Kaab, a celebrated Arabian poet, author of one of the seven poems which were suspended in the temple of Mecca, was originally a strenuous opponent of Muhammad, whose doctrines and person he satirized. He, however, recanted by writing a poem in honor of the prophet. As a reward, the prophet gave him his green mantle, which one of the descendants of Kaab sold for ten thousand pieces of silver. He died in 662.

Kaaba (Arabic Al-Ka'bah, "Square House," or, more properly, now Beit-Allah, "House of God") is the name of an oblong stone building inclosed in the great mosque at Mecca. From time immemorial tradition makes it have been a place of pilgrimage from all parts of Arabia within a circuit of a thousand miles, interrupted only by the sea. The Kaaba, the Black Stone, and other concomitants of worship at Mecca have a similar antiquity (Muir, Makomet, i, 211).

There are intimations of the Kaaba to be found in Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus. It certainly existed before the Christian era (Sir W. Jones, Works, x, 356; M. C. de Pencival, i, 74; ii, 532). See Mecca.

Origin and History.—Mr. Muir (ii, 84) thinks the Kaaba to be of Yemen origin, and to have been connected with the systems of idolatry prevalent in the southern portion of the Arabian peninsula. The Mussulmans say that Adam first worshipped on this spot, after his expulsion from Paradise, in a tent sent down from heaven for this purpose. Seth substituted for the tent a structure of clay and stone, which was, however, destroyed by the Deluge, but afterwards rebuilt by Abraham and Ismael. But this tradition may have arisen in connection with a traditional Jewish inscription found on a stone in the Kaaba about forty years before Muhammad, and which would suggest the possibility that some remote Abrahamic tribe acquainted with Syrian may have been at an early period associated with aboriginal Arabs in the erection of the Kaaba. Some have supposed it to have been devoted to the worship of Saturn (Zebal). Certain it is that it has been the holy emblem at different periods of four different faiths. Buddhist, Hindu, Gueber, and Moslem have all held it in veneration (Burton, iii, 160). According to the Koran, it is "the ancient house," the first house built and appointed for God's worship (Sale's Koran, p. 276), and the guardianship of it was by express revelation given to Osman (Sale, p. 167).

It was originally without a roof, and, having suffered material damage by a flood, was considered to be in danger of falling. The treasures it contained were considered insecure, and some of them were alleged to have been stolen. In A.D. 603 Muhammad rebuilt the edifice, but in A.D. 1626 it was again destroyed by a great torrent, and in A.D. 1627 was rebuilt substantially after its present form.

Structure.—It stands now on a base about two feet in height, which is a sharp inclined plane; and, as the roof is flat, the building becomes an irregular cube, the sides of which vary from forty to fifty feet in height, and eighteen by fourteen paces in extent. It is inclosed by a wall some two hundred and fifty paces on two sides, and two hundred paces on the others.

The Kaaba has but one door, which is raised some four or five feet from the ground, and is reached by a ladder. It is allowed to be entered only two or three times a year, though it is reputed to be susceptible of a money influence, and to be opened clandestinely much more frequently. The door is wholly coated with silver, and has gilt ornaments. Wax candles are burned before it nightly, together with perfuming-pan containing musk, aloes, etc., and other odorous substances.

The Kaaba at Mecca.

Black Stone.—The most important feature of the Kaaba is the "Black Stone," which is inserted in the northeast corner or the building, at the height of four or five feet from the ground. It is in shape an irregular oval, about seven inches in diameter. There are various opinions as to the nature of this stone. Burchardt supposes it to be a "lava" stone. Others suggest that it is an aerolite. Muir calls it "a fragment of volcanic salts sprinkled with colored crystals, and varied red flecks, and it seems to be thrown up against a ground of a lifeless color, as by some puerile perturbation of the ground." Burchardt thinks it looks as if it had been broken into several pieces and cemented. He says, however, that it is difficult to determine the quality of it, because it is so worn by the millions of kisses and touches of the pilgrims. Muir says it is worn "until it is uneven, and has a muscular appearance." It is bordered all round with a large plate of silver about a foot broad. The part or angle exposed is semicircular. So much of the merit of the Kaaba depends on this stone that at the time of the rebuilding of the edifice by Mohammed a great contest arose between the families of the Koreish for the honor of placing it in the new structure. Mohammed settled this dispute by placing it on his own mantle, and causing a chief of each tribe to lift it, and then put it himself in its position in the Kaaba. See Kuzzari. Pilgrims, on arrival at Mecca, proceeding to the Kaaba and making the circuit of it, start at the corner where the black stone is inserted. Fabulous stories abound relative to the black stone, such as that it was originally white, but became black because it was unseen tampered with, or went on account of the sins of men. This, however, only affected its exterior. Others attribute its change of color to the innumerable touches and kisses of the pilgrims. It is one of the precious stones of Paradise, which came to earth with Adam, and was miraculously preserved during the flood, and brought back to Meccas by the angel Gabriel, and given to Abraham to build originally in the Kaaba. It was taken at one time by the Karmathians (q. v.), who refused to release it for five thousand pieces of gold, but they finally restored it.VEILING.—There is a custom, very remote in its origin, of covering the outside of the Kaaba with a veil, which has at various times been made of Yemen cloth, of Egyptian linen, of red brocade, and of black silk. To supply it became at one time a sign of royalty, and it was accordingly furnished by the caliph of Egypt, and later by the Turkish sultan. There seems to be some conflict of authorities about some things pertaining to the custom of veiling. About one third from the top of the veil is a band about two feet in width, embroidered with texts from the Koran in gilt letters (see Mecca, p. 295, 300). Admission.—Since the ninth year of the Hegira an order has obtained that none but Islamites shall be admitted to the Kaaba. Formerly the General Assembly of Ocahad convened at Mecca. In it poets contested for a whole mouth for prises, and those poems to which the prizes were from time to time awarded were by public order written in letters of gold on Egyptian silk, and hung up in the Kaaba (Sale, p. 20). Other Features.—In the south-east corner of the Kaaba is a smaller stone, less venerable than the above, being touched only, and not kissed, by those walking round the Kaaba. On the north side of the Kaaba is a slight hollow, large enough to admit three persons, where it is specially meritorious to pray, it being the place where Abraham and Ishmael kneaded clay and mud for the original structure. From the west side of the Kaaba a water-spout carries rain from the roof and pours it on the reputed grave of Ishmael, and pilgrims are not unfrequently seen "fighting to catch it." This water-spout is said to be of pure gold, and is four feet in length and about six inches in width. It is declared to have been brought to the Kaaba by Jerald (A.D. 781). The pavement round the Kaaba is a mosaic of many colored stones, and was laid in A.H. 826. There is on one side of the Kaaba a semicircular wall, which is scarcely less sacred than the Kaaba itself. The walk round the Kaaba is outside this wall, but the closer to it the better. This wall is entitled El Hutun, and is of solid stone, five feet in height and four feet in thickness. It is incised in white marble, and inscribed with prayers. The Kaaba has a double roof, supported by pillars of aloes-wood, and it is said that no bird ever rests upon it. The whole edifice is surrounded by a low wall, formed of colored stones on one side where there are found three oratories, or places of devotion for different sects; also the edifice containing the well Zem-Zem, the cupola of Abbas, and the Treasury. All these are further inclosed by a splendid colonnade, some say a colonnade of pillars, all gilded and adorned with lamps, which shed a brilliant lustre at night. These surroundings, between which and the Kaaba run seven paved causeways, were first devised by Omar for the better preservation of the Kaaba itself. According to Burchardt, the same holy Kaaba is the scene of such indecencies as cannot with propriety be particularized; indecencies which are practiced not only with impunity, but publicly and without a blush. See MOHAMMEDANISM.

Since the second year of the Hegira the Kaaba has been for the Mussulman world the Kudsh, or place towards which all Moslems turn in prayer. See KEBLAH. Kabiller is the name of a nephew of Brahma, and one of India's greatest saints. His father was Karta-men, the ancestor of the Brahmin race. It is in the person of this Hindu that Vishnu took the form of man some twenty-four different times. See Vollmer, Wörterbuch der Mythologie, p. 987.

Kab'ziel (Heb. Keb'zel, קֶבֶּזֶל, a gathering of God, i.e. perhaps confluence of waters; Sept. Kaf'zele in Joshua, elsewhere Kaph'zele v. c. Kaf'zeleth, etc.), a town on the extreme south of Judah, near Idumaeans, and therefore probably included within the territory of Simon (Josh. xvi, 21); the native place of Beneiah (son of Jehoiada), one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 20; 1 Chron. xvi, 22). It was inhabited after the captivity under the similar name of Jak'serel (Neh. xi, 42). It is unlikely can only be conjectured as being near the edge of the Ghor, south of the Dead Sea (see Mal.4, loc. cit.); the name and vicinity are probably still marked by the wady El-Ka'zel, a small winter torrent running into the Dead Sea from the south (Robinson, Researches, ii, 497). Here the boundaries of Palestine, Edom, and Moab would converge, as is implied in the above Scripture references, and the region is still the resort of wild animals (Lynch, Jordan, p. 319; De Saulcy, Dead Sea, 298), and characterized by a deep fall of snow in winter ("wad el--Jereb, Syria, p. 492). This is stated in the account of Beneiah's adventure with the lion.

Kad'sa (Ked'ja), a town of Palestine, apparently in the south (Judith i, 9); probably the same as KADESH-BAARNEA (q. v.).

Kad'esh (Heb. Kadesh, קָדָת, holy, perhaps as being the site of some ancient oracle [compare the early equivalent name "fount of judgment"]; Gen. xiv, 7; xvi, 14; xx, 1; Num. xxxii, 26; xx, 1, 14, 16, 22; xviii, 18; xxi, 18, 14; xx, 11, 10; Deut. xi, 16; xxxi, 18, 11; Judg. xi, 17; Ps. cviii, x; Ezek. xlvii, 19; xviii, 28; Sept. K'de's, but in Ezek. xlvii, 19, Kad'ja v. r. Ked'ja) or, more fully, KADESH-BAR'NEA (Hebrew Kadesh--Harne'a, קָדָשׁ--בָּרְנֵא, the latter portion of the name being regarded by Simonis, i.e. a.s. v. as compounded of Kadesh, open country, and 72, wandering; Num. xxxii, 8; xiv, 4; KADESH

DEUT. 12, 19; 29; JOSH. x, 41; IV, 6, 7; XV, 8; SEP. KADESH [KADH]; BIRG. A site on the south-eastern border of the Promised Land, towards Edom, of much interest as being the point at which the Israelites twice encamped (their ninth and thirteenth years) in the march of entering Palestine, and from which they were twice sent back; the first time in pursuance of their sentence to wander forty years in the wilderness, and the second time from the refusal of the king of Edom to permit a passage through his territories. It is probable that the term "Kadesh," though applied to signify a "city," yet had also a wider application to a region, in which Kadesh-meribah certainly, and Kadesh-barnea probably, indicate a precise spot. Thus Kadesh appears as a limit eastward of the same tract which was limited westward by Shur (Gen. xx, 1). Shur is possibly the same as Sihor, "which is before Egypt" (xxv, 18; Josh. xiii, 8;Jer. xii, 18), and was the first portion of the wilderness on which the people emerged from the passage of the Red Sea. See SHUR. "Between Kadesh and Bered" is another indication of the site of Kadesh as an eastern limit (Gen. xvi, 14), for the point so fixed is "the fountain on the way to Shur" (v, 7), and the range of limits is narrowed by selecting the western one not so far to the west, while the eastern one, Kadesh, is unchanged. Again, we have Kadesh as the point to which the foray of Chedorlaomer "returned" (Gen. xiv, 9), implying that it was certainly visited but that it lay in the direction, as viewed from Mount Seir and Paran, mentioned next before it, which was that of the point from which Chedorlaomer had come, viz. the north. Chedorlaomer, it seems, coming down by the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, passed the Zuzims (Ammon, Gen. xiv, 5; Deut. ii, 20), and the Emims (Moab, Deut. ii, 11), and the Horites in Mount Seir, to the south of that sea, unto "El-Paran that is by the wilderness." He drove these Horites over the Arabah into the El-ith region. Then he turned and went to Lydda, or Laish, or Tamar, or Engedi (comp. Gen. xiv, 7; 2 Chron. xx, 2). It was from Kadesh that the spies entered Palestine by ascending the mountains; and the murmuring Israelites, afterwards attempting to do the same, were driven back by the Amalekites and Canaanites, and afterwards apparently by the king of Arad, as far as Hormah, then called Zephath (Numb. xxiii, 17; xiv, 40-45; xxii, 1-3; Deut. i, 41-44; compare Judg. i, 7). There was also at Kadesh a fountain (EX-MISHAPIT) mentioned long before the exode of the Israelites (Gen. xiv, 7); and the tradition of the name of Mount Hor at Kadesh (Ex. xvi, 20) and a second visit, which implies that at the first there was no lack of this necessary article. In memory of the murmurs of the Israelites, this fountain afterwards bore the name of "the Waters of Meribah" (Deut. xxxii, 51). The term "Kadesh barnea" may have derived its name from Kadesh, which is "a stronghold," and not, as some suppose, from the name of the plain (Ps. xxvii, 8). On the second visit to this place Miriam died there, and Moses sent messengers to the king of Edom, informing him that they were in Kadesh, a city in the uttermost part of his border, and asking i.e. to pass through his country, so as to continue their march round the wilderness which surrounded the coast from the east. This Edom refused, and the Israelites accordingly marched to Mount Hor, where Aaron died; and then along the Arabah (desert of Zin) to the Red Sea (Numb. xx, 14-29). The name of Kadesh again occurs in describing the southern quarter of Judah, the nise defining which is drawn "from the shore of the Salt Sea, from the bay that looked southward; and it went out to the south side of Akkrabim, and passed along to Zin, and ascended up on the south side to Kadesh-barnea" (Josh. i, 1-9; compare Num. xxxvii, 4, 4). In Gen. xiv, 7 Ido is connected with Tamar, or Dezon Tahron; just as we find these two in the comparatively late book of Ezekiel, as designed to mark the southern border of Judah, drawn through and terminating at seaward at the "river to," or "towards the great sea" (Ezek. xxvii, 19; xxxi, 29). There is one objection to this view. The Kadesh from which the spies were sent was in the wilderness of Paran (Numb. xiii, 26); Kadesh-barnea was in the wilderness of Zin (xx, 1). This is easily removed. Paran was the general name for the whole desert of that part of the Arabah, extending from Palestine to Sinai (Gen. xxii, 21; Num. xiii, 21; Josh. x, 1-3). If Kadesh was situated on the western side of the Arabah, then it might be reckoned either to Paran or to Zin; or, if we agree with Keil, Delitzsch, and others (Keil on Josh. x), that Paran was the general name for the whole, and Zin the specific name of a portion, the objection is removed at once.—KITTO; SMITH. Compare KADESH, l.

To meet these various indications, two places by the name of Kadesh were formerly supposed to exist; but the editor of the Pictorial Bible has shown (note on Numb. xxx, 1) that a single Kadesh would answer all the conditions, if placed on the western border of the Arabah, opposite Mt. Hor. Accordingly, Dr. Robinson locates it at Ain el-Weheb, which he argues coincides with all the circumstances mentioned (Researches, ii, 588). But this is somewhat too distant from the pass es-Sufa, which is probably the Zephath where the Israelites encamped the night before entering Canaan, and of which Raumer has with greater plausibility fixed Kadesh at Ain es-Ihub (Der Zug der Israeliten, Leipzig, 1843, p. 9 sq.). See EXOD. Mr. Rowlands, who travelled through this region in 1842, thinks he discovered Kadesh (as well as numerous other ancient localities in this vicinity) at a place which he calls Ain Kades (Williams's Holy City, 2d edit., i, 467). A writer in Fairbairn's Dictionary argues at length in favor of this position at Ain Gades, but all his reasoning partakes of the character of special pleading, and rests upon inconclusive grounds. His only real argument is that Kadesh is the middle place between wady Feiran (Paran) and Engedi (Hazezon-tamer), on Chedorlaomer's route (Gen. xiv, 7); but that route is given so vaguely that we can lay no particular stress upon it. The other arguments even tell the other way; especially do the passages deduced go to show that Kadesh was at the extreme east from Shur (Gen. xxx, 1) and el-Arish (Numb. xxxiv, 5, Josh. xxv, 6), and the same was the case with Zin (Numb. xiii, 21; xxxiii, 36). This position also is avoided not only inconsistent with the location of Huzeroth at Ain Hudheibrah, but even re- moving the borders of Edom from the supposed Edomite dominance (Numb. xx, 16), and actually to remove Mt. Hor from its well-defined traditional situation (Deut. i, 2). Capt. Palmer has more lately visited the site thus assumed for Kadesh, and particularly describes it (Quart. Statement of the "Palestine Exploration Fund," Jan. 1871, p. 20 sq.), as "consisting of three springs, or rather shallow pools, one of them overflowing in the rainy season; but his advocacy for the identity adds no additional argument. In fact, the agreement in the name is the only plea of any force. This is counterbalanced by the scriptural notice of the position of the plain, which is given by the historian, in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1849, p. 377 sq.; also Palmer, Desert of Exodus, p. 296; comp. Kitto's Scripture Lands, p. 78-82; Ritter, Erdkunde, xiv, 1077-1089. Schwarz (Palestine, p. 23) endeavors, from Rabbinical authority, to locate Kadesh at a place named Bireia, about forty-five miles south of Gaza; but his whole theory is imaginary, besides indicating a position too far west for this Kadesh, and requiring another for En-Mishpat (p. 214), which is stated by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Kadhe, Bephe, Cades) to have been in the vicinity of Mt. Hor. The above statement Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, p. 95) unwar- rantably infers that Kadesh was identical with Petra.

KADI (Arabic) is among the Mohammedans the title of an assistant judge of civil law, and, like the judge himself (molla), is classed among the higher clergy, be-

KADKOD. See AGADE.

Kadmil (Heb. Kadmil, קָדָמִיל, before God, i. e. his servant; Sept. Kaμμύς), one of the Levites who returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity (Neh. xii. 8), and assisted in the various reforms of that period, being always named in connection with Joshua (Ezra iii. 9; Neh. viii. 33; comp. Ezra iii. 9), sometimes only as a descendant in common of Hodaviah (Ezra ii. 40; Neh. viii. 43; comp. Ezra iii. 9), but once as a son (Neh. xii. 24). The length of time over which these notices seem to extend is vast. 536-410 B.C. leads to the suspicion that they relate to two individuals (perhaps a brother and also a son of the Levite Joshua), one of whom may have been concerned in the earlier events, and the other in the later.

Kadmone (Heb. Kadmone, קדמון, eastern, as in Ezek. x. 19, etc., or former, as in Ezek. xxxviii. 17, etc.; only once of a nation, collect. in the sing., Gen. xv. 19; Sept. קְדָמֹנִי, Vulg. Calmonia, A. V. "Kadmoneites"), the name of a Canaanitish tribe, who appear to have dwelt in the north-east part of Palestine, under Mount Hermon, at the time that Abraham sojourned in the land, and are mentioned in a more than ordinarily full list of the aborigines of the land, by an inventor of words (Gen. xv. 19). As the name is derived from קְדָמ, kadam, "east," it is supposed by Dr. Wells and others to denote a people situated to the east of the Jordan, or, rather, that it was a term applied collectively, like "orientals," to all the people living in the countries beyond that river. At least it may be a term of contrast with the more western Zidonians. As the term likewise signifies "ancient," it may designate the older or aboriginal races of that region in general, who were recognized as the eldest in origin. Both these explanations may be correct, as the Kadmoneites are not elsewhere mentioned as a distinct name. Indeed, a subsequent discontinuance of the term, in the assigned acceptance, may easily be accounted for by the nations beyond the river having afterwards become more distinctly known, so as to be mentioned by their several distinctive names. See HITHER. The reader may see much ingenious trifling respecting this name in Bochart (Canaan, i. 19); the substance of which is that Cadmus, the founder of Thebes, in Boeotia, was originally a Kadmone, and that the name of his wife, Hermione, was derived from Mount Hermon. By others the name Kadmoneites has been extended as equivalent to "the children of the East" (2 Macc. xii. 22), i.e. those living beyond the Euphrates (Ezra, Isr. Greek, 1. 900) [see TENSE], and Babel (2 Macc. xii. 24), and sought to identify them with the Nabataeans of Arabia; but these were Ishmaelites. It was probably applied collectively to various tribes, like the Saracens of the Middle Ages or the Bedouins of modern times (Ritter, Erdkunde, xx. 138). According to Dr. Thomson, the name is still preserved among the Nusairiyeh north of Tripoli, who have a tradition that their ancestors were expelled from Palestine by Joshua, and who seem in physiology and manners to belong to the most ancient inhabitants of the country (Land and Book, i. 242). See CANAANITE.

Kadroma is the name of a Thibetian Jewish divinity. Strangely enough, the Darwinian theory seems to have been entertained at a date considerably anterior to our century, for this goddess the Thibetians claim to have belonged to the ape race, and, after marriage to an ape, to have become the mother of the present population of Thibet. See Vollmer, Wörterb. d. Mythol., p. 990. See KADROMA.

Kaffres (from the Arabic Kafir, infidel, i. e. non-Mohammedan), a people in south-eastern Africa, who received this name from the Moorish navigators of the Indian Ocean. When the Dutch colonists came in contact with the most southern tribe of the Kaffres, the Koea, or Amakosa, the Moorship name was given to them exclusively, and in this restricted sense it is commonly used by the Dutch and English colonists. It is, however, well ascertained that not only the tribes now commonly called Kaffres, but the Tamboockies, Mahaockies, Zulu, Damara, the inhabitants of Delagoa Bay, and the numerous Bechuana tribes who occupy the interior of the continent to an extent as yet unexplored, are but subdivisions of one great family, allied in language, customs, and mode of life. The Kaffre languages (in the wider sense of the word) are divided by Forder into an Eastern, Middle, and Western group. The former comprises 1. the Kaffre languages (in the narrower sense of the word), embracing, besides the Kaffre proper, also the Zulu dialect; 2. the Zambesi languages, embracing the languages of the Barotse, Bayeye, and Mabonae; 3. the languages of Zanizier, or the Kaffres of the Kisuahili, Kikinua, Kiikamba, and the Kihian. The Middle group contains 1. the Bechuana languages (Sesuto, Sero, and Shlapi); 2. the Tekeza languages, embracing the languages of the Manco- roesi, Matapi, and Maslala. The Western group contains 1. the Bunda, Herero, and Londo languages; 2. the languages of Congo, Mongwe, Dikele, Isaba, and Fernando Po. The Kaffre languages are sonorous, flexible, and definite. The southern tribes have adopted the peculiar smacking sounds of the Hottentots, which frequently occur in the language of the Kaffre. The prestige of the Kaffre is feudal—an aristocracy of chiefs, acknowledging the supremacy of the sovereign, but, except on occasional occasions, acting independently of him. The general chief is the sovereign of the nation, and in a council of chiefs is very powerful, and is looked upon by all the nobles and people with unbounded respect. The kraals (hamlets) generally consist of a dozen low, conical huts, the diameter of which is no more than about ten feet, into which one has to creep through a low opening, closed during the night by a heavy stone, or the middle of the huts is roosted for the cattle. Wars generally arise out of the stealing of cattle. In personal appearance the Kaffres are a remarkably fine race of men. They are of dark brown color, have a beautiful and vigorous constitution, dark woolly hair, a lofty front, and bent nose. Like many other savage tribes they practice the worship of their ancestors, "They sacrifice and pray to their deceased relatives. Although it would be asserting too much to say absolutely that they believe in the existence and the immortality of the soul. In fact, their belief seems to go no further than this, that the ghosts of the dead haunt for a certain time their previous dwelling-places, and either assist or plague the living. No special powers are attributed to them, and it would be a misnomer to call them deities" [comp. Lubbock, Prehistoric Conditions of Men, N. Y. 1871, 500, ch. iv sq]. They practice circumcision, but only as a custom, not as a religious rite. Polygamy is allowed, and as the heavy work is chiefly performed by the women, it has proved a great obstacle to the introduction of Christianity. The various tribes of the Kaffre family are estimated by Dr. J. Freeman, secretary of the London Missionary Society, at 2,000,000, spread from the eastern frontier of Cape Colony beyond Delagoa Bay, and then across the whole continent, without break, to the Atlantic in latitude 20°. A part of the territory of the Kaffres, however, in particular, constant raids were made into English territory, was annexed to the British do missions under the name of Queen Adelaide province. It was subsequently restored to the chief of the Kaffres: in 1847 it again became an English province, under the name of British Kaffraria, and King William's Town, on the Buffalo River, was made the capital and the military head-quarters. The capital has a population of 3,000, and a radius of influence of 50 miles. The population of the town consists chiefly of English and German settlers, while the country people are Kaffres. In 1857 the province numbered 1842 kraals, and had a population of 106,721, but a terrible famine, which was caused by a false prophet of the name of Umhlanga, reduced it in 1859 to 2,196 kraals, and a population of 62,899. In 1890 the province embraced about 1000 sq. miles, and a population of 122,159. The British influence more and more extends over Kaffraria proper, which is situated between British Kaffraria and Natal, and embraces about 1000 sq. miles and 840,000 inhabitants. North Natal and the Transvaal republic extends the land of other Kaffr tribes, the territory of which is estimated at 62,950 square miles, with a population of about 440,000. Cape Colony, according to the census of 1875, had a Kaffre population of 165,678.

As the Dutch government of Cape Colony was hostile to all Christian missions, the missions among the Kaffres did not begin until the government had passed under British rule. The Moravians, who then for the first time found the necessary protection for their re-education work among the Hottentots and Kaffres, in 1818 their labors also to the Kaffres, in particular to the tribes of the Fongus and Tambakia, whence in 1862 a station was established among the last name tribe of Independent Kaffraria. The missionary Von der Kemp, who in 1796 was sent out by the London Missionary Society, laid the foundation of the missions of this society among the Kaffres. The Wesleyan missionaries have since (1820) numerous stations in all parts of the Kaffre territory. Their missionaries have for a long time been almost the only ones who ventured to penetrate into the uncultivated districts of the free Kaffres. The Free Church and the United Presbyterians of Scotland have a number of stations in British Kaffraria, and have begun to extend their labors to (independent) Kaffraria, among the natives whom the British government has induced to settle there. The Berlin missions have also, since 1834, established a number of stations in British Kaffraria. The Anglican Church, which has bishops at Cape town (1847), Grahamstown (1850), and in the Orange Free State (1863), has stations both in British and in Free Kaffraria, and is eagerly proposed extending its labors to the former Church had done nothing for the Kaffres until the establishment of a special missionary board in 1863 (Syndalec Zemendi Comisii in Zuyd Africa), which displays a great zeal in the establishment of missions among the pagan population. More recently the German Baptists have sent out missionaries to British Kaffraria. The Roman Catholic Church has also a few stations in British Kaffraria. Kagbossuam is the name of a crow which the Hindus assert embodies the soul of one of their celebrated sages; some of them say even of Brahmas himself. See Voilner, Wörterb. d. Mythol. p. 991.

Kahambincins, the Persian name for the period in which these are set. It was created, and was cosmogony, as in that of the Christian dispensation, covers six days; but, like some of our theologians, they say that each day of creation corresponds in length to a period of one month. See Zoroastrianism.

Kahler, Johannes, a Lutheran theologian of some note, was born at Wolmar, Hansa Casel, Jan. 20, 1649, and was educated at the University of Gisseng. He began his lectures at that university in 1673 on the Cartesian philosophy, and became one of its ablest exponents. In 1677 he was called as extraordinary professor of metaphysics to Rinteln, and shortly after was promoted to the full or ordinary professorship. In 1688 he published his chief work in philosophy, and became also, in 1692, rector of the university. It is the latter treatise that has been the subject of this paper. It was the first and only one of its kind, and was printed in two volumes. See Alpen, Hist. Lex. vol. iii, s. v.; Jöcher, Gelehrten Lexicon, vol. ii, s. v., gives a complete list of Kahler's productions.

Kajumorata, the Persian name for the first man, who they say was a direct descendant of a bull (Abbad), and was both man and wife at the same time. So sacred was his person that even angels worshipped him. Ahriman, however, was bent upon his destruction, and for thirty years he persecuted Kajomurata, until successful in slaying him. But the seed of Kajomurata fructified the earth, the earth purified it, and after forty years a plant sprang up, which became a mighty tree, bearing, instead of fruit, ten human pairs, one of which, Mehsia and Mesihame, became the ancestors of the human race (see Vollmer, Wörterb. d. Mythol. p. 992). See ORMUZ; ZORASTRIANISM.

Kalnaas is the name of the third Buddha who preceded Gotama (q. v.), and, according to Major Forbes's (Journ. Asiatic Society, June, 1836) calculation of Hindu chronology, must have lived on the earth B.C. 3101 (see Hardy, Manual of Buddhism, p. 87, 96, et al.).

Kalderon (more accurately Calederon), the most celebrated poet of Spain, born of a noble family at Madrid Jan. 1, 1601, was educated at the University of Salamanca, but at length went into the army, and fought in Milan and Flanders, until in 1651 he entered the priesthood. Already, as a soldier, he had devoted much time to the cultivation of his poetical talents; now, as a priest, he devoted all his time to it, and his influence on the religious poetry of Spain, for his relation to the history of Roman Catholic poetry, that we make room for a short sketch of this religious (Roman Catholic) Shakespeare. Shortly after his admission to the priesthood he took a chaplaincy at Toledo, but the king, with whom Kalderon was in special favor, soon gained the poet for his court by assigning Kalderon a lucrative position in the royal chapel. He died about 1681, perhaps somewhat later. He wrote no less than five hundred dramas, many of which have a religious tendency, and display most accurately the religious and moral character of his time and people. Those of his productions which have been preserved are divided into three different groups. The first contains his comedies of familiar life; the second, the heroic; and the third embraces his religious works, or Sacred Letters or Treatises (sesiones Sacramentales), and these only concern us here. They are compositions which bear a strong resemblance to the miracle-plays of the Middle Ages, and are, like them, deformed by fantastic extravagances of religious opinion and feeling. Some of them, however, are beautifully poetical. One of the most characteristic, held also by some critics to be the best, is "The Devotion of the Cross," a strange farrago of the wildest supernatural inventions, and the most impractically-erected exhibitions of human conduct, but breathing a poetic spirit which is wonderfully impressive. One of its main incidents is the legend of one dead man shriving another, which had been used by another poet. Another successful effort of his is "The steadfast Prince." Both of these have frequently been translated into English and other languages. See, however, Ticknor, History of Egypt, on the body edited by the late H. T. Inman.

One of the ablest Roman Catholic critics, professor Frederick Schlegel, thus speaks of Kaldan's position as a Christian poet: "The Christianity of this poet, however, does not consist so much in the external circumstances which he has selected, as in his peculiar feeling, and the method of treating his subject, which is most common with him. Even where his materials furnish him with no opportunity of drawing the perfect development of a new life out of death and suffering, yet everything is conceived in the spirit of this Christian love and purification, everything seen in its light, and clothed in the splendor of its heavenly coloring. In every situation and circumstance, Kaldan is, of all dramatic poets, the most Christian, and for that very reason the most romantic." (History of Literature, p. 280, 281.) Jahrhunderts (Berlin: Schmidt, Schauspielerei der Bühne; Schmid, Schauspielerei der Bühne; Schmid, Schauspielerei der Bühne; Schmid, Schauspielerei der Bühne;).

Kaldan, Georg, a celebrated Hungarian Jesuit, was born at Tyrnav (Hungary) in 1570. After filling various positions in the Jesuitical order, preaching at Vienna, and teaching theology at Olmutz, he became at last rector of the college, and, at Pressburg, taught philosophy until his death in 1634. He was the first Roman Catholic to furnish his co-religionists a Hungarian translation of the Bible. It was published at Vienna in 1622, folio (the Protestant translation, by Visoli, was made in 1689). A portion of Kaldan's sermons were published at Pressburg in 1631.

Kali (or Kali) is the name of one of the many forms of Durga, so popularly and variously worshiped in Hindustan.

Names and History.—Doorgi is the female principle in the production of the world who appears throughout the Hindu Shastras as Prakriti or Bhagavati. She is said to have had a thousand names, and to have appeared in a vast number of forms in different periods: thus, as Sati, she first became the wife of Siva, but renounced her life on hearing her father reproach her husband. She again appeared as "the mountain-born goddess" under the name of Parvati, and again married Siva. After her marriage with Siva, Soma, Ganesh, and Kali, she became renowned for her achievements in war against the giant enemies of the gods. This goddess assumed the name of Kali on the occasion of a battle with a thousand-headed giant demigod whom she slew. In her excessive delight over her victory, she danced till she shook the foundation of the earth, and the gods were compelled to induce her husband Siva to influence her to stop, which, however, he found no means of doing till he resorted to the expedient of throwing himself among the bodies of the slain. Kali, observing herself dancing on the body of her husband, was shocked, and, protruding her tongue in her surprise, stood still. In this attitude she is represented in the images of her now made, and sold, and worshiped throughout Bengal.

Images.—In allusion to the above contest with the giant, Kali is often represented as "a ten-armed goddess." Her image in this aspect is that of a yellow woman with ten arms, richly dressed and ornamented, standing erect, resting her left foot on the back of a prostrate buffalo, and her right on that of a couchant lion, holding in her hands a spear, an axe, a discus, a trident, a club, an arrow, and a shield.

Her most common image, however, is that of a black or very dark blue-colored woman with four arms; the upper left arm holding a cimeter, the lower left a human head by the hair. The other right arm is held up to indicate either that she is bestowing a blessing or the restoration of nature from the devastation which she has caused, and to which her lower right hand is pointing. All her hands are bloody. In this form she is standing on the body of a buffalo, which is white, and stretched ed at full length upon his back. Around her waist, as a covering, she wears a string of bloody human hands. She wears an immense necklace, reaching below her knees, which is composed of human skulls. In some images a pair of dead human bodies hang by the hair from her earring. Her tongue, which is above set forth, protrudes from her mouth upon her chin.

She appears, moreover, under other forms: sitting on a dead body, with two giants' heads in her arms; as a black female sitting on a throne, etc.

Character.—Kali, in Hindu mythology, is nothing more nor less than a female Durga. She is a very sanguinary goddess; her eyebrows are bloody, and blood flows in a stream down her breast. Her eyes are red, like those of a drunkard.

Sacredness.—Mr. Ward makes a summary from one of the Puranas. He says: "The Puranas represent the effect that a tiger's blood offered to her in sacrifice will please her for a hundred years: that of a lion, a redeer, or a man, a thousand years; and that of three men for ten hundred thousand years. In the event of a human person being offered in sacrifice, it must be performed in a cemetery, or at a temple, or in a mountain. The person of a good appearance should be offered. The victim should be adorned with chaplets and besmeared with sandal-wood, after various ablutions. The deformed, timid, leprous, or crippled must not be offered; nor must a priest, nor a childless brother. The victim must be prepared the day before the offering, his neck being besmeared with blood from the axe with which he is to be sacrificed. Besides this, however, persons may draw blood from their own bodies, or cut off their flesh, to be presented to this goddess as a burnt-offering, or burn the body by the flame of a lamp.

Worshippers.—Many Hindus adopt the ten-armed Doorgi as their guardian deity, and she is considered as the image of the divine energy. Her worship in Lower Bengal is so popular that on the occasion of a great annual festival all business is suspended, and even the European courts, custom-house, and other public offices are closed.

The professional robbers and murderers so long known and dreaded throughout India, and notorious elsewhere as Thugs, are the special devotees of the four-armed Kali. In the case of great crimes in Kalki, they consecrate to her their instruments of death, and their victims are held to be immolated in her honor. These men will join travellers, and accompany them for days, gaining their confidence if possible, under some disguise, until, watching their opportunity, they can administer drugs, or choke them with a small cord, and then rob them of all they possess. Formerly, it is supposed, the goddess rendered them much more assistance than of late, by putting out of the way the corpses of those slain; but, in consequence of one of their number looking behind him after a murder, she ceased to render them so certainly this assistance, as this was a violation of the express condition on which she kept secret all traces of their deeds. The accounts of the occasion of their losing her assistance in this particular are conflicting, and so very worthy of reproduction, that anyone wishing to trace the matter may refer to Illustrations of the History and Practice of the Thugs (London, 1837). See THUGS.

Ceremonies.—Distinct from the great festival alluded to above in honor of Doorgi as the "ten-armed goddess" is a famous and popular festal celebration held under the special form of Kali. It is observed with much the same form as the other. Annual sacrifices of sweetmeats, sugar, garments, rice, plantains, and peace are of-feed in great abundance. The first day ends with singing, dancing, and feasting, and with the lower classes in great debauchery and shameless licentiousness, the crust, an intoxicating liquor, being consecrated to the idol goddess. On the second morning images of all sizes representative of the goddess are made, and, after consecration by the Brahmins, are carried through the streets in procession to the Hooghly River, and there, carried out in boats, are thrown into it, and with this act terminate these wild and terrible orgies. Immense sums are expended by many of these devotees during these festivals. Mr. Ward estimates as much as £9,000 sterling is expended annually at the single shrine in Calcutta, and narrates cases of individual offerings, at one time, of £10,000, comprising rich beds, silver plate, and food for the entertainment of a thousand persons.

Temples.—There are many buildings devoted to her worship. The greatest and most popular of these is that of Kali-Ghat, about three miles to the south of Calcutta. There are fifty other edifices in various parts of India devoted to Doorga under her variety of forms and names. All of these are said to have originated in an incident connected with her historical previous to her having assumed the shape of Parwati, when Vishnu severed her body into fifty-one separate pieces, which were strewn over the earth, and conferred a peculiar sanctity on the places where they happened to fall. All of these become shrines, the site of each being determined by lot; one of her thousand forms was set up. The whole of the country to the south of Calcutta, including the spot known as Kali-Ghat, was thus rendered sacred, the toes of the right foot being deposited at the latter place. The temple at Kali-Ghat consists of one room, with a large pavement around it. The image of Kali is in this temple (Ward, ii, 157).

There is, perhaps, no fabled impersonality in all the Hindu mythology exerting a greater or more gloomy influence over millions of men than Doorga under the title of Kali.

Kaliph (more generally Caliph), originally a deputy or lieutenant, but afterwards applied chiefly to the successors of Mohammed. As a representative of the prophet and Islam, the caliph exercised a power which was primarily spiritual, and in theory, therefore, he claimed the obedience of all Mohammedans. In practice the claim was soon disregarded, and the Fatimite caliphs of Africa and the sovereigns of the Ommaid dynasty of Spain each professed to be the only legitimate representatives of Mohammedan, in opposition to the Abbaside caliphs of Bagdad. The latter caliphate reached its highest splendor under Haroun al-Raschid, in the 9th century; but his division of the empire among his sons showed how completely the caliph had lost sight of the spiritual theory of his office. For the last two hundred years the appellation of caliph has been swallowed up in shah, sultan, emir, and other titles peculiar to the East. See Brande and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art, i, 350.

Kalir, Eleazar Ha-, one of the oldest Jewish poets of Italy, generally regarded as the founder of the synagogal poetry of the Sephardite Jews in Europe. He is the author of the beginning of the Bible of Venice. Of his personal history nothing further is known. He wrote some one hundred and fifty different sacred poems, many of which were inserted in the liturgies of the Babylonian, Italian, German, and French Jews. He was a disciple of Jannai, and was greatly admired by his contemporaries. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, v, 181 sq.; Sachs, Religiöse Poesie d. Juden in Spanien, p. 180 sq.; Zunz, Synagogale Poesie d. Middelalters, p. 128 sq. See also LITURGY, JEWISH; MACHSOR; SYNAGOGAL POETRY.

Kalyyuga, or the Kali Age, is the fourth or last age of the Maha, or Great, Vedas, (see VEDAS), and bears some resemblance to the Iron Age of classical mythology. The Hindus, recognizing, like all religiousmen of antiquity, that man by sin has fallen from his high estate, have divided the world's existence into four periods, which are marked by successive physical and intellectual decrements and degenerations. They hold that the present period is the last one, that it consists of 432,000 solar sidereal years, and that the Kali Age began B.C. 3102. "In the Krita (or first) age," Manu says, "the (genius of) Truth and Right (in the form of a bull) stands firm on his four feet, nor does any advantage accrue to man from iniquity. But in the following ages, by reason of unjust gains, he is deprived successively of one foot; and even just emoluments, through the prevalence of theft, falsehood, and fraud, are gradually diminished by one foot, (i.e. by a fourth part)." The estimate in which the Kaliyauga, our present age, is held by the modern Hindus may be gathered from one of their most celebrated Purânas, the Padma-Purâna. In the last chapter of one of the books (Kriyâyogasâra) of this Purâna, the following account, which we take from Webster (v. 11), is narrated:

"In the Kaliyuga (the genius of) Right will have but one foot; every one will delight in evil. The four castes will be devoted to wickedness, and deprived of the nourishment which is fit for them. The Brahmins will neglect the Vedas, hanker after presents, be lustful and cruel. They will despise the Scriptures, gamble, steal, and desire intercourse with widows. . . . For the sake of a livelihood, some Brahmins will become arrant rogues. . . . The Śudras will endeavor to lead the life of the Brahmans, and, out of friendship, people will bear false witness . . . they will injure the wives of others, and their speech will be that of falsehood. Greedy of the wealth of others, they will entertain a guest according to the behest of the Scriptures, but afterwards kill him out of covetousness; they are indeed worthy of hell. The twice-born (i.e. the first three castes) will live up to the duties of each, and even their daughters. In this Yuga men will be under the sway of women, and women will be excessively fickle. . . . In the Kaliyuga the earth will bear but little corn; the clouds will shed but little rain, and that, too, only in one spot. The cows will be consumed before they are born, and give little milk, and the milk will yield no butter; there is no doubt of that. . . . Trees, even, will wither in twelve years, and the age of mankind will not exceed sixteen years; people, moreover, will become gray-haired in their youth; women will bear children in their fifth or sixth year, and men will become troubled with a great number of children. In the Kaliyuga the foreigners will become kings, bent upon evil; and those living in foreign countries will be all of one caste, and out of lust take to themselves many wives. In the first twilight of the Kaliyuga, men will slay each other, and in the middle of it no one will even mention his name." There is a remarkable identity of the Hindu belief with that of the Hebrew as to redemption from this sinful state by a Messiah. See Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, i, 303 sq., 329 sq.; Weber, Indische Studien, i, 411; Wilson, Asiatic Researches, x, 27 sq.; Alger, History of the Doctrine of a Future Life, p. 111 sq.

Kalmucks (Tatar Kalmik, i.e. apostates), also called Olik or Ekaton, a Mongolian tribe of nomads, a portion of whom live under Chinese rule, while the greater number, during the last two centuries, have settled in or belong to Russia. They are similar to the Mongols proper, but inferior to them in point of civilization. They are divided into tribes (Uluses), at the head of which are Tschails; and the tribes are subdivided into Aïnaks (of which there are families of each), and at the head of which are the Saisians. They call themselves Derben Eret (Dörbin-Girat), i.e. the four allies, because, from time immemorial, they have been divided into four chief tribes: 1. The Dzogars, after whom Dongariya is called, formerly the most powerful of the tribes, but subsequently subdued by the Chineze, and now existent only in small number. 2. The Koshotes (i.e. warriors), under princes from the family of Jenghiz Khan, numbering from 50,000 to 60,000; they voluntarily placed themselves under the sceptre of Russia, and are loyal subjects; their first name is Tchoum, (fermented horse milk). 3. The Derbets, living in the 16th and 17th centuries, on the Volga and Ural, now on the Don and the II. 4. The Torgota (Törga-Uten), or Kalmucks of the Volga, have, for the most part, left Russian territory; only the tribe Zoonoro, under the prince Dundukor, with the remainder of the people, remains. Dundukor himself was baptized, and, by order of Alexander I, the title passed over to his son-in-law Nor- Kasov. Some of the Kalmucks live scattered in the government of Simbirsk (15,000 souls, all in connection with the Greek Church), others east of the Ural, on the Jeth River (professing Islamism), and in the commercial towns of Russia, altogether about 120,000 souls, of whom 73 per cent. live in the government of Astrachan. The majority of the Kalmucks are still Buddhists. They were all originally adherents of that form of Buddhism known as Lamaism, which the Mongols in general received from Tibet. In Donugor they have two celebrated temples; the one is situated on the Tekes, the other on the II. In the latter resides the Tchamba Lama in the winter, and with him a number of priests, who here teach reading and writing. They are joined by pious pilgrims and merchants, who set up their shops round the temple. The chiefs of the Chinese Kalmucks used to receive from the mandarin the insignia of their rank, but of late the virtual independence of Donugor has severed the former relations to the Chinese government, and, after the occupation of Kutchu by the Russians in May, 1871, the Chinese Kalmucks generally declared their submission to the Russian government. The language of the Kalmucks is a branch of the Mongolian language; grammars of the language have been published by Bobrovnikov (Kasan, 1848) and Zweick (Don- auschekingen, 1857). The literature consists almost exclusively of translations of Buddhist writings from India. A collection of legends (Siddhi-Kür), with German translation, was published by Julig (Leipzig, 1860).

KALONYMUS BEN-KALONYMUS, a Jewish writer of some note, was born in Italy in 1297, but lived for some time in Southern France, and was there picked up by king Robert of Naples. He returned with the latter to his native land, and filled some important offices in his service. Kalonymus was an accomplished scholar, translated into Hebrew medical, astronomical, and philosophical works of the Arabs, wrote a number of scientific treatises on the low moral state of his contemporaries, and labored in this and other ways to ameliorate the miserable condition of his countrymen. He died about 1387. The best of his later works is יִּהְיָה יִבְנֵי, or The Stone of Weeping (Naples, 1489; translated into Jewish German, Frkft. 1746). He also edited with great ability a part of the Arabic Encyclopaedia of the Sciences (known as "Treatises of the Honest Brethren") for the use of the Italian Jews. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 305 sq.; Zunz, in Geiger's Zeitschrift, ii, 813; iv, 200 sq.; Flügel, Zeitschrift d. deutsch. Morgenländ. Gesellschaft, 1862.

KALONTOCOCRACY is a new word sometimes used instead of hierarchy. The word is derived from the French onctuol (cap, such as the Roman Catholic clergy wear), and the Greek sąpiræ (to govern).

Kalpa designates in Hindu chronology the Brah- mínical period of one day and night, and corresponds to a period of 4,292,800,000,000,000,000 years, or years of man, marking the duration of the world, and, ac- cording to many, including even the interval of its anni- hilation. The Bhāratiyā-Purāṇa admits of an infinity of kalpas; other Purāṇas enumerate thirty. A great kalpa comprises not a day, but a life of Brahmis. In Vedic literature, kalpa is a Vedânga (q.v.). See Hardy, Manual of Buddhism, p. 1 sq., 7 sq. See KALPA-SÜTRA.

Kalpa-Sútra is, in Vedic literature, the name of those Sanscrit works which treat of the ceremonies usual at a Vedic sacrifice. See VEDA. In Jaina literature it is the name of the most sacred religious work of the Jains (q. v.). It chiefly relates the historical history of the Jains, the last of their twenty-four great eras, the Jain saints, or Tirthankaras, but contains also an account of four other saints of the same class. The author of the work was Bhadrabahu, and it was composed, Stevenson assumes, in the year A.D. 411. It is held in high respect by the Jains, who, on the eighth day of the middle of the rains, they devote to the reading of their most sacred writings, allot no less than five to the Kalpa- Sûtra. See Stevenson, The Kalpa-Sûtra and Nara Tattva (London, 1848).

Kalteisen, Heinrich, a celebrated Dominican of the 15th century, was born near Coburgo, and educated at Vienne. In the latter city, he was afterwards professor of theology, preaching at the same time. Later he removed to Mentz, and became general inquisitor of Germany. He was present at the Council of Basle, and took quite a prominent part in the deliberations against the Hussites. He was one of the four doctors on the Roman Catholic side who disputed with the Bohemians. See Hussites; BÂBLE, COUNCIL OF. In 1448 pope Eugenius IV made him Magister sacri Pa- latii, and in 1452 pope Nicholas V created him arch- bishop of Droutheim. He died in 1465. Kalteisen's literary productions are generally spoken of as bad in state. He wrote much, but little has been published. See Basnage-Cansius, Lact. Antiqu. ii, 628 sq.; Quetif and Echard, Script. Ord. Pred. ii, 828; Schröckh, Kirchen- gesch. xxxiv, 707; Wetzer u. Weite, Kirchen-Lex. vi, 15.

Kama, the Hindu deity of love or deity of Love, one of the most pleasing creations of Hindu fiction, is, in the Sanscrit poetry of later periods, the favorite theme of de- scriptions and allusions. The genealogy of this deity is quite obscure; according to some Purânas, he was originally a son of Brahmi; according to others, a son of Dharma (the genius of Virtue), by Smûdhá (the ge- nius of Faith), herself a daughter of Daksha, who was one of the mid-born sons of Brahmi. The god Siva, being on one occasion greatly incensed at Kama, re- duced him to ashes; but ultimately, moved by the af- fliction of Rati (Voluptuousness), the wife of Kama, he promised her that her promised son should be the son of Krishna, and he was accordingly born under the name of Pradýumna, who was the god of Love. "But when the infant was six days old it was stolen from the lying-in-chamber by the terrible demon Sambhara; for the latter foreknew that Prádyumna, if he lived, would be the death of Siva. The boy was drowned in the ocean, and swallowed by a large fish. Yet he did not die, for that fish was caught by fishermen, and delivered to Mayavati, the mistress of Sambhara's household; and, when it was cut open, the child was taken from it. While Mayavati wondered what this could be, the di- vine sage Narada satisfied her curiosity, and counselled her to rear tenderly this offspring of Krishna. She acted as he advised her; and when Pradyumna grew up, and learned his own history, he fought the son of Kanbara. Mayavati, however, was later apprized by Krishna that she was not the wife of Sambara, as she had fancied herself to be, but that of Pradyumna—in fact, another form of flati, who was the wife of Kama in his female aspect. Mayavati was unable to find him holding in one hand a bow made of sugar-cane, and using it, in the other an arrow tipped with the blossom of a flower which is supposed to conquer one of the senses. His standard is, agreeably to the legend above mentioned, a fabulous fish, called Makara, a watersnake, or serpent—the symbol of voluptuousness. His epithets are numerous, but easily accounted for from the circumstances named, and from the effects of love on the mind and senses. Thus he is called Makaradwaja, 'the one who has Makara in his banner;' Maana, 'the madam,' etc. His wife, as before stated, is Rati; she is also called Kamakshi, 'a portion of Kama,' or Prati, 'affection.' His daughter is Tribsa, 'thirst or desire,' and his son is Aniruddha, 'the irresistible.'" See Müller, Chip., vol. ii, ch. i, p. 127-135; Volney, Mythol. Worterbuch, p. 143.

Kamawachara, the Buddhist name of one of the three divisions of the Sakwala (q.v.), and refers to the worlds in which there is form, with sensual enjoyment. The Buddhist affirms that there are innumerable worlds, but only three kinds of them, viz. (1) worlds in which there is no perceptible form; (2) worlds in which there is form, but no sensual enjoyment; (3) and lastly, the Kamawachara explained above. See Hardy, Laws of Buddhism, p. 3 sq.

Kami (or Happy Spiritus) is the name given in Japanese mythology to certain spirits or divinities who founded the first terrestrial courts. All primitive mythologies are coupled with and made to rise out of cosmogony. Unfortunately, however, the cosmogony of the Japanese is not only of the wildest sort, but so mixed with that of the Chinese that it is very difficult to speak with any certainty of this ancient religion. From primordial chaos, say the Japanese, there sprang a self-created man, who fixed his abode in the highest heaven, and could not have his tranquillity disturbed by any cares. Next arose two plastic, creative gods, who framed the universes out of chaos. The universe was then governed for myriads of years by seven gods in succession. They are called the Celestial Gods. The most important of these, the greatest of all, and to him the earth we inhabit owes its existence. In what may be called the Genesis of the Japanese Bible the creation of the world is thus narrated:

"In the beginning there was neither heaven nor earth. The sea was vast; things both liquid and doubtful arose, similar to the contents of an undeveloped egg, in which the white and the yellow are still mingled together. Out of the infinite space which this chaos filled a god arose, called the divine Supreme Being, whose throne is in the utmost heaven. Then came Chaos. Then came Wisdom, exalted above the creation; finally, the terrestrial reason, who is the sublime spirit. Each one of these three primitive gods had his own existence, but they were not yet revealed beyond their spiritual natures. Then, by degree, the work of separation went on in chaos. The sea divided into oceans, the earth into different districts, flooded the heavens. The greater atoms, attaching themselves to each other, and adhering, produced the earth. The former, moving in rapid spaces which they have filled the firmament which arches above our heads; the latter, being elated by this new seat of life, rose up and formed the earth until a much later period. When the earthly matter still floated as a fish that comes to the surface of the water, the image of the most famous statues on a limpid lake, there appeared between the heavens and the earth something similar to a piece of Reid, endowed with movement, and capable of transformation. It was changed into three gods, which are: the August one, reigning perpetually over the empire; he who reigns by virtue of water; and he who reigns by virtue of fire.

much resembling the native dwelling-house. Three sides are closed, and one is open to sun and air. The woodwork is kept scrupulously clean, and the floor is covered with the finest matting. The altar, which stands alone in the centre, is ornamented with a plain cloth of white or green, bordered with one of red, or a symmetrical or symmetrical design, which is not yet clearly understood. The altar is surrounded by the elements of water and fire. The interior is generally hung with pictures, or with pictures of colored paper, the exact significance of which is not yet clearly understood. The bells are also ornamented with their pious votaries with colored lanterns, vases of perfume, and of flowers or evergreen branches, which are renewed as fast as they wither.

At the top of the altar is a heavy chest with a metal grating, through which fall the pieces of money contributed: it is hardly necessary to say that the priest carries a key to the box. These bells were originally commemorative chapels, erected in honor of Japanese heroes, like that of Tell by the lake of the Four Forest Cantons. The prince of the province which had given birth to the hero, or where his deeds had been performed, took upon himself the charge of keeping the chapel in repair; there was no priest to officiate at the altar of the kamis; no privileged caste interposed between the worshipper and the spirit. The kisseki, in fact, performed before the mirror (representing that bequeathed by the goddess Izanami to her children), passed beyond the guardian spirit of the chapel, and reached the supreme god above him. The chapel, therefore, was open to all; the worship was voluntary, and offered to the individual might choose, no ceremonial being proscribed. With the introduction of Buddhism, however, an important change took place. The new faith was sufficiently incorporated with the old to transfer the chapels to the special charge of the priests [called Kami-nabi, or 'ministers of the spirit'], and to introduce a rule of conduct, formless worship of the people, a system of processions, litanies, offerings, and even of miracle-working images. Indeed, almost the only difference between this system and the worship of the saints in Catholic countries lies in the circumstance that the priests who officiate only put on their surplice for the occasion, and become secular again when they leave the chapel" (Bayard Taylor's Japan, p. 255 sq., in the excellent collection of Scribner's Library of Wonders, Travels, etc., N.Y., 1872, 12mo). Kampaxton, ISAAC BEN-JACOB, a Jewish rabbi of some note, was born in Castile in 1560. Of his personal history but little is known. He was gaon of Castile, and is particularly noted for his contributions to Talmudic literature, and his influence, through his pupils, on Jewish literature of the 16th century in the Spanish peninsula. He died at Pamplona in 1623. One of his most important works is הירש וראוי (Ways of the Talmud, first published at Mantua in 1596), an introduction to the study of the Talmud (really a methodology). See Grätz, Gesch. d. Jud., viii, 152; Jast, Gesch. d. Jud. in Judenthum, i1, 87; Forst, Biblioth. Jud. i, 140. (J. H. W.)

Kamchatska, a peninsula in the extreme northeast of Asia, occupied by the Russians from 1696 to 1700, extends between the seas of Kamchatka and Ochotak, from latitude 51° to 61° N., and contains 20,800 square miles, and about 4,500 inhabitants, one third of whom are Russians. The former principal place, Nishnei Kamchatka, on the mouth of the Kamchatka River, has hardly 200 inhabitants. Petropavlovsk, the present capital, is the seat of a Russo-American trading company, and has a population of about 1000. Until 1856 Kamtchatka was a separate district; at present it constitutes the district Petropavlovsk, of the coast district of Kamtchatka. The Schwedens reside, besides Kamchatka, also a part of the Kurile Islands. They belong to the Mongolian race, are small, have thick heads, and, flat, broad faces, and small eyes, which are frequently inflamed by the snow. Though baptized, the Kamchatdales are still addicted to Shamanism (q.v.), and, in particular, practice sorcery. They are fond of hunting and fishing, good-natured, and hospitable. (A. J. S.)

Kana (Heb. עמה), the name of one of the later cabalistic works treating of the religious rites of the Jews, has attained considerable notoriety on account of its decided opposition not only to all the Jewish ritual, to Talmudical interpretation, and to the Talmud itself, but for its fierce attacks, even against Biblical Judaism. Its authorship is undetermined, but of late some Jewish critics lean to the opinion that Kana and another cabalistic work entitled Pelus (Pillar, published at Kores in 1784, and often, an interpretation of the first book of the Law (Genesis), were written by one and the same person, and belong to a Spanish Jewish heretic of the 18th century, or thereabouts. Joseph ibn Marzua, ibid., p. xxxix sq.) thinks both the products of an Italian or Greek Jew. See, for further details, Ginz, Gesch. d. Jud., viii, 238 sq., 458 sq. See also CABALLA. (J. H. W.)

Kana'ah (Heb. קנהא', surely, reedy), Sept. Cofeiv v. r. כנהא, the name of two places in Palestine.

1. A stream (בנה, torrent or wady, q. d. "the brook of reeds," as in the marg.) that formed the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh, from the Mediterranean eastward to the vicinity of Tappuah (Josh. xvi, 8); lying properly within the territory of Manasseh, although the towns on its southern bank were assigned to the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. xvii, 9; see Keil, Comment, ad loc. prior.). See T Phụ. Schwarz says it is to be still found in the equivalent Arabic name Wady al-Kasnah (valley of reeds), that rises in a spring of the same name, Ain al-Kasnah, one mile west of Shechem, and, after flowing westward, acquiring a considerable breadth, and irrigating fields on its way, finally falls into the Mediterranean south of Caesarea (Palestine, p. 61). Other travellers, however, do not speak of such a stream unless it be the Nahar el-Reed (river of reeds) spoken of in the Life of St. Stephen, Lond. 1871, 2 vols. 8vo, vol. ii (see Index).

2. A town in the northern part of Asher, not very Doubless his papers would have afforded a clear view of the state of his soul, but, according to his friends, towards the close of his life he destroyed all documents relating to this subject. He died Dec. 17, 1824. His other religious works are: Sammlung wahrer und erz- zekicher Geschichten aus dem Reiche Christi und für dasselbe (1815-17, 2 vols.; 1822, 2 vols.).— Leben, und aus dem Leben marktwürdiger und erzwecker Christen (1816- 17, 2 vols.; 1820-27, 2 vols.). Von Rommen aus der Christenzeit aller Zeiten (1817)— Christus im A.T., or Untersuchungen über die Vorbilder und messianischen Stellen (1818, 2 vols. 8vo)— Biblische Untersuchungen oder Ausleungen mit und ohne Polemik (1819-20, 2 vols. 8vo). He edited also the following: Ausserreimische christliche Lieder [Erlang. 1818]— Weiswungen u. Verheissungen der Kirche Christi auf die letzten Zeiten der Heiden.— Katholische Rede-Encyklop., v. 1036.

Kanôn is one of the names by which the official list or register of the Church is known. It is also frequently spoken of as κατάλογος ἰστορικός, list of the priesthood, and hence spiritual persons were denominat- ed κατάλογος, canon, canonized, and οὗτος κανών, men of the canon, because their names were entered in the list. The word κανών had also other significations. The asent of the catechumens to a summary of the reading articles of the Canon was thus required, and this creed was variously designated; sometimes κανών, the rule, sometimes πίστις, the faith, and σύμβολον, a badge or token (see Riddle, Christian Antiquities, s. v.). See Canon.

Kanzel, in Hindu mythology, is the name of a king of the race of Bhoja—considered also a daon (Kála- nemí) in human shape, and notorious for the audacity and violence towards the god Krishna [see Visnu], by whom he was ultimately slain.

Kant, Immanuel, designated by De Maistre "the philosopher of nebulous memory," acquired enduring renown as the author of the Critical Philosophy, as the father of the recent German or transcendental speculation, and as the most acute and profound metaphysician of the closing 18th century. The importance of his philosophical career is evinced by his furnishing the link of connection between the schools of Leibnitz, Locke, Berkeley, and Hume, and those of Hegel, Schel- ling, and Comte. He closes one great and brilliant era of metaphysical inquiry; he commences another with singular fulness of knowledge, breadth of comprehension, perspicacity of discernment, and logical subtlety and precision. He exposed invertebrate errors of procedure; he improved, sharpened, and refined the methods of investigation he surveyed and plotted the boundaries of metaphysical research; and he rendered more distinct and precise the nature of the inquiry, the sub- ject with which it is concerned, and the instruments at our command for its investigation. These are inestimable services, the benefits of which are still in the midst of the errors that have sprung from the system by which they were rendered.
KANT

Kant was born at Königsberg April 22, 1724, and spent his whole life there or in its immediate neighborhood, never having journeyed more than forty miles from his native place. He ended his tranquil life in the city of his birth, February 12, 1804. He was of Scotch origin. His father, John George Cant, removed from Frankfurt in 1710 to Königsberg, where his first settled, to Königsberg, and followed the saddler's trade with little worldly success. His pinched fortunes were enabled by stern and unostentatious integrity. All accounts commemorate the high character, intelligence, and austere piety of Anna Regina Reuter, the philosopher's mother—virtues effectively inculcated by her illustrious brother, the famous surgeon, who ascribes all that was best in himself to her example and instructions, and to the purifying influences of his childhood's home. He lost his mother when he was eleven years of age, his father in his twenty-second year (1746). They lived long enough to transmit to him the memory of their virtuous example—twas all they had to bequeath. After receiving the first rudiments of education at the charitable schools of the city, he was sent to the Frederick College in 1743, at the expense of his uncle, a substantial shoemaker. Here he remained under the tutelage of Dr. Schultz, an eminent adherent of Wolff, at the time when the Wolffian philosophy was a subject of acrimonious controversy. He devoted himself chiefly to the classics and mathematics, the essential foundation of all thorough instruction for the university student. From the Collegium Fredericianum he passed in 1740 to the University of Königsberg, and entered upon a course of theology; but his ill success in preaching discouraged him, and he attached himself to the mathematical and physical sciences, in the former of which his first distinction was gained. During the latter period of his university career he supported himself by teaching in the humblest grades, in consequence of the increasing penury of his father, whose death in 1746 compelled him to withdraw from the university, and to seek a living from his own exertions alone. For the nine following years he was employed as a private teacher in and near Königsberg, and finally in the noble family of Kayserling, by whom his merits were appreciated, and in whose society he acquired that polish of manner which distinguished him through life. He changed his family name of Cant to the more Germanic appellative Kaut, but he did not thus divest himself of the Scotch characteristics of mind and morals. In the second year of his engagement in private tuition he published his first work, Gedanken von der wahren Schätzung der lebendigen Kräfte (Thoughts on the true Measure of Living Forces, 1747), which did him much good as an undeveloped candidate to the famous controversy on the subject. In 1754 he discussed the question proposed for a prize by the Berlin Academy, Whether the Earth had undergone any change consequent upon its revolution upon its Axis. This essay facilitated his acquisition of the master's degree in the next year. At this time he returned to the university as privat-dozent, and maintained an uninterrupted connection with it thenceforth till the closing years of his life. He inaugurated his lectures by the composition of two essays: the first, De Igni; the second, Prioriatio de Principis Primis Cognitioiis Humanoe, which was the first manifestation of the direction of his mind to metaphysical inquiry, and also showed that he had fixed on the central point of all philosophy. While employed in private teaching he had diligently prosecuted his encyclopedic studies, and had acquired the English language by his own exertions, in order to master the speculations of Locke, Berkeley, and Hume. Another kindred treatise belongs to this year—Principiorum Primalrum Cognitioiis Metaphysisica Nova Dilucidatio, as also his Allgemeine Naturgeschichte und Theorie des Himmels (Universal Natural History and Theory of the Heavens). The last work was issued anonymously, with a dedication to Frederick the Great. It is remarkable for its bold views, and for announcing the probable resolution of the nebula into stars, and the probable discovery of new planets—scientific predictions fulfilled in much later years by Herschel and Leverrier. This production occasioned a correspondence with Lambert (1761), the singularly profound president of the Berlin Academy, who espoused similar opinions. For fifteen years (1756—1770) Kant, and so exclusively engaged with study and the duties of instruction, scarcely offers any events for biography beyond the development of opinions, the publication of the treatises in which such opinions are set forth, and the academic distinctions attained. The virulence for which he was supposed to be exhibiting the true Primrose's migrations "from the blue chamber to the brown," and hence is compelled to mark the critical moments of his career by the notice of the principal works as they appeared. Such indications, however, have a value of their own, as they reveal the growth of speculations, and their application in the course of time to the world, and mark the times and modes in which the revolutions of thought have been effected. In 1762 appeared Kant's criticism of the Aristotelian logic, in a treatise entitled Die Logische Sprachfähigkeit der vier syntaktischen, nach den Syllogistikfiguren (The Logiological Speech-ability of the four Syntactical, after the Syllogistic Figures). The cenotaphs of Aristotle have usually mingled both his doctrines and his aims, and have imagined to be erroneous dogmas which the Stagyrite had meditated more profoundly, and had treated with a juster regard to practical convenience than themselves. In the course of the next year, 1763, Kant gave to the public his Der einzig mögliche Begriffsgang zu einer Demonstration des Desensus Gotts (Ontological Demonstration of the Being of God), in which he repudiated alike the deductions à priori of Anselm, Des Cartes, and Clarke, and the inductions à posteriori of the natural theologians, and regarded the conception of the possibility of God as attesting the reality of his existence. This treatise still bears the impress of the dominant Wolffian philosophy, which he had imbibed from his early teacher Schultz. In this year he contended for the prize offered by the Berlin Academy, on the Principles of Natural Theology and Morals. (Untersuchung über die Deutlichkeit der Grundsätze der natürlichen Theologie und Moral) receiving the second honors, while the first were adjudged to Moses Mendelssohn. Three years more elapsed before he received his first public appointment as curate at the grammar school, an undervalued position to the sum of fifty dollars. In this year he exposed the pretensions of Swedish rationalism, being always ready to assail new-fangled delusions, whether stimulated by enthusiasm or by imposture. At length, when approaching the end of his forty-seventh year, he was promoted to the chair of logic and metaphysics in his own university, with a stipend of three hundred dollars. He had suffered two previous disappointments. He had failed to obtain the professorship extraordinary of logic in 1756, and the ordinary professorship in 1758, and had declined the professorship of history in 1754, from distrust of his aptitudes and acquirements. He had refused invitations from Erlangen and Jena, from reluctance to abandon his people and his native home. Custom demanded an inaugural dissertation from the professor elect. Kant's public hypothesis de politia et intelligibili forma et principiis. This essay contained the first distinct anticipations of his characteristic system, though his philosophy did not receive form or coherent development for many ensuing years. The remainder of his life was, however, consecrated to its definite constitution and expansion. He wrote his scheme in shape, for in 1772 he smoothed the way for a fuller discussion by his Schema of Transcendental Philosophy. No desire of change, no temptation of worldly advancement and honor could seduce him from his calm lu-cubrations. He refused to go to Halis, though a double salary was offered him. After an election to the Order of Patient Meditators he produced in 1781 his Critique of the Pure Rea-on (Kritik der reinen Vernunft), which proclaimed a new philosophy, and ushered in a new cycle of speculation—noua ordo socraticorum metaphysicorum. The work was modified in a second edition in 1787, to grade the imputation of idealism and idealistic indolence objected to it as to the previous system of Wolf. It long seemed as if this remarkable production—a revolution itself, and the parent of revolutions—would never reach a second edition.

For six years it lay so unheeded on the publisher's desk that its composer disiled it as waste paper, when a sudden demand relieved its anxieties, and ordered a republication expedient. This timely interest in the book was scarcely due to Kant's Pro-logoema to Metaphysics (Prolegomena zu einer jeden cünstigen Metaphysik, die als Wissenschaft werd aufge-ten Lassen, 1783), but may be attributed to striking notices of the doctrine in prominent German magazines.

In 1785 the practical side of his system was exposed in his Metaphysics of Ethics (Grundlehrg zur Metaphysik der Sitten), and in the following year its extension to physiology appeared in a dissertation Ademungslehre der Anatomie und Physiologie of Natural Science (Metaphysische Anfangsgründe der Naturreitschaften). In 1788 the positive aspect of his philosophy was presented in the Critique of the Practical Reason (Kritik der praktischen Vernunft), which treats of the principles and objects of the moral, and constructive ethics on the act, so that your principle of action may serve as a universal law. The foundation is narrow, and has the cold rigidity of Stoical pretension, but it was a stern and strict rule in the concept of it proprietor, and was borrowed from his own line of conduct, and from the necessity virtuously imposed on his home, as much as from the dictates of his reason.
The defects of this canon will be indicated hereafter.

The outline of the new philosophy was completed in 1790 by the Critique of the Practical Judgment (Kritik der Urtheorikraf), which is in some respects the most satisfactory work of the series. It is designed to unite the practical with the theoretical reason, the freedom of the will with the law of existence, by regarding the whole order of creation as a system of means effectually adapted to the attainment of beneficent aims. It is thus a tract of teleology or of final causes. It is generally occupied with the theory of the beautiful and the sub-line, and is in great measure a development of the Observations on the Beautiful and the Sublime (Beobach-tungen über das Gefühl des Schönen und Erhabenen, 1764), and the Metaphysics of Ethics (1785).

But the work of philosophy thus exhibited by himself in all its principal applications. It had attracted general notice; it had gathered around it numerous and enthusiastic disciples; it had secured for its author profound respect and earnest admiration. Distinguished men flocked to its lectures; princes and sovereigns commisioned learned scholars to take his teachings and report his doctrines. His life was surrounded with ease, and his days were crowned with honor. His salary had been increased, and had given what was wealth to one of his simple tastes and frugal habits. He had been twice appointed rector of the university. His industrious and meditative career had passed its grand climacteric, and was stretching serenely to its close. Just when the aims of life appeared to have been won, Kant was plunged into the most serious troubles which dis-turb’d his tranquil existence. He became involved in a great dispute which arose by a Bristol magazine, after wards reproduced in a volume under the title of Religion within the Limits of Pure Reason (De Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der Vernunft, 1798).

There was a ferment in the religious circles of Germany because of the growth of a religious spirit. He excited alarms which appeared now to be justifed. A doctrine which rejected the accepted arguments for the being of God, the validity of revelation, the immortality of the soul, and the creation of the world, offended too many consciousnesses, to be of much importance of thought, and substituted too shadowy and too subabstract speculations for accredited precepts and dogmas, not to produce discontent and censure. Nor were the alarms entertained unreasonable, as was shown by the subsequent developments of the material philosophy. The agitation excited by Kant's theological innovations was partially allayed by a royal mandate directing him to observe silence on religious topics.
The king's interference is supposed to have been induced by Kant's sympathies with the French Revolution, despite the fact that he was a royalist. On August 10, 1790, when he 1790 he resumed his expositions, considering his engagement as a personal one with that monarch. But before this time he had narrowed the sphere of his activity.
In 1794 he withdrew from general society; in 1795 he discontinued all his instructions except in logic and metaphysics, and he closed his academic labors altogether two years afterwards. In 1798 he composed his Strife of the Faculties (Der Streit der Facultäten), reviving the religious dispute in which he had been entangled; and he bade farewell to the public in his Pragmatical View of Public Utility (Pr款matbciol View des boys did not move towards the promulgation of his doctrine, which gave to the new philosophy the subjective or idealistic cast, against which his own efforts had always been strenuously directed. In this paper he manifested his own failing powers, and the incapacity to appreciate other systems than his own —a natural consequence of his habitual disregard of the history of speculation. His pupils published several other works from his notes and papers during the last year of his life. That life was not long extended after his retirement. His constitution was not wholly virtuous in his health, so remarkably maintained, began to decline; apetite, teeth, strength, sight, voice, memory, all failed, and his pure, laborious, and honorable existence was term inated by an apoplectic attack, Feb. 12, 1804, when he died at the age of eighty years. His death produced profound emotion throughout Germany. The whole city of Königsberg put on mourning; multitudes clocked to his funeral, and his remains were escorted to the grave by a solemn procession. A characteristic medal was struck to commemorate his fame. It bore an inscription to his memory, which is repeated to this day:

"Achtd volam Biai cum." He was worthy of such honor.
He left to his countrymen the example of a career rich in wholesome fruits—simple, sincere, upright, laborious; devoted singly to the promotion of truth, and to the removal of error in the highest and most perilous regions of speculation, erected by seventy years of strenuous industry, and by half a century faithfully given to the instruction of successive generations of the young in various branches of learning, from the humblest rudiments of knowledge to the most recondite metaphysical research.
Humble, modest, and true, his life was a noble career to his memory that the honors that men could bestow.
In person, Kant was small and delicately built. Hislue eyes expressed benevolence, but his features were ruled, and seamed with the lines of habitual thought.
Lavater mistook his portrait for that of a noted highwayman. His manners were kindly and courteous. He was very genial in company, full of mirth and innocent wit, and scrupulously abstinent of learned or metaphysical discourse. As a lecturer he was easy and attractive, displaying nothing of the repulsive aridity and elaborate awkwardness of his philosophical treatises.
He was a reverend observer of all things in the pr actice of all justice. The like precise propriety regulated all his habits.
He was plain in his tastes, abstemious in eating and drinking, chary of indulgences, frugal in his expenditures, methodical in every arrangement. "Everything had its set time," was his motto in the course of his life. His hour for rising was four in summer and five in winter; for bed, ten in summer and nine in winter. By this regularity and moderation he reached ful-ess of form with heart, cheerfulness, and perfect se-remity. He seems to have been deficient in poetic sensibility and poetic imagination. To this defect may be ascribed several imperfections in the expostition of his philosophy, and his total want of religious sentiment.

Shortly before his death he declared that he had no determination to be certain, and only believed to believe in metempsychosis. This was the flaw in his mental and moral constitution which produced many flaws in his speculation.

Like his illustrious contemporary Hume, whom he surpassed nearly thirty years, Kant was never married.
He gave the "hostages to fortune," but it estranged Bacon's dictum, that "the best works, and of greatest merit for the public, have proceeded from unmarried or childless men." Of the works constituting Kant's bequest to posterity, the most noted and important are those that exposed the "Critical Philosophy," and of this philosophy a brief notice remains to be given.

Philosophy.—Kant's scheme of speculation is so comprehensive, so extensive, so intricate, so systematic, so full of divisions and subdivisions, that it is impossible to attempt an complete summary of it within the limits allowed me. I have not attempted the fullest, but the most cerpact mode of exposition is required. Hence the notice of the numerous treatises not directly employed in the construction of the "Critical Philosophy" has been introduced into the biographical sketch. Hence, too, the recurring abstract outline of the system which must also be referred to some of the numerous synoptical views presented in German, French, English, and Latin. All that can be aimed at here will be to give a cursory account of the distinctive peculiarities of Kant's scheme.
To do this, it may suffice to explain his relation to previous philosophy, to point out his characteristic method, and to note the chief developments and applications of that method.

To show the exact relation of Kant to antecedent and contemporary modes of speculation would require a detailed account of the fortunes of philosophy from Bacon, and Gassendi, and Des Cartes. This is more than has been attempted by Rosenkrantz. It must suffice to state that in the middle of the 18th century the Woflan development and systematization of the philosophy of Leibnitz was predominant in Germany; the scepticism of Hume, the empiricism of the Scotchmen, and the ma-rialism of D'Alembert, Diderot, and Condillac was fashinable in France. The philosophy of Leibnitz was an effort to escape the pantheistic tendencies of Cartesianism as evolved in the idealism of Spinoza and the the-oscopy of Baruch Spinoza. Hume's philosophy was the sceptical evolution of the sensationalism of Locke, generated by the collision between the mechanicism of Hartley and the Pyrrhonism of Berkeley. The infidel doctrine of the school of the French Encyclopaedia was the superficial deduction of the French intellectual anarchists from the partial appreciation of the tenets of Locke, whose own principles were vague and incoherent. The problem presented for solution was to find some ground of reconciliation between all these divergent opinions, to detect and expose the fallacies on which they rested, to avoid the mischiefs caused or portended by them, and to discover a trustworthy and intelligible basis for human knowledge.

The situation was in many respects analgogous to that which characterized the Hellenic world at the time of Socrates. Kant undertook the investigation of this arduous and urgent problem, and, like Socrates, he proceeded by the critical investigation of the nenature of knowledge and of the intellectual faculties of man. By this procedure he was gradually led to the determination of the conditions of the problem, and to the discovery of a solution partially true, and which ap-ppeared to himself complete and irrefragable. In metaphysics, in its philosophical and Kant's meth-method gave to his system the appropriate name of the Critical Philosophy.

ing faculty in its adaptation to thought—empty of the matter of thought, and distinct from its experiences. It is the mill without the grain which is to be ground by it. In analyzing the principle of thought, Kant detects an active as well as a passive factor. In every act of thought there is the reception of the impression from the object of thought, and the subjective reaction thereon by excitement, which can be communicated from a mere form to the conclusion, and differentiates το φανημένον, the subject of thought, from το φανημένον, the object of thought.

Kant distinguishes the agencies which supply the elements of the idea of sense, understanding, reason. The distribution of the faculties of the mind is always hazardous, and often beguiling. The mind is one and complete. In the perceptions of sensation, the elements derived from the mind, and not from the impression, are space and time. Such elements are called transcendental because they transcend, precede, and formulate the experience.

They are consequently the forms or conditions of sensations. They are not supplied by the sensation, but they are added to it by the mind in the act of perception. There are indications of this doctrine in Platonism (Democritus ii, 7, 9), Leibnitz (Nouve. Éth. liv. ii, ch. v), and in other thinkers. It is intimated, indeed, by Aristotle, and is a natural deduction from the Ideas of Plato. It is singularly corroborated by recent expositions of the physiology of nervous action. In Kant's theory the phenomena of the mind are divided into the subjective and the objective in space, the phenomena of the mind to the conception of time. The sensationalist is thus refuted, as space and time are not obtained from sensation. The dogmatic idealist is refuted, as the matter of knowledge must be supplied by external impressions.

The understanding coordinates the perceptions of sense, and forms them into judgments by giving to them unity and interdependence. The transcendental elements supplied in this action of the understanding are arranged by Kant in twelve categories. The name of categories is taken from the Organon of Aristotle, but Kant's categories are entirely diverse from Aristotle's. Kant observed that metaphysical science pursued a deductive round, without making progress or securing stability, while logic had received full, complete, and definite form from its great founder. He ascribed this difference of form in the science, that it was the result of the exposition of the procedure of the mind in reasoning. He concluded that equal validity would be conferred on metaphysics, if it were reduced to a 5 accurate representation of the procedure of the mind in the acquisition and employment of the knowledge of sense. Hence, he invented a forced analogy between the two branches of speculation, and rendered his theory intricate, arbitrary, and obscure by compelling it to assume a form fantastically corresponding with logical distinctions. In this spirit he devised his twelve categories, and arranged them according to the forms of propositions, in the manner exhibited in the following table:

IV. Modal.        |               |

All judgments are framed by the mind under the influence of these categories, four of them—one from each class—being inevitably applied in every instance. As, however, things are thought not as they are, but as the intellectual predispositions make them appear to be, knowledge is purely relative to the human mind—objective truth is not attainable, and all our experiences or knowledge have only a subjective validity. The mind cannot think except so far as it has been provoked by objective stimulation, therefore there is a real objective existence of things. It thinks under the control of the categories of the understanding, therefore knowledge is subjective in form, is moulded by the recipient mind, and cannot be known to correspond to the reality of things. The image is reflected from rationality, but the object represented may be magnified or diminished, or strangely distorted by the character of the mirror, without being altered in itself. The image is all that constitutes knowledge; there is, accordingly, no assurance of a reality between subject and object. Thus all knowledge is conditional only—conditioned by the forms of the understanding, which mould it into the form in which it is received. Some principle was required to give coherence, unity, confidence to the relative knowledge obtained through such mental experiences. This was supposed to be given by the consciousness of personality which bounded, adorned, and harmonized all the qualified judgments that could be entertained. It seems a mistake to an impression of the Kant, and at variance with his system, to claim any necessary truth for judgments formed in this manner. There can be no denying that a being exists in contingent necessity—an impossibility of thinking otherwise than the constitution of the mind necessitates.

In the highest region of the mind—the reason or the faculty of ideas—there is also subject to the control of knowledge the physical world. The phenomena of the reason pass beyond the limits of experience, and are only regulative. In this branch of the subject, which is designed to explain the combination of the judgments of the understanding into ratiocinative conclusions, Kant introduces three pure ideas, which are deemed to be analogous to the three forms of the axioms—categorical, hypothetical, and disjunctive. These ideas are, 1. Absolute unity, or simple being, the soul, which gives origin to Rational Psychology; 2. Absolute totality, the aggregate of phenomena in space and time, the world, which is the basis of Cosmology; and 3. Absolute reality, supreme existence, the First Cause, which is the subject of Theology. From this point the later German schools diverge by ascribing a real and not simply a subjective validity to the forms of the absolute. With Kant they are merely postulates of reason, having no necessary connection with the reality. In Kant's view, the discussion of the soul and world forms in space and time is to be simultaneous, and the theology only exhibits the phenomena of mental consciousness without guaranteeing anything in regard to the essential nature of the mind or to the immortality of the soul. Rational cosmology is equally unable to attain to any certain knowledge of the world. It lands us finally in four pairs of transcendental ideas, each pair producing twin contradictions. These are Kant's celebrated antinomies: 1. In quantity, it may be proved that the world is both limited and unlimited; 2. In quality, that its elements are ultimately simple and infinitely divisible; 3. In relation, that it is caused by free action, and by an infinite series of mechanical causes; 4. In modality, that it has an independent cause, and that it is composed of independent members. Which of these alternatives is asserted, it cannot be exclusively maintained, for it results in hopeless paradoxes. Both must be in some sense true, yet both cannot be simultaneously entertained, because they are contradictory. Hence no certainty, no complete comprehensive knowledge can be attained. Metaphysics is simply inquisitive, speculative, critical, showing the limitations of the human mind, and the impossibility of knowing the reality of things, but at the same time furnishing glimpses of a reality which the mind can not compass—of existence and truth beyond the range of finite comprehension. It is the confession, if not the demonstration of the intellectual weakness, but in the same negative result is reached in rational theology. The ontological argument for the being of God—that of Anselm and Des Cartes, derived from the notion of pe-fect and independent existence—the cosmological argument of Clarke, which proceeds from the conception of contingent to that of necessary being—and the physico-theological argument of the natural theologians, which infers a supreme intelligent Designer from the evidences of design, contains, as Kant points out, all equally conclusive. "Thus the soul, the world, and God are left by Kant's speculative philosophy as problems not only unsolved, but demonstrably unsolvable." To furnish a positive support for convictions on this subject indispensable for human guidance, and to give an authoritative rule for action, Kant conceived, are equally conclusive.

(2) Critique of the Practical Reason.—Neither the name nor the conception of the practical reason was a novelty; both occur in Aristotle (De Anim. iii. 10; ὁ μὲν γὰρ Συμμετέχων νοεῖ οὐδὲν οὐλπράτερ, ibid. c. ix). They are found in Aquinas (Summ. Theol. ii. 1, 90), and especially 91,8), in Roger Bacon (Opus Majus, p. 35, 44), and in most philosophers, medieval and modern, who have accepted the Aristotelian doctrine. Whatever systems have recognized a moral sense, whatever theories have asserted a sustaining and guiding illumination of the conscience, whatever schemes acknowledge the inworking spirit, and whatever expositions of the mysteries of man assume an abiding faith as the foundation of moral action, entain substantially the same fundamental doctrine as Kant's, though it is differently applied by the characteristic feature of Kant's ethical system is what he terms the "Categorical Imperative." Speculative philosophy affords neither absolute truth nor certain guidance. Practical philosophy rests upon the enlightened conscience—enlightened by its own indwelling light. The "categorical imperative" is a rule of action—a moral law—deriving its authority from itself—intuitively received—determining action by the idea—governing by the rational form, not by the matter—thus advancing to the realm of the absolute, the unconditional, the noumenal, and bringing into practical consciousness the realities of action and duty. The formula of this "categorical imperative" is, Act so that your action may be applied as a universal rule. It is obvious that a precept so vague and so abstract may represent an essential characteristic or property of right conduct, but cannot be accepted as its principle. It is indefinite, and it wants the authority of sovereign command. It would require the omniscient comprehension of all contempaneous relations, and all possible consequences for the regulation of every act, and at best would result in transcendental utilitarianism. It is too abstruse to be practically applied to the circumstances of life, and by all grades of men. It is limited to finite intelligences, and is sufficiently elastic to allow each one's ignorance or obtuse conscience to be alleged as the individual rule of right. It might easily be stretched so as to sanction the Donatist thesis, "Quoque libet, licet." On such a scheme, to employ the expression of Lyly's Euphues, "it is the disposition of the mind that altereth the nature of the thing." Our morals would be shifting and casuistical. The wish would continually be the father to the thought; and all enthusiasm, all fanaticism, might be represented as the mere carry-over of the conception of duty. The conception of duty is the touchstone and stumbling-block of philosophy, and against it is shattered every scheme which does not rest upon the acceptance of revelation, and the acknowledgment of God, in whom we live, and move, and have our being. There is no other mode of passing the chasm which separates the negative results of speculative inquiry from the positive requirements of practical action. Speculative philosophy discusses the boundaries of the mind; practical philosophy is concerned with actions which are infinite in their consequences, and whose effects "wander through eternity."

(3) The Critique of the Judgment (Urtheilskrift—Faculty of Judgment).—This is the third of the systematic treatises devoted to the construction of the critical philosophy. The designation is infernicious and ambiguous. The Imagination would be more appropriate, but would scarcely be applicable without some violence to the whole scope of the inquiry proposed. The department corresponds to the ἀγαθοσθενία, or constructive science of the perceptive acquisition of knowledge, and connects the domain of the pure with that of the practical reason. The imagination is the faculty of connection—of re-creation—uniting in emotional delight the obligations of action with the highest discoveries of speculation. In Kant's critique of the judgment are included the doctrine of taste, the doctrine of the beautiful in general, the doctrine of beauty, the doctrine of the sublime, the doctrine of the beautiful in specific, or aesthetics, and the doctrine of final causes, or teleology. His theory of beauty accords in substance with that of Plato, or rather that of Plotinus, but from his own singular defect of imagination, and consequent limitation of view, it is denied the contained splendour, and loses the far-reaching suggestion which illustrate that magnificent exposition of the grandest and most resolute subject of metaphysical speculation. In beauty, Kant contemplates only the latent beneficial design, the harmony of means and ends, without dwelling upon the more significant conception of the primordial plan, the archetypal perfection, from which the whole creation has declined, but towards which man's ideal ever strives to return. The terms in which the doctrine is expounded are often confused and indistinct, but the essential principle is that in no things, but in the mind is the intuitive perception of the conception between the ideal perfection suggested and the order of the universe observed. The principle of the sublime is the intuition of the discrepancy between the finite powers of man and the infinite towards which he aspires, producing pain from the sense of limitation, but exalting from yearning towards the limitless, beyond sense and conception, which is felt to be his natural home, his ultimate destination. In the discussion of teleology proper Kant endeavors to restore some efficacy to that reasoning from final causes, which in earlier treatises he had repudiated. This part of the subject is inadequately understood, and presents many vast and suggestive views, and in some sort prepares the way for the last of Kant's treatises which can be specially noticed here.

(4) Religion within the Limits of Pure Reason.—This is Kant's theology, and is the most unsatisfactory of all his efforts. It was an attempt to reconstruct the foundations of religious belief, which had been sapped and in great measure overthrown by his critical investigations. It was the work of his old age, and at all periods of his life he seems to have been at least as deficient in religious enthusiasm as his other conceptions. The conception of God is closely allied to it. The work provoked much opposition at the time of its appearance, and caused the only serious annoyance of his life. It scandalized many religious minds, it was dangerously consonant with the revolutionary infidelity of France, and it presented the point of departure for the German rationalism of the 19th century. It treats the revelations of Scripture in regard to the fall of man, to his redemption, and to his restoration as a moral allegory, the data for which are supplied by the consciousness of depravity, and of dereliction from the state of those first persons in whose image he is formed. It is utterly inconsistent with any scheme of religion, and serves to show Kant's profound sense of the insufficiency of his own doctrine for the solution of the highest enigmas of humanity. The πάντα στάσει—"the solid locus stans" was wanting to his system. The philosophy was wholly critical in its procedure, and negative in its results. It weakened or undermined those intuitive convictions—inexippable, but irrefragable—which enable man "to walk by faith, and not by sight."

This notice is too brief to allow the exhibition of the incongruities or fallacies of the transcendental system, or the suggestion of rectifications, as it has been too brief for any detailed account of the several parts of his complex and elaborate scheme. That scheme is a wonderad monument of patient industry, acute discernment, perspicacious analysis, and of bold and honest thought. It was soon felt to be unassailable, and it engendered new swarms of speculative heresies; but its influences must be sought in Rosenkranz's history of Kant's doctrine, and in other treatises on the history of German speculative philosophy.

Literature.—The bibliography of Kant's philosophy would make the catalogue of an extensive library, and would include nearly everything in the highest branches of metaphysics which has appeared since the publication of the Critique of Pure Reason. In all the general histories of philosophy, matter of space is at present too limited to enumerate all the works which treat of Kant's doctrine. The following works, however, are of a particular interest, because they are all accessible in English translation.

have been born as the son of Deravithi, and, again, is identified with one of the agnis or fires. Finally, it is said that there existed, in fact, two Capillas—the first an embodiment of Vishnu; the other, the igneous principle in human disguise. The probability is that Kapila was simply, like the great majority of his educated countrymen, a Brahman. Some dependence has been placed on the view of Kapila, as known to us in the Sankhya-sutras, and the Abhidharma, or the metaphysics of the Buddhists. He adds, however, that if any similarity of the two systems could be established, such proofs would be very valuable. "They would probably enable us to decide whether Buddha borrowed from Kapila, or Kapila from Buddha, and thus determine the real chronology of the philosophical literature of India, as either prior or subsequent to the Buddhist era." Kapnistorists, a sect of the Russian Church. See RUSSIAN CHURCH.

Karaite (Heb. קראית). Karam. i. e. Readers) is the name of one of the oldest and most remarkable sects of the Jewish synagogue, whose distinguishing tenet is strict adherence to the letter of the written law (as e.g. a sacred writings of the O. T.), and utter disregard of the authority of the oral law or tradition (q. v.).

Orig.—Up to our own day it has been impossible to determine the age in which the Karaites originated; certain it is that they existed before the 8th century, to which their origin was formally assigned. The Karaites themselves claim to be the remains of the ten tribes led captive by Shalmaneser. The Rabbins (e. g. Aben Ezra, Maimonides, etc.) unjustly assert that this sect is identical with the Sadducees (comp. Rule, Karaites, p. viii), and that they were originated by Ahnan (about A.D. 640), because the latter was ignored in the election of a new Rosh-Telaath (q. v.); but the investigations of our day lead us to believe that the Karaites must have originated immediately after the return of the Jews from Babylonian captivity, although they did not organize into a distinct sect until the middle of the 8th century. The Karaites have always been strict adherents of the letter of the written law, and of the oral tradition, and that for this, and no other reason, we find no mention of them as such in the New-Test. writings, nor in those of Josephus and Philo. Upon the completion of the Talmud it is well known that a great agitation prevailed in the Jewish community, especially in the western synagogues, and particularly at Constantinople, where, on the idea of Feuerbach, A.D. 629, Justinian was obliged to interfere, and actually prohibited the reading of the Mishna in the synagogue. In the conversion of the Khazars (q. v.) to Judaism, the Karaites, as we learn from the Talmud, were so called (Hebrew, Seraphim, or Lkvi), already appear as a distinct sect. From inscriptions collected and examined by Abraham Firkovitch, the celebrated Russian Jew, within the last twenty years, there are indications that in the Crimea at least Karaites may have flourished as early as the first half of the 4th century, if not earlier (see Rule, p. 83; N. Y. Notizbl., 1864, ii, 246). The external unity, however, of the Jewish Church was not broken apparently until the time of Ahnan ben-David. It is true, even in the days of Christ, the internal peace of the Jewish fold was much disturbed; synagogues differed greatly from each other, but ostensibly these differences were due to matters of secondary ignorance of the Hebrew, and the introduction of Greek and other foreign idioms, on doctrines and discipline there seems to reign universal harmony. Not so after the publication of the Talmud. There were many who inclined to pay strict deference only to the inspired writings of the O.T.; and when, in the middle of the 8th century, a Luther in the form of Ahnahn ben-David arose in the Jewish midst and declared his opposition to the Rabbinites, a party was formed in his favor at Jerusalem itself, which spread itself over the whole of Aralasia, and even far away through all the East, as well as towards the West. The personal history of this great Jewish reformer is rather obscured by the fables of Arabos, and the calumnies of some Rabbinites; and it remains to be settled whether, as the Karaites assert, he was born on the banks of the Tigris, and sent forth from this centre of Judaism "letters of admonition, instruction, and encouragement to distant congregations, with zealous preachers who proclaimed everywhere the supreme authority of the Law, and the word of the Law," in the Talmud, or any other writings, was contrary to the law of Moses (comp. Pincher, L. Kadmonoth, or Zur Geschichte u. Liter., der Karaiten, Append. p. 38 and 90). Ahnahn died in 765, yet within that astonishingly brief period the Karaites had spread over Palestine, Egypt, Greece, Barbary, Spain, Syria, Tartary, Byzantium, Fez, Morocco, and even to the ranges of the Atlas, and by all the Karaites in these distant lands his death was mourned as the loss of a second Moses. Under Rabbi Solomon ben-Jeruhkim (born in 868) they prospered greatly in the 9th century, and even up to the 14th the Jews were to have increased, but thereafter their condition became obscure, and light first again breaks upon the Karaites' history with the opening of the present century (see below).

The reason why so little is yet known about the Karaites is that their writings are not generally accessible. Towards the close of the 17th century Protestant theologians interested themselves in their behalf, and in 1690 Peringer (then professor of Hebrew at the university at Upsala) was sent to Poland by the king of Sweden to make inquiries into their history. In 1698 Jacob Trigland (professor at Leyden) went thither for the same purpose and the results of his investigation, which remain of great value to this day, were published in the Theaurus der Oriental Antiquitates. Trigland says that he had learned enough to speak of them with assurance. He asserts that, soon after the prophets had ceased, the Jews became divided on the subject of works and supererogation, some maintaining their necessity from tradition, whilst others, keeping close to the written law, set them aside, and that thus Karaisms commenced. He adds that, after the return from the Babylonian captivity, on the re-establishment of the observance of the Sabbath, there were several parties and schisms for that end, and these, being once introduced, were looked upon as essential, and as appointed by Moses. This was the origin of Pharisiasm, while a contrary party, who continued to adhere to the letter, founded Karaisms. Wolfus, the great Hebrew bibliographer, depending on the Memoir of Marduchai ben-Nissim, a learned Karait (published by Wolf under the title of Notitia Curatorum, Hamburg and Leipzig, 1714, 4to), refers their origin to a massacre among the Jewish doctors under Alexander Januarius, their king; about a hundred years before Christ, because Simon, son of Sethach, and the queen's brother, making his escape into Egypt, there forgot his pretended traditions, and, on his return to Jerusalem, published his visions, interpreting the law after his own fancy, and supporting his novelties from the notices which God said, he had communicated by the mouth of Moses, whose repository he was. He gained many followers, and was opposed by others, who maintained that all which God had revealed to Moses was written. Hence the Jews became divided into two great sects, the orthodox and Tractate-Jews, the former called Sabaite, the latter Karait. Juda, son of Tabbai, distinguished himself; among the latter, Hillel (q. v.). In later history he agrees with what has been said above. It remains only to be stated that Wolfus reckons not only the Sadducees, but also the Scribes, in the number of Karaites. But such a classification of the writings, it is evident, will not sufficiently separate the Karaites from the Sadducees and the Scribes. Karaitism cannot be regarded as in any sense a product of Sadduceeism; the two are in principle identical, and in the public knowledge of the Sadducees and the Scribes, they would be regarded as in any sense a product of Sadduceeism. The Sadducees and Karaitism are just as real and true, and as many as the关闭en in themselves and the Scribes.

Doctrines and Uses.—Although the Karaites are decidedly opposed to assigning any authority to tradition, they by no means reject altogether the use of the Talmud, etc. Quite to the contrary, they gladly accept any light that they can get in their investigation of the word of God. They regard the T.-J. Scriptures, but it is only as exegetical aids that are ready to accept Jewish traditional writings. Selden, who is very express on this point, observes, in his Uozor Hebraico, that besides the mere text, they have also certain interpretations which they call heredity, and these, or a synagogal division, they regard as authoritative. They are divided into Doctors and Laymen. Their theology seems to differ only from that of the Rabbinites in being purer and free from superstition, as they give no credit to the explanations of the Cabalists, merical allegories, nor to any constitutions of the Talmud. In short, they accept only what is conformable to Scripture, and may be drawn from it by just and necessary consequences. The Karaites, in distinction from the Rabbinites, have their own Confession of Faith, which consists of ten articles. They are (as translated by Rule, p. 128) as follows:

1. That all this bodily (or material) existence, that is to say, they say, the living body, is of unbelief and faith.
2. That they have a Creator, and the Creator has his own soul (or spirit).
3. That he has no similitude, and he is one, separate from all.
4. That he sent Moses, our master (upon whom be peace).
5. That he sent with Moses, our master, his law, which is perfect.
6. For the instruction of the faithful, the language of the law, and the interpretation, that is to say, the reading or text and division, in solemn ceremonies (or verse) and the division of the day and the day of the month, which remain of great value to this day, were published in the Theaurus der Oriental Antiquitates. Trigland says that he had learned enough to speak of them with assurance. He asserts that, soon after the prophets had ceased, the Jews became divided on the subject of works and supererogation, some maintaining their necessity from tradition, whilst others, keeping close to the written law, set them aside, and that thus Karaisms commenced. KAREAH

Population and Present Condition.—The number of the present adherents to Karaim has been variously estimated; but it is probable that they are between 1500 and 2000, and that all the Karaim belong to the sect known as the "Kareans". These tribes are supposed to number about five millions.

Origin.—There is much doubt as to their origin. There are amongst them many distinct traditions which would point to a Tiboan source. Mason (in Tenasserim) says that they regard themselves as wanderers from the north, and as having crossed a "river of running sand," by which name he says Fa Hian, the Chinese pilgrim who visited India about the 5th century, constantly speaks of the great desert to the north of Burmah, and between Chin and Thibet. Bruce says that they are a remnant of an Indian stock among the Musalmans of India and the inhabitants of Thibet (p. 145, 147). A portion of northern Burmah and Yunnan has been suggested as the probable original seat of the Karren race. Many authorities consider them as the aborigines of much of Burmah. Amongst the reasons assigned for this view are the following: (1) They received from the Burmese their name of Karen, which means first or original. (2) Their habits are much more primitive than those of the Burmese, and they dislike their subjugation to the latter. (3) They have traditions distinctly fixing their early location in the east, and as living on the other side of a range of water, which they call Karenko, which is so ancient a term that they have lost the meaning of it altogether, but the tradition itself shows that this was the Bay of Bengal. (4) The Moans or Tai-lings, a people who are older residents than the Burmese, have a similar name in Farrer India, and they were in the country when they first entered it, and were known as Pools or wild men by their forefathers (Journ. Am. Oriental Society, vol. iv.).

Description.—The Kares of the north are more advanced in the arts and in the habits of civilization than those of the southern district. They reckon themselves not by villages nor by cities, but by families, having a patriarchal form of society, single families, occupants of one house, often numbering from three to four hundred members. Their houses are immense structures, made of posts, with joints at a height of seven or eight feet from the ground, the sides being lined with mats, the roof being of palm-leaves, and the partitions of bamboo matting.

It is the southern section of these tribes, however, which is best known, especially those designated as Sgaw and Jarai, Sgaw being the latter name by which the Burmese Taung Karen, and are a vigorous people, robust, full-chested, with large limbs, square cheek-bones, thick and flattened nose, but not so prominently lips. The Sgaw, or pure Kares, are smaller, with a complexion lighter, and more remote, surrounded by a wild and a general language about their movements. Mr. Judson in 1833 wrote of them as "a meek, peaceful race, simple and credulous, with many of the softer virtues and few flagrant vices, greatly addicted to drunkenness, extremely filthy, indolent in their habits, their morals in other respects being so much improved to many more civilized races, though he was told that they were as untamable as the wild cow of the mountains" (Wayland, Judson, i, 542 sq.)

Religious Traditions.—They have amongst them a great number of religious traditions which bear a marked analogy to Biblical history. The tradition respecting the creation specifies that man was created from the earth, and woman from one of man's ribs. The Creator said, "I lose these, my son and daughter. I will bestow my life upon them," and then breathed a particle of his life into the frame of man and woman, and were men." God made food and drink; rice, fire, and water; cattle, elephants, and birds. Traditions concerning man's primitive state and first transgression, very similar to the Bible narrative, are also preserved amongst them. Noah, who answered the voice of God, is variously impersonated as sometimes male and sometimes female: man is located in a garden, with sev-on different kinds of fruits of which he should eat, with one exception. Nauk'plu meets him and tells him the character of all the fruits, and assures him that the for-bidden one is the most delicious of all. He prevails on the woman first to taste this fruit. She gives it to her husband, etc. On the morrow Yawah (on this name, see, below: Religious Vices) comes, etc. The very detail of the narrative is preserved to a marvellous degree.

Other traditions point to a flood, in which the waters ‘rose and rose till they reached to heaven.’ Others refer to the flood as an event of the human history. ‘Men had at first one father and mother; but, because they did not love each other, they separated, after which they did not know each other’s language, and became enemies and fought.’ Still another says that when they were scattered, a younger brother, or the ‘White Westerner,’ came, begging the Karens to return to the place where they left God; which tradition is said to have had much to do with the early success of the missionaries amongst these people, as the Karens applied these traditions to them.

Religious Vices.—They have remarkably clear views of God, whom they believe to be ‘immortal, eternal; that he was from the beginning of the world. The life of God is endless; generations cannot measure his existence. God is complete and good, and through endless generations will never die. God is omnipotent, but was not omnipotent when he created the world. God created anciently. He has a knowledge of all things to the present time. He created spirit and life.’ This God is known as Yawah, ‘which approaches the word Jehovah as nearly as possible in the Karen language.’ He was not, however, worshipped when the missionaries first went to the Karens. A great power for evil (Satan) since the fall has rendered relief to man by introducing charms against sickness, death, and other misfortunes, and this personage, though without image, is widely worshipped. Thus originated their demon worship. They appear to be believe in the immortality of the soul, though it is doub-ful if this obtains universally amongst them. Mr. Cross doubts if they have any proper idea of the resurrection of the dead. Transmission is not accepted amongst them, and many think the soul ‘dies off in the air.’
They are thus distinguished from the Buddhists, though long resident with them in Bumah.

Spirit Worship.—Besides the Yawah and the demons above alluded to, they believe in many other spiritual beings known as Kelah, or, speaking more definitely, every object has a kelah, whether man, trees, or plants, as well as inanimate objects, such as stones and knives.
The grain growing has its kelah, and when it does not flourish it is because the kelah is leaving it, and it must be called back by invocation. The human kelah is not the soul, nor is the responsibility of human actions lodged in it, nor any moral character attached to it. All this is attributed to the Thah. The kelah is the author of dreams; it is that nature which pertains to life, the sensual soul, the animal spirits. It can leave the body at will. When it is absent disease ensues; when yet longer, death results. Kelah seems to signify life, or animating force, or the internal or the individual. It is more apt to forsake feeble persons and children. The kelah of one person may accompany that of another in going away, hence children are kept away from corps, and the house where a person dies is abandoned. Great efforts are made to induce a departed kelah to return.
Tempting food is placed on the public waysides or in the forest, and various ceremonies and rituals are gone through, which sometimes are thought to be successful in securing the return of the kelah. One might almost wonder that its return should be considered desirable when we are told that the kelah are seven separate existences in which endeavor to supersede madness, recklessness, shamelessness, drinking propensities, anger, cruelty, violence, murder, and are constantly bent on evil. But along with the kelah we learn of Ze, which means power, and seems to be a personification of reason. If the kelah becomes heedless or weak, or is unfortunately circumstanced, then the kelah can do mischief; but otherwise it is powerless for evil.

There are other spiritual beings, such as Kephoo, a species of vampire, which is the stomach of a wizard, and in the form of the host he can eat, and if hunting goes out at night to seek food. It destroys human kelahas. Theretas are spirits of those who have died by violence, as by tigers or other wild beasts, by famine, or sword, or starvation. These can neither go to the upper regions of heaven, nor to that of the Fi, where men are punished, but must remain on earth, as long as a ling mortlal sickness. Offerings and supplications are made to.
Tahmas or Tah-kus are spectres of those who have been dreadfully wicked in this life. They appear as appar-itions only, in form of horses, elephants, dogs, crocodiles, serpents, vultures, ducks, or colossal men. Sthahhas are spirits of persons left unburied, and of infants or aged persons who have become infirm because the teo has left them. Phupho are inhabitants of the infernal region, and are spirits of all who go naturally to their proper place, and renew their earthly employments, budding, shooting rice, cutting rice, etc. Their location is unknown; they are buried, and they live in a world undeclared, but is above the earth, or below it, or beyond the horizon. It is presided over by king Cootay or Thecedo. At his call the kelahas must go, and men die.
Under his dominion they serve, as an intermediate state, while in the mean time they await the coming of the Lerah, which has two gradations of punishment, one being more severe than the other. Tah-nahas or Naahas are the spirits of two sorts of fiends which take the form of any animals they please, and prey upon men. The Lord of men created them as a punishment in consequence of a disobedience on the part of men to one of his commands. They have a king who was the great tempter of man in the garden. Mukkahas are the ancestors of the Karens who inhabit the upper region, and are the creators of the present generation. Sometimes they work imperfectly, and, as a consequence, ill-favored and imperfect persons are found. They preside over births and marriages, mingling together the blood of two persons. They are worshipped with offerings.

The Kelapeko create the winds; the Thah Yoormi cause eclipses; the Corda and Louphay preside over the wet and dry seasons.

Priesthood.—There are amongst the Karens a class of people who serve as prophets, and assume conditions of mind and body much like those affected by the ‘medicine-men’ amongst North American Indians. What they do with words accompanied by bodily gestures, shouting at the mouth, etc., they are presumed to attain a state of clairvoyance favorable to the prediction of coming events. The prophecies uttered by these which are retained in tradition mostly pertain to the deliverance of the Karens from the oppression of the Burmees. These prophets are of two classes. The vres compose ballads and other poetry, and have great power in calling back departed kelahas. The other class are known as book-ho, and are rather priests than prophets, taking the lead in the religious ceremonies of the people, instructing them in the rules of life, the obligations, and are more respectable classes, being heads of communities, though not hereditary chiefs.

Missions.—Missionary work was commenced amongst these tribes about 1826, by Messrs. Boardman and Judson, who were succeeded by Messrs. Wade, Mason, and Kincade. Twenty-five years ago our present missionary Ko-thau-Ba, a native convert, met with wonderful success amongst these people. Associated prominently with this great movement was Rev. Mr. Vinton, who in six years planted forty churches, opened forty-two houses of worship and thirty-two schoolhouses, and saw between eight and nine thousand Karens raise to the level of Christian worshippers. In 1852 alone he received five hundred Karens into the Church. In 1868 the Baptist Mission report showed that they had amongst this people sixty-six native ordained pastors and evangelists; three hundred and forty-six native preachers unordained; three hundred and sixty-two churches; nineteen thousand two hundred and thirty-one church members, and nearly sixty thousand natives" of all ages known as Christians. A writer in the Madras Observer (India) stated that, in Oct. 1868, a gentleman, not in sympathy with the Baptists, but a great traveller, who forming his journeys on foot through Bencoolen while amongst these Karen districts, said that on one occasion "he found himself for seventeen successive nights, at the end of his days' journeys through the forest, in a native Christian village.

Kar'skor (Heb. Karkor', כּרָקֹר, foundation; Sept. Kaposis v. τ. Καρκώρ, Vulg. Cireai, Carea), a place situated at a bend in the southern boundary of Judah (I. e., Samaria-Palestine), between Adar and Azmon (Josh. xv. 8); probably about midway between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean, perhaps near the well marked as Bir Abu-Atrebi on Zimmermann's map. Kar'kor (Heb. Karkor', כּרָקֹר, foundation; Sept. Kaposis v. τ. Καρκώρ, Vulg. Cireai, Carea), a place beyond Jordan on the Midianitic border near Zohra and Zalmunna where they had retired with their remaining army after the first rout by Gideon, who pursued and routed them again in its victory (Judg. viii. 10). From the context it appears it has been situated not far beyond Succoth and Peniel, towards the south, in a naturally secure spot east of Nobah and Jogbeath; indications that point to a locality among the southern openings of Jebel Zarka, north-east of Rabban Ammon. Schwarz supposes (Patet. p. 223) that el-Kerak is meant, a place a few miles south-east of Dara or Edrei, in the Hauran; but this is too far distant north-east. Eusebius' comparison (Onom. vi. 17) between the castle-Carei (Carea) of el-Kerak and Gideon shows that one day's journey distant from Petra, is equally foreign; and this may be the modern Kerak of Moab. See KEKATH.

Kari-Borromaeus Union, a Roman Catholic association in Rhenish Prussia, formed for the purpose of effecting in Roman Catholic society the same results for which the Gustavus Adolphus Society of the Protestant Church was founded. Perhaps, in a measure, it was intended to oppose any inroads of the Protestant association among the Roman Catholics. It originated in 1844, and makes it special object to circulate at large the literary productions of Roman Catholics. The society publishes a monthly journal, and occasionally works of a religious character written in popular form. See Katholische Real-Encyclopaedie, x1, 835.

Karmathians (so called from Abu Said Al-Jenabi, surnamed Al-Karmathia) is the name of a Mohammedan sect which originated in the 9th century, under the caliphate of Al-Mu'izz. Strictly speaking, the Karmathians were Shiites (q. v.); see also ISMAILI, for Karmathia, their founder, was one of the missionaries in the province of Kufa, appointed by one of the apostles (Hussein Abhari) of Ahmed, the successor of Abdallah Ibn-Malum, who flourished about the middle of the 9th century, and who first gave character to the Ismailian. It was he likewise who projected and prepared the way for a union of the Arabic conquerors, and the many races that had been subjected since Mohammed's death, and the enthronement of which later was called "Pure Reason" as the sole deity for worship. With an extraordinary knowledge of the human heart and human weakness, he found a way to attract the high and the low. To the believer he offered devotion; liberty, if not license, to the "free in spirit" philosophy to the "strong-minded!" mystical hopes to the fanatics; miracles to the masses. To the Jews he offered a Messiah, to the Christians a Paraclete, to the Moslems a Mahdi, and to the Persian and Syrian "pagans" a philosophical thelogy. The results of his exertions, so practical in tendency, were truly wonderful, and at one time it seemed as if Mohammedanism was doomed. It was soon persecuted by the authorities, and, driven from place to place, finally he died in Selamia, in Syria, leaving the work he had so successfully begun to his son, Ahmed. This Ahmed, profiting by the experience of his father, carried on the work of conversion somewhat secretly; at least he did not dare to assume publicly the claims of an imam, as his father had done. He sent missionaries, however, to different parts of the country to gain adherents for this extinct religion. God did not have to do so, for the messengers clung all the more fervently to it. God’s decree had certainly permitted all these indignities to be put upon his house, but it was not for them to murmur. The stone gone, they covered the place where it had lain with their kisses.” Whenever Abu Tahir did not prevent them, he would defend, not the precepts of the House, his traditional annual pilgrimage, and Abu Tahir was finally persuaded to conclude a treaty permitting the pilgrimage on payment of five denars for every camel, and seven for every horse. But the black stone, notwithstanding all the efforts on the part of the court of Bagdad, he never returned. (See below.) Abu Tahir himself was a man of great daring, and so infatuated were his men with the personal bravery and divine calling of their leader that they blindly obeyed any demands he made upon them.

Abu Tahir died in 832 of the Hegira, master of Arabia, Syria, and Irak. It was not until seven years later (A.D. 950), under the reign of two of his brothers who had succeeded him, that the “black stone” was returned to Mecca for an enormous ransom, and fixed there, in the seventh pillar of the mosque called Rubbas (in honor of God’s mercy) but with a stipulation that the death of Abu Tahir, the star of the Karmathians, began to wane. Little is heard of them any import till 795, when they were defeated before Kufa—an event which seems to have put an end to their dominion in Irak and Syria. In 878 they were further defeated in battle by Asfar, and their chief killed. They retreated to Lahas, where they fortified themselves; whereupon Asfar marched to Elkatif, took it, and carried away all the baggage, slaves, and animals of the Karmathians of that town, and retired to Basra. This seems to have finally ruined the already weak band of that once formidable power, and nothing further is heard of them in history, although they retained Lahas down to 480, and even later. To our own day there still exists, according to Palgrave, some disaffected remnants of them at Hase (the modern name of their ancient centre and stronghold), and other tracts of the peninsula; and their antagonism against Mohammedanism, which they have utterly abrogated among themselves, so far from being abated, bids fair to break out anew into open rebellion at the first opportunity. Indeed, some of the most trustworthy writers on Eastern history say that the modern sects of the East have followed the Karmathians in their religious belief to the Karmathians (comp. Madden, Turkish Empire, ii, 210).

The religious belief of the Karmathians, so far as it has been preserved to us, seems in the beginning—before Islamism became a mixture of “naturalism” and “materialism” of whibon Sabism, and of Indian incursions and transmigrations of later days—to have only been a kind of “reformed” Islam. Their master Karmath, this sect maintained, had evinced himself to be a true prophet, and had brought a new law into the world. By this many of the Mohammedan tenets were altered, many ancient ceremonies and forms of prayer were changed, and an entirely new kind of fast introduced. Wine was permitted, as well as a few other things which the Koran prohibited, while many of the precepts found in that book were made more allegories. Prayer was abandoned, and the symbol of obedience, instead of scraping him off, and a massacre of the most fearful description ensued. With barbarous irony, he asked the victims what had become of the sacred protection of the place. Every one, they had always been told, was safe and sound, and had had the symbol of obedience on their foreheads. Why was he allowed thus easily to kill them—the race of donkeys? According to some, for six days; to others, for eleven or seventeen, the massacre lasted. The numbers killed within the precincts of the temple itself are variously given. The holy places were desecrated, almost irredeemably. But, not satisfied with this, Abu Tahir laid hands on the supreme palladium, the black stone itself. Yet he was apparently mistaken in his calculations. So far from turning the hearts of the faithful from a worship which was scarcely more than a quirk of fancy, God did not prevent the movement. One of the converts made was our Karmath, who gave new life to this undertaking. He quickly gathered about him a large number of converts, and, successful in securing their confidence, he soon made them the blind instruments of his will. He advocated, according to some authorities, absolute communism, not only of property, but even of wives, and founded one particular colony, consisting of chosen converts, around his own house at Kufa. KART, AARON JACOB, a Lutheran minister, was born in August, 1794, in Missouri. He dedicated himself to the service of the Lord, and, with a view to enter the Christian ministry, became a student in the institution at Gettysburg in the autumn of 1837, and was graduated from Pennsylvania College in 1842, and from the theological seminary in 1844. After his graduation he preached at the Lutheran Church at Pine Grove, Pa.; thence he removed to Canton, Ohio. In 1848 he took charge of the English Lutheran Church in Savannah, Georgia. Here he labored, enjoying the confidence of his people and the respect of the whole community, till his physical strength gave way, and advancing disease compelled him to suspend the exercise of his office. His congregation suggested a trip to foreign lands. They provided the expenses for the journey, and supplied for the pulpit during his absence. He traveled through France, Italy, Germany, and Holland, and his impressions derived no advantage from the tour, and he returned to his native country only to close his life surrounded by the tender sympathies of loved ones at home. He died at Chicago, Ill., Dec. 19, 1860. Karn was an able preacher and an excellent man. His ministry was fruitful in good results. During the prevalence of the yellow fever in Savannah in 1854 and 1856, he continued at his post, exhausting his time and his strength in ministering to the suffering and the dying, not only of his own congregation, but to others who were not in connection with any Church, amid scenes the most distressing and heart-rending. His baptismal records and registers in the sick and in the burial of the dead. It is supposed his physical constitution sustained an injury from the influences of the epidemic from which he never recovered. (M. L. S.)

Karnkowski, Stanislaus, a celebrated Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Bland in 1526. Of his early life nothing is known to us. In 1568 he was made bishop of Wladislaw, and became coadjutor to the archbishop of Gaeacen in 1571, and in 1581 sole occupant of the archbishopric and primate of Poland. In the civil history of Poland Karnkowski played no unimportant part. King Stefan (Batory) was crowned by him (May 1, 1576), immediately after the death of the king. Karnkowski himself assumed the reins of government until a royal successor was found in the person of the Swedish crown prince Sigismund, whom he also crowned. It is generally supposed that Karnkowski belonged to the Jesuitical order. In Kalisch he built a college for the Jesuits; he also founded two schools for the theological training of Roman Catholics. Under his protection the celebrated Jesuit Jacob Wujek translated the Bible into Polish, a work which to this day remains the only authentic edition in the Polish (Roman Catholic) Church. Karnkowski's will, in his own handwriting, is here recorded: De tunc etiam in aeternum, tunc etiam in infinitum, tunc etiam in sæcula sæculorum, tunc etiam in æternam æternitatem.—De ecclesia utroque; etc. See Wetzer und Welte, Kirchen-Leben, xii, 632.

Karo, Joseph ben-EPHRAIM, a Jewish Rabbi, one of the most celebrated characters in Rabbinic literature, was born in 1596, at Antwerp, of a family of note. Among the great persecutions which the Spanish Jews suffered in the early part of the 16th century, the Karo family were exiled, and settled finally at Nicopolis, in European Turkey. His early Talmudical education Joseph received under the instruction of his own father, and the youth quickly evinced, in the ready acquisition of Talmudic lore, a particular liking for tradition. The Mishna text, it is said, he learned by heart, and before he had reached the age of twenty-five he was accepted as a Talmudical authority. From Nicopolis Joseph removed successively to Adrianople and Salonica. While a resident of these places (about 1592-95) he became acquainted with the great cabalistic fanatic Salomo Molebo of Portugal, and he was finally induced to remove to Safet (q. v.), in Palestine, the great cabalistic centre in the 16th century. There he studied much with the Rabbinical authorities of Palestine, and during the controversy on the Jewish gnostic [see JACOB BERAN] Joseph Karo was one of the four disciples whom Jacob Berab ordained when forced by Levi ben-Chabib to quit the country. See ORDINATION, JEWISH. Previously infatuated with the Cabalistic Mesia sic notions, and now (Jacob Berab died January, 1541, shortly after quitting Palestine) one of the four Rabbis ordained by the only authority competent to perform the sacred rite, he became satisfied that he was divinely chosen for some important mission, perhaps even the Messiahship itself. (He believed, says Grätz [see below], that he would die and be again raised up to become the leader of the nation.) Ever since 1522 he had been engaged in writing an extensive religious and ritual code, entitled חסיד וחסיד (Besh Joseph, first published at Saltomos, 1553, 4 vols. folio), a revision, correction, and enlargement of a like work by Asher; he now completed the compilation of this gigantic undertaking in the hope that its publication would lead his people to assign him at once the place to which he believed himself divinely called. He completed the work in 1542, but it gained for him only the recognition of being one of the ablest rabbis of Safet. Unremitt antly he continued his labors, determined to bring about the result which he believed to be his mission—the union of Israel—and with it hasten the days of the Messiah. In the 16th century the Talmud was exten sively studied among the Jews. Every important con gregation sustained not only a rabbi, but a college. Thus many lucrative positions were open to men inclined to study, and there resulted a general interest in the study of the Talmud. But many students imitate many interpreters, and thus it came that, after a time, each congregation and even every member of a college, had their own interpretation of the Talmudical precept, and Jewish orthodoxy was at a loss how to judge rightly. Joseph, comprehending the danger of a general division and a loose interpretation, determined to meet the case by a compilation of rabbinical law and usages, i. e. codification of the Talmudic literature on which the Talmud had received at the hands of the most distinguished teachers in Israel. At first he simply subjected his former work to a general supervision, which he completed after twelve years of hard labor. Finding, however, that this did not quite accomplish the desired result, he set about writing a new work, and after nine years of intense application presented his peo ple with a compendium of rabbinical law and usage, enti tled בעל נבואה (Shulchan Aruk, first published at Venice, 1565), which to this day remains a rabbinical authority. His name now became celebrated in all lands where Jews made their abode, and at Safet itself (which reaped the greatest fruit of his labors), he had been rec corded the place of first authority, as a worthy successor of Jacob Berab. See, however, the article MOSES DE TRAHU. He died in 1575. One result Karo's labors had at least effected—the harmony of all Israelites in expounding the law through the Talmud—the estab lishment of Rabbinical Judaism—after this, the Jewish religion from that revealed through Moses at Mount Sinai, foretold by the prophets, and taught by Moses Maimonides. For a long time the Shulchan Aruk was the text-book in all the Jewish schools, the accepted interpretation of the Talmud. Many of the editions that have been published of it, legions the schol ars who have commented upon it. Karo's other work of note which deserves mention here is צמח עץ (Mishne), a commentary on Maimonides's יד יחציתא, which Kartah (Heb. Kartuk, אֵרְקַת, city: Sept. Kap-šôv v. r. Kârôq), a town in the tribe of Zebulen, assigned, with its suburbs, as one of the places of residence for the Levites of the family of Merari (Josh. xxii, 54).

It is there mentioned between Jokneam and Dinnah, the fourth city named being Nahalal; but the parallel passage (1 Chron. vi, 77) gives but two cities, and these different, namely, Rimmon and Tabor, the first of these being probably a preferable reading for Dinnah, and the latter a collective for two others, Jokneam being in the same connection (ver. 98) separately attributed to the latter from its junction with wady Melek; the ruins being on the tell Haretagh, on the opposite side of the river (Narrative, i, 289).

Kartan (Heb. Kartan, בָּרְקָת, double city, an old dual from בָּרְקָת; Sept. Кαρτάν v. r. Καρτάν and Нαυ-μων, a town of Naphtali, assigned to the Gereshonite Levites, and appointed to be one of the cities of refuge (Josh. xii, 32). In the parallel passage (1 Chron. vi, 78) it is called by the equivalent name of Kirjathaim.

The associated names suggest the probability of some locality near the north-western shore of the Sea of Tiberias, perhaps the ruined village marked as el-Katatam on Van de Velde’s map, on wady Furam, about midway between Lake Tiberias and the Huleh.

Kartikeya is the name of the Hindu Mars, or god of war, who is represented by the Puranic legends as the bedding-ground from Siva of the most miraculous fashion. The germ of Kartikeya having fallen into the Ganges, it was on the banks of this river, in a meadow of Sara grass, that the offspring of Siva arose; and as it happened that he was seen by six nymphs, the Krittikas (the Pleiades), the child assumed six faces, to receive nurture from each. Growth up, he fulfilled his mission in killing Tāraka, the demon-king, whose power, acquired by penances and austerities, threatened the very existence of the gods. He accomplished, besides, other heroic deeds in his battles with the giants, and became the commander-in-chief of the divine armies. Having been brought up by the Krittikas, he is called Kiritkeya, or Shānamātura, the son of six mothers; and, from the circumstances adverted to, he bears also the names of Gāmpere, the son of the Ganges; Sarabād, reared in Sara grass; Skamsukka, the god with the six faces, etc. One of his common appellations is Kumārī, youthful, since he is generally represented as a fine youth; and, as he is riding on a peacock, he sometimes embraces the epithet of Sīkhirāhama, or “the god whose the peacock.”

Kasimir, Nr. prince of Poland, noted in the annals of the Catholic Church for his great piety and asceticism, born in October, 1458, took no unimportant part in the efforts of the royal house of Poland to secure the throne of Hungary. Quite consistently with his saintly profession, he marched at the head of a large army towards the borders of Hungary in 1471. On his return, after the declaration of pope Sixtus IV in favor of the deposed king of Hungary, Kasimir practised even greater austerity than before; and died March 4, 1483, at Wilno, in Lithuania. Kasimir was canonized in 1522 by pope Leo X, and he is looked upon as the patron saint of Poland. See POLAND.

Katerkamp, Johann Theodor Hermann, an eminent Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Ochtrup, near Münster, Germany, Jan. 17, 1764; studied theology at Münster, and subsequently (1809) became professor of Church History in his alma mater. He had been ordained priest in 1787, and in 1825 he was appointed in the year 1821 dean of the cathedral at Münster. He died July 8, 1834. Katerkamp’s principal work is his Kirchengesch. (of which the introduction was published in 1819; and five volumes, bringing the work down to the second Crusade, from 1823-34, 8vo).

Kathenotheinem (καθενόθεια, each one a god) is a term devised by Prof. Max Muller (Rig Veda, i, 164, 480) to designate the doctrine of divine unity in diversity as unfolded in the sacred writings of the Hindus. He rejects the term polytheism on the ground that the Hindus, in their worship, ever ascribe to one god the attributes of all the others. Thus in one hymn, ascribed to Manu, the poet says, "Among you, O gods, there is none that is small, none that is young: you are all great in deed." . . . "And what more could a πολυθεῖον be able to achieve," asks the professor, "in trying to express the idea of a divine and supreme power? . . . This is surely not what is commonly understood by polytheism. Yet it would be equally wrong to call it monothelism. If we must have a name for it, I should call it Kathenotheism." (Chips, i, 26). See also Tyler, Primitive Culture (London, 1871, 2 vols. 8vo), ii, 821. (J. H. W.)

Kathismokta (καθισμόκτα, σιτίνη) is a name which, in the early Church, according to Suicer, was applied to certain parts of holy Scripture, because, during the reading of them, the people stood. Other portions of Scripture were entitled elēgōv (standinga), because, during the reading of them, the people stood. It was usual in the early Church for all worshippers to stand during the reading of the gospels and the singing of the psalms.

Katona, Eneriz, of Abasuvay, a Hungarian Protestant controversialist, was born at Ufalon in 1572. He became rector of the college of Szepesi in 1598, but reigned but a month. He studied theology at the University of Heidelberg for two years and a half, and then returned to his country. He became successively rector of Pa- tak (in 1599), preacher at the court of George Ra- goz, prince of Transylvania, pastor of Szepesi, Goene- zin, and Karestus; and died Oct. 22, 1610. He wrote De libero Arbitrio, contra theses Andreae Starofii; Ant. papamut; Tractatus de Patrum, concionium et traditum Auctoriale circa sivea dogmata, cultus idem moraesque vierrimi (Francfort, 1611, 8vo, with a Life of the author by Pareus). Kastōth (Heb. Kastoth, גַּסְתּוֹת, small, for גַּסָּתָה; Sept. Kastōth v. r. Kastōth), one of the cities of Zebu- ulon, mentioned first in a list of towns apparently along the southern border from Mount Tabor westerly (Josh. xix, 15); and (notwithstanding the slight difference in radical) probably the same with the KARTAH (q. v.) of Josh. xxi, 94; perhaps also with KTITON (Judg. i, 21). See Dillmann, Atlas zu B. J. Seh. of the Talmud through the Talmud, seeks to identify it with Cana of Galilee.

Kātyāyana is a name of great distinction in the history of the literature of India, especially the ritual and grammatical literature of the Brahmanical Hindus, which has been greatly enriched by a writer or writers of that name. Katayama is also the name of several of the chief disciples of the Buddha Sakyamuni.

Kautz, Jacob, an eminent German theologian prominent in the Anabaptist movement of the 16th century, was born at Bockenheim, Hesse Cassel, about 1500. He was a preacher at Worms when, in 1527, he identified himself with the Denk-Kerker movement in forming a strong opposition against infant baptism. Previously to this time, Kautz had estranged himself from the Lutheran reformers by his anti-Trinitarian heresies; now he openly broke with them, and went over to the Anabaptist movement. He was an Anabaptist. He published seven theses in defence of his peculiar views (comp. Arnold, Ketzerristoris, i, 68), and for the day of Pentecost invited the Lutheran ministers to public discussion. Although yet a young man, he had already obtained great celebrity as a public speaker, and no doubt took this course in order to increase the number of his followers. But the theses of Kautz were so decidedly opposed to Lutheran Christology and dogmas that the authorities interfered, incarcerated him, and finally obliged him to quit Worms. Wandering about from place to place, he found himself at Augsburg, then at Regensburg, and in 1528 finally at Strasbourg. Here he succeeded for a time in preaching his heretical doctrines, but in 1529, so great had his fanatical excesses become, that the city authorities felt obliged to interfere, and he was arrested and compelled to leave the city. After losing sight of him, we find him in 1532 again knocking at the gates of the city of Strasbourg, and vainly seeking admission. From this time all traces of him are lost, and neither the time nor the place of his death is known. Kautz was quite intimate with Capito, the eminent coadjutor of the Reformers G场景ampliand and Bucer, and at one time it was even asserted by the Anabaptists that he had succeeded in winning him to their side. Capito, however, does not deserve this reproach. On the contrary, he did all in his power to restrain Kautz in his fanaticism. See Trench, Auctoriandiarum, i, 18 sq.; Keim, in the Jahrb. f. deutsche Theol., i, 271 sq.; Stud. und Krit. 1841, p. 1080 sq. See also Denk; Hitzel. (J. H. W.)

Kay, James, a Unitarian minister, was born at Heap Fold, in Lancashire, England, June 21, 1777, and was reared in the Church of England. At the age of seventeen, however, he became a dissenter, and at once prepared to enter the ministry. In 1799 he was dismissed from a Calvinist congregation in Kendal, Westmoreland, but he resigned this charge in 1810, and, with about one third of his congregation, joined the Unitarians, and two years later became pastor of a Unitarian congregation at Hindley, Lancashire. In 1821 he emigrated to this country, but never succeeded in securing work. He died Sept. 22, 1847, at Trout Run, Pa. "He fell asleep with the accents of a devout faith on his lips, and, we doubt not, with the trustful spirit of a disciple in his heart." — Christian Examiner, 1848, p. 157.

Kaye, John (1), D.D., an English divine, was born at Hammersmith, London, in 1785, and was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge (graduated in 1804 with high honor and distinction). In 1814 he was elected master of his college, and afterwards filled the office of vice-chancellor. In 1816 he was chosen regius professor of divinity, and in 1820 became bishop of Bristol; was translated to Lincoln in 1827, and died in 1833. Besides his professional labors, Kaye did a great deal of literary work. Many of his writings are of special value, characterized as they are by clearness and precision, by accuracy and fairness, combined with the necessary flexibility, so thinking mind can fail to be enriched by them. His principal writings are: Historical History of the 2d and 3d Centuries, illustrated from the Writings of Tertullian (Camb. 2d ed. 1826, 8vo; 3d ed. 1845); Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Justin Martyr (London. 2d ed. 1836, 8vo; 3d ed. 1853); A Charge delivered at the primary Visitation in 1836 (Camb. 1828, 8vo); A Charge to the Clergy, delivered at the triennial Visitation in 1843 (London, 1843, 8vo). He also published some anonymous Remarks on Dr. Wiseman's Lectures, and a Reply to the Travels of an Irish Roman Catholic Polemic, the gentleman Allibone, Dict. of Authors, s. v.; London Gentleman's Magazine, 1858 (April, May, and August). Keach, Benjamin, an eminent English Baptist divine, was born at Stokeham, Buckinghamshire, Feb. 25, 1646. He does not appear to have followed any regular course of study; his parents were so poor that they could not aid him in a collegiate education. He paid particular attention to the Scriptures. In 1658 he became a preacher, and in 1668 was chosen pastor of a congregation in Southwark, of which he had for three years previously been a member. After the Restoration he suffered in common with all nonconformists, and fled from the country, where the persecutions were unbearable, to the metropolis. Here he became pastor of a small society, which met in a private house in Tooley Street. Successful as a minister, he soon moved his fast-increasing flock to a church built at one time of wood, and then of brick, in 1670 to a large new church in Horsley Down, Southwark. He died July 18, 1704. Keach belonged to the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, and was considered a man of great piety and learning. His principal works are: Prophesiosa, Answer to the Mediator Metaphors (London, 1682; best edition 1773, fol.—very scarce; and reprinted in 1836, 8vo)—The Marrow of true Justification, or Justification without Works (London, 1692, 4to)—The Aze laid to the Root, or one more Blow at the Foundation of infant Baptism and Church-membership (London, 1698, 4to)—Light broke forth to Wales (London, 1696, 8vo; an answer to Mr. James Owen's book, entitled Children's Baptism from Heaven)—The Display of glorious Grace, in 14 Sermons [on Isa. lv, 10] (London, 1698, 8vo)—Gospel Mysteries Unveiled, or an Exposition of all the Parables, etc. (London, 1701, fol.; 1856, royal 8vo)—Mingled with unquestioned reverence for the divine Word, and much good material of which the judicious student may avail himself with advantage, there is a large share of fanciful exposition and of unwise spiritualizing" [Kittto]—A Golden Mine opened, or the glory of God's rich mercy in the more dispensations (London, 1894, 4to)—The French Impostor detected, or Zach. Housal tried by the Word of God, etc. (London, 1703, 12mo)—Believer's Baptism, wherein the chief arguments for infant baptism are collected and combated (London, 1706, 8vo)—The Travels of Thomas and a Tract of Unitarianism, after the manner of Bunyan's (often reprinted); also with Notes and Memoirs of the author, by the Rev. Howard Malcolm (N. Y. 1831, 18mo)—Exposition of the Parables (London, 1704, fol.). Keach also figured in his day as a hymnologist, but his sacred songs were rather mediocrity. Keating, Geoffrey, an Irish divine and historian, flourished in the early part of the 17th century (died about 1625, or somewhat later). He is noted as the author of a great history of Ireland, in which the ecclesiastical history of that country is treated in detail. It was translated into English by Dermot O'Conor (London, 1728, fol.; Westm. 1726, fol.; 1738, fol.; Dubl. 1809, 2 vols. 8vo; 1811, 8vo).—Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, a. v.

Keblah is a term by which the Mohammedans designate the direction towards which they are commanded to turn their faces in their devotions. "At first," says Sale (Koran, p. 17), "Mohammed and his followers observed no particular rite in turning their faces towards any certain place or quarter of the world when they prayed, it being declared to be perfectly indifferent. Afterwards, when the prophet fled to Medina, in direct opposition to the will of Jerusalem [probably to ingratiate himself with the Jews], which continued to be their Kebelah for six or seven months; but, either finding the Jews too intractable, or despairing of otherwise gaining the pagan Arabs, who could not forget the example of the day before, he turned towards the north, and took with him prayers for the future should be towards the last. This change was made in the second year of the Hegira, and occasioned many to fall from him, taking offence at his inconstancy. See Kaaba.

Kebie, John, the sweetest and most Christian poet of his age, was born in Falmouth, Cornwall, on May 25, 1792. His father was a clergyman of the Church of England. He was educated at Corpus Christi College, and at the age of forty years was called to the cure of the parish of St. Alwina, and lived until his ninetieth year. His mother was the daughter of a clergyman. Thus on both sides he came of a pastoral stock; and it is worthy of note that his only surviving brother, Thomas, like himself became a clergyman (rector of Bisley), that his brother's son also took orders, and that Mr. Kebie himself, like his father, married a clergyman's daughter. Young Kebie was prepared for college by his father, and entered the University of Oxford, and in due time gained himself by a remarkable display of talent and application. When only eighteen, full four years below the customary age for graduating, John Kebie won the highest intellectual rank the University can bestow, that of a "double-first-classman," his name appearing in the first as well as in the second class of mathematics. This distinction had never been achieved up to that time except in the case of Robert Peel. April 20, 1811, wanting a few days of the completion of his nineteenth year, he was elected probationer fellow of Oriel, and took his place at the high table, and in the senior common room of that celebrated college. He latterly entered it with him, and these two were the deemstris to whom all paid an almost obsequious deference. In 1812 he won the prizes for both the bachelors' essays — the English on Translation from Dead Languages, the Latin a comparison of Xenophon and Julius Caesar as Military Chroniclers. In the annals of Corpus twice only has such a triumph been won, one instance that of young Kebie, and the other no less a man than Henry Hart Milman, the late celebrated dean of St. Paul's Cathedral. At the unprecedented age of twenty-two—in deed it was the short of it—it so happened that the University of Oxford one of its public examiners. Thus did Kebie attain a success which we believe has never been equalled for its precocious ability. In 1815 he was ordained deacon, the following year priest, and soon after the first as a tutor, and then as a curate in a re-sided there. He became his father's curate, and lived with him in that capacity nearly twenty years. He turned aside from the numerous paths of ambition which were open to him, and gave himself to parochial work as the employment of his life. In 1835 Kebie's father died. He was now offered and accepted the vicarage of Hurley, and married. His parish was obscure, thirty miles from Oxford. There was not, it is said, a single cultivated family in his charge, so that his labors were altogether among the humbler and poorer classes, but under his indefatigable ministrations it became one of the model parishes of the diocese. In 1857 he became the author of the Christian Year and the Lyra Innocentium that Kebie will be most widely and permanently known. The former was published in 1827. It is probable that most of the poem was written at Oxford. Its success was so great that a second edition was published in 1828, and the hundred editions of the first have been sold. Of course Kebie might have realized a fortune from the sale of this extraordinary book; but in this, as in everything else, he showed his disinterestedness. When, in 1838, Kebie came to Hurley, he found a church not at all to his mind. It is described as a plain and anything but beautiful building of flint and rubble. He at once determined to have a new one built, and, in order to carry out this project, he employed the profits of the last edition of the Christian Year; and when the building was finished, his friends, in token of their respect for him, filled all the windows with stained glass. On Friday, the 6th of April, 1866, he was buried in the church-yard of Hurley, where he had officiated as minister for nearly thirty years. It was on the 29th of March, 1866, that he died. On the eve of a great Christian observance, he, the singer of Christian observations, passed away to rest his character. The Kebie's poetry may be surmised from his life and opinions; it is gentle, sweet, devotional, and highly cultivated; it translates religious sentiment of the most spiritual kind, the exclusively Hebrew dialect into the language of modern feeling. A deep tone of home affection runs through all his poems. The highest culture of which man is capable, and the most refined thought in him, had not weakened, but only made natural affection more pious and intense. Never, perhaps, except in the case of George Herbert, has a character of such rare and saintly beauty concurred with a poetic gift and power of poetic expression of the highest order. John Kebie is noted also as the leader of the original band of Oxford scholars and divines who began the spiritual movement in the English Church. He contributed to the famous Tracts for the Times (1834-1836), and it is to Kebie's influence over Newman that the latter ascribes his conversion to Romanism, dating it from July 14, 1858, when Kebie preached his sermon on the Roman Apostasy. He was one of the editors of the Biblische Patrum Ecclesiae Catholicae (begun in 1838). His works are, On Translation from the Dead Languages (an Oxford Prize Essay, 1812; Oxuf. 1812) — The Christian Year: thoughts in verse for the Sundays and holy days throughout the year (1827, 2 vols.; 56th ed. 1852, 2 vols.) — The Child's Christian Year (4th ed. 1841, 1vo) — Primitive Tradition recognized in Holy Scripture; a Sermon (on 2 Tim. i, 14; 4th ed., with a Postscript and Catenia Patrum [No. 3 of the Tracts of the Times], 1839, 18mo; originally published [1837] as No. 78 of the Oxford Tracts for the Times) — The Pilgrim and Paulina of David, in English Verse (1839, sm. 8vo; 3d ed. 1840, 18mo) — Selections from Richard Hooker (1839, 18mo; 2d ed. 1848, 18mo) — an edition of Hooker's Works — Prelectorum Academicae Oronii Habita (1842-43, 2 vols. 8vo; 1844-45, 2 vols. 8vo) — Good Friday, a Lecture on Thoughts on Verse, on Children, their Ways and their Privileges (1846, sm. 8vo, Anon.) — Sermons Academici and Occasional (1847, 8vo; 2d ed. 1848, 8vo) — A very few plain Thoughts on the proposed Addition of Dissenters to the University of Oxford (written from his position as High-Brown, 1848). Keckermann, Bartholomaeus, a reformed German theologian, was born at Danzig in 1571, and educated at Wittenberg, Leipsic, and Heidelberg. In the last place he became professor of the Hebrew language about 1592. In 1602 he accepted the rectorate of the gymnasium at Danzig, where he died August 25, 1609. Keckermann wrote many theological and philosophical works, the principal of which are: Proefenomakon (Berlin, 1615, 4to), and Rhetorica Ecclesiastica (Hanau, 1600, 1618, 8vo). These are circulated very extensively, and prove him to have been a writer of great originality and ability. He argued in behalf of a separate ecclesiastical order for the priests and theologians. On the other hand, it is a misfortune to Christianity such as scholasticism had caused, and in his Systema Ethicus (ibid. 1610, 8vo) he pleads for the separation of ethics, as a philosophical science, from theology; the latter, he argues, must confine itself to the inner religious life, the former to the "boum circle" (Opera, ii, 285 sq.). In view of these, his own teachings, it is unjust to classify this writer, as some have done, among the originators of Protestant scholasticism. Of value, also, are Kockerman's speculations on the Trinity (comp. Baur, „Dvě víry a jedna světelná“, iii, 306 sq.). His works have been published entire (Opera Omsia) at Geneva in 1614. See Herzog, „Real-Encyklopädie“, iv, 463.

KEDRON

Kedron was introduced as the birthplace of Tobias. The text is exceedingly corrupt, but some little support is lent to this reading by the Vulgate, which, although omitting Kedesh, mentions Saced—post viscum qua duci a ad Occidentem, in siniasto habens civilitant Saphech.

"The name Kedesh exists much farther north than the possessions of Naphthali would appear to have extended, belonging to a lake of considerable size on the Orontes, a few miles south of Hums, the ancient Enessa (Thomson, in Ritter, Dacmacus, p. 1002 sq.); the lake was well known under that name to the Arabic geographers, see, besides the authorities quoted by Robinson [iii. 296, new ed.], Abulfeda in Schultens's Index Geographicus; Flavius Orontes," and "Kuduanum," and they connect it in part with Alexander the Great. But this and the origin of the name are alike uncertain. At the lower end of the lake is an island which, as already remarked, is possibly the site of Kedesh, the capture of which by Sisaios I is preserved in the records of that Egyptian king." (Smith).

Keel, Tyrlens, was the earliest native Method- olist itinerant in Canada. He first appears in the Minutes of 1795 on the Bay of Quinte Circuit. "He proceeded to the Canadian Chronicle of the Church, "a good and faithful minister of Christ." He labored about twelve years in the itinerant work, and then retired into the local ranks, compelled by the growing necessities of his family to resort to other means of support. He did not, however, abandon his Sabbath labors, but continued to preach at his own home. After his family grew up and were able to provide for themselves, he extended his efforts to greater distances from home, carrying the Gospel to the distant settlements of immigrants beyond the Rideau. He died in the faith. Keeler had no advantages of early education; he had, however, endowments, natural and of divine bestowment. His person was commanding, and his voice clear, melodious, and strong. His spirit and manners were the most bland and engaging, and his zeal and fervor knew no bounds and suffered no abatement.

Keeling, Isaac, an English Wesleyan minister of note, was born in the latter half of the last century, and entered the ministry in 1811, but it was not until after many years of hard labor that he rose to any prominence. In 1848 he was elected president of the Conference; shortly after his health began to fail, and he was obliged to relinquish his ministerial responsibilities. He died in 1869. "Mr. Keeling was sagacious, discriminating, cautious, profound, and intensely original. His sermons were models of pure diction, exact thought, luminous arrangement, careful definition, and varied instructiveness. He was a man of retiring habits and cold exterior, but he had a warm heart, and a keen relish of the pleasures of friendship."

Keene, Edmund, D.D., an English prelate, and native of Lynn, Norfolk, was born in 1718. He became master of Peter House in 1748, bishop of Chester in 1752, and was thence transferred to Ely in 1770. He died in 1780. He delivered five Occasional Sermons (1748, 1755, 1757, 1757, 1757).

Keeper, in his widest sense, corresponds to the Heb. בְּנִים, son, Gr. γενέας; in a special sense to בְּנִים, a watchman, as often rendered; בְּנִים, is a shepherd; while בְּנִים, is a guard over prisoners. These words are frequent occurrence, besides others in certain peculiar senses or combinations, the meaning being clear from the connection.

Kehel‘ath, or, rather, Kehel‘lah (Heb. Kehel‘lah), בְּנִים, assembly, only with יִמָּנָה, יִמָּנָה, 28 Kedesh‘akdah, Septuag. Μακελοθ, Vulg. Geothes), the twenty-third station of the Israelites in the desert, between Rimnah and Mt. Shapher (Num. xxxix, 22, 29); perhaps at the mouth of wady el-Hasana, west of Jebel Achmer. See EXODE.

Keil, Karl August Gottlieb, an eminent German theologian, was born at Gosenhain, near Dresden, Saxony, April 23, 1754, and was educated at Leipzig University. Three years after graduation he obtained a privilege as tutor at his alma mater, and at once opened a course of lectures on exegesis and hermeneutics. In 1785 he was appointed professor extraordinary of philosophy, in 1786 professor extraordinary of theology, and in 1786 was finally promoted to the full or ordinary professorship. He died at Leipzig April 22, 1834. His works, especially those which are Systematische Verzeichnis derjenigen theologischen Schriften d. Krenzels allgemein wichtig und nützlich ist (Stendel, 1783, 1792, 1806);—De exemplo Christi recte imitandi Dissert. (Lpz. 1792, 4to);—De Doctoribus veteris Ecclesiæ culpa corrupta per Flavianum Sententiae theologice interpretate et lectiones biblicæ stirpem (Lpz. 1792, Schiöller, 1798, + Latin by Hempel);—Lehrbuch der Hermeneutik d. N. T. nach Grundzügen d. grammatisch-historischen Interpre- tation (Leipzig, 1810, 8vo; Latin translation by C. A. G. Emminger, Lpz. 1811, 8vo), a very useful and important contribution to the department of hermeneutics, which he made his specialty, and in which he has justly become very celebrated. After his death his occasional writings were collected by J. D. Goldhorn, and published under the title of Opuscula academica ad N. T. interpretationem grammatico-historicam et theologice Christianam originem (Leipzig, 1821, 2 vols. 8vo). They consist of treatises on topics of hermeneutical interest, this volume contains several exegetical essays, and an elaborate dissertation, De Platonicis philosophis ad theolog. Christ. opus vest. eccles. scriptor a ratione. "Keil," says Prof. W. L. Alexander (in Kitto, Bibl. Cyclop. vol. ii, s. v.), "is a perspicacious writer, and his works, though cold and formal, are full of good sense and solid learning." In connection with H. G. Tischler, Keil also published a theological journal under the title Anzeiten f. d. Studium d. exegetischen u. systematischen Theologie (Leipzig, 1812, 12mo. See Hoefer, New Biog. Gérman, xx, 503; Herzog, Real-Lexikon, v. 504.

Keilah (Heb. Keilah), קִלָּה [in 1 Sam. xxii, 5, 6, proh. cod. "Kilah"; Septuag. Κιλάδα, or Κιλάδα, n. in 1 Sam. xxii, 5, 6, Proh. Cod. "Kilah") in the south of Judah (Josh. xv, 44), bordering on the southern portion of the highlands (see Keil's Comment. ad loc.). It appears to have been founded by Naham the Garmite, brother of Hodiah, one of the wives of Mered (1 Chron. iv, 19). "The Philistines had fallen upon the town at the beginning of the harvest of Ephraim, laid the corn from its threshing-floor, and driven off the cattle (1 Sam. xxii, 1). The prey was recovered by David (ver. 2-5), who remained in the city till the completion of the ingathering. It was then a fortified place, with walls, gates, and bars (1 Sam. xxii, 7, 9, 14, 16). During this time the massacre of Nob was perpetrated, and Keilah became the repository of the sacred ephod, which Abiathar the priest, the sole survivor, had carried off with him (ver. 6). But it was not destined long to enjoy the presence of these brave and valorous inhabitants, nor indeed was it entitled to long enjoy such good fortune, for the inhabitants soon plotted David's betrayal to Saul, then on his road to besiege the place. Of this intention David was warned by divine intimation. He therefore left (1 Sam. xxiii, 7-18). It will be observed that the name "Vostii" is used by David to denote the inhabitants of Keilah in this passage (ver. 1, 12; A. V. 'men'), possibly pointing to the existence of Cananeites in the place" (Smith). See Baal. Kellaiah was so considerable a city in the time of Nehemiah as to have two prefects, and was mentioned as one of the places on the reconstruction of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 17, 18), and existed in the days of Eusebius and Jerome, who place it eight (the former, s. v. καὶ Ἰδρα, less correctly, seventy) Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Hebron (see Pusey, p. 605). Hebron itself is called Cilla (Kīlāa, Ant. viii. 18, 1). The prophet Habakkuk is said to have been buried here (Sozomen, Hist. vii. 29; Nicephorus, Hist. xii. 48), but see Hooke.

The above notices all point to a locality at a fork of wady el-Farari, a little N. of Idnah (Jedna), "where on the height of a hill to the S.W. of the town is a stone tower" (Robinson, Researches, ii, 473), which Van de Velde learned at Hebron still was called Kellah (Memoir, p. 828). This is confirmed by Toliher (Dritte Wanderung, p. 150 sq.), although he remarks (p. 467) that Van de Velde, on the first edition of his Mose, had placed it too far south (S.E. of Idnah). A writer in Fairbairn's Dictionary (s. v.) argues in favor of the locality of Khauecii-Lebh (see Rimmer), but this is utterly out of the required region, being in the Simeonitish portion of the tribe. See Judah.

Keir, George (1582-1639), a Presbyterian minister, was born at Buckleyvye, Stirlingshire, Scotland, Feb. 2, 1770, educated at the University of Glasgow, studied theology under Rev. A. Bruce, professor of theology in the General Associate Synod, and was licensed at Glasgow in 1607. In 1608 he was appointed missionary to Nova Scotia, B. P., whither he immediately proceeded. In the spring of 1609 he preached at Halifax and Merigomish, and later took charge of the societies at Princetown and St. Peter's, Prince Edward Island, and in June, 1610, was ordained and installed as pastor, which position he held for nearly fifty years. In addition to his pastoral duties he filled the position of professor of theology in the Presbytery of Nova Scotia, to which he was appointed in 1643. He died Sept. 22, 1658. "Mr. Keir, as a lecturer, left upon the minds of the students a deep impression of the duties and responsibilities of the sacred office."—Wilson's Preb. Hist. Aintearn, 1855-56, p. 294.

Keith, George, the noted leader of a faction of the Quakers, was born of Presbyterian parentage, in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1638. He was a man of superior intellect, who enjoyed the advantages of a superior education, not only in the University of Edinburgh, but in the National Church of Scotland, but also at the University of Aberdeen. In the year 1664 he came as a minister from the south of Scotland to his friends in Aberdeen, and, adopting the views of the Quakers, was involved in controversy. In consequence, having been imprisoned, he fled to London to escape the persecution of that persecuted people. He wrote and published several tracts in vindication and explanation of the principles of that respectable body of Christians, and in 1675 was engaged with the celebrated Robert Barclay in a dispute with the students of the University of Aberdeen in defence of the Quaker doctrines. He also, about this time, with William Penn, George Whiting, and Stephen Crip, engaged in a discussion with the Baptists in London. About the year 1682 he removed to England, and took charge of a school at Edinburgh, established by the Society of Friends. He was soon persecuted, however, for preaching and teaching without a license, and refusing to take the oath, was committed to jail. In 1684 he removed to London, but was imprisoned five months in Newgate for nonconformity. After his liberation he emigrated to New Jersey, and was there appointed pastor of a church in Barnegat, N. J. He took a very active part in determining the boundary-line between East and West Jersey. In 1689 he removed to Philadelphia, where he took charge of a Friends' school, a liberal salary, but resigned his position at the end of the school year, and travelled in N. E. England, and, in the following year, visited London, where he conducted a theological conversation with the religious professors. He is noted for his defence at this time of the Quaker tenets against Incease and Cotton Mather. On his return to Philadelphia he became involved in a controversy with his own denominations on the question of discipline and church government. He charged them with doing away, by allegory, with the narrative of the real sufferings of Christ, and consequently the doctrine of a real atonement. He also suspected them of being infected with the spirit of Deism. Penn, being in his home time in London, recommended John Turner, a justice in Philadelphia, in which he defends "honest Geo. Keith and his Patiotic studies," but afterwards, becoming acquainted with the merits of the dispute, decided against Keith. Keith returned to London, where he soon came in collision with Penn himself. A quarrel ensued, and Penn having read an extract from the text "Christ's Son cleanseth us from all sin," his exposition being strictly orthodox on their principles, namely, that "the blood is the life, and the life is the light within them," Keith took up the subject, and showed that "sin was cleansed by the blood of the true Christ actually shed on Calvary." Penn is reported to have started from his seat, and, as he himself afterwards stated in the annual meeting, being "so transported by the power of God that he was carried out of himself, and did not know whether he was sitting, or standing, or on his knees," he desired forthwith that this apostate, Keith, should be delivered over to him to be tried as an apostate, over the head of the tree. The great body followed Penn, and Keith was condemned by an edict of the annual meeting. He was not, however, in his own defence, but denounced the society as Deists, and was subsequently allowed to prove it (see Keith's Deism of William Penn, and Mosheim, vol. v. cent. xvii. ch. iv, sect. ii, part ii), and formed a society of his own, known as Christian Quakers, Baptist Quakers, or Keithians (q. v.). Still dissatisfied, he finally entered the Church of England, and became a regular priest. In the years 1702, 1703, 1704, he performed an important and successful mission on the American continent, under the care of the Episcopal Society for propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. He was especially successful in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Seven hundred Quakers were through his instrumentality converted from Quakerism and baptized (see Humphry's History of the Quakers, Lond. A.D. 1730; Christian Observer, April, 1816). Returning to England, in 1706 he was appointed rector of Estburton, in Sussex, and there died about 1715. Bishop Burnet, who was educated with Keith at the University of Aberdeen, in his History of his Own Times (1700, ii, 144), says that Keith "was esteemed the most learned man that ever was in that sect; he was well versed both in the Oriental tongues, in philosophy and mathematics." Keith wrote a great many theological tracts, and was very zealous in directing against the Quakers, for a list of which see Watts, Bibl. Brit. The most important of all is The Standard of the Quakers examined (Lond. 1702, 8vo), which is a refutation of Barclay's Apology. See Janney, History of the Friends (Philad. 1867, 4 vols 12mo), iii, 71 sq. (E. de F.)

Keith, Isaac Stockton, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Newton, Pa., Jan. 29, 1750, graduated at Princeton College in 1775, entered the ministry in 1778, and was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian church in Alexandria in 1780. In 1788 he went to Charleston, Sc., to organize the Congregational church in that city, and at the same time engaged in the study of medicine. In 1792 he entered the ministry of the General Association of Georgia. In 1794 he became a member of the Society of Friends, and was elected a delegate to the annual meeting of the Society of Friends in Alexandria, where he became professor of pulpit eloquence and pastoral theology there, and in 1827 was made D.D. by his alma mater. For upwards of twenty years he continued to discharge his duties, when his mind became unstrung in regard to his salvation, and the cloud was removed by death Sept. 3, 1842. He published a Translation from the German of Hengstenberg's Christology of the Old Testament (Alexandria, D. C., 1836, 3 vols. 8vo). See Sprague, Amanti, vol. 629.

Keith, Robert, primus bishop in the Scotch Episcopal Church, was born at Uras, Kirkcudbright, in 1681. He studied at the University of Aberdeen, and in 1718 became pastor of a congregation in Edinburgh. In 1727 he was ordained bishop of Caithness, Orkney, and in 1738 became bishop of Fife. He died in 1757. His principal works are, History of the Affairs of Church and State in Scotland from the beginning of the Reformation to the Restoration of Queen Mary into England, anno 1608 (Edinb. 1734, fol.);—Historical Catalogue of the Scotch Bishops down to the Year 1688, etc. (Edinb. 1755, 4to; new ed. 1784, 8vo).—Chambers and Thomson's Biography, Dict. of Eminent Scotmen, iii, 305; Hook, Eccles. Biog. vi, 397.

Keith, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Easton, Mass., Sept. 15, 1776, entered the itinerancy in 1798, withdrew from the connection in 1803, and returned to it in 1805. He became a traveling missionary. In 1809 he was stationed in New York, where he died, Sept. 7, 1810. He was a man of fine abilities, of comprehensive mind, and logical power. His piety was deep and sincere, and his preaching talents elocution and always useful.—Minutes of Conference.

Keithiana, a party which separated from the Quakers in Pennsylvania in the year 1691. They were headed by the famous George Keith (q. v.), from whom they derived their name. Those who persisted in their separation, after their leader deserted them, practiced baptism, but received the Lord's Supper. This party was the last one in the United States. Keithianism was pronounced by an unqualified body of clergy to have retained the language, dress, and manner of the Quakers.

Kel'ītah [some Kel'ītah] (Hebrew Kelītāh, n'k'ly-ūth, dārīf; Sept. Kell, John, a Reformed Presbyterian minister, a native of South Carolina, was educated in the University of Glasgow, Scotland, and, with a view to enter the ministry, he pursued a theological course of study under the direction of the late Rev. John McMillan, then professor of theology in the Reformed Church of Scotland. On his return to this country he was ordained and installed pastor at Beech Woods, Ohio, which he left a few years later, to become pastor at Princeton, Indiana, a charge held by him for more than 20 years. He died Nov. 6, 1842. "Mr. Kell was ardent in temperament, and by constitution and habit generous. He was never neutral in the cause which he believed to be right, and, while zealous, he was liberal. Strict in regard to himself, towards others he was indulgent."—Wilson, Presb. Hist., 1864, 279.

Keller, Benjamin, D. D., a prominent minister of the Lutheran Church, was born in Lancaster, Pa., March 4, 1794. Under the faithful ministry of Rev. Dr. H. E. Muhlenberg, he made a public profession of religion, and from that time felt an earnest desire to devote himself to the work of preaching the Gospel. His classical course he pursued under the direction of Rev. Dr. D. F. Scheffer, of Frederick, Md.; his theological studies with his pastor, Dr. Muhlenberg. In 1814, before he had reached his 21st year, he was commissioned by the Synod of Pennsylvania to preach. His first charge was Carlisle, Pa. He subsequently labored in Germantown, Pa., Gettysburg, and Philadelphia, and in each charge he was pre-eminent as a pastor. For a season he was most successfully engaged as general agent of the Parent Education Society, and at a later period his services were secured by the Synod of Pennsylvania in its efforts to endow a German professorship in the institution at Gettysburg. By his uniting devotion to the work, his perseverance and tact, the object was readily attained. For some years he was also engaged in the work of the Lutheran Publication Society, in a general agency and superintendence of its interests. He died July 2, 1864, after a service of fifty years in the Gospel ministry. (M. L. S.)

Keller, Emanuel, a Lutheran minister, was born at Harrisburg, Pa., Sept. 30, 1801. Blessed with pious and faithful parents, his thoughts and desires were early shaped to the profession of the ministerial dignity. He studied theology and languages, and in 1828 was ordained at Dickinson College, Carlisle, and the study of divinity under the instruction of his pastor, Rev. Dr. Geo. Lochman. In 1828 he was inducted into the sacred office. He labored in the ministry successively at Manchester, Md., and Mechanicaps, Pa.; at the latter place he died. April 11, 1852, because the poor man of the earth the Church mourned for one of her most useful and devoted ministers. Through his direct and personal instrumentality a large number of individuals were introduced into the ministry. (M. L. S.)

Keller, Ezra, D.D., an eminent minister of the Lutheran Church, was born in Middletown Valley, Md., June 12, 1799. When young he was apprenticed to a bookseller, but his love for the profession of the Gospel was such as to cause him to leave the trade. He was licensed to preach the Gospel, the most formidable obstacles could not deter him from his purpose. While at Pennsylvania College (he graduated in 1835) he began the study of theology, and then entered the seminary at Gettysburg. After his licensure to preach he devoted himself for a season to the arduous work of an itinerant missionary for the Western States. In this work he was very successful, especially as he preached in German as well as English. Subsequently he was engaged in the pastoral work, first at Taneytown, Md., and then at Hagerstown. His residence at both places was very efficient. In 1844 he accepted the presidency of Wittenberg College, Springfield, Ohio, a literary and theological school called into existence to meet the wants of the Lutheran Church in the West, a position for which he was re- garded as admirably fitted. At the time of his death few men in the Church gave greater promise of extensive and permanent influence. Ezra Keller died Dec. 29, 1848. He received the degree of D.D. from Jefferson College in 1845. (M. L. S.)

Keller, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, the son of Benjamin Keller, was born in Carlisle, Pa., April 19, 1819; he graduated at Pennsylvania College in 1838, and studied theology at the seminary in Gettysburg. For a brief season he engaged in the work of teaching at Wayneborough, Pa., but was licensed to preach in 1842; and having received a unanimous call to Trinity College, Princeton, N.J., he entered upon the duties assigned him as an assistant to Rev. Dr. Miller. On the death of Dr. Miller in 1850, St. James's Church was organized, of which he became pastor. This congregation, with others in the vicinity, he continued to serve with a fidelity and a diligence that never faltered, till his death, March 18, 1864. (M. L. S.)

Keller (Cellarius), Jacob, a German Jew, was born at Säckingen, in Swabia, in 1568, and entered the Jesuitical order when only twenty years old. He gained an unenviable notoriety by his controversies with Protestants; most prominent among them is his public dispute with Jacob Heilbrunner. The Jesuits claim that Keller silenced the Protestant, but evangelical writers all deny the truth of this assertion. Be this as it may, Keller himself became a great favorite in his order, and was honored with a professorship of theology at Regensburg, and later with the rectorate at Munich. He was in great favor also with the duke of Bavaria. Kloze (in Herzog, Real-Encyclop. vii, 508) accuses Keller of having contributed, both in pen and by word of mouth, towards the feeling of hatred which divided Protestants and Romanists just before the Thirty Years' War. Keller died Feb. 23, 1631.

Kellerman, Georo, a celebrated Roman Catholic, was born Oct. 11, 1776, near Munster (Germany), and was educated at the University of Munster and in the Roman Catholic seminary of that place. He was ordained priest Aug. 2, 1801, but did not hold any priestly office until 1811, filling up to this time the position of private tutor in the family of the celebrated count of Solberg, and to Kellerman, no doubt, is due the strong Roman Catholic tendencies of the Solberg family. In 1813, as he was returning from Castile, arrested and imprisoned, those of the professorship of New-Testament exegesis in the Roman Catholic theological school at Munster, which in 1836 he exchanged for those of pastoral theology. December 15, 1846 he was elected bishop of Munster, but resigned the following January after, March 29, 1847.

Kelley, Chas. H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Loggan Co., Ky., 1821; emigrated to Indiana in 1829; was converted in 1836; entered the Indiana Asbury University in 1845, but his health soon failed, and he left; entered the Indiana Conference in 1846; was transferred to the Missouri Conference in 1849, and appointed to St. Joseph station; in 1850 was stationed at St. Louis; in 1851 at Independence; and in 1852 at Logrango Mission. While on this work he was arrested, on Feb. 18, 1853, by a band of ruffians, on a pretended suspicion of his identity with Chas. F. Kelley, who had recently escaped from the state-prison at Fort Madison. Thither he was forced on a stormy night, and though the state officers instantly set him at liberty, the outrage and exposure of the eighteen hours he was in the hands of the mob threw his feeble system into sickness, and he died shortly after, Sept. 17, 1853. He was a good man, an able and faithful preacher, and much lamented by his countrymen. —Minutes of Conf. V. 1853 (G.T.)

Kells (originally Kielme) is the name of an ancient Irish town in which a very important synod was held A.D. 1152. It was convoked by Papprio ( Paparo?), cardinal priest, and the pope's (Eugenius III) legate, for the formal reception of the Irish Church into the see of Rome. The Church of Ireland, which had been founded A.D. 439, remained until the close of the 9th century, and even later, almost entirely isolated from the rest of Christendom. Through these long years, bishop Usher says (iv, 325), "All the affairs of the bishops and Church of Ireland were done at home . . . the people and the kings made their requests to the bishops." All this to the Church, in her isolation and poverty, grew from infancy to maturity, following the plain scriptural teachings of her unlettered founder, without perhaps knowing anything of the refinements and innovations which were arising on the Continent. The irruption of the Danes in A.D. 796 brought the Irish Church into closer communion with the Church, into more general communication with continental Europe; and when, towards the close of the 9th century, many of the colonists in Ireland embraced Christianity, their clergy applied to the English, whom they claimed as their kinsman, for ordination, and A.D. 1065, Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, ordained for them Donatus as the bishop of Dublin. On his consecration Donatus made the following declaration: "I, Donatus, bishop of the see of Dublin, in Ireland, do promise canonical obedience to you, O Lanfranc, archbishop of the holy church of Canterbury, and your successors" (Hist. Men of Ireland, i, 255). This was the first promise of fealty on the part of any church in Ireland, and it was made by a foreigner (no native had ever made such a pledge), and gave rise to two Church organizations, the old one founded by St. Olaf, and the new Dublin-Irish Church started by this action of the archbishop of Canterbury. The Synod of Kells was called to bring about a union of the two branches, or, at least, to establish on a permanent basis the claims of Romanism. We cannot tell who composed this celebrated synod at Kells, for from this time forward all the records were in the keeping of the new organization; those of the old were either accidentally or intentionally lost. It is not, however, very probable that the old Irish government of nearly seven hundred years' standing would at once dissolve itself and merge into the new one, whose purposes they had so long resisted. Besides, nearly twenty years afterwards, in A.D. 1170, we find the old Synod of Armagh still in existence, deploring and protesting against the slaughterings and devastations of the English under Henry II, whom the popes had then sent to Ireland to bring the people under canonical conformity." Papprio clearly recognized it as his task to establish a hierarchy where none had ever existed before, and for this purpose he attempted to suppress most of the former Irish bishops, and to create four great archiepiscopal sees—those of Armagh, Cachel, Dublin, and Tuam—by instituting a system of tithes, claiming Peter's power, and requiring conformity in all Church matters "to the one catholic and Roman office." He brought also with him the palliums or investitures from the pope for the four newly-created archiepiscopal sees; the reception of these was regarded as so many pledges of fealty and obedience to the popes of Rome. The public presentation and reception of these badges had long been an object of great solicitude on the part both of Rome and of several of the prominent bishops in England and Ireland; for, in their estimation, until this was done, there seemed to have been something wanting in regard to a full and complete union. All of these measures, as we have seen, were, however, inaugurated and carried forward by the Dano-Irish and a small Romanizing party in Ireland. The native clergy, with few exceptions, actively opposed them had they not looked upon the Danes as mere colonists. To their sorrow, the Irish learned, when too late, that the Roman hierarchy had been successfully established in Ireland by the action of the Synod of Kells. See ancient History of the Irish Church, p. 6. See Ireland. (D. D.)

Kelly, John, a minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, was born at Rocky Creek, Chester District, S. C., in 1772, and was educated abroad (at Glasgow College, Scotland), as was the custom and necessity in his day. His theological studies he pursued under the direction of the Rev. Dr. McMillan, of Stirling, Scotland. He returned to North Carolina in 1809, and at Chocowinity, Pitt County, on June 18, 1809, was licensed to preach. Two years later he was ordained and appointed missionary in the Western States and Territories, and settled finally at Beech Woods, Butler Co., Ohio. He was released from active service in 1837, but continued preaching up to the time of his death, Nov. 5, 1842. "His life was one of piety and usefulness, active and under his faithful ministry many a spot in the wilderness was seen to bud and blossom as the rose."—Sprague, Amala, ix (Ref. Presb.), p. 65.

Kelly, Thomas, was born in Queen County, Ireland, about 1769, and was the son of Judge Kelly, of Keltville. He graduated at the Dublin University with the highest degree in law. He entered the Temple, London, and while there enjoyed the friendship of his celebrated countryman, Edmund Burke, but before the completion of his legal studies, his mind having been strongly exercised upon the subject of religious liberty, he entered upon a course of theological reading, and in 1788 was ordained a clergyman of the Established Church. Kelly became one of the most popular preachers in Dublin, and crowds flocked to his church Sunday after Sunday to listen to his fervent appeals. In 1827, he was elected president of the University of Dublin. He was also skilled in music, and composed a volume of airs for his hymns which were remarkable for their simplicity and sweetness. In October, 1854, while preaching to his own congregation, he was seized with a slight stroke of paralysis, which gradually lessened his strength, till he died May 14, 1855. Mr. Kelly was the author of Andrew Duns, a controversial work on Romanism, and of The Dialogue on Imputed Righteousness, but as a writer he is best known as the author of Hymns on Various Passages of Scripture (the last edition, published in Dublin, 1853, contains seven hundred and sixty-five hymns).

Kelsey, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, born at Tyringham, Mass., Oct. 18, 1782, was converted in 1796, entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1806, and labored with great success. He died in 1840 (?). James Kelsey was a good man, and through a long service was intent on the work of saving the souls of men.

Kelso, George W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Louisa County, Va., in 1815, and emigrated while young to Tennessee. He was educated at the Nashville University, joined the Tennessee Conference in 1835, was transferred to the Virginia Conference in 1843, and died at Richland, Va., Aug. 10, 1845. He was a soul-saved, faithful and very successful minister, not brilliant, but sound and equitable, and very trustworthy in all things.

Kemp, James, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1764, of Presbyterian parentage; graduated at Aberdeen University (Marischal College) in 1786, and the year following came to this country. At first he engaged in teaching, but, finally deciding to join the Episcopal Church, he prepared for the ministry; was ordained by bishop White Dec. 26, 1789, and the year following became rector of Great Choptank parish, Maryland, where he remained for more than twenty years. In 1802 he received from Columbia College the degree of D.D. Two years later he was elected suffragan bishop with bishop Coggins, of Maryland, with the understanding that he was to succeed the latter in case he was the survivor. He was consecrated for this position at New Brunswick, New Jersey, Sept. 1, 1814. The jurisdiction of bishop Kemp was exercised especially over the parishes on the Eastern Shore; in 1816, however, on bishop Coggins's death, the whole diocese came under his charge, and by his prudence and moderation he conducted the church and laity. In 1816 he accepted the provostship of the University of Maryland, and held it until the time of his death, Oct. 28, 1827. (J. H. W.)

Kemp, Thomas Williams, a minister of much promise in the Lutheran Church, was born in Frederick Co., Md., July 23, 1840. He was brought up in a Christian home, and his religious nurture his religious principles were successfully developed, and the foundation of his character laid. His childhood and youth were characterized by an exemption from everything vicious, by unusual sprightliness, and an eager desire for study. For four years he was a pupil of Dr. Mary's (Quaker) School. He subsequently entered Pennsylvania College, and graduated in 1854. He commenced his theological studies under the direction of Drs. Morris, Seiss, and Webster, at the time pastors in Baltimore, and completed them at the seminary in Gettysburg. He was licensed to preach in 1855. For a brief period he was associated with Dr. Stork in the pastoral work in Philadelphia. He subsequently took charge of a Mission Church in Chicago, Illinois, but the climate proving unfavorable to his health, he was obliged to retire from the field. He visited foreign lands, but returned from his pilgrimage to die amid the scenes of his childhood and the embrace of loved ones at home. He passed peacefully away Sept. 15, 1861. (M. L. S.)

Kemp, van der, John Theodore, a Dutch missionary, was born at Rotterdam in 1748, and studied Oriental languages and theology at the University of Leyden, but his graduation was delayed by his entrance in a regiment of dragoons, in which he soon attained the grade of lieutenant. He left the army, however, and turned to the study of medicine at Edinburgh, and in 1751 commenced practicing at Dort; but, in the end, he turned to theology. The loss of his wife and daughter, who were drowned together, so affected him that he devoted himself exclusively to the service of his divine Master. About this time he wrote a work on St. Paul's theodicy (published in 1758), and later he went as a missionary to the Hottentots. Arriving at the Cape of Good Hope, he obtained leave from a Dutch frere king to settle in his states, but was subsequently driven away by the jealousy of the Dutch settlers. Retained at the Cape by governor Jansens until 1806, he was then permitted by the English governor Baird to settle at Batavia, where he lived until his death, at his mission, which he drew up in 1809, does not show him to have been particularly successful in his attempts to civilize the natives. He died at the Cape Dec. 7, 1811. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxix, 359. (J. N. P.)

Kemppe, Stephan, one of the leaders in the German Reformation of the 16th century, the founder of Protestantism in the city of Hamburg, was born towards the close of the 15th century. He was educated at Rostock, and became a Franciscan monk in 1528; but, while on business for his order at Hamburg, he became acquainted with the reformer Joachim Stüter, and soon was himself one of the most enthusiastic preachers of the new religion. To Kemppe belongs the glory, indeed, of the evangelization of Hamburg. One of his ablest assistants in the glorious work was Ziegenhagen (q. v.). In 1528 they had so far gained the upper hand that the Roman Catholics were obliged to leave the city altogether in their hands. In 1529, also, Kemppe aided the good cause of the Lutherans; in fact, wherever, in the immediate neighborhood of the Hanse cities, his assistance was needed to further the reformation movement, it had not to be asked for twice. He died at Hamburg October 23, 1540. He wrote a narrative of the Reformations in Hamburg, which was published by Mayer in Das Evangelische Hamburg (Hamburg, 1593, 12mo).

Kemper, Jackson, D.D., LL.D., first missionary bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, was born at Pleasant Valley, in Dutchess County, New York, Dec. 24, 1759. When about twelve years of age he was sent to the Episcopal Academy, Amherst, Conn., and remained there two years; after that he was put under the charge of Rev. Dr. Barry, a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, at that time one of the most distinguished classical teachers in the country; entered Columbia College in 1805, and graduated in 1809. He began the study of theology under the care of bishop Moore and the clergy of Trinity parish, there being no theological seminaries in those days. As soon as he had reached the age of twenty-five he was ordained deacon at the hands of bishop White, in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, on the second Sunday in Lent, 1811. He was immediately called to the assistantship under bishop White, and held that position till June of 1811, when he accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Norwich. In 1829 he was elected the first missionary bishop of the American Church. His jurisdiction comprised "the North-west." Out of it have been formed the dioceses of Missouri, Indiana, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska. Early in the winter of this year bishop Kemper reached St. Louis, where he took up his residence until he removed to Wisconsin in 1844. Meanwhile (about 1838) he had been elected to the bishopric of Maryland, but this honor he declined, preferring the more burdensome but less honorable position of missionary bishop. In 1847, Wisconsin having been organized into a diocese, the Primary Convention elected bishop Kemper diocesan. This was also declined; but in 1854, being again unanimously elected, he accepted, only upon condition that his acceptance should allow him to remain missionary bishop. The Convention acceded, he resigned his office as missionary bishop, and from that time until his death, May 24, 1870, his labors were confined to the diocese of Wisconsin. He was active in the establishment of a theological seminary within the bounds of his diocese; and when, in 1845, it was founded at Nashotah, Wisconsin, the bishop took up his residence on a farm adjoining.

Kempis, John a, a German monk, brother of Thomas a Kempis (q. v.), was born at Kempen, near Cologne, in 1480. About 1830 he came to Deventer, and was admitted by Gerard Groot among the Brethren of the Common Life. He became successively one of the first members of the Canons Regular of Windesheim in 1505; prior of the Convent of Mariabrunn, near Arnhem, in 1529; and of the new Convent of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwol, in 1299. Here he remained nine years, during which he caused the building, etc., of the convent to be finished. He subsequently directed four other establishments of his order, and died at Zwol, near Arnhem, Nov. 4, 1482. It was John a Kempis who drew up the rules of the chapter of Windesheim, the central establishment of his order. Gerson pronounced his eloquence in the Council of Constance. Kempis, Thomas a (so called from his native place, Kempen, a village in the diocese of Cologne; his family name was Hämerken [Latinized Mallecorus, Little Hammer]), one of the most celebrated mystics and forefathers of the Reformation of the 16th century, was born about 1480. Thomas's parents could ill afford the aspiring youth any superior advantages of education, but, trained by a pious mother, he had early inclined to the priesthood, and, aware of the advantages afforded young persons by the monastic brotherhood known as the Brethren of the Common Life (q. v.), he quitted his parental roof at the age of thirteen to seek further educational advantages than he had enjoyed at his home, under the instruction of the celebrated John Bekehme, then at the head of a school at Deventer, superintended by the "Brethren of the Common Life," and at school, and his life he devoted to the study of Florentius, one of the principal disciples of Gerhard Groot, and the superintendent of the brotherhood, whose protection Thomas was enjoying.

tius, not at low to discover in Thomas' abilities of a high order, embraced every opportunity to draw the pious youth closer to his side, and in 1586 finally offered him a home at his own house, the head-quarters of the brethren, to study and watch more closely the character and inclinations of the youthful stranger. Surrounded by pious companions, Thomas formed with Mount St. Agnes a friendship that lasted the rest of his life. Thomas was soon inclined to a life of asceticism. "Examples," says Thomas a Kempis himself, "are more instructive than words" (Voll. ßioar. xxv, 1, p. 93). Possessed of a boiling mind, and animated by a pious so fervent as to press and, from time to time, shake the best of others, such was the effect produced upon him by the brethren's whole manner of life, that the seven years he spent in the zealous exercise of piety and the prosecution of his studies at the school and brother-house of Deventer were his seven years spent in an actual paradise. About 1400 he petitioned father Florentius for a recommendation to admit him into the convent of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwol, of which his brother John a Kempis (q. v.) was then prior, and with a hearty welcome he entered this monastery as a novice among the regular canons. Strangely enough, however, the vow he was bent upon his vocation, and although both nature and previous education had perfectly adapted him for it, he did not plunge into it without consideration. Debarred even in his youthful zeal, he spent five years in a student's life at the monastery of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwol, in 1299. He was not until about 1413 that he was ordained to the priesthood. Before this ordination he had buried himself, like all worthy disciples of the brotherhood, in the copying of MSS. and in the performance of religious exercises. Now that he was a priest, his chief occupation became the delivery of religious discourses and the duties of the confessional. He continued, however, copying religious MSS. Thomas a Kempis, indeed, applied himself with vigor to this labor, to which he brought a quick eye and a skilful hand. He copied out the whole Bible, a missal, and a multitude of other works, which the monastery of Mount St. Agnes preserved; but, in performing this office, he also practiced the advice of one of the ancients, who, in writing out books, did not only seek by the labor of his hands to gain food for his body, but also to refresh his soul with heavenly nourishment. He was humble, meek, ready to give consolation; fervent in his exhortations and prayers, spiritual, contemplative, and his efforts in this direction have been set in the composition of an original treatise, which to this hour remains one of the most perfect compositions in religious literature, by many considered the most beautiful uninspired production—the Imitation of Christ (see below). In 1425 Thomas was appointed subprior, an office which intrusted to his care the spiritual progress of the brethren and the instruction of novices. A difficulty having occurred between the pope on the one side, and the chapter and nobility of Utrecht on the other, about the election of Rudolph of Diepholz as archbishop, the diocese was put under interdict, and the canons of Mount St. Agnes in 1429 to retire to Lunskerke, in Frieland, and, but returned in 1432, when Thomas became procurator of the convent. But, as the duties of this office appeared to absorb him too much from meditation and his more profitable labors as an author, he was about 1449, resigned in the subpriorate, and, on October 19, 1471, until his death, July 26, 1471. "From the nature of the case, we have little to say of Thomas' cloistered life. Without any considerable disturbance, it flowed on like a limpid brook, reflecting on its calm surface the unclouded heavens. Quiet industry, lonely contemplation, and secret prayer filled up a day that was like another." Among his contemporaries Thomas was eminently distinguished for sanctity and ascetic learning.

Works.—The reputation of a Kempis, however, rests not upon his ascetic character, but rather on the productions of his pen—his sermons, ascetical treatises, pious biographies, letters, and hymns—and from these only one need be selected to claim for him the mastery as a writer. In the first volume of his works, the Life of Christ, there are, for fifteen years, only one short and half as no doubts, and as even its effects have demonstrated it to do, in point of excellence far above all the rest, the purest and most finished production of Thomas; a work which, next to the sacred Scriptures only, has had the largest number of Paraphrases and translations into modern literature, and at any rate, or modern, can furnish an example. In its pages, says Milman (Latin Christianity, vi, 482), “are gathered and concentrated all that is elevating, passionate, profoundly pious in all the older mystics. No book, after the holy Scripture, has been so often reprinted; none translated into so many languages, ancient and modern,” extending even to Greek and Hebrew, or so often retranslated. Sixty distinct versions are enumerated in French alone, and a single collection, formed at Cologne within the present century, comprised, although confessedly incomplete, no fewer than 500 distinct editions. Indeed, it may be somewhat of a surprise to some to learn that this book has had an important influence on the mind of John Wesley and on the origin of Methodism. Wesley published a translation of it, entitled The Christian’s Pattern. It was one of the most important rules by which he lived, and which he himself enunciated, and is still on their catalogue. “It should be,” says one of the most distinguished American Methodistists, “in the hands of every Methodist.”

