicable to the hippopotamus. It has been argued that such a description is equally applicable to the elephant, but it is hardly the case; for, though the elephant is fond of frequent ablations, and is frequently seen near water, yet the constant habit of the hippopotamus, as implied in verses 21, 22, seems to be especially made the subject to which the attention is directed. At evening tide, he occurred deep, and still possessed occasional sandy islands densely clad with lofty reeds, Above and beyond these reeds stood trees of immense

1. Hiram (Sept. makes two names, 'Aχαρων και Tovvias'), the last named of the sons of Bela, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 56). B.C. post 1856.

2. Hiram, Hiram, or Hiram, king of Tyre at the commencement of David's reign. He sent an embassy to Jerusalem, as if in an alliance, or strengthened a previous friendship between them. It seems that the dominion of this prince extended over the western slopes of Lebanon; and when David built himself a palace, Hiram materially assisted the work by sending cedars-wood from Lebanon, and also stones; and in 1 Kings, v, 10, 18; vii, 10; 1 Chron. vii, 11; 1 Chron. vi-1). B.C. cir. 1044. It was probably the same prince who sent to Jerusalem an embassy of condolence and congratulation when David died and Solomon succeeded, and who contracted with the new king a more intimate alliance than ever before or after existed between a Hebrew king and a foreign prince. The alliance seems to have been very substantially beneficial to both parties, and without it Solomon would scarcely have been able to realize all the great designs he had in view. In consideration of large quantities of corn, wine, and oil furnished by Solomon, the king of Tyre agreed to supply from Lebanon the timber required for the Temple, to float it along the coast, and deliver it at Joppa, which was the port of Jerusalem (1 Kings v, 1 sq.; ix, 10 sq.; 1 Chron. ii, 3 sq.). The vast commerce of Tyre made gold very plentiful there; and Hiram supplied no less than 220 talents of gold for the Temple, and received in return twenty towns in Galilee, which, when he came to inspect them, pleased him so little that he applied to them as a name of contempt, and restored them to the Jewish king (2 Chron. vi, 2). See CAUL.

It does not, however, appear that the good understanding between the two kings was broden by this unpleasant circumstance, for it was after this that Hiram suggested, or at least took part in, Solomon's traffic to the Eastern Seas, which certainly could not have been undertaken by the Hebrew king without his assistance in providing ships and experienced mar-ers (1 Kings ix, 27; x, 11, etc.; 2 Chron. viii, 18; ix, 10, etc.). B.C. cir. 1010. See ORPH; SOLOMON.

Josephus has preserved a valuable fragment of the history of Mercandia, a native of Ephesus, relating to the intercourse of Hiram and Solomon, profoundly taken from the Syrian archives (Apion, i, 18). After the death of Abia-bus, Hiram, his son, succeeded him in his kingdom, and reigned thirty-four years, having lived fifty-three. He laid out that part of the city which is called Eurychoron, and consecrated the golden column which is in the temple of Jupiter. And he went up into the mountains on the mountain called Libanos, measured for the roofs of the temples; and having demolished the ancient temples he rebuilt them, and concrated the fanes of Hercules and Astarte: he constructed that of Hercules first, in the month Peritius; then that of Astarte, when he had overcome the Tityrians who had refused to pay their tribute; and when he had subdued them he returned. In his time was a certain young man named Abia-bus, who used to stock the ships of which we have pointed to him by Solomon, king of Jerusalem." According to the same authority (ib. i, 17), the historian Dios, likewise from the Tyrian annals, says,
"Upon the death of Abia-bus, his son Hiram succeeded unto the kingdom. He raised the eastern parts of the city, and called it Aelia, and its citizens, and the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, which stood before upon an island, by filling up the intermediate space; and he adorned that temple with donations of gold, and he went up into Lilibaus to cut timber for the construction of the temples.
And it is said that Solomon, who at that time resided in Jerusalem, sent envoys to Solomon, who asked others in return, with a proposal that whichsoever of the two was unable to solve them, should forfeit money to the other. Hiram agreed to the proposal, but was unable to solve the enigma, and paid treasurers to a large amount as a forfeit to Solomon, and paid Solomon and Aelia the two authentic copies of the epistles that passed between the two kings respecting the materials for the Temple. See LEBANON. With the letters in 1 Kings v, and 2 Chron. ii, 5, may be compared not only his copies of the letters, but also the still less authentic letters between Solon and Hiram, and between Solomon and Apries (Apries?), which are preserved by Eusebius (Prop. Evang. ix, 30), and mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor (Clem. Alex. Strom. i, 24, p. 332). Some Phoenician historians (ap. Tatian, cont. Grec. § 37) relate that Hiram, besides supplying timber for the Temple, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon. Jewish writers in less ancient times cannot overlook Hiram's uncircumcision in his services towards the building of the Temple. Their legends relate (Essenm. Ent. Jud., i, 688) that because he was a God-fearing man, and built the Temple, he was received among the Israelites; but that, after he had been there a thousand years, he sinned by pride, and was thrust down into hell. Eusebius (Euseb. Prol. Evang. ix, 30) states that David, af-ther a war with Hiram, reduced him to the condition of a tributary prince. See DAVIN.

Some ancient historians consider Solomon as a different person from the friend of David, since Josephus states that the Temple was built in the twelfth year of the reign of the Tyrian king who aided Solomon in the work (Apion, i, 17 sq.; the eleventh, according to Ant. viii, 8, 1); but this is probably only by a computation of the historian, whose numerical calculations in these points are far from trustworthy. (See Nessel, Diss. de amicitia Solon. et Hiramii, Upsal, 1784.) Hiram is also spoken of by Herodotus (ii, 44) as the builder of new temples to Hercles, Melcart, and Astarte, and the admirer of that of Zeus-Baalamin.

Ewald (Gesch. Israel, III, i, 28, 88) and Movers (II, i, 326 sq., 446 sq.) give a Hiram II, who reigned from 551-532 B.C., toward the close of the Chalde.-Babylonian em-piry, and who is not mentioned in the Bible.

Dr. Robinson describes a remarkable monument of Solomon's ally, still extant, which he passed a little out of the village of Humaneh, on his way from Safed to Tyre (Jibl. Rev. iii, 348). "It is an immense sarcophaggus of limestone, resting upon a pedestal of large hewn stones; a conspicuous ancient tomb, bearing among the common people the name of Kedar Hai-tham," Sepulchre of Hiram, mentions another sarcophagus, measuring by six feet in height and breadth; the lid is three feet thick and remains in its original position; but a noie has been broken through the sarcophagus at one end. The pedestal consists of three layers of the like species of stone, each of three feet thick, the upper layer projecting over the others; the stones are large, and one of them measures nine feet in length. This gray, weather-beaten monument stands here alone and solitary, bearing the marks of high antiquity; but the name and the record of him by whom or for whom it was erected have perished, like his ashes, forever. It is indeed possible that the present name may have come down by tradition, and that this sepulchre once held the dust of the friend and ally of Solomon; more probably, however, it is merely of Mohammedan application, like so many other names of Hebrew renown, attached to their welys and monuments in every part of Palestine. I know of no historical trace having reference to this tomb; and it had first been mentioned by a Frank traveller (Monro, 1838) only five years before." (See also Thomson, Land and Book, i, 290 sq.)

3. The son of a widow of the tribe of Dan, and of a Tyrian father. He was sent by the king of the same name to execute the principal works of the interior of the Temple, and the various utensils required for the sacred services (1 Kings vii, 13, 14, 40). We recognise in the enumeration of this man's talents by the king of Tyre a character common in the industrial history of the ancients (comp. those of Bezaleel, Exod. xxxi, 3-5), namely, a skilful artisan, knowing all the arts, or at least many of those arts which we practise, in their different branches. See Handicraft. It is probable that he was selected for this purpose by the king from among others equally gifted, in the notion that his half-Hebrew blood would render him the more acceptable at Jerusalem. B.C. cir. 1010. He is called "Hiram" in 2 Chron. ii, 13; iv, 11, 16, and "Hirom" in the margin of 1 Kings vii, 40. In 2 Chron. ii, 13, הירם rendered "Hiram my father's," so in 2 Chron. iv, 16, הירם is rendered "Hiram his father;" where, however, the words הירם and יירם can hardly belong to IV—8

The "Tomb of Hiram."

The name, but are appellations; so that "Hiram my (or his) father" seems to mean Hiram my counsellor, i.e. foreman, or master-workman.

Hircanus (Ὑρκανός, i.e. Hyrcanus), a son of Tobias," who had a large treasure placed for security in the treasury of the Temple at the time of the visit of Heliodorus (2 Macc. iii, 11), B.C. cir. 187. Josephus also mentions "children of Tobias" (ταμιίς Ταύβιον, Ant. xii, 5, 13), who, however, belonged to the faction of Menjaus, and notices especially a son of one of them (Joseph) who was named Hyrcanus (Ant. xii, 4, 2 sq.). But there is no sufficient reason for identifying the Hyrcanus of 2 Macc. with this grandson of Tobias either by supposing that the ellipsis (rou Tawbion) is to be so filled up (Grotius, Calmet), or that the sons of Joseph were popularly named after their grandfather (Ewald, Gesch. iv, 309), which could scarcely have been the case in consequence of the great eminence of their father.—Smith. See Maccabees.

The name of Hyrcanus occurs at a later period under the Maccabees. It has been thought that it was adopted on account of a victory gained by John, the son and successor of Simon Mac- cabenus, over the Hyrcanians (Euseb. Chron. lib. ii; Sulp. Severus, Hist. Stac. lib. iii, c. xxvi). Josephus informs us that Hyrcanus accompanied Antigonus VII Sidetes into Parthia, and Nicolaus of Damascus says that a trophy was erected at the river Lycus to commemorate the victory over the Parthian general (Ant. xiii, 8, 4). The Hyrcanians were a nation whose territory was bounded on the north by the Caspian Sea, and would thus be at no great distance from Parthia, where John Hyrcanus had gained the victory. It is remarkable that the different statements agree in the position of the countries, Hyrcania, Parthia, and the river Lycus (of Assyria) being contiguous. As Josephus, however, does not give any explanation of the name (Ant. xiii, 7, 4; War, i, 2, 5), and the son of Simon is nowhere called Hyrcanus in 1 Macc., the reason for its assumption is uncertain. See Hyrcanus.

Hierling (자는 sakir's μεταξάρ), a laborer who is employed on hire for a limited time (Job xii, 1; xiv, 6; Mark i, 20). By the Mosaic law such a one was to be paid his wages as soon as his work was over (Lev. xix, 13). The little interest which would be felt by such a temporary laborer, compared with that of the shepherd or permanent keeper of the flock, furnish a striking illustration in one of our Lord's discourses (John x, 12, 13). The working-day in the East begins with the rising of the sun, and ends when it sets. The parable in Matt. xx, 1-14, is interesting, not only as showing what the day's wages of a laborer at this period in Judaea, "a penny," i.e. the Roman denarius, about fifteen cents of our money, but also showing that the salvation of the Gentiles can in itself become no impediment to the Jews; and as eternal life is the free gift of God, he has a right to give it in whatever proportions, at whatever times, and on whatever conditions he pleases. HIRMOS

Church (Neale, Hist. of the Eastern Church, p. 890). See Hirmos.

Hirmos, or rather Hirmos (ἐτίπος, a series) is the name of a strophe in a Greek hymn. "The model of succeeding stanzas, so called as drawing others after it." — Walcott, Soc. Archæologia (Svo, London, 1868).

Hirnheim or Hirnhaum, Hieronymus, a distinguished Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Troppau, province of Silesia, in 1655. He took orders in 1679, and pursued his theological studies at Prague until appointed instructor in philosophy at the Norbertin College. A short time after he was made abbot of Mount Sion, and later general vicar of Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, and Austria. Hirnheim is generally ranked among modern skeptics, and most of his works have been censured in the Roman Index. He was a great abettor of the Protestant Church, and employed, in common with a number of other theologians of his Church, to combat Protestantism, secret weapons, as he saw no prospect of vanquishing them in the dogmatic field. He died August 27, 1760. His most important work is De typho generis humani, sive scieniarum humanarum incarni ac ventoso tumore, difficilissem, labilitate, falsitate, jactantia, praesumptione, incommodis et periculis, tractatu brevi, etc. (Prague, 1676, 4to), put into the Index April 14, 1692. Hirsch, Andreas, a Lutheran minister of the latter half of the last century. He studied theology at Strasburg, and filled several positions as preacher, but gave dissatisfaction to the people, and was driven from each of them in succession. Notwithstanding all persecution, he managed sufficient time to write several works, among which are, Kircherus Jesuitae Germaniae redonatus, etc. (Halle, 1662; Svo). —Religionsgespräch zwischen zweierlei Religionenverwirrten (Rotternburg, 1672, 4to): — Predigten und Gelehrtenbriefen (ibid. 1673, 8vo). —Jöcher, Gelehr. Lex. Addenda ii, 2018.

Hirsch, Carl Christian, a German theologian, was born at Hersbruck October 29, 1704. He studied at Altorf, Leipzig, and other universities, and went to the theological seminary at Nuremberg in 1729. He entered the ministry in 1734, and in 1740 was appointed deacon of Lorenz Church at Nuremberg. He died Feb. 27, 1784. His chief works are: Histoire Litt. de l'Art sacré et des moeurs des Romains, etc. (Nuremberg, 1756, 4to); — Geschichts- und Landschaftsbeschreibungen der Deutsch-Deutschen, Continu. (ibid. 1758-1764, 4to); — Geschichte der Kirche der Deutschen (1760, 4to); — Geschichte der Weltliteratur (1775, 4to). He wrote also a number of monographs inserted in the Acta Historiae ecclesiae, and in the Acta Scholast. of Nuremberg. Jöcher, Gelehr. Lex. Append. ii, 1791; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Génér., xxiv, 793; Düring, Gelehr. Thelol. Deutschl., i, 738.

Hirsch-Choetz, Zern, ben-Jerachmiel, a Polish Rabbi, and one of the most eloquent preachers of the 17th century, was born at Cracow, but spent his later days in Germany. He gained renown as an author by הרלדט הדכואס או ג'ר, or Hereditas decoris ex Jer. iii, 19 (Frankf. 1721, 4to); an allegorical commentary on the Pentateuch, written in German, with Hebrew characters, and in the main drawn from "Zohar," one of the works of the Cabalists. זוחרא, זוחרא, or Sabbath tam fut (Paris, 1693, 4to); ויאו, or Descendit decoris, a commentary on ת' יא (Amsterdam, 1706, fol.), etc. — Fürst, Bib. Jud. i, 177; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Génér., xxiv, 792; Jöcher, Gelehr. Lex. ii, 1626.

Hirschau or Hirsaue, a very celebrated old German provincial name, is the name of a number of distinctine order, in the diocese of Speier, having much in common with the congregation of Cluny (q. v.). It is asserted by the Roman Catholics to have been opened A.D. 645; but it was probably founded about 850 by count Erfalvied von Calw and bishop Notting of Verceil. The monks and the different abbots who inhabited it were distinguished for their scholarship. Some were authors, others rose to high distinction in the Church. Among these, the abbots of Seligenstadt, more than any other to establish the noble reputation of this monastery. After the Reformation it became a Protestant seminary until 1692, when the French, on their invasion of the country, destroyed it. A history of this monastery was written by Johann Theodor, professor of its abbots, under the title Chronicon Hirsaugense (Basel, 1559, fol., and 1690, 2 vols. fol.). — Herzog, Real-Enzyklop. vi, 143; Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lex. v, 213; Real-Enzyklopädie fur d. Kathol. Deutschl., v, 375. See BENEDICTINER, J. H. W.

Hirscher, Johann Baptist von, a celebrated German Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Alzengarten, Würtemberg, Jan. 20, 1788. He was educated at the Lyceum of Constance and at the University of Freiburg, and was made a priest in 1810. He held the position of instructor in philosophy and theology in different institutions until 1817, when he was called as professor of ecclesiastical pastoral theology at the University of Tubingen. In 1837 he was called to the University of Freiburg, and in 1839 he became a member of the cathedral chapter of the archiepiscopate of Freiburg. He was also appointed an "ecclesiastical counselor," and, somewhat later, a privy counselor (Geheimer Rat). In 1849 he was elected a member of the University of Freiburg in the First Chamber of the grand-duchy of Baden, into which he was subsequently several times called by the confidence of the grand-duke. In 1850 he became dean of the cathedral chapter. In 1863 he resigned his position at the university on account of his health. He died Sept. 4, 1865. Hirscher was one of the representatives of Roman Catholic theology in the 19th century. At the beginning of his literary career he was a zealous advocate of liberal reforms within his Church; subsequently he gradually became, with Möhler (q. v.), Drey (q. v.), and other professors of Tübingen, a more outspoken champion of the tenets of his Church in opposition to Protestantism, and joined his colleagues as founder and co-editor of the Theologische Quartalschrift (established 1819), one of the ablest theological organs of the Church of Rome. But, though a prolific and prominent author in behalf of his Church and its beliefs, even in later life, to favor the introduction of some reforms, as the admission of the laity to diocesan synods, and, laid, in general, greater stress on those points which the Roman Catholic Church has in common with orthodox Protestantism than on those which separate the two churches. He remained an opponent of Ultramontane theories, and was therefore, up to his death, the object of many attacks on the part of Ultramontane writers. Several of his earlier works, in particular the one entitled De Missa (Tübingen, 1821: German transl. Baden, 1826), in which he advocated the use of the Latin language in divine services, were put in the Roman Index. The chief aim of most of his works is to represent the doctrines of his Church, especially those most offensive to Protestants and liberal Roman Catholics, in as favorable a light as possible. The most important among his works are: Die Lehre vom kathol. Ablass (6th ed. Tubt, 1856); Gesch. Jesu Christi (Tubt, 1840; 2d ed. 1845); — Kutschetik (4th ed. Tubt, 1840); — Betrachtungen über sämmtliche Evangelien der Frauen (Tubt, 1849); — Die kirch. Zuständig. d. Geheimwarten (Tubt, 1851); — Die christl. Moral (Tubt, 1835, 3 vols.; 5th ed. 1850-1851); — Betrachtungen über die somitige. Evangelien des Kirch. Jahres (5th ed. Tubt, 1856, 2 vols.); — Erörterungen über die grossen religiösen Fragen der Geschicht (Tubt, 1843; 2d ed. Paris, 1843, 1852); — Hauptstücke des christl. Glaubens (Tubt, 1857); — Kutschetikus (Frib. 1842, and many edit. since); — Re-

And he also wrote this dissertation of poor and abandoned children, himself establishing three houses of refuge. He wrote on this subject the work Die Sorge für die sittlich verschorften Kinder (Freib. 1856). A volume of minor posthumous works (Nachgelassene kleine Schriften, Freib. 1899) has been published by Rollin. HIRT, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a distinguished German theologian, was born at Apolda, in Thuringia, Aug. 14, 1719. He studied at the University of Jena, and in 1746 was made extraordinary professor of philosophy. In 1769 he changed to the chair of theology, and in 1775 was appointed regular professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg. He died July 29, 1784. Hirt was regarded as one of the first theologians at the Wittenberg University, and inferior to no other person as a scholar of the Oriental languages. He is especially known in this department by the development which he gave to the systems of Alting and Danz on the Hebrew language (Systema trinum morarum); but the advance of late years in the field of exegetical theology developed the value of all his efforts in this direction. His most important works are, besides a host of dissertations in the field of exegesis, Biblia Hebraica analytica (Jena, 1758, 4to) — Philologisch-exegetische Abhandlung ub. Psalm xv, 14, 45 (ibid. 1758, 4to) — Dieu, Mysterium, et ejus resurrectione demonstrata (ibid. 1757, 4to) — Biblia hebraica analytica para Christiocen (ibid. 1757, 8vo) — Vollständ. Erklärung d. Sprüche Salomos (ibid. 1768, 4to) — Instit. Arabin. linguae (ibid. 1770, 8vo) — Orantialische und exeget. Biblia (ibid. 1772-1775, 8 vols., 8vo); continued, under the title Witten. Oriant. und exeget. Biblia, Jena, 1779, 4 vols., 8vo; Gebrihm Lex. Add., ii, 1822; Döring, Gekhr. Theol. Deutschl. i, 740 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv, 795. (J. H. W.)

HIRZ, NAPHTALI, BEN-JACOB-ELCHANAN, one of the most celebrated Jewish Cabalists, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main in the latter half of the 16th century. The only work of Hirz which was printed, Poetic. Poetic. (in Valley of the King (Amat. 1849, fol.), is a complete exposit of the Cabala. The vast amount of work which he made for the preparation of this work makes it indispensable for inquirers into the Cabalistic system. He died, Fürst says, in Palestine, but the date is not certainly known. — Först, Biblio. Judaico, i, 401; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv, 800.

HIRZEL, BERNARD, a Swiss theologian and Orientalist, was born at Zürich in 1807. He was for many years pastor of a small parish at Pfössikon. Most of his life he devoted to the study of the Oriental and Sanscrit languages. In the ecclesiastical revolt of Sept. 6, 1839, he led the peasants to the city of Zürich, on which incident he wrote a book entitled Mein Antheil a. d. Be- wönnung d. Gémeine Sept. (Zür. 1839). He died in Paris June 14, 1847. Of his works the translation of the dramas of Kalissata, Sukkutata (Zürich, 1838), and of Solomon's Song: Das Lied d. Lieder (ibid. 1840), and the Hebrew poem Geischt d. Todebeten u. d. Erdkreis (ibid. 1844), are best known. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Généale, xxiv, 801; Brockhaus, Conc. Lex. vii, 946.

HIRZEL, JOHANN HEINRICH, a German theologian, was born at Zürich (Switzerland) Dec. 18, 1716. In 1747 he was appointed professor of oratory and Church history at the university of his place; in 1745, of logic and rhetoric; and in 1759 was called to the chair of theology. He died Nov. 20, 1764. Of his writings, most remained in MS. He published Diap. de verbo Dei uniaco reformata Relig. fundamento (Zür. 1760, 4to) — Diap. de vi et amplitudine nominis Dir. Jehovae Zeboth (ibid. 1762, 4to). — Jocher, Gekhr. Lexicon, Add. ii, 2023 (J. H. W.).

HITHI (ҥ-ҥ-ҥ, shurakt, to whittle), a term usually expressing insinuation and contempt (Job xxvii, 20); so in the denunciation of the destruction of the Temple (1 Kings ix, 8; comp. Jer. xix, 8, xliv, 17, etc.). To call any one with hissing is a mark of power and authority (Isa. v, 26), and the prophet Zechariah (x, 8) speaking of the return from Babylon, says that the Lord will gather the house of Judah, and he will come with a hiss, and bring them back into their own country: an image familiar to his readers, as Theodoret and Cyril of Alexandria remark that, in Syria and Palestine, those who looked after bees drew them out of their hives, carried them into the fields, and brought them back again, with the sound of a flute and the noise of hissing (Isa. vii, 18). — See Buz.

Histopédèse (inriç, a mast of a ship, and waq, a foot), a term applied to certain heretics, chiefly Emomians, who baptized only the upper parts of the body as far as the breast, and this with the heels upward and the head downward (toνς ποτας ανω, και την κεφαλιν κωρω). Hence the name Histopedes, or Pedeverci. See Epiphanius, Harar. c. 79; Bingham, Orig. Eccls. bk. xi, chap. 18.

Histories, a name applied to anthems composed either out of Scripture or from lives of the saints. — Walcot, Sacred Archetyp. p. 312.

History, in its modern sense, is hardly a term that expresses the conception of the sacred writers, who nevertheless have given us invaluable materials for its construction. The earliest records of the O.T. are rather family pedigrees (י-ת, generations), and the Genealogies and Acts are properly memories and personal memoranda. See Chronicles.

1. It is evident, however, that the Hebrew people were a commemorative race; in other words, they were given to creating and preserving memorials of important events. Even in the patriarchal times we find monuments set up in order to commemorate events. Jacob (Gen. xxviii, 18) set up a pillar to perpetuate the memory of the divine promise; and that these monuments had a religious import and sanction appears from the statement that "he poured oil upon the top of the pillar" (Gen. xxxi, 45; Josh. iv, 9; 1 Sam. vii, 12; Judg. ix, 6). Long-lived trees, such as oaks and terebins, were made use of as memorial stones (Exod. xxiv, 26). Commemorative names, also, were given to persons, places, and things; and from the earliest periods it was usual to substitute a new and descriptive name for an old one, which may in its origin have been descriptive too (Exod. ii, 10; Gen. ii, 25; iv, 1). Genealogical tables appear, moreover, to have had a very early existence among the people of whom the Bible speaks, being carefully preserved first memoriser, afterwards by writing, among family treasures, and thus transmitted from age to age. These, indeed, as might be expected, appear to have been the first beginnings of history—a fact which is illustrated and confirmed by the way in which we should term a narrative or historical sketch is spoken of in the Bible, that is, as "the book of the generation" ("of Adam," Gen. v, 1): a mode of speaking which is applied even to the account of the creation (Gen. ii, 4), "These are the generations of the heavens and the earth, which were created they were created." The genealogical tables in the Bible (speaking generally) are not only of a very early date, but are free from the mixtures of a theological and cosmogonical kind which are found in the early literature of other primitive nations, wearing the appearance of being, as far at least as the true genealogical complete lists of individual and family descent (Gen. v, 1). But perhaps the most remarkable fact connected with this subject is the employment of poetry at a very early period to perpetuate a knowledge of historical events. Even in Gen. iv, 28, in the case of Lamech, we find po-every man employed, that is, by the great-grandson of the primitive father. Other instances may be found in Exodus xv; Judges v; Joshua xx; 2 Samuel i, 18.

1. The sources of Biblical history are chiefly the Biblical books themselves. Any attempt to fix the precise value of these sources in a critical point of view would require a volume instead of an article. Whatever hypothesis we may entertain individually, the fact is that the exact time when these books, or any of them, were put into their actual shape, as also touching the materials out of which they were formed, one thing appears very certain, that (to take an instance) Genesis, the earliest book (probably), contains, most indubitably, as well as most interesting historical facts; for though the age, the mode of life, and the state of culture differ so widely from our own, we cannot do otherwise than feel that it is among men and women, parents and children—beings of like passions with ourselves—and not with mere creations of fancy or fraud, that we converse when we pursue the narratives which this composition has so long preserved. The conviction is much strengthened in the minds of those who, by personal acquaintance with the early profane writers, are able to compare their productions with those of the Hebrews, which were long ante- rior, and which were composed by an equally ancient or- gin, have been at least equally deformed by fable. The simple comparison of the account given in Genesis of the creation of the world with the Cosmogenies of heathen writers, whether Hindu, Greek, or Latin, is enough to assure the impartial reader that a purer, if not a higher information, is to be obtained by the expression of the facts in a form which the ancient writers have been careful to preserve the legends or the philosophies of heathenism; nor is the conclusion in the slightest degree weakened on a closer scrutiny by any discrepancy which modern science may seem to show between its own revelations and the statements in Genesis. The Biblical history, as a scratched on its Biblical sources has a decided peculiarity and a great recommendation in the fact that we can trace in the Bible more clearly and fully than in connection with any other history, the first crude elements and the early materials out of which all history must be constituted.

