The name Jezebel appears annually (as in modern times) to have become proverbial for a wicked termigant (comp. 2 Kings ix, 22), and in this sense it is prob-illy used in Rev. ii, 20, where, instead of “that woman Jezebel” (Ῥωμανή Ἡζεβήλ), many editors prefer the reading “thy wife Jezebel” (Ῥωμανή της Ἡζεβήλ), i. e. of the bishop of the Church at Thyatira, who seems to have assumed the office of a public teacher, although herself as corrupt in doctrine as in practice. In this address to the representative of the Church she is called his wife, i. e. one for whose character and conduct, as being a member of the congregation over which she had charge, he was responsible, and whom he should have taken care that the Church had long since repudiated. Her proper name is probably withheld through motives of delicacy. We need not suppose that she was literally guilty of licentiousness, but only that she disseminated and acted upon such corrupt religious principles as made her resemble the idolatrious wife of Ahab in her public influence. (See Jablonski, Dìaz de Jezebel Thyatironor, pseudo-prophetiessa, Frankf. 1739; Stuart’s Comment. ad loc.) Others, however, maintain a more literal interpretation of the passage (see Clarke and Alford, ad loc.). See NICOLAI-TAN.

Jezelus (11765), the Grecized form (in the Apocrypha) of the name of two Jews whose sons are said to have returned from Babylon with Ezra; but a comparison with the Hebrew text seems to indicate an identity or else confusion.

1. (Vulgate Zecelus). The father of Secchanias, of "the sons of Jezelus" (1 Esdr. viii. 32); evidently the Jahanzi of Ezra viii. 5.

2. (Vulgate Jehelus). The father of Abadias, of "the sons of Job" (1 Esdr. viii. 35); evidently the Juehel of Ezra viii. 9.

Jezer (Heb. Yezer, יְצֶר, formation; Sept. Ἰασάυ, Ἰασάυ, but in Chron. Χασάον v. τ. Ἰασάω), the third named of the four sons of Naphthali (Gen. xlv. 24; Num. xxvi. 49; 1 Chron. vii. 13), and progenitor of the family of Jezelrites (Heb. Yīzīrî, יְצִירִי, Septuag. Ἰασάου, Num. xxvi. 49; see Ezek.). B.C. 1666.

Jezerite (Num. xxvi. 49). See Jezero.

Jezira (Heb. Yázīqáh, יָצִירָה, for יְצִירָה, sprinkled by Jehovah; or perhaps to be written יָצִירָיה; Yízqáyāh; for יְצִירָה, assembled by Jehovah, comp. Jezireh; Sept. 'Aţâna, Vultgat Jezina, an Israelite, one of the "sons of" Parosh, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra x. 25). B.C. 459.

Jezîli (some Jezîth) (Heb. Ye'tîlî, יֵתִלî, as in the margin, assembled by God; Sept. 'Aţâkāv v. τ. Ἰασάω, etc.; Vultg. Jezizâl, a son of Azmaveth, who, with his brother, was one of the Benjamite archers that reinforced David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 8). B.C. 1055.

Jezirah (יְצִירָה, יְצִירָה, Sêpher Ye'tiszôrîh), or the Book of Creation, is the name of one of the cabalistic books which, next to the Zohar, forms the principal source whence we derive our knowledge of Jewish mysticism. The age of the book it has thus far been impossible exactly to determine. Jewish tradition claims it to be of divine origin. It was intrusted to the Lord to Abraham, and he handed it down to Akiba (q. v.). Modern scholars have come to the conclusion that the Jezirah is the product of the Jewish schools in Egypt at the time of Phile Judeus. Dr. Zunz, however, assigns it to the Gnostic period, the 8th or 9th century. For the latter assertion there seems to us to be no good reason, and we are inclined to believe it was composed during the period of the first Maimanaists, i.e. between a century before and about eighty years after the birth of Christ (comp. Etheridge, Intro. to Heb. Lit. p. 300 sq.; Endlich, Hist. Philos. p. 465). See Carabia, vol. ii, p. 1. We thus see determining that the Hebrew of this work is of that dialectic kind used by the learned Jews at the time of the opening of the Christian era. Indeed, it is barely possible that the work itself was a collection of fragments of various earlier times: a kind of résumé of what had hitherto been determined on the occult subject of which it treats. The Jezirah treats of the Creation of the World, and is, in fact, an ancient effort of the human mind to discover the plan of the universe at large, and the law or band which unites its various parts into one harmonious whole. It opens its instructions with something of the tone and manner of the Bible, and announces that the universe bears upon itself the imprint of the name of God; so that, by means of the great panorama of the world, the mind may acquire a conception of the Deity, and from the unity which reigns in the creation, it may learn the oneness of the Creator. So far, so good. But now, instead of tracing in the universe the laws which determine the universe, the Jezirah seeks to ascertain from those laws the thoughts of the law-giver, "it is sought rather to arrive at the same end by finding some tangible analogy between the ideas which exist and the signs of thought, or by the means by which those thoughts are conveyed and interpreted among men; and recourse is had for this purpose to the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and to the first ten of the numbers" (compare Etheridge, p. 304 sq).

"The book of Jezirah begins by an enumeration of the thirty-two ways of wisdom (תִּשָּׁבֵעָה, or, in plainer terms, of the thirty-two attributes of the divine mind (כְּלֵי בֹּא), as they are demonstrated in the founding of the universe. The book shows why there are just thirty-two of these; by an analysis of this number it seeks to exhibit, in a peculiar method of theosophical arithmetic, how to speak (on the assumption that figures are the signs of existence and thought), the doctrine that God is the author of all things, the universe being a development of original entity, and existence being but thought become concrete; in short, that, instead of the heathenish or popular Jewish conception of the world as outward or coexistent with Deity, it is coeval in birth, having been brought out of nothing by God, thus establishing a pantheistic system of emanation, of which, principally because it is not anywhere designated by this name, one would think the writer was not himself quite conscious. The following sketch will illustrate the curious process of this argumentation: the sum of 32 is the sum of 10 (the number of digits) and 22 (the number of the letters of the Heb. alphabet), this latter being afterwards further resolved into 3 + 7 + 12. The first chapter treats of the former of these, or the deities, and its elements, which are designated as figures (קַבְּלָה, Sephiroth), in contradistinction from the letters (כֹּלְלֵי בֹּא, Hebrew alphabet). In the details of this hypothesis, the existence of divinity in the abstract is not ignored, though not formally denied; thus the number 1 is its spirit as an active principle, in which all worlds and beings are yet included: 2 is the spirit from this spirit, i.e. the active principle in so far as it has before decided on creating; 3 is water; 4 fire, these two being the ideal foundations of the material and spiritual worlds respectively; while the six remaining figures, 5 to 10, are regarded severally as the signs manual of height, depth, east, west, north, and south, forming the six sides of the cube, and representing the idea of form in its geometrical perfection.

"We see, however, that this alone establishes nothing real, but merely expounds the idea of possibility or actuality, at the same time establishing the virtualliser as existing in God, the foundation of all things. The actual entities are therefore introduced in the subsequent chapters under the 22 letters. The connexion between the two is here shown by the Hebrew name of Sephirah (number) is yet identical in voice and action with the spirit; but afterwards these elements, separating as creator and substance, together produce the world, the materials of which are represented by the letters, these, by their manifold combination forming the name and describe all that exists. Next, three letters are abstracted from the 22 as the three mothers (composing the mummotetic word בּטִסָּה, i.e. the universal relations of principle, contrary principle, and balance, or in nature—fire, water, and air; in the world—the heavens, the earth, the air; in the seasons—heat, cold, moisture; in humanity—the spirit, the body, the soul; in the body—the head, the feet, the trunk; in the moral organization—guilt, innocence, law, etc. These are followed by seven doubles (consisting of וּלְפָס, i.e. the relations of things which are subject to change (opposition without balance), e.g. life and death, happiness and misery, wisdom and insolvency, riches and poverty, beauty and ugliness, man and woman, service and slavery. But these seven, so far as the material world, namely, the six ends (sides) of the cube, and the palace of holiness in the middle (the immanent deity) which supports it; also the seven planets, the seven heavenly spheres, the seven days of the week, the seven parts of the body, the seven members of speech, the seven symbols of the soul (i.e. the eyes, ears, nose, mouth, etc.). This theory further has express reference to the fact that..."
from the combination of the letters results, with mathematical certainty and in a geometrical ratio, a quantity of words so great that the mind cannot enumerate them; thus, from two letters, two words; from three, six; from four, twenty-four, etc.; or, in other words, that the letters, whether spoken as results of breath, or written as elements of words, is the ideal foundation of all things. Finally, a town of twelve single letters (constituting the remainder of the alphabet) show the relations of things so far as they can be apprehended in a universal category. Their geometrical representative is the regular twelve-sided polygon, such as that of which the horizon consists, or the zodiac. In Jezreel also are the twelve symbols of the zodiac and the twelve months of the lunar year; in human beings, the twelve parts of the body and twelve faculties of the mind (these being very arbitrarily determined). They are so organized by God as to form at once a province and yet be ready for battle, i.e. they are as well fitted for harmonious as for contentious action.

The text of the Jezira is divided into six chapters, which are subdivided into sections. Its style is purely dogmatic, having the air and character of aphorisms, or theorems laid down with an absolute authority. The abstract character is, however, redeemed by a harmonious addition which relates the conversion of Abraham from Chaldean idolatry to pure theism, so treated as to render the work a kind of monologue of that patriarch on the natural world, as a monument or manifestation of the glory of the throne of God. The book was published with five commentaries (Mantius, 1652); with a Latin translation and notes by Rittagliani (Amst. 1642), and with a German translation and notes by Meyer (Leips. 1830); with ten commentaries (Warsaw, 1842, etc.). Jezreel (Heb. Yezerel, जेजशेल, once Jezreel, 2 Kings i, 10; sown by God; Sept. ישריאל, but sometimes Yisrē'ā'el, ישריאל or ישריאל; Josephus ישריאל, Ant. viii, 13, 6; יְשֶׁרֵיאָל, Ant. ix, 6, 4). The name of two places and of several men.

A town in the tribe of Issachar, (Josh. xix, 18), where the kings of Israel had a palace (2 Sam. ii, 8 sq.), and where the court often resided (1 Kings xviii, 45; xxii, 1; 2 Kings ix, 30), although Samaria was the metropolis of that kingdom. It is most frequently mentioned in the history of the house of Ahab. "In the neighborhood, or within the town probably, was a temple and grove of Astariste, with an establishment of 500 priests supported by Jezreel (1 Kings vi, 38; 2 Kings x, 11). The palace of Ahab (1 Kings xx, 1; xxvii, 46), probably containing his "ivory house" (1 Kings xxii, 50), was on the eastern side of the city, forming part of the city wall (comp. 1 Kings v, 1; 2 Kings vi, 25, 30, 33). The seraglio, in which Jezebel lived, was on the city wall, and had a high window facing eastward (2 Kings ix, 30). Close by, if not forming part of this seraglio (as Josephus supposed, Ant. ix, 5, 6), was a watch-tower, on which a sentinel stood, to give notice of arrivals from the disturbed district beyond the Jordan (2 Kings x, 17). This watch-tower, well-known as 'the tower in Jezreel,' may possibly have been the tower or migdal near which the Egyptian army was encamped in the battle between Necho and Josiah (Herod. ii, 159).

An ancient square tower which stands among the hovels of the modern village may be its representative. The gateway of the city on the east was also the gateway of the palace (2 Kings ii, 34). Immediately in front of the gateway, and under the city wall, was an open space, such as existed before the neighboring city of Bethshan (2 Sam. xxii, 12), and is usually found by the walls of Eastern cities, under the name of 'the mounds' (see Arabic Nāyjāt, passion), whence the dogs, the scavengers of the East, prowled in search of offal (2 Kings x, 25). See Jezreel. A little further east, but adjacent to the royal domain (1 Kings xxii, 1), was a smooth tract of land cleared out of the uneven valley (2 Kings ix, 25), which belonged to Naboth, a citizen of Jezreel. This tract, called by the Arabs El Nabud (or Nabud, 2 Kings xxii, 3); but the royal grounds were so near that it would have easily been turned into a garden of herbs for the royal use (1 Kings xxii, 2). Here Elijah met Ahab (1 Kings xxii, 17)" (Smith). Here was the vineyard of Naboth, which Ahab coveted to enlarge the palace-grounds (1 Kings xvii, 15, 46; 22), and here Jehu executed his dread full commission against the house of Ahab, when Jezebel, Jehoram, and all who were connected with that wretched dynasty perished (2 Kings ix, 14-37; x, 1-11). These horrid scenes appear to have given the kings of Israel a distaste for this residence, and it was not again mentioned in their history. It is, however, named by Hosea (i. 4; compare i, 11; ii, 29); and in Judith (i, 8; iv, 3; vii, 3) it occurs under the name of 'Eberdonon (Eberdon) near Dothaim. In the days of Eusebius and Jerome it was still a large village, which the God of Israel had blessed (see Legio, called Eberdonon (Eberdon, Osma). v. *Yse-poel, Jezreel); and in the same age it again occurs as Stradela (Str, Hieros, p. 586). Nothing more is heard of it till the time of the Crusades, when it was called by the Franks Parcum Geremia, and by the Arabs Zerin (an evident corruption of the old name), and it is described as commanding a wide prospect—on the east to the mountains of Gilboa, and on the west to Mount Carmel (Will. Tyr. xxii, 26). But this line of identification seems to have been afterwards lost sight of, and Jezreel came to be identified with Jenin. Indeed, the village of Zerin ceased to be mentioned by travellers after Turner, Buckingham, and others after them again brought it into notice; and it is still more lately that the identification of Zerin and Jezreel has been restored (Rau- mer, Pallatino, p. 156; Schubert, iii, 164; Elliot, ii, 379; Robinson, iii, 164).

Zerin is situated on the brow of a rocky and very steep descent into the great and fertile valley of Jezreel, which runs down between the mountains of Gilboa and Hermon. Lying comparatively high, it commands a wide and noble view, extending down the broad valley on the east as far as the Jordan (2 Kings ix, 17) to Beisan (Bethheban), and on the west quite across the great plain to the mountains of Carmel (1 Kings xviii, 46). It is described by Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii, 169) as a most magnificent site for a city, which, being itself a conspicuous object in every part, would naturally give its name to the whole of the old province. In the valley directly under Zerin is a considerable fountain, and another still larger somewhat further to the east, under the northern side of Gilboa, called Ain Jalud. There can, therefore, be little question that as in Zerin we have Jezreel, so in the valley and the fountain we have the "valley of Jez- reel" and the fountain of Jezreel. Jezreel's name is at present little more than twenty humble dwellings, mostly in ruins, and with few inhabitants. (See De Sauly, i, 79; ii, 306 sq.; Schwarz, p. 164; Thomson, ii, 180.)

The inhabitants of this city were called Jezreelites (Heb. Yezerelîth, יזראהלת, i.e. bloodshed), put for the murder perpetrated by Ahab and Jehe at this place (Hos. i, 4). See below.

JEZREEL, DAY OF ( יזראל, i.e. period), put for the predictioned time of the execution of vengeance for the atrocities they there committed (Hos. i, 5). See below.

JEZREEL, DITCH OF (יהזם, Septuag. ἐμπορικοῦ), was simply the fortification or intrenchments surrounding the city, outside of which Naboth was executed (1 Kings xxi, 23; comp. ver. 18). See Trench.

JEZREEL, FOUNTAIN OF (יהזם, always a perennial natural spring), a place where Saul encamped before the fatal battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxix, 1). Still in the same eastern direction from Zerin are two springs, one 12 minutes from the town, the other 20 minutes (Robinson, Bib. Res. iii, 167). This latter spring flows from under a sort of cavern in the wall of conglomerate rock, which here forms the base of Gilboa. The water is excellent; and issuing from crevices in the rock, it spreads out at once into a fine limpid pool 40 or 50 feet in diameter, full of fish (Robinson, iii, 168). This probably, both from its size and situation, is the one above referred to. It is also probably the same as the spring (A. V. "well") of "Haroed," where Gideon encamped before his night attack on the Midianites (Judg. vii, 1). (Possibly the nearer spring may distinctively have been called that of Jezerel, and the farther one that of Haroed.) The name of Haroed, "trembling," probably was taken from the "trembling" of Gideon's army (Judg. vii, 3). It was the scene of successive encampments of the Crusaders and Saracens, and was called by the Christians Tubaia, and by the Arabs Aru Ablalaid, "the spring of Goliath" (Robinson, Bib. Res. iii, 69). This last name, which it still bears, is derived from a tradition mentioned by the Beorodes Pilgrim; that was David killed Goliath. The tradition may be a confused reminiscence of many battles fought in its neighborhood (Ritter, Jordan, p. 416); or the word may be a corruption of "Gilead," supposing that to be the ancient name of Gilboa, and thus explaining Judg. vii, 3, "depart from Mount Gilead" (Schwarz, p. 384). See Gilead. According to Josephus (Ant. viii, 15, 4, 6), this spring, and the pool attached to it, was the spot where both and his sons were executed, where the dogs and swine licked up their blood and that of Ahab, and where the harlots bathed in the blood-stained water (Sept.). But the natural inference from the present text of 1 Kings xxiii, 58 makes the scene of these events to be the pool of Samaria. See Naboriah.

JEZREEL, PORTION OF ( torrents, merely signifies the field or country adjoining the city, where the crime of Ahab had been perpetrated, and where its retribution was to be exacted (2 Kings ix, 10, 21, 36, 37; comp. ver. 25, 26). Naboth was stoned to death outside the city of Jezreel (1 Kings xxi, 19), and the dogs licked up Ahab's blood, and were to be kissed by his chariot, before it was washed, near the pool of Samaria (1 Kings xxiii, 35, 38); hence Schwarz (Palest. p. 165, note) proposes to render the expression נטראים, "in the place where," occurring in the sentence of retaliation, 1 Kings xxi, 19, as signifying "in punishment for that," but this construction is not in accordance with the Heb. idiom (see Gesenius's Lex. s. v. נטראים), and the other incidents furnish a sufficiently exact fulfillment of the prediction (see Clarke's Comment. ad loc.).

JEZREEL, TOWER OF ( יזipmap, Sept. πύργος), was one of the turrets or bastions guarding the entrance to the city, and sentinelled as usual by a watchman (2 Kings ix, 17). See above.

JEZREEL, VALLEY OF ( יזしばらく, Josh. xvii, 16; Judg. vi, 38; Hos. i, 5). On the northern side of the city, between the parallel ridges of Tabor and Moreh (now called Jebel ed-Duby; see Mount), lies a rich valley (hence its name, God's seating-place), an offshoot of Esraelon, running down eastward to the Jordan. This was called the "Valley of Jezreel," and Bethshan, with the other towns in and around the valley, was originally inhabited by a fierce and warlike race who had "chariots of iron" (Josh. xvii, 16). The region fell chiefly to the lot of Isachar, but neither this tribe nor its more powerful neighbor Ephraim was able to drive out the seamless ancient people (xix, 18). The "valley of Jezreel" became the scene of one of the most signal victories ever achieved by the Israelites, and of one of the most melancholy defeats they ever sustained. In the time of the Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and "children of the East" crossed the Jordan, and "pitched in the valley of Jezreel," almost covering its green pastures with their tents, flocks, and herds (Judg. vi, 33 sq.). Gideon hastily summoned the warriors of Israel round his standard, and took up a position on the lower slopes of Gilboa, close to the "well of Haroel" (vii, 1; also called "the fountain of Jezerel"), about a mile east of the city. (See above.) See Gideon. Two centuries later the Philistines took up the identical position formerly occupied by the Midianites and the Israelites under Saul pitched on Gideon's old camping-ground by the "fountain of Jezreel" (1 Sam. xxix, 1-11). The Israelites were defeated, and Saul and Jonathan, with the flower of their troops, fell on the heights of Gilboa (xxxvi, 1-6). See Saul.

In later ages the valley of Jezreel seems to have extended its name to the whole of the wider plain of Edreton, which continued to be the scene of great military evolutions of Palestine. This latter is, indeed, the most extensive level in the Holy Land (v πλεγμα, μυσαν συμπλεγμα, 1 Mac. xii, 49; Josephus, Ant. xv, 1, 27; vii, 2, 3; xii, 8, 5; xv, 8, 5; War, iii, 8, 1; Life, 41; fully οπλα πλεγμα, μυτατις, Judea, Judith i, 8). It is the modern Mery Bn-Amir, by which the whole of the plain is known to the Arabs. It is also known in Scripture as the plain of Megiddo (2 Chron. xxxvi, 22; Zech. xii, 11), and the Armageddon of the Apocalypse (Rev. xvi, 16). It extends about thirty miles in length from east to west, and eighteen in breadth from north to south. It is bounded on the north by the mountains of Galilee, and on the south by those of Samaria: on the eastern part by Mount Tabor, the Little Hermon, and Gilboa; and on the west by Carmel, between which range and the mountains of Galilee is an outlet, whereby the river Kishon winds its way to the bay of Acre (see Robinson's Researches, iii, 160-162, 181, 227). Here, in the most fertile part of the land of Canaan (see Hassiquest, Trar. p. 176; Trolle, p. 545; Maundrell, p. 76; Schubert, iii, 165, 166), the tribe of Issachar rejoiced in their tents (Deut. xxxii, 16). In the first ages of Jewish history, as well as during the Roman Empire and the Crusades, and even in later times, this plain has been the scene of many a memorable contact (see Rob-
JIPHTIH-EL

Is Notion, Researches, xi, 223). The same plain was the scene of the conflict of the Israelites and the Syrians (1 Kings xx, 25-30). Here also Josiah, king of Judah, fought in disguise against Necho, king of Egypt, and fell by the arm of the Assyrians. Josephus often mentions this remarkable part of the Holy Land, and always (as above) under the appellation of the Great Plain; under the same name it is also spoken of by Eusebius and Jerome (in the Onomasticon). "It has been a chosen place for encampment," says Dr. E. Clarke, "in every contest from the days of Nahuchadonosor, king of the Assyrians, in the history of whose war with Araphiil (Judith i, 8) it is mentioned as the great plain of Esdraelon, until the disastrous march of the late Napoleon Bonaparte from Egypt into Syria. Jews, Gentiles, Saracens, Christian Crusaders, Egyptians, Persians, Druses, Turks, Arabs, and French, warriors out of every nation which is under heaven, have pitched their tents in the plain of Esdraelon, and have beheld the various banners of their nation met with the dew of Tabor and of Hermon." (For other notices of this place, see De Saulcy's Narratives, ii, 306-311.) This noble plain, like the greater portion of all the rich plains of Palestine and Syria, is in the hands of the government, and is only partially cultivated; the soil is deep, of a dark red color, inclined to clayey, and cannot be surpassed in natural fertility (see Reland, Palest. p. 386 sq.; Hameauel, i, 416 sq.). See Esdraelon.

The towns of the mountains of Judah are mentioned between Juthlah and Jokdeam (Josh. xv, 50), situated (according to the associated names) in the district south-east of Hebron, on the edge of the desert of Judah. It is possibly identical with the modern ruined site Zurrat, which lies in a fertile region (Robinson, Researches, ii, 201), as the name Jezreel implies. See Nu, 3. It was probably this place (1 Sam. xxv, 43) from which came Abihai, of the son of Tola, the son of Issachar, a valiant chief, apparently of the time of David (1 Chron. vii, 2). B.C. cir. 1017.

Jid'lash (Hebrew Yidolah, לMembership, teetar; Sept. Ἰδώρα, the seventh named of the eight sons of Nahor (Abraham's brother) by Milcah (Gen. xxii, 22). B.C. cir. 690.

Jin'na (Numb. xxvi, 44). Jimnath (Gen. xlvii, 17). Jim'nite (Numb. xxvi, 44). See IMHAL.

Jip'hath (Heb. Yiphthach, רטפשת, the same name as Jepthah; Sept. Ἰπθαη, a town in the "lowland" district of Judah, mentioned between Ashan and Ashnah (Josh. xv, 48), and lying in the southern mediaeval group west of Hebron and east of Klethopolis. See JUDAH. Some (e. g. Keil, ad loc.) have located it in the mountains of Judah, or in the text; but, although the import of the name implies a "defile" adjoining, and the associated names are indicative of naturally strong positions, yet the "plain" or Shephelah (q. v.) here actually comes quite far in this direction to the proper "hill country" (Robinson, Researches, iii, 19).

We may therefore reserve a location for Jipthath at the ruined village Jimrin, where a smaller valley runs up south from wady el-Melek (Robinson, ii, 342, note; Van de Velde's Map, ed. 1864).

Jip'thah-el (Heb. Yiphthach-el, תיותחלא, opening of God; Sept. [Taw'] Ἰπθαη, a valley at the intersection of the line between Asher and Naphtali with the northerly boundary of Zebalon (Josh. xiv, 14, 57). Dr. Robinson, with great probability, suggests (new ed. of Researches, iii, 105, 107) that the name is represented by that of Jotapata (Iotapata), the renowned fortress of Galilee mentioned by Josephus as having been fortified by himself (War, ii, 20, 6; Life, 57), and then as the head of the mountain country of the Galileans, under the continued assaults of Vespasian, and where he was at last taken prisoner after the downfall of the place (War, iii, 7, 3-36). He describes it as surrounded by a precipice, except on the north, where the city extended out upon the sloping extremity of the opposite mountains, and deep valleys extending towards the other sides. It was overlooked by surrounding mountains. It contained no fountains, but only cisterns, with caverns and subterranean recesses.
Reland had already remarked (Palaest., p. 816, 667) that the Gopatanta of the Talmudic writings, three miles from Sepphoris, was probably identical with this place. It is doubtless the modern Jefat, which lies four or five English miles from Sefuriah. It was first visited and identified by Schultz (Ritter, Erdk. xvi, 703 sq.). The ancient city is said to have been built in six days, and the modern village situated on the hill overlooking the town and the valley below it.

2. The valley in which the town is situated is the same as that mentioned in the Book of Joshua (Josh. xix, 27), where it is called Jiftach (Josh. xix, 27). The town is situated on the edge of the long valley [rather plain] of Tarum, which would be identified with the "valley of Jiftahthek" (xii, 122); but this, on the other hand, lies even more to the east (Robinson, Mimrammon). The town is doubtless called Judah within Zebulon (1 Chron. vi, 77). The title (Jud. v, 18) means, and not מְדִינָה, is called a "city watered by a brook." See Gesenius, Lexic., s. v.) properly designates this fine pass (because the superlative name, God's Jiftah, which connects the rich plain el-Batataf on the east with the yet more fertile plain of Acre on the west, and is described by the Scottish deputation as "inclosed within hills; sometimes it0wes almost to the strangeness of a defile. . . . The valley is long, and declines very gently towards the west; the hills on either side are often finely wooded, sometimes rocky and picturesque. The road is one of the best in Palestine, and was no doubt much frequented in ancient days" (Robinson, The Land and the Book, 2:62). There seems to be an identification of the etymological force of the name (q.v., the opening out of a gorge into a plain) in the statement (Josh. xix, 14), "And the outgoings thereof are in the valley of Jiftahthek" (comp. Deut. xxxiii, 18, "And of Zebulon he said, rejoice, Zebulon, in thy going out").

Joab (Heb. Yoab, יֹאָב, "Jehovah is his father; Sept. Ιωαβ, but יוחב in 1 Chron. ii, 16), the name of the Ataroth-Adar.

1. The son of Seraiah (son of Kenaz, the tribe of Judah), and progenitor of the inhabitants of Charsashim or craftsmen (1 Chron. iv, 15). B.C. 1657.

2. One of the three sons of Zeruiah, the sister of David (2 Sam. vii, 16; xx, 33), and "captain of the host" (generalissimo of the army) during nearly the whole of David's reign (2 Sam. ii, 18; x, 1; xi, 1; 1 Kings xi, 15; 2 Sam. xvii, 3). It is a little remarkable that he is designated by his maternal parentage only, his father's name being nowhere mentioned in the Scriptures. Josephus (Wars i, 202), indeed, gives (4. v. vii, 13) the father's name as Sareh (Zorah), but this may be merely a repetition of the preceding Sarehiah (Zorohai). Perhaps he was a foreigner. He is said to have resided at Bethlehem, and to have died before his sons, as we find mention of his sepulchre at that place (2 Sam. ii, 32).

Joab first appears associated with his two brothers, Abishai and Asaiah, in the command of David's troops against Abner, who had set up the claims of a son of Saul in opposition to those of David, then reigning in Hebron. The arms having met at the pool of Gibeon, a general action was brought on, in which Abner was worsted, B.C. 1053. See Gimel. In his flight he had the misfortune to kill Joab's brother, the swift-footed Asaiah, by whom he was pursued (2 Sam. ii, 13-32). See Abner: Asaiah. Joab smothered for a time his resentment against the shedding of his brother's blood; but, being whetted by the natural rivalry of position between him and Abner, he afterwards made it the excuse of his policy by treacherously, in the act of friendly communication, slaying Abner, at the very time when he had the latter to thank for what he had then turned, had rendered him a most dangerous rival to him in power and influence (2 Sam. iii, 27-27).

That Abner had at first suspected that Joab would take the position of blood-avenger [see Blood-revenge] is clear from the apprehension which he expressed (2 Sam. ii, 23). Joab, however, thought that under the circumstances, abandoned this position, is shown by the unsuspecting readiness with which he went aside with him (2 Sam. iii, 26, 27); and that Joab placed his murderous act on the footing of vengeance for his brother's blood is plainly stated in 2 Sam. iii, 30; by which he also appa'own, Nahath, a brother (2 Sam. xxiii, 37; 1 Chron. xi, 39), and ten attendants to carry his equipment and baggage (2 Sam. xvii, 15). He had the charge, formerly belonging to the king or judge, of giving the signal by trumpet for advance or retreat (2 Sam. xvii, 16). He was called by the almost regal title of "lord" (2 Sam. xi, 11), "the protection of the king's army" (1 Chron. xxvii, 34). His usual residence (except when campaigning) was in Jerusalem, but he had a house and property, with barley-fields adjoining, in the country (2 Sam. xiv, 50), in the "wilderness" (1 Kings xii, 15), or he camped on the north of the city (compare 1 Sam. xiii, 18; 2 Sam. viii, 15, 29), and near an ancient sanctuary, called from its nomadic village "Baalahazar" (2 Sam. xviii, 23; compare with xiv, 30), where there were extensive sheepswalks. It is possible that this "house of Joab" may have given its name to the Ataroth Beth-Joab (1 Chron. vii, 54), to distinguish it from the Ataroth-Adar. His great military achievements, which he conducted in person, may be divided into three campaigns: (a) The first was against the allied forces of Syria and Amnon. He attacked and defeated the Syrians, while his brother Abishai did the same on the opposite side. The two armies met on the plains of Zepa, kindred tribes from beyond the Euphrates, and were finally routed by David himself. See Hadarezer. (b) The second was against Edom. The decisive victory was gained by David himself in the "valley of salt" and Edom. He celebrated the victory by a public sacrifice at the temple, and was accompanied by his fathers, and that Joab, the captain of the host, was dead," did he venture to return to his own country (2 Sam. xi, 21, 22). (c) The third was against the Ammonites.
They were again left to Job (2 Sam. x, 7-19). He went against them at the beginning of the next year, "at the time when kings go out to battle"—to the siege, of Rabbah. The ark was sent with him, and the whole assembly encamped in booths for five round the beleaguered city (2 Sam. xi, 1, 11). After a sortie of the inhabitants, which caused some loss to the Jewish army, Job took the lower city on the river, and then, with true royalty, sent to urge David to come and take the city. This plea they should pass from the king to his general (2 Sam. xii, 26-28).

It is not necessary to trace in detail the later acts of Job, seeing that they are in fact part of the public record of the king he served. See David. He served him faithfully, both in political and private relations; for, although he knew his power over David, and often treated him with little ceremony, there can be no doubt that he was most truly devoted to his interests. But Job had no principles apart from what he deemed his duty to the king and the people, and was quite as ready to serve his master's vices as his virtues, so long as they did not interfere with his own interests, or tended to promote them by enabling him to make himself useful to the king. (See Niemeyer, Charak. iv. 458 sq.) His ready apprehension of the king's meaning in the matter of Uriah, and the facility with which he made himself the instrument of the murder, and of the hypocrisy by which it was covered, show how deep a stain upon his character as his own murderers (2 Sam. xi, 14-25), B.C. 1035. As Job was on good terms with Absalom, and had taken pains to bring about a reconciliation between him and his father, we may set the higher value upon his firm adherence to David. As Absalom revolted, and upon his stern sense of duty to the king—from whom he expected no thanks—displayed in putting an end to the war by the slaughter of his favorite son, when all others shrank from the responsibility of doing the king a service against his own will (2 Sam. xv, 7-37), B.C. 1023. In like manner David, unhappily resolved to number the people, Job disapproved the evil and renounced against it, and although he did not venture to disobey, he performed the duty tardily and reluctantly, to afford the king an opportunity of reconsidering the matter, and took no pains to conceal how edifying the measure was to him (2 Sam. xxiv). David was certainly ungrateful for the services of Job when, in order to conciliate the powerful party which had supported Absalom, he offered the command of the host to Amasa, who had commanded the army of Absalom (2 Sam. xix, 18). But the inefficacy of the new command and the prestige which the revolt of Bichri's son produced, arising perhaps from the reluctance of the troops to follow their new leader, gave Job an opportunity of displaying his superior resources, and also of removing his rival by a murder very similar to that of Abner, and in some respects less excusable and more foul. See Amasa. Besides, Amasa was his own cousin, being the son of his mother's sister (2 Sam. xx, 1-18). B.C. cir. 1022.

When David lay apparently on his death-bed, and a demonstration was made in favor of the succession of the young Solomon, the king was highly displeased with the preference of the young Solomon, and joined the party of the former. B.C. cir. 1015. It would be unjust to regard this as a defection from David. It was nothing more or less than a demonstration in favor of the natural heir, which, if not then recognized, at least could not have been compromised by the preference of the young Solomon, Joab joined the party of the former. B.C. cir. 1015. It would be unjust to regard this as a defection from David. It was nothing more or less than a demonstration in favor of the natural heir, which, if not then recognized, at least could not have been compromised by the preference of the young Solomon. contentions in his day for temporal power might ultimately result, as they eventually did, in the assumption of "spiritual things which do not belong to him." "Joachim's doctrines, however, are somewhat peculiar. His fundamental argument is that the Christian era closed with the year 1290, when a new era would commence under another dispensation. Thus the three persons of the Godhead divided the government of ages among them: the reign of the Father embraced the period from the world to the coming of Christ; that of the Son, the twelve centuries and a half ending in 1290, and then would commence the reign of the Holy Spirit. This change would be marked by a progress similar to that which followed the substitution of the new for the old dispensation. Thus man, after having been break under the Father, half carnal and half spiritual under the Son, would, under the Holy Ghost, become exclusively spiritual. So there have been three stages of development in society, in which the supremacy belonged successively to warriors, the secular clergy, and monks (comp. Neander, Church History, iv, 229 sq.)."

As Joachim found the third later Catholic Council, at the request of Alexander III, condemned Joachim's "mythical extravagances;" Alexander IV was still more severe in opposition to Joachim; and in 1290 the Council at Aries finally pronounced all followers of Joachim heretics. Joachim's ideas were chiefly presented in the form of meditations on the N.T. He strongly opposed the scholastic theology, which aimed at establishing the principles of faith dialectically, and also the manner in which Peter Lombard explained the doctrine of the Trinity. Towards the middle of the 15th century these views had gained a large number of adherents. Among the many works attributed to Joachim some are undoubtedly spurious, while others have probably been subjected to additions, etc., in consequence of his popularity (compare Neander, iv, 221, note). The Expositio super Apostolicam (Venice, 1517, 4to, often reprinted), Commentarius de Novi Testamento (Venice, 1519, 8vo), and the Pauserium deorum Chordurum appear to be genuine. Among the others bearing his name are commentaries on Jeremiah, the Psalms, Isaiah, parts of Nahum, Habakkuk, Zechariah, and Malachi; also a number of prophecies concerning the popes, and predicting the ruin of the patriarchates. All these were published at Venice (1519-1524) and Cologne (1577). His life was written by Gregory di Lauro (Naples, 1669, 4to). Among the MS. works attributed to him, Prophecies et Expositiones Sibyllarum; Exercitaciones et Libri Joachiini de terris, sie, et fururn, de pseudo-Christianis; Prophecies de Oinobio Priscovianum; Epistola Joachiini de suis Prophecies; and Revelations, are to be found in the public libraries of Paris. Joachim I and II. See Reformation (German).

Joachimites. See Joachim of Floris.

Jo'achim (Iōāchīm), another Grecized form of the Heb. name Joachim, applied in the Apocalypse to:

1. The son of Josiah, king of Judah (1 Esdr. i, 37, 38, 39)
2. By corruption for Jehoiachin, the next king of Judah (1 Esdr. i, 43).

3. A son of Zerubbabel, who returned to Jerusalem after the exile (1 Esdr. vi, 5, 9), apparently a mistake for Zerubabel himself.

4. "The historian which was in Jerusalem" (Judith, iv, 6, 14) in the time of Judith, and who welcomed the heroine after the death of Holophernes, in company with "the ancients of the children of Israel" (y γενεσία τῶν ἡλικίων Ἰσραήλ, xv, 8 sq.). The name occurs with the various reading Elijah, but it is impossible to identify him with any historical character. No such name occurs in the lists of high-priests in 1 Chron. vi (compare Josephus, Ant. x, 6, 6); and it is a mere arbitrary conjecture to suppose that Elijah, mentioned in 2 Kings xviii, 18, was afterwards raised to that dignity.

Still less can be said for the identification of Joachim with Hilkiah (2 Kings xxiii, 4; Josephus, Ant. x, 4, 2; 2 Pet. xiii, 1). The name itself is inappropriate to the position which the high-priest occupies in a story of Judith ("The Lord hath set up"), and the person must be regarded as a necessary part of the fiction. See Judith.

5. The husband of Susanna (Sus. 1 sq.). The name seems to have been chosen, as in the former case, with a reference to its meaning; and it was probably for the same reason that the husband of Anna, the mother of the Virgin, is called Joachim in early legends (Proor. Jaci, i, etc.). See Susanna.

J o'iānūs (Ἰωάννους, Vulg. Joanneus), one of the priests, "sons of Jesus, the son of Joas, and his brethren," who married foreign wives after the exile (1 Esdr. ix, 19): apparently the same as Jedidiah in the corresponding Hebrew text (Ezra x, 18) by a corruption (see Bähring, Genealogies, i, 167).

Jo'lah (Heb. Ḥodh, Ἰαπῆς, Jerohah is his brother, i.e. helper), the name of four men:

1. (Sept. Isaa v. r. Ḥodh, Vulg. Joana). The third son of Obed-edom (v. v.), appointed with his brethren to the charge of the sacred furniture (1 Chron. xxviii, 4).

2. (Sept. Izaiā v. r. Ḥodēth, Isaa, Ḥodēth; but in 2 Chron. first occurrence Izaiā v. r. Ḥodētēr, second Izaiā, Vulg. Joah). A Levite of the family of Gershom, the son of Zimmah and father of Eldo (1 Chron. vi, 21); apparently the same elsewhere called Eldo (Isaiah ver. 42). He is probably the same as the person who, with his son Eden, aided Hezekiah in his efforts at a religious reformation (2 Chron. xxxii, 12).

3. (Sept. Isaa, in Isa. Isaa, Vulg. Joach). Son of Assaph and historiographer of king Hezekiah, who was one of the messengers that received the insulting message of Rabshakeh (2 Kings xviii, 18, 26, 37; Isa. xxxvi, 8, 11, 22). C. 712.

4. (Sept. Isaiā v. r. Isaa, Vulg. John; Josephus, Ant. xiv, 4, 1). Son of Joasah and historiographer of king Josiah; he was one of the officers that superintended the repairs of the Temple (2 Chron. xxxiv, 8). C. 623.

Jo'nah (Heb. Ḥoḏaḥ, Ἰαννάς, a contracted form of the name Jehoahaz, for which it occurs in speaking of others of the same name; Sept. Izaiā, Vulg. Junah, the father of Joah, which latter was also the father in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxix, 8). C. 623.

Joan (papae), is the name of a fictitious female who was supposed to have occupied the chair of St. Peter, as John VIII, between the popes Leo IV and Benedict III, about 853-855. This personage is first said to have been a nun of Ravenna, then as a Roman knight, then as a knight of Scutum, a monk of the abbey of Fulda, who died at Menz in 1086, and who says in his chronicle (which many authorities declare to be spurious), under the year 853, the thirteenth year of the reign of the emperor Lothair, that Leo IV died on the 1st of August, and that this nun, supposed to have died two years, five months, and four days, after which Benedict III was made pope. But Anastasia, who lived at the time of the supposed pope Joan, and who wrote the lives of the popes down to Nicholas I, who succeeded Benedict III, says that fifteen days after Leo IV's death Benedict III succeeded him. Further, Hincmar of Rheims, a contemporary, in his twenty-sixth letter to Nicholas I, states that Benedict III succeeded Leo IV immediately. It is proved, moreover, by the unquestional evidence of a diploma still preserved, and of a contemporary coin which Garampi has published, that Benedict III was actually reigning before the death of the emperor Lothaire, which occurred towards the close of 855. It is true that some MS. copies of Anastasius, asserting them briefly and authoritatively, mention the story of Joan; but this has been ascertained to be an interpolation of later copyists, who have inserted the tale in the very words of Martinus Polonus, a Cistercian monk and confessor to Gregory X (latter part of the 12th century), who wrote the Lives of the Popes, in which, after speaking of the nomination of Joan during an English crusade, and then adds, "Hic, ut asseritur, femina fuit." Other authorities for this story are Siegbert of Gembloux († 1113) and Stephen de Bourbon, who wrote about 1225.

According to these accounts, she was the daughter of an English missionary, was born at Mayence or Ingelheim, and was a woman of very loose morals. She is said to have removed to Fulda, and having there established an improper intimacy with a monk of the convent, assumed male attire, entered the convent, and afterwards eloped with her paramour, who was a very learned man, to Athens, where she applied herself to the study of Greek, as well as to the sciences under the able directions. After the death of her companion she went to Rome, where she became equally proficient in sacred learning, for which her reputation became so great, under the assumed name of Johannes Anglicana, that she easily obtained holy orders, and, with such ability and adroitness as she displayed in the studies of the church, she was unanimously elected as his successor, under the general benefit of her male sex.

Continuing to indulge in sexual intercourse, the fraud was finally discovered, to the infinite mortification of the Roman Church, by her sudden delivery of an infant in the public streets, near the Colosseum, while heading a religious procession to the Lateran Basilica. The mother and child died soon after, and were buried in 856. This event is said to have caused the adoption of the Stella tercoraria, which was in use from the middle of the 11th century to the time of Leo V, for the purpose of proving the sex of the popes elect.

The story was generally credited from the latter part of the 11th until the opening of the 16th century. All Church historians after Martinus generally copied it from him, and presented it as an authentic narrative. The succeeding popes were not disposed to be diligent in the religious duties of their office (1421-1481), who, although repeating it in his Lives of the Popes, concludes with these words: "The things I have above stated are current in vulgar reports, but are taken from uncertain and obscure authorities, and I have inserted them here simply not to be taxed with obstinacy." Panvinius, Platina's compiler, seems to have been more critical: he subjoins a very elaborate note, in which he shows the absurdity of the tale, and proves it to have been an invention. Later Roman Catholic writers, seeing the arguments which their opponents in doctrine obtained from this story against papal succession, took great pains to impeach its accuracy; but it is truly curious that the best dissertation on the subject is that of David Blondel, a Protestant, who completely refutes the story in his Familiar Exercitatum de la question et si une Feme a été assise au Siège Papal entre Leo IV de Gratian (A viérandins 1493). He was followed on the same side by Letibitz [Flores sparri in tumulm Papiase, in [Chr. L. Scheidt] Biblith. Hist, [Götting, 1758], i, 297 sq.], and, although attempts have been made from time to time by a few writers to maintain the tale (among which one of the most noted was a Mr. Hume), the considerable number of moderns, entitled A Present for a Papist, or the History of the Life of Pope Joan, proving that a Woman called Joan really was Pope of Rome), it has been all but universally discredited, its latest patron being professor Kist, of Leyden, who, but a few years since devoted an elaborate essay (Vorhersendung der Frauen Joanne) to the subject. Nearly all ecclesiastical writers of our day seem to be agreed that no feminine character ever filled the papal chair, and it is certainly a variety of opinions as to the causes which provoked the story. Some attribute it to a misconception of the object of the Stella tercoraria; the canons excluded eunuchs from the papal throne, some held that the Canons contrived to prove that the person elected fulfilled the requirements of the canons. Others consider it as a symbolical satire. Still others look upon it as a lampoon on the indecency of the pope, John VIII; or, and perhaps more correctly, as a satire on the female regent (under Mamluk rule) during the pontificate of John X. JOAN 924 JOASH told by a Burgundian officer to the English for the sum of 16,000 francs. Being conveyed to Rouen, the head-quarters of the English, she was brought before the spiritual tribunal of the bishop of Beauvais as a sorceress and heretic; and after a long trial, accompanied with cruel tortures of which per[.]turbation of the most astounding is the fact that her own countrymen, and the most learned of these, representing the University of Paris, pronounced her under the influence of witchcraft. By their advice, she was condemned to be burned to death. Recanting her alleged errors, her punishment was converted into perpetual imprisonment. But the English feared her, and determined at all hazards to sacrifice her life, and they finally succeeded in renewing the trial; words which fell from her when subjected to great indignities, and her resumption of male attire when all articles of female dress were cruelly removed from her, were made grounds of concluding that she had relapsed, and she was brought to the stake May 30, 1431, and burned, and her ashes cast into the Seine. Her family, who had been ennobled on her account, obtained in 1440 a revival of her trial, and in 1456 she was formally pronounced by the highest secular and ecclesiastical authorities to have been innocent. The doubts respecting the fate of Joan d'Arc raised by M. Delapierre in his Doute historique (1850), who is inclined to think that she never suffered martyrdom, and that another person was executed in her stead, seem to have been good grounds.

JOAN OF KENT (JOAN BOCHER), a female character who flourished in the first half of the 16th century, and who was condemned to death as a heretic, April 25, 1552, for holding the doctrine that “Christ was not truly incarnate of the Virgin, whose flesh, being sinful, he could not partake of; but the Word, by the consent of the inward man in the Virgin, took flesh of her.” This scholastic nicety appalled all the grandees of the English Church, including even Cranmer, who, finding the king slow to approve the condemnation of Joan of Kent, presented to the sovereign the practice of the Jewish Church in stoning blasphemers as a counterpart of the duty of the head of the English Church, and secured the king’s approval for the execution of the poor woman, who “could not reconcile the spotless purity of Christ’s human nature with his receiving flesh from a sinful creature.” See: Neal, Puritans, i, 49; Strype, Memorials of the Reformations, i, 314.

JOICHAN (Yosanim v. r. lyuwi), a Gracized form (1 Esdr. xix, 1) of the name of JOHANAN (q. v.), the son of Eliashib (Ezra x, 6).

JOANES (or JUANES), VICENTE, a celebrated Spanish painter whose subjects are exclusively religious, was born at Fuerte la Higuera, in Valencia, in 1528. He studied in Italy, and, as we may infer from his style, chiefly the works of the Roman school, and died Dec. 21, 1579, while engaged in finishing the altar-piece of the church of Bocairent. His body was removed to Valencia, and deposited in the church of Santa Cruz in 1581. Joanes was one of the best of the Spanish painters: he is acknowledged as the head of the school of Valencia, and is sometimes termed the Spanish Raphael. His drawing is correct, and displays many successful examples of foreshortening; his draperies are well cast, his coloring is sombre (he was particularly fond of mulberry color), and his expression is mostly in perfect accordance with his subject, which is generally devotion or impassioned resignation, as in the “Baptism of Christ” in the cathedral of Valencia. Like his countrymen Vargas and D’Amato of Naples, he is said to have always taken the sacrament before he commenced an altar-piece. His best works are in the cathedral of Valencia, and there are several good specimens in the Prado at Madrid.

JOIANA, the name of a man (prop. JOANAN) and also of a woman in the New Testament.

2. (Jowin, i. q. Jowin, JOHN) the eldest brother of Judas Maccabees (1 Macc. ii, 3); elsewhere called JOHN (q. v.).

JOANES. See JOHN.

Jô-arib (Iowsip, r. Iosip), a Gracized form (1 Macc. ii, 1) of the name of the priest JEHOARIB (1 Chron. xxiv, 7).

Jô-ahâb (Heb. Yôdsah), the name of several persons, written in two forms in the original.

1. (Yôdsâh), a contracuted form of JEHOASH; Septuag. Yods. The father of Gideon, buried in Ophrah, where he had lived (Judg. vi, 11, 29; viii, 14; viii, 13, 29, 32). Although himself probably an idolater, he ingeniously screened his son from the popular indignation in overthrowing the altar of Baal (Judg. vii, 30, 31). B.C. 1062. See GIDEON.

2. (Yôdsâh or Yôdas), a form as preceding; Sept. Iosip, r. Iow. A son of Shemash or Haemath the Gibeathite, and second only to his brother Ahiezer among the brave Benjaminite archers that joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 3). B.C. 1055.

(Jô-âdâh), a name as preceding; Sept. Iow. One of the descendants of Shalum, son of Judah, mentioned among those who were in some way distinguished among the Moabites in early times (1 Chron. iv, 22). B.C. perh. cir. 995. See JANHUB-LEHIRN. “The Hebrew tradition, quoted by Jerome (Quast. Hebr. in Paral.) and Jarchi (Comm. ad loc.), applies it to Mahlon, the son of Eleazar, who married a Moabitess. The expression rendered in the A.V., ‘who had the dominion of Moab,’ would, according to this interpretation, signify ‘who married in Moab.’ The same explanation is given in the Targum of R. Joseph.”

(Jô-âdôh or adôh), a name as preceding; Sept. Iow. An eminent officer of king Ahab, to whose close custody the prophet Micahiah was remanded for denouncing the allied expedition against Ramoth-Gilead (1 Kings xxii, 20; 2 Chron. xxvii, 25). B.C. 896. He is style “the king’s son,” which is usually taken literally, Thesius (Comment. ad loc, in Kings) suggesting that he may have been placed with the governor of the city for military education. Geiger conjectures that Maaseiah, “the king’s son,” in 2 Chron. xxviii, 7, was a prince of the Maccabean family, and that Joash was a priest of the same (Urschatz, p. 307). The title, however, may merely indicate a youth of princely stock.

(Jô-âdôh or Iow), a name as preceding; Sept. Iow. King of Israel (2 Kings xiii, 9, 12, 14, 25; xiv, 1, 23, 27: 2 Chron. xxxv, 17, 18, 21, 23: Hosea i, 1; Amos i, 1). See JEHOSHAH, II.

7. (Yôdsâh, to whom Jehoram ascends, i.e. for sist. See Iow), One of the sons of Becher, son of Benjamin, a chief of his family (1 Chron. vii, 8). B.C. prob. cir. 1017.
JOATHAM

B. (Same form as last; Septuag. Ιωαθαϊ.) The person having charge of the royal stores of oil under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 28). B.C. 1014.

Jo’ātham (Matt. i, 19). See Jotham.

Jo’zāb’dus (יוֹזָבָדֵו v. r. יְוֹזָבָדֵו), a Graceful form (1 Esdr. ix, 48) of the name of Jozabad (q. v.), the Levite (Neh. viii, 7).

Jo’zār (יוֹזָר, יְוֹזָר, i. e. Jocor), a son of Boaz, and an ancestor of the high-priest Matthias (q. v.), whom he succeeded in the pontifical office by the arbitrary act of Herod the Great on the day preceding an eclipse of the moon (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 6, 4), which occurred March 18, B.C. 4. He was deprived of the office by Cyrenius (although he had aided that officer in enforcing taxes there) in B.C. 11 (Ant. xvi, 8, 1, 2). He was afterwards killed in the battle of Actium (ib. xvii, 2, 1), i. e. A.D. 7-8. It appears, however, that he had been temporarily removed (A.D. 4) by Archelaus during the short term of his brother Eleazar, and then of Jesus, the son of Sie (ib. xvii, 13, 1), and restored by popular acclamation (ib. xviii, 2, 1). See High-priest.

Job, the name of two persons, of different dimensions in the original.

1. (倭, יְבֹרֵס, persecuted; Sept. and N. T. Ἰαβρός). An Arabian patriarch and hero of the book that bears his name; mentioned elsewhere only in Ezek. xiv, 14, 20; Zeb. v, 11. The various theological, moral, and philosophical consequences connected with his history are involved in the discussions of the book itself, and we therefore treat them in considerable detail in that connection, aside from their critical bearings.

I. Analysis of Contents. I. The Introduction (i, 1-11), supplies all the facts on which the argument is based. Job, a chieftain in the land of Uz (apparently a district of Northern Arabia—see Uz), of immense wealth and high rank, is represented to us as a man of perfect integrity, and blameless in all the relations of life. The highest goodness and the most perfect temporal happiness are combined in his person; under the protection of God, surrounded by a numerous family, he enjoys in advanced life (from xiii, 16 it has been inferred that he was about seventy years old at this time), an almost paradoxical state, exemplifying the normal results of human obedience to the will of a righteous God.

The question, however, could be raised by envy: May not the goodness which secures such direct and tangible rewards be a refined form of selfishness? In the world of spirits, where all the mysteries of existence are brought to light, Satan, the accusing angel, suggests this doubt, and boldly asserts that if those external blessings be taken away, the test will show whether Job’s allegiance to the Law is genuine. The question thus distinctly propounded is obviously of infinite importance, and could only be answered by inflicting upon a man, in whom, while prosperous, malice itself could detect no evil, the calamities which are the due, and were then believed to be invariably the result of wickedness. The accuser receives permission to make the trial. He destroys Job’s property, then his children; and afterwards, to leave no possible opening for a cavil, is allowed to inflict upon him the most terrible disease known in the East. See Job’s Disease.

Each of these calamities assumes a form which produces an impression that it must be a visitation from God, precisely such as was to be expected, supposing that the patriarch had been a successful hypocrite, reserved for the day of wrath. Job’s wife breaks down entirely under the trial—in the very words of the text she “excited the patriarch himself would at last utter in his despair, she laments ‘to curse God and die.’ (The Sept. has a remarkable addition to her speech at ii, 9, severely reproaching him as the cause of her bereavements.) Job remains steadfast.

The destruction of his property draws not from him a word of complaint; the death of his children elicits the sublimest words of resignation with ever falling from the lips of a mourner—the disease which made him an object of loathing to man, and seemed to designate him as a visible example of divine wrath, is borne without a murmur; he repels his wife’s suggestion with the simple words, ‘What! shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil?’ “In all this Job did not sin, nor curse his God.”

2. The Controversy (ii, 11—xxxii, 40).—Still it is clear that, had the poem ended here, many points of deep interest would have been left in obscurity. Entire as was the submission of Job, he must have been inwardly perplexed by events to which he had no clee, which were quite foreign to any but divine intervention, and which, so far as they were entertained, and seemed repugnant to the ideas of justice engraved on man’s heart. It was also most desirable that the impressions made upon the majority of men by sudden and unaccountable calamities should be thoroughly discussed, and that a broader and firmer basis than heretofore should be found for speculations concerning the providential government of the world.

An opportunity for such discussion is afforded in the most natural manner by the introduction of three men, representing the wisdom and experience of the age, who came to console Job on hearing of his suffering. Some time appears to have elapsed in the interim, during which the disease had made formidable progress, and Job had thoroughly realized the extent of his misery. The meeting is described with singular beauty. At a distance they greet him with the wild demonstrations of sympathy and grief usual in the East; coming near, they are overpowered by the sight of his wretchedness, and sit seven days and seven nights without uttering a word (ii, 11—18). This awful silence, whether Job felt it as a proof of real sympathy, or as an indication of inward suspicion on their part, drew out all his anguish. In the agony of desperation he curses the day of his birth, and sees and hopes for no end of his misery but death (ch. iii).

This causes a discussion between him and his friends (ch. iv—xxxii), which is divided into three main parts, each with subdivisions, embracing alternately the speeches of the three friends of Job and his reply: the last part, however, consists of only two subdivisions, the third friend, Zophar, having nothing to rejoin; a silence by which the author of the book generally designates the defeat of Job’s friends, who are defending a common case (it has, however, been argued with much force by Winer, that some defense is interposed in the order of the composition; for chap. xxvii, 13—23, appears to contain Zophar’s third address to Job, while ch. xxviii is to be the conclusion of the whole book, containing the moral, added perhaps by some later hand. But see below, § 5.)

(a) The results of the first discussion (chap. iii—xiv) may be thus summed up. We have on the part of Job’s friends a theory of the divine government resting upon an exact and uniform correlation between sin and punishment (iv, 6, 11, and throughout). Afflictions are always penal, issuing in the destruction of those who are radically opposed to God, or who do not submit to his chastisements. They lead, of course, to correction and amendment of life when the sufferer repents, confesses his sins, puts them away, and turns to God. In that case restoration to peace, and even increased prosperity, may be anticipated (v, 17; xvi, 27). If the suffering always proves the commission of some special sin, while the demeanor of the sufferer indicates the true internal relation between him and God.

These principles are applied to them by the case of Job. They are, in the first place, scandalized by the vehemence of his complaints, and wonder how he maintains his freedom from wilful or conscious sin, they are driven to the conclusion that his faith is radically unsound; his protestations appear to them almost blasphemous; they become convinced that he has been severely guilty of some unpardonable sin, and their tone, at first courteous, though warning (compare ch. iv with ch. xv), becomes stern, and even harsh and menacing. It is clear that, unless they are driven from their partial and exclusive theory, they must be led on to an unqualified condemnation of Job.

In this part of the dialogue the character of the three friends is developed. Eliphaz, as he represents the true patriarchal chieftain, grave and dignified, and erring only from an exclusive adherence to tenets hitherto unquestioned, and influenced in the first place by genuine regard for Job and sympathy with his affliction, Bildad, without much originality or independence of character, yet closely participating on the wine side and desiring to advance his party, and on the other hand Zophar, who is mainly on the authority of his older friend. Zophar differs from both: he seems to be a young man; his language is violent, and at times even coarse and offensive (see, especially, his second speech, ch. xx.). He represents the prejudiced and narrow-minded bigots of his age.

In order to do justice to the position and arguments of Job, it must be borne in mind that the direct object of the trial was to ascertain whether he would deny or forsake God, and that his real integrity is asserted by Job himself. His answers through correspond with these data. He knows with a sure inward conviction that he is not an offender in the sense of his opponents: he is therefore confident that, whatever may be the object of the afflictions for which he cannot account, God knows that he is innocent. This consciousness, which from time immemorial has been the life of things cannot be destroyed by others, enables him to examine fearlessly their position. He denotes the assertion that punishment follows surely on guilt, or proves its commission. Appealing boldly to experience, he declares that, in point of fact, prosperity and misfortune are not always or generally commensurate; both are often intermingled as vice and virtue. "the tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure" (xii, 6). In the government of Providence he can see but one point clearly, viz. that all events and results are absolutely in God's hand (xii, 9-25), but as for the principles which underlie those events he knows nothing. In fact, he is sure that his friends are equally uninformed, and are sophists defending their position, out of mere prejudice, by arguments and statements false in themselves and doubly offensive to God, being hypocritically advanced in his defence (xiii, 10). Still he doubts not that God is just, and although he cannot see how or when that justice can be manifested, he feels confident that his innocence must be recognised. "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him, also will I be his salvation" (xiii, 14, 16). There remains, then, but one course open to him, and that he takes. He foresees a day of vindication, impatiently desired, a fair and open trial (xiii, 18-29). Admitting his liability to such sins as are common to man, being unclean by birth (xiii, 26; xiv, 4), he yet protests his substantial innocence, and in the bitter struggle with his misery he first meets the thought which is afterwards developed with remarkable distinctiveness. Believing that with death all hope connected with this world ceases, he prays that he may be hidden in the grave (xiv, 18), and there reserved for the day when God will try his cause and manifest himself in love (verse 15). This prayer represents, as but a dim, yet a profound and true presentiment, drawn forth, the evidently for the first time, as the possible solution of the dark problem. As for a renewal of life here, he dreams not of it (verse 14), nor will he allow that the possible restoration or prosperity of his descendants at all meets the exigencies of his case (xv, 17).

(b.) In the second discussion (ch. xv-xxii) there is a more resolute, elaborate attempt on the part of Job's friends to vindicate their theory of retributive justice. This requires an entire overthrow of the position taken by Job. They cannot admit his innocence. The fact that they cannot prove it, is unimportant to them that there must be something quite unique in his guilt. Eliaphaz (ch. xv), who, as usual, lays down the basis of the argument, does not now hesitate to impute to Job the worst crimes of which man could be guilty. His defence is blasphemous, and, that he is quite godless; that he disregards the wisdom of age and experience, denies the fundamental truths of religion (verse 16). He represents Bildad (ch. xviii) as taking up this suggestion of ungodliness, and, after enlarging upon the inevitable results of all infidelity, concludes that the special evils which had come upon Job, such as agony of heart, ruin of home, destruction of family, are peculiar to the penalties due to one who is without God. Zophar (ch. xx) draws the further inference that a sinner's sufferings must needs be proportioned to his former enjoyments (verse 5-14), and laments to his former gains (verse 15-19), and thus not only accounts for Job's present calamity, but menaces him with still greater evils (verse 20-29).

In answer, Job recognises the hand of God in his afflictions (xvi, 7-16, and xix, 6-20), but rejects the charge of ungodliness; he has never forsaken his Maker, and never ceased to pray. This, being a matter of inward conviction, cannot be answered, and Job therefore directly to earth and heaven: "My witness is in heaven, and my record is on high" (xvi, 19). The train of thought thus suggested carries him much further in the way towards the great truth—that since in this life the righteous certain are, it follows that their ways are watched and their sufferings recorded, with a view to a future and perfect manifestation of the divine justice. This view becomes gradually brighter and more definite as the controversy proceeds (xvi, 18, 19; xvii, 8, 9, and perhaps 13-16), and at last finds expression by a strong not without declaration of his conviction that at the latter day (evidently that day which Job had expressed a longing to see, xiv, 12-14) God will personally manifest himself as his nearest kinsman or avenger [see Goxt], and that he, Job, although in a desponded state (y®®®® y®®®®®®®®), should survive in spirit to witness this posthumous vindication, a pledge of which had already often been given him (y®®®®®®®®®®®, etc.—he, Job, although he cannot see it or feel it, is the outward man, remaining or recovering his personal identity (xix, 25-27). There can be no doubt that Job here virtually anticipates the final answer to all difficulties supplied by the Christian revelation.

On the other hand, sturdy by the harsh and narrow-minded bigotry of his opponents, Job draws out (chap. xxiii-xxvii) all the consequences. He shows that as the beginning to the end of their lives, ungodly men, avowed atheists (ver. 14, 15), persons, in fact, guilty of the very crimes imputed, out of mere conjecture, to himself, frequently enjoy great and unbroken prosperity. From this he draws the inference, which he states in a very unguarded manner, and in a tone calculated to give just offence, that an impenetrable veil hangs over the temporal dispensations of God.

(c.) In the third dialogue (chap. xxiii-xxv) no real progress is made by Job's opponents. They will not give up and cannot defend their position. Eliphaz (ch. xxiii) makes a last effort, and raises one new point which, he states with some ingenuity. The station in which Job was formerly placed presented temptations to certain crimes; the punishments which he undergoes are precisely such as might be expected had those crimes been committed, before he inferred them committed. The tone of this discourse thoroughly harmonizes with the character of Eliaphaz. He could scarcely come to a different conclusion without surrendering his fundamental principles, and he urges with much dignity and impressiveness the exhortations and warnings which are now needed. Bildad (ch. xxiv) has nothing to add but a few solemn words on the impenetrable comprehensiveness of God and the nothingness of man. Zophar, the most violent and least rational of the three, is put to silence, and retires from the contest (unless we adopt the above suggestion of a transposition of the text).

In his last two discourses Job does not alter his position, nor, properly speaking, adduce any new argument, but he tries to prove, that he is not, and that he never was, in a different line or in a different principle, or as an absolute lord, according to his mere will and pleasure.

(3.) Humbly to adore God is our duty, even when we are subject to calamities not at all deserved; but we should abstain from hastily judging of those who, when distressed, seem to bear forth an example of divine favor. Thus ends the discussion, in which it is evident both parties had partially failed. Job has been betrayed into very hazardous statements, while his friends had been on the one hand dishonorable, on the other bigoted, harsh, and pitiful. The points which had been limited, or imperfectly developed, are now taken up by a new interlocutor (ch. xxxii.-xxxvii.), who argues the justice of the divine administration both from the nature of the dispensations allotted to man, and from the essential character of God himself. Elihu, a young man (ver. 7), descended from a collateral branch of the family of Abraham, is here introduced in indignation at the arguments of his elders (xxxii., 7), and, impelled by an inward inspiration, he now addresses himself to both parties in the discussion, and specially to Job. He shows, first, that they had accused Job upon false and insufficient grounds, and failed to convict him, or to vindicate God's justice. Job, again, had acted with unnecessary violence, and had arraigned that justice (xxxiii., 9-11). These errors he traces to their both overlooking one main object of all suffering. God speaks to man by chastisement (ver. 14, 19-22)—warns him, teaches him the necessity of self-knowledge and humility (ver. 18, 16-17)—and prepares him (ver. 23) by the mediation of a spiritual interpreter (the angel Jehovah of Genesis) to inspire and to obtain pardon (ver. 24), renewal of life (ver. 25), perfect access and restoration (ver. 26). This statement does not involve any charge of special guilt, such as the friends had alleged and Job had repudiated. Since the warning and suffering are preventive as well as remedial, the visitation anticipates the commission of sin; it saves man from pride, and other temptations of wealth and power, and it effects the real object of all divine interpositions, the entire submission to God's will. Again, Elihu argues (xxxiv., 10-17) that any charge of injustice, direct or indirect, against God involves a contradiction in terms. God is the only source of justice; the very idea of justice is derived from his governance of the universe, the principle of which is love. In his absolute knowledge God alone sees secrets, and by his absolute power he controls all events, and that for the one end of bringing righteousness to light (verse 21-30).

Man has, of course, no claim upon God; what he receives is purely a matter of grace (xxxv., 6-9). The occasional appearance of unanswerer prayer (verse 9), when evil seems to get the upper hand, is owing merely to the fact that man prays in a proud and insolent spirit (verse 12, 13). Job may look to his heart, and he will see if that is true of himself. Job is silent, and Elihu proceeds (ch. xxxvi.) to show that the almightiness of God is not, as Job seems to assume, associated with any contingency. The theme of this right Job freely avails himself, and maintains it against his friends.

(2) In a state of compose and calmer reflection, Job qualifies, chiefly in his concluding speech, some of his former rather extravagant assertions, and says that, although God generally afflicts the wicked, and blesses the righteous, still there are exceptions to this rule, single cases in which the pious undergo severe trials; the inference, therefore, of a man's guilt from his misfortune is by no means warranted. For the exceptions established by experience prove that God does not always distribute prosperity and adversity according to this rule, but that he sometimes acts upon a different principle, or as an absolute lord, according to his mere will and pleasure.

In his last two discourses Job does not alter his position, nor, properly speaking, adduce any new argument, but he tries to prove, that he is not, and that he never was, in a different line or in a different principle, or as an absolute lord, according to his mere will and pleasure.

argumentative tone. The last words are evidently spoken while a violent storm is coming on, in which Elisha views the signs of a Thropean, such as cannot fail to produce an intense realization of the nothingness of man before God.

4. The Almighty's Response. — From the preceding analysis it is obvious that many weighty truths have been developed in the course of the discussion—nearly every theory of the objects and uses of suffering has been reviewed—while a great advance has been made towards the apprehension of doctrines hereafter to be revealed, and was known only to God. But the mystery is not yet really cleared up. The position of the three original opponents is shown to be untenable—the views of Job himself to be but imperfect—while even Elisha gives not the least intimation that he recognizes one special object of calamity. In the case of Job, as we are expressly told, that object was to try his sincerity, and to demonstrate that goodness, integrity in all relations, and devout faith in God can exist independent of external circumstances. This object never occurs to the mind of any one of the interlocutors, nor could it be proved without a revelation. On the other hand, the exact purpose of the trial of Job is not more explicit, nor does Elisha express in its full extent, that respect in which he had been betrayed, and to his three opponents for their harshness and want of candor, could only be awarded by an omniscient Judge.

Accordingly, from the midst of the storm, Jehovah, whom Job had several times vehemently challenged by accusing him and God's justice with great injustice and profound language of incomparable grandeur he reproves and silences the murmurs of Job. God does not condone, strictly speaking, to argue with his creatures. The speculative questions discussed in the colloquy are unnoticed, but the declaration of God's absolute power is illustrated by a marvellously beautiful and comprehensive survey of the glory of creation, and his all-embracing providence by reference to the phenomena of the animal kingdom. He who would argue with the Lord must understand at least the objects for which instinct so strange and manif statedly gven to the beings far below man in gifts and powers. This declaration suffices to bring Job to a right mind: he confesses his inability to comprehend, and therefore to answer his Maker (xl, 3, 4). A second address completes the work. It proves that a charge of injustice against God involves the consequence that the accusation is more competent than he for the universe. He should then be able to control, to punish, to reduce all creatures to order—but he cannot even subdue the monsters of the irrational creation. Baffled by leviathan and behemoth, how can he hold the reins of government, how contend with him who made and rules them all?

5. Job's unreserved submission terminates the trial (ch. xxxvii—xxxiii). There is probably another transposition at xl, 14, which belongs after xxxii, 1-6). He expresses deep contrition, not, of course, for sins falsely imputed to him, but for the bitterness and arrogance which had characterized some portion of his complaints. In the rebuke then addressed to Job's opponents the integrity of his character is distinctly recognised, while they are condemned for untruth, which, inasmuch as it was not wilful, but proceeded from a real but narrowed-minded conception of the divine justice, is pardoned on the intercession of Job. The restoration of his external prosperity, which is an inevitable result of God's personal manifestation, symbolizes the ultimate compensation of the righteous for all sufferings undergone by others.

II. Design of the Book. — From this analysis it may seem clear that certain views concerning the general object of the book are partial or erroneous. a. It cannot be the object of the writer to prove that there is no connection between guilt and sorrow, or that the old ethical doctrine of retribution was radically unsound. Job himself recognizes the general truth of the doctrine, which is, in fact, confirmed by his ultimate restoration to happiness. b. Nor is the development of the great doctrine of a future state the primary object. It would not, in that case, have been passed over in Job's last discourse, in the speech of Elisha, or in the address of the Lord God. In fact, critics who hold that view admit that the doctrine is rather suggested than developed, and amounts to scarcely more than a hope, a presumptuous, at the most a subjective conviction of a truth first fully revealed by him "who brought life and immortality to light." (See Pareau, De Immortalitate notis et in libro Job, Devent. 1807.) The cardinal truth of the immor tality of the soul is taught in Job's reasoning, as it is elsewhere assumed in the T. T. (comp. Matt. xxii, 32); and this thought, in fact, constitutes the afflicted patriarch's ground of consolation and trust, especially in that sublime passage (xxi, 25-27) where he expresses his confidence in his posthumous vindication, which could be of no satisfaction unless his spirit should survive to witness it. Yet this belief is nowhere carried out at length, as would have been the case had this been the main theme of the epopee. Much less is the later doctrine of the resurrection of the body contained in the poem. See RESURRECTION, c. G. On the passage above, see below. See FUTURE LIFE: IMMORTALITY.

2. It may be granted that the primary design of the poem is that which is distinctly intimated in the introduction, and confirmed in the conclusion, namely, to show the effects of calamity in its worst and most awful forms upon human nature. Job is the chief hero of the poem, his amiable character contrasted with the terrible trial to which he was subjected, and the hope that he would prove the type of the meek and lowly who, even in the midst of suffering, trust in God. A second character is the high priest of the tribe of Levi, Elisha, the law and the prophecies of the ancient world are here brought together, and the greatness of the event is seen in the fact that it was brought about by the hand of an ordinary man. The poem is, in fact, a history of the nation, and the history of the nation is told through the lives of its great men, who, by their suffering and triumph, bring the message of the future and the kingdom of God to the world. The poem is, therefore, a history of the nation, and the history of the nation is told through the lives of its great men, who, by their suffering and triumph, bring the message of the future and the kingdom of God to the world.
There is another fundamental error which has led nearly all modern interpreters to a mistaken idea of the design of this book. They assume that the problem could be satisfactorily solved only when the doctrine of retribution is held as a fixed point, which had not been done by the author of the book of Job: a perfect solution of the question was therefore not to be expected from him. Some assert that his solution is erroneous, since retribution, to be expected in a future world, is transferred by him to this life; others assert that he could not know, which he could not know, and he has been satisfied to ask for implicit submission and devotedness, showing at the same time that every attempt at a solution must lead to dangerous positions: blind resignation, therefore, was the short meaning of the lengthened discussion on the doctrine of retribution after death our author does not enter; but that he knew it may be inferred from several passages with great probability; as, for instance, xiv, 14, "If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come." The y here shows that the writer had been before engaged in serious consideration of the subject of life after death; and when such is the case, a pious mind will necessarily indulge the hope, or will, at least, have an obscure presentiment of immortality. The truth also of God's undoubted grace, on which the doctrine of immortality is based, will be fully vindicated. Even a child can know [11] The lengthened discussion does not recur to this hope for the purpose of solving his problem; he did not intend in his discussion to exceed the limits of what God had clearly revealed, and this was in his time confined to the vague notion of life continued after death, but not connected with rewards and punishments. From these considerations it appears that those interpreters who, with Bernstein, De Wette, and Umbreit, assume that the book of Job was of a sceptical nature, and intended to dispute the doctrine of retribution as laid down in the other books of the Old Testament, have entirely misunderstood it.

On nearer examination, however, it appears that the doctrine of retribution after death is not of itself alone calculated to lead to a solution of the problem. The belief in a final judgment is firm and rational only when it rests in the belief in God's providential government of all the events of human life. Temporary injustice is still injustice, and destroys the idea of a holy and just God. A God who has something to redress is no God at all. Even the ancient heathen perceived that future rewards would not vindicate inequalities in this world; "For the ungodly are not cut off, but are of a certain age" (Psal. 108 sq.). God's just retribution in this world is extolled throughout the Old Testament. The New Testament holds out to the righteous promises of a future life, as well as of the present; and our Saviour himself, in setting forth the rewards of those who, for his sake, forsake everything, begins with life (Matt. xiv, 20).

A nearer examination of the benedictions contained in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v) shows that none of them exclusively refer to future blessings; the judgment of the wicked is in his view proceeding without interruption, and therefore his examples of the distribution of disgrace and justice in this world are most apt with those of refulent in a future order of things. The Gal-leans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their own sacrifices (Luke xiii, 1), were in Christ's opinion not accidentally killed; and he threatens those who would not repent that they should in like manner perish. That sickness and death, which so often appear as part of our Mosaic law, are clearly taught (John vi, 14; Luke, xvi, 20, 24): in the former passage it is threatened as a punishment for sins committed; in the latter it is placed in consequence of punishment remitted. The passage in John ix, 2, 3, which is often appealed to in proof that our Lord did not consider sickness as a punishment for sin, does not prove this, but only opposes the Jewish position—found-were sicknesses and infirmities were consequences of crimes. The solution of the problem regarding the sufferings of the righteous rests on two positions:

1. Their necessity.—Even the comparatively righteous are not exempt from suffering, which, nevertheless, is not attended only by afflictions, and he who patiently endures them will attain a clearer insight into the otherwise obscure ways of God. The trials of the pious issue at once from God's justice and love. To him who entertains a proper sense of the sinfulness of man, no calamity appears so great as not to be deserved as a punishment, or useful as a corrective.

2. The Compensations attending them.—Calamity, as the veil of grace, is with the pious never experienced alone, but manifest proofs of divine favor accompany or follow it. Though sunk in misery, they still are happier than the wicked, and when it has attained its object it is terminated by the Lord. The consolations offered in the Old Testament are, agreeably to the weaker judgment of its professors, derived chiefly from external circumstances, while in the New Testament they are mainly spiritual, being, moreover, directed beyond the limits of this world.

It is this purely correct solution of the problem which occurs in the book of Job. It is not set forth, however, in any one set of speeches, but is rather to be gathered from the concurrent drift of the entire discussion. For, without God (who cannot be "a man at the bar of" Job), for God proves himself gracious towards him only after he has been corrected and humbled himself. Although the author of the book does not say (i, 22; ii, 10; comp. xiii, 7) that Job had charged God foolishly, and sinned with his lips, yet the sentiment calling for correction in his speeches is clearly pointed out to be that "he was righteous in his own eyes, and justified himself rather than God" (xxiii, 1, 2). The entire purity of his character did not prevent his falling into misconceptions and even contradictions on this important subject; his discussion, therefore, only perplexed. Job continues to be embarrassed for the solution, and he is only certain of this, that the explanation of his friends cannot be satisfactory. Job erred chiefly in not acknowledging his need of chastisement; not withstanding his integrity and sincere piety, this prevented him from appreciating the object of the calamity inflicted on him, led him to consider God's dispensations as arbitrary, and made him despair of the return of better days. The greatness of his sufferings was in some measure the cause of his misconception, by exciting his feelings, and preventing him from calmly considering his blessing; he was in his own eyes tempted, and deserving God's indulgence. He had received considerable provocation from his friends, and often endeavored to soften his harsh assertions, which, particularly in ch. xxvii, leads him into such contradictions as must have occurred in the life of the tempted; he is loud in acknowledging the wisdom of God (ch. xxviii), and raises himself at times to burning hopes (comp. ch. xix). But this can only excuse, not justify him, and therefore it is in the highest degree honorable to him that he remains silent when, in Elihu's speeches, the correct solution of the question is suggested, and that he unreservedly acknowledges his fundamental error of doing justice to himself only.

manner is reproved by God, and represented as a real sin, and that much sin it is hard to overlook, if Job was directed to offer a propitiatory sacrifice. Their error proceeded from a crude notion of sin in its external appearance; and, inferring its existence from calamity, they were thus led to condemn the afflicted Job as guilty of heinous crimes (ch. xxxii). The moral use of sufferings was unknown to them. It was often supposed that they themselves were not yet purged and cleared from guilt. If they had been sensible of the nature of man, if they had understood themselves, they would, on seeing the misery of Job, have exclaimed, "God be merciful to us sinners!" There is, indeed, an important correct principle in their speeches, whose centre it forms, so much so that they mostly err only in the application of the general truth. It consists in the perception of the invariable connection between sin and misery, which is indelibly ingrained on the heart of man, and to which many ancient authors allude. The problem of the book is then solved by properly uniting the correct positions of the speeches both of Job and his friends, by maintaining his innocence as to any moral obliquity (although changing a view which must have resulted in spiritual perdition, he was the Lord's "lamb," socially exposed, and his character before it ripened into guilt), and at the same time avoiding the idea that misfortunes are necessarily a punitive infliction (being only a curse when it follows the violation of the physical laws of the Creator, and even then capable of being overruled for the welfare of his saints), thus tracing the errors of both parties to a common source, the want of a sound insight into the nature of sin. Job considers himself righteous, and not deserving of such infusions, because he was not conscious of having committed any crime; and his friends think that it was because Job was highly criminal, in order to justify his misery. [3.] The solution of the question at issue is not exclusively given in the addresses of God, which contain only the basis of the solution, not the solution itself. In assigning forth his majesty, and in showing that imputing to him that which was repugnant to a correct conception to his nature, these addresses establish that there must be a solution which does not impair divine justice. This is not, indeed, the solution itself, but everything is thus prepared for the solution. We apprehend that God must judge further; he can show how he can be just, and still the righteouse be miserable. [4.] Nor yet can we justly regard the speech of Elihu as affording altogether a correct solution of this main question; for, as the preceding analysis has shown, it falls short of the purpose, and the text itself (xxxviii., 2) expressly states its 'belligerent and incompetency. Nevertheless, the position of this in the poem, and the general agreement of its doctrines with the final result, indicate that it contains, in germ at least, the correct solution, as far as human capacity can go. The leading principles in Elihu's statement, that calamity in the sight of God is inflicted even on the best of best men, but that God allowed a favorable turn to take place as soon as it had attained its object. Now this is the key to the events of Job's life. Though a pious and righteous man, he is tried by severe afflictions. He knew at the outset that his purpose he is relieved from the burden which oppresses him, and ample prosperity atoms for the afflictions he has sustained (the last vestige of injustice on the part of the Almighty in thus afflicting a good man at the instance of Satan, and for the sake of the example to future ages, disappearing with the consideration that the subject of it himself required the severe lesson for his own spiritual profit). Add to this that the remaining portion of Elihu's speeches, in which he points to God's infinite majesty as including his justice, is continued in the addresses of God; that Elihu foretells God's appearance; that he is not punished by God as are the friends of Job; in fine, that Job, by his very silence, acknowledges the problem to have been solved by Elihu; and his silenced, metaphorically "interred" as the highest sign of guilt, which had urged him to defend himself (xxxiii., 32), and because Job had repeatedly declared he would "hold his peace" if it was shown to him wherein he had erred,(vi, 24, 25; xix., 4), this view of the book of Job, and among modern authors been supported chiefly by Stiädelin (Briefläge zur Re- ligion, ii, 138) and Schultze (Das Buch Job, Lpzg. 1812), though it is equally mixed up with much erroneous matter; and it is further confirmed by the whole Old Testament giving the same answer is the question mooted which the speeches of Elihu offer: in its concentrated form it is presented in Psa. xxvii. xliii. At the same time, it must be conceded that the apprehension of Elihu's speech by Jehovah himself, as sup- plying a solution, is, as the tenor of the whole succeeding portion of the poem also implies, that there are mysteries in divine providence, the full solution of which, in this life at least, God does not deign nor think best to make to his creatures who are the subjects of them. The intractability of God's ways by hu- man judgment, the onset of events, especially inferring from him and his people, and the character of this life as a probation requires the withholding of many of his plans in order to their proper disciplinary effects. Especially is the saint required to walk by faith and not by sight, and the growth and fullest exercise of this faith can only occur under such circumstances as those in which Job was placed. While it is pre-eminently the doctrine of both the Old and the New Testament that afflictions are the earthly lot of the righteous, it is equally a maxim under both dispensations that the most emboldening motive for their patience is this, that the simple truth is in- spired by our heavenly Father, who alone fully knows why they are best for us. Could the subject of them at the time perceive clearly their necessity and advantage, half their value would be destroyed; for an assurance of this he must trust the known kindness and wisdom of God and the love of the Lord's people to his subtle position, finally attained by the tried patriarch (Job xxiii, 10), which gilds his character with its most sacred hue. The above is substantially the view of the moral design of the book entertained by the latest ex- plicators (e.g. Conant, Delitzsch, etc.), although they do not bring out these ethical considerations with sufficient distinctness.

It remains to consider the view taken by Ewald re- specting the design of the book of Job. He justly re- jects the common, superficial view of its design, which has recently been revived and defended by Hitzel (see his Commentar, Lpzg. 1839), and which represents the author as intending to show that man cannot apprehend the plans of God, and does best to submit in ignorance, without repining at afflictions. Nowhere in the whole book is simple resignation crudely enjoined, and no- where is man shown to be more righted then when he, in submission, pleads his sufferings as triad, and the epilogue declares that the end had proved this: consequently the author was competent to give a theo- olgy with reference to the calamity of Job and if such is the case he cannot have intended simply to recommend resignation. The Biblical writers, when engaged on this problem, know how to justify God with reference to the afflictions of the righteous, and have no inten- tion of evading the difficulty when they recommend resignation (see the Psalms quoted above, and, in the New Testament, the Epistle to the Hebrews, chap. xi. 24). The view of the book of Job alluded to would isolate it, and take it out of its natural connection. Thus far, then, we agree with Ewald, but we cannot approve of his own view of the design of the book of Job. According to his system, "calamity is never a punishment for sins committed, but always a mere accident, an imag- inary show, above which we must raise ourselves by the consciousness of the eternal nature of the human mind, to which, by external prosperity, nothing can be added, and from which, by external misfortune, nothing can be taken away. It was (says Ewald) the burden of the whole book, the way of the Lord's love, the study of the reality and naturalness of sorrow, and even allowing its exhibition, yet knows how effectually to cure its wounds by the most substantial considerations. Nor is it in accordance with the book itself, which nowhere impugns or mitigates the extent of Job's calamities, but, from the high vantage ground of the prologue and epilogue, impresses us with a more solemn insight into their significance than even Job was enabled to take, and throughout the discussion (both on the part of the three friends and that of the author) judicial impartiality is asserted as evidence of the divine displeasure, and especially in the key furnished by Elihu—which excites them to the interest of the most interesting degree of importance in the moral discipline of the people of God), admits and therefore seeks to justify their pungency. Their design is as far from being wanting as any; the contents are instructive and admirable. Viewed in the light of the foregoing purpose, this book becomes one of the most precious legacies to the Church—to which tribulation in this world has been left as a heritage; and a sublime exposition of some of the most interesting problems of religious experience in its most highly developed phase.

III. Historical Character of the Work.—On this subject there are three opinions. (1.) Some contend that the book contains an entirely true history. (2.) Others assert that it contains a narrative entirely imaginary, and constructed by the author to teach a great moral truth. (3.) The third opinion is that the book is founded on a true history, which has been recast, modified, and enlarged by the author.

1. The first view, taken by numerous ancient interpreters, is now abandoned by nearly all expositors.
Understandably so. All the details in the Book of Job were not only that the persons and events which it describes are real, but that the very words of the speakers were actually recorded. It was supposed either that Job himself employed the latter years of his life in writing it (A. Schultens), or that at a very early age some inspired Hebrew collector of the speeches and sayings, preserved by oral tradition, and presented them to his countrymen in their own tongue. Some such view seems to have been adopted by Josephus, for he places Job in the list of the historical books, and it was pre-avalent with all the fathers of the Church. In its support several reasons are adduced, of which only the first and second have any real force; and even these are over-weighed by other considerations, which render it impossible to consider the book of Job as an entirely true history, which may but be used in defence of the third view alluded to. It is said (1.) That Job's name is [Estek. xiv, 14-20] mentions him as a public character, and says, Noah and Daniel, and represented as an example of piety. (2.) In the Epistle of James (v, 11), patience in sufferings is recommended by a reference to Job. (3.) In the Greek translation of the Sept. a notice is appended to the book of Job, evidently referring to Gen. xxxvi, 38, and stating that Job was the king Jobab of Edom.
It is as follows: "And it is written that he will rise again with those whom the Lord will raise up. This is translated out of a Syrian book. He dwelt indeed in the land of Uz, on the confines of Idumea and Arabia. His first name was Job; and having married an Arabian woman, he had by her a son whose name was Ennon. He was himself a son of Zare, one of the sons of Esau, and his mother's name was Bosarra; so that he was the fifth in descent from Abraham. And these were the kings who reigned in Edom, over which continued, the genius of the most ardent thinker has raised this, the most remarkable monument of the Skmitic mind. The first indications of this opinion are found in the Talmud (Baba Bathra, xx, 1). In a discussion upon the age of this book, while the Rabbins in general maintain its historical character, Samuel Bar-Nachman declares that its composition was not confined to a single author, but the work is a parable." Hai Gaon (Ewald and Duke's Beitraége, iii, 165), A.D. 1000, who is followed by Rashi, altered this passage to "Job existed, and was created to become a parable." They had evidently no critical ground for the change, but bore witness to the prevalent tradition of the Hebraists, "Nie der Reb Nebochim, ii, 22), with his characteristic freedom of mind, considers it an open question of little or no moment to the real value of the inspired book. Ralph,
I.e., R. Levi ben-Gershom, treats it as a philosophic work.
A late Hebrew commentator, Simcha Arie (Schlottmann, p. 4), denies the historical truth of the narrative on the ground that it is incredible that the patriarchs of the chosen race should be surpassed in goodness by a child of Edom. This is worth noting in corroboration of the argument that such a fact was not likely to have been invented by an Israelite of any age.

In opposition to this view, the following arguments may be adduced: (1) It has always seemed to pious writers incompatible with any idea of inspiration to assume that a narrative, certainly not allegorical, should be a mere fiction, and irreverent to suppose that the Almighty would be introduced as a speaker in an imaginative way.

(2) We are led to the same conclusion by the soundest principles of criticism. Ewald says (Evid. p. 15) most truly, "The invention of a history without foundation in facts—the creation of a person, represented as having a real historical existence, out of the mere head of the poet—is a notion so entirely alien to the spirit of all antiquity, that it only began to develop itself gradually in the latest epoch of the literature of any ancient people, and in its complete form belongs only to the most modern times." In the canonical books there is not a trace of any such invention. Of all people, the Hebrews were the least likely to mingle the most frivolous contentions of imagination with the sacred records revered as the peculiar glory of their race.

It is true that the arguments advanced by Ewald to show the historical character of the chief features of the book of Job are not conclusive, especially the literature of the name Job, which may have reference to the character sustained in the narrative (from 22:8 to hate, q.d. "the assailed," i.e. tempted; see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 81); still they must be allowed to have some weight, and, taken in connection with the general usage of Scripture in its poetical and rhetorical amplifications, especially with the considerations presently to be adduced in the following, the author of this book must justify the presumption of a historical foundation, not only for the facts and personages represented in the book, but also, to a certain extent, for the speeches.

(3) To this it must be added that there is a singular air of reality in the whole narrative, such as must either proceed naturally from a faithful adherence to objective truth, or be the result of the most consummate art. The effect is produced partly by the thorough consistency of all the characters, especially that of Job, not merely as drawn in broad, strong outlines, but as developed out of the most trying circumstances; partly also by the minute and accurate account of incidents which in a fiction would probably have been noted by an ancient writer in a vague and general manner.

Thus we remark the mode in which the supernatural trial is carried into execution by natural agencies—by Chaldæan and Sabaean robbers—by whirlwinds common in and peculiar to the desert—by fire—and, lastly, by the chelaphasia (see Schottmann, p. 15; Ewald, L. C.; and Hengstenberg), the most formidable disease known in the East. The disease was indeed one which the Indians and most Orientals then probably believed to be peculiarly indicative of divine wrath, and would therefore be naturally selected by the writer (see the analysis above). But the symptoms are described so faithfully as to leave no doubt that the writer must either have introduced them with a view to giving an air of truthfulness to his account, or have learned them by a witness or received from an exact tradition. The former supposition is confuted by the fact that the peculiar symptoms are not described in any one single passage so as to attract the reader's attention, but are made out by a critical and scientific examination of words and by an inquiry into the complaint of the sufferer. The most refined art fails in producing such a result; it is rarely attempted in the most artificial ages, was never dreamed of by ancient writers, and must here be regarded as a strong instance of the disguised coincidences which the soundest critics regard as the best evidence of genuineness and authenticity in any work.

4. Luther first suggested the theory which, in some form or other, is most generally received. In his introduction to the first edition of his translation of the Bible he speaks of the author as having so treated the historical facts as to demonstrate the truth of those which are recorded in the Tischредen (ed. Walch, xxii, 2038) he says: "I look on the book of Job as a true history, yet I do not believe that all took place just as it is written, but that an ingenious, pious, and learned man brought it into its present form." This position was strongly attacked by Bellarmine, who declared that the theory was afterwards repudiated by most Lutherans. The fact that Spinola, Clericus, Du Pin, and Father Simon held nearly the same opinion, the first denying, and the others notoriously holding low views of the inspiration of Scripture, had of course a tendency to bring it into disrepute. J. D. Michaelis first revived the old theory of Bar-Nachman, not upon critical, but dogmatic grounds. In a mere history the opinions or doctrines enounced by Job and his friends could have no dogmatic authority; whereas, if the whole book were a pure inspiration, the strongest arguments could be developed from it, and the greatest indications of the resurrection and a future judgment, which, though implied in other early books, are nowhere so distinctly indicated. The arbitrary character of such reasoning is obvious. At present no critic doubts that the narrative rests on facts, although the previous Continental scholars never certainly in its form and general features, in its reasoning and representations of character, the book is a work of creative genius.

Taking this view, we must still abstain from undertaking to determine what the poet derived from tradition, and what he added himself, since it is evident how far it diverges from the original. The empirical character of the work must be distinctly acknowledged. Much of the preceding is a mere speculation; the author of this book must justify the presumption of a historical foundation, not only for the facts and personages represented in the book, but also, to a certain extent, for the speeches.

IV. Decent, Country, and Age of the Author.—1. Opinions differed in ancient times as to the nation to which the author belonged, some considering him to have been an Arab, others an Israelite. Various citations are made from the first (1785). We find in our book many ideas of genuine Israelitish growth: the creation of the world is described, in accordance with the prevailing notions of the Israelites, as the immediate effect of divine omnipotence; man is formed of clay; the spirit of man is God's breath; God employs the angels for the performance of his orders; Satan, the great enemy of the children of God, is his instrument for tempting them; men are weak and sinful; nobody is pure in the sight of God, moral corruption is propagated. There is a particularity to men the law of God, which they must not infringe, and the transgressor of which is visited on offenders with punishments. Moreover, the naked world, or Sheol, is depicted in hues entirely Hebraic. To these particulars might, without much trouble, be added many more, but the deep-seeking inquirer will particularly weigh, (286), the fact that the book displays a strength and force of language which could only be expected within the domain of revelation. Monotheism, if the assertions of ancient Arabian authorities may be trusted, prevailed, indeed, for a long period among the Arabs, and it held its ground at least among a portion of the nation till the age of Mohammed, who died for it, and the religion of his party which was spreading from Syria. Still the god of the Arabs was, as those of the heathens generally were, a retired god, dwelling far apart, while the people of the Old Covenant enjoyed the privilege of a vital communion with God, and the warmth with which our author enters into the view incontrovertibly proves that he was an Israelite. (Sdl), As regards the language of our book, several ancient writers asserted that it was originally written in the Aramaic or Arabic tongue, and afterwards translated into Hebrew by Moses, David, Solomon, or some unknown Israelite. (Note on Job, in the Appendix in the Septuagint, and the compiler of the tract on Job added to the works of Origen and Jerome; in modern times it has been chiefly defended by Spanheim, in his Historia Job. But for a translation there is too much propriety and propriety in the words and sense, and the mode of writing and the phrases, for the time and the language. This parallelistism also is too accurate and perfect for a translation, and the whole breathes a freshness that could be expected from the original work only. Sensible of the weight of this argument, others, as Eichhorn, took a medium course, and assumed that the author was a Hebrew, though he did not live among his countrymen, but in Arabia. "The earlier Hebrew history," they say, "is unknown to the author, who is igno- rant of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. The genealogy of angelic characters, also, he proves himself always familiar with Arabia, while he is silent respecting the characteristics of Palestine. With Egypt he must have been well acquainted, which can be accounted for by supposing him to have lived in Arabia than in Palestine." Hitzig and Delitzsch believe that the writer of the Elohist book was an Egyptian. Wetstein and Delitzsch say that he was a native of the Hauran. The usual place of the name in Hebrew, however, appears to imply a later date than the Exode, and the absence of allusion to the events of Hebrew history, it has been thought, may be accounted for by the peculiar line of argument (from natural religion) pursued in the book, as in Ecclesiastes. It has further been suggested that the author, without directly mentioning the Pentateuch, frequently alludes to portions of it, as in iii, 4, to Gen. 1, 3; in iv, 19, and xxxix. 21; to Moses' account of the creation of man; in v, 14, to Deut. xxxii, 32; in xxxiii, 11, to Deut. xxxv, 4. Moreover, history says nothing of the Israelites having permanently taken up their residence in the land of Arabia, so as to allow the supposition of the above origin of the book of Job by a Hebrew thus isolated from Palestine; nor was any of the arguments adduced to prove the acquaintance (and therefore neighborhood) of the author with Egypt bear a close examination. Thus it is a mistake to suppose that the description of the working of mines in ch. xxxvii must necessarily have reference to Egypt; Phoenicia, Arabia, and Edom afforded mining regions sufficient to the object of the description. It is also unknown that the Egyptian mauosea rests on an erroneous interpre- tation of iii, 14, which may also be said of the asser- tion that xxxix, 18, refers to the Egyptian myrtus of the phœnix. Casting aside these arbitrarily assumed Egyptian references, we have only the following: Our author knew the Egyptian vexillations of bulrushes, ix, 29; the Nile-grass, viii, 12; the Nile-horse (Bebemuth) and the crocodile (Leviathan), xi, 15; xiii, 1. Now, as these things belong to the more prominent peculiarities of a neighboring country, they must have been known to every educated man of ancient Egypt, and it is set better be- fore his eyes than anywhere else, is true, for there he had an opportunity of observing mines, caravans, drying up of brooks, etc. But this is not sufficient proof of the author having lived permanently in that remote part of Palestine, and of having there written his book: he was not a man of considerable attainments, endowed with the power of vividly representing things absent from him.

2. As to the age of the author of this book, we meet with three opinions: (a) That he lived before Moses, or was, at least, his contemporary. (b) That he lived in the time of Solomon, or in the centuries next follow- ing—the opinion of Hahn, Schottmann (Berl. 1857), and Delitzsch. (c) That he lived shortly after the Babylonian exile, or even after the Babylonian exile. Against this last view (adopted by Le Clerc among earlier interpreters, and by modern expositors by Bernstein, Gesenius, Umbreit, and De Wette) it is conclusively objected, (1) That the book is refered to in the Old Testament itself (Ezek. xiv, 14—20) as well known before the time of the captivity, and (2) the poetical character of the book, which is wholly different from the declamatory style of the later period.

The most complete statement of the reasons in support of the opinion that the book of Job was written between the age of Moses and the Exile may be found in Rieger's "Erste Jeremia," p. 163 sq.; in Rosenmüller's edition of Lowth's Fragmentations de Poet. Sacra Hieroborum, in which he maintains that it was written in the age of Solomon. Most of these rea- sons, indeed, are either not conclusive at all, or not quite cogent. Thus it is an arbitrary proposition, proved by modern researches to be erroneous, that the author of the book of Job was unknown previous to the age of Moses. The assertion, too, that the marks of cultivation and refinement observable in our book belonged to a later age rests on no historical ground. Further, it cannot be said that for such a short time the language is too smooth and neat, since in no Syrian dialect is it possible to trace a progressive improvement. The evident correspondence also between our book and the Proverbs and Psalms is not a point proving with restless force that they were all written at the same time. Nor is it the character of such a kind that the most unhallowed Psalms and Proverbs (esp. Ps. xxxix, 18, with Job vii, 19; xiv, 6; x, 20, 21; viii, 8, 21, in the Hebrew Bible), can be exactly said to have copied our book, but it may be accounted for by their all belonging to the same class of writings, by the very great uniformity and cohesion of thought, and the similarity of the sentiments expressed in the Old Testament, and by the stability of its religious character. The striking coincidence, in particular, observable between the eulogy of "wisdom" contained in Job xxviii and the numerous similar didactic strations found in the writings of Solo- mon (comp. especially Prov. xi, iv), may be accounted for by the above supposition that this chapter was added by a later hand than the author of the rest of the book, or at least as a sequel to the traditional part of the poem.

The traditional view of the authorship of the book of Job sacrifices it to Moses; the arguments in favor of this view have been collected by Spanheim, and may be seen with replies in Wymys (Life and Times of Job, p. 82 sq.). The following leading points are deserving of consideration: (1) There is in the book of Job no direct allusion to any portion of the Hebrew legislation; and other statements are suited to the period of the patri- archs; as, for instance, the great authority held by old men, the high age of Job, and fathers offering sacri- fices for their families—which leads to the supposition that when our book was written no sacerdotal order yet existed. Not to mention the ignorance of all the ordinary habits of living and associations of Judaism fully explainable on the ground of the author's desire to base the question at issue wholly on religious consciousness and experience; for many of the incidents of Jewish and even patriarchal history were too apposite to his topic to be passed over (e.g. the overthrow of Pharaoh and the deliverance of the plagues), unless we suppose a degree of studied impersonation at variance with the naturalness and practical aims of Scripture. (2.) The language of the book of Job seems strongly to support the opinion of its having been written as early as the time of Moses. It has often been said that no writing of the Old Testament can be more strongly illustrated from the Arabic than this book. Jerome observes (Praef. in Dan.), "Jobum cum Arabica lingua plurimum habere societatem," and Schultens proved this so incontrovertibly that Gesenius was rather too late in denying the fact (see his Geschichte der hebräischen Sprache, p. 38). Nor, from this character of its language we might be induced to infer that the work was written in the remotest times, when the separation of the dialects had only begun, but had not yet been completed. It is true that this peculiarity of idiom is not such as to be of itself conclusive as to its date, and it might even have been to some extent assumed in order to correspond with the foreign garb of the poem. It also contains some Aramaisms and other signs of degeneracy; these (unless attributable to copyists) may easily be accounted for by the supposition of a later editorship more consonant with the Jewish tradition than the authorship of Moses (see Otho, Lex. Rabbin. p. 525; comp. Tobit ii, 12; Euseb. Prep. Ev. ix, 25), although not entirely uniform, seems to have been firmly established at an early period; and, lightly as it has been treated by some (see Dr. Davidson, in the new ed. of Horne's Introd. ii, 727), still affords the only writer of sufficient note to whom the work has ever been definitely ascribed. The facilities enjoyed by Moses during his quiet sojourn in Midian were greater perhaps than those of any other Hebrew author for such a production; and the contemplation of his ancestors and their experiences may have furnished as ample a motive for the task as can be found at any other period, or in the case of any other writer to whom the book has been assigned, even if no special outward occasion can be shown to have led to the literary effort at that time. This date, moreover, is precisely such as to admit the incorporation of Jewish theology without its history, and affords a locality where all the elements of the poem were at hand. (4.) The period in which Job himself lived is a distinct question from that of the age in which the book was written, it having been in this respect (on the supposition of the reality of the narrative) to locate the author very substantially at the times of his hero, and under such circumstances as to suggest the topic. The ante-Mosaic date of Job's life is evident from his longevity (probably two centuries and a half, xxii, 16, 17) while the Sept. expressly gives his total age as 240 years, assigning, however, 170 of these as preceding his affliction), which seems to mark him as contemporary with Peleg, Reu, or Serug (B.C. 2414-2122) as well as from the primitive character of his social relations, which are similar to those of Abrah- am (B.C. 2168-1898). His country could not have been the Mediterranean or Sinaitic peninsula. There is thus found to be a reasonable presumption in favor of the Mosaic authorship of this book, so far as time and place are concerned, while there is no internal evidence decidedly opposed to the tradition in its favor. Our conclusion, as being the most probable combination of all the facts in the case, is that, as a narrative poem in a rudimentary form, it was originally framed in Job's age (by that romance style of composition spontaneous with Orientals), and that, in its Arabic dress, it was gathered by Moses from the lips of the Midianitish harlot, "the wife of seven husbands," or by his countrymen, that it was first composed by him in the Hebrew language, but now reduced to its present complete form still considerably later, perhaps by Solomon. This progressive kind of authorship is vindicated by the fact that other epics have come down to us through similar stages of heroic legend, oral preservation, collection, formal composition, and editorial work, and is even illustrated in the origin of other less obscurely traceable books of the Bible. See Genesis. (5.) In defense of the theory that the book was written during the Assyrian invasion, B.C. cir. 708, see the introduction to Merx's Buch Job (Jena, 1870). V. Integrity of the Book. — It is satisfactory to find that the arguments employed by those who impugn the authenticity of considerable portions of this book are, for the most part, mutually destructive, and that the mass of reaching investigations bring out the most convincing proofs of the unity of its composition, and the coherence of its constituent parts. One point of great importance is noted by the latest and one of the most ingenious writers (M. E. Renan, Le Livre de Job, Par. 1859) on this subject. After some strong remarks upon the inequality of the style, and appearance of in- terpolation, M. E. Renan observes (p. xliii): — "The Hebrews, and Orientals in general, differed widely from us in their views about composition. Their works never have that perfectly defined outline to which we are accustomed, and we should be careful not to assume interpolation whenever it seems to meet with defects of sequence which surprise us." He then shows that in parts of the work, acknowledged by all critics to be by one hand, there are very strong instances of what Europeans might regard as repetition, or suspicion of interpolation: thus Elihu recommends his arguments four times, and discourses of Job, which seem to be distinct portions, such as to modern critics might seem unconnected and even misplaced, are impressed with such a character of sublimity and force as to leave no doubt that they are the product of a single inspiration. To this judgment true the narrative and the highly poetical language of the colloquy. Yet the best critics now acknowledge that the style of these portions is quite as antique in its simple and severe grandeur as that of the Pentateuch itself (to which it bears a striking resemblance), and comp. Lee, Job, p. 49), or as any other part of the book, while it is also true that the narrative style of all the later productions of the Hebrews. Ewald says with perfect truth, "These prosaic words harmonize thoroughly with the old poem in subject-matter and thoughts, in coloring and in art; also in language, so far as prose can be like poetry," (2.) It is said, again, that the doctrinal views are not in harmony with those of Job. This is wholly unfounded. The fundamental principles of the patriarch, as developed in the most solemn of his discourses, are identical with those maintained throughout the book. The form of worship belongs essentially to the patriarchal type; with little of ceremonial ritual, without a separate priesthood, thoroughly domestic in form and spirit. The representation of the angels, and their appeal, "was of God," peculiar to this book and to Genesis, is accord entirely with the intimations in the earliest documents of this type; (5.) It is, moreover, the fact that there are discrepancies between the facts related in the introduction, and statements or allusions in the dialogue. But the apparent contradiction between xix. 17 and the statement that all Job's children had perished rests upon a misinterpretation of the words "seven" or "two," children of my womb," I.e. "of the womb that bare me," and "my mother's children," but not "my mother's womb." Indeed, the destruction of the patriarch's whole race is repeatedly assumed in the dialogue (e.g. Gen. 4. 16). Again, the omission of all reference to the defeat of Satan in the last chapter is quite in accordance with the grand simplicity of the poem (Schollmann, p. 39, 40). It was too obvious a result to need special notice, and it bad, in fact, been accomplished by the steadfast faith of the patriarch which so often measured. No allusion to the agency of that spirit was to be expected in the colloquy, since Job and his friends are represented as wholly ignorant of the transactions in heaven. At present, indeed, it is generally acknowledged that the entire work would be unintelligible without this portion. (4) The skew objection in the introduction chapter. It is certain that they first appear in Hebrew history about the year B.C. 770. But the name of Chaldea, an ancestor of the future, is found in the genealogical table in Genesis (xxii, 22), a fact quite sufficient to prove the early existence of the people as a separate tribe. It is highly probable that an ancient race bearing that name in Kurdistan (see Xenoph. Cyr. iii, 1, 34. : Abyd. iv, 3, 4; iv, 5, 17) was the original source of the nation, who were there trained in predatory habits, and accustomed, long before their appearance in history, to make excursions into the neighboring deserts, a view quite in harmony with the part assigned to them in this book. (5) Strong objections are made to the passage chap. xxxvii, 9, 10. The problem is to determine the character of the Jewish prophet of Zophar has been put into the mouth of Job. The fact of the contradiction is denied by able writers, who have shown that it rests upon a misapprehension of the patriarch's character and fundamental principles. He had been provoked under circumstances of peculiar aggravation into statements which at the close of a discourse by which he was to be anxious to guard or recall: he was bound, having spoken so rashly, to recognize, what, beyond doubt, he never intended to deny, the general justice of divine dispensations even in this world. Moreover, he intimates a belief or presentiment of a future retribution and recompense in any other way. Any one (see ver. 8). The whole chapter is thoroughly coherent: the first part is admitted by all to belong to Job: nor can the rest be disjoined from it without injury to the sense. Edwad says, "Only a grievous misunderstanding of the whole book could have led one to hold that this passage is interpolated or misplaced." Other critics have abundantly vindicated the authenticity of the passage (Hahn, Schollmann, etc.). As for the style, E. Rénan, a most competent authority in a matter of taste, declares that it is one of the finest developments of the style. It certainly differs exceedingly in its breadth, loftiness, and devout spirit from the speeches of Zophar, for whose silence satisfactory reasons have already been assigned (see the analysis). This last argument, however, applies rather to chap. xxviii, which may, without any impairment of the integrity of the poem, be regarded as an embellishment representing the times and sentiments of the final editor (e. i. Solomon).

3. The last two chapters of the address of the Almighty have been rejected as interpolations by many, of course rationalistic, writers (Stuhlman, Bernstein, Edwad), who hold that the inferiority of style, partly as not having any bearing upon the argument, but the connection of reasonings, involved, though, as was to be expected, not drawn out, in this discourse, has been shown in the preceding analysis; and as for the style, few who have a true ear for the Hebrew language have not been struck with the dissent from the judgment of E. Rénan, whose suggestion, that it may have been written by the same author at a later date, is far from weakening the force of his observation as to the identity of the style.

4. The speech of Elihu presents greater difficulties, and has been rejected by several rationalists, whose opinion, however, is not that of the writers, but by some of the most sceptical commentators. The former support their decision on the apparent, and, to a certain extent, the real difference between this and other parts of the book in tone of thought, in doctrinal views, and, more positively, in language and general style. Much stress is also laid on the fact that Elihu is not mentioned in the introduction nor at the end, and that his speech is unanswered by Job, and unnoticed in the final address of the Almighty. These points were observed by very early writers, and were accounted for in various ways. On the one hand, Elihu was regarded as a distinctly different person (S. Schollmann, p. 53). In the Seder Olam (a rabbinical system of chronology) he is reckoned among the prophets who declared the will of God to the Gentiles before the promulgation of the law. S. Bar-Nachman (12th century) notes his connection with the family of Abraham as a sign that he was the first person to expound the ways of God. The Greek fathers generally follow Chrysostom in attributing to him a superior intellect, while many of the best critics of the last two centuries consider that the true dialectic solution of the great problem, the book is to be found in the course of Elihu's discourse. On the other hand, Jerome, who is followed by Gregory, and many ancient as well as modern writers of the Western Church, speak of his character and arguments with singular contempt. Later critics, chiefly rationalists, see in him but an empty babbler, introduced only to heighten the contrast between the last part of the book and dignified discourse of Job. The alternative of rejecting his speech as an interpolation was scarcely less objectionable, and has been preferred by Stuhlman, Bernsteir, Edwad, Rénan, and other writers of similar opinions in other countries. A candid and searching examination, however, must convince us that double Elihu supplies exactly what Job repeatedly demands—a confutation of his opinions, not merely produced by an overwhelming display of divine power, but by rational and human arguments, and proceeding from one not, like his other opponents, bound to uphold the upright, candid, and truthful (comp. xxxiii, 3, with vi, 24, 25). The reasonings of Elihu are moreover such as are needed for the development of the doctrines insculpted in the book, while they are necessarily cast in a form which could not without irreverence be assigned to the Almighty. As to the objection that the doctrinal system of Elihu is in some points more advanced than that of Job or his friends, it may be answered, first, that there are no traces in this discourse of certain doctrines which were undoubtedly known at the earliest date to which those critics would assign the interpolation, whereas, it is evident that if they would have been adduced as the strongest arguments for a warning and consolation. No reader of the Psalms and of the Prophets could have failed to urge such topics as the resurrection, the future judgment, and the personal advent of Messiah. Secondly, the doctrinal system of Elihu differs but little from that of Job, which has been either developed or intimated in several passages of the work, and consists chiefly in a specific application of the mediatorial theory, not unknown to Job, and in a deeper appreciation of the love manifested in all providential dispensations. It is quite consistent with the plan of the book in general, and is shown in the arrangement of the whole work, that the highest view as to the object of afflictions, and to the source to which men should apply for comfort and instruction, should be reserved for this, which, so far as regards the human reasoners, is the culminating point of the discussion. Little can be said for Lightfoot’s theory that the whole work was composed by Elihu, or for E. Reiman’s view that the discourse may have been composed by the author in his old age; yet these views imply an unconscious impression that Elihu is the fullest exponent of the truth. It is satisfactory to know that two of the most impartial and discerning critics (Ewald and Reiman), who unite in denying this to be an oration in which a large portion of the work is solely acknowledged as its intrinsic excellence and beauty.

There is no difficulty in accounting for the omission of Elihu’s name in the introduction. No persons are named in the book until they appear as agents, or as otherwise concerned in the events. Thus Job’s brethren are named incidentally in one of his speeches, and his relatives are, for the first time, in the concluding chapter. Had Elihu been mentioned at first, we should of course have expected him to take part in the discussion, and the impression made by his startling address would have been lost. Job does not answer him, nor, indeed, does Elihu deny the cogency of his arguments, while this silence brings out a curious point of coincidence with a previous declaration of the patriarch (vi. 24, 25). Again, the discourse, being substantially true, did not need correction, and is therefore left unnoticed, in exactly the same way as the Almsgiving of the Almighty, which could be more in harmony with the ancient traditions of the East than that a youth, moved by a special and supernatural impulse to speak out God’s truth in the presence of his elders, should retire into obscurity when he had done his work. More weight is to be attached to the objection resting upon diversity of style and dialectic peculiarities. The most acute critics differ indeed in their estimate of both, and are often grossly deceived (see Schottmann, p. 61); still, there can be little doubt as to the fact. It may be accounted for either on the supposition that the author adhered strictly to the form in which tradition handed down the dialogue—in which case the speech of a Syrian might be expected to bear traces of his dialect—or that the Chaldaic forms and idioms, which are far from resembling later vulgares or corruptions of Hebrew, and occur only in highly poetical passages of the oldest writers, as peculiarly suit the style of the young and fiery speaker (see Schottmann, Exil. p. 61). It has been observed, and with apparent truth, that the discourses of the other interlocutors have each a very distinct and characteristic coloring, shown not only in the general tone of thought, but in the nature of the expression (Ewald, and Schottmann). The excessive obscurity of the style, which is universally admitted, may be accounted for in a similar manner. A young man speaking under strong excitement, embarrassed by the presence of his elders and by the peculiar responsibility of his position, might be expected to use language obscured by repetitions, and, though ingenious and true, yet somewhat intricate and imperfectly developed arguments, such as, in fact, present great difficulties in the exposition of this portion of the book.

VI. Commentaries.—The following is a list of the exegetical helps on the whole book exclusively, the most important being designated by an asterisk [*] prefixed: Origen, Selecta (in Opp. ii, 499); also Scholi (in Bibl. Patr. Gallandii, xiv); Anon. Commentarius (in Origen’s Opp. ii, 808); Athanasius, Excerpta (in Opp. i, ii, 1063); Jerome, Commentarius (in Opp. Suppos. xi, 566); Philippius, Expositio (in Jerem. Opp. Spur. vii, 893; also in Bede’s Opp. iv; also Basil, 527, fol.); Augustine, Annotationes (in Opp. iii, 829); Chrysostom, Homiliae (in Opp. Spur. vii, 681); Ezechiel Syrus, Scholia (in Syriac, in Opp. iii, i-20); Gregory, Moralia (in Opp. i, 1; also tracts in Oxford, 1844, 50, 4 vols. 8vo); Olympiodorus, etc., Catena (Ludgundum, 1586, 4to); London, 1557, folio; Bruno Asteinus, In Jobum (in Opp. i). versions has made of it, 7. It was also entertained by Abulafa (Hist. Ael) in p. 26, and, in modern times, by the best scholars generally. The passages which are considered to indicate this disease are found in the description of his skin burning from head to foot, so that his sleep was interrupted by scraping himself (ii, 7, 8); in its being covered with putrefaction and crusts of earth, and being at one time stiff and hard, while at another it cracked and discharged fluid (vii, 5); in the offensive breath, which drove away the kindness of attendants (xxx, 17), in the restless nights, which were either asleep or scarred with frightful dreams (vii, 18, 14; xxx, 17); in general emaciation (xvi, 8); and in so intense a burning of the hardship of life that strangling and death were preparable to it (vii, 16). In this picture of Job's sufferings the state of the skin is not so distinctly described as to enable us to identify the disease with leprosy in a rigorous sense. The difficulty is also increased by the fact that 7772 (shekheha), a sore, Sept. ένγος) is generally rendered "boils." But that word, according to its radical sense, only means burning, inflammation—a hot sense of pain, which, although it attends boils and abscesses, is common to other cutaneous infections. On this fact, the context is very clear; he scraped himself with a potsherds is irreconcilable with the notion that his body was covered with boils or open sores, but agrees very well with the thinned state of the skin which characterizes the disease. See Leprosy.

2. (216, Yob; if genuine, perh. returning, from 216 = 216; Sept. Τασαβρός, Vulg. Job). The third-named of the four sons of Issachar (Gen. xi, 19), elsewhere called Hushim (Num. xxxvi, 24; 1 Chron. vii, 1), for which this is probably an erroneous transcription.

Job of Rostoff), first patriarch of the Russo-Greek Church, flourishing in the second half of the 16th century. We have already had occasion to refer to the circumstances under which Russia succeeded in establishing an independent patriarchate in her dominions in the geographical sketch of the Greek patriarch Jeremias (q. v.). This important event took place in 1563, and was solemnly confirmed by the Constantinopolitan patriarch in a synod of the Greek Church held in 1592. The act was also confirmed in 1619 by Thophilus, the patriarch of Jerusalem. By the other Oriental patriarchs Job was recognized as the fifth patriarch of the orthodox Church. Of his history we are ignorant. See Aschbacher, Kirchenlex., iii, 291; Stanley, East Church, p. 435, 436; Strabli, Russ. Kirchengesch., i, 619. See Greek Church, vol. iii, p. 981, col. 2.

Job, Heb. Jobab, 271. The first named of the sons of Job, and founder of a tribe in Arabia (Gen. x, 29; 1 Chron. i, 29), B.C. post 2414. Bochart comments (Phaleg, ii, 29) the Jobab (Yapab) of Potemons (vii, 24) a people on the eastern coast of Arabia, near the Socotra, which, after Salmasius, he supposes to be Jobitis; so also Michaelis (Ab. i, 29; Supplem., 1659).

2. Son of Zerah of Beth, king of Edom after Bala and before Husham (Gen. xxxvi, 33, 34), i Chron. i, 44, 45, B.C. prob. long ante 1617. The supposition that he was identical with the patriarch Job rests only upon the apocryphal addition to the book of Job in the Sept., and is utterly unworthy of credit. See Jon.

3. The Canaanite king of Madon, one of those whose aid Jabin invoked in the struggle with the Israelites (Josh. xi, 1), B.C. 1617.

4. The first-named of the sons of Shaharaim by one of his wives, Hedef or Besa, of the tribe of Benjamin, although apparently born in Moab (1 Chron. viii, 9). B.C. cir. 1612.

5. One of the "sons of Elpaal, a chief of Benjamin, at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 18), B.C. probably cir. 588.

Joceline, bishop of Bath and Wells. See Jos. (king of England).

Joceline of Salisbury, a prelate of the early English Church, flourished from 1142 to 1184. In the controversy of Thomas à Becket with King Henry II, the prelate was a prominent supporter of the king in this great ecclesiastical war, and fell under the displeasure of the archbishop. See Lestiviste. The latter, in accordance with his incorruptible spirit, soon found a pretext to impress his inferior with his power at Rome by condemning Joceline for his assent to the royal election of appointments of John of Oxford to the deanship of Salisbury, notwithstanding the archbishop's prohibition. Joceline adhering to his former course, Becket pronounced excommunication against the rebellious prelate, and his act was approved shortly after by pope Alexander III (1160). Of course the bishop remained in his place, but he encountered many difficulties from the subordination of inferior ecclesiastics, as in the case of the monks of Malmsbury about 1180 (comp. Inett, Hist. Engl. Ch. ii, ch. xv, § 19). See England, Church of.

Joch, Johann Georg, a German theologian, born at Rotenburg, in Franconia, in 1668, became an Alessandria in Utrecht, and died in 1731. To him belongs the credit of having been the first to assert the superiority of practical Christianity over the then prevailing pietism, in the principal stronghold of Lutheran theology, the cathedra Lutheri at Wittenberg. While yet a boy, the then chief object of pietism in the 18th century was, both as a student and as private tutor, one of the disciples of Spener, and an ardent pietist; but when he became superintendent of the gymnasium of Dortmunt, where dogmatism and polemics alone filled the churches and the halls of learning, Joch turned his attention to the subjects of conversion and personal birth. He was of course involved in a controversy, but he seems to have been quite successful, for in 1728 he was made a professor of theology at Wittenberg. —Herzig, Real-Encyklop., v. p. 88. See Augusti, Der Pietismus in Jens, etc. (Jena, 1857); Göbel, Gesch. d. christl. Lehre d. r. -zweckh. ev. Kirche.

Jochanan Bar-Naphazah, a distinguished rabbi, was born in Judea about A.D. 170. He is said to have studied under Judah Hakkodesh and other Jewish teachers, and is believed to have formed a school of his own at Tiberias when quite a youth. His history, like that of all other distinguished rabbis of that period, has been very imperfectly preserved, and extraordinary legends that it is very high impossible to arrive at anything definite concerning his life. So much appears certain, that he lived to a very old age, instructing very nearly to his last hour (in 279). He is by some Hebraists supposed to have collected all the works written on the Jerusalem Talmud (q. v.); but this seems unreasonable. See J. Furst, Biblioth. Judaica, ii, 94, 99; Grätz, Geschichte der Juden, iv, 285 sq. See JUDEH HAKKODES. (J. H. W.)

Jochanan Ben-Zachia. Jewish rabbi of some note, and contemporary of the celebrated Gamaliel ii, whom he succeeded in the patriarchal See. He flourished about B.C. 50. But little is known of his personal history. He is said to have been a decided peace man, and to have greatly discouraged any revolutionary efforts of his suffering countrymen. This may account for the esteem in which he was held at the court of Vespasian, who was always found ready to oblige his Jewish friend. Jochanan Ben-Zachia is regarded as the restorer of Jewish learning and scholastic habits after the destruction of the Temple, by the founding of a school at Jabez, and a new sanhedrin, of which he was the first president, thus presenting to the unfortunate and dispersed race another centre in place of the latter in the sacred capital. How long he served his people at Jabez is not well known; Grätz inclines to put it at about ten years (comp. Frankel, Monatsschrift) [1852, p. 201 sq.]. He

JOEL was a prophet of the second minor prophets (Joel i, 1). His history is only known from the contents of the book that bears his name.

JOEL BOOK OF. I. Personal Circumstances. — 1. Birthplace.—Pseudo-Epiphanius (ii, 248) records a tradition that the prophet was of the tribe of Levi, born and buried at Bethhoron (v. r. Bethem, etc.), between Jerusalem and Cesarea. It is most likely that he lived in Judea, for his commission was to Judah, as that of Hosea had been to the ten tribes (Jerome, Comment. in Joel). He exuchs the priests, and makes frequent mention of Judea and Jerusalem (v. i, 18; ii, 2; iii, i, 12, 17, 20, 21). It has been made a question whether he were a priest himself (Winer, Real.builders, but there do not seem to be sufficient grounds for determining it in the affirmative, though some recent writers (e. g. Maurice, Prophets and Kings, p. 189) have taken this view.

2. Date.—Various opinions have been held respecting the period in which Joel lived. It appears most probable that he was contemporary with Amos and Isaiah, and delivered his predictions in the reign of Uzziah, B. C. cir. 800. This is the opinion maintained by Abarbanel, Vitringa, Leenhardt, Dr. Wilken, Holzhausen and others (see D. H. v. Kaulf, Dieis, de Joel estate, Marb. 1811; Jüger, in the Tübing. theol. Zeitschr. 1828, ii, 227). Credner (Joel, p. 88), with whom agree Movers (Chron. 119 sq.), Hitzig (Kleine Proph. p. 4), and Meier (Joel, p. 16). The principal reason (i, 18; ii, 1, 18; iii, 1, 17) for this conclusion, besides the order of the books (the Sept., however, places Joel after Amos and Micah), is the special and exclusive mention of the Egyptians and Edomites as enemies of Judah, no allusion being made to the Assyrians or Babylonians, who arose at a later period.

2. Contents.—We find, what we should expect on the supposition of Joel being the first prophet to Judah, only a grand outline of the whole terrible scene, which was to be depicted more and more in detail by subsequent prophets (Brown, Ordo Saec. p. 691). The scope, therefore, is not any particular invasion, but the whole day of the Lord. The book of Joel is but a brief Jewish prophetic discourse, and may explain to us what distant events in the history of the land would expand it, and bring fresh discoveries within the sphere of the inspired man's vision" (Maurice, Prophets and Kings. p. 170). The predominant events to which the prophecy related were a public calamity, then known as the plague on Judah, of a twofold character: want of water, and a plague of locusts, continuing for several years. The prophet exhorts the people to turn to God with penitence, fasting, and prayer, and then, he says, the plague shall cease, and the rain descend in its season, and the land yield her accustomed fruit—nay, the time will be a most joyful one; for God, by the outpouring of his Spirit, will impart to his worshippers increased knowledge of himself, and, after the excision of the enemies of his people, will extend through them the blessings of true religion to Israel and lands. Brown (Ordo Saec. p. 692) regards the contents of the prophecy as embracing two visions, but it is better to consider it as one connected representation (Hengstenberg, Winer). For its interpretation we must observe not isolated facts of history, but the scene. The swarm of locusts was the medium through which God's people, the "true Church," was represented to the inward contemplation of the prophet; but, in one unbroken connection, the idea goes on to penitence, return, blessing, outpouring of the Spirit, judgments on the enemies of the Church (1 Pet. iv, 17), final establishment of God's kingdom. All prior destructions and judgments, and visions of smaller circles, the final consummation of all things, to which the prophecy reaches, being the outmost one of...
1. The prophet opens his commission by announcing an extraordinary plague of locusts, accompanied with extensive famine. He begins his prophecy with regioned animates and sublime poetry under the image of an invading army (i, 1-11). The fidelity of his highly-wrought description is corroborated and illustrated by the testimonies of Shaw, Vedney, Forbes, and other eminent travellers, who have been eye-witnesses of the ravages of this pest, and this of a most terrible kind, the insect tribe. See Locust.

2. It is to be observed that locusts are named by Moses as instruments of the divine justice (Deut. xxviii, 39, 39), and by Solomon in his prayer at the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings viii, 57). In the second chapter the formidable aspect of the locusts, rapid progress, their spread, devastation, the awful murmur of their countless throng, their instinctive marshallng, the irresistible perseverance with which they make their way over every obstacle and through every aperture, are delineated with the utmost graphic force (Justl, "Commentaries on Joel ii, in Ellicott’s "Bibliothek," iv. 30-79). Dr. Hengstenberg calls in question the reality of their flight, but, as it appears to us, without adequate reason. Other particulars are mentioned which literally can apply only to locusts, and which, on the supposition that the language is inapplicable only as being auxiliary traits for filling up the picture (Davidson, Sacred Hermetica, p. 310).

Maurice (Prophets and Kings, p. 180) strongly maintains the literal interpretation of this judgment. Yet the plague contained a parable in it which it was the prophet's mission to unfold (comp. "beatitude," p. 6). Hence a figurative interpretation was adopted by an early paraphrast, Ephrem the Syrian (A.D. 350), who supposes that by the four different denominations of the locusts were intended Tijlah-pjeser, Shalmanser, Sennacherib, and Nebuchadnezzar. The Jews, in the time of Jeremiah, understood the passages under the Assyrists and Chaldæans; by the second, the Medes and Persians; by the third, Alexander the Great and his successors, and by the fourth, the Romans. By others, however, the prophecy was interpreted literally, and Jerome himself, in his "Expositio," has discussed, between the two opinions, though more inclined to the allegorical view. Grotius applies the description to the invasions by Ptol. and Shalmaneser. Holzhausen attempts to unite both modes of interpretation, and applies the language literally to the locusts, and metaphorically to the Assyrians and Chaldæans. This, however, that the literal invasion be intended, not the least hint is given of personal injury sustained by the inhabitants; the immediate effects are confined entirely to the vegetable productions and the cattle. Dr. Hengstenberg, while strongly avers from the literal sense, is not disposed to limit the metaphorical meaning to any one event or class of invaders. "The enemy," he remarks, "are designated only as north countries. From the north, however, from Syria, all the principal invasions of Palestine proceeded. We have therefore, no reason to think exclusively of any one of them; nor ought we to limit the prophecy to the people of the old covenant. Throughout all centuries there is but one Church of God existing in unbroken connection. That this Church, during the first period of its existence, was concentrated in a land into which hostile intrusions were made from the north was purely accidental. Under this circumstance this extraordinary event, as the foundation-stone of the fulfilment of prophecy were just as absurd as if one were to assert that the threatening of Amos, 'By the sword shall all sinners of my people die,' has not been fulfilled in those who perished after another manner' (Christology, Keith's translation, i, 104). In accordance with the literal (and certainly the primary) interpretation of the prophecy, we should render "הָיָה הָנִּים as in our A. V., 'the former rain,' with Rosenmuller and the lexicographers, rather than as (or the teacher of rightousness' with margin of A. V., Hengstenberg, and others.

The allusion to the Messiah which Hengstenberg finds in this word, or to the ideal teacher (Deut. xviii, 18), of whom Messiah was the chief, scarcely accords with the intended reference to the strain of animates and sublime poetry under the image of an invading army (i, 1-11). The fidelity of his highly-wrought description is corroborated and illustrated by the testimonies of Shaw, Vedney, Forbes, and other eminent travellers, who have been eye-witnesses of the ravages of this pest, and this of a most terrible kind, the insect tribe. See Locust.

3. The מִם (mimm) of i, in the Hebrew, "afterwards," ii, 27 of the A. V., raises us to a higher level of vision, and brings into view Messianic times and scenes (comp. Tyschen, Illustratio vaticinis Joelis iii [Gotz 1787]; Steudel, Disq. in Joelis iii [Tithagen 1820]). Here, says Steudel, we have a Messianic prophecy altogether. If this prediction has ever yet been fulfilled, we must certainly refer the event to Acts ii. The best commentators are agreed upon this. We must not, however, interpret it thus to the exclusion of all reference to preparatory events and the earlier declaration, and still less to the exclusion of later Messianic times. Acts ii virtually contained the whole subsequent development. The outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost was the αρραβον, while the full accomplishment and the final reality are yet to come. But here both are blended in one, and the whole passage has a Messianic aspect (see Dresd. Proph. Joels de αρραβων. Sp. [Sp. [Witt 1782]). The passage is well quoted by Peter from the first prophet to the Jewish kingdom. His quoting it shows that the Messianic reference was the prevailing one in his day, though Acts ii, 39 proves that he extended it to the end of the Dispersion. The expression "all flesh" (Acts ii, 17) is explained by the following clauses, by which no principle of distribution is meant, but only that all classes, without respect of persons, will be the subjects of the Spirit's influences. All distinction of races, too, will be done away (comp. Joel ii, 9, with Rom. xii, 18).

4. Lastly, the accompanying portents and judgments upon the enemies of God (ch. iii, A. V.; iv, Heb.), and their various solutions, according to the interpreters, in the repeated deportations of the Jews by neighboring merchants, and sale to the Macedonians [1 Mac. iv, 41; Es. xi, 13], followed by the sweeping away of the neighboring nations (Maurice); in the events accompanying the crucifixion, in the fall of Jerusalem, in the breaking up of all human polities. But here again the idea includes all manifestations of judgment, ending with the whole is shadowed forth, as the great outline, and, while some crises are past, others are yet to come (comp. iii, 13-21 with Matt. xxiv, 1, and Rev. xix). See Double Sense.

III. The style of Joel, it has been remarked, unites the strength of Micah with the tenderness of Jeremiah. In vividness of description he rivals Nahum, and in sublimity and majesty is scarcely inferior to Isaiah and Habakkuk (Couz. De caractere poetico Joeli [Tub. 1783]). "Imprimis est elegans, clarus, fusus, thumque; valde etiam sublimis ac fervidus" (Lorth. De Sacra Poetis HEB. Prael. xxi). Many German divines assign that the latter parts of all the prophetic books, some say that Isaiah ii, 4-6; Micah iv, 1-3, are direct imitations of him. Parts of the New Testament also (Rev. ix, 2 sq.; xiv, 18) are pointed out as passages in his style.

