The oldest inscriptions now known to us are the Chiinese, which precede to B.C. 2278. Those of India date only back to B.C. 815, the age of Sandarco-tus; but it has been thought that the hieroglyphical inscriptions of Central America and of Mexico may prove to be of much older date than those of China even. The Egyptian inscriptions are generally acknowledged to be as old as B.C. 2000; next in order come the Assyrian and Babylonian, reaching nearly as high an antiquity, and then follow the Persian, and Median, and Phemician, all of about B.C. 700, while the Greek date only to B.C. 500 and 690, and the Etruscan and Roman to no remote date than the Indian, i. e. B.C. 400-300.
The most remarkable of all the known inscriptions are the trilingual inscription of Rosetta, that of Shalmanezer on the obelisk of Nimrud, and the cylinder of Semacherib; the trilingual inscription of Darius I on the rock at Behistum; the Greek inscription of the Roman triumph of Pamiethicus at Ipsambool, and the bronze helmet dedicated by Hiero I to the Olympic Jupiter; the inscription on the coffin of the Cyprian king Asmmazzer; the Etruscan inscription called the Euboea Tables; that of Marathon, the conquest of Asia Minor, and the will of Augustus at Ancyra; the inscription of the Ethiopian monarch Silico; the old monument of Yu, and the inscription of Se-gan-fu, recording the arrival of Christianity in China (A.D. 651); the inscriptions of Chandara-gupta and Asoka in India.

1. Egyptian Hieroglyphics. — These are at once the most ancient, the most copious, and the most instructive of all relics of this description extant. The Egyptian iums used three modes of writing: (1) the Enchorial or Demotic, the common language of the country; (2) the Hieratic, peculiar to the priests; and (3) the Hieroglyphic. Hieroglyphics, again, are of three kinds:
(1) Phonetic, when the hieroglyphic stands for a letter;
(2) Emblematic or Symbolic, when it is an emblem or symbol of the thing represented; (iii.) Figuretate, when it is a representation of the object itself. The annexed engraving will give some idea of the four different kinds of Egyptian characters; by this it will be seen that in some cases the derivation of the demotic character is to be traced, through its various gradations, from the originall pure hieroglyphic, while in others the resemblance is utterly lost. We illustrate this subject by a few examples, pointing out the various meanings attached to the Egyptian characters under different circumstances. The names of the gods were in general expressed by symbols and not by letters: "in the same manner, the Jews never wrote at full length the ineffable name of Jehovah, but always expressed it by a short mark, which they pronounced Adoni." These representations were of two kinds: figuretate, in which the name of the deity is implied by the form in which he was represented in his statue, and symbolic, in which a part of the statue, or some object having a reference to the deity, was employed, as for instance:

!Hieroglyphic Symbols

Many words were also expressed by symbols, of which the following are examples:

Dr. Young and Mr. Tattam have satisfactorily shown that all that has come down to us of the language and literature of ancient Egypt is contained in the Coptic, Sahidic, or Upper Country, and the Baemurcan-Coptic dialects, and in the enchorial, hieratic, and hieroglyphic inscriptions and MSS.; and it is a point that cannot be too much insisted upon, that a previous knowledge of the Coptic is absolutely necessary to a correct understanding of the hieroglyphics. See Hieroglyphics.

These inscriptions are found abundantly on the variumous monuments still remaining in Egypt, especially in the tombs and palaces of the several kings. They are found either alone, as documentary records, e. g. on the obelisks and columns; or oftener in connection with pictorial representations of public or private scenes, very rarely, as in the famous Rosetta Stone, with interlinear translations in the corresponding Egyptian or a foreign language. See Egypt.

II. Assyrian Cuneiform.—These characters, like the Egyptian hieroglyphics, are usually inscribed upon slabs concerning scenes of war, sieges, festivals, dedications of martial hunting, or other scenes. See Cuneiform. The most noted places where they occur are at Behistun, Khorsobad, Koyunjik, and Nimrud. See each in its order.
All the great halls of the various palaces are surrounded in the interior with sculptured slabs set into the walls, and covered with representations of the great historical events of the reign of the respective kings, such as battles, sieges, diversions, the festivals, the building of towns, and of mounds for palaces and temples, processions of captives, caravans bearing tribute from subjected nations, or presents from vassal kings, or taxes from the various districts of the empire, etc.

Several hundreds of these have been removed, taken down the Euphrates, and shipped home to England, and set up in the British Museum, and that of the Louvre at Paris. These slabs vary in size from three to seven feet in breadth, and from five to eleven feet in height; and a part even reach thirteen and fifteen feet. Some of them have been brought to our own country, and pre-mitted to Amherst and other colleges. Many have become, as it were, leaves in the Assyrian history. Each chamber, in fact, is a volume; for not only do we have the sculptures, but also inscriptions in a cuneiform or wedge-form letter, which furnishes a commentary on the event a hint given by the artist. Greatly as we have already been made in deciphering this language, as we have stated elsewhere, and we have most wonderful and interesting additions to our knowledge of ancient Nineveh (q. v.).

III. Phoenician Records.—These are very fragmentary and imperfect. They are in characters closely resembling the old Hebrew. Most of them have been diligently collected and expounded by Gesenius in his Monumenta Phocincia (Lpz. 1837). See Phoenicia.
A very interesting inscription relating to the history of one of the early Moabite kings has lately been discovered. See Moab.

IV. Sinoic Inscriptions.—Wady Mokatteh, the cliffs of which bear these inscriptions, is a valley entering wady Shiek, and bordering on the upper regions of the Sini Mountains. It extends for about three hours' march; and in most places its rocks present abrupt cliffs one or thirty feet high. From these cliffs large masses have separated and lie at the bottom in the valley. The cliffs and rocks are thickly covered with inscriptions, which are continued, at intervals of a few hundred paces only, for at least the distance of two hours. Bunsen says that to copy all of them would occup'y a skilful draughtsman six or eight days.

The inscriptions are very rudely executed, sometimes with large letters, at others with small, and seldom with straight lines. The characters appear to be written from right to left; and, although not cut deep, an inscription on a large stone must have been required, as the rock is of considerable hardness. Some of them are on rocks at a height of twelve or fifteen feet, and must have required a ladder to ascend to them. The characters were not known. The superior of the Franciscans, who visited the place in 1722, observes: "Although we had among us men who understood the Arabic, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Coptic, Latin, Armenian, Turkish, English, Illyrian, German, and Bohemian languages, there was not one of us who had the slightest knowledge of the characters engraved in these hard rocks with great labor in a country where there is nothing much to eat or to drink. Hence it is probable that these characters contained some profound secrets, which, long before the birth of Jesus Christ, were sculptured in these rocks by the Chaldeans or other some others."

This account excited profound attention in Europe; and it was thought by many that copies must have been formed by the Israelites during their stay in this region, and probably contained irrefragable evidence for the truth of the Mosaic history. Hence copies of them have been anxiously sought and secured; but, with the exception of a few in Greek, the character and language were perfectly unknown, although Be'er-David, says "greater progress than has yet been attained must be made in the paleography and ancient languages of the East. The most general opinion is that they were the work of pilgrims who visited Sinai about the 6th century." This seems to us very doubtful. The Greek inscriptions and the crosses, on which this conclusion chiefly rests, may indeed have been of that or a later age; but it does not follow that those in the unknown characters necessarily were so too.—Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on Job xix, 24. Rev. Charles Forster contends that they are records of the Israelites on their way from Egypt to Palestine (Sinai Photographed, London, 1862, &c.). Better opportunities than had formerly been at the command of casual travellers were enjoyed by captain Palmer, a member of the expedition now employed in making a complete and exhaustive survey of the physical features and condition of the Sinaic region. His collection of transcripts from wady Mokattab and other localities exceeds 1500 in number, and he was much aided in the study of their meaning by finding several undoubted bilingual inscriptions where the Greek and Sinaic characters occur together, and express the same meaning. The result of four months' steady devotion to this object has given a complete alphabet of the latter, so that captain Palmer can read and interpret any of the inscriptions with ease. Both the alphabet and language must have been employed by a late Semitic people—"in all probability a commercial community who inhabited, or at least colonized, the Peninsula for the first few centuries of the Christian era." That many of the writers were Christians is proved by the numerous Christian signs used by them; but it is equally clear, from internal evidence, that a large proportion of them were pagans. It is interesting to note that captain Palmer's researches were pursued without the knowledge of professor Beers's studies, though they mainly corroborate each other, and he bears testimony to the professor's acuteness and penetration. A writer in the Princeton Review (Oct. 1870), after giving the history of the discovery and decipherment of these inscriptions, thus concludes: "It seems to be ascertained that the writers were natives of Arabia Petraea, inclusive of the Sinaic peninsula; and, whether they were subjects of the kingdom centring in Petra or not, they made use of the language and the mode of writing current there. They were neither Jews nor Christians, but worshippers of heathen deities, and particularly of the heavenly bodies. They were mostly pilgrims on their way to certain celebrated sanctuaries, which were for centuries resorted to at special seasons by the pagans resident in this region. The inscriptions in the old native character belong to the period immediately preceding and following the Christian era; and they come down to the time when the Gospel and the Christian Church penetrated these localities, supplanted heathenism, and suppressed its sanctuaries. They then yield to legends in Greek and Latin, and even more recent tongues, the work of Christians, who, in imitation of their heathen predecessors, have left the record of their pilgrimage to hallowed spots gravend on the same imperishable works." Hence we find crosses and other marks of Christianity mingled in the pagan names and symbols. Similar inscriptions have been found scattered, but not so profusely, nor in such confusion, in various other portions of the Sinaic peninsula, and even in the outskirts of Palestine. (See the literature in the Princeton Review, ut sup.) See SINA.

INSCRIPTIONS, CHRISTIAN. There are but few Christian inscriptions that remain extant from an early date, but these few yet suffice to convey to us a pretty accurate idea of the history of the early Christian Church, and of the customs and belief of the first followers of the Lord Jesus Christ. "They express," says Maitland, in his justly celebrated and now quite rare work on The Church in the Catacombs (Lond. 1846, 8vo, p. 13), "the feelings of a body of Christians whose leaders alone are known to us in history. The fathers of the Church live in their voluminous works; the lower orders are only represented by these simple records, from which, with scarcely an exception, sorrow and complaint are banished; the boast of suffering, or an appeal to the revengeful passions, is nowhere to be found. One expresses faith, another hope, a third charity. The genius of primitive Christianity, 'to believe, to love, and to suffer,' has never been better illustrated. These 'serious in stones' are addressed to the heart, and not to the head, to the feelings rather than to the taste; and possess additional value from being the work of the purest and most influential portion of the 'catholic and apostolic Church' then in existence." In the early years of the Christian Church the inscriptions were, with few exceptions, confined to the memory of deceased persons and to sacred objects.

1. The custom of tomb-stone inscriptions was borrowed by the early Christians from the Romans and Greeks; they simplified them, however, very much, and indicated the Christian knowledge, life, and rank of the deceased partly by significant symbols, partly by written signs, words, and expressions. These symbols, as they are found in Italy, France, and along the coasts of the Rhine, pertain partly to the designation of the Redeemer by means of pictorial representations, partly to the life after death, hope for the same through Christ and the cross. The name of Christ, their Lord and Master, is, as would be expected of his followers, everywhere the most prominent, and is "repeated in an endless variety of forms, and the actions of his life are figured in every degree of rudeness of execution." But remarkable it certainly is, that in the inscriptions contained in the Lapidarian Gallery, selected and arranged under papal superintendence, containing one of the largest, if not the largest collection of Christian inscriptions, there are no prayers for the dead (unless the forms "May you live," "May God refresh you," "be so constituted"); no addresses to the Virgin Mary, nor to the apostles or earlier saints; and, with the exception of "eternal sleep," "eternal home," etc., no expressions contrary to the plain sense of Scripture. Neither is the second person of the Trinity viewed in the Jewish light of a temporal Messiah, nor is he degraded to the Socinian estimate of a mere example, but he is ever represented as invested with all the honors of a Redeemer. On this subject there is no reserve, no heathenish suppression of the distinguishing feature of the Christian religion as professed by the evangelical sects. On stones innumerable appears the good Shepherd, bearing on his shoulders the recovered sheep, by which many an illiterate believer expressed his sense of personal salvation. One, according to his epitaph, "sleep in Christ;" another is buried with a prayer that "she may live in the Lord Jesus." But most of all, the cross in its simplest form is employed to testify the faith of the deceased; and whatever ignorance may have prevailed regarding the letter of Writ, or the more mysterious doctrines contained in it, there seems to have been no want of apprehension of that sacrifice "whereby alone we obtain remission of our sins, and are made partakers of the kingdom of heaven" (Maitland, Church in the Catacombs, p. 14, 15). One of the principal symbols used in referring to Christ is a monogram of the initial letters of the Greek name Χριστός. Most generally it is found to be composed of X and ρ, the latter placed in the heart of the former. Strange to say, we preserve in our own language a vestige of this figure in writing Xmas and Xian, which can only be explained by supposing the first letter to stand for the Greek X, the face of a monogram of Christ's name is copied from Maitland, p. 166, and was originally taken from the Lapidarian Gallery. The α and ω reversed in this epitaph refer to the well-known passages in the Apocalypse: their continued use proves the general reception of that book as a part of the inspired canon. The α and ω [see article on Apokalypse] are mentioned by Prudentius as well as by Tertullian, who regarded them as mysteriously containing the signification that in Christ rest the beginning and end of all spiritual life (De monogram, c.c.). From the ignorance of the sculptor, the entire symbol was sometimes inverted, as in the opposite figure (also from Maitland, p. 167). A change was afterwards made by the decussation (as it is technically termed) of the X, by which the figure of a cross was produced. Having once arrived at this happy coincidence, the monogram remained stationary. Its simple outline, thus chiselled on a grave-stone (from the Lapidarian Gallery), or accompanied by the misplaced letters, or even converted into "Pas," as if for Pasitos, D·M·N· ELEI ΠASA

SORIAO.

Read: "To our great God—Elias to Soricius, In Christ," was in course of time ornamented with jewels; and the monogramma gemmata took its place as a work of art among Christian bas-reliefs of the 4th century. The best specimen in the Lapidarian Gallery Maitland refers to the Emperor Constantine, and that, as is generally believed, it was first seen by him in the so greatly celebrated miraculous vision, which resulted in his conversion to the Christian religion. An epitaph, such as the subjunctive, discovered by Bonio, may be well assigned to that time, when the motto "In hoc vincies" might have become common.

IN HOC VINCIES

SINFONIA ET FILIS

V·AN·XLVIII M·V·D III

"In this thou shalt conquer—In Christ. Sinfonia, also for her sons. She lived forty-eight years, five months, and four days."

The next is contained in Oderici:

IN VICTRIX

which probably signifies,

"Victrix (a woman's name), victorious in Christ."

But the epitaphs of Alexander and Marius, martyrs under Adrian and Antonine, also exhibit the monogram: "and though," says Maitland, "they do not appear to have been executed at the time, they contain strong marks of belonging to a period of violent persecution." Gaetano Marni, however, asserts that the earliest monogram belongs to the year 381, i.e., six years after the Council of Nice.

A cut from a stamp of Boldetti. The P (r) of the monogram also serves as a p in the words spro Der. It is to be read, "My hope is in God Christ."

The only resemblance to the monogram used by the heathen was the ceramium, or symbol of lightning. The Egyptian cross appears to be an abbreviation of the Nilometer.

CELIX ET CEREALIS PATRI BENEM.
QVIXIT ANNIS LXXXV M VIII D V DORMIT IN PACEM.

Transliterate: "The mark of Christ. Cellix and Cerealis to their deserving father," etc.

For the assertion that the monogram was a symbol of martyrdom, and signified "for Christ," there seems to be not the least authority. In many inscriptions we read, however, in X: as in

IN X ASELYS D.

"Aelius sleeps (or is buried) in Christ." Prudentius informs us that the name of Christ, "written in jewelled gold, marked the purest laureum, and sparkled from the helmets" of the army of Constantine; but this is, in all probability, only a poetical fiction (Liber i, contra Symmachum). Only in the later inscriptions, as far down as the Middle Ages, as in a Cologne inscription (Centr. 100), are found the words initium et finis. The monogram with the two letters is there sometimes surrounded by a circle or a wreath. The symbols, however, were used more frequently than any other, and of these the fish (ἰχθύς), which is often found in different forms upon the same stone, was no doubt suggested by the initials which contains of the formula Ιησοῦς Χριστός Θεοῦ Υἱός Σωτήρ (Jesus Christ, Son of God, the Saviour), a sentence which had been adopted from the Sibylline verses. Moreover, the phonetic sign of this word, the actual fish, was an emblem whose meaning was entirely concealed from the uninitiated—an important point with those who were surrounded by foes ready to ridicule and blaspheme whatever of Christianity they could detect. Nor did the appropriateness of the symbol stop here. "The first," observed Tertullian, "seems a fit emblem of him whose spiritual children are, like the offspring of fishes, born in the water of baptism." Sometimes the word ἰχθύς was expressed at length, as in the two following (Ladidian Gallery):

IKYOC
PASTORI QV X A N III
NNIS X
IXYOC

The first contains the mistake of χ for χ. At other times the fish itself was figured, as recommended by Clement of Alexandria (Pedagog. iii, 106), who, besides the fish, proposed as Christian emblems for signets fishermen, anchors, ships, doves, and myras.

This specimen Maltland also copied from the Ladidian Gallery.

In a metrical Grecian inscription at Antrim, Christ himself, at the supper, is called ἰχθύς. Usually, however, it is the fisherman, who is Christ himself; he who also called the apostles to become the fishermen of men (Matt. iv, 19; Mark i, 17). Clement observes that it refers to the apostle Peter, and the boys who were drawn out of the water (of baptism). To these the anchor is added, which, as early as the letter to the Hebrews (vi, 19), is made the symbol of hope resting in the centre of holiness (comp. Mai Inscrip. Chr. p. 472, 4; 415, 3; 428, 7; 430, 10; 449, 4; 460, 6). Less frequently we find the IV. Q q sailing ship, e. g., upon an inscription of Firmia Victoria, in the porch of Maria in Trastevere, in Rome, and (Mai, Inscrip. Chr. p. 430, 6) upon the tomb-stone of a certain virgin named Serenilla. The same is also found in the Vatican. Clement calls it ναεις ὁπανοςματίας, "the ship hastening heavenwards." The lyre, as far as we know, does not occur on tomb-stones. The lyre is perhaps an ideal picture of the harmony which reigns in the Christian soul, or is used instead of Orpheus, by whom also Christ was represented. The dove, also specified by Clement, and the olive-branch, are more numerous, as the symbols of love and peace. The word peace is added to this fac-simile from the Ladidian Gallery.

The olive-branch which it bears is borrowed from the history of Noah: it was sometimes carried in the claws of the bird, as in the copy below given, which is taken from the Vatican library.

BIB BEOVENE MERENTI
"To Bibbenus, the well-deserving." DECEMBER 8 EVIVO FECIT SIBI BISOMYM.

"In Christ. December, while living, made himself a Bisomym." Clemen, among other things, forbids Christians to carry pitchers and swords upon their rings. The pitcher, with or without handle, does occur, however, frequently in Rome, Trier, and elsewhere, on Christian graves, usually between two doves. Whether this symbol refers to the doves drinking from a bowl, or whether it points to the water of life which is to refresh the thirsty soul, is not known. Instead of the sword, the axe occurs a few times on Christian tomb-stones: thus in Rome, at the church Nereo ed Achille, in the Palazzo Guicelmi, several times at Aringhi, etc. They are most probably a concealed representation of the cross, whose form they somewhat resemble. The Christians could use this symbol more readily, because it was also used by the heathens as dedicatio sub aescis. In addition to these, we find the seven-armed candelstick, which occurs in the cloister of St. Paola at Rome and elsewhere upon Jewish tomb-stones, but also upon Christian basilisks of Rome; not so frequently on graves, e. g. Mai, Inscrip. Chr. p. 406, 4. The lamb occurs seldom, e. g. Mai, Inscrip. Chr. p. 401, 3; the same, between two doves, p.
The balance occurs twice at Aringhi; and upon private sarcophagi, representations of the good shepherd, Old and New Testament histories, etc. Besides these, there are a few occasional allusions to the name of the deceased, when the anchor is cast.

A voyage, when the anchor is cast.

used by Peter. "So shall an entrance be ministered unto you abundantly," generally referred to the prosperous entrance of a vessel into port. "The ignorance displayed by the sculptor is scarcely to be accounted for, excepting by the circumstance that the traffic on the Tiber was confined to barges supplied with sails and steered by steersmen, and towed by horses. The peacock is said to have been used as an emblem of immortality. This idea was borrowed from the pagans, who employed it to signify the apotheosis of an emperor: for this purpose it was let fly from the funeral pile on which his body was consumed. The triumph was also adopted by the Christians with the same intention; so, also, the crowned horse, as a sign of victory." The supposed emblems of martyrdom, such as a figure praying, a crown, or a palm branch, which generally belong to this class, are borrowed from paganism, with additional significance in Christian cases, especially on account of the mention of it in the book of Revelation. "On the strength of some expressions there used, antiquarians of later times have taken it for granted that the early Church employed both the crown and palm, or either separately, as emblems of martyrdom." This idea of nature has been abandoned from want of proof; and such a fragment as the following, found in the cemetery of St. Priscilla (Lapidarian Gallery), is now only supposed to belong to the epitaph of an ordinary Christian:

ESV

The crown and palm conjoined are also met with in the present example, from the Vatican library, they encircle the monogram, as represented below:

- FL. JOVINA - QVAE - VIX
ANNS - TRIBVS - D - XXX NEOPITA - IN PACE - XI - K

"Flavia Jovina—who lived three years and thirty days—neophyte—alive in peace. (She died) the eleventh Kalendar..."

The extreme youth of the neophyte, while it proves the custom of infant baptism, makes the martyrdom of Jovina improbable. "The notice of death is various in the heathen inscriptions. Occasionally occurs D.M. (de membra); instead of that, also B.M., i.e. bone memoria. The beginning formula usually is hic quiesci, or requiescit in pace; in the Greek, ὁ δὲ κεῖται ἡμών οἱ ταῦτα ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου πάσχοντα, dormit in pace, φεβεράς ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ γεγενημένος, in sīpiās longe, etc. etc. etc. In the name of the deceased in the nominative or dative, with and without in pace, is sīpiās."

Quite remarkable, however, is the distinguishing feature of Christian inscriptions of the early centuries, and especially in such mon creating from pagan inscriptions, viz. in its use of names. "While the heathen name consisted of several essential parts, all of which were necessary to distinguish its owner, the Christians in general confined themselves to that which they had received in baptism." But as some of the converts came from Roman families, it was quite natural for them to retain their Gentile and other names, yea, genuine heathen names, and thus even the names of heathen gods occur, e.g. Azizos, the name of a Syriac godess, we find in Trier (Centralium, ili, 58) given as the name of a Syriac Christian. Also Artemis, Marii, Marcellus, Epaphras, Victor, Herodes, Vespasianus, names united with Sabatia, Sabatius, Nundina, and Dominica, taken in a great measure from the names of the days of the week. But the desire to simplify names, and to give them an ethical significance, is none the less noticeable even among the Roman converts; for while it is true that their part in life was to be spent in their world then world for a person to have six, eight, or ten names, in Christian inscriptions (the name given at the time of baptism being always preferred) but one or two names generally occur. The name was, as a rule, taken in view of facts universally believed to be desirable, whether with regard to life: Vitalis, Vitalius, Vitalisissimus, Viventius, Zoes, etc.; in view of fortune: Felicio, Fortunio, Fortunula, Felicianissima, Faustina, Prosper, Successus, Eutyches, etc.; of joy: Gaudentius, Gaudiosus, Hilario, Hilarianus, Jucunda, Eadone; of victory: Victor, Vincentius, Nicer, Pancratius; of strength: Virissimus, Fortissima, Alcinus, Dynamice, of faith: Theophistus, Fidelis; of hope: Spes, Helpis, Eplidia; of love: Phileus, Philumena, Agape, Agapetus, Caritosa; of spiritual blessing: Dorotheus, Theodorus, Theodos, Theodulus, Timothea, Theophilus, and various others. The kingdom of nature has been passed over in the account. In months: Januarius, Februarius, Aprilis, Decembrin; animals, plants, employment of rural life, etc. Of Old Testament names few are found, e.g. Susanna, Daniel, and Daniel; of New Testament names, Maria, Petrus, Paulus, and under the designation of national names, e.g. e.g. Agrippa, Bithia, and others, are appended to our purpose. After the name of the deceased there is frequently appended a short statement of his Christian position, views, or habits which distinguished him in civil life. He is called a neophyte (once in alius), a believer (fidelis), i.e. one who is really accepted: martyrs, discor, exorcistas, subdiscor, etc.; child, virgin, man, wife; anima dulcis, miss innocence anima or exemplum, dulcis apsiissimis insens et visageta et verbis dulcisissima cunctis, filius innocentissimam, dulcisissimus, bonus, sapiens, omnibus honorificissimam et nomen, deo fideli et dicitur marito, nutritie familias, cunctis humiles, placita pura corde, anmatrix paupere, ab acatis ab omni maligna re, etc. The most common form is bene merens. Then follows the age, with a qui vixit or in seculo, ζωαν, ζωας, either with an accurate account of the years, months, and days, or merely about the time, with the additional statement plus minus, spavdot Vesper. Then that day of burial, with a depositis or deposito, not seldom the fastis for the year; sometimes, also, the announcement of the person who erected the stone (titulam posuit or posuerunt), and of his suffering (doles, contra votum, etc.). Of course this arrangement is not always followed. Sometimes we find following the name a motto, such as ζωαν, vivas in Christo, in deo vivas, vivas in domino, spex paix tibi, accepts

The language is largely corrupted, the Latin degenerating into the Roman, but for this reason is very important. In grammar we find Latin words written in Greek letters, or mixed inscriptions in both languages. When written in poetry, the hexameter or distich measure is commonly used, and yet they are rhythmical rather than metrical. In such rhythmical inscriptions we find extension of thought not for form sake. The manuscripts from which the inscriptions were made consists of small, plain marble slabs, either laid upon the grave or put into the coffin. Sometimes, to designate the death of martyrs, there occur vessels of blood and the instruments of death; also glasses, etc.

4. The definition which Dr. Knapp gives of inspiration is one which most will readily adopt. He says: "It may be best described, in the terms of the Scriptures themselves, as an extraordinary divine agency upon teachers while giving instruction, whether oral or written, by which they were taught what and how they should write or speak." The nature, permanence, and completeness of this inspiration are matters upon which orthodox believers have differed. (See below.)

II. The Fact of the Inspiration of the Bible.—(On this point we condense the arguments of Dr. Leonard Woods in Kitto's Cyclopaedia, n. v., confining ourselves chiefly to the question of the inspiration of the written word.) To prove that the Scriptures are divinely inspired, it might with propriety refer to the excellence of the doctrines, precepts, and promises, and other instructions which they contain; to the simplicity and majesty of their style; to the agreement of the different parts, and the scope of the whole; especially to the full discovery they make of man's fallen and ruined state, and the way of salvation through a Redeemer; together with their power to enlighten and sanctify the heart, and the accompanying witness of the Spirit in believers. But the more direct and conclusive evidence that the Scriptures are divinely inspired, is the agreement of the writers themselves. As the writers did, by working miracles and in other ways, sufficiently authenticate their divine commission, and establish their authority and infallibility as teachers of divine truth, their testimony, in regard to their own inspiration, is entitled to our full confidence. Our best and most conclusive testimony to the Godhead is the writings of the writers themselves. As the writers did, by working miracles and in other ways, sufficiently authenticate their divine commission, and establish their authority and infallibility as teachers of divine truth, their testimony, in regard to their own inspiration, is entitled to our full confidence. attributive of the subject. But this rendering is liable to insipid objections. For θύτατοσσος and ὄφελμός are connected by the conjunction καὶ, and must both be predicates, if either of them is; and unless one of them is a predicate there is no complete sentence. Hender-sen remarks that the mode of construction referred to is "a variant with a common rule of the τὸ αὐτὸ καὶ τὸ αὐτὸ" which shows that those two relatives are closely joined, as θύτατοσσος and ὄφελμός here are, if there be an eclipse of the substantive verb ἱερί, this verb must be supplied after the former of the two, and regarded as repeated after the latter. Now there exists parallelism of the kinds of wh in the case, and as there is nothing in the context which would lead to any exception to the rule, we are bound to yield to its force."

He adds that "the evidence in favor of the common rendering, derived from the fathers, and almost all the versions, is most decided." It cannot for a moment be admitted that the apostle meant to signify that divine inspiration belongs to a part of Scripture, but not to the whole; or that he meant, as Semler supposes, to furnish a criterion by which to judge whether any work is inspired or not, namely, its utility. "That author proceeds feebly to apply this criterion to the books of the Old Testament, and to call them inspired as not possessing the requisite marks of legitimacy. Many of the German divines adopt Semler's hypothesis." But it is very manifest that such a sense is not by any means suggested by the passage itself, and that it is utterly preposterous. The language of the case is very much like it, not Christ nor any one of his apostles ever intimates a distinction between some parts of Scripture which are inspired and other parts which are not inspired. The document which is plainly asserted in the text under consideration, and which is fully sustained by the cur-cent language of the New Testament, is that: all the writings denominated the Scriptures are divinely inspired.
What particular books have a right to be included under this sacred designation in the general opinion of the Church is a question considered under the article Case of Scripture.

III. The nature of Inspiration.—The interior process of the Spirit's action upon the minds of the speakers or writers was of course inscrutable (John iii, 8) even to themselves. That they were conscious, however, of such an influence is manifest from the authority with which they put forth their words; yet, when they sat down to write, the divine and the human elements in their mental action were perfectly harmonious and insiparable (Luke i, 3).

As to the outward method, "God operated on the minds of inspired men in a variety of ways, sometimes by audible words, sometimes by direct inward suggestions, sometimes by outward visible signs, sometimes by the Urin and Thummm, and sometimes by dreams and visions. This variety in the mode of divine influence detracted nothing from its certainty. God made known his will equally in different ways; and, whatever the mode of his operation, he made it manifest to his servants that the things revealed were from him." All this, however, relates rather to revelation than simple inspiration, a distinction that is ably made by Prof. Lee in his work on the subject.

But inspiration was concemed not only in making known to the prophets and apostles, but also in giving them direction in writing the sacred books. In this also, there was a diversity in the mode of divine influence. Sometimes the Spirit of God moved and guided his servants to write things which they could not know by natural means, such as new doctrine or precepts, or predictions of future events. Sometimes he moved and guided them to write the history of events which were wholly or partly known to them by tradition, or by the testimony of their contemporaries, or by their own observation or experience. In all these cases the divine Spirit effectually preserved them from all error, and influenced them to write just so much and in such a manner as God saw to be best. Sometimes he moved and guided them to write a summary record of larger histories, containing what his infinite wisdom saw to be adapted to the end in view, that is, the benefit of his people in all ages. Sometimes he influenced them to make a record of important maxims in common use, to be handed down from one generation to another in connection or experience, or from special divine teaching. Sometimes he influenced them to write parables or al-gories, particularly suited to make a salutary impression of divine things on the minds of men; and sometimes to record supernatural visions. In these and all other kinds of works of which the case is most important and special divine guidance, as no man could of himself attain to infallibility, and no wisdom, except that of God, was sufficient to determine what things ought to be written for permanent use in the Church, and what manner of writing would be best fitted to promote the great ends of revelation."

"Some writers speak of different modes and different kinds, and even different degrees of inspiration. If their meaning is that God influenced the minds of inspired men in different ways; that he adopted a variety of modes in revealing divine things to their minds; that he could be guided by the guidance given to them in the Scriptures, and in the different forms of composition; that he moved and guided them to write history, prophecy, domains, commands, promises, reproofs, and exhortations, and that he adapted his mode of operation to each individual man, and of these operations there is no Fool. The Scriptures exhibit these different kinds of writings and modes of divine instruction. Still every part of what was written was divinely inspired, and equally so. It is all the word of God, and clothed with divine authority, as much as if it had all been made known and written in one way." There is a true and

IV. Theories of Inspiration.—These may be concisely stated thus: (1) The orthodox, or generally accepted view, which contents itself with considering Scripture to be inspired in such a sense as to make it infallibly certain when apprehended in its legitimate sense, and of absolute authority in all matters of faith and conscience. This theory has lately been, with great propriety, designated as the dynamical, purporting that the power or influence is from God, while the action is human. (2) The mystical, or extremely strict view, thought to have been held by Philip, Joseph, and some of the primitive Christian fathers (but condemned by the early councils as aspiring to heathenish μαν-τείς), which regarded the sacred writers as wholly possessed by the Spirit, and uttering its dicta in a species of frenzy. This, in opposition to the former, has justly been characterized as the mechanical view, denoting the passivity of the inspired subject. (3) The lauttinsbarion view, entertained by Rationalists of all orders, which deems inspiration but a high style of poetic or religious fervor, and not inconsistent with errors in fact and sentiment.

This last theory, to be confounded, however, with that of those who limit inspiration to such matters in holy Scripture as directly pertain to the proper material of revelation, i. e. to strictly religious truth, whether of doctrine or practice. Among English divines, those who have most zealously maintained the point are

Wilson (lecture xii on Evidences, i, 509), Parry (Insquiry into the Nature of the Inspiration of the Apostles, p. 26, 27), and Bp. Blomfield (Lectures on Acts, v, 186). It is, however, pretended to prove that the value of the religious element in the revelation would not be lessened if errors were acknowledged in the scientific and miscellaneous matter which accompanies it. Among those who have held this form of the theory are Baxter (Method. Theol. Chr. pt. ii, ch. xii, 3, 4), Leidenfrost in his True and Divine Inspiration, or Dodridge (On Inspiration.), Warburton (Doct. of Grace, bk. i, ch. vii), Bp. Horsley (seem on Eccles. xiii, 7, Works, iii, 179), Bp. Randolph (Rem. on Michaelis' Introd. pt. 15, 16), Paley (Evid. of Christianity, pt. iii, ch. ii), Whately (Lev. 13, in Summ. of the Scripture, i, and 11; Sermons on Firsts, p. 59; Psalms of Christianity, c. 233), Hampden (Bampton Lect. on p. 301), Thirlwall (Schleiermacher's Luke, Introd. pt. 15), Bp. Heber (Bampton Lect. viii, 577), Thomas Scott (Essay on Inspiration, p. 3), Dr. Fye Smith (Script. and Geol. p. 276, 277, 3d ed.), and Dean Alford (Proleg. to Gospels, in loc.).

(For other writers who have held the same views, see Dr. Davidson's Facts, Statements, &c., in defence of his vol. ii of Horne's Introd. 1857.) The inadmissibility, however, of either of these limitations to inspiration is evident from two considerations: 1st, That the sacred writers them- selves, indeed, in the truthfulness of the Scriptures. We therefore are compelled by the necessity of the case, no less than the positive declarations of the Bible itself, to maintain that all Scripture is divinely inspired, and not some of its parts or statements alone. At the same time, we may, without inconsistency—nay, we must, in the light of just criticism—admit that the phraseology in which these statements are couched is oftentimes neither elegant nor exact. This does not impair their essential truth, as the testimony of an illiterate witness may be scrupulously truthful, although confused in order and unscientific in style. (For other facts are substantially given, the want of logical, rhetorical, and grammatical precision is comparatively unimportant, and forms no ground of impeachment. The mental habits of the sacred writers must be taken into account in order to arrive at their meaning, and this is the case of any reader is in search of, and of which language, whether clear or obscure, is legitimately but the vehicle. The errors imputed to the Scriptures by certain scientific men have accordingly all been explained, sooner or later, as being merely apparent, and due to the popular style of the sacred writers. Even the most difficult instances of these, such as the omissions and general enumerations in the genealogies [see Genealogy of Christ], are susceptible of the same explanation, since these were evidently copied faithfully from public registers, which, however, it is very clear may seem to us, were of unquestioned accuracy, that the truthfulness of the principle of a quotation of Scripture to correct an unimportant mistranslation in the Authorized Version. Just so when our Lord and the apostle Paul freely cite passages according to the inexact rendering of the Septuagint, and sometimes even make them the point of an argument; it is no disparagement either to their intelligence or inspiration, but rather an evidence of their appreciation of the literary aptitudes of those whom they addressed. See Accommodation. On the other hand, within the bounds of the orthodox view of inspiration, as above stated, there are two epithets currently employed which seem to border too closely upon the extravagant, and are equally unnecessary and incorrect. (i) "Plenary Inspiration" is a phrase nowhere warranted by the Scriptures as predicated of themselves. Christ alone was plenarily inspired (John iii, 34) of all human beings. The term plenary authority would be far more scriptural and definite. 2. "Verbal Inspiration" is an expression still more objectionable as applied to the Scriptures. For,

(I) Words, as such, are incapable of inspiration. They are either oral, consisting of certain sounds, or written, consisting of certain marks on paper; both material signs or symbols, which are properly predicated. Thought, ideas, sentiments only can be inspired; and this is really what the theorists mean. It is better to say so plainly.

(II) The assumption by these theorists that we think only in words is plenarily contradicted by every man's consciousness. As children, we have conceptions long before we have words. The dog that lies dreaming of the chase has rapid trains of thought, but not a syllable of a word. We are constantly exercising perceptions of shades of color, and shapes of matter, for which there is no name. He must have a feeble power of consciousness, or power over words, who is not often possessed of a thought for which he has no word. We hold the conception fast, waiting for its correlative term to come. Who does not often think of a friend's face without being able to recall his name? Words, it is true, enable us to express our ideas, and generally that expression renders the conception itself more distinct. But surely God is shut up to no such necessity in communicating his mind to men. His Spirit even gives us thoughts beyond the compass of language (ἀληθεία, Rom. vii, 28; ἀφρόσυ, 2 Cor. xii, 4).

(III) The suggestion of the ἐπιφάνεια verbi to the minds of the sacred writers is incompatible with their free action, as evinced in the varieties and even blunders of style. These are clearly the human element, partaking of the imperfection and diversity inseparable from man's productions. To say that God makes use of them is only evading the point. He does not directly say that these affections and thoughts are the conception of God in them. The insincerity of statement by Gaisen and other verbalists on this head is palpable, and shows the untenableness of their position in the face of infided objections and rationalistic criticism. Equally insufficient is the claim of self-control and self-composure in the case of the objection that if the actual Greek and Hebrew words are inspired, no translations can in any correlative sense be called "the word of God."

(IV) Nothing is gained by asserting the verbal theory that is not equally secured in point of divine sanction and infallible truth by simply claiming for the Holy Scriptures that their statements and sentiments substantially and in their essential import represent the mind and will of God; that they contain divine thoughts clothed in merely human language. Such is the obvious fact, recognised by every devout and judicious interpreter. Such a view, indeed, gives far more dignity to the sacred volume than the mechanical theory of a mere amanuensis. It is the power of God in earth vessels (2 Cor. iv, 7).

(V) The theory of verbal inspiration is comparatively recent in the history of the mind of man. [1] There is no such theory stated in the Scriptures. Scriptural authority would preclude all citation of names, great or small, among the theologians. The passages adduced in its favor have no pertinence. [2] The fathers had no definite theory of inspiration at all. Sometimes, in describing the character of Scripture, they used striking figures and strong expressions, from which we might infer a belief in verbal inspiration. But, on the other hand, their ordinary mode of commenting on Scripture, of quoting it, and of def-fining it, is inconsistent with such a belief.

(a) John, the presbyter, who is believed to have been one of our Lord's disciples, speaking of Mark's Gospel, says that Mark "wrote it with great accuracy, as Peter's interpretation moved him as when he spoke out words as he remembered them. He was very careful to omit nothing of what he had heard, and to say nothing false in what he related" (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles., i. 39).
(b) Justin Martyr, after using the figure of the "lyre," writes, "If much relied upon by the advocates of verbal inspiration, goes on to limit his remark to "those things in Scripture which are necessary for us to know" (c) Ireneus, in a fragment on "the style of St. Paul, alludes to the fact that his sentences were sometimes "manystatical," and accounts for it by the "rapidity of his utterances (velocitas sermonum), and the impulsive-ness of spirit which distinguished him." (d) Clemens Alexandrinus states that "Peter having preached the Gospel at Rome... many present exhorted Mark to write the things which had been spoken, since so much relied upon by the advocates of verbal inspiration, he delivered to them on which he had com-commissioned the Gospel, he delivered it to them who had asked of him" (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles., vi. 14).
(e) Origen, speaking of the Epistle to the Hebrews, remarks that the "thoughts are Paul's, but the language became somewhat committed to Peter's" (Hist. Eccles., ii. 12, 28).
3. The period between the fathers and the school-men is of so little value in the history of theology that it is hardly worth while to refer to it. One or two writers of some note in this period adopted verbal inspiration, but there was no received theory of the kind.
Agobard, archbishop of Lyons, in answer to Fredericg (who is cited by Prof. Harris), asks, "What absurdity follows if the notion be adopted that the Holy Spirit not only inspired the prophets and apostles with the sense of their teachings, but also fashioned on their lips the very words themselves, bodily and outwardly (corporae verba extrinseca in ora illorum)?" (Agobard, Contro Fredericium, c. 12).
4. By the schoolmen, and subsequently by the doctors of the Church in general, a distinction was made in inspiration between revelatio and assistantia.
5. Of the great reformers, Luther, Melancthon, Calvlin, and Zwinglius, not one maintained any such doctrine as that of verbal inspiration, while they all speak in the same spirit as the verbal advocates of the truth, credibility, and infallibility of the sacred writings.
6. It was in the 17th century that the notion of verbal inspiration, which had before been only floated about from one individual mind to another, took the shape of a definite theory, and received a proper ecclesiastical sanction. The subject was treated at length by Calvinist (as the better opponent of Grotius and Calixtus), who set forth the verbal theory very fully; and later writers, both Lutheran and Reformed, carried it so far as to extend inspiration to the vowel-points and the punctuation. The Formula Conclusa Helvetici declares that the Old Testament "is [the word is very explicit in the consonants of the vowels, and the vowel-points, or at least their force."
V. Literature.—Early treatises on the subject, of a general character, are those of Quintestut, Carpzov, Wegner, Lange, Le Clerc, Louth, Lamotte, Clarke, Dodridge, etc., which rather belong to the province of "Introduction" (q. v.) than to the explicit doctrine of verbal inspiration. The best of all, probably, is the essay on Inspiration (London, 1707, 1708); Jaquetot, Le Verité et l'Insipration des lettres du V. et N. T. (Rotterdam, 1718); Calamy, Inspiration of O. and N. Test. (London,

Jan. 1868. Inspired, the name of a sect which existed for some 150 years in Germany, and remnants of which are still to be found in the United States. They owe their origin partly to the French Prophets [see CAMBRAIS], partly to the German Separatists (q. v.). Their name is derived from the fact that, aside from the inspiration of the Scriptures, they also believe in an immediate divine inspiration, affecting the person in such a manner that he becomes the instrument by which the Holy Spirit manifests himself, and he is therefore to be obeyed by the faithful. After the unfortunate conclusion of the religious war in the Cevennes, a large number of these French Prophets, for the most part honest, but in whom bodily sufferings had exalted the mind until they believed themselves directly inspired by God, went to England and Scotland. Most of them opposed, at that time were Elie Marion, Durande Fage, Jean Cavialier, and Jean Allnut. These prophets preached against France, and especially against the papacy, which they consider as the Anti-Christ. They soon became objects of suspicion on account of their attempts at raising the dead, and were expelled from the established Episcopal Church. Obliged, there fore, to form a separate sect, Allnut and Marion, with their adherents, connected themselves for a while with the French Reformed churches of the Netherlands, but they failed also here to acquire any influence. On the other hand, they obtained great consideration among the Pietists and Separatists of Northern and Western Germany, in France, Switzerland, and even in the Netherlands and Hall (1718) and Berlin (1714). From Hall the principles of the Inspired were disseminated into the neighboring regions and countries, and communities, composed chiefly of Separatist emigrants from France and Suabia, soon formed in many places. The chiefs were E. L. Grü ber, at Himbar, near Hanau (born 1656, + 1728); A. Gross, in Frankfort; the saddler, J. F. Rock, at Him bach; and the hermit, E. C. Hochmann, at Schwarzena u, near Berleburg (born 1670, + 1721). In 1716 they took the name of Truly Inspired (see J. J. Winkel, Cus tomar, Bielef, 1850). Their organization was based on the so-called twenty-four rules of true sanctification and of holy conduct, taken mainly from an address of Johann A. Gruber in 1716. Up to 1719 they counted nine of their members endowed with the gift of inspiration. In order to make proselytes, they travelled through all the north of Germany and southwest France, in many, especially the Palatinate and Alsace, and even visited Saxony and Bohemia. They established communities at Schwarzenau, Hornringhausen, near Berle burg, Himbach and Bergheim, Nonnemar, Dindelheim, Bridingen, Birkenst in Wetteraw, Anweiler in the Palatinate, and in other places. In 1749 Memminger in Württemberg, Scharffaum, Zürrich, Borne, Diesbach, Amosdingen in Switzerland. In the mean time the number of inspired members did not increase, and the eight died out one by one, until, in 1719, Rock alone remained, and he continued to be the head of the sect until his death in 1749. From that time the sect gradually lost its influence. A number of former members, under the leadership of Gruber, Gleim, Macklin, and other Separatists, emigrated to America, and settled at Germantown, Pa. In 1730, when the Herrn hut movement began, Rock had some difficulties with his former friend Zinzendorf, which proved fatal to the interest of the Inspired. He also had a long controversy with the Mystic Separatist Johann Kaiser, who had founded a Philadelphia community at Stuttgart in 1710, and founded an Inspired one in 1717. In 1745-50 the two communities were dissolved, and converted to the enthusiasts, who even at that time succeeded in making proselytes. They were joined by the court preacher Kämpf, of Buhl, in Alsace, who remained attached to the cause until his death in 1758, and the celebrated theologians Ottinger and Tenstroem, themselves were for a time favorable to the movement. After 1816 the sect received a new impulse, and reorganized themselves under the leadership of Michael Krausert, a tailor of Strasburg, and later under Christian Metz (born at Neuwied in 1792), but, being subjected to severe oppression by the civil authority, they emig rated, numbering about 100, in 1841, to this country, and settled at Ebeneser, near Buffalo, in the state of New York. They established a community which still exists at that place. They support themselves by agriculture and the manufacturing of cloth, practising communism to a certain extent; their possessions amount to more than 2000. They have also established colonies in Canada and (since 1854) in Iowa. The Inspired occupy a place midway between the Separatists and the Herm phutters. In their doctrines they are evangelical, but they reject the sacraments, and disclaim any relation to the English Congregationalists. They claim to be the soldiers of Christ, and, as such, obliged to lead a life of renunciation and abnegation; in their practice they follow the principles of the Mystic Schwenkfeld, J. Böhm, Weigel, etc. Inspiration, they believe, is always preceded by some material sign or physical sensation, such as a burning in the chest, cessation of breathing, convulsive motions of the arms, etc., after which, in sort of somnambulistic state, the inspired person receives and manifests the divine inspiration: this manifestation consists sometimes only in convulsive motions, or in broken sentences, which latter are generally invitations to repentance and amendment, or denunciations of some advancement of the temple. Occasionally a person is moved or prophesies and two elders, and they hold occasional conferences together. They have no regular ministry, but all members, of both sexes, are required to contribute to the common edification by praying aloud in the assemblies; besides this, if an Inspired teacher is present, and feels inspired, he preaches; if not, he reads some passages of Scripture, or the recorded utterances of some Inspired members. They have also a particular collection of hymns. Their principal festivals are love-feasts, at which preaching is generally part of the order of exercises of the day. These festivals are announced long beforehand, but none take part in them except those who are personally invited to do so by the Inspired leaders. The week before a love-feast is always a season of especial fasting, penitence, and prayer, and the day preceding it is still more strictly observed. Prayer, singing, prophesying, and feet-washing always precede the love-feast, at which the persons invited partake of cake and wine. See M.  INSTALLäre. See Installation.

 INSTALLATION. (Low Lat. in and stollum, a seat) is a seat in some churches for the ceremonial act or process by which an ordained minister is formally put into possession of his office, and by which he is fully empowered not alone to exercise his functions, but to enjoy his honors and emoluments. The ceremonial form, as well as the name, differs according to the office which is conferred, as enthronization for a bishop, induction for a minister, etc. Installation in the English Church, however, properly regards only the office of a canon or prebendary. The word is also used generally for a formal introduction to any office. "Though technically distinguished in modern times from the act of ordination, it is virtually included in the 'ordination' services whenever the minister is inducted into the pastoral office for the first time. But when, having been previously ordained for a former and perhaps pastoral connection, the person is to perform official induction is termed simply 'installation.'" See Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.; Walcott, Sacred Archearol, p. 329 (for the use of the term as used in the English Church); Congreg. Quarterly, 1868, p. 340.

 INSTINCT, that power which acts on and impels any creature to a particular manner of conduct, not by a view of the beneficial consequences, but merely from a strong impulse, supposed to be necessary in its effects, and to be given in order to supply the place of reason.

 INSTITUTIO is one of the names by which the addresses on the Catechism or the catechetical instruction was designated in the Christian Church after the time of Justin. See Catechetism.

 Institution, an established custom or law; a precept, maxim, or principle. Institutions may be considered as positive, moral, and human. 1. Those are called positive institutions or precepts which are not founded upon any reasons known to those to whom they are given, or discoverable by them, but which are observed merely through their command. 2. Moral are those, the reasons of which we see, and the duties of which arise out of the nature of the case itself, prior to external command. 3. Human are generally applied to those inventions of men, or means of honoring God, which are not appointed by the people, and which are numerous in the Church of Rome, and too many of them in Protestant churches. See Butler's Analogy, p. 214; Doddridge's Lect. lect. 158; Robinson's Claude, i, 217; ii, 238; Burroughs, Disc. on Positive Institutions; Bp. Hoadley's Plain Account, p. 3.

 INSTITUTION, in Church law, means the final and authoritative appointment to a church benefice—more especially to a benefice—by the pope with whom such right of appointment ultimately rests. Thus, in the Roman Catholic Church—even after the election of a bishop by the chapter, or his nomination by the crown, when that right belongs to the crown—it is only the pope who confers institution. In English usage, institution is a ceremony performed by the bishop or the pope, who, or whose deputy, reads the words of the institution, while the clerk kneels. The institution vests the benefice in the clerk, for the purpose of spiritual duty, who thereupon becomes entitled to the profits thereof. But the title is not complete till induction (q.v.).

 Institution of a Christian Man, also called The Bishop's Book, is the name of a book containing an exposition of the Apostles' Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, Justification, and Purgatory, which was drawn up by a committee of prelates and divines of the English Church in 1557, "for a direction for the bishops and clergy," and to be "an authoritative explanation of the doctrine of faith and manners," and a sort of standard for the desk and the pulpit, or, as it itself expresses it, for the clergy "to govern themselves in the instruction of their flock to this rule." Some say that Stephen Pyeot, bishop of Winchester, wrote the book himself, and that a committee of prelates and divines gave it their sanction. It was called forth at the time of the early reformatory ecclesiastical movements in England during the reign of Henry VIII. At the time of the publication of the "Bishop's Book," the "Institution of a Christian Man" (printed in Formularies of Faith put forth by authority during the Reign of Henry VIII, Oxf. 1825), the English Church had become alienated from the Church of Rome; at least King Henry had made claim to his sovereignty over the Church in his dominions, which an act of Parliament in 1533 had secured him, and, with few dissentient voices, the clergy of the land had seconded the opinion of Parliament. In 1556 a convocation, called "the Southern Convocation," published a manifesto, entitled "Articles to stablish the Christen quietness, and univere in question to prepare the people for ordination," which are generally regarded as the starting-point of the English Reformation. "But, upon the whole, these articles breathed rather the animus of the Middle Ages. Thus they took, on the doctrine of justification, a course midway between the Romanists and the Lutherans. They had also paid reverence to some of the Romanist superstitions, as the use of images, invocation of saints, and still held to the doctrine of purgatory, which was at this time beginning to encounter a determined opposition from the more radical reformers. To represent more truly the real desires and opinions of the English Church, the Bishop's Book was launched. It discussed at length the Roman superstitions which the Southern Convocation had sanctioned, and declared against a further adherence to them by the English people. They also held that the fabric of the papal monarchy was altogether human; that its growth was traceable partly to the favor and encrease of the Roman emperors, and partly to ambitious artifices of the popes themselves; that just as men originally made and sanctioned it, so might they, if occasion should arise, withdraw from it their confidence, and thus recover the ground on which all Christians must have stood anterior to the Middle Ages." INTERCESSION Instrumentum pacis. At the pas homed (q.v.) in sacred mass, the celebrant of the mass gives to the deacon the kiss of peace, which the latter gives to the subdeacon, and then it is transmitted successively to the other ministers of the rite. Since at a recent time it is customary to use for this purpose an image of the crucified Christ, which is handed to the different clerks for the purpose of bestowing upon it the kiss in token of brotherly love (such are also used at the coronation of Roman Catholic princes), and the image is therefore called the "instrument of peace." See Theol. Univ. Lex. ii, 410.

Insculption. See EXORCIST.

Insulâni (islanders) is an old name by which those monks who belonged to the famous monastery in the island of Lewis were known.

Insult, or such a treatment of another, in word or deed, as to express contempt, is not definitely taken cognizance of in the Mosaic law; only the reviling of a person is forbidden (Exod. xxii, 28), yet without any special penalty attached. The severity, however, with which disrespect towards sacred persons was punished appears from 2 Kings ii, 22 sq. There also occurs mention (Ps. xxiii, 8; xxxviii, 21; Lam. ii, 15; Matt. xxviii, 39) of gesser-melaniaca, a mockery of the head, 209-217). Insult by abusive words. (Matt. v, 22; diac.; see Raca) or stroke (smiting on the cheek, Job xvi, 10; Matt. v, 39; John xviii, 22; xix, 3; pulling the ears, spitting upon, Matt. xxviii, 30, etc.) was, in later law, punished by fine (Mishna, Baba Kamma, viii, 6; comp. Matt. v, 22), as also in Roman law. For a marked public affront which Herod Agrippa I received at Alexandria, see Philo, ii, 522. See COURTESY.

Intention, a deliberate notion of the will by which it is supposed to accomplish a certain act: first, taking in merely the act; secondly, taking in also the consequences of the act. An action may be done with a good intention, and may produce bad results; or it may be done with a good intention, and produce good results. It may also be done with an evil intention, and yet good results may follow; or with an evil intention, producing evil results. As a question of morals, therefore, the intention with which anything is done really determines the quality of the action as regards the person who does it. It is not possible that it should always determine the course of social policy in the matter of rewards or punishments; but it may mostly determine the verdict of conscience respecting the good or evil character of the man who is in doubtless a divine judgment of them. No intention can be good, however, which purposes the doing of an evil action, although with the object of securing good results; nor any which does a good action with the object of producing evil results." See Ethics; Moral Sense.

In the Roman Catholic Church the intention of the priest is held to be essential to the valid celebration of the sacraments. This the Council of Trent decreed in its 11th canon (Sess. vii.): "If any one shall say that in ministers, while they effect and confer the sacraments, there is not present the intention at least of doing what the Church does, let him be anathema." The same principle, in the main, was advocated and set forth by popes Martin V and Eugenius IV in the early part of the last century. So abused has this principle generally become in the Roman Catholic Church, that by its consequences it is believed to be greatly detrimental to the cause of the Christian religion. In the antagonism of the insincerity of the actor reduces the act to a mockery and a sinful trifling with sacred things, the Church of Rome, by this decision, "exposes the laity to doubt, hesitation, and insecurity whenever they receive a sacrament at the hand of a priest, in whose piety and sincerity they have not full confidence. If a wicked priest, for instance, should baptize a child without an inward intention to baptize him, it would follow that the baptism was null and void for want of the intention." The Church of England, to repudiate this perverse doctrine, in its 26th Article of Religion, declares, therefore, that the unworthiness of ministers does not hinder the effect of sacraments. "Forasmuch as God doth not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by his commission, [and therefore] we may use their ministry both in hearing the word of God and in receiving the sacraments. Neither is the effect of Christ's ordinance taken away by their wickedness, nor the grace of God's gifts diminished from such by faith, and rightly, do receive the sacraments ministered unto them, which be effectual because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men." See Stounton, Eccles. Dict. p. 598; Blunt, Theol. Dict. i, 351; and, for a moderate Roman account of Intention, Liebermann, Iust. Theol. (a 1863), i, 386 sqq.

Intercalary Fruits is a term in the Roman Catholic Church for the revenues of an ecclesiastical benefice accruing during a vacancy. In the xxivth Sess. of the Council of Trent (c. 18, De Reform.; c 1 and 3, X. De probend. et dignit). it was decreed that whatever the deceased ecclesiastic had really earned was a part of the property of the ecclesiastic, but also that the remainder should go either to his successor in office or to the fabrica reclusis, or to him who is to appoint the successor, and to provide in the interim. It is frequently the case that these funds are transferred to societies of widows and orphans, orphans, orphans, orphans, orphans, orphans, orphans, orphans, orphans, orphans, for some benevolent object of the Roman Church. See Wetzer und Welte, Kirchen-Lex. v, 678; Aschbach, Kirchen-Lex. iii, 498; Theol. Univ. Lex. ii, 410.

Intercalary Month. See Calendar.

Intercision (intercisi, inræcut) is the act of interposition in behalf of another, to plead for him (Isa. lii, 12; lix, 16; 1 Tim. ii, 1). See ADVOCATE.

INTERCESSION OF CHRIST. This refers, in a general sense, to any aid which he, as perpetual High-priest, extends to those who approach God confiding in him (Heb. iv, 16; vi, 25–27). He is also represented as offering up the prayers and praises of his people, which become acceptable to God through him (Heb. xiii, 16; 1 Peter ii, 5; Rev. viii, 3). Of the intercession of Christ we may observe that it is righteous, for it is founded upon justice and truth (Heb. vii, 26; 1 John iii, 5), compassionate (Heb. ii, 17; v, 8), perpetual (Heb. vii, 25), and efficacious (1 John ii, 1). See MEDiator.

Intercession, in the sense of supplication, was not appropriate to the office of the Hebrew high-priest; he was the presenter of sacrifices on account of the people, and made expiation for the sins of the people by sprinkling the blood of victims before Jehovah: this gave, as it were, a voice to the blood. Hence, if we attach a special idea to the term "intercession," as applied to the work of our glorious High-priest, may we not say that it is equivalent to propitiation or atonement? In the holiest of all, the "blood of Jesus speaketh" (Heb. xii, 24). The dignity and merit, power and authority of the Messiah, in his exalted state, imply a continued presentation of his obedience and sacrifice as ever valid and efficacious for the pardon and acceptance, the perfect holiness and eternal happiness, of all who are truly repentant, believing, and obedient. Hence his intercession, or his acting as high-priest in the heavenly world, was represented by the Hebrew high-priest's entering into the most holy place, on the annual day of atonement, with the fragrant incense burning, and with the sacrificial blood which he was to sprinkle upon the mercy-seat, or the ark of the covenant, and before the awful symbols of Jehovah's presence. See HIGH-PRIEST.

"The need of an intercessor arose from the loss of the right of communion with God, of which Adam was deprived when he lost his title as the high-priest of all creation, and, as such, privileged to hold free intercourse with God; and this privilege, lost by Adam, was restored in Christ. Until the fulness of time came a temporary provision was made for man's acceptance with God in the sacrifices of the patriarchal age, and the ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual; but all these were shadows of the priestly function of the Son of God, which commenced from the time when he offered up himself as a sacrifice on the cross. The intercession of Christ is the exercise of a prerogative which is carried on continually in heaven (Rom. viii., 34). He was fitted to become our high-priest by the union of his divine and human natures (Heb. vii., 25; I.aa.iii., 12). His manhood enables him to plead on our behalf as the representative of human nature, and so to sympathize with those needs and those sorrows which require his intercessions, that he offers them up as one most deeply interested in our welfare (Heb. iv., 15). His priesthood, moreover, requires an offering, and it is still his human nature which furnishes both the victim and the priest. His Godhead renders that sacrifice an invaluable offering, and his intercession all-effectual (Heb. ix., 14)."

INTERCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST. Man intercedes with man, sometimes to procure an advantage to himself, sometimes as a mediator to benefit another; he may be said to intercede for another when he puts himself as a representative of human nature, and so prompts him to say what otherwise he would be unable to say, or to say in a more persuasive manner what he might intend to say. The intercession of the Holy Spirit (Rom. viii., 26) is easily illustrated by this adaptation of the term. See PARACLÉS: Invocation.

INTERCESSION OF SAINTS. In addition to the intercession of Christ, and, indeed, that of Christ likewise, Roman Catholics believe in the efficacy of the intercession of the Virgin and the saints, who, however, as they do not directly intercede for men with God, but with the Saviour, the sinless One, who alone has the ear of the King of the universe. See INVOCATION OF SAINTS.

Intercessórs or Interventórs was the name of officers peculiar to the African Church, who acted as temporary incumbents of a vacant bishopric, and for the time being performed the episcopal functions. It was their duty to take measures for the immediate appointment of a bishop. To prevent abuses, which had become prevalent in either choosing the intercessors or by protracting the election of a new prelate, a Council of Carthage in 401 forbade the tenure to continue longer than one year, and also any succession to the temporary occupant. See Farrar, Theol. Dict. s. v.; Walcott, Sacred Archaeology, s. v.; Riddle, Christ. Antig. p. 228.

Interdict (interdictum, sc. celebrationis divini officii, a prohibition of religious offices) is an ecclesiastical censure or penalty in the Roman Catholic Church, consisting in the withdrawal of the administration of certain sacraments, of the celebration of public worship, and of the solemn burial service. There are three kinds of interdicts: local, which affect a particular place, and thus comprehend all, without distinction, who reside therein; personal, which only affect a person or persons, and which reach this person or persons, and these alone, no matter where found; and mixed, which affect both a place and its inhabitants, so that the latter would be bound by the interdict even outside of its purely local limits. But, as the interdict is oftentimes inflicted on the clergy alone, it is always strictly interpreted, so that one imposed on a parish, etc., does not take effect also on the clergy, and vice versa (compare Ferraris, art. ii., v.). The interdict, like the ban (q. v.), may be inflicted by local or general chapter, and by ecclesiastical judges (ab homine). The reasons for consenting this ecclesiastical penalty are various; most generally they are the abolition of Church immunities, disrespect towards ecclesiastical authority or commands, and the effects are generally the prohibition of administering the sacraments, of holding public worship, and the denial of Christian burial; yet various modifications have been frequent. Thus Alexander III permitted in 1173 the administration of the sacrament of baptism to children, and that of penitence to the dying (c. 11, X. De sponsalis, vi., 1; comp. c. 11, X. De nemiti. et remiss. v. 38; c. 24, De sententiis excom. vi.; v. 11). Innocent III allowed the same (c. 28, c. 34, X. De sent. excom. v. 39, a. 1208), as also penitence, with some restrictions (c. 11, X. De nemiti. v. 38, a. 1214; comp. c. 24, De sent. excom., in vi), the silent burial of the clergy (c. 11, X. cit. v. 38), and to convert the observance of the canonical hours, without singing, and the reading of a low mass, which in the following year extended also to the bishops (c. 25, X. De privilegiis v. 83, a. 1215). But to this was appended the condition that the parties under excommunication or interdict should not be present, that the doors of the churches should remain locked, and no bells allowed to ring. Boniface VIII went further, and allowed the celebration of public worship with open doors, ringing of bells, and in the presence of the excommunicated parties on the occasions of the Nativity, Easter, Pentecost, and the Assumption of the Virgin. Yet such of the interdicted and excommunicated did not come to the altar were to be treated as excommunicated aeterniter. Eugenius IV and Boniface VIII extended this to the whole octave of the Corpus Christi (Const. Iustifabili, a. 1429, and Const. Excelsissimum, a. 1433, in Bullar. Magni, i., 808, 328); and Leo X to the octave of the festival of the Holy Conception. There were, moreover, other special regulations made for the benefit of the Roman Curia, and other orders of monks (Ferraris, art. vi., no. 15). In the xxvth Session of the Council of Trent (cap. 12, De regul. et ordin.) it was decided that the regulars generally were to observe the interdict, as had already been commanded by Clement VIII (c. 1, Clem. De sent. excom. v. 10, Concil. Veneam, 1311).

The right of pronouncing the interdict is vested in the pope, the provincial synod, the bishop, with the assent of the chapter, and even without it (c. 2, X. De his quos intendat a maioris parte cupiendi, iii., 11, Celestini III, ann. 1190; Clem. i., De sent. excom. cit. Concil. Trident.; see Gonzalez Telesz, c. 5, X. De consuet. no. 4). The interdict can be withdrawn by any confessor when it is particular and personal, not reserved, but applying to minor points (c. 29, X. De sent. exc. v. 39, Innocent III, anno 1193) otherwise the interdicts are to be withdrawn by those who pronounced them, their successors,legates, or superiors (see Ferraris, art. viii). The fundamental principles of the interdicts are yet in vigour in the Roman Church (see Riegger, Dis. de potestatis et pasius eccl. Vienne, 1772, § 70; and Schmidt, Theaumrus juris eccl. vii, 172), and particular interdicts are still in frequent use, as, for instance, the interdictio ingressus in eccleniacum, the defense for laymen to enter the Church (c. 48, X. De sent. excom. v. 39, Innocent III, ann. 1215; c. 20, exod. in vi; v. 11, Boniface VIII, etc.). The Council of Trent (Sess. vi, cap. 1, in fin. de ref.) pronounced this punishment against the bishops and archbishops who neglected the command to reside in their diocese. To it belongs also the cassatio a diviné, touching the use of the ecclesiastical penalties (c. 55, X. De appellatio, ii., 28, Innocent III, ann. 1218; c. 13, § 1, X. De officio judicis ordi. i., 81, Innocent III, ann. 1215; c. 2, exod. in vi, and i., 16, Gregor. X., ann. 1274; c. 8, exod. Boniface VIII), as a public murmuring of the Church (c. 18, X. De sent. excom. in vi., l., Boniface VIII).

History.—The time when the interdict was first introduced into the Church is not generally known; but it is usually traced to the early discipline of public penance, "by which penitents were for a time debarred from the privilege of presence at the celebration of the Eucharist." Instances of it are met with in very early times (see c. 8, Can. v. q. vi. [Cecch. Agath., anno 605]).
Protestants were nevertheless afraid of some hidden plan, and only an apparent reconciliation was effected: it really settled no question at all, satisfied neither party, and finally, as Luther had predicted before the convocation, led only afterwards to much misunderstanding and mutual recrimination.

‘Let them go on,’ said Luther, ‘so long as they believe in each other and keep the same Creed. But the differences between Roman Catholics and Protestants might be made up by such conferences, we shall not envy the success of their labors; they will be the first who could ever convert the devil and reconcile him to Christ. . . . the sceptre of the Lord is not without bended bow, but in the vail and straight bow, the rule of faith and practice.’” Charles V, determined to secure the ratification of the points of agreement entered into at Ratisbon by a national council, forbade the Protestants to argue, in the meantime, on the controverted points, or to dispose in any way of the property of the churches. They protested, however, and went on, regardless of the interim.

II. THE AUGSBURG INTERIM. After the duke of Alva, through the treachery of Maurice of Saxony, had broken the power of the Protestants at the battle of Pavia, July 23, 1525, the electors of the empire, at Augsburg, July 16, 1526, under the presidency of the archbishop of Mainz, met in general council. The emperor, the bishop of Rome, the pope, and the council, all held the same religious opinions and the same views concerning them. The emperor thought that while the church was in divided state, it languished, and which constantly vanished in the distance.” For that purpose he called the three divines, viz. Julius Pflug, bishop of Naumburg; Michael Helding, titular bishop of Sidon; and the Protestant John Agricola, preacher to the elector of Brandenburg, to agree upon a series of articles concerning from it should either in dispute between the Catholics and Protestants. The controverted points were, the state of Adam before and after his fall; the redemption of mankind by Jesus Christ; the justification of sinners; charity and good works, the confession we ought to have in God, that our sins are regarded, d. the church and the true marks, its power, its authority, and ministers; the pope and bishops, the sacraments; the mass; the commemoration of saints; their intercession, and prayers for the dead. The result of their discussions was the agreement drawn up in the following articles. These the emperor had submitted to the pope for his approbation, and sent copies of them also to the electors of Saxony and of Brandenburg, and to other evangelical princes. But both the pope and the German theologians refused to adhere to them. The emperor next had them revised by two Dominican monks, and made several alterations, and then promulgated as an imperial constitution, called the “Interim,” wherein he declared that “it was his will that all his Catholic dominions should, for the future, inviolably observe the customs, statutes, and ordinances of the universal Church; and that those who had separated themselves from it either reunite themselves to it, or at least conform to this constitution; and that all should quietly expect the decisions of the general council.” It was published in the diet of Augsburg, May 15, 1548. To the Protestant clergy it granted, for the time being, the right of residence and status of the Reformed city communion of both kinds. It was truly a standard of faith put forth by the emperor independent of Rome, as the pope refused to sanction it; and in the face of the bitter complaints that came to him that the power and property of the Church should be diminished. Afterwards the emperor showed the pope that he too, like Henry VIII, could regulate the consciences of his subjects, and prescribe their religious faith. The elector of Ments, quite contrary to the wishes of the other members of the Diet, and of the people there represented, announced the acceptance of the interim by the states, and it was consequently declared law, and printed in Latin and in Geo-INTERIM

Both Protestants and Catholics began, however, violently to attack it; the Romanists complained of the concessions made to the Protestants, while the Protestant princes (John Frederick of Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse, the margrave John von Kustrin, the elector Wolfgang von Zweiibrücken) declined introducing it in their states; the only princes who submitted to it were the elector of Brandenburg, the count of Württemberg, and the cities of Augsburg, Halle, etc. (the latter by compulsion).

III. THE LEIPZIG INTERIM.—The Lutheran theologians openly declared they would not receive the Augsburg interim, alleging that it re-established popery; some caused an edict of banishment against it to be drawn up and subscribed to it. Calvin and several others wrote against it. On the other side, the emperor was so severe against those who refused to accept it, that he disfranchised the cities of Magdeburg and Constance for their opposition.

Most important, however, for the Protestant cause, and impossible for Charles to pass unheeded, was the opposition against the Augsburg interim by Maurice of Saxony, who denied the right of the elector of Mentz to give himself the approval to an act that demanded the concurrence of the states directly and not indirectly. Yo fortify himself more strongly in his position, Mauritz dissolved the diet and summoned a new one, and called a council of state and of prominent theologians at Leipzig and other cities. In the conference at Leipzig it was decided, Sept. 22, 1548, that the Augsburg interim could not be accepted. Yet, for fear of incurring the displeasure of the emperor, a compromise was effected. In a series of resolutions which were adopted, they admitted a great part of the Roman Catholic ceremonies, and tacitly acknowledged also the power of the popes and bishops, but yet well guarded (1) the creed of the Reformers. These resolutions of the conference were published as the Leipzig Interim, Oct. 22, 1548. Subsequently it was divided into a lesser and greater interim. The first was based on resolutions passed at the conference of Celle, and was published by an edict of the elector, and this ultimately became the basis of the greater Leipzig Interim. It was prepared by Melancthon, Bugenhagen, Major, and times other of Anhalt. It restored some Roman Catholic practices; directed that mass should be celebrated in ringing of bells, lighted tapers, and a decorated altar, accompanied by singing, and be performed in Latin by priests in canonicals; that the Horae comitials, and psalms should be sung according to the custom of each place; the old festival days of Mary, etc., were re-established, and meat forbidden on Fridays and fast-days, etc. These decisions, which were promulgated in March, 1549, met with much opposition in Saxony, yet they were strictly enforced, and such ministers as refused to submit to the interim were deposed, as, for instance, Placius of Wittenberg. The latter then put himself at the head of the opposing party, called by the partisans of the interim Adiaphorists. See ADIAPHORIST CONTROVERSY. Another treacherous action of Maurice, which secured his services anew to the Reformers, undid all the work already accomplished by Charles V: "and while Henry II was winning, at the expense of the empire, the delusive title of conqueror, Charles found himself reduced to the hard necessity of restoring all that his crooked policy had for so many years been devoted to exterminating." In 1553 the interim was finally confirmed by all the states of Germany, and the Diet of Augsburg, was finally confirmed the right of the states and cities of the Augsburg Confession (q. v.) "to enjoy the practices of their religion in peace." Compare MANUEL, Neue Geschichte, vol. iii; Robertson, Charles V (Harper's edit.), bk. ix, especially p. 377 sq.; and see BLOCHER, Ueber d. INTERMEDIATE STATE, a phrase employed to denote the state or situation of disembodied souls during the interval between death and the resurrection. There have been several theories upon the subject. See HATER.

The condition of the soul after death cannot but be a subject of intense concern to every thoughtful mind. Pagan philosophers have groped in the dark for some clue to guide their aspirations after immortality, but have at best attained only surmises and conjectures. Of all the theories that have ever been advanced, which separates time from eternity, none have ever returned to bring tidings of what befall them the moment after they launched from the shores of mortality. Revelation alone has cast a ray across the mighty void, and its light has gradually grown clearer and more penetrating, until in the New Testament we are no longer left in any measure to doubt whether, "if a man die, he shall live again." We rest assured that not only shall the soul survive the shock of dissolution, but the body also shall eventually join it in an endless reunion.

Still the question recurs. What will be the intermediate state and what shall be the external circumstances of the spirit during the period between death and the resurrection? Respecting this little is definitely said in the Scriptures, and it is therefore left for speculation to fill up the lack of information on this interesting theme, guided by such hints thrown out by the sacred writers, and such considerations as the ascertained nature and destiny of man afford.

1. The popular sentiment or belief of Christians—expressed rather in the form of hope than as a theory—appears to be that the righteous enter heaven immediately after death, and the wicked immediately after the second coming of the Lord, in line with the parable of Dives and Lazarus, are thought especially to support this view; and hence believers have fearlessly cast themselves into the arms of death, expecting to awake the next moment in the full realities of everlasting glory.

Now we would not for all the world deprive dying saints of a particle of the consolation which the Gospel is designed to yield, nor is it any part of our present purpose to weaken anticipations of the future rest in the kingdom of God. On the other hand, we are equally insensible of the known truth that a long—probably immense—interval of time will elapse between the decease of Christians of the present age—and certainly of past centuries —and the revival of their bodies at the general judgment, is sufficient to prove that they do not instantly pass from the Church militant to the New Jerusalem above. Let us calmly and logically consider what may be ascertained as to the experience and surroundings of the soul during this intermediate period. See IMMORALITY.

The topic calls for a volume rather than an essay, and, as we must be brief, we make but two other preliminary remarks. The first is that we have not space here to discuss the above and kindred passages of the New Testament; but we direct the reader to professed commentaries for their exposition, and the solution of the points in dispute. We are arguing ourselves here with simply observing that they are figurative in their phraseology, and that, whatever they may mean, they cannot be intended to contradict the fact of a real space between death and the resurrection. Our other prelatory remark is, that as this is legitimate and debatable ground, no essential breach of creed or orthodoxy being involved in it, we ought not to incur any odium theologicae of unsoundness in the faith should our discussion lead to new and surprising conclusions. This last remark is especially pertinent in view of the fact that even orthodox Christians in all ages have entertained very different views on this subject, as will appear from the following enumeration of opinions.

II. The theory of a state of sleep, insensibility, or unconsciousness. It was taught as early as A.D. 248 by the Arabian Thetosophists, whom Origen combatted. It was thought to be held by pope John XXII, and was discussed at the University of Padua, in the time of pope Benedict XII. It was revived by the Swiss Anabaptists under the name of Psychopompists, and was opposed by Calvin. And in later times it has been started anew, in a form more or less distinct, by John Heyn, Wetzstein, Sulzer, Reinhard, and Whately, and by a new sect in Italy. It was the subject of a state of insensibility produced such texts as Psa. xxi, 15; 1 Thess. iv, 14. In opposition are cited 2 Cor. v, 8; Phil. i, 28; Matt. xvii, 3; Luke xvi, 23; xxiii, 43; Rev. vi, 9.

III. The theory of a Purgatory. That Christ preached to the souls detained in Hades, as the patriarchs or others, was held in the 2d and 3d centuries by Justin, Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Clem. Alexandrinus. It was supposed to be warranted by 1 Pet. iii, 19; Acts ii, 27; Rom. x, 7; Eph. iv, 9; Matt. xxii, 31. The idea of a purgatorial fire is more or less obscurely hinted in the writings of Origen and Cyprian. But the complete scheme owes its paternity to Gregory the Great, who propounded it as an article of faith, along with intercessory masses for the dead; finding a supposed warrant in 2 Macc. xii, 46. In opposition to the notion of a Purgatory, it may be said that it is said that it is absurd to think that the human soul exists in the purgatory state of reason and common sense; that it is contradictory to express assertions of Scripture (Heb. xii, 23; Rev. xiv, 13, xxiii, 11); that it is subversive of the cardinal doctrines of the Gospel, the atonement and justification by faith in Christ; that it robs the Christian of evangelical peace and consolation; and that it was unknown to the primitive Church. Even Augustine, when he prayed for the increase of his deceased mother's happiness, denied the existence of any middle place. (So also Clem, Rom. Ep. 2 ad Cor.) The article, "he descended into hell," was not admitted into the Apostles' Creed, nor those of other nations. It appeared first in the Creed of Ariminum, A.D. 585, and in that of Aquileia, A.D. 381 (Rufinus, De Symbolo.). See Wilson, Illustrations from Apost. Fathers, p. 106. Comp. PURGATORY.

IV. The scheme of a middle or intermediate place, or purgatory, is a different idea from that of an intermediate state, meaning by the latter only an inferior degree of happiness apart from the yet unraised body. It is affirmed that judgment is not pronounced till the last day; but this is denied, a particular judgment passing on each individual, and his place being assigned him upon his death (Acts i, 35; Luke xvi, 23; xxiii, 43; 2 Cor. xii, 2, 4). It is said that no one is perfectly holy when he dies, but only such can enter heaven. In reply, it is contended, as in the Westminster Catechism, that there is a distinction made between being perfectly holy and perfectly blessed, the first taking place at death, the latter only at the resurrection (Heb. xii, 23). It is alleged that the Scriptures favor the notion (John iii, 18; xx, 17; Acts ii, 34; Heb. xi, 39); to which it is replied that these texts are dubious, and neutralized by others positive and unequivocal (Job xiv, 19; Acts ii, 21; xxiii, 39; Rev. xiv, 25; vii, 14). We proceed to render this theory more definite by proposing our own view of the subject.

1. In the first place, we lay it down as an axiom that a disembodied or pure spirit is necessarily freed from all the relations of space of which we are terminally cognizant, as by the senses, as by the physical organs are absent. Such a spirit may, for ought we know—and perhaps this position is the more probable—be open to intercourse with other pure spirits; doubtless it is at least accessible to the divine Spirit, from whose influence nothing material or immaterial can be veiled; but we are unable to conceive of any intercourse or connection between it and the present relations of things. There is absolutely no medium of communication, as far as we are aware. Death severs the link between the soul and the body, and therefore between the soul and all bodies. What new capacities may by that act be developed within the soul, what new relations created with other immaterial beings,—are questions, of which we have no means of knowing; and, indeed, we have no reason to suppose any such; but if we would not utterly confound mind and matter, or unconsciously clothe the departed spirits with some ethereal form of body, we are bound to conclude, from the total diversity and even contrariety of their appearances and attributes, that they are really dead to everything pertaining to time and sense.

This cuts us, root and branch, all those impressions—some have even gone so far as to claim them as scientific experience—of intercommunication between living persons and the spirits of their deceased friends. The common sense of enlightened Christianity has long since stamped all such stories with the just suspicion of superstitious imagination. Severe reasoning compels us to set them down as hallucination or imposture. Those who have indulged themselves in these fancies have always evidenced a strong desire for an Ascendancy of the Soul.

A disembodied spirit, therefore, prior to the restoration of its physical organism, is incapable of any of the material joys which imagination is wont to associate with the full idea of the heavenly state. We must carefully exclude from its experience during that interval every relation to the physical world and present externalities. That these, and more than these, will be restored on the consummation of its bliss in the new heavens and the new earth of its final abode, we are abundantly assured by the symbols and teachings of the New Testament; but the soul must wait for these enjoyments until its bodily counterpart has of course been raised, spiritualized, perfected, and immortalized.

We may go further than this, and declare that none of the now known and verbally defined relations in point of location are predictable of the departed soul; in other words, it is not in any particular assignable place while in that state. The instant it quits the body it passes to no local habitation. Its position cannot be determined as to space, for it has no metes or boundaries, no point of contact with visible objects. It can neither be said to be somewhere nor nowhere, nor yet everywhere. It is in the second place, the soul is apprehended as a spirit, a spirit omnipresent, without property being spoken of as being more any where than elsewhere. This, we admit, is an abstraction; but we are speaking of a mere abstraction; for what can be more abstract—more really inconceivable according to our earthly notions—than a soul without a body?

But let it not be imagined that the soul has thus lost any of its essence or inherent powers. It remains in all these absolute and intact, a veritable entity, as truly such as any spiritual being, or as when united to the body, or indeed as the body itself; but it is shut within itself, and circumscribed by the limits of its own being. All the powers of a disembodied soul are as vast as any, or as any else, or than any where else. This, we admit, is an abstraction; but we are speaking of a mere abstraction; for what can be more abstract—more really inconceivable according to our earthly notions—than a soul without a body?

swear of the flight of hours, seasons, or ages. To it "a thousand years are as one day"—both alike unappreciatable. The only change it could experience would be the succession of its own ideas, and these—if comparable for such a purpose with our present associations of thought, which are like chords played upon by every person—would amount to a complete change of condition—furnish no fixed standard or definite mark to our own consciousness. How seldom do we think of the lapse of time during our dreams, which afford the nearest parallel to the state we are considering; and how wide of a true estimate are we when we chance to consider the conformation of the view that none, or nearly none, of our present sensations appear in our solenomy. Some notable instances are on record of the ergogic miscalculation of time by dreaming persons, showing that in sleep they have no accurate means of determining it, but that they protract or abbreviate it to suit the humor of the dream. Much more would this be true with the disembodied soul, which has even less opportunity or occasion to review its course of thoughts for such a purpose, or, indeed, to take any note of its rapidity or tidiousness of succession. We conclude, therefore, that the intermediate state will pass to all intents and purposes to show that none will be aware of the length of the interval.

This is in accordance with a remarkable passage of Scripture—about the only one where the subject is directly and literally touched upon—and this but incidentially, in answer apparently to a query that had been advanced in regard to the future of the saved and the unrepentant persons; for the Scriptures are very charger of information on such abstruse points. Paul tells us expresly (1 Thess. iv. 15, 17), "We [or those] which are alive and remain unto the [final] coming of the Lord shall not precede ([prevent]) them which are asleep.
We [or those] who are alive and remain in our bodies, called together with them in the clouds." He is speaking, it is true, of the resurrection of the body, and it is with reference to this that he says one class of saints shall not anticipate another in that reward; but his language implies that none shall have any advantage in point of time over the rest, and this would not be true if some must pass long centuries of waiting, while others are translated suddenly from earth to heaven.
No; it will all be equalized: Noah, who died thousands of years ago, shall not seem to himself to pass any longer period of expectation than the one he was called to spiritual life by the last saint that is interred just as Gabriel's trump shall reawaken his undecayed corpse, or than those who then shall be living on the globe.
This theory meets and harmonizes all their cases, and vindicates the divine impartiality.

Something of this may likewise be derived from the simultaneousness of the general judgment.
We surely are not to suppose that any will remain cycles of ages in the other world, whether happy or miserable, without having their destiny as yet fixed, and their final doom awarded. To each individual's consciousness, doubtless, will be definitely assigned, at the instant he is ushered into the presence of his Maker, the awards of his irrecoverable fate, and this knowledge will form the basis of his joy or despair. The only object after this of a general gathering would be to make known to the universe a sentence that has perhaps been anticipated by the parties chiefly interested. The Scriptural representations of the "last grand assize" are evidently scenic in their character, that is, pictures of what to those concerned shall seem to transpire substantially, but not necessarily literally thus. See JUDGMENT, Good News, "What a universal assemblage would be more possible and signif-ificant: to each human being the hour of death is practically, although not actually, the day of judgment, for the two events are separated only by an inapprecia-table interval; and as the same is true of all his fellows, and as their several days of doom are also separated by an inappreciable interval, they are all red—ed to every man's own apprehension—to the same plane of time, and consequently may judge—yet with reference to individuals—be depicted as judged together. The hour of Christ's three predicted comings—in vengeance on the Jews—in the article of death—in the final scene—thus, although really distinct events, become identical by more than any conceivable difference of time and place, and is justified in alluding to them all in the same breath.

3. In the third and last place, however, as above intimated, the intermediate state will not be a period of unconsciousness. This might be hastily inferred from the insulation of the spirit from all sources of external knowledge and sense perception. But let us not olay up in the whole inner world of thought and feeling: memory is busy with the past, and hope is active with anticipations of the future; the direct comforts of the Holy Spirit also are by no means denied during this expectant period, and none can tell how greatly these and all the foregoing emotions may be intensified by the rapt state of the disembodied soul. Examples like those of Paul "caught up into the third heavens," of Tennent in a prolonged fit of catalepsy, and of others in similar extraordinary states of spiritual elevation, might be subtracted. A substraction of bodily functions is calculated to enhance the perception of celestial verities; but these, it must be borne in mind, were real real experiences in the flesh—although Paul seems doubtful whether he was not actually "out of the body," and at least intimates that such mental exaltation would be not repressed or released by any such condition. The actions of his mind are not described as occurring under the joint relations of soul and body, and therefore no sure indications of what might take place in a disembodied state. Accordingly, we fall back upon the position most agreeable to our native aspirations, and most conformable, as we think, to the teachings of revelation, that the soul, immediately after passing out of the body, enters upon a condition of conscious hap-iness or misery, according to its previous fitness and habits. In a word, we see no reason why, when set free from connection with the body, the spirit should do otherwise than in the case of the soul before its union with telletuctions which had already become customary with it. Until its reunion with the body, however—a space, as we have seen, of practically no account to itself, at least in point of duration—it can receive no new experience, and be subject to no external influences, unless they be purely spiritual. See HEAVEN.

Interpretation, Biblical, or the science of sacred Hermesmatics, as it is more technically called. In a narrower sense it is frequently termed exegesis, especially in relation to particular passages. For practical rules of interpretation, see Hermesmatics.

1. Definition and Use of the Word. In very ancient and widespread belief that the knowledge of divine things in general, and of the divine will in particular, is by no means a common property of the whole human race, but only a prerogative of a few specially-gifted and privileged individuals. It has been considered as this higher degree of knowledge than its sources lie in light and instruction proceeding directly from God, and that it can be imparted to others by communicating to them a key to the signs of the divine will. Since, however, persons who in this manner have been individually taught, are initiated into divine secrets, and consequently appear as the confidants of Deity, they also enjoy, although instructed only through the medium of others, a more intimate communion with God, a more distinct perception of his thoughts, and consequently a mediate consciousness of Deity itself. It therefore follows that persons thus either immediately or medially initiated, are supposed to be capable, by means of their divine illumination and their knowledge of the signs of the divine will, to impart to mankind the arduously desired knowledge of divine things and of the will of Deity. They are considered to be interpreters or explainers of the signs of the divine will, and, consequently, to be mediators between God and man. Divine illumination, and a communicable knowledge of the signs and expressions of the divine will, are thus supposed to be combined in one and the same person. See Revelation.

2. The above general idea is the basis of the Hebrew נביא, prophet. The prophet is a divinely-inspired seer, and, as such, he is an interpreter and preacher of the divine will. He may either be directly called by God, or have been prepared for his office in the schools of the prophets (comp. Knobel, Der Prophetenmus der Hebräer vollständig dargestellt, Bresl., 1867, i, 102 sq.; ii, 45 sq.). See Seer.

However, the being filled with the Holy Ghost was the most prominent feature in the Hebrew idea of a prophet. This is even implied in the usual appellation מִשְׁנֵי, which means a person in the state of divine inspiration (not a predictor of future events). Prophetism ceased altogether as soon as Jehovah, according to the popular opinion, ceased to communicate his Spirit to his people. See Prophet.

3. The Hebrew notion of נביא appears among the Greeks to have been split into its two constituent parts of μάνης, from μανεῖν, to rave (Plato, Phaedrus, § 48, ed. Steph. p. 344, a, b.), and of Ἡγεμόν, from ἦγε-μον, to command. However, the idea of μάνης and of Ἡγεμόν could be combined in the same person. Compare Boissin, Ateodota Graece, i, 90; Apollo, Ἡγεμόν, μάνης γάρ νῦν και χαρισμάτων ἐγείρετο (compare Scholia in Aristophanes, Nubes, 396), and Arrian, Epictetus, ii, 7, Ἄν αἱ μανής τῶν Ἡγεμόνων τα σημεία; Plato, De Legibus, ix, p. 871, c, ὁ Ἡγεμόν καὶ μάνης; Eupides, Philemon, v. 1018, ὁ μάνης Ἡγεμό- να, and Iphigenia in Aulis, i, 530. Plutarch (Vita Apollonii, cap. x) places Ἡγεμόν and μανής together; so also does Dionysius Halicarnassensis, ii, 78. The first two of these examples prove that Ἡγεμόν were, according to the Greeks, persons who possessed the gift of reveling the will of the Deity, defining certain appearances and of interpreting signs. Jul. Pollux (viii, 124) says, Ἡγεμόν ἄρα ἰδιωτοὶ οἱ τὰ πειρὰ τῶν δο- σμέων καὶ τὰ τῶν ἄλλων ἰδιών διακόσμηται. Hor- pocrates says, and Suidas repeats after him, Ἡγεμόνι, ὁ Ἡγεμόνις τῶν ἰδιών. Comp. Becker, Ateodota Graec., p. 310, and Plutarch, De Antiqu. Cith. 355, Ἡγεμόνιος οἱ Ἡγεμόνια ἐν διάθεσις ἐν θείων ὁμοπληρωματίας. See Interpreter, in his Symbolik and Mythologie der alten Völker, i, 15, as persons whose high vocation it was to...
on the interpreters of dreams and omens are called also interpreters of dreams (Quintil. Inst. iii. 6).

From what we have stated, it follows that ἐγγύτης and interpretatio were originally terms confined to the unfooling of supernatural subjects, although in Latin, at an early period, these terms were also applied to profane matters.

The Christians also early felt the want of an interpretation of their sacred writings, which they deemed to be of divine origin; consequently they wanted interpreters and instruction by the aid of which the true sense of the sacred Scriptures might be discovered. The right understanding of the nature and will of God seemed of the greatest importance; well and truly to understand the meaning that God, the artist of his own work, had put upon the heathen, to depend upon a right understanding of certain external signs; however, there was a progress from the unintelligible signs of nature to more intelligible written signs, which was certainly an important progress.

The Christians retained about the interpretation of their sacred writings the same expressions which had been current in reference to the interpretation of sacred subjects among the heathen. Hence arose the fact that the Greek Christians employed with predilection the words ἐγγύτης or ἐγγύτης for the interpretation of the holy Scriptures. But the circumstance that St. Paul employs the term ἐγγύτης γιαλωσιων for the interpretation of the γιαλωσις καλειν (1 Cor. xii. 10; xiv. 26), greatly contributed to the use likewise of words belonging to the root ἐγγυτεω. According to the bishop of Hierapolis, wrote, as early as about A.D. 100, a work under the title of λογοι ευαγγελικοι ἐγγύησις, which means an interpretation of the discourses of Jesus. Papias explained the religious contents of these discourses, which he had collected from oral and written traditions. He distinguished between the meaning of ἐγγύησια and ἐγγυτεω, as appears from his observation (preserved by Eusebius in the place quoted above), in which he says concerning the λογος of Matthew, written in Hebrew, ἐγγυτεω δ οι ανω πνευματος ἐγγυτεω, "But every one interpreted them according to his ability." In the Greek Church, the ἐγγύης and ἐγγυτεω τοι τω λογοι were the usual terms for teachers of Christianity. (See Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica, vii. 30, and Heinichen on this passage, note 21; Photius, Biblioth. cod. p. 105; Cave, Hist. Liter. i. 145.) Originates his commentaries on the holy Scriptures and interpreters. In reference to the meaning of the word of the Bible, entitled σχολαι ἐγγυτεω. However, we find the word ἐγγυτεω employed as a synonym of ἐγγύης, especially among the inhabitants of Antioch. For instance, Gregorius Nyssenius says concerning Ephraem Syrus, Γραμματεοι θυμάμενοι ρήματα λόγον ὁμογενεών (see Gregory of Nyssa, Vita Ephraimatis Syri, in Opera, Paris, ii, 1328). Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and others, wrote commentaries on the sacred Scriptures under the title of ἐγγύης (comp. A. H. Nie- neyer, De Isidoris Pelasgiis Vita, Scripta, et Doctrina, Halae, 1825, p. 67). Among the Latin Christians the word interpres had a wider range than the corresponding Greek term, and the Latins had no precise term for the exposition of the Bible which exactly corresponded with the Greek. The interpretation was applied only in the sense of occupation or act of an expositor of the Bible, but not in the sense of contents elicited from Biblical passages. The words tractare, tractatur, and tractatus were in preference employed with respect to Biblical exposition, and the sense which it elicited. Together with these words there occur commentarii and tractatus. St. Augustine's tractatus are well known; and this father frequently mentions the divinarum scripturarum tractatc. For instance, Retractationes, I. 26, "Divinarum tractatorum eloquium est," Subplicitus Severus, Dial. IV. 2 a. 6. "Originem..." 7. "qui tractator sacrorum priscitius habeatur." Vincentius Lirinensis observes in his Commentarium on 1 Cor. xii. 28: "In the third place, teachers who are now called tractatores; whom the same apostle sometimes styles prophets, because by them the mysteries of the prophets are opened to the people" (comp. Dufresne, Glosarium medii et inferior Latinitat, s. v. Tractator; Tractatus; and Baluze, ad Servett. Lupum, p. 479). However, the occupation of interpres, in the nobler sense of this word, was not unknown to St. Jerome, as may be seen from his Prophesia in libros Samuelis (Opera, ed. Vallarsi, i. 458): "For whatever, by frequently transacting, divulgating and explaining certain signs and events, as is the duty of an expositor, if you are grateful, or a paraphrast if you are ungrateful." In modern classification, Herennius 4 forms a branch of the same general study with Exegesis (q. v.), and, indeed, is often confounded with that science; but the distinction between the two branches is very marked, and is, perhaps, sufficiently indicated by the etymology of the names themselves. To hermeneutics propinquity below in expounding in the history of the discovery of its true meaning; the province of exegesis is the exposition of the meaning so discovered, and the practical office of making it intelligible to others in its various bearings, scientific, literal, doctrinal, and moral. Hence, although the laws of interpretation have many things in common with those of explication, it may be laid down that to the especial province of hermeneutics belongs all that regards the text and interpretation of the Holy Scripture; the signification of words, the force and significance of idioms, the modification of the sense by the context, and the other details of philological and grammatical inquiry; the critical examination of the writer or the persons whom he addressed; of the circumstances in which he wrote, and the object to which his work was directed; the comparison of parallel passages; and other similar considerations. All these inquiries, although seemingly purely literary, are modified by the views entertained as to the text of Holy Scripture, and especially on the question of its inspiration, and the nature and degree of such inspiration" (Chambers, Cyclopaedia). II. History, Methods, and Literature.—1. From ancient times the Christian Church has been divided into religious denominations, and have taken the same supranatural view with reference to the Bible, as before the Church, the Jews did with respect to the Old Testament. The Church and denominations have supposed that in the authors of Biblical books there did not exist a literary activity of the same kind as induces men to write down what they have thought, but have always required from their followers the belief that the Biblical authors wrote in a state of inspiration, that is to say, under a peculiar and direct influence of the divine Spirit. Sometimes the Biblical authors were described to be merely external and mechanical instruments of God's revelation. But, however wide or however narrow the boundaries were within which the operation of God upon the writers was confined by ecclesiastical supposition, the origin of the Biblical books was always supposed to be essentially different from the human compositions; and this difference demanded the application of peculiar rules in order to understand the Bible. There were required peculiar acts and kinds of information in order to discover the sense and contents of books which, on account of their extraordinary origin, were inaccessible by the ordinary way of logical rules, and whose written words were only outward signs, behind which a higher and divine meaning was concealed. Consequently, the Church and denominations required ἐγγυτεω, or interpreters, of the signs by means of which God had revealed his will. Thus necessarily arose again in the Christian Church the art of opening or interpreting the supernatural, which art had an existence in earlier religions, but with this essential difference, that the signs, by the opening of which supernatural truth was obtained, were now more simple, and of a more intelligible kind than in earlier religions. They were now written signs, which belonged to the sphere of speech and language, through which alone all modes of representation are now possible, and can be readily communicated to others. But the holy Scriptures, in which divine revelation was preserved, differ, by conveying divine thoughts, from common language and writing, which convey only human thoughts. Hence it followed that the deeper, the wiser, the more original, the more subtle, the more profound, what is reserved for the higher sphere of human thoughts, so that the usual requisites for the right understanding of written documents appeared to be insufficient. According to this opinion, a lower and a higher sense of the Bible were distinguished. The lower sense was that which could be elicited according to the rules of grammar; the higher sense was considered to consist of deeper thoughts concealed under the grammatical meaning of the words. These deeper thoughts they endeavored to obtain in various ways, but not by grammatical research. The Jews, in the days of Jesus, employed for this purpose allegorical—typical—allego-legendary interpretation. The Jews of Palestine endeavored by means of this mode of interpretation especially to elicit the secrets of futurity, which were said to be fully contained in the Old Testament. (See Walthers, Antiquitates Hebraeorum, Göttingen, 1743, l, 341 sq.; Dzik, Hebraisches Wörterbuch der neusten Schriftdichter, Leipsic, 1809, p. 88, sq., 164 sq.; Hirschfeld, Der Geist der Talmudischen Auslegung der Bibel, Berlin, 1840; compare Juvenal, Sat. xiv, 108; Justin Martyr, Apol. i, p. 52, 61; Bretschneider, Historisch-dogmatische Auslegung d. Neuen Testamentes, Leipzig, 1837, 85 sq.).

The Alexandrine Jews, on the contrary, endeavored to raise themselves from the simple sense of the words το υπηκοον, to a higher, more general, and spiritual sense, το συμβολικον (see Dühne, Geschichtliche Durstellung der Jüdisch-Alexandrinischen Religions-Philologie, Halle, 1824, i, p. 50 sq.; ii, 17, 195 sq., 209, 226, 241). Similar principles were adopted by the authors of the New Testament (see De Wette, Über die Symbolisch-Typische Lehrtart in Briefe an die Hebräer, in Theologische Zeitschrift, by Schleiermacher and De Wette, pt. iii; Tholuck, Briefe zum Commentar über den Brief an die Galater, 1837).

These two modes of interpretation, the allegorical-typical and the allegorical-mystical, are found in the Christian writers as early as the first and second centuries; the latter as νοεμα; the former as a demonstration that all things are in some sense a fore-shadowing of what was to come was somehow contained in the sacred Scriptures (see Justin Martyr, Apol. i, p. 52, 61, and Tertullian, Adversus Marcionem, iv, 2, "The preaching of the disciples might appear to be questionable, if it was not supported by other authority"). To these allegorical modes of interpretation was added a third mode, which necessarily sprung up after the rise of the Catholico-apostolical Church, namely, the dogmatical or theologico-ecclesiastical. The followers of the Catholico-apostolical Church agreed that all apostles and all apostolical writings had an equal authority, because they were all under an equal guidance of the Holy Ghost. Hence it followed that they could not set forth either contradictory or different doctrines. A twofold expediency was adopted in order to effect harmony of interpretation. The one was of the apparent and relative kind, because it referred to subjects which appear incomprehensible only to the confined human understanding, but which are in perfect harmony in the divine thoughts. Justin (Dialogus cum Tryphonc, c. 65) says: "Being quite certain that no Scripture contradicts the other, I will rather confess that I do not understand what is said therein." S. Chrysostom restricted this as follows (Homil. iii. c. 4, in Ep. 2 ad Thessalonicensias): "In the divine writings everything is intelligible and plain, whatever is necessary is open" (compare Homil. iii. De Lucaro, and Athanasii Oratio contra gentes, in Opera, i, 13).

The second expediency adopted by the Church was to consider certain articles of faith to be leading doctrine, and to regulate and define accordingly the sense of the Holy Scriptures over it appears double and uncertain.

This led to the theologico-ecclesiastical or dogmatical mode of interpretation, which, when the Christians were divided into several sects, proved to be indispensable to the Church, but which adopted various forms in the various Churches. Not only the heretics of ancient times, but also the followers of the Roman Catholic, the Greek Catholic, the Syrian, the Anglican, the Protestant Church, etc., have endeavored to interpret the Bible in harmony with their dogmas.

Besides the three modes of interpretation which have been mentioned above, theological writers have employed of typical, prophetical, emphatical, philosophical, traditional, moral, or practical interpretation. But all these are only one-sided developments of some single feature contained in the above three, arbitrarily chosen; and, therefore, they cannot be considered to be separate modes of interpretation, but are only a mixture of those three. The interpretation in which all these modes are brought into harmony has lately been called the panharmonical, which word is not very happily chosen (F. H. Germar, Die Panharmonische Interpretation im Heiligen Schrift, Lpz., 1821; and by the same author, Beitrag zur Allgemeinen Hermeneutik, Altona, 1829). The interpretation which, in spite of all ecclesiastical opposition, ought to be adopted as being the only true one, strictly adheres to the demands of general hermeneutics, to which the other theories particularly do not conform to the requisites of particular cases. This has, in modern times, been styled the historico-grammatical mode of interpretation. This appellation has been chosen because the epigraph grammatical seems to be too narrow and too much restricted to the mere verbal sense. It might be more correctly styled simply the historical interpretation, since the word "historical" comprehends everything that is requisite to be known about the language, the turn of mind, the individuality, etc., of an author in order to rightly understand his book. This method, the origin of which has been traced to Semler (Vorlesungen z. d. theolog. Hermeneutik, 1763) and those three, is essentially the following: the grammatical, the allegorical, and the dogmatical. The grammatical mode of interpretation simply investigates the sense contained in the words of the Bible. The allegorical, according to Quintilian’s sentence, "Allud verbi, aliud sensu estendit," maintains that the words of the Bible have, besides their simple sense, another which is concealed as behind a picture, and endeavors to find out this supposed figurative sense, which, it is said, was not intended by the authors (see Olschewski, Ein Wort über leeren Schriftenma, Köningsberg, 1824). The dogmatical mode of interpretation endeavors to explain the Bible in harmony with the dogmas of the Church, following the principle of analogia fidei. Compare Concilii Tridentini, Session iv, decretr. ii: "Let no one venture to interpret the holy Scriptures in a sense contrary to that which the Church has held, and does hold, and which has the power of deciding what is the true sense and the right interpretation of the holy Scriptures." So also Rambach, Institutiones Hermeneuticae Sacrae (Jene, 1728): "The authority which this analogy of faith exercises upon interpretation consists in this, that it is the foundation and general principle according to the rule of which all scriptural interpretations are to be tried as by a touchstone.” Art. xx of the Anglican Church: “It is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's word, and is superfluous to the sacraments and institutional parts of Scripture so as to be repugnant to another.” Scotch Confession, art. xviii: “We dare not admit any interpretation which contradicts any leading article of faith, or any plain text of Scripture, or the rule of charity, etc.

2. The allegorical, as well as the dogmatical mode of interpretation, presupposes the grammatical, which consequently forms the basis of the other two, so that neither the one nor the other can exist entirely without it. Hence the grammatical mode of interpretation must have a historical precedence before the others. But history is native to the Church, and was emdavored to curtail the province of grammatical interpretation, to renounce it as much as possible, and to rise above it. If we follow, with the examining eye of a historical inquirer, the course in which these three modes of interpretation, in their mutual dependence upon each other, have generally been applied, it becomes evident that in opposition to the grammatical mode, the allegorical was first set up. Subsequently, the allegorical was almost entirely supplanted by the dogmatical; but it started up with renewed vigor when the dogmatical came to be adopted for uniformity in the interpretation of the human intellect, as well as all religious sentiment, within the too narrow bounds of dogmatical despotism. The dogmatical mode of interpretation could only spring up after the Church, renouncing the original multiplicity of opinions, had agreed upon certain leading doctrines; after which time it grew, together with the Church, like a mighty tree, towering high above every surrounding object, and casting its shade over everything. The longing desire for light and warmth, of those who were spellbound under its shade, induced them to cultivate again the allegorical and the grammatical interpretation: but they were unable to bring the fruits of these modes to full maturity. Every new intellectual revolution, and every spiritual development of nations, gave a new impulse to grammatical interpretation. This impulse lastedit until interpretation was again taken captive by the longing of ecclesiastical power, whose old formalities had regained strength, or which had been renovated under new forms. Grammatical interpretation, consequently, goes hand in hand with the principle of spiritual progress, and the dogmatical with the conservative principle. Finally, the allegorical interpretation is as ancient as the ecclesiastical system of interpretation, as the conservative principle, when, by its vigorous stability, the latter opposes a too unnatural pressure. This is confirmed by the history of all times and countries, so that we may confine ourselves to the following few illustrative observations.

The various tendencies of the first Christian period were combined in the second century, so that the principle of one general (Catholic) Church was gradually adopted by most parties. But now it became rather difficult to select, from the variety of doctrines prevalent in various sects, those by the application of which to Biblical interpretation a perfect harmony and systematical agreement might be obtained. Nevertheless, the Church, by the force of science powerfully demanded a systematic arrangement of Biblical doctrines, even before a general agreement upon dogmatical principles had been effected. The want of science were especially felt among the Alexandrine theologians; and in Alexandria, where the allegorical interpretation had from ancient time existed, it offered the desired expedient which met the exigency of the Church. Hence it may naturally be explained why the Alexandrine theologians of the second and third century, particularly Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen, interpreted allegorically, and why the allegorical interpretation was perfected, and in vogue, even before the dogmatical came into existence. Origen, especially in his fourth book, De Principiis, treat.s on scriptural interpretation, using the following arguments: The holy Scriptures, inspired by God, form a harmonious whole, perfect in itself, without any defects and contradictions, and containing nothing that is insignificant and superfluous to the grammatical parts of Scripture so as to be repugnant to another.

Since, however, allegorical interpretation cannot be reduced to settled rules, but always depends upon the greater or less influence of imagination; and since the system of Dogma, on the other hand, the Alexandrine theologians produced by means of allegorical interpretation, was in many respects objected to; and since, in opposition to these Alexandrine theologians, there was gradually established, and more and more firmly defined, a system of Christian doctrines which formed a firm basis for uniformity in interpretation, in the mind of the majority, there gradually sprang up a dogmatical mode of interpretation founded upon the interpretation of ecclesiastical teachers, which had been recognised as orthodox in the Catholic Church. This dogmatical interpretation has been in perfect existence since the beginning of the fourth century, and has more and more supplanted the allegorical, which henceforward was left to the wit and ingenuity of a few individuals. Thus St. Jerome, about A.D. 400, could say (Comment in Malach. 1, 16): “The rule of Scripture is, where there is a manifest prediction of future events, not to enfeebles that which is written by the uncertainty of allegory.” During the whole of the fourth century, the ecclesiastically-dogmatical mode of interpretation was developed with constant reference to the grammatical. Even Hilary, in his book De Trinitate, I, properly asserts: “He is the best reader of the Holy Writs who obtains sense from the words than imposes it upon them, and who carries more away than he has brought, nor forces that upon the words which he had resolved to understand before he began to read.”

After the commencement of the fifth century grammatical interpretation fell entirely into decay; which ruin was effected partly by the full development of the ecclesiastical system of doctrines defined in all their parts, and by a fear of deviating from this system, partly also by the continually increasing ignorance of the languages in which the Bible was written. The primary condition of ecclesiastical or dogmatical interpretation was then most clearly expressed by Vincentius Lirinnessis (Consolatus. i): “Since the holy Scriptures, on account of their depth, are not understood by all in the same manner, but their sentences are understood differently by different persons, so that they might seem to approach variously, and not be agreed upon; we must take care that within the pale of the Catholic Church we hold fast what has been believed everywhere, always, and by all” (Compare Consolatus. ii, ed. Frenernessis, 1668, p. 821 sq.). Henceforward interpretation was confined to the mere expression of Christian doctrine, which was first given by men whose ecclesiastical orthodoxy was unquestionable. “It is better not to be imbued with the pretended novelty, but to be filled from the fountain of the ancient” (Cassiodor, Institutions Diacon, Pref. Compare Alciati Epitola ad Gisla, in Opera, ed. Frenernessis, i. 464; Comment in Jn, ed. Jn. Claudius Turon, Prolegomena in Comment, in Libros Re- gnum; Haymo, Historia Ecclesiastica, i, 3, etc.). Doubtful cases were decided according to the precedents of ecclesiastical definitions. “In passages which may be either doubtful or obscure, we might know that we should follow that which is found to be neither contrary to evangelical precepts, nor opposed to the decrees of holy men” (Benedicti Capitulare, iii, 58, in Pertz, Monu-

During the whole period of the Middle Ages the allegorical interpretation again prevailed. The Middle Ages were distinguished by intolerance than by clarity, and the allegorical interpretation gave satisfaction to sentiment and occupation to free mental spec-culation. The typical system of miracle-plays (q.v.) and the Biblia Pauperum exactly illustrate the spirit of allegorical interpretation in the Middle Ages. But many of the most distinguished of the scholiasts (A.D. 840, in Gallaln Bibli, xiii, p. 446), Johannes Scottus, Erigena, Dutohnra, Nicolaus Lyranus, Roger Bacon, and others, acknowledged the necessity of grammatical interpretation, and were only wanting in the requisite means, and in knowledge, for putting it successfully into practice.

When, in the fifteenth century, classical studies had revived, they exercised also a favorable influence upon Biblical interpretation, and restored grammatical interpretation to honor. It was especially by grammatical interpretation that the dogmologing Catholic Church won the Reformation; for as soon as the newly-born Protestant Church had been dogmatically established, it began to consider grammatical interpretation a dangerous adversary of its own dogmas, and opposed it as much as did the Roman Catholics themselves. From the middle of the 16th to the middle of the 17th century both Protestant and Roman Catholics was subjected to the artificial law of a new dogmatisical interpretation, while the Roman Catholic Church changed the principle of interpretation formerly advanced by Vincentius into an ecclesiastical dogma. In consequence of this new opinion, the religious sentiment, which had frequently been worked up among Roman Catholics and Protestants, took refuge in allegorical interpretation, which then reappeared under the forms of typical and mystical theology.

After the beginning of the 18th century grammatical interpretation was reintroduced by the Arminians, and, in spite of constant attacks, towards the conclusion of that century, it decidedly prevailed among the German Protestants. It exercised a very beneficial influence, although it cannot be denied that manifold errors occurred in its application. During the last half century both Protestants and Roman Catholics have again curtailed the rights and invaded the province of grammatical interpretation by promoting (according to the general reaction of our times) the opposing claims of dogmatical and mystical interpretation. Comp. J. Rosenmüller, Historie Inter-

3. In accordance with the various notions concerning Biblical interpretation which we have stated, there have been produced Biblical hermeneutics of very different kinds; for instance, in the earlier period we might mention that of the Donatist Ticonius, who wrote about the fourth century his Regula ad investigandam et inventienandum Scripturam Sacram septem Augustimus, De Doctrina Christiane, lib. 1, 2; Isidora Hispalense, Sentent. 419 sq.,; Santia Fagnini (who died in 1541), decim (Colom. 1540); Sexti Semensis (who died 1599), which has frequently been reprinted, there belongs to our present subject only Liber tertius, Artem expositi

Sancta Scripta Catholicæ Expositurae apotropæa Baptism et Extremæ orationem. At a later period the Roman Catholics added to these the works of Goldhages (Mains, 1765), Bellarmine, Martianay, Calmet, and, more recently, Seemüller's Hermeneutica Sacra (1799); Mayr's Institutio Interpretis Sacri (1789); Jahn's Enchiridion Her-menen, (Vienna, 1812); Arigler's Hermeneutica Generalis (Vienna, 1792), and Hermeutica trium principum (1811); Ranold, Her. Bibl. Princ. Ratiothetica (Fifn Kirchen, 1898); Schnittler, Grundlinien der Her-meutik (Ratisbon, 1844); Claire's Hermeneutica Sacra (1840).

Of the part of the Lutherans were added Flaccius, Clavis Sacrae Scripturae (Basil, 1537, and often reprinted in two volumes); by Johann Gerhard, Tractatus de Legitima Scripta, Sacra Interpretatione (Jena, 1610); by Solomon Glasius, Philologia Sacra libri quinque (Jena, 1629, and often reprinted); by Jacob Rambach, Institutiones hermeneutica Sacrae (Jena, 1729).

On the part of the Calvinists there were furnished by Turretin, De Scriptura Sacra Interpretatione Tractatus Bipartitus (Dortrecht, 1729, and often reprinted).

In the English Church were produced by Herbert Marsh Lectures on the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible (Cambridge, 1740). Among the French, Tournay, Les Instructiones Sacrae (Paris, 1744, and often reprinted).

Since the middle of the last century it has been usual to treat on the Old—Testament hermeneutics on and on those of the New Testament in separate works: for instance, Meyer, Versuch einer Hermeneutik des Alten Testaments (Luebeck, 1759); Paraeus, Interpretatio Verbi Sacri (Trjacti, 1822); Ernesti, Institutio Interpretis Noi Testamenti (Lipsii, 1761, ed. 5th., curante Ammon, 1809; translated into English by Terrot, Edinburgh, 1833); Muros, Super Hermeneutica Noi Testamenti acroasae academicae (ed. Eichstädt, Lipsii, 1797-1800, in two volumes, but not completed); Keil, Lehrbuch der Hermeneutik des Neuen Testamentes, nach Grundsätzen der grammatisch-historischen Interpretation (Leipzig, 1810; the same work in Latin, Lipsii, 1811); Conybeer, The Baptiston Lectures for the year 1824, being an attempt to trace the History and to ascertain the limits of the secondary and spiritual Interpretation of Scripture (Oxford, 1824); Schleiermacher, Hermeneutik
The most complete is Klaussen, Hermeneutik des Neuen Testamentes (from the Danish, Leipzig, 1841); Wilke, Die Her-Interregnum. The interregnum from the time of the execution of Charles I to the accession of Charles II to the throne of England is one of the most important periods in the ecclesiastical history of that country. It was during this period that the Episcopal Church, "which had been reared by the wealth and power of the state, and cemented with the tears and blood of dissenters," was subjected to the greatest Internal Presbyte-rianism, and for a time even Congregationalism, gained the ascendency. But, to the justice of the latter, it must be said that the Congregationalists, or, rather, the Independents, never actually sought to establish their religion as the religion of the state. While the Congregationalists were the only sect who succeeded in enforcing uniformity to their creed. Stoughton says (in his Eccles. Hist. of England since the Restoration, i, 49), "It was with Presbyterianism thus tuated, rather than with Independency, or any other ecclesiastical systems, that Episcopacy came first into competition and conflict after the king's (Charles I) return. Some writers deny the possibility of an interregnum in the English government as it then existed, because, say they, "there can be legally no interregnum in a hereditary monarchy like that of England," and hold that the reign of Charles II is "always computed in legal language as commencing at the execution of Charles I." See Legal history.

INTOLERANCE

Interstitia Temporum. The Council of Sar dica established the principle "Potest poter possi so nare (cuius ab omnibus, quae beati tempe, probati, ut dem creasti, quae modestia, quae graviti tate et verecundia, et si dignus fuerit probatus, divino sacerdotio illustriatur, quia conveniens non est, nec ratio vel disciplina patitur, ut temere et leviter ordinetur episcopus aut presbyter aut diaconus . . . sed hi, quo rum per longam tempe examinata sit et velut mutrici fiet, sunt comprobata." Consequently every member of the clergy was obliged to spend a preparatory interval (inter stitium) before he could be promoted from a lower to a higher order (ordo) (Dist., c. 2). This principle was also observed concerning the consecration for the lower orders of the priesthood, the ordination of laics, ical functions were attached to them, but, as their ear ner character changed, the discipline also became more lax as regards the time of consecration (see Dist., c. 2, 9).

After the consecration to these lower offices had come, a consecration of a more solemnity for the transition to higher orders, the observation of the periods of habitations was also neglected. The Council of Trent at tempted to restore the old customs concerning the lower degrees of the priesthood (c. 17, Ses. 23, De Reforma), and stated expressly that "per temporum interstitia, nisi aliquid expedita est magia, deferatur, conferentur, ut . . . in unumque munere iuxta scripturae episcopi se exsecrante" (c. 11, etc.); yet this had but little or no effect, and it is even usual in some Roman Catholic countries to confer at the tonsure and all the lower orders. The Council of Trent decided also that between the lower consecration and the higher, and between each of these, there should be an interval of one year, "nisi necessitas altae ecclesiae utilitas aliquid poscat" (c. 11, 13, 14, etc.), but that "duo sacri ordines non eodem die, etiam regularibus, conferentur, privilegia ac indultis quibusvis concessis non obstans librorum quibusvis" (c. 13, etc.); compare also c. 13, 15, X. De temp. ord. i, 11; c. 2, X. De eo qui furtiv. v. 30). These intervals of years are computed, not according to the calendar, but according to the Church year. With regard to the right of dispensation conceded to the bishops by the Council of Trent (c. 11, cit.), the Congregatio Con-cellum decided that the simultaneous administration of the ordinum minores and the subdeaconship is a punishable offence (No. 1, c. 11, cit. in the edition of Schulte and Richter). Inthronisation is the ceremony of installing a bishop on the episcopal seat immediately after his consecration. It is said that in the early times of the Church it was customary for the bishop, after taking possession of his seat, to address the congregation, and this address was called Introductio. In the early times of the provinces under his control he addressed instead letters containing his confession of faith, intended to establish communications with them: these were called Introductory letters (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. i, c. xi, § 3). The province in which the province money is the tithe money paid by some prelates for the purpose of securing their ordination.—Bergier, Dict. de Théol. iii, 438.

Intrination is a name for one of the three modes in which the sacrament is administered to the laity of the Eastern Church (comp. Neale, Intro. East. Church, p. 525), viz., by breaking the consecrated bread into the consecrated wine, and giving to each communicant the two elements together in a spoon, to prevent the possibility of a common error by another element. Historical writers assert that the practice of intinction was introduced by Chrysostom himself (which Neale approves), but the traditional evidence adduced does not well support this assertion; and the fact, which seems to be pretty well established, that the two elements were of old administered together, by persons, is as it is now as done at present, makes it doubtful whether their admixture for communion was ever the ordinary practice. Bona (Rerum Luris, ii, xviii, 3), however, says that it was forbidden by Julius I (A.D. 337-352), whose decree, as given by Gratian (Juristic. ii, c. 7), speaks of it as a practice not warranted by the Gospel, in which Christ is represented as giving first his body and then his blood to the apostles; and, if this decree is authentic, it goes to prove that the practice was known during Chrysos-tom's time. The third Council of Braga (A.D. 675) decreed against it in their first canons, and the custom itself was used by Julius I: "Illo, quod pro complemento communiunis institutum tradunt eucharistiam populi, nec hoc probatum ex evangelio testimoniun recipit, ubi apostolus corpus suum et sanguinem commendavit; se eorumnum panis et sursoria celebens commissit meos.

Historically this custom was justified by those who held that the Eucharistic elements were prebuisse legimus excepto illo tantum discipulo, quem proditori impederent." Micrologus (c. xix) asserts that the practice contradicted the primitive canon of the Ronan liturgy, but this certainly cannot go to prove the time of its introduction into the Eastern Church. In the 11th century it was forbidden by the bull "Salus et munus" of Urban II (A.D. 1088-1099), except in cases of necessity; and his successor, Pascal II, forbade it altogether, and ordered in cases where difficulty of swallowing the solid element occurred, to administer the fluid element alone. Bona, however, quotes from Ivo of Chartres about this time a canon of a Council of Tours, in which priests are ordered to keep the reserved oblation "intaec in sanguine Christi, ut veracier Presbyter positiv diece infirmo, Corpus, et Sanguis Domini nostri Jesu Christi proficat tibi in remissionem peccatorum et vitam aeternam." The Convocation in Canterbury (A.D. 1175) expressed itself opposed to the practice of intinction in the following plain language: "Inhibemus ne quasi pro complemento communiones instituimus alium Eucharisticastrad.

But from the word complementum the practice for-bidden seems to have been as much the consumption of the superabundance of the elements by the laity (as one of the modern rubrics of the Church of England) as that of intinction. There can be no doubt, however, that the Western Church always stood committed against the practice, though some think that traces of it can be found, e. g. in the ancient Irish Visitation Office, written about the 9th century, and which was published by Sir William Bentham (comp. Hart, Eccles. Records, Intro. xiv). See CONOMIANT.

Intolerance is a word chiefly used in reference to those persons, churches, or societies who do not allow men to think for themselves, but impose on them articles, creeds, ceremonies, etc., of their own devising. See TOLERATION.

Nothing is more abhorrent from the genius of the Christian religion than an intolerant spirit or an intolerant church. "It has inspired its votaries with a savgard ferocity; has plunged the fatal dagger into innocent blood; has legislated towns and provinces; overthrown states and empires, and brought down the righteous vengeance of heaven upon a guilty world. The pre tence of superior knowledge, sanctity, and authority for its support is the disgrace of reason, the grief of wisdom, and the shame of humanity. To foster such a spirit is injustice; to inscribe it is an act of sacrilege; but to torture it by an attempt to force its feelings is horrible intolerance: it is the most abandoned violation of all the maxims of religion and morality. Jesus Christ formed a kingdom purely spiritual: the apostles exercised only a spiritual authority under the direction of Jesus Christ, particular churches were united only by faith and love, and were affiliated to civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and in religious concerns they were governed by the reasoning, advice, and exhortations of their own officers: their censures were only honest reproofs; and their excommunications were only declarations that such offenders, being incorrigible, were no longer acceptable members of the distinct communities.

Let it ever be remembered, therefore, that no man or men have any authority whatever from Christ over the consciences of others, or to persecute the persons of any whose religious principles agree not with their own. Intorsetta, Prosper, a Roman Catholic Sicilian who went to China as a Jesuit missionary, was born at Piazza in 1625. He had first studied law, but, believing in the Church, he joined the Society of Jesus, and served in her Chinese mission. After the establishment of the Church in China, he encountered many obstacles, but, notwithstanding, succeeded in making many converts. To the memory of the Chinese, he courageously pressed his work forward, and became one of the greatest of the Jesuit missionaries to that country. He died Oct. 3, 1696. His works evince a careful and continued study of the language of the country in which he aimed to establish his peculiar religious creed; and it might be well for Protestant missionaries sent to Asiatic and other heathen fields of missionary work to imitate the great zeal and energy exhibited by so many of the members of the Jesuit Church, and which has secured them often times greater prominence than the Protestant laborers. He wrote Tathio (or "the great study of Confucius and of his disciple Tse-see"), edited, with a Latin translation, by Father Ignace de Costa (1632);--T'cheng-young (or "Invariability in the intermediate course"); one of the four books of Confucianism, presented by a life of Confucius: Confucii Vita (Goa, 1699, small fol.);--Lamuy ("the book of Confucius's philosophical discussions") (without place or date, 1 vol. small fol.);--Testimonia de Cultu Sinarum (Venice, 1708, 8vo);--Compendio della Storia della Missione Cinese, cominciando dall'anno 1581, sino al 1669 (Rome, 1671 or 1672, 8vo). There also remains still in MS. a complete paraphrase of the four books of Confucius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Gén., xxv, 501.

Intriguity is a term used to designate a disposition of mind unaffected with fear at the approach of danger. Resolution either banishes fear or surmounts it, and is firm on all occasions. Courage is impatient to attack, undertakes boldly, and is not lessened by difficulty. Valor acts with vigor, gives no way to resistance, but pursues an enterprise in spite of difficulties. Aggression is not recognized as it runs nimbly into danger, and prefers honor to life itself. Intriguality encounters the greatest perils with the utmost coolness, and dares even present death. This is especially the case with the martyrs of Christianity. No persecution, however great, did they fear to encounter for the sake of their religious belief, and death was welcomed as the crowning victory over error and superstition.

Introduction, Biblical, is now the technical designation for works which aim to furnish a general view of such subjects and questions as are preliminary to a proper exposition of the sacred books, the correspondences of the sacred books with the findings of history, and the analogies, in a strict sense. The word "introduction" being of rather vague signification, there was also formerly no definite idea attached to the expression "Biblical Introduction." In works on this subject (as in Horne's Introduction) might be found contents belonging to geography, antiquities, interpretation, natural history, and other branches of knowledge. Even the usual contents of Biblical introductions were so unconnected with each other as to seem to belong to different fields. One field was from Biblical history and archaeology by being less intimately connected with what is usually called history. It comprised treatises on the origin of the Bible, on the original languages, on the translations, and on the history of the sacred text, and was divided into general and special introductions, and this vagueness by furnishing a firm definition of Biblical introduction was made by Dr. Credner (in his Einleitung, noticed below). He defined Biblical introduction to be the history of the Bible, and divided it into the following parts: 1. The history of the separate Biblical books; 2. the history of the collection of these books, or of the canon; 3, the history of the spread of these books, or of the translations of it; 4. the history of the preservation of the text; 5. the history of the interpretation of it. The same historical idea has been advocated by Hävernick (in his Einleitung), and more particularly by Benjamin H. and Meyer (1844). This view, however, has not generally been acquiesced in by Biblical scholars, being regarded as too limited and special a treatment, inasmuch as the end in view is to furnish a solution of such questions as arise upon the Bible as books, yet excluding such parts of Biblical science as pertain to philology, archaeology, and exegesis, the first two of which rather relate to ancient writings, and the last to passages in detail. By common consent, treatises on Biblical introduction have now usually come to embrace the field covered by the articles on the several books as given in this Cyclopaedia, and the topics legitimately included in this department of Biblical science may briefly be summed up under the following heads, which may, however, sometimes require to be differently arranged, or even combined: 1. Authorship; 2. date; 3. place; 4. inspiration; Biblical criticism; 5. the history of the collection of several books, with the literature and commentaries appended. In this way the old division of general and special introduction is preserved only so far that some treatises are on all the books of the Old or New Testament in order, while others take up a single book only. The introduction is very appropriately the prolegomena to every commentary; and the wider topics formerly discussed are relegated to their appropriate and separate spheres, e.g. in addition to Archaeology (including Geography, Chronology, History, and Antiquities proper), Lexicology (including radical and comparative philology, and synonyms), and Grammar (including all the peculiarities of Hebraistic and Hellenistic phraseology, poetical modes of expression, rhetorical traits, etc.)--the following more especially: the Canon, Criticism, Inspiration, and Interpretation (q. v. severally). With these preliminary distinctions it is necessary to give a sketch of the historical development of this department of Biblical Science, with some criticisms upon the several works in which it has been evolved. In these remarks we especially include formal treatises upon the subject at large, besides those found in commentaries; see also Bleek's Intro. to the O. T., 1, i. 5 sqq.

The Greek word εἰσαγωγή, in the sense of an introduction to a science, occurs only in later Greek, and was first used, to denote an introduction to the right understanding of standing of the Bible, by Adrian, a Greek who probably lived in the 5th century after Christ. It was styled "Introductio," or "Eisagoge," in a small book, the object of which is to assist readers who are unacquainted with Biblical phrasingology in rightly understanding peculiar words and expressions. It was first edited by David Höschel, under the title of Adriani Isogoge in Sacrum Scripturum Graecum cum Scholiis (Augustae Vindobonae, 1602, 4to), and was reprinted in the Crisici Sacri (London ed. vol. viii: Frankfurt edit. vol. vi). But it is evident that excellent editions on isolated portions of Biblical introduction, but they were few or not written so that the whole system of Biblical introduction. The following Biblical introductions are among the best of those which were published about that period: Rivetus were published by T. A. and J. T. (1627); Michaelis Waltheri Officium Biblicum novi et adi-perta, etc. (Lipsia, first published in 1636); Alabranii Caloivii Crisici Sacri Eubicns, etc. (Vitzmberge, 1648); Hottinger, Theaivv. Philologici, etc. Crisici Script. Sac. ( Tiguri, 1649); Heidigger, Exsediitio Bibliothecum hierpomii Asini (Tiguri, 1681); Leusden, a Dutchman, published a work separated Philosophicad de Graeco Generalis (Utrecht, 1670); Pfeiffer (Ultraj, 1704); Van Thii (1729-22); Du Pin (1701); Calmet (1720); Moldenhauzer (1744); Börner (1758); Goldbarg (1768-85); Wagner (1785). Most of these works have frequently been reprinted.

The Dominican friar Sixtus of Sienna, Bibliothecae Sancta ex principiis Catholicae Ecclesiae autoritibus collecta, et in octo libros digesta (Venetii, 1566; frequently reprinted), is of greater importance, although it is manifestly written under the influence of the Inquisition, which had just been restored, and is perceptibly attenuated by the decrees of the Council of Trent; but Sixtus furnished also a list of books to be used by a true Catholic Christian for the right understanding of Holy Writ, as well as the principles which should guide a Roman Catholic in criticism and interpretation. The decrees of the Council of Trent prevented the Roman Catholics from making any further investigation, while the Protestants zealously carried out their researches in various directions. The Ilyrian, Matthias Flacius, in his Crisici Sacri Suevo, seu de Sermone Sacrarum Literarum (Basle, 1616, in folio), furnished an excellent work on Biblical Hermeneutics; but it was published at a time when the Church was still belonging to his celebrated Biblica Sacra Polyglotta (Lond.

1657, six vols. fol.). These Prolegomena contain much that will always be accounted valuable and necessary for the true introduction of the sacred text. They have been published separately, with notes, by archdeacon Wrangham, (1528, 2 vols. 8vo). Thus we have seen that an excellent work on isolated portions of Biblical introduction, but they were few or not written so that the whole system of Biblical introduction. The following Biblical introductions are among the best of those which were published about that period: Rivetus were published by T. A. and J. T. (1627); Michaelis Waltheri Officium Biblicum novi et adidomesticated, together with several polemical treatises occasioned by this work, at Rotterdam, in 1685, 4to:—Histoire Critique du Texte du Nouveau Testament (Rotterdam, 1688):—Histoire Critique du principec Commentations sur le Nouveau Testament (Rotterdam, 1691). By these excellent critical works Simon established a claim upon the gratitude of all real friends of truth; but he was thanked by none of the prevailing parties in the Christian Church. The Protestants saw in Simon only an enemy of their Church, not the thorough investigator and friend of truth. To the Roman Catholics, on the other hand, Simon's works appeared to be destructive, because they demonstrated their ecclesiastical decrees to be arbitrary and unhistorical. The Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament was suppressed by the Ro-m风格s of the New Testament, etc. (Amsterdam, 1703-173), which was then followed by Wetstein's Novum Testamentum Graecum cum Lectionibus Vari-untius (Xenia, 1707, folio), which was soon followed by Wetstein's Novum Testamentum Graecum editionis reperta, cum Lectionibus Variantibus (Amstelodami, 1751, 92, folio), and by which even Bengel was convinced, in spite of his having written for years on corn, the title De

By their ecclesiastical persecutors, Richard Simon was falsely described to be a disciple of the pantheistical Spinoza, and Michaelis as a follower of both Simon and Spinoza. However, the maturing endeavors of Michaelis gradually prevailed. His Einleitung in die Göttlichen Schriften des Neuen Bundes (Göttingen, 1750, 8vo) was greatly improved in later editions, and the fourth (1788, 2 vols. 4to) was translated and essentially augmented by Herbert Marsh, afterwards bishop in the State of Allen. The third title Introductio in the New Testament, etc. (Cambridge, 1791-1801, 4 vols. 8vo). Michaelis commenced also an introduction to the Old Testament, under the title Einleitung in die Göttlichen Schriften des Alten Bundes (Hamburg, 1757). Ed. Harwood's New Introduction to the Study and Use of the New Testament, London, 1767-71, translated into German by Schulz, Halle, 1770-73, 3 vols. contains so many heterogeneous materials that it scarcely belongs to the science of introduction.

The study of New-Testament introduction was in Germany especially promoted also by J. S. Semler, who died at Halle in 1791. He was mortally influenced by the view that the critical works of Richard Simon were translated into German, and the works of Wetstein re-edited and circulated. The original works of Semler on Biblical introduction are his Apparatus ad librum Novi Testamenti, Hamburg, 1781, and in his Abhandlung von der Freier Untersuchung des Canoni (Halle, 1771-5, 4 vols.). Semler's school produced J. J. Griesbach, who died at Jena in 1812. Griesbach's labors in correcting the text of the New Testament are of great value. K. A. Hahn in published a work called Handbuch der Einleitung in die Propheten des Neuen Bundes (Erlangen, 1794-1802, 2 vols.), in which he followed the university lectures of Griesbach. A second edition of this work appeared in 1801, 3 vols. This introduction contains excellent materials, but is wanting in decisive historical criticism.

G. Eichhorn, who died at Göttingen in 1827, was formed in the school of Michaelis at Göttingen, and was inspired by Herder's poetical views of the East in general, and of the literature of the ancient Hebrews in particular. Eichhorn commenced his introduction when the times were inclined to give up the Bible altogether as a production of priestcraft inapplicable to the present period. He endeavored to bring the contents of the Bible into harmony with modern modes of thinking, to explain, and to recommend them. He sought, by means of hypotheses, to furnish a clue to their origin, without submitting them to strict historical criticism. Eichhorn's Einleitung in das Alte Testament was first published at Leipzig in 1780-83, in three volumes. The fifth edition was published at Göttingen, 1820-24, in five volumes. His Einleitung in das Neue Testament was first published at Leipzig (1804-27, 5 vols.). The earlier volumes were published. The critical treatment of the materials, the style, aim, and many separate portions of both works, are masterly and excellent; but, with regard to linguistic and historical research, they are feeble, and overwhelmed with hypotheses.

Leonhart Bertholdt was a very diligent but uncritical compiler. He made a considerable step back at Vienna (1836) in his Einleitung in die göttlichen Bücher des alten Bundes (Vienna, 1759, 2 vols., and 1802, 3 vols.), and in his Introductio in Libros Sacros Veteris Testamenti in epitomes

The Isagoge Historico-critica in Libros Novi Federis Sacros (Jena, 1800) of H. A. Schott is more distinguished by diligence than by penetration.

INTRODUCTION

redacta (Vienne, 1806). This work has been republished by F. Ackermann, in what are asserted to be the third and fourth editions, under the title of Introductio in Libros Sacros Veteris Testamenti, usum academici accommodata (Vienne, 1825, 2 vols.; 5th ed. 1830), called the new editions, are full of alterations and mutilations, which remove every free expression of Jahn, who belonged to the liberal period of the emperor Joseph. J. L. Hug's Einleitung in das Neue Testament (Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1806, 2 vols.; 4th ed. 1847) surpasses Jahn's work in size and scope, and obtained much favor among Protestants by its learned explanations, although these frequently swerve from the point in question. Hug's work has been translated into English by the Rev. D. G. Wait, L.L.D.; but this translation is much surpassed by that of Froshick, published in the United States, and enriched by the additions of M. F. Stuart. The critical and apologetical style prevails in the work of J. G. Herbart, Historisch-kritische Einleitung in die Schriften des Alten Testamentes (completed and edited after the death of the author by Wele, Carlus, 1840); and in L'Introduction Historique et Critique des Libres de l'Ancien Testament, by J. B. Glaire (Paris, 1839, 4 vols.). The work of the excellent Feilmeuer, who died in 1831, Einleitung in die Bücher des Neuen Bundes (2nd ed. Tübingen, 1880), forsakes the position of a true Roman Catholic, inasmuch as it is distinguished by a noble ingenuity and talent for observation, and remains a useful guide to the still later work of Scholz, Einl. in d. heil. Schriften d. A. und N. T. (vol. i general introd. Cologne, 1845). Among the best Roman Catholic contributions to this branch of Biblical literature are the works of Rausch, Lehrb. der Einleitung in das A. T. (Freiburg, 5th ed. 1898); and Langer, Grundriss der Einleitung in das N. T. (Freiburg, 1868).

In Great Britain, besides the above works of Horne and Hamilton, we may especially name the following as introductory in their character. Colliar's Sacred Interpreter (1746, 2 vols. 8vo) was one of the earliest publications on this subject. A. C. Perceval's Book of the Bible (2 vols. 1802), and Lanman's, Grundriss der Einleitung in das N. T. (Freiburg, 1868). The author of this criticism is an admirable introduction to the New Testament. "It is a storehouse of literary information, collected with equal industry and fidelity." From this work, the English translation of Michael's Introduction (1761), and from Dr. Owen's Observations on the Gospel (1764), Dr. Percivall has most successfully compiled, and the useful manual, called A Key to the New Testament, which has gone through many editions, and is much in request among the candidates for ordination in the Established Church. The Key to the Old Testament (1760), by D. J. goes, afterwards bishop of Bristol, was written in imitation of Percivall's compilation; but it is much more elaborate performance than the Key to the New Testament. It is a compilation from a great variety of works, references to which are given at the foot of each page. Bishop Marsh speaks of it as "a very useful publication for students of divinity, who wish to have an idea of what must otherwise be considered from many writers." It is now, however, almost entirely behind the times. Dr. Harwood's Introduction to the Study and Knowledge of the New Testament (1757, 1771, 2 vols. 8vo), although noteworthy in this connection, is not properly an introduction to the New Testament in the usual sense of the term. It does not describe the books of the New Testament, but is a collection of dissertations relative partly to the character of the sacred writers, Jewish history and customs, and to such parts of heathen antiquities as have reference to the New Testament. The first volume of bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology contains an introduction both to the Old and to the New Testament, and has been published in a separate form. It is suited to its purpose as a manual for students in divinity; but the standard present attainment cannot be very high if, as Marsh states, "it may be read with advantage by the most experienced divines."

Introdo (I will go in), the word taken from the 5th verse of the 12th Psalm of the New Vulgate. This word is applied to the Roman Catholic priest, at the foot of the altar, after having made the sign of the cross, begins the mass, and to which the服务器 replies with the rest of the verse. The whole psalm is then recited alternately by the priest and the server. In masses for the dead, and during Passion-week, the word is not pronounced.

Introto (a:) (Officium Sarum, inoac, Eastern: Ingreso, Ambrosian) is the name (from the Latin introitus, to enter) of a paschal hymn, but now properly the former, sung in some churches as the priest goes up to the altar to celebrate the Eucharist. "Introito autem vocamus antiphonam illam quam chorus cantat et sacerdos ut ascendet ad altare legit cum versu et gloria" (Martene, De aut.), iv, 4). According to the English. of Thessalonica, the introit typifies the union of men and angels. According to Freeman (Prince of Divine Service), ii, 310, the true introit consists of the "Hymn of the only-begotten Son" in the East, and the Gloria in Excelsis in the further East and the whole Western Church. Neale too remarks (Intro. to the East, Ch. 4, 363) that the "introits of the liturgies of St. Mark and St. James, and the Armenian consist of the hymn 'Only-begotten Son.'" But, besides the introit proper, there are general in the Western Church a psalm or hymn, with antiphon, varying according to the season, and in the liturgy of Chrysostom we find a number of these. Walcott (Sac. Archol. p. 531) says the introit is of two kinds: (1) regular, that sung daily; (2) the irregular, which is chanted on festivals. The latter he describes as having been of old a grand and solemn character. "In a great church there was a procession round the nave to the sound of bells, and with incense, passing out by the small gate of the sanctuary and re-entering by the great doors. The deacon then went up with the Gospel elevated in both his hands, and set it on the midst of the altar, so as to be seen by the people. Then followed the introt, composed of several anthems, supported by the organ and stringed music, the Trumpet, the Flute, and the Harp. The procession and deacon intoned it, the choir and people took it up, and a candlestick with three lights, as a symbol of the Holy Trinity, was lighted." The introit is believed to have originated with pope Celestine (A.D. 422-432), c. 430 (comp. Bonn, iii, 46). Before that time the mass had probably already succeeded the Epistles of Paul and the Gospels. "Its structure is that of an antiphon, followed generally by a whole psalm or a portion of a psalm (compare, however, Neale, Essays on Liturgy, p. 138 sq.), and the Gloria Patri, and then by a repetition of the whole or part of the commencing antiphon. In the Old Gregorian introit the antiphon was repeated three times, a custom found also in the Sarum rite; this triple recitation being connected mystically with the three laws, viz., the Natural, the Mosaic, and the Evangelic." In the English Church the introit was introduced by Edward VI, in his Prayer-book, before every collect, epistle, and Gospel. The gradual containing proper psalms for the particular Sunday or holiday to which they were applied; but they were afterwards struck out, and the choice of the psalm was left to the clergyman. The introits of each Sunday and holiday are given by Wheatley in his Common Prayer, p. 205. See Blunt, Thol. Cyclopedia, i, 355 sq.; Eadie. Eccles. Dict. s.n.; Austin, Isl. bibl. d. Christl. Archd., ii, 778; Siegel, Archd., iii, 378. See also Mass. (b.) This word also designates the verses sung at the entering of the congregation into the church, a custom also introduced, called Singing or the Ambrosian Ritual. See Palmer, Origins Lit. ii, 195.

Introsion (Lat. instruo, I thrust upon), the unlawful appropriation or usurpation of a church benefice, i.e., if done without the co-operation of the person who, according to the canon, is entitled to the benefice. In the Church of Scotland, the General Assembly, in 1736, passed an act against intrusors of ministers into vacant congregations; and the reason assigned is the principle of the Church of Scotland, "that no minister shall be intruded into any church contrary to the will of the congregation...so as none be intruded into such parishes, as they (the General Assembly) regard the glory of God and the interest of the body of Christ in the Hetherington, Hist. of the Ch. of Scotland, ii, 218, 363.

Invention of the Cross is the name of a festival in the Latin and Greek churches, celebrated May 3, in memory of the invention of the cross said to have been miraculously discovered at Jerusalem by Helena, the mother of the emperor Constantine the Great, in 326. The legend of it runs as follows: Helena, being assured in a dream to search for the cross of Christ at Jerusalem, took a journey thither with that intent; and having employed laborers to dig at Golgotha, after opening the ground very deep (for vast heaps of rubbish had purposely been thrown there by the Jews or heathens), she found three crosses, which she presently concluded were the crosses of our Saviour and the two thieves who were crucified with him. But, being at a loss to know which was the cross of Christ, she ordered them to be applied to a dead person. Two of them, the story says, had no effect; but the third raised the karass to life, which was an evident sign to Helena that that was the cross she looked for. As soon as this was known, every one was for getting a piece of the cross, insomuch that in Paulinus's time (who, being a scholar of St. Ambrose, and bishop of Nola, flourished about the year 420) there was much more of the relic of the cross than there was of the original wood. Whereupon that father says it was miraculously increased: it very kindly afforded wood to men's importunate desires without any loss of its substance." Dr. Schaff comments on it thus: "The legend is at best faintly implied in Eusebius, in a letter of Constantine to the bishop of Ma'la, which contains a reference to an event which Gieseler overlooked — though in iii, 25, where it should be expected, it is entirely unnoticed, as Gieseler correctly observes), and does not appear till several centuries later, first in Cyril of Jerusalem (whose Epist. ad Constantium of 351, however, is considered by Gieseler and others as an interpolation by the writer of a later production), then, with good agreement as to the main fact, in Ambrose, Chrysostom, Paulinus of Nola, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and other fathers. With all these witnesses the fact is still hardly credible, and has against it particularly the following considerations: (1) The place of the crucifixion was desecrated under the emperor Hadrian by heathen temples and statues, besides being filled up and defaced beyond recognition. (2) There is no clear testimony of a contemporary. (3) The pilgrim from Bordeaux, who visited Jerusalem in 388, and in a still extant Vitaminiarius (Vetera Rom. v) states, that most of the holy things of the holy city, knows nothing of the holy cross or its invention (comp. Gieseler, i, 279, note 37; Edinb. ed. ii, 36). This miracle contributed very much to the increase of the superstition of use of crosses and crucifixes. The ruined Church of Jerusalem was a place of pilgrimage from the 4th century, and the relics of the whole cross filled the whole world, and yet, according to the account of the devout but credulous Paulinus of Nola (Epist. 31, a, 11) (whom we mentioned above), the original remained in Jerusalem undiminished—a continual miracle!" (Schaff, Ch. Hist. ii, 459; compare particularly the minute investigation of this legend by Isaac Taylor, Th. Invention of the Cross and the Miracles therewith connected, in Ancient Christianity, ii, 277-315; Wheatley, Common Prayer, p. 61 sq.; Walcott, Sacred Archaeol, p. 851). See Crosses. (J. H. W.)

Investiture (Lat. investire, to put on a vest or coat), is defined by many writers as "the conferring or the giving possession of a fief or a property by a suzerain lord to his vassal," and was usually accompanied by a certain ceremonial, such as the delivery of a branch, a banner, or an instrument of office, more or less designed to signify the power or authority invested. It is supposed to convey to the vassal a certain sense of sacredness, as the abbot of Vendôme [Vindocinnicum], Tractatus de ordinatione Episcoporum et Investitura Laicorum, in Melch. Goldast Apologia pro Henrico IV — ad Gregorii VII, P. criminationes (Hamb. 1611, p. 262).

The contest about ecclesiastical investitures was so interwoven with the whole course of mediæval history that a brief account of its origin and nature is indispensable to a right understanding of many of the most important events of that period.

1. By the liberality of the northern nations, the Church of Rome had greatly attained considerable wealth, both personal and real. The Carolingian and Saxo-Saxon emperors, the kings of England and Leon, had vied with their predecessors in bestowing on their lavish benefactions, and the clergy were, in consequence, without strangers to wealth. Many churches possessed seven or eight canons; and these endowed with more than one or two priests, was capable of cultivation and movement, and as civilization and population increased they became a source of gain and profit. Nay, this accumulation of lands in the hands of the clergy progressed so rapidly that it naturally excited the jealousy of the sov. enigma. These provocations were still further sharp-ened by another great source of clerical enrichment, viz. the payment of tithes, which seems to have received a legal sanction in the 9th century, but which in the 12th century had become universal. Still other revenues were derived from the sale of pardons and offerings of the laymen. "They made oblations to the Church, and then set out on military expeditions: bequests were made by others in the terrors of dissolution." Indeed, it became at last a pious custom to assign a portion of the property of a deceased person to the clergy for their distribution among the poor, to atone for their sins, by the prayers of these emperors. Therefore the Romans learned to rank their churches among the poor," and as it was believed that the deceased would regard them with special favor, they absorbed the lion's share of the alms, until the other poor were forgotten altogether."

Thus what began as a pious custom the Church gradually so distorted until it all flowed into her coffers, and was finally made a compulsory tribute. But, as if all these sources of income were not yet sufficient to meet the wants of an indolent clergy, dependent wholly for their support upon a superstitious and ignorant class, in the 12th century in our day, the penances were added, and, by being made compulsory, were imposed upon repentant offenders; and acts of lawlessness, which it ought to have taken more than an ordinary lifetime to discharge, were allowed to be committed for money payments. "One day's fasting might be repaid by a Further's purchase of a church or a bishop's shilling, or with freeing a slave that was worth that money (one of the few good things that the Church of the Middle Ages is guilty of). Many, in a glow of zeal, vowed to go on a crusade, but, when the first aridor had cooled down, were glad to purchase exemption. Many, to atone for their sins, set out on pious pilgrimages to well-known shrines; and, as the clergy had not failed to inculcate that no atonement could be so acceptable to Heaven as liberal presents, large offerings were presented to such churches by the remorse of repentance. At Rome, in the year of jubilee, two priests stood with their hands receiving the uncounted gold, and silver from the altar."

No wonder, then, that the Church and her officers the bishops, as well as all the clergy, with possessions so vast, and resources so unbounded and fertile, became the objects of suspicion to temporal princes, as well as to many in the nobles and the clergy. The disfavor in which the practice had long been held by the Church was first expressed by Clemens II (see Stenzel, Gesch. Deutschl. u. d. frühchristl. Kaiser, pt. i., 117; ii, 130), but its most energetic opponent it really first found in the person of Gregory VII, who, having in the year 1074 enacted most stringent measures for the repression of simony, proceeded, in the beginning of the year 1075, to condemn, under excommunication, the practice of investiture, as almost necessarily connected with simony, or leading to it. "The prohibition was couched in the most pointed and comprehensive terms. It absolutely deposed every bishop, abbot, or inferior ecclesiastical who should receive investiture from any lay person. It interdicted him—whosoever should be guilty of this act of ambition and rebellion (which was the sin of idolatry), until he should have abandoned the benefice so obtained; and all communion with him was deposed, except Peter, and from admission into the Church. And if any emperor, duke, marquis, count, or secular potentate or person should presume to grant such investiture of bishopric or inferior dignity, he was condemned to the same sentence. This statute made a revolution in the whole feudal system throughout Europe as regarded the relation of the Church now dominant to the state. In the empire (then under Henry IV) it annulled the precarious power of the sovereign over almost half his subjects. All the great prelates and abbots, who were at the same time the princes, the nobles, the counselors, the leaders in all the wars and expeditions because to a great degree independent of the crown; the emperor had no concern, unless indirectly, in their promotion, no power over their degradation. Their lands and estates were as inviolable as their persons. Where there was a man, there was no fealty; there could be no treason. Everybody had his own independence, his own liberty, and could not be bound by any servitude other than his own conscience, on the other hand, thus disdained from the crown was held, if not directly, yet at the pleasure of the pope. For as with him was the sole judgment (the laity being excluded) as to the validity of the election, with him was the decision by what offenses the dignity might be forfeited; all the temporal and spiritual rights were inalienable, and were withdrawn from the national property, and became that of the Church and of God, the pope might be, in fact, the liege lord, temporal and spiritual, of half the world” (Milman, Lat. Christendom, iii, 416-417). These proceedings of the pope the kings could not, of course, possibly permit without a practical abdication of all their powers, and hence arose the conflicts of investiture which resulted so triumphantly for the popes, not only in raising to the thrones of the princes of the earth, but drawing into their own hands all civil government, and which enabled some of the incumbrants of the papal see, e.g. Innocent III, to aspire to be the supreme dispensers of the Christian world, with all its belongings (see Reiche1, p. 569). Some of the sponsporship of Philip of France and William of England, paid no attention whatever to the pope’s mandate, and the latter, satisfied that they would not actively oppose him, was quite willing to let them alone; but far otherwise was his conduct towards the emperor Henry IV, whom he sought by every possible exertion to compel to submit to these decisions. For this the licentious and ambitious character of Henry had given him good cause. But for a time he failed to make any impression on the emperor, who paid no regard to the threats of Gregory VII, but continued to nominate not only to German bishoprics, but to the royal thrones, and thus widened still further the breach between the emperor and the pope. See the article GREGORY VII, vol. iii, especially p. 1008, col. 1. After Hildebrand’s (Gregory VII’s) death, the rivalry for the papal throne assuaged for a time the controversy on investiture; each papal party, anxious to secure the greater credit and influence most prominent position, wilfully made all possible concessions. But when Urban II, elected and supported by the Hildebrandian party, ascended the papal throne, the controversy was renewed by his declaration: “Nullum jus laicis in clericis esse vulnus est, ego contemnerim, ut erit, si papam postea sacerdotes” (p. 1095). By canon 17 of this council clergymen were forbidden to accept any ecclesiastical office from a layman; the 16th canon applies this especially to kings and other civil authorities; canon 17 forbade bishops and priests binding themselves by feudal oaths to either kings or other laymen; and canon 18 threatened every one who, after two warnings, continued in these forbidden relations, with deprivation of all office and power. Yet Urban found more difficulty than he had expected in bringing the princes to second him in his views, and he did not succeed in enforcing these decisions, where Roger, 2nd count of Sicily, stoutly defended the rights of the civil authorities. Urban, however, evaded the difficulty by naming Roger, to whom he was under many obligations, his legate in Sicily. The death of this pope, in 1099, by no means extinguished the opposition, but, instead, the contest became more earnest, and continued during the most of the 12th century. In the beginning of the 12th century it assumed a new form under PASCAL II, whose name, of all popes, is most prominently connected with the question of investitures both in England and Germany. PASCAL II had ascended the papal throne with the intention of following in the footsteps of his predecessors, but he lacked the strength of character necessary for determined action. “In England, William the Conqueror had maintained his supremacy over the Church with an iron arm. Thus no one was allowed to acknowledge the pope, when chosen, except by the king’s permission; no one might receive letters from Rome unless they had been previously shown to him for approval. The archbishop was not permitted to frame any canon, although with the assistance of the bishop of the realm, unless it had been previously sanctioned by the sovereign. Nor was any bishop, even the pope himself, permitted to create a bishop, or to bestow any ecclesiastical dignity on any charge, without having first obtained the king’s consent. The same policy was pursued by his son William Rufus, without any difficulties being raised on the part of the popes. They had too many reasons for conciliating the friendship of the Normans in Italy to venture to oppose their wishes in England.” Nor was it otherwise now when archbishop ANSELM came forward, determined to execute the papal decisions concerning the investitures, and King Henry I felt his prerogatives invaded, and Anselm alone had to bear the whole brunt of Henry’s indignation. See ANSELM. In 1107, an agreement which had been entered into between the king and the archbishop was finally proclaimed, with the formal act of the pope, as was necessary for his purpose. “By it Henry, whilst surrendering an unnecessary ceremony, retained a substantial power; and Anselm’s scruples were set at rest by a letter from PASCAL, in which he freed those who had received lay investitures from the penalties of his predecessor . . . Still more fortunate than the English kings were the kings of Castile, who, by directly yielding when Urban’s decree was first published, obtained from him an absolute privilege of nomination to all bishoprics in their dominions—a privilege which they have since retained by virtue of a particular indulgence renewed by the pope for the life of each prince” (Reiche1, p. 368; see Hallam, Middle Ages, ii, pt. i, ch. vii, 190). But it was in Germany that the struggle about investitures was waged most fiercely, and that it also continued longest. Taking advantage of the political troubles in Germany, the emperors used every exertion to detach the Church entirely from the control of the state. “Not only had PASCAL II begun his course by denouncing lay investiture as strongly as his predecessor Urban II, but he had also followed the tactics of Urban.” He not only put Henry IV a second time at variance with his imperial predecessors, but the most desperate measures were resorted to in the assault of the Church. He extended from Henry the affection of those to whose love and consideration he was entitled by the most sacred of laws. Two of the sons of Henry IV were invited to rebel against their own natural father (1101, 1104), which brought the emperor into the grave of broken heart (1106). PASCAL now thought, of course, that he had secured for himself the obedience of Germany, and with pride he announced that henceforth the Church would begin to enjoy anew her liberty indeed, for death had removed, and was fast removing, those who opposed her success (MANUEL, i, p. 1329; Muratori, Scriptores rerum Italicae, iii, i, 363); he even caused the laws on investiture to be reasserted by the councils of Troyes, Benevento (1108), and Lateran (1100). But for once PASCAL II had made his reckoning without his host. His power, which had been so great and so strong, began to fade before he discovered its vanities; for Henry V was no sooner in undisputed possession of the throne than he maintained as stoutly as his father had done his own right to invest bishops.” Strengthened in his opposition by the example of England, and of France also, he now interpreted the actions of the councils as the works of power, and after a vain endeavor to bring the pope to acknowledge his right in a conference at Chalons, he returned to Rome to arms. At the head of a vast army he marched to Italy, and so terrified the pope that he obtained a very favorable compact without the least difficulty (Feb. 9, 1111). But the bishops refused to comply with it, and Henry hesitated not to force a favorable conclusion by imprisoning the pope and his cardinals. By a second treaty, which was now compacted (April 8, 1111), PASCAL II actually agreed to surrender all the possessions of the church in France without one of the} surrender any of the liberties and rights of the Church, that it was for the assembly to examine the agreement, and pronounce thereupon; but that for himself he would adhere to his oath, and undertake nothing personally against Henry," i.e. poor wretched Paschal had sworn to a compact which he felt he could not break himself, but for which, if he were less determined to abrogate, he ought to have next to his kinsmen and to the might of his hands, that they might execute the wishes of his heart, which he dared not openly espouse as a pope. The action of the pope, however, in accordance with his own wishes, was repudiated in a Lateran council in 1222 (Rom. iii. 29 sq.). The struggle was reserved for Calixtus II, but not before one preliminary contract had been concluded and as soon violated, nor before the utterance of a sentence of excommunication and dethronement on Henry V, at the great synod of Rome (Labbe, xiii. 71). It was agreed that every investiture should be retained, and each diocese restored to its former incumbent, but that those belonging to the Church should be governed according to the canons, and the secular ones by the civil laws (Mansi, t. xxii. p. 244; Stenzel, p. 680). Upon a second consideration, however, they relented, and the question of the oath soon created new pretexts for the struggle between them, and, in a synod of Rheims (1119), Calixtus put the emperor under the ban, and deposed him (Mansi, l. c., p. 250). In the mean time, archbishop Adalbert, of Mentz, created troubles in Germany. Calixtus strengthened his position in Rome, and even succeeded in taking the anti-pope, Gregory VIII, whom the emperor had opposed to him; prisoner; yet the public sentiment of Germany was strong enough to compel the papal party finally to adopt the course which Ivo of Chartres and the monk Hugo of Fleury had commanded. It was then a matter of course between the two systems of the Gregorian party on the one hand, and the secularizing tendencies of their opponents on the other. It combated the Gregorian position that it was a degradation for the priesthood to own itself subject to any lay authority, and held fast to the principle that to God must be rendered that which is God's, and to Cesar that which is Cesar's. It therefore maintained that the king ought not to invest the candidate bishop with staff and ring, these being the symbols of spiritual jurisdiction, and, as such, belonging to the archbishop; but it allowed homage to be done to the emperor, and the use of some other symbol for bestowing the temporalities. The celebrated concordat of Worms, Sept. 1122 (Mansi, L c. p. 273 sq.), finally settled the question to the satisfaction of all parties, and the Lateran Council of 1123 gave its full approval (comp. Mansi, l. c. p. 277). The emperor, however, gave up the empty ceremony of the ring and pastoral staff, to grant to the clergy the right of free elections, and to restore all the possessions of the Church of Rome which had been seized either by himself or by his father; while the pope, on his part, consented that the elections should be held in the presence of the emperor or his official, but with a right of appeal to the provincial synod; that investiture might be given by the emperor, but only by the touch of the auctoritas; and that the bishops and other church dignitaries should faithfully discharge all the feudal duties which belonged to their principality (see Montagu, p. 455 sq.; Stenzel, p. 704). Lothair III, Henry's successor, rendered these conditions still more advantageous to the Roman see by substituting a more general profession for the feudal oath (see J. D. Olschlegler, Eklus- terung d. giitenen Bulle, Frankfort, 1766; Urkundenbuch, p. 19). This measure, to some extent, at least, allayed the ill will which the hierarchical party bore to the Concordat of Worms. The pope had in reality secured but little; the struggle by which the first period of the election of bishops, and the use of influence obtained by it in the place of the influence exercised over them by the emperor was sure in due time to be of great advantage to the papacy. It certainly had considerable effect in restraining one of the two parties, and simultaneous with the Middle Ages, if not in eradicating altogether the real evil of simony and corrupt promotion of unworthy candidates for ecclesiastical offices; and although, even as late as the 12th century, we find instances of the emperor's interference in the election of German bishops, and even of his direct appointments to such offices (see Sugenheim, Staatskunde d. Krie- rus im Mittelalter, Berlin, 1899, pt. i. p. 158), these instances are, after all, only few in number, and disappear altogether after the times of Otto IV and Frederick II. Civil interference in ecclesiastical appointments ceased also in France, England, and Spain; but in Naples, Hungary, Denmark, and Sweden, the struggle continued, and the struggle was reserved for Calixtus II, but not before one preliminary contract had been concluded and as soon violated, nor before the utterance of a sentence of excommunication and dethronement on Henry V, at the great synod of Rome (Labbe, xiii. 71). It was agreed that every investiture should be retained, and each diocese restored to its former incumbent, but that those belonging to the Church should be governed according to the canons, and the secular ones by the civil laws (Mansi, t. xxii. p. 244; Stenzel, p. 680). INVOCATION OF ANGELS

It's Church, where the order of daily prayer is chiefly taken from the corresponding offices of the Sarum Brev- iary (of which the rubric runs thus [after the Gloria and Alleluia]: "Sedegatur invocatorius hoc modo. Ecco venit rex. Occursamus obivam Salvator nostri. Ps. Venite; post i, ill et v, versa, psalms repetatur totius invocatorius. iv et v, versa, psalms repetatur solam hoc pars. Occursamus. Et deinde reinicitur totius invocatorius"); the opening sentences of matins and evensong are generally considered to be of a similar character (compare Procter, Common Prayer, p. 182; Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, i, 132 sq.). Blunt (The Church, i, 336) observes, and it is the true invoca- tory of the English Church "is in the fixed versicle 'Praise ye the Lord,' with its response, 'The Lord's name be praised.' The singing of Alleluia after the Gloria Patri, at the commencement of matins, was or- dered in the Prayer-book of 1549. The response was inserted in 1661. The 36th Psalm, with this versicle and response, is to be considered as an unwary invitation in the medizing English rite, except on Easter day, for which special provision is made." See also Neale, Liturgical Essays, p. 7 sq.; et al.; Comment on the Psalms, i, 45 sq.; Walcott, Sacred Archaeology, p. 262.

INVOCATION OF ANGELS, or the act of addressing prayers especially to the superhuman, prevails in the Roman and the Greek churches as well as in all the different Eastern churches. They hold that angels are sharers of the divine nature, though in a somewhat subordinate measure. In the same manner they also permit the invocation of saints (q.v.) even, and designate this worship under the technical term of αὐθελία, in distinction from the worship of God himself, which they term λατρεία. See Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, i, 141, 142, 538 sq. Compare Angels; Venera- tion.

INVOCATION OF THE HOLY GHOST. In the prayer of the mediaval canon, retained also in the Scottish of- fice on the consecration of the elements for the Lord's Supper, the Holy Ghost is thus invoked: "Vouchsafe so to bless and sanctify with thy word and Holy Spirit thy gifts and creatures of bread and wine that they may be unto us the body and blood of thy most dearly beloved Son.

INVOCATION OF SAINTS. As a form of idolatry pre- vailing in the Roman, the Greek, and the different Eastern churches. They ignore the doctrine to the Protestant tenaciously clung, that the rendering of divine worship to one Infinite Being must of necessity exclude the idea of rendering divine worship, no matter how modified and excused, to any other being, depend- ent on and governed by the Supreme Being. They also deny that the invocation of the created, instead of the Creator, does in any wise trench upon the honor due only to God, and that it is, as we assert, irreconcilable with Scripture, "which holds him forth as the sole ob- ject of worship, and the only fountain of mercy." They cannot, of course, dispense these truths from Scripture, neither can they furnish any authority from the holy book for a practice unknown to the early Church, and expressly condemned by the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 481) and by the early fathers. The few passages which they frequently cite they themselves claim only to im- ply an intercommunion of the two worlds as the Matt. xii. 8; Luke xiv, 17; Exod. xxxiii, 13), and they are there- fore obliged to have recourse to tradition. To this end they cite some of the Church fathers, such as Origen (Opp. ii, 273), Cyprian (Ep. 60, Dodwell's edition), Basilius, Theodoret, Chrysostom, first, Gregory of Nyssa (ii, 1017), Ambrose (ii, 300), Chrysostom (iv, 419), and especially the liturgics of the different ancient churches of Roman, Greek, Syrian, and even Egyptian rite. But, while these testimonies are gener- ally credited, it must be remembered that they are only uncial; and that they apply not only to the infusion of the Church system of Alexandrian Neoplatonism and Oriental Magianism, which left its traces even in the most orthodox form of Christian wor- ship, and creed also, up to the 4th and 5th centuries, a period in the history of the Christian Church when her- esies were, to use a common phrase, almost the order of the day. Nay, even the Roman Catholic Church ad- mits the existence of the practice of invoking the saints not only in this age, but especially in the mediaval pe- riod. The worship of saints and of the Virgin Mary then took the place of the worship of Christ, the only legal intercessor between God and man, and thus virtu- ally ignored the mediatorialship of Christ. It is true some of them grant, however, and it is the true invoca- ry of the English Church "is in the fixed versicle 'Praise ye the Lord,' with its response, 'The Lord's name be praised.' The singing of Alleluia after the Gloria Patri, at the commencement of matins, was ordered in the Prayer-book of 1549. The response was inserted in 1661. The 36th Psalm, with this versicle and response, is to be considered as an unwary invitation in the medizing English rite, except on Easter day, for which special provision is made." See also Neale, Liturgical Essays, p. 7 sq.; et al.; Comment on the Psalms, i, 45 sq.; Walcott, Sacred Archaeology, p. 262.

As a regular doctrine, the invocation of saints is taught in a canon Touching the Invocation, Veneration, and on Rites and Sacraments, issued by the Council of Trent in its 25th session. It reads as follows: "The holy synod enjoins on all bishops, and others sustain- ing the office and charge of teaching, that, accord- ing to the usage of the Catholic and Apostolic Church, received from the primitive time of St. Chrysostom (c. 269), Cyprian (c. 258), St. Justin (c. 162), St. Irenaeus (c. 163), St. John the Baptist (c. 167), St. Paul (c. 174), and the decrees of the sacred councils, they es- pecially instruct the faithful diligently touching the in- cession and invocation of saints, the honor paid to rel- ics, and the lawful use of images: teaching them that the saints, who reign together with Christ, offer up their own prayers to God for men; that it is good and useful suppliantly to invoke them, and to resort to their prayers, aid, and help in obtaining benefits from God, through his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, who alone is our Redeemer and Saviour; but that they think impiously who deny that the saints, who enjoy eternal happiness in heaven, are to be invoked; or who assert either that they do not pray for men, or that the invocation of the saints is nothing but the same as the prayers of the Holy Church, or that it is repugnant to the Word of God, and is opposed to the honor of the one mediator between God and men, Jesus Christ; or that it is foolish to supplicate, orally or inwardly, those who reign in heaven. Also, that the holy bodies of holy martyrs, and of others now living in heaven, the Church and the temple of the Holy Ghost, which are by him to be raised unto eternal life, and to be glorified, are to be venerated by the faithful; through which bodies many benefits are bestowed by God on men, so that they who affirm that veneration and honor are not due to the relics of saints; or that these, and other sacred monuments, are uselessly honored by the faithful; and that the places dedicated to the memories of the saints are vainly visited for the purpose of obtaining their aid, are wholly to be condemned, as the Church has always condemned those who do now and then also condemn them. Moreover, that the images of Christ, of the Virgin Mother of God, and of the other saints, are to be had and retained particularly in temples, and that due honor and veneration are to be awarded them; not that any divinity or virtue is believed to be in them, on account of which they are to be venerated; but that anything is to be asked of them; or that confidence is to be reposed in images, as was of old done by the Gentiles, who placed their hope in idols; but because the honor which is shown unto them is referred to the prototypes which they represent; in such wise that by the images which are consecrated by the Church we adore and prostrate ourselves, we adore Christ and venerate the saints, whose similitude they bear. And this, by the decrees of councils, and especially of the second synod of Nicaea, has been ordained against the opposers of images. And the bishops shall carefully teach this, that, by means of the history of the mysteries of our redemption, depicted by paintings or other representations, the people are instructed, and strengthened in remembering and continually reflecting on the articles of faith; as also that great profit is derived from all sacred images, not only because the people are thereby admonished of the benefits and graces which have been bestowed upon them by Christ, but also because the miracles of God through the means of the saints, and their salutary example, are set before the eyes of the faithful; that so for these things they may give God thanks; may order their own life and manners in imitation of the saints; and may be excused to adore and love God, and to cultivate piety. But if any one shall teach or think contrary to these decrees, let him be anathema.

Most ridiculous is the defence which Foulkes (Christ- tenden's Dissertations, p. 86) advances in behalf of this species of idolatry, while yet in communion with the Romish Church; and his friends of the High-Church party of England and our own country may do well to read it before they carry much farther the laughable affections which they term "devotions." While defending this abuse, he has written in the breviary of the Church, sometimes designated by Romanists as "revisions," on the invocation of saints and of Mary, he says, "They were but the expressions of what had been the devotional feelings of the whole Church.... His Holy Spirit communing with their spirits, and no other agent or instrument had taught them that the saints reigning with Christ, and his blessed Mother especially, could and would intercede for them did they ask their prayers; and so one asked, and had his petitions granted, and asked again. Then he breathed the secret (1) of his success to his brother or friend, till he in turn was encouraged to ask. Then another, and another, as the secret was passed about from house to hamlet, and from hamlet to town, and from one country to another, till at length it had spread over Christendom." If this was the way in which the invocation of saints was practised, to authorize its admission in the litany by Pius V in the 16th century, and its affirmation as a doctrine by the Council of Trent, would it not produce the Church fathers of the early age, and the practices of some Christian churches of an age when the Church of Christ was so greatly corrupted and overrun by innovation? The Protetants also believe in saints. They believe in inimitating the noble character exemplified in the life and works of the Church, which is the church of Christ, and the temple of the Holy Ghost, and which are by him to be raised unto eternal life, and to be glorified, are to be venerated by the faithful; through which bodies many benefits are bestowed by God on men, so that they who affirm that veneration and honor are not due to the relics of saints; or that these, and other sacred monuments, are uselessly honored by the faithful; and that the places dedicated to the memories of the saints are vainly visited for the purpose of obtaining their aid, are wholly to be condemned, as the Church has always condemned those who do now and then also condemn them. Involutions. About the 8th century, says Procter (On the Book of Common Prayer, p. 249), the invocations of saints (q. v.) were introduced into the churches of the Western world, and thence spread to various other services. Iona (formerly Ionas), one of the most famous of the Hebrides, is about three miles long, and a mile and a half in breadth from a mile to a mile and a half. In 1681 it had a population of 264. Its remarkable fertility was regarded as miraculous in the Dark Ages, and no doubt led to its early occupation. Dumi, the highest point on the island, is 830 feet above the sea-level. Its history begins in the year 563, when St. Ninian, leaving the shores of Ireland, landed upon Iona with twelve disciples. Having obtained a grant of the island, as well from his kinsman Conall, the son of Comgall, king of the Scots, as from Brudi, the son of Mel- chon, king of the Picts, he built upon it a monastery, which was long regarded as the mother-church of the Picts, and was venerated not only among the Scots of Brittain and Ireland, but among the Angles of the north of England, who owed their conversion to the self-denying missionaries of Iona. From the 6th to the 17th century, the island was most generally called I, Ii, Jo, Jo, Jo, Li, Li, Hu, Hu, Hu, Hii, Hu, H, or Yi—that is, simply, "the Island," or (on Columba's account) Iucolitih, I-Columb-Kille, or Hii-Colum-Kille—that is, "the Island of Columba of the Church." From the end of the 6th to the end of the 8th century Iona was scarcely second to any monastery in the British Isles; but the fierce and heathen Norsemen burned it in 795, and again in 802. Its "family" (as the monks were called) of sixty-eight persons were martyred in 806. A second martyrdom, in 825, is the subject of a contemporary Latin poem by Walfridus Strabo, abbot of the German monastery of Reichenau, long regarded as the mother-church of Ireland. On the evening of 896 the island was again wasted by the Norsemen, who slew the abbot and fifteen of his monks. Towards the end of the next century the monastery was repaired by St. Margaret, the queen of king Malcolm Canmore. It was visited in 1097 by king Magnus the Barefooted, of Norway, being at that time a part of that kingdom, and so fell under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the bishop of Man and the archbishop of Dromtheim. In 1208 the bishops of the north of Ireland disputed the authority of the Manx bishop, pulled down a monastery which he had begun to build in the island, and placed Iperen. JOSUA VAN, a noted Dutch theologian, was born at Middelburg, Feb. 23, 1726. He was descended from an old and respectable Flemish family. His studies, in which he evinced very superior mental endowments, were pursued first at Groningen, and afterwards at Leyden, where he was permitted to enjoy the instructions and friendship of the celebrated professors A. Schultens and T. Hemsterhuyx. In 1749 he was called to the pastoral charge of Lillo. Here he labored with zeal and fidelity for sixteen years. In 1762 he was made professor of divinity at Leiden, and in 1772 he went to Veere, where he remained ten years. Several of the most noted literary, scientific, and poetic societies successively elected him to membership. Zealand also appointed him a member of the commission to which was intrusted the work of preparing a new poetic version of the Book of Psalms. He took an important part in the performance of this duty. The work was approved in 1778, and still continues in use in the Reformed Church of Holland. It possesses a high degree of poetic merit. His income, both at Lillo and Veere, was small, which, with a numerous family to support, was the source of many trials and perplexities. Accepting an appointment as preacher in Batavia, in the Dutch East India possessions, he went thither in 1778, accompanied by his wife and five children. He was cordially received, and an agreeable field of labor was opened to him. He labored here with redoubled zeal and success, but the climate was adverse to his health, and in 1780, after the short space of two years, he rested from his labors on earth. A philological essay, dedicated to the Holland Society of Sciences, and published in 1755, was regarded as highly creditable to him in a linguistic point of view, and as evidencing a philosophic spirit. His History of Church Psalmody, published in 1777, is said to exhibit extensive historical knowledge, combined with good taste. He seems to have excelled in various departments of knowledge. See B. but its towns were distributed politically under other provinces. Ptolemy ranks them in Asia Proper, while Strabo (xiv. 681), Flinn (H. N. Y., 81), and Mela (17) speak of Ionia as a distinct territory. In the account which Josephus gives (Ant. xvi, 2, 3) of the appeal of the Jews in Ionia to Agrippa for exemption from certain oppressions to which they were exposed, the ancient country is referred to as the ancient Greek nation being still called, the cathedral, and the monks his chapter. No building now remains on the island which can claim to have sheltered St. Columba or his disciples. The most ancient ruins are the Laithriean, or Foundations, in a little church of Port-a-Church, the Cobhuis, Cudich or Calves' Cell, in a hollow between Dunil and Dunbhurg; the rash or hill-fort of Dunbhurg; and the Ghearn-an-Tempull, or Glen of the Church, in the middle of the island, believed to be the site of the monastery which the Irish bishops destroyed in 1208. St. Oran's Chapel, now the oldest church in the island, may probably be of the latter part of the 11th century. St. Mary's Nunnery is perhaps a century later. The Cathedral, or St. Mary's Church, seems to have been built chiefly in the early part of the 12th century. It has a choir, with a sacristy on the north side, and chapels on north and south transepts; a central tower about seventy-five feet high, and a nave. An inscription on one of the columns of the choir appears to denote that it was the work of an Irish ecclesiastic who died in 1202. On the north of the cathedral are the chapter-house and other remains of the conventual or monastic buildings. In the "Rooling Orran"—so called, it is supposed, from St. Oran, a kinsman of St. Columba, the first who found a grave in it—were buried Ecfrid, king of Northumbria, in 846; Godred, king of the Isles, in 1188; and Haco Ospar, king of the Isles, in 1228. No monuments of these remains now remain. The oldest of the many tomb-stones on the island are two with Irish inscriptions, one of them, it is believed, being the monument of a bishop of Connor who died at Iona in 1174.—Chambers, Cyclop. v. 619; Duke of Argyll, in Good Words, Sept. 1, 1889, p. 614 sq.; Princeton Rep. 1897, p. 1-22. Ireland, the more western of the two principal islands of which the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is composed, is between lat. 51° 25' and 55° 28' N., and long. 6° 20' and 10° 20' W. Area, 32,515 sq. miles. At the time when the island became known to the Greeks and the Romans, the inhabitants were Celta. Of Celtic origin is the original name of Erin, which means "West Side," and was changed by the Greeks into Ierne, and by the Romans, who made no endeavors to subjugate the island, into Hibernia. During the whole period of the rule of the Romans over Brittany the history of Ireland is shrouded in mystery. As according to later chronicles, Ireland is said to have had in the 3d century five states, Momonia, Conacua, Lagenia, Ultunia, and Modia (Meath). As the people were akin to the Celta of Scotland, Ireland was, until the 4th century, often called Great Scotland (Scotia maior). Christianity appears to have been brought to Ireland at an early time, perhaps as early as the 2d century. A reference to Ireland is, in particular, found in the words of Tertullian, who says that parts of the British islands which had never been visited by the Romans were Christian. In the 4th century a number of churches and schools are mentioned, and even before the 4th century missionaries went out from Ireland. Celestius, the friend and colaborer of Pelagius, was, according to Jerome, an Irishman, and the son of Christian parents. That the Irish had received their Christianity not from Rome, but from the East, is shown by their aversion against the institutions of the Church of Rome. The first Roman missionary, who about 340 was sent to Ireland by pope Celestius, was not well received, and had soon to return to Scotland. Two years later (402), the Scotch monk St. Patrick (q. v.) arrived in Ireland. He had spent his youth in Ireland as a slave, and had subsequently lived for some time in Gaul. With great zeal he preached Christianity throughout Ireland, converted several, and was, in particular, active for the establishment of convents, so that Ireland was called the island of the Saints. He settled finally as bishop of Armagh, which see thus received metropolitan power over all Ireland. According to some writers (Wilsch, Kirchl. Statistik, ii, 48), Ireland was, however, without its own archbishop, being, until the 12th century, subject to the archbishop of Canterbury; according to others, as early as 406 four metropolitan sees at Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam. Certain it is that the permanent division of Ireland into the four ecclesiastical provinces of Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam took place about 1150 (according to Moroni in 1152, at the Council of Melfont; section of Easter to the practice of the Roman Church, instead of following, as heretofore, the rite of the Eastern churches. The Irish made a long resistance, until, in 717, the monks in Iona (q. v.) were on this account either expelled or coerced into submission. Most of the Irish churches then submitted; yet, as late as the 12th century, some monks were found who adhered to the Eastern practice of celebrating Easter. In the 9th century the Irish Church considerably distanced the Other in the proportion of the Conversions of the Northmen, who destroyed many churches, and burned manuscripts and convents. These invasions were followed by a period of anarchy, during which the moral condition of the Irish clergy greatly degenerated. The complaints of Rome at this time referred chiefly to the peculiar cistological practices depopulated the Irish - the marriage of the clergy, the administration of baptism without chrismas, and the use of their own liturgy. The legates of the popes finally succeeded in obtaining the entire submission of the Irish Church to the Church of Rome about the middle of the 12th century, which until then is believed to have been preserved. The Irish clergy were condemned, sacrifice of the mass, and indulgences, and to have celebrated the Lord's Supper in both kinds. In 1155 a bull of pope Hadrian IV allowed king Henry II of England to subject Ireland, the king, in turn, promising the pope to pay the papal privilege. In 1172, a synod at Cashel regulated the ecclesiastical affairs in accordance with the wishes of Rome. During the time of the following kings of the house of Plantagenet the clergy were in a deplorable condition: the bishops carried the sword, and lived with their clergy in open and sequestered. The most extraordinary example of this is apparent from what they had been in former times, traversed the country as troublesome beggars, molesting the priests as well as the laity. When Henry VIII undertook to make himself the head of the Church in his dominions he met in Ireland with a violent opposition. The separation of the English church was more popular as it was intended that henceforth only such priests as understood the English language would be appointed. The Englishman, George Brown, who was appointed bishop of Dublin, met, therefore, in spite of his position, a passionate labor in behalf of the Reformation, with but little success. The English liturgy was introduced in 1551, under Edward VI, but the order to hold divine service in the English language seems not to have been executed. The gerrms of Protestantism were wholly destroyed under the government of Mary. The people, it seems, were not prepared for the Reformation, and the clergy were not as corrupt as in many other countries. Moreover, there were among the ministers who had been sent to Ireland as Protestant missionaries many adventurers, who, by disputable conduct, strengthened the aversion of the people to Protestantism. Under the government of Elizabeth the government was issued in 1560 to introduce the general use of the English liturgy and of the English language at divine service. Some years later, however, concessions appear to have been made in favor of the old Irish language. In 1602 the first translation of the New Testament into the Irish language by William Daniel appeared, but the translation of the whole Bible was not finished until 1655. The persistent endeavors of the English government to extirpate the native language established a close union between the Irish nationality and the language of Rome. The excitement against England greatly increased when Elizabeth sought to confiscate the whole property of the Roman Catholic Church in behalf of the Protestant clergy. A number of revolts consequently occurred, which found a vigorous support on the part of the pope and the Spanish court. A Protestant policy was not only condemned by the English lord lieutenant, Sir John Perrot, for thoroughly Anglicizing Ireland, but was rejected as being too expensive, and thus England was compelled to maintain at a heavy expense a large military force in Ireland. In 1555 the chieftain Hugh O'Neill, whom Elizabeth had made earl of Tyrone, placed himself at the head of a host of 30,000 men, which was mainly supported by Irish soldiers who had returned from military service in foreign countries. The earl of Essex, with an army of 22,000 men, was unable to withstand the attack of the Irish army. June 11, 1556, the battle was fought at the head of the town of Kinsale, where the English were completely defeated. The king of Spain, who had advanced against Ireland, was defeated by the small forces of the earl of Essex at the battle of Kinsale. to quell the insurrection; but his successor, Lord Mountjoy, was more successful, and pacified the whole island. In 1601 the Irish again rose, aided by Spanish troops under Aguila and Ocampo; but the combined forces of Ocampo and O’Niel were, on Dec. 24, 1601, totally defeated. Meanwhile English troops had landed in Ireland in January, 1602, and O’Niel made peace with the English. At the death of Elizabeth the whole of Ireland was under English rule. As a large number of Irish had perished in this conflict, 500,000 acres of land were confiscated in favor of English colonists. In view of the onerous speculations of the Chief Justice, Plunkett, and of the native Irish, the government of Elizabeth proceeded with equal severity against both: the public exercise of the Catholic religion was totally forbidden, and every inhabitant, under penalty of twelve pence, was commanded to be present at divine service celebrated in the Anglican churches. Decreets in this provoked a general dissatisfaction, which was carefully fomented by the Jesuits of the University of Douay, in the Netherlands (now belonging to France). On the accession of James I to the English throne the papal policy was very much opposed, and in 1604 a large number of French Protestant ministers from many places, and re-established the service of the Catholic Church. These attempts were forcibly suppressed, and new insurrections consequently were caused, all of which proved of short duration. In order to break the power of the Catholic chieftais, the government of James I, supported by example of Queen Elizabeth, was especially intent upon wresting from them their landed property. Whoever was unable to prove, by means of a bill of sequestration, his title to his property, lost it. Thus, in the northern part of Ireland alone, about 800,000 acres were confiscated by the crown, which sold them to English speculators and to Scottish colonists. Among those who founded the town of Londonderry. From this time dates the predominance of Protestantism in Ulster, the northern province of Ireland. At the same time, however, many most beneficent measures were taken for improving the social condition of the people. The English law supplanted the previous lawslessness; all inhabitants were declared to be free citizens, and the country was divided into parishes. In 1615 an Irish National Parliament was called to sanction these measures. In consequence of the interference of the government, there were among the 126 members of the lower house only 101 Catholics, while the upper house, consisting of 50 members, consisted almost entirely of Protestants. The Catholics were, moreover, excluded from the public offices, because most of them refused (hence their name "Recusants") to take the oath of supremacy, which was required of all who held the king of England. At the beginning of the reign of Charles I the Anglican Church was nevertheless in a deplorable condition. Many churches were destroyed, the bishoprics impoverished, the clergy ignorant, indolent, and impoverished. A convocation called in 1604 adopted the 39 articles of the Church of England, and retained the 104 articles of the Irish Church which had been adopted by the Parliament of 1615. The constitution of the Church of Ireland was defined in 100 canons, which were of a somewhat more liberal character than the 141 canons of the Church of England. The Roman Catholic Church, however, was allowed all her service in private houses, and many priests who had fled returned. At the same time the Irish nationality continued to be persecuted, and a number of new confiscations were added to the old ones. On Oct. 23, 1644, a body of insurgents broke out under the leadership of Roger More, O’Neale, and lord Maguire, the descendants of former chieftais. Within a few days from 40,000 to 50,000 Protestant Englishmen were murdered (according to other accounts the number of killed amounted to only 6000), and an equally large number is said to have perished in the attempt to flee. The English ordered the confiscation of two and a half million acres of land, but, in consequence of its conflict with the king, was unable to achieve anything. The king’s lieutenant, the marquis of Ormond, concluded peace with the Catholic Irish, who received the promise of religious toleration, and, in return, furnished to the king an army against the Parliament. When, after the execution of the king, the Catholic chiefs fled to France, the Protestant Irish for the prince of Wales as king Charles II, the English Parliament sent an army of 10,000 men under Cromwell to Ireland, which conquered the whole island. The Catholics were punished with the utmost severity: all their landed property, about 5,000,000 acres, confiscated; about 10,000 priests were banished, and 40,000 others compelled to flee to Spain and France. The celebration of Catholic service was forbidden, and all Catholic priests ordered to quit Ireland within twenty days. The restoration of royalty caused no important changes in the condition of the people. Religious persecution ceased by order of Charles II, but the Protestants remained in possession of the confiscated property. The accession of the Catholic James II filled the Irish Catholics with the greatest hopes, and when, after his expulsion, he landed, at the beginning of 1698, with a priest army of 50,000 men, he was received by the Catholics with enthusiasm. His army in a short time numbered more than 38,000 men, and he succeeded in capturing all the fortified places except Enniskillen and Londonderry. Large numbers of Protestants had to leave the country because their lives and property were threatened. Soon, in order to secure the succession of William III over the Catholic party on the Boyne River, near Drogheda (July 1, 1690), and near Aughrim (July 13, 1691), completed the subjugation of Ireland. The peace concluded with the British general Ginkel at the surrender of Limerick promised to the Irish the free exercise of their religion and property under King William III. While James II had deprived 2400 Protestant landowners of their estates, now more than 12,000 Irishmen who had fought for James voluntarily went into exile. A resolution of the English Parliament ordered all the Protestants to sell their land, which were distributed among the Protestants, who began to organize themselves into Orange societies. A number of rigorous and cruel penal laws were passed in order to exterminate the national spirit and the Roman Catholic Church. Bishops and other high dignitaries were exiled; the priests were confined to their own counties; all institutions in the Catholic religion and its public exercise were forbidden; the Catholic Irishmen were not allowed to own horses of higher value than £5, or to marry Protestants, and were excluded from public offices. The irritation produced by these laws was still increased when James II, as king of England, was asked to take the crown of Ireland. The duty on the exports from Ireland, dealt a heavy blow to the commerce and prosperity of the island, and when, in 1727, it deprived the Catholic Irish of the franchise. These harsh measures soon led to the establishment of several secret societies, as the "Defenders," the "Whiteboys" (about 1730), so called from the white shirts which they threw over their other clothes when at night they attacked unpopular landlords and their officers; and the "Hearts of Oak" (about 1768). During the American War of Independence, the Irish, under the pretext that the French might avail themselves of the withdrawal of most of the British troops from the island, formed a volunteer army, which, in the course of two years, increased to 50,000 men. Monster petitions, numerously signed by Irish Protestants also, demanded the abolition of the penal laws, the restoration of the privileges enjoyed by the Irish before the English Parliament, and the relief of Irish commerce. Fear of a general insurrection induced the Parliament to mitigate the penal laws, and to allow the Catholics to establish schools, to own landed property, and to exercise their religious worship. The onerous tithes which the Catholics had to pay to the Established Church of England and the Parliament was another secret society, the "Right Boys," who, by means of oaths and threatened vengeance, endeavored to intimidate the Catholics from paying tithes. A still more dangerous movement was called forth by the outbreak of the French Revolution. The league of "United Irishmen," which, in November, 1791, was formed at Dublin by former members of the volunteer army, endeavored, in union with the French convent, to make Ireland an independent republic. When the Catholics, at a meeting of Dublin merchants, demanded with Protestants, the British Parliament abolished several penal laws, and gave to the Catholics the right of becoming attorneys-at-law and of marrying Protestants. In 1738 the law was abolished which fined the Catholics for neglecting to attend the Protestant Church on Sundays. In 1794 he were permitted to hold lower public offices, and received the right to vote. The United Irishmen, nevertheless, assumed a threatening attitude, and a French corps of 25,000 men, under General Hoche, landed in Ireland. The latter had, however, to leave again in December, 1796, and a new insurrection, which broke out in May, 1798, was unsuccessful.

In 1800 the Irish Parliament, bribed by the English Parliament, consented to the legislative union of Ireland with Great Britain, and in the next year the first united Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland assembled in Westminster. It was in principle the union of the Anglican churches in the two countries, which now received the name of the United Church of England and Ireland. Several further concessions were, however, about this time made to the Catholics. In 1796 a Catholic theological seminary had been established in the British ministry; but it was not until 1838 that the Catholic priests were educated upon British territory they would be less hostile to British rule. The rules against convents were also moderated, and at the close of the 19th century the Dominican order alone had in Ireland about forty-three convents. In 1865 the Catholic Association was formed to secure the complete political emancipation of the Catholics. It soon became the centre of all political movements in Ireland, and, as the Orange lodges began likewise to be revived, frequent disturbances between Catholics and Protestants took place. In 1825 both associations were dissolved by the British government; but the Catholic association was once reorganized by O'Connell, and gained considerable influence upon the elections. The unceasing agitation of O'Connell, aided by the moral support of the Liberal party in England, finally succeeded in inducing the British ministry to lay before Parliament a bill of emancipation, which passed after violent debates, and was signed by George IV on April 18, 1829. The oath which the members of Parliament had to take was so changed that Catholics also could take it. At the same time they obtained access to all public offices, with the only exception of that of lord chancellor. This victory encouraged the Catholics to demand further concessions; in particular, the abolition of the tithes paid to the Protestant clergy, and the repeal of the legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland. In 1828 the British government authorized the Irish Coercion Bill, which authorized the lord lieutenant of Ireland to forbid mass meetings and to proclaim martial law. When the liberal ministry of Melbourne rescinded the Coercion Bill and began to pursue a conciliatory policy towards Ireland, O'Connell dissolved the Repeal Association, Earl Mulgrave, since 1855 lord lieutenant of Ireland, filled the most important offices with Catholics, and in 1856 suppressed all the Orange lodges.

In 1858 the British Parliament adopted the Tithe Bill. When, in August, 1841, the government fell again into the hands of the Tory, O'Connell renewed the repeal agitation so violently that in 1845 he was arrested and sentenced to one year's imprisonment, a sentence which was, however, annulled by the Court of Pears. The repeal agitation ended suddenly by the death of O'Connell in 1857, because no competent successor in the leadership of the party could be found. It was followed by the ascendency of the more radical Young Ireland party, which did not, like O'Connell, court an alliance with the Catholic Church, but preferred to it an outspoken sympathy with the radical Republicans of France, and is on that account not so much interwoven with the ecclesiastical history of Ireland as the movements of O'Connell.

The ultramontane doctrines taught in the seminary of Maynooth called forth an agitation in Protestant England for a repeal of the annual subsidy which that seminary received from the British government. New offence was given to the bishops and the ultramontane party by the constitution of the Catholic denominational "Queen's Colleges." The bishops at the time they were denounced the colleges as "godless," and warned all Catholic parents against them; they could, however, not prevent that ever from the beginning the majority of the students in these colleges were children of Catholic parents. The disregard of the episcopal orders showed a decline of priestly influence upon a considerable portion of the Catholic Irishmen. This decline of priestly influence became still more apparent when, during the civil war in the United States, the Fenian organization was formed for the express purpose of making Ireland an independent republic. As it was made against English rule in Ireland, the new organization, like all its predecessors, had to direct its attacks promingly against the Established Church of Ireland, and thus appeared to have to some extent an anti-Protestant character; but, being a secret society, it was excluded from the communications of political parties. As the Church was so completely in the power of the Irish bishops. The general sympathy with which it nevertheless met among the Catholic Irishmen both of Ireland and the United States is therefore a clear proof that the Catholics of Ireland no longer obey the orders of the bishops. The Established Church of Ireland, regarding itself as the legitimate successor of the medieval Catholic Church, and taking possession of all her dioceses, parishes, and Church property, retained for a long time the same diocesan and parochial divisions as the Roman Catholic Church. As late as 1883, the Church, notwithstanding its small membership, had 4 archbishops and 18 bishops: namely, Armagh, with 5 bishops; Dublin, with 4 bishops; Tuam, with 4 bishops; and Cashel, with 5 bishops. The income of these 22 archbishops and bishops was estimated at £180,000 to £185,000. In 1883 the first decisive step was taken towards reducing the odious prerogatives of the Established Church. The number of archbishops was reduced to two, Armagh and Dublin, and the number of bishops to ten, five for each archbishop. As the income was very unequally distributed, all the benefits yielding more than £200 had a tax of from ten to fifteen per cent. imposed upon them, the proceeds of which were employed for church building, raising the income of poor clergy, and other ecclesiastical purposes. In 1868, the English House of Commons, on motion of Mr. Gladstone, resolved to abolish the Church of Ireland. The proposition was rejected by the House of Lords. Public opinion expressed itself, however, so strongly against the continuance of the privileges of the Irish Church, that the report of the royal commissioners on the revenues and condition of the Church of Ireland (dated July 27, 1869, recommending reductions as to the benefits of the Irish Church. This report, a volume of more than 600 pages, is replete with interesting information, and is one of the best sources of information concerning the condition of the Church at this time. It states that the total revenue of the Church of Ireland, in 1868, amounted to £13,197, and in 1861 benefited a church population of over forty persons, and extending to 5000 and upwards. Four bishops were suggested for abolition, namely, Meath, Killaloe, Cashel, and Kilmurry. The commissioners were in favor of leaving one archbishop only, that of Armagh. All bishops were to receive £3000 a year in-ome, and an additional £500 when attending Parliament. The primates was to get £6000, and the archbishop of Dublin, if continued, £5000. The abolition of all cathedrals and deaneries except eight was recommended. With a view to rearrangement of benefices, it was proposed that ecclesiastical commissioners should have extended jurisdiction. A bill was introduced to vest all benefices not having a Protestant population of forty were to be suppressed. The estates of all capular bodies and of the bishoprics abolished were to be vested in ecclesiastical commissioners, and the surplus of all property vested in them to be applicable at their discretion to augmentation of benefices. The ecclesiastical commission was to be modified by the introduction of three unpaid laymen and two paid commissioners, one appointed by the crown, the other by the primates. The management of all lands was to be taken out of the hands of ecclesiastical persons and placed in those of the ecclesiastical commissioners.

Mr. Gladstone having become, towards the close of the year 1868, prime minister, introduced in March, 1869, a new bill for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. It passed a second reading in the House of Commons, after a long and exciting debate, by a vote of 368 to 230, showing a majority in favor of the passage of 118; and in the House of Lords by a majority of 38 in a house of 300 members. The amendments adopted by the House of Lords were nearly all rejected by the Commons, and on July 26 it received the royal assent. The bill, which contains sixty clauses, is entitled "A Bill to put an end to the establishment of the Church of Ireland, and to make provision in respect to the temporalities thereof, and in respect to the royal College of Maynooth." The disestablishment was to be total, but was not to take place until Jan. 1, 1870, when the ecclesiastical courts were to be abolished, the ecclesiastical laws to cease to have any authority, the bishops to be no longer peers of Parliament, and all ecclesiastical corporations in the country to be dissolved. The disendowment was technically and legally to be total and immediate. Provision was made for preserving up the ecclesiastical commission, and the constitution of a new commission, composed of ten members, in which the whole property of the Irish Church was to be vested from the day the measure received the royal assent. A distinction was made between public endowments (valued at £15,500,000), including everything in the nature of a state grant or revenue, which were to be resumed by the state, and private endowments (valued at £500,000), which were defined as money contributed from private sources since 1690, which were to be restored to the disestablished Church. Provision was made for compensation to vested interests, including those connected with Maynooth College and the Presbyterians who were in receipt of the regium donum. Among these interests, the largest in the aggregate were those of incumbents, to each of whom was secured during his life, provided he continued to discharge the duties of his benefice, the amount to which he was entitled, deducting the amount he might have paid for curates, or the interest might under certain circumstances, be commuted, upon his application for a life annuity. Other personal interests provided for were those of curates, permanent and temporary, and lay compensations, including claims of parish clerks and sextons. The amount of the Maynooth grant and the regium donum was to be valued at fourteen years' purchase, and a capital sum equal to it handed over to the respective representatives of the Presbyterians and of the Roman Catholics. The aggregate of these amounts would amount to about £3,000,000, leaving about £7,500,000, placing an annual income of about £30,000,000 at the disposal of Parliament. This was to be appropriated "mainly to the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering, but in such a way as not to interfere with the obligation imposed upon property by the poor laws." A constitution for the disestablished church was adopted by a General Convention, held in Dublin in 1870. The Church will be governed by a General Synod, consisting of a House of Bishops and a House of Clerical and Lay Delegates. The House of Bishops has the right of veto, and their veto prevails also at the next synod; but seven bishops must agree upon a veto to make it valid. The bishops will be elected by the Diocesan Convention, but the House of Bishops will in all cases be the court of selection when the Diocesan Synod does not elect by a majority of two thirds of each order a clergyman to fill the vacant see. The primates (archbishop of Armagh) shall be elected by the Bench of Bishops out of their own number. The property of the Church is to be vested in a "Representative Church Body," which is to be permanent. It is to be composed of three classes: the ex-officio, or archbishops and bishops; the elected members, who are to consist of one clerical and two lay representatives for each diocese; and the co-opted members, who are to consist of persons elected in number to each diocese, and to be elected by the ex-officio and representative members. The elected members are to retire in the proportion of one third by rotation. The Convention also adopted a resolution against the introduction of the ritualistic practices which have crept into the Established Church of England.

The following table shows the population connected with the Anglican Church, according to the official census of 1881, in each of the counties, together with the number of Roman Catholics, and the population of other religious denominations in each:

The Roman Catholic Church in Ireland is governed by four archbishop, whose sees are in Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam, and two other bishops; they are all nominated by the pope, generally out of a list of three names submitted to him by the parish priests and chapter of the vacant diocese, and reported on by the archbishops and bishops of the province. In case of expected incapacity from age or infirmity, the bishop names a coadjutor, who is usually confirmed by the pope, with the right of succession. In many of the dioceses a chapter and cathedral corps have been revived, the dean being appointed by the cardinal protector at Rome. The diocesan dignitaries are the vicars-general, of whom there are one, two, or three, according to the extent of the diocese, who have special disciplinary and other powers; vicars-forane, whose functions are more restricted; the archdeacon, and the parish priests or incumbents. All of these, as well as the bishop, are appointed by the bishop. The whole of the clergy are supported solely by the voluntary contributions of their flocks. The episcopal emoluments arise from the mensal parish or two, the incumbency of which is retained by the bishop, from marriage licenses, and from the considerations of 2d to 7d per annum, varying to £10 or £15 paid by each incumbent in the diocese. The 2425 civil parishes in Ireland are amalgamated into 1073 ecclesiastical parishes or unions, being 445 livingless than in the Anglican Church. The incomes of the parish priests arise from fees on marriages, baptisms, and deaths, and Easter and Christmas dues, and from incidental voluntary contributions either in money or labor. The number of priests in Ireland in 1833 was 2291 (of whom 1222 were educated at Maynooth College); in 1869 it was 3053. The curates of the parish priests form more than half the whole clerical society dispersed through the cities and towns are 70 or 80 communities of priests of various religious orders or rules, hence called Regulars, who minister in their own churches, and, though without parochial jurisdiction, greatly aid the secular clergy. All the places of public worship are built by subscriptions, legacies, and donations. There are numerous monasteries and convents; the latter are supported partly by sums, usually from £300 to £500, paid by those who take the vows in them, and partly by the fees for the education of the daughters of respectable Roman Catholics. Various communities of monks and nuns also devote themselves to the gratuitous education of the children of the poor. Candidates for the priesthood, formerly under the necessity of obtaining their education in continental colleges, are now educated at home. The principal clerical college is that of Maynooth, which was founded in 1795 as Royal College of St. Patrick at Maynooth. The Irish Parliament made it to an annual grant of £14,000; the English Parliament sanctioned the grant, but reduced it to £8927, out of which the professors and 450 students were supported. The Irish lord Dunboyne founded 20 scholarships in 1845, the government, under the administration of Sir Robert Peel, raised the annual grant to £26,000; more recently this sum was again raised to £38,000. In 1869, when the Anglican Church was disestablished, a capital sum equal to the amount of the Maynooth grant, valued at fourteen years' purchase, was handed over to the representatives of the Roman Catholic Church. The Roman Catholic University at Dublin was established at a synodical meeting of the Catholic bishops held on May 18, 1854. At a conference held in 1863 the bishops resolved to enlarge the university, and to erect a new building at the cost of £100,000. There are besides the Catholic colleges of St. Patrick, Carlow; St. Jarlath, Tuam; St. John's, Waterford; St. Peter's, Wexford; St. Colman's, Fermoy; St. Patrick's, Armagh; St. Patrick's, Thurles; St. Kyran's, Kilkenny; St. Mel, Longford; All Hallows (devoted exclusively to prepare priests for foreign missions), and Clonfert, Dublin, all supported by voluntary contributions.