2. How far the literature supplied in the Bible may be only a relic of a literary cycle called into being by the felicitous circumstances and favorable constitution of the great Semitic family, but which has perished in the lapse of ages, it is now impossible to determine; but had the other portions of this imagined literature been of equal religious value with what the Bible offers, there is little risk in affirming that mankind would scarcely have allowed it to be lost. The Bible, however, bears traces that its were not the only books current in the time and country to which it relates; for writing, writers, and books are mentioned without the emphasis and distinction which always accompany new discoveries or peculiar local possessions, and as ordinary, well-known, and matter-of-course things. It is certain that we do not possess all the works which were known in the early periods of Israelitish history, since in Numbers xxii, 14 we read of "the book of the sons of the Lord," and in Joshua x, 13, of "the book of Jasher." Without writing, history, properly so called, can have no existence. Under the head Writing we shall trace the early rudiments and progress of that important art; here we merely remark that an acquaintance with it was possessed by the Hebrews at least as early as their Exodus from Egypt—a fact which shows at least the possibility that the age of the Biblical records stands some thousand or more year prior to the earliest Greek historian, Herodotus. Other sources for at least the early Biblical history are comparatively of small value. Josephus has gone over the same periods as those the Bible treats of, but obviously had no sources of consequence relating to primitive times which are not open to us, and in regard to those times does little more than add here and there a patch of a legendary or traditional hue which could well have been spared. His Greek and Roman predilections and his apologetical aims detract from the value of his work, while in relation to the early history of his country he can be regarded in no other light than a sort of philosophica- l interpreter; nor is it till he comes to his own age that he has the value of an independent (not even then an impartial) eye-witness or well-informed reporter. In his annals he is not consistent, and the care with which business was very insufficiently furnished. The use of both Josephus and Philo is far more safe for the student of the New Testament than for the exponent of the old. See Josephus.

3. The Talmud and the Rabbis afford very little assistance for the early periods, but might probably be made to render more service in behalf of the times of the Saviour than has generally been allowed. The illustrations which Lightfoot and Wetstein have drawn from these sources are of great value; and Gfrorer, in his Jahrhun- dert des Heils (Stuttgart, 1838), has made ample use of the materials they supply in order to draw a picture of the first century, a use which the learned author is at no small pains to justify. The compilations of the Jew- ish doctors, however, require to be employed with the greatest caution, since the Rabbis were the depositaries of the earlier writings, and the compilation of each has been on the form of the primitive faith and of the Mosaic institutions which has been called by the distinctive name of Judaism, comprising a heterogeneous mass of false and true things, the colloquies of the East as well as light from the Bible, and which, to a great extent, lies under the inquisition of the compilers of Jewish history. The expression of the faith in the Talmud is to propagate fables on their authority, and to do a disservice to the Gospel records, may be learnt from the fact that older writers, in their undue trust of Rabbinic authority, went so far as to maintain that no cock was allowed to be kept in Jerusalem, because fowls fall from the sky, or that the author of Scripture (which in this case they refused to admit) is most express and decided (Matt. xxvii, 54; Mark xiv, 30, 60, 72). On the credibility of the Rab- bins, see Ravii Diss. Phil. Théol. de eo quod Fidei meren- tur, etc., in Dilherr's Collect. Mystic. Hist. et Theol. Pans. Wolf, Hilt. Heb. ii, 1095; Fabricius, Biblici, Antiqu. i, 3, 4; Brunsmann, Diss. de Judaeis (Hafniae, 1705).

The classical authors betray the grossest ignorance almost in all cases where they treat of the origin and history of the Hebrew people; and even the most seri- ous and generally philosophic writers fall into vulgar erors and unaccountable mistakes as soon as they speak on the subject. Whet, for instance, can be worse than the blunder or prejudice of Tacitus, under the influence of which he declared that the Jews derived their origin from Mount Ida, in Crete? that by the advice of an oracle they had been driven out of Egypt; and that they set up in their temple at Jerusalem as an object of worship the figure of an ass, since an animal of that species had directed them in the wilderness and discovered them a fountain (Tacitus, Hist. v, 1, 2). Dion Cassius (xxxvii, 17) relates similar fables. Plutarch (Quint. Sca. 5, 5) makes the Hebrews pay divine honors to swine, as being their instructors in agriculture, and afirms that they kept the Sabbath and the Feast of Taber- nacles in honor of Bacchus. A collection of these gross misrepresentations, together with a profound and generally philosophic inquiry into their sources, and the falsehood of their falsehood, has been given by Dr. J. G. Müller, in the Theologische Studien und Kritiken (1845, iv, 893).

3. The children of the faithful Abraham seem to have had one great work of Providence intrusted to them, namely, the development, transmission, and infusion into the world of the religious element of civilization. Their history, accordingly, is the history of the rise, progress, and diffusion of true religion, considered in its source and its developments. Such a history must possess large and peculiar interest for every student of human nature, and pre-eminently for those who love to study the unfoldings of Providence, and desire to learn that greatest of all arts—the art of living at once for time and for eternity. The material contained in the Biblical history is of a wide and most extensive nature. In its greatest length and fullest meaning it comes down from the creation of the world till the close of the 1st century of the Christian era, thus covering a space of some 4000 years. The books presenting this long train of history are written not only in prose, but in verse also, in unison, and in verse; nor seldom is it the fact that the modern historian has to construct his narrative as much out of the implications of an epistle, the highly-colored materials of poetry, the far-reaching visions of prophecy, and the indirect and illusive information of didactic and moral precepts, as from the immediate and express statements of history strictly so denominated.

The historical materials furnished relating to the Hebrew nation may be classed under three great divisions: 1. The books which are consecrated to the antiquity of the Hebrew nation—the period that elapsed before the era of the judges. These works are the Pentateuch and the book of Joshua, which, according to Ewald (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i, 72), properly constitute only one work, and which may be termed the great book of original documents. 2. The books which duplicate the times of the judges and kings, in the first description of Jerusalem; that is, Judges, Kings, and Samuel, to which belongs the book of Ruth: “all these,” says Ewald, “constitute also, according to their last formation, but one work, which may be called the Great: Book of Kings. 3. The third class comprises the books included under the head of Hagiographies, which are of a much later origin, Chronicles, with Ezra and Nehemiah, forming the great book of general history reaching to the Grecian period. After these books come those which are classed together under the name of Apocrypha, whose use, we think, has been unduly neglected. These works preserve records of events which, closed within the century that saw it open. Other books found in the Old and New Testaments, which are not properly of a historical character, connect themselves with one or other of these periods, and give important aid to students of sacred history.

4. Biblical history in general. These works are the older writers as a part of Church History in general, since they considered the history given in the Bible as presenting different and successive phases of the Church of God (Buddel Hist. Eccles. 2 vols. 1726-39; Stolberg, Gesch. der Religion Jevn, i, 111). Other writers have viewed this subject in a more practical light, presenting the characters found in the Bible for imitation or avoidance; among whom may be enumerated Hess (Geschichte der Israeliten vor den Zedern Jevn, Zürich, 1775) and Nie- meyer (Charakteristik der Bibel, Halle, 1830). Among the more strictly learned writers several have had it in view to supply the gaps left in the succession of events by the Bible, out of sources found in profane writers. Here the chief authors are of English birth, namely, Prideaux, Shuckford, Russell; and for the New Testament, the learned, cautious, and fair-dealing Land- sey. There is a valuable work by G. Lauge, "Enzyk dezie der heiligen und profanen, in der Ge-chichte der Welt (Bayreuth, 1775-80). Other writers have pursued a strictly chronological method, such as Usher (Annals Ver.N.T. London 1650) and Des Vignoles (Chronologie de l'Histoire Sainte, Berlin, 1730). Heeren (1800) is the best introduction of this kind. Heeren has compiled many valuable inquiries on the monarchical period, the following work: J. Bernhardi Commentatio de consui gibus effectu sint ut regnum Judaei divisi psereret quantum regnum Israel (Louvani, 1823). Heeren also declares that Bauer's Handbuch der Gesch. des Holy, Vol. 2, is the best introduction both to the history and the antiquities of the Hebrew nation; though Gesenius complains that he is too much given to the construction of hypotheses. The English reader will find a useful but not sufficiently critical compendium in The History of the Hebrew Commonwealth, translated from the German of John Jahn, D.D., by C. E. Stowe (N. Y. 1829, and later); a work admirable, as no other, in estiesting, yet by no means faultless work, is Millman's History of the Jews (London, 1829, 3 vols. 12mo; revised, London, and N. Y. 1870-1, 3 vols. sm. 8vo). A more recent and very valuable work, Kittto's Pictorial History of Palestine (Lond. 1841), combines with the Bible history of the Jews, and presents, in each volume, and is preceded by an elaborate Introduction, which forms the only Natural History of Palestine in our language. A valuable compendium is Smith's series of "Student's Histories" (Old Testament History and New-

German theologians are strongly imbued with the feeling that the history of the Hebrews has yet to be written. Nieluhru's manner of treating Roman history has had a great influence on them, and has aroused the theological learned, and profane; but by no means yet come to an end; nor can we add that they have hitherto led to very definite and generally approved results. The works of the learned Jews, most famous of which is Kose (Gesch. der Israeliten seit dem Maccabäer, 3 vols.; Gesch. des Judenstaates since 1798, 3 mitte, with 4 plates); also (Gesch. d. Volkes Israel v d. Vellenung des Zweiten Tempels bis zur Einsetzung des Mahaläns Schimone, 1854-57, 2 vols. 8vo); Grätz (Geschichte d. Juden, 11 vols. 8vo, not yet completed), as well as that of Nork (Das Leben Moses vom Astron. Stand. betrachtet, 1868), Raphall (Post-Bibl. History of the Jews, N. Y. 1855, of which vols. i and ii only ever appeared), and others, must not be overlooked by the professional student; nor will he fail to study with care the valuable introductions to the knowledge of the Old Testament put forth in Germany, with which we have nothing comparable in our language. The memoirs of the Royal Society, for example, we may mention Stihielin's Kritisch Unternehmungen über den Pentateuch, etc. (1843), and H. Ewald's Geschichte des Volkes Israel bei Chrihstus (Göttingen, 1843 sq. 1851-3, 6 vols. 8vo), the last part of which has been translated into English (London, 1859, 2 vols. 8vo). The latter especially is learned, accurate, and profound; the author being particularly pervaded by a rationalistic spirit. Kurz's Manual of Sacred History (Philadelphia, 1854, 12mo; from the German, Köingsberg, 1856, 8vo), and History of the Old Covenant (Edinburgh, 1859, 3 vols. 8vo; from the German, Berlin, 1848-54). The best of the works, we believe, are the following: Weber and Holzmann's Gesch. d. Volkes Israel (Leipz. 1866, 2 vols. 8vo) is rationalistic. The latest is Hitzig's Gesch. Isr. (Lpz. 1870). For other works, see Darling, Cyclopaedia, col. 1830 sq.

HISTRIOMASTIX is the name of a book written in 1663 by William Prynne, a Puritan barrister, against plays, masks, dancing, etc. It is a work quarto of 1000 pages, and abounds with learning and curious quotations. The author of this work was arraigned before the Star Chamber Feb. 7, 1663, on account of passages which, it was alleged, reflected on the religious conduct of the royal house. But the fact was that the author condemned, and that justly, the levity and voluptuousness of the court, and the encouragement which even some of the pretates gave to its licentiousness. Prynne was sentenced "to have his book burned by the hands of the common hangman, to be put from the bar, and to be forever incapable of appearing in the court," a sentence which was condemn'd by the whole society of the society of Lincoln's Inn, to be degraded at Oxford, to stand in the pillory at Westminster and Cheapside, to lose both his ears, one in each place, to pay a fine of £5000, and to suffer perpetual imprisonment." But more remarkable than this, if possible, was the violent speech of an English earl (Dorset) on this occasion. "I declare you (Pryme) to be a schismmaker in the Church, a sedition sower in the commonwealth, a wolf in sheep's clothing; in a word, omnium malorum requisimus," continuing in this strain, and closing thus: "I would have him branded in the forehead, and in the hand of every one, that he be discharg'd for eight years, and never, for the space of his life, have his collegiate course; but, despite this, he succeeded in obtaining in 1816 the principalship of the academy in his native place, and his success as a teacher received the recognition of Yale College in the degree of M.A., which that institution of learning conferred on him only two years later. In 1819 he went to Yale, and studied theology under Dr. Taylor for about three years. His first and only settlement in the ministry was at Conway, where he remained from 1821 to 1825, when again failing health induced him to accept the professorship of natural history and chemistry in Amherst College, which gave him the benefit of more extended and less exhaustive labors. He entered this new position after some preparatory study under Prof. Stillman, senior, of Yale College. In 1845 he was elected president of Amerst College, and professor of natural theology and go-ology. In 1854 he resigned the presidency, but still continued in the chair of geology. He died Feb. 27, 1864.
Dr. Hitchcock is especially deserving of our reognition in this place on account of his Religion of Geology and its connected Sciences (Boston, 1851, 12mo), the result of thirty years' study and reflection, which had a very extended circulation both in this country and in Europe. Among Dr. Hitchcock's peculiar literary traits (see the Biblioth. Sacra, July, 1851, p. 662, 668) may be mentioned "his mode of answering the objection to the resurrection of the body; his proofs from geology of the benevolence of God, of special providence, and of special divine interposition in nature ..." (ibid., July, 1851, p. 662), in "Relations and Duties of the Philoosopher and Theologian," and xl, 776-800, "Special Divine Interpositions in Nature." Dr. William S. Tyler, professor in Amherst College, who preached a discourse at Dr. Hitchcock's funeral, which has been printed, gave "an admirable and summarine, yet happy, character, attainments, and influence."—Appleton's Cyclop.

Hitchcock, Enos, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Springfield, Mass., graduated at Harvard in 1767, and was ordained colleague of Mr. Chipman, pastor of the Second Congregational Church of Beverley, in 1771. In 1780 he became a chaplain in the army, and at the close of the war in 1783 he took a pastoral charge in Providence, R. I. He besought at his death, which occurred in 1803, $2500 as a fund for the support of the ministry. He published a Treatise on Education (1799), and Sermons, with his Discourses on Lord's Supper (1793-1800).... Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 852.

Hitchcock, Gad, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Springfield, Mass., Feb. 12, 1718 or 1719. He was educated at Harvard University, where he graduated in 1743, and was ordained and installed in Pembroke (now Hance, Mass.), in October, 1748. During the Rev. War served in one of the Massachusetts regiments.
In 1750, his alma mater conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity. In 1757 he was attacked with paralysis while preaching to his people, from which he never recovered so as to engage any further in active service. He died Aug. 9, 1803. His writings were mainly sermons and a (Dutch) discourse, delivered at Harvard College in 1779.—Sprague, Ann. of the Amer. Pulpite, viii, 29,

Hitt, Daniel, a Methodist Episcopal minister of considerable eminence, was born in Fauquier County, Va., entered the itinerancy in 1790, became the traveling companion of Bishop Asbury in 1807, and in 1808 was elected by the General Conference one of the agents of the Methodist Book Concern, the duties of which offered him a discharge for eight, and afterwards, on a fidelity, served as presiding elder until 1822, when he became the travelling companion of bishop McKendree.
In 1828 he took charge of the Potomac District; after two years' labors he passed to the Carlisle District, and there closed his earthly work. Mr. Hitt was a man of marked "simplicity and integrity," and an admirer of his manners and the sweetness of his disposition, in his private intercourse in society, gained him the affect-on of all." He died of typhus fever, in great peace and sure hope, in September, 1825.—Minutes of Conf., i, 567.

Hittite, or rather Chittite (Heb. Chiti, usually in the plur. , Sept. Xirittaios; also in the children of Heth; fem. , Ezek. xvi, 3; plur.
, Ezek. i, 1; also in the plur., daughters of Heth, Gen. xxxvii 46, the designation of the descendents of Heth in the name of nations of Canaan (q. v.), 1. Biblical Notion.—(1.) With five exceptions, below below, the word is in the singular number, according to the common Hebrew idiom. It is occasionally rendered in the A. V. in the singular number, "the Hittites" (Exod. xxxii, 28; xxxiii, 2; xxiv, 11; Josh. i, 1; also , daughters of Heth," Gen. xxxvii, 46, the designation of the descendents of Heth in the name of nations of Canaan (q. v.),
2. (2.) The plural form of the word is in the Chittim, or Hittites (Josh.
, 1; Judges, 26; Judges, 29; Kings x, 2; Kings vii, 6; 2 Chron. i, 17), (3.) A Hittite woman) is in the Ezek. xvi, 3, 45), in 1 Kings xi, the same word is rendered "Hittites." In the list of the descendants of Noah, Heth occupies the second place among the children of Canaan. It is to be observed that the first and second names, Sidon and Heth, are not gentile nouns, and that all the names following are gentile nouns in the sing. Sidon is called the first-born of Canaan, though the name of the town is probably derived from one of the Sons of Canaan, "fisherman," Amaic, of Philo of Byblus. It is therefore probable, as we find no city Heth, that this is the name of the ancestor of the nation, and the gentile noun, chilren of Heth, makes this almost certain. After the emigration of the nations sprung from Canaan, it is added,
"and formerly were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad" (Gen. x, 18). This passage will be illustrated by the evidence that there were Hittites and Amorites beyond Canaan, and also beyond the wider territory that must be allowed for the placing of the Hamamites, who, it may be added, perhaps had not migrated from Canaan at the date to which the list of Noah's descendants mainly refers (see verse 19). See Canaanite.
1. Our first introduction to the Hittites is in the time of Abraham, when they are mentioned among the inhabitants of the Promised Land (Gen. xv, 20). Abraham bought from the Bene-Cheth, "Children of Heth"—such was then their title—the field and the cave of Machpelah, belonging to Ephron the Hittite (Gen. xxiii, 3-18). They were then settled at the town which was afterwards, under its new name of Hebron, to become the capital of the ancient city of the Hebrews, known by the name of Kirjath-arba, and perhaps also of Mamre (Gen. xxiii, 19; xxx, 9). The propensities of the tribe appear at that time to have been rather commercial than military. The "money current with the merchant," and the process of weighing it, were familiar to them; the peaceful assembly in the "gate of the city" was their manner of receiving the stranger who was desirous of having a “possession” “secured” to him among them. The dignity and courtesy of their demeanor also come out strongly in this narrative. As Ewald well says, Abraham chose his allies in warfare from the Amorites, but he goes to the Hittites for his grave. But the tribe was evidently as yet small, not important enough to be mentioned in the first two centuries of the era which shared the bulk of the land between them (Gen. xii, 6; xiii, 7). In the southern part of the country they remained for a considerable period after this, possibly extending as far as Gerar and Beersheba, a good way below Hebron (xxvi, 17; xxviii, 10). From their farthest time, the Hittite people were divided (Gen. xxvii, 44; 3xvi, 2 sq.), and the fear lest Jacob should take the same course is the motive given by Rebekah for sending Jacob away to Haran. It was the same feeling that had urged Abram to send to Mesopotamia for a wife for Isaac. The descendant of Shem could not wed with Hamites—“with the daughters of the Canaanites among whom I dwell . . . wherein I am a stranger,” but “go to my country and thy kindred” is his father’s command, “to the house of thy mother’s father, and take thee a wife from thence” (Gen. xxviii, 2; xxxiv, 4). See Hittites.

From several of the above notices we learn that the original seat of the Hittites, the city of Hebron, was founded by one Arba of the Anakim, whence its earlier name, and had inhabitants of that giant race as late as Joshua’s time. It is also connected with Zoan in Egypt, and is said to have been the capital of Egypt seven years before that city (Num. xxxii, 22). Zoan or Avaris was built or rebuilt, and no doubt received its Hebrew or Semitic name, Zoan, the translation of its Egyptian name HA-ANWAR, in the time of the first Shepherd-king of Egypt, who was of Phoenician or kindred race. It is also to be noted that, in Abraham’s time, the Amorites were connected with the giant race in the case of the Rephaim whom Chedorlaomer smote in Asherot Keramim (Gen. xiv, 5), where the Rephaite Og afterwards ruled, dwelt close to Hebron (ver. 18). The Hittites and Amorites, we shall see, were later settled together in the Oronites valley. Thus at this period there was a settlement of the two nations in the south of Palestine, and the Hittites were mixed with the Rephaite Anakim. See Hebron.

2. Throughout the period of the settlement in Pal-esine, the name of the Hittites occurs only in the usual formula for the occupants of the Promised Land. Chedorlaomer, as the code of Joshua implies, the Hittite, but the Hittites are never omitted (see Exod. xxiii, 28). In the enumeration of the six or seven nations of Canaan, the first names, in four phrases, are the Canaanites, Hittites, Amorites; and in three, the former three names, with the addition of another nation. In but two phrases are these three nations further separated. It is also to be remarked that the Hittites and Amorites are mentioned together in a bare majority of the forms of the enumeration, but in a great majority of passages. The importance thus given to the Hittites is perhaps equally evident in the place of Heth in the list of the descendants of Noah, in the place of the tribe in the list in the promise to Abraham, where it is first of the known descendants of Canaan (xv, 20), and certainly in the term “all the land of the Hittites,” as a designation, the Amorites connected with that extent, from Euphrates to Mediterrenean, and from Lebanon to the desert (Josh. i, 4). The close relation of the Hittites and Amorites seems to be indicated by the prophet Ezekiel, where he speaks of Jerusalem as daughter of an Amorite father and a Hittite mother (xvi, 9, 40). The Amorites married his last-cited passages, to be named for the Canaanites in general.

When the spies examined Canaan they found “the Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites’ dwelling ‘in the mountains’ (Num. xiii, 29), that is, in the high tracts that afterwards formed the refugee and rallying-points of the Israelites during the troubled period of the judges. There is, however, no distinct statement as to the exact position of the Hittites in Palestine. We may draw an inference from their connection with Jeru-salem and the Amorites, and their inhabiting the mountains, and suppose that they were probably seated in the hilly region of the south, though of their territory beyond Palestine there are some indications in Scripture. The most important of these is the designation of the Promised Land in its full extent as “all the land of the Hittites” (Gen. xxi, 31) or “the land of the Hittites” (Josh. x, 18) or “the land of Hittite” (Josh. x, 19), in which the Egyptians probably settled Hittites, who have originally attracted them so far to the south as Beersheba, a people having the quiet commercial tastes of the Egyptians and their companions can have had no call for the roving, skirmlishing life of the country bordering on the desert; and thus, during the sojourn of Israel in Egypt, they had withdrawn from the desert region and migrated to those districts, retiring before Amalek (Num. xiii, 29) to the more secure mountain country in the centre of the land. Perhaps the words of Ezekiel xvi, 8, 45 may imply that they helped to found the city of Jebus. From this time on, however, their quarters are not fixed, and they take their part against the invader, in equal alliance with the other Canaanitic tribes (Josh. ix, 1; xi, 3, etc.).

3. Henceforward the notices of the Hittites are very few and faint. We meet with two individuals, both of them attached to the army of Ammon. In the account of the war with Midian, the Hittite, who was with him in the hill of Hachilah, and with Abishai accompanied him by night to the tent of Saul (1 Sam. xxvi, 6). He is nowhere else mentioned, and was possibly killed in one of David’s expeditions, before the list in 2 Sam. xxvii is drawn up, (2). In the account of the Hittite Uriah the Hittite, whom David’s body-guard (2 Sam. xxiii, 39; 1 Chron. xi, 41), the deep tragedy of whose wrongs forms the one blot in the life of his master. In both these persons, though warriors by profession, we can perhaps detect traces of those qualities which we have noticed as characteristics of the tribe. In the case of the first, it was the Hittite practical, unscrupulous “son of Zerah,” who pressed David to allow him to kill the sleeping king; Ahimelech is clear from that stain. In the case of Uriah, the absence from suspicion and the generous self-denial which he displays are not well known to need excusing. (2 Sam. xi, 11, 12). He was doubtless a prolyte, and probably descended from several generations of proselytes; but the fact shows that Canaanitic blood was in itself no bar to advancement in the court and army of David.

Solomon subjected the remaining Hittites to the same tribute of bond-service as the other remnants of the Canaanitic nations (1 Kings ix, 20). Of all these the Hittites appear to have been the most important, and to have been under a king of their own; for “the kings of the Hittites” are, in 1 Kings x, 29, coupled with the kings of Syria as purchasers of the chariots which Solomon imported from Egypt. It appears that this was some different division of the Hittite family living far away somewhere in the north; although, from their connection in 2 Kings vii, 6, with the Egyptians, others have inferred that the noise came from the south, from what quarter, in that case, the Hittites were the only people who could be expected to make an attack with chariots. This would identify them with the southern Hivites, who were subject to the sceptre of Judah, and show also that they were to who purchased Egyptian chariots from the fact that Solomon had. It is evident in this case, however, that these were a distinct and independent body, apparently outside the bounds of Palestine. The Hittites were still present in Palestine as a distinct people after the Exile, and are named among the alien tribes with whom the returned Israelites contracted those marriages which Ezra urged and Nehemiah compelled them to dissolve (Ezra ix, 1, etc.; comp. Neh. xiii, 32-After this we hear no more of the Hittites, who probably lost their national identity by intermixture with the neighboring tribes or nations. (See Hamel-

4. Nothing is said of the religion or worship of the Hittites. Even in the enumeration of Solomon's idolatrous worship of the gods of his wives—among whom were Hittite women (1 Kings xi, 1)—no Hittite deity is alluded to (see 1 Kings xi, 5, 7; 2 Kings xxiii, 13). See below.

5. The names of the individual Hittites mentioned in the Bible are as follow. They are all susceptible of interpretation as Hebrew words, which would lead to the belief either that the Hittites spoke a dialect of the Aramaic or Hebrew language, or that the words were Hebraized in their transference to the Bible records.

Adan (a woman), Gen. xxvi, 2.
Ahimelech, 1 Sam. xxvi, 6.
Bashemath, accurately Basemath (a woman); possibly a second name of Adah, Gen. xxvi, 34.
Bree (father of Judith, below), Gen. xxvi, 34.
Bride (father of Basemath), Gen. xxvi, 34.
Ephron, Gen. xxiii, 10, 13, 14, etc.
Judith (a woman), Gen. xxvi, 34.
Urnaim, 2 Sam. xiii, 3, etc.; xxiii, 38, etc.
Zohar (father of Ephron), Gen. xxiii, 8.

In addition to the above, Sinbechati, who in the Hebrew text is always denominated a Hushathite, is by Josephus (Ant. vii, 12, 2) styled a Hittite.

II. Notices in Ancient Inscriptions.—1. The Egyptian monuments give us much information as to a Hittite nation that can only be that indicated in the two passages in the books of Kings above noticed. The kings of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties made extensive conquests in Syria and Mesopotamia. They were opposed by many small states, which probably always formed one or more confederacies. In the time of Thothmes III (B.C. cir. 1450), the leading nation was that of the Huthen (or Luten), which appears to have once headed a confederacy defeated by that king before Meggido (De Rougé, Revue Archéologique, n. s., iv, 346 sqq.).

The Kheta were conquered by or tributary to Thothmes III (Birch, Annals of Thothmes III, p. 21); but it is not until the time of Rameses II (B.C. cir. 1300), second king (according to Manetho) of the nineteenth dynasty, that we find them occupying the most important place among the eastern enemies of the Egyptians, the place before held by the Huthen. The name is generally written Khet, and sometimes Kheta, and was probably in both cases pronounced khat. It is not easy to determine whether it properly denotes the people or the country; perhaps it denotes the latter, as it rarely has a plural termination; but it is often used for the former. This name is identical in radicals with that of the Hittites, and that it designates them is clear from its being connected with a name equally representing that of the Amorites, and from the correspondence of this warlike people, strong in chariots, with the non-Palestinian Hittites mentioned in the Bible. The chief or strongest city of the Kheta, or at least of the territory subject to or confederate with the king of the Kheta, was Ketesh, on the river Arnut, Anaorta, or Arunata. Ketesh was evidently a Kadesh, "a sacred city," yth, but no city of that name, which could correspond to this, is known to us. It is represented in the Egyptian sculptures as on or near a lake, which Dr. Brugsch has traced in the modern lake of Kedes, fed by the Oronotes, southward of Hems (Emesa). The Oronotes, it must be observed, well corresponds to the Arunata. The town is also stated to have been in the land of Amor (of Amarna), that is, of the Amorites. The position of this Amoritish territory is further defined by Carchemish being placed in it, as we shall show in a later part of this article. The territory of these Hittites, therefore, lay in the valley of the Oronotes. It probably extended towards the Euphrates, for the Kheta are also connected with Sehaera or Mesopotamia, not the nahmi of the cuneiform inscriptions, but it is not clear that they ruled that country. Probably they drew confederates thence, as was done by the Syrians in David's time.