The commentary of this book has never been called in question.

IV. Commentaries.—The special exegetical help on the book of Joel as a whole are the following, to the most important of which we prefix an asterisk: Ephrem Syrus, Explanatio (in Sryr., in Opp. v, 249); Hugo de Victor, Annotationes (in Opp. i); Seb. Münster, Commentarium (in Opp. i); Caspar Hasse, C. I. S. F. (1680, 8vo); Caspar Hasse, Commentarius (brief, with Amos and Obadiah) (Argent, 1586, 8vo); also Commentarius (Vittem, 1547, 4to); both in German.

10. A Levite, son of Uziah or Aaziah, and father of Elkanah, of the family of Kothah (1 Chron. vi, 36), and one of those who co-operated with Hezekiah in his restoration of the Temple services (2 Chron. xxix, 12). B.C. 726. In 1 Chron. vi, 24 he is called Shaal or by an error of the scribers.

11. A descendant of Simon, apparently one of those whose enraging families compelled them to emigrate to the valley of Gedor, whose aboriginal inhabitants they expelled (1 Chron. iv, 35). B.C. cir. 712.

12. Son of Zicht and prefect of the Benjaminites resident at Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. xi, 9). B.C. 536.

13. One of the "sons" of Nebo, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra, x, 43). B.C. 465.

Joielah (Heb. Yodkah), גּוֹלֶא הַלָּא, a name or derivation uncertain; Sept. *Iωακι,v. 1.9.11, Vulg. Joelah), one of the two sons of Jeroham of Gedor, mentioned along with the brave Benjaminite archers and others who joined David's fortunes at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 7). B.C. 1055.

Jo’zer (Heb. Yozzer, יֶזֶר, Jehováh is his help); Sept. *Iωακαρ v. 1.9.11, one of the Korhites who reinforced David while at Ziklag, and remained among his famous body-guard (1 Chron. xii, 6). B.C. 1055.

Joga. See HINDUSTAN; VISNUH.

Jogbehah (Heb. Yoboak, יַעֹבָה, only with paragotic, גּוֹבָה, lofty; Sept. *Iουβα, but יָוָּאֵב, adj. in Num.; Vulg. Joppa), a place mentioned (between Jazer and Beth-nimrah) among the "fenced cities and folds for sheep" rebuilt by the Gadites (Numb. xxxiii, 85). It lay on the route of Gideon when pursuing the nomadic Midianites, near Nobah, beyond Peniel, in the direction of Karkor (Judg. viii, 11). These notices correspond sufficiently with the locality of the ruined village El-Jebel (Robinson's Researches, iii, Append. p. 108), laid down on Robinson's and Zimmerman's map on the edge of the desert east of Jebel el-Fuksa.

Joges. See YOGER.

Jogel (Heb. Togel, יַעַל, eldest; Sept. l.10), the father of Bikki, whom latter was the Danite commissioneer for partitioning the land of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv, 22). B.C. ante 1618.

Jogues, or YUGUS, is a name among the Hindus for periods of extraordinary length spoken in their mythological chronology.

Jo’ha (Heb. Yocha, יֹכָה, probably contracted for יָכָה, whom Jehocah revives), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. יָכָה v. יָכָה). A person mentioned as a Tizite, along with his brother Jediel, the son of Shimi, among David's famous body-guard (1 Chron. xi, 43). B.C. 1055.

2. (Sept. יָכָה v. יָכָה). The last named among the Benjamite chiefs, descendants of Beriah, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 16). B.C. apparently 888 or 856.

Johanan (Heb. Yochanan, יְיוֹחָנָן, יְיוֹחָנָן, a contracted form of the name JEHOHANAN; comp. also JOHN), the name of several men. See also JEHOHANAN, 3, 4, 6.

1. (Sept. יָוָּאֵב v. יָוָּאֵב). The eighth of the Gadite bravoes of Eth. (Joiner) [David's band in the fastness of the desert of Judah (1 Chron. xii, 12)]. B.C. cir. 1061.

3. (Sept. יָוָּאֵב v. יָוָּאֵב, יָוָּאֵב). Son of Aaziah and father of Azariah, high-priest (1 Chron. vi, 9, 10, where perhaps an erroneous repetition of names has occurred). He is thought by some to have been the same with Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv, 15). Josephus, however (Ant. x, 6, 6), seems to call him Joram, and the Seder Olam Jeroham, whom it places in the reign of Jehoashaphat. See HIGH-PRIEST.

4. (Sept. יָוָּאֵב). The oldest son of king Joash (1 Chron. iii, 15). He must have been born in the fifteenth year of his father's age, and he seems to have been of so feeble a constitution as not to have survived his father. See JEROHAM.

5. (Sept. יָוָּאֵב v. יָוָּאֵב v. יָוָּאֵב). Son of Aaziah and father of Azariah, high-priest (1 Chron. vi, 9, 10, where perhaps an erroneous repetition of names has occurred). He is thought by some to have been the same with Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv, 15). Josephus, however (Ant. x, 6, 6), seems to call him Joram, and the Seder Olam Jeroham, whom it places in the reign of Jehoashaphat. See HIGH-PRIEST.

6. (Sept. יָוָּאֵב). Son of Aaziah and father of Azariah, high-priest (1 Chron. vi, 9, 10, where perhaps an erroneous repetition of names has occurred). He is thought by some to have been the same with Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv, 15). Josephus, however (Ant. x, 6, 6), seems to call him Joram, and the Seder Olam Jeroham, whom it places in the reign of Jehoashaphat. See HIGH-PRIEST.
JOHANNES 942

1. The father of Matthew, of the Maccabean family (1 Macc. ii, 1). See Maccabees.

2. The son of Acco, and father of Eupolemus, who latter was one of the envoys sent by Judas Maccabaeus to Rome (1 Macc. viii, 17; 2 Macc. iv, 11).

3. Surnamed Caddis (q. v.), the eldest son of the same Mattathias, and one of the Maccabean brothers (1 Macc. i, 2), and cousin and possibly Joseph (q. v.), his elder brother. He had been sent by his brother Jonathan on a message to the Nabatheans, when he was taken prisoner "by the children of Jambri" (q. v.), from Medeba, and appears to have been put to death by them (1 Macc. i, 35, 36, 39).

4. One of the Maccabees sent by the Jews to a petition to the Syriac king, general Lydias (2 Macc. xi, 17).

5. The son of Simon Maccabaeus (1 Macc. xiii, 58; xvi, 1, 2, 9, 15, 21, 23), better known by the epithet Hycrana (q. v.).

II. In the New Testament the following are all that are mentioned, besides John the Apostle and John the Baptist, who are noticed separately below:

1. One of the high-priest's family, who, with Annas and Caiaphas, sat in judgment upon the apostles Peter and John for their cure of the lame man and preaching in the temple (Acts iv, 6). A.D. 29. Lightfoot identifies him with Johanan ben-Zachai, who lived forty years before the destruction of the Temple, and was president of the great synagogue after its removal to Jabne, or Jamnia (Lightfoot, Cent. Chor. Matth. proef. ch. 15; see also Selden, De Synedriis, ii, ch. xv). Grotsius merely says he was known to Rabbinical writers as "John the priest" (q. v.).—Smith, Dict. Base.

2. The Hebrew name of the evangelist Mark (q. v.), who throughout the narrative of the Acts is designated by the name by which he was known among his countrymen (Acts xii, 12, 25; xiii, 5, 13; xv, 37).

III. In Josephus the following are the most noteworthy of this name, besides John of Gischala, whom we notice separately below:

1. A high-priest (son of Judas, and grandson of Elia- shib), who slew his brother Jesus in the Temple, thereby provoking the vengeance of Bagose, the Persian victor over Artaxerxes (Ant. xi, 7, 1). He corresponds to the Jonathan (q. v.), son of Joia, of Neh. xii, 10, 11. See High-Priest.

2. Son of Dorcas, sent by the Scearei with ten executioners to murder the persons taken into custody by John of Gischala on his arrival in Jerusalem (Josephus, War. ii, 5, 4).

3. Son of Sosan, one of the four popular generals of the Idumaeans who marched to Jerusalem in aid of the zealots at the instance of John of Gischala (Josephus, War. iv, 4, 2). He was possibly the same with John the E-sene, spoken of as commander of the toparchy of Shamma at an earlier stage of the war (ib. ii, 29, 4; comp. ii, 2, 1). He was mortally wounded by a dart during the last siege (ib. v, 5, 6).

John (Ἰωάννης) the Apostle, and brother of the apostle James “the greater” (Matt. iv, 21; x; 2 Mark i, 19; iii, 17; x, 35; Luke x, 44; viii, 3). See John the Baptist.

1. Personal History.—Early Life. It is probable that he was born at Bethsaida, on the Lake of Galal The general impression left on us by the Gospel narrative is that he was younger than the brother whose name commonly precedes his (Matt. iv, 1: x, 5; xii, 1, etc.); but compare Luke x, 26, where the order is inverted in the Syriac, younger than his friend Peter, possibly also than his Master. The life which was re- tracted to the time of Trajan (Eusebius, H. E. i. 33, 25, following Irenaeus) can hardly have begun before the year B.C. 4 of the Dionysian era. The Gospels give us the name of his father Zebedee (Matt. iv, 21) and his mother Salome (comp. Matt. xxvii, 56 with Mark, xvi, 40; xvi, 1). Of the former we know nothing more. See ZEDEBEES. The traditions of the fourth century (Epiphanius, iii, Herr. 78) make the latter the daughter of Joseph by his first wife, and consequently husband to our Lord. By some recent critics she has been identi-tilled with the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, in John xix. 25, (Wieseler, in Stud. u. Krit. 1840, p. 648), Ewald (Gesch. Israels, v. 171) adopts Wieseler's conjecture, and connects it with his own hypothesis, that the sons of Zebedee, and our Lord, as well as the Baptist, were of the tribe of Levi. On the other hand, more sobriety and judgment are found in the editor of the 8th and 9th editi., who, after Lücke (Johannes, v. 9), reject both the tradition and the conjecture. See also Salome. They lived, it may be inferred from John i, 44, or in the same town as those who were afterwards the companions and partners of their children. See Bethsaida. There, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, with him to Galilee, they grew up. The mention of the "hired servants" (Mark v, 20), of his mother's "substance" (ἀντί των ἐπιστέφων, Luke viii, 3), of "his own house" (τὰ ἰδία, John xix, 27), implies a position removed by at least some steps from absolute poverty. The fact that the apostle was known from the high-priest Caiaphas, as that knowledge was hardly likely to have begun after he had avowed himself the disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, suggests the probability of some early intimacy between the two men or their families. The name which the parents gave to their younger child was too common to amount to a sign of a special favor; but it deserves notice (1) that the name appears among the kindred of Caiaphas (Acts iv, 6); (2) that it was given to a priestly child, the son of Zacharias (Luke i, 18), as the embodiment and symbol of Messianic hopes. The frequent occurrence of it in the lists of the Twelve those four names of the sons of Joseph of Arimathea, only the received as personal, traces of individual character, of special turning-points in their lives. Soon they find themselves in the number of the Twelve who are chosen, not as disciples only, but as their Lord's delegates—representatives—apostles. In the lists of the Twelve those four names of the sons of Jonathas and Zebedeus are found, only in the innermost circle of their Lord's friends, and are as the ἑξάκοιτον ἀδελφοί τύποι. The three, Peter, James, and John, are with him when none else are, in the chamber of death (Mark v, 57, in the glory of the transfiguration (Matt. xviii, 1), when he forewarns them of the destruction of the Holy City (Mark xiii, 8, 12); in this instance, with him, in the agony of Gethsemane. Peter is throughout the leader of that band; to John belongs the yet more memorable distinction of being the disciple whom Jesus loved. This love is returned with a more single undivided heart by him than by any other. If Peter is the φιλόκαισαρ, John is the φιλόσπουτος (Grotius, Prolegom. in Joann.). Some striking facts indicate why this was so; what the character was which was thus worthy of the love of Jesus of Nazareth. They hardly sustain the popular notion of a love fostered by the labors of the future Baptist, perhaps may have imparted a meaning to it for the parents of the future evangelist which it would not otherwise have had. Of the character of Zebedeus we have hardly the slightest trace. He interposes no refusal when his sons are called on to leave him (Matt. iv, 21). After this he disappears from the scene of high apostolic history; and we are led to infer that he had died before his wife followed her children in their work of ministration. Her character meets us as presenting the same marked features as those which were conspicuous in her son. From her, who followed Jesus and ministered to him of her substance (Luke viii, 3), he sought for her two sons that they might sit, one on his right hand, the other on his left, in his kingdom (Matt. xx, 20), he might well derive his strong affections, his capacity for giving and receiving love, his eagerness for the speedy manifestation of the Messiah's kingdom. The early years of the apostle we may believe to have passed under this influence. He would be trained in all that constituted the ordinary education of Jewish boyhood. Though not taught in the schools of Jerusalem, and therefore, in later life, liable to the reproach of having no recognised position as a teacher, no Rabbinical education (Acts iv, 15), he would yet be taught to read from the Law and the Prophets, to feed on the writings of the prophets with the feeling that their accomplishment was not far off.

2. Incidents recorded of him in the New Testament.—The ordinary life of the fisherman of the Sea of Galilee who was at last broken and united with him in his last journey to heaven upon a village of the Samaritans (Luke i, 54). About this time Salome, as if her husband had died, takes her place among the women who followed Jesus in Galilee (Luke viii, 3), ministering to him of his substance, and went up with them into the last journey to Jerusalem (John xii, 58). Through her, we may well believe, John first came to know Mary Magdalene, whose character he depicts with such a life-like touch, and that other Mary, to whom he was afterwards to stand in so close and special a relation. The fulness of his narrative of what the other evangelists omit (John xi) leads to the conclusion that he was united also by some special ties of intimacy to the family of Bethany. It is not necessary to dwell at length on the familiar history of the Last Supper. What is characteristic is that he is there, as ever, the disciple whom Jesus loved; and, as the chosen and favored friend, reclines at table with his head upon his Master's breast (John xiii, 29). To him the eager Peter—they had been sent together to prepare the supper (Luke xxi, 8)—makes signs of impatient questioning that he should ask what was not likely to be answered if it came from any other (John xiii, 24). As they go out to the Mount of Olives, Peter was not in their Master's company. They only are within sight or hearing of the conflict in Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi, 37). When the betrayal is accomplished, Peter and John, after the first moment of confusion, follow afar off, while the others simply seek safety in a hasty flight (John xviii, 10). The personal acquaintance existed between Peter and Jesus, and enabled him to gain access both for himself and Peter, but the latter remains in the porch, with the officers and servants, while John himself apparently is admitted to the council-chamber, and follows Jesus thence, even to the prostomium of the Roman procurator (John xviii, 16, 19, 28). To trace, as if the desire to see the end, and the love which was stronger than death, sustained him through all the tears and sorrows of that day, he followed—accompanied probably by his own mother, Mary the mother of Jesus, and Mary Magdalene—to the place of crucifixion, where the teacher who had been to him as a son was to die, and he learned to him a brother's duty. He is to be as a son to the mother who is left desolate (John xix, 26-27). The Sabbath that followed was spent, it would appear, in the same company. He receives Peter, in spite of his denial, on the old terms of friendship. It is to the Magdalenite first meeting with the tidings of the emptied sepulchre (John xx, 2); they are the first to go together to see what the strange words meant. Not without some bearing on their respective characters is the fact that John is the most impetuous, running on most eagerly to the rock-tomb; Peter, the least restrained by awe, the first to enter in and look (John xx, 4-6). For at least eight days they continued in Jerusalem (John xx, 26). Then, in the interval between the resurrection and the ascension, we find them still together on the Sea of Galilee (John xx, 1), as though they would calm the eager suspense of that period of expectation by a return to their old calling and their old familiar haunts. Here, too, there is a characteristic difference. John is the first to recognise in the dim form seen in the morning twilight the presence of his risen Lord; Peter the first to plunge into the water and swim towards the shore where he stood calling to them (John xx, 6, 7). The last words of the Gospel reveal to us the deep affection which united the two friends. It is not enough for Peter to know his own future. That at once suggests the question—"And what shall this man do?" (John xxi, 21). The history of the Acts shows the same eager desire on the part of John and the other disciples. Peter's and John's presence on the Mount of Olives and on the day of Pentecost. Together they enter the Temple as worshippers (Acts iii, 1), and protest against the threats of the Sanhedrin (iv, 13). They are fellow-workers in the first great step of the Church's expansion. The apostle whose wrath had been roused by the unbelief of the Samaritans overcomes his national exclusiveness, and receives them as his brethren (vii, 14). The persecution which was pushed on by Saul of Tarsus did not drive him or any of the apostles from their post (viii, 1). When the persecutor came back as the convert, he, it is true, did not see him (Gal. i, 19), but this, of course, does not involve the least evidence that he had left Jerusalem. The sharper though shorter persecution which followed under Herod Agrippa brought a great sorrow to him in the martyrdom of his brother (Acts xii, 2). His friend was driven to seek safety in flight. Fifteen years after Paul's first visit he was still at Jerusalem, and helped to take part in the great settlement of the controversy between the Jewish and the Gentile Christians (Acts xvi, 6). His position and reputation were those of one ranking among the chief "pillars" of the Church (Gal. ii, 9). Of the work of the apostle during this period we have but the slightest trace. There may have been special calls to mission-work like that which drew him to Samaria. There may have been the work of teaching, organizing, restoring the churches of Judea. His fulfilment of the solemn charge intrusted to him may have led him to a life of loving and reverent thought rather than to one of conspicuous activity. We may, at all events, feel that he appreciated the tragedy of his Master's life, of his character, with all their fiery energy, became purified and mollified, rising step by step to that high serenity which we find perfected in the closing portion of his life. Here, too, we may, without much hesitation, accept the traditions of the Church as recording a historical fact Lampe fixes the charge and Caiaphas as the interlocutor (Tertull. De Monag. c. xiii). The absence of his name from 1 Cor. ix, 5 tends to the same conclusion. It harmonizes with all we know of his character to think of his heart as so absorbed in the higher and diviner love that there was no room left for the lower and the human. St. Ignatius of Antioch, in his "Epistle to Polycarp," says he was come, with more or less show of likelihood, to fill up the great gap which separates the apostle of Jerusalem from the bishop of Ephesus. It was a natural conjecture to suppose that he remained in Judea till the death of his Divine Master, and that he took place we can only conjecture. The hypothesis of Baronius and Tillemont, that the Virgin accompanied him to Ephesus, has not even the authority of tradition (Lampe, i, 51). There are no signs of his being at Jerusalem at the time of Paul's last visit (Acts xxii). The actual question is not whether he actually went to Ephesus before the work of the apostle of the Gentiles was brought to its conclusion. Out of many contradictory statements, fixing his departure under Claudius, or Nero, or as late even as Domitian, we have hardly any data for doing more than rejecting the two extremes and coming down to the time of John (v, 14), when he was besieged by the Roman forces under Cestius, as the most probable date. Nor is it certain that his work as an apostle was transferred at once from Jerusalem to Ephesus. A tradition current in the time of Augustine (Quast. Evang. ii, 19), and embodied in some MSS. of the New Testament respecting the 1st Epistle of John as addressed to the Parthians, and so far implied that his apostolic work had brought him into contact with them. In the earlier tradition which made the apostles formally partition out the world known to them, Parthia is the lot of Thomas while John respectively Pontus and Asia (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iii, 1). In one of the legends connected with the Apostles' Creed, Peter contributes the first article, John the second; but the tradition appears with great variations as to time and order (comp. Pseudo-August. Serm. cxvi, cxvii). When the question arises, for what reason, at the ascertainment of the apostolic age, we are still left in great doubt as to the extent of his work and the circumstances of his outward life. Assuming the authorship of the Epistles and the Revelation to be his, the facts which the New Testament writings assert or imply are: (1) that, having come to Ephesus, some persecution, local or general, drove him to Patmos (Rev. i, 9); (2) that the seven churches of which Asia was the centre, were special objects of his solicitude (Rev. i, 11); that in his work he had to encounter men who denied the truth on which his faith rested (1 John iv, 1; 2 John 7), and others who, it is obvious, were not simply the successors of his master's mortality (3 John 9, 10). If to this we add that he must have outlived all, or nearly all, of those who had been the friends and companions even of his mature years—that this lingering age gave strength to an old imagination that his Lord had promised him immortality (John xiv, 3)—that, as if remembering the actual words which had been thus perverted, the longing of his soul gathered itself up in the cry, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. xxii, 20)—that from some who spoke with authority he received a solemn attestation of the confidence the Church possessed of his presence, it is not surprising that he has any claim to the character of historical truth. The picture which tradition fills up for us has the merit of being full and vivid, but it blends together, without much regard to harmony, things probable and improbable. He is shipwrecked off Ephesus (Simeon Metaph. In vivd Johann. c. 2; Lampe, i, 47), and arrives there in time to check the progress of the heretics which sprang up after Paul's departure. Then, or at a later period, he numbers among his disciples men like Polycarp, Papias, Ignatius (Jerome, De vir. Illust. c. xvi.). In the persecution under Domitian he is taken to Rome, and there, by his boldness, though not by death, gains the crown of martyrdom. But he has, as it were, thrown his power to hurt him (Tertull. De Præscript. c. xxxvi.). The scene of the supposed miracle was the Porta Latina, and hence the Western Church commemorates it by the special festival of "St. John Port. Latin." On May 6th. He is then sent to labor in the mines, and finally to give the place of his all. (Victorius, In Apoc. ix; Lampe, i, 60). The accession of Nerva frees him from danger, and he returns to Ephesus. There he settles the canons of the Gospel history by formally attesting the truth of the first three Gospels, and writing his own to supply what they left wanting (Euseb., H. E. iii, 24). The elders of the Church are gathered together, and he, as a sudden inspiration, begins with the wonderful opening, "In the beginning was the word" (Jerome, De vir. Illust. 29). Heresiarchs continue to show themselves, but he meets them with the strongest possible denunciation: so as to show under the sun's blazing roof (that of the public baths of Ephesus)—against their foremost leader, lest the house should fall down on them and crush them (Iren. iii, 3; Euseb. H. E. iii, 28; iv, 14). Eusebius and Ireneaus make Cerinthus the heretic. In Epiphanius (Hær. xxx. c. 24) Eunomos is the hero of the discussion. To modern feelings the anacoluths may seem at variance with the character of the apostle of love, but it is hardly more than the development in act of the principle of 2 John 10. To the mind of Epiphanius there was a difficulty of another kind—nothing less than a special inspiration could account for such a departure from the canons of the Church to a book of its all. (Victorius, In the agency the great temple of Artemis is at last of its magnificence, and even (l) levelled with the ground. (Cyril. Alex. Ort. de Mar. Virg.; Nicephor. H. E. ii, 42; Lampe, i, 90). He introduces and perpetuates the Jewish mode of celebrating the Easter feast (Eusebius, H. E. iii, 24). Some time after the death of the Lord, bearing on his brow the plate of gold (μεταμφιεῖον; compare Suid. Thea. s. a.), with the sacred name engraved on it, which was the badge of the Jewish pontiffs (Polycrate, in Eusebius, H. E. iii, 31; vi, 24). In strange contrast with this ideal exaltation, a later tradition assigns to him the office of shepherding the flock, the playfulness and fondness of a favorite bird, and defended himself against the charge of unworthy tripping by the familiar apology of the bow that must sometimes be unblest (Caes. Collat. xxiv, c. 2). More true to the N.T. character of the apostle is the story, told with so much power and beauty by Clement of Alexan- dria (Quis divers, c. 42), of his special and loving interest in the younger members of his flock—of his eagerness in the young man's attempt to rescue one of them who had fallen into evil courses. The scene of the old and loving man, standing face to face with the young and backward, whom, in days gone by, he had baptized, and winning him to repentance, is one which we could gladly look on as belonging to his actual life—part of a story which is, in Clement's words, οὖ μὲν ἐδοκεὶ ἅλκη λαῖναι. Not less beautiful is that other scene which comes before us as that of St. John at Ephesus. The elder on whose breast the child, whom in days gone by, he had baptized, and winning him to repentance, is one which we could gladly look on as belonging to his actual life—part of a story which is, in Clement's words, "Little children, love one another" (Jerome, in Gal vi). Other stories have been added or adjoined to their most likely pass over rapidly. That he put forth his power to raise the dead to life (Euseb. H. F. v, 18); that he drank the cup of hemlock which was intended to cause his death, and suffered no harm from it (Pseudo-August. Soliloq.; Isidor. Hispal. De Morte Sanct. c. 78); that when he felt his death approaching he gave orders for the construction of his own epitaph (ibid.); that he declined to reapar on the point of a conflict which the orthodox christians in the last days (Suicer, Thes. s. v. 'Iwirynq)—these traditions, for the most part, indicate little else than the uncial spirit of the age in which they passed current. The very time of his death lies within the region of conjecture rather than of history; and the dates which have been calculated for it range from A.D. 69 to A.D. 120 (Lampe, i, 92).

I. Generousness.—There is no reason to doubt that the fourth Gospel was from the beginning received in the Church as the production of the apostle whose name it bears. We may decline to accept as a testimony to this the statement at the close of the Gospel itself (xxi, 24), for this can have the force of an independent testimony only on the supposition that the passage was added by another hand; and though there is evident allusion in 2 Pet. i, 4 to what is recorded in John xxi, 18, 19, yet, as the account taken from St. John the Evangelist, the latter tradition would be sure to send forth among the brethren (compare ver. 23), it cannot be inferred from Peter's allusion to it that it was then put on record as we have it in the Gospel. We may also admit that the passages in the writings of the apostolic fathers which have been adduced as evidence of their dependence on this Gospel are not decisive. The passages usually cited for this purpose are Barnab. Ep. vi, xii (comp. John quainted with John's Gospel, and cited it; and this brings us up to the beginning of the 2d century, within a short time of the apostle's death.

This concurrence of external testimony is the more Noticeable, seeing the statement in the Synoptic manuscripts of the just utterance of Christian thought and feeling by different men; though in three other passages cited from Ignatius (Ad Rom. vii. 20, and Ad Philiad. vii.) the coinidence of the first two with John vi. 32 sq., and of the last with John iii. 8, is almost too close not to call for invariable feeling with the text, and place the former text in the form of a doxology, if (as Dr. Mermod, in his Exeg. Joh. p. 102, 103, Rothe, Anfänge der Christl. Kirche p. 715.) But Eusebius attests that this Gospel was among the books universally received in the Church (Hist. Eccles. iii. 23); and it cannot be doubted that it formed part of the canon of the churches, both of the East and the West, before the end of the 3d century. See CANON. It is in the Peshito, and in the Muratorian Fragment.

It is quoted or referred to by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 52, 61; ii. 6; c. Tryph. 105, etc.; compare Olshausen, Echtheit der Kan. Evv. p. 304 sq.) by Tatian (Orat. ad Grecos. 4, 15) and Irenaeus (Adv. haer. iii. 29), Theol. Harrel. Fab. i. 20), in preparing which he must have had this gospel before him; in the Epistle of the Church at Antioch to the Corinthians (Eus. v. 1.), by Melito of Sardes (see Pinie, Speicleg. Sollemne i. 2, Prolegom. p. 5, Paris, 1803); in the pseudo-Clementian Letters (i. 11, 17, 20, p. 14, ed. Dindorf); by Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (Hist. eccles. i. 24); and in the Clementine Homilies (xix. 22, ed. Dressel, 1853), in such a way that not only is its existence proved, but evidence is afforded of the esteem in which it was held as canonical from the middle of the 2d century. Still more precise is the testimony of Theodore, bishop of Antioch, who not only composed a Harmony of the four evangelists (Jerome, De viris illust., 25; Ep. 151, ad Aegyptum), but in an extant work (ad Autol. ii. 22) expressly quotes John i. 1 as part of holy Scripture, and as the production of the great John, who was among the circle of the Evangelists. More important still is the testimony of Irenæus (Hist. iii. 11, 5, p. 218, ed. Grabe), both because of his acquaintance in early youth with Polycarp, and because of the distinctness and confidence with which he asserts the Johannine origin of this Gospel. See IRENAEUS. To these testimonies may be added that of Celsius, the enemy of the Christians, who, in preparing his attack upon them, evidently had the four canonical Gospels before him, and of whose citations from them some are undoubtedly from that of John (compare Olshausen, ut sup., p. 345, 351; Lipsius, Comment. iv. 2, 9, ed. 1835, which shows that, at the time when he wrote, this Gospel must have been in general acceptance by the Christians as canonical. The heretic Marcion, also, in rejecting this Gospel on dogmatical grounds, is a witness to the fact that its canonical authority was generally held by the Christians (Tertull. c. Marcion. iv. 5; De Corp. Christi.). That the Gospel was recognised as canonical by the Valentinians, one of the most important sects of the 2d century, is placed beyond doubt by the statement of Irenæus (Hist. iii. 11), and by the fact that it is quoted by Ptolemaeus, a disciple of Valentinus (Epiph. Hist. vii. 28, ed. Schneckenburger), and was commented upon by him without an formulas, another of his disciples, both of whom lived about the middle of the 2d century. That Valentinus himself knew and used the book is rendered probable by this, and by the statement of Tertullian (De prafer. Haret. 33). In expounding the 2d verse of this chapter, though he perverted its meaning; and this probability is raised to certainty by the fact that, in the recently discovered work of Hippolytus, Valentinus is found twice (Philosoph. vi. 33, 34, ed. Miller) citing the phrase τὸ δόξα τοῦ κυρίου τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ, as applied to the devil, which occurs only in John's Gospel, and repeatedly there (xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11); and also quoting the saying, John x. 38, as the word of Christ. From the same source also (vii. 22, 27, p. 292, 242) we learn that Basilides was ac-regarded as discharged (Doplmatik i, 268, 3rd ed.). Since that work appeared, the claims of the Gospel have been opposed by Strauss in his Leben Jesus; by Weiss in his Evangelische Geschichte; by Lützelerberger (Die Kirchliche Tradition i, 7, d. Apost. J. Lpz. 1848, and in many other forms since); by Baur (Krit. Untersuch. über die Kanon. Schriften, 4th ed., 1858); and by the Briefe Joh. nach ihrem Lehrbegr. dargestellt, Halle, 1849), and by others. But the reasons advanced by these writers have so little force, and have been so thoroughly replied to, that even in Germany the general opinion has reverted to the ancient and catholic belief in its integrity. (Herder, Theologie, iii. 26; Schaltenbrand, Theol. Gesch., ed. 1850; d. d.; Ewald, Der Brief Joh., Halle, 1850, p. 178; Meyer, Kritik. Ezeg. Comm., Th. 2 Abs.: Die Apost. Gesch., 3rd ed., 1856; Bleek, Einl. in das N. T. (Berlin, 1865); Davidson, Introduction to the New Test., 6th ed., 1863; Schaff, Church History, 4th ed. 1865, p. 179.)

The importance of the fourth Gospel as a proof of the divine character of Jesus Christ led to this special assault on its genuineness by the Rationalists of the Tübingen school and their imitators elsewhere, but without shaking the convictions of the church. See Jesus Christ. For further details of the controversy, see Fisher, Supernat. Origin of Christianity (new edit. N. Y. 1870); Pressensere, Apostol. Age. (N. Y. 1871), p. 509 sq.; See Rationalism. The most important other express treatises in opposition to the authenticity of a later hand after the death of the apostle's direct authority are: 1. Zeller (Berlin, 1840), Zeller (Jahrh. 1845 sq.), Koestlin (ib. 1853), Volkmar (in several works and arts. in Ger. journals), Scholten (Leid. 1864, etc.), Mathes (ib. 1867), Tayler (Lond. 1867); in favor, Stein (Brandenburg 1822), Crome (Lpzq. 1824), Hauff (Nürnberg 1831); and in the Stud. and Krit. Jahrb., (1842, 1853). All these volumes have been made by one hand, and their defects reflected wholly on internal grounds, for there is no evidence that the Gospel was ever known in the Church without this chapter. At first sight it certainly appears as if the original work ended with ch. xx, and that ch. xxi was a later hand, and that the apostle's death's day evidence wholly belongs to this part. But the absence of any trace of the Gospel having ever existed without it must be allowed to afford strong prima facie evidence of its having been added by the author himself; still this is not conclusive, for the addition may have been made by one of the apostle's friends or disciples before the work was in circulation. Grotius, who thinks it was made by the elders at Ephesus, argues against its genuineness, especially from ver. 24; but, though the language there has certainly the appearance of being rather that of others than that of the party himself to whom it refers, still it is not impossible that John may have referred to himself in the third person, as he does, for instance, in xix, 35; and as for the use of the pl. οἶκος, that may be accounted for by its tacitly joining his readers with himself, just as he assumes their presence in xix, 35. There is more difficulty in accepting ver. 25 as genuine, for such a hyperbolic mode of expression is difficult to comport with the simplicity and sincerity of John; but there seems to be no valid reason for calling into doubt any other part of the chapter.

III. Integrity.—Certain portions of this Gospel have been regarded as interpolations or later additions, even by those who accept the Gospel as a whole as the work of John. One of these is the closing part of verse 2, from αἰκατερίαν, and the whole of ver. 4, in regard to the rejection of the critical authorities' exegesis, and which contains statements that give a legendary aspect to the narrative, such as belongs to no other of the miracles related in the Gospels. Both are rejected by Tischendorf, but retained by Lachmann; and the same diversity of judgment appears around interpreting some rejecting both passages (Lucie, Tholuck, Olshausen), others retaining both (Bruckner), others rejecting ver. 4, but retaining verse 2 (Ewald), while some leave the whole in doubt (De Wette).

Another doubtful portion is the section relating to the woman taken in adultery (vii, 53-58, viii. 11). This is regarded as an interpolation because of the deficiency of critical evidence in its favor (see Tischendorf or Alex, ed. loc.), and because of reasons founded on the passage itself, viz., the apparent forced way in which it is connected with what precedes by means of vii, 53: the reason why the characteristic title of the one who so constant introduces himself into his narratives, and for which we have in this section βια, used as John generally uses εὐαγγ., and the presence of the expression εἰς ὡς, πάς ὁ λαὸς, καθαρσ. εἰς ἀλλήλοις αὐτός, οἱ γεγονήτευκαν καὶ αἱ φαραώαν ἤκουσαν, ἀναστησάμενοι, εὐαλλίκειοι, and εὐακρίνους, which are foreign to John's style. On the other side, it is urged that the section contains, as Calvin says, "Nihil apostolico spiritu indignum," that it has no appearance of a later legend, but bears every trace of an original account of a very probable fact, and that it has a considerable amount of diplomatic evidence in its favor. The question is one which hardly admits of a decided answer.

The preponderance of evidence is undoubtedly against the Johannean origin of the section, and it has consequently been regarded as an interpolation by the great majority of critics and interpreters, including among the latter Calvin, Beza, Tittmann, Tholuck, Olshausen, Lücke, and Luthardt, as well as Grotius, De Wette, Paulus, and Ernle. At the same time, if it did not form part of the original Gospel, it is difficult to account for its being at so early a period inserted in it. From a passage in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iii, 39) some have concluded that Pilatus inserted it from the Gospel according to the Hebrews; but it is not certain that it is to this section that the words of Eusebius refer, nor is it certain that he meant to say that Pilatus inserted the story he refers to in the Gospel. See ADULTERY, vol. i, p. 87.

More important than either of these portions is chap. xxi, which is by many regarded as the addition of a later hand after the apostle's death's day. The preponderance of evidence is against the Johannean origin of the section, and there is no evidence that the Gospel was ever known in the Church without this chapter. At first sight it certainly appears as if the original work ended with ch. xx, and that ch. xxi was a later hand after the apostle's death's day. But the absence of any trace of the Gospel having ever existed without it must be allowed to afford strong prima facie evidence of its having been added by the author himself; still this is not conclusive, for the addition may have been made by one of the apostle's friends or disciples before the work was in circulation. Grotius, who thinks it was made by the elders at Ephesus, argues against its genuineness, especially from ver. 24; but, though the language there has certainly the appearance of being rather that of others than that of the party himself to whom it refers, still it is not impossible that John may have referred to himself in the third person, as he does, for instance, in xix, 35; and as for the use of the pl. εἶχος, that may be accounted for by its tacitly joining his readers with himself, just as he assumes their presence in xix, 35. There is more difficulty in accepting ver. 25 as genuine, for such a hyperbolic mode of expression is difficult to comport with the simplicity and sincerity of John; but there seems to be no valid reason for calling into doubt any other part of the chapter.

IV. Design.—At the close of the Gospel the apostle has himself stated his design in writing by the words: "Thus have I written, and written to him in the third person, as he does, for instance, in xix, 35; and as for the use of the pl. εἶχος, that may be accounted for by its tacitly joining his readers with himself, just as he assumes their presence in xix, 35. There is more difficulty in accepting ver. 25 as genuine, for such a hyperbolic mode of expression is difficult to comport with the simplicity and sincerity of John; but there seems to be no valid reason for calling into doubt any other part of the chapter.

Now the design, therefore, is that the Gospel is to supply the omissions of the other three, but no such impression is conveyed by the Gospel itself, which is as far as possible from having the appearance of a mere series of supplement notes to previously existing writings a indeed, if this had been the apostle's purpose, it cannot be said that he has in any adequate way fulfilled it. Nor is there any ground for believing that it was a poloical object which chiefly prompted him to write this Gospel, though such a suggestion has often been made. Thus Irenæus (Hær.iii, 11, 1) says that the Gospel was written against the errors of all Ebionites and Doctora the parties against whom the poloical of the apostle is here directed. All this, however, is mere supposition.
 Doubtless in John has written there is that which forms the fullest and full reflection of all Ebionites and Doctora heresy: but that to confute those was the design of the apostle, as these writers affirm, cannot be proved.
See Gnostics. At the same time, though he may have had no intention of formally confuting any existing herecy, it is more than possible that he was stimulated to seek by means of this record to counterfeit certain tendencies which he saw rising in the Church, and by which the followers of Christ might be seduced from that simple faith in him by which alone the true life could be enjoyed. Still this must be regarded, at the utmost, as future and not actual, on the occasion, not the occa-siun, of his writing. The latter is to be sought in the effect which this Gospel is fitted to produce on the mind of the reader in regard to the claims of Jesus as the divine Redeemer, the source of light and life to darkened and perishing humanity. With this view John presents him to us as he practised among men, and especially as he taught when occasion called forth the deeper revelations which he, as the Word who had come forth from the invisible God to reveal unto men the Father, had to communicicate. John's main design is a theological one: a conversion of which doubtless led to his receiving in the primitive Church the title ear 'Prophet' of the gentle Jesus. But the historical character of his writing must also be acknowledged. As one who had been privileged to "company" with Jesus, he seeks to present him to us as he really appeared among men, in very deed a paraker of his nature, yet, under that nature, vested in a higher, which ever and anon broke forth in manifestation, so that those around him "beheld his glory as the glory of the Only Begotten of the Father" (i, 14). "There is here no history of Jesus and his teaching after the maner of the other evangelists; but there is, in historical form and manner, the Christ in relation to the person of Christ, as its central point, and in this representation there is a picture, on the one hand, of the antagonism of the world to the truth revealed in him, and on the other of the spiritual blessedness of the few who receive him as the Light of Life" (Reuss, Gesch. der Heil. Sch., ch. N.7, p. 354). As John doubtless had the other Gospels before him, without for-normally designing to supplement them, he would naturally enlarge more particularly upon those portions which they had left untouched, or passed over more briefly.

IV. Contents.—The Gospel begins with a prologue, in which the author presents the great theme of which his subsequent narrative is to furnish the detailed illustration—"the theological programme of his history," as one has called it, and which another has compared to the overture of a musical composition in which the leading idea of the piece is expressed (i, 1-5). The historical exposition begins with verse 6, and the rest of the book may be divided into two parts. Of these the former (i, 6-xii) contains the account of our Lord's public ministry from his introduction to it by John the Baptist and his solitary consecration to it by God, to its close in the Passion Week. In this portion we see the Saviour presented to us chiefly in his manifestation to the world as a teacher sent from God, whose mission is authenticated by signs and wonders, and whose doctrines, truly divine, transcend in their spiritual import the narrow limits of personal speculation, and can be comprehended only by a spiritual discernment.
The second portion (ch. xiii-xvi) may be divided into two parts, the one of which is introductory to the other. The former (ch. xiv-xvii) presents to us Lord in the retirement of private life, in his intercourse with his immediate followers, to whom he pours out his soul in loving counsel, warning, and promise, in the prospect of his departure from them; and in communion with his heavenly Fatherto, who, as an observer, as an executor of what he had received to do, he intercedes for those whose redemption from sin and evil is the coveted recompense of his obedience. To this succeeds the account of the Passion, and the appearances of Christ to his disciples after his resurrection (ch. xviii-xxi), which forms the other portion of the book. The minute analysis of Lampre in his Comment, and a brief one in Westcott, Introd. to Study of the Gospels, p. 281 sq.

The greater part of the book is occupied with the discourses of our Lord, the plan of the evangelist being obviously to bring the reader as much as possible into personal contact with Jesus, and to make the latter his own expositor. Regarding the discourses thus reported, the question has arisen, How far are they to be accepted as an exact report of what Jesus uttered? and in reply to this, three opinions have been advanced: 1. That both in form and substance they have come from the lips of Christ: 2. That in substance they present what Christ uttered, but that the form in which they appear is due to the evangelist; and, 3. That they are not the discourses of Christ in any proper sense, but only speeches put in his mouth by the evangelist to express to which of them the teaching of his doctrine.
Of these views the last has found adherents only among a few of the sceptical school: it is without the slightest authority from the book itself. irreconcilable with the simplicity and earnestness of the writer, is foreign to the habits and notions of the class of men to whom John belonged and offered by the frequent explanations which he introduces of the sense in which he understood what he reports (comp. ili, 19, 21, vii, 38, 39; xii, 32, 33, etc.), by the brief notices, which evince an actual reminiscence of the scenes and circumstances amid which the discourse was delivered, (e.g. xiv, 31), and by the prophetic announcements of his impending sufferings and death ascribed to the Saviour, which are couched in language such as he might naturally use, such as accounts for those to whom he spoke, even his disciples, not understanding his meaning at the time, but comprehending it afterwards airous of reporting his very words should, writing after the fulfilment of these predictions, impute to him (comp.
vii, 33-36; viii, 21, 22; x, 17-20; xii, 23-36; xiv, 1-4, 18, 28; xvi, 19, etc.). Some of these considerations are of weight also as against the second of the opinions above stated; for, if John could merely report what substance of the Saviour's teaching in his own words, why clothe predictions, the meaning of which at the time of the writing he perfectly understood, in obscure and difficult phraseology? Why especially impute to the speaker language of which he feels it necessary to give an explanation, instead of at once putting the intellligible statement in his discourse? Undoubtedly the impression which one gets from the narrative is that John means the discourses he ascribes to Jesus to be received as faithful reports of what he actually uttered: and this is confirmed by the Saviour's own words; for, in John the Baptist's sayings with those of our Lord, the character of the one being totally different from that of the other. To this view it has been objected that there is such an identity of style in the discourses which John ascribes to Christ with his own style, both in this Gospel and the Epistles, that the Saviour is, for the most part, but not of a faithful reporter, but of one who gives in the manner natural to himself the substance of what his Master taught. In this there is some force, which is but partially met by the suggestion that John was so implused with the very mind and soul of Christ, and formed by his doctrine, and so filled by his spirit, that his own manner of thought and utterance became the same as that of Christ, and he incessantly wrote and spoke in the style of his Lord. Reuse objects to this that on this supposition the style of Jesus "must have been a very uniform and sharply-defined one, and such as excludes the very different style ascribed to him by the synoptists." (Gesch. der H. S. des N. T. p. 208.) But the formal and personal style of the Lord's discourses in John is by no means perfectly uniform, nor is it much further removed from that ascribed to him by the synoptists than the difference of subject and circumstance will suffice to account for. As for the objection that it is inconceivable that the evangelist could have retained from his collaboration with the Lord's disciples any of his former discourses heard by him only once, we need not, in order to meet it, resort to the foolish suggestion of Bertholdt that he had taken notes of them at the time for his own behoof; nor need we to lay stress on the assurance of Christ which John records that the Holy Ghost whom the Father should send to them would teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance whatsoever he had said unto them (John xiv, 26), though to the believer this is a fact of the utmost importance. It will suffice to meet the objection if we suggest that, as the apostle wrote the history of Christ, he did not wait till he sat down to write his Gospel to give forth his recollections of Master's words and deeds. What he narrates here in writing is only what he must have been repeating constantly during his whole apostolic career. Still, after due allowance has been made for these considerations, it cannot be admitted that the decided Johnean cast of all these discourses, as compared with our Lord's sayings reported in the synoptical Gospels, shows that while the evangelist gives the substance and essential form of Christ's public utterances, he nevertheless, to a large degree, modified them into his own style of phraseology and of expression. This is especially true of xii, 44-50, which is evidently a summary of statements made on perhaps more than one occasion not definitely given. Indeed, it is doubtful if any of the evangelists give us the exact words of our Lord, as they certainly do not tally in this particular any more than they do in the order and connection in which these are narrated. (See Tholuck, Glaubwürdigkeit der evangelischen Geschichte [2d ed.], p. 314 sq.) See HARMONIES.

V. CHARACTERS.—1. As to matters, the peculiarities of John's Gospel more especially consist in the four following doxologies. (1.) The mystical Son-Salvation, Son to the Father. (2.) That of the Redeemer to believers. (3.) The announcement of the Holy Ghost as the Comforter. (4.) The peculiar importance ascribed to love. Yet these peculiarities are not confined to this Gospel. Although there can be shown in the writings of the other evangelists some isolated dicta of the Lord which seem to bear the impress of John, it can also be shown that they contain thoughts not originating with that disciple, but with the Lord himself. Matthew (xi, 27) speaks of the relation of the Son to the Father so entirely in the style of John that persons not sufficiently conversed in Hebrew Writ are apt to search for this passage in the Gospel of John. The mystical union of the Son with believers is expressed in Matt. xxviii, 20. The promise of the effusion of the Holy Ghost in order to perfect the disciples is found in Luke xiv, 48. The doctrine of "baptizing with the Holy Ghost" (Col. i. 15, 16) Paul entirely resembles what, according to John, Christ taught on the same subject. Paul here desires our particular attention. In the writings of Paul are found Christian truths which have their points of coalescence only in John, viz., that Christ is the image of the invisible God, by whom all things were created (Col. i. 15, 16). Paul considers the Spirit of God in the Church the spiritual Christ, as Jesus himself does (John xiv, 16), frequently using the words οὐκ ον χριστός. 2. As to form, there is something peculiar in the evangelist's manner of writing. His language betrays traces of that Hebraistic character which belongs generally to the N.-T. writers, and the author shows his Jewish descent by various incidental indications; but he writes purer Greek than most of the others, and his freedom from Judaic narrowness is so marked that some have founded on this an argument against the genuineness of the book, forgetting that the experiences of the apostle in his more intense years of labor would more than correct the prejudices and party leanings of his earlier career. The apostle's style is marked by ease, simplicity, and vivisidity; his sentences are linked together rather by inner affinity in the thoughts than by outward forms of composition or dialectic concatenation— they move rather as the natural recollection of other discourses heard by him only once, we need not, in order to meet it, resort to the foolish suggestion of Bertholdt that he had taken notes of them at the time for his own behoof; nor need we to lay stress on the assurance of Christ which John records that the Holy Ghost whom the Father should send to them would teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance whatsoever he had said unto them (John xiv, 26), though to the believer this is a fact of the utmost importance. It will suffice to meet the objection if we suggest that, as the apostle wrote the history of Christ, he did not wait till he sat down to write his Gospel to give forth his recollections of Master's words and deeds. What he narrates here in writing is only what he must have been repeating constantly during his whole apostolic career. Still, after due allowance has been made for these considerations, it cannot be admitted that the decided Johnean cast of all these discourses, as compared with our Lord's sayings reported in the synoptical Gospels, shows that while the evangelist gives the substance and essential form of Christ's public utterances, he nevertheless, to a large degree, modified them into his own style of phraseology and of expression. This is especially true of xii, 44-50, which is evidently a summary of statements made on perhaps more than one occasion not definitely given. Indeed, it is doubtful if any of the evangelists give us the exact words of our Lord, as they certainly do not tally in this particular any more than they do in the order and connection in which these are narrated. (See Tholuck, Glaubwürdigkeit der evangelischen Geschichte [2d ed.], p. 314 sq.) See HARMONIES.

V. CHARACTERS.—1. As to matters, the peculiarities of John's Gospel more especially consist in the four following doxologies. (1.) The mystical Son-Salvation, Son to the Father. (2.) That of the Redeemer to believers. (3.) The announcement of the Holy Ghost as the Comforter. (4.) The peculiar importance ascribed to love. Yet these peculiarities are not confined to this Gospel. Although there can be shown in the writings of the other evangelists some isolated dicta of the Lord which seem to bear the impress of John, it can also be shown that they contain thoughts not originating with that disciple, but with the Lord himself. Matthew (xi, 27) speaks of the relation of the Son to the Father so entirely in the style of John that persons not sufficiently conversed in Hebrew Writ are apt to search for this passage in the Gospel of John. The mystical union of the Son with believers is expressed in Matt. xxviii, 20. The promise of the effusion of the Holy Ghost in order to perfect the disciples is found in Luke xiv, 48. The doctrine of "baptizing with the Holy Ghost" (Col. i. 15, 16) Paul entirely resembles what, according to John, Christ taught on the same subject. Paul here desires our particular attention. (See Tholuck, Glaubwürdigkeit der evangelischen Geschichte [2d ed.], p. 314 sq.) See HARMONIES.
I. Its Authenticity. — That this is the production of the same author as wrote the fourth Gospel is so manifest that it has universally been admitted (comp. Hauff, Die Autographen der heiligen Evangelien, p. 187 sq.). The establishment of the genuineness of the one, therefore, involves the admission of that of the other. The evidence, however, in favor of the Epistle is sufficient to establish its claims, apart from its relation to the Gospel. See § 7, below.

2. With this the internal evidence fully accords. The work is anonymous, but the apostle John is plainly indicated throughout as the writer. The author asserts that he had been an immediate disciple of Jesus, and that he testifies what he himself had seen and heard (1, 1-4, 13-14), and this assumption is sustained throughout in a way so natural and unaffected that it would be doing violence to all probability to suppose that it could have been attained by one who felt that he was practising in this a deliberate imposition. The circumstances also of the writer to which he alludes, the themes on which he dwells, the thought that is expressed in it, are all such as fall in with what we know of the apostle John, and suggest him as the writer. If this be the work of a pretender, he has, as De Wette remarks (Ezech. Hdb.), "shown incredible subtlety in concealing the name of the apostle, whilst he has indirectly, and in a most simple natural way, imparted his history to the readers.

A few German theologians in our own times (Lange, Schriften des Johan, iii. 4 sq.; Cluvis, Uerzeichnct des Christenthe, p. 52 sq.; Bretschneider, Probabil., p. 166 sq.; Zeller, in the Theol. Jahrb, 1845) have been the first critics to throw doubt on the genuineness of any of John's writings; and this altogether on internal grounds, but they have met with complete refutation from the pens of Bertholdt (vi), Harnack (Authent. d. Schr. d. Evangel., Johan.), and Lücke (Commentar, iii). See above. The only serious objections to the Epistles are those of Bretschneider, who has equally attacked the genuineness of the Gospel.

1. He maintains that the doctrine concerning the Logos, and the anti-docetic tendency of John's 1st Epistle, betrays an author of the second century, whom he assumes to be John the Presbyter. But it is beyond all question that this is not the apostle (De Wett, Hdb.), and it is by no means improbable, although not fully developed, existent in the Jewish theological notions respecting the Son of God, and that we find it distinctly expressed, although in different words, in the Pauline representation of Christ's exalted dignity (compare Coloss. i with Heb. i); that the rudiments of it appear in the literature of the Jews, canonical and apocryphal, Chaldaic and Alexandrian; that in the time of Christ it was considerably developed in the writings of Philo, and still more strongly in the fathers of the second century, who were so far from retaining the simple, Hebraizing, and canonical mode of expression peculiar to John that in them it had assumed a gnostic form, although essentially identical. John intends by the Word (Logos) to express the divine nature of Christ, but the patristic logology attempts to determine the relationship between the Logos and the invisible God on one side, and the world on the other. The earliest fathers, as Justin Martyr and Tatian, while they make use of John's phrasing, further support their doctrines by ecclesiastical tradition, which, as Lücke observes, must have its root in doctrines that were known in the first century. But, from Theophilus of Antioch downwards, the fathers, mentioning John by name, expressly connect their elucidations with the canonical foundation in the Gospel of John, without the granting of which the language of Justin would be inexplicable (Olshausen, On the Genuineness of the Four Gospels, p. 306 sq.). Accordingly, adds Lücke, on this side, the authenticity of the Gospel and Epistle remains unassailable. See Logos.

3. (23) On some of the grounds may be refuted Bretschneider's arguments derived from the anti-docetic character of John's Epistle. It is true, docetism, or the idealistic philosophy, was not fully developed before the second century, but its germ existed before the time of Christ, as has been shown by Moesheim, Walsh, and Niemeyer. The traces of Jewish theology which have been said to have been applied to the Christian doctrine in the apocalyptic age are to be found in the Epistles of Paul, and it would be unaccountable to suppose that the fully developed docetism should have first made its appearance in the Epistles of Irenaeus and Polycarp. We have the authority of the former of these for the fact that Cerinthus taught the docetic heresy in the lifetime of John in the simple form in which it seems to have been attacked in 1 John iv, 1-3; ii, 22; 2 John 7. See Docetism.

II. Integrity. — The genuineness of only two small portions of this writing have been called in question, viz., the words ο ὡμολογει τον Νίκων κα την παραμετρίας (i, 23), and the words την στήνον την πιεσκον, και συναίνει την τρίαν ν παιδι (κα την τρίαν κα την τρίαν μεταμετρίας ν την γνώσει (v, 7, 8). The former of these is omitted in the Text. Rec., and is printed in brackets in the Griesbach's edition. It is of no sufficient authority, and is inserted by Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Scholz, etc. The latter of these passages has given rise to a world-famous controversy, which can hardly be said to have yet ended (Orme, Memoir of a Controversy respecting the Heavenly Writings [London, 1830]). The prevailing judgment, however, of all critics and interpreters is that the passage is spurious (see Griesbach, Appendix ad N. T. ii, 1-25; Tischendorf on the passage; Lücke, Comment, on the Epistles of John, in Bib. Cabinet, No. xxv, etc.). See Witnesses, the Three Heavenly.

III. Time and Place of Writing the First Epistle. — On these points nothing certain can be determined.

1. It has been conceived by many interpreters, ancient and modern, that it was written at the same place as the Gospel. The more ancient tradition places the writing of the Gospel at Ephesus, and the translator's report refers it to the island of Patmos. Irenaeus (Adv.), infers, from the absence of writing materials (3 John 13), that all John's Epistles were composed at Patmos. The most probable opinion is that it was written somewhere in Asia Minor, in which was the ordinary residence of the apostle (1 John 1, 4), and it is according to the tradition of the Greek Church, at Ephesus, for this but we have no historical warrant (Lücke, Comment.)

2. It is equally difficult to determine the time of the writing of this Epistle, although it was most probably anterior to the Gospel, which seems to be referred to in 1 John 1, 4. Some are of opinion that the Epistle was an envelope or accompaniment to the Gospel, and that they were consequently written nearly simultaneously (Hug, Introduct.). As, however, the period when the Gospel was written, according to the evidence of tradition and criticism, "fluctuates between the sixth and ninth decade of the first century" (Lucie, Commentary), we are, for good reason, inclined to adopt this hypothesis respecting the exact time of the writing of the Epistle; but that it was posterior to the Gospel is further rendered probable from the fact that it is formed on such a view of the person of Jesus as is found only in John's Gospel, and that it abounds in allusions to the speeches of Jesus as there recorded. Lucie concludes, from its resembling the Gospel in its apologetical and polemical allusions, that it indicates such a state of the Christian community as proves that it must be posterior even to the last Epistles of Paul, and consequently that the ancient Church was justified in regarding it among the catholic Epistles, which all bear this chronological character.

It has been argued by several, from ii, 18 (lofýrýnt ὑπο λας), that the Epistle was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, while others, founding their conjecture on the need of words to maintain the views of the first Epistle, among the former are to be found the names of Hammond, Grotius, Calovius, Lange, and Hahneline, and among the latter those of Baronius, Basnage, Mill, and Le Clerc.

Equally unsatisfactory is the argument, in respect to the time when this Epistle was written, derived from its superior age. It is true that the Gospel has more proleptical than polemical words, and that the words of the Gospel referred to in John's may be found in this writer. But if the Epistle and the Gospel are in the same spirit, and if the Evangelist has preserved the Gospel, there must be a writer who has preserved the Epistle.

The Epistle is therefore written before the destruction of Jerusalem. The two writers were contemporaries. They were both ministers of the same faith. They were both Christians, and the Gospel and the Epistle are both written in the same spirit, and the same style, and the same language.

V. Character. Though ranked among the catholic Epistles, this writing has not the form of an epistle—is it respect this it more resembles a free homily; still, in fact, it undoubtedly was sent as a letter to the persons for whose instruction it was designed. The general strain is salutary, and the author seems to have written for the good of his readers, and to have addressed himself to their need of instruction and consolation, to their need of spiritual life and growth. The author addresses present him with one thought, and the book is pervaded by a suppressed intensity of feeling that recalls the youthful Rejoicings in the aged apostle. The mighty power that in it has drawn to it in all ages the reverence and love of the nobles minds, "especially of those who more particularly take to heart the idea of the love of a religion of the heart" (Lucie, Int. p. 65).

VI. Contents. A strict analysis of this Epistle, therefore, seems hardly possible, as the writer does not appear to have been systematic in its plan, but rather to have written out of a full and loving heart. He "utters the heart's(French)" desire; he preaches the pure religion of Jesus. He appeals to opposition to false teachers, and for the comfort of the Church (i, 7; 2). Then follows a statement of the perfection of man, and the propitiatory of Christ, this propitiatory being intended to stir us up to holiness and love (i, 8; ii, 17). Jesus and the Christ are asserted to be one, in opposition to the false teachers (ii, 18-29).

The next chapter seems to be devoted to the sinfulness of man, and to the perfection of Christ, this perfection being intended to stir us up to holiness and love (2). The chapter then continues a exposition of love as love (3). The following chapter is principally occupied with marks by which to distinguish the teaching of the Spirit of God from that of false teachers and of Antichrist, with repeated exhortations to love as brethren (4). The next chapter shows the connexion between faith, renewal, love to God and to the brethren, obedience, and victory over the world, and one man's contribution to another's salvation (5). The last chapter is one of the most beautiful of all the Epistles (6). The spirit is unceasingly to be observed in the Spirit (7). The last chapter is one of the most beautiful of all the Epistles (8).

VII. Relation to the Fourth Gospel. The close affinity between this Epistle and John's Gospel has already been alluded to. In style, in prevailing formula of expression, in spirit, and in thought, the two are identical. The writer of 2 John is evidently the same who wrote the Fourth Gospel. There is no evidence that the writer of each had a similar connexion with his opponents in his mind—those who, like the Docete, denied the true humanity of Christ; those, again, who denied that the man Jesus was the Christ and Son of God; and those who, under pretence of being his disciples, were habitually living in violation of his commands. Both books are the same deeply loving and contemplative nature; in both, a heart completely imbued with the teaching of the Saviour; in both, also, the same tendency to abhorrence of those who opposed his Lord. Remarkable, too, (to use the words of Ebrard), is the similarity of the expressions of WERNER, that "a Parthos is an error for a Sophism," an expression which actually is found in several MSS. (Scholz, Bibl. Krit. Reihe, p. 67), is ingenious, and may be correct. If we are to understand the term catholikos, as applied to this Epistle, in the sense of circular, we may naturally infer, from the absence of the epistolary form, that this was an encyclical letter addressed to several of John's congregations, and in all probability to the churches of the Apocalypse. See § 8, below. Lardner is clearer right when he says that it was primarily meant for the churches in Asia, under John's inspection, to whom he had already orally delivered his doctrine (3; 31; 7). See REVOLV.

See also, the notions of propitiation (λαταθηματος), of doing righteousness, sin, or iniquity (μαγιος), and the sharply-presented antithesis of light and darkness, truth and untruth, loving and hating, the love of the Father and of the world, the children of God and of the devil, spirit of truth and spirit of error (Fairbairn). Macknight, and, still more fully, de Wette, have drawn out a copious comparison of expressions in both the Epistle and Epistle.
some, a prolegomenon to the Gospel; according to other its practical conclusion; and according to others, its my commercial accomplishment. The probability is that both were written at the same period of the author's life, and that they both contain in writing what he had been in his life. The same also holds true of the Reformed ministry; but whether any closer relation than this exists between them must remain matter entirely of conjecture.

VIII. Design.—That the apostle sought to confirm the believers for whom he wrote in their attachment to Christ: by a twofold argument. 1. Christ by his resurrection renounces this view, attempts to show that Docetism was in the same way, in the same period of the appeal to the case of Cerinthus, and to the references to Docetism in three of the epistles of Ignatius (Ad Smyrn. 2 ap.; Ad Trall. ix; Ad Eph. vii); but the docetistic arguments of the period of Docetism and which is not Docetic in the proper sense, and the passages cited from Ignatius are all subject to the suspicion of being interpolations, as none of them are found in the Syrian recension. Lucke lays stress also on the words in σοφοι δε ξαπλώσαντες (iv. 2); comp. 2 John vii) as indicating an express antithesis to the doctrine of the Christ that had come only in appearance. It may be doubted, however, whether this means anything more than that Christ had really come, the phrase in οὐκ ε但是他 regard it as such, and in this case even the appearance of allusion to a direct contradiction vanishes (see Bleek, Eusebius, p. 668).
It may be added that, had John intended to express a direct antithesis to Docetism, he would hardly have tended himself with merely using the words in οὐκ ε for, or to the exercise in which even the Docetists would have admitted this.

The main object of the Epistle, therefore, does not appear to be simply that of opposing the errors of the Docetists (Schmidt, Bertholdt, Niemeyer), or of the Gnostics (Kleuker), or of the Nicolaitans (MacKnight), or of the Cerinthusians (Michaelis), or of all of them together (Townsend), or of the Sabians (Barkey, Storr, Keil), or of Judaeans (Lößler, Semler), or of apostates to Judaism (Lange, Eichhorn, Händel): the leading pur-purpose of the apostle appears to be rather constructive than polemical. John is remarkable both in his history and in his writings lost to the doctrine of the Docetists, but he does not attack error as a controversialist.
He states the deep truth and lays down the deep moral theology of Christianity, and in this way, rather than directly, condemns heresy. In the introduction (i, 4-1 there is a twofold statement of the purpose of his Epistle. It is to declare the Word of life to those whom he is addressing, in order that he and they might be united in true Christian communion with each other, and with God the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ. He at once begins to explain the nature and conditions of communion with God, and, besides the "faith that cometh by hearing," he brings himself back to the same subject. The first part of the Epistle may be considered to end at i, 28. The apostle begins afresh with the doctrine of sonship or communion at ii, 29, and returns to the same theme at iv, 7. His lesson throughout is, that the means of union with God are, on the part of Christ, his atoning blood (i, 7; ii, 2; iii, 5; iv, 10, 14; v, 6) and advocacy (ii, 1)—on the part of believers, faith and love (i, 3; purity (iii, 3), faith (iii, 23; iv, 3; v, 5), and, above all, love (ii, 7; iii, 14; iv, 7; v, 1). John is designated as the Apostle of Love, and rightly; but it should be ever remembered that his "love" does not exclude or ignore, but embraces both faith and obedience as constituent elements. He is called "the beloved" (John i, 16; v, 15; love," and James's "works that are the fruit of faith," and John's "love which springs from faith and produces obedience," are all one and the same state of mind described according to the first, second, or third stage into which we are able to analyze the complex whole.

IX. Commentaries.—The special exegetical helps on the whole of the three epistles of John, besides those mentioned under the Gospel above, are the following, of which we designate the most important by prefixing an asterisk: *Baur, F., in Bibl. Max. Patr. vii (also in Bibl. Patr. Gall. vi); Bede, Expositio (in Opp. v); Althamer, Commentarius (Argent. 1521, 1528, 8vo); Hemming, Commentarius (Vitemb. 1569, 8vo); Schnecker, after it, the general belief, both in the Latin and the Greek churches, was that they were written by John the apostle. 2. Both Jerome and Eusebius concur in ascertaining that all ascribed these Epistles either to John the apostle or to the Evangelist by Mrs. Conant. N. Y. 1892, 12mo): Erdmann, Argumentum, etc. (Berol. 1855, 8vo); Graham, Commentary (Lond. 1857, 12mo): Myrberg, Commentarius (Upsala, 1859, 8vo): Handeock, Exposition (Edinburgh, 1861, 8vo): Candlish, Lectures (Edinburgh, 1866, 8vo): Haupt, Einleitung, etc. (Cott. 1867, 8vo). JOHN, SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF. The title catholic does not properly belong to the 2d and 3d Epistles. It became attached to them, although addressed to individuals, because they were of too little importance to be classed by themselves, and, so far as they went, were regarded as appendices to the 1st Epistle.

Chapter 1. Authorship. 1. The external evidence for the genuineness of these two Epistles is less copious and decisive than that for the 1st Epistle. They are not in the Peshito version, which at the time it was executed they were not recognised by the Syrian churches; and Eusebius places them among the ἄνακτλητα (H. E. iii, 23). See Antiq. Romana. The 11th verse of the 2d Epistle, however, is quoted by Irenaeus (Hær. i, 16, 5) as a saying of John, the disciple of the Lord, made before the Jews in the house of the high priest, that the Jewish Church, therefore, classed them with the other seven catholic Epistles, it would appear that he must have known and acknowledged the 3d also. If the adultoraciones are Clement's, he bears direct testimony to the 2d Epistle (Ad. dimb. p. 101, edit. Potter). Original Epistles of the apostle John having left the 2d and 3d Epistle, which, however, he adds, all did not accept as genuine (In Joan, ap. Euseb. vi, 25). Dionysius of Alexandria (ibid. vii, 25) recognises them as productions of the same John who wrote the Gospel and the 1st Epistle; and so do all the later Alexandrian writers. Eusebius himself elsewhere refers to them (Hær. Evan. iii, 5) without hesitation as John's; and in the synod held at Carthage (A.D. 256). Aurelius, bishop of Chullabi, confirmed his vote by citing 2 John 10 sq. as the language of the apostle John (Cyprian, Opp. ii, 129, ed. Oeberlin). Ephrem Syrus speaks of them in the 4th century, and they are found in the 5th century in almost universally received. A homily, wrongly attributed to St. Chrysostom, declares them uncanonical. In the Muratorian Fragment, which, however, in the part relating to the Epistles of John, is somewhat confused or apparently vitiated, there are at least two Epistles of John recognised, for the author uses the plural in mentioning John's Epistles. In all the later catalogues, with the exception of the Iambics ad Seleucum, they are inserted with the other canonical books of the N. T. There is thus a solid body of evidence in favor of the genuineness of these epistles; and not uniformly known and received is probably to be accounted for by their character as private letters to individuals, which would naturally be longer in coming under general recognition than such as were addressed to churches or the Christians of a district.

The external testimony which has reached us from antiquity is that of Jerome, who says (De vir. Illust. x, 18) that both epistles were commonly reputed to be the production, not of John the apostle, but of John the presbyter, confirmed by the statement of Eusebius (iii, 25) that it was doubtful whether they were the production of the evangelist or of another John. On this it may be observed, 1. That the statement of Jerome is certainly not true in its full extent, for there is evidence enough that both in his own time and before, as well as
II. The second Epistle is addressed to one whom the writer calls ἱερατὴς κυρία. This has been differently understood. By some it has been regarded as designating the Church collectively, by others as designating a particular congregation, and by others as denoting an individual. This expression cannot mean the Church (Jerome), nor a particular church (Casiodorus), nor the elect Church which comes together on Sundays (Michaelis), nor the Church of Philadelphia (Whiston), nor the Church of Jerusalem (Whitby). These opinions are rendered improbable partly by the reference in verse 11 to the children, and in verse 12 to the sister of the party addressed, partly by the want of any authority for such a usage of the term ἱερατὴς as would thus be imputed to the apostle. By those who understand this of an individual there are three renderings: according to one interpretation she is “the lady Electa;” to another, “the elect Kyria;” to a third, “the elect lady.” The first interpretation is that of Clement of Alexandria (if the passage above referred to in the Aδυναμίωνες be his), Wetstein, Grotius, Middleton; the second is that of Benson, Carpzov, Schleusner, Heumann, Bengel, Rosenmüller, De Wette, Lette, Neander, Davidson; the third is that of the renderings of the Epistles of Ephesians, to Philo, to the Hebrews, of First and Second Timothy, of Titus, and of the Epistle to Philemon. Of these, the last is the most common, and the second is that which has been most commonly spoken of as ἱερατὴς is fatal to the hypothesis. The rendering “the elect lady” is probably wrong, because there is no article before the adjective ἱερατὴς. It remains that the rendering “the elect Kyria” is probably right, though here too we should have expected the article—indeed, we should have expected it even in the third rendering (though the rendering “an elect lady” is not demanded—see Alford, Gr. Text. vol. v, proleg.). The choice, therefore, being between the last two of these renderings, two circumstances seem to be decisive in favor of the former: Kyria occurs elsewhere as a proper name (see Cyprian); and that ἱερατὴς is taken in its usual signification is rendered probable by its being applied in verse 13 to the sister of the party addressed. See ELECTA.

At the time of writing this Epistle the apostle was with the sister of the lady addressed, but expresses a happy contentment on her being good in all respects. He expresses confidence that she is not behind him in matters of which he could not then write. From this we may infer either that the apostle was at the time on a journey from which he expected ere long to return, or that the lady in question resided not very far from his usual residence, and that he intended some time to pay her a visit. Adopting the latter theory, we have the more probable, and viewing it in connection with the apostle’s styling himself πρεσβύερος, we may infer that the Epistle was written at a late period of the apostle’s life.

The object of the apostle in writing the 2d Epistle was to warn the lady to whom he wrote against abetting the teaching known as that of Basilius and his followers, by perhaps an undue kindness displayed by her towards the preachers of the false doctrine. After the introductory salutation, the apostle at once urges on his correspondent the great principle of love, which with him (as we have before seen) means right affection springing from right faith, and issuing in right conduct. The immediate consequence of the possession of this love is the abhorrence of heretical misbelief, because the latter, being incompatible with right faith, is destructive of the former, which is the great principle of love, which with itself. This is the secret of John’s strong denunciation of the “deceiver,” whom he designates as “Antichrist.” Love is in him the essence of Christianity, but love can spring only from right faith. Wrong belief, therefore, destroys love, and with it Christianity. Therefore says he, “If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed, for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds” (2 Epist. 10, 11).

III. The third Epistle is addressed to Caius, a Christian brother noted for his hospitality to the saints. Whether this be one of those mentioned elsewhere in the N. T. by this name is uncertain. In the introduction it would appear that the object of the travelling was to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles without money and without price (3 Epist. 7). The apostle had already written to the ecclesiastical authorities of the place (1 John, ver. 9, not “scripsiissem,” as the Vulg.), but they, at the instigation of Diotrephes, had refused the missionary brethren, and therefore the apostle now commends them to the care of a layman. It is probable that Diotrephes was a leading presbyter who held Judaism views, and would not give assistance to men who were going about with the purpose of preaching solely to the Gentiles. The apostle thereby makes the probable route of his personal visitation the church, where he would deal with Diotrephes for his misconduct, and would communicate to Caius many things of which he could not then write. In the mean time he exhorts him to follow that which is Demetrius, that is, to receive the benediction and salutation. Whether this Demetrius (ver. 12) was a tolerant presbyter of the same community, whose example John holds up as worthy of commendation in contradistinction to that of Diotrephes, or whether he was one of the strangers who bore the letter, we are now unable to determine.

From their general similarity, we may conjecture that the two epistles were written shortly after the 1st Epistle from Ephesus. They both apply to individual cases of conduct the principles which had been laid down in their fulness in the 1st Epistle.

IV. Commentaries. The following are the exegetical helps on the whole of both the latter epistles exclusively, in addition to those noticed above: Jones, Commentary [including Philerm. etc.], (Lond. 1835, fol.); Smith, Exposition [on 2d Epistle] (Lond. 1663, 4to); Sonntag, Hypomnemata (Alton, 1655, 8vo); Feussel, Commentary (Vienna, 1707, 4to); Venema, Exercitations (Gedan, 1741, 4to); Heumann, Commentary [on 2d Epist.] (Helms. 1778, 8vo); Müller, Commentary [on 2d Epist.] (Schles. 1788, 4to); Sommer, Isagoge (Lond. 1798, 4to); Ramonnet, Spectum, etc. [on 2d Epistle] (Tr. ad Rh. 1818, 8vo); Gribnoff, Apostolische Auslegung (Mittlerer Diss. 8vo); Cox, Private Letters of Sts. Paul and John (Lond. 1867, 8vo). See Commentary.

JOHN, REVELATION OF. See REVELATION.

John the Baptist (Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτιστής), or simply Ἰωάννης, when the reference is clear, as in Matt. iii, 4; iv, 12; Lat. Joannes (Tacitus, Hist. v, 12); Heb. יוחנן, denoting grace, or favor [see Simons, Lec. N. T. p. 813]. In the Church John commonly bears the honorable title of “forerunner of the Lord”—antecuror et preparator viarum Domini (Tertull. adv. Marc. iv, 53); in Greek, προφήτης ὁ βαπτιστής, προφήτης ὁ τοῦ Λόρντος, in which the Gospelists present are fragmentary and imperfect; they involve, too, some difficulties which the learned have found it hard to remove; yet enough is given to show that he was a man of a lofty character, and that the relation in which he stood to Christianity was one of great importance. From John’s own testimony, he was a more honored character and distinguished saint than any prophet who had preceded him (Luke vii, 28). See PROPHET.

1. John was of the priestly race by both parents, for his father Zacharias was himself a priest of the course of Abia, or Abijah (1 Chron. xxiv, 10), offering incense at the very time when a son was promised to him; and
Elizabeth was of the daughters of Aaron (Luke 1:5), the latter "a cousin" (συγγόνος, relative) of Mary, the mother of Jesus, whose senior John was by a period of six months (Luke 1). Both parents, too, were devout persons, walking in the commandments of God, and waiting for the assurance of redemption. The hope of Israel, the desire of ages, the desire of ages more definitely, "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me" (iii, 1). His birth—"a birth not according to the ordinary laws of nature, but through the miraculous interposition of Almighty power"—was foretold by an angel sent from God, who announced it as an occasion of joy and gladness to many, and at the same time assigned to him the name of John, to signify either that he was to be born of God's especial favor, or, perhaps, that he was to be the harbinger of grace. The angel Gabriel, moreover, proclaimed the character and office of this wonderful child even before his conception, foretelling that he would be filled with the Holy Ghost from the first moment of his existence, and appear as the great reformer of his countrymen—another Elijah in the boldness with which he would speak truth and rebuke vice—but, above all, as the forerunner of the Messiah. This marvellous revelation as to the character and career of the son for whom he had so long prayed in vain were too much for the faith of the aged Zacharias, and, when he sought some assurance of the certainty of the promised blessing, God gave it to him in a vision. The privation of speech—until the event foretold should happen—a judgment intended to serve at once as a token of God's truth and a rebuke of his own incredulity. And now the Lord's gracious promise tarried not. Elizabeth, for greater privacy, retired into the hill-country, whither she was soon afterwards followed by this blind and aged Mary, who was herself the object and channel of divine grace beyond measure greater and more mysterious. The two cousins, who were thus honored above all the mothers of Israel, came together in a remote city, and immediately God's purpose was confirmed to them by a miraculous sign; for, as soon as Elizabeth heard the salutation, the babe leaped in her womb, thus acknowledging, as it were, even before birth, the presence of his Lord (Luke 1, 43, 44). Three months after this, and while Mary still remained with her, Elizabeth was delivered of a son, John, whose name the prophet Zacharias wrote down and determined. The rabbins (Othoo, Lex. Rabb. p. 824; Witsii Miscell. Sacerr, ii, 889) fix on Hebron, in the hill-country of Judaea; Paulus, Kuinoel, and Meyer, after Reiland, are in favor of Jutta, "a city of Judea." See JUTTAH. On the eighth day the child of promise was, in conformity with the law of Moses (Lev. xii, 6), brought to the priest for circumcision, and, as the performance of this rite was the accustomed time for naming a child, the friends of the family proposed to call him Zacharias, after the name of his father. The mother, however, required that he should be called John, a decision which Zacharias still speedily confirmed, by writing on a tablet, "his name is John." The judgment on his want of faith was then at once withdrawn, and the first use which he made of his recovered speech was to praise Jehovah for his faithfulness and mercy (Luke 1, 64). God's wonderful interposition in the child's position in the spirit impressed the minds of many with a certain solemn awe and expectation (Luke iii, 16). God was surely again visiting his people. His providence, so long hidden, seemed once more about to manifest itself. The child thus supernaturally born must doubtless be commissioned. In the midst of his youth the angel Gabriel took his departure from him, and his life passed as a common human being. He was cast into prison at the gates of Jerusalem, and spent probably thirty years, the whole period which elapsed between his birth and the commencement of his public ministry: "The child grew and waxed strong in the spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel" (Luke i, 80). John, it will be remembered, was ordained to be a Nazarite (see Numb. vi, 1–21) from his birth, for the words of the angel were, "He shall drink neither wine nor strong drink" (Luke i, 15). What we are to understand by this brief announcement is probably this: the chosen forerunner of the Messiah and herald of his kingdom was required to forego the ordinary pleasures and indulgences of the world, and live a life of the strictest self-denial in retirement and solitude. The apocryphal Protoc. Ject. ch. xxii, states that his mother, in order to rescue her son from the murder of the children at Bethlehem which Herod commanded, fled with her son to the long-expected country of refuge, the mountain opened at her request, and gave the needed shelter in its bosom. Zacharias, being questioned by Herod as to where his son was to be found, and refusing to answer, was slain by the tyrant. At a later period Elizabeth died, when angels took the youth under their care (Josephus, Ant. i, 17, § 1, p. 117; comp. Kuhn, Leben Jesu, i, 103, remark 4). It was thus that the holy Nazarite, dwelling by himself in the wild and thinly-peopled region westward of the Dead Sea, called "desert" in the text, prepared himself by self-discipline, and by constant communion with God, for the onerous office to which he had been divinely called. Here year after year of his stern probation passed by, till the time for the fulfilment of his mission arrived. The very appearance of the holy Baptist was of itself a lesson to his countrymen; his dress was that of the old prophets—a girdle made of camel's hair (2 Kings i, 8), attached to his loins by a girdle of leather. His food was such as the desert spontaneously afforded—locusts (Lev. xi, 22) and wild honey (Psa. lxxxii, 16) from the rock. (See Engelmann, De victis J. Bapt. Hcrald., 172; Thaul. s. St. Adamo, De victis Joc. Bapt. in desertto, Bâle, 1770, p. 170.) In this wilderness he was born is not disputed (see Hackett, Illustr. of Script. p. 96.) Desert though the place is designated, the country where he spent these early years—the wild mountainous tract of Judah, lying between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea, along which it stretches—was not entirely destitute of means for supporting human existence (Mat. iii, 12–13; Mark i, 1 sq; Luke iii, 1–20; John x, 28; Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Trypho, c. 88). Josephus, in his Life (ii, 2), gives an account of one of his instructors, Banaus, which throws light on John's condition in the desert: "He lived in the desert, and had no other food than what grew of itself, and his only clothing was a skin, woolly and rough, both by night and by day. I imitated him in these things, and continued with him three years." Some writers infer that John was an Essene; see sayn. C. Taylor, editor of Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible: comp. Josephus, Antiq. ix, iii, § 3. But this is denied by Bezan, Vie de Jean (13th ed. Paris, 1867), p. 101 sq.

2. At length, in the fifteenth year of the reign of the emperor Tiberius (see Jarvius, Areas, Intro. p. 228 sqq., 462 sqq.), or A.D. 25, the long-secluded hermit came back into the history of the world. His birth, his hard ascetic life, his reputation for extraordinary sanctity, and the generally-prevailing expeculation that some great one was about to appear—these causes, without the aid of miraculous power, for "John did no miracle" (John x, 41), were sufficient to attract to him a great multitude from "every quarter" (Matt. iii, 5). Brief and startling was his first exhortation to "be not deceived; for he is the kingdom of God is at hand." A few scores of verses contain all that is recorded of John's preaching, and the sum of all is repentance—not mere legal ablation or expiation, but a change of heart and life. Herein John, though exhibting a marked contrast to the scribes and Pharisees of his own time, was the Christ of a new and powerful motive, the lessons which had been again and again impressed upon them by their ancient prophets (comp. Isa. i, 16, 17; Is. vii, Jer. vii, 3-7; Ezek. xviii, 19-32, xxxvi, 25-27, Joel ii, 12, 18, Micah vi, 8; Zechar. i, 3, 4). But, while such was his solemn admonition at the multitude, he adopted at the time leading the sects of the Jews a severer tone, denouncing Pharisaics and Sadducees alike as "a generation of vipers," and warning them of the folly of trusting to external privileges as descendants of Abraham (Luke iii, 8). Now, at last, he warns them that "the ax and the two-edged sword are come to cast into the bosom of his house, and even his righteousness will be cut down, but the root thereof will not be destroyed." Such alarms were not new, but what was new, indeed, what had not been heard before, was the very notion that God's people could be abased and annihilated. It was a new idea, for the people of Israel had been accustomed to think of themselves as God's chosen and specially set apart as his instruments in the establishment of his kingdom. John's message, therefore, was a shock and a terrible message; and it is no wonder that it met with such vigorous protest on the part of the leaders and ruling classes in the nation. The people must be "born again" if they were to be saved. The old order of things must be swept away, and the kingdom of heaven must be established on earth. This was the essence of John's message, and it was this message that made his ministry so dangerous to the rulers of the land. But, in spite of all the opposition and persecution that he met with, John continued to preach the gospel of righteousness and repentance to all who would hear him. He was a true prophet, a man of God, and his message was a power for good among the people.

What, then, was the baptism which John administered? See WASHING. (Comp. Ohlhausen, "Comment. on
loc. Joh.; Dale, "John's Baptism, Phila. 1871.) Not altogether a new rite, for it was the custom of the Jews to baptize proselytes to their religion: not as an ordinance in itself conveying remission of sins, but rather a token and symbol of that repentance which was an indispensable condition of forgiveness through him whom John pointed out as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world." Still less did the baptism of John impart the grace of regeneration—of a new spiritual life (Acts xix, 8, 4). This was to be the mysterious effect of baptism "with the Holy Ghost," which was to be ordained by that "mightier one" whose coming he proclaimed.
The preparatory baptism of John was a visible sign to the people, and a distinct acknowledgment by them that a greater one than John was coming to make ready a people for the kingdom of heaven, which the Baptist proclaimed to be at hand.

But the fundamental distinction between John's baptism unto repentance and that baptism accompanied with the gift of the Holy Spirit which our Lord afterwards obtained is clearly marked by John himself (Matt. iii, 11, 12). See BAPTISM OF JOHN. As a preacher, John was eminently practical and discriminating.
Self-love and covetousness were the prevalent sins of the people at large on them, therefore, he enjoined charity and correction for others. The publicans he cautioned against extortion, the soldiers against violence and plunder. His answers to them are, no doubt, to be regarded as instances of the appropriate warning and advice which he addressed to every class. The first reason assigned by John for entering on his most weighty mission is clearly marked by John himself in these words: "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." It was his great work to prepare the mind of the nation, so that when Jesus himself came they might be a people made ready for the Lord. What was the exact idea which John intended to convey by the term "kingdom of heaven"? It is not easy, at least in our space before us, to determine with satisfaction. (See Richter, "De manne saecro Joanni Bap. divinitus delegato, Lips. 1756.)

We feel ourselves, however, justified in protesting against the practice of those who take the vulgar Jewish notion and assign it to John, that John, for a change, goes so far as to deny that our Lord himself, at the first, possessed any other.

We have space to develop the moral character of John, we could show that this fine, stern, high-minded teacher possessed many eminent qualities; but his personal and official modesty in keeping, in all circumstances, in the lower rank assigned him by God did not pass without special mention. The doctrine and manner of life of John the Baptist were evidently the south of Palestine, and people flocked from all parts to the spot where, on the banks of the Jordan, he baptized thousands unto repentance. Such, indeed, was the fame which he had gained, that "people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he might be the Christ" (Luke iii, 16). John might without doubt have assumed to himself the higher office, and risen to great worldly power; but he was faithful to his trust, and never failed to declare, in the fullest and clearest manner, that he was not the Christ, but merely his forerunner, and that the sole work he had to do was to usher in the day-spring from on high. (See Beecher, "Life of Jesus, vol. i, ch.v.) The more than prophetic fame of the Baptist reached the ears of Jesus in his Nazarene dwelling, far distant from the locality of John (Matt. ii, 9, 11). The nature of the report—namely, that his divinely-predetermined forerunner was not any man of the common people, but the one who had been preparing the way for many months in Judea, that he was the "Lamb of God." The people baptized by John must have been a very select body, for the time had now come for his being made manifecto Israel. The mission of the baptist—an extraordinary one for an extraordinary purpose—was not limited to those who had openly forsaken the covenant of God, and so frequently its principles it was confined to the whole people alike. This does not matter from the point of view of those who had no confession to make, and no sins to wash away. Jesus himself came from Galilee to Jordan to be baptized of John, on the special ground that it became him "to fulfill all righteousness," and, as man, to submit to the same ordination as all other men which he chos-ing upon the rest of the Jewish people. John, however, naturally at first shrink from offering the symbols of-purity to the sinless Son of God. Immediately on the termination of this symbolical act, a divine attestation was given from the opened vault of heaven, declaring Jesus to be in truth the long looked-for Messiah—"this is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (Matt. iii, 17). The events which are found recorded in John i, 19 sq. seem to have happened after the baptism of Jesus by John. See JESUS CHRIST.

Here a difficult question arises—How is John's acknowledge, as he was the forerunner at the moment of his presenting himself for baptism compatible with his subsequent assertion that he knew him not save by the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him, which took place after his baptism? It is difficult to imagine that the two counsels did not personally recognize each other, from their close relationship, and the confession which John could not have failed to receive of the remarkable circumstances attending Jesus' birth; hence his general deference at that time, but his explicit testimony subsequently (see Kui-nol, Alford, "Comment, on Matt. iii, 14). The supposition that John was not personally acquainted with Jesus is therefore out of the question (see Lütcke, "Comment, on John i, 31). Yet it must be borne in mind that their places of residence were at the two extremities of the country, with but little means of communication between them. Perhaps, too, John's special destination and mode of life must have kept him from knowing his fellow-countrymen at Jerusalem. It is possibly, therefore, that the Saviour and the Baptist had not oft met. It was certainly of the utmost importance that there should be no suspicion of concert or collusion between them. John, however, must assuredly have been in daily expectation of Christ's manifestation to Israel, and so a word or sign would have sufficed to reveal to him the person and presence of our Lord, though we may well suppose such a fact to be made known by a direct communication from God, as in the case of Simon (Luke ii, 26; comp. Jackson's "Greek Works," Oxf. ed. vi, 404). At all events, it is wholly imconceivable that John should have been permitted to baptize the Son of God without being enabled to distinguish him from any of the ordinary multitude. Upon the whole, the true meaning of the words καύξω ὄν ἄνωθεν αὐτὸν would seem to be as follows: And I, even I, though standing in so near a relation to him, both person and office, minimally, had no authority to proclaim him as such till I saw the predicted sign in the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him. It must be borne in mind that John had no means of knowing by previous announcement whether this wonder of the divine Son would be vouchsafed to his forerunner at his baptism or at any other time (see Dr. Mill's Hist. Character of St. Luke's Gospel, and the authorities quoted by him). See Baptism of Jesus.

With the baptism of Jesus John's more especial office ceased. The king had come to his kingdom. The function of the herald was discharged. It was this that John had with singular humility and self-renunciation announced beforehand: "He must increase, but I must decrease." It seems but natural to think, therefore, when their historical relative position is taken into account, that John would forthwith lay down his office of harbinger, which, now that the Sun of Righteousness himself had appeared, was entirely fulfilled and terminated. Such a step he does not appear to have taken. From incidental notices we learn that John and his disciples, as long as he lived, had no official position, but that Lord entered upon his ministry (see John iii, 23; iv, 1). We gather also that John instructed his disciples in certain moral and religious duties, as fasting (Matt. ix, 14; Luke v, 38) and prayer (Luke xi, 1). In short, the language of Scripture seems to imply that the Baptist Church continued side by side with the Messianic (Matt. xi, 3; Luke vii, 19; John xiv, 25), and remained long after John's execution (Acts xix, 3). Indeed, a sect which bears the name of "John's disciples" exists to the present day in the East, whose sacred books are said to be preserved by a Gnostic leave. (See Gnosis, in the Altheim, Litereutung, 1817, No. 48, p. 878, and in the Hall. Encyclop., prothetape, p. 95 sq.; Buckhardt, Les Nazoréens apéliés Zabiane et Christiens de St. Jean, tr. Gnosique, Strasbourg, 1840; also Blarkey, in the Hall. Hymn. iv, 355 sq.; Schaff, Ap. Hist, p. 279 sq.). See also John vii, 14, 18. The sovereign, pious, but spirit was like to the spirit of Jesus. The sect, they do not. Still, though it has been generally assumed that John did not lay down his office, we are not satisfied that the New Testament established this sect. John may have ceased to execute his own peculiar work as the forerunner, but may justly have continued to bear his most important testimony to the Messiahship of Christ; or he may even have altogether given up the duties of active life some time, at least, before his death; and yet his disciples, both before and after that event, may have maintained their individuality as a religious communion. Nor will the student of the New Testament and of ecclesiastical history, who knows how grossly a teacher far greater than John was, both during his life and after his crucifixion, misunderstood and misrepresented, think it impossible that some misconception or some sinister motive may have had weight in preventing the Baptist Church from dissolving and passing into that of Christ. (See Weber, J. d. Täufers und die Parteien seiner Zeit to, Gotha, 1878). It was, not improbably, with a view to remove some misunderstanding, that John addressed his disciples to Jesus which is recorded in Matt. xi, 3; Luke vii, 19. The spiritual course which the teachings of Jesus were more and more taking, and the apparent failure, or at least uneasy postponement of the promised kingdom in the popular sense, especially after their execution, his imprisonment and prison, and the imminent danger of losing his life, may well have led John's disciples to doubt if Jesus were in truth the expected Messiah; but no intimation is found in the record that John required evidence to give him satisfaction. (See below) Be that as it may, it is certain that John still continued to present himself to his countrymen in the capacity of witness for Jesus. Especially did he bear testimony to him before Herod Antipas (for John the brother of Bethabara, is the reading of the best MSS.). So confidently, indeed, did he point out the Lamb of God, on whom he had seen the Spirit alighting like a dove, that two of his own disciples, Andrew, and probably John, being converted by his testimony, followed Jesus as the true Messiah.

8. But shortly after he had given his testimony to the Messiah, John's public ministry was brought to a close. He had, at the beginning of it, condemned the hypocrisy and worldliness of the Pharisees and Sadducees, and was thereupon cast into prison. Josephus, however, assigns a somewhat different cause for Herod's action, and the story of John's imprisonment and death is told in the Gospels: "Now some of the Jews thought that the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and that very justly, as a punishment of what he did against John that was called the Baptist; for Herod slew him, although he was a good man, and commanded the Jews to exercise righteousness and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism. Now when others came in crowds about him—for they were greatly moved by hearing his words—Herod, who feared lest the great influence John had over the people might put it into his power and inclination to raise a rebellion (for they seemed ready to do anything he should advise), thought it best, by putting him to death, to prevent any mischief he might cause, and not bring himself into difficulties by sparing a man who might make him repent of it when it should be too late. Accordingly he sent an occasion of but a trivial and insipid counsel of the Herod's—of Machærus, the castle I before mentioned, and was there put to death" (Matt. xxi, 32). There is no contradiction between this account and that which is given in the New Testament. (See Lamy, Dis. de vicesis Joa. Bapī.; Van Till, De Joa. Bapī, resurrectionibus, tab. x, etc.) Both may be true: John was condemned in the mind of Herod on political grounds, as endangering his position, and executed on private and ostensible grounds, in order to gratify a malicious but powerful woman. The scriptural reason was but the pretext for carrying into effect an ancient, and then a prevalent, policy of Herod. The fear of Herod was not without some ground may be seen in the popularity which John had gained (Mark xi, 92; see Lardner, Works, vi, 488).

The castle of Machærus, where John was imprisoned and beheaded, was a fortress lying on the southern extremity of Persia, at the head of the Lake Asphaltites, between the dominions of Herod and Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, and at the time of our history appears to have belonged to the former (Lardner, vi, 488). It was here that the above-mentioned reports reached him of the execution of John the Baptist. This revelation was a proof to John of his mission and the confirmation of what he expected to hear as to the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. But if Christ's kingdom were indeed established, it was the duty of John's own disciples, no less than of all others, to acknowledge him as their own master, and be slow to transfer their allegiance to another. With a view, therefore, to overcome their scruples, John sent two of them to Jesus himself to ask the question, "Art thou he that should come?" They were answered not by words, but by a series of signs wrought in the nature of a peculiar foretelling, which prophecy had specified as the distinguishing credentials of the Messiah (Isa. xxxv, 5; 1st i, 1), and while Jesus bade the two messengers carry back to John as his only answer the report of what they had seen and heard, he took occasion to guard the multitude who surrounded him against supposing that the Baptist himself was shaken in mind, by a direct appeal to their own knowledge of his life and character. He would not be appealed to as witnesses that the stern prophet of the wilderness was no waverer, biding every breeze, like the reeds on the banks of Jordan. Proof abundant had they that John was no worldling, with a heart set upon rich clothing and dainty fare—the luxuries of a king's court—and of his mission. He was ready to acknowledge that one so innured to a life of hardship and privation was not likely to be affected by the ordinary terrors of a prison. But our Lord not only vindicates his forerunner from any suspicion of inconstancy, he goes on to proclaim him a prophet, and more than a prophet; nay, inferior to none born of woman, though in respect to spiritual privileges behind the least of those who were to be born of the Spirit and admitted into the fellowship of Christ's body (Matt. xii, 11). It should be noted that the expression οὐδὲ ἡμῖν ἡμεῖς ἦμεν, τ. ὁ, λ. is understood by Chrysostom, Augustine, Hilary, and some modern commentators, and his grace and gentleness of spirit is held up in this connection. This interpretation is less agreeable to the spirit and tone of our Lord's discourse. Jesus further proceeds to declare that John was, according to the true meaning of the prophecy, the Elijah of the new covenant, foretold by Malachi (iii, 1, 2).

The event, indeed, proved that John was to Herod what Elijah had been to Ahab, and a prison was deemed too light a punishment for his boldness in asserting God's law before the face of a king and a queen. Nothing but the death of the Baptist would satisfy the resentment of Herodias. Though foiled once, she continued to watch her opportunity, which at length arrived. A court festival was kept in honor of the king's birthday. After supper the daughter of Herodias came in and danced before the company, and so charmed was the king by her grace that he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she should ask. Salome, prompted by her abandoned mother, demanded the head of John the Baptist. The promise had been given in the hearing of his distinguished guests, and so Herod, though loth to be made the instrument of so bloody a work, gave instructions to an officer of his guard, who went to the door of the claustra, and held the head of John fast within as it were brought to the feast of the adulteress whose sins he had denounced. See HERODIAS. According to the Scripture account, the daughter of Herodias obtained the Baptist's head at the entertainment, without delay. How could this be when Machærus lay at a distance of many miles? The feasting of the queen must have been made at Machærus, which, besides being a stronghold, was also a palace, built by Herod the Great; and here Antipas appears to have been spending some time with his paramour Herodias.

4. Thus was John added to that glorious army of martyrs who have suffered for righteousness' sake. His death seems to have occurred just before the Passover, in the course of the Lord's ministry, A.D. 28. Herod undoubtedly looked upon him as some extraordinary person, for no sooner did he hear of the miracles of Jesus than, though Sadadus himself, and, as such, a unbeliever in the resurrection, he ascribed them to John, whom he supposed to have risen from the dead. See HEROD ANTIPAS. Holy Scripture tells us that the body of the Baptist was laid in the tomb by his disciples, and ecclesiastical history records the honors which succeeding ages have paid it. A Pilgrim is mentioned in the Koran, with much honor, under the name of Jaḥja (see Hottinger, Historia Orientalis, p. 144–149, Tifṣur, 1609; Herbelot, Biblioth. Or. ii, 288 sq.).

The brief history of John's life is marked throughout with the characteristic graces of self-denial, humility, and holy courage. So great, indeed, was his influence that worldly men considered him possessed. "John came neither eating nor drinking, and they said he hath a devil." His humility was such that he had again and again to disavow the character and decline the honors which an admiring multitude almost forced upon him. To their questions he answered plainly he was not the Christ. Indeed, he refused to be thinking, nor one of their old prophets. He was not on a voice merely—the voice of God calling his people to repentance in preparation for the coming of him whose shoe-latchet he was not worthy to unloose. For his boldness in speaking truth, he went a willing victim to prison and to death.

Resembling, though John did, in so many things the Elijah of former days, the exit of the one from his field of labor was remarkable for its humiliating circumstances, as the other for its singular glory—the one dying as a felon by the hand of the executioner; the other, without tasting at all of death, ascending to heaven in a chariot of fire. But in John's case it could not be otherwise; the forerunner, no more than the disciple, could be above his Master; and especially in the treatment of the one must the followers of Jesus be prepared for what was going to be accomplished in the other. After John's death, and growing number of special acts and discourses were directed to this end by our Lord. The manner of John's death, therefore, is no account to be regarded as throwing a depreciatory reflection on his position and ministry. He himself testifies: "I am not worthy to untie the latch of John's shoe." (John xiv, 85), and he fulfilled his arduous course in a truly noble and valiant spirit—Fairbairn.

John Ἐξοδησία (ἀπόδοσις), a presbyter of Ἱππα (Πηπα) (probably in Cilicia, mentioned in the second list of apostles—Acts xvi, 6, ἡ ἐξοδησία) by Phoebus called him (Cod. 55) a Nestorian, but Fabricius, with reason, supposes that he was a Eucharian. When he flourished is not known; he may perhaps be consigned to the latter half of the 5th century. Vonstus places him under Zeno the Isaurian, but Carp/s (Chinkas he was later). He is the reputed author of (1) Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστογγ (Historia Ecclesiastica), in ten books, of which Photius had read five, containing the history of the Church from the deposition of Nestorius at the Council of Ephesus (the third general council, A. D. 431) to the deposition of Petrus Fullo (A.D. 477), who had usurped the see of Antioch in the reign of the emperor Justinian. It is said that the Council of Chalcedon is the point at which the ecclesiastical history of Socrates leaves off, it is probable that the history of John of Ephes is commenced, like that of Evagrius, at that point, and consequently that these five books were the first five of his history. He describes his style as periphrastic and florid, and says that he was a great admirer of Diodorus of Alexandria, the successor of Cyril, and extolled the Synod of Ephesus (A.D. 449), generally branded with the epithet ἡ λαρξίων, "the synod of robbers," while he attacked the Council of Chalcedon. How late a period the history came down to cannot be determined:—(2) A work which Photius describes as Κατὰ τὴν ἁγίας τιτάρων συνόδου (Adamantius Quartam Sanctam Synodem). This must be Photius's description, not the original title of the work; for, opposed as we infer John to have been to the authority of the Council of Chalcedon, he would hardly have described it as "the fourth sacred council," Photius commends the style in which the work was written. Fabricius identifies John of Ephesus with the Joannes  ὁ ἐπὶ Μεσοποταμίας, i.e. "the dissenter," cited by the anonymous writer of the Διαγραφής τῶν νυν ποιουντων (Δομινικ φημομμένων Council), and which was printed by Comenius (in his Origenis C. Pollicinaria Maxima, p. 24, 83), but Comenius himself (ibid. p. 59) identifies this John with John Malalas. Whether John of Ephesus is the John  ὁ Πυργω, "the rhetorician," cited by Evagrius Scholasticus (Hist. Eccl. i, 16; ii, 12; iii, 10, etc.) is doubtful. Le Quien (Opera S. Ioannis Damasceni, i, 568, note) identifies them, but Fabricius thinks they were different persons. See Photius, Bibl. Cod. 41, 55; Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vii, 419; Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 456, ed. John the ALMSGIVER (JOHANNES ELEKROMOSYNARUS), one of the best of the patriarchs of the Eastern Church, was born of noble parentage at Amathous, in Cyprus, about 550. He had married young, but, losing his wife, he distributed his possessions among the poor. He had devoted himself to a life of ascetic practice. So irreproachable was his conduct, and so great his reputation for piety and charity, that, on the murder of Theodore, he was unanimously demanded as successor in the patriarchate. He was appointed by the emperor in A.D. 606. The first years of his reign were quiet; not so the last years, which were marked by the successful invasions of Chosroes II, king of the Persians, during the reign of Phocas, into the Roman possessions of the Orient (compare Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Rom. Empire, ch. xlv). From all parts of Syria Christians fled to Alexandria to find a protector in John, and when Phocas died Jerusalem also had fallen (A.D. 610), not content with feeding and clothing the refugees he found right at his own door, he sent large sums of money to the Holy City to redeem Christian captives and prevent further massacre. (The statement that at this fall of Jerusalem "50,000 Christians were massacred, and the chief principally by the Jews, who purchased them from the Persians on purpose to put them to death" [Neale], has no better basis than the inventions of prejudiced monastics, bent on the destruction of the Jews. Comp. Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, v, 34 sq., 458 sq.). In 620, when the Persians threatened Egypt also, he fled to his native island, and died there a short time after his arrival. He is commemorated in the Oriental Church November 11, and in the Latin January 23. Curiously enough, he is also commemorated by the Jacobites. It is from this John that the famous order of the Hospitallers, in its first instance, derived its name. Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, ascribed to him the authorship of the celebrated Epistola ad Cassianum, with which the most of the modern Catholic critics credit Chrysostom. Three biographical accounts were written of him:—(1) by Joannes Moschus and Sophronius (no longer extant); (2) by Leontius, bishop of Neapolis, in Cyprus (translated, between 538 and 676, into Latin by Anastasia and Basilia, printed); for the text of the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists (Jan. 23, ii, 496); (3) by Simeon Metaphrastes (but not trustworthy). See Neale, Hist. East. Ch. (Alexandria), ii, 52 sq.; Wetzer, Weltk., II. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, v, 718 sq.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec., i, 609; note xx; viii, 322; x, 262. (J. H. W.)

John of Antioch (1), a much more true representative of the Eastern Church, distinguished for the part he took in the controversy between Cyril and Nestorius, flourished in the first half of the 5th century, and succeeded Theodotos in the patriarchate of Antioch about A.D. 427. Favorably disposed towards Nestorius, who is said to have been a schoolmate of St. Ephrem, near Antioch, he was forced to take decided ground against Cyril by the impolite conduct of the latter at the Council of Ephesus (q. v.). Among the Eastern bishops who came with John of Antioch to attend the council, he was the acknowledged leader: he need not have given them all in favor of Nestorius, when, on arriving at Ephesus, they learned that the sessions had not only commenced, but that Nestorius had already been actually condemned without their sanction. As long as Irenaeus (q. v.) and Candidus succeeded in making a show of it, the emperor Theodosius, John proved faithful to his course taken at Ephesus; but when he found the Cyril- This is a digitized copy of a page from a book. John of Antioch (2), surmamed Codonatus, the successor of Petrus Galoepus, or Fullo (the Fuller), after his deposition, in the patriarchate of Antioch, A.D. 447, John had previously been bishop of Apamea; but, after the deposition of John, the same Anius procured his elevation to the bishopric of Tyre. Theophanes incorrectly ascribes this appointment to Calendyn of Antioch. See Theophanes, Chronog. p. 110, etc., ed. Paris (p. 88, etc., ed. Venice: p. 199, etc., ed. Bumm); Valerius, Not. ad Georgii H. E. iii, 15, and Observationes, Ecclesiast. ad Georgium, ii, 8—Smith, Dict. Greek and Roman Biog. ii, 586.

John of Antioch (3), surmamed Scholastiscus, an eminent Greek legislist, flourished in the 6th century. He entered the Church, and became patriarch of Constantinople (564-578). He compiled a collection of ecclesiastical laws, which greatly surpassed in extent and method that which preceded it, and which has retained the basis of canon law in the Greek Church. Another of his works, entitled Nomocanon, was an attempt to harmonize Justinian's constitutions relating to the Church with the older rules. Both works were for many centuries held in high estimation, and were inserted in Voell and Justel's Bibli. juris canonicae veteris (Paris, 1691), ii, 603-789. See Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. xi, 100; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gr. xxvi, 530, (J. N. P.)

John Archiaphe (Αρχιαπή), an Egyptian schismatic of some note, was a contemporary of Athanasius. He was a devoted follower of Mulletius, who, just before his death, which occurred shortly after his condemnation by the Council of Nice (A.D. 325), made John the Melitian bishop of Memphis, and intrusted to him also the leadership of the Melitians as a body. John, supported by the Arians, renewed the attacks against the orthodox party, and the schism soon became as violent as ever. Athanasius, now patriarch of Alexandria, and leader of the orthodox party, was the great object of attack; and John and his followers sought to throw on him the odium of originating the disturbances, and of persecuting his opponents; and, especially, they charged him with the murder of Anesius, a Melitian bishop, whom they had secured in order to give color to the charge against Athanasius. In the name of the emperor, Constantine the Great, charging John and his successors with unsoundness in the faith, with a desire to alter the decrees of the Nicene Council, and with raising tumults and insulting the orthodox; he also objected to them as being irregularly ordained. He refuted their charges, especially the charge of murder, ascertaining that Anesius was alive, and obliged them to remain quiet. John professed to repent of his disorderly proceedings, and to reconcile to Athanasius, and returned with his party to the communion of the orthodox Church; Mulletius was reconciled but not silenced, or lasting; troubles broke out again, and a fresh separation took place. John, and his followers either being ejected from communion by the Athanasian party, or their return opposed. The Council of Tyre (A.D. 383), in which the opponents of Athanasius were triumphant, ordered John, and his followers to renounce allegiance to the emperor, and conciliated Athanasius taken down and published by Donatus Acciaiuoli, who is mentioned as a pupil of Arguropolu.—4. Commentarii in Aristotelis Metaphysicam, published with Bessarian's version of that work (Paris, 1515, fol.). The other original works of Arguropoli are scattered in MSS. through the libraries of Europe (of which a list is given by von Guerard, u. a. in Wuertter.) He also translated the Proclusi Philosopher, and the Homilies of Basil in Hebraic. His version of Porphyry was printed with his translations of Aristotle at Venice in 1496, and that of Basil at Rome in 1515. See Grynaeus, Biblioth. Græca, i, 373, 496, xvi, 450, etc. Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Engr. ii, 587.
John, abbot of St. Arnoul of Metz, is first mentioned in 969, when he succeeded Anstée in that office. He was reputed to be a learned and very liberal man for the times. He granted a charter of freedom to the inhabitants of Maurville, formerly serfs of the abbey, and of Audincourt. He returned among them for the abbey the right of levying certain taxes. He died about 977. John wrote a Life of St. Godtolide (Mabilion, Acta Sanctorum, vol. ii, col. 1087) and the Life of St. John de Vendré, abbot of Gorolle (Bollandii, vol. iii, Feb.). See Gallia Christ. vol. xiii, col. 986; Hist. Lit. de l'Art. 1911, p. 231; Hoefer, Nouveau Bléog. Général, xxvi, 530. (J. N. P.)

John of Avila (Juan de Avila), the apostle of Andalusia for the 16th century, was born at Almodovar del Campo, a small city of the province of Toledo, about the year 1500. His father intended him for the profession of law, but, after a short stay at the University of Salamanca, he returned home, and spent three years in strict asceticism. Then, after extended studies in philosophy and theology under Domingo de Soto, he commenced preaching with great success. His popularity excited envy, and he was imprisoned for a very short time by the Inquisition. After preaching for nine years in Andalusia, he visited Cordova, Granada, Baeza, Montilla, etc., where his sermons—chiefly in honor of the Virgin Mary—proved a great success. The highest ecclesiastical offices were now offered him; pope Paul III contemplated even creating him cardinal, but John preferred to continue the work of the great missionary. With a view to the early religious education of the people and to elevate their moral standing permanently, he established schools at Seville, Ubeda, Baeza, Granada, Cordova, and Montilla. His health failed him, however, and he remained for twenty years sick at the latter place, which accounts for his not accompanying the archbishop of Granada to the Council of Trent. Here he composed his Epistolario spirituale (2 vols., 4to), which has been translated into several languages. He died May 10, 1569. His Life has been written by Luis de Granada (see Obras del V. P. M. Luis de Granada, Madrid, 1819; Luis Munoz, Vida del V. Vener. el Maestro Juan de Avila; Antonio de Casamayor, Teatro Histórico de la Doctrina Española). See Fr. J. John Baptist, a French missionary priest in the latter part of the 18th and the beginning of the 19th century. The son of the emperor of Cochín China, Gya-Long, having come to France with the bishop of Adran in 1787, concluded a treaty with king Louis XVI, by which the latter was to aid him in regaining his throne, which he had lost by a revolution. Events prevented Louis from keeping his promise, but Gya-Long, having regained his kingdom, called to his court the bishop of Adran, who became his prime minister, and John Baptist, who was general vicar to the bishop. He also acted several laws favoring Roman Catholicism. The bishop of Adran died in 1817, and Gya-Long himself in 1819. His successor being opposed to Christianity, John Baptist left Hai-Foo, the capital of the empire of Annam, where he had resided, travelled through the East, and in 1827 settled in the convent of St. Francis at Macao, where he died July 9, 1847. He is said to have left a collection of interesting documents on China and the other countries he visited. See Le Constitutionnel, Oct. 17, 1847.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 567. (J. N. P.)

John of Bassora is the name of a prelate of the Eastern Church, who was connected at Bassora, the ancient Bostra, from A.D. 617-650, after whom one of the liturgies of the Oriental Church is named. He was formerly supposed to be the author of it, but Neale thinks it of later date, and supposes it had its origin in the northern parts of Arabia. John Buridanus, a celebrated Nominalist of the 14th century, was born at Bethune, in Artois. He is reputed to have been a pupil of Occam, then to have lectured with great ability and success in Paris, and to have risen to the distinction of rector of the University of the city of Paris, and to have been a great professor only after the Realists had gained the ascendancy [see Realism and Nominalism], and to have assisted in the founding of the university at Vienna. He was looked upon by his contemporaries as one of the most powerful adversaries of Realism, and distinguished himself also by his rules for finding the middle term in logic, a species of contrivance denominated by some the Ars de Bride, as well as by his inquiries concerning free-will, wherein he approached the principles of Determinism, maintaining that we necessarily prefer the greater of two goods. As for the celebrated illustration which he gave of an ass dying for hunger between two bundles of hay, it is not to be found in his writings, which are, Questions in X lib. Ethicorum Aristotelis (Paris, 1483, fol.; Oxford, 1637, 4to)—Question in Polit. Arist. (Paris, 1500, fol.)—Compendium Logicae (Ven. 1495, fol.; Summulae de Dialectic (Paris, 1467, fol.; etc. Complete editions of his works were published at Paris in 1500, 1516, and 1518. John the Cappadocian, patriarch of Constantinople (he was the second patriarch of the name of John, Chrysostom being John I) from A.D. 517 or 518, was, before his election to the patriarchate, a presbyter and syncclius of Constantinople. Originally he sided with the opponents of the Council of Chalcedon, but he had either too little firmness or too little principle to follow out stoutly the inclination of his own mind, for he appears to have been in a great degree the tool of others. On the death of Anastasius, and the accession of the emperor Justin I, the orthodox party among the inhabitants of Constantinople raised a tumult, and compelled John to anathematize Severus of Antichion, and to insert in the formulas of the fathers of the Council of Chalcedon, and restore to them those of the patriarchs Euphemius and Macedonius. These disputations were two tables of ecclesiastical dignitaries, one containing those who were living, and the other those who had died in the peace and communion of the Church, so that insertion was a palpable declaration of orthodoxy, and erasure of heresy or schism. These measures, extorted in the first instance by popular violence, were afterwards sanctioned by a synod of forty bishops. In A.D. 519, John, at the expressed desire of Justin, sought a reconciliation with the Western Church, from which, under Anastasius, the Eastern name of the patriarchs of Antioch was transferred to the orthodox Church. See HORMISDAS. In this he failed. John died about the beginning or middle of the year 520, as appears by a letter of Hormisdas to his successor Epiphanius. John wrote several letters or other papers, a few of which are still extant. Two short letters to John, patriarch of Jerusalem, and one to Epiphanius, bishop of Tyre, are printed in Greek, with a Latin version, in the Concilia, among the documents relating to the Council of Constantinople in
JOHN

A.D. 586 (v. col. 185, ed. Labbe; viii, 1065-67, ed. Mansi). Four relations, or Libelli, are extant only in a Latin version among the Epistles of Pope Hormisdas (in the Concilia, iv, 1472, 1496, 1491, 1521, edit. Labbe; viii, 346, 451, 457, 488, ed. Mansi). It is remarkable that in the two short Greek letters addressed to Eastern princes, regarding the duty owed by the Christian churches to the See of St. Andrew, or to the See of Rome, or to the See of the Great Church (Ecclesiae præsidius), or to the See of Constantinople, and which are extant only in the Latin version, the title does not appear; and circumstances are not wanting to lead to the suspicion that its presence in the Greek epistles is owing to the mistake of some scribe, who has confounded this John the Cappadocian with John the Faster. It is certainly remarkable that the title, if assumed, should have incurred no rebuke from the jealousy of the popes, not to speak of the other patriarchs equal in dignity to John; or that, if once assumed, it should have been dropped again, which it must have been, since the employment of it by John the Faster (v. c.), many years after, was violently opposed by Pope Gregory I as an unauthorized assumption. We may conjecture, perhaps, that it was assumed by the patriarchs of Constantinople without opposition from their fellow-prelates in the East during the schism of the Eastern and Western churches, and quietly dropped on the termination of the schism, that it might not prove a source of embarrassment to the fulfillment of the church's mission.

John of CITRUS (now Ktiro or Ktros), in Macedon, the ancient Pydna, was bishop of that see about A.D. 1290. He is the author of Αγιορειτικά τοῦ Καυσταντίου Ἀρχιεπισκοποῦ Διάφωτος τοῦ Κεφαλάτων (Response ad Constantium Cephalatan, Archiepiscopum Pyrrhacii), of which sixteen answers, with the questions prefixed, are given with a Latin version in the Jus Greecoromanorum of Leclercius (Frankf. 1596, folio), v. 323. A larger portion of the Response is given in the Synopsis Juris Iuris of Thomas Diplotavicus (Diplostatio). Several MSS. of the Response contain twenty-four answers, others thirty-two; and Nicholas Comnenus Papadopoli, citing the work in his Prognosis Mytylogikes, speaks of a hundred. In one MS. at Leiden, the title does not appear; and the name of Philalethes, Allatius, in his De Consensu, and Contra Hortogorvetum, quotes De Constantius et Dogmatibus Latinarum as the production of John of Citrus. John (VI, patriarch) of Constantinople was ap- pointed by Pope, Philippicus Bardanes, A.D. 712, for his Monothelite opinions and his rejection of the authority of the sixth oecumenical (third Constantinopolitan) council. Cyrus, the predecessor of John, was deposed to make way for him, according to Cave. John was excommunicated by the Nestorian council, apparently, of the deposition of his patron Philippicus, and the elevation of Artemius or Anastasius II. The John of Cornwall was an eminent theologian of the 12th century whom both England and France claim as their own. Little is known of his life. He appears to have studied at Paris under Peter Lombard and Robert of Melun, and to have died towards the close of the 12th century. Great uncertainty also prevails respecting his writings; still he is generally considered as the author of a work entitled Elogium (publ. by Martène, Anecdotæ, v, col. 1637). It is a special treatise on the human nature of Christ, refuting the subtle distinctions of Gilbert de la Porre and other scholastic theologians, who maintained that Christ, quod homines, could not be considered as a mere person, adiectum or accident. In other words, his humanity was but a contingent or accidental form of his nature. This doctrine had already been condemned by pope Alexander III in the Council of Tours (1163). Casimir Oudin considers him also as the author of Libellus de Censio mystici idiomatis, contained in the works of Hugo of St. Victor, vol. ii, etc. See Cas. Oudin, De Scripto Eccles.; Hist. Lit. de la France, vol. xiv.—Hoefer, Nouv. Bioogr. Gén. xxxi, 548.

John of Crema, a cardinal who flourished in the first half of the 12th century, is celebrated for his exertions in behalf of the cause of pope Calixtus II against his adversary Burdin, and especially for his activity in the English Church, whither he was sent by pope Honorius II, in 1126, to enforce the laws of celibacy on the English clergy. How successful he was in this mission may be best judged from the sudden termination of his stay on the English continent. Not only did the English clergy violently oppose the cardinal's efforts, but he was even entangled in a snare that must have considerably annoyed the eminent Roman Catholic ecclesiast. Says Lea (Hist. Sacr.ord. Celib. p. 293; compare Inett, Hist. Eng. Ch. ii, chap. viii), the cardinal, "after fiercely denouncing the concubines of priests, and expatiating on the duties of a priest on the bier, that the body should be made by one who had just left the side of a harlot, he was that very night surprised in the company of a courtesan, though he had on the same day celebrated mass." Although instrumental, after his return to Rome, in the election of pope Innocent II (1198), the latter afterwards forsook him, and John for a time espoused the cause of the rival pope, Anacletus, returning, of course, again to obedience to Innocent II as soon as he had learned that by such an act only he could advance his own interests. The time of his death is not known to us.

John, the Deacon and orator (Διάκονος τοῦ Ρουμ) of Constantinople, was a deacon of the great church (St. Sophia) in that city about the end of the 9th century. He wrote λόγος εἰς τὸν βιον ἐν ἐνίγμας ποιούς ἡμῶν Ἡσομ, τοῦ ἐννομάζοντος (Vita S. Josephi Pyriformis), published in the Acta Sanctorum (April 3), vol. i, a Latin version being given in the body of the work, vol. ii, appendix. Other works are: De Vitris (ibid., p. 266, etc.), and the original in the Appendix, p. xxxvi. Allatius (De Pellis, c. xxx) cites another work of this writer, entitled Τις ὁ σκοτών τῷ διὸ τῆς πρότροσι τοῦ ἀνθρώπου πλάτων, κ. τ. τ. (Quid est Consilium Dei in primis hominum). A work De Consensu is common to several medieval writers, as John Galenus or Pedemus; John Hypatius.

John Cyriaristia (Κυριαριστια), surnamed the One, an ecclesiastical writer, lived in the latter half of the 13th century, not in the 15th, as erroneously stated by Lalbe in his Chronologia Brevis Ecclesiasticae Scripturarum. Cyriaristia was an opponent of Gregory Palamas (q. v.) and his followers (the believers in the light of Mount Tabor), and most of whose works (as late as 1898) were written (1829) had reference to that controversy. They compose a series of five treatises, but only the first and fourth books of the first treatise of the series, Palaearistius Transgressio Libri iv, have been published. They appeared, with a Latin version, in the Aurelian Novellam of Combes, ii, 68-105, and the Latin version was given in the Bibliotheca Patrum, xxi, 476, etc. (ed. Lyons, 1677). Cyriaristia wrote also "Εκθέσεις στουκανδρίων ρημάτων θεολογικών (Expositio Materiae lorum que de Dea a Thelosia dicuntur). The work is divided into one hundred chapters, which are subdivided in ten decades or portions, each chapter containing, from which arrangement the work is sometimes referred to by the simple title of Decades. A Latin version of it by Francisca Turriana was published at Rome in 1851, 404, and was reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, xxxi, 577, etc.—Combes, Aurelian Novellam, ii, 105; Fabriacius, Bibl. Gr. xi, 507; Cave, Hist. Lit., vol. ii, Appendix by Gery and Wharton, p. 65; Oudin, De Scriptor et Scriptis Ecclesiastici, iii, 1062; Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Bibliog., ii, 594.

John of Damascus (Johannes Damascenus, των ἀνδρὸς Δαμασκηνοῖς) (1), one of the early ecclesiastical writers, and the author of the standard text-book of dogmatic theology in the Greek Church, was born at Damascus about the year 676. His oratorical talents caused him to be surnamed Chyrrnnothos (golden stream) by his friends (the Arabs called him Munur). Little is known of his life except that he belonged to a high family, was ordained priest, and entered the convent of St. Sabina, where he passed the rest of his life in the midst of literary labors and theological studies. The other details found concerning him in his biography by John, patriarch of Jerusalem, are considered untrustworthy. According to this writer, John Damascenus's father was a Christian, and governor of the province of Damascus by the hands of the Saracens, and John was ably educated by an Italian monk. Under Leo the Isaurian and Constantine Capronius he zealously defended image worship both by his pen and tongue, and even went to Constantinople on that account. A legendary story relates that Leo, who was then a decided iconoclast, forged a treasonable letter from John to himself, which he contrived to pass into the hands of the caliph, who sentenced John to have his right hand cut off, when the severed hand was restored to the arm by a miracle. About that time, however, John withdrew from the convent of St. Sabina, near Jerusalem, where he passed the remainder of his life in ascetic practices and study. He died between 754 and 787. In the former year we find his last public act, a protest against the Iconoclastic Synod at Constantinople, and in the latter the Ecumenical Council of Nic, in which he took part. The Greek Church commemorates him on November 29 and December 4, and the Roman Catholic Church on May 6. Church writers agree in considering John Damascenus as superior to all his contemporaries in philosophy and erudition; yet his works, though justifying his reputation, are deficient in criticism. The most important literary achievement of Damascenus is the Πηγὴ γνώσεως (Source of Knowledge), comprising the following three works: (1) Κρόαμα Φιλοσοφία, or Didascalia, which treats almost exclusively of logical and ontological categories, based mainly on Aristotle and Porphyry.—(2) Περί συμμετηκός στην Συμφωνία, De heresibus, containing in 108 articles a chronological synopsis of the heresies in the Church; it differs from other works on the errors of pagans and Jews (the first eighty are really the work of Epiphanius; the remainder partly treat of the heresies from the time of Epiphanius to that of the image controversies, according to Theodoretus, Sophronius, Leontius of Byzantium, and others). This work is a most precise history and analysis of heresies, and its contents are not mere or partly fictitious. The third and most important work, to which the former two were really simply the introduction, is entitled "Εκθέσεις ανεφάλως της Πρωτοκλησίας, Doctrinae of the Orthodox Church, collected from the principal writers of the 4th century, especially Gregory of Nyssa, Athanasius, Basil the Great, (Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Cyril, Nemesius, and others. The whole work is divided into 100 sections or four books (the latter is probably a later arrangement), and treats of the following subjects: (a) Doctrinae seniores, or the possibility of knowing them. Though John teaches that it is neither impossible to know God, nor possible to know him all; that his essence is neither expressible nor entirely inexpressible, he nevertheless inclines to the transcendent character of the idea of God, and insists on the necessity of human thought in its conception, and referring man, in the end, as Apopagiosis does, to the records of divinely revealed truth. It may be considered as a characteristic feature of his theology that it principally dwells on God's metaphysical attributes, hardly touching the ethical question. (b) The Trinity, to which he gives great prominence. He not only repeats the doctrines of the Greek Church, as well as the arguments of the Greek fathers, but resumes a scientific construction of the dogma within the established creed, though admitting that there are certain bounds to the inquiry, which human reason cannot cross. (c) Creation, Angels, and Demons. On these he simply collects the doctrines of his predecessors, chasing with a somewhat lengthy exposition of his views on heaven, heavenly bodies, light, fire, winds, water, earth, also chiefly based on the authority of the fathers. Some singular opinions of his own he attempts to support by scriptural passages. (d) Man, his creation and nature. His theory is that God created man for the participation of the divine in his person, and as such he has a share in the divine in his person, and as such he has a share in the divine. Whenever he ventures upon the latter he fluctuates between Peripateticism, tending to Trinitism, and Platonism, leading almost imperceptibly to Saebullianism and Modalism. (e) Creation, Angels, and Demons.

John is now generally regarded as one of the oldest men of the Greek Church in the 8th century; but he by no means, on that account, deserves to be honored with the title of "philosopher." He was not an independent inquirer, but, like all able and diligent compiler and expounder of what others had thought, and the Church received. "He was," as an American ecclesiastic has well put it, "in design, method, and spirit, the precursor of the scholastic theologians. They, indeed, lived in another quarter of the globe from Symeon and in Peter of Lombardy, the first great scholastic theologian of the Latin Church. But no one who has compared the orthodox faith of the one with the sentences of the other can well doubt that some of the early translations of the former were employed in the composition of the latter. It cannot, probably, be far from the truth to say that, while Augustine is the father of the scholastic theology as to the matter of it, the learned Greek of Damascus was the father of it as to its form."

John of Damascus is generally considered as the restorer of the practice of chanting in the Greek Church, and he is also named as the author of a number of hymns yet in use in that Church. It is by no means proved, however, that he was the inventor of musical notation, as some have affirmed. Copies of a Mss. treatise on Church music, of which he is considered the author, are to be found in several European (public) libraries: it was published by abbe Gerbert in the 2d vol. of his treatise De Conto et Musica Sacra. It was translated into French by Villoteau in his memoire Sur l'Etat actuel de l'Art musical en Egypte (in Description de l'Egypte, xiv, 580 sq.). John, Jacobite bishop of Dara (a city in Mesopotamia, near Nisibis) in the first half of the 9th century (not in the 6th or 7th, as says Cave in his Hist. Lit., i, 131, nor in the 4th, as is maintained by Abraham Chechelis, nor in the 8th, as it is said by Asseman in his Bibliotheca Orientalis, ii, 118; see also ii, 219 and 347). He was a contemporary of Dionysius of Telmahar, who dedicated his chronicle to him, as he states in his Preface: "Nos Côngelorum, "I am occasioned to fly to the writings of Dionysius of Mytilene, who was also the author of the work of Gregory of Nyssa, whose writings he also used otherwise (Asseman, iii, 22); and also an Anaphora (according to theCatalogue Sarcopoum, by Schulting, pt. iii, p. 106, No. 29)."—Herglotz, Real-Encyk., vi, 746. JOHN DE DIEU (JOHANNES A DEO), saint, founder of the order of charity, was born at Monte-Mor-el-Novo, Portugal, March 8, 1495. An unknown priest stole him from his father, a poor man called Andrea Ciudad, and afterwards abandoned him at Oropesa, in Castile. After roaming about many years, he was led to dedicate himself to the care of the sick, and changed his family name for de Dieu (a Deo), by permission of the bishop of Tui. In 1540 he opened the first house of his order at Seville, and died March 8, 1550, without leaving any set rules for his disciples. In 1572 Pope Pius V subjected them to the rule of St. Augustine, adding a vow to devote themselves to the care of the sick, and sundry other regulations. See CHARITY, BROTHERS OF. John de Dieu was canonized by pope Alexander VIII, October 16, 1690. He is commemorated on the 8th of March. JOHN OF EGYPT (JOANNEIS AEGYPTIUS), a Christian martyr who suffered in Palestine in the Diocletian persecution, is spoken of by Eusebius, who knew him personally, as the most illustrious of the sufferers in Palestine, and especially worthy of admiration for his philosophic (i.e., ascetic) life and conversation, and for the wonderful strength of his memory. After the loss of his eyesight he acted as anagnostor, or reader in the church, supplying the want of sight by his extraordinary power of memory. He could recite correctly whole books of Scripture, whether from the Prophets, the Gospels, or the apostolic Epistles. In the seventh year of the persecution, A.D. 310, he was treated variously with great cruelty; one foot was burned off, and fire was applied to his sightless eyeballs for the mere purpose of torture. As he was unable to undergo the toil of the mines or the public works, he and several others (among whom was a religious lady), who were under sentence of banishment, and had disabled from labor, were confined in a place by themselves. In the eighth year of the persecution, A.D. 311, the whole party, thirty-nine in number, were decapitated in one day by order of Maximin Daia, who then governed the eastern provinces. See Eusebius, De Martyribus, 4; Hist. Eccl. c. 13; Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. ii, 585.

JOHN ELIZENSTAYRI. See JOHN THE ALMGIVER.