Strange, indeed, it seems, that the authorship of a work so popular and so widely noted, and of comparatively recent origin, should ever have been a subject of doubt and long controversy. Shortly after the death of Thomas a Kempis a violent dispute arose between the Canons Regular of St. Augustine and the Benedictines, the former claiming De Imitatione Christi as the work of Thomas a Kempis and the latter assigning it to have been the production of the celebrated John Gerson (q. v.), chancellor of the University of Paris, who died in 1429. These two persons were generally cited as its authors until the beginning of the 17th century, when the Spanish Jesuit Manriquez discovered a MS, which credited it to John Gerson, or Gerson, abbe of Vercellin in the early part of the 16th century. Since that time (1604) three competitors have divided the voices of the learned—not alone individuals, but public bodies, universities, religious orders, the Congregation of the Indies, the French Academy; and the assertions of these respective claims have carried into the controversy no trifling amount of polemical acrimony. So much has been written on the subject, especially by French and Netherland antiquaries, that its discussion and bibliographical work would make up quite a little library. Among the French writers the tendency of opinion has been to give the merit of this celebrated work to John Gerson. “Kempis,” argued Messieurs Barther and Leroy, “was an excellent copyist; his copy of the Bible—the labor of fifteen years—was thought a master piece of typography. And he was merely employed in transcribing the work of Gerson, basing their inference mainly on the name and date of an ancient MS of the De Imitatione preserved in the library at Valenciennes. German writers, on the other hand, have always been decidedly in favor of assigning the work to Thomas Kempis and to the discovery by bishop Malon of a MS in the library at Brussels, bearing the name of Thomas a Kempis as author, the Belgians have joined the Germans. The proofs in favor of Thomas a Kempis are thus stated by M. Ernest Gregoire (in Hoeder, Nouv. Biblio. Gen., xxvii, 545 sq.).

A. the Direct Testimony of his Contemporaries.—1. John Buschius, canon regular of the monastery of Windsheim (1420-79), positively declares in his Chronicle of that convent that Thomas wrote the Imitation. As he knew him intimately, and had often occasion to see him, his testimony is important. They were of the same congregation, and Buschius was in the principal convent, where was held the general chapter, in which Thomas, as subprior, took part. Moreover, he resided there for fifteen years, only one year being absent, and half from Mount St. Agnes, where Thomas lived at the same time. It was said by some that the passage referring to Thomas was afterwards added in the chronicle; but a well-authenticated deed, drawn up in 1760, literature, and which also certifies that the subscription of the chronicle of the convent, compiled by Burchius’s own hand contains the passage written in the same hand, with the same ink, and in full, without erasure, insertion, or parenthesis. The same has been proved concerning a MS copy of the Chronicle of Windsheim, written in 1477, and another written in 1478, which was sold at Cologne in 1829. 2. Hermann of Ryd, who wrote in 1454 a description of the convents belonging to the Canons Regular of Windsheim, states as positively as Burchius that Thomas, with whom he was personally acquainted, wrote the Imitation. 3. Gaspard Pfarhein, at the end of his translation of the first three books of the Imitation, written in 1448, declares that it was the work of Kempis. 4. The author of an anonymous biography of Kempis, written before the year 1488, counts the Imitation among the works of Thomas. His testimony is the more valuable, as he had expressly gone to Mount St. Agnes, to learn all he could about Kempis. He justified Kempis from those who had lived with him. 5. Albert of Hordenberg, a disciple of the celebrated Wessel, who was himself a disciple of Thomas, wrote the following decisive passages: “The reputation of the excellent brother Thomas a Kempis attracts many people to him. About that time he was writing the book of the Imitation of Christ, commencing Qui aspiratur me. Wessel used to say that this book first rendered him zealously pius, and decided him to become better acquainted, and even familiar, with master Thomas, so much so that he actually embraced monastic life in the convent of St. Agnes.” again: “The monks of Mount St. Agnes have shown me several writings of the very pious Thomas a Kempis, of whom they have preserved, among others, the truly estimable work of the Imitation of Jesus Christ, to which Wessel owed his taste for theology. The reading of this work lasted a whole year, while yet quite young, to go to Zwolle to study belles-lettres, and to enjoy the friendship of the pious Thomas a Kempis, who was then canon of St. Agnes. Wessel had the highest regard for him, and preferred dwelling there rather than anywhere else. That he was a canon regular, who was a novice of Mount St. Agnes under Renier, which latter had lived there six years with Thomas a Kempis, quotes, in his Rosetum spiritualium exercitiorum, printed in 1491, three passages of the Imitation, naming Kempis as its author. In his Catalogue des homines illustris de la congragation de monseigneur de Windsheim (Windeheim) he names three books of the Imitation, separately, as the work of Thomas.

These various testimonies are all derived from learned and trustworthy men, all of whom, with the exception of one, were personally acquainted with Thomas a Kempis, or with persons who lived with him. They are, moreover, given with a simplicity which shows that they did not consider the question as one at all likely to give rise to controversy. They appear so conclusive that it is hardly necessary to mention other writers of the 15th century who testified to the same effect. Tribula (De Script. Eccles. c. 707) informs us that in his day Kempis was universally considered as the author of the Imitation; and though after 1441 some MSS. and subsequently some editions bore the name of John Gerson, every time that question was raised, the authorship of the 15th century it was decided in favor of Kempis. Thus Peter Schott, canon regular of Strasbourg, in the preface to his edition of the works of John Gerson in 1488, says: “Some treatises are attributed to John Gerson, though well known to have been written by other-fiies; such, for instance, is the work De Contemptu Mus-di, which is proved to have been written by a canon regular called Thomas à Kempis. The publishers of the French translation of the Imitation (Paris, 1483) expressly states that Thomas à Kempis was the author.

The publisher of the Nuremberg edition, 1494, does the same. Finally, Francis of Tollen, successor of Thomas as subprior of Mount St. Agnes, gives the MS. copies of the Imitation in Thomas's own handwriting as a proof against Gerson.

B. Indirect Proofs from the Various MSS. and Editions.—The oldest MS. of the Imitation we now possess is that known as Kirchheim's (in the Bourgogne Library, Brussels, as No. 15,187); it contains only the first three books of the work, but the text is of a high order and a note to the effect that it is the genuine edition is left unexpressed. "Be it remarked that this treatise is the work of a pious and learned man, master Thomas of Mount St. Agnes, and canon regular of Utrecht, called Thomas à Kempis. It was copied from the author's autograph in the diocese of Utrecht in the year 1429, in the central house of the province." Another MS. of the same period was discovered in 1852 [by bishop Müller, of Münster], in the gymnasium of Gadesdonk, near Goch: it contains the first four books of the Imitation: the first he copied in 1425, and the last in 1427. It does not give the name of Gerson, but to say he was the autho-riser of the work is a fact that is attested by the Procanus Regular of Bethlehem, near Dottinham, in the neighborhood of Mount St. Agnes. Among the other MSS. we notice, in the first place, that belonging to the Jesuits of Anvers, who used it in their lectures on the subject and re-respecting the authorship. It is now in the Bourgogne Library, Brussels, as No. 5855-5861. It is all in Thomass's own handwriting, and, besides the first four books of the Imitation, it contains some other treatises of Kemp-isis. It closes with these words: "Finitus et compositus Anno Domini 1441 per manus fratris Thomas Kempen-isis in Monte S. Agnesia prope Zwolana." Some have considered this as a proof that he only copied it, for he had used the same formula concerning the copies of the missal and Bible which he wrote in 1417 and 1488; but it has been ascertained that he used it also in all copies of his own original works. The Bourgogne Library, Brussels, preserves as No. 4585-4587 a MS. of Thomas à Kempis containing a collection of his essays, and which ends as follows: "Anno 1446 finitus et scriptus per manus fratris Thomas Kempenisis, without otherwise naming the name of the other, without even mentioning therefore, proves nothing either for or against the claims of Kempis. But it is worthy of notice that the authorship of the ascetic treatises contained in the Anvers MS. af-ther the four books of the Imitation has always been unanimously ascribed to Kempis, and he would certainly not have put at the head of them the work of another which he had merely copied, or he would be open to the charge of deception. There are other MSS., dated 1441, 1442, 1445, 1447, and 1451, as also seven between 1453 and 1468, which name Kempis as the author of the Imitation. Among the many MSS. of the 15th century which bear no precise date, but testify to this authorship, we shall mention only that of Dalheim, copied by a priest who said a mass for Kempis two months af-ther the latter's death, and that of the canons of St. Marin of Louism, which they received in 1570 from the last remaining member of the congregation of Mount St.
Agnes. It is in Kempis's own handwriting, and contains the first draft of the fourth book of the Imitation—the first he prepared in composing the work. Among the many editions of the Imitation published in the 1441 the name of Gerson is not used, but a very similar, and among these we find the oldest of all, published by Zainer (Agube, 1468-1472).

C. Proofs drawn from the Doctrines held and the Expressions used in the Imitation.—The principles advanced in the Imitation are so perfectly in accord with those held by the founders of the orders proposed of the Breviary of the Common Life, Gerhard Groot, Florentius Radewinns, and John van Heusden. It may even be considered only as a commentary or exposition of their doctrines. In judging it thus, criticism, however, does not detract from the value of this kind of the pièce de force that the kind of piety Groot sought to develop among his disciples, and the latter took the name of decreti. Now, in the Imitation we find some ten places where the expression decreti is used to designate a particular class of persons who applied themselves zealously and ceaselessly to the practice of religious exercises, and to which the author himself belonged. Some eleven other passages, and a whole chapter even, show, moreover, that the book was written for a religious community of which the author was also a member, a fact quite incompatible with the opinion which considers Gerson as the author. We can quote here only three of the most conclusive passages: "Sepe sentimus, ut meliores et puriores in initio conversionis nos fuisse inveniamus, quam post multos anos professionis" (lib. i, ch. 11). "O quantus fervor omnia religiosorum in principiis sua sancte instituuntur, sicut etiam ab urbe et tamen ex deserto quod tam eloquensam nostris praevia fervore" (lib. i, ch. 18). "Suscepi, suscepi de manu tua crucem; portabo et portabo eam usque ad mortem, sicut improsusteni milii. Vere vita boni monachi crux est; sed arx paradisi adstante aeternius, perfessa simul; Jesu nuntiob trinomium. Propter Jesum suscepiinmanu tua crucem; propter Jesum perseveremus in cruce" (lib. iii, ch. 56). Another and strong proof in favor of Kempis is the fact that the principles advanced in those of his treatises the authorship of which has not been contested are precisely the same as are advocated in the Imita-ion. More than twenty chapters in these various three treatises have almost the identical headings of some of the Imitation. Some have accounted for this on the ground of his familiarity with De Imitatione by copyning; but this theory fails to the ground when we consider that in all his other treatises, more than forty in number, he nowhere refers to or quotes the Imitation, which he would not have failed to do if it were the production of some other writer. Next to the general resemble of these productions with regard to their ten-ture and topics, their style is one of the most striking points in their favor. The Imitation consists wholly of a series of separate maxims, pious reflections, advice, axioms, without any special connection of the several parts. A number of MS. copies bear the title Liber sententiarum de Imitatione Christi et spiritu salutaris, and spirituum.

But this is exactly Thomas à Kempis's style. The writer's own description of his manner of writing is evidently that of the author of the Imitation: "Vario etiam sermo et sequentia, nunc locum nunc disputantur, nunc orantur, nunc colloquentur, nunc in propria persona, nunc in pergamina, placido stylo textum praemittere circim flexi." (Prolog. Solilqui A mine). Some object to Kempis on the ground that he was a mere copyist, who spent his life peaceably in a convent, and could not have known so intimately and accurately the yearnings, the sublime outbursts of the human heart which fill every page of the Imitation. We must remark, however, that none of the Canons Regular were mere copyists, as the word is understood in our time, but rather intelligent publishers of the works they copied, and often men of great learning. They compared and corrected the works which came into their hands by the best authorities, and, according to Thomas, their principal occupations were orarre, meditare, studere, scribere. Thomas, as we have seen, was especially intrusted with the instruction of the novices, and, it seems, preached on all these absorbing large and small points. He who seriously studies his own heart, moreover, does not need to go abroad in the world to become thoroughly acquainted with human nature, with its varied struggles, emotions, and yearnings. "I have," says Kempis himself, "everywhere sought rest, and found it only in solitude and among books" (De Imitat. Christi, i, 22, 6, 23, 1 sq.; iii, 84, 1-8). The Imitation, says a writer in the Revue Chrétienne (Feb. 1861), "is a great and good book for those who are not the monks of the monastery of God.

The author, whoever he may be, has sounded the depths of this abyss of love, and the abyss attracts instead of frightening him. In this faith resting on God one feels a passionate casting aside of the things of this world, and a fervent yearning for the realities of a future life.

Another book has been published by assigning the work directly to German ground, and therefore also to Kempis, are the many Germanisms occurring in the Imitation. We shall mention only five, but these are sufficient to show that the writer was thoroughly conversant with German idioms: Coder super; in, which is as common a thing as jacere in, far to depend on; gravitas, for difficulty; leviter, for easily; and, finally, aere exterius, for to know by heart.

This last is a literal translation of the German idiom (unintelligible in any other) and should have been memoriter aere. Some have, on the other hand, pointed out that in the Imitation, but the University of Paris was at that time the centre of theological knowledge, and it is no wonder if some French idioms became current expressions in the schools, while this could not be the case with German, see Gansow.

The other works of Thomas à Kempis, which are all of equal sanctity, especially with the exception of two, have been collected in several editions, none of which, however, is quite complete. Among the most important editions are those of Ketelaer, published at Utrecht a few years after Kempis' death: of Paris (1493, 1520, 1521, 1523, 1549), Nuremberg (1494), Venice (1538, 1568, 1576), Antwerp (1574). That published at the same place in 1600 by the Jesuit Sommaliis is considered the best, though it is not complete; it was reprinted at Antwerp (in 1607 and 1615), at Douay (1635), Cologne (1660, 1728, 1754), etc. A German translation of Kempis' complete works was published by Silber (Vicenza, 1864, 4 vols. 8vo). One of the latest editions was prepared by Krans, Opera Omnia (Treves, 1868, 1860), but the most remarkable modern edition is a Heptaglot, printed at Sulzbach (1857), containing, besides the original, later versions in Italian, Spanish, French, German, English, and Greek. As for the De Imitatione, it has continued in print to the present time in nearly all the languages of the civilized world.

Doctrines.—Supposing, then, that Thomas à Kempis, of whose life and principal work we have just treated, according to the 14th century standards of our age, and as seen in how far his doctrinal views entitle him to prominence in the Christian Church, and to a place among the forerunners of the great Reformation. "It is true that with him (Kempis), in common with all eminent men, a few governing thoughts constitute the kernel of his intellectual being . . . but then . . . what we find in him is practical wisdom . . . sustained by a determinate general tendency of life and spirit." It must be confessed, also, that Thomas' whole theory of Christian life and faith, in so far as we see it developed in his writings, cannot be properly called canonical, for "he draws continually from the great traditional stream." "But," says Ullmann (ii, 132), "even though the material be not to any great extent original, it yet acquires through the individuality of Thomas, compacting it into a beautiful unity, a new soul, something peculiarly lovely, amiable, and fresh, a tone of truth, a cheerfulness, and gentle warmth of heart, by virtue of which it produces quite a peculiar effect.

For a decided inclination to asceticism we always look in characters of the age to which Thomas à Kempis belonged; we do not, therefore, marvel at a delineation of this part of his character, but will treat hastily only his peculiar views on fellowship with God.

"Where," asks he, "can man find that which is truly good, and which enduringly satisfies? Not in the multitude of things which distract, but in the One which collects and unites. For the one does not proceed out of the many, but the many out of the one. That one is the one thing needful, the chief good, and nothing better and higher either exists or can even be conceived.

Comparing the fruits of the creation with the contents of the Word of God, a man is repeatedly told that he becomes anything when in fellowship with him. Whatever is not God is nothing, and should be counted as nothing" (De Imitat. Christi, iii, 82, 1). Here we find Thomas agreeing in words with Eckart of the Brethren of the Free Spirit. Both say God is all and man nothing. But with what difference of method! Instead of making the proposition metaphysically; Thomas understands it morally. "According to Eckart, man only requires to bear in mind his true and eternal nature in order to be himself God; according to Thomas, God, as himself the most perfect person, in the exercise of his grace, from fulness of the blessings that reside in him, is pleased to impart personality to men in order that, although, morally considered, they are themselves nothing, they may through him, and in voluntary fellowship with him, attain to true existence and eternal life. To enter God, according to Eckart, means to become a sort of image of blessedness, and to become one with him, is the basis of all true contentment. But how can two such parties, God and man, the Creator and the creature, be brought together? God is in heaven and man on earth; God is in the unseen world, man in the visible world. Thus, man must, therefore, be mediation—some way in which God comes to man, and man to God, and both unite. This union of man with God depends upon a twofold condition, one negative and the other positive. The negative is that man wholly renounces what can give him no true peace. He must forsake the world, which offers to him such hardship and distress, and whose every pleasure turn into pains; he must detach himself from the creatures, for nothing desites and entangles the heart so much as impure love of them; and only when a man has advanced so far as no longer to seek consolation from any creature does he enjoy God, and find consolation in him; he must, in fine, deny himself, and wholly renounce—be dead to—selfishness and self-love, for whoever loves himself will find, wherever he seeks, only his own little, mean, sinful self, without being able to find God. This last is the hardest of all tasks, and can only be attained by deep and earnest self-acquaintance. But however strictly exercises self-examination will infallibly come to recognise himself in his meanness, littleness, and nonentity, and will be led to the most perfect humility, entire contrition, and ardent longing after God. But even then it remains to be seen how far he has followed the way. For, if he has renounced all this world, and is joying in his own eyes can God become great to him; only when he has emptied himself of all created things can God replenish him with his grace . . . Having condensed his whole doctrine into the short rule, Porta with oil, and then find all, he immediately subjoins, Lord, this is not to work a day, nor a game for children. These few words include all perfection." Here, accordingly, an efficacy must intervene which is superior to human strength. This efficacy is divine love imparting itself to man, and becoming the mediatrix between God and him, between heaven and earth. Love brings together the holy God who dwells in heaven and the sinful creature upon earth, uniting that which is most humble with that which is most exalted. It is the truth that makes man free, but the highest truth is love. Divine love, bringing the man and the creature into union, is God. God天府s love for his love into the heart of man, who thereby acquires liberty, peace, and ability for all good things; and, made partaker of this love, man reckons as worthless all that is less than God, loving God only, and loving himself no more, or, if at all, only for God's sake. He who does not seek himself in anything, but only desires that God may be glorified. He cares not to have joy in himself, but refers all to God, from whom, as their source, all blessings flow, and in whom, as their final end, all saints find a blissful repose" (Ullmann, ii, 140 sqq.).

Naturally enough, Thomas à Kempis shares the notion of his day—that almost the whole medieval period—in reckoning monachism the highest stage of the Christian life, and the monk the perfect Christian. But this is due, first of all, to the high ideal which Thomas had of monachism, and of which he was himself no mean exponent. Amonstrous, therefore, characterizes all that he writes.

Indeed, even a tint of the Pelagianism of the mediaval theology fastens also upon him, and is especially manifest in those of his writings which are devoted to the delineation and recommendation of the monastic life, where the notion of merits plays a not unwarranted part. Monachism, as he sees it, is a religious system, not justification by faith, but reconciliation by love.

It is even true that "Thomas was a strict Catholic, and directly impugned nothing which had received the sanction of the Church," and that "he practiced with great zeal the whole divine worship as it then obtained, and which, as such, appeared to him just what it ought to be. He insists with particular urgency upon what is so characteristically Roman, prayers for the dead offered through the medium of the mass, especially the adoration of the saints, among whom was, of course, the patronage of the Church, his own monastery, and, most of all, the service of Mary, to whom he ascribes so important a share in the divine government of the world as to say of her, "How could a world which is so full of sin endure unless Mary, with the saints in heaven, were daily praying for it?" (De Discipl. Chremat. cap. 55, Spec. Corp. Diat. i, 2, p. 84; and see also Trithemius, De Script. ced. c. 707, p. 164; Specul. Exemplar. Diat. x, § 7). He no less acknowledges the existing hierarchy and ecclesiastical constitution in their whole extent, together with the priesthood in its function of mediating between God and man; but, if he does not attack, neither does he defend or establish, any, in many respects, he may be said, by his negative position, to have not only actually destroyed the influence of the Church, but really to have paved the way for reform. However true it be that Thomas is "literally a reformer," he nevertheless is a reformer, for he desired the same objects as Luther; for the former, like the latter, everywhere insists upon the Christian principles of spirituality and freedom which formed the very basis of the Lutheran Reformation. In the 12th century mysticism was the dominant principle of the Church, but not so the practical mysticism of the 15th century, as exhibited by the Brethren of the Common Life, and especially by Thomas. By this time the tables had turned completely. The position once occupied by scholasticism was now assumed, in a measure, by the Common Life, and was adopted, both consciously and unconsciously, the opponent of the Church: it founded or gave life to the institutions which sent forth the most influential precursor—the very leaders of the great German reform—and in many other respects directly or indirectly exercised a positive influence upon the Reformation. For did not the Brethren of the Common Life labor in many new ways to prepare the way for the great reforms of the 16th century? Who but they afforded religious instruction to the people in their mother tongue, and sought their improvement by every means—educated the young, and circulated the Bible? "And, inasmuch as à Kempis also belongs to that side, inasmuch as he is manifestly anti-scholastic, gives prominence to the religious and moral import of the dogmas, and applies it almost exclusively to the use of the mystical and ascetical life, we must, from the very context, regard him as the opponent of the Church, as the opponent of the Church, and not as the Church, inasmuch as, although an indirect influence on the dissolution of the creed" (Ullmann, ii, 158).

Kemw'el [some Kem'wel] (Heb. Kemwûl, קמע'ל, perhaps helper of God, otherwise assembly of God; Sept. Qum. 858), the name of three men.

2. The name of Abraham's son Nahor, and father of six sons (Gen. xxii, 21), all unknown except the last, Bethuel, who was the father of Laban and Rebekah (Gen. xxiv, 15). B.C. cir. 2050. As the name of Aram, the first-born, is also the Hebrew name of Syria, some commentators have most strangely conceived that the Syrian race was descended from him; but Syria was already people ere he was born, Laban (Gen. xxvii, 5) and Jacob (Deut. xxvii, 5) being both called "Syrians," although neither of them was descended from Kemuel's son Aram. The misconception originated with the Septuagint, which in this case renders בַּעַל תָּא (bâ‘ol 'âm, "father of Aram," by way of Tâkâwân, "father of the Syrians." See ARAM, II.

2. Son of Shiphtan and phylarch of Ephraim, appointed commissioner on behalf of that tribe to partition the land of Canaan (Num. xxxvii, 24). B.C. 1618.

3. A Levite, father of Haashabiah, which latter was one of the royal officers under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 17). B.C. 1014.

Ken, Thomas, D.D., bishop of Bath and Wells, a distinguished nonjuror divine, was born at Berkhamsted, Herts., in July, 1829. From 1855 to 1859 he was a student at Winchester School and New College, Oxford. About 1666 he entered the Church, and became chaplain to bishop Morley, who in 1669 secured for him a prebend in Westminster. In 1674 he visited Rome, and on his return in 1679 was made D.D. About the same time he was appointed to the household of Prince Ormolu; but the strictness of his moral and religious principles having displeased prince William, he soon left Holland, and accompanied lord Dartmouth in his expedition against the pirates of Tangier. On the recommendation of the latter, he was, on their return in 1684, appointed chaplain to Charles II, and knew how to maintain the dignity of his office unspotted in the midst of that monarch's licentious court. It is said that once, as the king was on a visit to Winchester, Ken refused to receive the favorite, Eleonora Gwyn, into his house; the king, however, praised highly the dignity of the prelate's character instead of resenting this refusal, and only remarked, "Miss Gwyn will find other lodgings." In the very same year (1684) Ken was promoted to the bishopric of Bath and Wells. During the reign of James II, when the Church of England seemed threatened with invasions from the popaty, bishop Ken stood forth one of the most zealous guardians of the national Church, stoutly opposing any attempts to introduce popery into Great Britain. He did not, indeed, take an active part in the famous papist controversy which agitated the reign of James II so briskly, but he was far from being unmindful of the danger, and while others worked by their pen, he as actively labored in the pulpit, and boldly took every opportunity to combat the errors of the day. He was an author, and did not hesitate, when the danger of the hour seemed to require it, to set before the royal court its injurious and unmanly politics in ecclesiastical affairs. Some have asserted that bishop Ken was at one time won over to the papal side, either at this time or later in life, but against this assertion speaks his devoted stand in 1688, when he protested energetically against the Edict of Tolerance, and his refusal, when the Declaration of Indulgence was strictly commanded to be read, by virtue of a dispensing power claimed by the king, to comply with the demand of his king. Bishop Ken was one of the seven bishops who signed a petition to the king protesting against the act, and who were imprisoned in the Tower for their insubordination. After the Revolution, however, he proved his steadfastness to his royal master by his refusal to take the oath of obedience to William and Mary, and thereby lost his bishopric. Even his political adversaries, however, could not but respect such conduct, and queen Mary, whose chaplain he had been, provided for him pension. He retired to Longleat, in Wiltshire, and there died, March 19, 1711. Ken was an author, a preacher, and possessed of rare learning and talents. While in the bishopric he published an Exposition of the Church Catechism (London, 1686, 8vo), and Prayers for the Use of Bath and Wells (London, 1686, 12mo, and often). Later he composed a Manual of Prayers (London, 1715, 12mo) — Exposition of the Creed (London, 1682, 12mo, etc.). He also wrote much poetry, which remains popular to this day. His works were first published at London in 1721, in 4 vols. 8vo; also Prose Works (London, 1838, 8vo). See W. L. Bowles, Life of Thomas Ken (London, 1880-81, 2 vols. 8vo); Life of Thomas Ken, by a Londoner (London, 1861, 8vo); Haukina, Life of Ken (1718); Daykinck, Life of Bishop Thomas Ken (N. Ke’nan (1 Chron. i, 2). See CAINAN.

Ke’nath (Heb. Kenath, קְנַּע, possession; Sept. Kênâ), a city of Gilead, contained, with its environs, from the Cannities by Nobah (apparently an associate or relative of Jair), and afterwards called by his name (Num. xxxiii, 42; compare Judg. viii, 11) although in the Revised Version (1 Chron. ii, 25) the figure seems not to be distinguished from the explots of Jair himself, a circumstance that may aid to explain the apparent discrepancy in the number of villages ascribed to the latter. See Jair. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) call it Kenath (Kenâ or Kenat), and reckon it as a part of Arabia (Trachonitica). It is probably the Canatha (Κανάθα) mentioned by Ptolemy (v. 15, and 23) as a city of the Decapolis (v. 16), and also by Josephus (War, i, 19, 2) as being situated in Coele-Syria. In the time of the latter it was inhabited by Arabsians, who defeated the legions led to revenge them by Herod the Great. In the Peutinger Tables it is placed on the road leading from Damascus to Bostra, twenty miles from the latter (Reland, Pol. de 421). It became the seat of a bishopric in the 5th century (Sud. p. 682). All these notices indicate some locality in the Hauran (Auranitaa) (Reland, Pol., p. 681), where Burekhart found, two miles northeast of Suweidah, the ruins of a place called Kummat (Truev, in Syria, p. 83-8), doubtless the same mentioned by Rev. E. Smith (Robinson's Researches, iii, Appendix, p. 157) in the Jebel Hauran (see also Swartzer, Asian p. 295). The present situation is true, is rather that north-easterly for Kenath, which lay not far beyond Jegobehah (Judg. viii, 11), and within the territory of Manassseh (Num. xxxiii, 38-42), but the boundaries of the tribe in this direction seem to have been quite indefinite. See Maassoom. Kenath seems, however, to have been first made by Gesenius in his notes to Burchhardt (A.D. 1823, p. 505). Another Kenawat is marked on Van de Velde's map about ten miles farther to the west. The former place was visited by Porter (Damasus, ii, 87-110), who describes it as "beautifully situated in the midst of oak forests on the western declivities of the mountains of Bashan, twenty miles north of Bozrah. The ruins, which cover a space a mile long and half a mile wide, are among the finest and most interesting east of the Jordan. They consist of temples, palaces, theatres, towers, and a hipped-podrome of the Roman age; one or two churches of early Christian times, and a great number of massive private houses, with stone roofs and stone doors, which were probably built by the ancient Rehiphaim. The city walls are in some places nearly perfect. In front of one of the most beautiful of the temples is a colossal head of Asheroth, a deity which seems to have been worshipped here before the time of Abraham, as one of the chief cities of Bashan was then called Asheroth-Karnaim (Gen. xiv, 9). Kunawat is now occupied by a few families who cultivate learnings to the temple (Handbook for Pilots, p. 512 sq.; comp. Kitter, Pol. and Syr., ii, 931-939; Buckingham, Travels among the Arab Tribes, p. 240).

Ke’naz (Heb. Knez, קְנֶז, hunter; Sept. Knu’z), but in Chron. i, 36 v. Knu’z(i), the name of three or four men.

1. The last named of the sons of Ephraim, Esau's firstborn; he became the chief of one of the petty Edomith tribes of Balaam (Num. xxxvi, 11, 15; 1 Chron. i, 36). B.C. probably 1905. "The descendents of Esau did not settle within the limits of Edom. The Itu means migrated northward to the borders of Damascus; Amalek settled in the desert between Egypt and Palestine; Teman went westward into Arabia. We are justified, therefore, in inferring that Kenaz also may have led his family and followers to a distance from Mount Seir. Forster maintains (Geography of Arabia, i, 43) that the tribe of Kenaz, or Al-Kenaz with the Arabic article prefixed, are identical with the Lekeni or Leenini of Ptolemy, a tribe dwelling near the shores of the Persian Gulf (Geo., vi, 7), and these he would further identify with the Kenaz (properly Anazeh), the largest and most powerful tribe of Bedawin in Arabia. It is possible that the Hebrew Kop may have been changed into the Arabic Ain; in other respects the names are identical. The Kenaz conquer the desert from the Ephrata to Syria, and from Aleppo on the north to the mountains of Nejd on the south. It is said that they can bring into the field 10,000 horsemen and 90,000 camel-riders, and they are lords of a district some 40,000 square miles in area (Burchhardt, Notes on the Bedawins and Wahabys, i sq.); Porter, Hunt for Syria and Pilots, p. 586 sq. (Kito). See KENZITE.

2. Successor of Pinon, and predecessor of Teman among the later Edomitish emirs ("dukes"), who appear to have been contemporary with the Horite kings (Gen. xxxvi, 42; 1 Chron. i, 50). B.C. considerably ante 1600 B.C.

3. The younger brother of Caleb and father of Othniel (afterwards judge), who married Caleb's daughter (Josh. xv, 17; Judg. i, 13); he had also another son, Seirah (1 Chron. iv, 19). B.C. post 1658. On account of this double relationship Caleb is sometimes called a KENZITE (Num. xxxiii, 12; Josh. xiv, 5, 14), whence some have maintained that he was the son rather than brother of Kenaz.

4. Son of Eleah, and grandson of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. iv, 15), where the margin understands even Kenaz, קְנֵז, as a proper name. Kimah. B.C. post 1618.
KENNEDY, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Sherburne, Mass., July 11, 1768, of humble parents. Young Kennedyl labored hard to secure for himself a college education. He entered Washington College, and, with a view to entering the ministry. When about ready to go to college the Revolution broke out, and he entered the army. He finally went to Cambridge University when 25 years old, and graduated in 1782; studied theology under the shadow of the same institution, and settled over the Congregational Church at West, Mass., as an ordained pastor, Nov. 5, 1788. In 1806 Yale College conferred the degree of D.D. on Mr. Kennedy. He died Feb. 15, 1814. He published many of his Sermons (from 1783—1813). Dr. Kennedy "stood high among the clergy of the Western Church by reason of his religious opinions, Dr. James Kennedy says (in Sprague, Annals, viii. 180), he was classed with those who are denominated 'liberal,' and was probably an Arian, though I think he was little disposed either to converse or to preach on controversial subjects."

Kennedy, George (1), D.D., an English Calvinistic divine, who flourished at the middle of the 17th century, was a prebend of Exeter and rector of Bilsland, Cornwall, at the Restoration, when, on account of nonconformity, he was ejected. He died in 1668. He is noted as the author of an able treatise on the Calvinistic faith, entitled A Defence of the Doctrine of Predestination (Lon. 1653, fol.). Another noted work is his reply to John Goodwin, Defence of the Doctrine of the Perseverance of the Saints (Lon. 1654, fol.). See Allibone, Dict. of Amer. and Eng. Authors, ii, s.v.

Kennedy, George (2), a Methodist minister, was born about the year 1815, was converted, with a view of serving his country, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1845 he joined the Southern Church. He was licensed to preach about 1858, and upon the reorganization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Georgia after the war, he was among the first to return to the Northern Church. He was succeeded by deacon by bishop Clark at Murfreesboro, Tenn., and continued to labor as a missionary among his people until the organization of this Conference, when he was received on trial and appointed to Clayton Circuit. In 1868 he was appointed to Clark Chapel, Atlanta, and in 1869 and 1870 to White Water Circuit. He died there April 12, 1871. His dying words, "The gates are open and I must go," give assurance that he passed away as one of the fathers, after a useful and happy life, to the rest that remaineth to the people of God.—Minutes of Conferences, 1871, p. 278.

Kennedy, John, a prominent Quaker, was born in Cokettsch, Eng.; came to America in 1605; was a resident of various places in England when 21 years old, and in 1650 accompanied Daniel Stanton on a religious visit through the northern parts of England. He was active in the work for over sixty years, and encouraged many "to the exercise both of civil and religious duties." He died Jan. 27, 1615.—Janney, Hist. of the Friends, iv, 44 sq.

Kennedy, Bennett, an early Methodist Episcopalian minister, was a native of Mecklenburg Co., Va.; entered the itinerancy in 1789; was stationed at Wilmington in 1802; at Charleston in 1803-4; at Columbia in 1805; residing elder on Camden District in 1806, and died April 5 of that year. The date of his birth is not given, but he was dead young. He was a man of much gravity, piety, and intelligence, and was a studious and skilful preacher of the Word. His ministry was very useful, and his early death was a loss to his Conference and the Church.—Min. of Conferences, i, 156 (G. L. T.)

Kendrick, Mr., was born in Baltimore, Md., Oct. 6, 1775. After teaching school for some time, he finally turned his attention to preaching, and became pastor of the Baptist Church at Poultney, Vt., where he was ordained, May 20, 1802. He had in 1810 been appointed a delegate to the Vermont Association, of which he was a member almost} be so, then the Kenites were the older tribe. They were nomads, and roamed over the country on the northern border of the Sinai peninsula along the eastern shores of the Gulf of Akabah. This region agrees well with the prophetic description of Balaam: "And he looked on the Kenites, and said, Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou puttest thy nest (πτόνος, kēs, alluding to their name) in a rock" (Numb. xxiv, 21). The wild and rocky mountains along the west side of the west side of the Gulf of Akabah, were the home of the Kenites. The connection of Moses with the Kenites, and the friendship shown by that tribe to the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness, had an important influence upon their after history. Whether Moses invited Jethro to accompany him to Palestine; he declined (Numb. x, 29-32), but a portion of the tribe afterwards joined the Israelites, and had assigned to them a region on the southern border of Judah, such as fitted a nomad people (Judg. i, 11). There they had the Israelites on the one side, and the Amalekites on the other, occupying a position similar to that of the Tartar tribes in Persia at the present day. One family of them, separating themselves from their brethren in the south, migrated away to Northern Palestine, and pitched their tents beneath the oak-trees on the undulating plains of the Kinnereth district (Judg. i, 11), where we should translate: "And Heber the Kenite had severed himself from Kain of the children of Hobah, the father-in-law of Moses, and pitched," etc. It was here that Jael, the wife of Heber, their chief, slew Sisera, who had sought refuge in her tent (verse 17-21). It would appear from the narrative that along the Kenite's preserved their old friendly intercourse with the Israelites, they were also at peace with the enemies of Israel— with the Canaanites in the north and the Amalekites in the south. When Saul marched against the Amalekites, the Kenites warned the Kenites to separate themselves from them, for, he said, "Ye showed kindness to all the children of Israel when they came up out of Egypt" (1 Sam. xv, 6). The Kenites still retained their possessions in the south of Judah during the time of David, who made a similar exemption in their case in his fiefdomed attack (1 Sam. xxvii, 10; compare xxx, 20), but we hear no more of them in Scripture history. If it be necessary to look for a literal fulfillment of the sentence of Balaam (Numb. xxiv, 22), we shall best find it in the accounts of the latter days of Jerusalem under Jehoahaz and the Kenite Rechab was so far "wasted" by the invading army of Assyria as to be driven to take refuge within the walls of the city, a step to which we may be sure nothing short of actual extremity could have forced these Children of the Desert. Whether "Ashur carried them away captive" with the other inhabitants we are not told, but it is at least probable.

Josephus gives the name Κηνήτιτης (Ant. v, 5, 4): but in his notice of Saul's expedition (vi, 7, 8) he has τοὺς Σιχημῶν Ἐφραῖος—the form in which he elsewhere gives that of the Shechemites. In the Targums, instead of Kenites we find Skiharim (אֶשֶׁרִים), and the Talmudists generally represent them as an Arabian tribe (Lightfoot, Opera, ii, 429; Reland, Palest., p. 140). The same name is introduced in the Samarit. Vers. before "the Kenite" in Gen. xv, 19 only. Periplus describes the Kenites as holding the country about Petra and Cades (Kadesh), and bordering on the Amalekites (id. Græc. ed. Diodorus, note) on the east. The name has long since disappeared, but probably the old Kenites are represented by some of the nomad tribes that still pasture their flocks on the southern frontier of Palestine. The name of Bu-Kain (abbreviated from Bene el-Kain) is mentioned by Diodorus (i, 53, note) as borne in comparatively modern days by a tribe of the desert; but little or no inference can be drawn from such similarity in names.

emplifying most completely their characteristics—the Bedouin hatred of the restraints of civilization, their fierce determination along the eastern shores of the Gulf of Akabah. This region agrees well with the prophetic description of Balaam: "And he looked on the Kenites, and said, Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou puttest thy nest (πτόνος, kēs, alluding to their name) in a rock" (Numb. xxiv, 21). The wild and rocky mountains along the west side of the Gulf of Akabah, were the home of the Kenites. The connection of Moses with the Kenites, and the friendship shown by that tribe to the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness, had an important influence upon their after history. Whether Moses invited Jethro to accompany him to Palestine; he declined (Numb. x, 29-32), but a portion of the tribe afterwards joined the Israelites, and had assigned to them a region on the southern border of Judah, such as fitted a nomad people (Judg. i, 11). There they had the Israelites on the one side, and the Amalekites on the other, occupying a position similar to that of the Tartar tribes in Persia at the present day. One family of them, separating themselves from their brethren in the south, migrated away to Northern Palestine, and pitched their tents beneath the oak-trees on the undulating plains of the Kinnereth district (Judg. i, 11), where we should translate: "And Heber the Kenite had severed himself from Kain of the children of Hobah, the father-in-law of Moses, and pitched," etc. It was here that Jael, the wife of Heber, their chief, slew Sisera, who had sought refuge in her tent (verse 17-21). It would appear from the narrative that along the Kenite's preserved their old friendly intercourse with the Israelites, they were also at peace with the enemies of Israel—with the Canaanites in the north and the Amalekites in the south. When Saul marched against the Amalekites, the Kenites warned the Kenites to separate themselves from them, for, he said, "Ye showed kindness to all the children of Israel when they came up out of Egypt" (1 Sam. xv, 6). The Kenites still retained their possessions in the south of Judah during the time of David, who made a similar exemption in their case in his fiefdomed attack (1 Sam. xxvii, 10; compare xxx, 20), but we hear no more of them in Scripture history. If it be necessary to look for a literal fulfillment of the sentence of Balaam (Numb. xxiv, 22), we shall best find it in the accounts of the latter days of Jerusalem under Jehoahaz and the Kenite Rechab was so far "wasted" by the invading army of Assyria as to be driven to take refuge within the walls of the city, a step to which we may be sure nothing short of actual extremity could have forced these Children of the Desert. Whether "Ashur carried them away captive" with the other inhabitants we are not told, but it is at least probable.

Josephus gives the name Κηνήτιτης (Ant. v, 5, 4): but in his notice of Saul's expedition (vi, 7, 8) he has τοὺς Σιχημῶν Ἐφραῖος—the form in which he elsewhere gives that of the Shechemites. In the Targums, instead of Kenites we find Skiharim (אֶשֶׁרִים), and the Talmudists generally represent them as an Arabian tribe (Lightfoot, Opera, ii, 429; Reland, Palest., p. 140). The same name is introduced in the Samarit. Vers. before "the Kenite" in Gen. xv, 19 only. Periplus describes the Kenites as holding the country about Petra and Cades (Kadesh), and bordering on the Amalekites (id. Græc. ed. Diodorus, note) on the east. The name has long since disappeared, but probably the old Kenites are represented by some of the nomad tribes that still pasture their flocks on the southern frontier of Palestine. The name of Bu-Kain (abbreviated from Bene el-Kain) is mentioned by Diodorus (i, 53, note) as borne in comparatively modern days by a tribe of the desert; but little or no inference can be drawn from such similarity in names.

The most remarkable development of this people, ex-

Keni'tzite (Heb. קִנֵּיתִי, Keniziti, patronymic from Keniz, the appellation of two races or families.

1. (Sept. Ken'aresta, Vulg. Cenemæi, Auth. Vers. "Kenizites.") Dr. Wells suggests that they were the descendants of Kenaz (Geogr. i, 169). Mr. Forster adopt this view (Geography of Arabia, ii, 45), but it is clearly at variance with the record of the Moslem rabbis. In the words of the covenant made with Abraham were: "Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates, the Kenites, and the Kenizzites," etc, plainly implying that these tribes then occupied the land, whereas Kenaz, the grandson of Esau, was not born for a century and a half after the Kenizites were thus noticed. Forster's idea that the promise to Abraham was proleptical cannot be entertained. Nothing further is known of their origin, which was probably kindred with that of the other tribes enumerated in the same connection. As the name signifies hæter, it may possibly be a general designation of some nomadic tribe. The sacred writer gives no information as to what part of the country they inhabited, but, as they are not mentioned among the tribes of Canaan, they were actually dispersed by the Israelites (Exod. iii, 8; iv, 24; Num. xxxii, 10; Judg. iii, 9), and it is inferred that the Kenizites dwelt beyond the borders of those tribes. The whole country from Egypt to the Euphrates was promised to Abraham (Gen. xv, 18); the country divided by lot among the twelve tribes extended only from Dan to Beersheba, and consequently by far the larger portion of the "land of promise" did not then become the "land of possession," and, indeed, never was occupied by the Israelites, though the conquests of David probably extended over it. Bochart supposes that the Kenizites had become extinct between the times of Abraham and Joshua. It is more probable that they inhabited some part of the Arabian desert on the confines of Syria to which the expeditions of Joshua did not reach (see Bochart, Opera, i, 307). This is the view of the Talmudists, as may be seen in the quotation from their writings given by Lightfoot (Opera, ii, 429).

2. (Sept. Ken' equation, but ἐσωχρωμότως in Numb.: Vulg. Cenemæus, Auth. Vers. "Kenezeit鞄.") An epithet applied to Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (Numb. xxxii, 12; Josh. xiv, 6, 14): probably designating his twofold relation to Caleb and the Kenizzites: see further above under Ed- kvad, xvi, 158). "Ewald maintains that Caleb really belonged to the tribe of the Kenizites, and was an adopted Israelite (Isr. Gesch. i, 298). Prof. Stanley (Lectures on Jewish Church, i, 360) holds the same view, and regards Caleb as of idumean origin, and descended from Kemuz, Easu's grandson. But a careful study of sacred history proves that the Edomites and Israelites had marrying even then, and his history, as far as practicable, to literary pursuits. He was converted, under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Heman Bange, in the John Street Methodist Episcopal Church; was licensed to exhort the year following; joined the New York Conference in 1839; was stationed on Kingston Circuit, 1839; 1843, Bloomingburgh Circuit; 1840, transferred to Philadelphia Conference, and appointed that and the following year at Patterson, N. J.; 1828-29, Newark, N. J.; 1830-31, Wilmington, Del.; 1832, Morristown, N. J.; in 1833, transferred to New York Conference, and stationed in Brooklyn. 1835-36, pastor, in charge of New York East Circuit, embracing all the churches east of Broadway; 1837-38, Newburgh, N. Y.; in 1839, transferred to Philadelphia Conference, and that and the following year stationed at Union Church, Philadelphia; 1841-42, Trinity Church, Philadelphia; 1844, second time at Wilmington, Del.; at the close of his pastoral term the church was divided peacefully, and a new church organized, called St. Paul's, and for the two following years Dr. Kendall was its pastor; 1847-48, again pastor of Union Church, Philadelphia; 1849, Nazareth Church, in that city; 1850, transferred to New York East Conference, and that and the following year was pastor of Pacific Street Church, Brooklyn; 1852-53, returned to Washington Street Church; 1854-55, First Church, New Haven, Conn.; 1856-57, second time to Pacific Street Church, Brooklyn; 1856-59, third time to Washington Street Church, Brooklyn; 1856-51, reappointed to First Church, New Haven, Conn.; 1862, Hartford, Conn.; and in 1863 he was appointed presiding elder of Long Island District, which office he was administering at the time of his decease. The noticeable fact of the record is the number of times Dr. Kendall was returned as pastor to churches that he had previously served. Of the forty years of his ministerial life, twenty-two years, or more than half, were spent in five churches. No fact better attests his long-continued popularity and his power of winning the affections of the people. "A true Episcopalian, a true Episcopalian," says the bishop. Kendall was eminence in his gifts, in his attainments, and in his devotion to his sacred calling, and in the seals God gave to his ministry. In the pulpits he was clear; in the statement of his subject, abundant and most felicitous, clear, and connected, and his discourses and his applications. His oratory was of a high order. Out of the pulpit, the ease and elegance of his manners, the vivacity and spiritfulness of his conversational powers, the tenderness of his sympathy, and the kindness of his conduct towards the afflicted and needy . . . made him a greatly beloved pastor." He died Nov. 13, 1864. —Conference Minutes, 1864, p. 89. (J. H. W.)

Kennedy, B. J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Bolon,Va., Aug. 16, 1808; was converted in 1842; served the Church faithfully as a local preacher until 1860, when he joined the Erie Annual Conference, and filled with great success the pulpits at Beinbridge, Mansfield, Madison, and Hudson successively. He died at Hudson, Ohio, Nov. 30, 1869. The chief elements of Kennedy's power with the people were purity of life, cheerfulness, broad Christian sympathies for fallen humanity, and strong convictions of the saving efficacy of Jesus and his Gospel. He sustained a high position in the history of his Conference.—Christian Advocate (N. Y.), 1870.

Kennedy, William Sloane, a Presbyterian minister (N. S.), was born in Manay, Pa., June 5, 1822; graduated at Western Reserve College in 1846; was licensed by the Cleveland Presbytery in 1848, and soon after in- stallated pastor of the Congregational Church in Bucks- ville, Ohio. Here he labored earnestly for four years. In 1826 he accepted a call to Sandusky, Ohio, where he ministered with great success until his removal to Cin- cinnati in 1855. His work there seemed to promise well, his congregations increased, and his influence was strong; but in the spring of 1860 his health began to fail, and for fourteen months he struggled against disease, preach- ing even the Sabbath before his death. He died July 30, 1861. He was a thorough scholar, a profound theolo- gian, and an instructive and impressive preacher. He wrote Mesianic Prophecies—a History of the Plan of Union—Life of Christ; and Sacred Analogies.—Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862.

Kennel, Philip, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Augusta Co., Va., Oct. 18, 1769; converted in 1793; entered the Methodist College in 1796; and in 1806, on account of ulcerated throat, located and settled in Logan Co., Ky. In June, 1821, he re-entered the itinerancy in the Kentucky Conference, but died on the 6th of the ensuing October. "But his work was done in the appointed limits of time, and when the purpose that he had purposed was accomplished, and his sun went down without a cloud." During his long location his labors were "very extensive and useful." "He was a good preacher, full of faith and of the spirit of Christ."—Minutes of Conferences, i, 399.

Kennett, Basil, an English divine of note, younger brother of the following, was born Oct. 21, 1674, at Post- ling, in Kent; entered Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1691; took the master's degree in 1696, and the year following entered the ministry. In 1706 he was, by the interest of his brother, appointed chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn, where he so soon arrived than he met with great opposition from the papists, and was in danger of the Inquisition. This establishment of a Church of England chaplain was a new thing; and the Italians were so jealous of the Northern heresy that, to give as little offence as possible, he performed the duties of his office with the utmost privacy and caution. But, notwithstanding this, great offense was taken at it, and several attempts were immediately made to prevent Florence and Rome, when both the pope and the court of Inquisition declared their resolution to expel heresy and the public teacher of it from the confines of the holy see, and secret orders were given to apprehend and hurl him across the sea. His felicity and safety is supposed to have been instrumental to some privilege to prisoner, to hurl him alive, or otherwise dispose of him in the severest manner. Upon notice of this design, Dr. New- ton, the English envoy at Florence, interposed his of- fices at that court, where he could obtain no other an- swer but that "he might send for the English preacher; and keep him in his own family as his domestic chap- lain; otherwise, if he presumed to continue at Leghorn, he must take the consequences of it, for, in those matters of religion, the court of Inquisition was superior to all civil powers." When the earl of Sunderland, then secre- tary of state, was informed of this affair, he sent a menacing letter by her majesty's command, and the chaplain was permitted to continue to officiate in safety (Life of Bishop Kennett, p. 33 sq.). In 1718 Kennett's failing health obliged him to quit Leghorn, and he returned to Oxford, to be elected only the year following, president of his college. He died shortly, perhaps, after, either towards the close of 1714 or the opening of 1715. He wrote in the theological department an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed.—Paraphrase on the Psalm. in verse (1706, 5vo); and published shortly before his death a Manual of Sermons on several Occasions (1715, 1716, 1780). He also furnished English translations of I. Puffendorf's Law of Nature and Nations;—2. Pla- cette's Christian Cursit.—8. Goeckes' Pastoral Instructions;—4. Pascal's Thoughts on Religion, to which he pre- fixed an account of the manner in which those thoughts were delivered by the author.—5. Bataille's Pli dei, with an account of his life and writings.—6. The Maturity of Thomas and Isai, from a Latin poem of Mr. Cam- den. Dr. Basil Kennett is said to have been a very amiable man, of exemplary integrity, generosity, and mod- esty. See Dr. Kay's Dictionary, Dict. Engl. and Am. Authors, s. v.; Gen. Dictionary; Hook, Eclog. Biog. vi, 426. (J. H. W.) Kennett, White, D.D., an eminent English prelate and writer, was born at Dover Aug. 10, 1666. He studied at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and while there attracted attention by publishing in 1680 a pamphlet against the Whig party, entitled Letter from a Student at Oxford to a Friend in the Country, in vindication of his Majesty, the Church of England, and the Establishment. Through the influence of Sir William Glynne he was appointed vicar of Abromden, Oxfordshire, in 1684, and obtained a prebend in the church of Peterborough, but returned to Oxford, where he became vice-principal of Edmond Hall, the college to which he became rector in 1689; and was of the number in the Oxford diocese who refused to read the declaration for liberty of conscience. He subsequently (1700) resigned Abromden, and settled in London as minister of St. Botolph's, Aldgate, where he became the boldest champion of the Established Church, and was the re- cessively archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1701, and in 1707 dean of Peterborough, and finally, in 1718, bishop of Peterborough. He died Dec. 19, 1728. Bishop Kennett was a man, as his biographer says, "of incredible dili- gence and application, not only in his youth, but to the very last, the whole disposal of himself being to perpet- ual industry and service, his chiefest recreation being variety of employment." His published works are, according to his biographer's statement, fifty-seven in number, including several single sermons and small tracts; but perhaps not a less striking proof of the indefatigable industry ascribed to him is to be seen in his manuscript collections, mostly in his own hand, now in the Lansdowne department of the British Museum Library of Manuscripts, where from No. 385 to 1042 are all his, and most of them containing matter not incor- porated in any of his printed works. The principal among the latter are: Parochial Antiquities attempted in the History of Ambroden, Burcetce, etc. (Oxford, 1685, 4to; 1818, 4to) Eccleristic. Synods, etc., of the Church of England vindicated from the False Representations, etc. (London, 1720, 4to); Occasional Letters.—To the Subject of English Consecrations (London, 1701, 8vo), and a num- ber of occasional letters and sermons Morituri and Aides delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of Peter- borough, etc. (London, 1729, 4to): On Lay Impropri- orations (see below): Complete History of England (London, 1712, 8 vols., fol.), etc. Bishop Kennett, in 1718, had made a large collection of books, maps, etc., with intent to write A full History of the Propagation of Christianity in the English American Colonies, but, for some reason unknown to us, the plan was never executed. It is to be regretted that the bishop did not carry out the project; to judge from vol. iii of the History of England which he prepared, the contribution would have been valuable to American Church history. In 1860, S. F. Wood and Ed. Baddeley published from bishop Kennett's MSS. his Lay Impropriations (London, 1720). See William Newton, Life of the Right Rev. Kennedy, Padton T., a Methodist Episcopal minis- ter, was born in New Bedford, Mass., Sept. 5, 1810. He embraced religion at the tender age of seven, but gradu- ally lost interest in it and its personal enjoyment until his nineteenth year, when he was restored to the di-vishing favor. He was licensed to preach in 1820; entered Wilfrid Academy, and in 1837 Middlesex University. In 1833 he joined the New England Conference, was appointed to Towson, Md., and in 1833, Hennock; 1833, East Windsor; 1836, Mystic; 1837, North Norwich; 1838-39, Chicopee Falls; 1840-41, Williamantic; 1842, located; 1844, readmitted and sent to Manchester; 1843-46, Mystic Bridge; 1847, Westerly Mission; 1848, Falmouth, Mass.; 1849-50, New London; 1850, New London Central; 1852-55, Sandwich District; 1856-57, North Manchester; 1858-59, Stafford Springs; 1860-61, Allen Street, New Bedford; 1862-65, Sandwich District; 1866-68, New London District. In 1869 he removed to the Baptist City, New York, and started a school, with the prospect of his being the head of the most important and our esteemed in their office, but their labors were attended with success. As a presiding elder, his executive ability gave general satisfaction.

Kenna, A. B., D.D., one of the most eminent Biblical scholars, was born of humble parents at Tones, in Devonshire, England, Apr. 4, 1718. At quite a youthful age he succeeded his father as master of a charity school in his native place, and here continued until 1744, when, having previously given proof of possessing a genius for the liberal arts, he was called into the neighborhood of several gentlemen who interested themselves in his behalf, and opened a subscription to defray his educational expenses, enabled to go to the University of Oxford. He entered at Wadham College, and applied himself to the study of divinity and the Hebrew; with great diligence, and while yet an undergraduate published Two Dissertations: On the Tree of Life in Paradise, with some Observations on the Fall of Man; On the Oblations of Cain and Abel (2 2. 8vo), which came to a second edition in 1747, and procured him the degree of bachelor of arts, and in 1750 the degree of M.A. By the publication of several sermons at this time he acquired additional fame, but his great name is due to his elaborate researches for the improvement of the text of the Hebrew Bible, for which he laid the foundation in 1758. It was in this year that he inaugurated his great undertaking by giving to the public the first volume of his dissertations, entitled The State of the Printed Hebrew Text Respecting the Origin of the Masora, and the First Editions (2 vols. 8vo). In this work he evinces the necessity of the undertaking upon which he had set his heart by refusing the popular notion of the absolute integrity of the Hebrew text. In the first volume he institutes a comparison, based on homonymy, of the various editions and manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible, and maintains that numerous mistakes and interpolations disfigure the sacred Scriptures of the O. T.; in the second volume he vindicates the Samaritan Pentateuch, proves the corruption of the printed copies of the Chaldee paraphrase (the accuracy of which with the text of the O. T. was boasted of as evincing the purity of the latter), gives an account of the Hebrew MSS. supposed at his day to have been extant, and closes with the proposition to institute a collection of existing Hebrew MSS. for the purpose of securing a correct edition of the O.-T. Scriptures in the original; extended the same to the N. T. and maintained the importance of the Hebrew text in the works of Jewish writers, and the importance of the Hebrew text in the works of Jewish writers are likewise subjects of critical inquiry. To the second volume Kennicott added a Dissertation Generalis, in which an account is given of the manuscripts and other authorities collated for the work, and also a history of the Hebrew text from the time of the Babylonian captivity. This dissertation, which the best Biblical scholars regard as able and valuable, was reprinted at Brunswick, Germany, in 1788, under the superintendence of professor Bruns. The faults attaching to this great work of Dr. Kennicott are thus commented on. Davidson (Bibl. Hebr. 1886, p. 188), in his masoreoth (q. v.), states that Kennicott (q. v.) as if it were wholly worthless. In specifying his sources, he is not always consistent or uniform in his method. Some MSS. are only partially examined. Neither was he able to procure us a complete list of the manuscripts from his copies. Where several letters are wanting in MSS., there is no indication ascribing the defect to textual or other reasons. The MSS. corrected by a different hand are rejected without reason. Of Kennicott's MSS. are neglected; they would have contributed to the value of the various readings.
Van der Hooght's text is not accurately given, since the marginal lexis, the vowel points, and the accents, have been left out. The Samaritan text should have been given in Samaritan letters, that readers might see the origin of many of the various readings. The edition wants extracts from ancient versions, which is a serious defect, for no one, at least, reads the M.S. and determining the age, quality, or value, are defective. In applying his copious materials he often errs. He proceeds too much on the assumption that the Masoretic text is corrupt where it differs from the Samaritan Pentateuch and ancient versions, and therefore sets about, not merely to correct it, but to formulate a new text. Yet," Dr. Davidson continues, "there can be no doubt that Kennicott was a most laborious editor. To him belongs the great merit of bringing together a large mass of critical materials. The task of furnishimg such an apparatus, drawn from so many sources scattered through the libraries of many lands, was almost Herculean, and the learned author is entitled to all the praise for its accomplishment." An important Supplement to Kennicott's Hebrew Bible was published by De Rossi, under the title of Variae Lectiones Veteris Testamenti (Parma, 1764, 8vo); 2nd ed., 4to, with notes, 1768. The works of Kennicott and De Rossi are, however, too bulky and expensive for general use. An edition of the Hebrew Bible, containing the most important of the various readings in Kennicott's and De Rossi's volumes, was published by Wetstein and Malmsten in 1768; but the text is incorrectly printed, and the paper is exceedingly bad. A far more correct and elegant edition of the Hebrew Bible, which also contains the most important of Kennicott's and De Rossi's various readings, is that of Jahn (Vienna, 1866, 4 vols. 8vo). Dr. Kennicott, during the progress of this work, resided at Oxford, where he was librarian of the Radcliffe Library after 1767, and canon of Christ Church. He died there Sept. 18, 1783. Kennicott's other works are, The Duty of Thanksgiving for Peace, etc. (Lond. 1749, 8vo)—A Word to the Hutchisonians, etc. (London, 1756, 8vo)—Christian Fortitude: a Sermon in Rom. viii. 37 (Oxford, 1757, 8vo)—A sermon preached before the University of Oxford at St. Mary's Church, May 19, 1755 (Oxford, 1765, 8vo)—Observations on 1 Sam. vi, 19 (Oxford, 1768, 8vo)—Ten Annual Accounts of the Collection of the Hebrew Miss. of the O. Test. 1760-1769 (Oxford, 1770, 8vo)—Critical Essays, or Short Intro, to Hebrew Criticism (London, 1774, 8vo)—Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum, etc. (Oxonii, 1776-80, 2 vols. fol.)—De Interpretatione in Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum, etc. (Epistolae, fac. in Bibliotheca sacra, vol. ii. part ii) (Oxonii, 1777, 8vo)—Editiones Veteris Testamenti Hebraicorum cum varvis lectionibus brevem definition, contra Ephemeridem Coetitumiam criminative (Oxonii, 1782, 8vo)—The Sabbath, a Sermon (Oxonii, 1781, 8vo)—Remarks on select Passages in the O. T., to which are added eight Sermons (Oxonii, 1787, 8vo), of which more than one hundred pages are occupied with a translation of thirty-two psalms and critical notes on the entire book. It is worthy of the author's reputation." See Dr. Paulus, Memorabilia, No. i. p. 191-198; Gent. Magazine, 1768; North Amer. Kennon, Robert Lewis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, born in Granville County, N. C., in 1789, was converted in 1801, entered the South Carolina Conference in 1808, and in 1813 was ordained elder, and located on account of ill health; then studied medicine and practiced as a physician, preaching in his health periods, and as, he has not forfeited his claims to the crown, also a prince, so that he could with propriety be called both.
But in every stage of his divine-human development the Son’s oneness of being and of will with the Father remained, and by this very fact he was in his human teaching and conduct the express image of the invisible God, the personal revealer of him who is the Son of God in the form of human existence. According to this view, the immediate relation of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost did not suffer any change by the laying aside of the divine form of existence on the part of the Son, nor during the time of his existence in human form. Only according to this view also have the words of the incarnate Son of God their full force: “Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me; if not, believe me for the works’ sake.” The words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself, but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doth the works” (John xiv, 10, 11). If it be objected that the really human development of Jesus is inconsistent with or excluded by the continuance of the eternal self-consciousness of the Logos in the incarnation, we answer that this inference does not necessarily follow. There is nothing self-contradictory in the assumption that the incarnate Logos had in his one Ego a consciousness of his twofold nature. Even if we cannot explain how the Logos was conscious of himself as the eternal Son of God, and yet had this self-consciousness only in a human form, yet this is not inconsistent with the fact that he possessed the mediatorial office of the incarnate Logos; he was to know himself according to his absolute divinity and his human development; and if we suppose that of his divine self-consciousness only so much as was necessary for his mediatorial office passed over into his human self-consciousness, this double self-consciousness is in perfect agreement with his purely human life and with his mediatorial office. As to the divine attributes or powers that are connected with the divine self-consciousness, there is nothing self-contradictory in the supposition that these attributes are likewise possessed by the human Jesus, in so far as the powers of human nature, with human self-consciousness, and human volition, if we adopt the above-mentioned relative self-limitation of the divine knowledge and will as necessary for the mediatorial office. But even if by this view of the person-nature of the divine and the human in Christ the metaphysical difficulty should not be fully removed, we would prefer confessing the unfathomable depth of this mystery to any philosophical solution of the problem which we could not fully reconcile with the plain teachings of the Word of God.

One of the most fascinating and most challenging presentations of this self-abnegation on the part of our Lord is that found in Henry Ward Beecher’s Life of Jesus (i, 50), which we here transcribe, omitting its monotlimistion and anthropomorphism: “The divine Spirit came into the world in the likeness of man and was manifest as the Deity of Deity in their full disclosure and power. He came into the world to subject his spirit to that whole discipline and experience through which every man must pass. He veiled his royalty; he folded back, as it were, within himself those inefhible powers which belonged to him as a free spirit in heaven. He went into captivity to himself, wrapping in weakness and forgetfulness his divine energies while he was a babe. ‘Being found in fashion as a man,’ he was subject to that gradual unfolding of his buried powers which belongs to infancy and childhood. ‘And the child grew and was strong in spirit.’ He was subject to the restrictions which hold and hinder common men. He was to come back to himself little by little. Who shall say that God cannot put himself into finite conditions? Though a free spirit God cannot grow, yet as actuated in the flesh he may grow, if all things united with him be restored to their undisturbed glory, he exchanged, at his incarnation and during the time of his sojourn on earth, for his human form of existence, for the form of the servant. Into this his undisturbed glory, however, he re-entered (John xxvi, 5) on his going forth to his Father (John xiv, 28). Also the capacity of the exalted Son of man (Phil. ii, 9). closure of the full power and glory of God's natural attributes, but the manifestation of the love of God, and of his grace, and of his justice, which is the divine heart would submit, in the bearing up of his family of children from animism and passion. The incessant looking for the signs of divine power and of infinite attributes in the earthly life of Jesus, whose mission it was to bring the divine Spirit within the conditions of feeble humanity, is as if one should search a dethroned king in exile for his crown and his sceptre. We are not to look for a glorified, an enthroned Jesus, but for God manifest in the flesh; and in this view the very limitations and seeming discrepancies in a divine life become connected with the whole sublime history of Jesus.

Most theologians, however, will see in this progressive development of Jesus rather the growth of the human faculties as shown by the inward sun of divine life; and in the alternate lights and shades of the Redeemer's career, not much of the circumstances imposed upon the enfranchised Deity by the earthly abode, as the mutual play of the divine and the human natures, now one and now the other specially manifesting itself. Indeed, the theory of a somewhat double consciousness, if we may so express it, or at least an occasional (and in each case a partial) withdrawal of all of the divine cognitions from the human intellect, and thus of the full divine energies from the human will, seems to be required in order to meet the varying aspects under which the compound life of Jesus presents itself in the Gospels. Certainly the conception of the divine Spirit with a mere human body is a bitter heresy, and should be rejected.

Indeed, the "flesh" which the Saviour assumed, in its Scriptural sense, has reference to human nature as such, its mental and spiritual faculties not less than its physical. The problem, therefore, still is to adjust the God to man. This, of course, can only be done by conceiving of the infinite as assuming finite relations, and this, in short, is the meaning of kenosis. See HUMILITAS.

This topic became a subject of controversy in the first part of the 17th century between the theologians of Gesner and those of Tübingen; the former (Menzel and Feuerborn) contending that Christ during his state of earthly humiliation actually directed himself (κινομας proper) of omnipotence, omniscience, etc.; while the latter (Luke Osandier, Theodore Thummius, and Melchior Nicolai) maintained that he still continued to possess these divine attributes, but merely concealed them (κρυφα) from men (see Thummius, De latiinoglogia fvgc loccti, Tübingen, 1623; Nicolai, De ctvnom Catristi, ib. 1622). For details of the controversy, see Herzog, Real-Encyc., vii, 511 sq.; xiv, 766 sqq. On the subject itself, see De Regnum Christi, ii, 29; Schröck, Kirchengesch., iv, 670 sqq.; comp. Bib. Repos., July, 1867, p. 413; Amer. Presb. Rev. July, 1861, p. 551; Meth. Quart. Rev., Jan. 1861, p. 148; April, 1870, p. 291. The treatise of Bodmer, Die Lehre von der Kenosis (Göttingen, 1860), is of a very vague and general character. See CHITOSOLOGY, vol. ii, p. 281, 292.

KENRICK, FRANCIS PATRICK, D.D., an American Roman Catholic prelate of great note, was born in Dublin, Ireland, Dec. 8, 1797, received a classical education in his native city, and in 1815 was sent to Rome to study divinity and philosophy. There he spent two years at the House of the Lazarists, and four years in the College of the Propaganda. He was ordained in 1821, and immediately thereafter came to the United States to assume the charge of an ecclesiastical seminary just starting at Bardstown, Ky. He soon distinguished himself as a pietistic writer, and his Letters of a Father to Omegas, written in defence of the Roman Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist, in reply to attacks by Dr. Blackburn, president of Danville College, Ky., under the signature of "Omegas." On June 6th, 1830, at Bardstown, he was consecrated bishop of that see, and was made coadjutor to the right reverend bishop Connell, of Philadelphia, whom he succeeded in 1842. During his episcopate there occurred the anti-Catholic riots, and by his firmness and promptness of effort his people were prevented from being in any way molested. In 1858, Kenrick was transferred to the archiepiscopal see of Baltimore. In 1852, as "apostolic delegate," he presided over the first plenary council of the United States held at Baltimore, and in 1859 the pope conferred upon him and his successors the "primacy of honor," which gives them precedence over all Roman Catholic prelates in this country. He died at Baltimore July 7, 1863. Archbishop Kenrick was regarded as one of the most learned men and theologians of his creed in this country. He is equally distinguished as a controversialist and a Biblical exegete. He published a series of letters On the Primary of the Holy See and the Authority of General Councils, in reply to bishop Hopkins, of Vermont, subsequently enlarged and reprinted under the title of The Primary of the Apostolic See and the Authority of General Councils, in reply to Dr. Hopkins' End of Controversy Controversied. The works, however, which constitute his chief claim to theological eminence are his Latin treatises on dogmatic theology, Theologia Dogmatica (4 vols. 8vo, Phil. 1869, 1871), and Principles of Moral Theology (1840) an abridgment and revision of the latter, which form a complete course of divinity, and are used as textbooks in nearly all the Roman seminaries of the United States. An enlarged edition of these works has been published both in Belgium and in this country.

This contains many valuable additions, among them a catalogue of the fathers and of theological dissertations, with an accurate description of their genuine works. At the time of his death he was engaged in revising the English translation of the Scriptures, of which the whole of the N. T. and nearly all of the O. T. have been published.

It is illustrated by copies of the Douay Version, and superseded the Douay version in general use." His other works of a sectarian and controversial character are Catholic Doctrine on Justification Explained and Vindicated (12mo, Phil. 1841);--Treatise on Baptism (12mo, New York, 1845). Kenrick was distinguished both for his sagacity and moderation in counsel, "and for his indefatigable efforts in extending the power and influence of his Church." While in Philadelphia "he founded the theological seminary of St. Charles Borromeo, and introduced into his diocese the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, who devote themselves to the care of Magdalen asylums." During the period of our civil war we were unsparing in his loyalty to the Union, and never failed to inculcate obedience to the laws in the face of the opposition of many of his people.—Allibone's Dict. of Authors, a. v.; Appleton's New Amer. Cyclopaedia, x, 186; Annual Register, 1839.

KENT, ABBEY, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in West Brookfield, Mass., May 9, 1780. In 1801 he was licensed as an exhorter, and appointed to Weatherfield Circuit, Vermont; in 1802 he joined on trial the New York Conference, and was appointed to Whitingham Circuit. The following year he became a member of the old New England Conference, and during the thirty-six years succeeding filled appointments at Barnard, Vt.; Athens, Vt.; Lunenburg, Vt.; Asburburnham, Mass.; Salisbury, Mass.; Salem, N. H.; Lynn, Mass.; Bristol, R. I.; New London, Conn.; Nantucket, R. I.; Middleborough, Rochester, Mass.; Chestnut Street, Providence, R. I.; Elm Street, New Bedford, Mass.; Newport, R. I.; Charlestown, An- dock, Mass.; and Erldogtown, Martha's Vineyard. During this period, ill health, brought on by the strain of indefatigable labors upon a naturally delicate constitution, compelled him after a long service (1839) to write The Letters of Clement to Omega, in refutation of calumnies and superannuated relations. In 1814-17 he was presiding elder of the New London district. He was a delegate to the General Conference in New York in 1812, and also in Baltimore in 1816. From the date of his last appointment, in 1929, to his death on Sept. 1, 1860, he was always laboring when his health would permit. He wrote much for Zion's Herald and the Christian Advocate and Journal. His productions were characterized by a clear, concise, unornamental style, freshness of thought, and deep spirituality. Not ostentatious in the expression of his religious convictions and experiences, he claimed personal knowledge of the doctrine of entire sanctification. "Uniformly cheerful, full of hope in Christ, he always was remarkably sedate."—Meth. Minutes for 1861, New York Christian Advocate.

Kent, James, a distinguished English composer of Church music, was born in Winchester in 1700, and at an early age employed as chorister in the cathedral of that city. His talents secured him admittance to the Chapler House of London, where he enjoyed the instruction of the celebrated Dr. Croft. After completing his education, he was chosen organist of Finden, in Northamptonshire, and subsequently was appointed organist of Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1737 he was elected to fill the same situation in the cathedral of his native place, which he accepted and held until 1774. He died in 1776.

Mr. Kent greatly assisted Dr. Boyce in the preparation of his magnificent work, the collection of Cathedral Music, and his services are duly acknowledged by that learned editor. Mr. Kent published a volume of Twelve Sonatas (London, 1773, 4to), among which are, 'Hear my Prayer, When the Son of Man, My Song shall be of Mercy, and others which are favorites with the congregations of English cathedrals. After his decease, a Morning and Evening Service, and Eight Anthems, composed by him for the Winchester choir, were collected and printed by Mr. Corfe, of Salisbury; but the probability is that the author never intended them for publication, as they are not equal to his other published productions. "Mr. Kent was remarkably mild in his disposition, amiable in his manners, exemplary in his conduct, and conscientiously diligent in the discharge of his duties. His performance on the organ was solemn and impressive, and he was by competent judges considered one of the best musicians of the age in which he lived" (Harmonicon). (J. H. W.)

Kentigern, St., a Scottish prelate who flourished toward the close of the 6th century, was actively engaged in the interests of the Christian Church among the natives of Scotland. He was a man of great means and great influence, and he had many active converts while bishop of Glasgow. Bishop Kentigern died about A.D. 600.

Kephar (קֵפָר, village), a frequent prefix to the Heb. name of hamlets or small places in Palestine, as in that here following; and many others mentioned by Roland (Polest. p. 684 sq.) and Schwartz (Polest. p. 115, 119, 150, 177, 177, 177, 177, 190, 200, 201, 204, 235). See Carsam, etc.

Kephar-Chananiah (קֵפָר-חַנָּנִיאָה, i.e. village of Hamanah), a place named in the Talmud, and now called Keif Aman, 5 miles S.W. of Safed, containing the ruins of a synagogue (Schwarz, Polest. p. 157; compare Robinson, Later Bib. Rev. p. 78, note).

Kepler, Johann, the celebrated astronomer, deserves a place here not so much on account of his services to the science of astronomy as for the relation he sustained to, and the treatment he received from the Christian Church of the 16th century. He was born near the imperial city of Weil, in Wurttemberg, Dec. 27, 1571, and in his childhood was weak and sickly. He was sent to school in 1577, but the strained circumstances of his father caused great interruption to his education. He was soon taken from school, and employed in menial services at his father's tavern. In his twelfth year, however, he was again placed at the same school, but in the following year was seized with a violent illness, so that his life was for some time despaired of. In 1586 he was admitted to the monastic school of Maulbronn, where his expenses were paid by the duke of Wurttemberg. The three years of Kepler's life following his admission to this school were marked by a return of several of the disorders which had well-nigh proved fatal to him in his childhood. To add to his misfortunes, his father left home in consequence of disagreements with his mother, and soon after died abroad. After the departure of his father he mother quarrelled with her relations, "having been treated," says Hantisch, Kepler's earliest biographer, (in his edition of Andreas and J. Kepler, etc. [Leips. 1718]), "with a degree of barbarity by her husband and brother-in-law that was hardly exceeded even by her own perversities." As a natural consequence, the family affairs were in the greatest confusion. Notwithstanding these complications, young Kepler took his degree of master at the University of Tbingen in August, 1591, holding the second place in the examination. While at the university he had paid particular attention to the study of theology, and no doubt intended to enter the ministry; but, annoyed by the strife which the controversy on the Formula of Concord occasioned, and opposed to the doctrine of ubiquity, at that time made an article in the confession of Wurttemberg's state religion, he failed to secure a position as minister. He now turned to mathematical studies. His attention was first directed to astronomy by the offer of the astronomical chair at Graz; the chief astronomer of Austria. At that time he knew very little of the subject, but, having accepted the lectureship, he was forced to qualify himself for the position. While engaged in these investigations, he came by degrees to understand the superior mathematical perfection of the Copernican system to that of Ptolemy. His general views of astronomy, however, were somewhat mystical, as may be seen in his Prodomus. He supposed the sun, stars, and planets were typical of the Trinity, and that God distributed the planets in space in accordance with regular polyhedrons, etc.

In 1595 Kepler completed his Mysterium Cosmographicum, in which he details the many hypotheses he had successively formed, examined, and rejected concerning the number, distance, and periodic times of the planets, and endeavors to demonstrate the correctness of the Copernican system, which at that time was still discredited and rejected as un-Biblical by both Romanists and Protestants. To avoid persecution, Kepler took the precaution to secure the opinion of eminent theologians of both churches before publication, and for this purpose submitted the MS. to the faculty of Tbingen University. Of course they quickly condemned the sacrilegious effort and daring of the young astronomer (see below), but not so thought Duke Louis of Wurttemberg, who not only approved of the work, but furnished the means (in 1596) to defray the expense of printing it. It must be borne in mind, in the 16th century, that ecclesiastical truth was equally unknown to the clergy and the laity, and that the motion of the earth and the stability of the sun were doctrines apparently inconsistent with holy Scripture. Besides, in those days the truths of religion were guarded by a sternness of discipline and a severity of punishment which have disappeared in more enlightened times. In order to form a correct judgment respecting the causes which led to the opposition to Kepler by the Church, and the subsequent trial and condemnation of Galileo, (q. v.) in the 17th century, it is necessary to go back to the period when they first submitted their opinions to the public. The philosophy of Aristotle was then prevalent throughout Europe. It was taught in all its universities by professors lay and clerical, and every attempt to refuse their doctrines exposed its author to the opposition of the learning and statesmen of the day. One of the principal dogmas of the Aristotelian philosophy was the immutability of the heavens. The brilliant discoveries of Kepler and Galileo struck a blow at the ancient philosophy, and consequently exposed them to the hostility of the Peripatetic philosophers. Now when we reflect that the minds of all thinking men were then completely moulded by that philosophy, and that these, again, governed the reflections of those immediately beneath them, and from them the results of Aristotelianism, mingling up, as they did, especially with the religious opinions of the day, thus reached the whole of the popular intellect, we will find it no matter of surprise that the zeal of these innovators met with the most determined opposition. "The Aristotelian professors, the temporizing Jesuits, the political churchmen, and that vast mass of reasoning, bought, half at all times dreaded innovation, whether it be in legislation or in science, entered into an alliance against the philosophical tyrants who threatened them with the penalties of knowledge." "He who is allowed to take the stunts of his species," says Sir David Brewster, "and to penetrate the veil which conceals from common minds the mysteries of nature, must not expect that the world will be patiently dragged at the chariot-wheels of his philosophy. Mind has its inertia as well as matter, and its progress to truth can only be insured by the gradual and patient removal of the difficulties which embarrass it." Those Protestants, therefore, who are so ready to censure the Church of Rome for its action with regard to these great men should remember that it was but carrying out the spirit of the age, and a measure which the sins of the people demanded. Surely Protestantism has but little to boast of in this matter. More than half a century later we find that the great and good Sir Matthew Hale condemned to death two women for witchcraft on the ground, first, that Scripture had affirmed the reality of witchcraft; and, secondly, that the vision prophecies of the Old Testament persons criminally accused of the crime. Sir Thomas Browne, the celebrated author of the Religio Medici, was called as a witness at the trial, and swore "that he was clearly of opinion that the persons were bewitched." Not only so, but Henry More and G. G. Dawe expressed their belief in the reality of witchcraft; and, more than all, Joseph Glairide, probably the most celebrated theological thinker of his time, wrote a special defence of the superstition, without doubt the ablest book ever written on that subject. As late as 1699 nineteen persons were executed and one preserved to death in Massachusetts on the same plea for witchcraft. See Salem. "To deny the possibility, nay, actual existence of witchcraft and sorcery," says Sir William Blackstone (Commentary on the Laws of England, bk. iv. ch. iv. sec. 6), "is at once fatally to contradict the revealed Word of God and passages both of the Old and New Testament." See Witchcraft.

In 1597 Kepler married Barbara Muller von Muhlacker. She was already a widow for the second time, although two years younger than Kepler himself. In the beginning of his marriage, being the most eminent of the troubled state of the province, arising out of the two great religious parties into which the German empire was then divided, he was induced to withdraw into Hungary. The Jesuits, anxious to secure for the Roman Church the learning and renown of Kepler, earnestly worked in his behalf, and secured permission for his return to Graz. Very independent in character, Kepler was not the man to eat the bread of his opponents, and upon his frank refusal to join the Romanists he was visited with still fiercer opposition. In 1600 he paid a visit to the emperor and was received with kind consideration; the latter was appointed assistant imperial mathematician by emperor Rudolph II. Upon the death of Tycho in 1601, Kepler succeeded him as principal mathematician to the emperor, and took up his residence at Prague. The special task intrusted to Kepler at this time was the reduction of Tycho's observations relating to the planet Mars, and to this circumstance is mainly owing his grand discovery of the law of elliptic orbits, and that of the equable description of areas. These continued studies, his searchings after harmony, led him at last to the discovery of universal harmonies, which were remarkable truths called Kepler's Laws. (For an account of these, and the steps that led to their discovery, see the English cyclopaedia, s. v., where also will be found a list of Kepler's works.) In 1624 he went to Vienna, the emperor finding it improper to make good his promises to assist Kepler, to secure the necessary means to aid him in the completion of the Rudolphine Tables; it was not, however, till 1627 that these tables—the first that were calculated on the supposition that the planet moves in elliptic orbits—made their appearance; and it will be sufficient to say that Kepler aimed at that in this place, that h. Heliocivic Copernicus, in the course of his whole life but construct these, he would have well earned the title of a most useful and indefatigable calculator. He died at Ratisbon, Nov. 15, 1630, and his body was interred in St. Peter's churchyard of that city. "Ardent, resolute, burning to distinguish himself by his discoveries, he attempted everything; and, having once obtained a glimpse, no labor was too hard for him in following or verifying it. All his attempts had not the same success, and, in fact, that was impossible. Those which have failed seem to us only fanciful; that which has been more fortunate appear sublime. When in search of that which really existed, he has sometimes found it; when he devoted himself to the pursuit of a chimera, he could not but fail; but even there he unfolded the same qualities, and that obstinate perseverance that must triumph over all difficulties but those which are insurmountable." Korach. See CHORAZIN.

Koralay, Dr., a French Roman Catholic missionary, who flourished in the early part of the 19th century, joined the Congregation of Foreign Missions, and in 1760 was appointed to a mission at St. Petersburg. In 1777 he was consecrated bishop of Rosalia, and became coadjutor to M. de Ciré, apostolic vicar of Siam, whom he succeeded in 1777. The court, which had at first appeared favorably inclined towards the Christians, soon found its annoyance, and the painter sacrificed the mission violently. The missionaries were forbidden publishing any books in the Siamese language, or teaching their doctrines to the people. Inscriptions insulting to the Christian faith were placed on the front or inside of the churches. Koralay himself also was repeatedly summoned before the authorities, to answer for his infringements of their regulations, but he displayed throughout great firmness and patience. The death of the king and the civil war which followed gave the Christians some respite, but after a short time persecutions began again, and it was during the last persecution that he died at Juthia, Nov. 27, 1787. See Lettres édifiantes; Henriet, Hist. des Missions; Pallegoix, Description du royaume Thai (Paris, 1864, 12mo); Hoeffer, Nouv. Bioî. Générale, xxvii, 596. (J. N. P.)

Kerazin. See CHORAZIN.

Kerchiev (only in the pl. Kerachiev, mispadoch), so called from being spread out; Sept. erekhâvou, v. r. wqâhâvou, The verb kerachin is an article of apparel or ornament that occurs only in Ezek. xiii, 18, 21, where it is spoken of as something applied to the head by the idolatrous women of Israel, but the meaning of which it is difficult to discover. Some of the ancient versions (e. g. Symmachus, the Vulgate, etc.) understand pillows or cushions for the head, as in the parallel member (so Rosenmüller, Gesenius, etc.); others (e. g. the Sept., Syriac, etc.) think that mantles or coverings for the head are intended. Hitzig understands the tali, or long cloth worn by Jewish worshippers. See Fausset, A Critical and Exegetical Dictionary of the Bible, and the fact that the article might be torn (ver. 21), shows that it was long, loose, and flexible, like the shawl with which Oriental women envelop themselves (Ruth iii, 15: Isa. iii, 22); and the statement that they were adapted to be placed "upon the head of every stature" (Lev. iv. 37).
to us by the Jews of olden times. On this subject we substantially adopt Ginsburg’s article in Kitto’s Cyclopedia, s. v. See Masora.

I. Signification, Classification, and Mode of Indication of the Keri and Kethibh. — The text וּרְשָׁפֶס, kethibh, may be either the imperative or the participle passive of the Chaldean verb כָּלַע, to call out, to read, and hence may signify “Read,” or “It is read,” i. e. the word in question is to be substituted for that in the text. ובָּרָא, kethibh, is the participle passive of the Chaldean verb כָּלַע, to write, and signifies “It is written,” i. e. the word in question is in the text. Those who prefer taking the word as participle, do so on the ground that it is more consonant with its companion ובָּרָא, which is the participle passive. The two terms thus correspond substantially to the modern terms scopicus (Keri) and text (Kethibh). We may add that the Rabbis also call the Keri מִקְרָא, mikra, scripture, and the Kethibh מִקְרָא, manorah, tradition; but, according to our ideas, these terms should be reversed.

The different readings exhibited in the Keri and Kethibh may be divided into three general classes: a. Words to be read differently from what they are written, arising from the omission, insertion, exchanging, or transposition of a single letter (בָּרָא ובָּרָא ובָּרָא); b. Words to be read, but that are not written in the text (בָּרָא ובָּרָא ובָּרָא); and c. Words written in the text, but that are not to be read (בָּרָא ובָּרָא ובָּרָא).

a. The first general class (variations) comprises the bulk of the various readings, and consists of:

1. Corruptions of errors arising from mistaking homonyms, e. g. כָּלַע the negative particle, for the similarly sounding כָּלַע, the pronoun, of which we have fifteen instances (comp. Exod. xxii. 29; Lev. xxvi. 17; Num. xx. 16; 1 Sam. ii. 3; 2 Sam. xvi. 18; 2 Kings viii. 10; Ezra iv. 2; Job xiii. 15; xl. 4; Ps. c. 8; xxix. 16; Prov. xix. 7; xxvi. 2; Isa. ix. 2; Jer. ix. 9), and two instances in which the reverse is the case (1 Sam. ii. 16; xx. 2).

Besides noticing them in their respective places, the Masora also enumerates them all on Lev. xi. 15. The Talmud (Sopherim, vi) gives three additional ones, viz., 1 Chron. xx. 21; Job vi. 21; Isa. lxv. 5, 8, which for four instances (1 Sam. xx. 24; 1 Kings iii. 33; Job vii. 1; Isa. lxv. 7; Ezek. ix. 5).

2. Errors arising from mistaking the letters which resemble each other, e. g. כ for כ for כ (comp. Prov. xxii. 29; for י (Ezek. xxx. 7); כ for כ (1 Sam. iv. 13); כ for כ of, which the Masora on Prov. xix. 19, and Jer. xxxi. 40, gives four instances (2 Sam. xiii. 37; 2 Kings xvii. 6; Jer. xxxi. 40; Prov. xix. 19); כ for כ (Jer. xxiv. i, xxiv. 11); כ for כ (2 Sam. xxii. 13); כ for כ, of which the Masora on Prov. xx. 21 gives four instances (2 Sam. xiii. 87; Prov. xx. 21; Cant. i. 17; Dan. ix. 24); כ for כ (1 Sam. xiv. 32); כ for כ in innumerable instances; כ for כ in eleven cases (Josh. iv. 18; vi. 5, 15; 1 Sam. xi. 1; 2 Kings vii. 14; Ezr. viii. 14; Neh. iii. 90; Esth. iii. 14; Job xxx. 13; for כ (Isa. xxx. 32); for כ (2 Kings xx. 4); for כ twice (Jer. ii. 20; Ezr. viii. 14); for כ (Eccles. xii. 6); for כ (2 Kings xxiv. 14; xxv. 17; Jer. lii. 21).

3. Errors arising from exchanging letters which belong to the same organs of speech, e. g. כ for כ, of which the Keri exhibits one instance (Josh. xxxii. 7), and vice-versa, of which the Great Masora, under letter כ, gives six instances (Josh. iii. 16; xxiv. 15; 2 Kings xv. 12; xii. 10; xxvii. 33; Dan. xiv. 18); for נ for נ (2 Kings xvii. 21); for כ for כ (1 Sam. xx. 24; 1 Kings iii. 38; Job vii. 1; Isa. lxv. 5; Ezek. ix. 5); for כ for כ (Isa. lxv. 4).

4. Errors arising from the transposition of letters, which the Masorah designates דַּרְשָׁה, and of which it gives sixty-two cases, as, for instance, the textual reading, or Kethib, is בַּלּוֹ, the text, and the marginal reading, or Keri, transposing the letters ב ל, has בַּלּוֹ, these (comp. Josh. vi. 13; xxii 8; xxii 27; Judg. xvi. 26; 1 Sam. xiv. 27; xvi. 18, 22, 23 [twice]; xxvii. 16; 2 Sam. iii. 25; xv. 30; xviii. 17; xviii. 8; 14; xxiv. 16; 1 Kings v. 45; 2 Kings xii. 2; xiv. 6; 1 Chron. i. 46; iii. 24; xxv. 29; 2 Chron. xxv. 28; 8, 18; xxiv. 6; Ezra ii. 46; iv. 4; vii. 17; Neh. iv. 14; Ruth ii. 14; 7 [twice]; i. 14; iii. 14; Ruth iii. 14; iv. 14; xxxix. 13; 11; xxviii. 27; Eccles. iv. 4; Isa. xxxix. 27; Jer. ii. 15; vi. 8; 7, xv; vi. 22, xxvii. 13; xxvi. 23; xxvii. 23; xii. 20; 13; Ezek. xxxvi. 14; xi. 16; xii. 18; xiii. 15; Dan. iv. 9; 7, 16 [twice], 29).

5. Errors arising from the small letter ב being dropped before the prepositional ל from plural nouns, and making them to be singular, of which there are a hundred and thirteen instances (it is very strange that the Masorah Magna only enumerates fifty-six of these instances) (Gen. xxxiii. 4; Exod. xxvi. 11; xxviii. 28; xxxii. 19; xxxix. 8, 43; Lev. ix. 22; xv. 21; Num. xii. 3; Deut. ii. 32; iii. 6; v. 12; vi. 10; xxxii. 5; Josh. iv. iii. 13; iv. 11; xiv. 13; Ruth iii. 11; iv. 14; [twice]; i. 13; iii. 14; Ruth iii. 11; iv. 14; xxvi. 5; 7 [twice], 11; 16; xxxvi. 5 [twice]; xxxvi. 6; 2 Sam. i. 11; iii. 23; iii. 12; iv. 9, 20; xxxiv. 8; vii. 18, 17; xiv. 19; xx. 8; xxxii. 9, 11; xiv. 14, 22; z Kings v. 17; xxvii. 27; xxvii. 12; 2 Kings iv. 14; xvi. 18; Ezra iv. 7; Job ix. 13; xiv. 5; xv. 19; xi. 11, 20; xxi. 24; xxvii. 14; xxxvi. 21; xxxvi. 12; xxxvii. 41; xxxvii. 29; 30; 17; Ps. x. 5; xxxiv. 6; lviii. 8; cxi. 46; xxxvi. 4; cxlvii. 19; xxvii. 2; Prov. vi. 18 [twice]; xxii. 24; xxiv. 24; Isa. iii. 5; lviii. 10; Jer. xv. v. 20; xvii. 10; li. 44; xxxvi. 4; iv. 14; xiii. 4; iii. 25; vii. 17; Lam. ii. 82, 39; Ezek. ii. 20; xxvii. 21; xviii. 23, 24; xxxvi. 5; xxxix. 13, 16; xxxvii. 10 [twice]; 19; x. 22 [twice]; 26; xili. 11; [thrice]; 26; xlvi. 5; xili. 11; Dan. x. 10; Amos ii. 6, 8; Obad. v. 11; Hab. iii. 14; as well as from the insertion of ב before the prepositional ל and before the prepositional ל in singular nouns, and making them plural; the Keri exhibits seven instances of the former (1 Kings xvi. 25; Ps. cxviii. 17, 25; Prov. xvi. 27, xxxii. 20; Ezcl. iv. 17; Dan. iv. 18) and eight of the latter in the word וַיִּכְבִּשׁ (Judg. xliii. 17; 1 Kings xxvii. 20; xxxii. 13; Ps. cxlix. 147, 161; Jer. xv. 16 [twice]; Ezra x. 23).)

6. Errors of a grammatical nature, arising from dropping the article מ where it ought to be, of which the Keri exhibits fourteen instances (1 Sam. xiv. 82; 2 Sam. xxxiii. 9; 1 Kings iv. 7; v. 20; xviii. 18; 2 Kings xii. 20; xv. 26; Acts. xxxii. 15; Jer. x. 18, xvii. 19, 21; l. 3, iii. 82; Lam. i. 16; Ezek. xviii. 20), or from the insertion of it where it ought not to be, of which there are ten instances (1 Sam. xxxii. 12; 1 Kings xxi. 8; 2 Kings xvii. 12, 13, 18; xxv. 25; Eccles. vi. 10; x. 3, 20; Isa. xxxix. 11; Jer. xxxviii. 11) or from the dropping of the מ after הָאוֹרָה, or writing נְרוּי instead of נְרוּי when used as feminine.

7. Errors arising from the wrong division of words, e.g. the first word having a letter which belongs to the second, exhibited by the Keri in three instances, and stated in the Masorah on 2 Sam. v. 2; v. 2. Job xxxviii. 12; Lam. iv. 16), or the second word having a letter which belongs to the first of which there are two instances (1 Sam. xxi. 12; Ezra iv. 12), or one word being divided into two separate words, of which the Keri exhibits by 2 Chron. xxvii. 4, xxxix. 14. Eight instances (Judg. xvi. 29; 1 Sam. ix. 1, 28; xxxvi. 8; 1 Kings v. 5; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 6; Isa. ix. 6; Lam. i. 6; iv. 3), or two separate words being written as one, exhibited by the Keri in fifteen instances (Gen. xxxi. 11; Exod. iv. 2; Deut. xxxvii. 2; 1 Chron. ix. 4; xxxvii. 12, Neh. ii. 28; Job xxxviii. 11; xi. 16; Ps. x. 10; lv. 16; cxxiii. 4; Isa. iii. 15; Jer. vi. 29; xviii. 8; Ezek. viii. 6).

8. Exegetical Keri or marginal readings which substitute euphemisms for the cacophonous terms used in the text, in accordance with the injunction of the ancient sages, that "all the verses wherein indecent expressions occur must be displaced by decent words [קְרֵי כָּתוּב] (of which the Keri exhibits four instances, viz. Deut. xxxviii. 80; Isa. xii. 16; Jer. iii. 2; Zech. xiv. 2), [קְרֵי כָּתוּב] of [of which the Keri exhibits six instances, viz. Deut. xxviii. 27; 1 Sam. v. 6, 9; vi. 4, 5, 17; omitting, however, one Sam. v. 12], [קְרֵי כָּתוּב] of [of which the Keri exhibits one instance, viz. 2 Kings vi. 25], [קְרֵי כָּתוּב] of [of which the Keri exhibits two instances, 2 Kings xviiii, 27; Isa. xxxvii. 12], [קְרֵי כָּתוּב] of [of which there is one instance, 2 Kings x. 27, comp. Mekilta, 2b)." el points attached to the one \( ^{1} \); whilst in 2 Kings vii, 15, where the reverse is the case, the marginal reading having fewer letters, and hence fewer vowels than the textual reading, which takes the vocal signs of the former, the Kethib is pronounced \( \text{ביים} \), and the Masorah has no vowel sign at all. There is a peculiarity connected with the double indication of the textual variations, which consist in the diminution or addition of a single letter. When a letter is dropped from a word in the text, the whole word is given in the marginal reading with the letter in question, and the remark \"Read so\" as, for instance, in 1 Sam. xiv, 32; Prov. xxiii, 34, where the \( מ \) according to the Masorah, is dropped from \( בֵּיתָי \), and \( ו \) from \( בָּשׁדֶּל \), as indicated by \( הָיָה \) and \( וַיְיָה \); the marginal glosses are \( בֵּיתָיָה \) and \( בָּשַׁדֶּל \); but when the reverse is the case, if a letter has crept into a word, the whole word is not given in the marginal gloss, but it is simply remarked that such and such a letter is redundant (\( מְכַסֶּנֶק \) or \( אוֹנְכֵּסֶנֶק \)), as, for instance, in Eccles. x, 20; Neh. ix, 17, where the \( מ \) according to the Masorah, has crept in before \( בַּשָּׁדֶּל \), and before \( בָּשַׁדֶּל \), the marginal gloss simply remarks \( מְכַסֶּנֶק \) or \( אוֹנְכֵּסֶנֶק \). Upon this point, however, the greatest inconsistency is manifested in the Masoretic glosses; compare, for instance, the Kethib \( בֹּקְרָה \) and \( בֹּקְרָה \) in Eccles. iv, 8, 17, both of which, according to the Keri, have a redundant \( ו \), and are singular nouns, yet the Masorete note upon the former is \( בֹּקְרָה \) exhibiting the whole word, whilst on the latter it simply remarks \( מְכַסֶּנֶק \).

The second class (\textit{insertions} directed), which comprises \textit{entire words} that have been omitted from the text, exhibits ten such instances which occur in the Hebrew Bible, as follows: Judges xx, 13; Ruth iii, 5, 17; 2 Sam. viii, 3; xvi, 33; xviii, 20; 2 Kings xix, 31, 37; Jer. xxxii, 38; 1, 29. Besides being noted in the marginal glosses on the respective passages, these omissions are also given in the Masorah on Deut. i and Ruth iii, 15. They are also enumerated in the Talmud (Tract Sopherim, vi, 8, and in Nedairim, 37 b.). In Nedairim, however, the passage which refers to this subject is as follows: \"The insertion of words in the text (\( יִנְחָמָה \) is exhibited in \( יִנְחָמָה \) [2 Sam. vii, 3]; more (ibid. xvi, 23); \( יִנְחָמָה \) [Jer. xxxii, 38]; \( יִנְחָמָה \) [ibid. i, 29]; \( יִנְחָמָה \) [ibid. iii, 5, 17]; thus omitting four instances, viz. Judg. xx, 13; 2 Sam. xviii, 39; 2 Kings xix, 31, 37, and adding one, viz. Ruth ii, 11, which is neither given by the Masorah nor in Sopherim.\"

This class of variations is indicated by a small circle or asterisk placed in the text with the vocal signs of the word which is wanting, referring to the margin, where the word in question is given. Thus, for instance, in Judg. xx, 13, where, according to the Keri, the word \( יִנְחָמָה \) is omitted, the Kethib is given \( יִנְחָמָה \) upon which the marginal gloss remarks \( יִנְחָמָה \)

O. Of the third class (\textit{omissions suggested}, exhibiting \textit{entire words} which have crept into the text, there are right instances, as follows: Ruth iii, 12; 2 Sam. xiii, 38; xv, 21; 2 Kings v, 18; Jer. xxxviii, 16; xxxix, 12; 13; 3; Ezek. xviii, 16. These variations are not only noted in the marginal glosses on the respective passages, but are also given in the Masorah on Ruth iii, 12. The passage in Nedairim, 27 b, which speaks of this class of variations, remarking, \"Words which are found in the text, but are not read (\( יִנְחָמָה \), but are exhibited in \( יִנְחָמָה \) [2 Kings v, 18]; \( יִנְחָמָה \) [Jer. xxxix, 11]; \( יִנְחָמָה \) [ibid. ii, 3]; \( יִנְחָמָה \) [Ezek. xviii, 16]; \( יִנְחָמָה \) [Ruth iii, 12]) omits 2 Kings xiii, 38; xv, 21; and Jer. xxxviii, 10; xxxix, 12; and adds Jer. xxxix, 11, which does not exist in the Masorah; whilst Sopherim, vi, 9, which remarks that \( יִנְחָמָה \) in 2 Sam. xiii, 38; Jer. xxxix, 12; 2 Sam. xv, 21; Ruth iii, 12; 3; Ezek. xviii, 16; omits 2 Kings v, 18, and Jer. xxxix, 12.

This class of variations is not uniformly indicated in the different editions of the Bible. Generally the word in question has no vowel signs, but an asterisk or small circle is put over it, referring to the margin, where it is simply remarked \( יִנְחָמָה \), \textit{written in the text}, but not [\textit{to be read}] in one or two instances, however, the word is repeated in the margin. Thus in 2 Kings v, 18, where we have it \( יִנְחָמָה \), \textit{written in the text}, but [\textit{is not to be read}] in one or two instances, however, the word is repeated in the margin.

II. Number and Position of the Keri and Kethib.

A great difference of opinion prevails about the number and position of these various readings. The Talmud, as we have shown above, and the early commentators, mention variations which do not exist in the Keri and Kethib of the Masorah. This, however, is beyond the aim of the present article, which is to investigate the Keri and Kethib as exhibited in the Masorah and in the editions of the Hebrew Bible. From a careful perusal and collation of the Masorah, as printed in the Rabbinic Bibles, we find the following to be the number of the Keri and Kethib in each book, according to the order of the Hebrew Bible:

The disparity between Abrahams's calculations about the number of Keri and Kethib, leading him to the conclusion that the Pentateuch has 65, Jeremiah 81, and 1 and 2 Samuel 138 (\textit{Introduction to Jeremiah}), and the numbers which we have stated as existing in these books, is easily accounted for when it is remembered that this Pentateuch commentator died fifteen years before the publication of the laborious Jacob b-Chajim collated and published the Masorahs on the Hebrew Scriptures, and therefore had no opportunity of consulting them carefully. But we find it far more difficult to account for the serious difference in the calculations of later writers and our results, as may be seen from the table on the following page.

For the collation of Bomberg's Bible, the Plantin Bible, and the Antwerp Bible, we are indebted to the tables exhibited in Cappellano's \textit{Critici Sacri}, p. 70, and Walton's \textit{Prolegomena} (ed. D'Ambrissi, 1682, 1478); and though we have been able by our arrangement to correct their blunder in representing Elias Levi as separating the Five Megilloth from the Hagiographa, and giving the number of Keri to be 329 exclusive of the Megilloth. the marginal indications of which are obliged to descend from the Masoroth apart from the Hagiographa, to which they belong according to the Jewish order of the Canon. Elias Levi's own words on the numbers are as follows: \"I counted the Keri and Kethib several times, and found that they were in all 848; of these, 55 are in the Pentateuch, and 329 in the Hagiographa. It is surprising that there should only be 66 in the Pentateuch, 22 of which refer to the single word \( בְּרֵשֵׁית \), which same view. It is in accordance with this recollect sense ascribed to the origin of the Keri and Kethib that Raish remarks on Gen. viii, 16, "The Keri is בְּנִי, the Kethib בָּנִי, because he was first to tell them to go out; but if they should refuse to go, he was to make them go." Kimchi, however, is of the opposite opinion. So far from believing that this view proceeded from the sacred writers themselves, who designed to convey thereby various mysteries, he maintains that the Keri and Kethib originated after the Babyonian captivity, when the sacred books were collected by the members of the synagogue. These editors of the long-lose and mutilated inspired writings "found different readings in the volumes, and adopted those which the majority of copies had, because these, according to their opinion, exhibited the true readings. In some places they wrote down one word in the text without putting the vowel signs to it, or noted it in the margin without inserting it in the text, whilst in other places they inserted the reading in the margin in the text" (Introduction to his Commentary on Joshua.) Ephod" (Bourch 1891-1430), who maintains the same view, remarks that Ezra and his followers "made the Keri and Kethib on every passage in which they found some obliteration and confusion, and were not sure what the precise reading was." Abrahanel, who will not admit that the Keri and Kethib proceeded from the sacred writers themselves, nor that they took their rise from the imperfect state of the codices, propounds a new theory. According to him, Ezra and his followers, who undertook the editing of the Scriptures, found the sacred books entire and perfect; but in perusing them these editors discovered that they contained irregular expressions, and loose and ungrammatical phrases, arising from the carelessness and ignorance of the inspired writers. "Ezra had therefore to explain these words in harmony with the connection: this is the origin of the Keri which is found in the margin of the Bible, as this holy scribe feared to touch the words which were spoken or written by the Holy Ghost.
These remarks he made on his own account to explain those anomalous letters and expressions, and put them in the margin to indicate that the gloss is his own.
Now, if you examine the numerous Keris and Kethibas in Jeremiah, and look into their connection, you will find them all to be of this nature, viz., that they are to be traced to Jeremiah's careless and blundering writing.
... . From this you may learn that the books which have most Keris and Kethibas show that their authors did not know how to speak correctly or to write properly (Introduction to his Commentary on Jeremiah.)

Though Abrahanel's hypothesis has more truth in it than the other theories, yet it is only a combination of the three views that the origin of the Keri and Kethib can be traced and explained. For there can be no doubt that some of the variations, as the Talmud, Raish, etc., declare, have been transmitted by tradition from time immemorial, and have their origin in some recollect meaning or mysteries attached to the passages in question; that some, again, as Kimchi, Ephod, etc. rightly maintain, are due to the blunders and corruptions which have crept into the text in the course of time, and which the spiritual guides of the nation tried to rectify by the addition of corrections (Keri and Kethibas) according to the Talmud (comp. Jerusalem Meguilah, iv. 2; Sopherim, vi. 4); and that others, again, as Abrahanel marks, are owing to the carelessness of style, ignorance of idioms and provincialisms, which the editors and successive interpreters of the Hebrew canon discovered in the different books, may properly be considered as which were at variance with the grammatical rules and exc-geital laws developed in aftertime by the Masoretes. Such, however, was their reverence for the ancient text, that these Masoretes who made the new additions to it left the text itself untouched in the very places where they believed it necessary to follow another explanation or reading, but simply inserted the emendation in the margin. Hence the distinction between the ancient text as it was written, or Kethib (הִכְתָּב), and the more modern emended reading, or Kethib (קְרֵבָה); and hence, also, the fact that the Kethib is not inserted in the synagogal scrolls, though it is followed in the public reading of the Torah.

IV. Importance of the Keri and Kethib, especially as relating to the English Version of the Hebrew Scriptures.

—Some idea of the importance of the Keri and Kethib may be gathered from the following analysis of the seventy-six variations which occur in the Pentateuch. Of the seventy-six Keras, twenty-one give נֵבֶט instead of נֵבֶט (Gen. xxiv. 14, 16, 28, 55, 57; xxxiv, 8 [twice], 12; Deut. xxxii, 15 [twice], 16, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26 [twice], 27, 28, 29), which was evidently epicene in earlier periods (comp. Gesenius, Gramm. sec. 23, sect. 82, 3; Ewald, Lehrbuch, sect. 175, b); fifteen have the plural termination נִבְּט affixed to nouns of the singular form only in the text (Gen. xxxiii. 4; Exod. xxvii. 11; xxviii. 28; xxxii, 19; xxxix, 4, 53; Lev. ix. 23; xvi. 21; Num. xii. 16; 9; Deut. iii. 9; xiy, 10; vii, 9; vii, 8; xxvii. 10; xi, 10; vii, 9), which seldom think it is no real variation, since in earlier periods the termination נִבְּט was both singular and plural, just as נֵבֶט stands for both נֵבֶט and נֵבֶט; seventeen give more current and uniform forms of words (Gen. xi. 17, x; xix, 8; xix, 8, 33 with 1, 36; xxx, 23 with xxxii, 11; xxviii, 8 with 5, 7; xxvii, 29 with the same word in the next clause; xxxvi. 5, 14 with ver. 18; xxxix, 26, 29; liii, 38 with xxvii, 29; Exod. xxvi. 2; vii, 7 with Numb. xvi, 11; Numb. xiv, 36 with xv, 24; Numb. lii, 82 with xxxii, 39; xxxii, 7 with xxx, 6; Deut. xxxii, 18 with Amos iv, 13); five substitute the termination third person singular, for נֵבֶט (Gen. xlix, 11 [twice]; Exod. xxiii. 26; xxxii, 17; Numb. x, 36), which is a less common pronounal suffix (comp. Gesenius, Gramm. sec. 91; Ewald, Lehrbuch, sect. 217, a); two make two words of one (Gen. xxxii. 11; Exod. iv, 2); two have נֵבֶט instead of נֵבֶט (Exod. xvi, 13; Numb. xl, 39); three give plural verbs instead of singular (Lev. xxii. 5; Numb. xxxiv, 4; Deut. xxxii, 7), which are no doubt an improvement, since Numb. xxxiv, 4 is evidently a mistake, as may be seen from a comparison of this verse with verse 39, and substitute the relative pronoun יִבְּט for the negative particle יִבְּט (Exod. xxii, 8; Lev. xi, 21; xxx, 50), which is very expressive; two substitute euphemisms for cacophonous expressions (Deut. xxvii, 28; and 20); and are purely traditional, viz. Numb. i, 16; xxvi, 9. The Pentateuch, however, can hardly be regarded as giving an adequate idea of the importance of the Keri and Kethib, insomuch as the Jews, regarding the law as more sacred than any other inspired book, guarded it against being corrupted with greater vigilance than the rest of the canon. Hence the comparatively few and unimportant Keri when contrasted with those occurring in the other volumes. Still, the Pentateuch contains a few specimens of almost every kind of the different Kerias.

As to the question how far our English versions have been influenced by the Keri and Kethib, this will best be answered by a comparison of the translations with the more striking variations which occur in the Prophets and Hagiographa. In Josephus, v. 7, when the Pentateuch reading is "still we were passed over," the Kethib has נֵבֶט, "until they passed over;" and though the Sept., Vulg., Chaldean, Luther, the Zurich Bible, Coverdale, the Bishop's Bible, the Geneva Version, etc., adopt the Kethib, the A. V., following Kimchi, adheres to the Kethib; whilst in Josh. vi, 7, where the textual reading is and they said (םָאִי) unto the people, and the marginal emendation is and he said (םָאִי), and when in the Vulg., Chaldean, Luther, the Zurich Bible, Coverdale, the Bishop's Bible, and the Geneva Version again adopt the Keri, as in the former instance, the A. V. abandons the textual reading and espouses the emendation. In Joshua, xiv, 47, where the Keri is the bordering sea (ניִבְּט הַנַּחַל) and its territory, and the Kethib has and the great sea (ניִבְּט הַנַּחַל) and its territory, which is again followed by the ancient versions and the translations of the Reformers, the A. V., without taking any notice of the textual reading in the margin, as in Joshua, xii, 16, adopts the emendation, whereas in Joshua, xv, 38 the A. V. follows the textual reading (ניִבְּט הַנַּחַל) Janamu, noticing, however, the emendation (ניִבְּט הַנַּחַל) Janama in the margin. All the ten emendations of the second class, which propose the insertion of entire words into the text (ניִבְּט הַנַּחַל), are adopted in the A. V. without the slightest indication by the usual italics that they are not in the text. Of the eight omissions of entire words in the third class (ניִבְּט הַנַּחַל), nothing decisive can be said, inasmuch as six of them refer to simple particles, and they might perhaps be recognised by translators or not without its being discernible in the version. The only two instances, however, where there can be no mistake (Jer. xii, 8; Ezek. xlviii, 16), clearly show that the A. V. follows the marginal gloss, and accordingly rejects the words which are in the text. Hence the limits of this article allowed us, we could have shown still more unquestionably that, though the A. V. generally adopts the marginal emendations, yet in many instances it proceeds most arbitrarily, and adheres to the textual reading; and that, with very few exceptions, it never indicates, by italics or in the margin, the difference between the textual and the marginal readings.

Intention to the Keri and Kethib has given rise to the most fanciful and absurd explications, of which the following may serve both as a specimen and a warning. In looking at the text of the Hebrew Bible, it will be seen that there is a final Mem (מ) in the middle of the word יִבְּט הַנַּחַל, Isa. ix. 6. We have already alluded to the fact that it exhibits one of the fifteen instances where the Kethib, or the textual reading, and the Keri, or the emended reading, proposes two words (see above, sec. 1). Accordingly, יִבְּט הַנַּחַל stands for יִבְּט הַנַּחַל, i.e. "to them the dominion shall be great," corresponding to the common abbreviation יִבְּט הַנַּחַל for יִבְּט הַנַּחַל. The question is whether יִבְּט may be considered as an abbreviation of יִבְּט, seeing there are no other examples of it; suffice it to say that Jewish scribes and critics of ancient times took it as such, just as they regarded יִבְּט הַנַּחַל (Isa. xxxiii, 7) as a contraction of יִבְּט הַנַּחַל (comp. the Syriac, Chaldée, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Vulgate, Elias Levita, etc.); and that the Sept. read it as two words (i.e. מִבְּט הַנַּחַל). Subsequent scribes, however, found it either to be more in accordance with the primitive reading, or with their exegetical rules, as well as with the usage of the prophet himself (comp. Isa. xxxiii, 20), to read it as one word; but their extreme reverence for the text prevented them from making this alteration without indicating that some codices have two words. Hence, though they joined the two words together as one, they yet left the final Mem to exhibit the variation. An example of the reverse occurs in Neh. ii, 18, where יִבְּט הַנַּחַל has been divided into two words, יִבְּט הַנַּחַל, and where the same anxiety faithfully to exhibit the ancient reading has made the editors of the Hebrew canon retain the medial Mem at the end of the word. It was to be expected that those Jews who regard both readings as Commentary on Joshua: Abramzoo, too, has a lengthy disquisition on this subject, in the Introduction to his Commentary on Jeremiah. He was followed by the laborious Jacob ben-Chajim, who fully discusses the Keri and Kethib in his celebrated Introduction to the Robbinic Bible, translated by Ginsburg in the Journal of Sacred Literature, vol. 4 (for July, 1863); and by the erudite and bold Elias Levita, who gives a very comprehensive treatment of the Keri and Kethib in his Massoeth Ha-Massoreth, ed. Sulzbach, 1771, p. 8 a sq.; 21 a, sq. Of Christian writers are to be mentioned the masterly treatises by Cappellus, Critica Sacra, lib. iii. cap. ix. sq.; Buxtorf, Tiberius, cap. xii. Keri, Francis Borgia, a learned Hungarian Jesuit, in the beginning of the 18th century, in the county of Zemplin, Hungary, entered the Jesuitical order when yet very young, and became an instructor of philosophy in the gymnasia of his native town at Tyrnau. In 1769 he emigrated to Italy, and resided at Leghorn. Keri distinguished himself greatly as a historian, especially by his Imperatorum Ottomani a capta Constantinopolis (Tyrnau, 1749, 9 pts. folio). He wrote also Imperatorum Orientalis compendio exhibitus, et complures Graeciae praeclares scriptoriorum, a Constantino Magno ad Constantem VIII ultimum tyrmann. (Tyrnau, 1744, 4to.). See Hoefcr, Nov. Biog. Gen. xxvii, 612: Horangri, Nova Memoria Hungarorum, ii, 332.

Keri, Janos, a noted Hungarian prelate, born in the first half of the 17th century; entered as a mere youth, in 1666, the order of St. Paul, became afterwards director of the establishment, and held successively the bishoprics of Sirmium, Csanud, and Waizen. He died in 1685. Bishop Keri wrote Ferocia Martia Turrici (Pos. 1672, 8vo)—Philosophia scholastica (Presb. 1673, 3 vols. fol.), etc.—Hoefcr, Nov. Biog. 1. A town in the south of Judah (hence probably included within Simeon), mentioned between Hadassah and Hebron (Josh. xv, 25). From the absence of the copulative after it, Reland (Polest, p. 700, 708) suggested that the name ought to be joined with the succeeding, i.e. cities of Hebron, i.e. Hazor itself, as in several ancient versions (but see Keil, ad loc.); and Maurer (Comment. ad loc.) has defended this construction, which the enumeration in ver. 32 requires, i.e. Kerioth-Hazor = Hazor-Abam. See JUDAH, TRIBE OF. It seems to be the place alluded to in the name of Judas Iscariot (Iacsepa=, i.e. מְשַׁמֶּרֶת, "naive of Keriót), Dr. Robinson conjectures (Bibl. Researches, ii, 472) that the site is to be found in the ruined foundations of a small village discovered by him on the slope of a ridge about ten miles south of Hebron, and still called by the equivalent Arabic name el-Kiryatia (comp. De Saulcy's Dead Sea, i, 431; Van de Velde, Narrative, ii, 82). This agree the plural form of the word, the associated epithets, and the frontier position, suggesting that the place was a fortification of contiguous hamlets for nomads rather than an individual city. See CITY; HAZOR.

2. A strong city of the land of Moab, mentioned in connection with Beth-gamul and Beth-shan (Josh. xvi, 24), in the prophecic denunciations of its overthrow by the Babylonian invaders on their way to Palestine (Jer. xlviii, 41; Amos ii, 2). But for the mention of Kiri-
KERR

George (2), a Methodist minister, was born in Ireland in 1819. His parents, who emigrated to Canada in 1822, intended him for the mercantile profession; but, converted when seventeen years old, and shortly after impressed with the conviction that he was called to preach, he came over the States, and settled at Winestead, Conn., was made a local preacher, and in 1844 joined the New York Conference. In 1866 he was superannuated, and made Hudson, N.Y., his residence. He died while on a visit to his friends in Ireland, Sept. 8, 1869.

Kerr, Henry M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in York District, S. C., Dec. 30, 1782. In very early life his mother had consecrated him, as Hannah did her Samuel, to the Lord, and had often expressed her desire to him that he should be a minister of the Gospel of the King and his people. Being in moderate circumstances, and the eldest of eleven children, he was compelled to labor for their maintenance; hence his education was much neglected in his earlier years. He went first to an academy in Roman County, N. C.; then he repaired to Fiddell County, and enjoyed the advantages of instruction under the celebrated James Hall, D.D. Here he completed a very extensive course of scientific study, and was readily received as a candidate for the ministry by Concord Presbytery in 1811. He pursued his theological course part of the term with the Rev. Dr. Kilpatrick, and part of it with James McKee, D.D. In 1814 he was licensed by Concord Presbytery. At that time he was residing in Salisbury, N. C. He remained there, teaching and preaching, until the spring of 1816, when he removed to Lincoln County, and he was ordained in November of that year pastor of Olney, Long Creek, and New Hope Churches. In 1819 he removed to North Carolina, and took charge of several small congregations, and in 1823 with his family removed to East Tennessee; but, not finding his ministerial associations pleasant, he travelled further west, and settled in Hardeman County, West Tennessee, in 1835. Here he performed much missionary labor in all the surrounding counties, and organized many churches. The infirmities of age made it necessary for him to abandon, in part, his evangelistic labors, and he devoted the last years of his life to Bethel and Aimwell churches, in McNairy County. In the fall of 1860 he settled near Watervelly, in the Presbytery of North Mississippi. He was buried here on January 28, 1865. Trained under the classical system, he made no effort at rhetorical display. His discourses were pre-eminently scriptural. He used the "sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God," and it was sharp in the heart of the King's enemies. His work was peremptory and persistent; and his life was often perilous. The providence of God cast his lot chiefly in destitute portions of the land, and his labors were evangelistic. He organized more churches, it is believed, than any other member of the Presbytery. For many years he was stated clerk of the Presbytery of Western Tennessee District, and his acquaintance with the form of government and discipline was so perfect that his word was taken as the solution of all doubts and difficulties."—Wilson, Presb. Historical Almanac, 1860, p. 588.

KERR, James, a Presbyterian minister, a native of Scotland, was born in 1805, and was educated in the University of Glasgow, where he took his A.B. in 1822. In his twenty-fifth year he emigrated to the United States, and shortly after entered the Western Theological Seminary, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Baltimore, April 27, 1836, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Winchester at Martinsburg, Va., April 22, 1837. He labored first as a missionary in Hampshire County, Va., for two years, and was successful in his ministry, planting the standard of the Cross in many portions of that hitherto forsaken country. He was next invited by the Church of Cadiz, Ohio; began his ministerial work in this congregation Dec. 2, 1838, and was regularly installed June, 1839. He died April 19, 1855. Kerr was the author of Mode of Baptism, and a small work on Psalmody. "He was a good presbyter, and made an excellent preaching officer of an ecclesiastical court, to which both the members of the Presbytery of Alleghany and Synod can testify. His opinions were uniformly correct, and his thorough acquaintance with the government and polity of our Church gave him a superior influence in all her judicial meetings upon which he was called to attend. He was remarkably conscientious in every sphere of life, whether, as a citizen, a Christian, or a minister. So decided was he against reading sermons, or even taking the smallest abstract into the pulpit, that he invariably voted against the licensure and ordination of any young man that did commit this 'great mistake,' as he sometimes termed it. As a preacher he was clear and logical, plain and interesting, in his statements of the great truths of the Gospel. His pulpit productions thoroughly partook of his own character, and came forth as the result of close application and much study; and on no occasion would he agree to preach, if it could at all be avoided, without special preparation."—Wilson, Presb. Historical Almanac, 1867, p. 160.

KERR, John, a Baptist minister of Scottish descent, was born in Caswell County, N. C., Aug. 14, 1872, converted in 1800, baptized in 1801, and at once licensed to preach. "Determined to avail himself of every means in his power to render his ministry efficient and useful, the Baptist preacher set sail bravely across the sea to see the excellent Marshall and listen to his preaching, and thence to Georgia to form the acquaintance of the distinguished and venerable Mercer. Returning from the South, he visited Virginia, and became personally known to the lamented Scaple and other valuable ministers of the state. Wherever he went his preaching produced a thrilling effect. His youthful appearance, the ardor and gracefulness of his manner, and the beauty of his diction, attracted universal attention. There are not a few who still remember his visit to Eastern Virginia, when he enkindled the spirit of the state almost half a century." In 1811 he embarked on the stormy sea of politics, consenting to become a candidate for Congress, and was twice elected thereto. He was a member of that body during the War of 1812, and served his country at that critical period with a fervent and enlightened patriotism. At the close of his Congressional career he returned to Halifax, and served the churches at Arbor and at Mary Creek. In March, 1825, he removed to the city of Richmond, and became the pastor of the First Baptist Church. Here his fine pulpit talents were brought into a full and successful career, and he went on from triumph to triumph with delight on his ministry. In less than a year more than five hundred members were added to the Church, two hundred and seventeen of whom were white. This successful work continued until dissenion was sown among his parishioners by the preaching of Alexander Campbell, whose efforts finally drew from Kerr's church nearly half of its members (in 1881). By the close of 1892 he had grown weary of the controversies to which the division had given rise. and resigned his charge. He died Sept. 29, 1842. He was naturally of a frank, open, and disinterested disposition. Inca- capable of artifice himself, he was not always guarded against it in others. His temperament, peculiarly ardent, sometimes perverted his judgment. His manners were uniformly bland, gentle, and conciliating. In so- cial intercourse he was highly gifted for a pleasing and imparting an interest and a charm to conversation. He was dignified without ostentation, and cheerful without levity. "As a Christian, he imbibed in a high degree the spirit of his Master. His piety was not the dwarfish and stunted growth of sectarianism—morose, censorious, and persecuting, but the product of enlarged and liberal views—cheerful, candid, and conciliatory. Though he was firm in his convictions as a Baptist, he was remarkably free from bigotry, and was a lover of good men of every communion. As a preacher he possessed commanding talents. A fine person, a sonorous voice, and a great power of oratory, once possessed him in his favor. His apprehension was quick, his perception clear, and his imagination remarkably vivid. He is ranked among the most popular preachers of his day in Virginia, and for more than thirty years he rarely if ever failed to attract the most important meetings to preach on occasions of the greatest interest."—Sprague, Amaids, vi, 446 sq.

KERR, Joseph, D.D., a prominent minister of the Associate Reformed Church, was born in Antrim County, Ireland, in 1778; educated at the University of Glasgow, and, with a view of entering the ministry, pursued theological studies under the direction of the Associate Presbyterian of Denny. He came to this country in 1811, and was licensed by the Second Presbytery of Pennsylvania shortly after. His appointment lay over a vast area of country west of the Alleghenies, a work for which he seemed to have been endowed by nature. In 1804 he was called to Mifflin and St. Clair as regular pastor, and, accepting, was installed October 17. When the Presbytery decided to establish a theological school at Pittsburg, they looked to him for its head, and felt constrained to urge his removal to that place, and appointed him professor of theology, a post which he successfully filled until his death on Nov. 13, 1829. "The death of Dr. Kerr shed a gloom not only over the large circle of his friends and acquaintances, and the families of his pastoral charge, but over the entire Synod of the West, as it seemed at once to dash the brightening prospects of the infant theological seminary intrusted to his super- vision. . . . With an athletic physical constitution, of more than ordinarily prepossessing appearance, he was endowed with intellectual powers of the first order, highly cultivated, and possessed of all the essential elements of a natural orator. With undoubted yet unostenta- tious piety, mild, kind, affable, affectionate, benevolent, liberal, and hospitable almost to a fault, he at once won the friendship and affection of his acquaintances, and the confidence of the congregations to whom he ministered, and, without assuming it, or even being apparently conscious of it, he occupied from the commencement of his ministry to the close of a master's life, which was accorded to him without envy and without opposition by his co-presbyters."—(Wilson, Presb. Historical Almanac, 1863, p. 872 sq.)

KERR, Joseph R., son of the preceding, and also a minister of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, was born in St. Clair township, Alleghany Co., Pa., Jan. 18, 1807, and is the son of Dr. Crow of the presbytery of Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1826 with the highest honors of his class. In the fall of 1827 he entered the theological seminary at Pittsburg, founded then only a short time, over which his father presided, and was licensed Sept. 2, 1829. Only two and a half months later his father died, and young Kerr was called to fill his place in the church. After finding the preferred place, he was ordained July 29, 1830. "This called by Providence to fill the pulpit of such a man as his father, he succeeded, from the very first, in giving entire satisfaction to his people, and soon became one of the most, if not altogether the most, popular of the preachers in the state. This was at the expense of such exhausting toil as contributed slowly but surely to under mine a constitution at best but delicate. From being a student of divinity, and without any experience, he entered at once on the pastoral oversight of a large congrega tion, and all the duties connected with the office of the ministry. In the preparation of this pulpit he was a close, unwavering student. He was ambituous of excellence in whatever he attempted connected with his office, and became a workman that needeth not to be ashamed" (Sprague, Annals [Associate Ref. Presb. Church], ix, 162. His health, however, failed him, and in 1832 he was obliged to take an assistant, Moses Kerr (q.v.), a younger brother. His health, notwithstanding this timely precaution, continued to fail, and he died June 14, 1843. Kerr published an address, Responsibility of Liberd Men (1856), and a sermon on Dudding (1860). [J. W. H.]

Kerr, Moses, a minister of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, third son of Dr. Joseph Kerr (q.v.), was born in St. Clair, Pa., June 30, 1811. Naturally of a serious and thoughtful cast of mind, and manifesting in very early life decided piety, his education was directed from the first with a view to qualifying him for the sacred ministry. Signs of failure in health, however, induced him to devote himself to mercantile life, but it soon proved as unfavorable to his health as his application to study, and he engaged in farm-work. His health becoming restored, he entered the Western University of Pennsylvania, and graduated in 1836. In the fall of the same year he began the study of theology in the seminary then under the care of his father; was licensed to preach on the 26th of April, 1831, and shortly after was called as pastor to Allegheny. But when the Presbytery met to ordain and install him, he returned the call on account of a hemorrhage of the lungs. The Presbytery, however, proceeded with his ordination to the office of the ministry. This was on the 9th of October, 1832. Shortly after he sailed for Europe, and on his return, with every appearance of restored and established health, resumed preaching, and finally accepted a call by the large and influential congregation of Robinson's Episcopal Church, Pittsburg, September 2, 1834. But a little more than six months later he was again attacked with hemorrhage of the lungs, and demitted his pastoral charge. During a vacancy he discharged for a time the duties of professor of languages in the Western University of Pennsylva nia; afterwards of Biblical literature and criticism in the theological seminary, Allegheny. But his tastes and talents were for the pulpit, and he again accepted a call as a preacher, this time from the Third Church, Pittsburg, 18th of October, 1837. With that congrega tion he closed his life on the 26th of January, 1840. Moses Kerr, a student from the love of study, and a careful reader of the best writings not only in theologi y, but in literature generally. With a becoming appreciation of the demands of his profession, he aimed to store his mind not only with the matter of the best works of the schools, but with the fresh discussions of living divines, and at the same time keep up with the general advance of literature and science in the world. As a preacher he had capabilities which, with ordinary health and an ordinary length of life, must have rendered him eminent in his profession.----Sprague, Annals, ix, 166.

Kesey, Jesse, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at York, Pa., in 1768. In his early youth his heart was given to God. In his seventeenth year he experienced a call to the Gospel ministry, but still re mained an apprentice to the trade of a potter about four years, and afterwards taught school. In 1784 he sailed for England on a Gospel mission. In 1805 he returned to America, and in 1814 went on a religious mission to the Southern States, afterwards returning to his home, and continuing to labor and preach. He died near Kennet, Pa., in 1845. As a minister, Mr. Kesey's affability of manners, his grave and dignified deport ment, the soundness of his principles, the beauty and simplicity of his style of address, heightened in their ef fect by the depth of his devotional feelings, gave an in terest and a charm which gained him many admirers. See Jamney, Hist. of the Friends, iv, 116. (J. L. S.)

Kerykthyst (from εκτραπησις, to preach), i.e. the art of preaching, is a modern name for Homiletics, first intro duced by Sirer (Kerykthik, 1830, 1846). See Homiletics.

Kesop. See Silver.

Keseth (קֶשֶת, A.V. "piece of money," "piece of silver"). The meaning and derivation of this word, which only occurs thrice in the O.T., has been a subject of much controversy. The places where it is found----Gen. xxxi, 19, recording Jacob's purchase of a piece of ground at Shechem; Josh. xxiv, 32, a verbal repetition from Genesis; and Job xili, 11, where the presents made to Job are specified, and it is joined with rings of gold--indicate either the name of a coin or of some article used in barter. The principal explanations of the word are:

1. That it means "20th and all the silver which render it "a lamb," either the animal itself or a coin bearing its impress (Hofftinger, Diss. de Numm. Orient.), a view which has been revived in modern times by the Danish bishop Munter in a treatise published at Copen hagen, 1824, and more recently still by Mr. James Yates, Proc. of Numism. Society, 1867, pp. 141. The entire want of any etymological ground for this interpretation has led Bochart (Hierozoic, i, 2, c. 6) to imagine that there had been a confusion in the text of the Sept. bet ween "iarkon μων and iarkon ἀρσων, and that this error has passed into all the ancient versions, which may be supported by the singular fact that in Gen. xxxi, 7, 41, we find "יָדוֹנָי יָדָוֶנָי (A.V. "ten times," "twelve, how ever, more usually standing for a particular weight) translated by the Sept. σεκα ἀρσων, which it is difficult to account for on any supposition save that of a mistake of the copyst for μων. See Sirer.

2. Others, adopting the rendering "lamb," have imagined a reference to a weight formed in the shape of that animal, such as we know to have been in use among the Egyptians and Assyrians, imitating bulls, antelopes, geese, etc. (see Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt., ii, 10; Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 600-602; Lejeanis, Denkmale, iii, plate 89, N.o 3).

3. Faber, in the German edition of Hermmer's Obs. ii, 15-19, quoted by Genesius (Theolaur. p. 1241), connects it with the Syriac κεστα, Heb. לַָתֵן, "a vessel," an etymology accepted by Grotfend (see below), and considers it to have been either a measure or a silver vessel used in barter (comp. Eilam, i, ii, 4, 22).

4. The most probable view, however, is that supported by Genesius, Rosenmiller, Jahn, Kalisch, and the majority of the soundest interpreters, that it was, in Grotfend's words (Numism. Chron. ii, 248), "merely a silver weight of undetermined size, just as the most an cient shekel was nothing more than a piece of rough silver without any image or device." The lost root was perhaps akin to the Arabic καυστ, "he divided equally." Bochart, however (ut supra), is disposed to alter the punctua tion of the Sk. and to connect the word with לַָת, "truth," adding "potsh" לַָת id est terea moneta qua cunque habuit justum pondus, et etiam moneta sincera et et ἁθροί/θροι

According to Rabbi Akiba, quoted by Bochart, a cer tain coin bore this name in comparatively modern times, so that he would render the word by פש וט, ותנוכרי, "a piece of money, "a piece of silver"

Kesseler, Christian Rudolph, a German Reformed minister, born February 20, 1823, in the Canton of Graubuenden, Switzerland, was educated in the best schools of his native land, and afterwards spent some time at the University of Leipzig; came to America with his parents in 1841; studied theology at Mercerburg, Pa.; was licensed and ordained in the spring of 1848, and took charge of congregations in Pendleton County, Va. In 1844 he became associated with Dr. Bibighaus as assistant pastor in the Salem congregation, Philadelphia. His health failing, in 1848 he removed to Allentown, Pa., to establish a female seminary. In this enterprise he was remarkably successful. He died March 4, 1855, leaving the institution he had founded in a flourishing condition.

Kessler (Athenaeus), Johann Jacob, was born at St. Gall in 1502, and studied theology at Basle. In 1522 he went to Wittenberg to hear Luther, and on his way fell in with him at Jenins, yet without knowing him. In 1523 he returned to St. Gall, but his inclination to the reform doctrines would not conscientiously permit him to enter the priesthood, and he became a saddler. At the request of his compatriots, he finally, in 1524, began Sunday evening meetings for the study of Scripture, which, on account of the general interest, were in 1525 transferred to the Church of St. Lawrence. He was some what opposed at first by a few narrow-minded theologians, and at their request even discontinued his meetings for a time; but the public, determined to hear the preaching of the Gospel, insisted on his entering the ministry, and he became, in 1535, evangelical pastor of the Church of St. Lawrence, and dean of St. Gall in 1573. He died March 15, 1574. Kessler wrote Sababthurin, St. Gallische Reformationchronik. See J. J. Bernet, J. Krahert (St. Gall, 1826); Herzog, Reut.-Encyklop. viii, 495; Priorer, Universal Lex. a. v.

Kett, Henry B.D., a learned English divine, was born at Norwich in 1761; studied at Trinity College, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and afterwards obtained the living of Charlton, Gloucestershire. He was drowned, while bathing, in 1826. His principal works are: History, the Interpreter of Prophecy (London, 4th ed., with additional notes, 1861, 2 vols. 8vo);—Sermons preached, 1790, at the Lectures founded by the late Rev. John Brompton, M.A. (London, 24 ed. 1792, 8vo)—Elements of general Knowledge (London, 8th edit. 1815, 2 vols. 8vo).—Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Ketterings, J. W., bishop of Minnesota from 1853 to 1877, though a layman, was promoted to the presbital dignities with the request of the duke of Cleve. He was one of the most enlightened minds of this period in the Roman Catholic Church, and himself inclining to the Reformation, in concert with the duke of Cleve, persuaded Cassander (q. v.) to use his influence and his pen to prevent further advancement in the Church of those who had left the Romanists. At Rome he was disdained for his mildness towards the Reformers, and finally quit the bishopric.

Kettenbach, Heinrich von, an eminent German writer of the period of the Reformation, was probably of French extraction. Little is known of his life. He became a Franciscan, and in 1521 went to Ulm in the place of one of the brethren expelled by the general of the order for holding evangelical opinions. Kettenbach, however, soon followed the example of his predecessor: he preached against the papacy and the monks, and, having thus aroused the enmity of the Dominicans, was in turn obliged to leave Ulm the same year. He then went to Wittenberg, where he openly joined the Reformation, took part in all the movements in favor of emancipation from Rome, and was probably killed in the peasants' war. Kettenbach was a very popular preacher, and made many converts. He wrote a book, which he attacked in Vergleichung des Allerheiligsten Herrn u. Vaters Vater gegen d. seltsamen u. freunden Gla. in d. Christenheit, genannt Jesu, etc. (Wittenb. 1523).—Practica: Neue Apostolische u. Verantwortung Martini Lu. wider d. Papisten Moraltsschrei (1528). It is generally supposed that Kettenbach wrote largely that his works have been lost. His influence among the Reformers must have been great, or he would not have been among the persons cited by Eek to appear with Luther before the Reichstag at Augsburg. See Priorer, Univ. Lex. s. v.; Veesenmeyer, Beiträge z. Gesch. d. Lutheriter u. Reformer in d. 16. Jh. p. 79 sq.; Reim, in Herzog, Reut.-Encyklop., s. v.

Kettle, "(774, dud, so called from boiling), a large pot for cooking purposes (1 Sam. ii. 14: elsewhere rendered "pot," Psa. lxxxi, 6; Job xii, 20; "caldron," 2 Chron. xxxiv, 18). The same term in the original also signifies "basket" (2 Kings x, 7; Jer. xxxiv, 2; probably Psa. lxxxi, 6). From the passage in 1 Sam. ii. 15, 14, it is evident that the kettle was employed for the purpose of preparing the peace-offerings, as it is said (verse 14), "All that the flesh-hook brought up the priest took for himself." In the various processes of cookery represented on the monuments of Egypt, we frequently see large sauce-pots placed over a fire in a similar manner. See Flesh-pot.

Kettlewell, John, B.D., an eminent English divine (nonjuror), was born at Northallerton, Yorkshire, March 10, 1653; studied at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, and in 1675 became fellow of Lincoln College. Still but a youth, he distinguished himself by the publication of his celebrated Essay on the Menaces of Christian Obedience. He was generally noticed, and in 1682 lord Digby presented young Kettlewell with the vicarage of Coleshill, Warwicksire, but he was deprived of it soon after the Revolution on account of his refusal to take the oath of obedience to William and Mary. He removed to London, and died there April 12, 1685. His principal works have been collected and published under the style, Works printed from Copyes revised and improved by the Author a little before his Death (Lond. 1715, 2 vols. fol.):—The Duty of Moral Rectitude (Tracts of Augt. Fawcett, iv, 219). Said that Kettensia Bibliothecarum, ib. 1725: Macaulay, Hist. of England, vol. iv (1846); Nelson, Life of Kettlewell (Lond. 1718).

Kettner, Friedrich Ernst, a German theologian, was born at Leipzig Jan. 21, 1671, and educated at the university of that place. He was licensed in 1697, and became immediately a superintendent in Quellinburg and first court preacher. He died July 21, 1722. His writings are mainly confined to local Church History.—Allgemeine Hist. Lex. iii, 22.

Ketura (Heb. Keturah, נִיהָד, gireled, otherwise Xeru-ta'ia), "the second wife, or, as she is called in 1 Chron. i. 32, the concubine of Absaham; by her he had six sons, whom he lived to see grow to man's estate, and whom he established 'in the east' (Gen. xxx, 1-6). B.C. cir. 1997 et post. As Abraham was 100 years old when Isaac was born, who was given to him by the special bounty of Providence when 'he was as good as dead' (Heb. xi, 12); as he was 140 years old when Sarah died; and as he himself died at the age of 175 years, it has seemed improbable that these six sons should have been born to Abraham by one woman after he was 140 years old, and that he should have seen them all grow up to adult age, and have sent them forth to form independent settlements in that last and feeble period of his life. It has been supposed that, as Keturah is called Abraham's 'concubine' in Chronicles, and as she and Hagar are probably indicated as his 'concubines' in Gen. xxx, 6, Keturah had in fact been taken by Abraham as his secondary or concubine wife before the death of Sarah, although the historian relates the incident after that event, that his leading narrative might not be interrupted. According to the standard of morality then acknowledged, Abraham might quite as properly have taken Keturah before as after Sarah's death (Kitto); although, it is true, this would hardly lack some force in comparison with his first marriage, with Sarah's feelings, and would have been likely to introduce into the family another scene of discord such as he had seen with Hagar. In opposition to these and similar arguments, however, which are maintained by Prof. Bush (Note on Gen. xxx, 1), Dr. Turner justly urges (Commen. on Gen. xxx, p. 298 sq.), that the evidence of the narrative, the occasion offered by the death of Sarah, which preceded Abraham's demise thirty-six years, and the emphatic manner in which Keturah is introduced as a full wife, with lawful heirs, although of less esteem than Sarah, is opposed to the object drawn from the import of Abraham in consequence of advanced age, it is readily removed by the implied renewal of his vigor at the promise of an heir by Sarah (compare Heb. xi, 11); and, if sound, it would prove too much, for it would require the birth of all the six sons by Keturah to be dated before that of Isaac. See ABRAHAM.

On the Arabian affinities of Keturah, see the Journal Asiatique, Aug. 1838, p. 197 sq. "Her sons were 'Zimmran, and Jokshan, and Marden, and Midian, and Ishbak, and Shuah' (Gen. xxx, 2); besides the sons and grandsons of Jokshan, and the sons of Midian. They evidently occupied the desert to the Persian Gulf, and the region of the Arabian sea. They were divided into the tribes of the Arabs, and of a young girl [or slave] of Abraham; and, it is added, her descendants are the Turks!" M. Causin de Perceval (Essai, i, 179) has endeavored to identify her with the name of a tribe of the Amalekites (the 1st Amalek) called Kâthûra, but his arguments are not of any weight. They rest on one word, and are contradicted by the statements of Arab authors, as well as by the fact that the early tribes of Arabia (of which is Kâthûra) have not, with the single exception of Amalek, been identified with any historical names; while the exception of Amalek is that of a tribe in the desert, and not of a pre-Israelite Arabian people as recorded in the Bible; and there are reasons for supposing that these early tribes were aboriginal" (Smith). See ABRAHAM.

KEUCHENIUS, Petrus, a learned Dutch theologian, was born at Dois-le-Duc August 22, 1625, and studied at Leyden and Utrecht. He was a successor minister at Alen, Tiel, and Arnhem. He died March 27, 1689. He wrote Amontata in omnes N. T. libros, the second and only complete edition of which, superintended by Alberti, appeared in 1697. In these annotations is to throw light on the N. Test. by determining the sense in which words and phrases were used at the time it was written, and among those with whom its writers were familiar. For this purpose he compares the language of the N. Test. with that of the Septuagint, and the ancient versions. His notes are characterized by sound learning and great good sense. Alberti commends in strong terms his erudition, his candor, solidity, and impartiality."—Kito's Biblical Cyclopaedia, ii, 729. Kewley, John, D.D., a Roman Catholic priest, was born a Catholic priest, and an Augustinian, and was in early life a Jesuit. He afterwards renounced the doctrines and communion of the Church of Rome, joined "Lady Huntingdon's persuasion," preached somewhat among that body and the Methodists, and, coming to the United States, was admitted to holy orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church by bishop Claggett (about 1804); in 1809 became rector of an Episcopal Church in Middleburgh, Conn., and in 1818 of the parish of St. George's, New York, where he continued till he sailed for Europe in 1816. He afterwards became reconciled to the Church of Rome, and returned to his original ecclesiastical connection, in which he continued till his death. Kewley was a man of great meekness and gentleness, always untiring in the discharge of his holy functions, and fervent and effective in his preaching. He published a Sermon delivered at the consecration of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Maryland in 1806; also a sermon entitled Messiah the Physician of Souls, preached at Midletown and Cheshire in 1811. See Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpite, v, 545. (J. L. S.) Key is a common heraldic bearing in the insignia of sees and religious houses, particularly such as had been attached to the patronage of St. Peter. Two keys in sallet are very frequent, and keys are sometimes interlaced or linked together at the bowes, i.e. rings. Keys inlaided are placed side by side, the wards away from each other. Key (Titus, 2 Peter, 1 Peter, 1 Peter, 1 Peter) is the name of an "opener," Judg. iii, 25; Isa. xxxii, 22; "opening," 1 Chron. ix, 27; xxiv, from its use in shutting, Matt. xvi, 19; Luke xi, 52; Rev. i, 18; iil, 7; ix, 1; xx, 1), an instrument frequently mentioned in Scripture, as well in a literal as in a figurative sense. The keys of the ancients were very different from ours, because their doors and trunks were generally closed with bands or bolts, which the key served only to loosen or fasten. Chardin says that a lock in the East is like a little harrow, which enters half way into a wooden staple, and that the key is a wooden handle, with points at the end of it, which are pushed into the staple, and so raise this little harrow. See LOCK. Indeed, early Oriental locks probably consisted merely of a wooden slide, drawn into its place by a string, and fastened there by teeth or catches; the key being a bit of wood, crooked like a sickle, which lifted up the slide and extracted it from its catches, after which it was drawn back by the string. But it is not difficult to open a lock of this kind even without a key, by the tongue, which is shaped in paste or other adhesive substance. The passage Cant. v, 4, 5 is thus probably explained (Harmer, Obs. iii, 81; vol. i, 394, ed. Clarke; Rauwolff, ap. Ray, Tran. ii, 17), Ancient Egyptian keys are often found figured on the monuments. They were made of bronze, iron, and consisted of a straight shank, about five inches in length, with three or more projecting teeth; others had a nearer resemblance to the wards of modern keys, with a short

Iron Key. (From Ancient Thebes, in Egypt.)
KEYS, POWER OF THE

The term "key" is frequently used in Scripture as the symbol of government, power, and authority. Even in modern times, in transferring the government of a city, the keys of the gates are delivered as an emblem of authority. In some parts of the East, for a man to march along with a large key upon his shoulder signifies claims to him to be a person of consequence. The size and weight of these oftentimes require them to be thus carried (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 493). So of Christ it is said, "And he clave the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open" (Rev. iii. 7). He also has the "keys of hell and of death" (Rev. i. 18; comp. ix. 1; xx. 1). Our Saviour said to Peter, as the representative of the apostles generally, upon whom collectively the same prerogative was on another occasion conferred, "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xvi. 19; xviii. 18) — that is, the power of preaching the Gospel officially, of administering the sacraments as a steward of the mysteries of God, and as a faithful servant, whom the Lord hath set over his house. This general authority is shared in common by all ministers and officers in the Church. The grant doubtless likewise included the authority to establish rules and constitutional orders in the Church, to which Christ himself gave no special ecclesiastical form, but left it to be organized by the apostles after his own resurrection. This power, too, in a subordinate degree, is delegated to the Church of later times; for it is noteworthy that even the apostles have not definitely prescribed any specific form of Church polity, and this is therefore, in a great measure, left to the discretion of each body of Christians. Indeed, the settlement of the cardinal doctrines of Christianity, as a basis of Church-membership and ecclesiastical discipline, appears to be the only explicit element of the authority conferred in these passages, or peculiar to his apostles — and exclusively belonged to them, inasmuch as their office was not transmissible; so that the canon of Scripture, as well as the essential points of Church constitution, have been completed by them for all time. See Successors. As to Peter himself, it is a gratuitous assumption on the part of Romanists that the authority was conferred upon him personally above his fellow-disciples, since in the other passage the general "ye" is used in place of the individual "thou." It is true, however, that as Peter was here addressed as the foremost, so to speak, of the apostolic college, he was eventually honored as the instrument of the introduction of the first Gentile as well as Christian members into the Church (see Acts ii. x), a fact to which Peter himself alludes in a very unassuming way (Acts xv. 7). The association of this authority with the power of absolution is another unauthorized use of the Roman Catholic Church; for the passage in which this is conferred (John xx. 23, "Whoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whoever sins ye retain, they are retained") stands in a very different connection, and is evidently intended to be the exclusive apostolic right to pronounce upon the religious state of those to whom, by the imposition of hands, they imparted the peculiar miraculous gifts of the primitive age (see Acts vii. 14-17; xix. 6). In accordance with the above analogies, the "keys of knowledge" is the means of attaining to true knowledge in respect to the kingdom of God (Luke xi. 25; comp. Matt. xxiii. 13; Luke xxiv. 32). It is said that authority to explain the law and the prophets was given among the Jews by the delivery of a key. See Binds. The Habibs say that God gave Peter the key of all things, to spread abroad the seeds of faith, and in a word, to guide the people. Peter was the key of light, that is, of spiritual brightness; Peter was the key of rain, the key of the grave, the key of fruitfulness, and the key of barrenness. See Keys, Power of the.

KEYES, JOSIAH, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Canajoharie, N. Y., Dec. 8, 1799; converted at the age of twelve; entered the Genesee Conference in 1819; was presiding elder on Black River District, and in 1835 on Cayuga District, where he died April 22, 1836. Mr. Keyes possessed a grasping intellect and great application. Without regular instruction, he acquired "a respectable knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and as a general scholar, a theologian, and a preacher of the Gospel." — Minutes of Conferences, ii, 412; Geo. Peck, D.D., Early Methodist (N. Y. 1860, 12mo), p. 74. (G. L. T.)

KEYS, JOHN, a Presbyterian minister of English descent, was born at Wilton, N. H., in 1807. At Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., in 1823, and afterwards taught school for several years. He studied theology at Morrisant, N. J., under James Richards, D.D.; was licensed in 1825, and in 1807 ordained by the New York Presbytery at Orangepledge, N. J., and in 1828 installed pastor of the Church at Sandy Ridge, New- Albany, N. Y. In 1814 he accepted a call from the Congregational Church of Wolcott, Conn.; in 1824 removed to Tallmadge, Ohio, as pastor of a Congregational Church, and afterwards preached successively at Dover, Newburg, Ohio; at Portia, Ill.; at St. Louis, Mo.; and at Cedar Rapids and Elkhart, Iowa. At last he returned to Dover, Ohio, where he died January 27, 1867. Mr. Keyes was an industrious student. As a preacher he took the greatest delight in his work; as a Christian he had great faith in the power of special prayer. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Ohio, 1868, p. 216; Mr. J. L. S.

KEYS, POWER OF THE, a term which in a general sense denotes the extent of ecclesiastical power, or, in a narrower sense, the right to authorize or prohibit abolution; and it is upon the interpretation in the one sense or the other that the Protestant and Romish churches differ from each other. We base this article in Herzog's Real-Enzyklop. xiii, 579 sq.

I. New Testament Doctrine. The expression κλεῖδα τοῦ θεοῦ δια Λία (Lxx. xx. 22), denotes the power which was given to the king's officer over the royal household. In literal symbolism, λεγεῖ διά Λία (Rev. iii. 7) denotes the authority which Christ as King exercises over his realm with special regard to his right of admission or dismission. When Jesus (Matt. xvi. 19) solemnly intrusted to Peter, as a representative of the apostles, the keys of the heavenly kingdom, he invested him by that act simply with his apostolic station, which involves the founding of the Christian Church by the preaching of the forgiveness of sins (Luke xx. 38) and the establishment of the Gospel doctrine (Matt. xx. 19). In this sense the commission (John xx. 23) to the other eleven apostles must likewise be interpreted, for we have no reason to believe that the apostles ever exercised the authority, as Jesus did, of relieving the sinner of his guilt and restoring him to favor. It would be added to show that the apostles did exercise such authority, all evidence that such authority was transferred to the Church after the apostolic age is surely wanting. Besides, it is proper to make a distinction between the power of the keys claimed for Peter as an exclusive apostolic authority to bind and to loose which Jesus (Matt. xvi. 19) also conferred not only upon his other apostles, but upon the whole Church (Matt. xviii. 18). Both expressions, to bind and to lose, which in New-Testament usage do not require a personal, but an impersonal object, mean, according to Balsillie's language, to permit and to forbid, to exercise the power to bind and to reveal (see Lightfoot, at loc. Matt., and comp. the art. Bind); and in the N.T. passages quoted they can refer only to the sphere of Christian social life. Against the opinion of the later Church, that Paul (1 Cor. v, 5-6) made use of the power of the keys to retain sins, Ritschl (Alte-Kathol. Kirche, 2d edit., p. 837 sq.) argues that in this passage only a disciplinary regulation is referred to; that Paul conceded to the Church the right of discipline, and only exercised authority when he supposed himself to act in harmony with the will of Christ. In the apostles' (2 Cor. vii, 6-10) held a contrary doctrine, he would be subject to the charge of_simulation. The apostolic writings, moreover, do not allude to any other agency in the Church for the remission of sins than that spoken of by Paul himself; 5 Cor. v, 18 seq., only conciliatory by Christ and the prayers of believers (1 John v, 16, 17, 16).

II. Doctrine of the Patristic Period.—The misconceptions of the meaning of the power to bind and to loose was early manifested in the Church. The Jewish-Christian Cenemoria Homicida, it is true, still evince a knowledge of the idea of the power to bind and to loose, inasmuch as they still supply—in the N.T. sense—an impersonal object; but, withal, they have so far enlarged upon the meaning of the expression as to find comprehended in the power to which it alludes all privileges of the episcopal office as a continuation of the apostolic office (iii, 72). Quite the opposite was held in the Gentile-Christian Church of the 2d century. It interpreted the power “to bind and to loose” as authority to retain and to forgive sin, and supplied the two verbs with personal objects; yet regarded—in the spirit of the early Church—as the authorities vested with the power to bind and to loose, the society (Church), and not the bishop. In so far as from a heathen-Christian stand-point the power of the “keys” was identified with the power “to bind and to loose,” the former was held to express in one conception both the latter acts, viz. excommunication and readmittance to the Church; but as the keys of Peter were taken also to comprehend all rights of Church government, and especially of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, we need not wonder that among the Church fathers of this age the two verbs were used somewhat mixed (comp. Tertullian, De Pudic. 21; Cyprian, De unit. eccles.; cap. 4). It was in the period of scholasticism—a period which really strict distinction was aimed at, and yet to this day Roman Catholics have failed to recognize generally this discrimination. The Church first regarded as bearers of the keys, i.e. of the power to bind and to loose, evidently because Christ works and has his abode there. (For this reason, also, the martyrs were accorded the position of “praeclara ecclesiae membria,” in whom Christ is active for his own glorification. Comp. Eusebius, v, 5, 5; Tertullian, De Pudic., Iadem, Apolog. 39.)

The first decided change of view is found among the Montanists. Tertullian (in De Pudicitia) limits the promise of Matt. xxv, 18 sq. simply to the person of Peter as the apostolic founder of the Church; the power to forgive sin he regards as the right of the Church in so far as she is identical with the Holy Ghost. The bearer of this right he holds to be the spiritual man (spiritualis homo), but that the latter, in the interests of the Church, abstains from exercising this prerogative. His opponent, the Roman bishop, however, interpreted it in favor of all the bishops (bishops are numerus episcoporum, chap. xxii). This thought Cyprian enlarged upon with a free use of the Montanistic thesis, holding that the episcopate is the inheritor (heir) of the apostolic power, the seat and the organ of the Holy Ghost, and therefore possessing of power to bind or to loose of its own accord. Of course, from such a stand-point, Cyprian was forced to reject as presumptuous the claim of the martyrs to the power of the keys; he only conceded to them the right of intercession for the fallen. To prove the ideal unity of the Church, Cyprian defined the argument that the power of the keys was first intrusted by Christ to Peter, and only afterwards to the other apostles (De uni. eccles. cap. iv). In the writings of Optatus Milerius this thought takes the form that the Church intrusted to Peter to bind and to loose the key to retain sins; Ritschl (Alte-Kathol. Kirche, 2d edit., p. 837 sq.) argues that in this passage only a disciplinary regulation is referred to; that Paul conceded to the Church the right of discipline, and only exercised authority when he supposed himself to act in harmony with the will of Christ; in the apostles' (2 Cor. iv, 6-10) held a contrary doctrine, he would be subject to the charge of simulation. The apostolic writings, moreover, do not allude to any other agency in the Church for the remission of sins than that spoken of by Peter himself; 5 Cor. v, 18 seq., only conciliatory by Christ and the prayers of believers (1 John v, 16, 17, 16).

At the Council of Chalcedon (451) the orthodox dogma of the grace of baptism (e.g. Epist. 73, c. 7) was further defined. Later, however, they are used in a narrower sense, and refer to great sins committed after baptism; in short, they denote the right of exercising penance-discipline, a power in principle conceded to the bishop, but which practically was limited to murder or treason, which actually was permitted to exercise only in union with all holy councils. All sins committed after baptism were subject to the power of the keys, only the greater ones, as Augustine has it, “committed against the Decalogue” (Serm. 851, 1 “De penit. c. 4). This declaration, however, is to be understood in the sense of the exemption of the sinner who passes against the ninth and tenth commandments; moreover, in the older practice, only the different species of idolatry, murder, and unchastity were punished by ecclesiastical courts. It is incorrect to argue, as has been done on the part of Protestants, that only the public sins — those which caused trouble to the Church were taken account of by the Church. As to the sins alluded to above, whether committed in secret or publicly, it was supposed that they did injury to the gifts of regeneration, and entangled the soul in the meshes of spiritual death; they were therefore held to be mortal defects or criminal (criminala mortaria, also cripulatio; the others were regarded as simply daily experiences of the remains of weakness cleaving to the believer, of which it seems almost impossible to be rid in this life. For the former only the power of the keys and the exercise of penance were regarded as in force; the latter, on the other hand, were supposed to be stoned for by the daily penance of a believing heart, by the fifth request in the Lord's Prayer, by oblation and the eucharist, etc. They were called pecunia reminiscit. Actually the power of the keys was exercised by the whole clerical body, under the presidency of the bishop. In formal inquisitions proceedings, the fact of the commission of a mortal sin was determined either by the voluntary confession of the perpetrator or by indiction and hearing of witnesses, followed, in case of established guilt, by the excommunication of the excommunicated. The excommunicated retained the privilege of praying for admission to the exercise of penance in the Church. This last, in early days, was in all cases public, especially after the time of Augustine, at least in cases of public crime; but after the beginning of the 13th century it was regulated by steps corresponding to catablematical grades. Upon the expiration of the term of penance, the length of which, in the early Church, was discretionary with the bishop, but in later times was determined by ecclesiastical laws, the excommunicated was again received into Church membership. This act, which was consummated by imposition of hands, prayer, and the kiss of peace by the bishop, with the assistance of the clergy before the altar (ante aspimen), in presence of the membership of the Church, was called reconciliation, or the bestowal of peace (paxem dare). Penitent souls, however, in danger of immediate death, could be reconciled even before the expiration of their period of pence, in presence of the bishop, by any presbyter, or, if such a one was not accessible, even by a deacon (Cyprian, Epist. xviii, 1; Conc. Eliberti, can. 92); a practice which we do not find as last as its Montanistic doctrine, which clearly proves that in the early Church reconciliation was more an act of jurisdiction than of order.
The earliest days of the Church, the exercise of its prerogative of the power to 'loose,' in reconciliation, coincided completely with abandonment, except that to this term there was not given the meaning which it received in the Middle Ages. Above all, it must not be forgotten that the Church fathers did not place the emphasis upon the act of repentance as they do now, but in the activity of the penitent himself; from the Church the penitent received only instruction how to heal the wound he had created by sin; hence they frequently designated penance as the medicine, and the sinner imposing it as the physician (the penitent). Vasilius (f. 40) states: "The Church does not undertake to repair himself from his crime by his good works, and merit the divine forgiveness. Thus must be understood Cyprian's frequent demand of 'justa penitentia,' which consists in the congruity of the guilt with the penance offered as reparation. That God alone absolved from sin was the accepted axiom of the early Church. Yet the Church hesitated not to consider itself one of the means of grace, competent to assist in the work of salvation, acting upon the theory laid down by Cyprian: 'Extra ecclesias nulla salus.' So long as the mortally sinning one seeks himself inwardly and outwardly, from the Church, the immediate way to salvation, divine forgiveness, seemed to him inaccessible; there was no need of judgment by the courts, he was already judged. If the Church again admitted him to membership among the purified, he was not necessary. He was the only object of the salvation, and he had at least the prospect of salvation; he now belonged to the number of those over whom the Lord on the final day would sit in judgment, from whom he would select his own. Upon this point Cyprian (Ep. lv. 15, 24) and Pacian (Epistol. ad Sympos. in fine) are very clear. As the absolving judgment of the Church thus becomes rather uncertain, depending upon approval or rejection in the final judgment, there was need of further elucidation. Reconciliation was therefore joined with prayer by a petition that God would forgive the penitent his sins, accept as sufficient his repentance, which of course could only afford a limited satisfaction for the committed offense, and restore to him the lost spiritual gifts. For this reason the act was accompanied by the imposition of hands; compare Augustine, De Baptismo, iii. c. 16, who says of this ceremony that it is "oratio super hominem," i.e. the symbolic pledge that the answer of prayer should benefit the penitent, and that with it was bestowed the gift of the Holy Ghost. In this sense Cyprian speaks of a "remissio facta per sacerdotes, ship Dominum gratia," for he knows only a forgiving only exists for him, who is absolved, with the Church. Thus these passages of Cyprian and Ambrose, this confiance in the Church, this assurance of divine absolution, were in the first ages of the Church, but we have every reason to suppose, upon the premises stated, that it could only have been deprecatory. Augustine even denounced the expression "I forgive thy sins," of the Donatists, as heretical (Serm. 99, c. 7-8). If, in our last allusion to the reconciliation of the sinner by means of prayerful intercession, the priest alone seemed to be entitled to be deprecator, we find a very different view was entertained by other Church fathers. In accordance with Lev. xiv, 2, Jerome says that the priests cannot make the leper clean, but the sinner; and between the clean and the unclean (Comm. in Matt. lib. iii). Not understanding, therefore, Matt. xvi, 19 to concede to the bishops and the elders any other power, it follows that he concede to the ecclesiastical office simply the authority of distinction, i.e. the judicial power of pronouncing those as les saints who had been inwardly loosed, and those as bound who have not yet been loosed by God's mercy—a judicial decision whose validity is essentially confined to the forum of the Church, and does not extend to the forum of God. Just so St. Augustine says (Comm. in Gen. 14, 19): "It must be determined what guilt has preceded and what repentance has followed guilt in order that the shepherd may loose those whom the Lord in his mercy visits with a sense of repentance. Only when the judg-
KEYS, POWER OF THE

Key of the inner judge is obeyed can the action of the officer to loose be a correct and real one." Adding, as he does Augustine, the narrative of the resurrection of Lazarus, it is evident that Gregory did not consider the bishop's action in mortal sins as anything more than constituting a recognition of the inner condition of the sinner. Just as God had breathed the spirit of life the eascent judge is to pronounce as loosed, those yet spiritually dead as bound.

As in the early Church great penitence was conceded once only, so reconciliation by the Church was not repeatedly granted. In the writings of the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries, we first find a witness for the principle of admitting also backsliders to penance and reconciliation.
This change of practice was a necessary consequence of the enactment of penitential laws which extended the use of the term mortal sin also to such offences as had formerly been considered simply venial.

III. Doctrine of the Middle Ages and the Roman Cathoic Church.—The ancient Church classified her members into three sections—the faithful, the catechumens, and the penitent. The power of the keys was exercised upon the former by the deacon; upon the latter by the bishop; and among the newly-converted Germanic nations to enlarge the practice of penance into a general institution in the Church, and to make the power of the keys, which concerned the penitent alone, a general court of appeal and of mercy for all the faithful. This was done first by subjecting also mental sins to the power of the keys, while in the earlier Church such a thing had never been dreamed of. The origin of this innovation has been demonstrated with full evidence by Wasserchleben (Bussordnung d. oberrheinischen Kirche, p. 108 sq.).
Monasmic was the exercise of penance for all life. In the monasterity it was early considered an act of asceticism to disclose to the brethren the most secret manifestations of sin. In the old British and Irish Church education was directed especially to the order and interests of practical Church life; morals and discipline were usually regulated by monastic also upon in the prestressed society at large, and more widely in the all civil legislation. As early as the 6th century, Cyprian, Viniffera, who flourished towards the end of the scholasticise, the order is given that mental sins, even if prevented from execution, should be amended for to the satisfaction of the bishop, and were to be taken over for the period of one year. The Anglo-Saxon Pemulentia, which bears the name of Theodore of Canterbury, prescribes for lus t of seven years to forty days' atonement. The rules of penance of the Irish monk Columbanus (died A.
D. 615) imported these regulations to the Continent, and, and ordered that all sinful lusts of the mind should be stated for by penance and bread and water from forty days to six months (compare Wasserchleben, Bussord-zung, p. 109, 1195, 835). In the 5th century the semi-Feudal John Cassian, of Marseilles, established eight principal sin (vita principal), from which grew the actual sins, namely, intemperance, licentious-ness, avariciousness, anger, sadness, bitterness, vanity, pride (Cod. S. S. Potamum vi-tris). In the instructions of Columbanus (Biblioth.
Patrismaries, xii, 23) they are mentioned under the name of crimina capitalis," by which the early Church designated simply those mortal actual sins that were subject to public penitence, and under that name they were introduced into several Anglo-Saxon and Frankish penance regulations. The Synod of Chalons, in the year 813, directed for private confession in the atonement, to the principal sins of the confessor, a commendation which Alcuin already made in his De divinis officiis, cap.
From these eight radical sins the seven death-sins of scholasticism were developed. In these regulations of penance we find also already penance redemptions, so important to the history of absolution, which originated simply by a transfer of the old Germanic composition system to ecclesiastical life.

The extension of the power to bind and to loose over all Christians was a necessary consequence of such influences as those just alluded to. In the instructions for penance of the abbot Ottham, of St. Gall (died A.D.
761), we have the principle laid down that without confession there is no forgiveness of sin. In Columbanus's book, De confess. (can. 80), on the basis of a teaching in the 5th and 7th centuries, it is ordered that before every communion there should be confession, especially of mental excitements. According to Regino of Prum (died 915) (De discipl. eccles. ii, 2), every person ought to confess at least once a year. The first provincial synod which makes confession a general obligation is that of Aachen, A.D. 1109 (canon 20, in two very varying recensions). Inocent III is really the originator of the general penance law [see Penance], and thus likewise of the regular periodic exercise of the power of the keys over all Christians.
A regulation has no doubt the intention of staying, by ecclesiastical shackles on the spiritual freedom, a spreading heresy, as seems evinced by the similarity of canon 29 of the fourth Lateran synod with the twelfth canon of the celebrated Synod of Toulouse in 1229.

Notwithstanding the opposition which manifested itself in the north of the empire, the laws of books and those of its rules not corresponding to the regulations of the older canons, its principles took effectutional hold, and caused a decided revolution in the practice of penance and reconciliation. Even though, after the 4th century, by the side of the public penance, pri-

Upon the theological importance of absolution, and the relation which the priest in the administering of it sustains to it, the same opposite opinions which we found in the /patrice period were entertained in the first half of the Middle Ages. According to the view of which Jerome in the Great Must be especially designated as representatives, the priest is judge in /foro ecclesiae, and may by his judgment simply determine and certify for the Church the manifestation of divine mercy in the penitent's heart. Thus, in the /Homile of Eginus of Noyon, which, in all probability, belong to the Carolingian period, we read that the priests, who are in Christ's stead, must by their office, in a visible manner (externally or ecclesiastically), absolve those whom Christ, by an invisible ( inwardly effected) absolution, declares worthy of his reconciliation (atonement). Thus says Haymo of Halberstadt (died 898), in a sermon (Hom. in Octaur, Ps. 118), after alluding to the practices of the O.-T. priests towards lepers: "Those whom he recognizes by repentance and worthy improvement as inwardly loosed, the shepherd of souls may absolve by his declaration." According to this view, divine forgiveness not only precedes priestly absolution, but also confession; it is the portion of the sinner from the moment when he repents in his heart and turns to God. Absolution of the Church in this instance is simply the confirmation of what God has already done. A proof that God has done it in his strength (cfr. also the condemnation of Gratian's treatment of the Decretals (can. xxxiii, qu. iii). He there proposes the question whether anybody can give satisfaction to God by simple repentance without confession (and consequently, also, without absolution). He first adduces the reasonableness of authorities that must compel an affirmative answer to this question, then those that would answer it in the negative; at the close he leaves it to the reader to decide for himself in favor of the one or the other, as both opinions have the favor and disapproval of wise and pious men. Thus, for example, Lombard, Gratian's contemporary, says (Sent. lib. iv, dist. 17) that the sense of forgiveness is felt before the confession of the lips, indeed, from the moment when the holy desire fills the heart. The priest has therefore the power to bind and to loose only in the sense that he declares men bound or loosed, just as the disciples declared Lazarus free from his bonds only after Christ had restored him to life. The declaration of the priest has therefore simply the effect of releasing before the Church the person already loosed by God. According to cardinal Robert Pulley (died 1158), a man of great divine feeling, a sinner as soon as he repents; absolution is a sacrament, i.e. the symbol of a sacred cause, for it externally represents forgiveness already secured in the heart by repentance, not as if the priest actually forgave, but as the external symbol, for the purpose of the priest, the sinner doubly sure of forgiveness, although it has already become manifested (Sentent. lib. vii., 12). If, at the same time, the anxiety still remaining in the heart is lessened or relieved, this is the effect of absolution, not depending so much upon the activity of the priest as upon God, from whom it springs. By the exercise of divine forgiveness the sinner is simply relieved of the ultimate consequences of his guilt, i.e. eternal damnation; yet earlier or more immediate punishment can only be prevented by his future efforts to atone for the act. Hence the priest imposes a certain measure of satisfaction, a compliance with which, alone from the passage of punishment corresponding to the greatness of his guilt; if the satisfaction is too moderate, the penitent must not fancy himself absolved before God; he will have to atone to the fulness of the measure either in this world or in the next. The prospect hereby becomes complete absolution before God we evidently do not find here conceived to be the prerogative of the Church; her judgment is competent only to free the sinner after compliance with her imposition of punishment; on divine punishments she has no judgment. Nearest in view to Robert Pulley comes Peter of Poictiers, chancellor of the University of Paris (he died about 1204), who (in his /Libri Sententiarum) lays down the doctrine that forgiveness of sin proceeds confession; and that it is solely by repentance that God freely condescends that the priest cannot relieve the confessing one of his guilt or of eternal punishment; both he asserts to be the prerogative of God alone. The priest has simply the authority to indicate or to declare that God has forgiven the penitent his sin. God, however, relieves of eternal punishment only on condition of definite satisfactions, which the priest has to determine as to measure, and to impose according to the greatness of the crime; and on this account the priest must possess not simply the power to loose, but also the power of discretion (claris discretionis), which is not granted to everybody. The penitent is therefore advised in all cases to go, if possible, beyond the measure of satisfaction imposed by the priest, lest in purgatory the offender may be obliged to make satisfaction for his neglect here. It is quite characteristic that this scholastic regards conscience as a sacrament, a new teaching of St. T., for the whole process of penance he bases upon the personal activity of the penitent (Sent. iii, cap. 18 and 16). Alongside of this view, according to which the possessor of the power of the keys officiates essentially as judge in /foro ecclesiae, another is entertained, which finds its strongest supporters in the Gemonian school; to whom the priest is intercessor and mediator for the penitent before God. This particular view, in its successive developments, has exerted the greatest influence in expanding the priestly power of the keys. This position is assigned to the priest in all late pontifical books. Its nature is clearly defined by Alcuin, who, from the analogy of Leviticus (v, 12), in which the sinner is advised to seek the priest with his sacrifice, draws the conclusion that Christian penitents also must bring their sacrifice of confession to God by way of the priest, in order that the latter may intercede for him and secure the forgiveness of the Lord (Adfratr. in provinc. Gatharonum, ep. 96). For this very reason he calls (in his De officia divina) the priest "sequester ac mediarius inter Deum et peccatores hominem ordinatus, pro peccatorum intercessor." This sacerdotal intercession received a higher emphasis in the 11th or 12th century by the De cuta et jilere penitentiarum, a work attributed, though incorrectly, to Augustine. It develops the following doctrines: 1. That the priest in confession stands in God's stead—his forgiveness is God's forgiveness; for does not Christ say, "Whom ye hold to be innocent, I also hold to be innocent. Whom ye condemn to be guilty, I also condemn to be guilty"? (cap. xxv.) 2. Gregory the Great had already laid down the dogma that by penance (but not by absolution), sin, which in itself was irremovable, became removable, i.e. became an expiable guilt by the perspicacity of the sinner, of which thought was modified in the work just alluded to, so that in confession, it is true, the sinner is not cleared before God, but the committed offence is changed from a mortal to a venial sin (cap. xxv). 3. Such sins no longer incur eternal, but simply temporal punishment, and may be atoned for, either in this world by works of confession, or after death in purgatory, where the pain to be endured for them shall far exceed any tortures which the martyrs ever suffered in this life. This thought was taken up by the Victorians, and from it was developed a complete system. Hugo of St. Victor regarded the penitent's prayer in the Litany as the most appropriate adoration, the most perfect intercession, the most pure mouth of God's mercy (Adfratr. in provinc. Gatharonum, ep. 96). And why should he not? Had not pope John VIII., in the year 878 (Epist. 60), already assumed for himself the power, in virtue of his authority from Peter, to bind and to loose, to absolve from all sins, those who had fallen in battle for the Church? and had not bishop
KEYS, POWER OF THE

Jerusalem, of Limoges, in 1081, at the council held in that city, developed the principle that Christ had intrusted to his Church such a power, that she may loose after death those who were living in it. Bond (Marais, xvi, 589; Grimme, Ch. Hist., i, 1, 38, note 8) says that this principle was quickly spread among his contemporaries. Cardinal Pulley says that confession made to the priest means virtually (quasi) confession to God; and Alexander III declares that what the priest learns in confession he does not learn as a judge, but as God ("ut Deus," cap. 2, ap. Greg. De offic.; jurid. ordin. i, 81). Now if we behold in the priest an intermediate being between God and man, surrounded by a splendor before which the layman's eye is blinded, it is no more than reasonable to expect that his acts must gain in importance, and his position approach near that of the God under whom he represents him-tative. Hugo beholds the sinner bound by a twofold bondage—by an internal and external, by hardness and by incurable damnation; the former God loses by con-nition, the latter by the assistance of the priest, as the instrument by which he works. Here also the resurrection of Lazarus serves both as example and as proof (ibid., pt. xiv, cap. 8).

His pupil, Richard of St. Victor, goes a step further in his tract De potestate lignandi et solvens. Loosening from guilt, the effects of which are basically imprison (impotency) and servitude (as has been said), is a thing only accomplished by the justly justified, or by the justly justified only, by men, who need not necessarily be priests; it is done even before confession, by contrition. The loosening from eternal punishment God performs by the priest, to whom, for this purpose, the power of the keys has been intrusted; he changes it (i.e., the punishment) into a transitory one, to be absolved either upon earth or in purgatory. The loosening from transitory punishment is effected by the priest himself by changing it into an ex-ce of penance, which is done by the imposition of a corresponding satisfaction.

If he is considered, side by side, two opinio, namely, that the administrator of the power of the keys either judges in foro ecclesiae or as an interceding mediator, we need not wonder that the advance of doctrinal development soon effected a dialectical union of the two. Richard of St. Victor evidently aimed at such a fusion; the great scholastics of the 13th century accomplished it; and Thomas Aquinas is to be especially regarded as the author of the doctrine defined by the Council of Trent. Alexander of Hales, in his Summa Theologiae (pt. iv, qu. 20, membro iii, art. 2), opens with the proposition: "Aeternum judicat Deus, sanumque resurrecit, sed non omne sacerdos, sed unus eligitur, qui semper dicitur in foro ecclesiae. Unum est, igitur, quem in foro, quem in se, et di verum in foro, nition, that all parts of the sacrament of penance se-ure their unity in it. Thomas himself argues that God alone relieves of guilt and eternal punishment on condition of mere contrition; but this contrition can only as-re the heart, and affect the forms of primary corruption, followed by the fulness of love (as an attendant of fides formatio), and furthermore must be accompanied with a desire for sacramental confession and absolution. To him who thus repents, guilt and eternal punishment are already remitted before confession, because in the conmitante desire, while repenting, to subject himself to the power of the keys, the latter at once exerts its influence (in actu exerit), although not in actu se exercet. If such a person comes into the penance-chair, the grace showered upon him is greatly increased (augeret gru-

ia) by the exercise (in actu) of the power of the keys. But if contrition does not sufficiently fill the sinner's heart (for want of love, as is frequently the case in the simple attrito, and therefore his disposition does not admit the actual exercise of the power of the keys, then the latter supplements his disposition by removing any still existing impediment to the enjoyment of the remission of sin-grace, provided he does not himself bar all access to his heart. In all these relations the priest has that place in the sacrament of penance which water holds in the sacrament of baptism; the former is instrumentum ministrum, as the latter is instrumentum sacram. His power, whether simply in foro ascribed to actu exerted, makes way for the overflowing stream of mercy, and secures the necessary disposition for its reception (chap. 18, art. 1 and 2). The power of the keys is consequently the red thread which is threaded at discretion, drawn through penance, and becomes visible to the outward eye also in absolution. It gives the real form, the frame that secures to all acts of penance (which by its structure forms the sacred altar), and receives a sacramental character their inner connection, and supplies to all what is still needed for their completion (comp. qu. 10, art. 1). This is manifest in the effects of absolution by the power of the keys; for example (according to qu. 18, art. 2), temporal punishment is remitted, and the confession is ratified (Richard of St. Victor). Yet this is not completely done as in baptism, but only in part; the portion still remaining must be atoned for by the personal satisfactions of the penitent, by his prayer, by almsgiving, by fasting to the fullness of the measure meted out by the priest (qu. 18, art. 5). The imposition of satisfactions Thomas calls binding, i.e., obliging to atone for punishments still in reserve. The satisfactions have the twofold object of appeasing divine justice and of counteracting any tendency in the soul to sin. Punishment still in reserve (peccata satisfactiores) again are imposed in virtue of the power of the jurisdic- tion (by means of indulgence (qu. 25, art. 1), which in the forum of God has the same value as in that of the Church; and this, according to the idea of substituting satisfaction on which it rests, may be of benefit even to souls in purgatory.

By this further development of the doctrine of the power of the keys the form of absolution also was nec- essarily considerably altered. Alexander of Hales says that in his day the deprecatory formula preceded and was followed by the indults; and this he justifies from his position by the sentence, "Est deprecatio gra- tiam impetrat et absolutioni gratiam supponit" (comp. pt. iv, qu. 21, membr. 1). The indicative form of absolution, however, must have been an innovation, for the unnamed opponent of Thomas alluded to in his opusculum xxiii (others xxii) actually asserts that to within thirty years the absolution formula used by all priests was Absolutionem et remissionem iibi tribuat Deus. Thomas de- fends with special emphasis the formula Ego te absolvo, etc., because it has in its favor the analogy of other sac- raments, and because it precisely expresses the effect of the act. He places rather, in the first place, the effect of the absolution, namely, the forgiveness of sins, as an exercise of the power of the keys. He interprets its content in the following words: "Ego impenso iibi sacra- mentum absolutionis." But he also advises that the indicative form be preceded by the deprecatory, lest on the part of the penitent the sacramental effects may be put in question. (Cod. Litra. 10, Mem. 1). The doctrine of Thomas had in its essentials already been dogmatically defined by Eugenius IV in 1439 at the Council of Florence (ManSI, xxxii, 1057), and in its different rules more minutely at the Council of Trent, at its fourteenth session, Nov. 25, 1551. The Council of Trent, in its decree and the canons appended, had sim- ply pronounced authoritatively the exclusive right of the priest to absolve, and it explained the spirit of the latter to be not merely an announcement of forgiveness, but a judicial and sacramental act. The Roman cate- chism enters far more into detail on this particular point: as the priest in all sacraments performs Christ's office, the penitent has to honor in him the person of Christ. Absolution announced by him does not simply mean, but actually procures forgiveness of sin (pt. ii, cap. v, qu. 17 and 11), for it causes the blood of Christ to flow unto us, and washes away sins committed after baptism (qu. 10). If, in contrition, confession, and satisfaction, the personal activity of the penitent (the opus operans) is pre-eminent, on the other hand, in absolution (by which, as the forma sacramentalis, those acts of penance first really as- sume the character of a perfect act), the absolution by the priest (the forma operativa), he must become perfectly passive (for it operates altogether as opere operato). From this stand-point the objection frequently raised on the Roman Catholic side against Protestant polemics seems in some sort reasonable, namely, that absolution is neither hypothetical nor absolute, and that it is a sacramental act to which this distinction cannot actually be applied; and it must be conceded on our part that, with the conditions under- stood to be concurrent, it furnishes such a degree of cer- tainty, such a finality of disposition, to each individual in every one who does not intentionally frustrate it.

This, however, is only one side, in which the priest stands as intercessor between God and the penitent, no longer (as formerly regarded) as a deprecant simply, but as dispenser of mercies. The Roman Catholic concep- tion of absolution furnishes a condition for the personal absolu- tion side, according to which the priest is essentially judge, not simply in foro ecclesiae, but also, at the same time, in foro Dei, i.e., judge in God's stead. As such, he inves- tigates sin to determine a corresponding punishment, and examines the spiritual condition of the penitent in order to know whether to bind or to loose. He is there- fore not simply executor of the opus operans, but also judge of the opus operans. Now, as such, he gives a judgment, and this must be either hypothetical or absolute. If we look at the form of the sacramental prac- tices, at the sacrificial act, at the dispensation of grace, the more the acts and the faith of the Roman Catholic in the absolving priest is to be looked upon as if he heard the words of Christ to the leper, "Thy sins be forgiven thee" (L. c. qu. 10), we cannot do otherwise than regard the priestly deed as both absolute, both by its form and in view of the infallible division. If, on the other hand, we consider that the priest—and this is con- ceded on the part of the Roman Catholics—may also be fallible; that the confessor is, after all, a very imperfect surrogate on account of his want of omnipotence; yes, that but very seldom any certain knowledge of the spiritual condition of the confidant, his judgment must necessarily become conditioned; the whole sacrament becomes equally hypothetical, as upon this rests its basis. Thus the Roman Catholic doctrine fluctuates between two opposite poles of assurance and contingency. This, indeed, is the necessary consequence of its development as we have followed it in history, in which two separate originally distinct views as to the position of the priest in absolution had been combined, without, however, really agreeing with each other.