The greatest achievement of Rameses II was the defeat of the Kheta and their allies near Kethes, in the fifth year of his reign. This event is commemorated in a papyrus and by several inscriptions and sculptures. The nations confederate with the Kheta were the Aratu (Aradus?), Masaus (Mash?), Paatara or Patara, Keshkeshei in Bhirka (Bucchara), Akhetera, Ketesh, Ireta, Arkites, Tentsen (or Tratenues), and Karakamash (Carchemish). These names are difficult to identify save the seventh and the last, but it is evident that they do not belong to Palestine. The Hittites are represented as having a regular army, which was strong in chariots, a particular which we should expect from the Biblical notices of them and of the Canaanites, where the latter name seems applied to the tribe so called. Each chariot was drawn by two horses, and held three men, a charioteer and two warriors. They had also cavalry and disciplined infantry. In the great battle with Rameses they had 2500 horses, that is, chariots. The representations of the Kheta in the sculptures relating to this campaign probably show that their forces were composed of men of two different races. Sir Gardner Wilkinson thinks that both belonged to the Kheta nation, and it seems hardly possible to form any other conclusion. "The nation of Sheta [the initial character is thus sometimes read S] seems to have been composed of two distinct tribes, both comprehended under the same name, uniting in one common cause, and probably subject to the same government." These supposed tribes differed in dress and arms, and one was sometimes bearded, the other was beardless (Ancient Egyptians, i, p. 400 sqq.). They are rather fair than yellow, and the beardless warriors are probably of a different race from the people of Palestine.
HITTITE 281

generally. In some cases they remind us of the Tatras, and it is impossible to forget that the Egyptians of the Greek period evidently took the Khetu for Scythians or Bactrians. The name Scythian is not remote, nor is that of the Kittas, or warrior-Tatras in the Chinese gardening, as the sons of Anak apparently look ruled the Hittites in Hebrew, so that we would not be surprised to find two races under the same government in the case of the Hittites of Syria.

In the twenty-first year of Rameses II, the great king of the Hittites, Khetsera, came to Egypt to make a treaty of peace. A copy of the treaty is preserved in a hieroglyphic inscription. From this it appears that Khetsera had been preceded by his grandfather Saphra, his father Mauraos, and his brother Mauthura, and that in the reigns of Saphra and Mauthura peace had been made upon the same conditions. In a tablet of the thirty-fourth year of the same king, belonging to his son, a Hittite princess with the Egyptian name Ra-Ma-ur-Re-Fri, is represented as well her father, the king (or a king) of the Khetu. Solomon also, as Dr. Brugsch remarks, took Hittite women into his harem (1 Kings xi, 1). Rameses III (B.C. cir. 1200) had a treaty with a Hittite prince; mention is made of the inscriptions with khet (kethesh) Karna (Carchemish), Akatu (Aradius?), and Aasa, all described as in the land Amara.

The religion of the Hittites is only known from the above treaty with Rameses II, though it is probable that additional information may be derived from an examination of prayer-books; but if the name of the land and of the mountains and rivers of the land of Khetu, of Egypt, the Sutekh of the land of Khetu, the Sutekh of several forts, the Ashetkar (written Antkarat) of the land of Khetu, several unnamed gods and goddesses of places and of the mountains and rivers of the land of Khetu, and of Egypt, Amen, Sutekh, and the winds. Sutekh, or Seth, was the chief god of the Shepherd-kings of Egypt (one of whom appears to have abolished all other worship in his dominions), and is also called Bar or Baal. Sutekh is perhaps a foreign form, and seems certainly of foreign origin. Ashetkar is, of course, Ashtoreth, the consort of Baal in Palestine. They were the principal divinities of the Khetu, for they are mentioned by name, and as worshipped in the whole land. The worship of the mountains and rivers is remarkably indicative of the character of the religion, and the mention of the gods of special cities points in the same direction. The former is low nature-worship, the latter is entirely consistent with it, and, indeed, is never found but in connection with it.

The Egyptian monuments furnish us with the following additional Hittite names: Tarakarunusna, Kamany, Tarakaratana, (as an ally) Ann, (as a scribe of the books of the Khetu, Peta, Tatarana, Katicdeura, Ak-ma (an ally?), Sarmus, Tatara, Matrema, brother of [the king of the Khetu, Raasununa (an ally?), Tutasna (an ally?).

These names are evidently Semitic, but not Hebrew, a circumstance we need not surprise us when we know that Aramaic was distinct from Hebrew in Jacob's time. The syllables Skna in Khetsera, and Rn in Rab-ras-umna, seem to correspond to the Sarr and Rab of Assyrian and Babylonian names. Tatarana may be the same name as the Tidal of Scripture. But the most remarkable of all these names is Matrema, which corresponds as closely as possible to Mizraim. The third letter is a hard t, and the final syllable is constantly used for the Hebrew dual. In the Egyptian name of Mesopotamia, Nehabena, we find the Chaldee and Arabic dual. It would therefore appear that the language of the Khetu was nearer to the Hebrew than to the Chaldean. Taekatatasa probably commences with the name of the goddess Dezeeto or Atargatis.

The principal information on the Egyptian bearings of this subject is Brugsch's Geographiche Inschriften, ii, 20 sq. The documents to which he mainly refers are the inscriptions of Rameses II, the poem of Pentasent, and the treaty. The first is the sixth letter of Jepsiu (Denkmaler, Abh. iii, bl. 153-161, 164-166, 187, 196; see also 130, 299), and translated by M. Chalas (Rev. Arch., 1859); see also Brugsch, Historie d'Egypte, i, 137 sq.; the second is translated by M. de Rouge (Revue Contemporaine, No. 106, p. 389 sq.), Dr. Brugsch (ll. cc.), Mr. Goodwin, Cambridge Essays, 1858, and in Bunson's Egypt's Places, iv, 675 sq.; and the third is translated by Dr. Brugsch (ll. cc.) and Mr. Goodwin (Parrthon, 1862).

In the Asyrian inscriptions, as lately deciphered, there are frequent references to a nation of Khati, who "formed a considerable and powerful rule in Asia," the "chiefs," whose territory also lay in the valley of the Orontes, and who were sometimes assisted by the people of the sea-coast, probably the Phoenicians (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, 465). "Twelve kings of the southern Khati are mentioned in several places." If the identification of this people with the Hebrews should prove to be correct, it agrees with the name Chat, as noticed under Heth, and affords a clue to the meaning of some passages which are otherwise puzzling. These are (a) Josh. i, 4, where the expression "all the land of the Hittites" appears to mean all the land of Canaan, or at least the northern part thereof. (b) Judg. i, 29. Here nearly the same expression recurs. See Luz. (c) 1 Kings x, 29; 2 Chron. i, 17, "All the kings of the Hittites and kings of Aram" (probably identical with the "kings on this side Ephratah," 1 Kings iv, 24) are mentioned as purchasing chariots and horses from Egypt, with the possession of which they were so notorious, that (d) it would seem to have become at a later date almost proverbial in allusion to an alarm of an attack by chariots (2 Kings vii, 6).

Hive (Heb. Chieri), "great, usu. with the art., often collectively for the plur., "the Hive," i.e. Hivites; Sept. ο Εναίο, a designation of one of the nations inhabiting Palestine before the Israelites. See Canaan. The name is, in the original, uniformly found in the singular number. It never means, like that of the Hittites, a plural, nor does it appear in any other form. Perhaps we may assume from this that it originated in some peculiarity of locality or circumstance, as in the case of the Amorites—"mountaineers," and not in a progenitor, as did that of the Ammonites, who are also styled Bene-Ammon—children of Ammon, or the Hittites, Bene-Cheb—children of Heh. The name is explained by Ewald (Gesch. i, 318) as Binnenländer, that is, "Midlanders;" by Genenus (Thea. p. 451) as pagoni, "villagers." In the following passages the name is given in the A.V. in the singular, "the Hivites" (Gen. xvi, 17; Exod. xii, 2; 20; xxvii, 2; xxxiv, 11; Josh. i, 1; xi, 3; 1 Chron. i, 15; also Gen. xxxiv, 2; xxxvi, 2. In all the rest it is rendered by the plural.

1. In the genealogical tables of Genesis the "Hivite" is named as one of the descendants—the sixth in order—of Canaan, the son of Ham (Gen. x, 17; 1 Chron. i, 16).

2. In the fourth century of the nation of the nation of the call of Abraham, occupied the Promised Land (Gen. xv, 19-21), the Hivites are omitted from the Hebrew text (though in the Samaritan and Sept. their name is inserted). This has led to the conjecture, amongst others, that they are identical with the Kadmonites, whose name is found there and there only (Isr., Palast., p. were Canaanites and Perizzites, these only being mentioned as likely to attack him in revenge (xxxv, 30). It is possible, but not certain, that there is a reference to this matter where Jacob speaks of a portion he gave to Joseph as having been taken by him in war from the Amorites (Gen. xxxv, 2). For his last will Jacob referred to Joseph, but it had been bought, and what Simeon and Levi seized was probably never claimed by Jacob, unless, indeed, the Hivites, who might possibly be spoken of as Amorites (but comp. xxxiv, 30), attempted to recover it by force. Perhaps the reference is to some other occurrence. It is possible also that the town of Nacharamim, and the pass sages just noticed (xxxv, 30), that the Hivites ruled by Hamor were a small settlement. See JACOB.

The Alex. MS., and several other MSS. of the Sept., in the above narrative (Gen. xxxiv, 2) substitute "Horite" for "Hivite." The change is remarkable from the usually close adherence of the Alex. Colax to the Hebrew text, but it is not corroborated by any other of the ancient versions, nor is it recommended by other considerations. No instances occur of Horites in this part of Palestine, while we know, from a later narrative, that there was an important colony of Hivites on the high land of Benjamin at Gibeah, etc., no very great distance from Shechem. On the other hand, in Gen. xxxvi, 2, where Ahohilamah, one of Esau's wives, is said to have been the daughter of the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite, all considerations are in favor of reading "Horite" for "Hivite."" The Horites were tribes of the pre-patriarchal genealogy of the family, by comparison of which little doubt is left of the propriety of the change (comp. ver. 20, 24, 25, 30, with 2), although no ancient version has suggested it here. See HORITES.

8. We next meet with the Hivites during the conquest of Canaan (Josh. xi, 20-22; xxiv, 10-12). The Hivites are not mentioned in any important position. Their character was then in some respects materially altered. They were still evidently averse to fighting, but they had acquired—possibly by long experience in traffic—an amount of craft which they did not before possess, and which enabled them to take the tables of the Amalekites in a highly successful manner (Josh. i, 3-27). The colony of Hivites who made Joshua and the heads of the tribes their dupes on this occasion, had four cities—Gibeon, Chephira, Beeroth, and Kirjath-Jearim—situated, if our present knowledge is accurate, at considerable distances apart. It is difficult to determine whether the last three were destroyed by Joshua or not (xi, 19); Gibeon certainly was spared. In verse 11 the Gibeonites speak of the "elders" of their city, a word which, in the absence of any allusion to a Hivite king, has been thought to point to a liberal form of government (Ex. xiv, 12; Deut. xxxiv, 9). This southern branch of the nation embraced the Jewish religion (2 Sam. xxii, 1, 4; Josh. ix, 21, 27), and seem thus to have been absorbed.

4. The main body of the Hivites, however, were at this time living on the northern confines of western Palestine—"under Hermon, in the land of Mizpeh" (Josh. xi, 3)—"in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal-Hermmon to the entering in of Hamath" (Judg. iii, 3). Somewhere in this neighborhood they were settled when Joab and the captains of the host, in their tour of numbering, came to "all the cities of the Hivites" near Tyre (2 Sam. xxiv, 7). Here, too, to many of the nation the end of the time of Solomon, who subjected them to a tribute of personal labor, with the remnants of other Canaanitic nations which the Israelites had been unable to expel (1 Kings ix, 20). In the Jerusalem Targum on Gen. x, chapter, they are called Tripolitans (אַניֵר חַי), a name which points to the same general northern locality. The Hivites probably retained their name for the Hivites; we recognize in the Egyptian names alone any trace of the Hivites in the conquests of the Pharaohs who passed through this tract. Cheseauid (Druzes, p. 361 sq.) refers the modern Druzes (q. v.) to them.

5. There are few Hivite names recorded in Scripture. Hamor, "the he-ass," was probably an honorable name. Shechem, "shoulder," "back," may also be indicative of strength. Such names are suitable to a primitive people, but they are not sufficiently numerous or characteristic for us to be able to draw any sure inference. It is, indeed, possible that they may be connected, as the similar Hittite names seem to be, with low and common practices, but the Holy Hierophants of the Hivite towns do not help us. Gideon merely indicates lofty position; Kirjath-jearim, "the city of the woods," is interesting from the use of the word Kirjath, which we take to be probably a Canaanitish form: the other names present no special indications.

6. In the worship of Baal-berith, or "Baal of the governor," at Shechem, in the time of the Judges, we more probably see a trace of the head-city of a Hivite confederacy than of an alliance between the Israelites and the Hivites. (See Hamesveld, iii, 62 sq.; Jour. of Soc. Lit. Oct. 1851, p. 106.)

Hizkia'h (Heb. Chizkiah, Ἰζήκια, Sept. Ezra'i-ac; Vulg. Ezechia), an ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph., i, 1). See Hizkia'h.

Hizkia'h (Heb. Chizkiah, Ἰζήκια, Sept. Ezra'i-ac; Vulg. Ezechia), a king of the people of Judah, was the third A. V. reign of Zedekiah, a name which sealed the covenant of reformation with Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. x, 17). But there is no doubt that the name should be taken with what preceding it, as "Ater-Hizkiah," a name given in the lists of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. It appears more reasonable that the Chronicles and the names following these in x, 17, 18 (Azur, Hodijah) are only corrupt repetitions of them. See Hizkia'h.

Hizir, founder of the Hiirevites, a monastic order of the Mohammedans, lived at the time of Orchan II. He founded poor-houses at Cairo and Babylon, and many visits are made by the Mohammedans to his grave at Bruss.—Pifer, Univ.-Lexicon, viii, 416.

Hjort, Victor Christian, a celebrated hymnologist of the Protestant Church, born at Gunderslevholm, in Denmark, in 1735, was bishop of Ribe. His collection of sacred songs was almost entirely inserted in the public hymn-book of the Danish Church. He published also collections of songs for the Sunday-schools of workmen, soldiers, etc. He died in 1818, on the island of Amager, near Copenhagen.—Pifer, Univ.-Lex., vii, 417.

Hoadley (or Hoadly), Benjamin, an English poet, theologian, and politician, was born at Westerham, Kent, Nov. 14, 1678. He studied at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, and passed A.M. in 1699. In 1700 he was appointed lecturer at St. Mildred's, London, and in 1702 rector of St. Peter's-in-Poor. "His ability as a controversialist, and his love of civil and religious liberty, became conspicuous in the strife of parties at the beginning of the century, when he entered the field against bishop Atterbury and the High-Church party. His share in this debate, and his intimate connection with the settlement of the new dynasty and the liberties of the country, were recognized by the House of Commons, who addressed the queen in his favor, and thus paved the way for his rapid promotion." In 1710 he was made rector of Streatham, and on the accession of George I, 1714, he became chaplain to the king. In 1715 he was made bishop of Bangor. In 1717 he preached the sermon before the king, on the text, My kingdom is not of this world, which gave rise to the famous Bangorian controversy (q. v.), in which Hoadley was assailed by the chiefs of the nonjurors, and with most effect by William Law, the champion of authority both in Church and State. This controversy was brought to a close about 1720, without conciliating either the High-Church party on the one hand, or the Dissenters on the other, but with great credit to Hoadley's ability and tolerant spirit. In 1721 he was translated to Hereford, and thence in 1728 to Salisbury. In 1784 he was made bishop of Winchester. He died April 17, 1781. In the political history of the Church of England, Hoadley is to be regarded as the great advocate of what are called Low-Church principles, a species of Whiggism in ecclesiastics in opposition to the high pretensions sometimes advanced by the Church or particular churches. It was in this character that he wrote his treatise on the Measure and Degree of Obedience due to the Civil Authorities, the moral import of which was not inadverted upon by Atterbury, and defended by Hoadley, whose conduct on this occasion so pleased the House of Commons (as stated above) that they represented in an address to queen Anne what signal service he had done to the cause of civil and religious liberty. He maintained these principles in the war of polemics and controversy. The war of pamphlets on the subject was wonderful; the number issued on all sides was nearly fifty. His doctrines excited so violent discussion in the lower House of Convocation that the government, in order to prevent further dissensions, suddenly pro- ceded to the Houses of Convocation, and they have never since been permitted to meet for the dispatch of business. The burden of Hoadley's offence, in the eyes of High-churchmen, lies in his doctrine, as stated in the sermon above mentioned: that the "Church is Christ's Kingdom on earth," which idea was left behind him no visible human authority: no vice- princes who can properly be said to supply his place; no interpreters upon whom his subjects are absolutely to depend; no judges over the consciences and religion of his people." Against the Dissenters, and especially in his answer to the case of Baxter, he wrote his Reasonsableness of Conformity to the Church of England (1703, 8vo), and his Defence of Episcopal Ordination (1707, 8vo). Besides the writings named, he wrote a number of theological treatises, in which he shows great freedom of thought. His theology is represented as perpetually meditating over "Letters on Miracles, to Dr. Fleetwood (1702, 4to):—A Preservation against the Principles of the Nonjurors (1716, 8vo):—Sermons (1718 et al.):—Plain Account of the Nature and End of the Lord's Supper (1785, 8vo). All these, with his Life of Dr. Sam. Clarke, his controversial pamphlets, sermons, etc., may be found in the Works of Bishop Hoadley, edited by his son, John Hoadley, L.L.D. (London, 1773, 3 vols. fol., of which the first volume contains a life of bishop Hoadley). See English Cyclopaedia; Biographia Britannica; Hook, Eccles. Hi. (q. v.); L'Estrange, Lives of Doctors, and Bennett, Lives of the English Divines, ii, 154; Buchanan, Justif., p. 200—201; Skeats, Hist. of the Free Churches of England, p. 227 sq.; Gass, Gesch. der Dogmatik, iii, 327; Wesley, Works, ii, 445; vi, 510; Hagenbach, History of Doctrines (Smith's), ii, 417, 516; Mosheim, Church Hist. iii, Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 802.

Hoadley, John, L.L.D., youngest son of bishop Hoadley (q. v.), was born Oct. 8, 1711, and educated at Cambridge. He edited the works of his father, and wrote himself a number of poems, among which are Love's Revenger, a pastoral (1757, 4to);—Jepthah, an oratorio (1748, 8vo);—Force of Truth, oratorio (1784), and others. He died March 16, 1776.—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 802.

Hoag, Ephraim, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Peru, N. Y., Sept. 15, 1815. He was converted in 1835, and, after a course of study at Cazenovia Seminary, entered, in 1841, the Oneida Conference (now merged in the Central New York Conference). His superior talents soon procured for him the favor of the people to whom he was sent, and the good wishes of his brethren in the ministry. Although comparatively a self-made man, he was looked upon as one of the first Methodist ministers in Central New York. He filled stations in the churches of Cortland, Cortlandt, and Ithaca (1852—3), Utica (1854—5), Norwich (1856—7), Cazenovia (1860—1), and in 1864 was made presiding elder of Cortland District. Here he labored with great success for four years, when he was sent to Canastota. In 1869, while at the session of the newly-formed New York Central Conference, he was suddenly struck with paralysis, and was obliged to ask for a superannuation relation. He died Oct. 3, 1869. "As a preacher he was earnest and uncompromising, seeking to please God and save men; as a pastor he was diligent, caring for and seeking the good of all the people under his charge. Of him it was true, the national feeling, and that the father of Moses's life, advance clear to his home (Exod. xviii, 27), Moses prevailed upon Hobab (whose comparative youth rendered his services the greater object to secure) to remain (as seems implied by the absence of any refusal to this second importance in Num. x, 22, so that we find his descendants among the Israelites, Judg. iv, 11). See JETHRO.

Hob'bah (Heb. Chobah, חֹבָּה, hiding-place; Sept. Χαβαῖα, a place to the northward of Damascus [אֶת־חוֹבָּה, lit. on the left], whither Abraham pursued the kings who had taken Lot captive (Gen. xiv, 15); perhaps the Choab or Choaba mentioned in the Apocalypse (חֲבֹא, Judg. xxvi, 4; חָבָא, iv, 4). Eusebius (Onom., s. v. supra) says that this place with Copho, the seat of the Eobines in the 4th century, was on the hard (Syria, p. 321) found a village called Kohab, probably the same which, however, lies south of Damascus. This is apparently also the village Hoba, visited in the year 1668 by Ferd. von Troido, who says, "It lies a quarter of (a German) mile north from the town, on the left hand. Near the city of Damascus is seen a large hill, where the patriarch Abraham overtook and defeated the army of the four kings. There formerly dwelt here a sect of Jews, converted to the (Christian) faith, who were called Ebionites; but at present the place is inhabited by a great number of Moors (Arabs) who have a mosque. In the neighborhood is a cave, in which the patriarch offered to the Divine Majesty his thanksgivings for the victory" (Travers, p. 584). On the other hand, Beland thinks of a castle called Canabal, mentioned by Edrisi as being on the lake of Tibersias (Palest., p. 737). "Josephus mentions a tradition connecting Abraham with Damascus: that he takes from Nicolaus of Damascus: "Abraham reigned at Damascus, being a foreigner... and his name is still famous in the country; and there is shown a village called from him The Habitation of Abraham." It is remarkable that in the village of Burzeh, three miles north of Damascus, there is a well held in high veneration by the Mohammedans, and called after the name of the patriarch, Musjed Ibrahim, 'the prayer-place of Abraham.' The tradition attached to it is that here Abraham offered thanks to God after the total discomfiture of the Eastern kings. Behind the well is a cleft in the rock, in which another tradition represents the patriarch as taking refuge on one occasion from the giant Nimrod. It is remarkable that the word Hobah signifies 'a hiding-place.' (See Kittle, Syriac, iv, 312; Wilson, Lands of Bible, ii, 831). The Jews of Damascus affirm that the first appointee, not far from Burzeh, is the Hobah of Scripture. They have a synagogue there dedicated to Elijah, to which they make frequent pilgrimages (see Porter, Handbook for Syria and Palatine, p. 491, 492; Stanley, Jewish Church, i, 212)."

Hobart, John Henry, D.D., Protestant Episcopal bishop of New York, was born Sept. 14, 1775. In 1788 he entered the College of Philadelphia, but soon after went to Princeton, where he passed A.B. in 1793 with high honor. In 1798 he took charge of two suburban churches near Philadelphia. The two following years he was with New Brunswick, New Jersey, and then to Newstead, Long Island, and later became assistant minister of Trinity, New York. In 1799 he was chosen secre-

HOBES, Thomas, an English philosopher and de-est, was born April 3, 1850, at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, and was educated at Merton College. In 1870 he became tutor to lord Hardwicke, subsequently earl of Devonshire; and, after their return from travelling, he resided in the family for many years, during which period he translated Thucydides, and made a Latin version of some of lord Bacon's works. In 1828 he went abroad with the lord, and while in Italy continued his residence in France. He returned in 1831 to undertake the education of the young earl of Devonshire. In 1868 he went with his new pupil to Paris, where he applied himself much to natural philosophy, and afterwards to Italy, where he formed an acquaintance with Galileo. He returned to England in 1837, and, soon after wrote his Elementa Philosophica de Cive (Var. 1642). A second edition was printed in Holland in 1647, under the superintendence of M. Sorbière. In 1640, after the meeting of the Long Parliament, Hobbes went to Paris. Here he became acquainted with Des Cartes and his followers. In 1642 he was appointed mathematical tutor to the prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. His treatises entitled Human Nature and De Corpore Politiço were published in London in 1650, and in the following year the Leviathan. Of these, the last was published in Latin, entitled De Res Publica Sive de Legibus, and published his Letter upon Liberty and Necessity in 1654, which led to a long controversy with bishop Brampall. Shortly after Hobbes was still further alarmed by the introduction of a bill into the House of Commons for the punishment of atheism and profaneness; but this storm blew over. In 1672 Hobbes wrote his own life in Latin verse, being then in his eighty-fourth year, and in 1676 published his translation of the Iliad and Odyssey. This translation is wholly wanting in Homeric fire, bald and vulgar in style and diction; and it must be allowed that the fame of the philosopher is anything but heightened by his efforts in this poet. Hobbes's dispute with Laneg, bishop of Ely, concerning Liberty and Necessity, appeared in 1676; and in 1679 he sent his Beemoth, or a History of the Civil Wars from 1640 to 1660, to a bookseller, with a letter in which he requested him not to publish it until a fitting occasion occurred. It appears from this letter that Hobbes, being anxious to publish the book some time before, had with that view shown it to the king, who refused his permission, and for this reason Hobbes would not now allow the bookseller to publish it. It appeared, however, almost immediately after Hobbes's death, which took place by paralysis Dec. 4, 1679.

In philosophy Hobbes was the precursor of the modern materialistic schools of Sensationalism and Positivism. Professing to reject "everything hypothetical (of all qualitatem occulturn), he affected to confine himself to the comprehensible, or, in other words, to the phenomena of motion and sensation. He defines philosophy to be the knowledge, through correct reasoning, of phenomena or appearances from the causes presented by them, or, vice versa, the ascertaining of possible causes by means of known effects. Philosophy embraces an object every body that admits the representation of production and presents the phenomena of composition and decomposition. Taking the term Body in its widest extent, he divides its meaning into natural and political, and devotes to the consideration of the first his Philosophia Naturalis, comprehending the departments of logic, ontology, metaphysics, physics, etc.; and to that of Law the law of nature, and political morals. All knowledge is derived from the senses; but our sensational representations are nothing more than appearances within us, the effect of external objects operating on the brain, or setting in motion the vital spirits. Thought is calculation (computatio), and implies the addition and subtraction of mental truths, which consist in the relations of the terms employed. We can become cognizant only of the finite; the infinite cannot be imagined, much less known: the term does not convey any accurate knowledge, but belongs to a Being in whom we can know only by means of faith. Consequently, religious doctrines do not come within the compass of philosophical discussion, but are determinable by the laws of religion itself. All, therefore, that Hobbes has left free to the contemplation of philosophy is the knowledge of our natural bodies (somatics), of the mind (psychology), and polity. His whole theory has reference to a system of eternal and objective truth, of which he derives all our emotions from the movements of the body, and describes the soul itself as something corporeal, though of extreme tenuity. "From these principles no moral or religious theory can flow, except that of infidelity. Though none of Hobbes's writings are expressly levelled against Christianity, few authors have really done more to subvert the principles of morality and religion. He makes self-love the fundamental law of nature, and utility its end; morality is nothing but utility, and the soul is not immortal. His writings gave rise to a spirit of volcanic controversy. "The Philosopher of Malmsbury," says Dr. Warburton, "was the terror of the last age, as Tindall and Collins are of this. The press swept with controversy, and every young churchman would try to arms in thundering on Hobbes's steel cap" (Divine Legation, ii, 9, Preface). His principal antagonists were Clarendon, in A Brief View of the dangerous and pernicious Errors to Church and State in Mr. Hobbes's Book entitled Leviathan; Gurney, in his Eternal and immutable Morality; and bishop Cumberland, in his Latin work on the Laws of Nature. Bishop Bramhall's controversy with Hobbes has been noticed above. We may also mention, archbishop Tenison's Creed of Mr. Hobbes examined, and Dr. Machiavel's Dialogues on Hobbes. Hobbes's whole works have been carefully re-edited by Sir William Molesworth, the Latin under the title Opera Philosophica (London, vol. i, 1841, 4 vols., 8vo); English Works now first collected (London, 1839, 4 vols., 8vo). Hobbhahn, Johann Wilhelm, a German theologian, was born at Ochsenberg March 8, 1665; studied at the universities of Ulm, Strasbourg, and Tübingen, and entered the ministry in 1690. In 1716 he was appointed superintendent over a number of churches, and pastor at Knüllingen, where he died in 1727. Hobbhahn wrote, mainly under fictitious names, a number of excellent polemics against the Romish Church and the Syncretists. Of these, his Obediense Wahrheit, and Apologie. Schauplatz d. triumphanten Wahrheit, against the Erst Eisen, 1704; Ed. Eisen, 1710; Dr. Philipp. Krabbing, Phym. d. röm. Priestere-Wehe, gegen C. Mändle; and especially Angestützte Jungfer-Ecke d. lutherischen Kirche, which gave him much trouble, and endangered his life, are considered the best.—Jöcher, Gelehr. Lex. ii, 1681.