John (surnamed Lackland) king of England, and youngest son of Henry II, was born at Oxford Dec. 24, 1166. After the conquest of Ireland, his father, in accordance with a bull from the pope authorizing Henry II to invest any one of the bishops of Ireland, appointed him to the government of that country in 1178, and he removed thither in 1185; but he failed so utterly in the task that he was recalled in a few months. He had always been the favorite of his father, and was allowed to stand by his side as leader of the Irish party in the controversy with Thomas a Becket, and his removal after the archbishop's death, contributed no little to the sudden death of Henry II. Upon his brother Richard's succession he obtained a very favorable position in the English realm; indeed, so many enfeoffments were conferred on him that he was virtually sovereign of nearly one third of the kingdom. But this by no means satisfied John, by nature base, cowardly, and covetous. During the absence of his brother on a crusade, he sought even to obtain for himself the crown, but failed signally, as having only a very untenable pretension to it, and while greatly increasing the affection of the English people for Richard. Upon the death of the latter, John, by express wish of Richard on his death-bed, ascended the long-coveted throne (May 26, 1199). The accusation that John avoided the claims of Arthur, the son of his elder brother Geoffrey, by imprisoning him and privately putting him out of the way, are questions which belong to secular historians. It remains for us to state here only that king Philip Augustus of France, who had espoused John's cause in opposition to Richard, now espoused that of Arthur, and joined John in a war in which the latter was severely the loser, France regaining by 1204 the provinces that had been wrested from her. Far more serious were the results of another contest into which he was drawn, in 1205, by the death of the archbishop of Canterbury, and which formed a most important chapter in the history of investiture. Insisting upon the royal right of investiture, John first waged war against his own clergy, until finally Innocent III also took up the gauntlet, and thus drew upon himself not only the formidable hostility of the whole body of the national clergy, but also of one of the ablest and most enterprising of the popes of history, his chief opponent. The question at issue was, of course, the election of a successor to the lately vacated archbishopric. It had hitherto been the custom of the clergy to defer the election to any vacancies in their ranks until the king had favorably disposed himself with a congre d'elire. But some of the justiciars of the monks or canons of Christ Church, Canterbury, who possessed the right of voting in the choice of their archbishop, had proceeded to the election without such a grant from the royal chair, and chosen Reginald, their sub-prior, as successor, and installed him in the archiepiscopal throne before day-light. Having enjoined upon him the strictest secrity, they sent him immediately to Rome to secure the pontiff's confirmation of their act. The foolish Reginald, however, disclosed the secret, and it came to the ears of the king and the suffragan bishops of Canterbury. He at the same time procured the consent of the pope for him to proceed to a new election, and suggested John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, for the honorable position, who was accordingly installed, likewise against the wish of the suffragan bishops. These appeals to Rome, however, and any one of his successors, did not, as is too often the case, do likewise. This afforded Innocent III, ever on the alert to make his imperial power felt, a valuable opportunity to place forever at his own disposal one of the most important dignities in the Christian Church. According to the doctrine of the invalidity of Reginald's election, none of John's successors could have proceeded to Rome without the sanction of the sovereign pontiff, and that therefore the choice of the bishop of Norwich also was illegal, and put forth as the candidate for the priency cardinal Langton, an Englishman by birth, but an energy quite uncommon to him suppressed all rebellious outbursts in his own domains. Innocent, finding his "ecclesiastical artillery" to be inefficient against England's king, entered into league with Philip Au-grusus, and took the latter to prepare a new invasion of England. This undertaking soon brought John to terms, and in 1213 (May 13) he at last consented to submit to all the demands of the Holy See, of which the admission of the pope's nominee, Stephen de Langton, to the archbishopric of Canterbury (May 24), he even yielded much more than could have consistently been asked of him by the Roman see, and perpetrated an act of disgraceful cowardice, which has heaped everlasting infamy on his memory. Two days after, he made over to the pope the kingdoms of England and Ireland, to be held by him and by the Roman Church in fee, and took to his holiness the ordinary oath taken by vassals to their lords (see Reichel, The Roman See in the Middle Ages, p. 251 sq.). It is not to be wondered at that the Roman see now readily conceded to the demand of John that hereafter there should be an oblivion of the pact on both sides, and that the full of existential communication should be revoked by the pope, while, in return, John was obliged to pledge that of his disaffected English subjects those who were in confinement should be liberated, and those who had fled or been banished beyond seas should be permitted to return home. Philip, whereupon to France, and the larger agreement of pope and king, persisted in his invasion scheme, though no longer approved by Rome; but the French fleet was totally defeated in the harbor of Damme, 300 of their vessels were captured and above 100 destroyed. Subsequent events, however, proved profitable to France, and the later agreement and concert at home against John. At length the English barons, tired of their tyrannical ruler, after vainly petitioning for more liberal concessions, assembled at Stamford to wage war themselves against him, and marched directly on London, where they were hailed with great joy by the citizens.
The king, fearing for his throne, now gladly consented to a conference. They met the king at Runnymead, and, as a result of this meeting, they obtained, on June 15th, 1215, the Great Charter (Magna Charta), the basis of the English Constitution. The pope, who had constantly opposed the English in their revolution, now annulled the charter, and the war broke out again.
The barons now called over the dauphin of France to be their leader, and Louis landed at Sandwich on May 20th, 1216. In attempting to cross the Wash, John lost his regalia and treasures, was taken ill, and, being brought to the Syrian MSS. 1039, 1041, and 1042, of the 49th year of his age. "All English historians paint the character of John in the darkest colors; and the history of his reign seems to prove that to his full share of the ferocity of his line he conjointed an unsteadiness and volatility, a susceptibility of being suddenly depressed by evil fortune, and exalted beyond the bounds of moderation and prudence by his opposite, which gave a little-less to his character not belonging to that of any of his royal ancestors. He is charged, in addition, with a savcage cruelty of disposition, and with the most unbounded licentiousness, while, on the other hand, so many vices are not allowed to have been relieved by a single good quality" (Engl. Cyclopedia, a. v.). Of course this may all be due to the fact that John has had no historian, that his cause expired with himself, and that every writer of his story has told it in the spirit of the opposite and victorious party; and, further, that the intense disgust always felt by every class of his countrymen at his base surrender of his kingdom in vassalage to the pope may have led them to regard with less distress all adverse reports respecting his general character. See

John, Monophysite (missionary) bishop of Ephessus, generally called Epycopus Asia, as Ephesus is the most important see of Asia Minor (see Assemiainen, Bibli.
Oriente. t. ii, Diss. de Monophysite, § ix, s. v. Asia), was a native of Amid (9), Syria, and lived in the 6th century (about 591). He was consecrated bishop in Constantinople, and was highly esteemed at court, especially during the regime of Justinian. The latter appointed him to inquire into the state of the heathen, of whom there was yet a large number in the empire, even in Constantinople, and to secure their conversion. Quite successful in his efforts at home, the emperor authorized John to take a missionary tour through the whole empire, and we are told that this time he converted 70,000 people, and founded 96 churches (comp. Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ch. xlvii). He seems not to have had any direct spiritual jurisdiction over the metropolis of Asia Minor, but to have been honored with the title simply on account of his great success as a missionary, and we are inclined to believe that in reality he was simply a missionary bishop," for he is often styled "he who is not over the heathen" (Syri. מנהיגים מברה), and also the destroyer of idols" (Syri. מנהיגים מברה). How long John remained a favorite with Justinian we do not know, but have reason to suppose that his fate depended upon the successor of his Monophysite brethren.
In 626 (see assemiainen, Bibli. Orient. ii, 284) he in his relations with the Roman church, which befell the Monophysites at the instigation of John of Stiriou. The period, circumstances, and place of his death are uncertain. He is probably the John Rhetor mentioned by Evagrius and Theodorus Lector, and with whom the former in his works calls his relative.
Assemiainen (Bibl. Orient. ii, 84) opposes this identity, but without good reasons. John wrote a historical work, in three parts, in Syria, which is of great importance for the Church history of the East. The first part appears to be totally lost, and of the second only a few fragments, quoted by Assemiainen, are preserved to us. It is indeed the third part alone that has come down to us, and that only in a somewhat mutilated form. Dionysius of Telmahar, in his chronicle (from Theodorus the younger to Justin II), used this part freely; and Assemiainen obtained his passages (Biblioth.
Oriente. i, 215, 269, 360, 362, 367, 370, 312, 328, 329) from this source and from Bar-Hebræus were the only sources through which the work of John was known to us until the third part of it (somewhat incomplete) was discovered by William Cureton among the MSS. of the Monastery of the Saints Peter and Paul of the Egyptian monks of the eleventh century, the 49th year of his age. "All English historians paint the character of John in the darkest colors; and the history of his reign seems to prove that to his full share of the ferocity of his line he conjointed an unsteadiness and volatility, a susceptibility of being suddenly depressed
by evil fortune, and exalted beyond the bounds of moderation and prudence by his opposite, which gave a little-

nected to the sixth year of the reign of Justinian II, nephew of Justinian, and consequently to the year 571. The first part forms six chapters, of which we have only the second and fifth in full; the others are all more or less incomplete (see Bernstein, Zeitsch. der d. Morgen. Gesellschaft, viii, 307).

It continues the history to the third year after the death of Justinus II (581) (see bk. vi, ch. xxv, p. 402), and mentions even later dates down to 588. We find in it accounts of many facts of ecclesiastical history not to be discovered in other sources. It is the more important from the fact that the author, though a portion of the Monophysite doctrine, and occasionally somewhat over-creedal, was a contemporary, and often an eyewitness of the facts he relates. Cureton promised an English translation of the work, but to our knowledge it has not yet appeared. The German scholar Schonfelder (Die Kirchengeschichte des Johannes von Ephesus. Aus dem Syrischen übersetzt. Mit einer Abhandlung i. d. Trühen [Münch. 1802, 8vo]) has, however, furnished a German translation, of which those who do not read the Oriental languages can avail themselves in their studies of the Eastern Church. In 1860 a young Dutch scholar published a treatise on John, Bishop of Ephesus, the first Syriac Church historian (for the full title, see below), in which he discussed the general relations of Syriac literature, and the productions of the Syriac Church historians in particular, the person and historical character of John, his relation to the Gospel of John, the development of Church history, and the contents of his work. Since then, Dr. Land has continued his studies of the Syriac writers, and in vol. ii of his Anecdotae Syriacae (also under the special title Jornana, Episopii Monophyti Scripta Historica [Leyd. 1868, 8vo]), he has published all the inedited works of John of Ephesus. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vi, 747; Kittto, Jour. Soc. Lit. xvi, 209 sq. (J. H. W.)

John of Euchaita (Euchaios or Euchania) (a city afterwards called Theodoropolis) was a bishop of Euchaita (Ὑπηρεσία στὴν Εὐχαία), and lived in the time of the emperor Constantine and Monomachus (A.D. 1042-1054), but nothing further is known of him. He is mentioned in the Menaion (Μηναίον), i.e. "Blackfoot.

He wrote a number of imitative poems, sermons, and letters. A volume of his poems was published by Matthew Bust (Eton, 1610, 4to). They were probably written on occasion of the Church festivals, as they are commemorative of the incidents of the life of Christ or the Church, or of the feasts, or ritual services, composed by him, and containing three canons or hymns, is given by Nicolaus Rayeus in his dissertation De Acolouthia Officii Canonic, prefixed to the Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. ii. John wrote also, Vita S. Dorothis Junioris, given in the Acta Sanctorum, June, I, 605, etc. Various sermons for the Church festivals, and other works of his, are extant in MS. See Fabricius, Biblioth. Orient. viii, 809, 627, etc.; x, 221, 226; xi, 79; Cave, Hist. John of Falkenberg, surnamed Jacobia de Saxonia, or Doctor de Prateniensis, a German Dominican, is celebrated for the zeal with which he defended pope Gregory XII in the Council of Constance. He also endeavored to defend the regiudical opinions of John Peti, but he failed in both instances. He next, at the request of the Knights of the Cross, wrote a libel against Wladislas Jagello, king of Poland, for which he was declared a heretic and condemned to imprisonment for life at Rome. Pope Martin V, however, commuted it a few years after, and John, encouraged, now demanded of the Knights of Paul of Rusoro, grand master of the Knights of the Cross, the price of the libel he had written. The latter offering him but a small amount, John of Falkenberg insisted that he was aggrieved, and condemned to be drowned. He escaped, however, repaired to the convent of Kämpen, and wrote against the order.

John the Faster (Johannes Jejunator or Nau- trites), of humble extraction, became patriarch of Constantinople in 582. He was distinguished for his piety, benevolence, strong asceticism, and fasting. He was the first who assumed the title of "ecclesiastical patriarch," and thereby involved himself in disputes with the bishops of Rome, Pelagius II and Gregory I, the opening of a struggle which resulted finally, in the 11th century (1054), in a complete rupture of the churches of Rome and Constantinople. (See the article Græcia, in Diet. de la lang. chrét. et de l'art, i, 17.) John died Sept. 2, 595. The Greek Church counts him among its saints. He is reputed the author of "Akolouthia kai tais tis "Ekoloupoliwmata"; λόγω πρῶτον τὴν μελίαν ἐκφυάσας τοῦ ἀγνωριστο- νον νόον, which belongs to the earliest penitential works of the Greek Church (pub. by Morinus, Compend. hist. de administratione sacramentorum, Paris, 1561, Vol. 179, etc.). Graec. x, 164 sq.; Le Quien, Oriens Chris- tian., i, 216 sq.; Schröckh, Kirchengesch. xvii, 56 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vii, 748; Aschbach, Kirchen-Lex., iii, 113.

John (called also Josselin), abbot of Fécamp. France, was born in the neighborhood of Vauxen. His family name Labbe supposed to have been Israel or D'Albe. He came to France with William, abbot of St. Bénigne of Dijon, and studied under that learned man. He practiced medicine with success; but William going to Fécamp to reform the abbey, and install there a col- lege of Benedictines, John accompanied him, was made prior, and finally succeeded William as abbot. He re- formed several convents, and by his firm adherence to discipline embodied himself with many prelates, sus- tained, however, in every instance by the pope. In 1054 he was sent to England, where he was welcomed by king Edward, but, having subsequently undertaken a journey to the Holy Land, he was made prisoner by the Mohammedans, and is said to have only returned to France in 1076. He died Feb. 2, 1079. He wrote a book of prayers, the preface of which is to be found in Mabillon, Anecdot. i, 133, and three chapters in the Meditations S. Augustini. He is also considered as the author of a treatise, De Divina Contemplatione, pub. in 1359, under the title of Confessio Theologica, and attrib- uted to John Cassian. John of Gischala, son of Levi, named after his native place [see Gischala], was one of the most cele- brated leaders of the unfortunate Jews of Galilee in their final struggle with the Romans, A.D. 66-67. Of his personal history we know scarcely anything. The only writer to whom we can go for information—Josephus—is prejudiced, because John of Gischala proved the most formidable rival of the renowned Jewish historian. He is on that account depicted by Josephus in a very disparaging manner. His deeds, however, indicate to every fair-minded person that he belonged to that class of men who, for the defense of their country, readily ig- nore all other duties. We are furthermore encouraged to accept his statement (Gesch. der Juden, iii, 386) has drawn of John, when we remember that the virtuous and learned Simon ben-Gia- maliel was a devoted and life-long friend of our hero. (By this it must, however, by no means he inferred that we are ready to accept Gratia's views on the character of John of Gischala, as we refer rather to Josephus, as Josephus.) Though nature Josephus's superior, more particularly in the art of warfare, he readily submitted

John the Italian (Ioannes Italus) (1), a monk of the 10th century. He was at first canon at Rome, patronized by the Emperor Leo V., and afterwards by Odon, who led him to France, and he entered a convent there. Some say that he afterwards returned to Italy, and became prior of a Roman convent, while others say that he became abbot of some French Cistercian convent, and that he died in France after 945. Our information regarding his personal history is derived only from his biography in the Life of St. Odon (in Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, vii., 152). He published extracts of St. Gregory's Moralia. See Hist. Litt. de la France, vi., 265; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs Sucrets, xii., 825.

John the Italian (Italus, Italeus, 2), a Greek philosopher and heretic who flourished in the time of Alexius I. Comnenus (1081-1118), escaped to Italy after the revolt of Maniaces against Constantine, and there prosecuted his preparatory studies. He finally returned again to Constantinople, and became a disciple of Michael Psellus the younger. His learning and ability attracted general attention, and the emperor Michael Ducas (1071-1178), finding himself in need of a man acquainted with the Italian provinces to influence them to a return to the Byzantine empire, selected John Italus for this purpose, and dispatched him to Dyrachium. He, however, proved unfaithful to the trust, and, in his intrigues humbugging some public, was banished from Rome to avoid persecution. He was subsequently allowed to return to Constantinople, and there entered the monastery of Pega. When Psellus was banished in 1077, John was made first professor of philosophy (Πατήρ τῶν φιλόσοφων), and filled this prominent post most acceptably, with logic and Aristotle's philosophy than with the other branches of science, and was but little versed in grammar and rhetoric. He was very passionate and hasty in argument, and sometimes even resorted to bodily violence, but he was, fortunately, prompt in acknowledging his errors. He expounded to his pupils Proclus, Plato, Jamblichus, Porphyry, and Aristotle, but often in a manner quite inconsistent with the position of Christian orthodoxy. Alexius, soon after ascending the throne, caused Italus's doctrines to be examined, and summoned him before an ecclesiastical court. The defense of the patriarch Eustadius, John Italus was obliged publicly to recant and anathematize eleven historical opinions advanced in his lectures. Among other things, he was accused of "ridiculing image-worship." Continuing, however, to teach the same doctrines, he was anathematized by the Church, and, fearing persecution, he forsook the rostrum. It is said that in later years he publicly renounced his errors. His principal works (all in MSS.) are, Έκκλησία τῆς ἁγίας Σαββάτου; Εκκλησία τῆς τοιαύτης; Περὶ ἐξουσίων; Μισίων ἐπισκοπῶν λεγείσης κατὰ σύνους; some discourses, etc. See Anna Comnenus, Alexius, v. 8, 9; Fabriicius, Bibli. John of Jerusalem (1), originally a monk, was bishop of Jerusalem (A.D. 386) when not much more than thirty years of age (Jerome, Epist. lxxxi., 8). Some speak of him as patriarch, but Jerusalem was not elevated to the dignity of a patriarchate until the following century. He was a man of great apostolical and monastic energy (Jerome, Lib. contra Joam. c. 10), but he was generally celebrated for eloquence, talent, and learning. He was acquainted, at least in some degree, with the Hebrew and Syriac languages, but it is doubtful if he was acquainted with Latin. He is said to have been at one period an Arian, or to have sided with the Arians when they were in the ascendant under the emperor Valens (Jerome, Lib. contra Joan. c. 4, 8). For eight years after his apostasy, his bishopric he was on friendly terms with St. Jerome, who was then living a monastic life in Bethlehem or its neighborhood; but towards the close of that period strife was stirred up by Epiphanius of Constantia (or Salamis), in Cyprus, who came to Palestine to ascertain the truth of a report which had reached him, that the notorious sentiments of Origen were gaining ground under the patronage of John. Epiphanius's violence against all that had even the appearance of Origenism led him into a controversy with John also. See EPIPHANIUS. Whether John really cherished opinions at variance with the orthodoxy of that time, or only pretended to, towards those who held them a forbearance which was looked upon with suspicion, we do not know; but he became again involved in squabbles with the supporters of orthodox views. He was charged by them with favoring Pelagius, who was then in Asia, and who was accused of heresy in the councils of Jerusalem and Diocletian (A.D. 415), but was in the latter council acquitted of the charge, and restored to the communion of the Church. See PELAGIUS. In the controversies waged against Chrysostom, John of Jerusalem always sided decidedly with the Apologists. Eusebius, in his Church History, wrote, according to Gennadius (De Viris Illustribus 30), Adversus Oblectatores Sui Studii Liber, in which he showed that he rather admired the ability than followed the opinions of Origen. Fabricius and Cellier think, and with apparent reason, that this work, which is lost, was the apologetic letter to which he addressed the above-mentioned Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, which resulted in a reconciliation between John and Jerome. No other work of John is noticed by the ancients; but in the 17th century two huge volumes appeared, entitled Ioannis Nepoto Suri Episcopi, Episcopi xii, Opera omnia quae hactenus incolati, reperti sunt, collectae, eaque Autori et Authoritati tribuit Vitellius Libri libris asserta per A. P. Petrum Wustelium (Brussels, 1643, fol.). The Vidicici occupied the second volume.

The works professed to be translated from the Greek, and are as follows: (1) Liber de Institutione primum Monachorum, in Lege Veteri exzortur et in Nova persecutionum, ad Cupramiam Monarchum. Interpretatione Aquitico Patriarcha Antiocchena. This work is mentioned by Trithemius (apud Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. x, 520) as "Volumen insignis de principio et profecta ordoi Carmelitici," and is ascribed to him by a letter to a later John of Jerusalem (in the 8th century). It is contained in several editions of the Biblotheca Patrum, in which work, indeed, it seems to have been first published (vol. ix, Par. 1589, fol.), and in the works of Thomas a Jane, the Carmelita (i. 416, etc., Cologne, 1684, folio). It is generally admitted to be the production of a Latin writer, and of much later date than our John. -- (2) In stratummatia Beati Iohannis Libri iii, a commentary on the first three chapters of the book of Job, often printed in Latin among the works of Origen, but supposed to belong neither to him. -- (3) In Sophoclemmum, an imperfect commentary on the Gospel of Matthew, usually printed, under the title of Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum, among the works of Chrysostom, in the Latin or Graeco-Latin editions of that father, but supposed to be the work of some Anian or Anomarian about the end of the 8th century. One of the works of the 7th century: Fragmenta Ex Commentario ad Prima Capita vii et vii. Marcii, cited by Thomas Aquinas (Catena Aurea at Evang.), as a work of Chrysostom. -- (5) Fragmenta Ex Commentario in Lukum, extant under the name of Chrysostom, partly in editions of his works, partly in the Latin version of a Greek Catena in Lucas published by Cordemius (Antiv. 1628, folio), and partly in the Catena Aurea of Thomas Aquinas. -- (6) Homiliae Liiii, almost all of them among those published in the works of Chrysostom. There is no good reason for ascribing any of these works to John; nor are they, in fact, ascribed to him except by the Carmelites. See Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. ix, 299; x, 525, etc.; Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 281, etc.; Dupin, Nour. Bibliothèque des Actes Ecclésiastiques, iii, 87, ed. Par. 1600; Smith, Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, ii, 596.

John of Jerusalem (2). A synodical letter of John, who was a patriarch of Jerusalem early in the 6th century, and his suffragan bishops assembled in a council at Jerusalem A.D. 517 or 518, to John of Constantinople [John of Capadocia], is given in the Concilia (vol. v, 187, etc., ed. Labbe; viii, 1067, ed. Mansi).

John of Jerusalem (3) [or of Damascus?]. There is no work relating to the persons mentioned, it is very near the name of John of Jerusalem, but it is doubtful how far they may be ascribed to the same author, hence we add him here simply under a separate heading. They are, 1. Ioannes uelvastator Martyrum Ἰουσαφελοῦ, Οικονομήματα τοῦ Ἱεροσόλυμων μοναχοῦ Διονυσίου, or Joannis Hierosolymitani renervenditii Monachi Narratio, a very brief account of the origin of the Iconoclastic movement, published by Combes under the title of the Scriptores Post Thokopalem (Par. 1685, fol.), and reprinted at Venice, A.D. 1729, as part of the series of Byzantine historians; it is also included in the Bonn edition of that series. It is also printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum (Par. 1724, fol.), vol. ii, 270: 2. Διάλογος προς τοὺς μισούντας πρὸς τὸν καιρόν και δοξολογοῦντα και πόδαν και ἣρμασάντα πρὸς τὰς ὑπηρεσίας τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ και τῆς ιεραπετρίας τῶν ἁγίων και δοξολογοῦντα ἤμεραν πιστώματος, or Discipatio inexcusa quod habet a de Sibedis et or. thodius, studiumque ac cæsarem orbis, seu Dionysios adversarius sibi adiutus doctrinae sacerdotum ortodoro- rumque patrium nostrorum, first published by Combes under the title of the Scriptores Post Thokopalem as the work of an anonymous writer, and contained in the Venetian, but not in the Bonn edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum (Par. 1724, fol.). It is also reprinted by Gallandius (ut supra), p. 352, and ascribed to John of Damascus or John of Jerusalem, some MSS, giving one name, and others giving the other. Gallandius considers that he is called Damascus from his birthplace. The author of this invective is to be distinguished from the greatly celebrated John of Damascus (q. v.), his contemporary, to whom, perhaps, the transcribers of the manuscripts, in prefixing the name Damascus, intended to ascribe the work: 3. Ioannes monachus et presbyteri prioris τοῦ δαμασκηνοῦ λόγου ἀναδικτικὸς περὶ τῶν ἅγιων και πολιτῶν ἐπιστημών, ἀπὸ τῶν και τῶν τοιουτῶν, πρὸς τοὺς ἀρχονταίς τοῦ Καπαλίου καὶ πρὸς πάντα ἀντικρι- στικῶν, or Joannis Damascusen Monachæ et Presbiteri Opera demonstrativa de sacris ac venerandis imaginibus, ad Christianos omnes, aduersaque Imperatorum Convivi- num Catalogum. The title is given in other MSS, "Ἐν Ευσταθίῳ Ιωάννου Ιεροσολυμίου Πραγματεύματα," etc. -- Epitola Joannis, or Hierosolymitani Archiepipei, etc. The work was first printed in the Acticri Nummum of Combes (Paris, 1648, folio), vol. ii, and was reprinted by Gallandius (ut supra), p. 356, etc. Fabricius is disposed to identify the authors of Nos. 1 and 3, and treats No. 2 as the work of another and unknown writer: but Gallandius, from internal evidence, endeavors to show that Nos. 2 and 3 are written by one person, but that No. 1 is by a different writer, and this seems to be the preferable opinion. He thinks there is also internal evidence of this. Nothing is written in the name of Damascus, and it was subsequently to No. 2. See Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. vii, 682; Gallandius, Bibli. Patrum, xiii, Prolegomena, ch. x, p. 15; Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Elog. ii, 596.

John of Jerusalem (4), patriarch of Jerusalem, who flourished probably in the latter half of the 10th century, was the author of a life of Joannes Damascenus, which is prefixed to his De vita et morte sive Hierosolymitana antiquus Pontificis Ioannis Hierosolymitani vita et morte scripta, &c. (Vita sancti Patrii nostri Joannis Damascenici & Ioannes Patriarcha Hierosolymitano conscripta). The work is a translation from the Arabic, or at least founded upon an Arabic biography, and was written a considerable time after the death of John of Damascus (A.D. 756), and after the cessation of the Iconoclastic contest, which may be regarded as having terminated on the death of Theophanes (A.D. 842). We have no data for determining how long after these events the author lived. Le Quien identifies him with a John, patriarch of Jerusalem, who was burnt alive by the Saracens in the latter part of the reign (A.D. 963–9) of Nicephorus Phocas, upon suspicion that he had excited that emperor to attack them (Cedrenus, Concord. i. 661, edn. Paris, ii. 374, ed. Bonn). This life of John of Damascus was first published at Rome with the orations of Damascenus (De Sacris Imaginibus [1555, 8vo]; it was reprinted at Basel with all the works of John of Damascus A.D. 1576 in the Acta Sanctorum (May 6), vol. ii (the Latin version in the body of the work [p. 111, etc.], and the original in the Appendix [p. 725, etc.]); and in the edition of The Works of Damascenus by Le Quien, vol. i (Paris, 1712, folio). The Latin version is given (s. d. 6 Maii) in the Vita Sanctorum of Lippomanni, and the De Probatis Sanctorum Opera Posthuma, etc., part of the Opera Sacra, note at the beginning of the Vita S. John. Damasc. and Origenis Christianissim, iii, 466. Fabricius, Bibli. Graec. vii, 689, 699; x; 291: Cave, Hist. Lett. ii, 29; Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. i. 598.

John the Laboriosus (Joannes Philoponus, also known as Alexander and Grammaticus), an Eastern scholar of great renown, was born at Alexandria towards the close of the 6th century or the beginning of the 7th. Of his personal history but very little seems to be definitely known. He is said to have been present at the capture of the city by the Mohammedans (A.D. 639), and to have with great trepidation, when he learned the intention of the conqueror, fled to the monastery of the Monastery of the Presbyter, at which place he is said to have translated the writings of the Eastern Church, and to have died an exile, his death being recorded by the historian of the monastery. (Comp. the two lives of John of Damascus and of Damascenus in the Acta Sanctorum, May 6). The latter is attributed to the 8th century, and the former to the 11th century. (Vide his life in the Acta Sanctorum, May 6.)

John the Little, or Johannes Parvus (Jean Petit, a French theologian, born in Normandy in the latter half of the 14th century. He was at one time professor of theology in the University of Paris, but was deposed for having, on the 8th of March, 1408, pronounced a discourse in justification of the murder of the duke of Orleans, brother of the king of France, who was assassinated by the duke of Burgundy. He died at Hesdin, France, in 1411. —Pierer, Univ. Lex.

John of Matha, St., founder of the Order of the Holy Trinity (also called Fathers of Mercy in Spain, and Mathurins in Paris), was born at Faucon, in Provence, in 1154, of noble parents. He studied at Paris University, and then entered the Church. "At his first celebration of divine service," the legend goes, "he beheld a vision of an angel clothed in white, having a cross of red and blue on his breast, with his hand, created over each other, resting on the heads of two slaves, who knelt on each side of him; and believing that in this vision the mind God spoke to him, and called him to the deliverance of prisoners and captives, he immediately sold all his goods and forsook the world, to prepare himself for his mission." In conjunction with Felix of Valois he arranged the constitutions of the new order, and together they went to Rome to obtain the approval of pope Innocent III. Felix having had, the legend continues, a similar dream, the pope gladly complied with their request, and the new order was approved and established by Pope Honorii III, of Châtillon, having given them the estate of Cerfroi, they there established their first convent. They also obtained several other convents and hospitals in France and Spain, and a convent and church at Rome. Having collected large sums of money, John dispatched two of his brothers to the deserts of Africa, whence they returned with 180 Christians redeemed from the Musulman's bonds. The year following John himself went to Tunis, preaching on his way all through Spain, and creating many friends for his noble undertaking; he returned with 110 captives. From another voyage he returned with 120 Christians. Hereafter he devoted himself to preaching at Rome. He died there Dec. 21, 1218, and was canonized by Innocent XI, July 30, 1679. He is commemorated on February 8. The dress of the order consists in a flowing white gown, with a red and blue cross on the breast. See P. Ignace Dilland, Vie de St. Jean de Brébeuf (2d ed.); Baillet, Vie des Saints, Feb. 8; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Grèce, xxvi, 460; and Mrs. Janens, Legends of Monastic Orders, p. 217 sqq.

John of Meda, St., founder, or rather reformer of the order of the Humiliati, was born at Meda, near Como, towards the close of the 11th century. He was a member of the Oldrati family of Milan. After ordination he withdrew to the solitude of Ransoneo, near Como, which he subsequently left to join the Humiliati, then a lay congregation. Chosen their superior, he subjected them to the rule of St. Benedict, only changing the appellations of brethren and monks into canons. He obliged them also to say the Virgin's mass every day, and composed a special breviary for their use, which was called canons' office. The Humiliati (q. v.) thus became a regular order, with clerical and lay members. John of Meda gained a large number of proselytes by his preaching, and was reputed very charitable. He died Sept. 26, 1159, and was canonized a few days after his death by Innocent II. See St. Amb., Hist. III, ii, § xv, ch. xxiii; Sylvestre Maurolyce, Mare Oceani di tutti i Relig. i Merici, Grand Dict. historique; Richard et Giraud, Biblioth. Sac.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 441.

John the Monk (Johannes Monachus), or John of Cassel, a Spanish Franciscan, was born at Cremes, vorthunie, in the 13th century. He was a Cistercian monk, and was created cardinal. He died in 1318. He wrote commentaries on the decretals of Boniface VIII and Benedict IX, and was the first who wrote on the whole Sexta of Boniface VIII. The same work was afterwards done by Guido da Bassano, and still better by Johannes Andreae. The glossaries of Johannes Monachus were annotated and published by Phil. Probus, doctor of the school of Bourges. His MSS., under the title Glossae in sextam decretalium, are preserved in the public library of Chartres. He is also considered by some as the author of the Deformator Juris, but this is not proved. See Savigny, Catalogue de la Bibl. de Chartres, iv, 274.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 559. (J. N. P.)

John of Monte Corvino, a celebrated early Roman missionary among the Mongols, belonged to the Franciscan order, and flourished towards the close of the 13th century. He was born in Monte Corvino, a small city in Apulia, and had, previous to his appointment as Eastern missionary, distinguished himself (in 1272) as ambassador of the emperor Michael Palæologus to pope Gregory X in behalf of a contemplated union of the Eastern and Western churches. He had travelled in the East, and, aware of the opening for Christianity among the Mongols, had urged the Roman see to dispatch missionaries to them; but their efforts proved unsuccessful, and in 1289 he finally, at the instance of pope Nicholas IV, set out for that distant field himself. Of an energetic character, discouraged by no reverses however great, and in trials however laborious, he finally succeeded in building up a Christian Church. As an instance of his undaunted courage may be cited the fact that he had to buy the children of natives in order to educate them in Christian doctrines, and through them to influence maturer minds. About 1295 he had some six thousand converts, and the prospect of still greater additions. In 1307 other laborers were sent into the field, and John de Monte Corvino was appointed archbishop (his see was named Cambaldu), and the Christian interests were advanced among the Mongols even after John's death in 1308, until the downfall of the Mongol dynasty. See Mongols. (J. H. W.)

John of Nomunik (more properly Pomuk), a very popular Bohemian saint of the Roman Catholic Church, and honored by them as a martyr of the inviolability of the seal of confession. He was born at Pomuk, a village in the district of Klatau, about the middle of the 14th century. After taking orders, he rose rapidly to distinction. He was created a canon of the Cathedral of Pardubec, and eventually vicar general of the diocese of Prague. He succeeded the second Duke of Wenceslaus IV, having selected him for his confessor. Wenceslaus, himself a man of mostolveable disposition, conceiving suspicions of her virtue, required of John to reveal to him what he knew of her life from the confessions which she had made to him. John steadfastly refused, and the king resolved to be revenged for the refusal. An opportunity occurred soon afterwards, when the monks of the Benedictine abbey of Kladran elected an abbot in opposition to the design of the king, who wished to bestow it upon one of his own disfavored favorites, and obtained from John, as vicar general, at once a confession, two hundred and thirty pounds of money, and a renunciation of the rights of the monks. Wenceslaus, having first put him to the torture, at which he himself personally presided, had him tied hand and foot, and flung, already half dead from the rack, into the Moldau (March, 1391). These historical facts have been considerably enlarged, and embellished with legendary additions, in his biographer, Robert Balzani. According to these, his birth was signalized by miraculous signs, and after his martyrdom his body was discovered by a miraculous light which issued from it, was taken up, and buried with the greatest honor. Several able Romanists have argued that the story is too well adapted to reconcile the points of conflict between the legend and the historical accounts. (See Sourz, Reist.-Encyklop. vi, 749 sqq.; Pezel, Kaiser Wenzels Nachrichten, i, 292 sqq.; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lex. v, 725 sq. Dr. Otto Abel (Die Sagen u. heil. Johan. v. Nepomuk) supposes the legend to be a Jesuitic invention, and to date from the restoration of popery in Bohemia, and to serve as a popular counterpart to the martyrdom of Huss and Ziska. His memory is cherished with peculiar affection in his native country. He was canonized as a saint of the Roman Catholic Church by Benedict XIII in 1729, his feast being fixed for the 29th of June. The historic personages of the same name are enumerated—one the martyr of the confessional seal, the other of the resistance to the simoniacal tyranny of Wenceslaus; but the identity of the two is well sustained by Balzeck, Gesch. von Böhmen, iii, 62. See Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.; Asbach, Kirchen-Lex. iii, 556 sq.)

John Nicota (from Nirina, probably the city of that name in the Indus valley), also known as the Belezu, and the Jacobite Alexander Church, flourished in the early part of the 6th century, and was in the patriarchal chair from 507 to 517. He is noted for his violent opposition to the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, and is said to have refused communication with any that did not agree with them. He is acknowledged to have promised the emperor Anastasius two hundred pounds of gold if he would procure their final and decisive abrogation (see Neale, Hist. Eccl. Ch. [Alexandria] ii, 35, 57; Theophanes, n. a. A.D. 512). Among the Jacobites, who in his day enjoyed especial favor at the imperial court (a period on which, says Neale, "the Jacobite writers dwelt with peculiar complacency," and in which "their boasted had gained a footing which it never before or since possessed"), John Nicota, better known as patriarch John I of Alexandria, is reckoned among the saints. He is believed to be the author of a learned work against the Pelagians, addressed to pope Gelasius. Some think it was written by John I of Alexandria, but it is in all probability the production of John Nicota, and was written before his accession to the patriarchal chair. (J. H. W.)

John of Nicklaushausen, a German religious fanatic, flourished, in the second half of the 15th century. He was a member of the House of Lichtenstein, and was engaged in a livelihood as a swineherd when it suddenly occurred to him that an attack upon the clergy, and a summons to them to reform their profligate ways, might meet with applause from the people, to whom at JOHN NICHOMEDIA, a presbyter of the Church of Nicomedia, in Bithynia, in the time of Constantine the Great, is noted as the author of Μαρτύριον τοῦ ἁγίου Βασίλεως εἰς Ἰσπαύσον Ἀγίασμα, Acta martyris S. Basilei episcopi A. mattress, which is given in the Acta Sanctorum. Fish of Nicomedia, in April, the Latin version in the body of the work (p. 417), with a preliminary notice by Henschen, and the Greek original in the Appendix (p. 50). An extract from the Latin version, containing the history of the female saint Glaphyra, had previously been given in the same work (Januar. 1721). The Latin version of the De sanctis S. Basili et alii, which had already been published by Alcibiades Lippomani (Vita Sanctarum. Patrum, vol. vii) and by Surius (De probatis Sanctorum Vitis, s. d. 26 Aprilis). Basilius was put to death at close of the reign of Licinius, A.D. 322 or 323, John, who was at Nicomedia, pre- fuses to have conversed with him in prison. Cave thinks that the Acts have been interpolated, apparently by Metaphrastes. See Acta Sanctorum, ii, cc.; Cave, Hist. Lit., i, 185.—Smith, Diet. Gr. and Rom. Biog. ii, 601.

JOHN OF OXFORD, an English prelate, flourished in the second half of the 12th century, and took an active and important part in the controversy between King Henry II of England and his archbishop Thomas a Becket, of Canterbury. Henry hated and feared the latter, and the unlimited confidence he enjoyed. He had attended the Diet at Wurzburg in 1165, held to cement a union between Henry and the emperor of Germany, and had there taken the oath of fidelity to the rival pope of Avignon, the anti-pope Paschal II, whom the church at Nicomedia, pro- fesses to have conversed with him in prison. Cave thinks that the Acts have been interpolated, apparently by Metaphrastes. See Acta Sanctorum, ii, cc.; Cave, Hist. Lit., i, 185.—Smith, Diet. Gr. and Rom. Biog. ii, 601.

the death of the latter John further received evidence of the grateful remembrance of his royal master by the appointment to the bishopric of Norwich (1175), and as such attended the Lateran Council in 1179. The exact time of his decease is not known to us, neither are we aware that he performed any literary work of value; but his action in his king's controversy absorbed all his interests. JOHN OF PARIS, a celebrated French Dominican of the 13th century, was professor of theology at the University of Paris. He owes his renown to the part he took in the condemnation then raging of the Franciscan monk, Philip the Fair, and pope Boniface VIII. The latter, fearing his deposition on the plea that the resignation of his predecessor Celestine was illegal, took every means to advance the doctrine of papal absolutism. Not only in matters spiritual, but also in matters temporal, the pope was to be regarded supreme; in short, to save his office, he carried his schemes for the enlargement of the papal power to the verge of frenzy. Unfortunately for Boniface, however, he found his equal in Philip the Fair, who not only denied the temporal power of the pope, but finally even scorned the foolish conduct of Boniface, who was so frightened by the issuing of bulls against him and his kingdom. The University of Paris sided with the king, and among his most outspoken friends were John of Paris and Accidius of Rome. The former even published a work against the papal assumptions, De regimine potestatium populi (in the collection of Goldast, vol. ii), in which he dis- serted that "the priest, in spiritual things, was greater than the prince, but in temporal things the prince was greater than the priest; though, absolutely considered, the priest was the greater of the two." He also main- tained that the pope had no power over the property of either the pope or his subjects. As the kingdom of Christ is a spiritual one, having its foundation in the hearts of men, not in their possessions, so the power conferred on the pope relates simply to the wants or to the advantage of the universal Church. He also stood up, in defence of the independent power of the king and priests, and denied that this is derived from God through the mediation of the pope alone, maintaining that it springs directly from God, through the choice or concurrence of the communities. "For it was not Pe- ter, whose successor is the pope, that sent forth the first apostles, whose success is that of the Church, but Christ; and no other apostles, whose success is that of the Church, but Christ; and no other apostles, whose successors are the bishops, or who sent forth the seventy disciples, whose successors are the parish priests; but Christ himself did this directly. It was not Peter who detained the apostles in order to impart to them the Holy Ghost; it was not he who gave them power to forgive sins; but Christ himself. Does Paul say that he received from Peter his apostolical office, but that he said that it came to him directly from Christ or from God; that three years had elapsed after he re- ceived his commission to preach the Gospel before he had an interview with Peter." But more than this he argued. The pope himself was even amenable to a worldly power for his conduct in the papal chair. As such he regarded not simply the Ecumenical Council, but to the secular princes also he believed this right belonged, subject, however, to a demand on the part of the clergy for aid. Neander says (Ch. Hist. v, 18), "If the pope gave scanty- tles, to refuse obedience to him pope. John of Paris, or the pope, had the power of secular rulers to bring about his abdication or his deposition by means of their influence on him or on his cardinals." If the pope would not yield, they might so manage as to compel him to yield. They might command the people, under severe penal- ties, to refuse obedience to him pope. John Phurnes (Φωνεὺς), a monk of the monastery of Mount Gannus, who flourished in the reign of the emperor Alexius Comnenus (11th century), was an opponent of the Latin Church, and is noted as the author of Ἀπολογία, Ἀμφιβολία, or Συμβολή. A discussion which was carried on with Peter, archbishop of Milan, in the presence of the emperor. If this is the work which John Veccias cites and replies to in his De Unitio Ecclesiarum Oratio (apud Allatius, Graec. Orthodozi, i, 173, etc.), it appears that the form of a dialogue was assumed for convenience’ sake, and that it was not the dialogue of a real conference. According to Fabricius, Allatius also published in his work de Consensu (ac. De Ecclesia Occidentalis et Orientaliae perpetuus Consensione), p. 1158, a work of John which is described as Epistolae de Ritus immediatas in Sacra Communia. Other works of John are extant in MS. See Allatius, Graec. Ordozo, l. c.; Fabricius, Bibliocr. i, 648, 650.—Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. ii, 601.

John the Presbyter, a supposed disciple of Jesus, and instructor of Papias of Hierapolis, is said to have been a contemporary of the apostle John (with whom it is thought he has been confounded by early Church historians), and to have resided at Ephesus. For the assertion that there existed such a person, the testimony advanced is that of Papias (in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. iii, 39), who, in speaking of the personal efforts he put forth to establish himself in the Christian faith, says: “Whenever any one arrived who had had intercourse with the elders [τοὺς πρίγκιπας], I made inquiry concerning the declarations of these, what Andrew, John, Peter, Philip, or Thomas, or Matthew, or any other of the disciples of the Lord said, as also what Aristion and John the Presbyter, disciples of the Lord, say.” For I believed that I should not derive so much advantage from books as from living and speaking discourse.” Eusebius, in reporting this, takes special pains to report that Papias purposely adds the name John twice, first in connection with Peter, James, and Matthew, where only the apostle can be intended, and again along with Arias, where he distinguishes him by the title of “the Presbyter.” Eusebius further says: “This he confirms in the respect that he relates that there were two men in Asia Minor who bore that name, and had been closely connected with Christ, and then continues by showing that two tombs had been found in Ephesus bearing the name of John. Further proof is found in another part of his history (vii, 25), where he mentions a certain Papias, bishop of the city of Hierapolis, in the middle of the 3rd century, as uttering the same tradition concerning the finding of the two tombs at Ephesus inscribed with the name of John, and as ascribing to John the Presbyter the authorship of the Apocalypse, which Eusebius himself was inclined to do. The existence of a presbyter John is (2) declared in the Apostolical Constitutions (vii, 36), where it is said that the second John was bishop of Ephesus after John the Apostle, and that it was by the latter that he was instituted into office. Further testimony is obtained from Jerome (De Vir. l. c., 9), who says that the second and third epistles of John are the production of John the Presbyter, “cujus et hocie alterium apud Ephesum ostenditur, etsi nonnulli paean duas memorias ejusdem Johannis evangelicai esse.” In defence of the existence of such a person as the Presbyter John, see against the anonymous writers (Grotius, Beck, Fritzsch, Bretschneider, Creder, Erdard, and Steltz, Jahrb. deutsch. Theol. 1609, ii, 139 sq.) all of whom ascribe to him the authorship of the last two epistles of John, generally believed to be the production of John himself; and finally published by Allatius, with a Latin version, in his Simeon. The Latin version is also given in the Acta

John Phocas (Φόκας), a Cretan monk and priest, son of Mathias, who became a monk in Patmos, had served in the army of the emperor Manuel Comnenus (who reigned A.D. 1143-80) in Asia Minor, and afterwards visited (A.D. 1183) Syria and Palestine, is noted for a short geographical account which he wrote of those countries, entitled Εκθέσεις ιεροπόλεων ιών και Μαρτυρίους and χωρών Συρίας και Φοινίκης και τῶν κατὰ Παλαιστίνην τῆς Ἀραβίας, Compendiaria Descriptio Civitatum et Urbarum (sic in Alatt. vers. ob Urbe Antiochiae urbe Hierosolymis, nomon Syriac ex Phoenice, et in Palatinae Stirorum Locorum, which was transcribed by his son (for he was named Bonacides) by his last conclusions, and finally published by Allatius, with a Latin version, in his Simeon, i, 1-46. The Latin version is also given in the Acta whether another John existed in Asia Minor contemporary with John the Apostle would, of course, be of little import, but the fact that the apostolical authorship of some of the epistles and of the Apocalypse is doubted has called to critical inquiry most of the leading theological minds of our day. The result is that, while some maintain the identity of the apostle John, others consider him as a person clothed even with episcopal dignity (Dollinger, First Age of the Church, p. 113), others have denied altogether the probability of the existence of such a person contemporary with the apostle John (see Schaff, Church History, ii. 661, sqq.). Dr. W. de W. Smith, in his Dictionary of the Bible, adds, in reviewing the proofs of those who assert the existence of John and his authorship of some of the Johannine writings, that "in the way of this assumption stands the following: 1. The negative evidence arising from the silence of all other ancient authorities, especially the silence of Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, who, in a list of eminent teachers and bishops in Asia Minor, preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. v. 24), makes no mention of John the Presbyter; and, 2. The positive evidence afforded by the statement of Irenaeus, who not only omits all mention of the Presbyter, but says that Papia was the son of the presbyter John. For this reason it cannot be unsuitable, and could only have created confusion, to denote by this title another John, who lived with the apostle and under him in Ephesus. Credner supposes, indeed, that these two epistles came not from the apostle, but, like the Apocalypse, from the 'presbyter John' in question. The latter is evident even at first sight; the epistles are far more akin, even in their language, to the first epistle than to the Apocalypse (comp. 2 John 4-7 with 1 John ii, 7; iv, 2, 3; 2 John 9 with 1 John ii, 27; iii, 9, etc.). This is De Wette's reason for considering them genuine. When Credner supposes that the Presbyter John afterwards commemorated himself to the apostle's way of thinking and speaking, he makes an entirely arbitrary assumption which he himself condemns in pronouncing a like change in the apostle's "altogether unnatural and inadmissible" (p. 735). (3) The Ephesian bishop Polycrates, in the 2nd century, in his letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, on the Paschal controversy (in Euseb. v. 24), mentions but one John, though he there enumerates the μεγάλη αποστολή of the Asian Church, Philip, with his pious daughters, Polycarp, Thrasybes, Sagaris, Papirius, Mcito, most of whom were not so important to the Presbyter John may have been, in Credner, a personal disciple of the Lord, and the author of the Apocalypse. We can hardly think that in this connection, where it was his object to present as many authorities as possible for the Asiatic usage respecting the feast, Polycrates would have passed over this John if he had known anything about him; and if his tomb could have been really pointed out in Ephesus, as the later Dionysius and Jerome intimate. Jerome, however, in speaking of this, expressly observes, 'Nonnulli putant, duas memorias ejusdem Johannis evangelistiae esse' (De Vir. Ill. c. 9); which, again, makes this whole story doubtful, and destroys its character as a historical testimony in favor of this obscure presbyter."

Ridiculous, certainly, is the argument which some have advanced, that the different Johannine epistles differ so much in style that they cannot possibly be ascribed to one and the same person. Dr. F. Erdmann (Einleitungen, etc.) laid particular stress, but he is easily answered by Dr. Tholuck in his Glaubewürdigkeit der evangel. Geschichte, 2d ed. p. 283. From the rich treasury of his reading the latter draws such analogies as the "varietas dicitionis Appuleiana," the difference between the "Discours des Deux Freres" and the "Dialogus Domini et Iacobi," the "Logos" and the earlier dialogues of Plato; the sermons and the satires of Swift, etc. "This catalogue," says Dr. Schaff, "may easily be increased from the history of modern literature. Think, for example, of the immense distance between Schleiermacher's Bekenntnisse der Religion und des Weltgeistes and Hegel's Logik und Aesthetik; the first and second part of Goethe's Faust;"

John, Prester (Priest John), a supposed Christian king and priest of a medieval kingdom in the interior of Asia, the locality of which is vague and undefined. In the 13th and 14th centuries the missionary activities of the Syrian missionaries translated by analogy with their own language, converting Ung into "Jachanan" or "John," and rendering Khan by "priest." In their reports to the Christians of the West, accordingly, their royal convert figured as at once a priest and the sovereign of a rich and magnificent kingdom. Genghis Khan having thrown off his allegiance, a war ensued, which ended in the defeat and death of Ung Khan in 1292; but the tales of his piety and magnificence long survived, and not only furnished the material of numerous medieval legends (which may be read in Assemani's Bibliotheca Orientalis, iii, 280 sq.), but supplied the occasion of several of those missionary expeditions from Western Christendom to which we owe almost all our knowledge of medieval Eastern geography. The reports regarding Ung Khan, carried to Europe by two Arab missionaries in 1145 to Eugene III, created in Rome profound impression; and the letters addressed in his name, but drawn up by the Nestorian missionaries, to the pope, to the kings of France and Portugal, and to the Greek emperor, impressed all with a lively hope of the speedy extension of the Gospel in a region hitherto regarded as hopelessly lost to Christianity. They are printed in Assemani's Bibliotheca Orientalis. The earliest mention of Prester John is in the narrative of the Franciscan father John Carpini, who was sent by pope Innocent IV to the court of Bath Khan of Kiptchak, the grandson of Genghis Khan. Father Carpini supposed that Prester John's kingdom lay still further to the east, but he did not prosecute the search. This was reserved for a member of the same order, father Rubruquis, who was sent as a missionary into Tartary by St. Louis, and, having reached the camp of Bath Khan, was by him betrayed to Kiptchak and put to death. This is the story of the supposed Prester John. He failed, however, of his hope of finding such a personage, the Khagan of Karakorum, Mangh, being still an unbeliever; and his intercourse with the Nestorian missionaries whom he found established there satisfied him that the accounts were grievously exaggerated. His narrative, which is printed in Purchas's Collection, is one of the most interesting among those of medieval travellers. Under the same vague notion of the existence of a Christian prince and a Christian kingdom in the East, the Portuguese sought for traces of Prester John in their newly-acquired Indian territory in the 16th century. A similar notion prevailed as to the Christian kingdom of Abyssinia, which, in the hope of finding Prester John, was visited so late as the reign of John II of Portugal (1481-95) by Pedro Covilhão and Alfonso di Pava, the former of whom married and settled in the country. John Raithicus or Raithinus, i. e. of Raithus or Raitha (ra' or Paris'), seneschal or abbot of a monastery at Etampes, or the Seventy Springs, on the western coast of the peninsula of Mount Sinai, flourished in the 6th century. He is celebrated on account of the friendly relations he sustained and the influence he exerted over John the Scholar, or John Climacus. It was at the desire of Raithenus that Climacus wrote the work Kifayat or Scala Paradisi, from which he derives his name, and to which Raithenus wrote a Compendium and Scholion. The "Exegetick του αγιου λειτουργιου τοι Soultun, Liutere Jhonou Stromaten," addressed to Climacus, requesting him to undertake the work, and the answer of Climacus are given by Radares in the original Greek, with a Latin version, in his edition of the works of Climacus (Paris, 1633, fol.). This version of the Liitera of Raithenus, and a Latin version of his Commentarium and Scholion, are given in various editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum: the Liitere in vol. iii, edit. Paris, 1575; the Liitere and Commentarium, vol. v, edit. Paris, 1899 and 1864; the Liitere, Epistola, Commentarium, and Scholion, in vol. vi, pt. ii. ed. Cologne, 1815, in vol. x, ed. Lyons, 1677. John de la Rochelle, a French theologian, was born in the early part of the 13th century, probably in the city of La Rochelle. He joined the Franciscans, and studied under Alexander of Hales, whose ordinances he observed in 1298, and was ordained in 1298 in the cathedral of St. Brevin. He died at Paris in 1271, according to Luc Wadding. John de la Rochelle was a successful teacher, yet his works did not enjoy much renown, probably because he did not follow the mystical tendency of the times. Among his works we notice commentaries on a number of the books of the Bible; sermons, preserved in the MS. collections of divers libraries, chiefly in that of Troyes, France; De Anima, MSS. in the library of St. Victor; and he is also considered the author of some other works, but on doubtful grounds. He is especially deserving of notice as one of the first, if not the first, who attempted to explain Aristotle's Hippi Verum, a task of which he ably disposed. Thomas Aquinas probably availed himself of this work. See Cas. Oudin, De Script. Eccles.; Histoire lit. de la France, xix, 171: B. Hautef, De la Philosophie Socratique, i, 475; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 549. See John of Repussissa or Roquetaille, a French Franciscan, who flourished near the middle of the 14th century, at Auriverpe, is noted for his severe denunciations of the gross immorality of the clergy of the Roman Church in his day. He was especially opposed to the court at Avignon, and hesitated not to brand the papal court as the most great whoredom. Popes Clement VI and Innocent VI imprisoned him on account of his continued remonstrances and prophesying, but even while in prison he wrote much against the papal court and the clergy. He died while in prison, but the cause of his death is not known. His works of interest are, (1) Lademum in tribulatione (in Ed. Brown's addition to Ortus Aquae graciæ, rer. expectandae. et fugienda. London, 1609), wherein he handles the French clergy without gloves, and prophesies much trouble to their native land on account of their wicked life and contempt of the French. John of Salisbury, an eminent English pupil of Peter Abelard, was born at Salisbury (old Suryam) about 1110. He was first educated at Oxford, and in 1136 went to France, where he continued his studies under Abelard, and many other celebrated French divines of that age. About 1151 he returned to England, and was appointed chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury. On the death of the archbishop on a mission to pope Hadrian IV in 1156, he openly approached the latter on the abuses of the Church and of the papacy, though always an earnest advocate of the univ and liberty of the Church, and the independence of the episcopate from the secular princes. He was an intimate friend and admirer of Thomas à Becket, whose cause he espoused warmly, and whom he followed into exile returning only to England with him in 1176, and after the murder of Becket, a few months later, was called Becket's eye and arm. In 1176 he was appointed bishop of Chartres, and died about 1180. His works, which evince positive Realistic tendencies, and bear evidence of fruitful genius, sound understanding, and great erudition, are, Fislicticus s. de nagia curialium et testi- gusti philosophorum (Leiden, 1681); a celebrative treatise on the employment, duties, virtues, and vices of great men—a curious and valuable monument of the literature of John of Salisbury's time!—Metalogicia (Leyd. 1610, Amst. 1664), an exhibition of true and false science.—Enchilics de dogmate philosophorum (pub. by Chr. JOHN III. the patriarch, surnamed the SCHOLAR (1), was born at Sirimis, near Antioch, towards the middle of the 6th century. He became successively attorney, then presbyter of Antioch, and finally, in 565, patriarch of Constantinople under Justinian I. He died in 577. He prepared a large Collectio canoniwm under fifty headings, which became authoritative in the whole Greek Church. He is also considered as the author of a collection of ecclesiastical rules and regulations under the title Nomoacwos (both in Justulli, Biblioth. juris canon- svari. Paris. 1662, ii, 499, 669). He is also said to have delivered a dissertation on the doctrine of the Trinity which involved him in a controversy with the renowned so-called Tritheste John Philoponus (Phot. Cod. 75).

JOHN THE SCHOLAR (2) (JOHANNES SCHOLASTICUS or CLIMACUS), a monk of the latter half of the 6th century, was a zealot partisan of monastic life, and became abbot of a convent on Mount Sinai. He died there about 606. He wrote Kýmaios to pavadosin, an ascetic mystical work (Latin, Scala paradisii, Ambrosium, Venice, 1531, etc.), which was greatly celebrated and widely circulated among Greek monks for centuries af- ter his death (Leyd. 1529). He was, however, also official canonic writer (pub. by Matth. Rader, 1606). A collection of his works in Greek and Latin has been published by Matth. Rader (Paris, 1863).—Pierer. Univer. Lex. s. v.

JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA. See SCOTUS.

JOHN OF SCYTHERIOLI, a Greek ecclesiastical writer, who in all probability flourished in the latter part of the 5th century or the beginning of the 6th, wrote a work against the followers of Eutyches and Dioscorus, entitled Katar tov òn epistwrwv tis inxhporias. Contra deserteres ecclesias. It was divided into twelve parts, and was undertaken at the suggestion of a certain prelate, one Julianus, in reply to an anonymous Eutychian writer, who had published a book deceitfully entitled Katar Nostorwv, Adversus Nestorianum, and whom Pho- tius (Bibl. Cod. 95, 107) supposed to be Basilius, a pres-byter of Cilicia. This Basilius wrote a reply to John in very abusive style, charging him, among many other things, with being a Manichæan, and consisting of Lent to a period of three weeks, and not abstaining from flesh even in that shortened period. Certain Pagonia- siac, Scholias, to the works of the pseudo Dionysius Are- opagistis, which Ussher has observed to be mingled in the printed editions of Dionysius with the Schola of St. Victor, are supposed to be from the hand of this John. Anastasius Bibliothecarius, who was born in the 6th century, made a Latin translation of these mingled scholia, not now extant, in which he professed to distinguish those of Maximus from those of John by the mark of a cross. Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vii, 9; x, 707, 710) identifies the Scholias of John with those by him and the Commentarii in Dionysium Areopagiti cited by John Cyprianoeta as by Dionysius of Alexandria. See Ussher and Photius. He is supposed (και ἐκ τούτων, εἰσὶ καὶ προήγερα) a celebrated ec- clesiastic in the Eastern Church, being one of the deputa- tion sent by Saloacis, the twenty-seventh patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 460-482), shortly before his decease, to the emperor Zeno, to secure his leave for a election of the next patriarch from among the de- fenders of the Council of Chalcedon by the clergy and laity of Alexandria. "The emperor," says Neale (East. Church [Alexand.], ii, 18), "received the deputes gra- ciously, complied with their request, and in the letter which he gave them by way of reply spoke strongly in favor of John. After the return of the embassy John, see- thus Saloacis died, and John was unanimously elect- ed to succeed him, but was almost immediately expelled from his see by order of the emperor. The cause of his expulsion is differently stated. Liberatus says that he was expelled mainly through the jealousy of Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, to whom, on different oc- casions, he had failed in paying due attention. According to Evagrius, who quotes Zacharias as his authority, he was detected in having procured his own election by bribery, and had broken an oath which he had taken before Zeno not to seek for himself the see. But Neale thinks it doubtful whether John ever took such an oath, and holds that, even if he had, he can see no reason for the harshness with which he was treated, and for his ejection from the see, so long as it was freely proffered to him (which seems clear from the anonoimous inscription). The true expatriation seems to have been the delay of the announcement of his election to the patriarchate of Constantinople, sending the message by Illus, who was then in Antioch, instead of dispatching a mes- senger direct, as he had done in the case of Rome and Antioch, thereby provoking the patriarchate of Constanti- nople, also his selection of Illus for the messengers, when the latter was then the object of jealousy and suspicion to Zeno, if not actually in rebellion against him. John, expelled from Alexandria, first restored to Ilus, then to Antioch; and having, through Ilus's intervention, ob- tained from the patriarch of Antioch and his suffragans a synodical letter commending him to pope Simplicius, departed to Rome to plead his cause there in person. Simplicius, with the usual papal jealousy of the patri- archs of Constantinople, took the side of John; but uni- ted the exactions of Simplicius to that of his suc- cessor Felix, and did not retain the restoration of the banished patriarch, and John finally accepted from Felix the bishopric of Nola, in Campania, which he held several years, and at last died peaceably (the precise date of his death is not known). John (whom Theophanes ex- tens) for his piety and orthodoxy) wrote Προς Τιλιτον τον την Ρωμαιον Ακακιον, and, according to a tradition in which he anathematized Pelagianism, as well as its defenders Pelagius and Celestius, and their successor Ju- lianus. The work, which is noticed by Photius, is not extant. See Tillemont. Mem. vol. xvi. Cae. Hist. Lit. l. 144.—Smith. Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. ii, 602; Neale, Hist. East. Ch. [Alex.]. ii, 18 sq.

John, surnamed the TUTTUS, from his nationality, abbot of St. Victor, was a native of the diocese of Trèves. He studied at Paris, joined the canons regularly of St. Victor, and became their abbot in 1203. He was one of the ablutions of the glossatores (q. v.) on canon law, and appears to have exerted great influence in general over the ecclesiastical affairs of his time, and to have been in great favor both with the pope and with the king of France. He died at Paris Nov. 28, 1229. He left three sons and a daughter, among the MSS. of the Imperial Library at Paris. (Two Dominikan c monks of like name flourished in the latter half of the 13th and the first half of the 14th century.) See Césaire d'Heisterbach, Illustr. Mirac. et Histor. Memori, John, archbishop of Thessalonica, who flourished in the 7th century, is noted as a stout defender of the orthodox faith against the Monothelitians. He attended as papal legate the third Constantinopolitan (sixth ecumenical) Council (A.D. 680), and to that character he subscribed the Acts of the council (Concilii, vol. vi, col.

1038, ed. Labbe; vol. iii, col. 1425, ed. Hardouin; vol. xi, col. 639, ed. Mansi). The time of his death is altogether uncertain. He wrote (1) Εἰς τὰς μορφὰς τῶν ναυσικᾶς, in maliæs ferentes uestigia, a discourse or treatise in which he argues that there is no contradiction in the several accounts of the resurrection of Christ given by the four evangelists. This piece appears to have been regarded by some as a work of Chrysostom, and was first published (but from a mutilated and corr uptext) by Savile in his edition of Chrysostom (v. 740, Elm. 1610, fol.), though with an expression of doubt to its genuineness. It was subsequently printed more correctly in the Novum Auctarium of Combebi (vol. i, Paris, 1648, folio), and by him assigned to the right author. It is given in a mutilated form in Mont-laucun's edition of Chrysostom among the Spongiv, viii, 159 (Paris, 1718, fol.); or in viii, 1518 of the 20th reprint (Paris, 1839). It is also given in the Bibliotheca Patrimon of Gallandii, xiii, 185, etc. A Latin version is given in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xii (Lyons, 1677):
—(2) ὁδος, Ortatio, of which a considerable extract was read by Nicolaus, bishop of Cyzicus, at the second Nicene (seventh ecumenical) Council, and is published in the Concilia, vol. vii, col. 335, ed. Labbe; vol. iv, col.
292, ed. Hardouin; vol. xiii, col. 168, ed. Mansi; and by Gallandius in his Bibliotheca Patrum, xiii, 196. See John I, pope of Rome, a Tuscan by birth, ascended the papal throne Aug. 13, 523. About this time the bigoted Eastern emperor Justinus II had issued an edict against heretics of all denominations, commanding them to be put to death wherever found in his dominions; but as it was principally aimed against the detested Manicheans, all went well until, in 524, the emperor is sued another edict, this time against the Arians of Italy.

Their patron Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, was induced to interfere for them by Byzantium, and he des-parted in which lay for this purpose, armed by the orthodox pope John himself, who had thus to plead a cause for which he had no sympathy. The latter promised, in undertaking the mission, to procure the revocation of the edict, and in this he succeeded, but, failing to procure also the emperor's permission for all those who had forsaken Arianism unwillingly to return to their former faith, and Theodoric fearing that the whole work on the part of the pope was a piece of deception, and that the Romans, with the bishop at their head, instead of seeking relief from the intolerance of Greek orthodoxy, solicited aid against the Goths, imprisoned the pope on his arrival at Ravenna, where he died in the 18, 528. A Roman tradition reports, not without some complacency, that in Constantinople the emperor bowed down before the bishop of Rome, and that at high mass the seat of the latter, by his special request, was raised above that of the patriarch; seemingly, of course,a concession of superiority to the Roman see. John is numbered among the martyrs. Two letters are ascribed to him, addressed to others, but they are not now rejected. See Bower, Hist. of the Popes, ii, 312 sq; Riddle, Papastry, i, 199.

John II, pope, a Roman by birth, surnamed Mer-curius, succeeded Boniface II in the Roman see in 582, being elected by the clergy and the people of Rome after considerable agitation and many simoniacal practices and confirmed by king Athalaric, for which confirmation a certain payment was fixed by an edict of the same king. The emperor Justinian, in a letter addressed to him shortly after his accession, after earnest assurances of his endeavor to unite the Western and Eastern churches, makes full confession of superior power belonging to the Roman hierarchy, designating him as "the head of the holy Church." The only other important events in his life are his decision on the Trinity question in favor of Justinian (q. v.) [see ACCEPTEM], and in the case of the bishop of Riez (q. v.). He died in 582. See Bower, Hist. of the Popes, ii, 330 sq; Riddle, Papacy, i, 209.

John XIII, pope, a native of Rome, was elected to succeed Pelagius I in 560, and was confirmed by the exarch of Ravenna in the name of the emperor Justinian.
Like many of his predecessors, he used his powers mainly for the aggrandizement of the Roman see. He consequences, only noted the excommunication of the archbishop of Embrun and of Gap, who had been deposed by local councils for improper conduct. Though known to be guilty, he ordered their restoration, which Constantine, the Burgundian king, was only too happy to enforce in opposition to the French clergy. But the Gallican Church, which had wits very great hesitancy permitted the restoration of the guilty men, soon proved them to be unworthy of ecclesiastical office, and a new French council confirmed their previous deposition.
John died in 574. See Riddle, Papacy, i, 210; Bower, History of the Popes, ii, 334.

John IV, pope, a Dalmatian by birth, was consecrated Dec. 28, 640. He displayed great zeal in founding convents and endowing the churches of Rome.
He is noted especially for his strife against the Greek rival. The Monothelitism creed of the patriarch Sergius promulgated by the emperor Heraclius as istor, was denounced as a heresy, and condemned by the Roman symod A.D. 641. John IV defended Honorius from the charge made by the Eastern Church that he was guilty of the Monothelitism heresy, and Eutychius informs us that, before his death (Oct. 12, 642), the emperor Constans gave John IV the promise of withdrawing the této, but the controversy continued under his successors. See Bower, History of the Popes, iii, 24 sq: Hergoz, Real-Encyklop, vi, 764.

John V, pope, a native of Syria, elevated to the papal dignity in May or July, 685, hardly ever left the bed during the short time of his insignificant pontificate.
The authenticity of the letters assigned to him, and the fact that the "simplex papist" has been contested. He died Aug. 2, 686.

John VI and VII, Popes, both Greeks by birth, were quite insignificant occupants of the papal throne.
The former was consecrated October 10, 701, and buried January 10, 705. He was defended by Roman akarians against the exarch Theophylact, who was ordered to drive him from the apostolic see. In a council which he held at Rome he acquitted Wilfred, archbishop of York, of several charges brought against him by the English clergy. The latter (consecrated March 1, 704, buried Oct. 18, 707) is described as weak and spiritless.
The happiest illustration of the unimportance of the Roman see at this time is afforded us in the action of this pope, who did not dare to venture to express an opinion on the Trullan canon, submitted to his examination by the emperor Justinian II, for fear of giving offence to somebody; and we do not wonder that an able ecclesiastical writer of our day (Butler, in his Ch. History, i, 658) says that the whole period from Gregory I to Gregory II "may be briefly designated as that in which the popes were under subjectio to the emperors of the East and their lieutenants, the exarchs of Ravenna." See the Preface to Vol. II of the Popes, iii, 168 sqq., 167 sq.; Riddle, Popacy, i, 305 sq.

John VIII. Pope (styled the ninth by those who believed in the story of pope Joan [q. v.], whom they style John VII.), a native of Rome, succeeded Adrian II Dec. 16, 672. He displayed much tact, and harbored great respect, for the power of the Court, but the spirit displayed during his administration is in keeping with the ideas of the pseudo-Isidorean collection, to which his predecessor Nicholas I had first ventured to appeal. John's designs, however, found but a tardy response in the little minds with which he had to deal, and the prevalence of general anarchy was not more auspicious to their execution. The pope, as well as the clergy, in the strife after power, actuated only by worldly ambition, knew no other arms than cunning and intrigue, and with these they were neither able to control the only power on earth that could claim its disposal from the Carolingian monarchy, nor to erect on its ruins the fabric of ecclesiastical dominion. When Louis II died, 875, without an heir to his land and crown, Charles the Bald marched hastily into Italy, and took possession of the Italian dominions. Then he proceeded to Rome, Dec. 16, 877, at Turgovia, the chair of St. Peter, the imperial crown, to which he had no lawful claim. Some Church annalists claim that the two then entered into a compact by which the emperor ceded to the pope the absolute and independent government of Rome, a confirmation and amplification of Pepin's donation; an explanation very proper (and of an ambiguous kind) can be deduced only for the surrender of Capua (compare Mansi, Concil. xvii, 10). By this alliance not much was directly gained by either party, for Charles, having once secured his coronation, cares not little for the papal interests; yet eventually the manner in which Charles had become possessed of the empire and of Italy increased very materially the papal power, especially when, in a moment of fear for his throne, Charles the Bald suffered the pope to declare to him that he had intrusted the imperial diadem by the only power on earth that could claim its disposal from the vicar of Rome. The emperor, however, failed to protect the papal dominions from the attacks of the Saracens. It is true he at one time led an army against the infidels (877), but his sudden death cut off all further hope of relief, especially after Athanasius's (bishop-duke of Naples) double-handed game of pleasing the pope and forming alliances with the Saracens became known at Rome, and we do not wonder that the plundering of Campania and the exactations of John make Milman say of the pope's difficulties from this score that "the whole pontificate of John VIII was a long, if at times interrupted, agony; an oppression; every proof (and that of an ambiguous kind) can be deduced only for the surrender of Capua (compare Mansi, Concil. xvii, 10). By this alliance not much was directly gained by either party, for Charles, having once secured his coronation, cares not little for the papal interests; yet eventually the manner in which Charles had become possessed of the empire and of Italy increased very materially the papal power, especially when, in a moment of fear for his throne, Charles the Bald suffered the pope to declare to him that he had intrusted the imperial diadem by the only power on earth that could claim its disposal from the vicar of Rome. The emperor, however, failed to protect the papal dominions from the attacks of the Saracens. It is true he at one time led an army against the infidels (877), but his sudden death cut off all further hope of relief, especially after Athanasius's (bishop-duke of Naples) double-handed game of pleasing the pope and forming alliances with the Saracens became known at Rome, and we do not wonder that the plundering of Campania and the exactations of John make Milman say of the pope's difficulties from this score that "the whole pontificate of John VIII was a long, if at times interrupted, agony; an oppression; every proof (and that of an ambiguous kind) can be deduced only for the surrender of Capua." (Latin Christianity, iii, 84). Much more precarious became the condition of the Roman pontiff after the death of Charles the Bald, whose son and successor in the West Frank dominion, Louis the Hammer, engaged in warfare with the Normans, found himself not the papal vassal, nor the imperial candidate for the imperial crown, nor to afford assistance to the vicar of Christendom. The only one from whom the pope really received any assurances of succor was Car郟mn, who at this time, with an army in Upper Itaangelo, and just recognised as king at Pavia, was aiming at the imperial throne against the French line. But, finding the pope more favorably inclined toward the French, he suddenly departed, and left to his nobles the disposition of the pope's case. Lambert, duke of Spoleto, and Adelbert, count of Tuscany, immediately made themselves masters of Rome, and, after imprisoning the pope, compelled the clergy and the nobles to swear allegiance to Car郟mn. But no sooner had Rome been cleared of Car郟mn's friends than the pope himself set out for France, determined no longer to conceal his desire to create for himself an emperor whom all the world should recognise as absolutely indebted for the crown to the see of Rome only. Arrived in France, the pope made Provence his capital, and there he was received with enthusiasm. Everywhere he was received with respect, but especial deference was paid him by one Boso, duke of Lombardy, connected with the imperial house by marriage, possessed of great influence and wealth, and an aspirant for the imperial purple. He succeeded in winning the good graces of the Roman pontiff, and John was designated as the vacant throne (compare Mansi, xiii, 121). Boso was, however, only made king of Burgundy, as Charles the Fat proved too fast for the pope; he had marched with a preponderating force into Italy, and the pope, foreseeing that the prince would not be likely to wait the pontiff's decision as to the rights of the Carolingijans to the throne, hastened to meet him at Ravenna, and reluctantly (though contriving to avoid the appearance of constraint) placed the crown upon the head of Charles the Fat. But, if John failed in placing upon the throne his own favorite, he certainly succeeded in exalting the see of Rome in the eyes of the Car郟mn, the bald, the pope above the emperor. To this, as well as to his efforts to make the clergy independent of the temporal princes, may be ascribed his popularity as a pope, and the magnificent reception he enjoyed on his visit to France. "At the Council of Ravenna in May 877, and again at Cosenza, in the following year, during his stay in France, he pronounced several decrees, to the astonishment of the bishops themselves, claiming for them various rights and privileges which they had not themselves hitherto ventured to demand. This proceeding produced upon them a better impression of his character than anything he had long been desirous of advancing their social position. Never until now had they been made aware of the points at which they ought to aim in order to secure for themselves the highest rank and influence in the state, and the pontiff who gave them powerful assistance in this weighty affair could not fail to be highly popular among them. It was perhaps by this measure that John chiefly contributed to the strengthening of the papacy to such an extent that it remained without any considerable loss during a long succession of ungodly and even heretical popes, and only at last sank so low as to have been despised and disgraced through the troubles which shook Italy for more than half a century" (Riddle, Popacy, ii, 81, 92). The controversy with the Eastern Church on the question of ecclesiastical jurisdiction over Bulgaria was continued under John. At first he inclined to favor Photius (q. c.), and acknowledged him as patriarch of Constantinople, but he was afterwards obliged to excommunicate him, as the Latin party severely condemned his course. Foulkes (Christendom's Division, ii, p. vii) says that the fable of pope Joan must have originated with the Latin party of this time, and that it was aimed against John VIII. "not because his theology was defective, or his life immoral, or his rule arbitrary, but solely because he had had the courage, the manliness, to appreciate the abilities and desire to cultivate the friendship of the great patriarch his brother." But his excommunication of Photius was by no means the only one he pronounced, but so much as the pope was more prodigal of excommunication than John VIII. Of his letters, above 300 (found in Mansi, Concilii, vol. xvi), it is remarkable how large a proportion threaten, inflict, or at least allude to this last exercise of sacerdotal power (Mans. Lat. Christianity, iii, 92 sqq.). John found his death, stultus et armatos, a molia Amuleos de Vigoletis, Cyprius, attributed to a conspiracy of his own curia. The assassins first tried poison; when this did not operate quick enough, they slew him with a hammer, Dec. 15, 882. See Milman, Lat. Christ., bk. v, ch. iii; Bower, History of the Popes, v. 36 sqq.; Riddle, Popacy, ii, 27 sqq.; Reichel, Rom. See in the Middle Ages, p. 169 sq.; Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. ii, 347; Gieseler, Gesch. der deutschen Kirchezeit, i, 188 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop., vi, 754; Muratori, Script. ii, pt. ii, ii. (J. H. W.)

John IX, Pope, a Benedictine of Tivoli, was con corated to the pontifical office June, 898. He held two councils, one at St. Peter's, where the wrong done to his badly-abused predecessor Formosus was redressed; the other at Ravenna, which passed an act for the better protection of the Church against thieves and in cendiaries. John displayed an honest zeal in defending the rights and regulating the discipline of the Church.
His rival for the papal throne, Sergius (q. v.), he suc cessfully combated, and, by authority of a council he called, excommunicated him with several other ec celesiastical accessories. John died July, 906. On his life, see Muratori, vol. iii, pt. ii; on the synods, Mansi, vol. xviii. See also Milman, Latin Christianity, iii, 112 sq.; Bower, History of the Popes, vii, 77 sq.

John X, Pope, according to Liutprand (discredited by Milman, Latin Christianity, iii, 163), owed his pro motion in ecclesiastical offices to the dissolute Theodore (q. v.), which attracted by his handsome figure, made him successively archbishop of Bologna, Ravenna, and finally pope (May 15, 914). The profligacy of his times, especially in Rome, surpassed that of the most degener eate period of paganism. The popes were merely the companions in revelry of the Roman nobility. But, if the archbishop of Ravenna was not a fit example of pi ety or holiness to be selected for the spiritual head of Christendom, "he appears," says Milman (Latin Chris tianity, iii, 161), "to have been highly qualified for the secular part of his office." He was a man of ability and daring, eminently fitted for this juncture to save Rome from becoming the prey of Mohammedan conquest.
The Saracens from Africa, who had landed in Italy and fortified themselves near the banks of the Liris, had made frequent irruptions into the Roman territory. At first John contented himself with inviting the neigh boring dukes to come to his defence; but, finding the aid of the two emperors necessary to combat successfully the Mohammedans, he crowned Berenger emperor of the West, March 24, 916, and, after having united all forces previously at his command with Berenger and the dukes of Benevento and Naples, he marched in person against them, and completely routed and exterminated them. After a reign of fourteen years, this powerful prelate of Rome came to a miserable end by the legiti mate consequences of the same vices that had been in strumental in raising him to his high dignity. Maro zia, the wife of Theodore, attempted to secure for herself and her lover the government of Rome, and find ing John too much in their way, surprised him in the Lateran palace, and thrust him into a prison, where, some months after, he died, either of want or by some more summary means (A.D. 929). Comp. Bower, Hist of the Popes, vii, 90 sq.; H. de deut. Pütten, i, 163; Milman, Lat. Christ. iii, 158 sq. (J. H. W.)

John XI, Pope, a natural son of Marozia, and, in all probability, of pope Sergius III, was seated on St. Pe ter's chair by his mother, in whose hands rested at this time (931) the power to supply any vacancies in the papal chair. Of course spiritual government was by such people not in consideration; in fact, Rome was now by all Christendom detested as a pestiferous swamp.
"Marozia, not content with having been the wife of a marquis, the wife of a wealthy and powerful duke of Tuscany, perhaps the mistress of one, certainly the mother of another pope, looked still higher in her lucrative title, and must wed the emperor of a king of Italy her hand was offered, and by him accepted.
But, if the Romans had brokered the rule of a Roman woman, they would not so readily consent for her par mour, a foreigner, to rule over them, and, headed by Marozia's own son, Alberic, the nobles put an end to the government of Marozia (and Hugh of Provence) and of John XI by expelling the former and imprisoning the latter, who died of poison, as is generally supposed in January, 936. See Milman, Lat. Christ. iii, 163 sq.; Du Cheyne, Hist. des Papes, ii, 460; Aachbach, Kirchen Lez. i, 518; Bower, Hist. of the Popes, v, 96 sq.

John XII, Pope, a son of Alberic, and grandson of the profligate and ambitious Marozia, whose wiles he had seen used with such success, succeeded to the dignity of Roman patron upon the death of his father Alberic, and in November, 955, after the death of Agapetus, was elevated to the papal see, though only about sixteen years old. His own name was Octavianus, but as pope he took that of John XII, thus inaugurating a memory since been followed by the popes of assuming a pontifical name. Ambitious to exceed the boundaries of the States of the Church, he soon involved himself in a disastrous war with Berenger II, himself full of ambition, and anxious to become master of Rome. In this most extreme hour of the pope hesitated not to beseech help from one whom he had formerly declined to receive as worthy of the imperial crown, the emperor Otto I. Daring and in omitable as was the spirit of Otto I, he was no sooner asked by Rome than we find him crossing the Alps with the son of Berenger, having entered into the pope not only personal safety, but also confirmed his title to the States of the Church. The extent of these promises, however, has been subject to contro versy, and it is not without a reason that the Vatican record, by which Pepin's donation was confirmed and unlimited, was attacked from critical scrutiny. See Pa pacy. At Pavia, already, Otto had been crowned king of Italy, here, at the Eternal City, he received from the pope himself the imperial diadem. "Never did a more important event in history take place, making less im portant to those who witnessed it, and less important certified by subsequent historians, than the coronation of Otto I at Rome in the year 962. By the coronation of Charles 162 years earlier the first foundations had been laid for the empire; by the coronation of Otto that empire itself was founded fresh, and from that time for wards it had an uninterrupted existence." (Welsh, Pe man See in the Middle Ages, p. 124.) For a short period the spiritual and temporal heads of Christendom seemed to be happily united, but the fickle John, influenced by either mistrust or jealousy, again interrupted that happy concord by concealing anew intrigues with Alberic, the son of Berenger. Rumors of un suitable conduct of John reached the ears of Otto I, but the noble German would hardly believe the reports until some trustworthy officers whom he had hastily des dpatched to Italy pronounced them true. The profligacy and vices of the pope were also reported to Otto I, and the latter determined to return to Rome and depose the vicar, if found guilty of the charges preferred against him. A council composed of the first ecclesiastics of Germany, France, and Italy was quickly called by Otto I, he himself presiding, and the vicar of Christ, accused of the crimes of murder, adultery, and perjury, was sum moned to appear in defence. Failing to comply with the emperor's request, judgment was pronounced, and he was deposed and excommunicated Dec. 4, 963, and Leo VIII (q. v.) declared his successor. Hardly had the emperor left Rome when John, supported by the roman nobility, returned to the pontificate as Peter's, and caused it to rescind the resolutions of the for mer one. Otto I, informed of these outrages, was per paring for a return to Rome for the third time, when John suddenly died of apoplexy while he was engaged in an adulterous intrigue, May 14, 964. "It was a brute, a man of most licentious habits, associating as he did to Peter's, and caused it to rescind the resolutions of the former one. Otto I, informed of these outrages, was preparing for a return to Rome for the third time, when John suddenly died of apoplexy while he was engaged in an adulterous intrigue, May 14, 964. "It was a brute, a man of most licentious habits, associating as he did with women of every station, and filling the Lateran with the noisy profanity of a brothel." Panvinius, in a note to Plinius's account of pope Joan, suggests that the licentiousness of John XII, who, among his numerous mistresses, had one called Joan, who exercised the chief influence at Rome during his pontificate, may have given rise to the story of "pope Joan." Comp. Luitprand, Historia Ottoniana, in Monum. Germ. Script. vol. iii; Milman, Lat.
Christ. iii, 175 sq.; Neander, Ch. History; Gieseler, Ch.
Hist. ii, 380; Reichel, See of Rome in the Middle Ages, p. 32; Riddle, The Rise of the Papacy, bill 69 sq.; John XIII., Pope, who was made such A.D. 965, was of noble descent, and held, previous to his election, the bishopric of Narbona. Provoking the wrath of the Roman nobility on account of his severity, and being a favorite of the imperial party, they instigated a riot against him, and finally secured him as prisoner. The pope, however, effected his escape, and returned to the City about a year after, when the emperor himself made his appearance, visiting the disorderly factions of the city with unsmiting severity. After the appointment of a prefect as representative of the imperial power, Otho the Great went to Ravenna, followed by the pope. Here a great and influential council was held, Easter 967, and fresh guarantee offered to the pontifical church on all the territory to which it had ever been entitled, including Ravenna. In return for these favors, John crowned the younger Otho (afterwards Otho II) as emperor, a name which he might have hoped for the sake of his wife Theophania, the daughter of the Greek emperor. He also evinced his gratefulness by establishing, at the emperor's expressed desire, a mission among the north-east-erian Slavonians. John died in 972. The few letters are found in Mansi, Concil. Suppl. i, 1148, and Harduin, Cod. Dipl. R. ii, 630. See Pagl, Rer. Pontif. R. ii, 283 sq.; Aschbach, Kirchen-Lex. iii, 520; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vi. 757.

John XIV., Pope, who was, previous to his elevation, Peter, bishop of Pavia, and arch chancellor of the emperor, was elected pope through the influence of Otho II in November or December, 986, in place of Boniface VIII. Unfortunately, he also married, which the pope died at Rome December 7 of the same year, and the e-pope, encouraged by the anti-empirical party, ventured to return the following spring (April 984) from Constantinople, whither he had fled, and proving sufficiently strong to convince John, his person was secured, and he was imprisoned in the Castle del Angelo, where he was either poisoned or starved to death. See Aschbach, Kirchen-Lexikon, iii, 520.

John XV., Pope, who began his inglorious reign in September 988, was in reality only the puppet of Crescenstius, the true governor of Rome, for he presided and ruled at the Castle del Angelo, and the patricians. At one John fled to Tuscany, but at the intervention of Otho III he was afterwards permitted to return and live in the Lateran, but he remained destitute of all authority. By way of compensation for his lack of power, he enriched himself and his relatives with the revenues of the Church. Concerning the dispute about the bishopric of Rheims, see Sylvester II. He died in April 996.

Some believe that another John, son of the Roman Rupertus, was the fifteenth pontiff under the name of John, and that the present John was the sixteenth pope of that name, holding the see four months af after the murder of Boniface VIII; but this is a very dubious statement, and is wholly denied by modern critics.

John XVI. or XVII., Pope, a native of Greece, a Catalanian and bishop of Piacenza, was appointed in 997 by Crescentius, in opposition to Gregory V; but when Otho III, in February, 998, brought Gregory V back to Rome, he imprisoned, mutilated, and ill treated John most shamefully, and put to death Crescentius and his partisans. See Gregory V. Though a rival pope, and in office only ten months, John is generally numbered in the series of the popes.

John XVIII. or XVII., Pope, succeeded Sylvester II in 1008, and died four months after his election.

ple of Rome, to the effect that the pope should reside at Rome, and, if absent more than three months, should be considered as deposed. These measures, however, were defeated. In 1803, the German and the Guelphic predominance at Rome was restored, the papal representative resuming his authority. But John XXII never personally visited Rome, having died at Avignon in 1354, when he had accumulated in his coffers the enormous sum of 18,000,000 florins of gold. John is renowned in theological history as the author of a portion of the canon law called the Extra-ambagantes, and also for the singular opinion he entertained that the just will not be admitted to the beatific vision until after the general resurrection. This opinion he was obliged formally to retract before his death (see Reichel, Romus Sec., p. 325). The writings of the Council of Pavia (a.v.), under his pontificate the clergy and people of the towns were deprived of the right of electing their bishops, which right he reserved to himself on payment of certain fees by the persons elected. He was especially rapacious in the collection of the Annates, or First Fruits. See Bower, History of the Popes, vi, 419 sq. Lebbe, xxv, 147; English Cyclopedia, s. v.

John XXIII, Pope, a native of Naples, and previously to his election known as cardinal Cossa, succeeded Alexander V in 1410. A man of great talents, but worthless in character, his reputation as cardinal under his predecessor is by no means enviable. Indeed, he is accused of being one of the most scandalous of popes (Cyclopedia, vii, 211). A witless pontiff, he supported the claims of Louis of Anjou against Ladislaus, king of Naples; but Ladislaus, having defeated his rival in battle, advanced to Rome, and obliged John to flee to Florence. He then preached a crusade against Ladislaus, which gave occasion to denunciation of the pope by Gregory XI, after the great schism continued, and Gregory, styled XII, and Benedict, antipopes, divided with John the homage of the Christian states. In his exile, wishing to secure the favor of the emperor, he proposed to Sigismund the convocation of a general council to restore peace to the Church, and Sigismund fixed on the city of Constance as the place of assembly. On hearing of the death of Ladislaus, by which event Rome became again open to him, John repented of what he had proposed, but was obliged to comply with the general wish by repairing to Constance. By this council (see vol. ii, p. 480) John was forced to drop the papal tiara; but, soon after, by the assistance of Frederick of Austria, he resumed his authority by ordering the council to dissolve. This provoked the question whether the pope is the supreme authority in the Church, and the fourth and fifth sessions, at Constance. With the general Council of Constance, John, now again Balthazar Cossa, escaped from Germany, and made his submission to the new pope, who treated him kindly, and gave him the first rank among the cardinals. He died soon after, Nov. 22, 1415, at Florentine, within the name of John, which most of those who bore it disgraced, either by debauchery, heresy, or other crimes, has since been avoided by the occupants of the chair of St. Peter. John (Sr.), Christians of. See SABIAN.

John's (Sr.) Day, a festival to commemorate the nativity of John the Baptist. It was observed as early as the 4th century. The birth of John is known to have preceded that of Jesus Christ significantly by six months. June 24 is therefore the day fixed upon for this festival. Augustine had commented upon the peculiarity of observing his birthday rather than his martyrdom, and the Church of Rome seems to have acted on this suggestion, for it set aside also a day, namely, August 29, in commemoration of his beheading; but both his birth and martyrdom are celebrated writings the same venerable service of the Church of England, the chief passages relating to his life and death being included in the lessons. See below, John's, Eve of St.

John's, Eve of St., one of the most joyous festivals of Christendom during the Middle Ages, was celebrated in many countries with great pomp and festivity. It is presumed that the observance of it at first was only local. The Council of Lyons, A.D. 1240, ordered that it should be perpetually and universally celebrated.

Johns, Richard, a celebrated member of the Society of "Friends," was born at Bristol, England, in 1645, and, coming to this country in early manhood, settled in Maryland. He was won over to the Quakers by George Fox, and preached for many years. He died Oct. 16, 1717. For further details, see Janney, Hist. of Friends, i, 190.

Johns, W. G., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Pulaski County, Ky., October 24, 1828, joined the Church at thirteen years of age, was licensed to preach in 1845, and continued in the work for twenty-one years, with interruptions for war of health. Indeed, it is said that so great was his devotion to the Christian ministry that he often preached when barely able to leave his room. He died October 23, 1866. — Conf. Min. Meth. Episc. Church South, iii, 157.

Johnson, Albert Osborne, an American missionary of the Presbyterian Church to India, was born in Cadiz, Ohio, June 22, 1833. He was educated at Jefferson College, Pa., where he was converted, and, on graduation (1852), went to the Theological Seminary at Alleghany, where he graduated in 1855, and was ordained by the presbytery of Ohio June 12, in the same year. He at once entered the missionary work, which was shared by his wife, whom he had married the day he left the Theological Seminary. He long endured the toils of a missionary life; during the Sepoy rebellion in 1857 they suffered martyrdom by the hands of the Indian rebels. For details, see Walsh, Memorial of the Fuggthorl Mission and her Martyred Missionaries (Philadelphia, 1859, 12mo), p. 241 sq. Mr. Johnson is spoken of by Walsh as "a man of very great influence and of fine social qualities. As a Christian he was zealous and devoted, a man of prayer, and faithful in all his duties; as a missionary he bade fair to excel in every department of labor. His qualifications were of a high order."

Johnson, Enoch, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in North Carolina; he was early converted; joined the Itinerancy in 1819, and died November 25, 1824. He was a man of deep piety and useful talents. His labors were abundantly successful, and his character greatly beloved. — Minutes of Conferences, i, 492.

Johnson, Evan M., D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Rhode Island, June 10, 1792. He was ordained to the ministry in the Trinity Church, Newport, by bishop Cопwood, July 4, 1818; removed to New York City in 1814, and became assistant rector of Grace Church, but the year following he exchanged this position for the rectory of St. James' Church, Newtown, L. I. In 1824 he settled in Brooklyn, and built St. John's Church. During his ministry he united nearly 4000 couples in marriage, and baptized nearly 10,000 children. He was, at the time of his decease, March 19, 1865, the oldest settled Episcopal clergyman in the State of New York.

Johnson, Haynes, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Newbury, Vermont, in 1801; converted in 1829; entered the New Hampshire Conference in 1831, and died at Newbury, April 5, 1866. He was "a faithful and laborious teacher," and in the last month of his life he made his death nine hundred pastoral visits. He was very successful in winning souls to Christ. — Minutes of Conferences, vi, 75.

Johnson, Herman Merrill, S.T.D., L.L.D., a prominent minister and educator of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Oswego County, N. Y., Nov. 25, 1816. Early on account of its numerical importance, he entered, in 1837, the junior class of Wesleyan University, graduating with distinction in 1839. The same year he was elected professor of ancient languages in St. Charles's College, Missouri, where he remained for three years. Thence he was called to occupy the chair of ancient languages in St. Louis, Missouri; but he held for two years, when he was elected professor of ancient languages and literature in the Ohio Wesleyan University at Delaware, Ohio. Here he performed for a while the duties of acting president of the institution, organizing its curriculum, and was especially interested in introducing the Bible into the method of ministerial education. In 1850 he was elected professor of philosophy and English literature in Dickinson College, a position which he filled for ten years, when he was called to the presidency of this institution, together with the chair of moral science, in 1860. Dr. Johnson died April 5, 1868. Several memorial resolutions in behalf of the Methodist centenary had secured to Dickinson College a fair endowment. He contributed largely to the Church periodicals, especially the New York Christian Advocate and the Methodist Quarterly Review. Indeed, he was decided ally both as a writer and an instructor, and his contributions were always written with uncommon interest; for, as a thinker, he was clear, concise, original, and his writings were often eminently distinguished for their simplicity and grace of expression. He had an especial liking for all questions of historical and philological inquiry, and published a learned edition of the City of Herodotus (N. Y., 1842, and often). He left unfinished another large and valuable philological contribution, the translation and revision of Eberhard's great Synonymical Dictionary of German, French, Italian, Spanish, and English. It is especially to be regretted that he did not live to complete it. He made a valuable translation of The historical Books of the Old Test. "Personally, Dr. Johnson was a man of many and rare excellencies. He was pre-eminently a scholar, extensively learned, and yet distinguished for culture rather than for mere learning. He was especially eminent as a teacher, and as an administrator and disciplinarian he had few superiors. In private he was a model Christian gentleman, affable, refined, and unassuming; able and entertaining in conversation, and as a companion gentle, without descending to any thing out of harmony with his elevated character and position. As a preacher he was both forcible and instructive, though too rigidly correct in his teaching to allow him to become extensively popular. In his relations to the Church he belonged to an important but very small class. His Christian character, his learning, and his confessed abilities fitted him for almost any one of the highest and most responsible offices in the Church. Such was the Church he occupied, while others of equal dignity and importance were ready to be offered to him" (Christian Advocate, N. Y., April 16, 1868). (J. H. W.)

Johnson, John (1), an eminent and learned divine of the Church of England, was born Dec. 30, 1662. He was educated at King's School, in the city of Canterbury, and at St. Mary Magdalen College, Cambridge. Soon after he graduated he was twice married: he was priest of Palace of West and dean of Canterbury to a scholarship in Corpus Christi College, and there took the degree of master of arts in 1685. Shortly after he entered into deacon's orders, and became curate to Thomas Hardress, at Hardres, near Canterbury. In 1686 he became vicar of Boughton under the Bless, and in 1687 he held the vicarage of Hernhill, adjoining to Boughton. In 1697 he obtained the living of St. John, in the Isle of Thanet, which he shortly after exchanged for that of Appledon, and in 1707 he was inducted to the vicarage of Cranbrook. He died in 1725. His works display the highest scholars, a mastery both of the Greek and Hebrew languages, and a deep research into the Holy Scriptures. His Unbloody Sacrifice (London, 1714, 8vo; latest ed., Oxon, 1847, 2 vols. 8vo) is the most complete work on the Eucharist, considered as a sacrifice, extant, particularly in its large collection of extracts from the fathers, which are printed in full. These are cited to prove that the Eucharist is a proper material sacrifice; that it is both eucharistic and propitiatory; that it is to be offered by proper officers; that the oblation is to be made on a proper altar; that it is to be consumed by the congregation; that it cannot be proved that what our Saviour speaks concerning eating his flesh and drinking his blood in the 6th chapter of St. John's Gospel is principally meant of the Eucharist. This publication, having involved him in a bitter controversy on account of its High-Church views, induced him to publish, in 1717, The Doctrine, the Sacrament, and All that We Need and Supported, part ii, showing the agreement and disagreement of the Eucharist with the sacrifices of the ancients, and the excellency of the former; the great importance of the Eucharist both as a feast and a sacrifice; the necessity of frequent communion; the respect of the people at the Eucharist; the nature of excommunication; the primitive method of preparation, with devotions for the altar. His other works are, A Collection of all Ecclesiastical Laws, etc., concerning the Government, etc., of the Church of England (Lond. 1720, 2 vols. 8vo; Ox ford, 1850-51, 2 vols. 8vo).—A Collection of Discourses, etc. (Lond. 1728, 2 vols. 8vo).—The Pastor, or Holy David and his Old English Translators cleared (London, 1707, 8vo). Johnson, John (2), an able and popular minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, born in Lounsbury Co., Va., July 7, 1873; joined the Church in 1897, and entered the Conference at Liberty Hill, Tennessee, in 1898. Two years after he removed to Kentucky, and was appointed to the Sandy River Circuit, and in 1881 to Natchez Circuit. His early educational advantages had been limited, but since he entered the ministry of his Church he can hardly be said to have possessed a fair English education; but unremitting efforts to gain knowledge at last made him one of the best scholars of his Conference. Thus, while at the Natchez Circuit, he displayed an extensive knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew, of which no one had ever before had an idea, and from that time he began to rise rapidly in the estimation of his colleagues. He now took rank with Lakin, Sale, Page, Blackman, and Oglesby, and was regarded by many as the most remarkable preacher of the West. In 1812 he was appointed to the Nashville Circuit; then successively to the Livingston, Christian, and Goose Creek, and finally again to the Livingston Circuit; and in 1818 he was sent to the Nashville Station. While he here engaged in a controversy on the question of immortality with the Baptist preacher Varden, in which he is generally believed to have come off victor; at least from this event dates his great popularity in the West. "Henceforth," says Redford (Methodism in Kentucky, ii, 143), "the name of John Johnson was the synonym of success in religious controversies." From 1820 to 1828, successively the Red River, Hopkinsville, and Russellville Circuits, and in 1828 stationed at Louisville, and in 1829 at Maysville, and, after several years of rest, was in 1831 appointed presiding elder of the Green River, and in 1832 of Hopkinsville District. In 1836 he was finally located, and he now removed to Mt. Vernon, Illinois. Here he died April 9, 1838. "As a Christian," says the Western Christian Advocate (May 26, 1838), "brother Johnson was consistent, exemplary, and deeply devoted. 'Holiness to the Lord' appears to have been his motto. He died in great peace, testifying, as his flesh and heart failed, that God was the author of his heart and his portion forever." (J.H.W.)

Johnson, John, Barent, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in 1769 in Brooklin j. I.; graduated at Columbia College, 1792; studied theology under Dr. John H. Livingston, and entered the ministry in 1795. He was co-pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church, Albany, with Rev. Dr. John Bassett, from 1796 to 1799, and afterwards pastor of the church in Brooklin, 1802-3. Of presiding presence and engaging manners, he won many friends by his dignified and courteous bearing. He was popular with all classes, especially with the young. As a preacher he was distinguished for a melodious voice, a natural manner, and effective oratory. His oration on General Washington "produced a great sensation throughout the community. The oration was spoken of at the time as a rare specimen of eloquence; and the whole performance was spoken of as a very high order." It was published by the Legislature, at whose request it was delivered. He also published several other discourses, and contributed largely to literary periodicals of his day. In person he was tall, slender, well proportioned, and graceful. His imagination was brilliant and his fervor profound. His intellects to qualities and theological and literary attainments were eminent. He wrote his sermons, but delivered them extemporaneously, with great simplicity, directness, and unctu. He died of consumption, Aug. 29, 1803. Of his three children, two became Episcopalian clergymen: one at Jamaica, L. I.; the other a professor in the General Theological Seminary at New York. —Rogers, Historical Discourse (Albany, 1856); Sprague, Annals, ix, 167. (W. J. H. T.)

Johnson, Joseph, an Indian preacher, was born at Mohogan, near Norwich, Conn., about 1750. After a brief course of instruction under Mr. Wheelock at Lebanon, he was sent, at the age of fifteen, as a school-master to the Indians in New York, with whom he remained there a couple of years. Afterwards he spent a vagrant life for some time, until, during a fit of sickness occasioned by his irregularities, he became a sincere penitent, and determined to preach the Gospel of Christ. He was soon licensed to preach, and for several years was employed in the State of New York. He was well acquainted with theology. The date of his death is not known to us.

Johnson, Samuel (1), an English divine, and a learned but violent writer against popery in the reign of James II., was born in Warwickshire in 1649. He studied at St. Paul's School and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained the living of a college chaplain. He went to Essex, but continued to reside in London, and mingled much in politics. He was a friend of Essex, and chaplain to Lord William Russell, and advocated the succession of the duke of York. He was a decided opponent of king James II and of his schemes to introduce popery as the religion of the state, and attacked Dr. Hickey (p. v.), the upholster of passive obedience, in a pamphlet entitled Julianus the Apostate. He would have gone further had not the death of his protector, lord Russell, obliged him to become more prudent, and to keep his Juliae et Vivae Christianae Monarchiae, which he published for having written the former work he was summoned before judge Jeffries, and of course condemned to a heavy fine. Unable to pay the fine, he was imprisoned, and during his confinement wrote An humble and hearty Address to all Protestants in the present Army, intended to provoke a rebellion against king James II. He was now put in the pillory in Palace Yard, at Charing Cross, whipped, and fined, after being degraded from orders. After the Revolution of 1688, William III. caused the verdict to be reversed, and gave him an indemnity. He died in 1708. His writings were collected and published under the title Works (3d ed. London, 1713, 3 vol.) See Biographia Britannica; Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Gen. xxvi, 791; Debarby, Hist. Ch. of Engl. from James II. to 1717, p. 70; Allibone, Dict. Engl. and Amer. Authors. i. 971. (E. de F.)

Johnson, Samuel (2), D.D., an American divine, was born at Guilford, Conn., Oct. 14, 1836, and passed A.B. in 1741 at Yale College, then situated at New Haven. On the removal of Yale to New Haven he became one of its tutors, and in 1720 pastor of the Congregational Church, West Haven. Determined to change his ecclesiastical relations, he went to England, and received episcopal ordination in 1723. He then visited Oxford and Cambridge, where he was made acquainted with America. Upon his arrival he entered on the mission of Stratford, Conn., and formed the acquaintance of William Burnet, son of the bishop of Salisbury. His ministerial duties were now considerably increased, and his pen warmly engaged for some years in defence of episcopacy. But in 1743 he was made D.B. by the University of Oxford. In 1744 he was appointed president of King's College, New York, in which office he continued till 1754, when he returned to Stratford, where he spent a tranquil and dignified old age, chiefly in literary labor. In 1746 he issued A System of Morality, and in 1747, A Dictionary of the English Language, and other theological and miscellaneous treatises after this date. He died Jan. 6, 1772.—Sprague, Am. Annals, v., 52; Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Am. Auth., ii, 971. (E. de F.)

Johnson, Samuel (3), LL.D., one of the most distinguished literary ministers of the eighteenth century, was born at Stratford, near London, on Dec. 13, 1709. His education was acquired in his native town. In 1728 he was entered at Pembroke College, Oxford, but, in consequence of the want of means, did not remain long enough to obtain his degree. In 1731 his father died insolvent. In the same year he went to Bosworth as usher of a school. He conformed to the independency of mind, the drudgery of teaching, and preferred to support himself by working for booksellers in Birmingham. In 1736 he married Mrs. Porter, the widow of a mercer, who brought him £800. Failing in an effort to establish an academy, he repaired in 1737 to London to accompany his colleague, the Rev. Mr. David Garrick. He devoted himself entirely to literary labor. His first production which attracted notice was his London, a poem in imitation of the third satire of Juvenal. Having entered into an engagement with the Gentleman's Magazine, he became active in the parliamentary debates, which, being then a breach of privilege, came out under the fiction of Arguments in the Senate of Lilliput. These obtained great celebrity on account of their extraordinary eloquence, and were almost exclusively the product of his own invention. The works which were now produced were crowded with new cold fancy, and should be regarded as extraordinary monuments both of vigor and originality in thinking, and of great though ponderous power of expression.

But Dr. Johnson had excellencies far superior to mere literary accomplishments. He was truly a devout man, and he possessed an independence of mind which enabled him to scorn the ridicule and silence the opposition of wits and worldlings to serious religion. He often recurred in after life to the impression made upon his tender imagination by his mother's example and instruction. While a student at Oxford these impressions were preserved and intensified according to his own account, by the careful study of Law's Serious Call, in consequence of which he was incited to a devout and holy life. Serious and pious meditations and resolutions had been early familiar to his mind. The pious gratitude with which he acknowledged mercies upon every occasion, the humble submission which he breathes when it is the will of his heavenly Father to try him with affliction, show how seriously the mind of Johnson had been impressed with a sense of religion.

Dr. Johnson is generally charged with extreme bigotry, and want of charity towards religionists who differed from him. This charge, however, is very unfair in the face of his repeated declaration to the contrary. "All denominations of Christians," he is reported to have said, "have really little difference in point of doctrine, though they may differ widely in external forms." "What would we ourselves be," he said in 1750 concerning Methodists, "if Protestant, agree in the essential articles, and that their differences are trivial, and rather political than religious." He spoke in the highest terms of Wesley from intimate knowledge of his character, having been at the same college with him, and said that "he thought of religion only." "What would we be," he said, "if we ourselves were Methodists teachers," he said, "he could scarcely doubt the sincerity of that man, who travelled 900 miles in a month, and preached twelve times in a week; for no adequate reward, merely temporal, could be given for such indefatigable labor. The established clergy in general did not preach plain enough; polished periods and glittering transitions were the effect. They always used the Latin style and novelty, and even in religion itself courted new appearances and modifications." His views on the great subjects of original sin, in consequence of the fall of man, and of the atonement made by our Saviour, as reported by his celebrated biographer, were decided and evangelical; the adherence to the orthodox tenets of the church, and the independence of mind of his religious views were equally explicit. In short, it appears that few men have ever lived in whose thoughts religion had a larger or more practical share. His habitual piety, says lord Brougham, "his sense of his own imperfections, his generally blameless conduct in all the various relations of life, have already been sufficiently described. He was a good man, as he was a great man; and he had so firm a regard for virtue that he wisely set much greater store by his worth than by his fame." "Though consciousness of superiority might sometimes make him sit at a table high with man and above his own station, and even this was much insisted on by himself in the last part of his life, his devotions have shown to the whole world how humbly he walked at all times with his God." "If, then, it be asked," says lord Mahon, "who first in England, at that period, breathed the waves and stemmed the tides of infidelity which threatened the freedom of the press, or who, in conjunction together with argument and learning, on the side of revealed religion, first turned the literary current in its favor, mainly prepared the reaction which succeeded—that praise seems most justly to belong to Dr. Samuel Johnson. Religion was with him no mere lip service but an active life. He was a man of cold fancy and cold heart; and it can be shown that his meditations, his long hours as much as in his grave labors, he brought to it not merely erudition such as few indeed possessed, but the weight of the highest character, and the respect which even his enemies could not deny him. It may be said of him that, though not in orders, he did the Church of England service better and with more skill than most of those who at that lastest era ate her bread."

The death of this great man was a beautiful commentary on his life. "When at length," says lord Macaulay, "the moment dreaded through so many years came close, the dark cloud passed away from Johnson's mind. His spirit became light; he talked of the grave without a ghastly tale; he ceased to think of death and of that which lies beyond death, and he spoke much of the mercy of God and the propagation of Christ. Though the tender care which had mitigated his sufferings during months of sickness at Streatham was withdrawn, he was not left desolate. . . . In this serene frame of mind he died, Dec. 13, 1784; a week later he was laid in Westminster Abbey, among the eminent men of whom he had been the historian—Cowley and Denham, Dryden and Congreve, Gay, Prior, and Addison." (E. de F.)

It remains for us to append a brief outline of all the literary labors of his life. In addition to his contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine and his poem London, Johnson wrote in 1744 an interesting Life of Richard Savage; in 1749 his best poem, The Vanity of Human Wishes, an imitation of the tenth satire of Juvenal; and in 1751, The Rambler, a periodical which was conducted for two years, and the contents of which were almost wholly his own composition. But perhaps one of his greatest accomplishments is his Dictionary, a noble piece of work, enlisting its author to be considered the founder of English lexicography; it appeared in 1755, after eighteen years of labor, and another periodical, was begun by him in 1758, and carried on for two years also; and in 1759 occurred one of the most touching episodes of his life—the writing of Ras-
JOHNSON was written, he tells us, "in the evenings of a week." But, with all these publications before the public, he did not really emerge from obscurity until 1762, when a pen who, with a name, was confirmed by him by lord Bute; and in the following year occurred an event, apparently of little moment, but which had a lasting influence upon his fame: this was his introduction to James Boswell, whose Life of Dr. Johnson is probably more imperishable than any of the doctor's own writings. In 1764 the famous Literary Club was instituted, and in the following year began his intimacy with the Thrales. In the same year appeared his edition of Shakespeare. In 1773 he visited the Highlands with Boswell, and in 1781 appeared his Essay to Works; Memoir by Walter Scott; Essays by Macaulay and Carlyle; a brief but elaborate character of Dr. Johnson, written by Sir James Mackintosh, in his Life, ii. 168-9; Dr. Johnson, his Religious Life and Works (N.Y. 1865, 8vo); Chambers, Cyclop., s. v.; English Cyclopedia, s. v.; and the excellent and elaborate article in Allibone, Dict. Engl. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

JOHNSON, Thomas, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Virginia, July 11, 1802; went to Missouri in 1822, and commenced the work of the ministry in 1825. He labored as an itinerant in the bounds of the St. Louis Conference, filling some of the most important stations, that spent his greatest labors, and was most successful, as missionary to the Indians. His name will ever be connected with the history of Indian missions. Wise and earnest, he carried success with him in his responsible and arduous labors. He honorably sustained his character as a Christian minister through all his pilgrimage, and died an approved servant of God. He was shot by unknown parties in the night of Jan. 3, 1865, probably on account of his political principles. Among his colleagues in the Conference Johnson ranked with the first, and was highly esteemed by all. Says one of them: "He was a man of principle: one of the very few among the many thousands who, on all occasions and under all circumstances, acted upon the settled principle of morality and religion."

JOHNSON, William Bullein, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born on John's Island, near Charleston, S. C., June 13, 1782. He was ordained for the priest's profession, but after conversion (1804) he decided for the ministry, and was ordained, January, 1806, pastor of a church at Eutaw, S. C. In 1809 he removed to Columbia; in 1810 he went to Savannah, Ga., whence he returned to Columbia in 1816. In 1819 he was placed in charge of the female academy at Greenville, S. C. Eight or nine years later he removed to Edgeville, S. C., as pastor, teaching also at the same time at a female high school, and subsequently to Anderson, S. C., where a university for ladies bears his name. He finally returned to Greenville, S. C., where he labored faithfully for the Church of his choice up to the hour of his death, in perfect vigor of mind and soundness of body very unlike an octogenarian. He died there in 1862. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by Brown University in 1838. Dr. Johnson was a prominent member of the Bible Revision Society, and one of the presidents of the General Baptist Convention of the United States (formed in 1814). Over the Baptist Convention of his native state he presided for a score and a half of years. He wrote largely for religious and periodical religious and periodical publications. He was the author of several books. Among his Chief works were: "Development of the Gospel of Jesus Christ through the Government and Order of the Churches," sermons, circulars, and addresses. — Appleton, Cyclop. x. 36.

JOHNSONIANS, followers of John Johnson, a Baptist minister at Liverpool, England, in the last century, of whom there are still several congregations in different parts of England. He denied that faith was a duty, or even action of the soul, and defined it "an active principle" conferred by grace; and denied also the duty of the regenerate man to rain and plead for his own sins, or to claim special sentences and moral duties whatever. Though Mr. Johnson entertained high supralapsarian notions on the divine decrees, he admitted the universality of the death of Christ. On the doctrine of the Trinity, his followers are said to have embraced the indwelling scheme, with Calvinistic views of justification and the atonement. See See Johnson's Faith of God's Elect; Brine's Mistakes of Mr. Johnson (1745).

JOHNSTON, Arthur, a Scotch writer of great celebrity, a native of Caskieben, near Aberdeen, was born in 1587. He was a physician by profession, but spent most of his time in literary pursuits; especially throughout his acquaintance. See with Latin, for his Latin version of the Psalms, one of his last and best works, that we mention his name here. They were published under the title of Psalmorum Daviis Paraphrasis Poetica, et Cantico Evangelicorum. Edinburgh, 1607, 12mo, and often since. As another writer of note, George Buchanan, also furnished a Latin version of the Psalms; a comparison was frequently instituted as to the comparative merits of their work. Hallam (Liter. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed. Lond. 1854, iii. 53), in alluding to it, thinks that "Johnston's Psalms, all of which are in elegiac metre, do not fall far short of those of Buchanan either in elegance of style or correctness of Latinity." Johnston spent the earlier part of his life in France and Italy. His medical degree he obtained at Padua. He returned to Scotland in 1625, and about 1628 was appointed physician to the court of Charles I. In 1637 his literary attainments received recognition by his election to the rectorate of King's College. He died in 1641. Besides the Psalms, he translated into Latin the Te Deum, Creed, Decalogue, etc.; also Solomon's Song (Lond. 1638, 8vo). His other publications are Elegiae in Obiturum R. Jacobsi (Lond. 1625, 4to); — Epistularum (Aberdeen, 1608); — The, etc. See also Johnson, ed. of Johnston's version of the Psalms: Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Amer. Authors, ii. 983; Cyclop. Brit. vol. xii. s. v.

JOHNSTON, John, a Scotch minister, was a native of Aberdeen, and flourished in the latter half of the 16th century. He was, like his relative Arthur Johnston (q. v.), a supporter of bishop Wishart; but, as a minister of the Church (the Presbyterian) in the capacity of professor of divinity at St. Andrew's College. He died in 1612. He wrote Consolatio Christiana sub Cruce, (1617, 8vo); — Jamb Secr (Lond. 1651); — Terrestriachi et Lemmon Sacra—Item Cantica Sacra — Item lones Regnum Judaeorum ac Gentium — Item Saturni aetatem. — Informed by the title-page, Dict. of English and American Authors, vol. ii. s. v.

JOHNSTONE, Blyck, an eminent Scottish theologian and writer, was born at Annan, Dumfriesshire, in 1747. He studied at the University of Edinburgh, where he graduated D.D. He entered the Church, and was for a long time pastor of Holyrood (from 1771), and died in 1805. The name, Commentary on the Revelation of John (1794, 2 vols. Lond.), was On the Influence of Religion on Society and civil Government (1801). All of his German and Life were published by his nephew, the Rev. John Johnstone (1807, 8vo); etc. See Gorton's Biogr. Dictionary, s. v.; Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Am. Anth. s. v.

JO'fáda (Heb. Yôfáda), "a contraction of Jôhó'fáda, found only in Nehemiah, who invariably was ii), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Iôso'dá v. r. Iôso'dá, Vulg. Joseph, A. V.) Son of Phashah, and apparently one of the chief priests; in conjunction with Meshullam he repaired the Old Gate [see JERUSALEM], with its appearance, after the captivity (Neh. iii. 6). B.C. 446.

2. (Sept. Iôso'dá v. r. Iôso'dá, "the". Son and successor of Eliahib in the high-priesthood, himself succeeded by his son Jonathan (Neh. xii, 10, 11, 22); another of his sons having married a daughter of Sanballat, on which account he was banished (Neh. xiii, 26). B.C. post 446. Josephus (Ant. xi, 7, 1) gives the name to Jezebel (Ibid.). See HIGH-PRIEST.

Jo'ak'in (Hab. Yogakí'im, דָּוָיִקִּים, a contraction of Jeroham, used exclusively by Nehemiah; Sept. 'Iwaqvíyí v. r. 'Iwaqívíq, son of Jehoahaz and father of Eli-shah高等, high-priests successively (Neh. xii, 10, 12, 26). B.C. ante 446. Josephus does not mention him. See HIGH-PRIEST.
Jo'arîb (Hab. Yogarîb, דָּוָיִרִב, a contraction of Jeroham, occurring exclusively in Ezra and Nehemiah), the name of three or four persons.
1. (Sept. 'Iwaqvíyí v. r. 'Iwaqívíq.) A priest named (Neh. xii, 10) in connection with Jachin, and as father of Jediah (q. v.), but by some error; compare 1 Chron. ix, 10, where he is called Jezaeliah (q. v.), well known as founder of one of the sacerdotal "courses." See PRIEST.
2. (Sept. 'Iwaqvíyí.) A descendant of Judah, son of Sechariah and father of Adiah (Neh. xi, 5), apparently through Shileah. See SHILLO. B.C. considerably ante 536.
3. (Sept. 'Iwaqvíyí, 'Iwaqívíq.) One of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii, 6). He was the father of Mattenai, a contemporary with the high-priest Jeshua (Neh. xii, 19). B.C. 526.
4. (Sept. 'Iwaqvíyí v. r. 'Iwaqívíq.) A priest mentioned in connection with Elathann as a "man of understanding" (the others being called "chief men"), apparently among the priests, sent for by Ezra at the river of Ahava to devise means for obtaining a company of Levites to return with him to Jerusalem (Ezra viii, 16). B.C. 459.
Joining, besides its common sense (בָּנָה, to cling or adhere), is technically used of the binders (נָּפָיּית, mechabberoth), whether of wood or stone, of the walls of a building (1 Chron. xxii, 3). See COUPLING.
Joint, besides its usual meaning (יָבָנָה de bek, ṣiph, etc.), is, in one passage (Cant. vii, 1), very erroneously employed in the A.V. as a rendering of הָנָתִית, cham-mukhan (Sept. vaguely מִבְּּוֹצִית, Vulg. junctura, occurs nowhere else, the wrappers (of the thigs), i.e. drawers, a part of the female dress; which, in the case of bridal toilette, are represented as being fringed with a worked edging like lace or a skillfully chased jewel. See ATTIRE.
Jōk'ēśām (Hab. Yokešām, דָּוָיִשְׁאָמָה, burning of the people; Sept. 'Ikešādad, v. r. 'Ikešād, Vulg. Jucudam), a town in the mountains of Judah, mentioned between Jezeel and Zanoah (Jos. viii, 1). The association of the name with the locality in the district south-east of Hebron, perhaps at the ruined site marked as ed-Dur on Van de Velde's Map, just north of Jebel Ziph.
Jō'kīm (Hab. Yōkīm, דָּוָיִכִים, prob. a contraction of JOIAKIM; Sept. 'Iwaqvíyí v. r. 'Iwaqvíq, Vulg. paraphrases qui stare facit solem), a person mentioned among the descendants of Shelah (his third son, according to Berrington), son of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 22). B.C. prob. about 598. Josephus (Ant. xii, 5), 2nd century. See JOSHUA.
Jo'ah (Hab. Yōjah, דָּוָיִח, gathering of the people; 1 Kings iv, 12, Sept. 'Iwaqvíyí v. r. 'Iwaqvíq, Vulg. Jecmaan, Auth. Vers. "Joahneam", in 1 Chron. vi 68 [58], 'Iwaqvíq, Jecmaan), a place elsewhere called KIRZAIM (Josh. xxii, 22), but better known as JOKER\- AM (Josh. xiii, 22, etc.).
Jok'ne'am (Heb. Yōkne'am, דָּוָיִנָאָמ, possession of the people; Sept. 'Ikešvōyā, Vulg. Jugachanam, Jechnam, Jecnam), a royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. xii, 22), situated on the southwestern boundary of Zebulon (but not within it [see THIRTY], near Dabbasheth, and fronted by a stream [the Kishon] (Josh. xix, 11); assigned out of the territory of Zebulon to the Levites of the family of Merari (Josh. xxi, 34). From 1 Chron. vi, 68, the name appears to have been in later times written in the nearly synonomous form of JOKERAM, and it thus appears (in the original) as the boundary point of one of the purveyors of stores to King Josiah, who seems to have been identical with the Levitical city KIRZAIM (see Lightfoot, Opp. ii, 233) in Mount Ephraim (Josh. xii, 22). Dr. Robinson has lately identified it with the modern Tell Katam, a commanding position at the foot of Mount Carmel, across the Kishon from the plain of Esdraelon, and in a locality exactly agreeing with the scriptural data, and in name and situation with the CAYMON (q. v.) of the Apocrypha (Judith vii, 8), as well as with that of the Cammona of Eusebius and the Cynara of Jerome, although (in their Onomasticon) they profusely ignore the site of Jokne'am, now a town of Bibl. Researches, iii, 115). Schwartz (Palest, p. 91) gives a conjecture agreeing with the latter part of this identification. (See also Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 320; Tristan, Land of Israel, p. 119.) Jōk'ṣān (Heb. Yōkṣān, דָּוָיִשְׁצָאָן, marer; Sept. 'Ikešvōv v. r. 'Ikešōv or 'Ikešrōv), the second son of Abrah\- am and Ketarah, whose sons Sheba and Dedan appear to have been the ancestors of the Sabaeans and Dedanites, that people part of Arabia Felix (Gen. xxv, 2, 3; 1 Chron. i, 22, 33). B.C. cir. 2920. "If the Keturahites stretched across the desert from the head of the Arabian to that of the Persian Gulf (see DEDAN), then we must suppose that Jokshan returned westwards to the trans-Jordanic country, where are placed the settlements of his sons, or at least the chief of their settlements, for a wide spread of these tribes seems to be indicated in the passages in the Bible which make mention of them. The writings of the Arabs are rarely of use in the case of Keturahite tribes, whom they seem to confound with Ishmaelites in one common name. Allah mentions a dialect of Jokshan (Yakshas, who is in Jokshan, as having been formerly spoken near 'Aden and El-Jened, in Southern Arabia: Yakṭṭās Moqam, cited in the Zeitschrift d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellschaft, viii, 600-1; x, 30-1; but that Midianites penetrated so far into the peninsula we hold to be completely improbable" (Smith). Stem� Knobel (Genes. p. 188) suggests that the name Jokshan may have passed into KASHAN (کشان), and that his descendants were the Cassanians (Cassanvatia) of Tolemy (vi, 7, 6) and Stephan. Byzant. (s. v.), the Cassanides (Cassari-joctic) of Agatharchides (p. 6, ed. Hude), the G assay s (Tarsaviatia) of Dios. Sic. (iii, 44), and the Cassani or Gessani of Pliny (Hist. Nat. vi, 32), who dwelt by the Red Sea, to the south of the Cassanides, and extended to the most norther of the Joktanites." See ARABIA.
Jōk'tān (Heb. Yōk'tān, דָּוָיִךְתָאָן, little; Sept. 'Ikeśāv, Josephus 'Ikešração, Ant. i, 6, 4; Vulg. Jectan), a Shemithe, second named of the two sons of Eber, his brother being Peleg (Gen. x. 25; 1 Chron. i, 19). B.C. cir. 2400. He is mentioned as the progenitor of thirteen sons or heads of tribes, supposed to have resided in the head region (Gen. xx. 30); 1 Chron. i, 20-23). The Arabians called him Khahtan and assert that from him the eight original residents of Yemen sprang. His name is still pointed out by them near Kishbuhr (Niebuhr, Beschreib, p. 287), and traces of the same name appear in a city mentioned by Niebuhr (Beschr. p. 275) as lying between the Red Sea and the Aqurney north of Nejeran, perhaps the station Juktan alluded to by Edrisi as situated in the district of Sanan. All accounts of the Jotkanidae are stated in the Bible: "Their dwelling was from Mecha, as thou goest unto Shepar, a mount of the East" (Gen. x, 30). The position of Mecha, which is reasonably supposed to be the western boundary, is still uncertain [see Mecha]; but Shepar is well established as being the same as Zafar, which the Arabians placed on the east of the Yemed, and formerly one of the chief centres of the great Indian and African trade. See SEPHAL.

1. The native traditions respecting Jotkan himself commence with a difficulty. The ancestor of the great southern peoples was called Kahtan, who, say the Arabs, was the same as the ancient. To this son of Kahtan some European critics have objected that there is no good reason to account for the change of name, and that the identification of Kahtan with Jotkan is evidently a Jewish tradition adopted by Mohammed or his followers, and consequently at or after the promulgation of the Koran. M. Cauvin de Perceval commences his essay on the history of Yemen (Essai, i, 39) with this assertion, and adds, "Le nom de Cabtân, dissent-ils [les Arabes], est le nom de Ye'ttân, légèrement altéré en passant d'une langue étrangère dans la langue Arabe." In reply to these objections we would say:

1. The Rabbins hold a tradition that Jotkan settled in India (see Joseph, Ant., i, 6, 4), and the supposition of a Jewish influence in the Arab traditions respecting him is therefore untenable. In the present case, even were this not so, there is an absence of motive for Mohammed or his followers to adopt traditions which alienate from the race of Ishmael many tribes of Arabia: the influence here suspected may rather be found in the contradictory assertion, put forward by a few of the Arabs, and rejected by the great majority and the most judicious of their historians, that Kahtan was descended from Ishmael.

2. That the traditions to which reference is here made are post-Mohammedan cannot be proved; the same may be said of everything which Arab writers tell us dates before the prophet's time; for then oral tradition alone existed, if we except the rock-cut inscriptions of the Himyarites, which are too slight to admit of much weight attaching to them.

3. In the Mirat es-Zemam it is stated, "Bin El-Kebbi says, Yuktan [the Arabic equivalent of Jotkan] is the same as Kahtan, son of 'Abir," i.e. Eber, and so say the genealogers of the Arabs. El-Bedelhdri says, "People differ in their adopting Kahtan for their ancestor; some say he is the same as Yuktan, who is mentioned in the Pentateuch; but the Arabs arabized his name, and said Kahtan, the son of Hud [because they identified their prophet Hud with Eber, whom they call 'Abir]; and some say, son of Es-Senefya," or, as is said in one place by the author here quoted, "El-Hemeya, the son of Nebir [or Nabii, i.e. Nebiath], the son of Ismail," i.e. Ishmael. He then proceeds, in continuation of the former passage, "Abi-Hanife ed-Dinawarti says, He is Kahtan, the son of Abir, and was named Kahtan only because he is suffering from drought;" [which is termed in Arabic Kaht]. (Mirat es-Zemam; account of the sons of Sem.)

Of similar changes of names by the Arabs there are numerous instances. (See the remarks occurring in the Koran chap. ii, 248, in the Expositions of Ezanakshebert and El-Beydawi.)

2. The settlements of the sons of Jotkan are examined in the separate articles bearing their names, and generally in Arabia. They colonized the whole of the south of the peninsula, the old "Arabia Felix," or the Yemen as it has a very wide significance in early times, stretching, according to the Arabs (and there is in this case no ground for doubting their general correctness), to Meckh on the north-west, and along nearly the whole of the southern coast eastwards, and far inland. At Meckh tradition connects the two great races of Arabia and Israël, the modern Yemenites and the descendants of Jurhum the Jotkanites with Ishmael. It is necessary, in mentioning this Jurhum, who is called a "son of Jotkan (Kahtan), to observe that "son" in these cases must be regarded as signifying "descendant," and that many generations (though how many, or in what order, is not known) are missing from the existing list between Kahtan (embracing the most important time of the Jotkanites) and the establishment of the comparatively modern Himyaritic kingdom, from this latter date, stated by Cauvin, Essai, i, 63, at B.C. c. 100, the succession of the Tubaas is apparently preserved to us. At Meckh the tribe of Jurham long held the office of guardians of the Kaabah, or temple, and the sacred enclosure, until they were expelled by the Ishmaelites (Kutd ed-Dyn, Hist. of Meckh, ed. Wustenfeld, p. 35 and 39 sq.; and Cauvin, Essai, i, 194).

Finally, the Biblical Sheba, that the kingdom of Jotkan attained its greatness. In the southwestern angle of the peninsula, Sana (Uza), Seba (Sheba), and Hadramaut (Hazarath), all closely neighboring, formed together the principal known settlements of the Jotkanites. Here arose the kingdom of Seba, followed in later times by that of Himyar. The dominion of tribes from remote ages seems to have been that of Seba (or Sheba, the Sabaei of the Greeks), while the family of Himyar (Homerya) held the first place in the tribe. The kingdom called that of Himyar we believe to have been merely a late phase of the old Seba, divided in both its rise and its name, only shortly before our era.

Next in importance to the tribe of Seba was that of Hadramaut, which, till the fall of the Himyaritic power, maintained a position of independence and a direct line of rulers from Kahtan (Cauvin, i, 185 sq.). Jotkanite tribes followed in later times by that of himyars. The dominion of tribes from remote ages seems to have been that of Seba (or Sheba, the Sabaei of the Greeks), while the family of Himyar (Homerya) held the first place in the tribe. The kingdom called that of Himyar we believe to have been merely a late phase of the old Seba, divided in both its rise and its name, only shortly before our era.

The name of Jotkheil, that of the two cities. 1. (Sept. 112.229, v. 112.229.) A town in the plain of Judah, mentioned between Mizpeh and Lachish (Josh. xv, 49). The associated name, city of Jotkheil, is a village from the tribe of Judah in the district south-west and south of Hebron (Keil's Commentary, ad loc.); possibly at Balad, a small modern village a little south of Tell es-Safak (Eddesm, Researches, ii, 368).

2. (Sept. 112.229, v. 112.229.) The name was given by king Azazah to Shokel, the capital of ancient Arabia Petraea, and subsequently borne by it (2 Kings xiv, 7); from which circumstance it appears to have improved it after having captured it. See PETRA.
JOLLY 889

JOLLY, Alexander, an English prelate, was born in 1756. He was ordained for the ministry in 1777, and became pastor at Turiff the same year. In 1778 he removed to Fraserburgh, where he resided for forty-nine years. In 1796 he was elevated to the bishopric of Dundee, and later he became bishop of Moray, a see founded in the 12th century, and which, after bishop Jolly's decease, was absorbed in other dioceses. He died in 1838. Bishop Jolly's works are, Baptismal Regeneration (Lond. 1828; new edition, with Life of author by Cheyne, 1840, 12mo) — Sunday Services and Holy Days, etc. (1829; 3d ed., with Memoir of author by Bp. Walker, Elderslie, 12mo) — The Christian Sacrifice in the Eucharist (1832, 12mo; 2d ed. Aberdeen, 1847, 12mo). See Allibone, Dict. of Eng. and Amer. Authors, ii, 986. Jontob. See LIEPFMAN.

Jon, Francis Du. See JONIUS.

Jona (John i, 42). See JONAS.

Jon'adab, a shortened form of the name Jehonada'bal, for which it is used indifferently in the Hebrew as applied to either of two men in certain passages; but these have not been accurately represented in the A.V., which applies the briefier form indeed to either, but the full form to but one in three of these passages. See JEHOANADAB.

1. The son of Shimeah and nephew of David (A.V. correctly in 2 Sam. xiii. 3 twice, 35; incorrectly in ver. 5, where the Hebrew has Jehonadab).

2. The Bechatele (Jer. xxxiv. 6, 10, 19; incorrectly in verse 8, 14, 16, 18).

Jona'h (Heb. Yona'h, יְוָנָה, a dove, as often, but in that sense only, Sept. Isaü in 2 Kings xiv, 25; elsewhere and in the N.T. Ἰωάνης; see JONAS), the son of Amittai, the fifth in order of the minor prophets. No ara is assigned to him in the book of his prophecy, yet there is little doubt of his being the same person who is spoken of in 2 Kings xiv. 25 as having uttered a prophecy of the relief of the kingdom of Israel, which was accomplished by Jeroboam's recapture of the ancient territory of the northern tribes between Cæle-Syria and the Ghor (compare ver. 29). The Jewish doctors have supposed him to be the son of the widow of Sarepta by a puerile interpretation of 1 Kings xvii. 24 (Jerome, Prefat. in Jonam). His birthplace was Gath-hepher, in the tribe of Zebulon (2 Kings xiv. 25). Jonah flourished in or before the reign of Jeroboam II (B.C. cir. 820), since he predicted the successful conquests, enlarged territory, and brief prosperity of the Israelitish kingdom under him. (Jonah's away (comp. Josephus, Antiq. ix, 10, 1). The oracle itself is not extant, though Hit zig has, by a novel process of criticism, amused himself with a fancied discovery of it in chap. xv and xvi of Isaiah (Dea Proph. Jon. Orakel über Mose krutscher, etc., Heidelberg, 1831). The personal history of Jonah is, with the exception of this incidental allusion, to be gathered from the account in the book that bears his name. Having already, as it seems (from 1 in 1, i), prophecied to Israel, he was sent to Nineveh. The time was one of political revival in Israel; but ere long the Assyrians were to be employed by God as a scourge upon them. The Israelites consequently viewed them with repulsiveness; and the prophet, in accordance with his name (יְוָנָה, a dove), out of timidity and love for his country, shrunk from a commission which he felt sure would result (iv, 2) in the sparing of a hostile city. He attempted, therefore, to escape to Tarshish, either Tar- tesseus in Spain (Bochart, Titcomb, Hengstenberg), or more probably (Drake) Tarus in Cilicia, a port of commercial intercourse. The providence of God, however, watched over him, first in a storm, and then in his being swallowed by a large fish (3:7—2) for the space of three days and three nights (see Hauber, Jonas im Beiche des Waldfiches [Leng. 1753] — Delitzsch, in Zeitschr. f. Luther, Kirche u. Theol. [1840], ii, 112 sq.; Baumgarten, itul. [1841], i, 187; Keil, Bibl. Commentar zu d. Kl. Propheten [Leips. 1866]). After his deliverance Jonah executed his commission; and the king, having heard of his miraculous deliverance (dean Jackson, On the Creed, bk. ix, c. 42), ordered a general fast, and averted the threatened judgment. But the prophet, not from personal, but national feelings, grudged the mercy shown to a heathen nation. He was therefore taught, by the significant lesson of the gourd, whose growth and decay (a known fact to naturalists: Layard's Nineveh, i, 123, 124) brought the truth at once home to him, that he was sent to testify by deed, as other prophets would afterwards testify by word, of the capacity of Gentiles for salvation, and the design of God to make them partakers of it. This was "the sign of the prophet Jonas" (Luke xxi, 29-32), which was given to a proud and perversive generation of Jews after the ascension of Christ by the preaching of his apostles. (See the monographs on this subject cited by Hase, Leben Jesu, p. 160). But the resurrection of Christ itself was also shadowed forth in the history of the prophets, as is made certain to us by the words of our Saviour (see Jackson as above, bk. ix, c. 40). Titcomb (Bible Studies, p. 237, note) sees a correspondence between Jon. i, 17 and Hos. vi, 2. Besides this, the fact and the faith of Jonah's prayer in the belly of the fish betokened to the nation of Israel the intimation of a resurrection and of immortality.