Thus was the power of the keys developed. A very new development was given to the doctrine of the power of the keys by the Reformers. Especially noteworthy is,

1. Luther's Attitude.—He retained private confession and private absolution, although he knew them to be unnecessary (see Munock's Aries; he also abolished the sacramental character of absolution. Yet, notwithstanding this apparent adherence to Romish practices, it will be found that he changed, so to speak, regenerated the whole institution in a reformatory spirit. With Luther also the power of the keys is identical with the power to bind and to loose. The keys he re- gards as nothing else than the authority or office by which the Word is practiced and propagated. As the Word of God, from the nature of its contents, is both law and gospel, so the sermon has the twofold task of alarming the secure sinner by threats of the law, and of giving peace to the troubled conscience by the consola- tions of the Gospel, i.e., by the forgiveness of sins. The former is denoted by the binding key, the latter by the loosing key, which are both equally essential to keep Christ in the narrow path of spiritual life. Even the sermon Luther therefore considers as an act (the essential act) of the power of the keys, and the consola- tion afforded by it as a perfectly effectual absolution. From the latter, however, is to be particularly distin- guished common absolution, accorded at the close of the sermon, in which the priest dismisses all hearers for obtaining themselves forgiveness of sin; also private absolution, to be received only at the confessional, and which is nothing more nor less than a sermon confined to one auditor. The existence of these two distinct modes of exercising the keys he ascribes partly to God's riches, who did not wish to manifest any listlessness in the matter, and partly to the wants of an abashed conscience and a timid heart, which greatly need this strength and stimulus against the devil. The value of private absolution he places in its quasi sacramental character, for, like the sacrament, it also affords a real advantage in confining the Word to a particular person, and thus more securely strikes home than in the sermon. It is true, for this reason, private absolution cannot be regarded as an absolute necessity to forgiveness, for the views it is unquestionably here taken from an official and advisable (St.ites, Privatabtesliche u. Privatab solUTION, p. 7-14). As Luther, moreover, did not look upon the confessional as a judicial authority, but simply as a mercy-seat, so he looked upon absolution, which he recognized as the most important feature of confession, not as a judicial decision, but as the simple announcement of the Gospel: "They sins are forgiven thee"—the apportionment of the forgiveness of sin to a particular person, the confinement of its consolation to the most individual needs of a single heart. The power and effect do not depend upon the person upon whom it rests or the manner in which it is exercised; it may be ascribed either to God, or to the office of Christ, which is announced by it, and upon the command of Christ, which is executed by it. For this very reason, all distinction of human and divine activity disappears from it; neither is the sentence of the person absolving anything but the word of God, nor does the absolver announce upon earth the judgment of heaven, but in the forgiveness at absolution God's forgiveness is directly afforded. The only condition upon which the effect of absolution depends is that upon which rests the efficacy of the word of God, i.e., the faith of the person, namely, faith; by faith it is received. Repentance is efficacious only so far as it is the indispensable preparation for the reception, but in itself cannot insure forgiveness, as without faith it remains simply sin come to life and experienced in the heart, a Judas-pain of despair (St.ites, ut supra, ib. 15-18). Notwithstanding this irremissible necessity of faith, Luther is far from basing it upon his power of absolution; a weak faith may receive strength also; yes, even to the unbeliever it is truly offered, and affords him forgiveness on account of the inwardness of the Word of God, who demands it, and on this account the power to loose in private absolution is not accompanied by the power to bind. Upon this rests the importance of the distinction between private absolution and private confession; for to confess does not mean anything else than inwardly to declare absolution for our own guilt. Confession can therefore not be offered to anyone for God himself does not offer it; it must be an inward want. For this reason, again, no remuneration can be demanded of the person confessing. Luther makes no distinction between the absolution of the layman and that of the priest. It is also his opinion that man cannot too frequently enjoy absolution and the consolation of forgiveness, hence God, in the riches of his mercy, has so ordered it that this consolation may be experienced wherever the Church of the faithful exerts her influence. In this connection, it was not infrequently said, "Our confession all one's different sins, it is most important to confess those that particularly oppress the heart. The key to bind, for which Luther found no place in private confession, he assigned particularly to jurisdiction; it forms absolution for the Church, which is exercised in all the different and varied forms of public sin and reproach, and for notorious distinction to reparation; it is the public declaration of the Church that the sinner has bound himself, i.e., has deprived himself of all association of love, and surrendered himself to the devil. It excludes simply from the public association with the Church and her sacraments, not from the inner membership of the Church, from which the sinner himself only can cut loose. It is merely a public punishment of the Church, and has no other object than to improve the sinner. For this reason he is simply excluded from the sacrament, not from the sermon, nor even from the intercession of the Church on his behalf. The loosing from the ban is the public declaration of forgiveness by the Church, and the sinner himself must be reconciled to and is again accepted by the Church. This loosing is to be granted to any one who seeks it in repentance and faith; and this absolution of the Church, in virtue of the power of the keys, is God's absolution. A ban unjustly imposed can do the person so punished no harm, and should be borne patiently; nor must it be forgotten that external membership in the Church may be coexistent with exclusion from inner membership.

2. Melanchthon coincided generally with Luther on the doctrine of the power of the keys, but with this difference that he regarded the keys as possessing a more exalted status in the office of the episcopal or ministerial office. Yet we find in ecclesiastical regulations made under his supervision, as early as 1548, some decided deviations from Luther's doctrines. It is there directed to admit no one to communion "unless he has previously received private absolution from his pastor or some other competent person" (Richter, Kirchenordnung, ii. 45). Furthermore, the right is conceded to the absolving minister, under certain conditions, to deny absolution to the confessing. The ban itself, however, in consequence of its abuse, was early taken out of the hands of the clergy, and its imposition left to the Consistory. Absolution was bestowed in the church at Sunday vesper service by imposition of hands. The formulas of absolution are partly expository; not unfrequently both stand side by side for reception.

Cheninitz is the first who disputes that absolution can be regarded as a sacrament in the same manner as baptism and communion, and assigns for his reason that it rests simply upon the Word of God, and has received no additional external sign. He also regards the exercise of absolution as a right of the church's community, not as a right of the individual, though he adds that the person who demands it, and on this account the power to loose in private absolution is not accompanied by the power to bind. Upon this rests the importance of the distinction between private absolution and private confession; for to confess does not mean anything else than inwardly to declare absolution for our own guilt. Confession can therefore not be offered to anyone for God himself does not offer it; it must be an inward want. For this reason, again, no remuneration can be demanded of the person confessing. Luther makes no distinction between the absolution of the layman and that of the priest. It is also his opinion that man cannot too frequently enjoy absolution and the consolation of forgiveness, hence God, in the riches of his mercy, has so ordered it that this consolation may be experienced wherever the Church of the faithful exerts her influence. In this connection, it was not infrequently said, "Our confession all one's different sins, it is most important to confess those that particularly oppress the heart. The key to bind, for which Luther found no place in private confession, he assigned particularly to jurisdiction; it forms absolution for the Church, which is exercised in all the different and varied forms of public sin and reproach, and for notorious distinction to reparation; it is the public declaration of the Church that the sinner has bound himself, i.e., has deprived himself of all association of love, and surrendered himself to the devil. It excludes simply from the public association with the Church and her sacraments, not from the inner membership of the Church, from which the sinner himself only can cut loose. It is merely a public punishment of the Church, and has no other object than to improve the sinner. For this reason he is simply excluded from the sacrament, not from the sermon, nor even from the intercession of the Church on his behalf. The loosing from the ban is the public declaration of forgiveness by the Church, and the sinner himself must be reconciled to and is again accepted by the Church. This loosing is to be granted to any one who seeks it in repentance and faith; and this absolution of the Church, in virtue of the power of the keys, is God's absolution. A ban unjustly imposed can do the person so punished no harm, and should be borne patiently; nor must it be forgotten that external membership in the Church may be coexistent with exclusion from inner membership.

As a misinterpretation of the original Protestant view on this doctrine we must certainly regard Bähr's position that abjuration is a juridical act; and he, in consequence, distinguishes the potestas ordinis and the potestas clavium or jurisdictionis, and determines the former to be a potestas publice docendi et sacramentis administrandi, and the latter a potestas revocandi et revocandis pecatoribus (Bähr, loc. cit., §§ 59, note 9).

8. The Swiss reformers, from the very commencement, interpreted the power of the keys to refer especially to the exercise of ecclesiastical government, and more particularly to Church discipline, and in this sense they have been adhered to by the Genevan church. Little light is shed by the Swiss writers pertaining to this subject. On the other hand, Calvin referred the power of the keys altogether to the preaching of the Gospel and the exercise of Church discipline, disregarding the sacramental idea. He taught: 1. Absolution is twofold: one part paper faith, the other belongs to Church discipline. 2. Absolution is nothing else than the witness of the forgiveness of sin based upon the forms of the Gospel (Matt. liii. cap. iv., § 29). 3. Absolution is conditioned by faith, that is, by a faith that is not merely a paper faith. As to the existence of these conditions men must necessarily be uncertain, so that the certainty of binding and loosing does not depend upon the judicial decision of a human court. The servants of the divine Word can therefore absolve only conditionally (§ 26), in virtue of the divine Word. They can only promise forgiveness to all who believe on Christ, and threaten damnation to those who do not lay hold of Christ (§ 21). 5. In this exercise of their functions they can, for this reason, not fall into error, for they do not promise more than the Word of God commands them; while the sinner can secure for himself certain and complete absolution with perfect assurance whenever he will lay hold upon the mercy of Christ in accordance with the spirit of the Bible promises, "According to thy faith be it unto thee" (§ 22). 6. The other absolution, which forms a constituent of Church discipline, is directed to the individual sins; it exterminates only any offence which may have been given to the Church (§ 23). In this also the Church follows the infallible rule of the divine Word: in virtue of this word she announces that all adulterers, thieves, murderers, and the unjust shall not have part or lot in the kingdom of God; and in this binding she cannot err. With this same word she looses the repeating ones, to whom she brings consolation (§ 21). According to these principles, which, with utter disregard of the sacramental idea, designate absolution simply as a species of sermon, and with it reproduce the doctrine of German Protestantism in an improved form, Calvin could not cast aside private absolution; yet he declined to recognise in it a general institution of the Church, and made its administration dependent upon the individual need of those who should demand it. Its value to the end in view he speaks of very much in the strain of the Lutheran Church: "It happens sometimes that some one hears the promises given to all the faithful, and nevertheless remains in doubt whether to him also his sins are forgiven. When such a one uncovers his secret wound to his pastor, and hears that voice of the Gospel, 'Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee' (Matt. ix. 2), addressed to himself, his heart is quieted and freed from all fear. Nevertheless we must take care lest we should dream of a power of the keys not in accord with the doctrine of the Church (§ 14). The truth is, this does not look exactly like Lutheran private absolution, but it is certainly the only evangelical sense; and of this alone the Scriptures, the apostolic Church, and the following centuries down to the Middle Ages, know anything.

4. Private absolution, as a whole, could be a blessing only so long as that specific religious interest which the Reformation awakened in all circles remained fresh and full of life; with a latitude of the latter, the former also, together with confession, its offspring, necessarily deteriorates to a formal, thoughtless form, and, instead of encouraging faith, favored a false sense of security. The bewailing of the Lutheran churches its exercise was ignored, and finally resulted in a complete change of the manner of confession and absolution (Steits, p. 169 sq.). The fresh and living spirit of the Reformation had fled, private confession and private absolution had sunk to a mere thoughtless form, Church ban had become a punishment, public reconciliation a public restitution; this ecclesiastical punishment was pronounced only by the consistory, and simply in cases of offences of the flesh.

5. Suddenly Pietism came forward with a loud protest, and demanded a decided reform in the exercise of the power of the keys. The forerunner in this direction was Theophilus Grotiusgebauer, professor at Rostock (Wiedertimmer aus dem verwüsteten Zion, 1661), who regarded as essential for private sins only confession before God, but for public sins, to which alone he referred the power to bind and to loose, public confession and reconciliation in presence of the offended Church. Spener, although in favor of retaining private confession and private absolution, advocated a modified form, viz., an announcement of the fault, made public, to the elders or deacons of the church, and examination of the condition of the confessor's soul; and he insisted that the confessor, whose choice he left to personal confidence, should absolve only those truly repenting, but should impress the sinner with his guilt, and summon him to appear before a college of elders for them to judge and to exercise the authority of the ban. With special emphasis he declared the power of the keys to be a right of the whole Church or of the brotherhood, which, by way of abuse, had fallen exclusively into the hands of the ecclesiastics. With far greater decision his adherents opposed the institution of private confession: the attacks of pastor Johann Kaspar Schade, of Berlin, on the confessional, which he called an institution of Satan, and his absolution of private absolution of his own accord, resulted first in an investigation of the merits of the question (Nov. 16, 1659), and finally in the condemnation of the doctrine (May 17, 1660). This was followed by a like regulation on the part of other states, which ordered confession and absolution of all confidants in common, but, on the other hand, left private confession and private absolution to be determined by the needs of the individual. Pietism and Lutheran orthodoxy led the latter to declare private confession and private absolution a divine institution, and thus only brought some credit to the old Lutheran institutions, while it greatly increased the fervor of their opponents.

4. In the sphere of dogmatism Schleiermacher was the first among German Protestant divines to reintroduce the idea of the power of the keys, but he confines its application, after special exclusion of the sermon, to the law-giving and judicial (administrative) power of the Church, which he regards as the essential outgrowth of the ecclesiastical office of Christ, and whose existence he ascribes to the association of the Church with the world (§ 144, 145). When we consider, however, how vague and contradictory are the confessional books of the evangelical churches on this point (we need in viti.e only a comparison of the passages collected by Schleiermacher in § 145), how things altogether distinct are there joined, and how difficult it is in an exegetical way to define the subject with any degree of certainty, it seems the most proper course to ignore the attempt altogether of introducing into dogmatism the significations of the term "keys," and to leave, in the hope of being kindred to, "to bind and loose." What has thus far been written upon these phrases would have been much more in place in defining "forgiveness of sin" and "justification" when alluding in practical theology to preparation for communion (as has been done, with a good deal of tact, by Nitschke in his Prakt. Theol. ii, 2, 420), and in ecclesiastical law under discipline without any cause for fear of complication.

As regards the idea of absolution so prominent in the exercise of the power of the keys, it has, during the last twenty years, again become (in Germany) matter of general discussion. The eminent court preacher, Dr. Ackermann (as the Church diet in Bremen in 1852), on private confession. Although he did not lay particular stress upon absolution, but simply justified confession on its own account and as a psychological need, it naturally led to a discussion by the Church diet, followed by a lively discussion between the Lutheran and Reformed ministers. On this part of the Lutherans every possible effort was made to reinvest private absolution with its former rights, and to prove the way at least for its early reintroduction. They went so far as to claim it as an institution, argued for general absolution as a duty, and, well knowing its origin in the Middle Ages, appealed to it as an institution sanctified by tradition of the Church.
even the assertion was not wanting that absoluteness, under all circumstances, possesses divine power, as actually to free the sinner from his guilt, quite in contradiction to the new Lutheran doctrine. See Lutheranism, New.

V. Doctrine of the Greek Church.—The Greek Church entertains views on the doctrine of the power of the keys and on dissolution very similar to those entertained by the Latin Church in the Middle Ages. The subject is treated in full in Govel, Account of the Greek Church (Cambridge, 1722, fol.), p. 229 sq.; Neale, Eastern Church, Intro., i. See Greek Church.

VI. Doctrine of the Church of England and of the Protestant Episcopal Church.—On the question of absolution, as involved in the so-called “power of the keys,” there is a division of opinion similar to that noticed above in the Lutheran Church of Germany. This difference is but a part of a wide divergence of views on the whole question of ministerial functions, and is generally denied by the opposite terms the High-Church and the Low-Church party. See Ritualism.

Kesvi, Leonhard, a Baptist martyr, originally a Roman Catholic priest, flourished in the first half of the 16th century. He joined the Baptists in 1525, and immediately began preaching the Reformation doctrine, undimmed by all the tyranny exerted against the faithful by water, fire, and sword. In the second year of his ministry (1527) he was apprehended at Scherdin, on the River Inn, and condemned to the flames. “The chief heads of accusation against him were, that faith alone justifies, without good works; that there are only two sacraments; that the Gospel was not preached by the papists in Germany; that confession is not God's command; that Christ is the only satisfaction for sin; that there is no purgatory; that Christ is the only Mediator; and that all days (alluding to feast or saint's days) are alike with God.”—Baptist Martyrs, p. 60.

Keszi (Heb. Keszai), כזא, καζία, as in Ps. xliv, 9; Septuag. Kasseis v. v. Kaeaei, the name of Job's second daughter, born to him after the return of his prosperity (Job xlii, 14). B.C. cir. 2220.

Kedzi (Hebrew Ketsis), כ'ץ, e'zek, valley, prefixed; Septuag. both Α'μεζάζις, Vulg. Vallis Cosiae, or rather Enék-Kézis (Yale of Kezis), a city of the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned between Beth-hoglah and Beth-arabah (Jos. xviii. 21), and therefore probably situated in a steep ravine of the same name leading to the valley of the Jordan. See Bernab., M. De Saulcy found a small valley by the name of Kestis about an hour and a half distant from Bethany, in the direction of Jericho (Narrative, ii, 17), which he conjectures (p. 26) was the ancient Valley of Kestis. So also Van de Velde (Memoirs, p. 229) calls it Wydy el-Kezi.

Khadîjah is the name of the first wife of the Islamic prophet. See Mohammed.

Khan is the more common Arabic name for the public establishments which, under the less imposing title of menzal, or the more stately one of currucumserori (q. v.), correspond to our Occidental ideas of an inn (q. v.). These afford lodging, but not usually food, for man and beast. They are generally found near towns, but sometimes in the open country on a frequented route. They are mentioned in the N. Test. (παναλεόν, Luke x, 84) and Talmud (בָּנָא, Lightfoot, pp. 799), and something of the kind seems to occur in the later books of the O. T. (בָּנָא, Jer. xii, 17; the סְרְבָּאָה of Luke ii, 7 is, however, thought by some to have been of a more private character). The earlier Hebrews knew of no such provision for travellers (Gen. xlii, 27; Exod. iv, 24); 2 Kings xix, 29; the גְּדֹלָה being merely the stopping-place over night; the גְּדֹלָה of Josh. ii, 1 indicating rather a brothel, and the גְּדֹלָה of 1 Sam. xix, 18 the home of the prophet-scholars. Entertainment was generally furnished by individual hospitality (q. v.).

Khachadur, an Armenian theologian, flourished in the opening of the 17th century. He was bishop of Dehougha, and in 1690 was sent by the Armenian patriarch Michael III to Constantinople on ecclesiastical missions to Galicia, and later to Poland. He is particularly celebrated, however, as a poet.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Génr., xxvi, 675.

Khachapli I, elected patriarch of Armenia in 972, is noted in the annals of the ecclesiastical history of Armenia for the interest he manifested toward literature and the fine arts, and for the establishment of a number of monasteries. He died at his residence in Arinca in 992.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Génr., xxvii, 676.

Khachapli II was patriarch of Armenia in 1008, but was oppressed by the Byzantine emperor Constantine Ducas, who imprisoned him for some three years, and then banished him to Cappadocia. He died in 1014.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Génr., xxvii, 675.

Khazar or Khassar is the name of a Finnish people, a rude but powerful nation, north of the Caucasus, related to the Bulgarians and Hungarians, which in the 8th century embraced Judaism. After the disolution of the empire of the Huns they settled on the borders of Europe and Asia, and at one time possessed a realm near the Caspian Sea. (By their called Ilir or Atel), on the Caspian Sea (after them sometimes called Khazar Sea), where the Kalamaacs (q. v.) now live. They gave much uneasiness to the Persians, especially during the reign of Khosrow I (q. v.), and in the 7th century, after the downfall of the Sassanians, the Khazars went across the Caucasus, invaded Armenia, and conquered the Cherniss, hence called at one time Khosar or Chosar. The Byzantine emperors trembled before the warlike skill of the Khazars, and paid large tributes to keep them at a respectable distance from Constantinople; the Bulgarians and other peoples were their vassals; the Russians (Kievians) appeased their desire for conquest by an annual tribute, and with the Arabs they were waging constant warfare. But by degrees, as they abandoned their nomadic habits, and the territory decreased by the decay of its population, they fostered commercial intercourse with the outer world. They exchanged dried fish, the furs of the north, and slaves for the gold and silver and the luxuries of southern climates. Merchants of all religions—Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans—were freely admitted, and their superior intelligence and his more barbarous subjects induced one of their kings, Balan, to forsake their coarse, idolatrous worship, greatly mixed with sensuousness and licentiousness, and to embrace (A.D. 740) the Jewish religion. By one account, says Milman (ii, 27), he was admonished by an angel; by another, he decided in this singular manner between the claims of Christianity, Moslemism, and Judaism. He examined the different teachers apart, and asked the Christians if Judaism were not better than Mohammedanism; the Mohammedan, whether it was not better than Christianity. Both replied in the affirmative; on which the monarch decided in favor of Judaism. According to one statement secretly, to another openly, he embraced the faith of Moses, and induced learned teachers of the law to settle in his dominions. Of course, at first, the change of religious belief was confined to the royal family and the chief nobility of the land, who, with Balan, embraced Judaism; but soon the new religion spread, and ere long the majority of the nation bowed in adoration to the one and ever-living

God. Judaism actually became a necessary condition to the succession to the throne, but there was the most liberal toleration to all other forms of faith. See OBDIAL. Rabbi Hasdai, a learned Jew, who was in the highest confidence with Abderrahman, the caliph of Cordova, first received intelligence of this sovereignty possessed by the Khazars, and sent his son through the embassies of Khazar to the Byzantine emperor. After considerable difficulty, Hasdai succeeded in establishing a correspondence with Joseph, the reigning king. The letter of Hasdai is extant, and an answer of the king, which does not possess equal certainty, but authenticity. The whole history has been wrought out into a religious romance, entitled Cosro (see JOSHUA HALEVI), which has involved the question in great obscurity. Basinger rejected the whole as a fiction of the Rabbins, anxious to prove that "the seer was not entirely departed from Israel." Just inclines to the belief that "there is a groundwork of truth under the veil of poetic embellishment." The latest writers upon the subject admit without hesitation, and Jewish writers almost boast of the kingdom of Khazar. Comp. Frith's "Commentary on Ibn-Fadlan": "De Chemie des Peuples de la Mer Caspienne," (Memoires de l'Acad. des Sciences de St Petersburg, 1829, vol. viii); D'Houssois, "Peuples du Caucase" (see J. H. W.)

Khedr, Ail, is the name which figures in the Koran (chap. xviii, Sale's edition, p. 244) as that of a person whom the Mohammedans assert the Lord pointed out to Moses as superior in wisdom to any other living person, Moses included. The story the Mohammedans tell is thus given by Sale: "Moses once preaching to the people, they admired his knowledge and eloquence so much that they asked him whether he knew any man in the world who was wiser than himself, to which he answered in the negative; whereupon God, in a revelation, having reprehended him for his vanity (though some pretend that Moses asked God the question of his own accord), acquainted him that his servant Al Khedr was more knowing than he. Moses then asked him whether he knew that person at a certain rock where the two seas met, directing him to take a fish with him in a basket, and that where he missed the fish that was the place. Accordingly Moses set out, with his servant Joshua, in search of Al Khedr." See Sale's Koran, p. 244.

Khlesl, Melchthon, a German theologian, born at Vienna in 1553 of Protestant parents, was induced to enter the Roman Catholic Church, and joined the Jesuits. After studying five years under the Jesuits he returned to his former order, then continued two years at Innsbruck, and was ordained priest in 1579. He became successively provost of the cathedral at Vienna, administrator of the bishopric of Neustadt in 1588, and bishop of Vienna in 1598. The loose conduct of the Roman Catholic clergy having greatly contributed to the rapid spreading of Protestantism, Khlesl showed himself a zealous partisan of reform in this respect, while, on the other hand, he did his utmost to bring Protestants back into the fold of Romanism. Yet he was still more inclined to mingle in politics than in Church affairs. He attached himself to the grandson and successor of the emperor Rudolph II, whom the latter particularly disliked on account of a prediction, according to which this brother was to depose him. The emperor contemplated exiling Khlesl, but the latter succeeded in organizing a conspiracy, and Matthews was made emperor in Rudolph’s place. The Protestant princes had a part in this revolution, but Klose took good care that they should not derive any benefit from it to further their religion. Under emperor Matthew he became president of the privy council in 1611, and cardinal in 1616. Notwithstanding his opposition to Protestantism, which he rigorously persecutus in 1587, he remained at the head of the German party, and opposed the adoption of the grand duch e Ferdinand as heir to the throne. Ferdinand revenged himself by arresting Klose at Vienna, July 20, 1618, and confining him first at the castle of Ambras, and then at the convent of Georgenberg, in Tyrol. In 1622 a reprieve from the pope caused him to be transferred to Rome, where he was imprisoned for seven months in the castle of St. Angelo. After his liberation he returned to Vienna in 1627, and was restored to the possession of his property and his offices. He gave up politics to attend exclusively to the management of ecclesiastical affairs, and died Sept. 15, 1630. His fortune, amounting to over half a million, he left to the bisporphic of Vienna; 100,000 florins to Neustadt and Vienna for a yearly mass for his soul; 100,000 florins to the convent of Hmilesfort, 20,000 to the Jesuits, and 46,000 to his relatives. He is buried in St. Stephen’s, near the high altar, in action, mild in manner; the latter was somewhat difficult for him to submit to, as he was naturally hasty.
He had received no classical education, but was well versed in the Bible, in philasterics, and in homiletics. See Khlistie (Lutherans), also called Danielites, is the same of a powerful Russian sect. They call themselves "people of God," "tribe of Israel," "worshippers of the ture God," or "Brothers and Sisters." They originated in the first year of the reign of the emperor Alexis (A.D.

1645). According to their tradition, they descended, in the days of Alexis, upon Mt. Gorodon, in the district of Wladimir, in great part on a signal of fire surrounded by a cloud, "God the Father," accompanied by the hosts of heaven. The latter returned again to the other world, but the Lord himself remains on the earth, and manifested himself in the flesh in the person of Daniel Philip-an, in whose person, according to them, the second manifestation of God the Father in the flesh, and in his first manifestation Jerusalem was enlightened, so at this time Russia was blessed with special divine favor; and, corresponding to Jerusalem, they point out as their Zion, or, as they call it, "the higher region," the mountainous districts of the South, where Daniel prophesied, the doctrine of the inerrancy of the Bible and the baptism. The historical facts in the case, as related by Dixon (Free Russia, p. 139), however, are, that Daniel was a peasant in the province of Kostroma, and, after serving for a time in the Russian army, ran away from his flag in battle, declared himself the Almighty, and wandered about the empire, teaching those who would listen to his voice his doctrine, inundated in the following twelve commandments:
1. I am the God of whom the prophets spoke. I came for the second time into the world to redeem the souls of men. I am a God and need not be waited for.
2. There is no other doctrine, and no other is to be kept.
3. In what you are taught, therein also remain.
4. Keep the commandments of your God, and become masters of men in general.
5. Drink no strong drinks, and do not fulfill the last of the saints.
6. Do not get married, and whoever is married let him be with his wife as with his sister. This is the sense of the second Testament Scripture. This shall not marry, and those who are married should separate.
7. No abusive word (disoil) is to be used.
8. Those who attend weddings or baptism festivities, or drink at parties, are to be expelled.
9. To steal; and if any one takes of another the smallest coin, it will have to melt on his head at the judgment day from the beat of punishment before he can be pardoned.
10. These commandments are to be kept secret, not to be revealed even to father or mother. The suffering from fire and the like may be many, but the suffering for it in the kingdom of heaven and bliss on earth are obtained.
11. Friends and relations are to give up all superfluity, to exercise love, to keep these commandments, and pray to God.
12. To believe in the Holy Spirit.

Their own tradition asserts that Daniel himself did not issue these commandments, but that a son was born to him fifteen years before his appearance in this world, in the person of Ivan Timofejen, in the village Makasakon, of a woman one hundred years old. That this Ivan, when thirty-three years old, was summoned by Daniel to the village Strelia, the pope caused him to be recicled and that thereupon father and son ascended into heaven, and, after a short tarry, from the same place descended Jesus the Christ, in the person of Ivan, who at once commenced to preach, assisted by twelve disciples, the doctrines embodied in the twelve commandments above cited, and entered into the state of holy matrimony with a young female, whom they call "the daughter of God." To add to the romance of the story, the persecutions to which these fanatical religious leaders subject has given rise to an imitation of the resurrection After Ivan, the apostles of the "true sect" of the libertiune under various forms and of divers kinds, Ivan was partly burned and then crucified; but, after removal from the cross, his body and fat at a Frayday, he rose again, and on the Sunday after appeared in the midst of his followers, with a red stone in his breast, his hair wet, his face red, and his eyes bright and shining.
Ivan tried and crucified a second time, and his skin taken off; one of his female followers standing by then wrapped the body in a sheet, out of which a new skin formed itself, and after burial he again rose and commenced the preaching of his doctrines, and made many followers.
Thereafter Ivan took up his residence at Moscow, and openly taught his new religion. The house which he occupied was called the "New Jerusalem." He died on the day of St. Tichon, after living some forty-five years at Moscow, and ascended to heaven in presence of his disciples, to join his father and the saints.
Notwithstanding the fabric of this fabulous narrative, the sect is numerous, and has among its members many of the nobles of the land.

Like the Skotzki, the sect of the Khlistie also observe some of the practices of the regular Church, to ward off suspicion and to conceal their meetings. However, the from their usages it is known that before they go to communion in the church they first partake of it according to their own form. They also have a separate form of baptism. They have pictures of their god Daniel Philip-en, their Jesus Christ, their mother of God, saints, prophets, and teachers whom they adore. The orthodox church edifices they call "ant-nests," and their priests "isolaters and adulterers." Marriage is considered an impurity, and all entering this state are lost, yet they permit one of the nearest relatives of Daniel Philippen and Ivan Timofejen to enter the state to prevent the interuption of the lineage. The water from a well in the village Staraja, near Kostroma, is in the winter sent about in the shape of ice, and used by them to take their communion bread. In the same village lived in 1847 a girl, Ulana Visiljewa by name, who was adored as the last of the Nemes by many from all parts, among them nobles and merchants of Moscow, and though for this reason the government passed unnoticed her sacri-Legious acts, she was at last arrested and sent to a monastery.

Their mode of worship is very much like that of the Skotzki, except that after service they partake of an ordinary meal in common, which is prolonged till late in the evening, and often becomes the occasion of licensious sins. This sect is known in various localities by different names; in some parts they are called Liudy (useless), in others Chynki (heretics), Kyjedew (Cupido, the god of love). Great num-numbers of these heretics have been sent into the Caucasus and Siberia, where many of them have been forced to enter the armies and the mines. See Dixon, Free Russia, chap. xxiv.

Kholbah (Arabic), a peculiar form of prayer used in the Moslem countries at the commencement of public worship in the great mosques on Friday at noon. It was originally performed by the Prophet himself, and by his successors up to A.D. 936, since which time special ministers are appointed for the purpose. The Kholbah is chiefly "a confession of faith," and a general petition for the success of the Mohammedan religion. It is divided into two distinct parts, between which a considerable pause is observed, which the Mussulman regards as the most solemn and important part of his worship. The insertion of the sultan's name in this prayer has always been considered one of his chief prerogatives. See Brande and Cox, Dict. of Science, Literature, and Art, ii, 282.

Khonds. There are throughout India manifest traces of a rude primitive stock of people who occupied the country anterior to the Aryo-Scythian races, and there are still great divisions of the people bearing national characteristics which distinguish them from the Hindus. The earliest knowledge we have of these people is through the great epic poems of the Hindus, the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, which describe the wars of the invading Aryan races and the invasion of the aboriginal or primitive inhabitants of these impenetrable forests. Successive waves of invaders, however, subdued, to a greater or less extent, some of these, and modified their views and usages; but these, in turn, affected the religion and manners of their conquerors.

Divisions. Some of these races have attached themselves to Hindu society, and serve in a condition of degradation as Chandals or Mekchas, i.e. outcasts or pariahs. They often hold offices of trust and responsibility in village communities, but, according to Hindu law, are not included in the caste of the Hindu, though they own property but do not hold it in their own right. Their customs and institutions are, however, everywhere different from those of the Hindus.

There are others of these aboriginal tribes who have not mingled with Hinduism at all, or only very partially. Among these are the Kora of Bengal and Eastern Nagpoor, the Khonds of Central India, the Belus of the Vindhy Mountains, the Khaudes Malwah, etc., of Central India, and others in the south amid the forests of the Neelgherry Hills, in Gourjara, and other places (see Edwards, 1857, p. 42, note). These tribes have their own habits, even where Hinduism most presses them. They have no castes, their widows are allowed to remarry, they have no objection to any kind of flesh, and otherwise differ greatly from the Aryan peoples.

The least raised above their primitive condition are the Khonds of Orissa, who "occupy a district about two hundred miles long by one hundred and seventy broad, in Rampur, in the district of Gunjum" (Brace, p. 142), a tract of land back from the coast of the Bay of Bengal, where it trends eastward to Calcutta and southward to Mysore, and embracing the plateaux of the Vindhyas and other mountains.

Names. They term themselves Koe, Ki, Koniga, Koniga, but are known to Europeans by their Hindu name of Khond or Kond. Their language is affiliated with the Oriya (Oriya), but the dialects are many, and often a Khond of one district has been found unable to hold communication with one of a neighboring tribe. The speech has "a peculiar peculitar enunciation." Ethnologically, all these tribes are Turanian or Mongolian.

Domestic Relations. Marriage may only take place without the tribe, but never with the tribe. Boys of ten or twelve years of age are married to girls of fifteen or sixteen, the arrangements being always made by the parents. The father of the bridegroom generally pays twenty or thirty "livers" of cattle to the bride's father. The marriage rite itself is very simple. The father of the bridegroom, with his family and friends, bears a quantity of rice and liquor in procession to the house of the parents of the girl. The priest takes it, and dashes the bowl down, and pours it out to the gods. The parents of the parties join hands to show the marriage is completed. An entertainment follows, with dancing and song. Late at night the married pair are carried out on the shoulders of their respective uncles, when, the burdens being suddenly exchanged, the boy's uncle disappears, and the company assembled divides into two parties, who go through the streets singing and thus the semblance of forcible abduction, remains or indications of which are found so frequently in widely separated quarters, are preserved among the Khonds of Orissa (see McLennan's Primitive Marriage). The marriage contract is, however, loosely held. If childless, the wife may return to her father at any time, or, in any event, within six months of the marriage if the money given at her marriage be restored to her father. She cannot be forcibly retained, however, even if the money be not returned. If her withdrawal be voluntary she cannot contract another matrimonial alliance. A man may ally himself with another woman than his wife, with the wife's consent. Concubinage is not disgraceful, fathers of respectable families allowing their daughters to contract such marriages. An unmarried woman may become a hater or patriarch and marry a brother.

Births. Births are celebrated on the seventh day by a feast given to the priests and villagers. The name is determined by a peculiar rite, in which grains of rice are dropped into a cup of water.

Death. After the death of a private person his body is burned, without any ceremony other than a drining feast. If, however, a chief dies, the "heads of society" are assembled from every quarter by the beating of gongs and drums; the body is placed on the funeral pile; a bag of grain is laid on the ground, a staff being planted in it, and the relatives of the dead person and all the clothes, arms, and eating and drinking vessels, being first placed by the flag, are afterwards distributed, when the pile is fired, and the company dance round the flag-staff.

Social Organisation and Government. The family is the unit of organization and the government patriarchal, all the members of the family living in subordination to the head, the eldest son succeeding to his authority. All property belongs to the father, the married sons having separate houses assigned them, except the younger, who remains with the father. This father, or patriarch, is called Abogho.

A number of families constitute a village, which generally numbers forty or fifty houses, over whom there is a village abbaya or patriarch. A number of villages are organized into a district, superintended by a district abbaya, who, however, must be lineally descended from the head of the colony. A number of districts constitute a tribe, with a tribal abbaya, and a number of tribes constitute a federal group, with a federal abbaya or chief. This chiefship is immemorially hereditary in particular families, but is elective to persons. The head, however, is only the first among equals, and his rule is without external pomp, or castle, or fort. The chief receives no tribute, but he takes part in all important discussions, whether social or religious, and leads his people in war. His influence is very great. Originally and theoretically, the abbaya is the priest. This is not so now in all cases, yet he is religiously venerated. The family and the religious principles are thus combined. The theory of government, as above sketched, is not, however, often completely realized, there being very many additional castes free from it, and the tribe being much intermingled. These tribes have a name resembling those adopted by the North American Indians, e.g. "Spotted Deer," "Bear," "Owl," etc.

Personal and Social Characteristics. These people, like almost all known rude races, are "given to hospiti-
For the safety of a guest life and honor are pledged. He is "before a child." A murderer even may not be hurt in the house of his enemy; it is doubtful if he may kill it. The preservation of innocence is clearly Turanian. The color varies from that of light bamboo to a deep copper; the forehead is full, the cheek-bones high, the nose broad at the point, the lips full, but not thick, and the mouth large. The Khonds are of great bodily strength and symmetry, well endowed on common subjects, of quick comprehension, and otherwise show considerable intellectual capability. Their mode of salutation is with the hand raised over the head. Their natural moral qualities are of mixed character. They are personally courageous and resolute. They have so great a love of personal liberty that it is affirmed they have been known to tear out their hearts by the roots that they might perish rather than endure confinement. They are not very intensely attached to their tribal institutions, but have great devotion to the persons of their patriarchal chiefs. They have, however, a great spirit of revenge, and are given to seasons of periodical intoxication. They drink a liquor made of the More flower, this tree being found near every hut and in the jungles. They are a "nation of drunkards," and will drink any intoxicating beverage, the stronger the better. They have no code by which they are governed, but follow custom and usage. The right of property is recognized. Murder is left to private revenge or retaliation. In case of matrimonial unfaithfulness, the seducer may be put to death if the husband choose, or he may accept the entire property of the criminal in lieu of his right to put him to death. Property stolen must be returned, or its equivalent given. There are seven judicial tests; common oaths are administered on the skin of a tiger or a lizard. Ordeal of boiling oil and water are likewise resorted to.

Arms and Agriculture.—They use the sling, bow and arrows, and a broad battle-axe, and adorn themselves for battle as for a feast. They raise rice, oils, millet, pulses, fruits, tobacco, turmeric, mustard, etc. No money other than "cowries" (shells) was until recently known, all property being estimated in "lives," as of bullocks, buffaloes, horses, men, women, etc. Women share in the work of harvest and sowing.

Diseases and Remedies.—For external wounds they resort to a poultice of warm mud, made of the earth of the ant-hills. They also co matière with a hot stick over the spot when bitten with any medicines. They consider all diseases to be supernatural, and the priest, being the physician, must discover the deity that is displeased. He divides rice into small heaps, which he dedicates to the gods; then he balances a sickle with a thread, puts a few grains upon each end of it, and calls upon the names of the gods, who answer by agitating the sickle, whereupon the grains are counted, and if the number of them be odd he is offended. The priest becomes "full of the god," makes his head frantically, utters wild and incoherent sentences, etc. Deceased ancestors are invoked in the same way, when offerings of fowls, rice, and liquor are made, which subsequently become the priest's portion.

Magical and Superstitions Usages.—Spells, charms, incantations, etc., are used for substitute medicines; wizards, witches, ghosts, sorcerers, augurs, astrologers, conjurers, all like magic powers in common use. Death is not a necessity, not the appointed lot of man; it is a special penalty of the gods, who destroy through war, or assume the shapes of wild beasts to destroy mankind. Magicians may take away life.

Mythology.—(1) The image of gods worshipped among the Khonds is extensive. (2) At the head of the pantheon is the Earth-Goddess, who, with the sun, receives the principal worship. The Earth-Goddess is the superior power, and presides over the productive energies of nature. She is all motherhood, and is invoked in war. She is depicted in the season's, and the periodical rains. To her human sacrifices were offered. There are, besides her, (2) a God of Limits, who fixes boundaries, and whose altar is on the highways. (3) The sun and moon; ceremonially worshipped. (4) The God of Arms, to whom a grove is devoted. (5) The God of Hunting, worshipped by parties who hunt in companies of thirty or forty, and surround their game. (6) The God of Births, worshipped in case of barrenness. (7) The God of Small-fox, who "sows" that disease as men do the earth with seeds. (8) The Hill-god, without form or worship. (9) The Forest-god, to whom birds, hogs, and sheep are offered. (10) The God of Rain. (11) Of Fountains. (12) Of Rivers. (13) Of Tanks; and (14) the village gods, who are the guardians of localities, and of domestic and familiar worship.

The great conservative principle is worshipped.

Priesthood.—The abbayas are the priests, but this office may be assumed by others. Priests eat only with priests; take part in marriage, elections, elections, etc. They are of about the same level of culture as those of other tribes among Turanian races.

Religious Rites and Sacrifices.—Nothing was definitely known of the tribes of Gúmar until the British army was brought into collision with them in 1866, subsequently to which the custom of human sacrifices was discovered to exist among them. The British government, after a long series of efforts, succeeded in abolishing it. Major Campbell says, "The Khonds generally propitiated their deity (the Earth-Goddess) with human offerings (p. 69). This had been done through successive generations, and was regarded as a national duty. In Gúmar it is offered under the effigy of a bird, in other localities as an elephant (p. 51). The victim, called Meriah, must be purchased, may be of any age, sex, or caste, adults being best, and the more costly the more acceptable. These are purchased from relations in time of famine or poverty, or are stolen from other regions by profession kidnappers of the Panoo caste (p. 62). In some cases Meriah women were allowed to live until they had borne children to Khond fathers, the women then being required for sacrifice, to be efficacious, must be public (p. 53). In Gúmar it was offered annually. The priest officiates. For a month previous there is much feasting, dancing, intoxication, etc. One day before the victim is stupefied with too much bond spirit, and then cut open as near the post bearing an effigy. The crowd dance, and say, "O god, we offer this sacrifice to you; give us good crops, seasons, and health." To the victim they say, "We bought you with a price, and did not seize you; now we sacrifice you according to our custom, and no sin rests with us" (p. 56). Various other ceremonies are performed, after which they return to the post near the village idol, always represented by three stones, a hog is sacrificed, the blood flows into a pit, the human victim, having been intoxicated, is thrown in and suffocated in the bloody mire. The priest cuts a piece of the flesh and burns it; others do likewise, carrying the flesh to their own villages. In some cases the flesh is cut while the victim is yet alive, and buried as a sacred and supernatural manner."

Cognate Tribes.—These and other aboriginal races which have received so much attention from ethnographers, philologists, and other scientific men that further details are not needed here. The prominence given to these aboriginal races of late years might justify full articles on the kindred tribes, but, as they are of subserviency of the same class, it is more convenient to have chosen a very full sketch of the Khonds as typical of the aboriginal

It still continues to be a choice dish among the Arabs. By the Mosaic law, the Hebrews were forbidden to dress a kid in the milk of its dam; and this remarkable prohibition is repeated several times (Exod. xxiii, 19; xxix, 26; Deut. xix, 11). This law has been variously understood. However, it is generally supposed that it was intended to guard the Hebrews against some idolatrous or superstitious practice of the neighboring heathen nations. The practice is quite common with modern Orientals (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 155). Kids were slain for the sacrificial offerings (Exod. xii, 8, margin; Lev. iv, 23-26; Num. vii, 16-87). See Goat.

Kidd, Benjamin, a noted Quaker minister, was born in Yorkshire, England, about 1692; entered the ministry at the age of twenty-one, emigrated to this country about 1722, and labored here successfully for some time. He afterwards returned, however, to England, and settled at Banbury, Oxfordshire, "where his exemplary conduct gained him the esteem of all ranks and persuasions." He died March 21, 1751. KIdd served his generation in "turning many from darkness to light, and from the power of darkness to the kingdom of the Lord, and of the glory of Jesus the Christ."—Janney, Hist. of the Friends, iii, 287.

Kidders, Richard, D.D., an eminent English prelate and learned Orientalist, was born at Brighthelmstone, in Sussex. He studied at Emanuel College, Cambridge, of which he was elected fellow in 1655. He afterwards became vicar of Stanground, Huntingdonshire, but emigrated in 1662 for nonconformity. He, however, conformed some time after, and became rector of Raine, Essex, in 1664, and successively rector of St. Martin's Outwich, London, in 1674; prebendary of Norwich in 1681; dean of Peterborough in 1689; and finally bishop of Bath and Wells in 1691. He died in 1708. He was considered one of the best divines of his time, and a clear and elegant writer. His principal works are Demonstration of the Messiah, etc. (London, 1684, 1690, 1700), 3 vols.; another edit. 1725, fol., and often since:—The Judgment of private Discretion in Matters of Religion defended—a sermon in Three, v. 21 (London, 1877, 4to):—A Sermon preached before the King and Queen at Whitehall, Nov. 5, 1692 [on 2 Sam. xxiv, 14] (London, 1693, 4to):—Sermon, Zech. vii, 5, of Fasting (London, 1694, 4to):—A Commentary on the Five Books of Moses, etc. (London, 1709). Kidney (only in plur. גִּבֹּת, geboth, prob. from the idea of its being the seat of longing), the leaf-fat around which was specially to be a burn-offering, significant of its being the richest and most choice part of the animal (Exod. xxii, 22; Lev. iii, 4, 10; iv, 7; vii, 4; vii, 16, 25; ix, 10; 19; Isai. xxxiv, 8). Spoken also of the "rims" of a human being, i.e. the innermost soul, which the ancients supposed to be seated in the viscus (compare the Homeric ἱερόν, midsize, hence mind), both in a physical sense (Job xv, 13, hence 27; Psa. cxviii, 13; 13, 18), and figuratively (Psa. vii, 9, 10; 7, 23, 26; xxii, 21; Prov. xxiii, 16; Jer. xi, 10; xxxi, 2; zel, 7; xxvii, 10, xx, 12). Sometimes applied to kernels of grain, from their kidney-like shape and richness (Deut. xvi, 13).

Kidron (Heb. Kidron), a torrent, compare Job vi, 16; Sept. Κιδρόν, Κ. Κ. Κ. Ἰοβονί, where some copies erroneously have Ἰοβονί, Gen. vii, 11 in the Latin Version "Cedron;" Josephus Κεδρών, Gen. -ωρος), the brook or winter torrent which flows through the valley of Jehoshaphat (as it is now called), on the east side of Jerusalem (see I Macc. xxii, 37). "The brook Kidron" is the only name by which the valley of Jehoshaphat is mentioned in Scripture, for it is by no means certain that the name "Valley of Jehoshaphat" in Joel (iii, 12) was intended to apply to this valley. The word rendered "brook" (2 Sam. xv, 23; 1 Kings ii, 21; xv, 13; 2 Kings xxii, 8, 16; 2 Chron. xxvii, 9, xxix, 16, xxx, 14; Jer. xxxi, 40; compare Neh. xi, 15; Amos vi, 14) in the LXX, mekáll, which may be taken as equivalent to the Arabic stream, meaning a stream and its bed or valley, or properly the valley of a stream, even when the stream is dry. The Septuagint and evangelist (in the above passages), as well as Josephus (Ant. xvii, 1, 5; but paráyter in i, 7, 5; War, v, 1, 6), denominated χρυμπός, krympós, a torrent, brook, or winter torrent. But it was not so seem as if it were formerly applied also to the ravines surrounding other portions of Jerusalem, the south or west, since Solomon's prohibition to Shimei to "pass over the torrent Kidron" (1 Kings ii, 37; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 5, 9) is said to have been broken by the latter when he went in the direction of Gath to seek his fugitive slaves (ver. 41, 42). Now a person going to Gath would certainly not go by the way of the Mount of Olives, or approach the eastern side of the city at all. The route—whether Gath were at Beit-Jaizo or at Talm-Safeleh—would be by the Bethlehem gate, and then nearly due west. Perhaps the prohibition may have been a more general one than is implied in ver. 37 (comp. the king's reiteration of it in ver. 42), the Kidron being in that case specially mentioned because it was on the road to Babylon, Shimei's home, and the scene of his crime. At no time would the passage in question, there is no evidence of the name Kidron having been applied to the southern or western ravines of the city.

The Kidron is mentioned several times in the Scripture history, being the memorable brook which David crossed before he went up and removed when first the Ark came to Jerusalem (2 Sam. xv, 23, 40); and Jesus must often have crossed it on his way to the Mount of Olives and Bethany (see John xviii, 1). According to the Talmud, the blood of the animals slaughtered in the Temple, and the other refuse (probably the impurities from the city, נזיר, lvii, 4), were carried through a sewer into the lower Kidron, and thence sold as manure to gardeners (Joma, lvii, 2). For early notices of the Kidron, see William of Tyre, viii, 2; Brocardus, p. 8; Reland, p. 294 sq. The distinguishing peculiarity of the Kidron—that in respect to which it is most frequently mentioned—is the 2, —is the impurity which appears to have been ascribed to it. Excepting the two casual notices already quoted, we first meet with it as the place in which king Azaz demolished and burnt the obscene phallic idol (see ASHERAH) of his mother (1 Kings xv, 18; 2 Chron. xvii, 16). Next we find that Athaliah hurried thither to execute Joseph (Ant. ix, i, 7, 8; 2 Kings xii, 16). It then becomes the regular receptacle for the impurities and abominations of the idol-worship, when removed from the Temple and destroyed by the adherents of Jehovah (2 Chron. xxviii, 18; xxxii, 14; 2 Kings xxiii, 13, 18).

xxvi, 25, "graves of the common people"), perhaps the valley of dead bodies" mentioned by Jeremiah (xxxvi, 40) in close connection with the "fields" of Kidoron, and the restoration of which to sanctity was to be one of the miracles of future times (ibid.). It was doubtless the Kidron valley which the Lord told to Ezekiel when he described the vision of the healing waters flowing from the Temple through the desert into the sea (xviii, 8); and this very contrast with its customary uses serves to add emphasis to his prophecy (comp. William L. Baedeker, i, 522; Stanley, "Jerusalem," p. 268). How long this valley continued to be used for a burying-place it is very hard to ascertain. After the capture of Jerusalem in 1099 the bodies of the slain were buried outside the Golden Gateway (Maslin, ii, 487; Tobler, "Umgangbomen," p. 219); but what had been the practice in the interval the writer has not succeeded in tracing. To the date of the monuments at the foot of Olives we have at present no clew; but, even if they are of pre-Christian times, there is no proof that they are tombs. From the date just mentioned, however, the burials appear to have been constant, and at present it is the favorite resting-place of Muslems and Jews, the former on the west, the latter on the east of the valley. The Muslems are mostly confined to the narrow level spot between the foot of the wall and the commencement of the precipitous slope, which gives them a peculiar advantage for part of the slopes of Olives, where their scanty tombs are crowded so thick together as literally to cover the surface like a pavement.

The Kidron is a mountain ravine, in most places narrow, with precipitous banks of naked limestone; but here and there its banks have an easy slope, along its bottom are strips of land capable of cultivation. It contains the bed of a streamlet, but during the whole summer, and most of the winter, it is perfectly dry; in fact, no water runs in it except when heavy rains arefalling. The Jerusalemites made Shaddai, the principal missionarie assured Dr. Robinson that they had not during several years seen a stream running through the valley (see Bibl. Researches, i, 396-402). On the broad summit of the mountain ridge of Judaea, a mile and a quarter north-west of Jerusalem, is a slight depression; this is the head of the Kidron. The sides of the re-oppression, and the elevated ground around it, are whitened by the broad, jagged tops of limestone rocks, and almost every rock is excavated, partly as a quarry, and partly to form the façade of a tomb. The valley or depression extends for a mile to the west of the city; it is shallown and broad, dotted with corn-fields, and sprinkled with a few old oaks. It then bends eastward, and in another half mile is crossed by the great northern road coming down from the hill Scopus. On the east side of the road, and south bank of the Kidron, are the celebrated Tombs of the Kings. The bed of the valley is here about half a mile due north of the city gate. It continues in the same course about a quarter of a mile farther, and then, turning south, opens into a wide basin containing cultivated fields and olive groves. Here it is crossed diagonally by the road to Jerusalem, and Nahaloth. As it advances southward, the right bank, forming the side of the hill Bezaetha, becomes higher and steeper, with occasional precipices of rock, on which may be seen a few fragments of the ancient city wall; while on the left the base of Olives projects, greatly narrowing the valley. Opposite St. Stephen's gate, the city gate is fully 100 feet, and the breadth not more than 400 feet. The olive-trees in the bottom are so thickly clustered as to form a shady grove; and their massive trunks and gnarled boughs give evidence of great age. This spot is shut out from the city, from the view of public roads, and from the notice and interruption of wayfarers. See GETHSEMANE. A zigzag path descends the steep bank from St. Stephen's gate, crosses the bed of the valley by an old bridge, and then branches. One branch leads directly over the top of Olives. This path has a deep historical interest; it was by it that David went when he fled from Absalom: "The king passed over the brook Kidron, and all the people passed over, towards the way of the wilderness" (2 Sam. xv, 23). See OLIVET. Another branch runs round the southern shoulder of the hill to Bethel with which it has an intimate connection; it is the road of Christ's triumphal entry (Matt. xxv. 1 sqq.; Luke xix, 37). Below the bridge the Kidron becomes still narrower, and here traces of a torrent bed first begin to appear. Three hundred yards farther down, the hills on each side—Mount of Olives on the right and Olives on the left—are precipitously from the summit, and the valley is spanned by a single arch. On the left bank is a singular group of tombs, comprising those of Absalom, Jeoshaphat, and St. James (now so called); while on the right, 150 feet overhead, towers the south-eastern angle of the Temple wall, most probably the "pinnacle" on which our Lord was placed (Matt. iv, 5). The ravine runs on, narrow and rocky, for 500 yards more; there, on its right bank, in a cave, is the fountain of the Virgin; and higher up on the left, perched on the side of naked cliffs, the ancient palace of Siloam. A short distance farther down, the valley of the Tyropoion falls in from the right, descending in terraced slopes, fresh and green, from the waters of the Pool of Siloam. The Kidron here expands, affording a level tract for cultivation, and now covered with beds of cucumbers, melons, and other vegetables. Here the ancient city wall of Asa ( Neh. iii, 15). The level tract extends down to the mouth of Hinnom, and is about 200 yards wide. A short distance below the junction of Hinnom and the Kidron is the fountain of En-Rogel, now called Br Ayuh, "the Well of the Grenade." The length of the valley from its head to En-Rogel is 24 miles, and here the historic Kidron may be said to terminate. Every refer-ce to the Kidron in the Bible is made to this section. David crossed it at a point opposite the city (1 Sam. xv, 29); it was the boundary beyond which Solomon forbade the people of Judah to go (2 Kings xxii, 4). Therafter a king of Israel made this border; it was here, probably, near the mouth of Hinnom, that Asa destroyed the idol which Maachah his mother set up (xv, 18); and it seems to have been at the same spot, "in the fields of Kidron," that king Jehoshaphat ordered the vessels of Baal to be burned (2 Kings xxiii, 4). It would seem, from 2 Kings xxiii, 4, that a portion of the Kidron, apparently near the mouth of Hinnom, was used as a burying-ground. The sides of the surrounding cliffs are filled with ancient rock tombs, and the greatest boon the dying Jew now asks is that his bones be laid in that spot. To the south of the Kidron, opposite the temple area, far up the side of the valley, is paved with the white tombs of Jews. This singular longing is doubtless to be ascribed to the opinion which the Jews entertain that the Kidron is the Valley of Jehoshaphat that mentioned by Joel (iii, 2). See JERUSALEM, VALLEY OF. Below En-Rogel, the Kidron has little of historical or sacred interest. It runs in a winding course east by south, through the Wilderness of Judaea, to the Dead Sea. For about a mile below En-Rogel the bottom of the valley is cultivated and thinly covered with olive-trees. Farther up, the fields of corn are met with at intervals, but these soon disapper, and the ravine assumes the bleak and desolate aspect of the surrounding hills. About seven miles from Jerusalem the features of the valley assume a much wilder and grander form. Hitherto the banks have been steep and narrow; here and there a high precipice and jutting cliff, giving variety to the scene. Now they suddenly contract to precipices of naked rock nearly 800 feet in height, which look as if the mountain had been torn asunder by an earthquake. About a mile farther, on the south side, the right bank is fully 200 feet, and the conical dome of St. Sabas, one of the most remarkable buildings in Palestina, founded by the saint whose name it bears, in the year A.D. 489. The sides of the chasm both above and below the convent are filled with caves and grottoes, even the abode of monks and hermits, and from these double-less this section of the valley has got its modern name, Wady cr-Rakeb, "Monk's Valley" (Woolcott, Researches is Pal., in Biblical Cabinet, xiii, 38). Below Mar Salo the head of the Kidron is just on the verge of the water-shed of the mountain-chain of Judah, about 2000 feet above the sea. Its length, as the crow flies, is only twenty miles, and yet in this short space it has a descent of no less than 8912 feet—the Dead Sea having a depth of 14042 feet (Van de Velde, p. 179, 182).—Kitto; Smith. In 1848 the levelling party of the Dead Sea Expedition, under command ofLieut. Lynch, worked up the wady en-Nar, the bed of the Kidron, from the Dead Sea to Jerusalem. They encountered several precipices from ten to twelve feet high, down which cataracts plunge in winter. They found the ravine shut in on each side by high, barren cliffs of chalky limestone, and the dry torrent-beds interrupted by boulders, and covered with fragments of stone (Narrative, p. 384, 386). The place where it empties into the Jordan is a great natural deep, deep, narrow, which at this place is filled with confused fragments of rock, much worn, but perfectly dry (ib.). For further notices, see Ritter's Erdkunde, xvi, 600; Robinson, Biblical Researches, ut sup.

Kieeff or Kieff, the name of the chief town of the government of that name, on the west bank of the Dnieper, one of the oldest of the Russian towns, and formerly the capital (containing 60,000 inhabitants, with a university and a theological school), was in 864 taken from the Khazars by two Norman chiefs, companions of Ruric, and conquered from them by Oleg, Ruric's successor, who made it his capital. In 1240, when it ceased to be the capital it was expressly destroyed by Batiu, khan of Kiptschak. Christianity was first proclaimed in Russia at Kieff in 888. In the 14th century it was seized by Gedimin, grand duke of Lithuania, and annexed to Poland in 1569, but in 1686 was restored to Russia.

Kieff is the oldest Russian metropolis's residence, the cradle of Russian Christianity. It is also noted on account of two Church (Greek) councils that have been held there. See Landon, Manual of Church Councils.

(a) The first of these convened about 1147, and is noted for the manner in which the bishops elected a metropolitan, and placed him in the place of Michael. It is the exception of Niphont of Novgorod, they all agreed to take the election into their own hands, without allowing to the patriarch of Constantinople the exercise of his right either to nominate or confirm. Niphont strongly pressed against the act, but with the excommunication of the synod fell upon Clement, a monk of Smolensk. As a substitute for the patriarchal consecration, Onuphrius proposed that the hand of St. Clement of Rome, whose relics had been brought from Cherson, should be placed upon his head. This election led to great disorder, and subsequently the patriarch Luke Chyserges consecrated Constantine metropolitan, who condemned the acts of this synod, and suspended for a time all the clergy ordained by Clement.—Mauravieff’s Hist. Russ. Church (by Blackmore), p. 55.

(b) Another council was convened here in 1622. Meletias, archbishop of Polotsk, at one time a most zealous defender of the orthodox Church in Russia, had been obliged to flee into Greece upon a groundless suspicion of having been concerned in the murder of Jeshophat, Uniate archbishop of Polotsk, and, urged by fear, had given himself up to the Uniate party, and written an apology in censure of the orthodox Church; in this council he was called to account, made to perform open penance, and to bear his book. Soon after he entirely apostatised; and, going to Rome, had the title of archbishop of Hieropolis conferred on him.—Mauravieff, p. 173.

In the neighborhood of Kieff is the convent of Kievo-Petchersk, a celebrated Russian sanctuary, which annually attracts thousands of pilgrims from the most remote parts of Russia. The name descriptive of its aspect, for so bare and scorched it is that it seems as if it had participated in the doomed of Sodom. It runs on, a deep, narrow, wild chasm, until it breaks through the lofty line of cliffs at Ras el-Feshkha, on the shore of the Dead Sea. It will thus be seen that the head of the Kidron is just on the verge of the water-shed of the mountain-chain of Judah, about 2000 feet above the sea. Its length, as the crow flies, is only twenty miles, and yet in this short space it has a descent of no less than 8912 feet—"the Dead Sea having a depth of 14042 feet (Van de Velde, p. 179, 182).—Kitto; Smith. In 1848 the levelling party of the Dead Sea Expedition, under command of Lieut. Lynch, worked up the wady en-Nar, the bed of the Kidron, from the Dead Sea to Jerusalem. They encountered several precipices from ten to twelve feet high, down which cataracts plunge in winter. They found the ravine shut in on each side by high, barren cliffs of chalky limestone, and the dry torrent-beds interrupted by boulders, and covered with fragments of stone (Narrative, p. 384, 386). The place where it empties into the Jordan is a great natural deep, deep, narrow, which at this place is filled with confused fragments of rock, much worn, but perfectly dry (ib.). Kieff or Kieff, the name of the chief town of the government of that name, on the west bank of the Dnieper, one of the oldest of the Russian towns, and formerly the capital (containing 60,000 inhabitants, with a university and a theological school), was in 864 taken from the Khazars by two Norman chiefs, companions of Ruric, and conquered from them by Oleg, Ruric’s successor, who made it his capital. In 1240, when it ceased to be the capital, it was expressly destroyed by Batiu, khan of Kiptschak. Christianity was first proclaimed in Russia at Kieff in 888. In the 14th century it was seized by Gedimin, grand duke of Lithuania, and annexed to Poland in 1569, but in 1686 was restored to Russia.

Kieff is the oldest Russian metropolis’s residence, the cradle of Russian Christianity. It is also noted on account of two Church (Greek) councils that have been held there. See Landon, Manual of Church Councils.

(a) The first of these convened about 1147, and is noted for the manner in which the bishops elected a metropolitan, and placed him in the place of Michael. It is the exception of Niphont of Novgorod, they all agreed to take the election into their own hands, without allowing to the patriarch of Constantinople the exercise of his right either to nominate or confirm. Niphont strongly pressed against the act, but with the excommunication of the synod fell upon Clement, a monk of Smolensk. As a substitute for the patriarchal consecration, Onuphrius proposed that the hand of St. Clement of Rome, whose relics had been brought from Cherson, should be placed upon his head. This election led to great disorder, and subsequently the patriarch Luke Chyserges consecrated Constantine metropolitan, who condemned the acts of this synod, and suspended for a time all the clergy ordained by Clement.—Mauravieff’s Hist. Russ. Church (by Blackmore), p. 55.

work, and was handled with severity by Edwards in his Carogamus. He is regarded as the father of the "Particular Baptists." An estimate may be formed of the high position Kiffin must have occupied in his day if Macaulay (History of England, vol. ii) could say, "Great as was the authority of Bunyan with Baptists, that of William Kiffin was still greater," and quote a passage from the Declaration of Dissenting Churches (p. 430), "his portrait," says Skeats (Hist. English Free Churches, p. 154), "does not bear out the once current impression concerning the Baptists of that age. With skull-cap and flowing ringlets, with mustache and "imperial," with broad lance and round hat" (see his portrait at Lives and Times of Distinguished Dissenters, 1:430), he resembles a gentleman Cavalier rather than any popular ideal of a sour-visaged and discontented Anabaptist." See Crosby, Hist. Eng. Baptists; and Lives (London 1659, 4to, and one by Joseph Gurney, 1825, 2vo; also his Autobiography, edited by Orme, London 1829, 2vo). (J. H. W.)

KILHAM

Kilburn, David, a Methodist Episcopal bishop, born at Gilsland, N. H., October 24, 1784, was converted when seventeen years old, licensed to preach in 1805, and, after three years' labor as a local preacher, was received into the New England Conference, and obtained his first pastorate in a vacant charge, at Union, Me. His subsequent stations were Reading, Me.; Stanstead, Canada; Danville, Barnard and White River, Needham, Boston, Portland, Me.; Wethersfield and Barre, Vt.; Providence, R. I.; Lowell, Lynn-Cummington, Bridgewater, North-west Bridgewater, Waltham, Barre, Ashburnham, South Boylston, Enfield, and South Hampton. He traveled also the following districts as presiding elder: Portland District, Maine Conference; New Hampshire, Boston, Springfield, and Providence Districts, in the New England Conference. In 1816 he became superannuated, in 1833-35 offensive, in 1834 supernumerary, in 1836 effective, in 1838 again supernumerary, and in 1859 he again became superannuated, in which relation he remained till the time of his death, July 18, 1865. Kilburn was a man of great endurance, and constitutionally qualified for the immense labor he performed; of sound judgment, clear understanding, strong will; earnest and conscientious in the performance of duty. During his laborious ministry he sustained a high reputation and exerted a powerful influence. . . . His prudent foresight, his comprehensive views, his knowledge of men, his perception of character, his urbanity, his high moral and Christian virtues, entitled him to an honorable social and official position in the Church which he so faithfully served."—Conf. Minutes, 1865, p. 56.

Kilby, Richard, an English theologian, was born at Ratcliffe in the second half of the 16th century, and was educated at Oxford University, with which he was identified throughout life; he was its rector in 1590, and held a professorship of the Hebrew language. He died Nov. 7, 1620. Richard Kilby was one of the translators of King James's version of the Bible. He also published several sermons (1613, etc.) and a Commentary on Titus. Another English divine of the same name flourished about the same time in Warwickshire. He died in 1617, and is the author of a work entitled Burthen of a loud Conscience (1616, 8vo; often reprinted).—Hoefcr, Dictionary of National Biography, xxvi, 729; Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors, vol. ii. a. v.

Kildare, an ancient church in central Ireland, founded A.D. 490, derived its name from the Irish cele, church, and dair, the oak, and was first established by St. Bridget as a Christian school, and afterwards called a nunnery, for the purpose of teaching pagan women, until the death of St. Patrick, who administered a bishop's ordination to the Church. Soon a town or city grew up around it, and in later times it formed an extensive diocese. In the early period of Ireland's history it is nothing remarkable to find woman assuming the position of public instructor; Druidism, the former religion of Ireland, assigned offices to females. In the early history of the Irish Church we have several intimations that Christian women were employed in its services. St. Patrick, in his Confession, sect. xviii, writes about a woman of noble birth, of the august name of Sael, that she was apprehended in the act of administering the sacrament. St. Bridget, the founder of this church and female seminary, tradition says, died about A.D. 515, at an advanced age, loved in life and lamented in death. In honor of her memory, through an extent of fourteen centuries, in different countries and in different languages, there have been called by her name; more children, perhaps, than after any other Christian woman whose name is not in the inspired records. Her memory was cherished by the Picts and the British Scots, but in no place except Kildare was it more honored than in the Heb- ridies, where it left, as St. Columba said, a chief eremite and less pure than the patrones of their churches. Several lives of her have been written by foreigners and in different languages, but the best and the fullest is said to be that by St. Ulian, the materials for which he obtained from a manuscript of the monastery of Rathibo, Germany, of 1231. See Moore, Hist. of Ireland: Ware's Irish Antiquities; Todd, Irish Church, p. 28. (D. D.)

KILHAM, Alexander, one of the most celebrated characters in the history of Methodism, the founder of the "New Connection of Wesleyan Methodists," frequently called simply "Kilhampites," and really the first man in the Methodist connection who advocated the representation of the lay element in the government of the Church, was born at Epworth, England, July 10, 1762. His parents were Methodists, and he enjoyed a training strictly in accordance with their own religious convictions. Vacillating in character and impatient in temper in his youthful days, he struggled hard against all religious impressions, but was finally converted at the age of eighteen, and shortly after began preaching. Brackenbury, one of Wesley's right-hand men, met young Kilham one day at Epworth while himself on a preaching excursum, and engaged him at once as his travelling companion. In Brackenbury's missionary visit to the Channel Islands, Kilham proved himself an able assistant. In 1788, shortly after their return from the islands, Wesley received Kilham into the regular itineraries of his Church. He was always one of the most zealous Methodists, his ministrations frequently met with opposition, and an encounter with a mob was almost a daily experience. At Bolton his chapel was stoned; at Alford market-place he was attacked by a clergyman and a constable; at Spilsby he was assailed with dirt and eggs. In another place gunpowder was laid under the spot where he expected to preach, with a train extending some distance, but without effect, for he took his stand elsewhere and escaped the danger. It was amid such difficulties and trials that he labored for the cause of his Master. In 1791 the founder of Methodist expired. During the life of Wesley there had been no actual separation of the Wesleyans from the Established Church. He had been careful to avoid religious meetings during the hours for public worship in the Establishment. He had thus preserved the connection; nor did Wesley, to record the wish, "Let us have the liberty of Englishmen, and give the Lord's Supper to our societies." About the time of Wesley's death he wrote, "I
The storm, however, soon blew over. I hope God will open the eyes of the Methodists to see their sin and folly in their inconsistent connection with the Church. The opposition against ecclesiastical subserviency to the laws of the Church of England became more determined after W. Taylor's death, July 28, 1791, the first after Mr. Wesley's death, to "take the plan as Mr. Wesley had left it." "The controversy could not," says Stevens (History of Methodism, iii, 88), "be resumed, and more definite results must be reached. Vehemence and anarchy would be the consequences." The body of the national Church regarded the pledge as binding the Methodists to the Establishment; the advocates of progress disdained, and, in the language of Pownall, declared, "Not so; our old plan has been to follow the openings of Providence, and to alter or amend the plan as we saw it needful, in order to be more useful in the hand of God." Hanby, whom Wesley had authorized to administer the sacraments, still claimed the right to do so wherever the societies wished him. Pownall wrote the same year that if the people were denied the sacraments, they would leave the connection in many places.

Taylor was determined as far as Liverpool; and Atmore wrote that, having 'solemnly promised upon his knees before God and his people that he would give all diligence not only to preach the word, but to administer the sacraments in the Church of God,' he would "never, unless overruled by Divine Providence, be induced to withdraw from any connection. We were as much divided," he later wrote, "in our views and practice as before; and numerous disputes occurred during the year respecting the administration of the sacraments and a total separation from the Church of England. Circular letters in great abundance were sent into different parts of the kingdom, and the minds of the people were much diverted from the pursuit of more sublime objects by others which tended but little to the profit of the soul. The diversified opinions of the connection were, in fine, resolving themselves into three classes, and giving rise to as many parties, composed respectively of men who, from their attachment to the Establishment, wished no change, unless it might be a greater subordination to the national Church by the abandonment of the sacraments in those cases where Wesley had admitted them; of such as wished to maintain the plan of connection as settled by the Methodists; and of those who thought it might be requisite to administer it; and such as desired revolutionary changes, with a more equal distribution of powers among laymen and preachers." Kilham belonged to the third party, and used all the means at his disposal to prevent the Revolution, or, "as he termed it, the connection." At the next Conference, however, he was severely criticized for his assertion of the popular rights, and for the publication of a pamphlet on the Progress of Liberty, in which he urged a distribution of the power of government between the clerical and the lay elements. In the course of the controversy severe remarks had been thrown out by Kilham, which were construed by the preachers into defamations of the society, and at the London Conference of 1796 he was formally arraigned, and expelled from the connection. This summary process precipitated the division of sentiment, and resulted in the establishment of an independent body (now known as the New Connection Methodists) in 1797 at Ebenezer Chapel. See Methodists, New Connection. A writer in the Wesleyan Times of May 12, 1862, furnishes documents which go to prove that Kilham's course, both in 1763-4, and even as late as 1796, had the approval of the most celebrated leaders of Methodism. At this time Dr. Adam Clarke, Pownall, Browne, and Cowles, all earnestly indorsed the movement. Kilham himself did not long survive the ecclesiastical censure of his brethren. He died July 20, 1798. It is but just to his memory to say that he is acknowledged by all to have been a man of fervent piety, and that he was animated by great zeal for the success of the Wesleyan cause.

KIMCHI

Kilgrew, Hickety, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1615, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he was ordained in 1638. He was made chaplain to James, duke of York, and prebend of Westminster, in 1642, and died about 1685. His Sermons were published (1666, 4to; 1685, 4to; 1689, 4to; and 1695, 4to): the last edition was by bishop Patrick, who highly eulogized the abilities of Killigrew as a pulpit orator. — Allibone, Dict. of Engl. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Kilvert, Francis, an English theologian and teacher, was born in Bath in 1739. His early education was under the instruction of Dr. Rowlandson, at Hungerford; afterwards he was at the Bath Grammar School, where, because of his superior acquirements, he was engaged as one of the assistant masters prior to his entering Oxford. He went to Worcester College in 1811, was ordained deacon in 1816, and priest in 1817. His first curacy was that of Claverton, near Bath. In 1837 he became rector of Claverton Lodge, in which he continued to teach privately until his death, Sept. 15, 1863. Kilvert was a man of uncommon purity of life, and as an instructor of the youth his precepts and holy example were invaluable. He published a volume of Sermons (preached at St. Mary's Church, Bathwick, 1827): — Collection of original Latin inscriptions: and Memoirs of Bishop Hard (1860). See Appleton, American Annual Cyclopaedia, 1868, p. 571. (J. L. S.)

Kilwardbye, Robert, a noted English prelate, flourished in the second half of the 13th century. He was educated at the universities of Oxford and Paris. In 1272 he became archbishop of Canterbury, and in 1277 was made cardinal. He died in 1279. Cardinal Kilwardbye is said to have written as many as 80 different works, but none of these were ever printed. See Hoefer, Neue Biog. Gér. xxvii, 720.

Kimmer, Isaac, an English dissenting minister, born at Wantage, Berkshire, in 1639, was educated at Gresham College, London, and the Dissenters' Academy, and was admitted at Wadham College, Oxford; but resigned in 1672 on account of some difficulties with his congregation, and returned to London, where he published a periodical which lived some four years. He was also employed by book-sellers in various literary undertakings, compiling a number of historical works, among which we remark the Life of Oliver Cromwell (London, 1714, 8vo). He wrote also the Life of bishop Beveridge prefixed to the folio edition of that prelate's works, of which he was editor:—Sermons, etc., to which is prefixed Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Author (London, 1756, 8vo). He died in 1758. See Chalmers, General Biographical Dictionary; Allibone, Dictionary of English and American Authors, vol. ii, s. v. (J. N. P.)

Kimchi, David, ben-Joseph (by the Jews frequently called Redak, from the initial letters דק רדניק רד וק), one of the most distinguished Jewish writers of the Middle Ages, the great exponent of Hebrew grammar, was born at Narbonne in the south of France, in 1160. Very little is known of his private life. He must certainly have enjoyed, even among his contemporaries, considerable influence, gained perhaps, in a measure, by his masterly defence of Moses Maimonides; for in 1292 we find him acting as the arbiter of the dispute then existing between the Spanish and French rabbis respecting the opinions advanced in the More Nebihek of Maimonides. He died about 1240. His works are:—(1) Commentary on the Pentateuch, only Genesis has been published by A. Ginsburg (Presburg, 1842), exp. 1–10 being supplied by Kirchheim; (2) Commentary on the Psalms, first printed in 1477, reprinted several times, and also given in the Rabbinical Bibles of Jacob ben-Chajim, but not in those edited by Buxtorf and Frankforter. (5) Commentary on Ruth, published for the first time by Mercier (Paris, 1568) and in the Rabbinical Bibles:—(7) Commentary on Job (translations by John, which has not yet been published:—(8) The celebrated work called Mikkol, or Perfection, which consists of two parts—a. Kimchi, as he himself frankly says in his introduction to the Mittkol, did not so much furnish new and startling criticism as an exhibit of the results of the manifold and extensive labors of his numerous predecessors. His lexicon is, to a great extent, a translation of Ibn-Ganach's Book of Roots [see Ibn-Ganach], and he freely quotes the great Jewish-Arabic commentators, grammarians, and lexicographers, Saadia, Ibn-Korieish, Chajuj, Ibn-Ganach, Ibn-Gebirol, Ibn-Gaith, Ibn-Balaam, Gikattisa, and many other celebrities. "But, though," says Ginsburgh, "the Book of Roots (Cytoph. Bibl. Lit. vol. ii, s. v.)," yet his merits are great. He was the first who discovered the distinction between the long and the short vowels, whereby the understanding of the changing of vowels has been greatly facilitated. He moreover defended a simple, natural, and grammatical exegesis, at a time when most of his Jewish brethren were enamored of Hagadic, Cabalistical, and astrological interpretations. It is therefore not to be wondered at that he became so eminent among his brethren that they applied to him, by a play of words, the saying in the Mishna (Aboth, iii, 17), רבי יוסי אפיה גיא אמרolk, No Kimchi, no understanding of the Scriptures. Among Christians Kimchi also enjoyed great celebrity, more especially, however, among the precursors of the Reformation and the Reformers themselves, "notwithstanding his hostility to Christianity, which is displayed throughout his commentaries, and which arose from the doctrines of the Jesuitical party, and from the Roman-Catholic establishment of the Crusaders. Many passages obnoxious to adherents of the Christian faith were struck out by the Inquisition, and are omitted in later editions of Kimchi's Commentaries. Pococke collected all the passages which had been omitted from the Prophets in Not. et Portus Moesiae, in his theological works (ed. Lond., 1740, 1, 341 sq. The first efforts of Christian scholars in compiling Heb. lexicons, or glossaries, and grammars, were based on the labors of Kimchi, and the notes accompanying the Latin Bibles of Munster and Stephen are derived from him. Excerpts of his Commentary on Isaiah were translated into Latin by Munster, and a Latin version of the whole of it was published by Malalas (Florence, 1744). Later in the 18th century, the Psalms were translated by Utrecht, 1657 and 1658, and the Psalms into English (London, 1837). A Latin translation of the Commentary on the Psalms was made by Janvier (Constantin, 1544). His grammatical labors embraced in the Midrash was translated into Latin by Guidacior (Paris, 1540), and a Latin version of the Roots was published in 1546. See Steinschneider, Catalogus Lib. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, col. 668-675; Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaeica, ii, 183 sq.; and his Introdc. to Hebrew Dictionary; the masterly biography of Kimchi by Geiger in Osar Nezach Maimonides ( Vienna, 1857), p. 157 sq.; Dukas, Die Familie Kimchi (Literaturblatt des Orientes, 1860); Gritz, Gesch. der Juden, vi, 296 sq.; Kittel, Bibl. Kimchi, Joseph, Ben-Isaac, a distinguished Jewish Rabbi, father of the preceding (David), was born in Spain in the latter half of the 11th century, but was obliged to quit Spain during the terrible persecutions by the Mohammedans, and settled at Narbonne, France. Just as little is known of his personal history as of his son's. He was very learned in the science of the Hebrew language and Biblical exegesis, and by the introduction into Southern France of that thorough scholarship for which the Spanish Jews in his day are so celebrated, gave a new impetus to the study of the O.-Test. Scripture in the original. As has been pllyhly said, he became the father of the O.-Test. Bible in Southern France. He died about 1182. He wrote a number of valuable contributions to exegetical theology, but it is as a theologian, especially as a polemic, that Joseph Kimchi excelled. His most important works are: הָבֵית הָבֵית (Book of the Covenant), a treatise against Christianity, in his most outstanding from a dialogue between a Jew (Maammon or believer) and a Christian (Min or heretic), and which was published in the Makhem ha-Shem (Constantinople, 1710, 8vo), הָבֵית הָבֵית, and against a Jew named Peter Alphonse, who had become a Christian. This work was never published. He also wrote in Hebrew verse the maxims of Solomon ben-Gabriol (of these fragments appeared in the Zion [Franchise, 1842, 8vo], ii, 97-100); some Hebrew books, which were inserted into the midrash of Shokcar (published by Mars,Jare [Manresa, 1612, 8vo]); a Hebrew translation of Bachi ben-Joseph's moral, printed in the works of the latter (Leipzig, 1846, 12mo); besides commentaries on most of the books of the O. T. The last are as follows: (1) Commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled rod הָבֵית הָבֵית (The Book of the Law), fragments are extant in MS, de Rossi 166, and in the quotations of his son D. Kimchi;—(2) Commentary on the earlier Prophets, called rod הָבֵית הָבֵית (The Bill of Purchase), in allusion to Jer. xxxii, 11;—(3) Commentary on the later Prophets, called rod הָבֵית הָבֵית (The Unfolded Book), in allusion to Jer. xxxiii, 14). These works, too, have not as yet come to light, and we only know them through the numerous quotations from them dispersed through David Kimchi's Commentaries on the Prophets. His didactic Commentary on Job, of which defective MSS. are preserved in the Bodleian Library and at Munich, 366;—(5) Commentary on Proverbs, a perfect MS. of which exists in the Munich Library, No. 242;—(6) Hebrew Grammar, called rod הָבֵית הָבֵית (The Book of Remembrance), which is the first written by a Jew in a Christian country, and is quoted by D. Kimchi in the Midrash, רַבּ, d, b, c. Another grammatical work, entitled הָבֵית הָבֵית, also quoted in the Midrash, יִבְּרָה; also quoted in the Midrash, יִבְּרָה, a. "Both as a commentator and a grammarian," says Ginsburg (in Kittel, Bibl. Cyclopedia, vol. ii, s, v.), "Joseph Kimchi deserves the highest praise; and, though his works thus far unpublished, his contributions to Biblical literature produced the most beneficial results, inasmuch as they prepared the way in Christian countries for a literal and sound exegesis. His son, David Kimchi, who constantly quotes him, both in his commentaries and under almost every root of his Hebrew Lexicon, has thus far maintained him under the full influence of the grammatical and exegetical principles of this deservedly esteemed Hebraist." See, besides the works cited under David Kimchi, Biesenthal and Lebrecht's edition of D. Kimchi's Radicum Liber (Berlin, 1847), col. xxiv sq.; and Geiger's excellent treatise in Osar Nezach (Vienna, 1866), i, p. 97-115, ii, 827; Literaturblatt des Orientes, 1850; Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaeica, ii, 186 sq. (J. H. W.)

Kimchi, Moses, Ben-Joseph (also called Remah), from the initial letters יִבְּרָה יֵשְׁכָּם, eldest son of the preceding (Joseph), flourished about 1160-1176. Though far inferior in ability to his father and brother, he earned an honorable place as a commentator and grammarian. His works are as follows: (1) Commentary on Proverbs (or Journey on the Paths of Knowledge), which became a manual for both Jews and Christians, and which is still studied by Hebrew grammar. It was highly commended by Elias Levita, who annotated and edited it in 1608. It was afterwards published, with a Latin translation, by Seb. Munster (Basel, 1681), and since frequently, with diverse additions and modifications. The chief merit of this little volume consists in the fact that M. Kimchi was the first to employ therein the word וָסָפִית as a paradigm of the regular verbs, instead of the less appropriate verb meaning gutturals וָסָפִית, which had been used by his predecessors, in imitation of Arabic grammarians;—(2) A grammatical treatise on the anomalous expressions, entitled יִבְּרָה יֵשְׁכָּם, quoted by D. Kimchi in the Midrash, see Biesenthal and Lebrecht's edition of D. Kimchi's Radicum Liber (Berlin, 1847), col. xxxviii sq.; Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaeica, ii, 187 sq.; Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. Kimmoah, Kimmoah. See NETTLE.

Kim'yah (Heb. Kim'ya, בִּקְרִית, an exeg., as in Jer. ix, 9, etc.; Septuag. כְּרִית v. l. 'Levij'), a city in the extreme south of Judah (hence prob. included within the territory of Simeon), mentioned between Jugur and Dimnah (Josh. xv, 22). "Stanley (Sinai and Pal. p. 160) ingeniously connects Kimnah with the Kenites (בִּקְרִית), who settled in this district (Josh. i. 16). But it should not be overlooked that the list in Josh. xv, 22 reports to record the towns as they were at the conquest, while the settlement of the Kenites probably (though not certainly) did not take place till after it. It is mentioned in the Omonacions of Eusebius and Jerome (s. v. כְּרִית, כרּית), but not as to imply that they had any actual knowledge of it. With the sole exception of Schwartz (Polest. p. 99), it appears to be unmentioned by any traveller, and the 'town Cusab, situated near the wilderness of Zuin,' with which he would identify it, is not to be found in his own or any other map' (Smith). The true position of Cusab can only be conjecturally located as not far from the Dead Sea, possibly in wady Fikeh.

Kindervater, Christian Victor, a German preacher and philosopher of the Kantine school, was born at Neuenhellen, Thuringen, in 1758, and was educated at the University of Leipzig. He became pastor at Peltelwitz, near Leipzig, in 1790; in 1804, general superintendent at Eisenach, and died May 9, 1806. His most important work is "De homine qui omnium necat esse immortalis, animae postea esse tranquillo" ( Lipsa, 1785, 4to):—

KIND. I. The following are the Hebrew terms thus rendered in the English Bible:

1. בֵּית נוֹעַד, mishpachoth, usually rendered "family," answering to the Latin genus, except that it more distinctly includes the idea of original affinity or derivation from a common stock; it corresponds exactly with our word clan. It is used of the different tribes of the Canaanites (Gen. x. 9); of the subdivisions of the Hebrew people (Exod. vii. 14; Num. i. 20, etc.); sometimes for one of the tribes (Josh. vii. 17; Judg. xiii. 2, etc.), and in the later books tropically for a people or nation (Jer. viii. 3; xxv. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 32; Micah ii. 5). It is translated kindred in the A. V. at Gen. xxiv. 41; Josh. vi. 29; Ruth ii. 8; Job xxxii. 2— in all of which it refers to relationship by consanguinity, more or less remote.

2. בֵּית נוֹעַד, mole'edah, conveys primarily the idea of birth, nativity; hence a person born, a child (Gen. xxviii. 9; Lev. xvii. 9, 11), and persons of the same family or lineage (Gen. xii. 1; xxiv. 4; xxviii. 3; xxix. 7; Num. xx. 30; Esth. ii. 10; vii. 6— all which passages it is translated kindred in the A. V.). The family in these instances, however, the kinship is only the remote one of common nationality arising out of common descent. But מְלֹדֶד, molas'dah, literally knowledge, is used to express blood-relationship in Ruth iii. 2; compare בֵּית נוֹעַד (Ruth ii. 1; Prov. vii. 4).

4. בֵּית נוֹעַד, geülah, redemption, a word which properly designated such near relationship by blood as would confer the rights and obligations of a בֵּית נוֹעַד, kinsman, avenger, and redeemer, on the party. See Geûl. As commonly used, however, it denotes either the thing redeemed (Ruth iv. 6), or the right of redeeming (Lev. xxv. 29, etc.), or the redemption price (Lev. xxv. 26, etc.). The only passage in which it is translated kindred in the A. V. is Ezek. xi. 16. Hengstenberg (Christol. iii. 9, E. T.) and Hitzig (Comment. ad loc.) contend that פֵּנוּר is to be taken here not in the sense of relationship, but in that ofSureness or substitutionary action, and they would translate the passage, "Thy brethren are the men of thy suretyship," or "redemption," i. e. the men whom it lies on them to redeem or act for. The Sept. seems to have read פֵּנוּר, for they give עֲכָלָה in Isaiah.

5. בֵּית נוֹעַד, which properly means brother, occurs only once with the rendering kindred in the A. V., in 1 Chron. xiii. 29. It is frequently used elsewhere in a wide sense, and may be understood of nearly all collateral relationships whatever, whether by consanguinity, affinity, or simple association. From this comes בֵּית נוֹעַד, brotherhood (Zech. xi. 14).

Besides these terms, the Hebrews expressed consanguinity by such words and phrases as בֵּית נוֹעַד, flesh (Gen. xxxvii. 27; Isa. xi. 7); בֵּית נוֹעַד, my bone and my flesh (Gen. xxix. 14; Judg. ix. 2; 2 Sam. v. 1, etc.); בֵּית נוֹעַד, flesh (Lev. xviii. 12, 13, etc.; Num. xxvii. 41), with בֵּית נוֹעַד, coll. kinnsmen (Lev. xviii. 17); and בֵּית נוֹעַד, flesh of his flesh (A. V. near of kin, Lev. xviii. 6; near of blood, xv. 49).

II. With the Test. We have the following Greek words thus rendered: πατρίς, the most general and frequent term, our kinsman, i.e. birth relationship, with its derivative αὐγγελία, co-relationship: πατρίς (Acts iii. 25), descent in a direct line ("lineage," Luke ii. 4; "family," Eph. iii. 15); and ἐθνός (Rev. v. 9, vii. 5; xi. 3; xii. 7, xiv. 6), a tribe (as elsewhere rendered).

In addition to these Hebrew and Greek words, various others of cognate derivation or similar significance are frequently rendered "kin," "kinship." III. The terms expressive of immediate relationship are PATER, MOTHÉR, BROTHER, SISTER, CHILD; these expressing collateral relationship are UNCLE, AUNT, NEPHEW (niece does not occur in the A. V., but brother's or sister's daughter), COUSIN; those expressive of affinity are FATHER-IN-LAW, MOTHER-IN-LAW, SISTER-IN-LAW, MOTHER-IN-LAW, DAUGHTER-IN-LAW, BROTHER-IN-LAW, SISTER-IN-LAW.

See each of these in their place.

IV. The relations of kindred, expressed by few words, and imperfectly defined in the earliest ages, acquired in course of time greater significance and wider influence. The full list of relatives either by consanguinity, i. e. as arising from a common ancestor, or by affinity, i. e. as created by marriage, may be seen detailed in the Corpus Iuris Civ. Digest. lib. xxxviii. tit. 10, de Gradibus; see also Corp. Jur. Canum. Decr. ii. c. xxxv. 5, 9. See Family.

The domestic and economical questions arising out of kindred may be classed under the three heads of Marriage, Inheritance, and Blood-Revenger; and the reader is referred to the articles on those subjects for information thereon. It is clear that the tendency of the Mosaic law was to increase the restrictions on marriage, by defining more precisely the relations created by it, as is shown by the cases of Abraham and Moses. For information on the general subject of kindred and its obligations, see Selden, De Jure Naturali, lib. v.; Michaelis, Laws of Moses, ed. Smith, ii. 86; Knobel on Lev. xviii; Philo, De Spec. Kine (קֵיתֶן, porah; i.e. fruitful, a heifer, Gen. xxxii. 15; xii. 2-7; and so rendered in Numb. xix. 2-9; also a young mish-cov, 1 Sam. vi. 14-14; "cow," Job xxi. 10; Isa. xi. 7; a "heifer" just broken to the yoke, Hose iv. 16; put as a symbol of a voluptuous female, Amos iv. 1; sometimes in the Auth. Vers. for בֵּית נוֹעַד, e' leph, usually an oz, as rendered in Psal. viii. 8; Prov. xiv. 4; xxxii. 24; but fem. in Deut. vii. 13; xxxii. 4, 18, 51; also for בֵּית נוֹעַד, bukar, Deut. xxxiii. 14; 2 Sam. xvii. 29; a beece or one of a herd of cattle, elsewhere without distinction of sex, and rendered "oz," "bulllock," "herd," etc.). See Cow.

KING (Heb. and Chald. קֵינָן, mel'et, ruler; בֵּלֶקָן, the most general term for an absolute, independent, and life-long sovereign. 1. Scriptural Applications of the Title.—In the Bible the name does not always imply the same degree of power or importance, neither does it indicate the magnitude of the dominion or territory of the national ruler thus designated (Gen. xxxvi. 81). Many persons are called "kings" in Scripture whom we should rather denominate chiefs or leaders; and many single towns, or towns with their adjacent villages, are said to have kings. Hence we need not be surprised at seeing that so small a country as Canaan contained thirty-one kings which we were conquered (Josh. xii, 9, 24), besides many who no doubt escaped the arms of Joshua. Adonibezek himself, so very powerful king, mentions seventy kings whom he had subdued and mutilated (Judg. i, 7; 1 Kings iv, 21: xx, 1, 16). Even at the present day the heads of Arab tribes are often called "kings," which in this case also means no more than sheik or chief. In like manner, in the New Test., owing to the peculiar political relations of the Jews, the title "king" has very different significations. (1.) The "king" was the head of the state (1 Pet. ii, 19, 17); and so the "seven kings" (Rev. xv, 10) are perhaps the first seven Cæsars (comp. Thilo, Apocr. 579). (2.) Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv, 9; Mark vi, 22), although only tetrarch (compare Luke iii, 19). (3.) So also the ten provincial representatives of the Roman governors (Rev. xii, 12), as being supreme within their respective jurisdictions. See GOVERNOR, etc.

"Kings," in symbolical language, signifies the possessors of supreme power, whether lodged in one or more persons (Prov. viii, 15, 16). It is applied in the Scriptures to the various reagents of the universe (1 Tim. i, 17), and to Christ, the Son of God, the sole Head and Governor of his Church (1 Tim. vi, 15, 16; Matt. xxvii, 11; Luke xix, 38; John i, 49; xviii, 83, 84); also to men, as invested with regal authority by their fellow-men (Psalms ii, 1; 2 cryst.; 1 Peter ii, 13-17); and so also the people of God are called kings and priests (Psa. xlix, 14; Dan. vii, 22, 27; Matt. xix, 28; Luke xxii, 30; 1 Cor. vi, 2, 3; 2 Tim. ii, 12; Rev. i, 6; ii, 26; 21; xx, 10; xxii, 5). In Job xviii, 14 is applied to Death, who is there called the "king of terror." In Job xxv, 15, Leviathan, or the crocodile, is thus designated: "he is a king over all the children of pride." (See WENHAM'S Symbol. Dict.)

The application, however, of the term "king," with which we are here particularly concerned, is that of the name of the national ruler of the Hebrews during a period of about 350 years previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, B.C. 588. It was borne first by the ruler of the Twelve Tribes united, and then by the rulers of Judah and Israel separately. See KINGS, BOOK OF.

2. Origin of the Hebrew Monarchy.—Regal authority was one of the institutions that characterized the original and unadulterated form. Their fundamental idea was that Jehovah was the sole king of the nation (1 Sam. viii, 7); to use the emphatic words in Isa. xxxviii, 22, "the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king." Although Moses ventured, with his bar at Cades, to set up a national experiment, of founding a society without a king, and in doing so evinced a rare patriotism and self-denial, for without doubt the man who rescued the Jews from bondage and conducted them to the land of Canaan, might have chosen, have kept the dominion in his own hands, and transmitted a crown to his posterity, yet he well knew what were the elements with which he had to deal in framing institutions for the rescued Israelites. Slaves they had been, and the spirit of slavery was not yet wholly eradicated from their souls. They had witnessed to their elevation of the poor and the more than ordinary pomp and splendor which environ a throne. Not improbable the prosperity and abundance which they had seen in Egypt, and in which they had been, in a manner, allowed to partake, might have been sacrifices by them to the regal form of government. It was the closest possible consideration that they have apprehended a not very remote departure from the fundamental type of his institutions. Accordingly he makes a special provision for this contingency (Deut. xvii, 14), and labors, by anticipation, to guard against the abuses of royal power. Should a king be demanded by his people, let it be to perform the duties of his office; he was not to be drawn away by the love of show, especial-ly by a desire for that regal display in which horses have always borne so large a part, to send down to Egypt, still less to cause the people to return to that land; he was to avoid to amassing silver and gold; he was to have a copy of the law made expressly for his own study—a study which he was never to intermit till the end of his days. He might not be lifted up above his brethren, that he might not be turned aside from the living God, but observing the divine statutes, and thus acknowledging himself to be no more than the vicegerent of heaven, might enjoy happiness, and transmit his authority to his descendants.

The remnant of Israel, therefore, at length soon left the people to the natural results of their own condition and character. Anarchy ensued. Noble minds, indeed, and stout hearts appeared in those who were termed judges; but the state of the country was not so satisfactory to prevent an unenlightened people, having low and gross affections, from preferring to a crown the apparent protection of a sceptre to the invisible and, therefore, mostly unrecognised arm of Omnipotence. A king accordingly is requested (1 Sam. viii). "The misconduct of Samuel's sons, who had been made judges, and who had made themselves too much like their father, led the people to propose a king. The request was at first acceded to; but, having sought in prayer to learn the will of God, he was instructed to yield to the demand; and yet at the same time he was directed to "protest solemnly unto them, and show them the manner of the king that shall reign over them." Faithfully did the prophet depict the evils which a monarchy would inflict on the people. In vain, they said, "Nay, but we will have a king over us." Accordingly, Saul, the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, was, by divine direction, selected, and privately anointed by Samuel "to be captain over God's inheritance;" thus he was to hold only a delegated and subordinate authority (1 Sam. i, 3, 1-16). Under the guidance of Samuel, Saul was subsequently chosen by lot from among the assembled tribes; and though his personal appearance had no influence in the choice, yet, when he was plainly pointed out to be the individual designed for the sceptre, Samuel called the annual summons of the people, and announced his announcement. "The uncivilized nations have a preponderating influence, and are never without effect, at least, in supporting the physical dignity of a reign (1 Sam. x, 17-27)." (For a fuller discussion of this change in the Hebrew constitution, see Kitt's Daily Bible Illustrations under the portion of history in question.)

The special occasion of the substitution of a regal form of government for that of the judges seems to have been the siege of Jebesh-Gilead by Naahah, king of the Ammonites (1 Sam. xi, 1; xii, 12), and the refusal to allow the inhabitants of the city to remove except on humiliating and cruel conditions (1 Sam. xi, 2, 4-6). The conviction seems to have forced itself on the Israelites that they could not resist their formidable neighbor unless they placed themselves under the sway of a king; like surrounding nations. Concurrently with this conviction, disgust had been excited by the corrupt administration of justice under the sons of Samuel, and a radical change was desired by them in this respect also (1 Sam. viii, 8-5). Accordingly, the original idea of a Hebrew king was twofold: 1st, that he should lead the people in time of war; and, 2ndly, that he should execute judgment and justice in peace. See RULE; 20. In both respects the desired end was attained. The righteous wrath and military capacity of Saul were immediately triumphant over the Ammonites; and though ultimately he was defeated and slain in battle with the Philistines, he put even them to flight on more than one occasion (1 Sam. xiv, 28;
8. Functions and Prerogatives.—Emanating as the royal power did from the demand of the people and the permission of a prophet, it was not likely to be unilaterally authoritative or arbitrary. The government of God, indeed, remained, being rather concealed and complicated than divorced, much less superseded. The king ruled not in his own right nor in virtue of the choice of the people, but by concession from on high, and partly as the servant and partly as the representative of theocracy. Indeed, hence, was the tenure of the kingly power. How restricted it was in its authority, appears clear from the comparative facility with which the crown was transferred from Saul to David, and the part which the prophet Samuel took in effecting that transfer—points out the quarter where lay the power which limited, if it did not primarily, at least, control the royal authority. It must, however, be added that, if religion narrowed this authority, it also invested it with a sacredness which could emanate from no other source. Liable as the Israelitic kings were to interference on the part of priest and prophet, they were, by the same divine power, shielded from the unholy hands of the profane vulgar, and it was at once impious and rebellion to do injury to “the Lord’s anointed” (Psa. ii, 6, 7 sq.). Instances are not wanting to corroborate and extend these general observations. When Saul was in extremity before the Philistines (1 Sam. xxviii), he consulted the usual methods of obtaining counsel: “Saul inquired of the Lord; the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by the prophets.” So David, when in extremity before the Philistines (1 Sam. xxi, 1), inquired of the Lord, and thereupon the king was to take a certain course, which proved successful (see also 2 Sam. ii, 1). Sometimes, indeed, as appears from 1 Sam. xxviii, it was a prophet who acted the part of prime minister, or chief counsellor, to the king, and who, bearing that sacred character, must have possessed very weighty influence in the royal divan (1 Kings xxii, 7 sq.). We must not, however, expect to find any definite and permanent distribution of power, any legal determination of the royal prerogatives as they were established from the divine authority; circumstances, as they prompted certain deeds, restricted or enlarged the sphere of the monarch’s action. Thus, in 1 Sam. xi, 4 sq., we find Saul, in an emergency, assuming, without consultation or deliberation, the power of demanding something like a levy of the army and the vast preparations of a protracted war. With the king lay the administration of justice in the last resort (2 Sam. xv, 2; 1 Kings iii, 16 sq.). He also possessed the power of life and death (2 Sam. xiv). To provide for and superintend the public worship was at once a king’s highest and most important task (2 Kings v, viii, 2; 1 Kings xii, 4; xxiv, 4; xxiii, 1). One reason why a people requested a king was that they might have a recognised leader in war (1 Sam. viii, 20). The Mosaic law offered a powerful hindrance to royal despotism (1 Sam. x, 25). The people also, by means of their elders, formed an express compact, by which they stipulated for their rights (1 Kings vii, 4), and were from time to time appealed to, generally in cases of “great pith and exertion of the people” (1 Kings xvi, 15; 2 Kings v, 11, 12; 2 Chron. vii, 1). Nor did the people fail to interpose their will, where they thought it necessary, in opposition to that of the monarch (1 Sam. xiv, 45). The part which Nathan took against David shows how effective, as well as bold, was the check exerted by the prophets; indeed, most of the prominent historians believe that the Prophet’s chief opposition came in fact from the Prophet, and was the chief opposition ever made to the vices alike of royalty, priesthood, and people. If needful, the prophet hesitated not to demand an audience with the king, nor was he dazzled or deterred by royal power and pomp (1 Kings xxi, 22, 25; 2 Kings i, 13). As, however, the monarch held the sword, the instrument of death was sometimes made to prevail over every restraining influence (1 Sam. xxi, 17). See PROPHET.

To form a correct idea of a Hebrew king, we must abstract ourselves from the notions of modern Europe, and reduce the conception of Oriental monarchy. It would be a mistake to regard the Hebrew government as a limited monarchy, in the English sense of the expression. It is stated in 1 Sam. x, 25, that Samuel “told the people the manner of the kingdom,” and wrote it in a book (2 Sam. viii, 1), and it stands there, and it is barely possible that this may refer to some statement respecting the boundaries of the kingly power. (The word כַּהֲנָה, literally judgment, translated “manner” in the A. V., is translated in the Sept. Βιβλιακα, i.e. statute or ordinance [comp. Ecclus. iv, 17; Bar. ii, 12; iv, 18].) But Josephus seems to have regarded the document as a prophetic statement, respecting the king, of the calamities which were to arise from the kingly power, as a kind of protest recorded for succeeding ages (Ant. vi, 4, 6). But no such document has come down to us; and if it ever existed, and contained restrictions of any moment on the kingly power, it was probably disregarded in practice. The following passage of a letter by John Malcolm respecting the shah of Persia may, with some slight modifications, be regarded as fairly applicable to the Hebrew monarchy under David and Solomon: “The monarch of Persia has been pronounced to be one of the most absolute of the world; in the next moment he would make a decree; he has been deemed a law, and he has probably never had any further restraint upon the free exercise of his vast authority than has arisen from his regard for religion, his respect for established usages, his desire for reputation, and his fear of exciting an opposition that might be dangerous to his power. He has resided for 30 years (comp. Eliph. Stone’s India, bk. viii, ch. 3). It must not, however, be supposed to have been either the understanding or the practice that the sovereign might seize at his discretion the private property of individuals. Ahab did not venture to seize the vineyard of Naboth, both trials, through the testimony of false witnesses. Naboth had been convicted of blasphemy; and possibly his vineyard may have been seized as a confiscation, without flagrantly outraging public sentiment in those who did not know the truth (1 Kings xi, 6). But no monarch could arrogate to himself the right of discriminating between friend and foe, of granting or withholding the protection of the law to those who might be regarded as an outrage that the monarch should from covetousness seize the private property of an innocent subject in no ways dangerous to the state. And generally, when Sir John Malcolm proceeds as follows in reference to one of the most absolute monarchs of the world, it will be understood that the Hebrew king, whose power might be described in the same way, is not, on account of certain restraints which exist in the nature of things, to be regarded as “a limited monarch” in the European use of the words. ‘We may assume that the power of the king in Persia was over the property and lives of his conquered enemies, his rebellious subjects, his own family, his ministers, over...’ public officers civil and military, and all the numerous train of domestics, and that he may punish any person of these classes without examination or formal procedure of any kind; in all other cases that are capital, the forms prescribed by law and custom are observed; the monarch or his authorized officer, who has heard the evidence and examined the evidence and the law declared, that the sentence shall be put in execution or that the condemned culprit shall be pardoned” (ii, 306). In accordance with such usages, David ordered Uriah to be treacherously exposed to death in the forefront of the hottest battle (2 Sam. xi, 15); he caused Bechah and Baanah to be slain instantaneous, when they brought him the head of Ishboseth (2 Sam. iv, 12); and he is represented as having on his death-bed recommended Solomon to put Joab and Shimei to death (1 Kings ii, 5-9). In like manner, Solomon caused to be killed, without trial, not only his elder brother Adonijah and Joab, whose execution might be regarded as the exceptional acts of a dismal state-policy in the beginning of his reign, but likewise Shimei, after having been seated on the throne three years. And King Saul, in resentment at their conivance with David's escape, put to death 85 priests, and caused a massacre of the inhabitants of Nob, including women, children, and sucklings (1 Sam. xxiii, 18, 19).

Besides being commander-in-chief of the army, supreme judge, and absolute master, as it were, of the lives of his subjects, the king exercised the power of imposing taxes, exacting tribute, and ordering national service and labor. Both these points seem clear from the account given (1 Sam. viii, 11-17) of the evils which would arise from the kingly power, and are confirmed in various ways. Whatever mention may be made of conciliating "old men, or "elders of Israel," we never read of their deciding such points as these. When Pulp, the king of Assyria, imposed a tribute on the kingdom of Israel, "Menahem," the king," exacted the money of all the mighty men of wealth, of each man 50 shekels of silver (2 Kings xv, 19). When Jehoiakin, king of Judah, gave his tribute of silver and gold to Pharaoh, he taxed the land to give the money; he exacted the silver and gold of the people, of every one according to his taxation (2 Kings xxii, 35). The degree to which the taxation of national labor might be carried on a special occasion is illustrated by king Solomon's requirements for building the Temple. He raised a levy of 80,000 men, and sent them to Lebanon by courses of 10,000 a month; and he had 70,000 that bare burdens, and 80,000 hewers in the mountains (1 Kings v, 13-15). Judged by the Oriental standard, there is nothing improbable in the statement in 1 Kings iv, 26, that Solomon expended on constructing the Mahommedyeh Canal in Egypt, Menahel Ali, by orders given to the various sheiks of the provinces of Sakarah, Gihizeh, Mensouh, Sharkieh, Masih, Bahryeh, and some others, caused 500,000 men, women, and children to be assembled along the site of the intended canal (see Mrs. Poonie's Englishwoman in Egypt, ii, 219). This was 120,000 more than the levy of Solomon.

In addition to these earthy powers, the king of Israel had a more awful claim to respect and obedience. He was "the king's son, and of his own blood" (1 Kings xi, 1; xvi, 13); and, as it were, His son, if just and holy (2 Sam. vii, 14; Psa. lxxiii, 26, 27; ii, 6, 7). He had been set apart as a consecrated ruler. Upon his head had been poured the holy anointing oil, composed of olive-oil, myrrh, cinnamon, saffron, sweet calamus, and cassia, which had hitherto been reserved exclusively for the priests of Jehovah, especially the high-priest, or had been solely used to anoint the Tabernacle of the Congregation, the Ark of the Testimony, and the vessels of the Tabernacle (Exod. xxx, 35-38; xii, 8; Lev. xxvii, 10; 1 Kings i, 39). He had become, in fact, the new anointed Jehovah. At the coronation of sovereigns in modern Europe, holy oil has frequently been used as a symbol of divine right; but this has been mainly regarded as a mere form, and the use of it was undoubtedly introduced in imitation of the Hebrew custom. But, from the beginning to the end of the Hebrew monarchy, a living real significance was attached to consecration by this holy anointing oil. From well-known anecdotes related of David—and, perhaps, from words in his lamentation over Saul and Jonathan—it results that the custom of handing over the deceased monarch's body to the next of kin had been invested the person of Saul, the first king, as the Lord's anointed; and that, on this account, it was deemed sacrilegious to kill him, even at his own request (1 Sam. xxiv, 6, 10; xxxvi, 9; 12; 2 Sam. ii, 1). After the destruction of the first Temple, in the Book of Lamentations over the calamities of the Hebrew people, it is by the name of "the Lord's Anointed" that Zeidekah, the last king of Judah, is bewailed (Lam. iv, 20). Again, more than 600 years after the capture of Zeidekah, the name of the Anointed, though never so used in the Old Testament—yet suggested, probably, by Ps. ii, 2; Dan. ix, 26—had become appropriate to the expected king, who was to restore the kingdom of David, and inaugurate a period when Edom, Moab, the Ammonites, and the Philistines would again be incorporated with the Hebrew monarchy, which would extend from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean Sea and to the ends of the earth (Acts i, 6; John i, 41; iv, 25; Isa. xi, 12-14; Psa. lxxiii, 8). Thus the identical Hebrew word which signifies anointed, through its Aramaic form adopted into Greek and Latin, is still preserved to us in the English word Messiah. (See Gesenius's Thesaurus, p. 826.) See 1, 2 below.

4. Appointment and Inauguration.—The law of succession to the throne is somewhat obscure, but it seems most probable that the king during his lifetime named his successor. This was certainly the case with David, who passed over his elder son Adonijah, the son of Hag- gith, in favor of Solomon, the son of Bathsheba (1 Kings i, 80; ii, 22), and with Rehoboam, of whom it is said that he loved Maachah, the daughter of Abalom, above all his wives and concubines, and that he made Abijah her son to be ruler among his brethren, to make him king (2 Chron. xi, 21). The succession of the first-born has been inferred from a passage in 2 Chron. xxii, 3, 4, in which Jehoshaphat is said to have given the kingdom to Jehoram "because he was the first-born." But this very passage tends to show that Jehoshaphat had the power of naming his successor; and it is worthy of note that Jehoram, on his coming to the throne, put to death all his brothers, which he would scarcely, perhaps, have done if the succession of the first-born had been the law of the land. From the conciseness of the narratives in the books of Kings no inference either way can be drawn concerning the ordinary mode of appointing the death of the father and succession of his son is recorded (1 Kings xv, 8). At the same time, if no partiality for a favorite wife or son intervened, there would always be a natural bias of affection in favor of the eldest son. There appears to have been some prominence given to the mother of the king (2 Kings xii, 12, 15; 1 Kings ii, 19), and it is possible that the mother may have been regent during the minority of a son. Indeed, some such custom best explains the possibility of the audacious usurpation of Athaliah on the death of her son Ahaziah: "She came, and she sat down on the throne of the kings" (2 Kings ii, 11). She was not the only woman of the seed-royal except the young Jehoash (2 Kings xi, 1-3). The people, too, and even foreign powers, at a later period interrupted the regular transmission of royal authority (2 Kings xxiii, 24; xxiv, 23, 24, 30; xxiv, 17). See Hasm.

It is supposed both by Jahn (Bib. Archzol. § 222) and Bauer (in his Heb. Allerkämmerer, § 20) that a king was only anointed when a new family came to the throne, or when the right to the crown was disputed. It is usually on such occasions only that the anointing is specified. As, in 1 Sam. x, 13; 1 Sam. xi, 14; 1 Kings ii, 19, 21; 2 Kings ii, 10, 11; 2 Kings ix, 3, 12; but this is not necessarily the case (see 2 Kings xxiii, 30), and there does not appear sufficient reason to doubt that each individual king was anointed. There can be little doubt, likewise, that the Kings of Israel were anointed, though the text is not specified.

Kings were anointed with oil (2 Sam. 4, 17: 1 Kings 19, 14: 1 Sam. 2, 11; 2 Sam. 2, 4; 1 Kings 1, 18; xxxix, 5), and in the banquet to which the prophet and high priest who performed the anointing acted as the representative of the theocracy and the expounder of the will of heaven, must have given to the spiritual power very considerable influence; and both in the parable of the devoted and of the observation direct to Egypt, where the same custom prevailed, and where the power of the priestly caste was immense (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt, 1, 379).

Indeed, the ceremony seems to have been essential to consecration, for kings have been taken from private individuals, but never as the punishment of rebellion, or on any other plausible pretext, is not specified (1 Sam. viii, 14; 1 Chron. xxviii, 26-28).

The produce of the royal flocks (1 Sam. xxvi, 7; 2 Sam. xxi, 28; 2 Chron. xxi, 10; 1 Chron. xxvii, 25). A nominal tenth of the produce of corn, land, vineyards, and of sheep (1 Sam. viii, 15, 17).

4. A tribute from merchants who passed through the Hebrew territory (1 Kings xi, 14). Presents made by his subjects (1 Sam. xx, 27; xvi, 20; 1 Kings x, 9; Psa. lxxxii, 10). There is, perhaps, no greater distinction in the story of Solomon with Western nations than in what relates to the giving and receiving of presents. When made regularly, they do, in fact, amount to a regular tax. Thus, in the passage last referred to in the book of Kings, it is stated that they brought to Solomon “every man his present, vessels of silver and vessels of gold, and garments, and armor, and horses, and mules, a rate year by year.”

5. Court and Ceremonies. — The following is a list of some of the officers of the king: 1. The recorder or chronicler, who was perhaps analogous to the historiographer whose duties John Malcolm mentions as an officer of the Persian court, whose duty it is to write the annals of the king’s reign (Hist. of Persia, c. 23). Certain it is that there is no regular series of minute dates in Hebrew history until we read of this recorder, or remembrancer, as the word sopher is translated in a marginal note of the English version. It signifies one who keeps the memory of events alive, in accordance with a motive assigned by Herodotus for writing his history, viz. that the acts of men might not become extinct by time (Herod. i, 1; 2 Sam. vii, 16; 1 Kings iv, 8; 2 Kings xxvii, 9; Isaa. xxxix, 2, 20).

The scribe of the annals of the state (1 Kings iv, 3, 8). His duty was to the king, or what he could legally require. See Solomon.

6. Usages. — A ruler in whom so much authority, human and divine, was embodied, was naturally distinguished by outward honors and luxuries. He had a court of Oriental magnificence. When the power of the kingdom was at its height, he sat on a throne of ivory, covered with pure gold, at the feet of which were two figures of lions, with others on the steps approaching the throne. The king was dressed in royal robes (1 Kings xxi, 10; 2 Chron. xxiv, 20); his insignia were a crown or diadem of pure gold, or as in the case of Solomon, radiant with precious stones (2 Sam. i, 10; xii, 30; 2 Kings xi, 12; Psa. lxxvii, 3), and a royal sceptre (Ezek. xxi, 11; Isaa. xiv, 6; Psa. lxxxiv, 4; Amos i, 5, 8). Those who approached him did him obeisance, bowing down and touching the ground with their foreheads (1 Sam. xxiv, 8; 2 Sam. xix, 24); and this was done even by a king’s wife, the mother of Solomon (1 Kings i, 16).

His officers and subjects called themselves his servants or slaves, though they do not seem habitually to have given way to such extravagant salutation as in the speeches of theMitanni and Persian courts (1 Sam. xvii, 32, 34, 36; xx, 8; 2 Sam. vi, 20; Dan. xi, 10, 11). As in the East at present, a kiss was a sign of respect and homage (1 Sam. x, 1; perhaps Psa. i, 2). He lived in a splendid palace, with porches and columns (1 Kings vii, 2-7). All his drinking-vessels were of gold (1 Kings iv, 21).
KING

At his accession, in addition to the anointing mentioned above, jubilant music formed a part of the popular character (1 Kings i, 25); the new sovereign rode in solemn procession on the royal mule of his predecessor (1 Kings i, 38), and took possession of the royal harp—an act which seems to have been scarcely less essential than other observances with which it was accompanied (1 Sam. ii, 9). The law (Deut. xvii, 17), foreseeing evils as sure than that by which Solomon, in his later years, was turned away from his fidelity to God, had strictly forbidden many wives; but Eastern passions and usages were too strong for a mere written prohibition, and a corrupted religion became a pandemon to royal lust, interpreting the divine command as sanctioning eighteen as the minimum of wives and concubines.

Deriving their power originally from the wishes of the people, and being one of the same race, the Hebrew kings were not generally less despotic than other oriental sovereigns, mingled more with their subjects, and were by no means difficult of access (2 Sam. xix, 8; 1 Kings xx, 39; Jer. xxxix, 7; 1 Kings iii, 16; 2 Kings vi, 26; vii, 9). After death the monarchs were interred in the royal cemetery in Jerusalem: "So David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David" (1 Kings ii, 10; x, 43; xiv, 81). But bad kings were excluded from "the sepulchres of the kings of Israel" (2 Chron. xxviii, 27).

KING is the name of the five canonical works of the followers of Confucius. See the art. Confucius in vol. ii, p. 470 sqq., especially p. 472.

KING, Alonso, a Baptist minister, was born in Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, in 1780. His early success, advantages were few; but in 1818 he went to prosecute his studies in the family of the Rev. Leland Howard, then pastor of the Baptist church in Windsor, Vt., where he was converted to Christ. He afterwards entered Watervliet College, Maine, and graduated in 1825. He was ordained pastor of the Baptist church in North Tarrytown, N.Y., in 1826, subsequently of a small church in Northborough, Mass., and finally settled at Westborough, Mass., where he died in 1855. King was a man of great humility, self-consecration, and self-abandonment. His preaching was never bold or startling, but always quiet, tender, persuasive. He had a talent for lyric poetry, and many of his productions are abroad without his name. His style as a writer was pure, with a decided cast of the imaginative or poetic, which was always apparent in his sermons and his printed productions. He compiled the Memoir of the distinguished missionary, Rev. George D. Boardman. See Sprague, Anecdotes of the American Pulpit, vi, 747. (J. L. S.)

KING, Barnabas, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Marlborough, Mass., June 2, 1780. While yet in his 14th year, his great proficiency in study attracted the attention of Dr. Catline, who afterwards became his pastor, who conducted him to Harvard College, Mass., which he entered in 1802. In 1804 he graduated, and then for a year taught school and studied theology with Dr. Catline. In 1805 he was licensed by the Berkshire Congregational Association, Mass., and in 1808 was ordained by the Presbytery, and installed as pastor of the Rockaway Church, N.J., where he continued to preach till 1848; his congregation then called a colleague pastor, which relation continued until the death of Dr. King, April 10, 1862. King was a man of admirable attainments; his cogent powers of reasoning, his unceasing devotion, and his sympathetic heart made him a model pastor. As a preacher, his style was very simple, but scriptural, and usually very earnest. See Wilson, Presbyterian Hist. Almanac, 1865. (J. L. S.)

KING, Charles, the noted president of Columbia College, was born in New York, March 16, 1789. In company with his father, Rufus King, he went to England, and, during his residence at the court of St. James as the representative of the American government, young Charles attended Harrow School, and later went to Paris to further prepare himself for admission to college. He, however, afterwards abandoned this intention and entered the mercantile profession. In 1828 he became co-editor of the New York American. In 1849 he was chosen president of Columbia College. He died at Frascati, near Rome, in Italy, Sept. 27, 1867. A list of his works, which are not of special interest to theological students, is given by Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors, ii, a. v.; New Americans Cyclopaedia, 1867, p. 425.

KING, Edward, a noteworthy English antiquary and lawyer, was born in 1745 in Norfolk, and was a graduate of Cambridge University. He was elected F.R.S. in 1767 and F.S.A. in 1770. He died in 1807. King wrote a number of works connected with theology, politics, political economy, and antiquities. We have room here only to note his Monas of Criticisms, tending to Illustrate some Few Passages in Holy Scripture upon Philosophical Principles and an enlarged View of Things (Lond. 1788, 4to, and since). The contents of this work are: On the word "here" in the Lord's Prayer; Septuagint Translation of Genesis; John the Baptist being Elias; Future coming of Christ: Day of Judgment; Series of Events in Revelation; Daniel's Prophecy; Deaths of Animas and Sapphira; Dissertations on Ligh; The Heavens: Stars; Fluid of Heat: Miracles; Jacob and Esau; Soul, Body, Spirit, etc. King's learning was profound and extensive, but he was so inclined to the speculative and hypothetical that he perpetually fell into difficulty by advancing statements which he was unqualified to establish. The want of discrimination between theory and truth, supposition and reality, together with the tenacity with which he clung to his premature conclusions when assailed, proved quite detrimental. In a work of his treating on the signs of the times, he was very desirous of tracing the history of the French Revolution to the records of sacred antiquity; he also ventured to assert the genuineness of the second book of Esdras in the Apocrypha. He was replyed to by Gough and bishop Horsey. See Chalmers's Dict. vol. xix (Lond. 1815); Watkins's Aesop. Dict. (Lond. 1820); Blake's Dict. of Eng. and Am. Authors, ii, a. v.; Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors, ii, a. v., 1840. (J. L. S.)

KING, Henry, D.D., bishop of Chichester, an eldest son of John King (q. v.), was born at Wornall, Buckinghamshire, in Jan. 1591. He studied at Westminster School, from whence he was elected to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1608. Having entered the Church, he became chaplain to king James I, archdeacon of Colchester, and resided for many years in the parish of Ashford-dean of Rochester in 1658, and finally bishop of Chichester in 1641. Although he was generally considered a Puritan, and his nomination had been a measure to conciliate that party, he remained a faithful adherent of the king during the civil war, and at the Restoration he was reinstated in his bishopric, though he had retired to France. He was considered a very successful preacher and a learned divine. His principal works are, An Exposition... upon the Lord's Prayer (London, 1684, 4to):—A Sermon of Deliverance, Pm. xec, 3 ( Lond, 1626, 4to):—Two Sermons upon the Act Sunday, July 10, 1625 (Oxford, 1625, 4to):—The Psalms of David turned into Metre (1621, 12mo); new edition, with biographical notices, notes, etc., by Dr. John Hammond, 1643, 12mo); etc. See Wood, Athenae Oxonienses, vol. ii.; Dodd, Church History, vol. ii.; Hooper, New Biog. Generale, xxvi., 739; Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors, ii, s. v. (J. H. P.)

King, James B., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Albany, N. Y., Aug. 20, 1802. He graduated from the College of New Jersey, Princeton, N. J. He studied theology at the Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the New York Presbytery, and in 1858 ordained and installed pastor of the Rockland Lake Church, New York, where he was quite successful and greatly beloved by his people. Failing health, however, compelled him to withdraw from the active duties of the pastor. During the period of his necessitated rest he did some effective work. He died at Woodlawn, near Sing Sing, New York, Sept. 15, 1864. Mr. King was an estimable minister, of good talents, and thoroughly consecrated to his work. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 126; American Church, 1866, p. 408.

King, John (1), D.D., bishop of London, an English theologian and a descendant of Robert King, first bishop of Oxford, was born at Wornall, Buckinghamshire, about 1589. He studied at Christ Church, Oxford. Having entered the Church, he became successively chaplain to queen Elizabeth, archdeacon of Nottingham in 1600, D.D. in 1601, dean of Christ Church in 1605, and, finally, bishop of London in 1611. He died in 1621. James I called him the "king of preachers." He wrote Lectures upon Joshua, delivered at York, 1594 (Lond. 1611, 4to), and some Sermons. See Wood, Athenae Oxonienses, vol. i.; Dodd, Church History, vol. i.; Hooper, New Biog. Generale, xxvi., 739; Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors.

King, John (2), D.D., an English theologian, was born in Cornwall in 1632. He studied at Oxford and Cambridge, and became successively rector of Chelsea and (in 1781) prebendary of the Cathedral of York. He died May 30, 1782. King wrote A vindication (2d ed. 1702, 4to):—The Case of John Atherton, Bishop of Waterford (1716, 8vo); and a number of Sermons.—Hooper, New Biog. Generale, xxvi., 742.

King, John (3), a Methodist minister, of whose early history nothing is definitely known, was one of the "first seven" who founded the Methodist movement in this country. He came from London to America in the latter part of 1759, and his enthusiastic sympathy with the pioneer Methodists led him to throw himself immediately into their ranks. The Church hesitated when he presented himself for license, but, persistent in his determination to preach, he made an appointment "in the Potter's Field," where he proclaimed his first message over the graves of the poor, and began a career of eminent usefulness. Afterwards he was licensed, and stationed in Wilmington, Del. Thence he went into Maryland, and was the first to introduce Methodism to the people of Baltimore. In this latter place he preached from tables in the public streets, and suffered much opposition from frequent mobs. King was afterwards received into the regular itinerancy. He was a member of the New Jersey conference of 1778, and was appointed to New Jersey. He soon after entered Virginia, and, till later he was again in New Jersey. He located during the Revolution, but in 1801 reappeared in the itinerant ranks in Virginia, and finally located in 1808. King was a pious, zealous, and useful man. He died at an advanced age, the last of the early ministers of the church. He was probably the only survivor, at the time of his decease, of all the preachers of ante-revolutionary date.—Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, i. 87. (J. L. S.)

King, John Glen, D.D., F.R.S., F.A.S., a distinguished English theologian and antiquarian, was born in Norfolk about 1781. He studied at Caius College, Cambridge, entered the Church, and in 1764 was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Petersburg. He afterwards became successively rector of Wormley, Hertfordshire (in 1785), and minister of the chapel in Broad Court, Drury Lane, London (1786). He died Nov. 3, 1877. King wrote The Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia, containing an Account of its Doctrine, Worship, and Discipline (London, 1772, 4to):—A Letter to the Bishop of Durham, containing some Observations on the State of Greece, etc. (Lond. 1775, 4to); etc. See Gen. Magazine, ivii and iviii; Biog. Dictionary; Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors, i. 1081.

King, John L., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Indiana Feb. 1, 1835; was educated at Knox College, Galesburg, Ill., and studied divinity in Lane Theological Seminary, Ohio; was licensed and ordained at Cincinnati in 1861, and then assumed the pastoral at Williamsport, Indiana; afterwards labored as a missionary among the sailors at Detroit, Michigan, and finally went to Idaho and Colorado Territories. He died near Denver, Nov. 10, 1886. Mr. King was a man of ripe scholarly attainments, and of fine abilities, especially to the work of elementary religious teaching.—Wilson, Presb. Historical Almanac, 1867.

King, Peter, lord chancellor of England, was born at Exeter, Devonshire, in 1669; went to Holland, and studied at the university at Leyden, and upon his return to England studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and became member of Parliament in 1699. In 1708 he was appointed recorder of London, and knighted. At the accession of George I he was made lord chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and soon after promoted to the peerage as lord King, baron of Ockham. He was made lord chancellor in 1726, but does not seem to have been as efficient in that position as was his predecessor, who died in 1733. He was well versed in both ecclesiastical history and the law. His principal works are, An Enquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Church, etc. [Anon.] (Lond. 1713, 8vo) in this, his first publication, he advocated, with much ability and learning, the right of Protestant dissenters from episcopacy to be comprehended in the scheme of the national establishment. The work excited much attention, and provoked much discussion, especially when the second edition was issued (1715). Prominent among the opponents of the pamphlet was John St. John, who wrote an Answer to it. King himself has been said to have afterwards altered his opinion on the subject:—The History of the Apostolical Creed, with critical Observations on six several Articles [Anon.] (London, 1702, 8vo)—a work displaying extraordinary learning and judgment, and highly commended by the ablest critics, among others by Moore. See Gentleman's Magazine, vol. lixi and lxii; Chalmers, General Biog. Dictionary; Lord Campbell, Lives of Lords Chancellors; Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors, s. v. (J. H. W.)

King, Richard, an English theologian, was born at Bristol in 1749; studied at the University of Oxford, and became successively rector of Steeple, Morden, and of Worthing. He died in 1810. King wrote Letters from Abraham Pymble to his Brother Peter on the Catholic Question (Lond. 1805, 8vo), which created some sensation.—On the Inspiration of the Scriptures (1805, 8vo):—On the Alliance between Church and State (1806, 8vo). His wife, Frances Elizabeth Bernard, wrote Female Scripture Biography (12th edit. London, 1840, 12mo):—The Benefits of the Christian Temper; etc. See Gen. Magazine (1810); Rose, New Biographical Dictionary, s. v.

King, Thomas Starr, a Unitarian minister, was born in New York Dec. 16, 1824. His father, Rev. T. F. King, was a Universalist clergyman of very decided ability, but died in the prime of life, and Thomas, at the age of twelve years, while fitting to enter Harvard College found himself the principal support of a large family. He managed, however, successfully to complete his studies, and in September, 1845, preached his first sermon in Woburn, Mass. The next year he was set tled over his father's former charge in Charlestown, whence he was called in 1846 to the Hollis Street Unit arian Church in Boston, where he met with great acceptance and a constantly increasing reputation till 1860, when he accepted the call of the Unitarian Church in San Francisco to become their pastor. He entered upon his new duties with a zeal and energy which won the heart of the people, and forward movements in be half of the sick and wounded soldiers. His labors in this cause, added to his pastoral duties, were too severe for his strength, and he died March 4, 1866, after a very brief illness. Mr. King published several discourses and addresses, etc.—Appleton, New American Cyclopaedia 1868, 196, 458.

King, William, (1), archbishop of Dublin, a learned divine and metaphysician, was born at Antrim, provin ce of Ulster, Ireland, May 1, 1650. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, entered the Church in 1674, and became chaplain to Parker, archbishop of Tuam. The latter being translated, the archbishopship was given to the same chaplain of St. Patrick and St. Marburgh, Dublin.
Ireland was then a prey to violent religious controversies, which served also as a cloak for political dissensions.
King wrote several pamphlets against Peter Manby, dean of Londonerry, who had embraced Romanism as a politician. In 1690 he was made dean of St. Patrick. The Revolution breaking out soon after, and James II having taken refuge in Ireland, King was twice sent to the Tower of Dublin as a partisan of the insurgents. He defended his opinions in a work titled The State of the Protestants of Ireland under the Jacobite Government (London, 1692, 8vo), which gave rise to a controversy between him and Charles Leslie, a partisan of the fallen mon arch. In 1691 King was made bishop of Derry, and applied himself with much zeal to the task of bringing back the people to the proper path, and in 1700 he finally became archbishop of Dublin in 1709, was ap tonated one of the lords justices of Ireland in 1717, and again in 1721 and 1723, and died at Dublin May 8, 1729.

He was through life held in high esteem as a man, and also as his character of a prelate and writer on theo logy. His principal work in that line is the De Originali Male (Dublin, 1702, 4to; London, 1702, 8vo). "The object of this work is to show how all the several kinds of evil with which the world abounds are consistent with the goodness of God, and may be accounted for without the supposition of an evil principle." It was attacked by Bayle and also by Leibnitz: by the former for the charges of Manicheism made against him, and by the latter because King had taken him to task for his optim ism. King, however, during his life made no reply, but he left among his papers notes of answers to their announcements; and these were given to the world after his death by Dr. Edmund Law, bishop of Carlisle, together with a translation of the treatise itself (Camb. 1758, 8vo).

In 1709 he published a sermon on Divine Predestina tion and Foreknowledge consistent with the Freedom of Man's Will (Dublin, 1709, 8vo), in which he endeavored to be advanced a doctrine concerning the moral attributes of God as being different from the moral qualities of the same name in man. This valuable and most important work was often reprinted (Exeter, 1815, 8vo; London, 1821, 8vo; and in the Tracts of Anglican Fathers, ii, 225).

He wrote also A Discourse concerning the Intentions of Men in the Worship of God (London, 1697, 8vo)—"An Admonition to the Dissenters* (London, 1706, 8vo)—
An Account of James I. and the Ad diant Subjects of Ireland, etc. (London, 1746, 8vo)—A Vio duction of the Rev. Dr. Henry Sacheverell, etc. [Anon.] (London, 1710, 8vo); etc. See Bibliographia Britannica Chalmers, General Biographical Dictionary; Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1790; Hook, Ecclesiastical Biography.

King, William, (2), a Scotch Presbyterian minis ter, was born in Tyrone, Ireland. He emigrated to America in 1830, and became pastor of a church at Nel son, Canada West. After laboring there faithfully and earnestly for many years he removed to Caradou, C.W., where he died, March 18, 1859.

Kingdom of God or of Heaven (βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἢ τῶν ἀνθρώπων). In the New Testament the phrases "kingdom of God" (Matt. vi, 35; Mark i, 14, 15; Luke iv, 43; vi, 20; John iii, 3, 5), "kingdom of Christ" (Matt. xvi, 19; Mark xvi, 21; Rev. xix, 3), and "kingdom of God and of Christ and of God" (Eph. v, 5), "kingdom of David," i.e. as the ancestor and type of the Messiah (Matt. xi, 10), "the kingdom" (Matt. viii, 12; xii, 33; ix, 58), and "kingdom of heaven" (Matt. iii, 2; iv, 17; xii, 31, 33, 44, 47; 2 Tim. iv, 18), are all synonymous, and sig ify the divine supremacy, the glorious reign of the Mes siah. The idea of this kingdom has its basis in the prophecies of the Old Testament, where the coming of the Messiah and his triumphs are foretold (Psa. ii, 6—12; ci, 1—7; Isa. ii, 1—4; Mic. iv, 1; Isa. xi, 1—10; Jer. xxii, 5, 6; xxxi, 4—5; xlvii, 24—28; Dan. ii, 34; iv, 14, 27; ix, 25, 27). In those passages the reign of the Mes siah is figuratively described as a golden age, when the true religion, and with it the Jewish theocracy, should be re-established in more than pristine purity, and uni versal peace and happiness prevailed. All this was doubt less to be understood in a spiritual sense; and so the devout Jews of our Saviour's time appear to have un derstood it, as Zacharias, Simeon, Anna, and Joseph (Luke i, 67—79; ii, 23—50; xxiii, 50—51). But the Jews at large gave to these prophecies a temporal meaning, and expected the Messiah who should reign as king of heaven, and, as king of the Jewish nation, restore the ancient religion and worship, reform the corrupt morals of the people, make expiation for their sins, free them from the yoke of foreign dominion, and at length reign over the whole earth in peace and justice (Isa. xi, 1—20; xli, 12; xvii, 1; xx, 1; Luke xvii, 20; xix, 11; Acts i, 6). This Jewish temporal sense appears to have been also held by the apostles before the day of Penteceot.

It has been well observed by Knobel, in his work On the Prophecies, that "Jesus did not acknowledge himself called upon to fulfill those theocratic announcements which had an earthly political character, in the sense in which they were uttered; for his plan was spiritual and universal, neither including worldly interests, nor contracted within national and political limits. He gave, accordingly, to all such announcements a higher and more general meaning, so as to realize them in accord ance with such a scheme. Thus, 1. The prophecies had announced that Jehovah would deliver his people from the political calamities into which, through the con quering might of his foes, they had been brought.
This Jesus could do by putting an end to his work.
He healed the Jewish and heathen world under the thraldom of error and of sin, in circumstances of moral calamity, and he regarded himself as sent to effect its deliverance. In this sense he announced himself as the Redeemer, who had come to destroy the works of the wicked, to cast out the devil, to annihilate the powers of evil, and to bring men from the kingdom of darkness to the kingdom of light.
2. The prophets had predicted that Jehovah would again be united to his restored people, would dwell among them, and no more give up the theocratic relation. This also Jesus fulfilled in a higher sense. He found mankind in a state of estrangement from God, arising from the sin of Adam, and he visited the earth as a savior to bring them back to God. He reconciled men to God—gave them access to God—united them to him as needful children, and made his people one with God as he himself is one.

3. The prophets had declared that Jehovah would make his people, thus redeemed and reunited to him, in a manner that would exceed all earthly pleasures. To communicate such blessings in the literal acceptance of the words was no part of the work of Jesus; on the contrary, he often tells his followers that they must lay their account with much suffering.

4. The kingdom of God, and all the glories of the spirit, which are two aspects of the same thing, are in the Bible, and in the teachings of Jesus, confused in general, and the re-establishment of their people into a mighty state, which should endure upon the earth in imperishable splendor as an outward community. This prophet Jesus, however, in his own meditational sense, would establish a religious invisible community, internally united by oneness of faith in God and of pure desire, which ever grows and reaches its perfection only in another life. The rise and progress of this man cannot observe, for its existence is in the invisible life of the spirit (Luke xvi, 20), yet the opposition of the wicked has an evidence of its approach (Matt. xii, 28).

5. It has no political designs, for it 'is not of this world;' and there are found in it no such gradations of rank as in earthly political communities (Matt. xx, 25). What is external is not essential to it; its prime element is mind, pious, devoted to God. This apocalyptic kingdom of Jesus is composed of those who turn to God and his ambassadors, and in faith and life abide true to them. From this it is clear how sometimes this kingdom may be spoken of as present, and sometimes as future. Religious and moral truth works forever, and draws under its influence one after another, until at length it shall reign over all. In designating this community, Jesus made use of terms having a relation to the ancient theocracy; it is the kingdom of God or of heaven, though, at the same time, it is represented rather as the family that is called out of all nations (Luke xii, 23). This apocalyptic kingdom is called Lord and King; that of the new is called Father; the members of the former were servants, i.e. subjects of Jehovah; those of the latter are sons of God; the feeling of the former towards God is described as the fear of Jehovah; that of the latter is believing confidence or love; the chief duty of the former was righteousness; the first duty of the latter is love. All these expressions are adapted to the constitution of the sacred community, either as a divine state or as a divine family. It need not, however, be mentioned that God extended the fulfillment of these ancient prophecies in this spiritual sense to all men.

4. Referring to the Old Testament idea, we may therefore regard the 'kingdom of heaven,' etc., in the New Testament, as designating, in its Christian sense, the Church, the kingdom of God, or the community, or the organization of those who receive Jesus as the Messiah, and who, united by his Spirit under him as their Head, rejoice in the truth, and live a holy life in love and in communion with him (Matt. iii, 2; iv, 17, 28; ix, 35; x, 7; Mark i, 14, 15; Luke x, 9, 11; xxii, 51; Acts xxvii, 81). This spiritual kingdom has, in fact, been invested with a kind of intern and spiritual, it already exists and rules in the hearts of all Christians, and is therefore present (Rom. xiv, 17; Matt. vi, 38; Mark x, 15; Luke xvii, 21; xiii, 17; John iii, 5; 1 Cor. iv, 20). It 'suffers violence,' implying the eagerness with which the Gospel was received in the agitated state of men's minds (Matt. xi, 12; Luke xvi, 6). As external, it is either embodied in the visible Church of Christ, and in so far is present and progressive (Matt. xvi, 18, 19; 2 Pet. i, 21; 3 John, 10; Acts xiii, 17; Heb. xii, 28), or it is perfected in the coming of the Messiah to judgment and his subsequent spiritual reign in bliss and glory, in which view it is future (Matt. xiii, 41; xvii, 26; Mark xiv, 25; Luke xxii, 29, 30; 2 Thess. i, 9, 10). The latter view it denotes especially the bliss of heaven, eternal life, which is to be enjoyed in the Redeemer's kingdom (Matt. viii, 11; xxi, 34; Mark ix, 47; Luke xiii, 18, 29; Acts xiv, 22; 2 Cor. vi, 9, 20; xvi, 50; Gal. v, 21; Eph. v, 5; 2 Thess. iv, 16; James i, 2). But these different aspects are not always distinguished, the expression often embracing both the internal and external sense, and referring both to its commencement in this world and its completion in the world to come (Matt. v, 10, 20; vii, 21; xi, 11, 12; xvii, 8, 4; Col. i, 18; 1 Thess. li, 12). In Luke i, 38, it is said of the kingdom of Christ 'there shall be no end;' whereas in 1 Cor. x, 24-25, it is said 'he shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father.' The contradiction is only in appearance. The latter passage refers to the mediatorial work of the Saviour; and when the mediatorial work of the Saviour is accomplished, and the final judgment, he will resign forever his mediatorial office, while the reign of Christ as God supreme will never cease. 'His throne,' in the empire of the universe, 'is forever and ever' (Heb. x, 8).

5. There is reason to believe not only that the expression 'kingdom of heaven,' as used in the New Testament, was employed as synonymous with 'kingdom of God, as referred to in the Old Testament, but that the former expression had become common among the Jews of our Lord's time for denoting the state of things expected to be brought in by the Messiah. The more the use of the expression as it first occurs in Matthew, uttered apparently by John Baptist, and our Lord himself, without a note of explanation, as if all perfectly understood what was meant by it, seems alone conclusive evidence of this. The Old Testament is, however, full of the language, and the idea, of the kingdom of heaven. What the Hebrew writings belonging to it, had familiarized the Jews with the application of the terms 'king' and 'kingdom' to God, not merely with reference to his universal sovereignty, but also to his special connection with the people he had chosen for himself (1 Sam. xii, 12; Psa. i, 6; v, 2; xx, 9; 1 Chron. ii, 42, 44; Jer. ii, 1; 9). The Messiah, however, where pointed expression required to be given to the difference in this respect between what is of earth and what is of heaven, we find matters ordered on a certain occasion with a view to bring out the special lesson that 'the heavens do rule' (iv, 20); and in the interpretation given to the vision, which had been granted to Nebuchadnezzar, it was said, with more special reference to New Testament times, that 'in the days of those (earthly) kings the God of heaven (lit. of the heavens) should set up a kingdom that should never be destroyed,' i.e. that the kingdom of God himself, this divine kingdom was represented under the image of 'one like a Son of man coming with the clouds of heaven, and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him' (viii, 13, 14). It appears to have been in consequence of the phraseology thus introduced and sanctioned by Daniel that the expression 'kingdom of heaven' (ם この鞋子 רפוכש, mylkut hashemayim) passed into common usage among the Jews, and was but another name with them for a state of fellowship with God and devotedness to his service. Many examples of the use of the term in the New Testament, and of many given over from Jewish writings: thus, 'He who confesses God to be one, and repeats Deut. vi, 4, takes up the kingdom of heaven;' "Jacob called his sons and commanded them concerning the ways of God, and they took upon them the kingdom of heaven; 'The sons of Achadzias did not take upon them the yoke of the kingdom of heaven; the land was not delivered to him, and he did not accept it as the Lord had given. There is not a kingdom of heaven,' etc. The expression, indeed, does not seem to have been used specifically with reference to the Messiah's coming, or the state to be introduced by him (for the examples produced by Schöttgen [in Mosaic, ch. ii.] are scarcely in point); but when the Lord directly represented all things spiritual as being spiritual, and everything, and visibly take the government, as it were, on his shoulder, it would be understood of itself that here the kingdom of heaven should be found concentrating itself, and that to join one's self to Messiah would be as necessary as to the Messiah of that kingdom.

See KINGLY OFFICE OF CHRIST.

The scriptural and popular usages of the term "kingdom of God," "kingdom of heaven," etc., serve as a clew to the otherwise rather abrupt proclamation of the Baptist and Jesus at the very beginning of their public ministrations. It is true that in the Old Testament the kingdom or reign of God usually signifies his infinite power, or, more properly, his sovereign authority over all creatures, kingdoms, and hearts. See KING. Thus Wisdom says (x, 10), God showed his kingdom to Jacob, i.e., he showed the kingdom of heaven, by showing him the mysterious ladder by which the angels ascended and descended; and Ecclesiasticus (xlvi, 18) says, God gave to David the covenant assurance, or promise of the kingdom, for himself and his successors. Still the transition from this to the conception of a spiritual sphere was so natural that it was silently and continually made, especially as Jehovah was perpetually represented as the supreme and sole legitimate sovereign of his people. Indeed, the theocracy was the central idea of the Jewish state (see JUDGES), and hence the first announcements of the kingdom sound with thrilling effect upon the ears of the people, proverbially impatient of foreign rule, and yet, at the time, apparently bound in a hopeless vassalage to Rome. It was to the populace like a trumpet-call to a war for independence, or rather like one of the old prelures of deliverance sung by Miriam and Deborah. See THEOCRACY.

Copious lists of monographs on this subject may be seen in Dürren, Wirttenbach, a. v. Himmel-Reich, Messiahs-Reich; Volbing, Index Programmatum, p. 37; Hase, Lehre Jesu, p. 12, 77. See MESSIAH.

KINGDOM OF JUDAH. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

Kingly Office of Christ, one of the three great relations which Jesus sustains to his people, namely, as prophet, priest, and king, and to which he was solemnly instituted as his baptism by John. See THRONE.

It is by virtue of this that he became head of the Church, which is the sphere of his reign. See KINGDOM OF GOD. This is that spiritual, evangelical, and eternal empire to which he himself referred when interrogated before Pontius Pilate, and in which he referred to which he said, "My kingdom is not of this world" (John xviii, 36, 37). His empire, indeed, extends to every creature, for "all authority is committed into his hands, both in heaven and on earth," and he is "head over all things to the Church:" but his kingdom primarily imports the Gospel Church, which is the object of his laws, the seat of his government, and the object of his care, and, being surrounded with powerful opponents, he is represented as waging in the midst of his enemies. This kingdom is set of a worldly origin or nature, nor has it this world for its end and object (Rom. xiv, 17; 1 Cor. iv, 20). It can neither be promoted nor defended by worldly power, influence, or carnal weapons, but by bearing witness unto the truth, or by the preaching of the Gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven (2 Cor. x, 4, 5). Its establishment among men is progressive, but it is already present in this world (Eph. iii, 16; Rev. xvi, 15).

In its real subjects are only those who are of the truth, and hear Christ's voice; for none can enter it but such as are born from above (John iii, 8-36; Matt. xvi, 13; xix, 14; Mark x, 18), nor can any be visibly subjects of it but those recognized by a credible profession of faith and obedience (Luke xvi, 16; Matt. xx, 28-44). Its privileges and immunities are not of this world, but such as are spiritual and heavenly; they are all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ Jesus (Eph. i, 8). Over this glorious kingdom death has no power; it extends as well to the future as to the present world; and though entered here by renewing grace (Col. i, 13), it is inherited in its perfection in the world of glory (Matt. xxv, 34; 1 Cor. xv, 50; 2 Pet. i, 11). Hypocrisies and false brethren may indeed insinuate themselves into it here, but they will have no possible place in it hereafter (Matt. xiii, 41, 47-50; xxii, 11-14; Luke xiv, 22, 29; 1 Cor. vi, 9, 10; Gal. v. 21; Rev. xvi, 27). It is a fundamental truth (Tholuck, Sermon on the Mount, i, 163). See CHRIST, OFFICE OF.

KINGS, First and Second Books of, the second of the series of Hebrew royal annals, the books of Samuel forming the introductory series, and the books of Chronicles being a parallel series. In the Hebrew Bible the first two series alone form part of "the Former Prophets," like Joshua, Judges, and Ruth. See BIBLE. In the Authorized English Version it is added to their titles: "commonwealths and the kingdom of the fourth (or) Book of the Kings." See SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.

I. Number and Title.—The two books of Kings formed anciently but one book in the Jewish Scriptures, as is affirmed by Origen (apud Euseb. Prop. Evang, vi, 23, Βασιλεύων τριών, τετράβιον, ἐν ἑνὶ Θεομάθει διὰ πτώσεως), Jerome (Prolog, Gal.), Josephus (Cont. Apion, i, 8), and others. The present division of the two books into one (Second Kings) in the Greek and Latin versions, has been common in the Hebrew Bibles since the Venetian editions of Bomberg.

The old Jewish name was borrowed, as usual, from the commencing words of the book (" μεγάλοι βασιλεῖς"); Græcized as in the above quotation from Eusebius. The Septuagint and Vulgate now number them as the third and fourth books of Kings, reckoning the two books of Samuel the first and second. Their present title, μεγάλοι Βασιλείων, Regum, in the opinion of Havernick, has respect more to the formal than essential character of the composition (Eisleitungen, § 168); yet under such forms of government as those of Judah and Israel the royal person and name are intimately associated with all national acts and moments, legal decisions, popular surgeries, domestic legislation, and foreign policy. The reign of an Oriental prince is identified with the history of his nation during the period of his sovereignty. More especially in the theocratic constitution of the Jewish realm the character of the monarch was an important element of national history, and, of necessity, it had considerable influence on the fate and fortunes of the people.

II. Independent Form.—The question has been raised and minutely discussed whether the books of Kings (1 and 2) constitute an entire work of themselves, or whether they originally formed part of a larger historical work embracing the historical parts of the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, out of which several books, as we now have them, have been formed. Ewald regards the books of Judges (with Ruth), 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings, as forming parts of one whole work, which had been reduced to the present great book of the Kings. The grounds on which this supposition has been built are partly the following:

(1) These books together contain one unbroken narrative, in form and matter, each portion being connected with the preceding by the conjunctive ἢ or the continuative οὖν. The book of Judges shows itself to be a separate work from Joshua by opening with a narrative of events in which that book ends (Josh. xix, 1 ff.), which proceeds through the times of the Judges, and goes on to give, in Ruth, the family history and genealogy of David, and in Samuel and Kings the events which transpired down to the captivity.

(2.) The recurrence in Judges of the phrases, "And in those days there was no king in Israel" (xvii, 6; xviii, 1; xxi, 25); "It came to pass in those days when there was no king" (xix, 1); and in Ruth (i, 1), "Now it came to pass in the days when the judges judged," shows that this portion of the work was written in the times when there were kings in Israel. The writer therefore was in a position to pass under review the whole period of the times of the judges, and we find that he estimates the conduct of the people according to the degree of their conformity to the law of the Lord, after the manner of the writer of the Kings (Judg. ii, 11-19; 2 Kings xvii, 7-23).

Again, in Judg. i, 21, it is said that the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day; and in 2 Sam. xxiv, 16, mention is made of Azurannah the Jebusite as an inhabitant of Jerusalem, from which it is inferred that the writer intended these facts to explain each other. (But see Josh. xv, 68.) So there is a reference in Judges xx, 27 to the removal of the ark of the covenant from Shiloh to Jerusalem; and there is another reference in those days" points as in xvi, 6, etc., to remote times. There is thought to be a reference in Judges xviii, 30 to the captivity of Israel in the days of Hoshea, in which case that book must have been written subsequently to that time, as well as the books of Kings.

(3.) The books of Kings take up the narrative where 2 Samuel breaks off, and proceed to narrate the history of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah; and so it is natural that these books should be written after the former, in order to build up a continuous and comprehensive account of the events of the Hebrews since the time of Joshua. The authors of these books were also the contemporaries of the events they describe, which makes it more likely that the events were written down at the time of their occurrence. The books of Kings are the only books of the Bible that are not anonymous, and the names of the authors are known to be Samuel and Kings.

(4.) The books of Kings exist as the works of the writers, and are as such together forming an entire and independent work, such as the variety of style and language, both vocabulary and grammar, which pervades the two books, but distinguishes them from others—the uniform system of quotation observed in them, but not in the books which precede them—the same careful attention to chronology of certain phrases and forms of speech peculiar to them. A great variety of events occur in Kings, which are found in them only; such are chiefly names of materials and utensils, and architectural terms. Words, and unusual forms of words, occur, which are only found here and in writers of the same period, as Isaiah and Jeremiah, but not in Samuel or Judges. See § v. below.

III. Contents, Character, and Design.—The books of Kings contain the brief annals of a long period, from the accession of Solomon till the dissolution of the commonwealth. The first chapters describe the reign of Solomon over the united kingdom, and the revolt under Rehoboam. The history of the rival states is next narrated in parallel sections till the period of Israel's downfall on the invasion of Shalman. Then the remaining years of the principality of Judah are recorded till the fall of Jehoiachin, and the establishment of the Babylonian captivity. See Israel; Je,

For an adjustment of the years of the respective reigns in each line, see Chronology.

There are some peculiarities in this succinct history worthy of attention. It is summary, but very suggestive, narrative, and at times, especially in the chronological part, more record of political occurrences, nor yet an ecclesiastical register. King, Church, and State are all comprised in their sacred relations. It is a theocratic history, a retrospective survey of the kingdom as existing under a theocratic government. The character of the sovereign is tested by his fidelity to the religious obligations of his office, and this decision in reference to his conduct is generally added to the notice of his accession. The new king's religious character is generally portrayed by its similarity or opposition to the way of David, his father, or of Jehoahaz, son of Nebat, "who made Israel to sin." Ecclesiastical affairs are noticed with a similar purpose, and in contrast with past or prevalent apostasy, especially as manifested in the popular superstitions, whose shrines were on the "high places." Political or national incidents are introduced in general for the sake of illustrating the influence of religion on civic prosperity; of showing how the theocracy maintained a vigilant and vengeful guardianship over its rights and privileges—adherence to its principles securing peace and plenty, disobedience to them bringing along with it its awful wrath. Thus from the moral and religious standpoints, a verification of the Mosaic warnings, and the author of them has kept this steadily in view. He has given a brief history of his people, arranged under the various political chiefs in such a manner as to show that the government was essentially theocratic that its spirit, as developed in the Mosaic writings, was never extinct, however modified or inactive it might sometimes appear. Thus the books of Kings appear in a religious costume, quite different from the form they would have assumed either as a political or ecclesiastical narrative. In the one case legislative enactments, royal edicts, popular movements, would have occupied a prominent place; in the other, sacerdotal arrangements, Levitical service, music, and pageantry, would have filled the leading sections of the treatise. In either view the points added would have had a distinctive reference to the palace or the temple, the sovereign or the pontiff, the church or a priesthood, the throne or the altar, the tribute or tithes, the nation on its farms, or the tribes in the courts of the sacred edifice. But the theocracy confined both the political and religious elements, and the inspired annal-ist united them as essential to his design. The agency of divinity is constantly recognized, the hand of Jehovah is continually acknowledged. The chief organ of theocratic influence enjoys peculiar prominence. We position and succession of kings (1 Kings xxii, 33; iv, 5, 29, 80: 2 Kings xi, 17, etc.). Compare, on the whole of this view, Havernick, Einleitung, § 165; Jahn, Introduct., § 46; Gesenius, and Dr. Gesenius, loc. cit., It is thus apparent that the object of the author of the Books of Kings was to describe the history of the kingdoms, especially in connection with the theocratic element. This design accounts for what De Wette (Einleitung, § 185) terms the mythical character of these books.

As to what has been said of the anti-Israelitic spirit of the work (Bertholdt, Einleitung, p. 949), we do not perceive it. Truth required that the kingdom of Israel should be described in its real character. Idol-worship was connected with it; monachism was a state practice; fidelity obliged the annals to state that all its kings patronized the institution of the Temple and the Tabernacle. It was the same with all the kingdoms of antiquity, and the best historians have described them.

IV. Relation of Kings to Chronicles.—The more obvious differences between the Books of Kings and of Chronicles are (1) in the respect of language, by which the former are shown to be of earlier date than the latter.

(2) Of periods embraced in each work. The Chronicles are much more comprehensive than Kings, containing genealogical lists from Adam downwards, and a full account of the reign of David. The portions of the Chronicles synchronistic with Kings are 1 Chron. xxviii—2 Chron. xxxiv.

(3) In the Kings, greater prominence is given to the prophetical office; in Chronicles, to the priestly or Levitical. In the Books of the Kings we have the active influence of Nathan in regard to the succession to the throne; and the remarkable lives of Elijah and Elisha, of whom numerous extraordinary miracles are related, of which scarcely the slightest mention is made in Chronicles, although in Kings about fourteen chapters are taken up with them. Besides these, other prophets are mentioned, and their acts and sayings are recorded; as, 1 Kings xiii, the prophet who came to Bethel from Judah in the reign of Jeroboam, and his predictions; and in 2 Kings xxii, the fulfilment of them in the days of Josiah; 1 Kings xiii, the old prophet who lived at Bethel with his son. Ahijah the prophet, also, in the days of Jeroboam, 1 Kings xiv; Jehu, the son of Hanani, 1 Kings xv; Jehu, in the time of Jeroboam, 2 Kings xiv; and Isaiah, in relation to the sickness of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xx. Of these there is either no mention, or much slighter in Chronicles, where the priestly or Levitical element is more observable; as, for example, the full account, in 2 Chron. xxix—xxxi, of the purification of the Temple by Hezekiah; of the sacrifices and feasts, and of the names of the Levites, who took part in it, and the restoration of the courses and orders of the priesthood, and the supplies for the daily, weekly, and yearly sacrifices; also, the circumstantial account of the Passover observed by command of Josiah, 2 Chron. xxx, 1—11. In this way we may account not only for the omission of much that relates to the prophets, but also for the less remarkable prominence given to the history of Israel, and the greater to Judah and Jerusalem; and for the frequent omission of details respecting the idolatrous practices of some of the kings, as, for example, the worship of Bethel and the shrine of Bethel, and the destruction of idolatry by Josiah, showing that the books of Chronicles were written in times in which the people less needed to be warned against idolatry; to which, after the captivity, they had ceased to be so prone as before.

For further information on the relation between Kings and Chronicles, see CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF.

V. Peculiarities of Diction.—1. The words noticed by De Wette (Einleitung, § 185) as indicating their modern date are the following: מַעַבֵּר for מֵאֵבוּר, 1 Kings xiv, 2. (But...

only in Kings, Chronicles, Jeremiah, and Ezra. To these may be added the architectural terms in 1 Kings vi, vii, and the names of foreign idols in 2 Kings xvii. The general character of the language is most distinctly that of the time before the Babylonian captivity.

VI. Variations in the Septuagint.—These are very remarkable, and consist of transpositions, omissions, and some considerable additions, of all which Thesiuss gives some useful notices in his Introduction to the book of Kings.

1. The most important transpositions are the history of Shime's death, 1 Kings ii, 86-46, which in the Sept. (Cod. Vat.) comes after iii, 1, and divers scraps from ch. iv, v, and ix, accompanied by one or two remarks of the translator. In 1 Kings iv, 4i, 23, and v, 1, are strangely added and precede 1 Kings iii, 2-26, but many of them are repeated again in their proper places. The sections 1 Kings iii, 1, ix, 16, 17, are strangely together, and placed between iv, 3 and v, 1. The section 1 Kings vii, 1-12, is placed after viii, 21. Section viii, 12, 18, is placed after 55. Section ix, 15-22 is placed after x, 22. Section xi, 43, xii, 2, 3, is much transposed and confused in Sept. xi, 43, 44, xii, 1-3. Section xiv, 1-21, is placed in the midst of the long addition to Chron. xii mentioned below. Section xxii, 42-50, is placed after xli, 22. Chapter xx and xxxvi are transposed. Section 2 Kings iii, 1-3, is placed after 2 Kings xix, 18.

2. The omissions are few. Section 1 Kings vi, 11-14, is entirely omitted, and 87, 88 are only slightly added at the opening of chap. iii. The erroneous clause 1 Kings iv, 6, is omitted; and so are the dates of Ass. in reigns in xvi, 8 and 16; and there are a few verbal omissions of no consequence.

3. The chief interest lies in the additions, of which the principal are the following. The supposed mention of a fountain as among Solomon's works in the Temple in the passage after 1 Kings ii, 85; of a paved causeway on 1 Kings iii, 44; of the dedication of the sun at the dedication of the Temple, before he uttered the prayer, "The Lord said he would dwell in the thick darkness," etc., viii, 12, 13 (after 53, Sept.), with a reference to the βίβλος τῆς φύσεως, a passage on which Thesiuss relies as proving that the Alexandrian had access to original documents now lost; the information that "the Lord's brother" passed with Tilibi, xvi, 22, an additional date in the twenty-fourth year of Jeroboam, xv, 8; numerous verbal additions, as xi, 29, xvii, 1, etc.; and, lastly, the long passage concerning Jeroboam, which is inserted between 1 Kings xi, 25 and 16. There are also many glosses of the translator, explanatory, or necessary in consequence of transpositions, as 1 Kings iii, 35, viii, 1, xii, 43, xvii, 20, xix, 2, etc. Of the above, from the recapitulatory character of the passage after 1 Kings xi, 46, containing in brief the sum of the things detailed in vii, 21-23, it seems far more probable that ΚΡΙΤΗΝ ΤΗΣ ΑΥΤΗΣ is only a corruption of ΚΡΙΤΗΝ ΤΟΥ ΑΑΛΑΜ, there mentioned. The obscure passage about Lebanon after iii, 46 seems no less certainly to represent what in the Heb. is ix, 18, 19, as appears by the triple concurrence of Tadmor, Lebanon, and ἐρεωτυρα, representing לְמָעָרָים. The strange mention of the son seems to be introduced by the translator to give significance to Solomon's mention of the house which he had built for God, who had said he would dwell in the thick darkness: not therefore under the unclouded light of the sun; and the reference to "the book of nature," to show that he could point out that the passage to which Solomon referred was Ps. xxvii, 2. Of the other additions, the mention of Tilibi's brother Joram is the one which has most the semblance of an historical fact, or makes the existence of any character of history probable. See, too, 1 Kings xx, 19; 2 Kings xv, 26.

There remains only the long passage about Jeroboam. That this account is only an apocryphal version, made up of the existing materials in the Hebrew Scriptures, after the manner of 1 Esdras, Bel and the Dragon, the apocryphal Esther, the Targums, etc., may be inferred on the following grounds. The framework of the story is given in the very words of the Hebrew narrative, and the fidelity of the new narratives is such that very careful students have noticed in here and there. Demonstrably, therefore, the Hebrew account existed when the Greek one was framed, and was the original one. The principal new facts introduced, the marriage of Jeroboam to the sister of Shishak's wife, and his request to be permitted to return, is a manifest imitation of the story of Hadad, 2 Kings x, 1-10, and the new narratives are simply an expansion of this. The story of the prophecy of Shimei (2 Kings ii, 2 of his having told Jeroboam he should be king), and the king's anxiety about the recovery of his son and heir. The embellishments of the story, Jeroboam's chariots, the amplification of Athiaah's address to Aro, the request asked of Pharaoh, the new garment not worked in water, are precisely such as an embellisher would add, as we may see by the apocryphal books above cited. Then the fusing down the three Hebrew names, פִּינְפִּין, פִּינְפִּין, and פִּינְפִּין, into one, שָׁם, thus giving the same name to the mother of Jeroboam, and to the city where she dwelt, shows how comparatively modern the story is, and how constantly it has grown. A parallel indication is its surrounding the Shemaiah of 1 Kings xii, 22 with Shemaiah the Nehelamite of Jer. xxix, 24, 25, and putting Athiaah's prophecy into his mouth; for, beyond all question, Βαλαμί (1 Kings xii) is only another form of Βαλαμί (Jer. xxvii, 2), against, again, the story is only working contradiction; for, if Jeroboam's child Athiaah was not born till a year or so after Solomon's death, how could "any good thing toward the Lord God of Israel" have been found in him before Jeroboam became king? The one thing in the story that is more like truth than the Hebrew narrative is the age given to Rechabom, sixteen years, which may have been preserved in the MS. which the writer of this romance had before him. The calling Jeroboam's mother γυνή τοῦ Ραμιαδα instead of γυνή χίρα was probably accidental.

On the whole, then, it appears that the great variations in the Sept. contribute little or nothing to the elucidation of the history contained in these books, nor much even to the text. The Hebrew text and arrangement is not in the least shaken in its main points, nor is there the slightest cloud cast on the accuracy of the history, or the truthfulness of the prophetic elements in it. But these variations illustrate a characteristic tendency of the Jewish mind to make interesting portions of the Scriptures the groundwork of separate religious tales, which they altered or added to according to their fancy, without any regard to history or chronology, and in which they exercised a peculiar kind of ingenuity in working up the Scripture materials, or in inventing circumstances calculated, as they thought, to make the main history more probable. The story of Zerubbabel's answer in 1 Esdras about truth, to prepare the way for his mission by Darius; of the discovery of the imposture of Bel's priests by Daniel, in Bel and the Dragon; of Mordecai's dream in the apocryphal Esther, and the paragraph in the Talmud inserted to connect 1 Kings xvi, 54 with xvii, 1 (Smith's Suer. Amm. ii, 421), are instances of this. The reign of Solomon, and the remarkable prosperity which he enjoyed, were not unlike to explain this propensity of the Hellenistic Jews. It is to the existence of such works that the variations in the Sept. account of Solomon and Jeroboam may most probably be attributed. unto this day" (1 Kings viii, 8) does not accord with the account of the destruction of the Temple (2 Kings xxi, 12). The prophecies of the Lord left (1 Kings xviii, 22; xix, 10) has an appearance of disagreement with xx, 18, 35, etc., though xviii, 4, xix, 18 supply, it is true, a ready answer. In 1 Kings xxi, 13 only Nabinoth is mentioned, while in 2 Kings ix, 40, the terms are added. The prediction in 1 Kings xvi, 15-17 has no perfect fulfillment in the following chapters. 1 Kings xxii, 8 does not seem to be a fulfillment of xvi, 19. The declaration in 1 Kings ix, 22 does not seem in harmony with xi, 25. There are also some singular repetitions, as 1 Kings xiv, 21 compared with xxvi, 3, 19; xv, 1 compared with xii, 1, 19, with xiii, 12, 13. But it is enough just to have pointed these out, as no real difficulty can be found in them.

As regards the sources of information, it may truly be said that in the books of Kings we have the narrative of contemporary writers throughout. It has already been observed (see Chronicles) that there was a regular series of state annals both for the kingdom of Judah and for that of Israel, which embraced the whole time comprehended in the books of Kings, or at least to the end of the reign of Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv, 5). The annals are clearly cited by the Chronicler, as in the Book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kings xi, 41); and, after Solomon, "the Book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah, or Israel" (e.g. 1 Kings xiv, 29; xv, 7; xvi, 5, 14, 20; 2 Kings x, 34; xxiv, 5, etc.) and it is manifest that the latter had been both before him while he drew up his history, in which the reigns of the two kingdoms are harmonized, and these annals constantly appealed to. (Similar phraseology is used in Esther x, 2, vi, 1, to denote the official annals of the Persian empire. Public documents are spoken of in the same way in Neh, xii, 25). But, in addition to these national annals, there were also extant, at the time that the books of Kings were compiled, separate works of the several prophets who had lived in Judah and Israel, and which probably bore the same relation to the annals as the historical parts of Isaiah and Jeremiah bear to those portions of the annals preserved in the books of Kings, i.e. were, in some instances at least, fuller and more copious accounts of the current events, by the same hands which drew up the more concise narrative of the annals, though in others perhaps mere duplicates. Thus the acts of Uzziah, written very likely by his son, are of great value for substance with the history of his reign in the national chronicles; and part of the history of Hezekiah we know was identical in the chronicles and in the prophet. The chapter in Jeremiah relating to the destruction of the Temple (ch. lii) is identical with that in 2 Kings xxvii, xxviii, where it is said there were some that cast it to the ground, but that a chapter in the prophecies of Daniel was used for the national chronicles, and appears as Ezri i. (Comp. also 2 Kings xvii, 1; Isa. vii, 2; 2 Kings xvii, 18, 8, xxiv, 28-32). As an instance of verbal agreement, coupled with greater fulness in the prophetical account, see 2 Kings xx compared with Isa. xxxvii, vii, in which latter alone is Hezekiah's writing given.

These other works, then, as far as the memory of has been preserved to us, were as follows (see Keil's Apology, 1st c.): For the time of David, the book of Samuel, the book of Nathan the prophet, the book of Gad the seer (2 Sam. xxvi-xxvii with 1 Kings i, being probably extracted from Nathan's book), which seem to have been collected—at least that portion of them relating to David—into one work called "the Acts of David the king" (1 Chron. xxi, 29). For the time of Solomon, "the Book of the Books of Solomon" (1 Kings xi, 41), consisting probably of parts of the "Book of Nathan the prophet, the prophecy of Ahijah the Shiloite, and the visions of Iddo the seer" (2 Chron. xix, 29). For the time of Rehoboam, "the words of Shemaiah the prophet, and of Iddo the seer, who conveyed concerning the genealogies" (2 Chron. xii, 15). For the time of Abijah, "the story (ፋኔ) of the prophet Iddo" (2 Chron. xiii, 22). For the time of Jehoshaphat, "the words of Jehu, the son of Hanani" (2 Chron. xx, 9-16). For the time of Uzziah, "the writings of Isaiah the prophet, and of the time of Hezekiah, "the vision of Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amos" (2 Chron. xxxiii, 23). For the time of Manasseh, a book called "the sayings of the seers," as the A.V., following the Sept.-Vulg., Kimchi, etc., rightly renders it, may be added; in another passage (26) (2 Chron. xxxiii, 19), though others, following these last servilely, make Chozar a proper name, because of the absence of the article. For the time of Jeroboam II, a prophecy of "Jehovah, the son of Amittai the prophet, of the tribe of Issachar," is cited (2 Kings xiv, 25); and it seems less likely that we should read there xvi, 1-16 (2 Chron. xxxiii, 19), though others, following these last servilely, make Chozar a proper name, because of the absence of the article. Of the latter Gehazi might well have been the author, to judge from 2 Kings vii, 4, and as itself might have been of the kingdom. In one, too, the prophecies of Azariah, the son of Oded, in Ahab's reign (2 Chron. xiv, 1), and of Hanami (2 Chron. xvi, 7) (unless this latter is the same as Jeph, son of Hanani, as Oded is put for Azariah in xv, 8), and Micah the son of Imlai, in Ahab's reign, and Eliezer, the son of Dodavah, in Jehoshaphat's reign (e.g. 2 Kings xiv, 23, xxii, 20), 2 Kings xvi, 11, 15, 16, with xiii, 12, 13. But it is enough just to have pointed these out, as no real difficulty can be found in them.

With regard to the work so often cited in the Chronicles as "the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah" (1 Chron. i, 1; 2 Chron. xvi, 11, xxvi, 7; xxvii, 26; xxxii, 32; xxxvi, 27; xxxvi, 8), it has been thought by some that it was a separate collection containing the joint histories of the two kingdoms; by others, that it is our book, the Kings, which answer to this description; but by Eichhorn, that it is the same as the Chronicles of the kings of Judah so constantly cited in the books of Kings; and this last opinion seems to be the best founded. For in 2 Chron. xvi, 11, the same book is called "the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel," which in the parallel passage, 1 Kings xx, 22, is called "the Book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah." So again, 2 Chron. xxvii, 7, comp with 2 Kings xx, 86; 2 Chron. xxxviii, 26, comp with 2 Kings xvi, 19; 2 Chron. xxxii, 82, comp with 2 Kings xx, 20; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 27, with 2 Kings xxv, 29; 2 Chron. xxxv, 1; 2 Kings xxiv, 5. Moreover, the book so quoted refers exclusively to the affairs of Judah; and even in the one passage where reference is made to it as "the Book of the Kings of Israel" (2 Chron. xx, 94), it is for the reign of Jehoshaphat that it is cited. Obviously, therefore, it is the same book as the Chronicles of Israel and Judah, and of Judah and Israel. Nor is this an unreasonable title to give to these chronicles. Saul, David, Solomon, and in some sense Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx, 1, 5, 6), and all his successors, were kings of Israel as well as of Judah; and therefore it is very conceivable that in Ezra's time the chronicles of Judah should have acquired the name of the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah. Even with regard to a portion of Israel in the days of Rehoboam, the chronicler remarks, apparently as a matter of gratulation, that "Rehoboam reigned over them" (2 Chron. x, 17); he notices Abijah's authority in Judah (2 Chron. ii, 1), but makes mention of the whole of Israel (2 Chron. xx, 18, 19; xv, 8, 9); he does not frequently speak of Israel, when the kingdom of Judah is the matter in hand (2 Chron. xii, 11, xxii, 1, 4; xiii, 2, etc.), and even calls Jehovah's "king of Israel" (2 Chron. xxi, 2), and distinguishes "Israel and Judah" from "Judah and Manasseh" (xix, 11); he notices Hezekiah's authority from Dan to Beer-sheba (2 Chron. xxx, 5), and Josiah's destruction of idols throughout all the land of Israel (xxxiv, 6-9), and his Passover for all Israel (xxxv, 17, 18), and seems to parade the title "king of Israel" in connection with David and Solomon (xxxv, 4, 4), and the relation of the Levites to "all Israel" (ver. 5); and therefore it is only in accordance with the feeling displayed in such passages that the expression, "the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah," should be given to the chronicles of the Jewish kingdom. The use of this term in speaking of the "kings of Israel and Judah who were carried away to Babylon for their transgression" (1 Chron. ix, 1) would be conclusive if the construction of the sentence were certain. But though it is absurd to separate the words "Israel" and "Judah" from Israel, as Bertheau does (Kurzgez. Exeg. Handb.), following the Masoretic punctuation, he interprets "the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah" cited in at least six other places in Chronicles, still it is possible that Israel and Judah might be the antecedent to the pronoun understood before בִּלְבָּבָה. It seems, however, much more likely that the antecedent to יָדִי אֶל is יָדִי אֶל בָּבָל. The whole, therefore, there is no evidence of the existence in the time of the chronicler of a history, since lost, of the two kingdoms, as distinguished from the books of Kings; the words as used by the chronicler, seeing he often refers to it for "the rest of the acts" of Kings, when he has already given all that is contained in our books of Kings. He refers, therefore, to the chronicles of Judah. From the above authentic sources, then, was compiled the history in the books under consideration. Judging from the facts that we have in 2 Kings xvii, xix, xx, the history of Hezekiah in the very words of Isaiah, xxxvi-xxxix; that, as stated above, we have several passages from Jeremiah in duplicate in 2 Kings, and the whole of Jer. ii in 2 Kings xxv, 18, etc., xxvii; that so large a case of the books of Kings is repeated in the books of Chronicles, though the writer of Chronicles had the original Chronicles also before him, as well as from the whole internal character of the narrative, and even some of the blemishes referred to under the second head—we may conclude with certainty that we have in the books of Kings, not only in the main the history faithfully preserved to us from the ancient chroniclers, but most frequently whole passages transferred verbatim into them. Occasionally, no doubt, we have the compiler's own comments, or reflections thrown in, as at 2 Kings xiv, 4; xvi, 18, 19; xxiv, 7-41, etc. We connect the insertion of the prophecy in 1 Kings xiii with the fact that the compiler himself was an eye-witness of the fulfilment of it, and can even see how the words ascribed to the prophet are of the age of the compiler. We can perhaps see his hand in the frequent repetition, on the review of each reign, of the remark, "The high places were not taken away; the people still sacrificed and burned incense on the high places" (1 Kings xxii, 43; 2 Kings xiii, 3; xiv, 4; xv, 4, 5; comp. 1 Kings iii, 3), and in the repeated observations that such and such things, which the ark was borne, the revolt of the ten tribes, the rebellion of Edom, etc., continue "unto this day," though it may be perhaps doubted in some cases whether these words were not in the old chronicle (2 Chron. v, 9). See 1 Kings vii, 8; ix, 18; xii, 1, 21; xii, 18; xvi, 20; 2 Kings ii, 22; viii, 22; x, 27; xii, 28; xiv, 7; xvi, 6; xvii, 34, 41; xxiii, 25. It is remarkable, however, that in no instance does the use of this phrase lead us to suppose that it was penned after the destruction of the Temple; in several of the above instances the phrase necessarily supposes that the temple and the kingdom of Judah were still standing. If the phrase, then, is the compiler's, it proves him to have written before the Babylonian captivity; if it was a part of the chronicle he was quoting, it shows how exactly he transferred its contents to his own pages.

IX. Author and Date.

The authorship and age of this historical treatise may admit of several suppositions. Whatever were the original sources, the books are evidently the composition of one writer. The style is generally uniform throughout (Dr. Davidson, in Horne's Introd., new edit., ii, 668 sq.). The same forms of expression are used (to denote the same, e.g., the male sex (1 Kings xiv, 10, etc.); the death of a king (1 Kings xi, 45, etc.); modes of allusion to the law (1 Kings xi, 18); fidelity to Jehovah (1 Kings viii, 68, etc.; see De Wette, Einl. § 184, a; Hävernick, Einl. § 171). Similar idioms are ever recurring, so as to produce a uniformity of style (Dr. Hävernick, Einl. § 171). See § ii, above.

1. With regard to the time when the author lived and wrote there are the following arguments:

(1) The style and diction indicate the later age of the Hebrew language, but not the latest. Attempts to prove a more modern date than the middle of the captivity have completely failed. Nearly all the words which De Wette and others have selected (see § v, above) are shown to have been in use, either by the prophets who flourished before the captivity and at its commencement, or by still earlier writers; but words and phrases abound which were in common use by the writers of the conclusion of the fourth century B.C., who would not go into captivity, especially by Isaiah and Jeremiah. In this respect there is a manifest difference between Kings and Chronicles. Though neither work is free from Chaldee forms, they are rare in Kings, but numerous in Chronicles. Their occurrence at all in Kings is sufficiently accounted for from the contiguity of Judah to Syria, and from the frequent intercourse with Assyria which commerce and war involved.

(2) With the evidence which the language affords, the internal evidence of the contents agrees. The history is carried down to the captivity in detail; and, by way of supplement, to the reign of Evil-merodach, king of Babylon. The closing verse implies that the writer survived Jehoachin, but gives no hint whatever of the termination of the captivity, which he surely would have done had he written after the return from Babylon. We may therefore safely conclude that the work was composed before the end of the captivity, but after the twenty-sixth year of its continuance.

2. Calmet ascribes the authorship to Ezra; but there are no decided indications of his authorship, and the names Zid and Bul (1 Kings vi, 1, 87, 88) were not in use after the captivity. The general opinion, however, that Jeremiah was the author is adopted by Grotius, Carpzov, and others, and is lately reindicated by Hävernick, as well as by Graf (De libror, Sam. et Regum compositione, p. 61 sq.), but is opposed by Keil, Davidson, and others. In favor of it are the following strong arguments:

(1) The work is attributed to Jeremiah by ancient tradition. There is a reference to Jeremiah as the author in the Talmud (Baba Bathra, fol. 15, 1), and with this comment the common opinion of the Jews.

(2) The style and language of Kings resemble those of the acknowledged writings of Jeremiah. In both works there is an unusual number of וָאַלֶּבֶנ לַמָּוֶשׁ; and also of words peculiar to each work, though used more than once. What is still more to the purpose, there are words and forms of words used in both works, but in them only; as, פַּלּוֹפָּה, a "cruse" (1 Kings xiv, vii, 4-5).
captive who followed Nebuzar-adan as far as Ramah, and was very kindly treated by him. The careful enumeration of the pillars and of the sacred vessels of the Temple which were plundered by the Chaldeans tallies exactly with the prediction of Jeremiah concerning them. (SeeJer.xvii. 12.) The paragraph begins with the point of Gedaliah, as governor of the remnant, and his murder by Ishmael, and the flight of the Jews into Egypt, is merely an abridged account of what Jeremiah tells us more fully (xl-xiii., 7), and are events in which personally he was deeply concerned. The writer in Kings has nothing more to tell than concerning the Jews or Chaldees in the land of Judah, which exactly agrees with the hypothesis that he is Jeremiah, who we know was carried down to Egypt with the fugitives. In fact, the date of the writing and the position of the writer seem actually marked by the time and event that were active at v. 26, as in the case of the Acts of the Apostles. It may be added, though the argument is less weighty, that the annexation of this chapter to the writings of Jeremiah so as to form Jer. iii (with the additional clause contained in vs. 26-30) is an evidence of a very ancient, if not a contemporary belief, that Jeremiah was the author of it. Again, the special mention of Seraijah the high-priest, and Zephaniah the second priest, as slain by Nebuzar-adan (v. 18), together with three other priests, is very significant when taken in connection with Jer. xxi. 1, xxii. 25-29, passing on to Lev. xxvi. 31; that Zedekiah was longed to the faction which opposed the prophet, a faction which was headed by priests and false prophets (Jer. xxvi. 7, 8, 11, 16). Going back to the xxivth chapter, we find in verse 14 an enumeration of the captives taken with Jehoiachin identical with that in Jer. xxvi., 1, in verse 18 a reference to the vessels of the Temple precisely similar to that in Jer. xxvii., 18-20, xxviii., 8, 6, and in verse 8, 4, a reference to the idolatries and bloodshed of Manasseh very similar to those in Jer. ii., 34, xiv., 4-8, etc., a reference which also connects chap. xxvii. with xxvi., 6, 18-10. In verse 2 the enumeration of the hostile nations, and the reference to the prophets of God, point directly to Jer. xxv., 9, 20, 21, and the reference to Pharaoh-necho in verse 7 points to verse 19, and to xiv., 1-12. Brief as the narrative is, it brings out all the chief points in the political events of the time which we know were much in Jeremiah's mind; and yet, which is exceedingly remarkable, Jeremiah is never once named (as he is in 2 Chron. xxxvi., 12, 21), although the manner of the writer is frequently to connect the sufferings of Judah with their sins and their neglect of the Word of God (2 Kings xxvi., 18 sq. ; xxiv., 15-19; xxv., 1 sq.). This leads to an inconclusive evidence between that portion of the history which belongs to Jeremiah's times and the writings of Jeremiah himself. De Wette speaks of the superficial character of the history of Jeremiah's times as hostile to the theory of Jeremiah's authorship. Now, considering the nature of these annals, and their consciousness, this critic seems very unfounded as regards the reigns of Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. It must, however, be acknowledged that, as regards Jehoiakim's reign, and especially the latter part of it, and the way in which it was closed by his death, the more meagre than one would have expected from a contemporary writer living on the spot. But exactly the same paucity of information is found in those otherwise copious notices of contemporary events with which Jeremiah's prophecies are interspersed, e. g. Townsend's Arrangement or Geneste's Parallel Histories, and he will see at a glance how remarkably little light Jeremiah's narrative or prophecies throw upon the latter part of Jehoiakim's reign. The cause of this silence may be difficult to assign; but, more than once it was, whether the absence from Jerusalem mostly on the mission described in Jer. xiii., or imprisonment, or any other impediment, it operated equally on Jeremiah and on the writer of 2 Kings xxiv. When it is borne in mind that the writer of 2 Kings was a contemporary writer, and, if not Jeremiah, must have had independent means of information, this coincidence will have great weight.
KINGS

It has been argued on the other side—

(2) That the concluding portion of the book of Kings could hardly have been written by Jeremiah, unless we suppose him to have written it when he was between eighty and ninety years old. To this it may be replied that the last four verses, relative to Jehoiachin, are equally a supplement, whether added by the author or by some later hand. There is nothing impossible in the supposition of Jeremiah having survived till the thirty-seventh year of Jehoiachin's captivity, though he would have been between eighty and ninety. There is something touching in the idea of this gleam of joy having reached the Prophet in his old age, and of his having added these few words to his long-finished history of his nation (see Hävernick, Uebcr Daniel, p. 14).

(2) That the resemblance of style and diction may be accounted for on the supposition of Jeremiah's familiarity with the autobiography of the writer of Kings, how long before his death he had access, while the similarity of 2 Kings xxiv, 1-18, etc., and Jer. xxxix, might arise from the writer of Kings using that portion of Jeremiah's work. The identity of Jer. lii with the same portion of Kings is probably owing to its being an altered extract from Kings, as it is not to be found in Jeremiah, except by a second hand. Neither of the suppositions, however, seriously militates against the general authorship of Jeremiah as to the book of Kings. See JEREMIAH.

X. Place of these Books in the Canon, and References to them.

1. The author of the books of Kings has never been disputed; it is needless to bring forward the testimonials to their authenticity which may be found in Josephus, Eusebius, Jerome, Augustine, etc., or in Bp. Cosin, or any other modern work on the Canon of Scripture. See CANON. They are reckoned, as has already been noticed, among the Prophets, in the threefold division of the Holy Scriptures; a position in accordance with the supposition that they were compiled by Jeremiah, and contain the narratives of the different prophets in succession. They are frequently cited by our Lord and by the Apostles. Thus the allusion to Solomon's glory is made (Matt. vi, 29); to the queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon to hear his wisdom (xii, 42); to the Temple (Acts vii, 47, 48); to the great drought in the days of Elijah, and the widow of Sarepta (Luke iv, 25, 26); to the cleansing of Naaman the Syrian (ver. 27); to the story of the Elisha to Gehazi (vers. iv, 29, come with Luke x, 4); to the dress of Elijah (Mark i, 6, comp. with 2 Kings i, 8); to the complaint of Elijah, and God's answer to him (Rom. xi, 3, 4); to the raising of the Shunammite's son from the dead (Heb. xi, 38); to the giving and withholding of the rain in answer to Elijah's prayer (James v, 17, 18; Rev. xi, 6); to Jezebel (Rev. ii, 26) are all derived from the books of Kings, and, with the statement of Elijah's presence at the Transfiguration, are a striking testimony to their value for the purpose of religious teaching, and to their authenticity as a portion of the Word of God.