Hobbs, Lewis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, born in Burke County, Ga., Feb. 1783; was converted in 1804, and entered the Indian Territory. In 1808, he was stationed in New Orleans in 1813, and died in Georgia in 1814. Mr. Hobbs was a young man of deep and uniform piety, great simplicity and zeal as a minister, and nobly endured the perils and hardships of missionary life in the Southern wildernesses and the poisonous climate of the Mississippi.—Minutes of Conference, 1821.

Hobhouse, Sir Benjamin, was born in 1757, and educated at Oxford for the bar. From 1797-1818 he was a distinguished member of the House of Commons, and filled other important stations. He died in 1881. His name is mentioned here on account of his Treatise on Heresy (Lond. 1792, 8vo), and his Reply to the Rev. F. Randolph's Discourse on the pretended Reappraisal of the Rev. F. Randolph's Scriptural Revision of Societian Arguments (Lond. 1792, 8vo; and again, Bath, 1798, 8vo).—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 856.

Hoburg, Christian, a mystic, born at Lützenburg in 1607, was for a time assistant minister at Lauenburg, and, later, subconrector at Uelzen. Here he was deposed from his position on account of his mystical tendencies, and he retired to private life at Hamburg. Later, he was appointed minister to congregations in the duchy of Brunswick, and finally became a Mennonite preacher at Hamburg. He died in 1675. Hoburg wrote much under the pseudonym Bachmann and Fritorius, as Der un- bekäme Christus (Hamb. 1589; Frankfurt 1609).—Theol. Myst. (2d edit. 1656; Nimerg. 1672; 3d edit. 1684, and often). Hochæisen, Johann Georg, a German theologian, born at Ulm in 1677, was educated at the University of his native place, and at Tübingen and Vitting. At the last school he at first devoted himself to the study of science, but afterwards went to the study of theology. He next went to Hamburg, where his acquaintance with the great Fabricius led him to a more thorough study of Greek and Hebrew. In 1705 he was made M.A. at Wittenberg, and immediately began there a course of lectures which procured for him an adjunct professorship in the philosophical department, he entering at the same time as a candidate of theology. In 1709 he was called as professor of Hebrew to the gymnasium at Breslau, where he died in 1712. Hochæisen contributed largely to the learned periodicals of his day. Of his published works the most important are De Hebreworum vocum officio et valore in consituentia syllogis (Viteb. 1706, 4to); De Deismo in Cartesianismo deprehensis (Hild. 1708, 4to); De Deismo in Theosophia dep- rehens, contra Witschamum nosteram (ibid. 1709, 4to). Some take his name to be the author (though this is unlikely) of the first letter in Vertrater Briefeschel zuvierre guten Freunde v. Weden d. Seele (1713 and 1734, 8vo), in which the soul is regarded only as a mere mechanism of the body.—Düring, Gelehr. Theol. Deutschländs, i, 744; Adelung's Jocher, Gelehr. Lexiz. Add. ii, 2929. (J. H. W.)

Hochmann (of Hochmann), Ernst Christoph, a German mystic, and principal representative of the Witt-Hochstetter, Andreas Adam, a distinguished German theologian of the Lutheran confession, was born July 13, 1669, at Tübingen, and educated at the university of his native place. In 1688 the reigning prince of his country sent him abroad to visit the different universities of Germany, Holland, and England, where he formed an acquaintance with a number of distinguished scholars. He paid particular attention to the study of the Hebrew and English languages. In the latter he made great proficiency, and translated into Latin, among others, Stillingsfleet's Epistolom de deism, etc. On his return he was appointed a professor extraordinary at his alma mater. In 1707 he was advanced regular professor of theology and city preacher of Tübingen, and in 1711 court preacher and Consistorial Rat at Stuttgart. Four years later, however, he returned again as professor to the university. He died April 27, 1718. His own works were mainly dissertations, of which the few published are in pamphlet form. A list of them is given by Jocher, Gelehr. Lex. ii. 1638. (J. H. W.)

Hochwart, Laurentius (Turnerwart), a distinguished German linguist, born in the 16th century, born at Tirschrenz in 1483, and educated at Leipzig. His first years after graduation were spent in teaching, first at Freysing, and later at Ingolstadt. In 1528 he became pastor at Waldsassen, and later at Regensburg. In 1531 he had a call as preacher to the court at Dresden, but he gave the preference to an offer from Eichstätt which came at the same time. In 1533 he returned to Regensburg and assumed the office of Germanist at Tübingen. He died toward the close of 1569 or in the beginning of 1570. His valuable works were left unpublished, with the exception of his Catalog. Ratisponense episcoporum libri iii (printed in A. F. Oevel's Rerum Boecarian script. i, 148-242). Among those unpublished the following are of especial value: Sermones Varii: ---Monasterius in quattuor Evangelia: ---Chrom. insigni mundi: ---Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, i, 253; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. vi, 164.

Hock, John. See J. ERINS.

Hock Tide (from Anglo-Sax. hocken, to seize), or Hoke Days, an English holiday, usually observed on Monday and Tuesday two weeks after Easter, in memory of the slaughter of the Danes by Ethelred, Nov. 15, 1002, according to Henry of Huntingdon, and mentioned in the Confessor's Laws. It was the custom formerly to collect money of the parishioners. A trace of this practice is found as late as 1667. Collections were also taken up at town gates, as at Chichester in the last century.---Walcott, England's Archaeology, p. 312.

Hod (Heb. id., "suz", "suzat", as often; Sept., "δοχή", one of the sons of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 37). B.C. ante 1017.

Hodaiyah (Hebrew Hodaiyahu, "גֹּדַיָּה", marg. more correctly, Hodaiyahu, "גֹּדַיָּה", a prolonged form of Hodaiyah; Sept. "Ωδίας", Vulgate Dodia), the first named of the seven sons of Elioenai, of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 24); probably a brother of the Nahum of Luke iii. 25 (see Strong's Harm. and Exposition of the Greek, p. 17). B.C. cir. 406. See GEN- KALOGY OF ZERUBBABEL.

Hodavai (Heb. Hodavaiy, גֹּדַיָּה, praise of Jehovah, or perh. L. q. גֹּדַיָּה, praise ye Jehovah; Sept., "Ωδίας" or "Ωδία", the name of three or four men.

1. A chieftain and warrior of the tribe of Manasseh East at the time of the Assyrian captivity (1 Chron. v. 24). B.C. cir. 720.

2. Son of Has-senaah and father of Meummah, of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. ix. 7). B.C. ante 588.

3. A Levite whose posterity (to the number of 74) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 40). In the parallel passage, Neh. vii. 48, his name is written Hodevah (גֹּדַיָּה, by contraction for Hodavai, marg. גֹּדַיָּה, by contraction for Hodiah; Sept. Odevai, Vulgate Dodia). B.C. ante 586. Apparently the same is elsewhere called Judah (Ezra iii. 9).

4. See HODAIYAH.

Hodegetics, a word properly signifying the art of instruction, or, better, the art of introduction (ἵνα being understood with ἀφηγεῖται), but generally taken to signify instruction (ἀφηγεῖται) itself, especially when reference is made to scientific Hodegetics. The Hodegetics (ἀφηγεῖται), of course, is expected to be thoroughly conversant with the science of which he treats, and which he is to introduce, else he might easily lead in the wrong direction, or into another department. Other names for this science are Methodology (from μέθοδος), or Propositions (from πράξεις and παραδείγματα, παράγω), or Isagogics (from ἰσαγωγή and ἀφηγοῦ). The difference between Hodegetics and Methodology (κ. v. c.) of Theology is that "the former has regard to the personal qualifications of the student, his method of study, his preparatory helps, etc., whereas the latter has regard to the various departments and systems of the science itself." The literature of Hodegetics is quite extensive. See Schlegel, Summe v. Exercitiorum und Resso. z. Erford. d. Studien in d. Schulen und auf d. Univ. (Riga, 1790); Kiesvetter, Lehrb. d. H. d. H. d. Hodge, Bernard, LL.D., principal of Hertford College, is the author of Solomon's Song, translated from the Hebrew (Oxford, 1785, 4to), in which his chief design has been to give an literal rendering of the original as possible. Also, The Psalms of Solomon, translated from the Hebrew, with Notes (Oxford, 1788, 4to) — Ecclesiastes, a new translation from the original Hebrew (Oxford, 1791, 4to). The notes are few in number, and are principally devoted to verbal criticism. — Kiteo, Cyclop. bib., 317; Darling, Cyclop. Bibl., 1, 1504; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 857.

Hodges, Robert, D.D., was dean of Carlisle in 1820, but the date of his death is not known. He published mainly his sermons (London, 1803-42), and edited the works of his uncle, bishop Porteus, of London, with his life (Lond. 1816, 6 vols. 8vo), of whom he also published a biography (Lond. 1811, 8vo). He died in 1844. —Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 855.

Hodhilli, see the sect of the Mohammedans, who believe that the saints lived a Paradise in an undisturbed quiet. See MOHAMMEDANISM.

Hodi'ah, the same as Hodiya (q. v.), the wife of Mered (Sept. *T'ovia; Alex. MS. *Tovian), and the mother of Jereb, and Heber, and Jehudiel (1 Chron. iv, 19), the same which is called Jemudiah (נמיה, the Jewess, i. e. his Jewish wife, as distinguished from Bithiah, who was an Egyptian) in the former part of the verse.

Hodges, Joseph, a Baptist minister, was born at Newton, Mass., May 19, 1804, and was a graduate of Waterville College in the class of 1820. He took the full course of study at the Newton Theological Institution (1830-33), and was licensed to preach by the Church at Canton, Mass., in April, 1831. He was ordained at Weston, Nov. 18, 1835, and was pastor of the Church in that place four years (1835-39). He had pastorates of a shorter or longer duration at Amherst, Coleraine, Three Rivers, Palmer, East Brookfield, and North Oxford, all in Massachusetts, for fifteen years (1840-55). For six years (1855-61) he was an agent of the American and Foreign Bible Society. He died at Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 10, 1863.

Hodges, Walter, D.D., a clergyman of the Hutchinsonian school and provost of Oriel College, Oxford, flourished about the middle of the last century. He provoked a great deal of attention by his Elthu, or an Inquiry into the principal Scope and Design of the Book of Job (London, 1750, 4to; 1751, 8vo; 3d ed. 1756, 12mo, and others), in which he endeavored to show that Elthu is the Son of God, a discovery which he supposed would throw great light on the book of Job, and solve the controversies respecting the doctrines which have been agitated thereupon. He wrote also The Christian Plain (2d edit., with additions and with other theological pieces, London, 1775, 8vo), a no less curious work than the one above mentioned, though it failed to produce so much sensation. "The whole meaning and extent of the Christian plain he represents as embodied, according to his interpretation, in the Hebrew Elohim." The other theological pieces in the addenda of this work are on the historical account of David's life; and on Shoel, or concerning the Place of departed Souls between the Time of their Disposition and the Day of Judgment, also, Oratio habita in domo conversationis.—Kiteo, Cyclop. bib., 317; Darling, Cyclop. Bibl., 1, 1504; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 857.

Hodges, Cyrus Whitman, a Baptist clergyman, was born in Leicester, Vt., July 9, 1802. At the age of twenty he was licensed to preach in Brandon, Vt., and in the autumn of that year accepted an invitation to preach at Minerva for a year. In connection with this work he pursued his ministerial studies under the Eulerian Professorship at Storrs, at Sharon, but so anxious was he to be fully engaged in the work of his calling that he abandoned the idea of a full course of study. He was, however, diligently improved such opportunities as he had, and his literary and theological acquisitions became quite respectable. He was ordained in Chester, Warren Co., N. Y., in 1824, and remained there three years. He preached two years in Arlington, Vt.; four years in Shaftesbury; four years in Springfield; six years in Westport, N. Y.; and five years in Bennington, Vt. Thence he went to Bristol, where he finished his career. He died April 4, 1851. He was a true Christian pastor; he believed heartily, entirely. His sincerity, his thorough consecration to his work, was the true secret of his effective and useful ministry. In 1850 Mr. Hodges published a small volume of sermons. —Sprague, Annuals, vii, 724.

Hody, Humphry, D.D., an English divine, was born Jan. 1, 1650, at Woodcombe, Somersetshire, and was educated at the University of Oxford. In 1676 he was elected a fellow of Wadham College, and in the same year he published a Dissertatio contra Historiam Aristaei de LXX Interpretibus. Holy became principally known by his publications respecting the bishops who had been deprived of their bishoprics during the reign of William and Mary for refusing the oath of allegiance. The first work which he published on this subject was a translation of a Greek treatise, supposed to have been written by Nicephorus in the latter end of the 18th or the beginning of the 19th century, in which the writer maintains that a bishop was unjustly deprived, neither he nor the Church ever made a separation, if the successor was not a heretic. The original Greek work, as well as the English translation, were both published in 1691. Dodwell replied to it in A Vindication of the Deprived Bishops (Lond. 1692). In the following year Holy published The Case of St. Vincent by an Uncanonical Deprivation (Lond. 1693, 4to), in which he replies to the arguments of his opponents. These exertions of Holy in favor of the ruling party in the Church did not pass unrewarded. He was appointed domestic chaplain to Tillotson, who in 1686 had also held Tillotson's successor. He was presented with a living in London, and was appointed regius professor of Greek at Oxford in 1698, and archdeacon of OEI

Oxford in 1704. He died Jan. 20, 1706. He founded ten scholarships at Wadham College in order to promote the study of the Greek and Hebrew languages.

Of the other works of Holy, the most important are:
1. De Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus, versionibus Graecae et Latinae Vulgaris; libri in (Oxon. F. A. 1705, 2. 1717), is said by Bishop Marsh to be "the classical work on the Septuagint." The first book contains the dissertation against the history of Aristarchus, which has been mentioned above. The second gives an account of the real translators of the Septuagint, and of the time when the translation was made. The third book is a history of the Hebrew text and of the Latin Vulgate; and the fourth, of the other ancient Greek versions:—2. The Resurrection of the (same) Body Assured (Lond. 1694, 8vo):
—3. Animadversions on two Pamphlets lately published by Mr. Collier (Lond. 1690, 8vo). Sir W. Perkins and Sir J.
Friend had been executed in 1655 for treason against the government; but previous to their execution they had been absolved of their crime by some nonjurors clergymen. This act was condemned by the ecclesiastical authorities, but it was justified by Collier in two pamphlets which he published in support of the subject. De Graecis Libri tribus libri De Graecis literaturam humanarum inventorii-toribus (Lond. 1742). This work was published several years after the author's death by Dr. Jebb, who has prefixed to it an account of Holy's life and writings. See Hoë, Matthias, of Hohenegg, famous in history as the confessor of John George I, elector of Saxony.

He was born of a noble family at Vienna in 1580, and educated at Wittenberg. In 1600 he commenced at this university a course of lectures, and published a programme on the position which he was to take, Orationes seu Disputationes. His political views are manifest in that great hatred for Romanists and Calvinists which characterized all the acts of his life. Hoë distinguished himself greatly both as a student and a lecturer. In 1612 he was called to Dresden by the elector, and became court preacher and confessor. His talents and adroitness gave him, in time, complete possession of the judgment and conscience of the elector, whom he hindered from entering into a league with Frederick V, the unfortunate king of Bohemia, by representing to him that the Reformed religion, which Frederick professed, was fatally wrong, and could not exist without injury to Lutheranism. Hoë seems indeed to have abated the Reformed even more than he did the Romanists, and there appears not the shadow of a reason to assert that he was bribed by the emperor. To the declaration of his principles while a lecturer at Wittenberg, and above alluded to, he adhered until the end of his life. His whole character is that of a hard and thorough reformer, thought it is said he greatly abated in his hatred against the Calvinists in his last days. His private character has been highly commented upon by all who knew him.
He wrote a Commentarii in Apocalypsin (Lpz. 1610—40, 2 parts), and a number of controversial works against the Reformed Church and the Romanists. He died in 1645. See Bayle, Gen. Dictionary, s. v.; Herzog, Real-

Hoel, bishop of Mans in the 13th century, made himself very conspicuous by the part which he took for the English in the revolt of the nobility of Mans against them after the death of William the Conqueror.
He suffered imprisonment, and after the accession of Hugo was even obliged to seek a refuge in England.
Hoel was also a great Misanthrope, and was attenant at the councils of Saumur (1094) and Brives. Later he travelled for a time with pope Urban II. He died (J. H. W.)

Hoeschelius, David, an eminent Greek scholar, born at Augsburg in 1556, was professor at St. Anne's College, and, later, the librarian of his native city. He died Oct. 30, 1617. He deserves a notice here on account of his valuable editions of some of the Greek fathers, and particularly of Greek authors who have written in the department of Christian antiquity and ecclesiastical history.—Bayle, Hist. Dict. iii, 478.

Hoeven [pronounced Hooven], Abraham (des Amorie) van der, a celebrated Dutch preacher, born at Rotterdam in 1798, was for a time professor at the seminary of the Remonstrants at Amsterdam, and later professor at the University of Groningen. He died July 8, 1855. Hoeven wrote De Joanne Cerino et Philippo a Limborch (Amst. 1848).

Hofacker, Ludvig, a German divine and cele-breated preacher, born at Wildbad April 15, 1798, and educated at the University of Tbingen. While here he became very zealous for the cause of religion, and es-specially endeavored to instruct the youth and cate-chumens the Bible among his fellow-students. He formed Bible-clubs which were largely attended; and his intimate acquaintance with the works of the orthodox commentators Bengel, Oetinger, and Steinrofer rendered him especial service in his sermons, which he frequently delivered at this time. When Tübingen was overthrown by the vicars of Stettin and Plieningen, he was appointed assistant to his father, preacher at St. Leonard's, in Stutt-gard. He was now only 28 years old, but his sermons attracted general attention, especially on account of his earnestness and piety. In 1836, after the death of his father, he was sent to Bieblinghausen, near Marbach. It is said that his audience was composed not only of his own congregation, but that strangers came from afar to hear the young preacher. In the fall of 1827, urged by his admirers and many friends, he began the publication of some of his sermons: Reden (1827; 5th ed. 1866).
The rapid sale of these was really surprising. An edition of 1500 was exhausted almost immediately after publication. His sudden death, November 18, 1828, incited his friends to a publication of all his sermons.
They have now been spread abroad in more than 100,000 copies, not only in Germany, but also in translations in France, England, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, and our own country. Speaking of his ability, Knapp (Lett. v. L.
Hofacker, Heidelberg, 1852) says that he was the greatest and most powerful preacher of the Würtemberg Church in this century. This opinion was confirmed by the celebrators of his memory: "The great and mighty preacher in him its most powerful preacher" (in his Autobiografrom posthumous works of Hofacker and from his sermons (Erbauung und Gebetbuch für alle Tage, Stuttgart), appeared in 1869.—Hersog, Real-Enzyklop. xix, 648 sq.

Hofacker, Wilhelm, a younger brother of Ludwig (q. v.), and, like him, a celebrated preacher of the Württemberg Church, was born February 16, 1805. In 1828 he became assistant to his brother, who was then in failing health. After his decease he travelled through Northern Germany on a literary tour. In 1838 and 1839 he delivered lectures at the University of Tübingen on Dogmatics, based on the work of Nitzsch, pursuing himself at the same time a course of study. In 1833 he was appointed at Waibingen, and in January, 1886, at St.
Leonard's, in Stuttgart, a church which his father and elder brother had served before him. He died on Aus-gust 10, 1848. Like his brother, he was an earnest servant of the Church of Christ, and a regular attendant at the Bible and Missionary meetings of the University students while at Tübingen, where he also was educated.
He was a zealous defender of the orthodox doctrine of the divinity of Christ, asserting that modern science is more in harmony with the Christian doctrine of the orthodox Church than with the speculative theology of the Hegel-Strauss school. He published, besides a number of polemical articles in different theological periodicals, Trümpfein aus der Lebensaegue (Stuttgart, 1863 and 1864), and Predigten für alle Sonn- und Fasttage (ib. 1850). Of his sermons nine editions have already been published, and a short biography here on account of his Musica Christiana (1854), and Historisches Gesamtbuch (Schlesingen, 1861). He died in 1868.—Piere, Universität. Lex. viii. 440.

Hofe, Johann, a German lawyer, born at Uffenheim in 1800, and educated at the universities of Stras- burg and Heidelberg. On his arrival in Vienna, he composed a treatise on account of his Musica Christiana (1854), and Historisches Gesamtbuch (Schlesingen, 1861). He died in 1868.—Piere, Univers. Lex. viii. 440.

Hofert, Joseph Anton, a German Roman Catholic priest, born at Kastelruth May 19, 1742, was educated at the University of Innsbruck. In 1765 he was made priest, in 1772 professor of rhetoric and prefect of the Gymnasium at Innsbruck, and in 1776 professor of ecclesiastical law; here he remained, with an interruption of four years only, which he spent at Innsbruck, until the discontinuance of the school in 1807, when he was pensioned, retaining, however, the title of an ecclesiastical canon and vicar of the diocese. He died in 1830. Hofert contributed several articles to periodical literature. Of his published works, Consecrath Juris eccles. publici (Brixen, 1781, 4to) entitles him to a position in theological literature. Hofert published several sermons which are of superior merit. Of these the following are perhaps the best: Ermahnungen an Titularfaste Ma- riai (ib. 1799, 8vo); —Kunstgriffe vonmern Eltern z. Er- ziehung wohlmeint. Kinder (ib. 1794, 8vo); —Utrißchildiges Kennzeichen d. sittlich. Auf der. (ibid. 1798, 8vo). —Dür- ring, Gelehrten Theolog. Deutschl. i, 746.

Hofbauer, Clemens Maria, a Roman Catholic, and the first Redemptorist (q. v.) in Germany, was born at Trienditz, in Moravia, Sept. 26, 1761. His par- ents had intended him for the ministry, but the sudden death of his father left his mother in destitute circumstances, and at the age of fifteen Hofbauer was apprenticed to a baker. While engaged in his trade he studied Latin, and passed an examination in the lower classes of a seminary school, where he became a priest at some future time, if possible. The bishop of Tivoli (later Pius VII) finally took him under his protection, and Hofbauer succeeded in making his way to Vienna, where he studied at the university. In 1783 he went to Rome, whither he had journeyed already twelve times, and joined the congregation of the Redemptor- ists. Two years later, after consecration to the priesthood, he returned to Vienna, and then to Warsaw, where a house and a church of St. Benno were placed at his disposal. From the name of Bennonites. The success of the Redemp- torists in the establishment of a monastery at this place was so great that Pius VI, in 1791, decided to give them an annual support of 100 scudi. The Roman Catholics assert that many Proteasts became converts of Hof- bauer, and that their confidence in him and his brothers of the monastery was unbounded. While the latter may be possible, the former is surely improbable. The effect of the French Revolution may have led some disturbing minds to join the ranks of the Roman Catholics, because many of that Church had taken such a peculiar attitude in France against true Christianity. Later Hofbauer also established a monastery in Switzerland, where he and his followers suffered great persecution, which, while it is possible that the disturbed state of the people gave rise to it, is more likely to have been provoked by Hof- bauer and his followers. This last supposition receives additional strength from the dealings of Napoleon while in Paris. He imprisoned them one entire month in the fortress of Küstrin, and, after a search of their papers, demolished the monastery and discontinued the order. Some time later Hofbauer succeeded in estab- lishing an educational institution at Vienna, which had been presented to the Redemptorists by a con- verted (q. v.) Protestant. In 1815 he went to Bulgaria, and returned to Vienna in 1818, where the govern- ment (Roman Catholic) obtained his permission to build a Redemptorist church at Wiener Neustadt. The intercession of the clergy influenced the em- peror not only to annul the order of the government, but to establish even a monastery at Vienna under his own protection. Hofbauer died suddenly March 25, 1820. In 1825 he was assisted by P. J. Höbel, who died in 1807. Initial steps have been taken for his beatifi- cation (q. v.). See Poi, D. erste deutsche Redemp- torist in u. Leben und Wirken (Reg. 1844); S. Brunner, H. und seine Zeit (Vienna, 1860); Real-Encyclop. f. d. Ku- thol. Deutschl. v. 413 sq. —J. H. W.

Hoffeditz, Theodore L., D.D., a German Reformed minister, was born near Carshaven, on the Weser, Ger- many, December 16, 1785. He emigrated to America in 1807. He first followed the calling of a school-teacher. Subsequently he studied theology with Rev. Samuel Heffenstein, D.D., in Philadelphia. He was licensed and ordained in 1813, and became pastor of German Re- formed congregations in Northampton County, Pa., and served this office until his death. In addition to the remaining years of his life, with the exception of brief intervals, during which he served numerous congregations which he organized in neighbor- ing counties. In 1843, he, with Rev. Dr. Schneck, vis- ited Germany, bearing a call from the Synod of the German Reformed Church to Dr. Krummacher to become professor of theology in the seminary at Mercersburg. He died July 10, 1858. Mild, warm-hearted, and zealous, Dr. Hoffeditz exerted a wide and blessed influence in the Church. One of his sons entered the ministry.

Hoffmann, Andreas Gottlieb, a very distin- guished theologian and Orientalist, born April 13, 1796, at Wellsleben, near Magdeburg, was educated at the University of Halle, where the influence of Gesenius led him to a thorough study of the Semitic languages, es- pecially the Syriac. After graduation he lectured at his alma mater for a short time on the Arabic language, and in 1822 was called as extraordinary professor to Jenae. Here he was advanced to the regular professor- ship in 1826, and in 1836 was made a member of the S.T.D. and member of the theological faculty. At the time of his death, March 16, 1864, he was senior of the theological faculty and of the senate of the university. As a professor at Jenae he devoted himself mainly to the philological de- partment of the faculty. His most popular works were on Hebrew Antiquities; but, like Gesenius, he lectured also on Church History, Isagoge, both of the Old and New Testament, Exegesis of the Old Testament, and on all the Semitic and Eastern languages generally studied at a German university. In philology, his Grammatica Syriaca (Hal., 1827; translated into English by Day and Cowper) is by some of the best authorities considered superior to any other yet published, that of Ullmann in- cluded. Among his other works are Enzeuf. d. hebr. Al- terthümer (Weimar, 1832), which is based on the work of Warnkeis (Weimar, 1822 and 1828),—Compend. der pa- lät. Literatur, in Halle, (in pamphlet form, Halle; later, Jenae, 1822, etc.) —Apologetische d. ab. Zeit unter Juden und Christen (Jenae, 1833-38, vol. i, part i and ii, containing the book of Enoch). Hoffmann was also ed- itor of the second section of the great Encyclopedia of Europe and America. In addition to these literary labors, he contributed largely to the German theological and philological periodicals. —Herc, Real-Encyclop, xix, 651; Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv, 899; Brockhaus, Conversat.-Lex. v, 20. —J. H. W.