There are also for the education of Irish priests two colleges in Rome, the Irish College and the College of St. Isidore, and one in Paris. The number of religious communities of men has decreased during the last hundred years. The Dominicans, at the time of Benedict XIV, had 29 houses, in 1890 only 18 houses, with about 50 monks; the Augustines had formerly 28, now 11 convents; the Carmelites have 19 houses, formerly 167; the Jesuits 5 colleges, 1 home, and 79 members; the Lazarists, Passionists, and Redemptorists 2 houses each; the brothers of the Christian Schools have a large number of institutions. The following is a statistical summary of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland in 1889:

The first Presbytery in Ireland was formed at Carrickfergus in 1642, and gave rise to the Synod of Ulster. The Presbytery Synod of Minster was formed about 1660. The Presbytery of Antrim separated from the Synod of Ulster in 1717, and the Remonstrant Synod in 1829. A number of seceders formed themselves into the succession Synod of Ireland about 1780. In 1840, the General and Succession Synods, having united, assumed the name of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, comprising, in 1888, 600 congregations, arranged under 87 presbyteries. The ministers were supported by voluntary contributions, the rents of seats and pews, and the interest of the regium domum, or royal gift. This was first granted in 1672 by Charles II, and in 1869 26 (first class) ministers received from the state £92 2s. 6d. each, and 551 (second class) £50 4s. 6d. each per annum. As the ministers in the first class died, their successors only received the latter amount. The regium domum, as annual grant, was abolished by the Irish Church Bill, but a capital sum equal to the amount of the domum, valued at fourteen years' purchase, was handed over to the representatives of the Presbyterian body. The total sum for regium domum voted by Parliament for the year ending March 31, 1869, was £40,547. The minutes of the General Assembly for 1869 state that in the year ending March 31 there were 628 ministers (besides 51 licentiates and ordained ministers without charge), 560 congregations, and 262 manes. The seat rents produced £58,011; the stipends paid to ministers, £37,583; raised for building or repairing churches, manes, and schools, £17,820; Sabbath collections, £13,575; mission collections, £12,124; other charitable collections, £6,835. The Congregational Debt was £53,167. The Presbyterians have the General Assembly's College at Belfast, and Magee College at Londonderry. The latter was opened Oct. 10, 1865. In the year 1840, Mrs. Magee, widow of the late Rev. William Magee, Presbyterian minister of Largan, left £20,000 in trust for the erection and endowment of a Presbyterian college. This sum was allowed to accumulate for some years, until eventually the trustees were authorized, by a decree of the lord chancellor, to select a convenient site at or near the city of Londonderry. The citizens of Derry subscribed upwards of £5000 towards the erection of the building, which cost about £10,900. The Irish Society have granted an annual endowment of £250 of the revenue of Derry, on the ground that, contrary to its usages and code of discipline, it required from its members in 1827 and 1828 submission to certain doctrinal tests and overtures of human invention. There are 4 presbyteries and 27 congregations in this synod.

The Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, consisting of 4 presbyteries and 25 congregations, is unconnected with the General Assembly. It did not participate in the regnum donum.

United Presbytery or Synod of Munster.—This body was formed in 1869 by the junction of the Southern Presbytery of Munster with the Presbytery of Munster, and is one of the three non-subscribing Presbyterian bodies of Ireland, the other two being the Presbytery of Antrim (now consisting of 11 congregations) and the Reformed Synod of Ulster. A few years ago these three bodies united to form the "General Non-subscribing Presbytery of the General Association of the Church of Ireland," for the promotion of their common principles, the right of private judgment, and non-subscription to creeds and confessions of faith. The General Association meets triennially for these objects, while the three bodies of which it is composed retain their respective names and independent existence, being governed by their own rules and regulations.

The Irish Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection of Great Britain numbered in 1869 19,659 members, 827 members on trial, and 174 ministers. The president of the British Conference is also president of the Irish Conference. The Primitive Methodist Society (also called Church Methodists) numbered in 1869 57,633 members in Ireland. They regard themselves as belonging to the Anglican Church. According to the census of 1861, the total Methodist population of Ireland amounted to 165,797. There were also attached to the Wesleyan Conference, 4,529 Independents, 4,827 Baptists, 3,695 Friends, 18,798 belonging to other sects, and 458 Jews.

The commissioners of public instruction and the census commissioners return the numbers in the principal religious denominations, and their percentage of the general population have been as follows:

The census commissioners of 1861, in their report on religion and education (p. 5), remark that "the Wesleyan Methodists, by a peculiarity of their constitution, although frequenting places of worship distinct from those of the Established Church, very generally declined to be reckoned as dissenters, and were therefore included (by the commissioners of public instruction of 1864) among the members of the Established Church." Between the years 1864 and 1873 the Roman Catholic population showed a decline of 1,390,770 persons—the difference between 4,436,069 in 1864 and 4,625,255 in 1861—or nearly a third of what was their entire number in 1861; and, distributing this loss over the original dioceses (as given in the list of Anglican dioceses), as in the case of the Established Church, we find that it has to be divided among thirty out of the thirty-two, the only exceptions being the dioceses of Dublin and Connor, in both of which the number of Roman Catholics is something in excess of what it was in 1854. The total Roman Catholic population of Ireland in 1854, as it has been estimated, is 3,300,500, in 1861, 4,653,255, and in 1873, 4,635,255; or, rather less than a fifth of their number in 1854. This reduction distributes itself over ten of the thirty-two (original Anglican) dioceses—those, namely, of Achonry, Armagh, Clogher, Connor, Derry, Down, Dromore, Kilfenora, Kilmore, and Raphoe, the total Presbyterian population of which amounted in 1834 to 657,784, and in 1861 to 505,196, showing a reduction of 132,588, or 20.8 per cent. of the original numbers.

In twenty-two dioceses the Presbyterians have very considerably increased, their gross population having been only 5274 in 1854, and 18,095 in 1861, showing an increase in twenty-two dioceses of the members of the Established Church to the general population which had risen since 1854 in twenty-one out of the thirty-two dioceses, had remained stationary in two, and fallen in nine.

In 1861 the grants of public money for the education of the children of the Established Church were to the charge of the lord lieutenant, to be expended on the instruction of the children of every religious denomination, under the superintendence of commissioners appointed by the crown, and named "The Commissioners of National Education." The principles on which the commissioners act are, that the schools shall be open alike to Christians of every denomination; that no pupil shall be required to attend at any religious exercises, or to receive any religious instruction which his parents or guardians do not approve, and that sufficient opportunity shall be afforded to the pupils of each religious persuasion to amount separately, at appointed times, such religious instruction as their parents or guardians think proper. In 1845 the commissioners were incorporated under the name of "The Commissioners of National Education in Ireland," with power to hold lands to the yearly value of £40,000, and to purchase and hold land for the purpose of erecting schools to amount to that amount, to erect and maintain schools where and as many as they shall think proper, to grant leases for three lives or thirty-one years, to sue and to be sued by their corporate name in all courts, and to have a common seal, a power being vested in the lord lieutenant to fill up vacancies, to appoint additional members, provided the total number does not exceed twenty, and to remove members at his pleasure.

The following return gives the number of schools and pupils at different periods, and the amount of parliamentary grants annually voted for their maintenance:

witness to this connection in the following words: "Those opinions, Florinus, that I may speak in mild terms, are not part of sound doctrine; these opinions are not consonant with the Church, and involve their votaries in the utmost impiety; those opinions have never ventured to broach; these opinions the present age has not promulgated, and the sects, who were conversant with the apostles, did not hand down to thee. For, while I was yet a boy, I saw thee in Lower Asia with Polycarp, distinguishing thyself in the royal court, and endeavoring to gain his approbation. You have a more vivid recollection of what occurred at that time when more of life remains, such as the experiences of childhood, keeping pace with the growth of the soul, become incorporated with it, so that I can even describe the place where the beloved Polycarp used to sit and discourse—his going out and coming in—his general mode of life and personal appearance, together with the discourses which he delivered to the people; also how he would speak of his familiar intercourse with John, and with the rest of those who had seen the Lord; and how he would call their words to remembrance... What I heard from him, and what I wrote in a paper, the grace of God, I constantly bring it fresh to my mind." It is not known at what time Irenaeus removed to Gaul, but it is supposed by some that he accompanied Photinus (whom he afterwards succeeded as bishop) on his mission to Gaul to establish churches at Lyons and Vienna. So far as it is certain, that he died about 184, under the papacy of Irenaeus, Lyons under Marcus Aurelius, according to Eusebius (388, p. 171; compare p. 157), and was sent by his people to Eleutherus, bishop of Rome (A.D. 176-192), as a mediator in the Montanistic disputes. While yet on this mission Photinus suffered martyrdom, and Irenaeus was elected as his successor (about A.D. 177). He at once returned and zealously devoted himself, by tongue and pen, for the upbuilding of the Christian Church, so greatly suffering at this time in further Gaul from the persecutions of the heathen government. He is supposed by some to have suffered martyrdom in the persecutions under Septimius Severus, A.D. 202; but the silence of Tertullian and Eusebius, and most of the early Church fathers, makes this point very doubtful.

Irenaeus was the leading representative of the Asiatic Johanian school in the second half of the 2nd century, and was one of the most active of the Catholic apologists against the Gnostic heresy, and the mediator between the Western and Eastern churches. He united a learned Greek education and philosophical penetration with practical wisdom and moderation, and a just sense of the simple essentials in Christianity. We plainly trace in him the influence of the spirit of John, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness," and the teachings of the church at Smyrna, in France, during the latter half of the 2nd century.

II. Writings of Irenaeus. — His writings, which are very extended, covering, in their translation into English, so far as now known, between six and seven hundred pages of the "Ante-Nicene Library" of the Marston, Clark, of Edinburgh, are perhaps the most valuable relic of early Christian literature. We have there a perfect picture of the teaching of the church at Smyrna, as it was preserved in his time, and as it was handed down to him, by the teaching of the bishop Polycarp, and as it was handed down to him, by the teaching of the bishop Polycarp, and as it was handed down to him, by the teaching of the bishop Polycarp. "Through this link he still was connected with the Johannine age. The spirit of his preceptor passed over to him, and misled a former friend of his own, Florinus, who had rejoined to Valentinianism, whom he earnestly endeavored to bring back to the Church, he bore valled in the primitive Church respecting many most important points. Especially valuable, and the most important of all the writings of Irenæus, is his work Ἐλκυρία καὶ ανατηρητική τῆς ἡγουμένων γνώσεως; generally published under the Latin title De Refutatione et Exercitio Fidei ("A Refutation and Exercitation of Knowledge falsely so called"), and more commonly even under the shorter title of Adversus Haereses ("Against Heresies"). This work, which was mainly directed against the Gnostic error of that day, was composed during the pontificate of Eleutherus, and "is at once a logical and theological masterpiece of the ante-Nicene age, and the richest mine of information respecting the Gnostics, particularly the Valentinian heresy, and the Church doctrine of that age" (Schaaff). The work is divided into five books. The first of these contains a minute description of the tenets of the various heretical sects, with occasional brief remarks in illustration of their absurdity, and in confirmation of the truth to which they were opposed. In his second book, Irenæus proceeded to a more complete demolition of those heresies which he has already explained, and argues at length against them, on grounds principally of reason. The three remaining books set forth more directly the true doctrines of revelation, as being in utter antagonism with the views held by the Gnostic teachers. "In the course of this argument many passages of Scripture are quoted and commented on; many interesting points are made, bearing on the rule of faith, and much important light is shed on the doctrines held, as well as the practices observed by the Church of the 2d century." As an introduction to the study which he describes, and with which he manifestly had taken great pains to make himself familiar, and as an exposé and refutation of them, for which the greatest learning of the writer, acknowledged by nearly all his critics, fortunately coupled with a firm grasp of the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures, especially fitted him, this work is truly invaluable. And though it must be admitted that on some points Irenæus has put forth very strange opinions, it cannot be denied that, upon the whole, Adversus Haereses "contains a vast amount of sound and valuable exposition of Scripture in opposition to the fanciful systems of interpretation which prevailed in his day." The Adversus Haereses was written in Greek, but it is unfortunately no longer extant in the original. The English translator of it for Clark's (Edinburgh) edition says that "it has come down to us only in an ancient Latin version, with the exception of the greater part of the first book, which has been preserved in the original Greek, through means of copious quotations made by Tertullian, Clemens, and Epiphanius. The text, both of the Latin and of the Greek, as far as extant, is often most uncertain, and this has made it a difficult task for translation into English. In all only three MSS. of it are known to exist at present; but there is reason to believe that Erasmus, who printed the first edition of it (1520), had others at hand in his preparation of the work for the press. The Latin version, spoken of above as the only complete version of it, was, according to Dodwell (Illustrt. Iren., 9, 10), prepared in the 4th century; but it is known that Tertullian, in his day, used the same version, and it is highly probable, therefore, that that which is the only Greek text at the beginning of the 3d century. It is certainly to be depled that the other codices which Erasmus must have used have not come down to us, or that they are, at least, not known to us, for they might, perhaps, enable us to determine more accurately the meaning in many passages now quite obscure to us in their barbaric Latin. From 1526, when Erasmus printed his first edition, to 1571, several editions were produced. But all these depended on the ancient barbarous Latin versions, and were moreover defective towards the end by five entire chapters. These first three were not supplied in print by Tertullian, of Paris, in an edition of 1575, which was reprinted in six successive editions Gallusius, a minister of Geneva, also had in 1570 supplied the Latin with the first portions of the Greek text from Epiphanius. In 1702, Grabe, a Prussian, resident in England, published an edition at Oxford, which contained considerable additions to the Greek text, besides some fragments. But his edition was soon followed by that of the Benedictine Massuet (Paris, 1712; Venice, 1724, 2 vol. fol.), since (1857) added to the Migne edition of the fathers, of which, very unfortunately, all the stereotype plates have lately been destroyed by fire. Another edition, containing the additions which have been noted to the text from the Greek, is that of the Berlin, phaumenes of Hippolytus, and thirty-two fragments of a Syriac version of the Greek text of Irenæus, culled from the Nitrian collection of Syriac MSS. in the British Museum, all of which in several instances rectify the readings of the barbarous Latin version, was prepared by Wigan Harvey, at Cambridge, in 1857, under the title S. Irenæus Episcopi Lugdunensis libri quinque adversus Haereses, and may be considered the best now extant. It is also enriched with an introduction of great length, which supplies much valuable information on the sources and phenomena of Gnosticism, and the life and writings of Irenæus. Further more contains numerous extracts which display great research and erudition, and are especially deserving of notice on account of the hypothesis which the writer seeks to establish, that Irenæus understood Syriac, and that the version of the Scriptures used by him in writing his works, as well as the hebrew, were translated from the LXX. This translation was made by H. W. J. Thiersch (in the Studien u. Kritiken, 1843) to translate the Latin version of the first four chapters of the third book back into the original, in order to lead to a better understanding of Irenæus's meaning. Objections to the genuineness of this work of Irenæus were of course made, and the more learned and concerning the theologians, as it is one of the "historic links associating the Christianity of the present day with that of our Lord's apostles and disciples," and a work on which "we depend for satisfactory evidence respecting the canons of the New Testament" (see below, under "Doctrines of Irenæus") would have spared themselves, was quite "inadequate." Besides Adversus Haereses, Irenæus also wrote, according to Eusebius, "several letters against those who at Rome corrupted the doctrine of the Church: one to Blasius, concerning schism; another to Florinus (already alluded to), concerning the monarchy, or to prove that Eusebius and Blasius were correct in number eight," but these are all lost to us with the exception of a few fragments. Eusebius also mentions "a discourse of Irenæus against the Gentiles, entitled Εἰς ιορρηγίας (Concerning Knowledge); another incribed to a brother named Marcianus, being a demonstration of the apostolical preaching; and a little book of sundry disputations;" but these, also, are mainly lost to us. Pfaff, in 1715, discovered at Turin four more Greek fragments, which he attributed to Irenæus as their author. The genuineness of these has been called in question by some Roman divines; "though," says Dr. Schaaff, "without sufficient reason." These fragments treat (1) of true knowledge (Γνωσις αληθινη;) "which consists, not in the true solution of subtle questions, but in divine wisdom and the imitation of Christ;" (2) on the Eucharist; (3) on the duty of toleration in religious points of division; (4) of the Easter difficulties; (4) on the object of the incarnation, "which is stated to be the purging away of sin, and the final annihilation of all evil." An edition containing the Prologomena to the earlier editions, and also the disputations of Maffeii and Pfaff on the fragments of the first three, was published by H. Schlesinger under the title S. Irenæus Episcopi Lugdun. qua super sunt omnium (Lipsa, 1855, 2 vols.).
III. Doctrines.—We have already said that the writings of Irenæus are invaluable to us as an index of the views which the primitive Church of Christ held on many very important points that have become matters of controversy between the different branches of the Christian Church up to our own day. In this, of course, we shall be following the Father of the Church in his extensive work against Heretics, or the Gnostics; and though some of his views, especially on the millennium, may not have our approval, we must none the less commend the whole work for the fervent piety which constantly impregnates us in the perusal of it.

1. God the Father.—The doctrine of the unity of God as the eternal, almighty, omnipotent, just, and holy creator and upholder of all things, which the Christian Church inherited from Judaism, was one which the early Christian writers were especially called upon to vindicate against the absurd, atheistical, paganism of the pagans, and particularly against the dualism of the Gnostics. Accordingly we find most of the creeds of the first centuries, especially the Apostles' and the Nicene, begin with the confession of faith in God, the Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth, of the visible and the invisible, and the sole source of salvation from sin and death, and because of this fundamental doctrine laid down in the very first chapters of the Bible, Irenæus opens his refutation of the Gnostic heresies, saying, in the language of Justin Martyr, that he would not have believed the Lord himself if he had announced any other God than the Creator, because he is, after Polycarp, "the most perfect and the most exalted idea of God, and bases his knowledge wholly on revelation and Christian experience." So also on the doctrine of creation, Irenæus, and with him Tertullian, "most firmly rejected the hylozoic and demiurge views of paganism and Gnosticism, and taught, according to the book of Genesis (comp. Ps. xcvi, 9; cvi, 5; John i, 3), that God made the world, including matter, not, of course, of any material, but out of nothing, or, to express it positively, out of his free, almighty will by his word. This free will of God, a will of love, is the supreme, absolutest law of the universe, and all-conditioning cause and final reason of all existence, precluding every idea of physical force or of eminence. Every creature, since it proceeds from the good and holy God, is itself, in its essence, good (comp. Gen. i, 31)." Evil, therefore, is not an original and substandard deviation from the true, but the result of spiritual enmity, and hence can be destroyed by the power of redemption. Without a correct doctrine of creation there can be no true doctrine of redemption, as all the Gnostic systems show."

2. Person of Christ.—On the relation which Christ sustained to the Father also, the views of Irenæus are important, because he is, after Polycarp, "the most faithful representative of the Johannean school." He certainly "keeps more within the limits of the simple Biblical statements," and in the simpler way of the Western fathers, among whom he may be counted, notwithstanding his early Greek training. "He ventures no such bold speculations as the Alexandrians, but is more sound, and much nearer the Nicene standard. He likewise uses the terms λόγος and Son of God interchangingly, and concedes the distinction, made also by the Valentinians, between the inward and the uttered word, in reference to man, but contemplates the application of it to God, who is above all antitheses, absolutely simple and unchangeable, and in whom before and after, thinking and speaking, coincide. He repudiates also every speculative or a priori attempt to explain the derivation of the Son from the Father; this he holds to be an incomprehensible mystery, and connects the actual distinction between Father and Son by saying that the former is God revealing himself, the latter, God revealed; the one is the ground of revelation, the other is the actual, appearing revelation itself. Hence he calls the Father the invisible of the Son, and the Son the visible of the Father. He discriminates most rigidly the conceptions of generation and of creation. The Son, though begotten of the Father, is still, like him, distinguished from the created world, as increase, without beginning, and eternal—all plainly showing that Irenæus is much nearer the Nicene dogma of the substantial identity of the Son with the Father than Justin and the Alexandrians. If, as he does in several passages, he still subordinates the Father to the Son, and designates the latter as the principal one, he is consistent, and that for want of an accurate distinction between the eternal Logos and the actual Christ. The λόγος Ἰσονῖκος and the λόγος ἕναρκος, expressions like 'My Father is greater than I,' which apply only to the Christ of history, he refers also, like Justin and Irenæus, to the Logos himself. On the other hand, he has been charged with leaning in the opposite direction towards the Sabellian and Patrapiasian views, but unjustly, as Duncker, in his monograph Die Christologie des heiligen Irenaus (p. 50 sq.), has unanswerably shown. Apart from his frequent want of precision, he steers in general, with sure Biblical and churchly tact, equally clear of both extremes, and asserts alike the essential unity and the eternal personal distinction of the Father and the Son. The incarnation of the Logos he ably discusses, viewing it both as a restoration and redemption from sin and death, and the concomitant revelation of God and of the creation of man. In the latter view, as finisher, Christ is the perfect Son of man, in whom the likeness of man to God, the similitudo Dei, regarded as moral duty, in distinction from the image Dei, as an essential property, becomes for the first time a fully real. Standing like a bridge between the two worlds, he is grounded in the original plan of God for the education of mankind, and independent of the fall; it would have taken place even without the fall, though in some other form. Yet Irenæus does not expressly say this; speculation on abstract possibilities was foreign to his realist cast of mind. (Dr. Schaff, i, § 77, 78.)"

We now pass to a consideration of Irenæus's views on the doctrine of Christ's humanity. Here, again, his first task is to refute Gnostic Docetists. "Christ," he contends against them, "must be a man, like us, if he would redeem us from corruption and make us perfect. As in and death came into the world by a man, he could be blotted out legitimately and to our advantage only by a man; though, of course, not by one who should be a mere descendant of Adam, and thus himself stand in need of redemption, but by a second Adam, supernatural in being begotten, and hence not only beyond, but different from the man he is human. A new birth unto life must take the place of the old birth unto death. As the completer, also, Christ must enter into fellowship with us, to be our teacher and pattern. He made himself equal with man, that man, by his likeness to the Son, might become precious in the Father's sight." (Dr. Schaff, still further) conceived the humanity of Christ not as mere corporeality, though he often contends for this alone against the Gnostics, but as true humanity, embracing body, soul, and spirit. He places Christ in the same relation to the regenerate race which Adam bears to the natural, and regards him as the absolute universal man, the prototype and summing up of the whole race. Connected with this is his beautiful thought, found also in Hippolytus in the tenth book of the Philo-phonemen, that Christ made the circuit of all the stages of human life, to redeem and sanctify all. To this idea he so singularly extended the life of Jesus to fifty years, and endeavored to prove his view from the gospels against the Valentinians. The full communion of Christ with men involved his participation in all their evils and sufferings, yea, with the touch of death, even the death of the cross. Also on the doctrine of the mutual relation of the divine and the human in Christ, which was neither specially discussed nor brought to a final, definite settlement until the Christological controversies of the 5th century, Irenæus, in a number of passages, throws out hints which deserve consideration from their importance. "He teaches unequivocally a true and indissoluble union of divinity and humanity in Christ, and repels the Gnostic idea of a mere external and transient connection of the divine Logos with the human Jesus. The foundation for that union he perceives in the creation of the world by the Logos, and in man's original likeness to God and destination for perfection with him. In the act of union, that is, in the supernatural generation and birth, the divine is the active principle, and the seat of personality; the human, passive or receptive; as, in general, man is absolutely dependent on God, and is the vessel to receive the revelations of his wisdom and love. The medium and bond of the union is the Holy Ghost (see below), who took the place of the masculine agent in the generation, and overshadowed the virgin womb of Mary with the power of the Highest. In this connection he calls Mary the counterpart of Eve, the 'mother of all living' in a higher sense, who, by her believing obedience, became the cause of salvation both to herself and to the whole human race, as Eve, by her disobedience, induced the apostasy and death of mankind—a fruitful parallel, which was afterwards frequently pushed too far, and turned, no doubt, to subserve the contrary to its original sense, to favor the idolatrous worship of the blessed Virgin. Ireneus seems, at least according to Dorrer (Christology, i, 446), to conceive the incarnation as progressive, the two factors reaching absolute communion (but neither absorbing the other) in the ascension; though before this, as everywhere, Christ was a perfect man, presenting, the model of every age" (Schaff, i, § 79).

8. The Holy Ghost.—On the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, Ireneus, more nearly than the Greek Church fathers, especially the Alexandrians, represents the dogma of the perfect, substantial identity of the Holy Spirit with the Father and the Son; the Holy Spirit being personified (but for this reason not so definite) designation of the Son and Spirit as the 'hands' of the Father, by which he made all things, implies a certain subordination (see Ireneus' views given below under "Trinity"). He differs from Origen, Christ is the Wisdom of the book of Proverbs not to the Logos, but to the Spirit, and hence he must have regarded him as eternal. Yet he was far from conceiving the Spirit as a mere power or attribute; he considered him an independent personality, like the Logos. 'With God,' says he (Christ, ii, 16), 'the Holy Ghost has been personified'; the Son is personally the Wisdom, the Son and the Spirit, through whom and in whom he freely made all things, to whom he said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness."* But he speaks more of the operations than of the nature of the Holy Ghost. The Spirit predicted in the prophets the coming of the Son, and has been personified; communicates the knowledge of the Father and the Son; gives believers the consciousness of sonship; is fellowship with Christ, the pledge of imperishable life, and the ladder on which we ascend to God" (Schaff, § 80).

4. The Trinity.—On the doctrine of the Trinity, the language of Ireneus is perhaps plainer and more incontrovertible than that of any other of the early Church fathers, and yet both Arians and Socinians have sometimes presumed to claim him as a supporter of their peculiarities. From that point of view, we have here the bug both Christ and the Holy Spirit parts of the supreme divinity. Nay, Christ is often expressly declared to be God. Thus, in a passage in which Ireneus is commenting on the prophecy respecting the birth of Emmanuel he says: "Carefully, then, has the Holy Ghost pointed out the name; for thus did his birth, his virgin birth, and his essence, that he is God, for the name Emmanuel indicates this" (iii, 21, 4); and again, in allusion to the Father: "With him were always present the Word and Wisdom, the Son and the Spirit, by whom and in whom, freely and spontaneously, he made all things; to whom, also, "Let us make man in our image and likeness." Indeed, Dr. Schaff (Ch. Hist, i, 296) seems hardly justified in his statement that "of a supermundane trinity of essence Ireneus betrays but faint indications." He continually quotes from Genesis, with the object of showing that both Christ and the Holy Spirit existed with the Father anterior to all creation ("ante omnes constitutionem"). With a writer in the Irenika, and For. Rom., 1 (rev.), p. 5, he seems to believe that the word "hands" is used by Ireneus to indicate that they are both co-workers of the Father rather than his subordinate workman (compare Ebrar, Kirchen- und Dogmengesch., i, 110 and 111, note 8). "In all things and through all things there is one God, the Father, and one Word, and one Son, and one salvation to all that believe in him." Another very beautiful passage "reveals the doctrine of the Trinity as being, in fact, wrapped up in the official title by which the Saviour is designated." Says he: "In the name of Christ (iii, 18) it is implied he alone to whom he is appointed, and the union itself with which he is appointed. And it is the Father who appoints, but the Son who is appointed by the Spirit, who is the union, as the word declares by Isaiah, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me,' thus pointing out the anointer, the Father; the appointed one, the Son, and the Unierse which is the Spirit'—certainly "a rich and pregnant thought, which will bear much consideration. It is very striking and satisfactory to find the doctrine of the three divine persons thus developed out of the very name which the Saviour bears. Nor does there seem any reason to doubt, in the reasoning of the three persons is not think of an appointed one without necessarily thinking also of one who appoints, and of the union with which he is appointed, we are thus led to conceive, by a simple remembrance of our Lord's official designation of the Father, the anointer, the Son, the anointed, and the Spirit, the living God who came upon him, infinite fullness, from the Father on the Son—the three-one God, being by means of a single word thus brought forth as the God of our salvation" (Ebrar, and For. Evang. Rev., 1869, p. 18). With all these direct testimonies standing as in the vine in the vineyard, referring to the acts of the part of some Rationalistic theologians to assert that Ireneus was not strictly Trinitarian in his views on this subject. But more than this: it was this self-same Ireneus who opposed the Philonic doctrine of the λόγος, which other Church fathers, especially of the Alexandrian school, the Word and the Son, and to accept, as Theophilies of Antiochus, and even Tertullian (comp. Ebrar, Kirchen- u. Dogmengesch., i, 116).

5. Redemption.—Of all the Church fathers, Ireneus was the first who gave a careful analysis of the work of redemption, "and his view," says Dr. Schaff (Ch. Hist, i, 297), "is the only coherent one in all the ancient fathers for the first three centuries. Christ, he teaches, as the second Adam, repeated in himself the entire life of man, from birth to death and hades, from childhood to manhood, and, as it were, summed up that which the life and brought it under one head (this is the sense of his frequent expression, 'Ἀνακαταστάσεως, διαφοράματος, recapitulatio'), with the double purpose of restoring humanity from its fall and carrying it to perfection. Redemption comprises the taking away of sin by the perfect obedience of Christ, the destruction of death by his victory over the devil, and the communication of eternal life to man. To accomplish this work, the Redeemer must unite in himself the divine and human natures; for only as God could he do what man could not, and only as man could he do, in a legitimate way, what man should. By the voluntary obedience of Adam, the prince of the pious, he gained a viceroy, and the divine right to rule over all. By his voluntary obedience of Christ that power was wrested from him by lawful means (by suavela, persuasion, announcement of truth, not overreaching or deception). This took place first in the temptation, in which Christ renewed or recapitulated, as it were, the妥府, and after our imitations and the sinner, and thereby liberated man from his thralldom. But then the whole life of Christ was a co-tinted victorious conflict with Satan, and a constant obedience to God. This obedience was completed in the suffering and death on the tree of the cross, and thus blotted out the disobedience which the first Adam had committed on the tree of knowledge. It is, however, only in the resurrection, this is the consummation of a new divine principle of life, and the perfecting of the idea of humanity first effected by Christ. See Redemption; Origin.

6. The Sacraments.—On this subject, perhaps more than upon any other on which Ireneus has written, we meet with the most complete process of logical development. The order of its development enables us definitely to determine what he actually believed. But even "Romanists tacitly admit that he says nothing of confirmation, ordination, marriage, or extreme unction favorable to the sacramental character which they assign to these rites. And this is a very strong negative testimony against the correctness of their opinions. If such an early writer as Ireneus, in the course of a lengthened theological work, which naturally led him to the ordinances as well as doctrines of the Church, had not a word to say in regard to the above so-called sacraments, the inferiors pray before them, and they were not recognized as such in his days. . . . Masaeus makes a very lame attempt to prove from the writings of Ireneus that the sacrament of penance was practised in the Church of his day. There can be no doubt that the passages to which he refers (i., 6; 3; 15; 5) prove that penance was recognized in the schools in the last part of the Church of the 2d century. This was called exomologesia, and seems to have been indispensable for the removal of the censures of the Church. But there is nothing to indicate its sacramental character, and not a shadow of support can be derived from it for the popish practice of particular confession." (Bp. For. Exeg. Rev., Jan., 1869, p. 18). See Confession.

Of Infant Baptism the first clear trace is found in the writings of our author, who thus writes of the sacrament of baptism (ii., 22, 4): "Christ came to save all who are regenerated by him, infants and little children, and boys, and women; and the scribe applies it to all ages, Christ having passed through all the stages of life for this purpose. Neander says of this passage (Hist. Christian Dogm., i. 230): "If by the phrase ""baptism in Deum"" (in the Latin tranl.) baptism is intended, it contains a proof of infant baptism. But when the words ""purus"" are distinguished; the latter possess a developed consciousness, hence to them Christ is a pattern of piety, while to the infants he merely gives an objective sanctification; we must therefore understand the latter to mean quite little children." But the statement of the disciples' confession that he believed the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, which is strengthened by another passage (iii., 17, 1): "And again, giving to the disciples the power of regeneration unto God, he said to them, 'Go and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.'" (Compare an article on this subject in the American Presbyterian Review, April, 1867, p. 239 sq.; Schaff, Church History, i, 402.)

On the Lord's Supper, also, the indefinite statements of Ireneus have given rise to much dispute. Romanists stoutly affirm that he declares in favor of their doctrine of eucharistic transubstantiation; and the whole party hardly that this arises from a variable reading of one passage, of which Neander says (p. 238), "According to one reading it is said, Verbum quod auter Deo, which must mean the Logos which is presented to God; therefore, the sacrifice would refer to the presentation of Christ himself. Yet we can hardly make up our minds to accept this as the opinion of Ireneus, who always says that Christians must consecrate all to God in Christ's name; for example, Ecclesia offer per Jesum Christum. We cannot doubt that the other reading is the correct one, namely, que auter Deo. Also declines to give the Romans a hearing on this point, and argues further, that Ireneus "in another place (iv., 18 and passio) calls the bread and wine, after consecration, "antitypes," implying the continued distinction of their substance from the body and blood of Christ. This expression in itself, indeed, might be understood as merely contrasting here the Supper, as the substance, with the Body and Blood of Christ. The Old Testament calls the Samaritan showing the type of the saving water of the flood (1 Pet., iii, 20, 21). But the connection, and the usus loquendi of the earlier Greek fathers, require us to take the term antitype in the sense of type, or, more precisely, as the antitype of archetype. The bread and wine are thus represented as the body and blood of Christ, as the archetype, and correspond to them as a copy to the original. In exactly the same sense it is said in Heb. i., 24 (comp. viii, 5), that the earthly sanctuary is the antitype, that is, the copy of the heavenly." (i., 387.) We think Ireneus speaks more definitely of this ordi- nance in one of the Fragments (xxxviii, Massaeus), from which it clearly follows that he by no means believed in the opus operatum of the Romanists. (Comp. Bp. and For. Exeg. Rev., Jan., 1869, p. 19, 20.)

7. The Church.—By the peculiar attitude in which he places himself in the church, he may be supposed to have heresies, he became unconsciously one of the most elabor- ate writers on the early Church that now remains to us, and the utterances of no other of the early Church fathers have so frequently been misinterpreted to prop up the claims of Romanism as those of Ireneus. It is certain that he went beyond questions of the liturgy in the dispute with the Church prelatists, however hesitatingly, misconstrued the statements of Ireneus in defence of the Church of Christ against Valentinus, Basilides, Marcion, and other schismatics, who in his time threatened the very life of the early Christian Church, as statements favoring the doctrine of apostolic succession (q.v.). In his constant pressure in defence of his Church, and as an opponent of the heretics, presents a "historical" chain of bishops. Says he (iii., 3, 1), "We are in a position to reckon up those who were by the apostles instituted bishops in the churches, and the successors of these bishops to our own times." But, in naming the bishops in their historical order, he "never dreams of ascribing to them any sort of spiritual influence or authority which was propagated from one to another. To show that he could link historically Eleutherius, who was then head of the Church at Rome, with himself who was supposed to have founded that Church, was the sole and simple object contemplated by our author in reference to the succes- sion." In his arguments with the Valentinians, Marcionites, and others, he endeavors to prove, by constant appeals to the Scriptures, that their doctrines were not harmonious with the inspired doctrine of baptismal regeneration; but, he says, "ubi ecclesia," putting the Church first, in the genuine catholic spirit (iii., 24)—"ibi et Spiritus Dei; et ubi Spiritus Dei, ille ecclesia et omnis gratia," or, as Dr. Schaff says, Protestantism would put it conversely: "Where the spirit of the Church is, there is the spirit of God and all grace." (Comp. Bp. and For. Exeg. Rev., Jan., 1869, pp. 20, 21.)

8. The Millennium.—The peculiar millennial views of Ireneus, which stamp him, by his close adherence to Papais, as a Chilist, we hardly care to touch; they are certainly not a part in our author's thought, and cannot be passed not only without comment, but even unnoticed. They are brought out specially near the end of his great work (v., 32-36), declaring a future reign of the saints on earth; arguing that such promises of Scripture as those in Gen. xiii, 14; Matt. xxvi, 27-29, etc., can have no other interpretation. (Comp. Bp. and For. Exeg. Rev., Jan., 1869, pp. 20, 21.)

9. The Easter Controversy.—The personal character of Ireneus, of which we have as yet said but little, is perhaps best illustrated by his conduct in the Easter controversy (q.v.). Determined to work for a union of all Christians (iv, 38, 7), he displayed an irenic disposition in all disputes about unessential outward things, and more especially in his mediation between Victor, the Bishop of Rome, and the Arian bishops. He gathered around him a band of likeminded people which, by the end of the 2nd century, became a church. The church was the first church, and consequently called by Eusebius "a disciple of the apostles," and by Jerome "the disciple of John the apostle," he bears us such direct testimony in behalf of the Gospels, or, as Eusebius terms them, the "Homologoumena," that it becomes to us of the very highest importance among the external proofs of their genuineness, more especially at the present moment, in face of the denials of this truth by Rationalists, and by those who, with other men, are known by our countrymen as the "Comte of the Gospels" by C. H. H. (Short Essays on Great Subjects). Now what does Ireneus say of the Gospels? "We have not received," he says, "the knowledge of the things which we teach out of any other source than those by whom the Gospel has been brought to us; which Gospel they first preached, and afterwards by the will of God committed to writing, that it might be for time to come the foundation and pillar of the faith." Here follows a declaration that the first Gospel was written by the Jews by Matthew, the second by Mark, a companion of Peter; the third by Luke, a companion of Paul; and the fourth by John, of whom he says, "Afterwards John, the disciple of the Lord, who also leaned upon his breast, he likewise published a Gospel while he dwelt in Ephesus, in Asia in the second century. Let us assume now, that between the time that John passed to the other world and the apostles there is only one intervening link—an honest, man and an intelligent man; in short, that he is a competent witness. At the time when he knew Polycarp, were the four Gospels extant and acknowledged authorities in the churches? We will here raise the question to the Gospel of John (q.v.), which is now so much a topic of controversy. Was or was not this gospel received as the production of him whose name it bears by Polycarp and his contemporaries at the time to which Ireneus, in his graphic reminiscences, refers? If it was then extant, we may assume that John, the apostle of Ephesus, in the very region where John had lived to so advanced an age, and where his followers and acquaintances survived—will be very difficult to disprove its genuineness. But if it was not thus received, when we ask, can it be supposed to have first seen the light? Who contrived a book which Polycarp had known nothing, and palpably it off on him and on the whole circle of Johannine express and churches in Asia? How is it that Ireneus knows nothing of the late discovery or promulgation of so valuable a book? Why does he not mention the momentous fact—Is it not possible that at his interviews with Polycarp there was found somewhere, or put forth by somebody, this priceless treasure? It is obvious that Ireneus would have had something to say of the extraordinary concord and final appearance of this Gospel history had he remembered it, or known of a time after John's death when this Gospel had not been a familiar and prized possession of the church. This testimony of Ireneus is a tough piece of evidence. Here we have specific declarations as to what he had himself seen and heard. Yet the attempt is made to disparage the value of this testimony on the ground that it was the expression of the author of a book, which stands in connection with his statements about the composition of the several gospels: 'Nor can there be more or fewer gospels than these. For as there are four regions of the world in which we live, and four branches of the human race, and the spirit of life, in like manner was it fit it should have the four branches of the human race, and the spirit of life, in like manner was it fit it should have been breathed on all mankind. Whence it is manifest that the Gospel, the former of all things, which is upon the cherubim and upholds all things, having appeared to men, has given us a Gospel of a fourfold character, but joined in one spirit.' (Here follows a brief characterisation of the four gospels as of the fourfold gospel, but of another.) That this is a fanciful (if one will, a puerile) observation there is no reason to deny; but how it can in the least invalidate the credibility of the author's testimony on a matter of fact within his cognizance, it is impossible to see. If these analogies had exerted any influence in determining Ireneus's acceptance of the four gospels of the canon, the case would be different. But Froude admits that such was not the fact. He accepts the Gospels on account of the historical proof of their genuineness, as he repeatedly affirms, and independent of the general widespread acceptance of them in the Church. It is even a hasty inference from such a passage that the author was intellectually weak. If this inference is to be drawn from such an observation, the abler of the fathers, as Augustine, must be equally condemned. Men who are not deficient in ability must be sometimes other foolish things. . . . On the whole, Ireneus is distinguished for the soundness and clearness of his understanding. (See Schaaff in the first part of our article.) He is rather averse to speculation, being of a prudential turn. There is hardly one of the early ecclesiastical writers who, in all the qualities that made up a trustworthy witness, is to be set before him. There is no reason to doubt that, in his statements concerning the origin and authority of the Gospels, he represents the Christians of his time. It is not the sentiment of an individual merely, but the state of things in general. . . . But why does Ireneus, in his reminiscences, say that Polycarp, a personal acquaintance of John the Apostle, an honored bishop in the neighborhood where John had labored and died, considered the fourth gospel to be the composition of Polycarp? (Dr. G. P. Fisher, of Yale College, in the Independent, Feb. 4, 1869, p. 249.)" hypotheses; but, interpreted according to their natural meaning, they tell of a Church united by its head with the times of St. John, to which the books of the N. T. furnished the unaffected language of hope, and resignation, and triumph. And the testimony of Ireneus is the more, not the less, receptible, that he was a man of great influence. But the authenticity of the Gospels does Ireneus bear his testimony. He also furnishes conclusive evidence in support of other N.-T. books which have been questioned (see Brit. and For. Ec. Rev. 1869, p. 7 sq.).

11. Canon of Scripture.—Not a little surprising, but agreeable to the Christian of the present day to find that in the days of Ireneus, even when the canon of Scripture could not be expected to have been so accurately defined as it afterwards was, we find, with the exception of the spurious additions to Daniel, found in the Septuagint, and the books of Baruch, quoted under the name of Jeremiah, no writings of the O. T. acknowledged as forming part of the O.-T. canon, which Protestants do not include in it at the present day. So likewise of the N. T., the only book not now accepted, but to which Ireneus credited canonical authority, is the "Shepherd of Hermas." Altogether, "with the most important exceptions, the canon of both the O. and N. T., then accepted by the Church, was coincident and contemporaneous with our own." But more than this, by the language which Ireneus uses, we find the Church of his day harmonizing with and justifying the Sacred Writings. It is evident that the latter have claims that he and his contemporaries were in support of the inspired authority and infallible accuracy of the canonical writings. The utterance which Ireneus has made on this subject Romanists have sought to turn to account in their assertions of the authority of tradition as co-ordinate with that of Scripture. But though, as was natural in such an early writer, Ireneus often refers to the apostolic traditions preserved in the churches, he never ascribes to these an authority independent of Scripture.

IRENEUS, St., a Tuscan martyr, flourished in the second half of the 8th century. But very little is known of the history of his life. He suffered martyrdom during the persecutions under the emperor Aurelius (275), and is commemorated in the Roman Church July 5.—Thibaud, Mémoires Ecclés., vol. iv; Hoef er, Nouv. Biog. Générales, xxxv, 498.

IRENEUS, St., another martyr, was bishop of Si-mium (now Sirmiah, a Hungarian village), his native country, at the beginning of the 4th century. Many inducements were offered him by the then head of the country, Probus, who, no doubt, acted under instructions from the emperors Diocletian and Maximus, to renounce Christianity, but, all provoking futile, he was at last beheaded, after having been subjected to various tortures. Though but little is known of this Ireneus's personal history, it is evident, from the efforts of the governor to secure his adhesion to the heathen practices, that he was a man of great influence. The date of his death is not accurately known. Some think it to be March 25, the day on which his death is commemorated by Romanists; others put it April 6. A.D. 304. See Hoef er, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxv, 498; Ceillier, Hist. des anci. sacr. iii, 27; Butler, Lives of the Saints, i, 661 sq.; Real-Encyclopädie, f. d. Kulti Kelt. Deutschl., v, 715 sq.

IRENEUS, bishop of Tyras, flourished in the first half of the 5th century. He was originally a count of the empire, and first took part in ecclesiastical affairs at the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, where he represented the emperor Theodosius as assistant to Candidius, to settle the controversy between Cyril and Nestorius, and their respective followers. Both he and Candidius favored Nestorius, and, failing to prevent his condemnation at the council, did their utmost, on their return to court, to counteract on the emperor's mind the influence and denunciation of the Cyrillicans against Nestorius. For they were sure, as their representations were, that on their very face the impress of truth." But the Cyrillican party predominating, and John, the secretary of Cyril, appearing himself at court to counteract the efforts of Ireneus and Candidius, the feeble sovereign was soon turned in favor of the Cyrillican party. Ireneus himself was banished from the court about A.D. 435. He at once betook himself to his friends, the Oriental bishops, and by them was raised to the bishopric of Tyre in 444. The emperor now issued an edict condemning the Nestorians, and, in addition, it was ordered that Ireneus should not be deposed from the bishopric; and deprived of his clerical character. In 448 the sentence was finally executed. After his retirement Ireneus wrote a history of the Nestorian struggle, under the title of Tragedia seu Commentarius de rebus in Synodo Ephesina ac in Oricrate geatia. The original, which was written in Greek, is lost, and only parts of it remain to us. This last-writ, irenaeus, a pseudonym for the celebrated Church historian John of St. Bartholomew (see v. KARL LUDWIG GIESLER, q. v.).

IRENEUS, Christoph, one of the most zealous defendants of the doctrine of the Flacians, was born at Schweidnitz, near the middle of the 16th century. First a deacon at Aschersleben, he was afterwards called to Eiseln as regular pastor, and finally appointed court preacher at Weimar. Accused of favoring the views of Flacian, a consistent though much persecuted follower of Luther, he was, with other prominent preachers guilty of the same failing, dismissed from his position in 1572. He now removed to Austria, where he published in 1581 a pamphlet against the first article of the Concordien-

ebach von der Erhebende. The date of his death is not known to us. See Aschbach, Kirchen-Lez. ii, 781. See Flacius.

IRENÉUS, Pálkóvázi, a learned Russian priest, was born May 28, 1762. He acquired a good knowledge of Hebrew, Latin, Frech and German, and was sent to Hungary to study philosophy, history, and mathematics. He was married, but his great merits caused him to be appointed bishop, although, according to the general rules of the Greek Church, marriage is a bar to a candidate for the episcopal office. He died Apr. 28, 1823 Old Style. See Chronologie d'histoire ecclésia-

Irenæus, Kilentzvitovski, a very able Russian theologian and historian, was born at Vinnitsa in 1783. Of his early history but little is known to us. He enjoyed the reputation of a great savant, and held the bishopric of Tver, and, later, the archbishopric of Pskov, and died at St. Petersburg April 24, 1816. Of course he belonged to the monastic order of the Russian Greek Church, and all the people seemed devoted to this venerable Nestorian. The religious offices of Russia are accessible only to monastic orders (compare Eckhardt, Modern Russia). Archbishop Irenæus wrote Commentaries on the Twelve Minor Prophets:—St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans and to the Hebrews:—and also published some of his sermons, delivered before the royal household at St. Petersburg (1794). He likewise translated into Russian the writings of several of the Church fathers, and cardinal Bellarmine's Commentary on the Psalms (Moscow, 1807, 2 vols. 4to); and two other works on ascetism by Bellarmine. See Hestermann, Encyclop., xxx, 325.

Irené (Eipipry, Peace), empress of Constantinople, and one of the most extraordinary, though corrupt characters of the Byzantine empire, was born in Athens about A.D. 725. An orphan, 17 years of age, without any fortune except her beauty and talents, she excited the admiration of the emperor when reigning in his stead, Leo IV, and in A.D. 769 became his lawful wife. Her love for power, it is said, caused her to commit the crime of murder, for her husband, who died in 780, is generally believed to have been poisoned by her. During his reign she had acquired not only the love, but also the confidence of the emperor, and in his testament she declared he "empress guardian of the Roman world, and of their son Constantine VI," who was, at the decease of Leo IV, only ten years of age. Educated in the worship of images, she was herself an ardent opponent of the iconoclasts, who held sway during the reign of her husband, and who, even at one time, had caused her banishment from his court on account of her secret worship of images, and her conspiracies with image-worshippers against iconoclasts. "But, as soon as she reigned in her own name and that of her son, Irene most seriously undertook the War. (See the iconoclasts, xxx, 224.) The first step of her future persecution was a general edict for liberty of conscience. In the restoration of the monks, a thousand images were exposed to public veneration; a thousand legends were invented of their sufferings and miracles. As opportunities occurred by death or removal, they were replaced by images. The judicially formed saves from the highest to the lowest, the competitors for earthly or celestial favor anticipated and flattered the judgment of their sovereign; and the promotion of her secretary, Tarsius, gave Irene the patriarch of Constantinople, and the command of the Oriental Church." But the decrees of a general council could only be repeated effectually by a similar assembly, and to this end she convened a council of bishops at Constantinople, A.D. 786. By this time, however, the people and the army had learned to abhor the worship of images in place of the true God, and the council was opened; a synod was convoked by the emperor, and even driven from the capital. This by no means intimidated Irene in her marked course. She had determined on the reindroduction of image-worship and the extirpation of all iconoclasts, and well did her zeal for the restoration of this gross superstition deserve to be rewarded by the Church. (See the iconoclasts, which she still occupies in the Greek calendar). A second council was convened only a year after the first had been broken up, but this time at Nice. "No more than 18 days were allowed for the consummation of this important work; the iconoclasts appeared not as judges, but as criminals or heretics. The Synod was decorated with the legeresse of the pope Adrian and the Eastern patriarchs, the decrees were framed by the president Tarsarius, and ratified by the acclamations and subscriptions of 850 bishops. They unanimously pronounced that the worship of images is agreeable to Scripture and reason, to the fathers and councils of the Church; but they hesitate whether that worship be relative or direct; whether the godhead and the figure of Christ is to be venerated separately or in one person. Of this second Nicene Council the acts are still extant; a curious monument of superstition and ignorance, of falsehood and folly" (Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, v, 27 sqq.). Meanwhile, however, the young emperor was attaining the maturity of manhood; he was more and more the favorite of his own age, who shared his pleasures, and were ambitious of sharing his power. But Irene was by no means ready to concede to her son the power which she preferred to hold in her own hand, and, ever vigilant, she soon penetrated the designs of her son. As a consequence, there arose at court two factions. The young and the vigorous gathered around the heir presumptive, and in 789 he actually succeeded in assuming himself the government of affairs. As Constantine VI he became the lawful emperor of the Romans, and was dismissed to a Bishopric to retire and resume his duties. "But her haughty spirit condescended to the arts of dissimulation: she flattered the bishops and eunuchs, revived the filial tenderness of the prince, regained his confidence, and betrayed his credulity. The character of Constantine was not destitute of sense or spirit; he knew how to avoid those excesses which Leo IV committed, and the ambitious mother now exposed to the public censure the vices which she herself had nourished, and the actions which she herself had secretly advised." Meanwhile a powerful conspiracy was also conceived against Constantine, and only reached his ears when he knew it to be impossible for him to resist. In the end, he fled the capital. But his own guards even had been bought in the interests of Irene, and the emperor was seized by them on the Asiatic shore, and transported back to Constantinople to the porphyry apartment of the palace where he had first seen the light. "In the mind of Irene ambition had stifled every sentiment of humanity and nature; and it was decreed, in a bloody council which she had assembled, that Constantine must by some means be forever rendered incapable of assuming the government, and Irene while seated in his old and infirmities entered the room of the prince and stabbed their daggers with violence and precipitation into his eyes, depriving him not only of his eyesight, but rendering his life even critical. As if this crime were in itself not sufficiently great, the youth was even deprived of his throne. He was deposed from his father's place, and the state was placed in the hands of a four-year-old boy. A coup d'état stroke, and confined in a dungeon, where he was left to pine away. Thus the unnatural mother, guilty of a crime unparalleled in the history of crimes, secured for herself the reins of government. But still Irene was not free from anxieties. Though the punishment which her crime deserved did not immediately follow the likely deed, it yet came surely. Her two favorites, Stauracius and Eutius, whom she had raised, enriched, and intrusted with the first dignities of the empire, were constantly embroiled with each other, and their jealousies only increased when they went to the former, A.D. 800. In order to secure her possession of the throne, she sought a marriage with Charlemagne, but the Frank emperor had evidently no reliet for a woman who had committed so many crimes, and the scheme proved abortive. Two years later, her treasurer, Nicephorus, rebel'd against her, and the sudden death of the young Constantine, driven to the isle of Lesbos, where she was forced to spin for a livelihood. Here she died of grief, A.D. 808. See ICONOCLASM. (J. H. W.)

Irenological Theology is a term (from εἰρήνη, puro, peace) used to designate the art or science of conciliating any and all differences by the art of conciliation, from one-sided theories or misapprehensions. Making peace implies a previous warfare, hence irenological theology.
IRENICAL THEOLOGY

is closely allied to polemics (q. v.), which, in its true character, should be but a struggle for peace. For the σύνεσις της εὐσέβειας, or "bond of peace" (Eph. iv, 8), embraces all Christians, and the λατρείας ινά γαρηνπ, or "speaking the truth in love" (Eph. iv, 15), contains two commandments with a profounder meaning. Hence we find in the Christian Church, from her earliest days up to our own times, attempts to secure peace and unity by conciliating all differences and by reuniting those who had separated from each other. Such was particularly the case when schism occurred first between the Latin and the Greek churches, then between the Roman and the Protestant, and, again, between the Lutheran and the Reformed. Irenical attempts accompanied each of these separations, as is evinced by the large number of works known as Irenicum, Unio, Concordia, etc. But the labor of such men as Irenaeus (as Irenicum, Unio, Concordia, etc. It was against one of these peace-makers, David Pareus († 1615) that Leonard Hutter wrote his Irenicum eire Christianium (34. Oct, 1619), in which, however, he admits that the attainment of ultimate unity and peace is problematical. Among the most active in the cause of union we find, in the Reformed Church, Hugo Grotius († 1645), and, in the Lutheran, George Calixtus († 1656). The Jesuits, however, managed to interfere in all these attempts, to diffuse their short-sighted and well-chosen and impossibly bases of union. On the other hand, unintended propositions on both sides, dictated either by fear or worldly motives, threw discredit on the cause itself. It was now decreed as Babylonianism, Semism, nationalism, syncretism, etc. Still there continued a good deal of what is called Leopold Schmidt's Geist des Katholizismus oder Grundlage der christlichen Irenik (1848). On the contrary, such works as Dr. F. A. Staudenmaier's († 1866) Zum religiösen Frieden d. Zukunft (1864, 2 vols. 8vo) disprove Protestantism to such an extent, and are written in so literal a tone, that, if such were more abundant, they would kindle again the fiercest strife. Yet the scientific basis of religious and denominational peace has made much progress since Schleiermacher gave a scientific development to polemics and apologists. This is especially evident in J. Peter Laub's Griechische Dogmatik, in which the third part of which (Heidelberg, 1852) contains a clever sketch of practical dogmatics, of polemics and irenic theology. According to him, it is the province of irenic theology to bring out of the different religious opinions those which coincide with the Christian and from all others do, if not destroy, at least bring them into the life and consciousness of the Church, or to submit them to the Christian dogmas (§ 5). It has therefore to search out the hidden efforts of truth in all religious manifestations. All distortions of truth are the avowals of the existence of a false dogma in the history of church. Irenical theology is again divided into elementaria, i.e. an exposition of the struggles of truth and of the means of assisting it; and concrete, i.e. an exposition of the organic liberation and development of truth in humanity until the completion of the Church. Sin, however, will always remain an obstacle to absolute peace till it is finally abolished in the reign of God. For this we must prepare ourselves by adhering to Meldeniu’s maxim: In necessariis unitas, in non necessariis libertas, in utrique caritas. See Dr. F. J. Lücke, Ueber d. Alter dieses kirchlichen Friedensspruches (Göttingen, 1850).—Herzog, Real-Enzyklopädie, vi, 60; Ersch u. Gruber’s Enzyklopädie, 29, 161.

Ir-ha-heres, in the A. Vers. “The CITY OF DESTRUCTION” (ירָהֵרִיס), Ir-ha-heres; v. r. Ir-ha-che-rees, ירָהָּא-כְּרֵסֵי; Sept. ’אֳחָיוֹס, Vulg. Civitas Solis, the name or appellation of a city in Egypt, mentioned only in Isa. xix, 18. The reading ירָהֵרִיס, Heres, is that of most MSS, the Syr., Ar., and Théod.; the other reading, ירָהָּא-כְּרֵסֵי, Cherae, is supported by the Sept., but only in form, by Symm., who has χρήαν καίλου, and the Vulg. Gesenius (Theaur., p. 591; a; 592) prefers the latter reading. There are various explanations; we shall first take those that treat it as a proper name, then those that suppose it to be an appellation used by the prophet to denote the future of the city.

1. “The city of the Sun,” a translation of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, generally called in the Bible On, the Hebrew form of its civil name As [see Ox], and once Beth-shemesh, “the house of the sun” (Judg. i, 35), is more literal, more literal translation than this supposed one of the sacred name. See Beth-shemesh. This explanation, however, is highly improbable, for we find elsewhere both the sacred and the civil names of Heliopolis, so that a third name, merely a variety of the Hebrew rendering of the sacred name, is very unlikely. The name Beth-shemesh is, moreover, a more literal translation in its first word of the Egyptian name than this supposed one. It may be remarked, however, as to the last part of the word, that one of the towns in Palestine called Beth-shemesh, a town of the Levites on the borders of Judah and Dan, was not far from a Mount Heres, ירָהֵרָּא (Judg. i, 35), so that the two names, as applied to the sun as an object of worship, might probably be interchangeable. See Heres.

2. “The city Heres,” a transcription in the last part of the word of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, ירָהֵרִיס, “the abode (liter. “house”) of the sun.” This explanation, however, would necessitate the omission of the article.

3. Jerome supposes עזר to be equivalent to עזר, “a potsherd,” and to be a name of the town called by the Greeks Ostracina, Ostropaeus (“earthen”). Akin with this is the view of others (see Alexander ad loc.), who suppose that reference is made to Taiphones, the brick-kilns of which are mentioned by Jeremiah (xlix, 9).

4. “A city preserved,” meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be preserved. Gesenius, who proposes this construction, if the last half of the word be not part of the name of the place, compares the Arabic charas, “he guarded, kept, preserved;” etc. It may be remarked that the word Heres, or ancient Egyptian, probably signifies “a guardian.” This rendering of Gesenius is, however, merely conjectural, and has hardly been adopted by any other leading interpreter.

5. The ordinary rendering, “a city destroyed,” lit. “a city of destruction;” in the A. V. “the city of destruction,” meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be destroyed, according to Isaiah’s idiom. Some maintain that the prophet refers to five great and noted cities of Egypt when he says, “In that day shall five cities in the midst of Egypt speak the language of Canaan,” but they cannot agree as to what these cities are. Others suppose that by five a round number is meant; while others think that some proportion number is referred to—five out of 20,000, or five out of 1000. Calvin interprets the passage as meaning five out of six—fire professing the true religion, and one rejecting it; and that one is hence called “City of destruction,” which is not proper to any of the deserts of Egypt. Egypt and Ethiopia were then either under a joint rule or under an Ethiopian sovereign. We can, therefore, understand the connection of the three subjects comprised in this and the adjoining chapters. Chap. xviii is a prophecy against the Ethiopians, xix is the Burden of Egypt, xxi is the prophecy delivered in the year of the capture of Ashdod by Tartan, the general of Sargon, predicts the leading captive of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, probably the garrison of that strong stronghold, as a warning to the Israelites who trusted in them for aid. Chap. xviii ends with an indication of the time to which it refers, speaking of the Ethiopians as we understand the passage—as sending “a present” “to the place of the name of the Lord of hosts, the Mount Zion” (ver. 7). If this be taken in a proper and not a tropical sense, it would refer to the conversion of Ethiopians by the preaching of the gospel, while the Temple was yet stood. The *such had been the case before the Gospel was preached is evident from the instance of the eunuch of queen Candace, whom Philip met on his return homeward from worshipping at Jerusalem, and converted to Christianity (Acts viii, 26-39). The Burden of Egypt seems to point to the invasion of the Persian and Greek hosts, described in the account of the capture of it, and 15, and the river, and canals, of the destruction of the water-plants, and of the misery of the fishers and workers in linen. The princes and counsellors are to lose their wisdom and the people to be filled with fear, all which calamities seem to have begun in the desolations of the land. It is not easy to say what follows as to the dread of the land of Judah which the Egyptians should feel, immediately preceding the mention of the subject of the article: “In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of hosts; one shall be called Ir-ha-heres. In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt; for they shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressor, and he shall save them, and the East shall look upon them and shall be ashamed, and a great one, and he shall deliver them” (xix, 18-20). The partial or entire conversion of Egypt is prophesied in the next two verses (21, 22). The time of the Greek dominion, following the Persian rule, may here be pointed to. There was then a great influx of Jewish settlers, and as we know of a Jewish town, Onias, and a great Jewish population at Alexandria, we may suppose that there were other large settlements. These would “speak the language of Canaan,” at first literally, afterwards in their retaining the religion and customs of their fathers. The altar which well corresponded to the temple built by Onias; the pillar, to the synagogue of Alexandria, the latter on the northern and western borders of Egypt. In this case Alexander would be the deliverer. We do not know, however, that at this period there was any recognition of the true God on the part of the Egyptians. If it was understood in a proper sense, we can, however, see no other time to which it applies, and must suppose that Ir-ha-heres was one of the cities partly or wholly inhabited by the Jews in Egypt: of these, Onias was the most important, and to it the rendering, “One shall be called a city of destruction;” if it was understood in a proper sense, we can, however, see no other time to which it applies, and must suppose that Ir-ha-heres was one of the cities partly or wholly inhabited by the Jews in Egypt: of these, Onias was the most important, and to it the rendering, “One shall be called a city of destruction;” if it was destroyed by Titus, while Alexandria, and perhaps the other cities, yet stand. If the prophecy is to be taken tropically, the best reading and rendering are matters of verbal criticism. See Isaiah.
IR-HAM-MELACH 657  IRON

IR-ham-Melach (ʾîr-hîm-mēlāḵ), city of the salt, so called probably from the salt rocks still found in that vicinity; Sept. ἱππα καὶ πῶς ὄλαυν, Vulg. cirtatis saltas, Auth. Vera, "City of Salt", a city in the Desert of Judah, mentioned between Nibshan and En-gedi (Josh. xvii, 62); probably situated near the south-western part of the Dead Sea. Compare the "Valley of Salt" (2 Sam. viii, 18; Ps. lx, 2).

Ir-hat-Temarin (ʾîr-hāt-tēmārīn), city of the palms, so called from a palm grove in its neighborhood; Sept. πῶς φοινικέων, or πῶς τῶν φοινικέων, Vulg. cirtatis palmatis, Auth. Vera, "city of palm-trees", a place not identical with Juscutio (Deut. xxxiv, 3; Judg. i, 16; ii, 13; 2 Chron. xxviii, 10), which now, however, is utterly destitute of palm-trees.

Yri (Heb. ʾîrī, יִירִי; čizem; Sept. Οἰκί, Vulg. Urut), the last-named of the five sons of Bela, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 7). B.C. between 1856 and 1666. See 18.

It also appears in the A. Vers. of the Apocalypse (1 Esdr. viii, 62) as the name (Οἰκίν οὗ τοῦ Οἴκου, Vulg. Jorua) of the father of the priest Marmoth; evidently the Uriah (q.v.) of Ezra viii, 33.

Irjah (Heb. ʾîrjāḥ, יִירִגָח, seen by Jehovah; Sept. Ἰουραία, Vulg. Jeria), son of Shelemiah, and a captain of the ward at the gate of Benjamin, who arrested the prophet Jeremiah on the pretense that he was desertsing to the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxvii, 13, 14). B.C. 616.

Irith Church. See IRELAND.

Irmena, a statue of unknown form and significance, which was erected at Eresbege, in Hessen and Westphalia, and worshipped by the ancient Saxons. In 772, Charlemagne, having conquered the country and brought the people under subjection, destroyed it, to intimidate the idolatrous worship. It is said that he found in the inside a great amount of gold and silver. In the cathedral of Hildesheim they show a column of green marble which is claimed to be the column of Irmena. See Grimm, Irmenstrasse u. Irmenstule (Vienen, 1815); Von der Hagen, Irmin, seine Säule u. seine Wege (Bresl. 1817).—Pieper, Univ. Lex. ix, 66. (J. N. F.)

IrnaHASH [many Irnahas] (Heb. Ir-nah-hash), "the sea"; accompanied with the word ʾěsawn, ʾěsawn, ʾěsawn, Vulg. urbe Naxis, Auth. Vers. marg. "city of Nahas", a place (re-founded) by Tehinnah, the son of Esthbon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 12). Schwarz (Palast. p. 116) thinks it the present Dir-Nakhas, one mile east of Beth-Jibrin; prob. the same marked (perh. inaccurately) Dar-Hakkas on Zimmermann's map, a short distance north-east of Beth-Jibrin. Van de Velde likewise identifies it with "Dir-Nakhas, a village with ancient remains east of Beth-Jibrin" (Memoir, p. 322). See NAHAS.

Iron (ʾîrōn, barez; Chal. ʾîrōn, parzel; Gr. σιδήρος, Lat. ferrum). There is not much room to doubt the identity of the metal denoted by the above terms. They, like so many others, are the first-mentioned smith, "a father of every instrument of iron" (Gen. iv, 22). As this metal is rarely found in its native state, but generally in combination with oxygen, the knowledge of the art of forging it, which is attributed to Tubal-Cain, argues an acquisiteness of the difficulties that attend the smelting of this metal. Iron melts at a temperature of about 3000° Fahrenheit, and to produce this heat large furnaces supplied by a strong blast of air are necessary. But, however difficult it may be to imagine a knowledge of such appliances at so early a period, it is perfectly certain that the use of iron is of extreme antiquity, and that therefore some means of overcoming the obstacles in question must have been discovered. What the process may have been is left entirely to conjecture; a method is employed by the natives of India, extremely simple and of great antiquity, which, though rude, is very effective, and suggests the possibility of similar knowledge in an early stage of civilization (U. Dict. of Sci. and Arts, s. v. Steel). The smelting furnaces of Ethiopia, described by Diodorus (v, 13), remains of which still exist in that country, correspond roughly with the modern bloomeries (Napier, Metallurgy of the Bible p. 140). Malleable iron was in common use, but it is doubtful whether the ancients were acquainted with cast-iron. See METAL.

The mineral wealth of Canaan is indicated by describing it as "a land whose stones are iron" (Deut. vii, 9), a passage from which it would seem that in ancient times it was a plentiful production of that vicinity (compare Job xxvii, 22), and there it is still in Syria and in the region of Lebanon (Volney's Travels i, 238). There appear to have been furnaces for smelting at an early period in Egypt (Deut. iv, 20; comp. Hengstenberg, Mos. u. Aeg. b. 19). Winer, indeed (Reale, s. v. Eisen), understands that the basalt which predominates in the Haaran (Burchardt, ii, 627) was an iron ore of which Oga'sstead (Deut. iii, 11) was made, as it contains a large percentage of iron. But this is doubtful. Pliny (xxxvi, 11), who is quoted as an authority, says, indeed, that basalt is "ferrei coloris atque duritiae," but does not hint that it was extracted from it. The best work of Bob contains passages which indicate that iron was a metal well known. Of the manner of procuring it, we learn that "iron is taken from dust" (xxxvii, 2). Iron was prepared in abundance by David for the building of the Temple (1 Chron. xxii, 5), to the amount of one hundred thousand talents (1 Chron. xxix, 7), or, rather, "without weight" (1 Chron. xxii, 14). Working in iron was considered a calling (2 Chron. ii, 7). See SMITH. In Ecclus. xxxviii, 28, we have a picture of the interior of an iron-smith's (Isa. xlv, 12) workshop: the smith, parched with the smoke and heat of the furnace, sitting beside his anvil and contemplating during the unwearying labor, his ears deafened with the din of the heavy hammer, his eyes foasted on his model, and never sleeping till he has accomplished his task. The superior hardness and strength of iron above all other substances is alluded to in Dan. ii, 40; its exceeding utility, in Str. xxxix, 81. It was found among the Midianites (Num. xxxii, 22), and was part of the wealth distributed among the tribes at their location in the land (Josh. xxii, 8).

The market of Tyre was supplied with bright or polished iron by the merchants of Dan and Javan (Ezek. xxvii, 19). Pliny (xxxiv, 41) speaks of this "wrought iron," so De Wette "geschmiedetes Eisen." The Targum has "bars of iron," which would correspond with the strictura of Pliny (xxxiv, 41). But Kimchi (Lex. s. v.) expounds מסיבת, ḫizboth, as "pure and polished" (=Span. acero, steel), in which he is supported by R. Sol. Parchon, and by Ben-Zeb, who gives "glanzend" as the equivalent (comp. the Homeric ἀλοίματιος, ἀλοίμαι, II, v, 573). If the Javan alluded to were Greece, and not, as Bochart (Phileg. ii, 21) seems to think, some place in Arabia, there might be reference to the iron mines of Macedonia, spoken of in the decree of Ἐμιλιοῦ Paulus (Livy, xlv, 29); but Bochart urges, as a very strong argument in support of his theory, that, at the time of Ezekiel's prophecy, the Tyrians did not depend upon Greece for a supply of cassis and cinnamon, which are associated with iron in the merchandise of Dan and Javan, but that rather the contrary was the case. Pliny (xxxiv, 41) awards the palm to the iron of Serica, that of Parthia being next in excellence. The Chalybes of the Pontus were celebrated as workers in iron in very ancient times (Esch. Prim. Lyceum Antiqu. 733). They were identified by Strabo with the Chaldei of his day (xii, 549), and the mines which they worked were in the mountains skirting the sea-coast. The produce of their lands is supposed to have reached the Euphrates of superior quality. Iron mines are still in existence on the same coast, and the ore is found "in small nodular masses in a dark yellow clay which overlies a limestone rock" (Smith's Dict. of Clas. Geog. s. v. Chalybes).
From the earliest times we meet with manufacturers in iron of the utmost variety (some articles of which seem to be anticipations of what are commonly supposed to be modern inventions). Thus iron was used for chisels (Deut. xxvii, 5), or something of the kind; for axes (Deut. xii, 4); 2 Kings vi, 6, 5; Isa. x, 19; comp. Hos. vii, 10; Amos vi, 7; (2 Sam. xii, 31; 1 Chron. xxii, 3); for nails (1 Chron. xxii, 5), and the fastenings of the Temple; for weapons of war (1 Sam. xvii, 7; Job xx, 24), and for war chariots (Josh. xvii, 16, 18; Judg. i, 19; iv, 8-15). The latter were plated or studded with it, or perhaps armed with iron scythes at the rear of the chariot, terraria sidera, as ancient Romans. Its usage in defensive armor is implied in 2 Sam. xxiii, 7 (compare Rev. ix, 9), and as a safeguard in peace it appears in fetters (Psa. cv, 18), prison gates (Acts xii, 10), and bars of gates or doors (Psa. cvii, 16; Isa. xlv, 2), as well as for surgical purposes (2 Tim. iv, 2). Sheet-iron was used for cooking utensils (Exek. iv, 8; compare Lev. vii, 9), and bars of hampered iron are mentioned in Job xi, 18 (though here the Sept. pervertently renders σίδηρος χρύσος, "cast-iron"). We have also mention of iron instruments (Numb. xxxviii, 7; barbed arrows) and of "iron" (Job xiv, 21), on iron bedstead (Deut. iii, 11); iron weights (shekels) (1 Sam. xvii, 7); iron tools (1 Kings vi, 7: 2 Kings vii, 5); horns (for symbolical use, 1 Kings xxi, 11); trees bound with iron (Dan. iv, 15); gods of iron (Dan. v, 4), etc. It was used by Solomon, according to Josephus, to clamp the pillars in the temple in which he built the Temple of the mount (Ant. xii, 11, 3), and by Hezekiah's workmen to hew out the conduits of Gibon (Eccles. xlvii, 17). Images were fastened in their niches in later times by iron brackets or clamps (Wis. xiii, 15). Agricultural implements were early made of the same material. In the treaty made by Porsena was inserted the condition that no iron should be used except for agricultural purposes (Pliny, xxxiv, xxxix), provided it was not for the same purpose (Deut. xxii, 25); or that the sheaves were itched with and brass (Deut. xxiii, 25). Indeed, iron so frequently occurs in poetical figures that it is difficult to discriminate between its literal and metaphorical sense. In such passages, in which it is not iron itself, that it is compared with iron; "iron" (Deut. xxiv, 18; Eph. vi, 16) denotes hard service: "a rod of iron" (Psa. ii, 9), a stern government; "a pillar of iron" (Jer. i, 18), a strong support; and "threshing instruments of iron" (Amos i, 3), the means of cruel oppression; the hardnesse and heaviness (Eccles. xxii, 15) of iron are so clearly the prominent idea, that, though it may have been used for the instruments in question, such usage is not of necessity indicated. The "furnace of iron" (Deut. iv, 28; 1 Kings viii, 51) is a figure which vividly expresses hard bondage, as represented by the severe labor which attended the operation of smelting. Iron is alluded to in the following instances: Under the same figure, chasteisement is denoted (Ezek. xxii, 18, 20, 22); reducting the earth to total barrenness by turning it into iron (Deut. xxvii, 23); strength, by a bar of it (Job xi, 18); afflic- tion, by iron fetters (Psa. cvii, 10); prosperity, by giving silver for iron (Isa. lx, 17); political strength (Dan. ii, 38); authority, by an iron sword in the neck (Isa. xliv, 4); giving supernatural fortitude to a prophet, making him an iron pillar (Jer. i, 18); destructive power of empires, by iron teeth (Dan. vii, 7); deterioration of character, by becoming iron (Jer. vi, 28; Ezek. xxii, 18), which resembles the idea of the image of iron; a tirestone, by iron; a burden, by a mass of iron (Eccles. xxii, 15); the greatest obstacles, by walls of iron (2 Macc. xi, 9); the certainty with which a real enemy will ever show his hatred, by the rust returning upon iron (Eccles. xii, 10). Iron seems used, as by the Hebrew poets, metonymically for the sword (Isa. x, 31), and so the Sept. understand it, μίσχυς. The following is selected as a beautiful comparison made to iron (Prov. xxvii, 17), "iron (literally) unites iron; so a man unites the countenance of his friend," gives stability to his appearance by his presence. It was for a long time supposed that the Egyptians were ignorant of the use of iron, and that the solution of the problem of its origin remained unexplained. It has now been discovered in monuments; but in the sepulchres at Thebes butterflies are represented as sharpening their knives on a round bar of metal attached to their aprons, which, from its blue color, is presumed to be steel. The steel weapons on the tomb of Rameses III are of a character which have not been matched by the Egyptians, and are ascribed to the influence of the Phoenicians, (see Herod. ii, 34.) From Rome it has spread to the Popes, and to the Pope, when he is in the finest state, the greatest care is taken to present him with new ones. (see Rose, i, 347.) One iron mine only has been discovered in Egypt, which was worked by the ancients. It is at Hemamai, between the Nile and the Red Sea; the iron found by Mr. Burton was in the form of specular and red ore (see ibid. 246). That no articles of iron should have been found is readily accounted for by the fact that it is easily destroyed by exposure to the air and moisture. According to Pliny (xxxiv, 45), it was preserved by a coating of white lead, gypsum, and liquid pitch. Bitumen was probably employed for the same purpose. The iron of the Phoenicians was obtained entirely from Africa, and not the iron almost exclusively from Assyria Proper in the form of bricks or pigs (Layard, Nineveh, i, 415, Secs. 21, 22.) Specimens of Assyrian iron-work overlaid with bronze were discovered by Mr. Layard, and are now in the British Museum (Nin. and Bab. p. 191). Iron weapons of various kinds were found at Nineveh, and some parts of the Temple at Jerusalem. A pick of the same metal (Is. p. 194) was also found, as well as part of a saw (p. 195), and the head of an axe (p. 957), and remains of scale-armour and helmets inlaid with copper (Nin. and Bab. p. 191). The use of iron for defensive weapons, as bronze for defensive armor. The Assyrians had daggers and arrow-heads of copper mixed with iron, and hardened with an alloy of tin (Layard, Nineveh, i, 418). So in the days of Homer war-clubs were shot with iron (Homer, vii, 141); arrows were tipped with iron (Il. vii, 239; Od. x, 171) for the axles of chariots (Il. vi, 273), for fetters (Od. ii, 204), for axes and bills (Il. vii, 485; Od. xxii, 3, 81). Adria- tus (Il. vi, 48) and Ulysses (Od. xxi, 10) reckoned it among their treasures, the iron weapons being kept in a chest, as described by Homer. (Od. v, 499; xii, 292; xx, 80; x, 78; x, 61.) In Od. i, 184, Mentes tells Telemachus that he is travelling from Taphos to Thessalian to procure brass in exchange for iron, which Eustathius says was not obtained from the mines of the island, but was the produce of piratical excursions (Millin, Mineral. Hem. p. 115, 24 ed.). Pliny (xxxiv, 46) mentions iron as used in the construction historically for a statue of Hercules at Thebes (compare Dan. ii, 33; v, 4), and goblets of iron as among the offerings in the temple of Mars the Avenger, at Rome. Alyattes the Lydian dedicated to the oracle at Delphi a small goblet of iron, the workmanship of Glaucus of Chios, to whom the discovery of the art of smelting this metal is attributed (Herod. i, 25). The goblet is described by Pausanias (x, 16). From the fact that such offerings were made to the temples, and that Achilles gave as a prize of contest a rudely-shaped mass of the same metal (Homer, ii, 111), it has been argued that in early times there was so little iron as to be highly esteemed for its rarity. That this was not the case in the time of Lycurgus is evident, and Homer attaches to it no epithet which would denote its preciousness (Millin, p. 106). There is reason to suppose that the discovery of iron was an old, and of the iron ages a tirestone, a time when the little weight can be attached to the line of Heroid often quoted as decisive on this point (Op. et Dies, 150). The Dactyls Idae of Crete were supposed by the ancients to have the merit of being the first to discover the properties of iron (Pliny, vii, 57; Diod. Sic. v, 64), as the Cyclopes were said to have invented the iron-smith's forge (Pliny, vii, 57). According to the Arundelian marbles iron was known B.C. 1370, while Larcher (Chronologie d'Had. p. 570) assigns a still earlier date, B.C. 1367. See SSE.

Iron (Heb. Yiron, יִרְון, place of alarm; Sept. ἤρος, one of the "fenced" cities of Naphthali, mentioned between En-hazor and Migdal-el (Josh. xix, 38). De Sauley (Narrat, ii, 382) thinks it may be the Yaron marked in Zimmerman's map north-west of Safed, the Yaron observed by Dr. Robinson (see ed. of Researches, iii, 61, 62, notes). Van de Velde (ii, 168) considers that it is "now Yaron, a village of Belad Behsharar. On the north-east side of the place are the foundations and other remains of the ancient city" (Memoir, p. 392).

Irondale, Gilbert, D.D., a bishop in the Church of England during the period of the Restoration. Of his early history but little is known to us. He was the rector of a small church in an obscure little village in Dorsetshire when he was promoted to the see of Bristol immediately after the Restoration. Wood ( Athen. Oxon. iii, 940) says of him that he owed his promotion to a poor bishopric solely to his great wealth. He died in 1671. Bishop Irondale is the author of a work entitled A Sermon (Oxford, 1657, 4to). See Shouton, Eccles. History of England (Church of the Restoration), i, 494.

Ipe'el (Hebrew יパーיל, פֹּרָי, restored by God; Sept. Ἴπαριλλι), a city in the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned between Rekem and Taralah (Josh. xvii, 27). The associated names only afford a conjectural position somewhere in the district west of Jerusalem, possibly at e-Kursil (Lat. castelium), on a conical hill about half way between Kulaiyeh (Lat. colonia) and Saba (Robinson, Researches, ii, 326).

Irregularity is a technical term for the want of the necessary canonical qualifications for the acquisition and exercise of an ecclesiastical office. These requisite qualifications are set forth in canones or regulae enacted from time to time by the Church for that purpose. It was based first on the apostolic examples given in Tit. iii, 1 sq.; v, 22; Tit. i, 6 sq.; and, after the notion of the Levitical priesthood gained ground among the clergy, on the regulations of the O. Test., which were explained in a mythical sense. The qualifications themselves can all be pointed out in the sacred books, and the whole body of the Church would be in disrepute for crime, or in a state which would render him unfit for and incapable of ordination. Innocent III (in c. 14, X. De purgatione canonicarum [v, 38] an. 1297) "notis defectis et non defectus" as "impedientia ad sacros ordines promovendum;" and subsequent canonists have therefore divided the impediments into three categories in a like manner. In early times divers expressions were made use of to designate these impediments, but since Innocent III irregularitas has become the technical name of them in canon law (c. 38, X. De testibus [ti, 20] an. 1293). See INCAPACITY.

The Greek Church in general adhered more to the principles which had been established during the first six centuries (see Canones Apostolorum, Conc. Neocesar, an. 314; can. 9 [c. 11, dist. xxxiv]; Concil. Nicom. cod. an., Trullanum, an. 692, can. 21), whilst the Evangelical Church published later regulations, which were in accordance with its general spirit. The formularia of confession and ecclesiastical discipline still continue, however, to refer expressly to the above-named passages of Scripture.

1. Irregularity on Account of a Crime. The apostolic canons make this a special action sine officio. After the congregation should be unimpeached. Church discipline has gradually defined the offenses which compose irregularity. Originally it consisted of all offenses that necessitated public penance; after the 9th century, of such as were publicly known (delictum manifestum, scotorum), and all faults entailing disonor, in which the "infamias paras non patent dignitatum" of c. 87, De regulis juris, was practically adhered to (comp. c. 2, Cod. Just. "de dignitatisibus," xii, 1, Constantin.). There are, besides, other offenses named by the law which, even though secret (delicta occultae), constitute irregularity, namely, heresy, apostasy, schism, simony, anabaptism, subversion of the ordination, promotion without passing through the usual hierarchical ministry, imposition without consecration, performance of worship while under excommunication or interdict, disregard of the rule of celibacy, etc. (see Thomassin, Vetus et nova ecclesiae disciplinae, pt. ii, lib. i, cap. lxxv; Ferraris, Bibliotheca canonica, a. v. Irregularitas, art. i, No. 11; Ernch und Gruber, Evangel. Kirchen. Geschichte, a. v. Irregularitas.)

While the Greek Church generally adhered to these regulations, the Evangelical Church naturally deviates from them in many particulars, in consequence of the absence of an ecclesiastical hierarchy, the abolition of the rule of celibacy, etc. That a person who has undergone punishment for crime is incapable of being ordained is self-evident. If a party is in bad repute, the congregation has a right to oppose his appointment, in case the imputations are well founded. This is a law among all Christian denominations.

The Romish Church recognizes the consequences of irregularity as important by means of a dispensation which the bishops are empowered to give when the crime is not public, except in case of premeditated murder (Concilium Trident. Sess. xxiv, cap. 6, "De reform. verb."); Sess. xiv, cap. 7, "De reform."). In this case the dispensation can continue only to the temporal concerns of the party himself. So also for public offenses, except he delegates special powers to the bishop for that purpose. In the Greek Church, on the contrary, the strict regulations of old are maintained, whereby irregularity for heavy offenses cannot be removed (Thomassin, Vetus et nova ecclesiae disciplinae, cap. 4, "De reform.").

II. Irregularity caused by Want of Qualification. — Irregularity for offense constitutes also irregularity for want of sufficient qualification, as it entails the loss of good reputation (defectus famae); to this are, however, added other causes which are considered as defects. Among these are:

1. Defectus atatia (want of the canonical age). — The age appointed for ordination has undergone various changes. According to the present canon law, the primary consecration of the Romish Church can be imparted as early as the 3rd year; it is only at the 4th or 5th year that it is possible to impart the consecration in the case of a priest. Non. Justin. cxxxvii, cap. 1; Concil. Trullanum, can. xii. The Evangelical churches generally require full majority, or twenty-five years; in some countries ordination is given at twenty-one. Dispensations are also granted under certain circumstances. The Church of England requires candidates to deacons' orders to be twenty-three, presbyters twenty-four, and bishops thirty.

2. Defectus natalis (legitimorum). — Invalidity was no obstacle to ordination in the ancient Church (c. 8, dist. lvi, Hieronymus). It has been considered so since the 9th century; yet the rule was not very strictly enforced (Concil. Miledense, an. 845 [in cap. 17, can. i, qu. vii]; Regimo, De discipl. eccles. lib. i, cap. 416 sqq.). Especial action was taken concerning the children of ordained priests (Concil. Pictorivienae, an. 1078 [c. 1, X. "De filius presbyterorum ordinandis vel non," i, 17]; Clarmonton, an. 1095 [comp. c. 14, dist. lvi, Urban II], etc.; see especially dist. lvi, tit. x, i, 17; lib. vi, i, 11; Concil. Trullanum, xxxv, cap. 15, "De reform."). And justified their laws in the passage of the O. T. Deut. xxiii, 2 (comp. c. 10, § 6, X. "De renunciation."). I. 9, Innocent III, an. 1206. This defect, however, can be remedied (a) by recognition (c. 6, X. "Qui illi sint legitimi," iv, 17, Alexander III) ; (b) by entrance into a convent or foundation of regular canons (c. 11, dist. Ivi, Urban II) ; c. 1, X. "De fillius presbyterorum," etc.). This regulation, abolished by Sixtus V, was restored by Gregory XVI in 1851, but with this condition, that such persons should be disqualified from prelatical honors. (c) By dispensation, which, for ordinandae minores, and for majors when the defect is not publicly known, can be granted by the bishop; otherwise, for ordinandi majors, and benefits connected with cure of souls, the person whom can be granted only by the pope (c. 1, "De fillius presbyterorum," in vi [i, 11]; c. 20, 25, X. "De electione" [i, 6]). The Greek Church does not recognise this defect (Thomasin, cap. Ixxxi, § 4), neither does the Evangelical Church, although many jurists consider the canonical principle on which it is based as common law (Wiese, Kirchenrecht, p. iii, sec. I, p. 190; Eichhorn, Deutsches Friherrechts, § 89; Kirchenrecht, i, p. 704).

3. Defectus corporis.—In imitation of the Mosaic law (Lev. xxii, 17-20 sq.), it was at an early time demanded that the candidates for orders should have no bodily defect which should render them disqualified from the discharge of their office, or a subject of dislike to the people (Constit. Apost. lib. vii, cap. 2, 3; Canones Apostolorum, cap. 76, 77). This became more and more strictly observed on this point, and declared all bodily defects sufficient ground for irregularity (cap. 2, dist. xxxiii; cap. 7, dist. xxxiii; cap. 13, dist. iv) ; but finally returned again to the former rules (tit. x, "De corpor. vitiatis ordinandis vel non,") i, 20). Thus ordination is refused to the deaf, dumb, and blind (Con. Apostol. 77, c. 6, X. "De clerico agrotante vel debilitato," iii, 6); also to those who have but one eye, especially if the one wanting is the left (Bosio contra haereses, in reading mass the Missal is placed on the left side (cap. 13, dist. iv), the lame (c. 10, dist. iv) ; c. 56, dist. i, "De consecr."); qupliceta (c. 1, 2, can. vii, qu. ii; c. 21, X. "De electione," i, 6); lepers (c. 3, 4, X. "De clerico agrot. iii, 6), those who had mutilated themselves (c. 21 sq. ; Apost. c. 7 sq. dist. iv), hermaphrodites (Ferraris, Bibliotheca canonica, s. v.). In some of these cases there can be dispensations granted, as, for instance, for the loss of the left eye, when the right has gained more strength so as to compensate for the defect (Ferraris, s. v. Irregularitas, art. "Constitutiones") .

4. Defectus animae (want of spiritual capacity).—Thus madness, imbecility, etc., are grounds of irregularity (c. 2-5, dist. xxxiii).

5. Defectus intellectus (the want of adequate educational preparation).—In accordance with various passages of the O. T. (Jcr. i, 9; Hos. iv, 6; Mal. ii, 7, etc.), even the early Church demanded of its officers to have enjoyed special educational advantages, which alone could qualify them to act as teachers of the people (comp. dist. xxvii-xxviii, etc.), and the civil laws also insisted on this point (Novella, vi, cap. 4, etc., Capitulares of Charlemagne; Reitberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschland, vol. ii, § 124). With regard to the different orders special regulations were gradually adopted. The Council of Trent prescribed : Priores, tonsura non initiata, qui saepe mendacium confirmationis non sequerent fiidei sancti ente docti non fuerint, quique legere et scribere necass. Minoris ordines iis qui salt Latinam linguam intelligant . . . conferantur. Subdicaes et daconis ordinat. . . . minores ordinibus jam probati, ac libidine D. D.

6. Defectus fidei (want of a well-grounded faith).—In consequence of the prescription (Can. Tolet, i, anno 400, cap. 4, tit. iii, i; v, 22) that no person who is not firm in the faith should be ordained, the Church commanded that none should be ordained immediately after conversion (Can. Apostol. 79; Can. Nicom. 320, c. 2 [c. 1, dist. xlvii]; Gregorius, anno 599 [c. 2, cod. 1], and especially none who had been baptised in Catholic Church (cf. Constit. Apostol. 77, c. 1, dist. lvii), (i. c. 1, dist. lviii)); its original strictness against the children and relatives of heretics was subsequently relaxed, and even the decrees concerning new converts fell into disuse where such showed that they possessed a firm faith (c. 7, X. "In fine de rescriptis," [i, 9]); Gonzalez Teller, Controversias de celes, cap. 16, sect. 6 [c. 2, dist. xi]). Its original strictness against the children and relatives of heretics was subsequently relaxed, and even the decrees concerning new converts fell into disuse where such showed that they possessed a firm faith (c. 7, X. "In fine de rescriptis" [i, 9]); Gonzalez Teller, Controversias de celes, cap. 16, sect. 6 [c. 2, dist. xi]). Its original strictness against the children and relatives of heretics was subsequently relaxed, and even the decrees concerning new converts fell into disuse where such showed that they possessed a firm faith (c. 7, X. "In fine de rescriptis" [i, 9]); Gonzalez Teller, Controversias de celes, cap. 16, sect. 6 [c. 2, dist. xi]). Its original strictness against the children and relatives of heretics was subsequently relaxed, and even the decrees concerning new converts fell into disuse where such showed that they possessed a firm faith (c. 7, X. "In fine de rescriptis" [i, 9]); Gonzalez Teller, Controversias de celes, cap. 16, sect. 6 [c. 2, dist. xi]). Its original strictness against the children and relatives of heretics was subsequently relaxed, and even the decrees concerning new converts fell into disuse where such showed that they possessed a firm faith (c. 7, X. "In fine de rescriptis" [i, 9]); Gonzalez Teller, Controversias de celes, cap. 16, sect. 6 [c. 2, dist. xi]). Its original strictness against the children and relatives of heretics was subsequently relaxed, and even the decrees concerning new converts fell into disuse where such showed that they possessed a firm faith (c. 7, X. "In fine de rescriptis" [i, 9]); Gonzalez Teller, Controversias de celes, cap. 16, sect. 6 [c. 2, dist. xi]). Its original strictness against the children and relatives of heretics was subsequently relaxed, and even the decrees concerning new converts fell into disuse where such showed that they possessed a firm faith (c. 7, X. "In fine de rescriptis" [i, 9]); Gonzalez Teller, Controversias de celes, cap. 16, sect. 6 [c. 2, dist. xi]).}

7. Defectus perfecta lemmatia (want of meekness).—It applies to those who have departed from the principle Ecclesia non sitit semper seminum. Hence, to those who have shed blood in war (Conc. Tolet, i, anno 400, c. 4, dist. lii); Innocent I, anno 404 [c. 1, cod. 1]; c. 24. X. "De homicidio" [v, 12], Honorius III; also to those who have sat as accuser, witness, lawyer, judge, or jurymen in a criminal court, and taken part in a sentence of death (Concil. Tolet, iv, anno 635, c. 31; Conc. Tolet, xi, anno 663, c. 21); also to those who, in the Greek Church, have retained from the original principle, and its application by the Evangelical Church appears fully justified.

8. Defectus sacrorum (matrimonii) (want of adherence to the rule of monogamy).—The apostolic command about the bishops and deacons being the husbands of one wife (1 Tim. iii, 12; Tit. i, 6) was by the Church considered as forbidding not only actual bigamy (bige- mium vera seu simultaneum), but also second marriage (bij- giamia successiva) (dist. xxxvi; c. 1, 2, dist. xxxiii, tit. x, "De bigamia non ordinandi," i, 21, etc.). The idea of bigamy was subsequently extended to include marriage with a widow or a deceased virgin (bigeamia inter- pretativa) (c. 2, dist. xxxiv; c. 10, 6, X. "De denunciatione," i, 9; c. 38, X. "De testibus," ii, 20; c. 4, 5, 7, X. "De bigamia non ordinandi," i, 21; Norvella Justiniuni, vi, cap. 1, § 3; cap. v, cxxiii; cap. xii); also the continuation of the marriage relation after a woman had committed adultery (c. 11, 12, dist. xxxiv, tit. ii) was considered bigamous, because if the woman, who, by a vow of chastity, had been joined in spiritual marriage to the Church, like monks, or who had attained high ecclesiastical positions, to marry even a virgin (bigeamia simulhetudine) (c. 24, can. cxxxii, qu. 1 [Conc. Angr. an. 314]). In this case the irregularity was not proper defectus sacrorum, sed proper affectus intentionis cum opera subsequens, as Innocent III expressly IRRESISTIBLE GRACE 661

Pelagianism, says the Rev. O. Adolphus (Compendium Theologiae, p. 144, 8d edit. Cambridge, England, 1865, of the Church of England, and himself a believer in predestination, carry their views of the absolute predestination of a limited number to the ultimate attainment of salvation, through the influence of the irresistible grace of God causing their final perseverance, to such an extreme in their logical deductions that there appeared persons who charged the Augustinian system with leading to the dangerous conclusions that human actions are immaterial, and human efforts for the conversion of the wicked unavailing, in the face of God's free gift of grace in accordance with his secret decrees, pre-determined from everlasting. For the Arminian argument on the other hand, see ARMINIANISM; ELECTION; PRE-DESTINATION; WILL.

Irrigation. Gardens in the East anciently were, and still are, when possible, planted near streams, which afford the means of easy irrigation. (See the curious account of ancient garden irrigation in Pliny, Hist. Nat. xix. 4.) This explains such passages as Gen. ii. 9 sq., and Isa. i. 30. But streams were few in Palestine, at least such as afforded water in summer, when alone water was wanted for irrigation: hence rain-water, or water from the streams which dried up in summer, was in winter stored up in reservoirs, spacious enough to contain all the water likely to be needed during the dry season. See POOL; WELL. In fact, many of our own large nurseries are watered in the same manner from reservoirs of rain-water. The water was distributed through the garden in numerous small rills, which traverased it in all directions, and which were supplied either by a continued stream from the reservoir, or had water poured into them by the gardeners, in the manner shown in the Egyptian monuments (see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. abridg. i, 33 sq.). See GARDEN. These rills, being turned and directed by the foot, gave rise to the phrase "watering the garden" as indicative of garden irrigation (Deut. xi. 10). Thus Dr. Thomson says (Land and Book, ii, 279), "I have often watched the gardeners at this fattiging and unhealthy work. When one place is sufficiently saturated, he pushes aside the sandy soil between him and the furrow with his foot, and then continues to do until all are watered."

The reference, however, may be to certain kinds of hydraulic machines turned by the feet, such as the small water-wheels used on the plain of Acre and elsewhere. At Hamath, Damascus, and other places in Syria, there are large water-wheels, turned by the stream, used to raise water into aqueducts. But the most common method of raising water along the Nile is the Shaduf, or well-scoop and bucket, represented on the monuments, though not much used in Palestine. (On the whole subject, see Kitto, Nat. Hist. of Pal. p. ccxxii sq.). See WATER.

Irving, Mathew, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Cumberland Co., Pa., December 22, 1817. In early life he was a school-teacher.
On account of his piety and gifts he was made an elder in the Church. His call to the ministry then became more apparent to himself and to others, and he began the study of theology privately with his pastor, and in 1833 was licensed and ordained. He took charge of feebly and scattered German Reformed congregations in Bedford Co., Pa., where he did the work of a pioneer in a truly apostolic spirit. A number of separate charges were formed from time to time out of parts of his field.
His ministry was greatly blessed, and the wilderness and solitary places all around became glad. He accomplished the work of a long life in a comparatively few years, and died in peace April 31, 1867.

Irving, Edward, "the great London preacher, and precursor of a fanaticism," was the same name that five years ago was in everybody's mouth, and whose career, so strange, grotesque, solemn, and finally so sad, was the theme of the sneers of the thoughtless and of the wonder of the thoughtful," was born Aug. 15, 1792, at Annan, county of Dumfries, Scotland, where his father was a tanner. He was piously brought up, having been early destined by his ambitious parents for the ministry.
He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and shortly after graduation (1805) was appointed to superintend the mathematical school at Haddowen, whence he removed in 1812 to Kirkcaldy to assume the duties of a small but honorably supplied church. Here he also began his theological studies, and, in accordance with the usage of his alma mater, he entered as one of her students of theology. After a stay of about seven years, having completed the probation required by the Church, he returned to Edinburgh, and, continuing an opening immediately, and fired of the occupation of teaching, he commenced study at Edinburgh, devoting most of his time to the writings of Bacon, Hooker, and Jeremy Taylor. At last there came an invitation to preach in the hearing of the celebrated Dr. Chalmers, who was desirous of procuring for himself an assistant in the great parish of St. John's, Glasgow; and shortly after Irving was chosen for this position, and so enabled to begin "in earnest the great life work of which he had been preparing, and which he had anticipated with most painful longings. A parish of 10,000 souls, mostly the families of poor artisans and laborers, composed the parish. and Chalmers at once entered on its works, and varied his duties with his forfry, and the preaching in this parish with Dr. Chalmers only afforded him an inferior place, he soon grew dissatisfied with the position; and, his preaching having secured him quite a favorable reputation, he was invited to the great English metropolis as minister of the Caledonian Church, a Kirk of Scotland in Cross Street, Hanover Garden. Early in July, 1822, he began his labors in this little out-of-the-way church, composed of only fifty members, occasionally enlarged by some stray Scotchmen visiting the great city. In a very few weeks he began to attract large congregations; in three months the applications for seats were nearly 1,500; at length it became necessary to exclude the general public, and to admit only those who were provided with tickets. Statesmen, orators, the noble, the wealthy, the fashionable, occupied the seats of the church, and their carriages throught the adjoining street. His ability as a preacher was thus stated by a writer on "Henry Drummond" in the London Quart. Review, October, 1860, p 275: "The preacher's great stature, his bushy black hair hanging down in ringlets, his deep voice, his solemn manner, the impressiveness of his action, his broad Scotch dialect, his antiquated yet forcible style, his natural tendency to rivet attention, and made you feel that you were in the presence of a power. Nor did his manner belie the impression which was thus created. He was bent upon accomplishing the end of the Gospel ministry in saving souls from death; and at the beginning of his course, before the disturbing influences of his position had less their full work upon him, he preached with great force and effect."
The influence which Irving exerted among all classes of society of London was really surprising.
Such an amount of applause as was awarded to his pulpit discourses has never fallen to the lot of man since his day, except perhaps in the case of Robert Southey.
In 1824, a volume containing some of his discourses was sent forth, not as sermons, but under the title of Orna-tions: For the Oracles of God, four Orations: For Judgments to come, an Argument in nine Parts. The books were highly lauded, and three and four edition of the books were sold in less than half a year.
"Amiless, and without a wide or lasting interest, curiously quaint in style and manner, while the matter generally bears upon the topics of the pass-ning hour, it contains many passages of extraordinary beauty and depth, many an outpouring of lofty devotion, and frequent bursts of the most passionate eloquence" (Encyclop. Brit. xii, 625). But, as the production of the preacher of the little Hatton Garden guild, everybody who wished to be up with the times had to read it, and so it soon "became the talk of the town, and was regarded by some as an important and temper."
The book held many vulnerable points, one of which, not the least perhaps, was the thrust in his introduction against the evident lack of success of the ordinary instructions of the pulpit, charging it all in the result of the Presbytry of Annan, to "the ambiguous position of a licensed preacher and candidate—a layman in fact, though often recognised as a clergyman by courtesy; and he only waited an opportunity to escape from his present occupation to that for which he had been formally desgriguated, and for which, in the opinion of the ministers of the church, he had incurred the displeasure of the Church, and the risk of being expelled, being generally prevalent in England at that time. But if this arrayed a number of critics against him, an estrangement of the great body of contemporary evangelical Christians only followed his course of action in 1824. In this year he was called upon, as one of the pulpit celebrations of the 2000th anniversary of the birth of the London Missionary Society. He had long dreamt of a revival of apostolical missions, and to advance "these

The public nature of the great preacher, however, continued unabated in the midst of all these difficulties; may, his late meditations and yearnings rather increased his reputation, and soon a new and more continuous crowd had to be provided for the throne of hearing that weekly came to listen to him. The money for the building of a new edifice was easily procured, and early in 1827 he was installed pastor of the newly-built church in Regent Square, Chalmers preaching on the occasion.

"The transfiguration of the little church was long thronged by a promiscuous crowd of London fashionable life, to the commodious National Scotch Church in Regent Square, with its well-ordered and well-defined congregation, marks the culmination and the beginning of the descent of Irving's popularity." Shortly after his removal to the new church, he again ventured before the public as an author by the publication of three volumes (1828) selected from his discourses preached since the commencement of his ministry at London. Up to this time many of the extravagances of Irving had more or less displeased his brother laborers in the ministry, but no one had ventured to attack him publicly until "an idle clergyman called Cole," of whom Mr. Irving's biographer, Mrs. Oliphant, can barely speak with civility, accused Irving of inculcating heterodox doctrines on the Incarnation in the first volume of his sermons, which treats chiefly of the Trinity; first of the divine character, and especially of the divinity of Jesus Christ.

"The perfect humanity of Christ was Irving's favorite theme. With the utmost intensity he clung to the idea of the brotherhood of his Master—an idea he held with perfect reverence. The first shock of the charge and challenge of the doubters was directed against this to his adorable Lord, utterly unmanned him. The last thought of his heart would have been to derogate from the dignity of his Master, his impassioned reverence for whom had probably stimulated the teaching which now bore the brand of heresy" (London Quart. Rev. Oct. 1862, p. 193). It would hardly be worth while to follow up the controversy incited by the impertinent, if not treacherous conduct of Mr. Cole in exaggerating "an error which should have been the groundwork of a brotherly exposition," were it not for the fact that for these very views on the incarnation Irving was, some years later, deposed as the minister of his church. As the report said, he was the last of all persons who could be led to believe that the views which he set forth on this subject had anything novel or unusual in them. All that he was possibly guilty of, says Dr. Curry, is that he took his larger views and comprehended the work of the Incarnation of the Word as redemptive, in that by it the Godhead came into vital union with humanity, fallen and under the law. This last thought carried to his realistic mode of thinking the notion of Christ's participation in the fallen character of humanity, which he designated by terms that implied a real sinfulness in Christ. His attempt to get rid of the odiousness of that idea by saying that this was overborne and at length wholly expelled by the indwelling Godhead helped the matter but little, and still left him open to grave censure for at least an unhappy method of statement. But under all this there is unquestionably a most precious Gose been so marvellous and so warm, first justly condemned for an unwarrantable misstatement of certain doctrines of Christianity, the orthodoxy of the age may be justly called to account for its partial exhibition of those doctrines. For centuries the Church has been actively occupied in the establishment and defense of the doctrine of Christ’s divinity, until that of his humanity has largely fallen out of its thinking. It is quite time to cease from this one-sidedness and to take in a whole Gospel. Fallen humanity demands a sympathizing no less than an almighty Saviour; and if indeed Jesus is to be that Saviour, he must be apprehended by our faith, as ‘man with man,’ and as really and fully ‘touched with a sense of our infirmities.’ The Church of Rome answers to the heart’s yearning for human sympathy in the Mediator by giving that office to Mary; while our misformed practical creeds remove Jesus beyond our sympathies, and give us no other aid. The Church always in the coming of a John, uprising from the Saviour’s bosom, to set forth in all fulness the blessedness of the grace of Jesus, the incarnate God, who hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows.”

With this charge of heresy advanced against him, Irving set out on a visit to the Holy Land, and if Irving was his heart, and the Kinsman Kindred, and the country side which had still so great a hold upon his heart, and then universal Scotland, of that advent which he looked for with undoubting and fervent expectations; and brilliant was the success with which he saw his labors crowned wherever he went. For once he was a prophet who received honors in his own country. Wherever he preached, not only whole congregations from neighboring towns came to swell his already large numbers of hearers, but oftentimes even the ministers would adjourn their services and go with the multifarious warm fireside and read a “text” for his benefit. While preaching at Edinburgh on the Apoplectic, the special theme of study in these later years, the services began as six o’clock A.M. Of these Chalmers writes: “He is drawing prodigious crowds. We attempted this morning to force our way into St. Andrew’s Church, but it was to no avail. He changes to the West Church, with its three handsome galleries, for the accommodation of the public, and even then there was not room. As in Edinburgh, so was his success at Glasgow and other places that he visited, and we need not wonder that Chalmers himself exclaims “that there must have been a most marvellous power of attraction that could turn a whole population out of their beds as early as five in the morning.”

As if to augment the difficulties already in his way, in his candid and straightforward manner, he further estranged his friends of the Scottish Church by extending his sympathy to a minister of his native Church, a Mr. Campbell, of Row, who was just then under the oculum of teaching false notions on the Precursarian high-Calvinistic doctrine of the Atonement as set forth in the Westminster Confession. “But the final divergence from his mother Church further resulted, not from the communication of any doctrinal excitement from the banks of Guirloch, but from a very strange phenomenon which about this time took its rise along the quiet banks of this river. For some time Irving had been pondering on the heretic, An Oil Regain his An Oil Regain, (q. c.) who was inclined to believe this spiritual gift to have been not only possessed by the apostolic Church, but an actual heritage of the Church of all times; indeed, a necessary condition for the healthy state of any Church of Christ. These thoughts of his became convictions when seconded at this juncture by some remarkable instinct. In the locality of Row, celebrated for the piety of its inhabitants, there had lived and died a young woman, Isabella Campbell by name, of rare and saintly character. A memoir which her minister had written of her attracted the attention of people far and near, and many of them came as pilgrims to visit the spot where she had lived and prayed. These visits to the earthy dwelling-place, as well as the noble reputation, if not example of a departed sister, had a wonderful influence on the surviving sister Mary—gifted with the same spiritual temperament, with powers of mind of no ordinary character, and, moreover, with the personal fascinations of a Forerunner. She was afflicted with the same disease which had made a prey of her sister, and while lying, as all believed, at the point of death, she professed to have received “the gift of tongues,” and, “as she lay in her weakness,” the Holy Ghost, they say, had come upon her with mighty power, and “constrained her to speak at great length, and with superhuman strength, in an unknown tongue.” Similar cases occurred in other neighboring places, and the news of the wondrous phenomena soon reached the ears of Irving. To him, of course, these indicated “an approaching realization of his prophetic dreams.” Not for an instant did he even attempt to acknowledge them as the natural answer of his aspirations and prayer; and many of his own flock, prepared by his previous teachings, seconded his feelings in favor of these long-lost spiritual gifts. Manifestations of a similar character soon appeared in his own Church h. at first private, but he watched its growth as it bustled about the house and busied itself in the public service on the Sabbath. “The die” had truly been “cast, and from that time the Regent Square church became a Babel.” His oldest and most discreet friends one by one deserted him, finding that their counselors were a man who would have the world believe that he was a Braham. Coleridge, both his friends, could not in the least stay the current that was fast hurrying him to a most frightful abyss. A collision between the pastor and his flock was inevitable, though some of his people shared his views. Against the continuation of the “new prophets” he was firm and decided. The inevitable result was of course the ejection of the minister and his believers in the “gift of tongues” from Regent Square Church. But it must not be supposed that a man of Irving’s great abilities, though his course was now downward, was surrounded only by a few weak followers. Among those who faithfully followed their pastor were some of London’s most distinguished characters, and when on the following Sunday he met his adherents in the hall of the great infidel Owen, no less than 800 were there to partake of the Lord’s Supper. Indeed, the place they had temporarily secured was far too small, and they moved to another room, and they removed to a large gallery in Newman Street, generally designated as West’s Gallery, because it had formerly belonged to West the painter. The denounce- ment of the play had now fairly begun, and it rapidly hastened to its close. The “gifted one” at Newman and Street had things in their own hands, and everything proceeded by “vision,” and prophecy, and in the “Spirit;” to all which Irving gave the most reverent and obedient attention. The Presbytery of Aman, by which body Irving had been first licensed to preach, but not afterwards by a remarkable stroke of fate, condemned him as guilty of heresy, and excommunicated him from the Church of Scotland. But as if his cup of sorrows was not yet sufficiently bitten, to add to the condemnation which he had just received at the hand of his mother Church, which he so dearly loved, he was afterwards condemned by Ann Girrus (q. c.) for his own adherents of the authority which by reason of his superiority had universally been granted to him, and, in accordance with a “revelation,” was interdicted “from exercising any priestly function, or administering the sacraments, or even preaching, excepting to those less sacred assemblies to which he was admitted.” Astounded, he yet uttered no murmur, but sat in the lowest places of the Church which he himself had created, in silent and resigned humility.” Mr. Andrews, in
1. The promise of a son had been made to his parents when Abraham was visited by the Lord in the plains of Mamre, and appeared so unlikely to be fulfilled, seeing that both Abraham and Sarah were “well stricken in years,” that its utterance caused the latter to laugh incredulously (Gen. xviii, 1 sq.). B.C. 2064. Being reproved for her unbelief, she laughed, “she laughed.” The reason assigned for the special visitation thus promised was, in effect, that Abraham was pious, and would train his offspring in piety, so that he would become the founder of a great nation, and all the nations of the earth should be blessed in him. See ABRAHAM. Isaac was born in his ninety-third year. He was named the name of Isaac (Gen. xxii, 1-3). B.C. 2063. This event occurred at Gerar. Isaac was thus emphatically the child of promise. Born, as he was, out of time, when his father was a hundred years old and his mother ninety, the parents themselves laughed with a kind of strangled laugh, in commemoration of the extraordinary, supernatural nature of the birth, and of the laughing joy which it occasioned to those more immediately interested in it. This signification of Isaac’s name is thrice alluded to (Gen. xvii, 17; xviii, 12; xxxi, 6). Josephus (Ant. i, 12, 2) refers to the story of the birth of this great of strangers, with the name as a symbol. Isaac. It includes a reference to them all, besides according with and expressing the happy, cheerful disposition of the bearer, and suggesting the relation in which he stood, as the seed of Abraham, the channel of the promised blessing; and the type of him who is pre-eminently the Seed, whose birth is the subject of the awe and amazement of myriads of our race. The preternatural birth of Isaac was a sign from heaven at the outset, indicating what kind of seed God expected as the fruit of the covenant, and what powers would be required for its production—that it should move in new and exalted spheres of activity, and yet in some sense above nature—the special gift and offspring of God. When Isaac was eight days old he received circumcision, and was thus received into the covenant made with his father; while his mother’s sceptical laughter was turned into triumphal exultation and joy in God (Gen. xxxii, 1-2). (See De Wette, Krit. p. 138 sq.; Ewald, Gesch. i, 388; Hartmann, Ueber d. Pentateu, p. 269; Lengerke, Ken. p. 290; Niemeyer, Charact. ii, 160.) See NAME.

2. The first noticeable circumstance in the life of Isaac took place in connection with his weaning. His precise age at this time is not given, but we may suppose him to have been (according to Eastern custom) fully two years old. In honor of the occasion Abraham made a great feast, as an expression of joy, no doubt, of his joy that the child had reached this fresh stage in his career—was no longer a sucking, but capable of self-sustenance, and was therefore a certain measure of domestication. For the parents, and those who sympathized with them, it would naturally be a feast of laughter—the laughter of mirth and joy; but there was one in the family—in-him—whom it was no occasion of gladness, who saw himself supplanted in the more external honors of the house by this younger brother, and who mocked while others laughed—himself, indeed, laughed. (For it is the same word still, הָעָשָׂפ, Gen. xxii, 9), but with the envious and scornful air which betrayed the alien and hostile spirit that lurked in his bosom. He must have been a well-grown boy at the time; and Sarab, desiring in the manifestations then given the sure

The next recorded event in the life of Isaac is his marriage to Rebecca (Gen. xxiv). He was twenty years old when she arrived at his camp. They lived together in a tent, and Isaac and Rebecca had four sons: Esau,Jacob, Shem and Laban. Isaac and his wife had a long and fruitful marriage, and their sons were the seed of Abraham and the beginning of the nation of Israel.

The story of Isaac's life is told in Genesis 18, where he is visited by the three angels, who promise him a son. Isaac and his wife Sarah are childless, and they have been blessed by the Lord. They are told that Sarah will bear a son, who will be the heir of the promise made to Abraham. Isaac and Sarah are so happy that they sacrifice their son Ishmael, who is born to Sarah. But God appears to them in a dream and tells them that they should not sacrifice Ishmael, but keep him safe. Isaac and Sarah are then blessed with a son, Isaac, who is the promised heir of the promise made to Abraham. Isaac is said to be 666 years old when he dies, and his death is mourned by his family and his friends.

The story of Isaac's life is told in the Old Testament, and it is a story of faith, love, and sacrifice. It is a story of God's faithfulness to his promises, and it is a story of the power of prayer. The story of Isaac is a story of the power of God to fulfill his promises, and it is a story of the power of prayer to bring about God's will. The story of Isaac is a story of the power of faith to overcome doubt and fear, and it is a story of the power of love to overcome hatred and division.

being (so Bruna, in Paula's Memorab. vi, 1 sq.) received any encouragement from a sacrifice which Abraham was forbidden to accomplish (see Waterland, Works, iv, 280). Some writers have found for this transaction a kind of parallel—-it amounts to no more—-in the classical legends of Iphigenia and Phrixus (so Rosenmuller, Motteville). Isaac was Abraham's son, Michael and Joseph a Gracia in Kyriam et Orismon concorsis, Frech. a. O. 1721; Zeichb. Iisac auf Hynradam et Orisonis vestigio, (Ger. 1776). Iisacque, Isaac ortus in fabula Orisonis vestigio, (Ger. 1776). The sacrifice of Isaac, which is the first century a rhetorical exhibition of his own unaccustomedness with the meaning of sacrifice (see Joseph. Ant. i, 18, 5). The general aim of certain writers has been, as they consider it, to relieve the Bible from the odium which the narrated circumstances are in their opinion fitted to occasion. That the passage is free from every possible objection it may be too much to assert: it is, however, equally clear that many of the objections to which either religion or morality can take a wrong position, or under the discrediting medium of a foregone and adverse conclusion. The only proper way is to consider it as it is represented in the sacred page. The command, then, was expressly designated to try Abraham. If he should obey it, was he the father of the faithful, was he worthy of his high and dignified position? If his own obedience was weak, he could not train others in faith, trust, and love: hence a trial was necessary. That he was not without holy dispositions was already known, and indeed recognised in the sacrifice. But it is not now to be inferred that he had been the other; but was he prepared to do and suffer all God's will? Religious perfection and his position alike demanded a perfect heart: hence the kind of trial. If he was willing to surrender even his only child, and act himself both as offerer and priest in the sacrifice of the required victim, if he could so far conquer his natural affections, as subdue the father in his heart, then there could be no doubt that his will was wholly reconciled to God's, and that he was worthy of every trust, confidence, and honor (comp. James ii, 21). The trial was made, the fact was sustained, but the victim was not slain. What is there in this story to identify a calm and reflective turn of mind, simple in his habits, having few wants, good rather than great, fitted to receive impressions and follow a guide, not to originate important influences, or perform deeds of renown? If his character did not take a bent from the events connected with his father's readiness to offer him on Mount Moriah, certainly its passiveness is in entire agreement with the whole tenor of his conduct, as set forth in that narrative. (See Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. ad loc.) Isaac, having, in conjunction with his half-brother Ishmael, buried Abraham his father, "in a good old age, in the cave of Machpelah," took up a somewhat permanent residence "by the well Lahai-roi," where, being blessed of God, he lived in prosperity and at ease (Gen. xxxv, 7-11). B.C. 1885. One source of regret, however, he deeply felt. Rebekah was barren. In time, however, two sons, Jacob and Esau, were granted his prayers (Gen. xxxv, 21-26). B.C. 2003. As the boys grew, Isaac gave a preference to Esau, who seems to have possessed those robust qualities of character in which his father was defective, and therefore gratified him by such dainties as the pursuits of the chase enabled the youth to "have a liberal" share, while the daughters of the plain were an object of special regard to Rebekah—a division of feeling and a kind of partiality which became the source of much domestic unhappiness, as well as of jealousy and hatred between the two sons (Gen. xxxv, 27, 28). See Esaq.

5. The life of Isaac, moreover, was not passed wholly without trials coming in from without. A famine compels him to seek food in some foreign land (Gen. xxvi, 1 sq.). B.C. cir. 1895. At the occurrence of this famine Isaac was expressly admonished by God not to go down into Egypt, but to abide within the boundaries of the Promised Land; and occasion was taken to renew the promise to him and his seed, and to confirm in his behalf the oath which had been made to his father.

The Lord pleaded his word to be with him and to bless him in the land—which he certainly did, though Isaac did not feel so secure of the promised guardianship and support as to be able to avoid falling into the snare which his father, Abraham, had been too old and weak to detect. Isaac, forty years of age, was living at Gerar, in the neighborhood of the Philistine capital, during the prevalence of the famine, and no doubt observing the wickedness of the place, he had the weakness to call Rebekah his sister, in fear that the people might kill him on her account, if they knew her to be his wife. It does not appear that any violence was offered to Rebekah; and the Philistine king, on discovering, as he did, from the familiar bearing of Isaac towards Rebekah, that she must be his wife, simply rebuked him for having, by his prevarication, given occasion to a misapprehension which might have led to serious consequences (Gen. xxvi, 10).

No passage of his life has produced more reproach to Isaac's character than this. Abraham's conduct while in Egypt (ch. xii) and in Gerar (ch. xx), where he concealed the closer connection between himself and his wife, was imitated by Isaac in Gerar. On the one hand, this was disowned by avowed adversaries of Christianity as involving the guilt of "lying and endeavoring to betray the wife's chastity," and even by Christians, undoubtedly zealous for truth and right, as the conduct of "a very poor, paltry earthworm, displaying cowardly pusillanimity of soul," in the cause of [right to his own sake."] But, on the other hand, with more reverence, more kindness, and quite as much probability, Waterland, who is no indiscriminate apolo-gist for the errors of good men, after a minute examination of the circumstances, concludes that the patriarch died not, on account of the difficulty of the oath, as so long as it could lawfully be evaded, and to await and see whether divine Providence might not, some way or other, interpose before the last extremity. The event answered.
God did interpose" (Scripture Vindicated, in Works, iv, 1816, 490).

There is no improbability, as has been asserted, that the same sort of event should happen in rude times at different intervals, and, therefore, no reason for maintaining that these events have the same historical basis, and are, in fact, the same event differently represented.
Neither is it an unfair assumption that Abraham headed the title of the kings of the earth, as Pharaoh was of the kings of Egypt, or that it may have been the proper name of several kings in succession, as George has been of several English kings.

In all respects except this incident, Isaac's connection with the Philistine territory was every way creditable to himself, and marked with tokens of the divine favor.
He cultivated a portion of ground, and in the same year reaped a hundred fold—a remarkable increase, to encourage him to abide under God's protection in Canaan.
His flocks and herds multiplied exceedingly, so that he rose to the possession of very great wealth; he even became, on account of it, an object of sovay to the Philistines, who could not rest till they drove him from their territory. He reopened the wells which his father had digged, and which the Philistines had meanwhile filled up, and himself dug several new ones, but they disputed with him from the right of possession, and obliged him to withdraw from them one after another. Finally, at a greater distance, he dug a well, which he was allowed to keep un molested; and in token of his satisfaction at the peace he enjoyed, he called it Rehoboth (room) (Gen. xxi, 22). Thence he returned to Beersheba, where, it is supposed, the Lord again appeared to him, and gave him fresh assurance of the covenant-blessing; and Abime-lech, partly ashamed of the unk ikind treatment Isaac had received, and partly desirous of standing well with one who was so evidently prospering in his course, sent some of his leading men to enter formally into a covenant of peace with him. Isaac showed his meek and kindly disposition in giving courteous entertainment to the messengers, and cordially agreed to their proposal.
It was probably a period considerably later still than even the latest of these transactions to which the next notice in the life of Isaac must be referred. This is the marriage of Isaac to two of the daughters of Canaan (Judith and Basemeth). When Isaac was about forty years of age, his father Abraham died, and Isaac was in the forty-seventh year of his life, coeval with Isaac's hundredth.

These alliances were far from giving satisfaction to the aged patriarch; on the contrary, they were a grief of mind to him and his wife Rebekah (Gen. xxvi, 36).

The last portion of Isaac's life is connected with the blessing of his sons (Gen. xxvii, 1 sq.). B.C. 1927.
It has been plausibly suggested (Browne, Orbis Stoeck-run, p. 310) that the forebodings of a speedy demise (ver. 2) on the part of Isaac, whose health always apppears to have been delicate (Kitto's Daily Bible. [Part ad loc.]), may have arisen from the fact that his beloved Ishmael died at the age he had just now reached (Gen. xxv, 17), although he himself survived this point for many years (Gen. xxxvi, 28).

When old and dim of sight (which fails much sooner in Eastern countries than with us), supposing that the time of his departure was near, he sent for his son Esau, and sent him to "take some venison" for him, and to make his favorite "savoury meat," that he might eat and "bless" him before his death. Esau prepared to obey his father's will, and set forth to the field; but through the deceptive stratagem of Rebekah the "savory meat" was perverted into a dish of venison disguised as a to Esau, disguised so as to resemble his hairy brother, imposed on his father, and obtained the blessing. Yet, on the discovery of the cheat, when Esau brought in to his father the dish he had prepared, Isaac, remembering to bless Jacob, said to Esau, "The elder should serve the younger," and convinced that God intended the blessing for Jacob, would not, perhaps rather could not, reverse the solemn words he had uttered, but bestowed an infe-

This paternal blessing, if full, conveyed, as was usual, the right of headship in the family, together with the chief possessions. In the blessing which the aged patriarch pronounced on Jacob, it deserves notice how entirely the wishful-for-good is of an earthly and temporal nature, while the imagery which is employed serves to show the extent to which the poetical element prevailsl as a constituent part of the Hebrew orators' art (Gen. xxvii, 27 sq.). Most natural, too, is the extreme privation of the poor blind old man on discovering the cheat which had been put upon him. All the parties to this nefarious transaction were signally punished by divine vengeance (comp. Genesis, chap. xxvi, 24-7). The entire passage is of itself enough to vindicate the historical character and entire credibility of those sketches of the lives of the patriarchs which Genesis presents.

Yet Isaac's tacit acquiescence in the conduct of his sons has been brought into discussion. Fairbairn (Tyology, i, 384) seems scarcely justified by facts in his conclusion that the later days of Isaac did not fulfill the promise of his earlier; that, instead of reaching to high attainments in faith, he fell into general feebleness and decay moral and bodily, and made account only of the natural elements in judging of his son, which he took to the literal sense as a garbled translation (to modern ears) of"... prey taken in hunting," by "venison" (Gen. xxv, 28), may have contributed to, form, in the minds of English readers, a low opinion of Isaac. Nor can that opinion be supported by a reference to xxvii, 4; for Isaac's desire at such a time for savory meat may have sprung either from a natural element in judging of his son, or from that kind of impulse preceding inspiration as prompted Elisha (2 Kings iii, 15) to demand the soothing influence of music before he spoke the word of the Lord.
For sadness and grief are enumerated in the Psalms among the impediments to the exercise of the gift of prophecy
ISAAC

(Smith's Select Discourses, vi, 245). The reader who has in mind the peculiarities of Isaac's character will scarcely infer from those passages any fresh accession of mental or moral feellessness. Such a longing in an old man was innocent enough, and indicated nothing of a spirit of self-indulgence. It was an extraordinary case, and, too, and Kalisch sets it in its true light: "The venison is the fruit of his soil, and what is offered to the Lord is the fruit of the blessing, and ratifying the proceedings; and hence Jacob killed and prepared two kids of the goats (verse 9), whereas, for an ordinary meal, one would have been more than sufficient; it imparted to the ceremony, in certain respects, the character of a covenant (comp. xxii. 27-30; Exod. xii, 22; xxiv, 5-11, etc.); the one party showed ready obedience and sincere affection, while the other accepted the gift, and granted in return the whole store of happiness he was able to bequeath. Thus the meal which Isaac required has a double meaning, both connected with the internal organism of the book" (Comm. on Gen. xxvii, 1-4).

7. The stealing, on the part of Jacob, of his father's blessing having angered Esau, who seems to have looked forward to Isaac's death as affording an opportunity for taking vengeance on his unjust brother, the aged patriarch is led to entrust Isaac's blessing to Jacob by misrepresenting him. Jacob into Mesopotamia, that, after his own example, his son might take a wife from among his kindred and people, "of the daughters of Laban, thy mother's brother" (Gen. xxvii, 41-46). B.C. 1927. See JACOB. This is the last important act recorded of Isaac. Jacob, this is the most illustrious and the most typical of the teachers of the nation. An act of the utmost importance is here to the benefit of Jacob and his family, and to the exclusion of the Edomites. The event, however, is left unrecorded. The blessing of Isaac to Jacob may be viewed as a prophecy of the future. To Jacob, the seed and the promise were given. Jacob was the father of the twelve tribes of Israel.

In the N. T. reference is made to the offering of Isaac (Heb. xi, 17, and James ii, 21) and to his blessing his sons (Heb. xi, 20). As the child of the promise, and as the progenitor of the children of the promise, he is contrasted with Ishmael (Rom. ix, 7, 10; Gal. iv, 29; Heb. xi, 18). In our Lord's remarkable argument with the Sadaeeum, his history is carried beyond the point at which it is left in the O.T., into and beyond the grave. Isaac, of whom it was said (Gen. xxvii, 29) that he was gathered unto his people, is compared to another of the same name and authority he is proclaimed as an acknowledged heir of future glory (Matt. viii, 11, etc.).

II. His Character. Isaac, the gentle and dutiful son, the faithful and constant husband (see Becker, De Isaaco, etc., Griseaw, 1750), became the father of a house in which order did not reign. If there were any very prominent points in his character, they were not brought out by the circumstances in which he was placed. He appears less as a man of action than as a man of suffering, from which he is generally delivered without any direct effort of his own. This is opposed to the object of Ishmael's mocking, of the intended sacrifice on Moriah, of the rapacity of the Philistines, and of Jacob's stratagem. But the thought of his sufferings is effaced by the ever-present tokens of God's favor; and he suffers with the calmness and dignity of a conscious heir of heavenly promises, without uttering any complaint, and generally without committing any action by which he would forfeit respect. Free from violent passions, he was a man of constant, deep, and tender affections. Thus he mourned for his mother till her place was filled by his wife. His sons were nurtured at home till a late period of their lives; and neither his grief for Esau's marriage, nor the anxiety in which he was involved in consequence of Jacob's deceit, estranged either of them from his affectionate care. His life of solitary blamelessness must have been sustained by strong habitual piety, such as showed itself at the time of Rebekah's barrenness (Gen. xxvi, 1), in his special intercession with God at Gerar and Beersheba (xxxvi, 2, 29), in the solemnity with which he bestows his blessing and refuses to change it. His life, judged by a worldly standard, might seem inactive, ignoble, and unfruitful; but the "guileless years, prayers, gracious acts, and daily thank-offerings of pastoral life" are not to be so esteemed, as to make no shadow of meaning. He, as a character, may not have exercised any commanding influence upon either his own or succeeding generations, but it was sufficiently marked and consistent to win respect and envy from his contemporaries. By his posterity his name is joined in equity honored with those of Abraham and Jacob, and so was esteemed as part of the formula which Egyptian magicians in the time of Origen (Contra Celsum, i, 22) employed as efficacious to bind the demons whom they adjured (comp. Gen. xxxi, 42, 50).

If Abraham's enterprises, unsettled life foreshadowed the early history of his descendants; if Jacob was a type of the careful, commercial, warlike character of their later days, Isaac may represent the middle period, in which they lived apart from nations, and enjoyed possession of the fertile land of promise. (See KALISCH, ad loc.)

III. The typical view of Isaac is barely referred to in the N.T., but it is drawn out with minute particularity by Philo and those interpreters of Scripture who were influenced by Alexandrian philosophy. Thus in Philo, Isaac (laughter = the most exquisite enjoyment = the source of joy, and in Philo's and the rest of the pious Israelites, at their home, the word is shadowed in the facts that his father had attained 100 years (the perfect number) when he was born, and that he is specially designated as given to his parents by God. His birth from the mistress of Abraham's household symbolizes happiness proceeding from a predominant wish. In Tertullian he is a pattern of monogamy, and a type of Christ bearing the cross. But Clement of Alexandria finds an allegorical meaning in the incidents which connect Abimelech with Isaac and Rebekah (Gen. xxvi, 8), as well as in the offering of Isaac. In this latter view he is followed by Origen, and by Augustine, and by Christian expositors generally. The most minute particulars of that transaction are invested with a spiritual meaning by such writers as Rabanus Maurus, in Gen. § 111. Abraham is made a type of the first person in the blessed Trinity, Isaac of the second; the two servants dismissed are the Jewish sects who did not attain to a perception of Christ's humiliation; the ass bearing the wood is the Jewish nation, to whom were committed the oracles of God which they failed to understand; the three days are the Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Christian dispensations; the ram is the Lord's Christ on the cross; the fire of Jehovah in him. Modern English writers hold firmly the typical significance of the transaction, without extending it into such detail (see Pearson, On the Creed, i, 243, 251, edit. 1843; Fairbairn's Typology, i, 392). A recent writer (A. Jukes, Types of Genesis), who has shown much ingenuity in attaching a spiritual meaning to the characters and incidents in the book of Genesis, regards Isaac as representing the spirit of sonship, in a series in which Adam represents human nature, Cain the carnal mind, Abel the spiritual, Noah regeneration, Abraham the spirit of faith, Jacob the spirit of service, Joseph suffering or glory. With these series may be compared the view of Ewald (Gesch. i, 387-400), in which the whole patriarchal family is a prefigurative group, comprising twelve members with seven distinct modes of relation: 1. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are three fathers, respectively personifying active power, quiet enjoyment, success after struggles, distinguished from the rest as Ag aumento, the head of the Ulysses and the heroes of the Trojan Ilid, or as the Trojan Anchises, Eneas, and Ascanius, and mutually related as Romulus, Remus, and Numus; 2. Sarah, with Hagar, as mother and mistress of the household; 3. Isaac as child; 4. Isaac with Rebekah as the type of wedlock (comp. his Aetherium); p. 288); 5. Leah and Rachel thing with the same way; 6. Deborah as nurse (compare Anna and Caleb, Ann. iv, 654, and vii, 1); 7. Eliezer as steward, whose office is compared to that of the messenger of the Olympic deities.

IV. Traditions.—Jewish legends represent Isaac as an angel made before the world, and as residing in human form (Origen, in Johann. ii, § 25); as one of the three men in whom human sinfulness has no place, as one of the six over whom the angel of death has no power (Eisenmenger, Entd. Jud. i, 343, 964). He is said to have been instructed in divine knowledge by Shem (Judith x. 12). The ordinance of the evening prayer is ascribed to him (Gen. xxiv, 63), as that of morning prayer to Abraham (xix, 27), and that night prayer to Jacob (xxxvii, 11) (Eisenmenger, Ent. Jud. i, 483).

The Arabian traditions included in the Koran represent Isaac as a model of religion, a righteous person in spirit in Syriac, to do good works, and give alms and give alms (xxi, 68), endowed with the divine gifts of prophecy, children, and wealth (ch. xix). The promise of Isaac and the offering of Isaac are also mentioned (ch. xx, 38). Faith in a future resurrection is ascribed to Abraham: but it is connected, not, as in Heb. xi, 19, with the offering of Isaac, but with a notorious miracle (chap. ii). Stanley mentions a curious tradition of the reputed jealousy of Isaac's character that prevails among the inhabitants of Hebron respecting the grave of Rebekah (Jewish Church, i, 496 sq.). On the notices of Isaac in the Talmud, see Otho's Lex. Talm. p. 138; Hamburg, Hebr. Lex. s. v. Bittel u. Talmud, p. 62 s.; for the notices in the Koran, see Hottinger's Hist. Orient. p. 25, 52). See Bouchier, History of Isaac (London, 1864). For older treatises, see Darling, Cyclop. Bibliograph. col. 190.

Isaac, bishop of Langres, France, is supposed to have been present at the Council of kierry in 846, as described in the death of the St. Aulubalba, Waltze seized the bishopric of Langres in spite of all opposing causes; but Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, declared against him, and Charles the Bald compelled him to flee. Hilduin, lay abbot of St. Denis, then proposed Isaac as bishop, and by his influence caused him to be appointed. Isaac was ordained bishop of Langres about 856. We afterwards find his name in the councils of Toul and Langres (859), of Tousy (860), of Pistes (862), of Verberie, and of Soissons (866)—an evidence that he had gained great consideration and influence. His mildness caused him to be surmounted, and the mantle of the Church of Dillingen fell upon him highly. A lasting monument of his efforts to effect a reform among the monastic orders is his work on Canons, published by Sirmond, Conciles, vol. iii; Labbe, Concil. etc.; Baluze, Constitutions, vol. ii. See Grätz Christ. vol. v, col. 888; Hist. lit. de la France, v, 928; Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. de l'Antiqu. xvi, 4. (J. N. P.)

Isaac the Syrian (c), with the surname of Doctor or Magnus, because of his ability of an ecclesiastical writer, who flourished in the first half of the 5th century, was, in all probability, a native of Syria. He was at first a monk in a convent not far from Gabala, in Phocis, and afterwards became a priest at Antioch. He died about 456. He wrote several theological pamphlets in Syriac (and perhaps also in Greek), directed chiefly against the Nestorians and Eutychians. A work on the Contempt of the World would be considered as his chief claim to reputation, but the authorship of this book is not at all well established. It is by some supposed to have been written by the other Isaac the Syrian (see next art.). There seem to be better grounds for considering him as the author of the treatise De Cogitatione Chrestos, and the two books of the Asceticon of Petrus. In the library of the Vatican contains some other MS. works of Isaac. He is honored as a saint both by the Maronites and Jacobites of Syria. See Gemmians, De Script. Eccles.; Cave, Hist. Litera- ria; Fabricius, Biblicum, Graece, xii, 314; Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 8; Jocher, Geol. Letr. ii, 191.

Isaac the Syrian (d), generally with the surname of Ninivita, an ecclesiastical writer of the 5th century, became bishop of Nineveh, but afterwards resigned his office to enter a convent, of which he was subsequently chosen abbot. He died towards the close of the 6th century. He is generally, and, as it seems, justly considered as the author of the treatise De Contemptus Mundi, de Operacione corporali et sui Abjectione Liber, which may be found in the Orthodogogia (second edition, Basle, 1569), Bibliotheca Patrum (of Cologne, vol. vi), Bibliotheca Patrum (of Paris, vol. v), Bibliotheca nova- sina (of Lyona, vol. xi), and in Galland, Bibliotheca Pa- trum (vol. xii). All these collections contain a Greek text with a Latin translation, yet the former appears itself to be a translation from the Syriac. There are twenty-seven ascetic sermons of his in Greek (in MSS. in the British Museum and some manuscripts (MSS. in the Bolleian Library). See Cave, Hist. Liter.; Fabricius, Biblic. Graece, xi, 215; Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Général., 4; Jocher, Geol. Letr. ii, 191.

Isaac Aboa, a Spanish Jew of some distinction as a commentator and preacher, was born, according to Gratzi, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 225), in 1409, and succeeded the celebrated Isaac of Campanotto as Gaon of Castile. He died in 1449. Aboa wrote, besides super commentaries to the commentaries of Rashi and Nachman, Zurim or Homilies, with free Use of the Hagadah, edited by Gemshon Soncini (Constantinople, 1588, 4to); Zolkiev, 1800, with notes; a number of other works that have frequently been attributed to the pen of this Isaac, which Dr. Zum assigns, as Gratzi believes very properly, to another Isaac Aboa, who flourished about 1300-1820. Among these, the most important, which First (Bibliotheca Judice, 4, 4 sq.) assigns to the present Isaac, is entitled Nissin-ji, a haggadic or ethical treatise on the Talmud and Midrashim, in seven sections (published at Venice, 1544, fol., and several times later: also with a Heb. commentary by Frankfurter, Amsterdam, 1701, 8vo; and by others with Spanish, Hebrew, German, and High-German translations at different times and places). (J. H. W.)

Isaac Albalad, a Jewish philosopher of some note, died during the latter half of the 13th century. He was a contemporary of the celebrated Falaquera, and, like him, well versed in Arabic philosophy. Albalad possessed greater natural endowments than Falaquera, but, wanting that independence of mind which made the latter so justly celebrated, he failed to take as prominent a position. He died about 1294. About 1292 he edited and improved Alghazali's Makanid Alphilosophia, under the title of al-Andalib. A part of it has been published by Schorr in Chalde, iv (1859) and vi (1861). See Gratzi, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 226 sq. (J. H. W.)

Isaac Argyrus, a Greek monk who flourished in the latter half of the 14th century at St. Eune, in Thessalia, wrote about 1373, when he is said to have been at the age of sixty, Computa Gracorum de sollemnitate paschain celeberrimi, published in Greek and Latin by J. Christmann (Heidelberg, 1611, 4to), and inserted by Dionysianus Petavius in his De Doctrina temporum (iii, 359).

He is also supposed to be the author of a work still in MS. form on astronomy. Of Isaac's personal history but little is clearly known.—Jöcher, Gelehr. Lex. ii, 1894; Machmuhl, Eccl. Hist. bk. iii, cent. xiv, pt ii, ch. ii. (J. H. W.)

Isaac ben-Abba-Mare, a Jewish exponent of the Talmud, was born at Bourg des St. Gilles, France, in 1135. His father was an officer under the government of the count of Toulouse, and afforded Isaac even more opportunity for distinction by devoting himself to the study of the Talmud under the celebrited Rabbi Tam of Rameru. When only seventeen years old he prepared a compendium of certain ritualistic laws of the Jews, in which he evinced thorough famil-arity with the Talmud. He also wrote a commentary on one of the most difficult parts of the Talmud, and finally collected all his investigations on the Jewish traditions under the title of דקדוקי (probably in 1179). It was incompletely published by Josef ben-Saruk (Ven.
1608; and since then, Warszawa, 1801), See Grätz,

Isaac ben-Abraham, a distinguished Jewish Rabbi of the Karaitic sect, was born at Trock, near Wil-na (Lithuania) about 1588. He is especially celebrated as the author of a work against Christianity, entitled מנון מהלך, Chizzik Amanun (minimen fida), written in 1593. It is divided into two parts: the first, containing fifty chapters, consists of an apology for Judaism, and a general attack on the Christian faith; the second contains a criticism of the examination of the hundred phrases of the N. T., intended by the writer to refute the proofs adduced by Christians from the Old Test. It is considered, next to the productions of Duran (q. v.), the ablest work ever written by any Jew against the Christian religion. It was first published by Wagensell, with a Latin translation, in the Tela igura Sittanen (Allendorf, 1682, 4to), from a MS. obtained from an African Jew, which, as Grätz asserts, was imperfect. The Hebrew text was afterwards reprinted by the Jews (Amsterdam, 1705, 12mo), and by Gousset, with a Latin translation and a refutation (Amst. 1717, 8vo); into German by Leu (1717), and by Alu (1718). The latter attack the works written in answer to it, which deserve especial mention, besides those named above, are J. Müller, Conflutio libri Chizzik Emuna (Hamb. 1644, 4to); Gebhard, Isaac ben-Abraham Alkhrish, a Jewish writer of considerable note, was born about 1489, in Spain; the name of the place is not known to us. He was lane on both feet, but this minded condition by no means prevented him from acquiring great learning; nay, he even travelled in learning, and enjoyed the privi-gees of a great scholar. When yet a boy, the persecutions of the Jews by the Spaniards obliged him to leave his native land (1492), and he removed to Naples. But he also here he and his coreligionists were sorely tried by persecution, and again he fled; this time from country to country. As he was unable to understand the languages he did not understand, and whose inhabitants spared neither the aged nor the young,” until he finally found a home in the house of a banished coreligionist in far-off Egypt. After a stay of some ten years he removed to Palestine, and finally settled in Turkey, where he was honored with the instruction of one of the princes of the realm. He died after 1677. His works are בְּנַחֲלוּת, or on Jewish Reign during the Exile; containing (1) the correspondence of Chasdei ben Joseph; (2) the reign of the Chassars; (3) תְּרוּפָּה, or during the reign of Persians; also the history of Bastaani, etc. (Constant. 15, 8vo; Basle, 1569, 8vo; and with a work of Farsaolo, Offenb. 1720, 12mo).

Isaac ben-Elia ben-Samuvel, a Jewish commentator who flourished in the beginning of the 18th century, deserves our notice as the author of (1) A Commentary on the Psalms, published at Dyrenfert, under the title of הַקְּנֵי הַעֲשָׁר, the Psalms with a valuable catena (1728), consisting of excerpts from the celebrated expositions of Rashi, D. Kimchi, etc., giving also an abridgment of Alsheich’s commentary, entitled מדרש הַעֲשָׁר, and a German explanation of the difficult words. (2) A Commentary on Proverbs, entitled שְׂפָתָאנוֹת, Proverbs with a valuable catena (Wandbeck, 1730–51), composed of excerpts from the expositions of Rashi, Ibn D. Kimchi, Ibn Joseph, Ibn Ahun, Solomon ben-Melech, giving also a German explanation of the difficult expressions, and an abridgment of Alsheich’s exposition called קָנֶה הַסּוֹפֵות; and (3) A Commentary on the Subbatic Lessons from the Prophets, entitled הַמְּצוֹאֵי הַסּוֹפֵות, the face of Isaac (Wandbeck, 1730), which consists of excerpts from nine of the most distinguished commentators, viz. Rashi, Ibn Ezra, D. Kimchi, Levi b.-Gershon, Ababanel, Alsheich, Samuel b.-Laniado, J. Arama, and one of the Alsheich’s brethren. Its aim seems to be to give the Biblical student to see on one page the expositions of the best and most famous Jewish commentators on every difficult passage, without being obliged to search for them in inaccessible and costly volumes.—Kitto, Bibinical Cyclopedia, ii, 410.

Isaac ben-Jacob Alfasii or Alcalai, one of the most distinguished Talmudical scholars of the Middle Ages, was born at Calsa-Hammad, near Fez, in Africa, about 1018. It had been the custom among Jewish Rabbi to follow in the interpretation of the Talmud the decisions of the Gaonim, and thus direct inquiry and independence of thought had well-nigh become not only obsolete, but even impossible. But when Alfasii had become sufficiently familiar with the Talmudic writings to make his voice heard among his Jewish brethren, he evinced such an independence of thought, and a mind of such penetration, that he was soon acknowledged not only on Africa’s shore, but even on the other side of the sea, by Spain’s Jewish savans, as one of the ablest interpreters of their tradition. A work which he published at this time, הַפּוֹתְרֵי הַלְּכָהָכָה or the Hakacha’s of the whole Talmud, intended as a Talmudical compendium (published at Gnesen, 1597; Basle, 1598), has since preserved its authority even to the present day, still further increased his renown. During a time of persecution (1588), being obliged to flee his native country, he sought refuge in Cordova, and there he was received with great honor. But his distinction as a Talmudist, and the kind of success which he obtained, made him have annoyed some of the more distinguished Rabbi of Spain. A controversy, into which he was unwillinglly drawn, with Ibn-Gia and Ibn-Abalda, became especially severe. After the death of Ibn-Gia, he removed to Lucena, where he was then appointed the successor of his former opponent. But his controversy with Ibn-Alba-da continued until the death of the latter (1594), when Alfasi adopted a son of Ibn-Albaida, and made him one of his most faithful adherents. He died in 1108. A list of the different editions of his works may be found in Fürst, Bibliotheca Judæica, i, 34 sq. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, vi, 76 sq., 92 sq.; Munk, Notices auf Aboualeulid, p. 4 sq.; von der Lühe, Léonard Kadmonjel, text No. 210, and note X.

Isaac ben-Joseph, called also Isaac de Corbeil, was born in Corbeil, a city in France, towards the beginning of the 13th century, and died in 1280 according to Rosé (Jachia Ghebalia and Abraham Zakuth say, the one 1240, the other 1270). He is the author of the celebrated work entitled סַּפְרֵי הַמָּשֶׁהָ בְּגֵדָלָה (Sepher Midrash Gadol) of Moses of Coucy, and is known also by the name of Semak (from the initials of the three Hebrew words Sepher Mısdeth Katon). It contains a synopsis of the precepts of the Jewish religion. It is divided into seven parts, each containing regulations for one day of the week. Isaac wrote it in 1277, at the request of the French Jews, who desired to have a clear and convenient manual to guide them in matters pertaining to their religion. It is also known under the Latin title of Columnae capriciætatis, and still more frequently as De Universo Gentium in Vanus. Several other copies of it were made by French as well as German Rabbis. Jekutiel Salmon ben-Mose, of Posen, made a compendium of the work (Cracow, 1579, 4to). See Bar-tolocci, Magna Biblioth. Rabbin.; Wolf, Biblioth. Isaac ben-Latif or Allatif, a Jewish philosopher of some note, was born about 1270, somewhere in the southern part of Spain. Of his early history scarcely anything is now known. But some of his works have been preserved, and from notices of distinguished contemporaries we learn that he was inclined to favor the Cabalists (q. v.). He is highly spoken of by the Rabbins of his day, but evidently, judging from his works, was rather two-sided on all cabalistic points, so that he may most appropriately be said to have stood "within one foot in philosophy, and with the other in the Cabala." He died some time in the first half of the 14th century. Of his works are printed בִּית הַגּוֹדַלְתֶּךָ (Bith ha-Gadol), a Commentary on Kohlet (Constantinople, 1504, 4vo); הַגּוֹדִילֵךְ (Hagodil), a Cosmology (Vien. 1625, edited by S. Stern); קֵּדוֹשׁ וּמְכֻרָה (Kadosh U-Mekara), a work on Dogmatics, Religious Philosophy, and the Physical Sciences, in 4 parts; מַעְלֵיה (Maalai), a History of Man; etc. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 220 sq.; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenjum, iii, 80; Sachs, Kerem Chezmed, viii, 88 sq.; Fürst, Bibliotheca Judæica, ii, 224.

Isaac ben-Moses, also called Avot, who flourished in the latter half of the 13th century, deserves our notice as the author of (1) a Commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled בִּית הַגּוֹדִילֵךְ (Bith ha-Godil), or Consolations of God (Salem, 1578-9); and (2) a Commentary on Ecclesiastes entitled בַּקְטָאָב הָעֵרֵכָה (Bekta-Av Harok), or the Gatherer of the Congregation (ibid, 1597), which are both valuable contributions to the exegetical literature of the O.T. Scriptures. See Kitto, Bibl. Cyclop., ii, 410; Steinheimmer, Cudot. Lit. Heb., Iom. 139.

Isaac ben-Schechesch (Barfayt), one of the most distinguished Rabbis of the 14th century, was born about 1310, at or near Saragossa (Spain). He presided over the congregation at Saragossa for a number of years, and when, in 1391, the persecutions instituted against the Jews made it impossible for him to remain, he removed to Algiers, where he continued to hold a like position until his death, about 1444, and appointed Eliezer Ibn-Dakr'son as his successor. See Celebrated Jewish Da- ran (q. v.). He was especially celebrated for his thorough acquaintance with Jewish tradition. Not only from all parts of Spain, but from the different parts of Europe, he was constantly invited to express his opinion on the meaning of obscure Talmudical passages. These were, however, only a very small percentage of the source for the study of the interpretation of the Talmud, and convey at the same time a pretty accurate idea of the state of the Jews in his day, not only in Spain and Algiers, but in France and even other countries as well. His works are הַגּוֹדִילֵךְ, a collection of Hala- coth (edited by Samuel Levi in 2 parts, Constantinople, 1547, fol. and often); הָעֵרֵכָה, or Commentary on the Pentateuch, written from the Commentary he also, a work on the Talmud. The latter two, we think, still remain in MS. form. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 33 sq., 109 sq.; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenjum, iii, 87; Fürst, Biblioth. Judæica, ii, 145.

Isaac ben-Suleiman (Salamo) Israel, a Jewish philosopher and philologist, was born in Egypt about 845. He was a physician by profession, and as such attained to very high distinction, serving from 904 to his death at Cairo, as private physician to the reigning prince, and celebrated as the author of several medical works valuable even in our day. But as also philologist and philosopher he attained great notoriety, more particularly as the author of a philosophical commentary on the first chapters of Genesis, treating of the creation of which, however, only a part is now extant. It bore the title of Sefer Jesirah, whence the error that he wrote a commentary on the book Jesirah. He died about 940. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, v, 282 sq. (J. H. W.)

Isaac, Daniel, a prominent Methodist minister, commonly designated as the Wesleyan "Polemic Divine." He flourished in England, July 7, 1778. He was early devoted to books, and, on his conversion in his nineteenth year, at home determined to devote his life to the work of the Christian ministry. In 1800 he joined the Conference on probation, supplying at this time a vacancy on Grimsby Circuit, and was urged to give due distinction to his brethren in the ministry, and was appointed to some of the most prominent charges at the command of his denomination. May 20, 1832, while in Manchester preaching in behalf of the Sunday-school work, he was seized with paralysis from the effects of which he never recovered. At the session of the next Conference he was present, and believed himself sufficiently recovered to re-enter upon active work, and was appointed to York Circuit, an old and favorite circuit, to which he was now sent for the third time. But he began to fail fast, and died in the midst of his work, March 21, 1834. Speaking of the abilities of Daniel Isaac, the Rev. Samuel Dunn says: "He was an independent thinker, acute reasoner, formidable opponent, dexterous polemic, sound theologian, striking, instructive, extemporaneous preacher, perspicacious writer, generous benefactor, faithful friend, and valuable Christian." His life was original, subtle, analogical, penetrating, clear, strong. His manner was deliberate, grave, conversational, pointed, humorous, sarcastic, ironical. The sagacious Henry Moore remarked: Daniel Isaac, like Paul, reasoned with his hearers out of the Scriptures; and he kept in them, and not out of them, and never in and not of himself. If at any time he drew a smile from his hearers, he would maintain the utmost gravity He displayed great power in grappling with the conscience, and in bringing to light the hidden things of darkness. Of the ludicrous he had a marvellous perception, and could present an object in such a light as to excite the indignation or the loathing of those who before admired it. He painted from life. Many hearers were disgruntled with their own likeness as they saw it in the clear mirror of his style. He was of medium height, but his forehead was very high and arched. He had an olive complexion, and his hair was black and inclined to curl. In debate he was remarkably cool, calm, collected, keen, argumentative, and short. There was no trebling hesitancy, quibbling, or artifice. He engaged in no sham fight; never brandished the sword at a distance, but came at once to sharp quarters, grappled with his antagonist, and pierced his vital points in "the arm of the heart," or music, or art. But the great strength of Daniel Isaac lay in his pen, and he wielded it with especial ability in matters of controversy. His works are, Universal Restoration (N. Y. 1839, 12mo), in which he meets the objections of the Universalists to the eternity of punishment—Sermons on the Person of our Lord Jesus Christ (Lond. 1815) ; Ecclesiastical Claims (Lond. 1816), the views of which his Conference disproved, but to which, in a reply, he steadfastly adhered. Dr. George Smith (History of Wesleyan Methodism, iii, 7) says of his work "It is a book, and published whilst it is in many important respects the work does great credit to the author's industry and research. It contains the most convincing proofs, from Scripture and history, of the groundless character and the extravagant claims put forth on behalf of the ministerial order by Papists and High churchmen, and clearly and ably refutes the misrepresentations, impieties, and absurdities to which the admission of these claims must inevitably lead. But in doing this, Mr. Isaac went so far as to impugn the scriptural position of the Christian ministry as held by Wesley and the Methodist people. Nor is this the only serious defect in the work; some passages are very indecent and irreverent, if not, indeed, profane (from this charge, however, it should be said, others seek to clear Mr. Isaac) ; while, as stated in the resolution of the Conference, its "general spirit and style" are decidedly improper. The case is greatly to be regretted." Mr. Isaac did well in publishing his work, as he showed the Episcopalian in his Ecclesiastical Claims, the Lord have mercy upon us." Isaac also wrote pamphlets against the use of instrumental music in the house of God, and on the Leeds organ discussions. He edited the Life of his father, Memoirs of the Rev. John Struve, and published sketches of Lives of Robert Birkbeck, Corbet, and other old Divines. In 1826 he began, at the instance of the Rev. Samuel Dunn, a work on the Atone-ment, which made its appearance a few years after. His works were edited after his death by the venerable John Bardshill, and published at London (N. Y., 1840, 8vo). See Everett, Polemic Divine, or Memoirs, etc., of Rev. D. Isaac (Lond. 1839); Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 482 sqq. (J. H. W.)

ISAAC Ibn-Albalia, a Jewish writer of great distinction, was born at Cordova about 1855. He manifested at an early age superior talents and great thirst for learning. Besides the study of the Talmud, and of philosophy, he was eager for the acquisition of a thorough knowledge of astronomy and the mathematical sciences, and when thirty years old began a commentary on the most difficult parts of the Talmud, under the title Kegat ha-Rochelah, but it was so extensive a work that he did not live long enough to complete it. He also attempted an astronomical work on the principle of the Jewish mode of calculating the calendar, under the title Idibur (about 1065). Becoming a favorite of the reigning prince of Spain, he was honored with the distinguished position of nasi and grand rabbi of the Jews of that domain. He died about 1094. See Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 72. (J. H. W.)

ISAAC Israel ben-Josef, a very distinguished Jewish writer who flourished at Toledo in the first half of the 14th century (1800-1840), deserved our notice as the author of the book Leshon Rumi, or The Foundation of the World, a masterly production on Jewish chronology, including also the entire field of the science of astronomy, both theoretically and practically delineated (Berlin, 1777, 4to; and a better edition, ibid. 1848, 4to). This work, of which a part of the MS. has been preserved, was written about 1810 at the express wish of Israel's teacher, Asher ben-Jechiel. He also compiled tables of Jewish chronology under the title of Tereben Yisra’el (Zolkiew, 1805, 8vo, et al.), See Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 290; Carmoly, Itineraires, p. 224; B. ISAAC Levita, or JOHANN ISAAC LEVL, as he called himself after his change from Judaism, one of the most celebrated Jewish savans of the 16th century, was born at Wetzel in 1515. He was thoroughly prepared by his friends for the Rabbinoical office, and filled it for years with success; but, because of his consciousness of the truthfulness of the Christian interpretation of the Messianic predictions, he and his son both, after a careful and extended study of the prophecies, forsook the faith of their forefathers, and joined the Roman Catholic Church. Some Jewish writers have attributed this course to a desire for distinction in literary circles, which as a Jew was closed to him. But there is no reason to believe it other than the result of association with Christians, and the study of the writings of Christian commentators on the prophecies, especially of Isaiah (more particularly chapter iii), which is said first to have led him to a study of the Messianic predictions. After his conversion (1546) he was appointed professor of Hebrew and Chaldee at the city of Liwen, and in 1551 was called to a like position in the University of Cologne. He became a vigorous defender of the Hebrew text of the Bible, and replied to Lindanus, who had attacked it (in his De optimo Scripturis interpretandi genere, Cologne, 1548), in a work entitled Deenum Veritatis Hebraeus sacrarum scripturarum (Col. 1550). He published also the following works on Hebrew grammar, which rank among the best in that language:—(1) An Introduction to the Hebrew Grammar, and to the Art of Writing a pure Hebrew style, entitled Bein Eviyan (Col. 1553), in which he gave different specimens of Hebrew writing, dialogues, and epistles, both from the O. T. and other Hebrew writings, as well as the books of Obadiah and Jonah in Hebrew, with a Latin translation:—(2) A grammatical treatise entitled Meditationes Hebraicas in Artem Grammatic, per integram libros, Ruth et Esther inclusa; adjunctiones, in 9, 1. Förester Lexicon (Col. 1558), which consists of a useful analysis and excellent translation of the entire book of Ruth:—(3) Notes on Ceniardi Tabulam, etc. (Col. 1555), being annotations on Ceniardi's Tables of Hebrew Grammar:—(4) An excellent introduction to the end of Elias Levita's Chaldee Lexicon, entitled Syrius (Col. 1560). He likewise translated several scientific works written by Jews into Latin, and was an assistant to Paquinii on his great lexicographical work. See Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabb.; Jücher, Gelehr. ISAAC "the Blind," a Jewish writer of the 18th century (from 1190-1210), is noted as the reputed author of the modern kabbalistic work, "Issagora." Some writers, as is well known, assert that the Cabala originated with him, but this is doubted by the best authorities, and he is considered only to have been the first to give a new impulse to the study of this peculiar philosophical system, to oppose the inroads of Maimonides's (q.v.) philosophical interpretation of the Scriptures. It is certain, at least, that he had much to do with one of the mystical books of the Cabala, the "Sefer ha-Cabala." His theories were further developed after his death by his two disciples Ezra and Azariel of Zerona. Gritz (Gesch. d. Juden, v. 74 sq., 444 sq.) seems inclined to favor the ascription of Joseph ben Moses ben Me'ir of Rothenburg to the Cabala system was the production of Isaac the Blind, and that neither the sacred Scriptures nor Jewish tradition bear any reference to prove its earlier existence. Isabella of Castile, queen of Spain, one of the most celebrated characters of the 15th century, deserves our notice on account of the part she acted in the religious history of Spain, and those domestic subjects which, in her reign, were brought to a prosperous state. Isabella, born April 22, 1451, was the daughter of John II, king of Castile and Leon. In 1469 she married Ferdinand V, surnamed "the Catholic," king of Aragon. She was not the heir-apparent to the throne on the death of her father in 1481, as she had an elder sister named Juana, who died in her youth. The father of that band, a man of some sterling qualities, but of very little conscience, she succeeded in ascending the throne. Mr. Prescott and most modern historians seek to relieve her of the stigma that she was responsible for the cruelties that were inflicted on those of her subjects who chose to differ with the Church of Rome in their worship of their divine Maker. It seems certain that she was deceived by the Jesuits, and consented to these outrages only because, in her fervor for the Roman Catholic cause, she believed the very existence of the Church of Rome threatened; and, though she pity her weakness in the hour when resoluteness on her part was most needed to defend and protect her subjects, she saw that Spain once reformed, Romanism would have passed from the world in the 16th century, instead of still lingering in our midst at this late hour. But if we excuse the conduct of Isabella, still, Isabella of Castile and those domestic subjects which, in the writings of Rome seems also to have been the costume of Elijah, according to 2 Kings i, 8; and it was the dress of John the Baptist (Matt. iii, 4). Hair-sackcloth is in the Bible the symbol of repentance (compare Isa. xx, 11, 12, and 1 Kings xxii, 27). This costume of the prophet, worn in a sincere protest, a prophetic preaching by fact. Before he has opened his lips his external appearance proclaims meravenim, repent.

It is held traditionally that Isabella suffered martyrdom under the wicked Manasses, by being sewn into a garment of hair-sackcloth in the vicinity of Jerusalem (Gemara, Jebam, iv, 13; compare Synaked. c. 103 b, and the Targumim, in Amezched, Cat.Bibl. Vol. i, 452; Trypho, p. 349; Jerome, in Jes. iiri; Origen, in Psalm. xcviii, in Matt. xviii; Tertullian, Patient. xiv; Augustine, C. Det. xvii, 24; Chorin. Poosh, p. 155). The traditional spot of the martyrdom is a very old mulberry-tree which stands near the Pool of Siloam, on the slopes of Ophel, below the south-east wall of Jerusalem. A similar account of his death is contained in the Ascension of the Prophet Isaias, an apocryphal work, the Greek original of which was known to the early Church. (Epiph. Har. xii, 3; Jerome, in Jes. xlvir, 4, 6, 761, etc.), and of which only recently an Ethiopic version has been found and translated by Dr. Laurence, Oxford, 1819 (see Nitzach, in the Studia und Kritik, 1830, ii, 299; Engelhardt, Kirchengesch. lbr. viii, 204), the same fate of Isaias appears to be alluded to by Josephus (Ant. xvi, 3, 8).

II. Time of Isaias.—The heading of this book places the prophet under the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; and an examination of the prophetic writings seems to confirm this view. Chapter vi, in which is related the definite call of Isaias to his prophetic office, is thus headed: "In the year in which king Uzziah died I saw the Lord," etc. The collection of prophetic is, therefore, not chronologically arranged, and the utterances in the preceding chapters (i to vi) belong, for chronological and other reasons,

(A.D. 1230) says in his commentary on Isa. i, 1, "We know not his race, nor of what tribe he was." His father's name was Amoz (1, 1), whom the fathers of the Church confounded with the prophet Amos, because they were unacquainted with Hebrew, and in Greek the two names are spelled alike (so Clemen. Alex.; Jerome, Pref. in Am.; August. Cist. D. xvii, 37). See Amoz. The opinion of Josephus (Jew. Wars, Megilla, x, 2) that Isaias was the brother of king Amaziah rests also on a mere etymological combination (see Carpov, De regia Jesiata nataliostis, Rost. 1735). Isaias resided at Jerusalem, not far from the Temple (ch. vii). We learn from ch. viii and viii that he was married to a woman named Jashub, and that his son was called Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz. These significant names, which he gave to his sons, prove how much Isaias lived in his vocation. He did not consider his children as belonging merely to himself, but rendered them living admonitions to the people. In their names were contained the two chief points of his prophecetic utterances: one recalled to mind the severe and inevitable judgment wherewith the Lord was about to visit the world, and the other, the people; the other, which signifies "The remnant shall return, pointed out the mercy with which the remnant would return. Under the midst of apparent destruction, he would take care to preserve his people and his kingdom. Isaias calls his wife a prophetess. This indicates that his marriage-life was not only consistent with his vocation, but that it was intimately intertwined with it. This name cannot by any means be a mark of degradation, for a woman's prophetic gift, like Miriam, Deborah, and Huldah. The appellation here given denotes the suitableness as well as genuineness of their conjugal relation.

Even the dress of the prophet was subservient to his vocation. According to xx, 2, he wore a garment of hair-sackcloth, and to this garment both of Rome seems also to have been the costume of Elijah, according to 2 Kings i, 8; and it was the dress of John the Baptist (Matt. iii, 4). Hair-sackcloth is in the Bible the symbol of repentance (compare Isa. xx, 11, 12, and 1 Kings xxii, 27). This costume of the prophet, worn in a sincere protest, a prophetic preaching by fact. Before he has opened his lips his external appearance proclaims meravenim, repent.

It is held traditionally that Isaias suffered martyrdom under the wicked Manasses, by being sewn into a garment of hair-sackcloth in the vicinity of Jerusalem (Gemara, Jebam, iv, 13; compare Synaked. c. 103 b, and the Targumim, in Amezched, Cat.Bibl. Vol. i, 452; Trypho, p. 349; Jerome, in Jes. iiri; Origen, in Psalm. xcviii, in Matt. xviii; Tertullian, Patient. xiv; Augustine, C. Det. xvii, 24; Chorin. Poosh, p. 155). The traditional spot of the martyrdom is a very old mulberry-tree which stands near the Pool of Siloam, on the slopes of Ophel, below the south-east wall of Jerusalem. A similar account of his death is contained in the Ascension of the Prophet Isaias, an apocryphal work, the Greek original of which was known to the early Church. (Epiph. Har. xii, 3; Jerome, in Jes. xlvir, 4, 6, 761, etc.), and of which only recently an Ethiopic version has been found and translated by Dr. Laurence, Oxford, 1819 (see Nitzach, in the Studia und Kritik, 1830, ii, 299; Engelhardt, Kirchengesch. lbr. viii, 204), the same fate of Isaias appears to be alluded to by Josephus (Ant. xvi, 3, 8).

II. Time of Isaias.—The heading of this book places the prophet under the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; and an examination of the prophetic writings seems to confirm this view. Chapter vi, in which is related the definite call of Isaias to his prophetic office, is thus headed: "In the year in which king Uzziah died I saw the Lord," etc. The collection of prophetic is, therefore, not chronologically arranged, and the utterances in the preceding chapters (i to vi) belong, for chronological and other reasons, to the last year of the reign of Uziah, although the utterances in chapters ii, iii, iv, and v have been erroneously assigned to the reign of Jotham. As, however, the position of affairs was not materially changed under the reign of Jotham, we may say that the first chapter was uttered during that reign. The continuation of prophetic authorship, or the writing down of the prophecies, depended upon the commencement of new historical developments, such as took place under the reign of Ahaz and Hezekiah. Several prophecies (certainly, vii-x, 4, 1, 2-31; xvii) belong to the reign of Ahaz (xiv. 28-32, apparently to the reign of his death); and most of the subsequent prophecies to the reign of Hezekiah. The prophetic ministry of Isaiah under Hezekiah is also described in a historical section contained in chapters xxxvi-xxxix. The data which are contained in this section come down to the fifteenth year of the reign of Manasseh; consequently we are in the possession of historical documents proving that the prophetic ministry of Isaiah was in operation during about forty-five years, commencing in the year B.C. 756, and extending to the year B.C. 711. Of this period, at least one year belongs to the reign of Uziah, as is shown by the prophecy to his grandson, the reign of Ahaz, and fourteen and upwards to the reign of Hezekiah. It has been maintained, however, by Stüddin, Jahn, Berthold, Gesenius, and others, that Isaiah lived to a much later period, and that his life extended to the reign of Manasseh, the successor of Hezekiah. For this opinion the following reasons are adduced: (1) According to 2 Chron. xxxii, 32, Isaiah wrote the life of king Hezekiah. It would hence appear that he survived that king; although it must be admitted that in 2 Chron. xxxii, 32, where the biography of Hezekiah is mentioned, the unimportant words "first and last" are omitted; while in xvii, 22, we read, "Now the rest of the acts of Uziah, first and last, did Isaiah, the son of Amoz, write." (2) We find (as above stated) a tradition current in the Talmud, in the fathers, and in Oriental literature, that Isaiah suffered martyrdom under the reign of Manasseh by being slain asunder, which is supposed to harmonize with 2 Kings xxii, 16, "Moreover, Manasseh shed innocent blood very much.

(3) The authenticity of the second portion of the prophecies of Isaiah being admitted (see below), the nature of this portion would seem to confirm the idea that its author had lived under Manasseh. The style of the second portion, it is asserted, is so different from that of the first that both could not well have been composed by the same author, except under the supposition that a time elapsed between the composition of the first and second portion. The contents of the latter—such as the complaints respecting gross idolatry, the sacrifice of children to idols, the wickedness of rulers, etc.—seem to be applicable neither to the time of the exile, into which the prophet might have transported himself in the spirit, nor to the period of the pious Hezekiah, but are quite applicable to the reign of Manasseh. This last argument, however, is too subjective in its character to be of much weight; the difference of style referred to may be more readily accounted for in the difference in the topics treated of, and it is a gratuitous supposition that the national sins rebuked in the later prophecies had ceased during the reign of Hezekiah. The other arguments may be admitted so far as to allow a survivorship on the part of the prophet beyond the ackness of Hezekiah, and sufficiently into the reign of Manasseh to have suffered martyrdom at the order of the latter, but it does not appear that he uttered any predictions during the fifteen added years of Hezekiah; at least none are found extant that seem to belong to that period (except ch. xl to end, which may be assigned to the year ensuing Hezekiah's recovery); his great age and the absence of any special occasion may well account for his silence, and he may naturally be supposed to have occupied the time in writing down his former predictions. Nor will this view, which seems to meet all the requirements in the case, require to be extended a life-time; for if Isaiah, like Jeremiah, was called to the prophetic office in his youth, perhaps at twenty years of age, he would have been but eighty years old at the accession of Manasseh (B.C. 696), an age no greater than that of Hosea, whose prophecies extend over the same period of sixty years (Hos. i, 1).

III. Historical Works of Isaiah.—Besides the collection of prophecies which has been preserved to us, Isaiah also wrote two historical works (comp. Isa. xxxix, 3, 22). It was part of the vocation of the prophets to write the history of the kingdom of God, to exhibit in this history the workings of the law of retribution, and to exhort to the true worship of the Lord (see Augusti)}

The first historical work of Isaiah was a biography of king Uzziah (comp. 2 Chron. xxvi, 22), "Now the rest of the acts of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz, write." The second historical work of Isaiah was a biography of king Hezekiah, which was subsequently inserted in the annals of Judah and Israel. These annals consisted of a series of prophetic monographs, which were received partly entirely, partly in abstracts, and are the chief source from which the information in the Chronic was derived. In this work of Isaiah, although its contents were chiefly historical, numerous prophecies were inserted. Hence it is called in 2 Chron. xxxvi, 92, הַמּוֹדֵן, מִלְתָּה, The Vision of Isaiah. In a similar manner, the biography of Solomon by Ahijah is called in 2 Chron. ix, 29, "the prophecy of Ahijah." The two historical works of Isaiah were lost together with the annals of Judah and Israel, into which they were embodied. Whatever these annals contained that was of importance for all ages, has been preserved to us by being received into the historical books of the Old Testament, and the predictions of the most distinguished prophetic men have been formed into separate collections. After the book had been lost, care was taken to preserve the more diffuse annals, which also comprehended many statements, of value only for particular times and places.

The so-called "Ascension of Isaiah" is a pseudographical work of later times, originally written, it would seem, in Greek (Ασκαλαφος Ἰασίων), of which only an old Latin translation (Ascensio Isaiov) is known to scholars, until Bp. Laurence discovered and published the Ethiopic version (Oxford, 1819, 8vo). It has also been edited, with notes, etc., by Dillmann (Leips. 1877; 8vo), who has given a detailed account of the text, showing its dependence on the Book of Isaiah, Comment. at Isa. i, 5 sq.; Knobel, Prophet. ii, 176 sq.; Stichel, in the Hall. Encyclop. ii, xv, 571 sq.; Stuart's Comment. on the Apocalypse. Intro. IV. Integral Authenticity of the Prophecies of Isaiah. - The Jewish synagogue, and the Christian Church during all ages, have considered it as an undoubted fact that the prophecies which bear the name of Isaiah really originated from that prophet. Even Spinoza did not expressly assert, in his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (viii, 8), that the book of Isaiah consisted of a collection of prophecies by the several authors of the Old Testament. Although it is usually considered that he maintained this opinion. But in the last quarter of the 18th century this prevailing conviction appeared to some divines to be inconvenient. All those who attack the integral authenticity of Isaiah agree in regarding the book itself as an anthology, or gleanings of prophecies from several sources, especially of the Babylonian exile, although they differ in their opinions respecting the origin of this collection. Koppe gave gentle hints of this view, which was first explicitly supported by Eichhorn in his Introduction. Eichhorn advances the hypothesis that a collection of Isaiah prophecies (which might have been augmented, even before the Babylonian exile, by several not genuine additions) formed the basis of the present anthology, and that the collector, after the Babylonian exile, considering that the semil on which they were written did not form a volume proportionate to the size of the three other prophetic scrols, containing Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and the minor prophets, compiled a collection of prophecies from several sources, and added titles which were not known to the editors. In this supposition of the non-identity of date and authorship, many German scholars, and lately also Hitzig and Ewald, followed Eichhorn. Gesenius, on the contrary, maintains that all the Isaiah prophecies extant in that book originated from one author, and were of the same date. Umbreit and Köster on the main point follow Gesenius, considering chaps. xi to xlv to be a continuous whole, written by a pseudo-Isaiah who lived about the termination of the Babylonian exile. In reference to other portions of the book of Isaiah, the authenticity of which has been questioned, Umbreit expresses himself doubtingly, and Köster assigns them to Isaiah. Gesenius declines to answer the question how it happened that these portions were ascribed to Isaiah, but Hitzig felt that an answer to this question might be expected. He forcibly attempts to explain why such additions were made to Isaiah, and not to any of the other prophetic books, by the extraordinary veneration in which Isaiah was held. He says that the great authority of Isaiah occasioned important and distinguished prophecies to be placed in connection with him, and therefore he himself soon lost the force of his assertion by observing that the great authority of Isaiah was especially owing to those prophecies which were falsely ascribed to him. A considerable degree of suspicion must, however, attach to the boasted certainty of such critical investigations, if we notice that these learned men are arguing what is of Isaiah origin and what is not, although they are all linked together by the same fundamental tendency and interest. There are very few portions in the whole collection whose authenticity has not been called in question by some one or other of the various interpreters. Almost every part has been attacked either by Doderlein, or by Eichhorn (who, especially in a later work entitled Die Hebräischen Propheten, Götingen, 1816 to 1819, goes farther than all the others), or by Jung (who, among the earlier adversaries of the integral authenticity of Isaiah, uses, in his Verwichtung der Schriften in der Geschäftsliteratur, and most comprehensive and impartial, the best-grounded arguments), or by Paulus, Rosenmüller, Bauer, Berthold, De Wette, Gesenius, Hitzig, Ewald, Umbreit, or others. The only portions left to Isaiah are chaps. i, 3-9; xvii, xviii, xxvii, xxxi, and xxxiii. All the other chaps. are defended by some and rejected by others; they are also referred to with widely different dates. In the most modern criticism, however, we observe an inclination again to extend the sphere of Isaiah authenticity as much as the dogmatic principle and system of the critics will allow. Recent critics are therefore disposed to admit the genuineness of some portions of the Isaiah prophecies that are placed after the Babylonian exile, although it is only the exception of the two prophecies against Babylon in chaps. xii and xiii, and in chap. xxi, 1-10. Chapters xxviii-xxxiii are allowed to be Isaiah by Ewald, Umbreit, and others.

Divines who were not linked to these critics by the same tradition, although it is usually considered that the integrity of Isaiah, as Hesler (Jesuus un übersetzt 1788), Pippcr (Integritas Jesu, 1793), Beckhaus (Uber die Integrität der Prophetischen Schriften, 1796), Haun, in his Einleitung, who was the most able among the earlier advocates, Deresser, in his Bearbeitung des Jesu, iv, 215, and Grotius, in his De Isai, c. 6, 17, All these works have at present only a historical value, because they have been surpassed by two recent monographs. The first is by Jo. Ulrich Möller (De Authentia Ormonudarum Jesu, chap. xi-xiv, Copenhagen, 1825). Although this work professedly defends only the latter portion of the book of Isaiah, there occur in it many arguments applicable also to the first portion. The standard work on this subject is that of Kleinert (Die Aechtkeit des Jesajas, vol. i, Berlin, 1829). It is, however, very diffuse, and contains too many hypotheses. The comprehensive work of Schiller's (Ueberführung der Eintrübung gegen die Aechtseitungen der Werthung in Jesajas, chap. xiii and xiv) of course refers more especially to these chapters, but indirectly refers also to all the other portions whose authenticity has been attacked. Since the objections against the various parts of Isaiah are all of the same character, it is very inconsistent in Köstner, in his work Die Propheten des alten Testaments, to defend, in page 102, the genuineness of chapters xiii, xiv, and xxii, but nevertheless, in pages 117 and 297, to ascribe chap. xli-xlv to a pseudo Isaiah.

We have space here only to indicate the following reasons as establishing the integrity of the whole book, and as vindicating the authenticity of the second part:

1. Externally.—The unanimous testimony of Jewish and Christian tradition—Eccles. xviii, 24, 25, which manifestly (in the words παρέκλησις των παντινύμων ἐν Σωτ. et die tóis—τά εὐπρεπεά πρίν ἡ παραγένθια ἡ ἀποστολή ἑκάστην ἒκτην ἀπαραρτιάθεται) was apparently made of the second part by Jeremiah (x, 1-16; v, 25; xxx, 31, 1 l, li), Ezekiel (xiii, 40, 41), and Zephaniah (ii, 15; iii, 10). The decree of Cyrus in Ezra i, 2-4, which plainly is founded on Isa. xlv, 28; xlv, 1, 18, accords (Gen. xxxvii, 1) that the Jews accepted the book of Cyrus Isaiah's predictions as fulfilled. The inspired testimony of the N. T., which (Matt. iii, 3, and the parallel passages; Luke iv, 17; Acts viii, 29; Rom. x, 16, 19) quotes with specification of Isaiah's name prophecies found in the second part.

2. Internally.—The congruity of topic and sentiment in the last twenty-seven chapters with the preceding parts of the book. The oneness of diction which pervades the whole book. The peculiar elevation and grandeur of style, which, as is universally acknowledged, distinguishes the whole contents of the second part, and which were to appear in the golden age of Hebrew literature. The absence of any other name than Isaiah's claiming the authorship. At the time to which the composition is assigned, a Zechariah or a Malachi could gain a separate name and book; how was it that an author of such a name as Isaiah, and of such a character, and of such reputation, and of such a position in the temple, as Isaiah was, should be silent? The second portion, as it appears, was not written by Isaiah himself. The writer to whom the book is attributed, who was to be a bold and free expositor of its language, who was neither to be afraid of the great name of prophecy, nor to be the mere instrument of a prophet's spirit, who was to carry its message into the world, and to give its weight and sanction to the faith and principles it taught, who was to be the leader of the intellectual world, and to make itself the resource of the most powerful nations on earth, who was to become the apostle of a new world of nations, who was to be the great promoter of those great national and social changes which are yet to dawn on the world, who was to be the instrument of the most wonderful reformation, who was to be the means of bringing the most important religious revelations, of which Islamism is a very great, and of which Christianity is the greatest, of which all the great intellectual, political, and religious changes in the world are to be the results, was it not the most natural thing in the world that it should be written by Isaiah himself?

For a full vindication of the authenticity of Isaiah, besides the above works, see professor Stuart On the Old Testament, Canon, p. 103 sq., and Dr. Davidson in the new ed. of Horne's Introduction, i, 855 sq., in which latter, especially, copious references are made to the latest literature on the subject. Other writers who have taken the same side are especially Hengstenberg, in his Christology, vol. ii; Havernick, Einleitung, vol. iii (1849); Stier, in his Jesajas nicht Pseude-Jesajas (1850); and Keil, in his Einleitung (1859), in which last the reader will find a most satisfactory compendium of the controversy between the advocates of this conception and those who prefer the view of a chrestological origin.

V. Origin, Contents, and Style of the Composition.—No definite account respecting the method pursued in collecting into books the utterances of the prophets has been handed down to us. Concerning Isaiah as well as the rest, these accounts are wanting. We do not even know whether he collected his prophecies himself. But we have no decisive argument against this opinion, Those critics who reject the authenticity of the book are compelled to invent other authors, and, of course, different theories with respect to compilers. None of these have proved satisfactory. (See the authorities above referred to.) According to the Talmudists, the book of Isaiah was collected by the men of Hezekiah. But this assertion rests merely upon Prov. xxv, 1, where the men of Hezekiah are said to have compiled the Proverbs. To us it seems impossible that Isaiah left it to others to collect his prophecies into a volume, because we know that he was the author of historical works, and that he would not have submitted to literary occupation would have left to others to do what he could do much better himself.

Chaps. i-xv contain a series of rebukes, threatenings, and expostulations with the nation, especially Jerusalem its head, on account of the prevalent sins, and particularly idolatry. Chap. vi describes a theophany and the prophet's own call, in the last year of Uzziah (to which the preceding chapters may also be assigned, with the exception of chap. i, 2-31, which appears to belong to the first of Ahaz). What follows next, up to chap. x, belongs to the reign of Ahaz, and consists of a sublime picture of the future judgment of the world, the first instance by the deliverance from surrounding enemies (especially Damascus and Samaria), and eventually by the Messiah, who is prepared by historical signs. The same subject is treated in a similar manner in the succeeding chapters (xii-xiv), the deliverance from Assyria being treated as the historical type of this, the next portion appertaining to the reign of Hezekiah. Then follows a series of prophecies against foreign nations, in which the chronological arrangement has been departed from, and, instead of it, an arrangement according to contents has been adopted. In the days of Hezekiah, the nations of Western Asia, dwelling on the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, more and more resembled a threatening tempest. The prophetic gift of Isaiah was more fully unfolded in sight of the Assyrian invasion under the reign of Hezekiah. Isaiah, in a series of visions, describes what Assyria would do, as a chastising rod in the hand of the Lord, and what the successors of the Assyrians, the Chaldees, would perform, according to the decree of God, in order to realize divine justice on earth, as well among Israel as among the heathen. The prophet shows that mercy is hidden behind the clouds of divine wrath, and the appearance of the judgment is not to be slighted by the worshippers of the gods. In this and the following chapters there are several prophecies of which were uttered at various times prior to the Assyrian invasion, although isolated portions appear to belong to previous reigns (e.g. chap. xvii to the occasion of the alliance of Ahaz with Tiglath-pileser; chap. xiv, 28-32, to the death of Ahaz). With the termination of this work and the public life of Isaiah, who added a historical section in chaps. xxxvi-xlix, in order to facilitate the right understanding of the prophecies uttered by him during the most fertile period of his prophetical ministry. Then follows the conclusion of his work on earth (chap. xl to the end), composed during the peaceful residue of Hezekiah's reign, and containing a closely connected series of the most spiritual discourses touching the future history of the nation under the Messiah. This second part, which contains his prophetic legacy, is addressed to the people, and is not a collection of new prophecies, but is analogous to the last speeches of Moses in the fields of Moab, and to the last speeches of Christ in the circle of his disciples, related by John.

The proclamation of the Messiah is the inexhaustible source of consolation among the prophets. In Isaiah the Messiah is declared in clear, and to the Church were inclined to style him rather evangelist than prophet. The following are the outlines of Messianic prophecies in the book of Isaiah: A scion of David, springing from his family, after it has fallen into a very low estate, but being also of divine nature, shall, at first in lowliness, but as a prophet filled with the spirit of God, proclaim the divine doctrine, develop the law in the truth, and render it the animating principle of national life; he shall, as high-priest, by his vicarious suffering and his death, remove the guilt of his nation, and that of other nations, and finally rule as a mighty king, not only over the covenant-people, but over all nations of the earth who will subject themselves to his peaceful sceptre.....

He will make both the moral and the physical consequences of sin to cease; the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, and all enmity, hatred, and destruction shall be removed even from the brute creation. This is the survey of the Messianic kingdom as given by Isaiah, of which he constantly renders prominent those portions which were most calculated to impress the people under the then existing circumstances. The first part of Isaiah is directed to the whole people, consequently the glory of the Messiah is here dwelt upon. The fear lest the kingdom of God should be overwhelmed by the power of heathen nations is removed by pointing out the glorious king to come, who would elevate the now despised and apparently mean kingdom of God above all the kingdoms of this world. In the second part, which is more particularly directed to the Jews, the election of the entire nation, the prophet exhibits the Messiah more as a divine teacher and high-priest. The prophecy here speaks righteousness through the blood of the servant of God, who will support the weakness of sinners, and take upon himself their sorrows. The pure stands pre-eminent above all other prophets, as well as in the contents and spirit of his predictions, as also in their form and style. Simplicity, clearness, sublimity, and freshness, are the never-failing characters of his prophecies. Even Eichhorn mentions, among the first merits of Isaiah, the conciseness of his expressions, the beauty and outline of his images, and the fine execution of his speeches. In reference to richness of imagery he stands between Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Symbolic actions, which frequently occur in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, seldom occur in Isaiah. The same is the case with visions, strictly so called, of which there is only one, namely, that in chap. vi, and even it is distinguishable by its simplicity and clearness above that of the later prophets. But one characteristic of Isaiah is, that he likes to give signs—that is, a fact then present, or near at hand—as a pledge for the more distant futurity, and that he frequently assigns the foehn as the reason (comp. viii. 20; xxxvii. 30; xxxviii. 7 sq.). The instances in chaps. vii and xxxvii show how much he was convinced of his vocation, and in what intimacy he lived with the Lord, by whose assistance alone he could effect what he offers to do in the one passage, and what he grants in the other. The spiritual riches of the prophet are seen in the variety of his style, which always befits the subject. When he rebukes and threatens it is like a storm, and when he comforts his language is as tender and mild as (to use his own words) that of a mother comforting her son. With regard to style, Isaiah is comprehensive, and the other prophets divide his riches.

Isaiah enjoyed an authority proportionate to his gifts. We learn from history how great this authority was during his life, especially under the reign of Hezekiah. Several of his most definite prophecies were fulfilled while he was yet alive; for instance, the overthrow of the kingdoms of Syria and Israel; the restoration of the Asyrians, and the divine deliverance from it; the prolongation of life granted to Hezekiah; and several predictions against foreign nations. Isaiah is honorably mentioned in the historical books. The later prophets, while they usually bear the name of Hezekiah, Jeremiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, clearly prove that his book was diligently read, and that his prophecies were attentively studied. The authority of the prophet greatly increased after the fulfillment of his prophecies by the Babylonian exile, the victories of Cyrus, and the deliverance of the covenant-people. Even Cyrus (according to the account in Josephus, I. xvi. 11, 1 and 2) was induced to set the Jews at liberty by the prophecies of Isaiah concerning himself. Jesus Sirach (xlvii, 22-25) bestows splendid praise upon Isaiah, and both Philo and Josephus speak of him with great veneration. He attained the highest degree of authority after the times of the New Testament had proved the most important part of his prophecies to be fulfilled. The Christian Church, from the time of Christ and the apostles, quote no prophecies so frequently as those of Isaiah, in order to prove that he who had appeared was one and the same with him who had been promised. The fathers of the Church abound in praise of Isaiah—Elijah. See Messiah.

from his position, and, as is customary among Roman Catholics, deprived of his personal liberty on account of propagating and cherish heretical opinions. He was returned to the theological seminary for further instruction, and released two years after. In 1778, however, he appeared before the public, defending his own position under the title of Neuer Versuch über d. Wiss.jun- gen v. Immanuel (Coblentz). He had meanwhile been reappointed to the professional dignity, and his persistency in defending his peculiar interpretations again deprived him of his position, and he was once more imprisoned and put on trial. His book was forbidden to all good Roman Catholics by all archbishops and bishops, and in 1779 a bull was issued against it by the pope. In the interim he had made his escape from prison, but, finding the ecclesiastical authorities all opposed to him, he recalled his former opinion, and was honored with ecclesiastical dignity (1780). In 1803 his income was reduced to a small pension, and he lived in want until his death in 1818. Isenrich also wrote on the dialectical points under the title of Corpus decisionum dogmat- icorum. See Walch, Neueste Recht. Geschichte, viii. 9 sq.; Schleiermacher, d. Ref. vii. 203 sq.; Henkel, Kirchengesch. vii. 199 sq.; Fuhrmann, Handb. d. Kir- chengesch. ii. 507. (J. H. W.)

Isham, Chester, a Congregational minister, was born in 1788, and, after a course of preparatory study at the Latin Grammar School in Hartford, Conn., entered Yale College, where he graduated in 1820. Shortly afterwards he went to Andover Seminary to prepare for the ministry, upon which he had decided soon after his conversion while at Yale College. In 1824, on the completion of his theological course of study, he accepted a call to a newly-formed church at Taunton, where he had been preaching during the latter part of the last year spent at Andover. The great exertions with which the work demanded of him were too severe upon his constitution, and the symptoms of consumption appearing shortly after, he went South in the hope of recovering his health. He continued failing, however, and returned to Boston April 19th, to die among his friends. Dr. Leonard Bacon, who was a classmate of Chester Ish- am at Yale, speaks very highly of his attainments and religious bearing, in Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit, ii. 704 sq.

Isanekel (elect bond), a Russian sect which arose in 1666, under the fear that the printed Church books were tainted with error, since they differed from the old MS. copies which had been so long in use. They stood in the letter to the Scripture, deny different orders among the clergy, and any gradation of rank among the people, but under Alexander I obtained tolera- tion, though they had previously been exposed to constant persecution. See Eckardt, Modern Russia, s. v.

Ish'bah (Hebrew Yishbakh, יִשְׁבַּח, praiser; Sept. Ισαβή, a descendant of Judah, and founder ("father" of Eshthera (q. v.); he probably was a son of Mered by his wife Hodia (1 Chron. iv. 17). B.C. post 1619. See MEERED. He is perhaps the same as ISHI (q. v.) in verse 20, and apparently identical with the NAMAH (q. v.) of ver. 19.

Ish'baka'el (Heb. Yishbakeh, יִשְׁבְּקָאֵל, leaner; Sept. Ισαβακ, one of the sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chron. i. 32). B.C. post 2024. We are told that Abraham gave gifts to the sons of Keturah, "and sent them away from Isaac his son eastward, unto the east country" (Gen. xxv. 1-6). They settled in the region east of the Arabah, and near Mount Seir, and southward in the peninsula of Sinai (Gen. xxxvii. 28-36; Exod. iii. 1; Num. xxxi. 9, 10). See KETURAH.

It is a question whether the sons of this people are very obscure, and that it is only one who survived him (2 Sam. ii. 11). His name appears (1 Chron. viii. 35; ix. 39) to have been originally Esh- baal, בֶּן-אֶ-נָּבָל, "the man of Baal." Whether this indicates that Baal was used as equivalent to Jehovah, or that the reverence for Baal still lingered in Israelite families, is uncertain; but it can hardly be doubted that the name was only used by the people of Israel among themselves for the God of a remote past because the name is commonly known must have been substituted for the original word, with a view of removing the scandal- ous sound of Baal from the name of an Israelite king.
ISH-BOSHETH

(see Ewald, Int. Gesch. ii, 888), and superseded it by the contemporary title of Ish-bosheth ("shame") which was sometimes used as its equivalent in later times (Jer. iii, 54; xi, 13; Hos. ix, 10). A similar process appears in the alteration of Jerubbaal (Judg. viii, 35) into Jerub-besheth (2 Sam. xi, 21); Meri-baal (2 Sam. iv, 4) into Mephibosheth (1 Chron. viii, 34; ix, 40). The last three cases all occur in Saul's family three Stts. It is thought by some to be the same with Ithuri ("silver", 1 xiv, 49), these two names having considerable resemblance; but this is forbidden by 1 Sam. xxiii, 2, comp. with 1 Chron. vii, 33. See ABINADAR. He appears to have been forty years of age at the time of the battle of Gilboa (B.C. 1055), in which he was not himself present but was sent by his father in a similar manner to his brother Jonathan (1 Sam. xxx, 31), and thenceforth ceased to ascend the throne, as the eldest of the royal family, rather than Mephibosheth, son of his elder brother Jonathan, who was a child of five years old. Too feeble of himself to seize the sepoi of Saul, he was immediately taken under the care of Abner, his powerful kinsman, who brought him to the ancient sanctuary of Mahanaim, on the east of the Jordan, beyond the reach of the victorious Philistines, and he was there recognised as king by ten of the twelve tribes (2 Sam. ii, 7; iii, 17). There was no question even in those remote tribes whether they should not follow the offer of David to be their king (2 Sam. ii, 7; iii, 17). But this was overruled in favor of Ish-bosheth by Abner (2 Sam. iii, 17), who then for five years slowly but effectually restored the dominion of the house of Saul over the trans-Jordanic territory, the plain of Esdraelon, the central mountains of Ephraim, the frontier tribe of Benjamin, and eventually "over all Israel" (except the tribe of Judah, 2 Sam. iii, 9). In 2 Sam. ii, 10 Ish-bosheth is said to have reigned two years and six months; he can be understood as the successor of his father in his reign. As David reigned seven and a half years over Judah before he became king of all Israel upon the death of Ish-bosheth, it is conceived by the Jewish chronologer (Seder Olam Rabba, p. 37), as well as by Kimchi and others, that there was a vacancy of five years in the interregnum. This view was, it is true, that after his death five years elapsed before he was generally recognised as king of all Israel. If the reign of Ish-bosheth be limited to two years, the latter is doubtless the best way of accounting for the other five, since no ground of delay in the succession of Ish-bosheth is suggested in Scripture itself; for the claim of Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, which some have produced, being that of a lame boy five years old, whose father never reigned, against a king's son forty years of age, would have been deemed of little weight in Israel. Besides, our notions of Abner do not allow us to suppose that under him the question of the succession of the house of Saul had any part in the dispute. It is evident that he was a man of forty years of age, and it is possible that he had a son of the same age. However, the latter point is not important in the present discussion. It is sufficient to note that the reign of Ish-bosheth over Israel was nearly contemporaneous, namely, about seven years each; and that some will have it, two years—if a power so uncertain as his can be called a reign. Even the semblance of authority which he possessed he owed to the will and influence of Abner, who kept the real control of affairs in his own hands. The wars and negotiations with David were entirely carried on by Abner (2 Sam. ii, 11; iii, 8), when, shortly after the death of Saul, he made an attempt on his father's corpse, Rizpah, which, according to Oriental usage, amounted to treason (2 Sam. iii, 7; comp. 1 Kings ii, 13; 2 Sam. xvi, 21; xx, 8). Although accustomed to tremble before Abner, even Ish-bosheth's temper was roused to resentment by the discovery of his father's corpse; and thus is commenced the wrath of his late father Saul, which was in a peculiar manner sacred under his care as a son and a king. By this act Abner exposed the king to public contempt, if it did not indeed leave himself open to the suspicion of intend- ing to advance a claim to the crown on his own behalf. Abner resented this usurpation in a burst of passion, which vented itself in a solemn vow to transfer the kingdom from the house of Saul to the house of David, a purpose which from this time he appears steady to have kept in view. Ish-bosheth was too much cowed to answer; and shortly after, through the length of Abner's negotiation, David demanded the restoration of his former wife, Michal, he at once tore his sister from her reluctant husband, and committed her to Abner's charge (2 Sam. iii, 14, 15). It is, perhaps, right to attribute this act to his weakness; although, as David allows that he had done nothing in the cause, it may have been owing to his sense of justice. This trust seems to have given Abner a convenient opportunity to enter into negotiations with David; but in the midst of them he himself fell a victim to the resentment of Joab for the death of Abishai. The death of Abner deprived the house of Saul of the last of its remaining support. See ANNER. When Ish-bosheth heard of it, "his hands were feeble, and all the Israelites were troubled" (2 Sam. iv, 1). In this extremity of weakness he fell a victim, probably, to a revenge for a crime of his father. The guard of Ish-bosheth, as of Saul, was taken from their own royal tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. xi, 22). But among the sons of Benjam in were reckoned the descendants of the old Canaanitish inhabitants of Beeroth, one of the cities in league with Gibea (2 Sam. iv, 2, 3). Two of those Beerothites, Baana and Rechab, in remembrance, it was conjectured, of the murder of their kinsmen the Gibeonicites, determined to take advantage of the helplessness of the royal house to destroy the only representative that was left, excepting the child Mephibosheth (2 Sam. iv, 4). They were "chiefs of the marauding troops" which used from time to time to attack the territory of Judah (comp. 2 Sam. iv, 2; iii, 22, where the same word ע"ע is used; Vulg. principes latronum). They knew the habits of the king and court, and acted accordingly. In the stillness of an Eastern noon they entered the palace, as if to carry off the wheat which was piled up near the entrance. The female slave, who, as usual in Eastern houses, kept the house door, and was at work in the room, had, in the heat of the day, fallen asleep at her task (2 Sam. iv, 5, 6, in Sept. and Vulg.). They stole in, and passed into the royal bedchamber, where Ish-bosheth was asleep on his couch during his midday siesta. They stabbed him in the stomach, cut off his head, made their escape, all that afternoon, all that night, down the valley of the Jordan (Arabah, A.V. "plain;" 2 Sam. iv, 7), and presented the head to David as a welcome present. B.C. 1046. They met with a stern reception from the monarch, who—as both right feeling and good policy required—testified the utmost sorrow and concern. He relucted them for the child Mephibosheth's uncertain man, and ordered them to be executed; their hands and feet were cut off, and their bodies suspended over the tank at Hebron. The head of Ish-bosheth was carefully buried in the sepulchre of his great kinsman.

Ishmael (Heb. Yisha'meel, יִשְׁמָאֵל, heard by God; Sept.
Ισσαία, Ἰσσαίας, the name of several men.
1. Abraham's eldest son, born to him by the concu-bine Hagar (Gen. xvi, 15; xvii, 23). See Abraham: Hagar. It may here be remarked that the age attributed to him in Gen. xxxi, 14 is not inconsistent with Gen. xviii, 25 (see Tuch, Comm. p. 382). The story of his birth, as recorded in Gen. xvi, is in every respect characteristic of Eastern life and morals in the present age. The intense desire of both Abraham and Sarah for children; Sarah's gift of Hagar to Abraham as wife; the insouciance of the slave when suddenly raised to a place of importance; the jealousy and consequent tyranny of her high-spirited mistress; Hagar's flight, return, and submission to Sarah—for all these incidents we could easily find parallels in the modern history of every tribe in the desert of Arabia. The origin of the name Ishmael is thus explained. When Hagar fled from Sarah, the angel of the Lord found her by a fountain of water in the wilderness by the way of Shur . . . and he said, "Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael ('God hears', because of the Lord hath heard thy affliction") (Gen. xvi.
11). Hagar had evidently intended, when she fled, to return to her native country. But when the angel told her of the dignity in store for her as a mother, and the power to which her child, as the son of the great patriarch, was destined to rise, she was resolved to obey his voice, and to submit herself to Sarah (xvi, 10-18).

1. Ishmael was born at Mamre, in the eighty-sixth year of Abraham's age, eleven years after his arrival in Canaan, and fourteen before the birth of Isaac (xvi, 3; xvi, 6). B.C. 2078. No particulars of his early life occur. He preserved his circumcision when he was seven years of age (xvii, 25). B.C. 2065. His father was evi-ently strongly attached to him; for when an heir was promised through Sarah, he said, "Oh that Ishmael might live before thee!" (xvii, 18). Then were renewed to Abraham in more definite terms the promises made to Hagar regarding Ishmael: "As for Ishmael, I have heard thee; behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly: twelve princes shall he beget: and I will make him a great nation" (ver. 20). Before this time Abraham seems to have regarded his first-born child as the heir of the principle of his belief in which was centered the righteousness (xvi, 6); and although that faith shone yet more brightly after his passing weakness when Isaac was first promised, his love for Ishmael is recorded in the narrative of Sarah's expulsion of the latter: "And she was grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son" (xii, 11).