On what portion of the coast-Jonah was set down in safety we are not informed. The opinions held as to the peculiar spot by rabbins and other thauatographic expositors need not be repeated. According to modern tradition, it was at the spot now marked as Khan Nemi Yumus, near Sidon (Kelly's Syriac, p. 382). The particular plant (1:18, יְקוֹגָו, "gourd") which sheltered Jonah was possibly the Bechanea, whose name קִדֵּס is yet preserved in some of the tongues of the East. It is more likely, however, to have been some climbing plant of the gourd tribe. The Sept. renders it צִוָּוָנוֹ (kiswano, 'gourd') which sheltered Jonah was possibly the Bechanea, whose name קִדֵּס is yet preserved in some of the tongues of the East. "Tomb of the Prophet Jonah" at Mosul.

Various spots have been pointed out as the place of his sepulchre, such as Mosul in the East, and Gath-he-phal prophecies ascribed to Jonah may be found in the pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vita Prophet. c. 16) and the Chronic. Paschale, p. 149.

Jonah's Prophecy contains the above account of the prophet's commission to denounce Nineveh, and of his refusal to undertake the embassy—of the method he employed to evade the commission, and the miraculous means which God used to curb his self-willed spirit, and subdue his petulant and querulous disposition (Reindel, Die Sendung des Prophet. Jonah nach Ninive. Bamm. 1892). His attempt to flee from the presence of the Lord seems like a partial insanity, produced by the excitement of distracting motives in an irascible and melancholy heart (J. C. Lange, Dias. de mirabilis fuga Jonah, Hal. 1751).

I. Historical Character of the Book. The history of Jonah is certainly striking and extraordinary. Its characteristic prodigy does not resemble the other miraculous phenomena recorded in Scripture, yet we must believe in its literal occurrence, as the Bible affords no indication of its being a mythus, allegory, or parable (Piper, Historia Jona a recens. consulis vindicato. Gryph. 1786). On the other hand, our Saviour's point of view and peculiar allusion to it is a presumption of its real occurrence. The historical character of the narrative is held by Hess, Lilienthal, Sack, Reindel, Hüvernic, Hengstenberg, Laberens, Baumgarten, Delitzsch, Wele, Stuart, and Keil, Eisleit. sec. 89. (See Friedrichsen, Krit. Uebericht der verschied. Ansichten von dem Buch Jonas, 2d edit. 1841.) The opinion of the earlier Jews, Persians, Greeks, Masoretes, and churchmen of the 1st, 2d, and 3d cent. (Ant. x1, 10, 2) is also in favor of the literality of the adventure (see Buddel Hist. V. Test. ii, 589 sq.) It requires less faith to credit this simple excerpt from Jonah's biography than to believe the numerous hypotheses that have been proposed to explain it. The supernatural character of the Lord's manifestation and the extraordinary nature of the event are authentically recorded in the Book of Jonah, and the question is not raised as to whether it was reported to the people of Nineveh, whether it was actually done, or whether it was a dream produced in that sleep which fell upon Jonah as he lay in the sides of the ship. The fanciful opinion of the famous Herman von der Hardt, in his Jonas in face, etc., a full abstract of which is given by Rosenmüller, P. Gossen, p. 19, was begun by the book of the author in his essay, and it was a historical allegory, descriptive of the fate of Manasseh, and Joseph his grandson, kings of Judah. Tarshish, according to him, represents the kingdom of Lydia; the ship, the Jewish republic, whose captain was Zadok the high-priest; while the casting of Jonah into the sea symbolized the temporary captivity of Manasseh in Babylon. Less (Vom historischen Styl der Ir. wedl) supposed that all difficulty might be removed by imagining that Jonah, when thrown into the sea, was taken up by a ship having a large fish for a figure-head—a theory somewhat more pleasing than the rancid hypothesis of Antion, who fancied that the prophet took refuge in the interior of a dead whale, floating near the spot where he was cast overboard (Rosenm. Prolegom. in Jon. p. 528). Not unlike the opinion of Less is that of Charles Taylor, in his Fragments affixed to Calmet's Dictionary. No. civ. 27, that signifies a life-preserver, a notion which, as his manner is, he endeavors to support by a series of apert and superfluous arguments. Neither is the characteristic historical form and names of the famous fish-god of Philistia. There are others who allow, as De Wette and Knoch, that Jonah was a real person, but hold that the book is made up, for didactic purposes, of legendary stories which had gathered around him. A slender basis of fact has been allowed by some—by Bunsen, for example—for the idea of a strange enough, fixes upon the very portion which to most of his rationalistic countrymen bears the clearest marks of spuriousness, as the one genuine part of the whole—Jonah's thanksgiving from the perils of shipwreck (as Bunsen judges); and thinks that some one had mistaken the matter, and fabricated out of it the present story—by others, such as Krahmer (Das Buch Jonas, introd.), who suppose that Jonah was known to have uttered a prophecy against Nineveh, and to have been impatient at the delay which appeared in the fulfillment, and was hence, for didactic purposes, made the hero of the story.

But the more common opinion in the present day with this school of divines is, that the story is purely moral, and without any historical foundation; nor can any clue be found or imagined in the known history of Nineveh, or in the religious or political history of the world. The book is in the latter stages of the kingdom, should have been learned as the ground of the instruction meant to be conveyed. So Ewald, Bleek, etc., who, however, differ in some respects as to the specific aim of the book, while they agree as to its non-historical character. In short, that the book is the grotesque coinage of a Hebrew im. agitation seems to be the opinion, variously modified, of Semler, Michaelis, Herder, Stadlin, Eichhorn, Augusti, Meyer, Pareau, Hitzig, and Maurer.

The plain, literal import of the narrative being set aside with missapplying ingenuity, the supposed design of it has been very variously interpreted. Michaelis (Ueber die d. N. T. part xi, p. 101) and Semler (Apparatus ad Lk. Vi. 30, p. 271) suppose the narrative to be intended to show the injustice of the arrogance and hatred cherished by the Jews towards other nations. So in substance Bleek. Similarly Eichhorn (Einl. § 577 and Jahn (Introducat. § 127) think the design was to show that the love of other peoples in times excelled them in pious observance. Kregel (Erbest. d. N. T. vii, 129 sq.) argues that this episode was meant to solace and excite the prophets under the discharge of difficult and dangerous duties; while Paulus (Memorabilia, vi, 32 sq.) maintains that the object of the author of Jonah is to impress the fact that God redeems punishment on repentance and reformation. Similar is the idea of Kimchi and Pareau (Interpretation of Old Testament, Biblical Cabinet, No. xxv, p. 263). Krehmer thinks that the theme of the writer is the Jewish colony in its relation to the Samaritans (Dea B. Jom. Kral. unter G. A. T. in Proph. Misia) adheres to the opinion which lies upon the surface, that it inculcates the sin of not obeying God, even in proclaiming severe threatenings on a heathen people. Ewald would make the design quite general, namely, to show how the real fear of God and repentance bring salvation — first, in the case of the heathen sailors; then in the case of Jonah; finally, in that of the Ninevites. Hitzig (first in a separate treatise, then in his commentary on the minor prophets) supposes the book to have been written by some one in the 4th century before Christ, "in Egypt, that land of wonders," and chiefly for its purpose of vindicating Jehovah in having failed to verify the prophecy in Obadiah respecting the heathen Edomites. Similarly, Köster (Die Propheten des A. und N. Test., Leipzig, 1839) favors the malignant inscription that its chief end was to save the credit of the prophet among the people, though the predictions against foreign nations might not be fulfilled, as Nineveh was preserved after being besieged and doomed.

These hypotheses are all vague and baseless, and do not merit a special refutation. Endeavoring to free us from one difficulty, they plunge us into others yet more important. The scene is a wonderful delineation of the eternal objections that have been brought against the book.

(1.) Much profane wit has been expended on the miraculous means of Jonah's deliverance, very unnecessarily and very absurdly; it is simply said, "The Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah." Now the species of marine animal is not defined, and the Greek ἁλίκος is often used to signify, not the genus whale, but any large fish or sea-monster. All objections to its being a whale which lodged Jonah in its stomach from its great length or strength of haunt in the Mediterranean, are thus removed. He- scratch explains ἁλίκος as θαλάσσων ἠλίκος τιμήτωρ, Eustathius explains its correspondent adjective κτήσις by μεγάλην (in the Iliad, ii, 88). Diodorus Siculus speaks of terrestrial monsters as κτήσις ζώων, and of sea-monsters as κτίσις. The Scripture thus speaks only of an enormous fish, which under God's direction swallowed the prophet, and does not point out the species to which the voracious prowler belonged. There is little ground for the supposition of bishop Jebb, that the asylia of Jonah was not the sacral throat or gullet of a whale, for, according to naturalists, is a very capacious receptacle, sufficiently large, that Captain Scoresby asserts, to contain a merchant ship's jolly-boat full of men (bishop Jebb, Sacred Literature, p. 178). Since the days of Bochart it has been a common opinion that the fish was of the shark species, Lamna cenis caroerias, or "sea-dog" (Bochart, Op. iii, 72; Calmet's Dissertation sur Jon.). Entire human bodies have been found in some fishes of this kind. The stomach, too, has no influence on any living substance admitted into it. Granting all these facts as proof of what is termed the economy of nature, the author supposed the narrative to be suited to the supernatural preservation of Jonah, is anything too hard for the Lord? See Whale.

(2.) What is said about the size of Nineveh, also, is in accordance with fact (see Pict. Bible, note, ad loc.). It was "an exceeding great city of three days' journey." Built in the form of a parallelogram, it made, according to Diodorus (iv, 34. 5) the circuit of 20,000 stadia, or 160 miles. It has been usual, since the publication of Layard's Nineveh, to say that the great ruins of Koyunjik, Nimrud, Keremels, and Khorsabad form such a parallelogram, the distances from north to south being about 16 miles, and from east to west about 12; the longer sides thus measuring 86 miles, and the shorter ones 24. But against this view professor Rawlinson has recently urged, with considerable force, that the four great ruins bore distinct local titles; that Nimrud, identified with Calah, is mentioned in Scripture as a place so far separated from Nineveh that a "great city"—resen—lay between them (Gen. x, 12); that the site of Khorsabad is a continuous town; and that the four sites are fortified on what would be the inside of the city." Still Nineveh, as represented by the ruins of Koyunjik and Nebbi-Yumus, or Tomb of Jonah, was of an oblong shape, with a circuit of about eight miles, and was therefore a place of unusual size for an exceeding great city. The phrase, "three days' journey," may mean that it would take that time to traverse the city and proclaim through all its localities the divine message; and the emphatic point then is, that at the end of his first day's journey the preaching had not taken effect; that the people "that cannot discern their right hand from their left hand," probably denotes children, and 120,000 of these might represent a population of more than half a million (Rawlinson's Five Great Monarchies, i, 310; Sir Henry Rawlinson's Comment on Can. Interc. iv, 17; Captain Jones's Topography of Nineveh, ii, 298). Jonah entered the city "a day's journey," that is, probably went from west to east uttering his incisive and terrible message. The sublime audacity of the stranger—the ringing monotony of his sharp, short cry—had an immediate effect. The story of his discourse alone would have been a wonderful delineation of the internal objections that have been brought against the book. brute creation was at least one analogy in the lamentation made over the Persian general Maniastus: "The horses and beasts of burden were shaved" (Herodotus, ix. 24). According to Plutarch, also, Alexander commanded the observance of a similar custom on the death of Hephæstion. Therefore, in the accessories of the narrative there is no violation of probability—such is in accordance with known customs and facts. See NINEVEH.

(3.) It has appeared to some, in particular to Bleek (Einl. p. 571), improbable, and against the historical verity of this book, that on the supposition of all that is here stated, the actual occurrence there should be in the relation of them such a paucity of circumstantial details—nothing said, for instance, of the place where Jonah was discharged on dry land, or of the particular king who then reigned at Nineveh—and not only so, but no apparent reference in the future allusions to Nineveh in Scripture, to the singular change (if so be it actually took place) wrought through the preaching of Jonah on the religious and moral state of the people. These are still always regarded as idolaters, and the judgments of God uttered against them, as if they stood in much the same position as the heathen enemies generally. Of course, and perhaps, may fairly be admitted that there is a certain degree of strangeness in such things, which, if it were not in accordance with the character both of the man and of the mission, and in these found a kind of explanation, might not unnaturally, I think, to some doubts as to the credibility of what is written. But Jonah's relation to Nineveh was altogether of a special and peculiar nature; it stood apart from the regular calling of a prophet and the ordinary dealings of God; and having for its more specific object the instruction and warning of the covenant-people in a very critical period of their history, the reserve maintained as to local and historical details may have been designed, as it was certainly fitted, to make them think less of the parties immediately concerned, and more of what through these God was seeking to impress upon themselves. The whole was a kind of parabolical action; and beyond a certain limit circumstantial minuteness would have tended to mar, rather than to promote, the leading aim. Then, as to the change produced upon the Ninevites, we are led from the nature of the case to think chiefly of the more flagrant iniquities of Nineveh as particularly aimed at; and Israel itself afforded many examples of general reformatory in respect to these, of which little or no trace was to be found in the course even of a single generation. Much more such might be expected to have happened in the case of Nineveh.

II. Style, Date, etc.—The book of Jonah is a simple narrative, with the exception of the prayer or thanksgiving in chap. ii. Its style and mode of narration are uniform. There are no traces of composition, as Nachtmann supposed; neither is the prayer, as De Wette (Einl. § 257) imagines, improperly borrowed from some other sources. That prayer contains, indeed, not only imagery peculiar to itself, but also such imagery as at once was suggested to the mind of a pious Hebrew preserved in circumstances of extreme jeopardy. On this principle we account for the similarity of some portions of its parableology to Ps. lxx. 23, xlii, etc. The language in both places had been hallowed by frequent usage, and had become the consecrated idiom of a distressed and succored Israelite. Perhaps the prayer of Jonah might be uttered by him, not during his mysterious imprisonment, but after it (פרעה...לעשית, out, i.e. when out of the fish's belly; comp. Job xix. 26; xi. 10). The hymn seems to have been composed after his deliverance, and the reason why his deliverance is noted after the hymn is recorded may be to show the occasion of its composition. "The Lord had spoken unto the fish, and it had vomited Jonah on the dry land!" (See further Hamburger, in his Bibl. Hethitologica, Leiden, 1718; also an article on the subject in the Brk. Theol. Mh., i, 8, p. 18.)

There was little reason either for dating the composition of this book later than the age of Jonah, or for supposing it the production of another than the prophet himself. The Chaldaic name which Jahn and others find may be accounted for by the nearness of the canton of Zebulon, to which Jonah belonged, to the northern territories. Many of the Aramaic peculiarities might be insensibly borrowed. (Thus we have רַעַּו— a ship with a deck—not the more common Hebrew term; רַעַּו—a foreign title applied to the captain; רַעַּו—to appoint—found, however, in Ps. lix. a psalm which Humphed without any valid grounds places after the Babylonian captivity; רַעַּו, to command, as in the later books; רַעַּו, command, referring to the royal decree, and probably taken from the native Assyrian tongue; רַעַּו, to row, a nautical term; and the abbreviated form of the relative, which, however, occurs in other books, etc.) Gesenius and Berthold place it before the exile; Jahn and Köster afterwards. Rossmüller supposes the author may have been a contemporary of Jeremiah; Hitzig postpones it to the period of the Maccabees. The general opinion is that Jonah was the first of the prophets (Rossmüller, Dp. Lloyd, Davidson, Brown, Drake); Hengstengberg would place it after Amos, and indeed, adherents to the view of the books in the canon for the chronology. He, as well as Hitzig, would identify the author with that of Obadiah, chiefly on account of the initial "a." The king of Nineveh at this time is supposed (Úather and others) to be a certain Tarshish; and he is placed by Jahn (Bibl. p. 624) at B.C. 750; but an earlier king, Adrammelech II, B.C. 840, is regarded as more probable by Drake. The date above assigned to Jonah would seem to indicate the husband of the famous Semiramis. See ASYRIA.

III. Commentators.—The following are the special exegetical helps expressively on the whole book, the most important of which we designate by prefixing an asterisk: Ephraem Syrus, In Jonam (in Opp. iii. 562: transl. from the Syriac by Burgess, Hymnsy, Lond. 1838: 12mo); Basil, In Jonam (in Opp. p. 99: Tertullian, Cœnann (in Opp. p. 576); Tholuck, Commentarius in Jonah (in Opp. i. v. Jonah ben-Abraham GERUNDI, a Jewish savant, and one of the principal leaders of the opposition to the school of Maimonides, was born about 1155. A disciple of the celebrated Salomo of Montepensier, he had espoused the cause of the latter. He was one of the parties that pronounced the ban against all who should dare to read the writings of the celebrated Jewish philosopher, and his opposition had in every way been so brilliant, that he was chosen, without any surprise in the Jewish camp when he, upon the attempt of the inquisitors to destroy all copies of the Rabbinical writings, openly declared his former course a mistake, and pronounced the second Moses a great and good man. He even entered upon a pilgrimage to the grave of the man whose writings and discourses he had formerly opposed; and when, at the solicitation of a Jewish congregation which demanded his services, he halted on the journey, and there died (about 1270), his death was attributed by some of his contemporaries as a punishment of heaven for the non-fulfilment of his duty to visit the grave of Maimonides, and there declare the folly of his former course. Jonah was a man of splendid parts, and did much to allay strife among his people. *Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 46, 117 sq. See Salomo of Montepensier. (J. H. W.)

IV.—R & N

JO'NAN (Yonah, perh. contr. for JONAH or JOHAN, or Leq. JONAS), the son of Eliah and father of Joseph among the maternal ancestors of Christ (Luke iii, 80). He is not mentioned in the Old Test. B.C. considerably ante 876. See Genealogy of Christ.

JO'NAS (Younah, for the Heb. Jonah), the Grecianized form of the name of three men in the Apocrypha and New Testament.

1. The prophet Jonas (2 Esdr. i, 39; Tobit xiv, 4; Matt. xi, 90, 40, 41; Luke xvi, 39, 80, 82).

2. A person occupying the same position in 1 Esdr. ix, 29 as ELIZER in the corresponding list in Ezra x, 23. Perhaps the corruption originated in reading Ἰωνᾶς, as appears to have been the case in the 1 Esdr. ix, 29 (compare Ezra x, 31). The former would have caught the compiler's eye from Ezra x, 22, and the original form Eionas, as it appears in the Vulg., could easily have become Jonas.

3. The father of the apostle Peter (John xxii, 15, 16, 17). In John i, 42 the name is less correctly Anglicized "Jonas" (some MSS. have Ἰωνᾶς). A.D. ante 25. See also BAR-JONA. Instead of Ἰωνᾶς (genitive) in all the above passages the correct form is Ἰωνᾶς, of which latter Lachmann has introduced into the text. Perhaps Jonas is but a contraction for Joannas (Luke iii, 27), which is the same as John.

Jonah, bishop of Orelans, an eminent prelate in the Latin Church, flourished in the first half of the 9th century. He died in 842. Jonas took an active part in the ecclesiastical affairs of his time, and played an important part in the Iconoclastic controversy, in which he assumed a mediatic role. In his De cultu imaginum (1645, 16mo) he wrote both against Claudius, bishop of Turin, and the Iconoclasts. The work was dedicated to king Charles the Bald, with whom he was in great favor. Although condemned by the destroyers of images, he did not approve the worship of them, and the most eminent Catholic writers, such as Bellarmine, therefore disapprove of his work. His other principal works are, Libri tres de institutione laicalli (transl. into French by De Meegh, 1622, 12mo):—De institutione regis (transl. into French by Desmarets, 1661, 8vo). These two works are to be found in Latin in D'Achery's Spicileg. He is also the author of a treatise on Miracles (in Bibl. Patr.). See Milman, Latin Christ. iv, 421; Schröck, Kirchengeschichte, xxiii, 294 sq., 416 sq.; Aschbach, Kirchen-Lexi. iii, 578.

Jonas, Justus, one of the most eminent reformers in Germany, a contemporary and associate of Luther, was born at Nordhausen, June 5, 1498. He studied law at the University of Erfurt. In 1519, however, encouraged by the advice of both Hess and Erasmus, he decided to study theology, and, inclining to the cause of the Reformers, he allied himself to Luther in 1521, and thereafter became closely connected with the great reformer. He went to Worms with him, and was soon after appointed provost of the church at Wittemberg. Here he was made D.D. by the university, in which he became a professor; and ever after worked zealously for the propagation of the principles of the reformation. His legal knowledge was of especial service to the Reformers. In 1529 he accompanied Luther to Marburg, and his letters on this occasion are a valuable historical contribution. In 1530 we find him assisting Melan- thion in the completion of his Augsburg. In 1541 he was summoned to the Hague to assume pastoral duties at St. Mary's church in that city, but in 1546 duke Maurice ordered him to quit the place, and he returned only after the election John Frederick had taken possession of the city in 1547. The battle of Mühlberg, which falls in this year, again turned the fate of the Protestants, and he once more quitted Halle. In 1551 he was appointed court preacher at Coburg, and in 1553 superintendent of Eisle- field, where he died Oct. 9, 1555. Jonas was particularly distinguished as a ready speaker and as a writer. He took part in the translation of the Bible by Luther, and wrote Prefatio in Epistolae divi Pauli Apostoli, ad Corinthios, etc. (Erfurt, 1820, 4to).—Epistome Judicii I. Jonae, postpos. Wittemb., de corrigenda cerimoniam (1528):—Annotaciones I. Jonae in Acta Apostolorum (Wittemburg, 1524, Basle, 1525):—Vom alien u. neuen Gott, Glauben u. Lehre (Wittemburg, 1520).—Ezech d. Prophetische Kirsche (Wittemburg, 1534, 4to):—Oratio Justi Ionae, doct. theol., de Studior Theologici (Wittemburg, 1538; Melanchthon, Selecti, Declamatio, 25) :—Des xx Paulina Auslegung (Wittenberg, 1546):—Kurze Historia v. Luthers bildischen u. geistlichen Antheilungen (in Luther's Works) etc. He also published a number of translations into German, especially of works of Luther and Melancthon; also translations from German into Latin. Jonas, Ludwig, one of the ablest German theologians of our day, was born at Neustadt a. O. February 11, 1797. During the Franco-Prussian war of 1812-1815 he fought against the foreign invader, but as soon as peace dawned on his native land he resumed his theological studies at the celebrated Schleiermacher's, under whom he was one of the most prominent and faithful followers. After preaching at different places, he removed to Berlin in 1834, and soon secured a place in the foreground among Berlin's large array of theological writers. He published Schleiermacher's MSS.: his Philosophische Dissertation in 1835, the Dialogetic in 1839, Morals in 1843, Letters in 1858. He died Sept. 13, 1859. Jonas was one of the founders of the Monatschrift of the United Church of Prussia (comprising the Reformed and Lutheran churches at that time. See art. Prussia).

Jonathan (Heb. Yonathan, יואנְן, 1 Sam. xiii, 2, 8, 16, 22; xiv, 1, 3, 4, 12, 13, 14, 17, 21, 27, 29, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 49, xix, 1; Kings i, 42, 43; 1 Chron. ii, 32, 33; x, 21; xii, 9; Ezra viii, 6; x, 15; Neh. xii, 11, 14, 35; Jer. xi, 8; Sept. 1°wadva), a contracted form of Jehonathan (יהונתן, q. d. Theophile, 1 Chron. xxvii, 2; 2 Chron. xvii, 8; Neh. xii, 18; Anglicized "Jonathan" elsewhere, Judg. xviii, 30; 1 Sam. iv, 6, 8; xiii, 1, 3, 4, xiv, 1, 2, 6, 7; xx, 1, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 16, 17, 18, 26, 27, 38, 39, 52, 53, 84, 85, 87, 88, 90, 40, 42, xxii, 10, 11, 12; 1 Sam. 4, 5, 12; 2 Sam. 23, 26; 16; 4; 1, 8, 6, 7; xxv, 26, 36; xvii, 29; xxii, 7, 12, 18, 14, 21, xxiii, 82; 1 Chron. viii, 33, 34; ix, 39, 40, xxvii, 32; Jer. xxxvii, 15, 20, xxxix, 26; Sept. 1°wadva), the name of fifteen or more men in the canonical Scriptures, besides several in the Apocalypse and Josephus.

1. A Levite descended from Gershom, the son of Moses (Judg. xviii, 30). It is indeed said, in our Masoretic copies, that the Gershom from whom this Jonathan sprang was the "son of Manasseh," but it is on very good grounds supposed that in the name Moses (תֹּמַשָּׁם), the single letter nun (n) has been interpolated (and it is usually written suspended, Buxtorf, Tiber., p. 14), changing it into Manassas (תֹּמַשָּׁס). The letter waw is to save the character of the great lawgiver from the stain of having an idolater among his immediate descendants (Bikhn. Buthara, 109, b). The singular name Gershom, and the date of the transaction, go far to establish this view. Accordingly the Vulgate, and some copies of the Septuagint, actually exhibit the name of Moses instead of Manasseh. (See on 1 Chron. ii, 32, 33, etc.). The history of this Jonathan is involved in the narrative which occupies Judges xvii, xviii, and is one of the two accounts which form a sort of appendix to that book. The events themselves appear to have occurred soon after the death of Joshua, and of the elders who outlived him, when the government was in a most unsettled state. Its proper place in the chronological order would be between the second and third chapters of the book. B.C. cir. 1590.

Jonathan, who was resident at Bethlhelm, lived at a time when the dads of the sanctuary did not afford a livelihood to the numerous Levites who had claimed upon the ground of the promised inheritance of the land which possessed which gave to all others a sufficient maintenance. He therefore went forth to seek his fortune. In Mount Ephraim he came to a "house of a god who was divided by a priest to whom he had pledged his establishment complete. See Micah. This person made Jonathan what was manifestly considered the handsome offer of engaging him as his priest for his victuals, a yearly sum of clothes, and ten shekels (about six dollars) a year in money. Here he lived for some time, till the Danite spies, who were sent by their tribe to explore the country, passed this way and formed his acquaintance. When, not long after, the body of armed Danites passed the same way in going to settle near the sources of the Jordan, the spies mentioned Micah's establishment to them, on which they went and took away not only "all the victuals," but the priest also, that they might set up the same worship in the place of which they were going to take possession. Micah vainly protested against this robbery: but Jonathan himself was glad at the improvement in his prospects, and from that time, even down to the captive state of his descendants continuing to be priests of the Danites in the town of Laish, the name of which was changed to Dan.

There is not any reason to suppose that this establishment, whether in the hands of Micah or of the Danites, involved an apostasy from Jehovah. It appears rather to have been an attempt to localize or domesticate his presence, under those symbols and forms of service which were common among the neighboring nations, but were forbidden to the Hebrews. The offence here was twofold—the establishment of a sacred ritual different from the only one which the law recognized, and the worship by symbols, naturally leading to idolatry, with the ministration of one who could not legally be a priest, but only a Levite, and under circumstances in which no Aaronic priest could legally have officiated. It is more than likely that this establishment was eventually the outcome of the golden calf's worship. But it seems set up in this place, his choice of which may very possibly have been determined by its being already in possession of a "house of gods." The Targum of R. Joseph, on 1 Chron. xxiii, 16, identifies this Jonathan with Shebuel, the son of Gershom, whom it is said there to have repented (שְׁבֹעֵל, בַּוָּל), in his old age, and to have been appointed by David as chief over his treasures. All this arises from a play upon the name Shebuel, from which this meaning is extracted in accordance with a favorite practice of the Targumist.

2. Second of the two sons of Jada, and grandson of Judah, of the family of Judah; as his brother Jether died without issue, this branch of the line was continued through the sons of Jonathan (1 Chron. ii, 32, 33, B.C. considerably post 1612.

3. The eldest son of king Saul and the bosom friend of David (Josephus Antiq. vii, 6, 1). He first appears some time before the death of Saul (1 Sam. xvi, 2). If his younger brother Ishobadiah was forty at the time of Saul's death (2 Sam. i, 8), Jonathan must have been at least thirty when he is first mentioned. Of his own family we know nothing except the birth of his two sons (4 Kings ii, 8; 1 Chron. ii, 32). He is regarded in his father's lifetime as chief to the throne. Like Saul, he was a man of great strength and activity (2 Sam. i, 22), of which the exploit at Michmash was a proof. He was also famous for the peculiar martial exercises in which his tribe excelled—archery and slinging (1 Chron. xii, 2). His bow was to him what the speans to his father: "the bow of Jonathan turned not back" (2 Sam. 1, 29). It was always about himself (2 Sam. xvii, 4; xx, 35). It is through his relation with David that he is chiefly known to us, probably as related by his descendants at David's court. But there is a background, not so clearly given, of his relation with his father. From the time that he first appears he is Saul's son (1 Sam. xviii, 1). He had listened to the voice of his father's meals. As Abner and David seem to have occupied the places afterwards called the captains of the "host" and of the "guard," so he seems to have been (as Hushai afterwards) "the friend" (comp. 1 Sam. xx, 25; 2 Sam. xv, 37). The whole story implies, without expressing it, the close relationship of the two. It is a notable fact in life, that Jonathan can only go on his dangerous expedition (1 Sam. xiv, 1) by concealing it from Saul. Saul's vow is confirmed, and its tragic effect deepened, by his feeling for his son, "though it be Jonathan my son" (ibid. xiv, 20). "Tell me what thou hast done" (ibid. xiv, 40). Jonathan cannot bear to believe his father's error, to David: "My father will do nothing, great or small, but that he will show to me: and why should my father hide this thing from me? it is not so" (1 Sam. xx, 2). To him, if to any one, the wild frenzy of the king was amenable. The unspoken word was the voice of 1 Jonathan" (1 Sam. xix, 6). Their mutual affection was indeed interrupted by the growth of Saul's insanity. Twice the father would have sacrificed the son: once in consequence of his vow (1 Sam. xiv): the second time, more deliberately, on the discovery of David's flight; and on this occasion it is evident that his mind was grieved in a darker history. Were the phrases "son of a perverse rebellious woman"—"shame on thy mother's nakedness" (1 Sam. xx, 30, 31), mere frantic invectives? or was there something in the story of Ahinoam or Kishpah which we do not know? "In fierce anger" Jonathan left the royal presence (1 Sam. xix, 6), and the face of Saul would turn, in the father's decline, not with his son's rise, and "in death they were not divided" (2 Sam. i, 23; 1 Sam. xxiii, 16).

1. The first main part of his career is connected with the war with the Philistines, commonly called, from its locality, "the war of Michmash" (1 Sam. xiii, 21, Sept.), as the last years of the Ped-eponim's father's war were called, for a similar reason, "the war of Deceesea." In the previous war with the Ammonites (1 Sam. x, 4–15) there is no mention of him; and his abrupt appearance, without explanation, in xili, 2, may seem to imply that some part of the narrative has been lost. B.C. 1060. He is already of great importance in the state. Of the 3000 men of whom Saul's standing army was formed (xili, 2; xxiv, 2; xxvi, 1, 2), 1000 were under the command of Jonathan at Gibeah. The Philistines were still in the general command of the country; an officer was stationed at Geba, either the same as Jonathan's position or close to it. In a sudden act of youthful daring, as when Tell rose against Gesslar, or as in sacred history Moses rose against the Egyptian, Jonathan slew this officer (Auth. Ver. "garrison," Sept. τοῦ ἀνωτέρου, 1 Sam. xiii, 3, 4). See Ewald, ii, 478, and thus gave the signal for a general revolt. Saul took advantage of it, and the whole population rose. But it was a premature attempt. The Philistines poured in from the plain, and the tyranny became more deeply rooted than ever. See Saul. Saul and Jonathan (with their immediate attendants) alone had arms, whilst the general weakness and disarming of the rest of the people came to Gibeah, with a small body of 600 men, and as they looked down from that height on the misfortunes of their country, and of their native tribe especially, they went abut (Sept. ἀνατρέφει, 1 Sam. xiii, 16).

From this oppression, as Jonathan by his former act had borne the first to provoke it, so now he was the first to deliver his people. On the former occasion Saul had been equally with himself involved in the responsibility of the deed. Saul "blew the trumpet;" Saul had "smitten the officer of the Philistines" (xili, 4). But now it would seem that Jonathan was resolved to undertake the whole risk himself. "The day," the day fixed by him (Sept. τὸν ἡμέραν τῆς Μαγγίας, 1 Sam. xiv, 1) approached; and without communicating his project to any one, except the young man, whom, like all the chiefs of that age, he retained as his armor-bearer, he sallied forth from Gibeah to attack the garrison of the Philistines stationed on the other side of the steep defile of Michmash. He fought by himself; and probably the ancient and peculiar spirit of the Israelitish warrior: "Come, and let us go over unto the garrison of these uncircumcised; it may be that Jehovah will work for us; for there is no restraint to Jehovah to save by many or by few. The answer is no less characteristic of the pride of the close relationship of the two, than it is of the zeal that afterwards sprang up between Jonathan and David. "Do all that is in thine heart; . . . behold, I am with thee, as thy heart is my heart (Sept., 1 Sam. xiv, 7)." After the manner of the time (and the more, probably, from having taken no counsel of the high-priest or any prophet before his departure), Jonathan proposed to draw an omen for their course from the conduct of the enemy. If the garrison, on seeing them, gave intimations of descending upon them, they would remain in the valley; if, on the other hand, they raised a challenge to advance, they would accept it. The latter event not to be the business of the two warriors from behind the rocks was taken by the Philistines as a furtive apparence of the Hebrews coming forth out of the holes where they had hid themselves; and they were welcomed with a scoffing invective (Sept. υποχείρωτας, afterwards offered to David). "Come up, and we will show you a thing" (xiv, 4–13). Jonathan immediately took them at their word. Strong and active as he was, "strong as a lion, and swift as an eagle" (2 Sam. i, 23), he was fully equal to the adventure of climbing on his hands and feet up the steep rock and on the face of it at the hour when his father's heart was thus in the extremity of his, with his armor-bearer behind him, they both, after the manner of their tribe (1 Chron. xii, 2), discharged a flight of arrows, stones, and pebbles from their bows, cross-bows, and slings, with such effect that twenty men fell at the first onset. A panic seized the garrison, thence spread to the camp, and led to the surrounding horde of marauders: an earthquake combined with the terror of the moment; the confusion increased; the Israelites who had been taken slaves by the Philistines during the last three days (Sept. rose in mutiny: the Israelites who lay hid in the numerous caverns and deep holes in which the rocks of the neighborhood abound, sprang out of their subterranean dwellings. Saul and his little band had watched in astonishment the wild retreat from the heights of Gibeah; he now joined in the pursuit, which led him heedling after the fugitives, over the rugged plateau of Bethel, and down the pass of Beth-horon to Ajalon (xiv, 15–31).

See GIBEAH. The father and son had not met on that day: Saul only conjectured his son's absence from not finding him when he numbered the people. Jonathan had not heard of the rash curse (xiv, 24) which Saul invoked on any one who stood before the evildoer. In the din and darkness (Hebrew, 1 Sam. xiv, 27) that came on after his desperate exertions, he put forth the staff which apparently had (with his sling and bow) been his chief weapon, and tasted the honey which lay on the ground as they passed through the forest. The pursuers in general were driven back; one man fled even from the presence of the pursuers in the silence of fear of the royal curse; but the moment that the day, with its enforced fast, was over, they flew, like Muslims at sunset during the fast of Ramadan, on the captured cattle, and devouried them, even to the brutal neglect of the law which forbade the desecration of the fresh carcases with the blood thereof (xii). The law Saul endeavored to prevent and to expiate by erecting a large stone, which served both as a rude table and as an altar; the first altar that was raised under the monarchy. It was in the dead of night, after this wild revel was over, that he proposed that the pursuit should be continued till dawn; and then, when the silence of the oracle of the high-priest indicated that something had occurred to intercept the divine favor, the lot was tried, and Jonathan appeared as the culprit. Jephthah's dreadful sacrifice would have been repeated; but the people interposed in behalf of the hero of that grief, and his life was saved. See Judges i, 46, 47.

2. But the chief interest of Jonathan's career is derived from the friendship with David, which began on the day of David's return from the victory over the champion of Gath, and continued till his death. It is the first Biblical instance of a romantic friendship, such as we find1 among the heroes of Greece, and has been since copied in Christendom; and is remarkable both as giving its sanction to these, and as filling with a pathos of its own, which has been imitated, but never surpassed, in modern works of fiction. "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul."—"Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women" (1 Sam. xvi, 1; 2 Sam. i, 26). Each found in each the affection that he found not in his own family; no jealousy of rivalry between the two, as claimants for the same throne, ever interposed: "Thou shalt be king in Israel, and I shall be next unto thee"(5 Sam. xxi, 7). The friendship was soon called into trial by the insane rage of his father against David. He interceded for his life, at first with success (1 Sam. xix, 1-7). Then the madness returned, and David fled. It was in a secret interview during this flight, by the stone of Ezel, that the second covenant was made between the two friends; now that more binding kind, and having to the mutual posterity—Jonathan laying such emphasis on this portion of the compact as almost to suggest the belief of a slight misgiving on his part of David's future conduct in this respect. It is this interview which brings out the character of Jonathan in the liveliest colors. His little articles of love for both his father and his friend—his bitter disappointment at his father's unmanageable fury—his familiar sport of archery. With passionate embraces and tears the two friends parted, B.C. cir. 1062, to meet only once more (1 Sam. xx). Their subsequent meeting was on the borders of Zeph, during Saul's pursuit of David. Jonathan's alarm for his friend's life is now changed into a confidence that he will escape: "He strengthened his hand in God." Finally, and for the third time, they renewed the covenant, and then parted forever (1 Sam. xxxii, 16-18). B.C. cir. 1052.

From this time forth we hear no more till the battle of Gilboa. In that battle he fell, with his two brothers and his father, and his corps shared their fate (1 Sam. xxxi, 2, 8). B.C. 1053. His remains were buried first at Jabesh-Gilead (ib. 19), but afterwards removed with those of his father to Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxii, 12). The news of his death occasioned the celebrated elegy of David, in which, as the friend, he naturally occupies the chief place (2 Sam. i, 22, 23, 25, 26), and which seems to have been sung in the education of the archers of Judah, in commemoration of the one great archer, Jonathan. "He had them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow" (2 Sam. i, 17, 18).

Jonathan left one son, aged five years old at the time of his death (2 Sam. iv, 4), to whom he had probably given his original name of Merib-baal, afterwards changed for Mephibosheth (comp. 1 Chron. viii, 34; ix, 40). See Mephiboseth. Through him the line of descendants was continued down to the time of Ezra (1 Chron. ix, 40), and even then their great ancestor's archery was practised among them. See David.

4. Son of Shage, a relative of Ahiam, both among David's famous warriors and descendants of Jashen of the mountains of Judah (2 Sam. xxiii, 32; 1 Chron. xi, 34). See B.C. cir. 1000.

5. Son of the high-priest Abiathar, and one of the adherents to David's cause during the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. xxv, 27, 36). He remained at En-rogel under pretext of procuring water, and reported to his master the proceedings in the camp of the insurgents (2 Sam. xv, 20-38; 1 Chron. xxvii, 20; Josephus, Ant. vii, 8, 2). B.C. cir. 1023. At a later date his constancy was manifested on a similar occasion by announcing to the ambitious Adonijah the forestalling of his measures by the succession of Solomon (1 Kings i, 42, 43). B.C. cir. 1013.

"On both occasions it may be remarked that he appears as the swift and trusty messenger. He is the last descendant of Eli of whom we anything" (Smith). See David.

6. Son of Shammah (Shimeah or Shimea), and David's nephew, as well as one of his chief warriors, a position which he earned by slaying a gigantic relative of Goliath (1 Sam. xvii, 7; Josephus, Ant. vii, 12, 12). B.C. 1018. He was also made secretary of the royal cabinet (1 Chron. xxxvii, 32, where סוחי is mistaken in the Auth. Vers. for the usual sense of "uncle"). B.C. 1014. "Jerome (Quast. Hebr. on 1 Sam. xvii, 12) conjectures that this was Nathan the prophet, thus making up the eighth son, not named in 1 Chron. ii, 13-15. But this is not probable" (Smith).

7. Son of Uzziah, and steward of the agricultural revenue of David (1 Chron. xxvii, 25; Heb. and A.V. "Jehonathan").

8. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to aid in teaching the Law to the people (1 Chron. xvii, 8; Heb. and A.V. "Jehoshaphat").

9. A scribe whose house was converted into a prison in which Jeremiah was closely confined (Jer. xxvi, 13, 20; xxxviii, 26). B.C. 589.

10. Baron of Johanan, the son of Kareah, and associated with him in his intercourse with Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor of Jerusalem (Jer. xi, 9). B.C. 587.

11. Son of Shemaijah and priest contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. xii, 18; Heb. and A.V. "Jehonathan").

12. Son of Melic and priest contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. xii, 14). B.C. between 536 and 459.

13. Father of Ebed, which latter was an Israelite of the "sons" of Adin that returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii, 9) at the head of fifty males, a number which is increased to 290 in 1 Esdr. viii, 22. Where Jonathan is written יואו נבשכ. B.C. ante 459.

14. Son of Asshkel, a chief Israelite associated with Jahaziah in separating the returned exiles from their Gentile wives (Ezra x, 15). B.C. 439.

15. Son of Joiada and father of Jaddua, Jewish high-priest (Neh. xii, 11); elsewhere called Johanan (Neh. xii, 22), and apparently John by Josephus, who relates his assassination of his own brother Jesus in the Temple (Joi. vii, 1, 7 and 2). Jonathan, or John, was high-priest for thirty-two years, according to Eusebius and the Alexandrin. Chron. (Selden, De Success. in Temp. cap. vii, Jordan: in Temple-Work).

16. Son of Shemaijah, of the family of Asaph, and father of Zechariah, which last was one of the priests appointed to flourish the trumpets as the procession moved around the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 35).

17. A son of Mattathias, and leader of the Jews in their war of independence after the death of his brother Judas Maccabaeus, B.C. 161 (1 Macc. xiv, 19 sq.). —Smith. See Maccabees.

18. A son of Absalom (1 Macc. viii, 11); and by Simon with a force to occupy Joppa, which was already in the hands of the Jews (1 Macc. xii, 33), though probably held only by a weak garrison. Jonathan expelled the inhabitants (רְאוּךְ בְּאָרָא עַיָּרָה; comp. Josephus, Αντ. xiii, 6, 8) and secured the city. Jonathan was probably a brother of Mattathias (2) (1 Macc. xi, 70).

19. A priest who is said to have offered up a solemn prayer on the occasion of the sacrifice made by Nebu-heimah after the recovery of the sacred fire (2 Macc. i, 23 sq.); compare Ewald, Gesch. d. V. Ir. iv, 184 sq.). The narrative is interesting; as it presents a singular example of the combination of public prayer with sacrifice (Grimm, in Arch. f. Lit. i. c. C. L.).

20. A Sadducee at whose instigation Hyrcanus (q.
*) abandoned the Pharisees for their mild sentence against his maligner Eleazar (Josephus, Αντ. xiii, 10, 6).

21. Son of Ananus, appointed Jewish high-priest, A.
D. 36, by Vitellius in place of Joseph Caiphas (Αντ. xviii, 4, 2), and deposed after two years, when his brother Theophilus succeeded him (5, 5, 2). He was reappointed by Agrippa A.D. 43, but this time he declined that honor in favor of his brother Matthias (Josephus, Αντ. xix, 6, 4); he was sent by Cumanus to Claudius in a quarrel with the Samaritans, but appears to have been released by the emperor (War, ii, 12, 6 and 7); he was at last murdered by the Sicarii (War, ii, 13, 5). He was perhaps the high-priest whom Felix caused to be assassinated for his reproves of his bad government (Josephus, Αντ. xx, 8, 5). (See Franke, Monatsschrift, i, 589; Graetz, Gesch. der Juden, iii, 263, 287, 557.) See HIGH-PRIEST.

22. A common weaver, leader of the Sicarii in Cyrene, captured and put to death by the Romans after various adventures (Josephus, War, vii, 11, 12).

23. A Jew who challenged the Romans to single combat during the last siege, and, after slaying one combatant, Pudens, was at length killed by Pricus (Josephus, War, vii, 12).

Jonathan ben-Uzziel, the celebrated translator of the Hebrew prophetic writings into Chaldee, a disciple of Hillel I, one of the first of those thirty disciples of Hillel who, in the language of the Talmud, "were worthy to possess the power of stopping the sun like Joshua," flourished about B.C. 30. His expositions were especially on Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, a fanciful reason for which is given in the Talmud: "When the illuminating sun arose upon the dark passages of the prophets, through this translation, and breadth of Palestine where these prophets are rooted, (תַּנִּית בְּאָרָא) the voice of the people (vox populi vox dei) was heard asking, 'Who has disclosed these mysteries to the sons of men? With great humility and becoming modesty Jonathan b.-Uzziel answered, 'I have disclosed the mysteries; but thou, O Lord, knowest that I have not done it to get glory for myself, or for the house of my father, but for thy glory's sake, that discourses might not not in Israel'" (Megill. 3, a). From these notices in the Talmud, it is manifest that Jonathan was only the Chaldee translator of the prophets; for it is distinctly declared in the last quoted passage that when Jonathan wished also to translate the His-grama (חִסְגֹּרַחֹמַר), the same voice from heaven (חָגֵרְךָ דְבָּרֵן) emphatically forbade it (יִהְיֶה), because of the great Messianic mysteries contained therein (יָאָסֵי מְשֶׁאָס). So Daniel (comp. Raishi in loco). But tradition has also ascer-ted to him the paraphrase of the Pentateuch known under the name of Pseudo-Jonathan and the Targum of theive Megillota.

The question of the authorship of the paraphrases will be treated in full in the article TARGUM (q. v.). We are, however, content for a few points in the discus-section, and will mainly speak of the work which is general fastened upon him. Firstly, then, as to this Paraphrase of the Prophets which embraces Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets, i.e. its importance is not only great because it contains expositions of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, but mainly so because, dating, as it does, from a period when the Hebrew language gave place to the Aramaic dialect, and when ancient Jewish and Phoenician dia-literal expositions were introduced in the paraphrases read during the divine services of the Jewish people, it contains very many ancient readings, which go far to explain many an obscure passage in the prophetical writings, and is also marked by false criticism and loose conjectures. A list of these various paraphrases has been collected in the Hebrew annual entitled תניה (Len-burg, 1852), i, 109 sq. The paraphrase was first publicated in 1494, and afterwards with that of Onkelos on the Pentateuch (Venice). It is found in all the Rabic Bibles; also in Walton's Biblioth Poligl. (ii, iii, and iv), and in Buxtorf's Bibli Hebraea (Basle, 1720, ii-iv), etc., with a Latin translation.

As to the other reputed writings of Jonathan, we have
(a) the Paraphrase on the Pentateuch (יִדְרֵשׁ מְדִים לְלִחְדַּרְתוֹן; see above); it is nothing more or less than a completed version of what is called the Jerusalem or Palestine Targum (תָּרָעְא מְדִים לְלִחְדַּרְתוֹן), which of itself is in reality but desultory glosses on Onkelos' paraphrase.
This completed version was at first called Targum Jerualem, after the fragment on which it was based, but aferwards it obtained the name of Targum Jonathan and was erroneously resolving the abbreviation יִדְרֵשׁ מְדִים לְלִחְדַּרְתוֹן into ידְרֵשׁ מְדִים לְלַחְדַּרְתּוֹן.

The additions to the work were probably not made prior to the seventh century. The work was first published in Venice 1590-91, with the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch, the paraphrase of Onkelos, the fragments of the Jerusalem glosses, the commentaries of Rashi and Jacob ben-Ascher, then in Basle (1497), Hanau (1614), Amsterdam (1640), Prague (1646), etc., and has lately been printed, with a commentary, in the beautiful edition of the Pentateuch with the Rabbinic commentaries (Vienna, 1869). Explana dations of it were also written by David b.-Jacob (Prague, 1609), Feivel b.-David Secherja (Hanau, 1614), Monte-cel Kremisen (Hanau, 1617), and others, and it was translated into Latin by Chevalier, in Walton's Polyglott.
An English translation was published by the late learned Wesleyan preacher, J. W. Etheridge (Lond. 1862, 2 vols.
8vo); but the masterly treatises on this Pseudo-Jonathan are by Bähr, Rosenmüller, Oesterley, and others.
Zeit.

The translation into Latin by Chevalier, in Walton's Polyglott.

A few early critics have attributed this work to Mar Jec-sef, of Sora (died 382), but of late it is assigned to a later period even than the paraphrase of the Pentateuch, and is considered simply a compilation from ancient materials made by several individuals. This version is generally published, together with the Hebrew text, in the Jewish editions of the Pentateuch, and is contained in all the Rabbinic Bibles. A rhymed version of the whole of this paraphrase was published by Jacob ben-Samuel, also called Koppelman ben-Bonem (about 1584). A Latin version of it is given in Walton's Polyglott. It has been again set out in a more lete paraphrase of the Song of Songs (Com-tent. on the Song, 1728); and Dr. Ginsburg has lately translated the first chapter of the paraphrase of the Song (Comment. on the Song, p. 29 sq.) and the whole of Ecclesiastes (Comment. on Eccles., p. 560 sq.). Hebrew commentaries on the entire paraphrase have been pub-declor Lorc (Cracow, 1880) and Chajim Feivel (Berlin, 1705). See also Bartolocci, Biblioth. Magna Rabbincia,

Jones, Benjamin (1), an early Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in South Carolina about 1774; entered the itinerancy in 1801; was stationed at Charleston in 1802; and died suddenly on Baden Circuit in 1804. He was a man of much seriousness and Christian gentleness, and a very useful preacher.—Conf. Minis., i, 125. (G. L. T.)

Jones, Benjamin (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Sandwich, Mass., July 28, 1786; united with the Church in 1806; entered the New York Conference in 1809; was made presiding elder in 1820; was a delegate to the General Conference in 1844; was by poor health superannuated in 1846; and died at Lincolnsville, Me., July 18, 1850, aged 64. Mr. Jones was a man of more than ordinary ability and influence. His preaching was bold, sustained, and independent; dealing in truthful logic and the word of God rather than fancy, and very strong in argument. His efforts were often eloquent in the highest degree.—Conf. Min., iv, 606; Stevens, Memorials of Methodism, chap. xiii. (G. L. T.)

Jones, Charles Colcock, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Liberty Hall, Ga., Dec. 20, 1804. While yet a youth he entered a large counting-house in Savannah, Ga., but when converted, in his 24th year, he decided to quit mercantile life and enter the ministry. He prepared for college at Phillips Academy, then entered Andover Seminary, and later the theological seminary at Princeton. He was licensed in 1830 by the New Brunswick Presbytery at Allentown, New Jersey, and returned to Georgia in the autumn, and shortly afterwards became missionary to the negroes of Liberty County, Ga. He soon became interested in the colored race, and during the remainder of his life sought by extensive correspondence, by his annual reports as a missionary, and by all other means in his power, to engage the colored people in the Christian faith. The condition of this class of our population. In 1833 he was elected professor of Church history and polyline in the seminary at Columbia, and after having been earnestly urged to accept the chair, on the plea that he might then there continue to work for the colored people, by inciting the students to engage with him in the work, he accepted the position in 1836. But he felt restless in his new place, and in 1838 returned again to his former work. In 1847 he was re-elected to the professorship, and again prevailed upon to accept the professorship, and he continued in it until 1838. In 1840 he removed from Georgia to return to Georgia. During the Rebellion he attached himself to the Southern cause. But his health was too feeble to permit much exertion, for he suffered from consumption. He died March 10, 1863. (Dr. Jones delivered a large part of the esteem and affection of the Church of God. As a man there was decision and energy of character, united with great friendliness of heart, cheerfulness of disposition, activity of mind, and ease and polish of manners. Few equalled him in all that makes up the ease and polish of the Christian gentleman. As a preacher there was much that was attractive in his appearance and manner. A delightful simplicity, ease, and unctious pervaded his happiest efforts." Dr. Jones published the ministerial work of Scripture Doctrine and Practice:—Catechism on the Creed;—Hist. Catechism of the O. and N. T.; besides several pamphlets on the Religious Instr. of the Negro. His Catechism of Scripture Doctrine and Practice was extensively used, and was found so serviceable to missionaries generally that it was translated into several languages, and was much commended for the instruction of the heathen. He also began a History of the Church of God, which he did not live to complete (it was published by Scriber). See Wilson, Presb. Hist. America, 1867, p. 438. (J. H. W.)

Jones, Cornelius, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hinsdale, Mass., May 20, 1800; was converted in Geauga Co., Ohio, Feb. 12, 1811; he entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1827; and died at Alleghanytown, Aug. 27, 1835. He was a diligent student, an able minister, and a successful evangelist.—Conference Minutes, ii. 483.

Jones, David (1), a Baptist minister, was born in White Clay Creek Hundred, New Castle Co., Del., May 12, 1774. He was determined to improve his education, which had been somewhat neglected. He entered Hopewell School, and remained there three years, eagerly pursuing the study of the classic languages. In 1761 he became a licticate, and was regularly ordained pastor in 1767 to the church at Freehold, Monmouth Co., New Jersey. In 1772 he removed to enter upon the missionary work among the Indians in Ohio. But he failed so utterly in these efforts that after the lapse of two years he returned again to his former charge. In the Revolutionary War he served as chaplain, and was a member of the regular work of the ministry at the close of the war. In 1786 he became pastor at Southampton, Pa. In 1794 he again entered the army, this time at the special request of General Wayne. He also served as chaplain during the War of 1812. He died in Chester Co., Pa., Feb. 5, 1820. See Sprague, Annae Am. Pulpit, vi, 85 sq.

Jones, David (2), another Baptist minister, was born in the north of Wales in April, 1785. He united with the Independent Church when about fifteen years old. Shortly after he emigrated to this country, and lived in Ohio. After a stay of two years among the Baptists, who were thickly settled in that immediate vicinity, he joined their Church, and was licensed to preach. He accepted a call to the Beaver Creek Baptist Church, teaching at the same time. From 1810 to 1813 he had no settled charge, and he travelled through several of the middle and border states, preaching from place to place. In 1813 he went to Newark, New Jersey, where, in 1814, he was the pastor of a church. He assumed the pastorate of the Baptist Church at "Low- ler Dublin," near Philadelphia, where he had preached occasionally before his departure for Newark. With these people he spent the remainder of his life. He died April 25, 1850, being the author of a tract on Baptism, entitled Letters of David and John, and wrote also the tract Salvation by Grace, published by the Baptist General Tract Society. See Sprague, Annae Am. Pulpit, vi, 518 sq.

Jones, Greenbury R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Brownsville, Pa., April 7, 1784; was converted in August, 1805; entered the itineracy on Baptism, entitled Letters of David and John, and wrote also the tract Salvation by Grace, published by the Baptist General Tract Society. See Sprague, Annae Am. Pulpit, vi, 518 sq.

Jones, Griffith, a Welsh divine, generally known as the Welsh Apostle, was born at Killrediis, Caernarthenshire, in 1864. His parents, who were eminently pious, took great pains to imbue the mind of their son from his earliest years with impressions of piety and religion. The serious turn which they gave to his mind inclined him towards the Christian ministry. At the completion of his theological studies he was ordained by bishop Bull, Sept. 17, 1706, and shortly after appointed to the rectory of Llanddowror by Sir John Phillips, whose own religious character made him wish to secure the services of a man of piety and learning like Jones. "In this situation," says Middleton (Evangelical Biography, s. v.), "he soon developed all the best qualities of a man of God, and a most eloquent and evangelical preacher. Christ was all to him; and it was his greatest delight to publish and exalt the wondrous riches of his Redeemer's righteousness. Nor was he less blessed in his private plans of doing good. He founded among his countrymen free schools, and by this means more than a hundred and fifty thousand poor people were taught to read. He also circulated thirty thousand hand copies of the Welsh Bible among them, besides other religious and useful books. His humility gave lustre to all these labors of love. On his dying bed he said, 'I must bear witness to the goodness of God to me. Blessed be God, his comforts fill my soul.' He died in April, 1830. It may be truly said of Griffith Jones that few lives were more heavenly and useful, and few deaths more triumphant." Jones also wrote and published several religious treatises in Welsh and English, of which many thousands were distributed as had been the Bible. See Jamieson, Cyclop. Relig. Biog. p. 289; Allibone, Dict. Engl. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Jones, Horatio Gates (son of David Jones, 1), also a Baptist minister, was born at Easttown, Chester County, Pa., Feb. 11, 1777. His early education was quite thorough, and remarkably so for a young man destined for agricultural life. Gifted with great fluency of speech, young Jones became "the politician" of his own immediate vicinity, and before he had reached his majority enjoyed the prospect of preferment in political life. Just about this time he became conscious, however, of his responsibility to his Maker, and, believing himself to have been the subject of spiritual renovation, he made public declaration of his belief, June 24, 1796, and determined to devote his life to the Christian ministry. He was licensed Sept. 28, 1814, and was ordained to Salem, New Jersey, Feb. 18, 1820. In 1805 his health became enfeebled, and he was obliged to resign, however reluctantly, the charge. Hereafter he devoted himself to farm life on a place which he bought on the banks of the Schuylkill River, about five miles above Philadelphia. But Jones had engaged too heartily in the cause of his Master not to be tempted to re-enter the work of the Christian ministry whenever his health should warrant the task. At first he went to different places from time to time and preached; finally he made the "Philadelphia Home Mission" at Lower Merion, Montgomery County, belonging to the Presbyterians, his head-quarters, and he succeeded, after several years of ardent labor, in building up there a Baptist Church, which he served until the end of his earthly days, Dec. 12, 1865. Mr. Jones held a prominent position in the Board of trustees of the Philadelphia Baptist Association, and was at one time its treasurer. He was a member of the Board of Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania, and was at one time its chancellor. This high school conferred on him the degree of D.D. The degree of M.A. he received from Brown University in 1812. He was also a member of the Baptist Board of Missions, and was at one time (1829) president of the Philadelphia Baptist Association. He published a History in 1823, and held a co-editorship of the Letter-day Luminary, an early Baptist missionary magazine. Indeed, we are told that "few men of his day have written so much and so well, and published so little." See Sprague, Annals Am. Pulpit, vi, 492 sq.

JONES, Jeremiah, a learned English dissenting minister, was born, as is supposed, of parents in opulent circumstances, in the north of England, in 1698. After finishing his education under the tuition of Samuel Jones of Tewksbury, who was also the tutor of Chandler, But- ler, Secker, and many other distinguished divines, he became minister of a congregation at Forest Green, in Gloucestershire, where he also kept an academy. He died in 1734. His works are as follows: A Vindica- tion of the former Part of the Gospel by Matthew from Mr. Whitton's Charge of Dialoogation, etc. (London, 1719, 8vo); Salop, 1721, 8vo, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1808; —also, A new and full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament (London, 1726, 2 vols. 8vo); vol. iii, 1727, 8vo; Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1798, 3 vols, 8vo, and since. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. (Lon- don); Gentleman's Magazine, vol. xxiii; Monthly Maga- zine, April, 1808; Allibone, Dict. of English and Ameri- can Authors, ii, 988.

JONES, Joel, a celebrated lay writer on theological subjects, and jurist by profession, was born of Puritan ancestry at Stratford, Conn., Oct. 26, 1755, and educated at Yale College, where he graduated in 1777. He was one of the judges of the Philadelphia District Court, and later mayor of Philadelphia. In 1848 he was elected president of Girard College, and he held that position for two years. He died Feb. 3, 1860. Distan- guished for his services in legal abilities, Jones deserved a place in our work on account of his extensive re- searches in the Biblical department. His acquirements extended far beyond the widest range of professional attain- ment. Judge Jones wrote extensively for literary journals and quarterly; he also published largely. Of special interest to the theological student are, Story of Joseph, or Patriarchal Age (originally published for the use of Girard College students): The Knowledge of One Another in the Future State: Notes on Scripture (published by his widow, Phila. 1860). He also edited several English works on Prophecy, which he published under the title of Liberale (5 vols. 8vo), enriched with many valuable additions of his own, and translated from the French, Outlines of a History of the Court of Rome and of the Temporal Power of the Popes (to which he appended many original notes). Judge Jones was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, and held pos- itions in various ecclesiastical boards, where his services were greatly prized. See Princeton Review, Index, ii, 219 sq.

JONES, John (1), an English Roman Catholic theo- logian, was born at London in 1675. He studied at St. John's College, Oxford, where he roomed with Laud, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. Having turned Roman Catholic, he went to Spain, completed his stud- ies at the University of Compostella, and became a Benedictine under the name of Lermani a Santen- Martino. After teaching for a while Hebrew and theology in the College of St. Vedast, he returned to England to invite him to the establishment of a college in Lon- don, Dec. 17, 1636. He wrote Sacra Ars Memorialis, or Scripturas divinas in promptu habendor accommodata (Douay, 1623, 8vo)—Concilii locorum communem totius Scripturis (Douay, 1625, 8vo). He also publish- ed some editions of the Bible, with interlinear glosses (9 vols. fol.); of the works of Biosinius; of Arnohe, Adscensis, and Tindes (Douay, 1634); and worked with P. Reynier on the Apostolicae Benedictinorum. See Wood, Athenae Ox- honiensis, vol. i; Dodd, Ch. History; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Insulaires, xxvi, 905. (J.N.P.)

JONES, John (2), an English Protestant divine, was born in 1700. He was educated at Worcester College, Oxford, and was admitted a fellow in 1726. He became vicar of Acombury, he resigned in 1751, to take the rectory of Boule Hurst, Bedfordshire. His death was caused by a fall from his horse; the time of its occurrence is not recorded. He wrote: Anon.] Free and candid Discip- linations relating to the Church of England, etc. (London 1748, 50, 8vo): this work produced a great controversy, last- ing in 1749 Anon. [Cursus Anaemdato, and Candid Discipulations," etc. (London. 1758, 8vo): —Catho- lical Faith and Practice (1765). See Nichols, Literary Anecdotcs: London, Gentil. Magazine, i, xxii, pt. i, p. 510 sq.; Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Am. Auth. ii, 9.

JONES, John (3), L.L.D., a Welsh Sociocian divine and philological writer, was born in Caerseathenshire, and educated at the Unitarian New College, Hackney. In 1797 he became a matirical teacher in the Welsh Academy, Swansea, which situation he held about three years, and then settled at Plymouth Dock over the Unitarian congregation. In 1797 he became minister of the Unitarian congregation at Halifax, in Yorkshire, and about 1800 he removed to London, where he resided during the remainder of his life, chiefly occupied as a classical teacher, and teaching only occasionally. He died January 10, 1827. A few years before his death he received the diploma of L.L.D. from the University of Aberdeen. Dr. Jones was the author of several works, some of which are re- ligious and some of which are of an erudite or critical sort or defence of Christianity. Of these the most important are Illustra- tions of the Four Gospels, founded on circumstances peculiar to our Lord and the Evangelists (London. 1808, 8vo): —Ecclesiastical Researches, or Philo and Josephus proved to be historians and apologists of Christianity (London, 1818, 1 vol. 8vo); —Epistle to the Ro- mans analyzed (1802, 8vo); —New Version of the Epis- toles to the Colossians, Thessalonians, Timothy, Titus, and the general Epistle of James (1819-20, 12mo); —New Ver- sion of the first three Chapters of Genesis (1819, 8vo). He also wrote a number of philological works which are considered valuable. It may not be out of place here to state that Dr. Jones was the first English philologist who taught Greek by the medium of the English instead of the Latin. See Lond. Gentil. Mag. April, 1827; Eng. Cyclop. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Am. Auth. i, 573.

JONES, John M., a Methodist Episcopal minister and native of England, was born about 1810. He was educated a Romanist in France, and while young emigrated first to Canada and then to Maryland, where he was a teacher in a Roman institution in St. George's County. He was converted to Protestantism in 1834, and entered the Presbyterian Church, and “for twenty years pursued the ministerial calling, laboring day and night with quenchless zeal to rescue souls from death.” He died at South Baltimore Station April 20, 1855. He was "a man of rare excellence and many virtues," of deep piety, and an able and de- voted minister. —Conf. Minutes, vi, 201. (L.T.)

JONES, J. Taylor, D.D., a Baptist missionary, was born at New Ipswich, N. H., July 16, 1802. He graduated at Amherst College in 1825; studied theology at Andover and Newton Seminary; and, having joined the Baptist Church in 1828, was the following year ap- pointed a missionary to Burmah. He arrived at Madra- main, his destined place of labor, in Feb., 1832, and after having mastered the Teling and Siamese languages, he was chosen to go to the kingdom of Siam, and reached Bangkok in April, 1833. After a successful mission, he left Siam in 1839, on account of his children, went to Singapore, and thence on a visit to the United States. After returning to Siam for six years he came home again in 1846, and in the fall of 1847 went away for the last time. He died at Bankok Sept. 13, 1851. The de- gree of D.D. was conferred upon him a few years before his death. Dr. Jones published three tracts in Siem- ese, 1834; and a translation of the New Testament in the same tongue, 1835. These works, and especially the says of Dr. Jones's qualifications for the missionary work, "Take him altogether, I have never seen his equal; and among more than a hundred men I have met among the heathen, I would select Dr. Jones as the model missionary."—Sprague, Anna's Am. M. Pulpit, vii. 772.

JONES, Joseph Huntington, D.D., an able Presbyterian minister, and brother of judge Joel (see above), was born at Coventry, Conn., Aug. 24, 1737, and graduated at Yale College in 1757. About the same time at Bowdoin College, he decided on the ministry for his life-work, and entered Princeton Theological Seminary. His first charge he entered June 1, 1824, at Woodbury, New Jersey. The year following, after a most successful work on the small and feeble charge, he was called to New Brunswick, New Jersey, and was installed the second Wednesday of July, 1825. In 1838 he removed to Philadelphia, to take charge of the Sixth Presbyterian Church in that city, and he continued his relation there for twenty-three years. "Beginning with a church reduced to so low that a resuscitation was deemed well-nigh impossible, and struggling with difficulties that would have discouraged ordinary men, a manly blessing crowned his efforts." In 1861, finding that the secretarial committee of the college on the "fund for disabled ministers," etc., which he had filled nearly for seven years in connection with his pastoral duties, found itself generous enough in its duties, he resigned his position as pastor, and devoted himself hereafter entirely to this noble cause of providing for those of his brethren who were in need of assistance. He died Dec. 22, 1868, in the midst of his work, "suddenly, as it were with the harness off." He was buried in Princeton College cemetery, with the degree of D.D. Dr. Jones published Revivals of Religion (Philadelphia, 1839):—Effects of Physical Causes on Christian Experience (1846, and often, 18mo):—Memor of the Rev. Ashbel Green, D.D. (N. Y., 1849, 8vo):—History of the Brethren at New Brunswick in 1871; and several of his sermons and essays.—Princeton Review, Index, vol. ii, 722 sq.

JONES, Lot, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Brunswick, Maine, Feb. 21, 1797, and was educated at Bowdoin College, Maine, where he graduated in 1821. Joining the Protestant Episcopal Church, he studied for the ministry under bishop Griswold, and was by him ordained deacon January 19, 1823, and priest September 1823. In 1823 he was settled at Marblehead and Marshfield, Mass., in 1827 at Macon, Ga.; in 1827 at Savannah; in 1827 at Gardiner, Maine; in 1829 at South Leicester, Mass.; and in January 1838, he removed to New York, and took charge of the new mission church of the Episcopalians. By humility, single-hearted devotion to his one great work, and untried industry, made his ministry remarkably effective. In 1858 he published his 25th anniversary discourse. During those 25 years he baptized 2,001—255 adults and 1,948 children; married 728 couples presented 915 for confirmation, enrolled 1494 as communicants, and attended 1362 funerals. He died in Philadelphia Oct. 12, 1865. His death was the result of accident in falling upon the pavement at St. Luke's Church, where he was in attendance upon the meeting of the Board of Missions.—Church Review, Jan. 1866, p. 565.

JONES, Robert C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Petersburg, Va., Dec. 23, 1808. He graduated at William and Mary's College in 1828, studied law and was ready for practice, when he was converted in 1838, and at once prepared for the ministry. He entered the Virginia Conference in 1836, and died Aug. 2, 1838. Mr. Jones was a man of good abilities, much modesty, and a consistent witness of sanctifying grace. He was a dignified and conscientious minister, and a very successful evangelist.—Conf. Minutes, ii, 667.

JONES, Samuel, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Glastonbury, South Wales, Jan. 14, 1735, and was brought by his parents to this country during his infancy. He was educated at Harvard College, and at Cambridge, where he received the degree of M.A. May 18, 1762, and turned his attention to the study of theology. He was ordained in January, 1763, and became pastor of the united churches of Pennepek and Southampton. In the same year he, by request, remodeled the charter of the college in Newport, R. I., which institution afterwards became Brown University. In 1770 he resigned the pastorate of the South Baptist Church, and devoted himself thereafter to that of Pennepek, afterwards called Lower Dublin. He received the honorary degree of M.A. from the College of Rhode Island in 1769, and that of D.D. from the College of Pennsylvania in 1786. While attending faithfully to his ministerial labors, he so devoted much of his time to the labors of the press, which he was so successful. He died Feb. 7, 1814. Dr. Jones made several compilations for divers associations in which he filled high offices, and published some occasional sermons.—Sprague, Anna's, vi, 104 sq.

JONES, Thomas, an English divine, was born in 1729, and educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. He was chaplain at St. Savior's, Southwark, and is noted for his deep piety and great exertions in behalf of the conversion of the masses at a time when the English pulpit was in that deep lethargy from which Wesley and his coadjutors first earnestly aroused it. Like the Wesleyan, he met with much opposition in his noble efforts, and "his sweetness of natural temper," says his biographer, "greatness of soul, would never have been depressed under the numberless insults he met with had it not been strengthened, as well as adorned, by a sublimer influence." His health finally gave way under his extraordinary labors, and he died, while yet a young man, in 1761.—Middleton, Evans, Biog. iv, 880.

JONES, William, M.A., F.R.S., of Nayland, as he is generally called, was born at Lowick, in Northamptonshire, July 28, 1706. He was educated at the Charter House and University College, Oxford. He there became a convert to the philosophy of Hutchinson, and, having induced Mr. Horne, afterwards bishop of Norwich, to adopt the same system, together they became the principal champions of that philosophy. He was admitted to deacon's orders after having received the degree of B.A., in 1749. In 1751 he was ordained priest by the bishop of Lincoln, and on quitting the university became curate of Finedon, and afterwards of Wadsboro, both in his native county. In 1764'archbishop Secker presented him to the vicarage of Bathedon, in Kent, and in the next year to the rectory of Pluckley, in the same county. In 1776 he took up his residence at Nayland, in Suffolk, where he held the perpetual curacy; and soon after he exchanged his living of Pluckley for the rectory of Paston, in Northamptonshire. In 1780 he became fellow of the Royal Society. In this capacity, for many years he was engaged in the composition of a treatise on philosophy, which was intended to elucidate his favorite system. In that work he displayed great learning and ingenuity, as well as ardent attachment to the interests of piety and virtue, united with the eccentric peculiarities of the Hutchinsonian school. Alarm at the progress of radical and revolutionary opinions during the French Revolution, he employed his pen in opposition to the advocates of such destructive principles, and his writings were widely circulated by the friends of the British government. He sanguine with equal success on the subject of theology, morals, literature, philosophy, and, in addition to all these, showed great talents in musical composition. "He was a man of quick penetration," says bishop Horsley, "of extensive learning, and the soundest piety, and he had the talent of writing upon everything, with a clear and strong understanding." In the year 1792 he met with a severe loss in the death of his most intimate friend, bishop Horne, to whom he was chaplain. Being now of advanced age, and obliged, by his growing infirmities, to discontinue his practice of taking pupils, that he might not be subjected to inconvenient travelling, he moved from his home, in the year 1798 the archbishop of Canterbury presented him to the sinecure rectory of Hol- lingbourn in Kent, which, however, he did not live long.
to enjoy, dying Feb. 6, 1800, in consequence of a paralytic stroke. His most important works are, A full

Jones, Sir William, an eminent poet, scholar, and lawyer, was born in London Sept. 28, 1746, and was sent to Harrow in 1758, where he soon eclipsed all his fellows, particularly in classical knowledge. In 1764 he was entered at University College, Oxford, where he was enabled to gratify that desire for a knowledge of the Oriental languages which had shown itself during the last two years of his residence at Harrow. In 1765 he left Oxford, and went to France as tutor to the son of one of Spencer's friends, with whom he travelled on the Continent.
In 1770 he was admitted to the Inner Temple, and the same year he published, at the request of the king of Denmark, A Life of Nadir Shah, translated into French
from the Persian; in the following year a Persian Gram-nar was republished seven years ago, with corrections and additions, by the late professor Lee; and in 1774 his Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry, republished by Eichborn at Leipzig in 1776. In 1776 he was made a commissioner of bankrupts. In 1780 he completed a translation of seven Arabic poems, known as the Moolidas-kat; verse, Biography; Hooper, Noun, Digest, Generale, xxvi, 908;
and another, entitled Essay on the Law of Bailments, and two or three odes. In March, 1783, Jones obtained a judgeship in the Supreme Court of Judicature in Bengal, and landed at Calcutta in September. He at once set about the acquisition in 1758, where he soon eclipsed all his fellows, particularly in classic knowledge. In 1764 he was entered at University College, Oxford, where he was enabled to gratify that desire for a knowledge of the Oriental languages which had shown itself during the last two years of his residence at Harrow. In 1765 he left Oxford and went to France as tutor to the son of one of Spencer's friends, with whom he travelled on the Continent. In 1770 he was admitted to the Inner Temple, and the same year he published, at the request of the king of Denmark, A Life of Nadir Shah, translated into French

from the Persian; in the following year a Persian Gram-nar was republished seven years ago, with corrections and additions, by the late professor Lee; and in 1774 his Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry, republished by Eichborn at Leipzig in 1776. In 1776 he was made a commissioner of bankrupts. In 1780 he completed a translation of seven Arabic poems, known as the Moolidas-kat; verse, Biography; Hooper, Noun, Digest, Generale, xxvi, 908;
and another, entitled Essay on the Law of Bailments, and two or three odes. In March 1783 Jones obtained a judgeship in the Supreme Court of Judicature in Bengal, and landed at Calcutta in September. He at once set about the acquisition of the knowledge of Oriental languages, literature, and customs. He established the Royal Asiatic Society "for investigating the history, antiquities, arts, sciences, and literature of Asia," of which he was the first president. To the volumes of the Asiatic Researches Sir William contributed largely, and in 1799, he wrote a short and verse, called The Enchanted Fruit, or the Hindu Wife; and a translation of an ancient Indian drama, called Sacaita, or the Fatal Ring. A translation by him of the Ordinances of Menu (q. v.) appeared in 1794. He was busily employed on a digest of the Hindu and Mohammedan laws, when he was attacked with an inflammation of the liver, which terminated fatally April 27, 1794. Sir Wm. Jones was one of the first linguists and Oriental scholars that Great Britain has produced, being more or less acquainted with no less than twenty-eight different languages. His poems are always elemental and their ideas and their versification are melliflu-

oun. His learning was extensive, his legal knowledge was profound, and he was an enlightened and zealous champion of constitutional principles. He was also an earnest Christian. To devotional exercises he was ha-bilitated attentive to the above works, Sir William Jones published a translation of the and a half, translations of two Mohammedan law tracts On the Law of Inheritance, and of Succession to Property of Inte-sates—Tales and Fables by Nizami; Two Hyms to Praviri; and Extracts from the Vedas. The East India Company erected a monument to his memory in St.

Paul's Cathedral, and a statue in Bengal. A complete edition of his works, in 6 vols. 4to, was published by Livy Jones in 1799; and another appeared, in 18 vols. 8vo, in 1807, with a life by the author lord Teignmouth.

Joneson, Finn (known also by the Latin name of Finnus Johanneus), the historian of the Icelandic Church and literature, was born on the 16th of January, 1704, at Skagafjarðar, and his Genealogic Name Athab. Jon Hal-dursen, was minister. He was educated at the School of Skalholt, and in 1725 passed to the University of Copenhagen. On his return to Iceland his intention was to become a lawyer, but the death of his uncle, a parish priest, who left behind him a numerous family of small children, induced him to devote himself to the Church, that he might bring up the orphans. He obtained the vacant benefice, brought up the family, married, and in 1754 was appointed to the bishopric of Skalholt. He was very attentive to the revenues of his diocese, and the account of his episcopate by Petursson is chiefly occupied with his disputes with refractory tenants of Church property. He died on the 23d of July, 1789. He composed several works in Latin and Icelandic, especially a Historia Ecclesiasticae Islandiae, first published with valuable additions by his son Finn-son (Copenhagen, 1772-8, 4 vols. 4to), and continued by Petursson (ib. 1835), a valuable and interesting work, embracing the literary as well as ecclesiatical affairs of Iceland—English Cyclopa. a. v.

Joppeh (Heb. Yahpo'h), "fl. Josh. xix. 46; 2 Chron. ii, 16; Josiah i, 3, or N£E" Extra iii, 7; beauty; Sept. N.
T. and Josephus 'ToPw', other Greek writers 'ioovTt', 'ioovTt', or 'ioow'; Vulgate Joppa; Auth. Vern. "Japho," except in Josiah; usually "Joppe" in the Apocrypha, town on the south-west coast of Palestine, the port of Jerusalem in the days of Solomon, as it has been ever since.

1. Legends. The etymology of the name is variously explained; Rabbinal writers deriving it from Japho'h, but classical geographers from Jopha (ToPw), daughter of Abulus and wife of Cepheus, Andromeda's father, its reputed founder; others interpreting it as the "waste" or "cast off town" (Rom. Paulos, p. 864). The fact is, that, from its being a sea-port, it had a profane as well as a sacred history. Pliny, following Mela (De situ orb. i, 12), says that it was of antediluvian antiquity (Hist. Nat. v, 14); and even Sir John Manndeville, in the 14th century, bears witness—though, it must be confessed, a slight one—to that tradition (Early Travels in F. p. 142). According to Josephus, it originally belonged to the Phoenicians (Ant. xiii, 15, 4). Here, writes Strabo, some say Andromeda was exposed to the whale (Geograph. xvi. p. 759; comp. Müller's Hist. Gev.
vii. 127), and when he was brought back from the sea, he appeals to its elevated position in behalf of those who laid the scene there; though, in order to do so consistently, he had already shown that it would be necessary to transport Ethiopia into Phoenicia (Strabo. i, 43).
However, in Pliny's age—and Josephus had just before affirmed the same (War, ii, 9, 3)—they still showed the chains by which Andromeda was bound; and not only so, but M. Scaurus the younger, the same that was so much employed in Judaea by Pompey (War i, 6, 2 sq.), had the bones of the monster transported to Rome from Joppa, where till then they had been exhibited. Yet, with all his regard for the Phoenicians and his adhesions to the public amongst other prodigies.
Nor would they have been uninteresting to the modern geologist, if his report be correct; for they measured forty feet in length, the span of the ribs exceeding that of the Indian elephant, and the thickness of the bone or vertebrae was such as to make them useful for the interchange of commerce between the Greeks, personified in their errant hero Perseus, and the Phoenicians, whose lovely, but till then unexplored clime may be shadowed forth in the fair virgin Andromeda. Perseus, in the tale, is said to have plunged his dagger into the right shoulder of the monster. Possibly he may have discovered or improved the harbor, the roar from whose foaming surf might have been surpassed by the barkings of Scylla or Charybdis. Even the chains shown there may have been those by which his ship was attached to the shore. Rings used by the Romans for mooring their vessels are still to be seen near Terracina, in the south angle of the ancient port (M. Liv. xxvi. 13). It is not known when it was started or when it was forsaken by Rome, but it ceased to be the port of the Usilii (i.e. Gessius Florus) it was destined amidst great slaughter of its inhabitants (War, ii, 18, 10); and such a nest of pirates had it become when Vespasian arrived in those parts that it underwent a second and entire destruction, together with the adjacent villages, at his hands (iii, 9, 5). Thus it appears that this port had already begun to be the den of robbers and outcasts which it was in Strabo's time (Geogr. xvi, 750), while the district around it was so populous that from Jamnia, a neighboring town, and its vicinity, 40,000 armed men could be collected (ibid.). There was a vast plain around it, as we learn from Josephus (Ant. xiii, 4, 4); it lay between Jamnia and Cesarea—the latter of which might be reached "on the morrow" from it (Acts x, 9 and 24)—not far from Lydda (Acts ix, 38), and distant from Antipatris 150 stadia (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 15, 1).

It was at Joppa, on the house-top of Simon the Tanner, "by the sea-side"—with the wind from the west and the sea circumscribed on the east by the high ground on which the town stood, but commanding a boundless prospect over the western waters—that the apostle Peter had his "vision of tolerance," as it has been happily designated, and was for the first time of the Gentiles—"but from the east to embrace, from still worse threshold, the virgin daughter of the west. The Christian poet Arator has not failed to discover a mystical connection between the raising to life of the aged Tabitha—the occasion of Peter's visit to Joppa—and the baptism of the first Gentile house of Cornelius (De Act. Apost. L 840, ap. Migne, Patrol. Curs. Compl. ixxviii, 164).

In the 4th century Eusebius calls Joppa a city (Onomast. a. v.); and it was then made the seat of a bishopric, an honor which it retained till the conquest of the country by the Saracens (Roland, p. 889; S. Paul. Geogr. Zoe, p. 304); the subscriptions of its prelates are preserved in the acts of various synods of the 5th and 6th centuries (Le Quen, Oriens Christian., iii, 629). Joppa has been the landing-place of pilgrims going to Jerusalem for more than a thousand years, from Arculf in the 7th century to his royal highness the prince of Wales and his retinue. It is mentioned in all the itineraries and books of travel in the Holy Land which have appeared in different languages (Early Travels in Pal. p. 10, 34, 142, 286). None of the early travellers, however, give any explicit description of the place. During the Crusades it was several times taken and retaken by Franks and Saracens. It had been taken possession of by the forces of Godfrey de Bouillon previous to the capture of Jerusalem. The town had been deserted, and was allowed to fall into ruin, the Crusaders contenting themselves with possession of the citadel (William of Tyre, Hist. viii, 24); but it was assigned there for the support of the Church of the Resurrection (ibid. ix, 16), though there seem to have been bishops of Joppa (perhaps only titular after all) between A.D. 1258 and 1365 (Le Quen, 1291; compare p. 1241). Saladin, in A.D. 1186, destroyed its fortifications (Secret. Fid., ch. x, v. 5); but Richard of England, who was confined here by sickness, rebuilt them (ibid., and Richard of Devizes in Bohn's Ant. Lib. p. 61). Its last occupation by Christians was that of St. Louis, A.D. 1258, and when he came it was still a city and governed by a count. "Of the immense sums," says Joinville, "which he was anxious to inclose Jaffa, it does not become me to speak, for they were countless. He inclosed the town from one side of the sea to the other; and there were twenty-restored to the Jews, but its revenues—whether from land or from export-duties—were bestowed upon the 2d Hyrcanus and his heirs (xiv, 10, 6). When Herod the Great commenced the city, it was therefore enlarged, lest he should leave a hostile stronghold in his rear when he marched upon Jerusalem (xiv, 15, 1), and Augustus confirmed him in its possession (xv, 7, 4). It was afterwards assigned to Archelaus when constituted ethnarch (xvii, 11, 4), and passed with Syria under Cyrenius when (M. Claud. xvi, 1, 10) for Archelaus has retired (xvii, 11, 3). On the con-

2. History.—We find that Japho or Joppa was situated in the portion of Dan (Josh. xix, 40), on the coast towards the south, and on a hill so high, says Strabo, that people affirmed (but incorrectly) that Jerusalem was visible from its summit. Having a harbor attached to it though not large, says the Roman, it was the port of Jerusalem, when Jerusalem became metropolis of the kingdom of the house of David, and certainly never did port and metropolis more strikingly resemble each other in difficulty of approach both by sea and land. Hence, except in journeys to and from Jerusalem, it was not much used for its fleets. Accordingly, after the above incidental notice, the place is not mentioned till the times of Solomon, when, as being almost the only available sea-port, Joppa was the place fixed upon for the cedar and pine wood from Mount Lebanon to be landed by the servants of Hiram, king of Tyre, under Zerubbabel (1 Kings v, 2; 2 Chron. ii, 16; Ezra iii, 7). Here Jonathan, whenever and wherever he may have lived (2 Kings xiv, 25, certainly does not clear up the first of these points), "took ship to flee from the presence of his Maker" (Jonah i, 3), and accomplished that singular historic tour which brought him one of the principal scenes in the great drama of his own (Matt. xii, 40).

After the close of O. T. history Joppa rose in importance. The sea was then beginning to be the highway of nations. Greece, Egypt, Persia, and some of the little kingdoms of Syria, had used their fleets for, after the change and war. Until the construction of Cæsarea by Herod, Joppa was the only port in Palestine proper at which foreign ships could touch; it was thus not only the shipping capital, but the key of the whole country on the sea-board. During the wars of the Maccabees it was one of the principalholds of Palestine (1 Macc. x, 75; xiv, 5, 34; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 1). It would seem that Jews then resided not only a majority of the population, and the foreign residents—Greeks, Egyptians, and Syrians—were so rich and powerful, and so aided by the fleets of their own nations, as to be able to rule the city. During this period, therefore, Joppa experienced many vicissitudes. It had sided with A pollonius, and was attacked and captured by Jonathan Mac cabæus (1 Macc. x, 76). It witnessed the meeting between the latter and Ptolemy (ibid. xi, 6). Simon had his council at Joppa, as did his grandson John Hyrcanus (ibid. xii, 34), which he afterwards strengthened considerably (ibid. xii, 11). But when peace was restored, he re-established it once more as a haven (ibid. xiv, 5). He likewise rebuilt the fortifications (ibid. v, 34). This occupation of Joppa was one of the grounds of complaint against the work of Ptolemaus, king of Egypt, who represented Simon; but the latter alleged in excuse the mischief which had been done by its inhabitants to his fellow citizens (ibid. xv, 30 and 35). It would appear that Judas Maccabæus had burnt their haven some time back for a gross act of barbarity (2 Macc. xii, 6). Tribute was subsequently exacted for its use by Ptolemaus, king of Egypt, by Antiochus Sidetes. By Pompey it was once more made independent, and comprehend under Syria (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 4, 4); but by Cæsar it was not only four towers, including small and great. The ditches were well scoured, and kept clean, both within and without. There were three gates (Chron. of Cris., p. 456, Bobb.), and of the three, the sultan of Egypt, together with the rest of Palestine, by which it was once more laid in ruins; so much so that Bertrand de la Broquiere, visiting it about the middle of the 15th century, states that it then consisted only of a few leaning walls covered with ruins, having been a strong place under the Christians. Guides, accredited by the sultan, here met the pilgrims and received the customary tribute from them; and here the papal indulgences offered to pilgrims commenced (Early Trav., p. 286). Finally, Jaffa fell under the Turks, in whose hands it still is, including the usual latitude of the cities possessed by them, and depending on Christian commerce for its feeble existence. During the period of their rule it has been three times sacked—the Arabs in 1722, by the Mamelukes in 1775, and lastly by Napoleon I in 1799, when a body of 400 Albanians, who held a strong position in town, surrendered on promise of having their lives spared. Yet the whole 4000 were afterwards pinioned and shot on the strand! When Napoleon was compelled to retreat to Egypt, between 400 and 500 French soldiers lay ill of the plague in the hospitals of Joppa. They could not be removed, and Napoleon declared them to be poisoned! (Porter, Handbook for S. and P. p. 288).

3. Description.—Yafé is the modern name of Joppa, and is identical with the old Hebrew Japho. It contains about 5000 inhabitants, of whom 1000 are Christians, about 150 Jews, and the rest Moslems. It is built on a level site, surrounded by a little rounded hill, dipping up to the west of the waves of the Mediterranean, and on the land side encompassed by orchards of orange, lemon, apricot, and other trees, which for luxuriance and beauty are not surpassed in the world. It extends for several miles along the coast. The principal towns, however, it looks best in the distance. The houses are huddled together without order; the streets are narrow, crooked, and filthy; the town is so crowded along the main street that the rickety dwellings in the upper part seem to be toppling over on the flat roofs of the houses. The most prominent features of the architecture from without are the whitewashed domes by which most of the buildings are surmounted, and the appearance of arched vaults. But the aspect of the whole is mean and gloomy, and inside the place has all the appearance of a poor though large village. From the sea side, situated on a little rounded hill, dipping up to the west of the waves of the Mediterranean, and on the land side encompassed by orchards of orange, lemon, apricot, and other trees, which for luxuriance and beauty are not surpassed in the world. There are three mosques in Joppa, and Latin, Greek, and Armenian convents. The former is that in which European pilgrims and traders usually lodge. The bazaars are worth a visit. The chief manufacture is soap. It has no port, and it is only under favorable circumstances of wind and weather that vessels can ride at anchor a mile or so from the shore. There is a place on the shore which is called "the harbor." It consists of a strip of water from fifteen to twenty yards wide and two or three deep, inclosed on the sea side by a ridge of low and partially sunken rocks. It may afford a little shelter to boats, but it is worse than useless so far as commerce is concerned. The town is defended by a wall, on which a few old gun embrasures are built. The principal rivers are the Wadi el Loom (mentioned in the time of Zobah), the Wadi el Amsa, and the Wadi el Maghara, which is only a few broken columns scattered about the streets, and through the gardens on the southern slope of the hill, and the large stones in the foundations of the castle, Joppa has no remains of antiquity; and none of its modern buildings, not even the reputed "house of Simon the tanner," which the monks show, are worthy of note, although the locality of the last is not badly chosen (Stanley, S. and P., p. 263, 274; and see Seddon's Memoir, p. 86, 185). The town has still a considerable trade as the port of Jerusalem. The oranges of Jaffa are the finest in all Palestine and Syria; its pomegranates and watermelons are likewise in high repute, and its gardens and orange and citron groves deliciously fragrant and fertile. But among the population of Jaffa, as in all other places in the East, there are many differences from all countries; and Europeans have little security, whether of life or property, to induce a permanent abode there. A British consular post is now in place, and a railroad has been projected to Jerusalem.

Joppé (Ἰωάννης), the Greek form (1 Esdr. v. 55; 1 Macc. xv, 75, 76; xi, 6; xii, 33; xiii, 11; xiv, 5, 34; 2 Macc. iv, 21; xi, 3, [Ἰωάννης]) of the name of the town Joppe (q. v.).

Jo'ra (Heb. Yoraḥ, יְוּרָה, prob. for יְוּרָד, יְוֹרָד, spriral, or autumnal rain; Sept. Ἰουρᾶνιος, v. Ὠράα, Vetr. Jor.); a man whose descendants (or a place whose former inhabitants) are numbered to the number of 115 when brought from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii, 18); called Ἀριφας in the parallel passage (Neh. vii, 24). "In Ezra two of De Rossi's MSS. and originally one of Kennicott's had ᾽Ιουρᾶνιος, i.e. Joshe, which is the reading of the Syriac and Arabic versions. One of Kennicott's MSS. had the original reading in Ezra altered to ᾽Ιουρᾶνιος, i.e. Joram; and two in Nehemiah read ᾽Ιουρᾶνιος, i.e. Harim, which corresponds with Ἀριφας of the Alexandrian MS., and Ἀριφας of the Syriac. In any case, the change or confusion of letters which might have caused the variation of the name is so slight that it is difficult to pronounce which is the true form, the corruption of Jorah into Hariph being as easily conceivable as the reverse. Burrington (General, ii, 75) decides in favor of the latter, but from a comparison of both passages with Ezra xiii 31 we should be inclined to regard Harim (᾿Ιουρᾶνιος) as the true reading in all cases. But, on any supposition, it is difficult to account for the form Aseriphath, or, more properly, Ἀριφαςις, in 1 Esdr. vi, 16, which Burrington considers as having originated in a corruption of the two readings in Ezra and Nehemiah, the second syllable arising from the error of the transcriber in mistaking the uncial Ε for Σ."

Jo'ra (Heb. Yoraq, יְוּרַק, perh. i. q. Jorah; Sept. Ἰουρᾶς, Vetr. Jor.;) the fourth name of the seven chieftains of the Gadites other than those resident in Hebron (1 Chron. vi, 13). B.C. perh. cir. 782. "Four of Kennicott's MSS. and the printed copy used by Luther read יְוּרַק, i.e. Jodal (Smith)."

Jo'ram (Heb. יְוּרָם, וּרָם, prop, a shortened form of the name יְהוּרָם, q. v., for which it is indifferently used in the Heb., and arbitrarily in the L. V., as the following classification shows: a. The son of the king of Zobah (2 Sam. viii, 10; Sept. יְוּרָמ; elsewhere called Hadoram). b. The king of Judah (2 Kings vii, 21, 23, 24; xi, 2; 1 Chron. iii. 11; elsewhere Jehoram). c. The king of Israel (2 Kings vii, 16, 25, 28 [twice]; 29 [twice]; ix, 14 [twice]; ix, 15, 16 [twice]; 14 [twice]; 20 [twice], incorrectly for διὼραμ; with Kings i, 7, 17, 21 [twice]; 22; elsewhere correctly so). d. The Levite (1 Chron. xxvi, 25, 29), b. By error for Jozabah (1 Esdr. i. 9)." Jor'dan (Heb. Yarden or, יֶרְדָּן, always with the article יְרֵדָן; Tadavign, the chief and most celebrated river of Palestine, flowing through a deep valley west of the centre of the country from north to south. The principal river of the entire region, however, usually styled in the original "the River", is the Euphrates (q. v.). See Rivah."

See Kamal.
1. The Name.—This signifies descender, from the root תָּם, "to descend"—a name most applicable to it, whether we consider the rapidity of its current, or the great depth of the valley through which it flows, or whatever part of the country its banks are approached, the descent is long and steep. That this is the true etymology of the word seems evident from an incidental remark in Josh. iii, 16, where, in describing the effect of the opening of a passage for the Israelites, the word used for the "coming down" of the waters (טָלָק מִשָּׁם) is almost the same as the name of the river (see Stanley, and S. and P. p. 279, note). Other derivations have been given. Some say it is compounded of נָה, a down, and לָכַּה, the name of the city where it rises; but this etymology is impossible (Heald, Palest., p. 371).

Another view is, that the river having two sources, the name of the one was Jor, and of the other Dan; hence the united stream is called Jordan. So Jerome (Comm. in Matt. xvi, 13). This theory has been copied by Adamnanus (De Loc. Sanct. ii, 19), William of Tyre (xii, 19), Brocardus (p. 3), Adrichomius (p. 109), and others: and the etymology seems to be read among the Christians in Palestine, from whom Burckhardt heard it (Travels in Syria, p. 42, 43; see Robinson, Bib. Res. iii, 412, note). Arab geographers call the river either El-Urdun, which is equivalent to the Hebrew, or Esphos, which signifies "the great," and this latter is the name almost universally given to it by the modern Syrians, who sometimes attach the appellative el-Kebir, "the great," by way of distinction from the Sheriat el-Mandhur, or Hieromax.

2. Sources.—The snows that deeply cover Hermon during the whole winter, and that still cap its glittering summits during the hottest days of summer, are the real springs of the Jordan. They feed its perennial fountains, and they supply from a thousand channels those superabundant waters which make the river "overflow all its banks in harvest time" (Josh. iii, 10). The Jordan has two historical sources. a. In the midst of a rich but marshy plain, lying between the southern prolongation of Hermon and the mountains of Naphtali, is a low cup-shaped hill, thickly covered with shrubs. On it once stood Dan, the northern border-city of Palestine; and from its western base gushes forth the great fountain of the Jordan. The waters of this large pond encircled with rank grass and jungle—now the home of the wild boar—and then flow southward. Within the rim of the cup, beneath the spreading branches of a gigantic oak, is a smaller spring. It is fed, doubtless, by the same source, and its stream, breaking through the rim, joins its sister, and forms a river some forty feet wide, deep and rapid. The modern name of the hill is Tell el-Kady, "the hill of the judge;" and both fountain and river are called Leddan—evidently the name Dan corrupted by a double article, El-ed-Dan (Robinson, Bib. Res. iii, 594; Thomson, Land and Book, p. 214; and in Biblical ears Soc., 1846, p. 190). Josephus calls this stream "Little Jordan" (יוֹרֵם מַגִּיסוֹן, War, iv, 1, 1; comp. Ant. i, 10, 1; viii, 8, 4); but it is the principal source of the river, and the largest fountain in Syria.

b. Four miles east of Tell el-Kady, on a lower terrace of Hermon, amid forests of oak, lie the ruins of Banias, the ancient Cesarea-Philippi, and more ancient Panium. Beside the ruins is a lofty cliff of red limestone, having a large fountain at its base. Beneath the cliff there was formerly, as Josephus tells us, a gloomy cave, and within it a yawning abyss of unfathomable depth, filled with deceptive pools; hence the name of the river (War, i, 21, 3; comp. Ant. xv, 10, 3; Pliny, v, 12; Mishna, Paru, viii, 12). A temple was erected over the cave by Herod, and its ruins now fill it and conceal the fountain. From it a foaming torrent still bursts, and dashes down to the plain through a narrow rocky ravine, and then glides swiftly on till it joins the other about four miles south of Tell el-Kady (Robinson, iii, 397; Porter, Handbook, p. 446).

c. The Jordan also has a fabled fountain, thus described by Josephus: "Apparent Panium is the source of the Jordan, but the water is, in reality, conveyed thither unseen by a subterranean channel from Phiala, as it is called, which lies not far from the high road, on the right as one leaves Baniyat to Trachonitis, at a distance of 120 stadia from Cesarea... That the Jordan hence derived its origin was formerly unknown, until it was ascertained by Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, who, having thrown chaff into Phiala, found it cast out at Panium" (War, iii, 10, 7). The lake here referred to appears to be Lake Huleh, which Robinson visited and described (Bib. Res. iii, 389). The legend has no foundation in reality.

d. Other fountains in this region, though unnamed in history, contribute much to the Jordan. The chief of these, and the highest perennial source of the Jordan, is in the bottom of a valley at the western base of Hermon, a short distance from the town of Hasbela, and twelve miles north of Tell el-Kady. The fountain is in a pool at the foot of a basalt cliff; the stream from it, called Hasbela (from Hasbela), flows through a narrow gully into a torrent, and falls into the Jordan about a mile south of the junction of the Leddan and Banias. The relative size of the three streams Robinson thus estimates: "That from Banias is twice as large as the Hasbela, while the Leddan is twice, if not three times the size of that from Banias" (Bib. Res. iii, 395). The Jordan, as it flows southward through the marshy plain for six miles, and then falls into Lake Huleh, called in Scripture "The Waters of Jerom." See ••

3. Physical Features of the Jordan and its Valley.—The most remarkable feature of the Jordan is, that throughout nearly its entire course it is below the level of the sea. Its valley is thus like a huge fissure in the earth's crust. The following measurements, taken from Van de Velde's Memoir accompanying his Map, will give the best idea of the depression of this singular valley:

- Fountain of Jordan at Hasbela: 1700 ft. elevation.
- Banias: 347
- Dan: 647
- Lake Huleh: 126
- Lake of Tiberias: 600 ft. depression.
- Dead Sea: 1327

There may be some error in the elevations of the fountains as here given. Lake Huleh is encompassed by a great plain, extending to Dan; and as it appears to the eye almost level, it is difficult to believe that there could be a difference of 500 feet in the elevations of the fountain and the lake. Porter estimated it on the spot not above 100 feet; but it is worthy of note that Von Wildenbruch makes it by measurement 837 feet, and De Berton 344.

The general course of the Jordan is due south. From their fountains the three streams flow south to the points of junction, and common in the same direction to the Huleh; and from the point of juncture of this lake the Jordan again issues and resumes its old course. For some two miles its banks are flat, and its current not very rapid; but on passing through Jir Benatia Yakkib ("the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters"), the banks suddenly contract and rise high on each side, and the river is narrowed to a shallow channel, dashes in sheets of foam over a rocky bed, rebounding from cliff to cliff in its mad career. Here and there the retreating banks have a little green meadow, with its fringe of oleanders all wet and glistening with spray. Thus it rushes on, often winding, occasionally doubling back like the coils of a serpent, till, breaking from rocky barriers, it enters the rich plain of Bethlah, where on the bank stands the ruins of Bethsaida (q.v.). The stream now expands, and glides lazily along till it falls on the still bosom of the Sea of Galilee. Between Bethsaida and the sea the Jordan averages about twenty yards in width, and flows sluggishly between low alluvial banks. Bars of sand extend across its channel here and there, and it is easily fathomed. (Hart, Handbook, p. 426; Robinson, ii, 414 sq.; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 815.) From Jien Belen Yakob the distance is only seven miles, and yet in that distance the river falls 700 feet. The total length of the section between the two lakes is about eleven miles as the crow flies.

The third section of the river, lying between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, is the Jordan of Scripture, the other two sections not being directly mentioned either in the O.T. or N.T. Until the last few years little was known of it. The notices of ancient geographers, travelers, and others who had crossed it at several points, but all the portions between these points were unknown. When the remarkable depression of the Dead Sea was ascertained by trigonometrical measurement, and when it was shown that the Jordan must have a fall of 1400 feet in its short course of about 100 miles, the exact course and points were called for by that distinguished geographer Dr. Robinson, in a paper read before the Royal Geographical Society in 1847 (Journal, vol. xviii, part ii). In that same year lieutenant Molyneux, R.N., conveyed a boat from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, mostly in the river, but in places on the banks of the Jordan, where rocks and rapids prevented navigation. Owing to the hostility of the Arabs the expedition was not successful, and the Jordan was not yet explored. Lieutenant Lynch, of the United States Navy, headed a much more successful expedition in 1848, and was the first fully to describe the course, and fully to solve the mysteries of the Jordan. His official Report is the standard work on the river. Molyneux's paper in the Journal of the Royal Geog. Society also contains some useful matter (vol. xviii, part ii).

Valley through which this section of the Jordan flows is a narrow, running, to the north, and shut in by steep and rugged parallel ridges, the eastern ridge rising fully 5000 feet above the river's bed, and the western about 3000. This plain is the great plain of the later Jews; the great desert (παλαιν της αγκέλας) of Josephus; the basin or "channel" of the Greek geographers; the "region of Jordan" of the N.T. (Matt. iii. 5; Luke iii. 3); and the Ghor or "sunken plain" of the modern Arabs (Stanley, p. 277; Josephus, War, iii, 9, 7; iv, 8, 2; Reland, Palest, p. 805, 361, 377 sq.). It is about six miles wide at its northern end, but it gradually expands until it attains a width of upwards of twelve at Jericho. Its sides are not straight lines, but nor is its surface perfectly level. The mountains on each side here and there send out rocky spurs, and long, long roots far into it. Winter torrents, descending from wild ravines, cut deep through its soft strata. As a whole, it is not a desert. In its northern division, above the fords of Succoth, small springs cause the ground to sparkle with fountains, and along the banks of streamlets, where irrigation is easy; but all the rest is a wilderness—in spring covered with rank grass and thistles, but in summer parched and bare. The southern section—known as the "shrubbery"—is different in aspect. Its surface is covered with a white nitrous crust, like hoarfrost, from which not a blade of grass or green herb springs. Nothing could be imagined more dreary or desolate than this part of the plain.

Down the midst of the plain winds a ravine, varying from 200 yards to half a mile in breadth, and from 40 to 150 feet in depth. Through this the Jordan flows in a tortuous course, now sweeping the western, and now the eastern bank: now making a wide, graceful curve, and now doubling back, but everywhere fringed by a narrow, dense border of trees and shrubs. The river has thus two distinct lines of banks. The first or lower banks confine the stream, and are from five to ten feet high. The second or upper banks are higher, and the river is higher; the second or upper are at some distance from the channel, and in places rise to a height of 150 feet. The scenery of the river is peculiar and striking. Lynch thus describes the upper section: "The high alluvial terraces on each side were everywhere broken by the bold action of the stream, the numbers of conical hills, some of them pyramidal and cuneiform, presenting the appearance of a giant encampment. This singular conformation extended southwards as far as the eye could reach. At intervals I caught a glimpse of the river in its graceful meanderings, sometimes glittering like a spear-head through an opening in the foliage, and again clasping some little island in its shining arms, or, far away, snatching with the fierceness and white foam of a torrent by some projecting point. . . . The banks were fringed with the laurel, the tamarisk, the willow, and the palm, while over the hillside and further on, the slope of the second terrace, grew a small species of oak, and the cedar."

The Jordan issues from the Sea of Galilee close to the hills on the western side of the plain, and sweeps round a little peninsula, on which lie the ruins of Tarichea (Pomparama) (Porter, Antiqu. of the Jews, i. 217). This peninsula is about 100 feet wide, and the current strong (Lynch). A short distance down are the remains of a Roman bridge, whose fallen arches greatly obstruct the river, and make it dash through in sheets of foam. Below this are several weirs, constructed of rough stones, and intended to raise the water two or three feet, so as to irrigate the neighboring plain (Molyneux). Five miles from the lake the Jordan receives its largest tributary, the Sheriat el-Mandhib (the Hieromax of the Greeks), which drains a large section of Bashan and Gilead. This stream is 130 feet wide at its mouth. Two miles further is el-Meiraj, the only bridge now standing on the Lower Jordan. It is a quaint structure, one large pointed arch spanning the stream, and double tiers of smaller arches supporting the roadway on each side. The river here deep and impetuous, having many high ledges. Below this point the ravine inclines eastwards to the centre of the plain, and its banks contract. Its sides are bare and white, and the chalky strata are deeply furrowed. The margin of the river has still its beautiful fringe of foliage, and the little islands which occur here and there are covered with shrubbery. Six and a half miles south of the bridge, wady Yabes (so called from Jabesh-gilead), containing a winter torrent, falls in from the east. A short distance above it a barren sandy island divides the channel, and with its bars on each side forms a ford, probably the one by which Jacob crossed, as the site of Succoth has been identified on the western bank. The plain round Succoth is extensively cultivated, and abundantly watered by fountains and streamlets from the adjoining mountains. The richness of the soil is wonderful. Dr. Robinson says, "The grass, intermingled with tall daisies and wild oats, reached to our knees; the only one we saw was the black thawed the riders' heads. All was now dry, and in some places it was difficult to make our way through this exuberant growth" (iii, p. 315). Jacob exercised a wise choice when he "made booths for his cattle at this fair and fertile place" (Gen. xxxi. 21). This great plain is equal in richness. The ravine of the Jordan is here 150 feet below the plain, and shot in by steep, bare banks of chalky strata (Robinson, l.c., p.316).

About nine miles below Succoth, and about half way between the lakes, the Jabbok, the only other considerable tributary, falls into the Jordan, coming down through a deep, wild glen in the mountains of Gilead.
When Lynch passed (April 17) it was "a small stream trickling down a deep and wide torrent bed. . . . There was another bed, quite dry, showing that in times of freshet there were two outlets." Lynch gives some good pictures of the scenery above the junction. "The plain that sloped away from the bases of the hills was broken in crags and titanicous cone-like mounds . . . A low, pale yellow ridge of conical hills marked the termination of the higher terrace, beneath which swept gently this low plain, with a similar undulating surface, half redeemed from barrenness by sparse vegetation and thistle-covered hillocks. Still lower was the valley of the Jordan—its banks fringed with perpetual verdure—winding a thousand graceful mazes . . . its course a bright line in this cheerless waste."

Below the Jabok the fall of the river is still greater than above, but there is less obstruction from rocks and cliffs. The jungles along the banks become denser, the sides of the river gne more regular, and the plain above more dreary and desolate.

On approaching the Dead Sea, the plain of the Jordan attains its greatest breadth—about twelve miles. The mountain ranges on each side are higher, more rugged, and more desolate. The plain is clothed with a nitrous crust, like hoar-frost, and not a tree, shrub, or blade of grass is seen except by fountains or rivulets. The gleam winds like a serpent through the centre, between two tiers of banks. The bottom is smooth, and sprinkled on the outside with stunted shrubs. The river winds in curves and meanders along the bottom, now touching one side and now another, with its beautiful border of green foliage, looking all the greener from contrast with the desert above. The banks are of soft clay, in places ten feet high; the stream varies from 80 to 120 feet in breadth, and from five to twelve in depth. Near its mouth the current becomes more sluggish, and the stream expands. Where wadis Hezhan falls in, Lynch found the river 150 feet wide and 11 deep, "the current four knots." Further down the banks are low and sedgy; the width gradually increases to 180 yards at its mouth, but the depth is only three feet (Lynch, Official Report; Robinson, i, 388 sq.; Stanley, p. 290).

Lynch in a few words explains the secret of the great and almost incredible fall in the Jordan. "The stream varies from 80 to 150 feet in breadth, and from five to twelve in depth. Near its mouth the current becomes more sluggish, and the stream expands. Where wadi Hezhan falls in, Lynch found the river 150 feet wide and 11 deep, "the current four knots." Further down the banks are low and sedgy; the width gradually increases to 180 yards at its mouth, but the depth is only three feet (Lynch, Official Report; Robinson, i, 388 sq.; Stanley, p. 290).

The bridge was probably built during the 15th century, when the caravan road was constructed from Damascus to Egypt (Porter, Handbook, ii, 466). The origin of the name, "Bridge of Jacob's Daughters," is unknown. Perhaps this place may have been confounded with the ford of Succoth, where the patriarch crossed the Jordan, or perhaps the "Jacob" referred to was some Muslim saint or Turkish pasha (Ritter, Pal. and Spo., p. 269 sq.). See Bridge.

Between Bethsaida-Julias and the Sea of Galilee there are several fords. The river is there shallow and the current sluggish. At this place the multitudes that followed our Lord from Capernaum and the neighborhood were able to cross the river to where he fed the 5000 (Mark vi, 32 sq.; Robinson, ii, 414).

The first ford on the southern section of the Jordan is about half a mile from the lake, where the ruins of the Roman bridge now lie. It was the means of communication between Tiberias and Galilee, and it was doubtless at this point our Lord crossed when he went from Galilee to Judea by the farther side of Jordan.
JORDAN

Mark x. 1; Matt. xix. 1, 2). Jair el-Mejajim is a Saracen bridge on an old caravan route from Damascus to Egypt. Probably a Roman bridge may have stood at the same place, connecting Scythopolis with the other cities of Decapolis. There is no ford here. At a point east of the ruins of Scythopolis, ten miles below the bridge, the river is now fordable, but the passage is deep and dangerous (Robinson, iii, 825; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 137).

At Succoth is one of the best and most important fords over the Jordan. Here Jacob crossed with his cattle. This, too, is possibly the Bethbarah, “house, or ford of passage,” where the Israelites intercepted the routed Milamites (Judg. vii. 24), and it was probably here that the men of Gilead slew the Ephraimites (xii. 6). Not far off, in “the clay ground between Succoth and Zarthan,” were the brass foundries of king Solomon (1 Kings vii. 46). These fords undoubtedly witnessed the first recorded passage of the Jordan in the O.T.; we say recorded, because there can be little dispute but that Abraham must have crossed it likewise. It is still the place at which the eastern Bedouin cross in their periodic invasions of Esdraelon. From Succoth to the mouth of the Jabbok the river becomes very low during the summer, and is fordable at many points. At one spot are the remains of a Roman bridge (Molyneux, p. 115 sq.; Lynch, April 16; Burchhardt, p. 344 sq.). Ten miles south of the Jabbok there is a noted ford on the road from Nablus to Es-Selt. To the southward of this Roman road and bridge were here discovered by Van de Velde (Meinour, p. 124). The only other fords of note are those in the plain of Jericho, one above and one below the pilgrims’ bathing-places. They are much deeper than those higher up, and when the river is swollen they become impassable.

5. Historical Notices. — The first notice of the Jordan is in the story of the separation of Abraham and Lot—Lot “beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah” (Gen. xiii. 10). Abraham had just left Egypt (xii. 10), and therefore the comparison between the fertilizing properties of the Jordan and of the Nile is very apposite. The section of the valley visible from the heights of Bethel, where the patriarchs stood, was the plain of Jericho and southward over a part of the Dead Sea. The “plain” or circle (“22”) of the Jordan must have been different then from what it is now. It is now a parched desert—then it was well watered everywhere. The waters of numerous springs, mountain torrents, and probably of the Jordan, raised by winds such as are seen at its northern end, were used by the old Phoenician inhabitants in the irrigation of the vast plain. The treachery of the Gerasites had not yet come upon it; the fire of heaven had not yet passed over it; the Lord had not yet destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah (Stanley, p. 215). It is manifest that some great physical change was produced in the valley by the convulsion at the destruction of the cities. The bed of the Dead Sea was probably lowered, and a greater fall thus given to the river. See DEAD SEA.

Another wonderful epoch in the Jordan’s history was the passage of the Israelites. They were encamped on the east of the river—on the low bench of the river, extending along the northern shore of the sea to the foot of the mountains. It was harvest-time—the beginning of April—when the rains were still falling heavily in Hermon, and the winter snows were melting under the rays of the warm sun, and when a thousand mountain torrents were sweeping down into the Jordan, which made it “overflow all its banks;” or, as the Hebrew literally signifies, made it full up to all its banks (see Robinson, Bib. Res. i. 540); that is, perhaps, up not merely to the banks of the stream itself, but up to the banks of the glen; covering, as it still does in a few places (Molyneux, p. 116; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 120), the whole bottom of the glen, and thus rendering the fords impassable for such a host as the Israelites. There can be no doubt that in ancient times the Jordan rose higher than it does now. When the country was more thickly wooded and more extensively cultivated, more rain and more snow must have fallen (Van de Velde, Narrative, ii. 271). There are wet seasons even yet, when the river rises several feet more than ordinarily (Reland, p. 273; Kassar, Pulât, p. 61, 2d ed.). The opening of a passage through the river at such a season was the greater miracle. To the Israelites, who had thought it would be impossible by nature, the time of the overflow—the finger of God must have been manifest to all. It is a remarkable fact that at this same spot the Jordan was afterwards twice miraculously opened—by Eliah and Elisha (2 Kings ii. 8, 14).

At a later period it was considered a sin and a daring that a party of David’s “mighty men” crossed the Jordan “in the first month (April), when it had overflowed all its banks,” and subdued their enemies on the east side (1 Chron. xii. 15). Jeremiah speaks of the lions “coming up” from the “swellings of the Jordan;” but the Hebrew word נְגֵל signifies beauty or glory, and refers to the dense jungles and verdant foliage of its banks; these jungles are impenetrable except to the wild beasts that dwell there. No allusion is made to the rise or overflow of the river (Genesius, Thesaurus, a. v.; Robinson, i. 540). Travellers have often seen wild swine, hyenas, and jackals, and also the tracks of panthers, on the banks of the Jordan (Molyneux, p. 114).

The passage of the river by king David in his flight from Absalom has one peculiarity—a ferry-boat was used to convey his household over the channel (2 Sam. xix. 18). The passage was probably effected at one of the fords in the plain of Jericho. The word צָרָם simply signifies a thing for carrying; it may have been a “boat,” or a “raft,” or a few inflated skins, such as are represented on the monuments of Nineveh, and are still used on the Euphrates and the Jordan. See FERRY.

Naaman’s illustrious deprecation of the Jordan, as compared with the “rivers of Damascus,” is well known. The rivers of Damascus water its great plain, converting a desert into a paradise; the Jordan rolls on so deep and so broad, to the Sea of Death.

The great event of the N.T. history enacted at the Jordan was the baptism of our Lord. This has made it the queen of rivers, and has given it the title “sacred.” The exact spot is disputed. See BETHERAH; ENON. The topography and the incidents of the narrative, both before and after the baptism, unquestionably point to the same place, already famous as the scene of three miracles (Porter, Handbook, p. 198). In commemoration of the baptism, the Christian pilgrims who assemble at Jerusalem at Easter visit the Jordan in a body and stand at the spot (279). The references to the Jordan in the writings of Josephus contain nothing of importance beyond what has already been mentioned in connection with the four-Arab tribes—so savage as scarcely to be considered exceptions—had become extinct on its banks.

Such, then, is the river Jordan, without any parallel, historical or physical, in the whole world. A complete river beneath the level of the sea! Disappearing in a lake which has no outlet, which could have none, and which originated in a miracle! It is divided by the direct agency of God, that his servants might pass in safety and comfort. It is a river that has never been navigable, flowing into a sea that has never known a port—has never been a high-road to more hospitable coasts—has never possessed a fishery—has never boasted of a single town of eminence upon its banks; in fine, it is, if not "the river of God" in the book of Psalms, at least that of his chosen people throughout their history, and, as such, it figures largely in the poetical symbolism of the passage from this world to the next.

In addition to the works above cited on the physical features of the Jordan, the following afford important information: Journal of R. Geog. Society, xvii, part ii, articles by Robinson, Petermann, and Molyneux; Ber- tou, in Julum de la Soc. Geograph. de Paris, xii, 166 sq.; missionary accounts of Upper Jordan; Erdkunde zu Berlin, 1845-46; Capt. Newbold, Jour. Roy. Armt. Society, xvi, 8 sq.; Rev. W. Thompson, Bibl. Sac. iii, 184 sq. A clear summary of all known about the Jordan up to 1850 is given by Ritter, in Palatina und Syrien, ii, 152-556; also in his separate essay, Der Jordan und seine Flussige, 1850. More popular descriptions are those published by the Religious Tract Society (London, 1858), and Nelson (ib. 1854). Most travellers in Palestine have likewise given an account of the river, chiefly at its mouth. See PALESTINE.

JORDAN, Joseph, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Nansendid County, Va., in 1665, and began preaching about 1718, first in the States, and later in various parts of England and Ireland, and some portions of Holland. He died Sept. 26, 1735. He was acquainted himself, was the testimony of the annual meeting of Virginia Quakers in the year of his death, "as a workman that need not be ashamed." See Janyey, Hist. of Friends, iii, 261.

JORDAN, Richard (1), a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Nansendid County, Va., in 1668, and began preaching the same year with his younger brother Joseph (see above). The two brothers frequently traveled together, preaching the word of God, in Virginia, Maryland, and Carolina, and suffered little from persecution. In 1728 he visited the Quakers in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and in Barbadoes. After two years he returned to the States, and settled in Philadelphia, where he died August 5, 1742. His ministry was convincing and consolatory, his delivery graceful, but unaffected; in prayer he was solemn and reverent. See Janyey, Hist. of Friends, iii, 270.

JORDAN, Richard (2), a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Norfolk County, Va., Dec. 12, 1756. He entered on ministerial labors in 1775 in New York and New England, and in 1802 visited Europe, where he spent two years. On his return he settled at Hartford, Conn., and five years later removed to Newton, N. J., where he died Oct. 14, 1826. He was an able minister of the Gospel, devoted to the service of his heavenly Master. See Janyey, Hist. of Friends, iv, 105.

and he was shipwrecked, in 1229. He wrote, De du Ezra viii, 16, and Ezra x, 18, in the Hebrew text of the above passages respectively).

Jorim (Ἰωρίμ, perh. i. q. Joram), the son of Matthath and father of Eleazar, maternal ancestors of Jesus, not mentioned in the O. Test. (Luke iii, 29). B. C. post 876. See Genealogy of Christ.

Joris (really Joriszon, i.e. Georgios). David, founder of an Anabaptist sect of the 16th century, known under the name of Dora DRAWATIS, or more generally under that of Joridis, himself altogether a most extraordinary character: was born either in 1501 or 1509 at Giessen, or, as Nipphold states, at Ghenau.
He has generally been spoken of as of low parentage, but nipphold tells that David's father was originally a merchant, and afterwards the head of a company who went about acting the play of the life of David the Psalms-mist, but that his mother was of noble origin. David was early placed at school, but the boy's inclination was more to a roving life, like that of his father, than to books. He early evinced a particular fondness for the art of glass painting. He was therefore finally taken from school and apprenticed to a glass painter, and soon displayed great aptitude in his profession. To perfect himself in this art he set out on a journey to neighboring countries, and travelled through Belgium, France, and England, until a dangerous disease hastened his return to Holland. He now (1524) settled at Delft, and married. Hitherto the young painter had displayed no extreme religious zeal; it is true he was strong in in all his religious observances, and had frequently declared himself in favor of vital piety, but this, at a time when the reformatory movement was in its infancy, was not remarkable. Even now he continued his attention to his business, and only on a few public occasions during the first years of the Reformation, did he become a Hollandese against the fanatic zeal of the Romanish clergy, and the religious excesses of the Dutch Church. In 1500, however, he appears more prominently on the stage.
It is true he had previously written a few pamphlets against Romanism, but these had failed to provoke reply, or a demand for interference on the part of the authorities. But this year, while a procession of Roman Catholics was moving through the streets of Delft, he stopped the priests and accused them of the crime of deceiving the people by false teachings; he especially reproached them for their worship of images and pictures. The burgomaster of Delft favored Joris not a little, being a friend of his; but this daring action could not go unpunished, and Joris was arrested and imprisioned for some time. After a trial, however, he escaped, no doubt by the aid of his friend, without any severe punishment. Delft for the time being was the last city he visited during his wanderings at this time that he became estranged from the true Reformation principles and an adherent to Anabaptist views, and finally even the founder of an independent sect. His roving life, so very much akin to that of all the Anabaptist leaders, inspired him with protest against the causes he had been moved to, but he was, on the whole, a more moderate than they, and opposed to their tumultuous proceedings, especially to their views of establishing their authority by the sword, it was not until 1534 that he actually joined them by rebaptism. At this time the Anabaptists were at the zenith of their success, especially at Münster. See Anabaptists. Being requested to preach and espouse their cause before the people, he at first refused; but his sense of his own pleaded incompetency; but at last was prevailed upon, and was consecrated by Dammus, Ubbo, and others as bishop of Delft. The same peace which he had manifested in the cause of the Lutherans he now displayed in behalf of the Anabaptists, and we may infer from the hesitancy in which the author his influence had become quite extended and his followers very numerous.
Certainly Joris himself was quite conscious of the extent of his power, and he hesitated not to use it for the accomplishment of the one great object that seemed to be nearest his heart,—the union of all Anabaptists under one common leader, the secure establishment of the principles which he himself espoused, and which no doubt he as yet believed to be based on the Scriptures and indorsed by divine favor. But his course soon aroused suspicion among the other Anabaptist leaders.
They publicly stated how they could not recognise in Joris the determined leader, and, jealous of the success he had already achieved, and fearful of their own position, they openly disavowed him. Such a course was adopted, especially, by Batenburg himself, the founder of an Anabaptist sect, a determined ruffian, void of feeling, the people, who, being the espouse of wealth and power. He preached the extinction of all non-Anabaptists by the sword. Strangely enough, however, his very followers, after his decease, became the most faithful adherents of Joris. Opposed within the camp of the Anabaptists, Joris led the party of the Convocation of Anabaptists held at Bocholt, assumed a still more independent position, and proudly declared himself divinely appointed as leader. This further provoked the jealousy of the other leaders; and, as, immediately after the Convocation of Bocholt, Joris issued a pamphlet calling all parties to a peaceful union, the views of the different leaders was stimulated anew, and resulted in an entire estrangement of most of the Anabaptists.
Those who now continued to espouse his cause were hereafter known as Jorists or Oradisits. Providence seemed to favor his effort. Letters came to him from all directions urging him to state his views in this short or long hour; to these were added visions and revelations which he fancied he had. Even the persecutions to which his followers were now subjected by the authorities were interpreted by him as a further proof of the divine favor. Was it not gain for them to die? From Delft he fled to the land of the Zuiderzee, and took back again to his native state to comfort his suffering believers, and to attend and animate them in their dying hours. Nor did he waver when he saw his own mother led to the scaffold (at Delft, 1537), attesting in her dying hour the doctrines which his son was preaching.
The extent of his influence may be inferred from the number who at this time became the subjects of persecution. At Delft thirty-five persons were executed for their adherence to Joris; at Haarlem, Amsterdam, Leyden, Rotterdam, and other cities also many suffered likewise. In a space of two years, in many thousands hundred betokened their faithfulness to Anabaptist views at the expense of their life. Nor was Joris himself safe from persecution. He was obliged to leave Delft, where he had lived for a while secretly, and, after flight from place to place in his native country, he was at last arrested, and it was during his wanderings at this time that he became estranged from the true Reformation principles and an adherent to Anabaptist views, and finally even the founder of an independent sect. His roving life, so very much akin to that of all the Anabaptist leaders, a hazardous undertaking; he therefore sought a home within the dominions of the landgrave of Hesse, but the landgrave also refused the weary wanderer a resting-place unlesse a man was strong and active; but now not likely to yield up all that his imagination had fasced to be divine truth, and he continued his roving until he felt safe nowhere. Suddenly we meet in Switzerland, in the city of Basel, a person by the name of John of Bruges, the owner of real estate in the town and in the country, a peaceable and good citizen, a communicant in the Reformed Church, who had come to Basel with his family in the spring of 1544. This man was an Augustinian and later a developed system of Montanist (q.v.). He denied the doctrine of future judgment, as he declared that perfection is attained in this world, and therefore the dependence of the subject on the Creator ceases. Of course he also ruled out of existence angels, both good and bad. He held, with Manes, that the body only, and not the soul, was defined as evil; and he took a most impotent step when he adopted the precepts of the Adamites with respect to marriage.

Of his 250 books and 1000 letters, the most important is his Book of Miracles, which appeared at Deventer in 1542, under the title of Wonderboek, etc. (2d ed. 1551, folio). A list of all his writings, and a very elaborate statement of his life and work, were written by Prof. Nippoldt, of Heidelberg University, in the Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Kirche in Deutschland, vol. iv., sect. iv., pp. 186, 483 sqq.; 1864, p. 476 sqq.

Jorissen, Matthias, a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church, was born at Wezel, Holland, October 26, 1738, and educated at the University of Utrecht. His first settlement was at Haarlethen, where he was called to Hasselt, and thence, in 1782, to the Hague, to preach to a German congregation. This charge he held up to his death, Jan. 13, 1823. Jorissen's characteristics were the vigor of intellect, the power of affection, solidarity of judgment, and a remarkable talent to read men and things. His native endowments were cultivated by extensive reading, thorough study, and much intercourse with the best society. He was an evangelist in sentiment, of eminent personal piety, devoted to the best interests of the Reformed Church, and commanded universal esteem and love. He was one of the founders of the Netherlands Missionary Society. A new version of the Psalms in German was prepared by him. To it he added a few hymns. It was welcomed and adopted by German congregations in the Reformed Church of Holland. His other published writings were very few. Jor'koön [some Jorkoöm] (Hebrew Yorkeüm, יְורֶכִּים, 'orām, pa leness of the people, or, more extended people; Sept. Ἰορκόον, v. t. ἵολον, both confounded with Re kem following; Vulgate Jeronem), a person apparently named as the son of Raham, of the descendants of Caleb, the brother of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 44); but others (e.g. Gesenius after Jarchi) understand "father" there to mean "founder", so that this would be the name of a town settled by Raham—an interpretation sustained by a similar use of other names in the same connection. The locality thus alluded to is otherwise unknown, but from the associated places may be presumed to have been a place in the region south-east of Hebron.

Jornandez (Jornandes or Jordanes), a celebrated historian of the 8th century, was by birth a Goth, or both of Alan and Gothic descent. After adopting the Christian religion he was appointed the bishop of Aosta, subsequently entered a monastery, and was finally made bishop of Croton, in Italy. He wrote two historical works in the Latin language, De Regnum ac Temporum Successione—a short compendium of the most important events in history from the Creation down to A.D. 652; valuable from the account it contains of several barbarous northern nations—and De Getarum Origine et Rebus Gestis (concerning the origin and deeds of the Goths), which has obtained great renown, chiefly from its being our only source of information about the Goths and other barbarian tribes, except when they are casually mentioned by some Greek or Latin historian. The main reason of this absence of information is a corruption of other writers, is full of inaccuracies, both of time, place, and person; Jornandes himself, however, seems to have been aware of the imperfect condition of his works, for he makes no claims to erudition or extended research. The aim of the works is believed to have been first to extol the houses of these nations, and, secondly, to bring about a union of the Goths and the Romans, for he tries to prove that both nations have long been friends and confederates, and that their perpetuation depended upon the most intimate alliance of the two. Jorini, John, D.D., an eminent English divine, was born in London Oct. 23, 1638. His parents were French Huguenots, who had been part of that devoted body which fled from France at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, giving up all in preference to abjuring their faith. He received his grammatical education at the Charter House. In May, 1715, he was admitted to Jesus College, in Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He attracted attention by his remarkable proficiency as a scholar, particularly his mastery of the learned languages, and two years after being admitted to the college was recommended by his tutor, Dr. Swayne Thirlby, to make extracts from Eustathius for the use of Pope's Homer, and for his services in this work he received the highest commendations from that distinguished poet. While at Cambridge he published a small volume of poems, which are greatly admired, and allowed by scholars to possess a very high rank among modern Latin verses. In 1729 he was admitted to dean's orders, and the following June to that of priest. In 1726-27 he was presented to the living of Swavesey, near Cambridge, but, in consequence of his marriage soon after, he resigned that living, and removed to London, where he soon became an admired and popular preacher. When his friend, Dr. Orme, the last bishop of London, died in 1732, Jorini was appointed his domestic chaplain, and was presented with a prebend in the Church of St. Paul and the living of Kensington. To these was soon added the archdeaconry of London. He fixed his residence at Kensington, where he died in 1770. He was as much beloved for his private virtues as admired for his learning, abilities, liberality of mind, and contempt of subserviency. Few men have ever enjoyed the intimacy of so many eminent persons. Among these may be mentioned the names of bishops Horsey, Warburton, Sherlock, Hare, Lowth, and Secker, besides Cudworth, Middleton, Pope, Ken, Dr. Samuel Johnson, Dr. Parr, Dr. Dodderidge, and others. The most intimate relations subsisted between Dr. Jorini and bishop Warburton until he incurred the displeasure of that distinguished prelate by controvverting his doctrine with regard to the state of the dead before the Messiah. He gained by his "Divine Legation of Moses." The critical writings of Dr. Jorini are greatly admired by all who have a taste for curious literature. It is not merely on account of the learning which is displayed in them, and the use which is made of obscure authors, but there is a terseness in the expression of his thoughts, a playful satire in his profound speculations, which render them very entertaining. His principal works are, Discourses concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion, etc. (Lond. 1746, 3 vols. 8vo.);—Life of Erasmus (Lond. 1758-60, 2 vols. 4to.);—Sermons on different Subjects, and the Doctrine of a Future State, etc. (Lond. 1771, 4 vols. 8vo.);—See Dissertations upon different Subjects (Lond. 1772, 7 vols. 8vo.);—Tracts, philologico, critical, and miscellaneous (Lond. 1790, 2 vols. 8vo.)—Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, ancient and modern (1781, 2 vols. 8vo.)—On Cursoryness (Tracts of Engl. Fathers, iv, 226); and Remarks on Eccl-nostical History, a work which is universally allowed to be curious, interesting, and impartial; full of many sense, sensate. and profound erudition. Joscelin, bishop of Soissons, a rival of Abèlard, and one of the most distinguished teachers in Paris, was born in the latter part of the 11th century. In 1115 he became archdeacon of Soissons, and in 1126 succeeded his illustrious predecessor. He took part in the councils of Troyes and Rouen, and in the coronation of king Philip. In 1131 Innocent II sent him, together with St. Bernard, on a mission to the archbishop and to the count of Bourdeaux. On his return in 1132 he founded the famous priory of Moisson, and was made a judge of Abèlard at the Council of Sens, and at the Council of Paris in 1147 was commissioned to inquire into the propositions attributed to Gilbert de la Place. He died Oct. 23, 1152. Joscelin enjoyed great reputation for learning and wisdom, and in his diocese fulfilled all the duties of his charge with scrupulous faithfulness. He wrote an Expositio symboli and an Expositio orisonis Dominici, both of which were published in Mar tene and Durand's Amplissimus Collectio, ix, 1101, 1111, Martene, Amedo, p. 434, gives also two of his letters. Jocuicius (called also Jocondus, Joculcius, Joculcius, Jocuicius, Jostho, and Gottso), a French Roman Catholic prelate, became bishop of St. Brieuc in 1150. In 1157 he was translated to the see of Tours, and immediately began to quarrel with the canons of his diocese, till king Louis VII was obliged to interfere. When Frederick, who preceded him, endeavored to judge between the rival popes, Victor and Alexander, Jocuicius was sent to the latter by England and France to assure him of their support and bring him to France. In 1167 Jocuicius was the prelate who, after the murder of Thomas à Becket, was commissioned by the pope to excommunicate the king of England. It was Jocuicius also who, when Henry had received absolution in 1172, went to him at Carc, and publicly declared him reconciled to the Church. He died in 1173 or 1174. Jos'eph (Heb. Yeosaph, יְשֹׁפֶה, containing, according to Gen. xxx, 23, 24, a two-fold significance [the the Heb. roots coinciding in form in Hiphil], removers, from יָשָׁא, and increaser, from יָשָׁה, the latter favored by the uncontracted or Chaldaic form יְשֹׁפֶה, יֶשֹׁפֶה, occurring only Psa. xxxi, 9, 9 Sept.). He was the son of of seven men in the tribe of Benjamin, all doubtless after the first, the name, whose beautiful history is told at length in the Scriptures with inimitable simplicity. See also JOSIAH.