Hoffmann, Daniel, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Halle 1540, and educated at the University of Jenae. In 1576 he was made professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg. In the theological contes-Hoffmann, Gottfried, born at Flugzwitz, in Silesia, in 1578, studied at Leipzig, and was rector of the gymnasium at Lauban and Zittau. He died in 1712. His name is mentioned here on account of his contributions to theology, as in Leichengäude (Laub 1704): Furstbieder (ib. 1705).—Pfierer, Univ. Lex. viii, 442.

Hoffmann, Heinrich, a German preacher of the 17th century at Masko, in Finland, was associated with other divines in translating the Bible into the Finnish language, published at Stockholm (1642, fol. and 1650).—Pfeier, Univ. Lex. viii, 447.

Hoffmann, Immanuel, born at Tübingen April 16, 1710, was appointed archdeacon of Tübingen in 1741, and in 1756 professor of Greek in the university of the same name. He died in 1772. Hoffmann published a number of dissertations; of these, the following are considered as representative: Diss. in Oraculum Ros., 5, 8 (Thb. 1752, 4to); Diss. de esto Apostoli Pauli (1757); Diss. in loca parallela, 2 Pet. ii, 4—17; Jude 5—13 (1762, 4to); Commentarii in Cor. i, 19—21 (1766, 4to). He wrote also, but left unpublished, Demonstratio Evangelica per quodnulla sint necessaria extra quattuor Testamenta in Novo allegatis declarata, partes iii (Tübingen, 1773—82, 4to). T. G. Hegelmeier, who edited this work after the decease of the author, prefixed to it a life of Hoffmann, and an excursus on the right method of interpreting the quotations made from the O. T. in the New Testament. These speeches of his work, as "font of learning, and in general very judicious."—Kitto, Bib. Cyclop. ii, 318.

Hoffmann, Johann, a distinguished German theologian, was born at Schweidnitz. The date of his birth is not known. He was for a time professor of theology at the University of Prag. In 1469 he and Otto of Münsterberg went to Leipzig, and induced many students to accompany them. They thus contributed to the founding of the Leipzig University. At first he was one of its professors, but in 1414 he was made bishop of Meißen. He died there in 1451.—Pfierer, Univ. Lex. viii, 441.

Hoffmann (or Hoffman), Melchior, one of the most celebrated Anabaptist (q. v.) prophets, born at Hall, in Suabia, originally a furrier, went to Livonia about the time of the Reformation, and became a Protestant. His enthusiasm for the cause of the Protestants led him to preach at Wolmar. On account of the great opposition which he there encountered, he went to Dorpat, where the opposition against him was no less great, and he became so embittered against the Roman Catholic party that he sought to influence the people in favor of destroying all paintings in churches, and all monasteries. This course estranged from him even his own friends, and he left in 1525 for Wittenberg to consult with Luther and Bubenhehn, who encouraged him to return to Dorpat, his former friends, at the same time, to harmonious action. But his success was no better than before, and he soon after left for Reval. Later we find him at Stockholm. In 1527 the king of Denmark appointed him preacher at Kiel, but his determination to explain the Bible apocalyptically, and his deviation from the doctrines of Luther and his followers opponents of Hoffmann, and, after a stay of only two years, a conference to examine his doctrines was appointed. He was condemned for heresy, deposed from his position, and ordered to leave the country. He then went to Strasburg, and next to Emden, where he enlisted himself with the Anabaptists, and soon became one of their principal leaders. At the latter place he so infuriated his followers that they took him for the prophet Elias, and announced the Day of Judgment as coming in 1536. From Emden he returned to Strasburg, and next took refuge in Sweden, of which country he became a subject by the calling of a synod (June, 1533), which condemned him and caused his imprisonment. He died in prison in 1542. On the person of Christ, Hoffmann, with many other Anabaptists, and like the Valentinians of the early ages, held that our Lord's birth was a mere phantom, laying down upon occasion the universality of the body, so that bodily bread is a seal, sign, and token in memory of the body; the body, however, is received in the word by an unavailing faith in our heart; the word is spirit and life; the word is Christ, and is partaken of by faith. Thus he thought it possible, while considering the bread and cup as a symbol, to adhere to the symbol of the real spiritual presence of Christ. The followers of Hoffmann, who took the name of their leader, flourished for a short time after his death near Strasburg and Lower Germany, but finally joined the other Anabaptist sects, from which they were distinguished while alive, by keeping the Christmas festival. Hoffmann (Hedwörtert, d. christl. Religions- u. Kirchengesch. ii, 325) says that a number of this sect went to England in 1535, and that there also they suffered greatly from persecutions; twenty-two of them were even imprisoned. Under Edward VI. (1549) they fared somewhat better, but after Mary's accession to the throne they were obliged to fly the country. Under the reign of Elizabeth they again ventured to reside in England, but in 1560 they were finally banished the country. A full account of Hoffmann and his sects is given by Krohn, Gesch. d. reformir. u. erneuerten Wiedertheers in Niederdeutschland (Lpz. 1768, 8vo, containing, also, a complete list of the writings of Hoffmann, which were mainly apocalyptic); Herrman, Sur la vie et la écriture de M. H. (Strasbourg, 1856). See also Schrock, Kirchengesch. s. d. Reformat. iv, 442 sq.; Cunitz, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. vi, 191; Heer, Gesch. d. christl. Religions- u. Hoffmeier, John Henry, a minister of the German Reformed Church, born at Anhalt-Cöthen, Germany, March 17, 1760, was educated at the University of Halle. He spent some time as private tutor in Hamburg; then went to Bremen, where he preached a short time, and finally emigrated to America in 1793.
HOFLING

Here he became pastor of several German Reformed congregations in Northampton County, Pa. In 1806 he was called to Lancaster, Pa., where he continued to labor till 1831. He was able to preach only in German; and the English language being needed in his charge, he retired from the active duties of the ministry. He died March 18, 1838. Well educated and diligent in his work, he was a successful minister. Two of his sons and three of his grandsons also devoted themselves to the ministry.

Höfling, Johann Wilhelm Friedrich, an eminent German Lutheran minister, born in Drossenfeld, near Bièreuth, in 1802, was educated at the Gymnasium of Bièreuth and at the University of Erlangen, where he was an attender of Schelling's lectures in aeronomy and logical philosophy. He received his doctor's degree in 1827. His magnum opus is his history of the church, in which he defends the Christian faith against rationalism. In 1823 he was appointed minister at Würzburg, and in 1827 at Jost, near Nuremberg. During his residence here he published two little pamphlets in defense of the Christian faith against the rationalists. In 1833 he was called to Tübingen, where he accepted his professorship in 1834. In 1835 he was appointed professor of Christian history and dogmatics at the University of Erlangen. He died April 5, 1858. Höfling was a firm adherent to the old Protestant idea of the ministry and the Church, and defended them vigorously with all the means of his talent and feeble means of his physical and mental resources. He was a prolific writer, and his name appears frequently in the literature of the Reformed Church, especially in the constitution of the Church, worship, and related dogmas. Of his earlier works the best are De symbolorum natura, necessitate, auctoritate et usu (Erlangen, 1835; 2d ed. 1837): - Liturgische Abhandl. v. d. Composition der chri. Gemeinde Gottesleute (ib. 1837). But his most important work is undoubtedly that on baptism: Das Sakrament d. Taufe, etc., dogmatisch, historisch, und liturgisch dargestellt (vol. i, 1846; vol. ii, 1848). But these works are not the only works of his. His last work, his History of the Church, was published in 1858.
born Feb. 15, 1758, in Frederick County, Va. For a time he attended a classical school in Culpepper County. In 1778 he went to Liberty Hall Academy, and there completed his studies in 1780. In November, 1781, he was licensed to preach, and was ordained pastor of a church at Hardy Dec. 13, 1782. In 1787, the Southern climate proving injurious to his health, he removed to Shep- herdsville, where he gathered a large congregation and an acquired great popularity. In 1803 he opened a classical school, mainly for the education of his own sons. He maintained this, however, only a short time, when he was called to the presidency of Hampden Sidney College; as successor of a very able Alexander. While at the head of the college, the degree of D.D. was conferred on him by Princeton College. In 1812 the Synod of Virginia established a theological seminary, and Dr. Hoge was called to it as a professor. He accepted this position, retaining, however, the presidency of Hampden Sidney College. He died July 5, 1820. He enjoyed the reputation of being a superior preacher. "John Randolph pronounced him the most eloquent man he had ever heard...... Yet Dr. Hoge had some great disadvantages. His voice had considerable unpleas- antness, arising from a nasal twang; so that he must be mentioned by the very remarkable "good twin" as a recommendation from his gifted countryman." He wrote, in 1783, in defence of the Calvinistic doctrine, a reply to the Rev. Jeremiah Walker, a Baptist minister who had suddenly passed from ultra Calvinism to the en- tire rejection of the Calvinistic doctrines. He also published _The Christian Penance_ (1780), designed as an antidote to Paine's _Age of Reason_. It consists of two parts, the first containing the substance of Watson's reply to Paine's first part, and the second Hoge's answer to the second part of Paine's work. It had a wide circulation, and exerted a very important influence. A volume of his sermons was published shortly after his death, but their circulation has been very limited, and they hardly do justice to his character as a preacher. A memoir of Dr. Hoge was partly prepared by his sons, but seems to have been lost, as it has never gone into print.—_Amer. Presb. Rev._ Jan., 1846, p. 98 sq.; _Sidgery, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit_, iii, 426 sq. (J. H. W.)

Hoge, Samuel Davies, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, son of Dr. Moses, was born in Shepherdstown, Va., in 1791. His early instruction he received from his father, after whose assumption of the presidency of Hamp- den Sidney College he became a student in that college, and graduated in 1810. He also followed the theological course under his father, filling at the same time the ap- pointment of tutor at his alma mater. Later he became professor, and at one time he acted even as vice-presi- dent. In 1816 he entered the active work of the min- istry, serving the churches of Culpeper and Mad- ison, Virginia, at the same time. In 1821 he removed to Hillesborough, Ohio, serving also a church at Rocky Spring at the same time. Three years later he was elected professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the Ohio University at Athens. The college being at this time without a president, Dr. Hoge performed the duties of his position with great propriety, and greatly increased the prosperity of the institution. At the same time, he preached in the college chapel and in the church of the town whenever his time and health would permit. He died in December, 1825. _Sprague, Am. of Am. Pulpit_, iv, 483.

Hohenburg or Odilienberg, an old, celebrated monastery on the Rhine, is said to have been founded by duke Ethic, whose daughter Odilia was the first abbess. She is supposed to have died in 720. This monastery was celebrated for many years for the great learning of its inmates and the encouragement which it gave to all who devoted themselves to literary labors. About 1429, this as well as the monastery at the foot of the hill, said to have been founded by Odilia, in or- der to save weary travellers the task of ascending the hill, was closed. One of the works published by an abbess of this monastery (Herrad, 1167), Hortus delicii- um, in Latin, contains contributions to Biblical history and to the entire field of theology. Hohenlohe, Alexander Leopold Franz Em- merich, prince of, a Hungarian Roman Catholic bishop, was born near Waldenburg Aug. 17, 1794. His mother, baroness Judith de Reviczky, destined him for the cler- ical life, and after studying at the Academy of Berne, and the seminaries of Vienna, Tynna, and Elwangen, he was consecrated bishop at Gera Jan. 18, 1818 as Titular of Illeia. He made a journey to Rome, where he associated much with Jesus, and finally joined their Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. In 1819 he returned to Germany, and settled in Bavaria, where his birth and fortune soon pro- cured for him a position of influence. His name was per- haps made known to his countrymen and foreigners be- cause of his pretended power to cure diseases in a mi- raculous way. He is said to have made cures in the hospitals of Würzburg and Bamberg. But the authori- ties at last interfered, and even the pope himself advised Hohenlohe to abstain from these pretensions, and the prince finally left Bavaria for Vienna. He next went to Hungary, and was made bishop in portibus of Sardica in 1844, and abbot of the convent of St. Michael of Ga- bendorf. During the Revolution of 1848 he was driven from Hungary, and he went to Innsbruck, where the emperor of Austria then resided. In Oct. 1849, he went to Vienna to weld his new, country which he had just de- cided to become a priest. He died at his house Nov. 17, 1849. The renown which Hohenlohe gained by his cures was not confined to his own country, but extended to England, Ireland, and even to our country, where the case of Mrs. Ann Mattingly, of Washington, D. C., who was said to have miraculously recovered of a tumor, March 10, 1824, in consequence of his prayers, caused considerable excitement. The prince ceased these prac- tices many years before his death, at least publicly. Va- rious theories have been professed to account for the cures attributed to him: the most rational is that which assigns them to the power of the imagination over so- called nervous disorders. His principal works are _Der im Grabe der kathol. Kirche betende Christ_ (Bamberg, 1819; 3d edit. Lpz., 1824) — _Des katholischen Priesters Beruf, Würth u. Pflicht_ (Limb. 1821) — _Was ist d. Zel- geret_ (Bamberg, 1811), an attempt to show that none but a good Roman Catholic can be a good and loyal citizen, addressed to Francis of Austria and Alexander of Rus- sia: _—Die Wunderschaft einer Gott suchenden Seele, etc_. (Vienna, 1880) — _Lichblücke und Erbahrungen aus d. Welt u. dem Priesterleben_ (Ratisbon, 1866); a number of sermons, etc. He published also his works were published by his heir, Baron Hohenlohe (Ratisbon, 1851). See also Paulus, _Wunderwerken z. Hohnbaum, Johann Christian, a distinguished German preacher, born at Rodach, near Hildburghausen, was educated at the University of Göttingen, under Michaelis, Walch, Heyne, and others. For a time he was private tutor and preacher. In 1777 he was appointed court preacher at Coburg, and, nine years later, minister and superintendent of his native city. He died Nov. 13, 1825. Hohnbaum was an assistant in the preparation of the Hildburger Gesammelte (hymn-book), and contributed also largely to different theological periodicals. His theological works are Uber d. heidn. Abendmahl (Leipzig, 1789); Prediger-Jahrbuch (ibid., 1788-89, 2 vols. 8vo) — Geseșe und Predigten (ib., 1800, 8vo). — Döring, Deutsch. Kunstzeder, p. 143 sq. (J. H. W.)

Hobcaw, Paul Henry Thiry, baron of; an infidel of the 18th century, was born at Heidelberg, in the Palatinate (now grand-duchy) of Baden, in 1728. He went to Paris at an early age with his father, who at that time was resident there. A large house became then the head-quarters of all the free-thinkers and writers of his day. At the dinners which he gave twice a week, either in Paris or at his castle of Grandval, and which gained him the title of first maître d’hôtel of philosophy, met the abbé Gallieni, Helvetius, Diderot, d’Alembert, Grimm, D’Alembert, Grimod de la Grange, Marmontel, Duclos, Lamerie, Condorcet, etc. It was in these reunions that they exchanged their ideas, and prepared, at least in their minds, many of the articles which appeared in the first Encyclopédie (Diderot’s), besides many anonymous publications which were also sent forth, consisting either of original articles or of translations from the German or English. They carried their speculation, it is said, to such daring lengths that Buffon, D’Alembert, and Rousseau felt compelled to withdraw from the circle. Hobcaw himself was one of the most zealous of these champions of naturalism, and contended not only against Christianity, but against every positive religion. He is said, according to Barther, to have published no less than forty-seven anonymous writings of his own composition. His first philosophical work he published in 1767 under the name of Boulanger; it is entitled Le Christianisme dévoilé, ou examen des principes et des effets de la religion révélée (Amst.). In this work he says explicitly that religion is in no way necessary for the welfare of empires; that the dogmas of Christianity are but a heap of absurdities, the propagation of which has exercised the most fatal influence upon mankind; that its moral influence is more superior to the morality of other systems, and is only fit for enthusiasts incapable of fulfilling the duties imposed by society; finally, that through the eighteen centuries of its existence Christianity had led to the most deplorable results in politics. Soon after this work, which his inital associates themselves declared the most terrible that had ever appeared in any part of the world, he published L’Esprit du Clergé, or Le Christianisme primitif vengé des entreprises et des excès de nos prêtres modernes (Lond. 1767), and De l’imposture sacrédote, or recueil de pièces sur le clergé (Amst. 1767). In the same year, 1767, Hobcaw published his most important work, Système de la Nature (Lond. 1770), under the signature of “Mirrabaud, secrétaire perpétuel de l’Académie Française.” It is not definitely known whether he wrote the book alone, or was assisted by La Grange, Grimm, and others, but it is generally believed to have been written by Hobcaw, and that he defrayed the expenses of publication. So radical was this work that even Voltaire attacked it in the article “God” of his “Philosophical Dictionary.” Yet in 1772 Hobcaw published a popular edition of that work under the title Le bon Sens, ou idées naturelles opposées à l’abominable abbé Meslier (Amst., 1772). The wretched book was largely read by the common people, and contributed perhaps more than all the other philosophical works of the 18th century, taken together, to the subversion of morals and the spread of infidelity. It teaches the most naked and atheistical materialism, and even Voltaire abused it as immoral. In it Hobcaw discusses the maxim of materialism, takes morality from moral life at and savage and savage life, touches the so-called “social compact,” and in the course of his observations endeavors to teach, among other things, that self-interest is the ruling motive of man, and that God is only an ideal being, created by kings and priests. The a. Système Socrétique, ou les principales doctrines de la morale et de la politique (Amsterd. 1773), aims, as its title indicates, to establish the basis and rules of a moral and political system altogether independent of any religious system. This work was as ill received by the philosophers as by the religious party, and the Paris University, on the 14th April (1774), pronounced this act all other preceding works of Hobcaw to be publicly burned by the hangman. They were all secretly sent to Holland in MS., and printed there by Michael Roy, who circulated them in France, so that even the friends and guests of Hobcaw did not know him as their author, and often criticized his works severely while partaking of his hospitality. He was also one of the contributors to the celebrated Encyclopédia (q. v.) of Diderot. Hobcaw’s biographers claim that he was a man of good heart, and that, notwithstanding the puerile theories of materialism which he sought to inculcate, esteemed and was loved among the persons who read better than his books. They claim especially that he was a man of most unselfish benevolence, and that he made his house even an asylum for his foes. Thus he protected and gave a refuge to the Jesuits in the days of their adversity under Louis XV, though he hated their system, and had written against them. He died at Paris January 21, 1789. Holberg, Ludwig von, a Danish divine, was born Nov. 6, 1684, at Bergen, in Norway. He studied theology at Copenhagen University, and become a professor in that school. In 1735 he was elected rector of the University, and in 1737 treasurer. In 1747 the king created Holberg a baron on account of his literary services. He died Jan. 27, 1754. He is known as the creator of modern Danish literature, and deserves our notice on account of his Kirchengeschichte (1738–40, 2 vols.), and Jüdische Gesch. (1742, 2 vols.). Both these works are considered quite valuable even at the present time. — Brockhaus, Conc. Lex. viii., 48 sq.; Gorton, Biograph. Dict. ii. (J. H. W.)

Holcombe, Henry, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Piscataway, in New Jersey, on Oct. 29, 1710. His early education was limited. While yet a boy, he entered the Revolutionary army. In his twenty-second year he was licensed to preach by the Baptists; and in Sept. 1789, was ordained pastor of the church at Pike Creek, S. C. Some time after, he was appointed delegate to the Congress of South Carolina, and was sent to ratify the Constitution of the United States. In 1791 he became pastor of the Baptist Church at Eufaw, preaching also at May River and St. Helena; but, the climate not agreeing with him, he removed to Beaufort. In 1799 he accepted a call to Savannah. Here he labored a short time among the Negroes, and afterwards in organizing the Savannah Female Asylum (in 1801), at the same time conducting a Magazine, The Georgia
HOLCOMBE

Analytical Repository. He also took part in establishing Mount Eon Academy in 1804, and a Missionary Society in 1806. In 1810 he was made D.D. by Brown University, and in 1812 became pastor of the First Baptist Church in Philadelphia, where he labored with great acceptance until his death, May 22, 1824. He published a number of occasional sermons, addresses, etc.—Sprague, Amals, vi, 215.

Holcombe, Hosea, a Baptist minister, was born in Union District, S.C., July 20, 1780. He was engaged in agricultural pursuits until 1800, when he turned his attention to theology, and was licensed the following year. He labored in his native region until 1815, when he went to North Carolina, and finally settled in Jefferson Co., Ala., in the fall of 1818. His ministrations in all these places were eminently successful, and he continued his labors until his death, July 31, 1841. Mr. Holcombe published a Collection of Sacred Hymns (1815)—a work for Baptists, entitled A Reply to the Rev. Philip Egbert, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Society (1832)—A Refutation of the Rev. Joshua Lawrrente's Pratetic Discourse, or Anti-Mission Principles exposited (1836).—The History of the Alabama Baptists (1840).—Sprague, Amals, vi, 442.

Holcot, Romert, an English scholastic of the 14th century, doctor of Oxford University, and a member of the Dominicans. He was one of the several interpreters of sacred Scripture in his day, yet an obedient son of the Roman Catholic Church, and a zealous advocate of Nominalism (q. v.). He died a victim of the plague in 1349. Holcot wrote mainly on the sacred Scriptures, but not many of his works have ever gone into print. This may account for the fact that many books whose authorship is doubtful are attributed to him by the Dominicans. Mazonius (in Unis. Platonis et Aristot. Philosoph. p. 201) has severely criticised the philosophical views of Holcot. His most important published theological works are De Studio Scripturis (Venice, 1860, and often)—In Proverbs, Salom. (Paris, 1515, 4to)—De Cantico Canonicorum et in septum Prima Crispa Ecclesiastica (Ven. 1509). Among the works attributed to him by the Dominicans we find Moraliizations Historiornae (Paris, 1510, 8vo).—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv, 941; Jocher, Gelehr. Lex. ii, 1671. (J. H. W.)

Hold [verb] is often used figuratively, but in obvious cases of the Bible. To take hold of God and his covenant is to embrace him as given in the Gospel, and by faith to plead his promises and relations (Isa. xlvii, 4, and lvi, 4). Christians hold forth the word of life; they, by practising it in their lives, give light and instruction to others (Phil. iii, 16). Not holding of Christ the power of God, and the grace of God, was a sin that could not be forgiven him, and to yield to such yielding of him; as, for instance (Col. ii, 18, 19), worshipping angels, etc. instead of Christ; insisting on penances, etc. instead of the merit of Christ's work.

Hold [noun] ( HOLD , metsuddle, a fortress, as often rendered), the term especially applied to the lurking-places of David (1 Sam. xxii, 4, 5; xxiv, 22, etc.). See STRONGHOLD.

Holden, Henry, D.D., a distinguished English Roman Catholic controversialist, was born in Lancashire in 1596. He studied at the Seminary of Douai, and afterwards went to Paris, where he took the degree of D.D. He became a priest in the parish of St. Nicholas du Chardonnet. Much of his time was devoted to literary labors, which placed him among the most renowned theologians of that period and civil and ecclesiastical. He died in 1656. His principal work is Anecologia Fidei (Paris, 1659, 8vo; 2d ed. by Barbon, 1677, 12mo; translated into English by W. G., 1684, 4to). Dupin commends this book very highly. In 1660 he published Novum Testamentum, with marginal notes, and a Letter to a Prelate on predestination and grace. See Dupin, Eccles. Writers, gent., xvii; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 863; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv, 385.

Holders, Wilhelm (also known as Frater Wilhelmi de Studiariis Ordinis Minorum), a Wittemberg philosopher and theologian, was born at Marbach in 1542, and educated at Tubingen. He distinguished himself especially by his great opposition to scholastic philosophy and theology, against which he wrote Mus exen- teratia contra Joannem Plutatorium (Tub., 1585, 4to).—a very rare and curious work on the Mass and baptism, of which extracts have been given in the N. Götting. Hist. Mag. vol. ii, pt. iv, p. 716 sq. —also Petitorum exhorta- torium pro resolutorio super graecas quibudam dubito- lae et questionas, e.¢. (Tubingen, 1585, 4to). He died July 24, 1609, buried in the church of St. Joh., Gelehr. Lex. ii, 1672; Krug, Encyclop.-philos. Lex. ii, 450.

Holdheim, Samuel, a distinguished Jewish divine of the Liberalistic or so-called reform school, was born at Kempten, province of Posen, Prussia, in 1806. His early education was, like that of every other Jewish Rabbi of his time, confined to a thorough study of the Scriptures and the Talmud. In the latter his proficiency was great, and was pretty generally known throughout his active province, even when he was yet a young man. With great perseverance, he paved his way for a broader culture than the study of the Talmud and the instructions of the Rabbinus could afford him, and he went to the universities of Prague and Berlin. His life work was a translation, made it, however, not possible for him to graduate at those high-schools. In 1836 he was called as Rabbi to the city of Frankfurt on the Oder. Here he distinguished himself greatly by his endeavors to advance the interests of his Jewish brethren in Prussia, and to obtain liberal concessions from the government. He there published, besides a number of sermons delivered in behalf of the cause just alluded to, Gottes- dienstliche Vorträge (Frankf. 1838, 8vo), in which he treats of the Jewish holy days, usages, etc. These sermons were the subject of consideration by the leading Jewish periodicals for successive months. Thus the distinguished Jewish scholar J. A. Frankel aimed to establish on these sermons the laws of Jewish Homiletics (comp. Literaturblatt des Orients, 1840, No. 85, 39, 47, 49, 50). His scholarly attainments were such at this time (1840) that the University of Leipzig honored him with the doctor's degree of D.D. In the same year Holdheim accepted a call as chief Rabbi of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and was installed Sept. 19 (1840). The prominence which this position gave him greatly increased his influence both at home and abroad, and his movements for reform in the Jewish Ritual (q. v.) contributed in no small measure to the further efforts of any other person to the reform movements at Berlin with which he was afterwards so intimately associated. In 1843 he published Uber d. Autonomie d. Rabbinen v. d. Princip, der jüd. Ehe (Schwerin and Berlin, 1843, 8vo). In this work he labored for a submission of the Jews in matrimonial questions to the law of the land in which they now sojourned, instead of adhering to their Talmudic laws, so conflicting with the duties of their citizenship, and so antagonistic to the principles of this liberal age. He held, first, that the autonomy of the Rabbinus must cease; secondly, that the religious obligations should be modified; thirdly, that the power which he held to the latter as of higher authority; and, thirdly, that marriage is, according to the Jewish law, a civil act, and consequently an act independent of Jewish authorities. (On the controversy of this question, see Jews, Rom- ronsetz.) In 1844 he published Grundzüge der religiös-denkenden, Deutschland (Schwerin and Berlin, 1844, 8vo), in which he treats of the question whether circumcision is essential to Jewish membership, and in which his position is even more liberal than in the treatment of the questions previously alluded to. Holdheim was also a prominent member of the Jewish councils held from 1843 to 1846. In 1847 he was called HOLINESS

Holgate, archbishop of York under king Edward VI, was one of the prelates of the Reformers who were silenced under queen Mary shortly after her accession to the throne of England, under the pretense that their marriage relations were non-ecclesiastical. Later (Oct. 4, 1558) he was imprisoned in the Tower, and kept there until January 18 of the following year, when he was pardoned. The dates of his birth and death of Holgate are not known:—Strype’s Memorials of the Reformation, iv, 57 sq.; Hardwick, Hist. of the Christian Church during the Reformation, p. 234.