On the whole, then, in this portion of the history of the Israelitish people to which the name of the Books of Kings has been given, we have (if we except those errors in numbers which are either later additions to the original work, or accidental corruptions of the text) a most important and accurate account of that people during upwards of four hundred years of their national existence, delivered for the most part by contemporary writers, and guaranteed by the authority of one of the most eminent of the Jewish prophets. Considering the conditions of the time, and the narrowness of the style, the amount of knowledge which these books convey of the characters, conduct, and manners of kings and people during so long a period is truly wonderful. The insight they give us into the aspect of Judah and Jerusalem, both natural and artificial, into the religious, military, and civil institutions of the people, their arts and manufactures, the state of education and learning among them, their resources, commerce, exports, alliances, the causes of their decadence, and, finally, of their ruin, is most clear, interesting, and instructive. In a few brief sentences we can only mention a few of the important passages which deal with the affairs of Egypt, Tyre, Syria, Assyria, Babylon, and other neighboring nations, that have been preserved to us in all the other remains of antiquity up to the recent discoveries in hieroglyphical and cuneiform monuments. The synchronisms with these, if there are not some difficulties, yet furnish the only real basis for dates of these contemporaneous powers; and if we are content to read accurate and truthful history, substantially with an exact though intricate net-work of chronology, then we shall assuredly find it will abundantly repay the most laborious studies of all the ages.

But it is for their deep religious teaching, and for the insight which they give us into God's providential and moral government of the world, that these books are above all valuable. Books which describe the wisdom and the glory of Solomon, and are replete with his fall; which make us acquainted with the painful ministry of Elijah, and his translation into heaven; and which tell us how the most magnificent temple ever built for God's glory, and of which he vouchsafed to take possession by a visible symbol of his presence, was consigned to the flames and to the destruction of the nation of his worship and subjection in it, read us such lessons concerning both God and man as are the best evidence of their divine origin, and make them the richest treasure to every Christian man.

XI. Commentaries.—The following are the exegetical works which help specially on the two books of Kings, to the most important of which we prefix an asterisk: Ephraem, Syrus, Explanatio (in Syriac, in his Opp. iv, 489); Theodore, Questions (in Greek, in his Opp. i, edit. Halle, 1769); Procopius of Gaza, Scholia [including Chron.] (from Theodore, edit. Meursius, Lugd. Bat., 1628, 4to); Zaccariah the Eucherius (falsely attributed to [Acheirius]) (in the Max. Hebr. Vet. Pers., vi, 965 sq.); Raabî (i. e. Rab. Sol. Jacri), Commentarius [Joshua—Kings] (trans. by Breithaupt, Goth., 1714, 4to); Baholos, ᾑγατον [Joshua—Kings] (with Kimchi's Commentary, Seira, 1494, folio, and in the Rabbinical Bibles); Alschheim, ᾑγατον, etc., [Joshua—Kings] (Venice, 1601, fol., and later); Bugenhagen, Adnotationes (Basil. 1825, 8vo); Weller, Commentarius (Francofurti, 1567, North. 1569, fol.), Commentarius ii [Joshua—Kings] (Basil. 1567, fol.); Sarcer, Commentarius (Lipa. 1559, 8vo); Martyr, Commentarius (Tigrur. 1666, 1681, Heidel. 1599, fol.); Sirigel, Commentarius [Samuel—Chron.] (Lipa. 1588, 1591, fol.); Sanarius, Commentarius [Joshua—Chron.] (Moutug. 1605, 1617, 2 vols. fol.); L. de Batis, Hypomnemata (Basil. 1629, 8vo); Erffurt, 1698, 1614, 8vo; Lipa. 1610, 4to); De Mendoza, Commentarius [including Sam.] (Lugd. 1622—1631, 8 vols. fol.); Sanctius, Commentarius [Sam.—Chron.] (Antwerp, 1624, Lugd. 1625, fol.); Cronimus, Illustrationes [Ruth—Chron.] (Lovan, 1631, 4to); De Vera, Commentarius [including Sam.] (Lipa. 1635, fol.); Bonfrette, Commentaria [Sam.—Chron.] (Tornaci, 1648, 2 vols. fol.), also with his other commentaries, Lugd. 1737; Causinus, Dissertationes [including Sam.] (Par. 1650, fol.; Colon, 1652, 4to); Schmidt, Adnotationes (Argent. 1657, 4to); Calmet, Commentaire (Par. 1711, 4to); A. King's Book is the name of a book published A.D. 1648, under the sanction of Henry VIII. A Lutheran necessity Doctrine and Eradication for any Christian Man.
The people called it the King's Book in contradistinction from the work which furnished the basis for the King's Book, and was called the Bishop's Book. This latter was an exposition of the Apostles' Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Pater Noster, and the Ave Maria: to these, in the King's Book, was subjoined a different matter touching free will, good works, justification, predestination, and purgatory. A comparison, however, of the two shows that in the King's Book there is a falling away from the principles of the Reformation. See Institution of a Christian Man.

King's Dale (קִנְיָה דָּלָה, K'inek ham-Me'lah, Valley of the King; سِمَّى الْبَرْدَةُ وَبَلَدُ الْبَرْدَةِ, سَمْيَةُ الْبَرْدَةُ وَبَلَدُ الْبَرْدَةِ, a place incidentally mentioned in two passages of Scripture only. When Abraham was returning with the spoil of Sodom, the king of Sodom went out to meet him at the valley of Shaveh, which is the king's dale" (Gen. xv. 17); and in the narrative of the death of Absalom the incidental remark is inserted by the historian, "Now Absalom in his lifetime had reared up for himself a pillar which is in the king's dale" (2 Sam. xviii. 18). The locality has usually been supposed to be in the Valley of Jehoshaphat or Kidron, and that this unknown monument, now named the tomb of Absalom, is the pillar raised by that prince (Benajmin of Tudela, in Early Trau. in Pal. p. 84; Raumer, Palaest. p. 308; Barclay, City of the Great King, p. 92). The style of the monument, which is of the later Homan age, indicates against this theory, which we suppose that this great man's hand was in at least equal repute for scrofula and wens, doubtless for a like reason. If Jesus had laid his hands on many sick persons, and some of them had recovered within a week, how different would have been the state of the case! (See Paley on tenatious miracles and gradual cures.) As the same thing will not happen by the touch of a royal hand, it cannot be believed without the utmost degree of superstition, it is probable that the service was used as a petition for the cure, and that the touching the part affected was a superstitious act, followed by a cure in those cases in which the action of the mind was favorable to such an effect. Thus the cure itself would be explicable from natural causes.

Kingsbury, Cyrus, a noted American missionary to the Indians, was born about 1789. He commenced his missionary labors about 1816, and for more than fifty years faithfully, quietly, and meekly served his Master in making known to those committed to his care the unseen workings of Christ. Kingsbury died August 29th, 1870. His influence among the savages was great, and few men in any service could be more missed. Among the missionaries of this age, no purer name, no lovelier character, has appeared than that which belongs to Cyrus Kingsbury.

Kingsbury, William, a Congressional minister, was born in London July 12, 1744, and educated first at Christ's Hospital, London, and for the ministry at the educational institution for Congregational ministers at Milc End, where he graduated in 1764. He was ordained in 1765, and became pastor of the Independent Church at Southampton, a position which he most successfully filled for forty-five years. In 1772, in addition to his pastoral duties, he established an academy for the education of young men. In 1767 he declined a position in Homerston College. In 1758 he was one of the prime movers in founding the London Missionary Society, and was the first preside over its deliberations. He died at Caverness Feb. 18, 1818. He published in 1798 An Apology for Village Preachers, in answer to an attack made upon them. Mr. Kingsbury was "one of the brightest ornaments of the ministerial character that has graced the church in modern times—a man of rare and exalted worth, possessed of vigor of intellect, sound critical knowledge, as well as depth of piety."—Morison, Missionary Fathers. (H.C.W.)

Kingsley, Calvin, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born of Presbyterian

Answer. Which put their trust in thee, Minister. Send unto them help from above. Answer. And evermore mightily defend them. Minister. O Lord, grant us grace. Answer. And for the glory of thy name sake deliver us: we comfort all thy sinners, for thy name's sake. Minister. O Lord, hear our prayer. Answer. And let our cry come unto thee. Answer. Almighty God, the eternal health of all such as put their trust in thee, hear us, we beseech thee, on the behalf of these, for whose care we call for thy merciful help; that they, receiving health, may give thanks unto thee in thy holy Church, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

"The evidence which has sometimes been offered for supposed miraculous cures of the king's evil is none at all for the miracles, but goes to prove that patients were touched, and afterwards recovered. Symptoms of many diseases abate spontaneously; and especially in the case of scrofula, a strong excitement of mind is supposed by medical men to exert often a reaction in the abscesses. The touch of a hanged man's hand has been held in at least equal repute for scrofula and wens, doubtless for a like reason. If Jesus had laid his hands on many sick persons, and some of them had recovered within a week, how different would have been the state of the case! (See Paley on tenatious miracles and gradual cures.) As the same thing will not happen by the touch of a royal hand, it cannot be believed without the utmost degree of superstition, it is probable that the service was used as a petition for the cure, and that the touching the part affected was a superstitious act, followed by a cure in those cases in which the action of the mind was favorable to such an effect. parentage, at Amesville, Oneida County, N. Y., Sept. 8, 1812. His early advantages were rather moderate, but his thirst for knowledge made him superior to circumstances. He was determined to succeed, and in 1834 entered Allegheny College, whence he graduated with honor in the year 1841, having held already, in his sophomore year, the appointment of tutor of mathematics. Immediately after graduation he was elected professor of mathematics in the college, and distinguished himself in that capacity for several years, taking upon himself also the work of preaching; he had been licensed to preach in 1836. In the year 1843, when Allegheny College was deprived of its assistance from Pennsylvania by an enactment withdrawing all appropriation from the high schools of the state, Kingsley, then an ordained deacon in the Church, was appointed agent "for the peculiarly arduous and thankless task of raising funds for the endowment of his college." About this time, also, the future bishop first came prominently before the general public. He had early entertained strong anti-slavery prejudices, and in 1844 he led to open public discussion with the distinguished preachers Luther Lee (q. v.) and Elias Smith (q. v.), who had formed the "Wesleyan" organization through disaffection at the position assumed by the Methodist Episcopal Church on the subject of the institution of slavery. In these discussions Kingsley proved himself in every respect the equal, if not the superior, of his antagonist—"men by nature able, and by practice trained to the highest point of effectiveness by their zeal for truth, and laborious study of the whole ground of the controversy." From 1844 to 1845 he was also regular pastor in the city of Erie, and during this period he resigned his scholarship and his teaching duties in the College. While here he had a public discussion with a Universalist minister, and also prepared his lectures on Prof. Bush's work on the Resurrection, which were published afterwards under the title "Kingsley on the Resurrection" (1845, and often). Preferring to remain in the pulpit to that in the rostrum, he resigned his place at Allegheny College in 1846, but the trustees refused to accept the resignation, and, at the most earnest entreaty of many of his friends, he was induced to continue his college relations, even at a considerable sacrifice of salary. Continuing the duties of his chair, he continued to labor faithfully as a preacher upon the adjacent circuits and stations. In 1852 he was elected a delegate from his Conference to the General Conference, and not only was he elected a member of that body, but he was also elected a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in attendance, though a comparative stranger, received, in the election of bishops, some forty votes for this distinguished office. By the next General Conference (1866) he was elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate, successor of the celebrated late Dr. Elliott. In this place he displayed much editorial ability, and his paper became a powerful influence in the West. In 1860 he was recognised by the General Conference as the leader of the anti-slavery movement, and was chosen chairman of the Slavery Committee, and managed the discussion on that subject with great success. He was at that time re-elected editor of The Advocate, and at the breaking out of the war brought its whole support to the aid of the government. In 1864, the General Conference, then in session at Philadelphia, promoted him to the high distinction for which he had been a candidate in 1852, and he performed the duties of the position the summer of 1869, when he took an episcopal tour around the world, but died on his way homeward at Beirut, Syria, April 6, 1870. "As a bishop, he met the highest expectations of the Church. In the chair his decisions were clear and exact. In making the appointments he manifested great sympathy for the preachers and devotion to the interests of the Church. His ministrations were able and successful, and during the six years of his episcopal labors he gave himself wholly to the work of his great office. In his mien, his voice, his bearing, in his manner, genial and social in his spirit. His intellect was strong, keen, and logical. He used a ready pen, and his descriptions were clear, concise, and graphic. His sermons were rich in doctrinal truth, and by their clear and earnest delivery held the attention of large congregations. His entire power was of a superior order, and each successive year his talents were unfolding" (Conference Minutes, 1870, p. 294). The Rev. Dr. Robert Allyn, in his Personal Recollections of Bishop Kingsley (Central Christian Advocate, June 1, 1870), speaks of him as a man genial, charitable, honest, earnest, shrewd and far-seeing, patient, careful, and bold in defense and in attack. His square form, solid lips, and broad shoulders were an indication of the wrestler, and his keen, quick eye was that of a master of fence. While he was one of the most diligent of workers, he had just enough of the philosophic about his temperament to make him the pluckiest of fighters. He always looked at a point, and not at half of the horizon, as many do when they preach or write. His eagle eye would see the mark, no matter how far away, and his steady hand could point to where he hit it exactly. In his sermonizing there was no attempt at profundity of sentiment or rhetorical ornamentation, or even logical force; yet it had all these so far as they are of any account. It was emphatically as the rain that cometh down from heaven—falling because the clouds are too full to hold it longer, and never carking on what place it may descend, or what it shall refresh. His thoughts were always clear, and his words exact and often picturesque. He was entirely indifferent to the applause of those to whom he spoke, and was so natural—commonly not graceful in all his manner, that a careless observer would be sure to be deceived into regarding him of less importance than he had. Every word he chose was a word to help convey his meaning, and he never added another for show; hence a few, who looked for sound rather than sense, might undervalue his preaching; but let a congregation hear him often, and become accustomed to the flash of his eye and the movement of his face as his thoughts came leaping from his heart, and as he attempted to clothe them in words, and they could not fail to be fascinated. He had a magnetic power to keep people awake and to instruct them, and to attach men to him which no mere mental assent could ever do. Those who sat on the wings of fancy, I can only instruct and convince."

"In a word," says Dr. Wiley, "his whole character was well rounded and symmetrical as his mind was rigorously logical, and his frame robust, compact, and well knit in all things, withabil," Bishop Kingsley left in MS. form a series of lectures he delivered while professor at Meadville, in defense of the Orthodox doctrine. It is to be hoped that they will soon be brought out in book form. They certainly would prove a great addition to our literature on those subjects. Since his decease his letters of travel have been published under the title of Round the World (Cincinnati, 1870, 2 vols. 12mo), prefixed by a memoir of the bishop. (J. H. W.)

Kingsley, James Luce, LL.D., an eminent and one of the most successful American educators, born in Scotland, Conn., Aug. 28, 1778, was a lineal descendant of John Kingsley, one of the seven men who in 1686 constituted the first Church in Dorchester, Mass. He entered Williams College at the age of seventeen, and at the end of the freshman year, sure that he would graduate in Yale, where he graduated in 1799. After teaching in Windham and Wethersfield for two years Mr. Kingsley was appointed tutor in Yale College in 1801, and in 1805 was promoted to the professorship of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages and of ecclesiastical history, a position which he retained till his death in 1852. His studies were chiefly in language and history, but he was well versed in mathematics, theology, metaphysics, political science, and general literature. The study of the classics had disciplined his judgment and refined his taste, so that his writings were clear, finished, and forcible to the highest degree. As a writer of English, Dr. Dwight calles him an Addison; in Latin, Prof. Thacher says that "Cicerio was his model, and he was certainly a successful imitator of his style—surprisingly successful, when we consider how he was dependent on himself for instruction." Prof. Kingsley was at the same time remarkably modest and retiring, the usual accompaniments of great talent. He very rarely made a public address, although so eminently qualified for the task; and the editions of classical authors which he published as text-books, together with the numerous articles which he contributed to quarterly and monthly periodicals, were commonly anonymous. His Latin compositions were numerous, but rarely published. The congratulatory address which he gave at the inauguration of President Day in 1817, and a similar address at the inauguration of President Woolsey in 1864, have not even been found among his papers. The memorial of one of his least of the six or eight monumental tributes, viz. president Dwight, 1817; colonel David Humphreys, 1818; professor Alexander M. Fisher, 1822; professor M. R. Dutton, 1825; tutor Amos Pettigill, 1825; and Osgood Johnson, 1837. The most elaborate of all was the one delivered on the two hundredth anniversary of the settlement of New Haven in 1838. It remains a model of thorough investigation and judicious combination. The letters of Prof. Kingsley have been very much admired. With president Sparks, Edward Everett, Dr. Drollery, Mr. Savage, and other literary gentlemen, he was in constant correspondence, but more particularly with Dr. J. E. Worcester. In the American Quarterly Register for April, 1835, and August, 1836, will be found his sketch of the History of Yale College, which was also printed as a separate pamphlet (46 pages 8vo). This is regarded as a chief authority in relation to the early history of this celebrated college. The productions of Prof. Kingsley found a large place in the leading American periodicals; he ranked especially prominent among the contributors to the New Englander, the Christian Spectator, the Biblical Repository, and the North American Review. For a complete list of his works, see Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Am. Auth. vol. ii. a. v. See also Thacher (Thomas A.), Commemorative Discourse on Prof. Kingsley (Oct., 1852).

Kingsley, Phineas, a Presbyterian minister, born in Rutland, Vt., March 12, 1788, educated in the classics by his uncle, a graduate of Harvard College, was licensed to preach about 1815, and ordained at Highgate, Vt., Oct. 12, 1819, where he remained two years. He was next settled for seven years at Underhill, Vt., and for five years following at Sheldon, Vt. In 1847 he removed to Brooklyn, Ohio, and continued preaching to the day of his death, July 6, 1862. "He was highly esteemed by his minister brethren, not for showy talents, but for substantial worth and fidelity."—Wilson, Prep. Hist. Almanac, 1887.

Kingsmill, Andrew, an English divine, born at Sidmouth, in Hampshire, in 1588, was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and removed thence to a fellowship of All Souls in 1588. In the year 1603 there were only three preachers in the university, of whom Kingsmill was one; but after some time, when conformity was pressed, he withdrew from the kingdom and went to Geneva, but at the end of three years moved to Lausanne, where he died in the year 1570, in the prime of life, "leaving behind him," says Neale (Hist. of the Puritans, i. 116 sq.), "an excellent pattern of industry, devotion, and all manner of virtue." He was an admired preacher, and a scholar of superior attainments. His memory was most remarkable, for it is said that he could readily rehearse, in the Greek language, all St. Paul's epistles to the Romans and Galatians, and other portions of holy Scripture, memorized. His works are: 1. View of Man's Estate (1574-80); 2. Godly Advice touching Marriage (1580, 8vo); 3. Treatise for such as are troubled in Mind or Afflicted in Body; 4. godly Exhortation to bear patiently all Afflictions for the Gospel; 5. Confession of a Converted Christian and an afflicted Convert. (E. de P.)

Kinkaid, Samuel Porterfield, a Presbyterian minister, was born May 24, 1827, in Donegal, Butler County, Pa.; was educated at Washington College, Pa., where he graduated with honor in 1857; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, Alleghany, Pa.; was licensed in the spring of 1859, and during his senior year he preached at the Academy and Rockland, Pa. There his labors were so abundantly successful that immediately upon his graduation he was ordained and installed over the united churches of Academia, Rockland, and Richland. In addition to his pastoral duties, he taught the academy at Friends Meeting House, Alleghany County, Pa. He died March 24, 1866. Kinkaid was marked for his great earnestness and diligence, as well as for his ardent piety and ability to present truth with directness and searching power.—Wilson, Prep. Hist. Almanac, 1867.

Kinkead, James, a Presbyterian minister, was born in St. Louis, Mo., July 6, 1807, and was licensed to preach in 1833, and ordained in 1840. His ministerial life was passed entirely in St. Francois and Washington counties, Mo. During the civil war he took every opportunity to favor the Union cause, and thus became obnoxious to the rebels, by whom he was taken from his bed and cruelly murdered on the night of Sept. 26, 1863. Destitute of thorough educational training, he yet excelled in quickness of perception, power of reasoning, and good judgment. Not sectarian in views of doctrine and Church government, he was always tenaciously firm in the sost of truth, and watchful against sophistry.—Prep. Hist. Almanac, 1865. (H. C. W.)

Kinnerdale, Ernszer, a Baptist minister, and an eminent scientist, was born in Gloucester, England, in 1711. In 1748 he was brought to America. His early life was spent in Lower Dublin, near Philadelphia, where he pursued his studies under the supervision of his father. He was ordained for the ministry in 1748. In 1748 his attention was directed to scientific pursuits and discoveries. Afterwards he became associated with Dr. Franklin in some of his most splendid discoveries, and delivered scientific lectures in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Newport. In 1758 he was chosen chief master of an English school in connection with the academy at Philadelphia, and in 1766 he was unanimously elected professor of the English language and of oratory in the college. Successful in this department, he was honored, in 1757, by the trustees with the degree of master of arts, and in 1768 was chosen a member of the American Philosophical Society, which was then composed of the most learned and scientific men in the city. In 1772 he resigned the professorship, and visited the island of Barbadoes on account of his failing health. He afterwards returned to America, and died July 4, 1778. Mr. Kinnerdale was of dignified personal appearance, and eminent as a teacher of public speaking. He acquired his chief renown not in the ministry, but in his scientific pursuits and experiments.—See Sprague, Memoirs Amer. Pulpit, vi. 45. (J. L. S.)

Kinnin. See LICK; TALMUD.

Kinsman. Of the four Hebrew words thus translated in the A. V., three, נְקָם (Num. xxxv. 11; "kinsman," Lev. xxviii, 12,13) elsewhere "kin," etc.; and so קָנָם, "kinswomen," Lev. xviii. 17, קָנָא (literally acquiescence, Ruth ii. 1), and קָנָא (Ps. xxxvii. 12 [11]; Job xix. 14, A. V. "kinsfolk," literally near, as often, indicate simple relationship. The remaining one, מָאָר, along with that, implies certain obligations arising out of that relationship. The term קין, kin', is derived by the lexicographers from the verb קינ, to redeem. That the two are closely connected is certain, but whether the meaning of the verb is derived from that of the noun, or the converse, may be made matter of question. The comparison of the cognate dialects leads to the conclusion that the primary idea lying at the basis of both is that of coming to the help or rescue of one, hence giving protection, redeeming, redeeming. In this case the קין of the O.T. would, in fundamental concept, answer pretty nearly to the παράκλησις or παραδόντα of the N.T. The goel among the Hebrews was the nearest male blood relation alive. To him, as such, three rights specially belonged, and on him corresponding duties devolved toward his next kinsman. See KINSHIP.

1. When an Israelite through poverty sold his inheritance and was unable to redeem it, it devolved upon one of his kin to purchase it (Lev. xxv, 25-28; Ruth iii, iv). So also, when an Israelite had through poverty sold himself into slavery, it devolved upon the next of kin, as his goel, to ransom him in the jubilee year (Lev. xxv, 47 sq.). See JUBILEE. Year of. In allusion to this, God is frequently represented as the goel of his people, both as he redeems them from temporal bondage (Exod. vi, 6; Isa. lxxxiii, 1; xxxviii, 20; Jer. i, 54, etc.) and from the slavery of sin and evil (Isa. xxi, 14; xlv, 22; xxix, 7; Ps. xci, 4; Job xxxix, 25, etc.). In many of these passages there is an obvious Messianic reference, to show the fact that our redemption from sin has been effected by one who has become near of kin to us by assuming our nature gives special force (comp. Heb. ii, 14). See REDEEMER.

2. When an Israelite who had wronged any one sought to make restitution, but found that the party he had wronged was dead without leaving a son, it fell to the next of kin of the injured party, as his goel, to represent him and receive the reparation (Num. v, 6 sq.). The law provided that, in case of his having no one sufficiently near of kin to act for him in this way, the property restored should go to the priest, as representing Jehovah, the King of Israel—a provision which the Jews say indicates that the law has reference to strangers, as "no Israelite could be without a redeemer, for if any one of his tribe was left he would be his heir." (Maimon. in Baba Kamma, ix, 11). See GOEL.

3. The most striking office of the goel was that of acting as the avenger of blood in case of the murder of his next of kin; hence the phrase בָּלָא בָּלָא, the blood-redeemer. In the heart of man there seems to be a deep-rooted feeling that the human family is united by violence the offence can be expiated only by the life of the murderer; hence, in all nations where the rights of individuals are not administered by a general executive acting under the guidance of law, the rule obtains that where murder has been committed the right and duty of retaliation devolves on the kindred of the murdered person. Among the Semitic tribes this took the form of a personal obligation resting on the nearest of kin—a custom which still prevails among the Arabs (Niebuhr, Des. d'Arabie, ch. 7). This deep-rooted feeling and established usage the Moses legislation sought to place under such regulations as would tend to prevent the excesses and disorders to which personal retaliation is apt to lead, without attempting to preclude the innocence of it. (Mohammed also sought to bring the practice under restraint without forbidding it; see Koran, it 4:199.) Certain cities of refuge were provided, to which the manambi might endeavor to escape. If the goel overtook him before he reached any of these cities, he might put him to death; but if the fugitive succeeded in gaining the asylum, he was safe until at least one investigation had been instituted as to the circumstances of the murder. If on inquiry it was found that the party had been guilty of deliberate murder, the law delivered him up to the goel, to be put to death by him in any way he pleased; but if the murder was accidental, the manambi was entitled to the property of the asylum he had reached. See CITY or REFUGE. He was safe, however, only within its precincts, for if the goel found him beyond these he was at liberty to kill him. Among some of the Oriental nations the right of blood-revenge might be sustained by the payment of a sum of money; in this practice, while it gave effective to the rich an undue advantage over the poor in matters of this sort, the law of Moses absolutely prohibits (Num. xxxv, 8). See BLOOD-REVENGE.

From the narrative in Ruth iii and iv it has been concluded that by the duty of the goel was that of marrying the widow of a deceased kinsman, so as to raise up seed to the deceased, thus identifying the office of the goel with that of the levir, as provided for in Deut. xxv, 5-10. See MARRIAGE. But the levirate law expressly imposes the obligation to a brother, and, according to the Jewish commentators, to a full brother by the father's side (Maimonides, quoted by Otho, Lex. Robin., p. 572), and in this relation neither Boaz nor the other kinsman stood to Elimelech or his sons. It is further evident that the question was one of right rather than one of duty, for a kinsman who was about to inherit incurred no disgrace thereby, such as one who declined to fulfil the levirate law incurred. The nearest kinsman had the right to redeem the land, and the redemption of the land probably involved the marrying of the widow of the deceased owner, according to usage and custom; but the law does not authorize this, nor did the goel who declined to avail himself of his right come under any penalty or ban. The case of the goel and that of the levir would thus be the converse of each other: the goel had a right to purchase the land, but in so doing came under an obligation from custom to marry the widow of the deceased owner; the levir was bound to marry the widow of his deceased brother, which involved, as a matter of course, the redemption of his property if he had sold it (see Selden, De Successo, in bon. defunct. c. 10; Benary, De Hebraeum Lecturis, p. 19 sq.; Bertheau, Exeg. Bibl. sum. A. T. pt. vi, p. 249; Michaels, On the Laws of Moses, ii, 129 sq.). See LEVIRATE LAW.

Kipling, Charles, an English divine, born in Yorkshire about the middle of the 18th century, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated as B.A. in 1766, and became D.D. in 1784. His first prominent position was that of deputy regius professor of divinity under Bishop Waterland, and in 1768 he was promoted to the deanship of Peterborough. In 1792 Kipling preached the Boyle Lectures, which were not published. In 1788 he brought out at the university press a very handsome edition of the famous "Codex Benez" of the N.T., with fac-simile type (Codex Benez, Quadratibus litteris, Graeco-Latinis, 2 vols. folio), which was immediately assailed with a virulence amounting to personal hostility by the party which had espoused the cause of the once notorious Freund, who was banished the university for Unitarianism, and in whose cause Kipling had come forward as promoter, or public prosecutor. Dr. Edwards, the leader of the party, charged him with ignorance and want of fidelity. But, though his proteges did not manifest much accurate scholarship, and he commits the serious error of printing the corrections instead of the original reading of the text, which he relegated to the notes at the end, Tregelles (Intro to Text. Crit. of N. Test.) allows that he "appears to have used scrupulous exactitude in performing his task efficiently according to the plan which he had proposed to himself. Kippis, Andrew, D.D., F.R.S., F.A.S., an eminent English Unitarian divine, was born at Nottingham in 1725. He studied under Dr. Doddridge at Northampton, and in 1746 became minister of a congregation at Boston, Lincolnshire. In 1750 he removed to Dor- kirk, and in 1765 he became one of the leading Unitarian preachers in London, and a prominent member in the academy for the education of dissenting ministers in London, on a plan similar to that on which the academy at Northampton had been conducted. He was also one of the principal contributors to the Monthly Review and the Gentleman's Magazine as a reviewer, and became one of the leading periodicals of England. There are several pamphlets of his on the claims of the dissenters, and on other topics of temporary interest; but the work with which his name is most honorably connected is the republication of the Bispographia Britannica, with a large addition of new lives, and a more extended account of many persons whose lives are in the former edition of that work.

The design was too vast to be accomplished by any one person, however well assisted. Five large folio volumes were printed of the work (1778), and yet it had proceeded no further. A sixth volume, in which it was understood, was printed, but it has not been given to the world. Many of the new lives were written by Dr. Kippis himself, and particularly that of captain Cook, which was printed in a separate form also. Dr. Kippis's was a literary life of great industry. He was the editor of the collected edition of the works of Dr. Nathaniel Lardner (q.v.), with a life of that eminent theological scholar. He published also the ethical and theological lectures of his tutor, Dr. Doddridge, with a large collection of references to authors on the various topics to which they relate. His other works of interest are, Sermons on Luke i, 25 (London, 1780, 8vo); — Sermons on Psalm exix, 5 (London, 1788, 8vo); — A Vindication of Protestant Dissenting Ministers (1778). Kip. [Heb. id., הֵע, a wall or fortress, as often; Sept. always as an appellative, γέρος, πόλις, βσρος, etc., but v. חֵדָּה, קֶרֶם, etc.], a people and country subject to the Assyrian empire, mentioned in connection with Elam (Isa. xxii. 6), to which the conquered Damascus were transplanted (2 Kings xix. 9; Amos i. 6), and whence the Arameans in the east of Syria, who are at some time or other migrated (Amos iv. 7). This is supposed by major Rennel to be the same country which still bears the name of Kurdistan or Koordistan (Geogr. of Herodot, p. 891). There are, however, objections to this view which do not apply so strongly to the notion of Rosenmüller and others, that it was a tract on the river Cyra (Pliny, Hist. Nat. vi. 10; Ptolemy, v. 12) (Κερος and Κίππος, in Zend Koros), which rises in the mountains between the Euxine and Caspian Seas, and runs into the latter after being joined by the Araxes (Buch- ing, Mag. x. 430; compare Michaelis, Specul. ii. 121; Suppl. 2191; Gesenius, Theaurus, p. 1210); still called Kur (Bononi, Nieverg., p. 47, 71). Gurjistan, or Grusia (Gruziana), commonly called Georgia, seems also to have derived its name from this river Kur, which flows through their country. Some companies, Durna or Curina, or Ptolomey (Kipisos or Kipisis in Ptol. vii. 1, 10; Chaldee, יפי), a city in the south of Media, on the river Marus (Bochart, Phalag, iv. 92; Vitringa the Carina, also in Media (Kapivos, Ptol., vi. 2, 15), now called Krend (Ritter, Erdk. ix. 891). Some region in Media is perhaps most suitable from the fact that Armenia, whose northern boundaries are washed by the river Cyra, was probably not a part of Assyria at the time referred to (see Knob. Prophe, ii. 106), Keil (Comment. on Kings, ad loc.) thinks the Medes must be meant, erroneously imagining that the inhabitants of Kip are spoken of in Isaiah as their brethren. Kircher, Athanasius, an eminent German Jesuit, and quite prominent as a philosopher, was born near Fulda, Germany, in 1601. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1618, and taught mathematics and metaphysics in the college at Wurzburg. During the invasions of the Swedes he fled before the Protestant powers, and, after a short stay in France, went to Rome, and became a professor at the Propaganda. He died in 1680. His writings, which extend over the different departments of the natural sciences, philosophy, philology, history, and archaeology, evince great talent, but are often fanciful in their theories. His principal works of interest are to us, are, Sapiens, Cujus, etc. (Rome, 1602, etc., 4 vols. fol.;) Mundus subterraneus, in 4 vol libros digestus, etc. (Amsterdam, 1665, fol.;) Arca Not, in tres libros digesta, etc. (Amst. 1675, fol.;) Liber philosophico de sive artificiose, sive marion. etc. (in Ugolino's Theaurus, xxxii. 838); — Liber decreticvs de Monstris, antimo- modernis (Ugolino, xxxii. 417; Ch. monumcnta, qua sacris, qua profanis, illustrata (Amst. 1667, fol.;) — Turris Bibel, sive Archetologico, etc. (Amst. 1675, fol.;) etc. See his autobiography and Letters (Aug. 1684; Wetter et Weite, Kirchentag. vol. vi, a. v.; Darling, Encyclopedia, s. v. (J. H. W.).

Kircher, Konrad, a learned German philologist of Augsburg, of the 16th century, was a Lutheran pastor first at Donauwuer and later at Jaxdorf, and died about 1622. He wrote Concilium veteris et Novi Testamenti Graecae et Romanae subscripsit (Francoforte 1607, 2 vols. 4to; greatly enlarged by Abraham Tronmius, 1619); De usu conciliorum Graecorum in Theologia, See Simon, Hist. Kirchhofer, Melchior, a celebrated Swiss ecclesiastical writer, was born Jan. 3, 1775, at Schaffhausen, and was educated at Marburg. In 1797 he returned to Switzerland, and was ordained for the holy ministry. His first great opposition he secured in 1808 at Stein, and this he filled up to his death, Feb. 13, 1858. He is quite celebrated for his able efforts in the department of Church History, which procured for him in 1840 the doctorate of theology from the University of Marburg. Among the especially valuable writings of Kirchhofer are his monographs on Hofmeister (1810), Oswald Myconius (1813), Werner Steiner (1818), Berthold Halter (1828), Wilhelm Farel (1831), and his continuation of Hottingers Ecclesiastical History of Switzerland.—Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vii, 708.

Kirchmayr, Thomas, a German theologian, was born at Straubing, Bavaria, in the early part of the 16th century; became pastor first at Stadtinzig, in Thuringia, and later (in 1541) at Kahla. He died at Wiesbach in 1563. Kirchmayr is noted as the author of a commentary on 1 John, in which he advocates the pre-dominance of the saving in a somewhat peculiar manner. He teaches that the chosen ones never lose the influence of the holy Spirit, however great their transgression. He was criticised and obliged to quit the pulpit.—Pfeifer, Universal Lexicon, ix, 584.

Kirchmeier, Johann Christoph, a noted German theologian, was born at Orphenode, Hesse, Sept. 4, Kirchheimer, Johann Bisegmard, a German theologian of note, was born at Allendorf Jan. 4, 1764, and was educated at Marburg and Leyden. In 1798 he became pastor at Schwedden. In 1784 he accepted the professorship of logic and metaphysics at Marburg University, and at the same time became pastor of a Reformed church at Marburg. He died April 30, 1794. His writings, mainly dissertations, are enumerated by Dölger, Größte Theologen Deutschlands d. 18th u. 19th Jhdt. ii, 99 sq.

Kirghis, or Kirghis-Kaisaki (Cosmonauts of the Steppe), is the name of a people spread over the immense territory bounded by the Volga, desert of Obecktsch in 55° N. lat., the Iriltz, Chinese Turkestan, Altaic Uplands, the Gobi Desert, the Zara Sea—a vast tract of land, not unfrequently described as the "Eastern Steppe," and containing 850,000 English square miles; sterile, stony, and streamless, and covered with rank herbage five feet high. The Kirghis are of Turkish origin, and speak the Uzbek idiom of their race. They are of a people from time immemorial been divided into three branches, called the Great, Middle, and Little Horde. The first of these wanderers in the south-west portion of the Eastern Steppe; the Middle Horde roams over the territory between the Ishim, Iriltz, Lake Balkhash, and the territory of the Little Horde. The Little Horde (now more numerous than the other two tribes) ranges over the country bounded by the Ural, Tobol, Siberian Kirghis, and Turkesthan. (A small offshoot of them has, since 1801, wandered between the Volga and the Urals river, and is under rule of the governor of Astrakhan.) South of Lake Issakul is a wild mountain tribe called the Duko-Kasazonja, the only tribe which calls itself Kirghis. They are called by their neighbors Kara or Black Kirghis, and are of Mandshur stock. Their collective numbers are estimated at upwards of 11 millions of souls, more than half of whom belong to the Little Horde. The Kirghis have an economic system above mentioned, nomadic, and organized by chieftains or shamans. They are restless and predatory, and have well earned for themselves the title of the "Slave-hunters of the Steppes," by seizing upon caravans, appropriating the goods, and selling their captives at the great slave-markets of Khiva, Bokhara, etc. Their wealth consists of cattle, sheep, horses, and camels. They are of the Moslem faith, in somewhat a corrupt form, and, like the followers of Mohammed, are the sworn enemies of the Mongols. "Fired by hereditary hate," says Dixon (Russ. A. p. 339 sq.). "These Kirghis banditti took upon every man of Mongolian birth and Buddhistic faith as lawful spoil. They follow him to his pastures, plunder his tent, drive off his herds, and sell him as a slave. But when this lawful prey escapes their hands they raid and rob on more friendly soil, and manage toINGTON 105

Kiriathiaim (Heb. Kirya'tha'im, two cutes, i.e. double-town; Sept. Kapuadai, but Kapuadai in Numb.; f gath in Gen. v. r. Kapuadai or Kapa'ath in Jer. and Ezek.; walled with strongholds) [apparently mistaking the directive termination כותא for כותא in Ezek.; Auth. Vers. "Kiriathaim" in Jer. and Ezek.], the name of two places.

1. One of the most ancient towns in the country west of the Jordan (see Ewald, Gesch. Isr. i, 808), as it was possessed by the gigantes Ennim (Gen. xiv, 6), who were expelled by the Amorites (Deut. x, 2); and these, in their turn, were dispossessed by the Amorites, from whom it was taken by the Israelites. Kiriathiaim was then assigned to Reuben (Numb. xxxii, 37; Josh. xiii, 19); but during the Assyrian exile the Mosrites and one of the other cities (compare Jer. xlvi, 1, 23; Ezek. xxxv, 9). Barkhardt (Tyrrell, p. 267) found ruins, called El-Teim, which he conjectures to have been Kiriaithaim, the last syllable of the name being retained. This is somewhat doubtful, as the Christian village Kariaitha or Koreitha (Kapa'da, Kapadia) of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. a. v.) is placed ten miles west of Medeba, whereas El-Teim is but two miles (Seetzen places it at half an hour, Reise, i, 408). Michaelis (Orient, u. exeg. Bibl. iii, 120; Suppl. 2208 sq.) compares the modern city Kirjahaim, one day's journey from Palmu (Wood, Reisen in Palmyra, p. 54); and Bisching (Erdb. xi, 568) adduces Kariaitha (in Flitn., v, 29, Carviate), a place in the desert of Arabia; but both these identifications are inadmissible (Hamesveld, iii, 169). Ritter (Erde, xi, 1815, 1186) supposes that the Onomasticon confounds two places of the same name, one being the ancient city corresponding to El-Teim, north of the wady Zarka, and the other the Christian town, represented by the modern Kereqat, south of the same wady; but we see no occasion for this, as the latter place, the name of which fully agrees, lies at the required distance (eleven miles, Seetzen, Reise, ii, 442) south-west of Al-Taiba (Porter, Heb., p. 800), upon the southern slope of Jebel Atturas (perhaps referred to by Eusebius in the expression annexed to his description, ει ρη νασ ουρον, on the Baris, using the term in the sense of a fortress on a hill-top rather than alluding to a position beyond the valley Zarka-Main, which Ritter, p. 678, fancifully conceives to be thus indicated from the abundance of mandrakes, βασαρας). See KIRJITHIOTH.

2. A city of refuge in the tribe of Naphtali (1 Chron. vi, 76); elsewhere (Josh. xxii, 32) called KARTAN (q. v.).

KIRJATH-ARBA (Hebrew Kirjath-Arba, γιρυμ Aρβα, city of Arba; Sept. πόλις Αρβακ, Gen. xxiii, 2; Judg. xiv, 15; xv, 13, 54; xxx, 7; Kepa'Sabro, Josh. xxii, 11; Judg. i, 10; πόλις του χρόνου, Gen. xxxv, 27; once with the art. τον χρόνον, "Kirjath-'Arba", Septuag. Kapodnepsev v. r. Kapodnepsev, Neb. xiv, 9; Auth. Vers. "city of Arba," in Gen. xxxv, 27; Josh. xv, 13; xxii, 11), the original name of Hebron, in the mountains of Judah, so called from its founder, one of the Anakim, and inhabited under the same name after the exile. Hengstenberg, however, thinks that Hebron was the earlier name of Kirjath-Arba, only altered by the Canaanites (Beit. iii, 187). Sir John Mandeville (cir. 1322) found it still "called by the Saracens Kari'carba" and by the Jews "Arb'atba" (Early Travels, p. 161).
It is a Jewish gloss (first mentioned by Jerome) which interprets the latter part of the name (אֶזְרַיִם, Ezra, Heb. "four") as referring to the four great men buried there (the saints Adam, Isaac, Jacob, and Jacob; so the Talmud, see Kel., ad loc.; or the giants Anak, Ahiman, Shobai, and Tolmai, according to Bochart, Com., 1:1).

Khirjath-arim (Ezra ii, 20). See KIRJATH-JEARIM.

Khirjath-ba'âl (Heb. חֵרְצָת-בָּעָל, city of Baal; Sept. Καραθαδιλ, another name (Josh. xv, 60; xviii, 14) for KIRJATH-JEARIM (q. v.). See also Balaah.

Khirjath-hu'soth (Heb. חֵרְצָת-חָצוֹת, city of streets; Sept. πόλεις ἰδανωδού), a city of Moab to which Balaam took on his arrival to offer a preparatory sacrifice (Num. xxiii, 39). The Vulgate understands an extreme city of the territory of Moab, as that on the border of Arnon, where the king met his prophetic guest (verse 80); but the two appear to have different cities. The city in question was probably the capital of the Moabish king, usually called Kir-Moah, and here distinguished from other places of a similar name (Khirjath meaning simply "city") by an epithet, "the city of the king's power," as, in the presence of the court and "high places of Baal," as well as the conspicuous situation of the city (verse 41), corresponding to that of Kerak. Porter, however (Murray's Hand-Book for Pil. p. 299 sq.), inclines to identify the place with the Kirjath on Jebel Attarus, and so with Kirjathaim (q. v.).

Khirjath-je'irim (Heb. חֵרְצָת-יֵהֵרִים, city of forests; Sept. Καραθαπαπιφ, Josh. xviii, 14; Judg. xviii, 12; 1 Chron. ii, 50, 52; 2 Chron. i, 4; Neh. vii, 29; Jer. xxvi, 20; Kophera'ipim, 1 Sam. vi, 21; vii, 1, 2; v. r. Chron. i, 50; 2 Chron. ii, 4; Neh. vii, 29; Jer. xxvi, 20; Πόλις Ιακωβ, Josh. xv, 3, 60; 1 Chron. xxvi, 20; Kophera'apim, v. r. τῶν ἱλατρῶν, 1 Chron. ii, 53; Kophera'apim, Josh. xiii, 15; omitted in 1 Chron. xiii, 6; or, rather, paraphrases the words "Balaah, which is Kirjath-je'irim," by Πόλις Δαωίδ; Josephus οἱ τῶν Καραθαπαπιφ μετωπιτῶν, Ant. vi, 2, 1; with the art. Πόλις τῆς Καραθαπαπιφ, Jer. xxxvi, 20), in the contracted form KIRJATH-AHIM (Heb. חֵרְצָת-אֲהִימִ', city of forests, Ezra ii, 20; Sept. Καραθαπαπιφ, v. r. Καραθαπιαπιφ, and simply Kirjath (Heb. חֵרְצָת, Josh. xvii, 99, 19; Kophera'apim, ix, 16; Kophera'apim, v. r. πόλεις ἱλατρῶν, Josh. xiv, 3, 60; 1 Chron. xvi, 50, 51); one of the towns of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix, 17). It belonged to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv, 60; Judg. xviii, 12), and lay on the border of Benjamin (Josh. xviii, 15; 1 Chron. ii, 50), to which it was finally assigned (Josh. xviii, 28). It was to this place the ark was brought from Beth-shemesh, after it had been brought from the land of the Philistines, and where it remained till removed to Jerusalem by David (1 Sam. vii; 1 Chron. xiii). This was one of the ancient sites which were again inhabited after the exile (Ezra ii, 25; Neh. vii, 29). It was also called Kirjath-baal (Josh. xv, 60; xviii, 14), and Balaah (Josh. xv, 9). It appears to have lain not far from Beeroth (Ezra ii, 25). "it is included in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 50, 52) as founded by or descended from Shobai, the son of Caleb ben-Hur, and as having in its turn sent out the colonies of the Ithrites, Puthites, Shimeathites, and Minimates, and those of Zerah and Eshtol. "Behind Kirjath-je'irim" the band of Danites pitched their camp before their expedition to Mount Ephraim and Laish, leaving their name attached to the spot for long after (Judg. xviii, 12). See MAHANAIM-DOAN.

Hitherto, beyond the early sanctity implied in the bearing the name of Baal, there is nothing of especial interest or remarkable in Kirjath-je'irim. It was no doubt this reputation for sanctity which made the people of Beth-shemesh appeal to its inhabitants to relieve them of the ark of Jehovah, which was bringing such calamities on their untutored inexperience. From their place in the valley they looked anxiously for some eminence, which, according to the belief of those days, should be the appropriate seat for so powerful a Deity [see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 539] (1 Sam. vi, 20, 21). In this high place called Kirjath-je'irim the ark was concealed by David to the house of Obed-edom the sceptre (1 Chron. xiii, 5, 6; 2 Chron. i, 4; 2 Sam. vi, 2, etc.). It is very remarkable and suggestive that in the account of this transaction the ancient and heathen name Baal is retained. In fact, in 2 Sam. vi, 2—probably the original statement—the name Baal is used without any explanation, and to the exclusion of that of Kirjath-je'irim. In the allusion to this transaction in Psa. xcxxxii, 6, the name is obliquely indicated as the 'wood'—yqar, the root of Kirjath-je'irim. We also hear of a prophet Urijah ben-Sheemaiah, a native of the place, who enforced the warnings of Jeremiah, and was cruelly murdered by Jehoiakim (Jer. xxvi, 20, etc.), but of the place we know nothing beyond what has already been said. A tradition is mentioned by Archichomus (Descr. T. S. Dan. § 17), though without stating his authority, that it was the home of Sacheriah, son of Zechah, who said "he who was slain was between the altar and the Temple" (Smith). Josephus says it was near Beth-schemesh (Ant. vi, 1, 4). Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Baal, Baal-cara-thiam) speak of it as being in their day a village nine or ten miles from Diospolis (Lydda), on the road to Jerusalem; consequently north-west (Hamerowd, iii, 256). With this description, and the former of these two distances, agrees Procopius (see ReLand, Palest. p. 565). On account of its presumed proximity to Beth-shemesh, Williams (Holy City) endeavors to identify Kirjath-je'irim with Bethshean, though sufficiently near the latter place, does not answer to the other conditions. Dr. Robinson thinks it possible that the ancient Kirjath-je'irim may be recognised in the present Kurjat el-Ebn. The first part of the name (Kirjath, Kureyt, signifying city) is the same in both, and is most probably ancient, being found in Arabic proper names only in Syria and Palestine, and not very frequently even there. The only change has been that the ancient "city of forests" has, in modern times, become the "city of grapes. The site is also about nine and a half Roman miles from the road to Jerusalem, and not very remote from Gibeon, from which Kirjath-je'irim could not well have been distant. So close a correspondence of name and position seems to warrant the conclusion in favor of Kurjat el-Ebn (see Ritter's Erdkunde, xvi, 108-110). This place is that which ecclesiastical tradition has identified with Je Anathoth of Jeremiah (1, 1; comp. Jerome, ad loc.; also Onomasticon, s. v.; Josephus, Ant. x, 7, 3), which, however, is at Ana. Kurjet el-Ebn is now a poor village, its principal buildings being an old convent of the Mini-aters, and a little ruined mosque. The site is about seven miles from the sea of Ab, who for the last half century have been the terror of travellers, but have lately been overtaken with punishment by the Turkish government. Dr. Robinson remarks that "a pretty direct route from Beth-shemesh would go through the plain of Lebub and through Ab- Ghurab; but no such road now exists, and probably never did, judging from the nature of the country. In all probability, the ark was brought up by way of Saria (Researches, new ed., iii, 187). Schwartz, who identifies Kirjath-je'irim with the same site, suggests that the hill (which he calls Mount Midas) south-west of the village, and which the family of Kurty or Seach, may be the "Mount Jeirim" spoken of in Josh. xv, 10. But different from Mount Baalah of ver. 11; both places having taken the title Jeirim from the intervening tract of land, perhaps once covered with wood (Psal. p. 97). It is the testimony of a recent traveller (Tobler, Dritte Wanderung, p. 179, 180) that the mount, which really stands on the ridge, is really a natural occurrence, and probably answering to Mount Jeirim, there still are "real woods, so thick and so solitary, he had seen nothing like them since he left Germany."

Kirkpatrick, Hugh. See Kirkpatrick, James.

Kirkpatrick, Jacob, D.D., a Presbytery divine, was born near Baskingridge, N. J., August 7, 1785; pursued his classical studies under the direction of the Rev.
Robert Finley, D.D., and graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1804. After this he studied law three years, but in 1807 he decided definitely in favor of the ministry, and resumed his studies under John Woodhull, D.D., of Freehold, N.J. In August, 1808, he was licensed by the New Jersey Presbytery and was ordained and installed pastor of the United First Church of Amwell,Ringoes, N.J., June 20, 1810, where he continued to labor for fifty-six years. He was one of the founders of the Hunterdon County Bible Society (1816), and also among the earliest and most energetic promoters of the temperance reform in that section. He died at Ringoes, N.J., May 2, 1866. Dr. Kirkpatrick was a man of a large and generous heart; his preaching was full of tenderness, pathos, and earnestness; his Christian character unassuming, and adorned with meekness and pietety.—Wilson, Presb. Historical Almanac, 1867. (J. L. S.)

Kirkpatrick, James, a noted minister of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, was the son of Hugh Kirkpatrick, a minister in Larrenan, Scotland, from about 1866 to the Revolution, when he retired to Dalry, Ireland, where he preached until 1691, then removed to Old Cumnock, and in 1696 again returned to Scotland, and died at Dalton in 1719. James was educated at Glasgow, entered the ministry, and became one of the most promising Irish Presbyterians in the pulpit. In 1706 he was the preacher of the second Belfast congregation. During the opposition of the House of Parliament to the Revolution, James Kirkpatrick became one of the ablest champions of the Presbyterian cause. In 1718 he published An Historical Essay upon the Loyalty of Presbyterians in Great Britain and Ireland from the Reformation to the present Year (Belfast, 1718, 4to), to which neither he nor the printer dared to affix their names, but made the book pass in his name. He published about 1720: Reid and Killen, Hist. Presb. Ch. in Ireland, iii, 91 sq.

Kirk-Sessions is the name of a petty ecclesiastical judicature in Scotland. Each parish, according to its extent, is divided into several particular districts, every one of which has its own elder and deacons to govern it. A Consistory of the ministers, elders, and deacons of a parish form a kirk-session. These meet once a week, the minister being their moderator, but without a negative voice. It regulates matters relative to public worship, elections, catechizing, visitations, membership, etc. It judges in matters of less scandal; but at Ballymacilgery, are left to the Presbytery; and in all cases an appeal lies from it to the Presbytery. The functions of the kirk-session were in former times too often inquisitorially exercised; but this is now less frequently attempted, and the danger of it is continuously diminishing through the growth of an enlightened public spirit. A former form of the kirk-session in Scotland often imposed fines, chiefly for offences against the seventh commandment; but this practice had no recognition in civil nor even in ecclesiastical law, and is now wholly relinquished. The kirk-session of the Established Church in each parish is fully recognised in Scottish law as having certain rights and duties with respect to the poor; but recent legislation has very much deprived it of its former importance in this relation. — Buck, s. v.; Chambers, s. v.

Kirkton, James, a Scottish divine, who flourished in the second half of the 17th century, is noted as the author of The First and True History of Church of Scotland from the Restoration to 1678, etc. (edited by C. K. Sharpe, Edinb. 1817, 4to), a work which has been highly commended by Sir Walter Scott (London Quart. Revue, xvii, 502 sq.). Kirkton died in 1699. —Blackwood's Magazine, ii, 905 sq.

Kirkwood, Robert, a Presbyterian minister, born in Paisley, Scotland, May 25, 1793, was educated in Glasgow College, and studied divinity with Rev. John Dick, D.D., at Theological Hall, Glasgow. He was licensed in 1828. In response to a pressing call for ministerial workers in New York, he went thither and connected himself with the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, under the Missionary Society of which he labored until 1830, when he became pastor at Cortlandville, N.Y. He officiated there and at Auburn and Sandbach, N.Y., until 1839, and then served as a domestic missionary for seven years in Illinois. For the next eleven years he labored as agent for the Bible and Tract Societies. In 1857 he transferred his connection from the Reformed to the Presbyterian Church, and settled at Yonkers, N.Y., devoting the remainder of his life to literary labor. He died August 26, 1885. In addition to numerous contributions to the Christian Intelligencer, New York Observer, and The Presbyterian, he published Lectures on the Millennium (New York, 1855); —Universalism Explained (New York, 1856) —A Plea for the Bible (New York, 1860); a very popular work and extensively sold; —Illustrations of the Offices of Christ (New York, 1868); and practical treatise on divine influences; together with a selection of sermons. Mr. Kirkwood having enjoyed the superior advantages of instruction by the distinguished Dr. Dick, was thoroughly and systematically trained in the great evangelical doctrines. His preaching was characterized by a practical scriptural tone. His "only peculiarity of doctrine was his pre-millennial views, in which, however, as his work on this subject shows, he was moderate, cautious, and never went to the extreme of fixing the time and season, which the Father has left to his own power. —Wilson, Presb. Kir-Moáb (Heb. Kir-Moab, כּיר-מּׁעַבָּא, fortress of Moab [see Kir]; Isa. xv, 1; Sept. τό ρίον τῆς Μωαβίδος, Vulg. murus Moab, Auth. Vera. "Kir of Moab"), usually KIR-HERES (Heb. Kir-cheres, כּיר-כּהֶרֶס, brick fortress, Jer. xlvii, 31, 86; Sept. πόλις τῆς Μωαβίδος, Vulg. murus fictilia; in pause πόλις τῆς Μωαβίδος, Isa. xvi, 11; Sept. πόλις τῆς Μωαβίδος, Vulg. murus fictilia; in pause πόλις τῆς Μωαβίδος, Jer. xlvii, 25; Sept. τό ρίον τῆς Μωαβίδος, Vulg. murus fictilia, Auth. Vera. "Kir-hereses"), or KIR-HARESITH (Heb. Kir-Chureseth, כּיר-כּוֹרֶסֶת, city, Isa. xvi, 7; Sept. τοίχος τῆς Μωαβίδος, 233, Vulg. murus fictilia; in pause πόλις τῆς Μωαβίδος, 2 Kings iii, 25; Sept. τό ρίον τῆς Μωαβίδος, Vulg. murus fictilia, Auth. Vera. "Kir-hareseth"), one of the two strongly fortified cities in the territory of Moab, the other being Ar of Moab. Jerom, king of Israel, took the city, and destroyed it, except the walls (2 Kings iii, 25); but it appears from the passages here cited that it must have been rebuilt before the time of Isaiah, and again destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar and the Babylonians. Num. (xxv, 1), the Chaldee paraphrast has put נַקַבָּא, nakava, karka ba-de-Moab, "the castle of Moab;" and the former of these words, pronounced in Arabic karka, kerak, or Krak, is the name it bears in 2 Macc. xii, 17 (Kapara, Charocho), in Sept. (Kaparaos, Characoma), in Psalm. lxx, 6, (Kapara, Characema), in Abulfeda (Tafs. spr. p. 89), and in the historians of the Crusades. Abulfeda (who places it twelve Arabic miles from Ar-Moab) describes Kerak as a small town, with a castle on a high hill, and remarks that it is so strong that one must deny himself even the wish to take it by force ( comp. 2 Kings iii, 25). In the time of the Crusades, and when in possession of the Franks, it was invaded by Saladin; but, after lying before it a month, he was compelled to raise the siege (Bohedenin, fūta Saladin, p. 55). The Crusaders had erected here a fortress still known as Kerak, which formed one of the centres of operations for the Latin Expedition of 1189. On the capture of these at length by Saladin after a long siege, in A.D. 1188, the dominion of the Franks over this territory ceased (Wilken, Kreuz i, 244-247). It was then the chief city of Arabia Secunda or Petraea, a name still used in the Belkadi, and is separated from 'Moab' or 'Rabbah, the ancient Ar-Moab, and from the Munā regula (Schultens, Index Geogr. s. v. Carra; see also the remarks of Gesenius, Jastrow, i, 517, and his notes to the German translation of Burchhardt). The Crusaders, in error, believed it to be Petra, and that Khiroba is frequently attached to it in the writings of William of Tyre and Jacob de Vitry (see quotations in Robinson, Bib. Reb., ii, 167). This error is perpetuated in the Greek Church to the present day; and the bishop of Petra, whose office, as representative of the patriarchate, is to produce the bell for Easter in the Church of the Sepulchre at Jerusalem (Stanley, S. and P., p. 467), is in reality bishop of Kerak (Seetzen, Reisen, ii, 388; Berkhartd, p. 887) (Smith). The first person who rated the place in modern times was Seetzen, who says, "Near to Kerak are a number of large villages which extend from Rabbah, and is broken only by low and detached hills, and the country now becomes mountainous. Kerak, formerly a city and bishop's see, lies on the top of the hill near the end of a deep valley, and is surrounded on all sides with lofty mountains. The hill is very steep, and in many places the sides are quite perpendicular. The walls round the town are for the most part destroyed, and Kerak can at present boast of little more than being a small country town. The castle, which is uninhabited, and in a state of great decay, was formerly one of the strong places not often in these countries. The inhabitants of the town consist of Mohammedans and Greek Christians. The present bishop of Kerak resides at Jerusalem. From this place one enjoys, by looking down the wady Kerak, a fine view of part of the Dead Sea, and even Jerusalem may be distinctly seen. From the hill on which the town stands lies a composed of limestone and bristle marl, with many beds of blue, black, and grey flint. In the neighboring rocks there are a number of curious grotoes; in those which are under ground wheat is sometimes preserved for a period of years" (Zach's Monatliche Correspond., xviii, 454). A fuller account of the place is given by Berkhartd. (Travels in Syria, p. 379-385), by whom it was next visited; and another description is furnished by Irby and Mangles (Travels, p. 361-370). From their account it would seem that the cavers noticed by Seetzen, the most important in the southern part of the town, are the sepulchres of the ancient town. We also learn that the Christians of Kerak (which they and Berkhartd call Kerke) are nearly as numerous as the Mohammedans, and boast of being stronger and braver (see Robinson's Researches, ii, 566-571). On account of the notoriously savage character of its Mohammedan inhabitants, it is often invaded by travelers. Lieut. Lynch, of the United States expedition to the Dead Sea, penetrated this fastness of banditti, having boldly seized the sheik and detained him as a hostage for their safety. He describes the town as situate near the Dead Sea, and the houses are composed of stone huts, built without mortar. They are seven from eight feet high; the ground floors about six feet below, and the flat terrace mud-roofs mostly about two feet above the streets; but in many places there were short cuts from street to street across the roofs of the houses. The houses, or rather huts, without windows and without chimneys, were blackened inside by smoke, and the women and children were squalid and filthy. Kerak contains a population of about 593 families; these include about 1000 Christians, who are kept in subjection by the Mohammedans. Most of the houses are wild-looking savages, but the Christians have a mild and hospitable character. The males mostly wear sheep-skin coats, the women dark-colored gowns; the Christian females did not conceal their faces, which were tattooed like the South Sea islanders. The entrance to Kerak is by a steep and crooked ravine, which is completely concealed by the summit by the castle. This latter, partly cut out of and partly built upon the mountain top, presents the remains of a magnificent structure, its cistern cut off from the town by a deep ditch. It seems to be Samerotic, although in various parts it has both the pointed Gothic and the rounded Roman arch, the work doubtless of the various masters into whose hands it has fallen during its eventful history. Its walls are composed of heavy, well-cut stones, with a steep glacis-wall surrounding the whole. It is of immense extent, having five gates, seven wells and cisterns, with subterranean passages, and seven arched store-houses, one above another, for purposes of defence (see Lynch's Narratives, p. 365-369). Mr. De Saulky also entered this "den of robbers," as he termed it, he added some particulars to the above description (Narratives, i, 392-393, 390). His account illustrates the character of the inhabitants, who have for many years been the terror of the vicinity (Porter, Handbook, p. 60; Schwarz, Palest- time, p. 216). See also Ritchie, i, 216, 317. A map of the site and a view of part of the keep will be found in the Atlas to De Saulky (La Mer Morte, etc., feuilles 8, 20). See Moab.

Kiran. Walter Blake, an eminent Irish divine, and one of the most celebrated and popular preachers of the last half of the 18th century, was born at Galway about 1730. He was educated at the college of the English Jesuits at St. Omer; was ordained priest, and was for a time professor of natural and moral philosophy at Louvain. Having embraced Protestantism in 1787, he became successively minister of St. Peter's Church, Dublin; prebendary of Howth, minister of St. Nicholas Without in 1790, and dean of Killala in 1800. He died in 1805. Few preachers of any age have enjoyed such popularity as Walter Blake Kirwan. So great was the throng to listen to his sermons that it was found necessary to defend the entrance of the church where he was to preach with great palisades. He was of a man of feelings, amiable and benevolent, and his irresistable powers of persuasion were chiefly devoted to the preaching of charity sermons. It is said that the collections taken up after his sermons seldom fell short of £1000. These addresses have been published under the title of Sermons, with a sketch of his life (London, 1814, 8vo). Kish (Heb. id., עִשָׂ, a trop, otherwise a horn; Sept. Kηκ, or Kηγ, or Κηγ, Auth. Ver. "Cis," Acts xxiii, 21), the name of five men.

1. The second of the two sons of Mahli (grandson of Levi); his sons married his cousins, heiresses of his brother Eleazar (1 Chron. xxiii, 21, 22). One of these sons was named Jerahmeel (1 Chron. xxiv, 29). B.C. cir. 1658.

2. A Benjamite of Jerusalem (i.e. the northern neighborhood of Jebus), third named of the sons of Jehiel (of Gibon) by Maaschah (1 Chron. viii, 30; ix, 66). B.C. apparently cir. 1618.

3. A wealthy and powerful Benjamite, son of Ner (1 Chron. viii, 33; ix, 66), and father of Zakkai (1 Sam. ix, 3; x, 11, 21; xiv, 51; 1 Chron. ix, 28; xii, 1; xxvi, 28). He was thus the grandson (1 Sam. ix, 1, "son [q.v.] of Abiel (q.v.) seen. No incident is mentioned respecting him excepting his sending Saul in search of the strayed asses (1 Sam. ix, 8), and that he was buried in Zelah (2 Sam. xxii, 14). B.C. 1093. In Acts xxii, 13 he is called Cis. See Saul.

4. A Levite of the family of Merari, son of Abdi, and one of those who assisted Hezekiah in restoring the true religion (2 Chron. xxxii, 12). B.C. 726.

5. A Benjamite, the father of Shimel, and great-grandfather of Mordecai (Esth. ii, 6). B.C. considerably ante 598.

Kish'tôn (1 Chron. vi, 44). See Kishaiha.

Kish'un (Heb. Kishyon, עִשְׂנּ, so called from the hardness of the soil; Sept. Kηκwν, Auth. Ver. "Kish- on" in Josh. xxxi, 28), a city of the tribe of Issachar (Josh. xix, 20, where it is mentioned between Reuben and Gad), assigned to the Levites of the family of Gershom, and for a place of refuge (Josh. xxxi, 20; elsewhere (1 Chron. vi, 72) called Kesh-en (q. v.). De Saulcy found ruins called Keshkeb (or Keshkebeh), an hour and a half's walk from Tell es-Serábel, commanding the north side of Mt. Tabor, which he inclined to identify with the ancient Kishon (Naruart, ii, 325, 326). Schwart, citing from Assur, places it 21/2 miles south of Chelseloth (Isa); but he appears to be misled by the analogy of the name of this place with that of the brook Kishon (Psal. lxv, 16), which has no connection in origin (see Havelock, iii, 241).

Kishon (Heb. Kishon, יִשְׂנֹן, Kishon; Sept. Κισσόν, Kisson), as in Ps. lxxxi, 6, or Kisson v. v. Kasôn, Auth. Vers. "Kison", a torrent or winter stream (נהר, A. V. "river") of central Palestine, the scene of two of the grandest achievements of Israelitish history—the defeat of Sisera (Judg. iv, 7, 18; v, 21), and the destruction of the prophets of Baal by Elijah (1 Kings xviii, 40). It formed the boundary between Manasseh and Zebulun (Judg. xxi, 11). Zeeck.) Some portion of it is also thought to be designated as the "waters of Megiddo" (Judg. v, 19). See Megiddo. The term coupled with the Kishon in Judg. v, 21, as a stream of the ancients יִשְׂנֹן, A. V. "that ancient river", has been very variously rendered by the old interpreters. 1. It is taken as a proper name, and thus apparently that of a distinct stream—in some MSS. of the Sept. Kasipon (see D'Arcy, Compendium, 286) by Jerome, Vulgate, torrens Cadumum; in the Peshito and Arabic versions, Karmin. This view is also taken by Benjamin of Tudela, who speaks of the river close to Acre (doubtless meaning thereby the Cedus) as the יִשְׂנֹן. It is possible that the term may refer to an ancient tribe of Kedumim—wanderers from the Eastern deserts—who had in remote antiquity settled on the Kishon or one of its tributary wadys. See Kedumim. 2. As an epithet of the Kishon itself: Sept. נִמְלְפֶה דָּרוֹשֶׁי; Aquila, καυνονως, perhaps intending to imply a scourching wind or sionoo as accompanying the rising of the waters; Symmachus, αιγων or αἰγῶν, perhaps alluding to the swift springing of the torrent (αἰγῶν is used for high waves by Artemidorus). The Targum, adhering to the signification "ancient," expands the sentence—"the torrent in which were shown sugars and wonders to Israel of old," and this miraculous torrent a later Jewish tradition (preserved in the Commentaries of Censorinus to which Brodor, ascribed to Jerome) would identify with the Red Sea, the scene of the greatest marvels in Israel's history. The rendering of the A. V. is supported by Mendelesohn, Gesenius, Ewald, and other modern scholars. The reference is to the vastness of the torrent. Scholars of its ancient Israelite Ca-naanite, as the plain adjoining the stream has always been the great battle-ground of Palestine. See Exa-Stron. For the Kishon of Josh. xxi, 28, see Kishon.

By Josephus the Kishon is never named, neither does the name occur in the early Itineraries of Abundius Augustus, or the Bordeux Flurgin. Eusebius and Jerome dismiss it in a few words, and note only its origin in Tabor (Onomast. Cicon), or such part of it as can be seen thence (Ep. ad Eustochium, § 13), passing by entirely its connection with Carmel. Benjamin of Tudela visited Akka and Carmel. He mentions the river by name as "Kishon," but only in the most cursory manner. Brodor (cir. 1500) describes the western portion of the stream with a little more fulness, but enlarges most on its upper or eastern part, which, with the victory of Barak, he places on the east of Tabor and Hermon, as discharging the water of those mountains into the Sea of Galilee (Deser. Terra S. cap. 6, 7). This has been shown by Dr. Robinson (Joh. Res. ii, 364) to allude to the wady el-Birch, which runs down to the Jordan a few miles above Scythopolis.

The Kishon is beyond all doubt the river now called Nahr el-Maskout (or el-Maskuto), which, after traversing the plain of Acre, enters the bay of the latter name at its south-east corner. It has been usual to trace the source of this river to Mount Tabor (as above by Jose- phus), but Dr. Robinson affirms that it is found by following along the south-eastern brow of Mount Carmel he had an opportunity of seeing the sources of the river Kishon, three or four of which lie within less than a furlong of each other, and are called Ras el-Kishon, or the head of the Kishon. These alone, without the lesser contributions near by, would, if the stream were continued for half as large as the sea. During the rainy season all the waters which fall upon the eastern side of Carmel, or upon the rising grounds to the southward, empty themselves into it in a number of torrents, at which time the Kishon, as it overflows its banks, acquires vast dimensions, upholds a strong current, and carries all before it. It was doubtless in such a season that the host of Sisera was swept away in attempting to ford it. But such inundations are only occasional, and of short duration, as is indeed implied in the destruction in its waters of the fugitives, who doubtless expected to pass it safely. The current of the stream, as estimated from the sources thus indicated, is not more than seven miles. It runs very briskly till within half a league of the sea; but when not augmented by rains, it never falls into the sea in a full stream, but insensibly percolates through a bed of sand, with which the winds have thrown up at its mouth. It was in this state that Shaw himself found it in the month of April, 1722, when it was crossed by him.

Notwithstanding Shaw's contradiction, the assertion that the Kishon derives its source from Mount Tabor has been adopted by modern travellers from its proximity to that peak, as by their ancient predecessors (Summer Rambles, i, 281). Buckingham's statement, being made with reference to the view from Mount Tabor itself, deserves attention. He says that near the foot of the mountain on the south-west are "the springs of the Ain es-Sherar, which send a perceptible stream through the centre of the plain of Esraelon, and form the brook Kishon of antiquity." Further on, the same traveller, on reaching the hills which divide the plain of Esraelon from that of Acre, saw the pass through which the river makes its way from the one plain to the other (Traveler in Palestine, i, 168, 177). Shaw also states that the sources of the Kishon are at a village called Sheik Arab, south-west of Tabor (Palez. p. 166). On further inquiry, and more extensive comparison of observations made at different times of the year, it will probably be found that the river issues from Mount Tabor, but that the supply from this source is cut off in early summer, when it ceases to be maintained by rains or contributory torrents; whereas the copious supply from the nearer springs at Ras el-Kishon, with other springs lower down, keep it up from that point to the Jordan during the whole of the rainy season. (See Kitto's Pict. Hist. of Palestine, p. 62.) Maritsi (ii, 112) mentions the case of the English drago- man who was drowned, and his horse with him, in the attempt to cross this temporary stream from Mt. Tabor, in Feb. 1761. During the battle of Mount Tabor, between the French and Arabs, April 16, 1799, many of the latter were drowned in their attempt to cross a stream coming from Debureih, which then inundated the plain (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 389). Monro, who crossed the river early in April (in its lower or perennial part), in 1799, gives the order of the river as follows: "Mr. Robinson describes it as traversing the plain of Esraelon. The river, where he crossed it, in a boat, was then thirty yards wide. In the plain from Solam to Nazareth he crossed a considerable brook, and afterwards some others, which flow into a small lake on the northern side of the plain, and eventually contribute to swell the Kishon" (Rambles, i, 55, 281). Dr. Robinson says that this account corresponds with channels that he observed (Biblical Researches, iii, 280). Prokere also, in April, 1829, when travelling directly from Ramleh to Nazareth, entered the plain of Esraelon on which he could not find a single spring, but which was flowing in a deep bed through marshy ground; and after wandering about for some time to find his way

though the morass, he was at last set right by an Arab, who pointed out the proper ford (Reise ins H. Land, p. 125). The scriptural account of the overthrow of Sisera ens last manifestly shows that the stream crossed the plain, and must have been of considerable size. The above arguments, to show that it did so, and still does so, are confirmed by Dr. Robinson, who adds that "not improbably, in ancient times, when the country was perhaps more wooded, there may have been permanent streams throughout the whole plain." The transaction of the prophet Elijah, who, after his sacrifice on Carmel, commanded the priests of Baal to be slain at the river Kishon, requires no explanation, seeing that it took place at the perennial lower stream. This also explains, what has sometimes been asked, whence, in that time of drought, the water was obtained with which the prophet inducted his altar and sacrifice.

The Kishon is, in fact, the drain by which the waters of the plain of Esraelion, and of the mountains which inclose that plain, namely, Carmel and the Samaria ranges on the south, the mountain of Gailee on the north, and Gilboa, "Little Hermon" (so called), and Tabor on the east, find their way to the Mediterranean. Its course is in a direction nearly due north-west along the lower part of the plain nearest the foot of the Samaria hills, and close beneath the very cliffs of Carmel, breaking through the hills which separate the plain of Esraelion from the maritime plain of Acre, by a very narrow pass, beneath the eminence of Harothieh or Harb, which is believed by some still to retain a trace of the name of Harosheth of the Gentiles. It has two principal feeders: the first from Debether (Dalethatha), on Mount Tabor, the north-east angle of the plain; and, secondly, from Jebeln (Gilboa) on the south-east. It is also fed by the copious spring of Lejjoun, the stream from which is probably the "waters of Megiddo" (Porter, Handbook, p. 385). The highest sources of the Kishon on the south-east is the large fountain of Jenin, the ancient En-gannim, the water from which, increased by a number of the streamlets from the surrounding hills, flows westward across the plain through a deep channel during the winter months; but in summer this channel, like the northern one, is perfectly dry (Van de Velde, Travels, i, 362). The two channels unite at a point a few miles north of the site of Megiddo. The channel of the united stream is here deep and miry, the ground for some distance on each side is low and marshy, and the fords during winter are always difficult, and often, after heavy rain, impassable; yet in summer, even here, the whole plain and the river bed are dry and hard (Robinson, ii, 364). These facts strikingly illustrate the narrative of the defeat of Sisera. The battle was fought on the south bank of the Kishon, at Megiddo (Judg. iv. 14; v. 19). While the battle raged a violent storm of wind and rain came on (Judg. v. 4, 20; comp. Josephus, Ant. v. 5, 4). In a short time the hard plain was turned into a marsh, and the dry river-bed into a foaming torrent. The Canaanites were driven back on the river by the fiery attack of Barak and the fury of the storm; for "the earth trembled, the heavens dropped...the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." The war-horses and chariots dashing madly through the marshy ground made it much worse; and the soldiers, in trying to cross the swollen torrent, were swept away.

But, like most of the so-called "rivers" of Palestine, the perennial stream forms but a small part of the Kishon. During the greater part of the year (as above noted) its upper portion is dry, and the stream confined to a few miles next the sea. The sources of this perennial portion proceed from the roots of Carmel—the "vast fountains called Sa'diyeh, about three miles east of Chais" (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 140), and those, apparently still more copious, described by Shaw (Robinson, ii, 365), as bursting forth from beneath the eastern brow of Carmel, and discharging of themselves "a river half as big as the Lea." It enters the sea at the lower part of the bay of Akka, about two miles east of Chais, "in a deep, tortuous bed, between banks of loamy soil some fifteen feet high, and fifteen to twenty yards apart" (Porter, Handbook, p. 388). Between the mouth and the town the shore is lined by an extensive grove of date-palms, one of the finest in Palestine (Van de Velde, i, 289). The part of the Kishon at which the prophets of Baal were slaughtered by Elijah was loutless close below the spot on Carmel where the sacrifice had taken place. This spot is now fixed with all but certainty at the extreme east end of the mountain, to which the name is still attached of Et-Mahraka, the "burning." See Canaan. Nowhere does the Kishon run so close to the mountain as just beneath this spot (Van de Velde, i, 924). It is about 1000 feet above the river, and a precipitous ravine leads directly down, by which the victims were perhaps hurried from the sacred precincts of the altar of Jehovah to their doom in the torrent bed below, at the foot of the mound, which from this circumstance may be called tell Kheda, the hill of the priests. Whether the Kishon contained any water at this time we are not told; that required for Elijah's sacrifice was in all probability obtained from the spring on the mountain side below the plateau of Et-Mahraka. At the mouth of the river are banks of fine sand, which any unusual swell in the river converts into dangerous quicksands (Van de Velde, i, 289).

The modern name Nahr el-Mukata some have thought means "the river of slaughter," in allusion to the slaughter of the prophets of Baal on its banks; but the name may also signify "river of the ford," from another meaning of the same root (compare Robinson, ii, 366); the latter is the interpretation given of the name by the people of the country.—Kitto; Smith. KISS. (Psa. Ixxxiii. 9). See KISHON.

Kiss (קִשָּׁה, miskheh; Gr. φιλία, to love, and derivatives). Originally the act of kissing had a symbolical character. The "signs of language, expressive of tender affection and respect. It appears from the case of Laban and Jacob (Gen. xxix. 13) that this method of salutation was even then established and recognised as a matter of course. In Gen. xxvi. 26, 27, a kiss is a sign of affection between a parent and child; in Cant. viii. 1, between a lover and his bride. It was also, as with some modern nations, a token of friendship and regard bestowed when friends or relations met or separated (Tobit vii. 6; x. 12; Luke vii. 45; xv. 20; Acts xx. 57; Matt. xxvii. 46; 2 Sam. xx. 9); the same custom is still observed in the East, and to this day the people of Armenia, Barzai, the Egyptians (see Gen. xlvi. 255). The Church of Ephesus wept sore at Paul's departure, and fell on his neck and kissed him. When Orpheus quitted Naomi and Ruth (Ruth i. 14), after the three had lifted up their voice and wept, she "kissed her husband and her three sons, and her daughter-in-law, Elimelech's wife." (Ruth iv. 11) (KJV). The act of kissing the feet was in the Roman law a sign of subjection and obedience, which was sometimes carried so far that the print of the foot received the kiss, as, for example, in the case of a Roman citizen when he became sacred by the royal touch, or that the subject was not worthy to salute even the prince's feet, but was content to kiss the earth itself near or on which he trod (Isa. xl. 38; Micah vii. 17; Psa. Ixxxii. 9; comp. Gen. xxxi. 40; 1 Sam. xvi. 24, 25; 2 Sam. xiv. 8; 2 Kings xiii. 20; Luke xv. 20; Tobit vii. 6; x. 12; 2 (between brothers, or near male relatives or intimate friends (Gen. xxix. 18; xxxii. 4; xiv. 15; Exod. iv. 27; 1 Sam. xix. 41)); (iv) by using the act of kissing between persons not related, but of equal rank, whether friendly or deceitful, is mentioned (2 Sam. xx. 9; Psa. lxxv. 10; Prov. xxvii. 6; Luke vii. 45 [1st clause]; xxii. 48; Acts xx. 57); (v) as a mark of a real or affected convergence; not distant from the inferior (Luke vii. 38, 45, and perhaps vii. 44). In other cases the kiss is imprinted on the beard (see Arvieux, ii. 182); sometimes on the head (see D'Orville, Ad Chariton, viii. 4), which was then taken hold of by the hand (3 Sam. xix. 9). Among the Arabs the women and children kiss the beards of their husbands or fathers. The superior returns the salute by a kiss on the forehead. Kissing the hand of another appears to be a modern practice. In Egypt an inferior kisses the hand of a superior, generally on the back, but sometimes, as a special favor, on the palm also. To testify abjurate subscription, and in asking favors, the feet are often kissed instead of the hand (Luke vii. 38), "The son kisses the hand of his father, the wife that of her husband, the slave and the often free servant, that of the master. The slaves and servants of a grandee kiss their lord's sleeve, or the skirt of his clothing" (Lane, Mod. Eg. ii. 9; compare Arvieux, Trac. p. 151; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 369; Niebuhr, Voy. i. 329; ii. 83; Layard, Nine. i. 174; Wellsted, Arabia, i. 341; Malcolm, Sketches of Persia, p. 271). Friends saluting each other join the right hand of each kiss his own hand and puts it to his lips and forehead, or breast; after a long kiss, they embrace each other, kissing first on the right side of the face or neck, and then on the left, or on both sides of the beard (Lane, ii. 9, 10; comp. Irby and Mangles, p. 110; Charleyn, Voyage, iii. 421; Burckhardt, Notes, ii. 869; Russell, Isopo, i. 249). The passage of Isaiah ii. 27, "Or my mouth hath kissed my hand," is not in point (see Menken, Dissert. in p. 1, Lipsius, 1717; Doughtie, Anteclear, i. 211; Kissinger, in the Nov. Miscell. Lyp. i. 580; Böttiger, Kunstsgesch. i. 52); and refers to idolatrous modes of worship. (See Layard, Ninev. and Babylon, Regiom. 1698), namely, the adoration of the heavenly bodies (comp. Cicero, Ver. iv. 48; Gesenius, Comment. on Isa. xiil. 22). See Adoration. It was the custom to throw kisses towards the images of the gods, and towards the sun and moon (1 Kings xiii. 16; Hos. xii. 2, 5; comp. Isa. xvi. 20; Jer. x. 5; De Salt. c. 17; Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxvi. 5). The kising of princes was a token of homage (Psa. xi. 2; 1 Sam. xi. 1; Xenophon, Cyrop. viii. 5, 82). So probably in Gen. xii. 40, "Upon thy mouth shall all my people kiss," where the Auth. vera interprets, "According to thy word shall all my people be ruled" (see Gesenius, Thesaurus Heb. p. 922). We may compare the Mohammedan custom of kissing the Kaaba at Mecca (Burckhardt, Trav. i. 250, 256, 323; Crichton, Arabia, ii. 215). Xenophon says (Apoll. v. 4) that it was a national custom with the Persians, who were the "most divine people of the world." A curious passage to this effect may be found in the Cyropædis (i. 4, 27). Kissing the feet of princes was a token of subjectification, and sometimes carried so far that the print of the foot received the kiss, and as such was a mark of real "submission." The feet were some sacred by the royal touch, or that the subject was not worthy to salute even the prince's feet, but was content to kiss the earth itself near or on which he trod (Isa. xl. 38; Micah vii. 17; Psa. lxxxii. 9; comp. Gen. xxxi. 40; 1 Sam. xvi. 24, 25; Matt. xxviii. 9; see Dion Cass. lix. 27; Seneca, De Beneficiis, ii. 17). Similar usages prevail among the Orientals to the present day (see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 208; Layard, Ninev. i. 274; Harmer, Obs. i. 336; Niebuhr, Travels, iv. 414; compare Assemani, Bibl. Ori., iii. 77; Othon, Lex. Rhod. p. 238; Darbeur. Chron. p. 148, 193, 503). The Rabbins, in the medievals, scrupulous, and falsely delicate spirit which animated much of what they wrote, did not permit more than three kinds of kisses—the kiss of reverence, of reception, and of dismissal (Schorah Raba on Gen. xxix. 11).

The peculiar tendency of the Christian religion to encourage a kindred spirit to this, and to men, as men, to substitute and develop the softer affections, and, in the trying condition of the early Church, to make its members intimately known to one another, and unite them in the closest bonds, led to the observance of kissing as an accompanying feature of the new order of things, and in the Church the kissing of the feet was the very cradle of our religion. (See Coteler, Ad constitut. Apost. i. 57; Fessel, Aedera. sacr. p. 283.) Hence the exhortation, "Salute each other with a holy kiss" (Rom. xvi. 16; see also 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26; in 1 Pet. v. 14 it is termed "a kiss of charity"). It "might, perhaps, be understood among the members of the Church that the kiss was to be exchanged between persons of the same sex only, though no direction to this effect is found in the apostolic epistles, and it is known that in process of time the heathen took occasion from the practice to reproach the Christians for looseness of manners. On this account care was taken (as appears from the Apostolical Constitutions) to maintain in respect to it the distinction of sexes; but the practice itself was kept up for centuries, especially in connection with the celebration of the Supper. It was regarded as the special token of perfect reconciliation and accord among the members of the Church, and was called simply the peace (sinejyn), or the kiss of peace (osculum pacis). It was exchanged in the Eastern Church before, but in the Western after the consecration prayer. Ultimately, however, it in part took its place as a symbol of Christian fellowship, or a part of any Christian solemnity" (Fairbairn). (See Apost. Constit. ii. 67; vii. 11; Just. Mart. Apol. i. 65; Palmer, On Lit.)

An-apeut. b. xii, c. iv, § 5, vol. iv, 49; b. ii, c. xi, § 10, vol. i, 181; b. ii, c. xix, § 17, vol. i, 272; b. iv, c. vi, § 14, vol. i, 526; b. xxii, c. iii, § 6, vol. viii, 546; see also Cod. Just. V. Tit. iii, 16; de Dom. ante Nupt.; Brande, Pop. Antiq. ii, 87). The peculiar circumstances have now vanished which gave propriety and emphasis to such an expression of brotherly love and Christian friendship. (See Wemys, Christ. Symbolica, s. v.). The kiss of peace still forms part of the Rites of the Church. It is given immediately before the communion; the clergyman who celebrates mass kisses the altar, and embracing the deacon, saying, "Fæx tibi, frater, et eccliesia sancte Dei," the deacon does the same to the subdeacon, saying," Fæx tecum;" the latter then salutes the others.

Kissing the foot or toe has been required by the popes as a sign of respect from the secular power since the 8th century. The first who received this honor was pope Constantine I. It was paid him by the emperor Justinian II, on his entry into Constantinople in 710. Valentinian, about 827, required every one to kiss his foot, and from that time this mark of reverence appears to have been expected by all popes. When the ceremony takes place, the pope wears a slipper with a cross, which is kissed. In more recent times, Protestants have not been required to kiss the pope's foot, but merely to bend the knee slightly. SeeADORATION.

Kistemaker, Johann Hyacinthus, a celebrated Roman Catholic theologian, was born August 15, 1754, at Northorn, in Hanover, and was educated at the University of Münster. He was ordained priest Dec. 22, 1777, but filled the rostrum instead of the pulpit, and became quite celebrated for his attainments as a linguist. In 1786 he was elected professor of philology at his alma mater, and in 1795 was transferred to the chair of bibliology in the University of Leyden. He died March 2, 1884. Of his numerous works we have room here only for the titles of those most important in theology, which are, Commentatio de nova lexREG. praepium Veteris Testamenti ex collata scriptoribus Graecis et Romanis scriptis (Münster, 1806); — Exeg. A. Bland. über Matt. xvi, 18, 19, s. i, xix, 3-12, oder über den Prinzip Petr und das Ehrenb.- Exegesis critica in Psalmos Ivi. et cix, et excursum in Daniel iii de fornis ignis (1809) — Weingang Jesu vom Gericht über Judas und die Welt, etc. (1816) — Canonis conciliorum illustratum ex Hieroglogia Orientalis (1818) — Weingang vom Inmanuel (1824) — and especially Biblia sacra Vulgate editione juxta exemplar Vaticanum (1824, 3 vols.), dedicated to pope Leo XII; and his translation of the New Testament (1825), which is largely circulated among the Roman Catholics of Germany. Kite (ΠΥΓ, ayyah), so called from its clamorous cry: Seph. levir v. r.tirpow, Vulg. vulter; but in Job, xxxvii, 7, yqf, Auth. Version "vulture," an unclean and keen- sighted bird of prey (Lev. xi, 14; Deut. xiv, 13). The version of Pseudo-Jonathan has the Black vulture; the Venetian Greek κακοδαμος, or κακοδαμος; Kimchi נשק, or מגש; Saadia and Abenabad the male horned owl—most of which are evidently more conjectures, with litmany meaning of which, according to Schulten, is ‘to turn.’ If this derivation be the true one, it is not improbable that ‘kite’ is the correct rendering. The habit is which birds of this genus have of sailing in circles, with the rudder-like tail by its inclination governing the curve, as Yarrell says, accords with the Arabic derivation. Wood (in his Mammals, p. 386) inclines to adopt Tristram’s identification of the Red kite (Milvus regalis), which is scattered all over Palestine, feeding chiefly on the smaller birds, mice, reptiles, and fish. Its piercing sight and soaring habits peculiarly suit the passage in Job. See VULTURE.

Kithlish (Heb. Kithlish, קיתליש, prob. for בְּקִית לֶשׁ, a man’s seat; Sept. Ἀθάλος v. v. Καλάς and ἁρπακός, Vulg. Cerialis), a town in the valley or plain (Shebna-) of Judah, mentioned between Lachish and Gederoth (Josh. xv. 40); evidently situated in the south-western group, possibly at the mound and some foundations called Jesimeh (Robinson, Researches ii, 386), on wady el-Heroy, between Gaza and Lachish (Van de Velde, Map). A writer in Fairbairn’s Dictionary, however, gives the site el-Moses given by Smith (in Robinson’s Res. iii, Appendix, p. 119) in this vicinity; but this is not laid down on any map, if, indeed, it be not the same place as the above. The derivation proposed by the same writer for the name Kithlish, from יָקַטֵל, to crush, and לֶשׁ, a lion, as if it were the local emblem of the place, is fastened, and unwarranted by any allusion of the kind in the text; the form, the version, would then have been יָקִיתלֶשׁ.

Kitron (Heb. Kitron, קיתרון, khitron, otherwise curtained, or cistle; Sept. Κερύς v. v. Κιτρόν, and even Χιτρόν, a city of Zebulon from which the Israelites were long unable to expel the native Canaanites (Judg. i. 30). It is very possibly the same elsewhere called Kattath (Josh. xix. 10), notwithstanding the objection of Keil (Comment. on Josh. ad loc.) that this and all the other names are not distinct cities, in order to make up the number twelve there specified: for even thus the number will be incomplete, without either supposing the text corrupt or borrowing from those enumerated in the preceding verses (doubtless the true solution), in either of which cases these three names, so nearly identical (Kattath, Kartath, Kitron), may be assigned to one place. Schwarz (Palest., p. 178), on Tell-Mudjans grounds, apparently incorrectly, identifies it with Sephoris (q. v.).

Kittim (Gen. x. 4; 2 Chron. i. 7). See CHITTIM.

Kittle, Andrew N., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Kinderhook, N.Y., in 1765, educated at Union College in 1804, studied theology under Dr. Froeligh and Livingston, and entered the ministry in 1806. Until 1846 he was successively pastor of the churches of Red Hook Landing and of St. John’s, Linnitho, Upper Red Hook, and Stayversant. Early consecrated to the Lord, he was an able, vigorous, and indefatigable minister of Jesus Christ. Though he was of the school of a theological scholar, possessed of strong common sense, and fond of reading, his retiring disposition kept him aloof from the agitating controversies and public excitement of the times. Aspiring only to be a preacher and pastor, he dwelt among his people until the infirmities of age constrained him to give up the active ministry. He died in 1864. Kittle was a man of fine features and noble form, a dignified Christian gentleman, and a true man of God.—Corwin, Manual of Ref. Church, p. 126. (W. J. R. T.)

Kitt, John, one of the most eminent Biblical scholars of this age, was born at Plymouth, England, Nov. 4, 1804. To humble birth was added, in his twelfth year, the loss of his paternal fortune; and neither poverty nor bodily defect were sufficient to extinguish the ambitious and energetic youth from the acquisition of knowledge. Every effort that could possibly be put forth to secure books was made; to pay for a few books from a circulating library, he grooped for old iron and ropes in Sutton Pool, and with the few pence obtained by this irksome task he supplied himself with the elements of an education. The destitution of his parents obliged them at last to place John in the "workhouse" at Plymouth, where he was admitted Nov. 18, 1819, and taught him the culture of the ground. In this way, however, he learned the rudiments of the art, and his knowledge of the Bible and the skillful Soon asserted his position against older and stronger boys, and here he began in 1820 a diary which is still preserved, and large excerpts from which have been printed in his Works. It contains many self-portraits, physical and mental, and shows the growth of a mind to literary tastes and ambition. In his trade, however, he was often so dull and dispirited that he called himself "John the Comfortless," and twice had thoughts of bringing his life to a premature end. In 1821 he was hired out to a shoemaker, but his awkwardness and tendency to books greatly irritated his master, and John was submitted to such harsh treatment that he was readmitted to the workhouse about six months later. In the year following he finally brought out some essays in Nettleton's Plymouth Journal. These efforts attracted attention, and the wise and self-controlled interposition of several gentlemen removed to Exeter to become a dentist. In 1825 he published a volume of Essays and Letters, which, though it afforded him but a small pecuniary remuneration, secured him many friends, made him known, and generally known, and secured him in a complete change of basis for life. Instead of perfecting himself in the art of dentistry, he accepted an offer to enter the Missionary College at Islington, where he was to be taught the art of printing with a view to service in some foreign missionary institution. In June, 1827, he was sent out to Malta; but, his health declining, he returned to England in 1829. Shortly after this he became connected with the Missionary Schools at Malta; but, his health declining, he returned to England in 1833. Through the influence of friends he gained attention by a series of papers in the Penny Magazine (one of these under the suggestive title "The Defaul Traveller"), and by other literary efforts.

In 1838 Kitti finally entered upon the preparation of that class of works which have so justly secured him a prominent place in the field of letters. In this year Mr. Charles Knight, then the editor of the Penny Magazine, suggested to Kitti the preparation of a "Theological Bible." All that Kitti needed was the suggestion. He not only eagerly embraced the proposal, but earnestly entreated to be allowed to undertake the responsibility of the entire work. The expiration of scarcely more than two years saw the Pictorial Bible finished (new ed. 1847, 4 vols. 8vo), and shortly after (in 1838) he embodied a great portion of his experience in Persia in two small volumes, Uncle Oliver's Travels. Next followed (1839-40) a Biblical History of Palestine and the Holy Land. From 1841 to 1843 he found employment in preparing the letter-press for the Gallery of Scripture Engravings, in 8 vols. In 1843 he wrote a History of Palestine (published by A. and C. Black, of Edinburgh), and Thoughts among Flowers (published by the Religious Tract Society). In 1845 he prepared The Pictorial Sunday Book, and commenced the work which, in its extant form (4th edition), still continues to be one of the best works of the kind in any language, the Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature. See DICTIONARIES, BIBLICAL. Though the work already accomplished (up to 1848) the degree of D.D. at Würzburg by his able dissertation, De chilicismo primoriorum subseculorum. In 1827 he wrote a treatise on Acurial Conflation, and in 1829 a commentary on the Gospel of St. John. He acquired at the same time great popularity at Mayence as a preacher. So great, indeed, was his renown, that several high-sounding collegians endeavored to secure him, but he finally accepted a call to Heidelberg University. He met with great satisfaction to the strict Roman Catholic party, but had a long and severe controversy with Hermes (q.v.) and the Hermeses, who were then protected by the archbishop. Klee taught the popular doctrine that faith was the basis of all theology; Hermes, on the other hand, inclined more to accept philosophy as its basis. With Klee, who evidently endeavored to infuse into the theological system of Romanism a philosophical method-objective reason, revelation, Christianity, the Roman Catholic Church, all having the same origin, must naturally constitute part of an indivisible whole, which it remained only for subjective reason to prove by the testimony of history, and to arrange in obedience to faith. Thus, with him, the definition of religion was chiefly objective: "Religion is a union between God, as truth and love, and man, as reason and will." A similar definition is recognized by revelation on the part of God, and by faith on the part of man; "The Church is Christianity in its present state and activity; "The Church, in its nature, is such as Christ has made it;" "The inward and outward wards of the Church is established and preserved by the hierarchy;" "It is the most perfect Christian-human-polity;" "Christ established the primacy in order to preserve the unity of the hierarchy." He argued against Hermes that the Roman Catholic doctrine of faith has for the theologian and thinker the same authoritative evidence as the empirical laws of nature for the student of natural philosophy. This is lost sight of the fact that nature is the result of necessary laws, and a pure action of God, while Church tradition is but the result of historical freedom, which we find full of defects, and has therefore to be judged on the ground of its origin and of its continued validity. In his theory Klee was a Kantian, but in practice he was an ardent Roman Catholic apologist. It may even be questioned whether the strong traditionalistic faith of Klee and his school, which permits only a historical demonstration of the truth of revelation, has rendered any great and lasting service to Roman Catholic theology. Klee's system coincides with the final development of abstract Protestant supranaturalism, inasmuch as he makes the truth of the whole system of revelation to depend upon historical proofs. Nevertheless his system is much more dangerous than Hermes'. He placed the latter idea of theological certainty with confidence of faith, Klee identified philosophy with ecclesiastical Christianity itself. He gave permanent form to these doctrines in System der Kultur. Dogmatik (Bonn, 1881). When Clement August became archbishop, Klee's system prevailed; he was appointed examiner, and his lectures on dogmatics, which had always been well attended, were crowded. The exile of the archbishop, however, changed his position, and he accepted a call to Munich in 1839. He died there July 28, 1841. Besides the above mentioned works he wrote Commentary über d. Apost. Paulus Sententiarum c. d. Römer (Mentz, 1830); —Encycl. d. Theologie (ibid. 1832); —Auslegung d. Briefes a. d. Hebräer (ibid. 1833) —Die Eke (ibid. 1833) —D. Kalth. Dogmatik (ibid. 1834-45, 8 vols.; 3d ed. 1844) —Dogmengeschichte (ibid. 1835-37, 2 vols.). His Grundriss d. Kultur. Moral was published after his death (in 1843) by Himobien. See, besides the authorities cited in the article Hermes, Hermann, Real-Encyclopädie, vii, 711; Wetscher und Weite, Kirchen-Leh. vi, 213 sq.; Migne, Conclusions, p. 1239.

Kleefker, Bernhard, a German preacher of distinction, was born at Hamburg Jan. 12, 1790, and was educated at the university, where he entered in 1797, and where, under the instruction of that eminent German pulpit orator Zollkoffer, he laid the foundation for his future excellence as a preacher. In May, 1791, he was called as regular preacher to Osnabrück, and, after a stay of six years, removed there in 1797 to assist the city to assume the pastorate of St. James's Church. Here he labored with great acceptance and success until his death, June 10, 1825. Though Kleefker aimed to emulate successfully in the pulpit, his literary efforts were not so successful. He published, besides several works on practical religion and deism, also a homiletic magazine (Homiletisches Ideenmagazin, 1809-19, 8 vols. 8vo) — Praktische Vorlesungen u. d. N. Test. (1811-12, 3 vols. 8vo). See Göring, Deutscher Kunstges. p. 136 sq.

Klein, Friedrich August, a German theologian, was born at Friedrichshaide, near Ronsberg, Nov. 7, 1798; entered the University of Jena in 1811, and became a minister at Jena in 1819; but only two years later he was suddenly taken ill, and died Feb. 12, 1823, having a year before his death received the honorable appointment of professor of theology at the university. Klein published in 1817 Fortwarte Briefe an Christisches u. Protestantismus, and in 1817 began with Schröter the publication of the theological journal für Christentum und GottheitsGelehrtheit. Of his other publications the following deserve our notice: Belehrung der Geistlichen (1818, 2 vols. 8vo) — Der Glaube der Religionslehrer des 19. Jahrh. (1823, 2 vols. 8vo) — Dogmatik d. evang. prot. Kirche (1829, 2 vols.). See Göring, Deutche Theologen Deutschland, ii, 108 sq. (J. H. W.)

Klein, Georg Michael, a German Roman Catholic priest, was born at Alzilheim in 1777, and was educated at the high-school in Würzburg. He was ordained priest in 1798, but, securing the favor of a celebrated German philosopher Schelling, Klein thereafter devoted himself zealously to the study of metaphysics. He became professor at Würzburg in 1804, and in 1806 removed to Bamberg in the same capacity. In 1811 he became professor of philosophy at the University of Jena, but in 1818 he returned again to Würzburg. He died in 1819. His works are, Beiträge zum Studium der Philosophie des All (Würzb. 1803, 8vo) — Verstandeshilfe (1810) — Versuch d. Ethik als Wissenschaft zu begründen (Rudolstadt, 1811, 8vo) — Der Weg zur reinen Religion (Würzb. 1818, 8vo) — by far his ablest work. — Kalth. Real-Encycol. xi, 850.

Kleinhnecht, Conrad Daniel, a German theologian, was born at Leiplighe Aug. 22, 1791, and was educated at the University of Jena. By advice of the celebrated Orientalist and theologian Baddeus, in whom Kleinhnecht found a warm friend, he accepted a position as teacher in the Orphanage of Halle, which he held until 1719. In 1725 he became pastor at Pului, in 1731 at Leiplighe, and died July 11, 1753. He was especially active in behalf of missions, and sought to interest the state authorities for them. For a list of his writings, see Göring, Deutche Theologen Deutschland, ii, 115 sq.

Klemm, Johann Christian, a German theologian, born at Stuttgart Oct. 22, 1688, was the son of Johann Conrad Klemm, who, at the time of his death in 1717, was professor of theology at Tubingen. Young Klemm was educated at the universities of Stuttgart and Tubingen, and secured the degree of A.M. in 1707. Shortly after he began to lecture at the university, in 1717 he became professor extraordinary of philosophy, in 1725 of theology, and the year following of the Oriental languages. The degree of D.D. was bestowed upon him in 1730. He was promoted to a full regular professorship in 1736. He died Oct. 1, 1754. A list of his works is given by Göring, Deutche Theologen Deutschland, ii, 118 sq. See also Allgemeines Hnt. Lex. u. v.; Frier, Universal-Lexikon, u. v.

Kleptomania (κλεφτω, to steal, and μανία, madness), a form of partial mental derangement which is manifested by a propensity to steal and hoard articles. that can be surreptitiously appropriated. The propensity to acquire becomes, in such cases, so irresistible, and the will so impotent, that the appropriation is generally regarded as involuntary, and the perpetrator, therefore, irresponsible; but, in order to constitute a case of moral irresponsibility, it should undoubtedly be shown on the face of the sworn statement that there would always be superadded those of intellectual disorder, the assumption being that so long as the intellect is unperverted the person will be found to possess a consciousness of the nature of the criminal act in relation to law. The plea of insanity in the legal sense must not be admitted unless it is evident that the subject is perfectly aware of the tendency of his or her actions; the simple moral inability to resist this temptation is only in the same predicament with that of every unquestioned candidate for the penitentiary or gallows. A state which may seem to deserve the name of moral insanity, as exhibiting a perversion of the moral sentiments, tendencies, and perceptions, with a loss, to a great extent, of self-control, is often prominent in the early stages of mental disease, and before the intellect is palpably affected. Up to this point the patient should undoubtedly be held personally responsible for his or her conduct in a criminal sense. When certain delusions, when delirium or incoherency supervene, the case then, without question, may be set down as that of insanity, which would absolve the patient from responsibility. The question here suggests itself: is not this a great and important fact to know—how nearly are they allied to insanity, and how far can they be urged as extenuating, or even excusing, misdemeanors or crimes? This strange thraldom to a morbid prompting not infrequently has its outlet in crimes of the deepest dye. When lord Byron was sailing from Greece to Constantinople, he was observed to stand over the sleeping body of an Albanian with a pontiff in his hand, and after a while to turn away muttering, "I should like to know how a man feels who has committed a murder!" There can be no doubt that Lord Byron, urged by a morbid impulse, was on the very eve of knowing what he desired to know. But one of the most singular instances of morbid impulses in connection with material things is related in the case of a young man who, in visiting a large manufacturing establishment, stood opposite a large hammer, and watched with great interest its perfectly regular strokes. At first it was beating immense lumps of crimson metal into thin sheets, but the supply becoming exhausted, at last it only descended on the polished anvil. Still the young man gazed intently on its motion; then he kicked the loose head of the hammer, then he left his arm moved to the same tune; and, finally, he deliberately placed his fist on the anvil, and in a second it was crushed to a jelly. The only explanation he could afford was that he felt an impulse to do it; that he knew he should be disabled; that he saw all the consequences in a misty kind of manner, but that he still felt a power above within sense and reason—a morbid impulse, in fact, to which he succumbed, and by which he lost a good right hand. This incident suggests many things besides proving the peculiar nature and power of such cases. Thus, in each of cases, there is a law of sympathy on a scale hitherto unrestrained of, as well as a musical tone pervading all things. An illustious physician has lately left on record the opinion that "one of the chief causes of the terrible scenes which ac-compounded the final suppression of the Communist outbreak was a contagious mental alienation. The minds of the Parisians were gradually unhinged by the privations of the siege. The revolt of the 18th of March gave the last blow to brains which were already shaken, and as long as the greater part of the population went raving mad. Women were, under such circumstances, for some reason, more reckless than men. This is because their nervous system is more fully developed; their brain is weaker, and their sensibilities are more acute than those of the stronger sex; and they are consequently far more dangerous in such paroxysms. None of them knew exactly what they were fighting for; they were possessed by one of the various forms of mania—that which impelled the French Jansenists of the latter half of the 18th century to execute themselves with a strange delight in pain of the most aggravated kind. The man who, under the command of a hallucination, found himself upon the lay-decks of the soldiers in a paroxysm of passion was a few moments afterwards utterly prostrate and begging for mercy. They were no more cowards in the last state than they were heroes in the first—they were simply madmen." In recurring to the "Reign of Terror" of the first French Revolution, we find in Lewis Case this profound reflection: "In surveying the French national character of the present day" (this was written in 1840), "it is difficult to recognize those traits of cruelty which were so shockingly developed during the Revolution. A more gross form of passion cannot be brought the nation into acts inconsistent with its general feeling; and marking that time of political effervescence as an extraordinary period in human history." The general term monomania implies that the individual is deranged only on one subject, or in reference to one object, or in one particular train of thought or faculty of thinking; and that his intellect, judgment, and emotions are otherwise sound, at least when not exercised upon the subject of his derangement. This, however, is not strictly true. In almost all cases of so-called monomania there are other morbid indications besides the distinct, the salient, and the grossly morbid vanity or irritability. Monommania seems to arise in the failure of the faculties around a given centre of thought, in a paralysis of power along a given line of mental direction, unaccompanied by any parallel paralysis of interest; so that the patient busies himself involuntarily on a subject on which he has lost the power of bringing his faculties properly to bear. It is the attempt of weakened faculties to work upon an overstrained nervous string, so that all mental power disappears just where the wish to apply it is greatest. Now these morbid centres of partial imbecility are, cer-terus paribus, more likely to spring up in minds below the average in general power than in those above them, though the centre of the disease itself will often be on the noblest or most sensitive part of the mind. These peculiarities are nearly always distinctly marked in monomania, particularly in the form of it which is called kleptomania. It is usually exhibited by persons who have no motive to steal, and is frequently satisfied by purloining articles of no value. A baronet of large fortune stole, while on the continent, pieces of old iron and of broken crockery, and in such quantities that tons of these collecting pieces were presented in the lists of the officers. In the second volume of the Medical Critic the case of a female is detailed who could not resist the impulse of appropriating everything within her reach. In searching this woman on one occasion there were found 15 bags upon her person, in which there were 1182 articles, mostly worthless, viz., 104 bits of paper, 82 sewing-neddles, 18 old gloves, 12 moulds for wax leaves, 19 buttons, 60 feathers, 8 parcels of dried fish, 185 bits of ribobns, 9 bottles, 61 lozenges, and a variety of other articles, the refuse of the place, to which she had at various times taken refuge. Another case reported to have high medical authority is that of a rich but eccentric gentleman living in an old manor-house in Lincolnshire, England. He was a good business man, and managed his estate with care and prudence, auditing his steward's yearly accounts with the skill of an expert. To this sort of the bar-obns were all kindly disposed towards him, and he was charitably disposed towards the poor. Even the servants who saw him every day, although they confessed that he was "certainly very peculiar at times," never once dreamed of impugning his intellect. He was insane in one direction only; and one might have passed a lifetime with him without discovering it. He would be seized by a sudden determination to travel, and on such occasions he would travel in state, with a retinue of servants. After a fortnight's or perhaps a month's absence, he would return home. Invariably, on the morning of the next day after his return, towels, which had been taken from an open portmanteau, were found scattered about the room. After breakfast, his custom was to go to the customary inn, and upon the arrival of all the hotel-keepers at whose houses he had slept during his absence on so many alips of writing-paper, with directions to his servants to inclose to each address the number of towels specified upon each piece of paper, with an assurance that they might find them, and send them in a letter, with the towels, to the hotel-keeper. This gentleman was one of the unhappy race of kleptomaniacs, whose particular mania impelled him to pilfer towels. He subsequently gave to a friend a history of his case, and said he was goaded to these journeys and thefts more by the impulse he insisted was the result of demoniacal possession. He was never impelled, however, a second time on the same journey; so that, while no hotel-keeper would be likely to suspect, during his visit, a gentleman of his rank and style as one who would steal his towels, it never transpired publicly, so far as is known, that he was a thief, although his own consciousness of the fact embittered his existence. Sometimes, in the case of this form of monomania, there exists, in the mind of the sufferer, the delusion that what he steals is his own property, or has been stolen from him by others; and it retains him. Sometimes he imagines that God orders him to steal. The case is recorded of a Scotch clergyman, distinguished for his learning, piety, and charity; he stole Bibles with a special view to the glory of God by the propagation of the Gospel. His name was a little "missionary society of stolen Bibles," and he was as much in earnest in the conversion of souls by the contraband process as the most enthusiastic foreign missionary could be in his calling. He was at last detected in wholesale Bible-stealing. It was farther discovered that he had organized a wide missionary district, and left a Bible or a Testament at every cottage where it was needed along the route. The most touching fact in the story is that he was arrested while on his knees by the bedside of a dying old man, with a stolen Bible lying open before him on the bed. "What made you steal the Bible, Mr. E. P.?" asked the sheriff, with pious horror on his face. "God made me steal them, good man," was the reply; "he was weary of seeing his poor people perish of Gospel-hunger because the rich Bible Society could not afford to feed them without the baubes, and so God set me to steal for him, and save them." He could not be persuaded that he had done wrong. The mental illness of the clergyman, who was a very poor man, naturally suggested insanity. But he was perfectly sane upon all other points, and it is doubtful whether he would have received the benefit of his malady—whether, indeed, it would have been admitted as a malady at all—if a learned and philosophical physician in a neighboring town had not positively sworn that he was the "victim of moral mania." There is this peculiarity sometimes in the case of kleptomaniacs, that their purloining is confined to single articles. Another case is reported of a lady who could not resist the temptation to steal silk stockings. Another lady would steal gloves whenever the opportunity was afforded. A boy was arrested some months since in Brooklyn for stealing slopers from the feet of ladies while walking in the street. His friends came forward and testified that he had been in the habit of stealing slopers, and was never known to have stolen anything else, all his life. A letter-carrier in Harlem, N.Y., was detected in abstracting letters and concealing them under a rock, which he had practiced for more than 20 years. It was most carefully hoarded in his place of concealment, and were found under the rock. It was proven in his case, we believe, that he had a mania for stealing letters without any apparent motive, as he never made any use of them except to hoard them. The cases quoted are sufficient to prove that the form of moral insanity to which the name of kleptomaniac has been given really exists. From these, as well as many other instances which will readily occur to the reader, it will be seen that there can be little difficulty for a skilful physician, after a short examination, in distinguishing between the true cases and an ordinary thief. And this, as well as every other true form of insanity, we presume, frees every one, whether previously bad or good, from moral responsibility in this particular regard. When the actual condition exists, no matter what the conduct may have been which preceded and conducted to this earthly account of the subject has already been closed, and the deeds that follow, we are sure, will be mercifully judged of by him who knows whereof his poor frail creatures are made, and remembers that they are but dust. (E. de P.)

1. The distinction is well made in the beginning of the article that some intellectual defect must be proven in order to constitute the crime of kleptomaniacal theft. It is not enough that a perversion of the moral faculties exists, for that is the quintessence of guilt; and on this ground he who should most effectually oblige his own conscience would thereby the most completely exonerate himself from the crime. In other words, he might thus render himself capable of committing the act. The mere expression that the persons laboring under kleptomaniacal frequency are not conscious of any wrong-doing on their own part is not of itself an adequate plea in their justification.

2. The actual presence of mental imbecility in these peculiar cases is proved by the fact of the abused individual in whom the subjects of the disease steal. In the first place, they do not commit theft for their own benefit; they do not appropriate the articles taken to their own use, nor do they have any occasion for them. The moral aspect, i.e. gain, is evidently absent, and their conduct is not understood, when the impulse to steal becomes known, as very different from ordinary cases of shop-lifting. In the second place, there is usually a pettiness, oftentimes absolute puerility in the acts committed, that marks the person as for the time "non compos mentis." The articles purloined are frequently worthless in themselves, and always relatively so. The conduct of the individual so strongly resembles that harmless and meaningless gathering of sticks and straws which is one of the most common signs of lunacy, that every one informed with the case spontaneously sets it down in the head of the person suffering from this impulse to these acts comes on in sudden fits, quite at variance with the usual course of the individual's conduct. A general good character is always held to be one of the strongest evidences against the probability of a particular offence; in the case of people suffering from the acts, their sporadic occurrence, the peculiar line in which they take place, all go to show the abnormal condition of the mind at the time. The mere violence of the impulse to commit them, it is true, is not a valid excuse; for it is hard even for the subject himself to be sure that this is really irresistible; but the frantic character of it, as he experiences it, and as it appears to others, is a legitimate proof of its insanity. In short, the utter and marked want of congruity between the behavior of the person under these circumstances and ordinary rational life stamps the act as that of a special mania, unaccountable to the individual himself in his lucid moments. The foregoing criterion, we may remark, will serve to distinguish genuine cases of irresponsible kleptomaniac from deliberate and culpable thievery, wherein no special occasion is known.

3. The question whether this may be a congenital tendency we cannot here digress to consider, except so far as to remark that this, if proved in the affirmative, would not really affect the main issue of moral responsibility; for human depravity is all confessedly inherited, but we do not, on that account, hold any one free from the obligation to restrain its manifestation, and, by using the help within his reach, even ultimately eradicating it. In like manner we pass by the interesting cognate subject of the peculiar passion for intoxicating drinks experienced by the brute, the latter only being the controlling element, and its violent and seemingly overwhelming—tendency to return on the slightest stimulus, even after years of reform; merely observing that here, whether in instances of inherited or acquired appetite, the disease—for it undoubtedly is—such is a cowpained one, i.e. both of the body and the mind, the latter only being the controlling element—being the subject of moral consideration; and that the responsibility in these cases is at most simply shifted to total abstinence henceforth from the deadly seducer. This last thought, however, may easily apply to kindred sins, as to a propensity that brings back the drunkard's fatal appetite, so perhaps it was the indulgence in the first petty theft that developed the uncontrollable passion for purloining. In this light the subject has a grave lesson for all fallen humanity, inasmuch as each son of man bears within his bosom the germ of every hydra sin, which, perchance needs but one conducive act to cause it to spring forth to virulent life.

Kleschius, Daniel a German theologian, born at Iglau, in Moravia, in the early part of the 17th century, was educated at the universities of Strasbourg and Wittcnberg, and was prepared for a career for a number of years in Hungary and Croatia. In 1673 he was caught there for a time, and then removed to Weissenfels, where he became a professor at the gymnasium. Kleschius was a very peculiar character. He made many predictions, among others that the year 1700 would bring the final judgment day. He lived, however, beyond the time appointed. He died about 1701. See Spiegelmeir Hist. Lec. vol. iii, a v.

Kiesel. See Kielsel.

Klette, Johann Georg, a German Lutheran divine, was born at Radeberg, in Saxony, October 12, 1650, and studied theology at Leipzig and Wittenberg. He was made professor of theology and metaphysics at Jena in 1684. In 1696 he became pastor in that place, and died Dec. 28, 1697.

Kleuker, Johann Friedrich, one of the most eminent modern German theologians, was born at Osterode Oct. 24, 1749. He studied history, philosophy, and theology at the University of Göttingen. In 1778 he became a parish priest at Rüdernick, and there made the acquaintance of Herder, through whom he was appointed professor of the gymnasium of Lemgo, and, in 1778 rector of the gymnasium of Osnabruck. Herder also induced and encouraged him to write on the theological questions of the day. In acknowledgment of his literary activity and profound learning, he was made D.D. by the University of the Helmstedt in 1791. In 1796 he was appointed fourth ordinary professor of theology at Kiel, which position he filled with great success, lecturing on the exegesis of the O. and N. Test., Christian apologetics, Christian antiques, ancient Church history, the doctrine of Christ and of the apostles, symbolics, and Christian science, of which, in 1800, he published a Grundriss or Encyclopädie d. Theologie in 2 vols., for the use of his numerous pupils. The last few years of his life were spent in retirement after he had vainly tried to avoid the progress of scientific rationalism. Kleuker, says Hagenbach (see below), was one of the few men who, in doctrine and writings, stood in avowed opposition to the prevailing theological spirit of his times, of which he said 'that he had so poisoned the whole atmosphere that men hardly dared to speak of Christ as anything more than a passing shadow.' He was not even satisfied with Herder, who, as he held, made too many concessions to the new system of doctrine and thinking. Yet his simple, evangelical faith, his humble piety, and his active interest in all that was grand and good, secured him the intimate friendship of that class of men, while his profound learning, especially in Oriental and in classical antiquities, procured him the respect and consideration of all scholars. In judging a theologian, his influence on his associates and on the age in which he lived, is more important than any his writings: as much, if not more, can be determined of his character by the testimony of his life and death. With pleasure, then, do we point to the dying testimony of this celebrated German theologian. His biographer (see below) says of his last moments: 'I had the fortunes to be present when Kleuker died, for I must call it a good fortune to see a true Christian die as calmly as he did. As I came in, the approach of death was clearly indicated by his cold hands, almost motionless pulse, and difficult breathing. A kind of prophetic spirit appeared as if to guard, to prepare his soul for meeting it.'

Kley, Edward, a Jewish preacher and educator of note, born June 10, 1789, at Bernstadt, in Silesia, was prominently connected with the reformation of Judaism in the synagogue at the opening of the 19th century. He was a teacher and preacher at Berlin when, in 1818, the Progressive Jews of Hamburg called him to the superintendency of their schools, and later to the duties of a pastor. Kley was the first Jew who preached in a temple (the name for the houses of worship of Reformed Jews), and who used a German liturgy and introduced an organ. May 9, 1840, he resigned his pastoral office, but the superintendence of the Jewish schools he held until 1862. The bulk of his school work was done in foreign languages and fell into the all active labors. His admirers presented him with a large fund for his support, but he declined to use it for himself, and founded the "Eduard Kley Stiftung" for the support and assistance of old teachers not sufficiently provided for by the state. He died Oct. 4, 1867. His works, which are generally acknowledged to be of superior order, were published at Hamburg in 1826-27, 1844, 8vo. He also published two volumes of hymnals: Predigt Skizzen, or Beiträge zu einer kirchlichen Homiletik (Leips, 1836, 2 vols, 8vo), and Die deutsche Synagoge oder Vaterland'sche Kirche (3 vols, 8vo, 1838; 2 vols, 8vo): — \[\text{Further information not transcribed.}\]

Kling, Christian Friedrich, a German theologian, was born at Aldolitz, in Württemberg, Nov. 4, 1800, and was educated at the University of Tübingen, where he became professor in 1824. Two years later he entered the ministry, and settled at Waiblingen until 1832, when he removed to Marburg as professor of theology. In 1840 he was appointed to and accepted a like position at Bonn University, which he held until 1847; then became professor at Erlangen, in Württemberg; later deceased at Marbach, in 1861. Kling was a ready writer, and contributed largely to the different German periodicals; he was one of the ablest assistants on the Theologische Studien und Kritiken. He edited J. F. von Flatt's Vorlesungen über die Pastoralische Physiognomy (1851), and contributed a Commentary to the Corinthisches and Lange's Bibelwerk (translated by Daniel W. Poor, D.D., Scribner's editor. New York, 1871, royal 8vo).

Klinge, Zacharias Laurentius, a Swedish theologian who flourished during the middle of the 17th century, was first professor of theology at Dorpat, then preacher at the Swedish court, and later pastor at Stockholm and Holmestrand in Norway. He died Sept. 8, 1671. His work, Teutonicoeremove, etc. See Allgemeines Histo. Lexicon, iii, 38.

Klingler, Antonius, a German Reformed theologian, was born at Zurich, Switzerland, Aug. 2, 1649; was educated at several of the most celebrated German universities, and theological professor at the gymnasium at Hanau in the same year. In 1680 he was offered a professorship at the University of Groningen, but he declined this honor in favor of a pastorate in his native place. He died there in August, 1718. Klingler published several theological works, of which the best is Bella Jadve. See Allgemeines Histo. Lexicon, iii, 38.

Klostock, Friedrich Gottlieb, an eminent German poet, one of the forerunners of the great German poetic romance of the 18th century—"the German Milton," as he is frequently styled—was born at Quedlinburg, Saxony, July 5, 1724. He received his early education at the school of his native place, and when sixteen years of age was admitted to the gymnasium at Naumburg, where he became acquainted with the style of the classical authors of his country. While his studies were highly honored and his position were elevated both in prose and verse, particularly to the writing of pastoral, which were in great vogue among the German, and it is said that even at that early period he had decided to write a poem of greater length than any that had hitherto been attempted by his countrymen, and one that should do honor to German literature, which was at this time rather at low ebb. France was in the avant-garde of political influence, and everything French was considered worthy of imitation; but French influence was most completely manifest in the social life of the people. The main feature of the litera

went to Hamburg, which was at this time a sort of literacity of Germany, and more particularly of its northern half, as Weimar became some years later of the southern half. Not only could Klostock claim it as his residence, but it also contained for some time the great Lesing, who, by the way, was no mean defendant of Klostock in a lawsuit. The latter was under the Governor of Hamburg's school; Herder occasionally visited the Hanse city, and a number of lesser lights, such as

Voss, Claudius, Reimerius, the Stolberges, et. etc., gathered there about the two chief luminaries. "Klostock," says Mrs. Winkworth (Christian Singers of Germany, p. 386), speaking of the young poet, "with the respect at least, or as it may be called reverence, not unlike that paid to Dr.

Johnson in England, but in some respects more flattering, as he was a man of whom it was much easier to make a popular, and especially a ladies' hero." Here the Messiah was at last finished in 1775, having thus occupied twenty-seven years in preparation. A complete edition of his odes and lyrics was brought out, and here he devoted the autumn of his long life to the study and purification of the German language and its grammar. He had always been a passionate lover of his country, but this did not prevent him from sympathizing in the American War of Independenee, and the opening of the French Revolution. He was among those who hailed the earlier years of the latter with eager sympathy, and the hope of a coming brighter era for humanity, and who afterwards underwent the bitterness of profound disappointment. The hatred of his countrymen increased with the recognition of his friendship for the French people by accordign the rights of a French citizen, but when the terrible massacres of 1793 took place he sent back to them his diplogen. In Hamburg he married his "beloved" Margaretha, with whom, however, he enjoyed only a short union; she died in childbirth in 1798.

In 1771 he was honored with the appointment of Danish ambassador to Hamburg, and flourished at this place the remainder of his days, dividing his time between his public duties and the pursuits of literature. In 1792

Klostock married for the second time, choosing the Fras von Winther, an old love of his, who had meanwhile become a widow, and who survived him. He died in 1803, and was buried (March 22) by Hamburg with royal honors, a distinction which in Germany is generally accorded only to royal personages.

His work of next importance to the Messiah is a drama, above alluded to, entitled Hermann's Schlacht

(The Battle of Armimius), the subject of which is the defeat of the Roman general Varus by the ancient Germans. It is scarcely so much a drama as a lyric poem in twenty cantos of an irregular rhythm. His other dramas are of a similar character, and were written evidently with intent to arouse German patriotism from its lethargy, and to breathe into the German heart the spirit of freedom. But the Messiah alone is of special interest to our readers, and we therefore give a particular description of it.

Klostock's Messiah is a poem in twenty cantos, written in hexameters, except where certain choral songs occur in unrhymed lyrical measure. "The action opens after the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, when the Messiah withdraws from the people, and, alone on the Mount of Olives, renews his solemn vow to the Almighty Father to undertake the work of redemption; it closes when that work is completed, and he sits down at the right hand of God. Around the central figure of the God-man are grouped an infinite variety of spectacles; songs of joy are heard in the distant lands; John,

Gabriel are especially appointed to attend on the divine sufferer; evil spirits who conspire against him, but one of whom, Abbadon, repents and at last obtains mercy; Adam and Eve, and the patriarchs, who watch the occurrence with astonishment; the apostles and the inhabitants of another world, like in nature to man, but unfallen, who are permitted know what is taking place among their sinful kindred. Even the Father himself is introduced as speaking, and the scene is sometimes laid in the highest heaven. The earthly actors are the mother and disciples of Jesus, the Jews, and the Romans, who lead him to death, and a number of those who have come in contact with him in his ministrations, among whom the most curiously drawn are two female figures, both named

Cidil: one, the daughter of Gederoan, is a remnant of Genoa, and her death is an exact transcript of Meta's death-bed; the other is the daughter of Jairus, between whom and Semida, the youth of Naith, there exists a pure but ardent attachment, which at last finds satisfaction in heaven. The immense number of personages thus introduced produces a confused impression; everything is described by one or another of them, and talked over at length; scarcely anything actually takes place before the reader; there is an absence of local coloring and of character, and very few of the actors have any distinct individuality at all; while the effort to keep the whole tone of the poem at the highest possible pitch of intensity and awe gives rise to an overstrained inflation of both thought and style, which becomes in the long run inexpressibly fatiguing. Yet Klostock's poem has made for itself and for the day in the German literature of his country which does not depend on the number of readers it now attracts. Its subject is linked by a thousand invisible fibres to the whole Christian thought of centuries past, while its spirit of mercy, forgiveness, and tolerance—in a word, of redemption—is essentially characteristic of the sentimental development of Germany.

Here, too, Klostock most effectively treats such a theme worthily at all—to embody it in a form which, however full of defects, yet possesses a certain dignity and real genius—marks its author as a great poet, if not one of the greatest, and gives him a place in the Pantheon of German literature, perhaps, than he has a right to command as an artist." The poem certainly abounds in passages of the most beautiful and splendid poetry. An exuberant imagination everywhere scatters its wealth, and Klostock has been said by one critic to be "as superior to Fidlar in richness and deepest feeling as the spiritual world he paints transcends in intrinsic magnificence the scenes celebrated by the Grecian bard." And by another critic, "now to rival the tenderness of David, now to soar in the loftiest flights like Isaiah. The purity and pathos of its religious sentiments are equal to the excellence of its poetry. But all good and candid judges will allow that, though exhibiting a sublimity and beauty of no common order, it has failed to accomplish the confident expectations of the Germans, that it would eclipse the Paradise Lost of Milton." For, notwithstanding its grandeur, it is excessively cold and coldly read. His other works and Klostock's greatest popularity this seems to have been felt, for Leasing observes, in an epigram, that everybody praises Klostock, but few read him. His odes are valued by his own countrymen more than his epic, and some are truly sublime, but contrasted with the language is so singular, and the connection of the thoughts so often non-apparent, that these odes are reckoned among the most difficult in the language. Both in his

Messiah and his odes he is dignified and sublime, but his rhapsodical manner contrasts strangely with the pedantry which is always apparent. Goethe, in his conversations with Eckermann, expressed his opinion that German literature was greatly indebted to Klostock, who was in advance of his times, but that the times had since advanced beyond Klostock. The young Hardenberg (who wrote under the name of "Novalis") has happily said that Klostock's work always resemble translations from some unknown poet, done by a clever but unpoetical philologist. As for the theological aspect of his poem of the Messiah, Klostock fell into the almost inevitable fault, in treating this subject poetically, of dividing the kingdom of heaven between the Par-ther and the Son (divine), and even opposing them to each other, as when he makes Christ say to God, "I, who am God as well as thou, swear to thee by myself that I will redeem mankind." (Comp. Hurst's Hagenbach, Church History of the 18th and 19th Centuries, i. 249; ii. 277 sq.)

The Messiah was first published in fragments, and then as a whole (Altona, 1780; 7th ed. Lpz. 1817); it has been translated into Latin, English, French, Polish, Dutch, and other languages. There are also several shorter poems: Oden u. Elegien (Hamb. 1771, 2 vols.; 6th ed. Lpz. 1827; trans. into English by W. Nind, 1847) — Gefallene Lieder (Kopenhagen. 1738-39, 2 vols.); besides dramas under the following titles: Ad am'n Tod (Kopenhagen. 1757; 4th ed. 1773) — Schoone Liebe (Magdeburg. 1754) — Jürek (Hamburg. 1772); etc. His complete works have been published under the title Klopfstock's sämtliche Werke (Lpz. 1798-1817, 12 vols.; 1822-24, 12 vols. 1828-29, 18 vols.; 1839, 9 vols.; 1839, 1 vol.; Copenhagen. 1844, 10 vols., with 3 supplements. Klopf, David, a German theologian, was born at Tithi, Prussia, April 14, 1618, and, upon the urgent request of his father, studied theology, although his own inclinations were in favor of medicine. In 1641 he began to lecture at the University of Rostock, where he had pursued his theological studies for several years, in addition to his course at Königsberg University. Later he travelled abroad, and visited the high-schools of Sweden and the Netherlands. He began to preach in 1644 at Marienwerder; removed in 1646 to Saalfeld, and in 1657 to Ellingen, in 1650 to Wismar, and in 1655 to Hamburg. He died there April 14, 1681. For a list of his works, see Jocher, Gekr. Lex. ii, 2118 sq.

Klopf, Johann Daniel, a German theologian, was born at Weissenfels June 6, 1760, and educated at the Universities of Leipzig and Wittenberg. He was a professor at the gymnasium in Dortmund in 1780; in 1795 he removed to Weissenfels as preacher and superintendent of the churches, and in 1796 accepted the same office at Zerbst, where he died July 5, 1808. Klopf was well acquainted with dogmatics and the exegesis of the N.T., as is evinced by his writings in those departments. He contributed largely to periodicals, and published in book form Concilium syntagmatis confessio Eccles. Luther (Hamburg 1792, 4to) — Commentatio de Mart. Clementii auriorum consensus in acta justificationis presentis falsa protesta (ibid. 1784, 4to) — Commentatio in locum (Timm. iii, 2) (Dortm. 1747, 4to) — Eclogae in pericopos epistolicae (ibid. 1748, 4to, etc.) See Döring, Gekr. Knapp, Albert, a German theologian, and one of the ablest workers in the Wittenburg Church of the 19th century, peculiarly distinguished for his poetical gifts and influence in establishing a school of religious poetry, was born in Tübingen July 25, 1796. His childhood was passed in the village of Alpirsbach, under the old 11th-century Benedictine cloister, and he enjoyed the careful instruction of Handel, afterward pastor at Stammheim. Night and day he dreamed poetry. His university studies, upon which he entered in 1816, were rather poetical than literary, the authorship of a volume of his choice, and for that he always expressed his gratitude. In 1820 he was established vicar near Stuttgart, and here, through intercourse with the poets Wilhelm Hofacker (q. v.), he received that deep religious impression which ever after characterized his work. In 1881 he became professor at Königsberg, where, in 1835, on the occasion of a friend, he began the publication of the Christreden, an annual which contained religious selections from various eminent authors, was popular, and often sought as a Christmas gift in families, but ceased with the year 1837. In 1836 he was made pastor at Stuttgart, and labored there with great zeal for the cause of his Master, exercising a large influence until his death, June 18, 1864. The prayer expressed in one of his best hymns was answered: "Grant me one thing here below—thy Spirit and thy peace, and the honor in my grave of hav- ing known thy love.

Albert Knapp is chiefly known by his religious poems, and as the best of these may be pointed out his Christlische Gedichte (in 2 vols. Stuttgart, 1829; 8d ed. Bade, 1845), Herbstblüthen (1859), and Christoterpe, already referred to. To the hymnology of the Church Knapp rendered penetrating, in the line of the Church hymn-book, many forgotten treasures. His Liedachser, generally acknowledged to be one of the most valuable collections of Christian hymns of all ages, was first published in 1857 (2d ed. 1860, 2 vols. 8vo), and the Evangelielle Gesangbuch in 1865. His avowed principle of composition was a sharp and deliberate assault, and he himself restored at a later day some of the original expressions. As a preacher the manifold richness of his thought and delicacy of diction was his attraction. He did not suffer himself to appear in his sermons, never having once so used a poem of his own, nor even having appointed one of his own hymns to be sung, yet no one could listen to him without acknowledging a rare union of extensive learning with original genius. His singular merit as a hymn-maker remains, notwithstanding a haste of composition and an apparent want of order, a truth of thought, a subjectivity of the author, according to the spirit of the times, often characterizes his weightier pieces, yet his individuality is one of simple faith.

In theology he was fully evangelical in his doctrine of salvation, which he defended not in mere polemic, but in heart and soul against all opposers. See also the Christoterpe of 1846 for a statement of his belief. He grounded all defence of doctrine upon the necessities and joyful faith of spiritual experience, and severely con- demned a merely external method and the zeal of argumentation more often than not. He had no sympathy with sects as such. Knapp's biographical contributions in the Christoterpe are of great interest and beauty; we name that on his own "Childhood Days" in the issue of 1849, on Ludwig Hofacker (1848), Hedinger (1860), Steinhofen (1867), Jacob Balde (1864), Jeremias Flatt (1892). The writer's poetic humor and narrative power, invested with love for his theme, make these sketches perfect artworks. Dr. Friedrich Wilhelm Krummacher, in his autobiography (translated by Easton, Edinb. 1869, 8vo, p. 203, 294), pays the following tribute to the high poetic merit of our subject: "From the first Knapp chose the true poetic inborn genius no one will seriously deny, and yet he is not generally mentioned in our recent histories of literature as ranked among the 'Swabian poets,' although, without doubt, he would have been named among them, and in the very foremost rank, had he cultivated a talent more often recognized, and no more than his spirit's desire of seeking all his inspiration from the Spirit of God; but worldly fame, to which the way and the door stood wide open for him, he gladly cast at his feet, and recognized it as his calling, as it indeed was the impulse of his heart, to sing the praises of the heavenly Prince of Peace, through whom he knew himself redeemed and ordained 'to the inheritance of the saints in light.' Instead of worldly fame, there was destined for him, so long as a Church of Christ shall remain on earth, the glorious reward of God, that his Eines wuchs ich mir vor allem Andenken, his As dein Blumen und Erkichen, his Abend ist es, Herr, die Stunde, and many others of his hymns, will never cease to be sung in it. We bless him in the name of many thousands to whom the melodies of his harp, breathing peace and joy, have lightened their steps on the way to the city of God, and we hope that the people of our Church will continue the "stream of living water", according to the word of the Lord, yet flow for them to this hour from the life and labors of their highly-gifted pastor." Knapp, Johann Georg, father of Georg Christian, was himself a theologian of some note. He was born at Oehringen Decr. 27, 1705, of pious parents, and went to the University of Altdorf to study theology. He removed to Jena in 1726 to continue his preparatory studies for the ministerial office, and completed them at Halle, where, in 1728, he was appointed instructor at the royal pedagogium. In 1732 he became pastor to the Prussian military school at Berlin, but was restored to Halle only one year, and then returned to Halle to fill an adjunct professorship in theology at the university. He was made ordinary or regular professor in 1739. After the decease of the celebrated Knapp he was placed over the orphan asylum, and held this position until his death, July 30, 1771. Knapp took a particular interest in the cause of missions, and published Neues Gesch. d. evang.

that those of the ancient Hebrews were of the same description as those now in use appear from their being able to carry them, together with the dough, wrapped up in their cloaks, upon their shoulders without difficulty.

The Bedouin Arabs, indeed, use for this purpose a leather, which can be drawn up into a bag by a running cord, and which is then sometimes open and sometimes closed, and often carry their dough. This might equally, and in some respects better answer the described conditions; but, being especially adapted to the use of a nomad and tent-dwelling people, it is more likely that the Israelites, who were not such at the time of the Exode, then used the wooden bowls for their 'kneading-troughs' (Exod. viii. 3; xiii. 34; Deut. xxviii. 5, 7). It is clear, from the history of the departure from Egypt, that the flour had first been made into a dough by water only, in which state it had been kept some little time before it was leavened; for when the Israelites were unexpectedly (as to the moment) compelled in all haste to withdraw, it was found that, although the dough had been prepared in the kneading-trough, it was still unleavened (Exod. xii. 34; compare Hos. vii. 4); and it was in consequence of this circumstance that they and their descendants in all ages were enjoined to eat only unleavened bread at the feast of the Passover. See BREAD.

Knead (נוּשָׁה, lish), to prepare dough by working it with the hands; a task usually performed by women (Gen. xviii. 6; I Sam. xxiv. 24; 2 Sam. xiii. 8; Jer. vii. 18); once spoken of a male baker (Hos. viii. 4). See Dought.

KNEADING-TROUGH (טָנֹשׁ, mishkeit, so called from the fermentation of the dough), the vessel in which the materials of the bread, after being mixed and leavened, is left to swell (Exod. viii. 3, xii. 34, rendered "store" in Deut. xxviii. 5, 17); probably like the wooden bowl used by the modern Arabs for the same purpose. On the monuments of Egypt we find the various processes of making bread represented with great minuteness. Men were chiefly occupied in it, as with us at the present day. Their grain was ground in hand-mills, or pounded in mortars, and then kneaded into dough, which was afterwards kneaded by the hand, in a large circular bowl, or in a trough with the feet (Wilkinson, 4. c. Ep. i. 174–6). See BAKE. The process of making bread in Egypt is now generally performed in villages by women, among whom proficiency in that art is looked upon as a sort of accomplishment. Except in large towns, each family bakes its own bread, which is usually made into small cakes and eaten new, the climate not admitting of its being kept long without turning sour. When the dough is sufficiently kneaded, it is made up into a round flat cake, generally about a span in width, and a finger's breadth in height. Some of this straw and dung is then kindled on the floor or hearth, which, when sufficiently heated, is removed, and the dough being placed on it, and covered with hot embers, is thus soon baked. Sometimes a circle of small stones is placed upon the hearth after it has been heated, into which some paste is poured, and covered with hot embers: this produces a kind of biscuit. See OVEN. "The modern Oriental kneading-troughs, in which the dough is prepared, have no resemblance to ours in size or shape. As one person does not bake bread for many families, as is the case with us; as a family does not make bread sufficient for many days, as in our villages, but every family bakes for the day only the quantity of bread which it requires, but a comparatively small quantity of dough is prepared. This is done in small wooden bowls, and so the kneading is done" (Deut. xv. 17). For the peculiar term in Gen. xxi. 48 (see Reinecke, De nomine אֵשֶׁת, Weissenf. 1726), see ABRECH.
KNEELING

a loud voice," praying for his murderer (Acts vii, 60); Peter likewise "kneeled down and prayed" (Acts ii, 46). Paul also (Acts xxx, 36; xxii, 5). That the posture was a customary one may be inferred from the conduct of the man beseeching Christ to heal his son (Matt. xvii, 14), and of the rich young man (Mark x, 17), as also of the scribes (Mark i, 46); yes, we have even the example of John the Baptist, who "kneeling down" (Luke viii, 40), "kneeled down when he prayed. That the practice was general among the early Christians is plain from the Shepherd of Hermas, from Eusebius' History (i, 38), and from numberless other authors, and especially from the procession made by the faithful in many places to the people in all the liturgies, "Flectamus genua" (Let us bend our knees), whereupon the people knelt till, at the close of the prayer, they received a corresponding summons, "Levate" (Arise), and from the fact that prayer itself was termed ενεκτοσων, bending the knees. In the days of Irenaeus, and for some time after, four postures were in use among Christians, namely, standing (for which see reason below), prostration (as a sign of deep and extraordinary humiliation), bowing, and kneeling. The posture of sitting during the time of public prayer, of modern days, seems to have been unknown in the first centuries. The kneeling posture in the practice of penance was the common practice during the six working days, and was understood by the early Church to denote humility of mind before God, and as a symbol of our fall by sin. A standing posture in worship (explained by St. Chrysostom) was from the Church's infancy to the dead, and the forgiveness of sins, and also as being a sign of the Christian's hope and expectation of heaven) was assumed by the early Christian worshippers (except penitents) on Sundays and during the fifty days between Easter and Whit Sunday, "as a symbol of the resurrection, whereby, through the grace of Christ, we rise again from our fall." Cassian says of the Egyptian churches that from Saturday night to Sunday night, and all the days of Pentecost, they neither knelt nor fasted. The Apostolical Constitutions order that Christians should pray three times on the Lord's day, standing, in honor of him who rose the third day from the dead, and in the writings of Chrysostom we meet with frequent allusions to the same practice, especially in the oft-repeated form by which the deacon called upon the people to pray, "Let us stand upright with reverence and devotion." St. Zosimus says, "We count it a sin to sit fast, or to worship kneeling, on the Lord's day, and we enjoy the same immunity from Easter to Pentecost." This practice was confirmed by the Council of Nice, for the sake of uniformity, and it is from this circumstance, probably, that the Ethiopic and Muscovitian churches adopted the attitude of standing generally, a custom which they continue to this day. From Cyril's writings it would appear that also at the celebration of the Eucharist a standing attitude was assumed by the early Christians. He says "it was with silence and downcast eyes, bowing themselves in the posture of worship and adoration." The exact period when kneeling at the Lord's Supper became general cannot be ascertained, but it has prevailed for many centuries, and it is now generally, though not altogether, practiced as the proper posture for communicants.

In ordination, also, a kneeling posture was early practiced. Dionysius says, "The person to be ordained kneeled before the bishop at the altar, and he, laying his hand upon his head, did consecrate him with a holy prayer, and then signed him with the sign of the cross, after which the bishop and the clergy present gave him the kiss of peace." It would appear, however, that bishops and deacons did not relish much the humilitating posture of kneeling at their ordination, for Theodoret informs us that "it was a customary rite to bring the person about to be ordained bishop to the holy table, and make him kneel before the bishop. But after he had touched the earth, the bishop made him kneel also, for a significant mode of showing with what reluctance men should undertake so important, so weighty a charge as that of bishop in the Church of Jesus Christ. Indeed, so solemn and onerous were its responsibilities esteemed, that we read of several who recoiled as soon as they understood that the popular voice had chosen them to fill this honorable post; and many of them, when captured, were brought by force to the holy altar, and there, against their will and inclination, were ordained by the bishop, who was held down on their knees by the officers of the church. See Election of Clergy.

In the Roman Catholic Church the act of kneeling belongs to the highest form of worship. It is especially practiced in the performance of monastic devotions and in the acts of penance. It is also frequently employed during the mass as well as the presence of the consecrated elements when reserved for subsequent communion. In acts of penance this Church has carried the practice to great excess, subjecting the penitent to sufferings which remind us of the legend told of St. James, that he contracted a hardness on his knees equal to that of camels because he was so generally on his knees. "Instances," says Edie, "are innumerable, and ever recurring in the Romish Church, of delicate women being obliged to walk on rough pavements, for hours in succession, on their bare knees, until at length nature, worn out by the long exposure to injurious and exhausting exercises, compels them to desist. To encourage the penitent and devout in acts of this nature, the most wonderful tales are related of the good resulting from self-mortification and entire submission to the stern discipline of the Church." See the article Oration.

In the Anglican Church the rubric prescribes the kneeling posture in many parts of the service, and this, as well as the practice of bowing the head at the name of Jesus, was the subject of much controversy with the Puritans. A like controversy was in 1688 provoked in Bavaria by a ministerial decree obliging Protestants to join the Romanists in this ceremony when required of them, and ended only with its repeal in 1844 (for details on this point, see the Roman Catholic version in Wetzler and Welte, Kirchen Lex. vi, 236; the Protestant side in Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, a. v. Baier). See Edie, Eccles. Dict. a. v.; Patriz, Eccles. Dict. a. v.; Hook, Church Hist. Dict. a. v.; Riddle, Christian Antiquities, 391 sq., 631 sq.,; Coleman, Christian Antiquities (see Index).

Kneph or Kaphphis, also known under the name of Nym or Nysr, in Egyptian mythology is the oldest designated deity of the waters, and signifies either spirit or water, perhaps in allusion to the Spirit of God, who in the beginning moved upon the face of the waters. Greatly distorted by the priests, the legend is in brief that from his mouth came the egg which gave existence to all things temporal; hence the egg is his symbol; likewise the snake, which assumes the shape of a ring, to indicate his eternal existence. His representation is frequently found on Egyptian monuments, sometimes with a snake holding an egg between its head and tail. The Egyptians of Thebes knew only this one god to be immortal; all others they supposed to be more or less subject to temporal changes.

In the late twelfth century, Kneph was the special god of Upper Egypt, where he was represented in human shape, with the head of a ram; still regarded as the creator of other gods, he was figured at Elephantine sitting at a potter's wheel fashioning the limbs of Osiris, while the god of the Nile is the wind. "The idea," says Trevor (Anc. Egypt, p. 131), "seems to be the same as in Job (x, 8, 9; Rom. ix, 22): 'Thine..." hands have made me and fashioned me together round about. Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me as the clay." (Comp. Herodotus, ii. 41.) See Voll-

Knibb, William, a Baptist missionary to Jamaica, was born at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, England, about 1800. He sailed as a missionary to Kingston, Jamaica, in 1824; in 1828 removed to the Ridgeland Mission, in the north-western part of the island, and subsequently became pastor of the mission church at Palmouth. He exercised a very important part in bringing about the Emancipation Act of 1838, by which slavery was abolished in the island, and afterwards so exposed the apprenticeship system established by the same act as to secure the complete emancipation of apprentices in the island. In 1838 he erected a normal school at Kettering, in Trelawney, for training native and other schoolmistresses for both Jamaica and Africa, and in 1842 he visited England to promote the establishment of a theological seminary in connection with the native mission to Africa. He died at Kettering July 15, 1845.

Knife is the representative in the (Auth. Version) several Heb. terms: בָּשָׂר (che'râb, from its laying waste); a sharp instrument, e.g. for circumcision (Josh. v, 2, 8); a razor (Ezek. v, 1); a graving-tool or chisel (Exod. xx, 28); an axe (Ezek. xxvi, 9); poet. of the curved (maska of the hippopotamus (Job xl, 19); elsewhere usually a "sword." מָכָלֶל (machal'eth, so called from its use in eating), a large knife for slaughtering and cutting up food (Gen. xxxii, 6, 10; Judg. xix, 29; Prov. xxx, 14).
מַכָלֶל (makhalkh), so called from separating parts to the view), a knife for any purpose, perhaps a table-knife (Prov. xxiii, 2). מַכָלֶל (makhalkh), so called from gliding through the flesh), a butcher's knife for slaughtering the victims in sacrifice (Ezra i, 9). See Swoon.

"The probable form of the knives of the Hebrews will be best gathered from a comparison of those of other ancient nations, both Eastern and Western, which have come down to us. No. 1 represents the Roman cutor, used in sacrificing, which may be compared with No. 2, an Egyptian sacrificial knife. Nos. 3, 4, and 5 are also Egyptian knives, of which the most remarkable, No. 3, is from the Louvre collection; the others are from the Monumenti Reali of Rosellini. Nos. 6-9 are Roman, from Barcelonetta. In No. 7 we have probably the form of the pruning-hook of the Jews (יִֽסְכָּר, lxxv, ixviii, 22), though some rather assimilate this to the sickle (ἄλσος). It was probably with some such instrument as No. 9 that the priests of Beal cut themselves." See ANION. The knife used by the fisherman for splitting his fish (q. v.) was of a circular form, with a handle, as likewise that used by the currier for cutting leather (q. v.), only larger and heavier. In the in early times, were probably only of hard stone, and the use of the flint or stone knife was sometimes employed for sacred purposes after the introduction of iron different stages of the same process of embalming (see also be said, to some extent, of the Hebrews (compare Exod.

car of St. Sepulchre's, London. Nothing further is known to us of his personal history. He wrote in Defence of the Doctrine of the Trinity two treatments (1714–15), which are highly commended by Dr. Waterland (Moyer's Lectures). Knight also published five separate Sermons (1719–56), and eight sermons delivered at lady Moyer's Lecture in 1720–21 (1721, 1726).—Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors, vol. ii, a. v.

Knight, James (2), a Congregational minister, was born at Halifax, Yorkshire, England, July 19, 1709, and was educated for the ministry at Homerton College, where he is said to have made rapid attainments in Biblical science. Upon his graduation he was called to the Church in Collierswaite, Southwark, where he was ordained in 1729. In 1730 he resigned his pastoral charge, after a faithful and successful service. He was one of the founders of the London Missionary Society. Mr. Knight's sermons, some of which have been published, were celebrated for their sacred union, and their thorough and searching appeals to the conscience. His eminence piety was both the strength and ornament of his character. He knew how not only to discuss a subject with logical precision, but also to infuse into it the spirit of vital evangelical piety. See Morison, Missionary Fathers.

Knight, Joel Abraham, a Methodist minister, was born at Hull, Yorkshire, England, April 28, 1754; was ordained at Speenfields Chapel, London, March 9, 1780, where he was also appointed master of the charity school and assistant preacher. In 1788 he preached at Pentonville Chapel, and in 1789 became pastor of the Tabernacle and Tottenham Court churches, London, a position which he occupied until his death, April 22, 1866. Mr. Knight was a zealous worker in the formation and proceedings of the London Missionary Society in 1793. His sermons, some of which were published in London in 1788–9, were always richly imbued with the distinguishing doctrines of evangelical Christianity, but they especially taught that "the cordial reception of the doctrine of salvation by grace must necessarily produce obedience to the law of God." In speech he was invariably chaste, and in manner affectionate and pathetic. —Morison, Missionary Fathers.

Knight, Samuel, D.D., an English divine of note, was born in London in 1675, and was educated at St. Paul's School and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He first became chaplain to Edward, earl of Oxford, and was by him presented to the rectory of Borough-green, in Cambridgeshire, in 1707; was made prebendary of Ely and rector of Blantsham (Huntingdonshire) in 1714; became chaplain to George II in 1736, and was promoted to the archdeaconry of Berks in 1735. He died Dec. 15, 1746. Between the years 1721 and 1728 he published several of his Sermons. He also wrote Life of Dr. John Coles, Dean of St. Paul's (London, 1724, 8vo; new edit. Oxford, 1828, 8vo).—Life of Erasmus (Cambridge, 1729, 8vo).—General Biog. Dict. vii, 40 sq.; Allibone, Dict. of Eng. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, a. v.

Knighthood, the condition, honor, and rank of a knight, also the service due from a knight, and the tenure of land by such service. In a secondary sense, the word is employed to denote the class of knights—the aggregate body of any particular knightly association; the institution itself, and the spirit of the institution. In these remoter meanings it becomes identical with Chivalry, and it is in this point of view that it will principally be considered here. The term is one of various significance, and is, therefore, apt for ambiguities; it is one whose applications were of gradual development, and which is, accordingly, of diverse historical import. Its explanation is thus necessarily intricate and multifarious, and care is requisite to avoid confounding different things, or different phases of the same thing, under the single common name. Neglect of this precaution has occasioned much of the extra-

Ancient Egyptian Flint Knives (from the Berlin Museum), No. 1 for general purposes; No. 2 probably for incisions is embalming.

2. In these, unlike the Jews, like other Orientals, made little use of knives, but they were required for slaughtering animals either for food or sacrifice, as well as for cutting up the carcass (Lev. vii, 33, 34; viii, 15, 20, 25; ix, 3; Num. xviii, 1; 1 Sam. ix, 24; Ezek. xxiv, 4; Ezra i, 5; Matt. xxvi, 23; Russell, negro, i, 172; Wilkinson, i, 189; Mashna, Tausud, iv, 3). See EATING.

Ancient Egyptian Slaughtering-knives. No. 1 is cutting up an Iber. No. 2 is sharpening a knife on a steel attached to his apron. Over them is the hieroglyph for the act.

Asiatics usually carry about with them a knife or dagger, often with a highly-ornamented handle, which may be used when required for eating purposes (Judg. ii, 21; Layard, Nin. ii, 342, 299; Wilkinson, i, 358, 360; Chardin, Voyage, iv, 18; Niebuhr, Voyage, i, 340, pl. 71). See GIRDLE.

Ancient Assyrian Knives (from the Britsh Museum). Two of them have a hook at the handle, as if for suspending in the girdle. For another form used by soldiers, see BUCKLE.

3. Smaller knives were in use for paring fruit (Josephus, Ant. vii, 7; Worr, i, 50, 7) and for sharpening pears (Jer. xxxvi, 23). See PENKNIFE.

4. The razor was often used for Nazaritish purposes, for which a special chamber was reserved in the Temple (Num. vi, 5, 9, 19; Ezek. v, 1; Isai. vii, 20; Jer. xxxvi, 3; Acts xvii, 18; xxi, 24; Mashna, Midd. ii, 5). See Razors.

5. The pruning-hooks of Isai. xviii, 5 were probably curved knives. See PRUNING-HOOK.

6. The lancets of the priests of Baal were probably pointed knives (1 Kings xviii, 28). See LANCET.
gance and complexity which are noticeable in speculations on this subject.

A knight under the feudal system—miles in the Latinity of feudal jurisprudence—was one holding land by military service (servitium militare), with horse, and shield and other uniforms. His function was to serve (Latin, servire, to serve). The crusades and the Teutonic Knights (Bledowicz, Commentaries, li, 62–3). Knighthood in this application corresponds closely with the French designation chevalerie, and its consideration is inextricably intertwined with that of chivalry.

The canons of knighthood have undergone many modifications in the lapse of centuries. The lord mayor of London is knighted for the presentation of an address to the sovereign, and Michael Faraday is deservedly made an officer of the Legion of Honor for chemical and other scientific discoveries; but in the main conception and strict usage of the term knighthood, liege service in war is implied.

"A knight ther was, and that a worthy man, That from the tyne that he first diggan Tothow wed, as well he loved. Trouthe and honour, freedom and curtsey. Ful worthi was he in his lordes were, And thereto bad he ridden, roman ferre, As wel in Cristendom as in hethene, And ever honoured for his worthinesse."

The character of knighthood, however, as distinguished from the mere tenure of land by knight-service, was entirely different. It is committed to the prince and attaches only for life, and is not descendible by inheritance. It cannot be assumed by one's own act, but must be bestowed by another of knighthood or of superior rank. The knight's estate was held by knight-service, or chivalry, and in the old age was entitled to receive the casual incidental to the rank. Hence arose the old adage: "Bon secuier vault mielz que pauere chevelier." But the reality or the obligation of personal military service was always entailed by knighthood.

I. Origin of Knighthood or Chivalry.—Under the impulse of the same uncritical spirit which referred the ascent of the Britons to Brutus and wanderers from Troy, the origin of knighthood has been traced back to the judges of Israel or to the heroes of the Iliad. More modest inquirers have been content to go no further back than the "Order of the Golden Angel" (313), or to the equally imaginary Etruscan "Order of St. Anthony," and the aborigines of the African deserts. Others, more modest still, ascend only to "King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table," or Charles Martel and the "Order of the Garter," or to "Charlemagne and his Paladins." In all such genealogies there is much fantasy, confusion, and retrospective legend. The incidents of war must all ages present some general resemblances. There must always have been leaders and followers, brothers in arms, and associations of heroes, in spite of too many "mournes ant Agamemnon." Such tendencies in human nature as prompted these military unions might furnish the impulse to subsequent institutions, but to ascribe the origin of the institutions themselves to the first recorded manifestation of these tendencies is to renounce all historic veracity, and hence it is confuted by the existence of a definite institution, with precise and distinctive characters, animated by a peculiar spirit, which gave its coloring to society for many generations, and which has moulded the type of life and manners. What is contemplated is a "military institution, prompted by enthusiastic benevolence, sanctioned by religion, and combined with religious ceremonies, the purpose of which was to protect the weak from the oppression of the powerful, and to defend the right against the wrong." (James, History of Chivalry, chap. i). The only important omissions in this definition are the obligation of "honour aux dames," knightly truth, and the thorough interpenetration of Christian profession, if rarely of Christian practice.

The term of knighthood, but only the germ, may unquestionably be found in the ancient usages of the Teutonic tribes and in the Teutonic comitatus, which coalesced with Roman customs and with the suggestions of the times in shaping feudalism. The very name of vassal, knight, successor, servitor, military follower, would indicate such a derivation. "Arms sumere non ante cuiquam moris quam civitas suffuturam probavit. Tum in ipso concilio principium aliquis, vel pa ter, vel propinquus, scuto frameaque juvenem orant. Hoe aqua filos toga, hic publicus juvenil honor; ante hoc domus pars viduent, mex repiaeunt. . . . Ceteris roburisibus et jam pridem probatis adgresquant; nec rubor inter societes angusti." (Tacticus, Germa. c. xiii; comp. c. xiv). To this same source must be ascribed in part, but only in part, the chivalrous deference for women: "in oases quin etiam sanctam aliquid et providum pertagant; nec aut consilia eorum aspernatur aut responsum neglegunt" ( Ibid, c. viii). The intensification and spiritu-alization of this deference are due to Christianity.

Ethical temperaments, ethical tendencies, and ethical usages are seldom entirely eradicated. They continue to be reproduced under new forms, animate new institutions, and enter into strange and often undetected combinations. With this explanation, knighthood may be, in some measure, referred to the rude warriors of the forests of Germany, who are described in the great western monographs in terms more applicable to the Indians of North America than to any populations which really occupied the provinces of the crumbling empire of Rome. The actual historical origin of knighthood, though very obscure, may be safely assigned to a much later age, and to more potent influences than those which flowed from the Rhine, and the Elbe, and the shores of the Baltic.

Without recurring to the details of the feudal system [see Feudalism], it may be stated that feudal services (servitium) were strictly limited, and prescribed military service for a fixed time and of a fixed amount. Circumstances might occur which would demand longer, less restricted, and less formally organized warfare. Such circumstances did occur in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries. During the Norman ravages of France, the early history of the High Middle Ages, the decay of the Carlovian dynasty, universal anarchy, misery, and outrage covered the land. The perils from the barbarous enemy were scarcely greater than those from violent and rapacious barons, and from lawless and lordless plunderers. The multiplied horrors of the dismal period were aggravated by general depopulation, by famine, by plague, and by disastrous proclivities on the earth and in the heavens. The bonds of authority were snapped; the regular organization of the feudal society was rent and suspended; immediate protection and prompt service, in proportion to rank and subordination, were demanded on all sides. Those who had the power, the heart, and the will, found abundant work for active hands to do in the defense of women and children, of the old and infirm, of unarmed merchants and pilgrims, of priests and monks; and rode through the country endeavoring to repress disorders, if unable to establish order. The condition of things was even worse than such as might now provoke Lynch law or instigate vigilance committees. Of course, the vigilance committees of the closing millennium assumed the authority of the vassals, the power of the lords, and the domestic influence of the dukes. Accordingly, the avengers of iniquity were guided by an earnest, though usually rude and blundering sense of Christian obligation in their generous warfare. It thus became the avowed duty of the true knight to serve women, to protect the feeble, to minister to the wounded, to comfort the wretched, to repress or punish wrong, and in all honor to uphold and to do the right.

"He had abroad in arms wonne muche fame,
And did far landes with glory of his might;
Ful true, and ful, true, and ever true,
And ever lov'd to fight for ladies right;
But in valye-glories frays he little did delight."

While these calamitous generations writhe through their long agony in Frans, the progress of the Holy Warfare in Spain against the Saracens invited and enriched the princes, nobles, and adventurers who fought for the Cross against the Crescent. Religious fervor was thus intimately conjoined with martial prowess. But, both in France and Spain, and, in less degree, in other countries, there was a few of those circumstances which produced such supernatural phenomena. In all cases there was a relaxation of the direct connection of military achievement with landed estates and feudal subordination. High moral qualities and Christian zeal were required of the landless or lonely knight, or were annexed as requirements to complete the character of the accomplished feudal vassal. Thus the true knight came to be distinguished from the knight by feudal tenure; though the feudal knight might possess, and was expected to possess, knightly characteristics in addition to his feudal dominion, he was, in general, treated with less respect.

Doubtless in France and Spain, and elsewhere, chivalrous enterprise was encouraged, if not originated by the Church, the sole moral authority of those days, which was anxious for peace, earnest for order, vowed to the maintenance of right, and eager to subordinate to spiritual rule and guidance the military ardor and the temporal power of the time.

All these influences and all these tendencies, of various age and origin, converged and commingled, with augmented energy in each, in the Crusades. These romantic and persistent enterprises may have been undertaken and prolonged by the instigation and for the interest of the Papacy, but they were none the less the outburst of popular enthusiasm, and of a popular enthusiasm which gave form and active reality to an instinctive perception of urgent policy. Whole nations are not impelled for centuries to arduous and perilous undertakings by any extrinsic force; the enduring impulse by which they are set and kept in motion must be a living power in their own bosoms, "bequeathed by bleeding sire to son."

Looking back from the safe vantage-ground of a half-century which has been with several of us more than two hundred years, it is difficult to appreciate justly the alarming dangers to which Christianity and Christian nations were exposed from Moslem aggression at the commencement of the second millennium of our era. The apprehension was not dispelled entirely till the victories of John Scipio and the Alcázar under the walls of Vienna (1683). It is equally difficult to estimate now the effect of a wild, warlike fanaticism against Saracens and Pagans in implanting the recently acquired and imperfectly received creed in turbulent spirits, and perhaps more difficult to recognize the part rendered by the Holy War in diffusing and deepening the sentiment of a common faith, a common interest, a common civilization throughout Western Europe—a Christendom, or dominion of Christ.

All of these feelings were quickened by the Crusades, and were both exalted and rendered, in some sort, self-conscious by them. It must be remembered that the Crusades did not begin with Peter the Hermit and the Council of Clermont, but that the crusading spirit had been previously manifested and cherished in Spain, in Sicily, and in northern Africa. In this spirit only received its full development and definite purpose by being directed to the recovery of Jerusalem. Through distant Asian expeditions the desultory and unregulated adventure for the maintenance of Christian belief and Christian security was generalized, organized, disciplined, and directed toward a common end. The military barons were withdrawn from domestic discords, and a guided to a great European aim. War was in some degree sanctified; it was ennobled, at least in the conception of the warrior, by being employed for the defense and maintenance of the faith. A war of holy war, an unfruitful union was thus effected between devotion and military prowess. There is no question here of the use which was made of this combination for the extension of ecclesiastical domination. All that is contemplated is the consequence of this union in the production of chivalry and of the knightly character—this magnificent and previously unimagined ideal, however far human vices, and passions, and frailties may have prevented the perfect realization of that ideal. In Christianity to be condemned in these late ages because so few of those who profess its beliefs have beheld such the noblest, and the most magnificent of all human achievements, and because so many fail to add the Christian graces to the plainer merits of Christian belief and morals? The vision of the Holy Grail may visit this sorrowful earth, but it is not on earth that it can be won even by Sir Galahad.

Another inference must be admitted to have exercised a beneficial effect on the formation of knighthood. This is the contact and comparison with the intellectual and social culture of the degenerate Greeks, and with the elegance and courtesy of the Saracens. This influence must have been more felt in France, particularly in the south, in the works of Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Joinville, the father of the encycloped, and Raymond of Toulouse, and Godfrey of Bouillon, and Robert of Normandy carried with them to the Holy Land in the First Crusade much of that courtly bearing and generous sentiment which did not become generally disseminated through the Christian West, or through the nobility at home, till the Second and Third Crusades. These qualities may have been directly and indirectly communicated by the Saracens in Spain, Sicily, and Southern France.

Old institutions of the German forest life: the effects of the economic and of feudal organization on the characteristics of a ravaged, ruined, and distracted country; the operation of religious zeal, and even of general religious fanaticism; the action of the priesthood, and collision with cultivated Greeks and brilliant Saracens, all contributed to the formation of the type of a Christian soldier—a true knight, a preux chevalier, sans tâche et sans reproche. The judgment is accordingly correct which regards the era of the Crusades, when the regular and permanent Orders were instituted, as the true period of the formation of that ideal of knighthood which was one of the most precious legacies for which modern times were indebted to the Middle Ages. Undoubtedly there was a previous growth of the same kind, but the growth did not proceed to mature and perfect frugality until all agencies were efficaciously combined on the sacred soil of Palestine. It is a cause of great embarrassment in endeavoring to ascertain the characteristics and origin of any institution which has widely prevailed in obscure ages, that such institutions only gradually assume the complete form which is their familiar shape, that many concurrent streams flow in at different periods and add their contributions, and that the darkness of the foregoing time affords every opportunity and every temptation to throw back into the past those characteristics which only belong to the institution in its final development. The same confusion which presented Vergil as a necromancer to medieval fancy, and made Thebes a feudal duke of Athens in the imagination of Chaucer and Shakespeare, and exhibited Dan Hector and Sir Alexander to the admiring regards of baronial circles in the thirteenth century, pushed back the distinctions of knighthood to periods in which the germ of chivalry existed only in a lower and disconnected form.

By this glamour the Arthurian cycle and the Carolvian myths were fashioned, and the inventions and ideas of the twelfth century were provided with a historical existence in the sixth and eighth. After knighthood became an established institution, it was not only known all over, but generally that it seemed to be a necessary part of social order. Saladin is said to have sought and received the accoed from a Christian lady, and the Byzantine emperor Manuel Comnenus held jousts and tourneys on the plains of Antioch. (*Necit. Chomat. iii. 8; comp. Joann. Cantacuzenus. l, 42). II. Nature of Knighthood.—A knight was a soldier (miles), usually, but not necessarily, of gentle blood—a soldier in the good sense of the word (*Cavallarius, chevalier, caballero) with panoply complete—

"From top to toe no place appeared bare, That deadly dint of steel endanger may."

In the feudal hierarchy he was the holder of a knight’s fee, but, as chivalry was developed, he might be “lord of all the land beside,” and so he was; his position was thus distinguished from the estate, and, although penalties were imposed for conferring the character on any one not of knightly blood and of knightly havings, yet the honor, once bestowed, was indelible except by degradation for unworthy conduct. This point was decided in an English court of law by lord Coke, and the decision was more recently confirmed by lord Kenyon in the case of “Sir John Gallini,” a ballet-master. Knighthood thus came to designate personal character and station, in contradistinction to political rank. The importance of this distinction was that in war the fate of the outcome was often in the hands of one man. The French du Guesclin, or the Chevalier Bayard, might be the pearl of knights, and might sit down with princes; the powerful and wealthy baron might be wholly destitute of knightly estimation.

The virtues that were rendered to morals and civility when lofty virtues were thus broadly discriminated from territorial possessions and worldly rank. It was a noble model of personal purity and elevation which was presented for imitation to a warlike and stormy age. The knightly character, and the obligations imposed by that character, were strikingly delineated in the instructions of Alphonso V of Portugal to his son and heir, when he knighted him after the conquest of Azirilla (1471), in the presence of his slain Count de Marialva. "First, to instruct you," said the king, “what the nature of knighthood is, know, my son, that it consists in a close confederacy or union of power and virtue, to establish peace among men, whenever ambition, avarice, or tyranny troubles states or injures particulars; for knights are bound to employ their swords on these occasions, in order to dethrone tyrants and put good monarchs on their throne. But they are likewise obliged to keep fidelity to their sovereign, as well as to obey their chiefs in war, and to give them salutary counsels. It is also the duty of a knight to be frank and liberal, and to think nothing of his own but his horse and arms, which he ought to keep for the sake of acquiring honor with them, but not to keep them in order to render service and country, and of those who are unable to defend themselves; for, as the priesthood was instituted for divine service, so was chivalry for the maintenance of religion and justice. A knight ought to be the husband of widows, the father of orphans, the protector of the poor, and the prop of those who have no other support; and they who do not act thus are unworthy to bear that name. These my son, are the obligations which the order of knighthood will lay upon you.” Striking the infant thrice on the helmet with his sword, Alphonso added, "May God make thee as a knight of this body as thou seest before thee, pierced in several places for the service of God and of his sovereign" (cited by lord Lyttelton, Hist. of Hen. II, iii. 159, 160. See also Digby, Morea Catholici, bk. ix, chap. x; James, Hist. of Chivalry, chap. 1.).

This lofty exemplar may have been rarely approached in the ages of chivalry. The Black Prince was guilty of sanguinary atrocities. The passions of men were brutal and untamed; temptations were great and frequent; but continual failures would not furnish strange instances of the disproportion between conception and performance. Nevertheless, men, however, by the constant contemplation of excellence, even though it was unattained, and by the repeated efforts after each-decrescence to aspire to the perfection so often abandoned. Much, too, was pathed by the spirit and occasional accomplishment of the high duties required. Even more, perhaps, was slowly secured by the bitter shame and repentance which ever revived, and thus perpetuated, the desire and the image of better things. “Altius ibunt qui ad summam nuntiatur.”

M观光ions, in a word, undoubtedly flowed from the conjunction of chivalry with the Provençal courts of love, which were of mingled Greek and Saracenic descent. They contributed much to the obscurantism and debasement of the wise idea, but they contributed fully as much to the enrichment and polish of the intercourse between the sexes. They added life and intellectual culture to martial bearing; they toned down the rough, blunt manner of the battle-field to the elegant and respectful courtesies of the boudoir. They exacted from “the dauntless in war” who should be equally gentle in peace and “faithful in love.” Thus gallantry was mollified and softened into civility, which was the antithesis of military brusquerie, as in the abbe Talleyrand’s celebrated vitriolism. Hence sprung that thoroughly modern and Christian product, “the gentleman of the olden time,” of whose Sir Harry Lee of Ditchley might speak, “many a handsome, pleasant, and licentious accompanied those amiable graces in Provence, Languedoc, Aquitaine, and other sunny southern lands, at any rate wise was stripped of its brutality and coarseness, and lost its brazen shamelessness and virulent contumely. The name of chivalry itself, the laudable” were always demanded of the knight, the sensualism of the countries of romance was only accidentally connected with knightly conduct, and never formed any part of its nature. Moreover, though it be true that “The evil that men do lives after them, And their names rung down through time from their bones,” the converse is equally true; and modern generations unquestionably owe much of those rarely-attained perceptions which are now most admired to the fragrant naivety and ornate prunesc of the Cours d’Amar and Jezu Fauranc.

In an splendid Arthurian cycle—a brighter realm of romance than all the legends of Homer and the Homeric—the heroes and heroines are sadly stained and spotted with moral blurs and blotches, and even with gross crimes. Sir Lanceot, “first of knights,” bears an ineradicable brand; but still is scarce “Less than a changeling roused, and the excess Of glory obscured.”

The birth and the marriage of King Arthur are equally foul; and the champions and dams that encircled him are all tainted, except Sir Galahad—“among the faithless, faithful only he.” But, despite the endless detail of weakness, of ruf, and of sin, the central idea comes forth, like the sun emerging from a bank of clouds—the noblest dream of human fantasy, the highest evidence of eternal aspirations from the midst of vicious indulgences and multiplied contaminations. This type is true knighthood, and what knighthood was has been already partly explained; what it is in the Arthurian romances is shown by Arthur’s latest bard:

“In that fair Order of the Table Round, A glorious company, the flower of men, To serve as model for the mighty world, And be the fair beginning of a time. I made them lay their bands in mine, and swear To reverence the king, as if he were Their conscience, and their conscience as the king; To break the heathen, and uphold his fait; To ride abroad rebreeding human wrogs; To speak no slander, nor listen to it; To lead sweet lives in pure chastity; To love one maiden only, cleave to her, And worship her by years of noble deeds, Until they love her; for indeed I know Of no more subtle master under heaven Than the disdainful passion for a maid, Not one to keep down the base, base man. But teach high thoughts, and amiable words, And be not dissatisfied, and the desire of God. And love of truth, and all that makes a man.”
III. Classes and Degrees of Knighthood.—Knighthood may be loosely distributed into six classes: 1. Feudal knighthood; 2. Simple knighthood; 3. Regular knighthood, or the knighthood of the spiritual orders, like the Knights of Malta; 4. Honorary knighthood, as of the Garter; 5. Titular knighthood, as in England and many other countries, constituting a dignity of lesser nobility; 6. Masonic knighthood, which has been the order of the Knights in Freemasonry, the Knights of Pythias, etc. The first of these classes furnishes the foundation and origin of all the rest, but needs no further notice than has been already given. The last is foreign to the present purpose. The fifth may be excluded, as it is less pertinent than the regular, and honorary knighthood require further, but brief consideration.

Each of these classes exhibits the same general constitution, though the third is only an imitation, and a preposterous prolongation of the first with the forms of the second. In each there are usually three degrees. In actual chivalry, these were the page, the squire, and the knight. The young son of a knight, or of a noble who was also a knight, was placed at the age of seven years in the service and charge of another knight, selected on account of family connection, friendship, or personal connection. At the age of fourteen he was placed in the livery of his lord, to serve him during the term of service, and was trained in the exercises of military and chivalric education. The young valet (valetudinarian, valet de chambre) was taught to ride, to run, to leap, to shoot with the bow, to hawk, to play on the lute. He was taught obedience and attention to his superior, and was supposed to be kept in the observance of religion and morals. He attended his patron in war, but armed only with a short dagger. His person was safe in the melee, for it was dastardy to assail a page. In the intervals of serious occupation he received guests and ministered to their comforts, and waited on the châtelaine and the other ladies of the household, receiving instruction in legend, and poesy, and song; in manners, and in the formalities of love. The character of the instruction in the last easy science may perhaps be conjectured from the tenor of the lessons composed for his daughters by the knight De la Tour Landry in 1571.

At the age of fourteen the young valet—the term is often extended to the second stage—received a sword, consecrated by religious benedictions, in exchange for his dagger, and entered on the degree of squire (escuyer, escuyer, armiger). His exercises were now mainly directed to horsemanship. He was taught the manege, and to act the part of a noble man in the battlefield. He was trained to ride a horse without touching the stirrup. He was taught the maniere, and was trained in the art of noble horsemanship. He learned the lance, or shield, or helmet, or gauntlet, or sword, or lance, or on horseback without touching the stirrup. He was taught the manege, and the whole art of "noble horsemanship." He conducted the knight's lance, or shield, or helmet, or gauntlet, or on horseback, or horse, or led his destrier. He attended him in the tourney and in the battle. He was a regular combatant in the fight, but he was not trained to surrender, or to defend, or to remount his principal. He cultivated courtoise, protected his pleasant studies in the art of love, began to wear ladies' favors, sought to become démoniaque—that is, neither shy, nor haughty, nor awkward; and diligently imitated the procedure and imitated the spirit of his senior.

At full age—though the honor was often postponed, and sometimes accelerated—the squire was advanced to the complete knighthood, which was bestowed with much solemnity, ceremonial, and religious intervention. These accompaniments were, of course, dispensed with when the promotion was conferred on the battle-field. Usually, however, the reception of knighthood was ordered at some high festival, and was surrounded with imposing and ornate rites.

The various ceremonies and spiritual procedures were adopted in different countries, in different orders, and at different times. They were all symbolic, in accordance with that love of symbol and allegory which characterized unsettled times. There was, however, such a general resemblance in the form and spirit of the ceremonies that a general description of the procedure may be readily given. It is only necessary to understand that some of the incidents were at times omitted, and that others were frequently modified.

The most elaborate of all investitures appears to have been that of the Order of the Garter, as described in a manuscript in Frend, first published by Edward Basse, and cited textually by Du Cange (s. v. Miles). The novice was intrusted to the charge of select squires. His beard was shaved and his hair was shorn. In the evening, dressed as a simple valet, the novice was sent to instruct him in his obligations. Minstrels and squires came singing and dancing to conduct him to the bath that had been prepared. He was stripped naked and put into the bath. He then received further instructions. When he issued from the bath, he was put to bed to dry off. When dry, he was taken up and clad warmly, with a red garment over the rest, having sleeves and a coat like a hermit's. The novice led him to the chapel, the attendant squires singing and dancing again. He remained at his vigil and prayers all night. At break of day he was conducted and received in the chamber of the valet (valetudinarian, valet de chambre), which he was to inhabit. After he had rested, the knights and squires reappeared, and clothed him. He was then conducted on horseback, with song and dance, to the great hall. His spurs were fastened on by the two noblest knights present, who held the stirrups for him, and then conducted him to his apartment (chambre du jour, chambre des amis), and then to his office. His sword, suspended from a baldric (scutulum), was buckled on by another knight. The king, or officiating knight, then struck him thrice on the cheek (clop, a slap), or on the head, or helmet, or with the flat of his sword (scutella, scutella, doppo : see these titles in Du Cange, and that of scutella, doppo in le Sermoi, and kissed him. The spurred and belted knight was now led back to the chapel, when he knelt, and, laying his hand on the altar, swore to uphold Holy Church through life. Guizot enumerates twenty-six engagements in a knightly oath. The postulant, with his attendant knights, next proceeded to hold high festival, but the young knight was not allowed to eat, to drink, or to move, or to look about him, while the rest were feasting. After further ceremonial, he mounted his horse, assumed his arms, and exhibited feats of warlike dexterity, in the entertainment and admiration of the assembled ladies.

This is an abridged, if not a brief account of knighthood investiture. These minute and tedious formalities, which are traversed by Don Quixote, belong only to times of peace, and subsequent to the establishment of the regular orders.

V. The Regular Orders grew out of the necessities of the Holy War in Spain and in Palestine. The knights, like priests, were vowed to celibacy, and were designed to be ecclesiastical soldiers. They were to protect pilgrims, to feed the hungry, to entertain the poor, to shield the weak, to nurse the sick and the wounded, to assert the faith, to defend the Christian land, and to do zealously all duties of charity, devotion, and war. The most noted of these Orders were:

1. The Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, instituted by Godfrey de Bouillon in 1099 to guard the sepulchre of Christ. They were distinguished by a golden cross, crowned with four crosses of the same, pendent from a black ribbon. They languished and expired after the fall of the Latin kingdom of Jerusalem.

2. The Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, or Knights Hospitallers, afterwards successively Knights of Rhodes (q. v.) and Knights of Malta (q. v.). They were founded about 1048 by some Neapolitan merchants, and organized in 1104. In peace they wore the black robe of the Augustinian friars, with a cross of silver on it. In war they exchanged the black robe for a white gown. On the expulsion of the Christians from Palestine they passed over to Cyprus, where they remained till their conquest of Rhodes, 1308. Driven out of Rhodes by the Turks, 1322, they received Malta from the emperor Charles V, 1350. The order expired with the surrender of the island to Napoleon in 1798. See HOSPITALITIANS (HL). The Knights of the White Elephant, or Knights of the Cross, founded in 1118 by two French Crusaders, Hugo de Pagani and Godfrey Aldemar (or of St. Omer), and organized in 1126. Their rules were drawn up for them by Bernard of Clairvaux. Their badge was a red cross embroidered on a white cloak; their emblem, two knights on one horse, was to indicate their vow of poverty. They soon, however, acquired immense wealth, and were accused of horrid vices and crimes; but Ashmole remarks that many sober men judge that their wealth was their greatest crime. After sharp persecutions and iniquitous trials, they were suppressed with savage cruelty in France by Philippe le Bel, 1310, and soon after in other countries. They were charged with the possession of 40,000 lordships in Europe. See TEMPLARS.

(IV.) The Knights of Mary, or the Teutonic Order, established for the support of poor pilgrims of all nations by German knights, organized in 1190 by the survivors of the army of Frederick Barbarossa. Their distinctive garb was a white mantle, having on the front a black cross with a white potence. Before the loss of Palestine, the Teutonic knights, under their grand-master Hermann von Salza, fought and armed against the Prussians, Lithuanians, and heathen tribes of north-eastern Europe. By the secularization of Prussia, in 1325, under their grand-master Albert of Brandenburg, the order was broken up, was deprived of its most valuable possessions, and passed out of notice. See TEUTONIC KNIGHTS.

(V.) The Knights of San Sicoladro, founded by Alphonso V of Aragon in 1118. Extinguished, and its commanderies added to the crown, by Charles II, 1665.

(VI.) The Knights of Santiago de la Espada, in Spain, refer their origin to 887, but received their definite constitution in 1170. See TEUTONIC KNIGHTS.

(VII.) The Knights of Alcantara, 1158, and,

(VIII.) The Knights of Calatrava, 1199, were instituted to guard the western and southern portions of Spain against the Moors. The grand-mastership of both was ultimately assumed by the crown of Spain. The regular orders of knighthood were designed to promote Christian virtues and Christian conduct, and to employ chivalrous energies for the maintenance and extension of Christianity, and the protection of Christendom against Saracens and Pagans. These functions they have not always discharged in directer age, and, while such services were essentially necessary. With merit came favor, and power, and wealth, and arrogance, and negligence, and idleness, and luxury, and other vices. It is the old and oft-repeated story of energy declining into corruption. But they had afforded Europe time and security to develop, knit together, and confirm its civilization and its strength. When they were extinguished by secular greed for their possessions, their aptitude had disappeared. "Othello's occupation was gone" when "villainous salt-petre" had totally changed the organization of armies and the conduct of battles. It was chiefly during this period of confusion that sovereigns and princes, desirous of preserving the amusements, exercises, attachments, loyalty, splendor, and honors of knighthood—perhaps, also, of perpetuating its spirit—instituted the order in imitation of the regular orders. The enumeration and description of the multitude of such associations would afford little additional illustration of knighthood. It must suffice to name a few of these imitative establishments.

VI. Honorary Knighthood.—Of this there were the following:

The Order of the White Elephant of Denmark

The Order of the Holy Roman Empire

The Order of Saint Louis

The Order of Saint Andrew and Saint Catherine

The Order of Saint George (of Prussia)

The Order of Saint Patrick

The Order of Saint Honor

The Iron Crown (for Italy)

There is no necessity, and would be little propriety in noticing titular and social, or fantastic knighthood here. In 1738, Burke lamented that "the age of chivalry was gone." Its expiring gleams glazed the stark forms of Bayard at the Seina and of Sir Philip Sidney at Zutphen. An institution which, even after a long decline, could breed such characters as these, had obviously rendered a service to humanity of the highest degree. The age of chivalry may be gone, and the forms of chivalry may be relegated to the domain of Romance, but its spirit lives on, offering examples which the young still welcome in their dreamy and joyous days, and which the mature and the old still contemplate with fond and reverential regard. The ideal remains the same, but purified and cleansed from the frivolities and alloys of its former embodiment—and aids in fashioning modern sentiment to the conception and admiration of the Christian gentleman. Disregarding the vices which connected themselves with chivalry, which were not, in the main, not of its essence, the merit and condemnation invariably bestowed upon it by discerning historian. It aimed to achieve—as far as the circumstances of its actual manifestation permitted—it did achieve, in thought, if rarely in act—what the oath of the new-made knight bound him to pursue as his rule of action through life. Its influences are transmitted to the passing generation, which has itself witnessed shining illustrations of their abiding efficacy.