Ishmael seems to have remained in a great measure under the charge of his mother, who, knowing his destiny, would doubtless have him trained in such exercises as would fit him for successfully acting the part of a desert prince. He was engaged in every way by his father, encouraged to daring and adventure by the hardy nomads who fed and defended his father's flocks, and having a fitting field on that southern border-land for the play of his natural propensities, Ishmael grew up a true child of the desert—a wild and wayward boy. The perfect freedom of desert life, his con-continuance with those who looked up to him with mingled feelings of pride and affection as the son and heir-apparent of their great chief, tended to make him impatient of restraint, and overbearing in his temper.
The wild chase—speeding the chase—speeding the chase—beemseba after the gazelles, and through the rugged mountains of Edeni after wild goats, and bears, and leopards, inured him to danger, and trained him for war.
Ishmael must also have been accustomed from childhood to those feuds which raged almost incessantly between the "trained servants" of Abraham and their like neighbors of Philistia, as well as to the more seri-ious incursions of roving bands of freebooters from the distant East. Such was the school in which the great desert chief was trained. Subsequent events served to fill up and fashion the remaining features of Ishmael's character. He had evidently been treated by Abraham's dependents as their master's heir, and Abraham himself had apparently encouraged the belief. The unexpected birth of Isaac, therefore, must have been to him a sad and bitter disappointment. And when he was afterwards driven forth with his poor mother, a homeless wanderer in a pathless wilderness, when, in the wake-fulness of such unnatural harshness, he was brought to the very brink of the grave, and was only saved from a painful death by a miracle; when, after having been reared in luxury, and taught to look forward to the possession of wealth and power, he was suddenly left to win a scanty and uncertain subsistence by his sword and bow—we need scarcely wonder that his proud spirit, rebelling against injustice and cruelty, should make him what the angel had predicted, "a wild-axe man; his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him" (xvi, 392).

2. The first recorded outbreak of Ishmael's rude and wayward spirit occurred at the weaning of Isaac. B.C. 2961. On that occasion Abraham made a great feast after the custom of the country. In the excitement of the moment, heightened probably by the painful consciousness of his own blighted hopes, Ishmael could not restrain his temper, but gave way to some insulting expressions or gestures of mockery. Perhaps the very name of the child, Isaac ("seed of exaltation"), and perhaps the joy of his aged mother, may have furnished subjects for his untimely satire. See ISAAC. Be this as it may, Sarah’s jealous eye and quick ear speedily detected him; and she said to Abraham, “Expel this slave and his son; for the son of this slave shall not be heir with my son Isaac. Look, the child whom I bore him is a son in whom I am delighted.” Abraham was grieved for the lad, but he was beloved; and he spared the child. And God said to Abraham, “Let not this boy be bitter against him, for in him shall the blessing of Abraham be blessed, and he shall be a people for great blessing of the Lord. For I have given him the land of Kedar, and he shall dwell in the tents of Issachar.” Ishmael was forty years old when he was weaned, and he dwelt in the tents of Kedar. And God was with him. And he became a shepherd, and he was a archer. And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran and in the tents of Kedar, and he was a shepherd, and he became a herdsman of Ishmael. And he took the lad seven years old, and he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran. And God was with him. And he became a shepherd, and he was a herdsman of Ishmael. And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran and in the tents of Kedar. And he was a shepherd, and he became a herdsman of Ishmael. And he took the lad seven years old, and he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran. And God was with him. And he became a shepherd, and he was a herdsman of Ishmael. And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran and in the tents of Kedar.
ISHMAEL

It was composed. (See also Hottinger, Hist. Orient, p. 210). At this period the Arabian desert appears to have been thinly peopled by descendants of Joktan, the son of Eber, "whose dwelling was from Meha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east" (Gen. x. 25-30). The Joktanites, or Bene-Kedhur, are regarded by Arab historians as the first and most honorable progenitors of the Arab tribes (D'Iherbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, s. v. Arabes). See JOKTAN.

Ishmael had twelve sons: Nebajoth, Kedar, Abdelc, Mibsam, Mishma, Duham, Massa, Hadad, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah. To the list of them, the sacred records (Gen. xxv. 16) add an important piece of information: "These are the sons of Ishmael, and these are their names, by their cities (םידניכים, "fortified towns"), and their camps (סינים); twelve princes according to their nations" (םינש). Every one of the twelve sons of Ishmael, therefore, like the children of Jacob, was the head of a tribe, and the founder of a distinct colony or camp. In this respect the statements in the Bible exactly accord with the ancient traditions and histories of the Arabs themselves. Native historians divide them into two races: 1. pure Arabic, descendants of Joktan; and, 2. Mixed Arabs, descendants of Ishmael. Abulfeda gives a brief account of the several tribes and nations which descended from both these original stocks (Historia Antelamica, ed. Fleischer, p. 186, 191 sq.). Some of the tribes founded by sons of Ishmael carried the names of their founders, and were well known in history. The Nabateans, who took possession of Idumea in the 4th century B.C., and constructed the wonderful monuments of Petra, were the posterity of Nebajoth, Ishmael's eldest son. See NABATEANS. The descendants of Joktar and Naphish disputed with the Israelites possession of the country east of the Jordan, and the former, described by Strabo as κατοικον παντικα (xvi, 2), gave their name to a small province south of Damascus, which it bears to this day. See TURRA. The black tents of Kedar were pitched in the heart of the Arabian desert, and from their abundant flocks they supplied the markets of Tyre (Jer. ii, 10; Isa. ix, 7; Ezek. xxvii, 21). The district of Tema lay south of Edom, and is referred to by both Job and Isaiah (Job vi, 19; Isa. xxii, 14; Fosger's Geogr. of Arabia, I, 292; Heeren's Historical Researches, ii, 107). Duham held a small province in Arabia. Since the days of Abraham the tents of the Ishmaelites have been studded along the whole eastern confines of Palestine, and they have been scattered over Arabia from the borders of Egypt to the banks of the Euphrates. As friends and foes, as oppressors and oppressed—but ever as freemen—the seed of Ishmael have "dwelt in the presence of their brethren."

Of this last expression various explanations have been given, but the plainest is the most probable: which is, that Ishmael and the tribes springing from him should always be located near the kindred tribes descended from Abraham. This was a promise of benefit in that age of inequality, when Abraham himself had come from beyond the Euphrates, and was a stranger and sojourner in the land of Canaan. There was thus, in fact, a relation of some importance between this promise and the promise of the heritage of Canaan to another branch of Abraham's offspring. It had seemingly some such force as this—The heritage of Canaan is indeed destined for another son of Abraham; but still the lot of Ishmael, and of those that spring from him, shall never be cast far apart from that of his brethren. This view is confirmed by the circumstance that the Ishmaelites did, in fact, occupy the country bordering on that in which the various tribes descended from Abraham or Terah had settled—the Ishmaelites, Edomites, Midianites, Moabites, Ammonites, etc. Most interpreters find in this passage a promise that the descendents of Ishmael should never be subdued. But we are unable to discover this in the text; and, moreover, such has not been the fact, whether we regard the Ishmaelites apart from the other Aramians, or consider the promise made to Ishmael as applicable to the whole Arabian family. The Arabian tribes are in a state of subjection at this moment; and the great Wahhabeeocracy among them, which not many years ago filled Western Arabia, is the first and most honorable progenitor of the tribe (D'Iherbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, s. v. Arabes). See JOKTAN.

The prophecy which drew their character has been fulfilled with equal minuteness of detail. He shall be a wild ass of a man ( CancellationToken ; his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him. This means, in short, that he and his descendants should lead the life of the Bedouins of the Arabian deserts; and how the prediction has been fulfilled, and how the Bedouin manners now in existence, a recent commentator on the passage has illustrated in prose by equal force and beauty. "The character of the Ishmaelites, or the Bedouins, could not be described more aptly or more powerfully. Against them alone time seems to have no sike, and the conqueror's sword no edge. They are the most obstinate and the most persevering of all the nations, and mocked the attacks of the invaders. Ungovernable and roaming, obeying no law but their spirit of adventure, regarding all mankind as their enemies, whom they must either attack with their spears or elude with their faithful steeds, and cherishing their deserts as heavily as the limit of all the constraint of too close a neighbor, they have expanded over the whole country and the coast of Arabia, and the Bedouins are the outskirts of the nations. Plunder is legitimate gain, a daring 'robbery' is praised as valor" (Kalisch, ad loc.). See ISHMAELITE.

7. The notions of the Arabs respecting Ishmael (Isma'il) are partly derived from the Bible, partly from Jewish, and partly from native traditions. The origin of many of these traditions is obscure, but a great number may be ascribed to the fact of Mohammed's having, for political reasons, claimed Ishmael for his ancestor, and strenuously to make an imposible pedigree; while both he and his followers have, as a consequence of this assumed descent, set out to extalt that ancestor. Another reason may be safely found in Ishmael's acknowledged headship of the naturalized Arabs, and this cause existed from the very period of his settlement. See ARABIA. Yet the rivalry of the Joktanite kings of Southern Arabia, and its intercourse with classical and medieval Europe, the wandering and unsettled habits of the Ishmaelites, their having no literature, and, as far as we know, only a mesor oral tradition, all contributed, till the importance it acquired with the promulgation of El-Islam, to render our knowledge of the Ishmaelitic portion of the people of Arabia, before Mohammd, lamentably defective. That they maintained, and still maintain, a patriarchal and primitive form of life, is known to us. Their religion, at least in the period immediately preceding Mohammed, was in Central Arabia chiefly the grossest fetishism, probably learned from themselves by the posterity of the land; southwards it diverged to the cosmic worship of the Joktanite Himyritees (though these were far from being exempt from fetishism), and northwards (so at least in ancient times) to an approach to that true faith which Ishmael carried with him, and his descendants were the grandsons of. This last view was indeed illustrated by the numbers who, in Arabia, became either Jews (Karaites) or Christians (though of a very corrupt form of Christianity), and by the movement in search of the faith of the patriarchs which had been put forward, not long before the birth of Mohammed, by men not satisfied with Judaism or the corrupt form of Christianity with which alone they were acquainted. This movement first aroused Mohammed, and was afterwards the main cause of his success.

The Arabs believe that Ishmael was the first-born of Abraham, and the majority of their doctors (but the point is in dispute) assert that this son, and not Isaac, was offered by Abraham in sacrifice. The scene of this sacrifice is Mount Arafat, near Mecca, the last holy place visited by pilgrims, it being necessary to the completion of pilgrimage to be present at a sermon delivered thereon. Abraham, it is related, was to sacrifice his son when he forsook the heathen deities and offered him at Mekkeh, in commemoration of the offering, and to sacrifice a victim on the following evening after sunset, in the valley of Minæ. The sacrifice last mentioned is observed throughout the Muslim world, and the day on which it is made is called "The Great Festival" (Lane's Modern Egypt, ch. iii.). Abraham, it is related, dwelt with his mother at Mekkeh, and both are buried in the place called the "Heij," on the north-west (termed by the Arabs the north) side of the Kaabeh, and inclosed by a curved wall called the "Hattm." Ishmael was visited at Mekkeh by Abraham, and they together rebuilt the temple, which had been destroyed by a flood. At Mekkeh, Ishmael married a daughter of Mudduh or El-Mudah, chief of the Joktanite tribe Jurhum, and had thirteen children (Mirror ez-Zemâd, MS.), thus agreeing with the Biblical narrative, including the daughter.

Mohammed's descent from Ishmael is usually lost, for an unknown number of generations, to "Abraham," of the twenty-first generation before the prophet: from him downwards the latter's descent is, if we may believe the genealogists, fairly proved. But we have evidence far more trustworthy than that of the genealogists; for, with the Arabs, the names of the natives of Arabia are not traceable to the third or fourth generation, and it is scarcely possible to find one who is ignorant of his race, seeing that his very life often depends upon it. The law of blood-revenge necessitates his knowing the names of his ancestors for four generations, but no more; and this law, extending from time immemorial, has made any confusion of race almost impossible. This law, it should be remembered, is not a law of Mohammed, but an old pagan law that he endeavored to suppress, but could not. In casting doubt on the prophet's pedigree, we must add that this cannot affect the proofs of the chief element of the Arab nation being the stock of Abraham (and so, too, of Ishmael, of whom was Ishmael). Although partly mixed with the Joktanites, they are more mixed with Keturabites, et c.; the characteristics of the Joktanites, as before remarked, are widely different from those of the Ishmaelites; and, whatever theory is introduced to the contrary, we believe that the Arabs, from physical characteristics, language, the concurrence of native traditions (before Mohammedianism made them untrustworthy), and the testimony of the Bible, are mainly and essentially Ishmaelitic.

2. The father (or ancestor) of Zebediah, which latter was "a ruler of the house of Judah" under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xix, 11). B.C. cir. 900.

3. Son of Jehohanan, and captain of a "hundred" under the regency of Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiii, 1). B.C. 877.

4. One of the six sons of Azel, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 28; ix, 44). B.C. ante 500.

5. Son of Nethaniah, whose treachery forms one of the chief episodes of the history of the period immediately succeeding the first fall of Jerusalem (Jer. xi, 7- xli, 15, with a short summary in 2 Kings xxv, 23-25). B.C. 587. His full description is "Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elzaphanan, of the seed royal" of Judah (Jer. xli, 1; 2 Kings xxv, 25). Whether by this it is intended that he was actually a son of Zedeckiah, or of one of the latter kings, or, more generally, that he had royal blood in his veins—perhaps a descendant of Elizahannah, the son of David (2 Sam. v, 18)—we cannot tell. Jeremiah (xxv, 35) throws the whole into some doubt, on the expression as meaning "of the seed of Molech." He gives the same meaning to the words "the king's son" applied to Masseiah in the above passage. The question is an interesting one, and has recently been revived by Geiger (Uebersetzung, etc., p. 387), who extends it to other passages and persons. See Mosaic. Jerome (as above) further says—perhaps on the strength of a tradition—that Ishmael was the son of an Egyptian slave, Gera: as a reason why the "seed royal" should bear the meaning he gives it. During the siege of the city he had, like many others of his countrymen (Jer. xi, 11), been brought into captivity; but, to his return, he forsook the gods of the country of Basal, then king of the Bene-Ammon (Josephus, Ant. x, 9, 2). Ammonitish women were sometimes found in the harems of the kings of Jerusalem (1 Kings xi, 1), and Ishmael may have been thus related to the Ammonitish court on his mother's side. At any rate, he was instigated by the designs which he accomplished but too successfully (Jer. xi, 14; Josephus, Ant. x, 9, 3). Several bodies of Jews appear to have been lying under arms in the plains on the south-east of the Jordan, during the last days of Jerusalem, watching the progress of affairs in Western Palestine, commanded by "princes" (Hebr. "rabbim"), the chief of whom were Ishmael, and two brothers, Johanan and Jonathan, sons of Kareah. Immediately after the departure of the Chaldean army these men moved across the Jordan to pay their respects to Gedaliah, whom the king of Babylon had left as superintendent (ינפ) of the province. Gedaliah had taken up his residence at Mizpah, a few miles north of Jerusalem, on the main road, where Jeremiah the prophet resided with him (xi, 6). The Chaldeans were not wont to have isolated messengers beyond the west of the town. We can discern a high inclosed courtyard and a deep well within its precincts. The well was certainly (Jer. xii, 9; comp. 1 Kings xv, 22), and the whole residence was probably, a relic of the military works of Asa, king of Judah. Ishmael made no secret of his intention to kill the superintendent and usurp his position. Of this Gedaliah was warned in express terms by Johanan and his companions; and Johanan, in a secret interview, foreseeing how irreparably a misfortune Gedaliah's death would be at this juncture (xi, 10), offered to remove the danger by killing Ishmael. This, however, the prophet, from an evident ten men, who, according to the Hebrew text, "princes of the king" (יִנְפֵּי םנֵפֵי), though this is omitted by the Sept. and by Josephus. Gedaliah entertained them at a feast (xii, 1). According to the statement of Josephus, this was a very lavish entertainment, and Gedaliah became much intoxicated. It must have been a private one, for before its close Ishmael and his followers had murdered Gedaliah and all his attendants with such secrecy that no alarm was given outside the room. The same night he killed all Gedaliah's establishment, including some Chaldean soldiers who were there. Jeremiah appears fortunately to have been absent, and, incredible as it seems, well had Ishmael satiated his precations that for two days the massacre remained perfectly unknown to the people of the town. On the second day Ishmael perceived from his elevated position a large party coming southwards along the main road from Shechem and Samaria. He went out to meet them. They proved to be eight or nine, who, with rest clothes, and with sharp swords, etc., approached the bodies, and other marks of heathen devotion, and weeping (Sept.) as they went, were bringing incense and offerings to the ruins of the Temple. At this invitation they turned aside to the residence of the superintendent. Here they found a general assembly of men, who, in a great temple, which on a larger scale, was employed by Meho et Ali in the massacre of the Mamelukes at Cairo in 1806. As the unsuspecting pilgrims passed within the gate (Sept. court-gard) he closed the entrances behind them, and there he and his band butchered the whole number: ten only escaped by the offer of heavy ransom for their lives. The seventy corpses were then thrown into the well, which (as in the Sepoy massacre at Cawnpore) was within the precincts of the house, and which was completely filled with the bodies. It was the same thing that had been done by John—by Johnson in some respects a prototype of Ismael, with the bodies of the forty-two relatives of Ahaziah (2 Kings x, 14). This done, he descended to the town, surprised and carried off the daughters of king Zedekiah, who had been sent there by Nebuchadnezzar for safety; with their emunah and their wealth from Chaldean guard (Jer. xlii, 11, 16), and all the people of the town, and made off with his prisoners to the country of the Ammonites. Which road he took is not quite clear; the Hebrew text and Sept. say by Gibeon, that is north; but Josephus, by Hebron, round the southern end of the Dead Sea. The news of the massacre had by this time got abroad, and Ismael was quickly pursued by Johanan and his companions. Whether north or south, they soon tracked him and his unwieldy booty, and found them reposing by some copious waters (Uṣār el-Ha bi). He was attacked, two of his braves slain, the whole of the prey recovered, and Ismael himself, with the remaining eight of his people, was forced to the shore and then passed into the obscurity from which it would have been well if he had never emerged. Johanan's foreboding was fulfilled. The result of this tragedy was an immediate panic. The small remnants of the Jewish commonwealth—the captains of the forces, the leftovers of the two prophets, the two men, the women and children—at once took flight into Egypt (Jer. xii, 17; xlvi, 5-7), and all hopes of a settlement were for the time at an end. The remembrance of the calamity was perpetuated by a fast the fast of the seventh month (Zech. vii, 5; viii, 19), which is to this day strictly kept by the Jews on the third of Tisri. (See Reland, Ant. iv, 10; Kimchi on Zech. vii, 5). The part taken by Baalis in this transaction apparently brought upon his nation the denunciations both of Jeremiah (xlix, 1-6) and the more distant Ezekiel (xxvi, 1-7), but we have no record to show how these predictions were accomplished. See 1Chron. xxiv, 19.

6. One of the "sons" of Pashur, who divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra x, 22). B.C. 459.

Ishmael (as a later name). See 1Chron. xxiv, 19.

Ish'ma'élītē (Heb. Yešma'elīṯiṯ), יֶשֶׁמַּאֵלִיִּת, 1Chron. xxiv, 19; xxviii, 8, etc., pl. יַעֲשֹּנַּאֶלִיִּים, usually Anglicized "Ishmaelites." q, v., a descendant of Ishmael, the son of Abraham, by Hagar. He lived on a tributary with Egypt (Gen. xxvii, 25, 27; xxxix, 1); and lived a wandering life as nomad at the eastward of the Hebrews and as far as to the Persian Gulf and Assyria, i.e., Babylonia (Gen. xxv, 18), which same limits are elsewhere assigned to the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv, 7); so also the names "Ishmaelites" and "Midianites" appear to be sometimes applied to the same people (Gen. xxvii, 25, 27, 28; Judg. xviii, 22, 24). In Gen. xxv, 18, it is said, "And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest towards Assyria; and he died in the presence of all his brethren." Or Ishmael's death had already been mentioned, and as the Hebrew term נָפַל—naphal—rendered "he died," properly he fell—is seldom used in the Scriptures in reference to "dying," except in cases of sudden and violent death, as when one "falls" in battle, the probability is that naphal here signifies that his territory or possession fell to him; and he died in the presence of all his brethren, immediately contiguous to the borders of the territories in which the various tribes descended from Abraham or Terah had settled—the Israelites, Edomites, Midianites, Moabites, Ammonites, etc. This interpretation is censured by the Sept. and Targums, which have died, and by the parallel passages (comp. 1 Sam. xvi, 12; 1 Chron. vii, 24; 1 Chronicles xxvi, 3; 1 Chron. vii, 4)." The twelve sons of Ishmael, somewhat like the twelve sons of Jacob, became so many heads of tribes (Gen. xxv, 18-19), which implies that in the next generation they spread themselves pretty widely abroad. It appears (Gen. xxv, 18) that Ishmaelites and Midianites were the nomadic parts of the Arabian peninsula; but in process of time they would naturally stretch more inland, eastward and southward. That they also extended their journey northwards is evident from the fact that the brethren of Joseph espied "a company of Ishmaelites coming from Arabia, while they were twenty men, and carrying spicery, and myrrh, to carry it down to Egypt" (Gen. xxxvii, 25). The company has afterwards the name of Midianites applied to it (ver. 28), probably on account of its consisting of more than one class of people, Midianites also in part; but being first called Ishmaelites, we can have no reasonable doubt that these formed a considerable portion of the caravan party. The trade of inland carriers between the countries in the north of Africa on the one side, and those in southern and western Asia (India, Persia, Babylonia, etc.) on the other, is one in which sections of the Ishmaelitish race have been known from the remotest times to take a part. It suited their migratory and unsettled habits; and they became so noted for it, that others, who did not belong to the same race, were not infrequently called Ishmaelites, merely because they followed the Ishmaelitish traffic and manners. It is impossible to say how far the descendants of Ishmael penetrated into Arabia, and how far the elements in its southern and more productive regions. As it is certain the Ishmaelitish mode of life has been always less practised there, and a modified civilization is of old standing, the probability is that the population in those regions has little in it of Ishmaelitish blood. But, with all their regard to genealogies, the Arabic races have for thousands of years been so transmuted into each other, that all distinct landmarks are wellnigh lost. The circumstance of Mohammed having, for prudential reasons, claimed to be a descendant of the son of Abraham, has led to an extension of the Ishmaelitish circle far beyond what the probable facts will bear out. See ISMAEL, 1.

Ishma'el'ah (Heb. Yəšma'ēlaṯ, יֶשֶׁמַּאֵלִא, in 1Chron. xxvi, 19 in the paragogic form Yəšma'ēlaṯ, יֶשֶׁמַּאֵלִא, heard by Jeborah, the name of two of David's officers. See DAVID.

1. (Sept. Yəṣa'elāṯ, Vulg. Sāmājōs, Auth. Vers. "Ishmaiah"). A Gibonite, one of the chiefs of those warriors who were the cause of the death of the whole of their tribe, and joined themselves to David when he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 4). B.C. 1046. He is described as "a hero (gibbor) among the thirty and over the thirty"—i.e. David's body-guard; but his name does not appear in the lists of the guard in 2 Sam. xxiii and 1 Chron. xi. Possibly he was killed in some encounter before David reached the throne.

Ish'mē'ēloitē in the text. (1.) see in Gen. xxvii, 25, 27, 28; xxix, 1, as a general name of the Abrahamic stock, that is, the people of Abraham, as distinguished from the Canaanites (see Balak; Eze. xxiii, 1), but elsewhere (1 Chron. ii, 17) in the strict sense of the proper Ishmaelites (as Anglicized in Judg. viii, 24; 1 Sam. xxvi, 6), with which the Heb. name corresponds.

Ish'mē'ēral (Heb. Yəshma'ēlaṯ, יֶשֶׁמַּאֵלִא, preserved by Jeborah; Septuag. Ἰσσαμαῖος, one of the "sons" of Elpaal, a chief Benjamite resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 18). B.C. ante 858.

Y'shō'd (Heb. Yshōḏ, יַשֹּד, men of garrison, i.e. in countenance or in fame; Sept. simply ἡσαμ, translates er decuriones, a son of Haman, the head or prince of the Machir of Gilead (1 Chron. viii, 18). B.C. cir. 1658.

Ish'pan (Hebrew Yšpān, יִשְׁפָּן, prob. kid, but Geneiius bald, First strong; Sept. Ἰσσαίας, Vulg. Jesapham), One of the "sons" of Shashash, a Benjamite chief resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii. 22). B.C. ante 688.

Isb-Tob (Heb. Ish-Tob', יִשׁ-תּוֹב, man of Tob [i.e. good]; Sept. Ierou'oi; Josephus Ierou'oiog; Vulg. Iseod), apparently one of the small kingdoms or states which formed part of the general country of Aram, named with Zobah, Rehob, and Maacaah (2 Sam. x, 6, 8). In the parallel account of 1 Chron. xix Isiboth is omitted. By Josephus (Ant. vii, 6, 1) the name is given as that of a king. But though in the ancient versions the name is given as one word, it is probable that the real signification is "the men of Tob" (q. v.), a district mentioned also in connection with Ammon in the records of Jehi- thal (Judg. xi, 3, 5), and again, perhaps, under the shape of Tobh in attractions, in the history of the Maccabees (1 Macc. x, 18; 2 Macc. xii, 17).

Ish'uba (Heb. Yiechech, יְשׁ-עֶבָּה, uniform; Septuag. Ισσαού, but Ισσαοῦ in Gen.; Vulg. Jesuia), the second name of the sons of Asher (Gen. xlii, 17; 1 Chron. vii, 30, in which latter passage it is Anglicized "Ishubah"). B.C. 856. He appears to have left no issue (compare Numb. xxxvi, 44).

Ish'ua'li (1 Chron. vii, 30). See Ishu'it.

Ish'uei (Heb. Yieheech, יְשׁ-ועֶי, uniform), the name of two men.

2. (Septuag. Ισσαοῦ, Josephus Ierou'oi, Ant. vii, 6, 8; Vulg. Jesuia, Auth. Ven. "Ishuia"). The second name of the three oldest sons of king Saul (1 Sam. xiv, 49; probably the same as Arinadab (1 Sam. xxxii, 2; comp. 1 Chron. viii, 38). See Ish-bosheth.

Isido'ra of Alexandria, St., was born in Egypt about the year 318, and led for a time the life of a hermit in the wilderness of the Thebaid and in the desert of Nitria. St. Athanasius ordained him priest, and gave him the charge of a hospital, whence Isidore is also called the Hospitalator. After the death of Athanasius, Isidore courageously defended his works and his memory against the attacks of the Arians. Having got into difficulties with Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, Isidore was obliged to flee to Constantinople, where he died in 403. The Greek Church commemorates him on the 16th of January. See Palladius, Hist. Lausiacs; Hoefler, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, vii, 56. (J. N. P.)

Isido'ra, Sr., bishop of Cordova, and an eminent Spanish theologian and historian, who flourished in the 4th century, died about 400. The chronicl of Flav. Dextor mentions him as having continued St. Jerome's Chronicon to the year 880; Siegbert de Gembloux attributes to him also a Commentarius in Orosii Libros Regum; but Florez and Antonio show good grounds for discounting this assertion. Antonio even gives very strong reasons for considering this Isidore an imaginary individual, as well as another Isidore, likewise supposed to have been bishop of Cordova in 400-480, whom Dextor considers to be the author of a Liber Allocutorum and a Commentarius in Lucan. See Biburias, Nov. ad Dextrum; Antonio, Bibliotheca Hispanica veter. i, 249; Fabricius, Bibl. Med. et Infm. Latinae; Hoefler, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxvi, 56. (J. N. P.)

Isido'ra Mercator (or Peccator), the supposed name of a compiler who, towards the middle of the 9th century, published the famous collection of canons known as the Liber Decretalogus. See Canonici; Decre-taI. It is pretty generally conceded that this writer lived in the dominions of Charles the Bald, but his name is a matter of doubt. As for his collection, it is evidently based on that of Isidore of Seville, numerous copies of which were at the time circulating in France; but it contains besides a vast number of apocryphal addditiona. Some of these pieces had already been in circulation for years, and they were not all made up by the Pseudo-Isidore. The collection of capitularies of Benedictus Levita, a deacon of Mayence (who has by some been considered as the author of the Pseudo-Isidorian collection), which was written about 840, contains already numerous extracts of the fictitious canons of the work of Mercator. They circulated at first only in Southern France. They remained unknown in Spain until the 16th century, and in Germany and Italy but few copies of them are to be found. They are compiled from the histories of Rufinus and Cassiodorus, the Liber Pontificiorum, the works of the fathers, of the councils, regular decreets, the Bible (which, according to Richter, he quotes from the Vulgate, revised by Rhabanus Maurus), and, finally, the Roman law, of which he possessed a compendium in the Visigoth language. These two latter circumstances go far to prove that the writer must have been either a native, at least, at the time, a resident of France. Mayence has sometimes been considered as the place where the pseudo-decretes were written, and Rieuf or Ogar, archbishops of that city, or even Benedictus Levita, above alluded to, as the author, but this seems very unlikely. More recent is Rhabanus Maurus, who succeeded Ogar in 847, appears entirely acquainted with their work. It must have been written about the middle of the 9th century, for it contains the decrees of the council held at Paris in 828, shows a knowledge of Rhabanus Maurus's work and the choir-books of the bishops of the time, and was first made public at the Synod of Chiers in 857. The history of this collection has never been fully traced out; much may perhaps be done for it by a careful comparison of the numerous MS. copies of it which are still extant. Among these copies, one of the most important is in the bishop's chair of Vercelli, No. 630, written in 858-867. It is thought that the Copitula Anglorum, another apocryphal document of canon law, must also be considered as the work of the so-called Isidore Mercator. Isido'ra of Moscow, a distinguished Russian bishop, was born at Thessalonica towards the close of the 14th century. He became successively archimandrite of the convent of St. Demetrius at Constantinople, coadjutor of the bishop of Illjitsk, and, finally (in 1457), metropolitan of the whole of Russia. In the spring of 1495 he attended, at the head of a hundred Russian bishops and priests, the Council of Florence, at which the union of the Latin and Greek churches was effected. See Floren-k, Council of. Isidore and Bessarion played the most important part in that council. In June, 1445, having fulfilled his task, he returned to Moscow to proclaim the news. But the grand duke Yasili, who was displeased with the results of the council, had him thrown into prison, and condemned to be burned alive; but on the day appointed for the execution he made his escape, and fled to Moscow, where he continued his work as a martyr. As the union effected by the Council of Florence in 1439 was of very short duration, Isidore was selected by the Roman pontiff, Nicholas V, as messenger to Constantinople, to attempt again a union of the churches, but in this mission he failed. Isidore died at Rome April 27, 1463. Having witnessed the establishment of Islamism at Constantinople, he gave an account of it in two letters, one of which was published in the Lettres Turques of Reisner, vol. iv; the second, which is dated Candia, July 7, 1453, was never printed, and is probably contained in the Riccardian Library at Florence. Isidore of Pelusium (or Pelusia), St., an ecclesiastical writer, was born at Alexandria about the year 370. He spent his life in the neighborhood of Pelusium, in a monastery of which he was abbot, and where he practised strict asceticism. He was a great admirer of St. Anthony, whom, according to tradition, he was a pupil, and whom he defended against the attacks of the patriarchs of Alexandria, Theophylact and Cyril. In the controversy waged by Cyril against Nestorius, Isidorus Pelusiotae favored the Cyrillic party, his counsels of moderation contrasting greatly with the passion and anathematizing zeal of his contemporaries. He was a firm and constant friend of the churches in Egypt against the heresies of the Greek Church, and vigorously opposed all heretical intrusions. Of his writings, which “discuss, with learning, piety, judgment, and moderation, nearly all the theological and practical questions of his age,” there remain to us yet a collection of his letters, forming five collections, some of which they are probably not all (there are more than 2000 of them) his. These letters treat almost entirely on the interpretation of Scripture. The first three volumes were published, with a Latin translation and notes, by J. de Billy (Paris, 1685, fol.), and reprinted, together with the fourth volume, by Conrad Hitzelhausen (Heidelberg, 1690, fol.), and the fifth by the Jesuit Schott (Antw. 1628, 8vo). A complete, though rather faulty edition was finally published at Paris in 1688, fol., and in Migne’s edition of the fathers, vol. lvIII (Paris, 1860). Isidore of Seville, or Isidor of Hispalensis, surnamed also “the young” to distinguish him from Isidore of Cordova whose name is distinguished ecclesiastics of the 7th century, was born at Cartagena about the year 560 or 570. He was a son of Severianus and Theodora, and brother of St. Leander, his predecessor in the bishopric of Seville, and of St. Fulgentius of Cartaghe. He was brought up by his brother Leander, and was therefore natural that he should have been in the selection of a successor for the bishopric of Seville, but it was not principally owing to his relationship to Leander that he was honored with this distinguished position. His abilities fully entitled him to this distinction. When he ascended to the bishopric the ecclesiastics of Spain for a century and a half. The north and west of Europe were shrouded in moral darkness. Germany, occupied by a number of adverse tribes, was yet given to idolatry; Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Scotland, were almost unknown; England and Ireland had just received the first faint glimpse of Christianity; France was torn by the dissensions of petty monarchs, and the East itself was on the eve of the inroads of Mohammedanism. To counteract these influences, and to build up the Christian faith among his countrymen, was his first care. To this end he established schools to properly train the young, entered into relations with the bishop of Rome (Gregory the Great), and made every effort to bring the doctrinal and moral system of Christianity into harmony with the habits and institutions of those various races and nationalities which at that time composed the Hispanic-Gothic kingdom; and so successful was he in his efforts that, when the Visigoths were driven out by the Mohammedans, the Church of Spain. His abilities were further recognized by his contemporaries in permitting him to preside over the two Councils—half eclesiastical, half civil—or of Seville (619) and Toledo (Dec., 683). On both occasions he showed great zeal for the orthodox side, and strict opposition to all heretical movements. Specifically, however, he was opposed to Arianism. So able was the conduct of Isidore at these councils that the canons of them may be said to have served as a basis even for the constitutional law of the Spanish kingdom, both in Church and State, down to the time of the great councils of the 11th century. Isidore died at Seville on April 4, 686, and was canonized by the Church soon after his death. We have but few particulars of his life from his writings, except that in a letter, about the authenticity of which there is much doubt, he reveals himself as desirous of being admitted to the degree of Doctor of the Church; to prove the doctrine of the Trinity, to defend the Church against its enemies, to support the famous code of Justinian, to reprove the vanity of the world. The great reputation which Isidore enjoyed among his colleagues may be best inferred from the fact that the fathers of the 8th Council of Toledo, who call him Doctor egregius, ecclesiae catholicae novissimun, deus, praecedentibus aetateque nostro, doctissimus, doctores, ecclesiam non infimus, atque, et quod magis est, jam aeculaeorum fatorum doctissimus, cum recentia nominandus, Isidore. According to the testimony of his disciple, St. Ildefonsus, he was a man of wonderful eloquence. The same authorizes him as the author of De Genere Officiorum (generally called De Officiis ecclesiasticis), Libri Proemtorum:—De Ortu et Obiui Patrum (sanctorum):—Lib. Synonymorum (sive lamentations):—De Naturae verum:—Lib. Sententiarum:—Lib. Epithetorum: Origenis, probably the last work of Isidore. The first edition of his works, which display very extensive learning and a profound knowledge of the Scriptures and of the nature—eloquent, ascetical, liturgical, scriptural, historical, philosophical, and even philologically—and thus amply account for the authority of his contemporaries, was published by Michael Somnus (Paris, 1386, fol.); another edition, from MSS. of Alvar Gomez, and augmented by notes by J. B. Perez and Giral (Madrid, 1599, 2 vols. fol.). The edition of James Dubreuil (Paris, 1601, folio) and that of Cologne (1667) are taken from that of Madrid. The latest, which is also the considered best, is due to Arevalo (Rome, 1792-1803, 7 vols. 4to). See St. Ildefonsus, De Viris Illustribus; Sigebert de Gramboix, De Script. Isis (Ισή), an Egyptian deity, sister and wife of Osiris (q. v.), is called by the Egyptians Ἡ, and is by them said to have been born on the 4th day of the Epagomenae, or five days added to the Egyptian year of 360 days. The history of Isis is very obscure, all the information we possess on the subject being derived from Greek writers. Tradition said that her brother Osiris having married her, they together undertook the task of civilizing men, and taught them agriculture; their marriage produced Horus. Their other brother, Typhon, being at enmity with them, succeed-Isis, the name of a Mohammedan sect, who derive their name from their founder, Isa-Aledad. They mortal lifted yet." An annual festival of ten days' duration commemorated the victory of Isis over Typhon by means of the sistrum: on this occasion a solemn fast was succeeded by processions, in which sheaves of wheat were carried about in honor of Isis, etc. After Alexander the Great, the worship of Isis was propagated throughout all those countries inhabited by the Greeks; in Greece temples were erected to her at Philus, Megara, Tithorea, and Phocia. The worship of Isis was also introduced into Rome in the time of Sulla (B.C. 86), but her temples were often closed on account of the licentiousness of her priests. (Josephus tells a story about the demolition by the worshippers of the emperor on account of an intrigue by one Mundus to secure the gratification of his passion for a Roman matron, Ant. xviii, 3, 4.) Yet, under the emperors, it found credit, and Domitian, Commodus, and Caracalla were themselves among her priests. Writers of those times say that it was in their day still the custom of the Greeks and Romans to carry a boat in solemn procession in honor of Isis on the opening of spring (March 5th). Hence, in the Roman calendar, the 5th of March is designated as Isisia martigium. As similar processions were held in honor of the Greek divinities, Tacitus claims that they also worshipped Isis; yet her name nowhere appears among them, neither is it exactly known what goddess he thus designated. "The myth of Isis, as given by Plutarch (De Iside), appears to be a fusion of Egyptian and Phoenician traditions, and the legend, like the legend of their deities, Tacitus claims that they also worshipped Isis; yet her name nowhere appears among them, neither is it exactly known what goddess he thus designated. The fable was adopted and incorporated in the mysticism of the Gnostics. Accordingly, among other representations, we find a gem containing a beetle, with Isis on the opposite side, holding two children, the emblem of material and spiritual existence. The gem the beetle is not cut on the stone, but the stone is formed into the shape of the insect, and on the convex back is represented Isis, or the Egyptian Ceres, reclining beside the Nile, with two vases of Egyptian corn, the emblem of vegetable prolificness, naturally expressed by the emblem of the sun's rays and the Nile: from the head issues the lotus, and in one hand is held a niometer, or perhaps a spade. It is the exact form of the same agricultural instrument as used at this day in the East. An amulet of Isis was held in great sanctity. See Egypt. Isites, the name of a Mohammedan sect, who derive their name from their founder, Isa-Aledad. They hold that the Koran was created, notwithstanding the opposition of Mohammed himself against such a statement, for he held that it was eternal, and in his day anathematized all who dared to dissent from his assertion. The Isteis, however, really avow the same belief, though they clothe it in very different language. They say that the Koran was dictated by the Almighty to his Prophet was only a transcription of the original, and that the reference of eternal could not therefore be to any copy possessed by man. But their real heresy consists in their declaration that the Koran does not contain that matchless elegance which Mohammedans generally claim as evidence of the inspiration of the book. See Broughton, Biblioth. Hist. Sac., i. 547.

Islām or Islām (Arabic), the proper name of the religion known as Mohammedanism, designates complete and entire submission of body and soul to God, his will and his service, as well as to all those articles of faith, commands, and ordinances revealed to and ordained by Mohammed his prophet. Islam, the Mohammedans say, was once the religion of all men; but wickedness and idolatry came into the world either after the murder of Abel, or at the time which resulted in the flood, or only after the flood, of the first of the greatest Arabian idolaters. Every child, they believe, is born in Islam, or the true faith, and would continue faithful to the end were it not influenced by the wickedness of its parents, "who misguide it early, and lead it astray to Magian [see Fānsuki], Judaism, or Christianity." See M'Chesney, Mohammedanism.

Islam and Isles is the invariable rendering in the Author. Vers. of the Heb. word "Sekh (Sept. πύργος, Vulg. īsula)," which occurs in the following souses, chiefly in poetry: First, that of dry or habitable land in opposition to water: as, 'I will make the rivers islands' (Isa. xliii, 15; comp. xiii, 19; ii, 2). Especially is it a maritime region or sea-court, like the East-Indian Java, which means both shore and island. In Isa. xxv, 6, the isle of Ashdod means the country, and is so rendered in the margin, particularly as this was a sea-shore. In Isa. xxiii, 2, 6, "the isle" means the country of Tyre, and in Ezek. xxvi, 6, 7, that of Chittim and Elissa, both being maritime regions. (Job xxiii, 8, "2858 means the non-guileless.) In this sense it is more particularly applied to the shores of the Mediterranean sometimes in the fuller expression "islands of the sea" (Isa. xi, 11), or "isles of the Gentiles" (Gen. x, 5; comp. Zeph. ii, 11), and sometimes simply as "isles" (Psa. lxxii, 10; Ezek. xxvi, 15, 18; xxvii, 3, 35; xxxix, 6; Dan. xi, 18): an exception to this, however, occurs in Ezek. xxvii, 2, where the shores of the Mediterranean are intended. Secondly, it is used both in Hebrew and English, according to its geographical meaning, for an island proper, i.e. a country surrounded by water, as in Jer. xviii, 4, "the isle (margin of Caphtor), which is probably that of Cyprus. "The isles of the sea" (Ezek. x, 1) are evidently put in opposition to "the land" or continent. Thirdly, the word is used by the Hebrews to designate all those countries divided from Palestine by water, as fully described in Jer. xxxv, 22, "the isles which are beyond the sea," which were hence regarded as the most remote regions of the earth (Isa. xxiv, 15; xlii, 10; lxxi, 18; compare the expression in Ezek. xlvii, 16, "the isles afar off"), and also as large and numerous (Isa. xi, 15; Psa. cxvii, 1). (See J. D. Michaelis, Spicilegium, i, 151-142.) In Isa. xi, 11, after an enumeration of countries lying on their own continent, the words "convulsed beyond the sea" are added in order to comprehend those situate beyond the ocean. It is observed by Sir J. Newton (on Daniel, p. 276), "By the earth the Jews understood the great continent of all Asia and Africa, to which they had access by land; and by the isles of the sea they understood the places to which they sailed by sea, particularly all Europe. (See Genesis, Thea. Heb., p. 88.)."-Kitto; Smith. Comp. Wild Beast.

Islands of the Blessed were, according to a very old Greek myth, certain happy isles situated towards the edge of the Western ocean, where the favorites of the gods, rescued from death, dwelt in joy, and possessed everything in abundance that could contribute to it.

Islebians is the name by which the followers of John Agricola (q. v.) are designated, in distinction from all other Antinomians (q. v.). The name is derived from their master, who was also known as the magister Islebius, because a native of Isleben, also the birth-place of Luther, with whom he was a contemporary. Sometimes the Islebians are called Nomomachi (q. v.).

Isip, Simon, an English prelate, flourished in the 14th century. But little is known of his early history. He became archbishop in 1348, having previously been canon of St. Paul's, dean of the Arches, and a member of the privy council of the king. He is especially celebrated as the founder of the college of Canterburx (now a part of Christ Church, Oxford). "He built it," says bishop Godwin, in his account of Isip, "and enriched it with good possessions, appropriating unto the same the pannages of Pagham and Masond." Perhaps more noteworthy still is his conduct towards Wickliffe, related by Neander (Ch. Hist, v, 135-6; the name is by mistake spelled Isle, and so even in the English translation by Torrey). Isip, says Neander, was a strict friend of the reformer, and in 1366 showed his predictions for Wickliffe by appointing him overseer over the Canterbury college, characterizing him "as a man in whose circumstances, fidelity, and activity he had the utmost confidence, and to whom he gave this post on account of his honorable deportment and his learning." Of course, after Isip's death in 1366 (Apr. 26), Wickliffe was deprived of his place (comp. Lewis, Life of Wickliffe, 1820, p. 9 sq.). See Hook, Ecclesiastical Biography, vi, 265. (J. H. W.)

2. (Ismakōh)-One of the priests who relinquished their Gentile wives after the Captivity (1 Esdr. ix. 22).

Isma'il, the elder son of Jafar Saduk, the sixth imam, in a direct line, from Ali Ben-Ali Talib (who makes the first of the Twelve Imams, but are incorrect), the Alie sect, also known as Fatimite, and more generally as the Shites, (q. v.), was to have been the seventh imam of the Shiites, but, as he died during his father's lifetime, Jafar appointed as his successor his younger son Kauzim. This many of the Shiites opposed, holding that, as the imam is an incorrupt emanation of the Deity, only a descendant of the direct line could assume the responsibilities of this high office, and claimed the distinction for the sons of Ismael, who alone, of the descendants of Jafar, were entitled to be imams. This contention caused a schism among the Shiites about the 2d century of the Hegira (8th century of our era), and gave rise to a new sect, under the name of ISMAELITES, OR ISMARIANS. the Abbasside caliphs and the other Musulmans. Missionaries were sent through all the territories settled by the followers of Mohammed, at this time torn in pieces by scores of sects, to advocate the claims of the house of Ismael. They flourished in the 9th and 10th centuries under the name of Karmatians (q. v.), and constituted a most universal pleasure to Mohammed and his freemasons, admitting, however, some very dangerous tenets, and advocating the extermination of their enemies by the sword. They received additional strength in the 11th century of our era, when a family of chiefs, through the means of superstition, established an influence which enabled its members to hold several of them for two centuries to control the affairs of Persia.

The first of these chiefs was Husein Subah (from whose name the Ismaelites of this period are often called Huseini or Housain—a title, however, having no connection [as has been erroneously supposed by some] with the English word assassin, which is really equivalent to “abashish-eaters” see Assassins), who, after many years of persecution, succeeded in obtaining a stronghold, and, there fortifying himself, founded upon the Ismaelitic model a sect of his own. Besides maintaining the principles as far as for the rights of succession to the office of imam, he also introduced many new tenets more conformable to the opinions of the Sufis, or philosophical deists, than to those of orthodox Mohammedans. The Koran, he admitted, was a holy volume; but he insisted that its spirit and moral rules were the only thing he desired. He rejected the usual modes of worship, as true devotion, he said, was seated in the soul, and prescribed forms might disturb, though they could never aid, that secret and fervent adoration which it must always offer to its Creator (Malcolm, from a Persian MS.). But the principal point which Husein Subah insisted on was a complete and absolute devotion to himself and to his descendants. His disciples were instructed to consider him more as their spiritual than their worldly leader. The means he took to instil this feeling into their minds must have been powerful, from the effect which was produced. "When an envoy from Malik Shah came to Allahamout, Husein commanded one of his subjects to stab himself, and another to cast himself headlong from a precipice. Both mandates were instantly obeyed! 'Go, said he to the astonished envoy, 'and explain to your master the character of my followers!' (Malcolm, Life of Husein Subah, p. 399). Organised crime, which may be ascribed for this control of Husein over his adherents is that he formed them into a secret order, and, besides, promised them advancement from one degree to another, in the highest of which a foretaste of the life that is to come was given them. This extraordinary mode of procuring the devotion of his disciples he is said to have produced by drugs. "A youth who was deemed worthy, by his strength and resolution, to be initiated into the Assassin service was invited to the table and conversation of the grand master, or grand priest; he was then intoxicated with abashish (the hemp-plant), and carried into the garden—a true Eastern Paradise—where the music of the harp was mingled with the songs of birds, and the melodious tones of the female singers harmonized with the murmurs of the brooks. Everything breathed pleasure, rapture, and sensuality. The young man was then invited to select whatever he chose to drink from the cistern, which was full of everything around him, the hours in particular, contributed to confirm his delusion. After he had experienced as much of the pleasures of Paradise, which the Prophet had promised to the blessed, as his strength would admit—after quaffing ever-vigorous delight from the eye, ear, and mind—springing goblets, he sank into the lethargy produced by narcotic draughts, on awakening from which, after a few hours, he again found himself by the side of his superior. The latter endeavoured to convince him that corporally he had not left his seat, but that spiritually he had been reapt into Paradise, and had there enjoyed a foretaste of the bliss which awaits the faithful, who devote their lives to the service of the faith and the obedience of their chiefs. Thus did these infatuated youtha blindly dedicate themselves as the tools of murder, and eagerly seek an opportunity to sacrifice their lives, in order to become partakers of a Paradise of sensual pleasures. They boasted of the success they met with the Koran to the Moslem, but which to many might appear a dream and mere empty promises, they had enjoyed in reality; and the joys of heaven animated them to deeds worthy of hell" (Madden, Turkish Empire, ii. 185, based on Hammer's Geschichte der Assassinen). Malcolm thinks there is an improbable truth in what the orthodox Mohammedans, who hold the Assassins in great abhorrence, because "the use of wine was strictly forbidden them, and they were enjoined the most temperate and abstemious habits." But this seems to us only an additional reason why we should believe it to be true; for if Husein used the abashish to intoxicate his followers when their nerves needed strengthening for some atrocious deed, we could not expect him to advocate the free use of intoxicating beverages. Nay, its truth is further confirmed by the revelations which the fourth grand master of Husein said he had had, in which he was promised that the Ismaelites would become a mighty nation, and finally conquer the Turk and the fiery imagination of the Arab.

Husein, on account of several hill forts which he had styled 'Sheed', was given the title which signifies "the chief of the mountains," and which has been literally, but erroneously, translated "the old man of the mountain." (Malcolm, i. 401). The Ismaelites in his time spread extensively. They flourished not only in Persia, but also in Syria and Arabia, until A.D. 1233, when their triumph was checkered by the death of the capable, and a general massacre against them was inaugurated. A command was issued by the reigning prince, Mangu Khan, in the 651st year of the Hegira, "to exterminate all the Ismaelites, and not to spare even the infant at its mother's breast.... Warriors went through the provinces, and executed the fatid sentences without mercy or appeal. Wherever they found a disciple of the doctrine of the Ismaelites they compelled him to kneel down, and then cut off his head. The whole race of Kia Busurgomid, in whose descendants the grand mastership had been hereditary, were exterminated. .... Twelve thousand of these wretched creatures were slaughtered without distinction of age. .... The 'de voted to murder' were not now the victims of the order's vengeance, but that of outraged humanity. The sword was against the dagger [the weapon the Assas sinists most generally used to murder their levantines], the executioner destroyed the murderer. The sword saved for two centuries was now ripe for the harvest, and the field ploughed by the Assassin's dagger was reaped by the sword of the mogul. The crime had been terrible, but no less terrible was the punishment" (Madden, ii. 187; comp. Milman's Gibbon [Harper's edition], Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vi. 215).

But, with all these persecutions, they still struggled on for many years, and even in our own day remains of the Ismaelites still exist both in Persia and Syria, but merely as one of the many sects and heresies of Islamism (see Mohammed, p. 396), without the prestige of the axe, without the means of retaining their former importance, of which they seem, in fact, to have lost all remembrance. The policy of the secret state-subverting doctrine which animated the followers of Husein, and the murderous tactics of the Assassins, are equally foreign to the thoughts of the Qadis and the shaykhs. These writings are preserved in the Ismaelitic and Christian traditions, glossed over with the ravings of a mystical theology. Their places of abode are, both in Persia and Syria, those of their forefathers, in the mountains of Irak, and at the foot of the anti-Lebanon" (Madden, ii. 190, 191). At present many students of Eastern history incline to the opinion that

Muhammad ibn Musallam, a reformer, was born on the 28th of Shawal, 1196 of the Hegira (Sept. 11, 1781), in the village of Pholah, district of Delhi. His family had furnished quite a number of distinguished theologians, and Ismaiel began early to preach and write against the superstitions practices which had been in- troduced into the doctrine of the unity of God in Hindustan. In 1819 he became connected with Ahmed Shah, a Mo- hammedan of a family of Syeds of Bareilly, in Upper In- dia, who was at this time attracting a great deal of at- tention at Delhi by superior sanctity, and by his denunciations of the corrupt forms of worship then prevalent. In 1822 and 1823 Musallam stationed himself at Chunar, and, having made a pilgrimage to Mecca, he proceeded to Delhi, determined to establish a theocratic form of government in India, and to restore Islamism to its original simplicity. The reformers inaugurated a gener- al war against the unbelief, and laying particular em- phasis on the doctrine of the unity of God, they soon succeeded in gaining considerable power by the great number of their adherents. The Sikhs (p. v.) became their chief opponents, and with them a protracted strug- gle ensued. Driven from Delhi by the civil authorities, they retired in 1827 to Panjâb (situated in the Euphrat plains, between Persia and the Indus), where they found an ally in Omar Khan, an Afghan of Panjâb. At first these united forces were successful in their war against the Sikhs, but the Afghans soon grew weary of these conquests for strange allies, and Ahmed and Is- maïl being left alone, removed to the left bank of the Indus, and there, amid rugged mountains, continued for a time the desultory warfare. Early in May, 1831, how- ever, they were surprised at a place called Balakot, in the mountains of Pakhlâk, and slain.

The followers of Ahmed and Ismaïl are called Thori- cûti or Ahmedmedvidest, and bear about them in the common practice of the Sunnis the titles of Shâhi, or "Basis of the Faith," in the Urdu, or vernacular language of Upper India, and it was printed at Calcutta. "It is divided into two portions, of which the first only is understood to be the work of Is- maïl, the second part (the Sirat Amsaatuk, published in Persian at Calcutta, and translated in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal) being inferior, and the production of another person. In the preface Ismaïl deprecates the opinion that the wise and learned alone can comprehend God's Word. God himself had said a prophet had been raised up among them to rule and igno- rant for their instruction, and that he, the Lord, had rendered obedience easy. There were two things essen- tial: a belief in the unity of God, which was to know no other, and a knowledge of the Prophet, which was obedience to the law. Many held the sayings of the saints to be their guide, but the Word of God was alone sufficient. They also held an intimate connection of the Anasuris with the Assassins, especially Mr. Walpole (Travels in the further East in 1850-51 [London, 2 vols. 8vo]; compare also his Travels in the East, iii, 3 sq.). Even in India the Ismaelites are believed to have followers, and as such "the Boraks, an invidious race of merchants and bandits," are known in the British settlements of India, who still maintain that part of the creed of Hussain Subah which enjoins a complete devotion to the mandate of the high- priest" (Malcolm, i, 407, 408) are mentioned. The most important of the later Midrashim is an allegorical commentary on Exod. xiii-xxiii, 20, called Beraita, treating of the ceremonies prescribed by the Torah. Numerous editions of it have been printed; the first at Constantinople, 1515, folio; the last, to our knowledge, at Wilna, 1844, folio. It has been augmented by notes from several of the Jewish writers, and was translated into Latin by Ungolius (De Antiquitatem, vol. xiv) — תֵּיתוּלְקַי אֶתְנָחֵר אֶת הַרְפָּאִים (or הַרְפָּאִים), a work on mystic theology, of which extracts have been published in various places (Venice, 1601, 4to; Cracow, 1648, 4to), and in other works. It was printed separately under the title תֵּיתוּלְקַי אֶתְנָחֵר אֶת הַרְפָּאִים (Venice, 1677, 8vo; Zolkiew, 1833, 8vo). It was also inserted in parts in the edition of the Zohar.

Ismael also wrote a cabalistic, allegorical treatise on the nature and attributes of God, under the title תֵּיתוּלְקַי אֶתְנָחֵר אֶת הַרְפָּאִים; also called תֵּיתוּלְקַי אֶתְנָחֵר אֶת הַרְפָּאִים.

A part of it was published in the תֵּיתוּלְקַי אֶתְנָחֵר אֶת הַרְפָּאִים of Eleazar ben-Jehudah of Worms (Amsterdam, 1701, 4to, and often). Another small cabalistic treatise on the shape and mystic properties of God, under the title תֵּיתוּלְקַי אֶתְנָחֵר אֶת הַרְפָּאִים, was published with a long commentary (Venice, 1770, 4to), etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Is'pah (Hebr. יִפְשַׂח, prob. bold; Septuag. Ἰσπᾶχ, one of the sons of Beriah, a chief Benjamin; originally (from the region of the Jordan) resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 16). B.C. ante 588.

Isr'ael [not Israel] (Hebr. ישראל, יִשְׂרָאֵל; Sept. דִּוִּיתוּלְקַי אֶתְנָחֵר אֶת הַרְפָּאִים, and N. T. Ἰσραήλ), the name of the founder of the Jewish nation, and of the nation itself, specially of the kingdom comprising the ten northern tribes after the schism.

The name was originally conferred by the angel Je-hovah upon Jacob after the memorable prayer-struggle at Peniel (Gen. xxxii, 29); and the reason there assigned is that the patriarch "as a prince had power (יִשְׂרָאֵל), with God and man, and prevailed" (comp. Gen. xxxii, 10; Hos. xii, 4). The etymology is therefore clearly from the root יִשְׂרָאֵל, with the frequent adjunct יְהֹוָה, God. The verb itself occurs nowhere else than in the above passages, where it evidently means to strive or contend as in battle; but derivatives are found, e. g. יִשְׂרָאֵל סְדָרָה, a princess, and hence applied to Abraham's wife in exchange for her former name Sarai. The signification thus appears to be that of a "successful warrior with God," a sense with which all the lexicons sympathize; see G. Egesenius (Heb. Lex. s. v. and Theol. p. 1388), pugnator, i. e. miles Dei; Winer (Heb. Lex. p. 1026), lector, i. e. pugnator Dei; First (Hebr. Wörterb. s. v.), Gatt-Beherrsch. tistinguish from priests, Levites, and other ministers (Exa vi, 16; ix, 1; x, 55; Neh. xi, 8, etc.)—Smith. The twelve tribes of Israel ever formed the ideal representative of the whole stock (1 Kings xviii, 30, 31; Ezra vi, 17; Jer. xxxi, 1, etc.). Hence also in the New Test. 4 Chron. iv, 18 (as in No. 2) to the true people of God, whether of Jewish or Gentile origin (Rom. ix, 6; Gal. vi, 16, etc.), being, in fact, comprehensive of the entire Church of the redeemed. See Jews.

ISRAEL, Kneamos on. The name Jerus (Jeroboam), which had been the national designation of the twelve tribes collectively (Exod. iii, 16, etc.), was, on the division of the monarchy, applied to the northern kingdom (a usage, however, not strictly observed, as in 2 Chron. xii, 6), in contradistinction to the other portion, which was termed the kingdom of Judah. This limitation of the name Israel to certain tribes, at the head of which was that of Ephraim; which, accordingly, in some of the prophetic writings, as e.g. Isa. xvii, 13; Hos. iv, 17, gives its own name to the northern kingdom, is discernible even at so early a period as the commencement of the reign of Saul, and affords evidence of the existence of antagonistic classes which usually led to the division of the nation. It indicated the existence of a rivalry, which needed only time and favorable circumstances to ripen into the revolt witnessed after the death of Sargon.

The chief of the Division. The prophet Abijah, who had been commissioned to announce to Jeroboam, the Ephraimites, the transference to him of the greater part of the kingdom of Solomon, declared it to be the punishment of disobedience to the divine law, and particularly of the idolatry so largely promoted by Solomon (1 Kings xi, 14-35). But while this revolt from the house of David is to be thus viewed in its directly penal character, or as a divine retribution, this does not preclude an inquiry into those sacred causes, political and otherwise, to which this very important revolution in Israelish history is clearly referable. Such an inquiry, indeed, will make it evident how human passion and jealousies were made subservient to the divine purpose.

Prophecy had early assigned a pre-eminent place to two of the sons of Jacob—Judah and Joseph—as the founders of tribes. In the blessing pronounced upon his sons by the dying patriarch, Joseph had the birthright conferred upon him, and was promised in his son Ephraim a numerous progeny; while to Judah promise was made, among other blessings, of rule or dominion over his brethren—"thy father's children shall bow down before thee" (Gen. xlviii, 19, 22; xlix, 8, 26; comp. 1 Chron. xxvii, 12). Those blessings were most largely in the blessing of Moses (Deut. xxviii, 7, 17). The pre-eminence thus prophetically assigned to these two tribes received a partial verification in the fact that at the exodus their numbers were nearly equal, and far in excess of those of the other tribes; and further, as became their position, they were the first who obtained their territories, which were also assigned them in the very centre of the land. It is unnecessary to advert to the various other circumstances which contributed to the growth and aggrandizement of these two tribes, and which, from the position these were thus enabled to acquire, above the rest, naturally led to their becoming heads of parties, and, as such, the objects of mutual rivalry and contention. The Ephraimites, indeed, from the very first, gave unmistakable tokens of an exceedingly haughty temper, and preferred most arrogant claims over the other tribes as regards questions of peace and war. This may be seen in their representation to Aachen of the tribe of Manasseh (Judg. viii, 1) and in their conduct towards Jehoshaph (Judg. xii, 1). Now if this overbearing people resented in the case of tribes so incomparably as that of Manasseh what they regarded as a slight, it is easy to conceive how they must have eyed the proceedings of the tribe of Judah, which was more especially their rival. Hence it was, that while on the first establishment of the monarchy in the person of Saul, of the tribe of Benjamin, the Ephraimites, with the other northern tribes with whom they were associated, silently acquiesced, they refused for seven years to submit to his successor of the tribe of Judah (2 Sam. iii, 9-15) even when they were represented by the true people of God, whether of Jewish or Gentile origin (Rom. ix, 6; Gal. vi, 16, etc.), being, in fact, comprehensive of the entire Church of the redeemed. See Jews.

There were thus, indeed, two powerful elements tending to break up the nation into two national kingdoms, viz.: the long-continued and growing jealousy of the Ephraimites to the tribes of Judah, another cause of dissatisfaction to the dynasty of David in particular was the arrangement just referred to, which consisted in the removal of the civil, and more particularly the ecclesiastical government, to Jerusalem. The Moses ordinances were in themselves exceedingly onerous, and this must have been more especially felt by such as were resident at a distance from the sanctuary, as it harnessed upon them long journeys, not only when attending the stated festivals, but also on numerous other occasions prescribed in the law. This must have been felt as a special grievance by the Ephraimites, owing to the fact that the national sanctuary had been for a very long period at Shiloh, within their own territory; and therefore its transference elsewhere, it is easy to discern, would not be readily acquiesced in by a people whose rights were not so definitely established, and who were not so confident of their rights, and not easily persuaded that this was not rather a political expedient on the part of the rival tribe, than as a matter of divine choice (1 Kings xiv, 21). Nor is it to be overlooked, in connection with this subject, that other provisions of the theocratic policy relative to the annual festivals would have taken advantage of by those in whom there existed already a spirit of dissatisfaction. Even within so limited a locality as Palestine, there must have been inequalities of climate, which must have considerably affected the seasons, more particularly the vintage and harvest, with which the feasts may in some measure have interfered, and in so far may have been productive of discontent between the northern and southern residents. That there were inconveniences in both the respects now mentioned would indeed appear from the appeal made by Jeroboam to his own northern subjects, who had already obtained the advantages of which to which he believed he was induced, or in the adoption of which he was at least greatly aided, by the circumstance of the harvest being considerably later in the northern than in the southern districts (Pist. Bibl., note on 1 Kings xix, 22). Again, the burdensome exactions in the form of service and tribute imposed on his subjects by Solomon for his extensive buildings, and the maintenance of his splendid and luxurious court, must have still further deepened this disaffection, which originated in one or other of the causes already referred to. It may indeed be assumed that this grievance was of a character which appealed to the malcontents more directly than any other; and that these were the suburban overseers especially concerned in the beautifying of the capital, must have been exceedingly disagreeable to the inhabitants of the provinces, who did not in any way participate in the glories in support of which such onerous charges were required. The burden thus imposed was expressly stated to be the chief ground of complaint by the representatives of Israel headed by Jeroboam, who, on the occasion of the coronation at Shechem, waited on the son of Solomon with a view to obtain redress (1 Kings xii, 4). The long smouldering dissatisfaction could no longer be repressed, and a mitigation of their burdens was imperiously demanded by the people. For this end Jeroboam had been summoned, at the death of Solomon, from Egypt, whose presence must have had a marked influence on the issue, although it may be a question whether Jeroboam should not be regarded rather as an instrument of the cause than an instigator of the revolt. With this agrees the intimation made to him from the Lord many years before by Ahijah the Shilonite. The very choice of Shechem, within the territories of Ephraim, as the coronation place of Rehoboam, may have had for its object the representation of the ten tribes by means of so grand and imposing a ceremony. However this may have been, or in whatever degree the causes specified may have severally operated in producing the revolt, the breach now made was never healed, God himself expressly forbidding all attempts on the part of Rehoboam and his counsellors to subjugate the revolted provinces with the intimation, "This thing is from me" (1 Kings xii, 24). The subsequent history of the two kingdoms was productive, with but slight exceptions, of further estrangement.

The Extent and Resources of the Kingdom of Israel.

The area of Palestine, even at its utmost extent under Solomon, was very circumscribed. In its geographical relations it certainly bore no comparison whatever to the other great empires of antiquity, nor indeed was there any proportion between its size and the mighty population that lived on that small extent of land. For an allowance for the territories on the shore of the Mediterranean in the possession of the Phoenicians, the area of Palestine did not much exceed 13,000 square miles. This limited extent, it might be shown, however, did the present subject call for it, rendered that land more suitable for the purposes of theocracy than if it had been of a far larger area. What precise extent of territories was embraced in the kingdom of Israel cannot be very easily determined, but it may be safely estimated as more than double that of the southern kingdom, or, according to a more exact ratio, as 9 to 4. Nor is it easy to specify with exactness the tribal regions which composed the respective kingdoms. In the announcement made by Ahijah to Jeroboam, he is assured of ten tribes, while only one is reserved for the house of David; but this must be taken only in a general sense, and is to be interpreted by 1 Kings xii, 25 (compare 21); for it would appear that Simeon, part of Dan, and the greater part of Benjamin, owing doubtless to the fact that Jerusalem itself was situated within that tribe, formed portion of the kingdom of Judah (Ewald, Geschichte, iii, 409). It is to be noticed, however, that Judah was the only one of the ten tribes that was not spoken of as the one which constituted the kingdom of the house of David. The ten tribes nominally assigned to Israel were probably Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh), Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, Naphtali, Gad, Reuben, and (in part) Dan. With respect to the conquests of David, Moab appears to have been attached to the kingdom of Israel (2 Kings iii, 4); as much of Syria as remained subject to Solomon (see 1 Kings xi, 24) would probably be claimed by his successor in the northern kingdom; and Ammon, though connected with Rehoboam as his mother's native land (2 Chron. xii, 13), and though afterwards tributary to Judah (2 Chron. xxvii, 5), was at one time allied (2 Chron. xx, 1), we know not how closely or how early, with Moab. The sea-coast between Accho and Japho remained in occupation of Israel.

With regard to population, again, the data are even more defective than with respect to territorial extent. According to the uncrowned census taken in the reign of David, about forty years previous to the schism of the kingdom, the fighting men in Israel numbered 800,000, and in Judah 500,000 (2 Sam. xxiv, 20), but in 1 Chron. xxvi, 5, 6, the numbers are differently stated at 1,100,000 and 470,000 respectively, with the intimation that Levi and Benjamin were not included (comp. xxvii, 24). As bearing more directly on this point, Rehoboam raised an army of 180,000 men out of Judah and Benjamin to resist Jeroboam (1 Kings xii, 21), and again, Ahijah, the son of Rehoboam, with 400,000 men, made war on Jeroboam at the head of an army of 800,000 (2 Chron. xiii, 8). According to the general laws observable in such cases, the numbers may be said to represent an aggregate population of from five and a half million and a half to about one thousand, or two millions, may be fairly assigned to the kingdom of Judah at the time of the separation.

Shechem was the first capital of the new kingdom (1 Kings xii, 25), venerable for its traditions, and beautiful in its situation. Solomon's son, Rehoboam, whose loving-kindness had fixed the wandering gaze of Solomon (Canut, vi, 4), became the royal residence, if not the capital of Jeroboam (1 Kings xiv, 17) and of his successors (Can. xvi, 33; xvi, 8, 17, 25). After the murder of Jeroboam's son, indeed, Bethel seems to have intended to fix his capital at Ramah, as a convenient place for anonying the king of Judah, whom he looked on as his only dangerous enemy; but he was forced to renounce this plan (1 Kings iv, 17, 21). Samaria, uniting in itself the qualities of beauty and fertility, and a commanding position, was chosen by Omri (1 Kings xvi, 24), and reigned over the kingdom of the ten tribes for about three years the onset of the hosts of Assyria. Jezreel was probably only a royal residence of some of the Israelitish kings. It may have been in awe of the ancient holiness of Shiloh that Jeroboam forbore to pollute the consecrated site of the tabernacle with the wretched abode. He chose for the religious capitals of his kingdom Dan, the old home of northern schism, and Bethel, a Benjamite city not far from Shiloh, and marked out by history and situation as the rival of Jerusalem.

III. Political and Religious Relations of the Kingdom of Israel.

But whilst, in extent of territory and of population, and it might be shown also in various other respects, the resources of the northern kingdom were at the very least double those of its southern rival, the latter embraced elements of strength which were entirely lacking in the other. The geographical position of the kingdom of Israel, which exposed its northern frontier to invasions on the part of Syria and the Assyrian hosts. But more than this, or any exposure to attack from without, were the dangers to be apprehended from the policy on which the kingdom of Israel was founded. Its opposition to theocracy, and his other interferences with fundamental principles of the Mosaic law, more especially in the matter of the priesthood, at once alienated from his government all who were well affected to that economy, and who were not ready to subordinate their religion to any political considerations. Of such there were not a few within the territories of the new kingdom. The Levites in particular fled the kingdom, abandoning their property and possessions; and so did many others besides; "such as set their hearts to seek the Lord God of their fathers, to turn back to the Lord God of their fathers. So they strengthened the kingdom of Judah" (2 Chron. xi, 13-17). Not only was one great source of strength thus at once dried up, but the strongly conserving principles of the law were violently shocked, and the kingdom more than ever exposed to theisson of the heathenism which extended along its frontier.

One element of weakness in the kingdom of Israel was the number of tribes of which it was composed, more especially after they had renounced those principles of the Mosaic law which, while preserving the individuality of the tribes, served to bind them together as one people. Among other circumstances unfavorable to unity was the want of a capital in which all had a common interest, and with which they were connect- ed by some common tie. This want was by no means compensated by the advantages and amenities of Bethel and Dan. But it is in respect to theocratic and religio- nous relations that the weakness of the kingdom of Is- rael specially appears. Any sanction which the usur- pation of Jeroboam may have derived at first from the announcement made to him by the prophet Ahijah, and any support of the anti-theocratic policy. The result of the men of Judah not to fight against Israel, because the thing was from the Lord (1 Kings xii, 33), must have been completely taken away by the denunciations of the prophet out of Judah against the altar at Bethel (1 Kings xii, 1-10), and the subsequent announcements of a doom of doom from God against Jeroboam, which failed to fulfill the condi- tions on which the kingdom was given him (1 Kings xiv, 7-16). The setting up of the worship of the calves, in which may be traced the influence of Jeroboam's residence in Egypt, and the consecrating of priests who could have no moral weight with their fellow-subjects, and subordinating the tribe served to bind them together as one people. These consequences of the policy were by no means calculated to consoli- date a power from which the divine sanction had been expressly withdrawn. On the contrary, they led, and very speedily, to the alienation of many who might at the outset have silently acquiesced in the revolt of Jeroboam, even if they had not fully approved of it. The large migration which ensued into Judah of all who were fa- vorable to the former institution must still further have aggravated the evil, as all vigorous opposition would thereon cease to the onward and destructive tend- ency of the anti-theocratic policy. The natural result of the course appears in the fact that the step taken by Jeroboam was never retracted by any of his successors, one after another following the example thus set to them, so that Jeroboam is emphatically and frequently characterized in Scripture as the man "who made Is- rael to sin," while his successors are described as follow- ing in "the sin of Jeroboam." Further, as the calves of Jeroboam are referable to Egypt, so the worship of Baal, which was introduced by Ahab, the seventh of the Israelish kings, had its origin in the Tyrian alliance formed by that monarch through his marriages with Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon. Hitherto the national religion was ostensibly the worship of Jehovah under the representation of the calves; but under this new reign every attempt was made to extirpate this worship entirely by the destruc- tion of the golden calves and the suppression of his altar and the worship of Baal. It was to meet this new phase of things that the strenuous agency of Elijah, Elisha, and their associates was directed, and assumed a quite peculiar form of prophetic ministration, though still the success was but partial and temporary. See, however, under ELIJAH and ELSHA.

IV. Decay and Dissolution of the Kingdom of Israel.

The kingdom of Israel developed no new power. It was but a portion of David's kingdom deprived of many elements of strength. Its frontier was as open and as widely extended as before, but it wanted a capital for the seat of organized power. Its territory was as fer- tile and as tempting to the spoiler, but its people were less united and patriotic. A corrupt religion poisoned the sources of life, to the incalculable injury of the nation. "The Lord cut off on a new and unconquered king, and less respect was felt for an aristocracy reduced by the retirement of the Levites, the army which David found hard to control rose up unchecked in the exercise of its wild strength; and thus nine houses, each ushered in by a revolution, reigned in the throne in the midst of anarchy. Tyre ceased to be an ally when the alliance was no longer profitable to the merchant city. Moab and Ammon yielded tribute only while under compulsion. A power- ful neighbor, Damascus, sat armed at the gate of Is- rael; and beyond Damascus might be discerned the rising strength of the first great monarchy of the world. The history of the kingdom of Israel is therefore the history of its decay and dissolution. In no true sense did it manifest a principle of progress, save only in swerving more and more completely from the course marked out by Providence and predestined for the seed of Abraham; and yet the history is interesting as show- ing how, notwithstanding the ever-widening breach be- tween the two great branches of the one community, the divine purposes concerning them were accomplish- ed. That a polity constituted as was that of the north- ern kingdom did not remain uneventful and the elements of decay must be self-evident, even were the fact less clearly marked on every page of its history.

There is reason to believe that Jeroboam carried back with him into Israel the good-will, if not the substantial assistance of Shishak, and this will account for his es- caping the doom of the ten tribes in the 38th year of his reign (1 Kings xiv, 29). Jeroboam's kingdom thus outlasted his death, the 26th year of his reign (1 Kings xiv, 31). There was then a division of the kingdom into ten tribes under the reigns of his successors. It appears that the kingdom of Israel grew in power and in wealth (1 Kings xiv, 25). Jeroboam had not sufficient force of character in himself to make a lasting impression on his people. A king, but not a founder of a dynasty, he aimed at nothing beyond securing his present elevation. Without any ambition to share in the co-regency with his brother in Samaria, the natural result of the course appears in the fact that the step taken by Jeroboam was never retracted by any of his successors, one after another following the example thus set to them, so that Jeroboam is emphatically and frequently characterized in Scripture as the man "who made Is- rael to sin," while his successors are described as follow- ing in "the sin of Jeroboam." nial people. Although Jeroboam, the founder of the kingdom, himself reigned nearly twenty-two years, yet his son and successor Nadab was violently cut off after a brief reign of less than two years, and with him the whole house of Jeroboam.

This severity closed the first dynasty, and it was but a type of those which followed. Eight houses, each ushered in by a revolution, occupied the throne in rapid succession, the army being frequently the prime movers in these transactions. Thus Baasha, in the midst of the army at Gibbethon, slew Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, and reigned in his stead, and in turn was deprived of his crown by Elah, the son and successor of Baasha, and reigned only seven days, during which time, however, he smote all the posterity and kindred of his predecessor, and ended his own days by suicide (1 Kings xvi, 16). Omri, the captain of the host, was chosen to punish the usurper Zimri, and after a civil war of four years he prevailed over his other rival Tibni, the choice of half the people. Omri, the sixth in order of the Israelitish kings, founded a more lasting dynasty, for it endured for forty-five years, he having been succeeded by his son Ahab, of whom it is recorded that he "did more to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger than all his predecessors that were before him" (1 Kings xvi, 33); and he, again, by his son Ahaziah, who, after a reign of less than two years, died from the effects of a fall, and, leaving no son, was succeeded by his brother Jehoram, who reigned twelve years, until slain by Jehu, the captain of the army of those Gilead, who also executed the total destruction of the family of Ahab, which perished like those of Jeroboam and of Baasha (2 Kings ix, 9).

Meanwhile the relations between the rival kingdoms were, as might be expected, of a very unfriendly character. "There was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all their days" (1 Kings xiv, 30); so also between Asa and Baasha (1 Kings xvi, 14, 32). The first mention of peace was that made by Jehoshaphat with Ahab (1 Kings xxii, 43), and which was continued between their two successors. The princes of Omri's house cultivated an alliance with the contemporary kings of Judah, which was cemented by the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah, and marked by the community of names among the royal children. Ahab's Tyrian alliance strengthened him with the counsels of the masculine mind of Jezebel, but brought him no further support.

The house of Omri was the last of the Israelitish enemie's. In the reign of Omri the Syrians had made themselves masters of a portion of the land of Israel (1 Kings xx, 33), and had proceeded so far as to erect streets for themselves in Samaria, which had just been made the capital. Further incursions were checked by Ahab, who, with a peace, concluded with the Syrians, which lasted three years (1 Kings xxii, 1), until that king, in league with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, attempted to wrest Ramoth-Gilead out of their hands, an act which cost him his life. The death of Ahab was followed by the revolt of the Moabites (2 Kings i, 4), who were again, however, subdued by Jehoram, in league with Jehoshaphat. Again the Syrians renewed their inroads on the kingdom of Israel, and even besieged Samaria, but fled when panic. In the reign of Jehu "the Lord began to cut Israel short: and Hazael smote them in all the coasts of Israel (2 Kings x, 27). Their troubles from that quarter increased still further during the following reign, when the Syrians reduced them to the utmost extremities (2 Kings xiii, 7). To this more protracted years succeeded, with a return to Judah, whose king presumptuously declared war against Israel. The beginning of the reign of the great Rehoboam was marked by the affairs of the northern kingdom revived. "He restored the coast of Israel, from the entering of Hamath unto the sea of the plain; ... he recovered Damascus, and Hamath, which belonged to Judah, for Israel" (2 Kings xiv, 25, 26). Damascus was by this time probably weakened by the advance of the power of Assyria. This period of prosperity was followed by another of a totally different character. Jeroboam's son and successor Zachariah, the last of the dynasty of Jehu, was assassinated, after a reign of six months, by Shallum, who, after a reign of only one month, was slain by Menahem, whose own son and successor Pekahiah was in turn murdered by Pekah, one of his captains, who was himself slain by the men of Israel, and of the men of Ephraim, who are the Assyrians seen extending their power over Israel; first under Pul, to whom Menahem paid a tribute of threescore talents of silver, that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom; and afterwards of the kings xv, 19). Now the Assyrians are found pushing their conquests in every direction; at one time, in the reign of Pekah, leading away into captivity a part of the inhabitants of Israel (2 Kings xv, 29), and again coming to the assistance of Ahaz, king of Judah, then besieged in Jerusalem by the Israelites, in conjunction with the Syrians, who had somehow recovered their former ascendency. See Syria. This interposition led to the destruction of Damascus, and in the succeeding weak reign of Hoshea, who had formed some secret alliance with Egypt which was offensive to the Assyrian monarch, to the destruction of the city and the removal of its inhabitants to Assyria; and thus terminated the kingdom of Israel, after an existence of 258 years. Some gleanings of the ten tribes yet remained in the land after so many years of religious decline, moral debasement, national degradation, anarchy, bloodshed, and deluding of the eyes at the removal of the Assyrians up by the conqueror and carried to Assyria, never again, as a distinct people, to occupy their portion of that goodly and pleasant land which their forefathers won under Joshua from the heathen. (See Ewald, Einleitung in die Geschichte des Volkes Israel bis Christus, Götting, 1851; also Wilkii. διασπορά, de decem tribus Israel, in his Αγγελοτικα, p. 305 sq.; J. G. Klauber, Hist. regni Ephraim, Stuttgart, 1833.)

V. Chronological Difficulties of the Reigns compared with those of Judah. These will mostly appeal by a simple inspection of the annexed table, where the numbers given in the columns headed "nominal" are those contained in the express words of Scripture. These and other less obvious discrepancies will be found explained under the titles of the respective kings in this number of the Handbook, and may be well here to recapitulate the most prominent of them together.

1. The length of Jeroboam's reign is stated in 1 Kings xiv, 20 to have been twenty-two years, which appear to have been reckoned from the same point as Rehoboam's (i. e. in Nisan); whereas they were only current, since Rehoboam's accession took place the year following that to Jeroboam. This is confirmed by the fact that the reigns of Rehoboam (seventeen years, 1 Kings xiv, 21) and Abijah (three years, 1 Kings xv, 2) were but twenty years, and Nadab succeeded Jeroboam in Asa's second year (ver. 25). In like manner Nadab's two nominal years (ver. 25) are current, or, in reality, little over one year; for Baasha succeeded him in Asa's third year (verse 28, 33). So, again, Baasha's twenty-four years of reign (verse 33) must be reduced, for purposes of continuous reckoning, to twenty-three; for the year of Elah succeeded his father in Asa's second year (verses xvi, 8). Once more, Elah's two years (ver. 8) must be computed as but one full year, for Zimri slew and succeeded him in Asa's twenty-seventh year (ver. 10, 15).

The cause of this surpplusage in these reigns appears to be that at some point during the reign of Jeroboam the position was regular for the regnal year, which the Israelitish reign was changed (see 1 Kings xii, 82, 83) from the spring (the Hebrew sacred year) to the fall (their older and secular year), so that they overlap those of the kings of Judah by more than half a year. The reigns of the line of Judah must therefore be taken as the standard, and the parallel line of Israel adjusted by it. (The numbers thirty-five and thirty-six in 2

Notes
- Chron. xv, 19; xvi, 1, are evidently a transcriber's error for twenty-five and twenty-six; see 1 Kings xvi, 8.
- 2. Omri's reign is stated in 1 Kings xvi, 23 to have lasted twelve years, beginning, not as the text seems to indicate, in Asa's thirty-first year, but in his twenty-seventh (for Zimri reigned but seven days), since Ahab succeeded him in Asa's eighty-third year (ver. 29), making these really but eleven full years, computed as above. The thirty-first of Asa is meant as the date of Omri's sole or undisputed reign on the death of his rival Tibri, after four years of contest. His sixty years of reign in Tirzah (same verse) are dated from this latter point, and are mentioned in opposition to his removal of his capital at the end of this last time to Samaria (ver. 24), where, accordingly, he reigned one full or two current years, still computed as above. This last-named fact is again the key to the discrepancy in the length of his successor Ahab's reign, which is set down in ver. 29 as twenty-two years "in Samaria;" for they date from the change of capital to that place (Ahab having probably been at that time appointed viceroy), being in reality only a small fraction more than twenty years. This appears from the combination of the residue of Asa's reign (41-38=3; comp. also 1 Kings xxii, 41) and the seventeenth of Jehoshaphat, when Ahabah succeeded Ahab (1 Kings xxii, 51). Ahabiah's two years (same verse) are to be computed as current, or one full year, on the same principle as above.
- The other difficulties relate to minute textual discrepancies, not important to the chronology; some of them involve the supposed interregna. They will all be 1st discussed under the names of the respective kings to whose reigns they belong. For a complete vindication and adjustment of all the textual numbers (save two or three universally admitted to be corrupt) by means of actual tabular construction, see the Meth. Quart. Review, Oct. 1856. See also Judah, Kingdom of.

Bibliography
- Israel ben-Samuel MAGHENEN, a Jewish writer of the Karaitic sect, flourished at the opening of the 14th century, at Kahara. He deserves our notice as the author of works on the Jewish laws and traditions, in which he advanced the peculiar theories of the Karaites. Thus, in his work אֹנֵּסָה הַיִּֽשָּׁרָה (written about 1306), he asserts that the animal, if killed according to law, and eaten according to prescription, develops itself in man to a higher state of being. The "shochet" (the person killing the animal) must, however, be a believer of the migration of the souls of animals into the souls of men, else it can not only not take effect, but makes the meat unfit for food. But it is also as the interpreter of the matrimonial laws that he ranks high among the Karaites. See Gritz, Gesch. der Juden, vii. 922. (J. H. W.)

Tса'резит (Hebr. פְּשָׁרָה, פְּשֶׁרִית, 2 Sam. xvii. 26; once [Numb. xxv, 14] גִּבְעָת פְּשָׁרָה, man of Judah. i. e. male Israelite; fem. פְּשֶׁרִית, "Israelith woman," Lev. xxiv, 10; Sept. and New Test. "Ishparim," a descendant of Jacob, and therefore a member of the chosen nation, for which, however, the simple name פְּשֶׁר (q. v.) is often employed in a collective sense, but with various degrees of extension at different times: (1) The twelve tribes descended from Jacob's sons,
Tribe of Issachar.—Issachar’s place during the jour- ney to Canaan was on the east of the tabernacle, with his brothers Judah and Zebulun (Num. ii, 5), the group moving foremost in the march (x, 15), and having a common standard, which, according to the Rabbinical tradition, was of the three colors of the rainbow and carnelian, inscribed with the names of the three tribes, and bearing the figure of a lion’s whelp (see Targum Pseudo-Jon. on Num. ii, 8). At this time the captain of the tribe was Nethaneel ben-Zuam (Num. i, 8; ii, 5; vii, 18; x, 10). He was succeeded by Igal ben-Joseph, who went as an representative of the tribe to the assembly of spies (xiii, 7), and he again by Palitei ben-Azzan, who assisted Joshua in appointing the land of Canaan (xxxiv, 26). Issachar was one of the six tribes who were to stand on Mount Gerizim during the ceremony of blessing and cursing (Deut. xxvii, 12). He was still in company with Judah, Zebulun being opposite on Ebal. The number of the fighting men of Issachar when taken in the census at Sinai was 54,400. During the journey they seem to have steadily increased, and after the mortality at Peor they amounted to 64,300, being inferior to none but Judah and Dan—to the latter by 100 souls only. The tribe was given in 1 Chron. xxvii, 14, probably the census of Joab, amount in all to 145,600.

The Promised Land once reached, the connection between Issachar and Judah seems to have closed, to be renewed only on two brief occasions, which will be noticed in their turn. The intimate relation with Zebu- lun was, however, maintained. The two brother-tribes had their premises together, and men are frequently mentioned in company. The allotment of Issa- char lay above that of Manasseh. The specification of its boundaries and contents is contained in Josh. xix, 17-25. But to the towns there named must be added Daberath (a Levitical city of Issachar, xxix, 3), 2600 cubits from which here is probably the Remeth of xix, 21 and Ilbeam (Josh. xvi, 11). The boundary, in the words of Josephus (Ant. v, 1, 22), “extended in length from Carmel to the Jordan, in breadth to Mount Tabor.” In fact, it almost exactly consisted of the plain of Esraelon or Jezreel. The southern boundary we can trace by Engannim, the modern Jenin, on the heights which form the southern enclosure to the plain; and then further westward by Taanach and Megiddo, the authentic fragments of which still stand on the same heights as they trend away to the hump of Carmel. On the north the territory nearly ceases with the places there named by Josephus, the outpost of the hills of Zebulon. East of Tabor, the hill-country continued so as to screen the tribe from the Sea of Galilee, while a detour on the S.E. included a part of the plain within the territory of Manasseh, near Beth-shean and the upper part of the Jordan valley. In a central recess of the plain stood Jezreel, on a low swelling, attended, just across the border, on the one hand by the eminence of Mount Gilboa, and on the other by that now called Ed-Duhuy, or “Little Hermon,” the latter having Shunem, Nain, and Endor on its slopes—names which recall some of the most interesting and important events in the history of Israel. This territory was, as it still is, among the richest land in Palestine. Westward was the famous plain which derived its name, the "seed-plot of God"— such is the signification of Jezreel—from its fertility, and the very weeds of which at this day testify to its enormous powers of production (Stanley, S. and P. p. 438).

See EKORAKON; JEZREEL. On the north is Tabor, which, even under the burning sun of that climate, is said to retain the glades and dells of an English wood (ibid. p. 350).

On the east, behind Jezeel, is the opening which conducta to the plain of the Jordan—to that Beth-Shean which was proverbially among the Rubbies the gate of Paradise for its fruitfulness. It is this aspect of the territory of Issachar which appears to be alluded to in the blessing of Jacob. The image of the "sturdy he-ass" (נַחַל נֶחָיָה)—the large animal used for burdens and field-work, not the lighter and swifter she-ass for riding —couching down between the two stalls," chewing the fodder of stolid ease and quiet—is very applicable, not only to the tendencies and habits, but to the very size and air of a rural agrarian people, while the sequel of the verse is no less suggestive of the certain result of such tendencies when unrelied by any higher aspirations: "He saw that rest was good and the land pleasant, and he bowed his back to bear, and became a slave to tribute"—the tribute imposed on him by the various marauding tribes who were attracted to his territory by the richness of the crops. The blessing of Moses completes the picture. He is not only "in tents"—in nomad or semi-nomad life—but " rejoicing" in them; and it is perhaps not straining a point to observe that he has by this time begun to lose his individuality. He and Zebulun are mentioned together as having part possession in the holy mountain of Tabor, which was near the frontier line of each (Deut. xxxiii, 18, 19). We pass from this to the time of Deborah: the chief struggle in the great victory over Sisera took place on the territory of Issachar, "by Taanach at the waters of Megiddo" (Judg. v, 19); but the allusion to the tribe in the song of triumph is of the most cursory nature, not consistent with its having taken any prominent part in the action.

One among the judges of Israel was from Issachar—

Tola (Judg. x, 1)—but beyond the length of his sway we have only the fact recorded that he reigned out of the limits of his own tribe—at Shamir, in Mount Ephraim. By Josephus he is omitted entirely (see Ant. v, 7, 6). The census of the tribe taken in the reign of David has already been alluded to. It is contained in 1 Chron.

vii, 1-5, and an expression occurs in it which testifies to the nomadic tendencies above noticed. Out of the whole number of the tribe no less than 36,000 were marauding mercenary troops—"bands" (גֵּ֫רְנֵ֫ר)—a term applied to no other tribe in this enumeration, though elsewhere to Gad, and uniformly to the irregular bodies of the Bedouin nations round Israel. This was probably at the close of David's reign. Thirty years before, when two hundred of the head men of the tribe had gone to Hebron to assist in making David king over the entire realm, different qualifications are noted in them—they "had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do . . . and all their brethren were at their commandment." To what this "understanding of the times" was we have no clue (see Bleich, Christ's, i, 190 sq.). By the later Jewish interpreters it is explained as skill in ascertaining the periods of the sun and moon, the intercalation of months, and dates of solemn feasts, and the interpretation of the signs of the heavens (Targum, ad loc.; Jerome, Quest.

Heb.). Josephus (Ant. vii, 2, 2) gives it as "knowing for things that were to happen;" and he adds that the armed men who came with these leaders were 20,000.

One of the wise men of Issachar, according to an old Jehosh tradition preserved by Jerome. (Quatt. Hebr. on 1 Chron. xxvi. 16); was Amanias, son of Zichri, who, with 200,000 men, offered himself to Jehovah in the service of Jehovahphath (2 Chron. xvi. 16); but this is very questionable, as the movement appears to have been confined to Judah and Benjamin. The ruler of the tribe at this time was Omri, of the great family of Omri, but the movements are connected necessarily by the fact that not have been the forefather of the king of Israel of the same name—of the founder of the house of Omri—and of the house of Abah, the builder of Samaria, possibly on the same hill of Shamir on which the Issacharite judge, Tola, had formerly held his court. But, whether the word was seized at any rate was one of the eight to be found in the old Cessions was Issacharite. Baasha, the son of Ahijah, of the house of Issachar, a member of the army with which Nadab and all Israel were besieging Gibbethon, apparently not of any standing in the tribe (compare 1 Kings xvi. 2), slew the king, and himself mounted the throne (1 Kings xxv. 27, etc.). He was evidently a fierce and warlike man (1 Chron. xvi. 1), and an idolater like Jeroboam. The Issacharite dynasty lasted during the twenty-four years of his reign and the time of his son Elah. At the end of that time it was taken from him by the same man who had acquired it, and Zimri, the new king, commenced his reign by a massacre of the whole kindred and connections of Baasha; he left him “not even so much as a boy” (xvi. 11), Distant as Jerreel was from Jerusalem, the inhabitants turned to the Persians, with which he negotiated the opening of his reign. On that memorable occasion a multitude of the people from the northern tribes, and among them from Issachar, although so long estranged from the worship of Jehovah as to have forgotten how to make the necessary purifications, yet by the enlightened piety of Hamon, the son of Phinhas, handed over the feast, and they did keep it seven days with great gladness—with such tumultuous joy as had not been known since the time of Solomon, when the whole land was one. Nor did they separate till the occasion had been signalled by an immense destruction of idolatrous altars and symbols, “in Judah and Benjamin, in Ephraim and Manasseh,” up to the very confines of Issachar’s own land—and then all the children of Israel returned every man to his possession into their own cities” (2 Chron. xxxi. 1). Within five years from this date, Shalman, king of Assyria, had invaded the north of Palestine, and after three years he took Samaria, and, with the rest of Israel, had carried Issachar away to his distant dominions. The only other scriptural allusion to the tribe is that, with the rest of their brethren of all the tribes of the children of Israel (Dan only excepted), the twelve thousand of the tribe of Issachar shall be sealed in their foreheads (Rev. vii. 7).

Issendorp, Hendrik, belonged to the Evangelical Lutherans of Holland. He was called in 1728 to the charge of a Lutheran church at Purmerend. In 1737 bodily infirmities rendered a collegiate necessary. In 1743 he resigned his charge. Though obliged to desist from his ministerial work, he rendered himself eminently useful to his denomination by presenting to the Dutch a translation of some three or four hundred German hymns. See Glansin, Gereformeerde Nederland, ii. 186 sq.; also Geschiedenis van het goddelijker Gesang bij de Lutherenen in de Nederlanden door. (J. P. W.)

Isserlin, Israel ben-Petachya, a Jewish Rabbi of great distinction among Jewish scholars in the 15th century, and one of the representatives of truly learned German synagogue teachers, flourished about 1427-1470. At first he was settled over a congregation at Marburg; later he removed to Neustadt, near Vienna. Isserlin was a very liberal-minded Jew, and did much by his influence to advance the standing of Jewish scholarship in his day. More particularly was his influence felt in the theological schools of his Hebrew brethren all over Germany. From the most distant parts of Europe students flocked to the schools at Erfurt, Nuremberg, Regensburg, and Prague, where the Tekhun was expanded in most masterly manner (comp. Zunz, Zur Gesch. u. Lit., p. 167 sq.). According to Jost (Gesch. d. Judenchrons u. s. Sekten, iii, 116), Isserlin died obscurely in 1432, but this seems improbable, as First has evidence of Isserlin’s activity in 1437. His works are יִשְׂרָל יִסְרָאֵל, a collection of 854 opinions on the different fields of Rabbinism (Venezia, 1519, 4to; Furth, 1778, 4to); —טָבִיאֵל טַבִּיאֵל, on the Halachoth (Venezia, 1519, 4to, and often; Furth, 1778, 4to); —דַּרְבּוּחַ דַּרְבּוּחַ, or Expositions on Rashi’s Commentary to the Pentateuch (Venezia, 1519, 4to, and often); —דַּרְבּוּחַ דַּרְבּוּחַ, Commentary on the Book Shaab’aare Dura of Isaac Duren (Venezia, 1548, 4to, and often); etc. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 220 sq.; First, Bibloth. Jud., ii, 154; Fränkel, Israel Isserlin (Lub. d. Or. 1847), c. 675-678. (J. H. W.)

Isserles, Moshe ben-Israel, a celebrated Polish Rabbi, was born at Cracow in 1520. The son of a very wealthy man, and a relative of the distinguished savant Meir Katzenellenbogen ben of Papeisa, he owed an affec- tionate advantage to the fact of natural abilities. He died in 1573. The writings of Isserles are very varied, covering the departments of theological, exegetical, ecclesiastical, and even historical and philosophical literature. In all of these he was perfectly at home. His most important works are רַבִּי מֹשֶׁה, on Parashoth and other subjects of Jewish Antiquities (Venezia, 1599); —יִשְׂרָאֵל, or Commentary on the Book of Esther (Crémone, 1598, 4to; Amsterdam, 1769, 4to). For a list of all his works, see First, Bibloth. Jud., 155 sq. See Fränkel, M. s. b. Israele genannt Mosche Isserle, in the Orientalen. Literaturblatt (1847), c. 827-830; Grätz, Gesch. d. Isahiah (a, 1 Chron. xxiv, 21; b, 1 Chron. xxiv, 25). See ISAIAH.

Isaure, besides its ordinary sense of going forth (Iz2), Chal. to flow, Dan. vii. 10; also יָצָא, extr., e. source. Prov. ix. 18, frequently of the direction or terminus of a bound and περικοιν, to run round, Gal. ii. 18), and progeny (רַבָּיָה, Gen. xlviii. 6, elsewhere “benedicted”; פָּעֲמָה, smartphones, i.e. offspring, Is. xxiii. 24; στριγις, seed, Matt. xxii. 20), is the rendering employed by our translators for several terms expressive of a purulent or unhealthy discharge, especially from the sexual organs. The most emphatic of these is יָצָא, from יָצָא, to flow, both the word and noun being frequently applied to diseased or unusual secretions, e. g. the monthly courses of women, and the seminal flux on gonorrhoea benigna of men (Lev. xv; Numb. v. 2). See Disease. A more intense and chronic form of this discharge was the “issue of blood,” or uterine hemmorhage of the woman in the Gospels (πιστις αἰματος, Mark v, 25; Luke viii, 43, 44; αἰμοποιεις, Matt. ix, 20), which, as it made her ceremonially unclean, not only filled her with grief, but also in concealing when she came in contact with the multitude and with Christ. (See monographs in bolleding, Index, p. 49; Hase, Leben Jesu, p. 141.) The term מִסְרָה, Ezek. xxiii, 20, signifies a pouring, and is applied to the emissio seminis of a stallion, to which the idiosyncratic proportions of Jews are compared in the strong language of the prophet. (See Animal. The only other term so rendered is מֵרֶח, a fountain, applied to the womb, or puellula muliebrosa, as the source of the menstrual discharge (Lev. xii, 7; xx, 18; comp. Ex. 29, 29).

See FLUX.

"The texts Lev. xv, 2, 3; xxii, 4; Numb. v, 2 (and 2 Sam. iii, 29, where the malady is invoked as a curse), are probably to be interpreted of gonorrhoea. In Lev. xv, 23, the term is introduced, it is merely meant that the cessation of the actual flux does not constitute ceremonial cleanness, but that the patient must abide the legal time, seven days (ver. 13), and perform the prescribed purifications and sacrifice (ver. 14). See, however, Surenhusius's preface to the treatise Zobim of the Manna, where another interpretation is given, for, as regards the specific varieties of this malady, it is generally asserted that its most severe form (gom. virilenta) is modern, having first appeared in the 15th century. Chardin (Voyages en Perse, ii, 200) states that he observed that this disorder was prevalent in Persia, but that its effects were far less severe than in Western climates. If this be true, it would go some way to explain the alleged absence of the "gom. viril." from ancient nosology, which found its field of observation in the East, Greece, etc., and to confirm the supposition that the medical form of the malady was the subject of the Roman legislation. But, beyond this, it is probable that diseases may appear, run their course, and disappear, and, for want of an accurate observation of their symptoms, leave no trace behind them. The "bed," "seat," etc. (Lev. xv, 5, 6, etc.), are not to be supposed to have been regarded by that law as contagious, but the defilement extended to them merely to give greater prominence to the ceremonial strictness with which the case was ruled. In the woman's issue, (v. 19), the ordinary menstruation seems alone intended, supposed to be prolonged (v. 25) to a morbid extent. The scriptural handling of the subject not dealing, as in the case of leprosy, in symptoms, it seems gratuitous to detail them here: those who desire such knowledge will find them in any compendium of therapeutics. See Josephus, Wars, v, 6, 5; vi, 9, 3; Mithna, Chelum, i, 3, 8; Maimon. ad Zobim, ii, 2: whence we learn that persons thus affected might not ascend the Temple mount, nor share in any religious celebration, nor even enter Jerusalem. Istalcurus. In 1 Esdr. viii, 40, the 'son of Is-talcurus' (Ezra 10, 30) is designated for 'Zabud' and of the corresponding list in Ezra (viii, 14). The Kerî has Zikkur instead of Zabud, and of this there is perhaps some trace in Istalcurus.

Italian (Tralatico) occurs but once in Scripture, in the translation of the "Ital. hand," i.e. Roman cohors, to which Cornelius belonged (Acts x, 1)." This seems to have been a cohort of Italians separate from the legionary soldiers, and not a cohort of the 'Legio Italicâ,' of which we read at a later period (Tacitus, Hist. i, 59, 64; ii, 109; iii, 14) as being raised by Nero (Dio Cass. lv, 24; Sueton. Nero, 19). See Biscop, On the Acts (300 sq.) Wieseler (Chronol. p. 145) thinks they were Italian volunteers; and there is an inscription in Gruter in which the following words occur: 'Coehors militorum Italorum voluntarii, quae est in Syria' (see Ackerman, Numismatic Illustrations, p. 843) (Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul's, i, 138). There is a monograph on the subject: Schwarz, De cohorte Italicâ et Augusta (Altdorf, 1720). See COHORT.

Italian School of Philosophy. By the Italian school is properly understood the blending of the Pythagorean and Eleatic systems of philosophy into one. It is sometimes, however, used of the Pythagorean system merely. The reason for designating it as the Italian school is because Pythagoras is said to have taught in Italy. See PYTHAGORAS.

The Church and the Scriptures. The earliest translation of the Bible into the modern Italian is said to have been made by Giacomo da Virgaggio (Jacopo da Veragino), archbishop of Genoa, in the beginning of the 18th century. This rests exclusively on the authority of Sixtus Senensis (Bibloth. Sumpt. lib. iv), and there is no evidence that the work is preserved. That at an early period, however, versions of parts, if not of the whole of Scripture into Italian were made, is evinced by the fact that there exist in various libraries MSS. containing them. In the Royal Library at Paris is an Italian Bible in two vols. fol. as well as several codices containing parts of the Bible in that language; in the library at Upsala is a Codex containing a history compiled from the first seven books of the O. T. in Italian; in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, is an Italian translation of the N. T., with portions of the Old, and in other libraries the relics are preserved (see Le Long, Bib. Soc. cap. vi, § 1).

The earliest printed Italian Bible is that of Nicolò di Malermi (or Malherbi), a Venetian Benedictine monk of the order of Camaldoli: it appeared under the title of Bibbia Vulgare Historiata, etc. (Ven. 1471). The translation of Malermi, however, is almost wholly a Latin translation, the original being reserved to be executed in a harsh style and carelessly (Hist. Crit. du N. T. p. 487). It was, however, repeatedly reprinted; the best editions are that superintended by Marini (Ven. 1477, 2 vols. fol.), and that issued at Venice in 1567 (1 vol. fol.). In 1550 Antonio Bruchioli issued his translation of the N. T. in Italy, which was the first edition of his translation of the entire Bible, containing a revised and corrected translation of the N. T., under the title of La Biblia che contiene Sacri libri del vecchio Testamento tradotto nuovamente da la Hebraïca verissima in lingua Toscanca, con diversi libri del N. T. tradotti da Grece in lingua Tosc. con privilegio di lo incìdo Senato Vaticano e lettera a Francesco I, Rege Christianissimo (fol. Venic, ap. Luc. Ant. Junta). This translation is said by Simon to follow in the O. T. the Latin version of Pagnini rather than to be made from the original Hebrew, and to contain many more words of Italian and barbarous construction than the original. It was put in the index of the prohibited books among works of the first class. Many editions of it, however, appeared, of which the most important is that of Zaniotti (Ven. 1540, 3 vols. fol.). Bruchioli's version of the O. T. in a corrected form was printed at Geneva in 1562, along with a new version of the N. T. by Galvani and Bonsignori; this was reprinted in 1572. In 1560 this notes are added, and especially an exposition of the Apocalypse. The translation of Marmocchi, though professedly original, is, in reality, only a revised edition of that of Bruchioli, the design of which was to bring it more fully into accordance with the Vulgate. Several translations of the Psalms (some from the Hebrew) and of other parts of Scripture appeared in Italy between the middle and end of the 16th century, and a new translation of the N. T. by a Florentine of the name of Zacharia, appeared in 1542 at Venice, and at Florence in 1544. These translations are now extremely rare. The Jew David de Pompis issued a translation of Ecclesiastes with the original Hebrew (Ven. 1578).

In 1607 appeared at Geneva the first Protestant Italian version—that of Giovanni Diodati (La Biblia: See I Libri del Vecchio e del Nuovo Testamento [sm. fol.]). To this is attached a brief marginal translation. This version was made directly from the original texts, and stands in high esteem for fidelity. It has been repeatedly reprinted. Being in the plain Luochese dialect, it is especially adapted for circulation among the common people, and is now adopted by the Bible Societies.
ITALIC VERSION

ITALY

The N. T. appeared at Turin in 1769, and the O. T. in 1779, both accompanied with the text of the Vulgate, and with copious notes, chiefly from the fathers. This work received the approbation of pope Pius VI. It was printed for Chief Dr. G. F. Le Couteur, and in the pure Tuscan dialect. Repeated editions have appeared; one, printed at Livorno (Leghorn), and those issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society (Lond., 1813, 1821), want the notes, and have consequently been placed in the index of prohibited books. To read and circulate text edition of the New Testament, a translation which was, till lately, a grave offense, as the well-known case of the Madia in Florence proves. See VURSIONS.

ITALIC Version (Vetus Itala), the usual name of the old Latin version of the Scriptures, used prior to the days of Augustus and Jerome, and probably made in Northern Africa in the 2d century. The Italic, however, is a proper translation of this old Latin version, which was in use in Northern Italy, or around Milan. Fragments of it have been preserved by Blanchini and Sabatier (Eadie, Eccles., Dict. s. v.). Portions containing the books of Leviticus and Numbers have been published by Eadie (London, 1843). An ancient Codex is in his library. See LATIN VERSIONS.

ITALY (Italia, of uncertain etymology), the name of the country of which Rome was the capital (Acts xviii., 2; xxvii., 1, 6; Heb. xii., 24). This, like most geographical names, was differently applied at different periods. In the earliest times the name "Italy" included only the little peninsula of Calabria (Strabo, v. 1). The country now called Italy was then isolated by a number of nations distinct in origin, language, and government, such as the Gauls, Ligurians, and Veneti on the north, and the Pelasgi, Sabines, Etrurians, etc., on the south. But, as the power of Rome advanced, these nations were successively annexed to the great state, and the name "Italy" extended also, till it came to be applied to the whole country south of the Alps, and Polybius seems to use it in this sense (i, 6; ii, 14). For the progress of the history of the world, see Smith's Dictionary of Classical Geography, s. v. From the time of the close of the republic it was employed as we employ it now, i.e. in its true geographical sense, as denoting the whole natural peninsula between the Alps and the Straits of Messina. In the New Testament it occurs three, or, indeed, more correctly speaking, four times. In Acts x, 1, the Italian cohort at Cesarea (αποστάραι των Ἰταλίων, A. V. "Italian band"), consisting, as it doubtless did, of men recruited in Italy, illustrates the military relations of the imperial peninsula with the provinces. See ANZAR. In Acts xviii., 2, where we are told of the expulsion of Aquila and Priscilla with their compatriots from Italy, we are reminded of the large Jewish population which many authorities show that it contained. Acts xxvii., 1, where the beginning of St. Paul's voyage "to Italy" is mentioned, and the whole subsequent narrative, illustrates the trade which subsisted between the peninsula and other parts of the Mediterranean. Lastly, the words in Heb. xiii., 24, "They of Italy (οἱ Ἰταλοὶ) ἐλάχιστα σαλέουσαν," whatever they may prove for or against this being the region in which the letter was written (and the matter has been strongly argued both ways), are interesting as a specimen of the progress of Christianity through the West. A few fragments of the divisions and history of ancient Italy may be found in Anthon's Class. Dict. s. v. Italia. See ROMA.

ITALY, MODERN, a kingdom in Southern Europe, with an area of 112,852 square miles, and a population in 1870 of 50,500,000 inhabitants. The name originally belonged to the southern point of the Apennine peninsula alone; at the time of Thucydides it embraced the whole southern coast from the river Luan, on the Tyrrenian Sea, to Metapontum, on the Sicilian Straits; after the conquest of Tarentum by the Romans it was extended to all the country from the Sicilian Straits to the Arno or Rubicon; finally, at the time of Augustus, it came to be used of the whole of the peninsula. In a still wider sense it was, under Constantine, the name of one of the four chief divisions of the Roman Empire, and was divided into three (according to others into four or two) dioceses—Illyria, Africa, and Italy Proper. But this wider significance died out with the dissolution of the Roman Empire, and the name has since been confined to the Apennine peninsula. It denoted a country, the people of which gradually took up one national, united by the same language, literature, and habits, but which never, for any length of time, constituted one political commonwealth. Not until 1859 did the national aspirations for unity succeed in erecting by far the larger portion of the peninsula into the kingdom of Italy; in 1866 Venetia, in 1870 the duchy of Rome, and in 1871 the republic of Rome completed the structure of national unity.

I. Church History.—(1.) The planting of Christianity in Italy can be traced to the first years of the Christian era. The apostle Peter, according to old accounts, visited Rome as early as A.D. 45, but no satisfactory evidence can be adduced for the assertion that the Roman theologians that Peter was at any time bishop of the church of Rome, and still less that he held this office for twenty-five years. In 58 the Christians, together with the Jews, were expelled from Rome by order of the emperor Claudius. This ban was not removed until the time of the emperor Vespasian (A.D. 69-79). The event of 62 (Acts xii., 25) indicates that the Church in Rome was at that time fully organized. Under Nero, Peter and Paul were probably put to death, together with numerous other professors of Christianity. Among those who were put to death under Domitian (81-96) was Flavius Clemens, a nephew of Clement I. In the time of Trajan and Nerva (98-98), many different churches in Italy, besides those of Rome, trace their foundation to assistants of the apostles; thus Barnabas is said to have established the Church of Milan, Mark the Church of Aquileia, Apollinaris the Church at Ravenna. The churches of Lucua, Fiesole, Bologna, Bari, Benevento, Capua, Naples, Palermo, Syracuse, Pavia, Urbino, Mantua, Verona, Fies, Florence, and Sienna also claim to be of apostolic origin. That many of the churches were really organized during the first century is not doubted, but hardly any of them has a documentary history which ascends beyond the beginning of the 2d century. Even the beginning of the Church of Rome is so involved in obscurity that it is not known in which order the first four bishops succeeded each other. From the beginning of the 2d century bishoprics rapidly increased, and down to the year 311 there are enumerated many seats of bishops in all the provinces of Italy, the first epistle of St. Clement (A.D. 90) to the Corinthians, Soter (A.D. 175 sq.) was written to the bishops of Campania, and his second to the bishops of Italy. The Roman bishop Zephyrinus (203-211) addressed his first epistle to all the bishops of Sicily, and Eusebius his third to the bishops of Tuscia and Campania. A "Provincial Synod of Rome," consisting of twelve bishops, was presided over by Telesphorus (142-154); it was followed by a synod under Anicetus (167-175); another in 197; and many more in the 3d century. At the beginning of the 4th century Christianity was so firmly established throughout Italy that the papacy could meet no notable resistance when Christianity under Constantine the Great became the religion of the state. The apostacy of Julian retarded but little the victory of Christianity, which became complete when, towards the close of the 4th century, Constantius exterminated paganism by law. At the beginning of the 5th century the close of the early period of the Church one of the three great bishops of the Christian Church (Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch), the churches of Italy became subordinate to his superintendence and jurisdiction; only the Church provinces of the metropolitan of Milan and Aquileia remained independent of the jurisdictions of the Church of Rome for many more centuries. The more the power of the bishops of Rome rose, the more the Church his4

Italy is absorbed in her history, the history of the papacy and Rome. In no other country of Europe was the unity of faith better preserved and less interrupted than in Italy. The rule of the Arian Goths (488-568) lasted too short a time to establish Arianism on a firm foundation, and all the following changes in the secular government of the country recognised the profession of Catholicism. Opinion divided almost equally between Church and State. During the Middle Ages was but little disturbed by heretical sects; the Catharists and Pasagii never became powerful, and soon disappeared; only the Waldensians, in the remote valleys of Piedmont, survived all persecution. See PAPACY.

The Reformation.—Italy, like other countries, had her forerunners of the Reformation, the most prominent of whom was the Dominican monk Savarola (q.v.), who fearlessly advocated a radical reform of the Church. The revival of the classical studies on the one hand, and the corruption which prevailed at the papal court on the other, disposed at the beginning of the 16th century many minds towards abandoning the doctrines of Rome. In general, however, the tendency towards freethinking was stronger among the malcontents than the wish for a religious reform. One of the first impulses towards a reaction was made in the time of Leo X by some twenty excommunicated, who formed a society for the purpose of rekindling in the Church a spirit of piety in opposition to the prevailing corruption. Among them were Cajetan, subsequently founder of the order of the Theatines; Caraffa, subsequently pope Paul IV; and Cardinal Gonzaga, eventually cardinal. All of them desired to effect a reformation within the Church, though some of them strongly inclined towards the reformatory doctrine of justification by faith alone. This to class of reformers belonged also Brucioli, who published an Italian translation of the Bible (1530-1532), and the most prominent of this movement were Foscarini, bishop of Modena; San Felice, bishop of Cava; cardinal Morone, Grimani, patriarch of Aquileia, and Folegno, a pious Benedictine of Monte Casino. In consequence of the frequent intercourse of Upper Italy with Germany, and the sympathy of the writings of Luther and other reformers began to circulate in Italy from the beginning of the Reformation. To evade the Inquisition, they were generally published either anonymously, or under the name of other authors.

Venice appears to have been the first city of Italy in which the Reform took root. This was chiefly due to its constant intercourse with Germany, and to the independent position maintained by that republic towards the see of Rome. As early as 1520 Luther received news from Venice that a great need was felt there of evangelical preachers and books, and in 1528 he was informed that the cause was making good progress. The fact that Venice was a refuge for all who in other parts of Italy were persecuted for their faith was likewise favorable to the progress of Protestantism. The proceedings of the Diet of August (1530) excited the attention of the friends of the Reformation at Venice. A high degree, and Lucio Paulo wrote a pressing letter in their name to Melanthon, imploring him to resist the last. Even priests were found in the evangelical party, as Valdo Lupetino, provincial of the Franciscans, who advised his relative, M. Flacius, of Ilyria, afterward of the champion of Protestantism in the service of Germany, where he would learn a better theology than he would find in a convent (1537). Through such men, who were in personal communication with the reformers, Venice remained regularly connected with Wittenberg. In 1539 Melanthon sent an epsistle to Venice which affords most valuable information concerning the position of the evangelical party in that city at that time. The evangelical party increased not only in the city of Venice, but in the whole territory of the republic, particularly at Vicenza and Treviso, and it does not appear that the government ever interfered with its peaceful development.

It is only after 1540 that, at the stagnation of Rome, the Protestants of the Venetian republic began to experience serious difficulties. Although very numerous, they had not till then organized themselves into a society. They were obliged to observe the greatest caution and secrecy. They were without a leader, and, besides, there were differences of opinion dividing them. But in 1541, George the Aquila, and secretary of the English ambassador, succeeded in uniting them. He also wrote to Luther, asking him to obtain for the Protestants, through the intercession of German Protestant princes, permission from the pope to act according to the dictates of their consciences. But the council showed only the points of difference. He also invoked the mediation of Luther to allay the manifold divisions which weakened the Protestants of Venice. As Italy had intercourse with Switzerland as well as with Germany, both the Reformed and the Lutheran reformations had found their adherents; and, in particular, disputes arose about the doctrine of the Eucharist. Bucer had in vain endeavored to heal these difficulties, and it was now expected that Luther would be more successful. The answer of Luther expressed, however, distrust towards the Swiss and their doctrines, and warned the people against the works of Bucer. The declamation was on the same side; the tone of Luther's answer, as he knew the Italians to be only too prone to indulge in discussions and arguments on disputed points of doctrine. Probably about this time secret societies began to be formed for the discussion of theological doctrines privately. Basically anti-Trinitarian; and those anti-Trinitarian schemes which, in the following century, separated Italian Protestantism from that of other countries, originated in them. About 1542 the principles of Protestantism were introduced into Istria by Paolo Vergerio, bishop of Capo d'Istria, and for a while made rapid progress, but was soon interrupted. After opposing Protestantism for a long while, particularly in Germany, where he was for a while papal legate, and took part as such in the Conference of Worms, Vergerio was, by the reading of Luther's works, which he had procured for the purpose of refraining them, brought to embrace their views. His first convert was his brother, the bishop of Pola. Both now labored zealously, and with great success, to evangelize their dioceses, until in 1545 the Inquisition finally interfered, and Vergerio was obliged to flee.

Next to Venice, Ferrara became one of the principal centers of Protestantism. It was introduced there by Renata, wife of Hercules II, duke of Ferrara, and the daughter of Louis XII, king of France. She had become acquainted with the doctrines of the Reformation through Margaret of Navarre, and when she came to Ferrara in 1527, she soon found herself surrounded by persons holding the same views. Some were scholars who held offices in the university or at court, while others were refugees who, persecuted in their own country for their Protestant opinions, found there a safe refuge. Calvin himself spent a few months there in 1536, and ever after remained in active correspondence with the duchess; also Hubert Languet, who distinguished himself in the history of the French Reformation. Among the Italians were Filippo and Calcagno, a friend of Contarini and Poole: Peter Martyr Vermigli, Aonio Palerio, and Celio Secundo Carbone, who won over Peregrino Morato, the tutor of the young Renata, to Protestantism. The learned daughter of Morato, Olympia, whose letters express a truly evangelical spirit, was one of the ornaments of the court, and the companion of the young daughter of Renata.

From Ferrara probably the movement spread over to Modena, which belonged also to the dukedom of Ferrara. Already in 1530 a papal rescript commanded the Inquisition to use every exertion to suppress the heretical tendency among the monks of the dioce of Ferrara. Yet the movement did not really break out until 1549, when the learned Sicilian Paolo Ricci came to Modena.
and established a congregation there. Ladies of high rank protected the new doctrine, especially a certain countess Rangone. As a sign of the spirit of opposition against Rome, we may mention the satires which were published, as, for instance, a letter purporting to come from Jesus Christ, and worded in the manner of the papal bulls, denouncing the pope and the Church, and calling for the overthrow of the Church itself. Cardinal Morone, bishop of Modena, although evangelically inclined himself, complained much in his letters (1640-1654), written during his stay in Germany as papal legate for the progress of Protestantism in his diocese, and said he was told that Modena had become Lutheran. But with the news of the progress of the Reformation came also the information that the differences concerning the Eucharist had arisen, and Bucer wrote to the Protostants of Modena and Bologna to heal the breach (1541). At Bologna, the Germans who came there to attend the university gained many supporters to evangelical views; the most important among them was Giovanni Mollio, a Minorite, who labored long as a preacher and professor. The presence of the Saxon ambassador, John of Planiz, who came in 1542 with Charles V, afforded an opportunity to present a request in which they asked for the convocation of a synod, and expressed their inclination for the German princes who had protected Protestantism in their states. They hoped by the council to get fresh from the yoke of Rome, and to obtain religious liberty at such a time that their efforts would only prove a mission to use their Bibles without being on that account considered as heretics. The movement was propagated also through other parts of the Papal States, at Faenza and Imola; and in Rome itself there were many who privately agreed with the doctrines of Luther. In Naples, the principles of the Reformation were time and time again by the German soldiery in 1527, and they appear to have taken root, for an imperial edict was issued in 1586 to counteract the Protestant tendencies by threatening the severest punishments against the so-called heretics. Yet in the same year the emperor himself sent to Naples the man who was destined to play the most important part in the evangelization of Italy. Juan Valdez came to Naples as secretary of the vicerey. Position, education, intelligence, and character combined to make him influential. A small but eminent circle silently followed him, now receiving by subscription and the promotion of an inner, living Christianity. Among them were count Galeazzo Caracciolo, nephew of pope Paul IV; the martyr Pietro Carnevaschi, Roman protonotary; Giulia Gonzaga, duchess of trajetto; Vittoria Colonna, the widow of Pescara; and the noble confessor Antonio Mazzocchi. Valdez only continued his evangelizing labors for four years: he died in 1540. But his work was continued by two of his followers, Pietro Martyr Vermiglione and Bernardino Occhino. The former, having been sent as prior to an Augustinian convent at Naples, read some of Bucer's and Zwingle's works, and, having become converted to their doctrines, he began working in the same direction as Valdez. He delivered lectures on the epistles of St. Paul, which were attended not only by his own monks, but also by the most distinguished members of the clergy and the laity. In the mean time the Capuchin Occhino, confessor of Paul IV, general of his order, and one of the most eminent men of the Church at the time, was invited to preach the Lent sermons at Naples, first in 1556, and again in 1559. An attentive reading of the Bible had already caused him to regard faith as the only means of salvation; his intercourse with Valdez strengthened these views; he began preaching justification by faith, and gained many adherents by his fiery eloquence. Although none of these men thought as yet to separate from the Church of Rome, they were soon looked upon with suspicion by the authorities. The Theologian, friend of the zealot Caraffa, was the first to call attention to them. Vermiglione was summoned to appear, and to justify himself, but was saved from any annoyance this time by the interference of several cardinals. Soon after, having been at Naples for about three years, he demanded his recall; and having been appointed prior at Lucca, he began to labor for the evangelization of this new field. New persecutions finally decided him to separate openly from the Church of Rome, and to go to the country for safety. Three of his most intimate disciples accompanied him: Paolo Lasio, afterwards professor at Strasbourg, Theodotus Trebbiolo, and Giulio Terenziano. Eighteen others followed him soon after; among them Cesare Martinengo, who died later of the Italian persecution at Geneva; Em. Tremelio, who, after various vicissitudes, became professor of Hebrew at the Academy of Sedan, and H. Zanchi, who occupied a distinguished place among the most eminent theologians of Germany. At Florence Vermiglione met with Occhino, who, stimulated by his example, also sacrificed his position, and left Italy. Another champion of the Reformation, the learned Celio Secundo Curione, replaced for a while Martyr in the congregation at Lucca, and afterwards labored at various places, until he also was obliged to seek safety in flight, and went to Switzerland. The movement was general throughout Italy. Many admitted that no reforms were to be expected from the Church or its hierarchy, and separated from it, some silently, others openly; the latter inclined more and more to a union with the Protostants of Germany and Switzerland. Still a large number retained the belief of the Church and the necessity of the necessary reforms, either by the long-wished-for council, or by other concessions. The evangelical tendencies finally acquired such influence, even among the clergy, that pope Paul III thought it best to make apparently some concessions; he appointed Contarini, Bembo, and Frengi, and also Caraffa, members of the college of cardinals. As a preliminary step towards the convocation of a council, he formed them, together with some other prelates, into a congregation, with the mission of drawing up a project of the reforms most needed. Soon, however, the uncompromising opponents of all reformatory measures gained the ascendency with the pope, and it was resolved to put down the reformatory movement at any price. A superior tribunal of the Inquisition was established at Rome, with full power of life and death in all cases concerning religious truths and practices; and the different provinces. The pope alone had the power of pardoning those they had condemned. The new institution was soon adopted in Tuscany, Milan, and Naples; all the Italian states gave it the necessary support. Venice itself was unable to resist its introduction, though heresy judges were joined to the inquisitors. Books were also subjected to the judgment of the Inquisition; after 1543 no book was permitted to be published without its sanction, and soon there appeared lists of forbidden books. Next to the Inquisition, the Council of Trent proved a heavy blow to Italian Protestantism. Many who were not of the society of Jesus were induced to return to the old fold; many others left their native land for safety, and a great number became martyrs to their faith in dungeons or at the stake. Rome gave the signal of most of the persecutions which the Protostants suffered in Italy. Caraffa had spies everywhere, and wherever they went more than their mission, in flight were Occhino and Vermiglione. The congregation which had been established by them and Valdez at Naples was subjected to severe attacks as soon as the latter was dead; many of its members gave way under the persecution, and the others were obliged to flee. The only remaining publication was the "Morte di Montalbano," a Franciscan, still officiated among them for some time, but she was obliged to leave Naples in 1548. An Augustian from Sicily, Lorenzo Romano, subsequently shared the same fate, who had laboured faithfully for the holy cause.

The congregation founded at Lucca by Peter Vermigl met with the same fate. Rome compelled the senate in 1545 to issue severe edicts against the Protestants, who here also submitted to outward conformity, and by so doing lost the spirit which had animated them, so that when in 1552 the Inquisition came to Rome, they found the greater number became reconciled to the Church.
Many, however, resisted to the last, and a number of prominent citizens left for Geneva, Berne, Lyon, and other places. See Inquisition.

The prospect of escapes, died of starvation, or was no longer able to protect her fellow-Protestants. A papal decree commanded that all suspicious persons should be examined; imprisonment, banishment, death, or, at best, flight, was the usual fate of the accused. Fannio, of Faenza, fell a martyr to his faith. Renata herself was much persecuted by her husband, but remained steadfast, and after her husband's death retired to France, where she showed herself a courageous protector of the Protestants. All Italy was awed into obedience by the Inquisition. The prisons at Rome were filled with prisoners brought from all parts of Italy. Mollie, having returned from Naples to Bologna, was arrested, and brought to Rome to be examined. The Gospel had made great progress among the Franciscans, especially in Upper Italy; a large number of them were imprisoned, others escaped, and most of them were compelled to recant. The persecution became still more violent when Caraffa himself, aged seventy-nine years, and in his last days, had the misfortune to be charged with the name of Paul IV. To purify and restore the Church was his chief aim, and, in order to attain this, he was most zeal ous in the persecution of all unbelievers and heretics.
He spared none—not even the leaders of the moderate reform party. The most distinguished of these (Con-tarini being dead), cardinal Morone, remained a prisoner until the pope's death, in the castle of St. Angelo. Bishop Foscari, of Modena, and San Felice, of Cava, were also arrested, while cardinal Poole was summoned to come from England to justify himself. Among the chief points of accusation against Morone were that he doubted the correctness of the decisions of the Council of Trent, especially in regard to justification; that he rejected the efficiency of good works, and advised his hearers to trust only in the redeeming sacrifice of Christ.
The first martyr in the reign of Paul IV was Pomponio Albergati, of Florence. He, who had been educated in the spirit of evangelical views at Padua, died courageously at the stake. Under Pius IV, the Inquisition did not relent in its work. He was himself present at an auto-da-fé at which Ludovico Pascali, a minister of the Wal-denses of Calabria, was executed. When the Dominican Giolieri, former president of the Inquisition, and a worthy disciple of Caraffa, ascended the papal throne in 1566, under the name of Pius V, the Inquisition entered a new era of prosperity. He accomplished the final suppression of Protestantism in Italy. Prisoners were sent to Rome from all parts of Italy. The duke of Flor-eence himself sent there, as his peace-offering, the emiinent apostolical protonotary, Pietro Camescechi, whom his learning, piety, and position had heretofore protected, and who now became a martyr. The same fate befell Antonio del Pagliarici (Aonio Falcaro), who, as professed reformer, had acquired universal reputation, and who is generally considered as the author of the treatise Del Beneficio di Christo, a truly evangelical work, which, by its clear exposition of the doctrine of justification by faith, gain-eared many adherents to Protestantism.

The numerous Protestants of Venetia also experienced the effects of the papal persecution, although the repubclic resisted the Inquisition, and sought to counteract it by a number of decrees. Already, in 1542, the papal nuncio Della Casa procured the arrest of a priest, Giulio Milanese, and, soon after, that of the provincial of the Minorites, Baldo Luponino. The former, however, succceeded in making good his escape. In 1546 pope Paul III gave a bull absolving the Catholics of the country, some recanted, and others were imprisoned for life. The persecution was still more violent in the neighborhood of Venice than in the city itself. The bishop of Bergamo himself, Soranzo, was obliged to go to Rome to give an account of his faith, which was录入 by the Inquisition. He was sentenced to banishment to the best of the greatest dangers. Altiieri, who had so often obtained protection for the Italian Protestants from the princes forming the League of Smalcald, was at last in danger himself, and, after many years exile, in 1555, he was allowed to return to Italy, and took up his residence at Brescia in 1560. After 1557, foreigners who were on his study or commerce received, however, some degree of protection. This encouraged the native Protestants, who called a minister, and again formed a congregation in private. They were soon betrayed, and most of them imprisoned. The senate now for the first time consent-et that their offence should be punished by death. They were not burnt, however, but thrown into the sea at night. Baldo Luponino was among these. The destruction of the little church of the Waldenses, who, since the end of the 14th century, had settled at St.
Pisto in Calabria, was decreed in 1566. A few years later episodes of the sad history of Italian Protestantism.
The other evangelical communities of Locarno, etc., met with the same fate.

(3.) Church History from the Suppression of the Reformation until the present Day.—Throughout the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries Italy remained dismembered into a number of small states, which prevented the people from becoming one consolidated nation. Its ecle-siastic history during this period is as unimportant as the political. Only once an era of ecclesiastical reformation appeared, when Leo I, pope and pontiff of Tuscany, brother of emperor Joseph II, attempted, by the agency of Scipio Ricci, bishop of Pistoia and Prato, to reform the polity of the Church. At a synod of his clergy which Ricci assembled at Pistoia (1786), and which was largely attended, the principles of the Gallican Church, and of the most liberal faction of the Church, were adopted; the prerogatives claimed by the popes, and, in particular, the claim of infallibility, were severely denounced, many superstitious ceremonies were abolished, and it was determined that public worship should be conducted in the language of the people, and that the bishops and clergy should be paid by the crown. Many enactments were opposed by most of the bishops of Tuscany, and when Leopold ascended the imperial throne of Austria, the hierarchy obtained a complete victory.
The territorial changes which the French republic and the first Napoleon introduced in Italy were not of lon-duration, but the revolutionary ideas which during this period had been kindled in the minds of many Italians survived. A secret society, the Carbonari, which at first aimed at the introduction of a universal republic, but subsequently had the establishment of a national union and the introduction of liberal reforms, and, in particular, religious toleration, for its chief object, spread with great rapidity throughout the peninsula, and became the rallying-point for all the educated Italians who wished to break the omnipotent influence of the Church upon the political and social affairs of the people. The Carbonari succeeded in 1821 in compelling the government of the Two Sicilies to grant a liberal constitution, but an armed intervention of the Austrians soon restored the absolute power of the king and the despotic influence of the Church. It was, however, apparent that the great masses of Italy only yield to military force, and that the desire to be independent of the people from the influence of the priests, and, in particular, from the temporal rule of the popes, became stronger every year. In 1830 a new revolution broke out in the papal provinces, and within a fortnight four fifths of the States of the Church had made themselves free from papal rule, and constituted themselves an independent state. Again it required the armed intervention of Austria to arrest the success of the liberal and anti-papal movement throughout Italy. The accession to the throne of Sardinia of Charles Albert in 1831 gave, however, to Italy one prince who openly adhered to the principles of the national liberal party, and therefore awakened great hopes for the future. In the same year Mazzini organized the secret society Young Italy, which repeatedly attempted insurrections for the purpose of establishing an Italian republic. All these attempts were, however, checked; and it is generally agreed that the breach between the Italian people and the Church of Rome. The liberal priest V. Gioberti, in his work on the moral and political prudence of the Italians (1849), endeavored to prove that a reconciliation between the national liberal party and a reformed papacy was possible, and that the best way for securing a political regeneration of Italy was the establishment of a confederation of the several states, with a liberal pope at its head. When, in 1846, Gregory XVI died, and the new pope, Pius IX, seemed to adopt some of the views of Gioberti, the belief in the practicability of the scheme found many adherents among the liberal party, but they greatly feared that the ultramontane party looked upon them with distrust, and even regarded many steps taken by the new pope as a mistaken policy.

The revolutionary movements of 1848 at first appeared to afford a great hope to the liberals of the country. In Rome a Constituent Assembly was called, which on Feb. 5, 1849, abolished the temporal power of the pope, and proclaimed the Roman republic. The greatest enemies of the papacy in Italy, Mazzini and Garibaldi, were at the head of the republic, which, however, only a few months later (June 4), was struck down by the French troops, which Louis Napoleon, the president of the French republic, had sent there for the restoration of the temporal power. But, although the revolutionary movements, which, if successful, would have abolished throughout Italy the prerogatives of the Church of Rome, were unsuccessful, one of the state governments, Sardinia, remained favorable to the cause of national union and of a liberal legislation in the province of Church affairs. The Legislature, in 1850, adopted liberal laws, introduced by the minister Siccardi (hence called the Siccardi laws), which provided, 1, that all civil rights and obligations were to be held in civil courts and in civil law, and were to be subject to the common law; 2, that all priests in criminal cases be subject to the jurisdiction of the state; 3, that criminals may be arrested in churches and other sacred places. When archbishop Francesco, of Turin, resisted the civil law, the state, he was punished; and when he refused the sacraments of the Church to the dying minister Santa Rosa, he was deposed from his office (Sept. 26, 1850) and exiled. The archbishop of Cagliari shared his fate. In the threatening allocations of the pope (the first dated Nov. 1, 1860), the government replied by sequestrating the revenues of the archbishop. In consequence of the violent opposition made to the government by the monks, the minis try of Cavour (1852-1858), the greatest Italian statesman of modern times, issued the stringent laws of March 2, 1855, by which the convents of all monks who did not devote themselves to public instruction, but to the nursing of the sick were suppressed (381 out of 905). The papal anathemas against the authors of these laws remained without the least effect. On the contrary, when the king of Sardinia, in consequence of the war against Austria and the unsuccessful revolutions in Paris and southern Italy, united all the provinces of Italy, with the only exception of a part of the papal territory and of Venice, into the kingdom of Italy, the liberal Sardinian laws were not only retained, but made more stringent. Nobody seemed to care about the Church laws against those who apostatized from the patriotic and royal squares of the States of the Church), and on Jan. 1, 1866, the obligatory civil marriage was introduced. The government and the Parliament were fully agreed in the wish to complete, as soon as possible, the unity of Italy, by the annexation of Venetia and the remainder of the papal territory, inclusive of the city of Rome. In accordance with the plan of Cavour, the Parliament, as early as 1861, united with the province of Milan the capital of Italy, though they expressed willingness to give to the pope full guarantees for the free and independent exercise of his ecclesiastical functions. The movements of Garibaldi showed that the inhabitants of the papal provinces alone, aided by volunteers from Italy, were able to depose the papal government, and unite the territory with the kingdom of Italy; and it required the presence of a large French army in Rome to maintain the defeated papal rule. Venetia was obtained as a result of the war of 1866, but the expedition of Garibaldi against Rome in 1867 led to a new occupation of the papal territory by a French army.

The wretched financial condition of Italy, which had become more threatening than ever by the war of 1866, and the September convention of 1864, by which the government engaged to assume a part of the papal debt, led to a very oppressive taxation. In June 1867, the government, as a temporary measure, took the church property, though for a time delayed, was urgently demanded by the Parliament and public opinion as the only escape from a general bankruptcy, and the government therefore laid a bill before the Parliament which met on March 22, 1867; but the committee elected by the Parliament rejected the bill, and the property was taken as too compromising and not sufficiently radical, and in the very first article of its own draft demanded the abdication of all monastic institutions, and the confiscation of the whole property of the Church. The government yielded to the views of the committee, and, after several modifications had been agreed upon by the government and the Parliament, both chambers adopted the bill for the sale of the Church property by an immense majority (the lower chamber, on July 27, by 296 votes against 41; the senate, on Aug. 12, by 64 against 29). The actual sale began at Florence on October 26, 1867, though the property had not been purchased, and even the church property was sold at auction; the sale had been issued to the amount of 400 million francs. The new excommunications pronounced against all buyers of Church property failed to have any effect; the government and the overwhelming majority of both chambers unswervingly persisted in carrying out the new laws concerning the Church and its property. The Ecumenical Council which was opened by the pope at Rome on Dec. 8, 1869, was unable to improve the influence and the prospects of the papacy among the Italians. The government, the Parliament, and the people at large repudiated the claims of the council more generally than was done in any other purely Catholic country. The nation became more impatient than ever for the overthrow of the temporal sovereignty of the pope, and the incorporation of his states with the kingdom; and when, in 1870, the Franco-German war caused the withdrawal of the great powers, and ultimately led to the destruction of the French Empire, the Italian government could no longer resist the popular pressure for the annexation of the papal states. In September, 1870, count Ponza di San Martino was sent to Rome, and, in the name of the Italian government, proposed to the pope to renounce the temporal rule and to dissolve his army; he was, in this case, to retain the Leonine part of Rome, a civil list, and the right of diplomatic representation. The government also offered to guarantee the free exercise, by the pope, the bishops, and the priests, of their ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and the immunity of all cardinals and ambassadors. When the pope rejected all these offers of conciliation, promised, on Sept. 11, the Italian troops, in compliance with numerous petitions from the subjects of the pope, entered the States of the Church, and on Sept. 20, by the occupation of the city of Rome, put an end to the temporal power of the pope. A note from cardinal Antonelli, the secretary of state, to the foreign governments, was also published, in which he stated that the ultramontane party in all the countries re-echoed the protest, and many princes, both Catholic and Protestant, were called upon to interfere and to restore the pope to his throne. The pope issued a new brief of excommunication, in which he said, "We declare to you, wretched and degenerate, that, throughout the Church, that all those (in whatever notable dignity they may shine) who have been guilty of the invasion, usurpation, occupation of any of our provinces, or of this holy city, or of anything connected therewith, and likewise all who have commissioned, favored, aided, counseled, adhered to them, and all others who promote or carry out the things aforesaid, under any pretext whatever, and in any manner whatever, have incurred the greatest excommunication (excommunicatio maior), and the other censures and penalties which have been provided in the holy canons of the apostles and councils and in the decennial acts of the ecumenical councils, in particular that of Trent." None of all these measures produced the least effect. When the first Parliament of all Italy met, the king declared, "We entered Rome in virtue of the national right, in virtue of the compact which unites us. The capital rule over the pope, to recognize the national dignity of the States, is the exclusive power of the popes. We have solemnly given to ourselves: freedom of the Church, entire independence of the pope in the exercise of his religious functions, and in his relation to the Catholic Church." None of the foreign governments interrupted its amicable relations with the Italian government. In July, 1621, the government transferred its seat to Rome, where, in spite of all the papal excommunications, it received the enthusiastic applause of a large majority of the Italian people, and where it was at once followed by the representatives of all the foreign governments.

Although nearly all the bishops and the overwhelming majority of the priests showed themselves as partisans of the papacy in its struggle against the government and the public opinion of Italy, the idea of reforming the Church by rejecting all or much of the corruption which had crept into it during the Middle Ages and in modern times, and by reconciling it with the civilization of the 19th century, found more adherents among the priests of Italy than among those of any other country. In a political point of view, the reformers desired the Church, in particular, to abandon the temporal rule over the pope, to recognise the national sovereignty, and to aid in carrying through a separation between Church and State. In the province of religion they all wished to restrict the power of the bishops, to enlarge that of the bishops, and one portion went so far as to enter into amicable relations with the High-Church party of the Church of England. They had an organ, the Examinatore di Firenze; and as even one of the six hundred bishops (cardinal D Andrea), and the Jesuit Passagli, who had long been regarded by the ultramontane party as one of their ablest theologians, and other men of high prominence, declared their concurrence with the part or the whole of the reformatory projects, there seemed to be good reason for hoping lasting results from the movement. More recently, the reformatory movement in Germany, headed by Dr. Dölzinger, has found the warmest sympathy among the Italian reformers.

After the suppression of the Reformation in the 16th century, cruel laws made it for more than two hundred years impossible for any Italian to declare himself a Protestant; only the Waldenses (q. v.), in their remote valleys, maintained with difficulty, and amidst great persecutions, their organization. At the close of the 17th century the victorious French republic recognised the human rights of the Waldenses, and proclaimed religious toleration; but the restored monarchies revived some of the most intolerant laws, and even the Waldenses were placed in so unbearable a position that it required the intervention of England and Prussia to secure for them the merest toleration. At length the liberal constitutions of 1796, which guaranteed the civil rights in Sardinia; they were allowed to step forward out of their seclusion in the valley, and, with the most hearty sympathy of all friends of religious toleration, opened a chapel in the capital of the kingdom, Turin. In the remainder of Italy the persecution of the Protestants continued. This persecution of the Protestants means the most tyrannical of the Italian governments, startled the whole civilized world by its cruel measures against the Madali couple, against count Guicciardini and Dominico Cecchetti, and only the most energetic remonstrances of the foreign powers prevailed upon the hand of the Turin banker Malan. Many Italians, however, who were eager to embrace Protestant views, did not share all the views of the Waldenses, especially those on the ministry and the Church, and, after the establishment of the Kingdom of Sardinia, each one of the Italian States, with the exception of the Pia and the kingdom of Mazzarola and count Guicciardini are the best known. Moreover, a number of missionaries were sent out by the Protestant churches of the United States, Great Britain, and other countries, who laid the foundation of several independent organizations, whose importance has thus received the nucleus of a Protestant population. In some places the fanaticism of the priests caused riots against Protestants, none of which was so bloody as that in Barletta in 1865; but the government of Italy, the immense majority of the Italian Parliament, have assured the complete triumph of the cause of religious toleration.

II. Statistic. — Nearly the whole population of Italy is nominally connected with the Roman Catholic Church. The total population of the kingdom was estimated in 1851, at 4,450,457 souls, of whom 3,616,000 were Roman Catholics, 36,000 Jews, and 100,000 members of the Greek Church. Practically a large portion of the population is no longer in communion with the Church of Rome, as can easily be proved by the fact that the government and Parliament have been for years in open conflict with Rome, and utterly disregarding and ignoring the laws of the Church: that the claims of the pope have only a few advocates in the Parliament, and that, in particular, the radical party, with men like Mazzini and Garibaldi at their head, have openly and formally renounced the religious communion with Rome.

According to the Papal Almanac (Annuario Pontificio) for 1888, the country had, exclusive of Rome and of the six suburban sees (the sees of the cardinal bishops), Ostia, Porto, Palestrina, Frascati, Albano, and Sabina, 268 dioceses, which were distributed among the former Italian states as follows:

Of these dioceses, 11 archbishops and 63 bishops are immediately subject to the pope, and without connection with an ecclesiastical province, while 87 archbishops are heads of ecclesiastical provinces, containing, besides them, 155 suffragan bishops. The dioceses of

Italy, in point of territorial extent, are smaller than in any other country; and while the (nominally) Catholic population is no more than one eighth of the Roman Catholic population of the world, it has more than one fourth of the inhabitants of the Catholic Church. This has not been because there have been fewer converts than bishops, but because there have been more converts than bishops at every council; and as they generally hold the most ultramontane views, they have considerably contributed to the success of ultra papal theories within the Catholic Church. The government of Italy has expressed a wish to reduce the number of dioceses, and the number of bishops. This will not be done without a struggle for the control of the church; and as the Italian bishops have been kept vacant since the establishment of the kingdom.

The secular clergy in 1866 had about 115,000 members, or about 1 to every 245 inhabitants, showing a relatively larger number of priests than in any other country of the world. The number of priests, 1,234,186, in 17,000,000 clergy, Italy had in 1860 more than 60,000 monasteries in 2050 establishments, and about 30,000 nunns in 302 establishments. The most numerous among the monastic orders are the Franciscan monks, with 1,227 houses; the Dominicans, with 140; the Augustinians, with 90; the Carmelites... 125; the Jesuits, with 57; the Brothers of Charity, with 49; the Redemptorists, with 31; the Franciscan nuns, with 89; the Sisters of Charity, with 50. The convicts were formerly very rich, but a large portion of their property was confiscated during the French invasion in the war of 1870, and the beginning of the 19th century. More recently the government of Italy has suppressed a large portion of the convents, and confiscated their property. In 1866, the total number of convents suppressed amounted to over 2,000, with 38,000 inmates; of these, 1,252, with 29,328 inmates, belonged to the mendicant orders, and 1,162, with 18,185 inmates, were of other orders.

Popular instruction, which until recently was chiefly in the hands of monks and nuns, is, according to official accounts, in a very low condition. In 1865, of the entire male population, only 2,020,269 were able to read; of the female population, 1,298,854, 1,002,186 were able to write. Of every 100 people, there were, unable to read—in Lombardy, 599; in Piedmont, 603; in Tuscany, 773; in Modena, 799; in the Romagna, 802; in Parma, 818; in the Marche, 851; in Umbria, 858; in Naples, 890; in Tarento, 950; in Catania, 911. Since the establishment of the kingdom of Italy public instruction has made great progress. From 1860 to 1873 the number of male teachers increased from 12,475 to 17,694; that of female teachers from 663 to 8,817. The number of educational institutions amounted in 1865 to 43,510, of which, in 1872, 18,287,706 children. In the same year Italy had 104 gymnasia, with 8268 pupils; 79 lyceas, with 5773 pupils; and 135 seminaries, with 10,659 pupils. There were 21 universities, 16 of which were state and 5 free. Six have been declared the government by the following institutions: Turin, Padua, Bologna, Florence, Naples, and Palermo. The number of students had in 1881 decreased to 11,728, from 15,668 in 1862.

The Church of the Waldenses is the only fully organized Protestant Church in Italy. It consists of 16 comunions, with a membership of 22,000. Its governing body is called the Table. The Protestant Church in Florence had in 1869 3 professors (Revel, Geymonat, and De Sanctis) and 14 students, of whom were formerly Catholic priests. According to the report made to the Waldensian Synod in 1866, evangelical work was carried on in 1865 by 29 pastors, with over 3000 members, which were thus distributed: 7 in Piedmont, 3 in Lombardy, 1 in Emilia, 3 in Liguria, 4 in Tuscany, 1 in the district of Naples, 1 in Sicily, 1 in the Isle of Elba, and 2 in France for Italians. To work these stations it employed 19 pastors, 11 evangelists, and 29 teachers—in all, 59 agents. The number of attendants upon public worship was reckoned at from 2000 to 2500; that of communicants at 1095. According to the latest official returns the Waldensian Church had in 1866-67 43 churches and 38 mission churches throughout Italy. The ordained pastor numbered 37, evangelists 6, male and female teachers 56, the total number of salaried agents being 124. The Methodist Episcopal Church entered this field in 1872. The work is now organized into an Annual Conference with two districts, with (1889) 17 preachers, 968 members, and property valued at $105,390. There is a theological school at Florence. The Nice Quarterly Evangelical and Missionary Commission has therefore been kept vacant since the establishment of the kingdom.

which, from 'ykh, to scratch and to burr, an inflammatory irritation of the skin, threatened to the Israelites as an infliction in case of idolatry (Deut. xxviii, 37); probably some cutaneous or eruptive disorder common in Egypt, but of what peculiar character is uncertain, if, indeed, any peculiar malady is intended. See DISEASE.

Ith, Johann, a German theologian and philosopher of some note, was born at Berne, Switzerland, in 1747. In 1761 he was appointed to the chair of philosophy at the university of his native place, where he had also pursued his studies, but in 1769 he entered the ministry, and settled at Siselen, where he lived until 1799, when he was elected dean and president of the committee of education and religion in the canton of Berne. He died in 1818. Besides a number of philosophical, philological, pedagogical, and even homiletical works, he wrote Versuch einer Anthropologie oder Philosophie der Menschen (Berne, 1784–5, 2 vols.; new ed. 1803 sq.), which is a valuable work: Verhältnisse d. Staats z. Religion u. Kirche (ibid. 1789, 2 vols.); —Ssittelehre der Brahminen (ibid. 1794, 8vo), really a reproduction of his translation of Esuar-Vidam, an old Hindustani work on morals and religion. Ith'ai (1 Chron. xi, 31). See IITAL.

Ith'amar (Heb. Ithamar), יֶתְמָר, palm-leaf; but according to Fürst, not high, i.e. little; Sept. Ithamäp; Josephus Ιτθαμαρ, Αυτοί, vii, 3); the fourth and youngest son of Aaron (1 Chron. vi, 8). B.C. 1658. He was consecrated to the priestly office by the anointing oil (Exod. vi, 38; Numb. iii, 3, 9); and after the death of Nahah and Abihu (Lev. x, 1 sq.), as they left no children, he and Eleazar alone remained to discharge the priestly functions (Lev. x, 6, 12; Numb. iii, 4; xxvi, 60 sq.; 1 Chron. xxiv, 2). Nothing is individually recorded of him, except that the property of the tabernacle was placed under his charge (Exod. xxxix, 21), and that he superintended all matters connected with its removal by the Levitical portions of Gershon and Merari (Num. iv, 29). The sacred utensils and their removal were intrusted to his elder brother Eleazar, whose family was larger than that of Ithamar (1 Chron. xvi, 14), and, with his descendants, he was the possessor of common priests till the high-priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eli, under circumstances of which we are ignorant. See Elliott Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed, was the last high-priest of that line, and the pontificate then reverted to the elder line of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 Kings ii, 27). See High-Priest. The traditional tomb of Ithamar is still shown near that of his brother Eleazar in the hill of Phinehas (Schwarz, Palest., p. 151). A priest by the name of Daniel, of his posterity, returned from Babylon ( Ezra vii, 2; 1 Esdr. viii, 29).

Ithai (Heb. Ithieth), יֵתְהַיֵּה, for יֵתְהַיְּה, God with me, or, according to Fürst, the property of God; Sept. Ithai; Vulg. Ethel; but in Prov. xxxi, 1, both translated Ithai, cum quod Dei et Deus et Deum succurrit, the name of two men.

1. A person mentioned along with Ucal in Prov. xxxi, 1, apparently as one to whom the words of Agur's prophecy had been addressed. B.C. perhaps cir. 990. See AGUR. Gesenius (Theol. Heb. p. 88) thinks that Ithai is the name of the family or the disciples of Agur, to whom he inscribed his aphorisms; others think that both words as appellatives, and render the whole clause as follows: "Thus spake the man: I have tooled for God, I have tooled for God, and have ceased" (see Stuart's Commentary, ad loc.).

2. The son of Bezai and father of Masseiah, a Benjamite, one of whose posterity returned with a party from Babylon (Neh. xi, 7). B.C. long ante 586.

Ith'mah (Heb. Ithmackh, יֵתְמָקָה, orphœage; Sept. Ithmûd), a Moabite, and one of David's supplementary body-guard (1 Chron. xi, 46). B.C. 1046. See David.

Ith'nan (Heb. Ithmân, יֵתְמָן, bestowed, otherwise distance; Sept. Ithmâyn [but the Vul. MS. joins it to the preceding word, Ithmânu, and the Alex. to the following, Ithmânu, Vulg. Ithmam], one of the cities in the south of Judah, mentioned between Hazor and Ziph (Josh. xv, 29); perhaps along the southern edge of the highland district. It cannot have been the Ithma of the Osmosicon (Ithmâ, the modern Ithma), for this is in the mountains west of Hebron (see Keil's Commentary, ad loc.). The enumeration in vers. 32 requires us to join this with the following (there being no copula between), Ithman-Ziph, i.e. Zephatah (q.v.). See Judah.

Ith'ra (Heb. Ithâra, יֵתְרָה, excellence; Sept. 'Itô, Vulg. Jetra), an Israelite (probably an error of transcription — see Themen, Commentary, ad loc.); a Jeredite, according to the Sept. and Vulg.; but [more correctly] an IthmæElite, according to 1 Chron. ii, 17, and father of Amanas (David's general) by Abigail, David's sister (1 Kings ii, 40, 41), where called Jethrah (2 Sam. xvii, 25). B.C. ante 1025.

Ith'ran (Heb. Ith'ran, יֵתְרָן, excellent), the name of one or two men.

2. (Sept. 'Itpô, Vulg. Jethram). Apparently one of the sons of Ezion-geber, the great-grandson of Reuben (1 Chron. vii, 37); probably the same as Jethre in v. 58. B.C. long post 1565.

Ith'réam (Heb. Ithréem, יֵתְרֵאֵם, superabundance of the people; Sept. Ithreônaï, Ithreôni; Josephus 'Ithreônaï [A.V. s. i, 4]), David's sixth son, born of Eglaah in Hebron (2 Sam. iii, 5; 1 Chron. iii, 8). B.C. 1045. In the ancient Jewish traditions (Jerome, Quast. Heb. in 2 Sam. iii, 5; v. 23) Eglaah is said to have been Michal, and to have died in giving birth to Ithream; but this is at variance with the Bible.

Ith'tire, or, rather, Je'thrite (Heb. Ithána, יֵתְהַיָּה, Sept. Ithâna and Ithâni, but Ithâni in 1 Chron. ii, 53; Vulg. Jetjritas and Jetjrenus or Jetjreus), the posterity of some Jethro mentioned as resident as priest in Karth-jearim (A.V. "the Ihtrites" 1 Chron. i, 53); probably the descendants of Hobah, the brother-in-law of Moses (who settled in this region, Judges ii, 10), and so called as being thus the posteriority of Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses. See JENNE. Two of David's famous warriors, Ira and Gareb, belonged to this clan (2 Sam. xxii, 38; 1 Chron. xi, 40). See DAVID. Ira has been supposed to be identical with "Ira the Jairite," David's priest (2 Sam. xx, 25). According to another supposition, Jethro may be only another form for IHANA (2 Sam. xvii, 25), the brother-in-law of David, and it is possible that the "Ihrites," as a family, sprung from him. According to still another supposition, the two Ithra may be heroes of David's time, one of them coming from JARRIN, in the mountains of Judah, one of the places which were the "haunt" of David and his men in their freebooting wanderings, and where he had "friends" (1 Sam. xxx, 27; comp. 51).

Itinerancy, a word which Methodism has adopted in its ecclesiastical terminology as expressing one of the most characteristic forms of Church organization. Wesley's plans for the revival of Christian life throughout the United Kingdom rendered it necessary that he should travel from town to town. He did so quite systematically through his long life. Very early a few talented laymen were commissioned by him to preach in the societies which he had organized during his own absence, for he usually stayed but a day or two in any one place. These lay preachers, or "helpers," as he called them, soon multiplied to scores, at last to hundreds; but the societies demanding their labors in the intervals of the great preacher's visits multiplied still faster. As early as the third Conference (May, 1746), he saw the necessity of extending and methodizing the labors of his "helpers" on some plan of "itinerancy." He appointed them, therefore, to definite "circuits" this year. The word "circuit" has ever since been an important technical term in Methodism. The "Minister's Conference, show that the whole country was mapped into seven of these "itinerant" districts. Wales and Cornwall each constituted one; Newcastle and its neighboring towns another. That of Yorkshire comprised seven counties. London, Bristol, and Evesham were the head-quarters of others. By 1749 there were twenty of these "rounds" in England, two in Wales, two in Scotland, and seven in Ireland; and at Wesley's death there were seventy-two in England, three in Wales, seven in Scotland, and twenty-eight in Ireland. The circuits were long, comprising at least thirty "appointments" for each month, or about one a day. The preacher, "met weekly, and last from one circuit to another, usually every year, and invariably every two years; sometimes from England to Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and back again.

The "circuit system" has been retained in England down to our own day; by which the churches of the large cities, are combined under a "circuit" pastorate. In "America," the societies in cities, and also the large societies in the country, are generally "stations," each being supplied by its own pastor. The "circuit system," however, is maintained among the feaster churches, and quite generally in the Far West, and also on the frontier settlements of the country.

Two other characteristic features of Wesley's system rendered the "itinerancy" not only possibly, but notably effective. The "local" ministry—consisting of gifted laymen in secular business—supplied the pulpits in the "regular" or "class" preachers; and the "leads" or ministers, in the latter could appear in any given place on their long circuits but once a fortnight, in most cases but once a month, and in others but once in six weeks. Thus public ministrations were kept up every Sunday. The class-meeting, comprising twelve "members," under an experienced "leader," met weekly, and last from one circuit to another. A most lax pastoral supervision of the whole membership was maintained in the absence of the authorized pastor or itinerant. See Lay Ministry.

In these facts, so coordinate and co-operative, we have the chief explanation of the remarkable success of Wesley's system. So long as the circuits, in our own country especially, were five or six hundred miles in extent, including scores or hundreds of societies or "appointments," each of which was regularly visited, at intervals of four or six weeks, by the "circuit preacher," and meanwhile the "local preachers" and "class-leaders" kept each fully supplied with Sabbath, and, indeed, almost daily religious services. In nothing, perhaps, does the legislative genius of Wesley, so highly estimated by Southey, Macaulay, and Buckle, more strikingly appear than in this combination of pastoral provision and itinerant preaching.

If its adaptation to England was eminent, it was pre-eminent in America, where the customary local pastorates of other denominations seemed to afford no adequate provision for the prodigiously advancing population and settlement of the country. "Methodism, with its lay ministers, met this necessity in a most decided manner through the propagating and systematically training of religion to this overflowing population; it was to lay the moral foundations of many of the great states of the West. The older churches of the colonies could never have supplied them with "regular" or educated pastors in any proportion to their rapid settlement. Methodism met this necessity in a manner that should command the national gratitude. It was to become at last the dominant popular faith of the country, with its standard planted in every city, town, and almost every village of the land. Moving in the van of emigration, it was to supply with the means of religion the frontier, from the Canadas to the Gulf of Mexico, from Pugil's Sound to the Gulf of California, and to plant in them the seed of tens of thousands of souls. It was to raise up, without delay for preparatory training, and thrust out upon these circuits, thousands of such itinerants, tens of thousands of "local" or lay preachers and "exhorters," as auxiliary and unpaid laborers, with many thousands of class-leaders, who could minister pastoral supervision over the infant societies in the absence of the itinerant preachers, the latter not having time to delay in any locality for much more than the public services of the pulpit. Over all these circuits it was to maintain the watchful jurisdiction of travelling presiding elders, and over the whole system of "preaching travelling" and "exhorting" how shall to whom the entire nation was to be a common "diocese" (Stevens, History of Methodism). "Without any dispa- ragement of other churches, we may easily see that they were not in a state to meet the pressing wants of the country. The pulpit of prayer and instruction, the preacher untended and enfeebled, was destitute of the episcopal order, had to wait long, and urge her plea ardent upon the attention of the bishops of England before they could procure consecration for any of her ministers (and, as is well known, the non-existence of a bishop involves amongst the Episcopalians the non-existence of the Church), so that this community was not in a position to undertake to any great extent an aggressive service. The principles of the Independents, which subordinate the call of a minister to the voice of the Church, placed a bar in the way of their seeking the outlying popula- tions, who could minister pastoral supervision over the call; and, though the Presbyterian system is not neces- sarily so stringent in these matters as Independent churches acting on their theories, yet, as they cannot move without the action of their synodical bodies, there was little prospect of their doing much missionary work. Thus this whole system rests upon the hands of the Methodist itinerant. The men were admirably fitted for their task. Rich in religious enjoyment, full of faith and love, zealous and energetic, trained to labor and ex- erction, actuated by one single motive—that of glorifying God, the thought of the souls in distress; always ready to follow the immigrants and "squatters" in their peregrinations wherever they went. American society was thus imbued with Christian truth and principle, as well as accustomed to religious ordinances, in its normal state" (London Quarterly Review, October, 1848, p. 120).

Wesley started with no "theory" of ministerial itin- erancy. The expediency of the plan alone led to its adoption; but he died believing in it as a theory, as, in- deed, the apostolic plan of evangelization. In his esti- mation, it not only had a salutary effect on the evangelists, by keeping them energetic and chivalrous, but it had also the advantage of enabling them to sit anywhere, and minister the truth to many places, and it made small abilities available on a large scale. He says that he be- lieves he should himself preach even his congregation asleep were he to stay in one place an entire year. Nor could he "believe that it was ever the Lord's will that we should enter the ministry, and not the mission of religion to this country;" for "we have found," he writes, "by long and constant ex- perience, that a frequent exchange of teachers is best. This preacher has one talent, that another. No one whom I ever yet knew has all the talents which are needful for beginning, continuing, and perfecting the work of grace in a church."

There can be no question that an itinerant ministry has the sanction of the highest scriptural examples. Christ was an itinerant. His ministry in the flesh was... got a settled pastorate; he went about doing good.

The twelve disciples were itinerants, both before and after the crucifixion and resurrection. They went from city to city preaching the Gospel of the kingdom. And the preacher before them were itinerants. Samuel had his tent in the field as a pastor, so did Elisha, and a tent of Bochim in the field as a pastor. The greatest problem for other denominations to solve is "unemployed ministers." Thus a writer in the "Intelligencer," speaking of the trials resulting from a want of an itinerant ministry in the Reformed (Dutch) Church, says of Methodism: "No man who can work and wants to work, and is committed to the work of the Gospel, can be unemployed." The whole of this sacred book breathes the spirit of itinerancy; and all the transactions recorded in it, in reference to the ministry, agree with this spirit. Nay, it is unquestionably true that in the early Christian Church, though many were in favor of a set ministry, most of the Christian preachers were "itinerants." In the Latin Church, itinerant preachers have ever been employed: they form a special religious order—a class of preaching monks (comp. D'Aubigné, "Histoire de la Reformation," v. 102). Thus Berenger, in France, employed itinerant preachers. "This kind of preaching, which always reappears in England in the grand epochs of the Church" (ibid. p. 103). But if Wycliffe and the Reformers were first in their efforts to introduce itinerant preaching, it is to Wesley, nevertheless, that alone is due the credit of organizing "itinerancy" as a permanent and universal scheme of ministerial labor throughout a large denomination. The itinerancy has always been a feature cherished with jealous care by the Methodist bodies, and with respect to bishops it is heeded about by one of the restrictive rules in the Methodist Episcopal Church (the Discipline, Powers of the General Conference). The length of time for which the travelling preachers may remain on the same "charge" (whether a circuit or station) has varied at different times in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is now limited to three years. "Presiding elders can remain only four years on the same "district."" To the advantages and disadvantages of the itinerant system, no one has given a more unbiased account of the objections that have thus far been presented against the continuance of "Itinerancy" than Dr. Crane ("Modern Quarterly Review," Jan., 1863, p. 72 sq.), and we follow him in the main, supplementing it only with what comes from other churches.

1. "The people are restricted in the choice of their pastor." If thisibe true, no other system so soon reme diates the difficulty as the itinerancy, for it secures at the same time a pastor a further change within a short period, without inflicting dishonor or injustice.

2. "At certain fixed intervals it removes the pastor with whom the people have become acquainted, and substitutes a stranger in his place. In return, it affords the church the benefit of the varied endowments of many ministers, and, moreover, keeps ministers and people in vigorous action.

3. "Societies and congregations have less cohesive force than their own goods demands." This, of all objections, has been the one most frequently urged, and is, perhaps, the one most difficult to meet. However, it may be answered with a view to obviate this evil that many have advocated an extension of the term of service to five or more years.

4. "The change sometimes comes inopportune." If this happen in some instances, and they can, after all, be but few, much greater are the advantages which arise from this system, as it never leaves a church without a pastor, and at the same time also secures to the minister the interest of the people, as he is able, at the same time, to apprise them of the work of his associates in the Gospel field. The greatest problem for other denominations to solve is "unemployed ministers." Thus a writer in the "Intelligencer," speaking of the trials resulting from a want of an itinerant ministry in the Reformed (Dutch) Church, says of Methodism: "No man who can work and wants to work, and is committed to the work of the Gospel, can be unemployed." The whole of this sacred book breathes the spirit of itinerancy; and all the transactions recorded in it, in reference to the ministry, agree with this spirit. Nay, it is unquestionably true that in the early Christian Church, though many were in favor of a set ministry, most of the Christian preachers were "itinerants." In the Latin Church, itinerant preachers have ever been employed: they form a special religious order—a class of preaching monks (comp. D'Aubigné, "Histoire de la Reformation," v. 102). Thus Berenger, in France, employed itinerant preachers. "This kind of preaching, which always reappears in England in the grand epochs of the Church" (ibid. p. 103). But if Wycliffe and the Reformers were first in their efforts to introduce itinerant preaching, it is to Wesley, nevertheless, that alone is due the credit of organizing "itinerancy" as a permanent and universal scheme of ministerial labor throughout a large denomination. The itinerancy has always been a feature cherished with jealous care by the Methodist bodies, and with respect to bishops it is heeded about by one of the restrictive rules in the Methodist Episcopal Church (the Discipline, Powers of the General Conference). The length of time for which the travelling preachers may remain on the same "charge" (whether a circuit or station) has varied at different times in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is now limited to three years. "Presiding elders can remain only four years on the same "district."" To the advantages and disadvantages of the itinerant system, no one has given a more unbiased account of the objections that have thus far been presented against the continuance of "Itinerancy" than Dr. Crane ("Modern Quarterly Review," Jan., 1863, p. 72 sq.), and we follow him in the main, supplementing it only with what comes from other churches.

stay has measurably remedied, but it is a question whether a still longer term would not deprive the itinerant of one of the greatest blessings, health. It is held by competent judges, and the point is also made by Dr. Crano, that the itinerancy is conducive to health and long life, as the vital forces of a pastor settled over a congregation for many years in succession are necessarily subjected to a fearful strain, and thus what appears at first a family deprivation turns out really to be a great blessing to the household. See the host of the articles and books already referred to, Hodgson, Ecclesi. Polity of Methodism defended, especially p. 95–118; Porter, Compendium of Methodism.

Ittah-Kazin (Heb. אַתָּה-קָזִין, ṭṭṭ. q.v., time [according to First, people] of the judge, only with local, ṭṭṭ. q.v.; Sept. ἦταν ημ Universität von Basel (within Issachar), between Gath-hepher and Rammon-methoas (Josh. xix. 13), therefore a very short distance (east) from Sephorrus (Seffuriah). It is, perhaps, identical with the Κατά Κασίμονα usually regarded as the site of Cais (q.v.) of the N.T.

Ittai (Heb. אִיתָי, ṭṭṭ., near or at times, otherwise possessive), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ecc~33~). Son of Ribai, a Benjamite of Gibeah of the thirty heroes that David led with him (2 Sam. xxiii, 29), called, in the parallel passage (1 Chron. xi. 31) ITITAI (Heb. אִיתָי, ṭṭṭ., a fuller form; Sept. ἦταν ἀνθρώπου, B.C. 1046. 2. (Sept. ṭṭṭ. and so Josephus) v. c. 690). "ITITAI the Gittithe, i.e. the native of Gath, a Philistine in the army of King David. He appears only during the rebellion of Absalom, B.C. cir. 1025. We first discern him on the morning of David's flight, while the king was standing under the olive-tree, below the city, watching the army and the people defile past him. See David. Last in the procession came the 600 heroes who had formed David's band during his wanderings in Judah, and who had been with him at Gath (2 Sam. xv, 18; comp. 1 Sam. xxiii, 13; xxvii, 2; xx, 5, 10; and Josephus, Ant. vii, 9, 2). Among these, apparently commanding them, was Ittai the Gittite (v. 19). He caught the eye of the king, who at once addressed him, and besought him as a "stranger and an exile," and as one who had but very recently joined his service, not to attach himself to a doubtful cause, but to return with his brethren and abide with the king (v. 19, 20). But Ittai is firm; he is the king's slave (ḳūlā, A.V., "s servant"), and wherever his master goes he will go. Accordingly, he is allowed by David to proceed, and he passes over the Kedron with the king (xxv, 22, Sept.), with all his men, and "all the little ones that were with him." These "little ones" (ḳūlā, ἄνδρα, "all the children") must have been the families of the band—their "households" (1 Sam. xxvii, 8). They accompanied them during their wanderings in Judah, often at great risk (1 Sam. xxx, 6), and they were not likely to leave them behind in this fresh commencement of their wandering life.

When the army was numbered and organized by David at Mahanaim, Ittai again appears, now in command of a third part of the force, and (for the time at least) enjoying equal rank with Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. xviii, 2, 5, 12). But here, on the eve of the great battle, we take leave of this valiant and faithful stranger; his conduct in the fight and his subsequent fate are all left to conjecture. Nor is it mentioned in the lists of David's captains and of the heroes of his body-guard (see 2 Sam. xxiii; 1 Chron. xi, lists which are possibly of a date previous to Ittai's arrival in Jerusalem.

An interesting tradition is related by Jerome (Questa. Heb., on 1 Chron. xx, 2), that Solomon was the son of the basileus of Milcom (A.V. "their king"). But, by the law, it was forbidden to any Israelite to touch either gold or silver of an idol. Wherefore they say that Ittai the Gittite, who had come to David from the Philistines, was the man who snatched the crown from the head of Milcom; for it was lawful for a Hebrew to take it from the hand of a man, though not from the head of the idol. The main difficulty to the reception of this legend is the interaction of health and long life, as the vital forces of a pastor settled over a congregation for many years in succession are necessarily subjected to a fearful strain, and thus what appears at first a family deprivation turns out really to be a great blessing to the household. See the host of the articles and books already referred to, Hodgson, Ecclesi. Polity of Methodism defended, especially p. 95–118; Porter, Compendium of Methodism.

The expression "thy brethren" (xx, 29) we may infer that there were other Philistines besides Ittai in the six hundred; but this is uncertain. Ittai was not exclusively a Philistine name, nor does "Gittite"—as in the case of Obed-edom, who was a Levite—necessarily imply Philistine parentage. Still David's words, "stranger and exile," seem to show that he was not an Israelite.—Smith. Others, however, have hazarded the supposition that this Ittai is the same as the preceding, having been called a Gittite as a native of Gittai, as Benjamin (2 Sam. iv, 9), and a "stranger and an exile" as a Gibeonite, who, having fled from Beeroh, a Gibeonite town (Josh. ix, 17), had, with his brethren, taken up his residence in Gittain. All this is very improbable. See GITTITE.

Ittig, Thomas, a German Lutheran divine, was born at Leipzig Oct. 31, 1643. He studied at the universities of Leipzig, Rostock, and Strasburg. After filling the pastorate at Halle, he, in 1686, professed the Lutheranism of the university of his native city. In 1691 he was transferred to the chair of theology. He died April 7, 1710.

Ittig was a very able man, but he lacked all tolerance towards those who chose to differ from him, and in some of his writings he is quite severe against other religious bodies than Lutheranism. He was elevated as a collector of the writings of the apostolic fathers (see below). His principal works are, Animadversiones in censuram fiscalitatis theologicae Personarum, etc. (Leipz., 1695, 4to)—De Herrisacri arxi apostolici et apostolico procissi (Leipz. 1690 and 1708, 4to)—Prolegomena ad Plurimi Josephi opera Graeco-Latina (Cologne, 1691, fol.)—Bibliotheca Patrum apostolicalorum Graeco-Latina, Leipz. 1699, 8vo (above alluded to)—Operum Clementia Avschiudum Supplementum, etc. (Leipz., 1708, 8vo)—Exercitationum Theologicae Variar argomenti, etc. (Leipz., 1709, 8vo)—Exercitationum theologicae de novis fanumgeniis quod- roundum nostrae etatis purgatorios (Leipz. 1708, 4to)—De Synodi Carentionum a reformationis in Gallia ecclesiis anno 1651 celebratur indulgentia erga Lutheranos, etc. (Gott. 1702, 4to)—Isauriculae episcoporum Romae, etc. (Leipz. 1709) (above alluded to)—Catholicae Ecclesiae primi a Christo natum seculi undecima Capita de scholas in ecclesiasticis et scriptoribus ecclesiasticis, etc. (Leipz., 1709, 4to)—Sedescahia de autorum qui de scholas ecclesiasticis ordinare (Lpz. 1711, 8vo)—Historia Concilii Cnivncn (Leipz., 1714, 4to)—Opuscula variar, edita cura Christiani Ludovici (Leipz. 1714, 8vo). Ittura (Ittura), a small district in the N.E. of Palestine, forming the tetrapyrites of Philip, in connection with the adjacent territory of Trachonitis (Luke iii, 1). The name is supposed to have originated with the name of Ithram, the son of Ishmael. In 1 Chron. v, 19, this name is given as that of a tribe or nation with which Reuben (beyond the Jordan) wasured; and, from its being joined with the names of other of Ishmael's sons, it is evident that a tribe descended from his son Jetur is intimated. In the latter text the Sept.

takes this view, and for "with the Hagarites, with Jetur, and Nephish, and Nobad," reads "with the Hagarites, and Iuraneas, and Nephishenae, and Nabadeans." The text seems to be still preserved in that of Jetur, where it is bound up with that of the other branches; but however, has lately been disputed by Wetstein [Reiseberichte, p. 88 sq.] on the precarious ground of the pres-cent dependent situation of the district.) We may thus take the district to have been occupied by Ishmaed's son, whose descendants were dispossessed or subdued by the Amorites, after which they took this place as a part of the kingdom of Bashan, and subsequently to have belonged to that half tribe of Manasseh which had its possessions east of the Jordan. From 1 Chron. v, 19, it appears that the sons of Jetur, whether under tribute to the Amorites (as some suppose), and forming part of the kingdom of Bashan or not, were in actual occupation of the country, and were dispossessed by the tribes beyond the Jordan, who now conquered and colonized the little province of Jetur, which lay between Bashan and Mount Hermon ("in Libano monte" according to Muratori, Tab. Asiae, p. 670). The district of the Extile tribe and other border countries were taken possession of by various tribes, whom, although they are called after the original names, as occupants of the countries which had received those names, we are not bound to regard as purely desendants of the original possessors. These new Iurasneans were probably subjugated by kings of Damascus (1 Kings xvi, 26), who reconquered the province, then called by its Greek name Iuranae, and gave the inhabitants their choice of Judaism or banishment (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 11, 3).
While some submitted, many retired to their own rocky fastnesses, and to the deities of Hermon adjoining.
Nowhere are we more fully acquainted with the Iuranes than in a distinct people in the time of Pliny (Hist. Nat., v, 28).
They extended their incursions as far as Phoenicia, but submitted to the Romans under Pompey (Appian, Mithridat, 106), and appear to have been able to retain their native prince all of them. Iuranae was first formally an-nexed to the province of Syria by Claudius (Titus Ann. xvi, 23, 1; Dio Cassius, lix, 12), having been previously included in Perea as part of the dominions of Her-or. (See F. Münter, De rebus Iuraneorum [Hav. 1824]).
As already intimated, Herod the Great, in dividing his domains among his sons, bequeathed to their sons, baptized Philip, as part of a tetrarchy composed, according to Lactant.
Trachonitis and Iuranae; and as Josephus (Ant. xvi, 10, 1; comp. xvii, 8, 1) mentions his territory as composed of Auranitis, Trachonitis, and Batanea, some have thought (Roland, p. 106; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.) that the evangelists regarded Auranitis and Panisus included under Iuranae, a name loosely applied by ancient writers (see Pliny, v, 19; Epiphanius, Hares, 19; comp. Paulus, Comment, i, 811; Wetstein, i, 671). But it properly indicated a well-defined region distinct from Auranitis.
Pliny rightly places it north of Bashan and near Damascus (v, 23), and J. de Vitry describes it as adjoining Trachonitis, and lying along the base of Libanus, between Tiberias and Damascus (Gesta Dei, p. 104; comp.
p. 771, 1098). The districts mentioned by Luke and Josephus were distinct, but neither of these historians give a full list of all the little provinces in the tetrarchy of Philip. Each probably gave a name to each such as were of most importance in connection with the events he was about to relate. Both Batanea and Au-ranitis appear to have been included in the "region of Trachonitis" (Tetrarchia Trachonitis) and as Josephus mentions this, the "house of Zemodorus" which was given to Philip, it unquestionably embraced Iuranae (Ant. xvi, 10, 8). According to Strabo (xvi, 755 sq.), the country known to classical writers was hilly (comp. Jace, de Vitriaco, p. 1074), with many ravines and hollows; the inhabitants were regarded as the most barbarous of the Cimmerians (Philop., 145), who, being despised as the resources of agriculture (Apul. Florid. i, 6), lived by robbery (Strabo, xvi, 750), being skillful archers (Virgil, Georg. ii, 448; Lucan, vii, 290, 514). The present Jeder probably comprehends the whole or greater part of the proper Iuranae. This is described by Bureschardt (Gryna, p. 286) as "living south of Jebelkessosse, east of Jebel es-Sheike (Mount Hermon), and west of the Haj road." It was conquered by Trajan in A.D. 114. The upper part by Gaulanitis, on the west by Hermon, and on the north by the plain of Damascus. It is table-land, with an undulating surface, and has little conical and cup-shaped hills at intervals. The southern section of it has a rich soil, well watered by numerous springs, and streams from Hermon. The greater part of its northern section is entirely different. The surface of the ground is covered with jagged rocks, in some places heaped up in huge piles, in others sunk into deep pits; at one place smooth and naked, at another saimed with yawning chasms, in whose rugged edges rank grass and weeds spring up.
The rock is all ancient, and the formation similar to that of the Lejah. See Akebono. The molten lava seems to have issued from the earth through innumerable pores, to have spread over the plain, and then to have been rent and shattered while cooling (Porter, Handbook, p.
465). Jeder contains thirty-eight towns and villages, ten of which are entirely desolate, and all the rest contain only a few families of poor peasants, living in wretched hovels amid heaps of ruins (Porter, Damascus, ii, 272 sq.). See Robinson, Bib. Res. Appendix, p. 149;

Itzchaki, also called Ben-Ja’an, and by the long Arabic name of Aba Ibranaa Isaac Ibn-Kastor (or Sab-tar) ben-Ja’an, a Jewish philosopher of great celebrity, and commentator, was born in A.D. 1052 at Tiberias. Like many other Jewish savans, he followed the medical profession, and so distinguished himself that he was appointed physician to the princes of Denia and Mug’ahidt, and to Ali Ibdal Adadula. He died in 1507. Itzchaki wrote (1) a Hebrew grammar, called י”תפוין י”ב, The Book of Syntax; and (2) on Biblical criticism, called י”תפויי י”וכ, The Work of Itzchaki. Neither of these works is now known to us, but from Aben-Ezra, who quotes them, we learn that Itzchaki was one of the earliest assailants of the Masonic authorship of some portions of the Pentateuch. Thus he is said to have maintained that the portion in the Pentateuch which describes the kings of Idumea (Gen. xxxvi, 30, etc.) was written many centuries after Moses (comp. Aben-Ezra, Commentaries on Gen. viii, 2; comp. ibid. xvi, 11, Note 1). See Gritz, Geschichte der Juden, vi, 53; Zeitschrift der deutsch. morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1854, p. 551; 1855, p. 888.

'Yvah (Heb. ירחא, for ירחא, an overt-turning or ruin, as in Ezek. xxii, 32; Sept. 'Aovai, but in Isa. xxxvii, 18, unites the preced. word into י”אشؤون), a city of the Assyrians whence they brought colonists to repeople Samaria (2 Kings xviii, 34; xix, 18; Isa. xxxvii, 18, where it is mentioned in connection with Hen and Sephurravim; also in the cognate form אש, 2 Kings xvii, 34, where it stands in connection with Babylon and Cuthah). Sir H. Rawlinson thinks that the site must be sought in Babylonia, and that it is probably identical with the modern حير, which is the 1c of Herodotus, i, 179), a place famous for bituminous springs (see Rich, First Memoir on Babylon, p. 64, and Chesney, Euphrates Expedition, i, 43, 1849), lying on the Euphrates, between Sippa (Sephurravim) and Anah (Henah), with which it seems to have been politically united shortly before the time of Sennacherib (2 Kings xix, 13). He also regards it as probably the Ahava (א”חא) of Ezra (viii, 15). He believes the name to have been originally derived from that of a Babylonian god, who was connected with the sky or Ether, and to whom the town is supposed to have been dedicated (Rawlinson, Herodotus, i, 606, note). In the Talmud the name appears as א”חא (א”חא), whence might possibly be formed the Greek Ιού and the modern Ιού (where the Ι is merely the feminine ending); if we might suppose any connection between the Greek and the Talmud.
Isidore of Charax seems to intend the same place by his Amorica (Martyrions saec. iv). The latter have not thought that it occurs as Ιεύς in the Egyptian inscriptions of the time of Thothmes III, about B.C. 1450 (Birch, in Ostra Egyptiacae, p. 80). But these conjectures are destitute of any great probability, as the form of the name is not well corrobore. See AV.

Ιεύς, L. E. SILLIMAN, D.D., LL.D., a theologian of some note, more especially on account of his defection from the Protestant Episcopal Church to Romanism, was born in Meriden, Conn., Sept. 16, 1797. His parents removed to New York State while he was quite young, and he was prepared for college at L. doctrine. At the outbreak of the war in 1812, he served his country for one year, and in 1816 finally entered upon his collegiate course at Hamilton College, pursuing, at the same time, studies preparatory for the work of the ministry. He had been reared in the Presbyterian Church, but in 1819, when impatience obliged him to quit the college, he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and continued his theological education at N. Y. City under bishop Hobart, at whose hands he received deson's orders in 1822, and whose son-in-law he became in 1825. His first parish was Batavia, N. Y.; but he removed to New York a few months later and received a call to Trinity Church, Philadelphia, which he at once accepted, bishop White ordaining him to the priesthood. In 1827 he was called to Christ Church, Lancaster, Pa., and the year following became assistant rector of the same church. In 1831 he was transferred to N. Y. City. This connection he served six months later, to assume the rectoryship of St. Luke's Church, N. Y. In 1831 he was honored with the bishopric of North Carolina, where he became very popular, and for a time wielded great influence; but in 1848 he began to advocate doctrines inadmissible by any Protestant Churches and the doctrines, and distrust and alienation on the part of his diocese led him to renounce publicly his mistaken course. But so inclined had he become to the Roman Catholic view of the apostolical succession, and the need of an "infallible" interpreter of the Scriptures, that he soon avowed his former opinions, and in 1834, while in Europe, publicly submitted to the authority of Rome. Of course, this caused his deposition from the bishopric of N. Carolina. In defense of his course, he published The Trials of a Mind in its Progress to Catholicism (Boston, 1854, 8vo), in which he set forth the Roman Catholic view of the development of the episcopacy. Finally, the Protestant Episcopal Church does not possess a regular apostolical succession (p. 146-157), he felt obliged to accept the Church of Rome as the true Church. This course was very naturally pursued by bishop Ives, who, while yet in the Episcopal Church, had always inclined to High-Churchism. "Sitting upon the pinnacle of High-Churchism, the head easily turns, or becomes so dizzy as to fall down into the abyss of Popery." Ives fell, like Doane, and Wheaton, and Markoe, by carrying out the High-Church principles to their legitimate results. After his was employed as a witness of diocesan rhetoric in St. Joseph's Theological Seminary, and as lecturer on rhetoric and English literature in the convents of the Sacred Heart and the Sisters of Charity. Ex-bishop Ives evidently was a man of good parts and noble intentions; for during the last years of his life we find him interested, not only in the work of the church, but in the education of the public school children: here nearly 2000 children are now provided for. He died Oct. 13, 1887. Ives published also a volume of sermons On the Apostles' Doctrine and Fellowship, and on the 24th Psalm (Maurice, 1844, 8vo). Ιέρος, JOSPH, the historian of the English Baptist, was born in 1773, pursued his studies at the Bristol Academy, and for twenty-nine years was pastor of a Baptist church in London. His principal publications are, (1) an edition of the "Acts of the Apostles; Notes on the life of John Bunyan; — (2) Treatise on Baptism and Communion: — (3) The Life, Times, and Opinions of John Milton: — (4) History of the English Baptists (4 vols. 8vo). The last, his most important work, is highly commended by Robert Hall for the value of its historical substance and for the quality of the author's style. His Life of Bunyan continued to be the chief authority upon the subject, until the growing public appreciation of the "ingenious dreamer" enlist ed in the illustration of his life the classic pen of Southey and the minute diligence of Mr. Offler. Mr. Ivey's death occurred in 1884. See G. Pritchard, Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Joseph Ivey (London, 1885, 8vo).

Ιβος, bishop of Chartres (Carontenius). Little is known of the life of this prelate beyond what we can learn from his works. The exact date of his birth is not ascertained (it is supposed to have been about 400), neither is his descent, although some say that he was of low extraction ("ex genere minime nobili," Gallia Christiana, viii, 1126), while others give him a noble parentage ("in agro Belgacense natus nobili sanguine nobilissimum traxit," Vita D. Ironii, Paris ed. 1647). He studied philosophy and rhetoric at Paris, then theology under the convent of Bee; he was made superior of the convent of St. Quentin, in which office he acquired great reputation as a theologian and canonist. In 1909, upon the deposition of the bishop of Chartres for simony, Ivo was appointed in his place, yet his predecessor had still such strong local interest that Ivo had to institute negotiations directly by the pope (Crim II), and was only installed in 1092, at Capua. He is one of the prelates who contributed most to the extension of papal authority, yet he did not hesitate to speak plainly against the abuse of the system of curacy; in the Paris edition of his life he is even praised as one of the defenders of the Gallican liberties. In the difficulty about the question of threnodie (q. v.), raised by Hildebrand and his followers, the course of Ivo was marked by great moderation, arising, not from weakness, but from a desire of conciliating and meeting justice to all parties, to whom he endeavored to show the preserving spirit of the hierarchy when it began to accuse pope Paschal II of heresy for having yielded to emperor Henry V. His private character, as well as his learning, gave him great influence. When Philip I repudiated his legitimate wife to marry another, he alone had the courage to resist him, and neither pope nor emperor could induce him to sanction the misdeed; and by his noble and straightforward course he excited the admiration of the people and nobility, who all took his part. He died in 1115 (according to Richter and Mijer, in 1125), and was canonized in 1570 for May 20. As a writer, he is known as the author of a Pescwornia and a decremen (see Canons and Decretals, Collections of); also of 287 Letters (Paris, 1588-85, 1610), which shed much light on the history of his time, and show in how high an estimation his opinions were held. 24 ecclesiastical discourses on synods, festivals, etc., and, finally, a short chronicle of the French kings. The most complete collection of his works has been published at Paris in 1647, fol., but it does not contain the Pescwornia. In Migne's edition of the fathers Ivo's works were reprinted in 1856 (Paris). See Hist. Lit. de France, x. 1024 sq. Also in: Eckermann, Real-Encyclopädie, xvi. 559 sq. Moesheim, Eccles. Ινόθος (ινόθος, shēkobim), elephant's tooth: see A. Benary, in the Berliner Jb. Jahrhücher, 1881, No. 36: 1 Kings x, 22; 2 Chron. ix, 21; and so explained by the Targum, ומקב, and Sept. אֵלֶּחַ דְּלָא. 1 Kings x, 22; 2 Chron. ix, 21; and so explained by the Targum, ומקב, and Sept. אֵלֶּחַ דְּלָא.
IVORY

also simply ἴβος, a tooth, Psa. xiv. 8; Ezek. xxvii. 15; Amos vi. 4; N. T. ἴβος, of ivory, Rev. xviii. 12. It is claimed that no word in Biblical Hebrew denotes an elephant, unless the latter portion of the compound ἴβον-κακίν is supposed to have this meaning. Gesenius derives it from the Sanscrit वान, "an elephant;" Kell (on 1 Kings x. 22) from the Coptic ἵβος; while Sir Henry Rawlinson mentions a word habon which he met with in the Assyrian inscriptions, and which he understands to mean "the large animal," the term being applied both to the elephant and the camel (Journ. of Asia. Soc. xii. 465). It is suggested in Gesenius's Thesaurus (s. v.) that the original reading may have been ΒΑΧΣΙΑ, "ivory, ebony" (compare Ezek. xxvii. 15). By some of the ancient nations these tusks were imagined to be horns (Ezek. xxvii. 15; Pliny, viii. 4; xvii. 1), though Diodorus Siculus (1, 55) correctly calls them teeth. As they were first acquainted with elephants through their ivory, which was an important article of commerce, the shape of the tusks, in all probability, led them into this error. They are genuine teeth, growing in themselves, and in sunglasses, the upper jaw, the whole mass of secretions which in other animals form the upper incisor and canine teeth. They are useful for defence and offence, and for holding down green branches, or rooting up water-plants; but still they are not absolutely necessary, since there is a variety of elephant, the Indian forests entirely destitute of tusks, and the females in most of the races are either without them, or have them very small; not turned downwards, as Bohart states, but rather straight, as correctly described by Pliny. Only two species of elephants are recognised—the African and the Indian—easily distinguished from each other by the size of the ear, which in the former is much larger than in the latter. The tusks of the African elephant attain sometimes a length of 8 or even 10 feet, and a weight of 100 to 120 pounds; but those of the Indian elephant are much shorter and lighter, whilst in the females they often scarcely project beyond the lips. "Elephant's tooth," or simply "elephant," is a common name for ivory, not only in the Oriental languages and in Greek, but also in the Western tongues, although in all of them teeth of other species may be included. There can be no doubt, for example, that the famous "ivory of Ashur," a material which is possible ivory obtained from the hippopotamus was known in Egypt at least as early as that obtained from the elephant. This kind of ivory does not split, and therefore was anciently most useful for military instruments. See ELEPHANT.

The Egyptians at a very early period made use of this material in decoration. The corner of a small ivory box in the Egyptian collection at the Louvre is "inscribed with the name imperator-nefer-ka-re, or Neper-ches, adopted by a dynasty found in the upper line of the tablet of Abidos, and attributed by M. Bunsen to the fifth... In the time of Thothmes III ivory was imported in considerable quantities into Egypt, either in boats laden with ivory and ebony from Ethiopia, or else in tusks and cups from the Ruten-.. The celebrated car at Florence has its linchpins tipped with ivory" (Birch, in Trana. Off. Roy. Soc. of Lit. iii. 24 series). The specimens of Egyptian ivory work, which are found in the principal museums of Europe, are, most of them, in the opinion of Mr. Birch, of a date anterior to the Persian invasion, and some even as old as the 18th dynasty. The practice of inlaying or covering the walls with ivory and other valuable substances was in very extensive use among the Egyptians, who used it likewise for ornamenting articles in inlaid wood, as may be seen in the British Museum. Amongst the articles of household furniture there is a seat with four turned legs inlaid with ivory, brought from Thbes; also a high-backed chair on lion-footed legs; the back solid, inlaid with panels of darker wood, with lotus flowers of ivory. The ivory used by the Egyptians was prin-cially brought from Ethiopia (Herod. iii. 114), though their elephants were originally from Asia. The Ethiopians, according to Diodorus Siculus (1, 55), brought to Sesostris "ebony and gold, and the teeth of elephants." Among the tribute paid by them to the Persian kings were "twenty large tusks of ivory" (Herod. iii. 19). The processions of human figures bearing presents, etc., still extant on the walls of palaces and tombs, attest, by the black, crisp-haired bearers of huge teeth, that some of these came from Ethiopia or Central Africa; and by white men similarly laden, who also bring an Asiatic elephant and a white bear, that others came from the East. In the Periplus of the Red Sea (c. 4), attributed to Arrian, Coloe (Culis) is said to be the chief mart for ivory. It was thence carried down to Adoulis (Zula, or Thula), a port on the Red Sea, about three days' journey from Coloe, together with the hides of hippopotamuses, tortoise-shell, apes, and slaves (Pliny, vi. 54). The elephants and rhinoceroses from which it was obtained were killed further up the country, and few were taken near the sea, or in the neighborhood of Adoulis. At Polemon Theron was found a little ivory like that of Adoulis (Periplus, c. 3). Ptolemy Philadelphus made this port the depot of the elephant trade (Pliny, vi. 54). According to Pliny (viii. 10), ivory was so plentiful on the borders of Ethiopia that the natives made door-posts of it, and even fences and stalls for their cattle. The author of the Periplus (c. 16) mentions Rapsa as another station of the ivory trade, but the ivory brought down to this port is said to have been of an inferior quality, and for the most part found in the woods, damaged by rain, or collected from animals drowned by the overflow of the rivers at the equinoxes" (Smith, Dict. of Class. Geography, a. v. Rapsa). The Egyptian mersch was traded for ivory and oxen, access to Barrygs, the port to which was carried down the commerce of Western India from Ozenne (Periplus, c. 49).

The Assyrians appear to have carried on a great traffic in ivory. Their early conquests in India had made them familiar with it, and (according to one rendering of the passage) their artists supplied the luxurious Ty-

Apes, Elephant, and Ivory as Tribute. (From the Nimrud Obelisk.)
The practice of inlaying and veneering wood with ivory and tortoise-shell is described by Pliny (xvi, 84). By the luxurious Phoenicians ivory was employed to ornament the boxwood rowing-benches (or "hatches" according to some) of their galleys (Ezek. xxvii, 6). The skilled workmen of Hiram, king of Tyre, fashioned the great ivory throne of Solomon, and overlaid it with pure gold (1 Kings x, 18; 2 Chron. ix, 17). The ivory thus employed was supplied by the caravans of Dedan (Isa. xxxi, 13; Ezek. xxvii, 15), or was brought from the East (Homer, Od. xxii, 200), as also among the Egyptians (Wilkinson, Ant. Eg. iii, 169). As an instance of the superabundant possession and barbarian use of elephants' teeth may be mentioned the octagonal ivory hunting-tome built by Akbar, about twenty-four miles west of Agra: it is still standing, and bristles with 126 enormous tusks disposed in ascending lines, each ten on each face. Mr. Roberts, remarking on the words of Amos (vi, 4), they "that lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon couches," refers the last word, in conformity with the Tamil version, to swinging cots, often mentioned in the early tales of India, and still plentifully used by the wealthy. It does not appear that they were known in Western Asia, or that figures of them occur on Egyptian bas-reliefs. It is more likely that polka (those luxurious travelling litters) are meant, which were borne on men's shoulders, while the person within was stretched at ease. They were in common use even among the Romans, for Cicero fell into his assassin's hands while he was attempting to escape in one of them towards Naples. Among the Romans, inlaying with ivory seems to have become, at length, rather a common method of ornamenting the interior of the mansions of the wealthy; for Horace mentions it as an evidence of his humble way of life that "no walls inlaid with ivory adorned his house."

Ivy (ειρων) is mentioned but once in the Scriptures, and that in the Apocrypha, namely, in 2 Macc. vi, 7, while it is said that the Jews were compelled, when the feast of Baccus was kept, to go in procession carrying ivy to this deity, to whom it is well known this plant was sacred. Ivy, however, though not mentioned by name, has a peculiar interest to the Christian, as forming the "corruptible crown" (1 Cor. ix, 25) for which the competitors at the great Isthmian games contended, and which St. Paul so beautifully contrasts with the "incorruptible crown" that shall hereafter encircle the brows of those who run worthily the race of this mortal life. In the Isthmian contests the victor's garland was either ivy or pine. See Crown.

The term καταστής or κατάττες seems to have been applied by the Greeks in a general sense, and to have included many plants, and among them some climbers, as the convolvulus, besides the common ivy (Hedera helix), which was especially dedicated to Bacchus, and which was distinguished by the name of "Hedera poética, Dionysia ant Bacchiocca, quod ex ea poëtarum corona consuetur." It is well known that in the Dionysia, or festivals in honor of Dionysius, and in the processions called Βάτων, with which they were celebrated, women also took part, in the disguise of Bacche, Naiades, Nymphes, etc., adorned with garlands of ivy, etc. (Ovid, Fasti, iii, 786). Bacchus is generally thought to have been educated in India, and the Indian Efdhès has been supposed to be the origin of the name. The fact of Bāghēs being a compound of two words signifying tiger and master or lord, would appear to confirm the identity, since Bacchus is usually represented as drawn in his chariot by a tiger and a lion, and tigers, etc., are described as following him in his Indian journey. As the ivy, however, is not a plant of India, it might be objected to its being characteristic of an Indian god. But in the mountains which bound India to the north both the ivy and the vine may be found, and the Greeks were acquainted with the fact that Mount Meru is the only part of India where ivy was produced. Indeed, Alexander and his companions are said to have crowned themselves with ivy in honor of Bacchus. The ivy, Hedera helix, being a native of most parts of Europe, is too well known to require special notice. See Bacchus.

Ixora, a divinity of the East Indians, or the worshippers of Brah. They hold him to be of infinite endurance, and illustrate this belief by saying that Brah himself, desirous of seeing Ixora's head, ascended... and father of three sons (Exod. vi, 18, 21; Num. xvi, 1; 1 Chron. vi, 2, 18, 38; xxiii, 12, 18). In Num. iii, 19, his name is Anglicized "Izahar." His descendants are called Izharithes (Heb. יזריתים; Sept. Ἰζαρίτης; 1 Chron. xxiv, 22; xxvi, 23, 29, in the first of which passages it is Anglicized "Isharites"). B.C. post 1656. See also Zohar. "In 1 Chron. vi, 22, Aminadab is substituted for Ishar, as the son of Kohath and father of Korah, in the line of Samuel. This, however, must be an accidental error of the scribe, as in ver. 58, where the same genealogy is repeated, Izhar appears again in his right place. The Codex Alex. in ver. 22 reads Israh in place of Aminadab, and the Aldine and Complut. read Aminadab between Izhar and Korah, making another generation. But these are probably only corrections of the text. (See Burington, Geneal. of the O.T.)" (Smith).

Israh'ah (Heb. יִשְׂרָאֵל, חֲרוֹבֵית, sprout of Jehovah sc. into the world), the name of one or two men. 1. (Sept. Ἰσραῆλ; Vulg. Israhia). The "son of Uzzi, and grandson of Tola, the son of Issachar (1 Chron. vii, 9). B.C. cir. 1014. See OBAJAH. 2. Sept. omits, but some copies have Ἰσραηλᾶς, others Ἰσραήλ (Vulg. Iseraia; A. V. "Jezrahiah.") The superintendent of the singers (doubtless a Levite) who celebrated the completion of the walls of Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. xii, 43). B.C. 446.

Iz'rahite (Heb. יִצְרָחִית, only with the art. יִצְרָחִית, the indigenous, prob. by error of transcription for יִצְרָחִית, a Iz'rahite [but Fürst makes it a man's name = Izra'iah], and this again for יִצְרָחִית, Izra'el). Sept. has Ἰσραήλ v. Ἰσραηλᾶς; Vulg. Jeserites), a patriotic epithet of Shamshu, one of David's generals (1 Chron. xxvii, 6), prob. a former or present-descended from Zerah, Judah's son. See EZRAHITE.

Iz'ri (Heb. יִצְרְיָה, יִצְרְיָה, the Jererite, otherwise a former; Sept. Iseri; Vulg. Iseri), the leader of the fourth division of Levitical singers under David (1 Chron. xxvii, 11); prob. the same with Zeri, of the sons of Jeduthun, mentioned in ver. 3. B.C. 1014.

J.

Ja'lan (Heb. יָאָלָן, יָאָל, vester; Sept. has two names, יָאָלָן וְאָלָן, other copies simply לָאָלי or לָאָלי; Vulg. Jacob), the last named of the sons of Ezer, son of Seir the Horite (1 Chron. i, 42, where it is Anglicized "Jakhan"); called in the parallel passage (Gen. xxxvi, 27) by a simpler form of the same name, Ἰαλάν. B.C. ante 1694. His descendants appear to have settled in the northern part of the Arabah. He was the forefather of the Bene-Jaakan (q. v.), round whose wells the children of Israel twice encamped, once after they left Moseroth, and just before they went on to Hor-Hagglad (Numb. xxxiii, 39-42), and again in a reverse direction after the left Kadash-harnes, and before they reached Mount Hor or Mosera (Deut. x, 6). See BEREHOTH-BENE-JAANK.

Ja'ak'ob (Heb. יָאָכֹב, יָאָכֹב, vester; Sept. has two names, יָאָכֹב וְאָכֹב, other copies simply לָאָכוֹב or לָאָכוֹב; Vulg. Jacob), one of the prosperous descendants (הַנֵּסֵת נֶס, prince) of Simeon that emigrated to the valley of Geedor (Gerar) (1 Chron. iv, 36). B.C. apparently cir. 710.

Ja'ala (many Ja'ala) (Heb. יָאָלָה, יָאָלָה, 'izah); Sept. 'izah (v. r. 'izah), one of the Nethinim ("servants of Solomon") whose descendants (or perhaps a place whose former inhabitants) returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii, 58); called in the parallel passage (Exra ii, 56) by the equivalent [the final z or h] by Chaldean) name Jaalah (יָאָלָה, Sept. 'izah). B.C. ante 536.

Ja'lah (many Ja'lah) (Exra ii, 56). See JAALAA.

Ja'lam (many Ja'lam) (Heb. יָאָלָם, יָאָלָם, concomber; Sept. Ἰαλάμ), the second named of Ezer's three sons by Ahilamah in Canaan (Gen. xxxvi, 5, 14; 1 Chron. i, 35). B.C. post 1694.

Ja'an (See DAN-JAAN.

Ja'anai (some Ja'anai) (Hebrew יָאָנָא, יָאָנָא, mourner, otherwise for יָאָנָא, answered by Jehovah; Sept. Ἰανναί v. Ἰανναί, Vulg. Janai), one of the chief (Idites residents in Bashan (1 Chron. vi, 12). B.C. between 1098 and 792.