Holiness (ἡσυχία, ἁγιότης), prop. the state of sanctity, but often used of external or ceremonial relations (then more prop. ἱεροσύνη).

I. Intrinsic Idea.—Holiness suggests the idea, not of perfect virtue, but of that peculiar affection whereby, with a being of perfect virtue regards moral evil; and so much, indeed, is this the precise and characteristic import of the term, that, had there been no evil either actual or conceivable in the universe, there would have been no holiness. There would have been perfect truth and perfect goodness, yet not holiness; for this is a word which denotes neither any one of the virtues in particular, nor the assemblage of them all put together, but the recoil or the repulsion of these towards the opposite vices—a recoil that never would have been felt if vices had been so far a nonentity as to be neither an object of real existence nor an object of thought (Chalmers, Nat. Theol. ii, 290).—Krauth, Fleming’s locub. of Philos. p. 217.

II. Applications of the Term.—1. In the highest sense, holiness belongs to God alone (Isa. vi, 3; Rev. xvi, 4), because he only is absolutely good (Luke xviii, 19), and thus demands the supreme veneration of those who would themselves become good (Luke i, 49; John xvii, 11; Acts iii, 14 [iv, 27, 30]; I John ii, 20; Heb. xii, 26; Rev. iv, 8). See Holiness of God.

2. Men are called holy (ὁ ἁγιός) in as far as they are vessels of the Holy Spirit and of divine power, e. g. the prophets; and also as far as they are a holy organization which is dedicated to God. In the N. T. Christians are especially holy, as being wholly consecrated to God’s service. (Comp. Rom. vii, 27; xii, 13; I Cor. vi, 2; Eph. ii, 19; v, 8; vi, 18; Col. i, 9; iii, 12; 2 Pet. i, 4; Rev. xi, 14; Acts xvi, 25.) Men were called holy (ὁ ἁγιός) (b) in so far as they are or become habitually good, deifying sin, thinking and acting in a godlike manner, and, in short, conforming, in their innermost being, as well as in their outward conduct, to the highest and absolute law or the will of God (Rom. vi, 19, 22; Eph. i, 4; Tit. i, 1; 1 Pet. i, 15; Rev. xx, 6).

The grounds of this sanctification, according to outward appearance, are twofold, viz. (a) Holiness is given by God through the mediation of Christ, conditioned upon faith and an inward surrender, which are themselves likewise the gift of God. (b) Man from within, by a proper purity of heart and the heart’s fruit, may assume this sanctity. Although the last cannot occur without the assistance of God, yet the personal activity of man is necessary and almost preponderant. Still, even interior holiness is, as above implied, the direct work of God.

3. As already dedicated to God partsake in a certain manner of his holiness, even they also become his temples, forms, and ceremonies (e. g. sacrifice): hence “to hallow” means also to dedicate to God, to offer up, to bring us an offering, to present one’s self as dedicated to God through Christ (Rev. xxvi, 18; I Cor. vi, 11; Eph. v, 26; Heb. xii, 15; I Th. iv, 17). In the N. T. where the merciful assistance of God in customary purity or objective holiness appears prominent, the expression to "sanctify one's self" is used only concerning Christ, and means here the same as to offer up himself as a sacrifice for human sin (John xvii, 19). But as man may make himself holy, i. e. under the assistance of the Holy Spirit, he may work for his own purity; similar phraseology is in the case of Christians (Matt. xxiii, 17; John xvii, 19; 1 Tim. iv, 5).
HOLINESS 297  HOLINESS

4. That by which God reveals his holiness, e. g. the Law, is also holy (Rom. vii, 12).

III. Progression. — Complete holiness, as applied to men, designates the state of perfect love, which exhibits itself in that every object of love is also loved with every emotion and volition, hence also every deed, is determined by the will of God, and thus the old man, who has been fainting under the burdens of worldly lust, and has been carrying the chains of the flesh, is cast off, and the new man is fully put on. This sanctification is both a work of God and of man. This divine grace comes through Christ, first at conversion, and by successive steps thereafter under the influence of the Holy Spirit. Man must seize the proffered hand of God, use the means of grace afforded him, and by the assistance of God perfect holiness. Thus, on the one hand, everything comes from God, and, on the other, the personal striving is neccessary. Whatever the good man is, he is through God and his own will; the evil man, however, is so only through his own will, for evil is falling away from God. Goodness consists ultimately in susceptibility for the divine work of grace, while wickedness has its final ground in the free hardening of the heart against the divine influences.

Personal holiness is a work of development in time, frequently under a variety of hindrances and backslidings, and even with the possibility of entire ruin. Hence the admonitions to watchfulness, to continual prayer, to perseverance in faith, in charity, in hope are abundant (1 Cor. i, 30; 2 Cor. vii, 1; Eph. iv, 29, 24; comp. Rom. xii, 2); hence also the apostle's prayer that the love of the Philippians might abound yet more and more (Phil. i, 9). But while the laying aside of the old, and the putting on of the new, are thus referred to man, of course it is not the meaning of the sacred writer that sanctification is accomplished by our own power. Christ is our sanctification, as he is our righteousness (1 Cor. i, 30); yet all that Christ through the Holy Spirit works in man may become in vain, because man by his unfaithfulness cannot bring the operation of the Spirit.

IV. Metaphors or Representations of a State of Holiness. — In the Scriptures this sanctification is described in manifold as well as strong and explicit figures as a "putting off" of the old man, and a putting on of the new man (Col. iii, 9), the subject becoming dead to the old, and having recovered the lost image of God. It is represented as self-denial (1 Cor. ix, 26, 27); as a cleansing (1 John i, 9; comp. Heb. i, 3; ix, 14; Eph. v, 26; 2 Pet. i, 9); as a washing (1 Cor. vi, 11); as a taking away of sin (John i, 29); as being filled with the fruits of righteousness (Phil. i, 11); with the water of life (John vii, 38; compare iv, 14); as a shedding abroad of the love of God in the heart (Rom. v, 5); as baptism into Christ (Rom. vi, 3; Eph. i, 10; ii, 5; Rev. xx, 1; fellowship with God (1 John i, 8); as being in the Father, and in the Son, and in the light (1 John ii, 5, 6, 10, 24; compare Eph. ii, 15; John xiv, 20); as the having God, Christ, and the Holy Spirit, in love, in joy, in blessing (1 John xv, 17, 20; Gal. ii, 15; 1 John iv, 15; 24; iv, 12-15; Eph. iv, 6); as a birth unto God and Christ (1 John ii, 29; iii, 9, 10; iv, 4-7; v, 18, 19); as being partaker of the divine nature (2 Pet. 1, 4); children of God (Rom. viii, 14; John 12, 1; John iii, 1, 2); born anew (1 Pet. i, 24); spiritual in Christ (Eph. v, 3); to be one with Christ and another (John xvi, 22, 26).—Krehle, New testament. Wörterb. p. 356. See Sanctification.

HOLINESS, as a note of the Church. See Sanctity. HOLINESS OF GOD, his essential and absolute moral perfection. Primarily, the word holy (Sax. holy; Germ. heilig, whole, sound, sound) denotes perfection in a moral sense. As applied to man, it denotes entire conformity to the will of God. See Sanctification. "But when we speak of God, we speak of a Being who is a law unto himself, and whose conduct cannot be referred to a higher authority than his own." See Holiness, above.

1. "As to the use of the words ὑπάρχειν and ἀγαθός, some critics assert that they are only used in Scripture, with reference to God, to describe him as the object of awe and veneration; and it is true that this is their prevalent meaning—e. g. Isa. vi, 9; John xviii, 11 (ὑπάρχειν πάσας) —and that accordingly ὑπάρχειν signifies to be extend ed venerable, to be revered. Still it is undeniable that these words in many passages are applied to God in a moral sense—e. g. Matt. v, 25 (ὑπάρχειν γινώσκειν;) 2, 'Be ye holy, for I am holy, comp. 1 Pet. i, 14-16. Thus also Eph. iv, 24; and ἀγαθὸν, ἀγαθός, by which all moral perfection is so frequently designated, more especially in the New Testament. The different synonynymical significations of the words ὑπάρχειν and ἀγαθός are clearly connected in the following manner: (a) The being externally pure; e. g. 2 Sam. xi, 4; Lev. xi, 44, 44; xx, 7, 25, 30 sqq. (b) The being separate, since we are accustomed to divide what is pure from what is impure, and to cast away the latter; and therefore (c) The possessing of any kind of external advantage, distinction, or worth. So the Jews were said to be holy to God, in opposition to others, who were κοσμίοι, profane, common, unreconciled. Then every excellence of the divine was without blemish, or grace, or blemish was called holy; and ὑπάρχειν, ἀγαθός, sacerocrantus, came thus to signify what was inviolable (Isa. iv, 8; 1 Cor. iii, 17); hence ἀγαθός, anyhm. They were then used in the more limited sense of chaste (like the Latin sanctitas), a sense in which they are also sometimes used in the New Testament; e. g. 1 Thees. iv, 7, (comp. Wolf, ad loc.). They then came to denote any internal grace, or purity, and, finally, all general notion of it, as exclusive of all perfection.

2. "The holiness of God, in the general notion of it, is his moral perfection—that attribute by which all moral imperfection is removed from his nature. The holiness of the will of God is that, therefore, by which he chooses, necessarily and invariably, what is morally good, and refuses what is morally evil. The holiness and justice of God are, in reality, one and the same thing; the distinction consists in this only, that holiness denotes the internal inclination of the divine will—the disposition of God, and justice the expression of the same by actions. The attributes of holiness are, 1. That all that is implied in an unalterable inclination can be found in God. Hence he is said (James i, 17) to be ἀπίστευτος ἐναίωρα, incapable of being tempted to evil (not in the active sense, as it is rendered by the Vulgate and Luther); and in 1 John i, 5, to be light, and without darkness; i. e. holy, and without sin. In this sense he is called ὀλοκλήρως, ὄντος, ὁ ἁγίας (1 John iii, 3); also ὄντος, ὁ ἁγίας, integer (Psa. xviii, 31). The older writers described this by the word ἀγαθότης, ἀγεικότης. The sinnerness of God is also designated in the New Testament by the words ἱλικές (Matt. xix, 4) and ἄθεος (Rev. xvi, 5), 2. That he never chooses what is false and deceitful, but only what is truly good—what his perfect intelligence recognises as such; and that he is therefore the most perfect teacher and the highest exemplar of moral goodness. Hence the Bible declares that he looks with displeasure upon wicked, deceitful courses (Psa. i, 5; v, 5; 'Thou hatest all workers of iniquity'); but, on the contrary, he regards the pious with favor (Psa. vii, 4; xv, 1 sqq.; Psa. xlvii, 18).—Hosea x, 11, sqq. § 29). Howe speaks of the holiness of God as "the actual, perpetual rectitude of all his volitions, and all the works and actions which are consequent thereupon; and an eternal propension thereto and love thereof, by which it is altogether impossible to will that it should ever vary." 3. Holiness is an essential attribute of God, and adds is therefore an indication that the Maker and Ruler of men formed them with the intent that they should avoid vice and practice virtue; and that the former is the object of his aversion, the latter of his regard. On this principle, the apostle, which is the whole book of holy scripture, God has enacted for the government of mankind, have been constructed. 'The law is holy, and the commandment holy, just, and good.' In the administration of the world, where God is so often seen in his judicial capacity, the punishments which are inflicted, invariably in a most just and immediately ordered to prevent and correct the practice of evil. 'Above all, the Gospel, that last and most perfect revelation of the divine will, instead of giving the professors of it any allowance to sin, because grace has abounded (which is an injurious imputation cast upon it by ignorant and uninformed writers, who have not clearly comprehended the design of the whole scheme of grace), simply constitutes the essence of divine holiness. To mankind, indeed, the simple will of God is at once law in all things; but with regard to God himself, his will is holy because he wills only according to his inherent holiness, that is, his own nature. As the absolute Being (God, the Father), his will is law, independent on any or all outward things; but as a morally perfect spirit God cannot but be true to himself, and thus manifest in all his agency his inherent moral perfection as his immanent law.

The earlier dogmatists of the Reformed Church largely discussed the question whether right is the right because God wills it, or whether God wills right because he must. Some (e.g. Polanus) maintained the former view as the only consistent with the absolute nature of God. The later writers maintain the opposite view, e.g. Voetius: 'God is subject to no moral duty from without, because he is his own debtor, and his own satisfaction outside of God that can bind or determine him. But from within he may be bound (so to speak), not, indeed, in the sense of subject, because he is his own debtor, and cannot deny himself. Thus, in divine things, the Father is bound to love the Son, for he cannot but love him; while he, in the very act of his divine nature, is bound to work by the Father; nor can he otherwise whenever a work outside of God is to be performed. So also, in external acts, the creature having been once produced, God is bound to maintain it by his perverted and continual influence (as long as it continues to exist), to the very first mover, and guide it to his glory (Prov. vii, 4; Rom. xiii, 34-36). That is immutably good and just whose opposite he cannot wish.' So also Heidegger (Corp. Theol. iii, 89, 90): 'Whatever is the holiness, justice, and goodness of the creature, nevertheless its rule and first norm in the sight of God is not his free will and command, but his own essential justice, holiness, and goodness.' On this subject Watson remarks as follows: 'Without conducting the reader into the profitless question whether there is a fixed and unalterable nature and fitness of things independent of the divine will on the one hand; or, on the other, whether good and evil have their foundation, not in the nature of things, but only in the divine will, which makes them such, there is a method, less direct it may be, but more satisfactory, of assisting our thoughts on this subject. It is certain that the divine will is the primary act upon rational creatures under the general name of righteousness, and that their contraries have been prohibited. It is a matter also of constant experience and observation that the good of society is promoted only by the wise, and injured by the other; and also that every violation of his nature, benefit and happiness from rectitude, injury and misery from vice. This constitution of human nature Holland, also called The Netherlands, a kingdom in Europe, has an area of 18,890 English square miles. Holland still owns extensive colonies in the East and West Indies, and in South America, which together make an area of about 885,700 English square miles.

I. Church History. — At the beginning of the Christian era the country was inhabited by Germanic tribes, of whom the Batavians and Frisians (q. v.) are best known. Their subjection, begun by Cesar, was completed by Germanicus. At the beginning of the 4th century the Franks conquered a large portion of the country; only the northern part retained its independence until the 7th century. Charlemagne appointed counts in Bavaria and in Zealand, and compelled the people to embrace the Christian religion. After the division of the empire of Charlemagne, the Netherlands were united with Lorraine, and they both were made a dependency of Germany. But gradually a number of princes became semi-independent; among them the bishops of Utrecht, who ruled over Upper-Yssel and Groningen. The most powerful among the princes were the counts of Flanders, and after the extinction of these last their land fell by marriage to Burgundy. In 1384, Burgundy was finally ceded to the House of Hapsburg, thus into possession of the whole of the Netherlands, remaining, however, feudal to the German emperor. The marriage of the daughter of the last duke of Burgundy with Maximilian, archduke of Austria (later, emperor Maximilian I of Germany), made the Netherlands a part of the Austrian Empire, where they were united with the Holy Roman Empire.

The Christianization of the country has been referred to in the arts. Belgium and French Holland. Holland, like Belgium, early became distinguished for its excellent cathedral schools, especially that of Utrecht. A great influence upon the religious life not only of Holland, but of much of the Low Countries, was exercised by the Order of Common Life, which was founded by Gerhard Groot (q. v.) (1340-1384). This order soon established a number of schools, especially in the Netherlands and the adjacent parts of Germany, which imparted not only elementary instruction, but also a higher education. Thus Holland became celebrated for its learning and scholarship, which in the 15th century was further promoted by the establishment of the University of Utrecht.

Many of the prominent men of Holland took an active part in the efforts to reform the Church of Rome; the best known of these reformers is John of the Wesel. The most important of the heroes of the Reformation in the Netherlands was John of the Wesel, and, living in a country which was favorable to religious toleration, suffered less from persecution than most of the medievals sects.

The Reformation of the 16th century found in few countries so congenial a soil as in Holland. Favored by the liberal traditions of the country, the national spirit of independence, and the extensive commerce with foreign countries, it spread rapidly. In vain did Charles V issue a number of cruel edicts (the first in March, 1528, the last in 1550) to put it down; it grew in spite of all persecution. Among the different reformed systems which then began to establish themselves, it was especially that of Calvin, first introduced by young Dutch students of Geneva, which struck deep root. The Lutheran doctrines, and, still more, Anabaptist movements, also found numerous adherents, but Calvinism soon obtained the ascendency in the Low Countries; it was further strengthened by the influence of the Reformed churches of England and France. Thus arose the Dutch Reformed Church, embracing at its origin the reformed churches of Belgium, as well as those of Holland, as these countries were at this time politically united. [The inner history of this Church is described in the article Utrecht Church.] Philip II was determined to destroy the new doctrine, and introduced into the Netherlands all the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition. This called forth a general opposition. The lower nobility united in presenting to the regent Margaret of Parma a protest against religious persecutions; the citizens assembled in the open field for divine service. In 1566, general attacks began against the Roman Catholic churches. In 1567, Philip sent duke Alba to the Netherlands with an army, consisting of Spaniards and Italians, to subdue the religious movement; but the cruel tyranny of the duke led to very different results. William of Orange, the stadtholder, who had ascended to the hereditary throne by the flight of his brother, was attempted at, the head of an army of exiles, to expel the Spaniards, but in 1572 nearly the whole of the northern provinces fell into the hands of the patriots. The efforts of Alba to suppress the revolution by force of arms having entirely failed, he was recalled, and departed in January, 1573. In 1576, 18,000 men had been executed, chiefly on account of religion. The efforts of his successors likewise failed to reestablish the rule of Spain. In 1575, the provinces of Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht, Friesland, Groningen, Over- yssel, and Guelders formed the Union of Utrecht, and thus laid the foundation of the republic of the Seven United Provinces. From this time the history of the Netherlands divides itself into that of Holland, in which the ascendency of Protestantism was henceforth established, and that of Flanders (subsequently Belgium, q. v.), in which the townsmen of the Bruges and Ghent regions maintained their independence, and adhered to the Roman Catholic Church.

William of Orange was assassinated in 1584 by a partisan of Spain, but his son Maurice successfully defended the independence of Holland, and in 1609 compelled Spain to agree to a truce for twelve years. During the peace an unfortunate war broke out between the Dutch and the Arminians (q. v.). Maurice, who aspired to become hereditary sovereign of Holland, placed himself, from political reasons, at the head of the strict Calvinists, and whenever he prevailed, the venerable head of the Arminian party, Barneveldt, one of the most illustrious figures of the Dutch nation, was exiled. Maurice, while Hugo Grothus, another distinguished leader of the Arminians, or, as they were generally called, from their remonstrances in favor of religious toleration, Remonstrants, escaped by an artifice. The war with Spain was renewed in 1621, but at the Peace of Westphalia in 1648, Spain had to recognize the independence of Holland.

Under various political vicissitudes, Holland remained henceforth a Protestant country. On the establishment of the Batavian republic in 1786, in consequence of the conquest of the country by France, Church and State were separated in the Netherlands. In 1794 the Church was reorganized, but the new Church did not remain, however, substantially as before. Simultaneously with the erection of the kingdom of Holland under Napoleon, an attempt was made to reorganize the Church, at the head of which the national Synod was to be placed; but this plan, also, was not executed, as in 1810 Holland was incorporated with the French empire. An introduction of the Organic Articles (1812) was then meditated, but never carried through. The re-establishment of the Netherlands as an independent state, with which also Belgium was united, restored to the national Church most of the rights formerly possessed by her, and gave her for the first time a national Synod. In the new state a majority of the population belonged to the Roman Catholic Church, but the government knew how to maintain in its legislation the ascendency of Protestantism, to the great dissatisfaction of the southern provinces, which revolted in 1830, and constituted themselves a constitutional kingdom. To this time that Holland again became a predominantly Protestant state, in which, however, the Roman Catholic Church comprises about two fifths of the entire population. Of late, an almost complete separation between Church and State has been effected.

II. Church Statistics. — The total population of the kingdom of Holland amounted in December, 1888, according to an official calculation, to 4,505,892. This is exclusive of the grand-duchy of Luxembourg (q. v.), which is governed by the king of Holland as grand-duke, but is entirely independent from Holland in point of administration. A little over a majority of the entire population, according to the official census taken in 1879, 2,469,814, belong to the National Reformed Church. The present constitution of this Church, which almost makes it autonomous, was regulated by a law of March 28, 1852. The Church embraces 40 classes in 10 provinces of Germany. A Synod consisting of the pastors and a number of the elders, but the number of the latter must not exceed the number of the pastors. Each class meets annually, and elects a standing committee, which exercises ecclesiastical discipline. The General Synod, which meets in May, is held in June at the Hague, consists of ten pastors, one being elected by each of the provincial synods, three elders, and the representatives of the three theological faculties of Leyden, Utrecht, and Groningen. To these are added delegates appointed by the Commission of the Reformed Walloon Churches (those which flow from the French Church), and by the East and West Indian churches. A Synodical Commission, consisting of the president, the vice-president, and the secretary of the Synod, of three preachers and elders, and one professor of theology, is chosen for a period of three years. The number of presbyteries in 1884 was 1,850, which were visited by 1,811 pastors. The Walloon churches were seventeen in number, with twenty-five pastors, and a population of 9678. They are placed under a special commission for the affairs of the Walloon churches, but form an integral part of the National Reformed Church, and hold their meetings in the same place as the Synod. Theological faculties representing this Church are connected with the state universities of Leyden, Utrecht, Groningen, and the Athenaeum of Deventer and Amsterdam. The famous theological schools of Harderwyk and Franeker (q.v.) have been abolished.

As the National Reformed Church in Holland, in the second half of the 18th and in the present century, fell more and more under the predominant influence of rationalism [for the doctrinal history of the Church, see the art. Reformed Church], a number of the leading defenders of the ancient creed of the Church deemed it best to switch from the National Church, and organize an independent Church (De Geestheids, reform. kerken). In 1884 this Church comprised forty classes in ten provinces, with about 200 ministers and 379 congregations. It has a theological school at Kampen, with fifty to sixty students. Its membership belongs chiefly to the poorer classes of the population, and numbers 189,905 souls.

The Remonstrants and followers of Arminius (q.v.) have considerably decreased since the beginning of the present century. While in 1809 they still numbered thirty-four congregations and forty pastors, they had in 1884 only twelve congregations and ten preachers left. They regard themselves as members of the Reformed Church, and call themselves the Remonstrant Reformed Brotherhood. They have been supported since 1795 by the state, and their pastors are educated at the Athenaeum of Amsterdam. Their Synod meets annually, alternating between Amsterdam and Rotterdam. The Lutherans of Holland adopted as early as 1596 a constitution similar to that of the Reformed Church. Like them, they have elective pastors, elders, and deacons; and by the new regulations of 1858, a Church Council, a Synodical Council, and Synodical Committees, the three stages of ecclesiastical representation. Their Synod likewise meets annually at the Hague. The population connected with the Church amounted in 1884 to 61,825; the number of parishes and pastors is about fifty; the number of classes six. They have a theological seminary, as well as the pastors, receive salaries from the state. The Mennonites, whose origin falls into the time before the Reformation, have likewise decreased since the beginning of the present century. In 1809 they numbered 128 congregations and 186 ministers; in 1884, 157 congregations, and 253 ministers. The former have a seminary at Amsterdam, with fifteen students in 1884. Rationalism largely prevails among them. The population connected with their congregations numbered in 1884, 50,705. The churches are self-supporting, and independent of each other. The Moravians have two churches and four ministers. The Jews in 1888 numbered about 100,000 souls.

Among the religious societies of Holland the following are the most important: (1) The Netherlands Bible Society, which had in 1867 a circulation of 92,951 copies, and an income of $30,000. (2) The Sunday-school Union which had in 1867 established 271 Sunday-schools in ninety-five different places; they had together 1801 teachers and 24,400 children. The Union publishes a weekly paper, The Christian Family Circle. (3) The Society for Christian National-school Instruction (established in 1869), whose design is the establishment throughout the country of schools in which a sound Christian education shall be given, as opposed to that given in the national schools. Eighty schools had in 1867 been established in different parts of the country on this principle. The income of the society was about $3000. (4) The Netherlands Evangelical Protestant Union, established in 1853, endeavors to "counteract the terrible power of Rome, and unbelieving prevailing throughout the country, by means of pietists." The income of the society is about $1500. (5) The missionary societies of Holland labor exclusively in the Dutch colonies, and in the neighboring islands of the Indian Archipelago. Great open-air missionary gatherings are held in Holland. Until the Reformation, the whole of modern Holland belonged to the diocese of Utrecht (q.v.). In 1559 this see was made an archbishopric, and five suffragan sees were erected—Haarlem, Middelburg, Deventer, Leeuwarden, and Groningen. The success of the Reformed Church, after the establishment of the independence of Holland, put an end to all the dioceses. In 1861 an apostolical vicariate was established for those who continued to adhere to the Church of Rome. It was first administered by the apostolical nuncio in Brussels. At the beginning of the 17th century the Dutch mission again started, and in the succeeding years a bishop (who was to supply the place of the former archbishop), and five provoars at the former episcopal sees. In 1728 the Jansenist (q.v.) canons of Utrecht elected an archbishop; in 1742 a Jansenist bishop was elected for Haarlem, and in 1755 another for Deventer. All these sees are still vacant, but the number of the imperial vicariate at Haarlem has been reduced to six. The membership have decreased. These have at present (1870) a population of about 4000 souls in twenty-five parishes. After the establishment of the United Kingdom of the Netherlands, the Roman Catholic Church in the seven old provinces was divided into seven archieparchies. In 1850 the bishoprics were placed under the patriarchate at the Hague as "vice superior of the Dutch mission," while the apostolic vicariates of Herzevogelbusch, Breida, and Limburg (1840) were erected into districts which had formerly belonged to other states. On March 7, 1853, Pius IX re-established the regular hierarchy of the archbishopric of Utrecht, and the four bishoprics of Haarlem, Breida, Herzevogelbusch, and Roermond. The Catholic population in 1879 numbered 1,469,157 souls, with 39 convents of monks (containing 1,015 members) and 187 female monasteries (containing 2168 members). Among these the monks and nuns, de-}

A complete Church History of Holland has been published by Glazius, Geschichte der christlichen kerk der nederlantsen in de Nederlanden (Leiden, 1823 sq., 6 vols.). The introduction of Christianity into the Netherlands is specially treated of by Diet Lorgin (Gesch. van de inwoning des christen, in Nederlanden (Leuven, 1841), and by Prof. Roysads (Gesch. der inwooning en vereniging der christen in Nederland, Enschede, 1840). The latter began a Church History of Holland during the Middle Ages (Gesch. van en geregillede Christendom en de christ. kerk in Nederlande gedurende de middeleeuwen, Ute, 1849-53, 2 vols.), but the death of this eminent historian (1854) prevented the completion of the work. A biographical Church History, from a Roman Catholic standpoint, was begun by Albertding Thijm (Ges. der kerk in de Nederl. ; vol. i., II. Willobrood, Apoel der Nederlnden, Amsterdam, 1861; Germ. transl., Munster, 1865). A work of great ability is the Church History of Holland before the Reformation, by Moll (Kerkgeschiedenis van Nederland voor de hervorming, Arnhem, 1864 sq., 3 vols.). See BEIJING. (A. J. S.)
HOLLAND

Holland, Guido, an English Jesuit, was born in Lincoln about 1587. He was educated at the University of Cambridge, devoting his time mainly to metaphysics. After his graduation he went to Spain and here pursued a course in theology. In 1615 he entered the order of the Jesuits, and was sent to England as a Roman Catholic missionary. He died Nov. 26, 1660. He wrote a work of some importance on the immortality of the soul, under the title Prerogativa naturae humanae.—Jocher, Gelekt. Leh., ii., 1674.