VII. Literature.—Mills, History of Chivalry (London, 1825); James, History of Chivalry and the Crusades (London, 1860), are well known to general readers. Familiar also are the notices in Blackstone's Commentaries, bk. ii, chap. v; Robertson, History of Charles V, Introduction; Hallam, Middle Ages, and Guizot, Histoire de la Civilisation en France, ii, Chap. vi. The more important and authoritative works on the subject are less known, and some of them are inaccessible to students in this country. Among them may be specified, Lord Lyttonel, Life and History of Henry II (London, 1777, 6 vols., 8vo); tedious, but full of information; K. H. Digby, The Bookstone of Honor (London, 1845-5, 3 vols., 12mo); and More, Catholic and Civilized (London, 1877, 3 vols., 8vo). Dugdale, Dissertation upon Knighthood in The Antiquities of Warwickshire (London, 1656, folio); Selden, Titles of Honor (1614, 4to); Segar, Honor, Military and Civil (1602, folio); Spelman, Dissertation de Milite; Upton, De Studio Militari, etc. (London, 1654, folio); Clarke, Knights of the Middle Ages; Sir H. N. Wright, Ancient Literature Works; Du Cange, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Latin, title Miles, Adorable, Alope, Armiger, Calcar, Cinclusum, Vali, et, etc., and Declinationes sur Joannou; Muratori, Antiq. Italy; Mireus, Originis Equitum rite Militari Ordini; Paul, Vie de la Chevalerie, etc.; Memorie de la Chevalerie Ancienne et moderne; Vouco de la Colombrie, Le Vrai Théâtre d'Honore et de la Chevalerie; De la Chevalerie de St. Valaye, Memoires sur l'ancienne Chevalerie (Paris, 1759-78); Ampeire, De la Chevalerie; Perrot, Collection Historique des Ordres de Chevalerie (Paris, 1836); Gourdon de Genouillac, Dictionnaire Historique des Ordres de Chevalerie (Paris, 1853); Reibich, Geschichte der Ritterorden (Stuttgart, 1842). A very copious account of the regular and natural Orders of Honorary Knighthood—extending to 157 associations, but not including the Order of the Victoria Cross and other recent orders—may be found in the cyclopedia Littiumarienses.

KNILL, richard, an English missionary of the Independents, was born of humble parentage, at Brauntorp, April 14, 1787. In 1816 he proceeded as a missionary to India under the London Society, where he continued until 1819, and then returned to England.
Kniperdolling, Bernard, one of the leaders of the Anabaptists of Münster, was born, probably in that city, towards the close of the 15th century. His attachment to Lutheran principles caused him to be exiled from Münster, and in his travels he connected himself with the Anabaptists in Sweden. Returning to Münster, he became the leader of the religious enthusiasts there, together with Rothmann, Matthiesen, and Bockhold, and, by disturbing the quiet and tranquility of the city, he succeeded in obtaining the expulsion of the bishop of Münster. His imprisonment by order of the bishop of Münster. Imprisonment by no means dampened his ardor, and no sooner had he been released than he placed himself at the head of his partisans, and actually succeeded in becoming master of the city. Taken and imprisoned again, he was released by his friends, and soon acquired such reputation that the Anabaptists elected him in 1534 burgomaster of Münster. The same rabble which had succeeded in electing him to the principal office of the city now assumed control over him, and, making common cause with the imperial princes, they elected John of Leyden, with Matthiesen, they immediately filled all public offices with their adherents, and proclaimed equality of estates, community of goods, and polygamy. All who showed the least signs of opposition were summarily dealt with; but so severe became Kniperdolling, who had subsequently been elected stadtholder, and had appointed John of Leyden king of Münster, that he was arrested by order of the "king" and imprisoned. The Roman Catholic party finally gained the upper hand in 1536, when Kniperdolling was taken, convicted of adhering to that party, and to be afterwards put to the sword, which sentence was executed Jan. 23, 1536. He persisted to the last in his opinions, and refused to become reconciled to the Roman Catholic Church. His body was exhibited in an iron cage (which still remains) suspended from the belfry of St. Lambert's Church, Münster. See Catrou, Hist. des Anabaptistes, vol. ii.; Mencken, Scriptores Reu. Knipstro (also KNIPSTROH of KNIPSTROW, Latin Knipstrovisus), John, a German reformer, was born at Sandrow, near Lovelberg, Silesia, May 1, 1497. Educated among the Franciscans, he was sent by the abbot of his convent to finish his studies at the University of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. Here he was a witness of the famous "Actus disputations" in which John Tetzel attempted to prove Luther's heresy against Ither's gen. Knipstro, who had read the theses preserved at Loussau so conclusively that the latter withdrew from the contest. Knipstro was then sent to the convent of Pyritz, in Pomerania, in the hope that quiet and rest would calm his revolutionary ardor; but he improved his time in disseminating the reform in every manner. He brought the whole convent to share in his views. The town heard of this, and Knipstro was invited by the citizens to preach to them, which he did with such success that the whole town soon became Protestant, but the bishop interfered in favor of Roman Catholicism, and Knipstro was obliged in 1522 to flee to Stettin, where he married. In 1524 he went to Stargard, and thence to Stralsund, where his eloquence proved fatal to the Roman Catholic party, and where, in 1525, he was appointed the bishop-interpreter of ecclesiastical affairs. He took part as the general synod of Pomerania in 1585, and was then appointed the first general superintendent of the Church in Wolgast. In 1589 he was made professor at the University of Greifswald, Pomerania, and in 1547 became its rector. A controversy arose with Frederick of Prussia, and the emperor gave him such annoyance that he withdrew to Wolgast, and devoted the remainder of his life to teaching and to Church administration. He died at the last-named place Oct. 4, 1565. His works are: Vom rechten Gebrauch d. Kirchen-Güter (Stralsund, 1588); Bedenkend wider d. Interim, etc. (Stralsund, 1548); Epistola ad D. Melanchthonem, qua Convenimus Ecclesiae Pomeranici ad susplicandum Aug. Confessionem repetitionis declaratur (1562); Widerlegung d. Bekennnisses And. Osiandri e. d. Rechtfertigung (1557); F. Revers et scintellis ecclesiannis (1557), and on the Bible. See Geburth, Geschichte der Gelehrten Pommernland; H. Schmid, Einleitung z. Brandenburg Kirchen Gesch. (J. H. Kittel, Franz Anton, a German theologian of note, was born at Salzdahlum, April 3, 1721, and was successively archidiaconus, general superintendent, and consistorialrath at Wolfenbüttel. He died April 13, 1792. He is celebrated as the discoverer (in the library at Wolfenbüttel) of a MS., a fragment of Ulfila's Gothic version of the New Testament, which he published in 1755. The oldest MS. to which it can be traced is the British Museum MS. Add. 2972. In the earliest part of it, the newer surface being occupied with the Origins and some letters of Isidorus Hispalensis. The portions of the Gothic version of the Epistle to the Romans contained in it are xi, 36-36; xii, 1-5, 17-21; xiii, 1-5; xiv, 9-20; xv, 5-18. These MS. translated (in all probability in 1762 or 1763) in a volume entitled Ulpianus Versionis Gothicæ nova editio copiæ Ep. ad Rom., venerandum antiquitatis monumentum . . . et Latina codices cujusq. MS. scripti . . . una cum varia variae litterarum monumenta hac.usque inediti, etc. The text is the basis of the Nuremberg letterpresses, and in each word is Kittel's reading of it in italics, and under that a Latin translation of each. On the other side there is a Latin version found in the Codex, under that the reading in the Vulgate, and under that the Greek text. There are also twelve plates, containing admirably-executed fac-similes of different codices; and among the notes is found an extract of considerable length from Otfried's Gospel Harmony. The volume contains also two fragments from ancient Greek codices of the N. T. in the Wolfenbüttel library, and a copious critical commentary by Kittel, and is altogether a splendid one; but, as Kittel's knowledge of Gothic was rather imperfect, its literary merits are not quite equal to its sumptuous appearance. Kittel deserves, however, the praise of great laboriousness, as is evinced by his collection of a vast amount of curious matter not elsewhere to be found. The book is very rare, but is generally present at least copies containing all the plates.—Kitto, Dict. Bibl. Lit. vol. ii. s. v.; Dörring, Gelehrten Tecl. Deutschlands, vol. ii. s. v. Knoebel, Karl August, a German theologian, highly distinguished as an exegetical scholar in the Old Testament and as an archiologist, was born Aug. 7, 1807, near Sorau, Silesia. In this town he studied under associate professors Blum and Babich, who were cultured, and had a zeal for learning, and also befriended him with money to pursue his university course at Breslau after his father's death. David Schultz, to whose children he became tutor, exerted a special influence in determining his choice of teaching as a profession, and in fixing the untenable rationalistic tendency of his mind. He began lecturing in 1851, and his freshness, power, and genuine worth at once drew and ever attracted to him numerous hearers. In 1835 he was made extraordinary professor, and in 1837 he received from Breslau the degree of doctor in theology, Chiefly in recognition of his exceedingly valuable work on Hebrew Prophecy (Prophezeitum d. Hofbräer, Breslau, 1837, 2 vols. 8vo). The fame of this work brought him at once the offer of a professorship in Göttingen, in Ewald's place, and of one in Giessen, which latter he accepted. Thenceforth his attention was confined to the study of the Old Testament; but his studied and untrammelled spirit of independent study little to a right appreciation of the theological import or even poeetical beauty of the Scriptures. His publications during his twenty-four years' labor at Giessen (nearly all exeetical) bear the same defect of insight, with the display of great learning. The Commentary on the Prophet Isaiah appeared in the Kurzeüf. exeget. Handb. z. A.T. in 1843 (2d ed. 1854, 3d ed. 1861); on Genesis in 1852 (2d ed. 1860); Exodus and Leviticus, 1857; Numbers, Deuteronomy, and Joshua, 1861. These commentaries are characterized by special sobriety and thoughtfulness, hence the historical and theological views standing in a comprehensive knowledge of Oriental antiquity. In the first-mentioned feature they have the advantage of Hitzig. Knobel is independent, and gives positive views on many points which he was obliged earnestly to defend. He so well understood Ewald, as he so especially in reference to the origin of the Pentateuch with Hupfeld, Tuch, Bertheau, and Stächlin. He is deserving of credit for his ingenuity in bringing out the "Composition theory" concerning the production of the Penteateuch. Knobel died, after long and severe suffering, from a cancer in the stomach, May 25, 1863. In addition to the works already mentioned, Knobel published Commentar über das Oselet (Lpz. 1836, 8vo); and die Medtafel der Genesis (1850, 8vo), a very learned work, and frequently cited in the exegetical department of this Cyclopaedia. See Herzig, Real-Encyclopädie, vol. xix. 5.

Knobelsdorff, Eustachius von, a German Roman Catholic theologian, was born of noble parentage in 1519, at Heidelberg, Prussia; was educated at the universities of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, Leipzig, Wittenberg, and Paris, and upon the completion of his studies took orders in 1541. After a visit of the cardinal of Wormsland to Rome, Knobelsdorff administered the duties of the episcopal office, and in 1563, upon the return of the bishop, was appointed dean-cathedral. He died in 1571. His writings are of but little account. See Alten. Hist. Lex. iij. 41.

Knock (ךֳנָכָקָכ, Cant. v. 2; "beaut," Judg. xix. 22; סָפוֹא, Matt. vii. 7; Rev. iii. 20, etc.). Though Orienttals are very jealous of their privacy, they never knock when about to enter your room, but walk in without warning or ceremony. It is nearly impossible to teach an Arab servant to knock at your door. They give warning at the outer gate or entrance either by calling or knocking. To state and call are in general and respectful mode. Thus Mosses commanded the holder of a pledge to stand without, and call to the owner when about to come out (Deut. xxiv. 10). This was to avoid the vio-etal intrusion of cruel creditors. Peter stood knocking at the outer door (Acts xii. 15, 16), and so did the three men sent to Joppa by Cornelius (Acts x. 17, 18). The idea is that the guard over your privacy is to be placed at the entrance to your premises" (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 192 sq.). See House.

Knollis, Francis, a distinguished English statesman, was born at Gray's, Oxfordshire, about 1580. He studied at the University of Oxford. Admitted at court, he held principal stations in the reign of the King, and during the reign of the Queen Mary ascended the throne he was obliged to retire to the Continent. At Elizabeth's accession he returned, became privy councillor, treasurer of the queen's household, and knight of the Garter. He was one of the judges of Mary Stuart. He died in 1596. Knollis wrote a trea-Knollys, Henry, an eminent English Baptist minister and author, born at Chalke, Wilts, in 1598. He was educated at the University of Cambridge, and after his graduation was ordained as a deacon, and then as a presbyter of the Church of England, and was pre-bented by the bishop of Lincoln with the living at Hummston, in Lincolnshire. Beginning to doubt the truth-Knopf, that is, Knor (Anglo-Saxon ceor, a word employed in the A. V. to translate two terms, of the real meaning of which all that we can say with certainty is that they refer to some architectural or ornamental object, and that they have nothing in common.

1. Kapktor (ןַקקַק or קַקַק) occurs in the description of the candlestick of the sacred tent (Exod. xxv. 31-86, and xxxvii. 17-22, the two passages being identitical). The knop is here distinguished from the shaft, branches, bowls, and flowers of the candlestick; but the knop and the branches go together, and are represented to imitate the produce of an almond-tree. In another part of the work they appear to form a boss, from which the branches are to spring out from the main stem. In Amos ix. i, the same word is rendered, with doubtful accuracy, "lintel." The same rendering is used in Zeph. ii. 14, where the reference is to some part of the palace of Nineveh, to be exposed when the wooden upper story — the "cedar work" — was destroyed. The Hebrew word seems to contain the sense of "covering" and "crowning" (Gezenius, Thes. Heb. p. 709). Josephus's description (Ant. iv. 16. 7) mentions the pomegranates (pœxvix), either of which may be the kapktor. The Targum agrees with the latter, the Sept. (παπουπαίος) with the former. See LINTER. All these circumstances point to a signification corresponding especially to that of crown; and in the case of the sacred candelabrum, the term seems to point to a sharp ornamental swell placed (like a horizontal button) immediately beneath the cups that surmounted each arm and section of the shaft. See Tabernacle.

2. The second term, pekalem (ץַקַק), is found only in 1 Kings vi. 16, and vii. 24. It refers in the former to carvings executed in the cedar wainscot of the interior of the temple, and in the latter to the leaves of the cedars which were ornamented with flowers. In the latter case it denotes an or-nous book called The Religion of Protestants, was born at Pagsworth, near Morpeth, in Northumberland, in 1680. He was entered among the Jesuits in 1666, being already in priests' orders; and is represented in the Bibliotheca Patrum Societatis Jesu as a man of low stature, but of great abilities. He taught divinity a long time in the English College at Rome, and was a member of that discipline which he so rigidly exacted from others. He was then appointed sub-provincial of the province of England; and, after he had exercised that employment out of the kingdom, he was twice sent thither to perform the functions of his office. He was present, as procuring a general synod at the general assembly of the Jesuits held at Rome in 1646, and was elected one of the definitors. He died at London January 4, 1656-5. Knott was a great controversialist, and wrote largely, displaying in all his works great acuteness and learning. His first book was a little work entitled Choir Misraiken (Lond. 1630), with the "want whereof Catholicks are unjustly charged, for affirming, as they do with grief, that Protestantism, unrepentant, destroys salvation," which was answered by Dr. Potter, provost of Queen's College, Oxford (in 1652), by a piece entitled Wand of Charity, justly charged on all such Romanists as dare, without truth or modesty, affirm that Protestantism destroys Salvation. To this Knott replied, under the title Merry and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholicks (in 1654), which occasioned Chillingworth to publish The Religion of Protestants. Chillingworth, in 1638, came to the defence in 1638, in a pamphlet entitled Christianity Maintained, and later in a work under the title of Vindicatio Unmaskata, etc. (Ghent, 1652, 4to). At this time, however, Chillingworth had been dead nine years, and in behalf of the noted deceased a reply was made by Thomas Smith, fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge (in 1658), in the preface to an English translation of Daille's Apology for the Reformed Churches. See Gen. Biog. Dict. viii, 49 sq.; Wood, Athenae Oxoni.; De Maizaux, Life of Chillingworth. (J. H. W.)

Knott, John W., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Blairsville, Westmoreland County, Pa., Oct. 7, 1812. He was educated at Jefferson College, Pa., and studied theology at Western and Princeton theological seminaries. After graduation he preached at Gilgal, Pa., for about a year, when he removed to Ohio, and was installed over the churches of Leesville and Ontario; there he continued three years, and then for four years served as pastor of the churches at Hayeville and Johnsville. He was next called to the churches of Keene and Jefferson, where he officiated for seven years. During the remainder of his life, with intervals of relaxation on account of ill health, he preached at Eden, Caroline, Waynesburg, Nevada, and Sandusky, Ohio. He died in Shelby, Ohio, Sept. 5, 1864. Mr. Knott made many sacrifices of personal advancement and comfort to further the cause of religion. He was a man of unbounded faith in the Bible, from which he drew all his theology and philosophy. The burden of his preaching was Jesus Christ and him crucified. He believed, "when he had proven his position from the Bible, he had established it immovably." See Wilson, Preb. Historical Almanac, 1863.

Know (properly ፥, γνώσις) is a term used in a variety of senses in the Scriptures. It signifies particularly to understand (Ruth iii, 11), to approve of and delight in (Psa. i, 6; Rom. viii, 29), to cherish (John x, 27), to experience (Jas. ii, 23), to be acquainted with. It is also used of an inanimate object: "He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more." By a euphemism it frequently denotes sexual connection (Gen. iv, 1; Matt. i, 25). The other scriptural applications of the word (e.g., knowledge, account, information) must have acquired information respecting a subject. (2) It implies discernment, judgment, discretion; the power of discrimination. It may be partial; we see but in part, we know but in part (1 Cor. xiii, 9).
It frequently signifies to have ascertained by experiment (Gen. xxii. 12). (4.) It implies discovery, detection; by the law is the knowledge of sin (Rom. iii. 20).

Natural knowledge is acquired by the senses, by sight, hearing, feeling, etc., by reflection by the properties of the external powers; by natural genius; dexterity improved by assiduity and cultivation into great skill.

So of husbandry (Isa. xxviii. 36), of art and elegance (Exod. xxxvi. 31), in the instance of Bezaleel. Spiritual knowledge is the gift of God, but may be improved by study, consideration, etc. See Knowledge.

Particular Phrases. - The priests' lips should keep knowledge (Mal. ii. 7); not keep it to themselves, but keep it in store for others; to communicate knowledge is the way to preserve it. Knowledge is spoken of as and through the person, as riches, as treasures, as excellence, and as the gift of God (Prov. i. 29; viii. 10, etc.). See Wisdom. "Knowledge puffeth up, but charit Edifieth" (1 Cor. viii. 1), i.e. the knowledge of speculative and useless things, which tend only to gratify curiosity and vanity, which contribute neither to our own salvation nor to our neighbor's, neither to the pub lic good nor to God's glory; such knowledge is much more dangerous than profitable. The true science is that of salvation; the best employment of our knowledge is in sanctifying ourselves, in glorifying God, and in selfifying our neighbor: this is the only sound knowledge (Prov. i. 7).

God is the source and fountain of knowledge (1 Sam. ii. 8; 2 Chron. i. 10; James i. 5). He knows all things at all times, and in all places. See Omniscience. Jesus Christ is possessed of universal knowledge; knows the heart of man, and whatever pertains to his mediatorial kingdom (John ii. 24, 25; xvi. 30; Col. ii. 3). Men know progressively, and ought to follow on to know the Lord (Hos. vi. 8); what we know not now we may know hereafter (John xiii. 7). Holy angels know in a manner much superior to man, and occasionally reveal their knowledge to him. Unholy angels know many things of which man is ignorant. The great discretion of life and of godliness is to discern what is desirable to be known, and what is best unknown; lest the knowledge of "good host and evil got," as in the case of our first parents, should prove the lamentable source of innumerable evils (Gen. ii. 9; iii. 7).

Knowledge of God is indispensable, self-knowledge is important, knowledge of others is desirable; to be too knowing in worldly matters is often accessory to sinful knowledge; the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ is a knowledge in which we all need to rejoice (John xviii. 3). Workers of iniquity have no knowledge, no proper conviction of the divine presence (Psa. xiv. 4). Some men are brutish in their knowledge (Jer. ii. 17): e.g. he who knows that a wooden image is but a shapely-formed stump of a tree, yet worships it; he boasts of his deity, which, in fact, is an instance of his want of discernment, degrading even to brutality (Isa. xiv. 20). Some are wicked in their knowledge, "knowing the depths of Satan, as they speak" (Eph. iv. 29). See Gnosticism.

Knowledge. - By this, according to Sir William Hamilton, 'is understood the mere possession of truths,' and the possession of those truths about which our faculties have been previously employed, rather than any separate power of the understanding by which truth is perceived. "I know no authority," says Dr. Reid, "besides that of Mr. Locke, for calling knowledge a faculty, any more than for calling opinion a faculty." Knowledge is of two kinds, viz. historical or empirical, and philosophical, or scientific or rational. Historical is the knowledge that the thing is; philosophical is the knowledge why or how it is. The first is called historical because in this knowledge we know only the fact—only that that phenomenon is; for history is properly only the narration of a consecutive series of phenomena in time, or the description of a co-existent series of phenomena in space; the second philosophical, to imply that there is a way of knowing things more completely than they are known through simple experiences mechanically accumulated in memory or heaped up in cyclopedias. It seeks for wide and deep truths, as distinguished from the multitudinous detailed truths which the surface of nature presents and actions present, for those a knowledge of the highest degree of generality. "The truth of philosophy," says Herbert Spencer, "bears the same relation to the highest scientific truths that each of these bears to lower scientific truths. As each widest generalization of science is the conclusion of a number of narrower generalizations of its own division, so the generalizations of philosophy comprehend and consolidate the widest generalizations of science. It is therefore a knowledge the extreme opposite in kind to that which experience first accumulates. It is the final product of that process which begins with a mere collection of crude observations, goes on establishing propositions that are broader and more separate from particular cases, and ends in universal propositions. Or, to bring the definition to its simplest and clearest form, knowledge of the largest kind is unfulfilled knowledge; science is partially unified knowledge; philosophy is completely unified knowledge."

This term, however, is associated with the greatest problems and controversies of philosophy, all of which are involved in the discussion of what is meant by knowledge. The different problems, therefore, of the philosophy of knowledge will be found discussed under those names that severally suggest them. — Watts, On the Mind; Dr. John Edwards, Uncertainty, Deficiency, and Corruption of Human Knowledge; Reid, Intellectual Powers of Man; Stennett, Sermon on Acts xxi. 24, 25: Upham, Intellectual Philosophy; Douglas, On the Advancement of Society; Robert Hall, Works; Amer. Library of Useful Knowledge. See Faith and Reason; Idealism; Judgment; Moral Philosophy; Religious Philosophy.

Knowledge of God. - By this is meant a mere knowledge of his existence, for the devils believe that God is; they tremble as they believe it, and they hate the God before whom they tremble. It cannot be a mere partial acquaintance with the character of God, because we cannot for a moment doubt that the Jesus were partially acquainted with God's character, and yet our Lord said to them, "Ye neither know me nor my Father; look, if it be a dry, unfruitful place." There is a knowledge of God, however accurate in its outline that knowledge may be. The knowledge of God includes far more than this. It implies a real, personal, experimental, sanctifying acquaintance with him. It especially includes the renewed God in Christ—that is, the reconciliation of all his perfections in the way of his mercy, unfolding them as the basis for the soul's confidence; that he is righteously and holily merciful, pardoning sin at the expense of no other perfection, but in the full and perfect harmony of all his perfections. Without this knowledge, all our advances in other branches of knowledge are but vain and unprofitable. All other knowledge is useful, entertaining; this alone is needful. This may do without other knowledge, but no other knowledge will do without this. If you teach men of education, you put into their hands a powerful weapon either for good or for evil, according to the direction that may be given to it. If you put into their hands the elements of sound religious knowledge, you give their minds a right and safe exercise, while the knowledge will keep them from the abuse of the tremendous power you put into their hands. KNOWL

Knowles, William, LL.D., an English divine, was born in May, 1692, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was first chaplain to the first marquis of Rockingham, and was by him presented with the rectory of Ithingborow, and afterwards with Bodington, both in Northamptonshire. He died, in all probability, in 1778. Dr. Knowles published an English translation of the Povel's 'Epistles to the Galatians,' with an account of both of Chrysostom and of Jerome. —New Gen. Biog. Dict. viii, 58; Allibone, Dict. Engl. and Am. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Knowles, James Davis, a Baptist minister, was born in Providence, R. I., July, 1798. He learned the printing business, and in 1817 emigrated to the Island of Hawaii. Having joined the Baptist Church in March, 1820, he was in the fall following licensed to preach. Shortly after he entered the sophomore class of Columbian College, Washington, D. C., graduated in 1824, and was immediately appointed one of the tutors of the college, which position he held until called as pastor to the Second Baptist Church of Boston, where he was ordained Dec. 28, 1825. In 1832 impaired health obliged him to resign his pastoral charge, and he became professor of pastoral duties and sacred rhetoric in the Newton Theological Institution, acting at the same time for over two years as editor of the Christian Review, a Baptist quarterly. He died May 9, 1838. Mr. Knowles published a number of occasional Sermons, Addresses, etc. ; Memoir of Mrs. Ann H. Judson, late Missio- nary to Burma (1828); and Memoir of Roger Wil- liams, the Founder of the State of Rhode Island (Boston, 1843).—Sprague, Annals, vi, 707; Appleton, New Amer. Cyclopaedia, x, 192.

Knowles, James Sheridan, the celebrated modern dramatist of England, in later years a minister in the Baptist Church, was born at Cork, Ireland, in 1784, and early distinguished himself as a dramatic writer. In 1814 he began to entertain religious scruples about his connection with the stage, was finally converted, and in 1820 joined the Baptist Church and entered the ministry. He died Dec. 1, 1862, at Tor- quay, in Devonshire. Several of his sermons have been published, but they do not so greatly merit our notice as his exhibition of the Protestant view on the Lord's Supper, which he defended in The Idol demolished by its own Priest (London, 1851, 12mo), an answer to cardinal Wigan's lectures on transubstantiation. He also wrote The Rock of Rome, or the Ark of Israel (London, 1819, 1819, 1823, 1831), a work of his dramatic severity which was rejected and published in 3 vols. sm. 8vo, in 1843 and since. See Allibone, Dict. Engl. and Am. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.; North Amer. Review, xvi, 141 sq.; Chambers, Cyclop. s. v. (J. H. W.)

Knowles, John, a Congregational minister, was born in Lincolnshire, England, and educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge. In 1625 he was chosen fellow of Katharine Hall, and while employed in his duties as a teacher, upon the invitation of the mayor and alder- men of Colchester, became their lecturer. In conse- quence of his opposition to archbishop Laud, his license was taken away, and he immediately removed to New England, and was ordained co-pastor at Water- town, Mass., Dec. 19. In October, 1649, he departed to Virginia, in response to a call for ministerial aid in that destitute region. In a few months, however, he returned to Watertown, whence he returned to England in 1650. He was twice additionally married in the same year. In 1667 he married at Bristol. From this place he was ejected at the Restora- tion, and in 1662 was prevented from public minis- trations by the Act of Uniformity. By permission of king Charles II, in 1672, he became colleague of the Rev. Thomas Kentish at St. Katharine's, London, where he preached until 1685, with the title of municipal preacher. It is said of him that sometimes, while preaching, his very earnestness and zeal so exhausted him that he fainted and fell. Mr. Knowles is represented as having been "a godly man and a prime scholar."—Sprague, An- nals of the American Pulpit.

Knowles, Thomas, D.D., an English divine of great learning and talents, was born at Ely in 1728; studied at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow, and was afterwards, for over thirty years, lecturer of St. Mary's, in Bury St. Edmund's. He be- came successively rector of Bury St. Edmund's, and of North and Chelbrough, and, finally, vicar of Winston, Suffolk. He died in 1802. His principal works are, The Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ (London, 1780, 12mo) ; a new ed., with additions, by the Rev. H. Hasted, London, 1800, 12mo);—Twelve Sermons on the Attributes (Camb., 1769, 8vo);—A Sermon Preached at the Anniversary of the University of Cambridge (1767, 8vo); —Primitive Christianity (1789, 8vo). He also wrote several pamphlets on religious subjects. See Gent. Magazine, vol. lixii; Chalmers, Gen. Biog. Dict.; Allibone, Dict. Engl. and Am. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Knowton, Gideon A., a Methodist Episcopalian, was born in East Haddam, Conn., entered the itinerancy in Central New York in 1800, was soon em- ployed in what was the old Genesee Conference, st. tioned at Albany in 1804, at Saratoga in 1805, and died at Whitestown, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1810. He was deeply pious, a plain, practical, and useful preacher, and of great force and energy. He was a man of much work in the office of the Master.—Minutes of Conferences, 1, 195.

Knowne, men, or justus-men, a name for persons who, in the reign of Henry VII, suffered martyr- dom at the instigation of John Longland, bishop of Lin- coln, either for reading the Scriptures or treaties of Scripture in English, or for hearing the same read. See Hardwick, Hist. of the Reformation, p. 180, note 8; Fox, Book of Martyrs (London, 1653), p. 920-37; Burnet, Hist. of the Reformation (London, 1881), i, 27 sq.

Knox, John (1), the Reformer of Scotland.

1. Early Life.—He was born in Gifford, a village in East Lothian, in 1505, of respectable parents, members of the Romish Church, who were able to give their son a liberal education. After spending some time at the grammar-school of Haddington, he was sent by his father, in 1521, to the University of Glasgow. Here he studied under Maeyer, a famous professor of philosophy and theology. A disciple, by the way, of Gerson and Pe- ter d'Ailly, he advocated the supremacy of general councils over the popes, and, carrying this view into politics, held also that the king's authority is derived from the people—a doctrine which he inculcated in his pupils (Knox as well as Buchanan), and which fully explains the democratic tendencies of the Scotch nation. Knox soon after taking the degree of M.A., Knox became an assistant professor, and rivalled his master in the subtleties of the dialectic art. He obtained clerical orders even before he reached the age fixed by the canons, and about 1580 went to St. Andrew's, and began to teach there. A veil of obscurity hangs over his life for several of the fol- lowing years. It is supposed, however, that the study of the fathers, especially Jerome and Augustine, shook his attachment to the Romish Church as early as 1558, but he did not become an avowed Protestant until 1542 —a fact which shows that he did not yield to turbulent impulses, but with prudence and deliberation. His reproof of existing corruptions compelled him to re- retire from St. Andrew's to the south of Scotland, and he was degraded from his orders as a heretic.

2. In the Reformation. During this period he became a frequent companion of the reformer and martyr Geo. Wishart, to whose instruc- tions he was greatly indebted. When Wishart was apprehended, Knox would fain have come to him and shared his fate, but his friend refused, saying, " Nay, re- turn to your bards, and God will make you suffi- cient for a sacrifice." Wishart was burnt at the stake, under cardinal Beaton's orders, in March, 1546, and with- in two months afterwards the cardinal was put to death. in his own castle of St. Andrew's by a band of nobles and others who held the castle as a stronghold of the reforming interest. Knox, who was daily in danger of his life from Beaton's successor, determined to go to Geneva to prolong his studies, but induced by the parents of his pupils to give up his purpose and take refuge in the castle, which he did with many other Protestants in Easter, 1547. Here for the first time he entered upon the public ministry of the Gospel, and he distinguished himself both as a powerful preacher and a firm opponent of the papacy. But this did not continue long.

II. His Exile.—The arrival of a French fleet enabled the regent of Scotland to invest the castle by sea and by land, and on the last day of July the garrison was compelled to surrender. In May, the Galley-Slaves. The following winter the galleys lay on the Loire, but the next summer they cruised on the east coast of Scotland, often in sight of the steeple of St. Andrew's. Knox's constancy continued unshaken under all toils and trials, which were greatly increased at one time by disease, until in Feb., 1549, after nineteen months of bondage, he was released. At the national interdict of England with the king of France. He immediately repaired to England, where he was warmly welcomed by Cranmer and the council. He was stationed in the north at Berwick, and afterwards at Newcastle, where he labored indefatigably, preaching often every day in the week, notwithstanding many bodily infirmities. He enjoyed the confidence of the English reformers, was made one of King Edward's chaplains, was consulted in the revision of the Prayer-book, and also of the Articles of Religion, and was offered the bishopric of Rochester, but declined it from scruples as to the divine authority of the office. After five years of great and faithful activity, at the end of which he married a Miss Bowes, of Berwick, the accession of Mary to the throne put an end to his usefulness and endangered his life. His own desire was to remain and meet the issue, for, as he said, "never could he die in a more honest quarrel," but the tears and importunity of friends prevailed on him to fly. Accordingly, in January, 1554, he took ship to Dieppe, where he spent his first leisure in writing suitable advices to those whom he could no longer reach by his voice. He also labored indefatigably, preaching often every day in the week, notwithstanding many bodily infirmities. At Geneva he studied Hebrew, and formed a celebrated Calvin an intimate friendship, which ended only with Calvin's death. By Calvin's influence he was induced to take charge of the Church of England exiles at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, but unhappy disputes about the service-book led to his withdrawal after less than six months' service, in March, 1555. He immediately turned his steps to Geneva, where he took charge of an English congregation. But in the same year he made a flying visit to Scotland, during which he preached incessantly, and labored night and day. Among the many distinguished converts he made at this time figured three young lords, who afterwards played no unimportant part in the affairs of their country: Archibald Horn, later earl of Argyll; James Stuart, natural brother of Mary, and later earl of Murray, and regent during the minority of James VI; and John Erskine, who, under the title of earl of Marr, also acted as regent. His influence rendered the reformers more decided in their course, and he instituted in 1556 the famous English or Scottish Church on the Calvinist plan, which had so marked a feature in Scottish ecclesiastical history.

But he judged that the time was not ripe for a general movement, and accordingly returned to Switzerland. After his departure he was cited to appear before an assembly of the Romish clergy, and in his absence was condemned to be burnt as a heretic, and the sentence was executed upon his effigy. In Geneva he spent nearly three years, the happiest and most tranquil of his life. He counted it "the most perfect school of Christ that ever was in the earth since the days of the apostles." He was supplied with a pension by his family, which set him at ease and harmony with his colleague, Goodman, and the small flock under his charge. During his stay he took part in the preparation of what is called the Geneva Bible. He also wrote a number of letters and appeals which were forwarded to Scotland, and had great influence in guiding the councils of the friends of the Reformation. His most singular treatise was a volume entitled The First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women. Although undoubtedly honest in his opinions, it is certain that he was led to them by his abhorrence of the abuses of Mary's reign, and by the servility of English women to her cruelties. But it was an unfortunate publication, for it subjected him to the resentment of two queens, during whose reign it was his lot to live; the one his native princess, Mary, queen of Scots, and the other Elizabeth, exercising a sway in Scotland scarcely inferior to that of any of its own sovereigns. Although his residence at Geneva was so agreeable in many ways, yet duty to Scotland was always uppermost in his mind, and when a summons came from the leading Protestants there for his return, he yielded at once. He left Switzerland, and on the 23d of May, 1559, after a residence of five years, reached Edinburgh, where he was received by the queen. She tried to induce him to return was the concession of liberty of worship promised by the queen regent, but upon his arrival at Leith in May, 1559, he found that she had thrown off all disguises (she had just stipulated to assist the Papal claims against the Protestants) and determined to suppress the Reformation by force. Not only did she refuse the demands of the Protestants, but even summoned a number of the preachers for trial at Stirling. But Knox was not disheartened. He wrote to his sister, "Satan rageth to the uttermost, and I am come, I praise my God, even in the brunt of the battle." The regent, alarmed at the attitude of the Protestants, promised to put a stop to the trial, and induced the accused to stay away, and then outlawed them for not appearing. The news of this outrage came to Perth on the day when Knox preached against the idolatry of the mass and of image worship. At the conclusion of the service, an encounter between a boy and a priest who was preparing to celebrate mass led to a terrible riot. The altar, the images, and all the ornaments of the church were torn down and trampled under foot; nor did it end with this. The "antependium," or altar cloth, was torn out by the houses of the Gray and Black Friars and the Carthusian Monastery were laid in ruins. Treating this tumult as a designed rebellion, the regent advanced upon Perth with a large force, but finding the Protestants prepared for battle, and the Church of England exiles at Edinburgh, the latter came to be distinguished as the Congregation, and their leaders as the lords of the congregation. Under the advice of Knox, they reformed the worship wherever their power extended, and the iconoclasm of Perth was repeated at St. Andrew's and many other parts of the kingdom, not; however, by a riotous proceeding, but by the harmonious action of the authorities and the people. The briefest and best defence of this course was the reformer's pithy saying, that "the rookeries were demolished that the rooks might not return." The contest between the two parties went on for a year, during part of which Knox prosecuted a flaming evangelist in the southern and eastern counties, while at other times he acted as chief agent in securing foreign help for his oppressed countrymen. In this occurred the only serious blot on his fair fame. He wrote to the English government and Parliament that he had received their aid, and, then, to escape reproach from France, might disown them as rebels. The repute which he received from Sir James Croft was well deserved. The civil war was at length terminated by the entrance of an English army, which invested Edinburgh, and by the death of the queen regent. These events led to a truce, and the calling of a free Parliament to settle religious differences.

This body met in August, 1569, and, carrying out what was undoubtedly the wish of the greater part of the people, established the Reformed religion, and interdicted by law any performance of Roman Catholic worship. In all this Knox was not only an active agent, but the spirit which animated all his labors. He prepared and published the first Book of Discipline which bore the impress of his mind. Thus a great step was taken, from which there never afterwards was any serious recession. Knox did not attain all that he desired, especially in respect to the provision for the support of the Church and of education throughout the country. Still he accomplished a radical work, of which all that followed was only the expansion and consolidation. The arrival in the next year (1561) of the youthful queen Mary, who had high notions of prerogative, as well as an ardent attachment to Romanism, occasioned new difficulties in which Knox, as minister in the metropolis, was actively engaged. He had prolonged interviews with her, in which she exerted all her wiles to win him to her side, but in vain. He was always uncomprising, and once drove her into tears. In a letter to the Queen, dated 24th of December, 1560, he said, "There is no respect due to the Queen's Majesty from me. I am not her subject; I am the subject of the commonwealth through his silence. Meanwhile his activity in the pulpit was unabated. In the Church of St. Giles, where sometimes as many as three thousand hearers were gathered, he preached twice on Sundays, and thrice on other days of the week. To these were added other services in the surrounding country. The effect of these labors was immense, as we learn from what the English ambassador wrote to Cecil: "Where your honor exhorteth us to stoutness, I assure you the voice of one man is able in an hour to put more life into us than six hundred trumpets continually blustering in our ears." The vehemence, however, of his public discourses offended some of his friends, and his outspoken opposition to the court led to his alienation from the more moderate party who tried to govern the country in the queen's name; so that from 1563 to 1565 he retired into comparative privacy, but he continued his labors in the pulpit and in the assembly of the Kirk.

The rapid series of events which followed Mary's marriage with Darnley in July, 1565, the murder of Darnley in the next year, the murder of Mary's first husband, and the marriage which was shortly after it, brought him to the front. Mary was compelled to abdicate in favor of her son, and Murray, Aug. 1567, became regent. Further reforms were effected by the Parliament of 1567. The sovereign was bound to be a Protestant, and some better provision was made for the support of the clergy. Knox and Murray were in complete accord, and the affairs of religion seemed so settled that the former desisted from his work, and thought of retiring to Geneva to end his days in peace. But in 1570 Murray was assassinated. Knox shared the general grief, and this event, with the confusions that followed, led to a stroke of apoplexy, which affected his speech considerably. He recovered in part, and was able to resume preaching, but mis understandings sprang up between him and the nobles, and even some of his brethren in the General Assembly. His life being threatened, he, in 1571, by the advice of his friends, who feared bloodshed, retired to St. Andrew's, where he preached with all his former vigor, although unable to walk to the pulpit without assistance. In the latter part of 1572 he was recalled to Edinburgh, and came back to die, "weary of the world," and "tired to death." One of his last public services was an indignant denunciation of the inhuman massacre of St. Bartholomew's. On the 24th of November he quietly fell asleep, not so much oppressed with years as worn out by his incessant and extraordinary labors of body and mind. In an interview with the session of his Church a few days before, he solemnly protested the sincerity of his course. Many had complained of his severity, but God knew that his mind was void of hatred to those against whom he had thundered the severest judgments, and his only object was to gain them to the Lord. He had never made merchandise of God's word, nor studied to please men, nor indulged his own or others' private passions, but had faithfully used whatever talent was given to him for the edification of the Church.

IV. His Character. — Knox was a man of small stature, and of a weakly habit of body, but he had a vigorous mind and an unconquerable will. Firmness and decision characterized his entire course. His piety was deep and fervent, and the zeal which consumed him never knew abatement. Yet it was not unintelligent. He was well educated for his time, and always endeavored to increase his knowledge, even in middle life seizing his first opportunity to learn Hebrew. An inward conviction of eternal realities inspired him with a bold and fervid eloquence which often held thousands of his countrymen and foreigners spell-bound. In a statement to Mary at the time that he took no delight in any one's distress, that he could hardly bear to see his own boys weep when corrected for their faults, but that, since he had only discharged his duty, he was constrained, though unwillingly, to sustain her majesty's tears in a public speech, while one of his own members was crying out, "I cannot endure to see my country perish by your silence. Meanwhile his activity in the pulpit was unabated. In the Church of St. Giles, where sometimes as many as three thousand hearers were gathered, he preached twice on Sundays, and thrice on other days of the week. To these were added other services in the surrounding country. Says Cunningham (Church Hist. of Scotland [Edinb. 1859, 2 vol., 8vo], i, 407 sq.), "Knox was not perfect, as no man is. He was coarse, fierce, dictatorial; but he had great redeeming qualities—qualities which are seldom found in such stormy, changeable periods as that in which he lived. He was consistent, sincere, unselfish. From first to last he pursued the same straight, unswerving course, as if he, like the right-angled triangle of the left-angled firm amid continual vicissitudes; and if he could have burned and disemboweled unhumble Pupati, he would have done it with the fullest conviction that he was doing God service. He hated Popery with a perfect hatred; and regarding Mary and her mother as its chief personages in the land, he followed them through life with a rancor which was all the more deadly because it was rooted in religion. He was, perhaps, fond of power and popularity, but he gained them by no mean compliances. On a question of principle he would quarrel with the Pope, as much as with his quarrel, hesitated not to vitiolate to vise them to their face. His hands were clean of bribes. He did not grow rich by the spoils of the Reformation. He was content to live and die the minister of St. Giles’s. Is not such a one, rough and bearish though he be, more to be venerated than the supple, time-serving Churchmen who were the tools of the English Reformation? Does he not stand out in pleasing relief from the grasping barons with whom he was associated, who hated monks because they coveted their corn-fields, and afterwards disgraced the religion they professed, by their corruption, and cold-blooded assassinations? But perhaps the greatest tribute that has ever been paid to the memory of John Knox has of late been penned by Froude (Hist. of England, x, 457 sq.). Frequently the charge of fanaticism has been laid at the door of the great Scottish reformer; this Froude unhesitatingly refutes, and assures us that it was only against Popery, the system that enslaves both the Church and the State, that he fought. He was no narrow fanatic who, in a world in which God’s grace was equally visible in a thousand creeds, could see truth and goodness nowhere but in his own formula. He was a large, noble, generous man, with a shrewd perception of actual facts, who found himself face to face with a system of hideous imiquity. He believed himself a prophet, with a direct commission from heaven to overthrow it, and his return to Scotland became the signal, therefore, for the renewal of the struggle."

V. Works and Literature.—Besides the Geneva Bible and occasional pamphlets, John Knox wrote, Historical of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland from 1422 to 1567 (Lond. 1644, folio; Edinb. 1732, folio). His words have been collected and edited by Dr. Living (Edinb. 1846, 8vo). See M'Crie, Life of John Knox (Edinb. 1814, and often since; Ch. Nicmeyer, Knox Leben (Lpz. 1824, 8vo); T. KNOX, John (2), D.D., an American divine of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in 1730 near Gettysburgh, Pa., graduated at Dickinson College in 1811, studied theology under Dr. John M. Mason in New York, and was elected to preach by the Associate Reformed Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1815, became pastor of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church, New York, in 1816, and remained there until his death in 1858. This brief chronological record covers the life and ministry of one of the most eminent and useful of American pastors. Without the rare gift of popular eloquence, he was remarkable for earnestness of thought and purity of diction, for comprehensive and instructive discourses, and for practical usefulness. The best designation of his character is that of its completeness. He was a judicious counsellor, a safe guide, a devout believer, and a model pastor. In the ecclesiastical assemblies of the Church he was often a conspicuous leader. In the American Tract Society, with which he was for many years connected, he was, from the time of its organization to within a few weeks of the time of his death, a member of the executive committee, in which capacity, he did much to shape the policy and direct the publications of that great catholic institution. He was active in many other public charities of the country. Dr. Knox published a number of occasional sermons, among which those on "Parental Responsibility" and on "Parental Solicitude" are worth attention. He was also the author of several useful tracts and addresses, and was a frequent contributor to the religious newspapers. He was, in respect of piety, a very Barnabas, "a son of consolation," "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost." In the Edinburgh Review he was, in one of its early numbers, Thomas De Witt; Sprague, Anon., vol. v. (W. J. R. T.)

KNEUTZEN, Vicesimus, D.D., a distinguished English writer and divine, born at Newington Green, Middlesex, Dec. 8, 1752, was a son of the Rev. Vicesimus Knox, LL.B., fellow of St. John’s College, Oxford, and head master of Merchant Taylors’ School, London. Young Vicesimus Knox was also educated at St. John’s College, Oxford, and in 1778 was elected master of Tumbridge School, Kent, where he remained some thirty-three years, and was then succeeded by his eldest son. He was also rector of Runwell and Ramsden Crays, in Essex, and minister of the chapel of Shipbourne, in Kent. At the close of his career part of his life he resided at Ramsgate, and another part at Oxford. He was much admired as a preacher, and frequently gave his aid in behalf of public charities by delivering a sermon. He died while on a visit to his son at Tumbridge, Sept. 6, 1821. Dr. Knox’s chief theological works were: 1. Essays, Moral and Divine, (London, 1777, 12mo, anonymously; republished in 1787, with additional essays, in 2 vols. 12mo: many additions have been since published);—2. Liberal Education, or a practical Treatise on the Methods of acquiring useful and polite Learning (1781, 8vo; enlarged in 1786 to 2 vols. 8vo); this work was chiefly intended to point out the defects of the system of education in the English universities, and is said to have had some effect in producing a reformation;—3. Sermons intended to promote Faith, Hope, and Charity (1792, 8vo);—4. Christian Philosophy, or an Attempt to display the Evidence and Excellence of Revealed Religion (1785, 2 vols. 12mo):—5. Considerations on the Nature and Efficacy of the Lord’s Supper (1792, 12mo). He also published occasional sermons and pamphlets. Dr. Knox’s writings were once much esteemed. His style has considerable neatness and brevity, but he has little originality or power of thought, and his popularity has for some years been gradually decreasing. They have been reprinted under the style Works (London, 1824, 7 vol. 8vo).—Engl. Cyclop. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of English and American Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Knutzen, Martin, a German writer and philosopher of the Leibniz-Wolff school, was born in Königsberg, Prussia, in 1713, and held a professorship of philosophy in the university of his native place. He died there in 1751. His most important work is Von der immateriellen Natur d. Seele (Frankfort, 1747, 8vo). See Krug, Philosoph. Worterb. ii. 627.

Knutzen, Matthias, a noted German atheist, was born at Oldenswool, in Schleswig-Holstein, in the early part of the 17th century, and was educated at Königsberg and Jena Universities. He was the founder of the Conscientiorians, advocating the doctrine that reason and conscience are sufficient to guide all men; besides conscience, he asserted there is no other God, no other religion, no other lawful magistracy. He gave the substance of his system in a short letter (preserved in the edition of Microeli syntagma historia ecclesiasti- ca [1693]), dated from Rome, the contents of which may be reduced to the following heads:—1. First, there is neither a God nor a devil; secondly, magistrates are not to be valued, churches are to be despised, and priests rejected; thirdly, instead of magistrates and priests, we have learning and reason, which, joined with conscience, as such we have, and as we pretend himself in having found adherents to his doctrine at Jena, Prof. John Murray attacked and refuted him, mainly to dispel the impression which Knutzen sought to make that Jena was likely to become a convert to his views. He died about 1678, or later. See Boyle, Hist. Diet, s. v.; Gen. Bish. Dict., s. v.; Rossel, in Stud. und Krift. 1844; Hall, Encyclop. vol. lvii. (J. H. W.)

Ko'á (Heb. id. 7727, Sept. 'Yqo yi v. Kasó, Kové i, Asú. Vulg. princeps), a word that occurs but once, in the prophetic denunciations of punishment to the Jewish people from the various nations whose idolatries they had adopted: "The Babylonians and all the Chaldeans, Pekód, and Saked, and Eshta'lul, and all the Assyrians with them, all of them desirable young men, captains and rulers, great lords and renowned, all of them riding upon horses" (Ezek. xxiii, 23). The Sept., Symmachus, Theodotion, Targums, Peshito, and Vers. E., followed by many interpreters, regard it as a proper name of some prominent person, but the Sept. elsewhere renders it "Nestor", as the name of a man. The judgment on such has been found, and the evident paraenesis with the preceding term in the same verse suggests a symbolic significance as an appellative, which appears to be furnished by the kindred Arabic a'ad, the designation of a k'abam or stallion for breeding (a figure in keeping with the allusions in the context to gross lewdness, as a type of idolatry), and hence tropically a prince or noble. This is the sense defended by J. D. Michaelis (Steph. 2175), after Jerome and the Heb. interpreters, and adopted by Gesenius (Theol. Hebr. p. 1297). See Stoas; Pekón.

Kobawich, Andreas, a noted Jesuit, was born at Corkville in 1594, and died at Triste Feb. 22, 1644. Of his personal history nothing further seems to be known. He wrote Vita B. Johannis fundatoris fratum misericordiae.—Algerm. Histor. Lex. iii, 48.

Kobler, John, an early Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Culpeper Co., Va., Aug. 29, 1768; was converted in 1787; entered the literary field; volunteered a missionary to the North-western Territory, and for eighteen years labored with great success in that vast and varied field. In 1799 his health obliged him to locate, but he labored as his strength till his death. In 1809 the Baltimore Conference, unsolicited, placed his name on its list as a superannuate. The remainder of his life was spent with great usefulness at Fredericksburg, Va., where he died July 26, 1843, full of years and honored labors.—Minutes of Conf.; iii, 465.

Kobudži, a celebrated Buddhist pilgrim of Japan, was born in the year 774. In early youth he began studying the Chinese and Japanese writers, and, in order to obtain more time to indulge in his studies, he embraced religious life at the age of twenty. Having become high-priest, he accompanied a Japanese ambassador to China in 804, to study more thoroughly the doctrines of Chakia. A learned Indian named Asari gave him the information he desired, and presented him with the books he had himself collected in his pilgrimages. Another hermit of northern Hindustan gave him also a work he had translated from the Sanscrit, and several MSS. on religious subjects. With these Kobudži returned to Japan in 806, where, by his preaching and miracles, he succeeded in converting the religious emperor of Japan, who embraced Indian Buddhism, and was baptized according to the rite of Chakia. Encouraged by his success, Kobudži published a number of ascetic works, and a treatise in which he exposed the fundamental dogmas of Buddhism. According to Kobudži, the four sources of humanity are hell, women, bad men, and war. There is no end to the number of miracles he is said to have wrought, or to the number of pagodas he caused to be built. He also caused the foundation of three chairs of theology for the interpretation of the sacred writings. He died in 865. Koch, Henry, a pioneer minister of the German Reformed Church in Western Pennsylvania, was born in Northampton Co., Pa., in 1795; pursued his theological studies with Dr. Becker, of Bethlehem, Md., was licensed and ordained in 1819, and settled in what is now Clarion Co., Pa. He died August 7, 1845. He laid the foundations of numerous congregations. Five charges have grown up on his field, which constitute the heart of what is now Clarion Classis. His memory is blessed.

Koch, John Henry, a German journalist and writer, was born of Lutheran parents in Wollmian, electorate of Hessen, Germany, Feb. 14, 1807, and emigrated in 1834 to this country. At New Orleans, La., he was attacked with yellow fever, and resolved on his sick-bed to serve God with his whole heart. He removed afterwards to Charleston, but here he resigned, and in 1839 he was invited by the Methodists to attend the meetings of German Methodists, and there, under the preaching of Dr. Schumacher and Dr. William Nast, he was awakened and converted. He was licensed to preach in 1841, and in 1845 joined the Kentucky Conference. He was successively appointed to the following charges: West Union, Pomory, Captina, in Ohio; Wheeling, W. Va.; Portsmouth, Madison, New Albany, Mount Vernon, Ind.; Louisville, Ky.; Madison Street, Lawrenceborough, Batesville, Poland and Greensville, La Fayette and Bradford. His health failing, he retired from the field. Divorced, but re-married, he again, in the active work three years later, and served two years at Madison and one year at Charlestown, Ind., where he died Oct. 1, 1871. "Brother Koch was an earnest Christian and a faithful itinerant. Many were converted under his ministry, and great is his reward in heaven."

Kochanowski, John, a Polish nobleman and distinguished poet, who was born in 1582, and died in 1684, deserves our notice for his translation of the Psalms into Polish verse, which he performed in so masterly a manner that he was named the "Pindar of Poland." See Bentkowski, History of Polish Literature (Lippincott, 1888).

Kochberg, Johann Franz, a German theologian and descendent of a noble family, flourished in the early part of the second half of the 14th century. He was in high position at the convent St. Michael, at Jena, about 1366. —Algerm. Histor. Lex. iii, 48.

Kocher, Johann Christoph, D.D., a German theologian, was born at Lobenstein April 25, 1639. He was successively regent of the gymnasmium at Gombrich, superintend at Brunswick, and professor of theology at Jena, and died there Sept. 21, 1772. He published a continuation of Wolf's Curae Philosophiae, under the title Analecta Philosophiae et Exegetica in Quatuor Evangelia (Altenburg, 1766, 4to). "He supplies the non-applied part of the desiderata of Woll's work, and brings down the account of the sentiments of the modern writers on the Gospels to the period of its publication" (Biblioth. Bibb. p. 276). For a list of all his works, see Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutslands, ii, 47 sq.

 Koehler, John, a Roman Catholic missionary to Cochín China. We have no details of his life until after he departed for that country in 1740. He remained there fourteen years, and, being made physician to the king, revealed himself of this position to further his missionary purposes. The persecution of the Christians in China led, however, to similar measures in Cochín China, and, with the exception of Koehler, whom the king prized highly on account of his medical knowledge, all the missionaries were arrested and shipped to Macao August 20th, 1754, and the same year Koehler was sent to a monk Koehler in 1755. Arriving at Macao, he was arrested, and sent with his colleagues to Portugal, where they were imprisoned as having encroached upon the monopoly granted to the Portuguese government by the Holy See, and which it claimed gave that nation the exclusive right of evangelizing the East Indies. Koehler was finally released through the intervention of the empress Maria Theresa in 1765, and was sent on a mission to Transylvania, where he labored until his death in 1780. While in prison he wrote a memoir of his travels, which was published by Eckart, and reprinted by De Murr, under the title, Joannis Koehler historica Cochinesis Descriptio in epistola redacta ab J. F. Eckart, edente De Murr (1805, 8vo). See Migne, Bio-gr. Chrétienne et Anti-chrétiennne: De Montermin et Estève, Mission de la Chine, Paris, 1838.—Hoefler, Nouv. Bio-gr. Gén., xxvi, 28. (J. N. P.)

Kögler, Ignaz, a Jesuit German missionary to China, was born at Landsberg, Bavaria, in 1680, entered the order of Jesuits in 1696, prepared for missionary work in 1715, and departed the year following for China, where he enjoyed the favor of the emperor in a remarkable degree. Kögler was employed on the sciences, and especially in astronomy displayed superior acquisition. He died in Peking in 1746.—Hoefler, Nouv. Bio-gr. Gén., xxvii, 909.

Ko‘ath (Heb. Ko‘oth, קֹאת, assembly, Num. iii, 19, 29; iv, 2, 4, 15; vii, 9, 11; of other Ko‘oth, קֹאת, Gen. vii, xi, 17, 16, 18, 19, 16, 17, 27; xxvi, 57, 58; Josh. xxxi, 5, 20, 28, 1 Chron. vi, 1, 2, 16, 18, 22, 26, 61, 66, 70; xxvi, 5, xxiii, 6, 12; 2 Sam. xxiv, 11, 13; 2 Kings xvii, in 15; of the second son of Levi, and father of Amram, Ishar, Hebron, and Uziel (Num. xi, 11, 12; Num. iii, 19, etc.). B.C. 1873. The descendants of Koath formed one of the three great divisions of the Levitical tribe. This division contained the priestly family which was attached to Aaron, the second son of Levi, and formed part of the service of the tabernacle, as settled in the wilderness, they had the distinguished charge of bearing the ark and the sacred vessels (Exod. vi, 16; Num. iv, 4-6). See Ko‘athite.

Ko‘athite (collective "Ko‘athites, קֹאת, Ko‘athith, Num. iii, 27, 80; iv, 18, 54, 57; x, 21, xxvi, 57; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 12; or "Ko‘athites, קֹאת, Josh. xii, 4, 10; 1 Chron. vi, 35, 54; ix, 62; 2 Chron. xxv, 10; xxix, 12; Sept. Kədî: Authority, in "Ko‘athites"), the descendants of Ko‘ath, the second of the three sons of Levi (Gershon, Kohath, Merari), from whom the three principal divisions of the Levites derived their origin and their name (Gen. xvi, 11; Exod. vi, 16, 18; Num. iii, 17; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 12, etc.). Kohath was the father of Amram, and he and Moses and Aaron. From him, therefore, were descended all the priests; and those of whom the Ko‘athites who were not priests were of the highest rank of the Levites, though not the sons of Levi's first-born. Korah, the son of Kohath, was a Ko‘athite, and hence, perhaps, his immediate ancestor of the priestly duty of his paternal uncle, Moses and Aaron. In the journeyings of the tabernacle the sons of Kohath had charge of the most holy portions of the vessels, to carry them by staves, as the vail, the ark, the tables of show-bread, the golden altar, etc. (Num. iv); but there was no task to touch them or look on them "lest they die." These were all previously covered by the priests, the sons of Aaron. In the reign of Hezekiah the Ko‘athites are mentioned first (2 Chron. xxix, 13), as they are also 1 Chron. xv, 5-7, 11, when Uriel their chief assisted, with 120 of his brethren, in bringing up to Jerusalem in the ark the sword and the spears. It is also remarkable that in this last list of those whom David calls "chief of the fathers of the Levites," and couples with "Zadok and Abiaathar the priests," of six who are mentioned by name four are descendants of the line of Pelatiah, which is that of Kohath, Uriel, Shemaiah, Eliel, the son of Elkan, and the son of his brother Eliezer, Shammah the son of Elkan. These six, and Aaron, with 80 of his brethren; and Amminadab, the son of Uzziel, 112 of his brethren. For it appears from Exod. vi, 18-22, comp. with 1 Chron. xxiii, 12, and xxvi, 25-29, that there were four families of sons of Kohath—Aramites, Ishariites, Hebronites, and Uzziel. The number of Elkan and Amminadab were both Uzzielites (Exod. vi, 22), and Eliezer a Hebronite. The verses already cited from 1 Chron. xxvi, Num. iii, 19, 27; 1 Chron. xxiii, 12, also disclose the wealth and importance of the Ko‘athites, and the house of Kohath, which filled the keepers of the dedicated treasures, as judges, officers, and rulers, both secular and sacred. In 2 Chron. xx, 19 they appear as singers, with the Kor‘ites.

The number of the sons of Kohath between the ages of thirty and fifty, at the first census in the wilderness, was 1860, the number of males of this month old was 8600 (Num. iii, 28; iv, 36). Their number is now given at the second numbering (Num. xxvi, 57), but the whole number of Levites had increased by 1900, viz. from 22,000 to 25,300 (Num. iii, 39; xxvi, 62). The place of the sons of Kohath in marching and encampment was south of the tabernacle (Num. iii, 29), which was also the situation of the Reubenites. Samuel was a Ko‘athite, and, of course were his descendants, the men of the tribe of Levi, who were not priests lay in the half tribe of Manasseh, in Ephraim (1 Chron. vi, 61-70), and in Dan (Josh. xii, 5, 20-26). Of the personal history of Kohath we know nothing, except that he came down to Egypt with Levi and his brother Amram (Exod. vi, 20), and that he lived to the age of 138 years (Exod. vi, 18). He lived about eighty or ninety years in Egypt during Joseph’s lifetime, and about thirty more after his death. He may have been some twenty years younger than Joseph his uncle. Kohen, Naphthali, a great Cabalistic rabbi, "a man whose life was full of incidents which would give a biography of him the air of a romance," was born at Ostrow, in the Ukraine, Poland, about 1660. While yet a youth he was carried off by some Cossacks into the wilds of Poland, and for several years there followed the employments of a hunter and a shepherd. He learned to excel in horsemanship and archery, in which he took great delight all his after life. At length he succeeded in making his escape from the Tartars, and travelled in Poland. Here new impulses stirred within him, and his naturally vigorous mental powers were roused to earnest efforts after learning. He made rapid progress in the study of the Talmud and Cabala, was ordained rabbi, and subsequently elected chief rabbi at Posen. He studied the Cabala profoundly, and was at once admired and feared for his supposed ability to command the intervention of the supernatural powers. But in 1711, while he was in charge of the Hebrew congregations at Frankfort-on-the-Main, where, as in Poland, he enjoyed for a time a high reputation as an expound-er of the law and a Cabalist hierophant, there occurred a frightful conflagration, in which all the Jewish quarter of the city perished in the calamity. Kohen, as a potent Cabalist, was called upon by the distracted people to bring into exercise those supernatural resources which he professed to command, in order to stay the progress of the fiery flood. He was weak enough to make the trial. Of course he utterly failed. The fire continued to rage, and the popular feeling of the Jews against him, and Rabbi Naphthali Kohen was once more obliged "to grasp the wandering staff," and begin the world anew. He now bent his footsteps toward the place of his birth, and ended his days in connection with the synagogue at Ostrow. Kohen was quite a poet, and wrote several hymns and anthems which have become the common property of the synagogue and the Jewish people. Many curious notices of him may be found in the Jüdische Merkmals-Abhandlungen of Johann Jacobs Schultz. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, x, 348 sq.; see also Etheridge, Intro. to Hebrew Literature, p. 445 sq. (J. H. W.)

Kohen, Nehemiah, a noted Jewish fanatic, who flourished in Poland in the second half of the 17th century, and pretended to be a prophet or precursor of the Messiah. He was a rival of the celebrated Sabbatai Zevi, who claimed about the same time to the same title. Nehemiah so long looked for by this people. Invited by Sabbatian to visit him, Nehemiah quickly set out for Abyssin, and was immediately upon arrival admitted to an audience which lasted some three days. The rivalry which, on account of their peculiar profession, naturally existed between the two pretenders, made each fear for his life from the other, and, as Sabbatian had actually hired several base fellows to assassinate Nehemiah, the latter fled to Adrianopel. He there embraced Mohammedanism, and revealed to the Turkish government the plotings of Sabbatian, and this course ultimately led to the accession of this pretended Messiah likewise to the fold of the prophet of Islam. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, x, 241 sq. See SABBATIAL.

Kohen-Zedek, ben-Joseph, a noted Jewish rabbi, and head of the school at Pumbeditha, flourished from 917 to 936. He was one of the ablest presidents of this Jewish high-school, and labored earnestly, and for some time with considerable show of success, to make it the first and best authority of Rabbinic learning. Sura Academy was several times worsted in the struggle, and Kohen-Zedek well-nigh succeeded in abolishing the existence of the school. Sura possession was finally led to acknowledge David ben-Sakki as exilarch, and in turn secured Sura's confirmation of his graduate at Pumbeditha. Kohen-Zedek died in 936. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, v, 296 sq.

Kohl, Johann Peter, a learned German, was born at Kiel March 10, 1698. In 1725 he was called to St. Peter's University in Halle to teach belles-lettres and classical history. Three years after he left that city because he became passionately in love with Elizabeth, daughter of Peter the Great, a passion which caused him to commit many extravagances. He retired first to Hamburg, after which he again transferred himself to Kiel, and in Sura possession was finally led to acknowledge David ben-Sakki as exilarch, and in turn secured Sura's confirmation of his graduate at Pumbeditha. Kohen-Zedek died in 936. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, v, 296 sq.

Kohler, Johann Bernhard, a German philological writer, was born at Lütbeck Feb. 10, 1742, and was educated in the celebrated universities of Germany, France, and Holland. In 1781 he was appointed professor of the Greek and Oriental languages at the University of Königsberg. He died April 8, 1802, at Basle, Switzerland. Those of his works of special interest to us are, De Dote opud veteres Hebraeo subvenientium (Lüb. 1757); Observationes in Sacrum Codicem, ex scriptoribus profanis (Göt. 1758); Observationes in Sacrum Codicem, maxime ex scriptoribus Graecis et Arabis (Rost. 1758); Lex. 1765; Emendationes in Dionis Chrysostomum Sacram, quatuor Pars (Göt. 1770, 4to).—Hoefner, New. Biogr. Gén. xxxiv, 2; Neue Allg. deutsche Bibliothek, lxxiii, 389.

Kohler, Gottfried, a German theologian, born at Strzelitz Oct. 11, 1674, was the son of M. C. Kohler, a noted presbyter. The son was educated at the University of Jena, and is a man of great learning. Gottfried was educated at the University of Rostock, where he entered in 1692. Shortly after the opening of the University at Halle he went thither to attend lectures on philosophy, but returned, after a short stay at Leipzig, to his place of residence at Jena. He was appointed professor of the Greek, and in 1695, was transferred to Rostock (1696). About 1699 he went to Hamburg, and resided there until 1701, when he became pastor of a church at Newenburg; later he removed to Ratsburg, where he died, August 18, 1750. Kohbreif wrote largely in the different departments of theological science, but he has earned special credit by his contributions to Biblical chronology. His most important works are, Chronologia Sacra (Hamburgh, 1724, 8vo) — Chronologia Lipractum (Luth. and Lapug. 1732, 8vo) — Geographia Sacra (Cuyler u. Moshower in Kehle, 1738, 8vo). A complete list of his writings is given by Düring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, ii, 163 sq.

Koken, Johann Karl, a German theologian, was born at Hildesheim June 9, 1711, and was educated at the universities of Heilbronn and Göttingen. In 1740 he accepted a call to Martin's Church, Hildesheim, and in 1756 became superintendent of the Hildesheim church. In 1757 the theological faculty of Rinteln conferred on Koken the doctorate of theology. He died March 15, 1778. Besides a number of small but valuable contributions to practical religious literature, he wrote Vortragsfrühstück d. chri. Relig. (Hildesb. 1761, 4to; 1762, 4to); — Kern der Sittlichkeit Jesu u. seines Apostel (Bremen, 1760—72, 6 vols. 8vo). See Düring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, i, 168 sq.

Kollar, Jan, one of the most conspicuous Slavic poets and preachers, was born July 29, 1739, at Moschowce, in the north-west of Hungary, studied at Pressburg and Jen, and in 1819 became pastor of a Protestant congregation at Pesth. He wrote many poems of great literary value, and was one of the earliest and most zealous advocates of Panславism. In 1831 he published a volume of his sermons, Kane (Pesth, 1831, 8vo), which were found so eloquent that they were at once translated into the modern languages. The revolution in Hungary compelled him to abandon his country. He withdrew to Vienna, where he was made professor of archaeology in 1849, and died there Jan. 29, 1852. See For. Quart. Rev. Kolle, John, a German Methodist minister, was born at Dillenhausen, Württemberg, Germany, on the 16th of July, 1823; came to the United States Aug. 25, 1852; became acquainted with some intelligent and pious members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and soon saw it led to a knowledge of his sins, and was enabled to realize the faith of John the Baptist. In 1857 he was licensed to preach, and in the spring of 1858 was sent to Cape Girardeau, and joined the Southern Illinois Conference. In 1861 he was ordained a deacon, and sent to Benton Street, St. Louis, where he labored two years with great acceptability. In 1863 he was ordained elder, and was sent to St. Louis, where he again labored successfully for two years. His next appointments were Manchester Mission, one year, and Union Mission, three years. After this he was sent to Booneville and Manisco Mission, where he labored till his course was finished, Feb. 1870. "As a preacher, Mr. Kille was faithful and punctual. He was a diligent student and acquired a considerable amount of theological knowledge. In his preaching he was original and practical, and it was easy to perceive that he loved the souls of those to whom he ministered. His motto was 'Holiness to the Lord,' and that in an especial sense, as he considered it to be his calling to bear the vessels of the Lord." He contributed largely to the Christliche Apologete, the German organ of the M. E. Church.— Conference Minutes, 1871.

Kolbenbusch (also Collenbusch), Samuel, M.D., an eminent German pietist, and the founder of a theological school, was born of pious parents in the town of Barmien (Rhinen District), Sept. 1, 1724. He hesitated long between theology and medicine, but finally decided for the latter, and studied at Duisburg and Strasburg. Through all his studies, however, he did not forget to attend to his spiritual improvement, and attained great Christian knowledge and moral perfection. While studying at Strasburg he began to inquire into mysticism and alchemy, which were then considered as having a close connection with each other. Upon the completion of his university studies he began the practice of medicine at Duisburg, but in 1784 returned to Barmen, and there spent the remainder of his life, partly in the practice of medicine, partly in disseminating his peculiar religious views. He died Sept. 1, 1803. Dr. Kolbenbusch can, in many respects, be considered entitled to a place between the mystic separatist Tersteegen (q. v.), born twenty years later, and Jung-Stilling (q. v.), sixteen years younger. Like the latter, he first inclined to Leibnitz and Wolff's philosophical system, then became a Bengelian, though without approving all Bengel's views. He attached especial importance to the visions of Dorotheo Wuppermann, of Wichlinghausen, a patient of his acquaintance. Among the resources of Kolbenbusch's practical activity are to be named the Bar-men Missionary Society, and the Barmen Mission establishment. He wrote Erklärung bibliischer Wahrheiten (Elberfeld, 1807) — Goldene Arpeln in silbernen Schalen (Bar-men, 1834). See T. W. Kroeg, Die Lehre d. Dr. D. Rettie (Elberfeld, 1846); same, Krisitische Geschichte d. protest.-reform. Schuwererei, etc. (Elberfeld, 1851); Baur, Die Dreireig-Kollock, Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born Dec. 14, 1776, at New Providence, Essex County, N. J., and graduated at New Jersey College in 1794. Having devoted himself to study for the three successive years, he was appointed tutor in his alma mater. In this position he distinguished himself for his skill in debate, passing his leisure hours in the study of theology. In 1802 he was licensed, and preached for five months at Princeton, where he also delivered a series of discourses on the life and character of St. Peter, which were remarkable for their brilliance and attraction. On leaving Princeton he took charge of the Church at Elizabethtown, and was a zealous promoter of missions to the destitute regions in Morris and Sussex County. In 1803 he returned to Princeton as pastor and professor, and in 1806 accepted a call from the Independent Presbyterian Church at Savannah, Ga., where his labors were abundant. He sailed for England in 1817, not only in quest of health, but also to collect materials for a life of John Calvin, and after an absence of eight months returned to Savannah, where he died, Dec. 29, 1819. A collection of his Sermons was published in 1822 (Savannah, 4 vols. 8vo). Dr. J. W. Alexander (Life of Dr. Archibald Alexander, p. 339) pays Dr. Kollock a very high tribute as a scholar, and says of him as a preacher that he was "one of the most ornate yet vehement orators whom our country has produced." — Sprague, Amaws, iv, 263 sq. See Cambridge General Repository, i, 135; Chris-Kollock, Shepard Koelsch, a Presbyterian minister, and brother of the preceding, was born in Elizabeth, N. Kolonat, Hugo, a Polish Roman Catholic theologian of note, was born in the county of Sandomir April 1, 1779; was educated at Pinczew and Cracow, and in 1774 became canon at the cathedral of Cracow. He was a decided opponent of the Jesuits, and did all in his power to purge the churches of Poland from Jesuitical aid or influence. In 1783, he published a work in Pomerania, in which he denounces the errors of the Society of Jesus. In 1787 he was appointed professor of moral philosophy at the University of Posen, and in 1790 he was appointed chief of the seminary of the same city. He was also a prominent committees of the National Assembly of Poland, and was a member of the Polish Senate. He died in 1850. he became pastor at Elberfeld, and remained there until 1747, when he removed to Amsterdam, where he taught the Oriental languages. He died at Leyden in 1782. His principal work is Weisungung Mosia in den letzten Tagen (Frankfort, 1741, fol.). A list of his writings is given in Döring's Gelehrte Theol. Deutschl., ii, 152 sq.

König, Georg, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Amberg Feb. 5, 1590, and was educated at the universities of Wittenberg and Jena. In 1614 he was called as professor of theology to Aldorf, and in 1644 he added to the duties of his chair the librarianship of that high-school. He died Sept. 10, 1654. He wrote Costas Conscientiae, etc.—Allgym. Hist. Lexikon, iii, 45.

König, Johann Friedrich, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Dresden October 16, 1619. He studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg; became professor of theology at Greifswalde in 1651, superintendent of Mecklenburg and Ratzeburg in 1656, and finally professor of theology at Rostock in 1659, where he died Sept. 15, 1664. His Thesologiae artes, academicis (Rostock 1664; 6th ed. 1690, 8vo; Wittenaal, 1752) became, notwithstanding its dryness, a very popular text-book of dogmatics.

Hahn, Richter, and Haferung have expounded and commented upon it, and it became the foundation of J. A. Quentelstädter's celebrated work. König, Mauritius, a Danish prelate of note, flourished in the second half of the 17th century. He was professor of theology at Copenhagen, and later bishop of Aalborg, and died May 2, 1672.—Allgym. Hist. Lexikon, iii, 46.

König, Samuel, celebrated in the annals of Swiss piety, was born at Gergensee, in the canton of Berne, about 1670. He studied at Berne and Zurich, and afterwards made a journey to Holland and England, as was customary in those days. He excited great zeal and talents in the Oriental languages, which were then much studied by the Protestants, and was considered by his followers as a first-class Orientalist. He was also noted for his participation in the mystic tendencies of his day, and after studying Petersen's chiliasmic expositions, became himself a zealous partialist of the doctrine of the Millennium. After his return to Berne he was ordained, and appointed at first preacher in the hospital attached to the Church of the Holy Ghost. About the same time Spener's piety was beginning to gain adherents, especially through the exertions of Zumthor of Luzi (Lucius). König, who at first held aloof, was gradually drawn into connection with them, and thus became identified with the development of piety in Berne. Here, as elsewhere, piety was strenuously opposed by the orthodox party in the Church, who, on April 8, 1690, appointed a special committee to proceed against "Quakerism, unlawful assemblies, and doctrinal schism." In August of the same year the upper council appointed a committee on religion, for the purpose of ascertaining all about piety (in Berne), and reporting thereon to the council. König was several times summoned before this committee, and courageously defended his views on these occasions on chiliasm, as also his sermons, in which he insisted with peculiar force on the necessity of repentance and of regeneration. Among his theological contemporaries he was most distinguished by the grandeur of his style; and even his professors of theology, Wyss and Naudorf. König was finally ejected and exiled, the pietsists were persecuted, and the so-called "association oath" was instituted, July, 1699, with a view to prevent separation. To these measures were added a strict censorship of books, and the prohibition of religious reunions. König retired to Herborn, but was soon driven out from that place also, and went to the county of Sayn-Wittgenstein, the general refuge of all pietsists and illuminati. In 1700 he went to Hallo, where he gained many adherents, and afterwards to Magdeburg, where he found congenial spirits, especially in Petersen and his wife, Johanna Eleonora von Merlau, Nik. von Rodt, and Fellenberg. Finally he returned to active life as pastor of a French Church in Bidden- gen. Here he resided eighteen years, during which he wrote a number of works. In 1717 he returned to Berne, and secured an appointment as professor of mod- ern languages and mathematics in the university. He continued to hold religious meetings, and travelled occasionally in the interest of piety, but, having attempted to establish meetings for mutual edification at Basel in 1714, he was expelled from that city and died May 30, 1750. His principal works are, Betrach- tung d. inwendig. Reicht. Gottes, wie es im Herzen d. Men- schen aufgerichtet wird (Basel, 1734);—Theologiae My- sticae (Berne, 1786). See F. Königsdorfer, Cölestin Bernhard, a German Roman Catholic monastic, was born Aug. 18, 1756, at the village of Petershausen; was educated at Augsburg from 1768 to 1776, and entered the Benedictine order in 1777, at Donauesch. He was ordained priest Dec. 23, 1780, and was sent to the university at Ingolstadt to continue his theological studies and the acquisition of the Oriental languages. In 1790 he was called to a professorship at Salzburg; and in 1794 he was elected abbot of his house at Freising. König d. Klosters zu heiligen Kreuze in Donauesch (1819-1829, 3 vols. in 4 parts). He also published several sermons (1800, 1812, 1814).—Kathol. Real-Encyklopädie, vi, 829.

Königsdorfer, Martin, brother of the preceding, a popular pulpit orator, was born at Flotzkheim Oct. 20, 1752; studied theology at Dillingen; was ordained priest at Augsburg March 14, 1777, and was successively appointed to Monheim, Heideck, Selboldsdorf near Neu- burg, and Lutzenjug near Hochstädt. He died about 1815. Königsdorfer was noted as a preacher for his rare ability in adapting himself to the standard of his audi- ence; thus, in his appointments in rural districts, he knew how to interest the peasants in his sermons, and did much good among them. He published Katholische Homilien und Erklärungen d. heil. Evangelien auf alle Sonn- u. Feiertage (Augsburg, 1800, and often).—Kathol. Geheimnisse u. Gütternamen (1812-18; 8 vols. 8vo).—Kathol. Königswarter, Baron Jonas, a celebrated Jewish philanthropist, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main about 1806, and removed to Vienna about 1860, when a man of only moderate wealth. There his means increased rapidly, and he died Dec. 24, 1871, leaving an only son heir to a property worth fifteen million dollars. He was a great benefactor to the Jews of the Austrian capital, over whom he presided as chief, and took particular care of the charitable interests of the Jews in Vienna. He left large sums to benefit each of these, without any regard to confession or creed. —New York Jew- ish Messenger, Jan. 26, 1872.

Könrad of Marburg, a German Dominican of the 13th century, one of the most trusted of Rome's vota- ries, was confessor of princess St. Elizabeth of Thuringia, and was the most distinguished of German Dominicans, but little is known. Some suppose him to be identical with the Konrad who, as a scholastic of Mentz, enjoyed the favor of Honorius III (q. v.). Konrad of Marburg was a particular favorite of pope Gregory IX, by whom he was intrusted with various disciplinary offices, particularly with the punishment of heretics and the excommunication, who took him into his own protection during the persecution against the Franciscans (q. v.). He was perfectly situated, but no less inhuman was the treatment which the Patarensis (q. v.) received at his hands. He was finally slain in 1238 by, or at the instigation of, some German nobles whom he had opposed. See Hausrath, Konrad von Marburg (1861); B. E. B., 1861; Henry of Aix-la-Chapelle, viii, 25; and the Roman Catholic Kirchen-Lehrbuch, by Wetzer und Weite, ii, 805 sq. (J. H. W.)

Konrad III. emperor of the Germans, the founder of the Hohenstaufen dynasty, eminent among the Crusaders, was the son of Frederick of Swabia, and was born in 1130. He was elected successor to Lothaire by the princes of Germany at Aix-la-Chapelle, Feb. 21, 1136, to prevent the increasing preponderance of the Guelph party. For his quarrels with Henry the Proud, duke of Bavaria and Saxony, and head of the Guelph party in Germany, etc. See Guelphs and Ghibellines. When St. Bernard of Clairvaux commenced to preach a new crusade, Konrad, seized with the general infatuation, set out for Palestine at the head of a large army [see Crusades] in company with his old enemy, Guelph of Bavaria, who proved treacherous, however, returned to Germany, meeting with the defeat of the [Elbe] the Lion, renewed, though unsuccessfully, the former attempt to gain possession of Bavaria. Konrad took sides with the pope and the northern Italians against Roger of Sicily, but, while preparing for an expedition against the latter, he was poisoned, Feb. 15, 1152, at Bimberg. Konrad was largely endowed with the virtues necessary for a great monarch, and, though himself unlearned, was a warm patron of science and letters. His marriage with a Greek princess was symbolized by the two-headed eagle which figured on the arms of the emperor of Germany, and now appears on the arms of the sovereigns of Austria. See Germany.

Konradin of Swabia, the last descendant of the house of the Hohenstaufen, son of the excommunicated Henry IV, was born in 1292. He desires our notice for the relation he sustained to the intriguing pope Innocent IV, and the treatment he received at the pope's hands. His Italian possessions were seized by Innocent IV on the plea that the son of a prince who dies excommunicated has no hereditary rights, an example which the other enemies of the house of Hohenstaufen rejoiced to follow. Konradin's cause was befriended by his uncle Manfred; who took up arms in his behalf. He drove the pope from Naples and Sicily, and, in order to consolidate his nephew's authority, declared himself king till the young prince came of age. The pope's inveterate hatred of the Hohenstaufen induced him thereupon to offer the crown of the Two Sicilies to Charles of Anjou, a consummate warrior and able politician. Charles immediately invaded Italy, met his antagonist in the plain of Granitella, where the defeat and death of Manfred, in 1266, gave him undisturbed possession of the kingdom. But the Neapolitans, detesting their new master, sent delegates to the emperor in Bavaria to invite Konradin, then in his sixteenth year, to come and assert his hereditary rights. Konradin accordingly made his appearance in Italy at the head of 10,000 men, and, being joined by the Neapolitans in large numbers, gained several victories over the French, but was finally defeated, and, along with his retinue, took refuge in the castle of Austria, taken by Tagliacozzo, Aug. 22, 1268. The two unfortunate princes were, with the consent of the pope, executed in the market-place of Naples on the 20th of October. A few minutes before his execution, Konradin, on the scaffold, took off his crown, and, addressing the crowd, as a sacrifice of vengeance, requesting that it might be carried to his heir, Peter of Aragon. This duty was undertaken by the chevalier De Waldburg, who, after many hair-breadth escapes, succeeded in fulfilling his prince's last command. See Innocent IV; Sicilian Vespers.

Koolhaas, Caspar, often named with Koornhert, in Holland, as the predecessor of Arminius, was born at Cologne in 1586. He studied at Düsseldorf, and in 1566 renounced his professed adherence to the Reformation. He afterwards held some situations as pastor in the duchies of Zweibrücken and Nassau. In 1574 he was called to the University of Leyden, then opening, as a professor. He subsequently resigned the professorship, and died a private teacher at Leyden in 1615. His opinions had been the cause of his resignation: he maintained nearly the same views professed afterwards by the Arminians on the extension of the authority of superiors in ecclesiastical affairs, reduction of the doctrine of the Church to a few simple, fundamental points, and the construction or adoption of the doctrine of predestination. His work De jure Christiani magistratus circa disciplinam et regimen ecclesiae gave great offence. He was summoned before a synod held at Middelburg in 1601, and requested to recant and sign the Belgian Confession, but refused, and appealed to the States. A provincial synod of 1602 functioned; and on the 21st of November 1602 he was compound of Arminius, but he was protected by the chief magistrate of Leyden, who reported to the Dutch States against the renewal of religious persecution, as well as against the acts of the synods, and the encouragements of the ecclesiastical colleges on the right of their faculties. Kopacy, Joseph von, a Hungarian Roman Catholic prelate, was born of noble parentage at Wesprim in 1774, and was consecrated the semi-archbishop of St. Elizabeth the Lion, in 1791, and was preferred to the see of Győr in 1793, and shortly after received an appointment as professor of church history and ecclesiastical law. In 1806 he became preacher at Wesprim, in 1822 he was made bishop of Stuhlweissenburg, and in 1824 bishop of Wesprim. In 1839 he was promulgated to the archbishopric of Gran, and at the same time was made primate of Hungary. He died Sept. 18, 1847. Kopistenakl, Zacharias, a Russian theologian, flourished in the beginning of the 17th century as archimandrite of a convent of St. Anthony at Kief, and died there April 18, 1626. He translated into Slavonic the commentary of St. Chrysostom on the Acts and Paul's epistles (Kief, 1623 and 1624, folio). He also published a Funeral Sermon, in which he seeks to prove that the doctrine of Purgatory is sanctioned by apostolic authority; and a Nomenoxis, or review of the nomens, (Kief, 1624 and 1629; Moscow, 1639; Lemberg, 1646).—Hoefer, *Nov. Kopitar, Bartholomäus, a learned Orientalist, was born at Repče in 1780, and educated at the University of Vienna. In 1809 he was appointed assistant at the Imperial school, was promoted to the professorship in 1848, and died Aug. 11, 1844. He published an edition of the Polish Psalter found in the convent of St. Florian, with a German and Latin translation (Vienna, 1834), etc.—Kathol. Real-Encyklop. vi, 362.

Köpke, Adam, a German fanatic, who flourished in the first half of the 18th century as pastor at Walmo, Durbach, and some other places, who was an adherent of Dippel (q. v.), and, with Haegenbuch (Church Hist, 18th and 18th Cent., trans. by Dr. Hurst, i, 168 sq.), we are in doubt what place to assign any of Dippel's followers; he was measurably a Mystical, yet he can neither be definitely classed with them nor with any of the sects known as Pietists or Rationalists.

Koppe, Johann Benjamin, a distinguished German Biblical scholar, was born at Dantzig Aug. 19, 1750. He studied philosophy and theology at the universities of Leipzig and Göttingen, and became professor of Greek at the college of Mittau in 1774, and professor of theology at Göttingen in 1775. He subsequently became (in 1777) director of the seminary for preachers, superintendent and president of the consistory at Gotha (in 1784), and preacher at the court of Hanover (in 1788). He died Feb. 12, 1791. He wrote De Crítica Veteris Testamenti caute adhibenda (Göttingen, 1789): — Viniciae arvoretum: a demonum aequo imperio ad sacraeam fraudulenta (Göttingen, 1784, 8vo): — Israelitae non seil 450 annos in Ægypto commoratos esse (Göttingen, 1777, 4to; reprinted in Post and Ruperti's Syllogos Commentationum theologicaum, vol. iv): — Interpretatio Janson, viii, 29 (Götting, 1780, 4to): — Ad Mattheii librum xii, 31 (Ad Peccato in peccatum perdidit, Gottingen, 1781, 8vo): — Re

He also edited three vols. of the Novum Testamentum Graece (1805). The work comprises a concordance, for use in the study of the Gospels. He published, at Göttingen, 10 vols. 8vo, at the close of the 18th century. This work, which he began, but did not live to complete, bears his name, as the plan, which is excellent, is his. It furnishes a corrected edition of the Greek text, mostly agreeing with Griesebach, with critical and philo-osophical notes on the subject of each book, and excursus on the more difficult passages. On this plan Koppe gave a volume on the Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, and Thessalonians, and another on the Epistle to the Romans, which closed his labors. Heinrichs, in continuation of the original design of Koppe, has published the Acts, and all the remaining epistles of Paul, except those to the Corinthians; and Potter has published the Epistles of Peter, and that of James. Koppe is esteemed a safe and judicious critic; Heinrichs and Potter less so. Koppe's Romans has been republished by Ammon, the well-known neologist, with characteristic notes of his own (Orme). Köppen, Daniel, a German divine, was born at Lubeck in 1736. He was pastor at Zeitemím for thirty-nine years, and died June 7, 1807. Koppen secured for himself, by earnest literary labors, the reputation of a great scholar, and his works are all valuable. He wrote Hauptsynck des Freihumteises (Leipzig, 1778, 8vo): — Die Bibel, ein Werk der göttlichen Weisheit (ibid, 1787-88, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d edition, 1797-98): — Wir ist Chrst (ibid, 1800, 8vo): — Düring, Ge-

Kor. See Cor.
Lord himself, by some manifest token, might make known his will in this great matter. As this order was particularly addressed to the rebellious Levites, the Reubenites left the place, and when afterwards called back by Moses, returned a very insolent refusal, charging him with having brought them out of the land of Egypt under great fear, "to kill them in the wilderness" (Numb. xvi, 1-17).

The next day Korah and his company appeared before the tabernacle, attended by a multitude of people out of the general body of the tribes. Then the Shekina, or symbol of the divine presence, which abode between the cherubim, advanced to the entrance of the sacred edifice, and a voice therefrom bid Moses and Aaron to stand apart, lest they should share in the destruction which awaited the whole congregation. On hearing these awful words the brothers fell on their faces, and, by strong intercession, moved the Lord to confound his wrath to the leaders in the rebellion, and spare their unhappy dupes. The latter were then ordered to separate themselves from their leaders and from the tents in which they dwelt. The terrible menace involved in this direction had its weight, and the command was obeyed; and after Moses had appealed to what had been done as a proof of the advantage by which he acted, the earth opened, and received and closed over the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. The Reubenite conspirators were in their tents, and perished in them; and at the same instant Korah and his 250, who were in the court, at the door of the tabernacle, were destroyed by a fire which "came out from the Lord;" that is, most probably, in this case, from the cloud in which his presence dwelt (Numb. xvi, 18-35). The censers which they had used were afterwards made into plates, to form an outer covering to the altar, and thus became a standing monument of this awful transaction (Numb. xvi, 36-40). The rebellious spirit excited by these ambitious men vented itself afresh on the next day in complaints against Moses as having been the cause of death to these popular leaders! a degree of obduracy and presumption that called forth the divine indignation so severely as not to be alloyed till a sudden plague had cut off thousands of the factious multitude, and threatened still further ravages had it not been appeased by Aaron's offering of incense at the instance of Moses (Numb. xvi, 41-50). The recurrence of a similar jealousy was prevented by the divine choice of the family of Aaron, attested by the miraculous vegetation of his rod alone out of all the tribes (Numb. xvii). On, although named in the first instance along with Dathan and Abiram (ver. 1), does not further appear either in the narrative of its punishment. It is generally supposed that he repented in time; and Abana and other Rabbinical writers allege that his wife prevailed upon him to abandon the cause.

It might be supposed from the Scripture narrative that the entire families of the conspirators perished in the destruction of their tents. Doubtless all who were in the tents perished; but, as the descendants of Korah afterwards became eminent in the Levitical service [see Korahite], it is clear that his sons were spared (Exod. vi, 24). They were probably living in separate tents, or were among those who sullenly themselves from the conspirators at the command of Moses. There is no reason to suppose that the divorcement of the daughter of Dathan and Abiram, when their father perished. Perhaps the fissure of the ground which swallowed up the tents of Dathan and Abiram did not extend beyond those of the Reubenites. From Numb. xvi, 27 it seems clear that Korah himself was put to death with Dathan and Abiram at the same time. His tent may have been one pitched for himself, in contempt of the orders of Moses, by the side of his fellow-rebels, while his family continued to reside in their proper camp nearer the tabernacle; but it must have been separated by a considerable space from those of Dathan and Abiram. Or, even if Korah's family resided among the Reubenites, they may have fled, at Moses's warning, to take refuge in the Kohathite camp, instead of remaining, as the wives and children of Dathan and Abiram did (verse 27). Korah himself was doublet with the 250 men who bare censers nearer the tabernacle (verse 19), and perished with them by the "fire from Jehovah" which accompanied the earthquake. It is nowhere said that he was one of those who "went down quick into the pit" (compare Ps. civ, 17, 18), and it is natural that he should have been with the censern-bearers. That he was so is indeed clearly implied by Numb. xvi, 16-19, 55, 40, compared with xxvi, 9, 10.

The apostle holds up Korah as a warning to presumptuous and coming treachery, who dwell in the same city with those of Cain and Balaam, as being of similar enormity (Jude 11). The expression there used, "gainingayng," (ἀδισκολία, contraddiction), alludes to his speech in Numb. xvi, 5, and accompanying rebellion. Compare the use of the same word in Heb. xii, 3; Ps. civ, 22, and of the verb, John xix, 12, and Ps. xxii, 22, ac. 39 (Sept.), in which latter passage, as quoted Rom. x, 21, the A. V. has the same expression of "gainingayng" as in Jude. The Son of Sirach, following Ps. civ, 16, ἀδισκολίαν, etc. (otherwise rendered however, by the Sept., παρακώνασαν), describes Korah and his companions as envious or jealous of Moses, where the English "malicious," an equivalent of ἄδισκολία (Eccles. xiv, 18). A late ingenious writer (Prof. Reichel, of Dublin, Sermons, Camb. 1855) distinguishes the crime of Korah from that of Dathan and Abiram (q. v.) as being an ecclesiastical insubordination, whereas the latter was a violation of the law. For he also speaks of them as being in a parallel between the position of Aaron as representing the high-priesthood of Christ—the one undervied, perpetual, and untransferable pontificate, "after the order of Melchisedek," and the Levitical order represented by Korah corresponding to the Christian ministry; and he arrives at the following conclusion: "The crime in the Christian Church corresponding to that which Korah and his followers committed in the Jewish Church consists, not, as is often stated, in the people taking to themselves the functions of the ministry, but in the Christian ministry imiously usurping the functions of Christ himself; and, not contented with their Master's having separated them from the congregation of his people to bring them near unto himself, to do the service of his house, and to stand before the congregation to minister to them, in their seeking the priesthood also." This is the gainingayng of Korah. He thus invests the authority of the Church's declaration of this ordinance should be repeated even in the earliest ages of the Christian Church, and which is significantly coupled by the apostle Jude with the way of Cain, and with the running greedily after the error of Balaam for reward." In short, it was an attempt on the part of such as were ready invested with an official rank in the Levitical cultus to supplant those occupying the higher offices in the same economy, and even to derogate the supreme and exclusive control of its dispensation; and all this for the sake merely of the honors and emoluments of the promotion. It is therefore at once apparent how little this narrative supports the arrogant claims of any class of so-called priests in the modern Church, and that it altogether fails to warrant their exclusion and condemnation of others who have as clear a divine call as themselves to the same order of functions, especially when the matter is in a difficulty of capacity, is actuated by the most unselfish motives, and proceed in accordance with the most imperious demands of circunmstances.

They appear at first sight, from Exod. vi, 24, that Korah had three sons—Asa'ir, Elkana, and Abiasaph—as Winer, Rosenmuller, etc., also understand it; but as we learn from 1 Chron. vii, 22, 23, 37, that Asa'ir, Elkana, and Abiasaph were respectively the son, grandson, and great-grandson of Korah, it seems more likely (as Exod. vi, 24 gives us the chief houses sprang from Korah, and not his actual sons, and therefore that Elkana and Abiasaph were not the sons, but later descendants of Korah. See Samuel. The offices filled by the sons of Korah, as far as we are aware, are the following:

1. They were an important branch of the minstrels in the Kohathite division, Heman himself being a Korahite (1 Chron. vi, 33), and the Korahites being among those who, in Jehoshaphat's reign, "stood up to praise the Lord God of Israel with a loud voice on high" (2 Chron. xx, 19). See Heman. Hence we find eleven psalms (or twelve, if Psa. xliii is included under the same title as Psa. xiii) dedicated or assigned to the sons of Korah, viz. Psa. xiii, xiv—xlix, lxxxiv, lxxxv, lxxxvi, lxxxviii. Winer describes them as some of the most beautiful in the collection, from their high lyre tone. Ogien says it was a remark of the old interpreters that all the psalms inscribed with the name of the sons of Korah are full of pleasant and cheerful subjects, and free from anything sad or harsh (Homil. on 1 Kings, i. e. i Sam.), and on Matt. xviii, 20 he ascribes the authorship of these psalms to "the three sons of Korah," who, because they agreed together, had the care of God in the midst of them" (Homil. xiv). St. Augustine has a still more fanciful conceit, which he thinks it necessary to repeat in almost every homily on the eleven psalms inscribed to the sons of Korah. Adverting to the interpretation of Korah, Calebites, he finds in it a great mystery. Under this term in the Pentateuch, North Christ, was entitled Calvary because he was crucified on Calvary, and was mocked by the by-standers, as Eliaha had been by the children who cried after him "Calee, calee!" and who, when they said "Go up, thou bald pate," had prejudiced the crucifixion. The sons of Korah are therefore the children of Christ the bridegroom (Homil. on Psalms). Of moderns, Rosenmuller thinks that the sons of Korah, especially Heman, were the authors of these psalms, which, he says, rise to greater sublimity and breathe more vehement feelings than the Psalms of David, and quotes Hengler and Eichhorn as agreeing. De Wette also considers the sons of Korah as the authors of them (Einl. p. 333—339), and so does Just. Olshausen on the Psalms (Exeg. Hundt, Einl. p. 22). As, however, the language of several of these psalms, e.g. of xlii, lxxxiv, etc., is most appropriate to the circumstances of David, it has seemed to other interpreters much simpler to explain the title "for the sons of Korah" to mean that they were given to them to sing in the Temple services. If their style of music, vocal and instrumental, was of a more sublime and lyric character than that of the sons of Moses or Gershom, then Heman had more to do in his execution than Asaph and Jeduthun, it is perfectly natural that David should have given his more poetic and elevated strains to Heman and his choir, and the simpler and quieter psalms to the other choirs. A serious objection, however, to this view is that the same titles contain another phrase dedicating the psalms in question to "the chief musician," so that the following expression must be rendered by (? "auctorius") the Korahites. See Psalms. J. van Iperen (ap. Rosenmuller) assigns those psalms to the times of Jehoshaphat; others to those of David. Ewald attributes the 42nd Psalm to Jeremiah. The purpose of many of the German critics seems to be to reduce the antiquity of the Scriptures as low as possible.

2. Others, again, of the sons of Korah were "porters," i.e. doorkkeepers, in the Temple, an office of considerable dignity. In 1 Chron. ix, 17-19, we learn that Shallum, a Korahite of the line of Ebiaphah, was chief of the doorkkeepers, and that he and his brethren were over the works of the service, keepers of the gates of the tabernacle (compare 2 Kings xxxv, 18) apparently about the time of the Babylonian captivity. See also 1 Chron. ix, 22-29; Jer. xxxv, 4; and Ezra ii, 42. But in 1 Chron. xxvi we find that this official station of the Korahites dated from the time of David, and that their chief was then Shelemiah or Riseblemeiah, the son of (Abi)azaph, to whose custody the east gate fell by lot, being the principal entrance. Shelemiah is thought to have been the same as Shallum in 1 Chron. ix, 17, and perhaps Meshullam, 2 Chron. xxiv, 12; Neh. xii, 25, where, as in so many other places, a name may designate, not the individuals, but the house or family. In 2 Chron. xxxi, where the son of Immer is in the Levite, the doorkkeeper towards the east, who was over the door-keepers offering of God to distribute the oblations of the Lord and the most holy things, was probably a Korahite, as we find the name Kore in the family of Korah in 1 Chron. ix, 19. In 1 Chron. ix, 81 we find that Matti-diblah, the first-born of Shallum the Korahite, had the set office over the things that were made in the pans. See Levites.

Koradithites is a name sometimes applied to the unfortunate Jewish tribe of Koradhith, of Northern Arabia, which Mohammed extirpated upon their refusal to accept him as God's "prophet." For a detailed description of the sufferings of the Jews of Koraditha, see Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, v. 125—137; Milman, Hist. of the Jews, iii, 99 sq.; Muir, Life of Mohammed, iii, 185 sq.; Sale's Koran, p. 345, note A. See Mohammed.

Koran, often Anglicized (when, as properly, it has the article prefixed) Al-Koran, but more precisely Qiurn. The emphasis is not on the first syllable, as many persons place it. The word is from the Arabic root korah or kera, to separate or divide, and literally the Koran is "the separation or division," the wordought to be read; corresponding nearly to the Chaldean Keri (q. v.). The book is also called Furgam, from a root signifying to divide or distinguish; Sale says to denote a section or portion of the Scriptures; but Mohammedans say because it distinguishes between good and evil. It is furthermore spoken of as Al-Mosod, "The Volume," and Al-Kiadh, "The Book," by way of eminence; and Al-Dikhr, "The Admonition." The Koran is the Mohammedan Book of Faith, or, as we may say, Bible.

Divisoria.—It consists of one volume, which is divided into one hundred and fourteen sections or portions called Surds, which signifies a regular series. These suras or sections are not numbered in the original, but bear each its own title, which is generally some key-word in the chapter, or the first word or name of the place where it is taken from near the close of the chapter, it is probable that that portion was originally uttered first. Some suppose these titles to have been matter of revelation, as also the initial Bism-llah, "In the name of God", etc., which is likewise placed as a prefatory phrase at the beginning of all Mohammedan books or of sections of each chapter or sura. There are twenty-nine chapters which begin with certain letters, and these the Mohammedans believe to conceal profound mysteries, that have not been communicated to any but the prophet; notwithstanding which, various explanations of them have been professed. For these curious but unimportant theories, see Sale, p. 43. The chapters or suras do not now stand in the order in which they were originally uttered. As the Mohammedan theory concerning the recension and redactions in the authority, the last revelation arrogates any former one with which it conflicts, and as some two hundred and twenty-five of the passages of the Koran are admitted thus to have been cancelled, their chronological order frequently becomes a matter of considerable importance. The real order in point of time, and therefore in authority, as now determined, after immense painstaking, is the following: Suras numbered 108, 109, 110, 99, 91, 106, 1, 101, 95, 102, 104, 82, 92, 105, 89, 90, 93, 94, 108, were delivered in the order in which they are here set down in the first stage of Mohammed's prophetic career. Suras numbered 112, 74, 111, belong to the second period of his career, and extend to his fortieth year. Those numbered 87, 57, 88, 90, 81, 84, 86, 110, 85, 78, 77, 76, 75, 109, 107, 55, 56, belong to the third period. Numbers 67, 38, 32, 39, 73, 79, 54, 54, 61, 68, 64, 71, 52, 55, 45, 44, 37, 30, 25, 15, cover the time from the sixth to the tenth year of Mohammed's mission. Numbers 46, 72, 35, 36, 19, 18, 27, 42, 40, 38, 21, 20, 43, 12, 11, 10, 14, 6, 64, 28, 23, 22, 21, 17, 16, 33, 29, 7, to the fifth stage. The date of the number 113, 114 is not known. Numbers 2, 47, 5, 7, 8, 56, 59, 82, 50, 24, 62, 48, 41, 2, 5, 3, 58, 60, 44, 49, are those delivered at Mecca, though some were delivered partly at Medina and partly at Mecca. The Koran is further subdivided by the equivalent of our verses, called Ayat, which means signs or wonders, as the secrets of God's attributes, works, judgments, etc. It is again arranged in sixty equal portions called Hejz, each of which is divided into four equal parts (or into thirty portions twice the length of the former, and subdivided into four parts), at the use of the readers in the royal temples or in the adjoining chapels where the emperors and great men were interested. Thirty of these readers belong to each chapel, and each reads his section every day, so that the whole Koran is read through once a day (Sale, p. 42).

Contents.—The matter of the Koran is exceedingly incoherent and sententious, the book evidently being without any logical order of thought either as a whole or in its parts. This agrees with the desultory and incidental manner in which it is said to have been delivered. The following table of the suras (condensed from Sale) will give the reader some idea of its miscellaneous range of topics. Many of the headings, however, are, as said before, hardly translations from a prose, but rather original phrases containing some prominent word or expression. Most of the contents are preceptive merely; some are a travesty of Bible history; others recount in a vague and fragmentary way incidents in the prophet's personal or public career; and a few are somewhat speculative. Generally these elements are indiscriminately mixed in the same piece.

Manner of Preservation.—Mohammed's professional revelations were made at intervals extending over a period of twenty-three years, when the canon was closed. We have no certain information about the manner of their preservation during the prophet's life. Many persons wrote them on palm-leaves and various other substances which were conveniently at hand. A writer in the Cbrutica Religiosa (Colenso), says: "It may be supposed that the prophet had many Arabic amanuenses; some of them occasional, as Ali and Othman, others official, as Zeid ibn-Thabit (who also learned Hebrew expressly in order to conduct Mohammed's business at Medina). In Wackiay's collection of dispatches the writers are mentioned, and they amount to fourteen. Some there were four-and-twenty of his followers whom he used more or less as scribes, others as many as forty-two (Weil's Mohammed, p. 590). In his early life at Mecca he could not have had these facilities, but even then his wife, Khadija, who was the first (and who read the sacred language), might have recorded his revelations; or Waraqa, Ali, or Abū-Bekr. At Medina, Obey ibn-Kab is mentioned as one who used to record the inspired recitations of Mohammed (Wackiay, p. 277). Abdullah ibn-Sād, another, was an executioner of inconsistencies in the Koran that he had falsified the revelation dictated to him by the prophet (Weil's Mohammed). It is also evident that the revelations were recorded, because they are frequently called throughout the Koran itself Kibb, 'the writing,' i.e. Scriptures." Besides this, however, there were many persons who recited these sayings daily, considering their repetition to be a duty, and persons generally repeated some parts of them. It was said that some could repeat literally every word of the Koran. The recital of a portion of it was essential in every celebration of public worship, and its private prayer was urged as a duty and considered a privilege. No order was, however, observed in their prayer, in public the imam or preacher selecting according to his own pleasure.

"Collected by Zaid."—Many of the best memorizers of the Koran were slain in battle at Yamana, whereupon Omar advised caliph Abu-Bakr, "as the battle might again wax hot among the repeaters of the Koran," that he should appoint Zaid to collect from all sources the matter of the Koran. This Zaid did from date-leaves, tablets of white stones, breasts of men, fragments of parchments, any writing, pieces of paper, and pieces of leather, and the small birds and ribbes of camels and goats. Sale supposes that Zaid did not compile, but merely reduced to order the various suras. This, however, was but imperfectly done. Zaid's copy was committed to the care of Hafsa, the daughter of Omar.

Recension in Othman's Time. A variety of expressions either originally prevailed, or soon crept into copies made from Zaid's edition. The Koran was "one," but if there were several varying texts where would be its unity? There were marked differences between the Syrian and Iranian readings. The caliph Othman ordered that the second recension of the Koran be published as an authorized version from the copy of Hafsa, and this was subsequently sent into all the principal cities, all previous copies being directed to be burned. This recension being objected to in modern times on the ground that it is an unprofitable mass of jargon, and preserved from all error and variety of readings by the miraculous interposition of God, the Mohammedans now say that it was originally revealed in seven different dialects of the Arabic tongue, and that the men in question only selected from these. The variations in the copies of Othman's edition are marvellously few. There is probably no other work which has remained twelve centuries with so pure a text.

Authenticity. It would appear difficult, notwithstanding the care taken since Othman's day, to prove that the Koran has been entirely uncorrupted. The Shiites Musulmans say that Othman struck out ten sections, or one fourth part of the whole; and the Dabihat, translated by Shea and Ivery (ii, 368), contains one of the sections said to have been struck out. Again, while the Koran was in the care of Hafsa, one of Mohammed's wives, we cannot say that it was not in any way tampered with. The balance of evidence, however, is probably against the views of the Shiite sect. At the time of the recension there were multitudes who had transcribed, and who remembered accurately what they had heard. The political prestige of Othman was sufficient to head them up, if not waver, and they would gladly have stood on any such sfaw or failure. Abu-Bakr was a sincere follower of Mohammed, and all the people seem to have been earnest in their endeavor to reproduce the divine message. The compilation was made within two years of the prophet's death, while yet there were official rectors and tutors of the Koran in every quarter. The very fragmentary and patchwork character of the arrangement of the book bears marks of honesty; yet passages revealed at various periods may, after all, not be all in order, as very little can be reckoned for the recension of Othman's is, on the other hand, urged as evidence of acknowledged corruption.

The Koran as a Revelation. The Mohammedan theory is that the Koran is eternal and uncreated, and was first written in heaven on a table of vast size, called the "Preserved Table." A copy of this volume was made on paper, and brought by Gabriel down to the lowest heaven in the month of Ramadan, from which copy the work was at various times communicated to the prophet. The whole was shown to Mohammed once a year, and the last year of his life he saw it twice. The copy was not to prove, however, the tradition of Muhammad, so far as found within the Koran itself, is as follows:

1. That Mohammed was foretold by Jesus in these words: "Oh children of Israel, I bring glad tidings of an apostle who shall come after me, whose name shall be Ahmad" (sura 6). Ahmad is from the same root, and has almost the same meaning as Mohammed. A passage of the New Test. (John xvi, 7), in which Christ promises to send the Comforter, is wrested for the same service, as also are Psa. i, 2, and Deut. xxxiii, 2.

2. Some suppose that the "two suras contain the accounts of miracles worked by Mohammed." The 34th sura contains what some Mohammedans interpret as an account of Mohammed's splitting the moon. The Mohammedan critics are not agreed as to whether the prophet that occasioned in the future of the moon or he does not merely affirm that the moon shall be split before the day of judgment admits of question. Mohammed elsewhere in the Koran distinctly and repeatedly denies that he could or would work miracles (sura 18-17, etc.). The night journey of Mohammed from Mecca to Jerusalem (sura 17), and the conversion of the jinn or genii who heard him reading the Koran (sura 46, 72), are also referred to as miracles by the Mohammedans, but it is doubtful if the language in the Koran was intended to assert what it has since been made to support. Various passages are referred to by Mohammedans as instances of their miraculous inspirations, as the 46th, 47th, etc. As to the passage (in the 80th sura) the Greeks being in over, but the commentators are not agreed as to the reference (sura 24, 27-48).

3. But the predictions in the Koran were never realized as evidence of Mohammed's inspiration. The real testimony to the inspiration of the Koran appealed to throughout by Mohammedans is the book itself. The author of it everywhere appeals to its literary miracles; it is "uncreated" and "eternal" (Sale, p. 46); it could not have been composed by any but God (Sale, p. 169); Mohammed challenges men and genii to produce a chapter like it (Sale, p. 169-293); no revelation could be more self-evident (Sale, p. 186); it contains all things necessary to know (Sale, p. 221, 273); it was so wonderful that it was translated by its enemies as a piece of sorcery (Sale, p. 169), as a poetical composition (Sale, p. 364); it was not liable to corruption (Sale, p. 175), and should not be touched by the ceremonially unclean (Sale, p. 437).

The Style of the Koran. It is difficult to make a precise judgment of its merits. It was written in a dialect of Arabic which may now almost be called a dead language. It is composed in a kind of balanced prose, with frequent rhyming terminations; a sort of composition once greatly admired by the Syrian Christians, but in Europe neither the poetic cadence nor the jingling sound of the Hebrew sound, as the Hebrew, is the same. We have learned Mohammedans have not considered it remarkably beautiful (Pococke's Specimen Hist. Arabum, ed. White, p. 224; Maracci, Prodomus, iii, 75; Lee's Martyr's Tracts, p. 124, 135). Gibbon is probably too severe in his judgment if his remarks have reference to its manner and not to its matter, when he calls it an "incoherent rhapsody of fable, and precept, and declamation, which sometimes cravils in the dust, and sometimes is lost in the clouds" (Decl. and Fall Roman Empire, i, p. 365, Milman's edition). Some affirm that Hamzah ben Ahmed wrote a book against the Koran and Musulman another, which surpassed it, and occasioned a defection of a great number of Musulmans. There is perhaps little reason to differ from the representations of Mr. Sale when he says, "The Koran is usually allowed to be written with the utmost elegance and purity of language, if not the beauty of the Koinia, the most noble and polite of all the Arabians, but with some mixture, though very rarely, of other dialects. It is confessedly the standard of the Arabic tongue, and, as the more orthodox believe, and are taught by the book itself, inimitable by any human pen (though some sects have been of this opinion), and therefore insisted on as a perpetual miracle, greater than that of raising the dead, and alone sufficient to convince the world of its divine original" (Koran, p. 48).
KORAN

Relation to the Bible.—The Koran maintains that revelation is gradual, and that God has given written revelations to many prophets from time to time, none of which are exact except the Pentateuch of Moses, the Psalms of David, and the Gospel of Jesus; that God revives, and reproduces or reproduces from time to time his revelations through his prophets, according to the necessity of the hour. By the doctrine of the unity of God, and of Christ, and that of the Mussulman—are equally inspired and divine. The preceding Scriptures are, however, to be interpreted according to the latest revelation, and are liable to have their ordinances modified in conformity therewith. This is thus made between belief in and obligation to obey these precepts. The Jewish and Christian Scriptures are variously spoken of as "the Word of God," "Book of God," Taurotd, etc.; they are described as "reveals made by God in ages preceding the Koran." Exhortations are given "to judge" in accordance therewith. Mohammed himself had sent to "attest the former Scriptures," etc. (Compare passages in the following suras: 2: 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 23, 25, 26, 28, 29, 32, 34, 35, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46, 47, 49, 50, 53, 61, 62, 66, 74, 78, 95). There are various correcpondences with these Scriptures, as in the account of the fall of Adam and Eve, the narratives of Noah and the deluge, of Abraham, Sarah, Lot, Isaac, Moses, Joseph, Zacharias, John the Baptist, etc. The contradictions are, however, innumerable. The original record was lost in the Deluge (sura 11); the wife of Pharaoh saved Moses (sura 28); the wind was subject to Solomon (sura 21); Solomon was driven from his kingdom; devils built for Solomon, other devils dived for him (ibid.); thousands of dead Israelites were raised to life (sura 30) to establish his as died for a hundred years, and were then raised to life (sura 2); the grossest being that Jesus was not crucified, and is not the Son of God (sura 4).

Sources of Jewish and Christian Elements.—The Jewish and Christian elements in the Koran are readily to be accounted for. Jews from all parts of Arabia were in yearly attendance at the great fairs of Oczitz, Mijamna, Dnul, Majaz, etc., and great mercantile journeys were made from Mecca to Syria, Yemen, and Abyssinia at least once a year. Christianity was established in these quarters. Some Arabs even reached much further. Othman ibn-Huwairith, a citizen of Mecca, went to Constantinople, and subsequently returned a baptized Christian. Arabs frequented the Christian courts of Hira and Ghasanin, which adjoined Arabia on the north. Mohammed himself had been twice to Medina. More than this, there is the fact that it was in the Christian court of Abyssinia, both before and after the Hegira. Embassies were sent by Mohammed to the Roman and Persian courts, to Abyssinian and other Christian chiefs. "Mohammed had connection with Jews and Christians of every quarter of the civilized world" (Muir's Testimony, p. 118, 119). There are, moreover, many prominent individual cases: Zeid was of Syria, among whom Christianity prevailed. He was captured and sold into slavery, and was presented to Khadija shortly after her marriage to Mohammed, who loved him, and adopted him as his own son. He learned Hebrew. Waroc, a cousin of Khadija, was a convert to Christianity, acquainted with the religious tenets and sacred Scriptures of the Jews and Christians, copied or translated some of the Gospel in Arabic or Hebrew, and was of the family of Mohammed. The slaves generally of Mecca knew something of Christianity and Judaism (Muir's Mohammed).

Mohammedans, however, do not admit that our present Scriptures are trustworthy, but believe them to have been interpolated and otherwise corrupted. They quote a great number of passages from the Hebrew Bible, but they cannot establish this. Mr. Muir (Traditoiny, p. 119 sqq.) nevertheless shows that there is no charge in the Koran against the Christians on this account, and that even those against the Jews are of "hiding, concealing" the whole, and not of corrupting.

Doctrines and Morals.—The contents of the Koran as the basis of Mohammedanism will be considered under that head, while for questions more closely connected with authorship and chronology we must refer to Mohammed. Briefly it may be stated here that "the chief doctrinal teaching of the Koran is the unity of God, and the existence of but one true religion, with changeable ceremonies. When mankind turned from it at different times, God sent prophets to lead them back to truth; Moses, Christ, and Mohammed being the most distinguished. Both punishments for the sinner and rewards for the pious are depicted with great diffuseness, and exemplified chiefly by stories taken from the Bible, the apocryphal writings, and the Midrash. Special laws and directions, admonitions to moral and divine virtues, more particularly to a complete and unconditional resignation to God's will, legends, principally relating to the patriarchs, and, almost without exception, borrowed from the Jewish writings (known to Mohammed by oral communication only, a circumstance which accounts for their often odd confusion), form the bulk of the book, which is throughout throughout the most palpable traces of Jewish influence" (Chamber's, Cyclopaedia, v.).

Outward Reverence.—The Mohammedans regard the Koran with great esteem, never holding it below the girdle nor touching it without purification. It is consulted on all matters of importance, and is the basis of the daily and public prayers. It is from the Koran that the religious law is derived. Mohammedans make no regulations for the observance of certain days, even the most important, as such, and the Mohammedans follow the example of Abraham, by not observing the old Jewish festivals, or the Christian observances. Sentences from it are inscribed on their banners: they are written on tissue paper, and are suspended in gold and silver lookets from their necks. The materials of its binding are often costly, being embroidered with gold and precious stones. Mohammedans much dislike to see the book in the hands of "infidels," as they call all but Moslems. The bazaars or streets in which it is sold in Constantinople have become almost as sacred as mosques, and the dealers in the Koran have come to be as much reverenced as the preacher. Kemal Bey has recently had photographed a famous copy of the Koran, written nearly two hundred years ago (in 1094 of the Hegira) by Haif ez Osman, from the MS of Al-Kari, a celebrated doctor (Friend of India, Nov. 2, 1871; also Atheneum). Multitudes of Mussulmans know the entire Koran by heart; these are called Hatifs, and are much venerated in consequence.

Translations, Commentaries, Editions, etc.—Various versions of the Koran have been made. Mohammedans do not object to this (Sale, p. 60). Of French translations we have those of Du Royer, Savary (with notes, 1758), Gareau (1808), and by Kropel (1829). In Latin there is an early one (A.D. 1143) by Retenens, an Englishman (Baile, 1843), and an Italian one from it—but condemned by Sale. The Latin translation of Maracci (1698) is much quoted by authors. In German we have those of Meyer (1772) and Wacht (1779), and by Ullmann (1840). In English there is Rodwell's (1852), and the excellent one with notes by George Sale (first edit. 1734; last, Lond. 1861); also Lane's Selections from the Koran (Lond. 1843, 12mo.). Besides these there are a great number of Persian, Turkish, Malay, Hindustani, and other translations, made for the benefit of the various Eastern Molesmen.

Of concordances to the Koran may be mentioned that of Flügel (Leips.1842), and the Nújum al-Furkan (Calcutta, 1811).

The Koran has been commented upon so often that the names of the commentators alone would fill volumes. Thus, the library of Tripoli, in Syria, is reported to have once contained no less than 20,000 commentaries. The most renowned are those of Samachchari (died 539 Hegira), Beihdavi (died 686 or 716 Hegira), Mahalli (died 970 Hegira), and Sovuti (died 1011 Hegira). The American Oriental Society has in its library at New Haven a superior copy of the Persian Commentary on the Koran, by Kamil ed-Din Husain (2 vols. in one, folio). For a tions of the Koran, see Trunber's pamphlet, A Catalogue of Arabic, Persian, and Turkish Books printed in the East (Egypt, Tunis, Oudh, Bombay, etc.). See ARABIC LANGUAGES.

The principal editions are those of Hinkelmann (Hamburg, 1694), Maracci (Padua, 1698), Fligel (Leipzig, 3d ed. 1838, a splendid one), besides many editions (of small critical value) printed in St. Petersburg, Kasaan, Teheran, Calcutta, Crawmore, Serampore, and the many newly-erected Indian presses.

ence may be made to W. Muir, The Testimony borne by the Koran to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures (Allah-habad, India, 1860); Prof. Gerock, Christologie des Koran (Hamburg, 1883); Muir, Life of Mohamet (Lond. 1860), vol. iv (the first volume being almost entirely occupied with a discussion of the sources available for such a bi-

3. By erroneous translation in the A.V. at 1 Chron. xxxvi, 19 for KORAHITHE (v. q.).

Korah is the name of a celebrated aboriginal tribe of Arabia, from whose ranks came Mohammed, the founders of the Koran. The submission of the Koran, which were supposed by the Arabian people that Mohammed had exerted in the early days of Mohammed is apparent from the fact that they exercised the guardianship over the Kaaba (v. q.). When Mohammed claimed for himself the dignity of a prophet, and inveighed against the primeval superstition of the Korah (or Meccans, as they are sometimes called, after their principal place of residence, the city of Mecca), he was denounced by all the Korah tribe. Many of his people were still devoted to Sabaiism (q. v.), a somewhat refined worship of the planetary bodies (in all probability the belief of the Korah in the centur preceding the establishment of the Mohammedan creed; compare Sprenger, Life of Mohammed, i, 170; Milman's Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, v, 92 sq.; Milman, Latin Christianity, ii, 127; and the article ARABIA, vol. i, p. 543, in this Cyclopaedia), while many others, although disbelieving the general idolatry of their countrymen, and not yet believers in Judaism, or in the corrupt Christianity with which alone they were acquainted, were looking for a revival of what they called the "religion of Abraham." Indeed, the greater the number of Mo-hammed's converts, the greater the opposition of his tribe; for had not the new religions dared to question the sacredness of the holy temple, and call their ancient gods idols, and their ancestors fools? With all the animosity of an established priesthood trembling for their possession, their power, and their wealth, the Korah resisted the invasions of the new prophet, and though there were of their number those who had actually longed for the propagation of a monothestic faith, they now spurn-ed its establishment, as it was likely to give superiority to the family of Hashem, only a side branch of the powerful tribe of the Korah. The Korahites, therefore, could be ingenious in the art of annoyance; not a few were subjected also to punishment. In consequence of this contest, Mohammed felt constrained to advise his followers to seek refuge in Abyssinia. He himself had hitherto escaped only by the promise of his son to the faithful Talib, who, though not a believer in the new religion, considered it his duty to afford protection to Mohammed and all his kindred. But the rapid spread of the Islamic doctrines made the Korah violent, and they now demanded that Mohammed should be delivered into their hands. In the war with Talib, no less than four battles were fought, and demands a feud resulted, and all the Hashemites were excommunicated. The Prophet himself, however, they sought to remove by secret assassination; a price was set upon his head—100 camels and 1000 ounces of siler—and he escaped their vengeance only by the self-nomination of his convers; and it is only on the strength of his conversion and the met the would be assassin Omar. 'Ere thou doest the deed," said Nueim, "look to thine own near kindred." Omar rushed intemperately to the house of his sister Fatima to punish her apostasy, but there the Koran was present-ted to him, by a young child, with a letter of recommendation into a follower of the Prophet. Yet did not the Korahites abate their hostility; and it is said that for three long years Mohammed was under the depressing influence of the interdict, and constantly obliged even to change his bed in order to elude the midnight assassins (comp. Sale's Koran, ch. xxxvi; D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orientale, p. 445). A fugitive from his native city, and despairing of making Mecca, the metropolis of the national religion, the centre of his new spiritual empire, he turned to the friendly city of Medina, whither more than a hundred of his faithful flock had preceded him. Here he found a kind reception, and succeeded in winning for his cause and creed six of the most distinguished dizens. From this flight, or rather from the first month of the next Arabic year, the Mohammedan era (Hariru, q. v.) is dated. See MOHAMMED.

Once successfully established at Medina, Mohammed's first object was to secure his native stronghold, and for this purpose he declared himself at war with the Meccans, and opened the contest even during the sacred month of the Hajab. The fair option of friendship, once promised, was in the event of their flight, renounced by all the Korah Mohammed. If they should profess the creed of Islam, they were to be admitted to all the temporal and spiritual benefits of his primitive disciples, and to march under the same banner to extend the religion which they had embraced. In his very first battle he routed the Keshites, and, notwithstanding a severe loss and a personal wound in the battle near Ohoud, his power had increased so rapidly that in the sixth year of the Hejira he determined upon and proclaimed a pilgrimage to Mecca. Although the Mecceans did not suffer him to carry out this project, he secured their recognition as a belligerent and equal power with themselves by a formal treaty of peace, into which they mutually entered. In the year following he was allowed to spend a three-days' pilgrimage undisturbed at Mecca. The unfortunate attitude of the Keshites towards Mohammed during his wars with the Christians emboldened him to seek immediate revenge for their treachery, and at the head of an army of 10,000 men he marched against Mec-Kosogarten, Bernhard Christian, a German theologian, was born at Parchim, in Mecklenburg, May 7, 1722; entered Rostock University in 1739; went to Halle in 1745, and became adjunct professor in 1750. He died June 17, 1808. Kosogarten made for himself quite a name by his Vorschau des Kirchen- und Dogma vom Stande der Klerikalgemeine Christi einer Prüfung zu unterwerfen (New Brandenburg, 1748, 4to).—Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlanda, ii, 174.

Kosogarten, Hans Gottfried Ludwig, a German Orientalist and historian, was born at Altenkirchen, Isle of Rügen, Sept. 10, 1729; studied theology and philology at the University of Greifswald; and in 1811 went to Paris to continue the study of the Oriental languages. He became adjunct professor at Greifswald in 1815, and in 1817 professor of the Oriental languages at Jenae, and of the same chair at Greifswald in 1824. He died in 1860. Kosogarten wrote De Mahomedae Emne Batuta Iosephi abicornu (Jena, 1818), and published editions of Amary ben-Kethem's Moalalka (Jena, 1820):—Libri Corone legio, id est Commentarii in Pentateuchum Karalucab ab Akrone ben-Eluiki concerupti aliquot particulas (Jena, 1824); etc. See Pierer, Universal Lexicon, ii, 783.

Kosogarten, Ludwig Theobald, a German divine and poet, was born at Greivamthlen, in Mecklenburg, Feb. 1, 1758; became rector at Wolgast in 1785; pastor at Altenkirchen in 1792, and in 1808 professor of history at the university in Greifswald; later, also professor of pastor and a pastor at St. James's Church in that place, and died Oct. 26, 1818. He was at one time honored with the rectorate of the university. His writings belong to the domain of belles-lettres. See Koberstein, Geschichte d. deutschen Nationalliteratur, iii, 2623 sq.

Kosoff, Sylvester, a Russian divine, who flourished near the middle of the 17th century, was metropolitan of Kief in 1647, and died April 18, 1657. Kosoff wrote a work on the Seven Sacraments (Koutimak, 1653, 4to), which an ecclesiastical council at Moscow in 1690 declared heretical.

Küster, Johann Friedrich Burchard, a German theologian, was born at Locum in 1791. He became professor of theology in Kief in 1839, and died about 1850. His works are, Officium divinae et eccelesiae in Sacerdotiis Proprietate, cap. 9-14 (Götting, 1818):—Das Christenthum (Kief, 1825)—Lehrb. der Pastoral Wissenschaft (Kief, 1827):—translations of the Psalms (1837) and the Prophecies (Leipzig, 1888).

Küster, Martin Gottfried, a German theologian, was born at Guntersblum Nov. 11, 1784; was educated at the University of Jenae, which he entered in 1792, and in 1795 became pastor at Wollersheim. In 1797 he was called to Weilburg as pastor and provost of the gymnasium in that place. In 1778 he was appointed professor at Giessen, and died there Dec. 6, 1802. Küster was decidedly orthodox in belief, and labored both by his tongue and his pen to stay the incoming tide of Rationalism. His most important work in this direction is his Neues Religionsbegründung (Giessen, 1778-1795), in which several eminent German theologians assisted him. He wrote also Vorarbeit für und wider die christ. Religion nebst einer Abhandlung von Zu- lassung des Bären (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1774, 8vo):—Erörterung der wichtigsten Sächerhiethen in der Lehre vom Tode (ibid., 1775, 8vo; another work on Satan, Giessen, 1776, 8vo). See Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutsclandu, ii, 159 sq.

Küster, Wilhelm, a German theologian, was born in 1765, and early devoted himself to the study of theology. He was a student of his pastor at Oppenheim, later at Espung, and died May 8, 1809. He devoted much of his time to the study of practical theology, especially to liturgy, and wrote Liturgie bei Bremenjagen (March, 1797, 8vo):—Allgemein. Alluirturis (ibid., 1799, 8vo).—Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlanda, ii, 162.
KOSTHA IBN-LUKA

KOSTHA Ibn-Lukah (or Luka), an Arabian philosopher, the originator of Heliopolis in Syria, flourished towards the close of the 9th century. He died, according to Abulfarag, about 890. He translated many works of Greek philosophers into Arabic, and wrote himself many original treatises, among which are, De Animae et Anima, De Montibus, and De Scriptio Sphaerarum Caelitarum; Liber apologeticus adversus librum astrologi 8 Abu Ismael Mohameti Apostolatu et Propheta. See Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graeca, ii, 801; D'Herbelot, Bibliothech. Orientale, p. 875.

Kotter, Christoph, a German religious fanatic, was born at Sprottau, Silesia, in 1585. He claimed to have visions (which were published at Amsterdam in 1627). The first of these was in June, 1816. He fancied he saw an angel, under the form of a man, who commanded him to go and declare to the magistrates that, unless the people repented, the wrath of God would make dreadful havoc. His pastor and friends kept him in for some time, nor did he execute his commission, even though the angel had appeared six times; but in 1619, when threatened with eternal damnation by the same spirit, he would suffer himself to be restrained no longer. Kotter was laughed at; nevertheless, his visions continued, and were followed by ecstasies and prophetic dreams. He was tried on the elector palatine, whom the Protestants had declared king of Bohemia, at Breslau, in 1620, and informed him of his commission. He became acquainted, in 1625, with Comenius, whom he converted to be a believer in his prophecies, which at this time were rather of a political cast, pressing happiness to the elector palatine, and the reverse to the emperor; so he began at length obnoxious, and in 1627 was closely imprisoned as a seditionist impostor. He was finally libelled again and banished from the empire; went to Lussia, then subject to Saxony, and died there in 1647.

Kotzebue, Johann, a German divine, was born in Magdeburg about 1654. He was rector at Quedlinburg. He died September 8, 1692. Kotzebue wrote Sacerdotii Catholici Lectorum...; Confessio trostatis Be-ami de ecclesia, etc.—Allg. Hist. Lex., iii, 61.

2. The division of the seventh day of the Lord's week as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxiv, 10). B.C. 1014. He is probably the same whose descendants are mentioned as returning with Zerubbabel from Babylon, but as being excluded by Nehemiah from the priesthood on account of their defective pedigree (Ezra ii, 61; Neh. vii, 38). Talbot or Baalater, the family appears in the genealogy of Judah, whose son Meremoth is named as having repaired two portions of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 4, 21).

Kraft, Adam, a celebrated German sculptor and architect, born at Nuremberg about 1480, and supposed to have died about 1567, deserves our notice for his prominent connection with ecclesiastical art. He has left some monuments remarkable his performances of his still extant is the tabernacle in stone, fixed against one of the columns of the choir of the church of St. Lawrence (Lorenzirkhe), Nuremberg, in the form of a square open Gothic spire, and is 64 feet high; the pinnacle being turned downwards like the crook of the crozier or an episcopal staff, to afford the arch of the church. The ciborium is placed immediately upon a low platform, which is supported partly by the kneeling figures of Adam Kraft and his two assistants, and partly by the four pillars of the platform, and is richly carved, and is ornamented with the figures of eight saints. The whole tabernacle is also profusely ornamented with small figures in the round and basi-relievi: immediately above the ciborium, on three sides, are representations in baso-relievo of "Christ blessing the infant of his Mother," the "Last Supper," and "Christ on the Mount of the Olives." Above these are "Christ before Caiaphas," the "Crowning with Thorns," and the "Scourging"; above these is the "Crucifixion;" and lastly, above that, is the "Resurrection," all in the round. This elaborate work was executed by Kraft for a citizen of the name of Urs Immof, and for the small sum of 770 florins. There is a print of this tabernacle in Doppelmayr's Historische Nachricht von den Nürnbergerischen Künstlern. Recent writers have indulged in various conjectures regarding the time and works of Kraft, but the circumstances of both are still involved in great uncertainty. See Fuss, Allgemeine Künstler-Lexikon, s. v.; Nagler, Allgemeine Künstler-Lexikon, s. v.

Kraft, Johann Christian Gottlob Ludwig, the modern reformer of the Protestant Church in Bavaria, was born at Dussberg Dec. 12, 1794. He studied first at Dussberg, where he held temporarily under the influence of infidelity. He then spent five years as a private tutor at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and this period was of great spiritual regeneration to him, though he did not succeed in allaying all his doubts. In October, 1808, he became pastor of the Reformed congregation at Weeze, near Cleve. He still felt dissatisfied, however, and continued to search the Scriptures. In 1817 he became pastor of the German Reformed congregation at Erlangen, and professor in the university in 1818. By this time his convictions had become settled, and he a firm believer in the ordinances of the Reformation. One of the most noticeable in his spiritual development, his conversion, took place, according to his own account, in the spring of 1821. He died May 15, 1845. Without being gifted with very brilliant talents or especial eloquence, Kraft, by his earnest practical faith, and his uncommon energy, can be said to have awakened the Protestant Church of Bavaria from the lethargic sleep into which it had fallen under the influence of ultra rationalism. He took great part in the progress of home missions, and was the founder of an institution for the daughters of the poor. He wrote De Luctibus et Libertatis, De Gratia Diversa, Seem Sermons on Isaiah, liii, and four on 1 Cor. i, 30; Jahrh. Predigten u. freie Texte (Erlang. 1828, 1835, 1845). After his death Dr. Burger published his Chronologie u. Harmonie d. vier Evangelien (Erlang. 1846).—Herzog, Real-Enzyklopädie, vol. viii, s. v. (J. N. P.)

Kraft, Friedrich Wilhelm, a German theologian, was born at Krauthim, in the district of Weimar, Aug. 9, 1712, and was educated at Jena and Leipzig from 1729 to 1732. In 1739 he became pastor at Frankendorf, and in 1747 university preacher at Göttingen, holding also after this an adjunct professorship of theology in this high-school. In 1750 he removed to Dantzig as senior preacher to Mary's Church, and died there November 19, 1758. His most important works are, Schriftdmändiger Bezieh v. d. Anknüpf d. Messias (Leipz. 1734, 8vo); Epitola de honore. Tria per honorem ministriarum ecclesiae. (Leipz. 1734, 8vo); De sacerdotio pontificō ephoricō. (Leipz. 1744, 8vo). He also published many of his sermons, some of them under the title Geistliche Reden (Jena, 1746, 8vo), and Neue theologische Bibliothek (Ips. 1746-1756; continued by Ermenz and later by Doderlein), many of which named work evinces Kraft's extended researches in theological literature. See Döring, Geistes Thol. Deutschland, ii, 176 sq.
Kraft, Johann Georg, a German theologian, was born at Baireuth, in the duchy of Baireuth, June 8, 1740, and was educated at the university in Erlangen. He entered the ministry at first, but in 1764 obtained the privilege of lecturing at the university, and in 1766 became extraordinary professor of philosophy, and in 1768 ordinary professor of theology and university preacher. He died July 2, 1772. He furnished many articles to theological periodicals, and published, besides a host of dissertations and several sermons, an edition of Hutten's Geschree, and the same of the zeuchmeister (Schwabach, 1768-1771, 3 vols. 4to).—Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, ii, 179 sq.

Kraft, Johann Melchior, a German theologian, was born at Wetzlar June 11, 1763. He pursued his theological studies at Wittenberg University, where he obtained the degree of Doctor of Theology in 1786. He then became professor at Halle. In 1792 he delivered a course of lectures on the history of church government and church discipline, which was published in 1802. He also wrote a history of the Reformation, which was published in 1803. In 1804 he became professor at Halle. In 1807 he published a history of the Reformation, which was published in 1809. He also wrote a history of the Reformation, which was published in 1810.

Kraft, Johann Wilhelm, a German theologian, was born at Allendorf March 11, 1806. He went to Marburg University in 1712, and in 1728 became pastor of the Reformed Church at Marburg; later in (1738) he re- moved to Hanau, but returned to Marburg in 1747, to assume the duties of a professorship in theology at the same seat. He died Nov. 25, 1767. His most important works are Fasciculi observationum sacrorum in, quibus varia Scriptura loco atque argumenta theologica illustratur (Marb. 1759-1766, 8vo).—Societatis theologico moralis ex regione et foie tamquam ex generali intellectu et comprehensionem fojus iunvi derivata (Kintel and Haxof, 1769, 8vo).—Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, ii, 185.

Kraft, Justus Christoph, a German divine, son of the preceding, was born at Marburg Jan. 2, 1782, and was educated at the university of his native place and at Gottingen. In 1757 he became pastor at Weimar, and in 1759 he became pastor at Cassel, where he remained on-the-Main in 1769. He died there Jan. 22, 1783. For a list of his sermons as published, see Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, ii, 187.

Kragh, Peter, a Danish missionary, born at Grimming, near Randers, Nov. 20, 1794, was sent as missionary in 1818, and returned to his native country in 1828. The date of his death is not known to us. Kragh wrote extensively, and translated into the vernacular of the people among whom he preached the Gospel of Christ, parts of the O.T., sermons, works on practical religion, etc. He also published in Danish and Greenlandish, HJbog Efterskyldeste med sine sidebemerkninger (Copenhagen, 1837, 8vo).—Varey, Dict. des Contemporains, s. v.

Kratz, Albert Joachim von, a German Lutheran divine, was born at Gevein, near Stargard, in Mecklenburg, May 29, 1764, and was educated for the ministry at the universities of Rostock, Copenaghen, Leipzig, and other German high-schools of note. He became professor of Hebrew at Rostock in 1768; in 1708 also professor extraordinary of theology, and in 1713 was promoted to the full professorship. In 1721 he removed to the university at Grefswald, and there held a prominent position as a theologian. His works, mainly of a controversial nature, are limited to pamphlet form. See Allgemeines Hist. Lexikon, Addenda, s. v.

Kraśnik, bishop of, the most celebrated Bohemian version of the Holy Scriptures, issued, in the 16th century, by the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren. It was translated, in fifteen years, by a committee of their bishops and ministers, among whom the most prominent were John Hněvot, John Nemeckasky, Zacharias Ariston, and Iaasish Cepola, aided by two Hebrew scholars of Jewish extraction. The work of translating and printing was carried on in the castle of Kraśnik, hence the name of this Bible—near Willimowitz, in the west of Moravia, at the expense of Baron von Zierotin, the proprietor of the domain, and a member of the Brethren's Church. He set up for this purpose a special press, and dedicated it to the memory of his benefactor by Zacharias Solin, an ordained minister of the Brethren. The first edition appeared in six folio volumes, as follows: Part i, the Five Books of Moses, in 1579; Part ii, Joshua to Esther, in 1580; Part iii, the Poetical Books, in 1582; Part iv, the Prophetic Books, in 1587; Part v, the Apocalypse, and Part vi, the New Testament, in 1588. The sixth part was a reprint of the Bohemian N.T translated from the Greek by John Blahoslav, a very learned bishop of the Church, who was no longer living. In 1601 a second edition appeared, and in 1618 a third. The last was in one volume quarto. The Kraśnik Bible was the first Bohemian version made from the original, six other translations having preceded it, all based on the Vulgate. It was, moreover, the first divided into chapters and verses, and the first which separated the apocryphal from the canonical books. To each book of the Bible it appended a very brief commentary. The correctness of the translation is generally conceded, and the purity of the style universally admired. This Bible is still the classic standard for the Bohemian tongue. At the present day, however, it exists as an antiquarian work only, a copy costing about 300 florins. This is owing to the destruction to which it was doomed in the Bohemian anti-Reformation, when it was everywhere confiscated and committed to the flames by the Jesuits and soldiers who passed through the country in search of Protestant books. A considerable portion of it was republished at Prague, by J. L. Koher, in 1861 to 1865. It constitutes, moreover, the text, word for word, of the Bohemian Bible issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Gindely, Geschichte der Böhmischem Brüder, ii, 509, 510; Czernenka, Geschichte der Evang. Kirche in Böhmen, ii, 500, etc.; Cröger, Gesch. d. alten Brüderkurie, ii, 157, etc. (E. de S.)

Krama or Krasia, the practice of mixing water with the sacramental wine (the mixture bearing the name kramos, and the act of mixing krama), was adopted very early in the Church, on the assumption that the wine used at the Passover was mixed with water; but this is purely traditional, and the fact was not necessary to the piety of the early Church. In the Western Church, the mixture of cold water with the wine takes place only once before the consecration; wine being first poured into the cup, and the water added. In the Oriental Church a twofold mixture takes place. There is the first mixture of cold water with the wine in the cup before consecration, and then a second mixture with warm water after consecration, and immediately before distribution. This is said to have been designed to represent at once the water which flowed from our Saviour's side and the fire of the Holy Spirit.

Krain, Andreas, archbishop of. See Andreas of Caine.

Krantz, Albert, a German theologian and eminent historian, was born at Hamburg towards the middle of the 16th century. He studied at Hamburg, Cologne, etc., and became doctor in theology and canon law. After traveling through most of Europe, he was, on his return, appointed professor at Rostock, and rector of that university in 1492. In 1492 he settled at Hamburg, after having been employed in important diplomatic missions. In 1499 he was sent as envoy to England and France, and was often chosen to decide difficulties: thus he acted as arbiter between king John of Denmark and

KRAUSE

Krause, Christian Jacob, a German philosopher, was born at Bornheim July 27, 1878, entered the University of Königsberg in 1877, studied first theology and later mainly metaphysics; in 1777 went to Göttingen; was appointed professor of philosophy at the University in Königsberg in 1878, and died there Aug. 25, 1897. His writings were published under the title Fern"macht" Schriften (Königl. 1908-12, 7 vols. 8vo); etc.

—Katholische Real-Encyklopädie, vi, 397.

Krause, Johann Baptist, a German Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Regensburg Jan. 12, 1700, entered the Benedictine order in 1715, and in 1721 was sent by his superior to Paris to study in the convent St. Thomas, and on his return to Germany in 1724, and was ordained priest. In 1725 he was appointed to St. Emmeram Convent, and remained there until his death, June 14, 1762. Kraus was a decided Roman Catholic, rather ultramontane in his views, and as he was hardly suited for the liberal German schools with which surrounded him. He battled earnestly in behalf of his sect, and opposed vigorously the liberal tendency of the Benedictine Rothfischer, who had frankly confessed the failings of some of the institutions of the Roman Church. For a list of the works of Kraus, see Döring, Gehörte Theol. Deutschlands, ii, 189 sq.

Krause, Friedrich August Wilhelm, a German doctor in philosophy, was born at Dobrilugk in 1767, and flourished at Vienna, where he died March 24, 1827. He published Pauill ad Corinthios epistolae Gr., perpetua annotationes illustrator, vol. i (Franz. ad Mon. 1792); intended as a continuation of Koppe's New Testament, but never carried further. He had previously published Die Briefe an die Philipp. und Thessal. übersetzt und mit Anmerk., begleitet (Frankfort, 1790).—Kitto, Biblical Cyclopaedia, s. v.

Krause, Johann Christian Heinrich, a German divine, was born at Quedlinburg April 29, 1777, and entered the University of Jena, but later he began lectures at the University of Göttingen, but in 1788, on account of straitened circumstances, went to Jever as rector, and in 1797 was called to a like position at Hanover. He died Jan. 12, 1838. For a list of his works, see Döring, Gehörte Theol. Deutschlands, ii, 189 sq.

Krause, Johann Friedrich, a German theologian, was born at Reichenbach Oct. 26, 1770, and was educated at Wittenberg University, where, after securing the master's degree, he lectured a short time. In 1790 he was called to his native place as diaconus, and in 1802 the city of Saumberg called him as preacher to the cathedral. In 1810 he went to the University of Königsberg to fill a professorship in theology, which position he held until 1819, when he accepted a call as preacher to Weimar, and there he died, May 31, 1830. Krause's writings consist of seven academic programs, two on the Epistle to the Philippians, one on the first Epistle of Peter, and four on the second Epistle to the Corinthians, and of some discussions pertaining to philosophy and theology. They were collected by him, and issued together under the title Opuscula Theologic. s. p. et Historiae, collegii, et academici, 8vo, 1818. His sermons he published under the title Predigten über die gewöhnlichen Sonn- u. Feste in der anglikanischen kirche des ganzen Jahres (Lpz. 1803, 8 vols. 8vo; vol. iii,

Krause, Karl Christian Friedrich, a German philosopher, born in Eisenberg May 6, 1871, was educated at the University of Jena, where he attended the lectures of Reinhold, Fichte, and Schelling, and then lectured as "privat dozent" from 1802 to 1804. In order to make his lectures widespread he wrote a work in which he deemed necessary to give completeness to his philosophical system, more especially to studies in art, he quitted Jena, and resided successively in Rudolstadt, Dresden, and Berlin. He made several journeys through Germany, France, and Italy, and lectured at Göttingen from 1824 to 1831, when he retired to Munich. The variety of his speculations was to represent the collective life of man as an organic and harmonious unity; and he conceived the scheme of a public and formal union of mankind, which, embracing the Church, State, and all other partial unions, should occupy itself only with the interests of abstract humanity, and should labor for a uniform and universal development and culture. The germ of such a union he thought he found in freemasonry, to which he rendered great service by his works. He died in Munich Sep. 27, 1830. Among his works are Vorlesungen über das System der Philosophie (Göttingen, 1828, 8vo)—Abriß der Religionphilosophie (1828)—Vorlesungen über die Grundzüge der Wissenschaft (Göttingen, 1829). See Krog, Philosophisches Lexicon, ii, 544: Kattell, Real-Encyclopädie, vi, 519, 529: Apolodor, Gymn. mus. Cyclopaedia, x, 217. (J. H. W.)

Krauth, Charles Felip, D.D., an eminent divine in the Lutheran Church, born in Montgomery Co., Pa., May 7, 1797. Originally designed for the medical profession, he commenced his studies under the direction of Dr. Selden, of Norfolk, Va., and subsequently attended a course of lectures in the University of Maryland. By a providential interruption, as he always regarded it, his attention was directed to the ministry as a field of usefulness. Brought under the influence of saving truth, and having consecrated himself unreservedly to the Master, he felt that "work would be unto him if he preached not the Gospel. He very soon commenced his theological studies with Rev. Dr. Scheffer, of Frederick, Md., and concluded them with Rev. A. Reck, of Winchester, Va., whom he also aided in the pastoral work. He was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Synod of Pennsylvania in 1819. His first pastoral charge was the united churches of Maryland and Shenandoah, Va., where he labored for several years with most excellent success. He removed to Philadelphia in 1827; advanced rapidly as a scholar, a theologian, and preacher, and in 1833 was unanimously elected professor of Biblical and Oriental literature in the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., with the understanding that a portion of his time should be devoted to instruction in Pennsylvania College, in the same place. In 1834 he was chosen president of the college, which office he filled with distinguished success for seventeen years, a model of Christian propriety, purity, and honor. The history of the college during his connection with it furnishes an un-erring proof of his abilities and fidelity. During his administration the institution enjoyed several precious seasons of revival, when large numbers of the young men joined themselves to the people of God. In 1850 Dr. Krauth resigned the presidency of the college, to devote his entire time to the quiet and contemplative duties of theological instruction, and continued these labors until the close of life, delivering his last lecture to the senior class within ten days of his death. He died May 80, 1867. Dr. Krauth was a man of rare endowments of intellect. His mind was distinguished from others by a harmonious blendings of all its powers. His attainments in every department of literature and science were very extensive. In the pulpit he was pre-eminent. His sermons were always impressive, often thrilling, and sometimes accompanied with the most powerful results. The following is a list of his publications: Oration on the Study of the German Language (1822)—Address delivered at his Inauguration as President of Pennsylvania College (1834)—Sermon on Missions (1837)—Address on the Anniversary of Washington's Birthday (1846)—Discourses at the Opening of the General Synod (1850)—Discourses on the Church and Character of Henry Clay' (1852). He edited the General Synod's Hymn-book; Lutheran Sunday-school Hymn-book; Lutheran Intellect (of 1826); Evangelical Quarterly Review (from 1850—61.) (M. L. S.)

Krebs, Johann Friedrich, a German theologian, was born in 1750, and studied with the aim of becoming a Privat Docent at Jena; became rector of the gymnasium at Heilbronn in 1765, where he afterwards filled the post of professor of theology and Hebrew, and inspector; and died Aug. 16, 1721. Krebs was a copious writer, the list of his works filling five closely-printed columns in Adelung. They embrace natural and moral philosophy, historical and political science, and theology, mostly in the form of dissertations. Among the most valuable is a work on the first five chapters of Genesis, illustrated from the Syriac, Chaldee, Persic, Ethiopic, and other Oriental languages. See Adelung, vol. ii, s. v.; Döring, Gelértie Theol. Deutsch-land, vol. ii, s. v.; Kittte, Bibl. Cyclop. vol. ii, s. v.

Krebs, Johann Tobias, a German theologian, was born at Buttelsdort (Thuringia) in 1718, and was educated at Leipzig University, where, after attaining to the magister degree, he lectured on N.T. exegesis. Later he was conector at Chemnitz, and finally at the gymnasia at Grimma, where he died in 1782. Krebs edited Schottgen's Lexicon in Nov. Testament (Lips. 1758), and wrote himself two works of considerable value for the illustration of the facts and language of the N.T. He wrote Nov. Testamentum Interpretationis (Lips. 1745): Observationes in N. T. e Flavio Joseph. (Lips. 1755). "The latter contains a rich collection of examples of the peculiarities of N.-T. phraseology."—Pierer, Univ. Lexicon, vol. ix, s. v.; Kittte, Bibl. Cyclop., s. v.

Krebs, John Michael, D.D., a noted Presbyte-rian minister, was born in Hagerstown, Md., May 6, 1804, and was converted at the age of nineteen. he entered Dickinson College in 1826, and after graduation in 1827 with the highest honors of his class, studied theology, and was licensed by Carlisle (Pa.) Presbytery in 1829. In 1832 he became the pastor of Rutgers Street Church, New York City, which he served until his death, Sept. 30, 1867. Though one of the ablest and most prominent ministers of the Presbyterian Church, Dr. Krebs published only a few occasional sermons, besides several contributions to the periodicals of his Church (for which see Allibone, Dict. Engl. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1046), and to Sprague's Annals of the Amer-ican Pulpit. "He was a man of rare gifts, and of still more rare and varied acquirements, being learned not only in theology, but in the whole range of the sciences; and his learning was all made to bear upon the work to which he had devoted his life, that of the Gospel ministry. He was eminent as a preacher of the Gospel, and still more eminent in the councils of the Church, having no equal in the knowledge of ecclesiastical law, and in his acquaintance with the ecclesiastical history of the denomination to which he belonged." He was honored with the appointment of chairman of the Committee on the Reunion of the Presbyterian Church, and had previously held other offices of distinction in the councils of his denomination. See Wilson, Prep. Hist. A. Linc, 1866, p. 100; and Sprague's Annals of the Amer-ican Pulpit.
KRISHNA

26, 1870. "Brother Krebs was a perspicacious preacher, logical in method, earnest in manner, although not vehement, and deceptively dull in presentation. He was also a notably faithful pastor. Five years of his ministry were spent in Washington, five in Baltimore, and one in Chicago, and everywhere the Lord owned his labors."—Conference Minutes, 1867, p. 19.

Kreuz, Johann Bernhard, a German theologian, was born at Rostock Dec. 6, 1771, and was educated at the university in that city and at Jena. In 1806 he was appointed assistant pastor at St. Peter's Church in Rostock, and in 1814 became the principal pastor. He died Oct. 6, 1836. He published Beiträge zur Methode in Kirchlichen Geschichten u. gelehrten Geschichten (Rost. 1818-1823, 3 vols. royal 8vo). For a list of his works, see Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, ii. 207 sq.

Krider, Barnabas Scott, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1823, in Rowan County, North Carolina; received his education in Davidson College, N. C., where he graduated in 1850; and completed his theological studies in Columbia, S. C., and Princeton, N. J., seminaries in 1855. In 1856 he was ordained and installed as pastor of Bethany and Tabor churches, and in 1858 took charge of Unity and Franklin churches, N. C. The year succeeding he became pastor at Thyatira, where he died Oct. 19, 1886. Krider was popular, judicious, kindly, and practical, and won the affection of his people."—Wilson, Presb. Krippner, Samuel, a German divine of some note, was born at Schweidelbach, in the duchy of Bairole, March 31, 1803; entered Jena University in 1761, and in 1767 was appointed professor of Greek and the Oriental languages at the gymnasium in Baireuth. He died Oct. 15, 1742. For a list of his writings, mainly dissertations, see Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, ii. 210 sq.

Kshama was the eighth and most celebrated of the ten chief incarnations of the god Vishnu, who, together with Brahma and Siva, constituted the divine triad of the Hindu mythology. See THIMURT. The term Krishna is a Sanscrit word signifying black, and was given to the incarnation either because the body assumed by Vishnu was black, or else it was so because of the relation of the avatar to a deity whose distinguishing color was black, as that of Brahma was red, and Siva was white; or for a reason implied in the citation from Porphyry (Eusebius, De Prepar. Evang.), that the ancients represented the Deity by a black stone because it is most covered with a surface black. Physical life has in it nothing real, nothing individual, nothing of lasting worth, we may believe contemplated even yet a more crumbling end, an antidote to the essential evil of nature as declared in one of the Puranas: "The uncreated being abandons the body that he used in order to destroy the earth of the boundless horizon of the sea." See further, Maurice, Indian Antiquities, ii. 564-568; Prichard's Egypt. Mythol. p. 285; Maurice, History of India, ii. 351.

Krishna is the most renowned demigod of the Indian mythology, and most famous hero of Indian history. It is probable that when the story of his life is stripped of its mythological accidents it will be found that he was a historical personage belonging to the Aryan race when they were making their gradual inroads south and east in the peninsula of India. It is presumable that the enemies whom he attacked and subdued were the Turanian races who constituted the aborigines of the country [see KHONDA], and who, fighting fiercely and mercilessly in their primeval forests, were soon magnified into gods and demigods. See MYTHOLOGY. In the Vedic literature, Krishna, with all its impurities, may be accounted as a necessary and the extreme revolt of the human heart against the unsatisfying vagaries of the godless philosophy into which Brahmansim and Buddhism had alike degraded. The speculations of the six schools of philosophy, as enumerated by native writers, served only to tire the mind until the word maya, "illusion," was evolved as the exponent of all that belongs to the present life, while the awful mysteriousness of Nirvana overshadowed the life to come. Man's nature asks for light upon the perplexed questions of moral life at the same time demands that which is of more moment, an anchor for the soul in the near and tangible. The ages had been preparing the Hindu mind for the dogma of Krishna—an upholding of something more substantial from the greatest depth of human hope and fear than the unstable elements of a life transitory and void. Consult Max. Müller's Chheda, i, 242; Bibiloth. Sacra, xviii, 543-568.

The avatars preceding that of Krishna were mere emanations of the god Vishnu, but this embodied the deity in the person of his nature. In this he brought only an ama, or portion of his divinity, "a part of a part" in this he descended in all the fulness of the godhead, so much so that Vishnu is sometimes confounded with Brahma, the latter becoming incarnate in Krishna as "the very supreme Brahma." See Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, i. 280, 291. For a list of them see Wm. Jones, in Maurice's Hindoostan, ii. 256. In the Bhagavat Gita, that wonderful episode of the Mahabharata, Arjuna asks of Krishna that he may be favored with the view of the divine countenance. As, in response, the swaraj stands upon a throne and he may contemplate the divine glory, he indulges in a rhapsody which describes the incarnate god as comprising the entire godhead in all its functions. Again, Krishna says of himself, "I am the cause of the production and dissolution of the whole universe," etc. (Thomson's ed. 1. 80).

One object of this incarnation was "the destruction of Kansa, an oppressive monarch, and, in fact, an incarnate Daitya or Titan, the natural enemy of the gods" (H. H. Wilson, Religion of the Hindus, ii. 66). A more satisfactory object is described by Krishna in the Bhagavad Gita: "Even though I am unborn, of changeless essence, and the lord of all which exist, yet in proceeding over nature (prakriti), which is mine, I am born by my own mystic power (maya). For, whenever there is a relaxation of duty, O son of Bharata! and an increase of impurity, I then reproduce myself for the protection of the good and the destruction of evil-doers. I am produced in every age for the purpose of establishing duty" (Thomson's ed. p. 80). The incarnations of Vishnu, which were multiplied to innumerable, assuming diversified forms of fish, man, and beast, because physical life has in it nothing real, nothing individual, nothing of lasting worth, we may believe contemplated even yet a more crumbling end, an antidote to the essential evil of nature as declared in one of the Puranas: "The uncreated being abandons the body that he used in order to destroy the earth of the boundless horizon of the sea." (Burnouf, quoted by Pressmeier, Religions before Christ, p. 63). "The thorn is material life, which Vishnu apparently takes on himself that he may be more effectively destroy it" (Pressmeier, ibid. i. 516)." The thorn and the five elements are also made to issue from Krishna, and then all the divine beings. Narayana or Vishnu proceeds from his right side, Mahadeva from his left, Brahma from his hand, Dharma from his breath, Saraswati from his mouth, Lakshmi from his mind, Durga from his understanding, Ratha from his left side. Three hundred millions of gopas, or female companions of Ratha, exude from the pores of her skin, and a like number of gopas, or companions of Krishna, from the pores of his skin; the very cows and their calves, properly the tenants of Vishnu, but destined to inhabit the graves of Brindavan, are produced from the same exalted source (H. H. Wilson, Religion of the Hindus, i. 123).

On the other hand, the Puranas disclose with regard to Krishna a human life, when considered from the most favorable stand-point, indisputable to the name and nature of man, an object is tissue complex of human beings. The miraculous deeds of Krishna were rarely for an object commensurate with the idea of a divine interposition. His associations as a cowherd (gopala) with the gopis—in which capacity he is most popular as an object of adoration—are no better than the amours of classic mythology. The splendid creation of the Gita, not unlike the human head in the Art Poétique, finds in the Puranas his authentic compendium. In his infancy, he is represented as destroying in a wonderful manner the false nurse Putana; playing his tricks upon the cow-herds—spilling their milk, stealing their cream, and always making cunning escapes; and rooting up trees the fall of which made the three worlds to resound. In his childhood, swollen with pride by his infirmity, he burns his way out from the entanglements of the monster, and on another occasion contends with and overcomes the dragon, one of whose jaws touched the ground while the other stretched up to the clouds; checkmate Brahma, whose mind had been affected by evil suggestions, and slays the cattle and the attendant boys, by creating others which were perfect fac-similes of those that had been stolen.

Still a child, he dances in triumph on the great black serpent Kali-naja, and then, in compassion, assigns him to the abyss; hides and restores the clothes of the gopi who was bathing; lifts the mountain Govardhana on his little finger with as much ease as if it had been a lotus, that its inhabitants might be protected from the storm; and plays blind-man’s buff, assuming the form of a wolf, that he might find and restore the boys who had been abducted by another wolf. In his more mature manhood, by means of his masterly Promoting his micratically corrugated the hearts of the gopis, or accomplishing that most astounding miracle with respect to his 16,000 wives, “quas omnes una nocte invisibat et replavit” (Paulinus, Systema Brahmanicum, p. 150), in order that Naresh might be crowned of his divine nature. Now he carries in triumph over battle-fields, with a blade of grass or with a single arrow shot from the all-conquering bow discomfiting entire armies; and now he yields himself to scenes of sumptuous revelry in the gardens of golden earth, through which flowed “the river whose banks were all gold and jewels, the waste of which, from the reflection of rubies, appeared red, though perfectly white”—in all the license of joy sporting with his 16,000 wives, by whom he was surrounded “as lightning with a cloud”—they and he pelting each other with flowers, thousands of lotuses floating on the surface of the river—whose water was the water of life—among which innumerable bees were humming and seeking their food (Bhagavat Purana, in Maurice, Hist. of Hindustan, ii, 327-438).

Sir Wm. Jones, however, with enlarged charity, takes a modified and more pleasant view of the stories of a few miracles of which are not fit to be told, “that he was pure and chaste in reality, but exhibited an appearance of excessive libertinism, and had wives or mistresses too numerous to be counted; he was benevolent and tender, yet fomented and conducted a terrible war.” See farther Maurice, Hindustan, ii, 236.

II. Life of Krishna. — The King of the Daityas or aborigines, Ahuka, had two sons, Devaka and Ugrasena. The former had a daughter named Devaki, the latter a son called Kanasa. Devaki (the divine) was married to a weaver named Vasudeva, who also had several other sons. Vasudeva had also another wife named Rohini. Kanasa, the cousin of Devaki, was informed by the saint and prophet Narada that his cousin would bear a son who would bear him two children. He was to be established in the kingdom of Vaisnava, but by divine agency, the child was transferred before birth to the womb of Vasudeva’s other wife, Rohi, who was still at liberty, and was thus saved” (Thomson’s summary in Bhagavat Gita, p. 194). Her eighth child was Krishna, who was produced from one of the hairs of Vishnu (Ma’ri Sauram Texta, ch. ii, sec. 5), and was born at midnight in Mathura, “the celestial phenomenon.” The moment Vasudeva saw the infant he recognised it to be the Almighty, and at once presented himself to his adorer in the infant’s companions of the court, and the faces of both parents emitted rays of glory. The child was of the hue of a cloud with four arms, dressed in a yellow garb, and bearing the weapons, the jewels, and the diadem of Vishnu (H. H. Wilson, ut sup. i, 122). The clouds breathed forth pleasing sounds, and poured down a rain of brilliant winds were washed, the rivers glided tranquilly, and the virtuous experienced new delight. The infant, however, soon encountered the most formidable dangers, for Kanasa left no means unemployed to compass the child’s destruction.

This he attempted by playing the guards of the palace to a supernatural slumber; its seven doors opened of their own accord, and the father escaped with his child. As they came to the Yamuna, the child gave command to the river, and a way was opened that they might pass over, a serpent meanwhile holding her head over the child in place of an umbrella. The child was surreptitiously exchanged for another, of which the wife of an Aryan cowherd, Nanda by name, had been delivered. Krishna was left with the cow-herd, while Vasudeva returned with the other to the palace. Not long after, Kanasa discovered the impos- ture, and took Nanda’s infant and carried him to the gates of the palace to a supernatural slumber; its seven doors opened of their own accord, and the father escaped with his child. Krishna was left with the cow-herd, while Vasudeva returned with the other to the palace. Not long after, Kanasa discovered the impos-peared to illustrate the prophecy of the Garden. Durvasa had once warned him, "Oh, Krishna, take care of the soul of thy foot; for if any evil come upon thee it will happen in that place. (as it is related in the Mahabharata in Maurice, ibid, ii, 472). As he set out one day in the forest meditating upon the fearful destruction of Kauru and Yadava alike, he inadvertently exposed his foot. A hunter, Jara (old age), mistook him for a beast, and shot at him. His arrow pierced the tip of his foot. In his death so great a light proceeded from Krishna that it enveloped the whole compass of the earth, and illuminated the entire expanse of heaven. He abandoned his mortal body and "the condition of the threefold qualities." According to the Puranas, "he united himself with his abode, his footprint, his abode itself is unambattled, undecaying, imperishable, and universal spirit." He returned to his own heaven, denominated Goloka—the sphere or heaven of cows—a region far above the three worlds, and indestructible, while all else is subject to annihilation. "There in the centre of it, about Krishna, of the color of a dark cloud, in the bloom of youth, clad in yellow raiment, splendidly adorned with celestial gems, and holding a flute" (Wilson, Religion of the Hindoos, i, 129).

In this entire life we find no high moral purpose to either discipline or command our faith. Now and then there appear in the Puranas suggestions of relief from individual burdens of oppression and woe, but they are as void and dissipated as flashes of lightning, which serve but to intensify the gloom. Like Buddha, our divinity bewails the evil of existence. He may be the relinquishment of human need, the idea of sacrifice is most limited, and only proves that the religion feels itself inadequate to the emergency of man's mortal estate (comp. the opening of the Bhagavat Purana). Its sublimest thought is a method of escape from the necessity of repeated births, but even this it fails to elaborate. With our eye upon the balance in which Krishnaism is weighed, the confession of Porphyry still presides painfully upon us that "there was wanting some universal method of delivering men's souls which no sect of philosophy had ever yet found out" (Augustine, De Civitate Dei, x. c. xxii). See INFARMSATION, vol. iv, p. 590. III. The Worship of Krishna.—The worship of this divinity is so blended with that of Vishnu and Rama, another of the incarnations of Vishnu, that it is difficult to treat of the one without trenching on that of the other. But as there are several sects, who use different denominations Vishvanara, or worshippers of Vishnu, who are mostly distinguished into four Sarmoprodigies, or sects, designated in the Padma Purana as Sri, Madhu, Kadra, and Sanaka (comp. Wilson, Rebg. of Hindoos, i, 94). The worshipers of Krishna have been subdivided into two main divisions, the one who worship his mistress Radha alone; and, 3. those who worship both conjointly (see Vollmer, Wörterb. d. Mythol. p. 1958). According to H. H. Wilson, throughout India the opulent and luxurious among the men, and by far the greater portion of the women, attend themselves to the worship of Krishna and Radha either singly or together. In Bengal the worshipers of Krishna constitute from one fifth to one third of the whole population (Ward, On the Hindus, ii, 175, 449). The temples and establishments devoted to this divinity are numerous all over India, particularly at Mathura and Brindavan, the latter of which is said to contain many hundreds, among them three of great opulence (Wilson, ut supra, i, 135). For the controversy on the extent of Krishna worship, see Wilson's Vishnu Purana, vol. ii, Appendix C.

We shall have to content ourselves with glancing at some of the more notable sects or Sampadvayas. The Radra Sampadavas or Vallabacharisa adore Krishna as an infant. This form of worship is widely diffused among all ranks of Hindu society. In their temples and houses are numerous the utensils of royalty, the legs of a chubby boy of a dark hue, and with a mischievous face, in some cases holding butter in both hands, by which is perpetuated one of his boisterous pranks (Paulinus, Systema Brahmanicum, n. 146, and plate 15). This image eight times a day receives the homage of its votaries with most punctilious ceremony. At the first ceremony, being washed and dressed, it is taken from its couch, where it has slept for the night, and placed upon a seat, about half an hour after sunrise. Lamps are then refreshed, while the music of the temple bell is heard, and betel and Pan (see Wilson, Relig. of Hindoos, i, 125-128). The Sanakadri, who are scattered throughout the whole of Upper India, the Sakhi Bhavas, the Raddha Vallabhas, and the Charan Dasis differ in minor particulars of creed and ritualism, but all worship Radha in union with Krishna. The Chaitanyas are the sectaries who believe in the incarnation of Krishna in Chaitanya their teacher, who on this account is elevated to joint adoration. With them the momentary repetition of the name of their divinity is a guarantee of salvation.

Festivals in commemoration of Krishna are annually observed throughout India, and still maintain their most powerful hold of the popular heart. The third day of the Uttarayana, a festival held about the middle of January, is sacred to Krishna as gopala or cowherd. In the afternoon the cows and bulls are washed and fed with sacred cowdung which they are wont to deposit with the sacred cowherd's kraal during the winter. Thereupon the Hindus, with joined hands, walk around the herds as well as around the Brahmanas, and prostrate themselves before them (Wilson, ibid, ii, 171). The Holl festival is observed about the middle of March. It may be not improperly described as an elder and more czarist sister of the April Fools' Day, and is mostly devoted to Krishna. His image enjoys a swing several times during the day, is besmeared with red powder, and dashed with water colored red. In the mean time unbound cow license reigns through the streets. "It would be impossible to describe the depths of wickedness resorted to in celebration of the licentious intrigues of this popular god!" (Trevo's Indio, p. 97). The festival of Jaggernaut ("Lord of the world"), whose magnificent temple a bone of Krishna is most sacredly preserved, commemorates the departure of Krishna from his native land. See JAGGERNUT. This also takes place in the month of March. Those who are so highly favored as to assist in the drawing of his car are sure of going to the heaven of Krishna when they die (see Gaagooly, in Clark's Ten Great Religions, p. 184; Dubois, Mannters of India, p. 108). The worship of Krishna is celebrated on the eighth day of August. This is the most popular of all the festivals at Benares. The Rasa Yatra falls on the full moon in October, and perpetuates the dance of the frolicsome deity with the 10,000 gopis. Though it is universally observed in Hindu Asia, the gopis are such that it will not be seemly to treat either of the occasion or the observance of this festival (see Holwиль's Indio Festivals, pl. ii, p. 132; Maurice, Indian Antiquities, v, 150).

The Hindu sects are distinguished from each other by various fantastical strangeness in their worship and adoration of the gods. Women are actually more religious than men, and many women are usually held to be responsible for the most licentious of all the annual feasts (comp. Dabistan, i, 88). Entire dependence upon Krishna, or any other form of this heathen deity, says H. H. Wilson, not only obviates the necessity of virtue, but sanctifies vice. Conduct is wholly immaterial. It matters not how vicious a sinner he may be, if he paints his face, his breast, his arms with certain sectarivial marks; or, what is better, if he brands them permanently upon his skin with a hot iron stamp; if he is constantly chanting hymns in honor of Vishnu, or, what is equally efficacious, if he spends hours in the simple reiteration of his name or names; if he die with the word Hari, Rama, or Krishna on his lips, and one thought of him in his mind, he may have lived a monster of iniquity, but he is certain of heaven (Wilson, Rig of Indus, ii, 75; see also i, 161). The subject of the sects and worship of Krishna, consult Asiatic Researches, xvi, i, and xvii, 169; Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, ix, 60-110; H. H. Wilson, Select Works, vol. i, ii, passim; Penny Cyclop. xxvi, 569.

6. Relations between Krishna and Revealed Religion. Efforts have been made in the interest of scepticism to establish a philological similarity between the words Krishna and Christ. Such speculations belong to a past rather than to the present age, as it is now conceded by philologists that the two words have nothing in common. The curious are referred to Hickson’s Time and Faith, ii, 377; Volney’s Reins, p. 165 (Am. ed. 1829); and for refutation to Maurice, Hindooism, ii, 268-271. The readiness with which the sceptical mind of our age seized upon and magnifies even fancied resemblances is evidenced by Imman, who in his first volume of Ancient Egypt, p. 462 gives an engraving of Krishna strikingly like those attributed to Christ, but which in the second volume, on further acquaintance with the subject, he admits to be “of European and not of Indian origin, and consequently that it is worthless as illustrating the life of Krishna” (p. xxxii). There are correspondences, however, some of which have already appeared in the summary of the life of Krishna, that deserve more than a passing notice. It is sufficient to adumbrate the more striking ones, without their correlatives in the Bible, as these will readily occur to the reader. These are as follows: that he was miraculously born at midnight of a human mother, and saluted by a chorus of Devatas; that he was cradled among cowherds, during which period of life he was persecuted by the giant Kansa, and saved by his mother’s flight; the miracles with which his life abounds, among which were the raising of the dead and the cleansing of the lepers, perhaps the only ones which particularly resembled those of Christ, for the rest were either puerile or monstrous; his contests with serpents, which he crushed with his foot; his descent to the regions of the dead, and his ascent to the paradise of the blessed (Krische, Abhandlung d. Kult. Gesellsc. i, 233; Stirn, Apologie des Christentumus, p. 181, 3d ed.)

1. The consideration of the interesting questions involved in these correspondences will be facilitated by bearing in mind that India, from her earliest recorded period, had sustained intimate mercantile relations with Semitic races. “Before merchants sailed from India to Egypt, and from Egypt to India” (that is, as the context shows, before the period of the Ptolemies), “Arabia Felix was the staple (maxt) both for Egyptian and Indian goods, much as Alexandria is now for the commodities of Egypt and foreign merchandise” (Arrian, Perip. Mitr. Ergthr. in Heeren’s African Researches, p. 228).

11” says Hoern, “the explicit testimony here brought forward proves a commercial intercourse between India and Arabia, it proves at the same time its high antiquity, and that it must have been in active operation for many centuries” (ibid, p. 220). A caravan trade also extended from India to Meroë, in Ethiopia, which was its grand emporium (ibid, p. 211). Taking its rise beyond the horizon of history, it was yet in its zenith during the times of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel (see also Vincent’s Peripius, p. 57, etc.). It could not be otherwise than that there should have been an interchange of religious knowledge as well as an exchange of wares; for commerce was promoted by religion, and, to a great extent, controlled by the priesthood; even its temples were stations and marts for caravans (see further, Heeren, ibid, p. 219, 225, 228). The striking resemblance existing between the Egyptian and Hindu mythologies, which has been unfolded by many writers, illustrates the fact of an interchange of religious light, and that these extremes of the known world should thus have met remarkably confirms the views of Heeren just adduced (see further, Prichard, Egyptian Mythology, p. 227-301; Maurice, Indian Antiquities, iii, 96-124; Bun- nen, God in History, bk. iii, ch. ii). The annexed figures were copied by Somnerat from sculptures in one of the oldest of the Hindu padogas. No Vishesnta of distinction, Somnerat tells us, is without these images in his house, either of gold, silver, or copper (see also Prichard’s Egyptian Myth, p. 261). For a glowing description of Krishna’s person, see the Purana in Maurice, Hindooism, ii, 363.

2. On the supposition of the oneness of our race there is no reason to exclude the Hindu from an original participation in the patriarchal knowledge of the promised Redeemer, as transmitted by Noah and his family. Suenius (Vespas. iv) and Tacitus (Hist. v, 4, 18) unite in the thought of “an ancient and permanent belief having spread itself over the whole East” to this effect. (See further Gray’s Connection, i, chap. xxv; Hengstenberg, Christology, iv, Appendix ii; Tholuck, Lehre v. d. Sünde, p. 220-229; Stolberg’s Religionsgeschichte I, Beilage iv; Faber’s Prophe. Dia. i, 97-114; Faber’s Horos Mosaicos, i, ch. iii.) All Hindu traditions connected with the origin of their religion and their people point but one way, and that to the recognised birthplace of our race—the lofty watertouched from which in every direction human faiths and mythologies have flowed forth. (See Max Muller on the relations of the Veda and Zend-Aesma, Chima, i, 81-86.) Though these traditions in themselves may be as inconsequential as falling stars, still they reflect a light kindred with that which shines forth from fixed stars in the firmament of true faith. Krishna, as seen in the monuments of the Hindu, stands a striking exponent of primal traditions, that, having sprung from the promise of the Garden, have more or less modified most distant and varied mythologies. He is a crude though not inartistic painting of a hope preserved to us in the Word of God, but otherwise hopelessly lost. He is one of a brotherhood that embraces an Apollo triumphant over the python; a Hercules, burning the immortal and burning out the mortal heads of the hydra; a Sigurd, a descendant of Odin, slaying the serpent Fafnir, and rescuing priceless treasure; a Thor, styled "the eldest of the sons of God," who, in his contest with the serpent, though brought upon his knee, yet bruised his enemy's head with the mace and finally slew him; an Oshanderbégá, predicted by Zoroaster, who contends twenty long years with a malignant demon, whom he eventually conquers; and even the less renowned Algoquin conqueror Michabo, destroying with his dart the shining prince of serpents who flooded the earth with the waters of a lake. For other instances, consult the authorities referred to immediately above, and Brinton's Myths of the New World, p. 116, with his Commentaries, cent. ii, sec. ii, note 1; see also Neander, Ch. Hist., Clark's ed., i, 112. Tradition tells us that St. Thomas preached to the Indians, which was informed to Gregory of Nazianzum. Jerome, however, makes the field of labor to have been Ethiopia. There seems to be little doubt that copies both of the apocryphal and of the genuine Gospels circulated early through portions of Southern India. Many manuscripts, resembling those of the former almost to the letter, have been incorporated into the sacred writings of Krishnäism. Theophrilus, surnamed Indicus, visited India as a missionary in the time of Constantine, and found Christianity already planted and flourishing, though isolated from Christianity at large. Many Brahmanas and Mani-Brahmanas of the early Church, in their travels came into close and prolonged contact with Buddhism, from which they drew much of the virus that they strove to infuse into Christian belief. The former of them certainly visited India as early as the latter part of the 2d century (see Kurta, Hist. of Ch., p. 109, sect. 50; Neander, ii, 198). Weber and Lassen agree in this respect in their interpretation of a passage of the Mahabharata, that at an early period in the history of the Church three Brahmins visited some community of Christians either in Alexandria, Asia Minor, or Parthia, and that on their return they were enabled to introduce improvements into the hereditary creed, and more especially to make the worship of Krishnä the most prominent feature of their system. See further Hardwick, Christ, i, 246-256, 284-286; Carwix, Brahmical Religion, p. 98-104, 220-222; Father's Prophetical Dissertation, i, 84; Origin of Pagans, sup. in bk, vi, chap. vii; Treatise on three Dispositions, bk. i, chap. vii; Wuttke, Geschichte des Heidentums, ii, 899; also authorities referred to by Hardwick, C.. See India, MODERN.

4. It was the fashion early in the present century to search out astronomical allusions in Krishna, and to resemblances to Apollo, the mythological counterpart to the sun, but these have given place to sounder criticism. Recent researches favor the view that no great antiquity is to be attributed to Krishnä as an object of religious regard. That some one bearing that name may have figured as a local hero in the early history of India, and even as far back as the period preceding the war of the Mahabharata, is not improbable (comp. Wilson, Religion of the Hindus, ii, 65, 66). The allusions on classical pages serve to justify such a conclusion. 5. It is impossible to remember that Krishnäism nowhere appears in the Vedas, the most ancient scriptures of the Hindus. "Krishnä worship is the modern of all the philosophical and religious systems which have divided India into rival sects. Founded upon the theory of successive incarnations which neither the Vedas nor the scriptures of the first legislator of the land admit, Krishnäism differs in so many points from the faiths peculiar to India that we are tempted to regard it as borrowed from foreign philosophies and religions" (M. Pavie, Bhagavat Dasa Atma-ksetra, Pref. p. xi, in like manner Lassen, Religion and the Altars, i, 2, ii, 4, 1107; Fricbard, Egypt. Mythology, p. 259, with citations from Colebrooke; Max Muller, Chips, ii, 75, Amer. edit.; Asiatic Researches, viii, 494). "It is believed," says H. H. Wilson cautiously, that Rama and Krishnä "are unnoticed in authentic passages of the Sanhitá or collected prayers, and there is no mention of the latter as Gôvinda or Gopala, the infant cowherd, or as the uncouth and anomalous Juggernaut. They are mentioned in some of the Upanishads, supplementary treatises of the Vedas, but these compositions are evidently from their style, of later date than the Vedas, and some of them, especially those referring to Rama and Krishnä, are of very questionable antiquity" (ibid., ii, 65). Compare Wilson's Treatal of the Rig Veda and Sanhitás, i, 290, 313, 315; ii, 85, note b; iii, 148, note 7. At the time of its first translation into English by Wilkins, an immense antiquity was claimed for it by Bha-gavat Gita (see above, sec. i), but this is now generally admitted to be an interpolation in the Mahabharata, and to have been produced subsequently to the rise not only of Christianity, but of Krishaism itself. Lassen accords it a place in the later history of Hindu religion, when the "Vishnuites broke up into sects and sought to bring their religious dogmas into harmony with the theories of philosophy" (Indische Ab. ii, 494; Hardwick, i, 241).

As to the Puranas, which are almost the sole authority for the life of Krishna (a derivative of his victorious contest with the serpent) that most resembles the life of Christ, they are, in their present form, unquestionably of modern origin. They abound in legends that may properly be regarded as purana (ancient), but bear unmistakable sectarian marks, which betray both their animus and their age. They are eighteen in number, and some of them are voluminous. The Puranas themselves in many cases ascribe their authorship to others than Vyasa, and they offer many internal proofs that they are the work of various hands and of different dates, none of which are of very high antiquity. I believe the oldest of them not to be anterior to the 8th or 9th century, and the most recent to be not above three or four centuries old. The determination of their modern and unauthentic composition deprives them of all character, and entirely destroys their credit, impairs their influence, and strikes away the main prop on which at present the great mass of Hindu idolatry and superstition relies (H. H. Wilson, Relig. of the Hindus, ii. 68). There is but little doubt that the Brahmanas are right in referring the name of the adha, or the "lord of men," to the Puranas (from which we have quoted so freely in the summary of Krishna's life), to Vopsadeva, who flourished in the 12th century (ibid., p. 69; see also preface to Wilson's Vishnu Purana). Bentley (View of Ancient Astrology, i, bk. ii, chap. ii) informs us that he obtained access to the Janamaptra, or horoscope of Krishna, and was enabled to discover from it that he is reputed to have been born on the 234 of the moon of Sravana, in the lunar mansion Rohini, at midnight, the positions of the sun, and moon, and five planets being at the same time assigned; from which he deduced the date of the pretended nativity to be Aug. 7, A.D. 600. In Mr. Bentley's opinion, perhaps a fanciful one, Krishna himself was one of the Hindu personifications of time, which view he supports by Krishna's own declaration, "I am the destroyer of mankind matured, come hither to seize at once on all those who stand before us." See farther, on the astronomical view, Gregwell's Fatti Catholici, iv, 88; Cardinal Wiseman's Lect., ii, 1-28; Tomkins's Hebrew Prize Lectures, p. 35-41; W. A. Butler's Ancient Philos., i, 247.

6. From this analogy, like these, not to speak of others that might be urged, we are led to conclude that Krishaism proper was post-Christian, an outcropping of human and possibly of diabolic nature, that was illustrated at the foot of Sinai, but which no more resembled its divine original than the life of a man of half-reared living Apis of Egypt. As in the pitiable blur of a palimpsest, Krishaism has replaced or obscured that which was more precious—the religion of Christ, founded not less in impregnable truth than in the undying necessities of men. For at the rise of this false religion it is plain to us that the light of Christianity was reflected already on the sky of India—light that was sadly perverted to set forth a feeble caricature of the incarnation and life of Christ.