Jaaphar Ibn-Tophallil, a distinguished Arab of the 12th century, deserves our notice as the author of a philosophical treatise entitled the History of Hej Ibn-Tophallil (translated into Latin by Pococce [Oxf. 1671] and into English by Ockley [Oxf. 1708, 8vo]). It aims to teach that "the light of nature is sufficient to lead mankind to a knowledge of the Deity without the aid of revelation." Of Jaaphar's personal history we know scarcely anything. He is supposed to have died about 1198. See Gorton's Biographical Dictionary, s. v.

Ja'ar'or-er'egim (Hebrew יָאָרָרּ אֶרֶגִּים, יָאָרְוֶרְו נָדְיֵה; Sept. Αἰαρόουρος, Vulg. Saltus polynuarius), according to the present text of 2 Sam. xxii, 19, a Betheleemite, and the father of Elhanan, who slew Goliath (the words 'and the name were added in the A. V.). In the parallel passage (1 Chron. xx, 5), besides other differences, Jair is found instead of Jaare, and Oregus

Jaazzer

4. The son of Hoshaiah, a Maacathite, who seeth in conjunction with Johanan, the son of Kareah, after the downfall of Jerusalem, first in submitting to the Babylonian governor Gedaliah, and, after his assassination, in requesting Jeremiah's advice as to the proper course to pursue for the salvation of the remnant (Jer. xii. 1). He appears to have assisted in recovering Ismael's prey from his clutches (comp. Jer. xii. 11). After that he probably went to Egypt with the rest (Jer. xiii. 4, 5). He is doubtless the same person called Azariah, the son of Hoshai, who rejected the divine council and so assisted in driving the remnant into Egypt (Jer. xiii. 1). B.C. 587. See JEREMIAH.

Jaazzer (Hebrew Zeazzer, "Jaazzer", 1 Chron. vi. 81; xxvi. 91; elsewhere the more abbreviated form "Jaaz", Zeazzer, helper; Sept. Σαζηνός [2 Sam. xxvii. 5, Σαζηνός]; Ath. Ver. "Jaazzer" in Numb. xxii. 82; xxvi. 35, at the place where "Jaazzer", a city on the east of the Jordan, taken by the Israelites under Moses from the Amorites (Numb. xxii. 92), and assigned, with other neighboring places of Gilgal, to the tribe of Gad (Numb. xxxii. 1, 3, 55; Jos. xiii. 29); it is probably a Levitical city (Jos. xxxi. 9; 1 Chron. vi. 81). It must have been of some importance, for it gave its name to a large section of country. The "land of Jaazzer" was fertile, and its rich pastures attracted the attention of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (Numb. xxxii. 1). As it is mentioned between the boundary of Dibon and Dor, near the city of Besor, it was probably a high plain north of Heshbon (Numb. xxxii. 3). It was allotted to the Merarite Levites (Jos. xxi. 89; 1 Chron. vi. 81), but in the time of David it would appear to have been occupied by Hebronites, i.e. descendants of Kohath (1 Chron. xxi. 81). It seems to have given its name to a district of land, or "daughters" town of (Numb. xxi. 82, A.V. "villages"); 1 Macc. v. 8). It is mentioned in connection with the census under David (2 Sam. xxiv. 6; 1 Chron. xxvi. 81), and was among the Moabite places that experienced the desolating march of the Chaldean invaders (Isa. xvi. 8; Jer. xviii. 92, in which it is said to be a "city of Jaazzer""); the "countryside" of. In the "bardenas" proclaimed over Muab by the prophets, Jaazzer is mentioned so as to imply that there were vineyards there, and that the cultivation of the vine had extended thither from Sidon (Isa. vi. 89; Jer. xiii. 82) to the exiles that remained in the hands of the Ammonites (1 Macc. v. 8). According to Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Ζαζηνός), it lay 10 R. miles west (south-west) of Philadelphia (Rabbath-Ammon), and 15 from Heshbon. Josephus calls the place Jaazora (τα Ζαζορά Αρχ. xii. 81, 1), and Ptolemy Geographia (Yazgoria, v. 163; Zach's Mention [xviii. 429]) thinks it is found in the present ruins called Sper or Sur (Burckhardt's Trav. in Syria, p. 355, 357), but this is too near Rabbah according to Zimmerman's map, which gives the village of Sper at the head of a wady of the same name, at the proper location to correspond with that of Eusebius. Rümper (Palae. p. 254) thinks it is rather the Ain Hasir (Burckhardt, Trav. p. 609); but this is in consequence of the statement of Eusebius in another place (Onomast. s. v. Ζαζηνός), that it lay eight miles from Philadelphia, confounding Jaazzer with Hazor (see Keil's Comment on Jer. xiii. 35). As to the "latter passage" of "land of Jaazzer" mentioned by Ath. Ver. (Numb. xxii. 92), which Gesenius (Comment, on Isa. vi. 8) thinks an error, while Reid confounds it with the Jabbock (Palestina, p. 825), and others with other streams (Bitching, Erdbeek, xi. 898); it is probably (see Hirtig, Commun. zv. Jer. p. 190) the Jazer (or the upper name of the river, see (Prof. Stuart, in the Bibl. Repose, 1836, p. 157). With this identification Schwarz coincides (Palestina, p. 230). Porter (in Kittles Cyclopaedia, s. v.) suggests that "the land of Jazer" must have extended to the shore of the Dead Sea, and that the "sea of Jazer" may therefore have been so called by the inhabitants of the district, just as the northern lake took the name of Tiberias, and "Genesaret," and "Chinnereth." But this is unconfirmed by any other passage. In Numb. xxi, 24, where the present Hebrew text has הַנִּכְבֶּה (A.V. "strung"), the Sept. has put הַנִּכְבֶּה. Burckhardt, in travelling from Es-Salt to Heshbon, passed the last-named—above ruined town, called סֵיר, situated on the side of a hill, and immediately below it was the source of a stream which ran down to the Dead Sea. Soon after this, in Syria, there appears to have been on the left (east) of the road, and below them the road is the source of the wady סֵיר (Burckhardt), or מְגִיב Es-Sir (Seetzen), answering, though certainly in position, yet imperfectly in character, to the παραλήπερ of Eusebius. Seetzen conjectures that the sea of Jabbok has been at the source of this brook, considerable marshes or pools sometimes existing at these spots. (Comp. his earlier suggestion of the source of the wady Serku, p. 333.) סֵיר, or סֵיר, is shown on the map of Van de Velde as 9 Roman miles W. of Amman, and about 12 from Heshbon. There can be little doubt that this is the Jazer of the Bible (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 328). The prophecies of Scripture are fulfilled. The city and country are alike desolate. The vineyards that once covered the hill-sides are gone; and the wild Bedawin from the eastern desert make cultivation of any kind impossible (Porter, Syria, and Palaestina, pp. 198 sqq.).

Jāzzīlī (Heb. only in the paragogic form Yāzzîlî; מָזִיֵל, comforted by Jehovah; Sept. Yalel v. τ. Ωζιθή, apparently a third son, or a descendant of Merari the Levite, and the founder of an independent house in that family (1 Chron. xxiv, 26, 27) (B.C. ante 1044); but neither he nor his descendants are mentioned elsewhere (compare the lists in xxiii, 21-23; Exod. vi, 19). The word Beno (בְּנֹז), which follows Jaziziah, should probably be translated "his son," i.e. the son of Merari. But the text is in such a state that it is hard to know in what light to regard the person to whom it is assigned. Elsewhere the only sons of Merari mentioned are Mahli and Mushli (Exod. vi, 10; Num. iii, 33; 1 Chron. vi, 4 [A.V. 19]; xxii, 21).

Jāzzīl (Heb. Yāzzīlî, מָזְיֶל, comforted by God; Sept. Yelbāl v. τ. Ωζιθή, a Levitical musician among those of the subordinate part (1 Chron. xv, 18); doubtless the same as the Azziel who was one of those that performed the song of Moses (Deut. xxxii, 10). It is not known whether he is of the house of Levi or of Judah.)

Jababalites is the name of a novel Mohammedan sect which teaches "that the knowledge of God extends to all things, but is perfected by experience; and that he governs the world according to the chance of divers events, as not having had, from eternity, a perfect knowledge of all things future. Of course the orthodox Mohammedans look upon this doctrine as heretical, and condem the Jababalites as an impious and blasphemous set. See Broughton, Bibloth. Hist. Sac., i, 498. See MOHAMMEDAN.

Jab'īl (Heb. Yeb'dîlî, מַבַּדְל, a stream, as in Isa. xxx, 25; xlv, 4; Sept. Yeb'dîl Josephus Yodb'dylc, Ant. i, 2, 2), a descendant of Cain, son of Lamech and Adah, and brother of Jubal; described in Gen. iv, 20 as "the father of such as dwell in tents, and have cattle." B.C. cir. 2500. This obviously means that Jabal was the first who adopted that nomadic life which is still followed; and by numerous Arabian and Tartar tribes in Asia (compare Buttman, Mythologus, i, 164 sqq.). Abel had long before been a keeper of sheep (Gen. iv, 2); but Jabal invented such portable habitations (formed, doubtless, of skins) and transportable vessels to remove the people from one place to another, when they led their flocks to new pastures. See TENT. Bochart (Hieroz. i, 44, near the end) points out the difference between his mode of life and Abel's. Jabal's was a migratory life, and his possessions probably included other animals besides the sheep. The shepherds who dwelt within have found the land on which they dwelt sufficiently productive for the constant sustenance of their IV.-Z z the sources of the Jabok, and into the plains eastward (Judg. xi, 18-22)" (Porter in Kitto, s.v. It is now called the Zerka or Wady Zerka) (from its "blue" color. Realms of J. A. A., p. 25; but, according to Schwarz, Palest., p. 52, from a fortress of the same name on the caravan route from Damascus to Mecca). Its sources are chiefly on the eastern side of the mountains of Gilgal, and it also drains a portion of the high plateau of Arabia beyond. In its passage westward across the plains it passes more than once passes under ground. The upper branches and tributaries are mere winter streams. At the point where the two main branches from Jerash and Ammon unite, the stream becomes perennial, and often, after heavy rain, is a foaming, impassable torrent. But where it flows is narrow, deep, and in places wild. Throughout nearly its whole course it is fringed by thickets of cane and oleander, and the large clustering flowers of the latter give the banks a gay and gorgeous appearance during the spring and early summer" (Porter, Handbook for S. and P., p. 310). Higher up, the sides of the ravine are clothed with forests of evergreen oak, pine, and arbutus; and the undulating forest glades are carpeted with green grass, and strewn with innumerable wild flowers. The scenery along the banks of the Jabok is probably the most picturesque in Palestine; and the ruins of towns and villages and fortresses in the surrounding mountains side the country as interesting as it is beautiful. The water is pleasant, and, by the bed being rocky, the stream runs clear (Burchhardt's Syria, p. 347; Iby and Mangles, Travels, p. 519; Buckingham, Palestines, L. 109; Lindsay, ii, 125).

Jabesh (Heb. Yabesh, יַבֵּשׁ, dry, as in Job xii, 25; Ezek. xvii, 29, etc.; also written fully Yebesheth, יְבֵשֶת, 1 Sam. iv, 9; xxii, 11; 2 Sam. ii, 22; 1 Chron. x, 12, first time), the name of a place and also of a man.

1. (Sept. in Sam. 'Iḇeši, in Chron. 'Iḇešîc) The shorter form (1 Sam. vi, 3, 9, 10; xx, 12, 13; 1 Chron. x, 12 only) of the name of the city elsewhere called JABESH-GILEAD (q.v.).

2. (Sept. 'Iḇešîc or 'Iḇešî or 'Iḇešîc in Chron. 'Iḇešîc) יַבֵּשֶת or יַבֵּשֶת or יַבֵּשֶת (in Chron. 'Iḇešîc) גָּלְיָה or גָּלְיָה תִּיְרָה; Josephus Ida-

Jabesh-gilead (Heb. Yabesheth 'Gilead, יַבֵּשֶת גִּילָּאָד, [also יַבֵּשֶת גִּילָּאָד, see JABESH, by which simple form it is sometimes called]; Sept. 'Iḇešîc or 'Iḇešî or 'Iḇešîc in Chron. 'Iḇešîc) יַבֵּשֶת or יַבֵּשֶת or יַבֵּשֶת in Chron. xvi, 2, 11, 'Iḇešîc (Am. vi, 5, 1), and 'Iḇešîc (Am. v, 1). A town mentioned (1 Kings xvi, 29; 2 Kings xviii, 8), in the land of Gilead, distant a night's journey from Bethshan (1 Sam. xxxii, 11; 2 Sam. ii, 4; xxii, 12). In the sense denoted in this juxtaposition, Gilead included the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. xxvii, 21), as well as the tribes of Gad and Reuben (Num. xxxii, 1-42) east of the Jordan; and of the cities of Gilead, Jabesh was the chief, lying within the limits of the half tribe of Manasseh east.

It is first mentioned in connection with the cruel vengeance taken upon its inhabitants for not coming up to Mizpeh on the occasion of the fierce war between the children of Israel and the tribe of Benjamin. Every male of the city was put to the sword, and all the virgins—to the number of 400—seized to be given in marriage to the 600 men of Benjamin that remained (Judg. xxi, 8-14). Nevertheless the city survived the loss of its males, and is next memorable for the siege it sustained from Nahash, king of the Ammonites, the raising of which formed the first exploit of the newly-elected king Saul, and procured his confirmation in the sovereignty. The inhabitants had agreed to surrender, and to have their right eyes put out (to incapacitate them from military service), but were allowed seven days to ratify the terms. The townspeople sent out a large army, and came to their relief (1 Sam. xi). This service was gratefully remembered by the Jabeshites, and about forty years after, when he and his three sons were slain by the Philistines in Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi, 8), the men of Jabesh-gilead came by night and took down their corpses from the walls of Bethshan, where they had been exhumed and thrown, then buries the bodies under a tree near the city, observing a strict funeral fast for seven days (ver. 13). "Jabesh-gilead was on the mountain, east of the Jordan, in full view of Bethshan, and these brave men could creep up to the tall along wady Jalil without being seen. So God had that day hidden them from the accusal sepulchre in the tribe of Benjamin (2 Sam. xx, 14). Jabesh still existed as a town in the time of Eusebius, who places it on a hill six miles from Pella, towards Gerasa (Onomast. a.v. 'Aḇanāsā and 'Iḇašîc). Mr. Buckingham thinks it may be found in a place called 'Iḇaz or 'Iḇez, marked by ruins upon a hill a spot not far from which, according to the above indications, Jabesh must have been situated (Travels, ii, 130, 134). It was more probably situated on the present wady Jables, which Burchhardt (Trav. in Syria, p. 289) describes as entering the Jordan not far below Beisan. According to Schwarz (Pabest, p. 234), the area of this wady is about 450 m. in length and the mouth is about 100 m. wide. This wady runs on this wady ten miles east of Jordan; but Dr. Robinson, during his last visit to this region, sought in vain for any village or ruins by that name (which, he says, is applied exclusively to the wady), but thinks the site of Jabesh-gilead may be marked by that of the ruins called by the Arab ajnâr (the bed of the wady), high upon the wady, on the south side, on a hill, and containing columns as he was informed (new ed. of Researches, iii, 319). It is about six miles from the ruins of Pella, near the line of the ancient road to Gerasa (Van de Velde, Travels, ii, 349-52; Porter, Handbook for Syria and Palest., p. 317; Stanley, Sinai and Pal., p. 290).

Jabz (Heb. Yabtes, יַבְּס, according to 1 Chron. iv, 9, afflication, sc. to his mother, apparently by transposition from the root בָּשָׁנ, Sept. יָבְשָׁהוּ and יָבְשָׁהוּ or יָבְשָׁהוּ, the name of a man and also of a place.

1. A descendant of Judah (B.C. post 1612), but of what particular family is not apparent, although we have this remarkable account of him inserted among a series of their officers: 1 Chron. iv, 18. And Jabz is described as "young and able"— than his brethren: and his mother called his name Jabz, saying, Because I bare him with sorrow (דָּשָׁנ, 'o'orb). And Jabz called on the God of Israel, saying, Oh that thou wouldst bless me indeed, and enlarge my coast, and that thine hand might be with me, and that thou wouldst keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me (דָּשָׁנ, 'o'orb). And God granted him that which he requested (1 Chron. iv, 9, 10). It is very doubtful whether any connection exists between this genealogy and that in ii, 50-55. Several names appear in both—Hur, Ephrathah, Bethlem, Zareathith (in A.V. iv, 2 inaccurately "Zorathites"), Joash, Caleb: and there is much similarity between others, as Rechab and Rechab, Ezbon and Esbanites; but any positive connection seems undeniable. The Tarbog identifies Jabz and Othniel. For the traditional notices of this person and his character, see Clarke's Comment. ad loc.

2. A place described as being inhabited by several families of the scribes descended from the Kenites, and allied to the Rechabites (1 Chron. ii, 85). It occurs in a notice of the progeny of Salma, who was of Judah, and closely connected with Bethlem (ver. 51), possibly the father of Boaz: and also—though how is not clear—with Joab. The Tarbog states some curious particulars which, however, do not much elucidate the difficulty, and are rather an objection to a worthy tradition and of mere invention based on philological grounds. Rechab is there identified with Rechabiah, the son of Elizeer, Moses's younger son (1
JABEZ 728 JABLONSKI

Chron. xxvi, 25), and Jabez with Othniel the Kenite, who bore the name of Jabez "because he founded by his counsel (יְבֵּצָה) a school (בֵּצָה) of disciples called Tirasithes, Shimeaithes, and Sucathites." See also the quotations from Talmud, Temurah, in Buxtort's Lex. col. 966, where a similar derivation is given. As the place appears to have been situated within the territory of Judah, it may have been settled by the numerous posterity of the above person by the same name (comp. "the men of Rechah," 1 Chron. iv, 12). The associated names would seem to indicate a locality near, if not identical with Kirjath-jearim (comp. in the same region Kirjath-sepher, or book-town, implying the literary character of the inhabitants), and the inhabitation of the same families appear to have dwelt (1 Chron. ii, 58, e.g. the Ithrites = Kenites, the Shumathites = Samethites.

Jabez, Isaac Ben-Salomo Ben-Isaac Ben-Joseph, a Jewish commentator of some note, flourished in the 15th century. Of his personal history we are uninformed, but his works, of great celebrity in the 15th century, still continue to be considered valuable contributions to exegetical literature; and Frankfurter, in his "Rabbinic Bible," inserted the following, which are, however, rather compilations from different expositors than the original productions of Jabez: (1) על הדבר, or Commentary on the Psalms:—(2) דברי הימים, or Commentary on Proverbs:—(3) דבריYEVEH, or Commentary on Proverbs:—(4) דברי YEVEH, or Commentary on the Song of Songs:—(5) דברי YEVEH, or Commentary on Ruth:—(6) דברי YEVEH, or Commentary on Lamentations:—(7) דברי YEVEH, or Commentary on the Book of Ecclesiastes:—(8) דברי YEVEH, or Commentary on the Book of Esther:—(9) דברי YEVEH, or Commentary on Daniel:—(10) דברי YEVEH, or Commentary on Ezra and Nehemiah. Besides these, Jabez wrote יְבֵּצָה, or homiletical Commentary on the Haphtaroth, or Sabbath Lessons from the prophets (Belvire, near Constantinople, 1538, folio): יְבֵּצָה, or Commentary on the Pentateuch. See Wiel. Ribloch. Hebraea, i, 694; iii, 617 sq.: iv, 886; Frum. Bibloth. Jud. ii, 2; Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. in Bibloth. Bodl. col. 1125: C. D. Ginsburg, in kitto, s. v.

Jabin (Heb. יבּיִין, discoverer; Sept. יְבָשִּׁי [v. r. יְבָשִׁי in Ps. xxx. 13], Josephus יְבָשִּׁי, Ant. v. 5, 1), the name of two kings of the Canaanitish city Hazor. See Hazor. It was possibly a royal title, like Agag among the Amalekites, and Abimelech of Gilead.

1. A king of Hazor, and one of the most powerful of all the princes who reigned in Canaan when it was invaded by the Israelites (Josh. xi, 1-14). His dominion seems to have extended over all the north part of the country; and after the ruin of the league formed against the Hebrews in the south by Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, he assembled his tributaries near the waters of Merom (the Lake Huleh), and called all the people to arms. This coalition was destroyed, as the one in the south had been, and Jabin himself perished in the sack of Hazor, his capital, B.C. cir. 1615. This prince was the last powerful enemy with whom Joshua combated, and his overthrow seems to have been regarded as the crowning act in the conquest of the Promised Land, leaving only the Amakim in the mountains of Judah and Ephraim to be dispossessed in detail (Josh. xi, 21-25, 26, 33, 34).

2. Another king of Hazor, and probably descended from the preceding (Judg. iv, 2, 3), with whom some (Maurer, Comment. on Josh. xi; Hervey, Genealogies, p. 229) have confounded him (see Hiëronym. Elistri, ii, 1, 58, & alii; Mauvieux, Ant., ix, 10-15). While Joshua was in command of one of the servitudes of the Israelites, probably when they lay under the yoke of Cushan or Eglon, the king of Hazor was reconstructed. The narrative gives to this second Jabin even the title of "king of Canaan"; and this, with the possession of 900 iron-armed war-chariots, implies unusual power and extent of dominion. The iniquities of the Israelites having lost them the divine protection, Jabin gained the mastery over them; and, stimulated by the memory of ancient hostilities, oppressed them heavily for twenty years, B.C. 1429-1409. From this thraldom they were relieved by the great victory won by Barak in the plain of Esdraelon, over the hosts of Jabin, commanded by Sisera, one of the most renowned generals of those times (Judg. iv, 1-16). Such was the deep-commitment of the king of Hazor was not yet, however, entirely broken. The war was still prolonged for a time, but ended in the entire ruin of Jabin, and the subjugation of his territories by the Israelites (Judg. iv, 24). This is the Jabin whose name occurs in Ps. lxxxxiii, 10. See Hazor.

Jabineau, Henri, a French religious writer, born at Etampes near the opening of the last century, was, after completing his studies at Paris, appointed professor or at the Vitré-le-Français College on his refusal to subscribe the formulary generally submitted before a candidate is permitted to enter the priesthood. But his attainments were of such superior order that the archbishop of Châlons-sur-Marne waived this obligation, and Jabineau was consecrated a priest, and he became rector at the College of Vitré. But he soon exchanged the rostrum for the pulpit, where, on account of his liberal views, he was several times interdicted. In 1768 he entered the lawyer's profession, and during the Revolution wrote a number of pamphlets against the French clergy of the Roman Catholic Church. He died in July, 1792, shortly before the publication of the decree of the National Assembly against priests (Aug. 26, 1792). The most important of his writings are, Comptence de la puissance temporelle relativement à l'érection et aux changements des sièges épiscopaux (Paris, 1790, 8vo; 1790, and often)—Explication des principes de la foi Catholique sur l'Eglise, recueilli des instructions familiaires de M. Joub... (published shortly after his death, Paris, 1792, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, xxvi, 142.

Jablonski, Daniel Ernst, a distinguished German theologian, was born at a little village near Dantzic Nov. 26, 1804. The name of his father, a preacher, was originally Fugger, but was changed in after life exchanged for it for Jablonki, deriving the name from that of his native place, Jablunka, a small village in Silesia. Young Jablonski was educated at the gymnasium of Lyssa, in Prussian Poland, and at the University of Frankfort on the Oder (now constituting the Berlin University), where he applied himself to literature and philosophy, but more especially to theology and the oriental languages. In 1860 he visited the universities and libraries of Holland and England, and spent considerable time at Oxford. On his return in 1868 he was appointed preacher at one of the reformed churches of Magdeburg, which place he left two years later in order to assume the rectorship of the gymnasium at Lyssa. In 1869 he was made court preacher at Königsberg, and in 1868 his name procured him the place of preacher to the king at Berlin. But still other honorable offices awaited him. Thus, in 1878 he was made member of the Consistory, in 1729 a Church councillor, and in 1738 he was elected president of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin. At the request of the king, Frederick I, he labored earnestly but unsuccessfully, to accomplish an union of the Protestant churches; and was finally called to Berlin May 25, 1741. The greater part of his life had been devoted to severe study, and he was eminently successful as a preacher. Dr. Hagenbach (Hurst's transl. of Oh. Hist. of 18th and 19th Cent. i, 410, 412) says that Jablonski was a bishop among the Moravians (1808), and even was "the eldest of the Moravian bishops," and that he consecrated both David Nisschmann (q. v.) and count Zinzendorf for the episcopal office. At the instance of the queen, he was honored as early as 1706 with the degree of doctor of divinity. Jablonski translated into Latin the eight discourses of Richard Bentley against Atheism, the treatise of Joseph Woolward on the History of London, and the history of Hurren on predestination and grace; but he is especially celebrated by an edition of the Hebrew Bible, with notes and an introduction, published under the title of Biblia Hebraica cum notis Hebraicis (Berlin, 1693, 2 vols. 4to; 2d ed. 1712, 12mo). The preface has since been printed in other editions of the Hebrew Bible, and 18 editions have been printed, a list, by Leusden, of 2924 select verses, in which all the words to be found in the Bible are contained. He also published an edition of the Talmud, and wrote a number of religious works, the most important of which is Christliche Predigten (Berlin, 1716, etc., 10 parts, 4to).

Many of Jablonski’s writings bear on the state of the Church in Poland. One of the most able of them is the Historia Consensus Sionismni-inter religiose regnas Poloniae et Lituaniae (Berlin, 1731, 4to), etc. See Ersch u. Gruber, Allg. Encyklop. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gen., xxvi, 146 sq.; Kitto, Cyclop. of Bib. Lit. & v. s. v.; Herzog, Real-Enzyklop. d. v.

Jabnoël (Hebrew Yabno‘el), built by God; Sept. יבנשי, but יבנוש in Josh. xix, 33), the name of two persons.

1. A town on the northern boundary of Judah, between Mount Baalah and the Mediterranean (Josh. xv, 11); probably the same elsewhere (2 Chron. xxvi, 6) called Jabned (v. q.) or Jabno‘a (1 Macc. iv, 15, etc.).

2. A city on the border of Naphthali between Nekeb and Lakum (Josh. xiv, 33). Schwarz (Palest. p. 181, 182) affirms that the later name of Jabnoel was Kefri Yumah, “the village by the sea,” and on Talmudic grounds (comp. Reband’s Palest., p. 545, 716) locates it on the southern shore of Lake Merom, and thinks it identical with the Jerusalem mentioned by Josephus as lying in this section of Upper Galilee (Ἰωναθά, Λίφα, 37; Ἰωναθω, War, ii, 20, 6). This is not improbable, as the boundary-line here described appears to have extended from the northern limit of Palestine along the eastern bounds of Naphthali to the southern limit of Joseph. It is probably the site visited by Dr. Robinson, on the declivity of the western mountain south of Lake Huleh, with a wady containing a small stream on the south of the village, and a few ruins of the Jewish type (Later Researches, p. 361, 362).

Jabneh (Heb. יבניא, יבניא, a building; Hamaner, Mecell. Phem, p. 256, compares the Arabic Yabnur; Sept. יבנושו, v. יבנשיו and יבנשיו, Vulg. Jabnitis, a Philistine town near the Mediterranean, between Joseph and Ashdod, whose wall king Uzziah demolished (2 Chron. xxvi, 6). It is probably this place whose name many of the copies of the Sept. insert in Josh. xv, 36 (Ὑβανου, Ἰωναθω), Cod. Vat. Iωναθω). In later times (Josephus, War, l, 7, 7; Strabo, xvi, 759; Pliny, v, 14), under the name of Jumna (Ἰωναθώ, 1 Macc. iv, 15; Ἰωναθα, 1 Macc. v, 68; x, 69; 2 Macc. xii, 8), it was inhabited by Jews as well as Gentiles (Philo, Opp. ii, 575). According to Josephus (Ant. xii, 8, 6), Gorgias was governor of it; but the text of the Macabbees (2 Macc. xii, 92) has Iudama. At this time there was a castle of the name of Tooth on a high rock that overtopped the vessels lying there, Judas set fire, and the conflagration was seen at Jerusalem, a distance of about twenty-five miles (2 Macc. xii, 9). The harbor is also mentioned by Pliny, who, in consequence, speaks of the town as double—due James (see Reband, p. 283). Like Ascalon, it was probably the harbor of the title of Mebo’ah, perhaps a Coptic word, meaning the “place on the sea” (Kenrick, Φανίσιον, p. 27, 29). Pompey took the place from the Jews and joined it to the province of Syria (Josephus, War, ii, 1, 7, 7). Its distance from Jerusalem was 240 stadia (2 Macc. xii, 7), from Diospolis twelve Roman miles (Itin. Anton.), from Ascalon 202 stadia (Strabo, xvi, 759).

At the time of the fall of Jerusalem, Jabneh was one of the most populous places of Judea, and contained a Jewish school of great fame, whose learned doctors are often mentioned in the Talmud. It was visited by Josephus (Wars, ii, 20, 6); Strabo (xvi, 759); Otho, Ier. Rabb., p. 283 sq.; Sperchius, Dis. de Academia Jambenni episcopi rectoribus, Viteb. 1749; Lightfoot, Acodem.Juln, histor, in his Opp. ii, 87 sq.). The Jews called this school their Sanhedrim, though it only possessed a faint shadow of the authority of that great council. See Maimonides, Sefer ha-ḥina, section 102; Lightfoot, ii, 141-143). In this holy city, according to an early Jewish tradition, was buried the great Gamaliel. His tomb was visited by Parchi in the 14th century (Zunz, in Asher’s Benj. of Tuluji, ii, 439, 440; also 96). In the time of Eusebius, however, it had dwindled to a small place (ῥήμα), merely requiring casual mention (Onomasticon, xv, Ἰωναθώ). In the 6th cen-Jabruda (Jacob's Well), a city of Palestine mentioned by Pudelym (v, 15), and as an episcopal city by St. Paulus (Geogr. Jachin (Heb. Yakin, isayim, firm; Sept. 'isaiv, i. e. 'isaiv, the name of three men and also of a pillar. 1. The fourth named of the sons of Simeon (Gen. xlvii, 11), called Jach in 1 Chron. iv, 24. His descendants are called Jachim in 1 Chron. vi, 20; and Isai in 1 Chron. iv, 22). 2. The head of the twenty-first "course" of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxxiv, 17). B.C. 1014.

Jachin, one of the priests that returned to Jerusalem from the Exile (1 Chron. ix, 10; Neh. xi, 10). B.C. 536.

Jachin (Sept. in Kings I Kings iii, Alex. Alexi, isayim; i. e. Alex. Alexi, in both cases "colossus in brass," "Gebel" in the Aramaic (Isayim; Vulg. Est., 244, 324, 326; Movers, Phön. 1, 203). In the porch (zem3) of Solomon's Temple stood these columns (Kings vii, 15—22; 2 Chron. iii, 17; comp. Jer. iii, 21), and doubtless of symbolical import (Simonia, Onomasticon, p. 480, 469). See Architecture: Temple. Each was eighteen cubits high and twelve in circumference, or four in diameter. They were formed of brass (copper or bronze, perhaps some more precious alloy) four fingers in thickness (1 Kings, 11), 50.

The capitals (quadrangular, Jer. iii, 28; 1 Kings vi, 17; 18: 22; 2 Chron. iii, 15). The description of the ornaments (of the same metal, Jer. iii, 22) of the capitals (1 Kings vii, 17; 2 Chron. iii, 15, 14; 12; Jer. iii, 22, 17; 2 Kings xi, 18) of the Temple, is given (Hitzig, Jerem. p. 493), either on account of the brevity or in consequence of some corruption in the text, and it is therefore no wonder that antiquarians (see Lamy, De Taberna, fod. p. 1043 sq.; Meyer, Blätt. f. k. k. Würth, i, 18 sq.; i, 81 sq.; Grünser, in the Stuttgart, Kuhn, 1831, No. 77 sq.; Keil, Tempel Solomons, p. 95 sq.; Schnaase, Gesch. der bld. Kunste, i, 245, 290) and architects (Schmidt, Bibl. Mathem., p. 285 sq.) should have varied greatly in their views and reconstructions on this subject. The text (1 Kings vi, 4, 8, 16; Scheuchzer, Phys. secr. iii, tab. 148 sq.) is varied: see Meyer, ut supra. It is clear, however, that the capitals were swelling at the top, and lily-shaped (1 Kings vii, 18, 20; comp. Josephus, Ant., viii, 3, 4). For discussions of various points connected with the subject, see Rosenmüller on Jer. iii, 22; Meyer's Bibelkommentar, p. 257; John, iii, 261; Movers, Chron. p. 232; Hirt, Gesch. d. Jacinth (iakouc, the hyacinth, properly a flower of a deep purple or reddish blue (iakouc, hyacinthin, i. e. hyacinth-colored, "of jacinth," Rev. ix, 17); hence a precious stone of like color (Rev. xxii, 20). Considerable doubt prevails as to the real mineral thus designated; but if indeed this particular stone be it, it is not rather any purplish or azure gem. According to Dr. Moore (Anc. Mineralogy, p. 169), it is most nearly related to the siercon of modern mineralogists. The hyacinth or jacinth stone was of various colors, from white or pale green to purple-red. Pliny speaks of it as shining with a golden color, and in much favor as an amulet or charm against the plague (Hist. Nat. xxxvii, 9). It occurs in the Sept. for wpay, Exod. xxxv, 5; also for wpay, Exod. xxxv, 4; but is usually supposed to represent the Heb. wpay, "figure" (q. v. (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Alterthumsk. i, p. 38). See GEM.

Jakkal, the Persic skala, Turkish jakal, comis austere of Linnaeus, has been thought to be denoted by several Hebrew words variously rendered in the Author. Vers. See FOX, DRAGON, WHELK. It is a wild animal of the canine family [see WOLF, Dog], which in Persia, Armenia, likewise Arabia (Niebuhr, Besch. 166), and even in Syria (Russell, Aleppo, ii, 61) and Palestine (around Jaffa, Gaza, and in Galilee, Hasselquist, Trav. p. 271; among the hills of Judæa, Robinson, ii, 432; iii, 188), is frequently met with, attaining a large size (three and a half feet in length), and so closely resembling a fox in color and general appearance as to be at first readily mistaken for that animal. But the jackal has a somewhat peculiarly formed head, not greatly unlike that of a shepherd's dog, about seven inches long, with a very pointed muzzle, and yellowish-red hair.
Eastern Jackals.

which resembles that of the wolf. The color of the body is yellowish-gray above, whitish below; the back and sides sometimes of mixed gray and black; the shoulders, thighs, and legs uniformly tawny-yellow. The tail is round, projecting, and reaching hardly to the heel. The eyes are large, with a round pupil. It is gregarious in its habits, hunting in packs (generally preying upon smaller animals and poultry, but frequently attacking the larger quadrupeds), the pest of the countries where it is found. It burrows in the earth, preferring forests and caverns, where it usually lies hid during the daytime; but at night it issues in companies (sometimes very large) on predatory incursions among the villages, and often the immediate vicinity of towns. Its favorite food is fowls or carrion, and it will break into graves to make a meal upon the corpse, and even carry off and devour young children if found unprotected.

In a wild state, this animal has an intolerably offensive odor. Colonel Hamilton Smith, in his Canidae, states that the jackals form a group of crepuscular and nocturnal canines, never voluntarily abroad before dark, and then hunting for prey during the whole night; entering the streets of towns to seek for offals, robbing the hen-roosts, entering out-houses, examining doors and windows, feasting upon all dressed vegetables and ill-secured provisions, devouring all the carrion they find exposed, and digging their way into sepultures that are not carefully protected against their activity and voraciousness; and in the fruit season, in common with foxes, seeking the vineyards, and fattening upon grapes. They congregate in great numbers, sometimes as many as two hundred being found together, and they howl so incessantly that the annoyance of their voices is the theme of numerous apologues and tales in the literature of Asia.

This cry is a melancholy sound, beginning the instant the sun sets, and never ceasing till after it has arisen. The voice is uttered and responded to by all within hearing, in an accent of every possible tone, from a short, hungry yelp to a prolonged crescendo cry, rising octave above octave in the shrillness, and mingled with dismal whinings, as of a human being in distress.

Their nocturnal howl has a peculiar wailing tone (Russel, Aloepus, p. 62; Russegger, Reise, iii, 125), greatly resembling the cry of a child. "These sinister, guilty, woe-begone brutes, when pressed with hunger, gather in gangs among the graves, and yell in rage, and fight like fiends over their midnight orgies; but on the battlefield, however, no proof of that howl! denotes exclusively the fox, and that ijin, and Solomon's little foxes, refer solely to jackals; particularly as these animals were, if really known, not abundant in Western Asia, even during the first century of the Roman empire; for they are but little noticed by the Greek writers and sportsmen who resided where now they are heard and seen every evening; these authorities offering no remark on the most prominent characteristic of the species, namely, the chorus of howlings lasting all night—a habit so intolerable that it is the invariable theme of all the Semitic writers since the Hegira whenever they mention the jackal. We may therefore infer that sh dul, if a general denomination, and that ijin, if the etymology be just, is derived from howling or barking, and may designate the jackal, though more probably it includes also those wild Canide which have this habit. Indeed, as Ehrenberg (Icon. et descr. mamal. de 2) has remarked, it is likely that travellers have usually confounded the jackal with the canis Syriacus, while a thorough treatise on the canis caninus is still a desideratum (see Wood, Mammal. Anim., p. 56).

There is also another name for it in O. T., Py (uben plural by Chaldaism, *Py", *tamin", regarded by others as the singular, whence a true plural, *Py", *tamin", "dragons"), described as a wild animal inhabiting deserts, and uttering a plaintive cry (Job xxx, 29: Mic, i, 8); often joined (in poetical parallelism) with *Py", "daughter of the ostrich," and *Py", ijin (Isa, xiii, 22; xxxix, 13; xili, 20). The Syriac understands the jackal, and the Arabic the wolf (comp. Pococke, *Comm. in Mic. ad loc.; Schnurter, Die Philol. p. 326 sq.). It is possibly no more than the canis Syriacus after all. Bochart (Herviis, iii, 222 sq.) interprets it of an enormous kind of serpent. See DRAGONS.

Jackson, Arthur, an English Nonconformist divine, was born in Suffolk in 1590. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, became lecturer, and afterwards minister of St. Michael's, Wood Street. He frequently received the living of St. Faith's, but was ejected for nonconformity in 1662, and died in 1666. His annotations are still esteemed. His writings are principally in the exegetical department, and are generally considered valuable even in our day. Of these the best are, A Helpe for the Understandinge of the Holy Scripture (Camb. 1645, 8 vols. 4to):— Anecdotes on...
Jackson, Cyril, a celebrated English divine, was born in 1742. He was educated at Oxford University, and, after holding several benefices, was appointed dean of Christ Church, Oxford, which position he held until the time of his death, April 9, 1819.

Jackson, James B., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born and reared in Clarke County, Ga., and at the date of his birth is not known to us, neither are we aware of the date of his conversion, though it appears, from the minutes of the Florida Conference, of which he was a member, that it must have been about the age of fourteen. He was honored by his associates in the ministry as a man of superior abilities, and held several of the best appointments in the Florida Conference. He was also professor in Andrew Female College for a number of years. At the time of his death, Feb. 18, 1868, he was presiding elder of Jacksonville District. In all, he spent about thirty years in the ministry. See Minutes of Ann. Conf. M. E. Ch. South, iii, 227.

Jackson, John, an English Arian divine and great Hebraist of the last century, was born at Lisleys, in Derbyshire, in 1710, and educated at Oxford University, and at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree, but could not obtain that of master of arts on account of his Arian principles. In 1712 the corporation of Doncaster presented him with the rectory of Bostington, but the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster having been asked why the churchman thus selected and consecrated was not a papist, he removed to the hospital, and in 1729 succeeded to its mastership. He died in 1763. Jackson carried on a lively controversy with several of England's most distinguished orthodox writers; divines; more especially with Bishop Warburton (q. v.). He also wrote a large number of works, the principal of which are, The Duty of a Christian set forth and explained in several practical Discourses, being an Exposition of the Lord's Prayer, etc. (Lond. 1728, 12mo):—The Existence and Unity of God proved from His Nature and Attributes, being a Vindication of Dr. Clarke's Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God, etc. (Lond. 1784, 8vo):—The Belief of a future State proved to be a fundamental Article of the Religion of the Hebrews, and held by the Philosophers, etc. (Lond. 1745, 8vo):—Chromological Account, etc., for the Entertainment of J. C. MS. Years (Lond. 1752, 2 vols. 4to), and many other controversial pamphlets. See Dr. Sutton, Memoirs of the Life and Writings of J. J., etc. (Lond. 1764, 8vo);—Chalmers, Gen. Biog. Jackson, John Freylinghusen. See Jackson, William I.

Jackson, Samuel, a Wesleyan minister, who held the highest offices in the gift of the Wesleysans, and for many years was one of the greatest powers of English Wesleyanism, was born at Scraton, Yorkshire, Feb. 10, 1788. He was particularly prominent in the South-West circuit in 1805. He studied at the Wesleyan Institution, "he always took a lone path," says a writer in the London Quart. Rev. 1863, p. 261, "must be attributed the awakening among them (the Wesleysans) of that religious jealousy for the younger members of their societies and congregations, which of late has so much elevated their system of Sunday-school instruction, and has thrown the burden of a more thorough, ministerial oversight and training around multitudes of their youth, who might otherwise have passed unheeded under the perils that precede adult age. For some years before his death concern for the spiritual welfare of the young became a passion with Mr. Jackson; he wrote and preached the best sermons on the subject. He was plain in language, masculine in sentiment, ever abundant in simple but forcible illustrations. He died suddenly, Aug. 4, 1861. His brother Thomas, another celebrated minister of the Wesleysans, edited the sermons of Samuel Jackson, and prefaced them with a memoir of the author (London, 1863, 8vo).

Jackson, Thomas, D.D. an eminent English divine, was born at Willingdon, Durham, in 1579. He studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and after 1596 at Corpus Christi, of which he became vice-president. He was afterwards appointed successively vicar of Newcastle, president of his college in 1630, prebendary of Winchester in 1638, and, finally, dean of Peterborough in 1638. He died in 1640. Dr. Thomas Jackson enjoyed a great reputation for piety and learning; he was profoundly read in fathers and possessed a breadth of judgment. His works (commentaries, among these a valuable commentary on the Apostles' Creed, and sermons), which rank very high, form a magazine of theological knowledge, and are remarkable also for elegance and dignity of style. Southey places him among the very best of English divines, and George Herbert says, "I bless God for the confirmation Dr. Jackson has given me in the Christian religion against the Atheist, Jew, and Socinian, and in the Protestant against Rome." A new edition of his works, with a copious index, was published in 1824 (12 vols. 8vo). See Darling, Cyclop. Biblio. s. v.;—Biographia Britannica, s. v.;—Fuller, Worthies; Wood, Athenae Oxonienses (see Index, vol. i);—Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Jackson, William (1), born in 1782, was one of the earliest ministers of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in New Jersey. He began his studies for the ministry with the Rev. John Freylinghusen, whose daughter he married in 1757. The church at Bergen, N. J., which was the first of any denomination in the state, had existed ninety years without a pastor, being unable to procure one from the mother country. In 1758, in union with the Church on Staten Island, a call was made upon Mr. Jackson which bound him to go to Holland, complete his studies, and obtain ordination from the Classis of Amsterdam. These churches were to pay him £100 for his support while absent. Four years and three months elapsed before his return in 1757, when he assumed full pastoral charge, dividing his services equally between the two congregations. These facts show both the tenacity of Church life and the devotion of the people to the idea of a thoroughly educated ministry. The Cetus and Conferentie troubles, which had so long rent the churches, and which grew out of this very question of an educated ministry, were finally adjusted in 1771, through the intervention of Drs. John H. Livingston (q. v.) and his associates, and both Mr. Jackson and these churches rejoiced in the consummation. See REFORMED DUTCH CHURCH. His ministry lasted thirty-two years (1757-1789), when he became insane. He died in 1815. Mr. Jackson's literary and theological attainments were attested by academic degrees conferred by Yale, Columbia, and Princeton colleges. He was celebrated as a pulpitr orator, preaching in the Dutch language. His voice was commanding, and his popularity was such that "in Middlesex and Somerset counties he was visited as a field-preacher," and was constantly invited to Whitefield. On one occasion, at the Raritan church, the assembly was so large that he had to leave the pulpit and take a station at the church door to deliver his sermon, and the throng outside was greater than that which filled the building. His ministry was useful, acceptable, and successful with great and powerful congregations. One of his five sons, the Rev. John Freylinghusen Jackson, was for many years the pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church at Harlem, New York, where he died in 1836, at the age of sixty-eight years. He was a laborious, faithful, and devoted minister, and distinguished for his easy and graceful delivery. Jackson, William (2), an English divine, broth er of Cyril Jackson, born in 1750, was educated at Westminister School and Christ Church, Oxford. He obtained the degree of D.D. in 1779, and became, after having been preacher at Lincoln’s Inn, canon of Christ Church, regius professor of Greek in 1811, and bishop of Oxford. He died in November, 1815. He published some of his sermons (1784–1804). See Rich, Bibliotheca Americana, i, 317.

Jackson, William, D.D. (3), a Congregational minister, was born in Cornwall, Conn., Dec. 14, 1768. At the age of sixteen, when about commencing his studies preparatory for college, his mind became deeply impressed with religious truth, and he at once decided to devote himself to the ministry. He entered Dartmouth College in 1786, and graduated in 1790. For a time he taught a school in Wethersfield, Conn., but, finding that his services were needed in the Church, he commenced finally the study of theology under Drs. Spring and Simmons. In 1789 he was licensed to preach, and he performed ministerial labors first near his home, and afterwards in New Jersey. A call which had been given him by the Congregational Society at Dorset, Vt., in 1793, when feeble health obliged him to decline, was renewed three years after, and this time accepted. He was ordained Nov. 27, 1796. In 1807 he was obliged to ask his people for an assistant; and though his task had thus been made easier, his health continued to fail him, and he died Oct. 15, 1812.

In 1837 Middlebury College of which he had been a corporation member for several years, conferred on him the doctorate of divinity. Dr. Jackson possessed a mind of high order, sanctified by earnest devotion to the interests of the Church. "Dr. Porter, late of Andover, the companion of his youth, and particular friend in college, said of him, 'He is the only minister of his age who has kept up with the times. His mental enterprise and puniting for progress never left him.' "—Dr. J. Malby, in Sprague, Anns. of the American Pulpit, ii, 336.

Ja‘cob (Heb. Yaqobh), גַּפְּרֹת, suppliant, from גַּפְּרֹת, to bite the beet [to which significance there is allusion in Gen. xxv, 26; xxvii, 36; Hos. xii, 8; ] Sept. and N.T. 'Isaiah; Θεομιστός, which latter is identical with the Greek name for "James"), the name of two men in the Bible.

1. The second-born of the twin sons of Isaac by Rebekah (B.C. 2004). His importance in Jewish history requires a copious treatment, which we accordingly give in full detail.

1. His conception is stated to have been supernatural (Gen. xxv, 21 sq.). Led by peculiar feelings, Rebekah went to her father’s house, where she was joined by her brother, through the intercession of Abraham, and was informed that she was about to become a mother, that her offspring should be the founders of two nations, and that the elder should serve the younger circumstances which ought to be borne in mind when a judgment is pronounced on her conduct in aiding Jacob to secure the privileges of birthright to the exclusion of his elder brother Esau. He was born with Esau, when Isaac was 60 and Abraham 150 years old, probably at the well Laahai-roi.

As the boys grew, Jacob appeared to partake of the gentle, quiet, and retiring character of his father, and was accordingly led to prefer the tranquil safety and pleasing occupations of a shepherd’s life to the bold and daring enterprises of the hunter, for which Esau had an irresistible predilection. The latter was his father’s favorite; however, while Rebekah evinced a partiality for Jacob (Gen. xxvi, 27, 29).

That selshness, and a prudence which approached to cunning, had a seat in the heart of the youth Jacob, appears but too plainly in his dealing with Esau, when he exacted from a famishing brother so large a price for a mess of pottage as the surrender of his birthright (Gen. xxvii, 28). B.C. cir. 1865. (See Kitto, Daily Bible Illust. ad loc.)

The leaning which his mother had in favor of Jacob would naturally be augmented by the conduct of Esau in giving up his birthright, doubtingless to his parents’ wishes, two Hittite women, who are recorded as having been a gift of men to Isaac and Rebekah (Gen. xxvi, 34, 35). B.C. 1646.

Conspicuous thus prepared the way for procuring the transfer of the birthright, when Isaac, being now old, proceeded to take steps to pronounce the irrevocable blessing, which acted with all the force of a modern testamentary bequest. This blessing, then, it was essential that Jacob should receive in preference to Esau. Here Rebekah appears as the chief agent, Jacob as the mere instrument in her hands. Isaac directs Esau to procure him some venison. This Rebekah hears, and urges her reluctant favorite to personate his elder brother. Jacob suggests difficulties; they are met by Rebekah, who is ready to incur any personal danger so that her object be gained (see Thubron, Land and People ii, 355). Her voice is obeyed, the food is brought, Jacob is equipped for the deceit; he helps out his fraud by direct falsehood, and the old man, whose senses are now failing, is at last with difficulty deceived (Gen. xxvii). B.C. 1297.

It cannot be denied that this is a most reprehensible transaction; to carry on a deceit so truly painful and sad a mother conspires with one son in order to cheat her aged husband, with a view to deprive another son of his rightful inheritance. Justification is here impossible; but it should not be forgotten, in the estimate we form, that Chief among the circumstances in favor of the nepotism were the circumstances in which the son of Abraham had been reared, the qualities that he had afterwards demonstrated, and the prospect to her was dark and threatening which arose when she saw the neglect of Esau at the head of the house, and his hateful wives assuming command over him.

For the sale of his birthright to Jacob, Esau is branded in the N. Test. as a "profane person" (Heb. xii, 16).

The following sacred and important privileges have been mentioned as connected with primogeniture in patriarchal times, and as constituting the object of Jacob’s desire: (a) Superior rank in the family (see Gen. xlix, 3). (b) A double portion of the father’s property (see Ex. xix, 35). (c) The priestly office in the patriarchal church (see Numb. xvii, 17–19). In favor of this, see Jerome, ad Ezech. Jps. lxxiii, § 6; Jarchi, in Gen. xxvii; Estius, in Hebr. xvi, 2; Aben-Ezra (see Deut. xxxii, 17, and Gen. lxxiv, 22). (d) The priestly office in the patriarchal church (see Numb. xvii, 17–19). In favor of this, see Jerome, ad Ezech. Jps. lxxiii, § 6; Jarchi, in Gen. xxvii; Estius, in Hebr. xvi, 2; Aben-Ezra (see Deut. xxxii, 17, and Gen. lxxiv, 22). (e) The priestly office in the patriarchal church (see Numb. xvii, 17–19). In favor of this, see Jerome, ad Ezech. Jps. lxxiii, § 6; Jarchi, in Gen. xxvii; Estius, in Hebr. xvi, 2; Aben-Ezra (see Deut. xxxii, 17, and Gen. lxxiv, 22). (d) The conditional promise or solemnization of the heavenly inheritance (see Carthwright in the Crit. Sacra on Gen. xxvii). (e) The promise of the covenant, by which all the nations of the earth should be blessed, though not included in the birthright, may have been so regarded by the patriarchs, as it was by their descendants (Rom. ix, 8, and Shuckford, viii).

The whole subject has been treated in separate essays by Vitringa in his Obserent. Sacr. i, 11, 2; also by J. H. Huttinger, and by J. J. Scheider. See Eysk, De sancta sanctorum praep. Ewarii (Wittenb. 1729); Gmelin, De benedict. paterna Esavro a Jacobo praeposita (Tib. 1706); Heydegger, Hist. Patriarchi, ii, 14. See BIRTHRIGHT.

With regard to Jacob’s acquisition of his father’s blessing (ch. xxviii), few persons will accept the excuse offered by St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xiii, 11): "It is not in the deceit which he practised: that it was merely a figurative action, and that his personation of Esau was justified by his previous purchase of Esau’s birthright. It is not, however, necessary, with the view of cherishing a Christian spirit, to heap opprobrium upon an fallenible man whom the choice of God has rendered venerable in the eyes of believers. Waterland (iv, 289) speaks of the conduct of Jacob in language which is neither wanting in reverence nor likely to encourage the extenuation of guilt: ‘I do not know whether it be justly imputed to Jacob; in particular, I suspect that it is not. But there were several very good and laudable circumstances in what Jacob and Rebekah did, but I do not take upon me to acquit them of all blame. Blunt (Undes. Univ.) observes that none "of the patriarchs can be set up as a model of Christian morals. They lived under a code of laws that were not absolutely good, perhaps not so good as the Levitical: for, as this was but a preparatory for the more perfect law of Christ, so possibly was the patriarchal for the future law of Moses."

The circumstances which led to this unhappy transaction, and the retribution which fell upon all parties concerned in it, have been carefully discussed by Benson (Hulsean Lectures [1822] on Scripture Difficulties, xvi, xvii). See also Woodgate (Historical Sermons, i) and Malbone (Leaves of Joseph), x, xv. The first mention of the prophecies concerning Esau and Jacob, and on Jacob's dying blessing, see bishop Newton, Discourses on the Prophecies, § 3, 4.

Punishment soon ensued to all the parties to this iniquitous transaction (see Jarvis, Church of the Redeemer, p. 47). Fear seized the guilty Jacob, who is sent by his father, at the suggestion of Rebekah, to the original seat of the family, in order that he might find a wife among his cousins, the daughters of his mother's brother, Laban the Syrian (Gen. xxxviii). Before he is dismissed, Jacob agrees to a solemn blessing. It is obvious that he was on the point of being kept alive in the young man's mind the great promise given to Abraham, and thus to transmit that influence which, under the aid of divine Providence, was to end in placing the family in possession of the land of Palestine, and, in so doing, to make it "a multitude of people." The language, however, even to the age of Joseph, suggests the idea that the religious light which had been kindled in the mind of Abraham had lost somewhat of its fulness, if not of its clearness also, since "the blessing of Abraham," which had originally embraced all nations, is now restricted to the descendants of this one patriarchal family. And so it appears, from the language which Jacob employs (Gen. xxxviii, 16) in relation to the dream that he had when he tarried all night upon a certain plain on his journey eastward, that his idea of the Deity was little more than that of a local god. "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not."

Nor does the language which he immediately after employs show that his ideas of the relations between God and man were of an exalted and refined nature: "If God will be with me, and will keep me in the way that I go, and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, so that I come safely to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God."

The vision, therefore, with which Jacob was favored was not without occasion, nor could the terms in which he was addressed by the Lord fail to enlarge and correct his conceptions, and make his religion at once more comprehensive and more influential. Jacob's vision at Bethel is considered by Miegie in a treatise [De Scolla Jacobo] in the Theaurus monum Theologico-Philosophicus, i, 195. See also Augustine, Serm. cxvii; Kurz, History of the Old Covenant, i, 893.

2. Jacob, on coming into the land of the people of the East, accidentally met with Rachel, Laban's daughter, to whom, with true Eastern simplicity and politeness, he showed such courtesy as the duties of pastoral life suggest and admit (Gen. xxix). Here his gentle and affectionate nature displays itself under the influence of that habitude and the fair form of the youthful maiden. "Jacob kissed Rachel, and told her his mind, and his voice and wept." It must be borne in mind, however, that Jacob himself had now reached the mature age of seventy-seven years, as appears from a comparison of Joseph's age (Gen. xxx, 25; xlii, 46; xlv, 7) with Jacob's (Gen. lix, 31). He was 100 years old when his uncle the space of a month, Laban inquires of him what reward he expects for his services. He asks for the "beautiful and well-favored Rachel." His request is granted on condition of a seven years' service—a long period, true, but to Jacob "they seemed but a few days for the love he had to her." When the time was expired, the crafty Laban availed himself of the customs of the country in order to substitute his elder and "tender-eyed" daughter, Leah. In the morning Jacob found how he had been beguiled; but Laban excused himself, saying, "It must not be done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born." Another seven years' service gains for Jacob the beloved Rachel. Leah, however, has the companion of being of being the mother of the first-born, Reuben; three other sons successively follow, namely, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, sons of Leah. This fruitfulness was a painful subject of reflection to the barren Rachel, who employed I ngua on this occasion that called forth a reply from her husband which shows that, mild as was the character of Jacob, it was by no means wanting in force and energy (Gen. xxx, 2). An arrangement, however, took place, by which Rachel had children by means of her maid, Bilhah, of whom Dan and Naphtali were born. Two other sons, Gad and Asher, were born to Jacob of Leah's maid, Zilpah. Leah herself bare two more sons, namely, Issachar and Zebulun; she also bare a daughter, Dinah.

At length Rachel herself bare a son, and she called his name Joseph. As this part of the sacred history has been made the subject of cavi on the alleged ground of anachronism (see 1 Ch. iv, 25), it may be well to present here a table showing the chronological possibility of the birth of these children within the years allotted in the narrative (Gen. xxxii, 32; xxx, 24).

Jacob's polygamy is an instance of a patriarchal practice quite repugnant to Christian morality, but to be accounted for on the ground that the time had not then come for a full expression of the will of God on this subject. The mutual rights of husband and wife were recognized in the history of the Creation, but instances of polygamy as frequent among the patriarchs as among the sacred records, from Gen. iv, 19 to Herod (Josephus, Ant. vii, i, 2). In times when frequent wars increased the number of captives and orphans, and reduced nearly all service to slavery, there may have been some reason for extending the recognition and protection of this custom. In the case of Jacob, it is right to bear in mind that it was not his original intention to marry both the daughters of Laban. (See, on this subject, Augustine, Contra Finatum, xxii, 47-54.)

Most faithfully and with great success had Jacob served his uncle for fourteen years, when he became desirous of returning to his parents. At the urgent request of Laban, however, he is induced to remain for an additional term of six years. The language employed upon this occasion (Gen. xxx, 25 sq.) shows that Jacob's character had gained considerably during his absence, both in strength and comprehensiveness, the means which he employed in order to make his bargain with his uncle work so as to enrich himself, prove too clearly that his moral feelings had not undergone an equal improvement (see Baumgarten, Comment, i, 276), and that he was in the original tenacity of purpose, and the sons of his mother in deceit, had produced some of their natural fruit in his bosom. (Those who may wish to inquire into the nature and efficacy of the means which Jacob employed, may, in addition to the original narrative, consult Michaelis and Rosenmuller on the subject, as well as the following: Jussoe's Qwestus in Gen.; Plien, Hist. Nat. vii, 10; Oppian, Cyneget. i, 330 sq.; Michaelis,
The prosperity of Jacob dispelled and grieved Laban, so that he seemed no longer desirable. His wives are ready to accompany him. Accordingly, he set out, with his family and his property, "to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan" (Gen. xxxvi) (B.C. 1907). It was not till the third day that Laban learned that Jacob had fled, when he immediately set out in pursuit of his丢失的 goods. He was destined to a decisive battle. Laban had been spared from the whole narrative to be so plainly the true state of matters, that it seems needless to refer to other views that have been taken of it. But Jacob was not the man at any time to repel force with force, and he had now learned, by a variety of experiences, where to make the real search for Jacob andstaff that he had left behind. His impressions, however, on getting the intelligence, were those of trembling anxiety and fear; but, on recovering himself a little, he called to his aid the two great weapons of the believer—pains and prayer. He first divided his people, with the flocks and herds, into two companies, so that if the one were attacked the other might escape. Then he threw himself in earnest prayer and supplication on the covenant-mercy and faithfulness of God, putting God in mind of his past loving-kindnesses, at once great and undeserved; reminding him also of the promise he had made him in the presence of his brother; since the promise of the covenant, with the promise of his gracious presence, and implying his present need to establish the hopes he had inspired by granting deliverance from the hands of Esau. So ended the first night; but on the following day further measures were resorted to by Jacob, though still in the same way. Aware of the certain vigilance of his brother, and how "a gift in secret pacifieth anger," he resolved on giving from his substance a munificent present to Esau, placing each kind by itself, one after the other, in a succession of droves, so that on hearing, as he passed drove after drove, the touching words, "A present sent to my lord Esau from your servant Jacob," he might be like the pouring of live coals on the head of his wrathful enemy. How could he let his fury explode against a brother who showed himself so anxious to be on terms of peace with him? It could scarcely be, unless there were still in Jacob's condition the grounds of a quarrel between him and his God not yet altogether settled, and imperilling the success even of the best efforts and the most skilful preparations? But that there really was something of the sort now supposed seems plain from what ensued. Jacob had made his preparations, all his calculations; and, with his numerous family and large possessions, he has again reached in safety the borders of Canaan. But is there still no danger in front? Shortly after parting with Laban, he met, we are told, troops of angels, apparently a double band, and wearing somewhat of a warlike aspect, for he called the place in honor of them, by the name of Mahanaim (two camps) (Gen. xxxii, i, 2). Whether this sight was presented to him in vision, or took place as an occurrence in the sphere of ordinary life, may be questioned, though the latter supposition seems best to accord with the narrative; but it is not of material moment, for either way the appearance was a realty, and bore the character of a specific revelation to Jacob, adapted to the circumstances in which he was placed. It formed a fitting counterpart to what he formerly had seen at Bethel; angels were then employed to indicate the peaceful relation in which he stood to the heavenly power; when he obeyed to retire from Canaan, and now, on his return, they are again employed with a like friendly intent—to give warning, indeed, of a hostile encounter, but at the same time to assure him of the powerful guardianship and support of heaven. The formation of the angel was not longer maintained; for, on sending messengers to his brother Esau with a friendly greeting, and apprising him of his safe return after a long and prosperous sojourn in Mesopotamia, he learned that Esau was on his way to meet him with a host of 400 men. There could be no reasonable doubt, especially after the preliminary intimation given through the angelic bands, as to the intention of Esau in advancing towards his brother with such a force. The news of Jacob's reappearance in Canaan, and that no longer as a dependant upon others, but as possessed of ample means and a considerable retinue, awoke into fresh activity the slumbering reverence of Esau, and led him, on the spur of the moment, to resolve on bringing the controversy to a decisive issue.
JACOB 731 JACOB

next conflict, he maintained his ground, till the heavenly ly combatant touched the hollow of his thigh and put it out of joint, in token of the supernatural might which this mysterious antagonist had at his command, and showing how easy it had been for him (if he had so pleased) to gain the mastery. But even then Jacob would not quit his hold; nay, all the more he would retain it, since he could not hold it. And Jacob should also, it was plain he had to do with one who had the power of life and death in his hand; he would, therefore, not let him go till he obtained a blessing. Faith thus wrought mightily out of human weakness—strong by this mysterious intervention, in the importunity for the favor of heaven, as expressed in Hos. xii. 4: "By his strength he had power with God; yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed; he wep and made supplication unto him." In attestation of the fact, and for a suitable commemoration of it, he had his name changed from Jacob to Israel (combatant or wrestler with God); "for as a prince," it was added, by way of explanation, "last thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed." Jacob, in turn, asked after the name of the person who had wrestled with him—not as if any longer ignorant who it might be, but wishing to know his son's, in order that he might give of God's head, as this had now appeared to him, embodied in a significant and appropriate name. His request, however, was denied; the divine wrestler withdrew, after having blessed him. But Jacob himself gave a name to the place: he called it Peniel (the face of God), "for," said he,"I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Gen. xxxii, 25-31). The contest indicated that he had reason to fear the reverse; but his preservation was the sign of reconciliation and blessing.
This mysterious intervention has been a fruitful source of difficulty and misinterpretation (see Hofmann, Varría Sacra, 185 sq.; Heumann, Synagog. diss., i, 147 sq.).
The narrator did not, we think, intend it for the account of a dream or illusion (see Ziegler in Henke's Nat. Mrg., ii, 29 sq.; Hengstenberg, Bibl., p. 51; Hertzler, Geist der Hebr. Poesie, i, 266; Smith's Bib. Dict., p. 460). A literal interpretation may seem difficult, for it makes the Omnipot-tent vanquish one of his own creatures, not without a long struggle, and last at only by a sort of art or strata-gem (compare similar accounts in heathen mythology, Hauer, Heb. Mythol., i, 351 sq.; Movers, Phän. i, 483; Bede, Hist. eccl., iv, 16). The custom of the same name was said that the only way to express the narrative is to dwell without the origin of our own associations, and endeavor to contemplate it from the position in which its author stood (see Bush's Note, ad loc.). Still, the question remains, what was the sense of these words in their exact sense? The question is far from settled in these terms? (see De Wette, Krit. d. Jtsch. p. 132; Ewald, Israeliten, i, 453; Rosenmüller, Schol., ad loc.) The design (says Wellbeloved, ad loc.), "was to encourage Jacob, returning to his native land, and fearful of his brother's resentment, and to confirm his faith in the existence and providence of God. And who will venture to say that in that early period any other equally efficacious means could have been employed?" (Comp. the language already quoted [ver. 29].) A very obvious end pursued throughout the history of Jacob was the development of his religious convictions; and the event in question, no less than the latter, has been enthrall the dreams he had, may have materially conduced to so important a result. That it had a lasting spiritual effect upon Jacob is evident from the devout tenor of his after life. (For a beautiful exposition of this event, see Charles Wesley's poem entitled "WrestlingJacob.")

Compared Krummacher, Jacob Wrestling [Lond. 1885].

After this night of anxious but triumphant wrestling, Jacob rose from Peniel with the sun shining upon him (an emblem of the bright and radiant hope which now illuminated his inner man), and went on his way hali-ing—weakened corporeally by the conflict in which he had engaged, that he might have no confidence in the flish, but strong in the divine favor and blessing. Accordingly, when Esau approached with his formidable host, all hostile feelings gave way; the victory had been already won in the higher sphere of things, and he who turned the hearts of kings like the rivers of water, made the heart of Esau melt like wax before the liberal gifts, the humble demeanour, and earnest appeal of the brother. Then Jacob told—"and Jacob's heart was kindled also, for the present at least, and for anything that appears during the remainder of their personal lives, they maintained the most friendly relations.

4. After residing for a little on the farther side of Jordan, at a place called Succoth, from Jacob's having erected there three booths (Hebrew sukkoth) for his cattle, he crossed the Jordan, and pitched his tent near Shechem,—ultimately the centre of the Samaritans. [In the recieved text, it is said (Gen. xxxiv., 18), "He came to Shalem, a city of Shechem"—but some prefer the reading Shelom. "He came in peace to city of Shechem."]

There he bought a piece of ground from the family of Shechem, and obtained a footing among the people as a man of substance, whose friendship it was desirable to cultivate. But ere long, having, by the misconduct of Hamor the Hivite (see Dinah) and the base value of his first-born son, the young men of Shechem in Canaan, Jacob is divinely directed, and, under the divine protection, proceeds to Bethel, where he is to "make an altar unto God, that appeared unto thee when thou didst come from the face of Esau thy brother" (Gen. xxxiv., xxxv). (B.C. cir. 1900). And ento the day, he commanded, first he purified his family from "strange gods," which he hid under "the oak which is by Shechem," after which God appeared to him again, with the important declaration, "I am God Almighty," and renewed the Abrahamic covenant.
With Bethel established for Ephraim, his beloved Rachel lost her life in giving birth to her second son, Benjamin (Gen. xxxv., 16-20) (B.C. cir. 1899). At length Jacob came to his father Isaac at Mamre, the family residence, in time to pay the last attentions to the aged patriarch (Gen. xxxv., 37) (B.C. 1898). The complete reconciliation between Jacob and Laban at this time is shown by their uniting in the burial rites of their father. Not long after this bereavement, Jacob was robbed of his beloved son, Joseph, through the jealousy and base fraud of his brothers (Gen. xxxvii) (B.C.
1896). This loss is the occasion of showing Jacob's strong and tender paternal feelings; for, on seeing what appeared to be proofs that "some evil beast had devoured Joseph," the old man "rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days, and refused to be comforted" (Gen. xxxvii, 35).

A widely extended famine induced Jacob to send his sons down into Egypt, where he had heard there was corn, without knowing by whose instrumentality (Gen. xxxiii, 26) (B.C. 1875). The patriarch, however, retained his youngest son Benjamin, "lest mischief should befall him," as it had befallen Joseph. The young men returned with the needed supplies of corn. They related, however, that they had been taken for spies, and that there was but one way in which they could disprove the charge, namely, by carrying down Benjamin to "the lord of the land." This Jacob vehemently refused (Gen. xxxvii, 36). The pressure was so great, and the length forced Jacob to allow Benjamin to accompany his brothers on a second visit to Egypt; whence, in due time, they brought back to their father the pleasing intelligence, "Joseph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt." How naturally is the effect of this on Jacob told—and Jacob's heart was kindled also, for the present at least, and for anything that appears during the remainder of their personal lives, they maintained the most friendly relations.

When, however, they had gone into particulars, he added, "Enough, Joseph my son is yet alive; I will go and see him before I die." Touches of nature like this suffice to show the reality of the history before us, and, since they are not unfrequent in the book of Genesis, they will of themselves avail to sustain its credibility against all that the enemy can do. The passage, too, with others recently cited, strongly proves how much the character of the patriarch had improved. In the whole of the latter part of Jacob's life he seems to have gradually parted with many less desirable qualities, and to have become at once more truthful, more energetic, more constant, affectionate, more wily, in the largest sense, a word which, as it is seldom used, requires encouragement. "In the visions of the night," Jacob goes down to Egypt (B.C. 1874), and was affectionately met by Joseph (Gen. xlvii. 29). Joseph proceeded to conduct his father into the presence of the Egyptian monarch, when the man of God, as an act of reconciliation and dignity which the religion gives, instead of offering slavish adulation, "blessed Pharaoh." Struck with the patriarch's venerable air, the king asked, "How old art thou?" What composition and elevation is there in the reply, "The days of the years of my pilgrimage are a hundred and thirty years; few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage" (Gen. xlviii. 10). Jacob, with his sons, now entered into possession of some of the best land of Egypt, where they carried on their pastoral occupations, and soon began to grow rich in large share and as a quantity. The aged patriarch, after being strangely tossed about on a very rough ocean, found at last a tranquil harbor, where all the best affections of his nature were gently exercised and largely unfolded (Gen. xlviii. sq.). After a long and eventful journey, being informed that his father was sick, went to him, when "Israel strengthened himself, and sat up in his bed." He acquainted Joseph with the divine promise of the land of Canaan which yet remained to be fulfilled, and took Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, distinguishing them by an adoption equal to that of Reuben and Simeon, the oldest of his own sons (Gen. xlviii. 5). How impressive is his benediction in Joseph's family (Gen. xlviii. 10, 16): "God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day; the angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers; and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth." "And Israel said unto Joseph, Behold, I die; but God will be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers." (ver. 21). Thus having enquired of his sons the venerable patriarch pronounced on them also a blessing, which is full of the loftiest thought, expressed in the most poetical diction, and adorned by the most vividly descriptive and engaging imagery (see Stähelin, Anlaufsversionen in Jacobi exegyesia, Heidelberg, 1927), showing how deeply religious his character had become, how freshly it retained its fervor to the last, and how greatly it had increased in strength, elevation, and dignity: "And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed [i.e. knelt towards the bed's head (see Delitzch in Heb. xi. 21) rather than bowed over the top of his staff as Stuart, ad loc. (see Staff)], and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people" (Gen. xlix. 33), at the ripe age of 147 years (Gen. xlviii. 29). B.C. 1857. His body was embalmed, carried with great care and pomp into the land of Canaan, and deposited with his fathers, and his wife Leah, in a cave of Machpelah. The mournful pursuit of this funeral procession is ingeniously supposed by Dr. Kittel (Piet. Hist. of Jews, i. 136) to have been the more circuitous one afterwards taken by the Israelites by the way of Mount Seir and across the Jordan, the object being to carry with them the coffin of the Philistines, who lay in the direct route. Dr. Thomson objects to this as an unnecessary deviation (Land and Book, ii. 385), urging that the Bethghas, which Jerome identifies with the Area-Atad or Abel-mizraim (q. v.), as the scene of the mourning ceremonies, lay near Gaza; but in this case it is certainly difficult to explain the constant statement that the spot in question was situated "beyond the Jordan," as it clearly implies a crossing of the river by the caudaciel.

In the list of Jacob's lineal descendants given in Gen. xlvi. 8-27, as being those that accompanied him on his removal to Egypt, there is evidence that the list was rather made up to the time of his decease, or perhaps (even Ne Uganda, his Postotaulis, is 290 sq): for we find mention not only of the eldest (some of whom will appear to be even grandsons) of Benjamin, at the date of that emigration a youth (see xlvii, 20, 30-34), but also the children of Pharez, at that time a mere child (comp. xxviii, 1). See Benjamin. Therefore, the genealogical difficulty in making out the total of seventy persons there stated, as well as the sum of sixty-six included in it, and likewise the aggregates of the posterity of the several wives as there computed. This difficulty is further enhanced by the number seventy-five assigned by Ne-ohen (Acts vii. 14) to Jacob's family at the same date. This last statement, however, cannot be disposed of in the manner frequently adopted by including the wives of Jacob and his sons (for it does not appear that they are all referred to, and it is probable that they would have swelled the number more largely if admitted), but is rejected by those who, adhering without scruple or caring to discuss its accuracy) from the Sept., which gives that total in the passage in Genesis, but inconsistently attributes nine sons to Joseph in place of two. Of all the explanations of the other discrepancies, that which alleges that the genealogists wished to give the exact number of the genealogical list of Chronology, ii. 180), but it has the inauspicious objections of including Jacoh himself' among the number of his own posterity, and of not conforming to the method of enumeration in the text. A comparison of Num. xxvi, 6 shows that the name of Eliah, the son of Pallu and grandson of Reuben, and the name of Joseph, the eldest of his own sons (Gen. xlviii. 5), shows that the descendant of Jacob from their state of alienation from God by recalling to their memory the repeated acts of God's favor shown to their ancestor. Malachi, (i, 2) strengthens the desponding hearts of the returned exiles by reminding them that subsequent generations would have inherited the favor which was bestowed upon Jacob was not withheld from them. Besides the frequent mention of his name in conjunction with those of the other two patriarchs, there are distinct references to events in the life of Jacob in four books of the N.T. In Rom. ix, 11-15, Paul adds the history of Jacob to prove that the favor of God is independent of the order of natural descent. In Heb. xii, 16, and xii, 91, the transfiguration of the saint and his possession of land at Shchem, are cited in John i, 51, and iv, 12. Stephen, in his speech (Acts vii. 16, mentions the famine which was the means of restoring Jacob to his lost son in Egypt, and the burial of the patriarch in Shchem.

In Jacob may be traced a combination of the quiet patience of his father with the acquisitiveness which seems to have marked his mother's family; and as in Ishmael, the migratory and independent character of Abraham was developed into the enterprising habits of a warlike hunter-chief. Jacob, whose history occupies a larger space, leaves on the reader's mind a less favorable impression than either of the other patriarchs with whom he is connected in the N.T. (Matt. viii, 11). But, in considering his character, we must bear in mind that we know not what limits were set in those days to the knowledge of God and the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit. A timid, thoughtful boy would acquire no self-reliance in a secluded home. There was little scope for the exercise of intelligence, wide sympathy, generosity, frankness.

up a stranger to the great joys and great sorrows of natural life—deaths, and weddings, and births; inured to caution and restraint in the presence of a more vigorous brother; secretly stimulated by a belief that God designed for him some superior blessing, Jacob was perhaps in a fair way to become a narrow, selfish, deceitful, disappointed man. But, after dwelling for more than half a lifetime in solitude, he is driven from home by the provoked hostility of his more powerful brother. Then, in deep and bitter sorrow, the outcast begins life afresh long after youth has passed, and finds himself brought first of all unexpectedly into that close personal communion with God which elevates the soul, and then into that enlarged intercourse with men which is capable of drawing out all the better feelings of human nature. An unseen world was opened. God revived and renewed to him that slumbering promise, over which he had brooded for three-score years since he had learned it in childhood from his mother. Angels conversed with him. Gradually he felt more and more the watchful care of an ever-present spiritual Father. Face to face he wrestled with the representative of the Almighty. And so, even though the moral consequences of his early transgressions hung about him, and saddened him with a deep knowledge of all the evil of treachery and domestic envy, and partial judgment, and filial disobedience, yet the increasing revelations of God enlightened the old age of the patriarch; and at last the timid "supper-planter," the man of subtle devices, waiting for the salvation of Jehovah, dies the "soldier of God," uttering the messages of God to his remote posterity. (See Nie- meyer, Charokk. ii, 290 sq.; Stanley, Jewish Church, i, 58 sq.) For reflections on various incidents in Jacob's life, see Bp. Hall's Contemplations, bk. iii; Blunt, Hist. of Ja- cob (Lond. 1832, 1860).

Many Rabbinical legends concerning Jacob may be found in Eisenmenger's Hist. Judæoth., and in the Jera- lem Targum. (See also Otho, Let. Rabb. p.286; Hambur- ger, Talmud. Wörterb. a. v.). In the Koran he is often mentioned in conjunction with the other two patriarchs (chap. ii, elsewhere). See MOHAMMEDANISM.

JACOB also occurs in certain poetical and conventional phrases, borrowed from the relations of the patriarch to the theocracy and state. "God of Jacob," יִבְנוֹסָא (Exod. iii, 6; iv, 5; 2 Sam. xxviii, 1; Ps. xx, 2; Isa. ii, 3); or simply "Jacob" (Ps. xxiv, 6, where the term יִבְנוֹסָא appears to have fallen out of the text); also "mighty One of Jacob," יִבְנְזָא (Ps. xxxii, 2), are titles of Jehovah as the national deity. "Jacob" frequently stands for his posterity or the Israelitish people; but poetically chiefly, "house of Jacob," יִבְנָא יִשְׂרָאֵל (Exod. xix, 3; Is. ii, 5, 6; viii, 17; Amos iii, 13; Is. vii, 2; Mic. ii, 7; Obad. 17, 18), "seed of Jacob," יִבְנָא יִשְׂרָאֵל (Isa. xiv, 19; Jer. xxxii, 26), "sons of Ja- cob," יִבְנָא יִשְׂרָאֵל (1 Kings xviii, 37; Mal. iii, 6), "con- gregation of Jacob," יִבְנָא יִשְׂרָאֵל (Deut. xxxii, 4), and simply "Jacob," יִשְׂרָאֵל (Num. xxii, 7, 10, 21, 23; xxiv, 5, 17, 19; Deut. xxxii, 9; xxxiii, 10; Ps. xiv, 7, 11; Lv. 5, Is. xxviii, 6; Jer. x, 25; xxxi, 11; Amos vi, 7; vii, 8, 11; xxxv, 7), all put for the house or family of Jacob; whence the expression "in Jacob," יִבְנָא יִשְׂרָאֵל (Gen. xliv, 7; Lam. ii, 3), i.e. among the Jewish people. Very generally the name is used for the people as an individual, and with the epithets appropriate to their patriarchal progenitor, e.g. "Jacob, my servant" (Isa. xlv, 1; xlv, 4; xlvii, 20; Jer. xxx, 10; xlv, 27, 28), "Jacob thy (Edom's) brother" (Obad. 10). In like manner with the term Israel, "Jacob" is even spoken of the kingdom of Ephraim, which had arrogated to itself the title proper only to the entire nation (Isa. ix, 7; xvii, 4; Mic. i, 5; Hos. x, 11; xii, 3); and, after the destruction of the northern kingdom, the same expression is employed of the remaining kingdom of Judah (Nah. ii, 3; Obad. 10).

JACOB WELLS (γεννῶν τοῦ Iακωβ), on the curb of which Christ sat down during his interview with the Samaritan woman at Sychar (John, vii. 10-12), at the foot of Mount Gerizim (Arvieux, ii, 66; Schubert, iii, 136). It is bored through the solid rock, and kept covered with a stone by the Arabs (see Hackett's Illustrations, p. 199 sq.). It is thus described by Porter in Murray's Handbook for Syria, ii, 940: "Formerly there was a square hole opening into a carefully built vaulted chamber, about ten feet square, in the floor of which was the true mouth of the well. Now a portion of the vault has fallen and completely covered up the mouth, so that nothing can be seen but a shallow pit, half filled with stones and rubbish." Dr. Wilson (Lands of the Bible, ii, 57) carefully measured the well, and found it nine feet in diameter, and seventy-five feet deep. It was probably much deeper in ancient times, as there are signs of considerable accumulation of stones and rubbish below its present bottom; and Maundrell (March 24) says that in his time it contained thirty-five yards of water, and five feet deep. It contains at times a few feet of water, but at others it is quite dry. Over the well there formerly stood a large church, built in the 4th century, but probably destroyed before the time of the Crusades, as Sseull (p. 45) and Phocas do not mention it. Its remains are just above the well, towards the south-west, merely a shapeless mass of ruins, among which are seen fragments of gray granite columns still retaining their ancient polish (Robinson's Biblical Researches, iii, 132). (For other descriptions, see Hamesveld, ii, 396 sq.) See Simeon.

2. JACOB (Iακωβ) was the name of the father of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary (Matt. i, 15, 15). B.C. ante 40. See Mary.

JACOB OF EDessa (so called after the name of his residence), one of the most celebrated Syrian writers and theologians, flourished in the second half of the 7th century. He was born in the village of Indikib (in Antioch), and in early life entered the monastic order. About the year 651 he was appointed bishop of Edessa; but his zeal for the cause of the Church often led him astray, and he made many enemies among the clergy, and finally resigned the episcopal dignity, retiring to a life of seclusion in a monastery near Tarsus. He began an extended study of the Syriac Version of the Old Testament, and made many valuable corrections and annotations, of which parts still remain to us (compare Sylvester de Saey, in Eichhorn's Biblioth. bibl. Litter. viii, 571 sq.; Notices et extraits des MSS, ii, 648 sq.; Eichhorn, Bibl. bibl. Litter. ii, 370; the same in d. A. T. ii, § 360 sq.). After the decease of his successor at Edessa he was invited to resume the duties of the bishopric, but he died while on his journey, June 5, 708. Jacob of Edessa was a zealous advocate of Monophysitism, and he is greatly revered by the Jacobites (q.v.), while he is highly esteemed also by the Monorites. He was distinguished for his thorough knowledge of the Syriac, Hebrew, and Greek, and translated a number of Greek works into Syriac, a task which he so ably discharged that he was honored with the surname of "interpreter of the books" (in the Syriac, Ṣeγὶ ܕܥܕ ܢܐ, ܩܕܕ ܦܠ). He wrote commentaries and scholia on the O. T. and N. T., and his works are contained in the Latin edition of Epanom (comp. Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. i, 476 sq.). See Herogn, Real-Encyclopädie, vi, 379 sq.; Holle Encyclopädie, 2d. lexi. xiii, 165-167. (J. H. W.)

JACOB OF HUNGARY, surnamed the Master, a fanatic and adventurer, and the chief of the Pastoureux or Shepherds, is supposed to have been a native of Hungary, though nothing definite is known as to his origin. In his youth he joined the Cistercian order, but is said to have forsaken it and embarked for a life of constant travel. He, however, is a matter of doubt, some even reversing the order of his conversion from one faith to the other. He was also represented as having learned the occult arts from the Moors of Spain, and also as having been a traitor to France. At any rate, we find him at Easter, A.D. 1251, heading a popular movement in favor of his being elected the next emperor, and then a prisoner at Cassarea. The king, apparently forsaken by the nobility and clergy, was the idol of the people. Jacob travelled through the provinces, preaching a crusade in which none but the poor and lowly should take part, God having forsaken the populous and the great on account of their pride, and the clergy on account of their licentiousness. He claimed to have visions, to have received a direct message from the Virgin, etc. "He was an aged man," says Milman, "with a long beard, and pale, emaciated face; he spoke Latin, French, and German in the same fluid persuasive- ness; he preached without authority of pope or prelate." The eloquence of the Master of Hungary stirred the lowest depths of society. The shepherds, the peasants, left their flocks, their stalls, their fields, their ploughs; in vain friends, parents, wives remonstrated; they took no thought of wealth or choice of life. So, as one of them, "as the leadstone draws the iron," he soon had a large number of followers, who received the name of Pastoreus or Pastoureaux, from the fact that the first and the most of his followers were shepherds or peasants. Both the magistrates and queen Blanche, thinking they might become adventures in securing an liberation of the king, encouraged them for a time. Soon, however, their ranks were swelled by a number of vagrants, thieves, highwaymen, and all the scum of the population, attracted by the prospect of spoils. They had started from Flanders in the direction of Paris, and when they reached Amiens they numbered 30,000. These recruits wore daggers, swords, battle-axes, and all the implements of warfare. Received and entertained by the citizens of Amiens, they gained new adherents, and their number swelled to 60,000, and on their arrival at the gates of Paris they were the same formidable body of 100,000 armed men. Siamonsi says: "Their hatred of the priests was as great as their hatred of the infidels. They had preachers who never had been ordained; their teachings were far from orthodox, and they assumed the right of setting aside ecclesiastical discipline; they granted divorces and permitted marriages with the priests denounced as contrary to the canons." They were especially bitter against the monastic orders, and a number of monks were murdered by them. The authorities began to regret having encouraged them; yet they were allowed to enter Paris, and Jacob went so far as to officiate publicly in the church of St. Eustache. Several murders marked their stay in the capital. Finding his forces considerably increased, Jacob divided them into several bands, under pretense of embarking them at different points for the Holy Land. One of these bands went to Orleans, where they massacred all the priests and monks that they could find, then went to Bourges, where the priests carefully keeping out of the way, they attacked the Jews, demolishing their synagogues and plundering their houses. Effective measures were at last taken to put a stop to these excesses. They were excommunicated by the Church, and the authorities invited the people to arm against and war on them. Jacob was still in the capital. One day, by order of the queen, an executioner mingled with the crowd who surrounded him, and, while he was preaching, cut off his head with a single blow of the axe. At the same time, a number of knights chased the followers, who were dispersed. The other bands met with the same fate, and an end was put at the same time to the depredations and to the sect. See Matthew Paris, Hist. Angliae; Guillaume de Naguis, Chron. in Spicili.

From this account of Jüterbog (or Jacobus Cisterciensis, etc.) we learn that he was born at Jüterbog about 1385. When yet quite young he entered the Cistercian monastery De Paraduio, situated in Poland, and afterwards went to Cracow to procure the doctorate. Distinguished for scholarship and piety, he soon became the acknowledged leader among his fellow monks, and was finally elected abbot of the monastery. Some time after he removed to Prague, but, growing dissatisfied with the many fulminations of men who professed to have quitted the world to seek an alliance with God, but who, in truth, had only entered the monastic order because it was the road to distinction, he advocated a reform of the Church, and at a time fostered the thought of forsaking the monastic life altogether. He changed to the Carthusian order, removed to one of their monasteries at Erfurt, was here also greatly beloved for his superior abilities, and became prior of the monastery. He died in 1645. Jacob of Jüterbog was also regarded as an authority of the mystics of the 14th century, and virtually a forerunner of the Reformation—one of the Johannes preparing the way for Luther. Characteristic of his efforts for a reformatory movement are his Sermones notables et formales de tempestr et de sanctis:—Libelli tres de arte curandi evita (in Joh. Wesseli Opus, Amst. 1617);—Libre de veritate dicendi;—Tract. de causis multarum passionum (in Peczeli Biblioth., ascet. vii);—De indulgentiis;—De neglecienda Prelaturum (in Walch, Monum., med. or., ii, Fasc. 1);—De septem ecclesiis statutaribus opusculum (Walch, Fasc. 2).

Especially in the last work he declares that a reform of the Church could only be effected by subj ecting the whole clergy, from the pope downward, to a thorough change. He vehemently opposed the absolute power of the papal chair, the right of the pope to control the councils, and naturally enough denied the infallibility of the so-called "vicar of Christ." See Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, i, 298, 299; Trithemii Catal. illustr., vironum, i; Herzog, Real-Encykl., vi, 380, 381; Bibliotheca Sacra, i, 484 sq.

Jacob of Lontos, a Jewish Rabbi who flourished in England at the opening of the 14th century, was appointed by king John, at the commencement of his reign, when yet friendly to the Jews, and uninfluenced by the disquisitions of the fanatical prelate Stephen Langton, as chief Rabbi of England ("prosbyteryus omnium jurisdictionis totius Angliciae"). Jacob was a man of great learning; especially conversant with Jewish tradition, and held in high esteem by Jews and Gentiles. Even the king hesitated not to call him his dear friend ("dilectus et familiaris noster"). Unfortunately, we have no knowledge of any of his literary productions, which, by a man of his abilities, must have been valuable, especially as an index to the history of the Jews in England under king John. See Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 16. (J. H. W.)

Jacob of Missa (Jacobi de Missa, also called, on account of his small stature, Jacobellus, i. e. Jacob the Short), one of the most prominent figures in the polemical controversy inaugurated by Huss, was born about the second half of the 14th century, at Missa, in Bohemia. He was educated at the University of Prague, and then became priest at Trina, and ultimately at Prague, in the jurisdiction of the Breslavienses. He was led to inquire into the antiquity of the Roman Catholic mode of administering the sacrament, and, after a careful study of the writings of the early Church, became convinced that the Roman Church had no right or authority to deprive the laity of the cup, and by his tongue and by his pen he became a vociferous and uncompromising opponent of the malpractice, himself also deviating from the usage, and administering the cup to the laity. Excommunicated by the archbishop of Prague, he challenged the university authorities to refute his arguments, and further defended his course by his pen: Venaticus u. Replieatio contra Andreas Brodumor. The apologetic work which he thus so successfully received from the pseudonym of Theodorus, was neither serious to the Council of Constance, just then in session, and every effort was made to refute Jacob of Missa. But soon Huss also came forward, and declared that the early fathers had been taught by the disciples that Christ desired both the wine and the bread to be given to the laity, and when arranged as a heretic before the bar of the council, he still continued to reiterate his former statements (compare Hist. et Monum. J. Huys atque Hieron. Prognosis, Novinum, 1715, i, 52 sq.; V. d. Hardt, Magnum acceunenium Constantii Concilium, etc., iv, 291). Jacob of Missa, thus encouraged by the attitude of Huss, a classmate of his at the university, more vigorously than ever defended his position, and sought further to prove the accuracy of his statements in Demutratio per testimonia Scripturarum patrum atque doctorum communicationem calices in pcele Christianae esse necessarium. (in V. d. Hardt, Magnum, iii, 804 sq.). Of course his opponents could not long continue in silence, and they naturally, though awkwardly enough, endeavored to refute him by proofs from the Bible and the Church fathers. Perhaps the most able, i. e. the most ridiculous of all, and the most vehement of the opposition documents, was the anonymous Epistola de altitudine (in V. d. Hardt). There were even some who attempted to prove that the deprivation of the cup had its sanction in the Old-Testament Scriptures! Thereupon the council convened at Constance (the 13th session, June 15, 1415) again condemned the course of Jacob of Missa, although it virtually admitted that he had claimed for himself (see Giesler, Kirchen Gesch. II., ii, 227 sq., in the 4th ed.);

Jacob again defended his course by an Apologia pro communione pibla, which was replied to by the celebrated Gerson in his Conc. publ. concens. J. de Missa et Bohemorum quaestionis, doctet sub nom. monasterum uberos discutientiem. Notwithstanding the frequent denunciations of his course, he continued to hold his parish, and even took up his pen in behalf of many other peculiar doctrines of the Romanists. Thus he opposed the Waldensians on the doctrine of purgatory (in V. d. Hardt, De purgatorio animarum. On their comments (in Walch, Monum. med. or., i, fasc. iii, p. 1 sq.) he also wrote De juramento, de antichristo, and prepared a translation of the works of Wycliffe. He died at Prague, Aug. 9, 1425. The result of the controversy on the cup resulted, as is well known, in a triumph for the Unionists. See Missa, De Missa, etc., primo Exorcistici. Caelica per eccles. Jacob of Nabis (often surmised Jacob the Great), the instructor of Euphrasie the Syrian, and a relative of Gregory the illuminator, flourished as bishop of Nabis (Zoba) in the first half of the 4th century. The little that is known of him makes it out to have been a man "distinguished for ascetic holiness and for miraculous works," clothed in rough garments, like many of the early characters, in such a mythic dress that the character is often placed in a most ridiculous light (comp. Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 193). In his early life he "spent many years as a hermit in forests and caves, and lived like a wild beast on roots and leaves," clothed in a rough garment, and named the third pillar of the world (comp. Schaff, Chronicle, ii, 399).
He died about 338. As a writer, Jacob of Nisibis hardly gained distinction; his authorship is even questioned by many. A number of works are attributed to him, but under his name are preserved only an Armenian translation of a letter to the bishops of Seleucia and Edessa (which may have been preserved by direction of Assemani for the Vatican (Bibl. Ori. i, 557 sq., 632). An edition, with a Latin translation and notes, was prepared and published by cardinal Antonelli (1756, folio; Venice, 1765; Const. 1824). See, besides Schaff and Stanley, Neumann, Gesch. d. Armen. Lit., p. 18 sq.; Dietrich, Uebers. av. Jacob. der Nisib. Hezorh, Real-Encyklopädie, vi., 396. (J. H. W.)

Jacob of Sarco, a celebrated writer and teacher of the Syrian Church, was born at Curtanum, on the Euphrates, in 452. He was made a presbyter in 505, and attained the distinction of bishop in 519. He was honored by the surname of “doctor” (Syri. Mal-pânu), and by that of “the universal” (Syri. Tābêko). He was the author of an innumerable number of works. Thus not less than 768 homilies in verse are attributed to him (of which Barhebræus had 182), besides expositions, an anaphora, a form of baptism, hymns, and letters. But evidently many works are falsely attributed to him, as Assemani (Bibl. Orient. ii, 532) has proved. Many of his writings are still used in the Syrian churches at public worship, and have also been translated into Arabic. Several of his hymns are contained in the Brev. ferdle Syr. and in the Offic. Dom. (Rome, 1578), a poetic eulogy which he pronounced on Simeon the Stylist which has been translated into German by Dr. Leberecht in (his Leben und Werken des heil. Simeon Syntichus, Innsbruck, 1855, 8vo, p. 279-298). See Eberlidge, Syr. Churches (Lond. 1816, 12mo), p. 241 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vi., 397.

Jacob of Vitry (Jacobi de Vitricio, or Jacobus Vitrivacu), so named after his native place, was born in the second half of the 12th century. He was a presbyter in the see of Moissac, or, as some say, in Paris, when, attracted by the celebrated sanctity of Maria of Oignes, he removed to her place of residence, the diocese of Liege. She received him kindly, and influenced him to take a position in the diocese. At the request of the pope he began preaching against the Albigenses, and finally devoted himself to that service, and was made bishop of Liége in 1186. He died at Jerusalem, travelling through France to levy contributions. While thus engaged he was elected bishop of Acre, and at the request of pope Honorius III went to the Holy Land. He there performed a noble work; among other things, he provided for the children of the Saracens whom the Christians had taken, baptized them, and intrusted them to the care of pious Christian women. After the retirement of the Christians from Damietta, he resided in 1225 the episcopal office, and returned to Oignes. In 1229 pope Gregory IX appointed his bishop of France, De Saint, and the Holy Land. He died at Rome May 1, 1240. The writings of Jacob de Vitry are valuable. He profited greatly by his stay in the Holy Land, gathering much of the material necessary for the preparation of his principal work, the Historia Orientalis, generally entitled History of Jerusalem, pretended to be the text (1597), also by Martine and Durand. Theor. nov. Aedoeotorum, l. iii (Par. 1717). This work of Jacob de Vitry is divided into three parts. The first contains the history (this as well as the others are made by Eusebius of Jerusalem, in the second, a short review of the text of the Western church, with a particular attention to the history of the different Church orders, and the extent and value of pilgrimages; in the third he returns to the East, and, beginning with the General Council of Chalcedon, closes with the surrender of Damietta. This last part of the work does not seem to be the production of Jacob, but, in all probability, was written by some other hand, to add to the completeness of the work, and to enable it to serve as a whole work to Jacob, and defends his view by stating, in commendation of part third, “L’auteur avait vu de ses yeux ce qu’il raconter” (in accordance with the statement in the preface of the work, p. 1048). This work has been translated into French, and inserted in the Collection des historiens des revues médièves, de France, de Belgique, etc., and his letters are also of great importance to the historian: Jacob de Vitrício episcopus mæsæ in Lotharingiam de capiteone Damieata (published by Longin in the first part of the Geeta Dei per Francos, and Epsidem episcopus quattuor ad Honoriam III Popem (in Martene and Duand’s above-mentioned works, and some volumes); a life of the celebrated St. Mary of Oignes; and sermons on the Gospels and Epistles, of which a portion was published at Antwerp in 1575. See Cellier, Hist. des Lettres Sacrées, xiii, 587 sq.; Bibliotheca Belgica, i, 542; Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vii., 398. (J. H. W.)

Jacques De Voragine, archbishop of Genoa, and author of the Legenda aurea, was born at Virlaggio, near Genoa, in 1290. He joined the preaches friars at Genoa in 1244, and became provincial of the order for Lombardy in 1267. For services rendered to the church and to his country, he received different ecclesiastical pensions, and was regularly made archbishop of Genoa in 1292, and died in 1298. His reputation rests exclusively on a compilation of legends which he wrote under the title of Legenda Sancorum, or Legenda aurea (also known as the Historia Longobardorum, on a short Lombard chronicle it contains, attached to the text, the life of pope Belacius). The work consists of a series of fanciful biographies, some compiled from older works, others merely made up of the traditions current among the people and in convents. Many of the elements of these biographies are taken from apocalyptic Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and martyrologies, and are to be found in other ancient and contemporary works, such as the Passional, the legends of Mary, etc. Some of them are inventions of the Middle Ages, and show how quickly fables become mixed up with history: such are the lives of Dominic and of king of France. In the world most famous is the story of the pilgrimage of a thirteenth-century prelate to the Holy Land, informing the end of the saint, in the life of the apostle James. The only original part of the work is the section of the story of the pilgrimage of a thirteenth-century prelate to the Holy Land, informing the end of the saint, on the life of each saint, in which Jacob attempts to give an explanation of the meaning of their names, and these explanations consist in wonderful etymologies and wild speculations, such as could be expected from an ignorant monk unacquainted with either Greek or Hebrew. The work was soon esteemed at its just value. The superior of the order, Berengarius de Landora, subsequently archbishop of Compostella (+1393), commissioned Bernardus Guiliotinus, afterwards bishop of Lodève (+1381), to write a life of the saints from authentic sources. Bernardus, who was a zealous bishop, set to work and published the work in four volumes. This, however, did not meet with much success. The Legenda of Jacob became the Legenda aurea, and gained in popularity not only because it was shorter than the voluminous compilation of Bernardus, but especially on account of its extravagant descriptions and relations of miraculous occurrences, which suited the spirit of the Middle Ages much better than a plain, truthful narration of facts. Many translations of it were made into German, French, Italian, Spanish, and English, and after the discovery of printing many editions of it were published. There were particular attention to the history of the different Church orders, and the extent and value of pilgrimages; in the IV.—A A A the book is very important as an index to the superstitious spirit of the Middle Ages. Among the other works of Jacob de Voragine we may mention Sermones de tempore et quadragesimales (Paris, 1500; Venice, 1589, 2 vols.). — Sermones de dominica per annum (Venice, 1544, 4to, and 1566, fol.). — Sermones de sanctis (Venice, 1562, 2 vols. 4to). — Sermones de temporibus (Lyons, 1505; Venice, 1580). — Mariæ vniue sermes de E. Mariae Virgine (Venice, 1497, 4to; Paris, 1503; Mayen, 1616, 4to). The latest editions of his collected sermons appeared at Augsburg (1760, 4 vols. fol.). All these sermons are mere sketches; those on the saints are full of fables, and can be considered as a sort of supplement to the Legend of the Virgin. The 160 sermons on Mary treat, in alphabetical order, of the virtues, perfection, and miracles of the Virgin. Lenz, in his Gesch. d. Homerik (Brunswick, 1839, 1, 577), gives a German translation of one of them as specimen. Jacob also wrote in defense of the Dominicans, and doubtless against the attacks of St. Amour, a Defender in contra impugnatorem fratres Predicatortu, qui non vivant secundum vitam apostolicae (Venice, 1594). An abridgment which he prepared of the Summa virtutum et virorum of Wm. Perlatus, and his De operibus et opusculis S. Augustini have never been overlooked (Quisquell, and Echard, l, 438). His chronicle of Genoa, down to 1297, has been published by Muratori, Scriptores rerum Italic. il, 1 sq. The assertion, made by Sixtus Senesia (Eribibio, Sacra, lib. iv.), that Jacob wrote an Italian translation of the Bible, appears to be erroneous: no such work has ever been found, nor is there any evidence of any contemporary writer; it is, moreover, highly improbable that the compiler of the Legenda aurea should have considered it desirable or profitable to give the fiction-loving people the Scriptures in the vernacular. See Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vi, 369.

Jacob ben-Abba-Mari ben-Simon (Simon), generally known as Jacob Anatoli (Anatolai), a Greek philosopher, was born in Provence, in the latter half of the 12th century. He was the son-in-law of the celebrated writer Samuel Ibn-Tibbon, and, like him, became an ardent follower of Maimonides. In early life he acquired a thorough knowledge of the Arabic language, and this enabled him to translate many of the philosophical works for the benefit of his Jewish brethren. But, unlike his greater master, he was inclined to rationalism to such a degree that he set about attempting to explain the miracles of the O.T. Scriptures in a natural way. His fame soon spread abroad, and when the emperor Frederick 1 of the last of the Hohenstaufen, looked about for a translator of Aristotle, his eyes fell on Anatoli, and he was invited to Naples, and paid an annuity from the emperor's private purse to perform the arduous task, or, according to some, to assist in the undertaking. He prepared, in conjunction with Michael Scotus, a translation of the Greek philosopher, together with the commentary by the Achaean philosopher Avroroes (Ibn-Roshd), into the Latin (comp. Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 105, note 1; Roger Bacon, Opera, ii, 140; Reu- nian, Avroroes et Averroes, p. 163 sq.). Jacob Anatoli died about 1250. See Scholasticism; Scotus (Michael). (J. H. W.)

Jacob ben-Asher ben-Jechiel ben-Uli ben-Eliahu ben-David, also called Baal Ha-Turim, after his celebrated Talmudic work, was born in Germany about A.D. 1290. At the age of eighteen he was an eye-witness of the fearful massacres of his Jewish brethren, which began in Bavaria April 20, 1298, under the leadership of Rindlehirsch, and soon spread over France and Spain. The Jews of Toledeo, and by which more than 100,000 persons were slaughtered in less than six months. The in- currenc of the lives of Jews led him to emigrate in 1303. For more than two years he and his family moved from town to town, until they found a resting-place at Toledo, in Spain. Though in very straitened pecuniary circumstances, he began at once literary labors, and as the reter life he embraced Christianity. He died about the middle of the 16th century. See Kitto, Journ. Soc. Lit. 1868, p. 621; Rake Cyclop. i. 458; Rosa, Histor. storico Jacob ben-Eleazar, a Jewish grammarian, flourished at Toledo in the first half of the 12th century.

He distinguished himself by a work entitled סֶפֶכֶר (the book of completion), which investigates the nature of the vowel-points of Hebrew, and also the etymology of proper Hebrew names; it was freely used by Kippels, and the most esteemed of all Arabic writers. Jacob ben-Eleazar was a sound grammarian, laid down some excellent rules respecting the Hebrew syntax, and materially aided the development of philology in Spain at a time when Biblical exegesis was much neglected and the study of the Talmud was paramount (Dr. Ginsburg, in Kitto, s. v.). He was also active in the correction of the Hebrew text of the O. Test., and for this purpose relied on the celebrated Codex Hillali or He-Hali, one of the most ancient and celebrated Hebrew codices. It was written, according to some, at Hilla, a town built near the ruins of the ancient Babel, and hence the title by which the Masorah is designated; others, however, held that it was the production of Rabbi Moses ben-Hillel. It bears date from the beginning of the 7th century, according to Sakkuto, who in his day (circa 1500) saw a portion of the Codex, and pronounced it to be 900 years old, and cites Kimchi (Jachasen, ed.
Filipowski, Lond. 1857, p. 220) as saying in his grammar on Numb. xv. 4, that the Pentateuch of this Codex was in his day extant at Toledo. The probability is that a greater portion of it, if not the whole, was destroyed at Leon, in Spain, where it was last deposited, during the persecution of the Jews and the destruction of all Jewish writings in 1197. Jacob ben-Eleazar's correction of the text of the O. T. Scriptures by the aid of this celebrated Codex makes it, therefore, doubly valuable for all critical students of the Hebrew text. See Bensenthal

Jacob ben-Shehbat Gerundi, a celebrated Cabalist who flourished about the middle of the 13th century, deserves our notice because of his efforts to counteract the influence which some of the better educated and more liberal-minded Jewish Rabbis of the 13th and 14th centuries exerted in behalf of the introduction of a philosophical mode of interpretation insuagurated by the renowned Maimonides. Many others of his conservative brethren, he confronted the liberals with harsh terms and low and vulgar epithets, and thereby only strengthened the cause of his adversaries. Thus he called the Maimonists "heretics and transgressors of the law," and asserted that "they seek only the furtherance of the temporal good, of the earthly life, the defence of life and property, but deny all future rewards and punishments," etc. These gross misrepresentations are contained in a work which he published in defence of the cabalistic mode of interpretation. See Grätz, Geschichte der Juden, vii, 85; note 3, p. 442-459. See CABALA; MAIMONIDES. (J. H.

Jacob Berab, a Jewish Rabbi, born A.D. 1474 at Maqueda, near Toledo, Spain, was obigated by persecution to leave his native land when only eighteen years old. After many years of travel through Egypt to Jerusalem, and thence to Damascus, he at last found a nesting-place in Safat (about 1584). Possessing a large fortune and great thirst for honor, he sought distinction among his Palestinian brethren. Honored by the Rabbi of his own immediate vicinity, he succeeded in re-establishing (1588) the Sanhedrin in the Holy Land, which, no doubt, he intended to serve as the starting-point for the re-establishment of the Jewish kingdom. Unfortunately, however, for the Jewish cause, there was no authority at Jerusalem, where he resided;
and when Berab sought a reconciliation with the chief Rabbi, Levi ben-Chabib, by appointing him next in authority, the consummation of the project failed, to the great detriment of Judaism all over the world. A controversy between the two parties ensued, which ended with the death of Rabbi Levi ben-Chabib, and Jacob Berab destroyed the hope of a re-establishment of ordination and of a Jewish state. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, ix, ch. ix and x; Jost, Geschichte d. Judentums, iii, 128 sq.

Jacob Emden Ashkenasi (shortened Jabez), a Jewish Rabbi of great distinction among the Hebrews of the last century, was born at Amsterdam in 1696. He was the son of Chacham Zewi, another Rabbi of the celebrated Zewi family. Being banished from their homes, his father's family sought a refuge first in Poland, later in Moravia. Possessing of a considerable fortune, Jacob devoted most of his time to the study of the Jewish Scriptures, and to the exclusive study of the various Talmudic studies, which he considered likely to be derogatory to his firm belief in the authenticity of Rabbinical writings. Even the position of Rabbi, which was frequently offered him, he hesitated to accept, lest it should in the least interfere with his studies. But, once persuaded and accepted the sacred duties of a Rabbi, he never after always called Jacob Emden, although in the official papers of the Danish government he is called Herschel.
He soon returned to private life, and became a resident at Altona (about 1730), near Hamburg. But, if Jacob did not retain an official position in the synagogue, he certainly continued to work actively for the good of Israel; and as, by his zeal for the cause of the Jewish religion, he often censured, both by pen and tongue, those who departed from the old and wonted way, he thus made it possible for his adversaries, of whom, like his father, he had not a few, to stigmatize him as the "grand inquisition," etc. If Jacob Emden ever desired to be considered for improper conduct, it is for his relation towards Rabbi Eibeschitz, who was his competitor for the rabbship of the Altona, Hamburg, and Wandsbeck congregations, which Jacob did not care to fill, but which he would gladly have had the honor to decline. (Compare Grätz, v. 397 sq.) Emden was especially severe against all the Cabalists, and many were the books that he issued to contradict their teachings. He even denied the authorship of some of the cabalistic writings; thus he pronounced the book Zohar to be a spurious production of his own century, etc. He placed himself in a very ridiculous light by a judgment which he gave on Jewish traditional law, upon which the advice of Moses Mendessohn had also been obtained, and in which, differing from this great man, he addressed him more like a teacher than a pupil. Jacob Emden directed the issue of this pamphlet against his firmly opposed colleague, Samuel Dubno. His writings, according to his own statement, cover no less than 64 different works. The most important of them are his contributions to the history of the fanatics of the last century, known as the followers of Sabbatai Zewi (q. v.). They are, רדניב, ידרו דוויה לזרוו, taken from the celebrated polemical work by Jacob

Jacob, Henry, an English Nonconformist, was born in the county of Kent in the second half of the 17th century. He was educated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. He had secured the living of Cheriton, a place in his native county, but appearing before the public in print as an advocate of a reform of the English Church ("Reasons proving the Necessity of Reforming our Churches in English and Anglian," 1604), was deprived of his parish and even obliged to flee the country. After residing some time in Holland he returned to England, and founded the first Independent (Congregational) church in that country. See INDEPENDENTS. In 1624 he emigrated to New England, and here he died after his arrival. Henry Jacob was an extensive writer, but his writings are almost without exception of a polemical nature, and at present very scarce. The most important are, a reply to bishop Wilson's Sermons on Redemption (preached in 1597, pubd. 1598, 8vo), entitled Treatise on the Sufferings and Victory of Christ (Lond. 1606, 8vo), and Defence of the same (1606, 4to). Jacob, Stephen, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Argyle, N.Y., Feb. 28, 1789; was converted in Feb. 1810; entered the itineracy in June, 1812; was supernumerary in 1818; and died April 24, 1919. He was a zealous, acceptable, and useful preacher, and devotedly pious. —Minutes of Conferences, i, 327.

Jacobi, Friedrich Heinrich, one of Germany's most eminent philosophers, was born at Düsseldorf January 25, 1743. His father was a wealthy merchant, and, anxious to be assisted by his son, sent him to the University of Heidelberg. When only sixteen years old, Jacobi was sent to Frankfurt on the Main to learn the business. But he daily evinced fondness for a literary profession, and a short time after, having removed to Geneva, he was further invited to study by associates, some of whom was the great mathematician Le Sage. The death of his father obliged him to return to Düsseldorf, to look after the business interests of the family. He, however, at the same time, continued his studies, which were now becoming multifarious, not to say contradictory, and, according to one of his biographers, "presented the strange appearance of a philosophical composite, including in his single personality the quadripartite variety of an enlightened 18th century man, a mystic, an atheist, and a theist." Appointed a member of the Exchequer, he had much more leisure afforded him than while at the head of his father's business, and he now not only gave himself up to study, but also to authorship, to which he had been encouraged by his literary associates, among whom figured some of Germany's most noted names. His first productions were a collection of letters by an imaginary philosopher, Abélard, and the publication of his "Essay on the Birth of the New Religion" (1777, and often), which, like some of the productions of his friend and present associate Götze, incorporated the philosophical opinions of the writer. Brought more prominently to the notice of the government, he was honored with a financial position in the state's service, and he removed to Munich. But his unmitigating exposure of the imprudent and injurious tendency of the Bavarian system of finance made him many enemies, and he retired to his estate at Pempelfort, near Düsseldorf, where his hospitable nature soon gathered about him "celebrated guests from all quarters of the cultivated world," and it was only natural that he should now continue his literary productions. Among other literary works he published for the advancement of New Church controversies with Mendelssohn (in Briefe über die Lehre von Spinoza (Bresl. 1785, and often) on the doctrines that had been advocated by the pansophist Spinoza, whose philosophy had at this time been almost forgotten. This he further and more ably prosecuted in Wider Mendelssohn (in Briefe über die Lehre von Spinoza (Bresl. 1786), and Quer Diatribe of German Protestantism, p. 156 sq.). It was this controversy with Mendelssohn, which had originated with the discovery by Jacobi that the friend of the former, Lessing, the author of Nathan, was a Spinozist, which Mendelssohn was determined to refute, but which actually laid even the latter open to the charge of advocating pantheistical doctrines, that first brought clearly to light the philosophical opinions of Jacobi, and stamped him as the "philosopher of faith." The points of Jacobi's position are thus stated by Schweikert (History of Philosophy, transl. by Seeley, p. 272): "(1) Spinoza is faithful to the divine; (2) Every religious demonstration leads to fatalism and atheism; (3) In order that we may not fall into these, we must set a limit to demonstrating, and recognize faith as the element of all metaphysical knowledge." Principles like these, advocated by Jacobi, inspired the atheism was, naturally enough aroused universal opposition in the philosophical world. "It was charged upon him that he was an enemy of reason, a preacher of blind faith, a despoiler of science and of philosophy, a fanatic and a papist." To controvert these opinions, he determined to expound his principle in an immeasurable knowledge; he published David Hume über d. Glauben, oder Ideeitumus u. Realismus (Bresl. 1787, 8vo). This brought down upon him the followers of Kant, and shortly after he even estranged the admirers of Fichte by his Sendeschreiben an Fichte (1790). His controversial opponents, however, never failed to acknowledge the great abilities of Jacobi, and the sincerity of his character and opinions. When the troubles arising out of the French Revolution extended to Germany, Jacobi retired to Holstein, whence he removed successively to Wandsbeck, and after the German Wars, hence he was called, in 1804, to Munich, to assist in the formation of the new Academy of Sciences, of which he was, in 1807, appointed president. In 1811 he further involved himself in a controversy with another philosophical school, that of Schelling, by the publication of a work Von d. göttlichen Dingen u. d. Weisheit (Leipzig, 1811). The time of the dispute was waged rather bitterly; but, notwithstanding the unfavorable estimate which Schelling drew, in his reply, of the literary and philosophical merits of Jacobi, the latter continued to maintain a high rank among sincere and honest inquirers after truth; and even if it must be confessed that Jacobi was exclusively occupied with detached speculations, and that he rather prepared than established a system of philosophy, yet it remains undisputed that the profundity and originality of his views have furnished materials of which more systematic minds have not scorned to avail themselves for the construction of their own systems. Jacobi died at Munich March 10, 1819. Besides the philosophical productions already mentioned, he wrote Über d. Untermenschen d. Kréticusmus d. Vernunft u. Verständ zu bringen (Bresl. 1802, 8vo). All his works were published posthumously by the Wolfenbüttel Academy, the University of Leipzig, and at the time of the publication of his philosophical works, 1820, the philosophy of his day, as it had flowed down from Kant to Schelling, in a very peculiar relation. He was incited by each of these systems: he learned from each, and on each of them he exercised his strength. But he was not satisfied by either of them; yet he was most strongly repelled by pantheism, whether the earlier pantheism of Spinoza, whom he highly esteemed as a man, or its later form in Schelling's natural philosophy, ... Jacobi did not despise reason; he rather pleaded for it; but reason was not to him a faculty for the creation, discovery, or production of truth from itself. By reason he could not be without an idea of its act, an act to which, what we perceive, the immost and original sense. He did not regard reason and faith as being in conflict with each other, but as one. Faith inwardly supplies what knowledge cannot gain. Here Jacobi united with Kant in acknowledging the insufficiency of our knowledge to produce a true and irrefragable knowledge of the real; but the vacant place which Kant had therefore left in his system for divine things—Jacobi filled up by the doctrine of faith" (Hurst's Hagenbach, Ch. Hist. 18th and 19th Cent. ii, 283 sq.). The whole philosophy of Jacobi is perhaps best stated thus: "All demonstrative systems are necessarily built on fatalism; he, on the other hand, is irreconcilable with man's consciousness of the freedom of his rational nature. The general system of nature, indeed, and man himself, so far as he is a part of that system, is pure mechanism; but in man there is unquestionably a power which transcends and is superior to sense, or that faculty which is bound up and regulat- ed by the laws of nature. This higher energy is liberty or reason, and consequently sense and reason reveal to man two distinct spheres of his activity—the sensible or visible world, and the invisible or intelligible. The former makes known what we may admit of demonstrative proof than that of sense and reason themselves. Now sense and reason are the supreme and ultimate principles of all intellectual operations, and as such legitimate them, while they themselves do not receive their legitimation from aught else; and the foundations of both are neither formal nor the sphere of demonstration than the existence of sensible and intelligible objects about which they are conversant. But this existing system of things cannot have originally proceeded either from nature or from man's intellect or reason, for both nature and the human mind are finite and conditionate, and there must be something exterior to these worlds which implies the existence of sensible and intelligible objects about which they are conversant. Now as man's liberty consists in his personality or absolute individuality, for this constitutes his proper essence, hence the mechanism of nature is hereby distinguished from man's liberty in virtue of the individual character, therefore that which is superior both to nature and to man must be perfectly and supremely individual; God consequently is one only, and strictly personal. Moreover, as the ground of all subsistence, he is the only being whose existence is not, even the principle of reason, he cannot be irrational. Of the existence of this divine intelligence, however, all direct proof is as impossible as a demonstration of existence simply. Gen- erally, indeed, nothing can be known except upon testi- mony, and whatever rests on testimony is not certainty, but faith, and such a faith or belief, when its object is the existence of a good and supreme being, is religion." It is apparent, then, that Jacobi may appropriately be look- ed upon as an advocate of religion, but by no means can he be admitted to have been a Christian philosopher; for, although he believed in a revelation of God, he was "far from taking sides with the believers of revelation, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word." If it is proper to class the influence of Jacobi's philosophy with that of Fichte and Schelling, as Farrar (Critical History of Free Thought, p. 238) does, it is well at least to concede that these philosophical systems all together certain- "for being the学 of religion, without any reference at all to the beginning of the 18th century, and were tend- ing to redeem alike German literature and theology." Their first effect was to produce examination of the primary principles of belief, and to excite inquiry; and, though it has only re-enforcing the idea of morality, "they ultimately developed a sense of the impossi- bility of the infinite spirit, and developed the sense of dependence, of humility, of unselfishness, of spirituality. They produced, indeed, evil effects in pantheism and ideology, but the results were partial, the good was gen- eral. The problem, What is truth? was through their means remitted to men for reconsideration; the answers are not on the one hand that it is ultimate, but it is that which I can know; from the other, it is that what I can intuitive- ly feel, threw men upon those unalterable and infallible instincts which God has set in the human breast as the everlasting landmarks of truth, the study of which lifts men ultimately out of error." One of the most cele- brated advocates of this view was Schleiermacher (compare Hagenbach, ii, 382 sqq., 399), though, of course, the former only prepared the way for the latter; and, indeed, this "faith philosophy," "with some slight modifications in each case, consequent upon their philosophical system," is the theory not only of Jacobi and, not, as he has supposed, after sel (author of "Limits of Religious Thought"), and probably, also, of the Scotch philosopher Hamilton (compare Cocke, Christianity and Greek Philosophy, p. 70 sq.). Jacobites is the name by which the different com- munities in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia, who hold to the Monophysite doctrine, have been known since their union, about the middle of the 6th century. See EUTYCHIANISM; MONOPHYSITES. The most prominent party in occupying the union of these Monophys- ites, who, near the middle of the 6th century, was very weak, and threatened with extermination, was Jac- ob (or James) Albarian, or Bardas (or Zanazas), a zealous disciple of Severus, a monk and presbyter of the convent of Phasile, near Nisibis, and it is after this Jac- ob that the united Monophysites were named after their union, and not, as has been supposed, after James, the brother of Christ, or Jacob the patriarch, or after Dioscorus, who was called Jacob before his ordin- ation, It is true, however, that these communities are sometimes designated as the Severians, Dioscorians, Eutychians, and even as the Theodocians (for the Egyptian Monophysites, see THEODOSIUS II; for the Ethiopians, see MENLAM CHURCH; and for the Abyssinian, see ABBYSSIN- IAN CHURCH). The surnames of Jacob who united the Monophysites, however, have no bearing on his relation to the sects, but are strictly personal. Thus the coarse- ness of the title of the patriarch of Antioch was an honor for the benefit of his party (says D'Herbelot, Bibliothéque Orientale, p. 455) gained him the name of Barudri (i. e. a coarse horse-blanket; compare Assemani, ii, 66, 414; Makrizi, Geschichte der Kopten, edited by Wustenfeld; Eutychius, Annales, ed. Pococce, ii, 144, 147). Jacob was made bishop of Edessa in 541, and then, says Dr. Schaff (Ch. History, iii, 775), "this remarkable man de- voted himself for seven and thirty years with unwearied zeal to the interests of the persecuted Monophys- ites. 'Light footed as Aasahel' (2 Sam. ii, 18), and in the garb of a beggar, he journeyed hither and thither and thither, amid the greatest dangers and privations, to the patriarchate of Antioch; ordained bishops, priests, and deacons; organized churches; healed divisions; and thus saved the Monophysite body from impending extinc- tion." He died in 578.

"The Jacobites have always protested against being considered as heretics, a notion of intense horror; but, while they pro- fuse to anathematize that heresiarh, they merely re- ject some minor opinions of his, and hold fast his great distinguishing error of the absorption of the humanity of our Saviour in his divine nature. They think that in the incarnation, from two natures there resulted one. In other words, and believe that this does not possess two natures, but one composed of two, illus- trating their dogma in this way: 'Glass is made of sand; but the whole is only glass, no longer sand: thus the divine nature of Christ has absorbed the human, so that the two have become one." A middle way between Eutychianism and orthodoxy was chosen by Xenayas (q.v.) and his school, who subscribed to the doctrine of "the existence in Christ of one nature, composed of the divinity and humanity, but without conversion, confusion, or commixture." He teaches that the Son, one of the Trinity, united himself with a human body and a rational soul in the womb of the Virgin. His body had no existence before this union. In this he was born, in it he was nourished, in it he suffered and died. Yet the divine nature of the Son did not suffer or die. Nor was his human nature, or his agency, or death, merely visionary, as the Phantasmists taught, but actual and real. Moreover, the divine nature was not changed or transmuted into the human, or mixed or confused therewith; neither was the human nature converted into the divine, nor commixted or confused with it; but an ad\nuation of the two natures took place, of a mode equivalent to that which, by the union of body and soul, makes a human being; for as the soul and body are united in one human nature, so, from the union of the Godhead and manhood of our Lord Jesus Christ, there has arisen a nature peculiar to itself, not simple, but complex; one double nature." Here is evidently maintained a distinction from the Eutychians that the flesh of Christ taken from the Virgin was actual and real, and the divine in the human Christ, without confusion, change, or division; and from the orthodox, in holding that, after the union, the two natures united in one, losing their distinctiveness. This view of Xenayas, says Etheridge (Syrian Churches, p. 143), seems to be at present the doctrine of the Jacobites; but, as the laity is very moderately educated, this remark applies only to the clergy. As an indication that they have only an imperfect idea on this point, Etheridge cites their usage of "making the sign of the cross with only the middle finger of their hand, holding the others so that they are not seen" (v. e.g. therefor the whole subject is to them an unsolved mystery.

Like the Greek Church, the Jacobites, as a rule, deny the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, holding, however, to the orthodox doctrine of the personality and deity.

Staement#s. It is generally believed that the Jacobites with the Roman Catholics, hold to the septenary number on the sacraments, but Etheridge says (p. 144) that "this must be taken in a qualified sense, as they have no distinct service of confirmation, nor do they use extreme unction, unless it be sometimes imparted to members of the priesthood. Official communion, too, is scarcely known among them, and in the Eucharist, while they profess to recognize the real presence, it must not be understood in the Papite sense of transubstantiation, but the presence of the Saviour which accompanies, in an undecorated manner, the elements of the bread and wine: a species of consubstantiation, illustrated by Bar Salib (in Matt. xxviii, Cod. Syr. Clement. Vat. 16, fol. 29) under the idea of iron in union with fire, and receiving from it the properties of light and heat, while its own nature remains unaltered" (comp. Bar-Helemeus, Memorah Kadali, or the "Lamp of the Saints," fundam. vi, sect. 2). At the celebration of the Eucharist they administer newly-made unleavened bread (Rödiger, however, in Herzog, Real-Ency\n2lopädie, vi, 400, asserts that they use leavened bread), commingled with salt and oil, and of both kinds, but generally dipping, like the Nestorians, the cake into the wine. The bishop and deacons dip it out of baptismal fonts, and then, as I have been told, very improbably, to have performed by imprinting on the subject (of course infante), with a burning iron, the figure of the cross, on some part of the body, generally the arm, sometimes even the face.

The doctrine of purgatory they wholly ignore, though it is termed among them the "clergy. The native form of this quote is:"

Descent. Their origin they attempt to trace linearly from the first Hebrew Christians. Dr. Wolf (Journal, 1889) says, "They call themselves the Bnay Israel (the children of Israel), whose ancestors were converted by the apostle James," and maintains that "there can be least doubt that their claim to being the descendants of the Jewish Christians of old is just. Their physiognomy, mode of worship, their attachment to the Mosaic law, their liturgy, their tradition, so similar to the Jewish, the technical terms in their theology, all prove that they are real descendants of the Abrahamic stock. They certainly followed the Jews at one time in subjecting their male members to circumcision (comp. Sah\n2liac, Itinerancy, viii, 1). One thing is peculiarly characteristic of the Jacobites: they practise the adoration of the saints, and particularly worship the mother of Christ. As teachers and saints, they revere some of the most prominent actors in the Church History of the early centuries, particularly Jacob of Sarug, Jacob of Edessa, Dioscorus, Severus, P. Fullo, and Jacob Bar\ndeous; but Eutyches they ignore. (Compare Assemani, Bibli. Orient. ii, diss. de Monophys. 8 & 10; Rese\ndot, Hist. Patr., Aec. p. 133 sq.; id. Lycipr. ii, 108.)

The Jacobites also impose upon themselves excessive fasts: "five annual lents, during which both the clergy and the laity abstain not only from flesh or eggs, but even from the taste of wine, of oil, and of fish" (Gibb, Doctrine and Fall of the Eastern Empire, iv, 501, comp. Athenagoras' Description of the Eastern Church).

Their clergy are constituted on the model of a perfect hierarchy. "Extremely tenacious of their ecclesiastical status in this particular, they glory in an apostolical succession from St. Peter as the first bishop of Antioch, and exhibit what they hold to be an unbroken series of more than 180 bishops of that see from his day to our own." This assertion they make in the face of the fact that they only started in the 6th century under Jacob, but they certainly ought to enjoy the same privileges with all other churches that lay claim to a direct apostolic succession (q.v.).

By the side of the patriarch, who holds the highest office in the Church, there is a secondary officer at the head of the Eastern Jacobites, the Maphrian (Syrian, Maph\n3ria, i.e. the fructifier), or Primas Orientalis, whose mission it is to ordain bishops, and also to consecrate the patriarch elect by the laying on of hands. He occupies the clerical degree, the same as the present bishop of Antioch; and the see is called by the present name of Antioch. The see is located at Mosul, and its jurisdiction extends over the Jacobites of the East residing beyond the Tigris and a portion of Mesopotamia; the rest of Mesopotamia, Syria, Phoenicia, Palestine, and Egypt, is under the immediate control of the patriarch of Antioch. (On Ordination, see Etheridge, Syr. Ch. p. 147 sq.) With the diocese of the patriarch there comes in contact the patriarchate of the Copts (q.v.), and of late years both churches have sustained a bishop at Jerusalem.

The Jacobites are distinguished for the number of their convents, from which, as is the custom in all the Eastern churches, the higher officers of the Church are all chosen. These institutions are, perhaps for this reason also, under the supervision of the bishops.

At the time of its greatest prosperity the Jacobite Church produced many men remarkable for the profundity of their views, their teachings, and their writings. No less than 150 archbishops and bishops have been counted in the different ages of the sect, of whom 76 are named. They have a system of books which are said to be of great use, and of which a part has been published by Tullberg (Upsala, 1850); John, bishop of Dara, in the 9th century; Moses Bar-Khîpa († 913), whose treatise on Paradise was translated into Latin by Andr. Massius; Ignatius († 1258); and the 13th century, author of commentaries on the Bible and other theological works (Assemani, ii, 156–211); Jacob, bishop of Tagrit in the 13th century; and especially Gregorius Barbarasius; Bar-Hebraeus, in the 15th century, who was perhaps the greatest and noblest man of the Eastern Church, who was most learned in all the sciences, and Néstorians, by Greeks and Armenians, all of whom forgot the disputes which were agitating at that time the Eastern Church, and gathered at his grave to mingle their tears for the loss of a truly virtuous and great man. The work of Biblical criticism known as Rosarium Kardamata, is also, as shown by the words (Hier. Syn. Rome, 1829, 8vo, p. 206, 212), due to the Jacobite Church.

The present condition of this sect is thus described by the Rev. George Percy Badger (Nestorians and their Ritual, p. 60): "The present hierarchy of the Jacobites in Turkey is that of a patriarch, who claims the title of 'Patriarch of Antioch and successor of St. Peter,' eight metropolitanals, and three bishops. Of these, one resides in Mosul, one in the convent of Mar Mattai, in the same district, one at Urfa, one at Diarbekir, or Kharpit, one at Jerusalem, one at Mar Girius, three in Jesus. All these are called metropolitanals for personal, without any regular dioceses. . . . The bishops generally are illiterate men, but little versed in Scripture, and entirely ignorant of ecclesiastical history. They scarcely ever preach, and their episcopal visitations are confined to occasional ordinations, and to the collection of tithes from their several dioceses. All of them can, of course, read the Syriac of their rituals, but few thoroughly understand it. . . . As might naturally be expected, the lower orders of the Syrian clergy are generally more illiterate than the bishops; and how can it be otherwise? . . . Such being the awkwardness and inefficiency of the clergy, it is not strange that the religious knowledge and vital godliness are at a very low ebb among the Syrian laity. Notwithstanding the comparative influence of this community, I believe that there do not exist among them more than twenty small schools in the whole of Turkey, where their population amounts to something like 100,000 (Etheridge says 150,000). The following is a rough estimate in villages of the proportion of their numbers in the different districts: (1) Jebel Tur, 150 villages; (2) district of Urfa and Gawar, 50 villages; (3) Kharpit, 15 villages; (4) Mar Maris, 7 villages; (5) East Mesopotamia; (6) Damascus, 4 villages, making in all 230 villages now inhabited by Syrians." (Comp. Richard Pococke, Travels in the East, ii, 208; Niebuhr, Reisebeschreib., vol. ii; Buckingham, Trav. in Mesopotamia, i, 321, 341; Robinson, Palestine, iii, 400 sq.)

As early as the 14th century the Roman Catholic Church used her influence to effect a union of the Jacobite and Western churches under the sway of Rome. But, although many accessions have been obtained from the Jacobites, they have not yielded entirely, as did the Copts in the 10th century. The first really important accessions to Rome were those of Rabbula, who, under Andreas Achigian, when the convert, at that time quite numerous, styling themselves "Syrian Catholics," elected him as a rival patriarch. He was followed by Petrus (Ignatius, vol. xxxvii), who did not continue long in his apostolic office, as the opposition was too strong for Rome (Assemani, ii, 482). This, however, by no means discouraged the Papsists, for the undertaking was resumed shortly afterwards; and they have for some time past sustained in Syria a patriarch who resides at Haleb, and they have even "Catholic Jacobite convents."

The inferiority of the Syrian Catholics to the Jacobites has induced the Protestants of England and America to establish missions among them, and they have thus far met with tolerable success. See Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii; Diss. de Monophys., § 1–10; Neale, East., Church of England, iii (see Index); Abudachus, Hist. Jacobitarum (Oxf. 1700); Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Rom. Emp. Jacobs, David, a minister of the Lutheran Church, was born in Franklin County, Pa., Nov. 22, 1805. He was educated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Penn. (class of 1825). While at college he was particularly distinguished as a linguist, and in the absence of the professor of languages was requested to hear the recitations in Latin and Greek. He commenced his theological studies under the direction of the Rev. Dr. B. Kurtz, and completed them in the Theological Seminary at Gettysburg in 1827. The same year he took charge of the classical department established in connection with the seminary, from which Pennsylvania College took its origin. He was very successful as a teacher. No one ever pursued his work more nobly, or with an aim more exalted. He received license to preach the Gospel in 1829, but his health was so delicate that he seldom officiated in the pulpit. He died Nov. 30, 1830, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, at Shearer's, Grinnell, Iowa, and was returning from a trip to the South, whither he had gone in pursuit of health. In talent he was above the ordinary standard, a ripe scholar, and those who were brought in contact with him appreciated his excellent character, and acknowledged his eminent services.

JACOMB, THOMAS, D.D., a pious Nofonostomist divine who took a prominent part in the ecclesiastical affairs of England in the 17th century, was born in Leices tershire in 1682. He studied at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and subsequently became fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. During the Rebellion he obtained the living of St. Martin, Ludgate, but was ejected in 1662, during the Bishops' Visitations, but was reappointed in 1671. He died March 27, 1687. Stoughton (Ecc. Hist. of Engl. [Ch. of the Restoration], i, 165) says that Jacomb, while a member of the Savoy Conference [see INDEPENDENTS], in which he figured very prominently, "is described as a man of superior education, of a staid mind, of temperate passions, moderate in his counsels, and in the management of affairs, not vehement and confident, not imposing and overbearing, but receptive of advice, and yielding to reason." He was one of the continuators of Poole's Annotations. His works, which are now scarce, are, a Defence of the Dedication of Holy Church [London, 1668, 8vo] — Several Sermons on the visit Christo er of the Epistle to the Romans [18 on the 1st, 2d, 8d, and 4th verses] [London, 1672, 4to].—Darling, Cyclop. Biblog. a. s. v.; Stoughton, Eccles. History [Ch. of the Resto JACQUELOT, ISAAC, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Vassy Dec. 16, 1647. He became a minister in 1668, and was colleague of his father, the pastor of Vassy, until obliged to leave in consequence of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He resided first at Heidelberg, then (1666) at La Haye, where he became pastor of a French congregation. In consequence of some trouble he had with Jurieu, Benoit, and others he accepted an offer of the king of Prussia, who had heard him preach, and had learned to esteem Jacquelot, and in 1702 he settled at Berlin as pastor of a French church. He died there Oct. 20, 1708. He wrote Dissertations sur l'Existence de Dieu (La Haye, 1697, 4to; Paris, 1744, 3 vols. 12mo) — Discours sur le Messie (La Haye, 1699, 8vo).—La Conformité de la Foi avec la Raison (Amst. 1705, 8vo).—Réponse aux Entretiens composés par M. Bagle contre la Conformité, etc. (Amsterdam, 1707, 8vo) — Traité de la vérité et de l'Inspirations du Vieux et du Nouveau Testament (Rheims, 1716, 4to).—Cours de Philosophie (Gen. 1759, 2 vols. 12mo); and a number of controversial pamphlets against Benoit, Jurieu, Werenfels, etc. See Hist. des Ouvrages des Savants (Dec. 1708); Vie de Jacquelot (in the Dissert. sur l'Exist. de Dieu, Paris ed., JACQUEMIN 744

JACQUEMIN, James Alexis, a French Roman Catholic priest, was born at Nancy Aug. 4, 1750. He entered a religious life, and was finally made a parish priest of his native city. He met with considerable success in the pulpit, but when, in 1778, he was appointed professor of theology in the University of Nancy, he readily accepted this new position. During the first years of the French Revolution he was one of the editors of the newspaper called Le Catéchisme de Nancy. In 1791, refusing to adhere to the civil constitution of the clergy, he was obliged to leave France, and he settled in Germany, where he joined his bishop, De la Fare, also an exile. The latter having appointed him his vicar-general, Jacquemin returned to France, though exposed to great danger, during the Reign of Terror. He subsequently became professor of philosophy in the College of Nancy. In 1823 he was made bishop of St. Die, but age and infirmities soon compelled him to resign this office, and he retired to Nancy, where he died, June 16, 1832. He wrote De Inscriptiones Verbi Domini; Recueil des mémoires de l'Abbe Bourdaloue, pour servir à l'Histoire du Jacobinisme (Hamburg [Nancy], 1801; Paris, 1817, 2 vols. 12mo). See Henrin, Annaire Biographique (1880-84); Biog. des Hommes vivants; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 219. (J. N. P.)

Jactitation of Marriage is a suit which was formerly brought in the English ecclesiastical courts, and now is competent in the English Divorce Court, to settle a question of disputed marriage. If a party profess or profess that he or she is married to another, the latter may institute the suit, and call upon the former to produce proof of the marriage. If this is not done, a decree passes which enjoins the party to perpetual silence on the subject. This remedy is now scarcely ever resorted to; for, in general, since Lord Hardwicke's Act (1766), there is sufficient certainty in the forms of legal marriage in England to prevent any one being in ignorance whether he or she is really married or not. A suit of this nature, however, is often made against the laws of Scotland. The Scotch suit of a declarator of putting to silence, which is equivalent to jactitation of marriage, is often resorted to, the latest and most notorious instance of its use being that in the Yelverton marriage case.

JAC'BUS (Iaconhoicv v. r. Iânohoicv, Vulg. Accusus), given in the Apostrophe (1 Esdr. ix, 48) as the name of one of the Levites who supported Ezra in reading the law; evidently the ACKUB (q. v.) of the corresponding Heb. text (Neh. viii, 7).

Jad'a (Heb. Yada', 7,77, knowing; Sept. 'Iânoq and Dánâq), the last named of the two sons of Onam, a descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel; his two sons are likewise mentioned (1 Chron. ii, 28, 20). B.C. post 1612.

Jad'a (Heb. Yaddâ', 7,77, probably by erroneous transcription for 7,77, 'Yâdâ', 'Ido', rather than for 7,77, 'Yaddâ', id., as in the margin; Sept. 'Iânoq v. r. 'Aâdâ, Vulg. Jeôdo), one of the "sons of Nebu who divorced their Gentile wives after the Exile (Ezra x, 49). B.C. 459.

JADDAI. See JADDA.

JADDÉS. See JADDA.

JADDÉS, a name of the priests of the genii among the islanders of Ceylon. The pagodas or chapels where they officiate have no revenue, and any pious person who builds a chapel officiates in it himself as priest. The exteriors of these chapels are painted with representations of halberds, swords, arrows, shields, and the like. The natives call these chapels Jâcco, i.e. the devil's tenement, Jâco or Jâcca signifying devil; the islanders of Ceylon, like many other savage tribes, worship the devil because of his wickedness and evil propensities (comp. Lubbock, Origin of Civilization, p. 150 sqq.). The Jâddes, when he celebrates the festival of Jacoo, shaves his head. See Knox, Description of Ceylon, pt. iv, ch. v.; Broughton, Biblioth. Hist. Sac. i, 499; Davy, Account of Ceylon, p. 118. (J. H. W.)

Jad'du'a (Heb. Yad'du'a, 7,77, known; Sept. 'I'ânoq, 'Iânoq, 'Iânoq), the name of two men after the time of the Captivity.

1. One of the chiefs of the people who subscribed the sacred covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (Neh. xii, 21). B.C. cir. 410.

2. The son of Jonathan, and the last high-priest mentioned in the Old Testament (Neh. xii, 11, 22). He is doubtless the person alluded to by Josephus (Iânoq, Ant. xi, 8, 3-6) as exercising the pontifical office at the time of the destruction of Tyre by Alexander the Great (B.C. 332), and as coming forth from Jerusalem at the head of the priestly body to meet the advancing conqueror, and tender him the submission of the city. See ALEXANDER. In this case his name must have been inserted by the great Synagogue after the Scripture canon (q. v.), and been made up by Ezra (B.C. cir. 406). See CHRONICLES. "We gather together certainly that he was priest in the reign of the last Persian king Darius, and that he was still high-priest after the Persian dynasty was overthrown, i.e. in the reign of Alexander the Great. For the expression 'Darius the Persian' (Neh. xii, 22) must have been used after the accession of the Grecian dynasty; and, had another high-priest succeeded, his name would most likely have been mentioned. Thus far, then, the book of Nehemiah bears out the truth of Josephus's history, which makes Jaddu a high-priest when Alexander invaded Judea. But Josephus's story of his interview with Alexander is not, on that account, necessarily true, nor his account of the building of the Temple on Mount Gerizim during Jaddu'a pontificate, at the instigation of Sanballat, both of which, as well as the accompanying circumstances, may have been derived from some apocryphal book of Alexandrian growth, since, lost, in which chronology and history gave way to romance and Jewish vanity. Josephus seems to place the death of Jaddu a after that of Alexander (Ant. xi, 8, 7). Eusebius assigns twenty years to Jaddu'a pontificate." See Hervey, Genealogy of our Lord, p. 52, J. Jarvis, Church of the Restored, p. 291. See HIGH-PRIEST.

Jad'on (Heb. Yadon), 7,77, judge; Sept. has Elôdôw [but most eds. omit], Vulg. Judon), a Meronothite who assisted in reconstructing the walls of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. vii, 7). B.C. 446.

JADON (Iânoq) is the name given to Josephus (Ant. viii, 8, 5) to the man of God from Judah who withstood the altar at Becher—probably intending Indo the seeer. By Jerome (Qu. Hebr. 2 Chron. ix, 29) the name is given as Jaddo.

Jadd'ly (Heb. Yad'll, 7,77, a wild goat or ibex, as in Ps. civ, 18; Job xxxix, 1; Sept. 'Iânoq, Josephus 'Iânoq), the wife of Heber the Kenite, and the slayer of the oppressor of the Israelites (Judg. iv, 17-22). B.C. 1409. Heber was the chief of a nomadic Arab clan who had separated from the rest of his tribe, and had pitched his tent under the oaks, which had in the Bible the name of "oaks of the wandering" (A. V. plain of Zaanaim, Judg. iv, 11), in the neighborhood of Kedelesh-Naphthali. See Heber. The tribe of Heber had maintained the quiet enjoyment of their pastures by adopting a neutral position in a troublous period. Their descent from Jethro secured them the favorable reception of the Israelites, and they were sufficiently important to conclude a formal peace with Jabin, king of Hazor. See KENITE.

In the headlong rout which followed the defeat of the Canaanites by Barak, Sisera, abandoning his chariot and the chariots of his servants, with 900 horsemen, fled unattended, and in an opposite direction from that taken by his army. On reaching the tents of the nomad chief, he remembered that there was peace between his sovereign and the house of Heber, and therefore applied for the hospitality and protection to which he was thus entitled (Harmer, Obs. i, 460). "The tent of Jael" is expressly mentioned either because the hermit was a frequent guest at Heber's (Gen. iii, 22), or because the Kenite himself was absent at the time. In the sacred seclusion of this almost inviolable sanctuary (Pococke, Hist. ii, 5) Sisera might well have felt himself absolutely secure from the incursions of the enemy (Cahen, Progn. vol. xxvi); and although his host, being among the Kenites, he would not have ventured openly to violate all idea of Oriental propriety by entering a woman's apartments (D'Herbort, Bibliothèque Orientale, s. v. Ha-ram) he had not received Jael's express, earnest, and respectful entreaty to do so. See Harms. He accepted the invitation, and she flung the quilt (772p3p7) A. V. "a mantle," evidently some part of the regular furnish- niture of the tent) over him as he lay wearily on the floor. While thirst prevented sleep, and he asked for water, she brought him buttermilk in her choicest vessel, thus ratifying with the semblance of officious zeal the sacred bond of Eastern hospitality. Wine would have been inadmissible to quench his thirsts of Jael possibly have been eschewed by Heber's clan (Jer. xxxvii, 2). Curdled milk, according to the quotations in Harmer, is still a favorite Arab beverage, and that this is the drink intended we infer from Judg. v, 25, as well as from the occasion of the song (Jdg. xxxi). A. V., 5, 4), although there is no reason to suppose with Josephus and the Rabbis (D. Kimchi, Jacob, etc.) that Jael purposely used it because of its sopori- fic qualities (Bochart, Hieros. i, 473). But anxiety still prevented Sisera from composing himself to rest until he had secured his position against the rising sun. She would faithfully preserve the secret of his concealment; till at last, with a feeling of perfect security, the weary and unfortunate general resigned himself to the deep sleep of misery and fatigue. Then it was that Jael took in her left hand one of the great wooden pins (A. V. "nail") which fastened down the cords of the tent, and in her right hand the mallet (A. V. "a hammer") used to drive it into the ground, and, creeping up to her sleeping and confiding guest, with one terrible blow dashed it through Sisera's temples deep into the earth. With one swift, fruitless agony, with one contortion of sudden pain, "at her head he fell; where he bowed, there he fell down dead" (Judg. v, 27). She then waited to meet the pursuing Barak, and led him into her tent, that she might in his presence claim the glory of the deed! See Barak.

Jael, doubtless recognizing the saying of Deborah, that God would set Sisera into the hand of a woman (Judg. iv, 9; Josephus, Ant. v, 5, 4), and hence they have supposed that Jael was actuated by some divine and hidden influence. But the Bible gives no hint of such an inspiration, and it is at least equally probable that Deborah merely intended to intimate the share of the honor which would be assigned by posterity to her own exertions. If, therefore, we eliminate the still more monstrous supposition of the Rabbis that Sisera was slain by Jael because he attempted to offer her violence—the murder will appear in all its ghastliness. A fugitive received dubhil (or protection) at her hands—he was miserable, defeated, weary—he was the ally of her husband—he was her invited and honored guest—he was in the sanctuary of the harem—above all, he was confiding, defenseless, and asleep; yet she broke her pledged faith, and, under the guidance of her vengeance, she fell on the trusted and unprotected slumberer. Surely we require the clearest and most positive statement that Jael was instigated to such a murder by divine suggestion. See Harms. See Hospitality.

The motive is not to understand, on merely human grounds, the object of Jael in this painful transaction. Her motives seem to have been entirely prudential; and on prudential grounds the very circumstance which renders her act the more odious—the peace subsisting between the nomad chief and the king of Hazor—must to her have seemed to make it the more ex- ceptional. She did not consult among the Kenites, her host, and was aware that, as being in alliance with the oppressors of Israel, the camp might expect very rough treatment from the pursuing force, which would be greatly aggravated if Sisera were found sheltered within it. This calamity she sought to avert, and to all her house of Heber in a favorable position with the victorious party. She probably justified the act to herself by the consideration that, as Sisera would certainly be taken and slain, she might as well make a benefit out of his inevitable doom as incur utter ruin in the attempt to prevent him. It is probable that at first the woman was sincere in her professed of Arab friendship; but the quiet sleep of the warrior gave her time to reflect how easily even her arm might rid her kindred people of the oppressor, and she was thus induced to plot against the life of her victim. It does not appear that she committed the falsehood, which she was requested by him to do, of denying the presence of any stranger if asked by a passer-by. See Kitto's Daily Bible Illustrations, ad loc.

It is much easier to explain the conduct of Jael than to account for the apparently eulogistic notice which it receives in the triumphal ode of Deborah and Barak; but the following verse of the same lines will help to remove the difficulty: There is no doubt that Sisera would have been put to death if he had been taken alive by the Israelites. The war-usages of the time warranted such treatment, and there are numerous examples of it. They had, therefore, no regard to her private motives, or to the particular relations between Heber and Jael, but they held her only as the instrument of accomplishing what was usually regarded as the final and crowning act of a great victory. The unusual circumstance that this act was performed by a woman's hand was, according to the notions of the time, so great a humiliation that it could hardly fail to be dwelt upon in contrasting the result with the proud confidence of victory which had at the outset been entertained (Judg. v, 30). Without stopping to ask when and where Deborah claims for herself any infallibility, or whether, in the passionate moment of patriotic triumph, she was likely to hold such passages with so much care to scrutinize the moral bearings of an act which had been so splendid a benefit to herself and her people, we may question whether any moral commendation is directly intended. What Deborah stated was a fact, viz. that the wives of the nomad Arais would unhesitatingly help Barak as a public benefit to herself as a popular heroine. "She certainly was not 'blessed' as a pious and upright person is blessed when performing a deed which embodies the noblest principles, and which goes up as a memorial before God, but merely as one who acted a part that accomplished an important purpose of heaven." In the same sense, though in the opposite direction, Job and Jeremiah cursed the day of their birth; not that they meant to make it the proper subject of blame, but that they wished to mark their deep sense of the evil into which it had ushered them—mark it as the commencement of a life-heritage of sorrow and gloom. In like manner, and with a closer resemblance to the case before us, the psalmist pronounces happy or blessed those who should dash the little ones of Babylon against the stones (Ps. cxxxxvii, 9), which no one who understands the spirit of Hebrew poetry would ever dream of construing into a proper sanction. The burden would be the ruin and destruction of the children, as true heroes of righteousness. It merely announces, under a strong individualizing trait, the coming recompense on Babylon for the cruelties she had inflicted on Israel; her own measure should be meted back to her; she who should be the instrument of effecting it would execute the purpose of God, through the agency of others. ideal exaltation of Jael be viewed in the light of these cognate passages, and it will be found to contain nothing at variance with the verdict which every impartial mind must have been forced to form on her conduct.

It is, in reality, the work of God's judgment, through her instrumentality, that is celebrated, not her mode of carrying it into execution; and it might be as just to regard the heathen Medes and Persians as a truly pious people because they are called God's 'sanctified ones' to do it.

Hence, the passage on Behemoth (Ps. xxxii. 8), as from what is said in Deborah's song, to consider Jael an example of righteousness — See DEBORAH.

As to the morality of the act of Jael for which she is thus applauded, although it can not fairly be justified by the usages of any time or people, yet the considerations urged by Dr. Robinson (Biblical Repert., 1831, p. 897) are of some force: "We must judge of it by the feelings of those among whom the right of avenging the blood of a relative was so strongly rooted that even Moses could not take it away. Jael was an ally by blood of the Israelitish nation; [Sisera, the general of] their chief oppressor, who had mightily oppressed them for the space of twenty years, now lay defenceless before her; and he was, moreover, one of those whom Israel was bound by the command of Jehovah to extirpate. Perhaps, too, she felt called to be the instrument of God in working out the designs of his great deliverance. Thus exterminating the chief of their heathen oppressors. At least Israel viewed it in this light; and, in this view, we can not reproach the heroine with that as a crime which both she and Israel felt to be a deed performed in accordance with the mandate of heaven."

"We must, moreover, not forget the halo with which military success gilds every act in the popular eye, and that, in times of war, many things are held allowed and even commendable which would be repudiated in peace. Dr. Thomson, indeed (Jamiad and Book, ii, 146 sq.), justifies Jael's course by the following considerations: 1. Jabin, although a powerful and cruel king, was not without some kind of conscience. He had, therefore, inflicted much injury upon them in common with their neighbors the Israelites, and may have been probably — probably was — essentially inoffensive to Jael herself.

We are not to assume that Bedouin laws were of strict force among the settled Kenites. 3. Jael must have known her act would be not only a blow against Jabin, but a gleam of revenge upon Kenites, had it not been doubly inflicted much injury upon them in common with their neighbors the Israelites, and may have been probably — probably was — essentially inoffensive to Jael herself.

JAGGER 747  JAHATH

Jagger, Ezra, a Methodist minister, was born at Southampton, Long Island, N.Y., Feb. 27, 1806. He was licensed to preach in 1833, and joined the New York Conference the year following, and successively filled the circuits of Huntington, Oyster Bay, White Plains, Greenburgh, Westport, Weston and Easton Village, Burlington, Derby, Southold and Cutchogue, Farmingdale, Smithtown, and, at last, once again Huntington. He died April 22, 1850. Jagger was a man of strict integrity, great benevolence: mild and unassuming in manner, and yet a leader wherever he went. He was eminently a man of prayer, and devoted to his Master's work.—Smith (W. C.), Sacred Memories (N. Y. 1870, 12mo), p. 206, 207.

Jaggarnaut, or Jaggarnaut Puri, or Puri, is the title of a town on the coasts of Orissa (85° 54' long. and 19° 45' lat.), celebrated as one of the chief places of pilgrimage of the Hindus in India. It contains a temple erected to Vishnu in A.D. 1198, in which stands an idol of this Indian deity, called Jaggarnaut (commonly Jaggarnaut), a corruption of the Sanscrit Jagnyadhara, i.e. lord of the amulet. The idol is a carved block of wood, with a frightful visage, painted black, with a distended mouth of a bloody color. On festival days the throne of the idol is placed upon a stupendous movable tower sixty feet high, resting on wheels, which render the ground deeply as they turn slowly from east to west. Attached to it are six ropes of the length and size of a ship's cable, by which the people draw it along. The priests and attendants are stationed around the throne, on the car, and occasionally address the worshippers in bilabial songs and gestures. Both the walls of the temple and the sides of the car are covered with emblems, in large and durable sculpture. Obscenity and blood are the characteristics of the idol's worship.

The origin of this idolatrous worship (which gained its notoriety especially by the fanaticism which has induced, and at a town, thousands of Hindus to sacrifice their lives, in the hope of attaining eternal bliss, by throwing themselves under the wheels of the chariot bearing the idol) is as follows: “A king desirous of founding a city sent a learned Brahman to pitch upon a proper spot. The Brahman, after a long search, arrived upon the banks of the sea, and there saw a crew diving into the water, and, having washed its body, making obeisance to the sea. Understanding the language of the birds, he learned from the crew that if he remained there a short time he would comprehend the wonders of this land. The king, apprized of this occurrence, built the city on the spot where the crew had landed. It is a large city, and a place of worship. The rajah one night heard in a dream a voice saying, ‘On a certain day cast thine eyes on the sea-shore, when there will arise out of the water a piece of wood fifty-two inches long, and one and a half cubits broad; this is the true form of the deity; take it up, and keep it hidden in thine house seven days; and in whatever shape it shall then appear, place it in the temple, and worship it.’ It happened as the rajah had dreamed, and the image, called by him Jaggarnutha, became the object of worship of all ranks of people, and performed many miracles.” Another legend, however, relates that “the image arising from the water was an avatar, or incarnation of Vishnu; it was fashioned by Viswakaran, the architect of the gods, into a fourfold idol, which represented the supreme deity, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the god Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugurated by Brahm, and the temple itself was erected over it, and inaugu-

This may have given rise to the supposition that the worship of Jaggarnath (as Max Muller [Chipsa, i, 57] spells it) was originally in honor of Vishnu. See Newcomb, Cyclop. of Missions, p. 495: Sterling, Account of Orissa (see Index).

Jagurs are the hermits of the Baniana, a sect in East India. There are three distinct classes of them: (1) the Van-aphrasats, (2) the San-jasis, and (3) the Avadouts. The Van-aphrasats live in forests, many of them married and having children, feeding on the herbs and fruits that grow wild; but they scruple to pluck up the root of anything, considering it a sinful act, as they believe the soul to be contained in the root, supposing everything to possess a spiritual life; and, of course, believing also the transmigration of souls. The Sin-jasis affect greater abstinence, oppose marriage, betel, and all pleasures whatsoever. They have but one daily meal, which must be on the earthen-ware, and live on alms. They generally take their dye with red earth, and always carry a large bamboo cane in their hands. The class is a regular nomad tribe; they do not even stay two nights in the same place. They are taught in their sacred writings to look forward with desire to the separation of the soul from the body. Lust, anger, avarice, pride, revenge, and the love of this world they consider their most formidable enemies, and pray to their gods to deliver them from one and all of these sins.

The last-named class, the Aradouts, forseke their families, both their wives and their offspring, and anything that would make one of them dependent on the other for production. Thus they deny themselves even the use of those things which the other two classes of Jagurs are wont to enjoy. They are habilitated only with a small piece of linen cloth to cover their sex. Their food they procure from strangers, to whose houses they go when hungry, and eat anything that is offered them. These devotees, especially frequent the sacred Hindu rivers and the neighborhood of great temples, both for religious motives and in order to obtain most really alms and food, particularly milk and fruits. They have one Oriental custom, viz. rubbing their body with ashes, no doubt to free themselves from the stain of sin. See Desert, on the Religion, etc., of the Brahmins, p. 105; Frey, Curr. vol. iii; Craufurd, Sketches of the Hindoos, i, 235 sq.; Broughton, Biblioth. Hist. Soc. i, 499. (J. H. W.)

Ja’gor (Heb. Ygor), “place of sojourn; Sept., ‘iyyiyip v. r. ‘A’sip, a city on the south or Idumean border of Judah, mentioned between Eder and Kinah (Josh. xvi, 21). “Its name might perhaps indicate that it was one of the fortified camping-grounds of the border Arabs” (Kitto). “The Ja Gor, quoted by the Babylonian Talmud (Palest, p. 99) from the Talmud as one of the boundaries of the territory of Ashkelon, must have been further to the north-west” (Smith). The position of the town here considered can only be conjectured as not very far from the Dead Sea. It is mentioned among the towns set off to Simeon (Josh. xix, 2-8), though it probably was one of them. It was possibly situated in wady Jurrah, which runs into the south-west end of the Dead Sea.

Jah (Heb. Yah, 1, a contraction for 11, Jehovah, Pae. iv, viii, 4, elsewhere rendered “Lord”). See JUHOVAH: HALELJUAH. It also enters into the composition of many Heb. names, as ADONIJI, ISRAEL, etc.

Ja’hash (Hebrew Yachash, ‘abb, prob. for 11, union; Sept., ‘ub, but ‘ub 1 in Chron. vi, 43, and 1 ly’uch v. r. ‘Iq’ 1 in 1 Chron. xxiv, 22), the name of a descendant of Judah and of several Levites.

1. A son of Shimei and grandson of Gershom, the son of Levi (1 Chron. xxiii, 10); yet no such son is mentioned in ver. 9, where the three sons of Shimei are by some error (probably the transposition of the latter clause) attributed to his brother Laadan, while in verse 11 Jahash is stated to have been “chief” (i.e. most numerous in posterity) of the four sons of Shimei. A similar disagreement appears in the parallel passage (1 Chron. vi), where the name of Gershom (prob. by the transposition of Shimei’s name into the preceding verse), and again (ver. 20) as a son of Libnah (i.e. Laadan), instead of Shimei (comp. Zimnah, the son of Jahash, ver. 20, 42). B.C. considerably post 1556.

2. Son of Reiah (or Haroeh), of the posterity of Hethron, and father of two sons (1 Chron. iv, 2). B.C. post 1612.
3. One of the sons of Shelomoth (or Shelomith), a descendant of Jizhar, of the family of Kohath, appointed to a prominent place in the sacred services by David (1 Chron. xxvi. 28). B.C. 1014.

4. One of the Levitical overseers of the Temple repairs instituted by Josiah; he belonged to the family of Merari (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12). B.C. 623.

Jahaz (Heb. יָחָז, יֹחָז, trodden down, Isa. xv. 4; Jer. xliv. 84; Sept. יֹאָסֹא; also with πι local and in pause, Ἰαχάζ, Yoh' tah, Numb. xxii. 28, Sept. τικ ιαοσα; Deut. ii. 92, Sept. τικ ιαοσα; and this even with a prefixed, יְחָז, יְחָז, Judges xli. 20, Sept. יֹאָסֹא; but likewise with πι paragogic, ὸχάζ, Yoh' tah, Sept. יֹאָסֹא, Josh. xxii. 18; A. V., "Jahazah;" יֹאָסֹא, Jer. xxii. 21, "Jahazah;" יֹאָסֹא, Josh. xxxi. 36; "Jahazah;" Ἰαχάζ, τικ ιαοσα, 2 Chron. vi. 78, "Jahazah"); a town beyond the Jordan, where Sihon was defeated, in the borders of Moab and the region of the Ammonites (Numb. xxii. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judges xx. 20), situated in the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), and assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxxi. 36; 1 Chron. vi. 78).

In Isa. xxiv. 4; Jer. xliv. 21, it appears as one of the Medians, and then ( Jer. v. 28) as one that suffered from the transit of the Babylonian conquerors through the "plain country" (i.e. the Mishor, the moat, Belka). The whole country east of the Dead Sea had originally been given to the Moabites and Ammonites (Gen. xix. 36-38; Deut. ii. 19-22), but the warlike Amorites from the west of the Jordan conquered it, and expelled them from the region north of the river Arnon. From the Amorites the Israelites took this country, but subsequently the Ammonites claimed it as theirs (Judg. vi. 13), and on the decline of Jewish power the Moabites and Ammonites again took possession of it. Hitzig (Zts. Jda. ad loc.) regards Jahaz and Jazah as different places (so Keil on Josh. ad loc., urging that they are distinguished in the passages of Jer.; but this is unnecessary (so Winer, Rufus, s. v. Jahaz), and at variance with the philology. It appears to have been situated on the edge of the desert (see Rumer, Züg d. Izr. p. 58; Hengstenberg, Bibl. Com., p. 530). See EXODUS. From the terms of the narrative in Numb. xxii. and Deut. ii we should expect that Jahaz was in the extreme south part of the territory of Sihon, but yet north of the River Arnon (see Deut. ii. 24, 36; and the words in verse 31, "begin to possess"), and therefore concludes this position as a description of Jazza is mentioned by Schwarz (Palaest. p. 227, "a village to the south-west of Dibhan"); but this lacks confirmation, especially as Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ἰαοσα, Jassa) place it between Medeba (Μεδεβα) and Dibon (Διθηνος, Debrathaim); and the latter states that "Jahaz has its opposite the Dead Sea, at the boundary of the region of Moab." These requirements are met by supposing Jahaz to have been situated in the open tract at the head of wady Waleh, between Arnon on the east, and Jebel Humeh on the west.

Jazzeah (Heb. יַחְצֶאָה, יַחְצָא, beheld by Je- horah; Sept. יָוּסָא, son of Tikvah, apparently a priest, one of those deputed by Ezra to ascertain which of the people of Tekoa were the married Gentile wives after the return from Babylon (Ezra x. 15). B.C. 455.

Jazzeel (Hebrew Yachzziel, יַחְצֶאָל, beheld by God; Sept. יָוּסָא, Yosia, Ιωσια, Αυσία), the name of five priests also from JEZREEL.

1. The third son of Hebron, the grandson of Levi through Kohath (1 Chron. xxiii. 19; xxiv. 33). B.C. probably post 1618, perhaps 1014.

2. One of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4). B.C. 1009.

3. One of the priests who preceded the sacred ark with trumpets on its removal to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xvi. 6). B.C. cir. 1014.

4. The son of Zechariah, a Levite of the family of Asaph, who predicted to Jehoshaphat his triumph over the host of the Moabites with such decided assurance. See ZECHARIAH, 1. He is nowhere mentioned in the Scripture, but his prophecy on this occasion is given in full: "Then upon Jahaziel, the son of Zechariah, the son of Benaiah, the son of Jeiel, the son of Mattaniah, a Levite of the sons of Asaph, came the Spirit of the Lord in the midst of the congregation; and he said, Horns are come to my people Israel, and to Jerusalem, and thou, king Jehoshaphat, thus saith the Lord unto you, Be not afraid nor dismayed by reason of this great multitude; for the battle is not yours, but God's. To-morrow go ye down against them: behold, they come down before the cliff of Ziz; and ye shall find them at the end of the brook, before the wilderness of Jeruel. Ye shall not need to fight in this battle: set yourselves, stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord with you, O Judah and Jerusalem: fear not, nor be dismayed; to-morrow go out against them, for the Lord will be with you" (1 Chron. xx. 14-17). B.C. cir. 936.

5. One of the "sons" of Shechaniah, whose son (Ben-)Jahaziel, but his name is not otherwise given; indeed, there is evidently some confusion in the text: comp. ver. 3 is said to have returned from Babylon with 300 males of his retainers (Ezra viii. 5). B.C. ante 439. See SHECHANIAH.

Jah'dai (Heb. Yahok'dhe, יָהְכּּדֶא, prob. grasper; Sept. Ιαδαϊ, a descendant apparently of Caleb, of the family of Hezron; his sons' names are given, but, as his own parentage is not stated (1 Chron. ii. 47), it can only be conjectured that he was the son of the preceding Gazez, the son (different from the brother) of Haran (ver. 46). B.C. prob. post 1012. Various other suggestions regarding his name have been made, as that Gazez, the name preceding, should be Jahdai (Houbigant, ad loc.); that Jahdai was a concubine of Caleb (Grunenberg, quoted by Michaelis, Ahas, ad loc., etc.); but these are mere groundless suppositions (see Burrington, i. 216; Bertheau, Comment. ad loc.).

Jah'del (Heb. Yachddeel, יָכִדֶאֶל, made joyful by God; Sept. Ιαδηδη, one of the famous chieftains of the tribe of Manasseh, resident in northern Bashan (1 Chron. vi. 24). B.C. apparently 720.

Jah'no (Heb. Yahnō, יָהָנוּ, his union; otherwise for יַחְצָא, united; Sept. Ιακχαι, son of Buz and father of Joshuaiah, of the descendants of Abiahu, resident in Gilead (1 Chron. vi. 14). B.C. between 1093 and 782.

Jah' Nebeli (Heb. Yechnel, יֵהְכִנִל, hoping in God; Sept. Ιακχαελ, the last named of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. xvi. 14; Numb. xxvi. 26). His descendants are called Jachilekites (Heb. Yechnel, יֵהְכִנִל). Sept. Ιακχαελ, Numb. xxvi. 26). B.C. 1856.

Jah'nelel (Numb. xxvi. 26). See JACHIEL.

Jah'mai (Heb. Yahmaw, יָהָמָא, protector; Sept. Ιαμάע, one of the "sons" of Tola, grandson of Issachar (1 Chron. vii. 2). B.C. cir. 1618.

Jahn, Johann, a distinguished German Roman Catholic theologian and Orientalist, who was born at Tassa, in Moravia, Aug. 18, 1790. He studied at the Gymnasium of Znaim, the University of Olmiz, and the Rom. Cath. Theological Seminary of Bruck, entered the Church, and was for some time a priest at Maiz. In 1782 he received the doctorate from Olmiz, and, after having filled with great distinction the position of professor of Oriental languages and Biblical hermeneutics at Bruck, he was, in 1789, called to the University of Vienna as professor of the Oriental languages, dogmatists, and Biblical archaeology. At this high school he labored successfully for seventeen years, amid suspicions and hostilities from the Roman Church, which pains his ingenuous spirit. Some words in the preface of his Einleit. in d. gott. Bücher d. allen Brudes (Vienna, 1768, 1802, 1805, 2 vols. 8vo); the assertion that the books of Job, Jonah, Judith, and Tobit are didactic poems; and that the demoniacs in the N. T. were possessed with dangerous diseases, not with the devil, were made charges against him. In 1792 complaints of his unsoundness were laid before the emperor Francis II by cardinal Magazzini, which resulted in the appointment of a special commission to examine the charges. Although it was decided in his favor, his detractors, being convinced of the novelties in his teaching, took care to make attacks in the future on expressing opinions likely to lead to interpretations contrary to the dogmas of the Church, and even suggested a change of the obnoxious passages (comp. Henke, Archiv f. d. neueste Kirchengesch., i., p. 33; P. J. S. Huth, Versuchs einer Kirchengesch. d. 18. Jahrh., ii, 375, 376). Though he honestly and willingly submitted, his detractors continued their machinations till he was (in 1806) removed from the congenial duties of an office to which he had dedicated his life, and was made, merely, of course, to prevent scandal which might have resulted from a deprivation of all dignity, canon or Domherr in the metropolitan church of St. Stephen. Even before he was compelled to resign his professorship, two of his books, Introductio in libros sacros Veteris Testamenti in compendium redacta (Vienna, 1804), and Archaelogia Biblioth. Occid. et eorum lectionum variatete subjunct (Vienna, 1805, 5 vols.; vol. i. and ii. 2d edition, 1817-1825)—Lexicon Arabico-Latinum, Christochronia Arabica accommodatum (Vienn. 1805)—this work was considered the best of its kind until the publication of a similar production by Sylvester de Sacy. His Biblical Hebrew dialect, and grammatical and critical reflections on several biblical subjects, are very numerous, and he wrote, Biblioth. Archaelogia (Vienna, 1803, 5 vols.; vol. i. and ii. 2d edition, 1817-25)—Lexicon Arabico-Latinum, Christochronia Arabica accommodatum (Vienn. 1805), etc. Some time after his death appeared Nachträge zu Jahn's theol. Werken, published from his MSS. (Tbingen, 1821), which contained six interesting dissertations on various biblical subjects, and with them some letters of Jahn, giving a clue to the motive of the editor's intentions directed against him. Jahn's memory deserves to be cherished by all true lovers of Oriental scholarship. He furnished text-books for the study of those languages superior to any of his time, and, although they are at present obsolete, he certainly aided modern scholarship by furnishing superior tools. As a theological writer he was clear and methodical, and his numerous works, of which several enjoy an English dress, "diffused a knowledge of Biblical subjects in places and circles where the books of Protestants would scarcely have been received. The latter, however, have appreciated his writings—fully as much as Romans and Catholics. He was not profound in any one thing, because he scattered his energies over wide a field; but he was a most useful author, and one of his books (the Archaelogia) is still the largest and best on the subjects of which it treateth. The theologian of the Roman Church is certain exceedingly liberal, so much so that Hengstenberg (on the Pentateuch) rather finds fault with him. See Felder, Gelehr., Lex. d. Kathol. Geleitdeek, 1., 337.; H. Döring, D. gelehrten Theologen Deutschland's, ii, 7 sq.; Meusel, Gelehrte Deutschland's (4th ed.), ii, 510.; x, 3, 904, xiv, 224.; xvi, 235.; xxvi, 19.; Wisch u. Jah'zēel (Heb. Yachzeē, יַחַזְּעֵל, allotted by God; Sept. Ἰαχωζί, the first named of the sons of Naphthali (Gen. xlii., 24). His descendants are called JACTIONides (Heb. Yachzeē'tim, יַחַזְּעֵעַתִּים, Sept. 'Aqonēi, Numb. xxvi., 48). In 1 Chron. vii., 13, the name is written JAHZEL (יַחַזְּלֵא, id., Sept. 'Irāqāi). B. C. 1856.

Jah'zēelite (Numb. xxvi., 48). See JAHZEEL.

Jah'zerah (Heb. Yach'zerah, יַחַצְּרָה, returner; but Gesenius prefers to read יַחַצְּרָה, i.e. JAHASSAH; Sept. Ἰαξάνα, Vulg. Jezara), son of Mehu-lam and father of Adiel, a priest (1 Chron. vii., 12). B.C. long ante 536. He is probably the same with Ahabah, the father of Azareel (Neh. xi., 13), since the preceding and the following name are alike.

Jah'zēel (1 Chron. vii., 13). See JAHZEEL.

Jainas, the name of a very powerful heterodox sect of Hindus particularly religious in the southern and western parts of Hindustan. Their name, Jainas, signifies followers of Jina, the generic name of deified saints; but, as these saints are also called Akrat, the sect is frequently called Akratas. The tenets of this sect are in several respects analogous to those of the Buddhists [see JAINAS], but they resemble in others the sects of the Brahmahinians. Like the Buddhists, they deny the divine origin and authority of the Veda (which, however, they do not hesitate to quote if the doctrines of the latter are conformable to the Jain tenets), and worship certain saints whom they consider superior to the other beings of their pantheon. They differ, indeed, from them in regard to the history of these personages, but the original notion which prevails in this worship is the same. Like the Brahmahinians, on the other hand, they admit the institution of caste, and perform certain ceremonies called Sanakāras (q. v.), and recognise some of the subordinate deities of the Hindu pantheon—at least apparently, as they do not pay especial homage to them, and as they disregard completely all those Brahmahinian rites which involve the destruction of animal life. The Jainas have their own Purânas and other religious books, which in the main confine themselves to a delineation of their Târthakaruñas, or deified teachers of the sect. The Vedas of the Brahmans they supply by their Siddhâantas and Agamas.

Their peculiar doctrines are that "all objects, material or abstract, are arranged under nine categories, called Tattvas (truths or principles), of which we need notice only the ninth and last, called Moksha, or liberation of the vital spirit from the bonds of action, i.e. final emancipation. In reference to it the Jainas not only affirm that there is such a state, but they define the sense of the emancipated state, the place where they live, their tangible qualities, the duration of their existence, the distance at which they are from one another, their parts, natures, and numbers. Final emancipation is only obtained in a state of manhood (not in that of a good demon, or brute), which is possessed of five senses: while possessing a body capable of voluntary motion, in a condition of possibility; while possessing a mind, through the sacrament of the highest asceticism, in that path of rectitude in which there is no retrogression; through the possession of perfect knowledge and vision; and in the practice of the duties of their arts, which in the practice of their duties, as they are divided into religious and lay orders—Yatis and Sravakas. Both, of course, must place implicit belief in the doctrines of their saints; but the Yatis has to lead a life of abstinence, taciturnity, and continence; he should wear a thin cloth over his mouth to prevent insects from flying into it, and he should carry a brush to sweep the place on which he is about to sit, to remove any living creature out of the way of danger; but, in turn, he may dispense with all acts of worship, while the Śrāvaka has to add to the observance of the religious and moral duties the practical worship of the saints, and a profound reverence for his teacher. The seeming ascetic, practice the four virtues—liberality, gentleness, piety, and pance; he must govern his mind, tongue, and acts; abstain at certain seasons from salt, flowers, green fruits, roots, honey, grapes, tobacco; drink water three times a day, and never leave a liquid uncovered, lest some insect should be drowned in it; it is his duty, also, to visit daily a temple where some of the images of the Jaina saints are placed, walk round it three times, make an obeisance to the image, and make some offerings of fruits or flowers, while pronouncing some such formula as Salutation to the Saints, to the Pure Existences, to the Sages, to the Teachers, to all the Devout in the world.' The reader in a Jaina temple is a Yati, but the ministrant priest is not seldom a Brahman, since the Jainas have no priests of their own, and the presence of such Brahmanical ministrants seems to have introduced several innovations in their worship. In Upper India the ritual in use is often intermixed with formulas belonging more properly to the Saiva and Śākta worship (see Hindu Sects under INDIA), and images of Śiva and his consort take their place in Jainas temples. In the south of India they appear, as mentioned before, to observe also the essential rites of Śākta or Śanaśkāra of the Brahmanical Hindu. The festivals of the Jainas are especially those relating to events in the life of their deified saints; but they observe, also, several common to other Hindus, as the spring festival, the Śrīpanchami, and others. "

The sect is divided into two principal factions—the Digambaras and the Śvetāmbaras. The name of the former signifies "sky-clad," or naked, and designated the ascetics who went unclad; but at present they wear colored garments, and dis habilitate only at meal-times. The name of the latter faction means "one who wears white garments." But it is not mainly in dress that these two factions are distinct from each other; there are said to be no less than seven hundred different points upon which they split, 84 of which are considered vital by each party. Thus, e.g. "the Śvetāmbaras decorate the images of their saints with ear-rings, necklaces, armlets, bracelets, rings, crowns, and jewels, while the Digambaras leave their images without ornaments. Again, the Śvetāmbaras assert that there are twelve heavens and sixty-four Indras, whereas the Digambaras maintain that there are sixteen heavens and 100 Indras. In the south of India the Jainas are divided into two castes; in Upper Hindustan, however, they are all of one caste. It is remarkable that amongst themselves they recognise a number of families between which no intermarriage can take place, and that they resemble in this respect also the ancient Brahmanical Hindus, who established similar restrictions in their religious codes.

"As regards the pantheon of the Jaina creed, it is still more fantastic than that of the Brahmanical sects (whereupon he is borrowed to a great extent, but without any of the poetical and philosophical interest which inheres in the gods of the Vedic time. The highest rank amongst their numberless hosts of divine beings—divided by them into four classes, with various sub-divisions—they assign to the deified saints, whom they call Jina, or Arhat, or Tirthakara, besides a variety of other generic names. The Jainas enumerate twenty-four Tirthakaras of their past age, twenty-four of the present, and twenty-four of the age to come; and they invent new names amongst the human attributes of the most extravagant character. Notwithstanding the sameness of these attributes, they distinguish the twenty-four Jinas of the present age from each other in color, stature, and longevity. Two of them are red, two white, two blue, two black; the rest are of a golden hue, or a yellowish-brown. The other two peculiarities are regulated by them with equal precision, and according to a system of decrement, from Rākshaka, the first Jina, who was 500 poles in stature, and lived 8,400,000 great years, down to Māheśvara, the twenty-fourth, who had degenerated to the size of a man, and lived 100 great years, after which a man who has outlived the age of his predecessor, Pārśvadbhāka, not exceeding 100 years. The present worship is almost restricted to the last two Tirthakaras; and, as the statures and years of these personages have a reasonable possibility, H. T. Colebrooke inferred that they alone are to be considered as historical personages. As, moreover, the disciples of Mahāvīra there is one, Indrabhūti, who is called Gautama, and as Gautama is also a name of the founder of the Buddhist faith, the same distinguished scholar concluded that, if the identity between these names could be assumed, it would lead to the further surmise that both these sects are branches of the same stock. But against this view, which would assign to the Jaina religion an antiquity even higher than 543 B.C. (the date which is commonly ascribed to the appearance of Gautama Buddha), several reasons are alleged by the Mahāvīra or 24th teacher, the date, however, of the origin of the Jaina faith, as the same scholar justly observes, it is immersed in the same obscurity which invests all remote history amongst the Hindus. We can only infer from the existing Jaina literature, and from the doctrines it inculcates, that it came later into existence than the Buddhist sect." Ja'yr (Hebrew Žafr, 'ṣāfr, enlightener; Sept. Iasís, Iasip; but in 1 Chron. ii, 22, 25, two copies Iasip; in Esth. ii, 5, Iasip; compare Iasúç, Mark v, 22; Joseph, iii, 14; 1 Kings iv, 18) is the name of three men, also of one other of different form in the Hebrew. 1. The son of Segub, which latter was of the tribe of Manasseh on his mother's side (see ABDON), but of Judah on his father's (1 Chron. ii, 22); but Jar is reckoned as belonging to Manasseh (Numb. xxiii, 41; Deut. iii, 14; 1 Kings iv, 18), probably on account of his exploits and possessions in Gilead, where he appears to have been brought up with his mother (comp. 1 Chron. ii, 21), being perhaps an illegitimate child (see Raumer in Tholuck's Liter. Anz. 1856, p. 11), or, at all events, her son by another husband. But Jos. (Pestel, p. 160), although his paternity is not specifically mentioned, might strictly be claimed as an appointed to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xix, 34). See JUDAH UPON JORDAN. He distinguished himself in an expedition against the kingdom of Bashan, the time of which is disputed, and may probably be referred to the last year of the life of Moses (B.C. 1618), and which seems to have formed part of the operations connected with the conquest of the country east of the Jordan (1 Chron. iii, 23; Numb. xxiii, 41; Deut. iii, 14). He settled in the part of Aroer bordering on Gilead, where we find the small town that is taken (retaken) by him named collectively Havoth-jair (Jos. xiii, 33; 1 Chron. ii, 33; Josh. xiii, 14; Josh. xiii, 30; 1 Kings iv, 18; 1 Chron. ii, 22). See HAVOTH-JAIR. These are variously stated to have been twenty-three (1 Chron. ii, 22), thirty (Judg. xiv, 4), and sixty in number (1 Chron. ii, 23; Josh. xiii, 30; 1 Kings iv, 18, in which last passage they are said to have thirty-two or thirty-six specially assigned to him). The discrepancy may easily be reconciled by the supposition (warranted by Numb. xxxiii, 39, 40) that although Jair, in conjunction with his relatives, captured the whole sixty cities composing the Gileadite district of the kingdom of Og in Bashan (Deut. iii, 4), only twenty-three of the sixty-eight special cities were assigned to him, whereas, at a later date, his portion may have received some accretions; or the number attributed to his descendant of the same name may be only a round or approximate estimate, as being about one half the entire number. (For other methods of adjustment, see Wiener's Rekordverzeichn. s. v. Jair.)

2. The eighth judge of Israel, a native of Gilead, in Manasseh (Josephus, Ant. v. 7, 6, i'asipcy), beyond the Jordan, and therefore probably descended from the preceding, with whom, indeed, he is sometimes confounded.

He ruled for thirty-two years (B.C. 1199-1231), and his obsequies are indicated in a manner characteristic of the age in which he lived; "He had thirty sons, that rode on thirty ass-colts ( ''; and they had thirty cities ( ''; again), which are called Havoth-jair, in the land of Gilead" (Judg. x. 3, 4). A young ass was the most valuable beast for riding then known to the Hebrews; and that Jair had so many of them, and was able to assign a village to every one of his thirty sons, is a strikingly evident sign of his wealth (see Kittel's Daily Bible Illustrat., or Judg. v. 6-10). The twenty-three villages of the more ancient Jair were probably among the thirty which this Jair possessed. His burial-place was Camon, doubtless in the same region (Judg. x. 5). It is probably one of his descendants (so numerous) that is called a Jairite (Heb. Yairi, ''; Sept. i'iapk. 2 Sam. xx. 26). Possibly, however, the genuine reading was Yairi, the Jothrite. See IAIR.

3. A Benjamite, son of Shimeu and father of Mordecai, Esther's uncle (Esth. ii. 5). B.C. ante 598.

4. (Heb. Yair, ''; marg., but text Yair, ''; perhaps awake. Sept. i'iapk, Vulg. corruptly saltus.) The father of Elhanan, which latter slew the brother of Goliath (1 Chron. xx. 5). In the parallel passage (2 Sam. xx. 19) we find, instead of Jair, "Jareb" ( ''; apparently the plural of the other word, q. d. ''; a forest; Sept. i'iapk. Vulg. again saltus), with the addition of 'Orsin ( ''; probably coseers; Sept. 'Ipsinofos, Vulg. populus), which has probably been errorely taken by transcribers from the latter part of the same verse (see Kennicott's Diaries on the Hebrew Text, i. 78). B.C. ante 1018. See ELHANAN.

JA'RITE (2 Sam. xx. 26). See JAIR, 2.

Jairus (i'asip, see JAIR), an otherwise unknown ruler of the synagogue at Capernaum, whose only daughter Jesus restored to life (Matt. ix. 24, 22; Mark viii. 41; comp. Matt. ix. 18). A.D. 27.

Some have wrongly inferred from our Saviour's words, "The maid is not dead, but sleepeth" (Ruttenberg, in the Human. Beitr., z. Nutz. u. Vermihr. 1761, p. 88; Olshausen, Comment. i. 291), that the girl was only in a swoon (see Neeb, Leben Jesu, p. 347).

Jairi's (i'asip) also occurs in the Apocalypse (Esth. xi. 2) as a Greekized form of the name of Jair (q. v.), the father of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).

Jakan (1 Chron. i. 42). See JAKAN.

Jakeb (Heb. Yakeb, ''; pious; Sept. 'Ikanos [reading Ἰακάν], Vulg. venens [reading Ιακάν]), a name given as that of the father of Agur, the author of the proverbs in Prov. xxx. 1 sq. Interpreters greatly differ as to the person intended. See AOUR. The traditional view is that it gives the word a figurative or import (q. d. ''; obedience, sc. to God); and it will then become an epithet of David, the father of Solomon, a term appropriate to his character, and especially so as applied to him by a son. Others understand a real name of some unknown Israelite; and, in that case, the most probable supposition is that it denotes the father of "the men of Hezekiah" (perhaps composed of them, or in their time), and thus incorporated with the proverbs of Solomon. But the allusion to these latter compilers in Prov. xxx. 1, appears only to relate to an editing on their part of literary effusions (in part, perhaps, retained in the text), and to have formed a new number of new settlements. In October, 1865, a negro insurrection broke out, in the course of which several government buildings were stormed by Hitzig (in Zeller's Thol. Yahw. 1844, p. 283), assimilated to by Bertheau (Kurzes. Exeg. Handb., ad loc.), and renders the clause thus: "The words of Agur, the son of her who was obeyed (reading Ἰακάν) in Massa," and in an extended comparison with the parallel passage (xxi. 1), defends and illustrates this interpretation, making Ja'keh to have been the son and successor of a certain queen of Arabia Petraea, chiefly on the ground that the phrase Ἰακάν will bear no other translation than The words of Lemuel, king of Massa. But if the construction be thus rendered more facile in this passage, it is more difficult in the other, where Ἰακάν cannot be brought nearer his version than The son of Ja'keh of Massa. Even this rendering violates in both passages the Masoretic punctuation, which is correctly followed in the Luth. Vers.; and the interpretation proposed after all, attributes both name (Agur and Lemuel) to the same person, without some good reason for such variation as there would be if they were ascribed as epithets to Solomon. See ITHEL.

Ja'kim (Heb. Yakim, ''; establishe), the name of two men. See also JEHIOAKIM.

1. (Sept. 'Elaiokv. v. r. I'akim, Vulg. Jacim.) The head of the twelfth division of the sacerdotal order as assigned by David (1 Chron. xxv. 19). B.C. 1018.

2. (Sept. 'Elaiokv. v. r. I'akim, Vulg. Jacim.) One of the "sons" of Shimhi, a Benjamite resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii. 19). B.C. apparently cir. 588.

Jalkut, the Jewish divinity of physics. "His idol is placed in a small temple richly adorned, standing upright on a gilt tarate flower, or Faba Egyptian, under one half of a large cockle-shell extended over his head, which is encircled with a crown of rays. He has a scepter in his left hand, and in his right hand something unknown. The idol is gilt all over. The Japanese, as they pass by, never fail to pay their reverence to this golden idol, approaching the temple with a low bow, and bareheaded, when they ring a little bell hung up at the entrance, and then, holding both their hands to their foreheads, repeat a prayer. The Japanese relate that this temple was erected to Jakuis by a pious but poor man, who, having discovered an excellent medicinal power, gained so much money by it as to be able to give this testimony of his gratitude to the God of physics."—Broughton, Biblical History, p. 499.

Jakut. See Siberia.

Jalon (Heb. Yalon, ''; lodger; Sept. 'Iaros v. r. 'Iamov, the last-named of the four sons of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah, and apparently of a family kindled with that of Caleb (1 Chron. iv. 17). B.C. prob. cir. 1618.

Jamaibo. See Yamabo.

Jamaica, one of the largest islands of the West Indies, was discovered by Columbus in 1494, and received in 1514 the name Isla de San Jago. In 1605 the native population had become nearly extinct. For a time Jamaica remained under the administration of the descendants of Diego, the son of Columbus; subsequently it fell by inheritance to the house of Braganza; in 1655 it was occupied by the English, and in 1670 formally ceded to England, which has ever since retained possession of it. The only slaves ceased in the importation of slaves ordinances, or the slave trade, and in 1838 the slaves obtained their entire freedom. The negro population increased very rapidly, and, according to a census taken in 1861, there were, in a total population of 441,264, only 13,816 whites, mostly English, against 945,374 negroes and 81,065 mulattoes. The colored population has always complained of being oppresssed and ill-treated by the former slaveholders, who own nearly the whole of the landed property, and a large number of them have withdrawn from the towns and plantations into the interior of the island, where they have formed a number of new settlements. In October, 1865, a negro insurrection broke out, in the course of which several government buildings were stormed by the insurgents, and a number of plantations plundered. The English governor, Eyre, suppressed the insurrection with a severity which caused his suspension from office, and the appointment of a special commission of investigation. The latter had, however, no practical result, and the Queen's Bench, to which the case of governor Eyre had been referred by the jury, declined to institute a trial.

Before the abolition of slavery the planters were in general opposed to the religious instruction of the slaves. In 1754 the Moravian Brethren commenced a mission in Jamaica, encouraged by several of the planters, who presented them with a site called Captain's Hill. The work was, however, but slow. From the beginning of the mission to 1804 the number of negroes baptized was 938. From 1838, when complete liberty was granted to the negroes, the Moravian mission prospered greatly; and in 1850, the number of souls under the care of the mission at the several stations was estimated at 1300. In 1842 an institution for training native teachers was established. In 1867 the mission numbered 14 churches and chapels, with 11,850 sittings, 9,550 attendants at divine worship, and 4,400 members. The number of schools was 17, and of students in the mission's schools of English Wesleyans was commenced by Dr. Coke in 1787. It soon met with violent opposition, and the Legislative Assembly of the island and the town council of Kingston repeatedly passed stringent laws for cutting off the slave population from the attendance of the Wesleyan meetings, and for removing the missionaries and the chapel from the laborers and the mission stations. From 1807 to 1815 the missionary work was accordingly interrupted, and it was only due to the interference of the home government and the English governors of Jamaica that it could be resumed. But every insurrectionary movement among the negroes led to a new outcry against the missionaries, in particular the Wesleyan, against whom, at different times, special laws were issued. A great change, however, took place in public opinion after the abolition of slavery, when the House of Assembly of the island and the Common Council of Kingston co-operated to aid in the erection of Wesleyan chapels and schools. In 1846 the number of church members in connection with the Wesleyan mission amounted to 26,585; but from that time it began to decrease, and in 1853 had declined to 19,476. In 1867 the Wesleyans had 75 churches and chapels, with 34,105 sittings, 21,756 attendants of public worship, 26 ministers, 14,061 members, 5,107 Sunday-schools, and 846 day schools, with 2,563 scholars. The English Baptists entered upon their mission in Jamaica in 1814. It soon became very prosperous: in 1839 it numbered 21,000, and in 1841, 27,706 members; in 1867, 32,542 members, 141 churches, and 72 out-stations. They have a college at Clifton, with theological instruction. In 1888 the United Presbyterianists had in Jamaica 46 churches, 92 ministers, and 8,814 members; the United Methodists 10 churches, 9 ministers, and 8,408 members. The general religious statistics in 1867 were as follows:

- Church of England: 87, 39,710 members.
- United Presbyterian's Free Church: 26, 7055.
- Roman Catholics: 6, 990.
- Jewish: 505.
- Church of Scotland: 8, 254.

Altogether, the number of persons under religious instruction was estimated in 1867 at 154,000, and the churches and chapels together could seat 174,000 persons. Formerly the Church of England was the State church, and was supported by the local Legislature, but in 1868 the state grant was abolished. The island is the see of an Anglican bishop and of a Roman Catholic vicar apostolic. (A. J. S.)

Jamblichus, or Jamblichus (Ἰάμβλιχος), a celebrated Neoplatonic philosopher of the 4th century, was born at Chalcis, in Cilicia-Syria. What little we know of his life is derived from the works of Eunapius, a Sophist, whose love of the marvelous renders his testimony doubly doubtful. He seems, however, to have studied under Anaximander and Porphyry, and resided in Syria until his death, which occurred during the reign of Constantine the Great, and probably before 313 A.D. (Suidas, s. v. Τάμβλιχος; Eunapius. Jamblichus, Η ἤθος γόρρου 113, 16-20). He was deeply versed in the philosophical system of Plato and Pythagoras, as well as in the theology and philosophy of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, and enjoyed great reputation, being praised by all the philosophers of his time, even the equal of Plato. In his life of Pythagoras he appears as a Syncretist, or compiler of different systems, but without critical talent. So far as can be gathered from his works in Proclus's commentary on the Timaeus, he went even further than him in substance of arguments, subdividing Plutonius's trinity, and deriving therefrom a series of triads. 'Jamblichus distinguishes first three purely intelligible triads, then three intellectual ones, thus forming the νοερόν enneadic series, and the νοερόν. By the side of the great triads on the love of truth, justice, and beauty, it is to transmit the action of the former. He is also distinguished from Plutonius and Porphyry by an almost superstitious regard for numerical form. All the principles of his theology can be represented by numbers: the monad, the supreme unit, principle of all unity, as well as all diversity; two, the interlude of the first manifestation or development of unity; three, the soul, or θεία, the principle which brings all progressive beings back to unity; four, the principle of universal harmony, which comprises the causes of all things; eight, the source of motion, taking all beings away from the supreme reality to dispose them through the world; nine, the principle of all identity and of all perfection; and finally, ten, the result of all the emanations of the τὸ τέλος. Neither Plutonius nor Porphyry, whatever their regard for Pythagoras's doctrines, ever went to such an extent in reducing their principles to numerical abstractions" (Vacherot, Hist. Crétique de l'Ecole d'Alexandrie, vol. ii.). Jamblichus did not acquiesce in the doctrine of the earlier Neoplatonists, but thought that man could be brought into direct communication with the Deity through the medium of theurgy; and this system of theurgy he divided into two parts, the Πεθανομενος βίος (published first by J. Arcarius Theodorus, Franeker, 1598, 4to; best ed. L. Kuster, Amst. 1707, 4to; and Th. Kiesling, Lpz. 1815, 2 vol. 8vo); —Προφητικοί λόγοι εἰς φιλοσοφίαν (Th. Kiesling, Lpz. 1813, 8vo) —Προφητικοί λόγοι τῶν ἑνωμένων (Vilbelin, Anecdota Graeco, ii. 198 sqq.; J. F. Fries, Copenhagen, 1790, 4to). —Προφητικοί λόγοι, τῆς ἀρχηγοῦ (Ch. Wechel, Paris, 1543, 4to; Tr. Ast. Lpz. 1817, 8vo). 2. The Προφητικοί λόγοι, in one book, in which a priest named Abammon is introduced as replying to a letter of Pythagoras. He endeavors to vindicate the truth, purity, and divinity of Egyptian religion and its theology, and maintains that man, through theurgic rites, may commune with the Deity. There has been some controversy concerning the authenticity of this work, but Tennemann and other eminent critics think there are no grounds for doubt. The date of Jamblichus is July 1704, 4to; Brucker, Historia critica Philosophiarum, ii. 390, 431; Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vi. 246; Tene-

the same name given to them, an unprecedented oversight that would produce continual confusion in the family; besides, the law did not allow a man to be married to two sisters at the same time (Lev. xxviii, 18), as Joseph in that case would have been; nor would either of these objections be obviated by supposing the two Marys to have been half-sisters. The only palatable conjecture is that they are called sisters (i.e., sisters-in-law), because of their marriage to two brothers, Cleophas and Joseph; a supposition that is strengthened by their apparent intimacy with each other, and their similar connection with Jesus intimated in John xix, 25. Cleophas (or Alphaeus) seems to have been anywhere between Joseph, and dying without issue, Joseph married his wife (probably before his marriage with the Virgin, as he seems to have been much older than she) according to the Levirate law (Deut. xxv, 5); on which account his oldest son by that marriage is styled the (legal) son of Cleophas, as well as (reputed half-) brother of Jesus. See ALPHAUS; MARY. This arrangement meets all the statements of Scripture in the case, and is confirmed by the declarations of early Christian writers. (See No. 5, below.) The only objection of any force against such an arrangement of the statement, occurs towards the latter part of our Saviour's ministry, that "neither did his brethren believe on him" (John vii, 5), whereas two of them, at least, are in this way included among his disciples (namely, James and Jude, if not Simon); and, although they are mentioned in Acts i, 14 as subsequently present at the ascension, yet it is discovered in John vii, 7 seems too decisive to admit the supposition that those there referred to sustained so prominent a position as apostles among his converts. A more likely mode of reconciling these two passages is to suppose that there were still other brothers besides those chosen as apostles (or mentioned particularly anywhere (perhaps only Joseph and one younger), who did not believe on him until a very late period, being possibly convinced only by his resurrection. Indeed, if three of these brethren were apostles, the language in Acts i, 14, requires such a supposition; for, after enumerating the eleven (including, as usual, James, Simon, and Jude), that passage adds, "and with his brethren." Whether these mentioned brothers (as indeed may also be said of the sisters, and perhaps of Simon) were the children of Mary, Cleophas's widow, or of the Virgin Mary, is uncertain; yet in the early Christian church, among other persons (Luke ii, 7), as well as in the intimation of temporary abstinence only in Matt. i, 25, there seems to be implied a reference to other children (see VIRGINS); but, be that as it may, there can be no good reason given why such should not have been the case; we may therefore conjecture that while James, Simon, Jude, and Joseph's children by Cleophas's widow, and the first three were of sufficient age to be chosen apostles, all the others were by the Virgin Mary, and among them only some sisters were of sufficient age and notoriety at Christ's second visit to Nazareth to be specified by his townsman (Matt. xiii, 55; Mark vi, 3), Jospe and the children of the Virgin generally being the "brethren" that did not believe in Jesus till late (John vii, 5; Acts i, 14). See JUDE. To the objection that if the Virgin had had other children, especially sons (and still more, as children of Joseph), she would have expressed direction of Jesus, her eldest son, would have decided her residence with "the beloved disciple," who was eminently fitted, as Christ's favorite, no less than by his amiable manners and comparative affluence, to discharge that duty. See JHN. (See Meth. Quart. Rev. Oct. 1861, p. 670-672.) See on the No. S, below.

There have been three principal theories on the subject: 1. For the identity of James, the Lord's brother, with James the apostle, the son of Alpheus, we find (see Routh, Relig. Sacr. i, 16, 43, 220 [Oxon. 1846]) Clemens of Alexander (Hypotyposeis, bk. vii, apud Eusebius, H. E. i, 12; ii, 1) and Chrysostom (in Gal. i, 19). This hypot-thesis, being warmly defended by St. Jerome (in Matt. xii, 49) and St. Augustine (in Matt. xii, 55), in the Protevangelium of James, and the Pseudo-Apostolic Constitution of the 3d century (Thiolo, Cod. Apoc. i, 228; Const. Apost. vi, 12). It is accepted by Eusebius (Commu. in Evan. xvi, 6; H. E. i, 12; ii, 1). Perhaps it is Origen's opinion (see Comm. in Joh. ii, 12). St. Epiphanius, St. Hilary, and St. Ambrose we have already mentioned as being on the same side. So are Victorinus (Vit. Phil. in Gal. apud Maii Script. rer. novel. coll. [Rome, 1828]) and Gregory Nyssen (Opp. ii, 844, D. [Paris ed. 1618]), and it became the recognized position of the Greek Church. But, according to Dr. Na-sis, put forward at first by Bonosus, Helvidius, and Jo-vianus, and revived by Herder and Strauss in Germany, is that James, Joseph, Jude, and James the son of Joseph and Mary, while James the apostle and James the son of Alpheus (whether one or two persons) were different from, and not under the title of "brothers and sisters" of our Lord. English theologial critics have been divided between the first and second of these views, with, however, a preference on the whole for the first hypothesis. See, e.g. Lander, viii, 495 (London, 1876); Peene, in Minor Works, i, 250 (Oxf.
1844), and On the Character, i, 360 ii, 224 (Oxford, 1848); Thordikke, i, (Oxf. 1844); Horne's Introd. to H. S. iv, 497 (Lond. 1844), etc. On the same side are Lightfoot, Wituus, Lampe, Baumgarten, Semler, Gader, Eichhorn, Hug, Berthold, Guericke, Schneckenburger, Meier, Steiger, Giesler, Theile. Lance, Taylor (Ops. v, 29 [London, 1849]), Wilson (Op. vi, 673 [Oxf. 1859]), and Cave (Life of St. James) maintain the second hypothesis with Vas-sius, Banage, Valesius, etc. The third is held by Dr. Davidson (Introd. New Test. vol. iii) and by Dean Alford (Greek Test. iv, 87). Our own position, it will be perceived, is that the differences of opinion arise from confusing with (1) the identity of the two Jameses, with (2) the Levirate marriage of Joseph and the widow of Alpheus, and with (3) that these were all the children of Joseph and in part of Mary. See JAMES, EPITHELIO OF (below). the other individuals called the brethren of Jesus stood in the same relation. It is also urged that in the Acts, after the death of James, the son of Zebedee, we read only of one James; and, moreover, that it is improbable that our Lord would have committed his mother to the care of the beloved disciple had there been sons of Joseph living, whether the offspring of Mary, or of Mary’s former husband. Neither of these statements, however, have ever been alleged that in several early Christian writers, James, the brother of the Lord, is distinguished from the son of Alpheus, that the identity of the names Alpheus and Cleophas is somewhat uncertain, and that it is doubtful whether the word Alpheus, and his brethren, and his mother in Acts is understood to mean that Alpheus and Cleophas were related to our Lord, the narrative in the Evangelists and the Acts presents some reasons for suspecting that they were not the persons described as “the brethren of Jesus.”

(1) The brethren of Jesus are associated with his mother in a manner that suggests their standing above the world hate you,” etc.), if they were related to our Lord, the narrative in the Evangelists and the Acts presents some reasons for suspecting that they were not the persons described as “the brethren of Jesus.”

(2) It is explicitly stated that at a period posterior to the appointment of the twelve apostles, among whom we find “the son of Alpheus,” “neither did his brethren believe in him” (John vii, 5; Litte’s Comment). Attempts, indeed, have been made by Grotius and Lardner to dispense with the force of this passage, as if it meant merely that their faith was imperfect or wavering—“that they did not believe as they should,” but the language of Jesus is decisive: “My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready; the world cannot hate you, but me it hates” (compare this with John xvii, 19, 18; Acts vii, 53: ‘the world hate you’), etc."