Holland, John M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, born in Williamson County, Tenn., about 1809 or 1804, was converted in early life, and entered the ministry in 1822. After holding several important charges, he was appointed presiding elder of the Cumberland District in 1828. Two years later he was sent to Nashville, and in 1828 he was appointed presiding elder over the Forked Deer District, transferred in 1833 to the Memphis, and in 1836 to the Florence District. In 1887 he was selected as the agent of La Grange College, but in 1888 he returned to the active work of the ministry as presiding elder of Holly Springs District, in Mississippi. In 1889 he was once more chosen agent for a college—this time for Holly Springs University; but in 1870 he again returned to the presiding eldership, of the Memphis District. On this district he died in 1841. Holland was one of the most able and useful servants of the Methodist Episcopal Church in his day, and is generally acknowledged to rank foremost among the preachers of Tennessee. —Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, vii., 662.

Holland, Thomas, a celebrated English divine, born at Ludlow, in Shropshire, in 1539, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford. His broad and thorough scholarship secured him the regius professorship at Oxford, and he was distinguished as "too much by every kind of desirable attainment, divine or human, that he was esteemed and admired not only in our seminaries of learning at home, but also in the universities abroad" (Middleton, Et. Biog. ii, 578 sq.; compare also Jocher, Gelekt. Leh., ii., 1674). He was a high churchman, and was appointed presiding Protestant, and labored earnestly to drive from Oxford all Papists and their sympathizers, of whom it had not a few at this early date of Protestantism in England. It is to be regretted that most of the works he left, and these few indeed, were never printed. Allibone mentions Oratio Oxoni. (Oxford, 1599-4to) and Sermones (ibid. 1601, 4to).

Hollas, David, a German Lutheran divine, was born at Wulkw, near Stargard, in 1614. He studied at Wittenberg, and became successively pastor of Pitzkerin, near Stargard, in 1670, co-rector of Stargard in 1690, rector and preacher of Colberg, and, finally, proton and pastor of Jakobskehe. He died in 1713. Aside from minor productions on different subjects, as sermons, etc., he wrote a work on dogmatics which was long in great favor. It is entitled Examen theologicae acromaticae universum theologiam theolico-politicam complectens (1707, 4to; repr. in 1717, 1722, 1725, 1742, and 1741); and, with additions and corrections, by J. Toller in 1750 and 1763). The popularity enjoyed by this work was not so much due to its scientific originality, for it was mainly based on the works of Gerhard, Calov, Scherzer, etc., as to its convenient arrangement, the clearness and precision of its definitions, and the careful and thorough classification of its contents. Another, and perhaps still more powerful cause of its success is to be found in its liberal spirit, coupled with unimpeachable orthodoxy. Hollas occupies the first place among the Lutheran theologians of the close of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th century. He sought to find a medium between the orthodox scholastic divinity and the spirit of practical Christianity, in order to reconcile ecclesiastical orthodoxy with freedom of thought. Hollebeck, Ewald, a Dutch theologian, born at Hamsted in 1719, was educated at the University of Leyden. In 1762 he was called to his alma mater as professor of theology. He is especially distinguished in the Church of Holland by his revolutionary efforts in the homiletical field of study. He was the first to condemn the old method of making a sermon an exegetical dissertation, and to introduce the English method of preaching to the edification of the people. He set forth his views in De optimo concionum generis (Leyden, 1788; much enlarged, 1770, 4vo.). At first he encountered great opposition, and in 1816 he was reappointed presiding elder over the Forked Deer District, transferred in 1833 to the Memphis, and in 1836 to the Florence District. In 1887 he was selected as the agent of La Grange College, but in 1888 he returned to the active work of the ministry as presiding elder of Holly Springs District, in Mississippi. In 1889 he was once more chosen agent for a college—this time for Holly Springs University; but in 1870 he again returned to the presiding eldership, of the Memphis District. On this district he died in 1841. Holland was one of the most able and useful servants of the Methodist Episcopal Church in his day, and is generally acknowledged to rank foremost among the preachers of Tennessee. —Sprague, Annuals of the American Pulpit, vii., 662.

Hollingsworth, Johann von, a Benedictine monk, born at Holleshoe, in Bohemia, in 1666, was educated at Paris. He was one of the most violent opponents of Huss, and contributed more than any other person to his execution. This explains why the Hussites, however (1240) destroyed the monastery to which Hollings-}

Holliday, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, born in Baltimore Nov. 28, 1771, was licensed to preach in 1797, and entered the itineracy in 1809. He was made presiding elder on Salt River District in 1818; located in 1816; was again presiding elder on Cumberland District, Tennessee Conference, 1817-21; on Green River District, Kentucky Conference, 1821-25; and on Wabash District, Illinois Conference, 1825-28. At the General Conference of 1828 he was appointed Book Agent at Cincinnati, where he remained eight years. After this he was for several years presiding elder in the Illinois Conference. He was superannuated in 1846, and died March 8, 1850. Mr. Holliday was a "clear, sound, and practical preacher," a deeply pious Christian, and amiable and beloved in all the relations of life, with great opposition; with great abilities; and with great sufferings. He was a man of counsel, a man of integrity, and a man of the church. See Memoir of Dr. Holley, by his Widow; North American Review, xxxv., 403; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i., 866.

Hollingshead, William D., a Congregational minister, born at Philadelphia Oct. 8, 1748, was educated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1770, and entered the ministry in 1772. His first pastoral charge was at Fairfield, N. J. In 1789 he accepted a call from a church

Hollis, Thomas, Sr., one of the early benefactors of Harvard College, was born in London in 1658. His father, a merchant of the same city, was a protestant of the Independent Church at Pinner's Hall, and he followed in the same relation. Having accumulated a fortune in trade, he gave large sums to charity and to advance the Baptist and Independent Churches. Still more substantial marks of his liberality were conferred on Harvard College, at which in number, and in the form of a scholarship in metaphysics and one of theology, and endowed scholarships for poor students, enriched the library and the cabinets, etc. He died in London in 1731. See Crosby, Hist. of the Baptists, iv, 229; Bogue and Bennett, History of the Dissenters, ii, 414; Christian Examiner, vii, 64; Skeats, Free Churches of England, p. 529.

Hollis, Thomas, Jr., nephew of the preceding, was born in London in 1720, and devoted himself to literature and to the propagation of the principles of civil and religious liberty. He travelled over the Continent from 1748 to 1750, and then settled down on his estate at Corsecombe, Dorset. It is said that half of his large fortune was given in 1792 to Sharon, Conn. He was converted in early life, preyed under the presiding elder in the state of New York, removed to Wisconsin, and joined the Wisconsin Conference in 1833. His appointments were: Summit, Fort Atkinson, Lake Mills, Greenbush, near Otons Falls, Fond du Lac Station, Fond du Lac District, Oconomowoc, Waukesha, and Hart Prairie. He was truly a laborer in God's harvest, zealously affected always in every good thing, serving the Lord most essentially with all his heart, and soul, and mind, and strength. He died at Salem, Wisconsin, March 15, 1869. Hollister was a self-educated man, but good native talent, a logical mind, and vivid imagination atoned for his earlier deficiency, and he ranked among the first in his Conference. See Min. Am. Conf. 1869, p. 225.

Holman, Samuel Christian, a distinguished German theologian, born at Stettin Dec. 8, 1796, was educated at Göttingen, and removed to Wittenberg, where he made adjunct professor of philosophy in 1724. Two years later he was promoted to an extraordinary professorship, and in 1754 was called as a regular professor to the University of Göttingen, then opening. He died in 1787. Holman devoted his time mainly to philosophical studies. He was at first an opponent of Wolf's philosophy, later an admirer of it, and finally became an Eclectic. He wrote text-books in metaphysics, which were well received, and used as long as skepticism was in vogue in Germany. He was also active in awakening an interest in his contemporaries for the study of the natural sciences. His most important works are: De stupendo natura mysterio anima sibi ipsi ignota (Greifsw. and Witten. 1722-24, 4to); Commentatio philos. de harmonia inter substantiam animae et aethereum, 2 vols. (Witten. 1724, 4to); — Apologia Prolectuom in N. T. Gres. (ibid. 1797, 4to); — Comm. phil. de miraculis et geniosis eorumdem criteria, etc. (Frankf. and Lpz. 1727, 4to). — Institu. philos. (Wittenberg, 1727, 2 vols., 8vo). — Uberzeugender Vortrag v. Gott u. Schrift (ibid. 1738, 8vo, and often); Von den Hypothesen, u. d. Translatiuni naturae in human. (ibid. 1737, 8vo); — Vom anatomischen, u. physiolog. Gehororganen, d. Nerven u. des Gehirns (ibid. 1737, 8vo); — Vom pneumatologen und theologischen Zustand der menschlichen Natur (Göttingen, 1740, 8vo). — The studies of a work is given in Jöcher, Gekl. Lex. Adelung's Add. ii, 2999 sq. See Krug, Philos. Lex. ii, 451 sq.

Holm, Peter, Jr., a Danish divine, born at Moom, Norway, June 6, 1706, was educated at the university at Copenhagen, and afterwards lectured at his alma mater. In 1738 he was appointed professor of theology and philosophy at Copenhagen, and a few years after, was a professor of the independent Church at Pinner's Hall, and he followed in the same relation. Having accumulated a fortune in trade, he gave large sums to charity and to advance the Baptist and Independent Churches. Holman, David, a Congregational minister, was born in Sutton, Mass., Dec. 13, 1777. He entered the sophomore class at Brown University in 1800, and graduated in 1803. He studied theology with his brother, the late Rev. Nathan Holman, of Attleborough, and Rev. Dr. Emmons, of Franklin, commenced preaching in Douglas, Mass., in the autumn of 1807, and was ordained Oct. 19, 1808. He continued pastor of the church in Douglas until Aug. 17, 1842, when he was obliged to resign on account of impaired health. In 1848 he renewed his labors among his old flock, and continued to perform the duties of a pastor for five years. Several revivals of religion were enjoyed during his ministry, as the result of which more than 200 were added to the Church. He died Nov. 16, 1866. See Congreg. Quarterly, ix, 203.

Holman, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Salem, Va., Nov. 29, 1799, at Carter Springs, Virginia, and removed to Franklin, Ky., then in Virginia. He joined the Church in 1812; four years later he entered the Ohio Conference, and was appointed to Limestone Circuit. In 1821 he was sent to the Newport Circuit, and a year later was appointed to Frankfort, the capital of the state. Here he built up a fine society, and remained four years. In 1825 he moved to Danville and Harrodsburg, where he labored with equal zeal and success. After serving Lexington, Russellville, and Mt. Sterling in succession, he was appointed to Louisville, where he succeeded in building the Brook Street Church. He remained in this city "from 1830 to the close of his ministry, except two years, serving all the churches either as pastor or presiding elder." During the war he separated his connection with the "M. E. Church South," and, espousing the Federal cause, "accepted a post-chaplainship, to the arduous duties of which he was well qualified, being himself with the Federalists." His death was "sadly surprising—visiting hospitals, and administering to the sick and dying night and day." He died Aug. 1, 1867. — Redford, History of Methodism in Kentucky, ii, 374 sq.

HOLOFERNES

HOLMES, Robert, D.D., an English divine, born in Hampshire in 1749, was educated at New College, Oxford. He became successively rector of Staunton, canon of Salisbury, and finally (1804) dean of Winchester. In 1780 he succeeded Thomas Warton as professor of poetry at Oxford. His father died at Oxford in 1805. Holmes wrote The Resurrection of the Body deduced from the Resurrection of Christ (Oxf. 1777, 4to) —On the Prophecies and Testimony of John the Baptist, and the parallel Prophecies of Jesus Christ (Bampton Lectures for 1782, Oxf. 1782, 8vo) —Four tracts on the Principles of Religion and Divinity: Authority; on the Principles of Redemption; on the Angelical Message of the Virgin Mary; and on the Resurrection of the Body, with a Discourse on Humility (Oxf. 1786); etc. But his principal work was the collation of the Septuagint. "As early as 1788 he published at Oxford proposals for a collation of all the known MSS. of the Septuagint, which had never yet been undertaken on an extensive scale, and the want of which had long been felt among Biblical scholars. Dr. Holmes's undertaking was promoted by the delegates of the Clarendon Press. In addition to the learned editor's own labors, literary men were engaged in different parts of the Continent for the business of collation, and Dr. Holmes annually published an account of the progress which was made" (Kitto). The book of Genesis, successively followed by the other books of the Pentateuch, making together one folio volume, with one title page and one general preface, was published at Oxford in 1789. From this pref ace we learn that eleven Greek MSS. in uncial letters, and more than one hundred MSS. in cursive writing (containing either the whole or parts of the Pentateuch), were collated for this edition, of which the text was a copy of the Form of 1719, for which, with other editions, collations from three other ancient editions (the Complutensian, the Aldine, and Grabe's) are always noted. The quotations found in the works of the Greek fathers are also alleged, and likewise the various readings of the ancient versions made from the Septuagint. "The plan of this edition thus bore a close resemblance to what had been already applied by Mill, Wetstein, and Griesbach to the criticism of the Greek Testament, and the execution of it has been highly commended as displaying un- common industry and apparently great accuracy." It is to be regretted that "the learned editor died in the midst of this honorable labor; but shortly before his death he had published the book of Daniel, both according to the Sept. version and that of Theodotion, the latter only having been printed in former editions, because the translation of this book is not contained in the common MSS. and was unknown till it was printed in 1772 from a MS. belonging to cardinal Chigi" (Kitto). The work was finished by the Rev. Parsons, D.D., and completed on the original plan. The title of the work is Virus Testamentum Græcum, cum variis Lectionibus (Oxf. 1798-1804, 15 vols. fol.). Tischendorf, however, condemns the work as inaccurately done (Proleg. to ed. of Sept. 1856, p. iii-iv). See Chalmers, Biographical Sketches, vol. ii, p. 117; Brough, Oxford University, Brit. Lib. p. 29, 22; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 870; Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1929; Kitto, Cyclop. of Bib. Lit. ii, 318. (J. H.W.)

Holmepatrick, Council of, held at Holmepatrick, an island off the eastern coast of Ireland, in 1148, by the advice of the pope, Innocent II, to consider the question of granting the pall to the archbishops of Armagh and Cashel. This synod was attended by fifteen bishops and two hundred priests. The council lasted four days, the first three of which were occupied with questions concerning the general welfare of the Church, confining the question of the pall to the last day. The result was a letter to the pope petitioning for the pall (which had meanwhile succeeded Innocent), which Malachy O'Morogais, a former archbishop of Armagh, was commissioned to carry to Rome, in favor of the grant.—Todd, Hist. of Ancient Church in Ireland, p. 113; Land- don's Manual of Councils, p. 265, 266.

HOLOFERNES, a person mentioned only in the Apocrypha (Judith ii, 4, 19), a nobleman belonging to the house of Oneglah, as borne by the brother of Ariarathes I (B.C. cir. 380), and afterwards by a pretender to the Cappadocian throne, who was at first supported and afterwards imprisoned by Demetrius Soter (B.C. cir. 158). The termination (Tissaphernes, etc.) points to a Persian origin, but the meaning of the word is uncertain.—Smith. See Volkmar, Einleitung in die Apokryphen (Tub. 1860-3), i, 179 sq.; Gritz, Geschichte der Juden, iv, 456. According to the account in the book of Judith, Nebuchadnezzar, "king of Nineveh," having resolved to "avenge himself on all the earth," appointed Holoffrnes general of the expedition, which was intended for the purpose of taking the cities of the coast, which he had submitted to him, "and the weight of his arm." Having reached Ecbatana he encamped "between Geba and Scythopolis" a whole month to collect his forces. The Jews, however, resolved to resist him, and fortified all the mountain passes. Dissuaded by Achior, "captain of the sons of Ammon," from attacking the Jews, he rescinded the advice, and delivered Achior into the hands of the Jews in Bethulia, from whom, however, he met with a kind reception. Holofernes proceeded against Bethulia (q. v.), where he was brought to bay: and, instead of attacking it, seized upon two wells on which the city depended for water, and compelled the devout women to bring it. While here he fell a victim to the treachery of Judith, a beautiful Jewish widow, who artfully managed to be brought into his presence, and who, by playing the hypocrite, secured his favor and confidence. Having invited her to a banquet, he drank freely, and, having fallen asleep, fell beneath the arm of his fair guest, who cut off his head with his own sword, and escaped with her to a lofty trophy to her own people in Bethulia. The Jews immediately fell on their enemies, who, finding their general dead in his tent, flew in confusion. Such is the story: it is scarcely necessary to add that it is wholly unhistorical.—Kitto. Holo'meon (Heb. Cholem, יַחֵלֹם or יַחַלֹם, sandy), the name of one or two places.

1. (Sept. Ῥλων, Ῥλων, etc.; Vulg. Holon, Olon.) A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 51, where it is mentioned between Goshen and Giloh); assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxii. 15, where it is mentioned beside his Eshtemoa and Debir); in the parallel passage (1 Chron. vi. 58) it is written Hilen (Heb. Chilen, יַחֵַלּן; Sept. Νελων, but transposes with Jether; Vulg. Helon). De Sauley is inclined to identify it with the village Nukhalin, on the hills (Dead Sea, i, 455, 454) west of Bethlehem, or, according to Dr. Robinson (new ed. of Researches, ii. 284), at the bottom of wady el-Masur, on its southern side; but this is not in the same group of towns with the others, which all lie in the south-west part of the mountain district (Keil, Comment, ad loc.). The position seems rather to correspond to that of Beiti Amr, a large ruined village on a hill near wady el-Khulil, north-west of Juthah, on the road to Hebron (Robinson, Researches, ii. 629 and note).

2. (Sept. Χλων, Vulg. Helon.) A city of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21). It was one of the towns of the Misbar, the level downs (A. V., "plain country") east of Jordan, and is named with Jahazah, Dibon, and other known places; but no identification of it has yet taken place, nor does it appear in the parallel lists of Numeirat and Josh. xxii. 31. —Smith. Perhaps it is the same as Horonaim (q. v.).

Holste or Holsteni, Lucas, born at Hamburg in 1596, was educated at the University of Leyden, and ranks as one of the first scholars of his time. Failing to secure a professorship, he travelled through Italy, England, and other countries, and settled in Paris, where he became acquainted with the distinguished Jesuits Dupuy, Peirese, and other learned men of that order, and he finally became a Roman Catholic, in consequence, he said, of his careful study of the works of the fathers, and of his seeking for the principle of unity in the Church; but others think that his conversion was wholly due to his association with the Jesuits, and to his desire to have free access to the libraries of France and Italy; and some even, among whom is Salmasius (see Müller, Čimbr. Litt. iii. 820), ascribe it to his severe poverty and great ambition. Soon after his conversion his friends introduced him to the pope's nuncio, cardinal Barberini, nephew of Urban VIII, whom he accompanied to Rome in 1627. He lived with the cardinal, and became his librarian. Later, he was promoted canon of St. Peter's, and finally he became librarian of the Vatican and consultor of the Congregation of the Index. He was sent on several missions to Germany; among others, to Innsbruck, to receive the abjuration of queen Christina of Sweden. He was also instrumental in effecting the conversion of other distinguished Protestants to Catholicism. Holsteini, even in his eminent position in the Church of Rome, retained some of the liberal principles imbibed as a Protestant, and they severely provoked his Roman friends. Thus he advocated earnestly, but in vain, the union of the Greek and Roman churches in 1639, advising liberal action on the part of the Roman Church. In the Congregation of the Index also, he would never favor any stricture against valuable works of Protestants, and he was even obliged to retire from the council for this reason. In the dispute between the Jansenists and Molinists, he counselled pope Alexander VII against any decision likely to be in favor of the Jansenists. The obscure and involved nature of such views maintain that no proof can be offered "that there is or ever was any one community on earth recognized, or having any claim to be recognised as the universal Church, bearing rule over and comprehending all particular churches. They further allege that no accredited authority exists that is empowered to define or vary any registry of those decrees. They consider, therefore, that the Catholic Church is an invisible community of much value in their unfinished state. Among his published works are the following: Porphyrii liber de Vita Pythagorae, etc. (Rom. 1630, 8vo; Cambri. 1655, 8vo), with a Latin version and notes, and a dissertation on the life and writings of Porphyrius, considered a model of learned biography; — Demophilii, Democratiae, et Sancti Veteris Philosophorum Sententiae Morales (Rome, 1638, 8vo; Leyden, 1639, 12mo); — Note in Sallustian Philosophum de Dies et Mundo (Rome, 1638, 8vo); — Observationes ad Apollonii Rhodii Argonauticae (Leyden, 1641, 4vo); — De Confusione de Venustione, with a Latin version (Par. 1644, 8vo); — Adnotationes in Geographiam Sacram Caroli a S. Paolo, Italian Antiquas Clavis, et Theaurum Geographicam Ortelii (Rome, 1666, 8vo); — Note et Castigationes Posthumae in Stephano Byzantinii de Urbibus, edited by Ryckius; — Liber Diurnae Pontificum Romano monumentorum, a collection of papal acts and decrees. He also wrote a collection of the rules of the earlier monastic orders, published after his death (Rome, 1661; later at Paris; and, lastly, much enlarged, Augsburg, 1759, 6 vols. fol.), which is considered as among the most valuable of his writings; he also edited in his lifetime the Antiquitates Mixtae, and the works of Methodius, and many of his Latin letters have also been published in the Collectio Romanus veterum aliquot histor. eccl. monumentorum, etc. See Wilken, Leben d. gelehrten Luxo Holsteini (Hamb. 1728, 8vo); English Cyclop.; Herzog, Real-Lex. vi. 241 sq.; Moehl, German, pp. 426 sq. HOLY Catholic Church, the "congregation of faithful men dispersed throughout the whole world." Some persons speak of this Church as if it were a visible community, comprising all Christians as its members, as having existed from the earliest days, and as retaining the same authority which it formerly had to frame and administer the doctrine and discipline of the Church. The decrees of such views maintain that no proof can be offered "that there is or ever was any one community on earth recognised, or having any claim to be recognised as the universal Church, bearing rule over and comprehending all particular churches. They further allege that no accredited authority exists that is empowered to define or vary any registry of those decrees. They consider, therefore, that the Catholic Church is an invisible community Holy Family is the general title, in the language of art, of the various representations of the domestic life of the Virgin Mary and the infant Jesus and his attendants. In the early part of the Middle Ages, when the object was to excite devotion, the Mother and Child were usually the only persons represented. At a later period, Joseph, Elizabeth, St. Anna (the mother of the Virgin), and John the Baptist were included. Some of the old German painters have added the twelve apostles as children and playfellows of the infant Christ, as well as their mothers, as stated in the legends. The Italian school, with its fine feeling for composition, was the first to recognise how many figures the group must comprise if the interest is to remain undivided and be concentrated on one figure, whether that figure be the Madonna or the Child. Two masters are pre-eminent in this species of representation—Leonardo da Vinci and Raphael (Chambers). Mrs. Jameson (Legenda of the Madonna, p. 292 sq.) also insists on drawing a distinction between the domestic and the devotional treatment. The latter, she says, is a group in which the sacred personages are placed in direct relation to the worshippers, and their supernatural character is paramount to every other. The former, a group of the Holy Family so called, in which the personages are placed in direct relation to each other by some link of action or sentiment which expresses the family connection between them, or by some action which has a dramatic rather than a religious significance.

Holy Father. I. "The first person of the Trinity was represented as in Daniel's vision, vii, 9, and vested in a cope, and wearing a tiara. It was contrary to our Lord's declaration (John vi, 46), and indefensible."—Walcott, Sac. Archæol. p. 312. II. A title of the pope (q. v.).

Holy Fire, a ceremony in the Romish Church, observed on Holy Saturday (q. v.) of Easter, with especial pomp at Rome, where the pope himself is in attendance. A light is kindled by sparks struck from a flint, to commemorate Christ—according to the Missal—as the great corner-stone. This light is hailed by kneeling ecclesiastics as the "Light of Christ" (Lumen Christi), that all the lights in the chapel having been previously extinguished, be rekindled at the new fire. In the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, at the Easter of the Oriental Church, the Holy Fire is claimed to be miraculous. "The Greek and Armenian clergy combine on this occasion, and amidst processions, solemnities, an excited multitude, and scenes disgraceful not only to the name of religion, but to human nature, the expected fire makes its appearance from within an apartment in which a Greek and an Armenian bishop have locked themselves."

Holy Ghost (πνεῦμα Ἁγίου), the third person in the Trinity, proceeding from the Father and the Son, and equal with them in power and glory (see Vth ART. of Religion, Church of England, and IVth of Methodist Episcopal Church). For the significations of the original words rendered in the English version by 'Spirit,' "Holy Spirit," "Holy Ghost," see SPIRIT. The Scriptures teach, and the Church maintains, I. the procession; II. the Personality; and, III. the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. For the offices of the Holy Ghost, see Spirit, Holy; Paraclete; Witness of the Holy Spirit.

I. THE PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST.—The orthodox doctrine is, that as Christ is God by an eternal filiation, so the Holy Ghost is God by an eternal procession. He proceeded from the Father and from the Son. "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which procedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me" (John xvi, 13). He is the Spirit of the Father, he is the Spirit of the Son: he is sent by the Father, he is sent by the Son. The Father is never sent by the Son, but the Father sendeth the Son; neither the Father nor the Son is ever sent by the Holy Ghost, but he is sent by both. The Nicene Creed teaches, "And I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified." The Athanasian Creed, "The Holy Ghost is of the Father and of the Son, neither male, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding." Thaddæus and the Acts of Emperor Constantine say, "The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and the Son, very and eternal God." The term spiration was introduced by the Latin Church to denote the manner of proceeding. When Jesus imparted the Holy Ghost to his disciples, "he breathed upon them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost" (John xx, 22).