1. The elder son of Jacob and Rachel, born (B.C. 1915; comp. Gen. xli, 46) under peculiar circumstances, as may be seen in Gen. xxx, 22; on which account, and because he was the son of his old age (xxxvii, 3), he was beloved by his father more than all his children, though Benjamin, as being also a son of Jacob's favorite wife Rachel, was in a peculiar manner dear to the patriarch. The partiality evinced towards Joseph by his father excited jealousy on the part of his brethren, the rather as they were born of different mothers (xxxvii, 2-11). Jacob at this time gave two pieces of land in Canaan, Abraham's burying-place at Hebron in the south, and the "parcel of a field, where he [Jacob] had spread his tent" (xxxiii, 19), at Shechem in the north, the latter being probably, from its price, the lesser of the two. He seems then to have staid at Hebron with the aged Issac, while his sons kept his flocks.

1. Joseph had reached his seventeenth year, having hitherto been engaged in boyish sports, or aiding in pastoral duties, when some conduct on the part of "the sons of Bilhah and the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives," seems to have been such as, in the opinion of Joseph, to require the attention of Jacob. Accordingly he communicated the facts. This regard to virtue, and this manifestation of filial fidelity, greatly increased his brothers' dislike, who henceforth "hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him" (xxxii, 4). Their jealousy was aggravated by the fact that Jacob had his brothers possessed by a mad phantasy, and had them dress up in a dress of scarlet and purple, with stripes of多样化 designs, which appears to have been a long tunic with sleeves, worn by youths and maidens of the richer class. See ATTIRE. Their avarice, however, was carried to the highest pitch when Joseph acquainted them with the two dreams that he had had, to the effect—the first, that while he and they were binding sheaves, his sheaf arose and stood erect, while theirs stood round and did obeisance to his; the second, that "the sun and the moon and the eleven stars did him homage." These dreams appeared to indicate that Joseph would acquire pre-eminence in the family, if not sovereignty; and even while his father rebuked him, his brothers were filled with envy (xxxvii, 11). Jacob, however, was not aware of any danger of their ill will; so that one may imagine, having a desire to hear intelligence of his sons, who were pasturing their flocks at a distance, he did not hesitate to make Joseph his messenger for that purpose. They had gone to Shechem to feed the flock, and (xxxviii, 3) every means were taken to undermine his father to bring him word of their welfare and that of the flock. They were not at Shechem, but had gone to Dothan, which appears to have been not very far distant, pasturing their flock like the Arabs of the present day, wherever the wild country (ver. 22) was unowned. His appearing in view of his brothers was the signal for their malice to gain head. They began to devise means for his immediate destruction, which they would have unhesitatingly effected but for his half-brother Reuben, who, as the eldest son, might well be the party to intercede on behalf of Joseph. A compromise was arrived at in virtue of his ill will, and the brothers took advantage of the opportunity to strip him of the distinguishing vestments which he owed to his father's affection, and cast into a pit. Having performed this evil deed, and while they were taking refreshment, the brothers beheld a caravan of Arabian merchants ( Ishmaelites = Midianites), who were bearing the spices and aromatics of India down to the well-known and much-frequented mart, Egypt. Judah on this feels a better emotion arise in his mind, and proposes that, instead of allowing Joseph to perish, they should sell him to the merchants, whose trade obviously, from the nature of the country, being as profitable as it was spurious. Accordingly the unhappy young man was sold for a slave (at the price of twenty shekels of silver, a sort of fixed rate: see Lev. xxvii, 5), to be conveyed by his masters into Egypt. While on his way thither, Reuben returned to the pit, intending to rescue his brother, and convey him safely back to their father. Finding Joseph gone, he returned with expectation of the wicked young man, he soon from relenting, now concerted a fresh act of treachery, by which at once to cover their crime and also punish their father for his partiality towards the unoffending sufferer. With this view they dipped Joseph's party-colored garment in the blood of a kid and surreptitiously laid it on him in order that he believe that his favorite child had been torn to pieces by some wild beast. The trick succeeded, and Jacob was grieved beyond measure (Gen. xxxviii, 12-35). B.C. 185.

2. Meanwhile the merchants sold Joseph to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh's, and captain of the royal guard, who was a native of the country (Gen. xxxvii, 56). It is by no means easy to determine who at this time was the Pharaoh, or ruling monarch, though, what is far more important, the condition of the country, and there- in the progress of civilization, are in certain general and important respects to make clear in the course of the narration. According to Syncellus, however, the general opinion in his day was that the sovereign's name who ruled Egypt at the time of the deportation of Joseph was Aphiopis. See EGYPT. In Potiphar's house Joseph enjoyed the highest confidence and the largest prosperity. His power was such that his master permitted whatever he undertook to succeed, till at length his master gave every thing into his hands. He was placed over all his master's property with perfect trust, and "the Lord blessed the Egyptian house for Joseph's sake" (ver. 5). The sculptures and paintings of the ancient Egyptian tombs throw vividly into the light of daily life and duties of Joseph. The property of great men is shown to have been managed by scribes, who exercised a most methodical and minute supervision over all the operations of agriculture, gardening, the keeping of live-stock, and fishing. Every profit was carefully registered to check the dishonesty of the laborers, who in Egypt have always been famous in this respect. Probably in no country was farming ever more systematic. Joseph's previous knowledge of tending flocks, and perhaps of husbandry, and his truthful character, exactly fitted him for the post of overseer.

The Hebrew race have always been remarkable for personal beauty, of which Joseph seems to have had an unusual share. This fact explains, though it cannot palliate, the conduct of Potiphar's wife, who, with the well-known profligacy of the Egyptian women, tried every means to ensnare Joseph to satisfy her unchaste desires. Foiled in her evil wishes, she resolved to punish Joseph, who thus a second time innocently brings on himself the vengeance of the ill-disposed. Charged with the very crime to which he had in vain been tempted, he is, with a fickleness characteristic of Oriental lords, at once cast into the state prison (Gen. xxxix). If the suddenness and magnitude of this and other changes in the lot of Joseph should surprise any one, the feeling will be mainly owing to his want of acquaintance with the manners and customs of the East, where vices notwithstanding less marked and refinements those presented in his native history are not common; for those who come into the charmed circle of an Eastern court, especially if they are persons of great energy of character, are subject to the most wonderful alternations of fortune, the slave of to-day being the vizier of to-morrow, and vice-versa.

It must not be supposed, from the lowliness of the morals of the Egyptians in practice, that the sin of unfaithfulness in a wife was not ranked among the heaviest vices. The punishment of adulterers was severe, and a moral tale, entitled "The Two Brothers" (contained in a papyrus of the 12th dynasty, found in the British Museum, and translated in the Cambridge Essays for 1838), is founded upon a case nearly resembling that of Joseph,
JOSEPH

It has, indeed, been imagined that this story was based upon the trial of Joseph, and as it was written for the heir to the throne of Egypt at a later period, there is some reason in the likeness of the trial of the virtuous one who held so high a position as Joseph might have been in the mind of the writer, were this part of his history well known to the priests, which, however, is not likely. This incident, moreover, is not so remarkable as to justify great stress being laid upon the similarity to it of the manner of a moral tale. The story of Belshazzar might as reasonably be traced to it, were it Egyptian and not Greek. The Muslims have founded upon the history of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, whom they call Yusuf and Zelikha, a famous religious allegory to be wondered at in the Koran, which relates the tempting of Joseph with no material variation in the main particulars from the authentic narrative. The commentators say that, after the death of Potiphar (Khitb), Joseph married Zelikha (Sale, chap. xii). This mistake was probably caused by the circumstance that Joseph's father-in-law bore the same name as his master.

Potiphar, although believing Joseph guilty, does not appear to have brought him before a tribunal, where the enormity of his alleged crime, especially after the trial placed in him, and the fact of his being a foreigner, would have made it likely that the virtuous one of the severest kind. He seems to have only cast him into the prison, which appears to have been in his house, or, at least, under his control, since afterwards prisoners are related to have been put "in ward [in] the house of the captain of the guard," which is the prison (xxix, 1), and simply "in ward [in] the captain of the executioners' house" (xli, 10; comp. xl, 7). The prison is described as "a place where the king's prisoners [were] bound" (xxxix, 39). Here the hardest time of Joseph's period of probation began. He was cast into prison on a false accusation, to remain there for at least two years, and perhaps for a much longer time. At first he was treated with severity; this we learn from Psa. cxv. 7. "He sent a man before them, Joseph [who]: was sold for a slave: whose feet they afflicted with the fetter: the iron entered into his soul" (ver. 17, 18). There is probably here a connection between "fetter" and "iron" (comp. cx, 8), in which case the signification of the last clause would be "the iron entered into him," meaning that the fetters cut his feet or legs. This is not inconsistent with the statement in Genesis that the keeper of the prison treated Joseph well (xxxix, 21), for we are not justified in thence inferring that he was kind from the first.

In the prison, as in Potiphar's house, Joseph was found worthy of complete trust, and the keeper of the prison placed everything under his control, God's especial blessing attending his honest service. After a while Pharaoh was incensed against two of his officers, "the chief of the cup-bearers" (םֹפַרְנָה בֵּית), and "the chief of the bakers" (םֹפַרְנָה בֵּית), and cast them into the prison where Joseph was. Here the chief of the executioners, doublets a successor of Potiphar (for, had the latter been convinced of Joseph's innocence, he would not have left him in the prison, and if not so convinced he would not have trusted him), charged Joseph to serve these prisoners. Like Potiphar, they were "officers" of Pharaoh (xi, 2), and though it may be a mistake to call them grandees, their easy access to the king would give them an importance that explains the care taken of them by the chief of the executioners. Each dreamed a prophetic dream, which Joseph correctly interpreted. The king was not surprised at Joseph's explanation that interpretations were of God. It is not necessary here to discuss in detail the particulars of this part of Joseph's history, since they do not materially affect the leading events of his life; they are, however, very interesting, from their perfect agreement with the manners of the ancient Egyptians as represented on their monuments. On the authority of Herodotus and others, it was long denied that the vine grew in Egypt; and if so, the Ancient Egyptians not only could not have been agriculturists, but they could not have brought about the commercial relations of the times. Wilkinson, however, has shown beyond a question that vines did grow in Egypt, and thus not only removed a doubt, but given a positive confirmation of the sacred record (Manners of the Anc. Egyptians, ii. 152).

The famine, whose fate was auspicious, promised the young Hebrew to employ his influence to procure his restoration to the free air of day; but when again in the enjoyment of his "butlership," he forgot Joseph (xli). B.C. 1885. Pharaoh himself, however, had two dreams which did not impress him with a sense of the reality of famine; the other people resolved that Joseph should be made (to borrow a term from Rome) dictator in the approaching time of need. "And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath shown thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art. Thou shalt be over my house, and according to thy word shall all my people be ruled; and the other princes I have in the land will I be greater than thou. See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt." And Pharaoh took off his ring and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck; and he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, bow the knee. (See AHERON.) And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah, [saviour of the world; comp. Hab. i, 5]; and gave him to wife Asenath, the daughter of Potipherah, priest of On. And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt" (xli, 59 sq.). The monuments show that on the investiture of a high official in Egypt, one of the chief ceremonies was the putting on him a collar of gold, and giving him a golden scepter, etc. As a consequence, their par- particulars, the vestures of fine linen and the riding in the second chariot, are equally in accordance with the manner of the country. It has been supposed that Joseph was taken into the priestly order, and thus ennobled. The Biblical narrative does not support this opinion, though it leaves it without a doubt that in reality, if not in form as well, the highest trust and the proudest honors of the state were conferred on one so recently a Hebrew slave. The age of Joseph is stated to have been thirty years at the time of this promotion (xli, 46). B.C. 1885.

3. Seven years of abundance afforded Joseph opportunity to carry into effect such plans as secured an ample provision against the seven years of need. The famine came, but it found a prepared people. The representations of the monuments, which show that the contents of the granaries, now securely closed when they were filled, will illustrate this part of the history. See GRANARY. The visitation was not merely local, for "the famine was over all the face of the earth;" and all countries came into Egypt to Joseph to buy corn" (ver. 56, 57). The expressions here used, however, do not require us to suppose their commerce extended beyond the countries around Egypt, such as Palestine, Syria, and Arabia, as well as some part of Africa, although of course it may have been more widely experienced. It may be observed, that although famines in Egypt depend immediately upon the failure of the inundation, and in other countries upon the failure of rain, yet that, as the rise of the Nile is caused by heavy pressure, extra heavy season there in and in Palestine would produce the result described in the sacred narrative. It must also be recollected that Egypt was anciently the granary of neighboring countries, and that a famine there would cause first scarcity, and then famine, around. Famines are not very frequent in Egypt, as Ethiopia is a remunerative season there in the seven years famine in the reign of the Fatimite Caliph El-Mustansir-billah is the only known parallel to that of Joseph. See Famine. Early in the time of famine, Joseph's brethren came to buy corn, a part of the history which we mention here only as indicating the liberal policy of the government of Egypt, by which the storehouses were opened to all buyers, of whatever nation they were.

After the famine had lasted for a time, apparently two years, there was "no bread in all the land; for the famine was very sore, so that the land of Egypt and [all] the land of Canaan fainted by reason of the famine. And Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought; and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house." (xvi, 13, 14). When all the money of Egypt and Canaan was exhausted, barter became necessary. Joseph then obtained all the cattle of Egypt, and in the next year, all the land, except that of the priests, and apparently, as a consequence, the Egyptians themselves. He demanded, however, only a fifth part of the produce as Pharaoh's right. It has been attempted to explain this enactment of Joseph as the result of the two fragments of Egyptian history preserved by profane writers, but the result has not been satisfactory. Even were the latter sources trustworthy as to the early period of Egyptian history, it would be difficult to determine the age referred to, as the actions of at least two kings of the third dynasty and of their successors were at times in the script very particularized. Herodotus says that, according to the Egyptians, Sesostris "made a division of the soil of Egypt among the inhabitants, assigning square plots of ground of equal size to all, and obtaining his chief revenue from the rent which the holders were required to pay him every year." (ii, 109). Elsewhere he speaks of the priests as having no expenses, being supported by the property of the temples (ii, 37), but he does not assign to Sesostris, as has been rashly supposed, the exemption from taxation that we may reasonably infer. Diodorus Siculus ascribes the division of Egypt into ninety-six districts to the kings of the fourth dynasty, calling Sesostris, "a veritable Sesostris". Taking into consideration the general character of the information given by Herodotus respecting the history of Egypt at periods remote from his own time, we are not justified in supposing anything more than that some tradition of an ancient allotment of the soil by the crown among the population was current when he visited the country. The testimony of Diodorus is of far less weight.

There is a notice, in an ancient Egyptian inscription, of a famine which has been supposed to be that of Joseph's time. In an inscription on the temple of Amon at Luxor and records of Amon, a governor of a district of Upper Egypt, that when there were years of famine, his district was supplied with food. This was in the time of Sesostris I, of the twelfth dynasty. It has been supposed by Bunsen (Egypt's Place, iii, 594) that this must be the famine of Joseph's time, and of Joseph's period, but strictly the record inapplicable to that instance, but the calamity it relates was never unusual in Egypt, as its ancient inscriptions and modern history equally testify.

Joseph's policy towards the subjects of Pharaoh is important in reference to forming an estimate of his character. Sesostris, we learn from Herodotus, taking a view that marked his whole career. He perceived a great advantage to be gained, and he lost no part of it. He put all Egypt under Pharaoh. First the money, then the cattle. Last of all the land, and the Egyptians themselves, became the property of the sovereign, and that, too, by the voluntary act of the people without any force exercised. This was an act of generosity, and required only a fifth of the produce as a recognition of the rights of the crown. Of the wisdom of this policy there can be no doubt. Its justice can hardly be questioned when it is borne in mind that the Egyptians were not forcibly deprived of their liberties, and that they had not been forced to such conduct at once restored. We do not know all the circumstances, but if, as we may reasonably suppose, the people were warned of the famine, and yet made no preparation during the years of overflowing abundance, the government had a clear claim upon its subjects for having taken precautions they had neglected. In any case it may have been desirable to make a new allotment of land, and to reduce an unequal system of taxation to a simple claim to a fifth of the produce. We have no evidence whether Joseph were in this matter divinely aided, but we cannot doubt that if not he acted in accord with a judgment of great clearness in discreet recognizing good and evil.

4. We have now to consider the conduct of Joseph at this time towards his brethren and his father. Early in the time of famine, which prevailed equally in Canaan and Egypt, Jacob reproved his helpless sons and sent them to Egypt, where he knew his son Joseph had been bought. Benjamin alone he kept with him. Joseph was now governor, an Egyptian in habits and speech, for like all men of large mind he had suffered no scruples of prejudice to make him a stranger to the people he ruled. In his exalted station he laboured with the zeal that he showed in all his various charges, prescribing himself at the sale of corn. They had, of necessity, to appear before Joseph, whose license for the purchase of corn was indispensable. Joseph had probably expected to see them, and he seems to have formed a deliberate plan of action. His conduct has on him the air of one of those who think with his ears rather than study the Bible, and even friends of that sacred book have hardly in this case done Joseph full justice (Niemeyer, Charakt., ii, 566; Heuser, Dieis. non inhumanitati sed prudensissime Josepham cum fratris faciens, Hal. 1770). Joseph's main object appears to have been to make his brothers in dread recognize his guilt in their conduct towards him. For this purpose suffering, then as well as now, was indispensable. Accordingly, Joseph feigned not to know his brothers, charged them with being spies, threatened them with imprisonment, and allowed them to return home to fetch their younger brother. It is only on this condition that one of them should remain behind in chains, with a prospect of death before him should not their words be verified. Then it was, and not before, that "they said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we slew him with our souls, and would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us. And Reuben said, Speak I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child, and ye would not hear? therefore, behold, also his blood is required." (xlii, 21). Upon this, after weeping bitterly, he by common agreement bound his brother Benjamin, and left him, asking earnestly, fully deeply concerned Joseph was for his family, how true and affectionate a heart he had, may be learned from the words which escape from the brothers in their entreaty that Jacob would allow Benjamin to go into Egypt, as required by Joseph: "The man asked us straitly of our youngest brother. What if your father yet alive? have ye another brother?" (xliii, 7).

At length Jacob consents to Benjamin's going in company with his brothers: "And God Almighty give you mercy before the man, that he may send away your other brother and Benjamin. If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved; yea, I am, I am bereaved." (ver. 14). The present consisting of balm, honey, spices, and myrrh, nuts and almonds, and with double money in their hands (double, in order that they might repay the sum which Joseph had caused to be put into each man's sack at their departure, if, as Jacob supposed, "it was an oversight"), they went again down to Egypt and stood before Joseph (xlii, 15); and there, too, stood Benjamin of its beloved Joseph, who agreed to his father's pledge of truthfulness was given. If it is asked why such a pledge was demanded, since the giving of it caused pain to Jacob, the answer may be thus: Joseph knew not how to demean himself towards his family until he ascertained its actual condition. That knowledge he could hardly be certain of, having been cut off from the mere words of men who had spared his life only to sell him into slavery. How had these wicked men behaved towards his venerable father? His beloved brother Benjamin, was he safe? or had he suffered from their jealousy and malice the worse fate with which he himself had been threatened? Nothing but the sign of Benjamin could answer these questions and resolve these details.

Benjamin had come, and immediately a natural change took place in Joseph's conduct: the brother began to claim his rights in Joseph's bosom. Jacob was safe, and Benjamin was Joseph's eye (Gen. 47: 9). But guilt is always the ready parent of fear; accordingly, the brother had no need of anything to fear. When taken to their own brother's house, they imagined they were being entrapped. A colloquy ensued between them and Joseph's steward, whence it appeared that the money put into their sacks, to which they now attributed their peril, was in truth a present from Joseph's hand, designed, as he so often acted, to aid his family in their actual necessities. The steward said, "Peace be to you; fear not; your God and the God of your father hath given you the treasure in your sacks. I had your money" (ver. 23).

Noon came, and with it Joseph, whose first question regarded their welfare, and said, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake? is he yet alive? And he lifted up his eyes and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son. And Joseph made haste, for his heart melted towards his brother, and Joseph's heart was troubled when he looked for him; and he entered into his chamber, and wept there. How does this look like harshness?

The connection brings into view an Egyptian custom, which is of more than ordinary importance, in connexion with the religious and political history of Pharaoh. This was the act of placing a brother in the place of another, as in Genesis 44: 22-23. And they set on (food) for him by himself (Joseph), and for them by themselves (the brethren), and for the Egyptians which did eat with them, by themselves: because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination with the Egyptians (ver. 39). This passage is also interesting, as proving that Joseph had not, in his princely grandeur, become ashamed of his origin, nor consented to receive adoption into a strange nation: he was still a Hebrew, waiting, like Moses after him, for the proper season to use his power for the good of his own people.

Other customs appear in this interesting narrative: "And they (the brothers) sat before him (Joseph), the first-born according to his birthright, and the youngest according to his youth." "And he sent messes (delicacies) unto them from before him; but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs" (ver. 32, 35). For Joseph had sat down to eat with his brethren, stretched out his length issued in joy and mirth (comp. ver. 18, 33, 34). The scenes of the Egyptian tombs show us that it was the custom for each person to eat singly, particularly among the great; that guests were placed according to their right of precedence, and that it was usual to drink freely, men and even women being represented as overpowered with wine, probably as an evidence of the liberality of the entertainments. See Banquet.

Joseph, apparently with a view to ascertain how far his brethren were faithful to their father, hit upon a plan which would in its issue serve to show whether they would make any, and what sacrifice, in order to fulfill their promise of quite truthfully giving Jacob in safety to Jacob. Accordingly, he orders not only that every man's money (as before) should be put in his sack's mouth, but also that his "silver cup, in which my lord drinketh, and whereby he divineth," should be put in the sack's mouth of the youngest. The brethren leave, but are soon overtaken by Joseph's steward, who charges them with having surreptitiously carried off this costly and highly-valued vessel. They, on their part, vehemently repel the accusation, adding, "with whomsoever of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord's bondmen." A search is made, and the cup is found in Joseph's brother's sack. Apprised, they return to the city. And now comes the hour of trial: Would they purchase their own liberation by surrendering Benjamin? After a most touching interview, in which they prove themselves worthy and faithful, Joseph declares himself unable any longer to withstand the appeal of parental affection. Once upon a time Judah, who is the spokesman, shows the deepest regard to his aged father's feelings, and entreats for the liberation of Benjamin even at the price of his own liberty. In the whole of literature we know of nothing more simple, natural, true, and unimpeachable, as the cords of this kind of bond in the Pentateuch, can we even understand what is meant by terming that collection of writings "the Hebrew national epic," or regarding it as an aggregation of historical legends. If here we have not history, we can in no case be sure that history is before us (chap. xliii, 10-17).

Most natural and impressive is the scene also which ensues, in which Joseph, after informing his brethren who he was, and inquiring, first of all, "Is my father alive?" expresses feelings free from the slightest taint of revenge, and even shows how, under divine Providence, the wrong he had done them was repaid to them in a thousandfold. In the words of the king of Egypt who had Joseph at his hands, "God sent me before you to preserve a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance." Five years had yet to ensue in which "there would be neither earing nor harvest," and therefore the brethren were directed to return home and bring Jacob down to Egypt with them. And when Joseph met his father Benjamin's neck and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck. Moreover, he kissed all his brethren and wept upon them; and after that his brethren talked with him" (xlv, 14, 15).

The news of the returning vessels was carried to Pharaoh, who, while pleased at Joseph's conduct, gave directions that Jacob and his family should come forthwith into Egypt: "I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land: regard not your stuff, for the good of all the land is yours." The brethren departed, being well provided for: "And to his father Joseph sent ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she-asses laden with corn, and bread, and meat for his father by the way." The intelligence which they bore to their father was of such a nature that "Jacob's heart failed, for he believed them not." When, however, he had recovered from the thus naturally told effects of his surprise, the venerable patriarch said, "Enough; Joseph, my son, is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die" (xlv, 26, 29). Accordingly Jacob and his family, to the number of three thousand and ten souls, go down to Egypt, and by the express efforts of Joseph, have all the ground in which they live and carry on their labors, where Joseph met his father: "And he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while." There Joseph "nourished his father and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families" (xlvii, 27). B.C.

5. Joseph had now to pass through the mournful scenes which attend on the death and burial of a father (Gen. I, 1-21). B.C. 1856. Having had Jacob embalmed, and seen the rites of mourning fully observed, the faithful and affectionate son—leave being obtained of the monarch—proceeded into the land of Canaan, in order, agreeably to a promise which the patriarch had exacted (Gen. xlvi, 29-31), to lay the old man's bones with those of his fathers, in "the field of Ephron the Hittite." Having performed with long and bitter mourning Jacob's funeral rites, Joseph returned into Egypt. The last recorded act of his life forms a most becoming close. After the death of their father, his brethren, unable, like all guilty people, to forget their criminality and characteristically finding it difficult to think that Joseph had really forgiven them, grew afraid, now they were in his power, that he would take an opportunity of inflicting some punishment on them. They accordingly go into his presence, and in using terms and an abrupt manner entreat his forgiveness. "Fear not!—this is his noble reply—"I will nourish you and your little ones."

6. By his Egyptian wife Asenath, daughter of the high-priest of Heliopolis, Joseph had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. xii, 50 sq.), whom Jacob adopted (xlviii, 5), and who accordingly took their place among the heads of the twelve tribes of Israel.

Joseph lived a hundred and ten years, kind and gentle in his affections to the last; for we are told, "The children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were brought up upon Joseph's knees" (I, 28). Having obtained a promise from his brethren that when the time came, as he assured them it would come, that God should visit them, and "bring them unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob," they would carry up his bones out of Egypt, Joseph at length "died, and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin." (I, 29). B.C. 1892. This promise was religiously fulfilled. His descendants, after carrying the corpse about with them in their wanderings, at length put it in its final resting-place in Shechem, in a parcel of ground that Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor, which became the inheritance of the children of Joseph (Josh. xxiv, 32). A tomb of which probably is the same as the one appertaining to travellers in the vicinity of Jacob's Well (Hackett's Illustrations, p. 197). It is a flat-roofed rectangular building surmounted by a dome, under which is pointed out the real tomb, in shape like a covered wagon (Wilson, Bible Landu, ii, 66).

The history of Joseph's posterity is given in the articles devoted to the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. Sometimes these tribes are spoken of under the name of Joseph (Josh. xiv, 4; xvii, 14, 17; xviii, 5; Judg. i, 23, 35, etc.), which is even given to the whole Israeliitish nation (Psa. lxxv, 1; lxxvi, 5; Amos v, 15; vi, 6). Ephraim is, however, the common name of his descendants, for the division of Manasseh gave almost the whole political weight to the brother-tribe (Psa. lxxvii, 67; Ezek. xxxvii, 16, 19; Zech. x, 6). That great people seems to have inherited all Joseph's ability with none of his goodness, and the very knowledge of his power in Egypt, instead of stimulating his offspring to follow in his steps, appears only to have constantly drawn them into a hankering after that forbidden land which began when Jeroboam introduced the calves, and ended only when a treasonable alliance laid Samaria in ruins and sent the ten tribes into captivity.

7. The character of Joseph is wholly composed of great materials, and therefore needs not to be minutely portrayed. We trace in it very little of that balance of good and evil, of strength and weakness, that marks most things human, and do not anywhere distinctly discover the results of the conflict of motives that generally occur in such great difficulty in judging men's characters. We have as full an account of Joseph as of Abraham and Jacob, a fuller one than of Isaac; and if we compare their histories, Joseph's character is the least marked by wrong or indecision. His first quality seems to have been the greatest resolution. He not only believed faithfully, but could endure patiently, and could command equally his good and evil passions. Hence his strong sense of duty, his zealous work, his strict justice, his clear discrimination of good and evil. Like all men of vigorous character, he loved power, but when he had gained it he used it with the greatest generosity. He seems to have striven to get men unconditionally in his power that he might be the means of good to them. Generosity in conferring benefits, as well as in forgiving injuries, is one of his distinguishing characteristics. With this strength was united the deepest tenderness. He was easily moved to tears, even weeping at the first sight of his brethren after they had sold him. His love for his father and Benjamin was not enfeebled by years of separation, nor by his great station. The wise man was still the same as the true youth. These great qualities explain his power of governing and administering, and his extraordinary flexibility, which enabled him to suit himself to each new position in life. The last trait to make up this great character was modesty, the natural result of the others.

In the history of the chosen race Joseph occupies a very high place as an instrument of Providence. He was "sent before" his people, as he himself knew, to preserve them in the terrible famine, and to settle them where they could multiply and prosper in the interval before the inquietude of the Canaanites was full. In the latter days of Joseph's life, he is the leading character among the Hebrews. He makes his father come into Egypt, and directs the settlement. He protects his kinsmen. Dying, he reminds them of the promise, charging them to take his bones with them. Blessed with many revelations, he is throughout a God-taught leader of his people. In the N. T. Joseph is only mentioned; yet the striking particulars of the persecution and sale by his brethren, his resisting temptation, his great degradation and yet greater exaltation, the saving of his people by his hand, and the confounding of his enemies, seem to indicate that he was a type of our Lord. He also connects the patriarchal with the Gospel dispensation, as an instance of the exercise of some of the highest Christian virtues under the less distinct manifestation of the divine will granted to the fathers.

2. The father of Igal, which latter was the Issacharite "spy" to explore Canaan (Numb. xiii. 30). B.C. ante 1651.

3. The second named of the sons of Asaph, appointed head of the first division of sacred musicians by David (1 Chron. xxv. 2, 9). B.C. 1014.

5. Son of Shebaniab, and one of the chief priests contemporary with Jehoiakim (Neh. xii. 14). B.C. post 536.

6. One of the "sons" of Bani who divorced his Genitive whale after the exile (Ezra x. 42). B.C. 459.

7. The son of Judah, and father of Semei, maternal ancestors of Jesus (Luke iii. 26); probably the same with Schemanian, the son of Oolah, and father of Schemian (1 Chron. iii. 21, 92). B.C. between 356 and 410.

9. (Iassaph.) Son of Oziel, and father of On, an ancestor of Judith (Judith viii. 1).

10. A young man of high character, son of Tobias, and nephew of the Jewish high-priest Onias II, whose avarice he rebuked, but prevented its evil consequences by propitiating Ptolemy, and becoming the collector of his taxes. His history is given at considerable length by Josephus (Ant. xii. 4, 2-19), including his unintentional marriage with his own niece, by whom he had a son named Ishmael, and, after the death of his wife, married Zeruiah, the sister of Absalom.

1.1. (Iosaph.) Son of Zacharias, left with Azarias as general of the Jewish troops by Judas Maccabaeus, and defeated by Gorgias, B.C. cir. 164 (1 Macc. v. 8, 56; Josephus, Ant. xii. 8, 5).

1.2. (Iossaph.) In 2 Macc. viii. 22; x. 19 Joseph is named as one of the heroes of Judas Maccabaeus apparently in place of John (Ewald, Gerack, iv. 384; note; Grimm, ad 2 Macc. viii. 22). The confusion of these two names is well seen in the various readings in Matt. xiii. 55. See Josaph.

2. Son of Heber, the Great, who left him in charge when he went to plead his cause before Antony, with injunctions to put Marianne to death in case he never returned; but this order, being disclosed to Marianne, led to Joseph's death by command of Herod through suspicion of criminal intercourse with Marianne (Josephus, Ant. xiv. 5, 6; Luke i. 26). He married Salome, Herod's sister (War, i. 22, 4). He seems to be the same elsewhere called Herod's treasurer (τραπεζιατης, Ant. xvi. 6, 5).

3. Son of Antipater, and brother of Herod the Great (Josephus, War, i, 8, 9), was sent by the latter with a large force to subdue the Idumeans (Ant. xiv. 14, 4, and 5), and to protect his sons by driving his rivals to act on the defensive against Machæus, neglecting which orders he lost his life in an engagement near Jericho (War, i. 17, 1-4).

He also had a son named Joseph (Ant. xviii. 5, 4), who seems to be the one mentioned as cousins (ἐκαίρως) of Archelaus (War, ii. 3, 2). He built Agrippaopolis, a relative of the high-priest Matthias, in whose place he officiated for a single day (apparently that of the annual atonement), in consequence of the accidental disqualification of the pontiff (Josephus, Ant. xvii. 6, 4).

3. Son of Abiathar, a relative of the high-priest Matthias, in whose place he officiated for a single day (apparently that of the annual atonement), in consequence of the accidental disqualification of the pontiff (Josephus, Ant. xvii. 6, 4).

4. The son of Simeon, the Saviour, being "the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ" (Matt. i. 16). By Matthew he is said to have been the son of Joseph, whose lineage is traced by the same writer through David up to Abraham. Luke represents him as being the son of Heloi, and traces his origin up to Adam. He appears to have had some special object in view, since he introduces his genealogical line with words of peculiar import: "Jesus being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heloi" (Luke iii. 23).—ος ἤπειρος, "as was supposed." In other terms, as accounted by law, as enrolled in the family, the mother of Joseph being the wife of his Warren, became thereby, in law (φυλακτος), the father of Jesus. See GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. He lived at Nazareth, in Galilee (Luke ii. 4), and it is probable that his family had been settled there for some time, since Mary lived there too (Luke i. 26, 27).

The statements of Holy Writ in regard to Joseph are few and simple. According to a custom among the Jews, traces of which are still found, such as hand-fasting among the Scotch, and betrothing among the Germans, Joseph had pledged his faith to Mary; but before the marriage consummation she proved to be with child. Grieved at this, Joseph was disposed to break off the connection; but, not wishing to make a public example of one whom he loved, he contemplated a private disruption of their bond. From this step, however, he is deterred by a heavenly messenger, who assures him that the conceive under this condition: &quot;And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins&quot; (Matt. i. 18 sq.; Luke i. 27). It must have been within a very short time of his taking her to his home that the decree went forth from Augustus (Caesar which obliged him to lead with their parents to Bethlehem. He was there with Mary and her infant born when the shepherds came to see the baby in the manger, and he went with them to the Temple to present the infant according to the law, and there heard the prophecy words of Simeon as he held him in his arms. When the wise men from the East came to Bethlehem to worship Christ, Joseph was there; and he went down to Egypt with them by night, when warned by an angel of the danger which threatened them; and on the second message he returned with them to the land of Israel, intending to reside at Bethlehem, the city of David; but, being afraid of Archelaus, he took up his abode, as before his marriage, at Nazareth, where he carried on his trade as a carpenter. When Jesus was twelve years old: Joseph and Mary took him with them to keep the Passover at Jerusalem, and when they returned to Nazareth he continued to act as a father to the child Jesus, and was always reputed to be so indeed.

Joseph was by trade a carpenter, in which business he probably educated Jesus (Thilo, Apor. i. 311). In Matt. xxii, 55, we read, "Is not this the son of the carpenter?" and in Mark vi, 3, "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary?" The term employed, ἄντρωπος, is of a general character, and may be fitly rendered by the English word "artisan or artist", signifying any one that labors in the fabricum (from Latin) of articles of ordinary use, whatever the material may be out of which they are made. See CARPENTER. Schles-ner (in voc.) asserts that the universal testimony of the ancient Church represents our Lord as being a carpenter's son. This is, indeed, the statement of Justin Martyr, and is repeated by Irenaeus (Adv. haeres. ii. 30. 1), and by Tertullian, who applies to Jesus, by saying that he made ἀποστολοὺς καὶ κυδώνια, ploughs and yokes; but Origen, in replying to Celsus, who indulged in jokes against the humble employment of our Lord, expressly denied that Jesus was so termed in the Gospels (see the passage cited in Otho's Jesus Christianus, p. 596, 1843), a declaration which suggests the idea that the copies which Origen read differed from our own; while Hilarius, on Matthew (quoted in Simon's Dictionnaire de la Bible, i. 691), asserts, in terms which cannot be mistaken, that Jesus was a "fabricium (I. f.) in various, passauber formantur, etc.

The ancient Jews all handicrafts were held in so much honor that they were prized and pursued by the first men of the nation. See ARTIFICER.

Jewish tradition (Hieros, Sheph. c. 14) names the father of Jesus Νατάλης, Penidara, or Penithra (Νάταλης, Midrash, Kohel, x. 5; lladavrop, Thilo, Apor. i. 528), and represents him (Orig. c. Cel. i. 32) as a rough soldier, who came from Gilead, and was the father of Jesus.
Joseph, the carpenter, is brought to Joseph. Another form of the legend sets him forth (Told. Jeshu, p. 8, ed. Wagenseil; comp. Epiph.
Her. 78, 7) under the name of Joseph Pendaria (Παντή νατάλης).

Christian tradition makes Joseph an old man when first espoused to Mary (Epiph. Her. 78, 7), being no less than eighty years of age, and father of four sons and two daughters. Theophylact, on Matt. xxii, 55, says that Jesus Christ had brothers and sisters, all children of Joseph, whom he had by his sister-in-law, wife of his brother Cleophas, who having died without issue, Joseph was obliged by law to marry his widow.
Of the sons, Jesus, the brother of the Lord, was, he states, the eldest born (Irenaeus, Adv. haeres. i. 25:3; Euse-ex Eccles. ii. 1) agrees in substance with Theophylact; so also does Epiphanius, adding that Joseph was fourscore years old when he married Mary. Jerome, from whom it appears that the alleged mother's name was Escha, opposes this tradition, and is of opinion that what are taken by some to be brothers and sisters are actually See JAMES; MART. The painters of Christian antiquity confine with the writers in representing Joseph as an old man at the period of the birth of our Lord—an evidence which is not to be lightly rejected, though the precise age mentioned may be but an approximation to the fact. Another story, which gives the name of Salome as that of Joseph's first wife, who was related to the family of John the Baptist. The origin of all the earliest stories and assertions of the fathers concerning Joseph, as, e.g., his extreme old age, his having sons by a former wife, his having the custody of Mary given to him by lot, and so on, is to be found in the apocryphal Gospels, of which the earliest is the Protevangelium of St. James, apprised of the work of Gnostics in the 2d century, quoted by Origen, and referred to by Clement of Alexandria and Justin Martyr (Tischendorf, Proleg. xiii). The same stories are repeated in the other apocryphal Gospels. The Monophysite Coptic Christians are said to have first assigned a festival to St.

Joseph in the Calendar, viz., on the 20th of July, which is thus inscribed in a Coptic Almanac: "Requies sancti seis justi Josephi fabri lignarii, Deipare Virginia Maria sponsi, qui pater Christi vocari promeruit." The apocryphal Historia Josephi fabri lignarii, which now exists in Arabic (ed. Wallisii Lips. 17), and Latin, Fabricius, Pseudopt. i. 800; also by Thilo and Tischendorf), is thought by Tischendorf to have been originally written in Coptic, and the festival of Joseph is supposed to have been transferred to the Western churches from the East as late as the year 1999. The above-named history is acknowledged to be quite apocryphal, and which belong probably to the 4th century. It professes to be an account given by our Lord himself to the apostles on the Mount of Olives, and placed by them in the library of Jerusalem. It ascribes 111 years to Joseph's life, and makes him old, and the father of four sons and two two daughters before the assumed marriage of Mary in this sentence: "Benediciones ejus et preces servat nos omnes, o fratres. Amen." The reader who wishes to know the opinion of the ancients on the obscure subject of Joseph's marriage may consult Jerome's acrimonious tract Contra Helvidium. He will see that Jerome highly disapproves of the canonisation of the so-called apocryphal (Gospels) of Joseph being twice married, and that he claims the authority of Ignatius, Polycarp, Ireneus, Justin Martyr, and "many other apostolical men," in favor of his own view, that our Lord's brethren were all his counte unto the age of 80, and that the work of Helvidius, which had been held by Eblon, Theodotus of Byzantium, and Valentine, that they were the children of Joseph and Mary. Those who held this opinion were called Antidicomariani, as enemies of the Virgin. (Epiphanius, Adv. haeres. i. iii. t. ii; Hier. xxxviii, also See Vener); comp. On the Virgin, art. Virgin Mary; Mill, On the Brethren of the Lord;

It is not easy to determine when Joseph died. That event may have taken place before his son entered on his public ministry. This has been argued from the fact that his mother only appeared at the feast at Cana in Galilee. The premises, however, hardly bear out the inferences. With more force of argument, it has been alleged (Simon, Dict. de la Bible) that Joseph must have been dead before the crucifixion of Jesus, else he would in all probability have appeared with Mary at the cross.
Certainly the absence of Joseph from the public life of Christ, and the failure of reference to him in the discourses and history, while "Mary" and "his brethren" not unfrequently appear, afford strong evidence not only of Joseph's death, but of the inferior part which, as the legal father only of our Lord, Joseph might have been expected to sustain. So far as our scanty materials enable us to form an opinion, Joseph appears to have been a good, kind, simple-minded man, who, while he afforded aid in every beneficial way to his son, yet by force of age, and by way of caution, would leave Mary unrestrained to use all the impressive and formative influence of her gentle, affectionate, pious, and thoughtful soul. B.C. cir. 45 to A.D.

Joseph was a noble officer of the Persian court. His name is found in the Greek text of the Old Testament as "Józêph" (Matthew 1:6, 12; 2:23; Acts 7:14). He was the son of Jacob and Mary, and the brother of Jesus Christ. Joseph was sold into slavery by his brothers and later rose to become the governor of Egypt. His story is told in the Book of Genesis, chapters 37-50.

Joseph was a man of great wisdom and integrity, and he was respected by both Egyptians and Jews. He was known for his ability to interpret dreams and was able to save Egypt from famine. His story is a testament to the power of faith and the importance of staying true to one's principles, even in the face of adversity.

Joseph's story is one of the most well-known stories in the Bible, and it continues to inspire people today. His life is a reminder of the power of hope and the importance of perseverance, even in the face of great challenges. and conveyed to Constantinople. On his return he found his friend and leader Gregory deod, and attached himself to another leader, John, on whose death he caused his body, together with that of Gregory, to be transferred to the deserted church of St. John Chrysostom, in connection with which he established a monastery.

Joseph was soon, by the attractiveness of his eloquence, filled with inmata. After this he was, for his stern and beneficent image of worship, banished to Cherone, apparently by the emperor Theophilus, who reign- ed from A.D. 829 to 842; but, on the death of the em- peror, Joseph b. Chija rejoined the court of the new emperor, and obtained, through the favor of the patriarch Ignatius, the office of cænonaphylax, or keeper of the sacred vessels in the great church of Constantinople. Joseph was equally acceptable to Ignatius and to his competi- tor and successor Photius. He died at an advanced age in A.D. 883. Joseph is chiefly celebrated as a writer of canones or hymns, of which several are extant in MS., but there is some difficulty in distinguishing his com- positions from those of Joseph of Thessalonica. His Canones in omnia Beatae Virginis Mariæ festa, and his Theologia, hymns in honor of the Virgin, scattered through the various liturgical books, were published, with a learned commentary and a life of Joseph, translated from the Greek of the Deacon, by Hippolytus Maracci, under the title of Marcius Josephi Hymnographi (Rome, 1661). The version of the life of Joseph was by Laizi Maracci, of Lucassau, and published by Jespers. Another version of the same life, but less exact, by the Jesuit Floritius, was published among the Vita Sancitorum Scolorum of Oc- taviano Cajetanus (Ottavio Gaetano), ii, 43 (Palermo, 1657, folio), and reprinted in the Acta Sancitorum (see below). Some writers suppose that there was another Joseph, a writer of hymns, mentioned in the title of a MS. typicon at Rome as of the monastery of St. Nicolaus Casularum (νας Κασταλίου). See Vita S. Josephi Hymnographi, in the Acta Sancitorum, s. d. III Aprilis, i, 289, etc., with the commentary of Prauicius of Papele- roche, and Appenine, p. 138 (Paris, 1727, folio); 79; Menologium Gradus, Ioseph, Basili, Imperatoris editum, s. d. Joseph ben-Chija (in the Talmud simply styled Rabbi Joseph), one of the greatest of Israel's Rabbis, was born in Babylon about A.D. 270. Rabbi Joseph was a disciple of Jehudah ben-Hekekel, the founder and president of the college at Pumbedita, and a fellow-student and intimate lifelong friend of the celebrated Rabbi Rabbah ben-Babila. Having censed Rabbi Rabba, the reputed author of the Midras Rabbah, or the traditional com- mentary on Genesis, whom he succeeded in the presi- dency at Pumbedita about A.D. 380. He died, however, only three years after (about A.D. 383). Joseph de- serves our notice not so much from his connection with the school at Pumbedita, which, though brief, was yet of marked benefit to the development of Biblical scholar- ship at that centre of Jewish learning, as for his Chal- ded versions of the Hebrew Scriptures (i. e. the Psalms, Proverbs, and Job), particularly of the Hagiographa, of which alone the authorship can be ascribed to him with any certainty (comp. the Rabbinic Biblia). Some Jewish critics credit him with a version of the whole O. T. ; and, indeed, from passages quoted in the Talmud (comp. Mord. Katan, 26, a; Peschem, 68, a; Menachoth, 110, a; Jonah, 92, b; 77, b; Aboda Zara, 44, a; Kidde- sha, 111, b; Nedarim, 38, a; Baba Kama, 68, b; Berachoth, 28, a) from a paraphrase with which he is accredited, it would appear that he translated Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosca, Amos, Obadiah, Zephaniah, and Zechariah, since these passages are from these books, and are distinctly cited in the Talmud.

ing it to the earlier part of the 10th century is that Dunash b.-Tanaim (who flourished about 955) knew the work and spoke of parts of it (comp. Milman's Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ii, 6, note). But as to the chronicle itself, it consists of six books, each of which the author explains in a genealogical table in Gen. xi.; then passes on to the history of Rome, Babylon, Cyrus, and the fall of Babylon; reumes again the history of the Jews; describes the times of Daniel, Zerubbabel, Esther, etc.; gives an account of Alexander the Great, his connection, his exploits, and expeditions to the East; and continuesto the history of the Jews; of Heliopolis's assault on the Temple; the translation of the O.T. into Greek; the deeds of the Maccabees; the events of the Herodians; and the last war which terminated in the destruction of the Temple by Titus. The authorities quoted in this remarkable book are: 1. Nicolaus the Damascene; 2. Strabo of Capadocia; 3. Titus Livius; 4. Togthas of Jerusalem; 5. Pororpus of Rome; 6. The history of Alexander, written in the year of his death by Magi; 7. The book of the antediluvian patriarch Cainan b.-Eneas; 8. Books of the Greeks, Medians, Persians, and Macedonians; 9. Josephus in Alexander about the wonders of India; 10. Treaties of alliance of the Romans; 11. Ciceron, who was in the Holy of Holies of the Temple during the reign of Pompey; 12. The intercalary years of Julius Caesar, composed for the Nazarenes and Grecians, and the chronicles of the Christians. Josephus, in it, 14. The constitutional diploma which Vespasian venerated so highly that he kissed every page of it: 15. The Alexandrian Library with its 950 volumes; 16. Jewish histories which are lost; and, 17. The national traditions which have been translated orally. The first printed edition of this work appeared in Mantua, 1476—1479, with a preface by Abraham ben-Salmon Chasot. A reprint of this edition (the text vitiated), with a Latin version by Münster, was published at Basle, 1511. There appeared an edition from a MS. containing a somewhat different version of the work, and divided into eleven chapters, edited by Tarn Ihn-Jaach ben-David (Constantinople, 1510). New editions of it were published in Venice, 1544; Cracow, 1589; Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1689; Amsterdam, 1728; Prague, 1784; Zol- kiew, 1805; Vilna, 1819. It was partly translated into Arabic by Zacharia ben-Saïd El-Tamini about 1255, and into English by Peter Morwong (Loud, 1586, 1561, 1575, 1579, 1602). There are two other Latin translations, besides the one by Münster, 1541; one was made by the learned English Orientalist, John Gagnier (Oxford, 1719), and one by Breithaupt; the last has also the Hebrew text and the German notes. He always continued to be the student's edition. There are German translations by Michael Adam (Zurich, 1546), Moses b.-Bezailei (Prague, 1607), Abraham ben-Morlecai Cohen (Amsterdam, 1661), and Seligmann Reis (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1707). Joseph ben-Shemtob, a noted Jewish philosopher, polemic, and commentator, flourished in the middle of the 15th century in Castile, and was in high office at the court of Juan II. He was especially noted in his day as a philosopher, and wrote many philosophic works, and made important contributions to the history of Jewish philosophy. He was especially rigid in defence of Judaism as a religious system, in opposition to the Christian, and in that line freely used Prophit Du-

John's writings, upon which he commented. See PASS.

In his later days he lost his position at court through the machinations of the papists and the so-called converts from Judaism, and finally died the death of martyrdom about 1460. His works of especial interest are: a) his commentary on the Mishna, titled Prophit Duran against Christianity (Constantinople, 1577); contained also in Geiger's Bibliotheca Rabbinica, 1844:—(2) Course of Homilies delivered in the synagogue on different Sabbaths on various portions of the Bible, entitled הינני קדש, The Eye of the Reader (still in MS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, Codex Michael, 581);—(3) Commentary on Lamentations, composed at Medina del Campo in the year 1441 (MS. by De Ross, No. 177).—(4) Commentary on Genesis ii. 1-14, being the Sabbath lesson which commences the Jewish year [see HAPITAH]; and—(5) Exposition of Deut., xv, 11. Josephus (Ἰωάννης ὁ Ἰουδαῖος, Ιωάννης), the Greek-Latin form (1 Esdr. ix, 34) of the Heb. name Jesus (q. v.) 6 ( Ezra x, 42).

Josephus, Flavius, the celebrated Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem A.D. 37. His father's name was Mattathias, and in his autobiography (the only source left us to write his history, as the works of his rival, Justus of Tiberias, are unhappily lost) he lays claim to royal and sacred descent and alliances to the renown he enjoyed while yet a youth (Life, i, 1). His early years seem to have been spent in close study of the Jewish traditions and the O.T. writings. Satisfied with all of the three principal Jewish sects while yet a young man he spent three years as the follower of one Banus, an eremite, in the desert, and at last joined the sect of the Pharisees. He was only 19 when he left Banus, and he joined the Pharisees between 19 and 30, when he went to Rome. Soon afterwards, the imprisonment of some Jewish priests by the procurator Felix afforded him the means of pleasing his people's cause before the emperor himself at the Roman capital, whither these men had been sent. On the way he was shipwrecked (some have unwarrantably imagined that he was Paul's companion in that disastrous voyage), but, being rescued by a Cyrenian vessel, he made his way to Rome. He there passed several years, and in some of them also ingratiated himself in the favor of the empress, and at length returned home loaded with presents. He found the mass of his countrymen determined on a revolt from the empire, and he anxiously sought to dissuade them sofro rash a course. The Jews, however, refused to listen to his advice; and the only alternatives for him were either to follow the popular will, and thus perhaps make himself the leader of his people, or to return to Rome, and there receive the rewards of treachery. In his description of the Jewish insurrection he has given us a graphic account of the numerous plots and their concerted working: and he became a fugitive during the whole period of his life. After the disastrous retreat of Cestius Gallus from Jerusalem, and the barbarous massacre of the Jews at Sepphoris (q. v.) and the Syrian cities, the most peacefully inclined of the Jews joined the zealots, and Josephus, no less than had hesitated as to the best course to be pursued. With great ostentation of revenge and self-declaration, he declared in favor of war —a covenant," and he soon secured for himself the appointment as general. Together with Joazar and Judas he was sent to Galilee, the province on which the storm would prevail, where, however, devoted themselves to their priestly functions, and Josephus became the sole commander (Life, 47; War, Finding the Galilean Jews divided among themselves (see John of Gischala), and fearing that his command was too weak to meet the army of the approaching Vespasian, he retired to the Jewish stronghold of Jotapata, and there awaited the attack of the Romans. For fear of the treachery of the Roman soldiery to deeds that immortalized his name. (For an interesting description of this siege, see Weber and Holzmann, Gesch. d. Volks Israels, ii, 475 sq.; Milman, Hist. of the Jews [Midleton's edition], ii, 252 sq.) After his surrender to Vespasian he was put in chains, with a view to being sent to Rome. Through the influence of Herod the Great, he was saved from this danger by predicting (he distinctly claims the gift of prophecy, War, iii, 8, 9) to Vespasian his future elevation to the imperial throne, but was still held in confinement for three years, until, on the realization of his prediction, his chains were cut from him, as a sign that he was destined for great things. By 43 A.D. at the latest, Vespasian had been declared emperor by the Roman soldiers in the East, and he immediately set out for the West, leaving Titus in command, with orders to hasten the conclusion of the war still raging in Palestine. In this expedition on Jerusalem Josephus accompanied Titus. Titus had supposed this task, with the aid of the title of the "renegade" (so Milman calls him), an easy one; but the Jews braved the attack of the Romans much more obstinately than the latter had expected, and, finally, Josephus was induced to go forth and urge his countrymen to capitulate, and thus to save the place from certain and total destruction. The people, by his account, were touched and ready to yield, but the leaders remained obstinate; but the fact is that they were naturally distrustful to listen to the counsels of a man who had quitted them in the hour of their greatest need. They were, however, that among his countrymen he would hardly find a safe refuge, he returned with Titus to Rome to enjoy the honors which Vespasian might bestow upon him. He was received with great kindness by the emperor; but, although the privileges of Roman citizenship were conferred upon him and an annual pension awarded him, he was detested by the Romans no less than by the Jews. It is supposed that his death occurred in the early years of Trajan's reign, perhaps A.D. 103. For other facts of a more directly personal character, such as his three marriages, the names of his sons, etc., see the seventy-six chapters of his life, and the following other passages of his other works: Aion, i, 9, 10; War, i, ii, 20, 3 sq.; 21, 2 sq.; iii, 7, 13 sq.; 8, 1 sq.; vii, vi; Ant. ed. Havercamp, i, 5, 226, 586, 545, 682, 982; Suidas, s. v. Ιωάννης. The character of Josephus has been very differently delineated by different writers. From his own works, especially the Aion, it is evident that although he dealt rather treacherously with his people, he yet felt a pride in the antiquity of the nation and in its ancient glories; and in the description of the misfortunes of the Jews he is by no means wanting in sympathy for them. Thus his account of the miserable fate of Jerusalem is altogether free from that tone of revolting coldness which shocks us in Xenophon's account of the downfall of Athens (Hell. ii, 2, 3 sq.). Yet the mildest interpretation that his conduct can receive certainly is that he despaired (as earnest patriots never do) of his country, and that he deserted his countrymen in their greatest extremity. From the very beginning, he appears to have looked on the nation as hopeless, and to have cherished the intention of making peace with Rome whenever he could. Thus he told some of the chief men of Tiberias that he was yet aware of the invincibility of the Romans, though he thought it safer to dissemble and he advised them to do the same, and to wait for a convenient season — περιμένων καιρόν (Life, 55; compare War, iii, 5); and we find him again, in his attack on Justus the historian (Life, 65), earnestly defending himself from the charge of having in any way caused the war with Rome. Had this feeling originated in a religious conviction that the Jewish nation had forfeited God's favor, the case, of course, would have been different; but such a spirit of living, practical faith we do not discover in Josephus. Holding in the main the abstract doctrines of a Pharisee, but with the principles and temper of a Herodian, he strenuously attempted to unite his religion to heathen tastes and prejudices; and this by actual commissions (Ottius, Prætermissa a Josepho, appended to his Spicilegium), no less than by a nationalistic system of modification (Smith, Dict. Greek and Rom. Biog., ii, 612). A more favorable opinion is somewhat expressed by Josephus, as he appears in the gelicit Quiet, Review, 1870, p. 420. Prof. F. W. Farrar (in Kitto, Cyclop. Bibl. Literature, s. v.) has perhaps best summed up the religious character of Josephus as that of "a strange mixture of the bigoted Pharisee and the time-seeing Herodian," and as "mingling the national pride of the patriot with the apathy of the subject." Very different is the opinion of all on the writings of Josephus. Even in his day he was greatly lauded for his literary abilities. Though a Jew by birth, he had so audibly acquired the Greek that he could be counted among the classic writers in that language. St. Jerome designates him as the "Grecus Livius" (Epist. ad Eustach.); and, to come nearer our own days, Niebuhr pronounces him a Greek writer of singular purity (Aec. Hist. iii, 455). But, with all, he is hardly deserving of the epithet φιλολόγης, so often bestowed on him (Suidas, s. v. 'Ιωάννης). He sets himself, however, as a defender of the Jewish religion against the attacks of Philo and Simus and Philostratos, says Scaliger, De Jenua. Temp. Preec. et.). It is true, he understood the duty and importance of veracity in the historian (Ant. xiv, 1; War, i, 1; c. Apion, i, 19); nevertheless, 'he is," says Niebuhr (Lett. Rom. Hist. l. c.), "often untrue, and his history of the wars and events of the war abound in distortions of historical facts, and in falsifications which arise from his inordinate national pride; and wherever he deals in numbers, he shows his Oriental love of exaggeration" (this charge is, in a measure, refuted, however, in Stud. u. Krit. 1855, p. 48). But, even though Josephus may not in all things be implicitly relied upon, his writings are the best theologian especially invaluable, and we may well say, with Casaubon and Farrar, that it is by a singular providence that his works, which throw such a flood of light on Jewish affairs, have been preserved to us. They are of immense service in the entire Biblical department, as may be seen from the frequent references that have been made to his writings throughout this Cyclopaedia, in the elucidation of the history, geography, and archaeology of Scripture. Yet by this it must by no means be inferred that we detract in the least from our former statement, that Josephus was not an unadulterated author of the reflection of the Biblical writings. "In spite of his constant assertions (Ant. x, 11)," says Farrar (in Kitto), "he can have had no real respect for the writings which he so largely illustrates. If he had felt, as a Jew, any deep or religious appreciation of the O. T. history, which he professes to follow (οίκείος προσεχής καὶ θεοφάνους, Ant. i, proem.), he would not have tampered with it as he does, mixing it with pseudo-philosophical fancies (Apios, i, 10), with groundless Jewish Hugadoth or traditions (such as the three years' war of Moses with the Ethiopians, the love of Tharbis for him, etc. : Ant. ii, 10, 2), and with quotations from heathen writers of very different authorship (Ant. vii, 5, 9, 10, De Aritrd, p. 211). The worst charge, however, against him is his constant attempt, by alterations and suppressions (and especially by a rationalistic method of dealing with miracles, which contrasts strangely with his credulous fancies), to make Jewish history palatable to Greek readers. For to such an extent has this, that J. Ludolphius calls him 'fabulator saepius quam historicus' (Hist. Ethiop. p. 230). Thus it omits all the most important Messianic prophecies; it manipulates the book of Daniel in a most unsatisfactory manner (Ant. ix, 11); he speaks in a very loose way about Moses and Abraham (Ant. i, 8; ii, 15); and, though he can swallow the romance of the pseudo-Aristaeus, he rationalizes the account of the Exodus and Jonah's whale (Ant. ii, 15, 6; ix, 10, 2). On the whole subject of his credibility as a writer, his omissions, his variations, and his pandering to Gentile taste, comp. J. A. Fabre, De Joseph. et quorum Librum Edidit, in Jan Dale, De Aritaeis, ii, xi; De Idololatria, vii; Brinch, Examen Hist. Flavi. Joseph. in Havercamp, ii, 309 sq.; Ottius, Speciliegum ex Josepho; Ittigius, Prolegomena; Usher, Epist. ad Lud. Capitolium, p. 42; Whiston's Dissertation, etc.

For his literary interest, perhaps, we may first of all note that the readers must be the relation which Josephus, living as he did in the age of Christ himself, sustained towards Christianity. Some have gone so far as to assert not only the authenticitv of passages in his writings alluding to Christ, etc. (see below), but have even made out of Josephus an Evangelistic Christian (Whiston, Bence-Jones, 1760). If it is a true follower of Jesus the Christ, Prof. Farrar (in Kitto), speaking on this point, says: "Nothing is more certain than that Josephus was no Christian (ἐπάργυρος τὴ Ἡ σαοί ὡς Χρήστος, Orig. c. Cels. i, 85); the whole tone of his mind was alien from the noble simplicity of Christian belief, and as we have here already, he was not even a good Jew. Whatever, therefore, may be thought about the passages alluding to John the Baptist (Ant. xviii, 5, 2), and James, 'the Lord's brother' (ibid. xx, 9, 1), which may possibly be genuine, there can be no reasonable doubt that the famous allusion of Josephus (Ant. xviii, 3, 5) is either absolutely spurious or largely interpolated. The silence [partial or total] of Josephus on a subject of such importance, and with which he must have been so thoroughly acquainted, is easily explicable; and it is intrinsically much more probable that he should remain silent over the subject than should the work be done also by his contemporary, Justus of Tiberias, Phot. Cod. Bibl. 83) than that he should only have devoted itself to a few utterly inadequate lines. Even if he had been induced to do this by some vague hope of getting something by it from Christians like Flavius Clemens, he certainly would not have expressed himself in a language so strong (ἐγένετο αὐτοίς λόγια γονίς), and still less would he have vouched for the Messiahs, the miracles, or the resurrection of Jesus. Justin, Tertullian, Chrysostom, Origen, and even Photius, knew nothing of the passage, nor does it appear till the time of Eusebius (Hist. Ecles. i, 2, Dem. pr. Alex. iii, 5), a man for whom Niebuhr can find no better name than 'a de-testable falsifier,' and one whose historical credibility is well nigh given up. Whether Eusebius forged it himself or borrowed it from the marginitia of some other Christian, it cannot be determined, but that Josephus did not write it [at least in its present form] may be regarded as settled. Nay, the very next sentence (Ant. xvii, 3, 4) is a disgusting story, wholly irrelevant to the tenor of the narrative, and introduced in all probability for the sole purpose of a blasphemous parody on the miracles of Jesus, such as was usual with Rabbinical writers (e.g. in the Sepher Toladeth Jekuth; see Wagensell, Tela Ignea Satanae; see Jesus Christ).

That Josephus intended obliquely to discredit some of the chief Christian doctrines by representing them as having been anticipated by the Essenes seems by no means improbable (comp. De Quincey's Works, vol. ix, The Essenes). For a compendium of the abundant literary references to Josephus, see Van Daele, De Aritaeis, p. 34. The chief treatises are, Daubus, Pro testimonio Fl. Jos. de Jesu Christ (London, 1706); reprinted in Havercamp; Böhmer, Ueber des Fl. Josu. Zeugnisse von Christus (Lips. 1823); Le Moyn, Var. Sacr, ii, 361, Heinichen, Excurs. i, ad Euseb. H. E. iii, 331; comp. also Langen, Propheten und Prophetenizeiten (Freib. 1866), x, 440 sq.; Stud. u. Krit. 1856, 840 sq.

It remains for us only to add a list of the works of Josephus (here we mainly follow Smith [Hist. Gr. and Rom. Bks. v. 1.], which are, 1. A History of the Jewish War, (τοῦτοι γὰρ Φαβροτοί αἰανοί, οὐδὲν ἑκατέρους ἡμῖν γνώσατε γὰρ ὁ ἠλώνος, i.e. the seven Jewish tribes to which he wrote it first in his own language (the Syro-Cahalite), and then translated it into Greek, for the information of European readers (War, 1, 1). The original is no longer extant. The Greek was published about A.D. 75, under the patronage and with the permission of Emperor Vespasian, but it appears among the works of Josephus II, which contain fewer than sixty-two letters to Josephus, bore testimony to the care and fidelity displayed in it. It was admitted into the Palatine library, and its author was honored with a statue at Rome. It commences with the capture of Jerusalem by Titus in the year 70, and ends with the events before Josephus' own time, and gives a detailed account of the fatal war with Rome (Josephus, Life, p. 65: Eusebius, Hist. Ecles. iii, 9; Jerome, Catalog. Script. Ecl. p. 13: Ittigius, Prolegomena; Fabricius, Ebd. Grce. v, 4: Vossius, De Hist. Grce. p. 229, ed. Westminster:—2. Jewish Antiquities, in twenty books, completed about A.D. 90, and addressed to Epaphroditus. The title, as well as the number of books, may have been suggested by the Παμεμαίρκεια τοιχολογία of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. The work extends from the creation of the world to A.D. 66, the 12th year of war. It is composed largely of the works of the pseudo-Josephus. See Josephus ben-Gorion:—3. His Life, is one book. This is an autobiography appended to the Antiquities, and is addressed to the same Epaphroditus. It cannot, however, have been written earlier than A.D. 97, the year before Josephus' death. Is (ibid. 65): —4. Κατά Απίωνος (a treatise against Apion), in two books, also addressed to Epaphroditus. It is in answer to such as impugned the antiquity of the Jewish nation on the ground of the silence of Greek writers respecting it. The title, "against Apion," is rather a misnomer, and is applicable only to a portion of the second book (1-18). It exhibits considerable learning, and is highly commended by Jerome. The greek text is deficient at ii, 5-9: —5. The Fourth of Maccabees (οι Μακεδανοίς, ὡς ἑπικοινωνίας λογομεθη) is, in one book. The genuineness of this treatise has been called in question, and was together (as was also Eusebius, Hist. Lit. Grec. v, 7; Ittigius, Prolegomena). Certainly, however, it does not read like his works. It is an extremely declamatory account of the martyrdom of the seven Maccabees and their mother, in the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes: and this is prefaced by a discussion on the superstitious nature which reason possesses de jure over pleasure and pain. Its title has reference to the zeal for God's cause thus manifested by various persons and nations. There is a paraphrase of it by Erasmus, and in some Greek copies of the Bible it was inserted as the fourth book of the Maccabees (Fabricius, L. C.). There are besides these, also attributed to him:— 6. The treatise "Πρωτόκολλον των πατριών," which was certainly not written by Josephus. For an account of it, see Phoebus, Cod. x. v. viii.; Fabricius, Bibliogr. Græc. v. viii.; Ittigius, Prolegomena, ed. ii. 7. Jerome (Pref. ad Lib. xi Comment. on 2 Thessal., chap. ii. 6) states that one of Josephus's sons, Daniel, was the student of Josephus's teaching for the seventy years of his life, but he probably refers to some other Josephus.—8. At the end of his Antiquities Josephus mentions his intention of writing a work in four books on the Jewish notions of God and his essence, and on the rationale of the Mosaic laws, but this task he never accomplished. At any rate, the works have not come down to us. (See Whiston's note, Ant. ad fin.; Fabricius, Bibliogr. Græc. v. viii.)

The writings of Josephus first appeared in print in a Latin translation, with no notice of the place or date of publication, contained in a portion of the Antiquities. These, with the seven books of the Jewish War, were reprinted by Schübler (Augsb. 1470) in Latin; and there were many editions in the same language of the whole works, and of portions of them, before the edict princes of the Greek text appeared in 1844, edited by A. Schimper. Since then the works of Josephus have frequently been printed, both in the Greek and in many other languages. One of the most valuable editions is that by Hudson (Oxf. 1730, 2 vols. fol.). The text is founded on a most careful and extensive collation of MSS., and the edition is further enriched by notes and indices. The principal English versions are those of Lodge (London, 1692): one from the French of D'Andilly (Oxford, 1676), reprinted at London, 1688); that of L'Estrange (London, 1702), and that of Whiston (London, 1757). The two last-mentioned versions have frequently been reprinted in various shapess. See, besides the authorities already noticed, Grätz, Geschichte d. Juden, iii. 399 sq.; Weber and Holzmann, Gesch. d. Juden, 467 sq.; Joel, Gesch. d. Juden, u. s. Skizzen, i. 225, 319, 444; De Wette, Hebr. jüd. Archäologie, p. 9; Ewald, Gesch. See James; Jude. He was the only one of the three brethren who was not an apostle—a circumstance which has given occasion to some unsatisfactory conjecture. It is, perhaps, more reasonable that those of them were apostles than that the fourth was not. A.D. 28.—Ritto. See Jesus Christ.

tile movements of the five confederate chiefs of the Amorites. Joshua, aided by an unprecedented hailstorm and a miraculous prolongation of the day (see below), obtained a decisive victory over them at Makkedah, and proceeded at once to subjugate the south country as far as Kadesh-barnea. He then returned to the camp at Gilgal near half of Palestine.

In another campaign he marched to the waters of Merom, where he met and overthrew a confederacy of the Canaanite chiefs in the north, under Jabin, king of Hazor; and in the course of a protracted war he led his victorious soldiers to the gates of Zidon and into the valley of Lebanon under Hermon. In six years, six nations, with thirty-one kings, swell the roll of his conquests; amongst others the Anaikim—the old terror of Israel—are specially recorded as destroyed everywhere except in Philistia. It must be borne in mind that the extensive conquests of Joshua were not intended to achieve, and did not achieve the complete extirpation of the Canaanites, many of whom continued to occupy isolated strongholds throughout the land. (See below.)

Joshua, now stricken in years, proceeded, in conjunction with Eleazar and the heads of the tribes, to complete the conquest of the conquered land. When that was accomplished, Timnath-serah in Mount Ephraim was assigned by the people as Joshua's peculiar inheritance. The tabernacle of the congregation was established at Shiloh, six cities of refuge were appointed, forty-eight cities were allotted to Levi, and the trans-Jordanic tribes dismissed in peace to their homes.

After an interval of rest, Joshua convoked an assembly from all Israel. He delivered two solemn addresses reminding them of the marvelous fulfilment of God's promises to their fathers, and warned them of the conditions on which their prosperity depended; and, lastly, he caused them to renew their covenant with God at Shechem, a place already famous in connection with Jacob (Gen. xxxv, 4) and Joseph (Josh. xxiv, 92). He died at the age of 110 years, and was buried in his own city, Timnath-serah (Josh. xxvii, B.C. 1350. According to Schwarz (Pal. p. 147), his grave, ornamented with a handsome monument, is still pointed out at Ke far Charas.

2. His Character.—Joshua's life has been noted as one of the few very few which are recorded in history with some fulness of detail, yet without any stain upon them. In his character have been traced, under an Oriental grace and fervour of devotion, the chivalry of Western chroniclers and poets in the Middle Ages; the character of a devout warrior, blameless and fearless, who has been taught by serving as a youth how to command as a man; who earns by manly vigor a quiet, honored old age; who combines strength with gentleness, ever looking up for and obeying the divine impulse with the simplicity of a child, while he yields great power and directs it calmly, and without swerving, to the accomplishment of a high, unselfish purpose.

All that part of the book of Joshua which relates his personal history seems to be written with the unconscionable vivid power of an eye-witness. We are not merely taught to look with a distant reverence upon the first man who bears the name which is above every name. We stand by the side of one who is admitted to hear the words of God, and see the vision of the Almighty. The image of the armed warrior is before us as when in the sight of two armies he lifted up his spear over unguarded Ai. We see the majestic presence which inspired all Israel (iv, 14) with awe; the mild father who communed with Achan; the calm, dignified judge who pronounced sentence; the devoted warrior prostrating himself before the captain of the enemy's host. We see the lonely man in the height of his power, separate from those about him, the last survivor, save one, of a famous generation; the honored old man of many deeds and many sufferings, gathering his dying energy for an attempt to bind his people more closely to the service of God whom he had so long served and worshiped, and whom he was ever learning to know more and more.

The great work of Joshua's life was more exciting but less hopeful than that of Moses. He gathered the first fruits of the autumn harvest where his predecessor had reaped the wheat of spring. It was a far lighter task to watch beside the cradle of a mighty nation, and to train its early footsteps in laws which should last for centuries; and it was a fit end to a life of expectation to gaze with longing eyes from Pisgah upon the Land of Promise. But so much brightness gleaned upon the fields of Canaan by Joshua did not light the way for the people with foreboding, fell from him as he sat "under the oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord in Shechem.

The excitement of his battles was past; and there had grown up in the mind of the pious leader a consciousness that it is the tendency of prosperity and success to make a people wanton and worldly-minded, idolaters in spirit if not in act, and to alienate them from God.

Holy Scripture itself suggests (Heb. iv, 8) the consideration of Joshua as a type of Christ. Many of the Christian fathers have enlarged upon this view; and Bishop Pearson, who has collected their opinions (On the Character and Design of the Jewish History, pp. 251-253), points out the following and many other typical resemblances: (1) the name common to both; (2) Joshua brings the people of God into the land of promise, and divides the land among the tribes; Jesus brings his people into the presence of God, and assigns them their crowns of victory as Joshua succeeded Moses and completed his work, so as the Gospel of Christ succeeding the law, announced (see by whom all that believe are justified from all things from which we could not be justified by the law of Moses (Acts xiii, 39); (4) as Joshua, the minister of Moses, renewed the rite of circumcision, so Jesus, the minister of the circumcision, brought in the circumcision of the heart (Rom. xvii, 8, ii, 29).

3. Difficulties in his Narrative.—It has been questioned whether the captain of the Lord's host (ch. v, 13-15) was a created being or not. Dr. W. H. Mill discusses this point at full length and with great learning, and decides in favor of the former alternative (On the Historical Character of St. Luke's First Chapter, Camb. 1841, p. 92). But J. G. Abicht (De Duce Exercitus, etc., etc., Nov. Thea, Theol. philologico-philogo, 508) is of opinion that he was the uncreated angel, the Son of God. Compare also Pfeiffer, Diff. Script. Loc. p. 173. See ANGEL.

The chronology and the names of the chief conquests are a subject of the most intense difficulty. The chronology is fully discussed by Dean Graves, On the Pentateuch, pt. iii, lect. i. He concludes that the extermination of the Canaanites was justified by their crimes, and that the employment of the Jews in such extermination was quite consistent with God's method of governing the world. Professor Fairbairn (Typeology of Scripture, bk. iii, ch. 4, § 1, ed. 1854) argues with great force and candor in favor of the complete agreement of the principles on which the war was carried on by Joshua with the principles of the Christian dispensation. See CA-

Among the supernatural occurrences in the life of Joshua, none has led to so much discussion as the prolongation of the day of the battle of Makkedah (x. 12-14). No great difficulty is found, in deciding as Pfeiffer has done (Diff. Script. loc. p. 173) between the length of the day and the shortening of the night. Joshua, in connection with both days with the Egyptian tradition mentioned by Herodotus, ii, 142. But since modern science revealed the stupendous character of this miracle, modern criticism has made several attempts to explain it away. It is regarded by Le Clerc, Duhou, and others, as a mere transcription of the chronicle of the east's host. It is called, following Iliken, as a mistake of the time of day: by Winer and many recent German critics, with whom Dr. Davidson (Intro. to O. T., p. 644) seems to agree, as a mistake of the meaning or the authority of a poetical contributor to the book of Joshua. So Ezraki (Gen. Jer. ii, 920) traces in the latter part of verse 13 an terpolation by the hand of that anonymous Jew whom he supposes to have written the book of Deuteronomy, and here to have misunderstood the vivid conception of an old poet; and he cites numerous similar conceptions from the old poetry of Greece, Rome, Arabia, and Persia. But the literal and natural interpretation of the text, as intended to describe a miracle, is sufficiently vindicated by Deyling, Observ. Sacra, i. 19, p. 100; and G. J. Abicht, De stitumia Sodi sac. Noe, Theol. philol., i. 516; and is forcibly stated by Bishop Watson in the fourth letter in his Apology for the Greek, Roman, Arabic, Persian, and Sabean, from the Italian, Trieste, 1899) understands the word הַלָּדוֹ, "stand still" (lit. be dumb), to signify merely cease to shine, and the expression "hasted not to go down a whole day" as equivalent to withheld its full light. In other words, there was an eclipse: how this could be of service to the Hebrews does not appear.

See GIBSON; JASHER.

4. Length of his Administration.—According to Joshua (Ant. v. 1, 29), Joshua commanded the Jews twenty-five years, but, according to other Jewish chronologers, twenty-seven years. The Tzemach Dardel, on the years of the Jewish era 2489 and 2496, remarks: "It is written in the Seder Olam that Joshua judged Israel twenty-five years, commencing from the year 2488 immediately from the death of Moses, to the year 2516. This, however, would not be known to us but for cabalistic tradition, but in some degree also by reasoning," etc. Hottinger (Synogoga, p. 469) says: "According to the Tzemach Dardel, Joshua was ten years younger than Moses; and when the Israelites left Egypt; she playd the harlot during the forty years in which the Israelites were in the desert. She became the wife of Joshua, and eight prophets descended from her, viz. Jeremiah, Mahasias, Hamanias, Shabbaoth, Baruch, Ezra, and Zedekiah. Some say also that Huliah the prophet was her descendant. Some of those who have endeavoured to reduce the rule of Joshua to seventeen, and others to twenty-one years. There is no good reason for departing from the number assigned by Josephus (see Mith. Quart. Rev. 1856, p. 450). See CUMMINS.

5. Other Traditional Notices.—Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. in Matt. i, 5, and Chornog. Lucea prav. iv, § 8) quotes Jewish traditions likewise to the effect that the sepulchre of Joshua was adorned with an image of the sun in memory of the miracle of Ajaion. The Sept. and the Arabic version of the book of Joshua, xxiv, 30, state that in his sepulchre were deposited the flint-knives which were used for the circumcision at Gilgal (Josh. vi, 2).

There also occur some vestiges of the deeds of Joshua in other historians besides those of his own country. Ptolemy mentions a Phoenician inscription near the city of Timgad in Mauritania, the sense of which was: "We are those who fled before the face of Joshua the robber, the son of Nun" (De Bell. Vandal. ii, 10). Suidas (sub voc Xaraiai) says: "We are the Cannanites whom Joshua the robber persecuted." Compare Fabricii Codex Pseudopigrapharum Vetus Testamenti, i, 889 sq., and the doubts respecting this statement in Dols, De Origine et Progressu Idolatriæ, p. 749 sqq. Ewald (Gesch. Isr. ii, 297, 298) gives sound reasons for forbearing to use this story as authentic history. It is, however, accepted by Hawlinson (Bampton Lecture for 1859, iii, 91).

A letter of Shaubeck, קְרֹבּ, king of Armenia Minor, in the Samaritan book of Joshua (ch. xxvii), styles Joshua הוּשָׁנָה, lapus percussor, "the murderous wolf," or, according to another reading in the book, Joshua hima (p. 154, 1), and in the Shalshelet Rakkabot (p. 96), אֵרֶבּ הַלָּדוֹ, lapus saporinus, "the evening wolf" (comp. Hab. i, 8; Hottinger, Historia Orientalia, Tiguri, 1651, p. 40 sq.; Buddens, Hist. Ecles. p. 964 sq.). A comparison of Hercules, according to the Phoenician and Greek mythology, with Joshua has been attempted by Herckelius (Quid Hercules simus sit ac Josua, Lipsiae, 1768); comp. Anton. Commen. libror. sacr. V. T. iv, et script. siveon, iv, v, Gorlic, 1817.

6. Additional Literature on Joshua personally, and his Exploits.—The principal occurrences in the life of Joshua are reviewed by Bishop Hall in his Contemplations on the O. T. bk. 7, 8, and 9. See also T. Smith, Hist. of Joshua (Lond. 1802); Oetinger, Life of Joshua (Lond. 1860); Ihms, Gesch. Josuah (Zitt. 1759); Masius, Josuahistoria (Antw. 1754); and Flumpetr, Hist. of Joshua (Lond. 1848).

JOSHUA, BOOK OF, one of the first order of the בְּנֵי יָשָׁעַה, or Former Prophets in the Hebrew Canon. See Bible. It is so called from the personage who occupies the principal place in the narration of events contained therein, and may be considered as a continuation of the Pentateuch, since it commences with "ere continuous" in the word וַיָּכֹל, which may be rendered thereupon it hapned.

I. Contents.—This book gives an account of the fortunes of the Israelites from the death of Moses to that of Joshua, the son of Nun. Beginning with the appointment of Joshua to succeed Moses as the leader of the people, it proceeds to describe the arrangements made by Joshua in prospect of passing over Jordan (i. 1-2); the crossing of the river, and the setting up of the memorial on the further side at Gilgal (iii. 11); the dis- may which this occasioned to the Canaanites (v. 1); the circumcision of the males among the people, that rite having been neglected in the wilderness; the observance of the Passover by them in the camp at Gilgal; the giving of the law on the plains of Moab; the division of the land that had entered Canaan (v. 12-18); the encouragement given to Joshua to proceed on his enterprise by the appearance of an angel to him (v. 13-15); the siege and capture of Jericho (vi. 1-7); the defeat of the Israelites at Ai (vii. 1); the taking of Ai (vii. 1—29); the writing of the law on tables of stone; and the solemnity of the consecration of the so-called Gibeonites and the blessings and curses which Moses had written in the book of the law (viii. 30—35); the confederation of the kings of Northern Canaan against the Israelites; the cunning device by which the Gibeonites secured the tribes from being destroyed by the Is- raelites; the indignation of the other Canaanites against the Gibeonites, and the confederation of the kings around Jerusalem against Joshua, with their signal defeat by him (ix. x); the overthrow at the waters of Megiddo of the great northern confederacy, with the destruction of the Anakim (x. 1); the list of the kings of Canaan subdued by the Israelites who had taken under Moses and Joshua (xii. 1); the division of the country, both the parts conquered and those yet remaining under the power of the Canaanites, among the different tribes, chiefly by lot; the setting up of the tabernacle in Shiloh; the appointment of cities of refuge for the Levites for the Levites, and the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, to their possessions on the east of the Jordan, after the settlement of their brethren in Canaan (xiii. xxiii); and the farewell addresses of Joshua to the people, his death and burial (xxiii—xxiv). The book naturally divides itself into two parts: the former (i—xii) containing an ac- count of the conquest of the land; the latter (xiii—xxiv) of the division of it among the tribes. These are fre- quently cited distinctively as the historical and the geographical portions of the book.

a. The first twelve chapters form a continuous narra- tive, which seems never to halt or flag. This description is frequently so minute as to show the hand not merely of a contemporary, but of an eye-witness. An awful sense of the divine Presence reigns throughout. We are called out from the din and tumult of each battle-field to listen to the still small voice. The progress of events is followed with intense interest in the first chapter (vers. 6). Step by step we are led on through the solemn preparation, the arduous struggle, the crowning triumph. Moving everything around, yet himself moved by an unseen power, the Jewish leader rises high and calm amid all.

b. The completion of the book (ch. xiii—xxiv) has been aptly compared to the Domesday-book of the Norman conquerors of England. The documents of which it consists were doubtless the abstracts of such reports as were supplied by the men whom Joshua sent out (xviii, 8) to describe the land. In the course of time it is probable that changes were introduced into their reports—whether kept separately among the national archives or embodied in the contents of a book—by transcribers adapting them to the actual state of the country in later times when political divisions were modified, new towns sprang up, and old ones disappeared (comp. the two lists of towns, Josh. xxi, 1 and xvi, 5, and Josh. xii, 5, etc.).

II. Design.—The object of the book is manifestly to furnish a continuation of the history of the Israelites from the point at which it is left in the closing book of the Pentateuch, and at the same time to illustrate the faithfulness of Jehovah to his word of promise, and his justice in assimilating his people by miraculous intercessions, to obtain possession of the land promised to Abraham. The ground idea of the book, as Maurer (Comment, p. 3) observes, is furnished by God's declaration to Joshua, recorded i, 5, 6, that the work which Moses commenced he should finish by subduing and dividing to the tribes of Israel the Promised Land. The book, therefore, may be regarded as setting forth historically the grounds on which the claims of Israel to the proprietorship of the land rested; and as possessing, consequently, not merely a historical, but also a constitutional and legal worth. As illustrating God's grace and power in dealing with his people, it possesses also a religious and spiritual interest.

III. Unity.—On this head a variety of opinions have been entertained. It has been asserted, 1. That the book is a collection of fragments from different hands, put together at different times, and the whole revised and enlarged by a later writer. Some make the number of sources whence these fragments have been derived ten (Herwerden, Disp.de Libro Jos. Groning, 1826); others five, including the reviser (Knobel, Exeget. Hdbkr. pt. 13; Ewald, Gesch. der Israel. i, 78 sqq.); while others count as many as seven (Herder, i. 4, 7; Naumann, Exeget. u. Geschichte, i. 4, to p. 326). 2. That it is a complete and uniform composition, intermixed with glosses and additions more or less extensive. 3. That the first part is the composition of one author; but the second betrays indications of being a compilation from various sources (Hävernick, i. 4, 7). 4. That the book must be regarded as uniform throughout, and, as a whole, is the composition of one writer. It is impossible here to enter into all the details of this discussion. The reader will find these fully presented by De Wette, Eichler, ins. a. T. 4, 7th and subsequent editions; Hävernick, Inschr. i. 4, 7, Königs, All. Testament. Studien, i. 4; Maurer, Comment. in Jos., vol. i, Comment. E. T. p. 8; Bleek, Einleit. ins. a. T. p. 311; Knobel, in the Exeget. Handbuch, pt. 13; and Davidson, Introd. to the O. T. i. 7, 412.

a. Events alleged to be twice narrated in this book are, Joshua's decease, ch. xxiii and xxiv; the command to appoint twelve men, one out of each tribe, in connection with the passing over Jordan (iii, 12; iv, 3); the stoning of Achan and his dependents (vii, 25); the setting of an ambush for the taking of Ai (vii, 9, 12); the rest from war of the land (xx, 9, 14); the command to Joshua concerning dividing the land (xili, 5); and the granting of Hebron to Caleb (xiv, 13; xv, 13). This list we have transcribed from Knobel (Exeget. Hdbkr. iii. 498). Is it incredible that Joshua should have twice represented the representatives of the people to address him before his decease? May he not have felt that, spared beyond his expectation, he had been enabled to avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded to address once more to the people words of counsel and admonition? In the case of the grant to Caleb of Hebron there is undoubtedly a repetition of the same facts, but it is not separate stories, as might be inferred from the same pen; for the two statements are made in different connections, the one in connection with Caleb's personal merits, the other in connection with the boundary rises and occupation allotted to Judah. The taking of Ai will be considered further on. As for the other instances, we leave them to the judgment of our readers. b. Of the alleged discrepancies, one on which much stress has been laid is, that in various parts of the book Joshua is said to have divided the land, and destroyed the Canaanites (xxi, 10; xxii, 7 sqq.; xxiv, 43; xxxii, 4), whereas in others it is stated that large portions of the land were not conquered by Joshua (xxxii, 1 sqq.; xxvii, 14 sqq.; xxviii, 3 sqq.; xxxii, 5-12). It is worthy of note, however, that this is a disagreement which pervades the book, and on which, consequently, no argument for diversity of authorship, as between the first and the second parts of it, can be built. Again, a discrepancy of this sort is of a kind so obvious, that it is exactly such as a compiler, consciously surveying the materials he is putting together, would at once detect and eliminate; whereas an original writer might write so as to give the appearance of it from looking at the same object from different points of view in the course of his writing. Viewed in relation to purpose and effect, the land was conquered and appropriated; Israel was wi ted in it as mastiff and protector; the power of Israel was broken, and God's covenant to his people was fulfilled. But through various causes, chieully the people's own fault, the work was not literally completed; and therefore, viewed in relation to what ought to have been done and what might have been done, the historian could justly say that there yet remained enemies to be conquered, and some portions of the land is be appropriated. It was intended (Ex. xxxiii, 28, 30) (Ex. xxxiii, 28, 30) that the people should occupy the land little by little. In like manner, it can not be allowed that the general statement (xxi, 29) that they gave the land unto all Israel according to their divisions by their tribes is inconsistent with the fact (xviii, 1; xix, 51) that many subsequent years passed before the process of division was completed and the allotments finally adjusted.

The division of the different tribes, it is said, are stated sometimes with greater, sometimes with less exactness. Now this may be a fault of the surveyors employed by Joshua; but it is scarcely an inconsistency to be charged on the writer of the book who transcribed their descriptions. Again, the divine promise that the people should have the coast of the sea, and the sea westward and southward, is not inconsistent with the fact that the country which Joshua was commanded to divide (xiii, 16) does not extend so far. Again, the statement (xiii, 3) that Ekron, etc., remained yet to be possessed is not inconsistent with the subsequent statement (xiv, 45) that it was assigned to Judah. Again, the promise that the land should be divided into seven equal parts after the death of Caleb is inconsistent with the former text is fact subsequent to the latter, or of his supposition that Ekron was in the possession of Judah at the time of its assignment. Another apparent discrepancy has been found between xxii, 2 and xxiv, 14, 23. How, it is asked, could there be "gross idolatry" amongst a people who had in all things conformed to the law of God given by Moses? This difficulty is dealt with by Augustine (Quast. in Jos. qu. 29), who solves it by understanding the injunction of Joshua to refer to alienation of heart on the part of the people from God. This explanation is fulled by substance by Calvin and others, and it is apparently the true one. Has Joshua known that "gross idolatry" was practiced by the people, he would have taken vigorous measures before this to extirpate it. But against secret and heart idolatry he could use only words of warning.

Another discrepancy is thus set forth by Dr. Davidson (Introd., i. p. 415): "It is related that the people assembled at Sichem, 'under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord,' and 'they presented themselves before God,' implying that the tabernacle and ark were there. But the command from xxviii, 1 had been removed from its former place at Gilgal to Shiloh, where it remained for a long period after Joshua's death" (1 Sam, iii, 31; iv, 8). Here are several mistakes.
The phrase "before God" (בָּעַל יְהֹוָה) does not necessarily mean "before the ark of the Lord" (comp. Gen. xxvii, 7; Judg. xi, 11; xx, 1; Kings xvii, 1, etc.; Hengstenberg, Brtr, iii, 43); and it is not related that "...the people assembled under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord," but that Joshua "took a great stone..." and set it up in the sanctuary of the Lord (xxvi, 26). The oak referred to was probably a well-known one that stood within the spot which had been the first sanctuary of the Lord in Canaan (Gen. xii, 6, 7), and where the nation had been convened by Joshua, on first entering the Promised Land, and the word is given to the words of the law (Josh. vii, 23-35). No place more fitting as the site of a memorial stone such as Joshua is here said to have set up could be found.

These are the only discrepancies that have even the appearance of seriously affecting the claim of the book to be regarded as the work of one author throughout. The others, which have been discovered and urged by some recent critics in Germany, are such that it seems unnecessary to take up space by noticing them. The reader will find them noted and accounted for in the Introduction to the Commentary on this book, p. 9.

The treatment of the Canaanites which is sanctified in this book has been denounced for its severity by Eichhorn and earlier writers. But there is nothing in it inconsistent with the divine attribute of justice, or with God's ordinary way of governing the world. See above, Joshua; also Canaanites.

The sanctity which is given to it does not impair the authority of this book. Critical impugnment has searched it in vain for any incident or sentiment inconsistent with what we know of the character of the age, or irreconcilable with other parts of canonical Scripture.

c. The differences of phraseology and style in different parts of the book might deserve more extended notice were it not for the very unsatisfactory state in which this method of inquiry as yet is. Without doubt, it is true that, if it can be shown that these differences are such as to indicate diversity of authorship, the argument must be admitted as legitimate and the conclusion as valid; but, if dealing with such questions, it would be well if it were settled on some scientific basis what is the competent test in each case, what kind and amount of difference in phraseology and style are sufficient to prove a diversity of authorship. On this head critics seem wholly at sea; they have no common standard to which to appeal; and hence their conclusions are frequently determined by purely personal leanings and subjective affections, and hardly any two of them agree in the judgment at which they arrive. This is remarkably the case with the instances which have been adduced from the book before us. Of these, some are of such a kind as to render an argument from them against the unity of the book little better than puerile. Thus we are told that in some places the word יָקָרַע is used for a tribe, while in others יָקָרַע is used, and this is employed as a test to distinguish one fragment from another. Accordingly, for instance, in chap. xviii, verses 4, 7 are pronounced to belong to one writer, and ver. 11 to another; which is just as if an author, in giving an account of the rebellion of 1745, should speak in the same chapter first of a body of Highlanders as a clan, and then of the same as a sept, and some critic were to come after him and say, "This could not have been written by one author, for he would not have called the same body by different names." Could it be shown that either יָקָרַע or יָקָרַע is a word introduced into the language for the first time at a date much later than the age of Joshua, while the other word had then become obsolete, an argument of some weight, and such as a scholar like Bentley might have employed, would have been advanced; but to attempt to assign passages in the same chapter to different authors and to different epochs simply because synonymous apppellations of the same object are employed, is nothing better than sheer trifling. Again, it is said that "the historical parts have the rare word יָקָרַע, inheritance [rather, division] (xi, 23; xii, 7; xviii, 10), which does not appear in the geographical sections" (Davidson, i, 417). Is chap. xviii, then, not in the geographical part of the book? or does a part become geographical or historical as suits the case, or the preconceived theory of the critic? Similar, the geographical portion has יָקָרַע, Jordan by Jericho, iii, 32; iv, 8; a mode of expression wanting in the historical" (ibid.). True; but suppose there was no occasion to use the phrase in the historical portions, what then? Are they, therefore, from a different pen from that which produced the geographical? Again, in the historical parts occur the words יָקָרַע, the priests, the Levites (iii, 8; viii, 8); or simply יָקָרַע, priests (iii, 6, 15; iv, 6, etc.); but in the geographical sections the same persons are termed sons of Aaron (xxv, 4, 10, 13, 19)" (ibid.). Is there not, however, a reason for this in the fact that, as it was in virtue of their being descended from Aaron, and not in virtue of their being priests, that the Kohathites received their portion, it was more proper to designate them "children of Aaron, of the Levites," than "priests"? And the Levites the Levitical portion, scuts this explanation as one which "only betrays the weakness of the cause." We confess ourselves unable to see this; the explanation is, in our judgment, perfectly valid in itself, and sufficient for the end for which it is adduced; and he has made no attempt to show that it is otherwise. All he says is, "The former is a Deuteronomistic expression; the latter Elohisic." What this is meant to convey we are at a loss to determine, for the only places in which the phrase "sons of Aaron" occurs is in connection with the names of Nadab and Abihu, who were sons of Aaron by immediate descent, and must have been so described by any writer, whether Deuteronomist or Elohisist.

A number of other words are adduced by the opponents of the unity of the book of Joshua for the purpose of showing that it includes fragments from different authors. On these we do not linger. There are two considerations which appear to us entirely to destroy their force as evidences for that which they are adduced to prove. The one of these is that, according to Ewald, "the later historians imitated the words and phraseology of those who preceded them, and, moreover, that they frequently altered the phrases which they found in the earlier documents." On this Kil (from whom we bor- row the statement) remarks with great force, "If that be the case, we can no longer think of peculiarities of style as characteristic signs by which the different sources may be distinguished. His entire theory is therefore built on sand." (Comment. on Josh. Intro, p. 9, E.T.). The other observation we would make is, that supposing it made out by indubitable marks that the book of Joshua has undergone a careful revision by a later editor, who has altered expressions and interpo- lated brief statements that would not seriously impeach the unity of the book, it would still remain substantially the work of one author. We cannot forbear adding that, in all such inquiries, more faith is to be placed on a sound literary perception and taste than on those mi- nuities of expression and phraseology on which so much stress has of late been laid by some of the scholars of Germany and Italy. We follow in us entirely to destroy their impression undoubtedly left on the mind of the reader is, that this book contains a continuous and uniform narrative; and its claims in this respect can be brought into doubt only by the application to it of a species of criti- cism which would produce the same result were it applied to the full narratives of Livy, the commentaries of Cesar, or any other ancient work of narrative.

IV. Date of Composition.—This can only be approximately determined. Of great value for this purpose is the frequent use of the phrase "until this day" by the writer, in reference to the duration of certain objects of which he writes. The use of such a phrase indicates indisputably that the narrative was written while the objects were still existing, and may also, which may be used with reference to a very limited period; as, for instance, when Joshua uses it of the period up to which the two tribes and a half had continued with their brethren (xxii, 3), or when he uses it of the period up to which the Israelites had been suffering for the iniquity of Jericho (xxvii, 17); compare xxviii, 9, 9. Now we find this phrase used by the historian in cases where the reference is undoubtedly to a period either within the lifetime of Joshua, or not long after his death. Thus it is used with reference to the stones which Joshua set up in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the priests had stood as the people passed over (iv, 9), and which we cannot suppose remained in that position for a very long time; it is used also of Rahab's dwelling in the midst of Israel (vi, 25), which must have ceased, at the furthest, very soon after Joshua's death; also of Caleb's personal possession of Hebron (xiv, 14), which of course terminated soon after the death of Moses. From these notices we infer that the book may have been written during Joshua's lifetime, and cannot have been written long after. With this falls in the use of the first person in the reference to the crossing of the Jordan (see note on 1:13) as a characteristic of the one who was present on the occasion is evidently the writer. To the same effect is the fact that no allusion is anywhere made to anything that is known to have been long posterior to the time of Joshua.

Several words occurring in this book have been adduced as belonging to the later Hebrew, and as, consequently, indicating a later date of composition for the book than the age of Joshua, or that immediately succeeding. But it strikingly shows the precarious basis on which all such reasoning rests, that words are pronounced archaic or late just as it suits the purpose of the inquirer; what De Wette calls late being declared to be ancient by Hävernick and Keil, and what Hävernick and Keil call ancient being again pronounced late by Knobel and Davidson, and with equal absence of any show of reason on both sides. One thing of importance, however, is, that whether the writer has used what modern scholars, judging a priori, call later forms or not, he has undoubtedly made no allusions to later facts, and so has given evidence of antiquity which common-sense inquirers can appreciate.

V. Author.—Assuming that the book is the production of Joshua, and that it was not written at the time above suggested, the question arises, To whom is it to be ascribed? That it is the work of Joshua himself is the tradition of the Jews (Baba Bathra, cap. i, fol. 14, B); and this has been embraced by several Christian writers, and among others, in recent times, by König, and, as respects the first half of the book, by Hävernick. That this might have been the case as respects all but the concluding section of the book cannot be denied, but the reasons which have been adduced in support of it have not appeared sufficient to the great majority of critics. These may be thus briefly stated: (a) It is evident (xxvi, 25) that Joshua could and did write some account of at least one transaction which is related in this book; (b) the numerous accounts of Joshua's intercourse with God (i. 1; iii. 7; iv. 2; v. 2, 9; vi. 2; vii. 10; viii. 1; x. 8; xi. 6; xii. 2; xiii. 1; xxiv. 2), and with the cause of the Lord's host (ver. 19), must have emamated from himself, (c) no one is more likely than the speaker himself to have committed to writing the two addresses which were Joshua's legacy to his people (xxiii and xxiv); (d) no one was so well qualified by his position to describe the events related, and hence the language of the documents contained in the example of his predecessor and master, Moses, would have suggested to him such a record of his acts; (e) one verse (vi, 25) must have been written by some person who lived in the time of Joshua; and two other verses, v. 1 and 6—assuming the common reading of the former to be correct—are most fairly interpreted as written by actors in the scene.

No one would deny that some additions to the book might be made after the death of Joshua without detracting from the possible fact that the book was substantially his composition. The last verses (xxiv, 23–35) were obviously added by some later hand. If, as is possible, though not certain, some subordinate events, as the capture of Ai (xxiv, 10–15), and of Le-Deshem (Josh. xix, 47; and Judg. xviii, 7), and the joint occupation of Jerusalem (Josh. xv, 63, and Judg. i, 21) did not occur till after Joshua's death, they may have been inserted in the book of Joshua by a late transcriber. The passages xiii, 24; xvi. 10; xvii, 11, which also are subsequently added, are in the book of Judges, may doubtless describe accurately the same state of things existing at two distinct periods.

Other authors have been conjectured, as Philonius by Lightfoot; Eleazar by Calvin; Samuel by Van Til; Joshua by Henry; one of the elders who survived Joshua by Keil. Von Lengerke thinks it was written by some one in the time of Josiah: Davidson by some one in the time of Saul, or somewhat later; Masius, Le Clerc, Maser, and others, by some one who lived after the Babylo- nian captivity.

VI. Credibility.—That the narrative contained in this book is to be accepted as a trustworthy account of the transactions it records is proved alike by the esteem in which it was always held by the Jews; by the references to events recorded in it in the national sacred songs (comp. Ps. cxviii, 24; Isa. xxxv, 14; xxxv, 13–15; xxiv, 1–8; Hab. iii, 8–13), and in other parts of Scripture (comp. Judg. xviii, 31; 1 Sam. i, 3, 9, 24; iii, 21; Isa. xxviii, 21; Acts vii, 45; Heb. iv. 8; xi. 30–32; James ii, 25); by the traces which, both in the historic and in the geographical portions, may be found of the use by his contemporaries of documents; by the minuteness of the details which the author furnishes, and which indicates familiar acquaintance with what he records; by the accuracy of his geographical delineations, an accuracy which the results of modern investigation are increasingly demonstrating; by the fact that the transactions described disagree as little as possible with the history and the barriers of their respective territories, but adhered to the arrangements specified in this book; and by the general fidelity to historical consistency and probability which the book displays (Hävernick, Enzl. sec. 148 sq.). Some of the narrations and accounts in the book are wholly in keeping with the avowed relation to the Almighty of the people whose history the book records, and they can be regarded as unhistorical only on the assumption that all miracles are incredible—a question we cannot stop to discuss here. See MİRAÇLER. In the list of such miraculous intercurrences we do not include the standing still of the sun, and the staying of the moon, recorded in ch. x, 12, 13. That passage is apparently wholly a quotation from the book of Joshua. and is probably a fragment of a poem composed by some Israelite on the occasion; it records in highly poetical language the triumph that is won by the Israelites, and the destruction of their enemies, and is no more to be taken literally than is such a passage as Ps. cxxiv, 4–6, where the Red Sea is described as being brightened and darkened, and it retains as skipping like rams. See JASHER. Book or. That God interposed on this occasion to help his people we do not doubt; but that he interposed by the working of such a miracle as the words taken literally would indicate, we see no reason to believe. The archaeological and geographical documents in the book CD; the theory of the taking of AI has been much dwelt upon as presenting a narrative which is unhistorical. It is incredible that Joshua and...
Joshua 1031

Joshua two bodies of men, one comprising 30,000 soldiers, the other 5000, to lie in ambush against the city, while he himself advanced on it with the main body of his army; and yet, as it seems, to be what was called "an ambush." What increases the improbability here is that the larger body is never mentioned as having come into action at all, for the whole exploit was accomplished by the 5000 and those who were with Joshua. If the case were stated thus: That Joshua took 30,000 of his warriors, and the ambush sent away 5000 in ambush, while be, with the remaining 25,000, advanced against the city, the narrative would be perfectly simple and credible. The suggestion that verses 12 and 13 are a marginal gloss which has been supposed to creep into the text, leaves the narrative burdened with the improbable statement that 30,000 men could advance on Ai in daylight, and lie concealed in its immediate neighborhood for several hours without their presence being suspected by the inhabitants. Still less probable seems the suggestion that in these verses we have a fragment of an older record. Keil labors to show that from the peculiar style of Semitic narrative it is competent to supply, in ver. 3, in thought, from the subsequent narrative, that from the 30,000 whom Joshua took he selected 5000, whom he sent away by night. But, whatever may be the difficulties in this text, it would be unreasonable to account for its originality by relying on our confidence in the general credibility of the book.

VIII. Relation to the Pentateuch. - The Pentateuch brings down the history of the Israelites to the death of Moses, at which it naturally terminates. The book of Joshua takes up the history at this point, and continues it to the death of Joshua, which furnishes another natural pause. From resemblances between the language and forms of expression used by the author of the book of Joshua and those found in Deuteronomy, it has been supposed that both are to be ascribed, in part at least, to the same writer. This, of course, proceeds on the supposition that the book of Deuteronomy is not the composition of Moses; a question on which it would be out of place to enter here. See Deuteronomy; Pentateuch. It may suffice to observe, that whilst it is natural to expect that many similarities of phraseology and language would be apparent in works so nearly contemporaneous as that of Deuteronomy and that of Joshua, there are yet such differences between them as may cause us to conceive that they are the productions of the same writer. Thus, in the Pentateuch, we have the word Jericho always spelt רְפָאִי, whilst in Joshua it is רְפָעִי; in Deuteronomy we have נֹבֶל (iv, 24; v, 9; vi, 15); in Joshua נֹבֶל (xxiv, 19); in Deuteronomy the inf. of נֹבֶל to fear, is נֹפֶל (iv, 10; v, 26; vi, 24, etc.); in Joshua it is נֹפֶל (xxii, 25); in Deuteronomy we have warriors described as נֹפֶל (i, 18), whilst in Joshua they are called נֹפֶל (i, 14; vi, 2, etc.). We have also in Joshua the peculiar formula נֹפֶל נֹפֶל, which nowhere occurs in the Pentateuch, but only נֹפֶל (Lev. xx, 9, 11, 12, etc.); the expression נֹפֶל נֹפֶל נֹפֶל (iii, 13, 18), which occurs again only in Zech. vi, 5; the phrase, "the heart melt- ed" (ii, 11; vi, 1; vii, 5); etc. In the Pentateuch, also, we find the usage with respect to the third personal pronoun feminine fluctuating between נֹפֶל and נֹפֶל in the book of Joshua the usage is fixed down to נֹפֶל, which became the permanent usage of the language. We find, also, that in the Pentateuch the demonstrative pronoun, with the article, sometimes appears in the form נֹפֶל, while in Joshua and elsewhere it is always נֹפֶל. The evidence here is the same in effect as would accrue in the case of Latin am, an. aman, an, ap, etc., in Greek ἐκεῖνος, οὗτος, ἀλλ' οὗτος. That the author of the book of Joshua derived part of his information from the Pentateuch is evident, if we compare Deut. xviii, 1, 2, and Num. xviii, 20, with Josh. xiii, 14, 38; xiv, 4. Even the unusual form נֹפֶל is repeated in Joshua. Compare also Num. xxxi, 8, with Josh. xiii, 21 and 22. The author of the book of Joshua frequently repeats the statements of the Pentateuch in a more detailed form, and mentions the designation which had taken place when the Pentateuch was written. Compare Num. xxxiv, 13 and 14, with Josh. xiii, 7; Num. xxxiv, 37, with Josh. xiii, 17 sq.; Num. xxxv with Josh. xxii.

There is also considerable similarity between the following passages in the books of Joshua and Judges: Josh. xii, 4, 14; xlv, 13 sq.; Judg. ix, 12, 10; Josh. xv, 19-19, Judg. i, 11-15; Josh. xv, 62, Judg. i, 21; Josh. xvi, 10, Judg. i, 29; Josh. xvii, 12, Judg. i, 27; Josh. xix, 47, Judg. xviii.

JOSUAH, Spurious writings of. The Samaritans, who for dogmatical purposes endeavored to depreciate the authority of persons mentioned in the latter books of the Old Testament, such as Eli, Samuel, Zerubbabel, and others, had no such interest in attacking the person of Joshua. Eusebius, according to Phoebi Code, p. 280, states: "The Samaritan multitude believes that Joshua, the son of Nun, is the person concerning whom Moses said, ‘The Lord will raise us up a prophet.’" etc. (Compare Lampo, Comment. in Evangelium Johannis, 1, 748.) The Samaritans even endeavored to exalt the memory of Joshua by making him the nucleus of many strange legends which they embodied into their Arabic book of Joshua, a work which seems to have been composed in the Middle Ages, and is quoted by the Rabbinical chroniclers of that period, Sepher Jachash, R. Samuel, and other authors. (Shalhebeth, R., Shabbath, 1, 96, 97, 98.)—Hottinger (Historia Orientalis, p. 40 sqq.); Zanz (Gottesdienstliche Vorträge der Juden, p. 140). Reland supposed that this book was written at an earlier period, and augmented in the Middle Ages; but it is more likely that the whole is a late compilation. (Compare Hottinger in his Morgenland, p. 48.)

The so-called book of Joshua of the Samaritans consists of compilations from the Pentateuch, our book of Joshua, the books of Judges and of Samuel, intermixed with many Jewish legends. Its compiler pretends that it is translated from the Hebrew into Arabic, but it was written in Arabic as the first book in the Arabic manuscript, after the promulgation of the Koran, which exercised a perceptible influence upon it (comp. Reland, De Samaritana, Dissertationes Miscellaneae, ii, 12 and 68; Rödiger, in the Hall. Alg. Lit. Zeit. for 1848, No. 217). The author of this compilation endeavors to prove that the story of Joshua is legendary, and he claims for them the celebrity of the Jews. He attempts to turn the traditions of Jewish history in favor of the Samaritans. By his account Joshua built the temple on Mount Gerizim, and there established public worship; the schism between Jews and Samaritans communicated by Eleazar, who, as well as Samuel, was an apostate and sorcerer; after the return from the Babylonian exile, the Samaritan form of worship was declared to be the legitimate form; Zerubbabel and his sacred books, which were corrupted, were authoritatively rejected; Alexander the Great expressed his veneration, not for the Jews, but for the Samaritans; these were oppressed under the emperor Adrian, but again obtained permission to worship publicly on Mount Gerizim. The whole book consists of a mixture of Biblical history and legends, the manifest aim being to falsify facts for dogmatical purposes. This book is opposed to the history of the Jewish war under Adrian. The only known copy of this book is that of Joseph Scaliger, which is now in the library at Leyden. Although the language is Arabic, it is written in Samaritan characters. Even the Samaritans themselves seem to have lost it. Huntington, in his Epitome (London, 1544), mentions that he had found it at Nablus, nor have subsequent inquiries led to its discovery there. An edition, from the only MS. extant, appeared in 1848 at Leyden, with the title Liber Jacob: Chronicon Samaritanum; eddit., Latine vertit, etc., T. t. J. Juynboll. It seems never to have been recognized by the Samaritans themselves (De Wette, Einl., sec. 171).

Besides this adulatorized version of the history of Joshua, there exists still another in the Samaritan chronicles of Abul Phethach. See Acta Eruditorum Lips., anno 1691, p. 167; Schnurrer's Samaritanischer Briefwechsel, in Kihlhorn's Repertorium, ix, 54; a specimen by Schnurrer, in Paulina's Neues Repertorium, t. 117 sqq.

The mention of the book of Joshua has given rise to some spurious compilations under that name, as well in Hebrew as in English. See JOSHAU.

A native of Beth-shemesh, an Israelite, the owner of the field into which the cart came which bore the ark on its return from the land of the Philistines; upon a great stone in the midst of the field the Beth-shemites sacrificed the cows that drew the cart, in honor of its arrival (1 Sam. vi, 14, 18). 3. The governor of Jerusalem at the time of the re- formation; upon the occasion of the resurrection of his palace he was situated near one of the idolatrous erection at the city gates (2 Kings xxii, 8). R.C. 628.

4. The son of Joeschach (Hag. i, 1, 12, Zech. iii, i, 8, 9; vi, 11), a high-priest in the time of Haggai and Zechariah; better known by the name of JEHOVAH (q.v.).

Joshua ben-Hanania, one of the most honored men of the Jews in the second century of the Christian era. He was a mechanic by trade, and earned his livelihood by continuing to work at his trade even when teacher of the Rabbinical school at Bkhiin, whither he had removed from Jerusalem after its downfall. He was a disciple of the celebrated Rabbi ben-Zachai, and did honor to his memory as a teacher. The controversies with Gamaliel and Eliezer ben-Hanan, which are celebrated in the Mishna and the Talmud, evince that he was a very formidable antagonist on account of the force of his reasoning powers and the punish- ment of a faculty of mind. After his death Joshua ben- Gamaliel and Akiba to Rome, to plead with Trajan on behalf of his oppressed countrymen, and was received by the emperor with unusual courtesy and respect. It is even reported (though not on any certain authority) that Trajan's daughter, the princess Imra, honored the Jewish Rabbi with her friendship; and that on one occasion, looking at the homely garb in which so much wisdom was encased, she said to him, "Thou art the beauty of wisdom in an abject dress."—"Good wine," Joshua complacently replied, "is not kept in gold or silver vessels, but in vessels of earthen-ware." When we consider that about 100,000 Jews were numbered in the second century among the patrician ladies of Rome, to whose aching hearts the herd of old and disreputable deities presented no ground of comfort or hope at all comparable with that afforded by the Hebraic pure worship—the worship of the one true God—we need not hesitate to credit the truth to his history of the belief of the Christians as a Jewish convert. It is also related that Trajan, in a bantering way, begged the old Rabbi to show him his God, whom he had affirmed to be every where present. After some conversation, Trajan still adhering to his demand, he is said to have given it up (see the God of the Hebrews, Joshua 21, 22). "Well, let us first look at one of his ambassadresses," and, taking the emperor into the open air, he desired him to gaze at the sun in his full meridian power. "I cannot," replied Trajan; "the light dazzles me." "Cast thou then," said the Rabbi, "expect to behold the glory of the God of Israel who art unable to endure the light of one of his creatures?" In such anecdotes attributed to Joshua ben-Hanania the Talmud abounds, and it is evident that in his day Joshua figured as the most able of all the Rabbins. Joshua (or Joshua) ben-Jehudah (called in Arabic Abu-Habbara Farhun, R., 1876, quoted by Earo as R. Joshua, II, 50 sq., "a distinguished Jewish philosopher, grammarian, and commentator of the Karaita sect, flourished in the 11th century. JOSHUA NARBONI. See VIDAL.

Josiah (Heb. Yosiyahu, יְשָׁיָהוּ, healed by Jehovah, Zech. vi, 10, elsewhere in the paragogic form Ἰσσία, Ἰσσία, and in the text of Jer. xxvii, 1, Ἰσσία; Sept., N. T., and Josephus 1 Antiq., "Josia"); Matt. i, 10, 11, the name of two men.

1. The sixteenth king of Judah after its separation from the kingdom of Israel, the son (by Jedidah) and, at the early death of his father, co-regent of his brother Amon (2 Kings xxii, 1; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 1). His history is contained in 2 Kings xxii-xxiv; 30; 2 Chron. xxxiv, xxxv; and the first twelve chapters of Jeremiah throw much light upon the general character of the Jews in his reign. While he was not at all a complete prince, yet his severe and exemplary conduct proves that he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in all the ways of David his father, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left (2 Kings xxii, 2; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 2).

So early as the sixteenth year of his age (B.C. 633) he began to manifest that eminence to integrity in all its forms which distinguished his character and reign; and he was not quite twenty years old (B.C. 629) when he proclaimed open war against it, although more or less favored by many men of rank and influence in the kingdom (2 Chron. xxxiv, 3). He then commenced a thorough purification of the land from all taint of idolatry by going about and superintending in person the operations of the men who were employed in breaking down idolatrous altars and images, and cutting down the groves which had been consecrated to idol-worship (see Berthold, De purgatione per Josiam, Erl. 1817). His character is rendered the more strongly expressed than by ransacking the sepulchres of the Idolatrous priests of former days, and consuming their bones upon the idol altars before they were overturned. This operation, although unexampled in Jewish history, was foretold 345 years before Josiah was born (Jer. xvii, 18). This is a solemn and solemn announcement to Jeroboam the future punishment of his sin. He even named Josiah as the person by whom this act was to be performed, and said that it should be performed in Beth-el, which was then a part of the kingdom of Israel (1 Kings xii, 2). All this seemed much beyond the range of human probabilities; but it was performed to the letter, for Josiah did not confine his proceedings to his own kingdom, but went over a considerable part of the neighboring kingdom of Israel, which then lay comparatively desolate, with the same object in view; and at Beth-el, in particular, executed all that the prophet had foretold (2 Kings xxiii, 1-19; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 3-7, 32). In these proceedings Josiah seems to have been actuated by an absolute hatred of idolatry, such as no other king since David had manifested, and which David had scarcely occasion to manifest; for the people had been too late; the heart of the people had hardened; and this recoil of the public cultus under Josiah that it forms an epoch whence Jeremiah dates many of his prophecies (Jer. xxx, 8, 11, 29).

2. In the eighteenth year of his reign and the twenty-sixth of his age (B.C. 627), when the land had been thoroughly purified, and all that belonged to it, Josiah proceeded to repair and beautify the Temple of the Lord (2 Kings xxii, 8; xxiii, 23). In the course of this pious labor the high-priest Hilkiah discovered in the sanctuary a volume, which proved to contain the books of Moses, and which, from the terms employed, seems to have been considered the original copy of the law as written by Moses himself. This volume has been much anxious discussion and some rash assertion. Some writers of the German school allege that there is no external evidence—that is, evidence besides the law itself—that the book of the law existed till it was thus produced by Hilkiah. This assertion it is the less necessary, as it will prove here, and it will be hotly contested in the article PENTATEUCH. (See also De Wette, Beitr., i, 168 sq.; Bertholdt, Progr. de eo quod in purgatione acoror, Jut. per Josiam facta omnium maxime congenti memorabile, Erl. 1817; also in his Opusc. p. 82 sq.) But it may be observed that it is founded very much on the fact that the age was greatly estimated when some parts of the law were read to him. It is indeed perfectly manifest that he had previously been entirely ignorant of much that he then heard; and he rent his clothes in consternation when he found that, with the best intentions to serve the Lord, he and all his people had been living in the Violation of the Law. What, then, is clared to be of vital importance. It is certainly difficult to account for this ignorance. Some suppose that all the copies of the law had perished, and that the king had never seen one. But this is very unlikely; for, if there have been, the pious king was likely to have been the possessor of one. The probability seems to be that the passages read were those awful denunciations against disobedience with which the book of Deuteronomy concludes, and which, for some cause or other, the king had never before read, or which had never before been read to him. This was the same strong conviction of the imminent dangers under which the nation lay, as now when read to him from a volume invested with a character so venerable, and brought with such interesting circumstances under his notice. We should bear in mind that it is very difficult for us in this age to be perfectly estimated when some of the opportunities which were then open to laymen of acquiring literary knowledge connected with religion. The special commission sent forth by Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii, 7) is a proof that even under such kings as Ass and his son the Levites were insufficient for the religious instruction of the people. What then must have been the amount of information accessible to a generation which had grown up in the reigns of Manasseh and Amon? We do not know that the law was read as a stated part of any ordinary public service in the Temple of Solomon (unless the injunction Deut. xxv, 10 was obeyed for seven years), though God was worshipped there with daily sacrifice, psalmody, and prayer.

The king, in his alarm, sent to Huldah "the prophetess" for her counsel in this emergency [see HULDAH]: her answer assured him that, although the dread penalties threatened by the law had been incurred and would be inflicted, he should be gathered in peace to his fathers before the days of punishment and sorrow came.

It was perhaps not without some hope of averting this doom that the king immediately called the people together at Jerusalem, and enjoined them in a solemn renewal of the ancient covenant with God. When this had been done, the Passover was celebrated with careful attention to the directions given in the law, and on a scale of unexampled magnificence. (On the public importance of this era, see Ezek. i, 2.) But all was not in this manner hastened; the kingdom of Judah was turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath, where with his anger was kindled against Judah" (2 Kings xxiii, 8-20; xxiii, 21-27; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 8-33; xxxvi, 1-19).

3. That removal from the world which had been promised to Josiah as a blessing was not long delayed, and was brought about in a way in which he probably had not expected. Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, sought a passage through his territories on an expedition against the Chaldeans; but Josiah refused to allow the march of the Egyptian army through his dominions, and prepared to resist the attempt by force of arms. His reason for this decision has usually been assumed to have been a high sense of loyalty to the Assyrian monarch, whose tributary he is supposed to have been. Such is at least the conjecture of Pridesux (Consection, anno 610) and of Milman (History of the Jews, i. 813). But the Bible ascribes no such chivalrous motive to Josiah, and it does not occur to the historian who has assumed the death of Zephaniah as a sequel of the war which we are here assumed to have been started by a design of the Egyptians to force the submission of the small country of Judah, which they were about to attack (2 Kings, xxi, 19). Josiah’s resistance merely to Fate urging him to destruction, nor to the author of 1 Esdr. i, 26, who describes him as acting wilfully against Jerusalem’s advice; nor to Ewald, w. (Gesch. Isr. iii., 707) conjectures that it may have been the constant aim of Josiah to fortify not only the ritual, but also the kingdom of David in its full extent and independence, and that he attacked Necho as an invader of what he considered as his northern dominions. This conjecture, if equally probable with the former, is equally without adequate support in the Bible, and is already contrary to the character of Josiah. Necho was very unwilling to engage in hostilities with Josiah; the appearance of the Hebrew army at Megiddo (comp. Herod. ii., 159), however, brought on a battle, in which the king of Judah, although disguised for security, was so desperately wounded by a javelin that his attendants, hailng him from the war-chariot and placed him in another, in which he was taken to Jerusalem, where he died, after a reign of thirty-one years. B.C. 609. (See J. R. Kiesling’s Es- say on this subject, Lips. 1754.) No king that reigned in Israel was ever more deeply lamented by all his subjects than Josiah; and we are told that the prophet Jeremiah composed on the occasion an elegiac ode, which was long preserved among the people (2 Kings xxiii, 29-37, 2 Chron. xxxvi, 20-27). See LAMEN- TATIONS. Compare the narrative in 2 Chron., xxxix, 25 with that in Jer., xxxii, 19, and with Jackson, in On the Creed, bk. viii, ch. xxiii, p. 678. The prediction of Huldah that he should “be gathered into the grave in peace” must be interpreted in accordance with the explanation of that phrase given in Jer. xxxiv, 5. Some excellent remarks on this may be found in Jackson, in On the Creed, bk. xxv, ch. xxxvi, p. 644. Josiah’s reformation and his death are commented on by bishop Hall, Contemplations on the O. T., bk. xx. See also Howard, History of Josiah (London, 1842). 4. It was in the reign of Josiah that a nomadic horde of Scythians and Ascalonites, or a mixed rabble of desert-dwellers, flocked towards Egypt by the way of Philistia; somewhere southwards of Ascalon they were met by messengers from Psammetichus and induced to turn back. They are not mentioned in the historical accounts of Josiah’s reign; but Ewald (Die Paumen, p. 165) conjectures that the 50th Psalm was composed by king Josiah during a siege of Jerusalem by these Scythi- ans. The town Bethelanan is said to derive its Greek name Scythopolis (Reland, Palest., p. 992; Lightfoot, Chron. Marc. vii, § 2) from these invaders. The facility with which Josiah appears to have extended his author- ity over the Philistines and the whole of the Israelite dominions is another indication of the fact that the Assyrian conquerors of that land were themselves at this time under the restraining fear of some enemy. The prophecy of Zephaniah is considered to have been written amid the terror caused by their approach. The same people are named in 1 Chron. xxvi, 15 and in a later passage (2 Kings ix, 9). See Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii., 689. Abarbanel (ap. Eisenmenn, Ent, Jud. i, 868) records an oral tradition of the Jews to the effect that the ark of the covenant, which Solomon deposited in the Temple (1 Kings vi, 19), was removed and hidden by Josiah in expectation of the destruction of the Temple, and that it will not be brought again to light until the coming of Messiah. 2. Son of Zephaniah, and a resident of Jerusalem after the captivity, in whose house the prophet was directed to crown the high-priest Jeshua as a type of the Messiahs (Zeck. vi, 10). B.C. prob. 520. “It has been conjectured that Josiah was either a goldsmith, or treasurer of the Temple, or one of the keepers of the Temple, who received the money for the temple taxes; but it is certain that nothing is known of him. Possibly he was a descendant of Zephaniah, the priest mentioned in Jer. xxii, i, xxxvii, 8; and if Hen in Zech. vi, 15 be a proper name, which is doubtful, it probably refers to the same person, elsewhere called Josiah.” Josiah is an Aramaicized form of the name of (a) ‘I- aqia, Vci. ‘I- tisi. Josiah (q. v.), king of Judah (1 Esdr. i, 1, 7, 18-21, 25, 28, 29, 32-34; Exclus. xlive, 14; Bar. i, 8; Matt. i, 10, 11): (b) ‘I- aqia v. t. ‘I- aqia, Vulg. Massiae), Jeshiaiah (q. v.), the son of Athaliah (1 Esdr. viii, 33; comp. Ezra viii, 7). Josi’bi’ah (Heb. Yoshibiyah, זֶבִּיָּה, dweller with Jehorak; Sept. Isiaia v. r. Asaphia), son of Seriah and father of Jehu, which last was one of the Simeon- ites who migrated to Gedor (1 Chron. iv, 35). B.C. ante 711. Josipl’i’ah (Heb. Yosibiyah, זֶבִּיָּה, consecrated by Jehorak; Sept. Isiaia v. r. Asaphia), one of the “sons” of Se- limoth (as the Heb. text now stands), a chief Israelite, whose son (Ben-Josiphia) returned with a company of 100 males under Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezza viii, 10). B.C. 458. He was one of the scribes that translated the Hebrew text in the beginning of the verse, and is supplied by the Sept. and the author of 1 Esdr. viii, 36, as well as (less correctly) in the Syriac; namely, Bazari (Bozari), i.e. 232, omitted from similarity to 232 preceding; thus making Bani (q.v.) the son of Selimoth, and the leader of the party of returned exiles. JOSIPPION. See Joseph Ben-Gonia. Joso, Toriai, one of Whitefield’s preachers, a na- tive of Scotland, was a sea-captain by profession. He had a vigorous mind, had been fond of the Bible from his youth, and had acquired a good degree of education by industrious study alone. He was converted by the preaching of Mr. Wesley at Robin Hood’s Bay, and soon after began to preach to and exhort his sailors with much effect, who were converted and did likewise. After various reverses in his business, he was constrained by Whitefield to give himself wholly to the ministry, and in 1766 he became his colleague at the Tabernacle and Tottenham Court. His preaching in London had from the first drawn great throngs and been very popular, and he was the only second to the master of White- field, whose associate he was for thirty years in the Cal- vinistic Methodist societies of London, usually itiner- ating in England and Wales four or five months annu- ally. See Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, i, 450. (G. L. T.) Jost, Isaac Marcus, one of the most celebrated writers of modern Jews, the first of his people since the days of Josephus to write a complete history of the Jews, was born at Berneburg, Germany, Feb. 22, 1788. His father, a poor blind man, the head of a family of twelve children, was obliged to depend mainly upon Marcus, the only boy, for support, and great and severe were the struggles which he had to endure until, in 1803, his father died, and the youth removed to Wolfen- buttel, where his grandfather resided. He was now admitted to a Jewish orphan asylum, where one of his most intimate associates was the celebrated Jewish am- bassador Ladislaus Zundel, and together they both, by hard study, succeeded in bringing it so far in the course of the six months terminating with April, 1809, that we, Zanz in Wolfenbuttel and I in Brunswick, were put in the senior class (prima) in the gymnasium.” (Pancheles, Sippurim, ...

JOTBATHAH

3 col, Prague, 1855, p. 141 sq.). After four years of hard study he removed to the University of Göttingen, where for one year and a half he pursued with great earnestness studies in history, philology, philosophy, and theology, and then transferred to the University of Berlin. In the capital of Prussia Jost soon won the hearts of many of his people, and, though comparatively a youth, yet succeeded in the management of a first-class school, to which flocked the children of Jew and Gentile. In 1885 he accepted the head-mastership of the Jewish high-school at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, and in that capacity spent the remainder of his days. He died November 20, 1880, at Frankfurt-on-the-Main. While at Berlin he published: (1) The gigantic historical work entitled Geschichte der Israelis seit der Zeit der Maccabäer bis auf unsere Tage (Berlin, 1839-29, 2 vols., 8vo), being an abridgment, with corrections, of the former work; and (2) Allgemeine Geschichte des israelitischen Volkes, etc. (Berlin, 1831-52, 2 vols., 8vo), a town, probably of Judah, the residence of Haruz, whose daughter Meshullemeth became the wife of king Manasseh and mother of Amon (2 Kings xxxi, 19). M. de Saulcy (Narart, i, 94, note) suggests the identification of Tifa with Tyme, a village shown on the north side of the valley (wady Ribah), north of Lebanon and south of Nabíla (Robinson's Researches, ii, 92); but this would lie within the precincts of the late kingdom of Israel. It is usually identified with Jobath or Jothathah of the Exode (Num. xxvi, 8, 84; Deut. x, 7), as the names are essentially the same in the Heb.; but the latter is spoken of only as a region, not an inhabited town, and is out of the bounds of the Jewish monarchy. “The Arabic equivalent for Jobath is et-Taibib, or et-Taibibeh, and no less than three sites of this name are met with in modern Palestine. One is considerably south of Hebron (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 472); another to the west of that city (ib. p. 427-429); and the third is north of Jerusalem, in the country of Benjamin. This last is most likely to answer to Jobath, for the two first-named places are very insignificant, and never have been of much importance; whereas this is the site of Dr. Robinson as crowning a conspicuous hill, skirted by fertile basins of some breadth, . . . full of gardens of olives and fig-trees. The remarkable position (he adds) would not probably have been left unoccupied in ancient times (Biblic. Res. ii, 121, 124). In a subsequent visit to the place he was struck both with the depth and quality of the soil, which were more than one would anticipate in so rocky a region (Later Bib. Res. p. 290). These extracts explain while they justify the signification ‘goodness,’ which belongs both to Jobath and Taibibeh, against this explanation; however, he counts among his very few, very strong objections, namely, its distance from Jerusalem, and the fact of the probable coincidence of this site with that of Orphah (q. v.).

Jotbath (Deut. x, 7). See JOTBATHAH.

Jotbath [some Jobbath] (Heb. Yotbath, יֹתוַבָּת, goodness, i.e. pleasantness, compare Agapothos [the name is the same with יֹתוַבָּת, Yotbath, with מָמָּג appended]; Sept. Ἰφραμία. v. r. Toibath, etc., Auth. Vers. in Deut. x, 7, “Jothabite”), the thirty-fourth station of the Israelites along their journeying out of Egypt, in the desert, situated between Hor-hagidgad and Ebronah (Num. xxxiii, 38, 34), and again their forty-first station, between Gudgodah and the Red Sea (Deut. x, 7), described in the latter passage as a land of rivers יֹתוָבָת. winter-brook) of waters." The locality thus indicated is probably the expanded valley near the confluence of wady Jerachef in its southern part with wady Mukatta el-Tuwariq and others (Robinson's Researches, i, 201), especially wady Khirbat el-4d, which nearly approaches the Heb. name (Jour. Sac. Lit. April, 1860, p. 47-49). This is generally a region answering to the description of fertility (Borain's Descent of Sinai, p. 295). Schwarz (Palest., 218), however, thinks wady Tiba, nearer the Akabah, is meant. See EXOD.

I. The second named of the six sons of Jahdai, of the family of Caleb the Hezronite (1 Chron. ii, 47). B.C. post 1612.

2. The youngest of Gideon's seventy legitimate sons, and the only one who escaped when the rest were massacred by the order of Abimelech (Judg. ix, 5). B.C. 1292. When the fratricide was made king by the people of Shechem, the young Jotham was so daring as to make his appearance on Mount Gerizim for the purpose of lifting up a protesting voice, and of giving vent to his feelings (see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 210). This he did in a beautiful parable, wherein the trees are represented as making choice of a king, and bestowing on the bramble the honor which the cedar, the olive, and the vine would not accept. See FABLE. The obvious application, which, indeed, Jotham failed not himself to point out, must have been highly exasperating to Abimelech and his friends; but the speaker fled, as soon as he had delivered his parable, to the tower of Beer, and remained there out of his brother's reach (Judg. ix, 7-21).