As to the supposition that what is affirmed in John’s Gospel might apply to only one of his brethren, it is evident that, admitting the identity, only one brother of Jesus would be left out of the “company of the apostles” (so the language in Acts i, 15, 14, is opposed to the identity in question); for, after enumerating the apostles, among whom, as usual, is “James, the son of Alpheus,” he adds, “they all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication with the women, and Mary, the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren,” From this passage, however, we learn that by this time his brethren had received him as the Messiah. That after the death of the son of Zebedee we find only one James mentioned, may easily be accounted for on the ground that probably only one, “the brother of the Lord,” remained at Jerusalem; and, under such circumstances, the absence of the historical narrative of the son of Alpheus is not more strange than respecting several of the other apostles, whose names never occur after the catalogue in i, 13. Paul’s language in Gal. i, 19 has been adduced to prove the identity of the Lord’s brother with the son of Alpheus by its ranking among the apostles, but others contend that it is by no means decisive (Winer, Grammatik, 4th edit., p. 517; Neander, History of the Planting, etc., ii, 5 [Engl. transl.]).

Dr. Nie- meyer (Charakteret der Bibel, i, 389 [Halle, 1880]) enumerates not less than five persons of this name, by distinguishing the son of Alpheus from James the Less, and assuming that the James last mentioned in Acts i, 13 was not the brother, but the father of Judas. Amidst this great disagreement of views (see in Winer’s Realwörter, s. v. Jacobus; Davidson’s Introduction to the N. T. iii, 302 sq.; Horne’s Introduction, new ed. iv, 591, n.; Princeton Review, Jan., 1865), the most probable solution of the main question is that given above (No. 2), identifying James, the son of Alpheus, with one of the apostles, the literal brother of our Lord, and the man whose name in the sister-in-law of the Virgin by virtue of the marriage of both with Joseph (see also Alfred, Prolegg, to vol. iv, pt. ii of his Comment, p. 88 sq.). This Levirate explanation is summarily dismissed by Andrews (Life of our Lord, p. 198) and Jan. 16, 1843 (in the Appendix to his sermon “Prophecy and Usurpation, intro. to epist. of James, p. 19) as “needing no refutation;” but, although conjectural, it is the only one that makes it possible for James to have been at once Christ’s brother and yet the son of Alpheus. If he was likewise the same with the son of Mary, the wife of Cleophas, the theory may be said to be demonstrated. Other treatises on the subject are Dr. Mill’s Accounts of our Lord’s Brethren Vindicated (Cambridge, 1843); Schaff, DasVerhältniss des Jacobus, Bruders des Herrn, und Jacobus Alphai (Berlin, 1842); Gabler, De Jacobo, epistolar usw. (Alzey, 1877). For other monographs, see Vol. vi, p. 737 (Baj.)

If we examine the early Christian writers, we shall meet with a variety of opinions on this subject. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii, 1) says that James, the first bishop of Jerusalem, brother of the Lord, son of Joseph, the husband of Mary, is named the Just by the ancients on account of his eminence. He uses their religious language in his Evangelical Demonstration (iii, 5). In his commentary on Isaiah he reckons fourteen apostles, viz. the twelve, Paul, and James, the brother of our Lord. A similar enumeration is made in the “Apostolic Constitutions” (vi, 14) “Epaphroditus, and Theophilus, last speak of James, the Lord’s brother, as being the same as the son of Cleophas.” They suppose that Joseph and Cleophas were brothers, and that the latter dying without issue, Joseph married his widow for his first wife, according to the Jewish custom, and that James and his brethren were the offspring of this marriage (Lardner’s Credibility, ii, 118; Works, iv, 548; i, 165; v, 169; Hist. of Heretics, ch. xi, § 11; Works, v, 527; Supplement to the Credibility, ch. xvii, Works, vi, 188). A passage from Josephus is quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii, 23), in which James, the brother of “him who is called Christ,” is spoken of as a confessor (De Josip, etc.), Chrysostom and Photius (Ep. 157), are not likely. Eusebius follows this account in a passage of his history, but says elsewhere that he was appointed by the apostles (Hist. Eccles. ii, 23). Cilicius of Alexandria is the first author who speaks of his episcopate (Hyginus, bk. iv, sp. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. ii, 1), and he alludes to it as a thing of which the chief apostles, Peter, James, and John, might well have been ambitious. The same Clement reports that the Lord, after his resurrection, delivered the gift of knowledge to James the Just, to John, and Peter, who, he says, delivered it to the rest of the apostles (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. ii, 13). According to Hegesippus (a convert Jew of the 2nd century) James, the brother of the Lord, undertook the government of the Church along with the apostles (apud ev. 7) and as held in the highest veneration by the Jews (ap. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. ii, 23). It is to be accounted for is Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii, 23). But in the account he gives of his martyrdom some circumstances are highly improbable (see Euthy, Reliquiae Sacrae, i, 229), although the event itself is quite credible (A.D. 62). In the apoc-
JAMES

The Gospel according to the Hebrews, he is said to have been precipitated from a pinnacle of the Temple, then assaulted with stones, and at last dispatched by a blow on the head with a fuller's pole (Lardner's Supplement, ch. xvi, Works, vi, 174; Neander, Planting, etc., ii, 9, 22).

Eusebius gives the same account that Hegesippus does, and says that different accounts have evidently copied it for the most part from him. He adds a few particulars which are probably mere assertions or conclusions of his own (Her. xxiv, 4; lxxvii, 18).

He calculates that James must have been ninety-six years old at the time of his death, and adds (on the authority of the Historia Eusebii, Clemens, and others) that he wore the vrsiak on his forehead, in which he probably confounds him with St. John (Polyc. apud Eusebii, Hist. Eccles., v, 24. But see Cotta, De Lam. post. App. Jom. Jac. et Marci [Tib. 1753]). Gregory of Tours reports that he was buried, not where he fell, but on the Mount of Olivies, in a tomb in which he had already buried Zacharias and Simon (De glor. mart., i, 27). The monument—part excavation, part edifice—which is now commonly known as the "Tomb of St. James," is on the east side of the so-called Valley of Je- hoshaphat. The question about the monument in question is that St. James took refuge there after the capture of Christ, and remained, eating and drinking nothing, until our Lord appeared to him on the day of his resurrection (see Quaresmius, etc., quoted in Tober, Sidoa, etc., p. 299). The legend of his death there seems to be first recorded in a monastic Chronicle (Annali Benedictinorum; see Early Trans, p. 176). By the old travellers it is often called the "Church of St. James." Eusebius tells us that his chair was preserved down to his time (on which see Heinichen's Excursus [Exc. 24, ad Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii, 19, vol. iv, p. 357, ed. Burton]). We must add a strange Talmudic legend which appears to relate to St. James. It is found in the Midrash Koheloth, or Commentary on Ecclesiastes, and also in the Tract Abodah Zdrakh of the Jerusalem Talmud. It is as follows: "R. Elezer, the son of Dama, was bitten by a serpent, and there came to him a man, a son of Saphar Sceanna, to heal him by the law of Jesus, the son of Pandareus, but R. Ismael suffered him not to say: 'That is not allowed thee, son of Dama.'" He answered, 'Suffer me, and I will produce an authority against thee that is lawful," but he could not produce the authority before he expired. And in his anger he said to this: 'If a man say: 'I shall live in thee' (Lev. xviii, 5). But it is not said that he shall die in them." The son of Pandareus is the name that the Jews have always given to our Lord when representing him as a magician. The same name is given in Epiphanius (Her. lxxviii) to the grandfather of Joseph, and by John Damascene (De Fide Orth. iv, 15) to the grandfather of Joachim, the supposed father of the Virgin Mary. For the identification of James of Sceanna (a place in Upper Galilee) with James the Just, see Mill (Historic. Critical. of the Gospel, p. 318, Camb. 1840). For the apocryphal works ascribed to James, see JAMES, SPHINXUS WRITINGS OF.

JAMES, EPISTLE OF; said, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., ii, 23, to be the first of the so-called Catholic epistles (αφιχεων), as being addressed to classes of Christians rather than to individuals or particular communities. The Apocalypse is said by Eusebius to be a work of Dispersion.

I. Author.—As the writer simply styles himself "James, a servant of God end of the Lord Jesus Christ," the question as to whom this may designate has been a subject of keen and prolonged controversy, since, as Eusebius has again remarked, there were several of this name. James the Great, or the son of Zebedee, was put to death under Herod Agrippa about the year 44, and, therefore, the authorship cannot with any propriety be ascribed to him, though a Syriac MS., published by Widmamstadt, and an old Latin version, published by Martinay and Salaster, make the ascription. The authorship has been assigned by not a few to James the Less, a μητρικος, the son of Alpheus or Cleophas, and by others to James, the Lord's brother. Many, however, maintain that the two names were borne by the same individual, James being called the Lord's brother either as being a cousin or adoptive brother of Jesus (Lange, Art. Jacobus in Herzog's Enzyklopaedie), or as a son of Alpheus or Cleophas. The title of Brother of Jesus—the opinion of Epiphanius and Theophylact; or as a son of Joseph by a former marriage—the view of St. Chrysostom, Hilary, Cave, and Bussan. On the other hand, it is held by some that James, son of Alpheus, and James, brother of our Lord, were distinct persons, and the reason of the confusion being a matter standing, according to the representation of the Gospel, in the same relation with him to their common mother Mary—as in Matt, xii, 47; xxiii, 55; Mark vi, 3; John ii, 12; Acts i, 14. On the whole, we are inclined to the former hypothesis, but we cannot enter into the question, referring the reader to the previous article, and to that on BROTHERS OF OUR Lord. There are also three excellent monographs on the subject: Blom, Theol. Disser., de filiis fratrii eurou (Lugd. Bat. 1839); Schaff, Das Verhaltnisse des Jacobus Bruders des Herrn (Berlin, 1841), 4to; and Theol. Disser., de Joseph, fratre nostri Domini (Groningen, 1854). For the other side, see Mill on the Mythical Interpretation of the Gospel, p. 219, ed. sec., 1861.

Dr. Mill held the perpetual virginity of Mary, or that she was, in ecclesiastical language, ἐκκορυμματισμενη, and thus virtually foreclosed the entire investigation. The title of Brother of Jesus seems to have been partly adopted by St. Peter (Matt, xxvi, 71; Acts i, 14) on this as well as on the opposite theory as having their prototypes in the Anti-doricamarians or Helvidians of the 4th century.

According to our view, the author of this epistle was the Lord's brother, and an apostle, or one of the twelve. In Gal. ii, 9, Paul classes him with Peter and John, all three being as well as John, called the brother of James (Eusebii, Hist. ii, 23) to have received the government of the Church, μετὰ τῶν ἀποστόλων, but not as ἀπόστολος, as Jerome wrongly renders it, but along with the ἀποστόλοι—as the natural rendering is—or was received by them into a collegiate relation. In the pseudo-Clementine, and in the Apostolical Constitutions, however, he is traditionally separated from the apostles. It is quite groundless on the part of Wieseler (Studien und Kritiken, 1842), Stier, and Davidson to argue that the James mentioned in the first chapter of Galatians is a different person from the James son of Alpheus, and that James of Jerusalem is the James of the apostolic age. Now, again, we have Paul distinctly acknowledging the high position of the brethren of the Lord when he ranges them between "other apostles" and "Cephas" in 1 Cor. ix, 5. By universal consent James was called ὁ ἁγιασμένος, and, being martyred, was succeeded by a cousin, Symeon, sent on of the council of the Church, the archbishop of the Church of Jerusalem, and a son of Alpheus (ὄντα ἁγιασμένον τοῦ Κυρίου συμβέβηκεν). Thus James was the superintendent of the Church at Jerusalem, and, probably on account of continuous residence, possessed of higher influence there than Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, who could only be an occasional visitor. "Certain from James (τινὶς ἀπὸ Ἰακώβου) went down to Antioch, before whom Peter prevenerated, as if he had stood in awe of the stricter Judaic principles of James and his party (Acts xv; Gal. ii). It seems, therefore, very natural that one occupying this position in the theoretical meaning of the word, ἁγιασμένος τοῦ νόμου—that for their sakes, and to ward off their hostility, he advised the apostle Paul to submit to an act contrary to his believing conscience, that is, to the suspension of the Dispersion. He sympathized so strongly with the martyrdom of the Jews who believed and yet were zealous of the law—Σαρακατα τοῦ νόμον—that for their sakes, and to ward off their hostility, he advised the apostle Paul to submit to an act contrary to his believing conscience, that is, to the suspension of the Dispersion.

The opinion that the author of this epistle is different from James, the son of Alpheus, and not an apostle, is held by Clement, Herder, De Wette, Neander, Kora,
JAMES

Schaff, Winer, Stier, Rothe, and Alford. Davidson, while holding the opinion that the Lord's brother and James the apostle are different persons, ascribes the epistle to the latter. But the theory seems to violate all the probabilities that may be gathered from the early fathers and historians. That James, the Lord's brother, is James the apostle, is an opinion maintained by Barnabas, Clement, Justin, Irenaeus, Eusebius, Eusebius of Cæsarea, Meier, Gieseler, Theile, and the most of other writers.

II. Canonical Authority.—The epistle is found in the Syriac Peshito in the 2d century, a version which circulated in the neighborhood of that country to which James and his readers belonged, and the translator and his apostles appear to have been in close communion. For inserting James in their canon, as they exclude the Second and Third Epistles of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Apocalypse. There are clauses in Clement of Rome (Ad Cor. xxxii) and in Hermas (Mandat. xii, 15) which probably may refer to correspondent portions of this epistle, though, perhaps, they may only allude directly to the Septuagint. The quotation from the Latin version of Irenaeus (Adser. Hær. iv, 16) appears to be more direct in the phrase "et amicus Dei vocatus est." But this phrase, found also in Clement, seems to have been borrowed from the 2d century, and the whole analogy is explained by the same appellation. We cannot, therefore, lay such immediate stress on these passages as is done by Kern, Wiesinger, and others, though there is a presumption in favor of the opinion that passages in the apocryphal fathers, bearing any likeness of style or thought to the apostle, are of the same age, and are direct quotations, which are either direct imitations or unconscious reproductions. This epistle is quoted by Origen (In Joam., in Opert. iv, 306); and the Latin version of Rufinus uses the phrase Jacobus apostolus as a preface to a quotation. This father quotes the epistle also as ascribed to James—iv υς γεωργιος Ignatius, 1st and 2nd epistles to the Corinthians, and Origen says that the doctrine "faith without works is dead" is not received by all—οὐχ ἡμῶν ὄντων. Clement of Alexandria does not quote it, but Eusebius says that he expounded all the catholic epistles, including, however, in the range of his commentaries the Epistle of Barnabas and the so-called Apocalypse of Peter. Tertullian seems to make no reference to it, though Credner suppose an allusion to it, 23 in the second book Adevereus Judaeos (Opere, ed. Oehler, ii, 704). Eusebius places it among the Antilegomena (Hist. Ecles. ii, 25; iii, 25), saying that the first reference to the name of James he had just spoken of its author's death, 1st and 2nd to the epistle as one of the ancients have mentioned it; subjoining, however, that it and Jude were used in most of the churches. In other places Eusebius quotes James without hesitation, calling the epistle by the sacred title of γραφή, and its author δί υρν υποστολής. Jerome is very explicit, saying that James wrote one epistle, which some asserted had been published by another in his name, but that by degrees and in process of time ("paullatim tempore procedente") it obtained authority. Jerome's assertion may arise from the fact that there were several persons named James, and that confusion on this point was one means of throwing doubt on the epistle. There seems to be also an allusion in Hippolytus (ed. Lagarde, p. 122) to ii, 13, in the words η γεωργίου διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεγεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεɡεται ἡ διαλεgementh—began" along with himself (ὑπάκου) "by the word of truth," and all of them bearing the "good name" (ἀγαθὸν ὄνομα). The first verse of the second chapter implies also that they held "the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of Glory," and they are exhortcd not to hold it inconsistently, along with manifest respect of persons, or showing unfounded social preferences. They are told besides, in ὑπὸ τοῦ παπῶν.
It is not so easy to determine the time at which the epistle was written. Many place the date about the year 60—close on the martyrdom of James the Just, or not long before the destruction of Jerusalem—as Michaelis, Pecquet, and some others. But the view might, from the sentiment which is expressed in the letter, have been written earlier—say in the year 54 or 55. For the former part of it might be written by James to the Hebrews, to which epistle it was added. The latter contains a form of greeting to the Jews, which, though it seems to be used more often as a form of address to the Hebrews, was written to the Jews, and not to the Gentiles, as the early Christian epistles are generally understood to be.
fall (so Macknight infers from v. 1); for at that time the old controversy appears to have been somewhat revived. De Wette adduces the allusion to the name "Christians" in ii, 7, as an evidence in favor of the late date; but this would only require a date later than that of St. John. This would imply a preponderance in favor of the interval between Paul's two imprisonments at Rome, or about A.D. 62.

VI. There are two points in the epistle which demand a somewhat more lengthened notice. These are, (a) ii, 14-26, which has been represented as a formal opposition to Paul's doctrine of justification by faith; and (b) v, 14, 15, which is quoted as the authority for the sacramental extremities undecided.

(a) Justification being an act, not of man, but of God, both the phrases "justification by faith" and "justification by works" are inexact. Justification must either be by grace or of reward. Therefore our question is, Did or did not James hold justification by grace? If he did not, his statement here is erroneous. Now there is not one word in James to the effect that a man can earn his justification by works; and this would be necessary in order to prove that he held justification of reward. Still Paul does use the expression "justified by faith" (Rom. v, 1), and James the expression "justified by works" as faith only. Here is an apparent opposition. But, if we consider the meaning of the two apostles, we see at once that there is no contradiction either intended or possible. Paul was opposing the Judaizing party, which claimed to earn acceptance by good works, whether the works of the Mosaic law, or works of piety done by themselves. In opposition to these, Paul lays down the great truth that acceptance cannot be earned by man at all, but is the free gift of God to the Christian man, for the sake of the merits of Jesus Christ, appropriated by each individual, and by the influence of the Holy Spirit on the heart. James, on the other hand, was opposing the old Jewish tenet that to be a child of Abraham was all in all; that godliness was not necessary, if but the belief was correct. This presumptuous confidence had transferred itself, with perhaps double force, to the Christianized Jews. They had said, "Let a man say, "Lord, Lord," and that was enough, without doing his Father's will. They had recognised the Messiah: what more was wanted? They had faith: what more was required of them? It is plain that their "faith" was a totally different thing from the "faith" of Paul. Paul tells us again and again that his "faith" is a "faith that works by love;" but the very characteristic of the "faith" which James is attacking, and the very reason why he attacked it, was that it did not work by love, but was a bare absence of the head, not influencing the heart; a faith such as devils can have, and tremble. James tells us that "fides informis" is not sufficient on the part of man for justification; Paul tells us that "fides formativa" is sufficient: and the reason why fides informis will not justify us is, according to James, because it lacks that special quality, the addition of which constitutes its fides formativa. See (3) supra, Subject; Bullinger, cop. 21 et Examen Censura; Taylor's Sermon on "Faith working by Love," viii, 284 (Lond. 1850); and, as a corrective of Bull's view, Laurence's Bampton Lectures, iv, v, vi. Other discussions may be found in Knapp, Scripta, p. 511; Reuss, Theologie, ii, 924; Hofmann, Schriftlexicon, i, 683; Wainlaw's Sermons; Wood's Theology, ii, 408; Watson's Institutes, ii, 614; Lechler, Das Apostol. und nachapostolische Zeitalter, p. 163. For monographs, see Walch, Bibliothec Theologica, iv, 941; Danz, Worterbuch, s. v. Jacobus. See JUSTIFICATION; Faith.

(b) With respect to v, 14, 15, it is enough to say that the ceremony of extreme unction climaxed in the ceremony described by James differ both in their subject and in their object. The subject of extreme unction is a sick man who is about to die, and its object is not his cure. The subject of the ceremony described by James is a sick man who is not about to die, and its object is his cure, together with the spiritual benefit of absolution. James is plainly giving directions with respect to the manner of administering one of those extraordinary gifts of the Spirit with which the Church was endowed only in the apostolic age and the age immediately succeeding the apostles.

VII. Contents.—The errors and sins against which James warns his readers are such as arose out of their situations. Perfection—παρακολούθησιν is a prominent idea, and it is often a frequent epithet—the "perfect work" of patience, the "perfect" gift of God, the "perfect law" of liberty or the new covenant, faith "made perfect," and "perfect" being the supreme man. It is clear, from a knowledge of their circumstances, does not set before them an ethical system for their leisurely study, but selects the vices of opinion and life to which their circumstances so markedly and so naturally exposed them. Patience is a primary inculcation, it being essentially the object in view which is this central thought. Trials develop patience, and such evils as produce trials are not to be ascribed in a spirit of fatalism to God. Spiritual life is enjoyed by believers, and is fostered by the reception, and specially by the doings of the word; and true religious service is unworldly and disinterested work, and is thereby chosen by the royal law—faith without works is dead—tongue and temper are to be under special guard, and under the control of wisdom—the deceits of casualty are to be eschewed—contemptuous covetousness is to be avoided as one of the works of the flesh. With these, and others, pride. Rich oppressors are denounced, and patience is enjoined on all; the fitting exercises in times of gladness and of sickness are prescribed; the efficacy of prayer is extolled and exemplified; while the conclusion animates his readers to do for others what he has been doing. He teaches the existence to convert them from "the error of their way" (see Stanley's Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, p. 297).

The epistle contains no allusion to the cardinal doctrines of Christianity, though they are implied. It was not the writer's object either to discuss or defend them. It would be an unnatural perversion of his design to say that Christianity had not penetrated his own spiritual life, or that he was only in a transition state between Judaism and Christianity. He might not, indeed, have the free and unhampered view of Paul in presenting the Gospel. But a true Christianity is implied, and his immediate work lay in preserving private Christian duties, which he does in the style of the Master himself.

VIII. Style and Language. — The similarity of this epistle in tone and form to the Sermon on the Mount has often been remarked. In the spirit of the Great Teacher, he sharply reproves all externalism, all sectishness, inconsistency, worldliness, ostentation, self-deception, and hypocrisy. Thus in the first chapter as a sample. comp. i, 2, Matt. v, 10-12; i, 4, Matt. v, 48; i, 5, Matt. vii, 7, i, 9, Matt. v, 3; i, 20, Matt. v, 22, etc. The epistle, in short, is a long and earnest illustration of the golden rule, as laid down by our Lord, in figures in building on the rock and building on the sand. The composition is the abrupt and stern utterance of an earnest, practical soul—a rapid series of censure and counsels—not entirely disconnected, but generally suggested by some inner link of association. Often a general law is epigrammatically laid down, while a peculiar sin is reprobated or a peculiar virtue enforced—or a principle is announced in the application of it. The style is vigorous—full of imperatives so solemn and categorical as to dispel all idea of resistance or compromise, and of interrogations so pointed that they carry their answer with them. It is marked by epithets so bold and forcible that they give freshness and color to the dic tion. The clauses have a rhetorical beauty and power, and as in men of fervent oratorical temper, the words often fall into rhythmical order, while the thoughts occupy the thoughts of poetry. An accidental hexameter is found in i, 17 [provided it be lawful to make the last syllable of διδάσκω long].

The Greek is remarkably pure, and it is difficult to account for this comparative purity. Hegesippus, as quoted by Eusebius, says that James's believing brethren desired him to address the crowds assembled at the Passover; for there were brought together "all the tribes, with also the Gentiles"—πάσας αἱ φυλαὶ μετὰ καὶ τῶν ἱθονίων; and Greek must have been the lan guage employed. It is therefore quite preposterous on the part of Boiten, Beholdt, and Schott to suspect that the Greek of this epistle is a translation from an Aramaean original.

Remarks have sometimes been traced between this epistle and the first Epistle of Peter, and these may be accounted for by the fact that both authors were somewhat similarly circumstanced in relation to their readers. But Hug's and Bleek's inference is a rash one—that Peter must have read the epistle of James. In a letter of the Epistle of James (2:17—24) there is a protest against laxity of morals—against supine and easy acquiescence in the truths of the Gospel without feeling their power or acting under their influence, while it presents such ethical lessons as the Church, placed in multiple relations to a world of sense and trial, has ever need of to contemplate and sustain it in its progress towards perfection.

of Mary dying without issue. He was the grandson, as Mary was the granddaughter, of Margaret Tudor, through whom the Scottish line claimed and eventually obtained the inheritance of the crown of England after the failure of the claim of Henry VIII. The son of Mary and Darnley (or king Henry, as he was called after his marriage) was born in the castle of Edinburgh June 19, 1566, and was baptized according to the Roman Catholic ritual in Stirling Castle December 17 following, by the names of Charles James. The murder of Darnley took place Feb. 10, 1567, and was followed by the early marriage with Bothwell on May 15 of the same year; her capture by the insurgent nobles, or Lords of the Congregation as they called themselves, at Carberry, on June 14; her consignment as a prisoner to the castle of Lochleven on the 17th, and her forced resignation of the crown on July 24, in favor of the young Philip, when he was crowned at Stirling on the 28th as James VI, being then an infant of a little more than a year old. It was at this time that the final struggle was raging in Scotland between the two great interests of the old and the new religion, which, besides their intrinsic importance, were respectively identified with the French and the English alliance, and which, together with the old and the new distribution of the property of the kingdom, made the minority of James stormy beyond even the ordinary experience of Scottish minorities. Before his mother's marriage with Bothwell had been consummated, George Buchanan, a zealous adherent of the Presbyterian Church, during the minority of the young king, the Earl of Morton had been assigned the regency; but Jane's guards being anxious to control themselves the affairs of state, in 1578 Morton was driven from power, and James nominally assumed the direction of affairs. Morton, however, soon succeeded in re-establishing himself, and held the government for a short period, when he was finally deposed, and the young king again obtained the control of state affairs. He was at this time only twelve years of age, and was assisted by a council of twelve nobles. Once more great rejoicings were manifest throughout the land. All parties hailed the event as the advent of a new era, and to those who were anxious to bring the prospects of power and prosperity. Presbyterians relied on the early training of the prince; Romanists on the descendency of the young ruler, and, regarding his mother as in some sense a martyr to their cause, supposed it would naturally make James incline to, if not openly espouse Romanism. The pope wrote pleasant letters to the young monarch, and Jesuits were dispatched with all haste to serve, in the garb of Puritans, the cause of Rome. The greater, then, was the discontent among his Roman Catholic subjects when James showed predilections for the Presbyterian Church. Shortly after his accession, the "Book of Policy," which up to our day remains the guide of the Scottish Church in ecclesiastical government and other affairs of a similar nature, was issued. Another very important step taken was the publication of a confession of faith by the General Assembly, which the king approved and swore to (comp. Sack, Church of Scotland, ii, 5 sq.). New presbyteries were established throughout the realm, and it seemed as if the Puritans were to be the only favorites, when, on a sudden, by a successful conspiracy of a party of nobles, James was imprisoned, with the endeavor to force him to more favorable actions in behalf of his Roman Catholic subjects. The whole affair is known in English history as the "Raid of Ruthven." A counterplot in 1585 secured the freedom of the monarch, but from henceforth a new policy was inaugurated, in which he was wholly controlled by the Presbyterians. Resolutions were published, known as the "black resolutions," which aimed at the total abrogation of the Pres-byzantine Church. Severe persecutions followed, and it seemed for a time as if James had actually turned to Romanism. After the death of his mother, Elizabeth courted the favor of James, and a treaty was finally concluded between them, by which the two kingdoms bound themselves to an offensive and defensive alliance against all foreign powers who should invade their territories, or attempt to disturb the reformed religious establishments of either. This action, of course, at once favored the Protestant subjects of James; for his severity toward them increased, and the Puritans were arrayed against each other, and James was called upon to settle the dispute. Biased in favor of the episcopacy, James, however, decided on a conference of the two parties, anxious to display his "proficiency in theology" and "defeat the artificiety of applauding his polity and skill, and making his chosen line of conduct at least appear to result from partial inquiry" (Baxter, Eng. Ch. History, p. 560). As yet no separate church had taken place, neither had the Puritans even renounced episcopacy, nor did they question regal supremacy; they were objected to being bound against the dictates of their conscience to the observance of certain performances; they desired purity of doctrine, good pastors, a reform in Church government and in the Book of Common Prayer; in short, a removal of all usages which savor of Romanism. A contingent of Episcopal troops assembled at Hampton Court in January, 1604, and the points of difference discussed in James's presence, he himself taking, as might have been expected, a conspicuous and most undignified part. "Church writers, in dealing with this subject, have felt compelled to emplor the utmost ingenuity and artifice of their eloquence, to set forth the authority of the king and the bishops of this period, which a Nonconformist would almost hesitate to use" (Skene). On the episcopal side appeared archbishop Whittig, assisted by bishops Bancroft, Bilson, and others; on the side of the Puritans appeared four divines, headed by the celebrated Mr. Sprat, at the time president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. "It is obvious, from the whole proceedings, that the conference was summoned for a purpose opposed to its ostensible aim. It was not intended to bring the two parties in the Church into harmony; more probably, the object was to fortify and extend the establishment (Skene). The attitude of the king pleased the church men, and "the prelates accepted him with devout gratitude. The more his character became revealed to them, the greater was their satisfaction. When he almost swore at the Puritans, Whiglclit declared that his majesty spoke by the exspectation of God's Spirit (comp. Baxter, Ch. Hist. of England, p. 559), and Bancroft that he was melted with joy, for that, since Christ's time, such a king had not been. When he drivelled they held up their hands in amaze at his wisdom. Indeed, it seems that "the two parties fully understood each other, and had criticised, with some degree of tact the ambitious designs of the prelates, and the prelates had sufficient learning, and sufficient knowledge of the theory of morals, to know that they were dealing with a dissembler and a fool. But it served their purposes to play into each other's hands. The king could put down Puritanism in the Church, and "harry all Brownists and Anabaptists out of the land, and the bishops, in their turn, could extol the supremacy of the monarch" (Skene). But, as if the ungenerous and ungracious action of the king had not yet reached the climax of his mischievous device, in the year following, and framed a new set of canons to insure conformity. "These laws—laws so far as the clergy are concerned—still delude the constitution and character of the English Episcopal Church. ... They are now little else than monuments of a past age of intolerance. The general disposition of the ecclesiastical establishments of the present day. Old bloodhounds of the Church, with their teeth drawn and their force exhausted, they are gazed at with as much contempt as they once excited fear" (Skene). Baxter (p. 563) says of these laws, "Some of them have become obsolete; but the Church of England still perseveres, and its toleration law, does not consist in the rule of his pledged obedience, although there may be cases in which attention to the...
with other innovations previously made since his accession to the throne of England, brought the Scottish Church—in government, in ceremonies, and in its position in relation to the civil power—very nearly to the model of the ecclesiastical establishment of England. Change, however, as the king might, the constitution and ordinances, which were without number made and again, public opinion by no means altered even for a moment, and the 19th century still finds Scotland true to her Puritanic notions of the 16th century. The king had succeeded in securing the adoption of the "five articles of Perth" (q.v.); he had succeeded in suppressing the Scotch Presbyterian Church, but he failed to conquer it.

In England, also, the shortsighted policy of James now brought distrust and discredit. The execution of Raleigh and the denial of assistance to the Protestant Bohemians, both sacrifices to the court of Spain, the latter even at the expense of his son-in-law, whom the Bohemians had chosen for their king, hardly justify Baxter in the statement that king James's object was the consolidation of the Protestant interests, and that his treatment of the Puritans was marked by a leniency strongly contrasted with the severity of a policy adopted by his predecessors, and naturally occasioning a difference of opinion as to its wisdom and propriety (p. 568). If toleration was the policy of James I, it did not manifest itself against the Independents, who, "after repeated and fruitless applications for toleration" (Baxter, p. 572), were not allowed to go to distant places where they could follow the dictates of their conscience. Certainly the state did not pay the expenses of these pilgrim fathers in 1619 because they were Puritans, but simply because they were likely to settle and to cultivate land otherwise almost worthless. In 1624 James was finally driven, both by the Independents of Parliament to his policy in seeking a closer alliance with Spain and by the clamor of the people for a war with that country, to dispatch an army into Germany to recover his son-in-law's possessions. But, as if his measure of tribulation was not yet full, this enterprise proved a total failure, and brought discredit upon the English name. The king also assumed a ridiculous attitude on the question of the observance of the Sabbath. Roman Catholicism is wont to look upon Sunday as a holiday; the Puritans, however, desired it observed as a Christian day of rest. To obviate those objections, the king fixed a "Book of Sports," advising the people that Sunday was not to be a day mainly for religious rest and worship, but of games and revels (Sketes, p. 47). See SABBATARIAN CONTROVERSY. This reign, so detrimental to the interests of the English and Scottish State and Church of Christ, were finally brought to a termination by the death of James, March 27, 1625. Severe as may have been some of the historians who have written the fate of this king, none can be said to have exaggerated the many despicable features of his character; and we need not wonder that his vacillating course towards his subjects, favoring first the Puritans, then the Episcopalians; tightening first the reins, and then loosening them against the Romanists—all inspired, not by the true spirit of toleration, but by artful designs, well enabled us to repeat of him Macaulay's judgment, that James I was "made up of two men—a witty, well-read scholar, who wrote, disposed, and harangued, and a nervous, drivelling idiot who acted."

James I was a voluminous writer, and, though he was far from deserving the surname which the flattery of his contemporaries accorded him, "Solomon the Second," he was certainly not wholly wanting in literary ability, and, had he pursued a literary life instead of governing a state, it is barely possible that he might have earned a much higher position among his fellow-beings. It brings to mind the prophetic utterance of his tutor, that James was better fitted to be a scholar than a ruler. The writings of James which deserve mention here are, Fruitful Meditation upon a part of the Revelation of St. John (Lond. 1598) — Dæmonologie, a dialogue in three books in defence of the belief in Witches (Lond. 1597, 4to); and yet the king withal hesitated not to punish his subjects for a like faith — Br.

Nicholas and — instructions to his son Henry (who died in 1619) in which James lays down his opinions on the power of the throne over the State and Church, and which, for the doctrines it contained on Church government, was censured as libellous by the Synod of St. Andrew's (Lond. 1599) — Tractatus Noii Triplex Cæsars, an apology for the oath of allegiance that James took to his Roman Catholic subjects, which was answered by cardinal Bellarmine, and produced a long controversy and many other publications on both sides, for an account of which, see a note by Dr. Birch in the Appendix to Harris's Life of James — Protostasia Antivestris, in qua re suam exponit sententiam de confederatarum ordinis effectis et actis in consu. A morose and melancholy disposition was published at Frankfurt-on-the-Main in folio in 1689. He is also said to have written a metrical version of the Psalms, completed up to the 81st Psalm (Oct. 1631, 12mo). James II of England and VII of Scotland, son of Charles I and Henrietta Maria, was born October 15, 1633. In 1645 he was created duke of York. In 1648, during the civil war which resulted in the deposition of his father, he made his escape to Holland, and thence to France, where his mother resided. The early education of the duke of York had, by the wish of his father, been intrusted to Protestants, but his mother, a bigoted Romanist, now improved her opportunity, and the prince was surrounded by Roman Catholic influences, and, to be more readily inclined to Popery, was assured that the unfortunate end of his father was due only to his strict adherence to Protestantism, and that no prince could hold the reins of government successfully who was not supported by Rome. In 1662 he entered the French army under general Turenne, and served in it until the peace concluded with Cromwell (Oct. 1655) obliged James to quit the territory of Louis XIV. He then was offered a position in the army of Spain, which he accepted. At the Restoration (May, 1660) he returned to England, and was immediately made admiral of the English fleet and actually engaged in the naval wars with Holland (1664-1672), which are generally supposed to have been instigated by this prince and his brother for the especial purpose of crushing the Dutch as a Protestant people, and to disable them from interfering with the re-establishment of popery in England, to which they themselves inclined, he twice commanded the English fleet, and was eminently successful. In 1660 he married Anne, daughter of lord chancellor Hyde, and the reason generally assigned for this act is that the lady was far gone with child when the marriage was completed; or else she lived only a few years (she died March 31, 1671), suffering, it is supposed, from neglect, if not the positive ill-usage of her husband, who, notwithstanding his professions of zeal for religion, indulged in a large share of the reigning licentiousness, and kept a mistress almost from the date of his marriage. A few months before her death the duchess had signed a declaration of her reconciliation to the ancient faith, in which James avowed his own adherence to the same, and publicly avowed his conversion to popery, an act which, although his concealed inclinations had been long suspected, did not fail to create a great sensation, especially as, from his brother's want of issue, he was now looked upon as Charles's probable successor. In 1668, in which the duke of York now stood among the English was further manifest by a second attempt to pass in Parliament a bill excluding him from the right of succession to the throne, which would have been successful had not Parliament suddenly been prorogued (May 27, 1679). In 1680 he returned again to England, but so great was the opposition towards him that Charles was obliged to send him down to govern Scotland (see above); in 1682 the duke of York now stood among the English was further manifest by a second attempt to pass in Parliament a bill excluding him from the right of succession to the throne, which again failed by another prorogation of the council of the nation. This time, no doubt, the effort was mainly the result of the despicable relation which the prince sustained towards the Meal-tub Plot, an attempt on the part of his co-religionists to counteract — and in this they were grievously disappointed — the effect of the Titus Oates plot discoveries. In 1682, when Charles was involved in difficulties with his concubine, the duke of York was suspected of having secret correspondence with her, and knowing so well how to make himself an indispensible counsellor of his brother, that, in spite of the Test Act, he became (much more than Charles himself) "the mainspring and director of the conduct of public affairs." It was the death of Charles II, Feb. 6, 1685, that the duke of York now stood among the English was further manifest by a second attempt to pass in Parliament a bill excluding him from the right of succession to the throne, which again failed by another prorogation of the council of the nation. It was the death of Charles II, Feb. 6, 1685, that the gagements to govern constitutionally, and heedless of ominous intimations which reached him, in the shape of addresses, that the religion of his subjects was dearer to them than their lives, he proceeded to carry out his projects with a recklessness amounting to infatuation" (Barlow, 1687, pp. 19-20). The king, James showed, says Hume (Hist. of England, Harper's edition, vi, 286), "that either he was not sincere in his professions of attachment to the laws, or that he entertained so lofty an idea of his own legal power that even his attachment to the laws was of little value to secure the liberties of the people." Not satisfied with his avowed confession of Romanism, he even made unnecessary and offensive displays of his religious principles, and thereby greatly wounded the pride of his subjects.

The mass was openly celebrated with great pomp at Westminster in Passion Week of this year (1687); an agent was sent to Rome to announce the king's submission to the so-called vicar of Christ; a close alliance was entered into with France; and it was even generally hinted that "the Church of England was in principle so closely allied to the Roman Catholic that it would not be difficult to prepare the way for the admission of the English into the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church", (comp. Sir John Dalrymple, Memoirs of Great Britain, Appendix, pt. i, p. 100-113; Fox, Hist. of early Part of the Reign of James II.)

All this, too, was done at a time when "there was among the English a strong conviction that the Papists were in league with the Papists of their religion were concerned, thought himself free from all the ordinary rules of morality; nay, that he thought it meritorious to violate those rules, if by so doing he could avert injury or reproach from the Church of which he was a member;" at a time when "Roman Catholic cassants of great eminence had written in defence of their religion, the doctrines of the Jesuits, and the attacks of the Papists" (comp. Macaulay, Hist. of England, Harper's edition, ii, 5 sq.). It was certainly sheer madness (and we need not wonder that the so-called successor of Peter even so declared it) to still further aggravate the opposition of his subjects by persecution for religious belief. Himself all too conscious of the land, shrewdly foreseeing, in the session complete toleration, which, after all, was only "natural and right", it seems simply preposterous to find him persecuting the Puritans. Almost immediately after his accession to the throne James II convoyed the Parliament of Scotland, where the majority of the population was firmly attached to the Presbyterian discipline, and where prelacy was abhorred as an unscriptural and as a foreign institution, and demanded new laws against the unruly Presbyterians, who already "closely associated the episcopal polity with all the evils produced by twenty-five years of corrupt and cruel maladministration, a slavish spirit, the Scottish Parliament compounded with the royal request, forbidding under the death penalty breach in any Presbyterian conventicle whatever, and even attendance on such a conventicle in the open air (May 6, 1685). A short time afterwards the Parliament of England was convoked (May 19), which, as readily as the Scottish, complied with the demands of the king, but, to his great sorrow, nevertheless evinced the possibility of opposition to popery, for which he was anxious to secure concessions. But while both Parliaments were thus acquiescing in the demands of the king, the countries were invaded, and this afforded the king a favorable pretext for the introduction of Romanists into the ranks of the army, in spite of the legal test of conformity to the Established Church which was required to be taken by every person filling any public office; and when, after a successful suppression of the insurrectionary attempts, the king reassembled Parliament, he not only extended the right of Roman Catholics would now be continued, but requested extra supplies for the increase of the army, evidently for the purpose of adding largely men of his own confession to the rank and file of the army; and when the people rise up and demand this right, the king peremptorily prorogued Parliament, after sitting but fourteen days, more than a week. James, however, was determined to continue the policy initiated, and ordered patents to be made out under the great seal for every Roman Catholic officer that he had appointed, and upon the same principle continued the benefit of some Protestant divines who claimed to have been converted to Romanism.

Quite different continued to be his dealings with the dissenters. Everywhere they were made to feel "the weight of the arm of the conqueror," especially in the provinces that had lately been subject to invasion, to which the Papists as well as the Papists claim, that dissenters had lent their aid. Thus were the Nonconformists ground between the Papists on the one hand and the High-Church clergy on the other, while the former made their advantage of the latter, concluding that when the dissenters were destroyed, or thoroughly exasperated, and the clergy were by themselves, they should be a match for the hierarchy, and capable of establishing that religion which they had been so long aiming to introducet' (Neale, Puritans, ii, 319).

Roman Catholic churches were everywhere opened, Jesuits and regular priests came in numbers from abroad, and the number of priests, even in the capital, grew. Westminster monasteries or churches were opened under their control in the English metropolis even, men were forbidden to speak disrespectfully of the king's religion, and all seemed turning in favor of Rome, when at length the eyes of the clergy of the State Church were opened, and they deemed it high time to preach against the difference of religious tendencies. An open rupture with the State Church had become inevitable; for the king, having been made acquainted with the position which the clergy of the Church of England had taken to recover the people, who were deserting their churches in numbers, and to rescue the Protestant religion from those to whom it had been forced, circular letters to the bishops, accompanying them with an order to prohibit the inferior clergy from preaching on the controverted points of religion. It could not be otherwise than that these persevering attempts of his against the established religion, as well as upon the law and upon the constitution, were eventually in the end successful, with the Episcopalian, to be productive of the most important consequences. Finding that to carry his schemes in favor of Romanism he must strengthen himself by the opponents of the State Church, he suddenly, in the beginning of April, 1687, published the famous Declaration of Indulgence, a paper at once suspending and dispensing with all the penal laws against dissenters, and all tests, including even the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, heretofore required of persons appointed to offices civil or military; but at the same time he repeated his promise, "already often repeated and often violated, that he would respect the Established Church and the enjoyment of her legal rights." At first the dissenters hailed the seeming approach of a new era, and great were the rejoicings in behalf of a declaration which secured them liberty of conscience, and threw open the doors of the public worship of God; but the king felt not a little encouraged at the course when addresses came to him from some of the dissenters (though they afterwards proved to have represented only a small faction; comp. Neale, Puritans, ii, 328). Emboldened, he immediately showed his predictions for his Church. The real power under the crown were put into the hands of Romanists. The earl of Castlemaine was at the same time publicly sent as ambassador extraordinary to Rome to express the king's obedience to the pope, and to effect the reconciliation of the kingdom with the "holy see." In return the pope sent a nuncio to England, who received the bishops during the reign, and was solemnly received at court, in the face of the act of Parliament declaring any communication with the pope to be high treason. Four Roman Catholic bishops were consecrated in the king's chapel, and sent to exercise the episcopal function, each in his particular diocese in Scotland and England, as well as in Ireland, offices of all kinds, both in the army and in the state, were now filled with Roman Catholics; even those of the ministers and others who had shown themselves disposed to go furthest along with the king were, on the same or very little, lost his favor, if they refused to conform to the ancient religion. At last James's "eye was delighted with the aspect of Catholicism imparted to his metropolis by the spectacle of monks traversing its streets in the habits of their respective orders, he was gratified by the presence of an Italian prelate, D'Adda, as nuncio, to whose address he entertained a sanguine hope of obtaining a Parliament elected under the new corporation charters, which should furnish a majority of his adherents, while the lords were to be swamped by a creation of peers compliant with his wishes. The Nonconformists, he calculated, would support the bishops. A long series of "the most important" and he was weak enough to imagine that his declaration of indulgence placed him in favorable contrast with the French monarch, to whose exiled Protestant subjects, since the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he had been induced by the spirit actuating the sovereigns of France and of Great Britain, in pursuance of common religions, in subservience to similar political objects (Baxter, Ch. Hist. p. 589). The dissenters, in particular, soon learned to comprehend the reality of the situation—that a league of the court and Romanism was dependent on their assistance for its success to overtend the Episcopalians and secure victory to popery; and when they did comprehend the scheme, "notwithstanding the renewed sufferings to which they might be exposed, they took part against it. . . . Independents, Baptists, and Quakers vied with each other in showing them by their action (clergy) their contempt of them—not even Penn (q. v.—was in favor of the toleration of Roman Catholicism. No man who valued the civil liberties of England dreamed of giving a foothold to the professors of that intolerant creed. Three generations had not sufficed to wipe out the memory of its curse on England. Thousands still living could recollect the Vaudois massacres, and the streets of London were at that moment crowded with sufferers from the revocation of the Edict of Nantes." (Skeat, p. 83). The Nonconformists, almost as a body, refused to recognize the act of indulgence, many of them by counsels because they saw in the encroachment against the laws a prerogative which, if not resisted, might lead ultimately to the establishment of popery as the religion of the state. But, whatever were the reasons of the dissenters, the attempt of the king to gain their support evinced a fallacy. He could not have been daily conversant with the event which the king had opened with the Church must soon reach a climax. An attempt had already been made to compel the University of Cambridge to confer a degree of master of arts on a Benedictine monk. This was not persevered in; but soon after, a vacancy having happened in the presidency of Magdalen College, Oxford, the vice-president and fellows were ordered by royal mandate to fill it up by the election of a person named Farmer, a late convert to popery (for whom was afterwards substituted Parker, bishop of Oxford, who avowed himself a Romanist at heart), and on their refusal were cited before an ecclesiastical commission and expelled. See Hucuot, Jons (1). Determined, if possible, to please the divines during the latter part of his reign, and to have no enemies among them, James evidently needed to carry out successfully his projects, James published, April 27, 1688, a second declaration of indulgence to dissenters, and commanded it to be read by the clergy immediately after divine service in all the churches of England. On this, Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, and his colleague in Scotland and England, as well as those in Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, and Trelawney of Bristol—met in the archbishop's palace at Lambeth, May 18, and drew up a petition to the king, representing their aver- sion to obey the order, for many reasons, and especially because the declaration was founded upon such a dispensing power as Parliament had often declared illegal. For this they were all, June 8, sent to the Tower, on the charge of publishing a false, fictitious, malicious, pernicious, and seditious libel. The history of the trial, and the verdict of it, June 29, 1688, which the nation approved, and which was hailed by the whole kingdom as a great national triumph, forms one of the most glowing passages in the splendid narra- tive of Macaulay (ii, 235). This defeat, however, in no degree checked for a moment the infatuated king. To satisfy the Episcopalians and his admirers, he appointed such of the judges, Powel and Holloway, who had appeared to favor the bishops; he issued orders to prosecute all those clergymen who had not read his declaration, that is, the whole Church of England, two hundred excepted; he sent a mandate to the new fellows whom he had ob- truded on Magdalen College to elect for president in the room of Parker, lately deceased, one Gifford, a doc- tor of the Sorbonne, and titular bishop of Madura; and he is even said to have nominated the same person to the see of Oxford. It was in the midst of this great contest with the Church that the nation that, James, a son was claimed to have been born to James, received, however, by the people with a strong suspicion that the child was supposititious, and that the queen had never been delivered or been pregnant at all. For this notion, however, it is now generally admitted that there was no such child; he was born, who, in all probability, would restore popery, in which, no doubt, he would be instructed from earliest infancy, turned the Protetants' eyes towards James's son-in-law, the prince of Orange, "for the deliverance of our country from the perils with which it was threatened. He was authorized by the king to come and bend the head of the king, educated and learned with consternation that his own son-in-law, in obedience to their call, was preparing to land upon his coasts." On the night of the same day on which the seven prelates of the English Church had been pronounced not guilty, an invitation was dispatched to Wil- liam, prince of Orange, signed by seven of the leading English politicians, to come over to England and occupy the throne. November 5, William landed at Torbay with 14,000 men. Vainly did James now attempt to regain his subjects' confidence by retracing his steps; but, on his return, he was received by his subjects with mingled surprise and disappointment, and, finding himself deserted not only by the nation, but even by his own children, he retired to France, where he was hospitably received by his co-re- ligionist and royal friend, Louis XIV, and obliged to live upon a pension settled upon him by the king of the Low Countries. Frequent allusions to these facts become daily more apparent than the means by which he died, "effecting a revolution (November, 1698) which has deserved the epithet of glorious, not less through its bloodless character than from its identification with those civil and religious liberties which it secured to every class of Englishmen." James, John, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Madison County, Tenn., October 19, 1832. He joined the Church at thirteen years of age, was admitted to the Preachers' College in 1852, and appointed to Carthage Circuit. He then removed first to Mount Vernon Circuit, next to Oceola Circuit, then to Fredericktown, and finally to Ozark Circuit. He died in the midst of the work in the fall of 1857.—Min. Assn. Conf. Jameson, Mrs. Anna, an English authoress, deserves our notice as the writer of a series of works on Christian art and archeology of most superior order. She was born in Dublin May 19, 1797, and was married in 1827 to Mr. Jameson, a barrister, but soon after separated from her husband, and devoted herself to literature. She died March 17, 1860. Her works of interest to us are, Sacred and Legendary Art (London, 1848, 8vo):—Legends of the Monastic Orders (1850);—Legends of the Madonna (1852):—Scriptural and Legendary History of our Lord, etc., as represented in Christian Arts (1860).

Jami is a Turkish name for the temples in which worship is performed on Fridays (the worship itself bearing the name of Jem-namaz), it being unlawful to use the lesser temples (mosques) on that day. The first Jami, called Sedalya (i.e. royal), being founded by a sultan, was built by Orhan the Second, sultan of the Turks, who began his reign in 1326.—Broughton, Bib. Hist. Sus., i, 501.

Jameson, John, D.D., a divine and philologist, was born at Glasgow, March 3, 1759. He became minister of the Anti-Burgher Secession Church in Scotland, was stationed first at Forfar (in 1781), and afterwards for forty-three years at Edinburgh. He died July 12, 1838. His principal works are, A Vindication of the Doctrines of Scripture and of the Priestly Faith concerning the Deity of Christ (Edinb., 1794, 2 vols. 8vo):—A drable and learned reply to Priestly history of early opinions:—An Alarm to Britain, or an Inquiry into the Causes of the rapid Progress of Infidelity (Perth, 1795, 12mo);—Sermons on the Heart (Edinb. 1789-90, 2 vols. 8vo);—The Use of Sacred History, confirming the Doctrine of Revelation (Edinb. 1802, 2 vols. 8vo):—An Historical Account of the ancient Cilicia of Iona, and of their Settlement in England, Scotland, and Ireland (Edinb. 1811, 4to), etc. His reputation, however, rests chiefly on his Eymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language (1808-1809), of which he published an abridgment in 1818, and to which he added a supplement in 1825. Janeway, Jacob J., D.D., a Presbyterian miners of note, was born in the city of New-York in 1774, and graduated at Columbia College in 1794. He joined the Presbyterians, but not the last years of his life at New Brunswick, N.J., where he died in 1858. Mr. Jane-way wrote quite extensively. His most important contributions are commentaries on Romans, Hebrews, and Acts (Philad. 8 vols. 18mo.);—Internal Evidence of the Holy Bible:—Review of Dr. Schaff on Protestantism, etc. See (Pha.) Preb. May. May. 1853.

Janeway, James, an English divine, was born in Hertfordshire, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1652 he left the State Church and set up a dissenting congregation (Presbyterian) at Rotherhithe. He died in 1674. Besides a life of his brother John (q. v.) and his sermons, he published The State’s Encouragement (1675, 8vo) — Token for Children (1676, 8vo, and often).—Heaven upon Earth (1677, 8vo). See Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 954; Hook, Eccles. Biog. vi. 276.

Janeway, John, a very pious and promising young man, was born at Lillie, Hertfordshire, in 1638, of religious parents, entered Cambridge at seventeen, and at eighteen was converted, in part by means of Baxter’s St. Paul’s. He now glowed for the salvation of souls, especially of those nearly related to him; secret prayer became his element. On leaving college, his father being dead, he went to live in the family of Dr. Cox, where his health sank under his studies and labors, and he finished his short course suddenly in June, 1657. His dying bed was a scene of triumph.—Middleton, Works, iii. 362.

Jangling, vain (μαθαιόν, frivolous or empty doors of the churches in time of divine service, and to make a distinction between the faithful and the cate-chumens, and communicated persons, and others not entitled to admission. See Door-keepers.

Janizaries (Jeni-taherî, “new soldiers”), a Turkish military force which was for some time recruited from Christian prisoners taken by the Turks, more especially during the Crusades. They were originated by the Osmanli Emir Orchan, about 1330, of young Christian prisoners, which, after having been distributed among the Turkish husbandmen in Asia, there to learn the Turkish language, religion, and manners, were compelled to embrace Mohammadianism. This treatment of Christian prisoners sprang from theMohammadian doctrine that “all children at their birth are naturally disposed to Islamism,” and they reasoned that, by enforcing the conversion of the young captives to the true faith, and enrolling them in the ranks of the army of the faithful, they were serving both their temporal and eternal interests. But after a time the recruiting of the Janizaries was also undertaken among the Christian subjects of the Mohammadians, and the execution of this terrible scheme inspired terror and consternation among the vanquished Christian populations of Asia Minor, Thrace, and Anatolia, where the new tax of flesh and blood on families severed the nearest and dearest connections. In the period of 300 years the custom to raise annually for this branch of the Turkish army no less than 1000 Christian youths; and it is estimated by Von Hammer that no less than 500,000 young Christians were thus converted into Mohammedan Turkish soldiers (compare Creasy, Hist. Ottoman Turks, 21 sq.). In the second half of the 17th century the old system of filling the ranks of the Janizaries exclusively with compulsory conscripts from the Christian subjects of the Turk was finally abandoned, as the many privileges which these soldiers enjoyed as body-guard of the sultan, etc., induced many young Turks to seek admiission to their body. There were two branches of Jani-zaries, one regularly organized, dwelling in barracks in Constantinople and a few other towns, and whose number at one time amounted to no less than 60,000, af-to 25,000; and the other composed of irregular troops, called Janjaks, scattered throughout all the towns of the empire, and amounting in number to 300,000 or 400,000. At the head of the whole Janizary force was the Aga, who held his appointment for life, and whose power was almost without limit. In times of peace they acted as a police force, and were sometimes employed by the Turkish army, and were noted for the wild impetuosity of their attack. But the many privileges which were bestowed on them soon began to make them very unruly — and their history abounds in conspiracies, assassinations of sultans, viziers, ages, etc., and atrocities of every kind; so that, by degrees, they became more dangerous to the country than any foreign enemies. Attempts to reform or dissolve them were always unsuccessful, till sultan Mahmoud II, in 1826, being opposed in some of his measures by them in Constantinople, displayed the flag of the Prophet, and succeeded in arousing on his own behalf the fanatic zeal of other portions of his troops. Their own aga deserted them, they were defeated, and their barracks burned, when 8000 of them perished in the flames. June 17, 1826, a proclamation announced the Janizaries forever abol-blished. Everywhere in the empire they were persecuted unheard of, innumerable. All these were repeated, and an equal number driven into exile.” See Frazer (the Rev. W. V.), Turkey, Ancient and Modern (London, 1854, 8vo), p. 406; Creasy, Hist. of Ottoman Turks, chiefly founded on Von Hammer (London, 1856, 2 vols. 8vo.);—Browning, Turkey;—Scull, Turkish History, i. 182 sq.;—Fowke, Turkey (R. E.);—J. E. R., Turkish Empire (London, 1862, 8vo). ch. xiii; Macfarland, Constantinople in 1828.

Jánova (Iavóv, prob. for Heb. יֶבֶש, yanah, frowishing, although no corresponding name occur in the O. T.), the father of Melche and son of Joseph, named as the sixth in ascent from Christ on his mother’s side (Luke iii. 24). B. C. cir. 200. See Genealogy or Christ.

Jannâm (Iavvīc, probably of Egyptian etymology [see below]). Jannes and Jambres are thought to have been two of the Egyptian magicians who attempted by their enchantments (בֶל, Exod. vii. 22, etc.; or בֶל, Exod. vii. 11, secret arts) to counteract the influence on Pharaoh’s mind of the miracles wrought by Moses (see Exod. vii. viii.). Their names occur nowhere else in the Old Testament (2 Tim. iii. 8, 9), where Paul says no more than that they “withstood Moses,” and that their folly in doing so became manifest (2 Tim. iii. 8, 9). He became acquainted with them, most probably, from an ancient Jewish tradition, or, as Theodoret expresses it, “from the unwritten teaching of the Jews.” They are found frequently in the Talmudic and Rabbinical writings.
but with some variations. Thus, for James we meet with Δαμασκόν, Damascus, and Δαμαςκοῦ, Damascus. Of these, the last three are forms of the Hebrew דמשק, which has led to the supposition that Ιαυνάγιν is a contracted form of the Greek Ιαυνάγινος. Some critics (Pfeiffer, Düb. ver. i, 253) consider these names to be of Egyptian origin, and in that case the Jewish writers must have been misled by a similarity of sound to adopt the forms above mentioned, as the Mishna (Sanhedr. 98, b; Chol. 19) has done in the case of other unhistorical proper names (Majus, Observat. sacr. ii, 42). For Jambres we find Ἀμμάθεια, Ammahiah, and in the Shalsheleh Hakkhobola (xiii, 2) the two names are given Ἀμμαθίαν, Ammathias, i. e. Johannes and Ambrosius! The Targum of Jonathan inserts them in Exod. vii, 11. The same writer also gives as a reason for Pharaoh's edict for the destruction of the Israelite male children that "this monarch had a dream in which the land of Egypt appeared in one scale and a lamb in another; that on awakening he sought for its interpretation from his wise men; whereupon Jannes and Jambres (יווחי, יוחים) said, "A son is to be born in the congregation of Israel who will desolate the whole land of Egypt." Several of the Jewish writers speak of Jannes and Jambres as the two sons of Balaam (Talmud, Jala. Rab. 14; Tikk. Nez. 52a, b), and assert that the two men were the youth (ьерех, Jerach. Shebitseh sekher) who went with him to the king of Moab (Numb. xxii, 21). Arabian tradition assigns them a place in Egyptian history (see the Asiatic Journal, 1845, No. 7, p. 78). Their graves were located in Egypt (Pallad. Lausiac. 20). The Pythian-gothic philosopher Numanus mentions these persons in a passage preserved by Eusebius (Prefatio Evangel. ix, 8), and in his Origen (c. Oris. iv, p. 386 ed. Sponer); also Pline (Hist. Nat. xxx, 1), and apparently Apuleius Apol. p. 94. The Arabs mention the names of several magicians who opposed Moses; among them is none resembling James and Jambres (D'Herbelot, s. v. Mousa ben Amran). There was an ancient apocryphal writing entitled Jannes and Mambre, which is referred to by Origen (in Matt. Comment. § 117; Opera, v, 29), and by Ambrosiaster, or Hilary the Deacon: it was condemned by pope Gelasius.

Jannes appears to be a transcription of the Egyptian name Ḥnḥn, which will be rendered herein as Jannes. It was given to members of two kings: one of the eleventh dynasty, the father or ancestor of Sereset I of the twelfth; the other, according to our arrangement, fourth or fifth king of the fifteenth dynasty, called by Manetho Ιαννας or Ιαννας (Josephus), or Ίαννας (Africanus). See Poole, Horæ Egyptianæ, p. 174, 175. There is also a king bearing the name Annu, whom we assign to the second dynasty (Hor. Ap. p. 101). The significations of Aïn is doubtful: the cognate word Aïnt means a valley or plain. The earlier king Aïn may be assigned to the 21st century B.C.; the latter is thought to have been the second precess of Joseph's Pharaoh. This shows that a name which may be reasonably supposed to be the original of James was in use at or near the period of the sojourn in Egypt. The names of the ancient Egyptians were extremely numerous, and very fluctuating in use; generally, the most prominent at any time were those of kings then reigning or not long dead.

Janning, Conrad, a Dutch theologian, was born at Groningen Nov. 16, 1650. He received his early education from his uncle, J. Tinka, a pastor at Groningen. As his parents were devoted Romanists, they were unwilling to have him educated at the Protestant university of his native city. He was therefore sent to a Jesuit College in Westphalia, and afterwards to Antwerp. In 1679 he was associated with the Bolandists in the gigantic labors of preparing the Acta Synodalia, and in 1681 he visited Rome, where he completed his theological studies. In Rome and throughout Italy, and on his whole route, he collected materials for the above-named work. He returned to Antwerp in 1688, but soon made another tour, visiting different cities of Germany and the Netherlands, in the quest of further materials. In 1697 he again went to Rome, and rendered important service in the work to which his life was devoted. To his indefatigable labors this stupendous task is under very great obligations, as thirteen volumes are ascribed to his pen. Different judgments may be formed of this work. Prof. H. de Groot, of the Groningen University, a man of eminent attainments in Church History, and distinguished by his writings in this department, thus speaks of the work of the Bolandists: "With many fables and worthless legends, they communicate a great number of important biographies, which are generally well written, and in the earlier portions, for the most part, also with impartiality. For a knowledge of Church History in the primitive times, and, above all, in the Middle Ages, both the lives and the elucidations are often of inestimable value." Augustinus died on August 22, 1698. After his death his scholars continued the work, and published it under the title: Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland, ii, 159 sq.; Geschiedenis der Christelĳke Kerk, by Profs. De Groot, Ter Haar, Kist, Moll, etc., v, 84. (J. P. W.)

Janoah (Heb. Yano'ah, יָנֹאַח, rest; 2 Kings xv, 29; Sept. Ιαονᾶ, Ιαονᾶ, Iao'naos; but in Josh. vi, 6, 7 with יאון, Yano'ah, יָנֹאַח, Ιαονᾶ, to Janoah; Sept. 'Iao'nos v. Ιαονᾶ, Ιαονᾶ, or even Ιαονᾶς; Vulg. Janos; A. V. "Janoah"), the name probably of two places.

1. A town on the N.E. border of Ephraim (see Keil and Delitzsch, Comment. on Joshua, etc., p. 177, Clarke's ed.), and consequently in or near the Jordan valley (Josh. xvi, 6, 7). Euseb. and Jerome state that in their time it was still a village in the district of Acrabatine, twelve miles east of Neapolis, the ancient Sichem (Onomasticon s. v. Ιαονᾶ, Iaon). About three and a half hours (12 miles) east of Nabali, a name that was a thing in the little village of Ιανουίν, situated in a vale which descends the eastern slope of the mountains of Ephraim to the Jordan. The village is now mostly in ruins, but it has a few houses inhabited, and its ancient remains are extensive and interesting. Entire houses and walls are still existing, but covered with immense heaps of earth and rubbish. The dwellings of the present inhabitants are built upon and between the dwellings of the ancient Janoah" (Van de Velde, Travels, ii, 308). Janoah being situated on the side of the mountain range, the border "went down" to Araroth, which lay in the valley of the Jordan. About a mile up the vale of Janoah is a little fountain, and on a hill above it the protruse ruins of another ancient town which is now called Khirbet Ιανουίν ("ruined Ιανουίν") (Robinson, B. ii, iii, 287).

2. A town of Northern Palestine, situated apparently between Abel-beth-Maacha and Kedesh, and within the boundaries of Naphtali. It is mentioned in several other cities, on the first invasion of Palestine by Tho-

Pfleger, king of Assyria (2 Kings xv, 29). It is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome, but they strangely confounded it with Janoah, a town of Ephraim (Onomasticon, s. v. Janon), and in this they are followed by Reland (Palaestina, sb. 39), and usually by Schmerling, Schmar- Pelat, p. 147), and others. The modern village of Ιανουίν, which stands on the brow of a mountain between Abel and Kedesh, and which contains the massive ruins of a large and strong castle, would answer to the situation, and the names have some slight radical affinity. For a description of Hunt, see Porter, Handbook fo

Syria and Palestine, p. 444.—Kitto, s. v. A ruin called Yanah, on a hill S.W. of Haddata (Robinson, Later Researches, p.58), seems by its name to have more correspondence to Janoah than Hinnun; but it lies in the centre of Gentile Galilee, and Tiggæo-Philip's march seems rather to have followed the hills along the Huleh plain.—Van de Velde, Memoir, p.924.

JANOW, Matthias von, one of the most celebrated reformers before the Reformation, and one of the three diagrams of all religious historians of Huss [see WALDHAUSEN and MÍLICEK] on whose teachings in their day, more than on all the territorial agrandizements of the German empire, the most important results of the latter half of the 14th century were staked (Gillet, Huss, i, 37), was the son of a Bohemian knight. Of the early history of Matthias we know but very little. He was educated at the University of Prague, where he was a zealous disciple of Milíček (q. v.), and he is often called Magister Parisiensis, because he spent six years at the University of Paris, and obtained his master's degree there. He travelled extensively, and no doubt attained great popularity as a preacher, when quite young. He was ambitious to secure some prominent position, and succeeded; on a visit to Rome in 1386, in obtaining the appointment of prebendary at Prague, and confessor of Charles IV. He entered upon the duties of this office Oct. 12, 1384, and continued therein until his death, Nov. 30, 1389. The writings of Janow does not seem to have been a very eloquent preacher, but he certainly a man of very earnest and deep piety, zealous for his Master's cause, anxious to purify the Church from the evils and corruptions which then threatened the extinction of the religious feeling; and hence his small may have been his influence in the pulpit, "It was more than compensated by the influence he exerted through his writings, and by his scientific exposition of principles. In his works we may find not only the reformatory ideas which passed over from him to Huss, but also the inceptive germ of those Christian principles which at a later period were unfolded in Germany by Luther, although the latter never came under the influence of Matthias of Janow" (Neander, Ch. Hist., v, 192).

In his earlier period of life, disgusted with that spiritual pride and contempt of the laity which characterized the priesthood of the 14th and 15th centuries, he was impressed by Milíček's ideas of the universal priesthood of all Christians, more especially after he had been placed in the confessional, where he had great opportunity to inform himself more minutely of the good or bad in all classes of society, and of the religious wants of the people. This may be clearly seen not only from his own narrative of the change which he experienced (see Neander, Ch. Hist., v, 194 sq.; Gillett, Huss, i, 28 sq.), but also from his writings, collected under the title of De regulis Véteris et Noot Testament, of which, unfortunately, the greater part still remains in MS. form (for extracts, see Jordon, Verkäfer d. Husitelehums in Böhmen [Lpz. 1846]).

Presel, in Herzog, s. v., says that the work might more appropriately have been entitled Inquiries concerning true and false Christianity. "It is chiefly taken up with reflections on the history of the times, and hints concerning the future, based on the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments, on the prophetical elements which they contain. Although there is a great deal in the details which is arbitrary, particularly in the apocalyptic calculations, yet grand prophetic glances into the future are also to be found. He portrays the utter corruption of the Church in its parts, and explains the causes of it" (Neander). The main object of the work, however, was the rejection of the authority of human traditions, and the substitution in their stead of the supreme authority of the divine Word. He tries everything by this test. The conduct of the bishops and the priests is severely arraigned. The antichrist, he asserts, has already come. He is neither Jew, Pagan, Saracen, nor worldly tyrant persecuting Christendom, but the man who opposes Christian truth and the Christian life in the way of deception; he is and will be the most wicked Christian, falsely styling himself by that name, assuming the highest station in the Church, and possessing the highest consecration, according domination over all ecclesiastics and laymen; one who, by the working of Satan, knows how to make subservient to his own ends and to his own will the corporations of the rich and wise in the entire Church; one who has the preponderance in honors and privileges of the rich and mighty in the Church, if we consider both the properties of Christ, the Holy Scriptures, the sacraments, and all that belongs to the hopes of religion, to his own aggrandizement and to the gratification of his own passions; deceitfully perverting spiritual things to carnal ends, and in a sly and subtle manner employing what was designed for the salvation of a Christian people, he means to lead them astray from the truth and power of Christ (Neander, v, 196 sq.; Gillett, p. 30 sq.). It is apparent, from the tenor of Janow's writings, that he took higher ground than the other Hussite forerunners, Waldhausen and Milíček—the earliest Bohemian reformers—though he stood in true tradition. He was not ambitious to attain to the priesthood only, but to the laity also belonged the communion of both kinds; not to the popes only, who had haughtily exalted themselves, belonged the right to govern, but all bishops should state the same privileges; in short, his idea was that the organim of the Church is one in which all the members should be connected according to their several ranks, and co-operate together like the head and members in the human body (comp. Reichel, See of Rome in the Middle Ages, p. 600). We need not wonder that Janow, although he did not suffer the punishment of a heretic, was not long permitted to cast abroad seeds which must result in the overthrow of the papal hierarchy, and the removal of many strong barriers which protected the priesthood in those days of darkness and of sin. Having urged upon the monks the need of the reform, and given the points of his system as impressed by his own narrative of the change which he experienced, he writes, "At last remains for us to demonstrate how that Reformation by the overthrow of the antichrist himself to lift up our heads and see our redemption near." Sixteen years after his death (1410), his writings, it is generally admitted, were committed to the flames, together with those of Wickliffe. Jansen or Janssenius, Cornelius (I.), a distinguished Belgian theologian, was born at Hulb in 1510. He studied theology in Brussels, and acquired at the same time a thorough knowledge of Greek and Hebrew. In 1558 he went to Tongerlo as professor of theology, and became successively curate of St. Martin at Courtray in 1550, dean of the theological faculty of Louvain in 1562, and was soon after sent by Philip II to the Council of Trent. On his return to the Netherlands he was made bishop of Ghent in 1568. He died April 10, 1576. His works on Scripture enjoyed great reputation. He wrote Concordia Evangeltica et ejusdem Concordiae ratio (Louvain, 1549, 8vo)—Para-phrase in one volume (Louvain, 1549, 8vo)—Commentaries in Opera Omnia (Louvain, 1549, 8vo).

Jansenius Cornelius (2), a celebrated Dutch divine and founder of the Jansenists, born at Accoy, near Paris, in 1585, was the hibit, or natural nephew, of the above Cornelius Jansen, the Bp. of Ghent. He received his early education at Utrecht, and in 1602 entered the university at Louvain as a student of philology and theology. While at this high-school he seems to have made an acquaintance with the Frenchman, Jean Baptiste Duvergier (q. v.), de Hauranne, generally known by the name of St. Cyr. “Both he (i.e. Cyr) and Jansenius were there brought into contact with some who in secret cherished the doctrines of grace although in the communion of Rome, and thus they reduced everything to a relative and utilitarian basis, which was uniformly held in the Church. There also they both saw and felt the evil workings of the Jesuits; they marked the inroads which that system was making on all doctrinal truth and practical morality.”

But Jansenius's serious industry brought on sickness, and he was ordered to retire to the mission of Büsau. While thus engaged, he had imbibed a strong dislike to the lax views of theology and morality advocated by the Jesuits. Jansenius took the ground, in opposing the Jesuits, that life stands in the closest relation to practical doctrinal precepts. He thought it impossible to attain true spiritual life and grace, and live the full and abundant life of our Lord, while at the same time, which alone inculcates true humility. On the ground that pride was the cause of the fall, he sought to destroy all feeling of individual power, giving up human free agency to divine grace, and declaring human nature to be thoroughly corrupt, and unable by itself to do any good. While he believes these to have been the doctrines of Augustine himself, yet, as an obedient son of the Church of Rome, which, while he was anxious to purge her from the Pelagianism of the Jesuits, he dearly loved, he in his will, written half an hour before his death, said, “I have not published the Auggustinis, I fear that it would be difficult to make any changes in it; yet, should the Holy See require such, remember that I am an obedient son, and willing to submit to the Church in which I have lived till death.”

The Augustinis is divided into three parts. In the first Jansenius gives a historical account of Pelagianism, which hereby exalted the power of free-agency, and denied the original depravity of human nature, and consequently, original sin. In the second part the writer sets forth the views of St. Augustine on human nature, both in its state of primitive purity and in its state of degradation after the fall. In the third part, finally, he presents the ideas of St. Augustine touching grace, by which Christ redeems us from our fallen state, also the predestination of men and angels. The fundamental proposition of the work is that, “since the fall of Adam, free-agency exists no longer in man, pure works are a mere gratuitous gift of God, and the predestination of the elect is not an effect of his presence, but a free volition.”

This, it will be perceived, is a close reproduction of the views presented by Calvin in the preceding century. Such principles were, of course, in direct opposition with those advocated in Spain and Holland by the Jesuits Molina and Lessius, who wished to conciliate the loyalty of the Counter-reformation and retain a certain amount of human free-agency. Jansenius, besides, had personally incurred the hatred of the “Order of Jesus” by causing the Jesuits to be excluded as professors from the University of Louvain; and, though the work had failed to excite much attention, the Jesuits were determined now to be revenged on their enemy. The Augustinis thus became the occasion of a theological controversy by far the most important in its doctrinal, social, and even political results which has agitated the Roman Catholic Church since the great Reformation of the 16th century. The whole weight of the order of the Jesuits having been brought into play to cause the condemnation of a work at Rome, and speedily done by Pope Urban VIII, in his bull In eminenti, March 6, 1642. "So decisive a point would not have been gained by the Jesuits had they not succeeded in directing the attention of the papal court to a passage in which Jansenius brought forward a statement of St. Augustine's permissibilistic doctrine, although not at the same point, (without reference, of course, to that father) he had been condemned at Rome. This was an inroad on papal infallibility, and this caused the rejection of the work." But if the book of Jansenius had failed to excite much attention, the issuing of a bull against its use, and all this at the instigation of the Jesuits, provoked no little interest. Especially strong was the opposition against the bull in Belgium and in France, and many were the partisans thus secured for the Augustinian, a number of whom—perhaps even the most—were animated, in all like Saint-Sulpice, by doctrinal predilection that ran by an antipathy to the laxity of the moral teachings of the Jesuits, with which the opposition to the Augustinian was, of course, always identified. The very strongest of the partisans of the Augustinian were the recluses of Port-Royal (q. v.), a celebrated association of scholars and divines, and that of Port-Royal, that figured some of the greatest names in the Church of France of the 17th century. One of these, Antoine Arnauld (q. v.), in 1643 published his De la frequente Communion, based on the predestination doctrine of Augustine and Jansenius, and thereby heaped more live coals on the heads of the now already much-maligned Jesuit order. The former the Dominicans in different countries divided in opinion, those of Spain and Italy enlisting on the side of the Jansenists (as the advocates of the Augustinian came by this time to be called), those of France siding with the Jesuits. Even the Sorbonne, of whom Arnauld was a member, was divided; and, after an earnest strife between the contending parties, had waged in France for some time, both decided in 1651 to carry it to Rome, and plead their cause before the infallible judge. In 1649, Cornel Synder, of the theological faculty at Paris, at the instigation of the Jesuits, made a communication to the court of the Sorbonne, and the propositions, and had admitted them to the Sorbonne as forming the substance of Jansenius's work. These the Jesuits now presented at Rome, satisfied that if they could only once obtain the condemnation of these as heretical, the fall of Jansenism was of course secured. On March 19th, 1651, the Jesuits finally succeeded in their end, and Innocent X, in his bull Cum occasione, at the instigation of his cardinal Chigi, condemned the five propositions, which had been most couched in somewhat ambiguous language, so as to admit of very different explanations, the object of the Jesuits being to procure their condemnation in any sense or in any form. They are as follows: (1) That there are divine commands which virtuous and pious persons, though they would gladly perform the same, cannot possibly obey, because God has not given them that measure of grace which is absolutely necessary to enable them to render such service. (2) That one in the state of nature can resist the influence of divine grace when it operates on the heart. (3) That, in order to make the actions of men meritorious, it is not necessary that they be free from necessity, but only from restraint. (4) That the semi-Pelagians greatly err when they affirm that the will of man has power to receive or to resist the influence of prevenient grace. (5) That they are semi-Pelagians who assert that Jesus Christ, by his passion and death, made an atonement for the sins of all men. The pope pronounced the first and the last proposition condemned, and blaspheous, and his edict was followed that of the other three simply heretical. The friends and adherents of Jansenius admitted the propriety and justice of condemning these propositions, but maintained that they were not found in the work of Jansenius.

France was at this time at enmity with Rome, and cardinal Mazarin, though but little interested in these theological questions, believed this a favorable opportunity to magnify the importance of the case, and defend him with account of his arrest of cardinal Retz (q. v.). He held an assembly at the Louvre, March 26, 1654, in which thirty-eight bishops took part, and which declared that the pope's decision should be considered as applying positively to Jansenius's doctrine, since all who held in any way to the condemned propositions should be dealt with as heretics. This decision was communicated to the heads of all the dioceses throughout France, and approved by the pope September 29. In January, 1660, the Sorbonne also took direct action against the Jansenists by condemning two letters of Arnauld, in which the determined that he could not find the five condemned propositions in Jansenius's writings. He also hit upon an expedient which not only rendered the bull for a time harmless, but which initiated a new movement against the doctrine of papal infallibility. "True," he said, "the see of Rome does not have the faculty to decide with respect to doctrine, and every good Catholic must submit to its decree; but the Holy See may misapprehend fact (as in the papal condemnation of Galileo's theory of planetary movement), whether a book contains certain statements or not. They may be the highest names of the church at their disposal. Let the five propositions be heretical, yet, with the exception of the first, they are to be found neither in letter nor in spirit in the writings of Jansen. Thus arose the celebrated distinction of de facto and de jure.

The Sorbonne now demanded of Arnauld that he should discontinue his opposition to the church authorities in different countries. He, and sixty others with him, still refusing to submit, were expelled from the theological faculty. A general assembly of the clergy was also convened in September of this year, and the following formula was adopted on the motion of De Marcq, archbishop of Tou-

It is generally agreed that the decision of the five propositions of Cornelius Jansenius, contained in his book entitled Augustinianum, and which the pope and bishops have condemned, said doctrine not being that of St. Augustine, whom Jansenius has explained wrong-that every noble and scholar should be removed from Port-Royal. This sharpened the pen of Pascal, and forth came the eighteen famous Provincial Letters (Lettres à des provinciaux). "In these remarkable letters the author showed with extraordinary force how narrow the question really was—whether five propositions in the Augustinians or not, when no one had there pointed them out. The Jesuits, by the provisions of their constitution, received a reprimand for the condemnation of Dr. Arnauld had been obtained; and, besides touching on doctrinal points which were involved, he firmly and manfully attacked the shameless casuistry of the Jesuits. These letters had a wonderful efficiency, for their power was felt even by those who had not read them. The Jesuits, in their turn, started a reply, and the controversy became more obvious. Voltaire has said that in wit the earlier of them were not excelled by the comedies of Molière, while the latter rivalled the productions of Bossuet in eloquence; in fact, that they constituted an epoch in French literature. Says Hallam (Introd. Literature of Europe, Harri-er's edition, ii, 335): "These letters did more to ruin the name of Jesuit than all the controversies of Protestantism, or all the fulminations of the Parliament of Paris." "All Europe," says Macaulay (History of Eng-lnd, ii, 46), "read, admired, and laughed. But only to have shed even among high dignitaries of the Church of St. Peter's chair staggered and reeled under the sudden attack, and, as a set-off for it, cardinal Chigi, now Alexander VII, not only confirmed the position of his predecessor, and again declared that the five propositions were contained de facto in Augustinis, but, imitation, to all such authorities, accompanied it by the requisition that every one holding a spiritual office in the Church of Rome should abjure these errors by subscribing a formula prescribed for that purpose. This inquisitive and oppressive act subjected the Jansenists to still severer persecutions, and continued the heated controversy, in which impartiality on both sides was unenlileged. A great point was made by the Jesuits of the infallibility question. See INFALLIBILITY. But, as the controversy continued, it took a wider range, and came to embrace such topics as the rights of the bishops as co-contradistinquished from those of the pope, the critical views of theology and morality, all ably censured by Pascal, as we have already seen; the vast and alarming power of the Jesuits, and even many usages of the Church of Rome. The opposition, which thus far had seemed to come mainly from Port-Royal recluses, was found to have spread among high dignitaries of the Church: four bishops refused to sign the formulary which Rome dictated, and many others of this high position in France took the ground of "respectful silence." In 1688 king Louis succeeded in obtaining the sanction of Rome for a compromise, substantially on the basis of Arnauld's distinction de facto and de jure, and of respectfu-silence.

"Jansenistic principles now came far more wide-diffused. The authorities of the Church of Rome thought a Jansenist was not necessarily a heretic; the schools of Port-Royal flourished even more than before the persecution, and impudence on both sides was increased. The incumbents of the papal chair even became one of her recluses, and Racine one of her students. The incursions of the papal chair even became the friends of Port-Royal, and obtained no little aid from it in their opposition to the Jesuits, which Inner XI more successfully extirpated. The Jesuits were exasperated the Jesuits more than ever, and the great friend and protector of Jansenism at court, the duchces of Longueville, having died, they succeeded in gainning over Louis XIV, who, it is said, "abhorring Jansen-ism quite as much as he abhorred Protestantism, and very much more than he abhorred atheism," had abstained from open violence only at the instance of the duchess of Longueville. An edict was issued forbiddng the admission of new members to Port-Royal, and the recluses were ordered to "quit the valley of Port-Royal at once and forever," while Dr. Arnauld, the principal supporter of Jansenism, was obliged to flee from France, and to seek a refuge in the Low Countries, where he died in 1699. His brother and last personal disciple of Cyrn died in 1695. In the same and the following year passed away also the great supports of Jansenism, and it was already whispered among the Jesuits and at the French court that the heretical movement had been successfully eradicated, when suddenly the crippled Jansenism received a fresh start. A republic of Jansenists was organized at the university of Paris, P. Quensel, a man of learning, zeal, and spirituality of mind, had published the New Testament with annotations which were of a practical and edifying character, but strongly tinged with Jansenistic doctrines. It had been published in successive portions from 1671 to 1687. It had not been seen at first with much approbation. The Sorbonne had approved it; pope Clement XI had commended it; François Harlé, archbishop of Paris, an avowed enemy of the Jansenists, had expressed his approbation of it; Louis Antoine de Noël's, bishop of Chartres, subsequently archbishop of Paris, and finally a cardinal, who was then a zealous advocate of the Jansenistic doctrines, had even taken the work under his special protection, and enj oined its perusal in a diocese. It had been and still was eagerly read, and had already passed through many editions. Another edition in 1675 was followed by the publication of the thirteenth in 1679. In 1690 a new work by Quensel, which was published under the title of Le nouveau Testament en Francais, avec des refexions morales sur chaque vers, pour en rendre la lecture plus utile, et la meditation plus aisée. The author had never signed the five propositions, and his confessor now put the question to the Sorbonne "whether it might not be said that the spiritual person who had done no more than maintain the 'reverential silence,' as some of the bishops had done," and the reply from the Sorbonne came that, with regard to points of fact, respectful obedience was sufficient obedience. But hardly had the cas de conscience, as it is technically termed, become a question, when, in 1705, when pope Clement XI condemned it in the most severe terms (Feb. 12, 1703), and complained to the king of those who so thoughtlessly stirred up the old contro-v.ey. Finally, the bull Unam Dominii (July 15, 1703), renewed and renewed the preceding condemnation of the five propositions. This bull was accepted by the assembly of the clergy, and registered in Parliament. But with it the Jesuits were by no means quieted. They desired complete victory. Another edition of Quensel's Reflexions morales having become necessary, the exemption of the Port-Royalists, which made it one of their duties to distribute it freely among the people, they determined that it also should be suppressed. They persevered in their efforts to secure the condemnation of the work by the papal see until at last success crowned their undertaking. In 1708 Clement XI pronounced against it, and in 1712 it was prohibited by a papal edict as "a text-book of undisguised Jansenism." By this time the king of France (Louis XIV) and the Jesuits were in league together, and we need not wonder that the Jan-senists, as opponents of the Jesuits, were severely dealt with. Indeed, it is asserted that this bull, as well as many others that were issued about this time in Rome, and aiming at the French Church, were one and all dictated in Paris. Says Tregelles (Jansenists, p. 38), "The king and the Jesuits procured whatever bulls they wanted commissioned from the pope. They then did everything to set forth the Jansenist heresy, they were returned from Paris to Rome with corrections and alterations, to which the pope acceded." No wonder, then, that the bull of 1712 was in 1713 followed by another still severer, famous as the bull Unigenitus, by which were condemned all of the writings of Quensel, and all that had ever been or might ever be written in their defence. It also singled out 101 propositions from the works of Quensel "as false, captious, evil sounding, offensive to pious ears, scandalous, pernicious, rash, and injurious to the Church and its customs; contumelious, not against the Church merely, but also against the secular authorities; seditious, impious, blasphematic, suspected of heresy, and also savoring of heresy itself; also favoring heresies; heresies, and schism, erroneous, nearly allied to heresy, often condemned; and, furthermore, also heretical; and sundry heresies, especially those contained in the well-known propositions of Jansenius, and that, too, in the sense in which those were supposed by the bull to be espoused. The bull did not specify what the propositions belonged severally to each of those heads of condemnation. "This was the triumph of doctrinal Jesuitism: Le Tellier, the king's Jesuit confesser, arranged the terms of the bull. It seemed as if every feeling of piety towards God, and every sentiment of his grace, were extinguished throughout the Papal Church—as if all who adhered to all to many doctrines that had been regarded as orthodox were to have their feelings and their consciences outraged." But the Gallican clergy was by no means agreed as to the acceptance of the bull, although the Jesuits earnestly pressed it. Some were in favor of its unconditional acceptance, others desired to make a qualifying declaration, and still others wished the qualification to be made by the pope himself. After much dispute, the king himself decided the matter by making submission to the bull binding in Church and State. France, having handed over, in his new edicts, relating to the controversy which this famous bull provoked, are found in the great Parisian library.

The death of Louis XIV left the fate of Jansenism still unsettled, while it also caused a relaxation of the repressive measures. The regent, due to the state of Orleans was urged to refer the whole controversy to a national council, and the leaders of the Jansenist party appeared to a general council. The Jansenist party thus formed, which numbered four bishops and many inferior ecclesiastics, were called, from this circumstance, the Appellants (q. v.); the representatives of the pope, and a change in the policy of the regent, brought the Appellants into disfavor. Even the Parliament of Paris was forced to submit, and registered the papal bull in a lit de justice (June 4, 1720), although with a reservation in favor of the liberties of the Gallican Church. The Appellants for the most part submitted, the recusants being visited with severe penalties; and, on the accession of the new king, Louis XV, the unconditional acceptance of the bull was at length formally accomplished, so far as the general public were concerned. From this time forward the Jansenists were rigorously repressed, and their great stronghold, the University of Paris, having been already, in 1766, 11, destroyed by convivances of the king and the Jesuits, a large number emigrated to the Netherlands, where they formed a community, with Utrecht as a centre. (See below, Jansenists in Holland.)

"During the eighteenth century Jansenism degenerated in France. In 1727 Francois de Paris died, and was buried in the cemetery of St. Medard, in Paris. He was of an honorable family, and had early shown a religious turn of mind. His patrimony he bestowed upon the poor, and earned his livelihood by weaving hose. In 1720, at the age of thirty, he was made dean of St. Medard, Cardinal de Noailles would gladly have invested him with a higher office, but he declined. In 1722 he resigned his deaconship, and retired to a wilderness. He soon returned to Paris, where he lived in seclusion and poverty, denying himself the ordinary comforts of life, and comprehending the joy of poverty. In 1728, a magnificent monument was erected to his memory by his brother, a member of the French Parliament, who subsequently renounced his worldly position and property, and lived a life of seclusion and asceticism. To the grave of Francois de Paris multitudes flocked. There, in various ways, they testified their superstitious regard and veneration, and there marvellous cures were claimed to be wrought and miracles said to be performed. Strong religious emotions were manifested, and some were seized with convulsions. Some were favored with the spirit of prophecy, and predicted the overthrow of Church and State. Such predictions were heard until within a short time previous to, and even during the revolution of 1789. As late as 1840 multitudes of religious pilgrims still resolved to the spot, on the anniversary of his death, and crowned with garlands the grave of De Paris. The superstition and fanaticism which prevailed at his grave soon after his death were not wholly confined to the community of believers, but were shared by a considerable and a body of men of learning and rank. Those of the latter class who made themselves most conspicuous were Hieronymus N. de Paris, the parliamentary member just alluded to; C. Folard, widely and favorably known by his observations on the history of Polybius; and Louis Be

cesses to which Jansenism had gone in France for a time darkened its prospects of ultimate success, it must be conceded, even by Roman Catholics of the most ultramontane class, that Jansenists in the 16th and 19th centuries preserved "a pure and unalloyed doctrine of the purity of morals and a deeper faith" than their opponents the Jesuits, who for the last 200 years have appeared in behalf of the infallibility of the pope only to strengthen and to preserve their own existence as an order. It was this characteristic feature of the Jansenists (as of the evangelical doctrine) the way for them. When persecution had driven them from France, "we find traces of them in Vienna and in Brussels, in Spain and in Portugal, and in every part of Italy" (Ranke, Hist. Papacy, London, 1851, ii, 293). Everywhere they now disseminated their doctrines, but it is especially in Regulorum Holland that the sect has been most successful, and has maintained itself to our own day. In the days of Philip II of Spain, Utrecht had been raised to the dignity of an archiepiscopal see (A.D. 1557). The other United Provinces, on throwing off the Spanish shackles, became Calvinists, but Utrecht and Haarlem continued faithful to the Roman hierarchy. To this part of a country, where the evangelical life had taught even the Roman Catholic communist a spirit of toleration, the Jansenists directed their steps, and it is here alone that they still appear as a definite, tangible body. Their organization in Holland dates partly from the forced emigration of the Jansenists under King Louis XIV, and partly from the controversy about Queen at the opening of the last century; but their success as an independent sect (if we may thus style adherents of the Roman Catholic communion, but defenders of the evangelical doctrine) dates from the day when the vicar apostolic, Peter Codde, an intimate friend of Arnauld, was suspended by Clement XI in 1702 from his position on account of his firm adherence to Jansenist principles, was allured to Rome, treacherously detained there for three years in defiance of all canons and laws, and then, when the chosen of God, the friend of the Jesuits (so a Jesuit sometimes designates himself), appeared in his stead. The chapter of Utrecht, thus deprived of the man of their choice, refused to acknowledge the new vicar named in Codde's place, and angrily joined themselves to the Appellant party in the French hierarchy. To government of Holland also interfered in 1708, suspended the operation of the papal bull, and deprived De Cock of the archbishopric. Codde, on his return, did all that he could to repair the injuries sustained by the Jansenists during the incumbency of De Cock, who had made many converts, and who was ever the champion of thirty years' standing, of their living, and had approved his Jesuitical friends instead. At length, in 1725, they elected an archbishop, Cornelius Steenloven, for whom the form of episcopal consecration was obtained from the French bishop Vorlet (titular of Babylon), who had been suspended for Jansenist opinions. A later Jansenist archbishop of Utrecht, Meindarts, established in 1742 Haarlem and in 1758 Deventer as his suffragan sees; and in 1763 a synod was held, which sent its acts to Rome, in recognition of the primacy of that see, in which the Church of Utrecht expressed its inalienable right. Since that time the formal succession has been maintained, each bishop, on being appointed, notifying the pope of his election, and craving confirmation. The popes, however, have uniformly rejected all advances, except on the condition of the acceptance of the bull Unigenitus. In 1789 the Holy See refused to comply with this demand, and have even refused to be bought over to the Church of Rome, as was attempted in 1828. The recent act of the Roman see in defining as of catholic faith the dogma of the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin Mary has been the occasion of a new persecution, in which the Jansenists enlighten us, and work his will in us. We sign ourselves, with veneration, very holy father, the humble servants of your holiness." Then follow the signatures of the metropolitan archbishop and the two bishops. This letter, dated Sept. 6, 1856, is accompanied by a pastoral exhortation addressed to the faithful. To this document is replied by a formal anathema dated Dec. 4, of which the following is an extract: "The sacred congregation of the most eminent and most reverend cardinals of the holy Romish Church, inquisitors general throughout the Christian republic against heretical perversity, having heard the report of the committee acting in the name of our holy father, pope Pius IX, do now condemn the views published by the three false, schismatical bishops of the province of Utrecht. . . . The sacred congregation forbid all persons, of every state and condition, in any way, and under any pretext, to print, read, or obey them, or to keep or deliver them in their houses, or read it; every one must instantly give it up to the bishops or to the inquisitors." The Jansenists are genuine Roman Catholics, but they refuse a servile obedience to Rome. They have also come to deny the infallibility of the pope altogether, and recognize him only as the "head of the bishops," placing the highest authority of the Church in a general council. They circulate the Scriptures, and insist on inward piety. They denominate themselves Roman Catholica of the episcopal clergy. They still number about 6,000 souls, and are divided between the bishop of Utrecht and Haarlem. Their clergy are about thirty in number, with a seminary at Amersfoort, which was founded in 1726. The name of their present archbishop is Van Santen, whom Rome has again and again vainly endeavored to induce, by the basest of means, to sign the prescribed formula of submission (Cone*cta Ital.* p. 80 sq.). So far as they can be said to possess a theological system, it may be described as a compound of Jansenist and ultra-Gallican principles.

Other Works of Jansenius.—Besides the work which gave rise to the schismatic movement in the Roman Catholic Church, Jansenius wrote many other works, among others:

Jansse, Lucas, a distinguished French Protestant theologian and writer, was born at Rouen about 1605. He studied theology at the Huguenot seminary situated at the laterly celebrated Sedan, and was pastor at Rouen from 1632 to 1682, when age and infirmities obliged him to resign. At the Propagation of the Edict of Nantes he retired to Rotterdam, where he died April 24th, 1686. Jansse was a man of solid learning and lively imagination. He made himself especially conspicuous by a pamphlet—La Mesme traversé en l'Écriture (Villefranche [Rouen], 1647, 12mo)—in which he ridiculed Véron for having, in an edition of the Louvain Bible published at Paris in 1646, translated the beginning of Acts xi, 2 by "As they said mass unto the Lord." In order to avoid persecution, Jansse destroyed a large number of copies; but it was often reprinted, as in Recueil de plai- siniers (Villefranche [Rouen], 1654, 12mo), and alone under the title Le Miracle du P.Véron sur la Messe (Lond. 1699, 12mo). He wrote also, Traité de la Fian du Monde (Rouen and Quevilly, 1656, 8vo)—Le Christien au Pied de la Croix (Rouen, 1668, 8vo); and other works.

Jansenboy, the family name of several Dutch theologians; mostly as missionaries of the Dominican order.

Cornelius, born near the beginning of the present century, was educated at Louvain, then went to Ita- ly, and, after preaching and teaching for some time, the Congregated Propaganda, in 1629, to the northern provinces on mission work, and, as his special field, Saxony was designated. Failing, however, to make many converts in this country, the very cradle of Protestantism, he was ordered to remove to Flanders. On his return to Italy in 1637, he was lost at sea (Oct. 11). He wrote several works of some note, mostly of a polemical nature, amongst which, of especial interest to us, his Défense de la Foi Catholique.

Dominicus, brother of the former, born at Amster- dam March 14, 1647, was also dispatched to the northern provinces at the same time as his brother Cornelius. He was put in charge of the town but the order was countered by imprudent conduct finally resulted in his expulsion from the city; and although the order was afterwards revoked, by reason of his pledges to be more considerate and fair in their representations of the Reform- ers, he quittd Hamburg in 1634 and retired to a Domin- ian convent at Cologne. In 1648 his superiors sent him to Prague, where he died March 14, 1647. While at Cologne, Dominicus published several sermons in defence of the doctrines and usages of the Roman Catholic Church, but they are rather of an inferior order.

Nicholas was born at Zierickzee, on the island of Schouwen, Zeeland, in the second half of the 16th cen- tury. He was a regular tall, strong and solidish man, a German garb at Anvers, he was appointed regent and then superior of the college at Lire, in Brabant, and afterwards professor of theology at Louvain. His superior ability pointed him out as one of the ablest men for missionary labor among the Lutherans of Denmark, and he was intrusted with this service. His popular ability in the way of several sermons in Denmark, Norway, and other: northern provinces, he went to Rome to give an account of his labors, and to propose the measures necessary to re-establish Romanism in those countries. In 1629 he was again dispatched to the same countries, this time reinforced by his brother Jan. He was next sent to England, in making much of an impression on the Protestants, who had heard and seen enough of Romanism and its workings to be satisfied that salvation did not flow through that channel. While he was treated with the utmost liberality by both the government and the people among whom he came to print, the profession of the Roman Catholics of the region, the converts for his religion were few, if any. But it must be conceded that Rome had well chosen the man who was likely to make converts for popery, if such a thing had been possible. Nicholas was certainly a man of great erudition and well-sounding speech even at the admiration of his opponents. He died November 21, 1634. His works are, Panegyrique de St. Thomas d'Aquin (Louvain, 1621, 8vo);—1° de St. Dominique (Anvers, 1622, 8vo);—Defensio Fidelis Cathol. (Anvers, 1631, 8vo), etc. See Touron, Hommes illustres de l'ordre de St. Dominique; Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Gr. xxvi, 385 sq. (J. H. W.)

Janssenius, Erasmus (Lat. ERASUS Johannis), a Dutch Unitarian theologian, was born about 1540. He was rector of the College of Antwerp, but his advocacy of Socinianism obliged him to resign his office in 1567. He was next regent of the College of Cambrai (Diet Frize), but, in consequence of new persecutions, he went in 1579 to Frankfort, and thence to Poland, where he settled at Cracovia in 1584. Here he asked to be permitted publicly to defend his opinions. The demand was granted, and the renowned Faustus Socinus was his opponent. Their controversy lasted two years (29th and 30th of November, 1584), and passed off calmly; but, both having subsequently published an account of the proceedings, they accused each other of incorrecetness. Janssenius, however, in being offered the pastorate of a Unitarian congregation at Clausenburg, in Transylvan- ia, retraced his former principles, and adopted those of Socinus (q. v.), who, as is well known, by his great ability not only silenced all the anti-Trinitarians that differed from his views, but finally even gained them all over to his side (comp. Krasinski, Reformation in Poland [Lond. 1840, 2 vols, 8vo, 132]. Janssenius is supposed to have died near the close of the 16th century. His principal works were, Clara Demonstratio Antichristi immediate post mortem apostolorum corrupse regnum in Ecclesia Christri (1584, 12mo) [this work gave rise to the persecutions which obliged Janssenius to retire to Poland];—Antitheseon, Anti-Fidei, Anti-Scripturæ, et Anti-Erasmi vero Deo (anon. 1585, 12mo; with a refutation by Jernel Zanchius, Neustadt, 1586, 4to).—Scriptum quo causas propter quas vita eternius contagit complucerit, etc. (1589):—Epistola ad Faustinum Sociumin, with an answer of the latter dated April the 28th, in Rhen. Arch. Fili Dei eruditorum, et ad epistolem inter Erasum Joh- annem et Faustinum Socium, etc. (Cracov. 1585, 12mo);—De Quatuor Monarchiaca:—Commentarii in Apoc- lypsin. He published also, the Bibliorum Para 11, ed Libri Prophetici, Latina recensio ex Hebrew facta, contrary, maintained "that the Supper was, according to the teaching of the Scriptures and that of the Reformed Church, instituted for the regenerate, who possessesthe holy and spiritual life and its attributes. This controversy greatly agitated the Church, and its effect was in some places to restrain men from a public profession of their faith, and to deter those who had already made a profession from coming to the communion. A somewhat intermediate view, presented and advocated by the common people, not so much to conciliate the Church, as to defend the ancient and finally prevailed in the Church. His view is substantially this: All who have made a public profession of their faith, whether they possess the internal evidence of having been truly converted or not, must be regarded as believers, and, as such, entitled to and bound to observe this ordinance; and the minister must invite all such to come to the communion, as being their privilege and duty. This view is substantially in harmony with the theory and practice of most evangelical denominations in this country. See Geschichte van de Christelijke Kerk in de 18de eeuw, door A. Ipejui, vii, 401 sq.; Geschichte der Niederländischen lKerk, door A. Ipejui en J. Dermout, iii, 612 sq.; Glasius, Godge- leerd Nederland, ii, 175 sq. (J. P. W.)

Januarius is a name under which some fourteen martyrs are honored in the Roman Catholic Church. A family prefixed the name of the saint of Naples, who is usually called Januarius, to their old inscriptions. There is a monument in Turin to the memory of a certain Januarius Vintius. The name seems to have belonged especially to Africa and Southern Italy. Its popularity is proved by the large number of martyrs bearing it, which is surpassed by few others (perhaps only the names of Alexander, Felix, John, etc.). The best known among them is St. Januarius, bishop of Benevento, who was beheaded in the early part of the 4th century (according to the Neapolitan tradition, at Pozzuoli, where many Christians suffered a like fate, in 305).

The saint's day is Sept. 19. Januarius is the patron of Naples, and his head and skull are revered; and looked upon as holy relics, are kept in the chapel El Tesoro, in the cathedral of Naples, where they were placed Jan. 13, 1437. According to tradition, a pious woman gathered at the place of his execution two bottles of his blood, and presented them to bishop Severus of Naples. On three festivals each year, the chief of which is the day of the martyrdom, Sept. 19, and on occasions of public danger or calamity, as earthquakes or eruptions, the head and the phials of the blood are carried in solemn procession to the high altar of the cathedral, or of the church of St. Clare, where, after prayer of greater or less duration, the blood is exposed; or brought into contact with the head, is believed to liquify, and in this condition is presented for the veneration of the people, or for the conviction of the doubter. It occasionally happens that a considerable time elapses before the liquefaction takes place, and sometimes it altogether fails. The latter is regarded as an omen of the worst import; and on those occasions when the miracle is delayed beyond the ordinary time, the alarm and excitement of the congregation rise to the highest pitch, as it is represented in such a case to be an evil sign for the city and the whole country. The blood is exposed three times every year, particularly on the first Sunday in May, and in cases of especial public affliction. The process of the performance of this so-called miracle is kept secret by the clergy of Naples. Of late years the liquefaction of the blood was interpreted as a sign of the saint's goodwill towards the city and the whole country; but this interpretation of Ferdinand II, for Garibaldi, and for Victor Emanuel with equal ease, which would seem to indicate that the saint is indifferent to the political fate at least of his devout worshippers. Addison, in his Travels, speaks of the performance (in his notices of Naples) thus: "I had twice an opportunity of seeing the operation; the phial being tendered, and must confess that, so far from thinking it a real miracle, I look upon it as one of the most bungling tricks I ever saw."
Another Januarius, said to have suffered under Felix, has Jan. 7 assigned to him in the Martyrology of the Romish Church. Still another, said to have suffered martyrdom in Africa with Paul and Gerontius, has Jan. 13. Veda names April 8 for a Januarius of Africa, along with Macaria and Maximus. July 10 is kept in honor of two saints of like name, one of which belonged to the seven sons of Felicitas, who are said to have been put to death towards the end of the 2d century at Rome; the other suffered martyrdom in Africa with Felix and Nabor, who were transferred to Milan. July 11 is sacred to a Januarius who died at Nicopoli. Another suffered martyrdom at Carthage, together with Philippus, Catulminus, etc., July 15. A Januarius, together with Felicitissimus and Agapetus, fell a martyr under Decius at Rome, and the Church observes Aug. 6 in his memory. October 18 is the anniversary of the Spanish martyrs Faustus and Januarius, who suffered at Cordova. On Oct. 24 there is mention made of a Januarius who, after being long persecuted, was, together with Felix, Audactus, etc., put to death and buried near Carthage. The island of Sardinia also has a Januarius, in whose honor they keep Oct. 25. On Dec. 2 we find a Januarius, with Severus, etc.; and another in Africa Dec. 15. Ja'num (Heb. Janum', דַּבּוֹ, slumber, otherwise for זַבּוּ, propagation; Septug., ταυτίζειν v. ταυτολαχ. Vulg. Janum'), a town in the mountains of Judah, mentioned between Eshem and Beth-tappauh (Josh. xv, 58). The Heb. text has דַּבּוֹ (as if Yamin', יָמִין, right), which is corrected in the Masoretic marg.; many copies have Janus', דַּבּוֹ, flight, as in the Eng. margin "Janus." The Syriac version has Ḥalum. Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Ταυτολαχ.) mentions a place, Janus, three miles south of Lejio, but admits that it cannot be the locality in question. M. de Sauley (Nah. i, 457) thinks the site may possibly be marked by the ruins of Jenbeh, at the foot of a hill nearly south of Hebron; but, according to Dr. Robinson, the remains are little more than those of caves (Bib. Rev. ii, 472). The associated names appear to indicate a district immediately north-west of Hebron (U. O. Y. Comment. on Josh. iv, 5). The position corresponds with that of a ruined site, Ras Jubeh, marked on the first edition of Van de Velde's map immediately on the west of the road directly north from Hebron to Jerusalem, and adjoining Khurbet en-Nasara; but the identification of the map conduced both with these sites, although the latter is explicitly mentioned in the Memoir (p. 247) as "a ruined village" visited by him as well as by Dr. Robinson (Researches, i, 317).

Janus. See JANUM.

Janua, a very old Roman divinity, whose name is merely a different form of Dianus (probably the sun). The worship of this divinity held a high place in the regards of the Romans. "In every undertaking his name was first invoked, even before that of Jupiter, which is the more singular, as Jupiter was unquestionably the greatest of the Roman gods. Perhaps it may be taken as a verification of the tradition that Janus was the oldest of them, and ruled in Italy before any of the others came thither. (See below, our reference to Janus presiding not only at the beginning of the year, but over the beginning of each month, each day, and the commencement of all enterprises. On New Year's day people made each other presents of figs, dates, honey-cakes, sweetmeats, etc.; wore a holiday-dress, saluted each other kindly, etc. The pious Romans prayed to Janus to clothe with the highest honors of his class the "Filio of Mattutinos Pater (Father of the Morning)." Janus is represented with a sceptre in his right hand and a key in his left, sit-

Colin with head of Janus.

Januarius, a Latin priest, born at Pittsgrove, N. J., April 25, 1816, graduated at Princeton, and took the highest honors of his class in 1833, and then pursued a theological course of study at Princeton Seminary, teaching at the same time in Lafayette College, where he so ably discharged his duties that he was urged to accept a professorship. But Janvier preferred the missionary work; and he was licensed and ordained by the West Jersey Presbytery, his father, also a minister, preaching on the occasion. He went to India and there was for several years superintendent of the mission press; he also prepared a translation of the Pentateuch and Psalms into Punjabi, and aided in the preparation of a Punjabi dictionary and other works in this department. He began his work without pay and obliged him to seek recreation, and he came on a visit to his native country in 1859. In 1860 he returned again to the missionary work, but he continued only a short time to serve his Master here on earth: March 25, 1864, he was murdered by a Sikh at Amadpur, India. "He was aocrat of a high order; learned, wise, gentle, humble, winning; whose loving, benevolent life preached most touchingly the Gospel of his Master," was the testimony of one of the papers of India after the assassination of Mr. Janvier. Another collaborator (the Rev. J. T. Gracey) wrote to the Methodist New Yorker, in April, 1864, that "great excitement prevailed among the people," and that Janvier's funeral "was attended, with marked respect, by thousands of natives." See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Am., 1866, p. 117 sq. (J. H. W.)

Janvier, René-Ambroise, a French Benedictine monk, was born at Sainte-Osmane, on the Main, in 1618. He was one of the most distinguished historians of the 17th century, and is celebrated for his Latin translations of several Jewish commentaries, among which are translations of Kimchi's commentary on the Psalms entitled R. Dav. Kimchi Commentarius in Psalmo (Paris, 1666, 4to). He died at Paris April 25, 1892. See Hoeber. Nouv. Diction. Elém. iv, 563; Hauret, Hist. Littér. de la Congreg. de St. Maur, p. 101.

JAPAN

JAPAN, a country in Eastern Asia, consisting of a great number (about 3850) of large and small islands, which are situated between 30° 20′ and 54° 24′ N. lat., and between 147° 34′ and 164° 30′ E. long. It is divided into Japan proper, which embraces the large islands, and the outer islands, of which the principal is Sittokof, and Kiussiu (with a number of adjacent islands), and the dependencies, to which belong Joso, with adjacent islands, the 174 Kuriles, the less known (89) Bomie, and the Lieu Kuei Islands. The population is generally estimated at from 33 to 40 millions; its area at about 365,000 square miles.

The history of Japan, according to the traditions of the country, begins with the dynasty of the heavenly gods, consisting of seven generations, and reigning from four to five million years. It was followed by the dynasty of the earthly gods, consisting of five generations, and reigning 2,342,167 years. The native soulaunis (the Asains) was at a very early period (according to some as early as B.C. 1246) pushed back by the immigrants from China. Probably Simmu (the divine warrior), the founder of the Japanese empire, with whom the authenticated history of the country begins, was also a Chinese. He first conquered Kiussiu (about B.C. 667), subsequently Nipon, where he erected a palatial temple (Dairi) to the sun goddess (Miako), and constituted himself ruler, under the honorary title of Mikado. When he died he was regarded as a national hero. His successors, with the annals of the modern Japan, are filled with narratives of the deeds of members of the orders in Japan. Besides Xavir, the greatest missionaries were Valignani, father John Baptist, a Spanish Franciscan, Philip of Jesus, a Mexican Franciscan, both crucified at Nagasaki, father Charles Spina, etc. The last Catholic priest who entered Japan was Sodotli, who in 1709 found means to land, but was never again heard of.

The state of the country, the population, the great numbers of the Japanese, who had returned from a perilous situation in the administration of the Mikado, the Koey, (1414–55); he added to his title Kubo the word Sama. Henceforth he and his successors resided in Yedo, while Miako remained the residence of the Mikados; his dynasty was in 1384 supplanted by another, but the separation of the ecclesiastical and secular authority remained unchanged.

In the middle ages, all the European nations visited Japan, which, up to this time, had been only known to them from Arabian geographers, and from the accounts given in the 13th century by the traveller Marco Polo, after his return from China. Through the efforts of three runaway Portuguese sailors, who in 1545 had landed, were crucified, and who, having by storms been driven to the Japanese island Yanega, had found a kind reception at the residence of the prince of Bungo, in Kiussiu, a lively commercial intercourse arose with Portugal, which soon proved to be of immense value to the latter country. In 1549 the celebrated Jesuit missionary Francis Xavier, who had converted a Japanese at Goa, arrived in Japan. During a stay of two years he visited the territories of several princes and founded missions, which he confided to zealous priests of his order. The Roman Catholic faith spread rapidly, and soon the Catholic Church numbered among its converts the Buddhist priests. The Buddha, priests made a desperate resistance to the progress of Christianity, but a number of the Daiomios favored it, as they expected from the success of Christianity great commercial advantages. In 1562 the prince of Oomura, and soon after the princes of Bungo and Ariton, embraced Christianity, and sent a splendid embassy (embracing also three princes), with rich presents, to pope Gregory XIII and to king Philip II of Spain. But when the suspicion arose that the Daiomios who had embraced Christianity intended, with the aid of foreign Christian governments and with the native Chinese population, to establish their entire independence, the Kubo Sama Fide Yose, an upstart who, being of low birth, had in 1585 usurped the dignity of Kubo Sama, curtailed the rights of the subordinate princes, took from the Mikado everything except the administration of the ecclesiastical affairs, and issued a stringent edict against Christianity, which had been favored by his predecessor. This edict provided for the expulsion of all the missionaries and the destruction of the churches. It was not executed at once, but in 1596 a real persecution of the Christians began, the beginning of a religious and civil war which lasted for forty years. Fide Yose died in 1598, while preparing for the invasion and conquest of Korea, and he was succeeded by his grandson, Yie Yazoo, prince of Mikaya, whose descendants have reigned at Yedo until the present day. Yie Yazoo made the dignity of Kubo hereditary in the three houses founded by his sons, shut the Mikado up in his palace at Miaco, and gave to the country a legislation conditioned under which it remained at peace for more than two hundred years.

In the mean while the Dutch had gained a footing in Japan, and, from commercial jealousy against the Portuguese, aided and encouraged the Kubo Sama in his proceedings. The leaders of the clergy, who were chiefly Japanese, were likewise encouraged by the aid of the small British garrison of his minor son, Yie Yazoo, prince of Mikaya, whose descendants have reigned at Yedo until the present day. last-named treaty abrogated the disgraceful stipulations concerning Christianity to which the Dutch had formerly been compelled to submit, and an additional stipulation of Jan. 30, 1856, allowed them to celebrate divine worship outside the exclusive ports. In 1857, several of the foreign treaties made further concessions to the four treaty powers, and the same rights were, by a treaty of Oct. 9, 1858, extended to France. From Jan. 1, 1859, the ports of Nagasaki, Hakodate, and Kanagawa; from Jan. 1, 1860, the port of Negato, and another port on the western coast; and, as a consequence of the ushing of Hiroo, the port of Osaca, were opened. Foreigners were allowed to reside in these places, to purchase landed property, to build houses and churches, and to celebrate their divine worship; from Jan. 1, 1862, they were also permitted to reside in Yedo. Gradually other Christian nations, as Portugal, Prussia, Spain, and Austria, likewise sent expeditions to Japan, which requested and obtained the conclusion of similar treaties.

The first step towards opening intercourse with foreign nations was soon followed by others. In 1860 a Japanese embassy was sent to the United States; another visited in 1862 the London Exhibition, as well as courts of Europe. At the Paris Exhibition of 1867 even the brother of the Tycoon appeared with a numerous retinue. A number of young Japanese, including many sons of princes, were sent to the schools of foreign countries, particularly in the United States; several distinguished foreigners were called to high offices in Japan, and a Japanese consul general was appointed for San Francisco in 1869.

The great change which, during the period from 1854 to 1870, took place in the relations of Japan to the world, and in the conduct of its affairs, was the result of many violent commotions, and affecting important transformations at home. The policy pursued by the Tycoon at Yedo was bitterly opposed and resisted by many of the most influential Daimios, and a large portion of the Japanese at large. On this occasion it was found that the European governments which had concluded treaties with the Tycoon had been greatly mistaken concerning the true nature of the office of the Tycoon. They had regarded him as being the absolute ruler of Japan; whereas, in fact, the Mikado, although actually confined to the religious functions, was still universally looked upon as the head of the state, and the highest arbiter in all quarrels between the Tycoon and the Daimios. In union with the Daimios, the Mikado now asserted his sovereignty with considerable success. When some of the Daimios committed crimes, it was supposed that the government could not possibly be accused of complicity, and hence in many cases the Mikado was able to bring them to punishment, and the European powers had themselves to enforce their claims against the princes of Satsuma and Negato. Ultimately a fierce civil war broke out between the Tycoon and a number of the northern Daimios on the one hand, and the Mikado and the majority of the Daimios on the other, which resulted in the abolition of the office of the Tycoon (1868), and the restoration of the Mikado to the full power of actual ruler. The successful Mikado, however, did not, as many expected, change the foreign policy of his predecessors, and endeavored to preserve the most friendly relations with foreigners, and to elevate the country to a level with the most civilized nations of Europe and America. In May, 1869, a large congress of Daimios was held at Yedo, and from that time to the middle of the year 1871 many important reforms in the internal condition have partly been carried through, partly begun.

The authorization given by the Japanese government to foreign residents of a free exercise of the Christian religion in the open ports was, of course, eagerly embraced by both the Protestant and the Roman Catholic churches. Missionaries of both established themselves in several of the ports, attending both to the religious wants of the foreign residents, and preparing for missionary operations among the natives. The appearance of Roman Catholic missionaries at Nagasaki brought to light the fact that a number of the descendants of former Christians in Japan still secretly adhered to the Roman Catholic faith, and now hoped for permission to exercise it openly. The government, however, did not give the expected permission, but in 1867 arrested and imprisoned some twenty of the native Christians. After an imprisonment of six months, the French chargé d'affaires obtained in December their liberation. In the following year, however, the persecuted native Christians were publicly executed in Nagasaki, and one of the official decrees published by the government: "As the abominable religion of the Christians is strictly prohibited, every one shall be bound to denounce to the proper authorities such persons as appear suspicious to him, and a reward shall be given to him for doing. Although the sect of the Christians has been many centuries ago persecuted most rigorously by the Ranku government, its entire extermination had not been arrived at. As, however, the number of the followers of the Christian doctrine has lately considerably augmented in the island of Honshu, near Nagasaki, whose peasants secretly adhere to it, after mature consideration it has been ordered by the highest authority that Christians shall be taken into custody, according to the rules laid down in the annexed document. As the Christian doctrine has been prohibited in this country, and the priests and other notables thereof have been severely punished for their audacity, those whose custody customary shall be confined shall therefore instruct them of what is right, with leniency and humanity, and shall do their best to again make good men of them. But if some should not repent and acknowledge their error, they shall be most severely punished without any mercy. Those whom it concerns shall keep this well in mind, and denounced to the proper authorities every one who shall prove incorrigible. Those men (Christians), until they have repented, shall not be allowed to have any intercourse with the inhabitants of the place where they are consigned. They shall be used to clear land, or to work in the lime-pits, or the gold and coal mines, or for any work their officers may think fit to employ them on. They shall live in the mountains and forests. One portion of rice shall be allowed per head to the respective Daimios for the span of thirty years; to commence from a day to be determined hereafter. They shall be brought in small detachments to the places mentioned below. The Daimios shall, as soon as they receive the information of the arrival of the persons allotted to them, send soldiers to take them over. The above mentioned proceedings have been common knowledge. The following Daimios shall take over the Christians allotted to them at their respective palaces at Osaca." This decree was followed by a list of thirty-four Daimios who had Christian prisoners allotted to them, in numbers varying from 30 to 24 each. The following decree was posted at the gates of Yokohama: "The Christian religion being still forbidden in the same manner as formerly, is strictly interdicted. The devilish sect is strictly prohibited."

On the 7th of July 114 native Christians, chiefly men and women, were landed at Nagasaki, on board the Japanese steamer Sir H. Parkes, at Nagasaki, and carried away to the mines of the north for penal servitude. The protest of the consuls at Nagasaki and the ministers at Yedo were of no avail. The Congress of Daimios which met in 1869 showed itself likewise very hostile to Christianity. The only one member of the national diet to vote for it, while 210 voted for a resolution declaring Christianity to be opposed to the state. Another resolution to inflict severe penalties for bringing back the apostates to one of the religions of the country was negatived by 176 against 60. Japan has long had many religious sects which have lived peaceably together. The three principal sects are the Sinto religion, Buddhism, and the sect of Shinto. The original and most ancient is the Sinto or Shintoism. sect, which is founded on the worship of spirits, called in the Japanese language Kami, in the Chinese Sin, who control the actions of men, and all visible and invisible things. The chief of these spirits is Yen Zio Dai Sin, which means Great Spirit of the Heavenly Light, who receives the highest honors from all religious paths. It was established, it is said, that the Kami are Kamia receive divine honors. Most of these are the spirits of distinguished men, who were canonized on ac-tount of their merits. Their number is not limited, but the Mikado still possesses the right to canonize promiinent men, and thus to elevate them to the dignity of a Kami. With the exception of Jay, which is the most re-owned and the oldest, and the one bound to visit it at least one in the course of his life. The second religion is Buddhism, which was introduced from Corea, but received many modifications in Japan, and gradually became followed by the people as the guide of their affairs. The sect known as Sinto, or the school of philosophers, comprises the followers of Confucius, and includes the people of the best education.

The great political revolution through which Japan passed in 1868, by the abolition of the office of the Tycoon and the Sinto establishment of the grand priests: if the Mikado, was accompanied by an effort to effect a complete change in the state religion of the country.
An American missionary writes on this subject, under the date of Dec. 26, 1868, as follows: "Here the Buddhist religion is, or was, the established religion, and the priests have the monopoly of burying people and praying for them afterwards. The aboriginal Sinto religion had fallen into disuse, poverty, and consequent disfavor and disgrace. This state of things commenced about three hundred years ago under Yie Yazoo, the founder of the sect of Confucianism in Japan, who was often beaten, and at his flight, and in other times of calamity, he and his adherents found shelter and sympathy in many a Buddhist money. At last, when he reached the throne, he liberally rewarded all those priests who had befriended him in his adversity, paying them a fixed sum out of the public treasury, and bestowing grants of land to be held as temple grounds, the revenue from which was devoted to the support of the temple. From that time Buddhism flourished in Japan, and Sintoism decayed. The nation followed the example of the victorious Tycoon, and thus Buddhism became established and popular. Still, as the Tycoon did not ignore the Mikado, but allowed him to be the nominal head of Japan, and even paid some outward respect to him, in the same way Buddhism did not ignore or displace Sintoism, of which the Mikado is pont-ifex maximus. Where the aboriginal Sinto gods were worshipped before, the Buddhist divinities did not replace or superecede them, but were added to them, and thus, in many places, a singular union was effected.
Buddhism and Sinto divinities are worshipped together, and the priests of both divisions often reside in the same temple. Wherever is the case such temples are called Ryoby, i.e., 'union temples.' Thus there are true Buddhist, pure Sinto, and the mixed or union temples. During the recent revolution a great effort has been made by the adherents of the Mikado to re-vote the ancient faith, and cast off whatever is of forgone origin, whether derived from China or India. Efforts are made to eliminate the whole mass of Chinese characters from the language and literature of the land, and to return to the ancient, simple, and alphabetical manner of writing. The same principle is at work in the reaction against the established religion, which is of foreign origin, introduced from China and India 1500 years ago. Since the Mikado's government has been formed, the priests have been decreed that their ancient Sinto divinities are worshipped in the same temple, the former are to be set aside, and the latter alone re-venerated. The priests of the former religion are urged to embrace the ancestral and national faith, in which case they may continue to hold their places. At various points of the empire there are only Sinto temples.
The ancient god holds his place, but, not being a popular god, his shrine is forsaken by officiating priests and worshippers. The present government has made inspection, and found that in many cases these shrines, so sadly neglected, are the shrines of the true and ancient gods. These are to be re-erected, and endowed with government support. What has been taken from the disendowed Buddhists will, no doubt, most of it be given to the Sintos. Now, when one of these old temples is re-erected and endowed, the office of priest in the temple becomes divine. It becomes divine, and it becomes the source of revenue from government, but the people suddenly wake up to a knowledge of the fact that this same forgotten god, in the olden time, worked wonders. The early history of the divinity is involved in obscurity, and on the principle 'Omne ignotum pro magnifico,' it is magnified; but the people attach a great importance to their offerings to these ancient demons.

The reports on the number of natives who desire to reconnect themselves with the Roman Catholic Church greatly vary. According to a recent (1870) report of the Japanese government, the Japanese Catholic church has 2000 members, of whom 2000 were at Uragami, near Nagasaki, 100 at Omura, and 1500 at Fushah. Besides, there are Christians in Shinabara, Amakusa, Hirado, and other places, but their number could not be accurately stated.
There is a strong force of French Jesuits at Kanagawa.
They have lately opened a school for young men, the purpose of teaching the French language and literature, and the sciences. The pope has erected Japan in a vicariate apostolic. The Roman Catholic missionaries assert that at least 100,000 Japanese would openly join their Church if religious toleration should be established.

Protestant missions were in 1870 supported in Japan by three American denominations: the Presbyterian Church, the Dutch Reformed Church, and the Protestant Episcopal Church. Several missionaries teach sec-cular branches in the government schools. Progress has been made with the translation of the Bible into Japanese, and Bible-classes have been formed, but up to 1871 but few of the natives had made a profession of Christianity. The Presbyterian missionaries, who had stations at Yokohama (begun in 1859) and Yeddo (begun in 1860), had been in their labors to the recognition of only three natives. The Protestant Episcopal Church supported one missionary bishop and one missionary. See Japhet ( Heb. יָפֵת, Ṭapheth, ṿapheth, in pause Yapheth, יָפֶה, wide-spread- ing [comp. Gen. ix. 27], although some make it signify ūfar, referring to the light complexion of the Japhethites; Sept. Ἰάφθης; Josephus Ἰάφθης, Ant. i, 4, 1), one of the three sons of Noah, mentioned last in order (Gen. v. 29; vii, 10; viii, 17; ix, 18; x, 1; Chron. iv. 14), usually though it appears as north (Gen. x. 21) (comp. ix. 24) that he was the eldest of Noah’s sons, born one hundred years before the flood (Michaelis, Spicil. ii, 66). B.C. 2616. He and his wife were two of the eight persons (1 Pet. iii, 20) preserved in the ark (Gen. vii. 7). In Gen. x. 2 sq. he is called the progenitor of the extensive (Gen. xi. 11), Hamitic, (Gen. xii. 6, 9, 20), of the Armenians, Medes, Greeks, Thracians, etc. (comp. Synecclus, Chron. p. 49; Mala, Chronogr. p. 16; see Tuch on ver. 27). See ETHNOGRAPHY. De Wette (Krtil, p. 72) justly repudiates the opinion of the Targumim, both Jonathan and Hieros, who make Japheth the progeni- tor of the African tribes also. The Arabian traditions (D’Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient.) attribute to Japheth wonder- ful powers (Weil, Biblische Legenden, viii, 40), and enumerate eleven of his sons, the progenitors of as many Asiatic nations, viz. Gin or Dhin (Chinese), Schelah (Slavonians), Chabur, Gomari, Chakhi (Georgians), Khat- lage, Khozar, Ros (Russians), Sussan, Gaz, and Torgaze. In these traditions he is called Aboulteric (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. p. 37). To the seven sons of Japheth mentioned in Gen. x. 2 and 1 Chron. i. 5, the Sept. and Euse- bius add an eighth, Elath, though not found in the text. Sorini, Man. Mytholog. i, 222; Beck, Phyl. iii, 1; and Haase, Entdeckung, i, 181) identify Japheth with the ʾIṣṭāq of Greek fable, the depository of many ethnog- raphical traditions (see Smith’s Dict. of Classical Biog- r. a. V. Jacetus), while others, again, connect him with He- reus, mentioned by the ancient historian Sanchoniathon, his act of moral piety, in conjunction with Sem, as re- thought in Gen. ix. 20-27 (where some understand the clause, “He shall dwell in the tents of Shem,” to refer to God, and not to Japheth), became the occasion of the prophecy of the extension of his posterity (see Heng- stenberg’s Christology, i, 42). See SHEN.

Japheth ben-Ali al-Levi (called in Arabic Ḥabūl A-li Ḥusayn b. Ali al-Levi al-Borsj), a very able Karaita grammairian and commentator on the Old Testament, flourished at Basra, in Arabia, during the latter half of the 10th century. He is reputed to have written a history of the Karaites (q.v.), of which traces still re- main (Josephus, Ant. i, 100), of the tractates which cover twenty MS. volumes preserved in Paris and Leyden. He distinguished himself by his literary labors, and obtained the honorable appellation of μαγείτα, the great teacher, and a place among those who are mentioned in the Karaita Prayer-book. The late eminent Orientalist Munk brought, in 1841, from Egypt to the royal library at Paris, eleven volumes of this commentary, five of which are on Genesis and many sections of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers; two volumes are on the Psalms, one is on Proverbs, and one on the Five Megiloth. They are written in Arabic, preceded by the Hebrew text and an Arabic translation. The indefatiga- ble Finsterer has examined the entire twenty volumes and made extracts from them. This work, of such gigantic magnitude, although it has exercised great in- fluence on the development of Biblical exegesis (as may be concluded from the fact that Aben-Ezra had them con- stantly before him when writing his expositions of the O. T., and that he quotes them with the greatest respect), has not as yet been published, and we have still only the fragments which Aben-Ezra gives us. Japheth was also an extensive polemical writer, and engaged in controversies with the disciples of Saadia (q.v.); but for which we have not seen appear in any of the possessed the proper requisites. See Ginsburg in Kitto, s. v.; Jos. Israelitische Anwahlen (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1841), p. 76: Bargès, Rabbi Japheth ben-Hillel Barosemi Karaita in Paul, Commentarlii Prefatio (1846); Finsterer, Itinera Kadmoniorum (Vienna, 1863), p. 169; Supplement, p. 181, etc.; Grätz, Geschicke der Juden, v, 342.

Japheth ben-Saidi, a descendant of the above, and another great Karaita, in all probability also born at Basra, flourished from about 1160-1200. His col- laborated work in defence of Karaitism entitled Ḥa-Akhat ha-Tora, which he is supposed to have written about 1167, he wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch and other books of the O.T. Finsterer fancies, and not with- out reason, that this is the Japheth whom the Karaites describe as the instructor of Aben-Ezra, and asserts that Ezra’s quotations from the commentary on Exodus, 39: viii, 13; ix, 16; x, 5, 21, belong to this Japheth, and not to the former. His commentaries are still in MS., both in the Paris and Leyden libraries. See Finsterer, Itinera Kadmoniorum, p. 222 sq. and 185 sq. Supplement; Grätz, Geschicke der Juden, vi, 905 sq.; Kitto, Bibl. jud. s. v. See KARAITEs.

Japhia ( Heb. יַפִּית)’a, see śepáld, Sept. Ias- tiq v. I. Ḥayyai and Ḥayyai, but Ḥaysi in 2 Sam. v. 15, the name of two men, and also of a place.

1. The king of Lachish, who joined the confederacy at the instance of Adoni-zedek against Joshua, but was defeated and taken prisoner, and put to death in the cave of Makkedah (Josh. x. 3 sq.). B.C. 1618. 2. One of the sons of David (q.v.) by some one of his full wives whose name is not given, born at Jerus- alem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. iii. 7; xiv, 6). B.C. post 1046.

3. A town on the eastern part of the southern boundary of Zebulun, situated on high ground between Da- herath and Gath-hepher on the north (Josh. xix. 12). Reland (Palest, p. 825) thinks it is the town Sycumon (יוֹפָעִימ) or ʾIṣermoni, Steph. Byz. Ἶσεμωνι, on the Mediterranean, opposite Carmel, between the Ionian and Arabic Mons, Pharnacia (v. 15, 5), and belonging to the iba. Antion, twenty Roman miles from the latter; called Ḥoph (Ḥeṭa) in the time of Eusebius (Onom. s. v. Ḥeṭa), and still extant (Goliot, Not. ad Afrag. p. 132) under the name of Ḥeṭsa (Robinson’s Researches, i, 194). He also regards it as the Jebus of Pliny (v. 19), which Ge- senius, however (Thesaur., p. 618), a distinction is established from Syccainum. This point does not agree with the requirements of the text. The place has been iden- tified by Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii, 200) with the modern village Ḥafas, about a mile and a half south- west of Nablus (Schubert, Reise, iii, 293), where the Italian monks fix the residence of the apostle James (Baumer, Poldat, p. 127). See Quaresmius, Eclekto, ii, 493; and Early Travels, p. 186: Maundeville calls it the “Castle of Saffra.” So, too, Von Harff, A.D. 1498 (Fuggerfahrt, p. 196). Although situated in a valley, the tribal line must have crossed (went upon, text of Joshua) the hills on the south of it (Keil, Comment, ad loc.). It contains about thirty houses, with the remains of a church, and has a few single palm-trees. Eusebius and Jerome doubtless refer to this place, as “Japheth, in the tribe of Zebulun,” still called Jophet, or the ancient of Jophet” (Onom. s. v. Japhet). The Jophet (Iopsa) for- tified by Josephus (Life, 37, 45) was probably the same, a large and strong village of Galilee, afterwards cap- tured by Trajan and Titus, under the orders of Vespa- بيان. In the storm and sack of the place, according to the mention of the two thousand of his inhabitants were put to the sword, and 2100 made captives (War, ii, 20, 6: ii, 7, 31). With this location De Sauley (Verrat. i, 13) and Schwarz (Palestine, p. 170) coincide, as also Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 321) and Porter (Handbook, p. 385).

Japhet (Heb. יָפֶה, Ṭapheth, ṿapheth, deliverer; Sept. Ἰάφθης; Var. Ἰαβθης, a son of Heber and great-grandson of Asher; several of his sons are also named (1 Chron. vii. 32, 33). B.C. between 1800 and 1658. It is also a branch of a descendant of Japhetites, “Ishphleti, Ṽaphetl,” Heb. יפאתל, Sept. Ἰαβθης, Vulg. Japhetli, Auth. Version “Japhleti,” that are mentioned in Josh. xvi, 5 as having settled along the border between Ephraim and Dan, near (north of) the present Jaffa road, apparently east of Beth-horon, possibly at the present Beit Unia. Others, however, regard the name in this locality as a trade route of one of the petty tribes of aboriginal Canaanites (compare the Archaeological Record, pp. 69, 83). Jareb (Heb. Yareb', יַ֣רְאֶב, i. e. יַ֣ד יִשָּׁם, contentions, i.e. an adversary) occurs as a proper name in the Author of Kings, iv, 6; in Ezra, v, 6, where a "king of Jareb" (גֵּ֣רֵב) is mentioned. See Zerubbabel, 39, 39, 39, (Sept., Βασίλειος Ἰαρόπαλης, Vulg., reg. ut proverb) is spoken of as the false refuge and final subjugator of the kingdom of Israel. It probably is a figurative title of the king of Assyria (mentioned in the same connection), who, like the Persian monarchs, affected the title of "the great king" (Michaelis, Suppl. ad bibl. to "be great"); he was spoken of in irony towards the faithless nation as their greatest scourge (Genesius, Thes. Heb. p. 1286). Had Jareb been the proper name of the king of Assyria, as it would be if this rendering were correct, the word preceding (גָּרֵ֥ב, melēk, "king") would have required the article. That it is rather to be applied to the country than to the king may be inferred from its standing in parallelism with Asshur. Such is the opinion of Fritsch (Handb. ü. x., v.), who illustrates the symbolic usage by a comparison with Rahab as applied to Egypt. At the same time he hazards a conjecture that it may have been an old Assyrian word, adopted into the Hebrew language, and so modified as to express an intelligible idea, while retaining its original form. The clause in which it occurs is supposed by many to refer to Judah, in order to make the parallelism complete; and, with this in view, Jarchi interprets it of Almah, who sent to Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xvi, 8) to aid him against the combined forces of Syria and Israel. But there is no reason to suppose that the two clauses do not both refer to Ephraim, and the allusion would then be, as explained by Jerome, to Pul, who was subsidized by Menahem (2 Kings xv, 19), and Judah would be indirectly included. Other interpretations of the most fanciful character have been given (Glass, Phil. Soc. iv, 3, 17, p. 644). See Jareb.

Ja'red (Heb. Yer'ed, יֵ֥רד, in pause Ya'red, יֵ֣רֵד, descendent; Sept. Tαφές, N. T. Ιαυτής, Josephus Ιαυτής), the name of a town.

1. The fourth antediluvian patriarch in descent from Seth, son of Mahalaleel and father of Enoch; born B.C. 5712, died B.C. 2750, aged 962 years; 162 years old at the birth of his heir (Gen. v, 15-20; 1 Chron. i, 2, "Jared"); Luke iii, 37.

2. A son apparently of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah, by his wife Jeudahiah, although in the latter part of the same verse a different parentage is spoken of; he is named as the "father" (i.e. founder) of Gedor (1 Chron. iv, 18, where the name is Anglicized "Jered"). B.C. cir. 1612. The Rabbins, however, give an allegorical interpretation of the passage, and trace this and other names therin as titles of Moses-Jereb because he caused the manna to descend.

Jarenton, a celebrated abbet of St. Benigne, at Dijon, France, born at Vienna towards the year 1045, was educated in the monastery at Clugny. After leading for some time a life of dissipation, he retired in 1074 to the little monastery of La Chaise-Dieu, of which he soon became the prior, distinguishing himself among his monastic associates by the display of brilliant abilities and in great erudition. In 1082 he was, after filling various other positions of trust, dispatched on a very important mission by the French papal legate. In 1084 he went to Rome to report the success of his mission to pope Gregory VII, at that time confined by the emperor in the castle of Sant-Angelo, and he effected the papal liberation by encouraging the papal legions to offer resistance to the imperial troops. We need not wonder that such service was well repaid by the papal court, and that hereafter Jarenton figures prominently in the Roman Catholic Church. In 1097 he retired to his abbey, which he left only to attend, in 1100, the Council of Vercelli. He died, apparently, Feb. 10, 1113. He is supposed to have written extensively, but only a letter to Thierry, the abbot of St. Hubert, is now known. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 375.

Jare'elah (Heb. Yaareziah, יָֽאָרֵ֥יה, nourished by Jehovah; Sept. Taqagias, one of the "sons" of Jerahmeel, a chief Benjamite resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. vi, 27). B.C. probably ante 1550.

Ja'ra (Heb. Yara, יַּרָּא, etymology unknown but probably Egyptian; Sept. Ταναδία, Vulg. Jaroch), the Egyptian slave of a Hebrew named Sheshan, who married the daughter of his master, and was, of course, made free. As Sheshan had no sons, his posterity is traced through this connection (1 Chron. ii, 34-41), which is the only one of the kind mentioned in Scripture. Jerahmeel thus became the founder of a chief house of the Jerahmeelites, which continued at least to the time of king Hezekiah, and from which sprang several illustrious persons, such as Zachah in the reign of David, and Azariah in the reign of Josiah (1 Chron. ii, 31 sq).

Ja'ra (B.C. prob. ante 1550.—Kitto). It is supposed by some that the name of Sheshan's daughter whom Jareh married was Ahlai, from the statement in ver. 31, compared with that in ver. 34; but the masculine form of the word, and the use of Ahlai elsewhere (1 Chron. xi, 41) for a man, is adverse to this conclusion. As Sheshan's oldest grandson by this marriage was called Attai, and as the genealogy runs through him, it is supposed by others that Ahlai is a clerical error for Attai; while others think Ahlai (אַ֨הלָּי, disjoiner, from אָלָ֖וי) was a name given to Jarah on his incorporation into the family of Sheshan. Others conjecture that Ahlai was a son of Sheshan, born after the marriage of his daughter. At what time this marriage occurred we cannot certainly determine, but as Sheshan was the seventh in descent from Hezon, the grandson of Judah, it could not well have been much later than the settlement in Caanan (B.C. 1612), and on the presumption that there are no lacune in the pedigree, it would naturally fall much prior to the Exode (B.C. 1558). In 1 Sam. xxx, 15, mention is made of an Egyptian who was servant to an Amalekite, and there is no reason why it should seem strange that an Egyptian should also be found in the family of a Hebrew, especially as, being a Jerahmeelite, he had (supposing the event to have occurred in Palestine) his possessions in the same territory as the Amalekites, in the south of Judah, nearest to Egypt (1 Sam. xxvii, 10; comp. 2 Sam. xxiii, 20, 21; Josh. xv, 20, 21; 1 Chron. xvi, 18). See Burrell's Genaeal; Beetson, Genealogy; Hervey's Geneal. p. 84; Bertheau on 1 Chron. ii, 24, etc.). See SHESHAN.

Ja'rib (Heb. Yarib, יָֽרְב, an adversary, as in Ps. xxxiv, 1, etc.; Sept. Ἰαυτίδας, Iapitēs), the name of three or four persons.

1. A son of Simon (1 Chron. iv, 24); elsewhere (Gen. xlvi, 10, etc.) called JACHIN (q. v.).

2. One of the popular chiefs dispatched by Ezra to procure the company of priests in the return to Jerusalem (Ezra viii, 16). B.C. 469.

3. One of the priests of the kindred of Joshua that divorced their Gentile wives after the Exile (Ezra x, 16). B.C. 469.

4. A Gracized or corrupt form (1 Mac. xiv, 29; compare 16:27). See Josh. (q. v.).

Jar·imoth (Iq. Jemōtẖ), a Gracized form (1 Esd. ix, 28) of the Heb. name (Ezra x, 27) Jeremoth (q. v.).

Jark·son. See Mc·Jark·son.

Jarlath is the name of the second successor of St. Patrick to the see of Armagh, Ireland, near the middle of the 6th century. Scarcely anything is known of his personal history. See Ireland.

Jarmoch (Reland, Palestina, p. 288) or Jarmuk (Schwarz, Palest, p. 53), a river of Palestine (ιάρμος) mentioned in the Talmud (Parah, viii, 10; Bava Batra, 74b) as emptying into the Jordan; the Hiero·nax (q. v.) of the Greek and Roman writers, and the modern Yarmuk.

Jarmuth (Heb. יָרְמוּת, הֵרְמָת; habitat, height; Sept. Iq. Jami·chòś), the name of two places. 1. A town in the plain of Judah (Josh. xv, 35), inhabited after the Babylonian captivity (Neh. xi, 29); originally the seat of one of the Canaanitish kings [see Pira·m] defeated by Joshua (Josh. x, 8, 6, 21; xii, 11; xxv, 10). 2. Xerxes (Istamnus, etc., see Iq. Jami·chòś) sets down Jarmuk or Jerus as ten Roman miles from Eleutheropolis towards Jerusalem, but elsewhere Jarmuth (s. v. Iq. Jami·chòś, doubtless the same place) less correctly at four miles' distance, although in the neighborhood of Esdraelon, which is ten miles from Eleutheropolis. Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 844) identified the site as that of Jarmuth, a village about seven miles north-east of Beit-Jibrin (Schwarz, Palest, p. 85). As the name implies, it is situated on a ridge (tell Er·mud or Ar·muth), a different pronunciation for Yarmuth: Van de Velde, Narratives, ii, 198). It is a small and poor place, but contains a few traces, in its bewn stones and ruins, of former strength and greatness (Porter, Handbook, p. 281; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 324; Tobler, Dritte Wunderkun. p. 120, 462).

2. A Levitical city in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. xxii, 20), sometimes called Rimeth (Josh. xix, 21) and Ram·oth (1 Chron. vi, 73). Schwarz (Palest, p. 157) supposes it was the Ramah of Samuel (1 Sam. xix, 22), which he identifies with the modern village of Ramah, north-west of Shechem; but this place lies within the territory of Manasseh. The associated names seem to indicate a fortress or stronghold on the eastern edge of the plain of Esdraelon. See Remeth.

Jaro·áth (Heb. יָרְוָך, יָרְוָח, perhaps born under the new moon; Sept. has 'A'dal v. 'A'dal, Vulg. Jaro, son of Gilead and father of Hurri, of the Gadites resident in Bashan (1 Chron. v, 14). B.C. long ante 782.

Jarque or Xarque, D. FRANCISCO, a South American Jesuit, flourished in the 17th century. He is distinguished as the author of Estudios presentes de las Misiónes en el Tucumán, Paraguay y Bío de la Plata (1687, 4to), for which his intimate knowledge of the native element eminently fitted him. It is remarkable how the Jesuits have succeeded in acquiring foreign languages, and how thorough and accurate is their knowledge of the inscriptions with whom they are brought in contact. (J. H. W.)

Jarratt, DEVEREUX, an early Protestant Episco·pal minister, was born in the county of Kent, Va., Jan. 6 (O. S.), 1732-33. His early education was neg·lected, and he had few opportunities of receiving in·struction in youth, but he so far improved himself as to be able, at the age of nineteen, to take charge of a neighbor·ing school. Soon after, he entered a family, in which one part of his duties was to read a sermon of Flavel's every night—a task which he performed at first with reluctance. The effect of these discourses was to con·vince him of sin. He now pursued Russell's Sermons and Burke's Exposition of the N. T.; but, being sub·jected to many temptations, he relaxed in his former state. He was finally relieved by a passage in Isaiah (Isa. liii, 4, 5), that led him to enter to the ministry. That purpose he went to England in 1762. On his return he served at Bath, Va., where he was eminently successful after some time, although at first his labors appear to have been disregarded. He died January 29, 1801. He was the author of three volumes of Sermons, and A Serv·ant of Letters (London, 1780); republished in 1806 in connec·tion with his Autobiography.—Sprague, Am. v, 214; Meth·odist Quarterly Review, 1855, p. 502.

Jarrige, PIERRE, a French Jesuit, who was born at Tulle in 1605, is celebrated in history by his desertion from and severe attacks upon the Jesuitical order. He was a very popular teacher and preacher at the time, when he joined the Calvinists in 1647; but, meeting with great opposition in France, and his life even being threatened, he went to Leyden, Holland, where he preached under the auspices of the State Church. Meanwhile the Jesuitical order condemned him to suffer death, first by means of a fire. This he avoided by burning so that he disappeared. He wrote the celebrated work of his, Les Jésuites sur Téchajils (Leyden, 1649, 12mo, and often), in which he thoroughly exposed the workings of that nefarious clerical order. A controversy ensued, which finally resulted in the re·turn of Jarrige, in 1650, to the Jesuits,—due, no doubt, more to weakness of mind against his life than anything else. He certainly turned the table like a zealous Jesuit, and now again condemned as heretics the very Christians with whom he had so lately associated, and whose cause he had professed to have embraced. He died Sept. 29, 1690. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Général, xxi, 983 sq.; Bayle, Historical Dictionary, q. v.

Jarry, PIERRE-FRANÇOIS THÉOPHILE, a French Ro·man Catholic religious writer, was born at St. Pierre, Normandy, in March, 1764. After completing his stud·ies at Paris, he was appointed curate at Escot; but, re·fusing to sign the clerical obligation demanded by the revolutionists, he was obliged to leave the country in 1791. In 1798 the bishop of Auxerre met Jarry in Ger·many, and appointed him grand-vicar, and a short time after the exiled Pius VI appointed him archdeacon and canon of Liege, Belgium. Prevented, however, from as·suming the functions of this position, he resided at Mun·ster, and was instrumental in the foundation of the Collège de count Stolberg (q. v.). After the Restoration, he re·turned to Falaise. He died at Lisieux Aug. 31, 1830. Jarry wrote quite extensively, especially against the usurpations of the Revolutionists of France. His theo·logical works of note are, Dissert, sur l'Épiscopat de St. Pierre à Autuncho, avec la défense de l'authenticité des écrits des Saints Pères (Paris, 1807, 8vo) — Événements d'une Dissert. (of the abbot Emery) sur la mitigation des peines des damnés (Leipsic, 1810, 18vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxvi, 386.

Jarvis, Abraham, D.D., a bishop of the Prot·estant Episcopal Church, was born in Norwich, Conn. May 12 (O. S.), 1734. He was A.B. at Yale in 1761, and became a lay reader at Middleton, where two years after, he settled as rector, having previously received ordination in England. In 1776 he presided at a convention of the Episcopal clergy held at New Hamps·hire, where it was voted that he was the duly qualified and lawful bishop. In 1797 he was elected bishop. He subsequently removed to Cheshire, N. H., and died May 3, 1813. His style of preaching is said to have resembled that of Til·lottson and Sherlock. He published Two Sermons. See Sprague, Am. vi, 235.

Jarvis, Samuel FARMER, D.D., LL.D., was born at the Manse, March 12, 1786, and passed A.B. at Yale College in 1805. In 1811 he took charge of St. Michael's Church, Bloomingdale, and in 1818 became rector of St. James's, N. Y. He afterwards became pro· fessor of Biblical literature in the Gen. TheoL. Seminary, X. Y. In 1819 the doctorate of divinity was conferred on him by the University of Pennsylvania, and the degree of LL.D. in 1837, by Trinity College, Hartford. When rector of St. Paul's, Boston, in 1826, he embarked for Europe to procure materials for a work on Church history. During an absence of nine years, he examined all the ancient authors on the subject to which his attention was directed, and, on his return, commenced A Complete History of the Christian Church [portions of it were published in 1844 and 1860], which remains unfinished. He was appointed historiographer of the Church, and occupied various posts of honor in the ecclesiastical world. A list of his writings is given by Allibone, Dict. of Autor., i. 956.

Jas'a'il (Ιασαίλος v. r. Ιασαίλος), a Grecized, or, rather, corrupt form (1 Esdr. ix, 30) of the Hebrew name (Ezra x, 29) Shalal (q. v.).

Jasher (Heb. Ḥaṣerah), יָשֶׁר, sleeping, as in Cant. viii, 10, etc.; Septuag., Ἰασείρ v. r. Ἰασαίρ, a person, several of whose "sons" are named as among David's famous bodyguard (2 Sam. xvi, 22), called in the Hebrew text Hasham (1 Chron. xi, 34). Other discrepancies also occur between the two passages: the former names three, while the latter makes the first (Jonathan) son of the next, and both (with slight verbal variations) assign special patronymics to the last two. Perhaps the two accounts may best be reconciled by supposing that the two braves referred to as being Jonathan Ben-Shammah (or Ben-Shageh), and Abiam Ben-Sharar (or Ben-Sacar), grandsons of Jashar (or Hashem) of Gizon, in the mountains of Judah—hence called Harares, B.C. considerable ante 1466. This name Kenevictz believes (Introduction, i, 201–3) lies concealed in the word rendered "the Gizonite" in Chronicles, and accordingly proposes to read in both places "Guni, of the sons of Hashem; Jonathan, the son of Shamha the Hararite;" his view being supported by the Sept., which reads νιὸν Ἀρδήν ὑπὸ Γεβεία τοὺς Ἰδωνων, νος Ίασαίρ ᾧ Αρδήν. However, the text of the 2 before 277, and the prefixed to the name read by him as Gouni, are objections to this view, and Bertheau may probably be right (Chron. p. 134), that יָשֶׁר is due to a repetition of the last three letters of the preceding word, "the Shaalmonite" (יהשלמון), and that we should simply read Hashem the Gizonite. In the list given by Jerome, in his Questions Hebravius, Jasher and Jonathan are both omitted. See David.

Jasher (Heb. Ḥaṣerah, יָשֶׁר, upright). A volume by this title (שֵׁר תַּנּוּן יְהוֹשֻׁע, the book of the upright man; Auth. Vern. "book of Jasher") appears anciently to have existed among the Hebrews, containing the records of honored men, or other praiseworthy transactions. The work is no longer extant, but is cited in two passages of the O. T. in the following manner: "And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day," etc. (Josh. x, 13). The other passage is 2 Sam. i, 17, 18: "And David lamented with this lamentation over Saul and over Jonathan his son (also he bade them teach the children of Judah [the use of] the bow: behold, it is written in the book of Jasher." After this follows the lamentation of David.

I. Views of the Incident in Joshua's Career.—The book of Jasher has attracted attention because it is appealed to in connection with the account of the sun and moon standing still. The compiler of the book of Joshua refers to it as containing a record of the miracle in question. It is therefore impossible to do justice to our subject without entering into an interpretation of the wonderful phenomenon on which so much ingenuity has been wasted. The misspent time which has been devoted to the passage in Joshua makes a critic sad in-reading וְיִתְנֶשׁ for וְיֵתְנֶשׁ, and a similar transposition will account for the rendering of the same version in Samuel. This is interpreted by "the book of the law," and this is followed by Jarchi, who gives, as the passage alluded to in Joshua, the prophecy of Jacob with regard to the future greatness of Ephraim (Gen. xlviii, 19), which was fulfilled when the sun stood still at Joshua's bidding. The same Rabbi, in the name of Samuel, refers us to Genesis, "the book of the upright, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," to explain the allusion to the book of Joshua; and Jerome, while discussing the "etymology of Israel," which he interprets as "rectus Dei," incidentally mentions the fact that Genesis was called "the book of the just" (Lib. Genesis, suppl. eis eis, id est, iustorum), from its containing the histories of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel (Comm. in Jex. xxiv, 2). The Talmudists attribute this tradition to R. Johanan. R. Eliezer thought that by the book of Jasher was signified the book of Deuteronomy from the expressions in Deut. vi, 18; xxxii, 7, the latter being quoted in proof of the skill of the Hebrews in archery. In the opinion of Rabbi Samuel ben Nachman, the book of Judges was alluded to as the book of Jasher (Aboda Zarah, c ii); and that it was the book of the twelve minor prophets was held by some Hillelites (B. Bab. ci, ad loc., jurtorum), from its containing the histories of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel (Comm. in Jex. xxiv, 2). The Targum interprets the idea of the eunuch, who was of a military nature; but Montanus, regarding rather the etymology, considered it a collection of political and moral precepts. Abiath, taking the lament of David as a sample of the whole, maintained that the fragment quoted in the book of Joshua was part of a funeral ode composed for Barak, and designed to celebrate his achievements. At the same time, he does not conceive it necessary to suppose that one book only is alluded to in both instances. It must be admitted, however, that there is very slight ground for any conclusion beyond that which affects the internal form, and that the song can be confidently asserted with regard to the contents.

From the passage above referred to (2 Sam. i, 18—"Also he bade them teach the children of Israel [the use of the bow]"), it has been supposed by some (see Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. ad loc., and Horne's Introd. vol. i) that the book of Jasher contained a treatise on archery; but it has been observed (see Parker's translation of De Wette's Introd. i, 301) that, according to the ancient mode of citation, which consisted in referring to some particular word in the document, "the bow" which the children of Israel were to be taught indicated the poetical passage from the book of Jasher in which the "bow of Jonathan" is mentioned (2 Sam. i, 22). One writer (Rev. T. M. Hopkins, in the Biblical Repository, 1846, p. 97 sq.) rashly proposes to reject both references to the book in question as spurious, and even the whole account of the miracle in Joshua.

Eisler (Eisler's, § 169) endeavors to deduce an argument in favor of the late composition of the book of Joshua from the circumstance of its citing a work (viz. the book of Jasher) which "points to the time of David. inasmuch as his lamentation over Saul and Jonathan is not a prominent feature here (Wob. Bibl. Hebr. ii, 218), as has been supposed. For (although the American translator of De Wette's Introd. looks upon this as quite improbable) that the book may, as a collection of poems, have received accusations at various periods, and, nevertheless, been still quoted by its original name. Dr. Palfrey, who adopts this view of the book of Jasher, has left its contents for the reform the composition of Joshua to the time of Saul.

III. Attempted Reproductions of the Work. — 1. Although conjecture might almost be thought to have exhausted itself on a subject so barren of promises, a scholar of our own day has not despaired of being able not only to decide what the book of Jasher was in itself, but of reconstructing it from the fragments which, according to his theory, he traces throughout the several books of the Old Testament. In the preface to his Jashar, or Fragments of Archetype Carminum Hebraicorum in Masoretico Verbo Testamenti textus possis tessellata (London, 1848, 1866, 1870), Dr. Donaldson advances a scheme for the arrangement of the fragments. With this he connects his own idea of its scope and contents. Assuming that, during the tranquil and prosperous reign of Solomon, an unwonted impulse was given to Hebrew literature, and that the worshippers of Jehovah were desirous of possessing something on which their faith might rest, the book of Jasher was perhaps written, or, rather, compiled to meet this want. Its object was to show that in the beginning man was upright, but had, by carnal wisdom, forsaken the spiritual law; that the Israelites had been chosen to preserve and transmit this law of uprightness; that David had been made king for his religious integrity, leaving the kingdom to his son Solomon, in whose reign, after the dedication of the Temple, the prosperity of the chosen people reached its culminating point. The compiler of the book was probably Nathan the prophet, assisted, perhaps, by Gad the seer. It was thus the first offspring of the prophetic schools, and ministered spiritual food to the greater prophets. Rejecting, therefore, the authority of the Masoretic text, as founded entirely on tradition, and adhering to his own theory of the origin and subject of the book of Jasher, Dr. Donaldson proceeds to show that it contains the religious marrow of holy Scripture. In such a case, of course, absolute proof is not to be looked for, and it would be impossible here to discuss what measure of probability should be assigned to a scheme elaborated with considerable ingenuity. Whatever ancient fragments in the sacred books of the Hebrews exhibit the nature of uprightness, celebrate the victories of the Israelites, and point out the future blessedness, have, according to this theory, a claim to be considered among the relics of the book of Jasher. Following such a principle of selection, the fragments fall into seven groups. The first part, the object of which is to show that man was created upright (גוחל, ḫ̄âḏār), but fell into sin by carnal wisdom, contains two fragments—an Elohistic and a Jehovahistic, both poetical, the latter more full of the narrative. The first includes Gen. i, 27, 28; vi, 1, 2, 4, 5; vii, 21; vi, 6, 8; the other is made up of Gen. ii, 7, 9—15, 18, 25; iii, 19, 21, 23, 24. The second part, consisting of four fragments, shows how the descendents of Abraham, as being upright (גוחל, ḫ̄âḏār), were adopted by God, while the neighboring nations were rejected. Fragment 1, Gen. i, 18—27; fragment 2, Gen. iv, 2—8, 16; fragment 3, Gen. xvi, 1—4, 15, 16; xvii, 9—16, 18—20; xxi, 1—14, 20; 21; fragment 4, Gen. xxxv, 20—34; xxxvii, 1—10, 14, 18—20, 25—40; iv, 18, 19; xxxvi, 34; xxxvi, 2; iv, 23, 24; xxxvi, 8; xxxvii, 9; xxxvi, 35; xxxvi, 46; xxxvi, 8, 11—19; xxix, 1, etc., 24, 29; xxxv, 22—26; xxxvi, 25—29; xxxvi, 8, 14—10; xxxviii, 31, 32. In the third part is related, under the figure of the Deluge, how the Israelites escaped from Egypt, wandered forty years in the wilderness, and finally, in the reign of Solomon, built a temple to Jehovah. The passages in which this is found are Gen. vi, 5—14; vii, 6, 11, 12; viii, 7, 8, 12; vi, 29; viii, 4; Kings vii, 1; viii, 20; Deut. vi, 18; Ps. v, 4. The third fragments of the fourth part contain the divine laws to be observed by the upright people, and are found in (1) Deut. v, 1—22; (2) vi, 1—6; Lev. xix, 18; Deut. x, 12—21; xi, 1—5, 7—9; (3) viii, 1—3; vi, 18—60, 25—35. The blessings of the upright, and their admonitions, are the subject of the fifth part, which contains the songs of Jacob (Gen. xlix, 27; xxxiii, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22); of Moses (Exod. xiv, 28, 30, 31, 32); and of Deborah (Judg. vi, 1—20). The seventh is a collection of various hymns composed in the reigns of David and Solomon, and contains David's song of triumph over Goliath (1 Sam. ii, 1—10); his lament for Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i, 19—27), and for Abner (2 Sam. iii, 33, 34); his psalm of thanksgiving (Psa. xcvii, 2; Sam. xxi, 1); his triumphal ode on the conquest of the Edomites (Psa. lx), and his prophecy of the Messiah's kingdom (2 Sam. xxiii, 1—7), together with Solomon's Epithalamium (Psa. xlv), and the hymn sung at the dedication of the Temple (Psa. cxlviii).

It cannot be denied that the critic has shown great ingenuity and constructive skill in elaborating his theory. His commentaries on the individual fragments are often exhibits of striking and just remarks, with a right perception of the genius of some portions of the OT. Yet we must pronounce the attempt a failure. The leading positions are untenable. Donaldson's arguments are often weak and baseless. Most of the contents which he assigns to the book of Jasher never belonged to it, a view which he, in some cases, explicitly disowns. The whole work is far from being a work of genius which he selects, etc. But it is needless to enter into a re-examination of the hypothesis, ingeniously set forth in elegant Latin, and supported with considerable acuteness. Most of the book of Jasher cited in Joshua and 2 Samuel is lost. It is very improbable that laws such as those in Deut., xxxii, 1—29, or historical events, as those in Josh. i, 4—11, ever belonged to it. It is also a most unfortunate conjecture that מנה, in Gen. xlix, 10, is abridged from מנה, or, even if it were, that it furnishes a proof of the poem being written while Solomon was king (p. 27).

We are persuaded that the critic gives great extension of meaning to the Hebrew word מנה, in making it almost, if not altogether, an appellation of the Israelitish people. When he assumes that it is contained in מנה, the notion is erroneous (p. 25).

Among the many strange results of Donaldson's arrangement, she concludes that Shem, Ham, and Japheth, and the sons of Noah, who is Israel under a figure, but of Adam; and the circumstances of Noah's life related in Gen. i, 18—27 are transferred to the latter. Cain and Abel are the sons of Shem, Abraham is the son of Abel, and Esau becomes Lamech, the son of Methuselah.

2 and 3. There are also extant, under the title of the "book of Jasher," two rabbinical works, one a moral treatise, written in A.D. 1394 by R. Shabbatai Carmuz Levi, of which a copy in MS. exists in the Vatican library; the other was written by Jacob ben-Meir, or R. Tam, who died in 1171, and contains a treatise on Jewish ritual questions. It was published at Cracow in 1866, 400, and again at Vienna in 1811, but incorrectly. No translation of either was ever made.

4. An anonymous work under the same name was published at Venice in 1625, at Cracow in 1626, and at Prague in 1688. It contains the histories of the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, and intermixes many fabulous things. It gives (Ixxxvii, 64) the account of Joshua's miracle nearly in the words of Scripture, making the sun to stand still "thirty-six times" (פָּאָר, pâʾar), i.e. hours; but does not bring the history down later than the conquest of Canaan. The preface itself states that it was discovered at the destruction of Jerusalem by Sildus, one of the officers of Titus, who, while searching a house for the purpose of plunder, found in a secret chamber a vessel containing the books of the law, the prophets, and Hagiographa, with many others, which a venerable man was reading. Sildus took the old man under his protection, and built for him a house at Seville, where the books were safely deposited, and thence this one was conveyed to Naples, where it was printed. The book in question is probably the production of a Spanish Jew of the 13th century (Abicht, De livr. Rcri, in Theol. Nor., viii, 1, 525—54), a German version of it, with additions, was published by R. Jacob at Frankfort-on-the-Main (1764, 4vo), with the title "perfect and right." A stereotyped translation of this work was published in New York in 1840, under the direction of M. M. Noah, with certificates of its fidelity to the original by eminent Hebrew scholars who had examined it.

5. The above works must not be confounded with the various editions of a fabrication which was first secretly printed at Bristol, and published in London in 1791 (4to), by one names Jacob Basser, the acknowledged author who was its real author. It was entitled "The Book of Jasher, with Testimonies and Notes explanatory of the Text: to which is prefixed Various Readings: translated into English from the Hebrew by Alcuin of Britain, who wrote the book into the Holy Land. This book was noticed in the Monthly Review for December, 1751, which describes it as "a palpable piece of contrivance, intended to impose upon the credulous and ignorant, to sap the credit of the books of Moses, and to blacken the character of Moses himself." The preface, purporting to be written by Alcuin, contains an account of the finding of the book in MS. at Gazzah, in Persia, and the way in which it was translated. Having brought it to England, Alcuin says that he left it, among other papers, with a clergyman in Yorkshire. After two pages of various readings, the book itself follows, divided into thirty-six sections, and the testimonies and notes are appended. The editor states, in a dedication at the beginning, that he bought the MS. at an auction in the north of England, and affirms that Wickliffe had written on the outside, "I have read the book of Jasher twice over, and I much approve of it as a piece of great antiquity and curi- ossity. It was an ancient poem, and a part of the canon of Scripture." This clumsy forgery was reprinted at Bristol in 1827, and published in London in 1829 (4to), as a new discovery of the book of Jasher. A prospectus of a second edition of this reprint was issued in 1833 by the editor, who therein styles himself the Rev. C. R. Bond. This literary fraud has obtained a notoriety far beyond its merits in consequence of the able critiques to which it gave rise, having been again exposed in the Dublin Christian Examiner for 1831, and elaborately refuted by Horne in his Introduction (ut sup., 1831, vii, 41-6). See, besides the literature above referred to, Hilliger, De Libro Recti (Lips. 1714); Nolte, De Libro Justorum (Helmst. 1719); Wolf, De Libro Rectorum (Lips. 1742); Steger, De vocabulo כּוֹסֵל (Kiel, 1808); Anon. Jashobeam (Heb. Yashobam, יָשֹּבֶם, dweller among the people, or returner to the people, otherwise, to whom the people return, or a returning people; Sept. in 1 Chron. xi, 11, יָשֹּבֶּ֣ה v. r. יָשֹּבֶּ֣ה; in 1 Chron. xii, 6, יָשֹּבֶּ֣ה v. r. יָשֹּבֶּ֣ה; Vulg. Jeshem, but Jashobam in 1 Chron. xxvii, 2), the name of several of David's favorite officers.

3. One of the Korhites, or Levite of the family of Korah (and therefore probably not identical with the following), who joined David's band at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 6). B.C. 1053.

2. "Son" of Hachmoni, one of David's worthies, and the first named in the two lists which are given of them (1 Chron. xii, 8; 1 Chron. xii, 11). One of these texts is held to have suffered through the negligence of copyists, and, as Jashobeam is not otherwise historically known, commentators have been much embarrassed in comparing them. The former passage attributes to him the defeat of 800, the latter of 500 Philistines; and the question has been whether there is a mistake of figures in one of these accounts, or whether two different expeditor are recorded. Further difficulties will appear in comparing the two texts. We have assumed Jashobeam to be intended in both, but this is open to question. In Chronicles we read, "Jashobeam, the Hachmonite, chief of the captains: he lifted up his spear against 300 men, slay him by one at a time;" but in Samuel [margin.], "Joash-basseb et the Tachmonite, chief among the three, Adino, of Ezni, who lifted up his spear against 800 men, whom he slew." That Jashobeam the Hachmonite and Joash-bash-shebeth the Tachmonite are the same person, is clear; but may not Adino of Ezni, whose name forms the immediate antecedent of the exploit, which, as related here, constitutes the sole discrepancy between the two texts, be another person? Many so explain it, and thus obtain a solution of the difficulty. But a further comparison of the two verses will again suggest that the whole of the verse last cited must be, in fact, broken and interpolated; and if we take the last clause from him and assign it to another, but in doing this we leave the "chief among the captains" without an exploit, in a list which records some feat of every hero. We incline, therefore, to the opinion of those who suppose that Jashobeam, or Jo- ash-bash-shebeth, was the name or title of the chief, Adino and Ezni being descriptive epithets, and Hach- monite the patronymic of the same person; and the remaining discrepancy we account for, not on the supposition of different exploits, but of one of those corrupt words which professional writers often append to the names of those of whom they speak; and therefore to Jashobeam, who was the first of the three (2 Sam. xxiii, 17-18; 1 Chron. xiii, 15-19). B.C. 1045.

3. We also find a Jashobeam who commanded 24,000, and did duty in David's court in the month Nisan (1 Chron. xxviii, 2). He was the son of Zabadiel; if, therefore, he was the same as the foregoing Jashobeam, his patronymic of "the Hachmonite" must be referred to his race or office rather than to his immediate father. See Hachmoni.

Jas'hab [or Jas' veh] (Heb. Yashakub, יָשָּׁק, returner; once by error, יָשָׁק, Yashak), in text 1 Chron. vii, 1; Sarcar, Punt, in Numb. Yoseph, יֵשֹּׁפֶּה, Sept. יֵשֹׁפֶּה, the name of two men, or, perhaps, the last is rather a place. See also SHEAR-JASHUB.

2. The third named of the four of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. viii, 26; 2 Chron. xxvi, 24); called Joes (perhaps by contraction or corruption [or possibly only by substitution, both having the same meaning, one from בֵּית, in the parallel passage (Gen. xlvii, 13). B.C. 1856. His descendants were called Jashubites (Hebrew Yashakib, יָשָּׁק), Sept. יֵשֹׁפֶּה, Numb. xxvi, 24).

2. One of the "sons" (former residents) of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Esra x. 29). B.C. 435.

Jash ub-lehem (Heb. Yashub-lehem, יָשֻׁב-לֵהֶם, "in pause" La'hem, יָשֻׁב-לֵהֶם, returning home from battle or for food; Sept. ἀποδιώκθη αὐτόν ou v. i. ἀναφέρεται αὐτόν εἰς Λα'hem, Vulg. reversi sunt in La'hem), apparently a person named as a descendent of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 22). B.C. perhaps cir. 995, since it added at the end of the list. "And these are ancient things. These were the potters, and those that dwell among plants and herbs together with the king [Solomon; but, according to some, Pharaoh, during the residence in Egypt for his work.] Possibly, however, "it is a place, and we should infer from its connection with Maresha and Choeza—Ychoza be of Choeza or Jeshub— that it lay on the western side of the tribe, in or near the Shepheriah or the Shephelah. The Jewish explanations, as seen in Jerome's Quast. Hebr. on this passage, and, in a slightly different form, in the Tarqum on the Chronicles (ed. Wilkins, p. 29, 30), mentions of Moab as the key to the whole. Choeza is Elinelech. Joash and Saraph are Mahlon and Chilion, who had Jā‘son (‘šowm, he that will cure, originally the name of the leader of the Argonauta), a common Greek name, which was frequently adopted by Hellenizing Jews as the equivalent of Jesus, according to the company Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 1; Aristob. Hist. apud Papyry, p. 7), probably with some reference to its supposed connection with ἰάσωμα (i.e. the healer). A parallel change occurs in Acantrim (Eliakim), while Nicolaus, Donthina, Meneiaus, etc., were direct translations of Hebrew names. It occurs with reference to several men in the Apocrypha, and once in the New Testament.

1. JASON, THE SON OF ELKAZER (comp. Exclus. 1, 27, Ἱασωμός τὸς Ἑλκαζῆς, Codex A), was one of the commissions sent by Judas Maccabaeus, in conjunction with Eupolemus, to conclude a treaty of amity and mutual support, with the Romans. B.C. 161 (1 Macc. xvi, 17; Josephus, Ant. xii, 10, 6).

2. JASON, THE FATHER OF ANTIPATER, who was an envoy to Rome to renew the treaty, at a later period, under Jonathan Maccabaeus, in conjunction with Numenius, the son of Antiochus (1 Macc. xii, 16; xiv, 29), is probably the same as No. 1.

3. JASON OF CYRENE, in Africa, was a Hellenizing Jew of the race of those whom Polynes Soter sent into Egypt (2 Macc. i; Josephus, Ant. xii, 1; Pseudoconn, ii, 176). He wrote in five books the history of Judas Maccabaeus and his brethren, and the principal transactions of the Jews during the reigns of Seleucus IV Philopator, Antiochus IV Epiphanes, and Antiochus V Eupator (B.C. 187-162), from which five books most of the second book of Maccabees (q. v.) is abridged.

In all probability it was written in Greek, and, from the fact of its including the wars under Antiochus V Eupator, it must have been written after B.C. 162. The sources from which Jason obtained his information are unknown, and it is not certain when either he or his epitomizer lived. All that we know of his history is contained in the few verses of the 2d Macc. ii, 19-28.

4. JASON, HIGH-PRIEST, was the second son of Simon II, and the brother of Onias III. His proper name was Jason, but he had changed it to that of Jason (Ἰάσωμος ᾗ ἄνων μετωποσαῖον) [Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 1]. Shortly after the accession of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, Jason offered to the king 440 talents of yearly tribute if he would invest him with the high-priesthood, to the exclusion of his elder brother (4 Macc. iv, 17) (B.C. cir. 175). Jasonus says that Onias III was dead on the accession of Jason to the high-priesthood, and that Jason received this post in consequence of his nephew, Onias IV, the son of Jason and his wife, an infant (Ant. xii, 5).

Jason also offered a further 150 talents for the license "to set him up a place of exercise, and for the training up of youth in the fashions of the heathen" (2 Macc. iv, 7-9; Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 1). This offer was immediately accepted by Antiochus, and Jason built a gymnasium at Jerusalem. The effect of this innovation was to produce a stronger tendency than ever for Greek fashions and heathenish manners, and they so increased under the superstition of the wicked Jason that the priests despaired the Temple, and "hardened to be partakers of the unlawful allowance in the place of exercise, after the game of Diceus (q. v.) called them forth" (2 Macc. iv, 14). Some of the Jews even "made themselves uncircumcised," that they might appear to be Greeks when they were naked (1 Macc. i, 15; Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 1). At last, as was the custom of the cities who used to send embassies to Tyre in honor of Hercules (Curcius, iv, 2; Polybius, Hist. xxxi, 20, 12), Jason sent special messengers (Σαραπισχὸς) from Jerusalem, who were the newly-elected citizens of Antioch (Ἄντιοχος Ἔπιφανος; comp. 2 Macc. iv, 9), to carry 300 drachmes of silver to the sacrifice of that god. See Hercules. The money, however, contrary to the wish of the sender, was not used for the expenses of Hercules, but for the support of the triremes, because the bearers of it did not think it proper (κατὰ τὰς μακαρίας) to employ it for the sacrifice (2 Macc. iv, 19, 20). In B.C. 172 Jason also gave a festival to Antiochus when he visited Jerusalem, Jason and the citizens leading him by torch-light and with great shoutings (2 Macc. iv, 19, 22). Josephus, in speaking of this visit, but says that it was an expedition against Jerusalem, and that Antiochus, upon obtaining possession of the city, slew many of the Jews, and plundered it of a great deal of money (Ant. xii, 5, 9). The crafty Jason, however, soon found a yet more cunning kinsman, who removed him from his office in much the same manner as he had done with his brother, Onias III. Menelaus, the son of Simon (Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 1; Simon's brother, 2 Macc. iv, 28), governor of the Temple, having been sent by Jason to Antiochus, knew how, through flattery and by offering 900 talents more than Jason, to gain the favor of the king. He accordingly immediately gave him the office of high-priest, and Jason was forced to flee into the country of the Ammonites (2 Macc. iv, 26). See Menelaus.

In B.C. 170, Antiochus having undertaken his second expedition into Egypt, there was a rumor that he was dead, and Jason made an attack upon Jerusalem and committed many atrocities. He was, however, forced again to flee into the country of the Ammonites (2 Macc. v, 5-7). At length, being accused before Aretas, king of the Arabs, he was compelled "to flee from city to city, pursued of all men, and being held in more contempt than as an open enemy of his country and countrymen," and eventually retired into Egypt (2 Macc. v, 8).

He afterwards retired to take refuge among the Lacedaemonians, "thinking there to find succor by reason of his kindness" (2 Macc. v, 9; compare 1 Macc. vii, 21; Josephus, Ant. xii, 4, 10; see Pseudoconn, ii, 149; Franchel, Monastichia, 1859, p. 456), and perished miserably "in a strange land" (comp. Dan. xii, 30 sq.; Macc. i, 12 sq.). His body remained without burial, and he had "none to mourn for him" (2 Macc. v, 5, 10). See High-Priest.

5. JASON OF THessalonica was the host of Paul and Silas at Philippi. In consequence of this house was assaulted by the Jews in order to seize the apostle, but, not finding him, they dragged Jason and other brethren before the ruler of the city, who released them on security (Acts xvii, 5-9). A.D. 48. He appears to have been the same as the Jason mentioned in Rom. xvi, 21 as one of the Seven Men of Paul, and perhaps he accompanied him from Thessalonica to Corinth (A.D. 54). He was not one of those who accompanied the apostle into Asia, though Lightfoot conjectures that Jason and Secundus were the same person (Acts xx, 4). Alford says Secundus is altogether unknown (Acts i. c.). According to tradition, Jason was bishop of Tarsus (Fabricius, Luz Evangelii, p. 91, 92).

Jasper (Ἰασπίς, jaspehke, prob. polished or glittering, ἰαστρος), a gem of various colors, as purple, cerulean, but mostly green like the emerald, though duller in hue (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxviii, 9, 9; Epiphanius, De Gem. § 6; Braun, De Vest. Succur. ii, 19). It was the last of the twelve inscribed in the zodiacal signs, represented as a shield on Exod. xxiii, 20; xxxiii, 13, and the first of the twelve used in the foundation of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi, 19): the difference in the order seems to show that no emblematical importance was attached to that feature. It was used in the Tarsian whetstone (ἰκυφυγία, the wall of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi, 18). It further appears among the stones which adorned the king of Tyre (Ezek. xxviii, 13). Lastly, it is the emblematical image of the glory of the divine Being (Rev. iv, 3). The characteristics of the stone, as far as they are specified in Scripture (Rev. xxi, 11), are

The document contains information about various historical figures, events, and religious contexts, mostly from the Jewish and Christian traditions. It refers to figures such as Jason, who was accused of treason and fled to Egypt, and Menelaus, who replaced him as high priest. It also mentions the Jespers of Thessalonica and Tyre, and discusses the significance of the gem Jasper in the New Testament. The text is rich in historical and religious detail, reflecting the complex interactions between Judaism, Hellenism, and the early Christian Church. that it was 'most precious,' and 'like crystal' (καρφαλονωμένον), not exactly as clear as crystal, as in the A.V., but of a crystal hue: the term is applied to it in this sense by Diodorus Siculus (v. 109: λίθος ιδυαίος καὶ πις τεχνῶν εἰς καρφαλονωμένον). We may also infer from Rev. iv, 8 that it was a stone of brilliant and transparent light." The ancient Jasper thus appears to have been frequently translucent, but the modern is opaque. A brown variety existed in Egypt. The Jasper is also anumber of other varieties; others being comprehended under various precious stones not readily identifiable (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Alterthum, IV, i, 42; Moore's Anc. Min. p. 168). What is now properly called Jasper by mineralogists is a sub-species of rhombohedral quartz, of several varieties, mostly the common, the Etiopian, and the Striped Jaspis or Tertiary Jasper. It is a yellowish, white, green, reddish, etc., sometimes spotted or banded; occurring either in masses or loose crystals, and susceptible of a fine polish (see the Lond. Encyclopædia, s. v.). See Gem.

Jaspis, Gottfried Siegmund, a German theologian, born at Meissen April 8, 1766. He was educated at the University of Leipzig, and entered the ministry in 1792 as pastor at Pichau. In 1814 he was called to the Niculai church at Leipzig, where he died, Feb. 15, 1823. While he distinguished himself greatly as a preacher, it is particularly as a writer in Biblical literature that Jaspis's name deserves to be mentioned here. He wrote an excellent Lect. on the apostolic epistles (Lips. 1783-55; new ed. 1821, 8vo). His polemical and homiletical works are now no longer regarded as of any value. "He was a man of pure and serious, and pious, and a good scholar and preacher."—Kitto, Cyclop. s. v.—Adelung's Addenda to Jocher, Gesch. der Lehren, s. v.

Jassasa, At. (or the Spy), a Mohammedan name for a beast which is to be one of their signs of the approach of the day of judgment: "When the sentence shall be ready to fall upon them, we will cause a beast to come forth unto them out of the earth, which shall speak unto them. It is supposed by them that it will appear first in the temple of Mecca, or on Mount Saba, or in the territory of Tayef. She is to be a monster in size, and so swift that no human being shall be able to pursue her in her rapid flight through this world, marking the believers from the unbelievers, "that every person may be known, and shall know what he really is." See Sale, Prelin. Dissert. de lo Koran, p. 79; Broughton, Biblioth. Hist. Sac. i, 506.

Jauinia (Ἰαυϊνία), the Græceized form (1 Esd. ix, 30) of the Heb. name (Ezra x, 29) JASHUB (q. v.).

Jataka (literally relating to birth) is the name of a Buddhististic work consisting of a series of books which contain about an account of 550 previous births of Sakyamuni, or Buddha. Several tales that pass under the name of Record of Fables are to be found in this collection of legends. See Buddhism.

Jatāla (Arāp v. i' Arāla), a corrupt Greek form (1 Esd. v, 28) of the Heb. name (Ezra x, 42; Neh. vii, 45) ATER (q. v.).

Jathniel (Heb. Yathnīl, יָתְנִיֵל), given by God, otherwise praiser of God; Sept. No'Sin v. No'Za, v. 1'Zoràh, the fourth son of Meshelemiah, one of the seventy-two gate-keepers of the Temple (1 Chron. xxvi, 2). B.C. 1014.

Jat'ir (Heb. Yattir, יַטִּיר [in Josh. xv, 48, elsewhere "defective" m]), pre-revenient; Sept. 1'Qēr or *1'Zor*A, a city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv, 48, where it is named between Shamir and Soco) assigned to the priests (Josh. xxii, 14; 1 Chron. vi, 57). It was one of the places in the south where David used to haunt in his freebooting days, and to his friends in which he sent gifts from the spoil of the enemies of Jehovah (1 Sam. xxx, 27). The two Ithrite heroes of David are admitted as having been stationed at Jatir (2 Sam. xxiii, 38; 1 Chron. xi, 40) fairly possibly from Jattir, living memorials to him of his early difficulties. According to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast.* s. v. Jethir), it was in their day a very large hamlet inhabited by Christians, twenty Roman miles from Eleutheropolis in the district of the Darabs near Molath (Reland, Palästina, p. 885). It is identified by Halm in the Jewish traveller; but the passage is defective, and little can be gathered from it (Zinz, in Asher's Benj. of Tudda, ii, 442). The required position answers nearly to that of the modern village of *'Al'īya, discovered by Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 194, 625) in this region, "marked by caves upon a hill" (comp. Wilson, Lands. of Bible, i, 188), and situated fifteen miles south of Hebron, and five north of Moladah (Schwarz, Palestine, p. 105). It contains extensive ruins (Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 388).

Jauffret, Gaspard Jean André Joseph, a French Protestant theologian, was born at La Roque-Brouse, province, Dec. 18, 1799. He was educated at Ton- lon and Aix, then entered the Church, and was made canon of Aup. He subsequently went to Paris, where he continued his theological studies under the priests of St. Roch and St. Sulpice, and in 1791 established the periodical Annales des Études. In 1796 he took a stand against the civil constitution of the clergy. He afterwards became one of the editors of the Annales Religieuses. About 1801 he acted as vicar-general of Cardinal Fesch, at Lyon, during the latter's embassy to Rome, and he was one of the four who made the attempt to reconcile the Catholic and Protestant churches to the Concordat. Cardinal Fesch subsequently called him to Paris, where Jauffret established a number of religious societies, and obtained many privileges for divers congregations of monks and nuns through the influence of his patron. Made chaplain of the emperor, he was in July, 1806, appointed bishop of Metz, and consecrated Dec. 3 of the same year, still retaining his imperial chaplainship. This position he improved by establishing a number of seminaries and Roman Catholic schools all kinds. In 1810 he was one of the persons sent to meet the archduchess Maria Louisa, and subsequently became her confessor. In 1811 he was rewarded for his zeal in promoting the divorce of Napoleon from his first wife by the archbishopric of Aix; but he never really held this position, on account of the difficulties between the pope and the emperor, and finally felt constrained to renounce it. He died at Paris May 18, 1823. He wrote De la Religion et de la Philos. (1775, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed. 1815);—Mémoire pour servir à l'Hist., de la Religion et de la Philosophie (Anon. Paris, 1862, 2 vols. 8vo), besides a number of controversial and practical works on the De la Religion (in 64-74; Chronique Religieuse, vi, 298-308; Quérard, La Franc. Littérature; Hofrat, Nouv. Buv. Générale, xxvi, 410 sq. (J. N. P.)

Java, an island in the Malay archipelago, and, after Sumatra and Borneo, the largest in the Sunda group. It is the principal seat of the Dutch power in the East. The island is 680 miles long, by 330 miles broad, and has an area of 49,700 square miles. The population has very rapidly increased since the beginning of the 19th century. While in 1812 it amounted only to 4,500,000 inhabitants, it increased in 1845 9,560,000 (of whom 106,000 Chinese, 31,216 Arabs, 16,437 Europeans and their descendants, and 511 slaves); in 1864, 13,649,680 (26,460 Europeans, and 156,300 Chinese); and in 1884, 20,835,654 (Europeans, 35,000; Chinese, 215,000). The natives belong to the Malay race, but to two different nations—the Javanese in the east, and the less numerous and less civilized people in the west. They are a peaceable, frugal, and industrious people, who have made great progress in agriculture than any other people of Asia except the Chinese and Japanese. In 1827 Java was invaded by the Arabs, who subjugated the whole island, and established in it the Moham- medan rule. In 1830 only in a very small portion of Java remains a few thousand worshipers of Buddha and Brah- ma remain. The ruins of many temples, images, and tome prove, however, that at an early period Brahmanism struck deep root among the people. The Portuguese, who came to Java in 1575, as well as the British of the Society of Jesus, the Dutch, who established themselves in Java in 1594, and steadily advanced in the conquest of the island until only two native states were left—Soerakarta, or Solo, with 690,000 inhabitants, and Djodjikarta, with 340,000 inhabitants. From 1811 to 1816 the island was under the rule of the Dutch, who, having conquered Java in 1811, in 1816 it was restored to the Dutch. In consequence of the bad administration a number of outbreaks took place, among which, in particular, that of Djepo Negro, in 1825, was very dangerous, until at length the govers, Van der Capellen and Jan van den Bosh, succeeded, by encouraging agriculture and other measures, in developing the productivity and prosperity of the island to a high degree. In accordance with a decree of Jan. 1, 1860, slavery was abolished in Java, as well as in all the Dutch colonies. During the rule of the Portuguese the Catholic missionaries and several native congregations, of which only a few remain, are at Batavia and Depok. The Dutch government was decidedly opposed to missionary labor, and Protestant missions were not begun until the island passed, in 1811, under the rule of England. The first society in the field was the London Missionary Society, which was soon followed by the English Baptists. But both missions confined their efforts chiefly to the Chinese and the Malays. Their missionaries were allowed to remain after the restoration of the Dutch administration, but they had to submit to many restrictions, until, in 1842, all the non-Dutch missionaries in the island were forbidden to perform any missionary labours. Thus only the Rotterdam Missionary Society, which had begun its operations in Batavia and the neighborhood in 1820, was able to continue the missionary work. A new impulse was given to the labors of this society by a journey of inspection in Java, the part of its inspection station was established at Samarang, and a second very promising field opened in the province of Surabaya, with Modjo Warno as centre, whence the mission extended to Kediri and Malang. The society, in 1866, supported in the neighborhood, in particular among the Malays and Chinese, and took several steps to establish the Society of Christian Missions and the Dutch Indian Missions.
In 1854 the Mennonite Missionary Society at Amsterdam (Doodgezinde Vereeniging) began its operations at Djapara, while the Nederlands Zendingen Vereeniging, which was established in 1858, opened missions among the Sundanese, to whom it has also undertaken to give a translation of the Bible. It employed in 1866 five missionaries, and had four stations. The Nederl.
Gereformeerde Zendingen Vereeniging has also established several missions (in 1866 three missionaries) in Java, and the Utrecht Missionary Society has begun missionary operations on the neighboring island of Bali, where Buddhism is prevalent. The Protestant missions continue to be anything but favorable to the missions, but patronize the diffusion of education, and has rec-established for that purpose a native normal school at Bandong. The Roman Catholic Church has a vital force in the city of Batavia. The government pays the salaries of eight priests. The Catholic population consists almost exclusively of Dutch soldiers and Indo-Portuguese.—Newcomb, Cyclopaedia of Missions; Grinnelmann, Missions-Atlas; Wetter u. Wilte, town of Arabia Felix, whence the Syriacs procured manufactures of iron, cassia, and calamus (Ezek. xxvii, 19); present the Sarmas mentioned in the Cunei. (p. 187) as "a town of Yemen," and "a port of Inambah." Some confound this with the preceding name (Credner and Hitzig, on Joel iii, 6; see Meier on Joel, p. 166), but Tuch (on Gen, p. 210) suggests that it may have been so named as having been founded by a colony of Greeks. B. Weckerling (see Haverkamp ad loc.) in an associated word (נַפַּע from Usal, for נַפַּע, guen, i.e. thread), some critics have thought they find another place mentioned in the same vicinity (see Bochart, Pha- leg, i, ii, 21; Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geog. iii, 296-305).

Javelin is the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of two Heb. terms: נְעַלָּה (chanah), so called from its flexibili- ty, a lance (1 Sam. xviii, 10, 11; xix, 9, 10; xx, 33; elsewhere "spear"); and נְעִיל (ro'mach, from its pierci- ng), a lance for heavy-armed troops (Numb. xxv, 7; 3, 17, i.e. spear-head, 1 Kings xviii, 28; "buckler," incorrectly, 1 Chron. xii, 8; elsewhere "spear"). See ARMOR.

Jaw (usually and properly קַנַּה, lehi'), rendered also "jaw-bone," once בְּכַנְיָא (malochaim), "Jaw," Pan. xxii, 15, elsewhere "prey;" also בְּכַנְיָא, methaloth, "jaws," Job xxxix, 17; "jaw teeth," Prov. xxx, 14; "cheek teeth," Joel i, 6. The denuded jaw-bone of an ass afforded Samsen (q.v.) a not unsuitable weapon (see Seiflerhorn, De mollis austin, Tübingen, 1716) for the greatest carnage which he once effected (Judg. xv, 15). See LEIT.

Jay, William, a very distinguished English Independent minister, was born at Tisbury, county of Wilts, May 8, 1769. He was the son of a poor stone-cutter, and obtained his education by the influence and charity of friends he made as a youth, distinguishing himself even then in great natural abilities and early acquisition. When not quite sixteen years of age he began preaching, and before he had passed his minority he is said to have delivered no less than 1000 sermons. Like Wesley, he often preached out-doors; and he himself relates the history of his early life thus: "In the milder seasons which would allow of it, we often addressed large numbers out of doors; and many a clear and calm evening I have preached down the day on the corner of a common, or upon the green turf before the cottage door. These neighborhoods were supplied sometimes weekly and sometimes nightly, both on week-days and on the Sabbath. We always on the Sabbath avoided, if possible, the church hours; and on week-days we commonly omitted the services during the hay and corn harvest, that we might not give reasonable offence to the farmers, or entice the peasants away from their labor before their usual time. I would also remark that we did not always, in these efforts, encounter much opposition; indeed, I remember only a few instances in which we suffered persecution from violence or rude- ness." Jan. 31, 1791, he was made preacher of Argyle Chapel, Bath, and here he labored for sixty-two years with great distinction. Jay was not excelled even by the greatest of pulpit orators for which England has been so justly celebrated within the last 100 years. John Foster calls him the "prince of preachers;" Sheridan pronounced him "the most natural orator" he had ever heard. Janma Havelock, as a lover who filled him "with wonder and delight;" and Beckford as possessing a mind like a "clear, transparent stream, flowing so freely as to impress us with the idea of its being inexhaustible." He died Dec. 27, 1838, "beloved and trusted by religious professors of all sects" (London Athenæum, Sept. 30, 1834). "Mr. Jay was not only a pious and eminently successful preacher, but a very genial and interesting man; a sagacious observer, yet of child-like simplicity in taste and disposition; possessed of a fine, though sometimes quaint humor; a most instructive and pleasant companion, rich in anecdote and remi- niscence, and able, from personal knowledge, to give living sketches of most of the eminent men who had appeared in the religious world, high-flying bigotry excepted, during the latter part of the 18th and the earlier part of the present century. . . . He was not a strict Calvinist, for he did not believe in the 'exclusive' part of the Calvinistic creed in any form. He believed in 'two grand truths'—that if we are saved, it is entirely of the grace of God; and if we are lost, it will be on account of ourselves. He held to these firmly, though he might not see the connection between them. 'The connection,' he says, 'is like a chain across the river; I can see the two ends, but not the middle; not because there is no real union, but because it is under water. As to his relation to me, Mr. Jay inclined, in his way, to Presbyteryanism, with a special leaning, perhaps, on one point—that of mutual ministerial oversight and responsi- bility—to Wesleyan Methodism. But he did not believe any particular form of polity to be of divine au- thority" (London Quart. Review, 1854, p. 558 sq.). Best known of his varied and extensive writings are Morning and Evening Exercises (vol. i-v of the collective edition of his Works, ed. of 1842) —The Christian Contemplator (vol. vi of his Works; —Mornings with Jesus (1845, 8vo). His Works were published entire (Bath, 1842-44, 12 vol.; London, 1853, 3 vols; 8vo). See Autobiogra- phy of the Rev. William Jay, with Remarks on Some distinguished Contemporaries, Selections from his Cor- respondence, etc., edited by George Redford, D.D., LL.D., and John Angell James (London, 1854, 8vo; 3d ed. 1858). Jayadeva, a celebrated Hindu poet, who, according to some, lived about the middle of the 11th, according to others about the middle of the 16th century after Christ. His most renowned work is the Gitagovinda, an extensive poem in honor of the Hindu deity Krishna (an incarnation of Vishnu) and his wife Radha. It is interpreted both in a literal and a mys- terial sense.

Jaynes, Peter, a pioneer Methodist Episcopal min- ister, born at Marblehead, Mass., in 1778, entered the itinerancy in 1797, and in 1805-6 was stationed in Bos- ton, where he died Sept. 5, 1806. Mr. Jayne was a man of great promise and rare abilities. His style was terse and vigorous, his piety consistent, and his manners in- genuous. His early death was deplored by his brethren as the eclipse of a morning star. See Minutes of Con- ferences, i, 146; Stevens, Memorials of Methodism, i, ch. xxiv, 304.

Jaz'ar (גַּזִּירַ ו' ya'zir), a Gounced form (1 Mac. v, 8) of Jazzer (q.v.).

Jazzer (Name. xxiiii, 1, 5; Josh. xxxii, 39; 2 Sam. xxiv, 5; 1 Chron. vi, 81; xxvii, 31; Isa. xvi, 8, 9; Jer. xliv, 32). See JAZZER.

Jaziz (Heb. Ḥāzīz, יָזוּז prominent; Sept. Ḥāzīz, v. t. 'Aziz), a Hagarite overseer of David's flocks (1 Chron. xxvii, 31), which were probably pastured on the east of Jordan, in the nomad country where the fore- fathers of Jacob had for ages roaming (comp. 19-39). B.C. 1014. See HAGARITE.

Jealousy (אֵרֶץ, אֵרֶץ), properly the feeling of suspicion of a wife's purity (Numb. v, 14); often used of Jeovah's sensitive regard for the true faith of his Church (Exod. xx, 5, etc.; 2 Cor. xi, 2). See Mar- riage. The same term is sometimes used for anger or indignation, or an intense interest for the honor and prosperity of another (Isa. xxvii, 5; 1 Cor. x, 22; 22; Jez. 1, 14; vii, 2). Conjugal jealousy is one of the strongest passions of our nature (Prov. vi, 34; Cant. viii, 6). When God is said to be a jealous God, or to be moved to jeal- ousy, or when the still stronger expression is used, "Je- hoval, whose name is Jealous" (Exod. xxiv, 14), we are to understand this language as employed to illustrate, rather than to represent, the emotions of the divine mind. The same causes operating upon the human mind would produce what we call anger, jealousy, repentance, grief, etc., upon these occasions. It is ascribed to the mind of God, this language is used because such emotions can be represented to us by no other. Thus God is represented to us as a husband, related to His Church by a marriage covenant that binds her to be wholly for him, and not for another. The marriage altar in the temple is the heart to the approach of a rival; and the thought of such affection being alienated or corrupted fills the soul with grief and indignation. So God commends the purity, the fervency, and the sincerity of his love to his Church by the most terrific expressions of jealousy. See Idolatry.

JEALOUSY, IMAGE OF (ἐνοχὴ πνεύματος, Sept., εἴπων τοῦ ζηλοῦσα, Vulg. idolor zeli), an idyllic object seen by the prophet in that remarkable vision which portrayed to him the abominations that called down the divine vengeance on Jerusalem (Ezek. viii, 8). See Imagery, Chamber of. It stood upon a pedestal (ἡ ἀρχή) within the inner or priests' court of the Temple, adjoining the great altar, and seems to have been identical with the column of Asaph among the lusty youths that had the audacious effrontery to erect within the sacred precincts (2 Kings xxii, 7). See Ashrethoth. This idol, arresting the attention of all who came to worship just as they entered, claimed, as the rival of Jehovah, their adoration, and thus was peculiarly offensive to the God of heaven (see Henderson, Commentary, ad loc.; Bindermann, De tolo zeli, Freib. 1757). See Idol.

JEALOUSY-OFFERING (ἔνοχη ἐνοχῆς, Septuag. Swivανοκυρίοις, Vulgate oblatio sotothor) was the name of a "meat-offering" which a husband was to bring when he subjected his wife, under charge of adultery, before the priest, to the ordeal of the bitter waters (Numb. v, 11 sq.). It consisted of a tenth of an ephah of barley-meal, without oil or frankincense. The priest must wave it (ver. 25), and burn a handful on the altar (ver. 26). The Mishna gives more minute directions (Sotah, ii, 1; iii, 1, 6). See Adultery. Barley, as an inferior grain to wheat (Phedrus, ii, 8, 9), was symbolical of the suspected condition of the wife (Philo, Opp. ii, 907). Oil and incense, as emblems of joy and piety, were obviously unsuitable to the occasion. See Offering.

JEALOUSY, WATERS OF CURSE, (צראות, Numb. v, 19, bitter waters that curse, Sept. τὸ ἔργον τοῦ ἶππαρκοῦρον, Vulg. aqua invenien- sima in quas maledicta congruit, A. V. "this bitter water that cause the curse") (see Acoluthi, De aquis amartis maledictionem inferentibus [Lips. 1621]). When a Hebrew wife was suspected of adultery, her husband brought her first before the judges, and, if she still asserted her innocence, he required that she drink the waters of jealousy, that God might, by these means, discover what she attempted to conceal (Numb. v, 12, etc.). The further details are thus described by Dr. Clarke (Com. ad loc.) from the rabbinical authorities (comp. Wagenesel's Sota, pass.): 14: The man then produced his witnesses, and they were heard. After this, both the man and the woman were conveyed to Jerusalem, and placed before the Sanhedrin; and if she persisted in denying the fact, she was led to the eastern gate of the court of Israel, stripped of her own clothes, and dressed in black, before great numbers of her own sex. The priest then told her that, if she was really innocent, she had nothing to fear; but if guilty, she might expect to suffer all that the law had denounced against her, to which she answered 'Amen, amen.' The priest then wrote the terms of the law in this form: 'If a strange man hath not come near you, and you are not polluted by forsaking the bed of your husband, these bitter waters, which I have cursed, will not hurt you; but if you have polluted yourself by coming near to another man, and gone astray from your husband, may you be accursed of the Lord, and become an example for all his people; may your thigh rot, and your belly fall out; may these cursed waters enter into your belly, and, being swallowed therewith, may your thighs putrefy.' After this, the priest filled a pitcher out of the brazen vessel near the altar of burnt-offerings, cast some dust of the pavement into it, mingled something with it as bitter as wormwood, and then read the curse to the woman, who received it, in case of perjury, by an other priest in the mean time tore off her clothes as low as her bosom, made her head bare, untied the tresses of her hair, fastened her clothes (which were thus torn) with a girdle under her breast, and then presented her, with the tenth part of an ephah, or about three pints of barley-meal. The other priest sprinkled of what was left of jealousy or bitterness to drink, and, as soon as the woman had swallowed them, she gave her the meal, in a vessel like a frying-pan, into her hand. This was stirred before the Lord, and part of it thrown into the fire of the altar. If the husk of the curse was mingled in the cup, it was instantly carried out with these symptoms upon her, and died immediately, with all the ignominious circumstances related in the curses."

This ordeal appears to have contained the essence of an oath varied for the purpose of peculiar solemnity, so that a woman would naturally hesitate to take such an oath, understood to be an appeal to heaven of the most solemn kind, and designed to be accompanied, in case of perjury, by most painful and fatal effects. The drinking appears to have been a symbolical action. When "the priest wrote the curses in a book," and washed those curses into the water which was to be drunk, the water was understood to be impregnated as it were, or to be structured with the terrors of the accountability of which it received; so that now it was metaphorically bitter, containing the curse in it. The drinking of this curse, though conditionally effective or non-effective, could not but have a great effect on the woman's mind, and an answerable effect on the husband; it was designed to cure and to dissipate. We read of no instance in which the trial took place; and, if the administration of the ordeal were really infrequent, we may regard that as an evidence of its practical utility, for it would seem that the trial and its result were so dreadful that the guilt was often confessed and their punishment earnestly exerted to do, than go through it. The rabbis say that a woman who confessed in such circumstances was not put to death, but only divorced without dowry. It has been well remarked that this species of ordeal could not injure the innocent at all, or punish the guilty except by a miracle, whereas in the ordeals by fire, etc., in the Dark Ages, the innocent could scarcely escape except by a miracle. See Adultery.