During the first three centuries there was nothing decided by ecclesiastical authority respecting the relations of the Holy Spirit to the Father and the Son. The Nicene Creed (A.D. 325) declared only that "the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father" (i.e. τὸν Ἱδρυότερον Ἰεροσολύμων, and the Greek fathers generally adhered to this view: so Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, Cyril of Alexandria, and others. Epiphanius added to the formula, ἵνα τὸν Ἰδρυότερον Ἰεροσολύμων, the explanatory clause, "and equal in power with the Father." That the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Son, the Church of the East held from the time of Novatian, and was admitted to the Nicene Creed, was retained in the Greek Church. But there were many in the Latin Church who maintained that the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Father only, but also from the Son. They appealed to John xvi, 13, and to the texts where the Holy Spirit is clearly and especially in the 7th and 9th verses, πάντα ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς, and at an earlier period by nearly all the Western churches. But as the Eastern Church still adhered substantially to the more ancient formula, it accused the Western Church of falsifying the Nicene symbol; and thus at different periods, and in the 7th and 9th centuries, violent controversies arose between them" (Knapp, Theology, § 43; Hey, Lectures on Divinity, vol. i.). The true causes of these dissensions were, however, very different from those which were alleged, and less animated, it seems, by zeal for the truth than by the mutual jealousies of the Roman and Byzantine Bishops. But, however, even the uncertainty that provoked these disputes, they terminated in the 11th century in an entire separa-
II. PERSONALITY OF THE HOLY GHOST.—1. Definition and History of the Doctrine.—A person is "a thinking, feeling, acting being," which has reason to reflect; a "singular, subsistent, intellectual being;" "an intelligent agent." As personality implies thought, reason, reflection, and an individual existence, distinct from that of other beings, when we speak of the personality of the Holy Ghost we mean his distinct and individual existence, his conscious being, his reflecting, reasoning spirit; it is represented throughout the Scriptures as a personal agent, and the earlier Christian writers so speak of him, though without any aim at dogmatic precision. It is the habit of some writers, opposed to the orthodox doctrine, to assert that not only was the doctrine of the Holy Ghost not precisely developed in the early period, but that it was not received. "On the contrary, the thorough investigations of recent times show plainly that the ante-Nicene fathers, with the exception of the Monarchians, and perhaps Lactantius, agreed in the two fundamental points that the Holy Ghost, the sole agent in the application of redemption, is a supernatural divine being, and that he is an independent person; closely allied to the Father and the Son, yet hypostatically different from them both" (Schaaff, CH. History, i, § 80). The first positive and dogmatic denial of the personality and deity of the Holy Ghost is ascribed to Tertullian, in his refutation of the Manichaeans; and he identifies the Holy Ghost simply as an operation of the divine mind, as the "exerted energy of God," or as an attribute only of the divine activity.

2. Proof of the Personality of the Spirit.—The Holy Spirit is represented in the New Testament not only as different from the Father and Son, and not only as the personification of some attribute of God, or of some effect which he has produced, but as a literal person (see Semler, Disp. Spiritum Sanctum recte describi personam). The proof of this is thus made out from the following texts: (1) From the texts John xiv, 16, 17; xv, 26. The Holy Spirit is here called πνεῦμα, not comforter, advocate, nor merely teacher, as Ernesti renders it, but helper, assistant, counsellor, in which sense it is used by Philo, when he says, God needs no πνεῦμα (monitor). Of the Paracletus, Christ says that the Father shall send him, and he shall remain with the Father, and shall come to him. The Paracletus, i.e. his Spirit shall remain in him, and shall be in him, to instruct his disciples. To these three subjects similar personal predicates are here equally applied, and the Paracletus is not designated by the abstract word ankhelion, but by the concrete auxiliarius; so that we have the Father who sent him, the Son in whose place he comes, and the Holy Spirit who is sent. His office is to carry forward the great work of teaching and saving men which Christ commenced, and to be to the disciples of Christ what Christ himself was while he continued upon the earth. John xv, 26 When the Paracletus shall come, whom I will send to you from the Father (I mean the Spirit—I. e. teacher—of truth, who proceeds from the Father), he will instruct you further in my religion; where it should be remarked that the phrase ἐκπορευεῖται πνεῦμα Πατρὸς means to be sent or commissioned by the Father. (2) 1 Cor. xii, 4-11, There are divers gifts, but the same Spirit; and one and the same Spirit (τὸ ίδίον Πνεύμα), from whom they all proceed. Here the ψυχισμα are clearly distinguished from the Spirit, who is the author of them. In verse 5 this same person is distinguished from Christ (οὶ Κύριοι), and in verse 6 from Θεός. In verse 11 it is said all these (various gifts) worketh one and the self-same Spirit, who imparteth to every man his own, as he will (εἰς αὐτὸν βοηθεῖται). (3) Those texts in which such attributes and works are ascribed to the Holy Spirit as can be predicated of no other than a personal subject. In John xvi, 15 sq., he is said to speak, to hear, to take, etc. So in 1 Cor. ii, 10, God hath revealed the doctrine of Christianity to us by his Spirit (πνεῦμα ἐν εἰς αὐτῷ), which style of expression is more perfect instruction. And this Spirit searches (ἰκανόν) all things, even the most secret divine purposes (βαθύς θεωρίς; comp. Rom. xi, 33 sq.); in his instruction, therefore, we may safely confide. The expressions, the Holy Spirit speaks, sends any one, appoints any one for a particular office, may be thus frequently in the Acts and elsewhere, show that the Holy Spirit was understood by the early Christians to be a personal agent (Acts xiii, 2, 4; xx, 28; xxi, 11 sq.). (4) The formula of baptism, Matt. xxviii, 19, and other similar texts, such as 2 Cor. xiii, 14, where Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are mentioned in a single act of consecration (xvi, 14), may now be used in proof of the personality of the Holy Spirit, since the other texts upon which the meaning of these depends have already been cited. From all these texts, taken together, we may form the following result: The Holy Spirit is represented in the Bible as a personal subject, and, as such, is distinguished from the Father and the Son. In relation to the human race, he is described as sent and commissioned by the Father and the Son, and as occupying the place which Christ, who preceded him, held. In this respect he depends (to speak metaphorically) as a younger brother of the Father (John xiv, 16) and upon the Son (John xiv, 16, 26; also xvi, 14, θεὸς οὗτοι λίγναρα; and in this sense he proceeds from them both, or is sent by them both. This may be expressed more literally as follows: The great work of converting, sanctifying, and saving men, which the Father commissioined to the Holy Ghost, is sent to be carried on by the Father and Son, through the Holy Spirit.

The objectors to this doctrine frequently say that the imaginative Orientalists were accustomed to represent many things as personal subjects, and to introduce them into the gods' speaking and acting; which, however, they themselves did not consider persons, and did not intend to have so considered by others; and to this Oriental usage they think that Christ and his apostles might here, as in other cases, have conformed. But, whenever Christ and his apostles spoke in figurative language, they always showed, by the explanation which they gave, that they did not intend to be understood literally. But they have given no such explanation of the language which they employ with regard to the Holy Spirit. We therefore fairly conclude that they intended that their language should be understood literally, otherwise they would have led their hearers astray instead of informing them the more so as they well knew that their readers and hearers were accustomed to personifications (Knapp, Theology, § 39).

The scriptural argument is thus logically developed by Watson. "1. The personality of the Holy Spirit in the sacred Trinity proves his personality. He proceeds from the Father and the Son, and cannot, therefore, be either. To say that an attribute proceeds and comes forth would be a gross absurdity. 2. Many passages of Scripture would be wholly unintelligible, and even absurd, unless the Holy Ghost is allowed to be a person. For as those who take the phrase as ascribing no more than a figurative personality to an attribute, make that attribute to be the energy or power of God, they reduce such passages as the following to utter unmeaningness: 'God anointed Jesus with the Holy Ghost and power and wisdom; and the favor of the Lord was with him:' that is, through the power of the Holy Ghost; 'and power'; that is, through the power of the Holy Ghost; 'in demonstration of the Spirit and power;' that is, demonstration of power and power. 3. Personification of any kind is, in some passages in which the Holy Ghost is spoken of, imposs-shall he speak.' What attribute of God can here be personified? And if the doctrine of the Gospel be arrayed with personal attributes, where is there an instance of so monstrous a prosopopeia as this passage would exhibit? the doctrine of the Gospel not speaking 'of himself,' but speaking 'whate'er he shall hear.' 'The Spirit maketh intercession for us.' What attribute of God is it, the first clause of the doctrine of the Gospel intercedes? Personification, too, is the language of poetry, and takes place naturally only in excited and elevated discourse; but if the Holy Spirit be a personification, we find it in the ordinary and cool strain of mere narration and argumentative discourse in the Gospels, where the personification is the most frequent utterance. 'Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost.' How impossible it is here to extort, by any process whatever, even the shadow of a personification of either any attribute of God, or of the doctrine of the Gospel. So again: 'The Spirit,' said unto Philip, 'Go near, and join thyself to this chariot.' Could it be any attribute of God which said this, or could it be the doctrine of the Gospel? Finally, that the Holy Ghost is a person, and not an attribute, is proved by the use of masculine pronouns and relatives in the New Testament, and in the three Persons in creative acts may be added a like association in acts of preservation, which has been well called a continued creation, and by that term is expressed in the following passage: 'These wait all upon thee, that thou mayest give them their meat in due season.' Thou hast divided their portion, and hast sealed their bounds by their blood, they die, and return to dust: thou sendest forth thy Spirit, they are created; and thou renewest the face of the earth.' (Ps. civ. 27-30.) It is not surely here meant that the Spirit by which the generations of animals are perpetuated is wind; and if he be called an attribute, wisdom, power, or both united, where do we read of such attributes being 'sent,' 'sent forth from God,' 'sent forth from God to create and renew the face of the earth?' (2.) The next association of the three Persons we find in the inspiration of the prophets: 'God spake unto our fathers by the prophets,' says Paul. He declares that these 'holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' (2 Pet. i. 21); and also that it was 'the Spirit of Christ which was in them' (1 Pet. i. 11). We may defy any Socinian to interpret these words of the Son of God by any mental operation or attribute, and thereby reducing the term Holy Ghost into a figure of speech. 'God,' in the first passage, is unquestionably God the Father; and the 'holy men of God,' the prophets, would then, according to this view, be moved by the influence of the Father: but the influence, according to the third passage, which was the source of their inspiration, was the Spirit or the influence of Christ.' Thus the passages contradict each other. Allow the Trinity in unity, and you have no difficulty in calling the Spirit, the Spirit of the Father, and the Spirit of the Son, or the Spirit of either; but if the Spirit be an influence, that influence cannot be the influence of two persons, one of them God and the other a creature. Even if they allowed the pre-existence of Christ, with Arians, these passages are inexplicable by the Socinians; but, denying his pre-existence, they have no subterfuge but to interpret 'the Spirit of Christ,' 'the Spirit which was in Christ,' 'the Spirit which was upon John,' 'the Spirit which was in Christ,' 'the Spirit which was in the Virgin Mary,' 'the Spirit which was in the Virgin Mary,' 'the Spirit which was in the Virgin Mary,' a puerile paraphrase; or 'the spirit of an anointed one, or prophet.' That is, the prophet's own spirit, which is just as gratuitous and as unsupported by any parallel as the former. If, however, the Holy Ghost be the Spirit of Christ, then the Spirit is the source of that prophetic inspiration under which the prophets spoke and acted. So the same Spirit which raised Christ from the dead is said by Peter to have preached by Noah while the ark was preparing; in allusion to the passage...

My Spirit shall not always strive (contend, debate) with man. This, we may observe, affords an eminent proof that the writers of the New Testament understood the phrase 'the Spirit of God,' as it occurs in the Old Testament, personally. For, whatever may be the full meaning of that difficult passage in Peter, Christ is clearly described in that baptism by the Spirit 'in the days of Noah; that is, he, by the Spirit, inspired Noah to preach. If, then, the apostles understood that the Holy Ghost was a Person, a point which will presently be established, we have, in the text just quoted from the book of Genesis, a key to the meaning of those texts in the Old Testament, that is, the page of the Spirit of God, 'the Spirit of God,' and 'the Spirit of the Lord,' occur, and inspired authority is thus afforded us to interpret them as of a Person; and if of a Person, the very effort made by Socinians to deny his personality itself indicates that that Person must, from the lofty titles and works ascribed to him, be necessarily divine. Such phrases occur in many passages of the Hebrew Scriptures; but in the following the Spirit is also eminently distinguished from two other Persons: 'And now the Lord God, and his spirit, hath sent me' (Isa. xlviii, 10): or, rendered better, 'hath sent me and his Spirit,' both terms being properly used in this case, as part of the title of the book of the Lord, and read; for my mouth it hath commanded, and his Spirit it hath gathered them' (Isa. xxxiv, 16). 'I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts, according to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so my Spirit remaineth among you' (Isa. xxxv. 5). 'For thus saith the Lord of hosts, the Lord hath been zealous for his land, and hath gathered all nations, and the Desire of all nations shall come' (Hag. ii, 4–7). Here, also, the Spirit of the Lord is seen collocated with the Lord of hosts and the Desire of all nations, who is the Messiah [according to the usual interpretation]. (3.) "Three Persons, and three only, are associated also, both in the Old and New Testament, as objects of supreme worship, and form the one divine 'name.' Thus the fact that, in the vision of Isaiah, the Lord of hosts, who spake unto the prophet, is, in Acts xxviii, 25, said to be the Holy Ghost, while John declares that the glory which Isaiah saw was the glory of Christ, proves indubitably that each of the three Persons bears this august appellation; it gives also the reason for the threefold repetition, 'Holy, holy, holy!' and it exhibits the prophet and the very seraphs in deep and awful adoration before the Throne of Lord of hosts; and the prophet and the seraphim were, therefore, worshippers of the Holy Ghost and of the Son, at the very time and by the very acts in which they worshipped the Father." 3. In the Apocololysis Beneficium, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, be with you all, Amen," the Holy Ghost is acknowledged, equally with the Father and the Son, "to be the source of the highest spiritual blessings; while the beneficence is, from its specific character, to be regarded as an act of prayer to each of the three Persons, and therefore is at once an acknowledgment of the divinity and personality of each. The same remark applies to Rev. i, 4, 5: 'Grace be unto you, and peace, from him which was, and which is, and which is to come; and from the seven spirits which are before his throne' (an emblematical reference, probably, to the golden branch with its seven lamps), 'and from Jesus Christ.' The style of this book sufficiently accounts for the Holy Spirit being called 'the seven spirits;' but no created spirit or company of created spirits is ever spoken of under that appellation; and the place assigned to the seven spirits, between the mention of the Father and the Son, indicates with certainty that one of the sacred Three, so eminent, and so exclusively eminent in both dispensations, is intended. 4. "The form of baptism next presents itself with demonstrative evidence on the two points before us, the personality and divinity of the Holy Spirit. It is the form of covenant by which the sacred Three become our one or only God, and we become his people: 'Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' In what manner is this text to be disposed of if the personality of the Holy Ghost is denied? Is the form of baptism to be so understood as to imply that baptism is in the name of God, and of the creature, and one attribute? The grossness of this absurdity suffices it, and proves that here, at least, there can be no personification. If all the Three, therefore, are persons, are we to have baptism in the name of one God and two creatures? This would be too near an approach to idolatry, or, at least, the pace of the Spirit and the Lord, 'the Spirit of God,' and 'the Spirit of the Lord,' occur, and inspired authority is thus afforded us to interpret them as of a Person; and if of a Person, the very effort made by Socinians to deny his personality itself indicates that that Person must, from the lofty titles and works ascribed to him, be necessarily divine. Such phrases occur in many passages of the Hebrew Scriptures; but in the following the Spirit is also eminently distinguished from two other Persons: 'And now the Lord God, and his spirit, hath sent me' (Isa. xlviii, 10): or, rendered better, 'hath sent me and his Spirit,' both terms being properly used in this case, as part of the title of the book of the Lord, and read; for my mouth it hath commanded, and his Spirit it hath gathered them' (Isa. xxxiv, 16). 'I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts, according to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so my Spirit remaineth among you' (Isa. xxxv. 5). 'For thus saith the Lord of hosts, the Lord hath been zealous for his land, and hath gathered all nations, and the Desire of all nations shall come' (Hag. ii, 4–7). Here, also, the Spirit of the Lord is seen collocated with the Lord of hosts and the Desire of all nations, who is the Messiah [according to the usual interpretation]. (3.) HOLY Ghost, Orders of. 1. Order of the Holy Ghost of Sassia (Order of the Holy Ghost de Montpellier), established in 1178 by Guido of Montpellier, according to the rule of St. Augustine for hospital knights. In 1294 the order obtained the Hospital di Sassin, in Rome, in which the superior of the order took his seat as grand master. Henceforth the members of the order were divided into hospital knights, with simple, and into regular canons, with solemn vows. Pius II abolished the knights in 1459 in Italy, but in France they survived. Having been restored in 1598, the order was divided into the degrees of Knights of Justice and Grace, Serving Brothers and Oblates, and in 1700 was changed into regular canons, who still exist. At an early period in the history of the order a female branch was established. 2. Sisters of the Holy Ghost of Poligny, established in 1212, and still continuing in France, a branch of the White Sisters. 3. Hospitalers (brothers and sisters) of the Holy Ghost in France, established in 1254 as a secular association, and connected with the Order of the Holy Ghost of Sassia. The sisters, on account of their dress commonly called the White Sisters, are still numerous; they are devoted to the nursing of the sick and the poor, and to the education of young girls. 4. Canons of the Holy Ghost, probably founded in Lorraine by Jean Herbert, and confirmed in 1588 by Sixtus V, are devoted to instruction. 5. The Society of Missionary Priests of the Holy Ghost was founded in 1700 by abbe Desplaces and Vincent le Barber for missions, seminaries, and the nursing of the sick; newly established in 1805; still exists, and is active in the foreign missionary fields of the Roman Catholic Church.

HOLY Grass (Hierochloa borealis), a grass about a foot high, of a brownish glossy lax panicle, found in the northern parts of Europe, has a sweet smell like that of vernal grass. In Iceland, where it is plentiful, it is used for scenting apartments and clothes. In some countries it is strewn on the floors of places of worship on holy-days, whence its name.

HOLY Handkerchief. "It is said that one of the women who followed Jesus to the crucifixion lent him her handkerchief to wipe the sweat and blood from his face, and that the impress of his features remained upon it. Of course, St. Veronica (q. v.) very carefully preserved the cloth, and it is now at Rome. Jesus, according to tradition, gave another handkerchief to Agbarinus (q. v.), king of Edessa, who had been restored to health by him. Veronica is only a mythical personage, the name being a hybrid compound signifying "true image."—Eadie, Eccles. Dict. p. 308. See CHRIST, IMAGES OF.

HOLY Innocents, a festival in commemoration of the slaughter of infant martyrs (at Bethlehem, Matt. ii, 16), of which the Greek menology and Ethiopic liturgy give the number at 40,000, is alluded to by the early Christian fathers, especially Ireneus and Cyprian, Origen and Augustine, as of memorial observance. In the 4th century, Prudentius celebrates it in the hymn "All hail, ye infant Martyr-Flowers," and, in connection with the Epiphany, also Fulgentius, in his homilies for the day. St. Bernard also alludes to them: "Stephani was a martyr before men, John before angels, but these before angels and God, confessing Christ by dying, not by speech, and their merit is known only to God." Violet was used on this day in memory of the sorrow of their mothers, and the Te Deum, Alleluia, and doxologies were forbidden. In England, at Norton (Worcestershire), "a muffled peal is rung to commemorate the slaughter, and then a peal of joy for the escape of the infant Christ; a half-muffled peal is rung at Minety, Maisemore, Leigh-on-Mendip, Wick, Rissington, and Pattington."—Welcott, Sacred Archæology, p. 313. HOLY LEAGUE. I. The name given to an offensive and defensive alliance contracted between the party of the Guises in France, king Philip II of Spain, the pope, the monks, and the French Parliament, in consequence of the edict of toleration of May 14, 1576. The object of the league was the overthrow of the Huguenot party in France, and of its chief, king Henry III, whom one of the Guises was to succeed on the throne. Duke Henry of Guise (surnamed Le Balafré) was the head of the league. In order to avoid the danger, Henry joined the anti-Protestant movement himself, and was thus led to renew the persecutions against the Huguenots. The war commenced in 1577, but soon ended by the peace of Bergerac. When the duke of Alençon died in 1584, leaving-René, duc de Navarre, a Protestant, as his heir, the league sprang again into existence under the influence of the adherents of the Guises, the strict Roman Catholic members of the Parliament, the fanatical clergy, and the ultra conservative party. The states, especially the sixteen districts of Paris (whence the association also took the name of Ligue des Six,), took an active part in it. A treaty was finally concluded with Spain, and signed at the castle of Joinville, Jan. 3, 1585, to prevent the accession of Henry of Navarre to the throne. The contracting parties also pledged themselves to the total uprooting of Protestantism in France and the Netherlands. The result of the league soon became manifest in the intolerant edict of Nantes in 1558, and led in 1587 to the war, known as the war of the three Henrys. (See FRANCE, vol. iii, p. 642.) Henry III having caused Henry of Guise to be arrested at Rochefort (1568), his brother, the Duke of Guise, became chief of the league. Henry III was in 1587 murdered near Paris in 1589, and the war continued until the abjuration of Henry IV in 1588. The pope having absolved him, the members of the league gradually joined the royal standard, and the party ceased to exist. HOLY SATURDAY. In some churches the Saturday before Easter is so called. See HOLY WEEK.

HOLY SCRIPTURE. See SCRIPTURE, HOLY.

HOLY SEPULCHRE. See SEPULCHRE OF CHRIST.

HOLY SEPULCHRE, Orders of. 1. A religious order in the Roman Catholic Church according to the rule of St. Augustine, founded in 1114 by the archdeacon (subsequently patriarch of Jerusalem) Arnold; according to others, it was founded in 1099 by Godfrey of Bouillon. It embraced regular canons and canonnaresses, was at one time established all through Europe, and received a new rule under Urban VIII. The canons became extinct soon after the renewal of their rule, but the canonnaresses still have a number of houses in France, Germany (Baden), and the Netherlands, and, living in strict seclusion, occupy themselves with the instruction and education of young girls. 2. The Order of Knights of the Holy Sepulchre in England, established in 1714; extinct since the 16th century. The knights were obliged to guard, at least during two years, the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem. 3. Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, an order founded very likely by pope Alexander VI to guard the Sepulchre, and at the same time to afford relief and protection to pilgrims to the Holy Land. Originally the pope was the grand master of the order, but he finally ceded this right to the "guardian father of the Holy Sepulchre." The knights must be, according to the rules of the order, of noble descent, ready at any time to give up their life, live, and die for the Roman Catholic faith, etc. But they enjoyed also extraordinary privileges, as exemption from taxation, permission to marry, possession of church property, etc. When Jerusalem was recaptured by the Turks, the knights of the Holy Sepulchre went to Perugia, in Italy. "After a temporary union with the Hospitaliers, the order was reconstructed in 1814 both in France and in Poland, and is still in existence within a very small circle of knights elected by the guardian father from the most respectable pilgrims who come to Holy Land.

HOLY SPEAR (Diá logh), as it is called in the Greek Church, is a kind of spear with a long handle, ending in a cross, "with which the altar-bread, called spragra or holy lamb, is cut out from the loaf for consecration by the priest, with a solemn form in the liturgy of the Church on Isa. iii. 78; John xix. 34."—Walcott, Sacred Archæol. p. 314.

HOLY SPIRIT. See SPIRIT, WORK OF THE; HOLY GHOST; PARACLETE; WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT.

HOLY SYNOD is the title in the Greek Church of the highest governing body.

HOLY TABLE, as it is called in some churches, is the table on which are placed the bread and wine, the appointed emblems of the Saviour's death. See ALTAR.

HOLY THURSDAY (called also Maundy Thursday, from sancdatum [commandment], the first word with which the Church services of the day begin), a day observed in some churches in commemoration of our Lord's ascension. In the Roman Calendar it is the thirty-ninth day after Easter Sunday. See ASCENSION DAY; HOLY WEEK.

HOLY UNION. See HOLY LEAGUE.

HOLY WARS. See CRUSADES.

HOLY WATER. In the Romish, as also in the Greek, Russian, and Oriental churches, denotes water blessed by a priest under certain religious uses. The theory of its first introduction seems to have been that water is a fitting symbol of purity, and accordingly, in most of the ancient religions, the use of lustral or purifying water not only formed part of the public worship, but also entered largely into the personal acts of sanctification prescribed to individual persons. The Jewish law also prescribed this, and it was a practice held in common by many Pagan nations (compare Riddle, Christ. Ant. p. 720). The sprinkling of the hands and face with water before... entering the sanctuary, still generally observed by the adherents to that law, was retained, or, no doubt, may have given rise to its adoption by the early Christian Church.
But its use was certainly for a very different purpose.
Thus bishop Marcellus ordered Equitius, his deacon, to sprinkle holy water, hallowed by its conveyance of ances and churches, to exorcise devils, which is said to have been done also by pope Alexander I. "Joseph, the converted Jew, Epiphanius says, used consecrated water in ex-orcism. Holy water was used in all benedictions of palm and olive branches, vestments, corporals, candles, household articles, by the clergy. By the cannon law it is mingled with salt. The Council of Nantes ordered the priest before mass to sprinkle the church court and close, offering prayers for the departed, and to give water to all who asked it for their houses, food, cattle, foster, fields, and vines. By the Captains of Charlemagne, Louis, and Lothaire, on Easter and Whitsun eves all the faithful might take, for purposes of asscription in their houses, consecrated water before its admixture with chrism (q.v.). In monasteries, a novice carried the holy water before the cross in procession (Walcott, Sac. Archæology, p. 814). In the Greek Church, to-day holy water is directed to be made of pure spring water, with the admixture of a little consecrated salt. This water (generally placed at the entrance of places of worship, and sanctified by a solemn benediction, prescribed in the diocesan ritual) the Romanist has consecrated with the most solemn regard, and it is used not merely for the sprinkling of persons on entering and leaving the church, but also in sprinkling books, bells, etc., and it is frequently taken to their homes, as having some peculiar virtue. Its use has thus become nothing more than a charm. In the Greek Church, holy water is usually consecrated by the bishop or his vicar-general on the eve of the Epiphany. No salt is employed, and they regard the use of it by the Latinas as a grievous and unauthorized corruption. The Greeks perform the ceremony on January 6, the day on which they believe that Christ was baptized by St. John, and twice a year it is usual to drink a portion, viz. at the end of the midnight mass of Christmas and on the feast of Epiphany. In the Armenian Church, holy water is consecrated by plunging a cross into it on the day of the Epiphany, after which it is distributed among the conçgregation, who take it to their homes. The Rites of Würtemberg, made on this occasion form a considerable portion of the emoluments of the Armenian priesthood. On the practice of using water for baptism, see Baptism, vol. i, p.
650.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. vili, ch. iii, § 67; Edie-um, p. 389, 595; Chambers, Cyclop., vol. vi. For monor-

Holy-water Sprinkler, "the aspergill, a brush for scattering holy water. A horrible Tuder mace, with radiating spikes, was called the morning star, or sprinker." —Walcott, Sacred Archæology, p. 814.

Holy-water Stock (i.e. pillar) or Stoup (i.e. bucket). A stationary stone basin (any porous substance which could not suck it up was to be carefully avoided) for water, placed at the entrance of the house of worship, called by the French "bénitier." Pope Leo III erected one at Ostia. "The stoup is found in all personal or architectural, or in the porch, or standing on a pedestal." The vessel used by the Temple priests was a brazier layer (see lsa. i, 16; ii, 11, 2: Exod. xxx, 30; 2 Cor. vii, 1; Psal. ii, 7, 7.)—Walcott, Soc. Archæology, p. 514 sq.

Holy-water Vat (French, bénitier; Latin, sinula, vas), a vessel in which the holy water was carried about, and which, according to Micrologus, was first consecrad by pope Alexander V, as Cranner says, to "fear in remembrance of our baptism, and the blood of Christ for our redemption, sprinkled on the cross." Edie says "this vessel was termed ama or annula. Du Cange recognises asperosol, aspergilium, and asperserium as the vessels from which the priests sprinkled the water, and spaudalium as that which held it. The first three are plainly the same as the πιπέρας of pagan-lism." The fixed holy-water stoup (q.v.) was used by those who came to late in church to receive the as-sprinkler by the priest and water carried in the portable vat, which in the churches of the West represented the bodily ablution made by the Oriental Christians."—

Acrionary, p. 313.

Holy Week, the last week of Lent (q.v.), i.e. the week before Easter, and specially devoted to commemorating the sufferings and death of Christ. In English use, it is also called Passion Week (a name appropriated, in later use, to the week before Easter on Sunday). This institution is of very early origin, and was "formerly called the 'Great Week,' and in medieval times the 'Authentic,' with the same meaning; in Ger-