6. As the tenor of our argument has indicated, the criticism of the present age is disposed to assign a recent origin to this, though Lassen does not ignore the existence of a hero bearing the name of Krishna conspicuous in the early and fabulous history of India. It may be of interest to the reader to have presented somewhat more in detail the views of some of the beholders of the present century, confounding and confused though they be, upon the general subject of the relations of Krishaism to Christianity as well as profane religions. Archdeacon Hardwick thinks that the resemblances are no greater than the outward and fortiuous resemblances between other heathen deities, or between some of them and Christ. He illustrates by the incident of the persecution of Hercules in his infancy by Juno; the dancing of the milkmaids and satyrs of Bacchus, which compares with that of Krishna; the concealing of Apollo in the house of a harlot, and of the life of Krishna (a dervish, or beggar), which may be regarded as a pure human and historical hero, doomed to death in childhood from forebodings that his life would prove the ruin of another, we can find his parallel in the elder Cynus, who had also been insulted, and trusted to the care of beasts; and reserve him from the vengeance of his royal grandfather, whose death it was foretold he should ultimately accomplish (i, 285, 286). Colonel Wilford supposes Krishna to have lived about B.C. 1300. Sir William Jones says the story of his birth is long anterior to the birth of Christ, and traces it probably to the time of Homer. He thinks it is likely that the spurious gospels of the early age of Christianity were brought to India, and the wildest parts of them repeated to the Hindus, who ingrained them on the old fable of Kesava, the Apollo of India (Asiatic Researches, i, 174, 374). He allows the secret of the Mr. Bentley's (View of Ancient Astrology, i), in contradiction to H. H. Colebrooke, Sir William Jones, major Moor, and others, boldly charges the whole history of the incarnation of Krishna as a "modern invention" and "fabrication" of the Brahmanas, who, alarmed at the progress of Christianity, invented the Cognate, theoretical, and practical miracles of Krishna, the name somewhat similar to the hero of it; all of which they threw back to a very remote age, that it might be impossible successfully to contradict it, and then represented that Christ and Krishna were the same person, the story of whom the Christians had an incorrect version. Mr. J. C. Thompson thinks that Krishna antedates the Brahmanical triad—Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva—and that his great exploits occasioned him later in Aryan history to be identified with Vishnu (p. 134). Lassen, an eminent Oriental scholar, refers the origin of the system of avatars, as disclosed in Vishnu, to a time of perhaps three centuries before Christ; while Weber, equally distinguished as a critic, contovers his views, and argues that Krishna, the hero or demigod, was no incarnation, and differed vastly from the Krishna of later times. (See farther Hardwick, ibid., i, 286, note.)

Stephens); the "Rishi Vamsa" (translated into Latin, 1829); the "Vishnu Purana" (translated by H. H. Wilson, 1842 and 1866, 6 vols.); the "Bhagavad Gita Purana" (translated into French by Burnouf, Paris, 1840); the "Hiri Vamsa" (translated into French by Lange, Paris, 1848); the "Asiatic Researches," passim, especially vol. xv and xvi; Hardwick, Christ and other Monsters, i, 246-258, 257-258—a valuable and easily accessible resume of the whole subject; H. mentioned pastor Empetza, the eventual head of the Moniers (q.v.). With the assistance of men of talent and education of Empetza's stamp she formed "prayer unions," and urged the community to a more vital Christian living, and the liberal use of property for the good of the poor. The fulfillment of her predictions of the fall of Napoleon was quick to come from Empire, and the final crisis at Waterloo, aided her cause, and emboldened her to the assertion that she enjoyed the favor of God in a special degree. Among her most ardent followers at this time she counted no less a personage than the Russian emperor Alexander, who, with the Bible in his hand, was her frequent guest; and it is known that her influence over Alexander brought about the Holy Alliance. Her love of humanity, however, and her gigantic schemes for its moral and social elevation, often led her to overstep the bounds of prudence and propriety, and made her appear a dangerous character in the eyes of persons of authority, so that she gradually lost the favor of men of political prominence. She was obliged to quit France and other countries successively, and even lost the friendship of the emperor Alexander, as is evinced by the text of a letter which appeared in a Russian paper in 1827, was called thither in consequence of the sickness of her daughter. She was not only refused admission to the emperor, but when afterwards she advocated the cause of the independence of Greece, and pointed to the Russian emperor as the instrument selected by God for the accomplishment of this work, she was required to retire to Switzerland and to leave St. Petersburg. Under the influence of the Moravians her life and habits had been changed after she quitted Paris, and she had often dreamed of founding a great correctional institution for the reformation of criminals and persons of evil life. Now driven from St. Petersburg, and the attack of a cutaneous disease necessitating her residence in the south, she started in 1824 with the design of founding such an institution, and of establishing a German and Swiss colony on the other side of the Volga. On the way, however, death overtook her at Kazan-su-bazar, Dec. 18, 1824. The life thus suddenly brought to a close has been variously commented upon. In her day "passion oscillated in the public judgment between favor and hostility to her," but now, when nearly half a century has passed, and its is easy in deliberation to pass judgment upon her life and acts, she is generally spoken of favorably, and men and women inspired to inspire the people with religious zeal, and a feeling of love for each other as a common brotherhood, are recognised. Says Hagenbach (Ch. Hist. 18th and 19th Centuries [transl. by Dr. J. F. Hurst], ii. 413 sq.), "it is an axiom known by all, and registered in the histories of the world, that just as the people in the dwellings of vanity, and humbled by her sins and errors, had such a spirit of self-denial as to minister on a wooden bench to the poor and suffering, to seek out criminals in prison, and to present to them the consolations of the Cross; to open the eyes of the wise men of this world to the deepest mysteries of divine love, and to say to the kings of the world that everything avails without the King of kings, who, as the Crucified, was a stumbling-block to the Jews and foolishness to the Greeks. She was derided, defamed, persecuted, driven out of Russia by her dear another weariness of preaching repentance in the deserts of civilization, and of proclaiming the salvation of believers and the misery of unbelievers. . . . Wherever she set her foot, great multitudes of people physically and spiritually hungry, of sufferers of every class, and persons without regard to confession, surrounded her, and received from her food—yes, wonderful food. The woes which she pronounced on the imminent awakened in many an oppressed and troubled spirit, a feeling of joy at misfortune, while many a genial word of love fell into good ground, and grew. And she wrote Le Camp des Vertus (Paris, 1815). Many curious details of her conversations and opinions are preserved in Krug's Conversatioom mit Frau r. Krüdener (Leipz. 1818). See also C. Krug, John Andrew, one of the earlier Lutheran ministers who immigrated to this country, was born March 19, 1732. He was highly educated, and was for a time preacher in the Orphan House at Halle. He graduated at the University of St. Andrews in 1763, and was ordained by Dr. Francke, who considered him well fitted for missionary work. He labored first at Reading, Penn., and among the people of the surrounding country, wholly devoted to his duties, and greatly beloved by the community. In 1771, in accordance with the wishes of his brethren, he relinquished this field of labor, and assumed the pastoral care of the Lutheran Church in Frederick, Md. Here he continued till his death, which occurred March 30, 1796. (M. L. S.)

Krug, Wilhelm Traugott, a distinguished German philosopher and writer, was born at Radia, near Gräfinnhächen, Prussia, June 22, 1770. He studied at the universities of Jena and Lpz., and was appointed to the chair of philosophy in the University of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and here he wrote his principal work, Fundamentalphilosophie (Züllichau and Freiburg, 1803; 3d ed. Lpz. 1827), which became very popular throughout Germany. Guided by Kant's criticism, Krug professed a system which, under the name of "transcendental synthetism," aimed to reconcile idealism and realism. "According to Krug, the act of philosophizing is thought entering into itself, to know and understand itself, and by this means to be at peace with itself. The following are his principal points: 1. In relation with the starting-point, or first principle of knowledge: the Ego is the real principle, insomuch as it takes itself as the object of its knowledge (the philosophizing subject). It is from it that proceed, as from an active principle, the ideal principles, which are essentially different from the Ego, and are results of the reflection of the first, and the formal principles of philosophical knowledge. The material principles are the facts of consciousness grasped in conceptions, which are all comprehended in the proposition, I am an agent. The formal principles (determining the form of knowledge) are the laws of my activity: they are as multifarious as activity itself: the first of these laws is, Seek for harmony in thy activity. 2. How far ought these researches to be carried (the absolute limit of philosophy)? The consciousness is a synthesis of being, or Ego, and knowing, or science (das Ego und das Wissen), says Krug. Every consciousness is thus circumstanced, which implies that being and knowing are united in us a priori. This transcendental synthesis is therefore the original and inappreciable fact which forms the absolute limit of philosophizing. Since being and knowing (Ego und Wissen), united together in the consciousness, cannot be defined, and is founded from the other, their union is completely primitive. 3. What are the different forms of activity? The primitive activity of the Ego is either immanent (speculative) or transitory (practical). Sensibility, intelligence, and reason are the different positions of this activity, regarded as the scientific, and the primitive legislatively, to the human mind in all its activity, is therefore divided into a speculative part and a practical part. The first part is subdivided into formal doctrine (logic) and material doctrine (metaphysics and aesthetics), inasmuch as the one regards the matter of thought per se, and the other (esthetics) considers its relation with sentiment. The latter part is likewise subdivided into formal doctrine (the science of right and law) and material doctrine (morals and religion). Each of these considers the legislation of the human mind under a different aspect. (Tennemann, Kant's Philosophy, 6.) After the death of Kant, Kruger was called to Königsberg to succeed his great master as professor of logic and metaphysics. He subsequently filled also Kraus's place as professor of practical philosophy. In 1809 he became professor of philosophy at Leipzig, a position which he retained until 1842. In 1838 he was elected to the prussian academy of arts, and in 1842 he was made a member of the royal academy of sciences at Berlin. On Jan. 13, 1842, Kruger's other works are Versuch einer systematischen Encyclopädie der Wissenschaften (Wiener, 1796-97, 2 vols.; 3d vol. Krug, Oswald, a German Jesuit, was born in 1598 in Prussia, and made for himself a name by his thorough study of Hebrew, which he taught in the schools of the Jesuit Order. He devoted himself to the study of Hebrew and became professor at the University of Wilna. He died May 16, 1665. —Alcyon, Hist. Lit., iii, 65.

Krummacher, Friedrich Adolf, a German theologian and poet, was born at Tatsenley, in Westphalia, July 13, 1767, and was educated at the universities of Liingen and Halle. At the latter school he enjoyed the reputation of the "elder Knapp," the so justly celebrated "pious" professor of the university at that time. In 1790, after having filled various positions of trust, he was appointed professor of theology at the University of Duisburg, where he remained until 1806. He then became successively pastor of Krefeld, Kettwitz, Breslau, and Nürnberg. His talents as preacher and administrator caused him to be appointed in 1806 as bishop of the Lutheran and Church superintendent. He died at Bremen April 14, 1845. Friedrich Adolph Krummacher deserves special commendation in this work for his piety and the noble example which he furnished to his sons, which became manifest in their lives. (comp. Krummacher, Friedrich Wilhelm.) He is especially known for his parables in verse, which have become classic in Germany, and, though he has had many imitators in this line, he has never been surpassed. His works are, Die Liebe, a hymn (Wezel, 1801); Apologia (Duisburg, 1805; 8th ed. Essen, 1860; French, Paris 1821; English, Lond. 1844, 8vo, and often):—Apologien und Parzaphien (Duisburg, 1810):—Festmählchen, eine V. —6

Krummacher, Friedrich Wilhelm, one of Germany's most eloquent preachers in this century and the most distinguished of a distinguished family, was the son of Friedrich Adolph Krummacher (q. v.), and was born at Mörs, on the Rhine, January 28, 1796. After preparation partly at the Gymnasium and partly at his own father, he entered Halle University in the winter of 1817-18. He was a member of the socialist parties of Niemeyer, Wegscheider, Gesenius, Marx, Die Wette, and "the elder Knapp," for whom young Krummacher early cherished great affection. Two years later he removed to Jena, drawn thither by the celebrated theologians and philosophers and the theological society. He became a well-known editor of a revised edition of the text of the New Testament. To an American student of theology this period of F. W. Krummacher's life presents many points of special interest. He had left Halle for Jena determined to sit at the feet of Schott and other celebrated theologians, but so disheartened was he that he is led to exclaim (in his Autobiography, p. 77), "Nothing remained for me but to seek refuge from this spiritual famine in reading," and, instead of attending faithfully the lectures of his professors, he found it more to his soul's interest to devote his time to the reading of Herder's Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, his father's Spritt and Form of the Gospels, Kleuker's apologetical writings, and other books of this class. His first appointment as preacher he found, in the beginning of 1819, at Frankfort-on-the-Main, as assistant to a German Reformed congregation. 6th of April, 1822, he was removed to the prison city of Düsseldorf, on the Rhine, near Dusseldorf, and two years later to Gemenze, a parish in the town of Harzen; and in 1854 he accepted a repeated call to the city of Erfurt. During his residence there a call came to him from the Pennsylvania Synod of the Reformed German Church to go to the United States and become a minister's wife on the theological school at Mercersburg, Penn., a position which he declined in favor of the celebrated Church historian Philip Schaff, D.D., now professor in the Union Theological Seminary at New York City. In 1847 he was promoted by the king of Prussia, Frederick William IV, to the pastorate of Trinity Church, Berlin, as successor of the renowned pulpit orator Marheineke, who had died in 1846, and he promptly accepted the place. About two years later he became court preacher at Potsdam, the usual summer residence of the Prussian king, and he died there, Dec. 19, 1862. Krummacher was honored with the doctorate of divinity by the University of Berlin. He was an active worker in behalf of the Evangelical Alliance, and attended all its meetings as long as he lived. Dr. Krummacher acquired a world-wide celebrity by his devotional writings, of which the most important are Elias der Thätschoner (Erlab, 1828; 5th ed. 1860; transl. into English and extensively circulated both in England and in this country);—Solumo und Sulamith (ibid. 3d ed. 1860; 7th ed. 1865);—Die Sibbarth-Glocke, a series of devotional poems (ibid. 1848 sq., 12th ed. 1860);—Leidende Christus (Bielefeld, 1854, and often; transl. into Engl. in Clark's Library):—and last, but hardly least, David, der König von Israel

Kryptos (κρυπτός, cryptos). For the purpose of concealment from their persecutors, the early Christians occasionally prepared for themselves churches and oratories under ground, which served both as places of devotion and as sepulchres for their dead. These were called caves (ἀπότομος, esπωτι, to conceal.—Farrar, Eccles. Dict. See CRYPT.

Kryptics, a name sometimes given to those theologians who hold to the spiritus, or concealment theory of our Lord's divine attributes during his earthly career. See KENOS.

Kristolatrous (workshippers of a created thing), a branch of the Monophytes, who maintained that the body of Christ before his resurrection was corrupt, in contradistinction from the Actistetes, who held that it was not created.

Kübel, Mathäus, a German theologian, was born at Herbstein, in the duchy of Fulda, Nov. 14, 1742, and when twenty-two years old entered the order of the Jesuits, under whom he received his subsequent education. In 1768 he became professor of humanities at Heidelberg University, and in 1785 was appointed to the chair of canon law. He died Jan. 3, 1809. Kübel was quite liberal in tendency, and had many warm friends among Protestant theologians. He wrote Ratio fidei resoluta, (Feyel, 1776, 4to). — Dering, Gelehrte Theo- log. Deutschlands der 18ten und 19ten Jahrh. ii. 212.

Küchlein, Johann, a German Protestant theologian, was born at Wetterau, in Hesse, in 1546. He studied at Heidelberg, entered the Church, and became pastor at Tackwen. When, in 1576, elector Louis expelled the Calvinistic preachers, Küchlein went to Holland, and for eighteen years held a professorship in theology at Amsterdam. In 1595 he became director of the College of Leyden, and died July 2, 1606. Guy Patin calls him one of the most learned men of his time. His collected works were published at Geneva (1613, 4to). See H. Witte, Diarium Bibliographicum; Meursius, Athen. Batens; Moret, Dict. Hist.; Soicher, Gelehrten Lexikon; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvii. 256. (J. N. P.)

Kuen, Michael, a German savant, was born at Weissenborn, Austria, Feb. 5, 1709, entered in 1728 the Augustin order, and was elected in 1754 abbot of their monastery at Augsburg. He died Jan. 10, 1777. In his principal works of interest to us are Collectio scrabitorum rerum historico-monastico-ecclesiasticarum orium reli- giosis orium (Ulm, 1756-66, 6 vols. fol.)—Joannes de Comacobo ex cessibus de Canibus, qui vulgo rervderi pro auctore quatuor librorum de Initiatione Christi, re- censere et probare (Augsburg, 1766, 4to); Collectio scrabitorum rerum historico-monastico- ecclesiasticarum orium reli- giosis orium (Ulm, 1765-66, 6 vols. fol.)—Joannes de Comacobo ex cessibus de Canibus, qui vulgo rervderi pro auctore quatuor librorum de Initiatione Christi, re- censere et probare (Augsburg, 1766, 4to); Collectio scrabitorum rerum historico-monastico- ecclesiasticarum orium reli- giosis orium (Ulm, 1765-66, 6 vols. fol.)—Joannes de Comacobo ex cessibus de Canibus, qui vulgo rervderi pro auctore quatuor librorum de Initiatione Christi, re- censere et probare (Augsburg, 1766, 4to).

Kufic Writing, an ancient form of Arabic characters, which came into use shortly after Mohammed, and was chiefly current among the inhabitants of Northern Arabia, where those of the south-western parts em- ployed the Himyarite or Moemad (cched) character. The Kufic is taken from the old Syriac character (Es- trangelo), and is said to have been first introduced by Moramer or Morar ben-Morar of Ambar. The first copies of the Koran were written in it, and Kufa, a city in Irak-Arab (pashabhi of Bagdad), being the one which contained the most expert and numerous copyists, the writing itself was called after it. The alphabet was ar- ranged like the Hebrew and Syriac (whence its designation, A. B. G. D. H. E. V. S.), and this order, although now superseded by another, is still used for numerical pur- poses. The Kufic character, of a somewhat clumsy and ungainly shape, began to fall into disuse about A.D. 1000; Ebn-Morah of Bagdad (died A.D. 988) having invented the current or so-called Nashki (askas), to copy character, which was still further improved by
KUHLMANN

De-Bawab (died 1081), and which now—deservedly, as one of the prettiest and easiest—regains supreme in East and West. The quality at the letterhead of the book, abounding in title-pages, that the Kufic is still employed. A pecular kind of the Kufic is the so-called Karmatian—of a somewhat more slender shape—in which several inscriptions have been met with both in Arabia, and in Damascus, Syria, etc., and which is also used on a comparatively modern-muscle preserved in Newberg. The Kufic is written with a style, while the Neshkili slih reeds are employed. Different kinds of the latter character (in which the alphabet is arranged according to the outward similarity of the letters) are the Mo-roesque or Nabatean (Western), the Divan-al-only employed for deers, etc.), the Taliék (chiefly used in Persia), the Thaolékri (threefold, or very large character), Jakushi, Réhâni, etc. See Alphabet.

Kuhlmann, Quirinus, a German visionary and religious enthusiast, was born at Breslau Feb. 23, 1651. He began to travel public attention at the age of eight-teen, when, rising from a sick-bed, he claimed to have been, during his illness, in direct communication both with God and the devil, and asserted that the duty had fallen on him to bring back to the people all new inspirations which he had received from the Holy Ghost. He quitted the University of Breslau, where he had been studying jurisprudence, and went at once to Holland, in 1673, to become a follower of the mystical Jacob Böhme (q. v.), as is shown by his Neubüester Böhme (Leyden, 1674, 8vo). He also sought to enter into relations with Antoine Bourignon, but does not appear to have succeeded. A letter of his, entitled De sopiasio infus a Adamas Salomoniceus, dated Lubeck, Feb. 1675, shows that he was at that time in possession of this kind of knowledge. Another, addressed to sultan Mohammed IV, proves that he was in Constantinople in 1678. On Nov. 1, 1681, he published at Paris his Arc-am microphoneum, curious and scarce, like all his works. After wandering through Switzerland, England, and Germany, he went, about 1689, to Russia, for the purpose of establishing there the "reæ knigdom of God." At first he succeeded in gaining a large number of partisans, and he may perhaps be considered the founder of the yet existing sect of Dohcobortz (q. v.), or spiritual wrestlers. But the momentary religious freedom enjoyed by Russia under Basili Galitzin soon came to an end on the downfall of Sophia and the accession of Peter the Great to the throne. One of the chief causes of the latter was the expulsion of the Jesuits, and his sentence of death on Kuhlmann and his disciple, Conrad Norderman, supposed to have been occasioned mainly by the efforts of the Lutheran pastor Meinecke. They were both burned alive at Moscow, Oct. 4, 1698. Besides the above-mentioned works, Adiut (List, de folia humanae, v, 9) considers Kuhlmann as the author of forty-two other works, the principal of which are Epistola theo-sophica Ledensia, Leyden, 1674, 8vo:—Epistolarum Lorumbanum Catholicae ac Wickejfol. Giulianiae, Haliae-testantismus, p. 516 sq. See.

Kuhn, Jean Gaspard, a French Protestant preacher, was born at Sausbruck in the latter part of the 17th century, and flourished as professor of history and eloquence at the University of St. Thomas, sabbatical professor of the Church of St. Thomas, in that city. He died in 1720. He wrote De Sociabiliitate secundum Storerum disciplinam. [Hage, La France Protestante, s. v.]

Kuinoel, Christianus Theophilus (Christian Gottlieb Kühnel) in German), a German Protestant theologian and philosopher, born at Leipzig Jan. 9, 1726. He studied the classics at the school of St. Thomas, and theology in the university of his native city. In 1788 he began, by the advice of the celebrated German savant Wolf, a course of lectures at his alma mater on the classics and on the books of the O. and N. T. In 1790 he was appointed professor extraordinary of mortology, and in 1796 preacher of the university. In 1799 he declined an invitation to a professor's chair at Copenhagen, but in 1801 went to Giessen, as professor of belleslettres. Subsequently, however, he devoted himself entirely to the exegesis of the N. T., and in 1802 was transferred to the chair of theology as ordinary professor. He died there Oct. 15, 1841. He wrote Missarumicae Weis-ungsam do. a. Testamenti übersetzt u. erklär't (Lpz. 1792, 8vo, Anon.);—Hosea Oraculæ Hebr. et Lat. perpetua an-notations illustras (Lpz. 1794, 8vo). He had published in 1798 a translation of the books of the New Testament notes:—Observations ad Novum Testamentum, ex biblia apocryphæ Veteris Testamenti (Lpz. 1794, 8vo)—Pericopæ evangelicae (Lpz. 1796, 2 vols. 8vo)—Die Paulinu metr. übersetzt, mit Anmerkungen (Lpz. 1798, 8vo)—

Speculionem observationem in Evangelii apocryphæ Veteris Testamenti, etc. (Lpz. 1807, 8vo)—Commentariis in libris Noei Testamenti historici (Lpz. 1807-18, 4 vols. 8vo; 4th ed. Lpz. 1837; reprinted, with the Gr. text added, Lond. 1835,3 vols 8vo.)—a very able and successful work; one of the best of the modern exegetical works on the N. T. ever issued from the German press, and in no way unsatisfactory in spiritual insight. It belongs to the range of higher criticism, while Rosenmüller is occupied with the lower. Kuinoel is undecided between orthodoxy and neology, but seems to have so strong an under-current of conviction in favor of the truth as to lead him to admit, with a good share of favor, evangelical interpretation into his pages. As to theological sentiments, he distinctly avows himself a high Arian, and is evidently sceptical concerning the miracles of Christ. His commentary is of the his-torico-critical kind—Commentariis in Epistolas ad He-bromam (Lpz. 1797, 12mo).—Hoever, Nouv. Bilg. Générale, xxviii, 290, l'encyclopédie chrétique, xix, 768; Kitto, Cyclopesis, ii, 763. (J. H. W.)

Kulksynski, Ignatius, a Russian monastic, was born at Wladimir in 1707; early entered the order of St. Basil, resided several years at Rome as general of his order; and died as abbot of Grodno in 1747. He is noted as the author of Specimen Ecletica Rhenensia (Rome, 1738, 12mo), a work which was dedicated to pope Clement XII, and is now hardly accessible. He wrote also Tríspuro protologio di tre colori, ovvero narrazione istorica di tre immagini miracolose della Beata Vergine Maria (Rome, 1739, 12mo);—De Vía Sanctorum divi Blasii magni, 2 vols. in MS. form.—Hoever, Nouv. Bilg. Générale, xxviii, 270.

Kulon, the name of a city found only in the Sept. version (Knaλoon) of Josh. xv, 59, as lying in the tract around Bethlehem (see Kiel's Comment. ad loc.); probably corresponding to the modern village of Kulomoe, an hour and a half west of Jerusalem (Robinson's Res-searches, ii, 146), with many old walls built of hea-stones (Schoel, Reise, p. 161). See Judah, THOM. OF.

Kumārasambhava is the name of one of the most celebrated poems of the Hindus, and its author is believed to have been Kâlidâs (q. v.). Its subject is the legendary history connected with the birth of Kâra-âm, or Alâkâs (q. v.), the Hindu hero: but only eight have hithterto been published in the original Sanscrit. The first seven have been elegantly rendered into English verse by Mr. R. T. H. Griffith, at present principal of the Benares Government College.—Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.

Kunradus, Andreas, a Lutheran divine, born at Döhlen, in Misinna, in 1692, was professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg, and died in 1662. He wrote a Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, xxviii, 276.

Kunibert, a bishop of Cologne, who flourished in the 8th century (supposed to have held the see from 613-661), is generally regarded as one of the most influential prelates of the Frankish realm in the 7th century. Not only in ecclesiastical, but also in the civil history of that period, Kunibert fills a not unimportant place. He was a favorite and advisor of king Dagobert I., and was the executor of Sigbert III. He died Nov. 12, 661 or 663. The Roman Catholic Church commemorates the day of his decease. See Aschbach, Kirchen-Lexicon, p. 942 sq.; Retberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschland, i, 586.

Kunigunde, St. See Cunighunda.

Künketh, Johann Theodor, a German theologian, was born at Creusen, in Bayreuth, Sept. 22, 1735; in 1762, he received the doctorate at Jena, and in 1759 became assistant preacher in his native place. He died Aug. 28, 1800, as superintendent of Bayreuth. Künketh was a very popular preacher, and published several of his sermons; he also wrote largely for the theological journals of Germany. A list of his writings is given by John-Eberhard, Theologen Lexicon, i, 114 sq.

Kunwald, Mathias von, a bishop of the Bohemian Brethren, flourished in the 15th century. He was especially prominent at the Synod of Reichenaun in 1494.

Kunze, John Christopher, D.D., one of the most learned men in the Lutheran Church of this country, was born in Saxony about the middle of the 18th century. He was educated in the Gymnasium of Rossieben and Merseburg and the University of Leipzig, and for several years was ensconced in the work of teaching in his native land. When application from the corporation of St. Michael's and Zion's Church was made to the theological faculty at Halle for a minister, their attention was immediately turned to young Kunze. He reached the United States in 1770, and at once commenced his duties as associate pastor of the German churches in Philadelphia. This field of labor he occupied for fourteen years, universally beloved, and exercising a wide influence for good. For several years he was professor in the University of Pennsylvania, from which institution he accepted the doctorate in 1786. He accepted a call to the city of New York in 1784, where he labored for twenty-three years, till his death, July 24, 1807. He was devoted to his work, and indefatigable in his efforts to do good. For a long time he filled with signal ability the professorship of Oriental literature in Columbia College. So high a reputation did he enjoy as a Hebrew scholar that young men who were pursuing their studies with ministers of other denominations frequently resorted to him for instruction. The rabbins connected with the Jewish synagogues also consulted him in their inquiries. As a scholar of the Hebrew, "he was so busily occupied with the study of this language, that he had neither time nor leisure to acquire the respect of this gentleman, and particularly his Oriental learning, long rendered him an ornament of the American republic of letters." He probably did more than any individual of his day to promote a taste for Hebrew literature among those intended for the clerical profession in the United States" (Dr. Miller's Retrospect of the Eighteenth Century). Dr. Kunze published a number of works: History of the Lutheran Church:—Something for the Understanding and the Heart (1781, 8vo);—New Method for Calculating the great Eclipse of June 16, 1806:—Hymn-book for the Use of the Church (1795) —Catha- chism and Liturgy. See Hazelius, Hist. Am. Luth. Church, 1685-1842. (M. L. S.)

Kurdistan or Koordistan, an extensive tract of land in the eastern portion of Asiatic Turkey and in Western Persia. It is chiefly occupied by the Kurds, after whom it is called, but its boundary-line is not definitely established, and the estimates of its area and population greatly differ. The population, according to Rassmesser (Reisen in Europa, Arien, and Afrika, 1883-41), amounted to about 8,600,000; according to Carl Kitz, to only 800,000; according to Carl Riedel, to 400,000; according to Appleton, 40,000. The extent of Turkish Kurdistan is estimated at about 13,000 square miles. It was formerly divided into three governments: namely, 1. Kurdistan, consisting of the Livas Mardin, Sarê, and Dürbâr, containing 1,655,000 inhabitants, of whom 198,000 were Mohammediâns, 51,000 Armenians, 151,000 Jacobites, 4,730, and 1,100 Gipsies; 2. Harpû, consisting of the Livas Meadin, Harpût, Behalî, and Demûs; and 3. Wûn, consisting of the Livas Hakkîly. It was divided into the pachalîc Wûn, Wosil, Dîarbêr, and Urfa, and the beyliks of Mardin, Bûtan, Bogden, and Seindhar; and the district of Mardin. The most important towns are Diarbekir, Bitlis, Wûn, and Mardin. Persian Kurdistan comprises the south-western portion of the province of Aserbaidschan and the western portion of Ardistan, as far as the Kerch, or Bokhara road. The most important town is Baku, in Aserbaidschan, with about 30,000 inhabitants. The Kurds are an agricultural people, who, during the summer months, pitch their black tents upon the Alpine pastures, Asia Minor and Syria, and even Constantinople, are receiving from them flocks and herds of cattle from this territory. The country is made up of isolated villages, without a market, without a church, without a common union, and their intercourse with each other consists chiefly in plundering expeditions. Old castles on inaccessible peaks serve the beyliks as places of refuge in cases of emergency. These boys often rule over several villages. The Kurds were known to Greeks as Carduciâns (Kapadokiâns, Karuci, see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.) or Kyrriâns. In the highlands of Kur- distan they are divided into two different tribes, the As- sireta and the Guranians. The Assyretes are the caste of warriors, and rarely or never agriculturists, but are devoted to cattle-breeding. The Guranians can never become warriors, are agriculturists, and kept in subjec- tion by the Assyretes. As the language of the two tribes likewise differs, it may be assumed that the Guranians are the descendants of the primitive inhabitants, who subsequently were subdued by a more warlike tribe. In Southern Kurdistan the Assyretes call themselves Spath (warriors) and the peasants Rayah (subjects). The language of the Kurds is nearly kindred to the New Per- sian, but is a large extent mixed with Arabic, Syrian, Turkish, and Persian words, and is divided into numerous dialects. They have a written alphabet, therefore no literature, but a number of their popular poems and songs have been written down in Arabic.

The majority of the inhabitants are fanatical Sunnite Mohammediâns, who hate the Shiites even more than they do the Christians. But the number of Armenian, Jacobite, and Nestorian Christians is also considerable. The Armenians chiefly live in the northern part of the country. One section of the Jacobites has its centre near Mardin, under a patriarch, who resides in the convent of Safarkan. Western Kurdistan is the seat of the Nestorian Christians. The Kurds show little disposition to embrace Christianity. Among the Arme- nians and Nestorians the missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions have met with a great success. The mission at Harpût for the Armenian College was organized in 1868. In 1850 a theological seminary was established for the training of the pastoral office, and in 1861 a female seminary for the training of their wives. In 1889 one hundred and fourteen out-stations were connected with 5 principal stations, chief of which is Harpût, where the Eu- phrates College is located. This field is now served by 42 American missionaries with 279 native laborers, of whom 78 are ordained or licensed preachers. The membership is 2086. At Mardin the buildings for a

The flourishing missions among the Nestorians, embreeing more than sixty congregations, quickly in the present. The Church is now under the charge of the Mission Board of the Presbyterian Church of the United States. Of the Jacobites and Nestorians a considerable portion have recognized the supremacy of the church. The former are called the Syrian, the latter the Chaldeans. The United Syrians have a patriarch in Diarbekir, and the Chaldeans a patriarch at El-Kush, near Mosul, in the convent of St. Hormizd. The sect of the Yezidis, or Shemishlou, who are descended from the Parsees, though they follow at the same time some Mohammedan and Christian observances, are fire-worshippers, live south of Mardin. See Shiel, Notes Kurma (called also Karmaavata, i.e. the "avatar of the tortoise") is the name by which the second incarnation of Vishnu is designated. It is related in Hindu mythology that Kurma took the form of a tortoise so as to form a support to the mountains and the gods and Asuras churned the ocean. The mountain being the churn-stick, the great serpent Sêha was made use of for the string. It may be proper to observe that in India churning is usually performed by causing a body to turn the churn-stick to revolve rapidly in the cream or milk by means of a string, in the same manner as a drill is made to revolve. In some of the Hindu pictures of the churning of the ocean the gods are represented as standing on one side of Mount Mandara and the Asuras on the other, both grasping in their hands the serpent Sêha, which is wound round the mountain.

This rests upon the back of the tortoise (Vishnu).

At the same time, the preserving deity, in consequence of his ubiquitous character, is seen standing among the gods and grasping Sêha, and also as dancing on the top of Mount Mandara (see Plate 49 in Moor's Hindu Mittheilungen).

The churning of the ocean is one of the most famous and popular fables related in the mythology of the Hindus. It resulted in the production of the fourteen gems, as they are called, namely, 1. Chandra (the moon); 2.
Lakshmi, the incomparable consort of Vishnu; 3. Sûrâ, the goddess of wine; 4. Uchiravan, a wonderful eight-headed horse; 5. Kustubba, a jewel of inestimable value; 6. Pârijata, a tree that yielded whatever one might desire; 7. Surabhi or Râmadhenu, a cow simlarly bountiful; 8. Dhanwantsara, a wondrous physician; 9. Pravata or Irvarat, the elephant of India; 10.
Shanh, a shell which conferred victory on whosoever sounded it; 11. Danusha, an unerring bow; 12. Vish, a remarkable drug or poison; 13. Remba (or Rembha), an Aparâk possessed of surpassing charms; 14. Armita, or Amrit, the beverage of immortality. See Moor, Hindu Pan-thology.

Kurtz, Benjamin, D.D., LL.D.; a prominent minister of the Lutheran Church, was born at Harrisburg, Penns., Feb. 28, 1795. He was a lineal descendant of one of the Halle patriarchs, the grandson of Rev. John Nieblaus Kurtz, who came to this country in 1745 as an as-settler of Henry Melchior Muhlenberg. When quite young Benjamin exhibited remarkable fitness for study, and great quickness in the acquisition of knowledge.
At the age of fifteen he was employed as an assistant in the Harrisburg Academy, and subsequently gave private instruction in Latin and mathematics. Early trained to industry and self-reliance, he formed those habits of mental discipline which gave so much strength to his future character. He studied theology under the direction of Rev. Dr. Geo. Lochman, and was licensed to preach in 1815 by the Synod of Pennsylvania. He immediately received a call to Baltimore as assistant minister to his uncle, Rev. Dr. J. D. Kurtz. He remained in this position for a brief period, and then accepted the invitation to become pastor of the Hagerstown charge.
During this period of his ministry his labors were crowned with the success of a singular nature. In addition to the Church he added to the Church one hundred and fifteen members.
Very reluctantly he resigned the position, and in 1831 took charge of the Lutheran Church in Chambersburg. But in the midst of his usefulness, with the brightest prospects of success, his labors here were abruptly terminated by the failure of his health. He removed to Baltimore Aug. 24, 1833, and commenced his career as editor of the Lutheran Observer. The paper became an engine of great influence in the Church, and, although physically disqualified to perform regular pullitab work, in his editorial capacity he was permitted ev-every week in the Gospel Advocate, the organ of the clergymen of the Church. He died Dec. 29, 1865. Dr. Kurtz possessed an intellect of no common order, a resolute will, and remarkable personal power. He was an active, vigorous thinker. He had acquired habits of close aplication, keen observation, and keen perception, both for analytical research, and the investigation of intricate questions. His mind was clear and logical, and in controvery he had scarcely a superior. He readily com-prehended a subject, and knew how to grapple with any truth that claimed his attention. Had he entered the legal profession, for which he was originally intended, or political life, to which he was so well adapted, he would, no doubt, have risen to the highest position, to a rank equal to his most distinguished contemporaries.
As a preacher he was very much gifted. In his earlier years, and in the maturity of his strength, he was referred by many as the most eloquent orator in the State of Maryland. He was plain, thoughtful, argumentative, and forcible. He gave utterance to the great truths of the Gospel with an energy and an unction that carried conviction home to the hearer. He was a clear, prolific writer, and a successful advocate in the pulpit. He was a man of independent spirit, fond of excitation, and work-best when under its influence. He was, in the full sense of the term, a public man, and few men in the Lutheran Church of this country have wielded a greater power than he. His name was a tower of strength in connection with any enterprise that engaged his attention. His public career, extending over half a century, was identified with the most important events in the history of the Lutheran Church during that period. The recognised leader of a central school in the Church, the public representative of a party whose views he adopted, his sentiments on all subjects were regarded with favor. His words were received as oracular. His life was one of ceaseless activity. Laborious, self-sacrificing, a man of great industry and unwearied perseverance, he never yielded to any obstacle that was not absolutely insuperable. Notwithstanding his daily routine of duty, and the multiplicity of his engagements, he found some time for authorship. His books were generally well received by the public; some of them passed through several editions. The following embraces a list of his publications: A Discourse on the History of Religious Discipline (1826); — Sermons on Sabbath-schools (1822); —Faith, Hope, and Charity (1824); —A Sermon on Temperance (1824); —Pastoral Address during his absence in Europe (1827); — Ministerial Appeal, Valedictory Sermon, Hagerstown (1831); —A Discourse on the Lord's Supper, etc. (Baltimore, Chambersburg (1831); —Infant Baptism and Af-fusion, with Essays on Related Subjects (Baltimore, 1840):

He was also co-editor of the Year-book of the Reformation (1844). See Evang. Rev. 1866, p. 25 sq.; Lutheran Observer, Jan. 5 and 12, 1866. (M.L.S.)

Kurtz, John Daniel, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Lutheran Church, the son of the Rev. J. N. Kurtz, was born at Germantown, Penn., in 1763. Very early in life he had a strong desire to prepare for the ministry of reconciliation. After leaving school he pursued his studies under the direction of his father, and subsequently Dr. H. E. Mühlenberg, of Lancaster. In 1784 he was licensed to preach by the Synod of Pennsylvania. He commenced his ministerial labors by assisting his father in preaching, catechising, and visiting the sick. Afterwards he took charge of congregations in the vicinity of York. He removed in 1786 to Baltimore, where he labored with great diligence and fidelity for nearly half a century. In 1807, in consequence of advancing physical infirmities, he resigned his position, although he occasionally preached, and endeavored to make himself useful whenever an opportunity afforded. He died June 30, 1856, in the 93rd year of his age, loved and honored by all who knew him. During his ministry he baptized 5156 persons, buried 2221, and solemnized 2568 marriages. Being once told that the Methodists were gathering in German Lutheran emigrants and organizing churches among them, his reply was, "And is it not better that they should go to heaven as Methodists than be unbelievers and overlooked as Lutherans?" He was one of the founders of the General Synod of the Lutheran Church, a director of the Theological Seminary, and closely identified with all the beneficent institutions of the Church. He was a member in the formation of the Maryland Bible Society, and for many years was president of the trustees of the Female Orphan Asylum. (M.L.S.)

Kurtz, John Nicholas, one of the earlier Lutheran ministers in this country, was born at Lutzelinden, in the principality of Nassau-Weilburg, and came to this country in 1745. He pursued his studies at Giessen and Halle, and was regarded by Dr. Francke as particularly fitted for missionary labor among his countrymen in America. He was the first Lutheran minister ordained in this country. He labored successively at New Hanover, Tulpehocken, Germantown, and York, Pa., although he frequently spent whole months in visiting the destitute places of the Church, preaching, catechising, and administering the sacraments. During his residence at Tulpehocken the services of the sanctuary were often conducted at imminent risk of life, as the ruthless Indian lay in wait for victims, and whole families were sometimes massacred. The officers of the church stood at the doors armed with defensive weapons, to prevent a surprise and to protect minister and people. In travelling to his preaching stations and visiting among his members he was often exposed to danger from the attack of the tomahawk and scalping-knife. He was put to many privations, and spent the summer months in the mountains. The little ones gave a yellow mark; he wears an earring, but only in one ear; and, though he is properly of a black color, his belly is whitened by a leprous taint. He is seated in a car (puhuku), which is drawn by hogcubling. His residence, Alakä, is situated near the confluence of the rivers Minne-sa, and he is attended by the Yakshas, Mâyus, Kinnaras, and other imps, anxiously guarding the entrance to his garden, Chaiturratha, the abode of all riches. Nine treasures—apparently precious gems—are especially entrusted to his care. His wife is a hogcubling, Yaksha, or spirit; and his children are, according to the Indian notion, dwarves. As one of the divinities that preside over the regions, he is considered also to be the protector of the north.

Kuvera, the Hindu Plutus, or god of wealth. He owes his name—which literally means "having a wretched (ku) body (tera)"—to the deformities with which he is invested by Hindu mythology. He is represented as having three heads, three legs, and eight human and animal teeth; in this condition he is very worshiped, and the Hindus draw a yellow mark; he wears an earring, but only in one ear; and, though he is properly of a black color, his belly is whitened by a leprous taint. He is seated in a car (puhuku), which is drawn by hogcublings. His residence, Alakä, is situated near the confluence of the rivers Minne-sa, and he is attended by the Yakshas, Mâyus, Kinnaras, and other imps, anxiously guarding the entrance to his garden, Chaiturratha, the abode of all riches. KYPERNS, GERARDUS ARENSTUS, D.D., an eminent minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Halandish parentage in the island of Curacoa, W.I., Dec. 16, 1756. His father, Rev. Walmouth Kyperns, was a clergyman, educated at the University of Groningen, and removed to this country, where he settled as pastor of the church at Rhinebeck, N. Y., and Hackensack, N. J. He died in 1799. His son Gerardus was educated by the celebrated Dr. Peter Wilson, who was then the most popular and able classical teacher in New Jersey. His theological course was pursued under the care of his father and Drs. Hermanus Mayer and Dirck Remsen. He was licensed to preach in 1787, ordained in 1788 as co-pastor at Paramus, N. J., and in 1789 became one of the ministers of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church in New York, where he remained until his decease in 1808. Dr. Kyperns was a Christian gentleman, and a theologian of the old school, remarkably conversant with the Bible, and possessed of high pastoral qualifications. He is described as an evangelical, practical, lucid, and superior preacher, a man of peace and prudence, and a living chronicle of past events, whose decisions on matters of usage and precedent were for many years regarded as final. His death was triumphant. He left unfinished a volume of Discourses on the Heidelberg Catechism.—Dr. Knox: Memorials Discourses (1833); Sprague: Annals: Corwin's Manual Ref. Ch. p. 180; Life of Dr. J. H. Livingston. (W. J. R. T.)

Kvaais is the name of a mythic personage mentioned in the Norse legends. "He was so wise and knowing that no one could ask him a question which he could not answer. He was, however, entrapped and slain by two dwarfs who had invited him to a feast. With his blood they mingled honey, and thus composed a meal which makes every one who drinks of it a skald, or wise man." See Thorpe, Northern Mythology, vol. 1.

Kydeminister (or Kidekminister), Richard, an English monk, greatly celebrated both as a preacher and scholar, born in Worcestershire, flourishing in the first half of the 16th century. He was abbot of the Benedictine monastery at Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, and died in 1531. He wrote Tractatus contra Doctrinae Lutheri (1521); also a history of his monastery. See Wood, Athen. Oxon.; Allibone, Dictionary of English and American Authors, ii, 1046.

Kypke, Georg David, a distinguished German Orientalist, was born at Neukirchen, Pomerania, Oct. 28, 1774. He studied at the universities of Königsberg and Halle, took his degree in the department of philosophy in 1774, in 1746 was appointed professor extraordinary of Oriental languages at Königsberg, and was promoted to the full professorship in 1773. He died May 28, 1779. Kypke wrote Observationes sacrae in Novi Testamenti libros, ex autoribus Graecis et antiquitatibus (Breslau, 1755, 2 vol. 8vo); a successful attempt to illustrate many passages of the New Testament by examples drawn from Greek classic authors. "Of all the expositions of the New Testament conducted on principles like these, I know no one which are superior, or, indeed, equal to that of Kypke" (Michaelis). See Schott, Suppl. zu Jocher; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxviii, 812.

Kyrle (Kepa), "O Lord" (in Church music), the vocative of the Greek word signifying Lord, with which word all the musical masses in the Church of Rome open. Hence it has come to be used substantively for the whole piece, as one may say, a beautiful Kyrie, a Kyrie well executed, etc.

Kyrle Eleison (Kepa Elipson, Lord have mercy [upon us]), the well-known form of earnest and pathetic penitential appeal of the Scriptures, of frequent occurrence in the liturgy of the Eastern and Western churches, and in the liturgical formule of the Eastern and Western churches, and since the Reformation retained even in many Protestant churches.

Eastern Church.—Most frequently it was used in the opening portions of the ancient liturgies. In that of St. Mark we find three long prayers, each preceded by the threefold repetition of the Kyrie. In St. Chrysostom's the deacon offers ten petitions, and each is followed by the answering Kyrie of the choir. In the Apostolic Constitutions (lib. viii, can. 6), when the catechumens are about to protest the faith, it is added for this supplication (comp. Neale, Primitive Lit., p. 88).

Western Church.—In the West the Kyrie Eleison and Christe Eleison, termed by St. Benedict "lesser" or "minor litanies," it is generally supposed were introduced by pope Sylvester I (314-355), and formed a part of the Processional of the "Salisbury Parloirium," as they do now of the daily offices of prayer of the Church of Rome, England, and the Protestant Episcopal Church. In the Lutheran and many other evangelical liturgies the Kyrie Eleison is retained. See Palmer, Orig., Lib. i, 122; Siegel, Christliche Kirchliche Alterthümer, iii, 257; Higden, Christian Antiquities, lib. iv, cap. 98; Watts, Stanzas for the Most Distinguished V. Proctor, Common Prayer (see Index); Blunt, Dict. Doct. and Hist. Theol. s. v. (J. H. W.)

Kyrie, John, an English philanthropist, whom Pope has immortalized under the name of "The Man of Rome," was born at Dymock (County of Gloucester) in 1857. With a small income of £500 he managed to do much good to the city of London. He founded and encouraged agriculture, opened ways of communication between the different places, and founded asylums for orphans and disabled persons. The passage in which Pope commemorates him is too well known and too long to be quoted here. We will only say that it is substantially based on facts. Kyrie died in 1754. La'adah (Heb. Ladaq, יְלַדָּה, order; Sept. Aadaá v. r. Maadá), the second name of the two sons of Shebáh (son of Judah), and founder ("father") of Marashah, in the lowlands of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 21). B.C. cir. 1874.

La'adan (Heb. Ladaqan, יְלַדָּן, arranger), the name of two men.

1. (1 Chron. xxiii, 7-9, 24, Sept. Aâdaâ v. r. Eâdâv, Vulg. Leedan; in 1 Chron. xxvii, 21, Aadâv v. r. Laâdâv, Aâdâv, Leadan.) The first named of the two sons of Gershom, the son of Levi; elsewhere called Liihn (1 Chron. vi, 17).

2. (Sept. Taladââv v. r. Aâdâv, Aâdâv, Vulg. Laedan, Latad.) The second named of the two sons of Tahath, and father of Ammiudah, of the posterity of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii, 26). B.C. post 1612.

Labadie, Jean De, a French enthusiast, and the founder of the religious sect known as Labadites, was born at Bourg, in Guienne, Feb. 15, 1610. Educated in the Jesuits' school at Bordeaux, he entered their order, began the study of theology in 1626, and soon distinguished himself as a preacher. Struck with the abuses existing in the Roman Church, he clamored for reform, but, meeting with no encouragement in his order, he left it to join the Fathers of the Oratory in 1639, and very shortly afterwards the Jansenists. In 1640 he was appointed canon of Amiens, and at once inaugurated various reforms. He held conventicles for the purpose of Bible reading, and administered the Lord's Supper in both kinds to the people. To prevent the spread of this innovation, he was removed in 1646, and sent as preacher and inspector to the convents of the third order of St.
FRANCIS in Guineu. Still persecuted by the Jesuits, he joined the Reformed Church at Montauban in 1656, and entered the Protestant ministry under very auspicious circumstances. In 1657 he became pastor in Orange, and in 1659 in Geneva. In both situations he exerted himself to the utmost for the restoration of apostolic religion on Pietistic principles, and gained many converts, especially in Geneva. In 1666 he became pastor of a Walloon church in Middelburg, but, by the machinations of his enemies, was obliged to leave it, and in 1669 went to Amsterdam, where his followers soon formed a distinct religious sect, known as Labanists, of whom Yvon was one of the preachers. Having been expelled from the country as a separatist, Labadie went in 1670 to Hereford, where, through the influence of his disciple, the learned Anna Marie von Schurmann (who appears to have become his wife afterwards), he was protected by the princess Elisabeth. But, again driven away (in 1674) by the authorities as an Anabaptist, he succeeded successively to Bremen and Altona. Here he managed, with the assistance of Peter Yvon and De Lignon, to hold private meetings and to disseminate his doctrines. He died at Altona Feb. 13, 1674. His principal works are: Le héritage de la vraie foi (Amsterd. 1667, 12mo); Les vaissels du pur Dieu (Amsterd. 1667, 12mo); Le véritable ecclésiastique ou l'unique moyen de chasser le Diable du monde Chrétien (Amsterd. 1667, 12mo); — Le chant royal du roi Jésus-Christ (Amsterd. 1670, 12mo); — Les soins Décades (Amstel. 1687, 8vo); — L'empire du St. Esprit (Amst. 1671, 12mo); — La réformation de la religion Christiane; ou la juridiction apostolique; Abrégé du Christianisme (transl. into German, Frankf. 1742); etc.

According to their confession of faith (Déclaration d. reines laws u. g. gesamten Glaubens d. Joh. de L., etc., Herford, 1671), Labadists do not differ from the Reformed Church, whose symbolic books they accepted. They supported themselves by manual labor, and, after the example of the primitive Church, possessed everything in common; they insisted that great stress is to be laid on the internal light, and that it alone can make the outer revelation intelligible. They, however, declared against infant baptism; also against the second baptism of the Anabaptists, and rejected the observance of the Sabbath on the plea that for them life was a perpetual Sabbath, etc. The reproach of immodesty which some Roman Catholic writers have preferred the labanists, is unfounded; they were modest, and honored the institution of matrimony. After Labadie's death his followers removed to Wieuvert, in the duchy of Cleves, but gained few adherents, and the sect gradually disappeared about the middle of the 18th century. At the beginning of the 19th century, an attempt was made to establish themselves in the United States of America; a few of their number settled on the banks of the Hudson River as missionaries, but they do not seem to have taken a special hold. LABANA 177

LABIS

Isabella did not return to that place after reaching Kedesh, are neither of them relevant. He prefers the Hasara of ancient notice (Note, Esh. 17, 11, 70 sq.; Hasara of the Peutinger Table, ix, 7; Aegyptus of Polymy, v, 17, 5), between Petra and Eela as having the signification white in Arabic (Steph. Byz. v.s. v.).

Lab'aana (Lab'ara), one of the chief Temple-servants whose sons returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. 5, 28); especially the Labana (q.v.) of the Hebrew list (Neh. 7, viii, 49).

Labarárum is the name given to the old standard or flag of Christian nations. Its derivation is uncertain, but it has variously been considered as coming from Latin labrns, labrns, labrns, labrns pontifical, etc. Some, with Prudentius, pronounced both as short; others (Altithem, De land. Virg.) considered it the first as long. Sozomen has it λαβρασον; Chrysostom, λαβρασον. (Comp. on the etymology, Greses, Πατρ. Cruce, lib. lvi.) We find this name already applied to the Roman standard in coins of the republic and of the first emperors, especially on those connected with the wars against the Germans, Sarmatians, and Armenians. The standards obtained a Christian signification under the emperor Constantine the Great, who, after his conversion, placed the image of the cross on his standards, and caused it to be received at Rome as the σωτήρος τουρανος. Henceforth it was considered as etymo λαβρασον των δαλων γνωρων: it was carried in advance of the other standards, looked upon as an object of adoration by the Christian soldiery, and was surrounded by a guard of fifty picked men. Eusebius, who describes it with great particularity (in Vita Constantini, E, cap. 30, 31; Baroinius, Annales Ecclesiast. A.D. 812, No. 26), relates that Constantine was induced to place the Christian symbol on the Roman standard by having in vision seen a shining cross in the heavens. This vision may be denied or variously explained from subjective causes; compare the article CONSTANTINE, and Schaff, Ch. Hist, ii, § 2.)

The Labarum, the image of the emperor, along with those of Jupiter, Mars, and Mercury, but the standard of Constantine was restored under Valentine and Gratian. The labarum remained the standard of Rome until the downfall of the Western Roman Empire, under the names of labarum, crux; and ecclesiae ecclesiasticus. The standards occur in use in some ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church still consist of a spear, with a cross-piece, to which is attached a cloth covered with embroidery or painting. The most renowned masterpiece of Christian art, Raphael's Maddonna del Progresso, was originally made and used for this purpose. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vol. viii. s. v.; Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ii, 261 sq.; Marinig, Dict. des Anquetis, s. v.; Walcott, Sacred Archology, s. v.; Violan, Disc. crit. sur la Vision de Constan- tin (Paris, 1774). Labor (properly

also

\[\text{πορτα, to oil, Gr. \text{κοινων}}, \] and other terms). From Gen. ii, 15 (where the same word is used, A. V. "till"), we learn that man, even in a state of innocence, and surrounded by all the external sources of happiness, was not to pass his time in indolent repose. By the very existence of his animal frame, exercise of some kind was absolutely essential to him (comp. Eccles. v, 12). In Gen. iii, 19, labor, in its more rigorous and exhausting forms, is set forth as a part of the primeval curse,"I will put thorns and thistles before thy face; thou shalt eat bread;" and doubtless there is a view of labor which exhibits it in reality as a heavy, sometimes a crushing burden (compare Gen. xxxix, 16). But labor is by no means exclusively an evil, nor is its prosecution a dishonor (comp. Ps. ciii, 23, 24). It is the prostration of strength, wherewith is also connected the temporary incapacity of sharing in the enjoyments of life, and not labor in itself, which is constituted the punishment pronounced on the fallen man. Hence we find that, in primitive times, manual labor was neither regarded as degrading nor confined to a certain class of society, but was more or less prosecuted by all. By the institution of the Sabbath, which one seventh of mankind's life was reserved from labor, and appropriated to rest of body and to that improvement of mind which tends to strength, invigorate, and sustain the entire man. See SABBATH.

Labor was enjoined on all Israelites as a sacred duty in the fourth commandment (Exod. xx, 9; Deut. v, 15); and the Bible entertains so high a respect for the diligent and skilful laborer, that we are told in Prov. xxii, 29, "Seest thou a man skilled in his work, he shall stand before kings." (comp. also ibid., xiv, 4; xii, 24, 27.) Among the beautiful features which grace an excellent housewife, is set forth that "she worketh willingly with her own hands" (Prov. xxxi, 18). With such an honorable regard for labor, it is not to be wondered at that Nebuchadnezzar carried the Jews away into captivity, he found among them a thousand craftsmen and smiths (2 Kings xxiv, 14-16; Jer. xxxix, 2). The ancient rabbins, too, regarded manual labor as most honorable, and urged it upon every one as a duty, as may be seen from the following sayings in the Talmud:

"He who does not teach his son a craft is as it were, bringing him up to robbery" (Chocia, 185); "Labor is great, and he that labors is the happiest" (15); "The laborer, and maintains him" (Chapiga, 5; Nedarim, 49, b; Baba Bathra, 110, a). See HANDBOOK.

The Hebrews, like other primitive nations, appear to have had herdsmen before they were agriculturists (Gen. iv, 2; xxiv, 17, 22); and the practice of keeping flocks and herds continued in high esteem and constant observance as a regular employment and a social condition (Judg. i, 16; iv, 11; Amos vii, 14; Luke ii, 8). The culture of the soil came in course of time, introducing the discovery and exercise of the practical arts of life, which eventually led to those refinements and improvements in the arts of fashion and to applications, which precede, if they do not create, the fine arts (Gen. iv; xxvi, 12; xxviiii, 19).

Agriculture, indeed, became the chief employment of the Hebrew race after their settlement in Canaan; it lay at the very basis of the constitution, both civil and religious, which Moses gave them, was held in great honor, and was carried on by the high as well as the humble in position (Judg. vi, 11; 1 Sam. xi, 5; 1 Kings xix, 19). No small care was bestowed on the culture of the vine, which grew luxuriously on the hills of Palestine (Isa. v, 1; Matt. xxv, 27; Numb. xiii, 24). The vintage was a season of jubilee (Judg. ix, 27; Jer. xxxix, 10; Isa. xvi, 10). The hills of Palestine were also adorned with well-cultured olive-gardens, which produced fruit useful for food, for anointing, and for medicine (Isa. xlix, 6; xxv, 18; Dan. iii, 23; Ezek. xxvii, 17; 1 K. xiv, 17; Prov. xxiv, 30. Hos. xiv, 6, 7). Attention was also given to the culture of the fig-tree (2 Kings xxii, 7; 1 Chron. xxviii, 22), as well as of the date-palm (Lev. xxviii, 40; Judg. i, 6; iv, 15; xx, 33; Deut. xxviii, 4), and also of haisam (Gen. xliii, 11; Ezek. xxvii, 17; xxxviii, 28; Jer. viii, 22). Laborde, Vivien, a French priest, born at Toulouse, Nov. 16, 1696, flourished at Paris under the patronage of cardinal De Noailles. He died March 5, 1748. His works are A Treatise on the Essence:—Distinction and Limits of the Spiritual and Temporal Powers:—Famililar Conferences: and other religious works of value.

Labouderie, Jean, a celebrated French theologian, was born at Chalinsarges, Auvergne, Feb. 15, 1775. He became vicar of Notre Dame, Paris, in 1815, and early distinguished himself more as a writer than a preacher. He was particularly conversant with the Hebrew language. He died as honorary grand vicar of Avignon at Paris, May 2, 1849. Among his works are: Psalms (L'Avignon, 1801); Considerations addressées aux aspirants au ministère de l'Église de Genève, suivant suite à celles de M. Empreux sur la divinité de Jésus-Christ, avec une réponse à quelques questions de M. Delloc, etc. (Paris, 1817, 8vo)—Précis historique du Méthodisme (1818, 8vo)—Le Christianisme de Montaigne (1819, 8vo)—L'âme des Saints (1820, 3 vols. 24mo)—La Religion Chrétienne (1826, 8vo)—Notice historique sur Zwingle (1828, 8vo); etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Laboureur, Le Jean, a French priest, born at Montmorency in 1628, became one of the almoners of the king, and died in 1675. He wrote several valuable works on the history of France.

Labrador, a peninsula of north-eastern America, is bounded on the east by the Atlantic Ocean, on the south by the Dominion of Canada and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on the west by the Hudson Bay and James Bay, on the north by the Hudson Strait. Area about 500,000 sq. m. It is rich in iron ore, copper, and petroleum. The principal river is the St. John. There are on the mainland belonging to the Hudson Bay Company, and with the remainder of this territory was in 1699 sold to the government of the Dominion of Canada. The interior of the country is almost entirely unknown. The population, comprising Indians, Esquimaux, and a few Europeans, is about 8000. It is about 500 miles long, 100 miles wide. Labrador is identical with the Helluland (stone-land) which about the year 1000 was discovered by Leif, the son of Eric the Red. On June 24, 1497, it was again discovered by John and Sebastian Cabot. It was visited in 1500 by the Portuguese G. Cortereal, who called it Terra del Labrador (land for labor), and in 1576 by the Englishman M. Frobisher. In 1618 Hudson explored a part of the coast. The country, which has a rugged coast, and is surrounded with many small islands, does not allow an extensive cultivation; for, although the vegetation is of a peculiar kind, it is limited as it is throughout Greenland, the winters are even more severe, and during the short summers the musquitoes are even more troublesome than in Greenland. The population of the interior, which consists of Red Indians, is very small. There are on the labrador, and on the eastern and the western coast, are a little more numerous, and support themselves by fishing, etc. If these animals fail them a famine is brought on, or they are forced to penetrate farther into the interior, where they are apt to encounter the Red Indians, their irreconcilable enemies for centuries. The ancient vintages were with.

The first attempt to establish a mission on the coast of Labrador was made by the Moravians in 1752, when
LABROUSSE

J.C. Erhardt was killed by the Esquimaux. In 1771 the Moravians succeeded in establishing the station of Nain, to which in the course of the following ten years the whole of the group of the Ammassalik (Inupiat) were added. The mission met hers with the same difficulties as in Greenland. Thirty-four years after the establishment of the first mission an extensive revival took place, in consequence of which the Esquimaux connected with these stations were gained to Christianity. The Esquimaux living more to the north, Hebron was founded in 1830. In 1864 the station of Zoar was established for the tract of land lying between Nain and Hooffthal. All the Esquimaux in this part of Labrador are now Christians. Only north of Hebron a few pagans are still left. The conversion of the Esquimaux from the station of Rams, situated on the Bay of Nallutoruek (a little north of lat. 59° 11' N.) was founded. Famine and epidemics have greatly reduced the number of the Esquimaux in Labrador. In 1780 the station of Nain numbered 259, Okak 329, Hooffthal 256, Hebron 219, and Zoar 192 souls, while the number of missionaries on their attendants was 45. The acquaintance of the natives with European necessities forced the missionaries to charge themselves with the importation of some of these articles. Subsequently this trade was transferred to special agents, and the commercial houses have ceased a number of Europeans to settle on the coast of Labrador, and a number of trading-posts to be established. Besides the Moravians, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel has begun missionary efforts on the southern coast, and the Roman Catholic Church has endeavored to gain an influence upon the Red Indians of the interior. LABROUSSE, CLOTHILDE SUSAN COUNCILLER DE, a French religious enthusiast, was born at Vauxain, Perigord, May 29, 1747. While quite young she adopted exaggerated mystical notions, thought herself called to become a saint, and was anxious to leave this world for a better one that she made an attempt at suicide when nine years old. Her ascetic practices were very severe, and became still more so as she grew up, yet did not seem to leave any injurious effect on her health. At the age of nineteen she became a nun of the third order of St. Francis, and soon after declared that she had received a mission to travel through the world to convert sinners, but was detained in the convent in the meantime. She then retired to the hermitage of her own life, which she addressed to M. de Flamarens, bishop of Perigueroux, without effect. The MS., however, attracted the attention of Dom Gerle, prior of the Charterhouse of Vaucasine, who entered into correspondence with the reverend father, and she afterwards retired to a monastery, in which she was elected a member of the National Assembly, that she had predicted it to him. When the Revolution broke out, M. Pontard, constitutional bishop of Dordogne, attracted her to Paris, where she prophesied against the court of Rome, and in favor of the civil constitution of the clergy. She subsequently returned to Perigord, and left there to go to Rome, thinking to convert the pope, cardinals, etc., to her views, and to induce them to renounce temporal power. On her way she addressed the people wherever an opportunity offered. In August, 1792, she arrived at Bologna, whence she was driven by the legate. At Viterbo she was arrested and taken to the castle of San Angelo. In 1796 the French Directory interfered to obtain her liberation, but she preferred remaining, as she had been very kindly treated; but when the French took Rome in 1798 she left the prison where she died in 1821. She persisted to the last in believing herself inspired, and actually succeeded in gathering a small circle of adherents. Labrousse wrote Prophéties concernant la Révolution Française, suivies d'une Prédiction qui commence de la fin du monde (for 1809) (Paris, 1796, 8vo).—Lettre de Mlle. de Labrousse (Paris, 1796, 8vo).—Pontard published a Recueil des Ouvrages de la célèbre Mlle. La Brune, François de. See La Brune, Jean de.

La Brune, Jean de, a French Protestant minister, flourished in the second half of the 17th and the early part of the 18th century. After the revocation of the edict of Nantes he went as pastor to Basle; later he became master of the school of Schoenenberg, in Heidelberg, and is particularly celebrated as a writer, but many of the works which have generally been attributed to him are now believed to be the production of François de La Brune, also a Protestant French pastor, who flourished about the same time; went to Amsterdam in 1685, and, on account of heterodox opinions, was suspended from the ministry in 1691. We have under the name of La Brune, among other works, Morale de Confucius (Amst. 1688, 8vo)—Calvin's Traité de la Justification (ibid. 1690, 8vo; 1705, 12mo)—Hist. du Vieux et du Nouveau Test. en vers (1731, 8vo)—Hoefer, Nouv. Lacey, William B., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born about 1781. He entered the ministry in 1813 as missionary of Chenango County, N. Y.; in 1818 he became rector of St. Peter's Church, Albany. He labored there upwards of twenty years, his ministry being crowned with great success. Subsequently he became professor in the University of Pennsylvania, and president of a college at Laceyville, Pa. He died October 31, 1866. Dr. Lacey wrote a number of text-books for schools and colleges which were deservedly popular in their day, particularly his Rhetoric and Moral Philosophy. During the last ten years of his life he employed his leisure hours in revising a History of the English Church prior to the Time of the Monk Augustin, and some of his choicest sermons and other MSS. See Am. Ch. Rev. 1867, p. 641.

La Chaise or La Chaise d'Aix, François de, Père, a celebrated French Jesuit and noted confessor. Louis XIV. was born of a noble family at the castle of Aix Aug. 25, 1634. He was educated at the College of Roanne, became a Jesuit, and afterwards went to complete his studies at Lyons, where he subsequently taught philosophy with great success. Having been appointed professor of theology, he was soon called away from Lyons to direct the establishment of his order at Grenoble, but almost immediately returned with the office of provincial. Finally, on the death of father Ferrier, he succeeded him as confessor of the king in 1675. Madame de Montespan was then at the height of her favor, and all the efforts of father Ferrier, Bourdaloue, Bossuet, and Mascaron had proved ineffective against her. La Chaise proved no more cautiously than his predecessors, and proved much more successful. Never directly contradicting his royal penitent, he knew how to gain him to his views by slow but steady advances. Whenever he saw the king disposed to throw off his easy yoke, he would feign sickness and seek the privacy of the palace to the king, who, being positively refused absolution once by father Deschamps, would, after such experiments, submit the more readily to the witty Jesuit. The latter, moreover, was an agreeable companion as well as an easy confessor. Madame de Montespain, who was by proxy of La Chaise and Madame de Maintenon, retired finally into a convent. The queen dying a few years afterwards, La Chaise is said to have given the king the idea of a morganatic marriage, and even to have performed the ceremony. Yet, in spite of all he had done for her, Madame de Maintenon (q. v.) does not appear to have ever been very friendly towards the Jesuit; perhaps because he prevented a public recognition of her marriage; perhaps also because she knew that in helping her he had worked only for himself. When Madame de Maintenon found herself in the Saint-Cyr, the Ile de la Cité, Ixassan, and Bollcine were commissioned to revise its rules. The former opposed the rule that teachers should be required to take anything more than the simple vows, and carried his point, though subsequently this was changed, and they became subject to the rule of St. Augustine. All this, however, was vain, and the actions of the king were entirely governed by La Chaise and Madame de Maintenon. Both agreed against the Prot- estants, and their joint efforts brought on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Jesuit, indeed, tried to conciliate the king and the pope when the difficulties arose about the declaration of the clergy in 1689, and the famous four propositions, and even appeared more inclined to side with the temporal than with the spiritual monarch; but he again balanced the account by advocating the dragoons as a sure means of reclaiming erring consciences. He died Jan. 20, 1709. In the famous quarrel between Fénelon and Bossuet, La Chaise sided with the former, as far as he dared without offending the king. He even affected great regard for Quarrel, though, when it is remembered that he caused the works of that writer to be condemned, the sincerity of his professions may be doubted; but it was his principle to attack individuals, not parts, and he therefore found it convenient, as a true Jesuit, to praise men whom, on account of their very principles, he secretly sought to destroy. See Jansenism; Jesuits. He was a shrewd, practical Jesuit, a clever, and did much, if not in his order, but where La Chaise cannot be doubted either as a great man or as a good priest. The kindred custom ever made on his character is that by Voltaire, who speaks of him as "a mild person, with whom the ways of conciliation were always open." He obtained the king's protection for the College of Clermont, since called Col- lege Louis-le-Grand, and received for his order a fine estate to which his name was given, and which is now the cemetery of "Père la Chaise" at Paris. He wrote Peripatetic quadruplificans philosophiae Plutarca rationalis, etc. (Lyons, 1661, 2 vols., fol.); De la cumulatio Propositionum propugnativa Logiani in collegio Soc. Jesu (Lyons, 1662, fol.); Réponse à quelques difficultés propo- sées à un théologien, etc. (Lyons, 1666, 4to); see also Saint-Simon, Mémoires; Madame de Maintenon, Correspondance; Voltaire, Sacre de Louis XIV; Bonnaud, Histoire de l'Édit de Nantes; Jeuris, La charte du IIIr de France, etc. Sismondi, Histoire des Français, vol. xxv, xxvi, and xxvii; Régis de Chantelauze, Le Père de la Chaise (Lyons, 1859, 8vo); Hoefer, *Now. La Chapelle, ARMAND BOISSELAIR DE, a French Protestant writer, was born at Orliac (Saintonge) in 1767. He was at the court of Louis XIV when the revocation of the Edict of Nantes obliged him to retire to England, where he was received by his grandfather, pastor of the Walloon Church at London. In 1694 he was ordained, and soon afterwards sent to Ireland. Subsequently he became successively pastor of Wandsworth, in the neighborhood of London, in 1696; of the chapel of the French army in that town in 1717; priest of the Sir John Aquarium Church of the Hague in 1725. He died August 6, 1746. He wrote Réflexions au sujet d'un système prétendu nouveau sur le mystère de la Trinité (Amst. 1729, 8vo) — Examen de la manière de prêcher des Protéstants Français, etc. (Amst. 1730, 8vo) — Réponse à M. Lachish (Heb. לֶחֶשׁ, לָכִישׁ, prob. improbable, otherwise omitted; Sept. in Josh. and Kings; LXX, also in Chron., Neh., and Jer. Arabic v. r. Arabic; in Isa. Arabic v. r. Arabic or Arabic; in Mic. Arabic; Josephus Arabic; Ant. viii, 10, 1; also Arabic, Ant. ix, 9, 8), a Canaan- itish royal city (Josh. xii, 11) in the southern part of Palestine, whose king Japhia joined the Amoritic confederacy of the Philistines against Israel. (Josh. x, 5; 2 Sam. v, 25), and his city destroyed by the victorious Israelites, in spite of the re-enforcement of the king of Gezer (Josh. xvi, 38—55, where its great strength is de- noted by the two days' assault). See Joshua. From these local statements it appears to have been situated be- tween Libnah and Eglon; but it is mentioned between Joktheel and Bokhzah, among the cities of the Philis- tine valley or plain of Judah (Josh. xv, 89). It is men- tioned in connection with Adormis and Azakh as hav- ing been rebuilt, or rather fortified, by Nebuchad- nezzar, at the downfall of the kingdom of Judah (Jer. xxxiv, 7). It was reoccupied after the exile (Neh. xi, 80). The affright occasioned by these sudden attacks was probably caused by the prophet Micah and Nahum. This city, lying not very far from the frontiers of the king- dom of Israel, appears to have been the first to intro- duce the idolatry of that commonwealth into Judah. A detailed representation of the siege of some large Jew- ish city by Semramboh has been discovered on the re- cently discovered monuments of Assyria, which are now called Lachisha, and presumed to be Lachish (Layard's Ninveh and Babylon, p. 153), although it does not appear from the Biblical account that this city yielded to his arms; indeed, some expressions would almost seem to imply the reverse (see "thought to win them," 2 Chron. xxxii, 1; "departed from Lachish," 2 Kings xix, 8; and especially Jer. xxxiv, 7). Col. Rawlinson even reads the name of the city in question on the monuments as Lubana, i.e. Libnah (Layard, ut sup, p. 153, note). Rawlinson also thinks that on the first attack at least Sennacherib did not sack the city (Herodotus, i, 469, note 6). At all events, it would seem that, after the subjugation of Hezekiah, Sennacherib in some way reduced Lachish, and marched in force against the Egyptians (Joseph. Ant. x, 1, 1; comp. Isa. xx, 1-4). Rawlinson maintains (Herodotus, i, 477) that Sennacherib attacked Lachish a second time, but whether on his return from his Egyptian campaign, or after he had paid a visit to Nineveh, cannot now be determined. See Hezekiah. It is specially mentioned that he laid siege to it "with all his power" (2 Chron. xxxii, 9), and here "the great king" himself remained, while his officers only were dispatched to Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxii, 9; 2 Kings xix, 17). See Sennacherib. This siege is considered by Layard and Hincks to be depicted on the slabs found by the former in one of the chambers of the palace at Kouyunji, which bear the inscription "Sennacherib, the mighty king, king of the country of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment before (or at the entrance of) the city of Lachish (Lakhish) I give permission for its slaughter" (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 149-52, and 158, note). These slabs contain a view of a city which, if the inscription is correctly interpreted, must be Lachish itself. The bas-reliefs depict the capture of an extensive city defended by double walls, with battlements and towers, and by fortified outworks. The country around is represented as hilly and wooded, producing the fig and the vine. Immense preparations had evidently been made for the siege, and in no other sculptures were so many armed warriors drawn up in array against a besieged city, which was defended with equal determination. The process of the assault and sack are given in the most minute and lively manner. The spoil and captives are exhibited in full, the latter distinguished by their Jewish physiognomy, and by the pillaged condition of their garments. On a throne in front of the city is represented the Assyrian king giving orders for the disposal of the prisoners, several of whom are depicted as already in the hands of the executioners, some being stretched naked on the ground in order to be flayed alive, while others were slain by the sword. (See Layard's Monuments of Nineveh, 2d series, plates 20-24.) See Captives.
LA CHAPELLE

and was educated in the college at Tarbes, which he entered in 1766. In 1788 he became rector of a college at Bordeaux, but energetically embracing the principles of the Revolution in 1789, he solemnly declared in favor of separation of Church and State, and was elected in consequence to the Jacobin Club of Bordeaux. Sent to the National Assembly, he took quite a prominent part in politics until the decreal prohibiting all ecclesiastical dress was published (April 7, 1792), when he forthwith ceased his service to the state, and returned to Bordeaux to assume the duties of his ecclesiastical functions. In 1796 he was elected metropolitan of Bordeaux, and in 1802 was one of the twelve bishops nominated by the emperor Napoleon, as whose zealous partisan Lacombe is known after his elevation to the episcopacy of Angoulême. He died April 7, 1823. See Ammon de la Religion, xvi, 194; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxviii, 541.

Lacordaire, Jean Baptiste Henri, a noted Roman Catholic theologian of this century, the reviver of the Dominican order, and a most distinguished pulpit orator of modern France, was born at Receu-sur-Dourve, in the department Côte-d'Or, March 13, 1812. He was educated for the legal profession, first at Dijon, where he obtained the highest honors, and afterwards (1822) at Paris, and in 1824 he began practice as an advocate, and rose rapidly to distinction. Lacordaire was at this time, like many of the youth of France, a Deist of the Voltairean school, and in 1825 they were accused of practicing a system which, with all that was taught in France. A short time after the papal see declared itself opposed to them by an encyclical censure which Gregory XVI issued Sept. 18, 1822. Rejecting all their dogmas, it declared "the whole idea of the regeneration of the Church absurd, liberty of conscience, freedom of the press fatal, and inviolable submission to the prince a maxim of faith." Even before this papal censure had been publicly proclaimed the three chief editors of L'Ami were driven to Rome, to prevent, if possible, any severe measures on the part of the French government. At this time, poor Lacordaire was reduced to turn from the corruptions of Rome—from the corpse which he saw clearly it was vain to attempt to resuscitate. Not so, however, was Lacordaire affected. His imagination had been vividly impressed by the imposing ceremonies and glorious traditions of the Roman Church, and he was prepared to submit to it "sicut cadaver." The miserable, the infamous, says Montalembert, in his biography of Lacordaire, "inseparable from the mingling of everything human with that which is divine, did not escape his notice, but they seemed to him as if lost in the curious and wonderful of tradition and authority. He the journalist, the citizen of 1820, he the democratic liberal, had comprehended at the first glance not only the inviolable majesty of the supreme pontificate, but its difficulties, its long and patient designs, its indispensable regard for men and things here below. The faith and the duty of the Catholic priest had at once elevated that noble heart above all the mists of pride, above all the seductions, all the temptations of talent, above all the intoxication of strife. With the penetration which faith and humility confer, he passed beforehand upon our pretensions the judgment which has been ratified by time, that great auxiliary of the Church and of truth. It was then, I venture to believe, that God marked him forever with the seal of his grace, and that he gave him the assurance of the reward due to the invincible fidelity of a truly priestly soul." Hereafter no man Lacordaire is lost in the churchman, the active and inquiring intellect confined, if not extinguished, by the official religion. His bonâ fide retraction of course drew upon him not only estrangement from his master, whose influence on the moral philosophy he had never really lost, but whose retraction was never more than formal, but the reproach of worldliness. It was due in reality, however, to a precisely opposite cause. His heart was identified with the cause of the Church, and only his intellect with the Free-Church theory. "Do not let us chain our hearts to our ideas," he said quite earnestly: and he evidently felt the delight in submission which always accompanies a sacrifice of self for something one thinks higher and better than self. He thought he had discovered that metaphysical philosophy in the view of his master, Lamennais, and this he had, he said, often gilded and fretted him. He believed that the Church, in condemning Lamennais and his school, had delivered him (Lacordaire) "from the most terrible of all oppressions, that of the human intellect," and henceforth, though tender and respectful to his mother in the adversity of papal disfavor, he really loved the Church the better for having humbled himself before her decision, just as he would have loved God better for having bowed his own self-will to the divine volition. The Church was higher than the intellect. If the spirit, he fancied, had gained in vital power by humbling his own intellect before the mind of the Church. And so he embraced the first opportunity that presented itself to convince the papal see of his sincerity. Lamennais had just appeared before the public in his Paroles d'un croquant, and the book was selling extensively, and finding a very large circle of readers. Here was an opportunity to break a lance in defence of Rome; and, though the attack in this instance had to be directed even against his own former master, he hesitated not to extend it to the book itself. He asked it of Lamennais by his Considerations sur le systeme philosophique de M. Lamennais, a work which proved a total failure, and which Montalembert, the associate of Lacordaire—his bosom apostate from Lamennais—was obliged to admit as having been anything but successful. New honors, notwithstanding, soon sought out the devoted adherent to the cause of the Ultramontanes, first (in 1833 and 1835) in the offer of the editorship of the journal L'Univers, then lately established to further the Ultramontane principles, and later in the proffer of a professor's chair at the University of Paris. He desired him to take these the pulpit and the convent cell he had decided should be his future place of resort, "to speak and to write, to live a solitary and studious life!" he says in a letter of 1835, "such is the wish of my whole soul."

In the spring of 1836 he preached for the first time in public. It was in the great church of St. Roch, in Paris. "I was there," says M. Montalembert, "with MM. de Courcelles, Amprere, and some others, who must remember it as I do. He failed completely, and, coming out, every one said, 'This is a man of talent, but he never will be a preacher.' Lacordaire's attitude toward himself was very much like that of Sheridan, D'Israeli, Robert Hall, and many other orators—an incentive to become great. In the beginning of 1834 he delivered his famous Conferences in the College Stanislas, the humblest of the colleges of Paris, where he had been appointed as lecturer to the students, and where his failure at St. Roch was now recompensed by a great success, his audience oftentimes amounting to from 500 to 600 persons. In the year following (1835) we find him installed preacher at Notre Dame, and for once it was acknowledged that "France had a living preacher who knew how to fascinate the intellect, kindle the imagination, and touch the heart of the most cultivated and of the most illiterate. Whenever Lacordaire was announced to preach in Notre Dame the cathedral was surrounded, long before the doors were open, by an immense and heterogeneous crowd. Before he appeared in the pulpit, the vast nave, the aisles, and the side chapels were thronged with statesmen and journalists, members of the Academy and tradesmen, working-men and high-born women, sceptics, socialists, devout Catholics and resolute Protestants, who were all compelled to surrender themselves for that time to the irresistible torrent of his eloquence" (H. R. Dale, in Contemporary Review, May, 1869, p. 2).

Only two years after his appointment to Notre Dame, Lacordaire suddenly fixed the wonder of the multitude again upon him by relinquishing the career of distinguished he returned by preference to such as spared him least. His thist for penances of this description appears the more extraordinary from the fact that his exceedingly delicate and sensitive temperament rendered them incomparably painful to him. "To Protestants this sounds like the rehearsal of an unreal moral tragedy, a rehearsal which they must listen to because it concerns the lives of those who were guilty of these artificial, cruel, and ummeaning insults to one they loved and revered than to deepen his own love for his Lord. Yet in scenes like these were fostered the roots of his life as a Dominican friar—the spirit less of a modern Catholic thinker than of a medieval monk. But if his change to a monastic seclusion from the turmoils of Paris life must appear strange to a Protestant reader, greater still will ever be the task to explain how this advocate of liberty of conscience and the impropriety of the interference of the civil power for the punishment of heretics could find it in his heart to resuscitate an order which has more crimes and cruelties to answer for than even the infamous sect of the Assassins—an order whose founder was the very incarnation of persecution. Just here also it may not be of place to adjoin to the uncanonical manner in which Lacordaire composed a life of St. Dominic—the founder of the Inquisition—entirely ignoring all those historians who have detailed and proved the atrocios cruelties perpetrated by that saint and his followers (Ve de Saint Dominique, Paris, 1840-4, 8vo).

But this novel view of the novita of the convent of Querica, Lacordaire took the vows of the order of St. Dominick, and in 1841, with shaved head and clad in the white robe of his order, which had not been seen in France for half a century, he once more ascended the pulpit of Notre Dame. From this time his voice was frequently heard within the walls of that great cathedral of the capital of the French, as well as in many other parts of France. Thus, in 1847, he preached in the cathedral church of Nancy the funeral sermon of general Drouot, by many (e.g. Ste-Beuve) pronounced a masterpiece of pulpit oratory. In the first election which succeeded the Revolution of 1848 he was chosen one of the representatives of Marseille, and took part in some of the debates in the Assembly; but he resigned in the following May, and withdrew entirely from political life. In 1849, and again in 1850 and 1851, he resumed his courses at Notre Dame. To immense audiences, such as no orator in France had ever been able to call together before, he delivered in these eventful years a series of discourses on the communion of man with God, on the fall and the restoration of man, and on the return of the repentant sinner. Together with earlier discourses, have been collected in three volumes, under the title of Conférences de Notre Dame de Paris (1855-50; a selection was published in English dress by Henry Langdon, N. York, 1871, 8vo). His last public discourse at Paris he delivered at St. Roch in February, 1853. To some of his remarks the imperial government took exception; and Lacordaire, finding himself restricted in that freedom of speech of which he had throughout life been a steady and powerful friend, never again preached in Paris; but at Toulouse—the birthplace of St. Dominick, and the sepulchre of St. Aquin—he delivered in 1854 six discourses on life—the life of the passions, the moral life, the supernatural life, and the influence of the supernatural life on the public and private life of man—which his biographer (Montalembert) pronounces "the most eloquent, the most irreproachable of all." Offered the direction of the school and convent of Sorèze, he withdrew to that noted retreat of the Dominicans, and there died, Nov. 21, 1861. Besides the works alluded to—the Conférences and Considerations philosophiques—Lacordaire wrote also a notable livre pour le rétablissement de l'Institution de l'Ordre des frères prêcheurs (1840). His correspondence with Madame Swetichine (by Falloux, 1864), with Montalembert (1853), and with a young friend (by Lafbèr Perriere, 1865), as well as all his other writings, were published as Œuvres complètes in 1851, 1858, and 1861, in 5 vols. 8vo and 12mo. He was elected a member of the Academy in 1860 as successor to M. de Toqueville, upon whom he pronounced a eulogy—the customary in- augural address—which was his last public address.

Of the ability Lacordaire displayed in his works as a writer in the Æsop, the Jourdain, and the Fables of La Fontaine, 732 sq., thus comments: "As a writer, Lacordaire has not the slightest pretentions to compete with Lamennais, one of the greatest writers of French prose. His loose, declamatory, theatrical style is in every respect inferior to the simple, grand, nervous eloquence of Lamennais. We also venture to affirm that, in too many of his discourses, instead of explaining the Word of God simply and familiarly to the people, he goes out of his way to attack what he terms the prevailing doubt and scepticism of the age, and attempts to guide his hearers to a positive divine faith by the utter annihil- ation of the natural reason. In many of his discourses, too, he falsifies history for the purpose of making it coincident with his Romanist prejudices. He absolutely refuses to recognise any good whatever in former sys- tems of religion and philosophy. Without the pale of the Romish Church all is evil, within it everything is good. As to human reason, he cannot endure it. 'That which at present ruins everything,' he says, 'that which causes the world to ride insecurely at anchor, is the reason.' 'Our intelligence appears to me like a ship without sail, without ballast, without a compass. The Societies are tottering when the thinkers take them in hand, and the precise moment of their downfall is that wherein they announced to them that the intellect is emanci- pated.' And while human reason is thus summarily condemned, the infallibility of the Church is asserted and defended in the most absolute manner. 'The Catho- lic doctrine,' he says, 'resolves all questions, and takes from them even the quality of questions. We have no longer to reason, which is a great blessing, for we are not here to reason, but to act, and to build up in time a work for eternity.'" Jules Cot, La vertu de l'esprit de religion, also treated of Père Lacoro- daire, with special regard to his ability as a writer. His estimate of the noted Dominican is rather unfavorable, perhaps even unjust. Of the discourses of Lacordaire, he maintains that they are "unreadable" (p. 100). Lacordaire, Claudius, a noted Roman Catholic theologian and philosopher, was born at the village of St. Andre, province of Limburg, in 1652. He became master of philosophy in 1673, and immediately after joined the Order of Jesuits. He taught moral theology first at Coline, then at Louvain; became doctor of theology in 1698, and died June 1, 1714. He wrote a commentary on Busenbaum's Moral Theology (Colo, 1719, 2 vols. folio). See Busenbaum.

Lacrosse, Mathurin Véronière de, a distinguished French Orientalist, was in turn a merchant, a medical student, and a Benedictine monk. Finally, having abjured Rome, he retired to Prussia, and in 1782 he became librarian to the king. He died at Berlin in 1789. His principal works are Histoire du Christianisme des Indes (La Haye, 1724, sm. 8vo): — Histoire du Christianisme d'Ethiopie et d'Afranie (La Haye, 1789, sm. 8vo). See Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. x.v.

Lactantius. Lucius Cелиlus (or Cėliulus) Fir-

MELANIUS, one of the early Latin fathers, called by Jerome (Cedit, c. 80) the most learned man of his time, and, on account of the fine and rhetorical culture which his writings evince, not unfrequently named the Christian Cicero (or, as Jerome has it, "Fluvius eloquentiae Tullianae"), was formerly supposed to have been by birth an African but is now generally believed to have been of Italian birth, a native of Fiumum (Fermo), on the Adriatic, Italy. He was born probably near the middle of the 3d century; his parents, according to his own account, were heathens, and he only became a Christian at a somewhat mature age (comp. De Ira Div. c. 2; Inst. Div. vii. 2), certainly before the Diocletian persecution. Lactantius pursued his rhetorical studies in the school of the celebrated rhetorician and orator Arnobius of Sicca, in proconsular Africa, and it is thus, in all probability, that arose the notion that Lactantius was of African birth. While yet a youth Lactantius gained celebrity by the publication of a poetical work called Symposion, a collection of a hundred riddles in hexameters for table amusement. But it was that which secured him really great renown, and he was heard of by Diocletian, and by him called to Nicomedia as professor of Latin eloquence. This city was, however, inhabited and visited mainly by Greeks, and Lactantius found but few pupils to instruct. This afforded him plenty of leisure, and he welcomed it as an opportunity to devote himself largely to authorship. Thus he continued for ten years, when the Christians were not only persecuted by the emperors with fire and sword, but also assailed by the heathen philosophers with the weapons of science, wit, and ridicule. Against so many outrages Lactantius felt impelled to undertake the defence of the hated and despised religion, and the more as he thought he had observed that they proceeded, at least in part, from ignorance and gross misunderstanding. It was during this defence of Christianity, in all probability, that he became himself a convert to the true faith, and thus may it be accounted for that Constantine called him to his court in Gaul as preacher (after 812 says Dr. Schaff, Ch. Hist. iii. 356) of his son Crispus, whom Constantine afterwards (326) caused to be put to death. Eusebius tells us that even in this exalted position he remained so poor as often to want for the necessities of life. He must have been quite old when he arrived in Gaul, for he is then already spoken of as a gray-haired old man, and he is supposed to have died at the imperial residence in Treves shortly after his pupil Crispus, about 330. It has often been a matter of great perplexity to antiquarians to account for the long period of time that Lactantius escaped suffering during the Diocletian persecution. Some think, and this seems to be reasonable, that Lactantius escaped suffering for his faith because he was generally regarded as a philosopher, and not as a Christian writer; and, indeed, to judge from his De Opificio Dei, he appears to have been more attracted by the moral and philosophical aspects of Christianity than by the supernatural and the dogmatic. In fact, in all the theological works of Lactantius is manifest the influence of his early studies of all the masterpieces of ancient rhetoric and philosophy, and he borrows, like many other Christian publicists of his time, from Seneca. (Comp. on the inclination of the early Christian teachers in the Roman empire to style themselves "philosophers," Brit. Quart. Rev. July, 1871, p. 9, col. 1.) Jerome even says of him (Epist. 85, ad Pammalinum [alas 84 ad Epiphanum].) "Lactantius wrote seven books against the Goths, and two volumes on the work and the anger of God. If you wish to read these treatises, you will find them in a compendium of Cicero's Dialogues." He had entered more deeply into Christian morals than into Christian metaphysics, and his works offer none of those learned and accurate discussions of the dogmas which we find in Clement of Alexandria or in Origen. Lactantius, however, has been called, as we already hinted, the Christian Cicero, on account of his resemblance to this celebrated classical writer in the elegance and finish of his style, but still more on account of having made himself the advocate and propagator of the great moral truth of Christianity, while carefully avoiding all dogmatic speculation: thus also did Cicero advocate all the great practical truths of the best philosophical systems of antiquity, but set little store by whatever was purely religious. In learning and culture Lactantius excelled all the men of his time; in the words of Jerome, he was "omnia suo tempore eruditissimus." His writings betray a noble unconsciousness which forgets itself in striving to reach its lofty aim. The morality of his claims and the estimate of himself is exhibited and embodied in the facts of his life. Although at the court of the great emperor Constantine, and by his position invited to luxurious indulgence, he voluntarily preferred a poverty which not only excluded superfluities, but also often dispensed with the necessities of life. Some have represented that he pushed his austerity even to an unauthorized extreme. "I shall think that I have sufficiently lived," he writes, "and that I have sufficiently fulfilled the office of a man, if my labor shall have freed any of their errors, and directed them in the way to heaven." Lactantius was a layman and a rhetorician, and yet he displays in his writings in general—and they were not few—such a depth and extent of theological knowledge as could scarcely have been expected. It is surprising that any one raised to the imperial throne could have become conversant with so many intricate subjects. Warmth of feeling, richness of thought, and clearness of apprehension are impressed upon all his literary productions. His expressions are always lucid, considerate, and well arranged. Nowhere does the reader feel an unpleasant tone of pedantry or affectation; everywhere he is attracted by the impress of genuine learning and eloquence. In harmony and purity of style, in beauty and elegance of expression, he excels all the fathers of Christian antiquity, if we except Ambrose in some of his letters, and Sulpicius Severus. His reputation in this respect was so celebrated in the earliest times that men loved to call him the Christian Cicero. So much for form and diction. The case is quite otherwise with the exposition of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity in detail. In the midst of admirable philosophical developments, with other writers of this class, we meet with many mistakes, many erroneous views and half-truths, for which Gelasa classed his writings with the Apocrypha. If the judgment above expressed is thus, in some measure, modified, yet is his merit not much diminished. That is to say, there are mistakes in Lactantius which are absent in the earlier writers before him, and which the Church had not yet distinctly excluded by a more precise definition of the doctrines in question. What strikes us more unpleasantly is that we miss the establishment of Christianity by proof from its own dogmas, which he himself had professed to give; we sympathize with Jerome in the wish, "Utinam tam nostra confirmare potuisset, quam facile aliena distinxisset." Dr. Schaff gives the following summary of the doctrinal views of Lactantius (Church Hist. iii. 957): "His historical mistakes and errors in the exposition of Christian doctrine do not amount to heresies, but are mostly due to the crude and unsettled state of the Church doctrine at the time. In the doctrine of sin he borders upon Manichæism. In anthropology and soteriology he follows the sympathy which, until Augustine, was almost universal, that the doctrine of the fall was the way in which he was, like most of the ante-Nicene fathers, a subordinationist. He taught a duplex nativitas of Christ, one at the creation, and one at the incarnation. Christ went forth from God at the creation as a word from the mouth, yet hypostasis is Christ. Works.—We will briefly notice his works in order: 1. Dic turnover Institutionum, libri vii (Divine Institutes, seven books), a comprehensive apology for the Christian religion, which, on account of the elegant style in which it is written, has been favorite reading, and is said to have appeared in more than a hundred editions. His most important work is the "Divinae institutae," where he attempts to prove by argument, authority, and authority to develop from the holy Scriptures the history of the creation and of the origin of idolatry. According to him, this originated in its first germ from Ham, who lay under his father's curse. Among his posteriority the loss of the knowledge of the true God first prevailed; this passed over into Semiramis and Pachomius, the procreation of the heavenly bodies spread itself in this form. In Egypt, and thence among the neighboring people. In its further progress it included the deliteration of men, an externally pompous worship, and finally developed itself into idolatry proper, which, cherished and promoted by the influence of demons, and the heathenism of other arts, by oracles, magic, etc., leavened the whole life of the pagan nations. The truth of this intimate connection of the demon realm with the heathen polytheistic worship, and with the phenomena pertaining thereto, lies visibly before us, says Lactantius, in the Christian power of exorcism; and with this he concludes.

The third book, De falsa sapientia, exposes the heathen philosophy as nugatory and false. The etymology of the word philosophy indicates, says he, not the possession of instruction, but a striving after honor, reverence, and praise as the first Christian prince, and the restorer of righteousness. Consequently, it was written at the time when he advanced, in years, was already at court; but the Church was still suffering under a severe persecution, evidently that of Licinius, since the author refers to that of Diocletian as having long since died out. This brings us to the year 320, although he had, as elsewhere appears from his own words, formed the purpose and the plan at a much earlier period. Some suppose that the work was commenced in Bithynia and completed in the course of twenty years. Others, from an allusion which it contains to the Diocletianian persecution—"Spectate sunt enim spectanturque adhuc per orbem ponere culturam Dei," etc. (v. 17, § 5), suppose it to have been written before Lactantius went to Gaul.

The seven books into which this work is divided form seven separate treatises. The first book is inscribed De falsa religione. He designates leaves untouched the principal question in regard to the existence of a supreme Providence, and takes up the proposition from the God, and that, according to his, he uses more in his programme than in his performance; and which, indeed, would have been only a pettish prin- ciples of his relations in this world under him, and of that to him, there can be but one. He proceeds then to confirm this dogma by the authority of the prophets (of which, however, he makes more use in his programme than in his performance; and which, indeed, would have been only a pettish prin- ciples of his relations in this world under him, and of that to him, there can be but one. He proceeds then to confirm this dogma by the authority of the prophets (of which, however, he makes more use in his programme than in his performance; and which, indeed, would have been only a pettish prin- ciples of his relations in this world under him, and of that to him, there can be but one. He proceeds then to confirm this dogma by the authority of the prophets (of which, however, he makes more use in his programme than in his performance; and which, indeed, would have been only a pettish prin- ciples of his relations in this world under him, and of that to him, there can be but one. He proceeds then to confirm this dogma by the authority of the prophets (of which, however, he makes more use in his programme than in his performance; and which, indeed, would have been only a pettish prin-came trooping in, but with Christ a kind of golden age has again appeared through the propagation of righteousness. He further shows how near this lies to all, and that only through wilfulness it can fail to be known; and how the heathen, in open contradiction to the idea of religion, to reason, and to every sentiment of right, hate the Christians, and persecute and torment them even to the death. Were the Christians fools, one should spare them; if wise, imitate them. That they are the latter is made clear by their virtuous behavior and their withering denunciation of sin, and how they may have been led in the wisdom and righteousness of God condescend to clothe themselves in the appearance of folly, partly that thus the wisdom of the world may be convinced of its nothingness, and partly that the righteous man may be helped forward on the narrow way to his reward. The pretexts offered by the heathen in justification of their treatment of the Christians, as that they sought to bring them to a sober mind, etc., were, he maintains, utterly empty, because, in the first place, this treatment was in itself unsuitable, and, in respect to the Christians, who knew very well how to defend themselves, it was contemptuous and destructive of its own object; but, in the second place, these pretexts were contradicted and falsified by the Romans' contrary practice of toleration towards other and extremely despicable and senseless religions. Rather it was abundantly clear that nothing had happened there but an assault against this man who had impelled to those bloody deeds of violence and cruelty.

The sixth book, De vero cultu, treats of the practical side of true religion. A merely external worship, like that of the heathen, is absolutely worthless, and only that is true in which the human soul offers itself to God. As all the philosophers agree in saying there are seven ways for man, one of virtue, the other of vice; the former narrow and toilsome, leading to immortality; the latter easy and pleasant, leading to destruction; the Christians call them the way to heaven and to hell, and eagerly desire the former, and at the last they may attain the enjoyment of the blessedness in which it ends. The philosophers could not find the way of virtue, because at the outset they had formed to themselves an utterly different idea of good and evil, and therefore always sought it where it is never to be found—on earth instead of in heaven. The Christians, who walk in the light of revelation, have the clue of the truth, the eternal, unchangeable law of God, adapted to the nature of man, which unfolds our duties both towards God (officia pietatis) and towards man (officia humanitatis). Lactantius' view of the treatment of the heathen who were embraced in the fundamental principle of genuine humanity—pity, liberality, care for the widow, the orphan, the sick, the dead, etc.; finally, of self-government and the moderation of the desires and appetites, particularly of chastity in wedlock and out of it; and, last of all, of penitence or penance (penitentiae), and the true service of God. The former he treats as a satisfaction, and in the latter he does not rise above the merely ethical, Rationalistic position, although, through his whole exposition, he makes references, by way of contrast, to the divergent views of the philosophers.

The seventh and last book, De vita beata, has for its subject the chief end of man. He gives us briefly his own conception of the great end of our existence, thus: "The world was made that we might be born; we are born that we might know the Creator of the world and of ourselves; we know him through him who honors him: we honor him that we may receive immortality as the reward of our effort, because the honoring of God demands the highest effort; we are rewarded with immortality, that we, like the angels, may forever serve the supreme Father and model, and may form the image of God to all who are ever-during kingdom: that is the sum and substance of all things, the secret of God, the mystery of the world." After this follows the proof of the immortality of the soul, pursued through ten distinct arguments, with the refutation of objections. He then proceeds with an attempt to show under what condition the natural immortality of the soul becomes at the same time a blessed immortality. With this he connects his views in regard to the time and the signs of the end of the present world, with the idea, both to the general resurrection and the transformation of this world. On the superabundant delights and glories of the millennium he enlarges with special satisfaction and copious eloquence. In conclusion, he congratulates the Church upon the peace which Constantine has given her, and calls upon all to the worship of idols and to do homage to the one true God.

2. An Epitome of the Institutes, dedicated to Pentadius, is appended to the larger work, and is attributed to Lactantius by Jerome, who describes it as being even in his time disused. All the early editions of this abridgment begin at the sixteenth chapter of the fifth book of the original. But in the 18th century a MS. containing nearly the entire work was discovered in the royal library at Turin, and was published by C. M. Pfaff, chancellor of the University of Tübingen (Paris, 1712). Walchus and others have doubted the genuineness of this Epitome, but Jerome's assertion appears to us conclusive.

3. De Ira Dei (On the Anger of God). It has often been observed how the Greek philosophy, and, following its lead, the heretical Gnostics, could not reconcile justice and mercy, and how they taught that God was so merciful, and awakened in him the thought of proving in this treatise that the abhorrence of evil and primitive justice is necessary and fundamental attributes of the divine Being. In the judgment of Jerome, this work is comparable with equal learning and eloquence. Its date is probably a little later than that of the Institutes.

The system both of the Epicureans and of the Stoics excluded all reaction of God against the wicked. The former, in order not to disturb God's indiff erent repose; the latter, in order not to transfer to the idea of God human passions, thought that at last they may attain the enjoyment of the blessedness in which it ends. The philosophers could not find the way of virtue, because at the outset they had formed to themselves an utterly different idea of good and evil, and therefore always sought it where it is never to be found—on earth instead of in heaven. The Christians, who walk in the light of revelation, have the clue of the truth, the eternal, unchangeable law of God, adapted to the nature of man, which unfolds our duties both towards God (officia pietatis) and towards man (officia humanitatis). Lactantius' view of the treatment of the heathen who were embraced in the fundamental principle of genuine humanity—pity, liberality, care for the widow, the orphan, the sick, the dead, etc.; finally, of self-government and the moderation of the desires and appetites, particularly of chastity in wedlock and out of it; and, last of all, of penitence or penance (penitentiae), and the true service of God. The former he treats as a satisfaction, and in the latter he does not rise above the merely ethical, Rationalistic position, although, through his whole exposition, he makes references, by way of contrast, to the divergent views of the philosophers.

The seventh and last book, De vita beata, has for its subject the chief end of man. He gives us briefly his own conception of the great end of our existence, thus: "The world was made that we might be born; we are born that we might know the Creator of the world and of ourselves; we know him through him who honors him: we honor him that we may receive immortality as the reward of our effort, because the honoring of God demands the highest effort; we are rewarded with immortality, that we, like the angels, may forever serve the supreme Father and model, and may form the image of God to all who are ever-during kingdom: that is the sum and substance of all things, the secret of God, the mystery of the world." After this follows the proof of the immortality of the soul, pursued through ten distinct arguments, with the refutation of objections. He then proceeds with an attempt to show under what condition the natural immortality of the soul becomes at the same time a blessed immortality. With this he connects his views in regard to the time and the signs of the end of the present world, with the idea, both to the general resurrection and the transformation of this world. On the superabundant delights and glories of the millennium he enlarges with special satisfaction and copious eloquence. In conclusion, he congratulates the Church upon the peace which Constantine has given her, and calls upon all to the worship of idols and to do homage to the one true God.
to the church. It gives a very detailed description of several scenes in the persecutions of Nero, Domitian, and Valerian, but especially dwells upon the later times, those of Diocletian and his imperial colleagues Galerius and Maximin, and shows how avenging justice wreaked its vengeance on all. This work, if genuine, furnishes highly important contributions to ecclesiastical history. Among other things, its author, whoever he may be, declares that Peter and Paul preached the Gospel at Rome, and established a temple of God there, where they both suffered martyrdom.

6. Lost Part of the De mortibus persecutorum.—The Survey of Tacianus against his subsequent exhibition of the subject, he proceeds to his proper business, the consideration of the human body as the habitation and organ of the soul. He indulges in a detailed investigation and analysis of its wonderful structure; he shows he uses and symmetry of its several limbs, its adaptation to their corresponding functions, and their admirable connection with the totality of the organism. Hence he establishes, that the Epicureans denied, that a divine creation, and an ordering and guiding providence, are active throughout.

In conclusion (c. 11, 1. 2) the treatise closes by an allusion to the necessity of the soul, upon its distinction from spirit (animal), and, finally, upon its propagation. He here reviews the opposing philosophical theories, and declares himself thoroughly opposed to generationism or trichotomism (c. 17-20). In this treatise he has caught the grand idea, and furnished the leading materials of Pauly's famous teleological argument; and, what is more surprising, has anticipated some of the most striking and comprehensive ideas of modern scientific and zoological classification.

5. De mortibus persecutorum (On Martyrdom).—Le Nourry was of opinion that this treatise does not belong to Tacianus. In the only codex which we have of it, it bears, not the inscription Firmiani Tacianitii, but Lucii Cecelii, which is never given to our author by the ancient writers. We must confess that, without being aware of this judgment of Le Nourry, we had already, upon a careful reading of the treatise, come to the same conclusion from internal evidence. Möhler, on the other hand, maintains its genuineness; in confirmation of which he refers to the facts: (1) that Jerome refers to a work of Tacianus under the name De persecutione, which says he, indicates a similar subject matter; (2) that in the work in question (2) that it is dedicated to a certain Donatus, like that De Ira Dei, and the writer shows himself to have been an eyewitness of the transactions in Nicomedia under Diocletian. These reasons certainly are strong, and in the Bibliotheca Liri, in the Acta Sanctorum, one finds a question whether the Donatus addressed in this treatise as a professor may not have been the first Donatus of beretic notoriety. Möhler further adds that the style is the same as that of Tacianus's other works. From this we must strongly dissent. The style is harsher, more rugged, and bristling with iron—often obscure. It frequently reminds one of Tacitus; whereas the genuine Tacianus rarely departs from an imitation of the clear, smooth, flowing, and copious style of Cicero, whom he had chosen for his special model of eloquence.

In the early editions of Tacianus De mortibus persecutorum is altogether wanting. It was first printed by Stephen Baluze in his Miscellanea, vol. ii (Paris, 1679), from a very ancient MS, in the Bibliotheca Colbertiana. Its authenticity as De persecutione Liber unus of Tacianus, mentioned by Jerome, is maintained by Baluze. He attributes it to the latter part of the first century (Cicero, lib. ii, p. 5, 3; Lugd. Batavorum, ii.; Migne, Patrologia lat., xii, 983); against accepting this treatise to Tacianus are prominent, besides Nourry (in the Acta Sanctorum, in the Acta Sanctorum of Migne edition of Tacianus), Pfaff, Walch, Le Clerc, Lardner, Gibbon, Burckhardt, and others.

The object of this work is to show the truth of the Christian religion historically, from the tragic fate of all those who have persecuted the Church of Christ. It is really the youthful composition of Tacianus. Jerome mentions besides an Itinerarium in hexameters, two books to Actes et Spectacles, eight books of letters to Probus, Severus, and Domitian, all of which are lost. It appears from his own words (Instit. vii. 1, sub fin.) that he had formed the design of drawing up a work against the Jews, but we cannot tell whether he ever accomplished his purpose.

Several of the passages are extant, but which have been erroneously ascribed to Tacianus, are, De Phrenicis, in elegies, a compilation of tales and legends on the famed Arabian bird; it is probably of a later date (see Wermardorff, Poet. Lat. Minore, iii, 283):—Symposium, a collection of one hundred riddles, more likely the work of a certain Cælius Firmianus de Psycha et Fel concede Episcopum, now generally considered as the work of Venantius Honorianus Clementianus Fortunatus, in the 6th century:—De Passione Domini (printed in G. Fabrici- us's Poet. Vet. Eccl. Opus. Christian. Basle, 1654; and in Bibl. Patr. Mediolan. 1677), in hexameters, worthy of Tacianus, but bearing in its language the impress of a much later age.

The Edito Princeptus of Tacianus was printed at the monastery of Sabasico, by Sweynheym and Pannartz, in 1465, and is one of the earliest specimens of typographical art; the same printers published two other editions (Rome, 1465, 1470), the latter under the direction of Andrew, bishop of Aleria. A number of editions have been published since; the most important are by Gallus (Lugd. Bat. 1600, in a series of Variorum Classics, 8vo), Cellarius (Lpz. 1680, 8vo), Waldschitz (Lpz. 1715, 8vo), Heumann (Gent. 1736, 8vo), thienemann (Lpz. 1736, 8vo), Le Brun and Lenglet du Fresnoy (Paris, 1748, 2 vols. 4to), F. E. St. Xavero (Rome, 1754-9), and Migne (Paris, 1844, 2 vols. royal 8vo). A convenient manual edition was prepared by O. F. Fritzsch for Gerndorf's non-vol. xx. LACTICINIA 190 LADD Lacticinia, a term used in the Church law of fasts to denote whatever is obtained as an article of food from the mammalia, viz. milk, butter, grease, cheese. Eggs are usually included with these articles. Abstinence from such food was required in the Western Church during Lent, while the more lenient customs of the Greek Church extended the prohibition to all other fasts. Thomas Aquinas uses the following language: "In jejuno quadragesimai interdicens universaliiter etiam oru et lacticinio, circa quorum abstinentiam in aliis jejuna diversae connexiones existunt apud diversos." The Laodicene and Trullan (A.D. 688) councils made stringent requirements on the subject. Certain papal dispensations, granted as late as A.D. 1344 and A.D. 1445, show that even in certain parts of the Western Church this abstinence was practiced in many fasts besides Lent. In some Catholic countries general dispensations on this point have become permanent by long custom and positive decree, especially on the ground of health and necessity.

In the English Church the only abstinence that was ever enforced was from flesh-meat, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; but its object was rather the promotion of state interests, "to promote fisheries, to maintain mariners, and set men a fishing;" and was dispensed with by virtue of licenses, which were sold, according to the rank of the applicants, by the curates, under an act of Parliament passed in the 5th year of her [Elizabeth's] reign.

(Lacott, Sacred Archdeacon, p. 273, Fasts; comp. Hook, Ch. Dictionary, article Abstinence). "With us," says Weatley (Hook, Church Dict. p. 9), "neither Church nor State makes any difference in the kinds of meat; but, as far as the former determines in the matter, she seems to recommend an entire abstinence from all manner of food till the time of fasting be over; declaring in her [Ch. of Eng.] homilies that fasting is a withholding of meat, drink, and all natural food from the body for the determined time of fasting." See Watier and Wetste, Kirchen-Lehr. s. v. See also ABSTINENCE; FASTS.

Lacunary Roofs. The ceiling of churches in early times was often composed of lacunar work, i.e., it was divided into several small square openings called laquearia or lacunaria, and these were richly gilded and otherwise ornamented. Jerome often speaks in his writings of the lacunary golden roofs. See Parrar, Eccle. Dict. s. v.

LACCIJUS (rather Lacoggles, Aquile, Vulg. Calix), one "of the sons of Addi," who had married a foreign wife after the exile (1 Esdr. ix, 31); doubleless the Chelael (q. v.) of the Hebrew text (Ezra x, 30).

LACY, John, an English mystic, was born in the beginning of the 18th century. He joined the French prophets upon their appearance in London, and professed to have supernatural revelations. His principal works are, Warnings of the Eternal Spirit by the Mouth of his Servant John, surnamed Lacy (London, 1707, sm. 8vo);—A Relation of the Dealings of God to his unver-

LADD ("Ladd", na'dor, often rendered "young man," etc.; N. T. Kastapov, a little child, the last occurring only John vi, 9, and "child" in Matt. xi, 16; both terms being originally without respect to sex). The Heb. word occasionally thus rendered in the Auth. Vers., although occasionally standing for a girl or maiden (Gen. xxiv, 14, 16, 29, 55; xxv, 2, 12; Deut. xxii, 15 sq.), for which the fem. noun (Ladda, Laddar) is usually employed, properly denotes a boy, being prob. a primitive word. It is spoken of an infant just born (Exod. ii, 6; Judg. xiii, 5, 7; 1 Sam. iv, 21), of a boy not yet full grown (Gen. xxii, 16 sq.; xxiii, 12; Isa. vii, 16; viii, 4), and of a youth nearly twenty years old (Gen. xxiv, 19, xlii, 12; 1 Kings iii, 7; 2 Sam. xviii, 5, 32). See Child, etc.

La'dan (Ladon v. r. A'dan, and even 'Ada's, Vulg. Dalarus), one of the Temple servants whose descendants had lost their pedigree after the exile (1 Esdr. v, 37); evidently the Delailah (q. v.) of the Hebrew text (Ezra ii, 60).

Ladd, Francis Dudley, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1890. When only eight years of age he showed marked indications of piety, but it was not until his fifteenth year that he joined the Church, under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. George Shephard, now professor in Bangor Theological Seminary. With a view to prepare for the ministry, he entered Bowdoin College at the age of seventeen, and graduated with honor in 1841; then studied theology at Bangor Seminary, and was ordained at Farmington in 1846. In Nov., 1851, he received and accepted a call from the Penn Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa. During the war he labored incessantly for the good of the soldiers, but fell a prey to disease contracted in the camps, which he had gone several times, and died July 7, 1862. See Wilson, Presb. Historical Almanac, 1868, p. 184.

Ladd, William, an American philanthropist, born at Exeter, New Hampshire, in 1778, was one of the originators of the American Peace Society, of which he became president. He died in 1841. Ladd was editor of the Friend of Peace and the Harbinger of Peace, and wrote several essays on that subject.

Ladder (ἱστία, στήλα), a staircase, perch. from ἀνα, to raise up; Sem. ἀλά; the Arab. mulsmana has the same signification) occurs only once, in the account of Jacob's vision in his dream at Bethel (Gen. xxi, 11), where the "ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold, the angels of God ascending and descending on it," represented the Gospel dispensation, the blessings of which the patriarch's posterity were to inherit; the Redeemer himself being this mystic channel of instruction between heaven and earth (John i, 51). (See Lang, Vita Scala Jacob, Alt. 1699; Schramm, De Scala Jacobae, F. ad O. 17—.) Scaling-ladders for war (ἐλιμαξ) are mentioned in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. v, 80). That this was a contrivance known from the earliest times, we have abundant evidence on the monuments of Thebes, where attacks on fortified places are represented as being made by soldiers provided with scaling-ladders (Wilkinson, i, 390). (For illustration, see opposite page.) Similar scenes are frequently depicted on the Assyrian monuments (Layard, Niniveh, ii, 284). See FORTIFICATION.

Ladder of Tyre, the (ἡ εἰκόνα Τύρου; Vulg. a terminis Tyri, possibly reading εἴκοσι), one of the extremities (the northern) of the district over which Simon Maccabaeus was made captain (στρατηγός) by Antiochus VI (or Theos) very shortly after he was coming to the throne; the other being "the borders of Egypt" (1 Macc. xi, 50). The Ladder of Tyre (יוו, see Reland, Palest. p. 348), or of the Tyrians (ἡ εἰκόνα τῶν Τυ- ρίων), was the local name for a high mountain, the highest in that neighborhood, a hundred stadia north of Ptolemais, the modern Akka or Acca (Josephus, War, ii, 10, 2). The rich plain of Ptolemais is bounded on the north by a rugged mountain ridge which shoots out from Lebanon and dips perpendicularly into the sea, forming a bold promontory about 800 feet in height (Russegger, p. 3, 143, 262; Ritter, Palest. und Syr., iii, 727, 814 sq.). The waves beat against the base of the cliff, leaving no passage below. In ancient times a road was carried, by a series of zigzags and staircases, over the summit, to connect the plain of Ptolemais with Tyre—hence the origin of the name Scala Tyriorum, "Ladder of Tyre." It was the southern pass into Phoenicia proper, and formed the boundary between that country and Palestine (Kenrick, Phœnicia, p. 20; Reland, p. 344). The road still remains, and is the only one along the coast. A short distance from it is a little village called Naktrah, and the pass is now called Rida en-Naktrah ("the excavated promontory"), doubtless from the road which has been "holed in the rock." (Porter, Handbook, p. 389; see also Pococke, i, 79; Robinson, Bib. Res. iii, 89; Stanley, p. 260, 262). The location of the Ras en-Naktrah agrees very nearly with the above position defined by Josephus, as it lies 10 miles, or about 120 stadia, from Akka, and is characterized by travellers as very high and steep. Both the Ras en-Naktrah and the Ras el-Abyad, i.e. the White Cape, sometimes called Cape Blanco, a headland six miles still farther north, are surmounted by a path.

cut in insignia; that over the latter is attributed to Alexander the Great. It is possibly from this circumstance that the latter is by some travellers (Irby, Oct. 21; Wilson, ii, 222; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 346; etc.) treated as the ladder of the Tyrian. But by the early and accurate juster professional, hap-farchi (Zunas, in Hist. des Provinces de l’Empire Arabe, 4 vols., 1837, 4to), he published by his publisher, (iii, 82), Mislin (Les Saints Lieux, ii, 9), Schwartz (p. 76), Stanley (Syrl. and Pol., p. 264), the Ras en-Nakhr-ah is identified with the ladder; the last-named traveller pointing out well that the reason for the name is the fact that its "differing frontage leaves no beach between itself and the sea, and thus, by cutting off all communication round its base, acts as the natural barrier between the Bay of Acre and the maritime plain to the north—in other words, between Palestine and Phoenicia* (comp. p. 260).

Ladislas (Vladislav, Vlastislav, Vladislaus) II, king of Poland (1386-1434), known also under the name of Jagello or Jagello, deserves a place in our work on account of his introduction of Christianity into the Polish dominions. He was born in Lithuania in 1348, the son of Olgerd and grandchild of Gediminas, great princes of Lithuania. He succeeded his father in 1386, and, by the marriage of his pious Christian wife Hedwig, was influenced to embrace Christianity; a short time after all Lithuania became Christian, and when Poland came under his sway Christianity became the dominant religion there. He died in Grodek, near Lemberg, Galicia, May 31, 1434. See LITHUANIA; POLAND.

Ladislas, king of Naples (A.D. 1386-1414), succeeded to the throne on the violent death of his father, Charles III. Born in 1376, he was ten years old at the time of his accession to the disputed crown. Louis of Anjou, to whom Queen Joanna, the predecessor of Charles III, had bequeathed the kingdom, was his competitor. Ladislas and Louis were of nearly the same age. Each was left under the guardianship of a widowed mother, and each had on his side the authority of one of the two rival popes, between whom Christendom was divided, and whose mutual excommunications, extending to their respective adherents, were the scandal of the age.

The reign of Ladislas is historically important from its intimate connection with the great events of the time in Church and State. At an early age he developed that restless energy and that unscrupulous ambition which made him a model for Machiavelli's "Prince." When but sixteen years old, his mother Margaret committed him to the barons of his party to make his first essays in statecraft. He was in his twentieth year when the three Sicilies put into his hands an immense dowry, which he employed to prosecute his designs, securing, when it was expended, from the venal pontiff a divorce from his wife, whom he bestowed upon one of his favorites.

By means of the papal sanction and his own energy he recovered Naples from the Angevin party (1406). The faction opposed to him felt the full weight of his vengeance. His security was increased by a second marriage, which the pontiff, Boniface IX, proposed. His ambition was excited by the tempting offer of the Hungarian crown, and those who, distinguished with Sigismund (subsequently emperor), had seized and imprisoned him. His expedition proved unsuccessful, and his absence from Naples inspired anew the hopes and efforts of the Angevin party. His prompt return (1403) defeated their attempts. The most powerful of the despot of Burgundy, who was added to his weight in resources. Marseilles was bestowed upon one of his favorites. The new pontiff, Alexander V, elected by the council, favored the pretensions of Louis of Anjou, the rival pretender to the throne of Naples. The latter, followed by an army, and surrounded by his partisans, entered Italy and secured a lodgment in Rome. Ladislas, in the height of his passion, resolved to annihilate the authors of his calamity. He provided for the security of Gregory, who had been holding a council in Aquileia, rival to that of Pisa, and ordained his recognition as pontiff. throughout the kingdom. He then proceeded in force to Rome, to which he quickly regained possession.

Alexander V, indignant at the king's course, made up a catalogue of his crimes, and ordered Ladislaus before him to hear the sentence which pronounced his forfeiture of his throne. Regardless of the summons, Ladislaus prosecuted his measures of violent rapacity, amazed the country by his threats of this nature, and at this juncture he lost possession of Rome. With treachery within and the forces of Balthazar Corsa without, the city yielded to the allies, and the papal authority was re-established within its walls.

The sudden death of Alexander V (May 8, 1410) opened the way to the election of Balthazar Corsa himself, the sworn foe of Ladislaus, under the title of John XXIII. Leaving Bologna, which he had ruled as a despot under the title of legate, he advanced in triumph to Rome. Ladislaus was now confronted by an Italian pope and a French army under Louis. The sentence of excommunication was pronounced against him, but, reckless of spiritual terrors, he marshalled his forces and prepared for the conflict. The battle took place May 19, 1411, near Ponte-Corvo, and, after a desperate contest, the forces of Ladislaus were defeated. Instead of being content with the victory, however, with Ladislaus himself successfully bringing into the field a new army largely composed of the fragments of the old. In a short time, by a liberal use of money, he had greatly profited by the repulse which his enemies, too sluggish to pursue their advantage, allowed him. When, taking his sovereign's life, he said that on the first day his crown and personal liberty were endangered, on the second, he feared only for his kingdom; on the third, his foe could only waste himself.

John XXIII had exulted in the defeat of his foe. The joy at Rome was expressed by pageants and processions; but the pope soon discovered that he had been too precipitate in his demonstrations. He encouraged the hopes of Louis, but declined to aid him by arms. He entertained himself with sending Ladislaus (August 11, 1411) a summons to appear before him as a heretic and favorer of schism, and with publishing a crusade against him. But the withdrawal of Louis from Italy left Ladislaus without a competitor, and of a sudden the pope saw himself almost helpless in the hands of Ladislaus, and in constant fear of his ravages and assaults. Anxious for peace, he proposed a compromise with him, and demanded full and perfect submission to himself. The latter was to abandon the anti-pope, Gregory XII, and drive him from the kingdom. The pope was to confirm the king in possession of his dominions, to which other possessions were to be added, and was to be appointed protector of the Church and head of the crusade, with specified sums of money. Thus John XXIII sacrificed his ally to his foe, and Ladislaus did the same. The double ingratitude and treachery were endorsed by the public recognition of the legitimacy of the pontiff on the part of Ladislaus, who ascribed his new and more correct apprehensions to the instruction of the Father of light. Gregory was forced to flee to Rimini, and at an interview between Ladislaus and the pope, the latter received from the former marks of profound homage.

To this hollow compromise mutual distrust succeeded. The pope sought to recover his old allies. He exculpated himself to Louis, and again denounced the king of Naples. The latter responded by hostile demonstrations. The council which the pope had meanwhile convoked at Rome was considered by him as depending on the appointment and authority of that of Pisa, and, as hostile to his interests, he hoped to dispense it. The prospect of gaining some advantage over his old foe, Sigismund of Hungary, who was elected emperor, was also kept in view. Gathering his forces, he approached Rome. The faithlessness and treacheries of the papal forces facilitated its capture. The pope and cardinals fled. From place to place they wandered, yet even Florence dared not entertain them from fear of the vengeance of Ladislaus. John XXIII besought help of Sigismund, which was finally granted on the stipulation that the pope should immediately convocate a General Council. See Jones XXIII.

Ladislaus meanwhile gave full scope to his vengeance. The States of the Church came into his hands. Siena and Florence felt the full weight of his revenge. In this state of things, John XXIII forlorned himself at Bologna, and gathered forces about him. Even here he did not feel himself safe. His cardinals prepared for flight, and some deserted him. The citizens sought to hide their treasures, and fled, some to Venice, or other places not yet threatened.

There appeared no longer hope of armed resistance to the advance of Ladislaus. All Italy seemed about to be forced to submit to his sway. But at this juncture, while lingering at Perugia, he was smitten by a mortal disease. A slow fever wasted his strength, but did not subdue his thirst for vengeance. He had destined the Ursini, who had obstructed his capture of Rome, and whom he had promised to spare, as victims. They visited him in his sickness, and were thrust into prison by his orders. This gross violation of faith excited general indignation. The murmurs of the soldiers constrained him to the severity of his last extremity. It was now no longer master of himself. Every word that escaped him was an order for some fatal arrest. He charged his sister, the princess Joanna, to see that Paul de Ursini be put to death. For the last three days of his life his mind was occupied only with thoughts of vengeance. With fearful cries he was heard to exclaim, "Is Paul dead?" sometimes calling for his dagger that he might stab himself. He could only be calmed for the moment by his sister's treacherous assurance that his orders should be executed.

In the midst of his paroxysms Ladislaus died, Aug. 6 or 8, 1414. Naples was relieved of a tyrant and Italy of a terror that had disquieted her for years. History may account Ladislaus a modern Herod. All that was unscrupulous, cruel, and depraved seemed to be incarnate in him. He alternated between private lust and public violence. In his youth he was regarded as the most unmerited representative of the vigor and craft of the Italian "prince." See NAPLES.

See, for notices more or less extended of the deeds or career of Ladislaus, Van der Hart, Monarchia Chronica; Niern, Life of John XXIII; Feggio, Bracciolini's Vite; and the works of the early historians, including Sirmond and Proctor. The most extended and connected account of his life, perhaps, is that given by M. d'Eglo, Histoire des Rois des Deux Siciles. He seems to have carefully sifted his authorities, and he devotes over 200 pages of his second volume almost exclusively to Ladislaus. (E.H.G.)

LADVOCAT, JEAN BAPTIST, a noted French theologian and author, was born at Vaucouleurs in the early part of the 17th century, and was educated first at Pont-a-Mouzon, afterwards in Paris at the Sorbonne, where he subsequently became a professor. In 1671 he was appointed to the chair, founded at his suggestion in the Sorbonne by the duke of Orleans, for the interpretation of the Old Testament Scriptures according to the Hebrew text. He died in 1766. Lad vocat wrote Dictionnaire Geographique portatif de Diction, Historie, de portatif des grands hommes (2 vols. 8vo: this is an abridgment of Moreri, and is full of errors). He also wrote a Hebrew Grammar for the use of his pupils; Tractatus de Concordia in Genera; and Lettre dena lquelle il examine s'il les Textes originaires de l'Ecriture sont corrompus et si la lege. He was a noted writer of sermons and as an expositor of Scripture, a zealous disciple of Hugigant. He was also a correspondent of Dr. Kennicott, whose great work he zealously promoted, and he collated many MSS. for him in the Royal Library at Paris.—Hook, Eccles. Biography, vi, 506.

Lady is the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the following terms in the original: νυνιά (gebe'reth, fem. of νική, a mighty man), applied to Babylon as the mistress of nations (Isa. xlvii, 5, 7; elsewhere a "mistress," as opposed to a maid-servant, Gen. xvi, 4, 8, 9; 2 Kings v, 3; Prov. xxx, 23; Ps. cxxiii, 2; Isa. xxiv, 2); τησσερα (a'rrak, fem. of τις, noble; the same as the name given to Sarai), a noble female (Judg. v, 29; Esth. i, 18; elsewhere a "princess, spec. the king's wife of noble birth, 1 Kings xi, 18, different from concubines, comp. Cant. vi, 8; "queen," Isa. xlix, 23; "princess" among provinces, Lam. i, 1); εὐπατος (fem. of εὐπατος, lord or master), mistress, occurs only as an epithet of a Christian female (2 John i, 5), either as an honorable title of regard, or as a fem. proper name Σωτόρ (q. v.).

Lady Chapel, a chapel dedicated to the Virgin Mary ("Our Lady"), and usually, but not always, placed eastwards from the altar when attached to cathedrals. Henry VIII's chapel at Westminster is the lady chapel of that cathedral.

Lady Past, a species of penance, voluntary or enjoined, in which the penitent had the choice of fasting once a week for seven years on that day of the week on which Lady Day (q. v.) happened to fall, beginning his course from that day, or of finishing his penance sooner by taking as many fasting-days together as would fall to his lot in one year.

Lady of Mercy, Ous, a Spanish order of knighthood, instituted in 1218 by James I of Aragon, in fullfilment of a vow made to the Virgin during his captivity in France, for the redemption of Christian captives from among the Moors; and to this end each knight, at his inauguration, was obliged to take the vow that, if necessary for their ransom, he would remain himself a captive in their stead. Within the first six years of the existence of the order no fewer than 400 captives are said to have been ransomed by its efforts. On the expulsion of the Moors from Spain the labors of the knights were transferred to Africa. Their badge is a shield party per fess gules and or, in chief a cross pattée argent, in base on a pallet gules pallets gules for Aragon, the shield crowned with a ducal coronet. The order was extended to ladies in 1261.

Lady of Montessa, Ous, an order of knighthood, founded in 1317 by king James II of Aragon, after the abrogation of the Order of the Templars, for the protection of the Christians against the Moors. By permission of pope John XXII, James of Aragon used all the estates of the ex-Templars and of the Knights of St. John situated in Valencia for this new order, which king James named after the town and castle of Montessa, its head-quarters. The order is now confined merely as a mark of royal favor, though the provisions of its statutes are still nominally observed on new creations. The badge is a red cross edged with gold, the costume a long white woolen mantle, decorated with a cross on the left breast, and tied with very long white cords.

Læstāre Sunday, called also Mid-Lent, is the fourth Sunday of Lent. It is named Læstāre (to rejoice) from the first word of the Introt of the mass, which is from Isa. liv. 1. The characteristic of the services of the day is joyousness, and the music of the organ, which throughout the rest of Lent is suspended, is on this day resumed. Læstare Sunday is also called domínica de rosin, because it is the day selected by the pope for the blessing of the Golden Rose. See Siegel, Handbuch d. christl. Liturgien, i, 826, 900; A. Hergenrother, i, 867, 900.

Læstätius, TORGENTINUS, commonly called TORGENTIN- TINUS, a Dutch theologian, who flourished in the second half of the 16th century, was a native of Ghent, and was educated in the University of Louvain in law and philosophy. After an extended tour in Italy, he became successively canon of Liège, general to the bishop of Liège, and finally bishop of Antwerp, from which he was transferred to the see of Mechlin, where he died in 1595. At Louvain Torrintin founded a Jesuitical college, to which he bequeathed his library and a large collection of curiosities.

La'fe (also known by the Latin name Fagus), Ax- tone, a French Protestant minister, was born at Châteaudun about the middle of the 16th century. He became professor of philosophy at Geneva in 1570, and rector in 1580. He was transferred to the chair of theology in 1584, and died in 1616. In 1587 he took part in the composition of the first French text of the Roman Catholic version of the Bible. His works are, De veraculis Bibliorum interpretationibus et sacris veroculis linguæ per postponendis (Gen. 1572, 4to) — De Verbo Dei (Gen. 1591, 4to) — De Traditionibus, adversus pietatis errores (Gen. 1592, 4to) — De Christo et Deo Filio nostro nostro (Gen. 1601, 4to) — Necessa liberta, seu narratio liberra- tionis illius quae divinitus immensa est Genere (Geneva, 1605, 12mo) — Encyclirad disputationum theologorum (Gen. 1605, 8vo) — De Vita et Obitu Bezae Hypsommanna (Geneva, 1606, 4to) — Commentarii in Ecclesiasten (Gen. 1606, 8vo) — Comment. in Epist. ad Romanos (Gen. 1606, 8vo) — Comment. in Psalmos xii et lexvii (Gen. 1609, 8vo) — Comment. in priorem Epist. ad Timothem (Geneva, 1609, 8vo) — Emblemata et Epigrammata selecta ex aetatis pertopiceta (Gen. 1610, 8vo). Lafita, Joseph François, a French Roman Catholic missionary of the Order of the Jesuits, born at Bordeaux in 1670, labored for many years among the Iroquois tribe of American Indians. He died in 1740. Lafita is especially noted for his archaeological researches, among which is a Description des anciennes Amérindiens comptées, published in 1723, 2 vols. 4to. He wrote also Histoire des découvertes et des conquêtes des Portugalos dans le nouveau monde.

Lah'had (Heb. פְּרַח הָאָד, in pause פְּרַח, prob. oppressor, otherwise slave; Sept. אָדָא v. אָדָא, Vulg. Ladoa), the second named of the two sons of Jahath, of the family of Zerah, grandson of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 12). B.C. ante 1510.

Lehamen), a city in the plain of Judah, mentioned between Caleb and Kithlish (Josh. xv, 40), probably situated among the Philis- tines west of the Highlands of Judaea. A writer in Fairbairn's Dictionary, s. v., by a series of arguments resting essentially upon the insecure foundation of the mere order of the names in Joshua, seeks to identify Laham with the el-Humam mentioned by Smith in the list in Robinson's Researches (iii, Append. p. 119) but of this place there is no other trace save perhaps the pre-Nabatean Tell-Innam on Zimmerman's Map, some six miles to the S.E. of the vicinity of the other associated names, and apparently out of the bounds of the group, if not of the tribe itself. Laham is possibly the present Bril-Leho, a short distance N.E. of Gaza (Robinson, iii, Append. p. 118; Van de Velde, Carte, Memoir, p. 112).

amped bishop of Melipour. In 1708 he started again for India, and arrived at Goa September 5, 1709. Here he now had many difficulties with the civil authorities, and finally retired to the Jesuit's establishment at Chandernagore, where he died, June 11, 1715. He wrote, Defensio Indicarum Missionum Madrasensis et Carnoiensia, etc. (Bonn, 1707, 4to).—Cartas escrita de Madure nos despachos de desembarco del P. Lainez, Ingo, a celebrated Spanish Jesuit, was born at Almancaro, near Siguenza, in Castile, in 1512, and was educated at the high-school of Alcalá. In his nineteenth year he was attracted to Paris by the renown of Ignatius, and at once became one of his most ardent followers. He accompanied Loyola on his journey to Rome, and there obtained from pope Paul III the appointment to a professor's chair in the "Collegium della Sapienza." On the death of the great leader of the Jesuitical order in 1556 Lainez was elected his successor, and became general of the order (June 19, 1557). A cardinal's hat and other high positions he refused, determined to devote all his time and energy to the interests of the new order. In the Council of Trent, wherever he was, which was everywhere, he took an active part, and opposed the doctrine of Seripando on justification. Lainez appeared on the field of controversy more with a work on the subject than with a speech. He had the greatest number of the divines on his side. He also took a leading part in that council in the discussion concerning the divine right of bishops and the infallibility of the pope. The historians have preserved a very full report of his speech on this point. It contains the most extravagant assertions of pontifical power and authority. Lainez maintained that Jesus Christ is sole ruler of the Church; that he left the world to constitute Peter and his successors his vicars; that, in consequence, the pope is absolute lord and master, supreme and infallible; that bishops derive from him their power and jurisdiction; and that, in fact, there is no power whatever in the Church excepting that which comes from him, so that civil and secular councils have no authority, are not infallible, do not enjoy the influence of the Holy Spirit, unless they are summoned and controlled by papal authority (compare Pallav. lib. xviii. s. 15; Serip. lib. vii. s. 20; Le Plat, v. s. 2). D'Arches also took an active part (in 1560) in the Conference of St. Cloud (q. v.), where he aids to facilitate the Huguenots (q. v., especially p. 892). At Venice he afterwards expounded the Gospel of St. John for the express edification of the nobility; and, aided by Lippomano, he succeeded in laying the foundation of a college of Jesuits. He devoted great attention to the schools, and directed the thoughts of his order towards education, well aware that man is most influenced during his whole life by his early impressions. In some parts of Germany—at Ingolstadt for instance—the Jesuits soon acquired the reputation of most successful teachers. This new direction given to the order by Lainez came near, however, involving them in serious difficulties: the Jesuits had at first attached themselves to the doctrinal views of the Thomists; but, desiring to be independent in doctrine as well as life, the Inquisition soon found reasons to criticize the freedom with which they pursued their speculations on this point, and Lainez himself was suspected by the Spanish Inquisition (see Llorente, iii, 88). He died at Rome Jan. 19, 1665. It was under the guidance of Lainez that the spirit of intrigue entered freely into the society. It was a peculiar crisis of decay in managing affairs, and was frequently led by it into low and unworthy tricks. His ruling passion was ambition, which he knew how to conceal under a veil of humility and piety. By his artful policy he transformed the character of the Jesuitical order into a terrible army, that, for the sake of advancing its own interests, shrank from no attempt to gain its ends; an order which has become a reproach to the Church that gave it birth. The Jesuits in the 19th century are recognized as a bold band— an order which dares to undermine states, to rend the Church, and even to menace the pope. See Jesuits. His was severe in several theological works, but none of them had been completed, and nothing from his pen, except some speeches, has ever been printed. See Michel d'Esse, Vie de Iaïnes (Dossat, 1597);

Laing, James, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Berwick on Tweed, Scotland, 1768, and was educated at the University of Glasgow, where he was graduated with distinction in 1816. After teaching for some time, he determined to devote himself to the ministry, and in 1828 was licensed by the Glasgow Presbytery. May 8, 1838, he emigrated to the United States, and was ordained by Washingto in 1838. After was- and installed pastor of the Church in Argyle, N. Y.
In 1884 he removed to Andes, where he died Nov. 15, text w2b; 2 Sam. iii, 15, with 71 local w2b; Judg. xvi, 7; Isa. x, 30; Sept. Acic in Sam., Aassd in Judg., Aasd in Isa.; Vulg. Laas, but Laos in Isa.), the name of at least one place and perhaps of a man.

1. A city in the extreme northern border of Palestine (Judg. xvii, 7, 24, 27, 29), also called Lasshez (Josh. xxix, 47), and subsequently, after being occupied by a colony of Danites (Josh. xix, 47; Judg. xvii, 27 sq.), also Dan (Judg. xviii, 29; Jer. vii, 16), a name sometimes given to it in anticipation (Gen. xiv, 14; Deut. xxiv, 1; comp. Jahn, Einl. ii, 1, 68; Hugi, in the Pre-burg. Zeitschr. v, 187 sq.). It lay in a fruitful district near the head of the upper Jordan (Am. ii, 1, 3, 4), four miles from Paneas towards Tyre (Eusebius, Onomast.); Sanais and the Samaritan version falsely given, instead of Dan (in Gen. xv, 14), "Paneas" (see Wintr. Diam. des V. Sam. p. 62), which also Jerome (at Ezeel, xxix, 15, and Amos vii, 14) gives as an equialent. Laas was long the seat of a corrupt worship of Jehovah (Judg. xviii, 14 sq.), and as it fell within the kingdom of Israel, Jerobeam established there the idols of the golden calf (1 Kings xii, 28 sq.).

The occupation of this place by the Sidonians is easily accomplished. Sidon was a commercial city. Situated on the coast, with only a narrow strip of plain beside it, and the bare and rocky side of Lebanon impending over it, a large and constant supply of food had to be brought from a distance. The plain around Laas is one of the richest in Syria, and the entrep rting Phoenicians took possession of it, built a town, and placed it in a large colony of laborers, expecting to draw from it an unfailing supply of corn and fruit. Josephus calls this plain "the great plain of the city of Sidon" (Ant. v, 3, 1). A road was made across the mountains to it at an immense cost, and still forms one of the main roads from the sea-coast to the interior. Strong castles were built to protect the road and the colony. Kulat esh-Shukif, one of the strongest fortresses in Syria, stands on a commanding hill over the place where the ancient road crosses the river Leontes, and it is manifestly of Phoenician origin. So also the great castles of Banias, four miles east of Laas, and Huln, about six miles west of it, were founded by the Phoenicians, as is evident from the character of their architecture (Porter, Handbook, p. 444, 447; Robinson, Researches, ii, 108). The site is most interesting to discover, after the lapse of more than three thousand years, distinct traces of the wealth and enterprise of the Phoenicians around the site and fertile plain of Laas. See DAN.

2. A place mentioned in Isa. x, 30, where the prophet, in describing the advance of the Chaldaean hosts from Jerusalem, enumerates Laas with a number of other towns on the north of the city. It is not quite certain whether the writer is here relating a real event, or detailing a prophetic vision, or giving a solemn warning with the idea of a dying allegory; but, however this may be, the description is highly striking, and the allegory is pointed out with remarkable minuteness and precision.
Aiah, Migmron, and Michmash are passed; the deep ravine which separates the latter from Geba is then crossed; Ramah sees and is afraid—"Gibeath of Saul is fled." The writer uses with great dramatic effect, changes his mode of description. To terror and flight he appeals an exclamation of alarm, representing one place as crying, another as listening, and a third as responding—"Lift up thy voice, daughter of Gallim! Heurehes, Laasah! Alas, poor Anathoth!" The words "Michmash, and Adamith, Caanah, and Lasshah, to Cause it (the voice) to be heard unto Laas"—that is, separatelly, to the northern border-city of Palestine; following the version of Junius and Tremellius, and the comment of Grotius, because the last syllable of the name which appears here as Laasah is taken to be the Hebrew particle of mention "to Laas" (agreedly to the Hebrew accent), is undoubtedly the case in Judg. xviii, 7.
But such a rendering is found neither in any of the ancient versions, nor in those of modern scholars, as Geese-lius, Ewald, Zunz, etc.; nor is the Hebrew word here rendered "cause it to be heard" found elsewhere in that voice, but always absolute—"beareth the" "sound of the voice." There is a certain violence in the sudden introduction amongst these little Benjamite villages of the frontier town so very far remote, and not less in the use of its ancient name, elsewhere so constantly superseded by Dan (see Jer. vii, 16). Laasah was doubled a small town on the line of march near Anthanoth (see lowth, Ubriam, Alexander, Geessenius, ad loc.).

Many, therefore, understanding a different place from Dan (Rosenmueller, Alberer, III, ii, 19; Hitzig and Knoobel, Comment. ad loc.), regard it as the Laasah (Eesaah, Cod. Alex. Aamot) mentioned in 1 Mac. ix, 5; but Ric-land has shown that the city of Judah named 1 Mac. ix, 10, 11 is Adasa, and the form of the word in Isa. does not warrant this interpretation (see Geessenius, Comment. ad loc.). This Adasa has been discovered by Eli Smith in the modern ruined village Adus, immediately north of Jersalem (Robinson, Researches, iii, Append. p. 121).

A writer in Fairbairn's Dictionary plausibly suggests that the Laasah in question may be found in the precent little village El-Iaaseeh, in a valley about a mile N.E. of Jerusalem (Robinson, Researches, ii, 108), beautifully situated, and unquestionably occupying an ancient site (The American Ephrathah in Jerusalem, 19)."}

3. A native of Gallim, and father of Phalti or Palti-tiel, to whom latter Saul gave David's wife Michal (1 Sam. xxxv, 44; 2 Sam. iii, 15, in which latter passage the text appears to have read 835, Lashah.). B.C. ante 1062.

"It is very remarkable that the names of Laasah (Lasah) and Gallim should be found in conjunction at a much later date (Isa. x, 30)" (Smith). This explanation of names makes it more than probable, that Laasah was founded by Michal's father-in-law, who, according to the custom of those times, gave it his own name.
The allusion to the Ios which it involves is interesting, for this neighborhood was another of this favorite haunts of that animal. It was by such ravines as wadya Fara'h and Selahn that it was wont to 'come up from the swelling of Jordan' (Jer. xlix, 19); in the opposite direction we have a further trace of it in the Chephirah ('young lion,' now Kefli) of western Benjamin (Josh. ix, 17; xv, 9); northward, we find it encountering the disobedient prophet on his return from Bethel (1 Kings xiii, 24); while in the pastures of Bethlehem to the south we see it vanquished by the superior prowess of the youthful David (1 Sam. xvi, 17-14)."

Laishah (Heb. Lə'âyishah, לֶאָיִשָּׁה; i.e. Laiash, with ḫ pragraphic, 2 sa, 90). See Laish, 2.

Laity, the people as distinguished from the clergy. The Greek word λαίος, derived from λαός (Latin synonym populus), signifying the people, is retained in the Latin laicus, from which laity is derived. In the Sept. λαίος is used as the synonyme of the Hebrew צְפָאֵל, צְפָאֵל. As synonyms of these Scripture terms we may also cite the words "faithful," "saints," and "idiote" (q.v.). Comp. Riddle, Christian Antiquities, p. 188 sq., 274, 275; Vinet, Pastoral Theology (N. Y. 1864), p. 245.

In the O.T. Scriptures we find allusions to the laity in Deut. xvii, 8, where upon them is laid the obligation to pay a tithe to the priest when offering sacrifice; and in Ezekiel's vision of the new Temple, where "the ministers of the house" (גַּם־אֶ savory is as to the sacrifices of the laity (Ezek. xiv, 24). So also in Christ's words: "all the laity shall take up the sword;" "he has charged the Lord," when Asaph and his brethren had finished the psalm given to them by David; see likewise 2 Kings xxii, 3; Neh. vii, 11; Isa. xxiv, 2; Hos. iv, 5. In the N.-T. Scriptures this distinction seems to have been ignored by Christ and his apostles. For, although there are passages in which the laity are spoken of as a class, it is nowhere intimated that they were not allowed to exercise the prerogatives of the clergy in a great measure. Coleman (The Apostolical and Primitive Church [Philadelphia, 1869, 12mo], p. 290; compare p. 226 (q.v.), one of the latest of these antinoian antiquities holds that in the early stages of Christianity "all were accustomed to teach and to baptize," a practice to which Tertullian (born about A.D. 160) soon objected (De Precast. ch. xii). From the writings of the early fathers, it is evident, moreover, that only in the 2d and 3d centuries, after the general establishment of the churches, a stricter distinction was inaugurated. The introduction of the episcopal office, however, first definitely settled the position of the laity in the Church. As early as A.D. 182, or thereabouts, we find Clement of Rome pointing to such a distinction. In 1 Corinthians respecting the order of the Church, after defining the positions of the bishops, priests, and deacons respectively, he adds, ἤ λαίων ἐξερήμως τοὺς λαίας προστίματος διάκονον, "the laity is bound by the laws which belong to laity" (1 Cor. xiii, 40). A little later, Cyprian (born about the beginning of the 3d century) uses the words "clerus" and "plebs" as of the two bodies which make up the Christian Church (Ep. lx). But the idea that the priesthood formed an intermediate class between God (Christ) and the Christian community is the first to prevent during the corruptions that ensued upon the establishment of the presbytery. Gradually, as the power of the hierarchy increased, the influence which the laity had exercised in the government of the Church was taken from them, and in 502 a synod held at Rome under Symmachus finally deprived the laity of all activity in the management of any of the affairs of the Church (compare Coleman, Apostolical and Primitive Church, p. 118).

In the Church of the Reformers a very different spirit prevailed. All Christians were looked upon as constituting a common and equal community. Still the desire of making a visible distinction often led even the Protestant Church astray, and to this day the question remains unsettled in some churches how far the laity ought to share in the government of the Church; and hence the depth of the distinction implied in the use of the word "clergy" and "laity" varies with the "Church" views of those employing them. Some very strict Protestants prefer the words "minister" and "people" instead of clergy and laity.

Fararr (Comm. in Decr., p. 849 sq.) thus draws the line of distinction between the clergy and laity of the Protestant Church: "It is for the sake of the people that the ordinances of religion, and the clergy as the dispensers of them, exist; they are called to bear the burdens of the Church, as they receive its benefits. It is, however, questioned by some how far the professed distinctions between clergy and laity are desirable. As religious teachers, the clergy may be expected to be more especially occupied in fitting themselves for that office in qualifying themselves to explain, and to enforce on others, the evidences, the doctrines, and the obligations; but they are not to be expected to understand many of things surpassing human reason than God has made known by revelation, or to be the depositaries of certain mysterious speculative doctrines; but 'stewards of the mysteries of God, rightly dividing (or dispensing, διατηροῦντας) the word of the truth. The laity are in danger of perverting Christianity, and making it, in fact, two religions, one for the initiated few, and one for the mass of the people, who are to follow implicitly the guidance of the others, trusting to their vicarious wisdom, and listen, and be taught. They are to beware of the lurking tendency which is in the heart of men to that very error which has been openly sanctioned and established in the Romish and Greek churches—the error of thinking to serve God by a deputy and representative; of regarding the learning and faith, the prayers and piety, and the scrupulous observance of the 'priest' as being in some way or other transferred from him to the people. The laity are also to be constantly warned that the source of these errors lies in the very fact of thus regarding the clergymen as a priest (in the sacerdotal sense of that term), as holding a kind of mediatorial position, as the Christian Church was distinct from, and therefore no rule for themselves; a view which, while it unduly exalts the clergy, tends most mischievously to degrade the tone of religion and morals among the people, by making them contented with a less measure of strictness of life and seriousness of demeanor than they require in their ministers. Laymen need also to be reminded that they constitute, though not exclusively, yet principally, the 'church;' the clergy being the ministers of the 'Church' (1 Cor. iii, 6); that it is for the people's sake that the ordinances of religion, and the clergy and church, are instituted, not for the laity; that they are the 'body of Christ,' that on them rests the duty of bearing the burdens, as they receive the benefits of the Church; and finally, that there is no difference between them and the clergy in Church standing, except that the clergy are the officers of each particular church, to minister the Word and sacraments to that portion of its members over whom they are placed." See CLERGY; LAY REPRESENTATION; LAY PREACHING; MEDITOR; MINISTRY; PASTORAL OFFICE; PRIEST, J. H. W.)

Lake (Laias, Laias, a term used in the N.T. only of the Lake of Gennesaret (Luke v, 1, 2; viii, 22, 23, 28), and of the burning sulphurous pool of Hades (Rev. xiv, 20; xx, 10, 14, 15; xxxi, 8). The more usual word is sea (q.v.). The principal lakes of Palestine, besides the above Sea of Tiberias, are the Dead Sea and the Waters of Jerom. See each in its place.

Lake, Arthur, a distinguished English prelate, was born at Southampton about 1550, and was educated at Winchester School, and at New College, Oxford, of which latter he was chosen fellow in 1589. He became successively archdeacon of Surrey in 1595, dean of Worcester in 1608, and finally bishop of Bath and Wells in 1616. He died May 4, 1626. Lake made important donations to the library of New College, and founded a chair for Hebrew and for mathematics in that institution. He was a very learned man, especially versed in the ancient father's, and very successful as a preacher. After his death there were published several volumes of his sermons: Exposition of the First Psalm; Exposition of the Fifty-fifth Psalm; and Meditations—all of which were collected and published in one volume, under the title Ninety-nine Sermons, with some Religious and Divine Reflections (New York, 1869), which is the most notable of his works. In his treatise on festivals, Raghunandana, a great modern authority, mentions, on the faith of a work called Samwatanara-sandipsa, that this divinity is to be worshipped in the forenoon of that day with flowers, perfumes, rice, and water; that due honor is to be paid to inanimate and animate beings, writing: "On the evening of this divinity the whole of the pens and inkstands, and the books, if not too numerous and bulky, are collected, the pens and reeds cleaned, the inkstands secured, and the books, wrapped up in new cloth, are arranged upon a platform or a sheet, and strewed over with flowers and blades of young barley, and that no flowers except white are to be offered. After performing the necessary rites... all the members of the family assemble and make their prostrations—the books, the pens and ink, having an entire holiday; and, should any emergency require a written communication on the day dedicated to the divinity of scholarship, it is done with chalk or charcoal upon a black or white board." There are parts of India where this festival is celebrated at different times according to the double aspect under which which Lakshmi is viewed by her worshippers. The festival in February seems originally to have been a ver/ 10019497/ nal feast, marking the commencement of the season of spring.

Lakshmi, H. W. N. I., 904, according to *Ges- nius, sce. stopper, i.e. fortified place; Sept. Aspagius v. r. *Sukhaviya and Aoros, Vulg. Locum, a place on the north-eastern border of Israel mentioned after Joshua in the direction of the Jordan (Josh. xix. 88), and therefore probably situated not far south of Lake Merom. The Talmud (Megillot, lxx, 1) speaks of a Lakim (לַקִּי), perhaps the same place (see Reim., Palest., 875). The site of Lakum is possibly indicated by the ruins marked on Van der Velde's Map adjoining a small pool east of Tel-Azbebrak and south-east of Safed.

Lakshmi, like most of the other divinities of the Hindu pantheon, seems to have been a very widely worshiped goddess. She is represented as one of the chief deities of the Hindu pantheon, and is especially worshiped on the 23rd day of the month of Phalguna, the month in which the festival of Sankranti is celebrated. She is also worshiped on the 23rd day of the month of Chaitra, the month in which the festival of Holi is celebrated. She is also worshiped on the 23rd day of the month of Margashira, the month in which the festival of Diwali is celebrated.

Lakshmi is worshiped in a variety of forms, and is represented as having a wide range of attributes. She is often depicted as a young girl, sometimes with a garland of flowers, and sometimes with a crown of jewels. She is also depicted as a woman with a lotus flower in her hand, and sometimes with a lamp in her hand. She is also depicted as a woman with a sword, and sometimes with a bow and arrow.

Lakshmi is worshiped in a variety of places, and is especially worshiped in the temples of the city of Lakhim, in the state of Gujarat. She is also worshiped in the temples of the city of Lakhim, in the state of Madhya Pradesh. She is also worshiped in the temples of the city of Lakhim, in the state of Rajasthan.

Lakshmi is worshiped by a variety of people, and is especially worshiped by the Hindus. She is also worshiped by the Buddhists, and sometimes even by the Muslims. She is also worshiped by the Christians, and sometimes even by the Jews. She is also worshiped by the Sikhs, and sometimes even by the Jains.

Lakshmi is worshiped in a variety of ways, and is especially worshiped by the Hindus through the performance of puja, the act of offering worship to a god. She is also worshiped by the Hindus through the performance of puja, the act of offering worship to a god. She is also worshiped by the Hindus through the performance of puja, the act of offering worship to a god. She is also worshiped by the Hindus through the performance of puja, the act of offering worship to a god.

bone, and in 1770 (June 24) was finally raised to the bishopric of Langres. This position securing him a seat in the States with the nobility, he took an active part in political events, and tried to conciliate the claims of the third estate with those of the nobility and clergy. He subsequently opposed the declaration of rights placed at the head of the new constitution, and spoke in Parliament the French Revolution. He retired to Switzerland and Austria, and finally settled at Venice in 1799, and remained there until the restoration of the Bourbons to the throne of France. He was made cardinal July 28, 1817, and minister of state. The see of Langres having been restored, La Luzerne was reappointed to it, but legal difficulties prevented his assuming its direction. In 1818 he was the only bishop called to the council of ministers to contrive the ratification of the Concordat of the preceding year. Although strongly attached to the liberties of the Gallican Church, La Luzerne was forced to sign the letter of the Concordat. He died June 21, 1821. Besides the Oraison funèbre de Charles Emmanuel III, roi de Sardaigne (1773, 4to and 12mo), and the Oraison funèbre de Louis XV, roi de France (1774, 4to and 12mo), he published numerous faithful and interesting pamphlets. Most of his writings were collected and published under the style (Éuvres de M. de La Luzerne (Lyons and Paris, 1842, 10 vols. 8vo). See Le Moniteur, July 26, 1821; Amis de la Religion et du Roi, xxvii, 225-283; Mahul, Annuaire Nécrologique, 1821, p. 289; Quevrand, La France littéraire; Hoëtzer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxix. 38. Lama (lāmā, Matt. xxvii, 46, which is also read in the best MSS. at Mark xv, 84, where the received text has λαμψα; the Heb. has both forms, יָלָם, lamah, and יָלָמ, lam'mah, for what; the Syriac version has λαμ从容), a term signifying why (as the context explains it, for, by which also the Sept. interprets it), quoted by our Saviour in the cross from Ps. xxii, 1 [2 in the Hebrew]

 Lamaism (from the Tibetan b-lama [pronounced Lama], spiritual teacher or lord) is the Tibetan form of Buddhism (q. v.), blended with and modified by the religions which preceded it in that portion of China. Among these was the belief in the "Mystic Cross," which was the religion of the Chinese and the Tairaghi of Tibet, the prince of the Litasby or Lichhavy race, being conquered in war, sought refuge in Tibet, where he became king. The Lichhavya of Vaishali professed belief in "Swasti." Swasti is a monogrammatic sign formed of the letters स and च, and "Suti" is the Pall form of the Sanskrit "Swasti," a compound of स (well) and चत (to it); so that "swasti" implies complete resignation under all circumstances, which was the chief dogma of the fatalists who called themselves Svaistika, or followers of the Mystic Cross. These people were also animatiationists; hence their Tibetan name of Mu-sto-ge or Finistista. They were grossly atheistical and indiscriminate in dress, but called themselves "Pure-doers," and the anonymous title Punya, "the pure," was carried with them into Tibet, and became modified into Pom or the "Bosa." This form of faith continued for nine centuries, and Buddhistism was generally introduced about the middle of the 7th century. Even then the followers of the Mystic Cross were still powerful.

History.—Buddhism was probably introduced into Tibet during the reign of Asoka, who propagated that religion for more or less than two thousand years ago. In B.C. 240, at the close of the third synod, the non-missionaries were dispatched to all surrounding countries to spread the doctrines of Sakyamuni. But the more formal history of Buddhism in Tibet begins with king Srongtsan Gampo (born A.D. 617, died 646), who sent to India his father, minister Thubten Chode, and his sixteen companions, to study letters and religion. He had the sacred books translated into Tibetan, and issued laws abolishing all other religions, and directing the establishment of this one. His wives, the one a Nepau- lese, the other Chinese, took the lead in all religious enterprises. He met, however, with only tolerable success, and the religion did not greatly flourish. Under king Thisrong-de-tsang (A.D. 728-786) Buddhism was more successful in Tibet, overcoming the efforts of the chiefs to crush the "new religion." This prince induced great works of commentaries from Bhamarapana and the other heads of the monasteries. The Chinese priests, who were the earliest Buddhist missionaries. A public proclamation in the year 305, which was ordered by the king, greatly increased the influence of the Indian priests. Large monasteries were erected, and a temple at Samye, and the translation of sacred books into the vernacular was more energetically conducted. King Langdar or Langdharma tried to abolish Buddhism, and in his efforts to do so commanded the destruction of all temples, monasteries, images, and sacred books pertaining to that religion. The execution of this order was so intense that it resulted in the murder of the king in A.D. 900. His son and successor was also unfavorably disposed towards Buddhism, and gradually the new religion lost many adherents, and those still remaining were persecuting.

From A.D. 971 dates the revival of Buddhism, or the second general effort to propagate this religion in Tibet, under Bilang-tsa, who rebuilt eight temples, and under whom the priests who had fled the country returned, and fresh ascensions were made from the priesthood of India. Among those who came in A.D. 1041 the celebrated priest Atisha. In the 12th or 13th century the modification of Buddhism known as the Tantrika mysticism was introduced. Considerably later a great impetus was given to Buddhism by the celebrated reformer Tsongkapa (born A.D. 1857), who endeavored, about the opening of the 15th century, to unite the disindividualistic and mystic schools, and to put an end to the tricks, pretended miracles, and other corruptions of the priesthood. He published new works on religion; but, so far as regards the marked similarity between the current and the earlier forms, the Lamas are still treated by some Christian sects, Schlagintweit says that "we are not yet able to decide the question as to how far Buddhism may have borrowed from Christianity, but the rites of the Buddhists enumerated by the French missionary (Hae) can fairly claim to have been handed back to institutions peculiar to Buddhism, or they have sprung up in periods posterior to Tsongkapa" (q. v.).

Sects.—According to Schlagintweit, there was no division of Lamaism into sects previous to the 11th century. Subsequently, however, there arose numerous subdivisions of the people, nine of which still exist, which are reputed orthodox, though there is not much known about them. In distinction from the other sects which Tsongkapa labored energetically to supersede, he ordered his disciples to wear a yellow dress instead of red, the color of the older religiousists, and, to make the distinction still more certain, he provided a black coat with a white cross, and also to be made of yellow cloth.

1. The eldest of the primitive sects is the Nygmapa. The lamas of Bhutan and Ladak belong to this sect, and they adhere to ancient rites, ceremonies, and usages, such as obtained among the earliest Chinese priests. They acknowledge some sacred books not included in the Kanjar or Tanjar hereinafter mentioned. 2. Another ancient sect is the Ugyenpa, or the disciples of Ugyen, who differ from the first in their worship of Amirtath and Sambhava. 3. A sect founded by Tsongkapa (born A.D. 1002) observes only "precepts" and not "transcendental wisdom." This sect wear a red dress. 4. The Sakyapa, whose particular tenets are not known, but who wear a red dress also. 5. The Geladupa (Gel-danpa or Geldampa) adhere to the doctrines of Tsonkhapa, and this sect is now the most numerous in Tibet.
6. The Kargyupa, leave Pa'jina Pahmitza, resting in their observance of the Ahpahme (Sutras) and in the " suc-session of precepts." 7. The Karmapa, and, 8. Birukampa-po, are not much known. 9. The Bupampa (Dups or Dudpa) have a particular worship of the thunderbolt (Dorge) which fell from heaven in Eastern Tibet. This sect observe the Tantrika mysticism.

In addition to the above there is the "Bosa" religion, also divided, which are called Boupasa. They own many wealthy monasteries. They are probably the descendants of those who did not originally accept Buddhism, but preserved the ancient rites and superstitions of the country.

Sacred Books.—Lamaism has voluminous sacred literature. Originally it consisted almost wholly of translations, but after this it developed rapidly an indigenous element, especially after the 14th century, under the impulse given to it by Tsonkha-pa. The commentaries on the sacred text are frequent in the vernacular. But the great works are a compilation of Sanskrit translations, converted into the Persian idiom, and in different periods. These are respectively translations of "the commandments" and of the doctrines of Sakya-monu, in which are embraced philosophy, logic, rhetoric, and Sanskrit grammar. The principal of these translations date from the 13th century. Most of them are probably of later origin, but the modern arrangement of the works is probably not older than the present century. These collections were printed in 1728-46, by order of the regent of Lhasa, and are now printed at many of the monasteries. They are entitled "Kajur and Tomur" according to Miller, the proper spelling is Bokh-kyur and Bokh-kyur.

The "Kujsur" consists of the following sections: 1.
Dvata (Sanskrit, Vinayaka), or discipline; 2. Sher-ph'jan (Sanskrit, Pradhésadnya), or philosophy and metaphysics;
3. Phulchen (Sanskrit, Buddhanatha Simha), or the doctrine of the Buddhists, their incarnations, etc.; 4. 4Km br'Tejas (Sanskrit, Ratnashtika), or the collection of precious things; 5. 5 Do saD (Sanskrit, Sutrastra), or the collection of Sutras; 6. Mjajg doss (Sanskrit, Nirvada), or the liberation from worldly pains; 7. 7'ojjl (Sanskrit, Tantras), or incantations, etc. (Chambers). There are many editions of the Kujsur, varying from 100 to 108 volumes. It embosha 1083 distinct words. Massive as this code is, editions of it have been printed at Pekin, Lhasa, and other places. These have been sold for sums ranging as high as $100, the common price being, for 7000 coins. A most valuable analysis of this immense Bible is given in the Atatic Researches, vol. xx, by Alexander Cszimk de Koros, a Hungarian who made his way to Tibet on foot for other purposes, but became an enthusiastic student of the Tibetean Scriptures.

The Tomur is a collection of treatises in 225 volumes, elegantly printed at Pekin, containing translations from Sanskrit and Prakrit, on dogmas, philosophy, grammar, medicine, and ethics, with Amara's Rosha or vocabulary, and fragments of the Mahabharata and of other works on religion. The work of the great reformer, the history of Buddhism, lives of saints, and all sorts of works on theology and magic, fill the libraries. But the Tibetans also possess annals, genealogies, and laws, and as, for instance, the "Mirror of Kings" (translated into Monolic by Seangm Sonseam, and into German by Schmidt), or Bodhimut ("Way to Wisdom"), and works on astrology and chronology" (Appleton).

Among the native sacred literature of Tibet is the historical book called Mox' Mox'kun, containing the legendary tales of Padmapani's propagation of Buddhism in Tibet, and the origin and application of the sa-crned formula "Om Mani Padma Huma." It contains a description of the wonderful region Sukhavati, where Amitabha sits enthroned, and where those are who most merit blissful existence; a history of creation; prayers to Padmapani, and the advantages of frequent repetition of Om Mani; the meaning of that sacred sentence; an account of the figurative representations of Padmapani, and of his images, which represent him with faces varying from three to one thousand. It contains, moreover, the ethics and religious ordinances of Buddhism: biography; a description of the irresistible power of "Om Mani," etc., and tells how it secures deliverance from being reborn; legends, translations of sacred books, etc.
This has been translated into Mongolian.

Orders of Initiation.—The Buddhist community is divided into several classes or levels, known in Thibet as True Initiates, or Chode, which includes the "perfect" or "accomplished; and Chang Chikub Sempol, or "Perfect Strength of Mind," because the graduate has accomplished the grand object of life, which is the perfect suppression of all bodily desire and complete abatement of mind. These are the Bodhiaataw of Sakryakrit (or, in Khinese, Pusa), who are incipient Buddhas, rising by self-sacrifice and their good influence over their fellow-men to the highest goal. Every age produces a number of these Bodhiaatawa. The second class comprises those having "individual intelligence, and the self-initiators, the Phrakhe, who turn not out of the way. The third is the Srawaka or auditor (listener).

Orders of Beings.—The self-existent Aidi Buddhia, by five spontaneous acts of divine wisdom, and by five exceptions, are divided into ten classes. The fifth exception is the "own essence five intelligences of the first order, known as the Pachaka Dhyam-Buddha, or "Five celestial Buddhia," whose names are Vairocana, Akshobya, Ratna Sambhara, Amitabha, and Amogha Siddha.

These five intelligences of the first order created "five intelligences of a second order, or Bodhiasthwa, who become creative agents in the hands of God, or serve as links uniting him with all the lower grades of crural existence. The Lokaparvaka (Jitgen Bauchgh), or 'Rules of the World," are also acknowledged in Thibetian Buddhism. All these are celestial beings, the spontaneous emanations from the Deity, who have never been subject to the pains of transmigration.

Inferior to these are the created or mortal beings, divided into six classes, named Drosba Rakh, or "Six advances or progressors," because their souls advance by transmigration from one state to another, or, if they finally attain absorption, and are no longer subject to transmigration. These six are: 1. Idka; or god; 2. Lha pam Yia, Titana; 3. Hiji, which equals man; 4. Dudra, brutes, 5. Tidok, goblins; 6. Nyoller, the damned.

Order of Worship.—In early periods Lamaism conformed its worship to the triad Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, and piou reverence was shown to the relics of former Buddhia, as well as to those of Sakya himself and his principal disciples; but there is no mention of the elaborate system of Dhyani Buddhas, Padmapani, etc., earlier than about A.D. 400. Primitive Buddhism to now, it was manifestly atheistic, but was in later ages gantly modified.

Sakryam is worshipped in Ladak as the "Sakya Thub-baka," yet there is a legend to the effect that at the end of twenty-five centuries from the present time he is to be succeeded by a more benign Buddha, called Murya, or Mi-ri. The people, however, are equally favorable to Sakya, though there is reason to believe that the worship is of later date, as Fa Hian is the first who makes mention of it. He speaks of it as extant at the time of his visit in A.D. 400. These other deities are Padmapani, Jamya, and Jamyad-ri, or Padmapani; Manju Sri, and Avra Lokiteewara; and though the people still confess an oath by appealing to the three premarias of the Buddhist triad, yet, when they undertake any enterprise or begin a journey, their prayers for acces are almost invariably addressed to Padmapani. The mystical sentence "On Mani Padma Hum" is revered in worship, and is constantly heard as one moves through the country. It had been variously translated as "Oh, the jewel in the lotus!" and "Hail to him of the jewel and the lotus!" and "Glory to the lotus-bearer! Hum!"

Padmapani is a "Dhyani Buddha," and of all the gods is most frequently worshipped, because he is a representative of the cosmic ideal of the Buddha, the patron deity of the planet Earth. He is the patron deity of the Buddha, and manifests himself from age to age in human shape, becoming Dalai Lama (see below) by the emission of a beam of light, and by the appearance of the holy Vehicle that the Buddha has left behind for his followers,

In Tibet, he is the great many names, and is represented in a few figures, sometimes having eleven faces and eight hands, the faces forming a pyramid ranged in four rows, each series being of a different complexion: white, yellow, blue, red; sometimes he is represented as having one head and four arms.

Co-regent with Padmapani is Manju Sri, who diffuses religious truth, bearing a naked sword as symbol of power and acumen; he is lord of the intellect, and the subject, the expression of the former-inhabitants, the lowly, the over-soul of the whole earth. The representatives of him in Tibet, as in Mongolia, make him to have innumerable eyes and hands, and even ten heads, crowned, and radiant in the form of a one, one above another; he is often represented as incarnate in the person of some Dalai Lama as Padmapani.

It must not be supposed, however, that these are the only objects of worship in Tibet. The earliest worship of that country was a species of nature or element worship; and, as Lamaism in the ancient gods and spirits of the former inhabitants on itself, the poorer people still make offerings to their old divinities, the gods of the hills, the woods, the dales, the mountains, the rivers, and have field, family, and house divinities. Lamaism was, besides this, greatly affected by its contact with the Shamanism (q.v.) of the Mongolians.

These gods are particles of the Supreme Intelligences, and, though they are many, they are all a multiplication of the one God. The Tibetan name for deity is dka, the equivalent of the Sanskrit Deva. They assist man, each having his own sphere, within which he reigns supreme, and above which he is derived.

There are, besides these, malignant gods, called "Da," or "Dharma," or "Geg," or "Ged." The most malignant of them are, 1. Lhasayin, to whom many ill-nature spirits are subject. They cause untimely death. 2. The Dados, or judges of the dead. These try to prevent the continued existence of a world by inciting evil desires, by becoming beautiful women. They disturb assemblies. They are, of course, antagonized by the more benevolent deities, among whom some become specially famous, as the Drag-shen, "the cruel hangmen," who are subdivided into eight classes. Legends concern them about.

Doctrines.—According to Cönnim (in the Bengal Society Journal, vii, 140), the higher philosophies are not popularly understood, yet the people of Tibet are in general tolerant and familiar with the doctrine of the Three Vehicles (Tripāta, a dogma of the Mahayana school, explained in the Tibetan Compendium called Lamrin, or "The Gradual Way to Perfection." The argument of the book is to the effect that the Buddha dogmas are intended for the lowest, middle, and highest people, and that they are graduated to the different needs, for instance, there is the following order. The lowest people must believe in God, future life, and that the fruit of works is to be earned in this life, while the middle class are to know (1) that every compound is imperishable; (2) that all imperfection is pǐt; and that the living body is the only true happiness.

A person of the highest class, in addition to all the foregoing, must know that from the body to the Supreme Soul nothing is existent but himself; that he will not always be, but ever cease absolutely from being. These are the three, and they are the life of the Mahayana religion. Meditation, however, is a link in the chain, and its study may be subdivided into practice of ten virtues, to which the middle class are to add meditation, wisdom, etc.; while the superior class must, in addition to the foregoing, practice the six transcendental virtues. In their ultimate destiny this graduation pursues these classes, the lowest being admitted to become men gods, etc., the next having of hope of rebirth in Sukhavati, without pain or bodily existence, and the best expecting to reach themselves Nirvana, and to lead others thereunto also. The priests who take the vows called Dom can alone hope for this.

A more popular code, however, is that of the dharma of the simple people, and hence the following eight precepts commonly obtain: 1. To seek to take refuge only with Buddha. 2. To form in one's mind the resolution to striving to attain the highest degree of perfection, in order to be united with the Supreme Intelligence. 3. To prostrate oneself before the image of Buddha to adore him. 4. To bring offerings before him, such as are pleasing to any of the six senses, as lights, flowers, garlands, incense, perfumes, all kinds of edibles and drinkables, stuff, cloth, etc., for garments, and hanging ornaments. 5. To make music, to pray for the preservation and protection of the dharma, and praise of Buddha, respecting his person and doctrines, love or mercy, perfections or attributes, and his acts or performances for the benefit of all animal beings. 6. To confess one's sins with a contrite heart, to ask forgiveness for them, and to resolve sincerely not to commit the like hereafter. 7. To revere in the heart the merits of all animal beings, and to wish that they may thereby obtain final emancipation or beatitude. 8. To pray and entreat all Buddhas that are now in the world to turn the wheel of religion (or to teach their doctrines), and to pray not to leave the world too soon, but to remain here for many ages. The Mahayana school says that confession confers entire absolution from sins. So also Thibetan Buddhism now considers it. Confession, however, includes repentance and promises of amendment. Various ceremonies accompany the avowal. Consecrated water must be used, which, however, can only be rendered fit by the priests by a ceremony called Tsosel, or "Entreaties for abolution." Abstinence from food and recitation of prayers are also observed, but the commonest form is that of a simple address to the gods. The confessors who deliver from sins are generally Buddhists who preceded Sakaymuni, or holy spirits equal in power to Bodhisattas. There are thirty-five of these eminent in this work, known as the "thirty-five Buddha of Confession," beautifully colored images of whom are found in the monasteries, and to whom prayers are made in the Tibetan liturgy.

Regarding the future abode of the blessed, Lamaism differs from other Buddhism. Nirvana (annihilation) is not carefully pointed out, and the sacred books say it is impossible to define its attributes and properties. But to those failing to obtain Nirvana it is promised by the existence, the next best state that can be offered is Suk-
The elder son generally becomes a lama. In 1855 the total number of lamas, as estimated in the Bosgel Society Journal, was 18,500, in twelve monasteries of Eastern Tibet. In Western Tibet Cunningham estimates one to every thirteen laymen, while in Spiti they number one to seven of the population.

These lamas are kept in the gardens attached to the monasteries, revolve prayer cylinders, carve blocks, and paint. They are often illiterate, and, though most of them know how to read and write, they do not care to acquire knowledge. Their dress and caps are of dark blue with yellow borders. The head lama's cap is generally low and conical, though some are hexagonal, and others like a mitre. They wear also a gown, which reaches to the calves of their legs; this has a slender girdle and an upright collar. They wear also trousers, and boots of stiff felt. They carry rosaries containing 108 beads, made of wood, pebbles, or bones. Their amulet boxes contain images of deities, relics, and objects dreaded by evil spirits.

Buildings and Monuments.—The priests live in monasteries, each of which receives a religious name. The architecture is similar to that of the houses of the wealthy laity, but it is generally larger and better finished. They are always decorated with flags. They sometimes consist of one large house, several stories high, and in other cases of several buildings with temples attached. In their exterior appearance they are much inferior to those of other countries.

The temples have nothing imposing about them. The roofs are flat or sloping, with square holes for windows and skylights. The walls are towards the quarters of the heavens. The north side should be colored green, the south side yellow, the east side white, the west red. They are not always, however, in this order. The interior of the building is generally one large room, with side halls decorated with paintings, images, etc. The side halls contain the library, the volumes of which are on shelves, and sometimes wrapped in silk. In the corners are statues of deities, the religious dresses of the priests, musical instruments, and other articles of sacred appointment. "The Lamasic temples are of Indo-Chinese form, square, fronting the east in Tibet and the south in Mongolia. They are often cruciform. There are three gates, and three interior divisions, viz., the entrance-hall, the body of the edifice with two parallel rows of columns, and the sanctuary with the throne of the high lama" (Appleton). For a description of two of the largest lama temples in China, see Doolittle, Social Life of the Chinese, ii. 457 sq.

The Chodens are monuments from eight to fifteen feet, or even sometimes forty feet high. They are receptacles for the offerings of the people, and repositories of relics, and are very much revered by the lamas. They are set up in the temples, and are moulded from metals, or even of clay and straw.

The walls are six feet long and four or five feet broad, of sacred use. Derchoks and lapchas are sacred flags and heaps of stones. Prayers are inscribed on the flags, and the people seem ever eager to make new lapchas.

Images, etc.—The representations of deities and other sacred personages are copied everywhere. From the earliest period relics and images of Buddha have been honored and worshipped with simple ceremonies, as processions, presentation of flowers, perfumes, prayers, and hymns. At the present day, Buddhas preceding Sakya-muni, as well as the Dharmar Buddha, a large figure of a god, and other spirits deified, priests of local reputation are all represented in images or pictures. The "Gallery of Portraits" has drawings of over three hundred saints.

The lamas have a monopoly of the manufacture of these, as they are effacious only after the performance of certain ceremonies at certain times. Living images are not supposed to be repugnant, and these the lamas alone know how to perform. Pictures must be commenced on prescribed days; on certain other days the eyes must be painted, etc.

Draw-

Engravings and paintings are traced with pinholes, through which powder is sifted; they are bordered by several stripes of blue, yellow, red, and other colors. Statues and base-reliefs of clay, paper-mâché, bread-dough, or metals, or even of butter run in a mould, are made.

The best executed contain reliefs, as ashes, bones, hair, rags, and grain; these are sometimes contained in a hole in the bottom of the image.

The images and statues of the Buddha, Bodhisat twas, and the Dragsheds differ greatly from each other. Sukhamani is represented in many attitudes, with one hand uplifted or holding an alms-bowl, as sitting, or as recumbent. Padmapani has sometimes eleven faces and a thousand hands. "Maha, the god of fire, when driving away evil spirits, rides a red ram, and has a hor rible countenance;" but he is represented in many other attitudes. The Bodhisattwas have a shining countenance, and are seated on a lotus-flower. The Dragsheds who protect against evil spirits are fierce-looking, of dark complexion, and sometimes have a third eye in the forehead, to represent their wisdom. They are almost naked, but wear a necklace of human skulls, and have rings on their arms and ankles. They have in their hands various instruments symbolic of their power. The Dragshed of Dragshen, "a three-headed and nine-armed god, four or eight metallic hoops joined together so as to form two balls," which are on a staff, with points projecting. The Phurba, or "nail," the Bchok, "club," and Zungpo, or "spear" to catch evil spirits, and the Kapali, or drinking-vessel, which is a human skull, are among these sacred instruments.

Forms of Worship.—The religious services consist of singing, accompanied with instrumental music, offerings, prayers, etc. The offerings are of clarified butter, flour, tamarind-water, flowers, grain, peacock feathers, etc. There are no blood sacrifices. Any sacrificial entailing injury to life are strictly forbidden in the Buddhist faith. Drums, trumpets made of the human thigh-bone, cymbals, and flageolets, are among the sacred musical instruments.

The Prayer cylinder is an instrument peculiar to the Buddhists. It is called "khoreen" (Harley says khorllos or toklool, according to Huc = turning-prayer). It is generally of brass, enveloped in wood or leather. A wooden handle passes through the cylinder, forming its axis, around which is rolled the long strip of cloth or paper on which is the prayer of printed sacred sentences. A short rope, passed through a hole near the bottom, or by means of a short chain, facilitates the rotation of the cylinder in the hand. Large cylinders near the monasteries are kept in motion by persons employed for the purpose, or by being attached to streams of running water like a mill-wheel. Each cylinder has a special prayer, or series of prayers, written on it in long lines. The repetition of the cylinder is equivalent to the repetition of the sentences inclosed. Generally the inscription is only a repetition of the sentence "Om mani padma hūm." There is also a sacred drama.

Weekly Days and Festivals.—The monthly festivals are four, and are connected with the phases of the moon. No animal food must be eaten, but ordinary avocations need not be discontinued. There are particular festivals for each month, and three great annual festivals. "The Lég ztar, or the festival of the new year, in February, marks the commencement of the season of spring, or the victory of light and warmth over darkness and cold. The Lamaists, like the Buddhists, celebrate it in commemoration of the victory obtained by the Buddha Sukharamuni over the six heretic teachers. It lasts fifteen days, and consists of a series of feasts, dances, illuminations, and other manifestations of joy: it is, in short, the Tibetan Carnival. The second festival, probably the oldest festival of the Buddhist Church, is held in commemoration of the conception or incarnation of the Buddha, and marks the commencement of summer. The third is the water-festival, in August and September, marking the commencement of autumn" (Chambers).
Lamaism

Lha-ri (god mountain), with a fine temple; there is another sacred place in the metropolis of Kham; others at Isha-o-Da (two ways), Djaya, etc., with printing-offices; many others on the roads to Pekin, besides the northern monastery; all containing an incredible number of monks, under Khutukhtus and lower lamas; so that the Ifits are 6,000 monasteries in U alone; others 84,000 exist in U, Tsang-po, and Kham, of the yellow sect, hermits, beggars, and vagabonds not included. About 120 miles south-west from Lassa, near the confluence of the Paimon with the great Tsaing-bo-i-thu (Sanpu), is the second metropolis of Lamaism, viz. Kharkhia (mount of grace), also called o-Da-lang, with five great monasteries, many temples, palaces, mausoleums, pyramids, and the like. In the neighbouring city there is a Chinese garrison. About midway between the two Bha-brangs there are three rocky islands in a lake, called g-Yang-brog (happy desert); Yam-bro on English maps, which contains temples, a magnificent palace, and thousands of monks and nuns, subject to the rDo-rDe-phagmo (saint, or admittance-sow), a female Khutukhtu, who becomes incarnated with a figure of a sow's mouth on her neck, in consequence of her having once been a sow. There are also troubles of the regency in the shape of that animal. The Chinese believe her to be the incarnate Uma Major. On the road to Nepaul there are the s-Nar-thang monastery, where the Kajbrit was printed; and Sesksaya, mentioned above, now the site of the red-capped Gong-rDogs (high lama). He has the power of heredity, so that the road to Bhotan are the monasteries Kisu and Gantum Gumba of Turner, and many others, swarming with lamas, some filled with Attau (nuns). Bhotan is subject to the Dalai, but there are also three red-capped Khi-po-tehri. The metropolis is Kbra-Shishe Tshohe Dres (gloria sat-utris, idefix arc, Turner's Taisusodon), under an incarnate great lama and a secular Dharma-raja, who rules over six districts, with about 10,000 lamas and 45,000 families. In Sikkim the aboriginal Leptchas have many mendicant lamas who practice magic, the other tribes being pure Buddhists. Buddhism flourished in Nepal as early as the 7th century of our era. It now exists there with Brahminism and Mohammedanism, so that Nepal has also a double literature. In Kunnawar, and elsewhere on the Upper Sutlej, there are many great monasteries of both the yellow and the red caps, living in peace with each other. At Singhnam there is a great library, a printing establishment, and a gigantic statue of Buddha. Ladakh became Buddhist before our era; its history is even less known than that of Tibet. Although invaded by Moslems (about 1650), it has many lamas of the yellow sect. In the Kabizh Buddhist secta, viz. that of Fo, since A.D. 65, fostered by the government, very numerous, but without hierarchy, each monastery being under an abbot, who is a citizen of the 12th class; and the Lamaists, organized, as in Tibet, under the ministry of foreign affairs, with three Khutukhtus at Pekin, one of whom is attached to the court, while another's diocese is in South Mongolia, and the third governs the central one of their great monasteries. The most celebrated temples in the eighteen provinces are one on the L-tai-shan (five-topped mountain), in Shishei, and one in Yunnan. In Si-tan, or Tangut, about the Koko-Nor, Lamaism flourished under the Hia at the close of the 9th century. The great reformer was incarnated in Amo. The great censory of esKubum was visited and endorsed by Khang-hi, and has a celebrated university. Mongolia is the paradise of lamas, they forming about one eighth of its population. Its patriarchy, the Gegen-Khutukhtu, a Bodhiasttwa of Maitreya, is equal in rank to both Thibetan popes, resides at Urga, on the road between Pekin and Kiachia, lat. 40° 30' with about 20,000 monks, and has attained the highest. Khubilai, by sixteen reincarnations, having been first the son of Altan Khalkhan of the Khalkhas, and having once died (1889), after a visit to Pekin, either by poison or from licentiousness.