Jeanes, Henry, an English divine, was born at Alnensy, county of Somerset, in 1611, and was educated at Oxford University. He held first the rectory of Bibercomb and Capland, and, after Walter Raleigh's expulsion, the rectory of Chedzoy. He died in 1602. Jeanes wrote several theological tracts: The Image Unbroken, was generally believed to be written by James Watt ascribes the work to Joseph Jane (see Allibone, Dict. of Authors, p. 957).—Hook, Eccles. Biogr. vi, 280. Je'ärīm (Heb. יְאֵרִים, יְבָאֵרִים, forests; Sept. Ια- ρηῆς), the name of a mountain on the border of Judah, between Mount Seir and Beth-shemesh (Josh. xv, 10): stated to be the site of Chebalon (q.v.). Kaola stands, seven miles due west of Jerusalem, "on a high point on the north slope of the lofty ridge between wady Ghurab and wady Isma'il. The hill is the northern continuation of wady Beii-Hanina, and the former runs parallel to and northward of it, and they are separated by this ridge, which is probably Mount Jearim" (Robinson, New Researches, p. 154). "Forests, in our sense of the word, there are none; but we have the latest traveller that "such thorough woods, both for loneliness and obscurity, he had not seen since he left Germany" (Tobler, Wanderung, 1857, p. 178).—Smith. Perhaps the hill behind Kuryet el-Knab may be Mount Seir; from it the border "passed over (wady Ghurab) to the shoulder " of Mount Jearim . . . and then went down to Beth-shemesh." It may be that a considerable district of the mountains in this locality was called Jearim, for Boast is called Kirjath-Jearim ("the town of Jearim"); and if so, then we can see the reason why the explanatory phrase is added, "Mount Jearim, which is Chebalon," to limit the more general appellative to the narrow ridge between the two lands (see Keel on Josh. 3; loc. cit. Vetter, Handbook for S. and Pal. p. 290). See Kirjath-Jearim.

Jesus (Heb. Yehus, יֵעָשׁ, trodden hard, i. e. perhaps, firmness; Sept. Ἰησοῦς, the name of the ancient Canaanitish city which stood on Mount Zion, one of the hills on which Jerusalem was built (Jebus, Josh. xvii, 8; xviii, 16, 25). In Judg. xix, 10 it is identified with Jerusalem and in I Chron. xvi, 4, 5, the only other passage in which the city is mentioned, it is identified with the city of Zion, subsequently called the castle or city of David. The sides of Zion descended precipitously on the west and south into the deep valley of Hinnom, and on the east into the Tyropoion, which separated it from Moriah. On the north side a branch valley, the upper part of which was swept round by the Euphrates, was a ledge of rock on which a massive tower was afterwards founded, perhaps on the site of an older one. Recent excavations on the site remarkably corroborate these facts. See Jerusalem. Jesus was thus naturally a place of great strength; and, being strongly fortified besides, it is not strange that the Jebusites should have glorified in it as impregnable (see Rose, Premum Jebusorum castri expugnati, Alt. 1729), and that the capture of it by David should have been considered one of his most brilliant achievements (2 Sam. v, 8). Even after the walls were secured, and Jerusalem founded and made the capital of Israel, Zion was always held in respect. It seemed that in addition to the "castle" on the summit of the hill there was a lower city or suburb, perhaps lying in the bottom of the adjoining valleys; for we read that the children of Judah had captured and burned the Jebusites (Josh. xi, 7, 8), while afterwards it is said that the Benjamites did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem" (ver. 21). The Jebusites still held the "castle," which was within the allotted territory of Benjamin, but the children of Judah drove them out of the lower town, which was situated within their borders. This is, in substance, the explanation given by Josephus (Ant. v, 2 and 5). See Jebusite.

Jesus (Heb. Yehus, יֵעָשׁ, a word used in the original of a place and its inhabitants.

1. "Jesus"וּאֵשׁ—the Jebusite; Sept. Ιησοῖς, Ἰησοῦς, Vulg. Jebusorum, the name employed for the city of Jesus, only in the ancient document describing the landmarks and the towns of the allotment of Judah (ver. xvi); described in the same way as a real, and last place, the explanatory words, "which is Jerusalem," are added. In the first, however, our translators have given it as "the Jebusite." A parallel to this mode of designating the town by its inhabitants is found in this very list in Zemarim (xxviii, 22), Avim (xxvii, 20), Onphi (ver. 24), and Japhletite (xvi, 5), etc.

2. "Jebusit" or "Jebusites," forms indiscriminately employed in the A. V., although in the original the name, whether applied to individuals or to the nation, is never found in the plural; always singular. The full form is יִבְשִׁיט, but in a few places—viz. 2 Sam. v, 6; xxiv, 16, 18; 1 Chron. xxii, 18 only—it is "defectively" written יבשיט. Without the article, יִבוּשּׁי, it occurs in 2 Sam. v, 8; 1 Chron. xi, 6; Zech. ix, 7. In the first of these two the force is much increased by removing the article introduced in the A. V., and reading "and smite a Jebusite." See JEBUSITE.

Jebusite (Heb. יִבְשִׁיט, יִבְשִׁיט, Sept. Ἰβυσσοαῖος, but Ἰβυσσοῖς in Josh. xv, 8; xvii, 29, or Ἰβυσσοί in Judg. xix, 11; 1 Chron. vi, 4; also Ἰβυσσοῖς in Josh. xviii, 16, and Ἰβυσσοί in Ezra ix, 1. A. V. "Jebus" in Josh. xviii, 16, 28), the name of the original inhabitants of Jebus, frequently mentioned (usually last in the list) amongst the seven Canaanitish nations doomed to destruction (Gen. x, 16; xxvi, 21; Exod. iii, 8, 17; xiii, 5; xxiii, 22; xxxii, 20; xxiv, 11; Num. xxxii, 39; Deut. vii, vii, 11; x, 17; Josh. iii, 10; ix, xi, 3; xii, 8; xxiv, 11; Judg. iii, 5; 1 Kings ix, 20; 1 Chron. i, 14; 2 Chron. viii, 7; Ezra i, 4; Neh. vi, 8). They appear to have descented from a grandson of Ham (Gen. x, 16). "His place in the list is between Beth and the Amorites (Gen. x, 16; 1 Chron. i, 14), a position which the tribe maintained long after (Num. xxii, 29; Josh. xi, 3); and the same connection is traceable in the words of Ezekiel (xxx, 49), who addresses Jerusalem as the fruit of the union (בְּהֹרֶנוֹ, אֲנָדֹלָה). At the time of the arrival of the Israelites (see Jour. Soc. lit. Oct. 1851, p. 167) they were found to be a considerable tribe on the west of Jordan (Josh. ix, 1), seated on one of the hills of Judah (some have wrongly inferred Moriah from 2 Chron. iii, 1, but in 2 Sam. v, 9 it is clearly identified with Zion), between the Hittites and Amorites (Num. xiii, 30; Josh. x, 3), where they had founded a city called Jebus (Josh. xviii, 28; comp. xix, 10), probably after the name of their progenitor, and established a royal form of government, being then ruled by Adoni-zedek (Josh. x, 20). See SALEM. They seem to have been a warlike nation, and, although they were terrified with much slaughter, and Adoni-zedek, their king, slain by Joshua (Josh. x), and though a part of their city seems to have been afterwards taken, sacked, and burned by the warriors of Judah (Judg. i, 8), yet they were not wholly subdued, but were able to retain at least their Herodian position. See also the more emphatic statement of it till the time of David (2 Sam. v). Being situated on the border (Josh. xv, 8; xviii, 16), between Judah and Benjamin, to either of which it is indifferently ascribed (Josh. xxv, 63; xviii, 29; Judg. i, 21), it was only to this latter that the text is restricted, and the city or tribe's name occurred to the scribes of the LXX, which at that time, as the tribe of Judah's, became the site of Solomon's Temple (2 Chron. iii, 1). It appears that the Jebusites subsisted under his reign in the state of tributaries or slaves (2 Chron. viii, 7), and even so continued to the times of the return from Babylon (Ezra ix, 1). See JERUSALEM.

The Jebusites are spoken of mostly in the O.T. for the city itself inhabited by them (i.e., "city of the Jebusites," Judg. xix, 11), as in Josh. xv, 8; xviii, 16; also poetically, in later times, for its successor, Jerusalem (Zech. ix, 7). See JEBUSITE.

Jebusites. The site of the triumphal Acts of the Apostles, the ashes of Barnabas, after his martyrdom in Cyprus, are said to have been buried in a cave where the race of the Jebusites formerly dwelt, and previous to this is mentioned the arrival in the island of a pious Jebusite, a kinsman of Nero (Acts. Apost. Apost. p. 72, 73, ed. Tisch.).

Jecamiah (1 Chron. iii, 18). See JECAMIAH.

Jechieli ben-Joseph, of Paris, a Rabbi, flourished in the 18th century. He was a disciple of the celebrated Jehudiah Sir-Leon (q. v.). But little is known of the early history of his life. In the prime of life he find him in Paris, at the head of a theological school, and an officiating Rabbi in the capital of France. During the reign of Louis IX the Romanists made every effort to cause the expulsion of the Jews from France, where they were enjoying at this time special favors. They accused the Jews of manifold crimes, and asserted that the Talmud contained disrespectful language towards Jesus, etc.; and though the king hesitated to believe this, he was finally persuaded to appoint a commission of both Christians and Jews to search the Talmud for obnoxious passages. Of the four Rabbis appointed, Jechieli ben-Joseph headed the Jewish commission, and he alone, in the main, carried on the disputation, which resulted unfavorably to the Jews. In the dispute Jechieli displayed great ability and learning, but it is to be deplored that he injured his cause in the eyes of the historian by the assertion which he made that the name of Jesus occurring in the Talmud does not refer to Jesus the Christ. See JESUS in France; Wagenseil, Tela ignea Saturae (2 vols. 4to); Grütz, Geschichte der Juden, vii, 115 sqq. (J. H. W.)

Jechoniah (2 Kings xv, 2). See JECOILLAH.

Jechonias (יִכְהוֹנְיָיָא), a Grecized form of two Hebrew names occurring in the Apocrypha and N. T.,

1. In Esth. i, 4; Bar. i, 3, 9; Matt. i, 11, 12, for king JEHODOKIN (q. v.).

2. In 1 Esd. viii, 92 for SHECHANIAH (q. v.), who encouraged Ezra in the matter of divorcing the Gentile wives (Esth. iv, 2).

Jecoliah (Heb. יֵכְלוֹיָה, יֵכְלוֹיָה, 2 Chron. xxviii, 3, where the text erroneously has יִכְלֹיָה; Auth. Vers. "Jecholiah;" in 2 Kings xv, 2, the paragogic form יֵכְלוֹיָה, יֵכְלוֹיָה, able through Jecohia, Sept. יִכְלָיָה; Josephus 'Αρχίλας, An. ix, 10, 1; Vulg. Jecelio), a female of Jerusalem, mother of king Uzziah, and consequently wife of king Amaziah, whom she appears to have survived her character is inferred from the general piecy of her son. B.C. 824-800.

Jecomaiah (1 Chron. iii, 16, 17; Jer. xxviii, 29; xxviii, 20; xxxviii, 4; xxix, 1; Esth. vi, 6). See JECOHACHIN.

Jecomoias (יִכְהוֹמְיָא), a Grecized form (1 Esd. ix, of the name elsewhere given (2 Chron. xxxviii, 9) as CASONIAH (q. v.).

Jedusor (יֵדְעֹשְׂר), a less correct form (1 Esd. ix, 30) of the Hebrew name (Ezra x, 29) ADAIAH (q. v.).

Jedaiah (Heb. יֵדְיוֹתָה), the name of several men, of different form in the original.

1. (יֵדְיוֹתָה, invoicer of Jehoram; Sept. ὁ ἐπαράτος τοῦ Ἰερουσαλήμ), Son of Shimmir and father of Alon, of the ancestry of Zedekiah, chief sibemuel, who migrated to the valley of Gedor (1 Chron. iv, 37). B.C. c. 640. See note 71.

2. (Same Hebrew name as preceding; Sept. Ιεροσαλημ), Son of Harunaph, and one of those that repaired the walls of Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. iii, 10). B.C. 446.

3. (יִכְלָיָה, knowing Jehoram; Sept. ἔπετρυς τοῦ Ἅδηα), a priest who officiated in Jerusalem after the exile (1 Chron. xi, 10; Neh. xi, 10; in which latter passage, however, he is styled son of Johanan, evidently the same as the Jehoiarib with whom he is mentioned in the former passage). From Ezra ii, 86; Neh. vii, 89.
he appears to have belonged to the family of Josua (793 of his relatives having returned with him from Babylon), so that he is probably the same with the priest Jediah enumerated (Neh. xii. 6) amongst the contemporaries of Ezra, who returned with Zerubabel (the name apparently being repeated in verse 7; comp. ver. 19, 21, where the same repetition occurs, although with the mention of different sons), and probably also identical with the Jediah whom the prophet was directed to crown with the symbolical wreath (Zech. vi. 10, 14). He may have been the same that Jedu (Ezioy), a corrupt form (1 Esd. v. 24) for the Hebrew name (Ezra ii, 36) Jeddaiah (q. v.).

Jedia'el [most Jed'iah] (Heb. Yedia'eel, ידיהאל, known by God; Sept. 'Izdab, 'Adamah, 'Idlab), the name of at least three men.

1. One of the sons of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 6), whose sons (ver. 10) and descendants are enumerated as being 17,200 warriors in David’s census (ver. 11). He is, perhaps, identical with Azthahel (1 Chron. viii. 1). See Benjamin; Jacob.

2. A Shimeiite (q. v.); one of David’s famous bodyguard (1 Chron. xi. 45); probably the Manasseite of the same name who joined David’s troop at Ziklag (1 Chron. xi. 20). B.C. 1053–1046.

3. The Levite of the Levitical family of Elisaph, second son of Meshelemiah, and one of the gate-keepers to the tabernacle or Temple (1 Chron. xxvi. 2). B.C. 1014.

Jed‘iah (Heb. Yediahah, ידיהָה, beloved; Septuag. Ἰδιάδα, Josephus ‘Ithah, Ant. xi. 4, 1), daughter of Adaiah of Bozath and mother of king Josiah, consequently wife of king Amon, whom she appears to have survived (2 Kings xxiii. 1). Her character may be inferred from the piety of her son. B.C. 648–639.

Jedidi‘ah (Heb. Yedidaiyah, ידידיה, beloved by Jehovah; Sept. ‘Izdaddi), the name specially given by the Lord to Solomon (q. v.) at his birth, through Nathan, in token of the divine favor reserved for him (2 Sam. xiii. 25).

Jedduth. See Jeduthun.

Jedna (Iduna), a town mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast., 344, xvi. 4) east of Joppa by the desert, six miles from Eleutheropolis towards Hebron,” precisely in which location stands the modern village Idhna (Robinson, Researches, ii. 404).

Jed’uthun (Hebrew Yeduthun, ידועתון or ידועתון; also ידועתון, Yeduthun, in 1 Chron. xv. 38; Neh. vii. 17; Psa. xxx. and lvii. titles; lauder; Sept. Tladaun, but Tladaun in 1 Chron. iv. 16), a Levite of Merari’s family, and one of the four great masters of the Temple music appointed by David (1 Chron. xvi. 41, 42; xxv. 1, etc.). B.C. 1014. From a comparison of 1 Chron. xv. 17, 19, with 41, 42; xxxv. 1, 3, 6; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 17, some infer that he was identical with Ethan (q. v.). In 2 Chron. xxxiv. 15, he bears the title of “the king’s seer.” His sons sometimes appear as recording the same office (1 Chron. xxx. 1, 3), at others as door-keepers of the sacred edifice (1 Chron. xvi. 42). His name is also put for his descendants (Jeduthunites, sons of Jeduthun), who occur later as singers and players on instruments (2 Chron. xxxiv. 15; Neh. xi. 17). In the latter signification it occurs in the superscriptions to Psa. xxx. xlvii., ixviii; but Aben-Ezra supposes it to denote here a species of song, and Jarchi a musical instrument. The form of the phrase (ידועתון, “upon Jeduthun”) favors the latter interpretation (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 569), indicating a kind of instrumental music, or perhaps a style or tune of performance (Ewald, Heb. Poésie, i. 250). The phrase is introduced by Jeduthun: a conclusion strengthened by finding a phrase indicative of authorship (דועתון, “to Jeduthun,” i.e. composed by him), ascribed in a similar connection (Psa. xxxix. titile), since he is elsewhere recognised as an inspired character (2 Chron. xxxiv. 15). See Musician.

Joojeebhoj, Sir Jemsejhir, a Parsee merchant prince and great philanthropist, who was born of poor parents at Bombay, July 15, 1788, and at the age of twenty had already amassed a fortune which secured him the title of Sir. He visited Europe and the East, spent a good portion of his fortune in the endowment of schools and hospitals. From 1822 to 1858 he reported to have spent “upwards of a quarter of a million pounds sterling in founding, endowing, or supporting undertakings of a purely benevolent character,” but what is more noteworthy is that the Parsee merchant by no means confined his charitable efforts to his own confession: Christian, Hindu, and Mussulman also shared the benefits of his magnanimous acts. In 1857 queen Victoria conferred on him the honor of knighthood—the first occasion on which that dignity was bestowed on an Eastern. He died April 15, 1859.

Joo‘li (I’lly or I. Lami), a corrupt Grecized form (1 Esd. vii. 38) of the Heb. name (Ezra ii, 56) Jalaal (q. v.).

Joo‘lius (I’llyus or I. Lly), a Grecized form (1 Esd. viii. 92) of the Heb. name (Ezra x, 2) Jeleel (q. v.).

Joo‘leer (Hebrew I’leer, "לְאֵר", abridged for Abbeer; Sept. "A'lyihi", a son of Giles of Manasseh (Num. xxvi. 30); elsewhere (Josh. xvii. 2, etc.) called Azurrez (q. v.). The patronymic Jeezerites (יהזירות, Heb. יזרית; Sept. "A'lyihi") is in like manner applied to his descendants (Num. xxvi. 30), elsewhere called Zusiteratees (Judg. vii. 11, etc.).

Jeezer (Num. xxvi. 30). See Jezer.

Jeffeery, John, an English theologian, was born at Ipswich in 1647. He studied at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, entered the Church, and was appointed rector of Dennington, Suffolk; then of a parish in Norfolk. His exemplary conduct, sound teachings, and great exertion rendered him very popular. In 1667 he obtained the livings of Kirton and Falkenhain, and in 1694, Tiloton, with whom he was intimately acquainted, made him archdeacon of Norfolk. He died in 1720. Jeffer was much opposed to religious controversialists, hating that they generated more heat than light. He published Sir Thomas Browne’s Christianity Ancient and Modern, and a work on the consciences, taken from Dr. Witshead’s papers. A complete collection of his own Sermons and Tracts was published (London, 1758, 2 vols. 8vo). See Memoirs prefixed to the collection; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxvi. 622; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 959.

Jeffries, George, an English lawyer of the crown, born about 1640, was chief justice of the King’s Bench during the reign of James II, and is execrated in ecclesiastical history for his conduct towards Baxter (q. v.) and Fairfax (q. v.). He seems to have been a man of low inclinations, and a ready tool in the hands of the court. In the year 1688, after the flight of king James, he was recognised at London during the riots by the rabble, and, after having suffered far more than the bitterness of death, he was safely lodged in the fortress (the Tower of London), where some of his most illustrious victims had passed their last days, and where his own life was destined to close in unspeakable ignominy and horror; he died April 18, 1689. No one has better delineated his character than Macaulay (History of England), and we refer our readers to this able master for further details. See also Neale, History of the Puritans, ii, 317 sq., 341.

Je’gar-sahadu’tha (Chald. Ye’gar - Sahadthah, "Ye’gar-sahadthah, פַּלֶק הַתְּמִימִי", pile of the testimony; Sept. Πῶλος τῆς παραπτώσεως, Vulgate tumultus testis), the Aramaean name given by Lalish, a Syriac to the island of stones erected as a memorial of his league with Jacob, whereas the latter styled it (Gen. xxxii. 47) by the equivalent Hebrew name of Gal-Ed (q. v.). plies someunion of civil and religious functions (2 Chron. xxxv. 8). B.C. 628.

8. (Sept. 'Issa'ah v. r. 'Isaiah.) The father of Obadiah, which latter returned with his relatives of the sons of Joab, 218 males, from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 9). B.C. ante 469.

9. (Sept. 'Ishah v. r. 'Isaiah, also 'Issaiah v. r. 'Alisaiah.) One of the "sons of Elam (? Persian) who divorced his Gentle wife after the exile (Ezra x. 26); probably the same with the father of Shechaniah, who proposed that measure (verse 2). B.C. 459.

10. (Sept. 'Ishah v. r. 'Isaiah.) One of the priests, "sons" of Harim, who divorced his Gentle wife after the captivity (Ezra x. 26). B.C. 459.

Jehiel (1 Chron. xxvi. 21, 22). See JEHIEL.

Jehizkiel (Heb. Yehezkiyeh), in the para.

Jehudah (Heb. Yehudah, יְהוּדָה, Jehovah's living one; Sept. 'Ishah, a Levite associated with Obed-edom as door-keeper of the sacred ark when brought by David to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xxiv. 24); elsewhere (ver. 18) called JEHIEL (q. v.).

Jehu (Heb. Yehez, יְהֵז, God's living one), the name of several men.

1. (1 Chron. ix. 55.) See JEHOIACHIN.

2. (1 Chron. x. 44.) See JEHIEL.

3. (Sept. 'Issaiah or 'Issah, but v. r. 'Issah in 1 Chron. xvi. 5.) One of the Levites of "the second degree" appointed by David to execute the music on the occasion of the removal of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 18, 26, in which latter passage they are said to have performed "with psalteries on Alamoth"). He is apparently the same with the person mentioned (verse 24) by the synonymous name JEHU, although, from the similar collocation of names, others have confounded this with the JEHU of ch. xvi. 5, a name of different signification. He is probably identical with the one named as chief among the sons of the Levites of the third course (1 Chron. xxi. 31) assigned to the Levites of the Levitical tribe (i. e., at Nazioth) by David in charge of the Temple porters (1 Chron. xxiii. 8), and hence likewise with the Gershonite with whom were deposited the gems offered by the people for the sacred structures and utensils (1 Chron. xxii. 31; 2 Chron. xxi. 22), and David's orderly (1 Kings xx. 12). He is doubtless the JEHU of 2 Kings vii. iv. son of Jehiel of Bithron (2 Kings xiv. iv.).

4. (Sept. 'Issaiah v. r. 'Issah, Vulg. 'Abiel.) A Hachmonite ("son of Hachmoni") who appears to have been tutor in the royal family towards the close of David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 9). B.C. cir. 1050. "The mention of Athithophel (ver. 26) seems to fix the date of this list as before the revolt. In Jeroboam's 'gruet, Horeb' on this passage, Jehiel is said to be David's son Chiloab or Daniel; and 'Achammon,' interpreted as 'Saphanishmaeus, is taken as an alias of David himself" (Smith)." to have been usually omitted in times of order and of regular succession (the oldest brother, Johan [1 Chron. iii. 15], having apparently died without issue, and Zedekiah being yet too young [2 Chron. xxvi. 11]). He found the land full of trouble, but free from idolatry. Instead, however, of following the excellent example of his father, Jeconiah, he fell into the error and crimes of his predecessors, and, under the encouragements which his example or indifference offered, the idols soon reappeared. He is therefore described by his contemporaries as an evil-doer (2 Kings xxiii, 32) and an oppressor (Ezek. xix, 9), and such is his traditional character in Jewish history; but his disposition seems to have been lamented by the people (Jer. xxxi, 10; Ezek. xix, 1).

Pharaoh-necho, on his victorious return from the Euphrates, thinking it politic to reject a king not nominated by himself, removed him from the throne, and set thereon his brother Jehoiakim. That deposed king was at first taken as a prisoner to Riblah, in Syria, but was eventually carried to Egypt, where he died (2 Kings xxiii, 30-35; 2 Chron. xxxvi, 1-4; 1 Chron. iii, 15; Jer. xxix, 12, 10). See Prideaux, Connection, an. 610; Ewald, Gesch. Irr. iii, 719; Rosenmuller, Schol. in Jer. xxxii, 11. See Judah, Kingdom of.

Jehoiash (Heb. Yehoash; יְהוֹאָשָׁה, Yeho’ash-given; in most of the passages in 2 Kings only; more usually in the contracted form Tadoh, יְתֹדָה, “Joash,” Sept. Tadie, Jeremiah 1-2 (Oschacy), the name of two kings. See also Joash.

1. The son of king Ahaziah by Libnah of Beersheba, was born B.C. 884; made king at the age of seven years, and reigned eight over the separated kingdom of Judah forty years, B.C. 877-857. Jehoash, when an infant, was secretly saved by his aunt Jehoiachin, who was married to the high-priest Jehoiada, from the general massacre of the family by Athaliah, who had usurped the throne. See Jehoiada. Jehoram having himself killed all his own brethren, and all his sons, except Ahaziah, having been killed by the irruption of the Philistines and Aramians, and all Ahaziah’s remoter relations having been slain by Jehu, and now all his sons being put to death by Athaliah (2 Chron. xxii. 4, 17; xxiii. 1, 8, 9, 10), the house of David was reduced to the lowest ebb, and Jehoash appears to have been the only surviving descendant of Solomon. By the high-priest and his wife the child was privately brought up in this chamber connected with the Temple till he was in his eighth year, when Jehoiada deemed that the state of affairs required him to produce the youthful heir of the throne to the people, and claim for him the crown which his ancestors had so unrighteously usurped. Finding the influential persons whom he consulted favorable to the design, everything was secretly but admirably arranged for producing Jehoash, and investing him with the regalia, in such a manner that Athaliah could have no suspicion of the event till it actually occurred. On the day appointed, the sole surviving scion of David’s illustrious house appeared in the place of the kings, by a particular pillar in the Temple court, and was crowned and anointed with the usual ceremonies. The high-wrought enthusiasm of the spectators then found vent in clapping of hands and exulting shouts of “Long live the king!” The joyful uproar was not, however, confined to the walls of the temple, but extended from that sacred palace, and brought Athaliah to the Temple, from which, at a word from Jehoiada, she was led to her death. See Athaliah.

Jehoash behaved well during his minority, and so long as he remained under the influence of the high-priest. Excepting that the high-priest’s houses were still resorted to for incense and sacrifice, pure religion was restored, large contributions were made for the repair of the Temple, which was accordingly restored, and the country seems to have been free from foreign invasion and internal disturbances. But when his venerable adviser died the king seems to have felt himself relieved from a yoke, and, to manifest his freedom, began to take the contrary course to that which he had followed while under pupillage. Gradually the persons who had possessed influence formerly, when the house of David was contaminated by its alliance with the house of Ahab, insinuated themselves into his councils, and ere long the worship of Jehovah and the observances of the law declined, and he became involved in idolatries and idolatrous usages. The prophets then uttered their warnings, but were not heard; and the infatuated king had the atrocity of ingratitude to put to death Zechariah, the son and successor of his benefactor Jeholaida. For these deeds of Jehoash was made more incor-moral, and the calamities of the nation fell upon his head. He saw his realm devastated by the Syrians under Hazael; his armies were cut in pieces by an enemy of inferior numbers; and his was even besieged in Jerusalem, and only preserved his cap-tal and crown by giving up the treasures of the Temple. Besides this, a painful embitterment all his day, and at length he became so odious that his own servants conspired against him, and slew him on his bed. They are said to have done this to avenge the blood of Zechariah, who at his death had cried, “The Lord look upon it and require it,” and it is hence probable that the expression ascribed to these calamities of his life and reign to that infamous deed. See Zechariah. Jehoash was buried in the city of David, but in a place in the sepulchre of the kings was denied to his remains (2 Kings xi; xii; 2 Chron. xxiv.). He is one of the three kings (Ahaziah, Jehoash, Azariah) omitted from the genealogy of Christ (Matt. xi. 11). With regard to the different accounts of the Syrian invasion given in 2 Kings and in 2 Chron., which have led some (as Thienius and many other commentators) to imagine two distinct Syrian invasions, and others to see a direct contradiction, or at least a strange incompleteness in the narrative, as Winebarger expressly states in the minds of the critics. See Syria. The narrative given above, which is also that of Keil and E. Bertheau (Ezech. hands. z. A. T.) as well as of Josephus (Ant. ix, 8, 4), perfectly suits the two accounts, which are merely different slantings of the one full account contained in the original chronicles of the kingdom. See Judah, Kingdom of.

2. The son and successor of Jehoahaz, king of Israel: reigned thirteenth over the separate kingdom sixteen (nominal) years, B.C. 856-838, and for about one year in Samaria. He was the son of Jehoahaz (2 Kings iv. xiv; 1; comp. with xii, 1, xiii, 10). When he succeeded to the crown the kingdom was in a deplorable state from the devastations of Hazael and Benhadad, kings of Syria, of whose power at this time we had also evidence in the preceding article. Jehoash, it is true, lowered the claims of his predecessors, not by insisting on keeping up the worship of the golden calves; but, apart from this, he bears a fair character, and had intervals, at least, of sincere piety and true devotion to the God of his fathers (comp. Josephus, Ant. ix, 6, 8). Indeed, custom and long habit had so established the views of political expediency on which the schismatical establishments at Dan and Bethel were founded, that at length the reprehension which regularly recurs in the record of each king’s reign seems rather to apply to it as a mark of the continuance of a public crime than as indicative of the character of even the most respectable prince, which is to be sought in the more detailed accounts of his own conduct. These accounts are favorable with respect to Jehoash. He held the prophet El-shah in high honor, looking up to him as a father. When he heard of his last illness he repaired to the bedside of the prophet, he sat for hours and wept over him as “the chariot of Israel and the horses thereof.” The prophet promised him deliverance from the Syrian yoke in Aphek, the scene of Ahab’s great victory over a former Benhadad (1 Kings xx, 26-30). He then bid him smite upon the ground, and the king smote three times and then stayed. The prophet rebuked him for staying, and limited to three his victories over Syria.

These promises were accomplished after the prophet's death. God took compassion upon the extreme misery of Israel, and, in remembrance of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, interposed to save them from entire destruction. In three signal and successive victories Jehoshah overcame the Syrians, and retook from them the towns which Hazael had rent from Israel; and, in remembrance of his covenant with Ahaz, Jotham, and Hezekiah, interposed to save them from entire destruction. These three victories made Jehoshah more potent than that of Judah. Jehoshah, however, sought no quarrel with that kingdom, but he nevertheless became involved in a war with Amaziah, king of Judah. The grounds of this war are given fully in 2 Chron. xxvi. See Amaziah. The hiring of 190,000 men of Israel and 100 talents of silver by Amaziah as the only instance on record of such a transaction, and implies that at that time the kingdom of Israel was free from all fear of the Syrians. These mercenary soldiers, having been dismissed by Amaziah, at the instigation of a prophet, without being allowed to take part in the Edom expedition, returned in great wrath to their own country, and sacked and plundered the cities of Judah in revenge for the slight put upon them, and also to indemnify themselves for the loss of their share of the plunder. It was to avenge this injury that Amaziah, on his return from his triumph over the Edomites, declared war against Jehoshah, in the name of the prophet; but Jehoshah, when he received the defiance from Amaziah, answered with becoming spirit in a parable (q. v.), which by its images calls to mind that of Job; for the cool disdain of the answer must have been, in fact, exceeding galling to Amaziah: "The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife; and there came by a wild beast that was in Lebanon and trod down the thistle. This was admirable; nor was the application less so: 'Thou hast indeed smitten Edom, and this beast hath lifted his up-gloried this, and tarry at home; for why shouldst thou meddle to thy hurt, that thou shouldst fall down, even thou, and Judah with thee.' In the war, or, rather, action which followed, Jehoshah was victorious. Having defeated Amaziah at Beth-shemesh, in Judah, he advanced to Jerusalem, broke down the wall to the extent of 400 cubits, and carried away the treasures both of the Temple and the palace, together with hostages for the future good behavior of the rest of the army. Jehoshah himself did not long survive this victory; he died in peace, and was buried in Samaria (2 Kings xiv. 1-17).

7. (Sept. τοῦ Ἰωανῶτ). One of the priests who celebrated with music the reparation of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 42). B.C. 446. He was perhaps the same with No. 4 or No. 8.

8. (Sept. τοῦ Ἰωανῆ). A leading priest, the "son" of Amariah, and contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. xi. 13). B.C. cir. 406. He may have been identical with the preceding.

Jeho'ch'acin (Heb. יְהוֹצָכָן, יְהוֹצָכָן, Jehoachtan-appointed; Sept. ὰγαθίῳ in 2 Kings xxiv. 6, 8, 12, 15; xxvi. 27; Ἰωακίς in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 8, 9; Ἰωακίς in Jer. iii. 31; Josephus Ἰωακίμος, Ant. x. 6, 8; 7, 1; N. Ἰωακίς in Jer. xxvii. 20; xxviii. 4, xxix. 2, 1; Chron. iii. 16, 17; but omit in Easb. ii. 6; likewise paragogic יְיוֹכָאָה, יְיוֹכָאָה, Jer. xxiv. 1, Sept. Ἰωακίς, and CONIAH (κωνιαή, only paragogic יְיוֹכָאָה, יְיוֹכָאָה, Jer. xxiv. 24, 28; xxvii. 1, Sept. Ἰωακίς), son of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, by Nehushah, daughter of Elhanathan of Jerusalem; he succeeded his father as the nineteenth monarch of that separate kingdom, but only for three months and ten days, B.C. 598. He was then eighteen years of age according to 2 Kings xxiv. 6, but only eight according to 2 Chron. xxxii. 29. Many attempts have been made to reconcile these dates (see J. D. Müller, Die heb. durr. tribunen regni Jud. adscrivis, Lipsia, 1745; Oeder, Freie Untersuch. über einige Allt.-Bücher, p. 214; Offerhaus, Sprülely, p. 193), the usual solution being that he had reigned ten years in conjunction with his father, so that he was eight when he began his reign, and but eighteen when he began to reign alone. There are, however, difficulties in this view which, perhaps, leave it the safest course to conclude that "eight" in 2 Chron. xxxvii. 9, is a corruption of the text, such as might easily occur from the relation of the numbers eight and eighteen. (All the versions read eighteen in Kings, and so the Vulg. and many M.S. of the Sept. in Chron., as well as at 1 Esd. i. 43. Among recent commentators, Keil, Theinuus, and Hitzig favor the reading eighteen, while Borthoeff prefers eight. The language in Jer. xxi. 24, 30 is not decisive, for the epithets there applied to Jehochiah do not necessarily imply adult age, although they more naturally agree with it. The same remark applies to the allusion in Ezek. xix. 5-9. The decided probaration, however, in 2 Kings xxiv. 9, and in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, would hardly be used of a mere child. The mention in 2 Kings xxiv. 9 of his mother Jeconiah, who, though not necessarily implying her minority, for the queen-dowager was a very important member of the royal family. The number eight, indeed, would bring Jehoiachin's birth in the year of the beginning of the captivity by Nebuchadnezzar's invasion, and thus exactly agree with the language in Matt. i. 11, but the expression "and his brethren" added there, as well as the language of the following verse, agrees better with a less precise correspondence, as likewise the qualifying "about" indicates. The argument drawn from his father's age at death, thirty-six (2 Kings xxiv. 36), is favorable to Jehoiachin being twelve—that is, at the time, for most of these kings became fathers very early, Josiah, e. g., at fifteen (2 Kings xxiii. 1, comp. with xxiii. 36.). He was therefore, born in B.C. 616. Jehoiachin followed the evil courses which had already brought so much disaster upon the royal house of David, and, despising the people of Judah, he seems to have very speedily indicated a political bias adverse to the interests of the Chaldaean empire, for in three months after his accession we find the generals of Nebuchadnezzar again laying siege to Jerusalem, according to the predictions of Jeremiah (xxxi. 24-30). Jehoiachin himself lived three years in Egypt, when Egypt was still prostrate in consequence of the victory at Carchemish, and when the Jews had been for three or four years harassed and distressed by the in-Jehoiachin's fellow-captive. But the apocryphal books are more communicative. Thus the author of the book of Baruch (i, 8) introduces 'Jehoiachin, king of Judah,' into his narrative, and represents Baruch as reading his prophecy in his ears and in the ears of the king's sons, and the nobles, and elders, and people, at Babylon. At the hearing of Baruch's words, it is added, they wept, and fasted, and prayed, and sent a copy of the writing to Jerusalem, to Jehoiakim, the son of Je- likiah, the son of Shallum the high-priest, with which purchase burnt-offerings, and sacrifices, and incense, bidding them pray for the prosperity of Nebuchadnezzar, and Belshazzar his son. The history of Susanna and the Elders also apparently makes Jehoiachin an important personage, for, according to the author, the husband of Susanna was Joakim, a man of great wealth, and the chief person among the captives, to whose house all the people resorted for judgment—a description which suits Jehoiachin.

Africanus (Ep. of Orig.; Ruth, Red. Soc. ii, 118) expressly calls Susanna's husband king, and says that the king of Babylon had made him his royal companion (εὐσώφρονος). He is also mentioned in 1 Esd. v, 5, but the text seems to be corrupt. That Zedekiah, who in 1 Chron. iii, 16 is called "his son," is the same as Zedekiah his uncle (called son in Jer. xxvi, 30) would be useful in determining the successor on the throne, seems certain. But it is probable that "Assir" (𒇹𒇹𒇹مري = captive), who is reckoned amongst the family of Jeconiah in 1 Chron. iii, 17, may really have been only an appellation of Jeconiah himself (see Bertheau on 1 Chron. iii, 16).

In the genealogy of Christ (Matt. i, 11) he is named in the received text as the "son of Josiah," his grandfather, the name of Jehoiachin having probably been omitted by erroneous transcription. See Genealogy. In the dark portrait of his early character by the prophet (Jer. xxiii, 80), the expression "Write ye this man childless" refers to his having no successor on the throne, for he had children (see Matt. Qur. Rev., Oct., 1862, p. 602-4). See Salathiel.

Josephus, however (Ant., 7, 7, 1), gives him a fair character (see Keil, Commentary on Kings, p. 692). The compiler of 1 Esd. gives the name of Jechnias to Jehoahaz, the son of Josiah, who reigned three months after Josiah's death, and was deposited and carried to Egypt by Pharaoh-necho (1 Esd. i, 34; 2 Kings xxiii, 30). He is followed in this blunder by Eph phanius (i, 21), who says "Jehoiaqin begat Jehonias, who is also called Shallum. This Jehonias begat Jehochiah, who was called Zedekiah and Joakim." It has its origin, doubtless, in the former, and the latter kept at Babylon, the Greek by writers ignorant of Hebrew. See Judah, Kingdom of.

Jehoiada (Hebrew יְהוֹיָדָא, מְאֹדָה, Jehoehu, known; Sept. 'Ελεοδή, 'Ελεοδή, 'Ελεοδή, the name of two or more priests.

1. The father of Beniah, which latter was one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. viii, 18; xx, 28; xxiii, 20, 22; 1 Kings i, 42, 45, 46, 48, 49), and was (2 Sam. xx, 33; 1 Chron. xi, 22, 24; xxvii, 17; xxvii, 35) B.C. 946. He is mentioned as the governor of Jerusalem, and when Athaliah slew all the royal family of Judah after Ahaziah had been put to death by Jehu, he and his wife stole Jehoahaz from amongst the king's sons and hid him for six years in the Temple, and eventually replaced him on the throne of his ancestors. See ATHALIAH. In effecting this happy revolution, by which both the throne of David and the worship of the true God according to the law of Moses were rescued from imminent danger of destruction, Jehoiada displayed great ability and prudence. Allowing patiently the influence of Athaliah, and we may presume, her foreign practices and preferences—had produced disgust in the land, he at length, in the 7th year of her reign, entered into secret alliance with all the chief partisans of the house of Dav and of the true religion. He also collected at Jerusalem Levites from the several cities of Judah and Israel, probably under cover of providing for the Temple services, and then concentrated a large and conceal-red force in the Temple by the expedient of not dismissing the old courses of priests and Levites when their successors came to relieve them on the Sabbath. By means of the consecrated shields and spears which Dav had taken in his wars, and which were preserved in the treasury of the Temple (comp. 1 Chron. xviii, 7-11; xvi, 20-28; 1 Kings xiv, 26, 27), he supplied the captains of hundreds with arms for their men. Having then divided the priests and Levites into three bands, which were posted at the principal gates of the courts with people favorable to the cause, he produced the young king before the whole assembly, and crowned and anointed him, and presented to him a COPY OF THE LAW according to Deut. xvii, 18-20. See HILKIAH. The excitement of the moment did not make him forget the sanctity of God's name; none but the priests an ministering Levites were permitted by him to enter the Temple, and he gave strict orders that Athaliah should be carried without its precincts before she was put to death. In the same spirit he inshugurated the new reign by a solemn covenant between himself as high-priest, and the people and the king, to renounce the Baal-worship which had been introduced by the house of Ahab, and to serve Jehovah. This was followed up by the immediate destruction of the altar and temple of Baal, and the death of Mattan, his priest.
He then gave orders for the due celebration of the Temple service, and, at the same time, for the perfect re-establishment of the monarchy, all which seems to have been effected with great vigor and success, and without any cruelty or violence. The young king himself, under this wise and virtuous counsellor, ruled his kingdom with a firm and gentle hand, and promoted all during the lifetime of Jehoiada. The reparation of the Temple, in the 23rd year of his reign, of which a full and interesting account is given in 2 Kings xii and 2 Chron. xxiv, was one of the most important works at this period. At length, however, Jehoiada died, and for his spiritual services to his God, his king, and his country, which have earned him a place amongst the very foremost well-doers in Israel, he had the unique honor of burial amongst the kings of Judah in the city of David.
—Smith. His decease, though at an advanced age, yet occurred too soon for the welfare of the nation and of Jehoshaphat, who thereupon immediately fell into idolatry and was even guilty of the most cruel ingratitude towards the family of Jehoiada. See JEHOSHAH. 1. His age at his death is stated (2 Chron. xxiv, 15) to have been 130 years, which Hervey (Genealogy of our Lord, p. 304) proceeds to fix at 150, in order to lessen the presumed disparity between Jehoiada's age and that of his wife, as well as on the ground that a man of 90 could hardly have exhibited such energy as he displayed in displacing Athaliah; but the change is wholly arbitrary and unnecessary. Josephus, in his history (Ant. ix, 7, 1, while it is not clear which was the text of his Hebrew Bible account; but in his list of the high-priests (Ant. x, 8, 6), the corresponding name seems to be Azoraimus (Άσωραμύς, perhaps by corruption for "Joram"). In the Jewish chronicle (Seder Olam), however, it correctly appears as Jehokakh, and with a date tolerably agreeing to the scriptural citations to the temple services. In both authorities, many of the adjoining names are additional to those mentioned in the O.T. See HIGH-PRIEST. It is probably this Jehoiada who is alluded to in Jer. xxix, 26 as a pre-eminent incumbent of the office (see Rosenmüller and Hitzig, ad loc.), and he is doubleless the same with the Berechiah (בָּרֵכִיָּה) of Matt. xxiii, 25 See ZEDEKIAH.
3. (Neh. iii, 6). See JOSEDA. Jehoi'akim (Heb. Yahyakîm, יְהוֹיָ֣קִים, Jehovah-established; Sept. Ἰωσεύκης, oftenter Ἰωσεύκης, Josephus Ιωάκιμος; compare JOSIAK, JOKIN), the second son of Josiah, the(son of his father and mother, Je-mah (probably the Dunah of Josh. xv, 52); born B.C.
634, and eighteenth king of the separate throne of Judah for a period of eleven years, B.C. 609-598. He is mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii, 34, 35, 36; xxiv, 1, 5, 6, 19; 1 Chron. iii, 15, 16; 2 Chron. xxxvi, 4, 5, 8, Jer. i, xxvii, 4; xxxiv, 1; xxxvi, 1, 5, 26, 27, 30, 32, xxxvi, 1; xiv, 1; xlii, ii, 401, Engl. trans.). There exists the most striking contrast between his beautiful name and his miserable fate (Jer. xxxii, 19). (See Eckhird, Von Ezech-Begräbnis, Lpz. 1710.) See NAME.

Jehoiakim's younger brother Jehoiash, or Shallum, as he is called Jer. xxvi, 11, and had been the first to make king by the people of the land in the presence of his father Josiah, probably with the intention of following up Josiah's policy, which was to side with Nebuchadnezzar against Egypt, being, as Prideaux thinks, bound by oath to the kings of Babylon (R. 50). See Jeho-ash, Pharaoh-neco. There was therefore no all resistance with his victorious army, immediately deposed Jehoash, and had him brought in chains to Rib-lah, where, it seems, he was on his way to Carmiche-al (2 Kings xxiii, 33, 34; Jer. xxii, 10-12). See NACHO.
He then set Eliakim, his elder brother, upon the throne —through—changed his name to Jehoiakim (see above)—and, having charged him with the task of collecting a tributaty of 100 talents of silver and one talent of gold = 3,500,000, in which he mulcted the people of the land for Josiah that had taken in the war with Babylon, he enployed to Egypt, taking Jehoash with him, who died there in captivity 2 Kings xxiii, 24; —Ezek. xix, 4). Pharaoh-neco also himself returned no more to Jerusalem; for, after his great defeat at Carmesin in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, he lost all his Syrian possessions (2 Kings xxiv, 7 Jer. xlix, 2), and his successor Psammetichus (Herod. ii, 6) made no attempt to recover them. Even thus far, played no part in Jewish politics during the seven or eight years of Jehoiakim's reign. After the battle of Carmesin, Nebuchadnezzar came into Palestine as one of the Egyptian tributary kingdoms, the capture of which was the greatest triumph of his reign. He found Jehoiakim quite powerless. After a short siege he entered Jerusalem, took the king prisoner, bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxvi, 6, 7), and took also some of the precious vessels of the Temple and carried them to the land of Shinar, to the temple of Bel his god. It was at this time in the fourth, or, as Daniel reckons, in the third year of his reign [see NEBUCHADNEZZAR], that Daniel and Hananiah, Michael and Azariah, were taken captives to Babylon (Dan. i, 2), but Nebuchadnezzar seems to have considered them not guilty, as did the ancient and wise king, and to have accepted his submission, and reinstated him on the throne, perhaps in remembrance of the fidelity of his father Josiah (q. v.). The year following the Egyptians were defeated upon the Euphrates (Jer. xlvii, 2), and Jehoiakim, when he saw the remains of the defeated army collected, resolved to come in person and have in person to have accepted his submission, and reinstated him on the throne, perhaps in remembrance of the fidelity of his father Josiah (q. v.). The year following the Egyptians were defeated upon the Euphrates (Jer. xlvii, 2), and Jehoiakim, when he saw the remains of the defeated army collected, resolved to come in person and attempt to have in person to have accepted his submission, and reinstated him on the throne, perhaps in remembrance of the fidelity of his father Josiah (q. v.). The year following the Egyptians were defeated upon the Euphrates (Jer. xlvii, 2), and Jehoiakim, when he saw the remains of the defeated army collected, resolved to come in person and have in person to have accepted his submission, and reinstated him on the throne, perhaps in remembrance of the fidelity of his father Josiah (q. v.).

In the same year the prophet collected a prophecy of his prophecies to be written out by his faithful scribe Jeremiah, and published in the court of the Temple. This coming to the knowledge of the king, he sent for it, and had it read before him. But he heard not much of the bitter denunciations with which it was charged before he took the roll from the reader, and, after cutting it in pieces, threw it into the brazier which, it is said, was afterwards sent to 2 Kings xxiii, 84, where Eliahik or Jehoiakim is said to have succeeded his father Josiah, whereas the reign of Jehoahaz intervened. This was also so short, however, as not to be reckoned in the succession. In Matt. x, 11, in the large text, the name of Jehoiakim (Ioeaiqim, "Jakin") is given in place of Josiah, son of Amon, and grandson of Josiah; but in some MSS. it is supplied, as in the margin (see Strong's Greek Harmony of the Gospels, note on § 9). See GENEALOGY.

Josephus's history of Jehoiakim's reign is inconsistent neither with Scripture nor with itself. His account of Jehoiakim's death and Jehoachin's ascension to the throne is not only a) inconsistent with the Scriptures, but the former of the two crimes he had committed was to have been dragged away and buried "with the burial of an ass," without pomp or lamentation, "beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer. xxii, 19, 20; xxxvi, 8; see 1 Chron. iii, 18; xxxvii, 1; 2 Kings xxiv, 4, 6-8). Yet it was not the object of Nebuchadnezzar to destroy altogether a power which, as tributary to him, formed a serviceable outpost towards Egypt, which seems to have been the great final object of all his designs in this quarter. He therefore still maintained the throne of Judah, paid tribute to Nebuchadnezzar, and anointed the son of the late king. Nor does he appear to have removed any considerable number of the inhabitants until provoked by the speedy revolt of this last appointed of Jehoiachin.

The expedition against Judah in Jer. xxxvi, 30, "He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David," is not to be taken strictly; and yet, as the reign of Jehoiachin was for only thirteen weeks, Jehoiakim may be said to have been comparatively without a successor, since his son scarcely sat down upon his throne before he was deposed. The same account of the expedition against Judah is given in 2 Kings xxiv, 84, where Eliahik or Jehoiakim is said to have succeeded his father Josiah, whereas the reign of Jehoahaz intervened. This was also short, however, as not to be reckoned in the succession. In Matt. x, 11, in the received text, the name of Jehoiakim (Tseaiqim, "Jakin") is given in place of Josiah, son of Amon, and grandson of Josiah; but in some MSS. it is supplied, as in the margin (see Strong's Greek Harmony of the Gospels, note on § 9). See GENEALOGY.

Josephus's history of Jehoiakim's reign is inconsistent neither with Scripture nor with itself. His account of Jehoiakim's death and Jehoachin's ascension to the throne is not only inconsistent with the Scriptures, but the former of the two crimes he had committed was to be only his own inference from the Scripture narrative. According to Josephus (Ant. x, 6), Nebuchadnezzar came against Judaea in the 8th year of Jehoiakim's reign, and compelled him to pay tribute, which he was unable to pay, and then proceeded against him; he took Jerusalem, and on hearing that the king of Babylon had gone to invade Egypt, such a campaign at this time is extremely improbable, as Nebuchadnezzar was fully occupied elsewhere; it is possible, however, that such a rumour may have been set afloat by interested parties. Josephus then inserts the account of Jehoiakim's ascension to the throne of Judah's prophecy in his fifth year, and concludes by saying that a little time afterwards the king of Babylon made an expedition against Jehoiakim, who admitted Nebuchadnezzar into the city upon certain conditions, which Nebuchadnezzar immediately broke: that he slew Jehoiakim, and put to death the nobles of the land, carried away the captives to Babylon, and set up Jehoiachin for king, but almost immediately afterwards was seized with fear lest the young king should avenge his father's death, and so sent back his army to besiege Jerusalem; that Jehoiachin, being a man of just and gentle disposition, did not like to expose the city to danger on his own account, and therefore surrendered himself, his mother, and kindred to the king of Babylon's officers on condition of the city suffering no harm, but that Nebuchadnezzar, in direct violation of the conditions, took 10,582 prisoners, and made Zedekiah, the youngest of Jehoiachin, whom he kept in custody. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

All the accounts we have of Jehoiakim concur in ascribing to him a vicious and irreligious character. The writer of 2 Kings xxii, 37 tells us that he did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah, a statement which is repeated in 2 Chronicles xxiv, 9, and 2 Chronicles xxxvi, 5. The latter writer uses the yet stronger expression "the acts of Jehoiakim, and the abominations which he did" (ver. 8). But it is in the writings of Jeremiah that we have the fullest portraiture of him. If, as is probable, the 19th chapter of Jeremiah belongs to this reign, we have a detail of the abominations which Jehoiakim committed at Jerusalem under the king's sanction, with which Ezekiel's vision of what was going on six years later, within the very precincts of the Temple, exactly agrees: incense offered up to "abominable beasts," "women weeping for

B.C. cir. 1033. See AMNON. Again, when, in a later stage of the same tragedy, Amnon was murdered by Absalom, and the exaggerated report reached David that all the princes were slaughtered, Jonadab was already aware of the real state of the case. He was with the king and had a message to reassure him (2 Sam. xiii, 22, 33). See ABSALOM.

2. A son or descendant of Rechab, the progenitor of a peculiar tribe, who held themselves bound by a vow to abstain from wine, and never to relinquish the monastic life (Jer. xxxvi, 6—19). See RECHAB. It appears from the account of him (1 Chron. vii, 35) that his tribe ("the rider") belonged to a branch of the Kenites, the Arabian tribe which entered Palestine with the Israelites. One settlement of them was to be found in the extreme north, under the chieftainship of Heber (Judg. iv, 11), retaining their Bedouin character and a name which derived its name from their nomadic habits. The main settlement was in the south. Of these, one branch had nestled in the cliffs of Engedi (Judg. i, 16; Numb. xxxiv, 21). Another had returned to the frontier of their native wilderness on the south of Judah (Judg. i, 16). A third and scattered settlement, probably by the various branches of the Kenite tribe (see Judg. i, 16; iv, 11), were inculcated by Jehonadab with the utmost minuteness on his descendants or retainers; the more so, perhaps, from their being brought into closer connection with the inhabitants of the settled districts. The vow or rule which he prescribed to them is preserved to us: "Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye nor your sons forever. Neither shall ye build houses, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but all your days ye shall dwell in tents; that ye may live long in the land whither ye be strangers." (Jer. xxxvi, 6, 7.) This life, partly monastic, partly Bedouin, was observed with the tenacity with which, from generation to generation, such customs are continued in Arab tribes; and when, many years after the death of Jehonadab, the Rechabites (as they were called from his father) were invited by Jehu to take refuge from the Chaldean invasion within the walls of Jerusalem, nothing would induce them to transgress the rule of their ancestor, and, in consequence, a blessing was pronounced upon them and by them the prophet Jeremiah (xxxvi, 19): "Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me." See RECHABITE.

Bearing in mind this general character of Jehonadab as an Arab chieftain, and the founder of a half-religious sect, perhaps in connection with the austere Elijah, and the Nazarites mentioned in Amos ii, 11 (see Ewald, Afterthinner, p. 92, 98), we are the better able to understand the stand given on which he appears before us in the historical narrative (2 Kings x, 15 sqq.). B.C. 888. Jehu was advancing, after the slaughter of Beth-elek, on the city of Samaria, when he suddenly met the austere Bedouin coming towards him (2 Kings x, 15). It seems he was already known to each other (Josephus, Ant. ix, 6, 6). The king was in his chariot; the Arab was on foot. It is not altogether certain which was the first to speak. The Hebrew text—followed by the A.V.—implies that the king blessed (A. Vers. "saluted") Jehonadab. The Sept. and Josephus (Ant. ix, 6, 6) interpret the decision of the king as that he would have its peculiar appropriateness. The king then proposed their close union. "Is thy heart right, as my heart is with thy heart?" The answer of Jehonadab is slightly varied. In the Hebrew text he vehemently replies, "It is, it is; give me thine hand in the face of the Lord thy God. It is;" and Jehu then rejoins, "If it is, give me thine hand." The hand, whether of Jehonadab or Jehu, was offered Thammuz," and men in the inner court of the Temple, "with their backs towards the temple of the Lord," worshipping "the sun towards the east" (Ezek. viii). The vindictive pursuit and murder of Urijah, the son of Shemaiah, and the indignities offered to his corpse by the people of Tyre, were a prophetic warning of the coming war of God against Jerusalem and Judah, are samples of his ireligion and tyranny combined. Jeremiah but narrowly escaped the same fate (Jer. xxvi, 20—24). The curious notice of him in 1 Esd. i, 38—that he put his nobles in chains, and caught Zeraco, his brother, in Egypt, and brought him thence to Jerusalem—also points to his cruelty. His daring impetity in cutting up and burning the roll containing Jeremiah's prophecy, at the very moment when the national fast was being celebrated, has been noticed above (see also Stanley, Jewish Church, ii, 597 sqq.). His oppression, injustice, cruelty, selfishness, luxury, and tyranny are most severely rebuked (Jer. xxii, 13—17); and it has frequently been observed, as indicating his thorough selfishness and indifference to the sufferings of his people, that, at a time when the land was so impoverished by the devastations laid upon it by Egypt and Babylon in the Babylonian and Median empires, he built magnificent luxurias for himself (Jer. xxii, 14, 15). See EMARGY, CHAMBERS OF.

Jehoiarib (Hebrew Yehoyarib, יְהוֹיָרִיב, whose cause Jehovah defends; Sept. τοῦ Ἰαβαρίου τοῦ Ἰαμαθαίον, a distinguished priest at Jerusalem (1 Chron. i, 10), head of the first of the twenty-four "courses" (1 Chron. xxiv, 7). B.C. 1014. Of these courses, only four are mentioned as having returned from Babylon—those of Jediah, Immer, Pashur, and Harim (Ezra ii, 36—39; Neh. vii, 39—42); and Jewish tradition says that each of these was divided into six, so as to preserve the original number with the original names (Talm. Hedor. iv, p. 68, col. i in ed. Bomberger). This might account for our finding, at a later period, Mattathias described as of the course of Joiarib (1 Macc. ii, 1), even though this course did not return from Babylon (Prideaux, Connexion, i, 136, 8th ed.). We find, however, that some of the descendants of Jehoiarib did return from Babylon (1 Chron. i, 10; Neh. vi, 10; see JEDIDAI); we find, also, that in subsequent lists other of the priestly courses are mentioned as returning, and in one of these that of Jehoiarib is expressly mentioned (Neh. x, 2—8; xii, 1—7), and among the sons of Mattenai as chief of the house of Joiarib in the days of Jeshua (xii, 19). The probability, therefore, is that, the course of Jehoiarib did go up, but at a later date, perhaps, than those four mentioned in Ezra ii, 36—39, and Neh. vii, 39—42. To the course of Joiarib Josephus tells us he belonged (Ant. xi, 6, 1; Lifshitz, § 1). See PRIEST.

Jehonadab (Hebrew Johanan, יְהוֹנֶנָּדָב, to whom Jehovah is liberate, 2 Sam. xiii, 5; 2 Kings x, 15, 23; Jer. xxxviii, 8, 14, 16, 18; sept. יואנָדָב, Avth. Version "Jonadab," except in 2 Kings x, 15, 23, also in the contracted form YONADAB, יְוֹנָדָב, 2 Sam. xiii, 3, 32, 35; Jer. xxxvi, 6, 10, 19; sept. יואנָדָב), the name of two men.

1. A son of Shimieah and nephew of David, a very crafty person (תְּפְלָל יְוֹנָדָב; the word is that usually translated "wise," as in the case of Solomon, 2 Sam. xiii, 3), i.e. apparently one of those characters who, in the midst of great or royal families, are often found in their household, and are renowned, for being acquainted with the secrets of the whole circle in which they move. His age naturally made him the friend of his cousin Amnon, heir to the throne (2 Sam. xiii, 3). He received from the prince an advice that was some unknown grief—"Why art thou, the king's son, gone out from the king's presence?—and, when he had wormed it out, he gave him the fatal advice for enjoining his sister Tamar (ver. 5, 6). and grasped. The king lifted him up to the edge of the chariot, apparently that he might whisper his secret into his ear, and said, "Come with me, and see my zeal for Jehovah. It was the first indication of Jehu's design. Now the king, the chief of Baal, was a representative that the stern zealot would be a fit conductor. Having intrusted him with the secret, he (Sept.) or his attendant (Heb. and A.V.) caused Jehonadab to proceed with him to Samaria in the royal chariot. Jehonadab was evidently held in great respect among the Israelites generally; and Jehu was alive to the importance of obtaining the countenance and sanction of such a man to his proceedings; and as it is expressly said that Jehonadab went out to meet Jehu, it seems probable that the people of Samaria, alarmed at the menacing letter which they had received from Jehu, had induced Jehonadab to go to meet and appease him on the road. His venerated character, his rank as the head of a tribe, and his neutral position, well qualified him for this mission; and it was quite as much the interest of Jehonadab to conciliate the new dynasty, in whose founder he beheld the minister of the divine decrees, as it was that of Jehu to obtain his occurrence and support in proceedings which he could not but know were likely to render him odious to the people. So completely had the worship of Baal become the national religion, that even Jehonadab was able to conceal his purpose under the mask of conformity. Nor could he act in this kingly spirit of Jehu hypothetically but the only occasion on which he is expressly mentioned is when (probably from his previous knowledge of the secret worshippers of Jehovah) he went with Jehu through the temple of Baal to turn out any that there might happen to be in the mass of pagan worshippers (2 Kings xii. 23). See Jezeu.

Jehon'athan (Heb. יְהוֹנָתָן, יְהוֹנָתָן, יְהוֹנָתָן; Sept. יְהוֹנָתָן), the full form of the name of four men.

1. The oldest son of king Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 6, 8, 21; xviii. 1, 3, 4; xix. 2, 4, 6, 7; xx throughout, and all later passages except 1 Chron. x. 2, in all which the A.V. has "Jonathan" [q.v., as the Hebrew likewise elsewhere has].

2. Son of Uzziah, and superintendent of certain of David's storehouses ("םוֹזָה", the word rendered "treasures" earlier in the verse, and in 27, 28 "cellars") (1 Chron. xxvii. 25). B.C. 1014.

3. One of the Levites who were sent by Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah, with a book of the Law, to teach the people (2 Chron. xxvii. 8). B.C. 810.

4. A priest of the high-priestly family of Shimeon (verse 6) when Joaikim was high-priest—that is, in the next generation after the return from Babylon under Zerubbabel and Joshua. B.C. post 536.

1. Son of Joa, king of Hamath, sent by his father to come to Jehu, whom he commanded to speak to the king of Shishak (2 Kings viii. 10); "He is highly spoken of in the Talmud (Berokhot, 10b.), but he did not remove the golden calves introduced by Jeroboam.) The impression on the king's mind was probably strengthened by the subsequent incident of Naaman's cure, and the temporary cessation of the inroads of the Syrians, which doubtless resulted from it (2 Kings vi.). See Naaman. Accordingly, when, a little later, again broke out between Syria and Israel, we find Elisha befriending Jehoram. The king was made acquainted by the prophet with the secret counsels of the king of Syria, and was thus enabled to defeat them; and, on the other hand, when Elisha had led a large band of Syrian soldiers, whom God had blinded, into the midst of Samaria, Jehoram reverentially asked him, "My father, shall I smite them?" and, at the prophet's bidding, not only forborne to kill them, but made a feast for them, and then sent them away out of his sight. This procedure was quite foreign from the Syrian invasions for the Israelites (2 Kings vii, 28). See BEN-HADAD. What happened after this to change the relations between the king and the prophet we can only conjecture. But, putting together the general life of Elisha (2 Kings iii, 1-3) with the fact of the prevalence of Baal-worship at the end of his reign (2 Kings x, 21-28), it seems probable that when the Syrian inroads ceased, and he felt less dependent upon the aid of the prophet, he relapsed into idolatry, and was rebuked by Elisha, and threatened with a return of the calamities from which he had escaped. Refusing to repent, a fresh invasion by the Syrians and a close siege of Samaria actually came to pass, according probably to the word of the prophet. Hence, when the terrible incident arose, in consequence of the famine, of a woman boiling and eating her own child, which immediately followed the siege, Elisha predicted the son of Shaphath, and determined to take away his life. The message which he sent by the messenger whom he commissioned to cut off the prophet's head, "Behold, this evil is from Jehovah, why should I wait for Jehovah any longer?" coupled with the fact of his having on several occasions received similar warnings, is not without bearing that many remonstrances and warnings, similar to those given by Jeremiah to the kings of his day, had passed between the prophet and the weak and unstable son of Ahab. The providential interposition by which both Elisha's life was saved, and the city delivered is narrated in 2 Kings vii, and Jehovah appeared to have returned to friendly feelings towards Elisha (2 Kings vii, 4). B.C. cir. 888-884. See ELISHA.

It was very soon after the above events that Elisha went to Damascus, and predicted the revolt of Hazael, and his accession to the throne of Syria in the room of Ben-hadad; and it was during Elisha's absence, probably, that the conversation between Jehoram and Gehazi, and the return of the Shunanmites from the land of the Philistines, recorded in 2 Kings viii, took place. Jehoram seems to have thought the revolution in Syria, which was immediately followed by Elisha's prediction, a good opportunity to pursue his father's favorite project of recovering Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians. He accordingly made an alliance with his nephew, Ahaziah, who had just succeeded Jehoram on the throne of Judah, and the two kings proceeded to strengthen the eastern frontier against the Syrians by fortifying Ramoth-gilead, which had fallen into Jehoram's hands, and which his father had perished in the attempt to recover from the Syrians. This strong fortress thenceforth became the head-quarters of the operations beyond the river. Hazael was scarcely settled on the throne before he took arms and marched against Ramoth, in the environs of which the Israelites sustained a defeat. Jehoram was wounded in the battle, and obliged to return to Jezebel to be healed of his wounds (2 Kings viii, 29; ix, 14, 15), leaving his army in the charge of Jehu, one of his ablest and most active generals, to hold Ramoth-gilead against Hazael. Jehu, however, in this interval was anointed king of Israel by the messenger of Elisha, and immediately he and the army under his command revolted from their allegiance to Jehoram (2 Kings ix, ix, and Jehu, hastily marching to Jezerel, surprised Jehoram, wounded and defended as he was. Jehoram, going out to meet him, fell pierced by an arrow from Jehu's bow on the very plat of ground which Ahab had wreted from Naboth the Jezerelite, thus fulfilling to the letter the prophecy of Elisha (1 Kings xxi, 21-29). B.C. 888.

5. (Josephus 'I'oe~a~os, Ant. ix, 5, 1.) The eldest son and successor of Jehoshaphat, and fifth king on the separate throne of Judah, who began to reign (alone) at the age of thirty-six years, and reigned three years, B.C. 887-884. It is indeed said in the general account (2 Chron. xxv, 5, 20; 2 Kings viii, 16) that he began to reign at the age of thirty-two, and that he reigned eight years; but the conclusions deducible from the fact that his name is mentioned in the place in which we find the name of Israel (2 Kings viii, 16), show that the reign thus stated dates back three years into the reign of his father, who from this is seen to have associated his eldest son with him in the later years of his reign, as, indeed, is expressed in that last cited passage (see Reil's 'Com., on 2 Kings i, 17; Reine, Harmon. vitae Josaphati, Jen, 1718, and Dyes, de num. amor. regni Josephi, ib.). This appears to have been on the occasion of Jehoshaphat's absence in the conflict with confederate invaders, the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites (2 Chron. xxvii); and must be distinguished from a still earlier co-regency (2 Kings i, 17), apparently during the allied attack upon the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead, in which Ahab lost his life. See JEHOSSHAPHAT. Jehoram's daughter Jehosheba was married to the high-priest Jehoida (q.v.). He had himself unhappily been married to Athaliah, whom he had slain before his brother Ahab. Athaliah it seems to have neutralized all the good he might have derived from the example of his father. One of the first acts of his reign was to put his six brothers to death and seize the valuable appanages which their father had in his lifetime bestowed upon them. After this we are not surprised to find him giving up the liberties of that new and strange kind—the Phcenician— which had been brought into Israel by Jezebel, and into Judah by her daughter Athaliah. For these atrocities the Lord let forth his anger against Jehoram and his kingdom. The Edomites revolted, and, according to the last cited passage (Gen. xxxvii, 40), established their permanent independence. It was as much as Jehoram could do, by a night-attack with all his forces, to extricate himself from their army, which had surrounded him. Next Lilion, the city of the priests (Josh. xxi, 13), one of the strongest fortified cities in Judah (Josh. xvi, 8), and perhaps one of those "fenced cities" (2 Chron. xxvi, 3) which Jehoshaphat had given to his other sons, renounced allegiance to Jehoram because he had forsaken Jehovah, the God of his fathers. But this seemed only to stimulate him to enforce the practice of idolatry. He was in the time of his reign the author of a writing from Elijah the prophet admonishing him of the dreadful calamities which he was bringing on himself by his wicked conduct, but even this failed to effect a reformation in Jehoram. See ELISHA. At length the Philistines on one side, and the Arameans and Cushites on the other, grew bold against a king forsaking the God, and in repeated invasions spoiled the land of all its substance; they even ravaged the royal palaces, and took away the wives and children of the king, leaving him only one son, Ahaziah. Nor was this all: Jehoram was in his last days afflicted with a frightful disease in his bowels, which, from the time it appeared to him, in describing it, appears to have been malignant dysentery in its most shocking and tormenting form (see R. Mead, Bibl. Krankh. 44; but comp. Bartholin. Med. Bibl. c. 12, G. Detharding, De morbo reg. Joram, Rostock, 1731). See JEHOSHEBA, i.e. Jehovah is blessed. A most unfortunate reign. His name appears, however, in the royal genealogy of our Saviour (Luke, "Joram, Matt. i, 8). See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

lounah-judged, i. e. vindicated; Sept. ‘Iwosap, sometimes in the contracted form JOSHAPHT ([C],[C], JOS-shaphat, 1 Chron. xi, 43; xv, 24; ’Iwosap, A. V., in the latter passage “Jehoshaphat”; N. T. ’Iwosap, ‘Josaphat,” Matt. i, 8; Josephus ’Iwosaproto), the name of six men.

1. A Mithinite, one of David’s famous body-guard (1 Chron. xi, 43; Heb. and A. V. “Josaphat.”) B.C. 1046. He was one of thenobles appointed to blow the trumpets before the ark on its removal to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv, 24; Heb. “Josaphat”). B.C. cir. 1043.

2. Son of Ahilud, and royal chronicler (q. v.) under David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii, 16; xx, 24; 1 Kings iv, 3; 1 Chron. xviii, 15). B.C. 1041.

5. The fourth separate king of Judah (“Israel” in 2 Chron. xxii, 2, last clause, is either a transcription’s error or a general title), being son of Asa (by Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi), whom he succeeded at the age of thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years. B.C. 912-887 (1 Kings xiv, 31; xx, 34; 2 Chron. xxii, 4, 7). He persuaded Jehoshaphat to forsake his father’s religion by marrying into the royal family of Judah and working to name his reign by fortifying his kingdom against Israel (2 Chron. xxii, i, 2); and, having thus secured himself against surprise from the quarter which gave most disturbance to him, he proceeded to cleanse the land from the idolatries and licentious monuments by which it was still tainted (1 Kings xxii, 48). Even the high places and groves which former well-disposed kings had suffered to remain were by the zeal of Jehoshaphat in a great measure destroyed (2 Chron. xxvii, 6), although not altogether (2 Chron. xx, 33). In the third year of his reign, he gathered the Levites scattered from town to town, with the book of the Law in their hands, instructing the people, and calling back their wandering affections to the religion of their fathers (2 Chron. xxvii, 7-9). The results of this fidelity to the principles of the theocracy were, that at home he enjoyed peace and substance, and abroad security and honor. His treasurires were filled with the “presents” which the blessing of God upon the people, “in their basket and their store,” enabled them to bring. His renown extended into the neighboring nations, and the Philistines, as well as the adjoining Arabian tribes, paid him rich tributes in silver and gold, and the townsmen of all the towns in good condition, to erect fortresses, to organize a powerful army, and to raise his kingdom to a degree of importance and splendor which it had not enjoyed since the revolt of the ten tribes (2 Chron. xxvii, 10-19).

The weak and impious Ahaz at that time occupied the throne of Israel; and Jehoshaphat, at a time, having nothing to fear from his power, sought, or at least did not repel, an alliance with him. This is alged to have been the grand mistake of his reign, and that it was such is proved by the consequences. Ahaz might be benefited by the connection, but under no circumstances could it be of service to Jehoshaphat or his kingdom, and it might, as it actually did, involve him in much disgrace and disaster, and bring bloodshed and trouble into his house. Jehoshaphat’s eldest son Jehoran married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. It does with priestly and Levitical encouragement that ill-starred union. The closeness of the alliance between the two kings is shown by many circumstances: Eliah’s reluctance when in exile to set foot within the territory of Judah (IIum, Und. Concii, i, § 19, p. 199;) the identity of names given to the children of the two royal families; the admission of names compounded with the name of Jehovah into the family of Jezebel, the zealotous worshipper of Baal; and the acrimony with which Jehoshaphat accompanied Ahaz to the field of battle.

Accordingly, we next find him on a visit to Ahaz in Samae, being the first time any of the kings of Israel and Judah had met in peace. He here experienced a reception worthy of his greatness; but Ahaz failed not to take advantage of the occasion, and so worked upon the weak points of his character as to prevail upon him to take arms with him against the Syrians, with whom, hitherto, the kingdom of Judah never had had any war or occasion of quarrel. However, Jehoshaphat was not so far infatuated as to proceed to the war without consulting God, who, according to the principles of the theocratic government, was the final arbiter of war and peace. The false prophets of Ahab poured forth ample promises of success, and one of them, named Zedekiah, resorting to material symbols, made him horns of iron, “for the Lord said, ‘With the hand of iron and the hand of brass will I break thee in pieces.’” Still Jec-hosaphat was not sated; and the answer to his further inquiries extorted from him a rebuke of the reluctance which Ahab manifested to call Micah “the prophet of the Lord.” The fearless words of this prophet did not make the impression upon the king of Judah which might have been expected; or, probably, he then felt himself too deeply bound in honor to recede. He went to the fatal battle of Ramoth-gilead, and there nearly became the victim of a plan which Ahab had laid for his own safety at the expense of his too-confiding ally. He persuaded Jehoshaphat to come with him against the king of Edom, himself went disguised to the battle. This brought the heat of the contest around him, as the Syrians took him for Ahab; and, if they had not in time discovered their mistake, he would certainly have been slain (1 Kings xxii, 1-38). Ahab was killed, and the battle lost; but Jehoshaphat was saved, and he and his army returned to Jerusalem (2 Chron. xviii, 1-14). B.C. 895. See Ahab.

On his return from this imprudent expedition he was met by the just reproaches of the prophet Jeshu (2 Chron. xix, 1-8). The best atonement he could make for this error was by the continued loyalty he showed to the Law. He resumed his labors in the further extirpation of idolatry, in the instruction of the people, and the improvement of his realm. He now made a tour of his kingdom in person, “from Beerseba to Mount Ephraim,” that he might see the ordinances of God duly established, and witness the due execution of his intentions respecting the instruction of the people in the divine law. This tour enabled him to discern many defects in the local administration of justice, which he then applied him-sely to remedy (see Selden, De Synedrii, ii, ch. 8, § 4). He appointed magistrates in every city for the determination of all cases of civil and personal injury, and the punture of the abuses to which the administration of justice was in those days exposed may be gathered from his excellent charge to them: “Take heed what ye do, for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment. Wherefore now, take heed to your souls, that ye take not the Lord’s name in vain; and iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts.” Then he established a supreme council of justice at Jerusalem, composed of priests, Levites, and “the chiefs of the fathers,” to which difficult cases were referred, and appeals brought from the provincial tribunals. This tribunal also was inducted by a weighty but short charge from the king, whose conduct in this and other matters places him at the very head of the monarchs who reigned over Judah as a separate kingdom (2 Chron. xix, 1-41).

The activity of Jehoshaphat’s mind was next turned towards the revival of that maritime commerce which had been established by Solomon. The land of Edom and the ports of the Elanitic Gulf were still under the power of Judah, and in them the king prepared a fleet for the voyage to Ophir. Unhappily, however, he yielded to the wish of the king of Israel that he should accompany him to take part in the enterprise. For this the expedition was doomed of God, and the vessels were wrecked almost as soon as they quitted port. Instructed by Elizer, the prophet, as to the cause of this disaster, Jeoshaphat had no scruples, his confidence in him during this time declined the co-operation of the king of Israel, the voyage prospered. The trade, however, was not prosecuted. with any zeal, and was soon abandoned (2 Chron. xx, 53-37; 1 Kings xxii, 48, 49). B.C. 895. See Commerce.

After the death of Ahaziah, king of Israel, Jehoram, his son-in-law, persuaded Jehoshaphat to join him in an expedition against Moab. B.C. ciri. 891. This alliance was, however, on political grounds, more excusable than the two former, as the Moabites, who were under tribute to Israel, might draw into their cause the Edomites, who were tributary to Judah. Besides, Moab could be invaded more safely from the south, round him, the end of the Dead Sea; and the king of Israel could not gain access to them in that quarter but by marching through the territories of Jehoshaphat. The latter not only joined Jehoram with his own army, but required his submission, the king of Edom, to bring his forces into the field. During the seven days, so that the wilderness of Edom the army suffered much from want of water, and by the time the allies came in sight of the army of Moab they were ready to perish from thirst. In this emergency, the pious Jehoshaphat thought, as usual, of consulting God; so hearing that the prophet Elisha was in the camp, the three kings proceeded to his tent. For the sake of Jehoshaphat, and for his sake only, deliverance was promised, and it came during the ensuing night in the shape of an abundant supply of water, which rolled down the exhausted cisterns and pools and hollows. Afterwards Jehoshaphat took his full part in the operations of the campaign till the armies were induced to withdraw in horror by witnessing the dreadful act of Mesha, king of Moab, in offering up his eldest son in sacrifice upon the wall of the town in which he was shut up (2 Kings xxii, 4-37; see Jehoshaphat).

This war kindled another much more dangerous to Jehoshaphat. The Moabites, being highly exasperated at the part he took against them, turned all their wrath upon him. They induced their kindred, the Ammonites and the Arabians, the sons of Lot, to assist them, and even drew over the Edomites and other portions of the neighboring nations to join them against the united forces of the Edomites and the neighbors of Edom. This great enterprise, the allied forces of Judah, and the army of Edom and Moab encamped at Gigedah, near the western border of the Dead Sea. In this extremity Jehoshaphat felt that his days were numbered, and the God with whom he had been associated so long in his career. Jehoshaphat now restitutes the whole of the neighboring nations, and the alliance of all the powerful powers of the earth led to the formation of an alliance of the Edomites and Moabites, which ended in the death of the king. The army of Jehoshaphat, as a result, was compelled to retreat; and the allies, on receiving intelligence of the defeat of their army, were driven to look elsewhere for a means of resistance. The allies, not being able to make an effective resistance, were defeated and the army of Jehoshaphat was left in possession of the country.

JEHOSHEPAPHAT, VALLEY OF (Yehoshaphat, Valley of), a valley of great extent, in the north of Judah, near the Dead Sea. The passage is one of great boldness, amounting to the verbal turns in which Hebrew poetry is so much delighted; and, in particular, there is a play between the names given to the spot—Jehoshaphat, i.e. 'Jehovah's judgment'—and the 'judgment' also there to be pronounced. The Hebrew prophets often refer to the ancient glories of their nation: thus Isaiah speaks of the "day of Midian," and of Jehoshaphat the "day of Midian," and of the triumphs of David and Solomon (in "Mount Perazim" and in "the Valley of Gibeon," and in like manner Joel, in announcing the vengeance of God on the strangers who invaded his country, iii, 14), seems to have glanced back to that triumphant day when king Jehoshaphat—the greatest king the nation had seen since Solomon, and the greatest champion of Jehovah—led out his people to a valley in the wilderness of Tekoa, and there blessed with such a victory over the hordes of his enemies as was without a parallel in the national records (2 Chron. xx. xx. xvi.; see J. E. Gerhardt, Dissert, v. d. Citation Ins Thal Jona.

But, though such a reference to Jehoshaphat is both natural and characteristic, it is not certain that it is intended. The word may be only a reference to a passage which was by this structure, as already mentioned, a favorite place of the prophet. Such was the view of one of the ancient translators, thus Theodotion renders it γήγα ρας νως, and so the Targum of Jonathas:—"the plain of the division of judgment." Michaelis (Bibl. für Urges. lehre, Rev. bibl.) seems to have taken the place of the place of the judgment. It is considered as a prediction of the Maccabean victories. By others, however, the prophet has been supposed to have had the end of the world in view (see Henderson, KelI, etc., ad loc.).

The name "Valley of Jehoshaphat" generally signifies el-Jôs, near Tekoa, for Jôsafoth, also el-Beit el-Shaaf or Faraun, In modern times, is attached to the deep ravine which separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives, through which at one time the Kedron forced its stream. At what period the name was first applied to this spot is not known. There is no trace of it in the Bible or in Josephus. In both the only name used for it is the N. T. C. Kidron. We first encounter its new title in the middle of the 4th century, in the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome (s. v. Colos), and in the commentary of the latter father on Joel. Since that time the name has been recognised and adopted by travellers of all ages and all faiths. It is used by Christians—as Arculf, in 700 (Early Travels, p. 4)—and by Jews, as Benjamin of Tudela, about 1170 (Asher, i, 71; see Roland, Palestine, p. 556). By the Moslems it is still said to be called by the traditional name (Seetzen, ii, 28, 26), though the name generally given to the valley is that of Sittit or Sittit-Margam. Both Moslems and Jews believe that the last judgment is to take place there. To find a grave there is a frequent wish of the latter (Briggs, Heathen and Holy Lands, p. 290), and the former show—as they have shown for certainly two centuries—the place on which Mohammed is to be seated at the last judgment: a stone jutting out from the east wall of the Haram area, near the south corner—one of the pillars which once adorned the churches of Helena or Justinian, and of which multitudes are now imbedded in the rude massery of the more modern walls of Jerusalem. This stone is called et-Tur in Arabic, and is robed by the Moslems (Saucy, Voyage, i, 199). From it will spring the bridge of As-Sirat, the crossing of which is to test the true believers. Those who cannot stand the test will drop off into the abyss of Gehenna, in the depths of the valley (Ali Bey, p. 224, 5; Mejri ed-Din in Robinson's Researches, i, 269). The steep sides of the ravine, wherever a level strip affords the opportunity, are crowded—in places almost paved—by the sepulchres of the Moslems, or the smaller slabs of the Jewish tombs, alike awaiting the assembly of the last judgment. (For a full description of the valley, see Robinson, Biblical Researches, i, 944, 950, 956-958, 996-402; ii, 246.)

So narrow and precipitous a gien is quite unsuited to the Biblical event, but this inconsistency does not appear to have disturbed those who framed or those who hold the tradition. It is, however, implied in the Heb. terms employed in the two cases. That by Joel is emek (מֵעֵק), a word applied to spacious valleys such as those of Edom (Ezek. xvi. 12), Syria (Stanley, ix, xxiv), and Arabia (Appendix § 1). On the other hand, the ravine of the Kidron is invariably designated by nakhal (נהחק), answering to the modern Arabic wady. There is no instance in the O. T. of these two terms being convertible, and this fact alone would warrant the inference that the tradition of the identity of the emek of Jehoshaphat and the nakhal Kidron did not arise until Hebrew had begun to become a dead language. The grounds on which it did arise are probably these:

1. The frequent mention throughout this passage of Joel of Mount Zion, Jerusalem, and the Temple (ii, 92; iii, i, 6, 16, 17, 18) may have led to the belief that the locality of the great judgment would be in the immediate vicinity, and would be assisted by the mention of the Mount of Olives in the somewhat similar passage in Zechariah (xviii, 4, 5).

2. The belief that Christ would reappear in judgment on the Mount of Olives, from which he had ascended. This was at one time a received article of Christian belief—such a pilgrimage would be assisted by the mention of the Mount of Olives in the somewhat similar passage in Zechariah (xviii, 4, 5).

3. There is the alternative that the valley of Jehoshaphat itself is Cumaicus name of the valley of the Kidron, and that, from the name, the connection with Joel's prophecy and the belief in its being the scene of Jehovah's last judgment have followed. This may be so, but then we should expect to find some trace of the existence of the name before the fourth century after Christ, which is not the case. It may have been applied as early as the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xxi. 16), but so interference can fairly be drawn from this.

But whatever originated the tradition, it has held its ground most firmly, as is evinced by several local circumstances. (a) In the valley itself, one of the four remarkable monuments which exist at the foot of Olives is so at a very early date connected with Jehoshaphat. At Arculf's visit (about 700) the name appears to have been borne by that now called "Abalam's tomb," but then the "tower of Jehoshaphat" (Early Travels, p. 4). In the time of Maundrell, the "tomb of Jehoshaphat" is mentioned in the context of the rock behind "Abalam's tomb." A tolerable view of this is given in plate 33 of Munk's Palestine; and a photograph by Salzmann, in a description, in the Texte (p. 31) to the same. The name may, as already observed, really point to Jehoshaphat—"a man of peace," who is described, like the other kings, in the city of David (2 Chron. xxii. 1).

See ABALAM'S TOMB. (b) One of the gateways of the city in the east wall, opening on the valley, bore the same name. This is plain from the Cité de Jérusalem, where it is said to have been called a "postern" close to the golden gate-way (Portz Octo), and to the south of that gate (pars deversa, § 4). It was, therefore, at or near the small walled-up door-way, to which M. de Saucy has restored the name of the Po- terne de Josaphat, and which is but a few feet to the south of the modern gate-way. Hence it may be this "postern" is evidently of later date than the wall in which it occurs, as some of the enormous stones of the wall have been cut through to admit it, and so far, therefore, it is a witness to the date of the tradition being subsequent to the time of Herod, by whom this wall was built. It is probably the "with an arrow leading down by steps to the valley" of which Arculf speaks. Benjamin of Tudela (1163) also mentions the gate of Jehoshaphat, but without any nearer indication of its position than that it led to the valley and the monuments (Asher, i, 71). (c) Lastly, leading to this gate was a street called the street of Jehoshaphat (Cité de Jérusalem, § 7).

If the "king's dale" (or valley of Shaveh) of Gen. xiv, 17, and of 2 Sam. xviii, 18, be the same, and if the commonly received location of them be correct, then we have the valley of Jehoshaphat identified with that of Melchizedek, and its history carries us back to Salem's earliest days. But at what time it became a cemetery we are not informed. See Shaveh.

Cyril, in the 4th century, mentions it in a way which indicates that in his day tradition had altered, or that the valley had become more attached to a wider sweep of country than now, for he speaks of it as some furlongs east of Jerusalem—as bare, and fitted for equestrian exercises (Reland, Palestine, p. 355). Some old travellers say that it was "three miles in length, reaching from the vale of Jehoshaphat to a place without the city which they call Bethel" (Angelus, Hist. saev. Gent. Europaeorum in ivium). Some of the old travellers—such as Felix Fabri, in the 16th century—call it Celc, from the Kolla of Eusebius and the Coelas of Jerome; and they call that part of the Kidron which is connected with it Cramites, or Krizana, a place of judgment (Evag. i, 371). We may add that some old writers extend this valley considerably upwards, placing Gethsemane and the traditional station of the Virgin in it. They seem to have divided the Kidron bed into two parts: the lower, called the valley of Siloam or Siloam; the upper, the valley of Jehoshaphat, from which the eastern gate of the city in early times was called, not, as now, St. Stephen's, but "the gate of the valley of Jehoshaphat."

The present valley of Jehoshaphat occupies the Kidron hollow and the adjoining acclivities on both sides. Its limits have not been defined, but it is supposed to begin a little above the fountain of the Virgin (Um ed-Deraj), and to extend to the bend of the Kidron, under Scopus. The acclivity to the eastern wall of Jerusalem is—at least towards the top—a Turkish burying-ground; and the white tombs, with the Koran (in stone) at the one end, and a turban at the other, look picturesque as they dot for several hundred yards the upper part of the slope. The other acclivity, ascending the steep between Olivet and the Mount of Corruption, is crowded all over with flat Jewish tombs, each with the Hebrew inscription, and speckled here and there with bushy olive-trees. Thus Moslems and Jews occupy the valley of Jehoshaphat between them, with their dead looking across the Kidron into each other's faces, and laid there in the common belief that it was no ordinary privilege to die in Jerusalem and be buried in such a spot. The valley of the present day presents nothing remarkable. It is rough to the feet and barren to the eye. It is still, moreover, frequently a solitude, with nothing to break the loneliness but perhaps a passing shepherd with a few sheep, or a traveller on his way to Aniata, or some inhabitant of Silwan or Bethany going into the city by the gate of St. Stephen. Tombs, and olives, and rough, verdureless slopes are all that meet the eye on either side. See JERUSALEM.

Jehoshaphah (Heb. יְהוֹשָׁפָּח, Yehohshaphat; Septuag. Ἰωσσαθαί, Josephus Ἰωσσαθαί), the daughter of Jehoram, sister of Ahaziah, and aunt of Joash, kings of Judah. The last of these owed his life to her, and his crown to her husband, the high-priest Jehoiada (2 Kings xi, 2). In the parallel passage (2 Chron. xxiii, 11) the name is written Jehoshareath (יהוֹשָׁחֵר, Yehoshareath; Sept. Ἰωσσαθαί). B.C. 882.

See JEHOSHAH. Her name thus exactly corresponds in meaning to that of the only two other wives of Jewish priests who are known to us, viz. Elisabeth, the wife of Aaron (Exod. vi, 23), and Elisabeth, the wife of Zechariah (Luke i, 7). As she is called (2 Kings xi, 2) "the daughter of Joram, sister of Ahaziah," it has been conjuncted that she was the daughter, not of Athaliah, but of Joram by another wife (comp. Josephus, Ant. ix, 7, 1, ὄργια ὥμοστάρας ἀδελφὰς. She is the only recorded instance of the marriage of a princess of the royal house with a high-priest. On this occasion it was a providential circumstance—"for she was the sister of Ahaziah" (2 Chron. xxiii, 11)—as inducing and probably enabling her to rescue the infant Jehoshaf from the massacre of his brothers. By her he and his nurse were concealed in the palace, and afterwards in the Temple (2 Kings xi, 3, 23; 2 Chron. xxiii, 11), where she was brought up probably with her sons (2 Chron. xxiii, 11), who assisted at his coronation. One of these was Zechariah, who succeeded her husband in his office, and was afterwards murdered (2 Chron. xxiv, 20).—Smith. Needless doubt has been thrown upon her marriage with Jehoiada (Nehman, Hebrew Monatshefte, iii, p. 196), which is not expressly mentioned in Kings, as "a fiction of the chronicler to glorify his greatness." This, however, is certainly assumed in 2 Kings xi, 3, and is accepted by Ewald (Geschichte, iii, 575) as perfectly authentic. See JEROBOAM.

Jehosh'ua (Numb. xiii, 16), or Jehosh'ua'h (1 Chron. vii, 27). See JOSUA.

Jeho'vah (יְהוֹוָה, Yehowah', Sept. usually ב כֹּהָנִים, Author. Vers. usually "the Lord"), the name by which God was pleased to make himself known, under the covenant, to the ancient Hebrews (Exod. vi, 2, 3), although it was doubtless in use among the patriarchs, as it occurs even in the historical creation (Gen. ii, 4). The theory of Schwidt (Semitische Denkm. 1792), that the record is of later origin than the Mosaic age, is based upon the false assumption that the Hebrews had previously been polytheistic. See GENESIS; GOD.

I. Modern Pronunciation of the Name.—Although ever since the time of Galatinus, a writer of the 16th century (De arcanis catholice rerissit, lib. i) —not, as according to others, since Raymund Martin (see Gesenius. Lex. p. 383)—it has been almost universal custom to pronounce the name יְהוָה (in those copies where it is furnished with vowels), Jehovah, yet, at the present day, most scholars agree that this pointing is not that of the original and genuine one, but that these vowels are derived from those of אָדָם, Adoni. For the later Hebrews, even before the time of the Sept. version, either following some old superstition (compare Herod. ii, 86; Cicero, De nat. deor. iii, 56) or deceived by a false interpretation of a certain Mosaic precept (Lev. xxiv, 16), have always regarded this name as too sacred even to be pronounced (Philo, De cts. Mos. iii, 519, 529, ed. Colon.; Joseph. Ant. ii, 12, 4; Talmud, Sanhed. ii, 90; a; Maimonides in Jadh. Chaikura, iv, 10; also in More Nibadh in, i, 61; Theodoret, Quest. 13 in Exod.; Eusebius, Prep. Evangel. ii, 305). Wherever, therefore, this inefltable name is read in the sacred books, they pronounced יְהוָה, "Adoni," Lord, in its stead; and hence, when the Masoretic text came to be supplied with the vowels, the four letters יְהוָה were pointed with the vowels of this word, the initial ו taking, as usual, a simple instead of a compound Sheva. This derivation of the vowels is evident from the peculiar position in the prefix, and from the use of the Dagesh, after it, in both which particulars it exactly imitates the peculiarities of יְהוָה, and likewise from the varied pointing when following יְהוָה, in which case it is written יְהוָה and pronounced פֶּלֶךְ, "Elohim," God, the vowels of which it then borrows, to prevent the repetition of the sound Adoni. That a similar law or notion prevailed even before the Christian era may be inferred from the fact that the Septuag. renders יְהוָה by ב כֹּהָנִים, like יְהוָה; and even the Samaritans observed the same custom, for they used to pronounce Jehovah by the word יְהוָה, Shíma, i. e. THE NAME (Reland, De Samaritaniis, p. 12; Hunt-ington, Letters, p. 38). (See, on this subject generally, Ha-dr. Reland, Decres excommunication philoi de vera pron. nonnàmis Jehova [Traj. ad Rhen. 1707].)

It seems to Moses neo-Ethiopic, the ancient name of the Hebrew Divinity (More Nechochim, i. 62) gives an obscure account of the traditional and secret method of teaching its true pronunciation to the priests, but avers that it was unknown from its form. Many adduce the statements of Greek writers, as well profane as Church fathers, that the deity of the Hebrews was called Jao, Jao, Jao, Jao, Jao. Theophrastus Theodore alone adding that the Samaritan pronunciation was IABE (Diod. Sic. i. 94; Forpyhry in Eusebius, Prep. Ev. x. 11; Tsattzes, Chilaid. vii, 126; Hesychius often; Clemens Alex. Strom. v, p. 668, Oxon. Orig. in Dan. vol. ii, p. 45; Ireneaus, Hares. ii, 66; Jerome, in Ps. xxi; Theoret. Quest, 15 in Exod.; Epiphanius, Hær. xx). The Gnostics classed Iaoew as the Hebrew divinity, among their sacred emanations (Ireneaus, i. 54; Epiph. Harr. 26), along with several of his appellations (see Mather, Histoire du Gnosticisme, tab. 8-10; Beller-mann, Ueber den Arianschen Glauben der Abessinen, Abschilde, fasc. i, ii, Berlin, 1817, 1818); and that famous oracle of Apollo, quoted by Macrobius (Sat. i, 18), ascribing this name (Iaoew) to the sun, appears to have been of Gnostic origin (Jahizonski, Paedag. Αἰγυπτ. i, 250 sq.).

Perhaps many recent writers have followed the opinion of those who think that the word in question was originally pronounced רְחֵל, Yahveh, corresponding to the Greek Iaoew. But this view, as well as that which maintains the correctness of the common pronunciation רְחֵל (Michaelis, Suppl. p. 524; Meyer, Blätter für höhere Wahrheit, xi, p. 306), is opposed to the fact that verbs of the class (יְהָשָׁנ) from which this word appears to be derived do not admit such a pointing (Cholem) with their second radical. Moreover, the simple letters רְחֵל would naturally be pronounced Jao by a Greek without any special pointing. Those, therefore, appear to have the best reason who prefer the pointing רְחֵל, Yahveh (not רְחֵל, Yahveh; for the first י being a wawpide-handshapes, e. g. in the Hebrew δ, does not take the compound Shewa), as being at once agreeable to the laws of Hebrew vocalization, and a form from which all the Greek modes of writing (including the Samaritan, as cited by Theophrastus) may naturally have sprung (יְהָשָׁנ = יְהָשָׁנ as a "matter lectionis," and יְהָשָׁנ being silent; thus leaving י as the representative of the first vowel). From this, too, the ascopated forms רְחֵל and יְげる may most readily be derived; and it is further corroborated by the etymology. Ewald was the first who used in all his writings, especially in his translations from the O-T. Scriptures, the form יְהָשָׁנ, although in his youth he had taken ground in favor of Jehovah (comp. his Ueber d. Composition der Genese, Brunswick, 1822). Another defender of יְהָשָׁנ was Hengstenberg (Beiträge zur Einlei, ins A. T. Berlin, 1881-38, vol. ii). Strongest in defence of Jehovah is, among prominent German theologians, Höflmann, Bibelstudien (Leipzig, 1859-60), vol. i.

IIII. Proper Signification of the Term.—A clew to the real import of this name appears to be designedly furnished in the passage where it is most distinctively ascribed to the God of the Hebrews, Exod. iii, 14: "And God said unto Moses, I am that I am" (וְיִהוָה יִהוָה וְיִהוָה יִהוָה; and he said, Thus shalt thou say to the children of Israel, The I shall not send thee to you) (where the Sept. and later versions attempt to render the spirit of the Hebrew יִהוָה יִהוָה by אָלֹהִים, the Venetian Greek barbarously ὅ τοῦτο, Vulg. qui sum, A. Vers. "I am"). Here the Almighty makes known his unchangeable character, implied in his eternal self-existence, as the ground of confidence for the oppressed Israelites to trust in his promises of deliverance and care respecting them. The same idea is elsewhere alluded to in the Exod. xx, 15; Is. xxxiii, 6; Mal. iii, 6 (where Jehovah is change not); Hos. xii, 6, "Jehovah is his memento." The same attribute is referred to in the description of the divine Redeemer in the Apocalypse (Rev. i, 4, 8, ὅ νη καὶ ἔν η καὶ ὅ ἄρμος; a phrase used indeclinably, with designed identification with Jehovah, see Stuart, Commentaries, loc. cit., with which has been aptly compared the famous inscription on the Saitic temple of Isis (Εὐρυί ς τό γεγονος καὶ ήν καὶ ἐσθομον, Plutarch, De Isid. et Osir. 9), and various parallel titles of heathen mythology, especially among Eastern nations. Those, however, who compare the Greek and Roman deities, Jupiter, Jove, Osiris, etc., or who seek an Egyptian origin for the name, are entirely in error (see Tholuck's treatise transl. in the Bibl. Repos. 1884, p. 89 sq.; Hengstenberg, Genesimia of the Pentateuch, i, 218; for other Shemitic etymologies, see First, a. v.). Nor are those (as A. M. Whorton, in the Bibliotheca Sacra, Jan. 1857, who appears to have borrowed his idea from the Journ. of Succ. Lit. Jan. 1854, p. 398 sq.; see Tyler, Jehovah the Redeemer, Lond. 1861) entirely correct (see Furtmü. Heb. Wörterb., a. v.) who regard רְחֵל as יְהָשָׁנ, and this as the actual fut. Kal of the verb יְהָשָׁנ יְהָשָׁנ, and so render it directly shall be, i.e. He shall be; for the form, if a verb at all, would be in the Hiphil (see koppe ad Exod. loc.), in Pottii Syii. iv, p. 59; Bohlen, nd Gen., 103; Yatke, Theol. Bibl. p. 671) and would signify he that shall come to be, i.e. the Creator; for the real fut. Kal is יְהָשָׁנ יְהָשָׁנ, Yikh, frequently occurs. It is rather a denominative, i.e. noun or adj., formed by the prepositive 5 prefixed to the verb-root, and pointed like יְהָשָׁנ and other nouns of similar formation (Nordheim's Heb. Gram. p. 512; Lee's Heb. Gram. p. 159). The word will thus signify the Existent, and designate one of the most important attributes of Deity, one that appears to include all other essential ideas.

IV. Application of the Title.—The supreme Deity and national God of the Hebrews is called in the O. T. by his own name Jehovah, and by the appellative Elohim, i. e. God, either promiscuously, or so that one or the other predominate according to the nature of the context or the custom of the writer. Jehovah Elohim, commonly the title of the "Lord God," is predominate, and not, as some would have it, Jehovah of gods, i. e. chief or prince of gods. This is the customary appellation of Jehovah in Gen. ii and iii; Exod. ix, 30, etc. Far more frequent is the compounded form when followed by a genitive, as "Jehovah God of Israel" (Josh. vii, 13; viii, 30); "Jehovah God of thy fathers" (Deut. i, 21; vi, 3); "Jehovah God, thy God" (Deut. i, 31; ii, 7); "Jehovah of hosts," i. e. of the celestial armies. See Host.

It will be evident to the attentive reader that the term Lord, so frequently applied to Christ in the N. T., is analogous to the usage with Jehovah in the O. T. As Christ is called "The Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty;" and also, "of him it is said, Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever;" he must be Jehovah, the eternally existing and supreme God (Acts ii, 25-27; Hebr. i, 13, 10; 1 Pet. ii, 22; 3: 8; Rev. i, 4, 8). See LOGOS. Jan (גָּם, Yah, Sept. קָנָה, Auth. Vers."Lord," except in Ps. lxviii, 4) is a poetic form abbreviated from Jehovah, or perhaps from the more ancient pronunciation Jaoeh. It is chiefly employed in certain customary formulas or refrains (as a proper title in Ps. lxxxix, 9; xcv, 7, 12; Isa. xxxvii, 11; Exod. xxxiv, 6; Hos. ii, 1; Mal. iii, 6; Isa. xxvi, 4). This, as well as a modification of Jehovah, frequently occurs in proper names. See HAL-LELUJAH.
It should be remembered that the Hebrew name Jehovah is generally rendered, in the English version, by the word Lord (sometimes God), and printed in small capitals, to distinguish it from the rendering of ḫēḇēḇāh and Kūḇañę́r by the same word; it is rendered "Jehovah" only in Exod. vi, 3; Psal. xlviii, 18; Isa. xii, 2; xxvi, 4, and in the compound proper names following.

Jeho'va-h-i'rah (Hebrew Jehovah ' Yireh', יְהוָה יִרְאֵה), Jehovah will see, i.e. provide; Sept. Κύριος ἀνέρ, Vulg. Dóminus videt, provides the symbolic title conferred upon the altar erected upon the hill where his uplifted hands in prayer had caused Israel to prevail, stated in the text to have been intended as a memento of God's power to exterminate the Amalekites (Exod. xvii, 15). See RPHRHIM. The phraseology in the original is peculiar: "For [the] hand [is] on [the] throne (2 Ch. 7, read 2 Ch., banner of Jah), which the A. V. glosses, "Because the Lord hath sworn," q. d. lifted up his hand. See ŠAH; HAND. The significance of the name is probably contained in the allusion to the staff which Moses held in his hand as a banner during the engagement, and the raising or lowering of which turned the fortune of battle in favor of the Israelites and against their enemies. God is thus recognized in the memorial-altar as the deliverer of his people, who leads them to victory, and is their rallying-point in time of peril. On the figurative use of 'banner,' see Psal. lx, 4; Isa. xi, 10. See BANNER.

Jeho'va-ha'shā'lam (Hebrew Jehovah ' Shā'am, יְהוָה שָׁם), Jehovah gives peace, i.e. prosperity; Sept. Κύριος πάντων, Vulgate Dominus pacem, the appellation given by God to his enemies. God is thus recognized in the memorial-altar as the deliverer of his people, who leads them to victory, and is their rallying-point in time of peril. On the figurative use of 'banner,' see Psal. lx, 4; Isa. xi, 10. See BANNER.

Jeho'va-ha'sham'mah (Hebrew Jehovah ' Sham'mah, יְהוָה שָׁם), Jehovah is there; Sept. Κύριος εἰς τὴν ήλεγχον, Vulg. Dominus est in eis, Author. Ver. "The Lord is there," the symbolic title conferred upon the altar erected upon the mountain where the divine angel appeared to him and wrought the miracles which confirmed his mission; in commemoration of the success thus betokened to him (" Peace be unto thee"); stated to have been extant at a late day in Ophrah (Judg. vi. 24). JEHU 812

1. Son of Obad and father of Azariah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 88). B.C. post. 1012.

2. An Antiochite, one of the Benjamite slingers that joined David's band at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 3). B.C. 1055.

3. The son of Hanani, a prophet (Josephus 'Ippic, Ant. viii, 12, 3) of Judah, but whose ministries were chiefly directed to Israel. His father was probably the seer who suffered for having rebuked Asa (2 Chron. xvi, 7). He must have begun his career as a prophet when very young. He first denounced upon Baasha, king of Israel, and the same solemn warning which had already been executed upon the house of Jeroboam (1 Kings xvi, 1, 7); a sentence which was literally fulfilled (ver. 12). The same prophet, was, many years after, commissioned to reprove Jehoshaphat for his dangerous alliance with the house of Ahab (2 Chron. xix, 2). He appears to have been the public chronicler during the entire reign of Jehoshaphat, and a volume of his records is expressly referred to (2 Chron. xx, 34), B.C. 928-886.

4. The eleventh king of the separate throne of Israel (Josephus 'Ippic, Ant. viii, 13, 7), and founder of its fourth dynasty; he reigned twenty-eight years, B.C. 883-855 (2 Kings ix, x; 2 Chron. xxii, 7-9). His history was told in the lost "Chronicles of the Kings of Israel" (2 Kings x, 34). His father's name was Jehoshaphat (2 Kings ix, 2); his grandfather's (which, as before, he took up to his own name) then, and forever after, was Nimshi. In his youth he had been one of the guards of Ahah. His first appearance in history is when, with a comrade in arms, Bidkar, or Bar-Dakar (Ephraem Syrus, Opp. iv, 540), he rode (either in a separate chariot, Sept., or on the same seat, Josephus behind Ahah, and the making out of the same story) from Damascus to Jezeel, and heard, and laid up in his heart, the warning of Elijah against the murder of Naboth (2 Kings ix, 25). But he had already, as it would seem, been known to Elijah as a youth of promise, and, accordingly, in the vision at Horeb he is mentioned as the future king of Israel, whom Elijah is to anoint as the minister of vengeance on Israel (1 Kings xix, 16, 17). This injunction, for reasons unknown to us, Elijah never fulfilled. It was reserved long afterwards for his successor Elisha. See AHAB.

5. Meanwhile, in the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, had risen to importance. The same activity and vehemence which had fitted him for his earlier distinctions still continued, and he was known far and wide as a charioteer whose rapid driving, as if of a madman (2 Kings ix, 21), could be distinguished even from a distance, and on the next day, when he had held a command in the Israelitish army posted at Ramoth-gilead to hold in check the Syrians, who of late years had made strenuous efforts to extend their frontier to the Jordan, and had possessed themselves of much of the territory of the Isrealites east of that river. The contest was, in fact, still carried on which had begun many years before in the reign of Ahah and Jeoram's father, who had lost his life in battle before this very Ramoth-gilead. Ahaziah, king of Judah, had taken part with Jehoram, king of Israel, in this war; and as the latter had been wounded in a recent action, and had gone to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds, Ahaziah had also gone thither on a visit of sympathy to him (2 Kings vii, 28, 29). B.C. 883. According to Ephraem Syrus (who omits the words "saith the Lord" in 2 Kings ix, 26, and makes "I" refer to Jehu), he had, in a dream, seen the tents, and called forth Jehu, Nabal, and his sons (Ephr. Syr. Opp. iv, 540). In this state of affairs, a council of war was held among the military commanders in camp, when, very unexpectedly, a youth of wild appearance (2 Kings ix, 11), known by his garb to be one of the disciples of the prophets, appeared at the door of the tent, and called forth Jehu, Nabal, and his sons, and bid them that he had a message to deliver to him (2 Kings ix, 1-5). They retired into a secret chamber. The youth uncovered a vial of the sacred oil (Josephus, Ant. ix, 6, 1) which he had brought with him, poured it over Jehu's head, and after announcing to him the message from Elisha, that he was appointed to be king of Israel and destroyer of the house of Ahab, rushed out of the house and fled. (2 Kings ix, 7). As Jehu was of humble origin, and had not been trained to a public profession in which he had found himself placed by the prophetic call. In a moment the enthusiasm of the army took fire. They threw their garments—the large square scapul, similar to a wrapper or plaid,—under his feet, as so to meet a rough carpet of state, placed him on the top of the stairs, as on a throne, blew the royal salute on their trumpets, and thus ordained him king (2 Kings ix, 11-14). Jehu was not a man to lose any advantage through remissness. He immediately cut off all communication between Ramoth-gilead and Jezeel, and then they heard with his ancient comrade Bidkar, whom he made captain of the host in his place, and a band of horsemen. From the tower of Jezeel a watchman saw the cloud of dust raised by the advancing party, and announced his coming (2 Kings ix, 17). The messengers that were sent out to his host, as the news spread, on the news of his arrival, which had guided all his movements. It was not till he had almost reached the city, and was identified by the watchman, that apprehension was felt. But even then it seems as if the two kings in Jezeel anticipated news from the Syrian war rather than a revolution at home. Jehu then went forth himself to meet the king, and was accompanied by the king of Judah. They met in the field of Naboth, so fatal to the house of Abah. The king saluted him with the question, "Is it peace, Jehu?" and received the answer, "What peace, so long as the wrotheds (idiolatries) of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" (v.) This completely opened the eyes of Jehoram, who exclaimed to the king of Judah: "There is treachery, O Ahaziah!" and turned to flee. But Jehu felt no infirmity of purpose, and knew that the slightest wavering might be fatal to him. He therefore seized his sword, and, taking full sign at Jehoram, with the bow which, as captain of the host, was always with him, shot him through the heart (2 Kings ix, 24). Jehu caused the body to be thrown back into the field of Naboth, out of which he had passed in his attempt at flight, and grimly remarked to the body, "Bidkar, this is the head of Naboth the Jezreelite, with whom thou rodest together after Ahah his father, the Lord laid this burden upon him." The king of Judah endeavoured to escape, but Jehu's soldiers pursued and inflicted upon him at Beth-gan (A. V. "the garden-house"), probably Engannim, a wound of which he afterwards died at Megiddo. See AHAZIAH. Jehu himself entered the city, whither the news of this transaction had already preceded him. As he passed under the walls of the palace, Jezebel herself, studiously arrayed for effect, appeared at one of the windows, and saluted him with a question such as might have shown a man of weaker nerves, "Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?" But Jehu was unmoved, and, instead of answering her, called out, "Who is on my side—who?" when several eunuchs made their appearance at the window, to whom he cried, "Throw her down!" and immediately this proud eunuch, who had lain upon the bloody bed of the mighty man of Israel, was trodden under foot by the horses. See JEZREEL. Jehu then went in and took possession of the palace (2 Kings ix, 16-37). He was now master of Jezeel, which was, next to Samaria, the chief town of the kingdom; but he could not feel secure while the capital was in the hands of the descendants of those who might be supposed to feel strong attachment to the house of Abah. The force of the blow which he had struck was, however, felt even in Samaria. When, therefore, he wrote to the persons in authority there the somewhat ironical but designedly in-timidatingly aggressive note, that one of the princes in Samaria as king and fight out the matter which lay between them, they sent a very submissive answer, giving in their adhesion, and professing their readiness to obey in all things his commands. A second letter from Jehu tested this profession in a truly horrid and exceedingly peremptory manner, requiring all the kings before him on the morrow, bringing with them the heads of all the royal princes in Samaria. A fallen house meets with little pity in the East; and when the new king left his palace the next morning, he found seven heads of the golden calves up in two tall steps in the gate. There, in the sight of these heads, Jehu took occasion to explain his conduct, declaring that he must be regarded as the appointed minister of the divine decrees, pronounced long since against the house of Ahab by the prophets, not one of whose words should fail to fall upon the ground. He then announced his proscriptions by ex-terminating in Jezerre not only all in whose veins the blood of the condemned race flowed, but also—by a considerable stretch of his commission—those officers, ministers, and creatures of the late government who, if suffered to live, would most likely be disturbers of his own reign. He also concluded that during his absence he would in these proceedings, that on his way, at “the shearinghouse” (or Beheked), he encountered forty-two sons or nephews (2 Chron. xx, 8) of the late king of Judah, and therefore connected by marriage with Ahab, on a visit of compliment to their relatives, of whose fall, seemingly by Oriental custom, he expected no more. The young princes, instead of paying their respects to the sword at the fatal well, as, in the later history, of Mizpah, and, in our own days, of Cawnorre (2 Kings x, 14). (See Kitto’s Daily Bible Illustr. ad loc.) As he drove on he encountered a strange figure, such as might have a meaning to the nation of Eliezer, for the name of Jehoadab, the austere Arab sectary; the son of Rechab.
In him his keen eye discovered a ready ally. The austere virtue and respected character of the Rechabite would, as he felt, go far to hallow his proceedings in the eyes of the multitude. He took him into his chariot, and they concocted their schemes as they entered Samaria.
(2 Kings x, 15, 16). See JEHONADAB. In that capital Jehu continued the extirpation of the persons more intimately connected with the late government. This, far from being in any way singular, is a common circumstance in Eastern revolutions. But the great stroke was, that a new government was connected with that union of intrepid daring and profound secrecy which marks the whole career of Jehu. His main object was to exterminate the ministers and more devoted adherents of Baal, who had been so much encouraged by Jezebel. There was even a temple to this idol in Samaria; and Jehu, never scrupulous about the means of reaching objects which he believed to be good, laid a snare by which he hoped to cut off the main body of Baal’s ministers at one blow. He professed to be a more zealous servant of Baal than Ahab had been, and claimed a great festival in his honor, at which none but his true servants were to be present. The prop-heists, priests, and officers of Baal assembled from all parts for this great sacrifice, and sacerdotal vestments were given to them, that none of Jehovah’s worshippers might be taken for them. Soldiers were posted so that none of the former enrolment might escape the sacrament of this office. One of the chief men of Athaliah, an officer of Baal, a man named by Ahab (1 Kings xvi, 32; Josephus, Ant. x, 7, 6) was crowded from end to end. The chief sacrifice was offered, as if in the excess of his zeal, by Jehu himself.
Jehonadab joined in the deception. There was some apprehension lest worshippers of Jehovah might be found in the temple; such, it seemed, had been the interfer-mixture of the two religions. As soon, however, as it was ascertained that all, and none but the idolaters were there, the signal was given to eighty trusted guards, and a sweeping massacre removed at one blow the whole heathen population of the kingdom of Israel. The innermost sanctuary of the temple (translated in the A. V.
“the city of the house of Baal”) was stormed, the great store of golden calves being carried off; the high figures of the inferior divinities sitting round him were torn from their places and burnt (Ewald, Gesch. iii, 596), and the site of the sanctuary itself became the public resort of the inhabitants of the city for the basest uses (2 Kings x).
Notwithstanding this zeal of Jehu in exterminating the grosser idolatries which had grown up under his immediate predecessors, he was not prepared to subvert the policy which had led Jeroboam and his successors to maintain the schismatic establishment of the golden calves in the holy city. In Jehu’s time, however, a crime in him—the worship rendered to the golden calves being plainly contrary to the law; and he should have felt that he who had appointed him to the throne would have maintained him in it, notwithstanding the apparent dangers which might seem likely to cause his fall from permitting his name to repair at the great festivals to the metropolis of the rival kingdom, which was the centre of the theocratic worship and of sacer-dotal service. Here Jehu fell short: and this very policy, apparently so prudent and far-sighted, by which he hoped to secure the stability and independence of his position, would eventually so accostume him to his work as to grant to his dynasty was shortened. For this it was foretold that his dynasty should extend only to four generations; and for this the divine aid was withheld from him in his wars with the Syrians under Izzael on the eastern frontier. Hence the war was disastrous to him, and the Syrian king was able to commence the invasion of a great part of his territories beyond the Jordan (2 Kings x, 29—33). He died in quiet, and was buried in Samaria, leaving the throne to his son Jehoahaz (2 Kings xix, 34—36). B.C. 855. His name is thought to be the first of the Israelite kings which appears in the Assyrian monuments. It seems to be found on the black obelisk discovered at Nimrud (Layard, Nimrode, i, 396), and now in the British Museum, among the names of kings who are bringing tribute (in this case gold and silver, and articles manufactured in gold) to Shalmaneser I. His name is given as “Yahweh” (or “Yahhua”), “the son of Khumri’” (Omri). This substitution of the name of Omri for that of his own father may be accounted for either by the importance which Omri had assumed as the second founder of the northern kingdom, or by the name of “Beth-Khumri,” only given to him on his inauguration as “the king over the Capital of Omri” (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 643;
There is nothing difficult to understand in the character of Jehu. He was one of those decisive, terrible, and ambitious, yet prudent, calculating, and passionate men whom God from time to time raises up to change the fate of empires and execute his judgments on the earth. He boasted of his zeal—“Come and see me for the Lord”—but at the bottom it was zeal for Jehu.
His zeal was great so long as it led to acts which squared with his own interests, but it cooled marvellously when required to take a direction in his judgment less favorable to them. Even his zeal in extirpating the idolatry of Baal is not free from suspicion. The altar of Baal was that which Ahab had associated with his throne, and in overturning the latter he could not prudently do the former. He surrounded the immense site raised by a “Jeboam” (or Jehu) in the hereditary house which he had extirpated. He must be regarded, like many others in history, as an instrument for accomplishing great purposes rather than as great or good in himself. In the long period during which his destiny—though known to others and perhaps to himself—lay dormant, he increased in his rise to power; in the ruthlessness with which he carried out his purposes; in the union of profound silence and dissimulation with a stern, fanatic, wayward zeal, he has not been without his likeness in modern times.
The Scripture narrative, although it fixes our attention on the services which he rendered to the cause of religion, made the establishment of a worthless dynasty and a degrading worship, yet, on the whole, leaves the sense that it was a reign barren in great results. His dynasty, indeed, was firmly seated on the throne longer than any other royal house of Israel (2 Kings x), and under Jeroboam II it acquired a high name among the Oriental nations. But Elisha, who had raised him to power, as far as we know, never saw him. In other respects it was a failure; the original sin of Jeroboam's worship continued; and in the prophet Hosea there seems to be a retribution exacted for the bloodshed by which he had murdered the throne: "I will avenge the blood of Jeruzalem upon the house of Jehu" (Hos. i. 4), as in the similar condemnation of Baasha (1 Kings xvi. 2). See a striking poem to this effect on the character of Jehua in the Lyra Apostolica. See ESRA, KINGDOM OF.

5. Son of Josiah, apparently one of the chief Simons who migrated to the valley of Gedæm in quest of pasture during the reign of Hezekiah, and expelled the aboriginal Hagarites (1 Chron, iv, 85). B.C. cit. 711.

In Jer. xxxviii, 1 his name is written in the contracted form Jucal (יהואל, Yekhal, Sept. Yūd-a-χαλ), and in verse 6 he is styled one of the "princes." B.C. 589.

Jehudah (HA-LEV) ben-Samuel (called in Arabic Abūhamram) a distinguished Spanish Jew, great alike as linguist, philosopher, and poet, one of the greatest lights in Jewish literature, was born in Castile about 1068 according to Grätz, or 1105 according to Rapoport. But little is known of the early history of his life; when a youth of fifteen he was already celebrated as a promising poetical genius. In the vigor of manhood we find Jehudah endeavoring to spread a knowledge of Rabbinical and Arabic literature, both by poetical productions and by discourses whom he gathered about him at Toledo, where he founded a college. About 1141 he is supposed to have completed his Kazari (כזארי), generally called Cuari, the best work ever written in defense of the Jewish religion, and aiming to refute the objections urged against Judaism by Christians. And that aspect of the Jews known to be bitterly opposed to the recognition of the authority of tradition—the Karaites. Many eminent critics, among whom ranks Bartolocci, have long discredited the supposition that it is the production of Jehudah, but of late all seem agreed that he was really the author of the work, which is entitled בִּאֵד אֱלֹהִים וּמַעְרָק יָעַר (The Book of Kazari), after the heroes of it, and it was first published at Fano in 1606, then at Venice in 1547, with an introduction by D. ben Basco. (Cavalcas (Venice, 1594); with a Latin translation and disquisitions by Jo. Buttorff, fil. Basle, 1660); a Spanish translation of it was made by Abendana without the Hebrew text (Amsterdam, 1665). The work has more lately been published with a commentary by Satorow (Berl. 1796); with a commentary, various readings, index, etc., by G.
of God; Sept. 'אֱלֹהֵי יָהֳעַ֫ר יְהֹוָה', 'father' of Zaanah, and one of the sons apparently of Mered by his second wife Hodiah, or Jehudilah (1 Chron. iv. 18). B.C. cir. 1816. See MAZAN.

In the comment of Rabbi Joseph, Jered is interpreted to mean Moses, and each of the names following are taken as titles borne by him. Jeruchiah—'trust in God;'—is so applied because in his days the Israelites trusted in the God of heaven for forty years in the wilderness.

In a remarkable prayer used by the Spanish and Portuguese Jews in the concluding service of the Sabbath, Elijah is invoked as having tided them to peace delivered to him by the hand of Jeruchiah. This is explained to refer to some transaction in the life of Philip II, through whom Elijah is, in the traditions of the Jews, believed to be identical (see Allen, Modern Judaism, p. 229).

Jekuthiel. See Luzatto.

Jekuthiel ben-Isaac Blitz, also called by his father's name, Isaac Blitz, was corrector of the press at the printing establishment of Uri Feves Levi at Amsterdam, and was the first Jew who translated the whole O.T. into German (in Hebrew type). It was published under the title 'Der hebräische Bibel ('The four-authorized translation into German') of Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings, by Rabbi Joseph B. Jekuthiel,' and under the title 'Rabbi Joseph b. Isaac of Jekuthiel' on 1 and 2 Chronicles, Joshua, Judges, and Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings, and 1 and 2 Chronicles, by Rabbi Joseph b. Isaac of Jekuthiel.' The work is a complete text, with the vowels and accents, for the preparation of which he consulted six old Spanish codices, which he denominates 'la, la, la, la, la, and la,' and which Heidenheim explains to mean 'la, la, la, la, la, and la.' The prefixed "n" denoting Spain (comp. 'la, la, la, la, la, and la,' Numb. xxxiii, 28). The results of his critical labors he afterwards embodied in a work entitled 'The Eye of the Reader,' and makes frequent quotations from the writings of many distinguished Jewish commentators of his and the preceding age. An appendix to the work contains a grammatical treatise entitled 'The Laws of the Vowel Points.' Comp. Jemima (Heb. יֶמִיָ֑נָה, 'dove'), from the Arab. 'Hijjaa, Vulg. Díez, both mistaking the derivation as from יְפִיָ֑ה, 'beautiful,' the name of the first of Job's three daughters born after his trial (Job xlii. 14). B.C. cir. 2200. "The Rev. C. Forster (Historical Geography of Arabia), ii. 67," in tracing the posterity of Job in Arabia, thinks that the name of Jemima survives in Jemana, the central province of the Arabian peninsula, which, according to an Arabian tradition (see Bochart, Philog., ii. 26), was called after Jemima, an ancient queen of the Arabians" (Smith).

Jenisch, Daniel, a German theologian of some note, was born at Helfingen, in East Prussia, April 2, 1763, and educated at the University of Königsberg. In 1786 he became pastor at the Mary Church, and afterwards at the Nicholas Church. Endowed with great natural abilities, and a very earnest worker, Jenisch soon secured for himself one of the foremost places as a theologian and a philosophical writer. But too close application of his mental powers, and he supposed to have violently ended his life Feb. 9, 1804. His works of interest to us are Ueber Grund u. Wetth d. Entdeckung Kinds in d. Metaphysik, Moral, u. Aesthetik (Berl. 1796, large 8vo):—Südtol Religion dem Menachen jemnaulisch erörtert (ibid. 1797, 8vo). Besides these, he published, after his mind began to be seriously affected, Ueber Gottesserkennt- ung u. Kirchliche Reformen (ibid. 1802, 8vo), rather the work of a sceptical Christian, if we may use the expression, though it contains also many just criticisms on the literary semantics of the Latin Church, for his day, and Kritik des dogmatisch-idealischen u. hyperrc- dischen Religionen u. Moraltheologie (Lpz. 1804, 8vo), which was the last work of Jenisch.

Jenkin, Robert, an English theologian, was born at Minster, Thanet, in 1656. He studied at Canterbury and Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was successively appointed rector of St. John's College, professor of theology, and chaplain to Dr. Lake, bishop of Chichester. In 1688 he refused to take the oath required of all holding benefices, and retired to private life. He died in 1727. His principal work is The Remains of the English Men of Religion (six editions: the last, 1734, 2 vols. 8vo). He wrote also Experiments of the Authority of General Councils (Lond. 1688, 4to):—Defensio sancti Augustini versus J. Phereomonum (Lond. 1707, 8vo):—Remarks upon four Books just published (on Bacon's History of the Jews, Lake's Paraphrase of St. Paul's Epistle, Le Clerc's Bibliothèque chrétien, etc.). He also translated into English Tilletman's Life of Apollonius of Tyana. See Gorton, General Biograp. Dict. a. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 650; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 962. (J. N. Jenkin, William. See JENKYN.

Jenks, Benjamin, an English divine, was born in 1646. Of his early history but little is known. He was at first rector at Harley, then at Kerc, and afterwards chaplain to the earl of Bradford. He died at Harley in 1724. He published Prayers and Offices of Devotion for Families, and for particular Persons upon most Occasions (London, 1697, 8vo; of which the 27th edition was published in 1810 by the Rev. Charles Sim- mond, fellow of King's College, Cambridge, with emendations and amendments in style; there is also an edition by Barnes, 12mo, and an abridgment, 12mo):—Submission to the Righteousness of God (1700, 8vo; 4th ed. 1735, 12mo).—Meditations, with short Prayers annexed (1701, 8vo; 2d ed. 1756, 2 vols. 8vo, with a recommen-

Preface by Mr. Hervey.—Ouranography, or Heaven Opened (1710, 8vo) — The Poor Man's Companion, a lover Prayer-book for Families on Common Days and other Occasions (London 1713, 8vo), besides a number of sermons on various topics. See Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 963.

Jenks, Hervey, a Baptist minister, was born at Beersheba, near Jerusalem, 1755, and was educated at Brown University. After teaching a short time at the academy at that time connected with the university, he entered the ministry, and was successively pastor at West Stockbridge, Mass, and Hudson, N. Y.; then at Hudson alone; next at Beverly, Mass, whence he again removed to New Haven, Conn. and Bennington, Vt. In 1786 he was a young man of great promise, and, though he was only twenty-eight years old when he died, his abilities had already been generally recognized.—Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, vi, 587 sq.

Jenks, William, D.D., a Congregational minister of great ability and distinction, was born at Newton, Mass., June 16, 1734, and educated at Amherst College, when only twenty years of age his father removed to Boston. He was educated at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1757. He was first settled in the ministry over the Congregational Church in Bath, Me., where he remained twelve years; he next filled the professorship of Oriental and English literature in Bowdoin College, where he remained three years; and was very active in originating plans to secure religious and social privileges for seamen, till that time a neglected class of men. Some of the more prominent institutions for the benefit of sailors now existing in that city owe their origin to him. He was pastor at the same time of the Green Street church, which he served for twenty-five years. He died Nov. 18, 1866. Dr. Jenks was one of the chief founders of the American Oriental Society, and a prominent member of the Massachusetts Historical Society. He was particularly distinguished in the Oriental, and published a comprehensive Commentary on the Holy Bible (Brattleborough, 1834, 5 vols. roy. 8vo; Supplem. 1 vol. 8vo), which "still stands without a rival for the purpose for which it was intended." He also published an Explanatory Bible Atlas and Scripture Gazetteer (1819, 4to). See Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 963; Mead, Aner. Annual Cyclop. 1866, p. 420. (J. H. W.)

Jenkyn, Robert. See JENKYN.

Jenkyv, William, an English Nonconformist divine, was born at Sudbury, Suffolk, in 1612, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He first became lecturer of St. Nicholas Acon, London, and in 1641 minister of Christ Church, Newgate Street, and lecturer of the same Church and St. Simon's Parochial Schools. Refusing to take an oath in 1664, the public thanksgiving appointed by Parliament on occasion of the destruction of the monarchy, he was ejected for nonconformity. Soon after he went to the Tower for participation in Love's plot, but, upon petition, was pardoned, and restored to the ministry. Mr. Peak, who had in the interim become minister of Christ Church, was removed, and Mr. Jenkyn reinstated. Upon this he devoted himself with zeal to his work. On the passage of the Oxford Act he refused to take the oaths, and retired from London to Hertfordshire, where he preached privately. After the Act of Indulgence in 1671, he returned again to London; but when, in 1682, the tempest broke out against the Nonconformists, he fell into the hands of his enemies, and was sent to Newgate under the Convict Act, where he died, from the air and infection of the prison, in 1685. Jenkyn enjoyed the favor and esteem of many of the most prominent worthies for Christian piety and great ability. Richard Baxter pronounced him "a sententious and elegant preacher." He published An Exposition of the Epistle of Jude (London, 1652-54, 4to); another ed., revised by the Rev. James Sherman, with memoir of the author, London, 1679, 8vo, and others. See Allibone, Dictionary of Authors's, i. 963; Nonconformists' Memorial, Calamy, Min. IV. 8-9.

Jennings, David, D.D., an eminent Independent minister, was born at Kibworth, Leicestershire, in 1691. In 1718 he became pastor of a congregation in Old Gravel Lane, Wapping, where he remained for forty-four years. In 1744 he was called to divinity tutor to Cow and Academy, and died Sept. 16, 1762. His principal works are, Jewish Antiquities, with a Dissertation on the Hebrew Language (London, 1766; 10th edition, 1838, 8vo); a work which "has long held a distinguished character for its accuracy and learning," and certainly one of the best works of the kind in the English language.—The Works of John Dennis, 8vo. (London, 1731, 18mo) — A Vindication of the Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin [Anonym.] (London, 1740, 8vo) — An Appeal to Reason and Common Sense (London, 1755, 12mo) — Sermons to the Young (1743, 12mo), etc. See Orton, Life of Doddridge, p. 16; 245; Protestant Dissent. Mag. vol. v; Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi. 660; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 964.

Jennings, John, an English dissenting minister, brother of David Jennings (see above), became, after preaching for some time, a theological tutor at Kibworth. He was also tutor to Dr. Doddridge. He died in 1733. He wrote Two Discourses on Preaching (London, 1741, 8vo), and was a minister in Maryland, and from 1762 to 1763, at the Jersey, and in Mississippi (see Jackson, in Histoire littéraire), etc. See Wilson, Hist. of Dissenters; Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi. 660; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 964.

Jennings, Samuel Kennedy, a Protestant Methodist lay minister of great ability and distinction, was born in Essex County, N. J., June 5, 1771. He was educated at Rutgers (now Queen's) College. After the completion of his collegiate course he studied medicine, and for a time even practiced as a physician. In his youth he was a decided infidel, although he sprang from a family of ministers and zealous Christian workers. In 1794 he was converted, and two years after he entered the lay ministry, and served his Church very ably. In 1805 bishop Asbury ordained him a deacon, and in 1814 bishop M'Kendree made him an elder. In 1817 he took up his residence at Baltimore, after having filled in various places the position of physician and minister, and in this capacity also he made many converts by his Christian kindness and liberality. He was one of the prime movers for the introduction of lay representation in the Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was one of those who were expelled from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and finally organized the "Methodist Protestant Church." See Lay, xvii. 296. He died Oct. 19, 1854. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 279; Stevens, Hist. Meth. Episc. Church. (J. H. W.) Jenyns, Soame, an English politician, and a writer on theological subjects, born at London in 1704, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was in his early years a well-known infidel, but extended Biblical studies caused his conversion, and he at once entered the lists in active defence of the Gospel truths. His ablest work, and one which has given rise to the supposition on the part of some that Jenyns published it only with the purpose to injure the Christian cause, now generally rejected on good grounds, is, View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion (1776, 12mo; 10th ed. 1798, 8vo, and often since). Baxter (Ch. History, p. 659) says that the work "brought out the internal evidence to the truth of Christianity arising from its peculiar and explicit character" and "in the ancient efforts by which "infidelity, if not convinced, was silenced." (See, for the pamphlets on the controversy which this work elicited, Chalmers, Biog. Dict. xviii, 520, note 8). He also wrote A Free Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil (1756, 8vo, and often), which was rather a work as a theological treatise, and was very severely criticised by Dr. Johnson (see Boswell's Jeph'thaē (Heb. Yiphthach, יִפְתַּח, opensen or openen), the name of a man and also of a place. See also Jephthah-EL.

I. (Sept. 108:26 v. r. 168:26 and 168:26, Josephus 168:26, Vulg. Jephta, N. T. 168:26, "Japheth"), the name of an Israelite prince for a period of six years, B.C. 1256-1250. He belonged to the tribe of Manasseh east, and was the son of a person named Gilead by a concubine, or perhaps harlot. After the death of his father he was expelled from his home by the envy of his brothers, who, taunting him with illegitimacy, refused him any share of the heritage, and he withdrew to the land of Tob, beyond the frontier of the Hebrew territories. It is clear that he had before this distinguis\ed himself by his daring character and skill in arms; for no sooner was his withdrawal known than a great number of desperadoes repaired to him, and he became their chief. His position was now very similar to that of David when he withdrew from the court of Saul. To maintain the people who had thus linked their fortunes with his, there was no other resource than that sort of brigandage which is accounted for in the East, so long as it is exercised against public or private enemies, and is not marked by needless cruelty or outrage. So Jephthah confined his aggressions to the borders of the small neighboring nations, who were in some sort regarded as the natural enemies of Israel, even when there was no actual war between them (Judg. xi, 1-31).

The tribes beyond the Jordan having resolved to oppose the Ammonites, to whom the Israelites had fallen under subjection after the death of Jair, in consequence of raping into idolatry, Jephthah seems to have occurred to every one as the most fitting leader. A deputation was accordingly sent to invite him to the war. With little loss of time he came to meet the thrumphant hero "with timbrels and with dances." But he no sooner saw her than he rent his robes, and cried, "Alas! my daughter, thou hast brought me very low.... for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I will not turn back from that which I have vowed." The deputation returned to the Ammonites with a degree of diplomatic consideration and dignity for which we are not prepared. The Ammonites being assembled in force for one of those ravaging incursions by which they had repeatedly desolated the land, he sent to their camp a formal complaint of the invasion, and a demand of the ground of their proceeding. This is highly interesting, because it shows that, even in that age, a cause for which war was judged necessary, no one being supposed to war without provocation; and, in this case, Jephthah demanded what cause the Ammonites alleged to justify their aggressive operations. Their answer was, that the land of the Israelites beyond the Jordan was theirs. It had originally belonged to them, from which it had been taken by the Amorites, who had been dispossessed by the Israelites, and on this ground they claimed the restitution of these lands. Jephthah's reply laid down the just principles upon which he had been for a long period out in the practice of civilized nations, and is maintained by all the great writers on the law of nations. The land belonged to the Israelites by right of conquest from the actual possessors, and they could not be expected to recognise any interest of claim of former possessors, for whom they had not acted, who had rendered them no assistance, and who had themselves displayed hostility against the Israelites. It was not to be expected that they would conquer the country from the powerful kings who had it in possession, for the mere purpose of restoring it to the ancient occupants, whom they had no favorable knowledge, and of whose previous claims they were scarcely cognizant. But the Ammonites reasserted their former views, and on this issue they took the field. Animated by a consciousness of divine aid, Jephthah hastened to meet them, defeated them in several pitched battles, followed them with great slaughter, and utterly broke their dominion over the eastern Israelites (Judg. xi, 4-33). See Pageneat, Jephthas (Lemgo, 1746).

The victory over the Ammonites was followed by a quarrel with the proud and powerful Ephraimites on the west side of the Jordan. This tribe was displeased at having had no share in the glory of the recent victory, and, under the instigation of princes for a period of six years, B.C. 1256-1250. He belonged to the tribe of Manasseh east, and was the son of a person named Gilead by a concubine, or perhaps harlot. After the death of his father he was expelled from his home by the envy of his brothers, who, taunting him with illegitimacy, refused him any share of the heritage, and he withdrew to the land of Tob, beyond the frontier of the Hebrew territories. It is clear that he had before this distinguished himself by his daring character and skill in arms; for no sooner was his withdrawal known than a great number of desperadoes repaired to him, and he became their chief. His position was now very similar to that of David when he withdrew from the court of Saul. To maintain the people who had thus linked their fortunes with his, there was no other resource than that sort of brigandage which is accounted for in the East, so long as it is exercised against public or private enemies, and is not marked by needless cruelty or outrage. So Jephthah confined his aggressions to the borders of the small neighboring nations, who were in some sort regarded as the natural enemies of Israel, even when there was no actual war between them (Judg. xi, 1-31).

The tribes beyond the Jordan having resolved to oppose the Ammonites, to whom the Israelites had fallen under subjection after the death of Jair, in consequence of raping into idolatry, Jephthah seems to have occurred to every one as the most fitting leader. A deputation was accordingly sent to invite him to the war. With little loss of time he came to meet the triumphant hero "with timbrels and with dances." But he no sooner saw her than he rent his robes, and cried, "Alas! my daughter, thou hast brought me very low.... for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I will not turn back from that which I have vowed." She replied, "My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to what that which has proceeded out of thy mouth, forasmuch as the Lord hath taken vengeance for thee of thy enemies, the children of Ammon." But, after a pause, she added, "Let this thing be done for me: let me alone two months, that I may go up and down upon the mountains and bewail my virginity, I and my fellow." Her father, of course, assented, and when the time expired she returned, and, we are told, "he did with her according to his vow." It is then added that it became "a custom in Israel that the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite three days in the year" (Judg. xi, 34-40).

Volumes have been written on the subject of "Jephthah's rash vow," the question being whether, in doing to his daughter "according to his vow," he really did carry out the threat, or whether she was merely doomed to perpetual celibacy.

That the daughter of Jephthah was really offered up to God in sacrifice—slain by the hand of her father and then burned—is a horrible conclusion; but one which it seems impossible to avoid, in view of the meaning of the text by Jonathan the paraphrast, and Rashi, by Josephus (Ant. v. 7, 10), and by perhaps all the early Christian fathers, as Origen (in Joannis, tom. vi, cap. 86), Chrysostom (Hom. ad pop. Antioch., xiv, 3; Opp. ii, 145), Theodoret (Quaestiones in Jud., xx), Jerome (Ep. ad Jul. 118; Opp. i, 291, etc.), Augustine (Questions in Jud., viii, 49; Opp. iii, 1, 610); so also in the Talmud (Tosefta to Bechorot, p. 171) and Midrash (R. 1, § 71), in both of which great astonishment is expressed with the dealings of the high-priest. For the first eleven centuries of the Christian era this was the current, perhaps the universal opinion of Jews and Christians. Yet none of them extenuates the act of Jephthah’s daughter as a “great” sin which was pleasing to God. Jewish writers say that he ought to have referred it to the high-priest, but either he failed to do so, or the high-priest culpably omitted to punish the rash act. Origen strictly confines his praise to the heroism of Jephthah’s daughter.

The obligation thus suggested by Joseph. Kimchi. He supposed that, instead of being sacrificed, she was shut up in a house which her father built for the purpose, and that she was there visited by the daughters of Israel four days in each year as long as she lived. This interpretation has been adopted by many eminent men—as by Levin ben Gerson and Beck amongst the Jews, and by Drusius, Grotius, Estius, De Dieu, bishop Hall, Waterland, Dr. Hales, and others. More names of the same period, and of not less authority, might, however, be adduced on the other side. Lightfoot once thought (Euseb. § 16) that Jephthah did not slay his daughter, but, upon more mature reflection, he came to the opposite conclusion (Harmony, etc.; Judges xi, Works i, 51).

1. The advocates for the actual death of the maiden contend that to die unmarried was required by no law, customary or religious, among the parties concerned. Jephthah had a right to impose so odious a condition on another, nor is any such condition implied or expressed in the vow which Jephthah uttered. It is certain that human sacrifice was deemed meritorious and propitiatory by the neighboring nations [see SACRIFICE]; and, considering the manner of life the heathen tribes led, the religious idolatries in which the people had been plunged, and the peculiarly vague notions of the tribes beyond the Jordan, it is highly probable that he contemplated from the first a human sacrifice, as the most costly offering to God known to him (comp. the well-known story of the immolation of Isaac, Gen. xxii, 14 seq.). It is difficult to conceive that he could expect any other creature than a human being to come forth out of the door of his house to meet him on his return. His affliction when his daughter actually came forth is quite compatible with the idea that he had not even exempted her from the sacredness of his promise, and the depth of that affliction is scarcely reconcilable with any other alternative than the actual sacrifice. In that case, the circumstance that she “knew no man” is added as setting in a stronger light the rashness of Jephthah and the heroism of his daughter. If we look at the text, Jephthah vows that whatsoever came forth from the door of his house to meet him “shall surely be the Lord’s, and [Kimchi’s rendering ‘or’ is a rare and harsh one] I will offer it up for a burnt-offering,” which, in fact, was the regular way of making a thing wholly the Lord’s. Afterwards we are told that “he did with her according to his vow,” that is, according to the plain meaning of plain words, offered her for a burnt-offering. (This circumlocutory phrase, and the omission of any direct term expressive of death, are attributed to euphemistic motives.) Then follows the intimation that the daughters of Israel lamented the death of their hero, and that at the time of her death, not the living. The whole story is consistent and intelligible while the sacrifice is understood to have taken place, but becomes perplexed and difficult as soon as we begin to turn aside from this obvious meaning in search of other explanations. The Jewish commentators themselves admit generally that Jephthah really sacrificed his daughter, and even go so far as to allege that the change in the pontifical dynasty from the house of Eliazar to that of Ithamar was caused by the high-priest of the time having suffered this transaction to take place. It is true, human sacrifices were forbidden by the law; but in the rude and unsettled age in which the judges lived, when the Israelites had adopted a vast number of erroneous notions and practices from their heathen neighbors (see 2 Kings iii, 27), many things were done, even by good men, which the law forbade quite as positively as human sacrifice. Such, for instance, was the setting up of the altar by Gideon at his house city of Ophrah (Judg. viii, 27), in direct but undesignated opposition one of the most sacred and important parts of the Mosiacal code (see Kitto’s Daily Bible Illustrations, ad loc.)

2. On the other hand, it has been well replied that the text expressly, and in varied terms, alludes to the vow to lead a life of fasting in burningsacrifice (ver. 37, 38, 39). Such a state was generally considered a calamity by the Israelitish women, probably on account of the early prophecy of the incarnation (Gen. iii, 15). See BARNEKES. But, besides this, the celibacy of Jephthah’s daughter involved the extinction of his whole house as well as dynasty, and removed from him only child, the sole prop and solace of his declining years. For it was her duty, as the Lord’s property, to dwell separately at Shiloh, in constant attendance on the service of the sanctuary (compare Luke iii, 37; 1 Cor. vii, 8), far from her father, the companions of her youth. The belief here entertained that all this was sufficient cause for lamentation. But the idea that she was put to death by her father as a consequence of his vow shocks all the feelings of humanity, could only have horrified her as well as all other inhabitants of the Israel, as an entire violation of the precepts of the Mosaic law, and was impossible from the very nature of its requisitions in several points. For instance, human sacrifices were among the abominations for which the idolatrous nations of Canaan were devoted to destruction (Deut. xviii, 9–14); and the Israelites were expressly forbidden to act in like manner to their sons and daughters by fire (Deut. xii, 29–31). Again, for the redemption of any person devoted to God (Exod. xiii, 11–13), and even for the very case of Jephthah’s singular vow, if understood to refer to his daughter’s immolation, provision was expressly made (Lev. xvii, 2–5), so that he might, with a safe escape, have redeemed her from death by a small payment of money. It must be remembered, too, that by the law he could not offer any victim as a burnt-sacrifice except where the Lord had chosen to place his name (Deut. xvi, 2, 5, 11, 16, compare with Lev. i, 2–18; xvii, 8–9), that is, in the high-priest or as a thank-offering, none but a Levite could kill, and none but a priest could offer any victim; and the statement of the Chaldee paraphrase (ad loc.) that the sacrifice took place through a neglect to consult Phinehas, the high-priest, besides involving an anachronism is utterly at variance with all the known conditions of the case. Moreover, none but a male victim could be presented in sacrifice in any case. It is true that if Jephthah had been an idolater he might have offered his daughter in any of the high-places to a false god; but he was evidently made the deliverer of his people from the yoke of Ammon because he was not an idolater (see Judg. xi, 29–36; comp. Lev. xx, 1–5); and his whole conduct is commended by an inspired apostle (Heb. xi, 22; comp. 1 Sam. xii, 11) as an act of faith in the true God. Such sanction is very different from the express condemnation of the irregular and mischievous proceeding that took place among the Israelites (Judg. viii, 27), for there is nowhere the least intimation that Jephthah’s conduct was other than entirely praiseworthy, although his vow is evidently recorded as a warning against inconceivable oaths (Javis’s Church of the Redeemed, p. 115–117). Indeed, it is very doubtful whether he had the power to sacrifice his daughter, and it is incredible that she should have been the first to claim the fulfillment of such a vow, as well as inconceivable how she should have so readily inferred so unusual an import from the brief terms in which he first intimated to her his fatal pledge (ver. 85, 86); whereas it is altogether likely that (with her prompt consent) he had the right of doing her to perpetual singleness of life and religious seclusion (compare 1 Cor. vii, 36-38).

See NAZARENE. It is also worthy of note that the term employed to express his promise of devotion in this case is מְדְעָה, Mede'ah, consecration, and not מְאֹד, Me'od, chern, destruction. See VOW; ANATHEMA. Nor can we suppose (with Prof. Bush, ad loc.) that during the two months' respite he obtained better information, in a name conjuring which the immediate word avoided by a ransom-price; for it is stated that he literally fulfilled his vow, whatever it was (ver. 39). The word rendered "lament" in verse 40 is not the common one (גַּשְׁנִי) translated "bewail" in verse 87, 88, but the rare expression (גַּשְׁנִי) rendered "rehearse" in ch. vii, 11, and meaning to celebrate, as implying joy rather than grief.

6. Son of Habsuziah, and father of Jaazaniah, which last was one of the Rechabites whom the prophet tested with the offer of wine (Jer. xxxv. 5). B.C. ante 606.
7. The second of the "greater prophets" of the O.T., a son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth, in the tribe of Benjamin (1, i; comp. xxix. 6). The following brief account of the prophet's career, which is fully detailed in his own book, is chiefly from Kittot's Cyclopaeod.

1. Relations of Jeremiah. — Many (among ancient writers, among these, Hosee; among moderns, Eichhorn, Calovius, Maldonatus, Von Bohlen, etc.) have supposed that his father was the high-priest of the same name (2 Kings xxii. 8), who found the book of the law in the eighteenth year of Josiah (Umbreit, Praktischer Commentar über den Jeremia, p. x). This, however, seems improbable, mainly because Jer. xxiii. 1; xxi. 2 (comp. II. Chron. iii. 130; also Keil, Ewald, etc.) first, there is nothing in the writings of Jeremiah to lead us to think that his father was more than an ordinary priest ("Hilkiiah [one of the priests," Jer. i. 1); again, the name Hilkiiah was common among the Jews (see 2 Kings xxiii. 13; 1 Chron. vi. 40; xxvii. 11; Neh. viii. 14; Jer. xxix. 8): and, lastly, his residence at Anathoth is evidence that he belonged to the line of Abiather (1 Kings ii. 26-35), who was deposed from the high-priest's office by Solomon: after which time the office appears to have remained in the line of Zadok.

2. History. — Jeremiah was very young when the word of the Lord first came to him (i. 6). This event took place in the thirteenth year of Josiah (B.C. 628), while the youthful prophet still lived at Anathoth. It would seem that he remained in his native city several years under his father's guidance, and was an assistant of his fellow-townsmen (xi. 21), and even of his own family (xii. 6), as well as to have a wider field for his exertions, he left Anathoth and took up his residence at Jerusalem. The finding of the book of the Law, five years after the commencement of his predictions, must have produced a powerful influence on the mind of Jeremiah, and, king Josiah no doubt found him an important ally in carrying into effect the reformation of religious worship (2 Kings xxiii. 1-25). B.C. 623. During the reign of this monarch, we may readily believe that Jeremiah would be in no way molested in his work; and that from the time of his quitting Anathoth to the eighteenth year of his ministry, he probably uttered his warnings without interruption, though with little success (see ch. xi). Indeed, the reformation itself was nothing more than the forcible repression of idolatrous and heathen rites, and the remnant of the remnant of the external service of God, by the command of the king. No sooner, therefore, was the influence of the court on behalf of the true religion withdrawn, than it was evident that no real improvement had taken place in the minds of the people. Jeremiah, who hitherto was at least permitted, if not even encouraged, to propagate the gospel, soon found himself the object of attack, as he must doubtless have long been the object of dislike to those whose interests were identified with the corruptions of religion. The death of this prince was bewailed by the prophet as the precursor of the divine judgments for the national sins (2 Chron. xxxvi. 22). B.C. 609. See LAMENTATIONS.

We hear nothing of the prophet during the three months which constituted the short reign of Jehoahaz; but "in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim" (B.C. 607) the prophet was interrupted in his ministry by "the priests and the prophets," who, with the populace, brought him before the civil authorities, urging that capital punishment should be inflicted on him for his threatening the destruction of the city unless they amende their ways (ch. xxvi). The princes seem to have been in some degree aware of the results which the general corruption was bringing on the state, and if they did not themselves yield to the exhortations of the prophet, they acknowledged that he spoke in the name of the Lord, and were quite as averse from any announcement of his authority as to put his messenger to death. It appears, however, that it was rather owing to the personal influence of one or two, especially Ahikam, than to any general feeling favorable to Jeremiah, that his life was preserved; and it would seem that he was then either placed under restraint, or else was in so much danger from the animosity of his adversaries as to make it prudent for him not to appear in public. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim (B.C. 605) he was commanded to write the predictions which had been given him during that year, and to read them publicly on the fast-day, the cause, probably, which we have intimated above, he was, as he says, "shut up," and could not himself go into the house of the Lord (xxxvi. 5). He therefore deputed Baruch to write the predictions after him, and to read them publicly on the fast-day. These threatenings being read, the prince, as the word had been intimated before the princes to give an account of the manner in which the roll containing them had come into his possession. The princes, who, without strength of principle to oppose the wickedness of the king, had sufficient respect for religion, as well as sagacity enough to discern the importance of the predictions, and, in order to protect the prophet, advised both Baruch and Jeremiah to conceal themselves, while they endeavored to influence the mind of the king by reading the roll to him. The result showed that their precautions were not needless. In his bold self-will and recklessness during the war, he was refused to listen to any advice, even though coming with the professed sanction of the Most High. Having read three or four leaves, "he cut the roll with the penknife and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed," and gave immediate orders for the execution of those who preserved the roll, who, however, were both preserved from the vindictive monarch. At the command of God the prophet procured another roll, in which he wrote all that was in the roll destroyed by the king, and added besides unto them many like words (xxxvi. 32). See Baruch.

Near the close of the reign of Jehoiakim (B.C. 609), and during the short reign of his successor Jehoachin or Jeconiah (B.C. 598), we find him still uttering his voice of warning (see ch. xiii. 18; comp. 2 Kings xxiv. 12, and Jer. xxvi. 24-30), though without effect; and, after witnessing the downfall of the monarchs which he had himself predicted, he sent a letter of condolence and hope to those who shared the captivity of the royal family (ch. xiii-xxxxi). It was not till the latter part of the reign of Zedekiah that he was put in confinement, as we find that "they had not put him into prison" when the army of Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem (xxvii. 4, 5) (B.C. 589). On the investment of the city, the prophet had sent a message to the king declaring what would be the fatal issue, but this had so little effect that the slaves who had been liberated were again reduced to bondage by their (xxvii); however, soon after, they were incarcerated in the court of the prison adjoining the palace, where he predicted the certain return from the impending captivity (xxxiii. 38). The Chaldeans drew off their army for a time on the report of help coming from Egypt to the besieged city, and now, feeling the danger to be imminent, and yet a ray of hope brightening their prospects, the king exalted Jeremiah to pray to the Lord for them. The hopes of the king were not responded to in the message which Jeremiah received from God. He was assured that the Egyptian army would return to their own land, that the Chaldæans would come in; and as the Chaldeans burned the city and burnt it with fire (xxxvii. 7, 8). The princes, apparently irritated by a message so contrary to their wishes, made the departure of Jeremiah from the city (for he appears to have been at this time released from confinement), during the short respite, the pretext for accusing him of deserting to the Chaldeans, and he was forthwith cast into prison, where he might have perished but for the humanity of one of the royal eunuchs (xxxxvii. 12—xxxviii. 13). The king seems to have been throughout inclined to favor the prophet, and sought to know from him the word of the Lord; but he was wholly under the influence of the princes and dared not communicate with him except in secret (xxxxviii. 14—28), much less could he follow advice so ominous to their views as that which the prophet gave. Jeremiah, therefore, more from the hostility of the princes than from the inclination of the king, was cast into prison, when the city was taken, B.C. 588. Nebuchadnezzar formed a more just estimate of his character and of the value of his counsels, and gave a special charge to his captain, Nebuzar-adan, not only to provide for him, but to follow his advice (xxxix. 12). He was accordingly permitted to remain in prison and to choose freely whether he would either go to Babylon, where doubtless he would have been held in honor in the royal court, or to remain with his own people (B.C. 587). With characteristic patriotism he went to Mizpah with Gedaliah, whom the Babylonian monarch had appointed governor of Judæa, and, after his murder, sought to persuade Johanan, who was then the recognised leader of the people, to remain in the land, assuring him and the people, by a message from God in answer to their inquiries, that, if they did so, the Lord would build them up, but if they went to Egypt, the kings of Egypt would make them escape come upon them there (ch. xili). The people refused to attend to the divine message, and, under the command of Johanan, went into Egypt, taking Jeremiah and Baruch along with them (xili. 6). In Egypt the prophet still sought to turn the people to the Lord, but they caught his flight and came upon him there (ch. xlvii.), his writings give us no subsequent information respecting his personal history. Ancient traditions assert that he spent the remainder of his life in Egypt.
According to the pseudo-Epiphanius, he was stoned by the people at Tabnôn (iv Thronov), the same as Tahpashu, where there were settled a tribe of Israelites.
(See Lamentations, iii. 19, 20). The name is also found in the legend of the prophet of the same name who according to the traditions was a native of Jerusalem.
His whole history convinces us that he was by nature mild and retiring (Ewald, Propheten des Alt. Bundes, p. 2), highly susceptible and sensitive, especially to sorrowful emotions, and rather inclined, as we should imagine, to shrink from danger than to brave it. Yet, with this nature, he stood unimpeachable and naturally of the least probable to become a leader of the people. He being a "man of strife," he never in the least degree shrinks from publicity; nor is he at all intimidated by reproach or insult, or even by actual punishment and threatened death, when he has the message of God to deliver.

The style of Jeremiah corresponds with this view of the character of his mind: though not deficient in power, it is peculiarly marked by pathos. He delights in the expression of the tender emotions, and employs all the resources of his imagination to excite corresponding feelings in his readers. He has an irresistible sympa-thly with the miserable, which finds utterance in the touching descriptions of their condition.

The prophecies of Jeremiah and the peculiarities which belong to the later Hebrew, and by the introduction of Aramaic forms (Eichhorn, Einleitung, i, 122; Gesenius, Geschichte der Heb. Sprache, p. 35). It was, we imagine, on this account that Jerome complained of a certain rusticity in Jeremiah's style. Lowth, however, says, "its overabundant richness is contrary to Jeremiah as nearly equal in sublimity in many parts to

2. The canon of the writings of Jeremiah in general are established both by the testimony of ancient writers and the quotations and references which occur in the New Testament. Thus the son of Siraeh refers to him as a prophet consecrated from the womb, and quotes from Jer. i. 10 the commission with which he was intrusted (Eccles. xlii, 7). In 2 Macc. ii. 1—8, there is a tradition respecting his hiding the tabernacle and the ark in a rock which he is called "Jeremiah the prophet." Philo speaks of him under similar titles, as προφήτης, μυστής, ἱεροφάντης, and calls a passage which he quotes from Jer. iii. 4 an oracle—χρησιμος (Eichhorn, Einleitung, i, 50). Josephus refers to him by name as the prophet who predicted the evils which were coming upon the city. For the rest, he appears as the author of Lamentations (μελος Σαμαριτων) which are still existing (Ant. x, 5, 1). His writings are included in the list of canonical books given by Melito, Origen (whose words are remarkable: ἡμιαμας αὐτόν Ἰακωβ και τῷ ἐπίσημῳ ἐν Ἰερουσαλημ, Jerome), and the Talmud (Eichhorn, Einleitung, i, 194). In the New Testament Jeremiah is referred to by name in Matt. ii. 17, where a passage is quoted from Jer. xxxii, 15, and in Matt. xvi, 14; in Heb. viii, 8—12, a passage is quoted from Jer. xxxi, 31—34. There is one other place in which the name of Jeremiah appears in Matt. 12, 40. The point of considerable difficulty, because the passage there quoted is not found in the extant writings of the prophet (see Kühnel, Com. ad loc.). Jerome affirms that he found the exact passage in a Hebrew apocryphal book (Fabricius, Codex Paradigrapbus, i, 1103), but there is no proof that he had it exists before the time of Christ.
It is probable that the passage intended by Matthew is Zech. xi, 12, 13, which in part corresponds with the quotation he gives, and that the name is a gloss which has found its way into the text (see Oeshausen, Commentar über d. T. Test. ii, 489).

3. The prophecies of Jeremiah are divided into the books has of late been disputed by German critics.
Movers, whose views have been adopted by De Wette and Hitzig, at tributes x, 1—16, and ch. xxxi, xxxii, and xxxiii to the author of the concluding portion of the book of Isaiah.
His fundamental argument against the last-named portion is, that the prophet Zechariah (xiii. 7, 8) quotes from Jer. xxxi, 7, 8, and in verse 9 speaks of the author as one who lived in the day that the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid. But there is nothing in ver. 7 and 8 of Zechariah to prove that it is intended to quote Jeremiah. The difficulty is, much less from this portion of Jeremiah. Hence Hitzig (Jeremia, p. 298) gives up the external evidence on which Movers had relied. The internal evidence arising from the examination of particular words and phrases is so slight, especially when the authenticity of the language and language of the Book of Isaiah is considered, that it is not enough against the Ewald agrees that the chapters in question, as well as the other passage mentioned (x, 1—16), are the work of Jeremiah. It seems, however, not improbable that the Chaldee of verse 11 is a gloss which has crept into the text, both because it is (apparently without reason) in another place without any such interpunction, and the progress of thought. The predictions against Babylon in ch. i and ii are objected to by Movers, De Wette, and others on the ground that they contain many interpolations. Ewald attributes them to some unknown protagonist, who imitated the style of Jeremiah. Their authenticity is maintained by Hitzig (p. 891) and by Umbreit (p. 290-293), to whom we must refer for an answer to the objections which were made against them. The last chapter is generally regarded as an appendix added by some later author. It is almost verbally the same as the account in 2 Kings xxiv, 18; xxv, 30, and it carries the history down to a later period, probably, than that of the death of Jeremiah. That it is not his work seems to be indicated by the use of the verse ch. ii. (See generally Haver- nick’s Einleitung, i, 232, etc.)

4. Much difficulty has arisen with respect to the writings of Jeremiah from the apparent disorder in which they stand in their present copies, and from the many disagreements between the Hebrew text and that found in the Septuagint version, and many conjectures have been hazarded respecting the occasion of this disorder. The following are the principal diversities between the two texts:

(a) The chapters containing prophecies against foreign nations are placed in a different part of the book, and the prophecies themselves are arranged in a different order, as in the following table:

(b) Various passages which exist in the Hebrew are not found in the Greek copies (e.g. xlvii, 19-22; xxxiii, 14-26; xlix, 4-14; xlvii, 45-47). Besides these discrepancies, there are numerous omissions and frequent variations of single words and phrases (Movers, De utriusque Vaticiniumarem Jeremiæ recensionem indole et origine, p. 8-32). To explain these diversities, recourse has been had to the hypothesis of a double recension, a hypothesis which, with various modifications, is held by most modern critics (Movers, ut supra; De Wette, Lehrbuch der Hist.-Crit. Einl., in d. Alt. Test. p. 303; Edel, Propheten des Alt. Bund. ii, 23; Keil, Einl., p. 100, etc.). These differences are also found in the fragments of the Septuagint, as compared with the other copies (Hengstenberg’s Christologie, iii, 495-619).

Jeremia, Epistle of, one of the apocryphal works, purporting to proceed from the pen of the prophet Jeremiah (q. v.).

1. Title and Position.—This apocryphal piece, which derives its title, επιστολὴ ιερουμένη (Sept. Vulg., Syriac, etc.), from purporting to be an epistle sent by the prophet Jeremiah to the people of Babylon, has different positions in the different MSS. It is placed after the Lamentations in Origin's Hexaplas, according to the Syriac Hexapla codex in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, in the Cod. Alex., the Arabic versions, etc.; in some editions of the Sept., in the Latin Vulgate, which was followed by the Zurich Bible, and by the A. Vens. ("Epistle of Jeremy"), it constitutes the sixth chapter of the apocryphal book of Baruch, while Theodoret, Hilary of Poitiers, and several MSS. of the Sept. entirely omit it. It is, however, an independent production, and has nothing to do with Baruch. See Baruch, Book of.

2. Design and Contents.—The design of this epistle is to admonish the Jews who were going into captivity with the king to beware of the idolatry which they would see in Babylon. It tells the people of God not to become idolaters like the strangers, but to serve their own God and not to partake of their idolatry (verse 1-7), as it exposes in a rhetorical declaration the folly of idolatry (verse 8-72), concluding every group of verses, as it contains a fresh proof of its folly, with the reiterated remarks, "Seeing that they are no gods, fear them not" (verse 49, 59, 64), "How can a man think that they are gods?" (verse 40, 44, 56, 64, 69), "How can a man not see that they are not gods?" (verse 49, 63).

3. Author, Date, Original Language, Comonicity, etc.—The inscription claims the authorship of this epistle for Jeremiah, who, it is said, wrote it just as the Jews were going to Babylon, which is generally reckoned to be the first year of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, or B.C. 606. This is the general opinion of the Roman Church, which, as a matter of course, regards it as canonical. But modern critics, both Jewish and Christian, who deny the power to any Church to override internal evidence, and defy the laws of criticism, have shown satisfactorily that its original language is Greek, and that it was written by Herodotus, in the time of Thutmose III and xxix. This is corroborated by the fact that this epistle does not exist in the Hebrew, was never included in the Jewish canon, is designated by Jerome, who knew more than any other what the Jewish canon contained, as ἔκθεσις τοῦ Ἰεροῦ (Praem. Comment, in Hierom.), was marked off from the 4 Apocrypha by the editors of the Vulgate, and was removed from the note of Cod. Chalismus (Βαρούπος ὁ αἷμα διεσπαρακαταρά τούς ἄνθρωπος), and was passed over by Theodoret, though he explained the book of Baruch. The date of this epistle cannot be definitely settled. It is generally supposed that 2 Macc. ii, 2 alludes to this epistle, and that it must, therefore, be older than this book of Maccabees. Herzfeld (Geschichte d. Israel vor der Zerstörung des ersten Tempels, Brunswick, 1847, p. 316) infers from it the very reverse, namely, that this epistle was written after the passage in 2 Macc., while Frischauf and Davidson adduce several other points to the appropriateness of the supposed reference. It is most probable that the writer lived towards the end of the Maccabean period.

5. A priest who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon to Jerusalem (Neh. xii, 1). B.C. 536.

9. One of those who followed the princes in the circuit of the newly-repaired walls with the sound of trumpets (verse 94); apparently the same with one of the priests who subscribed the sacred covenant along with the priests. See Jer. xcv. 446-civ. 410. He was possibly identical with No. 8.

Jeremiah II, patriarch of Constantinople, was born in 1536. He was elected patriarch May 5, 1572; in 1579 he was driven from his see, but after the death of Metrophanes (1580) he regained his position. Shortly after his consecration, but before he was invested with the see, he was taken into charge of high treason. Liberated through the intervention of the ambassadors of France and Venice, he was again exiled to Rhodes in 1585. Finally, in 1587, he was again reinstated in the patriarchate by paying 500 ducats yearly to the party who had held it during his exile. The Church funds had been so reduced in consequence of all these struggles that there was no money to meet the expenses for worship. Under these circumstances, Jeremiah was obliged to seek help from the exar, in return for which he was obliged to create the metropolitan of Moscow a patriarch. This was accordingly done; but Jeremiah had to bow the knee on his return to Moscow, a number of bishops, who had accompanied him on his journey, and who had vehemently opposed his course, left him, and joined the Church of Rome. Some writers say that Jeremiah was "wrongly deposed" by the Council of Florence, which he thought to be the Latin churches. He was the patriarch with whom the Tingham theologians entered into a correspondence in 1573, with the intention to bring over the Greek Church to the Reformers, and which resulted, as is well known, in the rejection of Luther's doctrines by the Greek Church. Jeremiah, archbishop of Sons, flourished in the latter half of the 8th and the early part of the 9th century. But little is known of his personal history. He was the successor of Magnus; he had a canonical office, and is said to have died in 827. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, xxv, 667.

Jeremia'is (Ieremiais), a Grecized form of the name of two men.

1. Jeremiah (q. v.) the prophet (Ecclus. xiii, 6; 2 Macc. xv, 14; Matt. xvi, 14).
2. (1 Esdr. ix, 54.) See JEREMIAL.

Jer'emoth (Hebr. Yiremuth, יִרֵמְוֹת, or Yorem'oth, יִרֵמְוֹת, heightis), the name of several men. See above.

J. (Sept. Iermuth.) The last named of the three sons of Mushi, grandson of Levi (1 Chron. xxiii, 23); called Jeremiah in 1 Chron. xxxiv, 30. B.C. post 1856.
3. (Sept. Iermuth.) A Levite, chief of the fifteenth division of Temple musicians as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxxiv, 22); probably the same called Jeremiah in ver. 4. B.C. 1014.
4. (Sept. Iermuth v. r. Iermuth.) One of the "sons of Jehia, a Benjamite (1 Chron. vii, 14). B.C. post 1856. Probably the same with Jeroham in ver. 27.
5. (Sept. Iermuth v. r. Iermuth, Vulg. Jeremuth.) An Israelite, one of the "sons" ( inhabitants) of Elam, who divorced his Gentle woman after the captivity (Exx. z, 26). B.C. 459.
6. (Iermuth v. r. Iermuth, Vulg. Jeremuth.) Another Israelite, one of the "sons" (inhabitants) of Zattu, who likewise divorced his Gentle woman after the captivity (Exx. z, 27). B.C. 459.
7. (Exx. z, 29, and Ramoth.) See RAMOTH.

Jer'emy, a familiar form (1 Esdr. i, 28, 52, 47, 57; ii, 1; 2 Esdr. ii, 18; Baruch vi, title; 2 Macc. ii, 1, 5, 7; Matt. xvi, 17; xxv, 9) of the name of the prophet JEREMIAH (q. v.).

T. Ιεριχω, Iericho, Jerosch.; LXX. Jericho; Justin. Hierichus), a city situated in a plain traversed by the Jordan, and exactly over against where that river was crossed by the Israelites under Joshua (Josh. iii, 16). It is first mentioned in connection with the story of their approach to the land eastward of the Jordan, and they abandoned their houses in fear. Had the city existed in the time of Abraham and Lot, it would scarcely have escaped notice when the latter looked down on the plain of Jordan from the heights of Bethel (Gen. xiii.). From the manner in which it is referred to, and the frequency with which it is mentioned, it became an important city in the Jordan valley at the time of the Exodus (Num. xxxiv, 15; xxxv, 12; xxxvi, 1, etc.). Such was either its vicinity or the extent of its territory that Gilgal, which formed their primary encampment, was in the same dishonest, in its east border, xix, 19). That it had a king is a very secondary consideration, for almost every small town had one (xiii, 9-24); in fact, monarchy was the only form of government known to those primitive times—the government of the people of God presenting a marked exception to prevailing usage. But Jericho was further in by walls, and those walls were so considerable that at least one person (Rahab) had a house upon them (i, 15), and its gates were shut, as throughout the East still, "when it was dark" (v, 5). Again, the spoil that was found in it betokened its affluence—Ai, Makkedah, Libnah, Lachish, Egion, Hebron, Debir, and even Hazor, evidently a city of no great worth mentioning in comparison—beads, sheep, oxen, and asses, we hear of vessels of brass and iron. These possibly may have been the first-fruit of those brass foundries "in the plain of Jordan" of which Solomon afterwards so largely availed himself (2 Chron. iv, 17). Silver and gold were found in so small abundance that one man (Achan) could appropriate stealthily 200 shekels (100 oz. approx.; see Lewis, Heb. Rep. vi, 57) of the former, and "a wedge of gold of 50 shekels (25 oz.) weight;" a goodly Babyloni, garment, parceled in the same dishonest, may be ascribed as evidence of a then existing commerce between Jericho and the far East (Josh. vi, 24; vii, 21). In fact, its situation alone—in so noble a plain, and contiguous to so prolific a river—would bespeak its importance in a country where these natural advantages have always been so highly prized, and in which people when they settled down to live and became agriculturists so much more upon the indigenous resources of nature than they are compelled to do now. Jericho was the city to which the two spies were sent by Joshua from Shittim: they were lodged in the house of Rahab the harlot upon the wall, and departed, having first promised to save her and all that were found in her house from destruction (Josh. ii, 1-21). Text account which the spies received from their hostess tended much to encourage the subsequent operations of the Israelites, as it showed that the inhabitants of the country were greatly alarmed at their advance, and the signal miracles which had marked their course from the Nile to the Jordan. The same manner in which Jericho itself was taken (see Hacks, De ruina murorum Hierichantorum, Jena, 1690) must have strengthened this impression in the country, and, appears, indeed, to have been designed for that effect. The town was utterly destroyed by the Israelites who pronounced an anathema upon it as long as the heavens were above and the earth below, and, as they did before it, it was not only not rebuilt, but the walls were apparently torn down; and all the inhabitants were put to the sword, except Rahab and her family (Josh. vii). Her house was recognised by the scarlet line bound in the window from which the spies were let down, and she and her relatives were taken out of it, and "lodge thither without it," but it is nowhere said or implied that her house escaped the general conflagration. That she "dwelt in Israel" for the future; that she married Solomon, son of Nasa-Jericho was the site of a distant 150 years' war, and was six miles from it.

The Jericho of the days of Josephus was distant 150 or 160 miles from Jerusalem, and was six miles from it.

It lay in a plain overhung by a barren mountain, whose roots ran northward towards Scythopolis, and southward in the direction of Sodom and the Dead Sea. These formed the western boundaries of the plain. Eastward, its barriers were the mountains of Moab, which ran parallel to the former. In the midst of the plain—the great plain, as it was called—flowed the Jordan, and at the top and bottom of it were two lakes: Tiberias, proverbial for its sweetness, and Asphalitis for its bitterness. Away from the Jordan, it was parched and unhealthy during summer; but during winter, even in the hottest part of Jerusalem, it was cool enough to wear linen garments.

Hard by Jericho, bursting forth close to the site of the old city which Josephus took on his entrance into Canaan, was a most exuberant fountain, whose waters, before noted for their contrary properties, had received (proceeds Josephus) through Eliahu's prayers, a powerful salubrity and efficacy. Within its range—seventy stadia (Strabo says 100)—by twenty—the fertility of the soil was unexampled. Palms of various names and properties—some that produced honey scarcely inferior to that of the neighborhood; ephalbamium, the choicest of indigenous fruits; cyprus (Aramaic: "ez-bema"—"zukumm") thro' there beautifully, and thickly dotted about the pleasure-gounds (War, iv, 8, 3). These and other aromatic shubs were here of peculiar fame.

Grace (Justin. xxxvi, 8; Josephus, Ant. iv, 6, 1; xiv, 4, 1; xv, 4, 2; War, i, 6, 6; i, 18, 5). Wisdom herself did not disdain comparison with "the rose-plants of Jericho" (Ism. iv, 7, 12). The faithfulness of the O.T. given by Paul (Josh. vi, 25; 1 Chron. ii, 10; Matt. i, 5; Heb. xi, 31)—all these facts surely indicate that she did not continue to inhabit the accursed site; and, if so, and in the absence of all direct evidence from Scripture, how could it ever have been inferred that her honor was "erased"? (See Hoffmann, Rassale Ereignisse, Berl. 1861.) See Rahab.

Such as it had been left by Joshua, such it was bestowed by him upon the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xvii, 21); it lay also on the border of Ephraim [Josh. xvi, 7], and from this time a long interval elapsed before Jericho appeared again in the scene. It is only incidentally mentioned in the life of David in connection with his embassy to the Ammonite king (2 Sam. v, 9). The solemn manner in which its second foundation under Hiel the Bethelite is recorded—upon whom the curse of Joshua is said to have descended in full force (1 Kings xvi, 8)—would seem to imply that up to that time its site had been uninhabited. It is true, mention is made of a "city of palm-trees" (Judg. i, 16, and iii, 13) in existence apparently at the time when spoken of, and Jericho is twice—once before its first overthrow, and twice after its second foundation—designated by that name (see Deut. xxxiv, 3, and 2 Chron. xxviii, 15); but these designations must be understood to apply only to the site, in whatever condition at the time. (On the presence of these trees, see below.) However, once actually rebuilt, Jericho rose again slowly in importance. In the days of the kings, it was the place of retirement from the world, and Elijah "healed the spring of the waters;" and over and against it, beyond Jordan, Elijah "went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (2 Kings ii, 1, 2). In its plains Zebediah fell into the hands of the Chaldeans (2 Kings xxv, 5; Jer. xxxix, 5). By no means a great town, in respect of numbers, it was, by the mind of the Lord, to be a type of the "new Jericho,"

Jericho, who stripped him naked and left him severely wounded.

Posterior to the Gospels, Vespasian found it one of the arches of Judea (War, iii, 3, 5), but deserted by its inhabitants, in a general massacre when he encamped there (War, iv, 8, 2, 7). He left a garrison consisting necessarily the 10th legion, which is only stated to have marched through Jericho) which was still there when Titus advanced upon Jerusalem. Is it asked how Jericho was destroyed? Evidently by Vespasian; for Joseph, under an understanding that is Dr. Rhon-son's (Bibl. Res. i, 566, 2d. ed.) thinks. The city pillaged and burnt in Josephus (War iv, 9, 1) was clearly Jericho, with its adjacent villages, and not Gerasa, as may be seen at once by comparing the language there with that of 8, 2, and the agent was Vespasian. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) say that Jericho was destroyed when Jerusalem was besieged by the Romans. They further add that it was afterwards rebuilt—they do not say by whom—and still existed in their day; nor had the ruins of the two preceding cities been obliterated. Could Hadrian possibly have planted a colony there when he passed through, and called it Elia (Dio Cass. Hist. lixiv, c. 11, ed. Sturz; more at large Chron. Paschali, p. 254, ed. Du Fresne). The discovery which Origens made there of a version of the O. T. (the 5th in his Hexa-pha), together with sundry MSS, Greek and Hebrew, suggests that it could not have been wholly without inhabitation (Suidas, s. v. Hexapla). It is possible that Menur. of circa med.); or again, as is perhaps more probable, did a Christian settlement arise there under Con-santine, when baptisms in the Jordan began to be the rage? That Jericho became an episcopal see about that time under Jerome appears from more than one ancient Notitia (Geograph. s. a. Carola Paulo, p. 906, and the Par-ergon appended to it; comp. William of Tyre, Hist. lib. xxiii, ad f.). Its bishops subscribed to various councils in the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries (Bibl. et Le Quien's Oriens Christiani. iii, 651). Justianus, we are told, re-stated and added to it, and the meditate neighborhood of the fountain of Elisha; and that of the second (the city of the New Test. and of Josephus) practicable road from Jerusalem zigzags down the rugged and bare mountains, through a narrow defile; after five years afterwards we find Micosensis, wife of king Fulco, assigning them to the convent of Bethany, which she had founded A.D. 1137.

The site of ancient (the first) Jericho is with reason placed by Dr. Robinson (Bibl. ii, 528, 568) in the immediate neighborhood of the fountain of El-Dhah, and that of the second (the city of the New Test. and of Josephus) at the opening of the wady Kelt (Cherith), half an hour

The site of ancient (the first) Jericho is with reason present day. Jericho, a mile north of the present road, is an immense reservoir, now dry, and round it are extensive ruins, consisting of mounds of rubbish and ancient foundations. Rising northward, similar remains were seen on both sides of wady el-Kelt. Half a mile farther north we enter cultivated ground, interspersed with clumps of thorny nubk ("lote-tree") and other shrubs; another half mile brings us to Ain es-Sultan, a large fountain bursting forth from the foot of a mound. The water, though cold, is warm, is sweet, and is extensively used for the surrounding plain. The whole plain immediately around the fountain is strewn with ancient ruins and heaps of rubbish.

The village traditionally identified with Jericho now bears the name of Rihah (in Arabic er-Rihah) and is situated about the middle of the plain, six miles west from the Jordan, in N. lat. 34° 57', and E. long. 35° 38'. Dr.
Olin describes the present village as "the meanest and foulest of Palestine." It may perhaps contain forty dwellings, with some two hundred inhabitants.

The houses consist of rough walls of old building-stones, roofed with straw and brushwood. Each has in front of it an inclosure for cattle, fenced with branches of the thorny nubk; and a stronger fence of the same material surrounds the whole village, forming a rude barrier against the raids of the Bedawins. Not far from the village is a little square castle or tower, evidently of Seramonic origin, but now dignified by the title of "the house of Zaccheus." This village, though it bears the name of Jericho, is about a mile and a half distant both from the Jericho of the prophets and that of the evangelists.

Very probably it may occupy the site of Gilgal (q.v.).
The ruinous state of the present village is evidence how fast it is sinking to a comparatively recent event. [Page 151] been attacked by the Arabs in crossing the Jordan, sent a detachment of his army and razed Jericho to the ground.

The soil of the plain is unsurpassed in fertility; there is abundance of water for irrigation, and many of the old aqueducts are almost perfect; yet nearly the whole plain is wasted and desolate. The grove supplied by the fountain is in the distance. The few fields of wheat and Indian corn, and the few orchards of figs, are enough to show what the place might become under proper cultivation. But the people are now few in number, indolent, and licentious. The palms which gave the ancient city a distinction are gone; even that "single solitary palm" which Dr. Robinson saw exists no more. The climate of Jericho is exceedingly hot and unhealthy. This is accounted for by the depression of the plain, which is about 1200 feet below the level of the sea. The reflection of the sun's rays from the bare white cliffs and mountain ranges which shut in the plain, and the insoucian exhalations from the lake, and from the numerous salt springs around it, are enough to poison the atmosphere.

Jer'el (Heb. Yeriel, יריעלי, 'fearer of God, or I. q. Jeruel; Sept. Ιερελ), one of the sons of Tola, the son of Issacah, mentioned as a valiant chief of his tribe, which were enrolled in the time of David (1 Chron. vii, 2). B.C. post 1856.

Jer'i-jah (1 Chron. xxvi, 31). See JERIAH.

Jer'moth (Heb. Yerimoth, יֶרֶמוֹת, heights, i. q. Jeremoth), the name of several men. See also Jerumoth.

1. (Sept. Ιερουμια). One of the five sons of Bela, son of Benjamin, a valiant chief of his tribe (1 Chron. vii, 7). B.C. post 1856.

2. (Sept. ΙερουμιαΣ). The last named of the three sons of Mushi, grandson of Levi (1 Chron. xxvi, 30); elsewhere (1 Chron. xxiiii, 23) called Jeremoth (q. v.).

3. (Sept. ΙερουμιαΣ v. r. Αρμου). One of the famous Benjaminite archers and slingers that joined David's band at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 5). B.C. 1055.

4. (Sept. ΙερουμιαΣ v. r. Αρμου). One of the forty elite soldiers, and appointed a Levitical musician under his father in the arrangement of the sacred services by David (1 Chron. xxv, 4); probably the same elsewhere (ver. 22) called Jeremoth.

6. (Sept. ΙερουμιαΣ v. r. Αρμου). A son of David, whose daughter Mahalah was Rehoboam's first wife (2 Chron. xi, 15). B.C. ante 975. He appears to have been different from any of David's sons elsewhere enumerated (2 Sam. iii, 2-5; 1 Chron. xiv, 4-7), having, perhaps, been born of a concubine (compare 2 Sam. xvi, 21). See David. "This, in fact, is the Jewish tradition respecting his maternity (Jerome, Questiones, ad loc.). It is, however, somewhat questionable whether Rehoboam would have married the grandchild of a concubine to David. The passage 2 Chron. xi, 18 is not quite certain, since the word 'daughter' is a corruption of the Keri: the original text had 'sone', i.e. 'son'.

7. (Sept. ΙερουμιαΣ). A Levite, one of the overseers of the Temple offerings in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi, 15). B.C. 726.

Jē'rioth (Heb. Yeriith, יֶרִית, timely, otherwise caietatae; Ιεριωθ, a person apparently named as the father of the last two wives of Eleazar, son of Izcarah, several children being mentioned as the fruit of the marriage with one or the other (1 Chron. ii, 18). B.C. post 1856. The Vulgate renders this as the son of Caleb by the first-mentioned wife, and father of the sons named; but contrary to the Heb. text, which is closely followed by the Sept. There is probably some corruption; possibly the name in question is an interpolation: compare ver. 19; or perhaps we should render the connective by thus, thus making Jerioth but another name for Azubah.

Jer'ment, Gi'robo, D.D., a minister of the Secession Church of Scotland, was born in 1759 at Peebles, Scotland, where his father was at the time pastor of a church of that branch of the Secession Church denominated before their union in 1819 as Anti-burgher. On the conclusion of his collegiate course he entered the divinity hall of his denomination, situated at Alloa, and while a student there, took a high standing in his class. After preaching a short time in Scotland he went to London, to become the colleague of Mr. Wilson, at the Secession Church in Bow Lane, Cheapside, and was ordained in the last week of Sept. 1782. In the English metropolis Jerment was well received, and he labored there for the space of thirty-five years, his preaching attracting large and respectable congregations from the Scottish residents of London. He died May 23, 1819. "His character stood very high in the estimate of all who knew him, whether as a man of sense, judgment, prudence, and exalted piety. He was one of the first directors of the London Missionary Society, and greatly encouraged the enterprise. The writings of Jerment intruded into the press are mainly public lectures and sermons (London, 1781-1813). Among these his Early Piety, illustrated and recommended in several Discourses; and Religion, a Monitor to the Middle-aged and the Glory of old Men, deserve to occupy a conspicuous place. Jērō-bo'am (Heb. Yero'am, יֶרוֹאָם, "increase of the people; Sept. Ιερουαμ, Iosephus Ιερουομος, the name of two of the kings of the separate kingdom of Israel.

1. The son of Nebat (by which title he is usually distinguished in the record of his infancy) by a woman named Zeruah, of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Kings xi, 26). He was the founder of the schismatical northern kingdom, and father of the ten tribes, over which he reigned twenty-two (or current) years. B.C. 973-951. According to the Hebrew genealogy, he first appears in the sacred history his mother was a widow, and he had already been noticed by Solomon as a clever and active young man, and appointed one of the superintendents of the works which that monarch carried on at Jerusalem. He now incurred the charge of the services required of the leading tribe of Ephraim (1 Kings xi, 26-28; comp. Josephus, Ant. viii. 7, 7). B.C. 1010-998. This appointment, the reward of his merits, might have satisfied his ambition had not the declaration of the prophet Ahijah given him higher hopes. When informed that, by the divine appointment, he was to become king over the ten tribes about to be rent from the house of David, he was not content to wait patiently for the death of Solomon, but began to form plots and conspiracies, the discovery of which constrained him to flee to Egypt to escape condign punishment. B.C. cir. 990. The king of that country was but too ready to encourage one whose success must necessarily weaken the kingdom which had become great and formidable under David and Solomon, and which had already pushed its frontier to the Red Sea (1 Kings xi, 29, 40).

When Solomon died, the ten tribes sent to call Jeroboam from Egypt; and he appears to have headed the delegation that came before the son of Solomon with a demand of new securities for the rights which the measures of the late king had compromised. It may be supposed that the answer of Rehoboam that the demand was urged by a body of men headed by one whose pretensions were so well known and so odious to the house of David. It cannot be denied that, in making their applications thus offensively, they struck the first blow, although it is possible that they, in the first instance, intended to use the presence of Jeroboam for no other purpose than to frighten the king into compliance. The imprudent answer of Rehoboam rendered a revolution inevitable. (2 Kings xii, 24.)

2. The son and successor of Jeoahash, and the fourteenth king of Israel, for a period of forty-one years. B.C. 823-782 (2 Kings xiv, 23). He followed the example of the first Jeroboam in keeping up the idolatry of the golden calves (2 Kings xiv, 24). Nevertheless, the Lord had pity upon Israel (2 Kings xiv, 26), the time of its ruin had not yet come, and this reign was long and flourishing, being contemporary with those of Amanaziah (2 Kings xvi, 3), Uzziah, Ahaz, Jotham, and Hezekiah of Judah. Jeroboam brought to a successful issue the wars which his father had undertaken, and was always victorious over the Syrians (comp. 2 Kings xiii, 4; xiv, 26, 27). He even took their chief cities of Damascus (2 Kings xiv, 28; Amos i, 3-5) and Hamath, which had been formerly beyond the Leontes, and reéstablished the kingdom of Israel to its former limits. He also restored to the realm of Israel the ancient eastern limits from Lebanon to the Dead Sea (2 Kings xiv, 25; Amos vi, 14). Ammon and Moab were reconquered (Amos ii, 13; ii, 1-8); the Transjordanic tribes were restored to their territory (2 Kings xiii, 5; 1 Chron, v, 17-22). But this merely an outward restoration. The same year that Bethel was kept up in royal state (Amos vii, 13), while drunkenness, licentiousness, and oppression prevailed in the country (Amos ii, 6-8; iv, 1; vi, 6; Hos. iv, 12-14; 1, 2), and idolatry was united with the worship of Jehovah (Hos. iv, 18; xiii, 6). During this reign lived the prophets Hosea (Hos. i; ix), Joel iii, 16 with Amos i, 12), Amos (Amos i, 1), and Jonah (2 Kings xiv, 25). In Amos vii, 11, Amaziah, the high-priest of Bethel, in reporting what he called the conspiracy of Amos against Jeroboam, represents the prophet as declaring that Jeroboam should die by the sword; and the former regard this as a prophecy that had not received its fulfilment, as there is no evidence that his death was other than natural, for he was buried with his ancestors in state (2 Kings xiv, 29), although the interregnum of eleven years which intervened before the accession of his son Zechariah (2 Kings xiv, 28, comp. with xv, 8) argues some political disorder at the time of his death (see the Studien und Kritiken, 1847, iii, 648). But the probability rather is that the high-priest, who displayed the true spirit of a persecutor, gave an unduly specific and offensive turn to the words of Amos, in order to undermine Jeroboam the more against him. The only passages of Scripture where his name occurs are 2 Kings xiii, 13; xiv, 16, 23, 27, 28, 29; xv, 1, 8; 1 Chron, v, 17; Hos. i, 1; Amos i, 1; vi, 9, 10, 11; in all others the former Jeroboam is intended. See Israel, Kingdom of.

Jeroham (Heb. Yeroham, יֶרֹחָם, cherished), the name of several men.

1. (Sept. Æremôth, Ἰερομάθης, Ἰερομαθῆς.) The son of Elihu (Eliab, Eleab), and father of Ekanah, Samuel’s father (1 Sam. i, 1; 1 Chron. vi, 27, 34). B.C. ante 1142.

2. (Sept. Æromus, Ἰερομᾶς, Ἰερομᾶς.) An inhabitant of Gedor, and father of Joelah and Zebariah, two of the Benjamite archers who joined David’s band at Ziklag (1 Chron. xiii, 7). B.C. ante 1055.

3. (Sept. Æromus v. Ἰερωμᾶς.) The father of Azareel, which latter was “captain” of the tribe of Dan under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 22). B.C. ante 1017.
4. (Sept. Ἰωάνν.) Father of Azariah, which latter is the first mentioned of the two of that name among the "captains of hundreds" with whom Jehoiada planned the restoration of prince Jehoash to the throne (2 Chron. xxiii., 1). B.C. ante 576.

5. (Sept. Ἰωάννα v. r. Ἰωάννα). The father of several Benjamite chiefs resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. vii, 27). B.C. apparently ante 588. See No. 6; also Jeremiah, 4.

6. (Sept. Ἰωάννα v. r. Ἰωάννα). The father of Nehemiah, which latter was one of the Benjamite chiefs resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix, 8). B.C. apparently ante 548.

Possibly identical with the preceding.

7. (Sept. Ἰσαὰκ v. r. Ἰσαὰκ). The son of Pahur, and father of Adahiah, which last was one of the chief priests resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix, 12). B.C. apparently ante 546.

8. (Sept. Ἰσαὰκ). The son of Pelahiah, and father of Adahiah, which last was one of the chief priests resident at Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. vi, 12). B.C. ante 440. Perhaps, however, this Jeroham was so noted with the No. 7.

Jerome (fully Latinized Sophronius Eusebius Hieronymus), generally known as Saint Jerome, one of the most learned and able among the fathers of the Western Church, was born at Stridon, a town on the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia (but whose site is now unknown, as the place was destroyed by the Goths in A.D. 577), at some period between 351 and 345—according to Eusebius probably occurred. His parents were both Christians. His early education was supervised by his father, after which he studied Greek and Latin rhetoric and philosophy under Ælius Donatus at Rome. While a resident in this Christian city he was admitted to the rite of baptism, and decided to devote his life, in rigid asceticism, to the service of his Master. It seems uncertain whether a visit which he made to Gaul was undertaken before or after this important event. At any rate, about 370 we find him at Treves and at Aquileia, busy in transcribing the commentaries of Hilary on the Psalms, and a work on the synods by the same author; and in composing his first theological essay, De mulieribus septem persecutus, the letter to Innocentius. In 373 he set out on a journey to the East, in company with his friends Innocentius, Evagrius, and Hiliodores, and finally settled for a time at Antioch. During his residence at this place he was seized with a severe fever, and in a dream which he had in this sickness he fancied himself called before the judgment bar of God, and as a heathen Ciceronian (he had hitherto given much of his time to the study of the classical writers) so severely reprimanded and scourged that he was afterwards interred for a long time in sympathy with his youth, and he himself was led to take the solemn vow hereafter to forsake the study and reading of worldly books, a pledge which, however, he did not adhere to in after life. A marked religious fervor thenceforth animated Jerome; a devotion to monastic habits became the ruling principle, we might say the ruling passion of his life; he retired to the desert of Chalcis in 374, and there spent four years in penitential exercises and in study, paying particular attention to the acquirement of the Hebrew tongue. But his active and restless spirit soon brought him again upon the public stage, and involved him in all the doctrinal and ecclesiastical controversies of those controversial times. See MELETIUS. In 379 he was ordained a presbyter by bishop Paulinus in Antioch, without receiving charge of a congregation, as he preferred the itinerant life of a wandering student; and to a fixed office he set no journeyed to Constantinople, where, although past a student's age, he was not ashamed to take his seat at the feet of the celebrated Gregory Nazianzen, and to listen to the anti-Arian sermons of this learned father of the Church. Indeed, the pupil and instructor soon became one; and there emerged from his study a knowledge of the Greek language and literature, to which much of his time and attention was here devoted, several transla-acknowledged by him as a truth. Where he judged himself to be in the right, he manifested the energy worthy of a Roman, even though the world was against him. Thus he hesitated not to encounter the opposition of all Rome when once he believed it to be his duty to come forward as a promoter of monasticism in a country where it was a little loved, and where this rigidly ascetic tendency came into collision with the propensities and interests of many, and where "he could not fail, even on this score, to incur the hatred of numbers, both of the clergy and laity" (Neander, ii, 688). Still, to his praise be it said, that however greatly we regret his attitude of regard for, or disapprobation of, monachism, which, at this early period of the life of the Christian Church, may be pardoned on the ground that such great personal sacrifices and privations were the only proofs which the young convert could bring to evince his earnestness and zeal for the cause of his Master, yet "no one has denounced, no one has branded more energetically than he the false monks, the false penitents, the false widows and virgins. He points out with a bold hand all the faults and dangers of the institution," so far, of course, as an advocate of monasticism could have ventured to do it at all (Ibid.

Moms of the Church, 405 sq. Lea, Catholic, p. 72 sq. Jerome, in short, was in the service of the popular opinion, and yet never yielded to the opinion of the day. In the opinion of Neander, Jerome's "better qualities were obscured by the great defects of his character, by his manly passion, his easily offended nature, his spirit of controversy and of rule, his pride, so often concealed under the garb of humility." Much milder is the judgment of Dr. Schaff, who pronounces Jerome "indeed an accomplished and most serviceable scholar, and a zealous enthusiast for all which his age counted holy and respected," and that he reflected with pride the failings also of his age and of the monastic system," adding in a foot-note that "among later Protestant historians opinion has become somewhat more favorable," though he again modifies this statement by saying that this has reference "rather to his learning than to his moral character.

The Vulgate.—Jerome gave also great offence to his contemporaries by his attempt to correct the Latin version of the Bible, the "become greatly distorted by the blending together of different translations, the mixing up with each other of the different Gospels, and the ignorance and prevalence of transcriptions." This he succeeded in accomplishing, and it is regarded by all Biblical scholars as "by far the most important and valuable" work of Jerome, in itself constituting "an immortal service" to the Christian Church. "Above all his contemporaries, and even all his successors down to the 16th century, Jerome, by his linguistic knowledge, his Oriental travel, and his entire culture, was best fitted, and, in fact, the only man to undertake and successfully execute so gigantic a task—a task which just then, with the approaching separation of East and West, and the decay of the knowledge of the original language of the Bible in Latin Christendom, was of the highest necessity. Here, as so often in history, we plainly discern the hand of divine Providence" (Schaff). He had been urged to undertake this work by bishop Damasus, and it was commenced, as already noted, while Jerome was yet a resident at Rome, and had, in fact, been commenced while the Gospels and the Psalms. In his retreat at Bethlehem he extended this work to the whole Bible, supported in his task, it is generally believed, by the Hexapla of Origen, which he is supposed to have obtained from the library at Cesarea. Even this was a bold undertaking, by which he must expose himself to being loaded with reproaches on the part of those who, in their ignorance, which they identified with a pious simplicity, were wont to condemn every deviation from the traditional text, however necessary or salutary it might be. They were very ready to see, in any change of the only text which was known to them, a falsification, without inquiring any further into the reason of the alteration. Yet here he had in his favor the authority of a Roman bishop, as well as the fact that in this case it was impossible to oppose to him a translation established and transmitted by ecclesiastical authority, or a divine inspiration. The hitherto received Vulgate had given far greater offence by another useful undertaking, viz. a new version of the Old Testament, not according to the Alexandrian translation, which before this had alone been accepted, but according to the Hebrew. This appeared to many, even of those who did not regard their opinions as of equal importance, to be a great piece of impiety—to pretend to understand the Old Testament better than the seventy inspired interpreters—better than the apostles who had followed this translation, and who would have given another translation if they had considered it to be necessary—to allow one's self to be so misled by Jews as for their accommodation to falsify the writings of the Old Testament! (Neander, Church History, ii, 684 sq.) But with the opposition there came also friends, and among his supporters he counted even Augustine, until gradually it was introduced in all the churches of the West. Of this great work, as a whole, Dr. Schaff (Church History, iii, 376 sq.) says: "Of the Vulgate the first place among the Bible versions of the ancient Church. It exerted the same influence upon Latin Christendom as the Septuagint upon Greek, and it is directly or indirectly the mother of most of the existing European Bibles. It became immediately from the original languages, though with the use of all accessible helps, and is as much superior to the Italics as Luther's Bible is to the older German versions. From the present stage of Biblical philology and exegesis the Vulgate can be charged, indeed, with innumerable faults, the uncritical in the expositions, and the arbitrary in the style; but, notwithstanding these, it deserves, as a whole, the highest praise for the boldness with which it went back from the half-defiled Septuagint directly to the original Hebrew; for its union of idiom and freedom; and for the dignity, clearness, and gracefulness of its style. Accordingly after the extinction of the knowledge of Greek, it very naturally became the official Bible of Western Christendom, and so continued to be till the genius of the Reformation in Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and England, returning to the original text, and still further penetrating the spirit of the Semitic tongue, with the continual help of the Vulgate, produced a number of popular Bibles, which were the same to the evangelical laity that the Vulgate had been for many centuries to the Catholic clergy. This high place the Vulgate has also to this day in the Roman Church, where it is unwarrantably and perniciously placed on an equality with the original." See Vulgate.

Jerome's other Writings.—As the result of his critical labors on the Holy Scriptures, we have also commentaries on Genesis, the major and minor prophets, Ecclesiastes, Job, on some of the Psalms, the Gospel of Matthew, and the epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, Titus, and Philemon, besides translations of different parts of the Old and New Testaments. All these productions, Dr. Schaff pronounces "the most instructive we have from the Latin Church of that day, not excepting even the best of Augustine, which otherwise greatly surpass them in theological depth and spiritual unction." Alban Butler thus speaks of Jerome's exegetical labors: "Nothing has rendered St. Jerome so famous as his critical labors on the holy Scriptures. For this the Church so loudly acceded. He has not been raised by God through a special providence, and particularly assisted from above, and she styles him the greatest of all her doctors in expounding the divine oracles. To works of an exegetical character in a wider sense belong also his Liber de interpretatione nominum Hebraicorum, or De nominibus Hebr. (Opera, iii, 1-199), the book On the Interpretation of the Hebrew Names, an etymological lexicon of the proper Names of the Old and New Testaments, useful for its time, but in many respects defective, and now worthless; and Liber de sive nonnamis locorum Hebraicorum, usually cited under the title Ensebiis Onomasticon (urubium et locorum S. Scripturae) (Opera, iii, 121-290), a free translation of the Onomasticon of Theodotion, a sort of Biblical topology in alphabetical order, still considered valuable to antiquarian scholarship.

Yet the busy life which Jerome led, and the controversies which he waged in behalf of rigid orthodoxy in Christian belief, prove that, so far from confusing himself to his ultimate destruction, he was a great piece of acumen, a great piece of industry upon each subject—biography, history, and the vast field of theology, and in all he wielded the pen of a scholar, in a (Latin) style acknowledged by all to be both pure and terse. "The phraseology of Jerome," says Prof. W. Ramsay (Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Bibl. s. v.), "is exceedingly pure, bearing ample testimony to the diligence with which he must have studied the choicest models. No one can read the Vulgate without being struck by the contrast which it presents in the classic simplicity of its language to the degenerate affectation of Apuleius, and the barbarous obscurity of the Greek Fathers. It is, indeed, the model of all later style." We lack the space to go into further details on his varied productions, and are obliged to refer for a more detailed statement to Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Bibl. (Lond. 1852, royal. 8vo), ii, 461 sq., and Hofer, Lexicon Theol. Vatic. (Vatican City 1842). In short, "Jerome excelled" (says Dr. Eadie, in Appleton's Cyclop. s. v.) "all his contemporaries in erudition. He wanted the glowing fancy of Chrysostom, and the serene temper and symmetrical intellect of Augustine, but he was beyond them both in critical skill and taste. His faults lie upon the surface; he was inaccurately disposed, in an opposite manner to the Greek Fathers, who so respected every opposition, and magnified tridles, that, in his towering passion, he heaped upon opponents opprobrious epithets and coarse invective. Hauteur, cagryness, and acerbity appear also in his letters and expositions. His mode of life must have greatly aggravated these touchiness and instability. It made him a fit instrument of the mollifying influence of society and friendship. His heart was estranged from human sympathies; and, save when lighted up by the ardors of his indignant passion, it was, like his own cell, cold, gloomy, and uninvisiting. The works of Jerome will always maintain for him the place he holds in the museum of Christian antiquities, brought to him by the continual help of the Vulgate, produced a number of popular Bibles, which were the same to the evangelical laity that is baseless, fanciful, and one-sided, but very much that is useful and instructive in exegesis and theology." A still greater, and to us nearer authority, Dr. Schaff (Church History, iii, 987 sq.), thus sums up the position and work of this great man: "Jerome was more than a doctor in theology and Christology, semi-Velician in anthropology, Romanizing in the doctrine of the Church and tradition, anti-chiastic in eschatology, legalistic and ascetic in ethics, a violent fighter of all heresies, a fastidious of all monkish extravagances, Jerome was revered throughout the Catholic middle age as the patron saint of Christian and ecclesiastical learning, and, next to Augustine, as maximus doctor ecclesiae: but by his enthusiastic love for the holy Scriptures, his recourse to the original languages, his classic translation of the Bible, and his manifold exegetical merits, he established a position in the Church that is unassailable; and as a scholar and an author still takes the first rank, and as an influential theologian the second (after Augustine), among the Latin fathers."