We hear no more of him; but three years after, if then living, he saw the accomplishment of the malversation he had pronounced (Judg. ix, 57).

3. A person named by Josephus (Jos2:24, Ant. viii, 1, 9) as the son of Bukki and father of Meraioth, in the regular line of Phinehas's descendants, although he (incorrectly) states that these lived privately; he seems to refer to Zerahiah (q. v.) of the scriptural list (1 Chron. vii, 5). See HIGH-PRIEST.

4. The eleventh king of the separate kingdom of Judah, and son of Uzziah (by Jeremiah, daughter of Zado, 2 Kings xvi, 22; 2 Chron. xxvi, 21, 22; 2 Chron. xxvi, 23). B.C. 742. See EZRA. For the chronological difficulties of his reign (see Crisius, De ara Jothamica, Lipp. 1756; Winer's Realwörterb., s. v.), see CHRONOLOGY. Jotham profited by the experience which the reign of his father, and of the kings who preceded him, afforded, and he ruled in the fear of God, although he was unable to correct all the corrupt practices into which the people had fallen. His sincere intentions were rewarded with a prosperous reign. He was successful in his wars. The Ammonites, who had "given gifts" as a sort of tribute to Uzziah, but had ceased to do so after his levies had been made, sent presents to Jotham. The principal of the Temple was rebuilt by him on a more magnificent scale; the quarter of Ophel, in Jerusalem, was strengthened by new fortifications; various towns were built or rebuilt in the mountains of Judah; and castles and towers of defence were erected in the wilderness. Jotham died greatly lamented by his people, and was buried in the sepulture of the kings (2 Kings xv, 38; 2 Chron. xvii, 3-7). B.C. 631. His reign approaches the time of the ministrations of the prophets Isaiah, Hosea, and Micah (Isa. i, 1; vii, 1: Hos. i, 1; Mic. i, 1). See JUDAH.

5. A high-priest named by Josephus (Jos2:24, Ant. x, 8, 6) as son of Joel and father of Urijah in the regular incumbency; probably the Amariah (q. v.) of 1 Chron. vii, 11). See HIGH-PRIEST.

Joufroy, THOLODORE SIMON, a noted modern French eclectic philosopher, was born at Pontets in 1768. In 1822 he became professor of philosophy at the College of France, and continued in this relation until 1827. He died in 1842. He was by far the most celebrated and of Cousin, and very popular as a writer of great elegance of style and terseness of diction. He first became known to the public at large through the medium of a translation of Dugald Stewart's Moral Philosophy. To this translation he prefixed an essay or preface, in which he vindicates the study of intellectual science against the attacks of those who would banish all except natural philosophy, out of the domain of human investigation. "Nothing," says Morell (Hist. of Med. Phil. p. 662), "can exceed the clearness, and even the beauty, with which he establishes in this little production the terms on which he signs himself an eclectic philosopher." To a careful observer it is evident that he deeply imbibed the principles and the spirit of the Scot-tish metaphysicians, whilst, at the same time, he would generally rise to those more expansive views of philosophical truth which were inculcated in the lectures of his master as instructed in the "Metaphysique des Phénomènes" (Paris, 1833; 2d edit. 1838-48), the second work to which we desire to call attention, "we see," says Morell, "the zealous pupil and successor of Cousin the genuine modern eclectic, touching more or less upon all the points of his master's researches in the philosophy of nature and morals. We have no space here to elucidate his system, and refer our readers to Morell. His works were published entirely in 6 octavo vola. in 1836. See Caro, in the Revue de deux Mondes, March 18, 1853.

Joumal, or DIURNAL, is the ancient name of the day hours contained in the Broadway (q. v.). It was also known in monasteries the day of daily expenses.

In the East, a day's journey is reckoned about sixteen or twenty miles. To this distance around the Hebrew camp were the quails scattered for food for the people (Numb. xi. 31). Shaw computes the eleven days' journey from Sinna to Kadesh Barnea (Deut. i. 2) to be about one hundred and ten miles. A Sabbath-day's journey (Acts i. 12) is reckoned by the Hebrews at about seven furlongs, or a little less than the length of a bow-stick, but it is said that if any Jew travelled above this from the city on the Sabbath he was beaten. See SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY.

Jouvencel or Jouvency, Joseph de, an eminent Jesuit, was born at Paris Sept. 14, 1648. He taught rhetoric with uncommon reputation at Caen, La Flèche, and Paris, and at length was invited to Rome, in order to continue the "History of the Jesuits" with more freedom than he could have enjoyed at Paris. His other principal works are two volumes of speeches, a small tract entitled De Ratione Discendi et Docendi, and notes on different classical writers. In his history of the Jesuits he avowed his determination to justify father Segneri, who was executed for enforcing the bigoted assassin Châtel in his attempt on the life of Henry IV. In France Parliament prohibited the publication or circulation of the work on that account. See Gorton, Dict. s. v.

Jovian (sometimes, but erroneously, called Jovinius), fully Flavius Claudius Jovinus, Roman emperor from A.D. 363 to 364. His predecessor Julian was slain on the field of battle, in his unhappy campaign against the Persians, June 26, A.D. 363. Jovianus, finding the continuation of the unfortunate struggle ineffectual in its destruction, and secured quite humane terms from the Persians, and, once free from the attacks of foreign enemies, he at once initiated measures to establish his authority in the West, and thereafter his time was mainly devoted to administrative and legislative business. Immediately after his election to the imperial dignity Jovianus had professed himself to be a Christian, and one of his first measures when peace was restored to his dominions was the celebrated edict by which he placed the Christian religion on a legal basis, and thus put an end to the persecutions to which the Christians had been exposed during the short reign of Julian. The heathen churches were, however, equally protected, and no superiority was allowed to the one over the other. The different sects assailed him with petitions to help them against each other, but he declined interfering, and referred them to the decision of a general council; and the Arians showing themselves most troublesome, he gave them to understand that impartiality was the first duty of an emperor. His friend Anthanasius was restored to his see at Alexandria. He died suddenly on his way home from the Orient, A.D. 364. It is possible, though not probable, that he died of a violent death, to wit, Ammannius Marcellinus (xxv, 5-10) seems to allude when he wrote the history of the Christian church, that with that of Eumilius Scipo. See De la Bitterie, Histoire de Jovin (Amsterdam, 1740), the best work on the subject.—Smith, Dict. Grk. and Rom. Biog, ii. 615.

Jovinian, one of the early opponents of monachism, and, in a measure, one of the earliest reformers before the Reformation, flourished near the end of the 4th century. He was an Italian, but whether a native of Rome or Milan is not known. He taught in both cities, and gained a number of adherents. His real opinions, freed from the misrepresentations of his opponents, it is hard father of the 4th century. He evidently maintained "that there is but one divine element of life, which all believers share in common; but one fellowship with Christ, which proceeds from faith in him; but one new birth. All who possess this in common with each other —all, therefore, who are Christians in the true sense, not barely in outward profession—have the same calling, the same profession, the same hope, and that the diversity of outward circumstances creating no difference in this respect, that all persons whatsoever, if they keep the vows they make to Christ in baptism and live godly lives, have an equal title to the rewards of heaven, and, consequently, that the same free estate of life is no more acceptable to God than those who live in wedlock, and nourish their bodies with moderation and sobriety." He also held that Mary ceased to be a virgin by bringing forth Christ; that the degrees of future blessedness do not depend on the meritoriousness of our good works; and that a truly overrated Christian, so long as he is such, cannot sin whiffly, but will resist and overcome the temptations of the devil. Yet, while upholding all these views, Jovianus himself remained single, and lived like all other monks, and his enemies even admit that the tenure of his life was always blameless. It is true that his opinions at Milan, but, being there denied by the stern Ambrose all liberty of speech, he went to Rome, which, as appears from the evidence of Jerome, was one of the last places to entertain the ascetic fanaticism, nor was it until after monasteries had darkened all parts of the East, as well as those of the West, that such monastic schemes were seen in that city. There, according to the report of pope Syricius and others, the doctrine of the Milanese monk had made many converts, so that the Church, "torn by dogs" in a manner heretofore unheard of, doubted where to look for an ascetic might proceed. A few of the holy men of the clergy had listened to Jovianus; and eight persons are named as his supporters, who, with him, were, by a unanimous decision of the Romish clergy, condemned and excommunicated in a council held at Milan in 390, as the authors of a "new heresy, and of blasphemy; and that they were excommunicated, and that he was not permitted to return, and that the cries of the multitude, De bone conjugali, and in others of a similar kind, he labors hard, by wily sophistry, to reconcile the prevailing absurdities with reason and Scripture. The mild, plious, and honest Augustine, however, was not the man to be the Church's thorough-going champion on this notable occasion. He had a better man at hand; "one who, by various learning, by a voluble pen, as well as by rancor of temper, and boundless arrogance, and a blind devotion to whatever the 'Church' had sanctioned, was well qualified to do the necessary work of cajoling the simple, of inflaming the fanatical, of frightening the timid, of calculating the ignorant, to sacrifice, in cold, of quashing, if it could be quashed, all inquiry concerning 'authorized' errors and abuses. The Church, right or wrong, was to be justified; the objector, innocent or guilty, was to be crushed; and Jerome would scruple nothing could he but accomplish so desirable an object."

See Jerome. But, notwithstanding these attacks by the Church's three greatest doctors—Augustine, Ambrose, and Jerome, whose great irritation and anxiety for the cause of the Church is sufficiently betrayed by their determination to oppose Jovinianism jointly, though living at points quite remote from each other—the "hersy," instead of dying out, spread, and was favorably thought of and accepted in different parts of Christendom, and no doubt made easier the task of Vigilantius and of Luther. Neander does not hesitate to rank the services of Jovinian so high as to consider him worthy of a place by the side of Luther. See Neander, CA. Hist. ii. 265; Schaff, CA. Hist. ii. 226 sq.; Ambrosius, Epist. 42; Augustine, De Haeres, c. 92; Bonaparte, Annales Ecc. p. 590, 412; Walch, Ketzerhistorie, iii. 635 sq.; Baur, Christ. Joy (usually some form of θαυμάζει, which prop. means to spin round with pleasurable emotion, and is thus a stronger term than ηδονή, which expresses gladness; but less so than θαυμάζει, to excel or leap with exuberant joy; Gr. prop. χαρᾶ), a delight of the mind arising from the consideration of a present or assured approaching possession of a future good (Ezra vi, 16; Euth. viii, 16). 1. Natural joy is of various degrees: when it is moderate, it is called gladness; when raised on a sudden to the highest degree, it is then exultation or transcendent; when we wish our desires by our possessions, it is consentment; when our desires are raised high, and yet accomplished, this is called satisfaction. When our joy is derived from some comical occasion or amusement, it is mirth; if it arise from considerable opposition that is vanquished in the pursuit of the good we desire, it is then called triumph; when joy has so long possessed the mind that it is settled into a temper, we call it cheerfulness; when we rejoice upon the account of any good which others obtain, it may be called sympathetic or congratulation. 2. Moral joy is also of several kinds, as the self-approbation, or that which arises from the performance of any good actions; this is called peace, or serenity of conscience; if the action be honorable and the joy rise high, it may be called glory. There is also a spiritual joy, which the Scripture calls a "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. v. 22), "the joy of the Spirit" (Phil. i. 25), and "a thing of hope" (Rom. xii. 6). The objects of it are—(1.) God himself (Ps. xii. 4, Isa. lx. 10). (2.) Christ (Phil. iii. 3; 1 Pet. i. 8). (3.) The promises (Ps. cxix. 162). (4.) The administration of the Gospel and Gospel ordinances (Ps. lixix. 15). (5.) The excellency of the interest (Isa. xlv. 16). (Rev. xi. 16, 17). (6.) The happiness of a future state (Rom. v. 2; Matt. xxv). The nature and properties of this joy: [1.] It is, or should be, constant (Phil. iv. 4). [2.] It is unknown to the men of the world (1 Cor. ii. 14). [3.] It is unspeakable (1 Pet. i. 8). [4.] It is permanent (John xvi. 22). See Watts, On Pious. sec. 11: Gill's Body of Div. Inst, iii, 111, 8vo ed.; Grove's Moral Phil. i. 556.

Joy of God relates, 1. To the delight and complacency he has in himself, his own nature, and perfection. 2. He rejoices in his own works (Ps. cxxv. 81). 3. In his Saviour Christ Jesus (Matt. xi. 17). 4. In the work of redemption (John iii. 15). 5. In the subjects of his grace (Ps. cxviii. 11; Zeph. iii. 17; Ps. cxlix. 4). Joy or Joye, George, an early promoter of the Reformation, a native of the county of Bedford, was educated at Cambridge, and he graduated M.A. in 1517. An associate of Tyndale, he was in 1527 accused of heresy, and obliged to go to Germany, where he resided for many years. He was concerned in the superintendence of Tyndale's Bibles, printed at Antwerp, and finally returned to his native country, but the time of his death is unknown. Besides his translation of part of the Bible, he published On the Unity and Schism of the ancient Church (1584)—Subservient of More's False Foundation (1584)—Commentary on Daniel, the messes from Melanchthon, etc. See Gorton, Biog. Joyner, James E., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Amherst County, Va., and died at his own home in Henry County, Va., March 15, 1968. For more than thirty years Joyner served the Church with great acceptability and usefulness in various appointments. His preaching was earnest, pointed, and eminently practical. During the late war he served as a chaplain in the Confederate States army, and exerted among the officers and men an influence for good which was felt and acknowledged by all. —Conf. Minutes E. M. 1. A Gederathite, one of the famous Benjazite archers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4). B.C. 1055.

2. A chieflard of Manasseh, who re-enforced David on retreating to Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 20). B.C. 1053.

3. Another chieflard of Manasseh, who deserted Saul's cause for that of David when he made Ziklag his residence (1 Chron. xii. 20); it is possible, however, that the name may have erroneously repeated for the preceding. B.C. 1053.

4. Probably a Levite, one of the persons charged with the care of the Temple offerings under the superintendence of Cononiah and Shimei, at the reformation by Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxii. 19). B.C. 726.

5. One of the chief Levites who made offerings for the renewal of the Temple services under Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 9). B.C. 629.

6. A son of Jeshua, and one of the Levites who took account of the precious metals and vessels offered for the Temple by the Israelites who declined personally to return from the captivity (Ezra viii. 33). B.C. 444. He was probably the same with one of the chief Levites who "had the oversight of the outward matters of the house of God" after the re-establishment at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 16). B.C. cir. 440. He was possibly identical with No. 7.

7. An Israelite, one of the "sons" of Pahur, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra x. 27). B.C. 459.

B One of the Levites who divorced his heathen wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra x. 25). B.C. 425.

C One of those who accompanied the priests who assisted Ezra in expounding the Law to the people assembled in the Temple (Neh. viii. 7). B.C. cir. 410.

Ἰωσαχάρ, the son of Shim-eath, an Ammonite, one of the two servants who assasinated Jehoahaz, king of Judah, in Millio (2 Kings xx. 21). In the parallel passage (2 Chron. xxiv. 26) the name is erroneously written Zara. B.C. 837. "It is uncertain whether their conspiracy was prompted by a personal feeling of revenge for the death of Zerahiah, as Josephus intimates (Ant. ix. 8, 4), or whether they were urged to it by the family of Jehoiada. The case of the chronicler to show that they were of foreign descent seems almost intended to disarm the suspicion that the king's assassination was an act of priestly vengeance. But it is more likely that the conspiracy had a different origin altogether, and that the king's murder was regarded by the chronicler as an instance of divine retribution. On the accession of Amaziah the conspirators were executed.

JUBAL

Jubal (Heb. נְבוֹל, nēḇōl, ἡμβολή, nēmbole), prob. for נְבוֹלָה, nēḇōlāh, jubiles, i.e. music; Sept. ναβόλας, Nabolos, Lamch.'s second son by Lahah, of the line of Cain; described as the 'father of harp and organ,' and 'the Inventor of the harp and the organ,' but perhaps more properly "the lyre and mouth-organ," or Panleian pipe (Gen. iv. 21). See Music. B.C. prob. cir. 3400. According to Josephus (Ant. i, 2, 2), he "cultivated music, and invented the psaltery and cithara." Some have compared him with Apollo of the heathen mythology (Isaac's Eusebius, ii, 57, comp. Euseb. Prep. Evan. ii, 6; Diod. Sic. i, 20; Buttmann, Mythol. i, 164; Kalisch, Commentary, ad loc.).

Jubilans. See SUNDAY.

Jubilees (Heb. נְבוֹלָי, nēḇōlāy or לְוֹלָי, lōḇlāy or לְוֹלֵי, lōḇlēy, a joyful shout or clang of trumpets; once in the Author. Versa. for לְוֹלָי, Lev. xxv. 9, which is elsewhere rendered "a shout," etc.), usually in the connection YEAR OF JUBILEE (נְבוֹלָה, nēḇōlāh), or merely לְוֹלָה, lōḇlah, in Lev. xxv. 28; Septuag. usually translates τροχὸς τῆς διάσπασης, or simply διάσπαση; but Grecines τωσοῦ in Jos. vi. 8, 13; Josephus Grescizes τωσοῦ, Ant. iii. 12, 3; Vulgate annum jubilum, but busce; or in Exod. xix. 13; also called the "year of liberty" (נְרוֹנָה, nōrlenāh, Ezek. xlvii. 17), the great semi-centennial epoch of the Hebrews, constituting a festival, and marked by striking public and domestic changes. The relation in which it stood to the Sabbatical year, and the general directions for its observance, are given Lev. xxv. 8-18. Its bearing on lands dedicated to Jehovah is stated Lev. xxvii. 16-25. There is no mention of the jubilee in the book of Deuteronomy, and the only other reference to it in the Pentateuch is in the appeal of the tribe of Manassach, on account of the daughters of Zelophehad (Num. xxxv. 2, 3). It is rarely spoken of in the apocryphal books, but is very frequently referred to by Talmudical writers. See FESTIVAL.

1. Signification of the Name. According to pseudo-Jonathan (Targum on Josh. vi. 5-39), the Talmud (Koš. Hikka-sha, 26, a), Rashbi, Aben-Ezra (on Exod. xix. 13), Kimchi (on Josh. vi. 6), and other Jewish authorities, the meaning ram, which נְבוֹלָה seems at times to bear (see First, Lexicon, s. v.; but Gesenius utterly denies this sense), is the primary one; hence metonymically a ram's horn (comp. Exod. xix. 13, with Josh. vi. 5), and so the sound of a ram's horn, like the Latin baccina. According to another ancient interpretation, the Heb. word is from a root לְבֹל, lōḇel, to liberate (parallel with יַרְדּה, a freed captive; comp. Hitzig on Jer. xxxvii. 6), an etymology which is somewhat sanctioned by Lev. xi. 21, the usual rendering of the Sept. (also Josephus, Άρσηπιαὶ ἡ ἐν εἰρήνῃ τοῦ ποιμένα, Ant. iii. 12, 3; and by St. Jerome, Jobel est demittens aut mittens, Comment. ad loc.). Others, again, regard the root לְבֹל as ornamentalpoetic, like the Latin jubilare, denoting to be jubilant (Gesenius, etc.). Most modern critics, however, derive לְבֹל from the better known root לְבֹל, to flow impetuously (Gen. vi. 17), and hence assign to it the meaning of the loud or impetuous sound (Gen. iv. 21) streaming forth from the trumpet, and proclaiming this festival. The other notions respecting the word may be found in Fuller (Misc. Sac. p. 1026 sq.; Critici Sacri, vol. ix), in Carpzov (p. 448 sq.), and, most completely given, in Kranold (p. 11 sq.).

2. Recension of landed Property. This provision is comprised in Lev. xxv. 13-34; xxvii. 16-24. The Mosaic law enacted that the Promised Land should be divided by lot, in equal parts, among the Israelites, and that the plot which should thus come into the possession of each family was to be absolutely inalienable, and forever continue to be the property of the original possessor. See LAND. When a proprietor, therefore, being pressed by poverty, had to dispose of a field, no one could buy it of him for a longer period than up to the time of the next jubilee, when it reverted to the original possessor. Of the sale, property taxes were not paid on the land, but of the produce of so many years, and the price was fixed according to the number of years (יֵשָׁהַ יָטָר, yeṣāha yāṭar) up to the next jubilee, so as to prevent any injustice being done to those who were compelled by circumstances to part temporarily with their land (Lev. xxv. 15, 16). The lessee, however, according to Josephus, in case he had made great outlays on the field just before he was required by the law of jubilee to return it to its owner, could claim compensation for these (Ant. iii. 12, 3). But even before the jubilee year the original proprietor could recover his field, if either his own circumstances improved, or if his next of kin (see GOÈL) could redeem it for him by paying back according to the regulations which regulated the price (Lev. xxv. 26, 27). In the interests of the purchaser, however, the Rabbinical law enacted that this redemption should not take place before he had the benefit of the field for two productive years (so the Rabbins understood יֵשָׁהַ יָטָר, yeṣāha yāṭar), exclusive of a Sabbatical year, a year of barrenness, and of the first harvest, if he happened to buy the plot of land shortly before the seventh month, i.e., with the ripe fruit (Ezech. xix. 1; Maimonides, Jobel, xi. 10-13). As poverty is the only reason which the law supposes might lead one to part with his field, the Rabbins enacted that it was not allowable for any one to sell his patrimony on speculation (comp. Maimonides, Jobel, xi. 3). Though nothing is here said about fields which were given away by the proprietors, yet there can be no doubt, as Maimonides says (ibid. xi. 10), that the same law is intended to apply to gifts (comp. Ezek. xlvii. 17), but not to those plots of land which came into a man's possession through marriage with an heiress (Num. xxxv. 4-9; Maimonides, Mishn. xxviii. 16, 17). Neither did this law apply to a house in a walled city. Still, the seller had the privilege of redeeming it at any time within a full year from the day of the sale. After the year it became the absolute property of the purchaser (Lev. xxv, 29, 30, 37). As this law required a more minute definition for practical purposes, the Rabbins determined that this right of redemption might be exercised from the very first day of the first year to the last day which made up the year. Moreover, as the purchaser sometimes concealed himself towards the end of the year, in order to prevent the seller from redeeming his house, it was enacted that when the purchaser could not be found, the original proprietor should hand over the redemption-money to the powers that be, break open the doors, and take possession of the house; and if the purchaser died during the year, the original proprietor could redeem it only in the whole of the following year. Maimonides, Jobel, xi. 1-7. Open places, however, which are not surrounded by walls, belong to landed property, and, like the cultivated land on which they stand, are subject to the law of jubilee, and must revert to their original proprietors (Lev. xxv, 31). But, although houses and buildings are thus the same as the inventor of the land-wants (יֵשָׁהַ יָטָר), but not to lay it up in their storehouses.

value to the Levites as landed property had to the other tribes, these houses were subject to the jubilee law for fields, and could at any time be redeemed (Lev. xxv, 32; comp. Erashim, ix, 8), so that, even if a Levite redeemed the house which his brother Levite was obliged to sell through poverty, the general law of house property is not to gain, even among the Levites themselves, but they are obliged to treat each other according to the law of landed property. Thus, for instance, the house of A, which he, out of poverty, was obliged to sell to the non-Levite B, and was redeemed from him by a Levite C, reverts in the jubilee year from C to the original owner A. The provisions of this law are the most probable meaning of the enactment contained in Lev. xxv, 33, and it does not necessitate us to insert into the text the negative particle וַיֵּצְבוּ before ובְּנֵן, as is done by the Vulgate, Houbigant, Ewald (Alterthümer, p. 421), Knobel, etc., nor need we, with Raši, Aben-Ezra, etc., take בְּנֵן in the unnatural sense of buying. The lands in the suburbs of their cities the Levites were not permitted to part with under any condition, and therefore these did not come under the law of jubilee (ver. 34), nor was there any exception to this general law with regard to the houses and the fields consecrated to the Lord, or to the support of the sanctuary. If these were not redeemed before the ensuing jubilee, instead of reverting to their original proprietors, they at the jubilee became forever the property of the priests (Lev. xxvii, 20, 21). The question is, however, on what condition a redeemed property could be redeemed were as follows: A house thus devoted to the Lord was valued by the priest, and the donor who wished to redeem it had to pay one fifth in addition to this fixed value (Lev. xxvii, 14, 15). A field was valued according to the number of homers of barley which could be sown therein, at the rate of fifty silver shekels of the sanctuary for each homer for the whole fifty years, deducting from it a proportionate amount for the lapse of each year (Lev. xxvii, 16-18). According to the Talmud the fiftieth year was not counted. Hence, as any one wished to redeem his field, he had to pay one fifth in addition to the regular rate of a sela (shelih), and a pandium (= 1-48th sela) per annum for every homer, the surplus pandium being intended for the forty-ninth year. No one was therefore allowed to sanctify his field during the year which immediately preceded it, for he would have to pay for the whole forty-nine years, because months could not be deducted from the sanctuary, and the jubilee year itself was not counted (Mishna, Erashin, vii, 1). If one sanctified a field which he had purchased, i.e., not freehold property, it reverted to the original proprietor in the same year (Mishna, Lev. xxvii, 22-24).

3. Manumission of those Israelites who had become Slaves.—This enactment is comprised in Lev. xxv, 39-54. All Israelites who through poverty had sold themselves as slaves to their fellow-Israelites or to the foreigners resident among them, and who, up to the time of the jubilee, had neither completed their six years of servitude, nor redeemed themselves, nor been redeemed by their relatives, were to be set free in the jubilee, to return with their children to their family and to the patrimony of their fathers. Great difficulty has been experienced in reconciling the injunction here, that in the jubilee all slaves are to regain their freedom, with Exod. xxv, 6, where it is enacted that those bondmen who refuse their liberty at the expiration of the appointed six years’ servitude, and submit to the boring of their ears, are to be slaves forever (שֶׁהָלְכָּהָּ עַל עָרָבָּה). Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 28), the Mishna (Kidushin, i, 8) and Talmud (Bab. Ked. 11, 14), Raši, Aben-Ezra, Maimonides (Hilkhot Abadim, ii, 6), and most Jewish interpreters, who are followed by Ainsworth, Bp. Patrick, and other Christian commentators, take the הָלְכָּהָּ עַל עָרָבָּה, maintaining that the slaves who submitted to have their ears bored are included in this general manumission, and thus try to escape the difficulty. But against this it is to be urged, that 1. The phrase הָלְכָּהָּ עַל עָרָבָּה is used in Lev. xxv, 46 for perpetual servitude, which is unaffected by the year of jubilee. 2. The declaration of the slave that he will not have his freedom, in Exod. xxi, 5, unquestionably shows that perpetual slavery is meant. 3. Servitude till the year of jubilee is not at all spoken of in Lev. xxv, 40-42 as something contemptible, for he would not be the person to refuse for him who refused his freedom, especially if the year of jubilee happened to occur two or three years after refusing his freedom; and that it is bondage beyond that time which is characterized as real slavery; and, 4. The jubilee, without any indication whether given or not, referring to this explanation, made to give the slave the right to take with him the maid and the children who are the property of the master—the very right which had previously been denied to him. Ewald, therefore (Alterthümer, p. 421), and others, conclude that the two enactments belong to different periods, the manumission of slaves in the year of jubilee having been instituted when the law enjoining the liberation of slaves at the expiration of six years had become obsolete; while Knobel (on Exod. xxx, 6) regards this jubilee law and the enactments in Exod. xxii, 5, 6 as representing one of the many changes which exist between the Jehovistic and Elieothic portions of the Pentateuch. All the difficulties, however, disappear when the jubilee manumission enactment is regarded as designed to supplement the law in Exod. xxi, 2-6. In the latter case the regular period of servitude is fixed, at the expiration of which the bondman is ordained to become free, whilst Lev. xxv, 39-54 institutes an additional and extraordinary period, when those slaves who had not as yet completed their appointed six years of servitude at the time of jubilee, or had not foreclosed their right of free discharge by means previously authorized, losing their power of bondage, and becoming slaves forever (כֵּן מַלְשֹׁנֵן), are once in every fifty years to obtain their freedom. The one enactment refers to the freedom of each individual at different days, weeks, months, and years, inasmuch as hardly any twenty of them entered on their servitude at exactly the same time, whilst the other legislation for a general manumission, which is to take place at exactly the same time, is enacted. The enactment in Lev. xxv, 39-54, therefore, takes for granted the law in Exod. xxi, 2-6, and begins where the latter ends, and does not mention it because it simply treats on the influence of jubilee upon slavery.

4. That there must also have been a perfect remission of debt, for which the jubilee is self-evident, is implied in the fact that all persons who were in bondage for debt, as well as all the landed property of debtors, were freely redeemed. Whether debts generally, for which there were no such pledges, were remitted, is a matter of dispute. Josephus positively declares that they were (Ant. xxi, 5, 3), whilst Maimonides (Jebetz, x, 16) as positively denies it.

III. Time when the Jubilee was celebrated.—According to Lev. xxv, 8-11, it is evident that forty-nine years are to be counted, and that at the end thereof the fiftieth year is to be celebrated as the jubilee. Hence the jubilee is to follow immediately upon the sabbatical year, so that there are to be two successive fallow years. This is also corroborated by verse 21, where it is promissed that the produce of the sixth year shall suffice for three years, i.e., forty-nine, fifty, and fifty-one or the two former years, which are the sabbatical year and the jubilee itself, and immediately following, and the ordinary produce of the preceding year would be wanting. Moreover, from the remark in verse 22, it would appear that the sabbatical year, like the jubilee, began in the autumn, or the month of Tisri, which commenced the civil year, when it was customary to begin sowing for the ensuing year. At all events, ver. 9 distinctly says that the jubilee is to be proclaimed by the blow of the trumpet "on the tenth of the seventh month, on the day of atonement," which is Tisri. See ATONE-MENT, DAY OF. The opinion that the sabbatical year and the jubilee were distinct, or that there were two fallow years, is also rejected (Lev. xxv, 12). That the fields did yield a crop in their second fallow year is most unquestionably presupposed by the prophet Isaiah (xxxvi, 30). Palestine was, at all events, not less fruitful than Albania, in which Strabo tells us (lib. xi, c. iv, sec. 8), "The ground that has been sowed once produces in a year, twice or three crops, the fruit of which is of even fifty-fold." It must, however, be remarked, that many, from a very early period down to the present day, have taken the jubilee year to be identical with the seventh sabbatical year. Thus the "Book of Jubilees," which dates prior to the Christian era, and which is not only the Biblical history from the creation to the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan into fifty jubilees of forty-six years each, which shows that this view of the jubilees must have been pretty general in those days. Some Rabbis, who lived in the Talmud (Eracli, 12), wrote with reluctance, as well as many Christian writers (Scaliger, Potavious, Ueber, Cusanus, Caviterius, Gatterer, Frank, Schroder, Hug, Rosenmuller), support the same view.
As to the remark, "Ye shall hallow the sabbath year" (ver. 10), "a jubilee shall that sabbath year be unto you" (ver. 11), it is urged at the same time, in accordance with a breath of speech which is common to all languages and ages. Thus we call a week eight days, including both Sundays, and the best classical writers called an olympiad by the name of quinquennium, though it only contained four entire years. Moreover, the sacred number seven, or the sabbatical year, which underlies all the festivals, and connects them all into one chain, the last link of which is the jubilee, corroborates this view, inasmuch as we have, 1.
A Sabbath of days; 2. A Sabbath of weeks (the seventh week after the Passover being the Sabbath week, as the first day of it is the festival of weeks); 3. A Sabbath of months (the first day of the month with the new moon and the full moon, and its festival, the new year); 4. A Sabbath of years (the seventh year is the sabbatical year); and, 5. A Sabbath of Sabbaths, inasmuch as the seventh sabbatical year is the jubilee. See Sab-natur.
IV. Mode of Celebration.—As the observance of the jubilee, like that of the sabbatical year, was only to be come obligatory when the Israelites had taken possession of the promised land, and cultivated the land for that period of years at the conclusion of which the festival was to be celebrated, the ancient tradition preserved in the Talmud seems to be correct, that the first sabbatical year was in the one-and-twentieth, and the first jubilee in the sixty-fourth year after the Jews came into Canaan, for it took them seven years to conquer it, and seven years more to distribute it (Erachin, xii, 6; Maimonides, Jobel, x, 21). The Bible says nothing about the moserah in which the jubilee is to be celebrated, except that it should be proclaimed by the blast of a trumpet. See TRUMPET. As in many other cases, the lawgiver leaves the practical application of this law, and the necessarily complicated arrangements connected therewith, to his interpreter. He has both directed us that the trumpets used on this occasion, like those of the feast of trumpets, or new year, were of rams' horns, straight, and had their mouth-piece covered with gold (Mishna, Rosh Ha-Shana, iii, 2; Maimonides, Jobel, 12, 11); that every Israelite blew nine blasts, so as to make a hundred and eighty-three rams' horns (Lev. xxv, 9); and that "from the feast of trumpets, or new year (i.e. Tisri), till the day of atonement (i.e.
IV.-U V U

1041 JUBILEE

Tiri 10), the slaves were neither manumitted to return to their homes nor made use of by their masters, but ate, drank, and rejoiced, and wore garlands on their heads; and when the day of atonement came the judges blew the trumpets and cried out: "Let the slaves go to their homes, and the fields were set free" (Rosh Ha-Shana, 8 b; Maimonides, Jobel, x, 14). Though the Jews, from the nature of the case, cannot now celebrate the jubilee, yet on the evening of the day of atonement the conclusion of the feast is announced in all the syna-agogues to the present day by the blast of one rams' horn, which, according to the Rabbis, is intended to commemorate the ancient jubilee proclamation (Orach Chajim, cap. dxxiiii, sec. 6, note). Because the Bible does not record any particular instance of the public celebration of this festival, Michaelis, Winer, etc., have questioned whether the custom to the ever came into actual operation; while Kranold, Hup-feld, etc., have positively denied it. The following considerations, however, speak for its actual observance: 1.
All the other Mosaic festivals have been observed, and it is therefore surpassing strange to suppose that the jubilee, which is historically connected with all the others, is the climax of all the times, is only the one that never was observed. 2. The law about the inalienability of landed property, which was to be the result of the jubilee, actually obtained among the Jews, thus showing that this festival was observed, and that it was with a view to observing the jubilee law that the right of an heirens to marry was restricted (Num. xxxvi, 4, 6, 7); and it was the observance of this law, forbidding the sale of land in such a manner as to prevent its reversion to the original owner or his heir in the year of jubilee, that made Naboth's property worthless, with his vineyard on the solicitation of king Ahab (1 Kings xxi, 1-4). 3. From Ezek. xlv, 17, where even the king is reminded that if he made a present of his landed property to any of his servants it could only be to the jubilee year, when it must revert to him, it is evident that this festival was observed. But the jubilee is also to be found in Neh. v, 1-19; Isa. v, 7, 8, 9, 10, lix, 1, 2; Ezek. vii, 12, 13 (Isa. xxxvii, 30 is less clear). Ewald contends that the institution is eminently practical in the character of its details, and that the accidental circumstance of no particular instance of its observance being preserved in the Talmud proves nothing.
Besides the passages to which reference has been made, he applies several others to the jubilee. He conceives that "the year of visitation" mentioned in Jer. xi, 23; xxiii, 12; xlvii, 44, denotes the punishment of those who, in the jubilee, withheld by tyranny or oppression the possessions of the poor.
From Jer. xxxvi, 6-12, he infers that the law was restored to operation in the reign of Josiah (Afterthamer, p. 424, note I). It is likely, however, that in the general declension of religious observances under the later monarchs of Judah this institution yielded to its ar-rice and worldliness of landed proprietors, especially as mortgaged property and servants would thereby be released (see Jer. xxxiv, 8-11; comp. Neh. v). Indeed, it is intimated that the Babylonian captivity should be of such a duration as to compensate for the years (sabbatical and jubilee together) of which Jehovah had been defrauded (2 Chron. xxxvi, 21). 4. The general observance of the jubilee is attested by the unanimous voice of Jewish tradition. This unanimity of opinion, however, only extends to the observance of the jubilee prior to the Babylonian captivity, for many of the later Rabbis affirm that it was not kept after the return to Judah. But in the Tiberias Olam (cap. xxx), the author of which lived shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem, we are positively assured that it was observed. Josephus, too (Ant. iii, 12, 3), speaks of it as being permanently observed. This is, moreover, confirmed by Diodorus Sic-lurus (iii. 10), who tells us that the Jews cannot dispose of their own patrimony (ζιωνικά κληρονομος, pαλαιος), as well as by the fact that we have distinct records of the law respecting the redemption of houses in cities with- out walls, which forms an integral part of the jubilee law, being strictly observed to a very late period (Evra- chis, 91 b.; Baba Kamma, 1 b)."

2 Origen, Vitae Importance of the Jubilee. —The foundation of the law of jubilee appears to be so es- sentially connected with the children of Israel that it seems strange that Michaelis should have confidently affirmed its Egyptian origin, while yet he acknowledges that he has no specific evidence for the subject (Mos. Law, art. 78). The only well-proved instance of anything like it in other nations appears to be that of the Dalmatians, mentioned by Strabo, lib. vii (p. 315, edit. Casaubon). He says that they redistributed their land every eight years. Ewald, following the statement of Pliny, refers to the institution of Lycurgus, but Mr. Grote has given another view of the matter (History of Greece, ii, 530).

The object of this institution was that those of the people of God who, through poverty or other adverse circumstances, had forfeited their personal liberty or property to their debtors, should have their debts forgiven by their co-religionists every half centu- ry, on the great day of atonement, and be restored to their families and inheritance as freely and fully as God on that very day forgave the debts of his people and re- stored to them the perfect fellowship with himself, so that the people of the whole community, having forgiven each other, and being forgiven of God, might return to the original or- der which had been disturbed in the lapse of time, and, being freed from the bondage of one another, might un- reservedly be the servants of him who is their redeemer. The aim of the jubilee, therefore, is to preserve unim- paired the essential character of theocracy, to the end that there be no poor among the people of God (Deut. xv, 4). Hence God, who redeemed Israel from the bondage of Egypt to be his peculiar people, and al- lotted to them the promised land, will not suffer any one of them to become poor or end his days as Lord over the property that he has acquired as his own. It is the idea of grace for all the suffering children of man, bringing freedom to the captive and rest to the weary as well as to the earth, which made the year of jubilee the symbol of the Messianic year of grace (Isa. lxi, 2), when all the conflicts in the universe should be peace to their original harmony, and when not only we, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, but the whole creation, which groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, may be restored into the glori- ous liberty of the sons of God (comp. Isa. lxi, 1–3, Luke iv, 18–23; Heb. iv, 9). The importance of this institution will be apparent if it is considered what moral and social advantages would accrue to the community from the sacred observance of it. 1. It would prevent the accumulation of land on the part of a few to the detriment of the com- munity at large. 2. It would render it impossible for any one to be born to absolute poverty, since every one had his hereditary land. 3. It would preserve those inequalities which are produced by extremes of riches and poverty, and which make one man domineer over an- other. 4. It would utterly do away with slavery. 5. It would give fresh opportunity to begin again their career of industry, in the patrimony which they had temporarily forfeited. 6. It would periodically rectify the disorders which crept into the state in the course of time, prejudice the division of the people into nobles and plebeians, and preserve the inviolate.

VI. Literature.—The Mishna (Erachin, ch. viii, ix) gives very important enactments of a very ancient date respecting the jubilee. In Maimonides (Jod Ha-Che- zaka, especially the tract so often above referred to as Hilkoth Geva'ot, 1, p. 23, ch. x–xiii) an epitome will be found of the Jewish information on this subject which is scattered through the Talmud and Midrashim. Of the modern productions are to be mentioned the valuable treatises of Cuneus, De Rep. Hebr. chap. i, sec. iv (in the Critici Sacri, i, 278 sq.), and Meyer, De Tru- por, et Diebus Hebraeorum (in Ugolini Theaurum, i, 708, 1750), p. 541–560; Michaelis, Commentaries on the Laws of Moses, Engl. version, Lond., 1814, vol. i, p. 268; L小龙, 376 sq.; Idelsohn, Die Geschichte der Chassidismen, Berlin, 1920, i, 502 sq.; the excellent prize essays of Krano, De Amno Hebr. Jubilaeo (Gottingen, 1837), and Wolde, De anno Hebr. Jubilaeo (Gottingen, 1887); Bahr, Symbolik des Mos- aischen Cultus (Heidelberg, 1869), i, 572 sq.; Ewald, Die Altertumskunde der Israelitischen Völker, 3rd ed., 1846, 579 sq.; Schaab, Das Mosaische Recht (Berlin, 1858), i, 141, etc.; and Archäologie der Hebräer (Königsb. 1866, ii, 224, etc.; Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volks Israel (Nord-hausen, 1855), i, 463, etc., etc.; Keil, Handbuch der Bibliischen Archäologie (Frankf. a. M., 1856), i, 574, etc.; Hasek, Commentarium de Hebraeorum Festa (part iii, 1852), has lately dealt with it in a vigilant and restless style of crit- icism. Vitringa notices the prophetic bearing of the jubilee in lib. iv, c. 4 of the Observations Sacra. Light- foot (Harm. Evang. in Luc. iv, 19) pursues the jub- lee in a fanciful manner, and makes out that Christ suffered in different times. For further details, see Wigram, De anno Hebr. Jubilaeo (Altorf, 1700); J. C. Buczkowsky, Einbühl, jubilaeo (Viteb 1700); Carpa, De anno jubil- aio (Lips. 1730; also in his Apparatus, crit. p. 45): Ode, De anno Heb. jubilaeo (Traj. a. H. 1736; also in Oehricb's Collectio, i, 421); Otto, De anno Hebr. jubilaeo (Altenb. 1754); also Marx, Syglog. dissert. 302; Bauer, Gotted, Verfass. i, 277; Hultmann, Uebergesch. des Staats, 73; Van der Hardt, De jubil. Monis (Helmst. 1728); Joachim Salomo, De jubil. Heb. Other monographs, relating, however, rather to later times, are cited by Vollend, Index, p. 129, 162. See Sarrabical Year. The jubilee is of two kinds, ordinary and extraordinary. The ordinary jubilee is that which is celebra- ted at stated intervals, the length of which has varied at different times. The first is traced to pope Boniface VIII, who issued, for the year 1300, a bull granting a plenary indulgence to all pilgrims-visiters of Rome dur- ing that year on condition of their penitently confessing their sins, and visiting the church of St. Peter and St. Paul. The number of pilgrims has varied at different times, and the revenues of the city. The invitation was accepted with marvellous enthusiasm. Innumerable troops of pilgrims from every part of the Church flocked to Rome. Gio- vanni Villani, a contemporary chronicler, states that the constant number of pilgrims in Rome, not reckoning those who were on the road going or returning, during the entire year, never fell below 200,000. Boniface, finding the jubilee a success, and having been informed, so the story goes, by a hoary patriarch, who, at the age of 107, attended it, that a hundred years ago a like jub- ilee had been held, now ordered that it should be repeated every 100 years. The great gain which the occasion afforded to the churches at Rome induced Clement VI to abridge the time to fifty years. His jubilee accordingly took place in 1350, and was even more numerous attended than that of Boniface. The average number of visitors, however, until suspended their frequency, being, according to Matthew Villani, no fewer than 1,000,000! The term of interval was still further abridged by Urban VI: but in the stormy days of his pontificate the jubilee could not take place, and his successor, Boniface IX, improved this to his advantage, and continued it in 1358. Ten years later he repeated it, and, besides, inaugurated extra jubilees and permitted their observance also in foreign cities provided the worshippers would pay into the Roman treasury the cost of a journey to the holy city (comp. Amort, De origine, progressu, et ac fructu indigent, i, 87 sq.). Paul II finally ordered in 1470 that thenceforward every twenty-fifth year should be held as jubilee, an arrangement which has continued ever since to regulate the ordinary jubilee. As to the term jubilee period, it seems to have drawn its origin from the contribution to ecclesiastical purposes, always be obtained at the home of the penitent, the pilgrimages to Rome gradually diminished in frequency; but the observance itself has been punctually maintained at each recurring period, with the single exception of the year 1587, in which, owing to the vacancy of the holy year and the troubles of the times, it was not held. For the excuses committed in the sale of indulgences, see Indulgences. The extraordinary jubilee is ordered by the pope out of the regular period, either on his accession, or on some occasion of public calamity, or in some special condition of the fortunes of the Church; one of the conditions for obtaining the indulgence in such cases being the recitation of certain stated prayers for the particular necessity in which the jubilee originated. See Herzog, Real-Enzyklop., vii, 117; Chambers, s. v.; Walcott, Sac. Arch., p. 334.

Jubilees, Book of. This apocyphal or Haggadic book was written, as was held, by the Chief Church, and was still known to the Byzantines, but of which both the original Hebrew and the Greek were afterwards lost, has recently been discovered in an Ethiopic version in Abyssinia.

I. Of the Book, and its Signification.—The book is called רבי יוחנן המడי, תדה הר, "the Jubilees," or
"the book of Jubilees," because it divides the period of the Biblical history upon which it treats, i.e. from the creation to the entrance of the Israelites into Ca-nan, into fifty jubilees of forty-nine years each, equal to 2450 years, and carefully describes every event according to the jubilee, sabbatical year, or year in which it is treated. It is also remarkable in the insulated phrases in the words of the division of the days according to the law and the testimony, according to the events of the years in sabbatical years and in jubilees, etc. It is also called by the fathers ימי משיח, ימי עדים, ימי גורמים, ימי ודים, על ימי תorde ימיVES = ימיVES ימיVES, i.e., the small Genesis, compendium of Genesis, because it only selects certain portions of Genesis, although through its many comments upon Genesis, it is actually longer than this canonical book (comp. Ephi-mine, 41., vi. i, tom. iii, cap. vi, edit. Petav.; G. Synelneu, p. 8); or, according to Ewald's rendering of it, על ימי תorde עגבלת עבט, because it divided the period into two equal parts, in every jubilee and small period (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, 111); it is called by St. Jerome the apocyphal Genesis (see below, sec. 3), and it is also styled ימי ודים, אפוקליפס ה Apocalypse of Moses, by George Synellen and Cedrenus, because the book pretends to be a revelation of God to Moses, and is denominated "the book of the division of days" by the Abyssinian Church, from the first words of the inscription.

II. Design and Contents of the Book.—This apocy-phal book is designed to be a commentary on the canonical books of Genesis and Exodus. (1) It fixes and arranges more minutely the chronology of the Biblical history from the creation to the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan; (2) Solves the various difficulties to be found in the narratives of these canonical books; (3) Describes more fully events which are simply hinted at in the sacred history of that early period; and (4) Ex-patiates upon religious institutions, as the Sabbath, the festivals, circumcision, sacrifices, lawsful and unlawful meats, etc., setting forth their sacred character, as well as our duty to keep them, by showing the high antiquity of these institutions, inasmuch as they have been sacredly obeyed by the patriarchs, may be seen from the following notice of these four points.

a. In its chronological arrangements we find that it places the deluge in A.M. 1858 (Jubil. vi, 61), and the exodus in the year A.M. 2410 (iv, 10). This, with the forty years' sojourn in the wilderness, yields fifty jubil-ées of forty-nine years each from the creation to the entrance into Canaan, i.e. 2450, and also allows a new generation immediately upon the entrance of the Israelites into the Promised Land, and the events in the calculations of this period the book of Jubilees agrees in its particulars with the Hebrew text of Genesis and Exodus; yet it differs from the canonical text both as to the time of the sojourn in Egypt and the years in which the ante and post-diluvian patri-archs begat their children. Thus Jared is said to have lived 62 instead of 162 years before Enoch was born, Methuselah was 67 instead of 187 at the birth of Lamech, and Lamech again was 53 instead of 182 when he begat Noah, agreeing partly with the Samaritan Pentateuch, and partly with the Septuagint in their statements about these antediluvian patriarchs. In the chronology of the post-diluvian patriarchs, however, the book of Jubilees deviates from these versions, and says that Arphaxad begat Canaan when 74-75; after the deluge, Canaan begat Salah when 57, Salah begat Eber when 68, Eber begat Peleg when 58, Peleg begat Reu 1961; the birth of Serug is omitted, so as to have begat Nahor in the year 116 after the birth of Reu, and Nahor begat Terah in his 62d year (compare Jubil. iv, 40, etc.). The going down into Egypt is placed about A.M. 2172-2173 (Jubil., xlv, 1-5), so that when we deduct it from 7400, to which year they are placed, there remains for the sojourn in Egypt 238 years. In the description of the lives of Noah, Abraham (xxiii, 28), Isaac (xxxvi, 49-52), Jacob (xl, 40-43), and Joseph (xvi, 9-15), the chronology agrees with the Hebrew text of Genesis.

b. Of the difficulties in the sacred narrative which the book of Jubilees is designed to solve, it may suffice to say that it accounts for the serpent speaking to Eve by saying that all animals spoke before the fall in paradise (comp.
Gen. i, 1 with jubil. iii, 98); explains very minutely the first heads of families took their wives (Jubil. iv, 24, 71, 106, etc.); how far the sentence of death pronounced in Gen. ii, 17 has been fulfilled literally (iv, 99, etc.); shows that the sons of God who came to the daughters of men were angels (v, 3); with what help Noah brought the animals into the ark (v, 76); where with the tower of Babel was destroyed (xxvii, 87); why Sarah disliked Ishmael and urged Abraham to send him away (xxvii, 105); why Reuben was not the firstborn (xvii, 90); how it was that Esau came to sell his birthright for a mess of pottage (xxiv, 5-20); who told Rebekah (Gen. xxvii, 42) that Esau determined to kill Jacob (xxvii, 1, etc.) how it was that he afterwards desisted from his determination to kill Jacob (xxvii, 29-106); why Reuben (Gen. xxi, 45) that she would be deprived of both her sons in one day (xxvii, 9); why Er, Judah's first-born, died (xlii, 1-7); why Onan would not redeem Tamar (xlii, 11-13); why Judah was not punished for his sin with Tamar (xlii, 57-67); why Joseph had the money put into the sacks of his brothers (xlii, 7-23); how Moses was taken away out of ark (xlii, 13), and that it was not God, but the chief m at e m a n, ה המה the enemy, who hardened the hearts of the Egyptians (xlii, 58). of the Amorites is described, to which allusion is made in Gen. xlvi., 22.

d. As to the religious observances, we are told that the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost, in the Amorites, is contained in the covenants which God made with Noah and Abraham (comp. Jubil. vi, 56-60 with Gen. ix., 8-17; xiv., 51-54 with Gen. xv., 18-21; the Feast of Tabernacles was first celebrated by Abraham, Jubil. xlii., 61-101; and the Festival, which is on the 23d of Tishri, continuing the Feast of Tabernacles, see Festival, was instituted by Jacob (Jubil. xxxii., 87-94) after his vision at Bethel (Gen. xxxv., 9-14); and that the mourning on the Day of Atonement ( Lev. xvi., 29) to commemorate the mourning of Jacob, is over the loss of Joseph (Jubil. xxiv., 50-55).

(The German version by Dillmann, through which this book has recently been made known to Europeans, has been divided by the erudite translator into fifty chapters, but not into verses. The references in this article are to those chapters, and the lines of the respective chapters.)

III. Author and Original Language of the Book.—That this book was a Jew is evident from (1) the description of the Sabbath and festivals, as well as all the Rabbinic ceremonies connected therewith (l. 19-33, 49-60), which developed themselves in the course of time, and which we are told are simply types described by Moses from heavenly archetypes, and have not only been kept by the angels in heaven, but are binding upon the Jews as well, without end; (2) the elevated position he ascribes to the Jewish people, (ii., 79-91; xvi., 50-56); ordinary Israelites are in dignity equal to angels (xxv., 75-78), and the priests are like the presence-angels (xxxi., 47-49); over Israel only does the Lord himself rule, whereas he appointed evil spirits to execute dominion over all other nations (xxv., 80-90); and (3) the many Hagadic elements of this book which are still preserved in the Talmud and Midrashim. Compare, for instance, Jubil. i., 116, where the presence-angel, מִשְׁמַר הַבָּה, is described as having preceded the hosts of Israel, with Sanhedrim, 38, b; the description of the creation of paradise on the third day (Jubil. ii., 37 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xxv); the twenty-two generations from Adam to Jacob (Jubil. ii., 64, 91, with Bereshith Rabba and Midrash Talmud, 2), the animals speaking before the fall (Jubil. iii., 98 with the Midrashim); the remark that Adam lived 70 years less than 1000 years in order that the declaration might be fulfilled, which means that he would have died, "since 1000 years are as one day with the Lord (Jubil. iv., 99 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xix.; Justin Dial. c. Tryph. p. 278, ed. Otto); the causes of the deluge (Jubil. v., 5-20 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xxxi.); the declaration that the beginning of the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months are to be celebrated as festivals, being the beginning of the four seasons called רַפָעֵי, and having already been observed by Noah (Jubil. vi., 31-55 with Per. R. Eliezer, cap. viii.; Pseudo-Jonathan on Gen. viii., 22); the statement that Satan induced God to ask Abraham to sacrifice his son (Jubil. xvi., 49-53 with Sanhedrim, 89, b); that Abraham was tempted time after time with Midrash, xix. 3; Parap. Jerusalem on Gen. xxiii., 1, etc.); and that Joseph spoke Hebrew when he made himself known to his brothers (Jubil. xili., 54 with Bereshith Rabba, cap. xxiii.). As, however, some of the practices, rites, and interpretations given in this book are at variance with the traditional exposition of the Rabbinists, Beer is of opinion that the writer was a Dositheus who was anxious to bring about a fusion of Samaritanism and Rabbinic Judaism by making mutual concessions (Das Buch d. Jubiläum, p. 61, 62); Jellinek, again, thinks that he was an Essene, and wrote this book against the Thrasiess, who maintained that the beginning of the month is to be fixed by observation and not by calculation (compare נַעַר הַלֶּחֶם), and that the Sanhedrim had the power of determining intercalary years (see Hillel II.), deducing in corroboration of this view the remark in Jubil. vii., 95-98, the chronological system of the author, which is based upon heptades; and the strict observance of the Sabbath, which, as an Essene loving the sacred number seven, he urges upon every Israelite (compare Jubil. xii., 23-35; iv., 19-24; Book 17, Midrash, iii., p. xi.; xii.), Frankel maintains that the writer was an Egyptian Jew, and a priest at the temple in Leontopolis, which accounts for his setting such a high value upon sacrifices, and tracing the origin of the festivals and sacrifices to the patriarchs (Monatsschrift, v., p. 399).

Notwithstanding the difference of opinion as to which phase of Judaism the author belonged, all agree that this book was written in Hebrew, that it was afterwards translated into Greek, and that the Ethiopic, of which Dillmann has given a German version, was made from the Greek. Many of the expressions in the book can only be understood by retranslating them into Hebrew. Thus, for instance, the remarks "and it is not impossible to be able to understand this, in the way we bear in mind that the original had had interreption. Moreover, the writer designates the wives of the patriarchs from the family of Seth by names which express a name given to the Virtue in Hebrew (Judith 3, reanim; Isaiah 36), reanim; Jared married Beracha, reanim; reanim; Enoch and Methuselah married wives of the name of Adni, reanim; reanim; whilst Cain married his sister Avan, reanim, reanim, where the words יִשְׁמַר הַבָּה, יִשְׁמַר הַבָּה, יִשְׁמַר הַבָּה, is described as having preceded the hosts of Israel, with Sanhedrim, 38, b; the description of the creation of paradise on the third day (Jubil. ii., 37 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xxv); the twenty-two generations from Adam to Jacob (Jubil. ii., 64, 91, with Bereshith Rabba and Midrash Talmud, 2), the animals speaking before the fall (Jubil. iii., 98 with the Midrashim); the remark that Adam lived 70 years less than 1000 years in order that the declaration might be fulfilled, which means that he would have died, "since 1000 years are as one day with the Lord (Jubil. iv., 99 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xix.; Justin Dial. c. Tryph. p. 278, ed. Otto); the causes of the deluge (Jubil. v., 5-20 with Bereshith Rabba, c. xxxi.); the declaration that the beginning of the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months are to be celebrated as festivals, being the beginning of the four seasons called רַפָעֵי, and having already been observed by Noah (Jubil. vi., 31-55 with Per. R. Eliezer, cap. viii.; Pseudo-Jonathan on Gen. viii., 22); the statement that Satan induced God to ask Abraham to sacrifice his son (Jubil. xvi., 49-53 with Sanhedrim, 89, b); that Abraham was tempted time after time with Midrash, xix. 3; Parap. Jerusalem on Gen. xxiii., 1, etc.); and that Joseph spoke Hebrew when he made himself known to his brothers (Jubil. xili., 54 with Bereshith Rabba, cap. xxiii.). As, however, some of the practices, rites, and interpretations given in this book are at variance with the traditional exposition of the Rabbinists, Beer is of opinion that the writer was a Dositheus who was anxious to bring about a fusion of Samaritanism and Rabbinic Judaism by making mutual concessions (Das Buch d. Jubiläum, p. 61, 62); Jellinek, again, thinks that he was an Essene, and wrote this book against the Thrasiess, who maintained that the beginning of the month is to be fixed by oband the services performed therein, but from its whole complexion, and this is admitted by all who have written on it. Its exact date, however, is a matter of dispute. Krüger maintains that it was written between B.C. 392 and 390; Dillmann and Frankel think that it was written in the first century before Christ; whilst Ewald is of opinion that it originated about the birth of Christ. The medium of the two extremes is the most probable.

The importance of this book can hardly be overestimated: we remember that it is one of the very few Biblical works which have come down to us, and it has been the object of research on the part of the O. T. canon and the beginning of the N.T. There are, however, several other considerations which render this book a most important contribution, both to the interpretation of the Bible and to the history of Jewish belief anterior to the Christian era. Many portions of it are literal translations of the books of Genesis, and therefore enable us to see in what state the Hebrew text was at that age, and furnish us with some readings which are preferable to those given in the tavoce rupicus, e.g. Jubil. xvii, 17 renders it probable that the correct reading of Gen. xxii, 11 is לֹא יָכֹ֣ב יִשְׂרָאֵל לָּמֹ֖ודה, which is corroborated by the verse immediately following, 12, which shows that the Jews at that age believed in the survival of the soul after the death of the body (xxiii, 115), though the resurrection of the body is nowhere mentioned therein; that they believed in the existence of Satan, the prince of legions of evil spirits, respecting which so little is said in the O. Test. and so much in the N.; and that these evil spirits have dominion over men, and are often the cause of their illnesses and death (x, 35-47; xlii, 7-10).

3. It shows us what the Jews believed about the coming of the Messiah, and the great day of judgment (xxiii, 97-118). 4. It explains the statements in Acts vii, 53; Gal. iii, 13; and Rom. ii, 16, which so much difficulty have been fute to interpreters, by most distinctly declaring that the law was given through the presence-angel (i. e., 99-102).

5. It even appears to be quoted in the N. T. (compare 2 Pet. ii, 4; Jude 6, with Jubil. iv, 7; v, 20).

V. Literature.—It has already been remarked that the Hebrew original of this book is lost. Chapters xxiv and xxxv are, however, preserved from Midrash Vajzau, in Midrash Jalut section Bereishith, xxxiii, as has been pointed out by Jellinek (see below); and Treuenfels has shown parallels between other parts of the book of Jubilees and the Hagada and Mirdashik in the Hebrew literature (1846, p. 1 sq.). The Greek version of this book, written in a very early period of the Christian era, as is evident from Clement's Recognit. cap. xxx. xxx-xxxii, through Ephi¬phanus (Adv. Hores. lib. i, cap. iv; lib. ii; tom. ii, cap. i, xxxvi, lxxxvi) and St. Jerome (Epist. ad Fabr. de sanct. menon) and Aesop, who, in his fables, 21, 22; Mansio xxiv on Numb. xxxiii, 27, 29) are the first who mention it by name, was soon lost in the Western Church, but it still existed in the Eastern Church, and was copiously used in the Chronography of Geor¬gian Syneclius and Georgian Czedenus, and quoted several times by James Zonaras and by Glosses, by za¬zantine theologians and historians of the 12th and 13th centuries (compare Fabricius, Codex Pseudo-aprophyl. V. Test. p. 851-863; Dillmann, in Ewald's Jahrbuch, iii, 94 sq.). From that time, however, the Greek version was also lost, and the book of Jubilees was quite unknown to European scholars until the 19th century, with the edition descript. für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, p. 176-179, that Dr. Krapf had found it preserved in the Egyptian church in an Ethiopic translation, and brought over a MS. copy which was made over to the Tubingen Uni¬versity. This Ethiopic version was translated into Ger¬man by M. P. Ewald in Ewald's Jahrbücher, ii, 230-236, and iii, 1-96 (Göttingen, 1849-51), and Ewald at once used its contents for the new edition of his Geschichte d. Völkes Israels (vol. i, Göttingen, 1851, p. 271; vol. ii, 1853, p. 294). This was seasonably followed by Jellinek's edition of the Midrash Vajzau, with an erudite preface in Beth Ha-Midrash, vol. iii (Leipzig, 1855); next by the learned treatises of Beer, Das Buch der Jubileen und die Lehre des Midrash Vajzau, (Leipzig, 1856), and Beer, Das Buch d. Jubileen (in the Monographs. d. Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judenthums, v, 311-316, 380-400); then by another masterly production by Beer, entitled Noch ein Wort über das Buch der Jubileen (in Frankel's Monatschrift, 1857); and strictures on the works of Jel¬linek, Beer, and Frankel, by Dillmann, in the Zeitschrift. der Deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, xi (Leipzig, 1857), 161 sq. Krüger, too, published an article on Die Chronologie im Buche der Jubileen in the same journal, xii (Leipzig, 1858), 279 sq.; and Dillmann at last published the Ethiopic itself (Kiel and Lund, 1859), which Rohn has since translated with notes (Leips.1874, 8vo).

Juda (Jev. xxxviii, 1). See Joshua.

Judäa (Judah, merely the Genitive case of Judäa, the Grecized form of Judah), an incorrect Angelizing of the name Judas or Judah in several passages of the Auth. Vers. See also Jude.

1. The patriarch Judah, son of Jacob (Susan, 56; Luke iii, 33; Heb. vii, 14; Rev. v, 5; vii, 5). For the "city of Judah" (i.e. the tribe of Judah), in Luke i, 89, see JUTTH.".

2. The son of Joseph, and father of Simeon, in Christ's maternal ancestry (Luke iii, 30); probably the same with ADAH, the father of Masseiah, which latter was one of the Jewish centurions who aided Jephthah in restoring Joash to the throne (2 Chron. xxxiii, 1). B.C. ante 876. See Genealogy of Christ.

3. The son of Joanna, and father of Joseph (Luke iii, 28), another of Christ's maternal ancestors; probably identical with ABD, the father of Eliasim, among Christ's paternal ancestors (Matt. i, 18); and likewise with ZADANE, the son of ORAH, and father of Shecha¬niah (1 Chron. iii, 21). B.C. ante 406. (See Strong's "Harm. and Expos. of the Gospels," p. 16, 17."

4. One of the Lord's brethren, enumerated in Mark vi, 3. See Joses; Joseph. On the question of his identity with Jude, the brother of James, one of the twelve apostles (Luke vi, 16; Acts x, 19), and with the author of the general epistle, see James. In Matt. xiii, 55, his name is given more correctly in the A. Vers. as Judas.

Juda (or Judá) Leo. See Judah Leo.

Judae's (Judae, fem. of Judaeus, Jew or Jewish, sc. land; once in A.V. for Chalde. "Wid." Judah, Ezra v, 8; "Jewry," Luke xxiii, 5; John vii, 1), the southernmost of the three divisions of the Holy Land. It de¬noted the kingdom of Judah as distinguished from that of Israel. See Judah. But after the captivity, as most of the exiles who returned belonged to the kingdom of Judah, the name Judæa (Judah) was applied generally to the whole of Palestine west of the Jordan ( Hag. i, 1; ii, 2). Under the Romans, in the time of Christ, Palestine was divided into Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa (John iv, 4, 5; Acts ix, 31), the last including the whole of the southern part west of the Jordan. But this divi¬sion was only observed as a political and local distinc¬tion, for the sake of indicating the part of the country, just as we use the name of a county (Matt. ii, 1; 5, 3; i, 4, 5; Luke i, 65); but when the whole of Palestine was to be indicated in a general way, the term Judæa was still employed. Thus persons in Galilee and else¬where, when asking of going to Judæa (John vii, 5; xi, 7), to distinguish it, the son of Assine to which they were proceeding; but when persons in Rome and other places spoke of Judæa (Acts xxviii, 21), they used the word as a general denomination for the country of the Jews, or Palestine. Indeed, the name seems to have had a more restricted sense in the time of Palestine east of the Jordan. It denoted all the dominions of Herod, the Great, who was called the king of Judæa; and much of these lay beyond the river (comp. Matt. xix, 1, Mark..." JUDEA 1046 JUDAH

x, 1). After the death of Herod, however, the Judea to which his son Archelaus succeeded was only the southern province so called (Matt. ii, 22), which afterwards became a Roman province dependent on Syria and governed by procurators, and this was its condition during the times of Josephus (see Not. introd. in Ant. 1, 4, 2; cfr. Romanorum, Upsal, 1822). It was afterwards for a time partly under the dominion of Herod Agrippa the elder (Acts xii, 1-19), but on his death it reverted to its former condition under the Romans. See Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s.v.

It is true Judea, in the provincial sense, that requires our present notice, the country at large being described in the article PALESTINE. In this sense, however, it was much more extensive than the domain of the tribe of Judah, even more so than the kingdom of the same name. There are no materials for describing its limits with precision, but it included the ancient territories of Judah, Benjamin, Dan, Simeon, and part of Ephraim. It is, however, not correct to describe Idumea as not ancienly belonging to Judah. The Idumeans of later times, or that which belonged to Judea, was the southern part of the ancient Judah, into which the Idumeans had intruded during the exile, and the annexation of which to Judea only restored what had ancienly belonged to it.

The name Judea occurs among the list of nations represented at the paschal outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Acts ii, 1-13). The Jews have preferred the various renderings Judæa or Idumæa (see Kunôl, ad loc.), and even Junia (Iouwïâ, Schultheis, De charismate, i, 146), a place in Armenia, with various other conjectural emendations (see Bowser's Conjectures on the N.T. ad loc.), all alike unnecessary (see Hackett, Alford, ad loc.).

In the Rabbinical writings, Judea, as a division of Palestine, is frequently called "the south," or "the south country," to distinguish it from Galilee, which was called "the north" (Lightfoot, Chorog. Cent. xii). The distinction of the tribe of Judah into "the Mountain," "the Plain," and "the Vale," which we meet with in the Old Testament (Num. xiii, 30), was preserved under the more extended denomination of Judea (for the more specific divisions in Josh. xv, 21-63, see Keil's Comment. ad loc.; Schwarz, Palest. p. 90-122). The Mountain, or hill-country of Judah (Josh. xxi, 11; Luke i, 39), has been called back of mountains by Lightfoot, who calls it (Chorog. Cent. xii), which fills the centre of the country from Hebron northward to beyond Jerusalem (for Luke i, 39, see JUTTAH). The Plain was the low country towards the sea-coast, and seems to have included not only the broad plain which extends between the stars of Judah and that of Simeon, but the whole parts of the hilly region itself in that direction. Thus the Rabbinins allude that from Beth-horon to the sea is one region (Talmud Hier. Sbhith, ix, 2). The Vale is defined by the Rabbinins as extending from Engedi to Jericho (Lightfoot, Pomeron, § 2); from which, and other indications, it seems to have included some parts of the Ghor, or great plain of the Jordan, as lay within the territory of Judea. This appropriation of the terms is far preferable to that of some writers, such as Lightfoot, who suppose "the Plain" to be the broad valley of the Jordan, and the "Vale" to be the valley of the lower Jordan river. Thus which is called the Wilderness of Judea was the wild and inhospitable region lying eastward of Jerusalem, in the direction of the Jordan and Dead Sea (Isa. xi, 3; Matt. iii, 1; Luke i, 80; iii, 2-4). In the N.T. only the Highlands and the Desert of Judea are distinguished, and may have some notion of the extent of the territory northward which Judæa had obtained, from Josephus calling Jerusalem the centre of the country (War, iii, 8, 5), which is remarkable, seeing that Jerusalem was originally in the northernmost border of the tribe of Judah. In fact, he describes the breadth of the country as extending from the Jordan to Joppa, which shows that this city was in Judea. How much further to the north the boundary lay we cannot know with precision, as we are unacquainted with the site of Amath, otherwise Beroea, which he says lay on the boundary-line between Judea and Samaria. The mere fact that Josephus makes Jerusalem the centre of the land seems to prove that the province did not extend so far to the north as the wilderness of Judea, mentioned above. The southern boundary of Judea was also that of the whole country, it is only necessary to remark that Josephus places the southern boundary of the Judea of the time of Christ at a village called Jordon, on the confines of Arabia Petra. No place of this name has been found, and Josephus' position is very different from the fact that all the country which lay beyond the Idumeans of those times was then called Arabia. In fixing this boundary, Josephus regards Idumea as part of Judea, for he immediately after reckons that as one of the eleven districts into which Judæa was divided. Most of these districts were denominated, like our counties, from the chief towns. They were, 1. Jerusalem: 2. Gophna; 3. Acarabatia; 4. Thumna; 5. Lydda; 6. Emmaus; 7. Pella; 8. Idumea; 9. Engaddi; 10. Herodium; and, 11. Jericho. Judea is, as the above intimations would suggest, a country full of hills and valleys. The hills are generally separated from one another by valleys and torrents, and are, for the most part, of moderate height, uneven, and seldom of any regular figure. The rock of which they are composed is easily converted into soil, which, for the most part, is the natural result of the rains, renders the hills cultivable in a series of long, narrow gardens, formed by these terraces from the base upwards. In this manner the hills were in ancient times cultivated most industriously, and enriched and beautified with the fig-tree, the olive-tree, and the vine: and it is thus that the cultivation which still subsists is now carried on. But when the inhabitants were rooted out, and the culture neglected, the terraces fell to decay, and the soil which had been collected in them was washed down into the valleys, leaving only the arid rock, naked and desolate. This is the general character of the scenery: but in some parts the hills are beautifully wooded, and in others the application of the ancient mode of cultivation still suggests to the traveller how rich the country once was and might be again, and how beautiful the prospects which it offered. As however, the result of this was the result of cultivation, the country was probably ancienly, as at present, naturally less fertile than either Samaria or Galilee. The present difference is very pointedly remarked by different travellers; and lord Lindsay plainly declares that "all Judea, except the hills of Hebron and the vales immediately adjoining, as Lightfoot calls it, was forested country and was probably /ancienly, as at present, naturally less fertile than either Samaria or Galilee. for Luke i, 29, see JUTTAH), the name of several persons, etc., in Scripture. See also JUDAH: JUNE.

1. The fourth son of Jacob by Leah, born B.C. 1916 (Gen. xxix, 35), being the last before the temporary cessation in the births of her children. His whole-brothers were Reuben, Simon, and Levi, elder than themselves, and Judah is mentioned last (Gen. xxxvii, 23). The name is explained as having originated in Leah's exclamation of "praise" at this fresh gift of Jehovah—"She said, 'Now will I praise יהוה Jehovah,' and she called his name Yehudah" (xxix, 35). The same play is preserved in the blessing of Jacob—"Jehuah, thou whom thy brethren shall praise!" (xxvii, 8).

The Genesis brings Joseph a hierarch more before the reader, and makes known more of his history and character than it does in the case of any other of the twelve sons of Jacob, with the single exception of Joseph. It was Judah's advice that the brethren followed when they sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites instead of taking his life. By the light of his subsequent actions we can see that his conduct on this occasion arose from a generous impulse, although the form of the question he put to them has been sometimes held to suggest an interested motive: "What profit is it if we slay our brother and conceal his blood? Come, let us sell him to the Hebrews, and let us not be guilty of blood" (Gen. xxxvii, 26, 27). Though we know Joseph afterward he "prevailed above his brethren" (1 Chron. v, 2), and we find him subsequently taking a decided lead in all the affairs of the family. When a second visit to Egypt for corn had become inevitable, it was Judah who, as the mouthpiece of the rest, headed the remonstrance against the donation of Benjamin by Jacob, and finally undertook to be responsible for the safety of the lad (Gen. xliii, 3-10). When, through Joseph's artifice, the brothers were brought back to the palace, he is again the leader and spokesman of the band. In that thorough ejection of Benjamin as Judah acknowledged the guilt which had never been committed, threw himself on the mercy of the supposed Egyptian prince, offers himself as a slave, and makes that wonderful appeal to the feelings of his disguised brother which renders it impossible for Joseph any longer to conceal his secret (xlii, 14-24). So, too, is Judah who is sent before Jacob to smooth the way for him in the land of Goshen (xlvii, 28). This ascendency over his brethren is reflected in the last words addressed to him by his father—Thou whom thy brethren shall praise! thy father's sons shall bow down before thee; and thou shalt be the gathering of the seven years of famine, 8-10). In the interesting traditions of the Koran and the Midrash his figure stands out in the same prominence. Before Joseph his wrath is mightier and his recognition heartier as the rest. It is he who hastens in advance to bear to Jacob the fragrant robe of Joseph (Well's Biblical Legends, p. 98-99).

Not long after the sale of Joseph, Judah had withdrawn from the paternal tents, and gone to reside at Adullam, in the country which afterwards bore his name. Here he married a woman of Canaan, called Shu-ah, and had by her three sons, Er, Onan, and Shela. When the eldest of these sons became of fit age, he was married to a woman named Tamar, but soon after died. See En. As he died childless, the patriarchal law, afterwards adopted into the Mosaic code (Deut. xxv, 6), required Judah to bestow upon the widow his second son. This was done, but not without difficulty (see Onan). Judah became reluctant to bestow his only surviving son upon this woman, and put her off with the excuse that he was not yet of sufficient age. Tamar accordingly remained in her father's house at Adullam. She had the usual passion of Eastern women for offspring, and could not endure the stigmas of having been twice married without bearing children, while the law precluded her from contracting any alliance but that which Judah withheld her from completing. Meanwhile Judah's wife died, and, after the time of mourning had expired, he went, accompanied by his friend Hirah, to attend the shearing of his sheep at Timnath, in the same neighborhood. These circumstances suggested to Tamar the strange thought of connecting herself with Judah himself, under the guise of a loose woman. Having waylaid him on the road to Timnath, she placed the article, seedless, before him. It was not long before the idea began to manifest in the person of Tamar, Judah was highly enraged at her crime, and, exercising the powers which belonged to him as the head of the family she had disinherited, he commanded her to be brought forth, and committed to the flames as an adulteress. But when she appeared the precious ring, the bracelet, and the staff which he had left in pledge with her, and put him to confusion by declaring that they belonged to the father of her coming offspring. Seeing Tamar Judah acknowledged them to be his, and confessed that he had been wrong in withholding Shelah from her. The result of this painful affair was the birth of two sons, Zerah and Pharez (B.C. cir. 1893), from whom, with Shelah, the tribe of Judah descended. Pharez was the ancestor of the line from which David, the kings of Judah, and Jesus came (Gen. xxxviii; xlvi, 12; 1 Chron. ii, 3-5; Matt. i, 8; Luke iii, 38). These circumstances seem to have been needed Judah was well{enlightened in town, for we find him ever afterwards at his father's tents. His experience of life, and the strength of his character, appear to have given him much influence with Jacob; and it was chiefly from confidence in him that the aged father at length consented to allow Benjamin to go to Egypt. That the offspring of Zerah, not misplaced has already been shown [see Joseph]; and there is not in the whole range of literature a finer piece of true natural eloquence than that in which Judah offers himself to remain as a bond-slave in the place of Benjamin, for whose safe return he had made himself responsible to his father. The strong emotions which it raised in Joseph disabled him from keeping up longer the disguise he had hitherto maintained, and there are few who have read it without being, like him, moved even to tears (xlvii, 14-54). B.C. 1874. See Jacob.

We hear nothing more of Judah till he received, along with his brothers, the final blessing of his father, which was conveyed in lofty language, glancing far into futurity, and strongly indicative of the high destinies which awaited the tribe that was to descend from him (Gen. xliii, 8-12). B.C. 1836. See Shishlong.

JUDAH, TRIBE AND TERRITORY OF. I. Historical Memoranda.—I. Judah's sons were five. Of these, three were by his Canaanitish wife Bath-shua; they are all insignificant; two died early, and the third, Shelah, does not come prominently forward either in his person or his family. The other two, Pharez and Zerah—twins—were illegitimate sons by the widow of Er, the eldest of the former family. As frequently the case, the illegitimate sons surpassed the legitimate, and from Pharez, the eldest, were descended the royal and other illustrious families of Judah. These sons were born to Judah while he was living in the same district of Palestine, which centuries after, Judah, with his posterity, issued from (Gen. xlvi, 12; Exod. i, 2). See Jacob.

2. When we again meet with the families of Judah they occupy a position among the tribes similar to that which their progenitor had taken amongst the patriarchs. At the time that the Israelites quitted Egypt, it already exhibited the elements of its future distinction in a larger population than any of the other tribes possessed (Stuart, 29, 30). Among the total of males, being nearly 12,000 more than Dan, the next in point of numbers, and 34,100 more than Ephraim, which in the end contended with it the superiority among the tribes. During the sojourn in the wilderness, Judah neither gained, like some tribes, nor lost like others.
Its numbers had increased to 76,500, being 12,100 more than Issachar, which had become next to it in population (Numb. xxvi, 22). The chief of the tribe at the former census was Nahshon, the son of Amminadab (Numb. 1:7; 7:3; 12:8); at the latter census it was Eleazar, the son of Zebulun (ii, 3-9; x, 14). The traditional standard of the tribe was a lion's whelp, with the words, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered! (Targ. Pseuda- dojón, on Numb. ii, 8.)

This west of the country the only incidents specially affecting the tribe of Judah are, (1) the misbehavior of Acham, who was of the great house of Zerah (Josh. vii, 1, 16-18); and (2) the conquest of the mountain-district of Hebron by Caleb, and of the strong city Debir, in the same locality, by his nephew and son-in-law Othniel (Josh. xiv, 6-15; xiv, 13-19). It is the only instance given of a portion of the country being expressly reserved for the person or persons who conquered it. In general the conquest seems to have been made by the whole community, and the territory allotted afterwards, without reference to the original conquerors. In this case the high character and position of Caleb, and perhaps a claim established by him at the time of the visit of the spies to "the land whereon his feet had trodden" (Josh. xiv, 9; comp. Numb. xiv, 24), may have led to the exception.

4. The history of the Judges contains fewer facts respecting the tribe than might be expected. It seems, however, to have been usually considered that the birthright which Reuben forfeited had passed to Judah under the blessing of Jacob; and a sanction was given to this impression when, after the death of Joshua, the divine oracle nominated Judah to take precedence of the other tribes in the war against the Canaanites (Judg. i, 2). It does not appear that any tribe was disposed to dispute the superior claim of Judah on its own account except Ephraim, although in doing this Ephraim had the support of other tribes. Ephraim appears to have rested its claims to the leadership of the tribes on the fact that the birthright, so far as interest it represented, had received the birthright, or double portion of the eldest, by the adoption of the two sons of Joseph, who became the founders of two tribes in Israel. The existence of the sacerdotal establishment at Shiloh, in Ephraim, was doubtless also alleged by the Ephraimites to give them a greater claim (2 K. xiv, 13). When, therefore, Judah assumed the sceptre in the person of David, and when the sacerdotal establishment was removed to Jerusalem, Ephraim could not brook the eclipse it had sustained, and took the first opportunity of erecting a separate church, and forming separate establishments for worship and sacrifice. Perhaps the separation of the kingdoms may thus be traced to the rivalry of Judah and Ephraim. After that separation the rivalry was between the two kingdoms, but it was still popularly considered as representing the ancient rivalry of these great tribes: for the prophet, in foretelling the repose of a coming time, describes it by saying, "The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off: Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim" (Isa. xliii, 15).

When the kingdom was divided under Rehoboam and Jeroboam, the land of Judah and the land of Ephraim had that of Judah as a kingdom. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

II. Geographical Data.—In the first distribution of lands, the tribe of Judah received the southernmost part of Palestine to the extent of fully one third of the whole country west of the Jordan, which was to be distributed among the nine and a half tribes for provision which was to be made to the members of the other tribes (Josh. xii, 1-19). This land was discovered and rectified at the time of the second distribution, which was founded on an actual survey of the country, when Simeon received an allotment out of the territory which had before been wholly assigned to Judah (Josh. xiii, 9). See SIMON. That which remained was still very large, and was proportioned to the future greatness than the actual wants of the tribe. We now also know, through the researches of recent travellers, that the extent of good land belonging to this tribe, southward, was much greater than had usually been supposed, much of that which had been laid down in maps as a desert being actually composed of excellent pasture-land, and in part of arable soil, still exhibiting some traces of ancient cultivation. Dan defended the western border against the incursions of the Philistines with a brave and well-trained band of soldiers, having a fortress and camp on the commanding height between Zorah and Eshtaol (Judg. xiii, 25; xvi, 31; xviii, 12; see DAS). Simeon bore the brunt of all attacks and forays made on the southern border by the tribes of the great "Wilderness of Wandering;" and when the Edomites attempted to penetrate Judah, Simeon could always check them by an attack upon their flank. When Judah became a kingdom, the original extent of territory assigned to the tribe was more than restored or compensated for it must have embraced the domains of Simeon, and probably also of Dan, and we know that Benjamin was likewise nearly as large. The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are narrated at great length, and with greater minuteness than the others, in Josh. xv, 20-63. This may be due either to the fact that the lists were reduced to their present form at a later period, when the monarchical residence with Judah, was naturally looked upon as the home of the tribes, and as more detached from the other tribes, or to the fact that the territory was more important and more thickly covered with towns and villages than any other part of Palestine. The greater prominence given to the genealogies of Judah in 1 Chron. ii, iii, iv, no doubt arises from the former reason. The towns are also specifically named, not only under the general divisions, but even in detailed groups. See below.)

The north boundary—coincident with the south boundary of Benjamin—begun at the embouchure of the Jordan, entered the hills apparently at, or about the pass of Shechem, and followed the ridge of the Mesh—probably the present Ain-Hand, below Bethany—thence over the Mount of Olives to Enroth, in the valley beneath Jerusalem; went along the ravine of Hinnom, under the precipices of the city, climbed the hill in a north-west direction to the water of Nephtoah, and thence (probably by the road now covered by Kurieh el-Enab), Bethhemesh (Ain-Shehme), Timnah, and Ekron to Jabneh on the seacoast. On the east the Dead Sea, and on the west the Mediterranean, formed the boundaries. The southern line is hard to determine, since it is denoted by places many of which have not been identified. It left the Dead Sea at its extreme south end, and joined the Mediterranean at the wady el-Arish; but between these two points it passed through Maaleh Accablim, the Wilderness of Zin, Hermon, Adar, Farraka, and Azmon; the Wilderness of Zin was the extreme limit of this tract, the entire width of all (from 1-19). The country thus defined was sixty-five miles long, and averaged about fifty in breadth. But while this large tract was nominally allotted to Judah, the portion of it available for actual settlement was comparatively small, not amounting to one third of the whole. From it must also be subtracted the land of Judah which had been laid in across from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea, being the part set off to the tribe of Simeon. The actual territory of Judaea therefore extended, on an average, only about twenty-five miles from north to south, by about forty miles from east to west. See TINAE. The whole of the above information was from a very early date divided into four main regions.

1. The South—the undulating pasture country which intervened between the hills, the proper possession of the tribe, and the deserts which encompass the lower part of Palestine (Josh. xv, 21). It is this which is once designated as the wilderness (midbar) of Judah (Judg. i, 16). It contained twenty-nine towns, with their dependent villages (Josh. xv, 20-32), which, with Bethlehem, were to give it its own proper and constant appellation, the Shephelah—the broad belt or strip lying between the central highlands—the mountain—and the Mediterranean Sea; the lower portion of that maritime plain which extends through the whole of the sea-board of Palestine, from Sidon in the north to Rhinocorura at the south. This tract was the garden and the granary of the tribe. In it, long before the conquest of the country by Israel, the Philistines had settled themselves, never to be completely dislodged (Neh. xiii, 23, 24). There, planted at equal intervals along the coast line, were five chief cities, each with its dependencies, overlooking, from the natural undulations of the ground, the "standing corn," "shocks," "vineyards and olives," which excite the ingenuity of Samson, and are still noticeable to modern travellers. "They are all remarkable features of the gardens which surround them—the scarlet blossoms and the white hyacinths, the golden oranges which gild the green foliage of their famous groves" (Stanley, Syr. and Pal. p. 257). From the edge of the sandy tract, which fringes the immediate shore right up to the very wall of the hills of Judah, stretches the immense plain of broad, variegated fields. In those rich harvests lies the explanation of the Samranah; the contests between Israel and the Philistines (Syr. and Pal. p. 238). From them were gathered the enormous cargoes of wheat which were transmitted to Phenicia by Solomon in exchange for the arts of Hiram, and which in the time of Rehoboam still "nourished" the country of Tyre and Sidon (Acts xii, 20). There were the olive-trees, the sycamore-trees, and the treasures of oil, the care of which was sufficient to task the energies of two of David's special officers (1 Chron. xxvii, 29). The natural features of the locality would seem to be reflected in the names of many of its towns if interpreted as Hebrew words: Dilean=cucumbers; Gedera, Gederoth, Gederothaim, sheaf-fields; Zoreah, yaphe; Ex-gamnium, spring of gardens, etc. But we have yet to learn how far these names are Hebrew, and whether at best they are but mere Hebrew accommodations of the original names, and therefore not to be depended on for their significations.

The number of cities in this district, without counting the smaller villages connected with them, was forty-two. Of these, however, many which belonged to the Philistines can only have been allotted to the tribe, and, if taken possession of by Judah, were only held for a time. What were the exact boundaries of the Shephelah we do not know. We are at present ignorant of the principles on which the ancient Jews drew their boundaries between one territory and another. One thing only is almost certain, that they were not determined by the natural features of the ground, for we should not find cities enumerated as in the lowland plain whose modern representatives are found deep in the mountains. See JAREMUTH; JIPHTHAH, etc. (The latest information regarding this district is contained in Tobler's Dritte Wendeung. 1850.)

3. The third region of the tribe—the Mountain, the "hill-country of Judah"—though not the richest, was, if not the largest, yet the most important of the four. Beginning considerably below Hebron, it stretches northward to Jerusalem, eastward to the Dead Sea slopes, and westward to the Shephelah, and forms an elevated district or plateau, which, though thrown into considerable undulations, yet preserves a general level in both directions. It is the southern portion of that elevated hilly district of Palestine which stretches north until intersected by the plain of Esdraelon, and on which Hebron, Jerusalem, and Shechem are the chief spots. On every side the approaches to it were difficult, and the passes easily defended. The towns and villages, too, were generally perched on the tops of hills or on rocky slopes. The resources of the soil were great. The country was rich in corn, wine, oil, and fruits; and the daring shepherds were able to lead their flocks far out over the neighboring plains and through the mountains. The surface of this region, which is of limestone, is monotonous enough. Round swelling hills and hollows, of somewhat bolder proportions than those immediately north of Jerusalem, which, though in early times probably covered with forests [see HARETIA], have now, where not cultivated, no growth larger than a brushwood of dwarf-oak, arbutus, and other bushes. In many places there is a good soft turf, discoverable even in the autumn, and in spring the hills are covered with flow- ers. The number of towns enumerated (Josh. xv, 48-60) as belonging to this district is thirty-eight, but, if we may judge from the ruins which on the eye on every side, this must have been very far below the real number. Hardy a hill which is not crowned by some fragments of stone buildings more or less considerable, which are still inhabited surrounded by groves of olive-trees, and inclosures of stone walls protecting the vineyards and the wells. The springs are numerous, the springs are frequent—in the neighborhood of "Solomon's Pools" at Urtas most abundant ones.

4. The fourth district is the Wilderness (midbar), which here and there only appears to be synonymous with Aradah), the sunken district immediately adjoining the Dead Sea (Josh. xv, 6), averaging ten miles in breadth, a wild, barren, uninhabitable region, fit only to afford scanty pasturage for sheep and goats, and a secure home for leopards, bears, wild goats, and owls (1 Sam. xvii, 34; Mark i, 13; 1 Sam. xxii. 1 sq.). Different sections of it were called by different names, as "Wilderness of Engedi" (1 Sam. xiv, 1), "Wilderness of Judah" (Judg. i, 16), "Wilderness of Mammon" (1 Sam. xxii, 24; see art. DESERT). It was the training-ground of the shepherd-warriors of Israel, "where David and his mighty men were braced and trained for those feats of daring courage which so highly distinguished them. See BIBLEL; DAVID. It contained only six cities, which must have been either, like Engedi, on the edge of the cliffs overhanging the sea, or else on the higher slopes of the basin. The "city of Salt" may have been on the salt plains, between the sea and the cliffs which form the southern termination to the Ghor.

Nine of the cities of Judah were allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi, 9-19). The Levites had no cities in the tribe, and the priests had none out of it.

The following is a tabulated view of these subdivisions of the tribe, with the cities in each group, as laid down in Josh. xxi, 21-63:

1. "The South" (22/77), or Simeonish portion.
   1. Kedesh.
   17 and 18. Bealoth or Balah (Bethelath-Nekeb), and
   2. Judgment-Jab-Balah (Bethaleath-Leh). Or 20. Adinah.
   22. Hazron.
   23. Hazor.
   24. Ithnian or Ithyan (Hazor-onah). (Hazoraddah). (Hazar-okhrah).
   25. Sennanah or Hazor-salath.
   26. Lebath or Beth-lebath.
   27. Shittim or Shamah.
   28. and 29. Beth-rim or Beth-salath.
   30. En-rimonim.
   31. Hebron.
2. Shema or Sheba (Hazor-onah).
4. Hammon or Azmon.
5. Beth-palet.
6. Hebron.

The villages (1.) Hazor-haddath and (2.) Kerieth-heron, or Hazor-amam, both belonged to Hazor proper; (3.) Hazor-ghaddah to Hazor-shanah.

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF. When the territory of all the rest of Israel, except Judah and Benjamin, was lost to the kingdom of Rehoboam, a special single name was needed to denote that which remained to him; and almost of necessity the word Judah received an extended meaning, according to which it comprised not Benjamin only but the whole region from Lebanon to Zadok; and it substantially included great numbers from Israel, and rallied round the house of David. At a still later time, when the nationality of the ten tribes had been dissolved, and every practical distinction between the ten and the two had vanished during the captivity, the scattered body had no visible head, except in Jerusalem, which most of the most resided mostly by a portion of Judah's exiles. See Captivity.

In consequence, the name Judah (or Jehu) attached itself to the entire nation from about the epoch of the restoration. See JEW. But in this article Judah is understood of the people over which David's successors reigned, from Rehoboam to Zedekiah; and it substantially corresponded to the Juda (q. v.) of later times.

I. Extent of the Kingdom. — When the disruption of Solomon's kingdom took place at Shechem, only the tribe of Judah followed the house of David. But almost immediately afterwards, when Rehoboam conceived the design of establishing his authority over Israel by force of arms, the tribe of Benjamin also is recorded as obeying his summons, and contributing its warriors to make up his army. Jerusalem, situated within the borders of Benjamin (Josh. xviii, 28, etc.), yet won from the heathen by a name and Levitical, connected the frontiers of the two tribes by an indissoluble political bond. By the erection of the city of David, Benjamin's former adherence to Israel (2 Sam. ii, 9) was cancelled, though at least two Benjamite towns, Bethel and Jericho, were included in the northern kingdom. A part, if not all, of the territory of Simeon (1 Chron. vii. 11, 1 Kings xix, 3; comp. Josh. xiv, 1) and of Dan (2 Chron. xi. 10; comp. Josh. xiv, 41, 42) was recognised as belonging to Judah, and in the reigns of Abijah and Asa the southern kingdom was enlarged by some additions taken out of the territory of Ephraim (2 Chron. xiii. 15; xv; xvi. 8; xxii. 41; xxvi. 16). By the influence of Hezekiah, the city of Jerusalem was restored to the national centre, and the ports of the coast fell to the dominion of Judah, and especially to the influence of the people to the One True God, which, if not always a pure and elevated sentiment, yet was a contrast to such devotion as could be inspired by the worship of the calves or of Baal, and, lastly, the popular reverence for and obedience to the divine law so far as they learned it from their teachers, their princes, and their priests. It was, therefore, to be attributed the fact that Judah survived her more populous and more powerful sister kingdom by 130 years, and lasted from B.C. 975 to B.C. 856. (See Bernhardt, De causa quibus effectum est quod regnum Juda dictum persisteret quam regnum Israel, in the Aeneid, Acad. Groning, 1822-23, p. 124 sq.; also Loven, 1891; Schmeidler, Der Uebergang der Reiche Juda, Bresl. 1831.)

II. Population. — A singular gauge of the growth of the kingdom of Judah is supplied by the progressive augmentation of the army under successive kings. In David's time (2 Sam. xxiii, 9, and 1 Chron. xxi, 5) the warriors of Judah numbered at least 500,000. But Rehoboam brought into the field (1 Kings xii, 21) only 180,000 men; Abijah, eighteen years after, 400,000 (2 Chron. xiii, 8); Asa (2 Chron. xiv, 8), his successor, 580,000, exactly equal to the sum of the armies of his two predecessors; Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii, 14-19), the next king, numbered his warriors in five armies, the aggregate of which is 1,160,000, exactly double the amount of his father, and exactly equal to the sum of the armies of his three predecessors. After four glorious reigns, the energetic Amaziah could muster only 300,000 men when he set out to recover Edom. His son Uzziah had a standing (2 Chron. xxvi, 11) force of 307,500 fighting men. It would be out of place here to discuss the question whether the numbers have been raised by the accuracy of these numbers. See NUMBER. So far as they are authentic, it may be safely reckoned that the population subject to each king was about four times the number of the fighting men in his dominions. See Israel, KINGDOM OF.

III. Resources. — Unless Judah had some other means of acquiring wealth besides pastures and tillage—as by maritime commerce from the Red Sea coast, or, less probably) from Joppa, or by keeping up the old trade (1 Kings x. 28) with Egypt—it seems difficult to account for that ability to accumulate wealth which supplied the Temple treasury with sufficient store to invite so frequent the banditry of the spoiler. Egypt, Damascus, Samaria, Nineveh, and Babylon had each its share of a large share of the pillarage. The treasury was emptied by Shishak (1 Kings xiv, 26), again by Asa (1 Kings xv, 18), by Jehoshaphat of Judah (2 Kings xii, 10), by Jehoash of Israel (2 Kings xiv, 14), by Ahaz (2 Kings xvii, 4), by Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 15), and by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxiv, 13).

IV. Advantages of Position. — In Edom a vassal-king probably retained his fidelity to the son of Solomon, and guarded for Jewish enterprise the road to the maritime trade with Phœnicia. Phœnicia maintained, for the most part, a quiet trade in the height of her brief power, pushed her conquests along the northern and eastern frontiers of Judah, and threatened Jerusalem; but the interposition of the territory of Israel generally relieved Judah from any immediate contact with that dangerous neighbor. The southern border of Judah, resting on the desert, was an agitated by any turbulent stream of commercial activity like that which flowed by the rear of Israel, from Damascus to Tyre. Though some of the Egyptian kings were ambitious, that ancient kingdom was far less aggressive as a neighbor to Judah than Assyria was to Israel.

The kingdom of Judah thus possessed many advantages which secured for it a longer continuance than that of Israel. A frontier less exposed to powerful enemies, a soil less fertile, a population hardier and more united, a capital at the same time a commercial and administrative centre of administration and religion, a hereditary aristocracy in the sovereign caste, an army always subordinate, a succession of kings which no revolution interrupted, many of whom were wise and good, and strove successfully to promote the moral and spiritual as well as the material prosperity of their part, a quiet more than these, the devotion of the people to the One True God, which, if not always a pure and elevated sentiment, yet was a contrast to such devotion as could be inspired by the worship of the calves or of Baal; and, lastly, the popular reverence for and obedience to the divine law so far as they learned it from their teachers, their princes, and their priests. It was, therefore, to be attributed the fact that Judah survived her more populous and more powerful sister kingdom by 130 years, and lasted from B.C. 975 to B.C. 856. (See Bernhardt, De causa quibus effectum est quod regnum Juda dictum persisteret quam regnum Israel, in the Aeneid, Acad. Groning, 1822-23, p. 124 sq.; also Loven, 1891; Schmeidler, Der Uebergang der Reiche Juda, Bresl. 1831.)

V. History. — For the circumstances that led to the schism, and for a comparison with the history of the rival kingdom, see Israel, KINGDOM OF. For a further examination of the many chronological difficulties arising from the double list of kings, see Chronology. The annals of the kingdom will be found detailed under the name of the several kings, and a general view under the articles Jerusalem, and Palestine. (See White, Kings of Judah and Israel, Lond. 1868; Herzer, Die Jüdische Biographie, Freiberg, 1875; also Geschichte der Könige Juda und Israel, Zürich, 1787; and Gesch. der Regenten Juda nach dem Exil, ib. 1784.) It will be sufficient, as a resume, here to notice the fact that the kingdom of Judah, in the course of its history, acted upon three different lines of policy in succession.

1. From the Conquest to the Rebuilding of Jerusalem. — The first three kings of Judah seem to have cherished the hope of re-establishing their authority over the Ten JUDAH

For sixty years there was war between them and the kings of Israel. Neither the disbanding of Rehoboam's forces by the authority of Shemaiah, nor the pillage of Jerusalem by the irresistible Shishak, served to put an end to the fraternal hostility. The victory of Judah over the defiles of the Jordan was not a temporary accession of territory. Assyria appears to have enlarged it still further, and to have given so powerful a stimulus to the migration of religious Israelitish settlers to Jerusalem that Baasha was induced to fortify Ramah with a view to checking the movement. Assyra provided for the safety of his dominion by building fortifications like Rehoboam, several fenced cities; he repelled an alarming irruption of an Ethiopian horde, he hired the armed intervention of Benhadad I, king of Damascus, against Baasha; and he discouraged idolatry and enforced the worship of the true God by severe penal laws. (See JANGE, NELLA INTER JUDANT EM ISRAEL. TIB. 1710.)

2. Resistance (generally in Alliance with Israel) to Damascus. — Hanani's remonstrance (2 Chron. xvi, 7) prepares us for the reversal by Jehoshaphat of the policy which Asa pursued towards Israel and Damascus. A close alliance sprang up with strange rapidity between the two parties. Asa became persuaded of the justice of tithing the produce of Amaziah, there was no open war between them, and Damascus appears as their chief and common enemy, though it rose afterwards from its overthrow to become, under Rezin, the ally of Pekah against Asa. Jehoshaphat, active and prosperous, repelled nomad invaders from the desert, curbed the power of the petty states of the nearer neighbours, and made his influence felt even among the Philistines and the Arabians. A still more lasting benefit was conferred on his kingdom by his persecuting efforts for the religious instruction of the people and the regular administration of justice. The reign of Jehoram, the husband of Athaliah, a time of bloodshed, idolatry, and disaster, was cut short by disease. Athaliah was slain by Jeph. Athaliah, the granddaughter of a Tyrian king, usurped the blood-stained crown of David, till the followers of the ancient religion put her to death, under the crown of Jehoash, the surviving scion of the royal house. His preserver, the high-priest, acquired prominent personal influence for a time; but the king fell into idolatry, and failing to withstand the power of Syria, was murdered by his own officers. The vigorous Amaziah, flushed with the victory of Eben-ezer, was no more; and his successor, the contemptuous Jehoash, the conqueror of the Syrians, and Jerusalem was entered and plundered by the Israelites. But their energies were sufficiently occupied in the task of completing the subjugation of Damascus. Under Uziah and Joash, Judah long enjoyed political and religious prosperity till the wanton outrage of Ahaz surrounded him with united enemies, with whom he was unable to cope, became in an evil hour the tributary and vassal of Tiglath-pileser.

3. Defence. Perhaps Vansande, to the Assyrian Kings. — Already in the fatal grasp of Assyria, Judah was yet spared for a checkered existence of almost another century and a half after the termination of the kingdom of Israel. The effect of the repulse of Sennacherib, of the signal religious revivals under Hezekiah and Josiah, and of the extension of these kings' salutary influence over the lost ten tribes of the kingdom of Israel, was apparently done away by the ignominious reign of the impious Manasseh, and the lingering decay of the whole people under the four feeble descendants of Josiah. Provoked by their treachery and meanness, their Babylonian master, who had meanwhile succeeded to the dominion of the throne of Assyria, the Israelites were brought in successive deportations, all being the strength of the kingdom. The consummation of the ruin came upon them in the destruction of the Temple by the hand of Nebuzaradan, amid the wailing of prophets and the taunts of heathen tribes arrests the length from the yoke of David.

V. L. Morit State. — The national life of the Hebrews appeared to become gradually weaker during these successive stages of history, until at length it seemed extinct; but there was still, as there had been all along, a spiritual life hidden within the body. It was a time of hopeless darkness to all but those Jews who had strong faith in God, with a clear and steady insight into the ways of Providence, and in that sense prophetic. The time of the division of the kingdoms was the golden age of prophecy. In each kingdom the prophetic office was subject to peculiar modifications which were required in Judah by the circumstances of the priesthood, in Israel by the existence of the house of Baal and the national character of its religion. Some historians have even stated that after the reign of Athaliah, the priesthood gradually acquired and retained excessive and unconstitutional power in Judah. The recorded facts scarcely sustain the conjecture. Had it been so, the effect of such power would have been manifest in the exorbitant wealth and unbridled luxury of the priests and the cruel enforcement of penal laws, like those of Assyria, against the people. But the peculiar offences of the priesthood, as witnessed in the prophetic writings, were of another kind. Ignorance of God's word, neglect of the instruction of the people, and parental judgments, are the offences specially imputed to them, just such as might be looked for where the priesthood is a hereditary caste and irresponsible, but neither ambitious nor powerful. When the priest either, as was the case in Israel, abandoned the land, or, as in Judah, ceased to be really a teacher, ceased from spiritual communion with God, ceased from living sympathy with men, and became the mere image of an intercessor, a mechanical performer of ceremonial duties little understood or heeded by himself, then the prophet was raised up to supply some of his deficiencies, and to exercise his functions as the mediator of God's word. But even his influence sinks into obscurity and almost disappear, except from the genealogical tables, the prophets come forward appealing everywhere to the conscience of individuals — in Israel as wonder-workers, calling together God's chosen few out of an idolatrous nation, and in Judah as exhorters and seers, supporting and uniting all that remained of ancient piety, explaining each mysterious dispensation of God as it was unfolded, and promoting his gracious spiritual promises in all their extent. The part which Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other prophets took in preparing the Jews for their captivity, cannot, indeed, be fully appreciated without reviewing the succeeding efforts of Ezekiel and Daniel. But the influence which they exercised on the national mind was too important to be overlooked in a sketch, however brief, of the history of the kingdom of Judah. See Prophets.

JUDAH, Marsh, is a name often given to a range of hills to the south and west of Jerusalem, styled in Luke i, 39, 65, the "hill-country of Judah" (ג' בנאל ג' 'יווועא'. The hills are low and conical, uniform in shape even to weariness; the vegetation, save in early spring, is dry and parched, the valleys are broad and assuageless. The present day signs are that the land of corn, and wine, and oil has become desolate. The fenced cities and villages surmount the hills, but they are in ruins; the terraces where once were vineyards and cornfields can be traced along the mountain sides, but they are neglected; wells and pools of water are to be found in every valley, but there is none to drink of them. See Judah, Tribe of. the priests in pushing the reconstruction of the Temple (Ezra iii, 9); unless this latter be rather the person elsewhere called Hodayah (Ezra ii, 40).

3. One of those who followed the half of the Jewish chiefs around the southern section of the newly-erected walls of Jerusalem, but whether he was a Levite or priest is not stated (Neh. xii, 34). B.C. 446.

4. One of those who accompanied with musical performances the procession around the southern quarter of the walls of Jerusalem lately reconstructed (Neh. xii, 86). B.C. 446. He was perhaps identical with the preceding.

5. Son of Sennah, a descendant of Benjamin, and prefect of Acræ or the Lower City (פִּירַ֨ת יָדֶּ֫קָּרוֹ, over the second city, not “second over the city,” as the A. V. renders following the Sept. and Vulg.) after the exile (Neh. xi, 9). B.C. cir. 440.

Juda hah-Kodesh, or the Holy, son of Simon, of the tribe of Benjamin, and a descendant of Hillel I., is one of the most celebrated characters in Jewish history. He was born at Tiberias, according to accounts, about 186, on the same day on which Akiba suffered martyrdom—an event predicted, according to his admirers, in the verse of Solomon: “One son ariseth, and one sun goeth down.” While yet a youth he was, on account of his extraordinary proficiency in Jewish law, admitted to the Sanhedrin, and on the death of his father followed him in the presidency.

Juda hah-Kodesh was one of the highest officials of the temple, and was known as the “scribe” and the “saint,” and also as the “rabbi.” He was the first of the great rabbis in the Jewish nation, and was known as the “scribe of the scribes.”

Juda hah-Kodesh has been called the “father of the Mishnah” by the rabbis of his time.

Judaism

Judaism, the name by which we designate the religious doctrines and rites of the people chosen by Jehovah as his peculiar people; the descendants of Jacob, to whom the law was given by Moses, and religious light and truth were revealed in the Old Testament; the most important branch of that family of nations conventionally comprised under the title of Semites—a people of many fates and of many names, called by the Bible the people of God; by Mohammed, the people of the Book; by Hegel, "the people of the Geist," and now generally known as Hebrews, Israelites, or Jews.

Abrahamism.—To the Christian student especially, the early development of these doctrines of this people is interesting, as unfolded in the pages of the older half of the inspired writings that go to make up the basis of his own creed. Judaism is pre-eminently a monotheistic faith, originating with the patriarch Abraham when, in an era of polytheism and flagrant vice, he became the founder of the monotheistic conception and worship of the one living and true God; and from that remote day to this, all the Jewish people pride themselves in being "children of Abraham." It is a fact striking to every student of comparative religion, and in no small degree a proof of the authenticity of the O.T. Scriptures, that this monotheistic faith originated at a time when the religion of all other branches of the same family, which, with the Hebrew, make up the Semitic, differed widely from it in every respect.

The Assyrians, Babylonians, Phœnicians, and Carthaginians all possessed a nearly identical religion, but one that lacked the essential feature of Judaism. They all, it is true, believed in a supreme god, called by the different names of Ilu, Bel, Set, Hadad, Moloch, Chemosh, Baal, El, Adon, Assur, but they also all believed in subordinate and secondary beings, emanations from this supreme being, the manifestation of this one god, and, like other pantheistic religions, the custom prevailed among these Semitic nations of promoting first one and then another deity to be the supreme object of worship. Among the Assyrians, as among the Egyptians, the gods were often arranged in triads, as that of Anu, Bel, and Ea, and other trios with the horns of a bull; Baal was represented by a serpent. These religions, in short, represented the gods as the Spirits within and behind natural objects and forces—powers within the world, rather than, as among the Hebrews, a spirit above the world. The Hebrews’ God was a God above nature, not simply in it. He stood along unaccompanied by its belonging and it was the doctrine of the divine. His worship required purity, not pollution; its aim was holiness, and its spirit humane, not cruel. Monotheistic from the first, it became an absolute monothestism in its development. In all the Semitic nations, behind the numerous divine beings representing the powers of nature there rose, it is true, by visible one supreme Being, of whom all these were emanations; but there was also among all of them, except the Hebrew branch, a tendency to lose sight of the first great cause, the very reverse of the tendency of the faith of Abraham, whose soul was the contemplation of the perfect Being above all and the source of all. With passionate love he adored this most high God, maker of heaven and earth. Such was his devotional to this almighty Being, that men said, “Abraham is the friend of the most high God.” The difference, then, between the religion of Abraham and that of the supremacy nations was, that while they descended from the idea of a supreme Being into that of subordinate ones, he went back to that of the supreme, and clung to this with his whole soul (Clark, Ten great Religions, chap. x). See Abraham.

This abstractive faith continued to be the faith of the Israelites even until it was supplanted by Moses in Sinai by the Lord himself, through his chosen servant Moses. Thereafter the Abrahamic idea was clothed in forms refined necessary not only by the character of the age, but also by the fluidity of men, to the general idea of the Trinity; the one God, the Creator, by himself, i.e., the essence of the God of the Lord during the ultimate union of the Jewish Church and State—the correlation of life and religion, of the nation and the individual. See Moses; Law.

Prophecy.—Surrounded by idolaters on all sides, with whom they were in contact continually, the Hebrews gradually disobeyed the commandments of Sinai until idolatry destroyed all personal morality, and the chosen people knew not their Lord. To save the race from utter apostasy, holy men were inspired by the Lord to call them back to the purity of the faith and immorality. Amid the trials and woes afflictive to which he visited the nation, he yet declares the perpetuity of the Jewish faith. A Messiah shall eventually gather in the people, and to the Lord alone shall service be rendered. See Messiah. Though the present plant shall wither, the seed shall continue to live, from whose germination shall spring a flower of greater fragrance in the fulness of time. All through the captivity among the Assyrians and Babylonians, even after the destruction of the Temple, the life of the seed was attested by the fruit it bore. See Captivity; Prophecy.

The political and political exactions of the Jews was ameliorated, they served themselves, with that determination characteristic of the Hebrew race, for other and more determined strife. In consequence of their dispersion as a nation, after the Babylonian exile the Mosaic constitution could be but partially re-established. “The whole building was too much shattered, and its fragments too widely dispersed, to reunite in their ancient and regular form.” But from his captivity the Jew had brought with him a reverential, or, rather, a passionate attachment to the Mosaic law and the constitution of the Temple; and the re-establishment of the state was accompanied by the ready and solemn recognition of the law. The synagogue was instituted, and with it many of the institutions which have tended to perpetuate Judaism to the present hour. One of the most important of these was the constant interpretation of the law and the prophets; and as the acquiescence with the law became more intimate, the attachment to it grew deeper and deeper in the national character even in one, which not only their Bible and statute-book, but a guide for the most minute details of common life. “But no written law can provide for all possible exigencies; whether general and comprehensive, or minute and multifarious, it equally requires the expositor to adapt it to the immediate case which may arise, either by his own private judgment, or that of the private conscience. Hence the law became a deep and intricate study. . . . Learning in the law became the great distinction to which all alike paid reverential homage. Public and private affairs depended upon the sanction of this self-forming spiritual aristocracy.

Every duty of life, of social intercourse between man and man, not to speak of its weightier authority as the national code of criminal and civil jurisprudence, was regulated by an appeal to the book of the law” (Milman, History of the Jews, ii, 417). Thus arose the office of the rabbi—the clergy, the learned interpreters of the law, the public instructors, to whom, by degrees, also the spiritual authority was transferred from the priesthood. At this time, also, besides the inspired Scriptures, traditional writings became another ground of authority over the public mind. See Tradition. This was not, however, always the case; historically at Mowile [the public reading of the Law], to that schism in Judaism which originated the Karaite (q. v.). Thus Judaism had fortified itself after the captivity, so that when the Temple was finally again destroyed, and public worship became extinct, the Rabbinical law was able to supplant the original religion of the Jews and from amid the blackened walls of Jerusalem rose, ere the smoke of the ruins had yet ceased, a new bond of national union, the great distinctive feature in the character of modern Judaism. With the Masora (q. v.) also came soon after the Mishna (q. v.) and the Talmud, and after them the Zohar—[see Talmud], that wonderful monument of human industry—formulated Mosaiism—which to the Jew “became the magic circle within which the national mind patiently labored for ages in performing the bidding of the ancient and mighty envoys, who dwelt the sacred line beyond the cloud, the light not venturing to pass” (Milman), and which so securely enwrapp’d the Jewish idea in almost infinite rules and laws that it completely sheltered it from polluting contact in the succeeding dark ages. It is thus that Judaism, weathering many a long and severe storm, has continued to prosper, and flourish to the duration of our race. See Sects.

Sects.—In the early age of Judaism we saw that the simple worship of a supreme Being constituted its peculiar characteristic. At that time, as a sign of the covenant of Abraham with the Lord, the rite of circumcision (q. v.) was introduced, and was soon followed by the formal institution of sacrifice. In the period of Mosaism the Jewish belief became an established form of religion, and then were introduced certain ceremonies and feasts days, together with the priesthood. In the Rabbinitic period, as the law became overlaid by tradition, discussions among the Jews were divided into three distinct sects—the Pharisees (q. v.), who placed religion in external ceremony; the Sadducees (q. v.), who were remarkable for their incredulity; and the Essenes (q. v.), whose peculiar distinction was the practice of ascetic sanctity. Still later sprang up other sects: prominently among them the Essenes and the Karaites, the strict observance of the letter of the law, the opponents of rabbinical interpretations. For a review of Jewish literature, see Rabbinitis.

Modern Judaism.—In the history of the Jews (q. v.) we have seen how greatly the condition of the people was ameliorated about the second Temple, and how the influence of Moses Mendelssohn. But not only in their civil condition did his efforts affect the Jews; he also greatly changed the character of Judaism itself. With him originated a tendency of thought and action, which has since spread among the leaders of Judaism generally, to weaken rabbinical authority, and to maintain a more simple Biblical Judaism. These have now been developed into two special phases of Jewish opinion, which are represented by the terms "Conservative" (or Moderate Orthodox) and "Reformed" (or Liberal) Judaism. (See each of these titles below.)

(General.) — A summary of the religious views of the Jews was first compiled in the 11th century by the second great Moses (Maimonides), and it continues to be with the Orthodox the Jewish confession of faith to the present day. It is as follows:

1. I believe in one perfect faith, that God is the creator (whose name be blessed), governor, and maker of all creatures; and that he hath wrought all things, worketh all them which be for ever.

2. I believe, with perfect faith, that the Creator (whose name be blessed) is one; and that such a unity as is in him can be found in none other; and that he alone hath been our God, is, and forever shall be.

3. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator (whose name be blessed) is not corporeal, nor to be comprehended with any bodily properties; and that there is no bodily essence to be changed, increased, or diminished.

4. I believe, with a perfect faith, the Creator (whose name be blessed) to be the first and the last; that nothing was before him, nor shall there be after him, nor shall he be alone.

5. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator (whose name be blessed) is to be worshipped, and none else.

6. I believe, with a perfect faith, that all the prophets are true.

7. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the prophecies of Moses our master (may he rest in peace) were true; that he was the father and chief of all wise men that lived before him, and shall live after him.

8. I believe, with a perfect faith, that all the law which at this day is found in our hands was delivered by God himself to our master Moses (God's peace be upon him).

9. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the same law is never to be changed, nor any other to be given us of God (whose name be blessed).

10. I believe, with a perfect faith, that God (whose name be blessed) has enlightened all the peoples of the earth with the brightness of men, as it is written in the prophecies: he fashioneth their hearts alike, he understandeth all their works.

11. I believe, with a perfect faith, that all the prophets (whose name be blessed) will recompense good to them that keep his commandments, and will punish them who transgress them.

12. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Messiah is yet to come; and although he retard his coming, yet I will wait for him till he appear.

13. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the dead shall be restored to life when it shall seem fit unto God the creator (whose name be blessed, and memory celebrated without end. Amen).

Doctrine of Immortality.—In regard to the future life, there is mentioned in the Scripture a resurrection of the righteous (q.v.), the Jews believe in the ultimate salvation of all men. Like the Roman Catholics [see PURGATORY], the Jews offer up prayers for the souls of their deceased friends (comp. Alger, Hist. Doct. Future Life, ch. viii. and ix.).

Starches.—Since the destruction of their Temple and their dispersion the sacrifices have been discontinued, but in all other respects the Mosaic dispensation is observed intact among the Orthodox Jews.

Worship.—Their divine worship consists in the reading of the Scriptures and prayer. But while they do not in the Synagogue, they expound all to say their prayers at home, or in any place where circumstances may place them, three times a day, morning, afternoon, and evening; they repeat also blessings and particular praises to God, aside from them, at their meals and on other occasions.

In their morning devotions they use the phyllacterys (q.v.) and the Talith, except Saturdays, when they use the Talith only. See FRINGE.

Calendar.—The Jewish year is either civil or ecclesiastical. The civil year commences in the month of Tisri (September-October), and falls into some part of our September, on the view that the world was created on the first day of this month (Tisri). The ecclesiastical year commences about the vernal equinox, in the month of Nisan, the latter part of our month of March and the first half of April. The seventh month of the civil year they call the first of the ecclesiastical year, because this was en-

Feast Days. — The feasts which they observe at present are the following: 1. Passover, on the 14th of Nisan, and lasting eight days. On the evening before the feast the first-born of every family observes a fast in remembrance of God's mercy toward the nation. They fast at this feast in a solemn, fasted, and religious manner, and during the holy days the first and last days. 2. Pentecost, or the Feast of Weeks, falling seven weeks after the Passover, is at present celebrated only two days. 3. Trumpets, on the 1st and 2d of Tisri, of which the first is called New-year's day. On the second day is read the 22d chapter of Genesis, and an account is given of the offering of his son Isaac, and God's blessing on him and his seed. Then they blow the trumpet, or, more accurately, the horn, and pray, as usual, that God would bring them to Jerusalem. 4. Tabernacles, on the 15th of Tisri, and lasting nine days; the first and the last two days being observed as feast days, and the other four as days of labor. On the first day they take branches of palm, myrtle, willow, and citron bound together, and go around the altar or pulpit singing psalms, because this ceremony was formerly performed at their Temple. On the seventh day they build a booth, and sit in it. This booth, or tabernacle, is called the Succoth, or law of Moses, out of the ark, and carry them to the altar, and all the congregation follow in procession seven times around the altar, in remembrance of the Sabbatical year, singing the 29th Psalm. On the evening of this day the feast of solemn assembly, or of rejoicing, commenced, and the various messengers of the prophets, and entreat the Lord to be propitious to them, and deliver them from captivity. On the ninth day they repeat several prayers in honor of the law, and bless God for his mercy and goodness in giving it to them by his servant Moses, and read that part of the Scriptures which gives expression of his death. 5. Pentecost, on the 14th and 15th of Adar (or March), in commemoration of the deliverance from Haman (Esth. ix.). The whole book of Esther is read repeated, with liberal almsgiving to the poor. 6. Besides these festivals appointed by Moses and Mordecai, they celebrate the destruction of the阵 and in commemoration of their victory over Antiochus Epiphanes. This festival lasts eight days, and is appointed to be kept by lighted lamps. The reason they assign for this is, that, at this purification and redemption of the Temple after the deliverance from Antiochus, there was not enough of pure oil left to burn one night, but that it miraculously lasted eight days, when they obtained a fresh supply. 7. Expiration day, the 10th day of Tisri, is observed by the Jews, though they have neither temple nor priest. Before the feast they seek to re-establish friendly relations with their neighbors, and, in short, do everything that may serve to evince the sincerity of their repentance. For twenty-four hours they observe a strict fast, and many a pious soul does not quit the synagogue during these long hours, but remains in prayer through the night. See FESTIVAL. Mission and Preservation of the Jews. — The preservation of the Jews as a distinct nation, notwithstanding the miseries which they have endured for many ages, is a wonderful fact. The religions of other nations have depended on temporal prosperity for their duration; they have triumphed under the protection of conquerors, and have been and given place to the succession of weak monarchs. Paganism once spread the known world, even where it no longer exists. The Christian Church, glorious in her martyrs, has survived the persecution of her enemies, though she cannot heal the wounds they have inflicted; but Judaism, hated and persecuted for so many centuries, has not merely escaped destruction, it has been powerful and flourishing. Kings have employed the severity of laws and the hand of the executioner to eradicate it, and a socitiable populace have injured it by their massacres more than kings. Sovereigns and their subjects, pagans, Christians, and Mohammadans, opposed to each other in everything else, have formed a common design to annihilate this nation without success. The bush of Moses has always continued burning, and never been consumed. The expulsion of the Jews from the great cities of kingdoms has only scattered them throughout the world. They have lived from age to age in wretchedness and obscurity. Their language has flowed from generation to generation, and they have continued to our day, in spite of the disgrace and hatred which everywhere clung to them, while the greatest empires have fallen and been almost forgotten. Every Jew is at this moment a living witness to the Christian as to the authenticity of his own religion, an undying evidence that Christianity is the last word of a revelation from God; and the patient endurance of the descendants of Abraham is an evidence that Providence has guarded them throughout all their miseries. Hence the Christian should regard with compassion a people so long preserved by this peculiar care amidst calamities which would have destroyed any other nation.

"I would look at the ceremonies of pagan worship," says Dr. Richardson, "as a matter of little more than idle curiosity, but those of the Jews reach the heart. This is the most ancient form of worship in existence, in which the whole of heaven was worshipped when all the other nations in the world were sitting in darkness, or falling down to stocks and stones. To the Jews were committed the oracles of God. This is the manner in which Moses and Elias, David and Solomon, worshipped the God of their fathers; this worship was not an institution of man, but was the worship the Lamb, and, singing hosannas to the son of David, confide their power to save."

Restoration of the Jews—The Jews, as is well known, deny the accomplishment of the prophecies in the person of Jesus. The Reformed Jews (see below) deny the promise of a personal Messiah altogether; but the orthodox, the greater part of the Jews, hold that the Messiah has not yet come, but that they will be redeemed at the appointed time, when he of whom the prophets spoke shall make his appearance in great worldly pomp and grandeur, subduing all nations, and restoring the sceptre of universal rule to the house of Judah. Then there shall reign universal peace and happiness in all the earth, never again to be interrupted, and to the Jews it shall be a blessing; in those only who have strayed into the Christian and Mohammedan folds; then idolatry shall cease in the world, and all men acknowledge the unity of God and his kingdom. (Comp. Zech. xiv, 3. "And the Lord shall be king over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one.") This restoration shall be effected not on account of any merits of their own, but for the Lord's sake; so as to secure their own righteousness, and the perfection to which they shall attain after their deliverance. (Atonement for sin is made by the fulfilling of the law and by circumcision, and not, as the Christian holds, by the sacrifice of the Messiah.) For the Christian doctrine of the Restoration of the Jews, see Restoration.

JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE. The gradual emancipation of the Jews in Germany, which, however, did not become final anywhere until 1848, and which was rendered complete by the revolution and the constitution of 1860, insensibly diminished the influence of Talmudic studies and of Rabbinical lore as the paramount obligation of life. Compelled, happily, to bear their own share in their deliverance from oppression, the Jews became more attached to the land of their nativity, and more and more estranged from the traditional allegiance to the kingdom of Israel. Their love for Palestine, intense and impassioned as ever, has assumed a different form. Their union and fellowship no longer represented a nationality yearning to be released from capture, but found in the indissoluble affection of race and a common faith, not inconsistent with ties of citizenship in the world.

In 1807, when Napoleon convened the so-called Jewish Sanhedrin, with a view of establishing the relations between the empire and the Jews resident in France, the first official and authoritative expression of the transformed Jewish sentiment was published. In effect, it was a defense of the Jew who had for centuries been denied the rights of a citizen, and who was subject to persecution. It declared that the Jews of France recognize in the fullest sense the French people as their brethren; that France is their country; that the Jews of France recognize as paramount the laws of the land, and their religious tribunals have no authority in conflict with civil ones; that the civil government joins in the pursuit of a useful trade and prohibits usury; that polygamy is forbidden and divorce permitted.

The Jews of France were equal to the promise of the Sanhedrin. They proved good citizens, and faithfully adhered to their religious belief and practice. The chief rabbi of France has been recognized as of corresponding dignity with the archbishop of Paris, and in the distribution of state aid to ecclesiastical institutions the Jews have been admitted to their proportionate share. The Jews of France, like those of Great Britain and Holland, have contributed largely to the exalted condition of their race, and it has not materially changed to this day. The Portuguese ritual is followed at one of the Paris synagogues, as at London and Amsterdam. The German or Polish ritual is otherwise the rule.

In Great Britain, about the year 1842, the key-note of progress was struck by the Jewish congregation at London, followed by that of Manchester. There are now only two congregations in the United Kingdom deny- ing the authority of the chief rabbi. In Great Britain, France, and Holland there exists a recognized ecclesiastical authority. The administration of religious affairs is conducted nearly upon the Episcopal system. The spirit of the churches in these three countries is extremely conservative. Nevertheless, great latitude is allowed to individual believers, and what would have been regarded as capital sins a century ago are considered trivial today. It may be said that the Jews have thoroughly assimilated themselves to the rest of the population. In France their conservatism is formal rather than substantial, and the nonconformist is treated with great liberality. That he violates the sanctity of the Jewish Sabbath is not necessarily a disqualification for high office in the church, nor does it detract from his worth as a citizen to live consistently with their professions; the laity are not sharply criticized. In England conservatism is decided, authoritative, uncompromising. Nonconformists are on sufferance, and are rarely allowed a voice in the administration of synagogal affairs. In Holland liberty has dealt kindly with the Jewish people, who are prominent in the state and in commerce, in science, in learning, and in art, and are at once conservative and tolerant in their religious views, while consistent in the conduct of the synagogue. There are successful Conservative colleges or theological seminaries at Paris, London, Amsterdam, Breslau, Berlin, and Wurzburg.

Conservative Judaism is paramount in Belgium and Italy, and has held its own in some parts of Austria also. The great Rapoport (q. v.) of Prague, one of the finest scholars of that century, may be regarded as the type of Conservative Judaism. The Reform of 1859, with its compromises and concessions, has, to a great extent, arrested the forward movement in its relations to the world, and the traditional legislation, once so prominent in the state and in commerce, in science, in learning, and in art, and are at once conservative and tolerant in their religious views, while consistent in the conduct of the synagogue. form or of scholastic authority. Conservative Judaism has no history in these countries, yet its scholars have done the world a service in the preservation of Hebrew literature, and in rescuing from oblivion ancient thought so peculiarly habituated and disguised. It is worthy of note that the chief rabbi at Jerusalem preserves great state, and is regarded as a functionary of signal consequence, presiding over the congregations, of which full one half came to this country only within the last twelve years. The synagogues rival the most beautiful and costly churches in the principal cities. In 1840 there were scarcely ten thousand Jews and not more than a dozen congregations in the United States. Their synagogues now number two hundred and fifty. The Conservative ministry is not strong. Only recently has any active interest been displayed in the higher Hebrew education, the preparation of candidates for clerical stations. Maimonides College, established in 1865 at Philadelphia, has not been successful. The Conservative Synagogues are variously named, some of them are charitable, educational, or political—otherwise recognizing no will or exposition of Jewish doctrine superior to that of their respective ministers or secular officials. The co-operative movements for aiding oppressed Israelites in foreign countries, and for representing anticipated dangers or checking legal discriminations at home, resulting in the establishment of the "Board of Delegates of American Israelites," are not confined to the Conservative or to the Progressive congregations. Doctoral questions are discussed in this organization, which is purely voluntary, and assumes no authority except what may be infallible with time to interpret the sentiments of American Israelites.

The Conservatives have of late years paid attention to religious education. Elementary schools are attached to most congregations, and in New York a society was formed in 1865 for the gratuitous instruction in Hebrew and in English of children whose parents are not attached to any synagogue, or are unable to contribute to its support. (M. H.)

JUDAISM, REFORMED, also called progressive or modern Judaism, is the Jewish religion as reformed in the 19th century in Germany, Austria, America, and in some congregations of France and England. The places of worship are called temples, distinguished from other Jewish synagogues by choir, organ, regular sermons, and part of the liturgy in the vernacular of the country, and in America also by family pews. The ministers of these temples are rabbis or rebbes, chosen, although by the congregation, from among the learned of the people, and are paid salaries. The children of the congregation are instructed in Hebrew lore, and are graduates of colleges or universities; or preachers by the choice of the congregation, who are mostly academic students; and cantors, capable of reading the divine service and leading the choir. In some congregations the offices of preacher and cantor are united in one person. Large congregations are conducted by the ordained rabbi and the cantor; the former is the exarch of the law, and the latter presides over the worship, and is also called Hazan, or Reader (q.v.). Every congregation elects secular officers to conduct the temporal affairs. The ministers are elected by the congregation for a stated period. A school for instruction in religion, Hebrew, and Jewish history is attached to every temple. Like all other Jews, the reformed also are unitarian in theology, and acknowledge the Old Testament Scriptures as the divine source of law and doctrine, but reject the additional authority of the Talmud, in place of which they appeal to reason and conscience as the highest authority in expounding the law and doctrines. They believe in the eternity of the soul, future reward and punishment, the perfectibility of human nature, the final and universal triumph of truth and righteousness. They reject the belief in the coming of a Messiah; the gathering of the Jewish people to Palestine to form a separate government, and to restore the ancient polity of Israel, its worship and Levitical priesthood; the resurrection of the body and the last judgment day; and the authority of the Talmud above any other collection of commentaries to the Bible. All these doctrines are expressed in their prayer-books and catechisms. Their hermeneutics is rationalistic. They reject the evidence of miracles, relying exclusively upon the internal evidence of the Scriptures, and the common consent of all civilized nations to the divinity of the scriptural laws and doctrines. Except in the case of Moses, of whom the story must be understood metaphorically, "the appearance and speaking of angels, as also the appearance and speaking of God, were subjective, in the vision, waking or dreaming, appearing objectively to the prophet, which was not the case in reality. In this respect they follow the guide of Moses Maimonides. They base their theologies on the "Mishneh Torah" and "Thora ha-Gadol," or "Thora ha-Mishna." In respect to doctrine, they hold that all religious doctrines must be taken from the Bible, and must be in harmony with the loftiest and purest conceptions of the Deity and humanity suggested by the Scriptures, and confirmed by reason and common-sense. They hold that all laws contained in the Decalogue, expressed or implied, are obligatory forever, both in letter or spirit. All laws not contained in the Decalogue, expressed or implied, are local and temporal (although the principle expressed by some may be eternal) and could have been intended for certain times and localities only. The last theories of Judaism were developed by various Jewish authors between the years 1000 and 1500; partly they are also in the ancient Rabbinical literature, but were dropped after 1500, and taken up again by the disciples and successors of Moses Mendelssohn toward the close of the last century and gradually developed to the present system. (I. M. W.)