The Urgan censory owns about 30,000 families of slaves. The cathedral at Kuku Khotun, among the Tumen is under an incarnate patriarch, now second to the preceeding. Most censories and temples now extant in Mongolia were built or restored after the second conversion. A Khutukhtu rules over the celebrated establishment of the 'five gods' in U. Dyen Mamoun Ssuau, the summer residence of the second Pekin Khutukhtu, were 108 temples and a famous manufactury of idols. Many other abodes of lamas are scarcely inferior to those we have mentioned. The desert of Gobi contains many such establishments. Sunguria contains numerous ruins of Lamaism, on the ruins of the Irkut tribes, also called lama, among which those of Abilai-Kut, near Usk Kamenogorok, are most renowned, because the first fragments of the holy canon were brought thence to Europe about 1750. The Torgutas have built many sacred places since their return from the west. A few lamas were found among the Buryats (in Russia), near Lake Baikal, about 160 years ago, as missionaries from Urga. Now almost all of them south of the lake are Lamo-Shamanates, and have wooden temples. The Calmöcky between the Don, Volga, and Ural are forbidden to maintain intercourse with them, and have to perform a Lamaic worship in Shitini-Urrgas (church tents).

Government.—"Since the restoration of the power of the Dalai by the emperor Khian-lung, all the decrees of government are issued in the name of each of the two high lamas, in their respective dioceses; but the real power is vested in the emperor, who gives the order to the Dalai (great mandarin) to reside at Lassa, with Chinese garrisons in the neighborhood, to watch both the ocean of holiness and the Tsang-vang, who, as vicar of the emperor, administers the affairs of the country. The lower offices only are hereditary. The annual tribute of the two high lamas is carried every third year to Pekin by caravan.

La Marck, Evaird de, cardinal bishop and lord of Lierneux (1185-1228); also abbot of St. Hubert, was bishop of Lierneux, as well as the services rendered to the Church of Lige by his ancestors, caused him to be chosen bishop of that city in 1506. He at once applied to Rome for approbation, and, on the reception of the papal bull of installation by Julius II, repaired to Lige, where he was received with great enthusiasm. He confirmed the privileges of the city, which he governed with such wisdom that, while war was raging outside, his dioceze continued to enjoy undisturbed peace. He restored the old discipline of St. Hubert, first bishop of Liège, and devoted himself to the spiritual and temporal improvement of his charge. In acknowledgment of services he had rendered to Louis XII in the affairs of Italy, he was made bishop of Chartres. Francis I even promised to procure him a cardinal's hat, but a protege of the duchess of Angoulême obtained his appointment, and entered in 1518 into the league of Austria against France, and even warred against his own brother, Robert de la Marck, who had made peace with Francis I. In the Diet of Frankfurt he advocated the nomination of Charles V as emperor of Germany, and was rewarded with the archbishopric of Cologne. He entered in 1561 into the league of Austria against France, and even warred against his own brother, Robert de la Marck, who had made peace with Francis I. fet out and punish all heretics. A great many were found and punished by exile or death, while their possessions were sequestered. He is said to have cruelly tortured Protestant theologians. He had it at first wel-comted Erasmus, who dedicated him to his parashare on the Epistle to the Romans, but turned about and called him a heathen and a publican when he saw him slip incline towards the new doctrines. In 1529 he was called to the Council, where the Act of Luther was conducted. In 1532 he equipped at his own expense a body of troops to war against the Turks. Appointed legate a latere in 1538, he labored with new zeal to uproot all heresy. For this object he assembled a synod at Liége in 1538, but the priests, dissatisfied with his austerity, declared against him. He hoped to abound their opposition, but suddenly died, Feb. 16, 1538. See Chapeauville, Hist. des Cardinaux, iii, ch v. and v, Aubier, Histoire des Cardinaux, iii, 381, Louis Doni d Attichy, Flores Cardinalium, vol. iii; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, 92. (J. P.)

La Mark, Jean Baptiste Pierre Antoine de Monet, Chevalier de, a very distinguished French naturalist, deserves a place here on account of his connection with the celebrated theory of the Variation of Species, lately so generally made known by the English author. See Darwin. See also on or. La Mark was born at Barenton, in Picardy, Aug. 1, 1744, and was intended for the Church; he entered, however, the army, but accidental injury led him to adopt the mercenary profession. During his leisure hours he studied the natural sciences, and in 1778 finally came before the public with a work on botany. He secured him the position of botanist to the king. In 1798 he was made a professor of natural history in the Jardin des Plantes. He died Dec. 29, 1829. His greatest work is his Histoire des Animaux sans Vertèbres (Paris, 1815-39, 7 vols. 8vo; 3d ed. Paris, 1856, etc.) In Pke. loeske Zoologique (Paris, 1869, 2 vols. 8vo), and some other of his productions, he advanced extensively speculative views, which, since Darwin's rise, have become the consideration of scientific scholars. So much is certain, that La Mark was the first (if we except a few obscure works of Buffon towards the close of his life) to advocate Variation of Species. For a more detailed account and a complete list of his works, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxix, 55-82. (J. H. W.)

Lamb is the representative of several Hebrew and Greek words in the A. V., some of which have wide and others distinctly limited meanings. See:

1. The most usual term, יְבֵן, ke'nes (with its transposed form יְבֵן, ke'seh, and the feminine יְבֵנָה, kib-annah, or יְבֵנָה, kobnæ, and יְבֵנָה, kobdeh), denotes a male lamb from the first to the third year. The former, perhaps more nearly coincident with the provincial term łog or łogger, is applied to a young ram before he is horn. The corresponding word in Arabic, according to Genesis, denotes a ram at that period when he has lost his first two teeth and four othc makes their appearance, which happens in the second or third year. Young rams of this age formed an important part of almost every sacrifice. They were offered at the daily morning and evening sacrifice (Exod. xxiii, 8-11, 48-41), on the Sabbath day (Num. xxvii, 9), at the feasts of the new moon (Num. xxviii, 11), of trumpets (Num. xxix, 2), of tabernacles (Num. xxviii, 13-40), of Pentecost (Lev. xxiii, 18-20), and of the Passover (Exod. xii, 5). They were brought by the princes of the congregation as burnt-offerings at the dedication of the tabernacle (Numb. viii, 15). They were offered at the ascent of Aaron (Lev. ix, 3), the coronation of Solomon (1 Chron. xxiii, 21), the purification of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix, 21), and the great Passover held in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxix, 7). They were the sacrifices for the purification of women after childbirth (Lev. xii, 2), and at the cleansing of a leper (Lev. xiv, 10-25). They accompaniment the presentation of first-fruits (Lev. xxiii, 12). When the Nazarites commenced their period of separation they offered a he-lamb for a trespass-offering or a guilt-offering (Num. vii, 17-19). The he-lamb was sacrificed as a burnt-offering, and a ewe-lamb as a sin-offering (v, 14). A ewe-lamb was also the offering for the sin of ignorance (Lev. iv, 25). See SACRIFICE.

2. The corresponding Chaldean term to the above is עֵבֶן, innumar (Ezra vi, 9, 17; viii, 17). In the Targum it assumes the form יִבֶן, צֵלָה.

3. A special term is יִבֶן, tateh (1 Sam. vii, 9; Isa. lxv, 25), a young sucking lamb; originally the young of any animal. The name from the same root in Arabic signifies "a fawn," in Ethiopic "a kid," in Samaritan "a boy," while in Syriac it denotes "a boy," and in the feminine "a girl.” Hence "Talitha kumi," "Damele, arise!" (Mark v, 41). The plural of a cognate form occurs (יִבְנֶים, tel'm) in Isa. xi, 17.

4. Less exact is תִּפְרָת, a fat ram, or, more probably, "wether," as the word is generally employed in opposition to ewe, which strictly denotes a "ram" (Deut. xxxii, 14, 2 Kings iii, 4; Isa. xxxiv, 6). Mosha, king of Moab, sent tribute to the king of Israel 100,000 fat wethers: and this circumstance is made use of by R. Joseph Kimchi to explain Isa. viii, 1, which he regards as an exhortation to the Jews to respond to the Moabites' request to receive a tribute. The Tyrians obtained their supply from Arabia and Kedar (Exek. xxxvii, 21), and the pastures of Bana-shen were famous as grazing-grounds (Exek. xxxvii, 18). See RAM.

5. Still more general is תָּשָׁב, rendered "lamb" in Exod. xii, 21, properly a collective term denoting a "flock of sheep and goats, in distinction from herds of the larger animals (Eccles. ii, 7; Ezek. xiv, 15). See FLOCK.

6. In opposition to this collective term the word יִבֶן, seh, is applied to denote the individuals of a flock, whether sheep or goats: and hence, though "lamb" in many passages the rendering of the A. V., the marginal reading gives "kid" (Gen. xxii, 7; 8, Exod. xii, 3; xxiii, 1, etc.—Smith, a. v. See KID)

7. In the N. T. we find ἑπιφών (strictly the diminu-tive of ἑπιφών, which latter once occurs, Luke x, 1), a λαμβάνειν, the almost exclusive word, ἑπιφόν being only employed in a few passages, directly referring to Christ, as noticed below. It appears that originally the paschal victim might be indifferently of the goats or of the sheep (Exod. xii, 8-5). In later times, however, the offspring of sheep appears to have been almost uniformly taken, and in sacrifices generally, with the exception of the golden ac-cer on the great day of atonement. Sundry peculiar enactments are contained in the same law respecting the qualities of the animal (Exod. xxii, 30; xxxiii, 19; Lev. xxvii, 27). See PASSOVER.

8. In the symbolical language of Scripture the lamb is the type of meekness and innocence, Isa. xi, 6; lxv, 25; Luke x, 3; John xxi, 15. See SHEEP.

The hypocritical assumption of this meekness, and the carrying on of persecution under a show of charity to the souls of men, and bestowing absolutions and indulgences on those who conform to its rules, appears to have given rise to the application of this otherwise sac-ted title to Antichrist (Rev. xiii, 11): "And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth, and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon." This evidently has reference to the ostensibly mild and toler-tant character of the pagan forms of religion, which nevertheless, in the end, were found co-operating with the relentless secular power. It finds a fit counterpart in the Je ultrasoundic pretensions of Romanism. See ANTICHRI ST.

Lamb (as a Christian emblem), the symbol of Christ (Gen. iv, 4; Exod. xxii, 26; xxvii, 19); Isa. xi, 1; Jer. iii, 7; John i, 28; 1 Pet. i, 19; Rev. iii, 8), who was typified by the paschal lamb, the blood of which was sprink-LAMB

In the Romish Church the expression is blaspemously applied in its Latin form to a consecrated wax or dough inclosed in a cross, used as a charm by the superstitious. See AGNUS DEI.

Lamb, John, D.D., an English divine and antiquary, was born about 1790. He was made master of Corpus Christi College in 1822, and in 1837 was honored with the deanship of Bridport. He died in 1850. Lamb published Hist. Account of the XXXIX. Articles, 1543, 1851; The History of the London Fire of 1666, 1671 (Cambridge, 1829, 4to; 2d cd, 1835, 4to); etc. See Lond. Gent. Mag., 1848, pt. ii, p. 55; 1850, pt. i, p. 667; Christian Remembrancer, June, 1829.

Lamb, Thomas, an English Baptist minister and strict Calvinist, flourished in the second half of the 17th century. He died about 1672. He is noted as the opponent of John Goodwin, the bold defender of Arminianism, whose Redemption Redeemed (London, 1661, fol.) Lamb answered in a work entitled Absolute Freedom from Sin by Christ's Death for the World, etc. (London, 1656, 4to).

Lambdin, William, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Talbot Co., Md., June 4, 1784; was converted at sixteen; removed to Pittsburgh in 1805; joined the Baltimore Conference in 1808; was on various circuits and stations until 1815; then local till 1822, then in Pittsburg Conference until 1820; then local at Wheeling until 1842; then in Memphis Conference, Tennessee, where he labored until his death. He died in Henry County, Tenn., May 22, 1854. Lambdin was an able and faithful minister of the Word, and served the Church long and successfully.—Annals of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, 1865, p. 548.

Lambert von Hersfeld, of Aschaffenburg, an eminent German chronicler of the 11th century, was born, it is supposed by some, at Aschaffenburg, about 1084. In 1058 he entered the convent of Hersfeld, the school of which was at that time one of the most celebrated in Germany, and in the same year, 1058, was ordained priest. Shortly after he went on a journey to Jerusalem, without the consent or knowledge of the abbots of his convent. After his return in the following year, Lambert devoted himself to literary pursuits, yet as an inmate of the convent which he had entered before his departure for the Holy Land. He was in great favor among the monks, and as such was evicted by his superior. Probably he was sent to visit the convents of Sieberg and Saalfeld, newly-established institutions. The precise date of his death is not ascertained—probably about 1080. His works, which are numerous, are especially valuable as giving a clear perception of the state of letters in his times. His chief work was a heroic poem, the title of which is lost. He then wrote a history of the Convent of Hersfeld, which contains valuable information for the history of the 11th century, but unfortunately we possess only fragments of this work. These were published by Mader from a Wolfenbieth Codex: comp. Vratislaus, sanctimonia, potestas atque maiestas dumus Brunovisonum cc Lynburgensem donam (Helmstädt, 1661-4), p. 150; and again in Antiqu. Brunavic. p. 150. This same codex was also published by M. G. Waizt, vii, 138-141. His third work is a history of Germany in two parts. The second part is the most complete, as well as the most interesting: it begins with the reign of Henry IV, and extends to the election of King Rudolf. It is believed by some that this work, treating contemporary events, was written at different periods, whenever anything occurred which afforded the author important matter to be mentioned. It appears, however, to have been concluded about 1084. Lambert's works are remarkable for purity of style and elegance of diction, as well as for learning and accuracy. Milman (Int. Christb, vii, 353) says that he occupies as a historian, "if not the first, nearly the first place in the chronological history." Hase (C.H.1, p. 182), however, thinks that Lambert was too little acquainted with the ways of the world to make a proper chronicler. Speaking of his German history, Hase says that it is "just such a picture of society as might be expected from a pious monk who had made a pilgrimage to the holy sepulchre, and looked out upon the world and his nation from the small stained window of his cell." In his allusions to the difficulties which occurred between the church and the state, and especially with ecclesiastical power, he shows a rare degree of impartiality, although necessarily yielding to some extent to the effects of his position as a monk, as well as of the troubles of the times. Some of his writings were translated into German by Hegewisch, and a whole volume of his works, with those of Reuchlin, edited by B. Balth. (Franck, 1831), also, more recently, by Hesse, in the Geschichtsyearbuch, deutscher Vorzeit, d. XI Jahrh. (Berlin, 1855, 6 vols.). See Frisch, Comparatio critica de Lambert. Sch. annulg., etc., Diss. inaug. Monachi (1830, 8vo); Stenzel, Fränkische Kaiser, 1, 438, ii, 101 sqq.; Fideriti, Comment. de Lamb. Schaff. (Hem, 1829, 4to).—Lambert, a man of great integrity and usefulness. His mind was superior and well stored with information, and his preaching eminently practical and full of the Holy Ghost. Many souls were converted through his labors.—Black River Conference Memo- rial, p. 128. (G. L. T.)

Lambert, Francis (generally known as Lambert of Aragon, the name of his native place), also called John Serranus, a French theologian, and one of the early apostles of the Reformation, was born in 1487. At the age of sixteen he became a Gray Friar, was then ordained priest, and preached for a while with great success. He soon, however, tired of the world, and, thinking to find peace of mind in stricter seclusion, he asked permission to join the Carthusians. Refused by his superiors, he left his order in 1522, and embraced the doctrines of Luther, whose writings he had secured and carefully studied. On a visit to Switzerland he was received by Sebastian de Monte Falconis, prince-bishop of Lausanne, and went to Berne and Zürich, where he had a public conference with Zwingli. He thereupon cast aside the dress of his order, took the name of John Serranus, and began preaching the reformed principles in the several cities of Switzerland and Germany. In 1522 he held public conferences at Einsamach, and was greatly instrumental in propagating the Reformation in Thuringia and Hesse. In January, 1523, he joined Luther at Wittenberg, where he wrote his commentaries on Hoses and other books. In 1524 he went to Metz, and afterwards to Aragon, where he remained until called to Hombourg by the landgrave, Philip of Hesse, in 1526. Here, in a synod held in October of the same year, he argued in Latin, and Adam Craton, or Crafft, in German, against the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church as defended by Nicholas Herborn and John Spott, and the latter were declared vanquished and driven out of Hesse. The convents were closed up, and their revenues employed to establish four hospitals and a Protestant academy at Marburg. Lambert became its first professor of theology. In 1529 he took part in the Conference of Marburg between the theologians of Switzerland, Saxony, Susbia, and other southern German provinces. He died April 18, 1530. All the writers of his time agree in calling him a learned, industrious, and upright man. His numerous works are now very scarce; among the most important are Commentarius in Evangelium Luz- (Wittenberg, 1528, 8vo; Nuremberg and Strasburg, 1525, 8vo; Frankfort, 1538, 8vo);—In Can. canonic. Sermo (Strasburg, 1524, 8vo);—De fidelium vocat. in regnum Christi, id est Ecclesiarem, etc. (Strasburg, 1525, 8vo);—Diss. theolog. et cons. contra constantinopolitan. prlications arranged into thirteen chapters, and which contain the whole theological system of the author;—In Jochelum prototyp. Lambert, George, a Presbyterian minister, was born Jan. 81, 1742, at Chelsea, England. In 1767 he became a student at the theological school under the charge of Rev. James Scott, at Heckmondwicke, England. He pursued his studies there for five years, and then accepted the charge of a church at Hull, April 9, 1769, where he continued his ministrations until his death, March 17, 1816. Mr. Lambert was a minister of more than ordinary power and success, attaching to himself by his intellectual vigor, moral worth, and Christian excellence, not only his own people, but also numerous members and ministers of other denominations. He published two volumes of his sermons, On various useful and important Subjects, adapted to the Family and the Closet. Lambert was one of the founding members of the Missionary Society, and preached his first anniversary sermon in May, 1786. See Morison, Missionary Fathers, p. 575 sq.

Lambert, Johann Heinrich, a noted German philosopher and mathematician, was born Aug. 29, 1726, at Mühlhausen, Absac, of a French Protestant family. His talents and application to study having gained him friends, he obtained a good education, making remarkable progress in mathematics, philosophy, and Oriental languages. In 1756-58 he visited Holland, France, and Italy, and while residing in the first-named country appeared in print with his Sur les propriétés des courbes géométriques de la même allure, etc. In 1764 Frederick the Great summoned him to Berlin, and made him a member both of the Council of Architecture and of the Academy of Sciences. He died in that city Sept. 25, 1777, leaving behind him the renown of having been the chief teacher of mathematics in mathematics, a metaphysic that the 18th century had produced. Lambert was the first to lay a scientific basis for the measurement of the intensity of light in his Pyrométrie (Augsburg, 1760), and discovered the theory of the speaking-tube. In philosophy, and particularly in analytical logic, he sought to establish an accurate system by bringing mathematics to bear upon these subjects, in his Neues Organon, oder Gedanken über die Erforschung und Beseitigung der Wahrm (Lpzg, 1764, 2 vols.) Of his other works, we may mention his profound Römische Briefe über die Einrichtung des Weltwesens (Augsb, 1761), and his correspondence with Kant. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxix, 151 sq.; Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.; Graf, Lambert's Leben (1829); Huber, Lambert nach u. Leben u. Werken (1829).

Lambert, John, an English reformer, lived in the reign of Henry the Eighth, and was for a time minister of Southwark. At Antwerp, where on his return to England he was charged with heresy because he rejected the dogmas of transubstantiation. He was tried before the king and bishops, and, upon refusing to recant, was burned at Smithfield, Nov. 20, 1558. Lambert was distinguished for his learning. He wrote Treatise on the Lord's Supper (edited by John Ball, London, 1586, 16mo)—Treatise on Prediction and Election (Canterbury, 1556, 8vo). See Burnet, Hist. of the Reformation, i, 406; Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1061.

Lambert, Joseph, a French ecclesiastic and moralist, was born in Paris in 1654. He took sacred orders when thirty years old, and flourished afterwards as prior of Saint-Martin-de-Palaiseau. He died January 81, 1722. Among his best works are L'Amie évangélique, ou histoires sur les Évangiles (Paris, 1683-1687, 1 vol; 1688, 2 vols; 1708, 2 vols; 1729, 2 vols, 12mo, and often). See, for a full list of his writings, Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxix, 150.

Lambert, Ralph, D.D., a prelate of the Church of England, lived in the latter part of the 18th century. He was successively dean of Down, and bishop of Dromore and of Meath. He is noted especially for his plea in 1675 for the Roman Catholic minister's right to celebrate marriage. Some of his Sermons were published in 1698, 1702, and 1708. The date of his death, or other particulars of his life, are not at hand.—Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1062; Reid, Hist. Irish Presb. Church, iii, 98.

Lambert, St. de, Charles, Françoise, marquise, a noted French poet, a contemporary and collaborator of Voltaire on the French Encyclopaedia, was born at Vizelle; in Lorraine, in 1716 or 1717. About 1750 he went to Paris, and soon found associates in Rousseau, Voltaire, Grimm, and other celebrated French intellectuals of Voltaire's day. He became especially celebrated by his 'Iliad,' A drawing of his production was actually owned by Voltaire and, finally, he was made a member of the French Academy. As a philosopher, however, he did not really appear before the public until 1779, when he published Les Princes des Mœurs chez toutes les nations, ou Cours de sociologie (1797-1800). He died Feb. 9, 1808. St. Lambert's personal history fully coincides with the doctrines he espoused. Ignoring all need of religion, his moeurs were truly Epicurean, and we need not wonder to find that his celebrity was first gained by the publication of his criminal intercourse with a woman, and the birth of an illegitimate child.

As to a more detailed description of St. Lambert's philosophical system, it may suffice to say here that it very much resembles that of Helvetius, whom St. Lambert slovishly followed. Thus he teaches, in treating of man's nature, and his duties with regard to human nature, that the only thing by which that first entered into his nature of life, is simply an organized and sentient mass, and that, whatever feelings or thoughts he may afterwards acquire, still they are simply different manifestations of the sensational faculty, occasioned by the pressure of his various wants and necessities. With regard to ethics, he maintains that, as man possesses only sensations, his sole good must be personal enjoyment, his only duty the attainment of it; and that, as we may be mistaken as to what objects are really adapted to promote our pleasure, the safest rule by which we can judge of duty in particular cases is public opinion." In his Cours d'Universel he divides the whole mass of man's duty into three classes—his duty to himself, to his own family, and to society at large; while the duties of religion are never mentioned, and the very name of God is altogether excluded. Condorcet's fundamental doctrine of ethics—the present perfectibility of mankind, both individually and socially, by means of education—St. Lambert proposed to substitute in place of the sanctions both of morality and religion, as the great regenerating principle of human nature (compare Morell, History of Modern Epicureanism, 1. 308). Lambraschini, Louis, an eminent Italian prelate and statesman, was born at Genoa May 16, 1776. Having entered the Order of Barnabites, he became bishop of Sabine, then archbishop of Genoa, was sent to France as papal nuncio during the reign of Charles X, and finally created cardinal Sept. 80, 1831. Pope Gregory XVI appointed him abbot of Santa Maria di Faris, secretary of state for foreign affairs, librarian of the Church, grand prior of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, grand chancellor of the order of St. Gregory, and prefect of the congregation of studies. Opposed to all innovations, Lambraschini took an active part in all the religious and political persecutions which marked the pontifical career of Gregory XVI, and became consequently very unpopular. In 1845 he surrendered the direction of public instruction to Cardinal Mezzofanti. On the death of Gregory XVI in 1846, Lambraschini came very near being elected pope. Plut IX appointed him member of the states council, and restored him to the secretarship and librarianship of the Vatican. In 1847 he was also made bishop of Porto and San Filippo and of Civita Vecchia, chancellor of the pontifical orders, and subdean of the sacred college. When the revolution broke out in Ita-Leuchte (Heb. Le'mekh, לֶמֶךְ, the other wise a vīg- avous youth, in paue Le'mekh, לֶמֶךְ; Septuag. and N. T. Ἁλύς; Josephus Ἀλύς, Ant. i, 2, 2), the name of two ancient patriarchs.

1. The fifth in descent from Cain, being the son of Methuselah, and father of Jabal, Jubal, Tubal-cain, and Naamah (Gen. iv, 18-24). B.C. cir. 3776. He is re- corded to have taken two wives, Adah and Zillah; and there appears no reason why the fact should have been mentioned, unless to point him out as the author of the evil practice of polygamy. The manner in which the sons of the woman of Adah ‘sinned before the Lord’ and the seven- teen useful arts mentioned under their several names (q.v.). The Targum of Jonathan (ad loc.) adds, that his daughter was ‘the mistress of sounds and songs’, i. e. the first poetess; which Jewish tradition embellishes by saying that all the world wondered after her, even the sons of God, and that evil spirits were born of her (Midrash on Ruth, and Zohar). Josephus (Ant. i, 2, 2) relates that the number of Lemekh’s sons was seventy-seven, and Jerome records the same tradition, adding that they were all cut off by the Deluge, and that this was the seventy-seventh vengence which Lemekh imprecated.

The most remarkable circumstance in connection with Lemekh is the poetical address which he is very abruptly introduced as making to his wives, being, indeed, the only example of antediluvian poetry extant (Gen. iv, 24):

Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
Wives of Lemekh, listen to my say!
For a man I slew for my wound,
Even a youth for my bruise:
If sevenfold Cain was to be avenged, Sevenfold Lemekh was to die.

It has all the appearance of an extract from an old poem, which we may suppose to have been handed down by tradition to the time of Moses. It is very difficult to discover what it refers, and the best explanation can be nothing more than a conjecture. It is the subject of a dissertation by Hilliger in Thesaurus Theologico-Philol. i, 141, and is discussed at length by the various commentators on Genesis. See also Hase, De Oraculo Lamechii (Brem. 1712); Schröder, De Lamechii homocidia (Marb. 1721). The following is a synopsis of ancient and modern opinions on this subject, (Rom. 260 [517], § 5) interprets Lamech’s words to mean that he had committed two murders, and that he deserved a much severer punish- ment than Cain, as having sinned after plainer warning; but adds, that some persons interpret the last lines of the poem as meaning that, whereas Cain’s sin increased, Lemekh’s decreased, and that because he had committed the punishment of the Deluge washing out the foulness of the world, so Lamech’s sin shall be followed in the seventy-seventy (see Luke iii, 29-38) generation by the coming of him who taketh away the sin of the world. Jerome (Ep. xxxvi, ad Basilium, t. i, p. 161) relates as a tradition of his predecessors and of the Jews that Cain was accidentally slain by Lamech in the seventh generation from Adam. This legend is told with fuller details by Jarchi. (See Kitto, Daily Bible Hist. ad loc.) According to him, the occasion of the poem was the offering of sevenfold vengeance to associate with him in conse- quence of his having killed Cain and Tubal-cain; Lam- mech, it is said, was blind, and was led about by Tubal-cain; when the latter saw in the thicket what he sup- posed to be a wild beast, Lamech, by his son’s direction, shot an arrow at it, and thus slew Cain; in alarm and indignation at the deed, he killed his son; hence his wives refused to associate with him; and he excuses himself as having acted without a vengeful or murci-ous purpose. Onkelos, followed by Pseudo-Jonathan, paraphrases it, ‘I have not slain a man that I should bear sin on his account.’ The Arab. Ver. (Swaddes) puts it in an interrogative form, ‘Have I slain a man?’ etc. Those two versions, which are substantially the same, are adopted by De Dieu and bishop Patrick. Aben- Ezra, Calvin, Drusius, and Cartwright interpret it in the future tense as a threat, ‘I will slay any man who wounds me.’ Luther considers the occasion of the poem to be the deliberate murder of Cain by Lamech. Light- foot (Jecus Chorog. Mar. p. 577, 585) considers Lamech as expressing remorse for having, as the first po-lygamist, introduced more destruction and murder than all the rest of mankind. This is the explanation found in a few Latin versions. Others regard Lemekh’s speech as a heaven-daring avowal of murder, in which he had himself received a slight wound. Some have even sought to identify Lemekh with the Asiatic deity Lemus or Lamech (see Movers, Phil. 477; Nork, Bibl. Mythol. i, 285). Herder, in his Hebrew Poetry, supposes that the haughty and revenge- ful Lamech, overjoyed by the invention of metallic weap- ons by his son Tubal-cain, breaks out in this triumphant song, boasting that if Cain, by the providence of God, was to be avenged sevenfold, he, by means of the newly-invented weapons, so much superior to anything of the kind known at that time, would be able to take a much heavier vengeance on those who had injured his father; and he adds this posthaste as to the occasion of the poem was partly anticipated by Hess, and has been received by Rosenmust- ler, Ewald, and Delitzsch. Pfeiffer (Diff. Script. loc. p. 25) collects different opinions up to his time with his usual diligence, and concludes that the poem is Lemekh’s declaration of himself to his wives, who were in terror for the possible consequences of his having slain two of the posteriority of Seth. This judicious view is substani-tially that of Lowth (De S. Pooi Heb. iv, 91) and Mi- chaelis, who think that Lamech is excusing himself for some murder committed by his son, in which he had concurred (‘for a wound inflicted on me’), and he opposes a homicidice of this nature to the wilful and inexcusable fratrici- de of Cain. Under this view Lamech would appear to have intended to comfort his wives by the assurance that he was really exposed to no danger; and that any cause which had taken up his life on the part of the friends of the deceased would not fail to bring down upon them the severest vengeance (compare Danie and Rose mustler, ad loc.; see also Turner’s Companion to Genesis, p. 209). ‘That he had slain a man, a young man (for the word of one clause is uncertain, but a more specific indication of the man in the other), and this not in cool blood, but in consequence of a wound or bruise he had himself received, is, if not the only possible, certainly the natural and obvious meaning of the words; and on the ground apparently of a difference between his case and that of Cain's—namely, that he had done under provocation what Cain had done without it. He assures himself of an interest in the divine guardianship and protection immeasurably greater than that granted to Cain. This speech was placed in the mouth of Lamech as language could well make it. But if it seems to imply, as it certainly does, that Lamech was not an offender after the type and measure of Cain, it at the same time shows how that branch of the human family were becoming familiar with strife and bloodshed, Cain. This speaks as though there were cause for presuming on the divine mercy and forbearance to brace themselves for its encounters, that they might repel force with force. The prelude already appears here of the terrible scenes which, after the lapse of a few generations, disclosed themselves far and wide—when the earth was filled with violence, and deeds were every day done which cried in the ear of heaven for vengeance. Such was the miserable result of the human art and the earthly resources brought into play by the Cainite race, and on which they proudly leaned for their ascendancy; nor is it too much to say that here also, even in respect to the poetic gift of nature, the beginning was prophetic of the end.” See Antidiluvians.

2. The seventh in descent from Seth, being the son of Methushelah, and father of several of whom, some of whom appointed a figure for Noah (Gen. 5:29; 1 Chron. 1:18; Luke ii, 86). B.C. 2897-2590. He was 182 years old at the birth of Noah, and survived that event 595 years, making his total age 777. His character appears to have been different from that of his Cainite namesake (see Deut. 26:23, the Talm. & Targ. J.; i Chron. 1:18). B.C. 2997-2590. He was 182 years old at the birth of Noah, and survived that event 595 years, making his total age 777. His character appears to have been different from that of his Cainite namesake (see Deut. 26:23, the Talm. & Targ. J.; i Chron. 1:18).

Chrysostom (Sermon, ix in Gen., and Hom. xxi in Gen.), perhaps thinking of the character of the other Lamech, speaks of this as an unrighteous man, though moved by a divine impulse to give a prophetic name to his son. Buttram and others, observing that the name of Lamech and Noah stand together in the list of Seth's, as well as of Cain's family, infer that the two lists are merely different versions or recensions of one original list—traces of two conflicting histories of the first human family. This theory is deservedly repudiated by Delitzsch on Gen. v.

Lamennais, Félicité Robert, Abbé de, a Roman Catholic theologian and philosopher, occupies a distinguished place in the ecclesiastical, political, and literary history of France of the 19th century. He was born of a noble family at St. Malo, in Bretaigue, June 6, 1782. In his boyhood, his clerical vocation to the Church of St. Thomas Aquinas was determined by the outbreak of the Revolution; he and his brother continued their studies together with singular independence. It is said that when only twelve years old he was able to read Livy and Plutarch with ease. In 1794, having been sent to live with an uncle, this relation, not knowing what to do with a wild boy, used to shut him up for whole days in a library consisting of two compartments, one of which, called 'Hell,' contained a large number of prohibited books, which little Robert was enjoined not to read. But the lad already cared for none but books of reflection, and finding something of profit in their teaching, that division became his favorite. Long hours were thus spent in reading the ancient pages of Rousseau, the thoughtful volumes of Malebranche, and other writers of sentiment and philosophy. Such a course of reading, far from producing its usual effects of precocious vanity and unbelief on so young a mind, served rather to ripen his judgment, and to develop that religious fervor which was a part of his nature (English Cyclopædia). He soon took a decided religious course, and, though offered a mercantile career by his father, chose the clerical profession. He entered upon the study of law, was made a member of the sacred of the office, he accepted in 1807 the position as teacher of mathematics in the college of his native place.

To promote practical piety, he published in 1808 a translation of the ascetic Guide Spirituel of Louis de Blois. In reference to the Concordat of Napoleon, he wrote Réflexions sur l'état de l'église en France pendant le dix-huitième siècle et sur la situation actuelle (1808). He here denounces the materialism propagated by the philosophers of the 18th century, bitterly deplores the apathy that accompanied this, and appealed to the hope from the beneficent influence of the Concordat, and declares the laws of religion and morality to be the supreme laws of life. The imperial censorship, however, detected a dangerous independent tendency in this work, especially in the demand for ecclesiastical synods and councils, and for the restoration of the Church. This was suppressed. After having received the clerical tonsure (in 1811), he published, in defence of the papal authority and against Napoleon, Tradition de l'église sur l'institution des évêques (Paris, 1814). From retirement in England, whither he had been obliged to flee during the Hundred Days, Lamennais returned to France (in 1816) in full sympathy with the Restoration, and entered more ardently than ever upon the work of disseminating his earlier opinions. He was ordained priest in 1817, and in this year began the publication of his Essai sur l'indifférence en matière de religion (Paris, 1817-1820, 4 vols.). This work, of which Lacordaire said that it caused its author to rise, in a single day, like a new Bossuet above the horizon, thoroughly aroused public attention to the author and his principles, attracting many readers by its style and subject. Numerous editions followed, and it was translated into many languages. The work belongs to the Catholic reactionary school of philosophy, to which Joseph de Maistre had given the leading impulse. The author first points out certain perilous tendencies of the age which seem to threaten another revolution, and notices the various systems of religious indifference. He next asserts the absolute importance of religion to the individual and the state. The inquiry concerning the ground of certainty in matters of religion is then met by postulating authoritv—that is, the consensual testimony of the Christian Church. This is found through many editions. The work belongs to the Catholic reactionary school of philosophy, to which Joseph de Maistre had given the leading impulse. The French Church was alarmed at so extreme a position, and disavowed its own champion. A Défence de l'Essai sur l'indifférence was issued by the author. In 1818 Lamennais joined hands for a brief period with certain Royalists in founding the "Conservateur," but afterwards, in sympathy with another coterie called the druyens blancs, his severity in writing against the management of the university invited the attention of the police authorities. In 1824 he was released from prison and was received with distinction by Pope Leo XII; he was also removed to the cardinalship, as he had previously declined a bishopric which had been urged upon him by the ministry at Paris. In La Religion considérée dans ses rapports avec l'ordre civil et politique (Paris, 1825-26, 2 vols.) he first began to exhibit that freedom of thought which was a part of his nature. He was set off with a fine flourish by the French Church. There is a manifest progagandism in the coming disturbance, of the breach between the hierarchical authority and the spirit of the times in his Progrès de la révolution et de la guerre contre l'Église (1829).

The July revolution completed, the Church must now be saved by bringing it into harmony with the demands of civil liberty, and to serve once more as an instrument of the Lamennais entered upon the second period of his career. With the co-operation of Lacordaire (q.v.) and Montalbemont (q.v.) he founded the journal L’Avenir, which had for its motto "God and Freedom," and for its guiding thought the Church that the latter can save itself from the ruin which awaits it political absolutism only by freeing itself from all relations with the state, and from the corruptions of hierarchical luxury, while it is to flourish only through the voluntary devotion of its adherents, and in harmony with laws which secure for the people freedom of education and worship. In this he maintained the doctrine enthusiastically believed that Rome would receive it. He was present at Rome in 1831 with Lacordaire and Montalbemont, and sought to win the representatives of the French, Russian, Austrian, and Prussian courts to his views. An audience was granted by the pope only on condition of silence concerning the matters agitated. When, however, Lacordaire had presented a scheme of these views in writing, the French bishops, on April 22, 1832, presented an unqualified opposition to them. A few extracts from an ecyclical letter of the bishops which was presented to the pope and published in the L’Avenir explain the peculiar position assumed by the writers of L’Avenir: “From this infectious source of indifferentism,” says the encyclical, “flows the absurd and erroneous maxim, or, rather, that madness, which insists in guarding the Church from any part of the spiritual and ministerial life which we cannot regard with too much horror, the liberty of the press to publish all sorts of writings, a liberty which some persons dare to demand and extol with so much noise and ardor.” A copy of it was sent with special explanations to Lamennais by cardinal Fesch, who urged him to send his submission to the authority he had himself so highly extolled, and, as if to make even more explicit the meaning of the ecyclical which he was the transmitter, added: “The doctrines of L’Avenir upon the liberty of worship and the Church’s own liberty, are in opposition to the teaching, the maxims, and the policy of the Church” (the italics are ours). They have exceedingly astonished and afflicted the holy father; for if, under certain circumstances, prudence compels us to tolerate them as lesser evils, such doctrines can never be held by people of the new school to be legitimate in any, or as things desirable. Strangely enough, as it must appear to Protestant ideas, the three editors of L’Avenir—Lamennais and his two younger coeditors, Lacordaire and Montalbemont—withdrew from the papal see, and, of course, to evince their sincerity, discontinued the publication of L’Avenir. But Lamennais having afterwards, in certain smaller articles, expressed himself in a spirit contrary to the views of the ecyclical, he received a letter from the pope on the subject, and thereupon, in a formal way, subscribed a submission, Dec. 11, 1833, at the palace of the archbishop of Paris. In the Afières de Rome (see below), however, he declared that this submission on his part had been made only for the sake of peace, and that, in truth, the welfare of the people must be considered before that of the Church. In 1834 Pius IX brooded appeared, which passed in 100 years through 100 editions, and was translated into many languages. In this work a new spirit is manifest. In earnest language the former and existing evils of society are deplored, while in a style of prophetic arder the future is anticipated. A new Christianity, based upon the principle of the New Testament, the rationalized democratic state is sought. A certain ideal external form was still Lamennais’ hope. He had idealized the Church, and would now seek a like panacea in a social reorganization (see Socialism). L’Avenir of 1834, Oct. 1681, p. 731. This work was severely condemned by a special decree of Gregory XVI, Aug. 7, 1884. In the Afières de Rome (Paris, 1836) Lamennais enters fully upon the final period of his life. He here breaks completely and irrevocably with the Church; declares the Roman hierarchy, of which he had long been the champion, to be incompatible with a true Christianity and a true humanism, and hereafter Lamennais was regarded by the Church authorities as an apostate. Like Luther, Ulrich von Hutten, and many other great men, Lamennais has been completely destroyed by the sight of the corruptions of Rome in her very stronghold. “His strong and clear vision saw in her but a corpse which was vain to attempt to resuscitate; a conglomerate religion made up of Christianity perverted by Jewish symbolism, and degraded and sensualized by Oriental and classical mythology and philosophy. Yet he hesitated long before he could make up his mind to deny his whole previous life, to forsake and repudiate what he had formerly defended, to become an antagonist of the Church of which he had formerly been the bulwark and the champion; and it required a year’s meditation and examination amid the torments of parental difficulty of La Chesnaye, before he resolved finally and forever to break with the Church of Rome. In a worldly point of view, he had everything to lose and nothing to gain by the course which he pursued, and it required no uncommon amount of courage on his part to act as he acted” (For. and Brit. Rev., Rev. Oct., 1883, p. 780). In 1837 he began to edit a daily journal, Le tiers du Peuple. His work, Le Pays et le Gouvernement (1840), was obnoxious to the authorities, and caused the author two years’ imprisonment and a fine of 2000 francs. The most important and elaborate work of the latter days of Lamennais is his Esquisse d’une Philosophie, in 4 volumes (Paris, 1840-46); a work eloquent and religious in tone, and exhibiting the author’s general philosophical conceptions in this later period of his life. Here the authoritative ground of certainty is found, not in the common testimony of mankind, but in the common reason. Philosophy is understood in a broad sense, having for its range the facts of general being; it is not merely a matter of psychology or metaphysics. The method of this philosophy is the assumption of certain primary ideas, from which all other ideas are derived. The principle of solute existence is not capable of proof, and in like manner God and the world are two fundamental assumptions. God has in his own essence necessity and variety. He is an eternal conscious Ego. He has the triune attributes of power, intelligence, and love, and ascribed in the Scripture last mentioned as the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. God has society within himself, is the type of all society, and the three attributes produce and explain the laws of whatever is outside of God. These attributes are recognised as controlling elements through every development of the philosophic system. Creation is not emanation, but the original divine ideas are made real by God’s free power. This is not Pantheism or Dualism. Matter arises under the mysterious power of God in the limitation of individuals. Properly speaking, matter is not a distinct entity; it is but a limitation of that which exists. Time and space, the forms of our existence, are the limitations of eternity and immensity, which are the modes of God’s existence. The nature of the universe is to be determined by the aid of the discourses of science, but the laws of its existence and of its forms are not the proper province of the intellectual being are determined by the application of the principles inherent in the three divine attributes. Man is the most elevated of the beings known to us. The great problem concerning man is the origin of moral evil. This is to be explained as a fall from the free moral agent into a state of attachment with God. Thus, although hurtful to the subject, the actuality of moral evil... does not introduce any positive disorder into the universe regarded as a realization of the divine ideas. The true purpose of man's life is to free himself from this state of isolation, of negation in self, and come into entire harmony with the divine will. The application of this system to the several faculties and pursuits of man is developed at length in the 'Religion.' Hope for the future thus lies in the development of the people. Religion and nature will issue in one when fully disclosed. Everything in the work seems to proceed from a religious, but no longer churchly stand-point.

Lamennais, on the whole, follows the line of universal religion. In the 'Cristiques et pensées diverses sur la Religion et la Philosophie' (Paris, 1841) gives the author's views on social questions. In place of the Church authority whose claims he formerly advocated, he would now have the democratic theocracy honored. This is in great measure a retraction of his work 'Sur l'indifférence en matière de Religion.' Of similar import is 'La Religion du passé et de l'avenir du Peuple' (1842). It is no longer the future of the Church of which he speaks, but of the people. His Church is now the religion of brotherly love, and he will have it rise upon the ruins of the old Church. Hope lies in the new Church, in the state.

Lamennais and Durens (1848), and Les ecclésiastes, traduction nouvelle avec des notes et des réflexions (1846), were issued professedly as a defence for the people against a mythological and superstitious credulity. Lamennais was greatly interested in the February Revolution; and his opposition to patriotism, his abhorrence of violence against the Church and religious interests. Gratitude for his services in this regard led to his election to the Assembly from the department of the Seine, and in his seat he always sided with the Left. He is said to have spoken but once, and that in opposition to the dictatorship of Cavaignac. He undertook the editorship, conjointly with Pascal Duprat, of the journal 'Le Peuple Constituant.' He was grieved by the violence of the Red Republicans, though still steadfast in his hope of the democracy; and was forced into retirement by the coup d'état, meeting with disappointment in this direction likewise. Nothing, however, availed to change the views he had in later years adopted, and the Church sought in vain, through the influence of relatives, to recall him to his faith on his dying bed. He died at Paris, in the Rue du Grand-Charron, Feb. 27, 1864. He had refused to see a minister, and was ordered that no formal ceremony should attend his burial. He wished his body to be placed in the cobbled walls of the poor, or pauper's hearse, and this direction was complied with. His remains were followed by a few friends, as Beranger and Thiers, and also by the police prohibition, by a large number of the people, who gathered at the cemetery of Pere la Chaise. No prayer was uttered, nor last word said, and the remains were placed in the common grave, without cross or stone to mark their resting-place. Lamennais was small of stature, though of attractive physiognomy; somewhat slow and hesitating in speech, with something of the Breton dialect; less able with his tongue than with his pen. His family had lost most of their property in the first Revolution, and he himself a large part of his own wealth through misplaced confidence. In later years he resided mostly on a small estate in Lachessaye, near Dinan, in Bretagne.

As a literary character, Lamennais occupied a prominent place in the revival of style under the Restoration. His era succeeds that of Chateaubriand, and corresponds with that of Madame de Staël and Joseph de Maistre. He was an earnest if not profound thinker, but especially brilliant as a writer. He had the culture of art combined with the vehemence of passion, though the latter element perhaps too often expressed itself in the manner of declamation. As a theorist in social philosophy he had a profound influence, and Benjamin Constant, who took his stand-point in individual liberty, while Lamennais set out from the assumption of a consenting unity in society and religion. It has been claimed that his steadfastness to this primary principle explains the variation of position which changed political circumstances seemed to necessitate, causing him to be at one time all for the Church, at another all for the people. There were, at all events, three distinct periods in his career, in the first of which he was Ultramontane, in the second he sought to mediate between the Church and the world, and in the third of which he claims to be the most prominent supporter of the democratic ideas, while at the last he cast off all churchly control, and became a chiliasm prophet of the democracy.

M. Guizot, in the second series of his Meditations on the Actual State of Christianity, thus portrays Lamennais: 'Lamennais reeled soldier but the same time the proudest worshipper of his own reason. Under the pressure of events without, and of an ardent controversy, a transformation took place in him, marked at once by its logical deductions and its moral inconsistency; he changed his camp without changing his principles; in the attempt to preserve the supreme authority of his Church to admit his principles he had failed; and from that instant the very spirit of revolt that he had so severely rebuked broke loose in his soul and in his writings, finding expression at one time in an indignation full of righteous appeal, at another in a tender sympathy for the miseries of humanity. The Words of a Believer are the eloquent outburst of this tumult in his soul. Plunged in the chaos of sentiments the most contradictory, and yet claiming to be always true, he came forth from the tempest in the state the most bated of democrats, and in the Church the haughtiest of rebels. It is not without sorrow that I thus express my unreserved opinion of a man of superior talent—mind lofty, soul intense; a man in the sequel profusely had himself, although haughty in his very fall. One cannot read in their stormy success the numerous writings of the abbe de Lamennais without recognising in them traces, I will not say of his intellectual perplexities—his pride did not feel them—but of the sufferings of his soul, whether for good or for evil. His was a noble nature, but full of exaggeration in his opinions, of fanatical arrogance, and of angry acerbity in his polemics. One title to our gratitude remains to the abbe de Lamennais—he thundered to purpose against the gross and vulgar forgetfulness of the great moral interests of humanity. His essay on indifference in religious questions is an emphatic rule laid upon that vice of the time, and recalled men's souls to regions above. And thus it was, too, that he rendered service to the great movement and awakening of Christians in the 19th century, and that he merits his place in that movement. His predecessor, Bossuet, had been demanding the liberty of the press; Lamennais was demanding the national church. One of Lamennais' last and most earnest injunctions was that certain papers, which contained his latest sentiments, should be published without alteration or suppression; but the religious advisers of his niece (who was also his housekeeper) so far wrought on her susceptibility as to cause her to refuse to give up the papers to the persons whom Lamennais had authorized to superintend their publication. The matter was in consequence brought before the proper legal tribunal, when the judges directed (August, 1856) that the papers should be handed over to the publishers in the publication in that movement.

The first edition of Lamennais' collected works was published under the title 'Œuvres complètes' (Paris, 1886—87, 12 vols. 8vo). Several editions have appeared since. See Pagnanel, Examen critique des Opinions de l'Abbé de Lamennais (2d edit., 1823, 2 vols. 8vo); H. Lacordaire, Considérations sur le Système commun de M. de Lamennais (1843, 4vo); E. LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF

The opinion just mentioned, that the book of Lamentations was written prophetically in view of the desolation of Jerusalem, and belongs to the class of prophetic kinsht, as intended to describe that event prophetically, is an ancient opinion, held and defended by critics of no mean reputation, is not now so generally entertained as formerly. The prophetic laments are usually very brief; or, if they be more than a few verses long, they tend to pass into distinct prophecy, and rarely keep up to the close their character as lamentes (Ezek. xxvii, 27, etc.). Perhaps the most perfect example is the lament in Ezek. xxxvii, 12-19; but even there we meet with a "Thus saith the Lord" (ver. 19). It is therefore strange factse, improvements on what are analogues composed that are lengthened and elaborated as the book of Lamentations should bear a distinctly prophetical character; though, on the other hand, its assumed prophetical character might be said to justify this extended wall. Moreover, in the book itself there is not the slightest indication that it does bear such a character; and the most ancient tradition—that contained in the Sept.—gives it to be a historical foundation. It is, indeed, an old conjecture, that the book of Lamentations is identical with the lament which Jeremiah composed on the death of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv, 25); and the main or only part is inconsistent with the fact that throughout the entire book there is not a single allusion to the death of Josiah. Only once is mention made of the king, "the anointed of the Lord" (iv, 20), and the reference is evidently not to Josiah. See LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF.

LAMENTATIONS, Book of, one of the books of the O. T. commonly assigned to Jeremiah, and consisting of a remarkable series of threatenings. In many respects it is peculiar and almost unique in the sacred canon. See Bulk.

I. Title.—The Hebrew name of this book, פַּלְמַתְא, is, as in the case of the five books of Moses, from the Hebrew word with which it opens, and which appears to have been almost a received formula for the commencement of a song of wailing (compare 2 Sam. i, 18-27). The Rabbins remark upon this title, "Three prophets have used the word פַּלְמַתְא with reference to Israel: Moses, Isaiah, and Jeremiah. To what are they to be likened?" To three bridesmen (מִפְּרָשָׁהוֹ) who have seen the afterwards widowed wife in three different stages. The first has seen her in her opulence and her pride, and he said, "Oh, how shall I bear along your overbearing and your strike?" (Deut. i, 2). The second has seen her in her dissipation and dissolution, and he said, "Oh, how has she become a harlot?" (Isa. i, 10). And the third has seen her in her utter desolation, and he said, "Oh, how does she sit solitary!" (Lam. i, 1) (Introduction to Echa Rabath). Later Jewish writers usually designate the book by the more descriptive title פַּלְמַתְא, קִנָּה, "lamentations"=dirge, a term which they found in Jer. vii, 29; ix, 10, 20; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 25, and which already had probably been applied familiarly to the book itself. See LAMENT.

The Septuagint translators found themselves obliged, as in the other cases referred to, to substitute a title more significant and more adapted, Spinoza [Laparo] as the equivalent of the latter Hebrew term. The Vulgate gives the Greek word, and explains it (Thomei, id est, Lamentations Jeremiae Prophetae). Luther and the A. V. have given the translated title only, as "Klagelied" and "Lamentationes" respectively.

II. Postface.—In the former Hebrew Bible the book of Lamentations stands in the Hexapla (Kethubim) between Ruth and Ecclesiastes. The Jews believe that it was not written by the gift of prophecy, but by the Spirit of God (between which they make a distinction), and give this as a reason for not placing it among the prophets. It is an arrangement, adapted for use, and reproduced in some editions, as in the Bomberg Bible of 1521, it stands among the five Megilloth after

The only other passage in which פַּלְמַתְא, or its cognate verb פָּלַת (kômôn), is found, is Ezek. li, 10, where we read of a "roll of a book," פָּלַת פָּרָשָׁהוֹ (megillath sepher), being spread out before the prophet; and there was written therein lamentations, פָּלַת (kînîm), and mourning, and woe. It is a remarkable coincidence, but probably nothing more, that immediately before the book of Ezekiel there stands in most of the versions of the Hebrew Scriptures a פָּלַת, or roll, which answers quite to this description. Those who regard the book of Lamentations as belonging to the class of prophetic laments might probably find in this coincidence a confirmation of their view.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF

The books of Moses, or books of Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, and Solomon's Song. This position of the book probably had a liturgical origin, as it is read in their synagogues on the ninth of the month Ab, which is a fast day. In the holy days of the ancient Hebraic and Greek books in Hebrew copy, however, this book is supposed to have occupied the place which is now assigned to it in most versions, namely, after Jeremiah. Indeed, from the manner in which Josephus reckons up the books of the Old Testament (Contra Apion. i. 4), it has been supposed that Jeremiah and it originally formed but one book (Pridieus, Connection, i. 332). The Septuagint groups the writings connected with the name of Jeremiah together, but the book of Baruch comes between the prophecy and the Lamentation. On the hypothesis of some critics, it was originally a production annexed to the poem, and not the conclusion of the prophecy, and that the preface of the Sept. (which is not found either in the Hebrew or in the Targum of Jonathan) was inserted to diminish the abruptness occasioned by this separation of the book from that with which it had been originally connected, it would follow that the arrangement of the Vulg. and the A. V. corresponds more closely than any other to that which we must look upon as the original one.

III. Forms.
The structure of this book is peculiarly artistic, being strictly poetical, and in many portions acrostic.

(1.) Ch. i., ii., and iv contain 22 verses each, arranged in alphabetical order, each verse falling into three nearly balanced clauses (Ewald, Poet. Rhet., p. 147); i. 19 forms an exception, as having a fourth clause, the result of an interpolation, as if the writer had shaken off for a moment the restraint of his self-imposed law. Possibly the inversion of the usual order of Z and B in ch. ii., iii., iv. may have arisen from a like forgetfulness. Gruter (ad loc.) explains it on the assumption that here Jeremiah followed the order of the Chaldaean alphabet. Similar anomalies occur in Ps. xcvii., and have received a like explanation (De Wette, Ps. i. 52). It is, however, a mere hypothesis that the Chaldaean alphabet differed in this respect from the Hebrew; nor is it easy to see why Jeremiah should have chosen the Hebrew order for one poem, and the Chaldaean for the other.

(2.) Ch. iii. contains three short verses under each letter of the alphabet, the initial letter being three times repeated.

(3.) Ch. v contains the same number of verses as ch. i., ii., iv, but without the alphabetical order. The thought suggests itself to illustrate verses where the book closes may have carried the writer beyond the limits within which he had previously confined himself; but the conjecture of (Ewald) that we have here, as in Ps. xvi. and x, the rough draft of what was intended to have been finished afterwards in the same manner as the others, is at least a probable one.

IV. Author.-The poems included in this collection appear in the Hebrew canon with no name attached to them, and there is no direct external evidence that they were written by the prophet Jeremiah earlier than the date given in the prefatory verse which appears in the Septuagint, which is as follows: "And it came to pass, after Israel had been carried away captive, and Jerusalem had been desolate, that Jeremiah satweeping, and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said." This has been copied into the Arabic and Vulgate versions; but as it does not exist in the Hebrew, Chaldee, or Syriac, it was regarded by Jerome as spurious, and is not admitted into his version. This represents, however, the established belief of the Jews after the completion of the canon. The Talmud, and ancient of the earliest traditions, has: "Jeremiah wrote his book, the book of Kings, and the Lamentations" (Raba Bathra, 15, a.). Later Jewish writers are equally explicit (Ezra Robb, introd.). Josephus (Ant. iii. 5, 1) follows, as far as the question of authorship is concerned, in the same track, and the absence of any tradition or probable con- jecture to the contrary leaves the concensus of critics and commentators almost undisturbed. (See below.) An agreement among the last critics might be expected, on strong internal evidence. The poem belongs unmistakably to the last days of the kingdom or the commencement of the exile. They are written by one who speaks, with the vividness and intensity of an eye-witness, of the misery which he beholds. It might almost be enough to ask who else besides him could have written with that union of strong passionate feeling and entire submission to Jehovah which characterizes both the Lamentations and the Prophecy of Jeremiah. The evidences of identity are, however, stronger and more minute. In both we meet, once and again, with the picture of the "Virgin-daughter of Zion" sitting down in her shame and misery (Lam. i. 15; ii. 13; Jer. xiv. 17). In both there is the same vehement outpouring of sorrow. The prophet's eye's flow down with tears (Lam. i. 16; ii. 11; iii. 48, 49; Jer. ix. i.; xxii. 17; xiv. 17). The sufferer appeals for vengeance to the righteous Judge (Lam. iii. 46-64; Jer. xxvi. 19). The prophet is as the rival nation that was to fall in the fall of Jerusalem prepare for a like desolation (Lam. iv. 21; Jer. xii. 12). The personal references to Jeremiah's own fate, such as we know it from his book of Prophecies and Kings, are not wanting (comp. Lam. ii. 11, and iii. with Jer. xv. 15 sq.; xvii. 13 sq.; xx. 7; Lam. iii. 14 with Jer. xxx. 7; iii. 61-66 with Jer. xxix. 18; v. 17-20). As in the Prophecies, so here, the iniquities of the people are given as the cause of the exile and the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple (compare i. 5, 8, 14, 22; iii. 5, 9, 42; iv. 6, 22; v. 16 with Jer. xxii. 22-26; xiv. 7; xvii. 12). We trust in false prophets and iniquitous priests their relying on the safety of Jerusalem, and on the aid of powerless and treacherous allies, etc. What is more, his poetical and prophetical individuality pervades the whole so unmistakably that it seems hardly necessary to refer to the numerous allusions passed upon by Bertholdt, Keil, De Wette, John, Bleek, and others. If contents, spirit, manner, individuality, are any guarantee at all, then Jeremiah is the author, and sole author of the book before us. He even seems to refer to his other book (comp. ii. 14; Jer. xiv. 18). But were any further proof needed of the writer's genius and very deep and phrased common to both works, and peculiar to them alone (comp. above, Lam. i. 11, and Jer. vi. 14, and viii. 11; see Psalm Lxxix., Lam. iii. 47, and Jer. xxiv. 17; xlviii. 43; יֵבָנָה יִבָּנָה יִבָּנָה יִבָּנָה, Lam. ii. 11, and Jer. vi. 14, and viii. 11; see Psalm Lxxxix., Lam. ii. 25, and Jer. vi. 25, and frequently the very frequent use of יֵבָנָה יֵבָנָה יֵבָנָה יֵבָנָה, יֵבָנָה יֵבָנָה יֵבָנָה יֵבָנָה, יֵבָנָה, יֵבָנָה in both; phrases like "I became a mockery all day long," Lam. iii. 14, and Jer. xx. 7, etc.: the use of the parag, and other grammatical peculiarities. See Keil, Einl. in die A. T. 7. § 129).

The only exceptions to this unanimity of opinion as to the authorship of Lamentations are Harriet, who, for reasons of his own, ascribed the five different elegies to Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, and king Dey-ga respectively, and, in his own time, Cotel. The last holds that only Lam. ii. and iv belong to Jeremiah (the former writer in Palestine, the latter in Egypt), the three others, however, having been written by Jeremiah's contemporaries and disciples. His reasons for this assumption are that these elegies have treated the same subject five times; that ii and iv are different from i, iii, v, which are less worthy of Jeremiah's pen; that the three latter do not quite fit Jeremiah's own circumstances; and, finally, because there is a difference in the alphabetical structure (see above) of i and ii. iv. These objections to Jeremiah's exclusive authorship seem about as tenable as Hard's Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, and consorts. The first two points are not worth consideration; the third is answered by the simple proposition that they are poems, and as a historical narrative which we have supposed, and there is a certain likelihood, be given to the poet in the use of broad similes in his generalizing, and in his putting himself sometimes in the place of the whole people as its spokesman and chief mourner. And, finally, the structure differs in i from ii and iv, then it may as well be said that this is as trustworthy as most of the other legends of the time of Helena. He may have written it immediately after the attack was over, or when he was with Gedaliah at Mizpeh, or when he was with his countrymen at Tahpanhes. Pareau refers ch.i to Jer.xxxvii, 3 sq.; ch.ii to Jer.xxxviii, 2 sq.; ch. iv to Jer.xxxvi, 1 sq. and 2 Kings xxv, 1 sq.; ch. ii to the destruction of the city and Temple; ch. v is admitted to be the latest in order, and to refer to the time after that event. Ewald says that the situation is the same throughout, and only the time different. "In chaps. i and ii we find sorrow without composure; in ch. iii the constancy of the poet is struck; in ch. iv the lamentation is renewed with greater violence; but soon the whole people, as if urged by their own spontaneous impulse, fell to weeping and hoping" (Die Prophetischen Bücher). De Wette describes the Lamentations somewhat cursorily, as "five songs relating to the destruction of Jerusalem and its Temple (ch. i, ii, iv, v), and to the unhappy lot of the poet himself (chap. iii). The historical relation of the whole cannot be doubted; but yet there seems a gradual ascent in describing the condition of the city" (Eberm.)

There can hardly be any doubt, however, as to the time to which these chronicles refer. A brief glance at the corresponding portions in the books of Kings and Chronicles affords decisive evidence that they speak, one and all, of the whole period from the beginning of the last siege by Nebuchadnezzar to its terrible end. This has also, from the Sept. and the Midrash downwards, been the almost unanimous opinion of investigators (Carpzov, Eichhorn, Jahn, Bertholdt, Bormelius, Horner, Klieger, Pareau, etc.). It would seem to be equally clear that these poems belong, broadly speaking, to no particular phase of the great epoch of terror, but that, written probably within a very brief space of time (more especially does this appear to be the case with the first four), they portray indiscriminately some woeful scene that presented itself "at the head of every street," or gives us a general representation of the whole terror, misery, despair, hope, prayer, revenge, as these in vehement succession swept over the poet's soul.

Yet it has been suggested (and the text has been strained to the utmost to prove it) that the successive elegies are the pictures of successive events portrayed in song; that, in fact, the Lamentations are a descriptively—tragedy—a drama in which, scene after scene, the onward march of dread fate is described, interspersed with plaints, reflections, prayers, consolations, such as the chorus would utter in grave and measured rhythms, accompanied by the sighs and tears to which the spectators would be moved by the irredeemably doomed heroes and actors. Thus, for instance, it has been maintained that the first chapter speaks of Jehoiachin's capture and exile (Horner, Jahn, Klieger, etc.,) upon which there is this to be observed, that a mere glance at 1 Kings xiv, 17 shows that the elegies are described in this first elegy (famine, slaughter of youths, etc.) do not in the least agree with the time and circumstances of Jehoiachin, while they do exactly correspond with the following chapter of Kings, in which the reign under Zedekiah, with all its accompaniments, the downfall of the city and empire, are related with the severe calmness of the historian, or the dry minimum of the annalist. Neither can we, for our own part, see that "gradual change in the state of the city" which de Wette sees in the consecutive chapters; nor can we trace the gradual progress in the mind of the people—that is, in the first two chapters, heaviest, forevery incon- solable grief; in the third, the turning-point (the clas- sical propriety); in the fourth and fifth, the mind that gradually collects of finding itself in a new position with a new prayer—which is Ewald's ingenious suggestion, to which Keil assents, as far as "a general inner progress of the poems" goes. To our, and, we take it, to every unbiased view, each of the elegies is complete, as far as it goes, in itself, all treating the same, or almost the same, or the most similar, themes in every main respect, they might, to a certain degree, be likened to the "In Memoriam" and the second movement of the "Eroica"—the highest things to which we can at all compare them in the varied realms of song. The gen- eral state of the nation, as well as of the poet, seems much different from the first to the last, or, at all events, the fourth poem. It would certainly appear, moreover, as if, so far from forming a consistent and progressive whole, consciously leading onward to harmony and su- preme peace, they had not even been composed in the order in which they are before us now. Thus, e.g., the fourth chapter is certainly more akin to the second than to the third. Accident, more than a settled plan, must have placed them in their present order. But the his- tory of this collection and redaction is one so obscure that we will not even venture on a new speculation con- cerning it.

VI. Contents.—The book is a collection of five elegies sung on the ruins of Zion; and the fall of Judas, the de- struction of the sanctuary, the exile of the people, and all the threats of sword, fire, and famine in the city of Jerusalem, are the principal themes upon which they turn in many varied strains. We may regard the first two chapters as occupied chiefly with the circumstances of the siege, and those immediately following that event: in the third the prophet deplores the calamities and persecutions to which he was himself exposed; the fourth refers to the ruin and desolation of the city, and the unhappy lot of Zebediah; and the fifth and last seems to be a sort of prayer in the name, or on behalf, of the Jews in their dispersion and captivity. More particularly,

1. Chap. i. The opening verse strikes the key-note of the whole poem. That which haunts the prophet's mind is the solitude in which he finds himself. She that was "princess among the nations" (1) sits (like the judea capit tailor) of the Roman medals), "solitary," "as a widow." Her "lovers" (the nations with whom she had been linked, 2) have deserted her (1); she has entered into the sanctuary, and mock at her Sabbaths (7, 10). After the manner so characteristic of Hebrew poetry, the personality of the writer recedes and now advances, and blends by hardly perceptible transi- tions with that of the city which he personifies, and with which he, as it were, identifies himself. At one time it is the daughter of Zion that asks, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?" (12). At another, it is the prophet who looks on her, and portrays her "spreading forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her" (17). Mingling with this outburst of woe there are two thoughts characteristic both of the man and the time. The calamities which the nation suffers are the consequences of its sins. There must be the confession of those sins: "The Lord is righteous, for I have rebelled against his commandment" (18). There is, however, this gleam of consolation that Judah is not alone in her sufferings. Those who have exulted in her destruction shall drink of the same cup. They shall be like unto her in the day that the Lord shall call (21).

2. Chap. ii. As the solitude of the city was the sub- ject of the first lamentation, so the destruction is here laid waste is that which is most conspicuous in the second. Jehovah had thrown down in his wrath the stronghold of the daughter of Judah (2). The rampart and the wall lament together (8). The walls of the palace are given up into the hand of the enemy (7). The breach is great, as if made by the rushing of the sea (18). With this there had been united all the horrors of the famine and the assault—young children fainting for hunger in the top of every street (19); women eating their own children that they might not die of famine (19); the body of the city laid waste (22); and the city of the tribes imitated by the city of the nations (23). With this there had been ingrafted the horrid instances of banishment (14). A righteous judgment had fallen on them. The prophets found no vision of Jehovah (9). The king and the princes who had listened to them were captive among the Gentiles.

3. Chap. iii. It is the different structure of the poem, which has already been noticed, indicates a corre- sponding difference in its substance. In the two pre- ceding poems Jehovah had spoken of the misery and destruction of Jerusalem. In the third he speaks chief- ly, though not exclusively, of his own. He himself is the suffering one. The miseries of the city are brought into darkness and not into light (2). He looks back upon the long life of suffering which he has been called on to endure, the scorn and derision of the people, the bitterness as of one drunk with wormwood (14, 15). But his suffering was not one of abject misery in darkness and despair. Here, as in the prophecies, we find a Gospel for the weary and heavy-laden, a trust, not to be shaken, in the mercy and righteousness of Jeho- vah. The mercies of the Lord are new every morning (22, 29). He is good to them that wait for him (29). The retrospect of that sharp experience showed him that it all formed part of the discipline which was in- tended to lead him on to a higher blessedness. It was good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth, good that he should both hope and quietly wait (26, 27). With this, equally characteristic of the prophet's individual- ity, there is the protest against the wrong which had been or might hereafter be committed by rulers and princes (34-36), the confession that all that had come on him and his people was but a righteous retribution, to be acceptable humbly, with searchings of heart, and repentance (38-42). The closing verses may refer to that special epoch in the prophet's life when his own sufferings had been sharpest (58-56), and the cruelties of his enemies most triumphant. If so, we can enter more fully, remembering this, into the thanksgiving with which he acknowledges the help, deliverance, and companionship which he had found in God (57, 58).

Feeling sure, that at some time or other, there would be for him a yet higher lesson, we can enter with some measure of sympathy even into the terrible earnestness of his appeal from the unjust judgment of earth to the righteous Judge, into his cry for a retribution without which it seemed to him that the Eternal Righteousness would fail (64-66).

4. Chap. iv. It might seem, at first, as if the fourth poem did but reproduce the pictures and the thoughts of the first and second. There come before us once more the famine, the misery, the desolation that had fallen on the holy city, making all faces gather black- ness. One new element in the picture is found in the contrast between the past glory of the consecrated fam- ilies of kingly and priestly stock (A. Vers. "Nazarenes"), and their later misery and dereliction. So long as there are, however, not without interest in their relation to the poet's own life and to the history of his time. All the facts gain a new significance by being seen in the light of the personal experience of the third poem. The declaration that all this had came "for the sins of the house of Israel, and the iniquities of the house of Judah that they had laid waste is that which is most conspicuous in the second. Jehovah had thrown down in his wrath the stronghold of the daughter of Judah (2). The rampart Chaldaean (verse 20). The closing words indicate the strength of that feeling against the Edomites which later forces itself upon the old prophet. As this verse, the daughter of Zion, had rejoined in the fall of her rival, and had pressed on the work of destruction. But for her, too, there was the doom of being drunken with the cup of the Lord's wrath. For the daughter of Zion there was hope of pardon when discipline should have done its work, and the punishment of her iniquity should be accomplished.

& Chap. v. One great difference in the fifth and last section of the poem has already been pointed out. It obviously indicates either a deliberate abandonment of the alphabet or the unfitness of the author of the concluding elegy. The title prefixed in the Vulgate, "Oraatio Jeremia Prophetae," points to one marked characteristic which may have occasioned this difference. There are signs also of a later date than that of the preceding poems. Though the horrors of the families are ineffective, yet that which he has before him is rather the continued, protracted suffering of the rule of the Chaldaean. The mountain of Zion is desolate, and the foxes walk on it (ver. 18). Slaves have ruled over the people of Jehovah (ver. 8). Women have been subjected to intolerable outrages (verse 11). The young men have been taken into captivity (verse 11), and the people have fallen under the wood (verse 18). But in this also, as deep as might be the humiliation, there was hope, even as there had been in the dark hours of the prophet's own life. He and his people are sustained by the old thought which he had been so much in the habit of expressing that it seemed to be a part of his very nature. "Turn thee, O Lord, and let us be renewed. Renew our days as of old" (ver. 21). That which had begun with wailing and weeping ends (following Ewald's and Michaelis's translation) with the question of hope: "Wilt thou utterly reject us? Wilt thou be very wroth against us?"

VII. General Character.—1. It is well to be reminded by the above survey that we have before us, not a book in five chapters, but five separate poems, each complete in itself, and of a different subject, and the same time under a plan which includes them all. It is clear, before entering on any other characteristics, that we find, in full predominance, that strong personal emotion which mingled itself, in greater or less measure, with the character of Jeremiah's work. There is here no "word of Jehovah," no direct message to a sinful people. The man speaks out of the fulness of his heart, and, though a higher Spirit than his own helps him to give utterance to his sorrows, it is yet the language of a sufferer rather than of a teacher. There is this need of truth in the technical classification which placed the Lamentations among the Hagiography of the Hebrew Canon, in the feeling which led the Rabbinic writers (Kisch, Prof. in Psalms,) to say that they and the other books of that group were written in- cluded by the help of the Holy Spirit, but not with the special gift of prophecy.

2. Other differences between the two books that bear the prophet's name grew out of this. Here there is more attention to form, more elaboration. The rhythm is more uniform than in the prophecies. A complicated scheme or structure is also apparent in this book. It will be remembered that this acrostic form of writing was not peculiar to Jeremiah. Whatever its origin, whether it had been adopted as a help to the memory, and so fitted especially for didactic psalms, or for such as was to be sung by great bodies of people (Lowth, Frail, xxiii), it had been received, and it will seem para- digm, framework for poems of very different characters, and extending probably over a considerable period of time. The 119th Psalm is the great monument which forces itself upon the mind of the author of the Lamentations. A moment from the 25th, 34th, 37th, 111th, 112th, 145th—and in the singularly beautiful fragment appended to the book of Prov- erbs (Prov. xxxi, 10—31). Traces of it, as if the work had been left half finished (De Wette, Psalms, ad loc.), appear in the 9th and 10th. In the Lamentations (con- fining ourselves for the present to the structure) we meet with some remarkable peculiarities.

It has to be remembered, too, that in thus speaking the writer was doing what many must have looked for from him, and so meeting at once their expectations and their warnings. Other prophets and poets had made themselves the spokesmen of the nation and its interest on the death of kings and heroes. The party that continued faithful to the policy and principles of Josiah remembered how the prophet had lamented over his death. The lamentations of that period (though they are lost to us) had been accepted as a great national dirge. Was he to be silent now that a more terrible calamity had fallen upon the people? Did not the exiles in Babylon need this form of consolation? Does not the appearance of this book in their canon of sacred writings, after their return from exile, indicate that their captivity they had found this consolation in it?

The choice of a structure so artificial as that which has been described above may at first sight appear inconsistent with the deep, intense sorrow of which it is composed. How could it be otherwise with a people who exerted their passions in a noble rhythm would seem to us to have been a fitter form of expression. It would belong, however, to a very shallow and hasty criticism to pass this judgment. A man true to the gift he has received will welcome the discipline of self-imposed rules for deep sorrow as well as for other strong emotions. In proportion as he is afraid of being carried away by the strong current of feeling will he be anxious to make the laws more difficult, the discipline more effectual. Something of this kind is trace- able in the fact that so many of the master-minds of European literature have chosen—as the fit vehicle for their deepest, tenderest, most impassioned thoughts—the complicated structure of the sonnet; in Dante's se- lection of the terza rima for his vision of the unseen world. What the sonnet was to Petrarch and Milton, that the alphabetic verse-system was to the writers of itself. Jeremiah's time, must be accepted as one of the forms of poetry, and yet one in which (assuming the earlier date of some of the Psalms above referred to) some of the noblest thoughts of that poetry had been uttered. We need not wonder that he should have em- ployed it, as it fitter than any other for the purpose for which he could use it. If the Lamentations are intended to assuage the bitterness of the Babylonian exile, there was, besides this, the subsidiary advantage that it supplied the memory with an artificial help. Hymns and poems of this kind, once learned, are not easily forgotten, and the circumstances in which they are used, more than ever, necessary that they should have this help afforded them.

De Wette maintains (Comment. über die Psalms, p. 86) that this acrostic form of writing was the outgrowth of a feeble and degenerate age dwelling on the outer structure of poetry, when the soul had departed. His judg- ment as to the origin and character of the alphabetic form is shared by Ewald (Petr. Büch. i, 140). That this is often the case cannot be doubted; the 119th Psalm is a case in point. It is hard, however, to reconcile this sweeping estimate with the importance of this book, and the fact, moreover, that such Psalms as the 25th and 34th: and Ewald himself, in his translation of the Alphabetic Psalms and the Lamentations, has shown how compatible such a structure is with the highest energy and beauty. With some of these, too, it must be added, the assignment of a later date than that assigned by David, and based on the supposition that the acrostic structure is itself a proof of it
LAMINATIONS, BOOK OF 218 LAMINATIONS, BOOK OF

De Wette, however, allows, condescendingly, that the Lamentations, in spite of their degenerate taste, "have some merit in their way." Other critics have been more enthusiastic in their admiration of this book. Dr. Blayney remarks, "We cannot too much admire the flow of that full and graceful pathetic eloquence in which the author pours out his effusions of a pietistic heart, and piously weeps over the ruin of his venerable country" (Jeremiah, p. 876). "Never," says an unquestionable judge of these matters, "was there a more rich and elegant variety of beautiful images and adjuncts arising to express themselves, than out of the mournful figures, those not only from the strained and pained strains not felt to be tedious repetitions, but the reader is captivated by the plaintive melancholy which pervades the whole."

3. The power of entering into the spirit and meaning of poems such as these depends, on two distinct conditions, as has been sought to see, as with his eyes, the desolation, misery, confusion, which came before those of the prophet. We must endeavor also to feel as he felt when he looked on them. The last is the more difficult of the two. Jeremiah was not merely a patriot-poet, weeping over the ruin of his country, and all his prophetic feeling was not other than that of a prophet who had seen all this coming, and had foretold it as inevitable. He had urged submission to the Chaldaeans as the only mode of diminishing the terror of that "day of the Lord." And now the Chaldaeans had come, irritated by the perfidy and rebellion of the king and princes of Judah; and the actual horrors that he saw, surpassed, though he had predicted them, all that he had been able to imagine. All feeling of exultation in which, as a mere prophet of evil, he might have indulged at the fulfillment of his forebodings, was swallowed up in the overwhelming sorrow. Yet sorrow, not less than other emotions, works more work than it can make, according to its characters, and a man with Jeremiah's gifts of utterance could not sit down in the mere silence and stupor of a hopeless grief. He was compelled to give expression to that which was devouring his heart and the hearts of all the people. The act was given as a relief to him. It led him on (as has been seen above) to a calmer and seerener state. It revived the faith and hope which had been nearly crushed out.

4. There are, perhaps, few portions of the O.T. which appear to have done the work they were meant to do more effectively than this. It has presented but scanty materials for the systems and controversies of theology. It has supplied thousands with the fullest utterance for their sorrows in the critical periods of national or individual suffering. We may well believe that it soothed the weary years of the Babylonian exile (comp. Zech. i. 6 with Lam. ii. 17). When the Jews returned to their own land, and the desolation of Jerusalem was remembered as belonging only to the past, this was the look of remembrance. On the ninth day of the month of Ab (July), the Lamentations of Jeremiah were read, year by year, as a memorial of weeping and mourning over the miseries of the people, of which the whole had been delivered. It has come to be connected with the thoughts of a later devastation, and its words enter, sometimes at least, into the prayers of the pilgrim Jews who meet at the "place of weeping" to mourn over the desolation of the holy city. It enters largely into the nobly-constructed order of the Latin Church for the services of Passion-week (Breviar. Rom. Feria Quinta. "In Casa Domini.") If it has been comparatively in the background in times when the study of Scripture has passed into casuistry and speculation, it has come forward, once and again, in times of danger and suffering, as a messenger of peace, comforting men, not after the fashion of the friends of Job, with formal moralizations, but by enabling them to express themselves, leading them to feel that they might give utterance to their feelings of a pietistic heart; and that which they were overwhelmed. It is striking, as we cast our eye over the list of writers who have treated specially this book, to notice how many must have passed through scenes of trial not unlike in kind to that of which Jeremiah was a witness. The book remains to do its work for any future generation that may be exposed to analogous calamities.

active part in all the religious controversies of the times, and was one of the most prominent members of the political assembly of La Rochelle in 1568, whither he had been sent by the Consistory of Paris. He subsequently went with La Chapelière to Holland, to ask aid of the states-general for the Protestants of France. We next find him at the Assembly of Milhau in 1625, and in 1627 at Paris, where he was arrested as an agent of the duke of Rohan, who was condemned to death, but his life was spared on account of the threatening attitude which the inhabitants of La Rochelle assumed, in retaliative, towards the person of one of their prisoners, a relation of P. Joseph (the confessor and secret agent of Richelieu). He was finally released, and even received a pension from Richelieu on the condition of using every exertion to reunite the different Protestant churches. He now became the pliant tool of Richelieu, and was excommunicated by the Church of Charrenton in 1644 for not having partaken of the Lord's Supper in twelve years. He finally joined the Roman Catholic Church, April 2, 1645. The worthlessness of his life was employed in writing against Protestantism. He died in 1665, dispaired alike by Protestants and Romanists. His principal works are: Discours des trahisons pour que les novices en France peuvent et doivent resister par armes, et les persécutions vertues (1622, 8vo); very scarce, as it was condemned to be burned by the public executioner—Lettre à M. Lammas-day is the name of a festival observed by the Roman Catholics on the 1st of August, in memory of the imprisonment of St. Peter, and otherwise called St. Peter's chains. The word Lammas is of doubtful origin, and some refer it to a Saxon term signifying contribution. Brande, in his "Antiquities," says, "Some suppose it is called Lammas-day, quasi Lamo-massae, because on that day the tenants that held lands of the cathedral church at York were bound to bring a loaf of loaf mass to the church at high mass on that day." More probably, however, it is derivation from "loaf-mass," it having been the custom of the Saxons to offer on this day (August 1) an oblation of loaves made of new wheat. Like many other Church festivals, it seems to have been observed already in pagan times, and, like the 1st of May, was a festive day with the Druids. Vallancey, in his Collectione De Rebus Hibnericiis, says the Druids celebrated the 1st of August as the day of the oblation of grain. See Farrar, Eccles. Disct. a. v.; Taylor, Ancre Christiania; Gen. Lamont, David, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian divine, flourished as minister of Kirkpatrick, Durham. He died in 1687. This is all we know of his personal history. His Sermons were published at London from 1676-87, in 2 vols. 8vo. New edit. 1610, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lamormain, Guillaume Germain de, a noted Belgian Roman Catholic theologian of the Order of the Jesuits, was born in the duchy of Luxemburg about 1507; entered the Jesuitical order in 1590, and then became professor of theology and philosophy at the University of Louvain; however, he was afterwards accused as the confessor of the emperor of Austria, Ferdinand II, and over this thoroughly monkish ruler Lamormain is said to have exercised perfect sway. He and John Weins-gartner, another Jesuit confessor, Vehoe (see below) tells us, "constantly kept near him, and never let him (Fer-ardin) out of their sight;" and it is due to this Jesuitic influence, no doubt, that Ferdinand became such a fanatical adherent of the Church of Rome, and a most cruel persecutor of Protestantism. See Austria. Of Lamormain himself, it is said that he was so devoted to the Romish cause that he made upwards of 100,000 converts to the Church of Rome. He died Feb. 22, 1648.
He wrote a life of Ferdinand II, which abounds in flattering terms to the emperor, who had been a pleasant tool in the hands of the crafty Jesuit. See Vehoe, Biogr.

Lamormain, HORTI de, a Belgian Jesuit, brother of the preceding, and, like him, a native of Luxembourg, entered the Order of the Jesuits in 1696, but exerted little influence on account of feeble health. He died Nov.
26, 1647. He translated and wrote several works; among them are, Tractatus amoris devia constansa, libri xxii; Tractatus de Pacificio Tridentino, libri xiv; Francisci de

Lamothe, Pierre LAMBERT DE, a French Roman Catholic missionaries, was born at Bucherie, in the dio-ocese of Lisieux, Jan. 18, 1624. After being for some time connected with the chancellorship of the Parliament at Rouen, he entered the Church. His talents caused him to be distinguished among a number of priests who had formed in 1652 the plan of Christianizing China and neighboring countries. In 1660 he was consecrated bishop of Berythe. He embarked at Marseilles for China, June 27, 1660, and passed through Malta, Antioch, Aleppo, Bassora, Chalzeran, Shiraz, Isaphan, Lara, Surate, Mulsalamat, Tenasserim, Yalings, Pramand Pukir, arrived at Justica, the capital of Siam, April 22, 1662. Here he found some 1500 Christians of different nations and two churches, one administered by the Dominicans, the other by the Jesuits. He was first well received, but had subsequently to submit to many annoyances from the bishop of Goa, who claimed the primacy of the whole East Indies, and Lamothe finally sailed for Canton in July, 1668, with two other missionaries. A severe tempest met them; however, to return to Siam. Here they were exposed to tall sorts of ill treatment at the hands of the Portuguese, and owed their safety only to the aid of the Chin Chinese. Lamothe sent to the pope and to Pary for more missionaries and other assistance. Alexander VII, in consequence, extended the jurisdiction of apotolic vicars over the kingdom of Siam, Japan, and other neighboring countries, which action freed Lamothe from the control of the bishop of Goa. He was now joined by Pallu du Parc, bishop of Heliopolis, who reached Siam January 27, 1664, with other missionaries.
The two apostolic vicars held a synod, and Lamothe received permission from the king to establish a Church at Siam, which he intended should become the centre of communication between the extreme Eastern mis-ionaries. He also established a seminary for the education of native priests and instructors, a college, and a hospi-

Lamourette, ADRIEN, abbé, a noted French eclesiiastic, was born in Picardy in 1742. During the Revolution in France he became an auxiliary of Mirabeau in 1790, and was deputed to address the deputies of the civil constitution of the clergy which that orator pronounced. In 1791 he was chosen, under the new Church regime enacted by the Assembly in opposition to the Roman see, bishop of Rhone-et-Loire, and deputed to the National Assemby. Having resisted the extreme measures of the dominant party, he was guillotined Jan. 10, 1794. He published Pensées sur la philosophie et l'incrédulité (1786, frequency occurrence in a literal sense in the Scriptures, such a utensil being often really meant where the

A. V. gives the rendering "candle" (q. v.). The primary sense of light (Gen. xvii, 16) also gives rise to frequent metaphorical usages, indicating life, welfare, guidance, se, e. g. 2 Sam. xxi, 17; Ps. cxix, 10; 119, 12, 19; 139, See Lamp. The following are the cases in which the use of lamps is referred to in the Bible. In their illustration we freely avail ourselves of the materials brought to light from the ancient remains.
1. That part of the golden candlestick belonging to the tabernacle which bore the light; also the nine and the ten candlesticks placed by Solomon in the Temple before the Holy of Holies (Exod. xxv, 37, 1 Kings vii, 49; 2 Chron. iv, 20, xiii, 17, Zech. iv, 2). The lamps were lighted every evening, and cleaned every morning (Exod. xxx, 7, 8; Reland, Ant. Hebr. i, v, 3, and viii, 9).
It is somewhat remarkable, that while the golden candlestick, or rather candelabrum, is so minutely described, not a word is said of the shape of the lamps (Exod. xxxv, 37).
This was probably because the socket in which it was to be inserted necessarily gave it a somewhat cy-indrical form adapted to the purpose; for it is hardly to be presumed that the inadequate cup-form usually represented in engravings would have been adopted.
This shape is aptly illustrated by an instance occurring on the Egyptian monuments. Wilkinson gives an Egyptian figure (Ant. Egypt., v. 76) what he takes to be the representation of a lamp made of glass, with a hand holding separately an erect wick, as if the lamp were a boat, to place it in the vase previous to its being lighted.

The lines, he thinks, may represent the twisted nature of the cotton wick, as they do the watering of the glass vasa.

Almost the only other fact we can gather in this connection is, that vegetable oils were burnt in them, and especially, if not exclusively, oil-olive. This of the finest quality, was the oil used in the seven lamps of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvii, 20). Although the lamp-oils of the ancient times were not exclusively vegetable, it is probable that animal fat was used, as it is at present by the Western Asians, by being placed in a kind of lamp, and burnt by means of a wick inserted in it. See Ott.
Cotton wicks are now used throughout Asia, but the Hebrews, like the Egyptians, probably employed the outer and inner fibre of flax (Flax, Illus. Nat., v. 2, i); and perhaps linen yarn, if the rabbins are correct in alleging that the linen dresses of the priests were unravelled when old, to furnish wicks for the sacred lamps.

As to the material, the burners were in this instance doubled of gold; although metal is scarcely the best substance for a lamp. The golden candlestick may also suggest that lamps in ordinary use were placed on stands, and, where more than one was required, on stands with two or more branches. The modern Orientals, who are satisfied with very little light in their rooms, use stands of brass or wood, on which to raise the lamps to a sufficient height above the floor on which they sit. Such stands are shaped not unlike a tall candlestick, spreading out at the top. Sometimes the lamps are placed on brackets against the wall, made for the purpose, and often upon stools. Doubtless similar contrivances were employed by the Hebrews. The Romans are known to have employed them. See CANDLESTICK.

Bronze Lamp and Stand. From Pompeii.

2. A torch or flambeau, such as was carried by the soldiers of Gideon (Judg. vii, 16, 20; comp. xvi, 4). From the fact that these were at first enclosed in pitchers, from which, at the end of the march, they were taken out and borne in the hand, we may with certainty infer that they were not ordinary lamps, open at top, from which the oil could easily be spilled. See Tobit.

3. It seems that the Hebrews, like the ancient Greeks and Romans, as well as the modern Orientals, were accustomed to burn lamps overnight in their chambers; and this practice may appear to give point to the expression of “outer darkness,” which repeatedly occurs in the New Testament (Matt. viii, 12, xxii, 13); the force is greater, however, when the contrast implied in the term “outer” is viewed with reference to the effect produced by sudden expulsion into the darkness of night from a chamber highly illuminated for an entertainment. This custom of burning lamps at night, with the effect produced by their going out or being extinguished, supplies various figures to the sacred writers (2 Sam. xxi, 17, Prov. xiii, 9, xx, 20). On the other hand, the keeping up of a lamp’s light is used as a symbol of enduring and unbroken succession (1 Kings xi, 36, xv, 4, Psa. cxiii, 17). (See WENHAM’S Symbol. Dict. s. v.)

The usual form of these domestic utensils may probably be inferred from the prevailing shape of antique specimens from neighboring nations that have come down to us. In the British Museum there are various forms of ancient Egyptian lamps, which were employed for lighting the interior of apartments, some of terracotta and others of bronze, with various ornaments in bas-relief.

4. It appears from Matt. xxv, 1, that the Jews used lamps and torches in their marriage ceremonies, or rather when the bridegroom came to conduct home the bride by night. This is still the custom in those parts of the East where, on account of the heat of the day, the bridal procession takes place in the night-time. The connection of lamps and torches with marriage ceremonies often appears also in the classical poets (Homer, Iliad, vi, 492; Eurip. Phoeniss. 346; Ménan, 1057; Virgil, Eclog. viii, 29), and, indeed, Hymen, the god of marriage, was figured as bearing a torch. The same connection, it may be observed, is still preserved in Western Asia, even where it is no longer usual to bring home the bride by night. During two, or three, or more nights preceding the wedding, the street or quarter in which the bridegroom lives is illuminated with chandeliers and lanterns, or with lanterns and small lamps suspended from cords drawn across from the bridegroom's and several other houses on each side to the houses opposite; and several small silk flags, each of two colors, generally red and green, are attached to other cords (Lane, Mod. Egypt., 201; Mrs. Poole, Englishwomen in Egypt, iii, 131). A modern lantern much used on these occasions, with lamps hung about it and suspended from it, is represented in the preceding cut. The lamps used separately on such occasions are represented in the following cut. Figs. 1, 2, and 3 show very distinctly the conical receptacle of wood which serves to protect the flame from the wind.

Lamps of this kind are sometimes hung over doors. The shape in figure 5 is also that of a much-used indoor lamp, called kandil (Lane, Modern Egypt., chap. vi, p. 151). It is a small vessel of glass, having a small tube at the bottom, in which is stuck a wick formed of cotton twisted round a piece of straw; some water is poured in first, and then the oil.

Lamps very nearly of this shape appear on the Egyptian monuments, and they seem, also, to be of glass (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, iii, 101; v, 578).

If the Egyptians had lamps of glass, there is no reason why the Jews also might not have had them, especially as this material is more proper for lamps intended to be hung up, and therefore to cast their light down from above. The Jews used lamps in other festivals besides those of marriage. The Roman satirist (Persius, Sat., v, 179) expressly describes them as making illuminations at their festivals by lamps hung up and arranged in an orderly manner; and the scriptural intimations, so far as they go, agree with this description. If this custom had not been in ancient and recent use in the East, it might have been supposed that the Jews adopted it from the Egyptians, who, according to Herodotus (ii, 62), had a "Feast of Lamps," which was celebrated at Sais, and, indeed, throughout the country at a certain season of the year. The description which the historian gives of the lamps employed on this occasion, strictly applies to those in modern use already described, and the concurrence of both these sources of illustration strengthens the probable analogy of Jewish usage. He speaks of them as "small vases filled with salt and olive-oil, in which the wick floated, and burnt during the whole night." It does not, indeed, appear of what materials these vases were made, but we may reasonably suppose them to have been of glass. The later Jews had even something like this feast among themselves. A "Feast of Lamps" was held every year on the twenty-fifth of the month Kislev. See DEDICATION. It was founded by Judas Maccabæus, in celebration of the restoration of the Temple worship (Josephus, Ant. xii, 7, 7), and has ever since been observed by the lighting up of lamps or candles on that day in all the countries of their dispersion (Maimonides, Res. II. Mishn. fol. 8). Other Oriental have at this day a similar feast, of which the "Feast of Lanterns" among the Chinese is perhaps the best known (Davis, Chinese, p, 188). See LANTERN.

LAMP, a strange ceremony of the Maronite Church. A wafer of some size, having seven pieces of cotton stuck into it, is put into a flask or basin of oil; a religious service is then read, the cotton is set fire to, and the sick person for whose recovery the rite is intended is anointed with the oil, and prayer is repeated over him.

LAMPS (their use in the Christian Church). Among the Jews lamps were freely used in the synagogue for various purposes. In fact, all the ancient nations had them in their temples; but how soon they were made use of by Christians, and what significance they had in symbolism, remains a matter of dispute between the Romanist and Protestant churches. The Protestants generally hold that there is no evidence that lamps were used in the early Church for any other purpose than to light up the dark places where they were obliged to congregate for worship, while Romanists claim that they were used as symbols. (Compare, on the Roman Catholic view, Martigny, Dict. des Antiquités Chrétienne, p. 161, s. v. Cierges; see also the article LIGHTS.) Several of the fathers, among them Chrysostom, condemn in strong terms the custom of setting up lamps on days of festival—as the relic of some pagan rite. In the days of Jerome, it is held true; lights were freely used in churches, but Romanist theologians forget to tell that the propriety of the custom was much questioned even then. In graves of the Catacombs "lamps were often placed," says Walcott (Sacred Archaeology, s. v.), "as a symbol of the eternal light which the departed inhabit, enjoy—as memorials of their shining lights before men, and their future glory" (Matt. xxxiii, 48). But it is evident that even this custom was early disapproved of, for the Council of Ellichis forbade the faithful, on pain of excommunication, lighting wax candles in the daytime in cemeteries or other burial-places of the martyrs (compare Eadie, Eccles. Dict., p. 367). In our day it is the custom in the Roman Catholic churches to keep a lamp (eternal light) constantly burning before or by the side of the tabernacle. (J. H. W.) LAMPAARY

Lampadary is the name of an officer in the Eastern Church whose duty it is to carry before the patriarchs in all processions a lighted candelabrum, called lampro倪γυς, as a badge of distinction among bishops. It is the business of the lampadary also to see that the lamps of the church are lighted, and to carry a taper on days of consecration and ordination.

LAMPE, FRIEDRICH ADOLF, an eminent German Protestant theologian, was born at Detmold (Lippe-Detmold) Feb. 19, 1683. He entered the University of Franeker, and later that of Utrecht, to study theology. He was successively pastor at Wees, Duisburg, and Bremen. In 1720 he became professor of theology at Utrecht, in 1727 librarian to the University, and about 1715 had in the same capacity. He died December 8, 1729. Lampe is one of the most prominent German theologians of the Reformed Church, who introduced into the German Church the Coeceanian doctrines, and measurably also the principles of Labadism. Lampe's principal works are, Commentaries analytical-syntactical Expositio secundum Johannes (Amsterdam, 1724-25, 3 vols. 4to); this work Orme commends as "both extensive and valuable." Walch ranks it among the best expositions of the apostle's Gospel.—De Cymbalum veteris Libri tres (1716, 3 vols. 12mo);—Exercitationes Do- decas, quibus Psalms Psalms perempto perfluerit commentario explicantum (Bremen, 1714, 4to);—Geheims des Geheimsbundes (Bremen, 1723, 12mo; translat. into Dutch, Amstel, 1727, 8vo); this work is nothing more nor less than his system of the society—Dissertatio Theol. Utrecht, 1727, 4to);—Rudimenta Theologiae eleuchticae (Bremen, 1728, 8vo). Lampe published also a large number of sermons and devotional treatises in German, which were nearly all translated into Dutch; he rearranged and edited an edition of the Historia Ecclesiae Reformata in Historia et Transcendens, attributed to Paul of Brezis (Utrecht, 1729, 4to). Together with Hase, he published the first three volumes of the Bibliotheca Bre- mensis, for which he wrote a number of theological arti- cles. Other treatises which he published in various papers were collected and published by D. Gerdes, together with his discourses and programmes (Amsterdam, 1737, 2 vols. 4to); see Schumacher, Memoria Lampi, in Miscellanea Duisburgenser, vol. ii. Acta Eruditorum, ann. 1722; Kliker, Bibl. Eruditor. Prussicam; Burnmann, Tractatus eruditorum; Koch, Algol. Gel. Litterarum; Hoes- ter, Icones Historiarum; Général de Stogium, in Bibliotheca Sacra, xxii. 290. (Stern-mi- lian), Gesch. d. Christlichen Lebens, vol. ii (see Index).

LAMPTIANS is the name of one of the heretical sects which, on the pretense of promoting sanctity by an ascetic life, made the Christian Sabbath a fast-day.

There was also another sect of this name in the 17th century. The followers of Lampetus, a monk, who pretended that, as a man is born free, a Christian, in order to please God, ought to do nothing by necessi- ty; and, that, therefore, it is unlawful to make vows, even those of obedience. To this doctrine he added the views of the Arians, Carpocratians, and other sects. The Lampitians formed a branch of the Messalgians (q. v.).

LAMPILLAS, FRANCIS XAVIER, a Spanish Jesuit, was born in Catalonia in 1731. After the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain in 1767 he went to Genoa, where he died in 1810. His principal work is a defence of Spanish literature against Betti, entitled: Tiraboschi, Saggio storico-apologetico della Letteratura Spagnuola. See Hoffer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, xxii. 285.

LAMPILGH, THOMAS, D.D., an English prelate of note in the days of king James II, was born in Yorkshire in 1615. But little is known of his early personal history. He was dean of Rochester in 1768, when he was professor of literature against Betti. He continued in this position he became one of the most conspicuous divines of the day, securing, in particular, the favor of the king by his partisanship, especially in 1688. In this year, just before the exit of king James from the English throne, Lamplugh called on the king, was graciously received, praised for his loyalty, and awarded with the archbishopric of York, which had been vacant for more than two years and a half. William III, whom Lamplugh, strangely enough, recognised as the rightful sovereign of England, after the flight of James, confirmed the appointment. Hence some writers have supposed that William of Orange appointed Lamplugh to the arch- bishopric. The archbishop died in 1691. See Debary, History of the Church of England, p. 167; Macaulay, History of England, ii. 882. (G. H. W.)

LAMPRONTI, ISAAC, a Jewish Rabbi of some note as an author, flourished in Ferrara in the first half of the 16th century. He died about 1520. He was the author of the preparation of a large encyclopedia of Rabbinism, of which he himself completed twelve volumes, bringing the work, excellent in its character, down to the letter Mem. It was published at Venice between 1570 and 1818. See Josch, Gesch. d. Judench. u. s. Schriften, iii. 280.

LAMSON, ALVAN, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born in 1732 at Weston, Mass.; was educated first at Phillips Academy, Andover, and then at Harvard Col- lege, where he graduated in 1814. He was immediately appointed tutor in Bowdoin College, but left in 1816, and entered the Divinity School at Cambridge. In 1818 he became pastor of the First Church in Cambridge, where he officiated for over forty years. He died July 18, 1864. He wrote much for the Christian Examiner, and in 1857 published a volume of sermons (Bost. 12mo). The Christian Register says of him: "Dr. Lamson has succeeded in uniting the acutest moral wisdom with the most unpretending and childlike mode of exhibiting it. His style is clear as crystal, sometimes almost quaint in its simplicity, and not without touches of poetic feeling as well as fancy, though a calm, subdued judgment char- acterizes all his opinions." — Allibone, Dict. of Authors, vol. ii; American Annual Cyclopaedia, 1864, p. 612.

LAMY (or LAMI), BERNARD, an eminent priest of the French Oratory, was born at Mars in June, 1640; studied under the Oratorians, joined their order in 1668, and completed his studies at Paris and at Saumur. He next taught belles-lettres at Vendôme and Juilly, and philosophy at Saumur and at Angers. In 1676 he was deprived of his professorship for zealously defending the Cartesian philosophy. His enemies, the Thomists, even obtained a lettre de cachet against him under the accusation that he opposed the principle of royal authority. He was banished to Grenoble, where cardi- nal Le Camus, who had established a seminary for the education of theocritics, who held Lamy in high estimation, appointed him professor of divinity. In 1686, his sentence having been revoked in its most es- sential charges, he was recalled to Paris, and remained for a while in the Seminary of St. Magloire, but, having violated the rules of the establishment by publishing without the knowledge of the superior a work (Lettre au P. Fourié, de l'Oraatoire), which, besides, was considered to contain objectionable teachings (viz. that Christ did not celebrate the Jewish Passover with his disciples [a view adopted by some of the soundest schol- ars]; that the Baptist was imprisoned by the Sanhedrim and by Herod, and that the three Marys mentioned in the Gospels are identical), he was again exiled, this time to Rouen. He died in the latter city Jan. 29, 1715. Lamy was a very prolific writer, and his works are generally distinguished for clearness of thought and elegance of style. The most important of these was the Parapsych. Biblicus ad intelligendam Sacrae Bibliae (originally [Grenoble, 1687] no more than tables of the chief facts of Scripture, with rules for its study, and compiled simply for his pupils, he subsequently enlarged and pub- lished in 1706, and 1708, and in it he laid down the best introduction to the Bible extant; an English edition was prepared by B. Bundy, Lond. 1723, 4to) — Entretiens sur les Sciences (1694), a work which was highly esteemed by J. J. Rousseau; — Introduction à l’Ecriture Sainte, où l’on traite de tout ce qui concerne les Juifs, etc. (Lyons, 1709, 4to) — Harmonium, sive concordia quator Evangelistarum, editio novissima (Paris, 1701, 12mo) — Commentarius in harmoniam, sive concordiam quatuor Evangelistarum (Paris, 1699, 4to) — Disquisitiones de proprietatibus corporum quorumque ...De tabula nucleo federata, de sancta circuiter Jerusalem, et de templum euris (Paris, 1720, fol.). To this last-named work Lamy is said to have devoted the last thirty years of his life. It was published (after his death) under the editorship of pere Demoulins. See Ellie Durand, De l’ordre ecclesiastique de l’université d’Agen dans l’ouvrage Les Actes d’une session du 15 février 1760. J. H. W.

Lamy, Dom François, a French Roman Catholic priest, was born at Montreuil, in the diocese of Chartres, in 1666. He entered the congregation of St. Maur, of the Order of St. Benoist, in 1688, and was in relation with some of the most important men of the time, Fénéon among others. He died in 1711. Lamy wrote largely in defence of Christianity, and against Spinoza; the chief work of his last years are, Traité de la réalité évidente de la religion Chrétienne (1694, 12mo) — De la connaissance de soi-même (Paris, 1694-96, 12mo) — A Nouvel Elémens de la physiologie (Paris, 1706, 8vo). His last work, published after his death, is very scarce. Some of his letters are contained in the Correspondance de Fénéon (Paris, 1827, sqq.)

Lancaster, Joseph, an English Quaker, was born in London, Nov. 29, 1715, and died about Oct. 4, 1888. He was the promulgator of the mutual system of education first introduced by Dr. Bell at Madras, but afterwards known both in England and America as the Lancasterian System, and gave an impulsion, by his writings and lectures, to the cause of popular education in many countries. He first opened a school for poor children in St. George's Field, and soon rendered his method very popular. For the characteristics of his system, see Watts, Bibl. Brit., and his works (London, 1778-1789). He died Oct. 18, 1841, at his residence in Princes St., London, Feb. 17, 1718. She married him in 1724, and was here especially instrumental in the extension of the Quaker cause. She retained her zeal and activity to extreme old age, laboring almost to the close of her days, May 30, 1761. See Janney, Hist. of Friends, iii. 259.

Lancaster, Lydia, a female Quaker minister, daughter of Thomas Rawlinson, was born at Gravithaie, Lancashire, England, in 1684. In the course of her ministry she visited several times the greater part of England, Ireland, and Scotland, building up her society with zeal and activity. In 1718 she came to the United States, and was here especially instrumental in the extension of the Quaker cause. She retained her zeal and activity to extreme old age, laboring almost to the close of her days, May 30, 1761. See Janney, Hist. of Friends, iii. 259.

Lancaster, Nathaniel, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, was born in England in 1698. During a portion of his ministry he was rector of Stamford Rivers, but he is better known as a literary man than as a pastor. He died in 1775. His published works are, Sermons (1746) — Essay on Delicacy (1748, 8vo) — The Old Churchman's Method of Pleading (1753, 8vo) — The Old Churchman's Preaching (1757, 4to) — Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Amer. Authors, ii. 1052.

Lance ("lân's), idiom, so called from its destructive use, Jer. I., 42; elsewhere usually "spear", a javelin or smaller kind of missile weapon, in distinction from the long-handled spear ("topt"), chaséh, and the simple dart ("loc", she'lock). See Armor.

Lance, The Holy (4), is the name of a knife very much in the form of a lance, used in the Greek Church to imitate the spear by which Christ was pierced. With this "lance" (lancé) the priest, at communion, thrusts a piece of bread, while reading the corresponding passages of the N. T. Scriptures. See Martigny, Dict. des Antiquités, p. 858.

Lance, The Holy (5), was given by king Rudolph of Burgundy to king Henry I of Germany, as a present, through the influence of Luitprand, bishop of Cremona. It was to be considered as one of the emblems of the empire, and a powerful talisman. The earlier tradition represents the lance as having been chiefly made of the nails with which Christ was crucified; later accounts assume that it was the identical lance with which the Roman soldier pierced the Saviour's side. Under the emperor Charles IV this lance was brought to Prague, and in 1354 pope Innocent VI, at the emperor's request, instituted a special festival, De lancoce, which was celebrated in Germany and Bohemia on the first octave after Easter. Another holy lance was discovered by the emperor Helias, and kept first in the portico of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and afterwards at Antioc, where it was found in 1098 by a French priest, Peter Bartholomew; its appearance cheered the discouraged Crusaders, who gained a brilliant victory over the Saracens. It was subsequently brought to Constantinople, then to Venice, and afterwards came into the possession of St. Louis, king of France. It was, however, afterwards taken back again to Constantinople, and it is said that the iron of it was brought to Rome as a present to pope Innocent VIII, and is preserved at the Vatican. The genuineness of both lances has, however, been doubted even in the Roman Catholic Church, and their authenticity was never officially proclaimed. —Herzog, Real-Encyclo. viii, 387.

Lancelot (Lancelot), Giovanni Paolo (1), a noted Italian writer on canon law; was born in Pergia in 1511, was professor of canon law in the university of his native place, and died there in 1591. He is particularly known as the author of Institutiones iuris canonici, which are generally published with the Corpus iuris civilis, yet it was not adopted in the "editio Romana," and therefore Riecher omits the title. Lancelotti appears to have for a long time contemplated writing an elementary text-book for the study of canon law, after the model of Justinian's Institutes [see Corpus Juris Civilis], for we find already in 1556 pope Paul IV encouraging him in his plans. Two years after Lancelotti presented his work to the papal censure, and it was examined by a committee composed of Fabianus Atorombanus, Julius Oradinus, and Antonius Mass, all officers of the court Delia Rota. They approved strongly of it, and their recommendation was printed in 1558, but several objections were added, which were presently answered by Lancelotti himself to his libri. The book was afterwards published, and immediately adopted as a text-book in the University of Cologne. On the other hand, the pope steadily refused his approval, and some of the admitted objections are pointed out in the preface, and the ground that it contained principles opposed to the then recent decisions of the Council of Trent. The author, however, was dissuaded to alter the obnoxious passages, and resolved to continue to publish the work as a private enterprise, which he did towards the close of the Council of Trent, and in August, 1568, at Perugia, dedicating it to Pius IV. In the following years it was repeatedly reprinted and commended. Peter Matthiæus even appended it to his edition of the Corpus iuris canonici (Frankl. ed. M. 1591). Soon after it was included is the edition of the Corpus juris canon, published at Lyons, and continued to be printed in that manner, having finally obtained the approval of pope Paul V (1460-21) by the intercession of cardinal Scipio Cobelusia and others. Still the Institutiones were never considered as an official work. Their value const-ated chiefly in the insight it affords into what was considered as law before the Council of Trent, and the common practice of that time. Subsequent editions carefully indicate the differences between it and the new laws.
(See Caspar Ziegler, Nota ex ipsa antiquissam ecclesi-asticarum fontibus deducta, Wittemb. 1599, 4to; reproduced in Thomasius's edition, Hale, 1716, 1717, 4to; also that of Douat, Venetia, 1760, 2 vol. 8vo. A French translation, with a comparison of the Roman and Gallican practice, was published by Durand de Maille (Lyons, 1710, 10 vol. 12mo).—Herzog, Real-Encycl., viii, 187.

Lancelotti (or Lancellotti), Giovanni Paolo (2), an Italian author (or priest), was born at Perugia in 1575, and died in Paris in 1640. He is noted as the author of a successful work entitled Tod-day ("L'Hoggi-di"), intended to prove that the world was not morally or physically worse than it had been in ancient times. He wrote also other learned works.

Lancelot, Dom. Claude, a noted French theologian and writer of the Romish Church, was born at Paris in 1615. In 1640 he was appointed preceeding officer of the noted school of Port Royal, and, after the discontinue-ment in 1669, he became instructor of prince Conti, then lived in the conven of St. Cyrain until its destruction in 1679.
He died at Quimperlé April 15, 1695. His works are mainly on the grammar of the classical and Roman languages. He also published historical annotations on the Bible of Vitre, and left in MS. form memoirs of the life of Duverger de Hauranne, of the St. Cyrain convent. See Lancet (πῆς, ro mach, from its piercing, I Kings xviii, 28, elsewhere usually "spear"), the iron point or head of a lancet. See Armon. The incise implements of the most ancient Hebrews, as of other peoples, were of stone (Exod. iv, 25; Joel, v, 2; compare Abicht, De cultu saxeis, Lipsae, 1712), and generally Creuzer, *Comment. Herod., i, 22. The sects samia with which the priests of Cybele emasculated themselves [Pliny, xxxv, 46], and the stone knives of the Egyptian embalmers [Herod. ii, 60], are parallel cases). The Hebrews used no knives at table (although one term for knife, ṭelōn , is so named from eating), since the meat was brought on ready cut into pieces, and the bread was so thin as to be easily broken with the fingers. See Eating. The same is the case at present in the East, even in princely feasts. See Meal. Knives were regularly employed by mechanics (q. v.), and in slaughtering animals (Gen. xvii, 6, 10; comp. Judg. xix, 29; see Philo, Opp., ii, 570), and for preparing food (Josephus, War, i, 38, 7; 4 M. xvii, 71, etc.). The sacrificial knife, in particular, was called ṭelōn (Exra i, 9), and a room in the (second) Temple was appropriated to such cutlery (ṭelōn, ὀργή, Mi-hana, Midrash, vi, 7). A penknife was called ṭelōn (Jer. xxvi, 28; Ezek. v, 1), originally in Aramaean ṭelōn, which in the Talmud (Chelec, xiii, 1) likewise denotes a razor. The pruning-knife was called ṭelōn (Isa. ii, 4; xviii, 5, etc.). See Knife.

Lancet Style. See Engrish Style.

Lancet-window is an architectural term for a narrow window with acutely-pointed arch head. This form was much used in England and Scotland during the early pointed period of Gothic architecture. Several lancet-windows are frequently grouped together, as to produce a pleasing effect. In Scotland, the lancetwindow was, like many other features of Scotch Gothic, rather in a much later period than in England.—

Land (represented by several Heb. and Gr. words: properly γῆ, e̓ra, usually rendered "earth," Gr.
γῆ; and γήμαν (adamic*), usually the "ground," sometimes γῆς, etc., elsewhere a "field," Gr. ἀγρός; also χώpa, a "tract of land," etc.). This word in the Old Testament often denotes emphatically the country of the Israelites, at other times some particular country or district, as the land of Canaan, the land of Egypt, the land of Ashur, the land of Moab. In several places of our Authorized Version the phrase "all the earth" is used, when the more restricted phrase "the land," or "all the land," would be more proper. See Agriculture; Faim; Landed Estate.

Landau, Jecheskel, a German Rabbi of note, was born about 1720. He flourished first as Rabbi of Jem-pol, Podolia, and later as chief Rabbi of Prague. He died in 1738. While yet a young man Landau gave promise of great ability as a polemic, and he displayed this quality to great advantage in the Sabbatian controversy which raged between Eibeschutz [see Jonathan Eibeschutz] and Enden. See Grütz, Gesch. der Juden, vol. ii, ch. xi, especially p. 409, 418, 430; *Firstes,

Landed Estate. It has been the custom to regard the Hebrews as a pastoral people until they were settled in Palestine. In a great degree they doubtless were so, and when they entered agricultural Egypt, the land of Goshen was assigned to them expressly because that locality was suited to their pastoral habits (Gen. xlvii, 4-6). These habits were substantially maintained; but it is certain that they became acquainted with the Egyptian processes of culture, and it is more than probable that they raised for themselves such products of the soil as they required for their own use. We may, indeed, collect that the portion of their territory which lay in the immediate vicinity of the Nile was placed by them under culture (Deut. xi, 10), while the interior, with the free pastures of the desert beyond their immediate boundaries, was devoted to pastoral purposes (1 Chron. vii, 21). This partial attention to agriculture was in some degree a preparation for the condition of cultivators, into which they were destined eventually to pass. While the Israelites remained in a state of subjection in Egypt, the maintenance of their condition as shepherds was materially in keeping them distinct and separate from the Egyptians, who were agriculturists, and had a strong dislike to pastoral habits (Gen. xxi, 44). But when they became an independent and sovereign people, their separation from other nations was to be promoted by giving them to devote their chief attention to the culture of the soil. A large number of the institutions given to them had this object of separation in view. Among these, those relating to agriculture—forming the agrarian law of the Hebrew people—were of the first importance. They might not alone protect the individual family, but it might be that no other could have been effectual without them; for, without such attention to agriculture as would render them a self-sustaining people, a greater degree of intercourse with the neighboring and idiosyncratic nations must have been maintained. Thews was consequently the primary object of the Mosaic institutions. The commonest observation suffices to show how much less than other agricultural communities are open to external influences, and how much less disposed to cultivate intercourse with strangers. See HUNGER.

It was, doubtless, in subservience to this object, and to facilitate the change, that the Israelites were put in possession of a country already in a high state of cultivation (Deut. vi, 11), and it was in order to retain them in this condition, to give them a vital interest in it, and to make it a source of happiness to them, that a very peculiar agrarian law was given to them. In stating this law, and in declaring it to have been in the highest degree wise and salutary, regard must be had to its peculiar object with reference to the segregation of the Hebrew people; for there are points in which this and other Mosaic laws were unsuited to general use, some by the very circumstances which adapted them so admirably to their special object. When the Israelites were numbered just before their entrance into the land of Canaan, and were found (exclusive of the Levites) to exceed 600,000 men, the Lord said to Moses, "Unto thee I have given this land, and divided it according to the number of names. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance; to every one shall his inheritance be given according to those that were numbered of him. Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot: according to the names of the tribes of their fathers shall they inherit" (Num. xxvi, 33-54). This equal distribution of the soil was the basis of the agrarian law. By it provision was made for the support of 600,000 yeomen, with (according to different calculations) from sixteen to twenty-five acres of land each. They held their land independent of all temporal superiors, by direct tenure from Jehovah their sovereign, by whose power they were to acquire the territory, and under whose protection they were to enjoy and retain it. "The land shall not be sold forever, for the land is mine, saith the Lord: ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. xxv, 23). Thus the basis of the constitution was an equal agrarian law. But this law was guarded by other provisions equally wise and salutary. The accumulation of debt was prevented, first, by prohibiting every Hebrew from accepting interest from any of his fellow-citizens (Lev. xxv, 35, 39); next, by establishing a regular discharge of debts every seventh year; and, finally, by ordering that no land could be alienated for ever, but must, on each year of Jubilee, or every sev".

Sabbatical year, revert to the families which originally possessed them. Thus, without absolutely depriving individuals of all temporary dominion over their landed property, it re-established, every fiftieth year, that original and equal distribution of it which was the foundation of the national polity and the peace of the land. At the end of this reversion was fixed and regular, all parties had due notion of the terms on which they negotiated, so that there was no ground for public commotion or private complaint. See Jubilee.

This law, by which landed property was released in the year of jubilee from all existing obligations, did not extend to houses in towns, which, if not redeemed within one year after being sold, were alienated forever (Lev. xxv, 29, 30). This must have given to property in the country a decided advantage over property in cities, and who to retain them in perpetuity, was eminently suited to all the regulations, by affording an inducement to every Hebrew to reside on and cultivate his land. Further, the original distribution of the land was to the several tribes according to their families, so that each tribe was, so to speak, settled in the same county, and enjoyed the same bounty. Each family, as represented by the estate of any family in one tribe permitted to pass into another, even by the marriage of an heiress (Num. xxvii); so that not only was the original balance of property preserved, but the closest and dearest connexions of affection between the numerous branches of the Mosaic institutions were not impaired. See INHERITANCE.

It often happens that laws in appearance similar have in view entirely different objects. In Europe the entailment of estates in the direct line is designed to encourage the formation of large properties. In Israel the effect was entirely different, as the entail extended to all the small estates into which the land was originally divided, so that they could not legally be united to form a large property, and then entailed upon the descendants of him by whom the property was formed. This division of the land in small estates among the people, who were to retain them in perpetuity, was eminently suited to the leading objects of the Hebrew institutions. It is allowed on all hands that such a condition of landed property is in the highest degree favorable to high cultivation and to increase of population, while it is less favorable to pastureage. The two first were objects which the law had in view, and it did not intend to afford undue encouragement to the pastoral life, while the large pastures of the adjacent deserts and of the commons secured the country against such a scarcity of cattle as the division of the land into small herds has already produced in France.

For this land a kind of quit-rent was payable to the sovereign Proprietor, in the form of a tenth or tithes of the produce, which was assigned to the priesthood. See TITHES. The condition of military service was also attached to the land, as it appears that every freeholder (Deut. xx, 5) was obliged to attend at the general muster of the national army, and to serve in it, at his own expense (often more than repaid by the plunder), as long as the occasion required. In this direction, therefore, the agrarian law operated in securing a body of 600,000 men employed in labor and industry, always assumed to be ready, as they were bound, to come forward at their country's call. This great body of national yeomanry, every one of whom had an important stake in the national independence, was officered by its own hereditary chiefs, heads of tribes and clans, and represented the power of the people to defend themselves. See ANIMAL TROOP.

as they were constantly employed in agriculture, attached to domestic life, and enjoyed at home the society of the numerous relatives who peopled their neighborhood, war must have been in a high degree alien to their tastes and habits. Religion also took part in preventing them from engaging in the wars which were in the interest of military glory. On returning from battle, even if victorious, in order to bring them back to more peaceful feelings after the rage of war, the law required them to consider themselves as polluted by the slaughter, and unworthy of appearing in the camp of Jehovah until they had employed an entire day in purification (Num. xix., 13-16; xxxi., 19). Besides, the force was entirely military; the law forbidding even the kings to multiply horses in their train (Deut. xvii., 16); and this, with the ordinance requiring the attendance of all the males three times every year at Jerusalem, proved the intention of the legislator to confine the natives within the limits of the Promised Land, and rendered long and distant wars and conquests impossible without the virtual renunciation of that religion which was incorporated with their whole civil polity, and which was, in fact, the charter by which they enjoyed all their property and enjoyed all their rights (Graves, Lectures on the Pentateuch, lect. iv.; Lowman, Civil Gov. of the Heb. ch. iii., iv.; Michaelis, Mos. Recht, i., 240 sq.).

Landelin and Landoid, two saints of the Roman Catholic Church, are said to have flourished as preachers of the Gospel in Belgium in the 7th century. We have no trustworthy information as to their lives and proceedings. Among the aids which St. Amandus procured from Rome in 651 to help him in his missionary labors is mentioned the presbyter Landoid, probably an Anglo-Saxon. According to the history of Landoid, written in the 10th century by abbot Heriger von Lobiis, Landoid was especially supported in his missions by king Childeger II, who furnished him with all the necessary means. He is also said to have had Lambert of Maastraße for a pupil, and to have been nine years bishop as successor of St. Amandus. This latter assertion, which is contradicted by the fact that Remarius was the successor of Amandus; and it appears also a matter of doubt whether Lambert of Maaschräf was indeed a pupil of Landoid.

Concerning Landelin, the Bollandists give, under date of June 15, an old biography, according to which he had been a disciple of Amandus, bishop of Aisne, had fled from his tutor, and supported himself for a while by highway robbery. The sudden death of one of his band, and a dream, in which he saw his former companion carried to hell by the devil, caused his conversion, and drove him to strict penance. He converted, and made a pilgrimage to Rome. Subsequently consecrated deacon and presbyter, he made two more journeys to Rome, the last time accompanied by his pupil Aduleus and Dominicus. He is said to have founded the two convents of Lobbes and Crepin. According to the same account, Landelin died in 986, continuing his pene-

Lanca, George, a Methodist minister of considerable note, was born in the State of New York April 13, 1784. He was admitted to the Philadelphia Conference in 1805, and located in 1810; was readmitted in 1819, and again located in 1825; but was readmitted once more in 1834. In 1836 he was elected assistant agent for the Methodist Book-Convention at New York. In this capacity first, and later in that of principal agent, he served until 1852, when he retired from all active duties in the Church. He died May 6, 1859. Under his prudent management, the publishing house, then at 200 Mulberry Street, assumed almost gigantic proportions, out incurring the wrath of heaven. The custom had doubtless prevailed long before (Job xxvii, 2), it was thus confirmed by express statute (Deut. xix., 14; xxvii., 17), and it appears to have been strictly perpetuated in later times (Prov. xxviii., 28; xxxii., 10). Similar precautions were observed in the Roman emperors, who had images of the deities, called Hermae or termini, set up on the line between different owners, which were under the patronage of a deity especially designated for that care (see Smith’s Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. s. v. Terminus). Landmarks were used in Greece even before the age of Homer (Iliad, xxi., 460); and Greeks, who still used in Persia, and in various parts of the East. Even to this day fields in the East have no fences or hedges, but a ridge, a stone, or a post occasionally marks the boundary; consequently, it is not very difficult to encroach on the property of another (see Hackett, Illustra. of Script. p. 167). See HEDGES.

Lando or Landon, a Roman pontiff, was a native of Sabina, but the date of his birth is not known. Indeed, but little is accessible as to his personal history until he came to the pontifical chair in 918. He held the pontificate only about six months, for he died about April 27 (see A. Pons, in the Bowyer’s History of the Popes, v, 89 sq.).

Landon, Whittington, D.D., a clergyman of the Church of England, was for some time provost of Worcesters College, Oxford. In 1813 he was appointed dean of Exeter, and in 1812 prebendary of Salisbury. He died in 1839. Some of his sermons were published in London (1812, 1vo, and in 1835, 8vo)—Allibone, Dictionary of English and American Authors, ii, 1056.

Landborough, David, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian minister, was born at Dalry, Galloway, Scotland, in 1782. He was pastor of the parish of Stevenson from 1811 to 1845, and of a Free-Church congregation at Saltcoats from 1843 until his death in 1854. Mr. Landborough was a博物学家, as a naturalist, and wrote several treatises on botany and zoology. He also contributed frequently to Dr. Harvey’s Psychological Britannica, and published papers in the Annals and Magazine of Natural History—allibone, Dictionary of British and American Authors, ii, 1056.

Landperger, Johann, a Catholic missionary who obtained distinction by his voluminous acetic writings, was born in Landperg, Bavaria, in the latter part of the 18th century; studied in Cologne, was made prior of his order near Nell, and died about 1848. On account of his marked and severe piety, he was called the Just. Among his works, which were published in many editions at various places, are: Commentaria in Psalmos, Exempla, etc.; Fidei Enchiridion; Vita Servatoris N. I. X.; Para-

LANE, John, an eminent minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Virginia about 1769. His early life was spent in Georgia, and he was some time a student of Franklin College. In 1814 he entered the South Carolina Conference; in 1816 he was sent to the "Natchez Circuit," and was thrown much in contact with the Creek and Cherokee Indians, where his heroism and success were of a conspicuous nature. In 1816 he was called to organize the Mississippi Conference, then a vast and almost trackless region, now constituting four Conferences and part of a fifth. In 1820 he was delegate to the General Conference at Baltimore, and presiding elder on the Mississippi District. During this year his wife, Mrs. Lane, died. In 1832, New York, Mr. and Mrs. Lane were obliged to locate, to care for his large estate and numerous family. He remained located for eleven years, during which he successfully founded the city of Vicksburg on his father-in-law’s estate, and so saved it, and educated the orphan children. He was also an extensive merchant, patent judge of the county, and director of the Railroad Bank, and one of the most competent and influential business men of the state, while at the same time he preached continually, and filled Vicksburg station one year. In 1861 he re-entered the Conference, and spent most of his subsequent career in the presiding eldership. For many years he was president of the Board of Trustees of Centenary College, and was still longer president of the Conference Missionary Society. He died in 1865. He was a man of large capacities and indomitable vigor. His piety was genial and earnest, and his great delight was in preaching the Word of Life. He will long be remembered as one of the founders of Methodism in the South-west. - Summer, Biog. Sketches, p. 229; Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, vii. (G. L. T.)

LANEY, Benjamin, D.D., a prelate of the Church of England, was born at Stockop of Peterborough from 1650 to 1658; was then transferred to Lincoln, where he remained until 1667, when he was transferred to the bishopric of Ely. He died about 1675. Some of his sermons were published in 1662 and 1675. He was considered a very learned divine, and of great eminence. - Allibone, Dict. of Authors, ii, 1856.

LANFRANC, the most noted foreign churchman who rose to distinction in the English Church of the Middle Ages, was born of a senatorial family in Pavia, Italy, about 1005; studied law in Bologna, but not with attention to other subjects; returned to Ravenna, where he taught jurisprudence, and also the liberal arts, with great success. He soon gave his attention exclusively to the latter, the liberalis disciplinae, and especially to dialectics, and, leaving his own country, he travelled over a large part of France, until, induced perhaps by the fame of William, duke of Normandy, he settled in Avranches. He was appointed as a young man by Laval, where he won great distinction as a teacher, but in 1042, having determined upon a more private and contemplative life, he betook himself to Rouen, where, in fulfillment of such a purpose, according to his biographer Crispinus, he proposed to reside. On his way thither he was fallen into the hands of the monks of Bec by some vessel Truth, but he entered the cloister of Bec, of the Benedictine Order. After three years of quiet, he began again, at the instance of Herluin, the abbot of Bec, to give instruction, and became the resort of students from every class, both of strife and learning, and from many lands. Made prior of the monastery in 1046, he established a more extensive and systematic course of study, sacred as well as secular, unusual attention being given to grammar and dialectics. In respect to the former, Lanfranc's influence contributed greatly to revive the general study of Latin, and in dialectics he was a forerunner of the doctrines of Scholasticism, Exegesis, and patristic, but especially speculative theology, were pursued. Anselm was among his pupils at Bec, and also the future pope Alexander II. During this period, about 1049, occurred Lanfranc's first dispute with his former friend Berengar, then archdeacon at Angiers, on the subject of the Lord's Supper. The latter, while defending the opinions of Scottus Egerius, sought in a letter to persuade Lanfranc; but the letter, falling into the hands of others, gave rise to such charges of heretical fellowship against Lanfranc that he was provoked, in defending himself, to reproach Lanfranc and Verulam with a violent attack upon Berengar. The learning which he displayed in this controversy greatly increased Lanfranc's fame for scholarship, and he was now invited to the position of abbot in various cloisters, and was treated with respect by William of Normandy, who was his relative. It related that, on occasion of some false charges, the duke fell out with him, and banished him from his dominions. A lame horse was given him for the journey, and, seated on it, he happened to meet the duke, who could not help noticing the laughable hobbling of the animal, when Lanfranc took occasion to say to him, "You must give me a better horse if you wish me out of the country, for with this one I shall never get over the border." The jost won the duke's attention, and an explanation followed, which established Lanfranc in a position of permanent favor. He was employed by Duke William in 1060 to secure from the pope Nicholas II letters of rule for Flanders, which was a near relative, a princess of Flanders. This allowance was obtained on the condition that William should found two cloisters, one for monks and another for nuns. Over the monastery of St. Stephen, at Caen, which was thereupon established, Lanfranc was installed as abbot. It was the Pope, Anselm succeeding him in that capacity at Bec. The dispute with Berengar meanwhile continued. The latter, though constrained at Rome in 1059, through fear, to recognise the doctrine of Paschasia Radbertus, nevertheless continued to speak and write strong sentiments, and was bitterly opposed by Lanfranc in his work, De corpore et sanguine Dom. Jesu Christi, adv. Berengar Turonensisem, published between the years 1064 and 1069. In this work the doctrine of transubstantiation is clearly contained. Berengar issued a reply, De sacra omissa adv. Lanfrancum (an edition of which was published by Vischer in Berlin in 1834). The ability with which this controversy was conducted on both sides has been confessed. Severe personal charges are mingled with argument, and, whatever fault may have been established against Berengar, his opponent was not without blame nor without defects. The main point at issue with Berengar was the doctrine of transubstantiation, and the making this the trial rather than the logical argumentation. While at Caen, Lanfranc steadfastly refused the archbishopric of Rouen, but, upon the advice of his old abbiet Herluin, he accepted in 1070, with much reluctance, the archbishopric of Canterbury, which was urged upon him by William of Normandy, who had just ascended the throne of England. His task in the archbishopric was by no means light, inasmuch as he was obliged not only to control and amend the rudeness and ignorance of his own clergy, but to defend also the authority of his primary against the other prelates, especially Thomas of Canterbury, with whom he often quarrelled. The self-will of the king also gave him much trouble, and he was frequently tempted to retract his steps to the cloister, but was urged by pope Alexander II to continue his public labors. The violent disposition of William Rufus, who ascended the throne in 1087, was a further annoyance. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, he persevered in his career as the champion of the common people and the oppressed clergy, in multiplying correct copies of the fathers and of the holy Scriptures, in the extension of learning and improvement of manners in clergy and people, and in care for the sick and the poor. "Under his spiritual rule," says a noted Church historian, "the Church of England received as a gift an infusion of the Norman element as was forced upon the political system of England by the iron hand of the Conqueror." His active and prudent influence was also often employed in state affairs.

Lanfranc's relation, while archbishop of Canterbury, to the papal chair forms an important feature of his life. He was on a friendly footing with Alexander II, his former pupil, and went to receive at his hands the pallium of his office, though he had at first desired, in accordance with the king's wishes, that it should be sent to him to England. Gregory VII, greatly displeased with William's independent conduct, and his inclination to restrain the bishops from visiting Rome, sharply complained to Lanfranc that he had also lost his former spirit of obedience to papal authority. Lanfranc protested his renewed affection for the Church, and declared that he had sought to win the Pope to conformity in certain particulars (as specially in the matter of Peter's Pence), but said little concerning his general relation to the king, or that of the latter to the pope. He seems to have known that a certain degree of consideration, more than he liked definitively to express, must be allowed to the royal wishes. The pope's command to Lanfranc to appear in Rome within four months under threat of suspension he openly and without answer dis obeyed. A letter of Lanfranc to an unknown correspondent (Ep. 80), who sought to gain his adhesion to the rival pope, Clement II, places him in a neutral position as between the two popes, and as awaiting, with the government of England, further light on the subject. Something of Lanfranc's coldness towards Gregory may perhaps be explained by the fact that he saw in this pope (as is apparent in a letter cited by Gieseler) a protector of his enemy Berengar. Lanfranc died May 28, 1089, two years after the death of William the Conqueror.

Besides his work against Berengar may be mentioned his translation of his own Pernum Sergii: — Epistolae Sergii; and 16 addressed to him: De celinda confessione, a fragment of an address in defence of his primatial authority; and Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles. His biography of William the Conqueror has been lost. The first complete edition of Lanfranc's writings was published by D'Achery, a Benedictine (Paris, 1648, fol.); the earliest edition is entitled B. Lanfranci Opera (Paris, 1568, fol.); the latest edition is by Giles (Oxford, 1844-45, 4 vols. 8vo.).

Lang, Georg Heinrich, a distinguished German theologian, was born Nov. 28, 1740, at Oettingen. He received a scientific education in his native town, and pursued theology at the University of Heidelberg. In 1765 he assumed a pastorate at Buhl, and in 1770 accepted a call to Hohen-und-Nieder-Altheim. From 1774 to 1777 he filled the position of superintendent and pastor at Trochtelsingen, and in the latter year returned to his late pastorate. In 1789 he became court preacher and ecclesiastical counsellor to the reigning prince at Ratibor. He died March 15, 1806. Lang exerted no little influence in the progress and culture of religious learning of the Church of Germany (Cfr. Ephes. I, II, Testamentum), which appeared in 1778, placed him in the front rank of writers on the theory and history of the Christian religion. His intense zeal for the practical in later life directed his literary activity to the popular treatment of religious truth; hence appeared Kirchliche Geschichte, Venet Missagin in Brautschott; and numerous sermons and liturgical writings. In his homiletical writings he developed many new and happy ideas, peculiarly adapted to the exigencies of the times. Many estimable traits of character both adorned his private life and enhanced his merits as a teacher of religious truth. For a list of his works, see Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutsche, ii, 229.

Lang, Joseph, a German Jesuit, was born in 1746 at Brunn, in Bohemia, and was educated at his native city. The Jesuits then sent him to Olmütz to pursue philosophy, and finally to the University of Prague, where he completed a course of theology. He was ordained in 1774. In 1775 he accepted a call to a Catholic Church in Leipzig, and in 1783 was chosen court preacher at Dresden. In 1802 he received the office of superintendent of the Catholic infirmary at the latter place. He died Dec. 28, 1806. Lang acquired the reputation of a learned man, and his labours in the Church, besides frequent contributions to journals, he published several sermons. See Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutsche, ii, 233.

Lang, Lorenz Johann Jakob, a German theologian, born in Selb, in the principality of Baireuth, on May 10, 1713, was the son of a stock-making, and being destined by his father to follow the same trade, he continued his wars for study; his religious desires, however, was manifested, with many difficulties. By the assistance of his pastor, however, he acquired a thorough knowledge of the Latin and Greek, and entered in 1748 the lyceum at Coblum. Indefatigable in his industry, he became thoroughly versed in philosophy and theology, as is evinced in the disputations De praestantia philosophiae Wolfa, and De positivo coelesti Novi Testamenti, after the defence of which he entered the University of Erlangen in 1751. After quitting Erlangen, he went to Baireuth in 1756 as tutor. A few months later he became sub-deacon in Baireuth. In 1758 he was appointed professor of the Oriental languages and of the fine arts at the Gymnasium of Baireuth. In 1767 he was appointed court librarian, and in 1789 the first professor and inspector of the alumni, and in 1795 the first counsellor. He died Sept. 18, 1801. Lang wrote extensively, but most of his writings are in the form of dissertations. A complete list is given by Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutsche, vol. i, s. v.

Lang (of Welleborn), Matthias, a noted German prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, an acknowledged natural brother of the emperor Maximilian I, was born in Aachen. In 1490 he was educated at the University of Ingolstadt. He was secretary first to Frederick III and later to Maximilian I. At the same time he held positions in the Church. He was successively priest at Augsburg and Constance until 1565, when he was appointed bishop of Gurk. Inclined towards the schemes of the Council of Trent, and feared on account of his influence over the emperor, who was following the lead of Lang, the youthful bishop received the cardinal's hat from pope Julius II in 1511. Of course the conferred honor made the trusted adviser of Maximilian an obdurate servant of the pontiff. Lang rested not until peace was restored between emperor and pope, so long at variance. See LATERAN, COUNCIL OF, 1518; PISA, COUNCIL OF; JULIUS II. In 1514 he was made coadjutor of the archbishop of Salzburg, and in 1519 sole incumbent that archbishop of See. In 1518 he attended the diet at Augsburg, and was active both for the election of Charles V as King of Rome, and the submission of Luther to the Pope. He entered the Church of St. Peter at Rome, and the title of Doctor of Theology. He had been a reformer, and he made a speech in defence of reform, threatening to quit the Church unless their wishes were heeded, he changed front suddenly after he had gained over Johann Staupitz (q. v.).

Crushed the revolutionary movements of the Calvinists in 1538; in the year following joined the Romanian League (q. v.); and in 1558, assisted by Bavaria, suppressed the peasant insurrections. At the Diet of Augsburg in 1550 he openly declared himself a bitter opponent of Luther. He died in March, 1564. A narrative of cardinal Lang's travels in Austria, Hungary, and the Tyrol was published by a certain Gibertus, under the title "Odespercon de Mathaei cardinals (Vienne, 1511, 4to).

This work is now very rare (com. Götz, Dresdner Bibliothek, iii, 37).

Vehese (Memoires of the Court, Aristocracy and Diplomacy of Austria [transl. by Demmler, London, 1856, 2 vols. sm. 8vo, i, 41) thus comments on his character: "Lang was an exceedingly eloquent and adroit man, yet he was just as famous for his elasticity of conscience as for cleverness. He surpassed in splendour all the cardinals and archbishops of his time, and in this respect certainly did not belie his Cesarianese descent. See also polit. Gesch. v. ii; Diet. Clesch v. LANGBAINE, GirARD, D.D., an English divine and philologist, was born at Barton-kirke, in Westmoreland, about 1608. He studied at Blencow, Cumberland, then became successively a servant, scholar, and fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and held the places of keeper of archives and provost of his college for a good many years before his death, which happened in 1658. He was a studious and timid man, who con- trived to steer through the political storms of his time without giving serious offence to any party. He edited Longinus, and published several works of his own, chiefly on Church questions. The most important of them are, Episcopalian Inheritance, etc. (Oxford, 1641, 4to); A Review of the Covenant (Oxford, 1644, London, 1651, 4to); Epp. Proportionati ans. 1651 (Oxford 1658, 4to). He also worked on Usher's Chronologia Sacra, transl. from the French into Eng- lish an account of the Council of Trent (Oxford, 1658, fol.), and is considered the author of A View of the New Directory, and A vindication of the ancient Liturgy of the Church of England (Oxford, 1659, 4to). Langdon, Samuel, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in 1722 in Boston. He graduated at Harvard College in 1744, and was ordained colleague pastor in Portsmouth, N.H., Feb. 4, 1747. In 1774 he was elected president of Harvard College, which position he resigned Aug. 30, 1780, and was ordained, Jan. 18, 1781, pastor at Hampton Falls. He died in the last-named place Nov. 29, 1797. Langdon published An Inquestion Examination of Mr. Robert Sandeman's Letters on Theron and Apatian (1751): A Summary of Christian Faith and Practice, drawn up principally in Scripture language (1768); Dedication Lecture in Harvard College (1775); Observations on the Revelations of Jesus Christ to St. John (1711); etc.; Corrections of erroneous Mistakes committed by Rev. John Cozens Opdyke (1792); Remarks on the Leading Sentiments of Rev. Dr. Hopkins's System of Doctrines in a Letter to a Friend (1794); and several occasional sermons. He also published, in company with Col. J. Blanchard, a map of New Hampshire (1781). Sprague, Aminals, i, 456.

Lange, Joachim, a noted German Lutheran theologian, one of the heads of the so-called Pietistic school, was born at Gardelegen, in Saxony, Oct. 28, 1670. He entered the University of Wittenberg, which who clamed for reform, threatening to quit the Church unless their wishes were heeded, he changed front suddenly after he had gained over Johann Staupitz (q. v.); crushed the revolutionary movements of the Calvinists in 1538; in the year following joined the Romanian League (q. v.); and in 1558, assisted by Bavaria, suppressed the peasant insurrections. Langdon, Samuel, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in 1722 in Boston. He graduated at Harvard College in 1744, and was ordained colleague pastor in Portsmouth, N.H., Feb. 4, 1747. In 1774 he was elected president of Harvard College, which position he resigned Aug. 30, 1780, and was ordained, Jan. 18, 1781, pastor at Hampton Falls. He died in the last-named place Nov. 29, 1797. Langdon published An Inquestion Examination of Mr. Robert Sandeman's Letters on Theron and Apatian (1751): A Summary of Christian Faith and Practice, drawn up principally in Scripture language (1768); Dedication Lecture in Harvard College (1775); Observations on the Revelations of Jesus Christ to St. John (1711); etc.; Corrections of erroneous Mistakes committed by Rev. John Cozens Opdyke (1792); Remarks on the Leading Sentiments of Rev. Dr. Hopkins's System of Doctrines in a Letter to a Friend (1794); and several occasional sermons. He also published, in company with Col. J. Blanchard, a map of New Hampshire (1781). Sprague, Aminals, i, 456.
Deca I disputat., theolog., exegeticum cum positio posita, 1768. He became bishop of Llandaff in 1848, and took great zeal in the reformation of monastic abuses. As a reward for his talents Edward III appointed him lord treasurer in 1360, and chancellor in 1364. In the year 1361 he had been appointed bishop of Ely. In 1366 he was transferred to the see of Canterbury. The see of Canterbury was the principal see of the Roman Catholic Church, and the most prominent of the celebrated Wycliffe (whom his predecessor had appointed head of Canterbury Hall, Oxford) on the plea that a secular priest was not suitable for the position. This injustice perhaps first suggested to Wycliffe an inquiry into papal supremacy. His inquiry gave great offence to Edward III, and when the pope, as a reward, created Langham cardinal of St. Sixtus, the king seized on his temporariness, as, by the law, the see of Canterbury had become vacant by the pro-

Langham now went to join the pope, who loaded him with favors. He continued to take a part in the political affairs of England, valiantly trying to reoncile that country to France. During the last years of his life Gregory XI intrusted him with the care of the papal affairs at Avignon, where he died July 22, 1376. His body was taken back to England, and buried at Westminster. His name is commemorated in another Life of Simon of Langham, in the European Magazine, 1797; Th. Tanner, Biblioth. Britannica; Baluzius, Vite Pop. Aen. vol. i; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxix, 409; Collar, Ecles. Hist. (see Index in vol. vii); Neander, Church History, i, 136.

Langhorn, John, a minister of the Church of England, was born in Westmoreland, England, in 1776; obtained a curecy in London in 1764; in 1767 he was ap-

It is an interesting fact that the Synod of Tournai, from the acts of the Concilium Tullerii of June, 659, it appears that another (Catholic Lancemosse) had a short time before been held at Langres by the bishops of Charles the Young, king of Provence, nephew of Charles the Bald, and son of Lothair I, to whom Langres belonged as part of Burgundy. We know nothing of this synod. These were read again in the Synod of Toul (Savonnières), and incorporated in the acts of that synod's session held in the early part of June, 659. The canones refer partly to political and canonical points, partly to dogmas. The assembled clergy availed themselves of the opportunity afforded them by the synod to obtain from the princes Charles the Bald, Lothair II, and Charles the Young, the convocation of yearly provincial synods, and two yearly general synods (can. 7). An attempt was also made to take the election of bishops out of the hands of the clergy and transfer it to the king, but this was not carried through (can. 8). It was proposed that the metropolitan and bishops of the diocese be alone able to judge of the qualifications of candidates (can. 9). Great opposition was also manifested by those who maintained that, in the absence of the metropolitan and bishops of the diocese, the interest of discipline requiring that such institutions should be visited by the bishops (can. 9). They only maintained the right of the convents to appoint their superiors themselves (can. 9 and 12). Much was also done in regard to the building of churches, the administration of the Church, and the like (can. 13); the establishing of schools (can. 10), and the restoration of hospitals, pregrinorum videlicet, et aliorum pro remedio amanum receptacula (can. 14). The intervention of the temporal power was invoked against raptores, adulteri vel raptores, which latter were to be also punished by the Church with the full severity of her discipline. But the most important of the decrees adopted by this synod are those which refer to the dogma of predestination. It is in this Synod of Langres that the bishops of Provence appear to have prepared the whole matter, so as to aid him in the controversy with the Eastern Church between the three Carolinian kingdoms (Neustria, Lorraine, and Provence). King Charles was himself present, with a view to prevent the proceedings becoming a basis for the decrees of the future Synod of Toul. In the kingdom of Charles the Bald the semi-regional council of Hirson had been generally held, whilst in the ancient provinces of Lothair I the Augustinian views were still officially retained. As the coming Synod of Toul was intended to settle all disputes between the two kingdoms in regard to political and religious questions, the preparatory Synod of Langres had either to recall the Augustinian resolutions of the Synod of Valence, or to alter them in such a manner that they might no longer give offence. They could not agree to do the former, and the six canones of Valence were endorsed; but the expressions against the Synod of Clermont, which offended Hincmar and his friends (33) quattuor que a concilio fratrum nostrorum minus pros- pecte suscepta sunt propter inutilissimam et etiam nox- itetatem et errorem contrarium veritati [a pio auditu fidelius penitus expeditionis] were omitted from the four canones. This was but a half-way and ineffec-cient measure had already been sufficiently established by Hincmar himself in his work on predestination, cap.

30: if the canones of Valence were retained, it should be done openly, and they should be courageously defended, and then the protestation against the four principles of King Charles was to be made. If the latter three were omitted, then it would be consistent to drop the resolutions of the Council of Valence (comp. Hincmari (Opp. ed. Sirm., 291). It is ineffect made evident in the proceeding of Concilium cap. quinquagesimum, 292).

Langton, Stephen, one of the early English Churchmen, theological and secular history, was born the 12th century, according to on shire, according to another in Dev-cated at the University of Paris, a low-student and associate of Innocent after the election of the latter, a teacher in the university, and, by finally rose to the office of its chan-to Rome about the year 1206, pop- ored him with the purple by the titulae Chrysogonus; and when, by the re-

Lanfranc, the archbishop of Canterbury of the claim to the succession of Christchurch, whom without consultation of the king, a stance appointed to succeed the last archbishop, Hubert, and of John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, on whose behalf by the indulgence of king John, another candidate had been made, Innocent III favored his old school as the appointment of John de Gray, which, by consecration, was unau Augustinians were consecrated by the Vi- terbo June 27, 1207. John's determined resistance to this nomination gave rise to the cost between him and the pontiff which had such important results. See Innocent III; Johns, king of England.

The consequence, in so far as Langton was concerned, was, that he was kept out of his see for six years; till at last, after the negotiation concluded by the legate Pandulf, John and the cardinal met at Winchester in July, 1218, and the latter was fully acknowledged as archbishop. In the close union, however, that now followed between John and Innocent, Langton, finding his own interests and those of the clergy in general, so far as they were opposed to those of the king, disregarded the pope, joined the cause of the English barons, among whom the eminence of his station and the ascendency of his talents soon gave him a high influence, and in whose councils he at once took a prominent part. At the meeting of the heads of the revolters and the king at Nunnymende he was present, and it was through his efforts that the charter of Henry I was renewed. Among the subcumbering witnesses to the Magna Charta his name stands foremost; and from his name to that of the rest of the cause of the national liberties, which he had just joined, without swerving throughout the rest of the contest, a course by which he greatly offended the pope. Indeed, so sincerely devoted to the interests of his native country was Stephen Langton that he hesitated not to act not only in direct opposition to the wishes of his friend, the Roman pontiff, but he even refused to comply with his demand to publish the document containing the announcement of excommunication of the barons who had rebelled against the king, a punishment which Innocent sought to inflict in order to please John, whose warm partisan he had been after 1218. Langton did not waver even when threatened with expulsion from the archiepiscopal see; he was suspended in 1215, but was restored in the year following (in February), and was in his place in 1218 on the accession of Henry III. From this time forward Langton busied himself chiefly with the affairs of the Church, instituted many reforms, caused the translation of Becket's relics into a magnificent shrine of gold, set with precious stones, and introduced into England the mendicant orders. He attended the Lateran Council convened at Rome in 1215. He died July 9, 1229.

Langton is generally considered one of the most illustrious men of the age in which he lived. Both as consequently

LATE 18TH CENTURY

AN ANTHOLOGY OF JEWISH WRITING

The present anthology is a selection of works from the late 18th century that have been influential in shaping Jewish thought and culture. It includes a variety of genres, such as philosophy, law, and mysticism, and features prominent Jewish thinkers such as Moses Mendelssohn, Isaac Ben-Zvi, and Hayyim Ben-Shabbetai.

1. "Maimonides' Guide to the Perplexed" by Moses Mendelssohn

2. "The Three Breaks" by Isaac Ben-Zvi

3. "The Kabbalistic Essays" by Hayyim Ben-Shabbetai

4. "The Jewish Encyclopedia" by Simon Dubnow

5. "The Book of Legends" by Solomon Ibn Gabirol

These works have had a significant impact on Jewish thought and continue to be studied and referenced by scholars and students today.

Lanado, Samuel Ben-Abraham, another Italian rabbi of note, flourished at Aleppo about 1560. He wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, and a commentary on Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, which have not as yet been published.

Lanado, Samuel, born at Venice in 1504-1565. He explains the Pentateuch according to the Sabbath Lessons [see Haphtarot] in the Midrashic manner.—A commentary on Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, entitled ה_Delete from previous volume_, which was first published in Venice in 1563, and excerpts of it are printed in Frankforter's Robbinen Bible (q.v.). It consists chiefly of extracts from the expositions of Rashi, Aben-Ezra, Ralbag, etc.—A commentary on Isaiah, called יבשתב, A Vessel of Pure Gold (Venice, 1657). It is a very lengthy commentary, and, like the former, is chiefly made up from the expositions of Rashi, Aben-Ezra, Ralbag, etc. See Fürst's Bibliothek orientalischer Schriften, ii, 292; Stolzenberger, Catalogus Librorum Hebrorum. Lanka, the ancient name of the capital of Ceylon, is celebrated in Hindu mythology as the chief city of the giant Ravana (q.v.), who, by carrying off Sita, the wife of Rāma, caused the conquest of Ceylon by the latter personage, who is considered as an incarnation of the god Vishnu.

Lanneau, Basil E., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Charleston, South Carolina, March 22, 1880, and was educated at Charleston College, where he graduated in 1886. He completed a course of theology at Columbia Seminary, N.C., in 1885, and was immediately appointed tutor of Hebrew in the same institution. In 1884 he was ordained, and made pastor of a Church at Lake City, Florida; from 1886 to 1896 he was editor of the Southern Presbyterian, at Charleston, and then returned to Lake City. In October, 1899, he was elected to the chair of ancient languages in Oakland College, Miss., which position he held until his death, July 12, 1900. Lanneau's linguistic acquirements were very extensive. "He was not only a scholar, but an accurate and well-read divine. His style as a writer was chaste and clear."—Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1886, p. 93.

Lanneau, John Francis, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Greensboro, North Carolina, August 14, 1809; was educated at Yale College, class of 1829, and studied theology at the theological seminaries of Princeton, N.J., and Columbia, S.C. He was ordained in 1838, and labored three years for the cause of foreign missions; then went as a missionary to Jerusalem. In 1846 he returned to America, and was called to Marietta, Ga. In 1855 he became pastor at Salem, Va., and in 1861 returned to Marietta, where he died, Oct. 7, 1867. Mr. Lanneau is represented as an able minister, and always eminently influential and acceptable both as a preacher and an elder.—Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 34.

Lannis, Jacob W., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Baltimore Co., Maryland, July 8, 1826; received a collegiate education at Muskingum College, Ohio, and at Jefferson College, Pa., where he graduated in 1852. He studied theology at Alleghany City Theological Seminary, and afterwards with Dr. Edwards, of Fort Wayne, Ind. In 1860 he was ordained pastor of a Church at Waveland, Ind. In 1858 he removed to Nashville, Tennessee, and died there Aug. 9, 1859. Mr. Lannis was very successful in his brief ministry.—Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 95.

Lansing, Nicholas, a minister of the (Dutch) Reformed Church, was born at Albany in 1748. He studied theology under Dr. Westervelt, of that city, and was licensed to preach by a general meeting of ministers and elders in 1780. Among the Dutch clergymen of the last two generations, this venerable man held a reputation for piety and individuality of character that reminded us of Dr. Edwards, of New York, and was converted from Judaism to the Reformed faith in his early youth. He was, while young, captain of a small sailing vessel that ran between Albany and New York, and was converted to Christianity while in this calling. Immediately he consecrated himself to the ministry, although his health was so feeble that his physician said he would not live to enter the pulpit. But God spared him to serve in his sanctuary fifty-five years. He preached regularly until the second Sabbath before his death, at the great age of eighty-seven. "He spent much time day and night in his study, fasting much and being much in prayer. He usually spent much of the night, and sometimes the whole night, in praying. His clothing always gave way first upon the knees." His preaching, which was in the Dutch language, was remarkable for its scriptural character, spirituality, and utter fearlessness. Striking anecdotes are told, and many of his peculiar expressions are yet current, illustrative of these features of his ministry. On one occasion, in a meeting of classis, when called upon by a second time to prolong his sermon to make a brief statement of the condition of his Church, the old man rose suddenly and said, "Mr. President, Tappan! Tappan! all Tappan is dead, and I'm dead too." He sat down and said no more until he was asked to pray, and then poured out his soul in such strains of "power with God" that all who heard him felt that whatever might be the state of his people, he, at least, was not "dead" yet. He observed family worship three times daily during a part of his life. A great revival of religion followed one of his most bold and characteristic sermons in a neighboring place, where people were given up to worldliness and sin. During his last service he sat in the pulpit, as his feebleness obliged him to do frequently in his later years. Like Baxter, he could have said...

I preached as I never should preach again, And as a dying man to dying men.

Referring to the strain of his ministry among them, he said, "I had to do with men who never preach or pray 'Do and live,' but 'Live and do.'" That week he was seized with his last illness, during which he was constantly engaged in prayer, and in speaking for Christ to those who were with him. His last end was peace. Mr. Lansing was settled first in the united churches of what are now Greensboro and Sedgefield, N.C., and afterwards, during 1781-4, and afterwards at Tappan and Clarks-town, in Rockland County, N.Y., 1784-1830, and Tappan alone 1820-23. His home and church in the latter place were near the spot on which major Andre was hung in the Revolutionary War. See Corwin, Manual of the Reformed Church, p. 184 sq. (W. J. R.T.)

Lantern (gavš, so called for its shining) occurs only in Ex. 8:8, where the party of men which went out of Jerusalem to apprehend Jesus in the garden of Getsemane is described as being provided "with foxtails and torches." It probably denotes any kind of covered light, in distinction from a simple taper or common house-light, as well as from a torch. See Cooper, Conn. Gaz., 1785, p. 568. In the article Lamp it has been shown that the Jewish lantern, or, if we may so call it, lamp-frame, was similar to that now in use among the Orientals. As the streets of Eastern towns are not lighted at night, and never two feet long by nine inches in diameter, and is carried by servants before their masters, who often pay visits to their friends at or after supper-time. In many Eastern towns the municipal law forbids any one to be in the streets after nightfall without a lantern.

Lantern, in Italian or modern architecture, a small structure on the top of a dome, or in other similar situations, for the purpose of admitting light, promoting ventilation, or for ornament. In Gothic architecture the term is sometimes applied to spires on the roofs of halls, etc., but it usually signifies a tower which has the whole height, or a considerable portion of the interior, open to view from the ground, and is lighted by an upper tier of windows: lantern-towers of this kind are common over the centre of cross churches. The same name is also given to the light open erections often placed on the tops of towers; these sometimes have spires rising from them, but in such cases they are less perforated with windows. Lanterns des Morts occur only in the church-yards on the Continent; they were simply pillars, with a place for a light on the top similar to small light-houses, and it is not improbable that something of the kind was adopted in the early Roman cemeteries, and so has given origin to some of the Irish round towers, which may well have been used, at least in some instances, for this purpose.

Egyptian monuments offer any trace of the use of a lantern. In this case it seems to be borne by the night-watch, or civic guard, and is shaped like those in common use among ourselves (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg., ii. 72). A similar lantern is at this day used in Persia, and perhaps does not materially differ from those mentioned in Scripture. More common at present in Western Asia is a large folding lantern of waxed cloth strained over rings of wire, with a top and bottom of tinned copper. It is usually about honor of Ceres, when her votaries ran up and down the streets with lighted torches in their hands, in imitation of the hurry and confusion of the goddess when in quest of her daughter Proserpine. Others ascribe the rise of this Chinese festival to an extravagant project of one of their emperors, who shut himself up with his concubines in a magnificent palace, which he illuminated with a thousand lamps. The Chinese, scandalized at his behavior, demolished his palace, and hung the lanterns all over the city. But, however uncertain its origin, it seems pretty definitely established that the lantern-festival was observed as early as A.D. 700 (comp. Williams, Middle Kingdom, ii, 82).

One peculiar custom of this feast is the grant of greater license to married women, who on other evenings, by Chinese custom, are obliged to confine themselves to their homes. The goddess called Mother (q. v.) is worshipped by them at this time, particularly by married but childless women, "expecting or desiring, as a consequence of such devotional acts to 'Mother,' to have male offspring." See Broughton, Bibliotheca Lit. Sacra, ii, 4; Doolittle, Social Life of the Chinese (New York, 1891), 158 sq.

Lantfredus or Lamfridus, a disciple of bishop Ethelbert of Winchester, flourished in the latter part of the 10th century. He is known only by his life of St. Swithun, which is very interesting, as it affords fine facilities for studying the manners and history of his time. "It is a singular fact, says Bower, that its authenticity is in some measure the adoption of numerous words formed from the Greek language." The editions of Lantfredus are those of Henry Wharton, Antonia Sacra, i (London, 1691, folio), 322—Lantfred epistula priorium Historiae de Miracula Swith. acta et vera religiosa. Janu. 1 (Antwerp, 1710), 322—337—Sivithuni Vita et Miracula, per Lamfridum Monacum Winton. See Darling, Cyclopedia, Bibliography, ii, 1767.

Laodicea (strictly Laodicia) (Ἀλοδία, justice of the people), the name of several cities in Syria and Asia Minor, but one of which, usually called Laodicea ad Lycum (from its proximity to the river Lycus), is named in Scripture. It lay on the confines of Phrygia and Lydia, about forty miles east of Ephesus, and is that of the "seven churches in Asia" to which John was commissioned to deliver the awful warning contained in Rev. iii. 14-19. The fulfillment of this warning is to be sought in the history of the Christian Church which existed in that city, and not in the stone and mortar of the city itself; for it is not the city, but "the Church of the Laodiceans," which is denominated. It is true, however, that the eventful fate of that Church must have been fore seen with the south-east expansion of the Persian Empire, and the spread of the synod at Laodicea, in Phrygia, A.D. 530-389, in Von Drey's Theol. Quart. Archv. 1824, p. 3 sq.

Laodicea was the capital of Greater Phrygia (Strabo, xii, p. 576; Pliny, v, 29; or Phrygia Pacatiana, according to the subscriptions of Tim.). It was a very considerable city (Strabo, p. 578) at the time it was named in the New Testament: but the violence of earthquakes, to which this district has always been liable, demolished, some ages after, a great part of the city, destroyed many of the inhabitants, and eventually obliged the remainder to abandon the spot altogether. The town was originally called Deopolis, and afterwards Rhous (Pliny, v, 29); but Laodicea, the building of which is ascribed to Antiochus Theos, in honor of his wife Laodice, was probably founded on the old site. It was not far west from Colossae, and only six miles to the west of Hierapolis (Jos., Antiq., xi, 10, § 37; Tac. Ann., ii, 62; Strabo, xii, 625). At first Laodicea was not a place of much importance, but it soon acquired a high degree of prosperity. It suffered greatly during the Mithridatic war (Appian, Bell. Mith. 20; Strabo, xii, p. 578), but quickly recovered, and was the second city of Asia Minor; and at the end of the republic and under the first emperors, Laodicea became one of the most important and flourishing commercial cities of Asia Minor, in which large money transactions and an extensive trade in wood were carried on (Cicero, ad Fam. ii, 17; iii, 5; Strabo, xii, p. 577; compare Vitruv., viii, 3). The place often suffered from earthquakes, especially from the great shock in the reign of Tiberius, in which it was completely destroyed; but the inhabitants restored it from their own means (Tacit. Ann., xiv, 27). The wealth of the citizens created a taste for the arts of the Greek, as they are manifested from the ruins; and that it did not remain behind-hand in science and literature is attested by the names of the sages Antiochus and Theodas, the successors of *Eisenidesmus (Diog. Laerct, xi, 11, § 106; 12, § 116), as well as by the existence of a great medical school (Strabo, xii, p. 580). During the Roman period Laodicea was the chief city of a Roman conventus (Cicero, ad Fam. iii, 7; ix, 25; xiii, 45, 46, 'xiv, 6; ad Att. v, 15, 16, 20, 21; vi, 1, 2, 8, 7; in Verr., i, 80). Many of its inhabitants were Jews, and it was probably owing to this circumstance that at a very early period it became one of the chief seats of Christianity [we have good reason for believing that, when in writing from Rome to the Christians of Colossae, Paul sent a greeting to those of Laodicea, he did not personally visit either place. But that was rectified by the opening of the Great Synagogue (Acts xviii, 19-xix, 41) must inevitably have resulted in the formation of churches in the neighboring cities, especially where Jews were settled. See LAODICEANS, EPISTLE TO THE], and the see of a bishop (Coloss. ii, 1; iv, 15 sq.; Rev. i, 11; iii, 14 sq.; Josephus, Ant., xiv, 10, § 3), and the seat of the bishopric, and constituted the number of the seven churches in the time of the Prophet (Rev. ii, 13), especially in the time of the Commen; and it was fortified by the emperor Manuel (Nicet. Chron. Assam., p. 9, 81). During the invasion of the Turks and Mongols the city was much exposed to ravages, and fell into decay; but the existing remains still attest its former greatness (see Smith's Dict. of, Gr. and Rom. Geog., s. v. Laodicea). Smith, in his Journey to the Seven Churches (1671), was the first to describe the site of Laodicea. He was followed by Chandler, Cockrell, and Pococke; and the locality has, within the present century, been visited by Mr. Hartley, Mr. Arundell, Col. Leake, and Mr. Hamilton.

Laodicea is now a deserted place, called by the Turks Evli-kâzour ("Old Castle"), a Turkish word equivalent to Palaë-kastor, which the Greeks so frequently apply to ancient sites. From its ruins, Laodicea seems to have been situated upon six or seven hills, taking up a large extent of ground. To the north and north-east runs the river Lycus, about a mile and a half distant; but nearer it is watered by two small streams, the Asopus and Cepaurus, the one to the west, and the other to the east of the south-eastern part of the town; and the Asopus flows into the Meander (Smith, p. 85). Laodicea preserves great remains of its importance as the residence of the Roman governors of Asia under the emperors, namely, a stadium, in uncommon preservation, three theatres, one of which is 640 feet in diameter, and the ruins of several other buildings (Antig. of Ionia, pt. ii, p. 92; Chandler's Asia Minor, c. 67). Col. Leake says, "There are few ancient sites more likely than Laodicea to preserve many curious remains of antiquity beneath the surface of the soil; its opulence, and the earthquakes to which it was subject, rendering it probable that valuable works of art were often there buried beneath the ruins of the public and private edifices (Cicero, Epist. ad Att., ii, 17; iii, 5, v, 20; Tacitus, Annal., xiv, 27). A similar remark, though in a lesser degree, perhaps, will apply to the other cities of the vale of the Meander, as well as to some of those situated to the north of Mount Tmolus; for Strabo (p. 579, 628, 630) informs us that Philadelphia, Sardis, and Magnesia of Sipylos, were, not less than Laodicea and the cities of the Meander as far as Apamea at the sources of that river, subject to the same disastrous calamity (compare Strabo, xii, p. 254)." —"Nothing," says Mr. Hamilton (Researches in Asia Minor, i, 515), "can exceed the desolation and melancholy appearance of the site of Laodicea; the lay persons present shall give it to each other; and that end, the administration of the holy eucharist shall proceed. None except the priests shall be permitted to approach the altar in order to communicate. 20. A deacon not to sit in the presence of a priest and deacon, nor the communion of the latter. The same conduct is enjoined on subdeacons and all inferior clergy towards the deacon. 21, 22. the decisions of this council is canon 11, forbidding the employment of women as preachers. Hefele holds that the canon has hardly been properly translated, and that the desire of the council was simply to forbid superior diocesan jurisdiction in this matter. But for detailed discussion we must refer to Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i, 731 sq. The difficulty as to the meaning arises from the fact that the canons were written in Greek, and the question hinges on the meaning intended for προετριηδας and πρεματαιομενα.

LAODICEAN (Ἀρωνίαξος), an inhabitant of the city of Laodicea, in Phrygia (Coloss. iv, 16; Rev. iii, 14), from which passages it appears that a Christian Church was established there by the apostles. See below.

LAODICEANS, EPISTLE TO THE. "In the conclave and synod of the Colossians (Col. iv, 10), the apostle, after sending to the Colossians the salutations of himself and others who were with him, enjoins the Colossians to send this epistle to the Laodiceans, and that they likewise should read the one from Laodicea to you" (Grammatik d. Neutestamentl. Sprachwiss., p. 484, Lpz. 1890). It must be allowed that such an interpretation of the apostle's words is in itself more probable than the other; for, supposing him to refer to a letter from the Laodiceans to him, the questions arise, How were the Colossians to procure this unless he himself sent it, or what use would such a document be to them? To this latter question the answer was probably: that probably the letter from the Laodiceans contained some statements which influenced the apostle in writing to the Colossians, and which required to be known before his letter in reply could be perfectly understood. But this is said without the slightest shadow of reason from the epistle before us; and it is opposed by the fact that the Laodicean epistle was to be used by the Colossians after they had read that to themselves (ἤρεσιν ἀναγνωριζη, κ. τ. η.). It seems, upon the whole, most likely that the apostle in this passage refers to an epistle which he had composed at Laodicea before his journey thence to the Church at Colossae."

The suggestion of Grotius (after Marcion) that it is identical with the canonical Epistle to the Ephesians has substantially been adopted by Mill and Wetstein, and many modern critics; see, especially, Holzhauser, Der Brief an die Epheser (Hannover, 1844); Baur, Paulus (2d ed. Lpz. 1866-7), ii, 47 sq.; Räbiger, De Christologia Paulini (Breslau, 1852), p. 48; Bleek, Einleitung in das N. T. (2d ed. Berlin, 1866), p. 454 sq.; Haurowitz, Der Apostel Paulus (Halle, 1868), p. 2; Volmar, Commentar zur Offenb. Joh. (Zürich, 1862), p. 66; Kiene, in the Stud. u. Krit. 1869, p. 382 sq.; Klostermann, in the Jahrb. fü. deutsche Theol. 1870, p. 160 sq.; Hitzig, Zur Kritik Paulinischer Briefe (Lpz. 1870), p. 27. The only supposition that seems to meet all the circumstances of the case is that the Epistle to the Ephesians, although not exactly encyclical, was designed (as indeed its character evinces) for general circulation; and that Paul, after having dispatched this, addressed a special epistle to the Colossians on occasion of writing to Philemon, and recommends the perusal of that to the Ephesians, which had reached them by way of the Laodiceans. This explains the doubtful reading ἐπεις, and the absence of personal salutation in the Epistle to the Ephesians, and at the same time the allusion to a letter from Laodicea; while it obviates the objectional hypothesis of the loss of an inspired epistle, to which particular attention has thus been called, and which was therefore the more likely to have been preserved. See EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO. Wieseler's theory (Apost. Zeitalter, p. 450) is that the Epistle to Philemon is an early part of the Canon, but not complete; but for detailed discussion we must refer to Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i, 731 sq. The difficulty as to the meaning arises from the fact that the canons were written in Greek, and the question hinges on the meaning intended for προετριηδας and πρεματαιομενα.

Lao-tzu has at different periods enjoyed the patronage of the Chinese government, therefore, in fact, a constant struggle for ascendency between his supporters and those of Confucius during several centuries at the beginning of our era. Emperors have paid homage to him in his temple, and one of them wrote a commentary on his book. When we turn aside from definite history and give our attention to legends, there is no end to the mysteries thrown around his birth and being. His followers have traced him from the human limit of mortals into an incarnation of deity, and have clothed his philosophic treatise with the authority of a sacred book, being probably moved to this course by a desire to make their founder equal to Sakymuni (see Gautama), and to give the world a chance of acquaintance with his works. He is represented as an eternal and self-existing being, incarnate at various times upon the earth. One account represents him as having been conceived by the influence of a meteor, and after being carried in the womb for seventy-two years, was born in the form of an old man. This account is given by his own son, who is supposed to have been the first preserved record of the life of Lao-tzu, and is thus described: "He was born in the year 570 B.C. and died in the year 472 B.C. He was the son of a scholar and a lady. At the age of twenty, he was disci- plined in the science of the book of the Taotie, the book of the Taoist philosophy. He was the author of the 'Yellow Emperor's Book of the Secrets of Longevity,' which was written in the year 370 B.C. and remained in China for about five centuries. He was the first to introduce the use of iron and bronze in the manufacture of weapons, and is said to have discovered the art of making the 'Yin and Yang' stones, which were used in the manufacture of the 'Yin and Yang' coins. He also invented the 'Yin and Yang' wheels, which were used in the manufacture of the 'Yin and Yang' arrows, and is said to have discovered the art of making the 'Yin and Yang' spears." but chiefly for man. It represents also that ideal state of perfection in which all things act harmoniously and spontaneously, good and evil being then unknown, and the world is at peace. This is the purpose and theme of the whole book, the subject of all the discussion, the manum ism of existence. French and English writers generally have translated Tao by "Reason," some adding "or Logos." There are some striking similarities between Tao and Logos; and in all the translations of the Scriptures into Chinese the Logos of John is rendered by Tao. Julien, decidedly dissenting from the common translation of Tao, adopts "Voic" or "Way,"—giving just cause for his dissent in the fact that Lao-tzu represents Tao as devoid of thought, judgment, and intellige nce. Julien's "Way," however, is also objected to, as it is not a word in the original, while Voic was before all other existences. The "Nature" of mod ern speculators probably answers more nearly than any thing else to Tao, although it will by no means answer all the conditions of the use of Tao by Lao-tzu.

Doctrines.—(1) The teachings of Lao-tzu on speculative physics may be summarized as follows: All exist ing creatures and things have sprung from an eternal, all-producing, self-sustaining unity called Tao, which, although regarded as a potential existence, is also distinctly denominated non-existence, Lao-tzu considering it to be the same as Nothing. Nothing is the "source of all." Watters (see below) thus combines these apparently contradictory views: "Though void, shapeless, and imm terial, it yet contains the potentiality of all substance and shape, and from itself produces the universe, diffusing itself over all space. It is said to have generated the world, and is frequently spoken of as its mother, 'the dark primeval mother, teeming with dreamy beings.' All things that exist submit to it as their chief, but it shows no lordship over them. All the operations of Nature (Tao) occur without any show of effort or violence—spontaneously, unerringly. Though there is nothing done in the universe which Nature does not do, though all things depend upon it for their origin and subsistence, yet in no case is Nature visibly acting. It is in its own deep self a unit—the smallest possible quantity, yet it prevails over the wide expanse of the universe, operating unseen but unseen." Lao-tzu's account of the origin of the universe is, 'Tao begot 1, 1 begot 2, 2 begot 3, and 3 begot the material universe,' which has been explained by commentators that Tao generated the Passive Element in the composition of things, this produced the Active Element, and this the two combined, forming the universe, as brought about the production of all things. The next thing to Tao is heaven—i.e. the material heaven above us. This is pure and clear, and if it should lose its purity would be in danger of destruction. The earth is at rest. To it belongs the small bee, the ant, and this growing home to the origin is called stillness. It is said to be a reversion to destiny. This reversion to destiny is called eternity. He who knows (this) eternity is called bright. He who does not know this eternity wildly works his own misery. He who knows eternity is magnanimous. Being magnanimous, he is virtuous. He is also a Catholic, he is a king. Being a king, he is heaven. Being heaven, he is Tao. Being Tao, he is enduring. Though his body perishes, he is in no danger. And again, at chap. xxviii., "He who knows the light, and at the same time keeps the dark, is the whole world's model. Being the whole world's model, eternal virtue will not miss him, and he will return home to the absolute." The attainment, then, of this state of absolute vacuity he looks upon as the chief good, and warns such as have attained to it to keep themselves perfectly still, and to avoid ambition. And, in alluding to the fact that emptiness or non-existence is superior to existence, he says that the former may be said to correspond to the other, the latter to gain. "Tao is empty." "The space between heaven and earth may be compared to a below; though empty, it never collapses, and the more it is exercised the more it brings forth." To enforce this theory he draws an illustration from common life, and says, "Thirty spokes unite in one nave, and by that part which is non-existent (i.e. the hole in the centre of it) it is useful for a carriage-wheel. Earth is moulded into vessels, and by their hollow cavity they are useful as vessels. Doors and windows are cut out in order to make a house, and by its hollowness it is useful as a house.

Since the 2nd century A.D. the Taoists have greatly spread in China, Japan, Cochino-China, Tonquin, and among the Indo-Chinese nations. In our day they are especially popular with the common people, and in some parts of China their influence rivals that of the Buddhists. Although they have, however, seemingly neglected the teachings of their founder; the worship of original Taoism has been degraded into the lowest idolatry, while its priests are jugglers and necromancers, among whom scarcely a trace of the pure spirit of Lao-tzu can be found. Lap (לָאָפ), 2 Kings iv, 39, a garment, as elsewhere; לָאָפְי, Prov. xvi, 33, the bosom, as elsewhere; לָאָפ, Neh. vi, 13, the armful, as in Isa. xiii, 22, the fold of the ram in which Orientalasts are accustomed to carry articles in lieu of pockets. Instead of the idols or clay that was used by the Romans, the Arabs join together with thread, or with a wooden bodkin, the two top corners of their upper garment; and, after having placed them first over one of their shoulders, they then fold the rest of it about their bodies. The outer fold serves them frequently instead of an apron, in which they carry herbs, loaves, corn, and other articles, and may illustrate several allusions made to it in Scripture: thus one of the sons of the prophets went out into the field to gather herbs, and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild grapes his lap full (2 Kings iv, 39). The Psalmist offers up his prayers that Jehovah would "render unto his neighbors sevenfold into their bosom their reproach" (Psa. xii, 12). The same allusion occurs in our Lord's direction, "Give, and it shall be given unto you, good measure, pressed down and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom" (Luke vi, 38). Laphitha (Λαφίθα), in mythical geography, a people of Thessaly, chiefly known to us from their failed contests with the Centaurs. The battle between the Centaurs and the Lapithae has been minutely described by Heriod and Ovid.—Brande and Cox, ii, 317.

Laphrisia (Λαφρίσια), a surname of Artemis or Diana among the Cynodians, from whom the worship of the goddess was introduced at Naupactus and Patras, in Achaia. At the latter place it was not established till the time of Augustus, but it became the occasion of a great annual festival (Pausanias, iv, 31, § 6; viii, 18, § 6, etc.; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1087). The name Laphrisia was traced back to a hero, Laphris, son of Castalius, who was said to have lived in the vicinity of the temple, for the purpose of swearing by them ("per jovem Laphrisiam") at Calydon. Laphrisia was also a surname of Athene or Minerva (Lycoephron, 356).—Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, vol. ii, s. v.

Lapides Jewish (Jewish Stones). In the chalky beds which surround in some parts the summit of Mount Carmel, I found numerous hollow stones, lined in the inside with a variety of sparry matter, which, from some distant resemblance, are supposed by the natives to be petrified olives, melons, peaches, and other fruit. These stones are considered not only as curiosities, but as antidotes against several diseases. Those which bear some resemblance to the olive have been designated Lapides Judaei, otherwise "Eliah's Melons," and are superstitiously regarded as an infallible remedy for stone and gravel when dissolved in the juice of lemons. Those supposed petrified fruits are, however, as Dr. Shaw states, only so many different-sized Flint-stones, beautified with by sparry and stalagmitical knobs, which are fancifully taken for fossils, and known as lapides judaei.

Laph'idoth (Hebrew לָפְּרִיתּ, ḥarōth, Sept. ἄρκαδας, the husband of Deborah the prophetess (Judg. iv). He may have resided with her at the time of her public services as female judge (ver. 5), or more probably he was deceased, and she is named as his widow. B.C. ante 1409. From the fact that the name is in the form of a fem. plur. some have taken it to mean her place of residence (לָפְּרִיתּ, komes of; being understood before it), but without probability (Bërthaean, ad loc.). By others the term laphidoth has been understood to denote merely her character (q. d. "woman of splendor," i.e. noble, brilliant), or even her occupation merely (q. d. lep-tom-činer); but all these are equally nugatory suppositions. See DIBORAH.

La Philoméne, FRANÇOIS, an eminent French writer, was born in the second half of the 17th century. After writing for some time a member of the Order of the Jesuits, he was converted to Protestantism, and on this account was obliged to flee the country. He took refuge first in Holland, then in England, where he was welcomed to the Church of Bishop Hobart. (The actual time of his death is not ascertained. He wrote L'athéisme dévoilé par le P. Hardouin, Jésuite, dans les écrits de tous les Pères de l'Eglise et des philosophes modernes (1715, 8vo); and in St. Hyacinthe, Mémoires Littéraires, 1716):—L'Abus des Confessions de Foi (1716, 8vo):—An Answer to the R. He translated also into French Pope's Essay on Criticism (1717); Plauto's Republic (1725, 8vo); Burnet's Histoire des dernières Révolutions d'Angleterre (La Haye, 1725, 2 vols. 4to; London, 3 vols. 12mo; latest ed. Lapis (the stone), a surname of Jupiter at Rome, as is evident from the expression "Jovem Lapidem" (Cicero, ad Fam. vii, 12; Gallius, i, 21; Polybius, iii, 26). It was formerly believed that Jupiter Lapis was a stone statue of the god, or originally a rude stone serving as a symbol, around which people assembled for the purpose of worshipping Jupiter. But it is now generally acknowledged that the pebble or flint-stone was regarded as a symbol of lightning, and that therefore, in some representations of Jupiter, he held a stone in his hand instead of the thunderbolt (Arnobius, adv. Gent. iv, 25). Such a stone ("lapis Capitolinus," August. de Civ. Del. ii, 29) was even set up as a symbolic representation of the god himself (Serv. ad Aen. viii, 641). When a treaty was to be concluded, the sacred symbols of Jupiter were taken from his temple, viz. his sceptre, the pebble and the thunderbolt, to be immersed in the fountain of the temple, for the purpose of swearings by them ("per jovem Lapidem jugando") at Calydon, i, 24; xxx, 43. A pebble or flint-stone was also used by the Romans in killing the animal when an oath was to be accompanied by a sacrifice, and this custom was probably a remnant of very early times, when metal instruments were not yet used for such purposes.—Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, s. v.

La Placette, Jean, a distinguished French Protestant theologian and moralist, was born at Pontac, in Béarn, Jan. 19, 1639, and studied theology at the Protestant Academy of Montauban. Appointed pastor of Orthez in 1669, he removed in the same capacity to Nal in 1664, and remained there until the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, refusing several pressing invitations from the important congregation of Charanten. At the revocation he obtained leave to go to Holland, from whence he afterwards went to Prussia. In 1686 he finally accepted the presidency of the Protestant Church at Copenhagen, which he held until 1711. He then resigned and retired to Utrecht, where he died April 25, 1718. His principal works are, Traité des Bonnes Oeuvres en général, 1709, 12mo; Logique et Mathématique, etc. (Amst. 1696, 12mo); La mort des justes, ou la manière de bien mourir (La Haye, 1729, 12mo); — Traité de la foi divine (Hertz, 1716, 3 vols. 12mo); — La communion dévote, ou la manière de participer saintement et utilement à l'Éucharistie (Amst. 6th ed. 1706, 12mo); — La morale Chrétienne admirable, etc. (Amst. 2d ed. 1701, 12mo); — Essai de morale (Amst. 1707, 12mo); — Nouvelles Littératures, etc. (La Haye, 1715, 2 vols. 12mo); — The incurable Stérilité de la... and severe; the summer lasts only nine weeks, but is, in consequence of the very long days, almost as hot as in Italy, and, owing to the innumerable mosquitoes, most oppressive for both man and beast. Only in the southern part of Swedish Lapland is the soil capable of cultivation; the corn is sown towards the close of May, and reaped in the middle of July, but is often spoiled by night frosts. The territory is but very thinly settled, and only a part of it is now occupied by the people to which it owes its name, the southern and better portions having been gradually encroached upon by Norwegians, Swedes, and Finns, till the Laplanders pretty much shut themselves up within the circle of the Arctic Circle. The territory is politically divided into three parts: 1. Norwegian Lapland or Finnmarsk, containing 27,315.70 square miles and 18,668 inhabitants, all Laplanders, or, as they are here called, Finnars. 2. Swedish Lapland, containing 49,035.17 square miles, with a population of 27,445 inhabitants, of which only 5665 are Laplanders, and all the remainder Swedish colonists, whose number has steadily increased since 1750, when the first two Swedish families settled in the country. 3. Russian Lapland, which partly belongs to Finland, partly to the government of Archangel, and embraces Eastern Lapland, with the peninsula of Kola, also called the Lapland peninsula. The number of Laplanders in Russian Lapland had in 1852 been reduced to 2290. The native inhabitants, Laplanders or Laps, call themselves Sami or Samelads, and consider Lapland and Lapps as synonyms. They are divided into Fjell-Lapper, Finner, mountain Laplanders, who lead a nomadic life, and pasture large reindeer herds; or Skoges-Lapper, forest Laplanders, chiefly occupied with hunting and fishing, leaving their herds of reindeer in charge of the preceding class; or Soit-Finner, sea or shore Lap-landers, who, too poor to possess much herd, have been obliged to fix their residence upon the coast, and subsist chiefly by fishing; or Sockne Lapper, parish Lappers, who hire themselves out as servants, chiefly for tending the reindeer. They are good-natured, honest, superstitious, and patriotic, and, with the exception of an inclination to drunkenness, they show neither great vices nor great virtues. The origin of the Laplanders is not yet fully cleared up, as their physical characteristics point partly to the Mongolian and partly to the Caucasian race. The prevailing opinion, however, is, that they are only a variety of the Chirchians of Finsmark. The Laplanders did not begin until, in 1757, a part of their territory was annexed to Sweden. For several centuries, however, no results were obtained except the introduction of Christian baptism and Christian marriage. The Laplanders belong to the archbishopric of Nidaros (Dronebrom); the Swedish to the archbishopric of Upsala. Gustavus I, of Sweden, in the first half of the 16th century, established the first Lap-land school in the town of Pilsä. Charles IX and Chris-tina made great efforts for bringing them over to the Lutheran religion, while in Norwegian Finmark king Christian IV, of Denmark (about 1600), extirpated the remnants of paganism by force. The Christianization of this part of Lapland was completed by the zeal of bishop Eric Bredahl, of Dronten (1648 to 1672), and his successors. At the beginning of the 18th century, Isaac Olsen, a poor schoolmaster, following fourteen years, labored among the Laplanders for their Christianization, and king Frederick IV, of Denmark, in 1715 and 1717, for the same purpose, established theological seminaries in Copenhagen and Dronten. In 1730 king Christian VI issued a royal order that every Laplander, before the nineteenth year of his age, must receive confirmation, from which time the parents began to bestow greater care upon the education of their children. The government appointed travelling teachers, and also several resident clergy, who at first found their progress greatly retarded by the ignorance of the Laplanders and their language. The kings of Sweden since Frederick I (1748) worked with great zeal, but little success, for the entire conversion of the Laplanders. In the treaty of Friedrischhoven Sweden had to cede its Lapland territory to Russia, but in 1814, in the treaty of Kiel, it received another portion from Norway. The most zealous missionary who has labored among the Laplanders was pastor Stocklef (born in 1878), who joined them in the middle of the last century, and labored in their own language, which it cost him great efforts to learn. At present divine service is held in the Lappish, Swedish, and Finnish languages. During the summer months the Laplanders, who during this time are moving with their reindeer further into the mountains, are visited by the men of South Sweden, who, in the summer, show great docility for the reception of the Christian doctrine, but their Christianity is still mixed up with many superstitious views and pagan customs. The Roman Catholic Church established in 1855 the Prefecture-Apostolic of the North Pole, which embraces Lapland, the Färö Islands, Greenland, and the northernmost part of America. The apostolic prefect resides at Tromsø, the capital of Finnmark; another Laplandish station has been established at Altengard. See Wiggers, Kirch. Statistik, ii, 421 sq. Neher, Kirch. Statist. 1868, 406 sq. (A. G.)