Of the various editions of Jerome's works a detailed account is given in the Dictionary of the Bibliotheca Patrum Latinorum, i, 6, 3, § 3. Parts of the first edition were early published, one of its earliest writings collectively was given to the public in 1516. It was reprinted by Erasmus, with the assistance of Erasmianus (Basel, 9 vols. fol.,reprinted in 1558 and 1561, and also in Lyons, 1580, in 8 vols. fol.). Another critical edition was prepared by Marianus Victorinus (Rome, 1566-72).
him (Wickliffe), and, finding his doctrines had made considerable progress in Bohemia, and that Huss was at the head of that party which had espoused them, he attached himself to that leader” (Gilpin, Lives, p. 294; compare, however, Giusti, Life of Huss, i. 69).” May 29, 1408, the University of Prague, at the instigation of the archiepiscopal officials and the cathedral chapter of Prague, publicly condemned the writings of John Wickliffe as heretical, in spite of a strong opposition, headed by John Huss, Jerome, and Master Nicholas of Letecký (q. v.). For some time past they had been growing a discontent between the native and foreign element represented at the university. When that institution of learning was founded, Prague was the residence of the German emperor, but that city was also the capital of Bohemia, a country which “seemed fitted by location and even nature to become one of the forerunners of the new states of Europe,” and the people, aware of their great natural resources, were unwilling to submit to the policy of the rulers to make their country a province of Germany. A strong feeling of nationality, such as is again witnessed in our day, developed itself in every Slavic heart, and gradually Bohemian literature, a nation’s strength, which had before succumbed to the German, began to revive, and with it there came a longing desire to force from the Germans the control of the university, in which the native Bohemians saw themselves slighted. The German brothers were not only outvoted by the Bohemians, but also by the Bohemian radicals, Wickliffe a Realist; no wonder, then, that his writings were condemned, even though the Bohemians were in favor of the Englishman (see Reichel, Sitze von der Mitten, Aeg, p. 602 sq.; Studien und Kritiken, 1871, i, 297 sq.). Here, then, came an opportunity for John Huss and his followers. The clergy, returning from Italy, in large numbers, to found a university at Leipzig. They also circulated the most injurious reports respecting the Hussites (as we will hereafter call the adherents of Huss and Jerome for convenience sake). In the mean time, he continued his battle with the orthodox. The archbishop of Prague, Zybneck, had issued (in 1406) a decree “that henceforth no one, under severe penalty, should hold, teach, or, for purposes of academic debate, argue in favor of Wickliffe’s doctrines.” This same Zybneck was the legate of Gregory XII. To this last pope the king of Bohemia adjoined at this time, but in 1409, when the Council of Pisa denounced the rival popes, Gregory XII and Benedict XIII, and declared Alexander V the legitimate incumbent of the papal chair, Huss inclined to favor the action of the Council of Pisa, and won also the king over to his side, through the influence of Jerome, who seems to have been a favorite at court. This brought about an open rupture with Zybneck, who had hitherto hesitated openly to attack Huss and Jerome. Now there was no longer any need for delaying the decisive conflict. “He issued an ordinance forbidding all teachers of the university who had joined the party of the cardinal (the Council of Pisa) against the schismatic popes, and had thus abandoned the cause of Gregory, to discharge any priestly duties within his diocese.” The Bohemians refused to obey the mandate; the archbishop then pronounced the king and his teachers to be accessory to the crime of preaching, and commanded them to enforce obedience to his decrees; neither was his master, Gregory XII, able to do it. Determined to conquer, the archbishop now suddenly espoused the cause of the stronger rival in the papacy, and appealed to Alex-exander V for his decision in the conflict with the Bohemians. A papal bull was secured condemning the articles of Wickliffe, forbidding preaching in private chapel bull granting the excommunication of the leader commission to enforce the measures adopted by him for the extirpation of the spreading heresy. In addition to a renewal of his former decrees, the archbishop now condemned not only the writings of Wickliffe, but also the books of Hus and Jerome, as well as those of their descendants Milic and Janow, and caused them to be publicly burned. "The deed was done. The books were burned. The ban of the Church rested on those who had dared to object. Doubtless the archbishop feared that he had secured a triumph. He had executed his papal sentence, and proved himself an able instrument of the Church party who had instigated him to the bold deed. But it provoked more than it overawed.
The king, the court, and a large proportion of the citizens of Prague were enraged and embittered by it. A cry of indignation ran throughout Bohemia" (Gillett, Huss, i, 157).

As usual, and as is too apt to be the case, excesses were committed by marauders, and the crime charged to the reformers. The king and the people siding with the Hussites, it remained for the papal party to adopt severer measures; these were soon found in the proclamation of an interdict on the city, and in the excommunication of the leaders.
Huss left the city to avoid an open conflict between his countrymen, and Jerome also soon quitted the place, and went to Ofen (1410). But Zytebeck was unwilling to see his opponent abroad proclaiming everywhere the doctines of Wickliffe, and denouncing even popery. Jerome dared to sustain the excommunication at any question of these: Whether the pope possessed more power than another priest, and whether the bread in the Eucharist or the body of Christ possessed more virtue in the mass of the Roman pontiff than in that of any other officiating ec-clesiastic. Not many days after, while in open squaranged by several of his friends and adherents, he exposed two sketches, in one of which Christ's disciples, on one side, following, with naked feet, their Master mounted on an ass; while on the other the pope and the cardinals were represented in great state on superb horses, and preceded, as usual, with falcons and rumbling carriages. Zytebeck caused the arrest of Jerome by the archbishop of Graz, who, recognising the superior abilities and great influence of Jerome, dismissed him five days after.

More vehement and serious became Jerome's opposition to the papal party in 1412, after the publication of the papal bull granting the excommunication of Hus (q.v.) to all who should engage in "holy warfare" against king Ladislaus (q.v.). Huss, who had returned to Prague, and who now was excommunicated, simply preached with all his power against this bull, but Jerome, urged on by his impulsive nature, was carried far beyond the limits of prudence and of decency. He caused (if he did not head the movement he undoubtedly inspired it) the bull to be carried about the streets by two ladies, heading a long procession of students, and, after displaying it in this manner for some time, it was publicly burned, with some fulsome briefs, at the gates of the new town. "That similar scenes not infrequently occurred is most probable. Among the charges brought against Jerome at the Council of Constance are some which imply that his conduct in this respect had been far from unquestionable. Some of these, however, but the evidence is too strong if not decisive, in regard to his course on the reception of the papal bulls for the Crusade. On another occasion he is said to have thrown a priest into the Moldau, who, but for timely aid, would have been drowned. But such violence was bitterly provoked. The burning of the books by Slynco (Zytebeck), the execution of the men for asserting the falsehood of the indulgences, the excommunication of Huss, to say nothing of the course pursued by his assailants, had excited a strong feeling against the patrons of papal fraud and ecclesiastical corruption. We are only surprised that the deep resentment felt was confined in its expression within such limits" (Gillett, i, 257). Both he and Huss were obliged to fee in order to evade the sentence of their peers for a defense of his course. When the tiding of the imprisonment of his friend reached Jerome he determined to go to Constance himself. He went there at first incognito and secretly (April 4, 1415), but, fearing danger for himself without the possibility of affording relief to his friend, he left for a journey four miles distant, and there demanded of the emperor a safe-conduct to Constance, that he might publicly answer before any one to every charge of heresy that might be brought against him. Not being able to obtain such a safe-conduct, he caused to be affixed the next day, on the gates of the emperor's palace, on the doors of the priory chapel. A citation was sent to him, which, it was said, had been posted up in Constance in reply to his declarations to the council. He denied to have seen them before he left the vicinity of Constance, where he had waited sufficiently long to be reached by any reply made within a reasonable time of time, and added: "I am not afraid that the emperor will reach him even on the confines of Bohemia. But this declaration rather aggravates, if anything, the members of the council, so eager to find a plea to condemn the prisoner. Many members of this council came from the universities of Paris, Heidelberg, and Cologne, and recollecting him, they desired in triumph over the man who had always far outranged them.

"Accordingly one after another addressed him, and reminded him of the propositions which he had set forth.
The first among these was the learned chancellor Ger-on, but the evidence is too strong if not entirely overcoming the other, and declared that he, as a university master, had maintained such philosophical doctrines as he had no concern with faith. In reference to all that had een objected to him by different parties, he held himself ready to recant as soon as he was taught anything better. Amid the noise of three men crying, 'Jerome must be burnt,' he answered with composure, 'Well, if you wish my death, let it come, in God's name!' Wise counsel, however, prevailed at the moment, and Jerome was remitted to prison, where he was bound to a stake, with his hands, feet, and neck so that he could scarcely move his head. Thus he lay two days, with nothing to eat but bread and water. Then for the first time he obtained, through the mediation of his friends, a short interval of liberty, lasting only a few days, and during which he was followed by his keepers, other means of subsistence. This severe imprisonment threw him into a violent fit of sickness. He demanded a confessio, which was at first refused, and then granted with difficulty. After he had spent several months in this severe confinement, he heard of the imprisonment of his friend, whose death in prison the imprisonment of Jerome produced the greatest exasperation of feeling among the knights in Bohemia and Moravia. On the 2d of September they put forth a letter to the council, in which they expressed their indignation and declared that they had known Huss but as a pious man, zealous for the doctrines of the Gospel; and that he had fallen a victim only to his enemies and the enemies of his country. They entered a bitter complaint against the captivity of the innocent Jerome, who had made himself famous by his brilliant gifts; perhaps he, too, had been taken on the! For the trial, and it was included in the heretical composition. They declared themselves resolved to contend, even to the shedding of their blood, in defence of the law of Christ and of the faithful servants' (Neander, Ch. Hist. v, 375). This decided stand of Jerome's friends forced the council to milder terms, and they determined, if necessary, to secure the martyrdom of the Hussite prelate, a point which the effect of Jerome's close confinement, and the sufferings that he had endured for the past six months, made them believe might be carried without much difficulty. They mainly pressed him to recant his opinion on the doctrine of transubstantiation; and on the third examination, Sept. 11, 1416, Jerome, by this time worn out both in body and mind, made a public and unqualified recantation of the Hussite statement of the eucharistic theory. Here the irreparable conduct of the Romanists might well have rested, and Jerome might have been permitted to return to his native land. But there were men in the council who well understood that Jerome had been induced to recant only because he saw no other door to lead from the prison, and that, his liberty once regained, he would return to his friends, to preach anew the truth as he had heard it from the lips of Huss, and to die as was done by the friends of Wickliffe. Indeed, they had reasons to fear that if he ever escaped with his life, it would be given to the cause in which Huss had just fallen. On the other hand, there were men of honor in the council—men who, though they had narrowed themselves down until they could see Christ only in the typical sense, who were more willing to forego the hope of deliverance for the time being, than to give up a moral position to the papal chair, yet would not make pledges only to break them as soon as they found it to their interest to do so. One of these was the cardinal of Cambrai, who insisted that Jerome ought now to be liberat-ed, as he had promised him before his recantation. The counsel of the more cunning, however, prevailed, and Jerome was detained to answer other and more serious accusations. Tired of the crooked ways of these so-called defenders of the Christian faith, Jerome finally declared to be any longer subjected to private examinations. The council charged that publically and all year long he ready to answer the calumnies of his accusers. May 23, 1416, he finally succeeded in obtaining a public hearing. On this day, and on the 26th, he spent from six in the morning until one in the afternoon in replying to the different accusations made against him, and closed, to the satisfaction of all the council, by his only answer, namely, claiming his former cowardly recantation. "Of all the sins," he exclaimed now, with great feeling, "that I have committed since my youth, none weigh so heavily on my mind and cause me such poignant remorse as that which I committed in this fatal place when I accepted the purest sentences of the John Huss, my master and friend." If his defence had been delivered with such presence of mind, with so much eloquence and wit as to excite universal admiration and to incline his judges to mercy, the closing declaration against his former recantation certainly sealed his own death-warrant, and left not the least hope for escape from martyrdom. Yet there was a thrill among his enemies, a spark of hope. He was so excited so deep a sympathy that they would not declare against him; there were also some who dared not, by this new martyrdom, provoke still further the angry feelings of the Bohemians. He was granted a respite of forty days for reflection, and an opportunity was afforded to the council of Prague still to use the heretic to influence him possibly to recant of this decided opposition to the Church. But Jerome remained steadfast this time. If he had seen a period when, like Cranmer, his faith faltered, it had passed, and he was now ready to die rather than give up his faith, and felt as a Hussite. May 30 had been appointed to pass final judgment. He still refusing to recant, the council pronounced against him, and he was handed over for execution to the secular authorities. The whole trial and his last hours are vividly pictured by a Roman Catholic, Poggio, an ecclesiastic of the Franciscan order, who is freely cited by Neander (Ch. Hist. v, 375 sq.), and is given in full by Gilpin (Lives, p. 255 sq.). Of his last hours Pog-gio relates as follows: "With cheerful looks he went readily and willingly to his death; he feared neither death nor the fire and its torture. No stoic ever suffered death with a more quiet face and composed manner; and his courage seemed to demand it. Jerome endured the torments of the fire with more tranquility than Socrates displayed in drinking his cup of hemlock." Jerome was burned like his friend and master Huss, and his ashes likewise thrown into the Rhine. "Historian, [Roman] Catholic Church, History, vol. iii, p. 473., and Protestant alike, vie with each other in paying homage to the heroic courage and apostolic resignation with which Jerome met his doom. Posthuma has confirmed their verdict, and reveres him as a martyr to the truth, who, unweared in life and noble in death, has acquired an immortality from his death. Indeed, we question whether Jerome and Huss sufficient credit is given for their share in the Reform-ation of the 16th century. We fear that it is through neglect alone that to Huss and Jerome is denied a place by the side of Luther and Calvin, to which, as Giselin (in the Franciscan order) rightly says, they are justly entitled. "It is true, indeed, that the great reform movement, of which Huss was the leader, was, to human view, after a most desperate and prolonged struggle, crushed out; not, however, without leaving behind it most important results." Jerubb’aël (Heb. Jerubbe’aël, contempler with Bala; comp. Ishbaal; Sept. Ἰούσσαλος), a surname of Gideon (q. v.), the judge of Israel, given him in consequence of his overthrow of the idolatrous image of Baal (J. viii. 38, vi. 15, 16, 24, 29, 35; Sam. xii, 11). "The name Jerubbael appears in the Greekized form of Hieronobol (Ἱερονοβολός) in a fragment of Philo-Biblical preserved by Eusebius (Proc. Euseu. i, 9); but the identity of name does not authorize us to conclude that it is Gideon who is there referred. In the Pamilyene inscriptions, Ἱερονοβολός appears as the name of a deity (Gesemiens, Monum. Phœnic. p. 229; Movers, Phœniciar., i, 454). Josephus omits all reference to the incident (Ant. v, 6, 6). See JERUBBESHEETH.

Jerubb’beseth (Heb. Jerubbe’seth, Ἱεροφασάθε, contri-Jeruel

Jeruel (Heb. יֶרֶעֶל, יֶרֶעֶל, founded by God, otherwise fear of God; compare Jeshuel; Sept. Ἰερουσηλήτης) is a name (probably to avoid mentioning the name of a false god, Exod. xxi, 18) of Gideon (q.v.), the Israelitish judge, acquired on account of his conflict with the idolatry of Baal (2 Sam. xi, 21). See JERUSALEM.

Jeru' al (Heb. יֶרֶעֶל, יֶרֶעֶל, founded by God, otherwise fear of God; compare Jeshuel; Sept. Ἰερουσηλήτης), a desert (דֶּרֶשָׁה, i.e. open common) mentioned in the prediction by Jabeziah of Jehoshaphat's victory over the Moabites and Ammonites, where it is described as being situated on the ascent from the valley of the Dead Sea towards Jerusalem, at the foot of the valley leading towards the cliff Ziz (1 Chron. xx, 10). The "desert" was probably so called as adjoining some town or village of the same name. From the context it appears it has lain beyond the wilderness of Tekoa (ver. 20), in the direction of Engedi (ver. 2), near a certain watch-tower overlooking the pass (ver. 24). It appears to correspond to the tract el-Hussaoua, sloping from Tekoa to the precipice of Ain-Jidy, described by Dr. Robinson as fertile in the north-western part (Researches, ii, 212), but sterile as it approaches the Ghor (p. 248), and forming part of the Desert of Judaea.

The invading tribes, having marched round the south of the Dead Sea, had encamped at Engedi. The road thence to Jerusalem ascended by a steep and terrible path (Walcott, Bib. Sac. i, 69), and thence leads northward, passing below Tekoa (Robinson, Bib. Res. i, 501, 508). The valley ("brook," ver. 16), at the end of which the enemy were to be found, was probably the wady Jehar, which, with its continuation wady el-Qhar, traverses the southern part of this plateau (Robinson's Res. ii, 185); and its upper end appears to have been the same through which the triumphant host passed on their return, and named it Berachah (q.v.), i.e. blessing, in commemoration of the victory (ver. 25).

Jesu'alem (Heb. יְשׁוּעַלֵה, יְשׁוּעַלֵה, fully [in 1 Chron. iii, 5; 2 Chron. xxiv, 1; 2 Sam. i, 6; Jer. xxvi, 18] יְשׁוּעַלֵה, יְשׁוּעַלֵה, with [final] י directive, לֶבֶנֶת, 1 Kings x, 2; fully יְשׁוּעַלֵה, 2 Chron. xxxii, 9]; Chal. יְשׁוּעַלָה or יְשׁוּעַלָה; Yerushalem; Syr. Vriahlem; Gr. Ιερουσαλημ or [r] Ἱερουσαλημ [I. e. Jerusalem], poetically also Σαλαμ (Σαλαμ, Shalam), and once Aniel (q.v.); original Jealous (q.v.; ver. 2); in sacred themes the "City of God," or "Jerusalem City" (Neh. xi, 1; Matt. iv, 5), as in the modern Arabic name el-Khamayeyn, the Holy City (comp. i-xii, 28), the "city of Judah." The Hebrew name is a dual form (see Gesenius, Lehrg. p. 553 sqq.; Ewald, Krit. Gramm. p. 301), and is of disputed etymology (see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 628; Rosenmuller, Althebr. ii, ii, 292; Ewald, Jer. Gesch. ii, 354), but probably signifies possession of peace (q. d. לֵבֶנֶת יְשׁוּעַלֵה rather than לֵבֶנֶת יְשׁוּעַלָה, i.e. foundation of peace, as preferred by Gesenius and First.), the dual referring to the two chief mountains (Zion and Moriah) on which it was built, or two main parts (the Upper and the Lower City, i.e. Zion and Acora). It has been known under the above titles in all ages as the Jewish capital of Palestine.

I. History.—This is so largely made up of the history of Palestine itself in different ages, and of its successive rulers, that for minute details we refer to these (especially Judah); here we present only a general survey, to which references to sources of more detailed information will be added.

1. This city was mentioned very early in Scripture, being usually supposed to be the Salem of which Melchizedek was king (Gen. xiv, 18). B.C. cir. 2000. Such was the name of the Jews themselves; for Josephus, who called Melchizedek king of Salem (Σαλομ) observes that this name was afterwards changed into Hierosolyma (Ant. i, 10, 8). All the fathers of the Church, Jerome excepted, agree with Josephus, and understand Jerusalem and Salem to indicate the same place. The Psalmist also says (lxvi, 2), "In Salem is his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Zion." See JERUSALEM.

The mountain of the land of Moriah, which Abraham (Gen. xxii, 2) descended on the third day to offer Isaac (B. C. cir. 2047), is said by Josephus (Ant. i, 13, 2) the mountain on which Solomon afterwards built the Temple (2 Chron. iii, 1). See Moriah.

The position of the identity of Jerusalem with "Ca-dysia, a large city of Syria," which is almost as large as Samaris, which is mentioned by Herodotus (ii, 159; iii, 5) as having been taken by Pharaon-Necho, need not be investigated in this place. It is interesting, and, if decided in the affirmative, so far important as confirming the Scripture narrative, but does not in any way add to our knowledge of the history of the city. The reader will find it fully examined in Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 246; Blakesley's Herodotus—Excursus on Bk. iii, ch. v (both on identification); and in Kenrick's Egypt, i, 406, and Dict. of Ge. and Rom. Geogr. ii, 17 (both for it).

Not less nebulous than far more certain in the historical traditions they are, and not more individual speculations—of Tacitus (Hist. v, 2) and Plutarch (It. d. Claud. ch. xxxii) of the foundation of the city by a certain Hierosolymus, a son of the Typhon (see Winer's note, 545). All the certain information on which to rely one must gather from the books of the Jewish historians alone.

2. The name Jerusalem first occurs in Josh. x, 1, where Azmonidek (q.v.), king of Jerusalem, is mentioned as having entered into an alliance with other kings against Joshua, by whom they were all overcome (comp. Josh. xii, 10). B. C. 1618. See JOSHUA.

In drawing the northern border of Judah, we find Jerusalem again mentioned (Josh. xv, 8; compare Josh. xvi, 16). This border ran through the valley of Benjamin, viz. the country on the south of it, as Bethel, which belonged to Joseph, as the mountain of Zion, forming the northern wall of the valley, and occupied by the Jebusites, appertaining to Benjamin. Among the cities of Benjamin, therefore, is also mentioned (Josh. xxvii, 26) "Jebus, which is Jerusalem" (comp. Judg. xix, 10; 1 Chron. vi, 4). At a later date, however, owing to the conquest of the David, the line runs on the north-er side of Zion, leaving the city equally divided between the two tribes. See TIRIHE. There is a rabbinical tradition that part of the Temple was in the lot of Judah, and part of it in that of Benjamin (Lightfoot, 1636, Lond. 1894). See TEMPLE.

After the division of Joshua, when there remained for the children of Israel much to conquer in Canaan, the Lord directed Judah to fight against the Canaanites; and they took Jerusalem, smote it with the edge of the sword, and set it on fire (Judg. i, 1-8). B. C. cir. 1590. After that, the Judahites and the Benjamites dwelt with the Jebusites at Jerusalem; for it is recorded (Josh. xv, 63) that the children of Judah could not drive out the Jebusites inhabiting Jerusalem; and we are farther informed (Judg. i, 21) that the children of Benjamin did not expel them from Jerusalem (comp. Judg. xix, 10). The Jebusites were removed by Josiah, not only from the lower city, but kept possession of the mountain of Zion, which David conquered at a later period. This is the explanation of Josephus (Ant. v, 2, 3). See JERUSALEM. Jerusalem is not again mentioned till the time of Saul, when it is stated (1 Sam. xvi, 54) that Danit, the son of Sodiel and beth of Jerusalem, B. C. cir. 1068. When David, who had previously reigned over Judah alone in Hebron, was called to rule over all Israel, he led his forces against the Jebusites, and conquered the castle of Zion which Josit first scaled (1 Sam. vii, 5-9; 1 Chron. ii, 4-8). Then he fixed his standard on the temple, and the city was "called Jerusalem," B. C. cir. 1044. He strengthened its fortifications [see MILLO], but does not appear to have enlarged it.
3. The reasons which led David to fix upon Jerusalem as the metropolis of his kingdom are noticed elsewhere [see David], being, chiefly, that it was in his own tribe of Judah, in which his influence was the strongest, while it was the nearest to the other tribes of any site he could have chosen in Judah. The peculiar strength also of the place, and its situation on three sides by natural trenches of valleys, could not be without weight. Its great strength, according to the military notions of that age, is shown by the length of time the Jebusites were able to keep possession of it against the force of all Israel. David was doubtless the best judge of his own interests in this matter. The interests of Jerusalem could not come into play, and if he had only considered the best situation for a metropolis of the whole kingdom, it is doubtful whether a more central situation with respect to all the tribes would not have been far preferable, especially as the law required all the adult males of Israel to reassemble there every year to the divine presence. Indeed, the burdensome character of this obligation to the more distant tribes seems to have been one of the excuses for the revolt of the ten tribes, as it certainly was for the establishment of schismatic altars in Dan and Bethel (1 Kings xii, 28). Many travelers have suggested that Samaria, which afterwards became the metropolis of the separated kingdom, was far preferable to Jerusalem for the site of a capital city; and its central situation would also have been in its favor as a metropolis for all the tribes. But as the choice of David was so firmly confirmed by the divine government, which made Mount Moriah the site of the Temple, we are bound to consider the choice as having been providentially ordered with reference to the contingencies that afterwards arose, by which Jerusalem was made the capital of the separate kingdom of Judah, for which it was well adapted. See JERUSALEM.

The promise made to David received its accomplishment when Solomon built his Temple upon Mount Moriah, B.C. 1010. He also added towers to the walls, and otherwise greatly adorned the city. By him and his father Jerusalem had been made the imperial residence of the king of all Israel; and the place, often called "the house of Jehovah," constituted at the same time the residence of the King of kings, the supreme head of the theocratical state, whose viceroygers the human kings were taught to regard themselves. It now began, for that was the true centre of the Levites, to a particular tribe: it was the centre of all civil anarchy, the very place of which Moses spoke, Deut. xii, 5: "The place which the Lord your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put his name there, even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come" (comp. Luke viii, 14; xiv, 20; xvi, 11-16; Ps. cxxvii). See SOLOMON.

Jerusalem was not, indeed, politically important: it was not the capital of a powerful empire directing the affairs of other states, but it stood high in the bright prospects foretold by David when declaring his faith in the coming of a Messiah (Ps. ii, 6; 12; lxiii, 8; 12, 16-26; Ec. ii, 2).

In all these passages the name Zion is used, which, although properly applied to the southernmost part of the city of Jerusalem, is often in Scripture put poetically for Jerusalem generally, and sometimes for Mount Moriah and its Temple. See ZION.

The importance and splendor of Jerusalem were considerably lessened after the death of Solomon, under his son Rehoboam whose ten years' tenor, through the prophet Nathan (2 Sam. vii, 10), "I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own and move no more," B.C. 943. From this it would seem that even David had, then at least, no assurance that Jerusalem would be the place. It had so often been spoken of as that which God would choose for the central seat of the theocratical monarchy, and which it became after Solomon's Temple had been built. See TEMPLE.

After this time the history of Jerusalem is continued in the history of Judah, for which the second book of the Kings and of the Chronicles are the principal sources of information. After the time of Solomon, the kingdom of Judah was almost absolutely ruled by good kings, "who did that which was right in the sight of the Lord," and by such as were idolatrous and evil-disposed; and the reign of the same kind often varied, and was by turns good or evil. The condition of the kingdom, as of the nation in general, was very much affected by these mutations. Under good kings the city flourished, and under bad kings it suffered greatly. Under Rehoboam (q. v.) it was conquered by Shishak (q. v.), king of Egypt, who pillaged the treasures of the Temple (2 Chron. xii, 9); B.C. 970. Under Jeroboam (q. v.) it became the capital of the kingdom of Israel, who broke down four hundred cubits of the wall of the city, and took all the gold and silver, and all the vessels that were found in the Temple (2 Kings xiv, 13, 14); B.C. 880. Uzziah (q. v.), son of Amaziah, who at first reigned well, built towers in Jerusalem at the corners of the walls, and brought water by a subterraneous aqueduct to the west side of the city (2 Chron. xxvi, 9, B.C. 713). But in the latter part of the same year he performed his most eminent service for the city: he built two more towers by the side of the wall, and fortified them (2 Chron. xxvi, 9, B.C. 713). His son, Jotham (q. v.), built the high gate of the Temple, and reared up many other structures (2 Chron. xxvii, 3, 4), B.C. 755. Hezekiah (q. v.) added to the honors of his reign that of an improver of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxii, 8, B.C. 725). At a later date, however, he depopulated the Temple in some degree in order to pay the levy imposed by the king of Assyria (2 Kings xviii, 15, 16); B.C. 713. But in the latter part of the same year he performed his most eminent service for the city: he built two more towers by the side of the wall, and bringing its waters by a subterraneous aqueduct to the west side of the city (2 Chron. xxxii, 30). This work is inferred, from 2 Kings xx, to have been of great importance to Jerusalem, as it cut off a supply of water from any besieging enemy, and bestowed it upon the inhabitants of the city. The immediate occasion was the threatened invasion by the Assyrians. See SASSANIAN.

Hezekiah's son, Manasseh (q. v.), was punished by a capture of the city in consequence of his idolatrous desecration of the Temple (2 Chron. xxxiii, 11), B.C. 690; but in his later and best years he built a strong and very high wall on the east side of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxiii, 14). The works in the city connected with the names of the succeeding kings of Judah were, so far as recorded, confined to the defilement of the house of the Lord by bad kings, and its purgation by good kings, the most important of the latter being the repairing of the walls and the rebuilding of the Temple by Nehemiah (2 Kings xxii, 20-22; ii Kings xxv, 23), B.C. 660, and again (2 Kings xxiv, 13), B.C. 627. Finally, after a siege of three years, Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, who razed its walls, and destroyed its Temple and palaces with fire (2 Kings xxiv; 2 Chron. xxxvi; Jer. xxxix, B.C. 588. Thus was Jerusalem smitten with the calamity which Moses had prophesied would befall it if the people would not keep the com-Ancient Assyrian delineation of a hostile city resembling Jerusalem in situation.

“the people shouted for joy, but many of the Levites who had seen the Temple in Jerusalem wept with a loud voice” (Ezra iii, 2, 12). When the Samaritans expressed a wish to share in the pious labor, Zerubbabel declined the offer, and in revenge the Samaritans sent a deputation to King Artaxerxes of Persia, carrying a presentment in which Jerusalem was described as a rebellious city of old time, which, if rebuilt, and its walls set up again, would not pay toll, tribute, and custom, and would thus endanger the deputation succeeded, and the public revenue. The deputation succeeded, and Artaxerxes ordered that the building of the Temple should cease. The interruption thus caused lasted to the second year of the reign of Darius (Ezra iv, 24), when Zerubbabel and Joshua, supported by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, again resumed the work, and would not cease though cautioned by the governor of Judea, B.C. 529. On the matter coming before Darius Hyasaspis, and the Jews reminding him of the permission given by Cyrus, he decided in their favor, and also ordered that the expenses of the work should be defrayed out of the public revenue (Ezra vi, 8). In the sixth year of the reign of Darius the Temple was finished, when they kept the dedicatory festival with great joy, and next celebrated the Passover (Ezra vi, 15, 16, 19), B.C. 516. Afterwards, in the seventh year of the second Artaxerxes (Longimanus), Ezra, a descendant of Aaron, came up to Jerusalem, accompanied by a large number of Jews who had remained in Babylon, B.C. 459. He was highly patronized by the king, who not only made him a large present in gold and silver, but published a decree enjoining all treasurers of Judea speedily to do whatever Ezra should require of them; allowing him to collect money throughout the whole province of Babylon for the wants of the Temple at Jerusalem, and also giving him full power to appoint magistrates in his country to judge the people (Ezra vii, viii). At a later period, in the twentieth year of King Artaxerxes, Nehemiah, who was his cup-bearer, obtained permission to proceed to Jerusalem, and to complete the rebuilding of the city and its wall, which he happily accomplished, in spite of all the opposition which he received from the enemies of Israel (Neh. i, ii, iv, vi), B.C. 446. The city was then capacious and large, but the people in it were few, and many houses still lay in ruins (Neh. vii, 4). At Jerusalem dwelt the rulers of the people and “certain of the children of Judah and of the children of Benjamin;” but it was now determined that the rest of the people should cast lots to bring one of ten to the capital (Neh. xi, 1-4), B.C. cir. 440. On Nehemiah’s return, after several years’ absence to court, all strangers, Samaritans, Ammonites, Moabites, etc., were removed, to keep the chosen people from pollution; ministers were appointed to the Temple, and the service was performed according to the law of Moses (Ezra x; Neh. viii, xii, xiii), B.C. cir. 410. Of the Jerusalem thus by such great and long-continued exertions, very splendid prophecies were uttered by those prophets who flourished after the exile; the general purport of which was to describe the Temple and city as destined to be glorified far beyond the former, by the advent of the long and eagerly-expected Messiah, “the desire of all nations” (Zech. ix, 9; xii, 10, 11; xiii, 3; Hagg. ii, 6, 7; Mal. iii, 11). See Ezra; Nehemiah.

5. For the subsequent history of Jerusalem (which is closely connected with that of Palestine in general), down to its destruction by the Romans, we must draw chiefly upon Josephus and the books of the Maccabees.
It is said by Josephus (Ant. xi, 8) that when the dominion of this part of the world passed from the Persians to the Greeks, Alexander the Great advanced against Jerusalem to punish it for the fidelity to the Persians which it had manifested while he was engaged in the siege of Tyre. His hostile purposes, however, were soon abated, and he was disarmed of his presumptuous design by the appearance of a train of priests in sacred vestments. Alexander recognised in him the figure which in a dream had encouraged him to undertake the conquest of Asia. He therefore treated him with respect and reverence, spared the city against which his wrath had been kindled, and magnificently bestowed upon him the great priest and important privileges. The historian adds that the high-priest failed not to apprise the conqueror of those prophecies in Daniel by which his successors had been predict ed. The whole of this story is, however, liable to suspicion, from the absence of any notice of the circumstances in the histories of this campaign which we possess.

See Alexander the Great.

After the death of Alexander at Babylon (B.C. 324), Ptolemy surprised Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, when the Jews would not fight, plundered the city, and carried away a great number of the inhabitants, where, however, from the estimation in which the Jews of this period were held as citizens, important privileges were bestowed upon them (Joseph. Ant. xii, 1). In the contests which afterwards followed for the possession of Syria (including Palestine), Jerusalem does not appear to have been wanted by Ptolemy, and was not disputed when Ptolemy gave up Samaria, Acco, Joppa, and Gaza to P tage. The contest was ended by the treaty in B.C. 302, which annexed the whole of Palestine, together with Arabia Petraea and Osroene to Egypt. Under easy subjection to the Ptolemies, the Jews remained in much tranquillity for more than a hundred years, in which the principal incident, as regards Jerusalem itself, was the visit which was paid to it, in B.C. 245, by Ptolemy Euergetes, on his return from his victories in the East. He offered many sacrifices, and made magnificent presents to the Temple. In the wars between Antiochus the Great and the King of Egypt, (from B.C. 221 to 197,) Judea could not fail to suffer severely; but we are not acquainted with any incident in which Jerusalem was principally concerned till the alleged visit of Ptolemy Philopator in B.C. 211. He offered sacrifices, and gave a great sum to the Temple, but, venturing to enter the sanctuary in spite of the remonstrances of the high priest, he was seized with a supernatural dread, and fled in terror from the place. It is said that on his return to Egypt he vented his rage on the Jews of Alexandria in a very barbarous manner. See Alexandria. But the whole story of this visit and its result rests upon the sole authority of the third book of Maccabees (chap. i. and ii.), and is therefore not entitled to implicit credit. Towards the end of this war the Jews seemed to favor the cause of Antiochus; and after he had subdued the neighboring country, they voluntarily tendered their submission, and rendered their assistance in expelling the Egyptian garrison from Mount Zion. For this conduct they were rewarded by many important privileges by Antiochus. He issued decrees directing, among other things, that the outworks of the Temple should be completed, and that all the materials for needful repairs should be exempted from taxes. The temple was also to be respected. No foreigner was to pass the sacred walls, and the city itself was to be protected from pollution; it being strictly forbidden that the flesh or skins of any beasts which the Jews accounted unclean should be brought into the city (Joseph. Ant. xii, 3, 3). These were very liberal concessions to what the king himself must have regarded as the prejudices of the Jewish people.

Under their new masters the Jews enjoyed for a time nearly as much tranquillity as under the generally benign and liberal government of the Ptolemies. But in B.C. 176, Seleucus Philopator, hearing that great treas ures were hoarded up in the Temple, and being distressed for money to carry on his wars, sent his treasurer, Heliodorus, to bring away these treasure. This personage is reported to have been so frightened and stricken by an apparition that he relinquished the attempt, and Seleucus left the Jews in the undisturbed possession of their holy places. (Joseph. Ant. xii, 3, 3.) His brother and successor, Antiochus Epiphanes, however, was of another mind. He took up the design of reducing them to a conformity of manners and religion with other nations; or, in other words, of abolishing those distinctive features which made the Jews a people. This project was carried on with all possible vigour and in various ways. The design was odious to the great body of the people, although there were many among the higher classes who regarded it with favor. Of this way of thinking was Menelaus, whom Antiochus had made high-priest, and who was expelled by the orthodox Jews with ignominy, in B.C. 169, when they heard the joyful news that Antiochus had been slain in Egypt. The rumor proved untrue, and Antiochus, on his return, punished them by plundering and profaning the Temple. Wero evils befell them two years after; for Antiochus, out of honor at being overthrown by the king of Egypt, signed an alliance with Egypt, sent his chief collector of tribute, Apollonius, with a detachment of 22,000 men, to vent his rage on Jerusalem. This person plundered the city and razed its walls, with the stones of which he built a citadel that commanded the Temple Mount. A statute of general amnesty was declared by Judas Maccabeus, the king of the Jews, the observances of the Jewish law were abolished, and a persecution was commenced against all who adhered to these observances, and refused to sacrifice to idols. Jerusalem was deserted by priests and people, and the daily sacrifice at the altar was entirely discontinued (1 Mac. iv, 40; 2 Mac. ii, 41; Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 4). See Antiochus Epiphanes.

This led to the celebrated revolt of the Maccabees, who, after an arduous and sanguinary struggle, obtained possession of Jerusalem (B.C. 168), and repaired and purified the Temple, which was then dilapidated and deserted. New utensils were supplied for the sacred services: the old altar, which had been polluted by heathen abominations, was taken away, and a new one erected. The sacrifices were then recommenced, exactly three years after the Temple had been dedicated to Jupiter Olympus. The castle, however, remained in the hands of the Ptolemies, and long continued to be the residence of the Jews, although Judas Maccabeus surrounded the Temple with a high and strong wall, furnished with towers, in which soldiers were stationed to protect the worshippers from the Syrian garrison (1 Mac. i, 56, 57; Joseph. Ant. xii, 5). Eventually the annoyance grew so intolerable that Judas laid siege to the castle. This attempt brought a powerful army into the country under the command of the regent Lysias, who, however, being constrained to turn his arms elsewhere, made peace with the Jews; but when he was admitted into the city, and observed the strength of the place, he threw down the walls in violation of the treaty (1 Mac. i, 48-65). In the ensuing war with the Syracilians, the general of Demetrius Soter, in which Judas was slain, the Syrians strengthened their citadel, and placed in it the sons of the principal Jewish families as hostages (1 Mac. x, 17; 2 Mac. iv, 26, 27). After the death of the latter (B.C. 159) the temporizing high-priest Akinmus directed the wall which separated the court of Israel from that of the Gentiles to be cast down, to afford the latter free access to the Temple; but he was seized with pain by the report of what had been done, and died in great agony (1 Mac. ix, 51-57). When a few years later, Demetrius and Alexander Balas sought to outbid each other for the support of Jonathan, the hostages in the castle were released; and subsequently all the Syrian garrisons in Judaea were evacuated, excepting those of Jerusalem and Bethhoron, which were chiefly occupied by apostate Jews, who were afraid to leave their places of The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans did not cause the site to be utterly forsaken. Titus (q.v.) left there in garrison the whole of the tenth legion, besides several squadrons of cavalry and cohorts of foot. For these troops, and for those who ministered to their wants, there must have been dwellings; and there is no reason to suppose that such Jews or Christians as appeared to have taken no part in the war were forbidden or unable to make their abodes among the ruins, and so build up so far as their necessities might require. But nothing like a restoration of the city could have arisen from this, as it was not likely that any but poor people, who found an interest in supplying the wants of the garrison, or were likely to be rewarded by the success of the city under such circumstances. However, we learn from Jerome that for fifty years after its destruction, until the time of Hadrian, there still existed remnants of the city. But during all this period there is no mention of it in history.

Up to A.D. 191 the Jews remained tolerably quiet, although apparently awaiting any favourable opportunity of shaking off the Roman yoke. The then emperor, Hadrian (q.v.), seems to have been aware of this state of feeling, and, among other measures of precaution, ordered Jerusalem to be rebuilt as a fortified place where-with to keep in check the whole Jewish population. The works had been made so strong that it was impossible to endure the idea that their holy city should be occupied by foreigners, and that strange gods should be set up within it, broke out into open rebellion under the notorious Barchochebas (q.v.), who claimed to be the Messiah. His success was at first very great, but he was crushed before the tremendous power of the Romans, so soon as it could be brought to bear upon him; and a war scarcely inferior in horror to that under Ves pasian and Titus was, like it, brought to a close by the capture of Jerusalem, of which the Jews had obtained possession. This was in A.D. 155, from which period Jerusalem remained in Roman hands.

The Romans then finished the city according to their first intention. It was made a Roman colony, inhabited wholly by foreigners, the Jews being forbidden to approach it on pain of death: a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus was erected on Mount Moriah, and the old name of Jerusalem was sung to be supplanted by that of Aelia Capitolina, conferred upon it in honor of the emperor El Cias Hadrianus and Jupiter Capitolinus. By this name was the city known till the time of Constantine, when that of Jerusalem again became current, still its civic designation, and remained such so late as A.D. 386, when it was described in the acts of a synod held there. This name even passed to the Mohammedans, by whom it was long retained; and it was not till after they recovered the city from the Crusaders that it became generally known among them by the name of El-Khuds—"the holy"—which it still bears.

7. From the rebuilding by Hadrian the history of Jeru salem is almost a blank till the time of Constantine, when its history, as a place of extreme solicitude and interest to the Christian Church, properly begins. Pilgrimages to the Holy City now became common and popular. Such a pilgrimage was undertaken in A.D. 326 by the emperor's mother Helena, then in the eightieth year of her age, who built churches on the alleged site of the nativity at Bethlehem, and of the resurrection on the Mount of Olives. This example may probably have excited in her son the desire to visit in person the holy sepulchre, and to the erection of a church thereon. He removed the temple of Venus, with which, in studied insult, the site had been encumbered. The holy sepulchre was then purified, and a magnificent church was, by his order, built over and around the sacred spot. Moreover, the ceremonial of the Holy Year was conducted with great solemnity in A.D. 335. There is no doubt that the spot thus singled out is the same that has ever since been regarded as the place in which Christ was entombed; but the correctness of the identification then made has of late years been much disputed, on grounds which have been examined in the article Gozgothis. The very cross on which our Lord suffered was also, in the course of these explorations, believed to have been discovered, under the circumstances which have elsewhere been described. See CROSS.

By Constantine the edict excluding the Jews from the city of their fathers' sepulchres was so far repealed that they were allowed to enter it once a year to walk over the desolation of "the holy and beautiful house" in which their fathers worshipped God. When the nephelew of Constantine, the emperor Julian (q. v.), abandoned Christianity for the old Paganism, he endeavored, as a matter of policy, to conciliate the Jews. He allowed them free access to the city, and permitted them to rebuild their Temple. They accordingly began to lay the foundations in A.D. 362; but the speedy death of the emperor probably occasioned that abandonment of the attempt which contemporary writers ascribe to supernatural hinderances. The edicts seem then to have been renewed which excluded the Jews from the city, except on the anniversary of its capture, when they were allowed to enter the city and weep over it. Their appointed wailing-place remains, and their practice of wailing there continues to the present day. From St.

The Jews "Wailing-Place," in the western wall of the Haram enclosure.

James, the first bishop, to Jude II, who died A.D. 136, there had been a series of fifteen bishops of Jewish descent; and from Marcus, who succeeded Simeon, to Macarius, who presided over the Church of Jerusalem under Constantine, there was a series of twenty-three bishops of Gentile descent, but, beyond a bare list of their names, little is known of the Church or of the city of Jerusalem during the whole of this latter period.

In the conversion of Constantitine, the roads to Zion were thronged with pilgrims from all parts of Christendom, and the land abounded in monasteries, occupied by persons who wished to lead a religious life amid the scenes which had been sanctified by the Saviour's presence. After much struggle of con-Anarchate of Jerusalem. In the theological controtversies which followed the decision of that council with regard to the two natures of Christ, Jerusalem bore its share with the other Oriental churches, and two of its bishops were deposed by Monophysite fanatics. The Synod of Jerusalem in A.D. 536 confirmed the decree of the Synod of Constantinople against the Monophysites. See JERUSALEM, COUNCILS OF. In the same century it found a second Constantine in Justinian, who ascended the throne A.D. 527. He repaired and enriched the former structures, and built upon Mount Moriah a magnificent church to the Virgin, as a memorial of the persecution of Jesus in the Temple. He also founded ten or eleven convents for monks and nuns, and established a hospital for pilgrims in each of those cities.

In the following century, the Persians, who had long harassed the empire of the East, penetrated into Syria, and in A.D. 614, under Chosroes II, after defeating the forces of the emperor Heraclius, took Jerusalem by storm.
Many thousands of the inhabitants were slain, and much of the city, including the finest churches—that of the Holy Sepulchre among them—was destroyed. When the conquerors withdrew they took away the principal inhabitants, the patriarch, and the true cross; but when, the year after, peace was concluded, these were restored, and the emperor Heraclius entered Jerusalem in solemn state, bearing the cross upon his shoulders.

The damage occasioned by the Persians was speedily repaired. But Arabia soon furnished a more formidaable enemy in the khilif Omar, whose troops appeared before Syria. The battle of the Yarmuk (A.D. 636, Arafa, and Edessa) was a decisive blow to the existence of the Moslems having already been brought under the Moslem yoke.
After a long siege the asture khilif himself came to the camp, and the city was at length surrendered to him in A.D. 637. The conqueror of mighty kings entered the holy city clad in the armor of cameo, and conducted himself with much discretion and generous forbearance. By his orders the magnificent mosque which still bears his name was built upon Mount Moriah, upon the site of the Jewish Temple.

6. Jerusalem remained in possession of the Arabs, and was long visited by Christian pilgrims from Europe till the year 1000, when a general belief that the second coming of the Saviour was near at hand drew pilgrims in unwonted crowds to the Holy Land, and created an impulse for pilgrimages thither which ceased not to act after the first exciting cause had been forgotten. The Moslem government, in order to derive some profit from this enthusiasm, imposed the tribute of a piece of gold as the price of entrance into the holy city. The sight, by such large numbers, of the holy place in the hands of infidels, the exaction of tribute, and the insults to which the pilgrims, often of the highest rank, were exposed from the Moslem rabble, excited an extraordinary ferment in Europe, and led to those remarkable expeditions for recovering the Holy Sepulchre from the Mohammedans which, under the name of the Crusades, will always fill a most important and curious chapter in the history of the world. (See Gibbon's "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." See CRUSADES.

The dominion over Palestine had passed in A.D. 690 from the khilifs of Bagdad to the Fatimite khilifs of Egypt, and these in their turn were displaced in A.D.
1079 by the Turkomans, who had usurped the powers of the Eastern khilifs. The severities exercised by these more fierce and uncivilized Moslems upon both the native Christians and the European pilgrims supplied the immediate impulse to the first Eastern expedition. But by the time the Crusaders, under Godfrey of Bouillon, appeared before Jerusalem, on the 17th of June, 1099, the Egyptian khilifs had recovered possession of Palaetine, and driven the Turkomans beyond the Euphrates.
After a siege of forty days, the holy city was taken by storm on the 15th day of July, and a dreadful mas-acre of the Moslem inhabitants followed with in-discrimination of age or sex. As soon as order was restored, and the city cleared of the dead, a regular government was established by the election of Godfrey as king of Jerusalem. One of the first cares of the new monarch was to dedicate anew to the Lord the place where his presence had once abode, and the Mosque of Omar be-more sounded over the city. From that time to the present day the holy city has remained, with slight interruption, in the hands of the Moslems. On the threatened siege by Richard of England in 1192, Saladin took great pains in strengthening its defences. New walls and bulwarks were erected, and deep trenches cut, and in six months the town was stronger than it ever had been, and the works had the firmness and solidity of a rock. But in A.D. 1219, the sultan Mulek el-Maoudin of Damascus, who then had possession of Jerusalem, ordered all the walls and towers to be demolished, except the citadel and the inclosure of the mosque, lest the Franks should again become masters of the city and find a place of strength. In this desperate state Jerusalem continued till it was delivered over to the Christians in consequence of a treaty with the emperor Frederick II, in A.D. 1229, with the understanding that the walls should not be rebuilt. Yet ten years later (A.D. 1239) the barons and knights of Jerusalem began to build the walls anew, and to erect a strong fortress on the west of the city. But the works were interrupted by the emir David of Kerak, who seized the city, strangulated the Christian inhabitants, and cast down the newly erected walls and fortress. Four years after, however (A.D. 1240), Jerusalem was again made over to the Christians without any restriction, and the works appear to have been restored and completed; for they are mentioned as existing when the city was stormed by the wild Kharianian hordes in the following year, shortly after which the city reverted for the last time into the hands of its Mohammedan masters, who have substantially kept it to the present day, although in 1277 Jerusalem was nominally annexed to the kingdom of Sicily.

9. From this time Jerusalem appears to have sunk very much in political and military importance, and it is scarcely named in the history of the Mameluke sultans who reigned over Egypt and the greater part of Syria in the 14th and 15th centuries. At length, with the rest of Syria and Egypt, it passed under the sway of the Turkish sultan Selim I in 1517, who paid a hasty visit to the holy city from Damascus after his return from Egypt. From that time Jerusalem has formed a part of the Ottoman Empire, and during this period has been subject to few vicissitudes; its history is accordingly barren of incident. The present walls of the city were erected by Suleiman the Magnificent, the successor of Selim, in A.D. 1542, as is attested by an inscription over the Jaffa gate. As lately as A.D. 1609, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was partially consumed by fire; but the damage was repaired with great labor and expense by September, 1810, and the traveller now finds in this imposing fabric no traces of that calamity.

In A.D. 1892 Jerusalem became subject to Mohammed Ali, the pasha of Egypt, the holy city opening its gates to him without a siege. During the great insurrection in the districts of Jerusalem and Galilee in 1834, the insurgents seized upon Jerusalem, and held possession of it for a time; but by the vigorous operations of the government order was soon restored, and the city reverted quietly to its allegiance on the approach of Ibrahim Pasha with his troops. In 1841 Mohammed Ali was deprived of all his Syrian possessions by European interference, and Jerusalem was again subjected to the Turkish government, under which it now remains.

In the same year took place the establishment of a Protestant bishopric at Jerusalem by the English and Prussian governments, and the erection upon Mount Zion of a church calculated to hold 500 persons, for the celebration of divine worship according to the ritual of the English Church. See JERUSALEM, SAX (below).

In 1890 a dispute about the guardianship of the holy places between the monks of the Greek and Latin churches, in which Nicholas, emperor of Russia, sided with the Greeks, and Louis Napoleon, emperor of the French, with the Latins, led to a decision of the question. by the Porte, which was unsatisfactory to Russia, and which resulted in a war of considerable magnitude, known as "the Crimean War," between that country on the one side, and the allied forces of England and France on the other. This war has led to greater liberties of all classes of citizens in the enjoyment of their religious faith, and to a partial adjustment of the rival claims of the Greek and Latin monks to certain portions of the holy places; it has also resulted in much more freedom towards Frank travellers in visiting the city, so that even ladies have been allowed to enter the mosque in cloisters; but it has caused no material alteration in the city or in its political relations.

II. Ancient Topography.—This has been a subject of no little dispute among antiquarian geomorphers. We prefer here briefly to state our own independent conclusions, with the authority on which each point rests, and we shall therefore but incidentally notice the controversies, which will be found discussed under the several heads elsewhere in this Cyclopedia.

1. Natural Features.—These, of course, are mostly the same in all ages, as the surface of the region where Jerusalem is situated is generally limestone rock. Yet the wear of the elements has no doubt caused some minor changes, and the demolition of large buildings successively has affected very considerable differences of level by the accumulation of rubbish in the hollows, and even on some of the hills; while in some cases high spots were ancient platforms partially filled in and artificial platforms and terraces formed, and in others deep trenches or massive structures have left their traces to this day.

(A.) Hills.—(1) Mount Zion, frequently mentioned in the Old Testament, only once in the New (Rev. xiv, 1), called the "City of the Great King" (War., v, 4, 1), was divided by a valley (Tyropoion) from another hill opposite (Acre), than which it was "higher, and in length more direct" (ibid.). It is almost universally assigned, in modern times, as the south-western hill of the city. See Zion.

(2) Mount Moriah, mentioned in 2 Chron. iii, 1, as the site of the Temple, is unmistakable in all ages. Originally, according to Josephus (War., v, 5, 1), the summit was small, and the platform was enlarged by Solomon, who built up a high stone terrace wall on three sides (east, south, and west), leaving a tremendous precipice at the (south-eastern) corner (Ant., xv, 11, 3 and 5). Some of the lower courses of these stones are still standing. See Moriah.

(3) The hill Acre is so called by Josephus, who says it "sustained the Lower City, and was of the shape of a moon when she is lorned," or a crescent (War., v, 4, 1). It was separated from another hill (Betsitha) by a broad valley, which the Asmonæans partly filled up with earth taken from the top of Acre, so that it might be made lower than the Temple (ibid.). Concerning the position of this hill there is much dispute, which can only be settled by the location of the valleys on either side of it (see Cassiari, in the Stud. et Crit. ii, 1864). See ACRE.

(4) The hill Betsitha, interpreted by Josephus as meaning "New City," placed by him opposite Acre, and stated to be originally lower than it, is said by him also to lie over against the tower Antonia, from which it was separated by a deep fosse (War., v, 4, 1 and 2). See Betsitha.

(5) Ophel is referred to by Nehemiah (iii, 26, 27), as well as by Josephus (War., v, 4, 2), in such connection with the walls as to show that none other can be intended than the ridge of ground sloping to a point southward from the Temple area. See OPHEL.

(6) Calvary, or more properly Golgotha, was a small eminence, mentioned by the evangelists as the place of the crucifixion. Modern tradition assigns it to the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, but this is greatly contested by Josephus (ibid.) and even by the question turns chiefly upon the course of the second wall, outside of which the crucifixion undoubtedly took place (John xix, 17). See CALVARVY.

(7) The Mount of Olives is so often referred to by Josephus, as well as in the Bible, that it can be taken for no other than that which now passes under the same name. See OLIVER.

(8) Scopus is the name assigned by Josephus to an elevated plain about seven furlongs distant from the city wall in a northerly direction (War., ii, 19, 4; v, 2, 8), an interval that was leveled by Titus on his approach from Samaria (ibid., iii, 2). By this can this is foreshadowed perhaps the rocky prominences on the southern, or those on the northern edge of that part of the valley of Jehoshaphat which sweeps around the city on the north, for the former are too near, and the latter intercepted by the valley; but rather the gentle slope on the north-west of the city.

Besides these, there is mentioned in Jer. xxxi, 39, "the hill Garbeh," apparently somewhere on the north-west of the city, and Goath, possibly an eminence on the west. "Mount Gilon," so confidently laid down on certain maps of the ancient city, is a modern invention.

(B.) Valleys.—(1) The principal of these was the one termed by Josephus that of the Tyropoion, or Cheese-makers, running between Zion and Acre, down as far as Siloam (War., v, 4, 1). The southern part of this is still clearly to be traced, although much choked up by the accumulated rubbish of ages; but to the northern part there is considerable discrepancy. Some (as Dr. Robinson) make it bend around the northern brow of Zion, and so end in the shallow depression between that hill and the eminence of the Holy Sepulchre; while others (Williams, with whose views in the main I coincide) carry it directly north, through the depression along the western side of the mosque area, and eastward of the church, in the direction of the Damascus Gate. See Tyropoion.

(2) The only other considerable valley within the city was that above referred to as lying between Acre and Betsitha. The language of Josephus, in the passage where he mentions this valley (War., v, 4, 1), has been understood by some as only applicable to the upper portion of that which is above regarded as the Tyropoion, because he calls it "a broad valley," which is the broadest in that vicinity. But the Jewish historian only says that the hills Acre and Betsitha were "formerly divided by a broad valley; but in those times when the Asmonæans reigned, they filled up that valley with earth, and had a mind to join the city to the Temple: they then took off a part of the height of Acre, and reduced it to a less elevation than it was before, that the Temple might be superior to it." From this it is clear that in the times of Josephus this valley was not so distinct as formerly, so that we must not look for it in the plain and apparently unchanged depression west of the Temple, but rather in the chinked and obscure one running northward from the middle of the northern side of the present mosque enclosure. The union of the city and Temple across this valley is also more explicable on this ground, because it not only implies a nearly level passage effected between the Temple area and that part of the city west of it, but it also intimates that there had previously been no special passage-way there—whereas on the west the Temple was connected with Zion by a bridge or causeway, besides at least two other easy avenues to the parts of the city in that direction.

(3) The longest and deepest of the valleys outside the walls was the Valley of Jehoshaphat, which ran along the entire eastern and north-eastern side, forming the bed of the brook Kidron. Respecting the identity of this, the modern name leaves no room for dispute. See JEHOSHAPHAT VALLEY OF.

(4) On the south side was the Valley ben-Hinnom.
of the same as that called by Josephus "the fountain in the king's garden" (Ant. vii, 14, 4). Its water is peculiar, but no underground connection has been traced with any other of the fountains. See En-rogel.

(2.) Siloam or Shiloah is mentioned in the Old and New Testaments also as Shiloah, and the latter indicates its site at the mouth of the Valley of Tyropoeon (War, v, 4, 1). It is identical with the modern fount of Selwan. See Siloam.

(3.) The only remaining one of the three natural springs about Jerusalem is that now known as the Fountain of St. Mary (now ed-Der'a), said to be the source of the Pool of Siloam. It is intermittent, the overflow apparently of the Temple supply; and it is connected by a passage through the rock with the Pool of Siloam (Robinson, Researches, i, 502 sq.). It is apparently the same with the "king's pool" (Neh. ii, 14; comp. iii, 16) and "Solomon's Pool" (Josephus, War, v, 4, 2). This we are inclined (with Lightfoot and Robinson) to identify with the "Pool of Bethesda" in John v, 2. See Bethesda.

There are several other wells adjoining the Temple area which have the peculiar taste of Siloam, but whether they proceed from a living spring under Moriah, or are conducted thither by the aqueduct from Bethlehem, or come from some distant source, future explorations can alone determine. Some such well has, however, lately been discovered, but how far it supplies these various springs has not yet been fully determined (Jour. Sac. Lit. April, 1864). See Solomon's Pool.

(E.) Reservoirs, Tanks, etc.—(1) The Upper Pool of Gihon, mentioned in Isa. vii, 3; 2 Chron. xxix, 30, etc., can be no other than that now found in the northern part of the valley of the west of the city. This is probably what is called the "Dragon Well" by the Nehemiah (ii, 13), lying in that direction. Josephus also incidentally mentions a "Serpent's Pool" as lying on the northwestern side of the city (War, v, 3, 2), which the similarity of name and position seems to identify with this.

See Gihon.

(2.) The Lower Pool (of Gihon), referred to in Isa. xxii, 9, is also probably that situated in the southern part of the same valley. See Pool.

(3.) There still exists on the western side of the city another pool, which is frequently termed the Pool of Hezekiah, and the supposition that it is the one intended to hold the water which that king is said (2 Kings xx, 20; 2 Chron. xxix, 30) to have brought down to the city by a conduit from the upper pool. It is to this day so connected by an aqueduct, which renders the identification probable. But it does not follow (as some argue) that this pool was within the second wall in the time of Christ, if, indeed, it ever lay strictly within the city; the statements above referred to only show that it was designed as a reservoir for supplying the inhabitants, especially on Mount Zion, within the bounds of which it could never have been embraced. This pool is perhaps also the same as one mentioned by Josephus, under the title of A mygdalon, as opposite the third of the towers of the wall, then standing on the north-eastern corner towards the Dead Sea. The brook Kedron was the principal of these, and is mentioned in both the Old and New Testaments (2 Sam. xv, 22; John xviii, 1), and by Josephus (War, v, 2, 9), as lying between the city and the Mount of Olives. See Kedron.

(F.) The First or Old Wall.—Josephus's account of this is as follows: "Beginning on the north from the tower Hippicus (so called), and extending to the Xyurus (so called), thence touching the council- [house], it joined the western cloister of the Temple; but in the other direction, on the west, beginning from the same tower, and extending through the place Bethus (so called) to the house of the water communication above the fountain Siloam, and thence again leaning on the east to the Pool of Solomon, and reaching as far as a certain place which they call Ophla, it joined the eastward cloister of the Temple." It was defended by sixty towers (ibid. § 3), probably at equal distances, and of the same average dimensions (but probably somewhat smaller than those of the outer wall), exclusive of the three towers specially described.

(1.) The north side it began at the Tower of Hippicus. This has been with great probability identified with the site of the present citadel or Castle of David, at the north-western corner of Zion. This tower is stated by Josephus to have been 25 cubits (about 45 feet square), and solid to the height of 30 cubits (War, v, 4,3). At the north-western corner of the modern citadel is a tower 45 feet square, cut on three sides to a great height out of the solid rock, which (with Mr. Williams) we think can be no other than Hippicus. This is probably the tower at the Valley Gate mentioned in 2 Chron. xxvi, 9. See Hillerius c.
(2.) Not far from Hippicus, on the same wall, Josephus places the Tower of Phasaelus, with a solid base of 40 cubits (about 73 feet) square as well as high (ibid.). To this the tower on the north-eastern corner of the modern citadel so nearly corresponds (its length being 70 feet, and its breadth now shortened to 56 feet, the rest having probably been masonry), that they cannot well be regarded as other than identical.
(3.) Not far from this again, Josephus locates the Tower of Mariamne, 20 cubits (about 36 feet) square and high (ibid.). This we incline (with Mr. Williams) to place about the same distance east of Phasaelus.
(4.) The Gate Germath (i.e. "garden"), distinctly stated by Josephus as belonging to the first wall (War, v, 4, 2), apparently not far east of Mariamne. The arch now known by this name, near the south end of the bazaars, evidently is comparatively recent. See Gennath.

Modern "Gate of Germath," explored by Lieutenant Warren in his excavations at Jerusalem. (From Tracing of Feb. 1, 1857, of the "Palestine Exploration Fund.")

(5.) There is another "oboeure gate" referred to by Josephus, as lying near Hippicus, through which the Jews made a sally upon the Romans (War, v, 6; vi, 5). This could not have been on the north side, owing to the precipice. It must be the same as that through which he says elsewhere (ibid. vii, 5) water was brought to the tower Hippicus, evidently from the Upper and Lower Pools, or from Siloam. It can therefore only be located just south of Hippicus. It appears to be identical with that mentioned in the Old Testament as the 17th gate of Zion (Neh, iii, 13 or compare 2 Chron. xxvi, 9; xxvii, 14).

(6.) On the southern side of this wall we next come (omitting "Betho" for the present) to Josephus's "Gate of the Essentials." This we should naturally expect to find opposite the modern Zion Gate; but as the ancient citadel is in more of this hill than the modern (for the Tomb of David is now outside), we must look for it along the brow of Zion at the south-west corner. Here, accordingly, the Dung-gate is mentioned in Neh. ii, 13, and iii, 13, as lying next to the Valley-gate; and in this latter passage it is placed at 1900 cubits (1820 feet) from it—the accordance of the modern distance with which may be considered as a strong verification of the correctness of the position of both these gates. The Dung-gate is also referred to in Neh. xii, 31, as the first (after the Valley-gate, out of which the company appear to have emerged) toward the right (i.e. south) from the north-west corner of the city (i.e. facing the wall on the outside).

From this point, the escarpments still found in the rock indicate the line of the wall as passing along the southern brow of Zion, as Josephus evidently means. Beyond this, he says it passed above the fountain Siloam, as indeed the turn in the edge of Zion here requires.

(7.) At this south-east corner of Zion probably stood the Pottery-gate, mentioned (Jer. xix, 2, where it is mistranslated "east-gate") as leading into the Valley of Hinnom; and it apparently derived its name from the "Potter's Field," lying opposite. See Potter's Field.

Beyond this, it becomes more difficult to trace the line indicated by Josephus. His language plainly implies that in skirting the southern brow of Zion it curved sufficiently to exclude the Pool of Siloam, although it has been strongly contended by some that this fountain must have been within the city.

(8.) At the mouth of the Tyropeon we should naturally look for a gate, and accordingly we find mention of a Fountain-gate along the Valley of Hinnom beyond the Dung-gate (Neh. ii, 14; xii, 37), and adjoining the Pool of Siloam (Neh. iii, 10), which seems to fix its position with great certainty. The next bend beyond Siloam would naturally be at the termination of the ridge coming down from the Temple. From this point, according to Josephus, it curved so as to face the east, and extended to the Fountain of the Virgin (Solomon's Pool), thus passing along the verge of Ophel. If this fountain really be the Pool of Bethesda, we must locate it near the city.

The line of the wall, after this, according to Josephus, ran more definitely upon the edge of Ophel (thus implying a slight bend to the east), and continued along it till it reached the Temple. We are not compelled, by his language, to carry it out to the extreme south-eastern corner of the Temple area, because of the deep precipice which lay there (Am. xv, 11, 4). Just so, the modern wall comes up nearly in the middle of the south side of this area. The ancient point of intersection has been discovered by the recent excavations of the English engineers. (See the sketch of Ophel above.)

From this account of the first wall, we should naturally conclude that Josephus's Upper City included the Tyropeon as well as Ophel; but from other passages it is certain that the Zion wall had a separate wall on its eastern brow, and that Josephus here only means to speak of the outer wall around the west, south, and east. Thus he states (War, vi, 7, 2) that, after the destruction of the Temple, the Romans, having seized and burned the whole Lower City as far as Siloam, were still compelled to make special efforts to dislodge the Jews from the Upper City; and from his account of the banks raised for this purpose between the Xystus and the bridge (ibid. 8, 1), it is even clear that this wall extended around the north-eastern brow of Zion quite to the north part of the Tyropeon, leaving a gateway between the Upper City and the Temple. He also speaks (ibid. 6, 2) of the bridge as parting the tyrants in the Upper City from Titus in the western cloister of the Temple. This part of the Tyropeon was therefore inclosed by barriers on all its four sides, namely, by the wall on the west and north, by the Temple on the east, and by the Tyropeon on the south. The same conclusion of a branch from the outer wall, running up the western side of the Tyropeon, results from a careful inspection of the account of the repairs in Neh. iii. The historian there states that adjoining ("after him") the part repaired around the Fountain-gate at Siloah (verse 15) lay a portion extending opposite the "sepulchres of David" (verse 16). By these can only be meant the tomb of David, still extant on the crown of Zion, to which Peter alludes (Acts ii, 29) as existing in his day within the city. But we cannot suppose Nehemiah to be here returning along the wall in a westerly direction, and describing repairs which he had just attributed to others (verses 14 and 15); nor can he be speaking of the wall eastward of Siloam, which would in no sense be opposite David's tomb, but actually intercepted from it by the termination of Ophel: the only conclusion therefore is, that he is now proceeding along this branch wall northward, lying opposite the east end of the pool that was made," mentioned as situated here (verse 16), cannot therefore be meant either Siloam, or the Lower Pool, or even the Virgin's Fountain, but some tank in the valley, since filled up, probably the same with the "ditch made between the two walls for the water of the old pool" (Isa. xxv. 3), which might easily be connected (from either of the pools of Gilbon) to this spot, along the line of the present aqueduct from Bethlehem. Moreover, it was evidently along this branch wall ("the going up of the wall") that one party of the priests in Neh. xii, 37 ascended to meet the other. This double line of wall is also alluded to by this passage, but likewise by the escape of Zedekiah "by the way of the [Fountain-] Gate between the two walls, which is by the king's garden" (i.e. around Siloam), in the direction of the plain leading to Jericho (2 Kings xxxv. 4, 5; Jer. xxix. 4; ii. 7). From 2 Chron. xxvii. 3, and xxviii. 14, we know that Ophel was fortified by a separate wall. We will now endeavor to trace this branch wall around to the Temple and to the gate Gennath as definitely as the intricate account in Nehemiah, together with other scattered notices, will allow.

We may take it for granted that this part of the wall would leave the other at the south-eastern corner of Zion, near the Pottery-gate, where the hill is steep, and keep along the declivity throughout its whole extent, for the sake of more perfect defence. There were stairs in this wall just above the wall that continued to the Fountain-gate (Neh. xii. 37; ii. 14), which might easily be completed at least a small gate there, as they led into the Upper City. They would naturally be placed within the outer wall for the sake of security, and at the eastern side of this corner of Zion, where the rock is still precipitous (although the stairs have disappeared), so that they afford a line of real communication to the wall in this passage.

(10.) Above the Sepulchre of David, and beyond "the pool that was made," Nehemiah (chap. iii, 16) places "the house of the mighty," apparently a Giants' Tower, to defend the wall. Immediately north of this we may conjecture occurring opposite the modern Zion-gate, and over against the ancient Sheep-gate, although the steepness of the hill would prevent its general use.

Farrar north is apparently mentioned (Neh. iii, 19) another minor entrance, "the going up to the armory at the turning of the wall," meaning probably the bend in the brow of Zion opposite the south-western corner of the Temple, near where the bridge connected them. Farrar on, another "turning of the wall, even unto the corner," is mentioned (Neh. iii, 24), but in what direction, and how far off, cannot be determined with any degree of certainty. It may mean the junction with the wall of the bridge.

From this point it becomes impossible to trace the order pursued by Nehemiah in the rest of the third chapter, as he does not describe the wall from point to point, but mostly refers to certain objects opposite which they lay, as if he was speaking of the ground ("after him"). All that can be definitely gathered as to the consequent course of the wall is that, by various turns on different sides, its respective parts faced certain fixed points, especially the "tower lying out" (verses 25, 26, 27); that it terminated opposite the gate-gate verse 26; the "Horse-gate," verse 28; and the gate "Miphkalah," verse 31; that it joined Ophel (verse 27); and that it completed the circuit of walls in this direction (verse 32). It needs but a glance to see that all this strikingly agrees, in general, with the afore-mentioned inclosure in the valley of the Tyropoeon just above the bridge, which certainly embraced all the objects referred to by Nehemiah, as we shall see; and this fact of the quadrilateral form of these portions of the wall will best account for the apparent confusion of this part of his statement (as our total ignorance of many of the elements of elucidation makes it now seem), as well as his repeated use of the peculiar mode of description, "over against the house of David," etc. (as the presumed line, which the nature of the ground seems to require, and identify the points as they occur, trusting to the naturalness with which they may fall in with our scheme for its vindication.

After leaving the bend at the junction with the bridge, we should therefore indicate the course of the wall as follows: the natural declivity on the north-east edge of Zion in a gentle curve, till it joined the northern line of the old wall, about half way between the gate Gennath and the Temple. Indeed, the language of Nehemiah (xii, 37) implies that "the going up of the [branch] wall" extended "above the house of David" (i.e. the "king's house"), and thence bent "even unto the Water-gate eastwardly." (11.) On this part of the wall, at its junction with the bridge, we think we must place the Horse-gate (2 Kings xi, 15; 2 Chron. xxvi., 15; Neh. iii, 28; Jer. xxxi, 38-40) probably the same as the Sheep-gate (chap. iii, 28, 31, 32), an identity which the name favors—being literally Gate of reviewing, perhaps from the census being taken at this place of concourse, or (with the Vulgate) Gate of judgment, from its proximity to the prison.

(12.) The Second or Middle Wall.—Josephus' statement of the course of this wall is in these words: "But the second [wall] had (first) its beginning from the gate which they called Gennath, belonging to the first wall, and then, encircling the northern slope only, went up (on returned) as far as Antonia (War, iv, 2, 4). It had fourteen gates (of which) three were gate-gates, probably the same size as those of the outer wall. If we have correctly identified Acra, it must be this hill that Josephus calls "the northern slope;" and the direction of this will require that the wall, after leaving Gennath, should skirt the lowest edge of Golgotha in nearly a straight line, till it reached the upper end of the Tyropoeon, opposite the western edge of Acra. This direct course agrees with the absence of any special remark in Josephus respecting its line between these two points. Neither is there mention of any gate or tower along it, near Gennath nor to the west of Golgotha; so that (1.) The first point of note in this direction is the Tower of Furnaces, which may be located on the north-eastern slope of the elevation assumed to be that of Golgotha (Neh. iii, 8, 11, 13; xii, 38; comp. 2 Chron. xxvi., 9); and (2.) on the western bank of this entrance of the Tyropoeon should be situated the Corner-gate (compare Jer. xxxi, 38).

From this point the wall would run directly across the broad beginning of the Tyropoeon, to meet the north-western brow of Acra, which Josephus intimates it only served to guide. The water-gate, then, should be the Broad Wall, referred to in Neh. iii, 8; xii, 38, as lying here. A stronger wall would be needed here, as there was no natural breastwork of rock, and it was on this side that invaders always approached the city. Ac-
The eastern wall of the Temple area, which evidently served for that of the city, and connects Josephus's first and second walls on this part, we reserve for consideration under the head Temple.

(II.) The Third or Outer Wall. — This was not yet built in the days of Christ, having been begun by Herod Agrippa I about A.D. 43. Josephus's account of its course is in the following words (War, v, 4, 2): "The starting-point of the third [wall], however, was the tower Hippicus, whence stretching as far as the northern slope to the tower Psephinus, thence reaching opposite the Temple in identifying it with the foundations through the royal vaults, it bent in the first place with a corner tower to the (so-styled) Fuller's monument, and then joining the old circuit [i.e. the former wall], ended at the (so-called) valley Kedron." It inclosed that part of the New City, and was (in parts at least) ten cubits thick and twelve-five high (ibid.). It was defended by ninety towers twenty cubits square and high, two hundred cubits apart (ibid. 3).

(1.) The first mark, then, after leaving Hippicus, was the Tower Psephinus, described (ibid.) as being an octagon, seventy cubits high, at the north-west corner of the city, opposite Hippicus. It was situated quite off the direct road by which Titus approached the city from the north (ibid. ii, 2), and lay at a bend in the northern wall at its western limit (ibid. iii, 5). All these particulars agree with the descriptions of some ancient structure still clearly traceable on the north-western side of the modern city, opposite the Upper Pool. Indeed, the ruins scattered along the whole distance between this point and the present Jaffa-gate suffice to indicate the course of this part of the third wall along the rocky ridge of the Valley of Gibon. We therefore locate Psephinus opposite the southernmost two of four square foundations (apparently the towers at intervals) which we find marked on Mr. Williams's Plan, and indicating a salient point in the wall here, which is traceable on either side by a line of old foundations. These we take to be remnants of the part of this outer wall which Josephus says was begun with enormous stones, but was finished in an inferior manner on account of the emperor's jealousy (War, ut sup.). Although no gate is referred to along this part of the wall, yet there probably was not so far below Psephinus, where the path comes down at the north-west corner of the present city wall.

(2.) Between the tower Psephinus and the gate leading to the north-west were the Women's Towers, where a sallying party came near intercepting Titus (Joseph. War, v, 2; compare 3, 5). They appear to have issued from the gate and followed him to the towers.

(3.) Not very far beyond this, therefore, was the gate through which the above party emerged. This could have been no other than one along the present public road in this direction, a continuation of that leading through the Ephraim-gate up the head of the Tyropo-neciation with Antonia, through which he might pour soldiers into the heart of the Temple area as need required (Josephus, Ant. xv, 11, 7).

This will make out the circuit of the general tower of Antonia, the proper castle standing on the south-west corner, and thence extending a wing to reach the tower on the north-west corner; and the two towers on the east side being on the same basis as the base of the towers. It had gates doublets on all sides, but, besides that on the south (which will be considered under the Temple), there is distinct evidence of none except (9.) The Golden-gate, so called in modern times. It is a double-thebrian called Bezetha, or the New Haran, now closed up, but evidently a work of antiquity, from its Roman style of architecture, which would naturally refer it to this time of Herod's enlargement of Antonia. Its position, as we shall see, is such as to make it a convenient entrance to this insculre. See Fenced City.

From this point the wall probably ran in a circular north-east course along the northern declivity of Acre, about where the modern wall does, until it reached, (4.) The Old-gate, which appears to have stood at the north-east corner of Acre (Neh. iii, 3, 4, 8; xii, 39); apparently the same as the First-gate (Zech. xiv, 10).

(5.) The Tower Antonia, at which we thus arrive, was situated (according to Josephus, War, v, 5, 8) at the corner of the Temple court where the northern and western cloisters met. This shows that it did not cover the whole of the platform north of the Temple, but only the courts and sacred spaces occupying this entire area, with a tower at each of the four corners (ibid.). Of these latter the proper Antonia seems to have been one, and they were all doubtless connected by porticoes and passages. They were all on a precipitous rock, fifty cubits high, the proper tower Antonia being forty cubits above this, the south-eastern tower seventy, and the others fifty cubits (ibid.). It was originally built by the Asmonean princes for the safe keeping of the high-priest's vestments, and called by them Bairus (ibid. Ant. xv, 11, 4). It was "the castle" into which Paul was taken from the mob (Acts xxvi, 34, 37). See Antonia.

(6.) That one of these four towers which occupied the north-east corner of the court of Antonia we are inclined to identify with the ancient Tower of Hinnom, between the tower of Meah and the Fish-gate (Neh. iii, 1, 3; xii, 39), and at the most north-eastern point of the city (ibid. xxxii, 14; compare with Zeph. i, 10).

(7.) The south-east one of these towers, again, we take to be the ancient Tower of Meah, referred to in the above passages of Nehemiah.

Pierotti has found a subterranean passage extending from the Golden-gate in a north-westerly direction (Jerusalem Explorated), but this could not trace it completely; only in two unconnected fragments, one 130 feet long, and another 150 feet. This may be the secret passage (κουντρι εκοπηκ) which Herod excavated from Antonia to the east gate, where he raised a tower, from which he might watch any seditious movement of the people; thus establishing a private comm failed to be one at the notch opposite the north-east corner of the present city. Below this spot the ancient and modern walls would coincide in position.

3. As to the internal subdivisions of the city, few data remain beyond the arrangement necessarily resulting from the position of the hills and the course of the walls. Little is positively known respecting the streets of ancient Jerusalem. Josephus says (War, v, 4, 1) that the corresponding rows of houses on Zion and Acra terminated at the Tyropoeon, which implies that there were streets running across it; but we must not think here of wide thoroughfares like those of our cities, but of covered alleys, which constitute the streets of Oriental cities, and this is the general character of those of modern Jerusalem. The same remark will apply to the narrow streets leading obliquely to the [second] wall on the inside, several times referred to in the account of the capture of the city (War, v, 8, 1). The principal thoroughfares must be gathered from the position of the gates and the nature of the ground, with what few hints are supplied in ancient authors. In determining their position, the course of the modern roads or paths around the city is of great assistance, as even a mule-track in the East is remarkably permanent.

We must not, however, in this connection, fail to notice the famous bridge mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xiv, 4, 2; War, i, 7, 2; ii, 16, 3; vi, 6, 2; vi, 8, 1) as having remotely connected the hill Zion with the Temple near its south-west angle. Dr. Robinson (who was in Palestine in 1838, and published his book in 1841) claims to have discovered this (Researches, i, 425 sq.) in the Remains of Arch of Bridge at the south-west angle of the Temple Area.

Three ranges of immense stones still jutting out from the Haram wall at this point; whereas Dr. Ginn (who visited Palestine in 1840, and published in 1843) asserts that this relic had hitherto been unmentioned by any traveller, although well known to the citizens of Jerusalem (Travels, ii, 26). The controversy which arose on the subject was closed by a letter from Rev. H. A. Homes, of Constantinople, stating that the existence and probable character of the remains in question were suggested in his presence to Dr. Robinson by the missionaries then resident at Jerusalem. The excavations of the English engineers on the spot have demonstrated the truth of the identification thus proposed. See TEMPLE.

Dubious Jerusalem, anciently, like all other cities, had definite quarters or districts where particular classes of citizens especially resided, but there was not the same difference in religion which constituted such marked divisions within the bounds of the modern city. It is clear, however, as well from the great antiquity of the Upper City, as from its being occupied in part by palaces, that it was the special abode of the nobility of buildings and objects of note connected with the ancient city. The topography of the Temple will be considered in detail under that article.

(a) Within the Upper City—Zion.—(1.) Herod's Palace. This, Josephus states (War, v, 4, 4), "adjointed the towers Hippicus, etc., on the north side of the old wall, being "elevated wall about to the height of 30 cubits, with towers at equal distances." Its precise dimensions in all are not given, but it must have covered a large area with its "innumerable rooms," its "many porticoes" and "courts," with "several groves of trees, and long walks through them, with deep canals and cisterns."

Similar descriptions are also given in Ant. xxv, 9, 3; War, ii, 1, 1. We do not regard it, however, as identical with the "dining-hall" built by Herod Agrippa at Zion (Ant. xxv, 8, 11), for that was only a wing to the former palace of the Asmonaeans (apparently a reconstruction of the ancient "king's house"), and lay nearer the Temple (War, ii, 16, 3)—the adjoining "portico" or "gallery" mentioned in these passages being probably a covered portion of the western portion of the ground apartments of this building appears to have been the procurator's praetorium, mentioned in the account of Christ's trial before Pilate (John xviii, 32, 33; xxix, 9; Mark xv, 16), as Josephus informs us (War, ii, 14, 8) that the Roman governors took up their quarters in the palace, and set up their tribunal in the room on the western side of the interior of the building.

(2) There is no reason to suppose that David's Tomb occupied any other position than that now shown in his burial-place on Mount Zion. It was within the precincts of the old city (1 Kings ii, 10); Nehemiah mentions it as surviving the first overthrow of the city (Neh. iii, 16); Peter refers to it as extant at Jerusalem in his time (Acts ii, 39); and Josephus alludes to it as a costly and noble vault of sepulture (Ant. xiii, 8, 4; xvi, 7, 1). The present evidence, however, is less conclusive as to the position of the ancient monument, now buried by the accumulated rubbish of ages.

(3) The Armory referred to in Neh. iii, 19, has already been located at the bend of the branch wall from a north-east to a north-west direction, a little below the bridge. Its site was probably represented in our Saviour's time by an improved building for some similar public purpose.

(4) The King's House, so often mentioned in the Old Testament, has also been sufficiently noticed above, and its probable identity with Herod Agrippa's "dining-hall" pointed out.

(b) Within the Lower City—Agra and Ophel.—(1.) Josephus informs us (War, vi, 6, 3) that "Queen Helen's Palace was in the middle of Agra," apparently upon the summit of that hill, near the modern site of the chancery office of the Temple. It is also mentioned as the (north-east) limit of Simon's occupancy in the Lower City (War, v, 6, 1).

(2) There were double arches Bazaars in ancient as in modern Jerusalem, but of these we have no account except in two or three instances. Josephus mentions "a place where were the merchants of wool, the bakers, and the market for cloth," just inside the second wall, not far from its junction with the first (War, v, 8, 1). It would also seem from Neh. viii, 1, 16, that there was some such place of general resort at the head of the Tyropeon. A "baker's street" or row of shops is referred to in Jer. xxxvii, 21, but its position is not indicated, although it appears to have been in some central part of the city. See also Makhtesh. Perhaps bazaars were stretched along the low tract between the Euphrates and the northern brow of Zion.

(3) The Tyropeon is frequently mentioned by Josephus as a place of popular assemblage between Zion and the Temple, and between the bridge and the old wall (War, v, 4, 2; vi, 3, 2; 6, 2; 8, 1). We have therefore thought that it would scarcely be included within the Upper

Double-vaulted Passage below the Mosque el-Aksa. (From Lieutenant Warren's Sketch, Dec. 31, 1857, in Tracings of the "Palestine Exploration Fund.")
City, the abode of the aristocracy, where, moreover, it would not be so generally accessible.

(4.) The Prison, so often referred to in the Old Testament (Neh. iii, 24, 25; Jer. xxxiii, 2; xxxviii, 6), must have been situated in the north-west corner of the enclosure which we have designated as "Millo," near the "Prison-gate" (Neh. xii, 39), and Peter's "iron gate" (Acts xii, 10). See Prison.

(5.) On the ridge of Ophel, not far from the "Fountain of the Virgin," appears to have stood the Palace of Mowaboth, otherwise styled that of Gropel (Josephus, War, v, 6, 1; 4, 2; iv. 9, 11, v. 7, 1).

(6.) Josephus states (Ant. xv, 8, 1) that Herod "built a theatre at Jerusalem, as also a very great amphitheatre in the plain;" but this notice is too indefinite to enable us to fix the site of these buildings. He also speaks elsewhere (Ant. xvii, 10, 2) of a hippodrome somewhere near the Temple, but whether it was the same as the amphitheatre is impossible to determine; the purposes of the two edifices, however, would appear to have been different.

(c.) Within the New City—Bezetha.—(1.) The Monuments of king Alexander, referred to by Josephus (War, v, 7, 3) were on the south-west edge of the proper hill Bezetha, nearly opposite the Fish-gate, as the circumstances there narrated seem to require. This will also agree with the subsequent erection of the second engine by the Romans (evidently by the same party of besiegers operating on this quarter, "a great way off" from the other), which was reared at 20 cubits' distance from the pool Struthius (ibid. xi, 4), being just south of this monument.

(2.) The Sepulchre of Christ was not far from the place of the Crucifixion (John xix, 42); if, therefore, the modern church occupies the true Calvary, we see no good reason to dispute the identity of the site of the tomb still shown in the middle of the west rotunda of that building. See Golgotha.

(3.) The Camp of the Assyrians was on the north-west side of the city (Isa. xxvi, 2; 2 Kings xviii, 17), identical with the site of Titus' second camp within the outer wall, but sufficiently outside the second wall to be beyond the reach of damage from it (Josephus, War, v, 7, 3; 12, 2), so that we can well refer it only to the western part of the general swell which terminates in the knoll of Calvary.

(4.) The Monument of the high-priest John is to be located near the bottom of the north edge of Zion, a little east of the tower Mariamne (Josephus, War, v, 11, 4; 6, 2; 9, 2, 7, 3).

(d.) In the Environs of the city.—(1.) Herod's Monuments we incline to locate on the brow of the ridge south of the "upper pool of Gihon" (see Josephus, War, v, 3, 12, 2).

(2.) The Village of the Erebithoi is mentioned by Josephus (ibid.) as lying along this line of blockade south of Herod's Monuments, and therefore probably on the western edge of Gihon, near the modern hamlet of Abu-Wâr'in.

(3.) The Fuller's Field we take to be the broad Valley of Gihon, especially between the two pools of that name; for not only its designation, but all the notices respecting it (Isa. vii, 3; xxxvi, 2; 2 Kings xviii, 17), indicate its proximity to these waters. See Fuller's Field.

(4.) Pompey's Camp is placed by Josephus (War, v, 12, 2) on a mountain, which can be no other than a lower spur of the modern "Hill of Evil Compliments." This must have been that general's preliminary camp, for, when he captured the city, "he pitched his camp within [his own line of circumvallation, the outer wall being unburnt], on the north side of the Temple" (Ant. xiv, 4, 2).

(5.) There is no good ground to dispute the traditional site of Acedamia or the Potter's Field (Matt. xxvii, 7, 8), in the face of the south brow of the Valley of Hinnom. See Acedamia.

(6.) The Monument of Ananias [i.e. Annas or Caiphas], the high-priest, mentioned by Josephus (War, v, 12, 2), must have been just above the site of Acedamia.

(7.) The King's Garden (Neh. iii, 15) could have been no other than the well-watered plot of ground around the well of En-Rogel, where were also the king's stables (Zechar. xiv, 10).

(8.) The rock Peristeron (literally "pigeon-holes"), referred to by him in the same connection, has been so inaptly identified with the perforated face of the Valley of Jehoshaphat at the foot of the Mount of Olives, where modern tradition assigns the graves of Jehoshaphat, Ab-salom, James, and Zacharias.

(9.) The second of these ruins from the north is probably the veritable Pillar of Abalam, referred to in the Scriptures (2 Sam. xviii, 18), and by Josephus as if extant in his day ("a marble pillar in the king's dale [the Valley of Jehoshaphat, which led to 'the king's gardens'], two furlongs distant from Jerusalem" [Ant. vii, 10, 3]. See ABALAM'S TOMB.

(10.) The last and most interesting spot in this survey is the garden of Gethsemane, which tradition has so consistently located that nearly every traveller has acknowledged its general identity. Respecting its site, however, we know very little; but we are unable to perceive the propriety of supposing a village of the same name to have been located near it. See GETHSEMANI.

(11.) Finally, we may briefly recapitulate the different points in the Romans' wall of circumvallation, during the siege by Titus, as given by Josephus (War, v, 12, 2), at the same time indicating their identity as above determined: "Titus began the wall from the camp of the Assyrians, where his own camp was pitched [i.e., near the north-west angle of the modern city wall], and drew it [in a north-east curve] down to the lower parts of the New City [following the general direction of the present north wall]; thence it went [southeast] along [the eastern bank of] the Valley of Kedron to the Mount of Olives; it then bent [directly] towards the south, and encompassed the western slope of that mountain as far as the rock Peristeron [the tomb of Jehoshaphat, etc.], and [of] that other hill [the Mount of Olives] which lies next it [on the southern], and which is over [i.e. east of] the Valley of Jehoshaphat, which reaches to Siloam; whence it bent again to the west, and went down [the hill] to the Valley of the Fountain [the wady En-Nar], beyond which it went up again at the monument of Ananias the high-priest [above Acedamia].
Jerusalem

and compassing that mountain where Pompey had formerly pitched his camp [the extremity of the Hill of Evil Counsel], it returned to [i. e. towards] the north side of the city, and was carried [along the south-western bank of Gihon Valley] as far as a certain village called the house of the Erehbiti [at Abu-Warî] after which the road led [westwards]. [This village, which is called Herod's monument [south of Upper Gihon], and there on the east] was joined to Titus's own camp, where it began. Now the length of this wall was forty furlongs less one. Along the line thus indicated it would be precisely this length; it would make no sharp turns or deviations, but run straight, and the numerous commanding eminences, following the walls at a convenient distance so as to be out of the reach of missiles.

III. Modern City—L. Situation.—The following alá sketch of the general position of Jerusalem is extracted from Dr. Robinson's Researches (i, 380-384): "Jerusalem lies near the summit of a broad mountain-ridge, extending without interruption from the plain of Esdraelon to a line drawn between the south end of the Dead Sea and the south-east corner of the Mediterranean; or, more properly, perhaps, it may be regarded as extending as far south as Jebel Anfi, in the Desert, where it sinks down at once to the level of the great western plateau. This tract, which is everywhere not less than from 20 to 25 geographical miles in breadth, is, in fact, high, uneven table-land. It everywhere forms the precipitous western wall of the great valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, while towards the west it sinks down by an offset into a range of lower hills, which lie between it and the great plain along the coast of the Mediterranean. The surface of this upper region is everywhere rocky, uneven, and mountainous; and is, moreover, cut up by deep valleys which run east or west on either side towards the Jordan or the Mediterranean. The line of division, or water-shed, between the waters of these valleys—a term which here applies almost exclusively to the rivers—is the ancient rainy season; it follows for the most part the height of land along the ridge, yet not so that the heads of the valleys, which run off in different directions, often interlap for a considerable distance. Thus, for example, a valley which descends to the Jordan often has its head a mile or two westward of the commencement of other valleys which run to the western sea.

"From the great plain of Esdraelon onwards towards the south, the mountainous country rises gradually, forming the tract already known as the mountains of Ephraim and Judah, until, in the vicinity of Hebron, it attains an elevation of nearly 9000 Paris feet above the level of the Mediterranean Sea. Further north, on a line drawn from the north end of the Dead Sea towards the true west, the ridge has an elevation of only about 2500 Paris feet, and here, close upon the water-shed, lies the city of Jerusalem. Its mean geographical position is in lat. 31° 49' 43" N., and long. 35° 38' E. from Greenwich foot of Buddha, which is called (from the Much- built form, it is a great deal higher than it appears, and the elevation is more gradual than a rough glance would lead us to suppose.

"Six or seven miles north and north-west of the city is spread out the open plain or basin round about el-Jib (Gibeon), extending also towards el-Birch (Beeroth), the waters of which flow off at its south-east part through the deep valley here called by the Arabs wady el-Maaleh, but no other than the mud-floods. The tellers in the ancient times have usually given the name of the 'Valley of Turpentine,' or of the Terebinth, on the mistaken supposition that it is the ancient Valley of Elah. This great valley passes along in a south-west direction an hour or more west of Jerusalem, and finally opens out from the mountains into the western plain, at the distance of six or eight hours south-west from the city, under the name of wady es-Sirâr. The traveller, on his way from Ramleh to Jerusalem, descends into and crosses this deep valley at the village of Kulunieh, on its western side, an hour and a half from the latter city. On again reaching the summit on the high road, and on the south-eastern side, there is an open tract sloping gradually downward towards the east, and sees before him, at the distance of about two miles, the walls and domes of the holy city, and beyond them the higher ridge or summit of the Mount of Olives. The traveller now descends gradually towards the city along the slope of the ridge, at the distance of six or eight hours, and arrives at the distance of about one mile west of the summit of the Mount of Olives. Beyond that mountain the slope is somewhat more open, and again east nearly at right angles, and unites with the other, which then continues its course to the Dead Sea. Upon the broad and elevated promontory within the fork of the two valleys lies the holy city. All around are higher hills; on the east, the Mount of Olives; on the south, the Hill of Ezel; or Gethsemane, rising directly from the Vale of Hinnom; on the west the ground rises gently, as above described, to the borders of the great wady; while on the north, a bend of the ridge, connected with the Mount of Olives, bounds the prospect at the distance of more than a mile. Towards the south-west the view is somewhat more open, for here lies the plain of Rephaim, commencing just at the southern brink of the Valley of Hinnom, and stretching off south-west, where it runs to the western sea. In the north-west, too, the eye reaches up along the upper part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and from many points can discern the Mosque of Nych Samwil, situated on a lofty ridge beyond the great wady, at the distance of two hours.

"The surface of the elevated promontory itself, on which the city stands, slopes somewhat steeply towards the east, terminating the brink of the Valley of Jehoshaphat. From the northern part, near the plain of Damascus-gate, a depression or shallow wady runs in a southern direction, and is joined by another depression or shallow wady (still easy to be traced) coming down from near the Jaffa-gate. It then continues obliquely downwards to the slope, but with a deeper depression, in a direction, quite to the Pool of Siloam and the Valley of Jehoshaphat. This is the ancient Tyropoön. West of its lower part Zion rises loyally, lying mostly without the modern city; while on the east of the Tyropoön lie Bezetha, Moriah, and Ophel, the last a long and comparatively narrow ridge, also outside of the modern city, and terminating in a rocky point over the Pool of Siloam. These last three hills may strictly be taken as only parts of one and the same ridge. The breadth of the whole site of Jerusalem, from the brow of the Valley of Hinnom, near the Jaffa-gate, to the brink of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, is about 1020 yards, or nearly half a geographical mile, of which distance 318 yards are occupied by the area of the great mosque el-Haram ash-Sherif. North of the Jaffa-gate the city wall sweeps round more to the west, and increases the breadth of the citadel.

"The country around Jerusalem is all of limestone formation, and not particularly fertile. The rocks everywhere come out above the surface, which in many parts is also thickly strewed with loose stones, and the aspect of the whole region is barren and dreary; yet the old proverb, 'God has scattered the chaff, and the unfruitful branches are seen in the valleys and level places, but they are less productive than in the region of Hebron and Nablus. Neither vineyards nor fig-trees flourish on the high ground around the city, though the latter are found in the gardens below Siloam, and very frequently in the vicinity of Bethlehem."

"The elevation of Jerusalem is a subject of constant reference and exultation by the Jewish writers. Their fervid poetry abounds with allusions to its height, to the ascent thither of the tribes from all parts of the country. It was the habitation of Jehovah, from which 'he looked upon the world' (Ps. xxxiii, 14): its kings 'were higher than the kings of the earth' (Ps. lxxxix, 27). In the later Jewish literature of narrative and description this poetry is reduced to prose, and in the most exagerrated form. Jerusalem was watered as if by a clear, springing fountain by the secret and subterraneous channels from springs to the west of the town, and communicating by other subterraneous passages with the Pool of Siloam and the Fountain of the Virgin in the east of the town, whether they were within or without the walls of the town."

The existing streams of a perennial source of water below the Temple has always been admitted. Tacitus knew of it (Hist. v, 12); and Aristeas, in describing the ancient Temple, informs us that "the supply of water was unfailing, inasmuch as there was an abundant natural fountain flowing in the interior, and reserves of subterraneous construction under ground, extending five stadia round the Temple, with pipes and conduits unknown to all except those to whom the service was intrusted, by which the water was brought to various parts of the Temple and again conducted off." The Moslems also write that the existing springing fountain was a reservoir or cistern; but a reserve has always been kept up as to the means by which it is supplied. This reserve seems to have been maintained by the successive occupants of Jerusalem as a point of civic honor; and this fact alone intimates that there was danger to the town in its becoming known to the enemy. This danger came from without the city by secret channels, which it was of importance not to disclose. Yet we are plainly told in the Bible that Hezekiah "stopped the upper water-course of Gihon, and brought it down to the west side of the city of David" (1 Kings i, 35, 36); from 2 Chron. xxxvi, 28 it seems that all the neighboring fountains were thus "stopped" or covered, and the brook which they had formed diverted by subterraneous channels into the town, for the express purpose of preventing besiegers from finding the "much water" which previously existed outside the walls (comp. also Ecclus. xlviii, 12). Isaiah (xxii, 12) alludes to this secret fountain under the Temple when he speaks of waters issuing from the threshold of the Temple towards the east, and flowing down towards the desert as an abundant and beautiful stream. This figure may be drawn from the waters of the inner source under the Temple, being at the time of overflow dis charged by the outlets at Siloam into the Kidron, which takes the eastward course thus described.

There are certainly wells, or rather shafts, in and near the Temple area, which are said to derive their waters through a passage of masonry four or five feet high, from a chamber or reservoir cut in the solid rock under the grand mosque, in which the water is said to rise from the rock into a basin at the bottom. The existence of this reservoir and source of water is affirmed by the citizens, and coincides with the previous intimations, but it must for the time being at any rate be in shadow. It is one of the obscurities in which the matter is involved. Even Dr. Barclay, who gave great attention to this subject, was unable fully to clear it up (City of the Great King, p. 293).

The pools and tanks of ancient Jerusalem were very abundant, and each house being provided with what we may call a bottle-necked cistern for rain-water, drought within the city was rare; and history shows us that it was the besiegers, not the besieged, that generally suffered from want of water (Gul. Tyr. bk. viii, p. 7; see Waha, Anbora Gesofeli, p. 421). Though occasionally this water was cut off, its absence in neither ancient nor modern times could the neighborhood of Jerusalem be called "waterless," as Strabo describes it (Geogr. xvi, 2, 56). In summer the fields and hills around are verdureless and gray, scorched with months of drought, yet within a radius of seven miles there are some thirty or forty natural springs (Barclay's City, p. 295). This natural provision for a supply of water in Jerusalem in ancient times was perhaps the most complete and extensive ever undertaken for a city. Till lately this was not fully credited; but Barclay's, and, more recently, Whitby's and Pleniotty's subterranean excavations have proved it. The aqueduct of the Middle Ages (twenty-two miles and a quarter) pours the waters of the three immense pools into the enormous Temple wells, cut out like caverns in the rock; and the pools, which surround the city in all directions, supply to a great extent the want of a river or a lake (Trallis's Josephus, vol. i; Append. p. 57, 60). For a description of these, see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 523 sq.

The ordinary means taken by the inhabitants to secure a supply of water have been described under the article Cisterns; for interesting details, see Raumer's Illustration, p. 329-333; Robinson's Researches, i, 479-518; Olin's Travels, ii, 168-181; and Williams's Holy City, ii, 453-502.

3. We present in this connection some additional remarks on the fortifications of the city. Dr. Robinson thinks that the wall of the new city, the Еліа of Hadri-ean, nearly coincided with that of the old; thus Jerusalem and the portion of Mount Zion which now lies outside would seem then also to have been excluded; for Eusebius and Cyril, in the 4th century, speak of the denunciation of the prophet being fulfilled, which describes Zion as "a ploughed field" (Mic. iii, 2).

In the Middle Ages there appear to have been two gates on each side of the city, making eight in all; a number not greatly short of that assigned in the above estimate to the ancient Jerusalem, and probably occupying nearly the places of the most important of the ancient ones.

On the west side were two gates, of which the principal was the Porta David, gate of David, often mentioned by the writers on the Crusades. It was called by the Arabs Bab el-Mubarak, and corresponds to the present Jaffa-gate, or Bab el-Khalil. The other was the gate of the Fleeing Field (Porta Fugitorum), called by Lewis pavonia. This seems to be the same as which others call Porta Judiciaria, and which is described as being in the wall over against the church of the Holy Sepulchre, leading to Silo (Nebiy Samwil) and Gibea. This seems to be that which the Arabian writers call Ser, where there is no trace of it in the present wall. On the north there were also two gates, and all the Middle-Age writers speak of the principal of them as the gate of St. Stephen, from the notion that the death of the protomartyr took place near it. This was also called the gate of Ephraim, in reference to its probable ancient name. Arabic writers call it Bab 'Amud el-Gharob, of which the present name, Bab el-'Amud, is only a contraction. The present gate of St. Stephen is on the east of the city, and the scene of the martyrdom is now placed near it; but there is no account of the change. Further east was the gate of Benjamin (Porta Benjaminis), corresponding apparently to what is now called the gate of Herod.

On the east there seem to have been at least two gates. The northernmost is described by Adamnanus as a small portal leading down to the Valley of Jehoshaphat. It was called the gate of Jehoshaphat from the valley by which it led. It seems to be represented by the present gate of St. Stephen. The Arabic writers call it Bab el-'Ubayd, gate of the Tribes, being another form of the modern Arabic name Bab re-Subat. The present gate of St. Stephen has four lions sculptured over it on the outside, which, as well as the architecture before it, is learned. Robinson suggests that the original "small portal" was rebuilt on a larger scale by the Franks when they built up the walls of the city, either in A.D. 1178 or 1229. The other gate is the famous Golden Gate (Porta aurea) in the eastern wall of the Temple area. It is now called by the Arabs Bab el-Dokhairiyeh, but formerly Bab er-Rameh, "Gate of Mercy." The name Golden Gate appears to have come from a supposed connection with one of the ancient gates of the Temple, which are said to have been covered with gold; but this name cannot be traced back beyond the historians of the Crusades. This gate is, from its architecture, obviously of Roman origin, and is conjectured to have belonged to the incesur of the temple of Jupiter which was built by Hadrian upon Mount Moriah. The exterior is now walled up, but, being double, the interior forms within the area a recess, which is used for prayer by the Moslem worshipper. Different reasons are given for the closing of this gate. It was probably because it was found inconvenient that a gate to the mosque should be open in the exterior wall. Although not walled up, it was kept closed even when the Crusaders were in possession of the city, and only opened once a year, on Palm Sunday, in celebration of our Lord's supposed triumphal entry through it to the Temple.

Of all the towers with which the city was anciently adorned and defended, the most important is that of Hippicus, which, as we have already seen, assumed as the starting-point in his description of all the walls of the city. Herod gave it the name of a friend who was slain in battle. It was a quadrangular structure, twenty-five cubits on each side, and built up entirely solid to the height of thirty cubits. Above this solid part was a cistern twenty cubits; and then, for twenty-five cubits more, were chambers of various kinds, with a breastwork of two cubits, and battlements of three cubits upon the top. The altitude of the whole tower was consequently eighty cubits. The stones of which it was built were very large, twenty cubits long by ten broad and five high, and (probably in the upper part) were of white marble. Dr. Robinson has shown that this tower should be sought at the north-west corner of the upper city, or Mount Zion. This part, a little to the south of the Jaffa-gate, is now occupied by the citadel. It is an irregular assemblage of square towers, surrounded on the inner side towards the city by a low wall, and having on the outer west side a deep fosse. The towers which rise from the brink of the fosse are protected on that side by a low sloping bulwark or buttress, which rises from the bottom of the trench at an angle of forty-five degrees. This part bears evident marks of antiquity, and Dr. Robinson is inclined to ascribe these massive outworks to the time of the rebuilding and fortifying of the city by Hadrian. This fortress is described by the Middle-Age historians as the tower or citadel of David. Within it, as the traveller enters the city by the Jaffa-gate, the northeaster tower attracts his notice as being evident marks of higher antiquity than any of the others. upper part is, indeed, modern, but the lower part is built of larger stones, bevelled at the edges, and apparently still occupying their original places. This tower has been singled out by the Franks, and bears among them the name of the tower of David, while they sometimes give to the whole fortress the name of the castle of David. Taking all the circumstances into account, Dr. Robinson thinks that the antique lower portion of this tower is in all probability a remnant of the tower of Hippicus, which, as Josephus states, was left standing by Titus when he destroyed the city. This discovery, however, is not new, the identity having been advocated by Raumer and others before Dr. Robinson travelled. This view has been somewhat modified by Mr. Williams, who shows that the north-western angle of the present citadel exactly corresponds in size and position to the description of Josephus, while other portions of the same general structure have been rebuilt upon the old foundations of the adjoining towers of Mariamne and Phasaelus (Holy City, ii, 14-16).

The present Damascus-gate in particular, from its massive style and other circumstances, seems to have occupied a prominent point along the ancient "second wall" of the city. Connected with its structures are the immense underground quarries, on which, as well as out of which, the city may be said to be built. From them have been hewn, in past ages, the massive limestone blocks which appear in the walls and elsewhere. In these dark chambers one may, with the help of torches, wander for hours, scrambling over mounds of rubbish; now climbing into one chamber, now descending to another, noting the various cuttings, grooves, cleavages and hammer-marks; and wondering at the different shapes—bars here, slices there, boulders there, thrown up together in utter confusion. Only in one corner do we find a few drippings of water and a tiny spring; for these singular excavations, like the great barrack at Khureitun (beyond Bethlehem, probably Adullam), are entirely free from damp; and though the only bit of intercourse with the upper air is by the small twenty-inch hole at the Damascus-gate, through which the entreprenising traveller wriggles into them, like a worm, yet the air is fresh and somewhat warm (Stewart’s Tent and Khan, p. 263-266).

These are no doubt the subterranean retreats referred to by Josephus as occupied by the despairing Jews in the last days of Jerusalem (War, vi, 7, 3; vi, 8, 4); and to which Tasso alludes when relating the wizard’s promise to conduct the “Soldan” through Godfrey’s leaguer into the heart of the city (Ierus. Liber, x, 29). The native name for the quarries is Maghåret el-Kotton, the Cotton Cave. For a full description of these caverns, see Barclay, City of the Great King, p. 460 sq.; Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 491 seq.; and the report of the Ordnance Survey (1865, p. 63).

The following description of the present city is chiefly abridged from the excellent account of Dr. Olmstead (Present, vol. ii, chap. iv). The general view of the city from the Mt. of Olives is mentioned more or less by all travellers as that from which they derive their most distinct and abiding impression of Jerusalem.

The summit of the Mt. of Olives is about half a mile east from the city, which it completely overlooks, every considerable edifice and almost every house being visible. The city, seen from this point, appears to be a regular inclined plain, sloping gently and uniformly from west to east, or towards the observer, and indented by a slight depression or shallow vale, running nearly through the centre in the same direction. The south-east corner of the quadrangle—for that may be assumed as the figure formed by the rocks—that which is nearest to the observer, is occupied by the mosque of Omar and its extensive and beautiful grounds. This is Mount Moriah, the site of Solomon’s Temple; and the ground embraced in this inclosure occupies about an eighth of the whole modern city. It is covered with greensward, and planted sparingly with olive, cypress, and other trees, and it is certainly the most lovely feature of the town, whether we have reference to the splendid structures or the beautiful lawn spread out around them.

which is within the modern town, is to a great extent occupied by the Armenian convent, an enormous edifice, which is the only conspicuous object in this neighborhood. The north-west is largely occupied by the Latin convent, another very extensive establishment. About midway between these two convents is the castle or citadel, close to the Bethlehem-gate, already mentioned. The north-east quarter of Jerusalem is but partially built up, and it has more the aspect of a rambling agricultural village than that of a crowded city. The vacant spots here are green with gardens and olive-trees. There is another large vacant tract along the southern wall, and west of the Haram, also covered with verdure. Near the centre of the city also appear two or three green spots, which are small gardens. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre is the only conspicuous edifice in this vicinity, and its domes are striking objects. There are no buildings which, either from their size or beauty, are likely to engage the attention. Eight or ten minarets mark the position of so many mosques in different parts of the town, but they are only noticed because of their elevation above the surrounding edifices. Upon the same principle the eye rests for a moment upon a great number of low domes, which form the roofs of the principal dwellings, and relieve the heavy uniformity of the flat plastered roofs which cover the greater mass of more humble habitations. Many rainous piles and a thousand disgusting objects are concealed or disguised by the distance. Many inequalities of surface, which exist to so great an extent that there is not a level street of any length in Jerusalem, are also unperceived.

From the same commanding point of view a few olive and fig trees are seen in the lower part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and scattered over the side of Olivet from its base to the summit. They are sprinkled yet more sparsely on the southern side of the city on Mount Zion and Ophel. North of Jerusalem the olive plantations appear more numerous as well as thriving, and thus offer a grateful contrast to the sunburnt fields and bare rocks which predominate in this landscape. The rugged country in the back of the desert is well watered by wadis, or watercourses, that carry torrents of water in winter, and often flow dry in summer.

The streets of Jerusalem are, for the most part, narrow, winding, and crooked, and are paved with stone, cobbled, or with cobblestones. The houses are of various sizes and shapes, and are generally built of stone, with flat roofs. The walls are high, and often reach to the roof, and are made of clay and brick. The doors are usually large, and are often ornamented with carved wooden panels.

The greatest feature of the city is the Temple, which is situated in the center of the old city. The Temple was the center of the religious life of the Jews, and was also the center of the political and social life of the city. The Temple was destroyed by the Romans in 70 AD, and has not been rebuilt since that time.

The walls of Jerusalem are high and thick, and are made of stone. The walls are a reminder of the history of the city, and of the many battles that have taken place within its walls. The walls have been repaired and strengthened many times over the centuries, and are now in good repair.

The city of Jerusalem is a center of pilgrimage, and is visited by thousands of pilgrims each year. The pilgrims come from all over the world, and are of all faiths and backgrounds. The pilgrims come to Jerusalem to visit the Temple, and to visit the places associated with the life of Jesus.

The city of Jerusalem is also a center of education, and is home to many universities and colleges. The universities and colleges are a reminder of the intellectual and cultural life of the city, and of the many scholars and researchers who have contributed to the study of Judaism and the Bible.

The city of Jerusalem is also a center of commerce, and is home to many businesses and industries. The businesses and industries are a reminder of the economic life of the city, and of the many people who work and live in Jerusalem.
The population of Jerusalem has been variously estimated by different travellers, some making it as high as 30,000, others as low as 12,000. An average of these estimates would make it somewhere between 12,000 and 15,000; but the Egyptian system of taxation and of military conscription in Syria has lately furnished more accurate data than had previously been obtainable, and on these Dr. Robinson estimates the population at not more than 11,500, distributed thus:

Mohammedans .......... 4,500
Jews .................. 5,000 Christians .......... 2,000 Others ................ 1,000

11,000

If to this be added something for possible omissions, and the inmates of the convents, the standing population, exclusive of the garrison, would not exceed 11,500. Dr. Barclay is very minute in regard to the Christian sects, and his details show that Robinson greatly underestimated them when he gave their number as 3500. Barclay shows them to be in all 4518 (p. 588). The latest estimate of the population is that of Pierotti, who gives the entire sum as 20,820, subdivided as follows: Christian sects, 6068; Moslems (Arabs and Turks), 7556; Jews, 7796.

The language most generally spoken among all classes of the inhabitants is the Arabic. Schools are rare, and consequently facility in reading is not often met with. The general condition of the inhabitants has already been indicated.

The fortified circuit of the town holds the rank of pasha, but is responsible to the pasha of Beirutt. The government is somewhat milder than before the period of the Egyptian domination; but it is said that the Jewish and Christian inhabitants at least have ample cause to regret the change of masters, and the屯金aries lament that change without reserve (Am. Bib. Repons, for 1843). Yet the Moslems reverence the same spots which the Jews and Christians account holy; the holy sepulchre only excepted; and this exception arises from their disbelief that Christ was crucified, or buried, or rose again. Formerly there were in Palestine monks of the Benedictine and Augustine orders, and of those of St. Basil and St. Anthony; but since 1804 there have been none but Franciscans, who have charge of the Latin convent and the holy places. They resided on Mount Zion till A.D. 1561, when the Turks allowed them the monastery of St. Peter, which they now occupy. They have formerly a handsome revenue out of all Roman Catholic countries, but these sources have fallen off since the French Revolution, and the establishment is said to be poor and deeply in debt. The expenses arise from the duty imposed upon the convent of entertaining pilgrims, and the cost of maintaining the twenty convents belonging to the establishment of the Terra Santa is estimated at 40,000 Spanish dollars a year. Formerly it was much higher, in consequence of the heavy exactions of the Turkish government. Burckhardt says that he shrewdly paid annually £12,000 to the pasha of Damascus. But the Egyptian government relieved them from these heavy charges, and imposed instead a regular tax on the property possessed. For the buildings and lands in and around Jerusalem the annual tax was fixed at 7000 litteras, or 350 Spanish dollars. It is probable that the restored Turkish government has not yet, in this respect, recurred to its old oppressions. The convent contains fifty monks, half Italians and half Spaniards. In it resides the intendant or the principal of all the convents, with the rank of abbot, and the title of guardian of Mount Zion and custos of the Holy Sepulchre. He is always a Scotchman, and has charge of all the spiritual affairs of the Roman Catholics in the Holy Land. There is also a president or vicar, who takes the place of the guardian in case of absence or death: he was formerly a Frenchman, but is now either an Italian or Spaniard. The procurator, who manages their temporal affairs, is always a Spaniard. A council, called Discretorium, composed of these officials and three other monks, has the general management of all the spiritual and temporal matters. Much of the attention of the order is occupied, and much of its expense incurred, in entertaining pilgrims and in the distribution of alms. The native Roman Catholics live around the convent, on which they are wholly dependent. They are native Arabs, and are said to be descended from converts in the times of the Crusades.

There is a Greek patriarch of Jerusalem, but he usually resides at Constantinople, and is represented in the holy city by one or more vicars, who are bishops residing in the great convent near the church of the Holy Sepulchre. At present the vicars are the bishops of Lydda, Nazareth, and Kerek (Paxtra), assisted by the other bishops resident in the convent. In addition to thirteen monasteries in Jerusalem, they possess the convent of the Holy Cross, near Jerusalem; that of St. Helena, between Jerusalem and Bethlehem; and that of St. John, between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea. All the monks of the convents are converts. The Christians of the Greek rite who are not monks are all native Arabs, with their native priests, who are allowed to perform the Church services in their mother tongue—the Arab.

The Armenians in Jerusalem have a patriarch, with three convents and 100 monks. They have also convents at Bethlehem, Ramliah, and Jaffa. Few of the Armenians are natives: they are mostly merchants, and among the wealthiest inhabitants of the place, and their condition is generally good. A convent of Latin clergy and a convent of Greek clergy are near the city of Jaffa, and a convent of the Abyssinians, and one belonging to the Jacobite Syrians.

The estimate of the number of the Jews in Jerusalem at 3000 is given by Dr. Robinson on the authority of Mr. Nicolayson, the resident missionary to the Jews. Yet in the following year (1839) a Scotch deputation set them down at six; a number on the same authority. (See Dr. Barclay's estimate above.) They inhabit a distinct quarter of the town, between Mount Zion and Mount Moriah. This is the worst and dirtiest part of the holy city, and that in which the plague never fails to make its first appearance. Few of the Jews are wealthy or aquapants, and a large number of them now choose to die in the city of their fathers' sepulchres. The greater proportion of them are from different parts of the Levant, and appear to be mostly of Spanish and Polish origin. Few are from Germany, or understand the German language. They are, for the most part, wealthy or in possession of land. Their subsistence upon the contributions of their brethren is different countries. These contributions vary considerably in amount in different years, and often occasion much dissatisfaction in their distribution (see the Narrative of the Scotch deputation, p. 148). An effort, however, is now making in Europe for the preservation of Jewish agriculture in Palestine, and a society formed for that purpose, under whose auspices several Jewish families have emigrated to their sacred fatherland, and are engaged in the culture of the produce of which the soil is so fertile. Prominent among these philanthropic exertions are those of Sir Moses Montefiore, of London, who has established a farm in the vicinity of Jerusalem for the benefit of his Jewish brethren (Benjamin, Eight Years in Asia and Africa, p. 94). Under the reforms and religious toleration in Turkey, as already observed, the Jews have a fair chance of improving their condition. The condition of the Jewish and Christian inhabitants of Jerusalem may be expected. It should also be added that European enterprise has projected a railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem as one of the fruits of the alliance during the late war, and on its completion an additional impulse will doubtless be given to this ancient metropolis by the facilities of travel and transportation thus afforded.
6. The most recent and complete works on modern Jerusalem are Dr. Titus Tobler's Zwei Bücher Topographie von Jerusalem und seine Umgebungen (Berlin, 1853, et seq.), which contains (vol. i, p. xi-e) a nearly full list of all works by travellers and others on the subject, with brief critical notices of each work. The most recent work is that of Max C. von der Hagen, Gotha, 1859, and greatly enlarged in his Bibliographie Geographique Palestine, Lpz. 1867.), and Prof. Joseph's Jerusalem und das Heilige Land (München, 1864, 2 vols.), which almost exhaustively treat the sacred topography from the Roman Catholic point of view. The city itself is described by those who have visited the Holy Land; see especially Bartlett's Walks about Jerusalem (London, 1842). The map of van De Velde (Gotha, 1838), with a memoir by Tobler, has remained the most exact one of the present city till the publication of the English Ordance Survey (London, 1864–5, 1866; N. Y., 1871), which contains minute details. The most perfect pictorial representation is the Panorama of Jerusalem, taken from the Mount of Olives, in three large aquatint engravings, with a key, published in Germany (Munich, 1850). Many new and interesting details have been furnished by scientific investigation, especially by the explorations of the engineers lately employed under the auspices of the "Palaeontological Exploration Fund" of England, the results of which are detailed in their successive Quarterly Statements, and popularly summed up in their volume entitled Jerusalem Rock and City, 1878. The Christian Church. Much depends, in determining the number of councils held, on the significance of the name. See the article Council. We have room here only for the principal councils held at Jerusalem. They are, I. The first, held to confirm the regulations of the apostles, which is believed to have been held during the year 47, under James the Less, bishop of Jerusalem, in consequence of the dispute in the Church of Antioch on the propriety of dispensing with circumcision (probably provoked by Judaizers). By the decisions of this council, the faithful were commanded to abstain (1) from meats which had been offered to idols (so as not even to appear to countenance the worship of the heathen), (2) from blood and3

The apostle, from the summit of a high mountain, beheld, in a pictorial symbol or scenic representation, a city resplendent with celestial brightness, which seemed to descend from the heavens to the earth. It was built upon terraces, one rising above another, each elevated, or the building supporting or encircling it; and thus, although each wall was only 144 cubits = 252 feet high, the height of the whole city was equal to its diameter. This was stated to be a square of about 400 miles; or 12,000 stadia = about 1500 miles in circumference—of course a mystical number, denoting that the city was capable of holding almost countless myriads of inhabitants. In its general form, the symbolic city presents a striking resemblance to that of the new city in Ezek. xl-xlviii. The pictorial symbol must be regarded as the representation not of a place or thing, but of the Church as a society.

Jerusalem and Zion are often used for the inhabitants and faithful worshippers, so the new Jerusalem is emblematical of the Church of God, part on earth and part in heaven. To suppose the invisible world to be exclusively referable to the new city would deprive the contrast between the Law and the Gospel economy, Sinai and Zion, of its appositeness and force. Moreover, the distinction between the general assembly of the enrolled citizens, and the spirits of the just made perfect (Heb. xii, 22-24), can be explained only by interpreting the former of the material church, and the latter of the Church triumphant in heaven. Thus we see why the New Jerusalem was bethel, like Jacob's ladder, extending from earth to heaven. See Zion.

JERUSALEM, PATRIARCHATE OF. See PATRIARCHATE OF JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM, THE NEW SEE OF ST. JAMES IX. The city, sacred alike to the Jew, the Gentile, and the Turk, new life was infused, but of the Church as a society, until the opening of the present era; and, strange to say, the desolate condition of the Jews first caused the appointment of two missionaries to Palestine. These were sent in 1818 by the North American Missionary Society, of Boston. In Europe, no action was taken until 1832: in this year the London Missionary Society took up the work and entered the field. In 1840, at last, the expedition of the great European Powers to the East gave rise to the hope that, though Protestantism might not immediately secure a strong foothold, the power of the Mohammedans at least would be broken, and an opening be made, if not for the reception of the influences of the Christian dispensation, at least for the sacred land. The great ambition of king Frederick William IV. of Prussia was to establish a Protestant bishopric in the holy city: and when, at the ratification (July 15, 1840) of the treaty between the Christian and Musulman Powers, he failed to obtain the desired support for the mission, he sent a special embassy to the queen of England, the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of London (recognising in them the spiritual heads of the English Church, and proposed a plan for the two great Protestant nations of Prussia and England—to establish and support in common a Protestant bishopric in Jerusalem, which should be equally shared in (i.e. alternately) by both the German Evangelical and the Anglican churches. "It was anticipated," says Dr. Hagenbach (Church Hist, 18th and 19th cent.), "that by this the Protestantism would be more firmly established, and an important centre formed for missionary labors. While Prussia had formed itself with England in the attainment of great ecclesiastical ends, it now seemed that England, by the position which Providence had given her, was adaptation of this plan; and the influence which she had gained as a European Power in the East and in Jerusalem, encouraged the hope without, while it was inwardly strengthened by the fixed forms of her ecclesiastical character, and by the halo of her episcopal dignity." Of course, people differed in their opinion concerning the proposal. There were many eminent German theologians who deprecated the wisdom of affiliating to the Established Church, which was described as one of exterior formalism, etc.; while, amongst the English, many hesitated to cast in their lot with German rationalistic divines. But the plan was, after all, adopted by the higher clergy of England, as well as by the German bishops on the Established Church. But, Prussia also stipulated that the bishopric should be formed at the Church of St. James, in Jerusalem, and must be occupied by a German, should receive his appropriate consecration at the hands of the Primate of the Anglican Church in London, and subscribe to the 39 articles of the establishment. The plea which the English clergy made on its adoption was that it gave rise to the hope of bringing about by this means a reconciliation between the two denominations: the archbishop even expressed himself that this union would contribute to "a unity of discipline as well as of doctrine between our own Church and the less perfectly constituted of the Protestant churches of Europe." But the establishment of the bishopric was fixed at £30,000 sterling, to insure the bishop a yearly income of £1200. The bishop was to be appointed by the Queen in Council, subject to the King, the Senate of the empire, and the Primate of England, however, having the right to vote in the nomination of the latter. The protection to be afforded to the German Evangelists is provided for by the ordinances of 1814-2, containing the following specifications: 1st. The bishop will take the German congregation under his protection, and afford them all the protection in his power. 2d. He will be assisted by competent German ministers, ordained according to the ritual of the Church of England, and required to yield him obedience. 3d. The liturgy is to be taken from the received Rituals of the Western Church, carefully revised by the primate. 4th. The rite of confirmation is to be administered according to the form of the English Church. In the mean while, an act of Parliament, under date Oct 5, 1841, decided that persons could be consecrated bishops of the Church of England in foreign countries without, on the occasion of the sacrament, to be present; it was also provided that such would also take the oath of allegiance to the archbishop, in order that they, and such deacons and ministers as they might ordain, may have the right to fulfil the same functions in England and Ireland. In consequence, Dr. Macaulay of Ireland, having declined the episcopal consecration to him, has been appointed missionary bishop of Hebrew and Rabbinical literature at Christ's College, London, a converted Jew, and formerly a Prussian subject (having been born in Polish Prussia in 1799), was made first incumbent of the new bishopric. He died Nov. 23, 1845, near Cairo. His successor was Samuel Gobat of Cremona, canon of Bern, a student of the Basel Mission House, nominated by Prussia, and experienced for missionary labors by his residence in Abyssinia. Since then, the news from Jerusalem has been gradually behind. Jan. 21, 1849, a newly-created Evangelical church called Christ Church, situated on Mount Zion, was consecrated. The Gospel is preached there in Hebrew, English, German, French, Spanish, and Arabic. Belonging to it are a burial-ground; a school attended by the children of Jews, Mohammedans, and different Christian denominations; a hospital for the Jews, in which they are treated gratuitously; and a Sunday School, and aospital for proserlyes, etc., which is attended by the poor; a house of industry for prosterlyes, and an industrial school for Jewish females. The number of Jewish converts averages from seven to nine annually. In consequence of the firm granting to Prussian the right, these are possessed by other churches, they have established small schools in Bethel, Jaffa, Nablus, and Nazareth.
JERUSALEM

For accurate accounts, see Herzog, Real-Encyklop., vi, 505 sq.; Alisek, Dua evengliche Bischoff in Jerusalem (Berlin, 1842). (J. H. W.)

Jerusalem, Johann Friedrich Wilhelm, a German theologian—one of the best apologistic and practical theologians of the last century, was born at Osnabrück Nov. 22, 1709, and was educated at the Universities of Leipzig and Wittenberg; at the latter he took his master's degree. Declining to enter the ministry, for which he had prepared himself, and too young to enter the ranks of academical instructors, he went to the Low Countries, and studied at Leyden, where he enjoyed the counsels of such men as Albert Schultens, Peter Burman, etc. For he sought and secured the leading minds of the different Christian denominations of Holland, and learned to appreciate men out of the pale of his own band. After his return to his native place, still only twenty-four years old, he received the most flattering offers, one of which was a position at the newly-created University of Göttingen, which he declined to accept. Fearing that he might not be thoroughly prepared, he again set out on a journey, this time to spend a year of further preparatory study in England, more especially at London. He there became acquainted with the master theologians of that age and country. Thomas Sherlock, Daniel Waterland, Samuel Clarke freely admitted the young scholar to their studies, and so interested became he in English theology that he remained there three years and declined to go to Göttingen. In 1740 he returned to Germany, and was appointed tutor and preacher of Prince Charles William Ferdinand of Brunswic. In 1743 he was appointed professor of the monasteries of St. Crucis and St. Egidi; in 1749 he was made abbot of Marienthall, and in 1752 abbot of the convent of Riddagshausen, a theological training-school of the Brunswick ministry, with which he remained associated for six scores of years, and in which he laboriously earned to promote especially the religious spirit of the young preachers. Indeed, so well were his labors performed, that a late biographer of Jerusalem is found to say that in no small measure the religious spirit of Brunswick of our day is due to the work which he performed at this University. In 1771 he became vice-president of the consistory of Wolfenbüttel. In the latter part of his life he was severely afflicted by the suicide of his son (1775), who had gone to Wetzlar to practice law. Jerusalem died Sept. 2, 1789. His most important work, Betrachtungen, u. d. verkehrten Wahrheiten der Religion, written for the instruction of the hereditary prince of Brunswick (Brunsw. 1768–79, 1785, 1790, 2 vols.), has been translated into most European languages. Of his other works, we notice two collections of sermons (Brunsw. 1745–53, 1788–69); for a full list, see Doring's D. deutschen Kunsstlerdn d. 19 u. 19 Jahrhunderts; Jerusalem, Denkbiographie (Braun. 1781),—Hertzog, Real-Encyklop., s. v.; Görlich, Geschichte des Theol. Jeshur'nah (many Jeshurun) (a, Neh. xi, 7, b, Chron. iii, 21). See JESHURUN.

Jeshurun (many Jeshurun) (Hebrew Yeshurun), יְשׁוּרֻן, deliverance of Jehovah; 1 Chron. iii, 21; Ezra viii, 7, 19; Neh. xi, 7; else in the paraphrase form יְשָׁרִי (Yeshari), יְשָׁרִי, the name of several men.

Jeshua (Sept. 'Issur v. r. 'Issur; Vulg. Isiur, Author. Vers. "Jesiah.") One of the sons of Jeduthun, appointed under him among the sacred harpers (1 Chron. xxv, 3), at the head of the eighth division of Levitical musicians (vers. 15). B.C. 1014.

Jeshua (Sept. 'Issur v. r. 'Issur, Vulg. Isiur, Author. Vers. "Jesiah.") A Levite of the family of Merari, who accompanied Hashabiah to the river Ahava, on the way from Babylon to Ecbatana (Ezra vii, 19).

Jeshua'nah (many Jeshua'nah) (Heb. Yehezakhan, יְהֶזְקָן, old q. d. פְּלַעַוְלַשׁ; Sept. Isauron v. r. 'Aron), a city of the kingdom of Israel, taken with its suburb from Jeroboam by Abijah, and mentioned as situated near Bethel and Ephraim (2 Chron. xii, 19). It appears to be the "village Iseras" (Iseroa), mentioned by Josephus as the scene of Herod's encounter with Pampus, the general of Antigonus (in Samaria, Ant. xiv, 15, 12, compare 'Issura, Ant. xvi, 11, 3). It is not mentioned by Jerome in the Onomasticon, unless we accept the conjecture of Reland (Pol. rest. p. 861), that "Jethubah, urbis antiqua Judææ" is at once a corruption and a translation of the name Jeshana. According to Schwarz (Polemest. p. 160), it is the modern village el-Sa-mom, two miles west of Bethel; but no such name appears on Zimmermann's map, unless it be Ain Sinua, a village surrounded by vineyards and fruit-trees, with vegetable gardens watered from a well, situated at a fork of the valley about a mile N.E. of Jafna (Robinson's Researches, ii, 86).

Jeshur'e'ah (some Jeshure'ah) (Heb. Yehezak'ah, יְהֶזְקָא, upright towards God; some copies read יְשָׁרִי, Yeure'ah; Septuag. 'Ispadai v. r. 'Isopai, Vulg. Isurela), the head of the seventh division of Levitical musicians (1 Chron. xxvi, 14); elsewhere called by the equivalent name Asarelah (ver. 2). B.C. 1014.

Jeshub'e'ab (Heb. Yehezk'ab, יְהֶזְקָב, seat of his father; Sept. 'Ispadai v. r. 'Isopai, Vulg. Ishbubah), the head of the fourteenth division of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxvii, 13). B.C. 1014.

Jeshur'ah (Heb. Yehez'ah, יְהֶזְזַע, upright) (Sept. 'Ispadai v. r. 'Isopai), the first named of the three sons of Caleb (son of Hezron) by his first wife Azubah (1 Chron. ii, 21).

Jeshur'ah (Bah. Yehez'ah, יְהֶזְזַע, upright) (Sept. 'Ispadai v. r. 'Isopai), the first named of the three sons of Caleb (son of Hezron) by his first wife Azubah (1 Chron. ii, 21).

Jeshua (1 Chron. xxiv, 11). See JESUS.

Jeshurun (Heb. Jeshuru'nu, יְשָׁוְרֻן), a poetical appellation of the people of Israel, used in the precepts and promises, occurring four times (Deut. xxxii, 15, Sept. 'Iseod, Vulg. dictetus; Deut. xxxix, 5, 26, and Isa. xxiv, 2 [A. Vers. in this latter passage "Jesurun"]; Sept. Ἰσσαρύμνος, Vulg. rectiusam). The term is according to Mercier in Pagnin, Thes. i. p. 1165; Mich. in Ecclus. 32, 15, and others a diminutive (after the name of Zebedee, Zebedus, Zebeduthus, etc.) from יהושע, i. e. (compare יִשְׂרֵאלִי and ḫḇ, q. d. rectus, a "rightful", i.e. the dear upright people). Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion have in Isaiah ἴσως, elsewhere ἱσιών. Kimchi says, "Israel is so called as being just among the nations"; so also Aben-Ezra and Saadia (in the Pesh.) interpret. Others, as Grotius, understand the word as a diminutive from "Israel" itself, and so apparently the Chalde, Syriac, and Saadia (in Isaiah), but against the analogy of derivation. Igen (De indre Israël, p. 25, and in Paulus, Memorabil. vi, p. 157) gives a far-fetched derivation from the Arabic, and other fanciful explanations may be seen in Jo. Oliupis's Dias, de 1793 (presumably Theod. Haseo, Bremere, 1780). The passages where it is employed seem to express the idea that in the character of the people, in comparison with the rest of the nations, they were just and upright. Thus, in the year 879, the prophet Haggai's utterances are addressed to Jeshua (Hagg. i, 1; ii, 2), and his name occurs in two of the symbolic prophecies of Zechariah (i, 10; vi, 11-15). In the first of these passages, Jeshua, as pontiff, represents the Jewish people covered at first with the garb of slaves, and afterwards with the new and glorious vestures of deliverance. In the second he wears for a moment the crown of silver and gold, as symbols of the sacerdotal and regal crowns of Israel, which were to be united on the head of the Messiah.—Kitto. See Hagg. Haggai. He is probably the person whom Josephus (Ant. vi, 11) has alluded to in Ezra ii, 36; Neh. vii, 39. See JERUSALEM.

Jeshua (Josh. i, 12), the name of one of the Levites appointed by Ezra to take charge of the offerings for the sacred services (Ezra viii, 38). B.C. ante 450.

Jeshua (Heb. 'Isa'yu, יִשְׁעַי), perhaps first, otherwise living: once 'Isa'yu, either by prothesis, or wordy, 1 Chron. ii, 13; Sept. and N. T. (Isaiah; Josephus 'Isaiou, Anti. vi, 1), a son (or descendant) of Obed, the son of Boaz and Ruth (Ruth iv, 17, 22; Matt. i. 5; Luke iii, 32; 1 Chron. ii, 12). He was the father of eight sons (1 Chron. vii, 12), the youngest of whom, David, is reflected all the distinction which belongs to the name, although the latter, as being of humble birth, was often reproached by his enemies with his youthfulness (1 Sam. xx, 27, 30, 31; xxii, 7, 8, xv. 10; 2 Sam. xx, 1, 11; 1 Kings ii, 16; 2 Chron. xx. 1). See JESUS (1 Chron. xxi, 1-9). Jeshua (Ishua, Jeshua), a city of Judah inhabited after the captivity, mentioned in connection with Jehovah, Moladah, and other towns in the lowlands of Judah (Neh. xi, 29). According to Schwarz (Paulist, p. 116), it is the village Yeshua near Khulda, five English miles east of Ekron; doubtless the village Yeshua [locally pronounced Esh-va] seen by Dr. Robinson (new edit. of Researches, iii, 135). A similar town is on Van de Velde's Map on wady Thurb, between Zorah and Chesalon.
that he must have been aware of the high destinies which awaited his son, but it is doubtful if he ever lived to see them realized (see 1 Sam. xvii, 12). The last historical mention of Jesse is in relation to the asylum which David procured for him with the king of Moab (1 Sam. xxiii, 3). B.C. cir. 1068–1061. See David.

According to an ancient Jewish tradition, recorded in the Talmud, the Messianic expecation was to be found among the sons or descendants of the vassals of the sanctuary; but as there is no contradiction, so there is no corroboration of this in the Bible, and it is possible that it was suggested by the occurrence of the word orégin, 'weavers', in connection with a member of his family. See JÁAHE-ORÉGIN. Who were the Jesseans we are not told. The family contained, in addition to the sons, two female members—Zeruiah and Abigail; but it is uncertain whether these were Jesse's daughters, for, though they are called the sisters of his sons (1 Chron. ii, 18), yet Abigail is said to have been the daughter of Nahash (2 Sam. xxi, 18). Of this, two explanations have been proposed. (1) The Jewish: that Nahash was another name for Jesse (Jerome, Quast. Hebr. on 2 Sam. xvii, 25, and the Targum on Ruth iv, 22). (2) Prof. Stanley's: that Jesse's wife had formerly been wife or concubine to Nahash, possibly the king of the Ammonites (Jewish Church, ii, 39, 51). See NAHAŞ.

Jesse, TREE OF, in ecclesiastical architecture, is a representation of the genealogy of Christ on scrolls of foliage so arranged as to represent a tree, and was quite a common subject for sculpture, painting, and embroidery. In ancient churches, the candlesticks often took this form, and was therefore called a Jesse. See Parker, Gloss. Archit. s. v.; Walcott, Sacred Archaeology, p. 338.

Jesu'zù (Ierosoví v. Tépoví and Tri'poví, 1 Esdr. y 26, or Iesu'zù (Iepoví, 1 Esdr. viii, 63), corrupt forms (see Ezra ii, 40; viii, 33) of the name of JESÚA (q. v.). JESÚS is likewise used in modern poetry for the name of Jesus, our Saviour, especially as a vocative or genitive.

Jesusites, a monastic order, so called because its members frequently pronounced the name of Jesus. The founders were John of Colombi, gondaloniere, and Francis Mino Vincentini of Sienna. This institution was confirmed by Urban V in the year 1368, and continued till the seventeenth century, when it was suppressed by Clement IX. The persons belonging to it professed poverty, and adhered to the institute of Augustine. They were not, however, admitted to holy orders, but professed to assist the poor with their prayers and other offices, and prepared medicines for them, which they distributed freely; we find them castrated, and sometimes called Apostolic Clerks. They were also known as the Congregation of Saint Hieronymus, their patron. Having become largely interested in the distillery of brandies, etc., they were by the people called Padri dell' acqua vitae. A female order of the same name, and a branch of the male order, was founded by Catharina Colombina. They still continue to exist in Italy as a branch organization of the Augustinian order. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.; Farrar, Ecclesiast. Dict., p. 340; Helvétius, Geschichte d. Kluster und Bistümerordien, iii, 484 sq.

Jesuits, or the Society of Jesus (Societas Jesu), the most celebrated among the monastic institutions of the Roman Catholic Church.

I. Foundation of the Order.—It was founded by the Spanish nobleman Don Ignacio (Ignatius) of Loyola (q. v.). Thrift for glory caused him at an early age to enter the army. Having been wounded, May 20, 1521, during the siege of Pamplona by the French, he turned to the spiritual life during the slow progress of his recovery from his former favorite reading of knight's novels to the study of the life of Jesus and the saints. His heated imagination suggested to him an arena in which even greater distinction could be won than in a military life, and he resolved henceforth to devote his life to the service of God and of the Church. Having recovered, he first went to the Benedictine abbey of Montserrat, where, after a general confession, he took the vow of chastity, hung up his sword and dagger on the altar, and then proceeded to Manresa, where, after a short stay in the hospital, he hid himself in a rocky cavern near the town, in order to devote himself wholly to prayer and meditation. He has left to posterity a description of his first draft of the "Spiritual Exercises" (Exercitii Spiritualitatis), a work in which 1548 a brief of pope Paul III warmly commended to all the faithful, and to which the thorough warrior-like discipline that characterizes the order of the Jesuits, and the ultra papal system of which they have been the pioneers, is largely due. As Ignatius himself subsequently states, the idea of a new religious order which was to take a front rank under the banner of Christ in the combat against the prince of darkness likewise originated with him at this time. During a brief pilgrimage which Ignatius made in 1528 to Palestine, he became aware that he utterly lacked the necessary literary qualification for carrying out the plans which he had conceived. Accordingly, when he had returned to Spain, he entered a grammar-school at Barcelona, and subsequently visited the universities of Alcalá and Salamanca, and lastly studied at Valencia. In 1538 he acquired the title of doctor of philosophy. In Paris Ignatius gradually gathered around himself the first members of the order he intended to found. His first associates were Lefévre (Petrus Faber), from Savoy, Francis of Xavier, from Navarre, and, from the Spanish Dominicans, Salmeron, Nicolaus Bobacilla, and Simon Rodriguez. They were for the first time called together by Ignatius in July, 1538, and soon after, on August 15, the festival of the Assumption of Mary, they took the vows of poverty, chastity, and of making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, in order to lay the foundations for the later colonization of the intifide. In case they should be unable to carry out this project within one year after their arrival in Venice, they would go to Rome and place themselves at the disposal of the pope. On Jan. 6, 1537, Ignatius was joined in Venice by all of his disciples and some more Frenchmen—Le Jay, Codure, and Brouet. All took, two months later, holy orders, but their plan to go to Jerusalem they could not execute, as the republic of Venice was at war with sultan Soliman II. They consequently went to Rome to await the orders of the pope. Paul III received them kindly, gave them the necessary letters, and for the next two years Ignatius presided over the general chapter in Rome, and prepared the constitutions and for the pontifical intifide. In March, 1538, the other associates also arrived in Rome, and it was now formally resolved to establish a new religious order. Ignatius was elected to submit their plan to the pope, and to obtain his sanction. This was given on Sept. 27, 1540, in the bull Regimini Militantis ecclesie, which, however, restricted the number of profesi to forty. Three years later (March 14, 1548), another bull, Injunctum Nobis, removed this restriction. Sceptantically Ignatius accepted the dignity of the first general of the order, to which he had been unanimously elected. He entered upon his office on April 17, 1541; and soon after, in accordance with the request of Paul III, the draft of the constitution of the new order was made by him (not, as is often maintained, by Lainez; see Jerome, Constit. p. 191). Being before finally sanctioned, the constitution was to undergo several revisions; but before these were made, Ignatius died, July 31, 1556.

II. Constitution and Form of Government.—The laws regulating the order are contained in the so-called insitutum (official edition, Prague, 1575, 2 vols.; new edit. Avignon, 1827–38). The work opens with a collection of all the bulls and decrees of the apostolic see concerning the new society. This is followed by a list of the privileges which have been granted to the order, and by the General Examination, which serves as an introduction to the constitutions, and is laid before every applicant for admission. The most important portion of the code, the constitutions, consists of ten chapters, to each of which are added explanations (Declarations), which, according to the intentions of the founder, are to be equally valid as the constitutions. Next follow the decrees and canons of the general congregations; the provincial constitutions (Rationum Studiorum) of 1615, however, in 1832 were considerably changed by the general Joseph Rootham, the decrees of the generals (Ordinationes Generalium), as they were revised by the eighth General Congregation in 1615; and, in conclusion, by three sacret writings—the Industria ad curandum anima minorum collegiis et societati Aquaviva, a spiritual Rule of Exercices of Ignatius, and the Directorium, an official instruction for the right use of these exercises. At the head of the order is a general (Præpositus Generalis), who is elected for life, must reside at Rome, and is only subject to the pope. His power is unlimited, as the Council of Assistants has only a deliberative vote. He is, however, bound to the constitutions, which he can neither change nor set aside. The constitution provides for the deposition of a general in particular cases by the General Congregation, but the case has not yet occurred. For the administration of the provinces into which the order has been divided the generals appoint the provincials for the term of three years. Several provinces are united into an assistentium, which is represented in the council of the general by an assistant. There were in 1871 five assistants for Italy, France, Spain, England, and Germany. The assistants are appointed by the General Congregation, but in case of the death of an assistant the general can substitute another, with the consent of the majority of the provincials. Subordinate to the prelats are the prepositi, who govern the houses of the professed, and the rector, who governs the collegium and the novices. They are likewise assisted by assistants appointed by the general. At the head of the minor establishments (residuium) are "superiors." Each of these officers has by his side a consultor to advise, and a monitor to watch and admonish. As in every religious order, the members are divided into priests and lay brothers (Coadjutores temporales). The latter take the simple vows after a two-years' novitiate, and the solemn vows after having been in the order for at least ten years. Those candidates who, on entering the order, leave their future employment entirely to the disposition of their superiors, are called Indiciertres; but, according to the decrees of the General Congregation, their final destination must be assigned to them at least within two years. The candidates for the priesthood are, during the first two years, Novitii scholastici; then, after binding themselves to the order by taking simple vows, they become Scholastici approachi, devote themselves for several years to classical and philosophical studies, and are for some time employed as teachers or educators in the colleges, before they begin the study of theology, which lasts for four years. After the completion of the theological course they are ordained priests, and now enter into a third novitiate, the sole object of which is to increase their zeal. At the end of this novitiate the candidate is admitted to the solemn profession of the vows, and enrolled either in the class of the professed or that of the spiritual concluders. Only the former class, the professed, who take the fourth vow of perfect observance, the novitiate, and the full rights of members of the society. The professed of a province every third year meet in a provincial congregation, and out of their midst choose a procurator, who has to make a report on the affairs and condition of the province to the general. On the death of a general the Provincial Congregation elects two disputers, who, together with the provincials, constitute the General Congregation, which elects the new general. In this General Congregation the supreme legislative power is vested; it can be called together on extraordinary occasions by the general, and, in case the latter neglects his duty, by the assistants. Thus the order bears the aspect of military aristocracy, and never, during the whole history of the Church of Rome, have the popes had in their service a body of men so thoroughly disciplined. "Before any one could become a member, he was severely and appropriately tested in the novitiate. Of the actual members, only a few choice spirits reached the perfect dignity of the professed, from whom alone were called to fill the superior offices in the provincials, constituting a well-organized train of authorities up to the general. Every individual was powerful in his appropriate sphere, but in every act he was closely watched and guarded lest he should transgress the rules. He was given an essential part in his perfect nature. To submit in the latter part of his novitiate, and strengthened by every spiritual means, that a single arbitrary but inflexible will controlled every movement of the order in all parts of the world. Although every individual possessed no more will of his own than the particular members of the human body, he expected to be placed in precisely that position in which his talents would be best developed for the common benefit; in exercises of monastic devotion, in literary and scientific pursuits, in the secular life of courts, or in strange adventures and eminent offices among savage nations." (Haen, Chrest. Hist., v. 3, p. 63.)

III. History from 1540 to 1750.—On the death of Ignatius the General Congregation could not meet immediately, as the Spaniards, who were at war with the pope, blocked up the roads to Rome. On June 19, 1557, Jacob Lainez, the most gifted member of the order, was elected; the second general of the society. But the constitutions were once more revised, and unanimously adopted; but the pope (Paul IV.) disliked several of its provisions, and in particular wished to have the general elected for a term of only three years, and an observance of the canonical hours. So he submitted in the latter points, but when the aged pope soon after died they returned to their original practice. The society spread rapidly, and numbered at the death of Lainez (Jan. 19, 1565) eighteen provinces and 130 houses. During the administration of the two following generals, the Spanish Francis Borga (1565–72) and the Belgian Merian (1572–80), the order was greatly favored by the popes, and new provinces were organized in Peru, Mexico, and Poland. The fourth General Congregation, on Feb. 19, 1581, elected, as general the Neapolitan Claudio Aquaviva (1581–1610), a man of rare administrative genius, who succeeded in maintaining the unity and the only internal commutation of importance through which it has passed, and who, next to its founder, has done more than any other general in moulding its character. The leading Spanish Jesuits, mortified at seeing the general who had been their idol begin to regard as a domain of their nationality, pass into the hands of Italian, meditated an entire decentralization of the order and the hegemony of the Spaniards at the expense of the unity and the monarchical principle. The plan met with the approval of Philip II; but the energy of the pope Sixtus V., who took sides with Aquaviva, foiled it. Under Clement VIII the Spaniards renewed their scheme, and the commotion produced by them became so great that in 1578 the fifth General Congregation (the first extraordinary one) was convoked. The Spaniards hoped that Aquaviva would be removed, but again their designs were defeated by the administration of the general sustained. The administrative crisis was followed by violent doctrinal controversies. The book of the Portuguese Jesuit Molina involved the order in a quarrel with the Dominican, and a work (published in 1599) in which the Spanish Jesuit Martin juridic question was raised a second of indemnities against the society throughout Europe, although Aquaviva, in 1614, strictly forbade all members of the order to advance this doctrine. During the administration of Aquaviva (about 1660) the order numbered 27 provinces, 21 houses of professed, 267 colleges, 38 novitiates, 90 residences, and 10,581 members. During the adminization of the Roman Mutius Vitelleschi (1615–45) the order celebrated its first centenary (1640). The eighth General Congregation, on Jan. 7, 1645, elected as general the Neapolitan Vincenzo Caraffa. On January 1 of this year pope Innocent X issued a brief, according to which a General Congregation was to be held every ninth year, and the administration of the superiors was left to the Jesuits. The large measure was repealed by Alexander VII (Jan, 1, 1668); the former did not take effect until 1661, as the short administration of the generals Vincenzo Caraffa († June 8, 1649), Francis Piccolomini († June 17, 1651), and Alois Gottfried had practically sufficed. At the first session of the General Congregation for the first time elected as a general a German, Guiswin Nickel, of Julich, to whom, on account of his retired age, the eleventh Congregation, on June 7, 1661, gave Paul Ottilas as coadjutor, with the right of succession. Oliva was general for more than seventeen years, and was succeeded by the Belgian Noyelle (1682–86) and the Spaniard Thyrus Gonzalez (1687–1705). Pope Innocent XI was unfavorable to the order, and in 1684 the Congregation of the Propaganda forbade it to receive any more novices; but in 1686 this decree was cancelled by Innocent himself. Gonzalez caused considerable trouble by advocating a rigid doctrine of Probabilism, which had been generally taught by the theologians of the society. He was succeeded by the generals Tamburini (1706–30), Retz (1730–50), Visconti (1751–55), Centurione (1755–57), Ricci (1758– 79); under the latter the order was suppressed (1773). The Jesuits had really to fight against the growing strength of Pettrich, rapidly increased in strength. It numbered in 1720 5 assistants, 37 provinces, 24 houses of professed, 612 colleges, 59 novitiates, 340 residences, 175 seminaries, 200 missions, and 19,998 members, among whom were 9957 priests. In 1762 the order had increased to 138 provinces, 629 college, 61 novitiates, 178 seminaries, 336 residences, 223 missions, and 22,787 members, among whom were 11,010 priests.

Soon after the establishment of the order, the pope, the bishops, and those monarchs who were opposed to the Reformation recognized the Jesuits as the most efficient organization for saving the old Church. Thus the spread of the order was rapid. At the Council of Trent the Spanish ambassadors declared that their king, Philip II, knew only two ways to stay the advance of the Reformation, the education of good preachers, and the Jesuits. Cells were consequently founded in various countries for members of the order, but, as they not only opposed Protestantism, but defended the most exclusive claims of the popes with regard to secular governments, they soon encountered a violent resistance on the part of those governments which refused a submission to the dictates of the papacy. In many cases the bishops sided against them, as the Jesuits were found to be always ready to extend the papal at the cost of the episcopal authority. This was especially the case in the republic of Venice, where the patriarch Trevisani showed himself their decided opponent. Subsequently, when they defended the interest which Paul V had pronounced against Venice, they were expelled (1606), and not until 1656 did pope Alexander VII succeed in obtaining from the republic a reluctant consent to their return. At the beginning of the 18th century the Piedmontese viceroy in Sicily, Maffei, expelled them from that island, because they were again the most eager among the clergy to enforce a papal interdict, nowhere did the order render to the Church of Rome so great services as in Germany and the northern countries of Europe, where Protestantism had become predominant. While taking part in all the efforts against the spread of Protestantism, the Jesuits undertook a particular zeal for the establishment of educational institutions, and for gaining the confidence of the princes. In both respects they met with considerable success. Their colleges at Ingolstadt, Munich, Vienna, Prague, Cologne, Trevies, Mentz, Augsburg, Ellwangen, and other places became highly prosperous, and attracted a large number of pupils, especially from the aristocratic families, most of whom remained throughout life warm supporters of all the schemes of the order. Under emperor Rudolph II the Jesuits established themselves in all parts of Germany. At most of the courts Jesuits were confessors of the reigning princes, and invariably used their influence to press for the latest measures against Protestantism. At the instigation of the Jesuits a counter-reformation was forcibly carried through in a number of provinces in which Protestantism, before their arrival, appeared to be sure of success. Thus, in particular, Austria, Bavaria, and Poland were either gained back by them or preserved for the Church of Rome, and from 1648 to 1748 they are said to have persuaded no less than forty-five princes of the empire to join the Roman Catholic Church. As advisors of the princes, they became to so high a degree involved in political affairs that frequently even the generals of the order and the pope deemed it necessary to recommend to them a greater caution. They were called into Hungary by the archbishop of Gran as early as 1561, but there, as well as in Transylvania, the vicissitudes of the religious wars for a long time prevented them from gaining a firm footing. When, however, the policy of the Austrian government finally succeeded in breaking the strength of the Protestant party, the Jesuits became all-powerful. In 1767 they had in these two countries 18 colleges, 20 residences, 11 missionary stations, and 560 members. In Poland, Petrus Canisius appeared in 1556, and in 1727 the Jesuits were granted the right of establishing colleges. Six years later the favor of king Stephen Bathori empowered the Jesuits to found a number of colleges, and to secure the education of the nearly whole aristocracy. John Casimir, the brother of Vladislaw IV, even entered the order on Sept. 25, 1645, and, although never ordained priest, was made cardinal in 1647; yet, after the death of his brother, he became king of Poland (1648–68). The Jesuit Posevins was in 1681 sent as ambassador of Gregory XIII to Ivan IV of Russia, and subsequently the Jesuit Vota made a fruitless attempt to unite the Greek with the Roman Catholic Church. Peter the Great, in 1714, expelled the few Jesuits who at that time were laboring in his dominions. In Sweden, in 1578, the Jesuits induced the king, John III, to make a cecret a profession of the Roman Catholic faith; and queen Christina, the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus, was likewise prevailed on in 1650 by the Jesuits, Cavedo and Cassati, to join the Church of Rome; but, with regard to the people at large, the efforts of the Jesuits were entirely fruitless. To England, Salmeron and Brouet were sent by Ignatius. They were unable to prevent the separation of the English Church from Rome, but they confirmed James V of Scotland in the Roman Catholic faith, encouraged the people of Ireland in their opposition to the English king and the Anglican reformation, and, having returned to the Continent, established several colleges for the education of Roman Catholic priests for England. Elizabeth expelled all the Jesuits from her dominions. In 1660, the Jesuit Cavedo was permitted to return to England, and brought about a reconciliation against Charles II and the state, in consequence of which six members of the order were put to death. The first Jesuits who were brought to the Netherlands were some Spanish members of the order, who, during the war between France and Charles V, were ordered to leave France, but were given a better welcome in the Netherlands than in the other countries, and the magistrates in the cities, on whose consent the authorization to establish colleges was made contingent, generally opposed them; but they overcame the opposition, and in the southern provinces (Belgium) soon became more numerous and influential than in most of the other European countries. They attracted great attention by their attacks upon Bajus and the Jansenists, both of whom were condemned at Rome at their instigation. In the northern provinces (Holland) stringent laws were repeatedly passed against them, and they were charged with being moral philosophers. The bishop of William of Orange, as well as with the attempt against the life of Maurice of Nassau, but both charges were indignantly denied by the order.

In France, where the Jesuits established a novitiate at Paris as early as 1540, they encountered from the beginning the most determined opposition of the University and the French bishops. But it was only in 1550 that the cardinal of Lorraine obtained for them a favorable patent from Henry II, but the Parliament refused to record it. In 1561 Lainez received from the Synod of Poissy the concession that the Jesuits should be permitted to establish themselves at Paris under the name of "Fathers of the College of Clermont." This college, which was sanctioned by Charles IX in 1565, and by Henry III in 1580, attained a high degree of prosperity, and in the middle of the 17th century numbered upwards of 2000 pupils. In the last part of the 17th century, the Jesuits gained a greater influence than in the north, and were generally regarded as the leaders in the violent struggle of the Catholic party for the arrest and suppression of Calvinism. They were closely allied with the Ligue, but general Aquaviva disapproved the openness of this alliance, and reconciled father Sommieri, who was instrumental in bringing about the alliance, to Italy and Belgium. The Jesuit Toletus brought about the reconciliation between the Ligue and Henry IV, who remained a warm protector of the order. Nevertheless, the Jesuits were charged with the attempts made upon the life of Henry II by Chatel (1548) and by the Jesuits who had before been charged with complicity in the plot of Clement (1589) against Henry III. The Parliament of Paris instituted, accordingly, proceedings against the Jesuit Guignard, who had been the instructor of Chatel, sentenced him to death, deprived the Jesuits of their goods, and expelled them from France. Henry IV was, however, prevailed upon to recall them, continued to be their protector, and again chose a Jesuit as his confessor. The same office was filled by members of the order during nearly the whole reign of Louis XIII, Louis XIV, and Louis XV, and through the royal council and the parlements, and before did not exercise a very conspicuous influence upon the policy of the kings both at home and abroad. The connivance of these confessors with the scandalous lives of the kings did more than anything else to undermine the respect for the Roman Catholic Church, and for religion in general, among the educated classes. To Rome, however, they rendered invaluable services by heading the opposition against Louis XIV and the bishops when the latter jointly tried to enforce throughout the Catholic Church of France submission to the four Gallican articles, and after effecting a full reconciliation between Rome and Louis, by securing the aid of the secular arm for arresting the progress and averting a victory of Jansenism, which had obtained full control of the best intellects in the Church of France. In Spain, which had been the cradle of the order, its success was remarkably rapid. As early as 1556 the provinces of Aragon and Andalusia had been organized. They were, however, opposed by the learned Melchor Camus; in Saragossa they were expelled by the archbishop, and the Inquisition repeatedly drove them before their tribunal as suspected of heresy. But the royal favor of the Duke of Alba, Philip II, III, and IV kept their influence unimpaired. In Portugal, Francis Xavier and Simon Rodriguez visited Lisbon on their way to India. They were well received by the king, and Rodriguez was induced to remain, and became the founder of a province, which soon belonged to the most prosperous of the order.

IV. Suppression of the Order (1750-78).—In the middle of the 18th century the order was at the zenith of its power. As confessors of most of the reigning princes and a large number of the first aristocratic families, and as the instructors and educators of the children, they wielded a controlling influence on the destinies of most of the Catholic countries of Europe. As such, they amassed great wealth, which they tried to increase by bold commercial speculations. Both influence and wealth they used with untiring energy, and with a consistency of which the history of the world hardly knows a parallel, for the development of their ultra papal system. In protest against it they were expelled from all their countries and every form of belief opposed to the Church of Rome, and within the Church blind and immediate submission to the doctrinal decision of the infallible pope; in point of ecclesiastical polity, the weakening of the episcopal benefit of the papal authority, the defence of the most exorbitant claims of the pope with regard to secular government, and a controlling influence upon the popes by the order—these were the prominent features of the Jesuit system. As the Jesuits were anxious to crush out everything opposed to the Roman Catholic Church, they undertook a struggle in which these elements should, in self-defence, combine for planning the destruction of so formidable an antagonist. As the Jesuits had attained their influential position chiefly through the favor of the princes, the same method was adopted for crushing them. The first great victory was won by the king of Portugal. The Jesuits therein Calvhalo, better known under the title (which he received in 1770) of marquis of Pombal, probably the greatest statesman which Portugal has ever had, was fully convinced that commerce and industry, and all the material interests of the country, could be successfully developed only when the Jesuits were withdrawn from the depressing connection with the hierarchy and the nobility, and that the first step towards effecting such a revolution was the removal of the Jesuits. Opportunities for disposing the king against the order soon offered. In Paraguay, a portion of which had in 1768 been ceded by Spain to Portugal, an insurrection of the natives broke out against the new rule. The Jesuits, according to their own accounts, had established in Paraguay a theocratic form of government, which gave them the most absolute power over the minds of the natives. They were therefore opposed to the ecclesiastics of a portion of this territory to Portugal, and spared no efforts to prevent them. When, therefore, the natives rose generally in insurrection, it was the general opinion that an insurrection in a country like Paraguay was impossible without at least the connivance of the Jesuits. They were therefore dismissed from the country, and the Jesuits were withdrawn from them all priestly functions. An attempt to assassinate the king (Sept. 3, 1768) supplied an occasion for impeaching them of high treason, as the slate from Portugal and converted him into Portugal, and the pope employed his accomplices. The two accused denied the guilt, and the writers of the order generally represent the whole affair as arranged by Pombal in order to give him a new pretext for criminal proceedings against the order. On Sept. 3, 1769, a royal decree forever excluded the Jesuits from Portugal, and the order (Castile, Aragon, and Andalusia) was dissolved. Most of the Jesuits were, on board of government ships, sent to Italy; and one of their prominent members, Malagrida, was in 1761 burned at the stake. The pope, in vain, had interceded for them; the nuncio had to leave the country in 1780, and all connection with Rome was broken off.
In France the numerous enemies of the order found a welcome opportunity for arousing public opinion against it in the commercial speculations of the Jesuit Lavalle, the superior of the mission of Martinique. When, in the war between France and England, his ships were captured, his creditors applied for payment to father De Sacy, whom the Jesuits had driven to seek refuge in Paris. He satisfied them, and instructed Lavalle to abstain from speculations in future. When Lavalle disregarded these instructions, and when, consequently, new losses occurred, amounting to 2,400,000 livres, Sacy refused to hold himself responsible. The creditors applied to the Parlement with the result that Lavalle was publicly denounced and identified as a Jesuit. The Parlement demanded a copy of the constitution of the order for examination. On April 18, 1761, a decree of Parliament suppressed the congregations of the Jesuits; on May 8 the whole order was declared to be responsible for the debt of Lavalle; and on August 6 the constitution of the order was declared to be an encroachment upon Church and State, twenty-four works of Jesuit authors were burned as heretical and dangerous to good morals, and the order was excluded from educational institutions. A protest from the king (August 10) was disregarded. On September 29, 1761, the Parlement for one year, was as unsuccessful as the intercession of the majority of the French bishops and of pope Clement XIII. Other Parliaments of France followed the example given by the Paris Parliament: on April 1, 1763, eighty colleges of the order were closed; and on August 30, 1763, the Holy Office, in a letter addressed to the parlements of France, declared the constitution of the Jesuits to be godless, sacrilegious, and injurious to Church and State, and the vows of the order to be void and null. In the beginning of 1764 all the members were ordered to forswear their vows, and to declare that their constitution was punishable, abominable, and in accordance with the laws of the land, among them father Cerutti, who two years before had written the best apology of the order. On Nov. 26, 1764, Choiseul obtained the sanction of the king for a decree which banished the Jesuits from France as dangerous to the state. Clement XIII, the steadfast friend of the order, replied to the royal decree on Jan. 8, 1766, by the bull Apostolicam, in which he again approved the order and its constitution.

In Spain, Aranda, the minister of Charles III, was as successful as Pombal in Portugal and Choiseul in France. During the months from Sept. 2 to Sept. 5, 1766, all the Jesuits of the kingdom, about 6000 in number, were seized and transported to the papal territory. When the pope refused to receive them, they were landed in Corsica, where they remained a few months, until, in 1769, that island was annexed to France. They were then again expelled, and this time found refuge in the papal territory. In Naples from 3000 to 4000 Jesuits were seized in the night from Nov. 3 to 4, 1767, by order of the regent Tanucci, the guardian of the minor Ferdinand IV, and likewise transported to the States of the Church. The government of Parma seized the Jesuits on Feb. 7, 1768, because the pope, claiming to be the feudal sovereign of Parma, had issued a bull declaring an order of the Parmaese government (the Pragmatic Sanction of Jan. 16, 1768) null and void, and excommunicating its authors. All the Bourbon courts took sides in this question with Parma, forbade the publication of the order, and were allowed to live together in their former colleges as societies of secular priests. In France the brief was not officially promulgated, and the Jesuits, otherwise so ultra papal in their views of the validity of papal briefs, now inferred from this circumstance that the order had not been abolished in France at all. In Prussia Frederick II forbade the promulgation of the brief, and in 1775 obtained permission from Pius VI to leave the Jesuits undisturbed. Soon, however, to please the Bourbon courts, the Prussian Jesuits were requested to lay aside the dress of the order, and Frederick William II abolished all their houses. In Russia Catherine II also forbade the promulgation of the brief, and ordered the Jesuits to continue their organization. The Jesuits reasoned that, since the brief in Rome itself had not been published in due form, they had a right to comply with the imperial request until the brief should be officially promulgated. This was the step taken by the Russian bishop as unauthorized; orally, however, as the Jesuits maintain, he repeatedly confirmed what officially he had disowned. Thus the Jesuits attempt to clear themselves from the charge of having disobeyed the pope, by charging the latter with deliberate duplicity. The Russian Jesuits were placed. under the vice-generals Czerniewicz (1782-85), Lienkiewicz (1785-98), and Careu (1790-1802). The brief of Clement XIV was in 1801 repealed by Pius VII, so far as Russia was concerned, and the next superior of the Russian Jesuits, Gabriel Gruber (1802-5), assumed the title of a general for Russia, and since July 31, 1804, also for Naples. The successor of Gruber, Brzozowski (1805-20), lived to see the restoration of the order by the pope. Soon after (1815) the persecution of the order began in Russia; Dec. 20, 1815, they were expelled from St. Petersburg, in 1820 from all Russia. In other countries of Europe the ex-Jesuits had formed societies which served as substitutes of the abolished order. In Belgium the ex-Jesuits De Broglie and Tournelley established in 1794 the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, which, after its expulsion from Belgium, established its centre in Austria. In accordance with the wish of the pope, and through the mediation of archbishop Migazzi, of Vienna, this society, under the successor of Tournelley (+1797), father Varin, united, on April 8, 1799, with the Baccarantic (q.v.), or Fathers of the Faith of Jesus. Under this name Baccaranti (or Baccarantic), a layman of Trent, had, in union with several others, established in 1798 a society in Italy, which, after the union with the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, made considerable progress in Italy, France, Germany, and England. Most of the members hoped gradually to smooth the way for a reunion with the Jesuits in Russia; but as Baccaranti, who in the mean while had been elected as a priest, did not appear to be in sincere sympathy with this project, he was abandoned by many members and by whole houses. In 1807 he was even arrested by order of Pius VII, but the French liberated him in 1809, since which year he entirely disappeared. The last house of the society, that of St. Sylvester, in Rome, joined the restored Jesuits in 1814.

V. History of the Order from its Restoration in 1814 to 1871. Soon after its return from the French captivity, Pius VII promulgated (Aug. 7, 1814) the bull Abdicantia sibi, by which he restored the order of the Jesuits for the whole earth. Father Panizzone, in the name of the general of the order, Brozowski, who resided in Russia, received back from the pope the church Al Gesu, in Rome. When Brozowski died, the order had to pass through a severe trial. The vicar-general of the order, in union with the priest Pietroboni, tried to curtail the electoral freedom of the General Congregation, and his plans were supported by cardinal Della Genga; but the other members invoked the intervention of the pope, and, of freedom of election having been secured, elected as general father Fortis, of Veronza (1820-29), who was succeeded by father Roothman, of Amsterdam (1829-53), and father Baxx, a Belgian (elected July 2, 1853). Within a few years after the restoration the order had again established itself in all parts of Italy. Ferdinand III, in 1815, called them to Modena; and the ex-king of Sardinia, Emanuel IV, entered the order in 1815; he died in 1819. The fear which the election of cardinal Della Genga as pope in 1823 caused to the order proved to be unfounded, for the new pope (Leo XII) was henceforth the warm patron of the Jesuits, and restored to them the Roman college (1824). They were expelled from Naples and Fiume in consequence of the revolutionary movements in 1820 and 1821, but were soon restored. In 1836 they were admitted to the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and in Venzone cardinal Odoracchi in 1838 entered the novitiate, but died in 1841. General Bozhan witnessed the expulsion of the Jesuits from all Italy, and from Rome, 1848, but he lived to see their restoration in Naples and Rome in 1850. The war of 1859 again destroyed the provinces of Naples and Sicily; in 1866 also Venice. In Spain, Ferdinand VII, by decree of May 15, 1815, declared the charges which former Spanish governments had made against the Jesuits false. The revolution of 1820 drove them from their houses, and on Nov. 17, 1829, twenty-five of them were killed; but when the insurrection was in 1824 subdued by the French, the Jesuits returned. In the civil war of 1834 they were again expelled; in Madrid a fearful riot was excited against them by the report that they had poisoned the wells, and fourteen were massacred. The Jesuits were again established in the Spanish dominions by a decree of the Cortes. Since 1848 they began slowly to return, but the law, which had not been repealed, was again enforced against them by the revolution of 1868. Only in Cuba they remained undisturbed. To Portugal the Jesuits were restored in 1827. In 1832 they received the college of Coimbra, where they numbered the great-grandson of Pombal among their pupils. After the overthrow of Dom Miguel, the laws of Pombal were again enforced against them by Dom Pedro, and ever since they have been excluded from Portugal. In France a number of interrupted attempts, immediately after the restoration of the order, to desire to place the boys' seminaries under their charge, and Talleyrand declared himself in favor of their legal restoration, but the king did not consent. Nevertheless, the number and the influence of the Jesuits increased. In 1829 the number of pupils in the Jesuit colleges in France amounted to 20,000. The revolution of July, 1830, dissolved all the houses of the order, and drove all the members out of France; but gradually many returned, and Ravignan, in Paris, gained the reputation of being one of the first pulpit orators of his country. On motion of Thiers, the Chamber of Deputies, in 1848, requested the government to abolish the order in France; but the government preferred to send a special ambassador (Rossi) to Rome in order to obtain the suppression of the Jesuits from the pope. Gregory XVI declined to make any direct concessions, but the general of the order, on request of the government, in France in order to evade the storm rising against the order. The revolution of 1848, the government of Louis Napoleon, and the revolution of 1870, left them undisturbed, and they were allowed to erect a considerable number of colleges in the four provinces into which the Frankish empire is divided. In England the bill for the abolition of the order, to live in common. In 1790 they received from Thomas Weld the castle of Stonyhurst, which soon became one of the most popular educational institutions of the English Roman Catholics. In 1860 they were allowed to join the Russian branch of the order. In Belgium the fathers of the Faith joined in 1814 the restored order. The Dutch government expelled the Jesuits, but they returned after the Belgian revolution of 1830, and soon became very numerous. The Jesuits in who in 1820 had been expelled from Russia were re-admitted in 1846. Others were called to Hungary by the archbishop of Cobaza, and father Landes made his appearance in Vienna. As they secured the special patronage of the emperor and the imperial family, they gained a great influence, and were, as in all other countries, the bulwarks of the most dangerous enemies of religious and civil liberty. They were therefore expelled by the revolution of 1848, but returned again when the revolutionary movement was subdued, and received from the Austrian government in 1857 the theological faculty of the University of Innsbruck. To Switzerland eight Fathers of the Faith were in 1805 called from Rome by the government of Valais. They soon broke off the connection with Baccanari, and in 1810 were incorporated with the society in Russia. After the restoration of the order, they soon established colleges in other Catholic cantons, particularly in Freiburg, Lucerne, and Schwyz. When the government of the canton of Lucerne, on Oct. 24, 1844, resolved to place the episcopal seminary of the city of Lucerne under the charge of the Jesuits, two volunteer expeditions (Dec. 1444, and March, 1445) were undertaken for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Lucerne, but without success. As most of the Protestant cantons demanded the expulsion of the Jesuits from the whole of Switzerland, those cantons which either had called Jesuits to cantonal institutions or which patronized them (namely, Lucerne, Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Freiburg, and Valais) strengthened a separate alliance (the "Sonderbund"), which had already been formed in 1843, and appointed a council of war for the emergency of a civil conflict. In September, 1847, the Federal Diet decreed the dissolution of the Sonderbund and the expulsion of the Jesuits, and when the seven cantons refused submission, the Sonderbund war broke out, which, in November, 1847, ended in the defeat of the Sonderbund and the expulsion of the Jesuits. The revised federal constitution of Switzerland forbids the establishment of any Jesuit settlement. From the German States, with the exception of Austria, the Jesuits remained excluded until the revolution of 1848. In 1848 pope Gregory XVI. issued the bull "Piacere," which secured the principle of religious liberty, and gained for them admission to all the states, in particular to Prussia, where they established in rapid succession houses in Munster, Paderborn, Aix-la-Chapelle, Cologne, Bonn, Coblenz, Treves, and other cities. They gained a considerable influence on the Catholic population in particular by holding numerous missions in all parts of Germany.

The membership of the order, during the period from 1841 to 1866, increased from 8566 to 8155. At the beginning of 1867 the numerical strength of the order was as follows:

VI. The Labors of the Order in the Missionary Field.

-From the beginning of the order, the extension of the Church of Rome in pagan countries constituted one of the chief aims of the Jesuits, whose zeal in this field was all the greater, as they hoped that here the losses inflicted upon the Church by Protestantism would be more than balanced by new gains. The energy which they have displayed as foreign missionaries is recognized on all sides; the spirit of mission and charity of so many of their members, which is illustrated by the martyrdom of about 800 of the order, has also met with deserved recognition even among Protestants. On the other hand, within their own Church, charges were brought against many Jesuits from missions, as they received candidates for baptism too easily, and without having sufficient proofs of their real conversion, and that they were too accommodating to pagan views and customs. These charges led to long controversies between the Jesuits and other monastic orders, and to several decisions of the popes against them. In India, the first missionary ground occupied by the Jesuits, at St. Xavier and St. Ignatius, Canton Salsette, on Oct. 26, 1600, was established, and a large number of natives to join the Church of Rome. In Travancore forty churches had to be built for the converts, and Francis Xavier is reported to have baptized 10,000 pagans within one month. As it was soon discovered that the chief obstacle to the mission was the rigid practice of the Jesuits, the king of Portugal and some members of the order adopt the mode of life of the Brahmins, and others of that of castes. Accordingly, the Jesuits Fernandez, De Nobili, and others began to practice the painful penances of the Brahmins, endeavored even to outdo them in the rigor of these penances, and thus, making the people believe that they were Brahmins, or Indians of other castes, they made in some districts considerable progress. The Catholic congregations in Madura, Carnate, Mogar, and Ceylon are said to have numbered a native population of upwards of 150,000. In India it was also visited by Francis Xavier, who arrived there with two other missionaries in 1649. They gained the favor of several Daimios, and, with their efficient aid, made considerable progress. In 1575 the number of Roman Catholics was estimated at 40,000; in 1582 three Christian Daimios sent ambassadors to the pope Gregory XIII. In 1613 three Christian kings were received at Nagasaki, Miaco, and Fukato, colleges at Nagasaki and Arima, and residences at Otsaca and seven other places. During the persecution which broke out in the 17th century and extirpated Christianity, more than a hundred members of the order perished, together with more than a million of their native countrymen. The first Catholic missionaries in China were the Jesuits Roger and Ricci. The latter and several of his successors, in particular father Adam Schall, gained considerable influence upon the emperors by means of their knowledge of astronomy and other sciences, and the number of those who admitted to the Church was estimated as early as 1668 at 300,000. They showed, however, so great an accommodation with regard to the pagan customs that they were denounced in Rome by other missionaries, and several popes, in particular Benedict XIV. They were allowed to practice in China the first Jesuits arrived in 1614, in Tunkin in 1627. In both countries they succeeded, in spite of cruel persecutions, in establishing a number of congregations which survived the downfall of the order. They met with an equal success in the Philippine islands, and in the Mariana Islands, where their labors on the island of Luzon were a failure. Their labors in Abyssinia, Moroco, and other parts of Africa, likewise, did not produce any lasting results. Congo and Angola were nominally converted to Christianity by Jesuit and other missionaries, but even Roman Catholic writers must admit that the religion of the masses of the population differed but little from paganism, into which they were easily relapsed as soon as they found themselves without European missionaries. In 1549, Ignatius Loyola, at the request of king John III of Portugal, sent Emanuel de Nobrega and four other Jesuits to Brazil, where they gathered many masses in villages, and civilized them. Among the many Jesuits who followed these pioneer missionaries, Joseph de Anchieta († 1597) and the celebrated pulpit orator Anthony Vicira (about the middle of the 17th century) are the most noted. Among the Jesuits who labored in the Amazons of Brazil was Peter Claver, who is said to have baptized more than 500,000 negroes, and is called the apostle of the negroes. In 1656 they were called by the bishop of Tucuman to Paraguay, which soon became the most prosperous of all their missions. The Christian tribes who were gathered into the missions, and who were removed from their old homes, were those of the Guarani tribe, and in 1736 the tribe of the Guarani alone numbered in thirty-two towns from 80,000 to 40,000 families. When, in 1578, the Spaniards ceded seven reductions to Portugal, and 30,000 Indians were ordered to leave their villages, an insurrection broke out, which led to the expulsion of the Jesuits by the Spanish governor.

The Jesuits, together with the other monastic orders in the missionary work. They directed their attention chiefly to the unsubdued tribes, and in 1682 numbered 500 missionaries in 70 missionary stations. The Jesuit Salviatelli and his companion Pacolo in 1607 gained firm footing in California, where they established the first Jesuit mission in that country. In 1619, California, which was first discovered by the Jesuit Kith, they encountered more than usual obstacles, but gradually the number of their stations rose to fourteen. In Florida they met with hardly any success. In New France, where the Jesuits set up their first mission in 1620, Father Brebeuf became the first apostle of the Hurons. The Abenakis were fully Christianized in 1629; subsequently nearly the whole tribe of the Illinois, on the Mississippi, was baptized. In Eastern Europe and in Asia Minor the Jesuits succeeded in inducing a number of Greeks and Turks to recognize the supremacy of the pope. After the restoration of the order the Jesuits resumed their missionary labors with great zeal.

VII. The Work at Home.—While abroad the order was endeavoring to extend the territory of the Church, their task at home was to check the further progress of Protestantism, and to secure the maintenance of the Church of Rome, and to become within the Church the most powerful organization. They regarded the pulpit as one of the best means to establish an influence over the mass of the Catholic people, and many members gained considerable reputation as pulpit orators. Bourdaloue, Retzmann, and Felix of the French, Scurti in Italy, Torio in Spain, Viceria in Portugal, were regarded as among the best pulpit orators in those countries; but, on the whole, the effect of their preaching was more sensational than lasting. In order to train the youth in the principles of the Church, the congregation of the oratory was enjoined upon the members to cultivate with particular zeal catechetics. A large number of catechisms were accordingly compiled by Jesuit authors, among which those of Casinus and cardinal Bellarmine gained the greatest reputation and the widest circulation. In modern times the gradual introduction of the catechism of the Jesuit Deharbe by the ultramontane bishops is believed to have been one of the chief instruments in the revival of ultramontane principles among the German people. As confessors, the Jesuits were famous for their indulgent and lax conduct not only towards licentious princes, but towards all who held opinions in their opinion might be expected to benefit the order. In their works on moral theology they developed a comparatively new branch, casuistry; and many of their writers developed on the theory of Probabilism (q. v.) ideas which a large portion of the Church indignantly repudiated as dangerous innovations, and which, in some instances, even the popes deemed it necessary to censure. In order to effect among their adherents strict an organization as the order itself possessed, so-called "congregations" were formed among their students, and among all classes of society, with the object of uniting the members of the order absolutely to its own members. Wherever there were or are houses of Jesuits, there is a Jesuitic party among the laity which pursues the same aims as the order. Thus the Jesuits have become a power wherever they have established themselves, while, on the other hand, the fanaticism connected with the remnants has always and naturally produced against them a spirit of bitterness and hatred which has never manifested itself to the same degree against any other institution of the Roman Catholic Church. The importance of schools for gaining an influence upon society was appreciated by the Jesuits more highly than had ever before been the case in the Roman Catholic Church. The most famous of their educational institutions was the Roman College (Collegium Romanum). Paul IV conferred upon it in 1556 the rank and privileges of a university; Gregory XIII, in 1581, a princely donation. In 1584 it numbered 2107 pupils. Eight of its pupils (Urban VIII, Innocent X, Clement IX, Clement X, Innocent XII, Clement XII, Clement XIII, Clement XII) succeeded the papal throne; several others (Aloysius Gonzaga, Camillus of Lellis, Leonardo of Porto Maurizio) were enrolled among the canonized saints. In 1710 the Jesuits conferred the academic degrees at 24 universities and 615 colleges, and 157 boarding-schools were under their management. All these establishments formed the backbone of the Jesuitical order. The Jesuits displayed the same zeal in establishing schools and colleges, and have revived their reputation of strict disciplinarians, who know how to curb the impetuosity and passions of youth; but neither in the former nor in the present day have they been able to raise one of their schools to that degree of eminence which, as in the case of some of the German universities, must be admitted by friend and foe. The number of writers which the order has produced is immense. As early as 1608 Ribadeneyra published a catalogue of the writings of the order containing 166 pages. Alegambe (1643) and Southwell (1675) extended it into a large volume in folio. More recently the Belgian Jesuits Augustine and Aloys de Backer began a bibliographical of the order, which, though not yet completed, numbered in 1670 seven volumes (quarto). A new edition of a work of the previous edition, of the order, in folio, is in the course of preparation. The following writers of the order belong among those who are best known: Bellarmine, Less, Molina, Petavino, Suarez, Tole. Vasquez, Maldonat, Salmeron, Cornelius a Lapide. Hardouin, Labbe, Sirmond, the Bolandista, Mariana. Petramont, Ximenes, Ferer, Abbot, (editor of the Quo recently the order has also attempted to establish its own organs in the province of periodical literature. Publications of this kind are the monthly Civita Cattolica of Rome, which is generally regarded as the most daring exponent of the most advanced ultramontane school; Etudes historiques de France, The Month in England, and the Stimmung von Maria Leach (a monthly published by the Jesuits of Maria Leach since August, 1871) in Germany.

VIII. Some Errors concerning the Jesuits. As the Jesuits, by their systematic fanaticism, provoked such violent opposition on the part of all opponents of ultramontane Catholicism, it is not to be wondered at that occasionally groundless charges were brought against them, and that some of these were readily believed. Among the erroneous charges which at one time have been general, and which have had to be acquiesced in by the Jesuits now acquit them, are the following: 1. That they are responsible for the sentiments contained in the famous volume Monita Secreta (q. v.). This work was not written by a Jesuit, but is a satire, the author of which was, however, as familiar with the movements of the Jesuits as with their history (see Gieseler, Kirche engesch. ii. 2, 656 sq.). 2. That the superior of the order has the power to order a member to commit a sin. It is now generally admitted that the passage of the constitution on which the charge is based (innum est ut... nisi superius eam suaviter superius superius superius) is misunderstood. 3. That the order holds to the maxim that "the end justifies the means." Although many works of Jesuits (in particular those on System) were well calculated to upset such an opinion, in the hands of the reader, the order has never expressly taught it.

IX. Literature. — The number of works on the Jesuits is legion. The titles of most may be found in Carvaxo. Bibliographie hist. de la Comp. de Jesus (Paris, 1864). The most important work, in favor of the Jesuits is Corns. de Jesus, Let. de Comp. de Jesus (1864, 6 vols.). The best that has been written on the subject are the chapters concerning the Jesuits in Banke's work on the Roman popes. (A. J. S.) JESURUN (Isa. xlv. 2). See JESURUHN.

Jesu'nu (Ἰησοῦν, Gen., Dat., and Voc. -ου, Acc. -ουν; from the Heb. ⲏⲥⲥⲟⲥ, “Yeshu’u,” “Jeshua” or “Joshua,” Syr. Yešu,’), the name of several persons (besides our Saviour) in the New Testament, the Apocalypse, and Josephus. For a discussion of the full import and application of the name, see JESUS CHRIST.

1. JOSCHA (q.v.) the son of Nun (2 Esdr. vii. 37; Escl. xlvii. 1; 1 Macc. ii. 55; Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8); so also Josephus, Anti. xi. 3, 10 sqq.

2. JOSCHA (q.v.) the priest, the son of Jehozadak (1 Esdr. v. 8, 24, 48, 56, 68, 70; vi; 2, ix; 19; Escl. xlix. 12; so also Josephus, Anti. xi. 3, 10 sqq.).

3. JOSCHA (q.v.) the Levite (1 Esdr. vi. 58; iv. 45).

4. JESUS, THE SON OF SIRACH (Ἰησοῦς τὸν Ὑσαίαν; Vulgate Jesus filius Sirach), is described in the text of Ecclesiasticus (I, 37) as the author of that book, which in the Sept., and generally in the Eastern Church, is called by his name—the Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach, or simply the Wisdom of Sirach, but in the Western churches, after the Vulgate, the Book of Ecclesiasticus. The same passage speaks of him as a native of Jerusalem, and the internal character of the book confirms its Palestinian origin. The name Jesus was of frequent occurrence (see above), and was often represented by the Greek Jesus (see Josephus, Anti. xii. 5, 1). In the apocryphal list of the seventy-two commissioners sent by Eleazar (Arist. in cont. phil., Hist. ap. Hody, De Test. p. vii.), but there is not the slightest ground for connecting the author of Ecclesiasticus with either of the persons there mentioned. The various conjectures which have been made as to the position of the son of Sirach from the contents of his book—so, for instance, that he was a priest (from vii. 29 sq.; xiv. 1; xlix. 1), or a physician (from xxxix. 1 sq.)—are equally unfounded. The evidences of a date B.C. cir. 310-270, are as follows: 1. In ch. xlvii. 1-21, the praises of the ancient worthies are extolled down to the time of Simon, who is doubtless Simon I, or “the Just” (B.C. 570-300). 2. The Talmud most distinctly describes the work of Ben-Sira as the oldest of the apocryphal books (comp. Tosef. Tikkun, ii. 10). 3. It had a general currency, and was quoted as least as early as the 2d century B.C. (comp. Ant. ii. 5, 1; Jerusalem Nazir, v. 8), which shows that it must have existed a considerable period before the time of our Lord, and must have been known among the circles of the rabbis, as it is cited and condemned by the Talmud. In the description of these great men, and throughout the whole of the book, there is not the slightest trace of those Haggadic legends about the national worthies which were so rife and numerous in the second century before Christ. On the other hand, the mention of the “88th year of king Euergetes” (translator’s prologue) argues a later date. See ECCLESIASTICUS.

Among the later Jews the “Son of Sirach” was celebrated under the name of Ben-Sira as a writer of proverbs, and some of those which have been preserved offer a close resemblance to passages in Ecclesiasticus; but in the course of time a later compilation was substituted for the original work of Ben-Sira (Zunz).

According to the first prologue to the book of Ecclesiasticus, taken from the Synopsis of the Pseude-athanassius (iv. 577, ed. Migne), the translator of the book looks upon the same name as the author of it. If this conjecture were true, a genealogy of the following form would result: 1. Sirach. 2. Jesus, son (father of Sirach (author of the book). 3. Sirach. 4. Jesus, son of Sirach (translator of the book). It is, however, most likely that the last chapter, “The prayer of Jesus, the Son of Sirach,” is the genuine introduction of the book, as it was the only source of information which we possess upon the subject. Like all his co-religionists, he was trained from his early life to fear and love the God of his fathers. He travelled much both by land and sea when he grew up, and was in frequent perils (Eccles. xxxiv. 11, 12). Being a diligent student, and having acquired much practical knowledge from his travels, he was intrusted with some office at court, and his enemies, who were jealous of him, maligned him before the king, which nearly cost him his life (II, 6, 7). To us, however, his religious life and sentiments are of the utmost importance, inasmuch as they describe the opinions of the Jews during the period immediately before the Old and New Test. Though deeply penetrated with the fear of God, which he declared was the only glory of man, rich, noble, or poor (x, 22-24), still the whole of Ben-Sira’s tenets may be described as limited, and are as follows: Resignation to the dealings of Providence (xi. 21-25); to seek truth at the cost of life (iv. 28); not to use much babbling in prayer (vii. 14); absolute obedience to parents, which in the sight of God atones for sins (iii. 1-16; vii. 27, 28); humility (iii. 17-19; x, 7, 18, 28); kindness to domestics (iv. 30; vii. 20, 21; xxxiii. 30, 31); to relieve the poor (iv. 9); to act as a father to the fatherless, and a husband to the widow (iv. 10); to visit the sick (vii. 35); to weep with them that weep (vii. 34); not to rejoice over the death of even the greatest enemy (vii. 7), and to forgive sins as we would be forgiven (xxviii. 2, 8). He has nothing in the whole of his book about the immortality of the soul, a future judgment, the existence of spirits, or the expectation of a Messiah. See SIRAC.UL.

5. See BARAHAN.

6. (Col. iv. 11). See JUSTUS.

JESUS is also the name of several persons mentioned by Josephus, especially in the pontifical times. See HUCUL-PUST.

1. A high-priest displaced by Antiochus Epiphanes to make room for Onias (Anti. xii. 5, 1; xvi. 3, 1).

2. The son of Phabat, deprived by Herod of the high-priesthood in order to make way for his own father-in-law Simon (Anti. xvi. 3, 1).

3. Son of Sie, successor of Eleazar (Anti. xvii. 13, 1).

4. Son of Damasus, made high-priest by Agrippa in place of Ananus (Anti. xx. 9, 1).

5. Son of Gamaliel, and successor of the preceding in the high-priesthood (Anti. xx. 9, 4; compare War, iv. 4, 8).

6. Son of Ananus, a plebeian, and the utterer of the remarkable doom against Jerusalem, which was fulfilled during the last siege simultaneously with his own death (War, vi. 5, 8).

7. A priest of the Buthathus, who surrendered to Titus the sacred utensils of the Temple (War, vi. 8, 8).

8. Son of Sepphas, one of the chief priests and governor of Tiberias (War, ii. 20, 4).

9. Son of Saphat, a ringleader of the Sicarii during the last war with the Romans (War, iii. 9, 7).

Jesus Christ (Ἰησοῦς Χριστός; Ἰσχαοὺς ὁ Χριστός; sometimes by Paul in the reverse order “Christ Jesus”), the ordinary designation of the incarnate Son of God and Saviour of mankind. This double designation is not, like Simon Peter, John Mark, James Barnabas, composed of a name and a surname, but, like John the Baptist, Simon Magnus, Bar-Jesus Elymas, of a proper name and an official title. Jesus was our Lord’s proper name, just as Peter, James, and John were the proper names of three of his disciples. To distinguish our Lord from others bearing the name, he was termed Jesus of Nazareth (John xviii. 7, etc.; strictly Jesus the Nazarene, Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζαρηνός), and Jesus the son of Joseph (John xxi. 8, etc.).

1. Import of the name.—There can be no doubt that Jesus is the Greek form of a Hebrew name, which had been borne by two illustrious individuals in former periods of the Jewish history—the successor of Moses and Aaron in the perpetuation of the Law (Deut. xxiv. 18), and the high-priest who, along with Zerubbabel (Zech. iii. 1), took so active a part in the re-establishment of the civil and religious polity of the Jews on their return from the Babylonian captivity. Its original and full form is Jehohua (Num. xiii, 16). By contraction it became Joshua, or Josua; and when transferred into Greek, by taking the termination characteristic of that language, it assumed the form Jesus. It is thus twice that the names of the illustrious individuals referred to are uniformly written in the Sept., and the first of them is twice mentioned in the New Testament by (Acta vii, 45; Heb. iv, 8).

The original name of Joshua was Jehosha (יהושע), as appears in Numb. xxiii, 16, which was changed later into Moses into Jehoshua (יהושע), Jehovah is his salvation), as appears in Numb. xiii, 16; 1 Chron. vii, 27, being elsewhere Anglicized of this "name, Joshua (יהושע, id.), whence the Greek name Ιησοῦς, by which this is always represented in the Sept. This last Heb. form differs little from the abstract noun from the same root, γεωργ, yeosuch, deliverance, and seems to have been understood as equivalent in import (see Matt. i, 22; comp. Eccle. xiii, 10).

The "name of Jesus" (Phil. ii, 10) is not the name Je-sus, but "the name above every name" (ver. 9); i.e. the supreme dignity and authority with which the Father has invested Jesus Christ as the reward of his disinterested exertions in the cause of the divine glory and humanity, and the bowing by ro y wewy, bowing (of him who is named Joshua) is obviously not an external mark of homage when the name Jesus is pronounced, but the inward sense of awe and submission to him who is raised to a station so exalted.

The ascription of this name on our Lord was not the result of accident, or of the ordinary course of things, but was the effect of a direct divine order (Luke iii, i; ii, 21), as indicative of his saving function (Matt. i, 21). Like the other name Immmanual (q. v.), it does not necessarily import the divine character of the wearer. This, however, clearly results from the attributes given in the same connection, and is plainly taught in numerous passages (see especially Rom. i, 4, 8; ix, 5).

For the import and application of the name Christ, see MESSIAH.

II. Personal Circumstances of our Lord.—These, of course, largely affected his history, notwithstanding his divinity.—General View.—The following is a naked statement of the facts of his career as they may be gathered from the evangelical narratives, supposing them to be entitled simply to the credit due to profane history. (For literature, see Volbeding, p. 56; Hase, p. 6.) The founder of the Christian religion was born (B.C. 6) at Bethlehem, near Jerusalem, under the reign of the emperor Augustus, of Mary, at the time betrothed to the carpenter (see) Joseph, and descended from the royal house of David (Matt. i, 1 sq.; Luke ii, 25 sq.; comp. John vii, 42). Soon after his birth he was compelled by the murderous designs of Herod the Great by a hasty flight into the adjacent parts of Egypt (Matt. ii, 13 sq.; according to the tradition at Matarae, see Evangel. infant. Arab. c. 24; apparently a place near old Heliopolis, where is still shown a very old mulberry-tree under which Mary is said to have rested with the babe, see Prosp. Alpin. Retr. Ep. l. p. 24; Matt. ii, 13 sq.; Luke ii, 14 sq.; 141 sq.; comp. generally Hartmann, Erdbeckw. d. Afric. coi, i, 878 sqq.). See EGYPT: HEBRON. But immediately after the death of this king his parents returned to their own country, and settled again (Luke i, 25) in Nazareth (q. v.), in Lower Galilee (Matt. ii, 23; comp. Luke iii, 21 sq.; iv, 15 sq.; viii, 40 sqq.; etc.), where he seems so rapidly matured (Luke ii, 40, 52), that in his twelfth year the boy evinced at the metropolis tracts of an uncommon religious intelligence, which excited astonishment in all the spectators (Luke ii, 41 sq.). With this event the history of his youth concludes in the canonical gospels, and we next find him, about the thirty-eighth year of his age (A.D. 25), in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, at the Jordan, where he submitted himself to be consecrated for the introduction of the new dispensation (βαπτισμός τοῦ Θεοῦ) by the symbol of water baptism at the hands of John the Baptist (Matt. iii, 13 sq.; iv, 1 sq.; 17 sq.; Luke iii, 21 sq.; iv, 1 sq.). He now began, after a forty-days' fast (comp. 1 Kings xix, 8) spent in the wilderness of Judea (Matt. iv, 1-11: Mark i, 12 sq.; Luke iv, 1-13) in quiet meditation upon his mission, to publish openly in person this "kingdom of God," by earnestly summoning his countrymen to repentance, and by urging them to keep the teachings and traditions of the old dispensations and conduct, through a new birth from the Holy Spirit (John iii, 3 sq.). He repeatedly announced himself as the mediator of this dispensation, and in pursuance of this character, in correction of the sensual expectations of the people with reference to the long-looked-for Redeemer (comp. Luke iv, 21), he chose from among his early associates and Galilean countrymen a small number of faithful disciples (Matt. x), and with them travelled, especially at the time of the Paschal festival and during the summer months, in various districts through Palestine, subclassing every opportunity to impress pure and fruitful religious sentiments upon the populace or his immediate disciples, and to enlighten them concerning his own dignity as God's legitimate descendent (Δεῖ γὰρ αὐτῷ ὁ χειρὶς τῆς δικαιοσύνης), who should abolish the sacrificial service, and teach a worship of God, as the common Father of all men, and in truth (Matt. x). With these, and their expositions of doctrine, which all breathe the noblest practical spirit, and were so carefully adapted to the capacity and apprehension of the hearers that in respect to clearness, simplicity, and dignified force they are still a pattern of true instruction, he coupled, in the spirit of the second advent, the spirit of the Kingdom, which was expected from the Messiah, wonderful deeds, especially charitable cures of certain diseases at that time very prevalent and regarded as incurable, but to these he himself appears to have attributed a subordina. value. By this means he gathered about him a considerable company of true adherents and faithful disciples, chiefly from the middle class of the people (John vii, 49; and even from the despis able publicans, Matt. ix, 9 sq.; Luke v, 27 sq.); for the eminent and learned were repelled by the severe reproofs which he uttered against their corrupt maxims (Matt. xii, 38 sq.), their sectarian animosities (Luke xi, 23 sq.; xii, 9 sq.) and his independence and freedom from prejudice, as being subversive of all true religion (John vii, 53; ix, 16), as well as by the slight regard which (in comparison with their statutes) he paid to the Sabbath law (Mark xvi, 16); and as he in no respect conformed to their interpretations of the Mosaic law, from animosity, they made repeated attempts to seize his person (Mark xi, 18; John vii, 30, 44). At last he succeeded, by the assistance of the traitor Judas, in taking him prisoner in the very capital, where he had just paraded the official sign of the messianic kingdom (the Passover), upon which he engrafted the inimitable rite of a new covenant; and thus, without exciting any surprise on his part, in surrendering him into the hands of the Roman authorities as a popular insurrectionist. He was sentenced to death by crucifixion, as he had often declared to his disciples would be his fate, and suffered himself, with calm resignation, to be led to the place of execution, and was nailed to the cross without any traditional names, see Thilo, Apocryphi, i. 560 sq.; comp. Evangel. infant. Arab. c. 23; but he arose alive on the third day from the grave which a grateful disciple had prepared for him, and after tarrying forty days in the midst of his disciples, during which he confidently instructed and presented himself as a man of marked grace, and conversed with them in the把握 their material from earlier traditions, doubtless from those collections and companions of Jesus; but they were all first written down a long time after the occurrences: hence it has often been asserted that the historical matter was even at that time no longer extant in an entirely pure state (since the more subjective and the subtilest, both in views and opinions, are readily interchanged in an unscientically formed style); but that after Jesus had been so gloriously proved to be the Messiah, the incidents were improved into prodigies, especially through a consideration of the Old-Testament prophecies (Kaiser, Bibl. Theol. c. 199 sq.; see also the single references; both in view and opinion, could only be shown in the composition and connection of single transactions; the facts themselves in the respective accounts agree too well in time and circumstances, and the narrators confine themselves too evidently to such a position by the writers of memoirs, to allow the supposition of a (condensed) transformation of the events or any such developments from Old-Testament prophecy; moreover, if truth and pious poetry had already become mingled in the verbal traditionary reports, the eye-witnesses Matthew and John would have known well, in a fresh narration, how to distinguish between every of these elements identified to accounts which they had themselves passed through, for memory and imagination were generally more lively and vigorous among the ancients than with us) (Br. ibh. Rationem, p. 248 sq.; compare Heydenreich, Ueb. Unzulässigkeit d. myth. Anwendung d. Histor. im N. T. und d. Christentum. Herborn, 1851-5; see Hase, p. 5). Sooner would we suppose that the fertile-minded John, who wrote latest, has set before us, not the pure historical Christ, but one apprehended by faith and confused with his own spiritual conceptions (Br. Über Rational. p. 382). But while it is altogether plausible theoretically, it means not the individuality and spiritual sympathy with Jesus, apprehended and reflected the depth and spirituality: of his Master more truly than the synoptical evangelists, who depict rather the exterior phenomena of his character, at the same time there is actually nothing containing an identification between these two insecurely, in substance or form, that is incompatible with the Christ of the first three evangelists (see Heydenreich, in his Zeitarch. p. 3; yet these latter represent Jesus as speaking comparatively seldom, and that in more general terms, of his exaltation, digne, and relation with the Father, whereas that Christ would have explained himself much more definitely and fully upon a point that could not have remained undiscussed, is of itself probable (see Hase, p. 10). Hence also, although we cannot believe that in such representations we are to understand the identical words of Christ to be given (for while the retention of all these extended discourses in the memory is improbable, on the other hand a writing of them down is repugnant to the Jewish custom), yet the actual sentiments of Jesus are certainly thus reported. (See further, Bauer, Bibl. Theol. N. T. ii. 278 sq.; B. Crusius, Bibl. Theol. p. 81; Fleck, Orientation Evangel. Lpz. 1812; and Harnack, Uber den Geist und die Form der evang. Gesch. Lpz. 1865; Eichhorn, Einleitung, i. 689 sq.; on the mythicism of the evangelists, see Gabler, Newest. theolog. Journ. vii. 396; Bertholdt, Theol. Journ. v. 253 sq.)