From a few late articles in the "Israilite" (Nov., 1871), by the distinguished writer of the above article on Reformed Judaism, we learn that he regards as the first reformer in the camp of Judaism the celebrated gaon Saadta (q.v.) ben-Joseph, of Egyum, who flourished in the first half of the 10th century; as the second, the famous body-physician of the caliph of Cairo, Rambam, the classical Moses Maimonides. Of perhaps minor influence, but also as active in the field of reform, he introduces us next to Bechai ben-Joseph, of Saragossa, and Ibn-Gebirol (q.v.), of Malaga, who flourished in the 11th century. He even counts among the reformers the celebrated French rabbi Isaac, of Troyes, better known under the surname of Rashi (q.v.); and on the side of reform or progressive Judaism are also ranked by Dr. Wise the celebrated "Emmeach Ramah (Exalted Faith), who fell a victim to fanaticism in A.D. 1180 at Toledo, in Spain, and with whom close up the two centuries that elapsed between the appearance of Saadta and Maimonides, in which deaths "all Jewish philosophy had become peripatetic," the Jewish philosophical writers of this period considering their main object "the self-defence of Judaism on the one hand, and the expounding of the Bible and Talmud as rational in as possible, in order to reconcile and harmonize faith and reason."
Judaizing Christians

With the 13th century undoubtedly opens a new epoch in Judaism, for it is here that we encounter the great Jewish master mind Moses Maimonides, of whom it has been truly said that “from Moses [the lawgiver] to Moses [Mendelssohn] there was none like Moses [Maimonides].” Since the days of Ezra, no man has exercised a greater, and lasting influence on the Jews and Judaism as this man, and we need not wonder that Orthodox, Conservative, and Reformed Jews alike lay claim to this master mind; but it must be confessed that, after all, he really belongs to the Progressive Jews only. It is true the creed drawn up by the second Messiah, in the possession of all Jews, is Orthodox clinging to it with even more tenacity than the Conservatives and the Reformed, but his theologicophilosophical works gained authority mainly among the Reformed thinkers of the Judaistic faith. After that, of course, Jewish literature abounds with names whose productions betray a rationalistic tendency, for all Jewish thinkers up to date, Baruch Spinoza, Moses Mendelssohn, and the writers of the 19th century included, are more or less the disciples of Maimonides, so that no Jewish theologicophilosophical book, from and after 1900, can be picked up in which the ideas of Maimonides do not form a prominent part.” In our own days the Reform movement first became very prominent. In Germany, where Judaism has always been strong on account of the high literary attainments of the German Jews, the separation between the Orthodox and Reformed, and the two establishments alike independent, lasting and permanent congregations first originated, and the celebrated Holdheim (q. v.) was among the first as pastor of a temple in 1846. Other Jewish rabbis of note, identified with the Reform movement in Germany, are Stein, of Frankfurt-on-the-Maine; Einhorn, now of New York City; Deutsch, now of Baltimore, Md.; and Ritter, the successor of Holdheim, and historian of the Reform agitation. In the U. States those prominently identified with the Reform question are Drs. Adler and Gutheim, of the Fifth Avenue Temple, New York City; Mr. Ellinger, editor of the Jewish Times, New York City; Dr. Lewin, of Brooklyn; editor of the New Era; Dr. Isaac M. Wise, editor of the Israelite, etc. See Jost, Gesch. des Judenstaates u. s., Sekten, iii, 349 sq., Graetz, Gesch. d. Juden, x; Ritter, Gesch., d. Judaizing Christians, a term frequently employed to designate a class of early Christians, of whom traces appear in the N.-T. epistles, and still more distinctly in the succeeding century. They are believed to have been converted from Judaism, who still clung to the Mosaic institutions, particularly circumcision. They appear a direct result of two classes or two currents of the ceremonial law binding only upon Christians descended from the Jews, while others looked upon it as obligatory also for the heathen. The head-quarters of the Judaizing Christians is said to have been first at Antioch. The council held at Jerusalem decided that the heathen should not be subject to circumcision. The more zealous Judaizing Christians, thus opposed by the apostles, abandoned Palestine, and went about trying to convert the heathen to their views, but with little success. They were probably the “false apostles,” persons “bearing a false name,” so mention of Paul, and known in history, the more moderate as Nazarenus (q. v.), the others as Ebionites (q. v.). See D. van Heyst, De Jud. Christianismo (1829).—Pieper, Universal Lexikon, ix, 159.

Ju'das (Iouda), the Grecized form of the Hebrew name Judah, and generally retained in the A. V. of the Apocrypha and N. T., as also in Josephus, where it occurs of a considerable number of men. See also JUDE: Jude.

1. The patriarch Judah (q. v.), son of Jacob (Matt. i, 2, 3)
2. One of the Levites who renounced his Gentile wife after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 23); the JU'DAM of Ezra x, 23.

3. The third son of Mattathias, and the leading one of the three Maccabees brothers (1 Macc. ii, 4, etc.). See Maccabees.

4. The son of Calphi (Alpheus), a Jewish general under Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc. xi, 70).

5. A Jew occupying a conspicuous position at Jerusalem at the time of the mission to Aristobulus (q. v.) and the Egyptian Jews (2 Macc. i, 10). He is thought by some to have been the same with

6. An aged person, and a noted teacher among the Essenes at Jerusalem, famous for his art of predicting events, which was confirmed in a remarkable manner by the death of Antigonus (q. v.) at the order of his brother Aristobulus, as related by Josephus (Ant. xiii, 11, 2, 6).

7. A son of Simon, and brother of John Hyrcanus (1 Macc. xvi, 2), murdered by Ptolemaeus the usurper, either at the same time (R.C. Cir. 135) with his father (1 Macc. xvi, 15 sq.), or shortly afterwards (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 8, 1; see Hinnom, or More. L. c.).—Smith.

8. A noted leader of a sect of Jews (Tos. Sanh. 83b) famous for his physical strength), and one of the three principal bandits mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xvi, 10, 2; War, ii, 4, 1) as infesting Palestine in the early days of Herod. This person, whom Whitton (ad loc.) regards as the Theudas (q. v.) of the Thras, 36), temporarily got possession of Sepphoris, in Galilee. What became of him does not particularly appear, but it may be presumed he shared the fate of the others named in the same connection.

9. Son of one Saripheus, or Sepher, and one of the two eminent Jewish teachers who incited their young disciples to demolish the golden eagle caged by Herod over the Temple gate, an act of sedition for which the whole party were burned alive (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 2-4; War, i, 83, 2-4).

10. A person surnamed “the Galilean” (Παλαιολόγιος). Acts xiii, 7; also by Josephus (Ant. xvi, 4, 4; 36, 5, 2; War, ii, 8, 1), and likewise “the Galilean” (Παλαιολογιστής, Ant. xviii, 1). He was born at Gamasset, a fortified city on the Sea of Galilee, in Lower Gaulonitis; and after the deposition of Archelaus, during the thirty-seven-year after the battle of Actium (Josephus, War, ii, 11, 2; e. A.D. 6, he excited the insurrection among the Jews, in concert with a well-known Pharisee named Sadox, against the Roman government exercised by the procurator Coponius, on occasion of a census levied by the emperor Augustus, asserting the popular doctrine that the Jews ought to acknowledge no dominion but that of God. He was destroyed, and his followers scattered by Cyrenius, then procurator of Syria and Judea. We also learn from Josephus that the scattered remnant of the party of Judas continued after his destruction to work on still in secret, and labor to maintain his free spirit and religious principles among the people (Josephus, War, ii, 17, 7-19). See E. A. Schulze, Diasor, D. Judas Galileos epygemos sunes, Frankfurt, 1761; also in his Exercit. philosoph. jurispr. nov. p. 104.8. See SICAHIL.

11. Son of Simon (John vi, 71; xviii, 2, 36), surnamed (always in the other Gospels)的心情, to distinguish him from the other apostle of the same name. See JOHN. In addition to this epithet the Evangelists usually distinguish him by some allusion to his treasurer-h绝 towards his Master.

1. Commentary of the Sermone.—The epithet lecicrTo (Τεκανομιον) has received many interpretations more or less conjectural.
(1) From Keritö (Josh. xv, 25), in the tribe of Judah, the Heb. קֶרֵיתּוּת, 'Ish-Keritö', passing into Ἰσθ ᾶ τ ῦ θ ο ὴ, ‘a man of Tob’—appears in Josephus (Ant. vii, 6, 1) as Ἰσθ ᾶ τ ῦ θ ο, ‘Istoth'. In connection with this explanation may be noticed the reading of some MSS. in John vii, 17, Ἱστὰ ῦ θ ο, that received by Lachmann and Tischendorf, which makes the name Iscarit belong to Simon, and not, as elsewhere, to Judas only. On this hypothesis, his position among the Twelve, the rest of whom belonged to Galilee (Acts ii, 7), would be exceptional; and this is perhaps an additional reason why this locality is noted. This is the most common and probable opinion. See Keim.

(2) From Karka (A.V. ‘Kartan,’ Josh. xxi, 32), in Galilee (so Ewald, Gesch. Israelit., v, 321).

(3) As equivalent to Isacharite, or Ἰασχαρίωτας (Grotius on Matt. x, 4; Hermann, Miscell. Groning., iii, 588).

(4) From the date-trees (σαμαριταίς) in the neighborhood of Jerusalem or Jericho (Bartolucci, Bibl. Rabbin., iii, 10; Gill, Comm. on Matt. x, 4).

(5) From נְסָרְתָן (={'soreerta}, Gill, L.c), a lea-thern apron, the name being applied to him as the bearer of the bag, and—"Judas with the apron" (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Matt. x, 4).

(6) From נְסָרְתָא, ascarn,—strangling (angina), as given after his death, and commemorating it (Lightfoot). The position of his name in the lists of the apostles, his sudden and unexpected death, and the disease tending to suffocation previously (Heimius, in Suicer, Thes. a.v., Ισχαρίας). This is mentioned also as a meaning of the name by Origen, Tract. in Matt. xxxvii.

2. Personal Notices.—Of the life of Judas, before the appearance of his name in the lists of the apostles, we know absolutely nothing. It must be left to the sagacious vision of a poet (Keble, Lyra Innocentium, ii, 13) or the fantastic fables of an apocryphal Gospel (Thilo, Cod. Apoc. N. T., Evang. Infantum, c. 85) to portray the infancy and youth of the traitor. His call as an apostle implies, however, that he had previously declared himself a disciple. He was drawn, as the others were, by the preaching of the Baptist, or his own Messianic hopes, or the "gracious words" of the new teacher, to leave his former life, and to obey the call of the Prophet of Nazareth. What baser and more selfish motives may have been the cause of his choice or the cause of the fact that he selected the last of the apostles, that is a question we can only judge by reasoning backwards from the sequel. Gifts of some kind must have been, rendering the choice of such a man not strange to others, not unfit in itself, and the function which he exercised afterwards among the Twelve may indicate what they were. The fact, however, that in the lists of the apostles in the Synoptic Gospels, is due, it may be imagined, to the infamy which afterwards rested on his name, but, prior to that guilt, it would seem that he externally differed in no marked particular from the other apostles, and he doubtless exercised the same mission of preaching and miracles as the rest (Matt. x, 4; xxxvi, 14-47; Mark iii, 19; iv, 10, 43; Luke vi, 16; xxii, 3, 47, 48; John vi, 71; xii, 4, xiii, 2; xiv, 22; xviii, 2, 3). A.D. 27.

The gerrms (see Stier's Words of Jesus, at the passages where Judas is mentioned of the evil, in all likelihood, unfolded themselves gradually. The rules to which the Twelve were subject in their first journey (Matt. x, 9, 10) sheltered him from the temptation that would have been most dangerous to him. The new form of life, of which we find the traces in Luke viii, 3, brought him, as it were, into an unknown world. He was recognised as a body, travelling hither and thither with their Master, receiving money and other offerings, and redistributing what they received to the poor, it became necessary that some one should act as the steward and almoner of the small society, and this fell to Judas (John xii, 6; xiii, 29), either as having the gifts that qualified him for it, or, as we may conjecture, from his character, because he sought it, or, as some have imagined, in rotation from time to time. The Galilean or Judean peasant (we have no reason for thinking that his station differed from that of the other apostles) found himself intrusted with larger sums of money than before (the three hundred denarii of John xiiii, 8 are spoken of as a sum which could be reasonably trusted with, and with this there came covetousness, unfaithfulness, embezzlement. It was impossible after this that he could feel at ease with one who asserted so clearly and sharply the laws of faithfulness, duty, unselfishness; and as the words of Jesus, "Have I not chosen you Twelve, and one of you is a devil?" (John vi, 70) indicate that even then, though the greed of immediate or the hope of larger gain kept him from "going back," as others did (John vi, 66), hatred was taking the place of love, and leading him on to a fiendish malignity. The scene is Bethany (John xiii, 1-9; Matt. xxvi, 6-18; Mark xiv, 3-9) showed how deeply the canker had eaten into his soul. The warm outpouring of love calls forth no sympathy. He utters himself, and suggests to others, the complaint that it is a waste. Under the plea of caring for the poor he covers his own miserable theft. The narrative that follows (Matt. xvi, Mark xiv) tells us this history in close connection (apparently in order of time) with the fact of the betrayal. During the days that intervened between the supper at Bethany and the paschal or quasi-paschal gathering, he appeared to have concealed his treachery. He went with the other disciples to Bethany to attend the funeral of the child on the acted parable of the barren and condemned tree (Mark xi, 20-24), and shared the vigil in Gethsemane (John xviii, 2). At the beginning of the Last Supper he is present, looking forward to the consummation of his guilt as drawing nearer every hour. All is at first as if he were still faithful. He is admitted to the feast. His feet are washed, and for him there are the fearful words, "Ye are clean, but not all." At some point during the meal (see below) come the sorrowful words which showed him that his design was known. "One of you shall betray me," Others, in their sorrow and confusion, "Is it I?" He, too, must ask the same question, lest he should seem guilty (Matt. xxvi, 25). He alone hears the answer. John only, and through him Peter, and the traitor himself, understand the meaning of the act which pointed out that he was the guilty one (John xiii, 26). After this both Peter and Jesus and the other disciples are convinced with the word he had hitherto uttered. Then he completes the sin from which even those words might have drawn him back. He knows that garden in which his Master and his companions had so often rested after the weary work of the day. He comes, accompanied by a band of officers and servants (John xviii, 3), with the wretch which was probably the usual salutation of the disciples. The words of Jesus, calm and gentle as they were, showed that this was what the spirit of the treachery, and the suffering it inflicted more acute (Luke xxii, 48).

What follows in the course of that night the Gospels do not record. Not many students of the N.T. will follow Heumann and archbishop Whately (Essays on Danger) in the hypothesis that Judas was the "other disciple" that was known to the high-priest, and brought Peter in (comp. Meyer on John xviii, 15). It is possible, indeed, that because he was in league with the high-priest's officers should return with them to wait the issue of the trial. Then, when it was over, came the reaction. The fever of the crime passed away. There came back on him the recollection of the sinless righteousness of the Master he had wronged (Matt. xxvii, 3). He feels a keen remorse, and the guilt that had tempted him it becomes hateful. He will get rid of the accursed thing, will transfer it back again to those with who it had lured him on to destruction. They mock and sneer at the fool whom they have used, and then there comes over him the horror of great death. He is owned by his own sin with "an exceeding bitter cry," but he dares not turn, with any hope of pardon, to the Master whom he has betrayed. He hurries the money, which the priests refused to take, into the sanctuary (vadis) where they were assembled. For him there is no longer sacrifice or purification. He eats the last morsel of the son of man himself (John xvi. 12). "He departed, and went and hanged himself" (Matt. xxvii. 5). He went "unto his own place" (Acts i, 25). A.D. 29. See below.

With the exception of the stories already mentioned, there are but few traditions that gather round the history of Judas. It appears, however, in a strange, hardly intelligible way in the history of the wilder heresies of the 2d century. The sect of Cainites, consistent in their inversion of all that Christians in general believed, was reported to have honored him as the only apostle that was in possession of the true graces, to have made him the object of their worship, and to have had a gospel bearing his name (comp. Neander, Church Hist. i, 158; Ireneaus, adv. Haer. i, 35; Tertullian, De Prese. c. 47). For the apocryphal gospel (Ephippius, Haer. xxxviii. 1), see Fabricius, Codex Apoc. i, 382. See Gospels, Syrocanan.

3. Our Lord's Object in his Selection as an Apostle.—The choice was not made, we must remember, without a prevision of its issue. "Jesus knew from the beginning . . . who should betray him" (John vi, 64); and the distinctness with which that evangelist records the successive stages of the guilt of Judas, and his Master's discernment of it (John xii, 4; xiii, 2, 27), leaves with us the impression that he, too, shrank instinctively (Bengel describes it as "singularis antipathia," Gnomon N. Test. on John vi, 64) from a nature so opposed to his own. He could not have expected fully to solve the question why such a man was chosen for such an office, nor is it our province to sound all the depths of the divine purposes, yet we may, without presumption, raise an inquiry on this subject.

(1.) Some, on the ground of God's absolute foreknowledge, contend with Ullmann, with Calvin, that the judgments of God are as a great deep, and with Ullmann (Sündenjung. Jesu, p. 97), that Judas was chosen in order that the divine purpose might be accomplished through him. See PREDESTINATION.

(2.) Others, less dogmatic in their views, believe, with Eichhorn, with Achtemeier (Neutestamentliche Theologie, § 77), that there was a discernment of the latent germs of evil, such as belonged to the Son of Man, in his insight into the hearts of men (John ii, 25; Matt. ix, 4; Mark xii, 15), yet not such as to exclude emotions of sudden sorrow or anger (Mark iii, 6), or astonishment (Mark vi, 5; Luke vii, 9), admitting the thought "with men this is impossible, but not with God." Did he, in the depth of that insight, and in the fulness of his compassion, seek to overcome the evil which, if not conquered, would be so fatal? It gives, at any rate, a new meaning and force to many passages of scripture referring to remission, if it is true that they either have been spoken in the hearing of Judas, and may have been designed to make him conscious of his danger. The warnings as to the impossibility of a service divided between God and mammon (Matt. vi, 19-34), and the destructive power of the "cares of this world," and the "riches of unrighteousness" (2 Cor. iii, 19, 22, 23), the pointed words that spoke of the guilt of unfaithfulness in the "unrighteous mammon" (Luke xvi, 11), the proverb of the camel passing through the needle's eye (Mark x, 30), must have fallen on his heart as meant specially for him. In the parable of the two sons that heard the question, Who, then, can be saved? (Mark x, 26). Of him, too, we may say that, when he sinned, he was "kicking against the pricks," letting slip his "calling and election," frustrating the purpose of his Master in giving him so high a work, and educating him for it (compare Chrysostom, Hom. on Matt. xxvi, xxvii, John vi).

(3.) But to most persons these will appear to be arbitrary or reconcile arguments. Important reasons of a different character are, more, we think, owned by the son of man. He had a great number of other reasons. He had the soul he was to lose; he had the soul that contained the secret of his life; he had the soul of one who knew the procedure, and they are not very far to seek. The presence of such a false friend in the company of his immediate disciples was needed, first of all, to complete the circle of Christ's trials and temptations. He could not otherwise have known by personal experience what many of them could not have known, but some who were most likely to be of a sacrificing, humble, and uncomplaining nature. For the deceit and treachery of Judas he would not have been in all things tempted like his brethren. Then on this account it was evident, by his very situation, that when the Master found the man whom he sought, he might slay the traitor. Yet it was not so that Judas was used as an instance of a particular sin. Judas was not used as an instance of the guilt of a person who was more, because he was a true believer. It was not the case that Judas was a man who knew if he was saved or not. It is not the case that Judas was so useful a man, and Judas was not a good man. It is not the case that Judas was a man who was deceived. But it is the case that Judas was the man who was to enter into David's heritage, and rise from the dust David's throne. Of the things written in the Psalms concerning him—written there as derived from the death of David's soul experience and sharp conflict with evil, but destined to remain in a still greater conflict than he—few have more affecting prominence given to them than those which relate to the hardened wickedness, base treachery, and reprobate condition of a false friend, whose words were smooth as butter, but whose actions were drawn swords, who ate of his meat, but lifted up his head against him (comp. Ps. xlix, xviii, xliii, xiii, 18; and see Aithiophiel). Other prophecies also, especially two in Zechariah (x, 12, 13; xiii, 6), waited for their accomplishment on such a course of ingratitude and treachery as that pursued by Judas. Further, the relation in which this false and unfaithful and treacherous man stood to the rest of the Master's followers was of great importance for his presence and agency. It was well that those who stood at a greater distance from the Saviour failed to discover any fault in him; that none of them, when the hour of trial came, could say of him, as of the man of Galilee, that the word of prediction had been exercised, and the most anxious efforts had been made to enable them to do so. But it was much more that even this bosom friend, who had been privy to all his counsels, and had seen him in his most unguarded moments, was equally incapable of finding any evil in him; he could not betray Jesus in his enemies, but he could furnish these enemies with no proof of his criminality; nay, with the bitterness of death in his soul, he went back to testify to them that, in delivering up Jesus, he had betrayed innocent blood. What more conclusive evidence could the world have had that our Lord was the Messiah? Even the very event by which the appearance of such a person as Judas among the immediate attendants of Jesus was needed as an example of the strength of human depravity—how it can lurk under the most sacred professions, subseit in the holiest company, live and grow amid the clearest light, the most solemn warnings, the tenderest entreaties, and the divinest works. The instruction afforded by the incarnation and public ministry of the Son of God would not have been complete without such a memorable exhibition by its side of the darker aspects of human nature: the fact, that such materials required for her future warning and admonition: and on this account also there was a valid reason for the calling of one who could act the shameful part of Judas Iscariot.

4. Motives of Judas in the Betrayal of his Master. The Scripture account leaves those to conjecture (comp. Neander, Leben Jesu, § 264). The mere love of money may have been strong enough to make him clasp at the biree offered him. He came, it may be, expecting more (Matt. xxvi, 15); he will take that. He has lost the chance of dealing with the three hundred denarii; it will be something to get his old back. It may have been that he felt that his Master saw through his hidden guilt, and that he hastened on a crisis to avoid the shame of open detection. Mingled with this there may have been some feeling of vindictiveness, a vague, confused desire to show that he had power to stop the career of the teacher who had reproved him. Had the words that spoke of "the burial of" Jesus, with the Lazarus and the seven thousand, been instrumental in any conspiracies of the priests, led him at last to see that the Messianic kingdom was not as the kingdoms of this world, and that his dream of power and wealth to be enjoyed in it was a delusion? (Ewald, Gesch. Israel, v, 441-446). There may have been the thought that, after all the literature and analysis, that sixty years might prove his innocence, or by some supernatural manifestation effect his escape (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 886; andWhitby on Matt. xxvii, 4). Another motive has been suggested (compare Neander, Leben Jesu, l. c.; and Whately, Essays on Dangers to Christian Faith, and those three) an entirely different kind, arising altogether the character of the act. Not the love of money, nor revenge, nor fear, nor disappointment, but policy, a subtle plan to force on the hour of the triumph of the Messianic kingdom, the belief that for this service he would receive as high a place as Peter, or James, or John. Of this it will make the priest the traitor. If he could place his Master in a position from which retreat would be impossible, where he would be compelled to throw himself on the people, and be raised by them to the throne of his father David, then he might forge for himself the most brilliant of all possible conclusions, with all his desires for wealth and power gratified to the full. Ingenious as this hypothesis is, it fails for that very reason. It attributes to the groveling peasant a subtlety in forecasting political combinations, and planning stratagems accordingly, which is hardly compatible with his character and learning, hardly consistent either with the pettiness of the faults into which he had hitherto fallen. It is characteristic of the wide, far-reaching sympathy of Origen that he suggests another motive for the suicide of Judas. Despairing of pardon in this life, he would rush on into the world of the dead, and there receive his just reward, among his own kind, his bowels gutted. (5) That the work of suicide was but half accomplished, and that, the halter breaking, he fell (probably from some elevated place, see Hackett, Illustra. of Script. p. 266) with such violence that his abdomen burst with the fall. (6) That for this reason, and not because the priests had bought him with the price of blood, the field was called Acededama. But it may readily be supposed that the potter's field which the priests had bought was the same as that in which the traitor met so terrible a death. See Acededama.

7. On the occasion of Judas's final salvation, it is difficult to see how any dispute could well arise in view of his self-murder (comp. 1 John iii, 15). But aside from this, two statements seem to mark his fate in the other world as distinctly a reprobate one.

(1) His unmitigated remorse, as expressed in Matt. xxvii, 5. This passage has often been appealed to as illustrating the difference between metaphysis and metaphysis. It is questionable, however, how far the N. Test. writers recognise that distinction (compare Grotius, ad loc.). Still more questionable is the notion that Matthew describes his disappointment at a result so different from that which he had hoped for. Yet this is nevertheless clearly an instance of "the sorrow of the world that worketh death" (2 Cor. vii, 10). See Repentance.

(2) His "going to his own place" (Acts i, 25), where the words ἐκβιοῦσα ἀπόσπασεν of the old manuscripts, probably meant to express the same impression of some dark region in Gehenna. Lightfoot and Gill (ad loc.) quote passages from Rabbinical writers who find that meaning in the phrase, even in Gen. xxxii, 55, and Num. xxiv, 25. On the other hand, it should be remembered that interpreters reject that explanation (compare Meyer, ad loc.), as that one great Anglican divine (Hammond, Comment, on N. Test. ad loc.) enters a distinct protest against it. Similarly
Dr. Clarke (Commentary, ad loc.) argues against the whole of our conclusions respecting the violent death of Judas, but his reasoning, as well as that of the other cases named, is far from satisfactory.

8. Literature.—Special treatises on the character of Judas are the following: Zandt, Comment, de Judae prodiore (Lips. 1679); Rau, Anmerk. s. d. Character des Judas (Lemgo, 1778); Schmidt, Apologia d. Judas, in his Exeget. Beitr, i. 18; ii. 342; Lechien, De culpa Judae (Sedul. 1785); Dahm, Judae Ieschiordis (Heidelberg, 1810); Schollmeyer, Jesus und Judas (Lüneb. 1886); Augusti, Thol. Bibl. i, 497, 590; Ferency, De consoiso proditionis Judae (Utr. 1892); Gerling, De Judae siccce carnem conivissa (Hal. 1744); Heinekenst, De Judae Iscor. (Vithec. 1712); Philipp, Ueb. d. Verdorther Judae (Naumb. 1754); Rütz, De Herode et Judae (Hass. 1789); Journ. Sac. Lit. Jud. 1863.

12. A Jew residing at Damascus in the Straight street at the time of Paul's conversion, to whose house Ananias went (Acts ix, 11). A.D. 30. "The 'Straight Street' may with little question be identified with the 'Street of Bazaars,' a long, wide thoroughfare, penetrating from the southern gate into the heart of the city, which, as all the Syro-Greek and Syro-Roman towns, it intersects in a straight line. The so-called 'House of Judas' is still shown in an open space called 'the Shekh's Place,' a few steps out of the 'Street of Bazaars': it contains a square room with a stone floor, partly walled off for a tomb, shown to Mammreli (Early Tr., Bohn, p. 494) as the 'tomb of Ananias.' The house is an object of curiosity (1541, in 1744), respected by Christians as well as Jews (Stanley, Syr. and Pal., p. 412; Conybeare and Howson, i, 102; Pococke, i, 119). See DAMASCUS."—JUDAS-LIGHT.

13. Surnamed BARBARAS, a Christian teacher sent from Jerusalem to Antioch along with Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiv, 27, 28). A.D. 47. He is supposed by some (see Grotius, Wolf, ad loc.) to be one of the seventy disciples, and brother of Joseph, also surnamed Barsabas (son of Sabas), who was proposed, with Matthias, to fill up the place of the traitor Judas (Acts i, 25); but others (Augusti, Ueber. d. Kathol. Br. ii, 86) identify him with the Judas Thaddaeus who was with Jesus in the面包 (iv, 29). Schott supposed that Barsabas means the son of Sabas, or Zabas, which he fancifully regards as an abridged form for Zabebed, and concludes that the Judas here mentioned was a brother of the elder James and of John. Judas and Silas are mentioned together (in the above description of the Church to determine the obligation of the Mosaic law as "prophets" and "chief men among the brethren" at the metropolis, "perhaps a member of the Presbytery." (Neander, Pl. and Tr., i, 123). After employing their prophetic gifts for the confirmation and support of the Christians in the faith, Judas went back to Jerusalem, while Silas was either retained at Antioch (for the reading Acts xiv, 64 is uncertain; and while some MSS. followed by the Vulgate, add minos Ιωαννος υπερ θρησκευω, the best omit the verse altogether) or speedily returned thereto. See Luke.

14. Son of one Jairus, and leader of a company of Jews during the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, from which he escaped by an underground passage: he was afterwards slain while leading the defence of the castle of Machærus against the Roman troopers (Josephus, War, vii, 6, 5).

Judas-Light, or Judas of the Paschal, was the name of a wooden imitation of the candle which held the real paschal in the seventh branch standing upright, the rest diverging on either side. See Walton, Sac. Archæol. a. v.

Judd, Gaylord, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Watertown, Conn., Oct. 7, 1874, and converted in 1885. He was licensed as a local preacher in 1909, and thus showed faithfully for this ministry. He entered the General Conference in 1921; was supernumerary in 1934; and died at Cedar, Tioga Co., N. Y., in 1859. He was a sound and evangelical preacher, and "had a good report of all men." Many souls were converted to the Christian ministry, and his memory is precious in the Susquehanna Valley, the principal field of his labors. —Minutes of Conferences, 1859, vii, 162.

Judd, Sylvester, a Unitarian minister of some note, was born in Westhampton, Mass., July 23, 1813, and was educated at Yale College. He was of Orthodoxy parentage, but shortly after the completion of his collegiate studies he changed his religious opinions, and went to Cambridge Divinity School to prepare for ministerial duties in the Unitarian Church. He was called to Augusta, Maine, and there spent his life. He died in 1853, "at the very beginning of a course of high usefulness, of a life which seemed essential to the Church." Judd was a man of rare and original ideas having a giving and as a literary character enjoyed a good reputation for ability. See Life and Character of the Rev. S. Judd (Bost. 1864), p. 531; Christian Examiner, 1853, p. 63 sq.

Judd, Willard, a Baptist minister, was born in Southington, Conn., Feb. 23, 1804. After teaching for a short time, he settled in Cannan, N. Y., and was licensed to preach in 1826. He then removed to Herkimer Co., and preached alternately in Salisbury and Oppenheim until Aug. 28, 1829, when he united with the Church in Salisbury. He continued his labors here with great success until 1835, when his health compelled him to abandon the ministry. In 1839 he accepted an appointment as classical teacher in Middlebury Academy, at Wyoming, which situation he held until his death in Feb. 1840. Mr. Judd published A Review of Professor Stuart's Work on Baptism (1836, and later revised and enlarged). A collection of several of his miscellaneous papers, with a brief memoir of his life, was published after his death.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 750.

Jude, or, rather, Judæ (Ἰωάννης, q. q. JUDE, see JUDA). There were two of this name among the twelve apostles—Judæ, called also LÉBRÈS and THADDÆUS (Matt. x, 4; Mark iii, 18), and Judas Iscariot. Judas is likewise the name of one of our Lord's brethren (Matt. xii, 40, 50, 53), but it is not agreed whether our Lord's brethren are named above with Judas (Luke, viii, 16, 18, 19; Acts i, 13) calls him Ιωάννης ἢ Ιωαννος, which in the English Auth. Ver. is translated "Judas, the brother of James." This is defended by Winer (Gramm. of N. T. Dict.), Arnaud (Récit. Crat. sur l'Histoire de Jude), and accepted by Burton, Aldred, Tre- gelles, Michaelis, etc. The elliptical ἢ Ιωάννης ἢ Ιωαννος is supplied by the old Syriac translator (who was unacquainted with the Epistle of Jude, the writer of which calls himself Ιωάννης ἢ Ιωαννος, Jude, verse 1), with the word ἢ, and not brother. We see it in Judæus Thadathæus (see notes for us to 1 Tim. xiv, 5), but the opinion that our Lord's brethren were children of Joseph by a former wife (Eacha or Salome, according to an apocryphal tradition), which was the sentiment of the majority of the fathers (still received in the Oriental Church). er the opinion adopted in the Western Church, and first broached by Jerome (Cont. Heliand.), that the brethren of our Lord were his cousins, as being children of Mary, the wife of Clopas, who must therefore be considered as the same with Alpheus. If we consider James, the brother of Joseph, and one of the Twelve, Jude, the brother of James, must consequently be placed in the same category; but if they are one and the same, Jude must be considered as the person who is numbered with our Lord's apostles. The most plausible solution of this question is, that the epithet of Jude the apostle is given by the early Christian writers to the brother of James and Judas, and not to Jude, mentioned among the apostles, as also the authors of the epistles bearing their respective names, being half-brothers of Christ, as the reputed son of the common parent Joseph. See ALPHEUS; JAMES; JOSEPH; MART.

The tradition referred to as to the time of the vocation of the apostle Jude to that dignity. Indeed, the only circumstance relating to him which is recorded in the Gospels consists in the question put by him to our Lord (John xiv, 22): "Joshua saith unto him (not Iscariot), Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world?" Nor have we any account given of his proceedings after our Lord's resurrection, for the traditioiary notices which have been preserved of him rest on no very certain foundation (Lardner's History of the Apostles). There may be some truth in the tradition which connects him with the foundation of the church at Edessa; though here again there is much confusion, and doubt is thrown over the account by its connection with the worthless fiction of "Abgarus, king of Edessa" (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i. 13; Jerome, Comm. in Matt. x). Niceneopliaus (Hist. Eccl. ii. 40) makes Jude die in Asia, in the summer after the ascension. He makes him go to Palestine, Syria, and Arabia. The Syrian tradition speaks of his abode at Edessa, but adds that he went thence to Assyria, and was martyred in Phoenicia on his return; while that of the West makes Persia the field of his labors and the scene of his martyrdom. Jude the apostle is one of the Twelve, and the brother of James the Less, and the apostle Simon (the same, also, of one of our Lord's brethren), on the 8th of October. Eusebius gives us an interesting tradition of Hegesippus (Hist. Eccl. iii. 20, 32) that two grandsons of Jude, "who, according to the flesh, was called the Lord's brother" (comp. 1 Cor. ix, 3), were seized and carried to Rome by order of Domitian, whose apprehensions had been excited by what he had heard of the mighty power of the kingdom of Christ; but that the emperor having discovered their answers to his inquiries, and the appearance of their hands, that they were poor men, supporting themselves by their labor and their art, took pity on them, and dismissed them, and ordered to be put in chains till the time of Trajan. Niceneopliaus (i. 23) tells us that Jude's wife was named Mary. For further discussion, see Bertholdt, Einl. v, 2673; vi, 31, 79; Perani Vita Apostol. p. 166; Asseman, Biblioth. JUDE, EPISCOPE OF. The last in order of the catholic episcopies.

1. Author. The writer of this epistle styles himself, verse 1, "Jude, the brother of James" (αδελφὸς Ἰωάννου), and has usually been identified with the apostle Judas Lebbeus or Thaddaeus, called by Luke (vi, 16) ὦμοίως Ιωάννου, A. V. "Judas, the brother of James." It has been seen above that this mode of supplying the elliptic, though plausible in itself, is uncertain in its application, and that Jesus leueus loquendi, is, nevertheless, quite justifiable, although there are strong reasons for rendering the words "Judas, the son of James." Jerome, Tertullian, and Origen among the ancients, and Calmet, Calvin, Hammond, Hänlein, Lange, Vatablus, Arnaud, and Tregelles among the moderns agree in regarding the epistle to the apostle. Whether it were the work of an apostle or not, it has from very early times been attributed to "the Lord's brother" of that name (Matt. xiii, 55; Mark vi, 3); a view in which Origen, Jerome, and (if indeed the Adumbrations are genuine) the Jamis Ammonius Alexandrinus agree; which is implied in the words of Chrysostom (Hom. 48 in Joann.), confirmed by the epigraph of the Syriac versions, and is accepted by most modern commentators—Arnaud, Bengel, Burton, Hug, Jesseis, Ohlhausen, Tregelles, etc. The objection that has been felt by Neander, and by the more recent opponents of the critical method, was, though he had been "the Lord's brother" he would have directly styled himself so, and not merely "the brother of James," has been anticipated by the author of the "Adumbrations" (Bunsen, Anwelt. Ante-Nicene, i, 350), who says, Jude, who wrote the catholic Epistle, brother of the sons of Alphaeus, wrote it extremely reluctantly, and that he was aware of his relationship to the Lord, did not call himself his brother; but what said he? "Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ" as his Lord, but "brother of James." We may easily believe that it was through humility, and a true sense of the altered relations between them and him who had been declared to be the Son of God with power . . . by the resurrection from the dead" (comp. 2 Cor. v, 16), that both Jude and James forbore to call themselves the brethren of Jesus. The arguments concerning the authorship of the epistle are ably summed up by Jensen (Jub. Lipp. 1821) and Arnaud (Roche, Critique sur l'Epitre de Jude, Strasb, 1851, transl. in the Brit. and For. Eccl. Rev. July, 1869); and, though it is by no means clear of difficulty, the most probable conclusion is that the author was Jude, one of the brethren of Jesus, and brother of James, as also the maternal uncle, the son of Alpheus. See BRETHREN OF OUR LORD.

2. Genuineness and Canonicity. Although the Epistle of Jude is one of the so-called Antilegomena, and its canonicity was questioned in the earliest ages of the Church, there never was any doubt of its genuineness among those by whom it was known. It was too unimportant to be a forgery; few portions of holy Scripture could, with reverence be it spoken, have been more easily spared; and the question was never whether it was the work of an impostor, but whether its author was of sufficient weight to warrant its admission into the canon. Josephus, an extremely reliable historian, declares in its favor, and the more widely it was known the more generally it was received as canonical, until it took its place without further dispute as a portion of the volume of holy Scripture. See ANTILEGOMENA.

This epistle is not cited by any of the apostolic fathers; the passages which have been adduced as containing allusions to it (Hermas, Post. Viss. iv, 3; Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. ch. xi; Polycarp, Ep. ad Phil. ch. iii) presenting no certain evidence of such. It is, however, formally quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Paedog. iii. 9, 17, 35), and the Scripturists. Eusebius testifies (Hist. Eccl. v, 14) that he treated it in his Hypotyposeis; it is also treated in the Adumbrations.
JUDE, EPISTLE OF

ascribed to Clement, and preserved in a Latin version.

Tertullian refers to the epistle as that of Jude the apostle (De Habil. Mulieb. ch. iii). It appears in the Muratori Fragmenta as being only a letter of bishop Alexandrian, repeatedly refers to it, and occasionally as the work of the apostle Jude (Hom. in Matt. xiii, 55, in Opp., ed. de la Rue, iii, 403; Cum in Ep. ad Rom., in Opp. iv, 519; Hom. in Jos., in Opp. ii, 411; De Princip., in Opp. i, 138, etc.); though in one place he speaks as if doubt was entertained by some, whether it were from the bishop of Alexandria, or from Jude himself (in Opp. Just. 814). It is not in the Peshito, and does not appear to have been known to the Syrian churches before the 4th century, near the close of which it is quoted by Ephraem Syrus (Opp. Sgr. i, 136). Eusebius ranks it among the Antilegomena, but this rather because it was not universally known than because known it was by any regarded with suspicion (Hist. Eccles. ii, 23; iii, 25).

By Jerome it is referred to as the work of an apostle (in Tit. i; Ep. ad Paulin. iii), and he states that, though suspected by some, in consequence of containing a quotation from the apocryphal book of Enoch, it had obtained such authority as to be reckoned part of the canonical Scriptures (Catal. Script. Eccles.).

From the 4th century onwards, the place thus conceded to it remained unquestioned (Westcott, Canon of the N. Test.). Thus the epistle is quoted by Malchian, a presbyter of Antioch, by the bishop of Alexandria, and by the bishops of Rome (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii, 30), and by Palladius, the friend of Chrysostom (Chrysostom, Opp. xiii, Dial. cc.18, 20), and is contained in the Laodicene (A.D. 383), in the Synopsis of Chrysostom, and in the Synopsis of Eusebius of Cæsarea.

Various reasons might be assigned for delay in receiving this epistle, and the doubts long prevalent respecting it. The uncertainty as to its author, and his standing in the Church; the unimportant nature of its contents, and the absolute absence of any reference to it in the Autentia Ep. Judae, Lapa. 1821.

There is nothing, however, in the epistle itself to cast suspicion on its genuineness; on the contrary, it rather impresses one with the conviction that it must have proceeded from the writer whose name it bears. Another, forging a work in his name, would hardly have omitted to make prominent the personality of Judas, and his relation to our Lord, neither of which comes before us in this epistle (Bleek, Einl. im. d. N. Test. p. 557). See Cases.

III. Time and Place of Writing.—There are few, if any, external grounds for deciding these points, and the internal evidence is but small.

1. The question of date is connected by many with that of its relation to 2 Peter (see below), and an earlier or later period has been assigned to it according as it has been considered to have been anterior or posterior to that epistle. Attempts have also been made to prove a late date for the epistle, from an alleged quotation in it from the apocryphal book of Enoch (verse 13); but it is by no means certain that the passage is a quotation from the now extant book of Enoch, and scholars have yet to settle when the book of Enoch was written, and that from this nothing can be inferred as to the date of this epistle.

From the character of the errors against which it is directed, however, it cannot be placed very early; though there is no sufficient ground for Schleiermacher's opinion that "in the last time" (Hebrews 9, verse 18), comp. 1 John ii, 18, Hebrews 6, verse 19) forbids our placing it in the apostolic age. It is true, the book of Enoch was written not later than c. A.D. 64 and 66, Davidson before A.D. 70, Credner A.D. 80, Calmet, Estius, Witsius, and Neander, after the death of all the apostles but John, and perhaps after the fall of Jerusalem; although considerable weight is given to the argument of De Wette (Eisen. im. N. Test. p. 300), (M cruc. Hom. in Matt. 814) is no assurance that anything had taken place, some warning would have been drawn from so signal an instance of God's vengeance on the "ungodly." From the allusion, however, to the preaching of the apostles, we may infer that it was among the later productions of the apostolic age; for it was written whilst persons were still alive who had heard apostolic preachers, but when this preaching was beginning to become a thing of the past (ver. 17). On the other hand, again, if the author were really the brother of Jesus, especially an elder brother, we cannot well suppose him to have lived much beyond the middle of the first century. We may therefore conjecturally place it about A.D. 66.

2. There are still less data from which to determine the place of writing. Burton, however, is of opinion that inasmuch as the descendants of "the Judas, the brother of James, and the rest of the circumcision, dwelt at Jerusalem," and mention of the places of the seat of the apostle, were found in Palestine, he probably "did not absent himself long from his native country," and that the epistle was published there, since he styles himself "the brother of James," an expression most likely to be used in a country where James was well known (Eccles. Hist. i, 394). With this locality will agree all the above considerations as to date.

IV. Persons to whom the Epistle is addressed.—These are described by the writer as "the called who are sanctified in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ." From the resemblance of some parts of this epistle to the second and third of John, and in the peculiar qualities of the epistle, were found in Palestine, he probably "did not absent himself long from his native country," and that the epistle was published there, since he styles himself "the brother of James," an expression most likely to be used in a country where James was well known (Eccles. Hist. i, 394). With this locality will agree all the above considerations as to date.

V. Object, Contents, and Errors inveighed against.—The purpose which the writer had in view is stated by himself. After the inscription, he says that, intending to write concerning salvation, learning that it was, he was, compelled to utter a solemn warning in defence of the faith, imperilled by the evil conduct of corrupt men (ver. 8). Possibly there was some observed outbreak which gave the occasion. The evil for a while had been working in secret,—"certain men crept in among the flock of God, dissevering the peace, speaking evil of our master and our saviour Jesus Christ, and not walking in the liberty of the Son, but keeping the tradition of the elders" (vers. 5-7).

The next describes minutely the character of those whom he censures, and shows how of old they had been prophetically marked out as objects of deserved vengeance (ver. 8-16). Then, turning to the faithful, he reminds them that the apostles had forewarned them that evil men would rise in the Church (ver. 17-19); exhorts them to maintain their own steadfastness; and concludes with an ascription of praise to him who alone could keep his people from falling (ver. 24, 25). The whole was thoroughly applicable to a time when iniquity was abounding; and the love of many waxing cold (Matt. xxiv, 12).

The design of such a train of thought is obviously to put the believers to whom the epistle was addressed on their guard against the misleading efforts of certain persons to whose influence they were exposed. Who these persons were, or to what class of errants they belonged, can only be matter of conjecture. Some, indeed (De Wette, Schwengler, Bleek), think the persons alluded to held no peculiar opinions, and were simply men of lax morals; but, from the manner in which the writer refers to them, it is evident that they were, to use the words of Paul (2 Tim. iii, 5), "seducers, perverted, corrupters of the gospel of Christ." These, however, are merely corruptly practised, but teachers of error as well."

Their opinions seem to have been of an antimonic character (ver. 4, 18, 19), but there is nothing to connect them, except in a very vague and distant way, with any of the later gnostic systems. The writer formally charges them with "denying," and even with "rescuing our Lord Jesus Christ," language which De Wette admits usually applies to error of doctrine, but which here, without any reason, would understand of feeling and conduct. The licentious courses in which they indulged led Clement of Alexandria to think that they were the prototypes of the Carcopitans and such like: "Of these," and such as these," he says, "I think that Jesus spoke prophetically in his epistle" (Strom. iii, 451, Syb.). But this does not imply that they had formed a system like that of the Carcopitans, but only that the notions and usages of one admixed themselves of the other. Perhaps there have been in all ages persons who have sought by perverted doctrine to gain a sanction for sensual indulgence, and such undoubtedly were found disturbing the peace and corrupting the purity of the churches of Christ in different places as early as the second and perhaps the first century. Against whom Jude writes are apparently of this class, but in their immorality the practical element was more prominent than the speculative.

VI. Style.—The main body of the epistle is well characterized by Alford (Gk. Test. iv, 147) as an impassioned invective, in the impetuous whirlwind of which the writer pours out his feelings, using the examples of divine vengeance on the ungodly; heaping epithet upon epithet, and piling image upon image, and, as it were, laboring for words and images strong enough to depict the polluted character of the licentious apostates against whom he is warning the Church; returning again and again to the subject, as though all language was insufficient to give an adequate idea of their profligacy, and to express his burning hatred of their perversion of the doctrines of the Gospel.

The epistle is said by De Wette (Eislet. in N. T. p. 306) to be entirely in good Greek, though there are some peculiarities of diction which have led Schmid (Eislet. i, 314) and Bertholdt (vi, 8194) to imagine an Aramaic original.

VII. Relation between the Epistle of Jude and 2 Peter.—The larger portion of this epistle (ver. 3-16) closely resembles in language and subject a part of the second Epistle of Peter (ver. 1-19). In both the heretical enemies of the Gospel are described in terms so similar as to preclude all idea of entire independence. Jude's known habit of quotation would seem to render the supposition most probable that he has borrowed from Peter. Dr. Davidson, however (Introct. to the N. Test. iii, 307), maintains the priority of Jude. As Jude's Epistle apparently emanated from Palestine, and (if the above date be correct) from Jerusalem, it may in some sort be regarded as an echo of Peter's admonitions uttered not long before at the Roman capital. This question will be more fully examined under Peter, second Epistle or.

VIII. Apocryphal Quotations.—This epistle presents one peculiarity, which, as we learn from Jerome, caused its authority to be impugned in very early times—the supposed citation of apocryphal writings (ver. 5, 14, 15).

1. The form of some of these passages, containing the reference to the context of the archangel Michael and the devil "about the body of Moses," was supposed by Origen to have been founded on a Jewish work called the "Assumption of Moses" (Ἀναπαύσις Μωίσεως), quoted also by Eusebius (ii, 629). Origen's words are expressed, "Which little work the apostle Jude has made mention of in his epistle" (De Principi. ii, 2; vol. i, p. 138); and some have sought to identify the book with the הָנָה הַנָּשָׁה, "The Demise of Moses," which is, however, proved by Michaelis (iv, 882) to be a modern composition. Attempts have also been made by Lardner, Macknight, Virtings, and others, to interpret the passage in question as a reference to the story of the journey of the Tabernacle (Num. xi, 24); by James (v, 17), and Stephen (Acts vii, 22, 28, 30). (See further, Zirkel, De Mosis ad Superos translatiio, Wurzcb. 1798.) See MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF.

2. As regards the supposed quotation from the book of Enoch, the question is not so clear whether Jude is making a citation from a work already known to his readers—which is the opinion of Jerome (l.c.) and Tertullian (who was, in consequence, inclined to receive the book of Enoch as canonical Scripture), and has been held by many modern critics—or is employing a tradi- tionary prophecy not at that time committed to writing (a theory which the words used, "Enoch prophesied, saying," ἐξορθοφθαιτον... ἐν τοῖς γενικ... seem rather to favor), but afterwards embodied in the apocryphal work already named. This is maintained by Tregelles (Horne's Introd. 10th edit., iv, 621), and has been held by Cave, Eusebius (Hist. eccl. viii, 11), and Calvin (comp. Jerome, Comm. in Eph. c. v, p. 647, 8; in Tit. c. i, p. 708). The present book of Enoch actually contains (ch. ii of The Book of Enoch, in Ethiopic and English, by Dr. Laurence, 3d ed. Lond. 1868) the very words cited by Jude; but some modern critics maintain that they are derived from that book out of Jude's epistle. See Enoch, BOOK OF.

But why should not an inspired author appropriate a piece of an apocryphal writing? If it contained elements of truth, or was simply apposite to his purpose, why should he not use it? He does not (as some al- locate) attribute to it any inspired authority, nor ever vouch for its accuracy. It is never objected in derogation of the apostle Paul that, both in speech and writing, he cited heathen authors, sometimes with a special reference (Acts xvii, 28; 1 Cor. xv, 38; Gal. v, 23; Titus i, 12). It has also been asserted that in various parts of the New Testament citations are alluded (through various citations) to several of the books commonly called apocryphal, and to other Jewish productions (see Gough's N.T. Test. Quotations, p. 276-296). Common provbers, we know, have been introduced into Scripture (1 Sam. xxiv, 19; 2 Pet. ii, 22, where the former part only of the prov-verb cited is from the Or Testament).

But there is no decisive proof that Jude could have seen the so-called book of Enoch. For, though this has been ascribed in part to the Maccabean times, and is said to have assumed its present shape prior to our Lord's advent (see Westcott, Introduction, p. 58, note), yet this is a theory on which critics are by no means agreed.
One of the latest has the question investigated, Prof. Volkmar, of Zurich (Zeitschrift der deutsch. mor.-gen. Gesellschaft, 1860), maintains that it was composed by one of the disciples of Rabbi Akiba, in the time of the sedition of Barcochba, about A.D. 132. Dr. Alford, in his notes on VOLKMAR'S statement inferred that "the book of Enoch was not only of Jewish, but of distinctly antichristian origin" (Proleg. to JUDE, p. 196). We are authorized, then, in believing that Jude merely incorporated into his epistle the tradition or copy of Enoch's prophecy, which was afterwards embodied in the book as we now have it. See Tradition.

IX. Commentaries.—Special exegetical helps on the whole Epistle of Jude exclusively are the following, of which we designate the most important by an asterisk prefixed: Didymus Alexandrinus, in Ep. Jude (in BIBL. MAX. P. v. B.; and B. P. Galland, vi.); Bell, Expositio (in Opp. v.); Luther, Auslegung (Wittenberg, 1524, 4to and 8vo); Maffe, Explicatio (Venet. 1567, 8vo); Ridley, Expositio (Lond. n. d. 16mo); De Bree, Expositio (Sagitt. 1582, 4to); Radeus, In Judea (Antw. 1584, Gen. 1599, 8vo); Dandus, Commentarius (in Iun. 1665, 8vo); Farsen, Commentarius (Coloni, 1595, 8vo); Juvenis, Nota (Lugd. cient Eastern analogy to suppose that they forfeited the judicial prerogative before they were overshadowed by the monarchy, and in David's time this is contrary to the tenor of history. During the oppression of Egypt the nascent people would necessarily have few questions at law to plead, and the Egyptian magistrate would take cognizance of them. As a matter of fact, Joseph and others of the existing judges in every town, etc., to choose their own colleagues, as vacancies fell, from among the limited number of persons who, being heads of families, were competent. Generally speaking, the reputation for superior wealth, as some guarantee against facilities for corruption, would add to the character of any person elected in connection with personal qualities, would tend to limit the choice to probably a very few persons in practice. The supposition that judicature will always be provided for is carried through all the books of the Law (see Exod. xxi, 6; xxii; Lev. xix, 15; Numb. xxxvi, 24; Deut. i, 16; xvi, 17; xxxv, 1). All that we know of the facts of later history confirms the supposition. The Hebrews were sensitive as regards the administration of justice; nor is the free spirit of their early commonwealth in anything more manifest than in the resentmment which followed the venal or partial judge. The fact that justice was not considered to be theAct of God largely contributed to keep up this spirit of independence, which is the ultimate check on all perverisions of the tribunal. The popular aristocracy (if we may so term it) of heads of tribes, sections of tribes, or families, is found to fall into two main orders of varying prominence, one of which, the sacerdotal, the other of the citizens, upward. The more common name for the higher order is "princes," and for the lower, "elders" (Judg. viii, 14; Exod. ii, 14; Job xxxii, 7, 8, 9; Ezra x, 8). These orders were the popular element of judicature. The other hand, the officio judges were imbued with a keen sense of allegiance to God as the Author of Law, and to the Covenant as his embodiment of it, and soon gained whatever forensic experience and erudition those simple times could yield; hence they brought to the judicial task the legal acumen and sense of general principles which complemented the other element. Thus the Hebrews really enjoyed much of the virtue of a system which allows separate provinces to judge and jury, although we cannot trace any such line of separation in their functions, save in so far as has been indicated above. To return to the first or popular branch, the need for the ex-officio judges arose from the occurrence of phraseology amid much diversity, that in every city these two ranks of "princes" and "elders" had their analogies, and that a variable number of heads of families and groups of families, in two ranks, were popularly recognised, whether with or without any form of election, as charged with the duty of administering justice. Souch (Judg. vii, 14) may be taken as an example. Evidently the ex-officio judges of Moses' choice would have left their successors when the tribe of Gad, to which Souch pertained (Josh. xiii, 27), settled in the other hand, the towns and what would be more simple than that the whole number of judges in that tribe should be allotted to its towns in proportion to their size? As such judges were mostly the head men by genealogy, they would fall into their natural oral places, and symmetry would be preserved. The Levites also were not entire, but were divided among the tribes; if and when they preserved their limits, there were probably few parts of Palestine beyond a day's journey from a Levitical city. One great goal which the priesthood had, in their jurisdiction, upon men's ordinary life was the custody in the sanctuary of the standard weights and measures, to which, in cases of dispute, reference was doubtless made. It is, however, reasonable to suppose that in most towns sufficiently exact models of them for all ordinary questions would be kept, since to refer to the sanctuary at Shiloh, Jerusalem, etc., in every case of dispute between dealers would be nugatory (Exod. xxx, 15; Numb. iii, 47; Exek. xlv, 12). Above all these, the high-priest in the anti-regal period was the resort in difficult cases (Deut. xvii, 12), as the chief jurist of the nation, and one who would, in case of need, be perhaps oracularly directed; yet we hear of none acting as judge save Eli, nor is any judicial act recorded of him—though perhaps his not re- stricting his son to be none but to fail in his judicial duties. Now the judicial authority of any such supreme tribunal must have wholly lapsed at the time of the events recorded in Judg. xix. It should not be forgotten that in some cases of “blood” the “con- gregation” themselves were to “judge” (Numb. xxxvi, 24). Thus in the case of Jotham, as thus in the regular course of constitutional law. It is also a fact of some weight, negatively, that none of the special deliverers called judges was of priestly lineage, or even became as much noted as Deborah, a woman. This seems to show that any central action of the high-priest on national unity was null, and of this supremacy, had it existed in force, the judicial prerogative was the main element. Difficult cases would include cases of appeal, and we may presume that, save so far as the authority of those special deliverers made itself felt, there was no judicial action from Joshua onwards. In the case of Jotham, the current phrase of those deliverers that they “judged” Israel during their term, shows which branch of their authority was most in request, and the demand of the people for a king was, in the first instance, that he might “judge them,” rather than that he might “mow the head of a king,” or Sam. viii, 4-17. The Peculiar Traits and Functions of the “Judges” in the Period designated by their Rule.—The station and office of these shophetim are involved in great obscurity, partly from the want of clear intimations in the history in which their exploits and government are recorded, and partly from the prejudice of parallelism in the history of other nations by which our notions might be assist- ed. The offices filled by Moses and Joshua, whose presence was so essential for the time and the occasion, were not at all involved in the general machinery of the He- brew government. They were specially appointed for particular services and the performance of which they were invested with extraordinary powers; but when their mission was accomplished, society reverted to its permanent institutions and its established forms of gov- ernment. As above seen, every tribe had its own he- roes; and the “shophetim” who presided over its affairs administered justice in all ordinary cases, and led the troops in time of war. His station resembled that of the Arabian emirs, or rather, perhaps, of the khans of the Tartar tribes inhabiting Persia and the countries further east. He was assisted in these important duties by the “subordinates” or officers, the chiefs of families, who formed his council in such matters of policy as affected their particular district, supported his decisions in civil or criminal inquiries, and commanded under him in the field of battle (Numb. xxvi, xxvii; Josh. vii, 16-18).

This was, in fact, the old patriarchal government, to which the Hebrews were greatly attached. It was an institution suited to the Wants of men who live dispersed in loosely connected tribes, and not to the wants and exigencies of a nation. It was in principle segregative, not aggregative, and although there are traces of unit- ed agreement through a congress of delegates, or rather, of national chiefs and elders of the tribes, this was an inefficient instrument of general government, seeing that it was only applicable or applied to great occasions, and could have no bearing on the numerous questions of an administrative nature which arise from day to day in every state, and which there should have existed. It was, therefore, that the judge, in his function of the king of the chosen people, and acting in them in his place—tabernacle. Here he was always ready, through his priest, to coun- sel them in matters of general interest, as well as in those having reference only to particular tribes; and to his court they were all required by the law to repair three times every year. Here, then, was the principle of a general administration, calculated and designed to unite the tribes into a nation by giving them a common government in all the higher and more general branches of administration, and especially for all the political and ecclesiastical relations of the com- munity. It was on this footing that the law destined the government of the Hebrews to proceed, after the pe- culiar functions of the legislator and the conqueror had been fulfilled. See TETZERACHT.

The fact is, however, that, through the perversity of the people, this settlement of the general government on theocratical principles was not carried out in its proper form and extent, and it is in this neglect we are to seek the necessity for those officers called judges who were from time to time raised up to correct some of the things which resulted from it. It is very evident from the whole history of the judges that, after the death of Joshua, the Israelites threw themselves back upon the segregative principles of their government by tribes, and all but utterly neglected, and for a long period del- ivered over to the wolves of that age, it is only after a general government was established. There was, in fact, no human power adequate to enforce them. They were good in themselves, they were gracious, they conferred high privileges, but they were enforced by no sufficient authority. No one was amenable to any tribunal for personal neglect or violation of the data, or for any in- vention or misappropriation of public affairs to the divine King. Omissions on these points involved the absence of the divine pro- tection and blessing, and were left to be punished by their consequences. The man who obeyed in this and other things was blessed; the man who did not was not blessed; and general obedience, with national blessing, and general disobedience with national punishment. The enormities and transgressions into which the people fell in consequence of such neglect, which left them an easy prey to idolatrous influences, are fully recorded in the Book of Judges. The people could not grasp the idea of a divine and invisible king; they could not bring themselves to recur to him in all those cases in which the judgment of a human king would have determined the course of action, or in which his arm would have worked for their deliverance. There- therefore it was that the Lord would command to the guidance of faithful men, who acted for the most part as agents of the divine will—regents of the invisible King, and who, holding their commission directly from him or with his sanction, would be more inclined to act as dependent vassals of Jehovah than kings, who, as members of royal dynasties, would come in contact with notions of inde- pendent rights and royal privileges, which would draw away their attention from their true place in the theoc- racy. In this greater dependence of the judges upon the divine King we see the secret of their institution. The Israelites were disposed to rest upon their separ- ate interests as tribes, and having thus allowed the standing general government to remain inoperative through disuse, they would, in case of emergency, have been disposed "to make themselves a king like the na- tional" had their attention not been directed to the ap- proach of the Assyrian enemy. It was thus, while they existed, the reason of our inability to find any similar office among other nations. In being thus peculiar it resem- bled the dictatorship among the Romans, to which office, indeed, that of the judges has been compared. But there is this great difference, that the dictator laid down his power as soon as the crisis which had called for its exercise had passed away, and in no case could this unwonted supremacy be retained beyond a limited period (Livy, i, 34; but the Hebrew judge remained invited with his high authority the whole period of his life, and is therefore usually described by the sacred historian as presiding to the end of his days over the tribes of the land. He was a man of peace and security which his military skill and counsel had, under the divine blessing, restored to the land.

It is usual to consider the judges as commencing their career with military exploits to deliver Israel from forexign oppression, but this is by no means invariably the case.
Eleazar the son of Arad, a mighty man, Deborah judged Israel before she planned the war against Jabin; and of Jair, Izban, Elon, and Abdon, it is at least uncertain whether they ever held any military command. In many cases it is true that military achievements were the means by which they elevated themselves to the rank of judges; but in general the appointment may be said to have varied with the exigencies of the times, and with the particular circumstances which in times of trouble would draw the public attention to persona who appeared suited by his gifts and influence to solve the crisis. It is noted that in questions arising between tribe and tribe, to administer public affairs, and to appear as their recognised head in their intercourse with their neighbors and oppressors. As we find that many of these judges arose during times of oppression, it seems to us that this last class of judges was a distinct class, and that much must have had a remarkable influence in the appointment of the judge. Foreigners could not be expected to enter into the peculiarities of the Hebrew constitution, and would expect to receive the proposals, remonstrances, or complaints of the people through some per-sion to represent the whole nation, or that part of it which their intercourse applied. The law provided no such officer except in the high-priest; but as the Hebrews themselves did not recognise the true operation of their theocracy, much less were strangers likely to do so.

On the officer they appointed to represent the body of the people, under circumstances which compelled them to deal with foreigners mightier than themselves, it would naturally devolve the command of the army in war, and the administration of justice in peace. This last was among ancient nations, and it is still in the East, the rule of the period when the Hebrews were a ruler, and the interference of the judges was probably confined to the cases arising between different tribes, for which the ordinary magistrates would find it difficult to secure due authority to their decisions.

In nearly all the instances recorded the appointment seems to have been by the free, unsolicited choice of the people. The election of Jephthah, who was nominated as the fittest man for the existing emergency, probably resembled that which was usually followed on such occasions; and probably, as in his case, the judge, in acccepting the office, took care to make such stipulations as he deemed necessary. The only cases of direct divine appointment are those of Gideon and Samson, and the last stood in the peculiar position of having been from before his birth ordained "to begin to deliver Israel." Deborah was called to deliver Israel, but was already a judge. Samuel was called by the Lord to be a prophet, but a judge, the whole nation, or that part of it which the people recognised as dwelling in him; and as to Eli, the office of judge seems to have devolved naturally, or, rather, ex-officio, upon him; and his case seems to be the only one in which the high-priest appears in the character which the theocratical institutions designed for him.

The following clear summary of their duties and priviileges is from Jahn (Hdbl. Archdol. II, i, 22 sq.; Heb. Commentwealth, Stowe's transl., § 28): "The office of judges or regents was held during life, but it was not hereditary; neither could they appoint their successors.
Their authority was limited by the law alone; and in doing, it may be presumed, in abeyance during the period of the judges, seem to have merged in the monarchy. The kingdom of Saul suffered too severely from external foes to allow civil matters much prominence. Hence of all the critical judicial cases one (1 Sam. xi, 13) was the mere remission of a penalty popularly demanded; the other the pronouncing of a sentence (ib. xiv, 44, 45), which, if it was sincerely intended, was overruled in turn by the right sense of the people. In David's reign it was evidently the rule for the king to hear causes, and not merely to be present, or even to preside by deputy (though this might also be included), the "fountain of justice" to his people. For this purpose, perhaps, it was prospectively ordained that the king should "write him a copy of the law," and "read therein all the days of his life" (Deut. xvii, 19, 10). The same class of cases which were reserved for Moses would probably fall to his lot, and the high-priest was, of course, ready to assist the monarch. This fact is further presumable from the fact that no officer analogous to a chief justice ever appears under the kings. It has been supposed that the same indifference to all Israel to David's policy caused an influx of such cases, and that advantage was artfully taken of this by Absalom (2 Sam. xv, 1-4); but the rate at which cases were disposed of can hardly have been slower among the ten tribes after David had become their king, than it was during the previous anarchy. It is not probable that David's uniformly successful wars wealth and population increased rapidly, and civil cases multiplied faster than the king, occupied with war, could attend to them, especially when the summary process customary in the East is considered. Perhaps the arrangements mentioned in 1 Chron. xxviii, 4; xxvi, 29; compare 1 Sam. vii, 32, were perhaps (including judges), of the 6000 Levites acting as "officers and judges," and amongst them specially "Chenenniah and his sons," with others, for the trans-Jordanic tribes, may have been made to meet the need of suitors. In Solomon's time, whose reign is described as being fertile in civil questions, the "wisdom to judge" was the fitting first quality (1 Kings iii, 9; comp. Psal. lxxi, 1-4).

As a judge Solomon shines "in all his glory" (1 Kings iii, 16). No criminal was too powerful for his justice, as some had been for his father's (2 Sam. iii, 39, 1 Kings ii, 5, 6, 33, 34). The examples of direct royal exercise of judicial authority are 2 Sam. i, 15; iv, 9-12, where sentence is summarily executed, and the supposed case of 2 Sam. xiv, 1-21. The denunciation of 2 Sam. xii, 5, 6, though not formally judicial, is yet in the same spirit. Solomon similarly proceeded in the case of Beeroth (1 Kings iv, 16), and the murder of his son Adonijah (1 Kings xiv, 5, 6). It is likely that royalty in Israel was ultimately unfavorable to the local independence connected with the judicature of the "princes" and "elders" in the territory and cities of each tribe. The tendency of the monarchy was doubtless to centralize, and we read of large numbers of king's officers appointed to this and cognate duties (1 Chron. xxiii, 4; xxvi, 39, 32). If the general machinery of justice had been, as is reasonable to think, deranged or retarded during a period of anarchy, the Levites afforded the fittest materials for its reorganization, fitting to some extent not only locally, and by special duties, exemptions, etc., from the mass of the population, they were more easily brought to the steady routine which justice requires, and, what is no less important, were, in case of neglect of duty, more at the mercy of the king (as shown in the case of the murderers of Absalom (2 Sam. xvi, 17)).

If the general machinery of justice had been, as is reasonable to think, deranged or retarded during a period of anarchy, the Levites afforded the fittest materials for its reorganization, fitting to some extent not only locally, and by special duties, exemptions, etc., from the mass of the population, they were more easily brought to the steady routine which justice requires, and, what is no less important, were, in case of neglect of duty, more at the mercy of the king (as shown in the case of the murderers of Absalom (2 Sam. xvi, 17)). But subsequently, when the Levites withdrew from the kingdom of the ten tribes, judicial elders probably again filled the gap. There they conducted the mock trial of Naboth (1 Kings xxi, 8-19). There is in 2 Chron. xix, 5, etc., a special notice of a reappointment of judges by Jehoshaphat, and of a distinct court, of appeal, perhaps, at Jerusalem, composed of Levitical and of lay elements. In the same place (as also in a previous one, 1 Chron. xxiii, 32) occurs a mention of the "king's masters" as a branch of jurisprudence. The rights of the prerogative having a constant tendency to encroach, and needing continual regulation, these were placed in the hands of a department somewhat like the English Exchequer.

One more change is noticeable in the pre-Babylonian period. The "princes" constantly appear as a powerful political body, increasing in influence and privileges, and having a fixed centre of action at Jerusalem, till in the time of Nehemiah they were probably in the hands of the duties of a privy council, and especially a collective jurisdiction (2 Chron. xxxviii, 21; Jer. xxvi, 10, 16). These "princes" are probably the heads of great houses in Judah and Benjamin, whose fathers had once been the pillars of local jurisdiction, but who, through the attractions of a court, and probably also under the constant alarm of hostile invasion, became gradually residents in the capital, and formed an oligarchy which drew to itself, amidst the growing weakness of the latter monarchy, whatever vigor was left in the state, and encroached on the sphere of justice. The employment in offices of trust and emolument would tend also in the same way, and such chief families would probably monopolize such employment. Hence the constant bane of the prophetic strain, denouncing the neglect, the perversion, the corruption of judicial functions, after the manner of Jer. ix, 8; xi, 10, 11; Jer. ii, 8; vi, 15, 17; vii, 5; Ezek. xxii, 27; Jer. xiv, 8, 9; Hos. v, 10; vii, 5, 7; Amos v, 7, 15, 24; vi, 12; Hab. 1, 4, etc.). Still, although far changed from its broad and simple basis in the earlier period, the administration of justice had little resembling the "st and rigid system of the later thee." This exact change arose from the fact that the patriarchal seniority, degenerate and corrupted as it became before the captivity, was by that event broken up, and a new basis of jurisdiction had to be sought for. See SANEDRIN.

For the details of procedure, little more is known than may be gathered from the two examples, Ruth iv, 2, of a civil, and 1 Kings xxii, 8-14, of a criminal character; to which, as a specimen of royal summary jurisdiction, may be added the well-known "Judgment" of Solomon. Boaz apparently empanelled, as it were, his "elders" when he meets "in the gate," the well-known site of the Oriental court, and cites the other party by "Ho, such a one," and the people appear to be invoked as attesting the legality of the proceeding. The whole affair bears an extemporaneous aspect, which may, however, be of secondary merit (compare John xix, 19). The transactions of Job, that of the "conflicting waters," and especially the "conflicting waters," and especially the appeal of Job xix, 19, we have a wish expressed that a "time to plead" might be "set" (comp. the phrase of Roman law, diem dicere). In the case of the involuntary homicide seeking the city of refuge, he was to make out his case to the satisfaction of his elders (Josh. xx, 4), and if failing, or the congregation deciding against his claim to sanctuary there (though how its sense was "to be taken does not appear), he was not put to death by act of public justice, but left to the "avenger of blood" (Deut. xxi, 12). The expressions between "blood and blood" and "blood and blood," are almost always a presumption of legal arising. The latter expression seeming to imply something like what we call a "cross-suit." We may infer from the sanctimony, or rather, almost entire absence of direction as regards forms of procedure, that the legislator was content to leave them in the hands of the persons concerned, or, if being impossible by any jurisprudential devices to anticipate chimacne. It is an interesting question how far judges were allowed to receive fees of suitors: Michaelis reasonably presumes that none were allowed or customary, and it seems, from the words of 1 Sam. xii, 5, the such transactions as were done "before the Lord" were not.

There is another question how far advocates were usual. There is no reason to think that, until the period of Greek influence, when we meet with words based on evrof the highest importance, as giving a key to the following portion. It is a summary view of the history: the people fall into idolatry; they are then oppressed by a foreign power; upon their repentance they are delivered by a judge, after whose death they relapse into idolatry.

2. Body of the History (chap. iii, 7-xxvi). The words "And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord," which had already been used in ch. ii, 11, are employed to introduce the history of the thirteen judges comprised in this book. An account of six of these thirteen is given at greater or less length. The account of Gideon, in the remaining two, is very short, and is added as a connecting link to the longer narratives. These narratives are as follows:

(1) The deliverance of Israel by Othniel, iii, 7-11.
(2) The history of Ehud (and in iii) that of Shamgar, iii, 12-31.
(3) The deliverance by Deborah and Barak, ch. iv-v.
(4) The whole passage in vi-x, 5. The history of Gideon and his son Abimelech is contained in chap. vi-x, and followed by the notice of Tola (x, 1, 2) and Jair (x, 3, 5). This is the only case in which the history of a judge is continued until that of his children. But the exception is one which illustrates the lesson taught by the whole book. Gideon's sin in making the ephod is punished by the destruction of the institution of the priest's office by his son Abimelech, with the help of the men of Shechem, who, in their turn, become the instruments of each other's punishment. In addition to this, the short reign of Abimelech would seem to be recorded as being an unauthorized and profligate reign. The question generally goes:

(5) Ch. x, 6-xii, 7, to which is added the mention of Ibzan (xii, 8-10), Elon (11, 12), Abdon (13-15).
(6) The history of Samson, consisting of twelve exploits, and forming three groups connected with his love of three Philistine women, chap. xiii-xvi. We may perhaps refer to this portion of the book that it is almost entirely a history of the wars of deliverance: there are no sacerdotal allusions in it; the tribe of Judah is not alluded to after the time of Othniel; and the greater part of the judges belong to the northern half of the kingdom.

A closer inspection, however, discloses a more interior, and therefore truer arrangement of this, the main part of the book, and one better calculated to bring out the theocratic government of God, which, as we have seen in the preceding article, was the cardinal idea of the office known as "the judge." This is further confirmed by the commission by the Angel of the Covenant, who went before the people in all their marches (Exod. iii, 1-6; xiii, 21; xiv, 19, etc.), and to fit him for his office Moses was filled with the Spirit of the Lord, which was given to him in a measure apparently not given to any mere man after him. But the Spirit, which was communicated to a certain degree to men for various tasks in connection with the Church and people, was especially communicated from Moses, in whom the fulness resided (fulness such as was possible under the Old-Testament dispensation), to the seventy elders who assisted him in the administration, and to Joshua, who was called to be his successor (Num. xi, 17, 25; xiiii, 16, 18, 20). Agreeably to this, the true grouping of the events in the time of the judges must be looked for in connection with the coming forth of the Angel of the Covenant, and the corresponding mission of the Spirit of the Lord into the hearts of his people. No less is this the case with the coming forth of the judgment of the Lord (chap. i, ii, 11); and with the coming forth of the Angel of God (chap. ii, 9, 12). The only possible rendering is, "the Angel of the Lord," "the Angel of God," and this is amply confirmed by the attributes of Godhead which are assigned to the judge in the narratives.) Yet, while we notice these epochs of special manifestation, we must remember that God was always present with his people, at the head of their government, and working in a more orderly manner in calling out agents for preserving and recovering the visible Church and holy nation. Besides, there was the standing method of consulting him by Urim and Thummim.
through the high-priest, and there was his way of expressing in advance the blessing of the people by prophesies; of both of these there are recorded instances in this book, although the prophetical agency is rare and feeble till the time of Samuel (1 Sam. iii, i, 19-21), with whom the succession of prophethood began (Acts iii, 22).

Now the appearance of the Angel of the Lord and the Spirit in a special sense is four times noticed in the body of the history, and nowhere else, except in the poetic allusion in ch. v, 23. (1) The Angel of Jehovah went up from Gilgal to Bochim, and reproached the people for neglecting his work of redemption; threatening to help them no more; yet in reality the very object of this threat, suggesting that his free grace would help them, as in fact they immediately gained a victory over their own sinful selves (i, 1-5). The outward victory over oppressors was soon gained by Ochniel (iii, 10) when "the Spirit of the Lord came," literally was, "upon him, and he judged Israel, and went out to war." (2) The Angel of the Lord came and gave a mission to Gideon to deliver Israel (vi, 11, etc.), and to fit him for it (ver. 34), "the Spirit of the Lord came upon," literally clothed, "Gideon, and he blew the trumpet." (3) A passage (x, 10-16) is so similar to the Angel and Gideon that we do not know how to avoid the impression that it is the Angel himself who speaks in that immediate manner which is peculiar to this book; certainly there is no hint of any prophet in the case, and a message like this from the Urim and Thummim is nowhere on record in Scripture. The closing words of the Angel are, "I have chosen thee, and thou shalt save Israel." (4) The Angel of the Lord appeared to the parents of Samson, announcing the birth of his son, who was to begin to "deliver," or rather "save," Israel (xiii, 3-25). This occurs with the usual correspondence (ver. 24, 25), "the child grew, and the Lord blessed him; and the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times, and he judged Israel, and he went abroad among the people of Israel. And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him from the time of his choosing by the Lord and given to him from his birth." It is said repeatedly afterwards, that "the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him." This arrangement suggests the four periods of history given below (§ 1x). The appearance of the angel of the Lord and the mission of the Spirit, however, belong not to the very commencement of the period, but rather to the continuance or close of a term of sin and disgrace. Perhaps in Gideon and Jephthah's cases the appearance of the angel and the mission of the Spirit were almost contemporaneous; but in the first case and in the last there must have been some distance of time between them, not now ascertainable, but possibly amounting to several years, and determined in each case by the particulars of the crisis which demanded these manifestations.

The second series of incidents: a. The conquest of Laish by a portion of the tribe of Dan, and the establishment there of the idolatrous worship of Jehovah already instituted by Micah in Mount Ephraim (ch. xvii, xviii). The date of this occurrence is not marked, but it has been thought to be subsequent to the time of Deborah, when her song contains no allusion to any northern settlements of the tribe of Dan.

b. The almost total extinction of the tribe of Benjamin by the whole people of Israel, in consequence of their supporting the cause of the wicked men of Gibeah, and the means afterwards adopted for preventing its recurrence. (Seventh-century b.c. See Joshua ii, 1-21.) In some degree marked by the mention of Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron (xx, 28), and by the proof of the unananimity still prevailing among the people.

III. Deisyn.—The above analysis clearly indicates a unity of plan on the part of the writer, who leads us (i, 11, 23) from the central idea of the theocracy, to prove that the calamities to which the Hebrews had been exposed since the death of Joshua were owing to their apostasy from Jehovah, and to their idolatry. "They forsook of the Lord, and served Baal and Ash-tharoth" (ii, 13), i.e. such crimes which they were deservedly punished and greatly distressed (ii, 15). Nevertheless, when they repented and obeyed again the commandments of the Lord, he delivered them out of the hand of their enemies by the Shophetim whom he raised up, and made them prosper in their wars against Moab (ii, 12). They had certainly collected the most important elements of the Hebrew history during the period between Joshua and Eli. Some episodes occur, but in arguing his subject he never loses sight of his leading theme, to which, on the contrary, he frequently recur while stating facts, and shows how it x. It was a peculiar passion of those oriental peoples to believe the only way to happiness was to shun idolatry and obey the commandments of the Lord. The appendix further illustrates the lawlessness and anarchy prevailing in Israel after Joshua's death.

Yet the word of the passage in which the author thus concludes his main object must not be pressed too closely, as if implying a perfect remedy of all political sin. It is a general view, to which the facts of the history correspond in different degrees. Thus the people is contemplated as a whole; the judges are spokes of the reverence due to the institution, and the deliverances appear complete. But it would seem that the people were in no instance under exactly the same circumstances, and the judges in some points fall short of the ideal. Thus Gideon, who in some respects is the most eminent of them, is only the head of his own tribe, and has to appease the men of Ephraim by suitably appropriating language in the moment of victory over the Midianites; and he himself is the means of leading away the people from the pure worship of God. In Jephthah we find the chief of the land of Gilead still affected to some extent by personal reasons (xii, 1): his war against the Ammonites is confined to the east side of Jordan, the cause of its issues probably also freed the western side from their presence, and it is followed by a bloody conflict with Ephraim. Again, Samson's task was simply "to begin to deliver Israel" (xiii, 5): and the occasions which called forth his hostility to the Philistines are of a kind which place him on a different level from Deborah or Gideon. This shows that the passage in question is a general review of the collective history of Israel during the time of the judges, the details of which, in their varying aspects, are given faithfully as the narrative proceeds.

This view of the author's design may lead us to expect that we have not a complete history of the time—a fact which is clear from the book itself. We have only accounts of parts of the nation at any one time. We may easily suppose that there were other incidents of a similar nature to those recorded in ch. xxvii, xxviii, not recorded in the history itself there are points which are obscure from want of fuller information, e.g. the reason for the silence about the tribe of Judah (see also xxviii, 16; ix, 26). Some suppose even that the number of the judges is not complete, but there is no reason for this opinion. "Budan" (1 Sam. xii, 11) is probably the same as Abdon. Ewald (Geisch, ii, 477) rejects the common explanation that the word is a contracted form of Ben-Dum, i.e. Samson. Ja'el (v, 6) need not be the name of an unknown judge, or a corruption of Jair, as Ewald thinks, but is probably the wife of Heber. "The days of Ja'el would carry the misery of Israel up to the time of the victory over Sisera, and such an expression could hardly have been used as an expression at that time (see v, 24). Had the writer designed to give a full and connected history of the Hebrews in the period between Joshua and the kings, he would doubtless have described the state of the domestic affairs and of the government in the several tribes, as well as that which attended to each other, and the extent of power exercised by a judge, with other particulars such as do not appear in the narrative.

IV. Sources of the Materials.—Parts of the work are undoubtedly taken from ancient records and genealogies, others from traditions and oral information. From ancient authentic documents are probably copied the song of Deborah (chap. v), the beautiful parable of Jotham ix, 8-15), and the beginning of Samson's epiphanic, or triumphal poem (xv, 16). See also chap. xiv, 18, 18; xiv, 7. In their genealogies the Hebrews usually insert names of the lines not mentioned in the narratives, which may have been derived from the characters of the circumstances that preceded the conception of Samson, which were given as the parents related them to others (chap. xiii). These genealogies were sometimes further illustrated by tradition, and several incidents in the history of Judges have been thus mentioned. For instance, some of the persons mentioned in Judges have been named in some of the other books of the Old Testament, such as Samson, Amos, and others.

In the appendix also of this book, but nowhere else, a priest has the honorary title of father given him (xvii, 10; xviii, 18). But, though the author sometimes retains the names of his ancestors, still the whole of the composition is written in a particular style, distinguishing it from all other books of the Old Testament. The idea of the Israelites being overcome by their enemies he expresses often in this way: ‘The anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he sold them into the hands of their enemies’ (i. 4; iv, 10; xii, 7). A courageous and valiant warrior is described as a man upon whom rests the spirit of Jehovah, or as a person whom the spirit of Jehovah clothed (vii, 3; ix, 19; xiv, 19; xvi, 14, etc.).

Stähelin (Kritis. Untersuch., p. 106) thinks that iii, 7—x. presents the same but more clear and diction throughout, and that there is no need to suppose written sources. So Havercamp (Entrichtung, l, p. 68, 79) only recognises the use of documents in the appendix. Other critics, however, trace them throughout. Bertheau (On Judges, p. xxv-xxxiii) says that the difference of the diction in the principal narratives, coupled with the fact that they are united in one plan, points to the incorporation of parts of previous histories. Thus, according to him, the author found the substance of iv, 2-24 already accompanying the song of Deborah; in ch. vi-x the two distinct authorities are used—a life of Gideon, and a history of Shechem and its usurper; in the account of Jephthah a history of the tribes on the east of Jordan is employed, which meets us again in different parts of the Pentateuch and Joshua; and the history of Samson is taken from a longer work on the Philistine wars. Ewald's view is similar (Geisch, i, 184 sq.; ii, 480 sq.).

V. Unity.—This has already been fully vindicated in the above remarks on the design of the writer (§ iii). The attacks that have been made upon the unity of the book are rested on very trifling grounds. The chief one is the existence of the appendix, though it is not difficult to see the two great reasons for this part of the book assuming such a form: the one, that the historical development was too rapid, so that the plan was not to be interrupted; the other, that the two events which it narrates are to be looked on less as single events than as permanent influences. The permanence of the worship at Dan is expressly mentioned (xviii, 30, 31), and the captivity of the land" for the ten years. Samuel assumed office is traced to it with tolerable distinctness. The permanence of the moral evil which came out at Gibeah is not so plainly intimated; on the contrary, it might have been supposed to be eradicated by the vengeance taken on Benjamin. Yet the evil to be found in the whole tribes is indicated by their share in the terrible chastisement; and there is a hint of the continuance of some equally potent mischievous influence in the similar slaughter of the tribe of Ephraim by Jephthah. The prophet Hosea in so many words forms us that the days of Gibeah never ceased in Israel, and that the evil had continued (xi. 8). The author's statements may have been derived from a tradition taken away (Hos. ix. 9; x, 9). There have been, indeed, some very unsuccessful efforts to establish a difference of the words in use and the style of composition in the appendix and in the body of the book, but there has been little appearance of success in the undertaking. Even these objections have been the several critics in expelling the unity between the appendix and the introduction, on account of which some of them have gone so far as to say that both these may belong to a later editor, who prefixed and annexed his new materials to a previously existing work, the history of the judges strictly so called. The authorship of the whole of the Book of Judges will be examined below (§ vii). The attempts to discover contradictions in the book, with a view to show a plurality of authors, have also signalised failed.

VI. Relation to other Books of Scripture.—This is somewhat connected with the points discussed in preceding and following heads. The coincidences with the two adjoining Biblical books, however, are so striking as to call for a distinct notice.

1. Relation to the Book of Joshua.—Josh. xvii-xvi must be compared with Judg. i in order to understand fully how far the two books differ from each other. The composition of the book begins with a survey of the land and the people of Canaan. Nothing is said in chap. i about the tribes on the east of Jordan, which had already been mentioned (Josh. xiii, 13), nor about Levi (see Josh. xiii, 33; xxii, 1-42). The carrying on of the war by the tribes singly is explained by Josh. xviii, 28. The book begins with a reference to Joshua's death, and ii, 9-10 resumes the narrative, suspended by i-ii, 5, with the same words as are used in concluding the history of Joshua (xxvii, 28-31). In addition to this, the following passages appear to be common to the two books: Judg. i, 10-15; 20, 21, 27, 29, compared with Josh. xv, 14-19, 19; xvi, 1-10; reference to the conquest of Laish (Judg. xviii) occurs in Josh. xix, 47.

2. Relation to the Books of Samuel and Kings.—We find in i, 29, 30, 33, 36, a number of towns upon which, "when Israel was strong," a tribute of bond-service was levied: this is supported to some extent by the time of Solomon (1 Kings ix, 19-22). The conduct of Saul towards the Kenites (1 Sam. xv, 6), and that of David (1 Sam. xxx, 29), is explained by i, 16. A reference to the conclusion of the Philistine wars is implied in iii, 5. The allusion to Abimelech (2 Sam. xi, 21) is explained by ix, 19. Chapters xvii-xvi of the book of Ruth are more independent, but they have a general reference to the subsequent history.

The question now arises whether this book forms one link in a historical series, or whether it has a closer connection either with those that precede or follow it. We cannot infer anything from the agreement of its

view and spirit with those of the other books. The object of the writer was to give an account only of the "Judges" proper. Hence the history ceases with Samson, excluding Eli and Samuel; and then at this point two historical pieces are added—ch. xvii.—xxii. and the book of Ruth, supplemental to the general plan and to each other. This is less well explained by Ewald's supposition that the books from Judges to 2 Kings form one work. In this case the histories of Eli and Samuel, so closely united between themselves, are only deferred on account of their close connection with the rise of the monarchy. Judg. xxvii.—xxxi. is inserted both as an illustration of the aspect of Israel during the life and reign of the judge in which respect it agrees with ch. i.—xvi., and as presenting a contrast with the better order prevailing in the time of the kings. Ruth follows next, as touching on the time of the judges, and containing information about David's family history which does not occur elsewhere. The connection of these books, however, is denied by De Wette (Einleit. § 186) and Thiersch (Kurs.-gefi. Erzg. Handb. Sam. p. xv, Königre, p. 1). Bertheau, on the other hand, thinks that one editor may have been traced from Genesis to 2 Kings, whom he believes to be Ezra, in the Persian period of Jewish history. The question was mentioned by E. (ii, 6.—xxvi.), and the last occurrence of which (xxv, 19) implies some distance from the time of Samuel. But i, 21, according to the most natural explanation, would indicate a date, for it is the only reference to the covenanting of Jeshurun by David (2 Sam. v, 6.—9). Again, we should at first sight suppose i, 28, 30, 33, 55, to belong to the time of the judges; but these passages are taken by many modern critics as pointing to the time of Solomon (comp. i Kings xi, 21). The first portion of the book (chap. i.—xxvi.) is the work of a E retailers Ewald thinks (Geist, § 202), the latter portion, that is the commencement of a larger work reaching down to above a century after Solomon (see also Davidson, Introduction, p. 649), but this is equally gratuitous. The author of the second division always describes the period of which he speaks thus: "In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (xvii, 6; xviii, 1; xix, 1; xxi, 25), but this expression never once occurs in the first division. Hence many modern critics conclude that the author of the first sixteen chapters of our book was different from him who wrote the latter part (see BDB, Art. "Nachrichtig, kritische Einleitung in die sämtlichen Schriften des A. und N. T. p. 876; Eichhorn's Einleitung in das A. Test. iii, § 457; S. Davidson, in Horne's Introd., new ed., ii, 648; but Keil the contrary, Einleit. p. 182). The authorship of the first sixteen chapters has been assigned to Joshua, Samuel, and Ezra. That they were not written by Joshua appears from the difference of the method of relating subjects, as well as from the difference of the style. In the book of Joshua there is a continual reference to the law of Moses, which is much less frequent in the book of Judges; and in Joshua, again, there are no such interferences with events that are common in Judges (iii, 1, 4; viii, 27; ix, 56). The style of the book of Joshua is nearer than that of Judges; the narration is more clear, and the arrangement is better (compare i, 10, 11, 20, with Josh. xiv, 6.—15, and xv, 13—19: also li, 1, 2—10, and Josh. xiv, 26—31). That the book of Judges was composed by Samuel, although an invention of the Talmudists, unsupported by any external evidence, is nevertheless the most plausible authorship that has been assigned to it, at least so far as relates to the first division. The opinion that this portion was written by Samuel may not be entertained by any one who attentively peruses the original; for it has a philosophy of its own, and certain favorite ideas, to which it constantly reverts, but of which there is not a trace in Ezra. If Ezra had intended to continue the history of the Hebrews from Joshua down to Eli in a separate work, he would not have given a selection of incidents to prove a particular theme, but a complete history. The orthography of the book of Ezra, with many phrases characteristic of his age, do not appear in the book of Judges. The prefix ו occurs, indeed, (v, 7; vi, 17; vii, 12; viii, 28), but this cannot be referred to in proof that the language of the text of Ezra, for it belonged to the dialect of North Palestine, as Ewald and others have shown, and the Hebrew form of the verbal peculiarities are explained in a similar manner (see Ottmar, in Heek's Magazin, vol. iv; De Wette, Lehrbuch der Einleitung in die Bibel, Berlin, 1833—39). The first sixteen chapters must have been written under Saul, whom the Israelites made their king in the hope of improving their condition. The events of the period of that time are traced in them, and the author must consequently have lived near the time when they were yet current. He says that in his time "the Jebusites dwelt with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem" (i, 21); now this was the case only before David, who conquered the town and drove out the Jebusites. Consequently, the author of the first division of the book of Judges must have lived and written before David, and yet be acquainted with a regal form of government, which can only point to the reign of Saul. If he had lived under David, the法人ism of the book by that monarch, as the nature of his subject did not allow him to pass it over in silence. The omission, moreover, of the history not only of Samuel, but also of Eli, indicates an author who, living in an age very near that of Eli, considered his history as generally known, because it is repeated in Judges. The exact date of the appendix is more difficult to determine, but its author certainly lived in an age considerably later than that of the recorded events. That in his time the period of the events which he relates had been long forgotten is, however, hardly a fair inference from the frequence by a later editor of the expression "in those days there was no king in Israel" (xvii, 6); and it is gratuitous to suppose that certain particulars of his narrative could no longer be ascertained, and that this caused him to omit the name of the Levite whose history is given in ch. xix. In his time, indeed, the house of God was in Shiloh (xxvii, 28); and it will be re-considered that it was David who brought the ark to Jerusalem. But it must be borne in mind that it had frequently changed places during the Philistine war, and it remained a long time away from Shiloh even after Eli's death. The author of this portion of the book, as were priests of the graven image in Dan, or Laish, "until the day of the captivity of the land" (xxviii, 20). This latter circumstance has been assumed by Le Cerfe and others to prove that the appendix was not published until after the Babylonian captivity, or at least until after that of Israel by Shalmanasar and Assur-balaa, but it cannot be understood of the domination of the Philistines over the Israelites, which would very improperly be called "the captivity of the land," this expression always implying the deportation of the inhabitants of a country. But we may reasonably suppose that this expression was borrowed by a later editor from another circumstance that the author, in mentioning Shiloh, adds, "which is in the land of Canaan" (xxii, 12), and that the topographical description of the site of Shiloh is given (xxi, 19), has let some interpreters to assume that the author of the appendix must have been a contemporary of the Israelite such remarks would have appeared trivial (see Briefe einiger Holländischer Gottesgelehrten über R. Ni- mon's kritische Geschichte des A. T., edited by Le Cerfe at Zürich, p. 490). The inference is certainly specious, but, from an examination of the context, it appears that the Israelites were not to be entertained by any one who did not enter into the town, a without the town of land of Canaan, and that this led the author to add to Shiloh that it was in Canaan; while the second passage describes, not the site of Shiloh, but of a place in its neighborhood, where an annual feast was celebrated, when the daughters of which came out to dance, to sing, and to play on instruments of me-is the case in the wars of all uncivilized people; the inhabitants of cities are destroyed wholesale (viii, 16, 17; xx). Hospitality and the protection of strangers received as guests is considered the highest virtue: a father will rather resign his daughter than allow violence to be done to a stranger who stops in his house for the night (ch. xx, 21).

In the state of oppression in which the Hebrews often found themselves during the period from Joshua to Eli, it was to be expected that men, filled with heroism, should now and then rise up and call the people to arms in order to deliver them from their enemies. Such valiant men are introduced by our author, and he extols them, indeed, with high praise; but, on the other hand, there are instances of silent respecting their faults, as may be seen in the instances of Ehud, whom he reports to have murdered a king to recover liberty for his country (iii, 16 sq.); of Gideon, who is recorded to have punished the inhabitants of Succoth and Penuel cruelly for having refused bread to his weary troops (viii, 16, 17); and of Jephthah, whose inconsiderate vow deprives him of his only daughter (xi, 34). This cannot be a fiction; it is no panegyric on Israel to describe them in the manner the author has done. Now this frank, impartial tone pervades the whole. It begins by displaying the truth to Israelites as a refractory and obstinate people; and the appendix ends with the statement of a crime committed by the Benjamites, which had the most disastrous consequences. At the same time, due praise is bestowed on acts of generosity and justice, and valiant feats are carefully recorded.

But are not the exploits of its heroes exaggerated in our book, like those of Scosestris, Semiramis, and Hercules? Their deeds are, no doubt, often splendid, but they do not surpass belief; provided we do not add to the narrative anything which the original text does not sanction, nor give to particular words and phrases a meaning which does not belong to them. Thus, when we read that "Shamgar slew of the Philistines 600 men" (iii, 31), it would perhaps have been correct if the Hebrew חֶֽשְׁגָּר had been rendered by "put to flight;" and it should further be recollected that Shamgar is not stated to have been alone and unassisted in repelling the enemy: he did it, no doubt, supported by those brave men whose leader he was. It frequently happens that the leader is attributed what has been performed by his followers. Nor can it offend when, in the passage quoted above, it is said that Shamgar repelled the Philistines with an ox-goad; for this was exactly the weapon which an uncultivated Oriental warrior, who had been brought up to husband-work, would naturally choose in preference to other instruments of offence. From the description which travellers give of it, it appears to have been well suited to such a purpose. See GOAD. It is chiefly the prodigious strength of Samson, however, which to very many readers seems exaggerated, and surpassing all belief. He is, e.g., reported to have, unarmed, slain a lion (xiv, 5, 6); to have caught 300 jackals (דֶּנַּלְיוֹן), bound their tails to one another, put a firebrand between two tails, and let them go into the standing corn of the Philistines, which was thus burnt up (xiv, 4, 5, 8); to have broken, with perfect ease, the new cords with which his arms were bound, etc. (xv, 14, 16, 7-9, 11). Now there is in these and other recorded feats of Samson nothing which ought to create difficulty, for history affords many instances of men of extraordinary strength, of whom Goliath among the Philistines is not the least remarkable; and for others we refer to T. Ludolf, Historia Asiaeïper, 1, 10; to the Aen. of Virgil; Descriptio Franciae, 1, 2; Schilling, Missionsbericht, 1q, 79. Lions were also slain by other persons unarmed, as by David (1 Sam. xvii, 36) and Benaiath (2 Sam. xxiii, 20). It was easy to show that, when properly understood, his other exploits do not necessarily exceed the limits of human power. Extraordinary indeed they were, but, even if regarded as not alleged by the Scripture itself to have been supernatural, they are far from fabulous. Considering the very remote period at which our book was written—considering also the manner of viewing and describing events and persons which prevailed with the ancient Hebrews, and which very much differs from that of our age—taking into account, indeed, the brevity of the narrative, which consists of historical fragments, we may well wonder that there do not occur in it more difficulties, and that not more doubts have been raised as to its historical authority (see Herder, Gedet der Hebräischen Poesei, ii, 294, 52; Lischhorn, Repertorium der Hebräischen Literatur, vii, 78). For a further elucidation of the above and other difficulties, see the several subjects in their alphabetical places.

IX. Chronological Difficulties.—The time commonly assigned to the period contained in this book is 299 years. For this number is not derived directly from it. The length of the interval between Joshua's death and the invasion of ChusHan-rishathaim, and of the time during which Shamgar was judge, is not stated. The dates which are given amount to 410 years when reckoned consecutively; and Acts xii, 20 would show that this was the only adoption of the 450 years. But the 450 years do not seem to result from adding 40 years for Eli to the 410 of this book. But a difficulty is created by xi, 26, and in a still greater degree by I Kings vi, 1, where the whole period from the exodus to the building of the Temple is stated at 480 years (Septuag., 440). One solution is the adoption of the 450 years: under the 20 of the Philistines compels us to suppose that his first 20 were contemporaneous with Jair’s government, down to whose death Keil admits that there is no trace of division: hence he is driven to the desperate resource of denying that Eli was a judge at all, except in the name. But in the name of I Kings, v, 1 Kings, vii, 1, and in another form, by Kennicott pronounces against it (Disp. Gen., 80, § 3) because it is omitted by Origen when quoting the rest of the verse. It is also urged that Josephus would not have reckoned 592 years for the same period if the present reading had existed in his time. But it is defended by Tholuck (ad loc.), and is generally adopted, partly on account of its agreement with Egyptian chronology. Most of the systems therefore shorten the time of the judges by reckoning the dates as inclusive or contemporaneous. But all these combinations are arbitrary. The same may be said of Keil’s interpretation which is one of those least open to objection. He reckons the dates successively as far as Jair, but makes Jephthah and the three following judges contemporary with the 40 years of the Philistine oppression (comp. x, 6-xxii, l); and by compressing the period between the division of the land and the Judges, he makes 450 years, or 10 years, which were years to the death of Saul into 39, he arrives ultimately at the 480 years. Ewald and Bertheau have proposed ingenious but unsatisfactory explanations—differing in details, but both built upon the supposition that the whole period from the exodus to Solomon was divided into 12 generations of 40 years; and that, for the period of the judges, this system has become blended with the dates of another more precise reckoning.

But the whole theory of the parallel or contemporaneous rule of two or more judges, upon which all these shortening of the period in question proceed, is purely arbitrary. There is nothing in the book of Judges to warrant the supposition that the national unity was completely broken up, so that there ever were two independent judges ruling different parts of Israel: such a schism first appeared in the days of Ithobaal and Jezebel, and then our attention is strongly called to it. The Ammonitish oppression is distinctly stated to have extended far beyond the eastern tribes, into Judah, and Benjamin, and Ephraim, all being included in that “Israel which they oppressed.” Nor is there anything in the history which suggests the restitutio ad integrum of Jephthah’s jurisdiction to the east of Jordan. On the contrary, Mizpeh of Gilead (xi, 29) seems to be distinguishable from Mizpeh simply so called, where he took up his house (ver. 34), where he uttered all his words before the Lord (ver. 11), and where the children of Israel had assembled together, but his father and his mother changed (x, 17); and it will be difficult to assign a reason for thinking that this was not the Mizpeh in Benjamin, where at other times the people of the Lord were used to meet in those days (xx, 1; 1 Sam. vii, 5, 6; x, 17). Jephthah’s successors, whose rule must also be made contemporaneous with the Philistine oppression during 40 years, had no special connection whatever with the eastern tribes. Ish-baal belonged to Beth-lehem, and was buried there; Elion stood in the same relation to the tribe of Zebulon, and Abdon to Pirathon, in the land of Ephraim. So far as we know, these are fair specimens of the connections which the judges had with the different localities of the land of Israel, and there is no ground for restricting the rule of these tribes to the eastern part of the land. We are pretty sure that this was not the case with Deborah and Barak, nor with Gideon, nor, certainly, with Samuel; why imagine it with any of the rest? What time could be suggested less likely for such a revolution in the constitution of Israel than the close of the judges, by which we may understand the last of the successive judges, in whose administration there was so little to record for the instruction of posterity? Or, if there had been a threatening of such disintegration of the commonwealth, would it not be prevented by the nomination of the high-priest Eli to the office of judge? Yet that office was taken in the forty years which were falling under the first 20 of the Philistines compels us to suppose that his first 20 were contemporaneous with Jair’s government, down to whose death Keil admits that there is no trace of division: hence he is driven to the desperate resource of denying that Eli was a judge at all, except in the name. But in the name of I Kings, v, 1 Kings, vii, 1, and in another form, by Kennicott pronounces against it (Disp. Gen., 80, § 3) because it is omitted by Origen when quoting the rest of the verse. Judgematics. See JUDAH JUDGIAN.

Judging, RASHI, the act of carelessly, precipitately, wantonly, or maliciously concerning others. This is an evil which abounds too much among almost all classes of men. "Not content with being in the right ourselves, we must find all others in the wrong. We claim an exclusive possession of goodness and wisdom; and from approving warmly of those who join us, we proceed to condemn, with much acrimony, not only the principles, but the characters of those from whom we differ. We rashly extend to every individual the severe opinion which we have unwarrantably conceived of a whole body. This man is of a party whose principles we reclaim slavishly, and therefore his whole sentiments are corrupted. That man belongs to a religious sect which we are accustomed to deem bigoted, and therefore he is incapable of any generous and liberal thought. Another is connected with a sect which we have been taught to account relaxed, and therefore can have no sanctity. We should do well to consider, 1. That this practice of rash judging is absolutely forbidden in the sacred Scriptures (Matt. vii. 3). 2. We thereby authorize others to requite us in the same kind. 3. It often evidences our pride, envy, and bigotry. 4. It argues a want of charity, the distinguishing feature of the Christian religion. 5. They who are most forward in consuming others are often most defective themselves." See Barrow’s Works, v. i, ser. 20; Blair’s Sermons, ser. 10, vol. ii; Saurin’s Sermons, ser. 4, vol. v.

Judgment, considered as a technical and scientific term of logic, is an act of the mind by which something is affirmed. In this restricted sense it is one of the simplest acts or operations of which we are conscious in the exercise of our rational powers. The intellectual faculty called judgment is the power of determining anything to be true or false. In every instance of memory or perception there is involved some judgment, some feeling of relationship, of space, or time, or of contrast, of cause and effect, of possibility and necessity. Consciousness necessarily involves a judgment; and, as every act of mind is an act of consciousness, every act of mind consequently involves a judgment. It is a process not only subsequent to the acquisi tion of knowledge, but "involved as a condition of the acquisitive process itself. There is not only included what is popularly understood as comparison (when the properties of bodies are compared), but that elementary faculty, that fundamental law or innate idea, which, in the first instance, makes us cognizant of the property. Hence Sir William Hamilton’s division into derivative and primitive cognitions, the derivative being of our own fabrication, formed from certain rules, and being the tardy result of perception and memory, of attention, reflection, abstraction. These are derived from expenrience, and, as such, are contingent; and as all experience is contingent, all the knowledge derived from experience is contingent also. But, as there are con-tions of the mind which are not contingent, which are necessary, in the sense Locke uses the term, which thought supposes as its fundamental condition, these are denominated primitive cognitions; these primitive and general notions being the root of all principles, these are the foundations of the whole edifice of science. For the discovery of this great truth we are indebted to Leibnitz, who, in controversy with Locke’s view of ideas, asserted the existence of a principle of human knowledge independent of and superior to that which is afforded by the senses. Kant, adopting Leibnitz’s view, furnishes a test by which these two elements are distinguished from each other: the former, being contingent, are fluctuating and uncertain; they may be in the mind, or they may not. Every fresh scene in which we are placed completely alters the sensations, and the particular sensational judgments of which we are conscious. On the contrary, our primitive judgments are steady, abiding, unalterable. These are judgments, he asserts, of two kinds, analytic and synthetic. An analytic judgment is simply a declaration of something necessarily belonging to a given notion, as that every triangle has three sides. A synthetic judgment may be a declaration of something which does not actually belong to a notion, and yet the whole mind is in a manner kind of evidence or other, to attribute it to it, as “Every event has an efficient cause.” Here we do more than analyze the expression; we attribute altogether a fresh notion to it, and form a judgment by which our knowledge is extended. Both these judgments are found in the pure sciences, and form the very principles upon which they are pursued. It may be well to remark, however, that Comte, Spencer, Mill, etc., following Locke, deny the existence of these primitive judgments altogothen, even the axioms which stand at the head of mathematical reasoning. So far from being subjective, they are truly inductive, derived from observation; only that observation is so constant, and that induction is so easy and immediate, that we fall easily into an illusion that these laws are intuitive, whereas they are, in fact, experimental. For instance, the axioms of Euclid, which are the basis of Euclid’s Geometry are not metaphysical—written on the inllect, and drawn out of the brain—they are only statements of laws observed and experienced. See Watts, Logic, ch. iv., p. 251; Locke, On the Understanding, 1

JUDGMENT, RIGHT OF PRIVATE. The Church of Rome denies the right as claimed by Protestants on the following grounds: that the Church, being assisted by the Spirit of God in searching the Scriptures, having the promise of the presence of Jesus to the end of the world, and having the possession of the unwritten word as a commentary on the written, is the only safe interpreter of holy Scripture, and the supreme judge by whose definite sentence all controversies with regard to the meaning of particular passages or the general doctrine of holy Scripture must be determined. This is a distinction, however, between the learned exegesis, as applied to the sacred writings, and that interpretation which emanates from the Church. The interpretation of the Church does not descend to the details which must claim the attention of the scientific exegetist.
Thus, for example, she does not hold it her duty, nor include it in the compass of her rights, to determine when, by whom, and for what object the book of Job was written; or what particular inducement engaged St.
John to publish his Gospel, or St. Paul to address an epistle to the Romans; in what order the events of the apostles followed each other, etc. As little does she undertake to explain particular words and verses, their bearings one on the other, or the connection existing between larger portions of the sacred book. Antiquities, in the widest sense of the word, fall not within the domain of her interpretation; in short, that interpretation extends only to doctrines of faith and morals.
Within these limits she declares it to be the duty of Christians to acquiesce in this infallible determination, and that it is presumption and impiety, and a sin for which they deserve everlasting punishment, to oppose their own private judgment, which cannot of itself astain the truth, to the decision of the Church, which canot err.

To this extraordinary claim Protestants agree in opposing this principle, that the holy Scriptures are the only rule of faith. But, while there is a general agreement as to this, i.e. to receive the Scriptures as a sufficient rule of faith, and as the only authoritative rule, there are wide diversities of opinion concerning the power reserved to the Church as to the doctrines of religion. The extreme view is that the Church at no time possesses the right of intermeddling in articles of faith. The essential articles of faith are so few, so simple, and so easily gathered out of clear and explicit proofs, that it is in no possible case for any to exercise the exercise of his reason to miss them; that no harm can arise from allowing any man to interpret the Scriptures as he pleases; and, that, as Scripture may be sufficiently understood for purposes of salvation without any foreign assistance, all creeds and confessions of faith confound and suppress the human mind and the authority are unnecessary even upon the prerogative of the supreme Teacher, and an invasion of the right of private judgment. Such furthermore maintain that all divisions among Christians have grown out of the attempt of the Church so forcibly to impose uniformity of belief as to the doctines of holy Scripture.

This view of the right of private judgment is generally held by the followers of Socinus, and among its ablest champions at the present day are some of the leading minds of the Church of England, who, on actual examination, have dealt very hardly with the uniariate, Catholic, Broad Church, by the friends of that party: Lattitudinarian, or Independent, by its enemies. Beleiving that the superficial differences between Christians are as nothing in comparison with their essential agreement, they are willing that the portals of the Church should be open to all denominations, whether Roman, Protestant, or otherwise. This is clearly set forth by the late Dr. Arnold: “All societies of men, whether we call them states or churches, should make their bond to consist in a common object and a common practice rather than in a common belief. If we, as believers, have in common the word of God, we have in common more than enough to bind us than truth. We may consent to set together, but we cannot consent to believe together; many motives may persuade us to the one: we may like the object, or we may like our company, or we may think it safest to join them, or most convenient, and any one of these motives is quite sufficient to induce a unity of action, action being a thing in our own power. But no motives can persuade us to believe together; we may wish a statement to be true, we may admire those who believe it, we may find it very inconvenient not to believe it; all this helps us nothing; unless our own mind is freely convinced and the foundation of our doctrine is true, we cannot by possibility believe it.

Such a union of action appears historically to have been the original bond of the Christian Church. Whoever was willing to receive Christ as his Master, to join his people, and to accept his doctrine was admitted to the Christian society. We know that in the earliest Church there existed the strangest varieties of belief, some Christians not even believing that there would be a resurrection of the dead. Of course it was not intended that such varieties should be perpetual; a broad union of belief, it was presumed, was the point to observe is that the union of belief grew out of the union of action; it was the result of belonging to the society rather than a previous condition required for belonging to it, for no human power can presume to JUDGMENT

inquire into the degree of a man's positive belief. A general, hearty belief in Christianity is to be regarded by the Church, not as its starting-point, but as its highest perfection. To begin with a strict creed and no effi-cotten errors, is not the care of the Church; but to belief; to begin with the most general confession of faith imputed, that is, as a test of membership, but with vigorous Christian institutions, is the way most likely to lead not only to a real and general belief, but also to a lively perception of the highest points of Christian truth in relation to the doctrine of Holy Scripture, and Christianity should be tolerated when they are combined with moral obedience; tolerated, because in this way they are most surely removed; whereas a corrupt or disorganized Church, with a minute creed, encourages intellectual objections; and if it proceeds to put them down by force, it is the rule of faith, and another to science, punishing an unbelief which its own evil had provoked, and, so far as human judgment can see, has in a great measure justified. In primitive usage, a herede was not properly he who did not believe what the Church taught, but he who withdrew his allegiance from its society, refusing to conform to its system, and setting up another system of his own.

To most Protestants, however, this plan seems very defective. Regarding the Christian Church as a society created by divine institution, it possesses all the resources of the sacred law, and the resources for saving apostles to their successors, and of the exercise of which the apostles have left examples. They deem it to be incontrovertible that these successive teachers in the Christian Church were intended to be interpreters and exponents of the sacred book; that they are invested with authority in relation to the doctrine of Holy Scripture; and that, as a mere acknowledgment of the truth of Scripture is not a sufficient security for soundness of faith, it is lawful for the Church to employ additional guards to that "form of sound words" which it is required to hold fast and to defend. It is not a thing to be considered the rule of faith, and another to say that it is the judge to determine what that rule is. The latter it can as little be as the code of civil law can exercise the functions of the judge; it forms, indeed, the rule of judgment, but it does not itself pronounce judgment. Hence the twentieth article of the Church of England declares that "the Church hath authority in matters of faith." So the Westminster Confession, "It belongeth to synods and councils ministerially to determine controversies of faith." See Rogers, Reason and Faith; Wilson, Apostolic Fathers; Elliot, Delimitation of the Holy Scripture (Index); Litton, Church of Christ, p. 77
sq. (E. de P.)

JUDGMENT, THE LAST, the sentence that will be passed on our actions at the last day, when the everlasting designs of God concerning this lower creation shall be accomplished, an end put to time, and the destinies of the human race fixed for eternity. This is one of the peculiar doctrines of revelation, a doctrine of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. There were, indeed, some hints of it in the Old Testament; but it is in the New Testament that we have it frequently and particularly declared and described, with the circumstances where it will be attained. It is a doctrine of certain, in which the Church, as it were, agrees, unable to reason, which fully concurs with revelation in directing our minds to a state of retribution, there being no alternative, if we hold not the truth of a judgment to come, but the holding that the creation is not under a moral government. The Church is the doubt that we live under a retributive government, and that cognizance is taken of our actions by an invisible but ever-present Being, whose attributes render him the determined foe of vice, and the steadfast upholder of righteousness. On the other hand, there has been an irresistible demonstration from the experience of all ages, that no accurate proportion is at present maintained between conduct and condition. The wicked triumph in their iniquity, while virtue is despised; her humble votaries are borne down by the gloom of advesity, or reared in the midst of sorrows and tears. In every age of the world, therefore, men have been perplexed by what seemed opposite evidences as to the superintendent care of a benevolent Being, who, in order to escape the difficulty is an appeal to the future; for either the idea is erroneous of one living under a moral government at all, or that moral government must have another scene of display where its impartiality shall be vindicated, and every discrepancy removed. See Fuller, Works, ii. 78, 106, 152, 211, 367, 392, 437, 441, 459, 671, 888, 906; Dwight, Theology; Irving, Argument for Judgment to come. See JUDGMENT DAY. (E. de P.)

JUDGMENT DAY, a term generally used to designate that important day which is to terminate the present dispensation of grace; at the end of the world, when time shall be no more, and the state of all men be unchangeably fixed (2 Pet. iii, 7).

I. Proof of a general Judgment.—The arguments for this are these: 1. The justice of God requires it; for it is evident that this attribute is not clearly displayed in the dispensations of grace in the present state (3 Thess.
1,6,7; Luke xiv, 14). 2. The acknowledged work of natural science are testimonies in favor of this belief (Rom. ii, 15; Dan. v, 5, 6; Acts xxiv, 25). 3. It may be concluded, from the relation men stand in to God, as creatures to a Creator. He has a right to give them a law, and to make them amenable for their acts; hence, he will rise in judgment (Gal. iii, 10, 12). 4. The resurrection of Christ is a certain proof of it. See Acts xvii, 31; Rom. xiv, 9. 5. The Scripture, in a variety of places, sets it beyond all doubt (Jude 14, 15; 2 Cor. v, 10; Matt. xxv; Rom. xiv, 10, 11; 2 Thess. i, 7, 10; 1 Thess. iv, 16, 17). See above, Judgment, Last.

II. The Judge.—The Bible declares that God will direct the world by Jesus Christ (Acts xvii, 31). The iuous God will be the Judge, as to original authority, power, and right of judgment; but according to the economy settled between the three divine persons, the work is assigned to the Son (Rom. xiv, 9, 10), who will appear in his human nature (John v, 27; Acts xvii, 31), with great power and glory (1 Thess. iv, 16, 17), visible to every eye (Rev. i, 7); penetrating every heart (1 Cor. iv, 5; Rom. ii, 16); with full authority over all (Matt. xxviii, 18, 20), and acting with strict justice (2 Tim. iv, 8).
As for the concern of others in the judgment, angels will be no otherwise concerned than as attendants, gathering the elect, raising the dead, etc., but not as advising or judging. Saints are said to judge the world, not as judges with Christ, but as approvers of his sentence, and as their special representatives and executors in judgment against their wicked neighbors (1 Cor. vi, 2, 3).

III. The Persons that will be judged.—These will be men and devils. The righteous will probably be tried first, as represented in Matt. xxxv. They will be raised first, though perhaps not a thousand years before the rest, as some have supposed (see MILLENNIUM); since the resurrection of all the bodies of the saints is spoken of as in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, in order to their meeting the Lord in the air, and being with him, not on earth, but forever in heaven (1 Thess. iv, 13, 16; 1 Cor. xv, 51, 52; Rev. iv, 17).

IV. The Rule of Judgment.—We are informed that the books will be opened (Rev. xx, 12): 1. The book of divine omniscience (Mal. iii, 5), or remembrance (Mal. iii, 15); 2. The book of consciousness (Rom. ii, 16); 3.
The book of Providence (Rom. ii, 4, 5); 4. The book of the dead (John v, 27); 5. The law, and Gospel (John. iv, 40; Rom. ii, 15, 16); 6. The book of life (Luke x, 20; Rev. iii, 5; xx, 12, 15).

V. The Time of Judgment.—The soul will be either happy or miserable immediately after death, but the general judgment will not be till after the resurrection (Heb. ix, 27). There is a day of the Lord, when he will judge the world, but it is unknown to men. See INFERIORATE STATE.

VI. The Place.—This is also uncertain. Some suppose it will be in the air, because the judge will come in the clouds of heaven, and the living saints will then be changed, and the dead saints raised, and both be caught up to meet the Lord in the air (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17). Others think it will be on the earth, on the new earth, on which they will descend from the air with Christ. The place where, however, is of no consequence, when compared with the state in which we shall appear. As the Scriptures represent it as certain (Eccles. xi. 9), universal (2 Cor. v. 11), righteous (Rom. ii. 5), decisive (1 Cor. xv. 22), and eternal as to its consequences (Heb. vi. 9), let us be concerned for the welfare of our immortal interests, flee to the refuge set before us, improve our precious time, depend on the merits of the Redeemer, and adhere to the dictates of the divine Word, that we may be found in him in peace. See Bates, Works, p. 449; Hopkins and Stoddard, On the Last Judgment; Gill, Body of Divinity, ii, 467, 8vo; Boston, Fourfold State; Heyer, Works, new edition, i, 72, 73; ii, 28, 223; iv, 155. See Resurrection.

Judgment-hall. See PRETORIUM.

Judgment-seat (βίσχος, properly a step, hence a rostrum or stage for speakers; as a "throne", e.g. Herod's in the theatre at Cesarea, Acts xii, 21), an elevated seat or tribunal (in James ii. 6, the term is καρυόπτων, a court of justice), especially of the Roman governor (Matt. xxvii. 19; John xix. 13; Acts xvii. 12, 16, 17; xxv, 6, 10, 17); hence of the final bar of God (Rom. xiv. 10; 2 Cor. v. 10). See PAVEMENT.

Roman Judgment-seat. (From a unique example at Wilton House.)

Judgments or God. 1. This expression is of frequent occurrence in the Scriptures, and its sense is generally determined by the connection. When God's judgments are spoken of, the term may denote either the secret decisions of the divine will (Ps. x. 5; xxxvi. 6, 8), or the declarations of God's will revealed in the Scriptures (Exod. xxvi, 1; Deut. vii, 12; Neh. ix, 18; Ps. cxix, 7-15), or the inflictions of punishment on the wicked (Exod. vi. 6, xii; Prov. xxix. 22; Ezek. xxv. 11; Rev. xvi. 7). The Scriptures give us many awful instances of the display of divine justice in the punishment of nations, families, and individuals, for their iniquities. See Gen. viii. ix; xiii; Exod. xv, Judg. i, 6, 7, 12; Acts xxvii, 33; Esther xiv, 14, with vii, 10; 2 Kings xi; Lev. x, 1, 2; Acts v, 1-10; Isa. xxx, 1-6; 1 Sam. xv, 9: 1 Kings xi, 25, 33.

2. In a less legitimate application, the strange trials to which those suspected of guilt were put in the Middle Ages, conducted with many devout ceremonies by the ministers of religion, and pronounced to be the judgments of God! The ordeal consisted of various kinds: walking blindfold amid burning ploughshares, holding a hot stone in the hand, or plunging the arm into boiling water. The popular affirmation, "I will put my hand into the fire to confirm this," appears to be derived from this solemn custom. Challenging the accuser to single combat, when frequently the stoutest champion was allowed to supply their place; swallowing a mouse or the bloody hand; sinking or swimming in a river for witchcraft, or weighing a witch: stretching out the arms before the cross, till the champion soonest wearied dropped his arms and lost his estate, which was decided by the very short chancery suit called the judicium crucis.

Those who were accused of robbery were put to trial by a piece of barley bread, on which the massa had been said, and, if they could not swallow it, were declared guilty. Probably the saying, "May this piece of bread choke me," comes from this custom. Among the proofs of guilt were the Blessubg of a corpse. If a person was murdered, it was believed that at the touch of the proach of the murderer the blood rushed out of the body in various parts. By the side of the bier, if the slightest change was observable in the eyes, the mouth, feet, or hands of the corpse, the murderer was conjectured to be present; and it is probable that many innocent spectators have suffered death in consequence.

It is well to mark, in extenuation of these absurd practices of our rude ancestors, that these customs were a substitute for written laws that then recognized barbarous period had not; and as no community can exist without laws, the ignorance of the people had reference to these customs, which, bad and absurd as they were, served to close controversies which otherwise might have given birth to more destructive practices. Ordeals are, in truth, the rude laws of a barbarous people who have not yet obtained a written code, and not advanced enough in civilization to enter into refined inquiries, the subtle distinctions and elaborate investigations which a court of law demands.

It is a well-established fact, however, that they were acquainted in those times with secrets to pass unharmed these singular trials. This was especially the case with ordeals of fire and boiling water. Doubtless the more knowing ones possessed these secrets and medications which they had at hand to pass through these trials in perfect security. See Jortin, Remarks on Eccles. Hist. iii, 246 sq. See ORDEAL. (E. de F.)

Judicature, Courts of. See Judge; Court; Trial; Triennial; Council, etc.

Judges electi, select judges, is a term applied to a number of judgesationally selected to hear and to act from an excommunicated presbyter or deacon against his own bishop. The Council of Sardica allowed an appeal to the metropolitan; and in such a case the metropolitan had three ways of proceeding—either to select a number of judges, generally twelve, to hear the case; or to refer the matter to a provincial synod; or to hear the cause himself without a synod. It is, however, doubtful whether a metropolitan had power to depose his own bishop. See Devey, 162, 387, 409, 412.

Judicial Blindness or Hardness, a term employed to express a state of moral incorrigibility. So we read, Mark iii. 5, "Being grieved for the blindness—hardness—of their hearts." In part hast happened to Israel." Eph. vi. 18, "Because of the blindness—hardness—of their hearts." 2 Cor. iii. 14, "Their minds were blinded—hardened." and elsewhere. This expression is of special interest to the theologian on account of two questions connected with it.

1. Is it an infestation of God?—From such passages as Isa. vi. 10, some have said that God commands the prophet to do a certain thing to this people, and then punishes the people: nay, this appears stronger still, where the passage is quoted, as (John xii, 40), He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts; which and seems to be contradictory to Matt. xiii, 15, where the people themselves are said to have closed their own eyes; and so Acts xxviii, 27. These seeming contradiction are, very easily reconciled, as if He, by using plenty and abundance, affords the means of the people's abusing his goodness, and becoming both over-fat with food and intoxicated with drink; and thus his very beneficence may be said to make their heart fat, and their eyes heavy, when the same time the people, by their own act, their overfeasting, become unaabbled, indolent, bloated, over-fat at heart, and, moreover, so stupefied by liquor and strong drink, that their eyes and ears may be useless to them: with wide-open eyes, staring, they may stare, but not perceive; and listening, they may hear, but not understand; and in this state, they will continue, preferring it to a more sedate, rational condition, and refusing to forbear from prolonging the causes of it, lest at any sober interval they should see truly with their eyes and hear accurately with their ears, in consequence of which they should be shocked at themselves, and converted, be changed from such mis-conduct, and I should heal them—shure these die- lusory effects of their surfeits and dissoluteness. Comp. Isa. v, 11; xxviii, 7. This is equally true in spiritual matters. In short, the expressions in question are to be understood in the same sense as the hardening of Pha- raoh's heart under a persuasion by his own wilful breach of the providences of God (Rom. ix, 17, 18). See PRE- DESTINATION.

2. Is this state hopeless? —That sinners may, by a course of persistent opposition to God, so far destroy or deaden the grace and presence of God as to be beyond the hope (not absolutely the power) of divine grace; it is a fearful fact, and one corroborated by the Holy Scriptures (1 Tim. iv, 2; Rom. i, 28; 2 Thess. ii, 11. Heb. vi, 6). But this condition, again, is not so much the result of God's de- termination as of their own inveterate perversity. See UPRIGHTNESS OF GOD.

JUDICIAI DEI. See JUDGMENTS OF GOD.

Judith (Heb. יְוּדִית, yūdīth, Jevvitha, Septuag. Ιωάννα, the name of two females; properly the feminine form of יְוָדִי, yāḏīy, Jowda, comp. Jer. xxxvi, 14, 21), but in the passage of Genesis it is generally taken as the correlative of Judith, i. e. "praised."

1. The daughter of Beeri, the Hittite, and one of the first two wives of Esau (Gen. xxxvi, 34). She is else- where more correctly called ANAHIRAH, the daughter of Esrail (Gen. xxvi, 32, 33; xxxvi, 2, 4). See Beeri.

2. The heroine of the apocryphal book which bears her name, who appears as an ideal type of piety (Jud. vii, 6. 8), beauty (xvi, 21), courage, and chastity (xvi, 29 sq.). Her supposed descent from Simeon (ix, 2), and the manner in which she refers to his cruel deed (Gen. xxix, 26 sq.), mark the conception of the character, which evidently belongs to a period of stern and perilous conflict. The most unscrupulous daring (ch. xiii) is combined with zealous ritualism (xii, 1 sq.), and faith is turned to action rather than to supplication (viii, 51 sq.).

Clement of Rome (Ep. i, 55) assigns to Judith the epi- thet given to Joel (Joaeli v επαρεν): and Jerome sees in her exploit the image of the victory of the Church over the power of evil (Ep. lxxix, 11, 508: Judith ... in typo Ecclesiae dolomi capite truncavit; compare Ep. xxii, 10, 105). According to the Greek text, Judith was the rich widow of Manasseh of Bethulia; to which the Vulgate adds that she was the daughter of Merari, or more properly Beeri (ךָרַי), as the Hebrew version has it; the latter also places her in the days of Maccabees, which is undoubtedly correct. See JUDITH. BOOK OF.

JUDITH, BOOK OF, one of the most interesting of the apocryphal books, which has called forth a greater variety of opinions among interpreters since the days of the Reformation than almost any other of the Deutero-canonical productions. Its historical bearings are es- pecially important.

I. Title and Position of the Book. —The book is named after its heroine, מִרְי: Jevvitha. St. Jerome's opinion, that it is so called because Judith was the authoress of it (Comment. in Agg. i, 6), is rightly rejected by every scholar of the Septuagint. The book, according to the Vulgate, and in Wycliffe's translation, Judith is placed between Tobit and Esther. This is followed by Coverdale, the Geneva version, the Bishops' Bible, and the A. V., where, from the nature of the division, it is put be- tween Tobit and the apocryphal Esther. In the Vat- sian copies it is placed between Tobit and the Wisdom of Solomon; in the Zurich Bible, between Baruch and the apocryphal Esther; whilst Luther puts it at the head of the apocryphal books.

II. Design and Contents of the Book. —The object of this book evidently is to show that as long as God's peo- ple walk in his commandments blamelessly, no matter how distressing the circumstances in which they may temporarily be placed, the Lord will not suffer the ene- my to triumph over them, but will in due time appea for their deliverance, and cause even those who are not Jews to acknowledge that the God of Israel is the only true God. In external form this is shown by the character of the record of a historical event, describing the complete defeat of the Assyrians by the Jews through the prowess of a woman.

In the twelfth year of his reign, Nebuchadnezzar, or, as he is called in the Greek, Νομόσασισσομοσος, king of Assyria in Asia Minor, who dwelt in the hill-country, by Euphrates, Tigris, Hydas- pes, and by the plain of Arioch, king of the Elymas- ans, made war against Arphaezad, king of Medias, who had fortified himself in Ecabata (i, 1-7); and, despite the inhabitants of the countries of the West, Peria, Li- banus, anti-Libanus, Carmel, Gaalad, Gallilee, Esdracon, Samaria, etc., refusing their aid (ver. 8-12), conquered Arphaezad, and returned home to Nineveh in the seven- teenth year of his reign (ver. 13-16). The following year, determined to carry out his resolution to wreak his vengeance on those nations who refused their aid, he dispatched his chief general Holofernes, at the head of 120,000 infantry and 12,000 cavalry (i, 22), who soon subdued Mesopotamia, Syria, Libya, Cilicia, and Idumea (ii, 23; iii, 8), and marched on Judea (ver. 9, 10). The inhabitants of the sea-coast made a voluntary submission, which, however, did not prevent them from being laid waste, their sacred groves burned, and their idols destroyed, in order that divine honors should be paid only to Nebuchadnezzar. Holofernes, having finally encamped in the plain of Esdracon (i, 8), re- mained inactive for a whole month—or two, according to the Latin version. But the children of Israel, who had newly returned from captivity, hearing of Holofernes' atrocities, and being afraid of his despoiling the Temple, determined to resist the enemy, and pre- pared for war under the direction of their high-priest Joachim, or Erach. The inhabitants of Bethulia, at once took possession of the high mountains and fortified their houses (i, 5), whilst the inhabitants of Bethulia and Beto- mestham, according to the command of the high-priest Joachim, guarded the passes of the mountains near Do- hmac (ver. 6-8); and, having made all the necessary preparations, they held them fast, and kept the road for protection (ver. 9-15). Furaged, as well as aston- ished at their audacity in preparing to fight against him, Holofernes made inquiries of the chiefs of Ammon and Moab who this people was (v, 1-4). Achor, the leader of the Ammonites, then gives him the history of the Jews, and tells him that no power could vanquish them unless they sin against their God (ver. 5-21). The proud army, however, becomes exceedingly angry with this statement (v, 1-9), and Holofernes orders Achor to be thrown into the Jewish camp, in order that he may be destroyed in the general destruction which was impending over the people whom he described as invincible (ver. 10-13). The Jews pick him up, and lead him to the governor of Bethulia, to whom he relates this, and who comforts him (ver. 14-21). The next day Holophernes marches against Bethulia, takes the mountain passes, seizes all the supplies of water (vii, 1-7), and lays siege to the city (ver. 8-19), which lasts forty days, when two young people urge the governor, Oziel, to surrender it, and he decides to do so unless relieved within five days (ver. 20-32). The pious widow Judith, however, denounces this decision as tempting the Almighty (viii, 1-31), and conceives a plan for delivering the people (ver. 32-56). With this view she entices the head of Holophernes, and all his officers, to the city, and persuades them to surrender, and to permit the gates of the city to be opened for her. Having prayed to the God of her fathers for the overthrow of the enemy (ix, 1-14), she arranges herself in rich attire, and, accompanied by her maid, who carries a bag of provision, goes to the camp of Holophernes (x, 1-11). The guards, seeing this beautiful woman, and hearing her story, conduct her to the general (ver. 12-23), whom she tells that the Jews would now be vanquished, because they had sinned against God in eating the victuals consecrated to the Temple (xi, 1-2), and that the Lord had fled from the assembled delinquents, and would show him the access to the city, only requesting that she should be permitted to go out of the camp to pray in the night (ver. 16-19). Holophernes, smitten with her charms, gives her a sumptuous entertainment, and invites her to remain alone with him until the next night (xii, 1-9). When heavily asleep in consequence of having drunk too freely, Judith seizes his falchion, strikes off his head, gives it to her maid outside, who puts it in the bag which contained the provisions; they both leave the camp as usual under the pretence of devotion, and return to Bethulia, displaying the head of Holophernes, amidst the rejoicing, and thanksgivings of the people (xiii, 1-20). Achior, hearing of this wonderful deliverance, is at once converted to Judaism, whilst Judith counsels the Israelites to surprise the enemy next morning (xiv, 1-10), who, being panic-stricken at the loss of their general, are soon discomfited, leaving immense spoil in the hands of the Jews (xv, 11-xx, 11). The women of Israel then express their gratitude to their sister (ver. 12-13), whilst Judith bursts forth in a sublime song of praise to the God of their salvation (xvi, 1-17), whereupon all of them go down to the river, to wash the bodies of their deceased compatriots, and sacrifices and feastings (ver. 18-20). Judith afterwards returns to her native place, Bethulia, manumits her maid, and dies at the advanced age of 105 years, greatly lamented by all the nation, whose peace no enemy dared to disturb for a long time (ver. 21-25). The Jews enjoying a profound and just peace, celebrate a yearly festival (according to the Vulgate) is instituted in honor of the victory.

III. Original Language, Versions, Condition of the Texts, etc.—That this book was originally written in Hebrew or Syro-Chaldaic is distinctly declared by St. Jerome, who says that "Judith is read by the Jews among the Hagiographa... and, being written in Chaldee (Chaldee sermones, so called) is reckoned among the histories," and that he used a Chaldee copy to correct thereby the vitiated readings of the MSS. (Pref. ad Jund.). This is, moreover, corroborated by the Byzantine historian John Malalas (fl. circa A.D. 880), who, having embodied the contents of Judith in his Chronographia, remarks, Τὸς εἶναι ἐν τῆς Εὐαγγελίας καὶ τοῖς γραφομένωι (i.e., ed. Oxon. 1691). Besides, the Greek contains unmistakable indications that it was made from a Hebrew or Aramaean original, e.g. giving the Hebrew use of the relative in ἐν τῷ ἐστὶν ἐν αὐτῷ (x, 2), ὑπὸ τὸ μᾶς ὄνομα (xvi, 4), the literal rendering of τοῦ ἐν τῷ παραβουλή (xii, 7), which has occasioned so much difficulty to interpreters, but which is easy enough when it is borne in mind that the Hebrew preposition ש is signified by more; the many Hebraisms (7, 16, 16, 7, 16, 18, 23, 13, 8, 10, 10, 1, 2, 6, 11, 15; v, 9, 12, 14, 16, 15; v, 15, 18; x, 7, 28; x, 5, 16; vii, 18, 19; viii, 19, and the mistranslations of the Hebrew (ii, 8; ii, 3, 1, 9, 10; v, 15, 18; vii, 27; x, 11). Gesenius, and especially Movers, have been very successful in their efforts to correct the present geographical errors by the supposition of a Hebrew original. Barteni, (9) the latter conclusion is, according to the ancient Jewish tradition (xii, 12) the two arms of the Nile. For γαλαγοι are read γαλαγοί, and considers Rassas to be an oversight for Tarshish. Origen was therefore misinformed when he was told that Judith did not exist in the Hebrew Βιβλία μέχρι ἐγκόσμων οὗτος τὸ Βιβλίον αὐτοῦ. And the Septuagint is so frequent in τοὺς οὐρανοὺς κατὰ ἑπτάκοσις Ιερουσαλήμ, ὡς αὐτῶν μάθων ιερογλυφικάς ἱστορίας, Ep. ad Afric., sec. 13). The Old Latin and the Syriac versions were made from the Septuagint, which, however, does not represent a fixed Hebrew or Aramaean original text, as may be seen from the various corrections of it differing greatly from each other. This is, moreover, corroborated by the fact that the Old Latin, the MSS. of which also deviated greatly from each other, and which St. Jerome corrected according to an Aramaean codex, differs materially from the Septuagint, of which the oldest MSS. are those of the 2nd century, with Sept. iv, 10; Vulg. v, 12, with Sept. v, 11-14; Vulg. v, 26-29 with Sept. v, 23-25; Vulg. vi, 15 with Sept. vi, 19; Vulg. vii, 18-20 with Sept. vii, 29; sometimes less (comp. Vulg. vii, 9, 10 with Sept. viii, 8, 15; Vulg. vii, 12-19 with Sept. viii, 17-23; Vulg. ix, 5-11, 12-15; with Sept. x, 22-24; not different (comp. i, 6, 8, 9, iv, 5; viii, 1), and sometimes the numbers (i, 2; ii, 1; vii, 2, etc.). A very minute collection of the variations between the Vulgate and the Sept. is given by Capellus, Commentarius in V. T. (Amstel, 1695), p. 574, etc.; and Eichhorn, Einleitung in das Alte Testament, p. 375. There are also extant several Hebrew recensions of Judith. Three of these have been published by Jellinek in his Beth Ha-Midrash, vols. i and ii, Leipzig, 1858, and the one which comes nearest to the Greek and Latin versions certainly removes all the difficulties against the historical character of the book contained in those versions. They are called הכהנים הכהנים הכהנים בֶּת הַמִּדְרָשׁ, הַמִּדְרָשׁ (Beth Ha-Midrash, i, 130-136), and הַמִּדְרָשׁ (Beth Ha-Midrash, ii, 12-22). Other Hebrew editions (אר verfügbar וספירה have been published at Berlin (1766, 5vo), Venice (5, 8vo), and Frankfort-on-the-Main (ed. S., London, 1715, 8vo); Coverdale and the Bishops' Bible, following Luther and the Zurich Bible, have translated from the Vulgate, whilst the Geneva version, which is followed by the A. V., has a translation of the Greek text.

IV. Historical Character of the Book.—There are three theories about the nature of this book:

a. Up to the time of the Reformation, the view that this book records actual history was universally entertained among Christians. The difference of opinion which obtained during those fifteen centuries, and which still exists among the defenders of its historical character, is about the time when the book occurred, involving as a necessary consequence the identification of the principal characters, etc. The limits of the range of time within which they have alternately been placed are B.C. 784-459. The most ancient opinion, however, is that the circumstances here described occurred after the Babylonian captivity, which is supported by the book itself (comp. iv, 3, v, 18, 19, Sept.; v, 22, 23, Vulg.). Still, as it does not tell us what this Nebuchadnezzar was, the advocates of this view have tried to identify him with every Persian monarch in succession to the Median, but others, take him to be Cambyses; Julius Africanus and Georgius Syncellus regard him as Cyrus; Mecassar. Estius, etc., make him to be Darius Hystaspis; whilst Sulpicius Severus and others identify him with Aras-saces Orzes (comp. Suidas, s. v. Judith; Bellarmine, De Verb. (ad Athis.) conjectures that this was the Holofernes of Judith. From its termination the name is supposed to be of Persian extraction (compare Orophernes, Polybius, xxxiii, 12), as Tisaphernes, Artaphernes, etc.

c. As the book itself, however, gives no intimation whatever that it is a fiction or an allegory, but, on the contrary, is written in such a way as to be read as history and not as fiction, it is evident from its minute geographical (i, 7; ii, 21 sqq.; iii, 9 sqq.; iv, 4 sqq.), historical (i, 5 sqq.), and chronological (i, 13, 16, viii, 4, xvi, 23) descriptions, that the author, his history, his war, and his other cities take it to contain a substance of true embellishment.

This view is supported by the following facts: 1. Notwithstanding the arbitrary and uncritical manner in which the deuterocanonical historians dispose of their materials, they have always a certain amount of truth, around which they cluster the traditional embellishments. 2. A summary of the contents of Judith is given in the ancient Jewish prayer for the first and second Sabbaths of the Feast of Dedication—beginning with אֲלֵה יָמֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל וְאַרְנָבַי וַעֲרָבָי; among the events which occurred in the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, and which it cannot be supposed that the Jews would make it the basis of thanksgiving when the deliverance was never wrought, and the whole of it was nothing but a fiction. 3. There are many facts in the book which record facts independently of the book of Judith. There is one, in particular, which gives a better recension of this book than either the Septuagint or the Vulgate, bears as much resemblance to the Septuagint and Vulgate as these two versions bear to each other, and removes many of the difficulties which the historical truths it inasmuch as it begins with ch. v, 5, and thus shows that the Septuagint, from which the other versions were made, has put together two different records.

Those, however, who understand the book to be an allegory, have attempted to verify the Jewish population, as to earthly resources, yet, by favor with God and man, prevailing over the powers of the world, do not thus relieve the fable from grave moral objections. An intelligent Jew, well read in the Hebrew Scriptures, could not have thought of setting up Judith as a proper emblem of female heroism and virtue. Her plan of procedure is marred throughout by hypocrisy and deceit; she even prays to God that he would prosper her deceit (ix, 12), and praises the cruelty of Simeon in slaying the Shechemites, as if his deed bore on it the sanction of heaven, though Jacob, the father of Simeon, had avowed in the name of God to eternal repro\-

The spirit of vengeance, resolve in its aim, un\- scrupulous in the means taken to accomplish it, is the prevailing animus of the story—a spirit certainly opposed to the general teaching of Old as well as New Testament Scripture, and incapable of being embodied in a heroic story except by one who had much more regard for the political than the moral and religious ele\- ments in Judaism.

V. Author and Date.—The difference of opinion upon this subject is as great as it is upon the character of the book. It is not named either by Philo or Josephus; nor have we any indication whatever by which to form a conjecture respecting its author. But it has been supposed by some that it could not have been written by a contemporary, from the circumstance of the family of Achior being mentioned as still in existence, and of the ancient Midian being still celebrated as the original of the New Moon being mentioned (vii, 6, comp. with Mark xv, 42). De Wette (Einleitung) conceives that the whole composition bespeaks an author who was a native of Palestine, who could not have lived beyond the end of the 1st century of the Christian era (the date assigned to it by Eichhorn), inasmuch as it is then cited by Clement of Rome, but that the probability is that it was much earlier written. Movers, a Roman Catholic professor at Bonn, a man of great penetration in similar investigations respecting the canonical or deuterocanonical books, has fixed the date of its composition in the year B.C. 104. "The author," he observes, "who has transferred the geographical relations of his own time to a former period [see, however, Foster, Geography of Arabia, 1844, i, 183], makes the Jewish territory appear less extensive than it was, and the city of Babylonia against which Holofernes directed his attack, the first Jewish city at the entrance into Judaea (iv, 7), reckoning the territory intervening between this and Samaria as tributary to the Jewish high-priest. This state of affairs continued from the time of John Hyrcanus to Pompey's invasion of Judaea, Holofernes had seized upon Samaria, and wrested Scythopolis, with the surrounding territory, from Epirates, the general of Ptolemy Lathurus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 10, 3), B.C. 110, according to Usher. But Samaria and Scythopolis, with other acquisitions of the Maccabees, were wrested from the Jews when Pompey, B.C. 48, reduced Judaea to its ancient limits. The sea-coast (iii, 1) independent of the Jews, continued, since the last years of the reign of Alexander Janneus, to be a Jewish possession; but Carmel, which (i, 8) was inhabited by the Jews, numbered its inhabitants in the time of Hyrcanus, and did not reign, and he first seized it after the war with Ptolemy Lathyrus (xiv, 15, 4,)." It is to this war that Movers considers the book of Judith to refer, and he supposes it to have been written after the unfortunate battle at Asosich, in Galilee (or, rather, Asophen on the Jordan: Movers, Uber die Umgebung der Destrucrion, etc., in the Bowar Zeitschrift, xiii, 36 sqq.). De Wette conceives that this hypothesis is opposed by the following geographical combinations: 1. Galilee belonged to the Asosichus, the proof of which, indeed, is by no means certain, while the following indications thereof present themselves: (a) Asosichus seems to have belonged to Alex\- ander Janneus, as it received Ptolemy Lathyrus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 12, 4, comp. with xv, 4). (b) Hyrcanus had his son Alexander Janneus brought up in Galilee (xiii, 12, 1). (c) Antigonus returned from Galilee (War, i, 6, 8). (d) Aristobulus seized upon Iturea (iv, xii, 1, 8), which presupposes the possession of Galilee. (e) Even after the limits of Galilee were circumscribed by Pompey, it still belonged to the Jewish high-priest (War, i, 10, 4). 2. Idumea belonged to the Jewish state, but the sons of Esau came to Holophernes (vii, 4, 18). 2. The story of the war with Ptolemy Lathyrus, De Wette's view, the irruption of Holophernes would rather correspond with the movements of the Cyprian army, which proceeded from Asosich to Sephoris, and thence to Asophen (Einleitung, § 307).

Wollf and others ascribe the authorship to Achior. B.C. 536-629; Huetius in Propr. Evangel. p. 217, Calv. (Instaur. Pretium, p. 142, etc., to Joshua, the son of Josuedek, the companion of Zerubbabel, B.C. 536-515; St. Jerome, etc., to Judith herself; Ewald, Vaihinger, etc., to the time of John Hyrcanus, B.C. 130-129; Volmar, who takes it to be an allegorical description of the victo\- ry over the Medes and Jews over Holofernes, the disengagement of Trajan, maintains (originally in the Theol. Jahrbuch, 1856, p. 362; and 1857, p. 448 sqq.; afterwards in Hinbl. d. Einl. d. Apok. Thub. 1890) that it was written for the twelfth of Aadar, A.D. 117-118, to commemo\- rate this day (סילassi בוי). He makes Nebuchadnez\- zezar stand for Trajan, Nineveh for Antioch, Assyria for Syria, Arphaxad for the Parthians, En-dor for Meta\- phassa, Holofernes for Lucullus, and the deduction of Judith for Judaea. This explanation assumes the spuriousness of the reference in the Prophets and this date (i, 6), which is too early for the date assigned. It has been adopted by Baur, Hitzig (in HilGENfeld's Zeitschr. 1808, p. 240 sqq.), and Schenkel; but it is opposed by Higges.

JUDSON 1087

He was the eldest son of Adoniram and Abigail Judson. Before he was ten years of age he had acquired a reputation as a superior student, and in 1807 graduated with the highest honors from Providence College (now Brown University), being not yet twenty years old. For a short period subsequently he was unsettled in his religious beliefs, but, assured by his father of the necessity of continuing under peculiar circumstances, he became an earnest inquirer after the truth, and, though not a Christian, was admitted as a "special student" in the divinity school of Andover, and while there was converted, and joined the Congregational Church. In 1809 he declined a tutorship in Brown University, and in 1810, formed the resolution of becoming a missionary to India, and went there. Several young men joined the seminary at this time who had also been for some time impressed with the need of missions to heathen peoples. Judson became intimately associated with them, and their zeal finally led them to press this object on the attention of the American churches, and, though not properly the cause, they were the occasion of the formation of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, who sent Mr. Judson to England to confer with the London Missionary Society as to the practicability of an affiliation between the two, and being forced by their joint action to abandon the project.

Mr. Judson left America on this errand January 1, 1811, but on the way was captured by a privateering vessel, carried to France, and did not reach London till April 6, 1811. His mission failed in its primary object, but was of advantage to the cause of missions in the American Church, and the American Board was enabled to assume the responsibility of sending out its own missionaries.

Mr. Judson, after marrying Ann Hasseltine, Feb. 5, 1812, embarked for India on the 19th of the same month, under the auspices of this new organization. His views of the necessity of baptism on the voyage, almost immediately after his arrival he sought imminovation at the hands of Dr. Carey, the Baptist missionary at Serampore. The Baptists in America were already possessed of considerable missionary zeal and intelligence, and, on learning of Dr. Judson's change of view, were roused to intense earnestness, and in 1814 they organized a denominational missionary society, and took Dr. Judson under their patronage. The hostility of the East India Company towards missionaries was at that time so intense, that within ten days after Judson's arrival in India he was peremptorily ordered to leave the country, and being forced to comply, he took passage in a vessel for the Isle of France, Nov. 30, 1812. He subsequently returned to Madras, but, finding the East India Company uncompromising in their opposition, he departed for Bombay, and reached Rangoon July 15, 1818. Accepting Burmah as his mission-field, Mr. Judson addressed himself to the task of acquiring the language of that country, and not only attained to the greatest familiarity with it, but spoke and wrote it with "the elegance of a cultured scholar." At an early period in these pursuits he published some "Grammatical Notices" of the language, which in a few short pages (only twenty-six) furnished "a most complete grammar of this difficult tongue." In imitation of the Burmese rest-houses attached to their pagodas for the accommodation of pilgrims and worshippers, Mr. Judson instituted a Zyiul in the public street for the reception of and conversation with inquirers about the gospel. This was ever a notable feature of his ministry, as he spent whole days thus with the people. Meeting with some success among the people, he resolved to go to Ava, the capital, and "lay his missionary designs before the throne, and solicit toleration for the Christian religion."

His efforts were ineffectual, and he returned to Rangoon, and made a short trip to Calcutta for the recovery of Mrs. Judson's health. On July 20, 1822, Dr. Price, a newly-arrived missionary physician, was summoned to attend on the king at Ava, and Mr. Judson was compelled to accompany him as interpreter. While at Ava Mr. Judson became known as the "Religion propagating teacher," and, as his missionary prospects seemed favorable, though he went to Rangoon temporarily, he returned to Ava to prosecute his work. War breaking out between the British-India and the Burmese governments, all the foreigners at Ava came under suspicion as spies, and in January, 1826, Mr. Judson was arrested. His horrible experiences of that incarceration cannot readily be described. On March 25, 1826, Mr. Judson himself wrote, "Through the kind interposition of our heavenly Father, our lives have been preserved in the most imminent danger from the hand of the executioner, and in regard to the most alarming, most alarming, protracted imprisonment of one year and five months; nine months in three pairs of fetters, two months in five, six months in one, and two months a prisoner at large." After his release he rendered most important service to the British government in the formation of the treaty at Yandabo, and later in a commercial treaty. While absent with the government embassy as interpreter, his first wife, one of the noblest of women, died. Mr. Judson shortly after (1827) returned from Ava and settled at Amherst, but subsequently removed to Maulmain, as even then it was a much more important post. From this time his life was variously employed in his mission-work at Maulmain, Rangoon, Prome, and other places, and became interested in the Karedens (q.v.), among whom he made several missionary tours. In 1834 he married Mrs. Sarah Boardman, and completed his revision of the whole Burmese Bible, in the revising and perfecting of which, however, he spent sixteen years more. This was the great work of his life, and "the best judges venture to hazard the opinion that three centuries hence Judson’s Bible will be the Bible of the Christian Church of Burmah" (Cutclla Review, xiv, 454). He also compiled a short Burmese and English dictionary. With a larger work of this kind he was occupied at the time of his death. In 1839-40 his health failed, and he was obliged to take several voyages for its recovery. In 1846, in consequence of the failing health of Mrs. Judson, he left for America. Mrs. Judson died at St. Helena, and Mr. Judson, continuing his voyage, reached Boston on October 15. He was received in America "with affectionate and enthusiastic veneration that knew no bounds. His eminent position as the founder and pioneer of the mission; his long and successful labors in the East; his romantic and eventful life, associated with all that is most beautiful and lofty in human nature; his world-wide fame, and his recent afflictions, encircled him in the people’s mind with the halo of an apostle." But Mr. Judson’s heart was in Burmah. After marrying Miss Emily Chubbuck in June, 1846, he set sail for Asia, and arrived at Rangoon on Nov. 30 of that year. His health, however, again declined, and he was obliged once more to return to the sea for relief, but died on his way to the Isle of Bourbon, April 12, 1850, and was buried at sea. (J. T. G.)

Judson, Ann Hasseltine, was born at Bradford, Mass., Oct. 22, 1789. She was married to Adoniram Judson on Feb. 5, 1812, and was the first American woman to devote herself to foreign mission service. She became "intimately associated with her husband in all his plans of benevolence, and bore an important part in the establishment" (Walter’s "Judson," 414). In 1824, in consequence of protracted ill health, leaving her husband in Burmah, she proceeded alone to America, where she remained, adding, however, much to the interest and advancement of missions by the publication of a very interesting account of the state of the Burmese, and a series of letters to Mr. Butterworth, a member of Parliament, whose hospitality she enjoyed while in England, till 1823, when she rejoined her husband at Rangoon, and proceeded with him to Ava. It was during the trying scenes of the succeeding two years, with her husband, that the devoted care, tact, and heroic resolution were so manifest. Her whole time, with the exception of twenty days when she was confined by the birth of her child, was devoted to the alleviation of the sorrows of her husband and his fellow-prisoners. She was perfectly familiar with the Burmese language, and possessed of a "presence which commanded respect even from savage barbarians, and incensed her with a moral atmosphere in which she walked unharmed in the midst of a hostile city and unrestrained." Her influence was acknowledged as contributing largely to the submission to the English terms of peace by the Burmese government. She died at Amherst on Oct. 24, 1826, during the absence of her husband, of disease which her sufferings and proximation at Ava had rendered her constitution incapable of resisting. "To great clearness of intellect, large powers of comprehension, and intuitive female sagacity, ripened by the constant necessity of independent action, she added that heroic disinterestedness which naturally loses all consciousness of self in the prosecution of a great object. These elements were, however, still veiled, and were hidden from public view by a veil of unusual feminine delicacy." (J. T. G.)

Judson, Sarah Boardman, was born in Alstead, N. H., Nov. 4, 1803. She was the daughter of Ralph and Abia Hull, and was married to the Rev. George D. Boardman in 1825, with whom she proceeded to Tavoy, Burmah, and in his missionary work shared great dangers and sufferings. Her husband died in 1831. Two of her children had previously died, and with one child, a son, left to her, she continued to prosecute her missionary work. In 1838 she married Mr. Judson, and in 1846, in consequence of failing health, she left Ava, and for America, accompanied by her husband. On their arrival at St. Helena Mrs. Judson died, Sept. 1, 1845. She translated the New Testament and Burmese treatises into Poguan, and "Pilgrim’s Progress" into Burmese. Of her a writer in the "Cutclla Review" says (vol. xiv.), "Exquisite sensibility, a poet’s soul and imagination, great natural abilities, thorough unselfishness, and a woman’s depth of love and affection, all shrouded by the most unpretending meekness and devotion, were some of the elements which blended together to form a character of extreme delicacy." Her "Letters to her son" are said to be "written on the green grass, etc., is enough to entitle her to high praise as a poet." (J. T. G.) tribes of Europe. Originally it was the name of the festival of winter solstice, and the practices of that festival have in the main been incorporated in the Christmas feast, they term it Jul. See Jules.

Jules are a spiritus and demons among the northern tribes, especially the Laplanders, to whom divine adoration is paid. They suppose them to dwell under particular trees, and proceed thither to offer up sacrifices once a year, at Christmas time, whence the name of the Christian festival corresponds to their Jul (q. v.). See Broughton, Biblioth. Ant. Sacra, s. v.; Thorpe, Northern Mythol. ii, 49 sq.

Julia (Joulia, fem. of Julius), a Christian woman of Rome, to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi, 15); she is named with Philologus, and is supposed to have been his wife or sister. A.D. 55.—Kitto, "Origens supposes that they were master and mistresses of a Christian household which included the other persons mentioned in the same verse. Some modern critics have conjectured that the name may be that of a man, Julius."

Julian the Apostate, emperor of Rome A.D. 361—363, is especially celebrated by his able and vigorous, but vain attempt to restore the ancient Greco-Roman paganism in the Roman Empire to its former power and glory. He was the nephew of Constantine the Great, the first Christian on the throne of the Caesars, and was educated under the restraining influence of the court Christianity of his cousin, the August, empress Constantina. He was a monastic, intolerant, tyrannical, and hypocritical form of this belief repelled the independent youth, and made him a bitter enemy of Christianity, and an enthusiastic admirer of the heathen poets and philosophers, whose writings inspired him to the extent of the severe prohibitions against them he managed secretly to procure and to study, especially during his sojourn at the University of Athens. "The Arian pseudo-Christianity of Constantius produced the heathen anti-Christianity of Julian, and the latter was a well-deserved punishment of the former." But he shrewdly concealed his real convictions, and hypocritically conformed to all the outward rites of Christianity till the death of the emperor. His heathenism was not a simple, spontaneous growth, but an artificial and morbid production. It was the heathenism of pantheistic eclecticism and Neo-Platonism, a strange mixture of philosophy, poetry, superstition, and superstition, at least, in great part an imitation or caricature of Christianity. With all his philosophical intelligence, he credited the most insipid legends of the gods, or gave them a deeper mystic meaning by the most arbitrary allegorical interpretation. He was in intimate personal intercourse with Jupiter, Minerva, Apollo, Hercules, who paid their nocturnal visits to his heated fancy, and assured him of their special favor and protection. His moral character corresponded to this pseudo-philosophy. He was full of affectation, vanity, sophistry, loquacity, and dissimulation. Everything he said, or wrote, or did was studied and calculated for effect. His apostasy from Christianity Julian dates from his twentieth year, A.D. 351. But while Constantius lived he concealed his pagan sympathies with consummate hypocrisy for ten years, and outwardly conformed to all the rites of the Church. After his death he made the world with brilliant military successes and executive powers as Caesar in Gaul, which was at that time threatened by barbarians, and won the enthusiastic love of his soldiers. Now he raised the standard of rebellion against his imperial cousin, and in 361 openly declared himself a friend of the gods. But before the end of the year Constantius in the same year he became sole emperor, and made his triumphal entry into Constantinople. He immediately set to work with the utmost zeal to reorganize all departments of the government on the former heathen basis. He displayed extraordinary talent, industry, and executive tact. The eighteen short months of his reign (Dec. 861–June, 863) comprehended the plans of a life-long administration. He was the most gifted, the most learned, and most active, and yet the least successful of Roman emperors. His reign was an utter failure, teaching the important lesson that it is useless to swim against the stream of history and to impede the onward march of Christianity. He proved, beyond the possibility of doubt, that paganism had out-lived itself, and that Christianity was the only living religion which had truly conquered the world, and carried all the hopes of humanity. He died in the midst of his plans in a campaign against the East—tragically predicting the result in a letter to his son (according to another tradition), "Soiliean, thou hast conquered!"

Julian did not resort to open violence in his attempt to destroy Christianity in the empire. He affected the policy of philosophical toleration. He did not wish to give the Christians an additional glory of martyrdom. He hoped to attain his end more surely in an indirect way. He endeavored to revive heathenism by his own personal zeal, and by the worship of the gods. But his zeal found no echo, and only made him ridiculous in the eyes of the cultivated heathen themselves. When he endeavored to restore the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, and arranged for a magnificent display, only a solitary priest appeared in the temple and ominously offered—a goose. He also attempted to reform heathenism by incorporating it with the morals and benevolent institutions of Christianity. But this was like galvanizing a decaying corpse, or grafting fresh scions on a dead tree. As to the negative part of his assault upon Christianity, Julian gave liberty to all the sects, in the hope that they might devour each other, but, instead of that, he only gave new vigor to the cause he hated. He forbade the Christians to read the classical authors, and deprived them of the benefit of the public schools of their own, that they might either grow up in ignorance, or be forced to get an education from heathen teachers. He assisted the Jews in rebuilding the Temple of Jerusalem in order to falsify the prophecy of Christ, but the attempt, three times repeated, signally failed, by an interposition of Providence approaching to the character of a miracle. (Respecting this question, see the judicious remarks in Lardner's Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol. iv.) Finally he wrote a book against Christianity, in which he united all the arguments of Porphyry, Celsus, Lucian, and other enemies before him, and infused into them his own bitter and sarcastic spirit. But this attack called for able refutations from Gregory of Nazianzum, Cyril of Alexandria, and others, and contains a number of incidental admissions which confirm the truth of most of the leading facts of the Gospel history. Dr. Lardner (in his learned book on the Credibility of the Gospel History, in the London edition of his works by Kipps, vii, 638–639) thus sums up the involuntary testimony of this ablest and bitterest of all the heathen opponents of Christianity:

"Julian has borne a valuable testimony to the history, and to the books of the New Testament. He allows that Jesus was born in the reign of Augustus, at the time of the taxing made in Judaea by Cyrenius; that the Christian religion had its rise, and began to be propagated, in the times of the emperor Tiberius and Claudius. He bears witness to the genuineness and authenticity of the four gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and the Acts of the Apostles; and he so quotes them as to intimate that they were the only historical books received by Christians as of authority, and the only authentic memoirs of Jesus Christ and his apostles, and the doctrines preached by them. He allows their early date, and even argues for it. He also quotes, or plainly refers to, the Acts of the Apostles, to St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans, the Corinthians, and the Galatians. He does not deny the miracles of Jesus Christ, but allows him to have 'healed the blind, and the lame, and dumb, and the sick,' and to have 'rebuked the winds, and walked upon the waves of the sea.' He endeavors, indeed, to diminish these works, but in vain. The account is considerably thereby the more precious as coming from a divine mission. He endeavors also to lessen the number of the early believers in Jesus, and yet he acknowledges that there were 'multitudes of such men in Greece and Italy' before St. John wrote his Gospel. He likewise attempts to diminish the certainty with which the miracles of Jesus, and successful preachers of his Gospel; so that upon the whole, he has undesignedly borne testimony to the truth of many things recorded in the books of the New Testament. He aimed to overthrow the Christian religion, but has confirmed it: his arguments against it are the strongest for it. He was the greatest, the weakest Christian. He justly exerts to some things introduced into the Christian profession by the later professors of it, in his own time or sooner, but has not made one objection of moment against the Christian religion as contained in the genuine and authentic books of the New Testament."

Julianus)* Cæsarianus, Cardinals, one of the most distinguished characters of the Church of Rome in the Middle Ages, prominently connected with the efforts to heal the great breach within the western Church of the 15th century, and the union of the Eastern and Western churches at the Council of Florence was born at Rome in 1388, the descendant of a noble family noted in the annals of Italian history. He was educated at the University of Perugia, and early evinced the possession of great ability and unassuming talents. He particularly interested himself in the study of the Roman law, and soon acquired the reputation of being one of the foremost thinkers, and was honored with a professor's chair at Padua. He was not suffered, how- ever, to continue long in the rostrum, for the Church of his day needed men of decision and energy to allay the strife which was raging fiercely, and threatening the de- struction of the hierarchal edifice so lately dishonored in the papacy of Martin V, and the Church was hara- kiri for those who would undertake the task. See INNOCENT XXIII. Seventy years of an- archy and orphanage, sometimes familiarly termed the Babylonish captivity of the Church of Rome, the illus- trious Colonna, better known as Martin V, was to obli- mate, as well as to rebuild on a firm foundation both the papal bulwark and the cardinal character, received on such a task his own talents, however great, were not suf- ficient, and the wise, far-seeing policy of the legate was not slow to recognise the uncommon endowments of young Julian, who was accordingly appointed apostolic protonotary, an- gler, auditor of the Rota Romana. Cardinal Branda- in particular became interested in the rising Cesarini; and when, in 1419, he was sent as papal legate to Bo- hemia to bring back the erring (?) sheep of the Sla- vonic fold, Julian was the legate's companion and main- stay. Though this mission failed to accomplish its objects, it was, however, a great step on his career. In the absence of the Romans, and in 1426 (May 22) was promoted to the cardinalate of Santo Angelo. When, in 1431, a diet was summoned at Nuremberg "to con- cert immediate and vigorous action for crushing the hitherto successful rebellion," it was none other than cardinal Julian who was prominent. His opinions were confirmed by Eugenius IV) to represent him in that ec- clesiastical body, as well as in the general council which, in accordance with the celebrated decree "Frequentia" of the Council of Constance, was soon to meet at Basle. It had been determined to extirpate the Hussites by all means, and, in the papal bull on the same subject, the open arms of the Church, the cardinal legate boldly exchanged the mitre for the helmet. Quickly an army of Crusaders was gathered, and in himself blending to- gether the characters of the priest and the soldier, he sought to kindle in the hearts the fires of religious zeal and patriotic devotion. But neither the potency of a blessed banner and a consecrated sword, nor the spectac- le of an ecclesiastic urging on an army to a war of faith, had sufficiently impressed Rome's most faithful adhe- rents to brave "the face of a religious influence like that of Hussites," who were rooted in national sympathies, such as Rome could never awaken in the day of her greatest power," and ignominiously the papal legate again failed in his mission. Meanwhile, however, the Council of Basle had convened, opened in the absence of the legate by two of his deputies, and thither Julian di- rected his steps. He assumed its presidency Sept. 9, 1431, determined by peaceful measures to essay once more the accomplishment of a task which he had found it impossible to secure on the field of battle; and to his honor be it said that all the inducements which were now held out to the Hussites were the offerings of a sincere and pious soul, which had dwelt among the things else the glory of God and the honor of his Church. 'The sanguine and undaunted legate, who had been the first to beckon on the military campaign as the only remedy for the spreading disease, was now the first to fall back upon that council which he had hitherto supposed so little good. 'As I saw no other remedy left' (are his own words), 'I animated and encouraged all to remain steadfast in the faith, and to fear nothing, since on this very account I was going to the council where the whole Church would assemble'" (Jenkins). How much Julian did to obtain Eugenius's sanction to the continuance of the council which that pontiff was determined to abrog- ate, and how Julian, notwithstanding the publication of a bull abrogating the council, and convoking it eighteen months later at Bologna, continued the session, and with what liberality and sagacity he counselled in the deliberations of this synod, and with what earnest-

Juliano, a Spanish Roman Catholic of the 17th century, who, while travelling in Germany, was converted to the Protestant faith. His zeal for the diffusion of the Word of God led him to undertake the dangerous enterprise of converting into Spain a large quantity of Bibles concealed in casks, and packed up as Rhenish wine. A pretended Protestant betrayed him. He was seized by the Inquisition, and, together with eight hundred purchasers of his precious treasure, was condemned to the torture and to death.—Fox, Book of Martyrs, p. 136.

Julias, the name given by Philip the Tetrarch to Bethsaida in honor of Julia, the daughter of the emperor Augustus. See Bethsaida.

Julitta of Cappadocia, a female martyr of the 4th century, under Diocletian, was a Lycaonian of royal descent, and greatly celebrated for her Christian virtues. To avoid the bigotry of the pagan governor, she withdrew from Iceniun, her native city, to Tarso. But here, with her daughter Cyrrica, she was seized, and confessing herself a Christian, was ordered to the rack. Her beautiful boy, for repeating his mother's words, "I am a Christian," was dashed in pieces on the pavement before her eyes, for which the dying mother gave thanks to God. After patiently suffering various torments, she was beheaded, April 16, A.D. 306.—Fox, Book of Martyrs, p. 55.

Julius, (Ioannes, for the Latin Julius, the name of an honorable Roman family), the centurion of the imperial cohort who had the charge of conducting Paul as a prisoner to Rome, and who treated him with much consideration and kindness on the way (Acts xxv. 8, 43, comp. ver. 11, 31). A.D. 55.—Kitto. "Augustus's band," to which Julius belonged, has been identified by some commentators with the Italian band (Acts x, 1); by others, less probably, with the body of cavalry denominated Sebastei by Josephus (Ant. xix, 9, 2, etc.). Conybeare and Howson (Life of St. Paul, ch. xxii) adopt in the main Wieseler's opinion, that the Augustan cohort was a detachment of the Praetorian Guards attached to the person of the Roman governor at Cæsarea; and that this Julius may be the same as Julius Pascu (Tacit. Hist. ii, 92; iv, 11), sometime centurion, afterwards prefect of the Praetorians. See Italiæ Paul.

Julius, a Christian martyr, was a Roman senator in the 2nd century. A convert to Christianity, he was ordered by the emperor to sacrifice to him as Hercules. This Julius absolutely refused to do, and he was imprisoned, and finally beated to death with clubs.—Fox, Book of Martyrs, p. 22.

Julius Africanus, an ecclesiastical writer who flourished in the beginning of the 3rd century, was, according to Suidas (s.v. Africanus), a native of Libya, but resided generally at Emmaus (afterwards Nicopolis, in Palestine), at Ephesus, at Rome, and at Alexandria. Quadratum, Quartum, Augustinianus, Liban. Little is known of his personal history. Eusebius (Hist. Ecc. vi, 31) relates that he undertook a journey to Alexandria to listen to Heraclias, the teacher of the cathedrums in that city, as also that he was sent by the inhabitants of Emmaus to ask of the emperor Heliogabalus the restoration of their city, which was granted (see Jerome, De vir. illust. c. 63). He was a friend of Origen; and, as in letters addressed to him when the latter was already some fifty years old, he styles him "son." He was a beloved disciple from the time he was a little child, and was a B.C. 222, in the year 238, while the expression "colleague" seems to imply that he also was a priest. He was, according to Jerome, in the full vigor of life during the reign of Heliogabalus and Alexander Severus. We have no information concerning the precise date of his death; it occurred during the reign of Alexander Severus near the end of the third century—some say about A.D. 232. He enjoyed great reputation for learning among the ancients. He is the author of the oldest Christian history of the world, the Chronographia, or De temporiibus, which Eusebius considered very trustworthy; it extended from the creation to the third year of the reign of Heliogabalus (221). Unfortunately, the complete work is not in our possession; a portion, however, was preserved to us by copious extracts, which subsequent Church historians made from it, and these (fifty-six fragments) have been collected by M. Porcher. The best single prototype letter to Origen concerning the authenticity of the history of Susannah and the Elders, and another to Aristides on the differences between the genealogies of Christ by Matthew and Luke. In this last letter, speaking against the opinion of a fraus pia having been perpetuated, he gives a number of much advanced emperors. According to Suidas, it was a collection of Empiric formulas for curing diseases by sorcery, etc. But, as this does not seem to agree with what we know of the general character of the man, Dupin thinks that there must be some mistake, and that there probably existed both a Julius Afric anus and a Julius Sextus, who have been confounded one with the other. Finally, he has also been considered the author of several treatises—De trinitate, De circumscriptione, De Attalo, De Pauci, De Stibbiarum—which are evidently not his, but Eusebius' addition. His death is mentioned by the Novatian. See Mohler, Patrologie, i. 577-580; Routh, Rel. Sacr. ii, 108 sq.; Herzog, Rituels-Encyclop. vii, 155.

Julius Caesar, the first emperor of the Romans, deserves a place in our work on account of his connection with Jewish history. He was born at Rome, July 12, B.C. 100, and was educated in Greece, whither the Roman youths of his day were wont to resort for instruction. After having successively held the offices of tribune, questor, aedile, high-priest, and praetor or governor of Spain, Caesar was one of the three parties who constituted the triumvirate of Rome, B.C. 60. He now set out for Gaul, ostensibly aiming at the subjugation of the Gauls, but actually to form and discipline an army that might enable him to force his coadjutors to leave to him alone the government of the Romans. The success with which his efforts, both as a soldier and a politician, were rewarded, are known to us from the history of the Gallic War that flowed from his own pen, as well as from other distinguished classical historians. When he went to Gaul he was to remain there five years, but the expiration of that time finding him involved in wars with the barbarians, five years more were added. Germany, Britain, and other countries beyond the Rhine were overrun in turn; and, when, at the death of Crassus, Caesar and Pompey alone were left to contend for supremacy, a quarrel naturally enough arose between the two rivals. Pompey was the favorite of the people, and therefore easily controlled the senate; if only once Caesar could be obliged to disband the army, as whose hero the victorious general of the Gallic wars was worshiped, there could be no longer any need for contention, and Pompey alone would be intrusted with the responsibility of the Roman government. A decree was quickly passed by the Roman senate commanding Caesar to disband his forces; but Caesar not only refused to comply with the demand, but actually marched against Pompey, whom he soon overtook, and who, after being defeated in the battle of Pharsalos, B.C. 49, was made dictator. Of the pursuit of Pompey and the fate of the latter we need not speak here; but the noble conduct of the Roman general towards his fallen enemy and towards his assassins is so meritorious in its character, that it deserves at least, in passing, a Christian commendation. When the rate of the death of Pompey reached Rome, Caesar was again appointed dictator for one year and consul for five years, and was invested with tribunicial power for life. His adherence to the cause of Cleopatra led him to enter Egypt and to engage in the "Alexandrine war," which also he brought to a successful termination in March, B.C. 47. In September of this year he returned to Rome, and was once more appointed dictator. But with the death of Pompey his partisans had by no means vanished. It is true that they had quit Pompey, but in Africa they were still dutiful to the memory and principles of their late master. To Africa, therefore, Caesar directed his steps; the party of Pompey was quickly attacked and subdued. The feud of Metellus, of Scipio, of Cato, and Juba was sad indeed, but the display of noble and wise generosity which Caesar now displayed towards those who had fought against him, but were now arrayed by him against his brother, proved to him that he was possessed of a great, magnificent nature. He was not a man that could stoop to the vulgar atrocities of Marius or Sulla, and so he majestically declared that henceforth he had no enemies, and that hereafter he would make no difference between Pompeians and Cassareans. Returned to Rome, he celebrated his victories in Gaul, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa by four great triumphs, during which the whole Roman populace was feasted and fitted by his magnificent liberality. But the display in which Caesar indulged soon led the Romans to fear that he aimed higher than the dictatorship—that the true government was his object. Roman patriotism had not yet expired. Many there were, in the Eternal City in whose veins flowed republican blood, and the man who dared to conspire to deprive them of the liberties they had so long enjoyed was doomed to fall at their hands. He thereby formed the only surety of the continuation of their long-enjoyed privileges of a free and unrestric ted government. While Caesar was planning how soon 'to wear the insignia of royalty, Brutus and other senators were sharpening their weapons to take his life. On the fifteenth of March, B.C. 44, after Caesar had taken his accustomed seat in the senate at the Capitol, a friend gave him a paper containing an account of the Julius Echter was a reformer who worked against the papacy. He opposed the coronation of the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V. Echter was born in 1500 and died in 1553. He was a member of the Catholic Church and played a significant role in the Reformation. He was known for his writings and speeches against the papacy. Echter was a key figure in the Reformation Movement, and his ideas and writings helped to shape the course of the Reformation in the Catholic Church. His contributions to the Reformation were significant and his legacy is still felt today.

cle, cardinal Antonio del Monte, he entered the Church, and soon became archbishop, and was intrusted with the administration of different dioceses. Paul III made him cardinal of St. Vitale and bishop of St. Palestina, and after he had lived in his retirement the Council of Trent (q. v.). After his elevation to the pontificate (1551) the sitings of the Council of Trent, suspended under his predecessor (1549), closely allied to Charles V, he spent his reign in quarrelling with France, Venice, and also with Ferdinand, king of the Romans, and brother of Charles V. His name is linked with English history by his efforts to organize with Mary the reunion of England with Rome, See Pole. Julius III died in March, 1555, leaving behind him a very indifferent character, marked by incapacity and misconduct. While a cardinal, he was responsible for the firmness, conduct and activity. The after-becoming pope he gave himself up to luxury and pleasure, and went so far in his disregard of all consistency as to give the cardinal's place left vacant by his election to one of his servants, whose only merit consisted in having taken care of his pet mon violin and groans. See Pole, Vitae Pontiff.: Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvii, 165; Herzog, Real-Encyclop., vii, 158; Ranke, Popacy, ii, 301 sq.; Bowyer, Hist, of the Popes, vii, 438 sq.

Jumenta, cattle. Heretics who denied the resurrection of the dead were accustomed to bestow opprobrious epithets on those who persisted in maintaining the truth of Scripture. Sometimes they called them carnies, animals, jumenta, carnal, sensual, cattle; also Judas, the traitor; and Barabbas, the robber. The Jumiers of Barak's is a name for those persons who, as an inference from 2 Sam. vi, 16, believe that religious worship must be accompanied by violent agitations, convulsive leaping and dancing. This singular religious belief is said to have originated among the congregations of Mr. Whitefield, in the western part of Wales, about 1760, but it soon found friends among the Quakers, and its banishment was among the first acts of the king. The Jumiers found special defenders in the Welsh poet William Williams (q. v.), Harris Rowland (q. v.), etc. They are sometimes called Barakite because frequently they do not confine their religious exuberances to jumping and dancing, but accompany them with inverted recumbency, often degenerating into a sort of bellowing. Discontented in England, the Jumiers emigrated to the United States, and here they continue to flourish moderately. We believe they have some adherents in Pennsylvania and Ohio, and particularly in Western New England. Even the attempt of Def. of the Denomination of the Christian World (London, 1811), relates his experience in a meeting of the Jumiers which he attended: "About the year 1761 I myself was very accidentally present at a meeting which terminated in jumping. It was held in the open air, on a Sunday evening, near Newport, in Moomouthshire. The preacher was one of lady Huntington's students, who concluded his sermon with the recommendation of jumping; and I must allow him the praise of consistency, for he got down from the chair on which he stood and jumped along with his hearers. The arguments he adduced for this purpose were, that David danced before the ark, that the baby leaped in the womb of Elizabeth, and that the man whose lameness was removed leaped and praised God for the mercy which he had received! He expatiated on these topics with uncommon fervency, and then drew the inference that this ought to be an exercise of the joy for the blessings which Jesus Christ had put into their possession. He then gave an impassioned sketch of the sufferings of the Saviour, and thereby roused the passions of a few around him into a state of violent agitation. About nine men and seven women for some little time rock to and fro, screwed up their faces, and then jumped with a kind of frantic fury. Some of the audience flew in all directions; others gazed on in silent amazement. They all gradually dispersed except the jumpers, who continued their exertions from eight in the evening till near eleven at night. I saw the conclusion of it; they at last knelt down in a circle, holding each other by the hand, while one of them prayed with an awful fervency, and the others were rolling off their knees, departed; but previous to their dispersion they wildly pointed up towards the sky, and reminded another one that they should soon meet there, and never again be separated."

Junius, or rather Junius (Tousin, a deriv. of Junius, the name of a Roman family), a Christian at Rome, to whom Paul addressed a salutation in connection with Andronicus, as being his "kinsmen and fellow-laborers, who are of note among the apostles," and were in Christ before himself (Rom. xvi, 7); hence probably of Jewish extraction. A.D. 55. As the gender of the epithets applied is uncertain (συζυγεθες και συναστα-λεγομενοι), (e.g. Origen, Christians of other fathers) have supposed a female (Tousin comes equally well from Tousin) to be meant (but see Michaelis, in Pott's Sylog. vii, 128.

Junilius of Africa, generally believed to have been bishop in the 6th century, is known by his work De legibus patriisque Christianis, dedicated to his patron, St. Primasius, probably the one of Hadrumetum who in 553 indorsed the Constitutum of Vigilius. Junilius himself claimed no originality, but acknowledged his obligation to a certain Paulus of Persia, supposed to have been Paulus of Bassora, who afterwards became metropolitan of Nisibis (though he was not a Persian). The work is in the form of a dialogue between a master and his pupil, and is a sort of introduction to the sacred writings. The first book, on Scripture, is divided into two parts, on the outward expression and the inward meaning; the outward expression contains five particulars—the species of writing, its authority, its author, its style, and its order of place. The inward meaning has reference especially to three particulars, God, this world, and the next. The second book treats of this world, its creation, its government, the properties and accidents of nature, the nature of will, and the consequence of results of will. Junilius then speaks of types, of predictions before and under the law concerning Christ and the calling of the Gentiles, and of Reason in its agreement with the commands of Scripture. Special attention is due to the fact that Junilius does not count the Chronicles, or the Apocrypha, or the Books of the Maccabees among canonical books. The work has been published as Junilius de Patriis Divinae Legis, libri ii (Basil. 1545, 8vo; Francfort ad Oder, 1593, 8vo; and in Biblioth. Patrij. i.—Herzog, Real-Encyclop., viii, 174 sq. Clark, Success. of Soc. Lat. ii, 325.

Juniper (ζύμη), rothem, prob. so called from its use in boiling; Sept. in 1 Kings xix, 5, "Rūσου v. τ. Ρωύνιμον; in verse 5, "ροξωρον; in Job xxx, 4, "ορούμενος. Vulg. juniperus, but in Psal. cxxi, 4, "ορολούμενος; and in Proverbs xxxi, 3, "ορολούμενος; a shrub or tree mentioned as affording shade to Elijah in his flight to Horeb (1 Kings xix, 4, 5), and as affording material for fuel, and also, in extreme cases, for hatching eggs (Psalm xvi, 4; Job xxxi, 4). The older translators seem to have been unacquainted with it, while the modern versions have generally followed the Vulgate in referring it to the juniper (see Stengel in the Biblioth. Brem. vii, fasc. 5; Hiller, Hierophyl. i, 258; Sprengel, Geogr. & Botan. i, 20), which, however, seems to be indicated by a different Hebrew word. See Heath.

The different species of juniper have by some botanists been ranked under Ceduus, the true species being distinguished by the title of Ceduus boreiformis, and the pines by that of Ceduus conifera. Of Junipers, the species of the Greeks is oblong and jointed, and then jumped with a kind of frantic fury. Some of the audience flew in all directions; others gazed on in silent amazement. They all gradually dispersed except the jumpers, who continued their exertions from eight in the evening till near eleven at night. I saw the conclusion of it; they at last knelt down in a circle, holding each other by the hand, while one of them prayed with an awful fervency, and the others were rolling off their knees, departed; but previous to their dispersion they wildly pointed up towards the sky, and reminded another one that they should soon meet there, and never again be separated."
in the mountains of southern latitudes, usually forming a low shrub, but in some situations being fifteen feet, and even thirty feet high. J. oxycedrus, the sharp or prickly, or brown-berried juniper, closely allied to the common juniper, is an evergreen shrub, from ten to twelve, but sometimes even twenty feet high. It was found by M. Bové on Mount Lebanon. J. drupacea, or large-fruited juniper, is a species which was introduced into Europe from the East under the Arabic name kabbel. This name, however, is applied rather to all the species than to any one in particular. It is a native of Mount Cassius, and is thought to be the same as the greater juniper found by Belon on Mount Taurus, which he describes as rising to the height of a cypress. J. Phoenicea, or Phoenician juniper, is the great juniper of Dioscorides, and is a native of the south of Europe, Russia, and Syria. It has imbricated leaves, bears some resemblance to the cypress, and attains a height of from twenty to thirty feet. J. Lycia, or Lycian juniper, is a dwarf species, and J. Subina, or the common Savine, is usually a low spreading shrub, but sometimes rises to the height of ten or twelve feet. It is a native of the south of Europe and Syria. Of these species, J. oxycedrus and J. Phoenicea are the only species which could have been the beriah of Scripture. Some were of opinion that the wood of J. oxycedrus, rather than that of the so-called cedar of Lebanon, was used in ancient times for its durability, and which was therefore employed in making statues. It is to the wood of certain species of juniper that the name of cedar-wood is now specially applied. See Cedar.

The rotem, however, is no doubt the plant still called by the Arabs rotem, and commonly known as Spanish broom. In London's Encyclopædia of Plants it is named Spartium monoasperum, or white single-seeded broom, and is described as a very handsome shrub, remarkable for its numerous snow-white flowers. Onbek remarks that it grows like willow-bushes along the shores of Spain, as far as the flying sands reach, where scarcely any other plant exists except the Ononis serpena, or creeping reatherose. The use of this shrub is very great in stopping the sand. The leaves and young branches furnish delicious food for goats. It converts the most barren spot into a fine odoriferous garden by its flowers, which continue a long time. It seems to shelter hogs and goats against the scorching heat of the sun. The twigs are used for tying bundles, and all kinds of herbs that are brought to market are fastened together with them. The Spaniards call it rotem, from the Arabic name rotem. It is now referred by all botanists to the genus Genista, and called G. monosperma. It is described by De Candolle as a branching and erect shrub, with slender, wandlike, flexible branches; leaves comparatively few, linear, oblong, pressed to the branches, pubescent; inflorescence in few flowered lateral racemes; pedicels white, silky, nearly equal to one another; legumes oval, inflated, smooth, membranaceous, one to two seeded. It occurs on the sterile shores of Portugal, Spain, Barbary, and Egypt. It was found by Forskal at Suez, and named by him Genista Spartium with rotem as its Arabic name. Bové also found it at Suez, and again in different parts of Syria. Belon also mentions finding it in several places when travelling in the East. Burkhardt also frequently mentions the shrub rotem in the deserts to the south of Palestine, and he sometimes covered with this shrub, and that such places are favorite places of pasturage, as sheep are remarkably fond of the poda. Lord Lindsay again, while travelling in the middle of the valleys of Mount Sinai, says, "The rotem, a species of broom, bearing a white flower, delicately streaked with purple, afforded me frequent shelter from the sun while in advance of the caravan" (Letters, p. 188). Dr. Robinson, in his journey from Akabah to Jerusalem, says (Researches, ii, 124): "The shrubs which we had met with throughout the desert still continued. One of the principal of these is the rotem, a species of the broom-plant, the Genista rotem of Forskal. This is the largest and most conspicuous shrub of these deserts, growing thickly in the water-courses and valleys. The Arabs always selected the place of encampment, if pos-able, in a spot where it grew, in order to be sheltered by it at night from the wind; and during the day, when they often went on in advance of the camels, we found them not unfrequently sitting or sleeping under a bush of reeds to protect them from the sun. It was in this way that the prophet Elijah lay down and slept beneath the same shrub (1 Kings xix. 4, 5, "under a juniper-tree"). It affords shade and protection, both in heat and storm, to travellers (Virgil, Georgy, ii. 54, 438, and Bonar describes it as particularly useful for shelter in the peninsula of Arabia). In the other passages the meaning is not so clear, and therefore different interpretations have been given.
Thus Job (xxx. 4) says of the half-famished people who despised him, "Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and rothem-roots for the herd." Though the broom-root may perhaps be more suitable for diet than the juniper, yet they are both too bitter and medicinal to be considered or used as nutritious, and therefore some say that "when we read that rothem-roots were their food, we are to suppose a great deal more than the words express, namely, that the herd was so vicious that it was not at liberty to stray from even these roots," which were neither refreshning nor nourishing. Dr. Thomson's ingenious suggestion (Land and Book, ii. 488), that perhaps the mallows only were used for food, and the rothem-roots as fuel to cook them with, seems hardly tenable from the phraseology of the passage. He supposes (A Reader's Companion, p. 384), that the herd was so vicious that instead of the roots of this broom we are to understand a plant which grows upon these roots, as well as upon some other plants, and which is well known by the English name of broom-rape, the orobanchia of botanists.
These are sometimes eaten. Thus Dioscorides (ii. 136) observes that the orobanchia, which grows from the roots of broom, was sometimes eaten raw, or boiled like asparagus. Celsius again suggests an amendment in the sentence, and thinks that we should understand it to mean that the broom-roots were required for fuel, and not food, for the herd. This qualifying fuel and food, though very similar to each other, are very different in their derivation (see Gesenius, Theol. p. 1317; and on the contrary, Michaelis, New Orient. Bibli., v. 3, 5), and this sense is confirmed by some of the Talmudical writers, as R. Levi ben-Gerson, in his remarks on this passage, states that the broom is the only fuel procurable to many of these desert situations (see Thevenot, Trav., i.
222). In Ps. cxx. 4, David observes that the calamities of his enemies were "like arrows of the mighty, with coals of rothem." The broom, being no doubt very commonly used as fuel in a country where it is abundant, may have afterwards come to be used rather for its own sake, and its original meaning may have been in a comparison; but it is also described as sparkling, burning, and cracking more vehemently than other wood, and the Arabs regard it as yielding the best charcoal. Thus the tree which afforded shade to Elijah may have furnished also the "coals" or ashes for baking the cake which satisfied his hunger (1 Kings xix. 6).

Junius, Francis, son of the following, was born at Heidelberg, 1589. In early life he studied mathematics, but finally turned his attention to literature and theology. After finishing his studies he went to France to work at the law. In 1600 he went to England, and was received into the house of the earl of Arundel, where he lived as his librarian for thirty years. In 1630 he returned to the Continent, in order to pass some time in the bosom of his family. For two years he lived in Friesland, in a district where the ancient Saxon tongue was still preserved, that he might perfect his knowledge. In 1675 he returned to England, and in 1676 went to Oxford, whence he retired to Windsor, to his nephew Isaac Vossius, and died there Nov. 19, 1677. He was a very learned philologist, as is evinced by his written, which are De pictura Veterum, libri iii (Amsterdam, 1637, 4to)—Observationes in Willeramii Para-phrasis Franciag Aurelii Ciceronicum (Amsterdam, 1655, 4to). His Latin work is De cultu scholastica et Junius, Francis (François Du Jon), an emiinent French Protestant theologian, was born at Bourges in 1545. He studied law at first, but embracing the principles of the Reformation, for which his father suffered persecution, he removed to Geneva in 1562, to study the dead languages and theology. In 1565 he took charge of a Walloon congregation at Antwerp; the party troubles of the time, however, obliged him to withdraw first to a church in Limburg, and finally to Germany. Frederick II welcomed him at Heidelberg, and he obtained a chair in the Palatinate. During the war of 1568 he lived in the Low Countries, and was chaplains of the Prince of Orange. He afterwards again returned to his charge, and remained there until 1575, when he was called to Heidelberg by the elector, to take part with Thomae in the translation of the Old Testament. After being also for a while professor of theology at Heidelberg, he returned to France in 1592 with the duke of Bouillon, and was employed by Henry IV on a mission to Germany. Later he accepted a professorship at Leyden, where he remained until his death in 1602. His most important work was the translation of the Old Testament, which he executed in conjunction with Tremellios. It appeared in five parts, the first containing the five books of Moses (Frankfort, 1575, folio); the second embracing the historical books, 1576; the third the poetical books, 1573; the fourth the prophets, 1579; and the last the Psalms, 1579.

After the death of Tremellios the translation was revised by his colleague, and printed at London, 1584, 8vo. In the course of twenty years it passed through twenty editions, and was printed for the first time at Zurich, 1579, 8vo. Junius lived to superintend the third edition, which was still better than the second, and is the ancient text of the French Bible. During the same year the French Testament, published in 1624, folio, containing a good index by Paul Tossanius.
"The index was published in a volume by itself at Frankfort, 1687, folio, and repeated after. The translation cannot be called elegant; it is too literal, and is sometimes obscure on that ac-tount. It is also disfigured with useless glosses and rabbinical traditions" (Kitto). He wrote besides, Apost-calypticae AnaLysis (1592); Grammatica Lingua Hebraeor (3d edition, 1598); Acta Apostolorum et epistola 2 S.

Notes in Epistolam S. Jude. His Opera theologica were published at the same epoch, in two volumes, and be-parly exegetical, partly philological and polemic.
His autobiography, which is published at the beginning of his works, was written in 1555, and is the source of his biographies published by Melch. Adam and in Bayle's Junius, Robert, a Dutch missionary, a native of Delft, who flourished in the 17th century, was sent by the Dutch government to the western part of the island of Formosa in 1634, and was eminently successful in his missionary labor. He is said to have baptized no less than six thousand persons. He also provided good educational advantages for the natives, and over six hundred young men crowded the schools he had founded. Of his other labors there is little that we are sure is true. His literary labors were confined to efforts in behalf of the people to whom he was sent. He composed some prayers, and translated certain Psalms into the Formosan language. He returned to Holland in after days, but the year of his death is not known to us. See Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. iii. bk. iv. cent. xviii. sect. 1. note 24.

Junakin, Gzonon, L.L.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Kingston, Cumberland County, Pa., Nov. 1, 1790, entered Jefferson College in 1809, and graduated in 1818. While at college he was converted (1811), and upon the completion of his collegiate studies he entered at once on a theological course of study under Dr. John M. Mason in New York city, where ordained at Gettysburg, Pa., in 1818, and remained in the pastorathe, though teaching and editing a paper a part of the time, till 1830. He was principal of Pennsylvania Manual Labor Academy at Germantown, Pa., from 1830 to 1832; president of Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., from 1833 to 1841; president of the University, from 1841 to 1844; was then recalled to the presidency of Lafayette College; and was president of Washington College, Lexington, Va., from 1848 to 1861, when, on the accession of Virginia, he left the college, his home, and his property. Lafayette College thereafter honored him with an honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. Upon the last day of May, 1860, Dr. Junakin told his congregation that for many years maintained a great influence in the Church courts, sustained by his thorough knowledge of every subject on which he attempted to speak, and the keen logic with which he expressed the fallacies in the arguments of his opponents. In 1844 he was moderator of the General Assembly. In 1838 he received the degree of D.D. from Jefferson College, and in 1856 that of L.L.D. from Rutgers College. Dr. Junakin performed an amazing amount of work in his lifetime. His preaching record shows that he delivered a larger number of sermons than most pastors do, while his toils in building up and reviving colleges, in laborious agencies, in ecclesiastical labors in the Church courts, in the professor's chair, at the editor's desk, and through the press, in his numerous books, sermons, and essays, make us wonder how he could find the time and energy for doing so much. He published The Educator, a periodical, in 1838; The Vindication, containing a history of the trial of the Rev. Albert Barnes by the Second Presbytery and by the Synod of Philadelphia, in 1838; A Treatise on Justification, in 1839; The Little Stone and the Great Image, or Lectures on the Person of Christ, in 1839; The Great Apostacy, a sermon on the Romanism, in 1835; Political Fallacies, in 1862; A Treatise on Sanction, in 1864; and The Tabernacle, or the Gospel according to Moses, in 1865. See Index volume (No. 2) to Princeton Review, p. 226 sq.

Juno, the Roman name of the queen of heaven, essentially identical with the Grecian Hera. Juno was the daughter of Kronos (Saturn) and Rhea. She was the most high and most powerful divinity of the Greeks and Romans next to Jupiter (the Greek Zeus), of whom she was the sister and wife. Argus and Samos claimed the honor of her birth. According to Homer, she was educated by Oceanus and Thetis; according to others, by the Hours. Her marriage with Jupiter on the island of Crete was honored by the presence of all the gods. This marriage, according to Homer, was consummated without the knowledge of their parents. Others say that he subdued her by artifice on the island of Samos, and there married her. According to the Oraculum Zeal, she was proud, ambitious, and jealous; and in the Homeric poems she is represented as an obstinate, quarrelsome shrew, and her temper a source of continual discord between herself and her lord. She often spitefully favors persons who were the objects of his displeasure, and he, in return, treats her with all that severity which, in ancient times, the husband was accustomed to use towards the wife. He scolds and often beats her, and on one occasion, when she had driven Hercules, the favorite of her husband, to Cos by a storm, Jupiter was so angry that he bound her hands and feet, loaded her with two amphoras, and suspended her from Olympus; and, to add to the inconveniences of her situation, none of the gods were allowed to help her. All, in fine, who assumed to themselves or attributed to others a superiority to her, experienced her vengeance. But she is, notwithstanding, a female of majestic beauty, the grandest of the Olympian goddesses, well calculated to inspire awe, although wanting the soft, insinuating, and heart-touching, which are items of justice in the only wedded goddess in the Greek mythology; she naturally presided over marriage and the birth of children. It is a significant feature of the Roman character that Juno, in addition to her other qualities, was the guardian of the nuptials, and was watching over the health of the mother and housewife; and a temple, containing the mint, was erected to her on the Capitoline as Juno Moneta (the Money-coiner). In the Roman conception she was also the goddess of chastity, and prostitutes were forbidden to touch her altar. She was, in short, the protector of women. She not only supervised the fertility of marriage, but also over its inviolable sanctity, and unchastity and inordinate love of sexual pleasures were hated by the goddess. Women in childbirth invoked Juno Lucina to help them, and after the delivery of the child a table was laid out for her in the house for a week, for no person would be allowed to enter were likewise under her protection. The month of Juno, which was originally called Junonius, was considered to be the most favorable period for marrying. As Juno has the same characteristics as her husband in so far as they refer to the female sex, she presides over all human affairs, which are based upon justice and faithfulness, but especially over domestic affairs, in which women are more particularly concerned. The companions of Juno were the Nymphs, Graces, and Hours. Isis was her particular servant. Among animals, the goose and the swan were sacred to her. Her usual attribute is the royal diadem, formed like a long triangle. She is drawn in a carriage by two peacocks. She had several temples in Rome. The first day of every month, and the whole of June, were sacred to her. See Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography, ii. 638.

Jupiter (the Latin form of the Greek name Zeus, Ζεύς, Genit. Διός), the principal deity of the Greek and Roman mythology, in which he is said to have been the son of Saturn and Ops. He is supposed to represent the fertilizing power of the heavens (see Creusus, Ζεύς, bolithic), and in this capacity, he is represented as the ruler both of the gods and of men. His attributes. See Walsh, Dissert. in Acta Apost. iii. 173; compare Horace, Odys. i. 5; Ovid, Fasti. v. 400; Metamorph. viii. 620; Tzetze. in Lyceoph. 681; "Hermes ergo if Diōς," Apollod. Bibl. iii. 2. 10; Homer, Iliad, iv. 622; Virg. Aen. iii. 21; ix. 627; Xen. de vit. ani. viii. 12. The Roman name is Juppiter, Hor. Flora. 229: Jove, Marlowe; Diana. (See Schmeller, Jn. Jovis n. orandi ad A. Altctor, 1740.) This deity is alluded to in several passages of the Bible, and Josephus frequently refers to his worship. The following statements are chiefly from kitten's Cyclopaedia, s. v.:

1. It is stated in 2 Kings xiii. 20, that in the kingdom of Judah there was an old man of Athens (Sept. Aττανσις; Vulg. Aττανσις) (some say "an old man, Athenensis" but Grocius, following the Latin, suggests instead of Aττανσις to read Ἀττανσις) to compel the Jews to depart from the laws of their fathers, and not to live after the laws of God; and to pollute also the Temple in Jerusalem, and to call it the temple of Jupiter Olympius (Διὸς Ὀλυμπίου), and that in Gerizim, of Jupiter the defender of.mountains (Ὑπαρχόντος τοῦ Ἰδίου, Vulg. Alpes, 5, 5). Here they did desire that dwellth in the place," Olympius was a very common epithet of Zeus, and he is sometimes simply called Ὀλυμπίουs (Homer, Il. xii, 108). Olympia, in Greece, was the seat of the temple and sacred grove of Zeus Olympia, and it was here that the fathers of Zeus Olympia, and in the place where the feast of Phidias at Olympia was held. Caligula attempted to have this statue removed to Rome, and it was only preserved in its place by the assurance that it would not bear removal (Josephus, Ant. xix, 1, 1). Antiochus Epiphanes, as related by Atheneus, surpassed all other kings in his worship and veneration of the gods, so that it is impossible to count the number of the statues he erected. His especial favorite was Zeus. The Olympian Zeus was the national god of the Hellenic race (Thucydides, iii, 14), as well as the supreme ruler of the heathen world, and, as such, formed the true opposition to Jehovah, who was revealed himself as the God of Abraham. Antiochus commenced, in B.C. 174, the completion of the temple of the Zeus Olympius at Athens (Polybius, Reliq. xxvi, 10; Livy, Hist. xiii, 20), and associated the worship of Jupiter with that of Apollo at Daphne, erecting a statue to the former god resembling that of Phidias at Olympia (Anm. Marcell. xxii, 13, 1). Games were celebrated at Daphne by Antiochus, of which there is a long account in Polybius (Reliq. xxxi, 3) and Atheneus (v, 5). Coins also were struck referring to the god and the games (Mionnet, v, 215; Müller, Antiq. Athos, p. 62-64). On the coins of Elia, the worship of wild olive (coroos) distinguishes Zeus Olympia from the Dodonian Zeus, who has an oak wreath.

Antiochus, after compelling the Jews to call the Temple of Jerusalem the temple of Jupiter Olympia, built an idol altar upon the altar of God. Upon this altar sacrifices were offered every day, and the breath of their flesh was sprinkled about the Temple (1 Macc. i, 46; 2 Macc. vi, 5; Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 4; xiii, 8, 2; War, i, 1, 2). The idol altar which was upon the altar of God (τοῦ βασιλέως ἡμῶν ἡ εἰρήνη τοῦ Σαλαμιστόρος) was considered by the Jews to be the "centre of desolation" (Σαλαμιστόρος τὴν εἰρήνην). 1 Macc. i, 54 foretold by Daniel (xi, 81; xii, 11) and mentioned by our Lord (Matt. xxiv, 15). Many interpretations of the meaning of this prophecy have been given. See ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.

The grove of Daphne was not far from Antioch (Δαφνίς πρὸς Ἀστέριον), 2 Macc. iv, 38; Josephus, War, i, 12, 15), and at this city Antiochus Epiphanes erected a temple for the worship of Jupiter Capitolinus. See Daphne. It is described by Livy as having its walls entirely adorned with gold (xii, 20). To Jupiter Capitolinus the Jews of Jerusalem, in whatever country they might be, were compelled by Vespasian to pay two drachmas, as they used to pay to the Temple at Jerusalem (Josephus, War, vii, 6, 6; Dion Cass. lxvi, 7). Hadrian, after the second revolt of the Jews, erected a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in the place where the temple of Gaul formerly stood (Dion Cass. lxxix, 12). There is, probably, reference made to Jupiter Capitolinus in Dan. xi, 38, alluding to Antiochus Epiphanes: "But in his estate shall he worship the god of forces" (fortresses, δυνάμεως, see Gesenius, Theaur. a. v. τιμή, p. 1011), for under this name Jupiter was worshipped by the victorious general on his return from a campaign, and it was in honor of Jupiter Capitolinus that he celebrated his triumph. Various conjectures have been made relative to this passage, but the opinion of Gesenius seems most probable. See MAUZIM.

In the passage from 2 Macc. above quoted a temple was also ordered to be set up to Zeus Xenius on Mount Gerizim. Josephus gives a different account. He relates that the Samaritans, who, when it pleased them, denied that they were of the kindred of the Jews, wrote to Antiochus, the god (Σελεύς οἱ κοιναὶ) Epiphanes, begging him to allow the temple on Mount Gerizim, which was called "the house of the Lord" (הַגֵּן יִשְׂרָאֵל), to be erected. Caligula attempted to have this statue removed to Rome, and it was only preserved in its place by the assurance that it would not bear removal (Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 5). This petition is said to have been granted. The epithet Σελεύς is given to Zeus as the supporter of hospitality and the friend of strangers (Plutarch, Aes. xato. 20; Xenop. Aenab. iii, 2, 4; Virgil, Enid. i, 785, etc.), and it is explained in 2 Macc. by the clause "as they did desire (Greek καὶ Ζεύς ἢργους, as they were; Vulg. prout erat hi, as they were) who dwell in the place." Ewald supposes that Jupiter was so called on account of the hospitable disposition of the Samaritans (Geschich. iv, 283, note), while Jahn suggests that it was because the Samaritans, in their letter to Antiochus Epiphanes, said that they were strangers in that country (Hebrew Commonwealth, i, 819); Grotius says because the dwellers of the place were pilgrims from the regions of Myria and Mesopotamia, specially referring to their idolatrous practices (2 Kings xvii, 24 sq.).

2. The appearance of the gods upon earth was very commonly believed among the ancients. Accordingly we find that Jupiter and Mercury are said to have wandered in Phrygia, and to have been entertained by Bau- nax and Pan in the country of Anice (Met. vii, 11). "Ye henceforth know not what," (John iv, 22), to be called the temple of Jupiter Hellenius (Ant. xii, 5, 5). This petition is said to have been granted. The epithet Σελεύς is given to Zeus as the supporter of hospitality and the friend of strangers (Plutarch, Aes. xato. 20; Xenop. Aenab. iii, 2, 4; Virgil, Enid. i, 785, etc.), and it is explained in 2 Macc. by the clause "as they did desire (Greek καὶ Ζεύς ἢργους, as they were; Vulg. prout erat hi, as they were) who dwell in the place." Ewald supposes that Jupiter was so called on account of the hospitable disposition of the Samaritans (Geschich. iv, 283, note), while Jahn suggests that it was because the Samaritans, in their letter to Antiochus Epiphanes, said that they were strangers in that country (Hebrew Commonwealth, i, 819); Grotius says because the dwellers of the place were pilgrims from the regions of Myria and Mesopotamia, specially referring to their idolatrous practices (2 Kings xvii, 24 sq.).

3. The word Ρέδια (fair or fine weather) is derived from ἡδρα and δαί. Jupiter, as lord of heaven, had power over all the changes of the weather. The Latins even used his name to signify the air—sub Dio (Horace, lib. ii, od. iii, 23), sub Jove frigido (Horace, lib. i, od. i, 25, etc.), comp. “the image which fell down from Jupiter,” A. Vers.; qui rov birotocoi, Act. xix, 55). The word also occurs in Matt. xvi, 15. (For a full account of Jupiter and Zeus, see Smith’s Dict. of Biography, s. v.; and for a list of the epithets applied to this god, see Rawlinson, Herod. vol. i, Appendix, p. 680.)

Jure Divino, an expression meaning "by divine right," used in connection with the question of the source of ecclesiastical authority. The "divine" for that authority contend that the episcopal discipline and orders, having issued immediately from the authority of God, are the exclusive channel through which holy ordinances can be lawfully or efficaciously exercised. Others, again (who consequently relinquish the jure divino claim), while maintaining that the episcopal regimen is agreeable to the will of Christ and the practice of his apostles, do not find a warrant for holding the above exclusive views, nor for asserting the utter invalidity, while they still admit the irregularity of such bodies. In their opinion, the claims of a Christian ministry rest not on any unbroken succession, but on the basis of the divinely sanctioned institution of a Christian Church. The authority, therefore, with which a Christian minister is invested they consider to be derived from Christ only by virtue of the apostolic commission to Christian congregations; and they hold that it comes direct from the Church in whose name and behalf he acts as its representative, and just to that extent to which it has empowered and directed him to act. They consider that the system which makes the sacramental virtue of holy orders inherent indefeasibly in each individual minister, detracts from the claims of the Church, makes the Church a sort of appendage to the priesthood, and, in fact, confounds the Church with the clergy, as if the spiritual community consisted only of its officers.—Eden, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v. See Succession.

Jurius, Pierre, an eminent French Protestant theologian, was born at Mer, in the diocese of Blois, in 1587. He was the son of a Protestant minister, and nephew of the celebrated Rivet and Du Moulin. He possessed uncommon talents, and when barely nineteen received the master's degree, and after travelling in Holland and England, returned to his country to succeed his father in his pastoral office. His reputation for learning in 1674 obtained for him the situation of professor of theology and the Hebrew language in the Huguenot seminary at Sedan. When in 1681 the Protases were deprived by Louis XIV of the permission to give public instruction in that town, he retired to Rouen, and from thence went to Rotterdam, where he was appointed professor of theology. In that city the ardoir of his zeal soon drew him into controversy with Bayle, Basnage, and Saurin, in the heat of which he manifested the same ranor which unfortunately disgraces most of his critical writings. He allowed himself likewise to fall into various errors by too much indulging a naturally lively imagination in the interpretation of prophecy. In his Commentary on the Apocalypse he even predicted the establishment of Protestantism in France during the year 1686. Those who differ from him in this respect cannot succeed his father in his pastoral office. His reputation for learning and piety, he treated with a most uncrowning severity. Grotius and Hammond, perhaps the two greatest theologians of their age, because they differed from him on the subject of the Antichrist predicted in the book of Revelation, he styles "the disgrace of the Reformed Church, and even of Christianity." The same spirit is manifested in his well-known controversy with the great Bossuet, whom he does not scruple to accuse of falsehood and dishonesty, though, on the other hand, it must be allowed that the recriminations of this celebrated defender of the Church of Rome, if more politely expressed, are equally severe and destitute of truth; the great object of Bossuet being, it would appear, to charge his antagonist with holding the heretical opinions of the Socinians (Bossuet, Hist. des Variations, iv, 64; v, 238-239). With all these defects, Jurieu stands deservedly high as a controversialist. His learning was most exhausted in his writings and in the criticism of his authorities, and he had a special talent in discovering the weak point in the cause of his antagonists. In respect of style and eloquence he is immeasurably behind Bossuet, but he is at least his equal in polemical talent, and by some is considered his superior in erudition. His reiterated denunciations of the theologians of every shade as a storehouse of great research. Jurieu's private life was becoming that of a Christian minister; he was charitable to the poor almost from his means, and employed his influence abroad in alleviating the sufferings of his exiled brethren. He died Jan. 11, 1718. His principal works are: Histoire du Calvinisme et du Papisme mis en paradoxe. (etc. Rotterdam, 1689, 2 vols. 12mo; 2d edit., ibid. 1693, 12mo)—Lettres Pastorales (Rotterdam, 1686-7, 3 vols. 12mo)—Le Vrai Système de l'Eglise (Dord. 1686-80);—L'Ordre, M. de Guénin (Deventer [Rotterdam], 1684, 2 vols. 12mo);—Propriétés Unisent (Amst. 1685, 8vo)—Apologie pour l’Accompagnement des Propriétés (1687, which has been translated into English, Lond. 1687, 2 parts, 8vo)—La Religion des Lutinistes (Rotterdam, 1689, 8vo);—Histoire des Dogmes et des Cultes des Huguenots (Amst. 1681, 12mo);—La politique du clergé de France (Amst. 1681, 12mo).—English Cyclopedia; Herzog, Real Encyclop. vii, 126; Hoeftz, Nouv. Bioire. Générale, xxvii, 267 sq. No one is acquainted with the reason for the title, Juridic, of the above work; but it is probable that he meant to imply that he was a lawyer in the ecclesiastical courts of France.

Jurdination is an ecclesiastical term denoting the power of appointing a bishop by virtue of the apostolic commission, of governing and administering the laws of the Church within the bounds of his diocese. The same term is also used to express the powers within which a bishop exercises his power, i.e. his diocese. To define this power of the ecclesiastic property of the diocese is to define the limits of the ecclesiastical property of the diocese. Of old the earl and bishop sat in the same court. Afterwards the bishop held his courts by himself, though temporal lords sat in synod with bishops—"the one to search the laws of the land, and the other the laws of God." The question of jurisdiction, after the period of the Council of Constance, became agitated between the ecclesiastical and secular sovereigns. The things, the latter argued, and reasonably, that are Cesar's belong to Cesar, and it is treason to take them from him; the things that are God's belong to God, and it is impious to take them from him. The Church is a free society, which is in no need of a perfect power of government within its own dominion, and a purely spiritual sentence should be beyond review by a civil court. See Investiture; Keys, Power of.

Jus Asyli, the right of protection. From the 4th century, the privilege of asylum, or the right of protecting criminals, was possessed by Christian churches and altars. This privilege had belonged to sacred places among Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, and from it may have been adopted by Christians. It seems to have been first introduced into the Christian Church in the time of Constantine; but the right was subsequently much circumscribed by various restrictions. It was found to be a serious hindrance to the administration of justice. Since the 16th century the privilege has been almost entirely abolished.—Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v. See Asylum.

Jus Devolutum (derived right). When, in the Establishment of Scotland, a patron does not present to a parish within six months after the commencement of the vacancy, the right of presentation falls to the presbytery, tanquam iure devoluto. Still further to guard against abuse, it has been enacted (act 1719, c. 29) "that if any patron shall present any person to a vacant church who shall not be qualified, by taking and subscribing the said oath in manner aforesaid, or shall present a person to any vacancy who is then or shall be pastor or minister of any other church or parish, or any person who shall not accept or declare his willingness to accept the same. In 1822, he was present when the said appointment was made, but the persons present did not act in accordance with the said appointment. In 1826, he was present when the said appointment was made, but the persons present did not act in accordance with the said appointment.

Justice (ἱστορία), righteousness, as an internal trait of character; ἡσυχία, quietness, as a judicial act, as applied to men, is one of the four cardinal virtues. It consists, according to Cicero (De Finibus, lib. v, cap. 28), in suo quaeque tribuendo, in accordance with every one his right. By the Pythagoreans, and also by Plato, it was regarded as including (Rom. xiii, 14; 1 Cor. xvi, 14). That we help one another means in our translation of the Scriptures to help one another, signifies as an extensive significance. As opposed to equity, justice (ῥό τηρεῖν) means doing merely what positive law requires, while equity (ῥό τις) means doing what is fair and right in the circumstances of every particular case. Justice is not founded in law, as Hobbes and others hold, but in our idea of what is right. Laws are just or unjust in so far as they do or do not conform to that idea. Justice may be distinguished as ethical, economical, and political. The first consists in doing justice between man and man; the second, in doing justice between the members of a family or household; and the third, in doing justice between the members of a community or commonwealth (More, Enquiry into Ethicus; Grove, Moral Philosophy). Dr. Watts gives the following rules respecting justice: 1. It is just that we honor, reverence, and respect those who are superior to us in any kind (Eph. vii, 1, 3; 1 Pet. ii, 17; 1 Tim. v, 17). 2. That we show particular kindness to those near relations (Proverbs, xvii, 17). 3. That we love those who are good, and show gratitude to those who have done us good (Gal. iv, 15). 4. That we pay the full due to those whom we bargain or deal with (Rom. xiii, 8; Deut. xvi, 14). 5. That we help our fellow-creatures in cases of great necessity (Exodus, xxi, 4). 6. Reparation to those whom we have wilfully injured" (Watts, Sermons, serm. xxiv, xxvi, vol. ii). See Wollaston, Religion of Nature, p. 187, 141; Jay, Sermons, i, 181.

Justice of God is that perfection whereby he is infinitely righteous, both in himself and in all his proceedings. Mr. Ryland defines it thus: "The ardent inclination of his will to prescribe equal laws as the supreme governor, and to dispense equal rewards and punishments as the supreme judge" (Rev. xvi, 5; Psa. cxliv, 7; xvii, 1, 2). The expression of the Supreme in the necessary result of the divine holiness, as exhibited in all his external relations to intelligent creatures. As holiness, in relation to God, is subjective, declaring his perfect purity, justice is objective, exhibiting his opposition to sin as the transgression of his law. (These two aspects are exactly exhibited by the two Hebrew terms above.) Divine justice is distinguished as legislative, or rectoral or distributive. Legislative justice must approve and require that rational creatures conform their internal and external acts to the dictates of the moral law, which, either by the influence of the Holy Spirit on the conscience or by direct revelation, has been made known to all men. Rectoral or distributive justice is God's dealing with his accountable creatures according to the sanctions of his law, rewarding or punishing them according to their deserts (Psa. lxxxix, 14). The latter is again distinguished as communicative, or distributive, or just and right (Rom. xii, 7, 8). Punitive or vindictive justice is the infliction of punishment for any sin committed by men (2 Thess. i, 6). That God will not act as a vindicator is evident from the language of the word of God (Exod. xxxiv, 6, 7; Numb. xiv, 18; Neh. 1, 3): 2. From the nature of God (Jas. i, 18, 14; Psa. v,
JUSTICE 1102  JUSTIFICATION

5, 6; Heb. xii, 29); 3. From sin being punished in Christ, the surety of his people (1 Pet. iii, 18); 4. From all the various natural evils which men bear in the present state. The use we should make of this doctrine is this: 1. We should learn the dreadful nature of sin, and the iniquity of the sinner (Ps. i, ix, 17). 2. We should highly appreciate the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom justice is satisfied (1 Pet. iii, 18). 3. We should imitate the justice of God by cherishing an ardent regard to the rights of God and to the rights of mankind. 4. We should abhor all sin, as it strikes directly at the justice of God. 5. We should derive comfort from the consideration that the judgment of all the earth will do right as regards ourselves, the Church, and the world at large (Ps. xcv, i, 2).

JUSTICE, ADMINISTRATION OF. This seems to have been one of the first subjects which claimed the attention of the great lawyer of the Hebrews. It appears from the advice of Jethro to Moses when "Israel was encamped at the Mount of God" (Exod. xviii, 15-24). When Moses had seen how laboriously Moses was occupied in "judging between one and another," he advised him to make some other provision in relation to the matter, and to restrict himself to the work which properly belonged to him, as the inspired teacher and leader of the people. This was accordingly done. The magistracy was taken from him in a form adapted to the existing wants of the people, and by reference to the record we shall find how fully it covers every essential point in the case. The value of evidence in conducting trials; the principles upon which verdicts should be rendered, both in civil and criminal cases, together with the great institution of trial by jury, are all found in greater or less development in the statutes and ordinances given from God to the Hebrews.

Their courts of justice were of various grades, some known as high courts of appeal, and others so simple and multiplied as to carry the administration of justice to every man's door, and effectually to secure the parties against that ruinous evil, "the law's delay." "Judges and offices shall thou make in all thy gates," was the command; and to what minute subdivision this creation of tribunals was carried out, we see in the ordinance directing that there should be "three thousand rulers over hundreds, rulers over fifties, and rulers over tens, who should judge the people at all seasons."

The candidates for office were not to be selected from any one privileged class. They were taken "out of all the people," they were required to be well known for their "intelligentsia" and "moral worth," and their fitness for the station to which they were chosen. They were to be "able men, such as fear God; men of truth, hating covetousness;" "wise men, and understanding, and known among the tribes;" and these qualifications being not only all-important, but all-sufficient, none others were required.

With a judiciary constructed after this manner, justice could be administered promptly and freely; and, on the other hand, a remedy was provided against the evils of hasty decision, which could not fall in the end to discover and punish in the right of the case. And if "the best laws are those which are best administered," we shall find the ordinances given to the Hebrews for carrying the laws of the land into effect admirably adapted to their end, giving equal security to the poor and to the rich against violence and wrong. See JUDGE; TAN-

JUSTIFICATION (some form of the verb Ἰησοῦ, Ἰησοῦ, a forensic term equivalent to acquittal, and opposed to condemnation; in an apologetic sense it is often synonymous with vindication or freeing from unjust imputation of blame.

I. Dogmatic Statement. — This term, in theological usage, is employed to designate the judicial act of God by which he pardons all the sins of the sinner who believes in Christ, receiving him into favor, and regarding him as relatively righteous, notwithstanding his past actual unrighteousness. Hence justification, and the remission of sins, are attributes of God, and the judicial act of God, to one and the same privilege of his believing people (Acts xiii, 38, 39; Rom. iv, 5, 8). So, also, "the justification of the ungodly," the "covering of sins," "not visiting for sin," "not remembering sin," and "impunity with God" imply that the justifying person is received with favor, and express substantially the same thing which is designated by "imputing or counting faith for righteousness." See PARDON. Justification, then, is an act of God, not in or upon man, but for him and in his favor; an act which, abstractly considered, respects man only as its object, and translates him into another relative state; while sanctification respects man as its subject, and is a consequent of this act of God, and inseparably connected with it. See REGULATION.

The originating cause of justification is the free grace and spontaneous love of God toward sinners (Rom. i, 17; iii, 24; vii, 9, 4, 5). Our Lord Jesus Christ is the sole meritorious cause of our justification, inasmuch as it is the result of his atonement for us. The sacrificial death of Christ is an expiatory of infinite wisdom, by which the full claims of the law may be admitted, and yet the penalty avoided, both the condition or equivalent has been provided by the sufferings of him who died in the sinner's stead (Eph. i, 7; Col. i, 14; Rev. v, 9). Thus, while it appears that our justification is, in its origin, an act of the highest grace, it is also, in its mode, an act most perfectly consistent with God's essential righteousness, and demonstrative of his inviolable justice. It proceeds not on the principle of abolishing the law or its penalty, for that would have implied that the law was unduly rigorous either in its precepts or in its sanctions. See ATONEMENT.

Faith is the instrumental cause of justification, present faith in him who is able to save, faith actually existing and exercised. See FAITH. The atonement of Jesus is not accepted for us, to our individual justification, until we individually believe, nor after we cease to live by faith in him. See FAITH.

The external results of justification are the restoration of amity and intercourse between the pardoned sinner and the pardoning God (Rom. v, 1; James ii, 23): the adoption of the persons justified into the family of God, and their consequent right to eternal life (Rom. viii, 17); the "adoption of a son" by the Holy Spirit" (Gal. iv, 6); the "HEIR'S OF GOD" (Gal. iii, 28); Gal. iii, 14; iv, 6), producing transeuntion of con-

We must not forget that the justification of a sinner does not in the least degree alter or diminish the evil nature and desert of sin. Though by an act of divine clemency the penalty is remitted, and the obligation to suffer that penalty is dissolved, still it is naturally due, though graciously remitted. Hence appear the propriety and duty of continuing to confess and lament our own personal guilt, and to humble and contrite heart (Ezek. xvi, 62). See PENITENCE.

II. History of the Doctrine. — 1. The early Church Fathers and the Latin Church. — Ecclesiastical science, from the beginning of its development, occupied itself with a discussion of the relation of faith, but the same, and even those who attributed the greatest importance to the latter recognised faith as the foundation. A merely logical division into subjective and objective faith, and an intimation of a distinction between a historic and a rational faith (in Clemens Alex., Stromata, ii, 45); the Theologian, De Trinitate, i, 67, for example, of little consequence. Two conceptions became prevailing: Faith as a general religious conviction, particularly as confidence in God, and the acceptance of the tire doctrine of the Church, fides catholica. The formula that faith alone without the works justifies is found in the full Pauline sense in Clemens Romanus (1 ad Corinthios, c. 32), and is sometimes used by Augustin tolemically in order to defend the freedom of grace and the priority of faith. More generally it is used in an argument against the necessity of the former. In the Jewish law (Ireneus, iv. 25; Tertullian, ade. Marcell. v. 3). The cumenical synods were instrumental in gradually giving the conception of fides catholica the new sense that salvation could be found only by adherence to eccle sian doctrine. Augustine defended this new sense of salvation without faith, and in opposition to which Augustine insisted that the difference is absolute, and that without faith no good works at all are possible. As salva nation was thought to be conditioned by works also, it was held, even when it was regarded as necessary as of God, it was regarded as a sacrament. The impor ance attributed to abstention created gradually a dis tinction between commands and advice, and the belief that the fulfillment of the latter a virtue greater than required would arise (Hermas, Pastor Simil. iii. 6, 3; Gregory, In Epistulam ad Rom. iii; Ambrose, De Vir da. iv. 508).

2. The Greek Church. — Little discussion and little controversy has occurred in this doctrine in the Greek Church. Faith and works together are regarded as the conditions of salvation. The words of James are refer to first, yet faith is declared to be the stock from which the good works come as the fruits. The descrip tion of faith proceeds from the definition in the Epistle to the Hebrews to the acceptance of the entire ecclesi astical tradition. Man is said to participate in the merit of the Mediator not only through faith, but also through the fulfillment of the commandments of God and of the Church, and, in particular, prayers, fasting, pilgrimages, and monastic life. They are considered useful and necessary only as a means of promoting sanctification, but not as per se necessary for salvation. Hence, through the terrors of conscience. Hence justification is a divine judicial act, which, through the apprehension of the jus tice of Christ, apprehended in faith, accepts the sinner as just, though he is not just. This strict distinction between justification and sanctification is manifested on the one hand against Scholasticism, which, through its Pelagian tendencies, seemed to offend against the honor of Christ, and to be unable to satisfy conscience, and on the other hand against Osianider, who regarded justification as being completed only in sanctification. The works even of the regenerated, according to the natural side, were regarded by the Reformers as sins. The Reformed theology in general agreed with the doc tine of justification as stated above, yet did not make it to the same extent the fundamental doctrine of the whole theology. According to Calvin, justification and sanctification took place at the same time; or, as he put it, 'faith forms in the heart of the believer a complete form of the soterioustruths of the Gospel, without any reference to human action or to a life of good works. Theologians of the Lutheran Church distinguished in faith knowledge, assent, and confidence, assigning the form to two to the intellect, the latter to the will. From the fides generalis they distinguished the justifying faith (specialis seu salvifica), and rejected the division into fides informat et formata. As a distinguishing mark, they demanded from a true faith that it be efficient in charity. For works they took the Decalogue as a rule; a certain necessity of works was strictly limited. But, however firmly they clung in general to the conception of justification as something essentially exterior (actus for tentiarius) and foreign (imputatio justitiae Christi), some dogmatic writers held that justification had really changed something in man, and indeed presupposed it as changed. Hollas pronounced this doctrine openly and inc autocritically, while Quenstedt designated these preceding acts as merely preparatory to conversion.

II. Doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church since the Reformation.
The Council of Trent, to make their compromises with the Pauline formula, recognized faith as the beginning and the foundation of justifica tion, but the full sense which Protestantism found in it was re jected. This faith is the general belief in divine revelation, though in transition to a special faith, yet a mere knowledge which makes room for mortal sins. Justifica tion is remission of sins and sanctification, through an infusion of the divine grace, in so far as the merit of Christ is not merely imputed, but communicated. It is given through grace, but as a permanent state it grows through the merit of the good works according to the commandments of God and the Church, through which works the justified, always guided by the grace of God in Christ, have to render satisfaction for the temporal punishment of their sins and to deserve salvation. Not all the works done before justification are sins, and to the justified the fulfillment of the commandments of God is quite possible, although even the saints still commit small, venial sins. A further development of this doctrine is found in the writings of Bellarmine. He admits faith only as fide generalis, as a matter of the intellect, yet as a consent, not a knowledge. Though only the first among mankind was destined for this justification, salvation for all is asserted. The Council of Trent had rejected the imputation of the merits of Christ only as the exclusive ground of justification; Bellarmine rejected it altogether. He explicitly proclaimed the necessity of good works for salvation, though only a relative salvation, the open supererogationism, which were not mentioned at Trent, though they remained unchanged in tradition and practice, are further developed by Bellarmine.

According to him, they go beyond nature, are not destined for all, and are not commanded under penalties.

III. Modern Protestantism.
This doctrine has denied all foreign imputation, also that of the merit of Christ. When supranaturalism in general declined, the points of difference from the Roman Catholic Church were frequently lost sight of. Kant found in the doctrine of justification the relation of the always unsatisfactory reality of our mingled future and the future which is recognized in the intuition of God. De Wette declared it to be the highest moral confidence which is founded on the communion with Christ, and turns from an unhappy past to a better future. Modern mystics have often found fault with the doctrine as being too outward, which approached the doctrine of the Roman Church. The Hegelian School taught that justification is the reception of the subject into the spirit, i.e., the knowledge of the subject of his unity with the absolute spirit. Following the doctrine of the Church, the severe Kanitz inquired what is the knowledge of the subject of his unity with the absolute spirit, or, according to Strauss, with the concrete idea of mankind. According to Schleiermacher, it is the reception of the communion of life with both the archetypal and historical Christ, and the appropriation of his perfection. Justification and sanctification are to him only different sides of the carrying out of the same divine decree. Many of the recent dogmatic writers of Germany have again proclaimed this doctrine to be the essential principle of Protestantism, some (Dörner, Das Prinzip unserer Kirche, Kö1, 1841) taking justification in the sense of a new personality founded in Christ, others (Hundeshagen, Der deutsche Protestantismus, Frankfort, 1847) in the sense that God, surveying the whole future development of the communion, to the former refinement, is the believer, views him as righteous. One of the last dogmatic manuals of the Church (Schweizer, ii, 526 sq.) distinguishes conversion and sanctification as the beginning and progress of a life of salvation, which justifies in the former sense, establishes the believer, views him as righteous. One of the last dogmatic manuals of the Church (Schweizer, ii, 526 sq.) distinguishes conversion and sanctification as the beginning and progress of a life of salvation, which justifies in the former sense, establishes the believer, views him as righteous.

give myself to my own contemplations. I chose a spot by the sea-side." Whether Justin still resided at this time at Flavia Neapolis—and in that case the quiet resort must have been the shores of the Dead Sea, perhaps in the walled city, or on some unfrequented spot of Lake Gennesareth—or whether, as seems more probable, he then resided at Ephesus, is a matter of dispute. In favor of Ephesus are Schrockh, Tillemont, Hilgenfend, Dorner, etc. But, be the name of the place Flavia Neapolis or Ephesus, it was the city of that name. Justin was attracted to it, no doubt, chiefly by the grandeur of the object he was seeking to solve, and the loveliness of the spot—that we find him one day, while wrapped up in thought, pacing up and down by the side of the sea, which moaned in melancholy unison with his reflections, accented by the stars of venereal aspect the moon, and, and soon the two are engaged in earnest converse on the subject uppermost in young Justin's mind. Somewhat enamored of the Platonistic philosophy, he argues in its favor with the apparently present senior, and contends that at some future day it will conduct him into that near heaven, by illumining sophists. His doubts, however, are soon dispelled, for some two or three points of doctrine belonging to that system, and finally the doubting and indolent disciple is visited with the cure and not gentle apostrophe, "You are a mere dealer in words, but no lover of action and truth; your aim is not to be a practiser of good, but a clearer disputant, a cunning sophist." Once more the inquiring youth is baffled in his attempt to lay hold of the truth; he is again convinced that even from the foremost of heathen philosophers he cannot obtain the pearl for which he is seeking so earnestly. But with this intelligence there comes also the direction, "Search the Scriptures; feed upon the Holy Scriptures; masticate with them, as one who, guided by the Spirit of God, saw and revealed the truth, and even foretold events future to their day; read the last and heroic words of the disciples of him who came to raise a fallen world, and to restore to it eternal and imperishable felicity. Pray,"—ended the venerable Christian, "and your eyes will be opened; for none can perceive and comprehend these things except God and his Christ grant them understanding." Justin was impressed; he had often heard the Platonists calumniate the Christians, but he had always discredited the common epithets with scorn. The tranquility and fortitude with which these followers of Jesus encountered death and all other evils which appear terrible to man, and he could never condemn as profligates those who could so patiently endure. He had long believed them innocent of the crimes imputed to these consistent martyrs. He was now prepared to think that they told the truth. He reflected on the words of the venerable stranger, and was convinced that they inculcated the "only safe and useful philosophy." From this time (the exact date is doubtful; the Bolsheviks place it in A.D. 119; it is generally believed, with Caeser, that it was written, and oc- curred in A.D. 133) his personal history becomes obscure, as he has but little to relate of himself hereafter, and as from other sources we cannot gather much on which we can depend. Certain it is that he at once enlisted in active service in behalf of the new cause. Retaining the name of Justin, he became a zealous Smith, and wrote against the Gnostics. A sequel, or one of the latest editors of the works of Justin Martyr, J. F. C. Otto, who makes four distinct classes.

as his second Apology, is one of the most interesting remains of Christian antiquity. It is addressed to the emperor Antoninus Pius, and to his adopted sons "Verissimus the Philosopher," afterwards the emperor M. Aurelius. The "Verissimus the Philosopher," as the common reading, not that of Eusebius), afterwards the emperor Verus, colleague of M. Aurelius. From the circumstance that Verissimus is not styled Caesar, which dignity he acquired in the course of the A.D. 139, it is inferred by many critics, including Pagani, Neander, Otto, Schenkel, that the Apology was written previously, and probably early in that year. Eusebius places it in the fourth year of Antoninus, or the first year of the 230th Olympiad, A.D. 141, which is rather too late. Others contend for a still later date. Justin himself, in the course of the work (c. 46), states that Christ has passed a hundred and fifty years before he wrote, but he must be understood as speaking in round numbers. However, Tilllemont, Grabbe, Fleury, Cellier, Marx, and others, fix the date of the work in A.D. 150. Its contents," says bishop Kaye, "may be reduced to the following heads: [1] Appeals to the ruling powers, and an exposition of the expostulations with, and even on the unfairness of the proceedings against the Christians, who were condemned without any previous investigation into their lives or opinions merely because they were Christians, and were denied the liberty allowed the inhabitants of the empire, of worshipping the God whom they themselves preferred. [2] Rebuttal of the charges of atheism, immorality, and disaffection towards the emperor, which were brought against the Christians: these charges Justin refuted by appealing to the purity of the Gospel presented and the argument presented in the condition of those who embraced Christianity: and by stating that the kingdom to which Christians looked forward was not of this world, but a heavenly kingdom. [3] Direct arguments in proof of the truth of Christianity, drawn from miracles and prophecy. With respect to the miracles, Justin has treated of them after many other writers had treated of them, in refuting the objection that the miracles of Christ were performed by magical arts. With respect to the latter, he states in forcible terms the general nature of the argument from prophecy, and shows the accomplishment of many particular prophecies in the person of Jesus; inferring, from their accomplishment, the reasonableness of entertaining a firm persuasion that the prophecies yet unfulfilled—that, for instance, respecting Christ's second advent—will in due time be accomplished. [4] Justin does not confine himself to defending Christianity, but occasionally brings in the annihilation of the heathen and the success of the Gentile polytheism and idolatry. In further confirmation of the ingenious, or, rather, beneficial character of Christianity, Justin concludes the treatise with a description of the mode in which proselytes were admitted into the Church, of its other rites and customs, and of the habits and manner of life of the primitive Christians." To this Apology, the larger one of the two, are generally appended three documents: (1) Άκροαν υπ' άυτον Χριστιανών ἴματος, Λεγενναῖον αὐτους Κατάθλησε, Μεταλλευτής, Αποστόλους ὇λους, Ἰησοῦν Ὀρθά, Κοινωνίας Ἀσίας. This Greek version of the emperor's letter was made and is given by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iv, 8). Justin has subjoined to his work the Latin original (Eccl. Hist. iv, 8), which probably is still preserved by Rufinus in his version of Eusebius, for which, in any case, the Latin version of Justin was afterwards substituted. (2) Αὐτοκεφαλία ἴματος τῷ κωνικῷ τῆς Άσιας, Αποστόλους Ὀρθά Ἐπισκόπων τῆς Ἀσίας. This is the earliest version of the first book, probably that which was after called the "Greek Apology," and was written, according to the text of the letter itself, as it appears in Eusebius, not by Antoninus, but by his successor, M. Aurelius. (3) Μάρκαν βεβαιῶς ιστολογία τῆς σύγχρονης ἡμείς ὑπάρχουσας, ἐν ἑάν μαρτυρίῳ Χριστιανών αἰτίας τῇ γενέσει τῆς οἰκίας αὐτών, Μαρκαί Φιλάππου Ἐπίσκοπος ad Semitam qui testatur Christianos victoriam caesaribus concessisse, Paulus, Μαρκαί πρωτοειδής λόγος, φασί, ἐπιτυχώς Ἀρμενίων. This, like the preceding, has been generally attributed to Justin, though it is said by Tertullian, Apologies, cap. 5, that a letter of the same tenor was written by the emperor, relates to the same subject of the so-called thundering legion (q. v.). 2. Ἀπολογία ἦλθη ὑπάρχουσα τῶν Ἰουνιτών πλεῖον τῆς Τρισέργυς- σπύρων, τῶν ἤρωων τοῦ προφετηθέντος Ιωάννου τό Προφήτην, τῶν Ἰουών τοῦ Ἰουουνίτων τῶν Ἐθνών τῶν Ἐθνών. This second and shorter plea for the Christians was addressed probably to the emperors M. Aurelius and Lucius Verus, or, rather, to Aurelius alone, as Verus was engaged in the East in the Parthian war. (See below.) Neander adopts the opinion of Strowy, himself, and Stow, that it was addressed to Aurelius and Verus has been lost, but their opinion has been refuted by several writers, especially by Otto. Granted, then, that this Apology was presented to Aurelius and Verus has been lost, but their opinion has been refuted by several writers, especially by Otto. Granted, then, that this Apology was presented to M. Aurelius, we find it "occasionally by the punishment inflicted on three persons at Rome, whom the prefect of the city, had put to death merely because they were Christians. After exposing the injustice of this proceeding, Justin replies to two objections which the enemies of the Gospel were accustomed to urge. The first was, 'Why, if the Christians were certain of being received into heaven, they did not hasten the visitation of the Angel of death, seeing that it was not in heaven, but on earth that they lived; that if the regenerate had the trouble of putting them to death?' Justin's answer was, 'If, that, if they were so to act, they would contravene the designs of God by diminishing the number of believers, preventing the diffusion of true religion, and, as far as possible, lessen the number of those within the Christian Church.' The second objection was, 'Why, if they were regarded by God with an eye of favor, suffered they to be exposed to injury and oppression?' Justin replies that the persecutions with which they then were, and with which many virtuous men among the heathen had before been visited, originated in the enmity of a fewmen, the offspring of the apostate angels, who were permitted to exercise their power until the designs of the Almighty were finally accomplished. Another objection, of a different kind, appears to have been urged against the Christians: that, in exhorting men to live virtuously, they insisted, not upon the beauty of virtue, but upon the eternal rewards and punishments which awaited the virtuous and wicked. Justin replies that these are topics on which every believer in the existence of God must insist, since that belief is involved in the religious life of a good man, and he must overthrow the bad. With respect to direct arguments to prove the divine origin of Christianity, that which Justin principally urges is drawn from the fact that no man ever consented to die in attestation of the truth of any philosophical tenet; whereas men, even from the earliest ranks of society, are prepared to die for the sake of the Gospel. Towards the conclusion of the tract, Justin states that he was himself induced to embrace Christianity by observing the courage and constancy with which its professors encountered all the terrors of persecution." Two Fragmenta, given by Grabbe in his edition of Justin (Spicileg. secund. ii, 101), which vary considerably from the text of the second Apology, in the present copies of which they are not found; but the correctness of this suppression is very doubtful. 3. JUSTIN

This dialogue, in which Justin defends Christianity against the objections of Trypho, professes to be the record of an actual discussion, held, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iv. 18), at Ephesus. Trypho describes himself as a Jew, "flying from the war now raging," probably occasioned by the war between the Parthians and Romans in A.D. 132-134. But, though the discussion probably took place at the time, it was not committed to writing, at least not finished, till some years after, as Justin makes a reference to his first Apology, which is assigned, as we have seen, to A.D. 138 or 139. It has been conjectured that the answer, addressed to the Talmudists, teacher or colleague of the celebrated Rabbi Akiba, but he does not appear as a rabbi in the dialogue. The dialogue is perhaps founded upon the conversation of Justin with Trypho rather than an accurate record of it. After an introduction, in which Justin gives an account of the manner of his conversion to Christianity, and earnestly exhorts Trypho to follow his example, Trypho replies to the exhortation by saying that Justin would have acted more wisely in adhering to any of the philosophical sects to which he had formerly been attached than in leaving God, and placing his trust in a rabbi of the Talmudists. Justin, however, maintains that the belief of the orthodox Christians, but that he himself maintained that the dead would rise again in the body, and live for a thousand years in Jerusalem, which would be rebuilt, and beautified and enlarged. He appeals in support of his opinion to Isaiah, and to the Apocalypse, which he assigns to John, one of Christ's apostles. Justin then concludes the interview by debating the conversion of the Gentiles. He contends that the Christians are the true people of God, inasmuch as they fulfil the spiritual meaning of the law, and do not merely conform, like the Jews, to the letter. They have the true circumcision of the heart; they are the true children of Abraham, and typified by Jesus, the high-priest in the prophecy of Zechariah; they offer the true spiritual sacrifices which are pleasing to God, agreeably to the prophecy of Malachi; they are the seed promised to Abraham; they are actuated by the principle of faith which alone called Abraham; they are, in a word, the true Israel. The dialogue with Trypho appears to be mutilated, but to what extent is a matter of dispute. Two fragments are assigned to it by Grabe (Spicilegium, sec. ii, 175), but it is doubtful with what correctness. It is to be observed, says Smith (Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography), "that, though Otto ranks the Dialogus cum Tryphone among the undisputed works of Justin, its genuineness has been repeatedly attacked. The first assault was by C. G. Koehl, of Apenrade, in the duchy of Sleswick (Justini Martyris Dialogus cum Tryphone, ec. &c., on the basis of convicetus), this attack was regarded as of little moment. That of Wetstein (Proleg. in Nov. Test. i, 66), founded on the difference of the citations from the text of the Sept. and their agreement with that of the Hexaplar edition of Origen, and perhaps of the version of the Septuagint, is the most popular. Another difference is, that Justin, was more serious, and has called forth elaborate replies from Krom (Diatribe de Authentia Dialogi. Justini Martyr. cum Trypho, etc., 1782, 4to.), Eichhorn (Eindiegung in das A.T.), and Krehl (Betrage zur Einleuung, etc.). The attitude was renewed at a later period by Lange, but with little result. An account of the controversy is given by Semisch (book ii, sect. i, ch. ii), who contends earnestly for the genuineness of the work. It may be observed that the genuineness even of the two Apologies was attacked by the learned but eccentric Hardmann." (2) Disputed or Doubtful Works.—4. Λόγος ποιητής "Ελάμφωνος, Ορατος ad Graces. "If this is indeed a work of Justin, which we think very doubtful, it is probably that described by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 18) as treating περί της των δαμασκενων φασιων (compare Photius, Biblioth. cod. 129), to which Justin refers, and which he describes as being "de Demonum natura," for it is a severe attack on the flagitious immorality ascribed by the heathens to their deities, and committed by themselves in their religious festivals. Its identity, however, with the work respecting demons is doubted by many critics. Cave supposes it to be a portion of the work next mentioned. Its genuineness has been on various grounds disputed by Oudin, Semler, Semisch, and others, and is doubted by Grabe, Dupin, and Neander. The grounds of objection are well stated by Semisch (book ii, sect. ii, c. 1); but the genuineness of the piece is asserted by Tillemon, Leclerc, Cave, Maris, De Wette, Baumgarten-Crux.
tours, placed among the works of doubtful genuineness. But it is now generally allowed that the precision of its orthodoxy, and the use of various terms not in use in Justin’s time, make it evident that it was written at any rate after the composition of the Ante-Nicene, and probably after the Nestorian controversy. Grabe, Ceillier, and some others ascribe it to Justinus Sicus. 10. Άπαντημα ποιὰ τῶν ἐρυθρών πυρὸς ἀναγκαῖος Σμύρνημα, ἐπιστολῶν τῆς Ἐρυθράς καὶ Μαραίτης Χριστιανῶν τῇ Νικαίᾳ τῆς Νεα-Νικαίας. This is a fragment of a letter addressed to the Christians of Nicæa, and it is quite possible that it was written by Justinus himself. It is, however, a suggestion rather than a proof of the genuineness of the work.

allype, but without saying that it was in a separate work. The authorship of the work Ἡ πρώτη τοῦ μαθητή, De Unicerro, mentioned by Photius (Bibl. cod. 48), was, as he tells us, disputed, some ascribing it to Justin, but apparently with little reason. It is now assigned to Hippolytus (vol. iii., p. 863). It begins by saying: "Nearly all the works of Justin, genuine and spurious (viz. all enumerated above in the first three divisions, except the Oratio ad Graecos and the Epistola ad Diognetum), were published by Robert Stephens, Paris, 1551, fol. This is the edition of 1551. It was a reprint of the lost work, but the Cohortatio ad Graecos had been published earlier, with a Latin version, Paris, 1539, 4to. There is no discrimination or attempt at discrimination in this edition of Stephens between the genuine and spurious works. The Oratio ad Graecos, and the Epistola ad Diognetum, with a Latin version and dates, were published by Henry Stephens, Paris, 1592, 4to, and again in 1597. All these works, real or supposed, of Justin were published with the Latin version of Langus, and notes by Fred. Syllburgius, Heidelberg, 1503, fol; and this edition was reprinted, Paris, 1615 and 1636, fol, with the addition of some other writings by Justin, and with an apparatus criticus (or rather Wittenberg), 1686, fol, with some further additions. A far superior edition, with the remains of Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, and Hermias the Philosopher, with a learned preface and notes, was published, "opera et studio unius ex Monarchia cogereta, S. Hippolitii Episcopi Romani," Geneva, 1742, fol. In this the genuine pieces, according to the judgment of the editor (Nos. 1-6 in our enumeration), are given in the body of the work, together with the Epistola ad Diognetum, of the authorship of which Mr. Marriott was in doubt. The two Apologies were placed in their right order for the first time in this edition. The remaining works, together with fragments which had been collected by Grabe (who had first published in his Speciologically SS. Patrum the fragment on the Resurrection from Joannes Damascenus) and others, and the Martyr, with a Latin version of which the Greek was first published in the Acta Sotetorum, Aprilis, vol. ii, were given in the Appendix. From the time of Maran, no complete edition of Justin was published until that of Otto (Jena, 1842-44, 2 vols. 8vo; new edition, 1847-50, 3 vols. 8vo). The first volume contains the Oratio et Cohortatio ad Graecos, and the Apologia Secunda. The second contains the Dialogus cum Tryphone, the Epistola ad Diognetum, the fragments, and the Acta Martyri Justinii et Sociorum. Numerous valuable editions of the several pieces appeared, chiefly in England. The Apologia Prima was edited by Thrilby, and published, Dublin, 1722, folio. The Oratio et Cohortatio ad Graecos, Cohortatio ad Graecos, and De Monarchia, by Hutchin (Oxford, 1703, 8vo); and the Dialogus cum Tryphone, by Jebb (Lond. 1719, 8vo). These three editions had the Latin version of Langus, and various notes. The Apologia Prima, Apologia Secunda, and Dialogus cum Tryphone, from the text of Robert Stephens, with some corrections, with the version of Langus, and notes, were edited by Thrilby, and published, Lond. 1722, folio. It has been conjectured that this valuable edition, though published under the name of Thrilby, was really by Marckley. The Apologia Prima, Apologia Secunda, Dialogus cum Tryphone, and the fragments, are given in the first volume of the Bibliothea Patrum of Galland. We do not profess to have enumerated all the editions of the Greek text, and we have not noticed the Latin versions. Full information with respect to these will be found in the 'Memorabilia Sacrae Antiquitatis' of Dr. Spear. These works are English translations of the Apologies of Reeves, of the Dialogue with Trypho by Brown, and of the Exhortation to the Gentiles by Moses."

Theological Views.—Of the more striking peculiarities of Justin's theological system, we present the reader a selection from a passage in the 'Memoirs of a French Lay Professor,' C. E. Stowe: "There is in every man a germ of the divine reason, a seed of the Logos, whereby man is related to God, and becomes capable of forming an idea of God. By this spark of the divine intelligence the better men among the pagan philosophers were illuminated; but more especially, and far beyond these, the previous revealed men in the Old Testament. Still this revelation was only fragmentary and partial. Only in Christ was the Logos, the divine reason, perfectly revealed. The Logos, the Word, is himself God, yet from God; the Word the First-begotten, the Power, the primitive Revelation of God. He is the uncreated, uncreated, uncreated, yet without any dividing line sur or evangelist is expressly named, but reference is always made directly to Christ. "Justin's exegesis of the Old Testament is typological and Messianic throughout, finding references everywhere to Christ."

Justin and the Gnostic, who flourished towards the end of the second century, has only recently become known through the Philosophoumena of Hippolytus (v, 22; § 15), and of his personal history and origin very little information has come down to us. His system has a Judaizing cast, and is mostly based upon a mystical interpretation of Genesis. He propagated his doctrines secretly, binding his disciples to silence by solemn oaths. In his genius Justin made use of Greek mythology, especially the tradition of the twelve conflicts of Hercules. He assumes three original principles, two male and one female. The last he identifies with Eden, which marries Elohim, and becomes thus the mother of the angels of the spirit-world. To the tree of life in Paradise represents the good, the tree of knowledge the evil angels. The four rivers are symbols of the four divisions of angels. The Naas, or the serpent-spirit, he made, unlike the Ophites, the bearer of the evil principle; he committed adultery with Eve, and Eve seduced Adam; he adulterated the laws of Moses and the oracles of the prophets, he nailed Jesus to the cross. But by this crucifixion Jesus was emancipated from his material body, rose to the good God to whom he committed his spirit in death, and thus became the deliverer. — Schaff, Church History, i, 242, 243. Justin of Sicily. See JUSTINUS.

Justin, or the Elder, Roman emperor of the East, born A.D. 450, was originally a swineherd. The soldiers of the Pretorian band forced him to accept the imperial dignity on the death of Anastasius in 518. He is noted in ecclesiastical history for his interference in behalf of the orthodox bishops who had been banished by the Arians, but whom he recalled, and for several edicts which he published against the Arians. Hearing of the destruction of Antioch by an earthquake, he laid aside the imperial robe, clothed himself in sackcloth, and passed several days in fasting and prayer, to avoid divine judgment. He refused that city and other places which were destroyed by the same calamity. He died in 527. See Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Bibl., ii, 677 sq.

Justin, Sr., is said to have been born at Antioch, of Christian parents, and to have suffered martyrdom at Nicomedia in 304. St. Cyrilian, surnamed the Magician, is charged with the attempt of her seduction by magic, and was sent to Alexandria to embrace the Christian faith. During the persecution ordered by Diocletian and Maximian they were arrested together, and, after suffering torture with great firmness, were sent to Diocletian at Nicomedia. The latter caused them at once to be beheaded. The Greek Church commemorates them on the 2d of October, and the Roman Church on the 26th of September. The emperor Theodosius II. the Younger, wrote a poem in three caesuras in honor of St. Justin and St. Cyrilian, 521. See Biblioth. chrys. exxt., Tbabot, Memoire, vol. v; Dupin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccles. au troisieme siecle; Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Gén., xxvi, 309.

Justin of Padua, St., patroness of Padua, and, together with St. Mark, of Venice also. According to the hagiographers, she was a native of the former city, and suffered martyrdom there in 304, under Diocletian, and at that time was under Nero. She was beheaded on the event, however. Her relics, which were lost, were recovered (?) in 1177, and are preserved in a church of Padua which bears her name. In 1117 a convent of Benedictines in the neighborhood reformed their rules, taking the name of Congregation of St. Justin of Padua. This reform was followed by another in 1498, under the care of Luigi Barbo, a Venetian senator, whose pope Alexander VI created first abbot of the order. The congregation spread, and the monastery of Mount Cassin, having joined it in 1504, was made its head-quarters by Julius II. Moreri considers the legend of this saint's ascension to heaven false, yet the Roman Church commemorates her on the 7th of October. See Tillemont, Hist. de la Persécution de Diocletien, art. 55; Baillie, l'ès des Saints, Oct. 7th.—Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Gén., xxvii, 310.

Justinian I, the Great (Flavius AECIUS JUSTINIANUS), emperor of the East, was born in 483 of an obscure family. He shared the fortunes of his uncle Justin, who, from common reflections, was raised to the imperial throne, and, after the death of his uncle, Aug. 1, 527, was himself proclaimed emperor. He obtained great military successes over the Persians through his celebrated general Belisarius; destroyed the empire of the Vandals in Africa, and put an end to the dominion of the Ostrogoths in Italy, which succeeded restored to the Roman empire a part of its vast possessions. But Justinian was by no means satisfied with the renown of a conqueror. Learned, unrestrainedly active, and ecclesiastically devout, he aspired to the united renown of a lawyer, theologian, and champion of the preserved Christian orthodoxy as well; and, in some respects, brilliant reign of nearly thirty years is marked by earnest though unsuccessful efforts to establish the "true faith" for all time to come. Indeed, he regarded it as his especial mission to compel a general uniformity of Christian doctrine, and to increase the divisions in church and state, as he was greatly misused by his famous wife, who, though animated by great zeal for the Church, was blindly devoted to the Monophysites. Yet, however unfortunate the efforts of Justinian in behalf of Christian orthodoxy re- sulted, so much is certain, that his aim was noble and lofty, and that he was actuated by the holiest of purposes. It is said of him that he spent whole nights in prayer and fasting, and in theological studies and discussions, and that he placed his throne under the especial protection of the Virgin Mary and St. Michael. He adorned the capital and the provinces with costly temples and institutions of charity. Among the churches which he rebuilt was that of St. Sophia at Constantinople, which had been burned in one of the civil commotions. This church is esteemed a masterpiece of architecture. The altar was entirely of gold and silver, and adorned with a vast number and variety of precious stones. It was by this emperor that the fifth Ecumenical Council was convened at Constantinople (A.D. 553) to secure the end for which Justinian was the means of promoting, the extermination of heresies. His fame, however, rests chiefly on his great ability as legislator. Determined to collect all previous legislative Roman enactments, he un-trusted to a number of the ablest lawyers of Rome, under the direction of the renowned Tribonianus, the task of a complete revision and digested collection of the Roman law from the time of Hadrian to his own reign; and thus arose, after the short lapse of seven years, the celebrated Codex Justinianus, "which henceforth became the universal law of the Roman empire, the sole text-book in the academies at Rome, Constantinople, and Berytus, and the basis of the legal relations of the greater part of Christian Europe to this day." This body of Roman law, which is "an important source of our knowledge of the Christian life in its relations to the state and its influence upon it," opens with the imperial edict on the Trinity (for which, see Schaff, Church History, iii, 769) and the imperial anathema against the prominent Christian heretics. The whole collections of Justinian are now known under the style of Corpus Juris Civilis. The editions with Goethendrius's notes are much esteemed. The four books of Justinian's Institutions were translated into English, with notes, by George Harris, LL.D. (Lond. 2d ed. 1761, 4to, Lat. and Eng.). Justinian also wrote a libellus confessionis fidei, and a hymn (μονογραφίας διας και λογος του Θεου, etc.). (J. H. W.)

Medal of Justinian.

Justinus or Sicily, bishop of one of the sees in that island in the latter part of the fifth century, was present at a council held at Rome A.D. 483 or 484, under pope Felix III, in which Petrus Fullo (Ἰωαννᾶς) or Peter the Fuller, was condemned as a heretic for having added to the "trisagion" the heretical words "who suffered for us." Several bishops, among whom was Justin, desist of recalling Peter from his errors, addressed letters to him. Justin's letter to Peter, in the original Greek, with a Latin version, Epistola Justinii Episcopi in Sicilia, ad Petrum Fulloonem εις κακουργεον, is given in Iun Coenitio (vol. iv, col. 110a, etc., edit. Labbe; vol. ii, col. 830, edit. Hardouin; vol. vii, col. 111s, edit. Mansi). The genuineness of this letter, and of six other letters of similar character from various Eastern or Western bishops, which are also given in the Concilia, is disputed by Valutus (Obser. Eccles. ad Ecce Gravis Libri duo, lib. i De Petro Antiochiano, Episcop, c. 4), but defended by Cave (Hist. Lit. i, 454), who, however, contends that the Greek text is not the original, but a version from the Latin. Pagi (Crit. in Baroni Amnades, ad ann. 485, c. 15) proposes to correct the reading of the title of Justin's letter from "Episcopi in Sicilia" to "Episcopi in Cilicia"; others would read the name "Justinianus," but on which authority we do not know. Dodwell and others ascribe to this Justin the Responsiones ad Orthodoxos, and the Expositio Decretalium, reputed to be by Justin Martyr, and printed with his works. See Fabritius, Bibl. Gr. vii, 53; xi, 661; xii, 653.—Smith, Dict. Greek and Roman Biog. s. v.

Justinus (Ἰωαννᾶς, for Lat. Justus, Justin; just; a frequent name among the Jews, equivalent to יוחנן, Josephus, Life, 9, 65, 70), the name or surname of several men. Schützgen (Act. Ap.) says by quotation from Rabbinical writers that this name was not unusual among the Jews.

1. Another name for Joseph (q. v.), surnamed Bar-saba, who was one of the two selected as candidates for the vacant apostolate of Judas (Acts i, 29).

2. A proselyte at Corinth, in whose house, adjoining the synagogue, Paul preached to the Gentiles after leaving the synagogue (Acts xvii, 7). A.D. 49.

3. Otherwise called Jesus, a Jewish Christian, named in connection with Mark by Paul as being his only fellow-laborer at Rome when he wrote to the Colossians (Col. iv, 11). Tradition (Acts, Sermo dom. Juni, iv, 67) names him as the bishop of Eleutheropolis! Justinus, St., is the name of a Christian martyr who, with his brother Pastor (aged respectively twelve and nine years), when the persecution of Diocletian against the Christians began, in the face of certain martyrdom boldly avowed himself a Christian. For this alone they were cruelly dragged; and Dacian, at that time the governor of Spain, enraged at their courageous resignation, finally caused them to be beheaded.

Another St. Justinus, celebrated in history, was bishop of Lyons, in France. His life gives us an insight into the customs of the 4th century. The monks, both in the East and the West, sought at that time to prevent as far as possible capital punishment, and often represented those who had undergone it in punishment of their crimes as martyrs. A man who, in an excess of rage, had killed several persons in the streets of Lyons, fled to the bishop's church for protection. Justinus, in order to shield him, delivered him into the hands of the authorities on the condition that he should be but lightly punished, but the mob took him out of the hands of the officers and killed him. Justinus, considering himself responsible for the death of this man, and henceforth unworthy of his office, fled to Egypt, where he remained unknown in a convent, and there died about 390.

Justinus of Tiberias (in Galilee), son of Pistus, one of the chief converts to Judaism by Jewish historians, flourished in the beginning of the Christian era. He was in the employ of king Agrippa as private secretary when the revolution in Galilee broke out, and though the city of Tiberias had been especially favored by the king, the Tiberian Jews soon followed in the course of their neighbors and gathered under Pistus and his son Justinus, who, besides the advantage of a Greek education, was a great natural orator, and easily swayed the masses. As we have shown in our articles on Josephus and John of Gischala, Josephus desired ever the leadership, be it among his own nation or among the Romans, and Justinus having made early advances in favor of the revolution, and quickly gained the confidence of the people, Josephus feared and hated him, and, as soon as the war terminated, took special pains to convince the Romans that Justinus was the greater rebel of the two. The conduct of Josephus towards Justinus became still more unjustly severe after the latter had ventured to write a history of the war, now unhappily lost, in which the treacherous action of Josephus was laid bare. Indeed, Josephus himself makes the only avowed object of the publication of his "life" his vindication from the calumnies of his enemies, who is accused of having falsified the history of the war with Rome (Jos., Ant. 14, 203, 33, 66, 74), as well as of having delayed the editing of the book until the decease of Agrippa and the other great men of the time, because his accounts were false, and he feared the consequences of his unjustness and untruthfulness. Justinus, according to Philo (Bibl. col. 33), also wrote a history of the Jews. from the times of Moses down to the death of Herod, in the third year of the reign of Trajan, but this work also is unfortunately lost. Some writers (Eusebius, Hist. Eclecs. iii, 9; Stephanus Byzant. a. v. Trisapoc) speak of a special work of his in the Jewish War, but this may refer only to the last portion of his chronicle, which Dio-genès Laertius (ii, 41) calls a Στιγμα. Suidas (s.v. Ιονετος) mentions some other works of Justus, of which, however, nothing is extant. See Grätz, Gesch. der Juden, iii, 397 sq.; Stud. und Krit. 1858, p. 56 sq. (J. H. W.)

Jutland, a province of Denmark, contains, since the Peace of Breslau (Dec. 30, 1864), which recognized the frontier between Denmark and Germany, 7,938 square miles, and in 1880 had 788,119 inhabitants. It constitutes the northern part of the Cimbrian peninsula, and is bounded on the north by the Skagerrack, on the east by the Kattegat, on the south by Schleswig, and on the west by the German Sea. Originally the Cimbri are said to have lived there; subsequently the country was occupied by the Juts, a Saxon tribe. At the beginning of the 10th century it was conquered by the Danish king Gorm, and since then it has been a part of the kingdom of Denmark. Christianity was introduced into Jutland by Ansar (q.v.), and the Christianization of the country was completed within a comparatively short period. The first church was erected at Ribe. The Reformation was first carried through in the city of Viborg by the efforts of Hans Yansen, a young peasant from the island of Fyn. Jutland has now four Lutheran dioceses—Aalborg, Viborg, Aarhus, and Ribe. See Denmark.

Juttah (Hebrew Yuttah, יטְחָה, Josh. xv, 55; Vulg. Jota; or Yuttah, יְטוּת, perhaps inclined, otherwise i. q. Jothab, Josh. xxi, 16; Vulg. Jeta; Sept. Ἰραβ v. Ἰταραβ and Ἰταραβ), a Levitical city in the mountains of Judah, named in connection with Ziph, Jezreel, etc., in the neighborhood of Massah and Cerenel (Josh. xv, 55). It was allotted to the priests (xxi, 16), but in the catalogue of 1 Chron. vi, 57-59, the name has escaped. Eusebius (Onomast. s.v.) calls it a large village by the name of Jettas (Ἰετασ), and places it eighteen miles south of Eleutheropolis, in the district of Daromos (the south). It is doubtful the village discovered by Dr. Robison (Researches, ii, 628), four miles south of Hébron, and still called Yutta, having the appearance of a large Mohammedan town, on a low eminence, with trees around, and where the guides spoke of the existence of old foundations and former walls. Schwarz calls it Zeda in his Israeliten Jutta auf dem Kap. The selection of Juttah as a city of the priests suggests the idea of its having already been a place of importance, which is seemingly confirmed by early and numerous allusions to it in the inscriptions on the Egyptian monuments. There it appears to be described under the names Tuth, Tuhm, and Tahouas as a fortress of the Anakim near Arba or Hebron; and it is not a little remarkable that another Egyptian document, the Ta perceptus, expresses the word in almost the selfsame manner, Ἰταραβ and Ἰταραβ (Jou, Soc. Lit. April and July, 1822, p. 231, 316; D'Alrous and D'Eggleston); and Fairbairn, s. v. The "city of Judah" (Luke i, 39), whether Mary went to visit Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist, (see John, 31), where Zecharias therefore appears to have resided, has usually been supposed to mean Hebron; but, if the reading be correct, the proper rendering would be "Juttah," where the elision in Luke would be inadmissible (see Bornemann, Schol. in Luc. p. 12), notwithstanding the absence of the article (Winer's Grammat. N. T. p. 136). But, as this was not intended (see Rob. Valesius, Epist. ad Casaubon, 1613, p. 669), Reland (Parad. Hist.) has suggested a conjectural reading of "Jut-tah" for "Juttah," and favored it on the ground that the word may have been taken from Luke, which has met with favor among critics (see Harenberg, in the Nor. Miscell. Lips. iv, 595; Paulus, Kuinard, ad loc.), although no varying reading exists to justify it.

Juvencus, Caius Vettius Agclusius, one of the earliest Church historians and Christian poets, a native of Spain, was a contemporary of Constantine, and a presbyter of the Church. Living at the time when Christianity ascended the throne of the Roman Empire, he endeavored to clothe the recital of Biblical events in the classic and elegant style of the best profane writers. About 330 he composed his Historia evangeliaca, a work in four books, dedicated to Constantine. It is the reproduction of the Gospel narratives in a new order of arrangement, the text closely following the Greek, especially St. Matthew's, and in the style imitating Laeti-tius, Ovid, and especially Virgil, thus making a sort of epic poem, after the model of the .Emid. — The liberal praises bestowed upon Juvencus by divines and scholars, from St. Jerome down to Petrarch, must be understood to belong rather to the substance of the poem than to the form in which the materials are presented. We may honor the pious motive which prompted the undertaking, and we may bestow the same commendation upon the laborious ingenuity with which every particular recorded by the sacred historians, and frequently in the very words, are rendered in this work. The very plan of the composition excludes all play of fancy and all poetical freedom of expression, while the versification, although fluent and generally harmonious, too often bids defiance to the laws of prosody, and the language, although evidently in many places copied from the public and private correspondence here and in Italy, is marked with evidences of corruption and decay. The idea that this production might be employed with advantage in the interpretation of the Scriptures, insomuch as it may be supposed to exhibit faithfully the meaning attached to various obscure passages in the early age to which it belongs, will not, upon examination, be found to require much attention" (Professor Ramsay, in Smith, s. u. Jezra). He also wrote parts of the Old Testament in the same manner, but of these we know only his Liber s. e. Genesis (according to Jerome, De script. ii, 84, he wrote "non multa, quare neminem sane lectoris intellectum delenit") of the Historia evangelica was first printed by Deventer, s. l. (probably 1490); then reprinted, as in the Collectio vet. Poet. ecol. of Fabricius (Basil. 1654); the Bibli. M. Lugov. i, 55 sq.; by E. Resch (Francfort and Lpa. 1710); and later from a manuscript in the collection of the Vatican by F. Arentii (Rome, 1792, 4to), and in the first book of Gebers. Extracts of the Genesis were given in Martene's Nor. Collect. tom. i. and lately by J. B. Pitta, in his Spiritualium Sodalismus (Paris, Didot, 1852; comp. Proleg. xli sq.), published for the first time from both the Genesis and other fragments from the Old Testament, forming the basis of the Hebrew history of his edition of the Hebrew Bible, Rom. Lit. Gesch. (Suppl.) 1; Smith, Dict. Five and Nine, s. v. Juxon, William, a celebrated English prelate, distinguished for his faithfulness to the unfortunate king Charles, was born at Chichester in 1632, and was educated at St. John's College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He first studied at Cambridge, and was preferred to a prebend in the city of York, was made a judge, and in 1661 was made a dean of Hereford, dean of the Chapel Royal, and, in 1683, bishop of London. The sweetness of his temper, the kindness and courtesy of his manners, and his uniform benevolence, made him bishop Juxon a general favorite, and he was no sooner placed in his see than he endeavored to hold a secular office under Government. This was one of Laud's fatal errors. He did not perceive and make allowance for the change of public opinion. Bishops had, before the Reformation, become great men by holding secular appointments, and the archbishop thought to restore the order to its ancient importance in men's eyes by reverting to the exploded system. He forgot that bishops held secular offices formerly from the necessity of the case, and because there were not a sufficient number of the laity qualified, and that the fact itself, though necessary, was still an evil, since it interfered with their higher and spiritual duties. In Land's own time the laity were better qualified than the clergy for office, and the appointment of the clergy was justly offensive, both as an insult to the laity, and as leading the people to suppose that the bishops had nothing to do in their dioceses. Under this false policy, in 1625 Juxon was appointed to the post of lord high treasurer, the highest office at that time in the kingdom, and next in precedence to that of the archbishop and to the great seal, which had not been held by a clergyman since the reign of Henry VII. In 1641 he resigned this office, which, it was admitted by all parties, he had held without reproach. The general harmlessness of his character enabled him to remain for the most part undisturbed at Fulham. Nevertheless, he remained firm to his principles, and steady in his loyalty to the king, by whom he was frequently consulted. He was in attendance upon the king at the treaty in the Isle of Wight, in 1648, and during the king's trial acted as his spiritual adviser. Bishop Juxon was also in attendance upon the king in his last hours upon the scaffold. Juxon continued in his position until the abolition of kingly government, by the House of Lords, and the establishment of a Commonwealth. He then retired to his own estate, the manor of Little Compton, in Gloucestershire, where he passed his days in a private and devout condition. At the Restoration, aged as he was, he was appointed, we might almost say by acclamation, archbishop of Canterbury in 1660. He was not able to exert himself much in his spiritual office, but he was a benefactor to the see, for during the short time he held the archbishopric he expended on the property fifteen thousand pounds; he moreover augmented the vicarages, the great tithes of which were appropriated to the see. He died June 4, 1663. By his last will, archbishop Juxon bequeathed £7000 to his alma mater. He left also £100 to the parish of St. Giles, of which he had been vicar; the same sum to four other parishes in Oxford, and sums for the repair of St. Paul's and Canterbury Cathedrals, and other charitable uses, in all to the amount of £5000. Wood tells us that he was a man of primitive sanctity, wisdom, piety, learning, patience, charity, and all apostolical virtues. Whitelock says of him that he was a comely person, of an active and lively disposition, of great parts and temper, full of ingenuity and meekness, not apt to give offence to any, and willing to do good to all; of great moderation, sincerity, and integrity, in so much that he was the delight of his time. He wrote a Sermon on Luke xxi. 31:—a treatise, entitled ΗΠΟΥΝ ΚΑΙ ΕΠΙΠΗΝ, or Some Considerations upon the Act of Uniformity (London, 1662, 4to.). In this work he shows himself to be no friend to the scheme of a comprehension. A catalogue of books in England, alphabetically digested (Lond. 1658), bears his name. See Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v. (J. H. W.)