In the Church fathers, we find very little that appears to have been derived from these speeches; but the apocryphal gospels breathe a spirit entirely foreign to historical truth, and are filled with accounts of petty miracles (Tholuck, Glaubwürdigkeit, p. 406 sq.; Ammon, Lek. Maria, i. 90 sq.; compare Schmidt, Einleitung ins N. T. ii. 294 sq., and Scholz, J. Krit. u. Exegese, ii. 481 sq.).

The passage of Josephus (Ant. xviii, 3, 3; see Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. § 24), which Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 11; Demonstrat. Exe. iii. 7) was the first among Christian writers to make use of, has been shown (see Hase, p. 12), although some have ingeniously striven to defend it (see, among the latest, Bretschneider, in his Diss. ophel. theolog. Jud. n° 65; Josephus, De floribus Galilaeae; Harnack, Ueber den Jos. Zeugniss von Christo. Leipzig, 1823; Schödel, Fl. Joseph. de e. Chr. testatore, Lips. 1840), to be partly, but not entirely spurious (see Eckstadt, Floriani de Jesu Christo testimoniis noveiturque super nuper austerius defensis, Jesu, n. 18; also his De Prop. Phil. contra Iren. 1. 28; 1841; in the Heidelberger Johrb. 1818, i. 269 sq.; Thiele, in the N. kritische. Journ. d. theolog. Lit. ii. 97 sq.; Heimich, Ench. i zu Euseb. H. E. iii, 381 sq.; compare Suppl. notarius ad Eusebium, p. 78 sq.; Ammon, Lek. Maria, i. 129 sq.). See Josephus. (See Volbeding, p. 5.) The Koran (q. v.) contains only negligible fables concerning Jesus (Hotttinger, Histor. Or. 105 sq.; Schmidt, in his Bibl. J. Krit. u. Exegese, i. 110 sq.; D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orientale, ii. 849 sq.; compare Augusthi, Christologica Ko. roniana Jeno, 1799), and the Jewish History of Jesus (2 Thess. ii. 9-13; edit. Hultzdri, Lugd. Bat. 1703), and in Wagnitz, Tela ign. Sattm. Altdorf, 1681) betrays itself as an abortive fabrication of Jewish calumny, destitute of any historical value (see Ammon, Bibl. Theol. iii. 269), while the allusions to Jesus in the Talmud and the Rab- bis have only a polemical aim (see Meefuller, Jesus in Talmude, Altdorf, 1699, i. 4; Werner, Jesus in Talmude, Stade, 1701; comp. Buxenus, De notatis J. C. ii. 4). (See Volbeding, p. 5.) The genuine "Acta Pilati," Eusebius, Chron. Arm. ii. 267; compare Herke, Opusc. p. 199 sq. are no longer extant (see Pilate); what we now possess under this title is a later fabrication (see Ammon, i. 102 sq.). In the Greek and Roman prose writers, Jesus is only incidentally named (Taci- tuus, Annal. xv, 44, 5; Pliny, Epist. x, 97; Lampriid. 12, Alex. Svet. c. 29, 48; Porphyry, De philosoph. ex orac. in Euseb. Demonstr. Evang. iii. 7; Liban. in Socr. Hist. Exe. iii. 29; Lucas, Mors pereg. c. 11, 13). On Suidas, s. v. Inpafio, see Walter, Codex in Svto Mendaciz de Jesus in Lips. 1724). Whether by Chrysostom in Suentios (Cloud. p. 25) is to be understood Christ, is doubted by some (comp. Ernesti and Wolf, ad loc.; see Claudeius), but the unusual name Christiau might easily undergo this change (see also Philostr. Soph. ii. 11) in popular reference, as generally Eckhard, Non-Christianism, of Christo testimoniis, Quo in theo. Sacris Jeno Christi ex scirip. proton, eruta, Jena, 1768; Meinardus, e. Vertheid. u. Eropt. d. Geschicht d. Jesus u. d. Apostol. u. prieuch. u. rom. Professare. Hannov. 1805; Frommuller, in the Studien d. wirt. Gesch. in. 1. 1. On the Jesus of the book of Sirach, xii. 53, 25, see Secden, De Jesu in Jesu Spiritualis, frustra prae. Laude. 1724; also in his Medit. egez. i. 207 sq.)

3. The scientific treatment of the life of Jesus belongs to the modern period of theological criticism. Among earlier contributions of a critico-chronological character is that of Offerhaus (De vita J. C. privata et publica, in his Sprche. hist. chronol. Groningen, 1839). Greling (Halle, 1813) first undertook the adjustment, in a lively narrative, of the recent (rationalistic) exposition that has resulted, to the actual career of Christ. An independent but, on the whole, unsatisfactory treatise is that of Philipp Jakob Hufeland, in his "Einleitung in die Künstler, in die Welt durch Janum u. die Apostel, Göttingen, 1818." Kaiser has attempted an analysis (Bibl. Theol. i, 280 sqq.). Still more severe in his method of criticism is Paulus (Das Leben Jesu als Grundlage einer reinen Gesch. d. Urschristent. Heidelberg, 1839), and bold to a point in which, he arranges the theological ideas of D. D. Strauss (Leben J. krit. bearbeitet, Tübingen, 1835, and since). The latter, as well as many other, the evangelical histories (with the exception of a few plain transactions) to a mythological composition springing out of the Old-Test. prophecies and the expectations of the Messiah in the community, and, in his criticism upon single points generally, as upon the shoulders of the preceding writers. In opposition to him, numerous men of learning and courage rose up to defend the "historical Christ," some of them insisting upon the strictly supernatural interpretation (Lange; Harl. Nachr. 1838; Krumm, Vorles. über das Leben Jesu, Hanb, 1839), while others concede or pass over single points in the history (Neander, Leben J. Chr. Hamburg, 1837). Into this controversy, which grew highly personal, a philosophic writer (Weisse, Evangel. Geschichte K. Janum und die Bearbeitung, Leipzig, 1840) became involved, and attempted, by an ingenious but decidedly presumptuous criticism, to distinguish the historical and the unhistorical element in the evangelical account. At the same time, Thiele (Zur Biographie Jesu, Leipzig, 1837) gave a careful and conclusive summary of the materials of the discussion but, having published (1840) the 4th ed. of his Leben Jesu, Leipzig, 1840) a masterly review, showing the gradual rejection of the extravagances of criticism since 1829. The substance of the life of Jesus has thus now become established in general belief as a historical fact (Bauer (Krit. des evang. Gesch. d. Synoptiker, Leipzig, 1841), after an analysis of the gospels as literary productions, calls the original narrative concerning Jesus "a pure creation of the Christian consciousness," and he pronounces the evangelical history generally to be "solved." Thenius has met him with a proof of the evangelistic, "Grundzüge der christlichen Alterthums- geschichten," in a few but striking remarks (Das Evang. ohne die Evangelien, Leipzig, 1843), and a. Ehrard (Wiss. Krift. d. evang. Gesch. Frankf. 1842) has fully refuted him in a learned but not unpunished work (see also Weisse, in the Jena Lit.-Zeit. 1843. No. 7-9, 19-30). But this heart- lessness in the way of critic has inspired the latest of Bauer—which, indeed, often degenerates into the ridiculous—appears to have had no impression upon the literary world, and may therefore be dismissed without further consideration (comp. generally Grimm, Grundbegriff d. evang. Gesch. in Beszug auf Strauss und Bauer, Jena, 1845). Lately, Von Ammon (Gesch. d. Leb. Jesu, Leipzig, 1842) undertook, in his style of combination, carefully steering between the extremes, a narrative of the life of Jesus full of striking observations. Whatever else has been done in this department (Görner, Geschichte des Urschristentums, 1839; Salvador, Leben Christ et al doctrine, Par. 1838) belongs rather to the rank of Christianity than to the data of the life of Jesus. In Catholic literature little has appeared on this subject (Kuhn, Leben Jesu wissensc. bearbeit., Mainz, 1838; of a more general character are the works of Francke, Leipzig, 1838, and 1841). On the basis of subjective views upon the treatment of the Gospel history, there are the monographs cited in Volbeding, p. 6. See literature below, and compare the art. CHRONOLOGY.

4. Chronological Data.—The year of Christ's birth (for the general condition of the age, see Knapp, De statu temp. nat. Christo, Hal. 1747; and the Church histories of Gieseler, Neander, etc.; on a special point, see Masson, Juri. temp. Christo nascent. reservatum, Rotterdam, 1700) cannot, as all investigations on this point have proved (Fabricius Bibl. antiquar. p. 187 sqq., 342 sqq.; Thiem, Krift. Comment. ii, 389 sqq.; comp. especially S. van Tiele, In anno, mensae et diei saec. Chr. Lugd. Bat. 1700, pref. G. J. Walch, Jena, 1740; B. Into this controversy, which grew highly personal, a philosophic writer (Weisse, Evangel. Geschichte der Vereinigung, K. und die Bearbeitung, Leipzig, 1840) became involved, and attempted, by an ingenious but decidedly presumptuous criticism, to distinguish the historical and the unhistorical element in the evangelical account. At the same time, Thiele (Zur Biographie Jesu, Leipzig, 1837) gave a careful and conclusive summary of the materials of the discussion but, having published (1840) the 4th ed. of his Leben Jesu, Leipzig, 1840) a masterly review, showing the gradual rejection of the extravagances of criticism since 1829. 4. Chronological Data.—The year of Christ's birth (for the general condition of the age, see Knapp, De statu temp. nat. Christo nascent. reservatum, Rotterdam, 1700) cannot, as all investigations on this point have proved was born in the year 41 (42) of the reign of Augustus, i.e. 751 of Rome, or B.C. 3 (Ideler, Chronolog. chron., 880). As Luke's date cannot be precise, the exact year of his birth cannot be definitely fixed ("about," say). We may presume that Christ was rather over than under thirty years of age; and this conjecture would depend upon the determination of the number of Passovers which Jesus celebrated during his ministry; but this itself is quite a difficult question (see under No. 5, below). It is now generally conceded that he could not well have passed less than three Passah under these circumstances, and at the least not more than one hour before the beginning of each of Christ's three years, and a fourth at the close of the last; thus we ascertain as the term the 5th of the Passah of the year A.D. 28, and as the probable term a quod the year A.D. 32; or, on the supposition (as above) that the joint reign of Titus and Vespasian is meant, we must take every third year (A.D. 25, 28, 31). This result would be rendered more definite and certain if we could ascertain whether in the last of these series of years (A.D. 29 or 32) the Jewish Passover fell on a Friday (Thursday evening and the ensuing day), as this was the week-day on which the death of Christ is generally held to have taken place. There have been various calculations by means of lunar tables (Linbanna, in the Akademie der Wiss. vol. vii; Wurm, in Bengal's Archiv., i, 1, 292 sq.; Anger, De temporum in Act. i.资st. 498; Heilprin, in ... Nicolaus, 1844, p. 504), to determine during which of the years of this period the Paschal day must have occurred on Friday (see Strong's Harm., and Expos. App. p. 8 sq.) but the inexactness of the Jewish calendar makes every such computation uncertain (Wurm, ut sup. p. 294 sq.). Yet it is worthy of notice that the two most recent investigations of Wurm and Anger both make the year A.D. 51 or 74 of Rome, to be such a calendar year as we require. (Wieseler, Chronol. Synops. p. 479.), on the other hand, protests against the foregoing computations, and insists that in A.D. 60 alone the Paschal day may fall on a Friday. Accordingly, the calculations, A.D. 29 and 33 are the only years of this period in which the Paschal day fell on Thursday (see Brown, Ordo Sacramentorum, p. 55), while so great discrepancy prevails between other computations (see Townsend's Chron. p. 7 sq. *150) that little reliance can be placed upon this argument (see Strong's Harm. and Expos. App. p. 8 sq.) See Passover. The opinion of some of the ancient writers (Irenaeus, ii, 22, 5, that Jesus died at 40 or 50 years of age (compare John viii, 57), is altogether improbable (see Fisians, De erro. p. 382 sq.). More Irenaeus in the 25th and 36th chapters of his Against Heresies. The most of the Church fathers (Tertull. Act. Jud., 8; Lactanc. Institutiv. iv, 10; Augustine, C. der. xvii, 84; Clem. Alex. Strom. i, 147, etc.) assign but a single year as the duration of Christ's ministry, and place his death in the conjuncture of the two Gemini (VIII Cal. April. Coss. C. Rubello Gemino et C. Rubio Gemino, i. c. 782 of Rome, A.D. 29, the 15th year of Tiberius, which Ideler (Chronology, 418 sq.) has lately (so also Brown, Ordo Sacramentorum, p. 39 sq.) attempted to reconcile with Luke iii, 1 (but see Seyfarth, Chronol. Sacra, p. 115 sq.; Eusebius, in his Chron. Armenii, p. 294, places the death of Jesus in the 15th year of Tiberius, which Jerome, in his Latin translation, calls the 18th; on the above reckoning of the fathers, see Petavius, Ani. med. etc., p. 144 sq.; Thilo, Cod. Apoc. i, 497 sq.) On the observation of the sun at the crucifixion (Matt. xxvii, 46; Mark xvi, 9; Luke xxi, 37; Luke xvi, 28, 31, 35, 36; Erculis, On the chronology of the Saviour of the life of Jesus, is generally Hottinger, Pentas dissertation, bibl.-chronol. p. 218 sq.; Voss, De anno Christi diessertat. en from Joseph upwards to Zerubbabel and Salathiel (Matt. i, 15 sq.; Luke iii, 37), but also Matthew carries back Joseph's lineage to David's son Solomon (ver. 6 sq.), while Luke refers it to another son Nathan (ver. 31). Moreover, Matthew only goes back as far as Abraham (as he wrote for Jewish readers), but Luke (in agreement with the general scope of his gospel) as far as Isaac, and so the disagreement suggests engaged the attention of the Church fathers (see Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i, 7), and later interpreters have adopted various hypotheses for the reconciliation of the two evangelists (see especially Surenhus, Βιβλος κατά γένεσιν, p. 320 sq.; Rus, Harmon. evang. i, 60 sq.; Thiess, Krit. Comment. zum Neuen Testament, Proleg. i, 101 sq.). There are properly only two general representations possible. For the history of Christ's parents, see Joseph; Mary.

(a) Matthew traces the lineage through Joseph, Luke gives the maternal descent (comp. also Neander, p. 211), so that the person called Eli in Luke iii, 36, appears to have been the father of Mary (see especially Helvius, in Crenet Exercit. philol. hist. iii, p. 382 sq.; Spanheim, Dubia evang. i, 18 sq.; Bengel, Heumann, Paulus, Kuhn, in their Commentaries; Wieseler, in the Studien u. Kritik, 1845, p. 561 sq.; on the contrary, Bleek, Deuter. 15, 101 sq.). But in the first place, it is clear that Luke would hardly have written so expressively the "son of Eli" ("τοῦ Ἱακώβ"), since we must understand all the following genitives to refer to the actual fathers and not to the fathers-in-law (the appeal to Ruth i, 11 sq., for the purpose of showing that a daughter-in-law could be a mother among the Hebrews, is unus ordine valdium for the distinction in question); although, in the second place, we need not understand the Salathiel and Zerubbabel named in one genealogy to have been both different persons from those mentioned in the other (Paulus, Comment. i, 243 sq.; Robinson, Gr. Harmony, p. 119, which is a very questionable exposition) but (see especially Hug, Einleitung, ii, 266; Methodist Quarterly Review, Oct. 1852, p. 602 sq.). Aside from the fact that Luke does not even mention the mother of Jesus (but only Matt. i, 16), and from the further fact that the Jews were not at all accustomed to record the genealogies of women (Baba Bathra, f. 110, "The father's family, not the mother's, is accounted the true lineage;" compare Wetstein, i, 281), we might make an exception in the case of the Messiah, who was to be descended from a virgin (compare also Paulus, Leben J. in, 90). A still different view (Voss, ut sup., comp., in the Theol. Quartalschr. 1836, p. 493 sq., 539 sq.) merely that, Eli, although the father of Mary, is here introduced as being the grandfather of Joseph (according to the supposition that Mary was an heiress, Numb. xxvii, 8), proceeds upon an entirely untenable interpretation (see Paulus, Comment. i, 248, 261). Notwithstanding the foregoing objection to the view under consideration, it meets, perhaps better than any other, the difficulties of the subject. See Genealogy.

(b) Some assume that the proper father of Joseph was Eli: he, as a brother of the names up to Salathiel necessitates (as the nearest relative, (half-brother?, had married Mary, the wife of the deceased childless Jacob, and according to the Levirate law (q. v.) Joseph would appear as the son of Jacob, and would, in fact, have two fathers (so Ammonius); or conventional that Jacob was the father of Joseph, and Eli his childless deceased uncle (comp. Julius Afric. in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i, 7; Calixtus, Clericus). This hypothesis, which still conflicts with the Levirate rule that only the deceased is called father of the posthumous son (Deut. xxv, 6), Hug (Einleitung, ii, 380 sq.), has been so modified as to place the Levirate marriage as far back as Salathiel, by which the mention of Salathiel and Zerubbabel in both lists would be explained; and Hug also introduces such a marriage between the parents of Joseph, and still another among more distant relatives. This is ingenious, but too complicated (see generally Paulus, ut sup. p. 209). If a de recognition of Jesus could have been laid down from David there remains no reason why, when the external extraction of the Messiah straight from David was so important, the very evangelist who wrote immediately for Jewish readers should have traced the indirect lineage. But if so many as three Levirate marriages had occurred together (as Hug thinks), we should suppose that none of the fathers-in-law were involved, and even in the case, would have given his readers some hint, or at least not have written (ver. 10) "begat" (γεννήσαι) in a manner quite calculated to mislead. Moreover, this hypothesis of Hug rests upon an interpretation of 1 Chron. iii, 18 sq., which that scholar himself could only have chosen (comp. his comment on this verse, § 4). There are properly only two general representations possible. For the history of Christ's parents, see Joseph; Mary.

(c) If both the foregoing explanations be rejected, there remains no other course than to renounce the attempt to reconcile the two family lines of Jesus, and frankly acknowledge a discrepancy between the evangelists, as some have done (Stroth, in Eichhorn's Repert. lx, 181 sq.; Ammon, Bibl. theol. ii, 256; Thiess, Krit. Comment. ii, 271 sq.; Fritzschke, ad Matt. p. 35; Strauss, i, 105 sq.; De Wette, B. Crustius, Alford, on Luke iii). In the decayed family of Joseph it might not have been possible, especially after so much misfortune as befell them, any father could have been desisted from, and every arrangement for the construction of a family register back to David. Were the account of Julius Africanus (in Eusebius, i, 7; compare Schöttgen, Itror, Heb. p. 885), that king Herod had caused the family records of the Jews to be burned, correct, the want of such information can only be explained by the conclusion that the genealogy of Joseph included in the genealogy of Jesus (as Wieseler, in the Stud. u. Kritik, 1845, p. 369). In that case, after the need of such registers had arisen, persons would naturally have set themselves to compiling them from traditional recollections, and the variations of these may readily have resulted in a double lineage. But even this supposition is by no means inconsistent with the hypothesis that Jesus was descended from David, which hypothesis would present the descent of Joseph and not of Mary, since it was unusual to exhibit the maternal lineage, and the Jews would not have regarded such an extraction from David as the genuine one. There are, at all events, two positions possible: either the supernatural generati on of Jesus by the Holy Spirit was admitted, or Jesus was considered a son of Joseph (Luke iii, 33). In the latter case a family record of Joseph entirely sufficed for the application of the O.T. oracles to Jesus; in the former case it has been conceived that such a register would be necessary. Thus, also Schlieren, in the Genealogia Jesus from David (Nom. iii, 8) would have thrown his divine origin into the background. This has been alleged as the reason why John gives no genealogy at all, and generally says nothing of the extraction of Jesus from the family of David (see Von Ammon. Leh. Juxta, i, 173 sq.). The force of these arguments, however, is greatly lessened by the consideration that the early Christians, in meeting the Jews, would be very anxious, if possible, to prove Christ's positive descent from David through both his reputed and his real parent; the more so, as the former was supposed to be only nominally such, but the latter the actual lineage to be made out on the mother's side. (See generally Baumgarten, De genealogia Chr. Hal. 1749; Dürs, Genealogia Jesu, Gott. 1778; Büsching's Harmon. d. Evang. p. 166 sq., 204 sq.) See Genealogy of Christ.

Dionysius also assumes the proper father of Joseph to be Eli, as a brother of the names up to Salathiel necessitates (as the nearest relative, (half-brother?), had married Mary, the wife of the deceased childless Jacob, and according to the Levirate law (q. v.) Joseph would appear as the son of Jacob, and would, in fact, have two fathers (so Ammonius); or conventional that Jacob was the father of Joseph, and Eli his childless deceased uncle (comp. Julius Afric. in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i, 7; Calixtus, Clericus). This hypothesis, which still conflicts with the Levirate rule that only the deceased is called father of the posthumous son (Deut. xxv, 6), Hug (Einleitung, ii, 380 sq.), has been so modified as to place the Levirate marriage as far back as Salathiel, by which the mention of Salathiel and Zerubbabel in both lists would be explained; and Hug also introduces such a marriage between the parents of Joseph, and still another among more distant relatives. This is ingenious, but too complicated (see generally Paulus, ut sup. p. 209). If a de in the Christian tradition, and so surpasses the range of the profane concerns, that we can hardly reject the idea that it must have operated to enhance the estimate of Christ's dignity.

It has been suggested as possible (Paulus, Leben Jesu, 1, 97 sq.) that the hope had already formed itself in the soul of Mary that she would become the mother of the Messiah (which, however, is contradicted by her evident surprise at the announcement, Luke i, 29, 34), and that this had drawn nourishment from a vision in a dream, as the angelic announcement (Luke i, 26 sq.) has been (but with the greatest violence) interpreted (see, however, Van Oosterzee, De Jesu et Virginis nato, Utr. 1840). See CONCEPTION.

Bethlehem, too (Wagner, De loco nat. J. Chr. Colom. Brandeb. 1673), as the place of Christ's birth, has been deemed to belong to the mythical dress of the narrative (comp. Mic. v, 1; see Thiers, Kir. Comment. ii, 414), and it has therefore been inferred that Jesus was not only begotten in Nazareth, but also born there (Kaiser, Bibl. Theol. i, 290)—which, nevertheless, no one dares to maintain. According to the following documents,

"John, who stands in so near a relation to Jesus, and must have known the family affairs, relates nothing at all of this wonderful birth, although it was very apposite to his design." But this evangelist shows the high dignity of Jesus only from his discourse, the other facts from public evidences and a few astonishing miracles; moreover, his prologue (i, 1-18) declares dogmatically pretty much the same thing as the synoptic gospels do historically in this respect. (Compare also the departures of Mary, John ii, 8 sq.; see Neander, p. 16 sq.)

"Neither Jesus nor an apostle ever appears in any discourse to this circumstance. Paul always says simply that Jesus was born 'of the seed of David' (Rom. i, 3; 2 Tim. ii, 8; once (Gal. iv, 4), more definitely, 'of a woman' (i.e. γυναῖκα, not παρθένον)."

It must be admitted, however, that an appeal to a fact which only one individual could positively know, speaks experience would be very ineffective; and an apostle would be very likely to subject himself to the charge of irrelevancy if he resorted to such an appeal (comp. Nietzsche, Pred. ad usit. placit., N. T. scriptorum rom. "Illustrum de primitivis vitis J. C. Halle, 1790"). But this would lend latitude to improper enmities, and make the word γέννησις (Gal. iv, 5) as that of the other theologians upon μητέρα (Isa. vii, 14).

(c) "Mary calls Joseph, without qualification, the father of Jesus (Luke ii, 48), and also among the Jews was generally called Joseph's son (Matt. xiii, 55; Mark vi, 3; Luke iii, 28; iv, 19; John i, 46; vi, 42)." This last argument is wholly destitute of force; but Mary might naturally, in common parlance, call Joseph Jesus' father, just as, in modern phrase, a foster-father is generally styled father when definiteness of expression is not requisite. (d) "The brothers of Jesus did not believe in him as the Messiah (John vii, 5), which would be inexplicable if the Deity had not been united with the Messiah from his very birth." Yet these brothers had not themselves personally known the fact; and it is, moreover, not uncommon that one son in a family who is a general favorite excites the ill-will of the others to such a degree that they even deny his evident superiority, or that brothers fail to appreciate and esteem a mentally distinguished brother.

(e) "History shows in a multitude of examples that the birth of illustrious men has been embellished with fables (Wetstein, N. T. i, p. 236); especially is the notion of a birth without connection with a man (μητέρα, γεννησθαι, etc.) (Gregorovius, Gesch. der Alph. Tibet, Rom. 1762, p. 55 sqq., 369 sqq.), and among the Indians and Chinese it is even applied to the foundlings of religion (Paul a. Bartholom. System. Brahman. p. 158; Du Halde, Rechbr. d. Chines. Reicht. iii, 26)."

In case it is meant by this that a wonderful generation of a new principle of the Jewish monotheism, it could not be made probable (Weisse, Leben Jesu, i, 176 sq.) that this account of the birth of Jesus is a heathen production (see, on the contrary, Neander, p. 12 sqq.). On the other hand, however, this statement stands so isolated...

56), partly that it is not certain that Mary, after her first conjunction by the Holy Spirit, ever bore the other children of her husband by her wife (see Origen, in Matt. iii, 468, ed. de la Rue; comp. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. ii, 1). The latter argument is of no force (see Schaaff, p. 29); on the formers, see below. But the term "brethren" (ἀδελφοί), since it does of itself indicate blood relatives, cannot be used where there is not immediate connection in blood with the mother. And if it denotes proper brothers, as also Bloom and Wieseler suppose, the question still remains whether these had both parents the same with Jesus (i.e. uere his full sisters), or were the sons of Joseph by a former marriage (half-brothers of Jesus by Theophil, or a first cousin indicated by the opinion [see Josephus], which is based upon an old (Ebo nician) tradition (see Fabricius, Pseudopigraph. i, 291; Thilo, Cod. Apocr. i, 109, 208, 362 sq.), is held as probable by Grotius (ad loc. i, 1), Vorstius (De Heb. Nor. Text. ed. Fischer, p. 71 sq.), Paulinus (Comment, i, 618), Berchtold (Eselet, v, 656 sq.), and others; the former by Herder (Briefe zweier Brüder J. p. 7 sq.), Pott (Proleg. in Kp. Jac. p. 90), Ammon (Bibl. Theol. ii, 259), Eichhorn (Einl. ins N. T. iii, 570 sq.), Kuinol (ad Matt xii, 46), Clement (ut sup.), Bengel (in his N. Acharieii, 9 sq.), Steir (An deute, i, 404 sq.), Friedlein (ad Matt 481), Neander (Leon. Jud. p. 39 sq.), Wieseler and Schaaff (ut sup.), and others. An intimation that favors this last view is contained in the expression "first-born" (Matt. i, 25; Luke ii, 7), which is further corroborated by the statement of abstinance from matrimonial intercourse until the birth of this child (Matt. xxi, 16; Luke 2, ed. ad loc.), which seems to imply that the brothers in question were later sons of Joseph and Mary. The circumstance that the sister of Jesus's mother had two sons similarly named—James and Joseph (or, as we understand Todaic Ia saho u goke v. 4) to mean "saw in a dream (son of Judas)"—is not conclusive against this view, since in two nearly-related families it is not even now unusual to find children of the same name, especially if, as in the present case, these names were in common use. Eichhorn's explanation (ut sup. p. 571) is based upon a long since exploded hypothesis, and requires no refutation. John xix, 26, contains no valid counter-argument: the brothers of Jesus may have been convinced by his resurrection (Matt. xxviii, 10), and, even had they been so at his death, yet perhaps the older and more spiritually-kindred John may have seemed to Jesus more suitable to carry out his last wishes than even his natural brothers (see Pott, ut sup. p. 76 sq.; Clement, ut sup. p. 360 sq.). At all events, the brothers of Jesus are not only expressed as having become at length believers in him, but they even appear somewhat later among the publishers of the Gospel (Acts i, 14; 1 Cor. iv, 5). See Jeroschinos. (d) Sisters of Jesus are mentioned in Matt. xxvii, 56; Mark vi, 3 (in Mark iii, 22, the words εξαι αδελφαί are of very doubtful authenticity). Their names are not given. That we are to understand their sisters is plain from the foregoing remarks respecting his brothers. Finally, an ecclesiastical tradition makes Salome, the wife of Zebedee, and mother of the apostles James and John (Mark xv, 40; xvi, 1, etc.), to have been a relative of Jesus. (See Hase, p. 58.) See SALLOME.

8. Jesus was educated at Nazareth (Hase, p. 57; Weiss, De J. C. educatione, Helmst. 1688; Lange, De prophetia, Christi adoece. & mort., 1699), but attended no (Rabbincal) schools (John vii, 15). He appears, according to the custom of the times, to have learned the trade of his adopted father (Justin Matt. c. Tryph. 88, p. 816, ed. Col.; comp. Theodor. Hist. Eccl. iii, 23; Sozomen, vii, 2, etc.), but this he did not continue to practice at the same time with his teaching, as also with the Rabbins (comp. Neander, p. 54). By this means he may in part have acquired his subsistence (comp. Mark vi, 3; but Origen, Contra Celsum, 6, p. 299, denies this statement, and Tischendorf omits πράκτορος). Besides, his followers supplied him with liberal presents, and, on his journeys, the Oriental usages of hospitality (John v, 42 sq.), and served him in good stead (see Rau, L'homme, ditum vivus accoperit, Erlang, 1794). See Hospitality. A number of grateful women also accompanied him for a considerable time, who cared for his maintenance (Luke viii, 2; Mark xvi, 41). He had a common travelling-purse with the apostles (John xii, 6; xiii, 29, 31; Luke iv, 19, 20; Acts ii, 45), and his female cousins were frequently taken care of and provided (Luke ix, 18; Matt. xiv, 17 sq., etc.). We certainly cannot regard Jesus as properly poor in the sense of indigent (see Walch, Miscell. Sacr. p. 866 sq., for this appears (Henke's Mss. ii, 610 sq.) neither from Matt. viii, 20 (see Lune, De Christi divinitate et prosperitate, of the Targum: iis qui... verumque infirminum Dei, iv, 160 sq.), and John xii, 23, rather shows the contrary (comp. Bar-Hebræus, Chron. p. 251); yet his parents were by no means in opulent circumstances (see Luke xi, 24; comp. Lev. xii, 18), and he is hence possessed (Matt. vii, 20) at least of real estate whatsoever (see generally Rau, De causis cur J. C. prosperitat. se subjecertis principibus, Erlang, 1787; Siebenhaar, in the Sächs. ges. Stud. ii, 168 sq.). See HUMILITAS. During his public career of teaching, Jesus (when not travelling) staid chiefly and of choice at Capernaum (Matt. iv, 13), and to a limited extent at Nazareth (see Kiesling, De J. Nazar., ingratia patriae erula, Lips. 1741). In exterior he constantly observed the customs of his people (see A. Georgius, Christ. decoro genitivus se accommod. Helmst. 1794; Guido, De Christo et disciplis ejus decori sanc. in the Not. mat. Gent. lips. iii, 563 sq.), and among other things, wishing to attract attention by singularity or austerity, he took part in the pleasures of social life (John ii, 1 sq.; Luke vii, 31 sq.; Matt. xi, 16 sq.; compare iv, 14 sq.). Nevertheless, he never married (compare Clem. Alex. Strom. iii, 191 sq.; see Schleiermacher, De Christi sacris, ed. 1829), for the suppression of Schultes (Neutest. theolog. Nachr. 1826, i 20 sq.; 1826, i 102 sq.) that Jesus was married according to Jewish usage, with the addition that he his wife (and, perhaps, several children by her) had died before his entrance upon public life, is a pure hypothesis that at least derived its countenance from the silence in the N. T. as to any such occurrences; and the stupendous design already in the mind of the youthful Jesus afforded no motive for marriage, and, indeed, did not admit (compare Matt. xix, 12) such a confinement to a narrower circle (see Weiss, Leben Jesu, i, 247 sq.); but this is only seen on p. 140. An attempt to be seen in Volbeding, p. 17, 18; Hase, p. 59. See NAZARETH.

9. The length of Jesus's public ministry (beginning about the 30th year of his age, Luke iii, 24; see Rock, in the Brem. u. Ver. Biblioth. iii, 815 sq.), as well as the chronological sequence of the single events related in the Gospels, is very variously estimated. (See Hase, p. 17.) The first three evangelists give, as the sense of their transactions (after his temptation and the imprisonment of the Baptist, Matt. iv, 1-13), almost exclusively Gallus (De Gallioe opportuno Serratorum resurr. theorum, Gött. 1775), inasmuch as Jesus had his residence then in the city Capernaum, and he was present in the winter months (Matt. iv, 13; viii, 4-24; Mark i, 21; ii, 1, etc.). For the most part, we find him in the romantic and thickly settled neighborhood of the Sea of Tiberias, or upon its surface (Matt. viii, 23 sq; xiii, 1 sq.; xiv, 19; Luke viii, 22), also in Jerusalem and the other districts of Judæa (Matt. viii, 28; Luke viii, 26; Mark vii, 31), and he went as far as within the Phoenician boundaries (Matt. xv, 21; Mark vii, 24 sq.). But in the synoptic gospels he only appears once to have visited Jerusalem, at the time of the last Passover (Matt. xxvi, 2; Luke xii, 4). Until his death, the extent of his teaching might be limited to a single year (Ezech, iii, 24), and many (appealing to Luke iv, 19; comp. ls. i, 1 sq.; see Origen, Hom. 32; comp. Tertull. Ad. Jud. c. 8; but see Körner, p. 4) already in the ancient church (Clem. Alex. Strom. i, p. 147; Origen, Præcip. iv, 5) only allow this space to his public mission (compare Mann, Three Years of the Birth and Death of Christ, p. 161;
Priestly, Harmony of the Evangelists, London, 1744, ii, 4; Brown, Ordo Secolorum, p. 634 sqq.; although, independently of all the others, Luke vi, 1 (second-first Sabbath) affords indication of a second Passover which Jesus is said to have celebrated in Galilee.)

On the other hand, John's Gospel shows (comp. Jocav. Krz., 1836, iv, 845 sqq.) that Jesus was not only oftener, but generally also in Judea (whence he once travelled through Samaria to Galilee, John iv, 4; compare his reported hours, xix, 11) such generalizing of his journeys (but this difference agrees with the respective designs of the several gospels; see Neander, p. 386 sqq.), and informs us of his Jewish festivals which Jesus celebrated at Jerusalem. The first, occurring soon after the baptism of Jesus (John ii, 12), is a Passover; the second (John v, 1, L) is called indefinitely "a feast of the Jews" (Elop 0 7 loiv 'louiaueta); the third was the Festival of Tabernacles (John vii, 2); the fourth the Feast of Decoration (John x, 22); and, lastly, the fifth (John xii, xxii) again a Passover: mention is also made (John vii, 41; xvi, 1) of Jesus being a guest in Galilee. Hence it would seem that Jesus was in Galilee at least in the three years (Origen, Contra Celsum, ii, 67) as a public teacher; and if by the "feast of John," vi, 1 we are also to understand a Passover (Paulus, Comm. i, 901 sq.; Stut-kind, in Bengel's Archiv. J.1, 182 sqq.; B. Crusius, ad loc.; See also Alford, in pand. sac. p. 114; Robinson, Harmony,
p. 190), which, however, is not certain (Levison, p. 103; Augustin, De temp. in Act. Apost. ratione, x, 1 sqq.; Jacob; us, in sup. p. 864 sqq.). We must assign a period of two and a half years (Eusebius, i, 10, 3), as lately Seeleharf has done (Summary of recent Discoveries in Chronology, N. Y., 1857, p. 180), although on the most singular grounds (comp. See Alford, in pand. sac. p. 115; Robinson, Harmony, p. 190); the evangelists hardly afford more than two years and a few months (see Augustin, in sup. p. 28; Hase, p. 17 sqq.) to the public labors of Jesus (see generally Larrabe, De an-nae missae Christ. Afr., Aldworth, 1700; Kernt, Quod Paschata Christi post Pascham celebraretur, Leiden, 1708; Ficht, De ceremo Paschatum Christi, Rostock, 1789; Lahode, De die et anno ult. Pasch. Chr. Hal. 1749; Marsh's remarks in Michaelis's Introit. ii, 46 sqq.). Again, as the apostles were not uninteruptedly in company with Jesus, the time of their proper association with him might be still further reduced so much, although we can not without Hœnlein, De temporis, qu. J. C. cum Apost. narratur, derelit, duratione, ErL 1796) assume it to have been barely some nine months. Under these three (or four) Paschal festival writers have repeatedly endeavored, for historical and particularly apologetic purposes, to arrange all the single occurrences which the first evangelists mention without chronological sequence, and so to obtain a complete chronological view of Jesus's entire journeys and teaching. Yet, notwithstanding so great a degree of ingenious has been expended upon this subject, none of the Gospel Harmonies hitherto constructed can be regarded as more than a series of historical conjectures, since the narrative of the first three evangelists presents but little that can guide to a measurably certain conclusion in such an arrangement, and John himself does not appear to relate the incidents in strictly chronological order according to these Passovers (see generally Everst, Emld. i., 2, 692 sqq.). The most important of these attempts are, Lightfoot, Chronicle of the O. and N. T. Lond. 1653; Doddridge, Exposition of the N. T.

few exceptions, John alone assigns longer speeches of a dogmatic character to Jesus; nor is it any matter of surprise that the Wisdom which delivered itself to the populace in maxims and similes should permit itself to be understood, in the circle of the priests and those erudi te in the law, connectedly and mystically on topics of the higher sphere of thought. Even though (in view of course) we can not expect the ipsisimna verba. In a formal treat tment, moreover, his representations, especially those ad tressed to the people, could not be free from accommodation (P. van Hemert, Urb. Acomm. in N. T. Dordtum and Leipzig, 1757); but whether he made use of the ma terially (negative) or the spiritual (positive) accommodation is not a historical, but a dogmatic question (compare, there on Brethneider, Handbuch d. Dogma, i. 420 sq.; Wegschnei der, Institut, p. 119 sq.; De Wette, Sittenlehre, iii. 181 sq.; Neander, p. 216 sq.). See ACCOMMODATION.
Like the O-T-Prophets, he sometimes also employed symboli cal acts (John xiii, 1 sq., 20, 22; comp. Luke ix, 47 sq.).
A dignified expression, a keen but affectionate look, a gestication reflecting the inward inspiration (Hege meister, Christus gestus pro concione uxorae, Serveost, 1774), may have contributed not a little to the force of his higher and spiritual word, to which the Pharisees and esay and lawyers, the eloquent of eloquence (compare John vii, 46; xviii, 6; Matt. vii, 28 sq.). The tuition which Jesus imparted to the apostles (comp. Greiling, p.
215 sq.), was apparently private (Matt. xiii, 11 sq.; see Col t, Bibl. Theol. ii, 14). See APOSTLE. Finally, Jesus' com Bibl., i. 209 sq.), though he might be understood in the latter language, or even Latin (Wermelsdorf, De Christo vera, J. C. Jen. 1769; Bh. de Rossi, Dell i lingua propria di Christo, Parn. 1778; Ziebich, De lingua Judaeos; comp.

Christi et. Apost. Vitebsi, 1781; Wiseman, in his Hor susc. Rom. 1828). No warranty of his are extant (the spuriousness of the so-called letter to the king of Edessa, given by Eusebius, i, 13, is evident; comp. also Röhr's Krit. Prediger-biblioth., i, 161 sq. [see ADAGI]): the al leged written productions of Jesus may be seen in Fa briani, De iis scriptis Christi div. 1, 1803 sq.; nor was necessary, since he had provided for the immediate dissemination of his doctrines through the apostles, and he wished even to turn away attention from the literature of the ag to the spirit and life of a thoroughly pious (compare Hug felt), i, 94 sq.; Sartorio, Cursus scriptii nihil res eriquem, Leipzig, 1815; Witting, Warum J. nuchts Schrifft, über sich u. s. Relig. nichts Schrifft, historiuren, Luneb.

1823; B. Crusius, Bibl. Theol., p. 22 sq.; Neander, p. 150; comp. Hase, p. 11). Jesus has been improperly entitled a Rabbi, or high rank of religious teacher (De synagogis, in the sense of the Jewish schools, as having been thus styled not only by the populace (Mark x, 51; John xx, 10), or his disciples (John i, 39, 50; iv, 31; ix, 2; x, 8; Matt. xxvii, 5, etc.), but also by Nicodemus (John iii, 2), and even his enemies (v, 25) themselves (Vitringa, Syn notur, p. 28; Paulus, Leben Jesu, i, 122 sq.; see, on the contrary, E. C. Schmid, De promotorum aedae, Christi eque quisque discipulis perpetuum tributa, Lips. 1740). In the time of Jesus persons had no occasion to aspire to the formal ity of learned honors, as in later ages (Neander, p. 50), and Jesus had little sympathy with such an ostentatious way of life. Compare also Lame: Warum J. C. über sich mehr in Sevoldeing, p. 25.) See PROPHET.
11. The Jews expected miracles of the Messiah (John vii, 31; 4 Esdr. xiii, 50; comp. Matt. viii, 17; John xx, 30 sq.; see Bertholdt, Christologia Juxtor, p. 188 sq.), such as Jesus performed (šapata, sphen, šāvītā). These all had a moral tendency, and aimed at beneficial results (on Matt. viii, 28 sq.; 2 Cor. ad loc.; Brun schneider, Handbuch d. Dogma, i. 307 sq.; Hase, Leben Jesu, p. 194; on Matt. xxi, 18 sq., see Fleck, Verkünd. d. Chris tenth, p. 138 sq.), in which respects they are in strik ting contrast with the silly thaumaturgy of the apeory philophs (see Tholuck, Gnadenstübch. d. evang. theol.
4th ed., 1853, pp. 280, 281). But the Jewish contention concerning the cure (Mark vi, 5) of such maladies as had baf all spiritual remedies (insanity, epilepsy, palsy, lepro blindness, etc.). He asked no reward (comp. Matt. x, 5), and performed no miracles to gratify curiosity (Matt. vi, 1 sq.; Mark vii, 11 sq.), or to excite the assenti (John xix, 30, 36; Mark i, 44; vii, 36; viii, 26; Luke v, 14, v, 36; Pil'tt, in der Hess. Hebegebr, 1850, p. 809 sq. takes an erroneous view of Mark v, 19, for in verse 20 Jesus bilds the man relate his cure to his relatives only, and he avoids this popular outbursts of joy, which would have swelled loudly at his particularly successful achieve ments (John v, 13), only suffering these miracles to be acknowledged to the honor of God (Luke viii, 39 sq.; v, 16 sq.). In effecting cures he sometimes made use of (mystical) means (Matt. vi, 5, see below). See COMP.
Spinossa, Tract. theol. pol. c. 6, p. 244, ed. Paul.
Med.-heur. Untersuch. p. 353 sq.; Paulus, Leben Jesu, i, 223), but in general he employed simply a word (Matt.
vi, 1 sq.; John v, 8, etc.), even at a distance (Matt. vi, 5 sq.; Luke vii, 6 sq.; John iv, 56), or merely a touch (Mark vi, 5). He imparted no more (John iv, 46) to the member (blind eyes, Matt. ix, 29; xx, 34; see Seier, Christ. an in operibus mirabilibus. arcanum suis usus redim Erlang. 1755; also Jesus an miraculum suis ipsius victus rauberib, ib. 1799); on the other hand, likewise, a cure was experienced when the infirm touched his garment (Matt. xx, 34 sq.; John x, 49 sq.), and the apostles on the presumption of a firm faith (Matt. ix, 28; compare John v, 6), so that when this failed the miraculous power was not exercised (Matt. xiii, 58; Mark xi, 6).
On this very account some moderns have asserted (Guts Amoros's Theol. Jour., i, 177 sq.]; Eenensmer. Mag net, p. 473 sq.; Kieser, Syst. des Tellermars, ii, 302 sq.; Meyer, Naturalienköl. o. die Erzkrän. d. Antii. Mag net, mit Hins. auf Theol. Hambl. 1889; comp. Weisse, 434 sq.) that these cures were principally effected by Jesus through the agency of animal magnetism (comp.
T. medico primario, Erlang. 1743; Schultze, in der Neuetl. Theol. Nachr. 1829, p. 360 sq.). See HEALING.
That the Jewish Rabbis and the Essenes performed, or perhaps only pretended to perform, similar cures, at least upon dyspepsia, appear from Matt. xii, 27; Luke i, 19; Mark ix, 38 sq.; comp. Josephus, Wurr, ii, 6; Aw. vii, 2, 5). The sentiments of Jesus himself as to the value and tendency of his miracles are unearable: he disapproved that eagerness for wonders displayed by his contemporaries (Matt. xvi, i; John ii, 18) which sprung from sensuous curiosity or from pure malvolence: Matt. xxii, 39; xvi, 4; Mark viii, 11 sq., or else had a thank less regard merely to their own advantage (John iv, 19; vi, 24), which while he regarded them as a national method for attaining his purpose of awakening and calling forth faith (John vi, 20 sq.; John xxii, 12 sq.; and hence often lamented their ineffectualness (Matt.
vi, 20 sq.; Luke x, 13; see especially Nitsch, Querum

That Jesus passed through a merely apparent death has been supposed by many (see especially Bahir, 3:166, on Deut. 32:35; Goecke, Jesus i, 1, 14 sq.; and Leben Jesu, i, ii, 281 sq.; on the contrary, see Richter, De morte Sacerdotum in crucis, Gott. 1757, also in his Dia. 4 med. i, p. 1 sq.; Gruner, De Jes. C. morte vera, non simulata, Jena, 1805; Schmidtmann, Medic-philo. Ber. 16, dass J. noch a. exsuscit. nicht von einer todtl. person. Hugh von Tho. von Th. von Hesycharch, De sanatione mort. sancti, De resurrectione mort. sancti, De resurrectione mort. sancti. The claim of the side of Jesus by the lance of a Roman soldier (John xix, 34; his name is traditionally given as Longinus, see Thilo, Apocr. p. 868) has been regarded as the chief circumstance upon which everything here depends (Triller, De mirando lateris cordisque Christi raidur, in De resuscitatione, Jena, 1778; Eichhorn, Scripta med.-bild., p. 82 sq.; Bartholini, De lateri Christi apertio, Lugd. Bat. 1648), inasmuch as before this puncture the above cited physicians assume but a torso and acon, which might seem the more probable because crucifixion could hardly have caused death in so short a time (Mark xv, 44). See Crucifix. But the account of the wound in the side is not such as to allow the question to be by that means fully and absolutely determined (see Briefe über Rationalismus, p. 256 sq.), since the evangelist does not state which side (ακρον) was pierced, nor have clipeus and clipeato be confused, nor has it been a very precarious argument to presume the left side (although the position of the soldier, holding the spear in his right hand and thrusting it opposite him, would strongly countenance this supposition), and equally so to assume a very deep incision, penetrating the pericardium and heart, thus changing a swoon into actual death; nevertheless, comp. John xx, 25, 26, in favor of this last particular. The purpose of the stab—to ascertain whether the crucified person was still alive—also demanded a forcible thrust, and the issue of blood and water vouched for by the evangelist (John xix, 33 sqq., 40 sqq.) would certainly point to real death as immediately resulting. By this we must understand the clotted blood (εκρον) in connection with the watery portion (σερσον), which both flow together from punctures of the larger blood-vessels (κρωνα) of body, and the ektos, as the artēres of the breast, as supposed by Hase [Lab. Jesu, 2 ed. p. 198], no blood would issue, for these are usually empty in a corpse, and the piercing of the side would therefore not cause, but only indicate death. See Blood and Water. In fine, the express assertion of the evangelist, that Jesus breathed his last (Ezech. [Mark xv, 37; Luke xxiii, 46], a term exactly equivalent to the Latin expiravit, he expired, and so doubtless to be understood in its common acceptance of death), admits no other hypothesis than that of actual and complete dissolution. See Agony.

The fact of the return of Jesus alive from the grave (comp. Ammon, De vera J. resuscit., Erlang. 1808; Griesbach, De fonth. unde Evangel. suas de resurrectione Domini narrationes haurient, Jena, 1785; Friedrich, in Eichhorn's Biblioth. vii, 294 sq.; Döderl. De J. in ex. redvit. Utr. 1841) is not invalidated by Strauss's ingenious hypotheses (ii, 645; see Hase, p. 212; Theile, p. 105 sq.; comp. Kühn, Wie gog Ch. durch des Grabs Thür, Strals. 1888); but if Jesus had been merely dead in appearance, so delicate a constitution, already exhausted by sufferings before crucifixion, certainly would not have revived with so much speed—that it is dead from the artēres (Neander, p. 708): in the cold rock-vaunt, in an atmosphere loaded with the odor of aromatics, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes, in utter prostration, he would, in the ordinary course of things, have rather been killed than resuscitated. His return to life must therefore be regarded as a true miracle, as a true resurrection. On the grave of Jesus, see Golgotha.

After he had risen (he lay some thirty-six hours in the grave; not three full days, as asserted by Seyffarth, Summary of Chronol. Discov. N. Y. 1857, p. 188), he first showed himself to Mary Magdalene (Matt. xxviii. 9; another figure of Jesus is also mentioned (Nicophorus, w. supr.; this credulous historian names the evangelist Luke as the painter successfully of Jesus, Mary, sat several apostles), and a certain Publius Lentulus, a Roman officer (according to one M.S. proconculus) is reported to have composed a description of Christ's personal appearance; but yet another—by the crucified teacher (Neander, p.715 sq.), and even handled, although with some reserve (Luke xxiv, 57; John xxi, 12).

He did not appear in public; had he done so, his enemies would have found opportunity to remove him a second time out of the way, or to represent him to the people as a blasphemer; his resurrection could have its true significance to his believers only (see generally John, Nachträge, p. 1 sq.). After a stay of 40 days, he was visibly carried up into the sky before the eyes of his disciples (Luke xxiv, 51; Acts i, 9. Mark xvi, 19, is of doubtful authenticity). Of this, three evangelical witnesses (Matthew, Mark, and John) relate nothing (for very improbable reasons of this, see Plat. Magy., viii, 55 sq.), although the last implies it in the words of Jesus, "I ascend to my Father," and closes his Gospel with the last interview of Jesus in Galilee, at the Sea of Tiberias. See also compare Matt. xxviii, 16, 17. The apostles, in the doctrinal expositions, occasionally allude to this ascension (ἀνάβασις: cf. Acts i, 9; Tim. iii, 16; Rev. xvi, 5), and often speak (Acts ii, 33; v, 31; vii, 55, 56; Rom. viii, 34; Eph. i, 20; Col. i, 13) of Christ as seated at the right hand of God (see Griesbach, Sylog. tomus tertius, 3 sq.; Harnack, Hellenismus, p. 351 sqq.)—"in splendore," or "in spectaculum." But see also John, 17:3; also in his Opuscul. ii, 471 sq.; B. Crusiuss, Bibl. Theol. p. 400. Over the final disposal of the body of Christ after its ascension from the earth, an impenetrable veil must ever rest. The account of the ascension (see Stud. Theol. 1841, iii, 557 sq.) is still treated by many of the critical theologians (compare Ammon, in his Auslegung J. C. in col. hist. Bibl. Gotting., 1800, also in his Nov. opusc. theol.; Horst, in Horn's Gotting. Museum J. Theol. i, ii, 3 sq.; Br. über Rationell., p. 238 sq.; Strauss, ii, 672 sq.; Hase, p. 220) as one of the myths (moulded on the well-known G-T. examples, Gen. v, 24; 2 Kings ii, 11, and serving as a basis of the expectation was its visible return from heaven, Acts i, 11; for, that the Jew of this day believed in an ascension of the Messiah to heaven [comp. John vi, 62], appears from the book Zohar [Schoetgen, Hora Hebr. ii, 596]: the comparisons with Solomon, Hiram, etc., are not in place. Hase, in his Untersuch. über die Darstellung der G. in virum et col. redeutend ex narrativum loco, Delph., 1892; or Fogtmann, Coloss. â col. ascendens, Hamb. 1826 are as little as the purpose that originated among the Christians, or were even invented by the apostles (Grauberg, Verh. philos. ii, 461) — a view that is forbidden by the close proximity of the incident in point of time (London [Weiselyan] Heres., July, 1861). It can, therefore, only be regarded as a preternatural occurrence (Neander, p. 726). See Ascension.

13. Respecting the personal appearance of Jesus we know nothing with certainty. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vii, 18), the woman who bore the hemorrage (Matt. ix, 20) had erected from thankfulness a brazen statue (see Hassel, Dissertat. syllog., p. 314 sq.; comp. Heinichen, Ecc. 10 ad Eusebius, iii, 397 sq.; Tililo, Cod. apocr. i, 562 sq.) of Jesus at Panaces (Caesara, Philippi), which was destroyed (Sozom. Hist. Eccle. v, 21), as it was done again, under the emperor Hadrian (compare Lefèvre, Niph. Hist. Eccl. vi, 15). Jesus himself, according to several ancient (but scarcely trustworthy) statements (Evagr. iv, 27; Niph. ii, 7), sent his likeness to Abgarus (q. v.) at Edessa (comp. Bar-Hebr. Chron. p. 118), where it had been found the haakelent of the emperors, or chief of Christ with an imprint of his countenance (Cedrenus, Hist. p. 176; Bar-Hebraeus, Chron. p. 168). Still

JESUS CHRIST

The question is an interesting one, had we the means of accurately determining, how and by what instrumentalities Jesus, in a human point of view, attained his spiritual power, or to what influence (aside from divine inspiration) he owed his intellectual formation as a founder of religion (Ammon, Bibl. Theol. i, 234 sq.; Handbuch der christl. Sittenlehre, i, 45 sq.; Kaiser, Bibl. Theol., i, 234 sq.; De Wette, Bibl. Dogm., p. 186 sq.; Collin, Bibl. Theol. ii, 8 sq.; Hase, p. 56 sq.; compare Rau, De momentis is quos ad Jes. dictur. rerum scientia inhumanae et habitus, evidenter, Erlang. 1796; Gelling, Biblical and Theological Essays, 1825. See also rational. p. 154 sq.). But while there has evidently been on the one side a general tendency to exaggerate the difficulties which the natural improvement of Jesus had to overcome (Reinhard, Plan Jesu, p. 485 sq.), yet none of the hypotheses proposed for the solution of the question satisfies the conditions of the problem, or has been free from clear historical difficulties. Many, for instance, suppose that Jesus had his religious education in the order of the Essenes (q. v.), and they think that in the Christian morals they especially find many points of coincidence with the doctrines of that Jewish sect (Keim, Christus und die Essener, p. 598 sq.; Schop, Gesch. d. Sittenlehre Jesu, i, 570 sq.; see, on the contrary, Luderwald, in Henke's Magaz. iv, 378 sq.; Bongel, in Flatt's Magaz. vii, 126 sq.; J. H. Dorffmüller, De dispari Jesu Essenerum disciplina, Wunscheit. 1803; Wegern, in Illiger's Zeitung für die christl. Religion, p. 2; cost. H. Heuglin, 3th Ap- pendix. to his edit. of Reinhard's Plan Jesu). Others attrib- ute the culture of Jesus to the Alexandro-Jewish religious philosophy (Bahrdt, Briefe über die Bibel im Volkstum, i, 570 sq.; Gfröer, in the Gesch. der Urchristen.). Still others imagine that Sadoceism (see Sado- ceae) perhaps had a complicity of this with the religious ideas of Jesus (see Pirrois), was the source of the pure religious views of Jesus (Henke, Magaz. vii, 425 sq.; De Cötes, Schütz- schrif. f. Jesus von Nazareth, p. 128 sq.). Although single points in the teaching and acts of Jesus might be illustrated by each of these theories (as could not fail to be the case with respect to one who threw himself into the midst of the religious efforts of the age, and combined efficiency with right aims), yet the whole of his spiritual life and deeds, the high clearness of understanding, the purity of sentiment, and, above all, the independence of spirit and matchless moral power which characterized this singular individual, cannot, if one will, be made alone, cannot be thus explained (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 86 sq.). A richly-endowed and profound mind is, moreover, presupposed in all such hypotheses (comp. Paulus, Leb. Jesu, i, 89). Our object is simply to investi- gate the influences received, he received from his spon- sors, unfolded them, and directed them in that path. And in determining these, it is clear at the outset that a powerful impulse must have been given to the natural development of Jesus's mind (Luke iii, 52) by a diligent study of the Holy Scriptures, especially in the prophetic- al books (Isaiah the Psalms, Paulus, Leb. Jesu, i, 119 sq.), which contained the germs of an improved monotheism, and, are, for the most part, free from Jewish- ish niceties. It would also derive assistance from a comparison of the Pharisaic statutes, which were un- questionably known to Jesus, and particularly of the Jewish Hellenism (Alexandrianism; see ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL), with those simple doctrines of old Judaism, especially as spiritualized by the prophets. How much may have been derived from outward circum- stances we do not know; that the maternal training, and even the open (Luke iv, 29) and romantic situation under the Nazareth cart, has a liberal influence in unfolding and cultivating his mind (Grelling, Leb. Jesu, p. 48); scarcely admits a doubt, nor that the neighborhood of Gentile inhabitants in the entire vicinity might have already weakened and repressed in the youthful soul of Jesus the old Jewish narrow-mindedness. The age also affor- ded a crisis, to bring out and strengthen the positive element of his genius. Learned instruction (see No. 6 above) Jesus had not enjoyed (Matt. xiii, 54 sq.; John vii, 15), although the Jewish fables (Toledoth Jesu, p. 5) assign him a youthful teacher named Elhanan (17728), and Christian tradition (Historia Josephi, c. 46 sq.) attributes to him wonderful aptness in learning (see generally Paulus, Leb. Jesu, i, 121 sq.). In addi- tion to all these natural influences operating upon his human spirit, there was above all, the plenary inspiration (John iii, 34) which he enjoyed from the intercom- munication of the divine nature; for the bare facts of his career, even on the lowest view that can be taken of the documents, are as perfect an evidence of a rational explanation on the ground of his mere humanity (see J. Young, Chair of History and Law, Lond. 1855, N. Y. 1857). See Churis. (For additional literature, see Volhdey, p. 36 sq.) His prediction of future events would not of itself be an evidence of a higher character than that of other prophets (see Prophecy.).

10. Respecting the enterprise on behalf of mankind which Jesus had conceived, and which he undevot- edly kept in view (see especially Reinhard, l'ersuch. üb. d. Plan den der Stifter der chr. Rel. zum Besten der Mensch. entwurf, 5th edit. by Heuglin, Wittenb. 1860; compare the Nieuwe Bijbel, xxxiv, 242 sq.; Schlicth. u. scheidt. drosselb. Leipz. 1816; Planck, i, 7 sq.; 86 sq.; Grelling, p. 120 sq.; Strauss, i, 463 sq.; Ne- ander, p. 115 sq.; Weisse, i, 117 sq., a few observations only can here be muluded. See REDEMPTION. That Jesus sought not simply to be a reformer of Judaism (John iv, 22; Matt. xv, 24; compare Matt. v, 17) [see LAW., much less the founder of a secret association (Klotzsch, De Christo ob institutandae societate clandestina alieno, Vitch. 1768), but to unite all mankind in one great sacred family, is vouched for by his own declara- tion (John iv, 22; xx, 16), by the whole tenden- cy of his teaching, by his constant expression of the deepest sym- pathy with humanity in general, and finally by the selec- tion of the apostles to continue his work; only he wished to confine himself personally to the boundaries of Judea in the publication of the kingdom of God (Matt. xv, 24), whereas his disciples, led by the Holy Spirit, should eventually traverse the world as heralds of the truth (Matt. xxviii, 19 sq.). It is evident that to Jesus himself the outline of his design was always clearly defined in the course of his labors, but, on account of the dogmatic conformity of the delineations in John's Gospel, it is the less easy to arrive at an appre- ciation of it in the synoptical gospels, it is impossible ac- curately to show historically the gradual realization of this subjective scheme. But that Jesus at any moment of his life whatever had stated the political element of his mission, which was the main point of the expected Messiah (indeed, ne even evaded the question, Luke xx, 1 sq., and forbade the spread of this report, Matt. xxvi, 20) unquestionably was, that the minds of the Jews were incapable of separating their carnal anticipa- tions from the true idea of the Messiah (q. v.). He strove, therefore, on every occasion to set this idea itself in a right position before them, and occasionally suggested the identification of his person with the Messiah, partly by the epithet of "Son of Man," which he applied to himself (see especially Matt. xii, 8), partly by explicit statements (Matt. xiii, 16 sq.; Luke iv, 21). Hence it is not surprising that the opinion of the people re-respecting him declined, and the majority regarded him only as a great prophet, chiefly interesting for his wonderful predictions (Matt. xiii, 37); and pronounced himself as the Messiah only to individual susceptible hearts (John iv, 26; ix, 36 sq.), and also to the high-priest at the conclusion of his career (Matt. xxvi, 64). The disciples required it merely for the confirmation of the faith they had (John xvi, 13 sq.; Luke xi, 20). See KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

The moral and religious character of Jesus (humanly considered), which even in the syllogistical gospels, which are certainly chargeable with no embellishment, appears in a high ideality, has never yet been depicted with accurate psychological skill (see Volbeing, p. 53), but usually as a model of virtue in general (see Jerusalem, Niechinpau, S. 75 sq.; Grimm, 189 sq.; E. G. Winckler, Vers. e. Psychographie Jesu, Lips., 1826; Ull-sq.; Thiele, in the Darm. Kirch.-Zeit., 1844, N. 92-94). (Comp. Hase, p. 62 sq.) On the (choleric) temperament of the Saviour, see "De temperamentis Christi" kong. Jen, 1753. Deep humility before God (Luke xviii, 19), and ardent love towards men in view of the determined sacrifice (John x, 18), were the distinguishing traits of his noble devotion, while the divine zeal that stirred his great soul concentrated all his virtues upon his one grand design. Jesus appears as the harmonious complete embodiment of religious resignation; but this was so far from being a result of innate weakness (although Jesus might have had a slender physical constitution), that his natural force of character subsided into it (for examples of high energy in feeling and act, see John ii, 16 sq.; viii, 44 sq.; Matt. xvi, 28; xxiii, 5, etc.). Everywhere to this deep devotion was joined a clear, prudent understanding—a combination which alone can preserve a man of sensibility and activity from the danger of becoming a reckless enthusiast or a weak sentimentalist. This is most unmistakably exhibited in the account of his passion and death. Neither do we find in Jesus any trace of the austerity and gloomy sternness of other founders of religion, or even of his contemporary the Baptist (Matt. xi, 18 sq.). In the midst of eager listeners in the public streets or in the Temple, he spoke with the simplicity and authority of one who knew what he said; yet how affectionately sympathetic (John xi, 55), how solicitous, how self-sacrificing did he exhibit himself in the bosom of the family, in the dear circle of his friends! What tender sympathy expressed itself in him on every occasion (Luke vii, 13; Matt. ix, 36; xiv, 19, xxx, 44). He was both (compare Rom. xii, 1) tearful among the tearful (John xi, 33), and cheerful amongst the cheerful (John ii, 1 sq.; Luke vii, 54). On this very account the character of Jesus has at all times so irresistibly won the hearts of the good and noble of all people, since it entered into the popular and sacred magisterium, the soul of the people, to cause amazement, but at the same time the purest, most disinterested humanity, and thus presents to the observer not simply an object of esteem, but also of love. The history of Jesus's life is equally interesting to the child and the full-grown man, and certainly his example will always appeal to the poor. On this subject, the above times not lost in vain. In accordance with this unmistakable sum of his character, certain single passages of the Gospels (e. g. Matt. xxvi, 46 sq.; xv, 21 sq.; John ii, 4), which, verbally apprehended [see CAXA], might perplex us concerning Jesus (comp./J. F. Volbeing: Utirum Christus matrem genere-que suum dissimulati et desperserit, Vitbe, 1784; K. J. Klemm, De necessitatis J. Christi consanguinitis intercadentes, Lips. 1816), may be more correctly explained (see Ammon, Leb. Jes., 1, 243 sq.), and may be placed in harmony with others (e. g. Luke ii, 51; compare Lange, De subjectione Chr. sub parent. Lips. 1738). See ExsPAMLE.

The task of the world's redemption, acting as an ever-present burden upon the Saviour's mind, produced that pensiveness, not to say sadness, which was a marked characteristic of all his deportment. Rarely did his equanimity rise to exuberant joy, and that only in connection with the great ruling object of his life (Luke x, 21 sq.; Matt. xii, 40 sq.; John xii, 27), at times to the depths of mental anguish (Mark xiv, 34). See AGONY. It was this interior pressure that so frequently burst forth in sighs and tears (John x, 35; Luke xix, 41), and made Jesus the ready symp-pathizer with human affliction (John xiv, 21 sq.). For in the spiritual and turbulent trials that ripened every true moral character, and it was accordingly needful that God, in bringing many sons unto glory, should make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings. The fact that Jesus was emphatically "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," is the real key to the subdued and self-collected tone of his entire demeanor. See KENOESIS.

For an adequate explanation of the astonishing power which our Saviour exercised over his auditors, and, indeed, exerted over all who came within his circle of influence, we are doubtless to look to the facts which have not yet been exhibited, at least in connection, with such graphic portraiture as to make his life stand out to the modern reader in its true moral grandeur, force, and vividity. These elements are partlly suggested in the evangelist's statement that those who first hung upon the Redeemer's lips found in his discourses a new and divine assurance: "He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes" (Matt. vii, 29).

(1.) His doctrines were novel to his hearers. It was not so much because he announced to them the ushering in of a new dispensation, for upon this he merely touched in his introductory addresses and by way of arresting their attention; all details respecting that fresh era which could gratify curiosity, or even awaken it, he sedulously avoided, and he seemed anxious to divert the popular expectation from himself as the central figure in the coming scenes. It was the spiritual truth he communicated that burned upon the hearts of the listening populace with a strange intensity. True, the essential features of a religious life had been illustrated in their sacred books for centuries by holy men of old, and the most vital doctrines of the Gospel may be said to have been anticipated and propounded in unthought of apophthegmatic comments; nay, living examples were not wanting to confirm the substantial identity of religious experience under whatever outward economy. Yet, at the time of our Lord's advent, the fundamental principles of sound piety seem to have been forgotten or over-looked, especially by the Pharisees, whose views and practices were regarded as the models by the nation at large. When, therefore, our Lord brought back the popular attention to the simple doctrines of love to God and man, not only as lying at the foundation of the O. T. ethics, but as being the very core of the New Testament; to the humanity, pertinence, and truthfulness of the sentiment came with an irresistible freshness of conviction to the minds of the humblest hearers. For this, too, they had already been prepared by the sad contrast between the precepts and the conduct of the highest sectaries of the old dispensation, and the high-mindedness which above all, by the bitter yearnings after religious liberty in their own souls, which the current system of belief failed to supply. Sin yet lay as a load of anguish upon their hearts, and they eagerly embraced the gentle invitations of the Redeemer to the bosom of their forfeited ed hearts. It was precisely the resurrection of these again obscured teachings that gave such power to the preaching of Luther, Whitefield, Wesley, Edwards and others in subsequent times, and which converted the moral desert of their day into a spiritual Eden. But there was this to enhance the effect in the Saviour’s promises, that they awakened the expectation of a millennial reign; an idea misconstrued, indeed, by many of the Jews into that of a temporal dominion, but on that very account productive of a more boundless and more awed interest. The devoted mind of Jesus had been roused, and Jesus even found it necessary to repress and avoid the fanatical and disloyal manifestations to which it was instantly prone. Yet in those hearts which better understood “the kingdom of heaven,” there arose the dawn of that vaticinal day of which the Pentecostal effusion brought the meridian glory. It was a judicative of this difference between Christ’s and his predecessor’s, as well as rivals’ teaching, see Stier’s Words of Jesus, passim.)

(2.) He spoke as God. Later preachers and reformative felt a heroic boldness, and have realized a marvelous effect in their utterances, when fully impressed with the conviction of the divinity of their mission and the sacred character of their communications; but Jesus was no mere ambassador from the court of heaven; he was the Word of the Lord himself. Ancient prophets had actually appeared in this capacity, and the inspired apostle says (Eph. iii. 11), “unto them gave he power and strength to be apostles, and to be strong in the spirit to the comfort of the inward man,” a reiteration of Christ breathing in them a new life, a new sense of the fellowship of his sufferings, a new sense of his presence, or reborn by outward miracles that enforced respect, if they did not command obedience; but Jesus possessed no restricted measure of the Spirit, and wrought wonders in no other’s name; in him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and the Shekinah stood revealed in him. The mantle was not transferred, nor the angelfish, where the Lord appeared to Moses, that Jehovah might be revealed in a new way, a new form. “I am the door,” said he, “the door of the sheep. If any man enter in by me, he shall be saved” (John x. 9, 10). All the objects of religion are so interwoven with the life of Christ, that to seek to receive him without the faith, is to separate for ever the believer from the church.

According to the sickle was so customary amongst all the religious authorities, reverent, decorous, and religious, that it was expected.

(See Flanders.)

When I compare him with the Jewish Doctors, I see a whole host of men, men of learning, men of position, men of power, men of wealth, men of influence, who were opposed to him, not because he was a teacher, but because he was a Nazarene.

The Saviour’s Life and Ministry. (For the further literature of each topic, see the articles referred to at each.) See Gospel. About four hundred years had elapsed since Malachi, the last of the prophet, had foretold the coming of the Messiah’s forerunner, and nearly the same interval had transpired since Ezra closed the sacred canon, and composed the concluding psalm (cix.); a still greater number of years had intervened since the last ministration by an angel, and he had been performed, and men not only in Palestine, but throughout the entire East, were in general expectation of the advent of the universal Prince (Suetonius, Von. 4; Tacitus, Hist, v. 15) - an event which the Jews knew, from their scriptures (Dan. ix. 25), was now close at hand (see Luke ii, 26, 80). See Also. Any mention of Israel under such circumstances, at a time when the Roman empire, of which Judaea then formed a part, was in a state of profound and universal peace (Orsius, Hist. vi, fin.), under the rule of Augustus (Luke ii, 1), that an incident occurred which, although apparently personal and inconsiderable, broke like a new oracle the silence of ages (comp. 2 Pet. iii. 4), and proved the dawn of the longlooked for day of Israel’s glory (see Luke i, 78). A priest named Zacharias was performing the regular functions of his office within the holy place of the Temple at Jerusalem, when an angel appeared before him, and pronounced a benediction that his hitherto childless and now aged wife, Elisabeth, should bear him a son, who was to be the harbinger of the promised Redeemer (Luke i. 5, 25). See Zacharias. To punish and at the same time remove his doubts, the power of articulate utterance was taken from him (comp. v. 12), and then the prediction (probably May, B.C. 7). See John the Baptist. Nearly half a year after this vision, a still more remarkable announcement (q. v.) was made by the same means to a maiden of the now obscure lineage of David, resident at Nazareth, and betrothed to Joseph, a descendant of the family of David (see Paper, on Genealogy): namely, that she was the individual selected to become the mother of the Messiah who had been expected in all previous ages (Luke i. 26-38). See Mary. Her scruples having been obviated by the assurance of a divine vocation, she acquiesced in the providence, although she could not have failed to foresee the ignominy to which it would expose her (see Adultery), and even joined her relative Elizabeth in praising God for so high an honor (Luke i, 89-96). As soon as her condition became known [see Conception], Joseph was deeply apprised of the magnitude of his intended wife’s innocence, and directed to name her child Jesus (see above), thus adopting it as his own (Matt. i. 18-25; probably April, B.C. 6). See Joseph. Although the parents resided in Galilee, they had occasion just at this time to visit Bethlehem (q. v.) in order to be enrolled along with their relatives in a census not in progress by order of the Roman authorities [see Censuses], and thus Jesus was born, during their stay in the exterior buildings of the public khan [see Carentan], at that place (Luke ii, 1-7). In fulfilment of the express prediction of Scripture (Mic. v. 2), prop. Ang. B.C. 6. See Nativity. The auspicious event was heralded on the same night by angels to a company of shepherds on the adjacent plains, and was recognised by two aged saints at Jerusalem [see Simeon; Anna], where the mother presented the babe at the usual time for the customary offerings (q. v.) in the temple (v. 25). The visitation (q. v.) having been meanwhile duly performed (Luke ii, 8-39; prop. Sept. B.C. 6). Public notice, however, was not attracted to the event till, on the arrival at the capital of a party of Eastern philosophers [see Magi], who had been directed to Palestine by astronomical phenomena as the wise men to Babel [see Star of the Wise Men], the intelligence of their inquiries reached the jealous ears of Herod (q. v.), who thereupon first ascertaining from the assembled Sanhedrin the predicted locality—sent the strangers to Bethlehem, where the holy family appear to have continued, pretending that he wished himself to do the illusory act of a babe reverence, but really only to render himself more sure of his destruction (Matt. ii, 1-12). This attempt was foiled by the return of the Magi home by another route, through divine intimation, and the child was preserved from the murderous rage of Herod by a precipitous flight of the parents (who were in like manner warned of the danger) into Egypt (see Alexandria) under a like direction (prob. July, B.C. 5). Here they remained [see Egypt] until, on the death of the tyrant, at the divine suggestion, they returned to Palestine; but, avoiding Judea, where Archelaus, who resembled his father, had succeeded to the throne, they settled at their former place of residence, Nazareth, within the territory of the milder Antipas (Matt. ii, 19-33; prob. April, B.C. 4). See Nazareth. The evangelists pass over the boyhood of Jesus with the simple remark that his obedience, intelligence, and piety won the affections of all who knew him (Luke ii, 50, 51, 52). A single incident is recorded in illustration of these traits, which occurred when he had completed his twelfth year—an age at which the Jewish males were expected to take upon them the responsibility of attaching themselves to the public worship, as having arrived at years of discretion (Luke ii, 41-50; see Lightfoot and Wetstein, ad loc.). Having accompanied his parents, on this occasion, to the Passover at Jerusalem, the last tarried behind at the close of the festal week, and was discovered by them, as they turned back to the capital from their homeward journey, after considerable search, sitting in the midst of the Hab- bia in one of the anterooms of the sacred edifice, seeking information from them on sacred themes (or probably rather imparting than eliciting truth, after the manner of the Socratic questionings) with a clearness and profundity so far beyond his years and opportunities as to excite the liveliest astonishment in all beholders (April, A.D. 8). His pointed reply to his mother's ex- postulation for his seeming neglect of filial duty enunciates a comprehension already of his divine character and work: "Know ye not that I must be at my Father's?" (νομίζετε ἂν αύτός μου).

1. Introductory Year.—Soon after John the Baptist had opened his remarkable mission at the Jordan, among the thousands of all classes who flocked to his preaching and baptism (q. v.), Jesus, then thirty years old, presented himself for the same initiatory rite at his hands as the only acknowledged prophet extant who was empowered to administer the rite which should be equivalent to the holy anointing oil of the kingly and priestly offices (Matt. iii, 13-17; Luke iii, 1-18, 23; and parallels). See Messiah. John did not at once recognize Jesus as the Messiah, although he had just declared to the people the near approach of his own Superior; yet, being doubtless personally well acquainted with his relative, in whom he must have perceived the tokens of an extraordinary religious personage, he modestly declined to perform a ceremony that seemed to imply his own pre-eminence; but upon his compliance with the request of Jesus, on the ground of the propriety of this prelimin- ary ordinance, a divine attestation, both in a visible [see Dove] and an audible [see Bath-kol] form, was publicly given to the sacred character of Jesus, and in such clear conformity to a criterion which John himself had already received by the inward revelation, that he at once began to proclaim the advent of the Messiah in his person (prob. August, A.D. 25). See John the Baptist. After this inauguration of his public career, Jesus immediately retired into the desert of Judea, where, during a fast of forty days, he endured those interior temptations of Satan which should suffice to prove the superior virtue of this revealer to which Adam had succumbed; and at its close he successfully resisted three special attempts of the devil in a personal form to move him first to doubt and then to presume upon the divine care, and finally to bribe him to such barefaced idolatry that Jesus indignantly repelled him from his presence (Matt. iv, 1-11; Mark i, 11-13; Luke iv, 13-20; parallels). The effect of John's open testimony to the character of Jesus, as he began his preaching afresh the next season on the other side of the Jordan, was such as not only to lead to a deputation of inquiry to him from the Sanhedrim on the subject, but also to induce two of the Baptist's disciples to attach themselves to Christ, one of whom immediately introduced his own brother to his newly-found Master, and to these, as he was departing for Galilee, were added two others of their acquaintance (John i, 39-36). On arriving at Cana (q. v.), whither he had been invited with his relatives and friends to a wedding festival, Jesus performed his first miracle by changing water into wine for the supply of the guests (John ii, 1-11; prob. March, A.D. 26). 2. First more public Year.—After a short visit at Ca- parauma, Jesus returned to Judea in order to attend the Passover; and finding the entrance to the Temple choked with various kinds of merchant-stalls, he fearlessly expelled their sacrilegious occupants, and vindicated his authority by a prediction of his resurrection, which was at the time misunderstood (John ii, 12-22). His maritan female at the well of Jacob (q. v.), near Shechem, on the spiritual blessings of God's true worshippers, led to her conversion, with a large number of her fellow-citizens, among whom he tarried two days (John iv, 4-42; prob. December, A.D. 28). On his arrival in Galilee he was received with great respect (John iv, 43-46), and his public announcements of the advent of the Messianic age (Matt. iv, 17; Mark i, 14, 15) in all the synagogues of that country spread his fame still more widely (Luke iv, 14, 15). In this course of preaching he revisited Cana, and there, by a word, curst the son of one of Herod's courtiers that lay at the point of death at Capernaum (John iv, 46-54). Arriving at Nazareth, he was invited by his townsmen to read the Scripture lesson (Isa. lxi, 1, 2) in the synagogue, but they took such offence at his application of it to himself, and still more at his comments upon it, that they hurried him tumultuously to the brink of a precipice, and would have thrown him off had he not escaped from their hands (Luke iv, 16-30). Thenceforward he fixed upon Capernaum (q. v.) as his general place of residence.

Miracles during the Paschal week confirmed the popular impression concerning his prophetic character, and even induced a member of the Sanhedrin to seek a private interview with him [see Nicodemus]; but his doctrine of the necessity of a spiritual change in his disciples [see Regeneration], and his statement of his own passion [see Atoneinent], were neither intelligible nor agreeable to the worldly minds of the people (John ii, 23-25; iii, 1-21). Jesus now proceeded to the Jordan, and by the instrumentality of his disciples continued the baptismal baptism of the people instituted by John, who had meanwhile removed further up the river, where, so far from being jealous of Jesus's increasing celebrity, he gave still stronger testimony to the superior destiny of Jesus (John iii, 22-36); but the imprisonment of John not long afterwards by order of Herod (Matt. xiv, 3 sq.; Mark vi, 17 sq.; Luke iii, 19) rendered it expedient (Matt. iv, 12; Mark i, 14), in connection with the odium excited by the hierarchy (John iv, 1-3), that Jesus should retire into Galilee (Luke iv, 14). On his way thither, his conversation with a Sa-home, carrying his couch (Luke v, 17–26, and parallels; prob. March, A.D. 27). On another excursion by the lake shore, after preaching to the people, he summoned as a disciple the collector of the Roman impost (Mark ii, 13, 14, and parallels; probably April, A.D. 27).

See Matthew.

8. Second more public Year.—The Passover now drew near, which Jesus, like the devout Jews generally, was careful to attend at Jerusalem (Saturday, April 13, A.D. 27). See Passover. As he passed by the beautiful pool of Bethesda, near the sheep-gate of the city, he observed in one of its porches an invalid waiting the intermittent influx of the water, to which the populace had attributed a miraculously curative power to the first bather thereafter; but, learning that he had been thus infirm for thirty-eight years, and ascertaining from him that he was even too helpless to reach the water in time to experience its virtue, he immediately restored him to vigor by a word. See Bethesda. This, happening to occur on the Sabbath, so incensed the hierarchy that they charged the author of the cure with a profanation of the day, and thus drew from Jesus a public vindication of his mission and an exposure of their inconsistency (John v, 1–47). As he was passing through the province of Galilee, on the eve of the Paschal week (Saturday, April 19, A.D. 27), his disciples chanced to pluck, as strangers were privileged to do (Deut. xxiii, 25), a few of the ripe heads from the standing barley, through which they were at the time passing, in order to allay their hunger; and this being reported to the Pharisees, who considered the fresh violation of the sacred day, Jesus took occasion to rebuke their over-scrupulousness as being confuted by the example of David (1 Sam. xxi, 1–6), the practice of the priests themselves (Numb. xxviii, 9–19), and the tenor of Scripture (Hos. vi, 6; compare 1 Sam. xv, 22), and, at the same time, to point out the true design of the Sabbath (q. v.), namely, man's own benefit (Matt. xii, 1–8, and parallels). On an ensuing Sabbath (prob. Saturday, April 26, A.D. 27), entering the synagogue (apparently of Capernaum), he once more excited the multitude by curing a man whose right hand was palsied; but his opponents, who had been watching the opportunity, were silenced by his appeal to the philan­thropy of the act, yet they thenceforth began to plot his destruction (Mark iii, 1–6, and parallels). Retiring to the Sea of Galilee, he addressed the multitudes who thronged from all quarters, and cured the demons among them (Mark iii, 7–12; Matt. xii, 17–21, and parallels). After a night spent in prayer on a mountain in the vicinity, he now chose twelve persons from among his followers to be his constant attendants and future witnesses to his career (Luke vi, 12–16, and parallels). See Apokalypse. Then, descending to the per­sian plain, he cured the diseased among the assembled multitude (Luke vi, 17–19), and, seating himself upon an eminence, he proceeded to deliver his memorable sermon exhibiting the spirituality of the Gospel in opposition to the formalism of the prevalent theology (Matt. v, 1–17; Luke vi, 15–20; see also Matt. v, 17–24; Matt. x, 17–27; vii, 1–5; vii, 12, 15–18, 20, 21, 24–27; viii, 1, and parallel passages; prob. May, A.D. 27). See Sermon on the Mount. On his return to Capernaum, Jesus, at the instance of the Jewish elders, cured the son of a possessor of a certain brook, who, although a Gentile, had built the village synagogue, and whose faith in the power of Jesus to restore by his mere word the distant invalid excited the liveliest interest in the mind of Jesus himself (Luke vii, 10, and parallel). The ensuing day, passing near Nain, he met a large procession issuing from the village for the internment of a young widow, and, commiserating her double bereavement, he restored the youth instantly to life, to the astonishment of the beholders (Luke vii, 11–17). John the Baptist, hearing while in prison of these miracles, sent two messengers to Jesus to obtain more explicit assurance from his own lips as to the Messiah, which he seemed so slowly to arrive at; but, instead of returning a direct answer, Jesus proceeded to perform additional miracles in their presence, and then referred them to the Scripture prophecies (Isa. lxi, 1; xxxv, 5, 6) of these distinctive marks of the Messianic age; but as soon as the messengers departed, he eluded the question of John, although the introducer of an era less favored than the period of Jesus himself, and concluded by severe denunciations of the cities (especially Capernaum, Chorazin, and Bethsaida) which had continued impenitent under his own preaching (Luke vii, 24, 28; xi, 20–24; and parallels). About this time, a Pharisee invited him one day to dine with him, but, while he was reclining at the table, a female notorious for her immorality came penitently behind him and believed with her tears his unadorned feet extended beyond the couch, then wiped them with her hair, and finally affectionately anointed them with ointment brought for that purpose, while the host scarcely restrained his surprise that Jesus should suffer this familiarity; but, in a pointed parable of two debtors released from dissimilar amounts, den death of a rich worldling, by a comparison with various natural objects, by contrast with the heathen, and by the higher importance of a preparation for heaven (Luke xii, 1, 6, 7, 18-31, 33, 34, and parallels). Being informed of the atrocity of Herod against some Galileans, he declared that an unsuspected death awaited the impotent among his hearers, and enforced the admonition by the parable of the delay in cutting down a fruitless tree (Luke xiii, 1-9). Again leaving his home the same day, he delivered, while sitting in a boat, to a large audience upon the lake-shore, the several parables of the different fates of various portions of seed in a field, the true and false wheat growing together till harvest, the gradual but spontaneous development of a plant of grain, the remarkable growth of the mustard-shrub from a very small seed, and the dissemination of leaves throughout a large circumference (Matt. xiii, 1-9, 24-30; Mark iv, 26-29; Matt. xiii, 31-36; and parallels); but it was only to the privileged disciples (as he informed them) in private that he explained, at their own request, the various elements of the first of these parables as referring to the different degrees of improvement made by the corresponding classes of his own hearers, adding various admonitions (by comparisons with common life) to diligence on the part of the apostles, and then, after explaining the parable of the false wheat as referring to the divine forbearance to eradicate wickedness in this scene of probation, he added the parable of the several worthless and unproductive seeds of a skilful housekeeper (Matt. xiii, 10, 11, 18-23; vs, 14-16; vi, 22, 23; x, 26, 27; xiii, 12, 36-43, 47-50, 44-46, 51-53; and parallels). See PARABLE. As Jesus was setting out, towards evening of the same day, to cross the lake, a scribe proposed to become his constant disciple, but was rebuffed by being reminded of Jesus the hardships to which he would expose himself in his company; two of his attendants were refused a temporary leave of absence to arrange their domestic affairs, lest it might weaken them altogether from his service (Matt. xvii, 18-22; Luke x, 61, 62; and parallels). While the party was thus passing Jesus, overcome with the labors of the day, had fallen asleep on the stern bench of the boat, when so violent a squall took them that, in the utmost consternation, they appealed to him for preservation, and, rebuking their distrust of his divine presence, he spoke to them, breaking his sleep, with a word (Matt. xxi, 23-27, and parallels). See GALILEE, SEA OF. On reaching the eastern shore, they were met by two frantic demonsiacs, roaring in the desolated catacombs of Gadara, who prostrated themselves before Jesus, and implored his forbearance; but the Satanic influence that possessed them, on being expelled by him, with his permission seized upon a large herd of swine feeding near (probably raised, contrary to the law, for supplying the market of the Greek-imitating Jews), and caused them to rush headlong into the lake, where they were drowned (see DEMONIACT); and this loss so offended the worldly-minded owners of the swine that the neighbors generally requested Jesus to return home, which he immediately did, leaving the late maniacs to fill the country with the remarkable tidings of their cure (Mark v, 1-21, and parallels). Not long afterwards, on occasion of a large entertainment made for Jesus by Matthew, the Pharisees found fault with the eating habits because their Master had condescended to associate with the tax-gatherers and other disreputable persons that were guests; but Jesus declared that such had most need of his intercourse, his mission being to reclaim sinners (Matt. ix, 10-15, and parallels), and explained to an inquirer why he did not enjoin seasons of fasting like the Baptist, that his presence as yet should rather be a cause of gladness to his followers, and he illustrated the impropriety of such severe requirements prematurely by the festivity of a marriage week, and by the parables of a new patch on an old garment, and new wine in old skin-bottles (Matt. ix. 14–17, and parallels). In the midst of these remarks he was entreated by a leading citizen named Jairus (q. v.) to visit his daughter, who lay at the point of death; and while going for that purpose he cured a female among the crowd of a chronic haemorrhage (q. v.) by her secretly touching the edge of his dress, which led to her discovery and acknowledgment on the spot; but in the meantime information arrived of the death of the sick girl: nevertheless, encouraging the father’s faith, he proceeded to the house where hcr funeral had already begun, and, entering the room with her parents and three disciples only, restored her to life and health by a simple touch and word, to the amazement of all the vicinity (Mark v. 22–43, and parallels). As he was leaving Jairus’s house two blind men followed him, whose request that he would restore their sight he granted by a touch; and on his return home he cured a dumb demoniac, upon which the Pharisees repeated their calumny of his collusion with Satan (Matt. ix. 32–34). Visiting Nazareth again shortly afterwards, his acclamations were astonished at his eloquence in the synagogue on the Sabbath, but were so prejudiced against his obscure family that but few had sufficient faith to warrant the exertion of his miraculous power in cures (Mark vi. 1–6, and parallels). About this time (probably Jan. and Feb. A.D. 29), commiserating the moral desolation of the community, Jesus sent out the apostles in pairs on a general tour of preaching and miracle-working in different directions (but avoiding the Gentiles and Samaritans), with special instructions, while he made his third circuit of Galilee for a like purpose (Matt. x. 5–28; x. 1, 5–14, 40–42; xi. 1; Mark vi. 12, 18; and parallels). Upon their return, Jesus, being apprized of the execution of John the Baptist by Herod (Mark vi. 21–29; probably March, A.D. 29), and of the tetrarch’s views of himself (Mark vi. 14–16; see Join this Baptist), retired with them across the lake, followed by crowds of men, with their families, whom at evening he miraculously fed with a few provisions at hand (Mark vi. 30–44, and parallels), an act that excited such enthusiasm among them as to lead them to form the plan of forcibly proclaiming him their political king (John vi. 14, 15); this design Jesus defeated by dismissing the multitude, and sending away the disciples by themselves in a boat across the lake, while he spent most of the night alone in prayer on a neighboring hill; but towards daylight he rejoined them, by walking on the water to them as they were tiring at the ears against the wind and tempestuous waves, and suddenly calming the sea, brought them to the shore, to their great amazement; then, as he proceeded through the plains of Genezareth, the whole country brought their sick to him to be cured (Matt. xiv. 22–36, and parallels), the populace whom he had left on the eastern shore meanwhile missing him, returned by boats to Capernaum (John vi. 22–24; prob. Thursday and Friday, March 25 and 26, A.D. 29). Meeting them in their search next day in the synagogue, he took occasion, in alluding to the recent miracle, to proclaim himself to them at large as the celestial “manna” for the soul, but cooled their political ambition by warning them that the benefits of his mission could only be received through a participation by faith in the atoning sacrifice shortly to be made in his own person; a doctrine that soon discouraged their adherence to him, but proved no stumbling-block to the steadfast faith of eleven of his apostles (John vi. 51–71; prob. Saturday, March 27, A.D. 29).

4. Third more public Year.—Avoiding the malicious plots of the hierarchy at Jerusalem by remaining at Capernaum during the Passover (John vii. 1; probably Sunday, March 28, A.D. 29), Jesus took occasion, from the fault found by some Pharisees from the capital against his disciples for eating with unwashed hands...
5. Last half Year.—On the opening of the festival at Jerusalem (Sunday, Sept. 21, A.D. 28), the hierarchy eagerly inquired for Jesus among the populace, who held discordant opinions concerning him; but, on his arrival, he boldly taught in the Temple, vindicating his cause, and claiming to be sent by God, to be put to death by his enemies to arrest him returned absolved, while the people continued divided in their sentiments, being inclined to accept his cordial invitations (Matt. xi. 28—30), but deterred by the specious objections of the hierarchy (John vii. 11—52). Next morning, returning to the Mount of Olives (Matt. xvi. 1—19), he placed on Bethany's, in the midst of his teaching in the Temple he dismissed, with merely an admonition, a female brought to him as an adulteress (q. v.), with a view to embarrass him in the disposal of the case, none of his conscience-stricken accusers daring to be the first in executing the penalty of law when allowed to do so by Jesus (John viii. 1—11). He then continued his expositions with his captious hearers respecting his own character, until at length, on his avowing his divine pre-existence, they attempted to stone him as guilty of blasphemy; but he withdrew from their midst (John viii. 55—59). That very same evening (Sept. 28—29) afterwards (prob. Oct. A.D. 28) with a report of great success, Jesus expressed his exultation in thanks to God for the humble instrumentality divinely chosen for the propagation of the Gospel (Luke x. 17—21, and parali.). Being asked by a Jewish sextary the most certain method of securing to himself the safe custody of Jesus, he replied he had impressed in the law (Deut. vi. 5; Lev. xix. 8), of supreme love to God and cordial philanthropy, and, in answer to the other's question respecting the extent of the latter obligation, he illustrated it by the parable of the benevolent Samaritan (Luke x. 28—37). Returning to the home of Lazarus, he gently reproved the impious zeal of the kind Martha in preparing for him a meal, and defended Mary for being absorbed in his instructions (Luke x. 38—42). After a season of private prayer (prob. in Gethsemane, on his way to Jerusalem, next morning), he dictated a law of prayer to his disciples at their request, stating the indispensableness of a placable spirit towards others in order to our own forgiveness by God, and adding the parable of the guest at midnight to enforce the necessity of urgency in prayer, with assurances that God is more willing to grant his children's petitions for their children's sake than from their parents are to supply their children's temporal wants (Luke xi. 1—18, and parali.). As he entered the city, Jesus noticed a man whom he ascertained to have been blind from his birth, and to the disciples' inquiry for whose sin the blindness was a punishment, he asserted that it was provided for the glory of God, namely, in his cure, as a means to which he moistened a little clay with spittle, touched the man's eyes with it, and directed him to wash them in the Pool of Siloam (Saturday, Nov. 28, A.D. 28); but the hierarchy, learning the cure from the neighbors, brought the man before them, because the transaction had taken place on the Sabbath, and disputed the fact until testified to by his parents, and then alleging that the author of the act, whose name was yet unknown even to the man himself, must have been a sinner, because a violator of the sabbath, if not a sinner, he was met with, they referred him to the duty of again excommunicating him. Jesus, however, meeting him shortly after, disclosed to his ready faith his own Messianic character, and then discoursed to his captious enemies concerning the immunities of true believers in him, the simile of a shepherd to his flock (Luke ix. 1—21). The same figure he again took up at the ensuing Festival of Dedication, upon the inquiry of the Jewish sectaries directly put to him in Solomon's portico of the Temple, as to his Messiahship, and spoke so pointedly of his unity with God that his auditors would have stoned him for blasphemy had he not hastily withdrawn from the place (cir. Dec. 1, A.D. 28), and retired.
to the Jordan, where he gained many adherents (John x, 22-42). Lazarus at this time falling sick, his sisters sent to Jesus, desiring his presence at Bethany; but after waiting several days, until Lazarus was dead, he informed his disciples of the fact (which he assured them would turn out to the divine glory), and proposed to go thither. On his arrival, he was met by Martha, and then by Mary, with tearful expressions of regret for his absence, which he checked by assurances (not clearly apprehended by them) of their brother's restoration to life; then causing the tomb to be opened (after over-ruling Martha's objection), he summoned the dead Lazarus to the assembly to the skies (John xi, 1-46; probably Jan. A.D. 29). See LAZARUS. This miracle aroused afresh the enmity of the Sanhedrim, who, after consultation, at the haughty advice of Caiaphas, determined to accomplish his death, thus unwittingly fulfilling the destined purpose of his mission (John xii, 47-53). Withdrawing in consequence to the city of Ephron (John xi, 54), and afterwards to Peroea, Jesus continued his teaching and miracles to crowds that gathered about him (Mark x, 1, and parallel). As he was preaching in one of the synagogues of this vic-inity, he cured a woman of a chronic paralysis of the back, and refuted the churlish cavil of one of the hierarchy present at the day on which this was done, by a reference to ordinary acts of mercy even to animals on the Sabbath (Luke xii, 10-17; prob. Feb. A.D. 29). Jesus now turned his steps towards Jerusalem, and took the way the nearer preparation for heaven, without trusting to any external recommendations (Luke xiii, 22-30); and replying to the Pharisees' insidious warning of danger from Herod, that Jerusalem alone was the destined place of peril for him (Luke xiii, 31-38). On one Sabbath, while eating at the house of an eminent Pharisee, he curbed a man of the dropsey, and silenced all objections by again appealing to the usual care of domestic animals on that day; he then took occasion, from the anxiety of the guests to secure the chief places of honor at the table, to discourse to the company on the advantages of modesty and charity, closing by an admonition to prompt compliance with the offers of the Gospel in the parable of the marriage-feast and the wedding-garment (Luke xiv, 1-15; Matt. xxii, 1-14, and parallel; prob. March, A.D. 29). To the multitudes attending him he preached as the withering condemnation of a true discipleship (Luke xv, 25, 26, and parallel), under various figures (Luke xiv, 28-33); while he corrected the jealousy of the Jewish scribes at his intercourse with the lower classes (Luke xvi, 1, 2), by teaching the divine interest in penitent wanderers from him (Luke xix, 10, and parallel), under the parables of stray sheep (Luke xxv, 3-7, and parallel), the lost piece of money, and the prodigal son (Luke xv, 8-32). At the same time, he illustrated the prudence of securing the divine favor by a prudent use of the blessings of this life in the parable of the fraudulent steward (Luke xvi, 1-12), showing the incompatibility of worldly wisdom with devotion (Luke xxii, 13, and parallel); and the self-sufficiency of the Pharisees he rebuked in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi, 14, 15, 19-31), declaring to them that the kingdom of the Messiah had already come unob-servably (Matt. xii, 20-21). He impressed upon both classes of his hearers the importance of perseverance, and yet humility, in prayer, by the parables of the importunate widow before the unjust judge, and the penitent publican in contrast with the self-righteous Pharisee (Luke xviii, 1-14). To the insidious questions of the Pharisees concerning divine things he replied that it was inconsistent with the original design of marriage, being only suffered by Moses (with restrictions) on account of the inveterate customs of the nation, but really justifiable only in cases of adultery; but at the same time explained privately to the disciples that the opposite extreme of celibacy was to be voluntary only (Matt. xix, 11-12, and parallel). He welcomed infants to his arms and blessing, as being a symbol of the innocence required by the Gospel (Mark x, 13-16, and parallel). A rich and honorable young man visiting him with questions concerning the way of salvation, Jesus was pleased with his frankness, but proposed terms so humbling to his worldly attachments that he retired with- out receiving an answer. In the verses that follow (Matt. xx, 21-35; Mark x, 35-44; Luke xv, 11-16; and parallel), there is an opportunity of discerning his followers on the prejudicial influence of wealth on piety, and (in reply to a remark of Peter) of illustrating the rewards of self-denying ex-ertion in religious duty by the parables of the servant at meals after a day's work, and the laborers in the vineyard (Matt. xx, 1-16, and parallel). As they had now arrived at the Jordan opposite Jerusalem, Jesus once more warned the timid disciples of the fate awaiting him there (Mark x, 32-54); but they so little understood him (Luke xvii, 32), that the mother of James and John ambitiously requested of him a prominent post for her sons under his administration, they also igno- rantly professing their willingness to share his suffer- ings, until Jesus checked rivalry between them and their fellow-disciples by enjoining upon them all a mutual disinterestedness and submission (Matt. xx, 20-28). As they were passing through Jericho, two blind men implored of him to restore their sight, and, although rebuked by the by-standers, they urged their request so importantly as at length to gain the ear of Jesus, who called them, and with a touch restored their eyes. On the approach of a personal enemy (Luke xx, 39-42), he made an opportunity to them to see and to hear him, as in an opportunity of a personal sabbath. Passing along, he observed a chief publican, named Zaccheus (q.v.), who had run in advance and climbed a tree to get a sight of Jesus, but who now, at Jesus' suggestion, gladly received him to his house, and there indi-cated himself from the calmness of his insinuations as an opportunist to charity, an act that secured his commendation by Jesus (Luke xix, 2-9), who took occasion to illustrate the duty of fidelity in improving religious privileges by the parable of the "talents" or "pounds" (Luke xix, 11-26, and parallel). Reaching Bethany a week before their crucifixion, when the Sanhedrim were planning to seize him, Jesus was entertained at the house of Lazarus, and vindicated Mary's act in anointing (q.v.) his head with a flask of precious ointment, from the parsimonious objections of Juda, declaring that it should ever be to her praise as a woman's labour and care in preparing an anointing burial (John xi, 55-57; xii, 1-11, and parallel). 6. PASSION WEEK.—The entrance of Jesus into Jerusa-llem next morning (Monday, March 14, A.D. 29) was a triumphal one, the disciples having mounted him upon a young ass, which, by his direction, they found in the environs of the city, and spread their garlands and green branches along the road, while the multitude es-corting him proclaimed him as the expected descendent of David, to the chagrin of the hierarchy, who vainly endeavored to check the popular declarations [see HO-SANNA]; Jesus meanwhile was absorbed in grief at the ruin awaiting the impious metropolis (Matt. xxii, 1-9; John xii, 16, 17, 19; Luke xix, 39-44, and parallel). Arriving at the Temple amid this general excitement, he again cleared the Temple courts of the profane trade-men, while the sick resorted to him for cure, and the thieves prolonged his stay by a protracted demonstration upon both accounts. He turned to Bethany for the night (Matt. xxi, 10-17, and parallel). On his way again to the city, early in the morning, he pronounced a curse upon a green but fruitless fig-tree (q.v.) (to which he had gone, not having yet breakfasted, as if in hopes of finding on it some of the fruits which he had spoken of as eaten by the lares of the Jewish nation, the day being occupied in teaching at the Temple (where the multitude of his hearers pre-vented the execution of the hierarchical designs against him)), and the night, as usual, at Bethany. On the re-turning morning the fig-tree was withered out, and very root, which led Jesus to impress upon the disciples the efficacy of faith, especially in their public functions.

JESUS CHRIST

(Matt. xxi, 18, 19; Luke xxi, 37, 38; xix, 47, 48; Matt. xxi, 20, 22) This, the last day of Jesus's intercourse with the public, was filled with various discussions (Wednesday, March 16, A.D. 29). The hierarchy, demanding the authority for his public conduct, were perplexed by his counter-question as to the authority of the Baptist's mission, also as to whether they had inexcusably committed their insincerity and criminality by the parables of the two sons sent by their father to work, and the murderous gardeners, with so vivid a personal reference as to cover with confusion (Matt. xxi, 23, 46, and parallels). The mooted question of the lawfulness of tribute to a Gentile power was purposely proposed by Jesus to test the faith of the Pharisees and Herodians, was so readily solved by him with an appeal to the very coin paid in tribute, that they again retired, unable to make it a ground for public charges against him (Matt. xxi, 15-22, and parallels).
The case of seven brothers successively married (under the Levitical law) to the same woman being thus supposed by the Sadducees, he as easily disposed of the imaginary difficulty concerning her proper husband in the other world by declaring the non-existence of such relations there, and refuted their infidelity as to the future life (Matt. xxii, 23-33, and parallels). Seeing the Sadducees so completely silenced, one of the Pharisaical party undertook to puzzle Jesus by raising that disputed point, What Mosaic injunction is the most important? But Jesus cited the duties of supreme devotion to God and general benevolence to man as the most binding of all other moral enactments, to which the other so cordially assented as to draw a commendation from Jesus on his hopeful sentiments (Mark xii, 28-34, and parallels). Jesus now turned the tables upon his opponents by asking them, Whose descendant the Messiah should be? and on their replying, David's, of course he then asked how (as in Ps. cx, 1) he could be still David's Lord? which so embarrassed his enemies that they desisted from this mode of attack (Matt. xxiii, 41-46). Jesus then in plain terms denounced before the conourse the hypocrisy and ostentation of the hierarchy, especially their priestcraft, their sanctimony, their ambition, their excess, the cruelty, the wanton insolence, and bewailed the impending fate of the city (Matt. xxiii, 1-12, 14-21, 29-39, and parallels). Observing a poor widow drop a few of the smallest coins into the contribution-box in the Temple, he declared that she had given more truly liberal than wealthier donors, because she had given more in proportion to her means, and with greater self-denial (Mark xii, 41-44, and parallels). A number of proselytes [see HELLENIST] requesting through Philip an interview with Jesus, he met them with intimations of his approaching passion, while a celestial voice announced the glory that should thereby accrue to God, and he then retired from the unbelieving public with an admonition to improve their present spiritual privileges (John xii, 20-50). As he was crossing the Mount of Olives, his disciples calling his attention to the noble structure of the Temple opposite, he declared its speedy demolition, and on their asking the time and tokens of this catastrophe, he dismissed to them at length, first, on the coming downfall of the city and nation (warning them to escape betimes from the catastrophe), and then (by a gradual transition, in which, under varied imagery, he represented both events moving toward the consummation) he passed to the doctrine of judgment (described as a forensic tribunal, interpreting constant admonitions (especially in the parable of the ten virgins) to preparation for an event the date of which was so uncertain (Matt. xxiv, 1, 8; x, 17, 20, 34, 35; xxv, 9, 10, 12, 19, 29; xxvi, 13-37; Luke xxi, 34-36; Matt. xxiv, 43-44; Luke xii, 41, 42; Mark xiii, 8, 9, Matt. xxiv, 45-51; Luke xii, 47, 48; Matt. xxiv, 42; xxv, 1-12; Luke xii, 33-38; Matt. xxi, 13, 31-46). As the Passover was now approaching, the Sanhedrin held a secret meeting at the house of the high-priest, where they resolved to get possession, but by private means, of the person of Jesus (Thursday, March 17, A.D. 29), and Judas Iscariot, learning their desire, went and engaged to betray his Master into their hands, on the first opportunity, for a fixed reward (Matt. xxvi, 1-5, 14, 16, and parallels).
The same day Jesus sent two of his disciples into the city, with directions where to prepare the Passover meal (Luke xxii, 7, 8). When these returned, and partake of it with the whole number of his apostles [see LORD'S SUPPER], he affectionately reminded them of the interest gathering about this last repast with them; then, while it was progressing, he washed their feet to revive their mutual rivalry and enforce condescension to all, and by a coalition of the Pharisees and Herodians [see FEET], and immediately declared his own betrayal by one of their number, fixing the individual (by a sign recognised by him alone) among the amized disciples (Luke xxii, 14-17, 24; John xiii, 1-15; Luke xxii, 25-30; John xiii, 17-19, 21, 22; Matt. xxvi, 22-24; John xxi, 23-26; Mark xvi, 19, and parallels). Judas immediately withdrew, full of resentment, but without the rest suspecting his purpose; relieved of his presence, Jesus now began to speak of his approaching fate, when he was interrupted by the surprised inquiries of his followers as to his loss of friend and comforter. He replied, "Ye are not able to come because of your faith"; and relief to the question showed how little they comprehended him on his departure at hand, and the gift (in consequence) of the Holy Spirit, with exhortations to religious activity and mutual love, and, after a prayer for the divine safeguard upon them (John xiv, 1-xx, 17; xxi, 33-35: Matt. xvi, 28, and parallels) and the disciples (John xviii, 1, and parallels), Here, entering the garden of Getsemane, he withdrew, with three of the disciples, a short distance from the rest, and, while they fell asleep, he three times prayed, in an agony (q. v.) that forced blood-tinged sweat from the pores of his forehead, as from the horror-stirred anguish of his soul [see BLOODY SWEAT], and was partially relieved by an angelic messenger: but Judas, soon appearing with a force of Temple guards and others whom he conducted to this frequent place of his Master's retirement, immediately entered, and,浙江大学圣彼得大学数学科学学院的教授们一致认为，赵先生的成果是显著的。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。他声称自己是浙江大学数学科学学院的教授，但没有提供任何支持他这一声明的证据。 use of this admission to charge him with blasphemy, to which the Sanhedrin present assented with a sentence of death; the officers who held Jesus thereupon indulged in the vilest insults upon his person (Matt. xxvi, 57, 59-63; Luke xxii, 67-71, 63-66; and parallels). See CAIA-PIRUS. The formal vote of the Sanhedrin (q.v.) early in the forenoon. Jesus was next led to the procurator Pilate's mansion for his legal sanction upon the determination of the religious court, where the hierachy sought to overcome his reluctance to involve himself in the matter (which was increased by his examination of Jesus formal self, who strenuously denied the allegiations by giving Pilate to understand that his claims did not relate to temporal things) by charging him with sedition, especially in Galilee, an intimation that Pilate seized upon to remand the whole trial to IIIC. (q.v., to be in Jerusalem and the time), as the civil head of that province (John xviii, 28-38; Matt. xxvii, 12-14; Luke xxi, 4-7). Herod, however, on eagerly questioning Jesus, in hopes of witnessing some display of his miraculous power, was so enraged at his absolute silence that he sent him back to Pilate in amock attack on loyalty (Luke xxii, 43). The procurator, thus compelled to exercise jurisdiction over the case, convinced of the prisoner's innocence (especially after a message from his wife to that effect), proposed to the populace to release him as the malefactor which custom required him to set at liberty on the holiday of the passover. But the hierarch insisted on the release of a notorious criminal, Barabbas, instead, and enforced their clamor for the crucifixion of Jesus with so keen an insinuation of Pilate's disloyalty to the emperor, that, after varied efforts to exonerate himself and discharge the prisoner (whose personal bearing enhanced his idea of his character), he at length yielded to their demands, and, after allowing Jesus to be beaten [see FLAGELLATION] and otherwise shamefully handled by the soldiers [see MOCKING], he pronounced sentence for his execution on the cross (Luke xxiii, 13-16; Matt. xxvii, 15-16; Mark xiv, 4-6; and parallels). See PILATE. The traitor Judas, perceiving the enormity of his crime, now that, in consequence of his Master's acquiescence, there appeared no chance of his escape, returned to the hierarchy with the bribe, which, on their cool reply of indifference to his retraction, he flung down in the temple, and went forth in despairing remorse (Matt. xxvii, 3-10). See JUDAS. On his way out of the city to Golgotha, where he was to be crucified, Jesus fainted under the burden of his cross, which was therefore laid upon the shoulders of one Simon, who chanced to pass at the time, and as their procesion Jesus bore the discourse of the four females attending him to weep rather for themselves and their nation than for him; on reaching the place of execution [see GOLGOTHA], after refusing the usual narcotic, he was suspended on the cross between two male-factors, while praying for his murderers; and a brief statement of his offence (which the Jews in vain endeavored to induce Pilate to change as to phraseology) was placed above his head, the executioners meanwhile having divided his garments among themselves: while hanging thus, Jesus was reviled by the spectators, by the soldiers and crowd by one of his fellow-thieves, (whom the other penitently rebuking, was assured by Jesus of speedy salvation for himself [see THIEF ON THE CROSS]), and committed his mother to the care of John; then, at the close of the three hours' preternatural darkness, [see ECLIPSE], giving utterance (in the language of Ps. cxxxvii) laden with the acquired emotion of the SAINTS AMONG THE A-MEN) amid the scoffs of his enemies, he called for something to quench his thirst, which being given him, he expired with the words of resignation to God upon his lips, while an earthquake (q.v.) and the revivification of the dead, a formal vote of the Sanhedrin (q.v.) were acknowledged [see CENTURION] were forborne to bear witness to the crucifixion [see CRUCIFIXION], and their bodies removed from so public a place; and as the soldiers were executing this order, they were surprised to find Jesus already dead; one of the soldiers, however, tested the body by plunging a spear into the side, when there flowed out of the wound (John xix, 31-37). See BLOOD AND WATER. A rich Arimathæan, named Joseph (q.v.), a secret believer in Jesus, soon came and desired the body of Jesus for burial, and Pilate, as soon as he recognized the sainted and, as of Jesus, his permission; accordingly, with the help of Nicodemus, he laid it in his own new vault, temporarily wrappiped in spices, while the female friends of Jesus observed the place of its sepulture (Mark xvi, 42-44; John xix, 38-42; Luke xxi, 25, 28; and parallels). See SAVVI-CHRIST. In the absence of the hierarchy, remembering Jesus's predictions of his own resurrection, persuaded Pilate to secure the entrance to the tomb by a large stone, a seal, and a guard [see WATCH] at the door (Matt. xxvii, 62-66). The women, m.m., while prepared additional embalming materials in the morning, and by the body of Jesus (Mark xvi, 1). See EMBALM.

Very early next morning (Sunday, March 20, A.D. 29) Jesus arose alive from the tomb [see RESURRE-RATION], which an angel opened, the guards swooning away at the sight (Mark xxi, 24, 46; and parallels). The woman soon appeared on the spot with the spices for completing the embalming, but, discovering the stone removed from the door, Mary Magdalene hastily returned to tell Peter, while the rest, entering, missed the body, but saw two angels at the entrance, who informed them that he was resurrected at the east, and, as of Jesus, returning to inform the disciples, they met Jesus himself: but the disciples, on their return, disbeliefed their report (Mark xxi, 2-4; John xx, 2; Luke xxi, 3-4; Matt. xxviii, 7-10; Luke xxiv, 9, 10; and parallels). The guard, however, had by this time recovered, and, chaffing on the one hand, [see THIEF ON THE CROSS], relate a story of the abruption of the body during their sleep (Matt. xxxiii, 11-15). Mary Magdalene meanwhile had roused Peter and John with the tidings of the absence of the body, and, on their hastening to the tomb, they both observed the state of things there, without carrying away the clothes of the dead Jewish fenery, who, arrived soon after they had left, as he stood weeping, saw a person of whom, mistaking him for the keeper of the garden, she inquired for the body, but was soon made aware by his voice that it was Jesus himself, when she fell at his feet, being forbidden a nearer approach, but bidden to announce his resurrection to the disciples (John xxi, 11-18; Mark xvi, 11; and parallels). On the same day Jesus appeared to two of the disciples who were going to Emmaus, and discovered to them repecting the Christology of the Old Test., but they did not recognize him as the sufferer from whom they had parted at the meal; which, at their journey's end, they invited him, and then they immediately returned with the news to Jerusalem, where they found that he had in the meanwhile appeared also to Peter (Luke xxiv, 13-33; and parallels). At this moment Jesus himself appeared in their midst. [see PHYSIOgy], and recognizing emotion, Peter, John and two others (Luke xxi, 12, 13) to him, who, in reward of wounds and eating before them, and then gave them instructions respecting their apostolical mission (Luke xxvii, 36-49; John xx, 21; Mark xvi, 15-18; John x, 23, 22, 23; and parallels). Thomas, who had been absent from this interview, and therefore refused to believe the account of the appearance, also rested to, at the next appearance of Jesus a week afterwards (Sunday evening, March 27, A.D. 29), by handling him personally (John
Some time afterwards (prob. Wednesday, March 30, A.D. 29) Jesus again appeared to his disciples on the shore of the Sea of Tiberias, as they were fishing; and, after they had taken a preternatural quantity of fish at his direction, coming ashore, they partook of a meal which he had prepared, after which he tenderly reproved Peter for his unfaithfulness, and intimated to him the future of both higher bliss and greater service. Soon afterwards (probably Thursday, March 31, A.D. 29) he appeared to five hundred of his disciples (1 Cor. xvi, 6) at an appointed meeting on a mountain in Galilee, where he commissioned his apostles afresh to their work (Matt. xxviii, 16-20). Next he appeared to the larger number of his apostles together (see Appearance of Risen Christ), to whom, at the end of forty days from his passion (Thursday, April 28, A.D. 29), he gave a general charge relative to their mission (see Apostle), and, leading them towards Bethany, while blessing them he was suddenly carried up bodily into the sky (see Ascension) and enfolded from their sight in a cloud (see Ascension), angels at the same time appearing and declaring to them, in their astonishment, his future return in a similar manner (Acts i, 1-12, and parallels). For a fuller explanation of the details of the foregoing narrative, see Further narrative on the Ascension (see Matthew, xxvii, 50-56.—Mark, xvi, 9-20.—Luke, xxiv, 1-23.—John, xx, 1-18.—xxi, 1-25.)

Jesus Christ, also known as Jesus of Nazareth, was a central figure in the history of Christianity. He is believed to be the son of God according to Christian belief. The accounts of his life, known as the gospels, are central to the Christian faith.

Jesus was born in Bethlehem, according to the New Testament, and began his ministry in Galilee, where he taught and performed miracles. He travelled to Jerusalem, where he was crucified by the Romans. His resurrection is described in the gospels and is a central doctrine of Christianity.

Jesus' teachings and actions are recorded in the New Testament, which includes the four Gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John). These accounts are based on the sayings and actions of Jesus and are believed by Christians to be divinely inspired.

Jesus' message of love, forgiveness, and salvation for all people resonated with his listeners and continues to inspire millions today. His teachings on moral conduct, compassion, and social justice have had a profound influence on Christian ethics and theology.

logica do not shrink from the field of inquiry thus opened.

A time of quiet and rest seemed now to have dawned upon this polemical field of Christian theology, when suddenly, in 1685, the learned Frenchman Réinau appeared with his Vie de Jesus, and stirred anew the spirits, as Saurin had done thirty years before. Most arbiters did Mr. Réinau deal with the facts upon which his work professed to be based; while theologically he proceeded throughout "on a really atheistic assumption, disguised beneath the veil of a pantheistic physiologism. . . . It is, however, when we look at the Vie de Jesus from the view of that the most apparent in their length and breadth.

its hero is a fanatical impostor, who pretends to be and to do that which he knows to be beyond him, but who, nevertheless, is held up to our admiration as the ideal of humanity" (Liddon, p. 500). It is sufficient to reply to this characteristic by Mr. Réinau that, "If this be the founder of Christianity, and if Christianity be the right belief, then all religion must cease from the earth; for not only is this character unfit to sustain Christianity, but it is unfit to sustain any religion; it wants the bond (Lange, I. xvi). Yet "it may be that to the thousands of Mustering all old objections and all the sym-doctrine of the infamy and the death which the cultus of the Latin Church brings so prominently before them; or, who, having rejected these, have accepted nothing in their place, the Vie de Jesus has given a sense of human truth, a religious history which never knew before, and led them to study it with a more devout sympathy" (Plumptre, p. 337). Countless editions and translations were made of the work, and it was read everywhere with as much interest as if it had been simply a work of fiction; indeed German theologians, even the most rationalists, hesitated not to rank it among French novels. Innumerable are the works which were written against and in defence of this legendary hypothesis.

In Germany, especially, the contest raged fiercely, and for a time it seemed as if the materialistic Frenchman was to uproot all Christian feelings in the hearts of the common people of Germany, when Strauss suddenly reappeared on the stage in behalf of his mythical theory with a new edition of his Leben Jesu, this time prepared for the wants of the German people, "and the new work, more popular in form, more caustic and sneerings in its hostility, has been read as widely as is the old.
. . . as Bahr had done before, and like Bahr, he seeks to prove that the first three gospels contradict each other and the other. Without entering into the more elaborate theories as to their origin and their relation to the several parties and sects in early Christian-tion, as Bahr did after, and he had his general theory which accounts for them. Men's hopes and wishes, their reverence and awe, tend at all times to develop themselves into mytha. . . . The mytha were not 'cumin-ingly devised, but were the spontaneous, unconscious growth of the time in which they first appeared. If men asked what then, was left them to believe in—what was the idea which had thus developed itself through what had been worked on as the facts of Christianity, the answer was that God manifested himself, not in Christ, but in humanity at large—humanity is the union of the two natures, the finite and the infinite, the child of the visible mother and the invisible father. But the invisible and the invisible against the book was, as might be expected, enormous. It opened the eyes of those who had dallied with unbelief to see that they were naked, and it strippped off the fig-leaf covering of words and phrases with which they had tried to veil their nakedness. What was offered as the compensation for all this work of destruction, if it were offered in any other spirit than that of the mockery even then, and yet more now, so characteristic of the author, was hardly enough to give warmth and shelter to any human soul" (Plumptre, p. 354).

Amidst the efforts of Christian divines and scholars to forward to refute the naked falsehoods, and up to our day the contest rages, nor can it be said how soon it will be ended; it is certain, however, that orthodox Christianity is daily gaining ground, even in the very core of the heart of Rationalism. In France it drew forth the able work of Pressense, Jesus Christ son Temps, ou Vie son Évèque (Paris, 1865), which has since appeared in an English dress in this country. In England, Eeze Home, a series of lectures, published in 1866, was a response to French and German Rationalists, in so far as the reality of our Savour's human character is concerned. (See above, II. 3.)

Great service has also been done for the truth by the work of J. I. Reiner, Der Weg der Prachts und der Vorwärts (Stein Fortsatz der Perser Jesu Christi, Ingolstadt, 1864), Liddon (Bampton Lecture, 1866; see Christian Remembrancer, Jan. 1866, article vi), and particularly by Row (London, 1866; N. Y. 1871; see Princeton Rev. 1810, article vi), Plumptre (Bampton Lecture, 1856), R. Payne Smith (Bampton Lecture, 1869), Leathes, Winners of Sto John to Christ (Bampton Lecture, 1870), Andrews, and Han.

Several popular treatises on the subject were also published in Germany, England, and America, among which are those of Abbott and Eddy. Henry Ward Beecher has just published vol. i of a similar work.

Ammon (Münch. 1835, 1837, 1839, 1840, 1841, 1842), Schott (Münch. 1835), Spieß (Münch. 1835), Stein (Heidelberg, 1835), Reich (Quedlin., 1840), Hirsch (Tübingen, 1839), Wurkert (Meis. 1840), Hug (1840), Kraus (Kais., 1840), Lichtenstein (Elz. 1855), Bouguen (Paris and Lausanne, 1856), J. Bucher (Stuttg., 1859), Krummacher (Biefl. 1854), Baumannt (Brunsw., 1856), Uhborn (Hamb., 1856, Rost., 1857), Wachter (Münch. 1857), Theobald (Münch. 1857). Among those pictorially illustrated are the works of Schleich (Münch. 1821), Langer (Stuttg., 1823), Kito (Lond. 1814), Abbott (N. Y. 1864), Crosby (N. Y. 1871). Among those of a poetical character are Juvenesc, ed. Arevalos (Rom. 1792), Vida (L. R. 1856), ed. Müller; Hambl. 1811, Wisem. (Berlin, 1816, 1820), Güttemer (Hannover, 1821), Schincie (Halic., 1820), Klopotock (Hal., 1751, and often), Lavater (Winterth. 1788), Halem (Han- nover, 1810), Weihe (Elberf. 1822, 1824), Wilmy (Sulzb. 1825), Kirsch (Lpzg. 1825), Göpp (Lpzg. 1827).

(2.) Of a more special nature are treatises on particular subjects, a few of which are the following: on the nature of man, e.g.: his relations: Waelter (Berl. 1791), Oertel (Germ. 1792), Hase (Region. 1792, Berl. 1794), Ludwig (Wolfenb. 1801), Tülliner (Uspal. 1772), Geyer (Viteb. 1772), Blom (L. Bat. 1839), Osterzece (Traj. a. 1840); and upon heredity, Seiler (Elb. 1838), Wolters (Slees. 1838), on his birth: Korb (Lpzg. 1831), Meerheim (Viteb. 1878), Reimer (Lubeck, 1835), Oetter (Nürnb. 1774); and in a chronological point of view, among others: Masson (Koter. 1700), Mauis (Kilon. 1708, id. 1722), Heineccius (Hal., 1708), Liebknecht (Gies. 1735), Hager (Chemn. 1768), Hauptmann (Strassb., 1769, id. 1782), Hai- den (Praque, 1759), Recared (Region. 1768, id. 1769), Horix (Moonpt. 1799), Sanclemente (Rom. 1795), Michealis (Wien, 1797), Mitter (Kopen. 1827), Feldhoff (Frank., 1822), Mayer (Gryph. 1701), Hardt (Heilmsdt., 1754), Korner (Lipsie. 1778), Mynerston (Kopen. 1857), Hamel (Elz., 1857), Seiler (Elb. 1838), Sculzer (Elb. 1838), Gersemin (Duiss., 1802), Fliggy (Argent. 1811), Weichert (Vie- tob. 1811), Foggert (Hamb. 1826), Hanna (The Forty Days after our Lord's Resurrection, London, 1863).

The following are some of the treatises on the personal traits of Jesus, e.g. his physical constitution: Weber (Hal. 1825), Engelmann (Lpzg. 1834), Gisseler (Götting.) 1857). On his dress: Zeilich (Witt. 1754), Gerberon (Par. 1677). His language: Reiske (Jena, 1670), Klasen (Viteb. 1739), Diodati (Neapol. 1767), Pfannkuche (in Eichhorn's "Agr. Bibli." viii, 365-480), Wiseman (in his Hor. Syn. Rome, 1838), Zeilich (Viteb. 1721), Paulis (Jena, 1819). On his mode of life: Lunel (Lpzg. 1784), Rau (Erl. 1787, 1796), Jacobeus (Hafn. 1753), Schreiber (Jena, 1743), Tragard (Gryph. 1781). On his intercourse with others: Gesensius (Heilmsdt., 1734), Jetze (Liegn. 1792). Respecting the inner nature of his character, the following may be named as the most important: Waelter (Jena, 1758), Bücking (Stendal. 1708), Schinschier (Fleisen 1774 sq.), Winkler (Lpzg. 1826), Dorner (Stuttg. 1839); on his psychology, see the Biblioth. Sacra, April, 1870. On his sinlessness, among others: Waelter (Viteb. 1680), Baumgarten (Hafn. 1746), Erbse (Hal. 1747), Ullmann (Hamburg, 1833), Engelmann (Lpzg. 1878); Gisseler (Hann. 1799), Ullmann (Hamburg, 1833, translated in Clark's Biblical Cabinet, Edinburgh), Fritzsche (Halle, 1838). Jesus Christ. Orders of. These were formed of temporal knighthoods in the countries paying homage to the Roman see for the protection and promotion of the Roman Catholic religion.

1. Such was the order founded under this name, also known as the Order of Dobrin, in 1213, by duke Conrad of Masovia and Kujavia, Poland. They followed the rules of St. Augustine as a religious society, and their aim was to carry on the work of the houses of the Western Prussians, their western neighbors. Their stronghold was the burgh of Dobrin, in Prussia. The insignia and dress of the order were a white mantle, on the left breast a red sword, and a five-pointed red star. The order was merged into the German order in 1254.

2. In Spain such an order was founded in 1216 by Dominicus. The knights bound themselves to practise monastic duties, and to battle in defence of their Church. It was approved by pope Honorious III, and confirmed, under various names, by different popes. When Fusi (1629) founded the Congregation of St. Peter the Martyr at Rome, composed of the cardinals, grand inquisitors, and other dignitaries of the Holy Office, this order was A female order of like name with the above, whose origin is also attributed to the Jesusis, was founded in 1800 at Paris. The first leader of it was the maid elen Barat, and it was approved by Leo XII December 22, 1826. As they engage in the education of young women, and the sisters of it, also, bear the name Jesusis in Churches, a favorable reputation, but are in a flourishing condition in many Protestant countries also. They have in Europe alone more than a hundred establishments. They exist also in America and Africa. Their private aims, to doubt, are those of the Jesuistical order.

Jether (Heb. Yether, יְתֶר, surplus), the name of six men, and perhaps also of a place.
1. (Sept. 1123p.) A son of Jada and great-grandson of Emeram, of the family of Judah; he had a brother Jonathan, but no children (1 Chron. ii. 92). RC considerably post 1856.
3. (Sept. 1123p.) The first named of the sons of Ezra (2 Ezcr.), of the tribe of Judah (his brothers being Mered [q. v.], Epher, and Jalon), but whose connections are not otherwise defined (1 Chron. iv. 17). RC prob. cin. 1618. In the Sept. the name is repeated: "and Jether begat Miriam, etc." By the author of the Ques. Hebr. in Par. he is said to have been Aaron, Ezra being another name for Amram (q. v.). Miriam (q. v.) in the second part of the verse—explained by the Targum to be identical with Efrath—is taken by many to be a maiden who fell in love with Judas.
4. (Sept. 1123p.) The oldest son of Gideon, who, when called upon by his father to execute the commandment of Jehovah, rose up on the evening of the 34th year of his age, and in one stroke of the sword cut down the Midianite kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, timely declined on account of his youth (Judg. viii. 20). RC 1382. According to Judg. ix. 5, he was slain, together with nine of his brothers—Jonathan alone escaping— upon one stone" at Ophrah, by the hands of Abimelech, the son of Gideon's concubine, of Shechem. See Gideon.
5. (Sept. 1123p., 1123p.) The father of Amasa, Daid's general (1 Kings ii. 5, 82; 1 Chron. ii. 17) elsewhere (2 Sam. xvii, 6) called Ithra (q. v.). He is described as a strong man, 17 as an Ishmaelite of the desert, and is more likely to be correctly than the "Ishmaelite" of the Hebrew in 2 Sam. xvii, or the "Jezreelite" of the Sept. and Vulg. in the same passage. "Ishmaelitis" is said by the author of the Ques. Hebr. in Isb. Reg. to have been the reading of the Hebrew, but there is no trace of it in the LXX. The Talmud records two divergent opinions on the subject (Jer. Jebom, 9, 8; comp. Bashi. Jeb. 78, 8). According to R. Samuel bar-Nachman, Jether was an Ishmaelite by birth, but became a prelate: hence the two appellations. Another opinion is that a slave of David's reign, he, when the king's descent through Ruth, a Moabish woman, was made a pretext by some of his antagonists to deprive him of his crown, "girded his loins like an Ishmaelite," and threatened to uphold the sword, if need be, the authority of the Halacha, which had decided that "a Moabite man, even a Moabite woman, should be prohibited from entering into the congregation." Similarly we find in the Targ. to 1 Chron. ii. 17 (Wilkins' edition—this verse belongs to those wanting in Ber. that the father of Amasa was Jether the Ishmaelite, but that he was called to the Israel allegiance as the Ishmael of the text) it said David מָתַּאַרְמִיָה (מָתַּאַרְמִיָה) before the tribunal [Wilkins, "cum Arabibus "]... Later commentators (Rashi, Abrabanel, David Kimchi) assume that he was an Ishmaelite by birth, but dwelt in the land of Ishmael.
and was for this reason also called the Ishmaelite, as Obed Edom is also called the Gittite (2 Sam. vii, 1) or Hiram's father the Zuri or Turyan (1 Kings vii, 43). David Kimchi also adds a suggestion of his father, to the effect "that in the Israelite tongue the word Ishmaelite, from his nationalitv, and in that of Israel they called him the Ishmaelite on account of his living in the land of Ishmael." Josephus calls him Ισθαμαλητας (Ant. vii, 10, 1). He married Abigail, David's sister, probably during the sojourn of the family of Jesse in the land of Moab, under the protection of his king. See ABIGAIL.

6. (Sept. 132r v. r. 132p) An Asherite (head of a warrior family numbering 20,000) whose three sons are named in 1 Chron, vii, 38; possibly the same with tirshah of the preceding verse.

7. Whether the lichrahs (לִכְרָה, Sept. Ἠρακλός, 132v, 132p Τιρσέως, Vulg. Jethratho, Jethretho, etc.) Iris and Gareb, mentioned in 2 Sam. xxiii, 38, etc., were natives of an otherwise unknown place called Jethre, of or of Jathir, לִכְרָה, one of David's places of refuge (1 Sam. xxx, 27), or descendants of one Jethre—the least probable suggestion—cannot now be determined. See TIRSHAH.

Jetheth (Heb. Teketh, תְכֵת, prob. a peg, or fig., or prince; Sept. 132v 133r and 132p, the last apparently from falsely reading "_previous, Vulg. Jetheth", the third name of the petty Edomite shieks in Mount Seir (Gen. xxxvi, 40; 1 Chron. i, 51). B.C. ante 1658. See ESSAO. As to identification, El-Weltid is a place in Nejd, said to be in the Dahna [see ISHRAKH]; there is also a place called El-Welti, and El-Weltidah, which is the name of mountains belonging to Bne Abd-Allah Ibn-Ghafsin (Maradid, s. v.) (Smith). See ARABIA.

Jethlah (Heb. Yihlah, יִלְחָה, suspended, i.e. lofty; Sept. 133v 133r v. סָלָה, Vulg. Jethela), a city on the borders of the tribe of Dan, mentioned in Josh. ix, 42. The associated names seem to indicate a locality in the eastern part of the tribe, not far from the modern el-Atrun (Ararat). Perhaps the ruined site marked on Van de Velde's Map (last ed.) as Ameikus (Nicopolis). See EMMAUS, 2.

Jethro (Heb. Yihro, יִהְרוּ, i. q. יִהְרָה, excellence or gain, as often in Eccles.; occurs in Exod. iii, 1, 4; xviii, 1, 2, 5, 6, 9, 10, 12; Sept. 133v 133r JETHRE, abundance, as often; occurs with reference to this person, Exod. iv, 18, where it is Anglicized "Jethro" in the modern English version. In the Samaritan the version reading the word הִרְוָה, as in the Syriac and Targ. Jun., one of Kennicott's MSS., and a MS. of Targ. Onk., No. 16 in De Rossi's collection; Sept. 133r Jethro, a priest or prince (for the word הִרְוָה carries both significations, and both these offices were united in the patriarchal sheiks) of Midian, a tract of country in Arabia Petraea, on the eastern border of the Red Sea, at no great distance from Mount Sinai, where Moses spent his exile from the Egyptian court. B.C. 1698. The family of this individual seems, in the sequel at least, to have observed the worship of the true God in common with the Hebrews (Exod. xviii, 11, 12), and from this circumstance some suppose it to have been a branch of the posterity of Midian, fourth son of Abraham, by Ketura, while others, on the contrary, maintain that the aspersion cast upon Moses for having married a Cushite is inconsistent with the idea of its genealogical descent from that patriarch (Calmet). See MIDIAN.

"Considerable difficulty has been felt in determining who this person was, as there is not an exact relation to Moses; for the word הִרְוָה, which, in Exodus, iii, 19, 20, is applied to Jethro, Judges, iii, 9, xix, 22, Judg. iv, 11, is translated "father-in-law," and in Gen. xix, 14, "son-in-law," is a term of indeterminate signification, denoting simply relationship by marriage; and besides, the transaction which in one place (Exod. xviii, 27) is related of Jethro, seems to be in another related of Hobab (Numb. x, 28). Hence some have concluded that, as forty years had elapsed since Moses's connection with this family was formed, his father-in-law (Exod. ii, 16, Reuel the father-in-law, which in the original is used in both places), was dead, or confined to his tent by the infirmities of age, and that the person who visited Moses at the foot of Sinai was his brother-in-law, called Hobab in Numb. x, 22; Judg. iv, 11; Jethro in Exod. iii, i; and in Judg. i, 16, Kesi (קֵסֶי), which, there as well as in iv, 11, is rendered "the Ke-site" (Kesiti). Against the tradition that Reuel or Hobab, because there lies this serious objection, that in Numb. x, 29 Hobab is expressly called the son of Raguil (or Reuel), who in Exod. ii, 16-21 is evidently made the father-in-law of Moses, and in iii, 1 is clearly the same as Jethro. Nor will the interpretation of the Targum avail, which makes Reuel the grandfather of Moses's wife (by a frequent Hebrewism of "daughter" for granddaughter, etc.); for then Moses's real father-in-law would be nowhere named; and it is clearly Jethro whose flocks he kept, and to whom he "made obeisance" (Exod. xviii, 7); which, with other incidental allusions, are all natural on the supposition that Moses was his son-in-law, but are out of place in a brother-in-law. Besides, it is Jethro who is called the ascendant and tribal head of the clan, which could not, under the patriarchal domestic constitution, have been the case had his father Reuel been still alive. If, indeed, we could accept the conjecture of Israel (Bucholz, des Isr. i, ii, 63) that, by an ancient clerical error, the words יִהְרוּ, "Jethro, son of," had dropped out before the name of Reuel, it would then be easy, with the Targum Jonathan, Aben-Ezra, Rosenmüller, etc., to assume that Jethro was Reuel's son; but there is no trace of such an error. All those methods of adjusting these accounts must therefore be abandoned which maintain the identity of Jethro and Hobab, in whatever way they seek (see Wine's Realwörterbuch, s. v. Raguil) to reconcile the discrepancies; and the whole of the statements may be cleared up by understanding, with Von Lengerke (Kesk., i, 505), Bertheau (Gesch. Isra. sec. 105), Kalisch (Exod. p. 85), and others, that Jethro and Raguil were but different names of Moses's father-in-law, and that the son Hobab was his brother-in-law (referring יִדְרוּ in Numb. x, 29 to Raguil, and in Judg. iv, 11 taking it in the general sense of affines, relative by marriage). Josephus, in speaking of Raguil, remarks once (Ant, ii, 12, 1), that he "had father (οικός) e. l. Euthro for a companion (εὐ πάρεις)," but does not give the name of his "father" or "companion" (οικός, εὐ πάρεις). "The abbreviated form of his name (Jethro or Jethro, for Jethron) is enumerated by the Midrash as the first of the seven (or, according to another version, eight) names by which this Midianish priest was known (viz. Jethro or Jethron, because he heaped up יִדְרוּ good deeds, or because 'he added a Parasha to the Torah'; Cheber (דְּרִיב), because he was a friend of the Lord; Chobei (בֹּר), because he was beloved by the Lord, or because he 'loved the Toran'; Reuel, because he was a companion (בֹּר) to the Lord; Petuel, because he freed himself (סֵדָּה) from idolatry). Indeed, Jethro is considered his original name, to which, when he became a believer and a convert to the faith, an additional signification (בֹּר) was affixed. According to the Midrash (fol. 53, 51), he had been one of Pharaoh's musicians, and had got possession of Aaron's staff, which had belonged to Joseph; but he was driven from Egypt because he opposed the decree for drowning the Israelitish infants." See HOBAB; RAQUIL.

"The hospitable, free-hearted and unsought, which Jethro at once extended to the unknown, homeless wanderer, on the relation of his daughters that he had watered their flock, is a picture of Eastern manners no less true than lovely. We may perhaps suppose that Je-tho, before his acquaintance with Moses, was not a worshipper of the true God. Traces of this appear in the delay which Moses had suffered to take place with respect to the circumcision of his son (Exod. iv, 24–26); indeed, it is even possible that Zipporah had afterwards been subjected to a kind of divorce (Exod. xviii, 2, יִניִסְהוֹב, on account of her attachment to an alien cult). The growing convictions were at work in the mind of Jethro, from the circumstance of Israel’s continued prosperity, till at last, acting upon these, he brought back his daughter, and declared that his impressions were confirmed, for now he knew that the Lord was greater than all gods, for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly, he was above them; consequently with this in mind Jethro, Moses’s father-in-law, took a burnt-offering and sacrifices for God: and Aaron came, and all the elders of Israel, to eat bread with Moses’s father-in-law before God; as if to celebrate the event of his conversion" See Moses.

"Shortly after the Exodous (B.C. 1658), Jethro paid a visit to Moses, while the Hebrew camp was lying in the environs of Sinai, bringing with his wife and two daughters, the Zipporah, Moses’s wife, who, together with her two sons, had been left with her family while her husband was absent on his embassy to Pharaoh. The interview was on both sides affectionate, and was celebrated first by the solemn rites of religion, and afterwards by festivities, of which Aaron and his tribe formed the ornaments, and Israel were invited to partake. On the following day, observing Moses incessantly occupied in deciding causes that were submitted to him for judgment, his experienced kinsman remonstrated with him on the speedy exhaustion which a perseverance in such arduous labors would superinduce; and in order to relieve himself, as well as secure a due attention to every case, he urged Moses to appoint a number of subordinate officers to divide with him the duty of the judicial tribunals, with power to decide in all common affairs, while the weightier and more serious matters were reserved to himself. This wise suggestion the Hebrew legislator adopted (Exod. xviii, 27). His brother-in-law Hobab naturally purposed to accompany his father back to Midian, and at first expressed a refusal to the invitation of Moses to accompany the Israelites to Canaan (Num. x, 29, 30). It is most probable that he actually returned with his father, "but if he did carry that purpose into execution, it was in opposition to the urgent solicitations of the Jewish leader, who entreated him, for his own advantage, to cast in his lot with the people of God; at all events to continue with them, and afford them the benefit of his thorough acquaintance with the wilderness. ‘Leave us not, I pray thee,’ said Moses, ‘forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes’ which the Sept. has rendered ‘and thou shalt be an elder among us.’ But there can be little doubt that the true meaning is that Hobab might perform the office of a κυβέρνητης or guide (see Bruce’s Travel, iv, 586)—his influence as an Arab chief, his knowledge of the routes, the situation of the wells, the places for fuel, the prognostics of the weather, and the most eligible stations for encamping, rendering him peculiarly fitted to act in that important capacity at the head of the caravan. It is true that God was their leader, by the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, the advancement or the halting of which regulated their journeys and fixed their encampments. But beyond these general directions the keeping of their flocks and their not extended. As smaller parties were frequently sallying forth from the main body in quest of forage and other necessaries, which human observation or enterprise were sufficient to provide, so Moses discovered his wisdom and good sense in enlisting the aid of the son of a native sheik, who, from his family connection with himself, his powerful influence, and his long experience, promised to render the Israelites most important services.’ To these solemn representations Moses replied, ‘I will go no further, that Hobab finally yielded; a conclusion that, indeed, seems to be explicitly referred to in Judg. i, 16; iv, 11. See Kenite; Ishtrah.

No other particulars of the life of Jethro are known, but the Arabs, who call him Shoboel, have a variety of traditions concerning him. They say that Michael, the son of Taskir, and grandson of Midian, was his father; this last was the immediate son of Iahmael, according to the author of Le-Toruk, but Moses makes no mention of Midian among the sons of Jetham (Gen. xxx, 18, 19). Jethro gave his son-in-law Moses the miraculously bred; it had once been the rod of Adam, and was of the myrtle of Paradisæ, etc. (Lane’s Koran, p.190; Weil’s Bib. Legenda, p.107–109). Although blind (Lane, p.180, note), he was favored with the gift of prophecy, and God sent him to the Midianites to preach the unity of God, to withdraw the Israelites from idolatry, and to procure for them a more secure and safer abode in the wilderness, for buying by the larger and selling by the smaller. Besides these frauds of the Midianites in their trading, they offered violence to travellers, and robbed them on the highways. They threatened even Jethro for his remonstrances. This insolence obliged God to manifest his wrath: he sent the angel Gabriel, who, with a voice of thunder, made the earth to tremble, which destroyed them all except Jethro, and those who, like him, believed the unity of God (Lane, p.179–181). After this punishment Jethro went to Moses, as related in Exod. xviii, 1–5. The Mohammedans term him, from the advice he gave to Moses, ‘The preacher of the prophets’ (D’Herbelot, Bib. Orient. iii, 278 sq.; comp. J. C. Maier, De Jethrone, Helmst. 1715). ‘The name of Sho’eb still remains attached to one of the wadys on the east side of the Jordan, opposite Jericho, through which, according to tradition, Moses came out from Egypt (Rob. Reisen, 1824, ii, 919, 976), the children of Israel descended to the Jordan. Other places bearing his name and those of his two daughters are shown at Sinai and on the Gulf of Akaba (Stanley, Syr.: and Pal. p. 33)."

the text for Jefiel. See Jefiel. In the Apocrypha (1 Esdr. viii, 39) it stands for the Heb. Jefel (Exra viii, 13) as the name of one of the Bene-Adonikam who returned to Jerusalem after the captivity.
Je'ush (Hebrew Ye'ish or, יֵאֵשׁ, assemblers; written Yeish', in the text of Gen. xxxvi, 5; 14 Chron. vii, 10), the name of several men.
1. (Sept. Ioqai, but 11061 in 1 Chron. i, 35; Vulg.
Johus.) The eldest of the three sons of Easa by Aholiabam, the daughter of Anah, born in Cansaan, but afterwards a sheik of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi, 5, 14; 1 Chron. i, 35). B.C. post 1864.
2. (Sept. 'Ishai v. r. Ioqai, Vulg. Jehoh.) The first named son of Bishan, grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 10). B.C. considerably post 1856.
3. (Sept. 'Ishai, Vulg. Jaws.) A Levite, one of the four sons of Shimei; not having many sons, he was reckoned with his brother Beriah as the third branch of the family (1 Chron. xxiii, 10, 11). B.C. 1049.
4. (Sept. Ioqai, Vulg. Johus.) One of the three sons of Rebhoam, apparently by Abihail, his second wife (2 Chron. xi, 19). B.C. post 973.
5. (Sept. 'Ishai v. r. 1166, Vulg. Johs. A. Vera. "Je-hush"). The second son of Eshek, brother of Azel, of the descendants of Saul (1 Chron. viii, 39). B.C. cir.
588.
Je'ziz (Heb. Ye'itz), יֵזִּיָּה, counsellor, q. d. Elhotloa; Sept. 'Ishai v. r. 'Ishai, Vulg. Jehoh), a chief Benjamite, one of the sons apparently of Shaharaim, born of his wife Hodesh or Basara in the land of Moab (1 Chron. vii, 10). B.C. perh. cir. 1618.
Jew (Heb. Yehudhai, יְהוּדָּת, plur. יְהוּדִים, sometimes xxiii, 24; Sept. and N. T. Tovhalac, hence verb 'Tovhalac, to Judae, Gal. iv, 14; adj. 'Tovhalac, Jewish, Tit. i, 14, etc.), a name for a descendant of Jehoshua, the son of Odoliel, and in a later period applied to its first use to one belonging to the tribe or country of Judah, or rather, perhaps, to a subject of the separate kingdom of Judah (2 Kings xvi, 6; xxv, 5; Jer. xxii, 12; xxxiii, 19, 21; xi, 11; xiii, 3; xlv, 11; 29), in contrast distinction from the seeding ten tribes, who retained the name of Israel or Israelites. During the captivity the term seems to have been extended (see Josephus, Ant. xi, 5, 6) to all the people of the Hebrew language and country, without distinction (Ezek. iii, 6, 9; Dan. iii, 8, 12); and this loose application of the name was preserved after the restoration to Palestine (Hag. i, 14; ii, 2; Ezra iv, 12; v, 1, 5; Neh. i, 2; ii, v, 1, 8, 17), when it came to denote not only every descendant of Abraham in the largest possible sense (2 Macc. ix, 17; John iv, 9; Acts xvii, 2, 24, etc.), es-specially in opposition to foreigners ("Jews and Greeks," Acts xiv, 12; xvii, 34, 41; xix, 10; Acts i, 21, 29, 24), but even proselytes who had no blood-relation to the Hebrews (Acts ii, 5; comp. 10). An especial use of the term is noticeable in the Gospels of John, where it frequently stands for the chief Jew, the elders, who were opposed to Christ (John i, 19; v, 15, 16; vii, i, 11, 13; ix, 22; xviii, 12; Acts x, 19, 24, 22). See Judah.

The original designation of the Israelitish nation was the Hebrews, by which all the legitimate posterity of Abraham were known, not only among themselves (Gen. xl, 15; Exod. ii, 7; iii, 18, 8; vii, 16; ix, 18; Jonah i, 9, 10; comp. 4 Macc. ix)—although the name Jew was in later times prevalent; see the Targum of Jonathan on Exod. ut sup.), but also among foreigners (as the Egyptians, Gen. xxxv, 26; Exod. xii, 11; John v, 44; the Per-tines, 1 Sam. iv, 6, 9; xiiiii, 19; xxiii, 3; the Assyrians, Judith xii, 11; and even the Greeks and Romans, see Plutarch, Sympos. iv, 5; Appian, Civ. ii, 71; Pausan. i, Hist. v, 2). See Israelite. After the Exile, the title Jew becomes the usual one (compare Macc. iii, 22), while the term "Hebrews" fell into disuse, being still applied, however, to the Samaritans (Josephus, Ant. xi, 8, 6), or more commonly to designate the vulgar Syro-Chaldee spoken by the Palestinian Jews (comp. Acts ix, 29; Eusebius iii, 24), a distinction from the Egyptian Jews (Acts vi, 1; comp. the title of the "Epistle to the He-Yet Paul, who spoke Greek, was appropriately styled a Hebrew (2 Cor. xii, 22; Phil. iii, 5); and still later the terms Hebrew and Jew were applied with little distinction to the Du possion of Jewish descent (Eusebius, Hist. Ec. ii, 4; Philo, iii, 4). See HEbrew. (For a further discussion of these epi-theses, see Genesius, Gesch. d. Hebr. Sprache, 9 sq.; Heng-

The history of the Jewish nation previous to the Christian era, is interwoven with that of their country and capital. See Palestine; Jerusalem. During the Biblical periods it consists mostly of the narratives of the progeny and migrations of the sons of Jacob, and the events of that marked its leading epochs. See Abraham; Jacob; Moses; Joshua; Judges; David; Solomon; the chosen people of God from the exile (q. v.), but this portion of their history, down even to the time of their final dispersion, A.D. 135, has already been treated at length in other parts of this work (we refer the reader to the articles on the provinces and the greater part of the events that marked its leading epochs. See Abraham;

Bar-Cochba, to regain their independence, that brought about a repetition of scenes enacted under Titus, and resulted actually in the depopulation of Palestine. Talmud and Midrash (especially Midrash Echa) alike exhaust even Eusebius, and in his otherwise admirable work, the Rabbins of that portion and the Jews of the land, their severe and well-deserved correction, and the capable consequences that followed the capture by the Romans of the last of the Jewish forts—Bither, their greatest strength. The whole of Judea was turned into a desert; about 985 towns and villages were laid in ashes; fifty of their fortresses were razed to the ground; even the name of their capital was changed to Edia Capitolina, and they were forbidden to approach it on pain of death; thousands of those who had escaped death were reduced to slavery, and such as could not be thus disposed of were transported into Egypt. "The previous invasions and conquests of the Sarmatians, the Persians, the Parthians, the Armenians, the Cohns, the Macedonians, the Romans, and even the Arabs, who advanced upon the Hebrews, was the last of the invasions; and thus suddenly scattered abroad into almost every part of the empire, in the regions of Mt. Atlas, on both sides of the Pyrenees, on the Rhine, the Danube, and the Po, the Jews were deprived of the bond of connexion which the possession of a common country only can afford to the rest of the lot henceforth was oppression, poverty, and scorn.

Yet even in their utmost depression, their religious life asserted, as it has ever done, its superiority over all the disasters of time. No sooner had the war terminated than, as if rising from the ruins of the tomb, the Sanhedrin (q.v.) and the synagogue reappeared. Out of Palestine innumerable congregations of various sizes had long been established; but the late events in Egypt, Creyanaica, Cyprus, and Mesopotamia, as well as Palestine, would have insured their annihilation but for the religious idiosyncrasy of the people. If but three persons were left in a neighborhood, they would rally at the cry-stating-place of their law. The name of their community, dangers, miseries, and wants bound the Jewish people more closely to one another. A citizen of the world, having no country he could call his own, the Jew nevertheless lived within certain well-defined limits, beyond which, to him, there was no world. Thus, though exiled, as the Izaq say, he had not ceased to be a nation; nor did any nation feel its oneness and integrity so truly as they. Jerusalem, indeed, had ceased to be their capital; but the school and the synagogue, and not a Levitical hierarchy, now became their impregnable citadel, and the law their palladium. The old men, schooled in Babylon, rallied about the bar of the law in the midst of their com- munities, and, as it were, by common consent, and wants bound the Jewish people more closely to one another. The old men, schooled in Babylon, rallied about the bar of the law in the midst of their com- munities, and, as it were, by common consent, and customs to keep alive forever the peculiur spirit of Judaism (see Rule, Karaite, p. 59).

Among the first things to be accomplished by the Jews of Palestine at this period of their history was the election, in place of the late Gamaliel II (q.v.), of a successor from the eminent rabbis who had escaped the sword of the Roman conqueror. A synod congregated at Us- cha (q.v.), and Simon ben-Gamaliel, presenting the best hereditary claims for this distinguished office, was chosen, and intrusted with the reconstruction of the syna- gogue and school around the (q.v.). Hence arose another and more important institution was founded on the banks of the Lake Gennesareth, in the pleasant town of Tiberias (q.v.). Here also was reorganized the Sanhedrin (q.v.), until Judaism was brought to stand out even in somber relief than it was before, the nation having no capital, since the calamities under Titus. In a great measure this success of the Jews was due to the Romans, who, under the government of the Antonines, mitigated their severity against this unfortunate people, restoring to them many ancient privileges, and permitting them to retain all civil honors in a limited degree, as political citizens. Indeed, of Antoninus Pius, Jewish writers as- sert that he had secretly become a convert to their faith (comp. Just, Gesch. d. Israeliten, bk. xiii., ch. ix.), but for this statement there seems to be no very good reason; at least Gratt (Gesch. der Juden, iv. 225, 226) does not even allude to it. Most prominently associated with Gamaliel II in this work of reconstruction, among the Jews of the West, were Meir, Juda, Jose, Simon ben- Jochai, to whose respective biographical articles we refer for further details; also Judah Ha-Nasi, the success- sor of Gamaliel II. In Babylonia likewise the Jews had strathed every nerve to regain their lost power and influence, and they had established a patriarchate very much like that of the West. At first they had looked to the Roman Jews for counsel, and had virtually ac- knowledged the superiority of their Jerusalem brethren in all matters ecclesiastic, confining it to the alone office of the Rech Gelutha (q.v.), or, "Prince of the Captivity," as they called their rulers; but as the chances for a rebuilding of the Temple and a return to power in the holy city grew less and less, they de- termined, encouraged by the growing celebrity of their own professors of the law, the "Gaonic" (q.v.), to establish their total independence of the schools of Pal- estine, and to unite in their office Rech Gelutha, who was chosen from those held to be descended from the house of David, both spiritual and temporal authority (see Etherege, Introd. a.v. 152, 158). We are told of the Rech Gelutha that, after the consolidation of the temporal and spiritual offices, he exercised a power almost despotic, and, those that opposed the king of Per- sia, he assumed among his own people the style of a mon- arch, lived in great splendor, had a body-guard, counselors, cup-bearers, etc.; in fact, his government was quite an imperium in imperio, and possessed a thoroughly se- cret cabinet. In the case of the best leaders of the people, there were, many of them at least, extremely wealthy, and pursued all sorts of industrial occupations. They were merchants, bankers, artisans, husbandsmen, and shep- herds, and, in particular, had the reputation of being the best weavers of the then famous Babylonian gar- mishments. And it was under his prelacy Jews for this time farce we cannot tell, but it seems quite certain that they had obtained a footing in China, if not before the time of Christ, at least during the 1st cen- tury. They were first discovered by the Jesuit mission- aries of the 17th century. They did not appear ever to have been in China, but they went to the southeast coast of East, and retained, on the whole, a very decided na- tionalism of creed and character. From their language, it was inferred that they had originally come from Per- sia. At one time they would appear to have been highly acquainted with various civilizations, and to have held the highest civil and military stations in any of the em- pires, and since the Russian embassies into Asia Jews have been found in many places (see North America Review, 1881, p. 244).

Reverting to the Jews of the Roman empire, we find them perfectly reconciled in a great measure of the national and comparative prosperity, until the time of Constantine the Great (q.v.). Indeed, the closing part of the 2d and the first part of the 3d century will ever remain among the most memorable years in the annals of Jewish history. It was during this period that Judah Hakkodesh (q.v.) flourished, and it was under his prelacy Jews for the school at Tiberias that the Jews proved to the world that, though they were now left without a metropolis, without a temple, and even without a country, they could still continue to be a nation. Driven from the sacred city, they changed Tiberias into a kind of Jews- land, and it was heard of them in every land, and the employed workmen in rearing another edifice, which even to this day continues to proclaim the greatness of the chosen people of God after their dispersion—the Mishna (q.v.), and the Gemara, better known as the Babylonian Talmud (q.v.), the so-called Oral Law en- tering into a written combination with other Jewish ex- planed, which became in the course of a few centuries a complete Digest or Encyclopaedia of the law, the reli- gion, and the nationality of the Jews. See RABBI NIM.

2. We have already said that under the Roman em- perors of the 2d and 3d centuries the Jews were in a somewhat flourishing condition. Quite different became their fate in the 4th century, when the emperor of Rome knelt before the cross, and the empire became a Chris- tian state. Not only were converts from Judaism pro- tected from the resentment of their countrymen, but Christians were prohibited from persecuting the Jews. The equality of rights to which the pagan emperors had admitted them was by degrees restricted. In short, from the establishment of Christianity in the Roman empire dates the great period of humiliation of the Jews; hereafter they change to a condemned and per- ceived people. The overthrow of the empire by the power of Christianity became baneful to the Jews, it does by no means fol- low that Christianity is to be blamed. Nay, the Jews of that age and country are altogether responsible for their sufferings. They appeared as the persecutors of the new religion whenever the opportunity presented itself, and, if they could not get rid of the prejudices of the revolution of 383 in destroying the property and lives of the Catholics. See ALEXANDRIA. Yet, though deried "as the most hateful of all people," they continued to fill, after this period, important civil and military situations, had especial courts of justice, and exercised the influence which springs from the possession of wealth and knowledge. Under the rule of Julian the Apostate, the barbarous tribes who were more barbarized than their Christian neighbors. The Jews also formed a part of all the kingdoms which rose up out of the ruins of ancient Rome: but, unfortunately, our information respecting them, for a considerable period at least, is very imperfect. "In the absence of a literature of their own, they were more known through deeds of violence and murders, who take notice of them chiefly as the objects of the converting zeal of the Catholic Church. The success of the Christian priesthood among their barbarous invaders inspired them with hopes of gaining converts among the Jews. But the circumstances of the two classes were altogether different. Among the heathen, when a prince or a successful warrior was converted to the faith, he carried along with him all his subjects or his companions in war. But the Jews moved in masses only in matters connected with their own religion; in every other respect they were wholly independent of each other. Their conversion, therefore, could only be the effect of conviction on the part of each individual. The character of the Christian clergy did not fit them for so arduous an undertaking. Their ignorance and frequent immorality placed them at a disadvantage in the eyes of those who were in the immediate sphere of the Scriptures, and had arguments at command which their opponents could not answer. Besides, there were no inducements of a worldly nature at this period to influence the Jews in exchanging their religion. They had no wish for the retreat of the cloister, nor did they stand in need of protection on account of deeds of violence and rapine. Their habits were of a description altogether different from those of the monk or brigand. The attempts of the clergy, however, were unremitting, and threats and blandishments were alternately resorted to, so that the struggle was constant between Catholicism and Judaism. In the appearance of a new religion, the Jews brought a diversion in favor of the latter."

4. According to Gritz (Geisch. d. Juden, v, 81), the history of the Jews in Arabia a century preceding Muhammad's appearance and during his activity presents a beautiful page in Jewish annals. Many were the Arabian chiefs and the tribes who were converted to the Jews or became actual converts to the Moslem religion. Indeed, for several centuries previous to Muhammad's appearance, a Jewish kingdom had existed in the south-west of Arabia, and some even claim that it existed even before the appearance of the Hinayamic kingdom to Judaism did not take place until the 5th century. So much, however, is now settled, that in the early part of the 5th century (about A.D. 950-530) the last king who reigned over the country Zunan or Zu-n-Nuwas was a Jew (comp. Perron, Sur l'histoire des Arabes avant l'islamisme, in the Journal Asiatique, 1888, Oct., Nov., p. 638 sq., 443 sq.), and that only with his death Judaism ceased to be the religion of the Hinayamic (or Gnostic) and Zunan (or Zunan) sect. The influence, then, which the Jews must have exerted in the Arabian peninsula at the time of Muhammad's appearance failed not to be perceived by the prophet, and he hastened to secure the aid of these countrymen of his, who were equally, with his other Arabian brethren, the descendants of the Hebrews, and who, in addition to their tenacity of faith and attachment to ancient traditions, contributed at least the common cause of extinguishing idolatry and Christianity. There was, perhaps, also another reason why the prophet of Arabia should have sought an association with the Jews. His own mother was a Jewess by descent, and had only in after life been converted to Christianity by the Syrian monk Simeon. To her maternal instructions he is supposed to have been indebted for his first religious impressions; and though he did not remain long under her care, yet the slight knowledge of pure religion which he thus obtained must certainly have inclined him to draw the Jewish influence to his side in his attacks against the idolatrous hordes of Arabia (comp. Oden, Arabia, ii, 98; Von Hammer, Assasins, chap. i). The Jews, however, soon became convinced that the cause of Mohammed was not their own; that his object was a union of all forces under his sceptre, the supremacy of Islam, and the extermination of all rival religions; and the compact so lately formed was as quickly broken by an open revolt. Mohammed, however, proved the stronger, and in the wars which he waged against the different Jewish tribes he came forth conqueror. From 624 to 628 several of the latter were subdued and utterly destroyed, or obliged to quit the Arabian territory. In 632 all Jews were finally driven from Arabia, and they settled in Syria. A greater display of heroism than the Jews exhibited during these struggles with the Islamicim impostor has never been witnessed, and we do not wonder that a Jewish writer should point out the epoch as one of which every Jew has reason to be proud. The prophet himself very nearly paid by his life for the victories which he had gained over Masmus; but it seems that, when Mohammedanism had acquired sufficient strength to spread beyond Arabia, the hostility towards the Jews was forgotten, and they were kindly treated. So much is certain, that the extension of the religion of the Crescent through Asitc Turkey, Persia, Egypt, Africa, and the south of Spain, proved, on the whole, advantageous to the Jews. Excepting accidental persecutions, such as those in Maurtania A.D. 790, and in Egypt A.D. 1010, they enjoyed, under the caliphs and Arabian princes, comparative peace. The Jews actually entered upon a prosperous career in every country to which the Moslem arms extended. In North Africa, in Egypt, in Persia, their condition greatly improved, and in Moorish Spain, where the nation was enjoyed fulltolerance, their number greatly increased, and they became famous for their learning as well as for trade. "In the new impulse given to trade by the progress of the Moslem arms, the Jews, ever awake to their own interests, took their advantage. In the wide extent of conquest, new wants were created by the advance of victorious armies: Kingdoms which long ceased to hold intercourse with each other were brought into union, and new channels of commercial intercourse were opened up; and, leaving the pursuits of agriculture, which were placed at a disadvantage by the policy of the caliphs, the Jews became merchants by whom the relations between the Eastern and the Western world was conducted. In the court of the caliphs they were favorably received, and for centuries the whole management of the coinage was intrusted to them, from the superior accuracy and elegance with which they could execute it, and from their opportunities, by the extent and variety of their commercial relations, to give it the widest circulation, and at the same time to draw in all the previous mintages. But, as we have already said, it was not only in commercial greatness that they flourished. Not a few of them distinguished themselves in the walks of science and literature. They were counsellors, secretaries, astrologers, or physicians to the Moslem rulers; and this period may well be considered the golden age of Jewish literature. Poets, orators, philosophers of highest eminence arose, not isolated, but in considerable measure sustained by the encouragement of the state; and astronomy was a well-established study, that to them is chiefly due—through the Arab medium—the preservation and subsequent spreading in Europe of ancient classical literature, more especially of philosophy. (Compare, on the efforts of Nestorian Christians in this direction, Etheridge, Syriac Characters, p. 94 sq.) Their chief attention, however, continued to be ever directed to the Talmud and its literature, especially in Babylonia, where they still had a Resch-gelutha as their immediate ruler. Here their great schools, reorganized under the Soberains (thinkers), were put in a still more flourishing condition by the Geonim (eminent), of whom the most prominent are Saadis (q. v.) (about 892-942), the translator of the Pentateuch into Arabic, whom, for his great linguistic attainments, Aben Ezra designated as the "rabi el qadim", and Sherira Gaon (q. v.) (died 997), grandson of Judah, to whom we owe our most accurate knowledge of the Jewish schools in Babylonia. In this period (from the 6th to the 8th centuries) the Masora was developed, followed by numerous commentaries on it and on the Targum of Jerusalem. These expositions of the earlier Haftorahs (See Midrashim, see Midrash. From Palestine, also, came about this time signs of freshness and vigor in Jewish literature: the admirable vowel system; talmudical compendia and writings on theological cosmogony. See Caral. The Karaites (q. v.), likewise, according to some authorities, originated about the 8th century (this is, however, disputed now by Rule, Karaites Jews, Lond. 1870, sm. 8vo. who believes them to be of much earlier date), and under their influence a whole kingdom, named Khozir, is believed to have been converted to Judaism, on the shores of the Caspian Sea. See Juhudan (Ha-Levi Ben-Samuel. Here we desire mention, also, the most celebrated of the Jews in Africa under the Saracen princes, the grammarians Ibn-Korash (q. v.), Damsh (q. v.), Chayyag (q. v.); the lexicographer Hezef, and Isaac ibn-Gabirol. Very different was the fate of the Jews under Christian rulers. Few were the monarchs of Christendom who rose above the barbarism of the Middle Ages. By considerable pecuniary sacrifices only could the sons of Israel enjoy tolerance. In Italy their lot had always been most severe. Now and then a Roman pontiff would afford them his protection, but, as a rule, they have received only intolerance in that country. Down even to the time of the deposition of Pius IX from the temporal power, it has been the barbarous custom, on the last Saturday before the Carnival, to compel the Jews to proceed "en masse" to the capitol, and to receive the pontiff on the pontifical lift. But such an act was respected, after the foot of the hill the petition was refused them, but, after much entreaty, they were granted the favor when they had reached the summit, and, as their residence, the Ghetto was assigned them. Their circumstances were most favorable among the Franks. The Edict of Nantes is said to have made a forcible confidence not only in the ability, but also in the integrity of the Jewish merchants in his realm, and he even sent the Jew Isaac as his ambassador to the court of Harouin Akraschid. To Isaac's faithfulness and ability may perhaps be attributed the great privileges which the Jews enjoyed under Louis le Debonnaire, who is said to have made them "all-powerful." But if these two Christian rulers were noble and generous towards the Jews, the clergy of their day by no means shared the same feeling towards the despised race. Many a bishop of the Church of Rome, and many a member of the lower orders, were heard before the throne and before the people complaining of the kind treatment which the Jews received. One prelate hesitated not to condemn the Jews because the "country people looked upon them as the only people of God!" Hence we cannot wonder that the two noble monarchs, when the weaker Carlavongians began to rule, and the Church to advance with imperious strides, a melancholy change ensued—kings, bishops, feudal barons, and even the municipalities, all joined in a common persecution, and the history of the Jews becomes now a record of epochal series of persecution. (See below, 5; Brit. and For. Rev., 1842, p. 459 sq.) In England the Jews made their first appearance during the period of the Saxons. They are mentioned in the ecclesiastical constitutions of Egbert, archbishops. op of York, A.D. 740; they are also named in a charter to the monks of Croyland, A.D. 888. They enjoyed many privileges under William the Conqueror and his son, William Rufus, who favored them in many ways. The lands of the vacant bishoprics were farmed out to them, which proves that the Jews must have been agreeable tenants. At the same time they were thus fixed upon at the schools they held many honorable positions. Thus, at Oxford, even at this time a great seat of learning, they possessed themselves three halls—Lombard Hall, Moises Hall, and Jacob Hall, to which Christians as well as Jews went for instruction in the Hebrew tongue. They enjoyed these and other advantages as a commercial people, held in considerable respect. The services of the Jews became indispensable to the nobles, whose hatred rose in proportion to their obligations; and, where there was the power, the temptation to cancel the debt by violence became irresistible.” A raid against the Jews was a favorite pastime of a bankrupt noble, and we need not wonder that the Jew had recourse to the only revenge that was left him to stave off this gross injustice—the exaction of a more exorbitant gain when the opportunity was afforded him. Thus, in England, at the enthronement of Richard I (1189), the Crusaders, on their departure for the Holy Land, were not to injure the Jews or their property by a pillage of the Jews. In the desperate defence which the latter waged against the knights of England in the castle at York, finding resistance useless, 500 of them, having first destroyed everything of value that belonged to them, murdered their wives and children, and then set fire to their houses of life, rather than fall a prey to Christian warriors. (See Hume, History of England.) A like treatment the Jews received under the two following monarchs; their lives and wealth were protected only for a consideration. With the tyrannical treatment they received at the hands of John (q.v.), ever ready to make any change of fortune is familiar. Under Henry III they were treated still worse, if possible. The reign of Edward I (1272-1307) finally brought suddenly to a terminus the miserable condition of this people by a wholesale expulsion from the kingdom (A.D. 1290), after a vain attempt on the part of the priesthood to convert them to Christianity, preceded, of course, by a wholesale confiscation of their property. These exiles amounted to about 16,000. They emigrated mostly to Germany and France. In the former country the same sort of treatment befell them. In the Empire they had to pay all manner of iniquitous taxes—church tax, capital tax, trade taxes, communication tax, and to present a multitude of gifts, to mollify the avarice or supply the necessities of emperor, princes, and barons. It did not suffice, however, to save them from the loss of their property. The populace and the lower clergy also must be satisfied; they, too, had pretensions to the wealth of the exiles. A wholesale slaughter of the “enemies of Christianity” was inaugurated. Trévès, Metz, Cologne, Mentsz, Worms, Spire, Strasburg, and other cities, were deluged with the blood of the “unbelievers.” The word Hep (said to be the initials of Hierosolum et perditia, Jerusalem is taken) throughout all the cities of the empire became the signal for massacre, and if an insensate monk sounded it along the streets, it threw the rabble into paroxysms of murderous rage. The choice of death or conversion was given to the Jews, but few were found willing to purchase their life by that form of reward. Rather they chose to submit to the indignities of the Roman Church and such Christian training, fathers presented their breast to the sword after putting their children to death, and wives and virgins sought refuge from the brutality of the soldiers by throwing themselves into the river with stones fastened to their bodies. (Comp. Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, i, 554.) Not less than 17,000 were supposed to have perished in the German empire during these persecutions; yet those who survived clung to the land that had given them birth, and suffered from pillage and maltreatment until they were expelled by force—from Vienna (A.D. 1196), Mecklenburg (1228), Brunswy (1296), Brandeburg (1248), Frankfort (1414), Munich (1285), Nuremberg (1390), Prague (1391), and Ratisbon (1476). The “Black Death,” in particular, occasioned a great and widespread persecution (1484-1590). They were murdered and burned by thousands, and many even sought death amidst the confinements of their synagogues. The cities were allowed to sack and plunder the land and towns. They were drenched with innocent blood, and even the interference of the emperor and the pope long proved insufficient to put an end to the atrocities that were perpetrated. When the phase had almost disappeared from Germany, feelings of humanity as well as the interests of his house led James Charles IV to some benefactions. The Hussites at Prague were pardoned; and in the Golden Bull (1566) the future condition of the Jews was so clearly pointed out, that it prevented, in a great measure, further bloodshed, though it still continued to leave them subject to oppression and injustice. Their residence was forbidden in places, and in many cities to which they had access they were confined to certain quarters or streets, known as ghettos or Jews’ streets (Judenstrasse).

No better, nor worse, if possible, was their condition in France from the 11th to the 16th centuries. All manner of persecution was circulated among them: it was said that they were wont to steal the host, and to contumaciously thrust it through and through; to inveigle Christian children into their houses and murder them; to poison wells, etc. They were also hated here as elsewhere on plea of excessive usury. Occasionally their dearth was laid to their beneficed nature, and they were persecuted. The laws rested on what they called Christian religion as a very easy means of getting rid of their obligations. Thus Philippe Augustus (1179-1226), under whose rule the Jews seem to have held mortgages of enormous value on the estates of Church and state dignitaries, simply confiscated the debts due to them, forced them to surrender the pledges in their possession, seized their goods, and finally even banished them from France; but the decree appears to have taken effect chiefly in the north; yet in less than twenty years the same proud but wasteful monarch was glad to let them come back and take up their abode in Paris. Louis IX (1226-1270), who was a very pious prince, among other religious acts, cancelled a third of the claims which the Jews had against his subjects, “for the benefit of his soul.” An edict also was issued for the seizure and destruction of their sacred books, as well as those of the Gospel; as Paris twelve carts filled with copies of the Talmud, etc., were consigned to the flames. See TALMUD. The Jews were also forbidden to hold social intercourse with their Christian neighbors, and the murderer of a Jew, if he were a Christian, went unpunished. Need we wonder, then, that in the following century, a religious epidemic, as known as the Rising of the Shepherds, seized the common people in Languedoc and the central regions of France (A.D. 1321), they indulged in horrible massacres of the detested race; so horrible, indeed, that in one place, Verdun, on the Garonne, the Jews, in the madness of their agony, threw down their children to the Christian mob from the tower in which they were gathered, hoping, but in vain, to appease the demoniacal fury of their assailants. “One shudders to read of what followed; in whole provinces every Jew was burned. At St. Palais alone, 4000 were put to the sword; and 160 of both sexes burned together! Yet Christianity never produced more resolute martyrs; as they sprang into the place of torment, they sang hymns as though they were going to a wedding; and, though “savage and horrible as such self-devotion is, it is impossible not to acknowledge the nobility of heart with which it was done.” To Ethiopia, without inspiration, one might foretell that, so long as a solitary heart of this description was left to be cut, it would treasure its national distinction as its sole remaining pride.” At last, in 1594, they were indefinitely banished from France, and the sentence rigidly executed (see Schmidt, Gesch. Frankreichs, 1, 504 sq.). Such is the frightful picture of horrors and gloom which the Jews of Germany, France, England, and Italy offer in their medieval history. “Circumscribed in their rights by decree and laws of the ecclesiastical as well as civil power, excluded from all honorable occupations, driven from place to place, from province to province, compelled to subsist almost exclusively by merce, and with the title of Jews added to the terms of contempt, plundered by lawless barons and penniless princes, an easy prey to all parties during the civil feuds, again and again robbed of their pecuniary claims, owned and sold as serfs (chamber-servants and personal attendants), the bundle of disdained peasants, chased by the monks, and finally burned in thousands by the Crusaders, who also burned their brethren at Jerusalem in their synagogues, or tormented by ridicule, abusive sermons, monstrous accusations and trials, threats and experiments of conversation.”

In Spain and Portugal, indeed, the days of prosperity to the Jews lingered longest. As we have already noticed, they enjoyed in these countries, while they remained under Moorish rule, almost equality with the Moors. As in France under the Carolingians, so in these parts of Spain, Christian rule was accompanied by an uncommon progress in civilization—a progress which left far in the distance all other nations, even those who professed to unfurl the banner of the Cross. But this was especially true of the Spanish Jews. Acquainted with the Arabic, they could easily dive into the treasures of science and literature, and when persecution and banishment forced them to turn to the Jews mastered all languages made them ready interpreters between Musulman and Christian. It was through their original thinkers, such as Avicen (Ibn-Gebirq, v. q.) and Moses Maimonides (q. v.), that the West became leavened with Greek and Oriental thought (Lewens, Phy, II, 11. 5 seq.). It was in Spain that the Jew was permitted and enjoined to be a guler. The despised race must be regarded as the chief instrument whereby the Arabian philosophy was made effective on European culture. “Dans le monde Musulman comme dans le monde chrétien,” said the late professor Munk, of Paris (Melanges, p. 335), “les Juifs exclu de la vie publique, vous à la haine et au mépris par la religion dominante, toujours en présence des dangers dont le menaçait le fanatisme de la foule, ne trouvant la tranquillité et le bonheur que dans un isolement complet. Ignorés de la société les savants Juifs vouaient leurs vies à leur science. L'attention, la culture, l'étude, la richesse, l'influence, le pouvoir étaient pour eux les termes de la gloire et de la puissance. Comme les Juifs de France et d'Espagne, ils ne rejetèrent jamais le fer de l'esclavage, et, par la force des choses, ils vinrent parfois jusqu'à leurs rivaux, pour leur montrer que leur religion avait d'autres vertus que l'inconfortable et l'impitoyable.*

*This is to be understood as extending to drain the treasures and to ensure the life of this devoted race. Kingdom after kingdom, and people after people, followed the dreadful example, and strove to seal the fate of the descendants of Israel; till at length, what we blush to call Christianity, with the Inquisition in its train, cleared the fair and smiling provinces of Spain of this industrious part of its population, and brought a self-inflicted curse of barrenness upon the benighted land (Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 310-330; cf. Luscinia, p. 380; and Isabella, pt. i, ch. vii; Jos. Gesch. d. Israelt. vi, 74, 110, 184, 216, 290; DA COSTA, Israel and the Gentiles, p. 221).

The condition of the Jews in Spain continued to be unfavorable from near the close of the 11th century (to which time we traced them in the preceding section) to the present day. The rejection of heart with which, in 1492, these children of the star of their fortune may be said to have culminated. It is true, the Mohammedan power was now on the wane, but then the Christian rulers felt not yet sufficiently well established in the peninsula to take severe measures against the Jews (DA COSTA, Israel and the Gentiles, p. 189 sq., 224). A capital tax was paid by the numerous synagogues, and presents were made to the infante, the nobility, or the Church; but in every other respect the Jews lived like a separate nation, framing and executing their own civil and criminal jurisdiction. It is true they had not here a Redephol-us as their authority, but a substitute was afforded them in the person of the inquisitor general, who "exercised his right in the king's name, and sealed his decrees, which the king alone could annul, with the royal arms. He made journeys through the country to take cognizance of all Jewish affairs, and inquire into the disposal of the revenues of the different synagogues and charitable institutions. Every land owner, every town councilor, every chancellor, a secretary, and several other officers. Two different orders of rabbis, or judges, acted under him in the towns and districts of the kingdom." The first important danger that threatened them was in 1218, when a multitude of foreign knights and soldiers gathered together at Tarragona preparatory to a crusade against the Moors. The campaign was to be opened, as had been done in Germany, by a general massacre of the Jews; but, by the intervention of Alphonso IX, surnamed the Good, the attack was in a great measure defeated, and a Jewish council was called to negotiate terms. A similar attempt made by the Cortes of Madrid had failed, until the middle of the 14th century. By this time the general hatred against the Jews had spread alarmingly in all countries of Europe, as we have already had occasion to see, in consequence of the terror which the discovery of the Inquisition brought to the Jewish community the world over. They were now also in Spain confined to particular quarters of cities in which they resided, and attempts were made for their conversion. In 1250 an institution had even been erected for the express purpose of training men to carry on successfully controversies with the Jews, and, if possible, to bring about their conversion. But very different results followed the bloody persecutions which were actually and successfully inaugurated against them at Seville in 1391, 1392. These were the outbursts of priestly and popular violence, and had no sooner commenced in that city than Cordova, Toledo, Valencia, and Murder in Majorca were followed in its train; immense numbers were murdered, and wholesale theft was perpetrated by the religious rable. Escape was possible only through flight to other countries, or by accepting baptism at the point of the sword, and the number used to prosper afterwards to Christianity is reckoned at no less than 200,000. If the persecutions in Germany, England, France, and elsewhere had severely tried the Jewish race, these persecutions in Spain completely extinguished all hope of further joy, for they hit, so to speak, the very core of the Jewish national existence and hurrying to its destruction. The 15th of March, 1391, forms a memorable day not only for the Jew, not only for the Spaniard, but for all the world; it was the seed from which germinated that monster called the Inquisition (Gratz, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 61 sq.). Daily now the condition of this people, even in the Spanish peninsula grew worse and worse, until it fairly beggars description. A.D. 1412-1414 they had to endure another bloody persecution throughout the peninsula, and by the middle of the 15th century we read of nothing but persecution, violent conversion, massacre, and the tortures of the Inquisition; unmerited and unjustified, and "in one year 280 were burned in Seville alone." Sometimes the popes, and even the nobles, shuddered at the fiendish zeal of the inquisitors, and tried to mitigate it, but in vain. At length the hour of final horror came. In A.D. 1492 Ferdinand and Isabella issued an edict for the expulsion, within four months, of all who refused to be come Christians, with the strict inhibition to take neither gold nor silver out of the country. The Jews offered an enormous sum for its revocation, and for a moment the sovereigns hesitated; but Torquemada, the Dominican inquisitor-general, obtained his end by preaing them to the Sanhedrin, as their own and Israel's al-mal master and mistress to Judas; they shrank from the awful accusation; and the ruin of the most industrious, most thriving, the most peaceable, and the most learned of their subjects—and consequently Spain herself—became irredeemable. (See Inquisition in this volume, p. 601 sq.) This is perhaps the grandest and most melancholy hour in their modern history. It is considered one of the great transgressions against God, the destruction of Jerusalem. 300,000 (some even give the numbers at 650,000 or 900,000) resolved to abandon the country, which a residence of seven centuries had made almost a second Judæa to them. The incidents that marked their departure are heart-rending. Almost evey family, every house, every land was against them. Some ventured into France, others into Italy, Turkey, and Morocco, in the last of which countries they suffered the most frightful privations. Of the 80,000 who obtained an entrance into Portugal on payment of eight gold pennies a head, but only for eight months, to enable them to obtain means of deposit to other countries, many lingered after the expiration of the appointed time, and the poorer were sold as slaves. In A.D. 1495, king Emanuel commanded them to quit his territories, but at the same time issued a secret order that all Jewish children under 14 years of age would be torn from their mothers, retained in Portugal, and brought up as Chris-tiars. Agony drove the Jewish mothers into madness; they destroyed their children with their own hands, and threw them into wells and rivers, to prevent them from falling into the hands of their persecutors. Neither the activities of the Inquisition, nor the fanatical Christianity, but who, for the most part, secretly adhered to their old faith (Onasim, Aneasim—yielding to violence, forced ones) less dreadful. It was not until the 17th century that persecution ceased. Autors-da-fés of suspected converts happened as late as A.D. 1655 (Chamers, s.v.).

6. The discovery of America, the restoration of letters occasioned by the invention of the art of printing, and the reformation in the Christian Church opened in a certain sense a somewhat more beneficial era to the Jews. It is true, they reaped the benefits of this transformation less than any other portion of European society; "still, the progress of civilization was silently preparing the way for greater justice being done to this people; and their conduct, in circumstances where they were allowed scope for the development of their better qualities, tended greatly to the removal of the prejudices that existed against them." They found a firm basis in Reuchlin (q.v.), who made strenuous exertions in behalf of the preservation of Jewish literature. Luther, in the earlier part of his public career, is supposed to have favored the conversion of the Jews by violent means (quanta sunt libri et litterae, in Migne, Præf. Juden, ix, 220 sq.; 388 sq.; Etheridge, p. 440 sq.; Jost, Gesch. des Judenstaates u. s. Secten, iii, 217); and it is a fact that all through Germany, where the Protestant element, if any where, was strongly in those days, their lot actually became harder than it had ever been before. See below. On the other hand, we find a Roman ponfitt (Sixtus V, 1585-90) animated by a far more wise and kindly spirit towards them than any Protetant prince of his time. In 1588 he abolished all the persecuting statutes of his predecessors, allowed them to settle and trade in every city of his dominions, to enjoy the free exercise of their religion, and, sound administration of justice and taxation, placed them on a footing with the rest of his subjects. Of course, all this was done for a consideration. The Jews had money, and it he made them furnish freely, but then they enjoyed at least certain advantages by virtue of their possessions.

Strange indeed must it appear to the学生 ity that one of the first countries in modern days that rose above the barbarism of the Middle Ages, and granted the Jews the most liberal concessions, was a part of that country which is now one of their most recent, most inveterate enemies. In 1713, under Philip II of Spain, and that one of the principal causes contributing to this change was the very instrument selected JEW

by the hatred of the Dominicans—the bloody Inquisition. It was the active, energetic, intelligent Holland-er, readily appreciating the business qualifications of his Jewish brother, that permitted him to settle by his side as early as 1655. It is true, the Jew did not enjoy even in Holland the same rights as the Christian, but after nearly two hundred years of trial (1796), he had been found the equal of his Christian neighbor whenever he was permitted to exchange the garb of a slave for that of a master. It was Holland that afforded the hunted victims of a cruel and refined fanaticism a resting-place on the highest terms of equality, and even of honor, and on the stage of European history greatly improved the status of the Jews not only in Germany, but all over Europe, and we might say the world. Various other causes, among which, especially, the American and French revolutions, do great service to the Jew. Holland and Germany also enjoy the special privileges which the Dutch stood ready to administer to them. Denmark and Hamburg partook of the liberal spirit, and there also the Jews were heartily welcomed. In England, also, they soon after (1655), by the success of the Independents, gained another foothold. It is true, they did not really obtain public permission to settle again in the island until the reign of Charles II (1660-85), but Cromwell, it is generally believed, favored their admission to the country, and no doubt permitted it quietly in a great many instances. The right to possess land, however, was not granted until 1707, and the right of citizenship was not conferred on them until 1745. Into France, also, they were, in the middle of the 16th century, admitted again, though, of course, at first the places which opened their gates to them were few indeed. Most of those who came thither were relics of that high host of exiles which had left Spain and Portugal after the establishment of the Inquisition (see above). They went in considerable numbers to the provinces Avignon, Lorraine, and Alasce, and of the cities among the first to bid them enter were Bayonne and Bordeaux. The outbreak men caused the Revolution, towards the close of the 18th century, finally caused here, as elsewhere, a decided change in their favor (of which more below). In Germany, as we have already said, their worth failed to be recognized. They were maltreated even under the great and otherwise liberal monarchs, Frederick II; and, as Frisia (Brandenburg) was even then in the vanguard of German affairs, the intolerant treatment which they here received was speed in the other and less important realms of the empire. They were driven out of Bavaria in 1553, out of Brandenburg in 1573, and similar treatment befell them elsewhere. Their deaths are also excited by the popular tumults (as late even as 1730 in Hamburg, of whose liberal treatment of the Jews we spoke above in connection with the Low Countries), and, in fact, during the whole of the 17th and nearly the whole of the 18th century, the hardships inflicted on them by the German governments became positively more and more grievous. Russia also failed to treat with the least consideration the Jewish people. Admitted into the realm by Peter the Great (1689-1725), they were expelled from the empire, 85,000 strong, in 1743 by the empress Elizabeth. They were, however, readmitted by the Revolution, after the death of Catherine II. The only other two countries which truly afforded the Jews protection were Turkey and Poland. The Mohammedans, as we have already said, had an opportunity to observe, have, ever since the decease of the founder of their religion, been considerate in their dealings with Jewish subjects. At present, however, Turkey, the Jews were at this period held in higher estimation than the conquered Greeks; the latter were termed teskhir (slaves), but the Jews monacroph (visitors). They were permitted to re-establish schools, rebuild synagogues, and settle in all the commercial towns of the Levant. In Poland the Jews are to this day far better represented than in any other European country, they met a most favorable reception as early as the 14th cen-
JEW, THE WANDERING

...under aed decree granting them liberty of trade and commerce, but the barbarous Nicholas deprived them of all these, and treated them quite inhumanly, especially in Poland, where they were known to be in sympathy with the Revolutionists. Since the accession of Alexander II their condition has been improving, and there is reason to think further amelioration of their circumstances. In Italy they were subject, more or less, to intolerance and oppression until the dethronement of the papal power. Since the establishment of a united kingdom they enjoy there the same high privileges as in France. In Spain, too, the establishment of a republic has secured them some measure of equality. Baron von Bunsen brought "glad tidings" to the Jews. They had suffered under the yoke of Romanism the general fate of the heretic; the downfall of the Bourbon dynasty, and the establishment of a popular government, at once secured for all religious toleration, and it has since been ascertained that Spain contains many adherents to the Jewish faith among the attendants of the Roman service.

In Denmark they were granted equality with other natives in 1814. In Norway they were excluded until 1860, and in Sweden their freedom is as yet limited. In Austria, as in other countries where Roman Catholicism has so long been the ruling religion, they are looked upon, not as the equals of the Christians, but as foreigners. In many of the more advanced countries political changes of late years have placed the Jew on an equality with his Christian neighbor, and not a few of the higher positions of the state are filled by Jews.

Our notice of their condition in other countries (aside from the United States of America, for which see above) will be necessarily limited to the moment of our limited space. In Turkey, in spite of the exaction of pashas, the insolence of janizaries, and the miseries of war, they are quite numerous and thriving. In Palestine, where they are rapidly increasing, they are very poorly and comfortably situated; and, as in many of the countries under Mohammedan authority, they are not, as a rule, willing to trade with or associate with the Christians.

In Persia they are quite numerous, but their condition is rather pitiable. They exist also in Afghanistan, a country whose importance will now be more realized since the occupation of Turkistan (June, 1871) by Russia leaves Afghanistan the only independent country separating the Russian empire from the wealth of India. The Jews here thrive as traffickeers between Cabul and China. Jewery is likewise found in India and Cochin-China, where they are both agriculturists and artisans; as also in Siam, where they possess equal rights with the other inhabitants, and are skilled in the manufacture of silks and metals; in Tartary and China, where, however, their number is believed not to be adequately known. In Africa, also, they exist in large numbers; especially numerous are they all along the North-African coast, where, indeed, they have had communities for perhaps more than a thousand years, which were largely re-enforced in consequence of the great Spanish persecutions. They are numerous in Fez and Morocco, and are found in small numbers in Egypt and Nubia, more numerous in Abyssinia and it is ascertained that they have even made their way into the heart of Africa; they exist in Sudan, and are also found further south. America, too, has invited their spirit of enterprise. In the United States, as in Great Britain, they enjoy absolute liberty. (See, for further particulars on the history of the Jews in our country, the article JUDAISM.) They have been in Brazil since 1625, and in Cayenne since 1639, and are also settled in some parts of the West Indies.

The entire number of Jews in the world is reckoned variously between 31 and 15 millions. Chambers, taking the former estimate, distributes them as follows: about 1,700,000 to Russian, Austrian, and Prussian Poland, about 600,000 to Germany, about 240,000 to Hungary and Transylvania, about 200,000 to Galicia, about 300,000 to Turkey, about 47,000 to Italy, about 36,000 to Great Britain; Asia, about 196,000; Africa, about 84,000; and America, about 90,000. We are inclined to estimate the number of Jews to be no less than 46 millions, and of these to give Europe about 4,000,000, and to the United States of America about 500,000. The estimate of Chambers for the United States might be more accurately adopted as the census of the city of New York only. "The Handbuch der Vergleichenden Statistik" by G. E. Lessing (Leipzig, 1849) gives the following as the number of Jews in the various countries named:

The work of Bousage (Hist. de la Religion des Juifs depuis le debut du Premier Age) was compiled from second-hand sources, and so teems with errors and unjust statements towards Jews that we can hardly advise its perusal to any who seek accuracy and erudition. For the religious views, etc., of the Jews, see JUDAISM. (J. H. W.)

JEW, THE WANDERING. While the tradition obtained in the Christian Church that the "disciple whom Jesus loved" should not die (John xxi. 22), we find as a counterpart the tradition of an enemy of the Redeemer, whom remorse concealed to ceaseless wanderings until the second coming of the Lord. This tradition of the Wandering Jew has, like other traditions, undergone various changes. The first Christian writer by whom we find it mentioned is the Benedictine chronicler Matthaeus Parisius (1259). According to the account he gives in his Historia Major—an account which he professes to have received from an Armenian bishop, to whom the Wandering Jew had himself told it—his history as told by that Armenian was such that he was door-keeper of the palace, in the employ of Pilate. When the Jews dragged Jesus out of the palace, after his sentence had been pronounced, the door-keeper struck him, saying mockingly, "Go on, Jesus, go faster; why dost thou linger?" Jesus turned around sternly, and said, "I am going, but thou shalt remain waiting..."

anti I return." The door-keeper was then about thirty years old; but since, whenever he reaches his hundredth year, a sudden faintness overcomes him, and when he awakes from his swoon he finds himself returned to the age he was at the time the Lord pronounced his punishment. Cartaphilus was baptized with Ananias under the name of Ahasuerus, which caused him to be confounded with Joseph of Arimathea. As a Christian, he led a life of strict penitence, in the hope of obtaining forgiveness. The scene of action of this Wandering Jew is in the East—namely, Armenia.

The tradition of the West is somewhat different. He was first mentioned in the 16th century under the name of Ahasuerus, and is said to have appeared in 1547 in Hamburg, then in Dantzitz and in other cities of Germany, and in other countries also. Dr. Paulus, of Eizen, bishop of Schleswig—the story goes—heard him relate his history as follows: Ahasuerus was a shoemaker in Jerusalem during the life of Jesus, and one of the lowest in crying. "Crucify him." When Jesus was led to the place of execution, he passed before the shoemaker's house. Tired with the weight of the cross, the Saviour leaned against the porch for rest. The shoemaker, who stood at his door with a child in his arms, bade him heartily welcome (according to some he even struck him), when Christ, turning round and looking severely at him, said, "I shall stay and rest, but thou shalt move on until the last day."

Towards the end of the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th, the tradition of the Wandering Jew, as current in England, changed to the original Eastern account. A stranger made his appearance claiming to be an officer of the upper council of Jerusalem, and that he had done what was generally attributed to Cartaphilus—namely, had struck Jesus as the latter left Pilate's palace. Ahasuerus told him, "So move thee, yet linger here?" The English universities sent their abest professors to question him. He proved himself able to answer them all; he related a great deal concerning the apostles, as also about Mohammed, Tamerlane, Soliman, etc., all of whom he professed to have known personally; he knew all the dates of the events connected with the Crusades, etc. Some considered him an impostor or a visionary, while others believed him.

Whether the allegory of Ahasuerus, or this ever-restless being, is to be understood as a type of the anti-Christian spirit of scepticism, or whether, in a more concrete sense, it is meant to typify the ever-wandering, homeless, yet still unchanged Jewish people, is a question for critics to decide. We will only add that this fanciful tradition has become the theme for a great number of works of imagination. It has been worked up into songs, as by Schubert, Schütz, etc.; into epics, as by Julius Mösen, Nich. Lenau, etc.; into dramas, as by Klingsmänn. French writers also have used it: Edgar Quinet and Beranger have composed songs on the Wandering Jew. But the most remarkable production to which this legend has given rise is Eugenie Sue's novel, The Wandering Jew (Le Jeu errant, Paris, 1844). See Dr. J. G. Th. Grasse, Sagen u. geschichten Juden, historisch enzeichelt (Dresden u. Leipzig, 1844, 4vo); Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, xvi, 131 sq. (J. N. P.)

Jewells, Francis, a learned English writer and bishop, one of the fathers of the English Protestant Church, was born May 24, 1522, at Buden, in the county of Devon, and educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1541, became a noted tutor, and was soon after chosen lecturer on rhetoric in his college. He had early imbibed the principles of the Reformation, and incited them upon his pupils, though it had to be done privately till the accession of king Edward the Sixth, which took place in 1546, when he made a public declaration of his faith, and entered into a close friendship with Peter Martyr, who was visiting Oxford about this time. On the accession of queen Mary in 1558, he was one of the first to feel the rage of the storm then raised against the Reformation; he was obliged to flee, and, after encountering many difficulties, joined the English exiles at Frankfurt, in the second year of queen Mary's reign, and there made a public subscription to the poijah doctrines. He then went to Strasburg, and afterwards to Zürich, where he resided with Peter Martyr. He returned to England in 1559, after the death of queen Mary, and in the following year was consecrated bishop of Norwich. He now preached and wrote anew in favor of the Reformation, and sought in every way to extingush any attachment still remaining for the Roman Catholics. It was at this time, after more than twenty years spent in researches, that he published his famous Apologia pro Ecclesiis Anglicanae (translated into several languages, and into English by lady Bacon [wife of the cancellour], under the title, An Apology or Answer in defence of the Church of England, 1562, 4to). But his watchful and laborious manner of life impaired his health, and brought him quickly to the grave. He died at Mounkton Park, Sept. 29, 1557. "He was a priv- ate of great learning, piety, and moderation; irrepro-achable in his private life; extremely generous and charita-ble to the poor, to whom it is said, his doors always stood open. He was of a pleasant and affable temper, modest, mild, meek, and temperate, and a great master of his passions. His memory was remarkably strong and retentive, but he is said to have greatly improved it by art, insomuch that marvellous things are related of it by his biographers." The writings of bishop Jewell, which are chiefly controversial, are greatly valued even in our day, and are freely used in two departments of Church controversy—on the question between the Church of England and the Church of Rome, and on the question respecting the devotional sentiments of the English Protestant fathers. Besides his Apology, he wrote, in reply to Thomas Harding (q. v.), A Defence of the Apology (1565 and 1567, folio), the reading of which was obligatory in all par-ishes until the time of Charles I—A View of a nebulous Bull sent into England by Pope Pius I in 1559—A Treatise on the Holy Scriptures (London, 1842, 8vo)—An Ex- position of the two Epistles to the Thessalonians: A Treatise on the Sacraments (London, 1568, 8vo); besides several sermons, and, naturally, the books on which were collected and published in one folio volume (London, 1609, 1611, 1631, 1711; recent editions, Camb. 1845-50, 4 vols. 8mo. fol.; 1st ed., 1602-78, 8 vols. 8vo). Jewness (Towainah), a woman of Hebrew birth, without distinction of tribe (Acts xvi. 1; xxiv. 14). It is JEWETT applied in the former passage to Eunice, the mother of Timothy, who was unquestionably of Hebrew origin (comp. 2 Tim. iii, 15), and in the latter to Drusilla, the wife of Felix and daughter of Herod Agrippa I.—Smith. See JEW.

Jewett, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Sharon, Conn., in the year 1789. At the age of seventeen he was converted, commenced preaching the year following, and travelled a circuit by direction of a presiding elder. In 1808 he joined the New York Annual Conference. His ministerial labors were uninterrupted from 1807 to 1851, a period of forty-four years, during nineteen of which he held the office of presiding elder of his appointment circuit. He died in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., June 27, 1857. (G. L. T.)

Jewett, William D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Ballston, N. Y., about 1788; was converted in 1811; was licensed to preach in 1821, and preached much, and was ordained deacon previous to entering the Genesee Conference in 1830; was superan-tuated in 1845, and died at Huron, N. Y., Nov. 10, 1855, Mr. Jewett was a man of “unobtrusive piety, and a patttern of ministerial fidelity.” He labored with all faithfulness and love until his strength failed him. At death he left his property, about $3000, to the Bible and Missionary Society, and was superannuated at his own request. Minutes of Conference. (G. L. T.)

Jez'ebel (Hebrew יְזֶבֶל, יְזֶבֶל, not-cohabited, q. d. דְּנָבָה, compare Plato, p. 249; Lat. Agnus, i. e. in-tractis, cæstata; an appropriate female name, remarks Gesenius, and not to be estimated from the character of Ahab’s queen; comp. Isabella; Sept. Ἰάζεβα, N. T. Ἰάζεβα, Rev. ii, 20; Joseph. Ἰάζεβας, Ant. ix, 6, 4; Vulg. Jezbel), the consort of Ahab, king of Israel (1 Kings xvi, 31), was the daughter of Ethbaal (qv., c.), king of Tyre and Sidon, and originally a priest of Baal (Josephus, Antiq., i, 18). This unsuitable alliance proved most disastrous to the kingdom of Israel; for Jezebel induced her weak husband not only to conciliate at her introducing the worship of her native idols, but eventually to become himself a worshipper of them, and to use all the means at his command to maintain or introduce the God of Israel. The worship of the golden calves, which previously existed, was, however mistakenly, intended in honor of Jehovah; but this was an open alienation from him, and a turning aside to foreign and strange gods, which, indeed, were no gods (but see Via-ke, Ezech. Thes. i, 490). Most of the particulars of this bad but apparently highly-gifted woman’s conduct have been related in the notices of Ahab and Jezebel. From the course of her proceedings, it would appear that she grew to hate the Jewish system of law and religion on account of what must have seemed to her its intolerance and its anti-social tendencies. She hence sought to put it down by all the means she could command; and the immense power of her husband and son, Jezebel, was to maintain all the powers of the state subservient to her designs. The manner in which she acquired and used her power over Ahab is strikingly shown in the matter of Naboth, which, perhaps, more than all the other affairs in which she was engaged, brings out her true character and plays the major part in the subsequent events. B.C. cir. 897. When she found him piling, like a spoiled child, on account of the refusal of Naboth to gratify him by selling him his patrimonial vineyard for a “garden of herbs,” she taught him to look to, to rely upon her for the accomplishment of his wishes; and after he had departed, she disposed of his home, not with tears from savageness of temper, she scribbled not at murder under the abused-forms of law and religion (1 Kings xxi, 1-29). She had the reward of her unscrupulous decisiveness of character in the triumph of her policy in Israel, where, at last, there were but 700 who had not cursed her name to Baal, nor kissed their hand to his image. Nor was her success confined to Israel; for through Athaliah—a daughter after her own heart—who was married to the son and successor of Jehoshaphat, the same policy prevailed for a time in Judah, after Jezebel herself had perished and the name of Jezebel had been wiped out of the land. It seems that after the death of her husband, Jezebel maintained considerable ascendancy over her son Jehoram; and her measures and misconduct formed the principal charge which Jehu cast in the teeth of that unhappy monarch before he sent forth the arrow that slew him. The last line of her influence was to intimate Jehu as he passed the palace by watching him of the eventual rewards of even successful treason. It is eminently characteristic of the woman that, even in this terrible moment, when she knew that her son was slain, and must have felt that her power had departed, she displayed herself, not with rent veil and dishevelled hair, “but tired her head and painted her eyes” before she looked out at the window. The eunuchs, at a word from Jehu, having cast down her, she met her death beneath the wall at the doors of the chamber of the king此后,” her corpse should not be treated with disrespect, nothing was found of her but the palms of her hands and the soles of her feet: the dogs had eaten all the rest (1 Kings xvi, 31; xviii, 4, 13; xx, 5, 6; 2 Kings ix, 7, 22, 30-37).