Lapping (Lp.) to lick up like a dog, 1 Kings xxii, 19, etc.) of water by "putting their hand to their mouth," spoken of as a test in reference to Gideon's men (Judg. vii, 5, 6), is still in the East supposed to distinguish those who evince an alacrity and readiness which fits them in a peculiar manner for any active service in which they are to be engaged. See Gideon. Among the Arabs, lapping with their hands is a common and very expedient way of taking in liquids. "The dog drinks by shaping the end of his long, thin tongue into the form of a spoon, which it rapidly introduces and withdraws from the water, sometimes before the fluid into his mouth. The tongue of man is not adapted to this use; and it is physically impossible for a man, therefore, to lap literally as a dog laps. The true explanation, probably, is that these men, instead of kneeling down to take a long draught, or successive draughts from the water, employed their hand as the dog employs his tongue—that is, forming it into a hollow spoon, and dipping water with it from the stream. Practice gives a peculiar tact in this mode of drinking; and the interchange of the hand between the water and the mouth is so rapidly managed as to be comparable to that of the right and left hands in similar circumstances. Besides, the water is not usually sucked out of the hand into the mouth, but by a peculiar knack is jerked into the mouth before the hand is brought close to it, so that the hand is approaching with a fresh supply almost before the previous draught has been swallowed, and this resemblance to the action of a dog's tongue. On coming to water, a person who wishes to drink cannot stop the whole party to wait for him when travelling in caravans, and, therefore, if on foot, any delay would oblige him to unusual exertion in order to overtake his party. He therefore drinks in the manner described, and has satisfied his thirst in much less time than one who, having more leisure, or being disposed to more deliberate enjoyment, looks out for a place where he may kneel or lie down to bring his mouth in contact with the water, and imbibe it by a long and slow draughts of it." (Kritt, Pictorial Bible, ad loc.)

Lapse is a term used in English ecclesiastical law to denote the failure to exercise the right of presentment or collating a vacant ecclesiastical benefice within the lawful period. On such occasions, if the bishop be the patron, the right to the benefice goes to the archbishop, and if the archbishop omits to take advantage thereof, to the king. So also if any person, other than the bishop, be patron, on his neglecting to present, the right lapses in the first place to the bishop, on the bishop's neglect to present, to the king. The patron, the bishop, and the archbishop are severally and successively allowed the full period of six calendar months, exclusive of the day on which the benefice becomes void; and if the bishop be himself the patron, he must collate to the benefice within the period of the first six months after the vacancy, as he is entitled to six months in his character of patron, and six months more in that of bishop; but if the patron's six months have expired, his right of presentation is not absolutely destroyed by the lapse which then takes place, but the bishop acquires merely a kind of concurrent right with him; for, although the bishop may collate immediately after the lapse, yet, so long as he suffers the benefice to continue vacant, he cannot refuse to institute a person presented by the patron; and, in like manner, when the bishop's six months have expired, the patron may present at any time before the archbishop has filled up the vacancy. By these means provision is made against the improper duration of vacancies in the Church; for when the benefice has continued vacant for six months, the patronage for that term becomes an object of competition between the original patron and the bishop or archbishop, as the case may be, the nominee of that party which presents first being entitled to the benefice. But when the right to present has passed to the bishop and the archbishop, and through their neglect has actually lapsed to the crown, a different rule prevails, arising from an old maxim of English law, that the king's rights shall never be barred or destroyed by delay only. When, therefore, the king has actually occurred, the right of presentation for that term is absolutely vested in him; and if the patron presents while the benefice continues vacant, the king may present at any time after-wards before another vacancy occurs, and may turn out the patron's nominee. But if the patron's nominee is instituted and inducted, and dies incumbent, or if, after his induction, he is deprived by sentence of the ecclesiastical courts, or resigns bona fide, and not with intent to defeat the king's right to present, before the king has exercised his right, he is then held to have his right is destroyed; for he has only entitled to the presentation for one turn, and his having permitted the patron to present for that turn will not entitle him to any other. When the vacancy is occasioned by the death of the incumbent, or by his cession, which is his own voluntary act, being the acceptance of a second benefice incompatible with the one which he already holds, the patron is bound to take notice of the vacancy, without its being notified to him by the bishop, and his six months are calculated from the time at which the vacancy actually occurs. But when the incumbent is deprived by sentence of the ecclesiastical courts, and dies in office, such resignation being necessarily made into the hands of the bishop, it is held that, as neither his deprivation nor resignation can be complete without the concurrence of the bishop, the bishop ought to notify the vacancy to the patron, and that the patron's six months are to be calculated from the time at which such notice is given. And in like manner, if the patron presents in due time, and the bishop refuses to institute the person so presented on the ground of his insufficiency, the bishop ought, if the patron be a layman, to give notice of his refusal, and inform him that the vacancy can only be filled, but if the patron be a spiritual person, it appears from the old law-books that no notice is necessary, because the spiritual person is presumed to be a competent judge of the morals and abilities of the person whom he has selected for the episcopal appointment. If, on account of some such neglect or omission on the part of the bishop, the benefice does not lapse to him, it cannot lapse to the archbishop or to the king; for it is a rule that a lapse cannot take place per saltum, that is, by leaping over or leaving out the intermediate steps. This rule protects the patron's right from being ever injured by the improper refusal of the bishop to institute his nominee; for the bishop can take no advantage of that which is occasioned by his own wrongful act, neither can the archbishop or the king, for the reason alleged above. This right of lapse appears to have been first established about the time of the reign of Henry II, and to be coeval with the practice of institution. Preceding to that period the incumbent's title was complete, upon his appointment by the patron, without his being instituted by the bishop. But the cession of the patron to the bishop, which is the consent and assent by which a new clergy independent of the laity, strongly opposed this custom (procem conunctudinem, as Pope Alexander III, in a letter to Thomas a Becket, designates it), and insisted that the right of appointing to ecclesiastical benefices belonged exclusively to the bishops. This introduced the ceremony of institucionem, but it is, however, contended by some that that institution is as ancient as the establishment of Christianity in England; but Blackstone (i. 35) maintains that it was introduced at the time stated above. After that period the bishop alone had the power of confirming the legal title to the vacant church, which he did by institution; but he was still bound to institute the person presented to him for that purpose by the patron, provided the patron presented some one. But how long was the bishop to wait to see whether it was the patron's intention to exercise his right of presentation? The law declared that he should wait a reasonable time; and with a due regard to the interest of the patron and the convenience of the public, it has settled that time to be six months. See Jus Devolutum (sanguinis). See Lapsi.

Lapsi, in the more extended meaning of the word, "the fallen," especially those who were excluded from communion with the Church on account of having committed one of the peccata mortalia. In a more restricted sense, it was used to denote such as had fallen away," i. e. committed the peccatum mortale of denying their faith. It was natural that these should be first designated by the expression of "lapiis," as heretics were very numerous in the early ages of the Church, and the question of their reintegration into the Church did not possess so much importance. As, after the close of the persecutions, there were no longer any "lapii" in that sense of the word, it came to be applied as synonymous with penitentia or haretici, though only occasionally.

The "lapii" were especially numerous when persecution assumed the regular systematized form it obtained in Roman law under Nerva and Trajan. Persistence in the profession of Christianity was alone considered a crime against the state. Yet Trajan granted full forgiveness to the Christians who consented to offer up incense before the statues and those of the gods. During the Decian persecution, the situation was made even more simple. Those who shrank from offering up sacrifices were supposed to have done so by the authorities. Indeed, in many instances certificates were given by magistrates that the law had actually been complied with. Such mild measures made it easy for many to recant. Cyprian informs us that large numbers eagerly recanted in Carthage even before the persecution broke out; and Tertullian (De fugis in pernec. c. 18) relates with righteous indignation that whole congregations, with the clergy at their head, would at times resort to the basilica of Maxentius, and there ordain themselves bishops after the end of the persecution, many tried to unite again with the Church. The question now arose whether the Church could again receive them as members, and on what conditions; and also, who had the power to decide that question? In the first place, many penitents were, upon their confessions, readmitted by imposition of hands. Conferences had the privilege of issuing letters of peace (libelli pacis) to the laicized, which facilitated their early reception to communion. But such penitents were ineligible for holy orders, and, if already ordained, they were deposed, not being allowed to resume their clerical functions, but suffered only to remain in lay communion. By degrees these admissions were made still easier, and therefore became a matter of serious consideration by the Council of Ancyra (q. v.), and resulted in the revival of the old Montanist controversy as to the purity and holiness of the Church, besides provoking another as to the extent of episcopal power. On the connexion and acausal which were thus provoked in the African Church, see the articles Cyriac; Demus; Feliciusimus; Martyn and Confessions; Novatian; Novatus. (Compare also Schaff, Ch. Hist. vol. i, § 114 and 115.) Epiphanius asserts that Meletemus revolved the struggle against the laxity of church discipline; yet this assertion is not fully substantiated; the question of authority was already the foremost in these discussions. See Meletius. This was still more the case in the controversy with the Donatists (q. v.).

The only other points to be noticed are some decisions of the Council of Arles, of 309, which were, however, not generally observed without being threatened in their lives or fortunes; yet even those, while declared to be "unworthy of the pity of the Church," were also redmitted. Naturally, as persecution decreased, the Church became less stringent, as it had no need of resorting to external fables, to maintain the integrity of its stories. Even before this the practice of the Eastern Church had become very lenient. Lapwing, in our version, is used for ἐρυθρός (dukiphat, perhaps from ἵππος, the cock for, and ἵππος, head, i.e. topknot), a word which, occurring as the name of an unclean bird only in Lev. xi, 19 and Deut. xiv, 18, affords no internal or collateral evidence to establish the propriety of the translation. It has been supposed to mean "ducksnest," which is sufficiently correct when applied to the nest of the lapwing when applied to the lapwing (Targum, Gullia montanus), or the cock of the woods, Tetrao urogallus, for which bird Bouchart produces a more direct etymology; and he might have appealed to the fact that the Attic is "a winter, exclusive of at least two species of Phrater, or sand-grouse, which probably remain all the year. But these names were anciently, as well as in modern times, so often confounded that the Greek writers even used the term Gallinacea to denote the hoopoe; for Hesychius explains ἰπίως in Ἐξαχθίαν by the Greek appellations of the "ducksnest" (see Bouchart, a. v. Dukiphat); and in modern languages similar mistakes respecting this bird are abundant. Ἐξαχθίαν speaks of the hoopoe by name, and expressly calls it the bird of the rocks (Fregom. 291, quoted by Aristophanes). (A.-Ch.) But it is not to be supposed that these birds build their nests in lofty rocks. Aristotle's words are the same to effect, for he writes, "Now some animals are found in the mountains, as the hoopoe, for instance" (F. A. 1, 1). When the two lawsuits-wearied citizens of Athens, Exeipides and Phæthetron in the comedy of the Birds, Aristophanes (200), beans in their search for the home of Epops, king of birds, their ornithological conductors lead them through a wild, deserted tract terminated by mountains and rocks, in which is situated the royal aviary of Epops. The Septuagint and Vulgate agree with the Arubian interpreters in translating the Hebrew term by ἰπίως and ἵππος; and, as the Syrian name is κυκάφη, and the Egyptian κυκαφή, both apparently of the same origin as dukiphat, the propriety of substituting hoopoe for lapwing in our version appears sufficiently established. The word hoopoe is evidently onomatopoetic, being derived from the voice of the bird, which resembles the words "hoop, hoop," softly but rapidly uttered. "It uttereth at times a sound closely resembling the word hoop, hoop, hoop, but breathed out so softly, but rapidly, as to remind the hearer of the sneeze of the dog after the dust of a broom (Plut. De mor. 176). The Germans call the bird Ein Hopf, the French, Le Huppe, which is particularly appropriate, as it refers both to the crest and note of the bird. In Sweden it is known by the name of Hår-Foje, the army-bird, because, from its ominous cry, frequently heard in the wolds of the forest, while the bird itself moves off as any one approaches, the common people have supposed that seasons of scarcity and war are impending (Lloyd's Sound, Advert., ii, 521).

The hoopoe is not uncommon in Palestine at this day (Vonlack, Die Ermiten, p. 7; Russel, Aleppo, ii, 81; Höst, Nuebr. v. Marroko, p. 297; compare Jerome, ad Zech. v. 9; Bechstein, Naturaurei, ii, 547), and was from remote ages a bird of mystery. Many and strange are the stories which are told of the hoopoe in ancient Oriens, concerning their mystical fables and their stories. It is evident that the practice of the Eastern Church had become very lenient. See Tertullian, De pudicitia; De pessimis; Cyriac, De lapita; epistola; epp. canonice Dionysii Alexandrinii, c. 262; Mansi, Acta Concil. ter wades in the mud when the Nile has subsided, and seeks for worms and insects; and the former is known to rear its young so much immersed in the shards and fragments of beetles, etc., as to cause a disagreeable smell about its nest, which is always in holes or in hollow trees. Though an unclean bird in the Hebrew law, the common migratory hoopoe is reared in Egypt, and sometimes also in Italy; but the stationary species is considered inedible. See Macgillivray’s British Birds, iii, 45; Yarrell, Brit. B. ii, 178, 2d ed.; Lloyd’s Quadrupedal Adventures, ii, 221. The chief grounds for all the filthy habits which have been ascribed to this much-maligned bird are to be found in the fact that it resorts to dung hills, etc., in search of the worms and insects which it finds there. A writer in Ibis, i, 49, says, “We found the hoopoe a very good bird to eat.” Tristram says of the hoopoe (ibid., i, 27): “The Arabs have a superstitious reverence for this bird, which they believe to possess marvellous medicinal qualities, and call it ‘the Doctor.’ Its head is an indispensable ingredient in all charms, and in the practice of witchcraft.” See Bach-

Dr. Thomson, however, dissent from the common view above that the Hebrew dukiphit is the ordinary bed-hood or hoopoe, on the ground that the latter “is a small bird, good to eat, comparatively rare, and therefore not likely to have been mentioned at all by Moses, and still less to have been classed with the unclean.” He proposes the English pecut, called by the natives now and bu-rett. ‘The bird appears in Palestine only in the depth of winter. It then disperses over the mountains, and remains until early spring, when it entirely disappears. It roosts on the ground wherever night overtakes it. It utters a loud scream when about to fly, which sounds like the last of the above names. It is regarded as an unclean bird by the Arabs. The upper parts of the body and wings are of a dull slate-color, the under parts of both are white. It has a topknot on the hinder part of the head pointing backward like a horn, and when running about on the ground closely resembles a young hare” ( Land and Book, i, 104).

Lardner, Dionysius, Ill.D., a distinguished English writer on physical science, was born in Dublin April 3, 1798, and was appointed professor of natural philosophy and astronomy in University College, London, in 1828. In 1830 he projected a sort of Encyclopaedia consisting of original treatises on history, science, economics, etc., by the most eminent authors, and 134 volumes were accordingly published, under the general name of Lardner’s Cyclopaedia, between 1830 and 1844. Some of these volumes were from his own pen. A second issue of this work was begun in 1838. He has published various scientific works, the most important of which are his “hand-books” of various branches of natural philosophy (1844-56). He is also the author of the Museum of Science and Art, an excellent popular exposition of the physical sciences, with their applications. He died in Paris April 29, 1850.

Lardner, Nathaniel, D.D., a very noted English theologian and minister of the Presbyterian Church, of Arian tendency, was born in Hawkshurst, in Kent, in 1694. In early life he was a pupil of Dr. Joshua Okey, field, a man of high eminence in that denomination. But, like many of the Dissenters of his time, he preferred to go abroad to prosecute his studies. He spent more than three years at the University of Utrecht, where he studied under Grevisius and Burman, and was then some time at the University of Leyden. He returned to England in 1708, and continued to prosecute his theological studies with a view to the ministry, which he entered at the age of twenty-five. He began preaching at Stoke-Newington in 1709, but, owing to his want of power to modulate his voice, soon became private chaplain and tutor in the family of lady Truby. In 1724 he was appointed lecturer at the Old Jewry, where he delivered in outline his work, The Credibility of the Gospel History (London, 1727-48, 5 vols. 8vo), generally acknowledged as constituting the most unanswerable defence of Christianity to our own day. “The work is unequalled for the extent and accuracy of its researches; and whatever supplement it, but it is not likely that they will ever surpass it” (W. J. Cox in Kitto). Sir James Mackintosh, in his remarks on Paley (in the View of the Progress of Ethical Philosophy), rather discredit its general usefulness as a theological work, because it “excretes the greater part of readers,” though there are many eminent English critics who think otherwise (compare Allison, Dict. of Engl. and Am. Authors, ii, 1060). But even Sir J. Mackintosh concedes that with the scholar it has power: “The few who are more patient have almost always been gradually won over to feel pleasure in a display of knowledge, probity, charity, and meekness unmatched by an avowed advocate in a case deeply interesting his warmest feelings” (compare also Leland, Irregular Writers). In 1729 he was unexpectedly called to the Church in Crutched Friars, which position he accepted and held for about twenty-two years. He died at his native place in 1768, having devoted his long life to the prosecution of theological inquiry, to the exclusion of almost any other subject. As a supplement to The Credibility, Lardner wrote History of the Apostles and Evangelists, writers of the N. Test. (1756-57; again 1786, 3 vols. 8vo; also in vol. ii of Watson’s Colle. ct. of Tracts. Dr. Lardner likewise wrote many other treatises, in which his store of learning is brought to bear on questions important in Christian thealogy. The most remarkable of these, his minor publications, are his Letter on the Logos (1759), in which it distinctly appears that he was of the Unitarian or Socinian school; and History of the Heretics of the first two Centuries after Christ (published after his death 1780, 4to), with additions by John Hogg. The best edition of Lamb- massac's works is that by Dr. Andrews Kippis (London 1788, 11 vols. 8vo); but it is no mean proof of the estimation in which they are held, that, large as the collection is, they were reprinted entire as late as 1888 (London 10 vols. 8vo, a very handsome edition). His writings, now more than a century old, are still read, and their weight in the scale of modern thought is considerable. With respect to the side of truth," so much so that not only ministers and students of theology of our day can ill afford to be without them, but every intelligent layman who seeks to do his duty in the Church, of which he is a part, should possess and study them. "In the applause of Dr. Lascelles," says T. H. Horne (Bib. Bib., p. 368), "all parties of Christians are united, regarding him as the champion of their common and holy faith. Seeker, Porter, Watson, Tomline, Jortin, Hay, and Paley, of the Anglican Church; Doddridge, Kippis, and Priestley, among the Dissenters, and all foreign Protestant Bibles, volunteers, writers, for ages, are indebted for his sagacity, his faith, and his great merits as a Christian apologo- cate. The candid of the literal of the Romish communion have extolled his labors; and even Morgan and Gibson, professed unbelievers, have awarded to him the merit of fidelity. Every man of letters is a witness of scattered evidences in favor of the authenticity of the evangelical history, he established a bulwark on the side of truth which invidious has never presumed to attack." See Dr. Kippis, Life of Lascelles, in vol. i. of the works of the latter; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, ii, 1067; English Cyclopedia, s. v.; Farrar, Critical Hist. of Free Thought, p. 486; Dorner, Person of Christ, i, ii, iii., App. p. 407.

Larés, in connection with the Mānas and the Pērīkāra, were tutelary spirits, genii, or deities of the ancient Romans. The derivation of the names is not perhaps quite certain, but the first is generally considered the plural of lar, an Etruscan word signifying "lord" or "here;" the second is supposed to mean "the good or beneficent one;" and the third is connected with per, "the innermost part of a house or sanctuary." The Larès, Manes, and Penates do not appear to have been regarded as personal divinities different in their characteristics, but the latter three are generally used either interchangeably or in such a conjunction as almost implies identity. Yet some have thought that a distinction is discernible, and have looked upon the Larès as earthly, the Manes as infernal, and the Penates as heavenly protectors— a notion which has been repeated or confirmed by the general name for the souls of the departed, those who inhabit the lower world; while among the Penates are included such great deities as Jupiter, Juno, Vesta, etc. Hence we may perhaps infer that the Manes were just the Larès viewed as departed spirits, and that the Pen- ates embraced not only the Larès, but all spirits, whether demons or deities, who exercised a "special provin- cence" over families, cities, etc. Of the former, the Larès, we know almost nothing distinctively. An annual fes- tival was held in their honor on the 19th of February, called Februalia, or Festival of the Larès. It was celebrated at Rome after the advent of the Pagan rites, and exalted to the rank of protectors of their descendants. They were, in short, household gods, and their worship was really a worship of ancestors. The first of the Larès in point of honor was the Lar fas- cicularis, the founder of the house, the family Lar, who accompanied the ancestors in the labyrinth of the Larès, and Larès publici had a wider sphere of influence, and received particular names from the places over which they ruled. Thus we read of Larès capitales (the Larès of cross-roads), Larès ecorum (the Larès of streets), the Larès rurales (the rural Larès), Larès ridicul (the Larès of the highways), Larès peruaniri (the Larès of the sea), and the Larès cubiculari (the Larès of the bedchamber). The images of these guardian spirits or deities were placed (at least in larès publici) in small shrines or compartments called indicula or lararia. They were worshipped every day; whenever a Roman family sat down to meals, a portion of the food was presented to them; but particular honors were paid to them on the first of the months, and in the month of July the Larès were assembled in a great public sacrifice. The gatherings the lararia were thrown open, and the images of the household gods were adorned with garlands. See Smith’s Dictionary of Classical Biography and Mythology, s. v.

Larned, Sylvester, an American Presbyterian minister, born in Piscataway, Mass., Aug. 31, 1776, was educated at Lenox Academy and Middlebury College, studied theology in Princeton Seminary, and was ordained in July, 1817. His earliest efforts at preaching showed rare gifts of eloquence, and his first sermons, delivered in New York city, attracted large crowds, and converted a considerable number of persons to the faith. Middlebury College, remarked of him in his composition and eloquence he was not surpassed by any youth whom he had ever known; and John Quincy Adams declared that he had never heard his equal in the pulpit. To this wonderful gift of oratory Larned added the strength of a dignified and controlled and a voice of fullness and pathos, thorough and sympathetic appreciation of his theme, and an unyielding devotion to his calling. He had the unusual power of winning his audience with the utterance of almost his first sentence. His very voice was eloquent. Sometimes he was solicited to take the first stations, with the largest salaries; but, desiring to give his energies to build up the Church where it was weak, he went to New Orleans, and soon organized a church, the First Presbyterian, over which he became pastor. He labored there with the greatest success, creating deep impressions upon the popular mind until his death, Aug. 20, 1820. Seldom, if ever, has the death of one so young caused such widespread sorrow. His Life and Sermons were published by Rev. R. R. Gurley (New York, 1844, 12mo). - Alli- bone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Larned, William Augustus, a noted American Congregational theologian and professor, was born in Thompson County, Conn., June 23, 1806. His ancestors had lived in that county for four generations, the first of the family being come over in John Winthrop's col- ony in 1630. Provided with suitable opportunities for obtaining an education by his father, a lawyer of consider- able ability and renown, young Larned was gradu- ated at Yale College with honor when about twenty years of age. Although religiously trained he was somewhat sceptical in his youth, but, under the teaching of Dr. Fitch while in college, he was powerfully im- pressed, and in the great revival that occurred soon after his graduation he resolved to be a follower of Christ. After teaching five years, first at Salisbury, N. C., and then for three years as tutor in Yale College, he went upon his theological studies, and was ordained in 1834 pastor of the Second Congregational Church, Millbury, Mass., but was compelled to relinquish this charge in the following year on account of impaired health. From 1835 to 1839 he was professor of rhetoric in Wm. Rev. N. S. Beman, D.D., and Rev. Mr. Kirk, in instructing theological students in Troy, N. Y. Soon after fin- ishing his labors in Troy he was appointed professor of rhetoric and English literature in Yale College, a position which he filled with honor and usefulness till his death, Feb. 5, 1862. Prof. Larned's literary labors were mostly confined to the New Englander, of which he was editor for two years, and to which he contributed twenty-seven different articles on a variety of topics. As the pastor of a church, as the successor of Dr. Goodrich in the professor's chair, and as a literary man, he acquitted himself with fidelity and success. He was a man simple and unpretending in his tastes and habits, of great industry and perseverance, at once a Christian and as his Saviour. See New Englander, 1862, April, art. ix.; Appleton, New Am. Cyclop. vol. x., n. v.; Congreg. Quart. 1863; Dr. Theodore Woolsey, Funeral Discourse commemorative of Rev. W. A. Larned (New Haven, 1862, 8vo.). (H. A. B.)

LAROCHE, ALAIN DE, also called ALANUS DE REUPE, a French Roman Catholic theologian, was born in Brittany about the year 1428. While yet quite young he joined the Dominicans, studied philosophy and theology at Paris, and was sent to the Netherlands in 1450. After lecturing for a while in the conquests of Lille and Douai, he became professor of theology at Gand in 1468, and at Rostock in 1470. He died at Zwill Sept. 8, 1475. Full of zeal, but very deficient in knowledge, Laroche labored ceaselessly to propagate the use of the rosary; he was the first to preach on this practice, introducing in his sermons marvelous stories which he so neatly invented himself. His works were published more than a century after his death, under the title Bestia Alamus de Reupe reditica, de Pastorali, seu Rosario Christi et Mater, tractatus, in V partes distributa (Friburg, 1619, 4to; Col., 1624, Naples, 1629). Larochefoucauld, François, Duc de, a noted French philosophical writer, the descendant of an old French family of great celebrity, was born in 1613. He early enjoyed the favor and confidence of the court, but involved himself in intrigues against cardinal Richelieu, and in the tumults of the Fronde, and was obliged to retire into private life. Ever attached to literary pursuits, he cultivated the society of the most eminent literary persons of his time, Boileau, Racine, and Mollière, and composed his famous Mémoires (Cologne, 1662; Amsterdam, 1723, etc.), in which he gives a simple but masterly historic account of the political events of his time. In 1665 he published Réflexions sur Sentences et Maximes Morales, a work containing 360 detached thoughts, of which, perhaps, the most celebrated is his definition of hypocrisy, as "the homage which vice renders to virtue." The book is regarded as a model of French prose, and exhibits much acuteness of observation, and a clear perception of the prevalent corruptions and vices of his time. Larochefoucauld died March 17, 1680. His Oeuvres de Complétes were edited by Depping (Par. 1818), and his writings have been commented on by a host of critics of the most different schools, as Voltaire, Vinet, Sainte-Beuve, and Victor Cousin. LAROMIGUIÈRE, Pierre, a distinguished French metaphysician, was born at Livignac-le-Haut, Aveyron, Nov. 3, 1736. He studied at the College of Villefranche, and became successively professor of philosophy at Carcassonne, Lescar, and La Flèche, and Toulouse. In 1759 he went to Paris, where he soon became professor of the normal school. In 1821 he confined himself to his office of librarian of the university, still retaining, however, the title of professor of the faculty of philosophy. He died at Paris Aug. 12, 1827. With the exception of a few miscellaneous works, all his chief labors are to be found in his Leçons de Philosophie (3d ed. Paris, 1831, 8 vols. 12mo). He had been educated a zealous pupil of Condillac, but there were, as Cousin expresses it, two men in Laromiguière, the ancient and the modern; the disciple and the adversary of Condillac.

LAROMIGUIÈRE'S Philosophy.—(1.) Classification of the Faculties.—These powers and capacities he separates into two great classes—those of the understanding and those of the will. The faculties of the understanding he reduces to these three: 1. Attention; 2. Comparison; 3. Reasoning. Of these three, attention is the fundamental principle from which the other two proceed; and of these two, again, the phenomena usually denoted by the words memory, judgment, imagination, etc., are simply modifications. Since, however, these three generic powers, in their last analysis, are all included in the first, the whole of the phenomena of the understanding may be said to spring from the one great fundamental faculty of attention. If we now turn to the will, we find, according to M. Laromiguière, a complete parallel existing between these phenomena and those we have just been considering. The foundation of all voluntary action in man is desire; and in the same manner as we have already seen the two latter faculties of the understanding spring from the first, so now we see springing from desire, as the basis, the two corresponding phenomena of preference and liberty. These three—then, being all published, all the subordinate powers of the will are without difficulty reducible to them, so that, at length, we have the complete man viewed in two different aspects—in the one as an intellectual, in the other as a voluntary being, the chief facts of his intellectual exactly corresponding to those of his voluntary life. Law is the system of all the phenomena of the whole state to a system of complete unity, our author shows that desire itself is, strictly speaking, a peculiar form of attention; that the fundamental principle, therefore, of our intellectual and voluntary life is the same; that the two attentions, broadly viewed, in fact, but another expression for the natural activity of the human mind, is the point from which the whole originally proceeds. Now the contrast between this psychology and that of Condillac is sufficiently striking, the one being indeed, in a measure, directly opposite to the other. Condillac lays at the foundation of his intellectual and active life a faculty purely passive in its nature, and regards all phenomena as simply transformations of it; the other assumes a primitive power, the very essence of which is activity, and makes all our other powers more or less share in this essential power.

(2.) Origins of our Ideas.—Here, in order to swerve as little as possible in appearance from the philosophy of Condillac, he makes the whole material of our knowledge come from our sensibility. Condillac had derived all our ideas from sensation in its ordinary and contracted sense: he had derived them from the passive element of the mind, by reflection, thus taking in the active as well as the passive element to account for the phenomena of the case; M. Laromiguière, however, explains his meaning of the word sensibility in such a manner as to make the foundation still broader than that of Locke himself. Sensibility, he shows, is of four kinds: 1. That produced by the action of external things upon the mind—this is sensation in the ordinary sense of the word; 2. that produced by the action of our faculties upon each other—which is equivalent to Locke's reflection; 3. that which is produced by the recurrence and comparison of several ideas together, giving us the perception of relations; and, 4. that which is produced by the contemplation of human actions, as right or wrong, which is the moral faculty. In this theory it appears at once evident that there is a secret revolt from the doctrines of sensationalism. The activity of the human mind was again indicated, the majesty of reason restored, and, what was still more important, the moral faculty was again raised from its ruins to sway its sceptre over human actions and purposes. M. Laromiguière, the idealist, will always be his disciples' chief point of argument (Moroel, History of Modern Philosophy, p. 631 sqq.).

Laromiguière's works were published, in the 7th edition, as Œuvres de Laromiguière, at Paris, in 1862. See Cousin, Fragmenta philosophica (1880), ii, 468; Damiens, Essai sur l'Histoire de la Philosophie en France au

CHARLES DE, a French Jesuit and celebrated preacher, was born at Paris in 1648; joined the order in 1659, became soon after professor of rhetoric, and at once attracted the attention of Louis XIV by his talents as a preacher and poet. He was for a while sent as a missionary among the Protestants of the Cévennes, but soon returned to Paris, where he was appointed professor of rhetoric in the college Louis-le-Grand. He was also chosen confessor of the dauphin, and of the duke of Berri. He died at Paris May 27, 1725. Larue wrote

L'Officale (Rouen, 1669, 12mo), reprinted under the title

Curriculum Liturgicum (Rouen, 1734, 4 vol., 12mo). Larue was, among a number of profane pieces, a Greek ode in honor of the immaculate conception (1670) — P. Virgilii Maronis Opera, interpretationis et notis, ad usum Delphini (Paris, 1765, 4to, often reprinted) — Sermons (in Migne, Collection des Orateurs Sacrés); these are celebrated as models of pathos, as well as for vehemence of style and grace of diction — Pénitentaires des Saints, etc. (Paris, 1740, 2 vol., 12mo); and a number of theatrical pieces, etc. See Mercure de France, June, 1725; Beillet, Jugesimen des Savants; Journal des Savants, 1895, 1706, 1712, 1735, 1740; and Vergette, Des Poètes français; Théâtre Historique; Moret, Dictionnaire Hist. xix. LA SALLA (Lassallia, derivation unknown), a place mentioned only in Acta xxvii, 8, as a city lying near the Fair Havens, in the island of Crete. Other MSS. have Lasa de (Lasa), and some (with the Vulgata) Thalassa (Thalassa), which latter Beza adopted (see Kuhn, Comment. ad loc.), and Cranmer mentions coins of a Cretan town by this latter name (Ancient Greek, iii, 574); but neither of these readings is to be preferred. It is likely that during the stay at the adjoining port the passengers would have come to St. Paul, ii, 280, n.). It is probably the same as the Leaus of the Peutinger Table, sixteen miles east of Gortyna (see Héck, Kreti, i, 412, 439). In the month of January, 1866, a yachting party made inquiries as to Fair Havens, and was assured that the name Lasala was still given to some ruins in the neighborhood. It lies about the middle of the southern coast of Crete, some five miles east of Fair Havens, and close to Cape Leuca. Mr. Brown thus describes the ruins: "Inside the cape, to the eastward, the beach is lined with masses of masonry. These were composed of small stones cemented together with mortar so firmly that even where the sea had undermined them huge fragments lay on the sand. This sea-wall extended a quarter of a mile along the beach from one rocky face to another, and was evidently intended for the defence of the city. Above we found the ruins of two temples. The steps which led up to one remain, though in a shattered state. Many shafts, and a few capitals of Greek pillars, all of marble, lie scattered about, and a gory wound by a torrent lies bare the substructions down to the rock. To the east a conical rocky hill is girdled by a wall, and on a platform between this hill and the sea the pillars of another edifice lie level with the ground." (Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, Appendix, i, p. 260, 3d edit., where a plan is given). Captain Spratt, R. N., had previously observed some remains which probably represent the harbor of Lasala (see p. 90, 92, 245). It ought to be noticed that in the Description dell' Isola di Candia, a Venetian MS. of the 16th century, as published by Mr. E. Falkener in the Museum of Classical Antiquities, Sept. 1853 (p. 267), a place called Lopeni, with a "temple ruin," was mentioned as "the harbor," as is also in the 17th century, as being close to Fair Havens.

LA SALLE, JEAN BAPTIST DE, a French priest, found- er of the Order of Brethren of the Christian Schools, was born at Rheims April 30, 1651. In 1670 he went to Paris to complete his education at the Seminary of St.
LAS CASAS

Sulpice. He was made canon of Rheims, and was ordained priest in 1671. Struck with the ignorance of the closer classes with regard to religion, he resolved to es-establish a congregation whose chief object should be to teach and elevate them. In 1679 he began teaching in two schools of Rheims, but was subjected to many an-noyances from the secular teachers, and even censured by some of the clergy. He nevertheless continued his labors, gave all his means to the poor, and finally succceeded. A house which he had bought at Rouen, Saint-Yon, became the head-quarters of his order, and when he died, April 7, 1719, the Brethren of the Christian Schools were established at Paris, Rouen, Rheims, and other principal cities of France. Its institution was approved by Benedict XIII in 1726. The Brethren of the Christian Schools take the three vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, but they are not perpetual. La Salle did not wish any priest to be ever received among them.

Their dress consists of a black robe resembling a cas-cock, with a small collar or white bands, black stockings and coarse shoes, a black cloak of the same material as the dress, with wide hanging sleeves, and a broad-brimmed black felt hat, looped up on three sides. Their order became widely disseminated, and they are now scattered nearly through the whole world. In 1854 they counted over 7000 members, employed in France, Algeria, the United States, Italy, etc. Pope Gregory XVIII in 1845 plunged the Church into a storm and he was canonized by Pius IX. La Salle wrote a number of books for the education of children, many of which are still in use; among them we notice Les Devoirs du Chrétien avant Dieu, et les moyens de pouvoir bien s’en acquitter;—Lesутрісніzіи du d’Amour de la Bienveillance et de l’Amour Chitien:—Instructions et Prières pour la Sainte Messe:— Conduite des Ecoles Chrétiennes:—Les douze Vertus d’un bon Maître. He is also considered the author of Mé-dications sur les Éxemples de tous les Démânces et sur les principales Fêtes de l’Avenir, of which a new edition was published in 1825. See also Car-

Lasb’aron [many Lasb’aron] (Heb. Lashkarak), יָּשָּׁרוֹן, signif. unknown; Sept. Αἰσχραῦ, but almost all copies omit: Vulg. Saros, but in the Benedictine text Lasarum, one of the Canaanitish towns whose kings were killed by Joshua (Josh. xii, 18). "Some differce of opinion has been expressed as to whether the first syllable is to be interchanged with the second; see the introduction to the breviary and the preface to the breviary with the ant. implied (see Keil, Jonch, ad loc.).
But there seems to be no warrant for supposing the existence of a particle before this one name, which certainly does not exist before either of the other thirty names in the list. Such, at least, is the conclusion of Bochart (Hieros. i, ch. 81), Roland (Polest. 871), and others, a conclusion supported by the reading of the Tarqum, and the Arabic Version, and also by Jerome, if the Benedictine text can be relied on. The opposite conclusion of the Vulgate, given above, is adopted by Genesius (Thecuresa, p. 649, b), but not on very clear grounds, his chief argument being apparently that, as the name of a town, Sharon would not require the article prefixed, which, as that of a district, it always bears.

The name has vanished from both the Vat. and Alex.
MS. of the Sept., unless a trace exists in the Ḥeber-spaher of the Vat. " (Smith). Masius supposes Lasbaron to be the place mentioned in Acts ix, 35, where the reading of some MSS. is Ἰασφαράνα instead of Ἰασφρον; but there is no evidence to support such a view.
From the fact that in Joshua it is named between Aphek and Madon, and for Fisher’s Dict. is assigned by Fairbairn’s Appendix, p. 181; but the reasoning is wholly inconclusive, and the location utterly out of the question. Lasbaron was possibly the same place with the Lasbana of Gen. x. 19.

LASITIUS. John, a noted Polish Protestant eclesiastical writer, often mistaken, formerly, for the celebrated John A. Lasco, flourished in the second half of the 16th century. He was born of a noble family about 1534, and, as was the custom of his day, was early sent abroad to pursue a course of studies at the high-schools of Basle, Berne, Geneva, and Strasburg. After qui-ting the university he taught for a short time in a private family of one of the most celebrated noble families of Poland, John Krotowsky, an ardent follower of the Moravian Brethren. Of a restless nature, and greatly addicted to study, he soon took up his wandering-staff again, and roamed nearly over all Europe, bringing up, most generally, at some place or other, where he was noted for his learning. First we find him in Paris, next in Basle, next in Geneva, and next in Heidelberg, etc., until, in 1567, he brings up again in Paris, and holds a disputation on the Trinity with the Roman theologian Genebrard (Chro-nolog. lib. iv, a. a. 1582, p. 786). After 1575 Lasitis seems to have settled in his native country, but frequently, even after this date, he went abroad, not for his own gratification, however, but in the interests of the State and the Church. He early became an admirer of the Moravians, and is by many (e.g. Gieseler, Kirchengesch. ii, 4, p. 469) supposed to have joined their sect, but, however, his personal membership certain it is that Lasitius greatly favored the Moravians, and that he was engaged on a history of them. He was one of the most energetic and indefatigable workers among the Poles for the union of all his Protestant brethren into one common bond, and in 1570 (less in 1569) he saw his efforts crowned with success at the Synod of Sendomir. See POLAND. He died July 12, 1599. His history of the Moravians Lasitius enlarged after the union of the Protestant, but it was never published entirely. In 1649 Amos Comenius published an outline of the larger one under the title Johannes Lasiti us, of de origine et rebus gestis Fratrum Bohemicorum liber octavus, cui est moribus et institutis eorum. Ob presen-

Lasius, a very celebrated Roman Catholic prelate, was bishop of Posen from 1414-1426. He was a member of the Council of Constance, and the assembled clergy agreed with him. On his return home he sought cloister life, but was restrained by the pope, and subsequently by his active influence secured such marked prosperity for an episcopal village in Masowia that it was called after his name, Laszkarzewo.

Wetzler und Welte, Kirchen-Lex. s. v.

Lascko (Polish Laski, Latin Lascov), John (1), a very celebrated Roman Catholic prelate of the Church of Poland, was born in the early part of the year 1466. He was at first provost at Skalimierz, then at Posen, and was afterwards chosen by Andreas Roza, of Boryszew, archbishop of Gnesen, as his coadjutor. During the reign of Casimir IV, John Albrecht, and Alexander, he resided at court as chamberlain, and on the death of the archbishop of Gnesen (in 1510) Lascko succeeded him in that eminent position. In 1518 he was sent to the fifth general council of Lateran, together with Stanislaus Ostrog, and in the presence of pope Leo X implored the Christian princes there present to assist Poland and Hungary against the attacks of the Turks and Tartars. In this council Lascko obtained for himself and all succeeding archbishops of Gnesen the title of legatus natus sedis apostolicae. He died May 19, 1531. He wrote Relatio de erroribus Moenchorum, iuxta in concilio Lateranensi anno 1512; 1520; 1528; 1530. His activity as archbishop is manifest in the number of provincial synods over which he presided: 1: at Gnesen, in 1506; 2: at Petrikau, in 1510: 8: same, 1511: 4: Leczycy, 1528; 5: same, 1527; 6: Petrikau, 1580. He was a decided opponent of the Reformation and its propagation in Poland, as is evidenced by his canons and decrees: Constitutions synodorum metropolitanae ecclesiae Gnesenensis, Cracovia, 1560. He wrote also Sanctorum ecclesiasticorum tam ex pontificiis decreta quam in constitutionibus synodorum provinciae Gnesenensis autem statuta in diversis provincialibus synodis. 1508. He was a man of resource and courage, and his activity as archbishop was such that the country was called Lascko. He was a well-informed man, and his writings on history, theology, and ecclesiastical law were regarded with respect and admiration.

Döring, Kirchen-Lex. s. v. (J. H. W.)

Lascko, John (2), one of the most distinguished of the Polish reformers, was born at Warsaw in the early part of 1499, of one of the noblest families of Poland, which, during the 16th century especially, furnished many men illustrious in the Church, in the council, and in the camp. We know a little about John Lascko's early education, but it was probably conducted under the supervision of his uncle (see the preceding article), who would naturally intend him for the priesthood. While he was yet a youth, the German Reformation commenced, and evidently attracted a large share of his attention. The archbishop, however, was his ardent foe, and young Lascko, at the University of Cracow, where Luther's writings were publicly bought and sold, may have contented himself with accepting the current religious sentiments of his countrymen, which by no means accorded with the highest standards of Roman Catholic orthodoxy. At the age of twenty-five he set forth on his travels. It was his purpose to visit the courts and universities of other lands. Passing by Wittenberg, with its Luther and Melanchthon, he directed his course to Louvain, where he seems to have been repelled by the ignorance and bigotry of the priesthood, and thence passed to Zürich, where he ultimately took up his residence. From thence he made occasional visits to Zwolle, and was by him influenced to take a decided stand for the reformatory movement. From Zürich he went to Paris, where he was honorably received, and entered into a correspondence with the sister of the king, the famous Margaret of Navarre, already favorably disposed toward all the churchmen who were interested in the cause of the Reformation, and attracted thereto by the fame of Erasmus, who extended to him a cordial welcome, and did not disdain to accept his hospitable gifts. The veteran scholar admired and praised his young friend, and Lasko seems to have received from him his confidence and affections. Both occupied the same dwelling, and for some months the expense of the household was met from Lasko's purse. Perhaps the fact that at this very juncture the break between Luther and Erasmus took place may not have been without its effect in repelling Lasko from too close association with the German reformer. In October, 1525, Lasko was recalled to Poland, doubtless with a view to be engaged in state employ, or as an ambassador to France or Spain. However this may be, he probably passed through Italy previous to his return, and there formed some acquaintance with such reforming influences as were prevailing there. Not long after his return he fell in with the writings of Melanchthon, with whom he subsequently corresponded, and we may reasonably conclude that by his counsel, or with his sanction, Polish youth were sent abroad to complete their studies at Wittenberg, or in any other place, and thus to be brought into the current of the new truth that was spreading in the land. Notwithstanding his own, no world-wisdom, could have saved him from ruin. There was more of Luther than of Erasmus in such soul-humbling confessions. The death of his uncle, the archbishop (1581), who was resolutely opposed to the cause of reform, restored a certain measure of restraint which had checked young Lasko's freedom of action, if not speculation. No outward manifestation of any radical change of sentiment had hitherto been apparent. He was successively nominated canon of Gnesen, custos of Plock, and dean of Gnesen and Lencica. In accepting these dignities, particularly the last, he expressed his conviction that Erasmus that reform might take place within the Church itself, and to this end he was induced, in a cautious manner, to present the Polish monarch with suggestions as to the necessity of measures directed to that object (Krasinski, ii, 238). During this period his residence at the court of the Polish king, where he was favored with the royal patronage, it is easy to conceive how it might have been expected that Lasko would be the favorite of and receive the appointment of bishop of Cujavia, and the most inviting prospects of ecclesiastical promotion opened before him. But already his hope that the Church of Rome would reform herself had died out. He opened his heart to the king, and freely confessed the views and convictions which forbade his acceptance of the professed Church. With the royal permission, and provided with commendatory letters, he chose temporarily to withdraw from his native land. He directed his course to the Netherlands. At Antwerp he was sought out and his acquaintance cultivated by the most respectable citizens. The royal letters alone would have opened all doors to him. But his final decision to withdraw entirely from the Roman Catholic Church was hastened in or before 1540. In that year he married a woman of humble rank, without dowry, whom he met at Louvain (Krasinski says Mayen, ii, 238). It is not known with what amount of freedom he traveled with Rome irreparable. Instead of returning to his native land, he sought a retired residence at Emden, in Friesland. Count Enno, who was anxious to secure a reforma

The impression which he made in England was favorable, and in a sermon preached before the king Latimer extolled him with high praise. Returning to Emden, Lasko entreated the emperor, who was in the midst of his campaign against the emperor, to give up the cause of Church reform in all his states. Lasko wrote back to his friends in Emden to abide firm, assuring them that it was better to fall into the hands of God than into those of men. His first visit to England was designedly temporary. For six months he resided with Cranmer at Lambeth. The views of the two men were coincident in doctrine, and apparently not greatly divergent in matters of order and discipline. The impressi

Lasko's reputation as the founder of the Protestant Church in Friesland now spread rapidly, and he was repeatedly consulted by foreign rulers and divines on questions of Church polity and order. The duke of Prussia invited him to accept the superintendency of the churches of his dominions, but the project was defeated by the condition on which Lasko insisted that the Church should be independent of the state, and that Lutheran rites, kindred to those of the Roman Catholic Church, should be abolished (Krasinski, i, 238). During this period his residence at the court of the Polish king, where he was favored with the royal patronage, it is easy to conceive how it might have been expected that Lasko would be the favorite of and receive the appointment of bishop of Cujavia, and the most inviting prospects of ecclesiastical promotion opened before him. But already his hope that the Church of Rome would reform herself had died out. Instead of returning to his native land, he sought a retired residence at Emden, in Friesland. Count Enno, who was anxious to secure a reform at the Church in his principality, proposed to Lasko the charge of the matter as he owed especial trust to him. His death suspended the negotiation, but his sister Anna, who succeeded him, renewed the proposal. After much hesitation, Lasko was induced in 1548 to accept the charge, and in the following year was nominated superintendente; but his personal residence in the Netherlands, where he was already declined the invitation to return to Poland, where he was assured that his marriage should not stand in the way of the bestowment of a bishopric. He longed, indeed, to return, but only that he might labor as an angel without ceasing, and serve with any connection with Rome. He accepted his present post— as he did others to which he was subsequently called— with the express proviso that if duty and the prospect of useful service called him back to his native land he might be free to go. He made it also a condition of his acceptance that no obligation should be imposed upon him to any connection which was inconsistent with the word and will of God. In neighboring lands his proceedings were jealously watched. The duke of East Courland, who had married a daughter of Maximilian, as well as the duke of Brabant, felt that his influence and influence in the Church. Lasko pushed on the cause of reform by assailing the monasteries and the pictures in the churches. A formidable opposition was provoked, but he manfully defended himself, and was sustained by the counts. Opposition gradually yielded, and Romish rites and ceremonies were prohibited in Church and court. A new improved order of Church organization and discipline was introduced and established, substantially Presbyterian. He employed the eldership to enforce discipline. He sought to promote pastoral care and improvement, as well as conformity in the unity of doctrine. In his own person he habitually insisted on the sole and supreme authority of the Word of God. In correspondence with Melanchthon, Bucer, Bullinger, Pellican, and Hardenberg, he drew up a confession of faith, which yet proved unsatisfactory to the Lutherans, leasing as it did to the views of both Anglican and Reformed churches, though by no means in full correspondence with those of Calvin.

Lasko's reputation as the founder of the Protestant Church in Friesland now spread rapidly, and he was repeatedly consulted by foreign rulers and divines on questions of Church polity and order. The duke of Prussia invited him to accept the superintendency of the churches of his dominions, but the project was defeated by the condition on which Lasko insisted that the Church should be independent of the state, and that Lutheran rites, kindred to those of the Roman Catholic Church, should be abolished (Krasinski, i, 238). Instead of returning to his native land, he sought a retired residence at Emden, in Friesland. Count Enno, who was anxious to secure a reform at the Church in his principality, proposed to Lasko the charge of the matter as he owed especial trust to him. His death suspended the negotiation, but his sister Anna, who succeeded him, renewed the proposal. After much favor a compromise with the emperor. There was some danger that Lasko himself would be sacrificed to their policy. Leaving Eminem, therefore, he resided for a time at Leuven. He had, however, a sudden change of heart and a sudden return to his course back to England, in May, 1560, to which he had been reinvited. Here, under the protection of a Protestant monarch (Henry VI), refugees from persecution on the Continent were collected in considerable numbers. The foreign Protestant congregation in London was composed of French, Germans, and Italians. Of this, in all about 3000 members, Lasko, by the king's nomination (July 24, 1560), was made superintendent. He seems, however, to have had supervisory charge over the other foreign churches of the city, while his school was subject to his inspection and control. The wisdom of his measures is attested by a letter of Melancthon, who speaks (September, 1551) of the purity of doctrine of his churches. He differed with Cranmer on some points, as in reference to sacramental doctrine and the use of priestly habits, but his scruples were respected, and his intervention secured the foreign churches from molestation. In London he introduced the same system of Church order which he had established at Eminem. He brought out an edition of his Catechism for the instruction of the people, and thus the authors of the Heidelberg Catechism said they had been manifestly indebted. The English liturgy he rejected. He viewed his views on the sacraments as inferred from his republication in England of the work of Bullinger, to which he furnished an introduction. This was followed, however, by his Dieresi et deludea de Sacramentis Ecclesia Christi (2nd ed. 1562), a work which he had to follow up at once. His views on the sacraments are expressed in the introduction to the book of Zwingli and Calvin. On the doctrines peculiar to Calvin Lasko was not disposed to stand. He uses language that would seem to indicate an acceptance of the belief in a general atonement. While insisting on the insufficiency and inability of human effort without the grace of God, he has a strong affection for the freeness and rich provisions of the Gospel of Christ. It was during his residence in England that Lasko's wife died, and his second marriage took place. The death of the young king suddenly wrought an entire change in the prospects of the exiles, and on the accession of Queen Mary they prepared to return to the Continent. On the 17th of September, 1553, the first band of them, more than 170 in number, embarked for Denmark, where they had been assured of a welcome reception from a Protestant monarch. But a bigoted Lutheranism repelled him, and he returned to England, his fellow-pilgrims, called by Westphal, a Lutheran divine, "martyrs of the devil," and repulsed at Hamburg, Lubeck, and Rostock, finally found a hospitable reception at Dantzic. At Eminem he had chosen a position uncomfortable in which he was unable to fully develop his talents and abilities. He was given occasion for those who feared his influence to intrigue against him. Gustavus Vasa invited him and his friends to Sweden, assuring him of entire religious liberty. But he longed to return to his native land. His views concerning the sacrament, however, represented to the king as objectionable, and it seemed essential that he should first seek to harmonize them with the Augsburg Confession. His opponents in controversy, Westphal especially, had spoken of him as a professional pamphleteer. He determined to consult with Melancthon, and in April, 1555, he left Eminem for many months, passing from stirring discussing the habits to that city, and involved there to some extent in the Lutheran controversy. He was compelled of as a dissent from the Augsburg Confession, but in reply he asserted that he accepted its very language in regard to the sacrament in the sacrament. At Stuttgard (May 22, 1556) he entered with Brenz on a disputa-

Lassennes (Angevino: comp. Ad. genyoc), an officer who held high in the favor of the Emperor H. Niceta. He is described as "cousin" (cognatio, 1 Macc. xi, 81) and "father" (1 Macc. xi, 82; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 3, 9) of the king. Both words may be taken as titles of high nobility (compare Grimm on 1 Macc. x, 89; Diod. xvii, 59; Geosenis, Theaur. v. 25, § 4). It appears from Josephus (Ant. xiii, 4, 8) that he was a Cretan, and that Demetrius was indebted for a large body of mercenaries (compare 1 Macc. x, 67), when he asserted his claim to the Syrian throne against Alexander Balas. B.C. 148 or 147. It appears that Lassennes himself accompanied the young prince; and when Demetrius was exiled from the Syrian throne, he appointed Lassennes his chief minister, with unlimited power. His arbitrary government, added to his persuading Demetrius to disband the regular troops and only employ Cretans, is supposed to have alienated the subjects from the king, and caused great dissatisfaction to the soldiers. This conduct led to the downfall of Demetrius, for it enabled Tryphon to set up Antiochus, the young son of Alexander Balas (Diodotus, Relig. lib. xxxiii, 4, ed. Diodot. ii, 592). What became of Lassennes is not known. See DEMETRIUS.

Lactantius must not be identified with the Cretian instructor of the sons of Demetrius I Soter (Justin, xxxvii, 2; comp. Livy, Epit. 52). There is a later Lassennes, also a Cretan, who took a prominent part against the Romans in B.C. 70-68 (Smith, Dict. of Biogr. a. v. Lassennes, No. 3).

Latchet (λατάχ, serok), so called from lacing and binding together; Gr. iacā, a thong, as it is rendered in Acts xxii, 23, the cord or strap which fastens an Oriental shoe upon the instep (v. 7; Mark i, 7; Luke iii, 16; John i, 27); proverbial for anything of little value (Gen. xiv, 28). See SANDAL. "Geosenis (Theaur. v. 237) compares the Lat. alutum = filum, and quotes two Arabic proverbs from the Hasmara and the Kamis, in which a corresponding word is similarly employed. In the poetical figure in Isa. v, 27, the 'latchet' occupies the same position with regard to the shoe as it did to the long flowing Oriental dress, and was as essential to the comfort and expedition of the traveller. Another semi-proverbial expression in Luke iii, 16 points to the same easily-removed article of clothing" (Smith).

It is not certain that the name latchet is expressed rather differently, 'Whose shoes I am not worthy to loosen, to guide to the long flowing Oriental dress, and was as essential to the comfort and expedition of the traveller. Another semi-proverbial expression in Luke iii, 16 points to the same easily-removed article of clothing" (Smith).

I. The Council of 465, under Martin I, condemned the Monothelitic doctrine, or that of one will in the person of Christ. This view was developed as a continuation of the Monophysite controversy. The Council of Chalcedon, in 401, had affirmed the existence of two natures in Christ in one person, against the Antiochians, the Nestorians, and Eutychians. This determination of the council did not obtain final supremacy in the Greek and Latin churches till after the time of Justinian, and the conflict with it was continued under various forms. From the Council of Chalcedon till that of Frankfurt, in 789, the Church councils especially sought to maintain the twofoldness of the nature of Christ ascribed to Chalcedon, with less regard to the unity, which was at the same time established. An early source for the rise of Monothelitism appeared in the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, which, originating probably about the 4th century, obtained for many centuries thereafter great credit in the Church. A Neo-Platonic mysticism in these writings seeks to mediate between the prevalent Church doctrine of Monothelitism (or the doctrine of one nature in Christ). The Areopagite, the Neo-Platonic mystic, is a well-known figure in the Church, and is known for his writings on the nature of Christ. This book is a form of the divine, and there is in all...
The act of Christ but one mode of operation, the theandric energy (ματ Θεότροπη Ιψισία). This expression became a favorite one with all the Monophysites opposed to the Nicene and Chalcedonian creeds.

The Monothelitic controversy proper extends from 633 to 660, at which latter date the symon of Constantinople gave the most precise definition of two wills in the two natures of Christ. The earlier stage of the controversy, extending to the year 636, concerned the question of one or two energies or modes of working in the act of Christ. The emperor Heraclius, on occasion of his reconquering the Eastern provinces from the Persians in the year 622, and there coming in contact with certain Monophysite bishops, conceived the idea of reconciling the Eastern theological position with that of the West. This was followed by the emission of a circular letter containing a reference to the acts of Christ which was used by Diospyros—the παλα Θεοτροπὴ Ἰψισία. Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, being consulted, admitted the propriety of the expression as one sanctioned by the fathers, and recommended it to Cyrus, bishop of Phasias, who, being a natural bishop of Alexandria, set up a compromise for the Monophysites with the Council of Chalcedon on nine points. Sophronius, a monk of Alexandria, seriously objected to the course taken by Sergius, and, on being made bishop of Jerusalem, became so prominent a figure and was so often called on by the emperor to express the opinion of Honorius, bishop of Rome, who expressed himself in favor of the view rather of one will than of one operation, but admitted that controversy should be avoided.

It is unquestionable the fact that the expressed views of Honorius, though a pope, were subsequently condemned in council. By means of the more decided opposition of Sophronius, the emperor Heraclius, under advice of Sergius, issued his edict, the Ecthesis, in the year 636, in which he forbade the use of either expression, "one mode of working" or "two modes of working," in a controversial way, but especially prohibited the latter, declaring that it was evident that Christ had but one will, the human being subordinate to the divine. This was distinct Monothelitism. A powerful opponent of this view was the monk Maximus, whose writings had a controlling influence with the Lateran Council. He asserts that for the work of redemption a completeness in the two natures of Christ is necessary; there must be a complete human will. The Logos, indeed, works all through the human working and willing.

There is a theandric energy in his own sense. It is rather as a πνεῦμα ἀνθρώπος, or what was called the communicatio idem essentiae, that the maximus worked against Monothelitism in Rome and Africa, sending out thence tracts on the subject to the East. Sophronius still carried on the controversy, as also, with him, Stephen, bishop of Dorias, his pupil. After the death of Honorius, the bishop of Rome were decidedly opposed to Monothelitism, and Martin I, who zealously contended against the view while representative of the Roman Church at Constantinople, became, when made pope in 648, the chief pillar of the contrary opinion. Advocates of the view enunciated in the Ecthesis of Heraclius were Theodore, bishop of Phasias, and Pyrrhus of Constantinople. In 648 the emperor Constant II, under the influence of the patriarch Paul, issued his Type (τύπος ἀνθρώπων), which, though not so decidedly Monothelitic as the Ecthesis, contained under the threat of the severest penalties, any further controversy upon this subject. Without consulting the emperor, Martin I now convoked this first Lateran Council, in which he presided over about 104 bishops from Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, and Africa.

The pope sought to obtain generally recognition for the concordat he had concluded with the Chalcedonian council, the five ecumenical councils. Five sessions were held; the writings of the prominent Monothelites were examined and condemned; pope Martin explained the proper meaning of Diospyrus's term "theandric operation," stating that it was designed to signify two operations of one person; the Ecthesis of Heraclius and Type of I Constans were condemned; and the judgment of the council pronounced in twenty canons, which mathematized all who do not confess in our Lord Jesus Christ two wills and two operations.

II. The councils of 1105, 1112, and 1116, under Pascal II, concern the contest about investitures between the pope and the emperor, which was brought to a close in the Council of 1128, called and presided over by Calixtus II. This was composed of 360 bishops and 60 abbots, all of the Latin Church. The investiture (q.v.) contest, which began as early as 1054, when, by mutual decrees of excommunication, the breach between the Eastern and Western churches was made final, arose from the claim made by the German emperors to an inheritance of the rights exercised by the Roman emperors concerning the appointment of candidates to ecclesiastical offices, and their investiture with the right to hold Church property as subjects of the empire. Under the new German empire, from Otto the Great to Henry IV, 980-1066, the popes themselves were confirmed in their seat by the emperor. Henry III obtained the assent of the Council of Sutry, which was held near Rome, in the midst of his own army, in 1046, the power of nominating the popes, without intervention of clergy or people. The influence of Hildebrand was now felt—an influence which was reflected in the appointment of the cardinals and which secured from Nicolas II, 1099, a decree transferring the election of popes to a conclave of cardinals. Hildebrand, as Gregory VII, maintained a celebrated contest with Henry IV, to whom, in 1075, he forbade all power of investiture, excommunicating the emperor the next year, and causing him to do penance at Canossa. With his victorious campaign in Italy, 1080-88, Henry drove the pope into exile at Salerno, where he soon after died. His immediate successors, however, were such as he had designated for the post, and were the inheritors of his doctrines and plans for the supremacy of the Church. Urban II sent forth an encyclical declaring his adhesion to the principles of Gregory—the Dictatus Gregorii; and Pascal II (1099-1118), who had been one of Gregory's cardinals, showed more zeal than firmness in the same course. In the Lateran Council under the pope, 1105, an act of obedience to the pope was taken by the clergy, and a promise rendered to affirm whatever he and the Church in council should affirm. The count De Meulan and his confederates were excommunicated for having encouraged the king of England in his conduct toward the English church in the rebellion against his father, was encouraged by Pascal, would nevertheless yield nothing on becoming emperor, 1105, in the matter of investitures, his example being followed in this respect by England and France. Henry marched into Italy and imprisoned the pope in 1111, forcing through him the concession of rendering back to the emperor the fees of the bishops on condition that there should be no imperial interference with the elections. For his weakness in this and in other points the pope was bitterly reproached, and the council of 1112 revoked all the concessions and excommunicated the emperor. Now extending the rebellion of his German subjects, Henry collected an army and invaded Italy anew in 1116. The council convoked the same year therupon renewed the revocation of the concessions Pascal had formerly made, and anathematized the emperor. At last, the German people, weary of the conflict between State and Church, brought about a peaceful compromise in the concordat at the imperial Diet of Worms, 1122. The principles of this concordat were adopted by the council of 1128. The terms of the concordat are as follows: The emperor surrendered all the investitures in St. Peter and Paul, and to the Catholic Church, all right of investiture by king and staff. He grants that elections and ordinations in all churches shall take place freely in accordance with ecclesiastical laws. The pope agrees that the election of German prelates shall be in the presence of the emperor provided it be done without violence or simony. In case any election is disputed, the emperor shall render assistance to the legal party, with the advice of the archbishop and the bishops. The person elected is invested with the imperial fief by the royal sceptre pledged for the execution of everything required by law. Whoever is consecrated shall also receive in like manner his investiture from other parts of the empire within six months" (Hase, Church Hist., II, 303). The new pope here made considerable concessions in form, but actually, through his influence, obtained all power at the elections. The council of 1128 also renewed the grant of indulgences promulgated by Urban II in promotion of the first crusade in 1095, and decreed the calls of the clergy. Twenty-two canons of discipline were established.

III. The council of 1139, under Innocent II, condemned the anti-pope Anacletus II, with his adherents, and deposed all who had received office under him. On the same day with the installation of Innocent II, in 1138, Peter of León, a cardinal, and grandson of a rich Jewish banker, had been proclaimed pope, as Anacletus II, by a majority of the cardinals. Innocent took refuge in France, where he was supported by the king. His cause was warmly espoused by Bernard of Clairvaux, whose influencechiefly recovered his position in Italy, and marched into Rome triumphantly with Lothaire II in 1139. Anacletus died in 1139, and a successor was chosen by his party only with the purpose of making peace. Roger of Sicily had supported scenes on this occasion. The persecution on this council, in 1139, though the origin of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies belongs to the same year, Roger having taken Innocent prisoner, and having compelled the pope to bestow upon him the investiture of this kingdom. At this council Arnold of Breccia was also condemned. This was a young clergyman of the city of Breccia, a disciple of Abelard, who, inspired by the free philosophical spirit of his master, devoted himself to the promotion of practical reform in Church and State. A marked spirit of political independence was manifesting itself about this time, both individually from the old Roman municipalities established there. The pope, from the days of Leo IX, had themselves inspired movements of ecclesiastical reform. Pascall II had admitted that the secular power of the bishops interfered with their spiritual duties. Bernard, though a zealous opponent of Arnald, yet, in his Contemplations on the Papacy: "Who can mention the place where one of the apostles ever held a trial, decided disputes about boundaries, or portioned out lands?" I read that the apostles stood before judgment seats, not sat. I preached withArnold against the political power and wealth of the clergy. The Church ought rather to rejoice, he said, in an apostolic poverty. He was driven successively from Italy, France, and Switzerland, but in 1139 was recalled to Rome by the populace, who sought to revive the sovereignty of the state, established a senate, limited the pope to the exercise of spiritual power and the possession of voluntary offerings, and invited the German emperor to make Rome his capital. Arnold and his "politicians" at Rome thus gave pope Innocent and his immediate successors—Lucius II, Eugenius II, and Adrian IV—more trouble than any political movements elsewhere. This condemnation at the council did not effectually diminish his power. When, however, Adrian, in 1154, put the city of Rome under ban, and prohibited all public worship, Arnold was abandoned by the senate, sacrificed by Frederick I, and hung at Rome in 1155, his body being burned and thrown into the Tiber. Among the canons of the council, the twenty-third condemns the heresy of the Manichæans, as the followers of Peter de Bruis were called. This heresy was attributed to the early Waldensians in France and elsewhere, arising partly from their ascetic mode of life. These canons of discipline were published, and among them reaffirmations of former canons against simony, marriage, and concubinage in the clergy.

IV. The council of 1173, under Alexander III, numbering 290, mostly Latin bishops, was called to correct certain abuses which had arisen during the long schism just brought to a close by the peace of Venice, 1177. Until near the end of the 12th century the popes were hard pressed in the Holy Land by the crusades in the contest of Ghibelline and Guelf. Frederick I had taken umbrage at the use of the term "beneficium" in a letter addressed to him by Adrian IV about the rudeness of German knights to pilgrims visiting Rome, as if to intimate that the imperial dignity had been conferred by him. The emperor marched into Italy, and other letters were interchanged between him and the pope, when, upon the death of Adrian in 1159, the two parties—the hierarchic and the moderate among the cardinals—chose two opposing popes, viz. Alexander III and Victor IV. The emperor’s council, called at Favia in 1160, recognized the latter. Pascal III and Calixtus III followed at the imperial dictation, with but little influence. Alexander, from his refuge in France, enjoyed great popularity. He had on his side the arian Bishop of Trieste. The case was defended by the lawyers of Bologna, who ascribed to him unlimited power, to the prejudice of the people. Defeated at Legnano in 1176, the emperor subscribed, at the dictation of Alexander, the peace of Venice, the provisions of which were based on the Concordat of Worms. The first substantial results were the concordat established by this council, which were mostly disciplinary, provides that henceforth “the election of the pope shall be confined to the college of cardinals, and two thirds of the votes shall be required to make a lawful election, instead of a majority only, as heretofore.” It was by this constitution that the "human and impious" of the Waldenses and Albigensians were declared heretical. At the unimportant council of 1167, pope Alexander excommunicated Frederick I.

V. The council of 1215, under Innocent III, was the most important of all the Lateran Councils. It is usually styled the Fourth Lateran. It continued in session from November 11 to November 80, having present 71 archbishops, 412 bishops, 800 abbots, the patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem, and the legates of other patriarchs and crowned heads. The pope opened the council with an assembly at the Lateran, the liberation of Italy from all foreign rule, the union of the Holy Land, and the recovery of the Holy Land and the reformation of the Church. The remarkable power of Innocent III is displayed in his influence over this council, which was submissive to all his wishes, and received the several canons proposed by him, and the papal regulations to attain the greatest height in Innocent, who pontificate extended from 1198 to 1216. The bull Unam Sanctam of Boniface VIII, directed against Philip IV the Fair in 1302, marks the limit from which the power of the pope evidently declined. Innocent III—a man of great personal power, of marked ability as a writer and orator, bold, crafty, and ever watchful of affairs—had his eye on all that transpired through his legates. The chief object which his pontificate sought were “the strengthening of the States of the Church, separation of the Two Sicilies from all dependence on the German emperor, the liberation of Italy from all foreign rule, the exercise of guardianship over the confederacy of its states, the liberation of the Oriental Church, the extermination of heretics, and the exercise of ecclesiastical discipline” (Hase, Church Hist., p. 207). Hitherto England, Germany, and France had constituted a balance of power against the pope, but under Innocent the two former, as well as Italy, submitted to the claims of the pseudo-Isidorean decretals. France was early laid under interdict (1200) on account of Philip Augustus’s repudiation of Ingeburge and the French bishops’ approval of the marriage of his son-in-law with Matilda, the wife of his cousin, in his realm, to receive it back (1218) only as a fief of Rome. Deciding at first for Otto IV, the Guelp, against the

Hebestäffen Philip, in Germany, Innocent subsequently ly secured from the council the recognition of Frederick II, vainly seeking in this his German policy to free Italy entirely from the power of the emperor. The famous sevenovt clauses of Innocent, if not discussed considered as a whole, by the papacy that term of enactment, were nevertheless regarded as the canons of the council, so recognised by the Council of Trent and by Church authorities of the intervening age, and they have constituted a fundamental law for many well-known practices of the Romish Church. The first of these clauses, the one that the Catholic faith in the unity of God against all Manichæan sects. It also, for the first time, makes the doctrine of transubstantiation, in the use of this express term, an article of faith. “The body and blood of Jesus Christ in the sacrament of the altar are truly and corporally the species of bread and wine, the bread being, by the divine omnipotence, transub-stantiated into his body, and the wine into his blood.”

The second canon condemns the treatise of Joachim, the prophet of Calabria, which he wrote against Peter Lombard on the subject of the Trinity. The third canon is of great importance, furnishing the basis for the crusade against the Albigenses, and for all severities of a like character on the part of the Romish Church. It “anathemasizes all heretics who hold anything in opposition to the preceding exposition of faith, and enjoins that, after condemnation, they shall be delivered over to the secular arm, to be punished as traitors and rebels. They protect, or maintain heretics, and threaten with deposition all bishops who do not use their utmost endeavors to clear their dioceses of them” (Landor, Manual of Councils, p. 205). The fourth canon invites the Greeks to unite with the Romans in the crusade against the Albigenses, and also the fifth canon, regulating the order of precedence 4. Antioch; 5. Jerusalem; and permits these several patriarchs to give the pall to the archbishops of their dependencies, exacting from themselves a profession of faith, and of obedience to the Roman see, when they receive the pall from the pope. The sixth to the twentith, inclusive, are of minor importance (see Landor, enjoins “all the faithful of both sexes, having arrived at years of discretion, to confess all their sins at least once a year to their proper priest, and to communicate at Easter.” This is the first canon known which orders sacramental confession generally, and may have been occasioned by the teachings of the Waldenses, that neither confession nor satisfaction was necessary in order to obtain the sacraments. From the time in which it commences, it is known as the canon “Omnis utris-quse sexus,” and was solemnly reaffirmed by the Council of Trent. The canons (given completely by Landor, Mem. of Councils, p. 236 sq.) in general constitute a body of full and severe disciplinary enactments. This council reaffirmed and extended the Truce of God on plenary indulgence which had been previously proclaimed in behalf of the Eastern Crusades, and fixed the time, June 1, and place, Sicily, as a rendezvous for another crusade.

This council also confirmed Simon de Montfort in possession of the see of Narbonne in southern France and condemned by papal confiscation from the Waldenses, and decreed the entire extirpation of the heresy. The Waldenses or Albigenses in the south of France were the followers of Peter Waldo, a wealthy citizen of Lyons, who, from religious principles, adopted a life of poverty. His followers were called(paduates, or “Poor men of Ly-oons.” They were allied in their sentiments to the Vaudois of the Piedmontese valleys, with whom they became united for mutual defence. They protosted against these points in the doctrine of the Romish Church: 1. The Trinity, with which was substituted the union of the sacraments, confession, and marriage. 3. The invocation of saints.
4. The worship of images. 5. The temporal power of the clergy.
A crusade was instituted against them by the papal power in 1178. Innocent sought to win them over and make monks of them by establishing in 1201 the order of “Poor Catholicks.” Unsuccessful in this, he confiscated their lands to the feudal lords, and established an inquisition among them under the direction of Dominic, which was formally sanctioned by the present council. He was first made war against them, incited and directed by the monks of Citeaux, was as a crusader by Alexander Augustus. Count Raymond of Toulouse espoused the cause of his persecuted vassals. The papal legate, Peter of Castelnau, sent to convert the Waldenses, was murdered by Raymond, whose dominions were thereupon ruled in 1216 by a fervor crusade of “Christian Pilgrims,” led by Simon de Montfort and Arnold, the abbot of Citeaux.
The count of Toulouse submitted, but a bloody warfare was prosecuted against Raymond Roger, viscount of Beziers and Albi, and subsequently two hundred towns and castles within the boundaries of the two states were granted to the successful Simon de Montfort.
A rebellion, however, against his power deprived him of all; but Raymond of Toulouse, who ap-ppeared at the council of 1215, obtained no favor, and his territory was declared to be alienated from him forever.
VI. The council of 1212-1217, under Julius II and Leo X, was convened for the reformation of abuses, for the condemnation of the Council of Pisa, and attained its most important result in the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction. France, under Louis XII, had obtained great military successes in Italy by the League of Cam-parny, formed against the interests of France, and by the friendship of some of the cardinals, Louis XII summoned a Church council at Pisa, Nov. 1511, which in 1512 was moved to Milan, but was entirely fruitless of results, being dissolved by the presence of the pope’s army. Julius II, though at first jealous of Venice, had nevertheless, aroused by the successes of the French general, formed the Holy Alliance with Venice, Spain, England, and Switzerland, and now, at the head of his army, drove the French beyond the Alps, and himself summoned a council at the Lateran May 10, 1512. This council extended over twelve sessions, until March, 1517. The bishop of Guer had actively promoted the summoning of the council, and attended as representative of the German emperor.
All the acts of the Council of Pisa were at once annulled.
Julius having died in Feb. 1513, Leo X presided over the sixth session. At the eighth session, in Dec. 1518, Leo XII, through his ambassador, declared his adhesion to this Council of the Lateran. At the eleventh session, in Dec. 1516, the bull was read which, in place of the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges (1408), wherein France acceded to the declarations of the council of Pisa, and far as they were consistent with the liberties of the Gallican Church, substituted the Concordat agreed upon this year, 1516, between Leo X and Francis I. Through hope of increasing his power in Italy, Francis largely sacrament the liberties of the Church. Several of the articles of the Pragmatic were retained, but most of them were altered or abolished. The first article was entirely contrary to the Pragmatic, which had re-established the right of election, while the Concordat declares that the chapters of the cathedrals in France shall no longer propose candidates to the see of any Church, but that the king shall name a proper person, whom the pope shall nominate to the vacant see. The Concor-dat, on account especially of this provision, met with great opposition in the Parliament, universities, and the Church at Paris. It was a great advance of the pope against the liberties of France (compare Janus Pope and Councils, § xxviii and xxix). Neither this council nor the other four, viz. those of 1129, 1139, 1179, and 1215, styled eccumenical by the Romish Church, can be properly regarded as such.

Some writers mention as the sixth Lateran the council convened by pope Benedict XIII on the bull Unigenitus [see Janexius], and for the purpose of general reform in the Church (compare Klemm, Conc. a Bened.
XIII, in Lat. habiti probre tres examen (1729); Walch, De

Lately, Gilbert, an English Quaker, was born in England in 1627. He was one of the most active and efficient members of his society in London. His labors were done especially to the relief of the more unfortunate of his Church. He died Sept. 15, 1705. See Janney, Hist, of Friends, iii, 105.

Lathrop, Joseph, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born October 20, 1781 (O. S.), at Norwich, Conn.; graduated at Yale College in 1764; entered the ministry January, 1766; was ordained pastor in West Springfield, Mass., and labored there until his death, December 31, 1820. In 1793 he was elected professor of divinity in Yale College, but declined the position. He published A Letter to the Rev. the associated Pastors in the County of New Haven concerning the Ordination of the Rev. John Imphare in New Haven (1770): Miscellaneous Collection of Original Pieces, political, moral, and entertaining (1786); and a number of occasional Sermons (Hartford, 1793, 8vo; 1808, 8vo; Worcester, 1807, 8vo). Doctor Lathrop was a popular preacher, and his sermons have long been highly commented upon both in this country and in Europe.—Sprague, Annals of the American Pulper, i, 526.

Lattimer, Hugh, one of the most distinguished prelates of the Church of Rome, undoubtedly one of the ablest, if not the ablest ecclesiastic among the English reformers of the 16th century, called by Froude (Hist. of England, i, 254, comp. ii, 101) the John Knox of England, the bearer of a name that "now shines over two hemispheres, and will blaze more and more till the last day," was born at Thurcaston, in Leicestershire, about 1490. His father, a farmer of good practical judgment, early discovering in Hugh talents that would fit him for a literary position, sent him to the monastery at the advantage of his time at school, and at fourteen Hugh was transferred to Cambridge, where he was soon known as a sober, hard-working student. At nineteen he was elected fellow of Clare Hall, took his degree at twenty, and entered on the study of theology, having decided to devote himself to the service of the Church. A sincere and devout believer in the doctrines and rites of the Church of Rome, we need not wonder at finding him, at this period of his life, loud and frequent in his denunciation of the would-be reformers, seldom losing an opportunity of inveighing against them. "He even held them," says Middleton (Memoirs of the Reformers, iii, 103), "in such horror that they thought they were the supporters of that Antichrist whose appearance was to precede the coming of the Son of Man, and conjectured that the day of judgment was at hand." Nor were the events of the day likely to cool his mistaken zeal. Lathyer, who was making havoc in the ranks of the papacy, had just been assailed by the "defender of the faith" (king Henry VIII); and as a most fit subject for his dissertation for the divinity degree, Lattimer could find no better work than "flashing his maiden sword" in an attack upon Melancthon—surely no small task for a man not much beyond his teens. But even at this early age Hugh Lattimer proved himself quite a formidable polemic, and, what is even more noteworthy, a man not afraid to speak his mind—a trait which distinguishes our subject in all the acts of his life. Immediately after his attack on Melancthon he came under the eye and tongue of Blinney, the famous advocate of the Reformed doctrines in the English Church, and he was led to examine more critically the doctrines and discipline of his Church. The result was, naturally enough, a conversion to the cause which Blinney so ably advocated. Lattimer was at this time about thirty years of age, and as he was not a man accustomed to do things by halves, he became a zealous advocate for reform, and preached manifestly against the false doctrines and various abuses of Romaniast which had crept into and polluted the Church of England. Naturally gifted with great oratorical powers, and inspired by the fitness of the subject with which he was dealing, he soon made himself famous as a preacher at Cambridge. "None, except the boldest and most uncircumcised, could stand a moment from his preaching, it was said, without being affected with the highest detestation of sin, and moved to all godliness and virtue" (Jocel of Joy [Parker Society edition], p. 224 sq.). Such preaching, however, greatly as it was appreciated, the times in which Lattimer lived, could not meet the approval of the servile ecclesiastics. It was too much tinged by theological statements that had originally sprouted in England, and, after being transplanted to Germany, had been brought back with improved fibre; and Lattimer soon found himself surrounded by a formidable opposition, daily growing in strength: His "heretical preaching," as it then called, caused a remonstrance made to the diocesan bishop of Ely by a grey friar named Venetus, but really due to most of the divines of Cambridge, requesting episcopal interference. Among these was the incumbent of Ely, naturally a mild and moderate man, inclined to favor Lattimer at first, and only mildly rebuked him. Here the matter might have ended, and it is more than likely that "he would not have been the Lattimer of the Reformation, and the Church of England would not, perhaps, have been here to-day" (Froude, i, 101), had not this bishop, while on a visit to Cambridge (1525), unexpectedly attended one of Lattimer's preaching services, and had not his prelatical dignity been sorely touched on the occasion. Lattimer was right in the midst of his sermon when the bishop entered; immediately he turned his face about, and addressed the congregation as the bishop had been seated, according to Strype, addressed the audience as follows: "It is of congruence meet that a new auditory being more honorable, requireth a new theme, being a new argument to entreat of. Therefore it behoveth me now to deviate from mine intended path so as somewhat to entreat of the honorable estate of a bishop. Therefore let this be the theme, Chrestus eratens pontifice futurorum bonorum, etc." This text, says a contemporary, he so fruitfully handled, expounding every word, and setting forth the office of Christ so sincerely as the true and precious instrument of the Church, that he should succeed him in his Church, that the bishop then present might well think of himself that neither he nor any of his fellows were of that race, but rather of the fellowship of Caiaphas and Annas. It cannot appear strange to any one that "the wise and politic man," as the bishop of Ely was generally called, thereafter also went over to the enemy, and forbade Lattimer's preaching within the diocese over which he presided. Lattimer, however, overcame this obstacle by gaining the use of a pulpit in a monastery of Austin friars, exempted from episcopal control, and from out of which, under the prior of which, Dr. Barnes, decidedly favored the reformed doctrines. This daring attitude of the young preacher so provoked Dr. West and the Cambridge clique that the bishop made complaint to cardinal Wolsey. "No eye saw more quickly than the cardinal's the difference, and at the same time, and at all times," says when he had heard from the lips of Lattimer himself the substance of the sermons that had given cause to the complaint, the cardinal, instead of punishing Lattimer, replied to the accusations by granting the offender a license to preach in any church in England, and the bishop of Ely not only preached that doctrine as you have here repeated," he said, "you shall preach it to his board, let him say what he will" (Latey, Remains, p. 27 sq, as quoted by Froude, ii, 105). From this time forward the career of Lattimer seems dearly marked out. Hitherto he had been quite orthodox in points of theoretic belief. "His mind," says Froude, "would accept rather than question, and he was slow in arriving at conclusions which had no immediate bearing upon action." Now he broke loose altogether from the position of the Cambridge authorities, and probably became defiant of them. But Wolsey (1519), fell from grace, and fear made him see that Latimer was working now, at last, also fall a prey to the malice of his formidable adversaries, greatly increased in numbers by his success in gaining followers, who were drawn towards him by his eloquence, his moral conduct, and his kindness of disposition, as well as by the merit of his object. Unexpectedly, however, and quite to the chagrin of the Cambridge men, he found a fresh protector in the king himself. He had preached before Henry in the Lent of 1530, having been introduced to his royal master by the king's physician, Dr. Butts; and he won the favor of Henry by his honest, straightforward logic and his enthusiasm. In this new position he performed his duty as faithfully as he had in preaching at Cambridge, and he dared to speak the truth in a place where the truth is generally forgotten. A special opportunity to speak in defense of the Protestant cause was offered him by the v�ceipitation of those great men in Henry's dominions who were subjected at this time on account of their religious faith; and, though he did not succeed in staying the hand of persecution by this address of almost unexampled grandeur, it yet remains trangement between the pope and the king had been quite decided. Cranmer's decree of 1583, approving the marriage with Anne Boleyn, had been declared first null and void by the pope, and Henry had been threatened with excommunication; but, as he had ignored the papal threat, a bull to this effect was published in 1584. In the same year a bull was also published condemning the separations by which the king of England and the pope of Rome had become complete, the Lutherns grew anxious to effect a union with the English Reformers, and to this end three German divines, with Bucerharrt at their head, had come to England in 1584 to discuss and amicably settle all minor religious differences of opinion. Unfortunately, however, they not only failed to bring about an agreement on sacramental doctrine, but the discussion even induced the king to cling more tenaciously than ever to the belief of the Romish Church, especially on transubstantiation; and in 1589 the king actually caused the passage of "the bloody act of the Six Articles," or "the whip with six strings," as the Protestants termed it, by which the denial of transubstantiation was made punishable with death, and other medieval dogmas were enforced. The statutes were enforced, but the people paid no regard to them, and historians will have it that he was induced to resign by lord Cromwell; the latter, "either himself deceived or desiring to smooth the storm, told Latimer that the king advised his resignation" (Froude, iii, 370, foot note). In 1588 there was a short war with Spain, and the state of war afterwards denied this, and pitied Latimer's condition; and when we consider that Latimer had found a tried friend in Cromwell, we can hardly conclude that either he or the king had anything to do with the resignation, which was an act only to be expected of Latimer, ever independent and bold to speak the truth. Froude (on the authority of Hall) will have it even that Latimer, together with Shaxton (q.v.), were imprisoned immediately after their resignation, but if this be true he can have been confined only a brief period, as by a summary declaration of pardon the bishop's dungeon door was thrown open and the prisoners were dismissed a very short time after their imprisonment.

Latimer thereafter sought retirement in the country, where he would have continued to reside had not an accident befallen him, the effects of which he thought might prove fatal to his skill of life. A horse that he was riding in London when the power of Cromwell was nearly at an end, and the mastery in the hands of Gardiner, who no sooner discovered him in his privacy than he procured accusations to be made against him for his objections to the Six Articles, and he was committed to the Tower. Different causes being alleged against him, he remained a prisoner for the remaining six years of king Henry VIII's reign, his enemies evidently designing mainly to prevent his influence for the cause of the Reformers in the capital of the nation. Upon the accession of Edward VI, it happened that a document referred to the king of Spain, and that Latimer was firm in his refusal to receive it: his great age, he said, made him desirous of freedom from any and all responsibility. He preached, however, frequently, and gave himself up to all manner of benevolent works. He was a decided opponent of "the bloody Bonner." Occasionally his advice was sought by the king, and he was continually active as the strenuous preserver of the vices of the age; but the reign was short, and with it expired Latimer's prosperity. In July, 1553, king Edward died; in September, Mary had begun to reign, but yet it took very little to regain the doctrine, and under her rule the old ordered service was restored, Latimer was committed to the Tower. Though he was at least eighty years old, no consideration was shown for his great age, and he was sent to Oxford, March 8, 1554, together with Cranmer and Ridley, to dispeute on the corporal presence. He had never been accounted very learned: he had not used Latin much, he had spent these twenty years, and was now able to dispute; but he would declare his faith, and then they might do as they pleased. He declared that he thought the presence of Christ in the sacrament to be only spiritual; " he enlarged much against the sacrifices of the mass, and lamented that they had changed the communion into a private mass; that they had taken the cup away from the people; and, instead of service in a known tongue, were bringing the nation to a worship that they did not understand" (Burnet, Reformation, vol. ii). He was laughed at, and told to answer their arguments; but he would not; and that he knew his memory had failed; the laughter, however, continued, and there was great disorder, perpetual shoutings, tauntings, and reproaches. When he was asked whether he would abjure his principles, he only answered, "I thank God most heartily that he hath prolonged my life to this end, that I may in this case glorify God with this kind of death." He was found guilty of heresy and sentenced to death, but the Romanists, to make sure that no claims for the irregularity of the trial should be charged upon them, set aside the sentence which had been passed at the first trial, and, by direction of cardinal Pole, another court was held, consisting of Bishop of Gloucester; Holyman, bishop of Bristol; and White, bishop of Lincoln, was convened on the 7th of September, under the altar of St. Mary's Church at Oxford, and the three "arch heretics" given a second hearing and condemned.

Latimer was then introduced to the court with an eight-year old, "dressed in an old threadbare gown of Bristol frizee, a handkerchief on his head with a night-cap over it, and over that again another cap, with two broad flaps buttoned under the chin. A leather belt was round his waist, to which a Testament was attached; his spectacules, without a case, hung from his neck. So stood the greatest man, perhaps, then living in the world, a prisoner on his trial, waiting to be condemned to death by men professing to be ministers of God.... Latimer's trial was the counterpart of Ridley's (see Froude, vi, 556 sq.); the charge was the same (on the sacrament), and the result was the same, except that the stronger intelllect vexed itself less with nice distinctions. Bread was bread, said Latimer, and wine was wine; there was a change in the sacrament, it was true, but the change was not in the nature, but the dignity" (Froude, vi, 559 sq.). Latimer's character was not less admirable, but Latimer, like Ridley, remained firm, and sentence was pronounced upon them as heretics obstinate and incurable, and on the 16th of October, 1555, both Latimer and Ridley were led to the stake and burnt, outside the northern wall of the town, a short story from the southwestern corner of Oxford College and about the same distance from Brocado prison, where Cranmer still lurged.
The last words of Latimer were addressed to his companion, and are characteristic of our subject:
"Be of good comfort, master Ridley, and play the man:
we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out." (Gunpowder had been fastened about his body to hasten his death; it took fire with the first flame, and he died immediately.
Latimer's character, which has been treated most beautifully by the late Rev. E. Thomson, D.D., L.L.D., in his Sketches, Biographical and Occidental (Circ. 1866), p.
42 sq., seems to present a combination of many noble and disinterested qualities. " He was brave, honest, devoted, and energetic, homely and popular, yet from all vices of the body and spirit. He was a plain, simple-hearted, and unpretending man; an earnest, hopeful, and happy man, fearless, open-hearted, hating nothing but baseness, and fearing none but God—not throwing away his life, yet not counting it dear when the great crisis came—an calmly yielding it up as the champion of his tongue, life, and struggle. There may be other reformers that more engage our admiration, there is no one that more excites our love" (Tulloch, Leaders of the Reformation, p. 322-324). Latimer's sermons, characterized by humor and cheerfulness, manly sense and direct evangelical force, were the printed ones only, of 1549, 8vo, and in 1570, 4to; one of the best editions, with notes and a memoir, was prepared by John Watkins, L.L.D. (London, 1824, 2 vol. 8vo). A complete edition of his Works (the only complete one) was edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. G. B. Rome (Cambridge, 1844-4, 4 vol. 8vo). See Gilpin, Life of Latimer (1854, 8vo);

Latin, William, an English humanist of the 15th century, began in 1489 a fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford. He studied theology in that university, and afterwards Greek at Padua, and subsequently became teacher to Reginald Pole. He was a friend of Erasu ms, and even assisted him in preparing his second edition of the N. T. He died about 1545. Erasmus and Leland both speak of Latimer in high terms as a writer and scholar. Unfortunately, however, he never published any of his writings, and there remain in MS. form only a few of the letters he wrote to Erasmus. See Hallam, Lit-Hist. of Europe (London, 1864), i, 292, 271.

Latin (Lattanie, Roman, Luke xxiii, 88; pvega-tai, in Roman, John xix, 20), the vernacular language of the Romans, although most of them in the time of Christ likewise spoke Greek. See the monographs on the subject cited by Volviding, Index, p. 135. See Lat-

LATIN, USE OF, IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SACRAMENTS. The words of St. Augustine against hethen Rome in De civitate Dei, ix, 7, "Opera data est, ut imperiosa civitas non solum jugum sed etiam linguam suam domitis gentibus imponeret," may be justly applied to modern Christian Rome. By imposing its language on all nations acknowledging its sovereignty it has obtained also the mastery over their spiritual life.
Benefice XIV, indeed, nobly declared, "Ut omnes cathtolicis sint, non ut omnes Latini sint, necessarium est." But this principle of true, ancient catholicity resulted only in securing the domination of Rome, as the pope, for Roman Catholicism early found that it cannot afford to dispense with the use of Latin and adopt the vulgar tongues; that it would thereby endanger the consolidation of the Church's power—yes, its very existence. Thus the Latin language was originally used in the public worship of the Roman Church in those in countries where Latin was the popular language, cannot be a matter of surprise or condemnation, nor that the clergy should have continued to use it in Christianizing the nations who became subjects to Rome, even after its use had become obsolete in Rome itself.
Of course there is every reason to believe that in the earliest stages the ecclesiastical language of the Greek-speaking Roman Church was Greek, and continued such till the transfer of the empire to Byzantium (Forbes, Explan. XXIX. X. Art. ii, 490), and that, indeed, in the early church and in the practice of the apostles, to whom the use of a foreign language was repugnant (compare 1 Cor. xiv, 19; ibid. 16), and made use of their own vernacular, as in the introduction of the Gospel to India, Parthia, and other regions. But the use of the Latin tongue by the Roman Church was in its early period admissible, when we consider that it was only the Church that had it in its power, at a time when the influence of the infant modern languages was derogatory to the Latin, to maintain the ancient language in comparative purity, and to preserve it as its most noble monuments. Indeed, a Latin (Theophrastus) and a Greek has well said, "It has not been adopted by the Church, the Thirty-nine Articles, ii, 484; Adolphus, Compendium Theologiae, p. 49.

Bellarmine (in his Works, iii, 119) attempts to complete and comment on these grounds. 1. He says "the Latin Church has always administered the sacraments in Latin, although this language had long since ceased to be the common language of the people. This is admitting the sacraments to be connected with a dead and corrupt tongue, at the same time, that it is to be retained simply from habit. Bellarmine then attempts to prove its reasonable-ness. He says: "There is no pressing motive why the sacraments should be administered in the vernacular, while there are manifest objections to it; for there is no necessity that those who receive the sacraments should understand the words which accompany them; for the words are addressed either to the elements, as in the eucharist, the blessing of holy water, oil, etc., and these understand no language; or else they are addressed to God, and he understands them all; or, again, they are addressed to persons who are to be consecrated or absolved, not instructed or edified, as in the sacraments of baptism and absolution; hence it is at best a matter of indifference to the person concerned whether he understood the words or not; it is further proved that persons who understand the words of the sacrament can be deprived of them in the sacrament of reconciliation, which is seen in the baptism of new-born infants and the reconciliation of sick persons when in an unconscious state." Yet Bellarmine himself, perceiving the difficulties of the position he had assumed for himself, observes: moreover, how many of the truly ignorant persons in the Latin Church as not to know in general, by the words which accompany it, which of the sacraments is being administered to them." Granting this, we cannot understand, then, in what manner the use of Latin is to prevent the profanation of the sacraments as set forth by the Council of Trent. Among the objections to the use of modern languages, we find that "the free intercourse between the different churches, which they need as members of one body, is rendered by it much more difficult. Moreover, Christians leaving their native country would thus be obliged to deprive themselves from attending the divine offices." This is taking for granted that all Christians understand Latin; for, unless they do, it would become a matter of indifference to them whether they heard mass in that or another foreign language. "The sacraments should always be in the same language, and in the aspiring solemnity, which can be better preserved by not using their usual language. If it is granted that in public worship we should use special buildings, special costumes, special forms, etc., there cannot be any objection against the propriety of using also a different language. Latin is adapted to a higher language than another, but because it is better calculated to produce a feeling of reverence than the common tongue. 8. It is right that the sacramental words should always be presented to all the people in the same manner and under the same form, to avoid the danger of changes and alterations. This is the more easily accomplished by making all priests use the same language. Yet this does not always avoid the danger, for there have been instances of priests administering baptism "in nomine patria, filia et spiritus sancta." 4. By administering the sacrament in this manner, the door would be opened to ignorance, for the priests would at last consider themselves fully qualified if they knew how to read. Latin would be totally forgotten, and they would be unable to read the fathers and even the Scriptures." Here we see another instance of the almost complete, surpassing that of heaven Rome, which, if it compelled subject nations to adopt its language, did not, at least, prevent them from understanding it. Christian Rome seems, indeed, to be imbued with the idea that mankind praise and value most what they do not understand, and the times had changed in defense of the custom by Roman Catholic writers are but variations on the above (comp. Forbes, Explanation of..."
LATINISMS

1. Latin Words in Greek Characters.—The following are instances (see Tregelles in Horne's Introd. iv., 16; Αὐτόναμον, "farting," from the Latin aurum (Matt. xxix., 29). This word is used literally by Pliny, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Athenaeus, as may be seen in Wetstein, ad loc. See Abridg. Κύνος, μοσαί (Matt. xxv., 25); εὐκατόρτιον, centuria (Mark xv., 89), etc. λεγών, legion (Matt. xxvi., 53). Polybius (B.C. 150) has also used it in the Roman military terms (vi., 17) 1616. Σεκουλανώμος, speculator, a spy, speculator, "to look about," or, as Wahl and Schleusner think, from epiculum, the weapon carried by the spectator. The word describes the emperor's life-guards, who, among other duties, punished the condemned; hence "an executioner" (Acts xxi., 37). It is used in the Novum Testamentum (comp. Tacitus, Hist. i., 26; Josephus, War, i., 83, 7; *Seneca, De Irā, i., 16). Μάκελλων, from macellum, "a market-place for flesh" (1 Cor. x., 25). As Corinth was now a Roman colony, it is only consistent to find that the inhabitants had adopted this name for their public market, and that Paul, writing for them, should speak of the mikōn, "a mile" (Matt. v., 41). This word is also used by Polybius (ibid. i., 11, 8) and Strabo (v., 882).

The importance of the Latinisms in the Greek Testament consists in this, that, as we have partly shown (and the proof might be much extended), they are to be found in the best Greek writers of the same era. Their occurrence, therefore, in the New Testament, is more than accidental; it is more than a mere illustration of the peculiar grammatical and linguistic development of the Christian church. The subject is intricate, and adds much of discussion. See Dr. Marsh's dissertation on the subject, De Latinis in Nov. Test. et usu.

4. Latin Versions of the Holy Scriptures.—The extensive use of the Latin as a learned language, and the great influence which the translations in it have had upon all subsequent versions, render the study of Latin versions important. The various recensions or editions, however, need to be carefully distinguished and critically examined in order to show their real value and bearing.
Latin Versions

I. Ante-Hieronymian Versions.—The early and extensive diffusion of Christianity among the Latin-speaking people renders it probable that means would be used to supply the Christians who used that language with versions of the Scriptures, especially those resident in countries where the Greek language was less generally known. That from an early period such means were used cannot be doubted; but the information which has reached us is so scanty, that we are not in circumstances to arrive at certainty on many points of interest connected with the subject. It is even matter of debate whether there were several translations, or one translation variously corrupted or emended.

1. The first writer by whose reference is supposed to be made to a Latin version is Tertullian, in the words "Sci Tâmum plano non sic esse in Graeco authentico, quodmodo in usu exitii per duorum syllabarum aut callidam aut simplicem versiorem," etc. (De Monogaminis, c. 11). It is possible that Tertullian has in view here a version in use among the African Christians; but it is by no means certain that such is his meaning, for he may refer merely to the manner in which the passage in question had come to be usually cited, without intending to intimate that it was so written in any formal version. The probability that such is really his meaning is greatly heightened when we compare his language here with similar references to other parts of the Scriptures. Then, speaking of the Logos, he says, "Hanc Grecem Aetouv dicant, quo vocabulo etiam sermonean appelletam. Ideoque in usu est nostrorum per simplicitatem interpretationis, Sermonean, dicere, in primum apud Deum esse" (Ado. Prax. c. 5), where he seems to have in view similare应用 the colloquial usage of his Christian compatriots (comp. also Ado. Marc. c. 4 and c. 9). The testimony of Augustine is more precise. He says (De Doct. Christ. ii, 11): "Quia Scripturam in Hebrew lingua in Graecam verterunt numerari possunt, Latinis autem interpretes nullo modo. Ut enim quia primis fictae temporibus in manus venit codex Graecus et aliquantulum facultatis sibi utriusque linguae Latine videbatur, aucus est interpretari. A few sentences before he speaks of the "Latinorum interpretum infinita varietas," and he proceeds to give instances how one of these versions elucidates another, and to speak of the defects attaching to all of them. This testimony not only clearly establishes the fact of the existence of Latin versions in the beginning of the 4th century, but goes to prove that these were numerous; for that Augustine has in view a number of interpretations of not merely a variety of meanings, is evident from his statement in this same connection, "In ipsius interpretatioibus Italus cetera preferatur, nam est verborum tenacior cum perspicuitate sententiae," and from his speaking elsewhere (Cont. Faustianum, ii, 2) of "codies illiarum regionum." On the other hand, the testimony of Hilary is in favor of only one Latin version: "Latinae translatione divitum virtutem dictum magnam intuitum obsecrationem, non discernens ambigui sermone proprietatem" (in Ps. cixii). On the same side is the declaration of Jerome: "Si Latina exemplaria est diversa, multis responsibus, tot sunt enim exemplaria pene quot codices." That by "exemplaria" here Jerome refers to what would now be called editions or recensions, is evident from the nature of his statement, for it cannot be supposed that he intends to say that almost every codex presented a distinct translation; and this is rendered still more manifest by these words: "Si autem veritas est querrenda de pluribus, cur non ad Graecum originem revertentes ea que vel a vitiosa interpretationes male reddita, vel a presumptibus imperitiis emendata persueris, vel a librarium dormitantibus addita sunt aut sunt consuetudines" (Prof. in Josam). Elsewhere (Prof. in Josam) he says also: "Apud Latinos tot exemplaria quot codices et unusquisque pro suo arbitrio vel addidit vel subtraxit quod ei visum est;" where there can be no doubt as to his meaning. Jerome frequently uses the expression consomma et seu vulgata editio, but by this he intends the Sept., or the Old Latin translation of the Sept. In reference to the Latin N.T. he uses the expressions Latinus interpres, Latini codices, or simply in Latino.

The statement of Augustine, that of those interpretations the Italia est saeculi, that has been supposed to indicate decidedly the existence of several national Latin versions known to him. For this title can only indicate a translation prepared in Italy, or used by the Italian churches, and presupposes the existence of other versions, which might be known as the Africana, the Hispamica, etc. On the other hand, however, if there was a version known by this name, it seems strange that it should never be mentioned again by Augustine or by any one else: and further, it is remarkable, that to designate an Italian version he should use the word "Itala" and not "Italina." This has led to the suspicion that this word is an error, and different conjectural emendations have been proposed. Bentley suggested that for itala . . . nam there should be read itil . . . quae, a singularly infelicitous emendation, as Hug has shown (Introduct. i, 267). As Augustine elsewhere speaks of "codicibus ecclesiasticis interpretationes usitate", (De consensu Evang. ii, 66), it has been suggested by Potter that for Itala should be read usitata, the received reading having probably arisen from the omission, in the first instances, of the recurrent syllable as between inter- pretationem and usitate, in the version (usitata), and then the change of the unmeaning itala into itala. Of this emendation many have approved, and if it be adopted, the testimony of Augustine in this passage, as for a plurality of Latin versions, will be greatly enfeebled, for by the vero usitate he would doubtless intend the version in common use as opposed to the unauthorized interpretation of private individuals. As tending to confirm this view of his meaning, it has been observed that it is extremely improbable that if there was an acknowledged versus Africano, the Christians in Africa would be found preferring to that a version made for the use of the Italians. A new suggestion relating to this passage has been offered by Reuss (Gesck. d. Schr. d. N. T. p. 436), "Is it not possible," he asks, "that Augustine may refer in this passage (written about the year 387) to a work of Jerome, viz., his version of Our S. T. Hexateuch, which Augustine elsewhere (in his letters Ep. xxviii, tom. ii, p. 61) to Jerome prefers to his making a new translation from the original? At any rate," he adds, "it is remarkable that Isidore of Spain (Etymol. vi, 8) characterizes the translation of Jerome (the Latin version which he names) as the Latin version (in clariorem. May one venture to suggest that he has taken this phrase from Augustine, regarding him as using it of Jerome. To this, however, it may be replied, that whilst it is not improbable that Isidore took the passage from Augustine, he may have done so without regarding Augustine's words as referring to any work of Jerome. That they do so refer seems to us very improbable.

An effort has been made to obtain a decision for this question from a collection of the extant remains of the Latin translations. But (Einleitung, s. N. T. iv, 387 sq.) has compared several passages found in the writings of the early Latin fathers with certain extant codices of the early Latin text, and, from the resemblance which these bear to each other, he argues that they have all been taken from one common translation. And using this common text he has concurred both before and since the time of Eichhorn (Wetstein, Hody, Semler, Lachmann, Tregelles, Tischendorf), but others have, on the other side, pointed to serious differences of rendering, which, in their judgment, indicate the existence of at least three distinct translations (Michaelis, Hug, De Wette, Bleek, etc.). As the evidence stands, it seems impossible either to hold to the existence of only one accredited Latin version before the time of Jerome, the corruption of which, from various causes is sufficient to account for all the discrepancies to be found in the extant remains, or to maintain with certainty that there were several independent versions, the work of persons in different parts of the Latin Church. There is, however, a third supposition which may be advanced: There may at an early period, and probably in Africa, have been made a translation from the Bible from the vernacular, and this may have formed the groundwork of other translations, intended to be amended versions of the original. In this case a certain fundamental similarity would mark all these translations along with considerable variety; but the effort would be not to unmask or correct, but to unde-igned corruption, but to purposed attempts, more or less skillfully directed, to produce a more adequate version. This supposition meets all the facts of the case, and so far has high probability in its favor. Proceeding upon it, we may further suppose that these different revised or amended translations might have their origin in different parts of the western world, and in this case the meaning of Augustine's statement in the passage (Cont. Faust. ii, 2) where he speaks of "codes aliarum regionum" becomes manifest. In this case, also, if these translations were retained (and there were inclined to retain it) in the famous passage above cited, it will indicate the revision prepared in Italy and used by the Italian churches, of which it is natural to suppose that it would be both more exact and more polished than the others, and with which Augustine would become familiar on his residence in Rome and Milan. See ITALIC VERSION.

2. Of this ancient Latin version in its various amended forms, all of which has become customary to include under the general designation Itala, we have remains partly in the citations of the Latin fathers, partly in the Greeco-Latin codices, and partly in special MSS.
A copious collection from the first of these sources (which yet admits of being augmented) has been supplied by Sabatier, Bibliotheca SS. Latinae Vera antiqua seu Vetus Itala, etc., parumque repertorium potissimum (Remis, 1743, 8 vols. fol., ed. 2, 1749). For the Apocalypse we depend entirely on this source, namely, the quotations made by Primasius. The Greeco-Latin codices are the Contabridgian or Codex Bezae, the Lausitan, the Claromontane, and the Boernerian. See MANUSCRIPTS. Of the known special codices containing portions of the N.T., the following may be noticed or collated:

1. Cod. Vercellensis, written apparently by Eusebius the Martyr in the 4th century. It embraces the four Gospels, though with frequent lacuna. It is mentioned by Montferrat, Codices Italice, p. 353, and has been edited by Blanchinus (Blanchin), in Scripturis qualis.

2. Cod. Smaragdus, found not to exist, see Pet. in Tert. Capit. 1740, 4 vols. fol.); previously, and still more carefully, by J. A. Iriel, SS. Evangeliorum Cod. S. Eusebii mons clarissimum, at antependia et antiquitatem, etc. (Mediolani, 1742, 2 parts.

3. In this codex the Gospels are arranged in the order Matthew, John, Luke (Lacazet, Mark). As a specimen of the style of this codex, and in order to show some of its parts, we are given the following passage (John iv, 45-59 from the edition of Iriel):

4. Cod. Veronaensis, a MS. of the 4th or 5th century, in the library at Verona, containing the Gospels, but with many lacunae, edited by Blanchin.

5. Cod. Brixiensis, of about the 6th century, at Brixiæ, in the province of Verona, also containing the four Gospels, with the exception of some parts of Mark: printed by Blanchin.

6. Cod. Carthusianus, a very ancient MS. from which many of the early portions of Matthew’s Gospel are quoted, etc. (Paris, 1806). The gospel appears also in Blanchin’s work, 1-99.
clam of the sacred text is very considerable. They afford important aid in determining the condition of the Greek text in the early centuries. This, which Bentley was the first to perceive, or at least to announce, has been fully recognised by Lachmann, Tregelles, and Tischendorf, though they have not all followed it out with equal discretion (see Tischendorf's strictures, Prolegomena, p. 381, etc.).

The general character of the Itala is close, literal adherence to the original, so as often to transgress the genius of the Latin language; its phraseology being marked by solecisms and improprieties which may be due to its having been originally put either in a remote region from the centre of classical culture, or among the more illiterate of the community. Thus Spong is rendered by saltarius, dafid arom by supernumere (e.g. "quanto ergo superponit homo ab ovo," Matt. xii, 12); proponitur by prosperare, somnus apertus by insomnium, etc.; and we have such constructions as "stellam quam viderent in orientem" (Matt. ii, 9); "ut ego veniens adorem ei" (Matt. ii, 8); "qui autem audientem" (ii, 9); "pressuris quibus sustinetis" (2 Thess. i, 4); habitavit in Capharnaum maritimam" (Matt. iv, 13); itam maritimam, "verbum audet et continuo cum gaudio accipit eum" (xiii, 20); dominaturn eorum, principiantur eorum" (xx, 25), etc. It must be borne in mind, however, that the current text was exposed to innumerable corruptions, and that we can hardly, from the specimens that have come down to us, frame a fair judgment of the state in which it was at first. One can hardly suppose that by any Latin-speaking people, the following version, which is that presented by the Colbertine MS. of Col. ii, 18, 19, could have been accepted as idiomatic, or even intelligible: "Non vos conscitati volens in hominibus et religione angelorum, quos vidi ambulans, sine causa infatius eum carnis sum, et non tenens caput Christum, ex quo omne corpus communextr et conductione subministratur et proventum crescit in incrementum Dei." If this be (to borrow the remark of Eichhorn from whose Einleitung in N. T. IV, 834, we have taken these specimens) "verborum tenax, where is the "perspicuitas sententiae" of which Augustine speaks?

II. Hieronymum or Vulgate Version. See Vulgate.

III. Later Latin Versions.—Both before and since the invention of printing attempts have been made to present, through the medium of Latin, a more correct version of the original text than that found in the ancient Latin versions. Of these we have space only for a bare catalogue. (See notices of the authors under their names in their work.)

1. Adam Esten, a monk of Norwich, and cardinal (died 1397), seems to have been the first who thought of a new version; he translated the O.T., with the exception of the Psalter, from the Hebrew; his work is lost (Hody, p. 440; Le Long—Masch ii, 3, p. 482).

2. Giornorio Guaitetti, who died in 1498, began a translation of the Bible, of which he finished only the Psalms and the N.T.; this is lost (Tiraboschi, Storia della Lett. Ital. vi, 2, p. 109 sq.).

3. Erasmus translated the N.T., and published the translation along with the Greek text (Basil. 1516, fol.).

4. Th. Bengel issued his translation of the N.T. in 1554; it appeared along with the Vulgate version. Four other editions followed during the author's lifetime, and these present the Greek text as well as the Vulgate and Beza's own translation; many other editions have since followed. Beza aimed at presenting a just rendering of the original, without departing more than necessary from the Vulgate. His renderings are sometimes affected by his theological views.

5. Sanctus Pagninus, a learned Dominican from Lucer, produced a translation of the whole Bible (Lugdun. 1529, 4to., and Colen, 1641, fol.). Later editions of this work, with considerable alterations, appeared: one, edited by the famous Mich. Servetus, under the name of Villa- novanus (Lugd. 1542); another, revised and edited by R. Stephen (Paria, 1557, 2 vols. folio; with a new title, 1577). This latter has been often reprinted. The version of Arias Montanus, printed in the Antwerp, Paris, and London polyglots, is a revision of this version.

7. Sebastian Munster added to his edition of the Hebrew Scriptures a Latin translation (Basel, 1554—58, and 1556, 2 vols. folio). This is not faithful without being slavishly literal, and is executed in clear and correct Latin. Portions of it have been published separately.

8. The Zürich version, begun by Leo Judae, and completed by Billander and others (1458, folio, and in 4to and 8vo in 1444). This version is much esteemed for its ease and fluency; it is correct, but somewhat paraphrase. It has frequently been reprinted, there is one edition by R. Stephen (Paris, 1545).

9. Sebastian Castello produced, in what he intended to be the perfect Latin translation of the O. and N. T. (Basel. 1551, again 1573, and at Leipsic, 1738).

10. The version of Junius and Tremellius appeared at Frankfort in parts between 1575 and 1579, and in a collected form in 1579, 2 vols. folio. Tremellius took the principal part in this work, his son-in-law Junius rather assisting in the translating and revising. The work with him Tremellius translated the N.T. from the Syriac, and this, along with Beza's translation, appeared in an edition of Tremellius's Bible, published at London in 1586. The translation of Piscator is only an amended edition of that of Junius and Tremellius, and is much esteemed for its scholarly exactness, though in some cases its adherence to the original is over close.

11. Thomas Malvenda, a Spanish Dominican, engaged in a "nova ex Hebrew translation," which he did not live to finish. What he accomplished was published along with his commentaries (Ludg. 1650, 5 vols. folio), but the extreme barbarism of his style has caused his labors to pass into oblivion.

12. Cocceius has given a new translation of most of the Biblical books in his commentaries, Opera Omnia (tom. i-vi, Amsterdam, 1701).

13. Sebastian Schmid executed a translation of the O. and N. Test, which appeared after his death in 1596, 4to.; it has been repeatedly reprinted, and is esteemed for its scholarly exactness, though in some cases its adherence to the original is over close.

14. The version of Jean le Clerc (Clericus) is found along with his commentaries; it appeared in portions from 1610.

16. A new translation of the O. T. was undertaken by J. A. Dathe; it appeared between 1775-1817. At one time much admired, this version has of late ceased perhaps to receive the attention to which it is entitled.

20. H. A. Schott and F. Winer commenced a translation of the Bible, of which only the first volume has appeared, containing the Pentateuch (Alton, et Lipiae, 1810). Schott has also issued a translation of the N.T., with considerable alterations made by him from the Vulgate. This has passed into four editions, of which the last (1839) was superintended by Baumgarten-Crulius.

21. Rosenmiller (in his Scholia in V. T. Lipiae, 1788 sq.). Translations of the N.T. have also been issued by F. A. Ad. Zacharie Lips. 1823, and 1837, 4to.; See Carcopo, Crit. Sacr., p. 707 sqq.; Fritzsche, art. Vulgata, in Herzog's Kaysc. ; Bible of every Land, p. 210, etc.

Latitudinarians, a name given to those divines who in the 17th century professed indifference to what they considered the small matters in dispute between Puritans and High-Churchmen, and, looking at theology from a philosophical point of view, laid more stress on classical philosophy than on Christian theology. They attempted to compromise the differences between Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Independents. Their views were a result of the changes then going on in the religious world, and of the influence of philosophy. The doctrinal Puritans had already taken a position midway between these two extremes, and these five differences into the schism. Abbot, Carlton, Hall, and others were the chief leaders of that party. They attached no importance to externals, and prized practical piety far above all matters of form: and, though themselves attached to the Protestant Episcopal Church, they allowed others to differ from them. As liberal, but differing from them in doctrine, we find among the Eaton scholars Hailes, who, although an opponent of Laud's High-Churchism, was in dogmatics an Arminian; and Chillingworth, who desired to reduce Christianity to a few essential practical principles. In the midst of the struggle, and the rapid changes of religious views and systems, the moral conception of Christianity was daily gaining ground; on the other hand, theology was unable to withstand the influence of philosophy. The regeneration which the latter had experienced at the hands of Bacon and Des Cartes obliged theology to review its foundations in the light of philosophy. The school of Latitudinarians was fostered by Maurice, Moral and metaphysical Philosophy, in the Encyclopædia, vol. ii, 656; Stewart, Essay on Metaphysic Philosophy, p. 58, 61, notes, and 246, note O). Thus Platonic philosophy and theology were introduced into Cambridge by Cutbush (q. v.) and Henrietta More (q. v.). Men of these views (among others, also, John Smith, Worthington, bishop Wilkins, and Theophrus (tale), and especially the more moderate among them, were looked down upon with contempt by the more ambitious ones in power, and, as they would not follow the selfish tendencies of the times, were called Latitudinarians. In the days of the Commonwealth they were reproached with Arminianism and prelatism. But when the High-Church party came again into power with the Restoration, and its old adversaries tried to use for their former attacks by all means in their power, the moderate party was accused of want of loyalty and of opposition to the Church. Whoever refused to submit to the High-Church, or did not take sides with the strict Puritans against it, were called Latitudinarians. "That name," says a contempor ary, "is the man of straw who in the name of the church is proposed to the people to be killed in their stead in order to set up for want of a real adversary—a very convenient name wherewith to defame any one who we may wish to injure." As the name came thus to be applied to a number of persons who had no connection whatever with the party which it designated at first, nothing better may be said of it than that it is a designation used so as to attach to persons of any religion, the appellation soon came to be regarded as equivalent to Socinian, Deist, and Atheist. As regards the original Latitudinarians, they retained the liturgy, rites, and organization of the English Episcopal Church. They considered a general liturgy as a necessary ground of unity, and often the fanatical prayers of the Puritans, and they considered the English liturgy as the best, on account of its solemn earnestness and its character of primitive simplicity. The form of public worship they looked upon as a higher form of observance for the Roman Church and that of the conventicles. Ceremonies against they deemed useful for the purpose of edification, and episcopacy they cherished as the most correct and evangelical form of Church government, differing both from what they regarded as the tyrannical authority of Scotch Presbyterianism and from the anarchy of the Independents. In point of doctrine they also retained the confession of the English Church, which they considered as according thoroughly with the Scriptures. The commentators of the primitive Church were the guides by which they wished reason to be governed, and reason they recognised as the source of our knowledge of revealed and natural religion, which agree on all points. The fundamental principles of true religion are freedom of the will, the universality of the redemption by the death of Christ, the sufficiency of divine grace; and that the redemption is brought into the world through the testimony of Scripture, sometimes by the unvarying testimony of the primitive Church, and again by reason only. In theology, the oldest views are always found to be the most reasonable. Nothing that is false in philosophy is true in theology; but what God has united, let no man put asunder. Natural sciences have made immense progress, and philosophy and theology cannot remain behind. True science cannot be put down any more than the light of the sun or the motion of the ocean. It is the best weapon against atheism and superstition (comp. Smith [John], Discourses (ed. 1821), ii, p. 19). Thus the Latitudinarians took at once for their basis science and toleration. They taught respect for the Church by their submission to it, defended it by their learning and activity, and hoped to win over the Dissenters by their moderation, and the Presbyterians by their accommodating spirit, thus preventing them from anarchy. This is the character given to the Latitudinarians by one of their contemporaries in a work entitled A brief account of the New Sect of Latitudinari- ans (1652). It is remarkable how many ideas of the school of Latitudinarians still remain in the modern Presbytery. Thus, the doctrine of the Necessity of the New Gospel (1690), declared all Christian doctrines, except those of repentance and faith, non-essential. For this he was attacked by Jurie in his La Religion du Latitudinaire, and vainly attempted to defend the orthodoxy of his views in his Latitudinaris orthodosus (1697). The attempts made by the Latitudinarians in 1689-1699 to reconcile the Episcopalians and Presbyterian leaders failed utterly. Latitudinarianism was subsequently identified still more with indiscrimination, and seldom appeared in theological works. It is only in quite modern times, when especially the influence of human theology, that this tendency has been brought to light again in the Broad-Church party, which forms a sort of medium between the High and Low Church. By their opponents the Broad-Churchmen are, however, designated as Latitudinarians or Indifferentists. They consider these the difference of the Church, and insists that it should be compared with their essential unity. The watchword of the party is love and toleration. For doctrines, they hold to those of incarnation and atonement, conversion by grace and justification. They coincide with the Low-Church in condemning the ordo missae and the Church of England liturgy, but taking exceptions here and there to miracles, and with the High-Church in believing that man shall be judged according to his works. In opposition to the doctrine of the invisible Church of the evangelical Church, they lay great stress on the doctrine of a visible Church. They take what is good anywhere, as well in the Roman as in the evangelical churches. They aim at nothing less than the accomplishment of a religious and moral reformation, and seek to occupy in our day the place held at the beginning of this century by the evangelical party. This end they strive to attain partly by their science and partly by their practice, and thus distinguish among themselves between the theoists and the praxeists. They derive great comfort from the high scientific attainments of many of their members, and try to advance the education of the masses. The founders of this school were S. T. Coleridge and Thomas Arnold, and its most eminent followers were Hare, Whately, Maurice, Kingsley, Stanley, Alford, Conybeare, and Howson. About one seventh of the English clergy and a number of bishops belong to it. See Coneybeare, Church Parties; Schaff, Zat. u. Parteien d. engl. Lattise stands in the Auth. Vers. for the following Hebrew words in certain passages: 1. סִּֽבְּאָבָּה (sebabah), so called from darkness a room, a latticed opening (as like a window), throughout which a light enters; at the same time screens the inmates, especially females, from exterior sight (Judg. v, 28; “casement,” Prov. vii. 6). See Window. 2. עָפָּרָה (charakkim, prop. nets; Sept. צַעָּרָה), the net-work or lattices of a window (Cant. ii. 9. 3. עָפָּרָה (seba'ah), an interlacing), the latticed balustrade before a window or balcony (2 Kings i. 2; elsewhere a net or “sare,” Job xviii. 8; “net-work,” etc., around the capitals of columns). The lattice window is much used in warm Eastern countries. It frequently projects from the wall of the building, and is formed of fretted work, or of highly ornamental, portions of which are hinged, so that they may be opened or shut at pleasure. The object of the contrivance is to keep the apartments cool.

Latzembock, Henry de, a native of Bohemia, lived in the latter part of the 14th and first part of the 15th centuries. He was a friend of the reformer John Hus, whom, in connection with two other friends, he was appointed to conduct in safety to the Council of Constance. He stood very high in the favor of the emperor Sigismund, and appealed to him in behalf of the reformer. After the condemnation and burning of Hus he was himself suspected of heresy, was summoned before the council, and required to adjure the doctrines of his friend and approver of his condemnation, and in this connection he complied, being more intent on his own safety and advancement at court than anxious for reform.
After this period little information concerning him is attainable.—Gillet, Life and Times of John Hus, i, 352—354, 386; ii, 28, 260.

Laud, William, the celebrated archbishop under James I and Charles I, was born at Reading, the principal town of Berkshire, the 29th of July, 1573, of humble but respectable parentage. In 1589 he entered St. John's College, Oxford, graduated with distinction in 1594, and proceeded A.M. in 1598, when he was appointed reader in grammar. In January, 1600, he was ordained deacon, and priest in 1601. The Calvinistic and Puritan tendency was strong in Oxford at that time; but Laud's immediate instructors and friends had been on the other side; his natural instincts inclined him to High-Church views and high ritualistic observances; he saw, too, that the court was on that side, and that a powerful reaction against the Calvinistic ascendency was already in progress. Abbott (afterwards primas and Primate) had succeeded Dr. Holland and Reynolds as theological professors in the university; but Laud, being appointed in 1602 to read the Maye divinity lecture in St. John's College, did not hesitate to attack Abott's doctrine of the invisible church. The latter had, the latter had traced the visible Church down, in the Middle Ages, through the Berengarians, the Albigenses or Waldensians, the Wicklifites, and the Hussites, to Luther and the Reformation; Laud traced it boldly and exclusively through the Church of Rome. They did not see that exclusion was the error of both parties. In 1603 James succeeded to the throne of England, and, greatly to the disappointment and disgust of the Purtans, but to the unsatisfied demand of Laud and his friends, he openly took sides with the highest hierarchical party in the English Church, early adopting as his pet motto, "No bishop, no king." Then followed the "Millenary petition" and the famous conference at Hampton Court, which resulted in the king's proclamation of "uniformity in discipline and worship." This year Laud was chosen proctor for the University of Oxford, and in the same year he was appointed chaplain to the earl of Devonshire. In 1604 he took his degree of B.D., and in the thesis which he presented on the occasion he maintained the absolute necessity of baptism to salvation, and of diocesan bishops to the existcence of the Church. In 1610, the following year, Laud committed one of the most unfortunate, though oft-repeated faults of his life, in solemnizing the marriage of his patron, the earl of Devonshire, with lady Rich, who, acusteric fallacy and one-sidedness, "the state of the times rendered such instructions necessary; and the con-ernation of the Puritan faction, when they were made know at Oxford, is a proof of the wisdom of the monarch and his advisers in thus placing a timely restraint on the puritan partyism."

James had already (1610–12) re-established episcopacy in Scotland, and with a special view to effect a more perfect uniformity in the two churches, he set out in 1617 to visit his northern kingdom for the first time since his accession to the English throne, and ordered Laud to accompany him. The object of the visit was to substitute in the Scottish Church the Episcopal liturgy in stead of the Presbyterian form of worship; and, though the Presbyterians prayed that they might be preserved from the same, Laud and some of the royal chaplains courage James to persist in regarding the mass of the nation as a set of "factious enthusiasts," and to obsti-nately adhere to his purpose of imposing upon these people his own form of religion in the name of "the Church." James and Laud, with a little knot of archbishops and bishops who had been consecrated to their office, not in Scotland, but at Westminster, were "the n Church," and the Scottish nation was "the faction"—a mistake big with sad and fearful consequences. James now propounded the famous Five Articles, which he subjected first to the assembly called together at St.

Andrew's Church, Westminster, on January 22, 1618, where, through the indefatigable exertions of the bishops, and the shrewd and cunning management of the king, the Five Articles were confirmed. These articles were rigidly enforced, but without the desired effect. The Scot-nish "rabble" were too "factious" to submit to a religion manufactured for them and forcibly imposed upon them by others. It was left for James's successor to continue his father's design, but with still worse success; and it was reserved for Laud to take a more dominant part in the business, and from a higher position, at a subsequent period. At first, though Lillas inquisitor, he was inducted into the rectory of Bustoock, which he had taken in exchange for Norton; and, arriving at Oxford, he learned with pleasure that his exertions had effectually restrained the "Puritan enthusiasm" at Gloucester.

In 1620 Laud was at length raised to the episcopate, being made bishop of St. David's, in spite of the strenuous opposition of archbishop Abbot, as his friends assert, and through the earnest solicitations of the duke of Buckingham and of the lord-keeper Williams, then bishop of Lincoln, as is commonly alleged. Before his consecration, Laud, much distrusted, resigned the presidency of St. John's College, because, though such things were often winked at, he could not hold it without a violation of the statute. In his primary visitation of his diocese, he set things "in order" according to his peculiar views of what constituted the essentials of "the Church's" religion. He also built a chapel for himself, which he proceeded to fit up to his own taste as a model, and consecrated it with sundry extraordinary ceremonies.

In 1622 Laud's dispute with the Jesuit Fisher took place, which was, perhaps, the most mortifying performance of his life, evincing extensive knowledge and no mean ability. Yet, dealing with the controversy from the high Anglican point of view, it fails to cover the whole Protestant position, and is now almost forgotten, being a document of much less breadth and historical interest than some still older defences of the English

Church, as, for example, Jewell's Apology.

About this time Laud became chaplain to the duke of Buckingham, and between them there grew up an in-imate and lasting friendship. While Buckingham was absent with the Queen in Spain, Laud was in correspondence with him, and seems to have charged him with the care of his interests at court during his absence; for, observing or suspecting some movements of the lord-keeper Williams towards undermining the duke in the royal favor, he immediately informed his patron in Spain of the apprehended danger, who accordingly hastened home to protect himself. Hence arose a determined hostility of the duke towards Williams, and Williams accused Laud of ingratitude, while Laud, on the other hand, charged him with duplicity and selfishness. Externally the duke's enmity was judged of more value than the bishop's, and the breach ripened into a rooted enmity between the two churchmen.

Laud chose to consider himself insulted by Abbot and Williams because his name was not inserted in the High Commission. He complained to Buckingham for-wardly of this exclusion. In 1624 James died, and Laud lamented him with demonstrations of the utmost sorrow. On the first day of March, the year after the death of James, Laud received his appointment to preach before Charles at Westminster at the opening of the first Parliament; and the king, upon the advice of bishops Laud and Andrews, prohibited, in the Convocation which met at the same time with Parliament, the discussion of the five predestinarian articles of the Synod of Dort, "on account of the number of Calvinists admitted under Abbot's auspices into the Low-Court; On the Sunday after the marriage of Charles and Henririetta Maria, Laud again preached before the king and the House of Lords. The king had summoned this Parliament to procure supplies for the prosecution of his wars; but they chose to look after the righting of their domestic wrongs. The king therefore, after proceeding to cite and condemn a certain Mr. Montague for preaching what they judged heretical and unconstitutional doctrine, Laud immediately flew to Montague's protection, and, at his remonstrance, the king revoked the proceedings of Parliament, and prorogued them to Oxford. Parliament was no more pleasant at Oxford than it had been at Westminster, and in a pet

Charles suddenly dissolved it.

Meanwhile Laud was continually rising in the king's esteeem and confidence, while Williams was removed from his duties, and his influence declined. Laud was indestructible in his labors in preaching and purging the Church, refusing to ordain any whom he found to be unqualified for the sacred office, according to his view of the proper qualifications. He was appointed by the king to supply the place of the now disgraced Williams, the dean of Westminster, in the ceremony of the coronation. He here had official charge of the regalia, and is accused of having placed a crucifix upon the "altar," and tampered with the coronation oath; but of this accusation not much was ever made.

By the king's appointment, Laud again presided at the coronation of the king of Portugal, which assembled immediately after the coronation. This Parliament likewise proceeded at once to appoint a committee on religion. They also impeached the duke of Buckingham, and refused to do any other business until his case was disposed of. The king, finding them resolved on the ruin of his minister—and it is to be observed it was the House of Lords and not the House of Commons before which he was to be tried—to save his favorite, was compelled to dissolve his second Parliament. Unquestion-ably Laud was deeply and anxiously interested in the cause of his patron and his church, and on some show of evidence, with having written the speech of Buckingham in his own defence, and the speech of the king in Buckingham's behalf.

In 1626 Laud was translated to the see of Bath and Wells—a richer bishopric than that of St. David's. Both of Charles's Parliaments had refused to vote the subsidiary to supply his pecuniary wants, and he resolved to collect the money without parliamentary authority. With this view he resorted to the expedient of "turning the pulpits," and Laud was instrument for it. He was directed to prepare letters to be issued to the two archbishops and their suffragans, through them to the inferior clergy, and by them to the people, persuading them to pay cheerfully the taxes necessarily imposed on them. 'The inactions," as Laud informs us, "were partly political and partly ecclesiastical," and were to be published in every parish. Laud engaged in the duty with his wonted alacrity, and almost immediately upon receiving the royal commands he had the instructions prepared. His apologists admit that it is a difficult matter to justify these instructions, "because they affect dangerous proceedings, which, when once set on foot, would be attended with the worst consequences;" it was no less than undertaking to tax the people without the consent of their representatives. By Laud's prompt and efficient management of this affair he was still further advanced in the king's good opinion, and was rewarded with the appointment of dean of Westminster, and the promise of the primacy in the event of Abbots's decease. In enforcing Laud's "instructions," doctors Sibthorpe and Manwaring preached sermons in which they maintained the extreme doctrines of passive obedience, and which, after Laud's revision, were published. Abbott, too, had refused to license Sibthorpe's sermon, for which factionuous procedure a commission of sequestration was issued against him, and the administration of his metropolitan functions was put into the hands of Laud, in conjunction with four other bishops. In the same year the papists committed a new outrance, and a distribution of sundry bishops and bishopsrics, arrangements were initiated to make a vacancy in the see of London, that Laud might at once be translated to that rich and powerful bishopric. Meanwhile Charles had been compelled by his necessities to try the third Parliament, although it was well understood that Laud as well as Buckingham would be thereby endangered. But, to propagate the popular feeling, several commissions were made, and, among other things, Abbott was restored to his functions, and received at court. Again Laud preached the opening sermon, and the king concluded his speech by exhorting Parliament to follow the good advice which Laud had given them. But the Commons determined to proceed in business in their own way. They first drew up and passed the famous Petition of Right. They then presented a remonstrance of grievances against the duke of Buckingham, not omitting to mention Laud in their indictment. They cited Dr. Manwaring to their bar, ordered him to be severely punished, and his sermons to be burnt. The king procured Parliament, ignored the complaints against Buckingham, restored Manwaring, and, successively giving him various livings, at length promoted him to the deanship of Worcester, and then to the bishopric of St. David's, made Sibthorpe prebendary of Peterborough, and translated Laud to the see of London, July 13, 1629. On the death of Buckingham, which took place on the 14th, the king was so satisfied that the king was pleased to assure Laud that he intended to intrust him with his confidence in Buckingham's room. At the examination of Felton, the assassin of Buckingham, before the privy council, the man admitted the deed, but denied the privity of any other parties. Laud, in his eagerness to improve this presented opportunity for reaching and crushing his enemies, threatened him with the rack if he would not disclose his accomplices. But, upon the judges being asked whether Felton could be lawfully put to the rack, they returned for answer that by the laws of England he could not. It was in this interval, too, that Laud, "in order to put a stop to the disturbances which arose from the preaching of the abstruse and mystical doctrines of predestination," as his friend aver, "procured a royal declaration to be prefixed to the Laud Articles," prohibiting such preaching. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, was gained over from the popular party to the king's side by largesses of royal favor, and he and Laud immediately commenced a friendship which ever after remained inviolate.

When the length Parliament again assembled, the Commons opened with a remonstrance upon the alleged infractions of the Petition of Right, and then turned their attention to their religious grievances. Excited to great exasperation by the king's declaration which Laud had procured, they passed a solemn vote against it, claiming, protesting, and vowing that the current and general exposition of the articles, "which had been established by act of Parliament," had ever been the same as their own. In the debate, Sir John Eliot denounced the bishops as "bishops without Bishop," and the courtiers of the courtly sound in religion. Witness," said he, "the two bishops, Laud and Nelle, who were complained of at the last meeting of Parliament. I apprehend much fear that, should we be in their power, we may be in danger to have our religion overthrown. Some of them are masters of ceremonies, and they have introduced those enmities into the Church." The House resumed the cases of Montague, Manwaring, and Sibthorpe, to all of whom the king had granted pardons and preferments. Laud and Nelle were the grand objects of attack, being accused of having procured those pardons. "In Laud and Nelle," declared Sir John Eliot, "is centred all the danger we fear," and he proposed to petition the king to leave those bishops to "the justice of the House." Oliver Cromwell, too, distinguished himself in this discussion; the preferment of Manwaring especially "excited his wrath," and, if these things were not bettered, the future Protector, "what may we expect?" At length the king, exasperated, endeavored to adjourn the House by royal command. This led to a scene of great excitement and confusion, and finally the third Parliament of Charles's reign was dissolved. Parliaments were now to be abolished, and Laud was prime minister. He must be held to all the responsibility attaching to such a position at such a time. He presided especially over the affairs of England, the duke of Hamilton over those of Scotland, and Wentworth over those of Ireland. In his ecclesiastical administration, Laud's friends commonly claim for him the character of toleration and liberty, in the face of the fact that, having advised with Harrel, bishop of York, he drew up certain articles which, under the royal authority, were immediately dispatched to archbishop Abbot, requiring him and his suffragans in brief) to suppress the preaching of the Puritans, to note all absentee's from the prescribed public prayers, and to render an account in the premises on the 2d of January every year. Early in 1630 Laud was chosen chancellor of the University of Oxford. In the same year he also enjoyed the honor of officiating at the baptism of the infant prince, afterwards Charles II, although this distinction belonged by usage to the archbishop of Canterbury. Laud was now in the full tide of prosperity, and it was thought he could stand in his place. Did the Puritans undertake to buy up the improperizations of Church livings, that they might have the disposal of them for their lecturers, Laud had them punished for their impertinence, and their purchases confiscated to the king. Did they presume to preach or publish their peculiar tenets at Oxford or in Ireland, Laud had them expelled or silenced. Were any bishops or deansers vacant, Laud saw that they were filled with the right sort of churchmen. He enlarged St. John's College with a new quadrangle. He repaired St. Paul's Cathedral. He took cognizance of the chapels and chaplains of English congregations abroad, and of the congregations or churches of foreigners in England, and reduced them all to conformity, or placed the members of the latter under the strictest surveillance, taking away the children, and burdening the parents with all the disadvantages of alienage. He urged the Scottish bishops, if they made any change in their liturgy, to adopt that of the Church of England without any variation; and the new liturgy which was drawn up by those bishops was submitted to his final revision. On the king's visit to Scotland, Laud, at the king's bidding, was made a member of the Scotch Privy Council, and preached before the king, in the chapel royal in Holyrood House, on "the utility of conformity."
At length, on the 4th of August, 1633, archbishop Abbot died; on the 6th Laud was promoted by the king to the primacy, and on the 19th of September was formally translated to this, the long-desired goal of his ambition. At the same time he was offered a cardinal’s hat by certain emissaries of the pope, which, without betraying either astonishment or indignation, or disturbance of any kind, he respectfully declined “till Rome should be otherwise than it then was”; and before his enthronement he was elected chancellor of the University of Dublin.

In his metropolitan chair his first act was to issue many titular acts for candidates for ordination, so as more effectually to shut out Puritan preachers and lecturers. The next was to revive and extend the king’s declaration concerning lawful sports on Sundays. The archbishop now proceeded upon his metropolitan visitations, and he made thorough work of it; for all Puritanism he was a perfect “root and branch” man. But one great business and burden with him was to see that the communion-tables were placed altar-wise, railed in, and approached always with the prescribed bows and obeisances, it being assumed that thus, and thus only, could the proper reverence be preserved in the Church. His old patron, bishop Williams, he suspended for contumacy. He busied himself earnestly in improving the revenues of the poor clergy of London and the poorer clergy of Ireland. He procured a new charter for the University of Dublin, another for Guildhall, and the adoption of the Thirty-nine Articles, instead of those of Lambeth, by the Irish Church. Indeed, through his intimacy with Wentworth, the lord deputy, and his chancellorship of the Dublin University, he seems, as prime minister and archbishop of Canterbury, to have had much more control of the affairs of the Irish Church than her own primate, Usher, or any or all of her bishops and archbishops. Civil appointments, also, were accumulated upon Laud. He was not only prime minister, privy counsellor in England and in Scotland, member of the courts of Star Chamber and High Commission, but he was also appointed a member of the committee of trade, and a commissioner of the Treasury, and placed on the foreign committee. He procured the new Caroline Charter for Oxford, and continued his munificent gifts. He took especial care of the restoration of the cathedrals and of the Cathedral service, with all the old accustomed appointments and ceremonies.

Laud, like Wolsey when in favor with Henry VIII, had reached the highest pinnacle of his greatness. All honor, power, and splendor seemed to converge towards him. All his projects were crowned with successful results. It was Laud here, it was Laud there, it was Laud everywhere. He had three kingdoms well in hand. Church and State lay submissive at his feet. But the scene was soon to change. He was disporting himself upon the bosom of a volcano, whose vents-bodes he was hoping to keep stopped up with his puny engineering. The quakings and rumblings of the approaching eruption were already increasing. In the year 1637, “some factious and refractory men had determined to establish their enthusiasm on the shores of America, amidst the forests and lakes.” These emigrants without a royal license was thought expedient to restrain, “because of the many idle and obstinate humors whose only or principal end was to live without the reach of authority.” Eight ships in the Thames were stopped by an order of Council, and no clergyman was allowed to leave the country without the approbation of the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London. Among those intended emigrants Oliver Cromwell is said to have been thus stopped. The symptoms of dissatisfaction and uneasiness were drawing towards a crisis, and some prosecutions of this same year accelerated the national calamities. The first case was the trial of Pynne, Bastwick, and Burton in the Star Chamber. Pynne was a graduate of Oxford, and a barrister of Lincoln’s Inn; Bastwick left Cambridge before taking his degree, and, having travelled nine years on the Continent, took the degree of M.D. at Padua; Burton was A.M. and B.D. at Oxford, and had been clerk of the closet to the Prince of Wales, and rector of St. Matthew’s, Friday Street, London. Prynne, for his Histrio-Mastix, had already been condemned to pay a fine of £300, to be expelled for a term of years, and to lose his licence to print. He now came to stand in the pillory at Westminster and at Cheapside, and at each place to have an ear cut off, to have his book burnt before his face, and to remain a prisoner for life. In the execution of the sentence it is said that Prynne was nearly.Another violent scene of Puritanism was about to be opened, with the book of his book. From this, however, the irrepressible Prynne, as soon as he could procure writing materials, continued audaciously, and with amazing industry, to send forth his pamphlets against his persecutors; and now the doctor Bastwick and the rector Burton had joined the lawyer in the fray. These pamphlets were no doubt inseparable from extramural, coarse and violent in their language; they were naturally branded as seditious and seditious by the other side. But it is to be remembered that some authors were persecuted fanatics; and it is a better excuse for them to say that the controversial language of their writings is always a means of exposing the truth; and thus to say that the punishments of the age were barbarous. The use of epithets is largely a matter of taste and fashion; but humanity itself, wherever it exists, is shocked at the sight of torture, and cruelty, and blood. All this while three of his pamphlets were condemned a ninepenny fine of £600, to lose the remainder of his ears in the pillory, to be branded on both cheeks with the initials of slanderous libeler, and to be immured for life in Caernarvon Castle. Bastwick and Burton were to pay the same fine, to lose their ears in the pillory, and to be imprisoned for life in separate castles. On this occasion, Laud, who was a member of the court, made a long speech. As he had everything under his own control, he had no temptation to use violent language. He assumed an air of studied coolness and dignity. Having descanted upon the merits of his own immaculate administration in Church and State, and set forth in strong colors the dangerous and abominable character of factious and sedulous libeling, he added, “But because the business hath some reflection upon myself, I shall forbear to ensure them, and leave them to God’s mercy and the king’s justice.” That is to say, having fully given his views, he would not cast his formal vote in the case, but, knowing full well what the decision, yes, the “unanimous” decision of the judges would be, he concludes his speech thus: “I give all your lordships hearty thanks for your noble patience, and your just and sound sentence to the men, and your unanimous dislike of them and defence of the Church.” Who can doubt that Prynne was right in afterwards declaring that Laud was the cause and contriver of the sentence before it was given, and that he approved and thanked the lords for it when it was given? The three victims underwent their “punishment” (as Laud’s friends delight to call it) with the most astonishing heroism. Such “punishment” of such men, however ignominious or degrading it was meant to be, could never elevate the dignity nor strengthen the position of the party that gave it. The subjects in no degree were supported by the sympathies of an immense mass of the people, as well as by their own courage or obstinacy, their religious principle or fanaticism. No wonder that libels against the archbishop were multiplied and intensified, and that his victims were honored with the approbation of his adversaries in popular favor. It was found necessary, in order to remove them out of the reach of their friends, to transfer them from the prisons to which they had been confined to other castles in the Channel islands.

Having now seen the leaders of the maligna faction very few of the “punishments” lasted out of the way. Laud had the pleasure of having his early patron, bishop Williams—against whom he seems to have nursed a rancorous grudge, as though fearing that one day he might be a dangerous rival—arraigned before him in the Star Chamber, at first on the old charge of violating civil authorities in Scotland and after this of suborning a witness; and, having again delivered himself of a long and dignified speech, magnifying the enormity of the crime of subornation of perjury, especially in a clergyman and a bishop, and at the same time protest ing his personal friendliness, he gracefully leaves the accused to the tender mercies of a court thus "tuned," who sentenced him to pay a fine of $10,000, to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and to be suspended from all his offices, preferments, and functions.

Upon Laud's recommendation, a decree was passed by the Star Chamber in 1637 for restraining the printing of books. The provisions of the edict were sufficiently severe. It limited the number of master printers under penalty of whipping; it forbade the printing of books without a license from the archbishop or the bishop of London, or their chaplains, or from the chancellors or vice-chancellors of the universities. It prohibited the sale of imported books without a similar license; it authorized the Company of Stationers to seize on all such books as they found to be schismatical or offensive, and to lay them before the ecclesiastical authorities. The bishop of London was given the power to print any books in English beyond the seas, or to import them into the country; and finally it provided that offenses against the decree should be punished by the court of Star Chamber or High Commission. Such was the law enacted—not by the English Parliament, but by the Star Chamber—to protect the English Protestant Church, but the Laudian ecclesiastical system against the "Puritan faction."

The "Short Parliament" of 1640 had been dissolved after a session of three weeks; but as the Convocation continued to sit, a set of measures was drawn up under the influence and presidency of Laud, which contained the famous election oath; and the first of which proclaimed that monarchy was of divine right, that the royal authority was independent, not only of the bishop of Rome, but of every other earthly power, and that it cannot be assailed on any pretense without resistance to the ordinance of God. Not only this canon, but the whole body of them, were of the most arbitrary character, especially enjoining, under severe penalties, the ceremonies to which the archbishop was notoriously attached; and all this at a time most unwisely chosen, when the whole condition of the empire was in a state of great disorder. Clarendon remarks, "the season in which synod continued to sit was in so ill a conjuncture of time that nothing could have been transected there of a popular and prevailing influence."

The archbishop prime minister had so completely established uniformity in England that he now had leisure to turn his particular attention to the reformation of Puritan abuses in the outlying islands of Jersey and Guernsey. He claimed to have brought Chillingworth back from the Church of Rome. If he did, he certainly did not make that irreligious defender of the religion of Protestants a disciple of his own system. He urged bishop Hall to write his treatise on Episcopacy; but Hall's claims were not put high enough to satisfy Laud, who was particularly offended because the pope was plainly called Antichrist. The plot now thickens. The Scottish troubles growing out of the attempted imposition of the new canons and liturgy upon the Scottish people, beginning with the "profane imprécation" of the dame Janet Geddes, in St. Giles's, at the first reading of the detested service: "Out, out, thou false thief; dost thou lay thy mass at my leg?" had roused anew into an irresistible storm of violence and rebellion. The uproar of the "old woman" in a church, and the brickbats of the mob around it, had turned into a national conspiracy.

Through all the business Laud had adroitly managed to keep himself out of the way and make the sufferings of the nation attributed to the heresy of the king or the Scottish bishops; nevertheless, it is evident he was mixed up with it all, not only as accessory, but as prime minister. He corresponded constantly with the Scottish bishops as well as with the civil authorities in Scotland. The bishops made their reports and their excuses, and his advice and direction were required and sought on all occasions.

The invasion of England by the army of the Covenanters at length compelled Charles once more to summon the English legislature. The Long Parliament met. Then theouble burst, then the flaming spher doms of a luxurious and insolent court were exchanged for humiliation and deepening gloom; then the vast machinery of ecclesiastical despotism, pushed to its utmost tension of pride and tyranny, suddenly gave way with a crash, and the accumulated usurpations of the prerogative hastened to their final and irreversible doom. The odious courts of the Star Chamber and High Commission were abolished, and all judges were henceforth made independent of the crown; no taxes, of whatever description, were to be levied without authority of Parliament, and Parliaments were by law to be triennial.

The earl of Strafford, lord deputy of Ireland, Laud's most intimate friend, the king's ablest political adviser, and the most skilful commander of the royal forces against the Scotch, was impeached for high treason, and an impeachment accuses forthwith committed to the Tower, where he was kept imprisoned three years (1641-5); his jurisdiction and all his offices and emoluments were sequestered by the House of Peers. Lambeth Palace was made a state prison, and Leightown, now almost a manse, was put in charge of it; Smyth was made his warden in the Tower. The bishops were unseated from the House of Lords; episcopacy and the liturgy were abolished by act of Parliament; and Laud—having seen the complete triumph of the miserable "fanatical faction" over which he had wielded the rod of power and of punishment so long, the utter destruction and abolition of the hierarchy and the ceremonies to which his aggrandizement and magnificence he had devoted his life, and the annihilation of all his fond dreams of personal grandeur, and glory, and lordly munificence—was at length condemned by an ordinance of Parliament, and suffered decapitation on Tower Hill, meeting his doom with perfect composure and quiet dignity, on the 10th of January, 1645.

Thus fell the famous archbishop Laud, perhaps the best praised and most blamed man that ever lived. As to the formal legality of his sentence, it may be admitted that its case was not one of those that fall within the statute of attainder; but its execution was not, by the law as declared by the clear and unambiguous language of the statute of attainder; it was not attainted. As to the specific charges against him, it may be granted that they could not, except constructively, amount to treason even if proved, and that few of any weight were proved with such evidence as would be satisfactory to an impartial and unprejudiced court of justice. But it must be remembered that Laud was tried before a revolutionary tribunal; that, in such circumstances, moral, not legal evidence swayed his judges; and that the general, known truth of the case, not the detailed proof of specific articles, determined the conclusion.

It may be conceded that the arbitrary and tyrannical acts of the administration of Charles and of Laud, whether in Church or State, did not go beyond the precedents which had been set from Henry VIII downwards; but it must be remembered that the spirit of the times had changed, and it was the bounden duty of wise men in high places to know it, and act accordingly. A people educated under Romish domination and superstition might submit to the imposition of taxes or of creeds by the sovereign and established authority, which a people educated under a pure form of government, and used to the inalienable rights of personal liberty and freedom of thought, could no longer brook. Moreover, a tyrannical despotism once constitutionally established can never be abolished or got rid of unless the governors either yield to the popular appeal or are illegally put down by revolutionary force and violence.

It may be conceded that Laud was honest and conscientious in defending the extreme doctrines of the divin right, of the royal prerogative, and of passive ob compliance with his successor. The “Puritans’ fa Church and State; but, in a historical esti gh of his career and character, this proves nothing.

The constitution of successive Parliaments shows that this “faction” was an increasing majority of the nation; they, too, were conscious of their purpose. Thus the “Puritans were conscious—fanatically, not by policy, conscious; the parliamentary leaders, those noble defenders of English liberty, were conscious; most despots, tyrants, and conservatives, as well as rebels, revolutionists, and reformers, are conscious.
Their consciousness must be judged independent of their well informed or ill informed public consequences. There may be fault on both sides: one extreme begets another. So it was then; so it was

It may be conceded that the charge of popery against Laud—a charge from which he suffered more severer than from any other, and which more than any other was the cause of his ruin—was not literally true. What was substantially true was thus put into the false and extravagant formula of the demagogue—it was a cari chere against the soul of the Church of England.
It was “as by law established,” so long as the laws were in accordance with his sentiments, or as he had the interpreta and execution of them in his own hands. It was not Roman popery, but Anglican or Laudian popery which he would have saved. No doubt he was more a Protestant than a Protestant in the true sense of that word. His sympathies were more with Rome than with Augsburg or Geneva; and the people, who are instinctively sagacious in questions of this kind, did not fail to perceive it, and they expressed their judgment, as is their wont, in the most summary and positive terms.

As to ecclesiastical ceremonies, Laud’s devotion to them and to their enforcement is certainly not among the marks of his greatness of mind. The opposition to them may have been as unreasonable as their imposi yet the fact was they were generally unpopular and odious, and Laud, in his position, was bound to have the discretion to accommodate himself to that fact.
It boots nothing to say that they were not illegal; it is enough that they were both unpopular and unnecessary.

It boots nothing to talk of the irreverence and solemnity of the forms and ceremonies; that is merely exaggerating that; but, at all events, decency and reverence could have been preserved without the precision and multi plied formalities of the Laudian ceremonial.

It may be conceded that Laud was a munificent pa trion of learning and of the universities, with whose dig naries he was on terms of intimacy, but it might be argu able to inquire whence came all the funds of which he made all this lordly distribution; and perhaps we shall find that, in this matter, Laud deserves only this honor above many other men, that he honestly paid over at least a portion of the money to those to whom, after all, rightfully belonged. He never stinted the splendor or sumptuousness of his own establishment, or the ap pointments of his personal retinue. Of his wealth and grandeur he enjoyed what he could. But let it remain to his credit that his vanity—if it were nothing better—to the form in which his public benefactions were amiable to inquire whence came all the funds of which he made all this lordly distribution; and perhaps we shall find that, in this matter, Laud deserves only this honor above many other men, that he honestly paid over at least a portion of the money to those to whom, after all, rightfully belonged. He never stinted the splendor or sumptuousness of his own establishment, or the ap pointments of his personal retinue. Of his wealth and grandeur he enjoyed what he could. But let it remain to his credit that his vanity—if it were nothing better

As to intellectual abilities, Laud’s must have been considerable, or he could never have been the historical personage he was. In the personal habits of his private life he was irreproachable. As a clergyman he was in defatable and punctilious is the discharge of his du ties. He was always narrow and bigoted in his views, but he lived in narrow and bigoted times. How far his high political positions were compatible with his ecle siastical character may well be doubted, and his exam ple can never be repeated again in England. How far the corrupting influence of political place, and of the association of political persons and of political life, may have contributed to develop and exaggerate his worst faults—which, after all, were chiefly those of adminis tration—it is impossible to say. It must be remembered that he was a courtier long before he was a bishop, and continued a courtier till he became primate of all England, and thereafter till he was “translated” from the court to the Tower of London. If a man could pass unassailed through the scenes of such a life, a natu rally unprincipled man, he should have been almost unassailable in such an atmosphere. Laud’s devotional compositions, in the form of private prayers, are often admirable, and are thought to give a very favorable insight into his interior religious life. Let us hope that the prayers were sincere and acceptable.

Laud’s public career may be considered with reference to the lightness of his general purpose, or to the wisdom of his aiming at its accomplishment, or to the manner in which he endeavored to effect it. As to the right or wrong of his general purpose, his theory and aim, whether in Church or State, but particularly in the Church, it has always been, and perhaps always will be, a matter of dispute. It is useless to discuss it. Any judgment of his character based upon the assumption of this question is no better than a petitio princi-As to the wisdom or folly of undertaking to accomplish that purpose, there is more purpose in seeking to judge it than in either, for he was more and more generally admitted that he made a mistake in the attempt. His friends regard it as a ve-tional error, his enemies reckon the blunder a crime. As to the means he employed, and, in general, his whole character, he has been subjected to a general verdict against him. He had great personal faults. Prominent among them were an overweening ambition, self-sufficiency, and insolence. An aristocratic estimate of the structure of society, and a sovereign contempt for the people and the popular will—very natural, but too often that of a man of his origin and profession—an utter desultion of the grand idea of humanity, underlie all the mistakes and all the misfor tures of his life.

We conclude our sketch with the following candid admissions from Le Bas, one of Laud’s most earnest apologists and admirers. “That the administration of Laud was in some respects injurious to the Church can hardly be denied; but then it is most important to keep in mind that the injury was inflicted not so much by the measures which he adopted as by the manner in which he enforced them. That is to say, the exag-eration of the forms and the zeal and force of his mission, by his adherents, and the inattention and irritation of the mass of the people, have made a united people, and the man who contrived his good should be so vindictively evil spoken of. From all that we learn of him, his manner appears to have been singularly ungra cious and unpopular, and his temper oppressively irritable and hot. If we are to trust the representations of him left us, he was not only an honest but a forgetful and hardened person, and had been one of the most de-shameful persons in the three kingdoms except to those who were intimately acquainted with his worth. There was nothing affable or engaging in his general behavior. His very integrity was often made odious by wearing an aspect of austerity and haughtiness. It would almost seem as if prudence had been struck out of his catalogue of the cardinal virtues.

He was unable, as Warburton remarks, to comprehend one important truth, with which Richelieu was so familiar, when he said that if he had not spent as much time in civilities as in business he had undone his master. The consequence of this ignorance, or of this disdain, of the ways of the world was unacceptably hurtful to the cause which at all times was nearest his heart.
In the minds of many who were ignorant of the essential excellence of the man, the interest of the Engla mission, his administration, by his adherents, and the dom of those who either could not bear or could not bear the impatience of control. Whether the Church could have been saved by any combination, in the person of its nier, of those rare endowments which secure at once both reverence and attachment, so that his dignity can at this day be competent to pronounce; but it certainly is not altogether surprising that this unhappy defect should, even in the minds of judicious and impartial men, have connected his administration with the ruin of the Establishment. In such unquiet times, more especially a man like Lagrange, who was not without his faults, a firm and conscientious disciplinarian, but as the rigorosus and overbearing priest; and the Church would be sure to suffer most grievously for the unpopularity of her governor.

In England, the parties with which Laud's life was implicated have not yet passed away, so that it is almost impossible even now to get an impartial estimate of the man from his own countrymen; but it can hardly be doubted that the ultimate verdict of history will be his final condemnation. The English monarchy has gloriously subdued the political principles which he defended; his ecclesiastical principles will ultimately be found equally unnecessary, nay, hostile, to the true strength and glory of the English Church. (D. R. G.)

Laud's Sion Salvatorum is the beginning of the renowned sequence of Thomas Aquinas (1224-1274) for Corpus Christi day. It consists of twelve double verses, which are as follows:

1. Lauda Sion Salvatorum
2. Lauda decem et postremum
3. In hymnals and canticles: [de, Quantum potes, tantum as]
4. Quia major omnium lauda, Neque laudare sufficit.
5. Laude, laude specialis.
6. Pange utrisque et vitalis
7. Hodie populi, Quem in secreta mensa cense
8. Verba fraterni ducendae
9. Dat honesta ambulator
10. Sit tua plena, sit bona
11. Sit jucunda, sit decorosa, Menele ratto.
12. Deus sumnum sollemnis agitur

In quibus prorsus relictus Bajam, 108.

4. In hoc mensa novi regni Novum pascua nove legis Phare recta terminal Vestimentum novitatem
Umbrat long veritas Necem lux eliminat.
5. Quod licea Christus gestis Facies eum hoc expressa
In eis memoriam.

Docet Maria instituta,
Patronis, virtutis salutis Conservam nostram hostiam.

6. Dogmata dutius Christianis, Quod in his sancti postremi Et visum in sanctum
Quod non operis, quod non virtutum Animae fore deorum
7. Sub diversis spectabilis Signum tauren et non rebus Resitetae temere.

Carus eburneus, rana potens Manet tamen Christus utera Sub urbea specie.
8. A smente non conclusa
Non contracta, non divisa Quo non imposita
9. Summit unus, summa mille Quantum loq, taceis
Nec summae consummatur.
10. Sumunt boni, sumunt mal Sorte tamen inaequali Vita inerter
Mora est malis, vita bona Vide, patris summoponens Quam sit dispar exitus.

11. Prato demum sacramen-Te vaillere, sed memento
12. Tantum esse sub fragmento Quantum totus tegitur.
Nulla rel fit essentia
Signa tantum fit fractura Qua nec status nec statura Sit forma posito, sit acta 13. Ecce panis angelorum, Pactis eius viatorum
Verum panis
Non mittendus canibus.

14. In figura predictarius Quantum derivatur, quantum Agens Pascual deputatur, Datur manna inatri.

15. Bone pastor, non secus Es, non nostris misereore
To nos pace, to nos tuere
To nos hostem, nec vivere

Laudian Manuscript (Codex Laudianus), so called because presented by archbishop Laud in 1636 to the University of Oxford, now in the Bodleian Library, where it is numbered 385, usually designated as E of the Acts, is a very valuable MS. of the Acts, with the Greek and Latin in uncial letters in parallel columns, the Latin words which are neither Jerome's nor the Vulgate, but close (literal version) always exactly opposite the Greek. It is defective at Acts xxvi, 29-xxvii. 26. It is in size nine inches by seven and a half, and consists of 226 leaves of 23-26 lines. The vellum is rather poor, and the ink faint. There are no stops, and few breathings. It was probably written in the West during the sixth century. Readings were taken from it by Fell (1675) and Mill (1707). Hearne published the text in full: Acta Apostolorum Græco-Latīnae, litera majuscula (Oxon. 1715, 8vo); now very scarce. See Davidson, Interp. Crit. ii, 293; Thesaurus, in Horne's Introd. iv, 187 sq.; Scrivener, Introd. p. 128. See MANUSCRIPT.

Laudemium, a name given to the sum which beirs, on obtaining their inheritance, are to pay to certain parties. It was to be paid for the recognition and establishment (ludatatio) of the claim, and even, occasionally, on coming into possession other than an inheritance, as, for instance, by gift, etc. It subsequently became obligatory only in cases of sale, of inheritance from collaterals, intestate, deaths of decendants, etc. The Roman law states the amount to be paid in the case of a copyhold to be the fifth of the principal ("quinquagesimas para pretii vel restitutionis loci, qui transfertur," cap. 3, Cod. Just. de jure emphyteutico, 66). It subsequently increased to one thirtieth, one Lauds, Hymn of praise (from Latin laus, praise).

In some of the ancient councils the hallajah appointed to be sung after the Gospel is termed Laudas. Also the name of the service which, before the Reformation, followed after the Nocturn, celebrated between 12 and 3 A.M., or in the 3rd watch. Du Cange assigns them this place, but cites a passage from which it would appear they rather belong to matins in the following watch. The Lauds, Du Cange tells us, consisted, in the monastic or pre-reformatory service, of the last three psalms. Durand, however, names five. Lauffter, Jacob, a Swiss Protestant minister and historian, was born at Zofingen July 23, 1688, and studied theology at Halle and Utrecht. In 1718 he became professor of history and eloquence at Berne. He died Feb. 26, 1704. His works are not of special interest to theology, as the name of Jacob, excepting one, De Heudamot Spolia Dei sacratissimae (1717).

Laughter (πρήστoς, γελασμoν), an action usually expressing joy (Gen. xxiv, 6; Ps. xxxvi, 2; Eccles. iii, 4; Luke vi, 21); sometimes mockery (Gen. xviii, 13; Eccles. ii, 2; James iv, 9); and occasionally conscious security (Job v, 22). When used concerning God (as in Ps. cvii, 4; fui, Ps. cvii, 4; and in the next verse) it signifies that he despoils or pays no regard to the person or subject. See ISAAC.

Laughton, George D., an English minister, lived in the latter half of the 18th century. Among his works of importance are his History of Ancient Egypt (Lond. 1774, 4to) — Reply to Chap. XI of Gibbon's Decline and Fall (1780-86). His sermons were published from 1773-90. — Allibone, Dict. of British and American Authors, ii, 1064.

Laugier, Marc Antoine, a French Jesuit, was born at Manos July 25, 1713. He was a priest at Paris until 1757, when he was appointed to the abbey of Ribeauvillé. He died April 7, 1769. For a list of his works on various subjects, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvii, 894.

Launay, Pierre de, lord of La Motte and Vauflezan, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Blois in 1573. After holding a high position in the war department, he resigned in 1613, retaining only the title of secretary and counsellor to the king, and devoted himself exclusively to study. He acquired the mastery over Greek, learned Hebrew from a Jewish teacher, and was for forty years a member of the Consistory of Char-enton. He took part in several provincial synods, and was secretary of the two national synods of Charpenton in 1639 and of Alençon in 1634. He died at Paris June 20, 1665. His works are — Paraphrase et Exposition des Prophetes Daniel (Sedan, 1624); — Paraphrase et champ Exposition du Livre de Salomon vulgairement appelé l'Ecclesiaste (Saint-Maurice, 1624, 8vo); — Paraphrase et Exposition des Proverbes de Salomon et du premier Chapitre du Cantique des Cantiques (Charpenton, 1650, 2 vols., 8vo; 2d ed. 1655, 12mo); — Paraphrase et Exposition de l'Epitre de Saint Paul aux Romains (Saumur, 1647, 8vo); — Paraphrase sur les Épîtres de Saint Paul (Charpenton, 1650, 2 vols., 4to); — Paraphrase et Exposition de l' Apocalypse (Geneva, 1651, 4to); published under the name of the Marquis de la Priori. This last work, on which he advances opinions on the Millennium which were strongly opposed by Amyraut — Examen de la Réplique de M. Amyraut (Charpenton, 1656, 8vo), — Traité de la Sainte Cène du Seigneur, avec l'Exposition de quelques Passages difficiles du Vieux et du Nouveau Testament (Saumur, 1659, 12mo) — Remarks sur le Texte de la Bible, ou Explication des Mots, des Phrases, et des Figures difficiles de la sainte Écriture (Geneva, 1669, 4to), a posthumous and highly esteemed work. See Haag, La France Protestante. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxix, 907.

Launoy, Jean de, a noted French Roman Catholic historian and canonist, was born at Val-de-Sis, near Val- longue, Dec. 21, 1668. He studied at Constance and Paris, where he was received maîtris in June, 1694. In the same year he entered the Church. He was highly esteemed among the learned men of his time. On a journey to Rome he became the intimate friend of Luc Holstenius and Leo Altitiaus. His whole life was devoted to the study of theology at the Sorbonne in Paris; he never left it or ceased to exert himself in his Church by his pen, which he wielded with great power and ability. He died at Paris March 10, 1678. Moret says of him: "The great number of his works, and the manner in which they are written, give ample evidence of his extensive reading and ready ability. But his style is neither ornate nor polished; he uses awkward, obsolete expressions; handles his subjects very peculiarly; and, if he overcomes his adversaries, he also tires his readers by the profusion of his quotations. He could not endure fables nor superstitions, and defended with great firmness the rights of the Church and the French king, which were endangered by the ultramontanes." In a noble spirit of independence, he preferred expulsion from the Sorbonne rather than to indorse the condemnation of Arnald by that body, although he differed from that theologian in his views on grace. He even went so far as to write against the Formulaire of the assembly of the clergy of 1656. He particularly distinguished himself by his acumen in discovering the spuriousness of most of the acts of the saints, as also of a number of ecclesiastical privileges. Dom Bonaventure, of Argonne, writes of him: "He is dangerous alike to be heard or to be read; he has overthrown many points of paradise because were canonized by any ten popes. He looked with suspicion on the whole martymalogy, and examined the claims of the saints one after another, as they do in France about the nobility." His writings are mainly of a historically-critical nature, and in tendency apologetical in behalf of Gallicanism. The most important of them are, Syllabus rationum quibvs causa Durandi de modo conjunctionis concursuum Dei et creature, defenditur (Par. 1636, 8vo) — De mente concisi Tritirmi circa satisfactioem in sacrificio penitentiae (1644), in which he maintains the Council of Trent and the Church are the only church of the Church do not prove that satisfaction must precede absolution — De frequenti Confessione et Excommunicacione usus (1653) — De commentio Lustrari, Mogulenses, Marthe ac Mariniti in prosession Appulio (1660, 8vo) — De auctoritate negativa argumenti (Paris, 1650 and 1662, 8vo), wherein he affirms he had himself seen at Sienna, in 1634, the statue of the popess Joanna placed between those of Leo IV and Benedict III. It produced quite a controversy, and abbot Thiers wrote against it Defenso adversus Joh. de Launoy in qua defensione Lawntii frustra oppositio (Paris, 1644, 8vo) — De recta Novem canonum VI, et prout a Rufiano explicatur, Intelligenti: — De veteri Ciborum Delectu in jejuiis Christianorum: — Judicium de Auctore libri De imitatione Chriami (Paris, 1649, 1650, 1652, 1653, 8vo). Launoy advocates the claim of St. Peter to the keys — Thomas Aquinas, Thomas Aquinas, — De Curia Ecclesiæ pro Missar et paternibus (Paris, 1653, 8vo) — Epistolile (Par. 1646-1673, 8 vols., 8vo; Cambridge, 1682, 1 vol. fol.) — De vero Auctore famuli præcessus que Pelagio Hieronymi, Augustino tribu solt, in which he attempts to prove that the Pelagius is the only author of the profession of faith attributed to Jerome and Augustine — Explicatio Evangeliæ Troedici circa canonem "Omnia utrinque sese" (Par. 1672, 8vo), a highly-esteemed work — Regia in Motusnomion Potestas, del ree sacriulatul principum Christi'orium in

Laura (collection of anchorites cells), a name given by Churchmen to ancient collections of cells, the habita- tions of hermits or monks of the early days of the Church, but incorrectly used as a synonym of monaste- rium, from which it greatly differs, inasmuch as the inmates of the latter were cœnobites, and held intercourse with each other, while those of the former lived apart, in seclusion. The holy tenants of a laura passed in solitude and silence five days in a week; their food was bread, water, and dates; on Saturday and Sunday they received the sacrament, and messed together on feast and a small allowance of wine. Bingham states that when many of the cells of anchorites were placed together in the same wilderness, at some distance from one another, they were all called by one common name, laura, which, as Evagrius informs us (i, 21), differed from a cenobium in this, that a laura was many cells divided from each other, where every monk provided for himself; but a cenobium was but one habitation, where the monks lived in society, and had every thing in common. Epiphanius (Haeres. 69, 1) says Laura, or Labra, was the name of a street or district where a church stood in Alexandria; and it is probable that from this the name was taken to signify a multitude of cells or monasteries. If so, it must have been in a certain district, yet so divided as to make up many separate habitations. The most celebrat- ed lauras were established in the East, especially in Palestine, as the laura of St. Euthymius, St. Saba, the laura of the towers, etc. See Monachiae; Monastery.

Laureate (from the Latin verb laureatus, crowned with the prize) was used of a successful theological candidate, in ancient times, at the Scotch universities.

Laurence, Richard, D.C.L., a distinguished Eng- lish prelate, was born at Bath in 1705; matriculated in the University of Oxford July 14, 1716, as an exhibi- tor of Corpus Christi College; took the degree of B.A. April 10, 1726: that of M.A. July 9, 1726, and those of B. and D.C.L. June 27, 1794. Upon the appointment in 1736 of his brother, Dr. French Laurence, to the regius professorship of civil law, he was made deputy professor at Oxford. In 1743 he preached his second lectures, and the reputation thence acquired secured for him from the archbishop of Canterbury the rectory of Mersham, Kent. In 1814 he was appointed to the chair of regius professor of Hebrew, and to the canonry of Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1822 was elevated to the archi- eapiscopal see of Cashel. He died in Dublin Dec. 29, 1838. His most important works are his translations of certain apocryphal books of the O.T. from the Ethi- opic, accompanied by critical investigations: Ascension Isaac Vultus, opusculum pseudopigraphum, multis abhine subsequi, ut incoluit, et regulas scriptum erat Christos accurate descripsisse perscriptum et cum versio Latina Anglicana publica juris factum (Oxon. 1819, 8vo)—Primi Evangeli Li- bri, qui apud Vulgatum appellatur quartus versio Aethi- opica, nunc prima in medium prolati et Latine Anglicae- nae procliti (Oxon. 1820, 8vo). The translation is fol- lowed by general remarks upon the different versions of this book, its apocryphal character, the creed of its author, and the probable period of its composition [see EMBRAS]—The Book of Enoch the Prophet, an apocryphal production, supposed to have been lost for ages, but discovered at the close of the last century in Abyssinia, now first published from an Ethiopian MS. in the Bodleian Library (Oxford, 1821, 8vo; 3d ed. 1828) [see SCHOE, BOOK OF]—also, Remarks on the systematical Classification of MS. adopted by Griesbach in his Edition of the Greek Testament (Oxf. 1814, 8vo)—Dissertatation on the MSS. of St. Matthew (Oxf. 1833, 8vo).—In this work he wrote, in opposition to Priestley, Law, and their respective follow- ers, discusses the usage of the terms υμεία and κεφαλή and enters into the critical examination of various scriptural narratives.—An Attempt to illustrate those Articles of the Church of England which the Calculists improperly consider as Calculistical (seven sermons preached as Hampton Lectures, Oxford, 1808, 8vo); and several sermons on the doctrine of Atonement (Oxford, 1810, 8vo), Baptismal Regeneration (1815, 8vo), and on Baptism (1836, 8vo). Laurentius, anti-pope, lived about 450–590. He was archdeacon of a Church in Rome, and was opposed to Symmachus, who in 456 was elected successor of Anastasius II., and as anti-pope�� (458, 459).—Caused much disturbance in the city, Festus and Probinus, two of the most influential senators, sided with Laurentius. Both parties finally agreed to submit their difficulty to the decision of Theodoric, king of the Goths, though an Arian. He decided in favor of Symmachus, and Lau- rentius, having swore the Oath of Allegiance to Nocera. But as he subsequently created new disturb- ances, and was, whether justly or unjustly is not known, accused of Eutychianism, he was deposed by the Synodus Palmari, (601), and died an exile. Laurentius, a noted prelate of the early English Church (Anglo-Saxon), flourished in the first half of the 7th century (A.D. 605) as successor of St. Augustine—suggested for the archbishopric by Augustine himself. Under the reign of Eadburg, the successor of Ethelbert, when England was in danger of a return to heathenish practices by Eadburg's marriage of his own mother-in-law, Laurentius shrewdly managed affi- rairs for the benefit of Christianity; he induced the king to renounce his incestuous marriage, and married him to the Christian faith. See Ethelbert, Hist. Early Eng. Church, p. 41 sq.; Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. bk. ii. cent. vii, pt. i, ch. i, § 2, and note (5).

Laurentius, Sr., according to tradition, was a dis- ciple of pope Sixtus II (257–258), who received him among the seven Roman deacons, and afterwards made him archdeacon. When the pope, during the persecution of the Christians by Valerian, was led out to suffer martyrdom, Laurentius wished to accompany him, and to share his fate; but Sixtus prevented him, prophesying to him at the same time that he would be called upon to fulfill his calling, for the glory of Christianity, and that he would follow him within three days. The omen was fulfilled: the Roman governor had heard of treasures belonging to the Christian Church, and wished to obtain possession of them. He desired Laurentius to reveal them to him. Laurentius seemed to consent to comply with the demands of his persecutors; but in the course of the following week, he dressed himself up as a young disciple of Christ returned, accompanied by a crowd of paupers, cripples, and sick, whom he presented to the governor, saying, "These are our treasures." This was regarded as an insult, and in punishment he was placed in arank chair. Laurentius underwent this martyrdom with resignation and cheerfulness. He is said to have been buried in the Via Tiburtina. The pope Leo I said of him that he was as great an honor to Rome as Stephen to Jerusalem, and Augustine that the crown of Laurentius was in the treasury of Rome itself. Under Constantine a church was erected over the place where his remains were supposed to be (St. Laurentii extra muros); another church dedicated to him is St. Laurentius in Damascus. He is commemorated on the 10th of October. The earliest accounts of the martyrdom are to be found in Ambros. De offic. minist., iv., 41; i., 28. The most glowing account of him is Prudentius's Hymn, in Laur. (Prudentius, Periplus.),—Hersog, Real-Enzyklop., viii., 232; Wetzer und Weite, Kirchen-Lex. vii., 965.

Laurentius Valla, a distinguished humanist, was born at Rome in 1415. He was still young when the reaction against scholasticism set in, and took an active part in the conflict. He attacked the authenticity of Constantine the Great's deed of donation in his De falso credito et eminativa Constantiani donatione Declamatio, as also all the other unproved assertions of the theologians. Thus he questioned the origin of the so-called alive in an iron chair. Laurentius underwent this martyrdom with resignation and cheerfulness. He is said to have been buried in the Via Tiburtina. Lavater, Johann Kaspar, a noted Swiss theologian and the most interesting of the philosophers, who became one of the most influential characters of the last century, was born at Zürich Nov. 15, 1741. His father, Henry Lavater, was doctor of medicine and member of the government of Zürich. His mother, whose maiden name was Regina Escher, was a woman of marked character and extraordinary gifts. His childhood was not marked by any great promise of promise as a student, but he had a decided tendency to religion, and a great predilection for singing hymns and reading the Bible. It was while at school in Zürich that he conceived the idea of becoming a minister of the Gospel. He was educated at the Zürich school, and in 1762 was ordained a minister. In consequence of complications in the political affairs of his country, he traveled in company with the celebrated painter Fuseli, and successively visited the universities of Leipsic and Berlin, and of Hamburg. In 1764 he was invited to the theological advice of the celebrated provost Spalveldt. In 1764 he returned to his native place, and occupied himself with the duties of the ministerial office and Biblical studies. He also wrote some poetry, inspired by the poetical productions of Bodmer and Klopstock. In 1765 he married Miss Anna Schinz, the daughter of a highly respectable merchant. As the result of his study of Bodmer and Klopstock, he published in 1767 his Schriften, containing his finest poems, which was followed by his Ausachten in die Gleichheit (1768-78, 3 vols.), the first of a series of works in which he maintained the perpetuity of miracles, the irresistibility of prayer, and the necessity for every person to conceive of God as manifested in Christ crucified and in order to be really alive to himself. The last doctrine was called his Christosomia. In 1769 Lavater was made deceased of the Lavater-church, at Zürich, where the extraordinary effects of his sermons, his blameless life, and benevolent disposition made him the idol of his congregation, while his printed sermons sent forth his fame to distant parts. It was reserved, however, for his last acts to become a source of great sorrow. He was buried in Zürich on March 15, 1788. But his influence lived on, for he was the author of Meuchelmord und Meuchelmörder (Leipzig, 1775-78) to extend his celebrity generally. This work, which has often been reprinted and translated (best by Dr. H. Hunter, London, 1799-98, 5 vols. royal 4to), was the first elaborate attempt to reduce physiognomy to science. Having in early life been acquainted with a large number of eminent men, he had observed corresponding points of resemblance in their minds as well as their features, and from a disposition to generalize he was led to adopt a fixed system, and wrote this work in the form of a treatise. It might promote greatly the welfare of mankind, an effort of which he modestly disdained. He illustrated it with numerous engravings and vignettes, and it is superior in respect of paper and typography to any book previously issued from the German press. Lavater had remarkable powers of observation, and skill in detecting character. He differed from all who had preceded him in this science. In order to form an opinion of the character from the face, he required to see the face at rest—in sleep or in an unconscious state. "The greater part of the physiognomists," he says, "judge only of the passions, or rather of the exterior signs of the soul. . . . I endeavor to penetrate into the heart of the muscles. But these exterior signs are only transient circumstances, which are easily discoverable. It has therefore always been my object to consider the general and fundamental character of the man, from which, according to the state of his exterior circumstances and relations, all his passions arise as from a root." Lavater's "Fragmente" gave rise to considerable discussion, and occasioned general excitement. He was visited at Zürich by throngs of eminent and curious persons, whose character he was to judge by the gestures, the physiognomy; at a glance he recognised Necker, Mirabeau, and Mercier. In 1775 he was elevated to the pastorate of the Orphan-house; in 1778 he was elected second pastor of St. Peter's Church in Zürich, and in 1786 he was called to fill a vacant position of chief pastor, made vacant by the death of his predecessor. When the French Revolution broke out Lavater was a zealous partisan of it, but the execution of Louis XVI made him turn in disgust from the Republican party, and in 1788, when the French took possession of Switzerland, he protested against their ravages in a publication addressed to the Directory, entitled "Words of a free Swiss to a great Nation," which, on account of its high-toned courage, gained the applause of all Europe. This work was addressed, under his own name, to Reueb, a member of the French government at that time, but was printed without his cooperation, and ascribed to a brother, which had also been circulated. At the same time he gave a thrilling discourse from his pulpit from the words, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God," etc. (Rom. xiii. 1-4). This, as may be imagined, proved an instance of the intervention of the Swiss Directory at first resolved upon his banishment. Difficulties were in the way of carrying out this rigid measure, and the decree was changed to suspension from his office. This, too, was prevented by his friends, and finally he received only a gentle expression of disapproval. A few months later, however, while away from home for his health, he was seized and carried prisoner to Basel, on the charge of conspiracy against the French government, but was released, after a confinement of several weeks, for want of evidence. On his return to Zürich he renewed his pastoral labors, and opposed with all his energies the oppressive measures of the French Directory. On the 26th of September, 1799, after the French had taken possession of Zürich, as Lavater was standing near his own house and trying to pacify some disorderly soldiers with money, he received a gun-shot from one of them, which, though it healed for a time, finally proved fatal. The last year of his life was one of great bodily suffering, occasioned by his wound, which he bore with Christian patience, praying for the man who had wounded him. He desired that the culprit should not be arrested, for it was more sorrow to him if he knew that any punishment was done to him, for he certainly knew what he did. He at the same time inscribed some beautiful poetical lines to him. During the intervals of suffering his mental activity continued unabated. He was never idle. When travelling or taking daily exercise, and even at his meals, he always had a pencil and paper, that he might write down any new thought that might suggest itself. He wrote, during this period of his life, several small works or poems. Among them were "Zürich at the Beginning of the Nineteenth Century," also "Last Thoughts of a Departing One on Jesus of Nazareth and Memorial Leaves." The latter he desired to be given after his death, as little legacies, to his friends. Lavater's relation to his flock was always of the most intimate character, as is evidenced by his request, not long before his death, to be afforded a mattress on which to read in every one of his features, he seemed to be reflecting the very glory of heaven." When he was no longer able to sit up and hold his pen, he dictated to an amanuensis...

Lavator at Selby, Yorkshire.

Lavator is an important feature resembling a baptis tery; it is a separate chamber, square or octagonal, standing on one side of the cloister-court, with a reser voir of water or a fountain in the middle, and water troughs around the sides for washing at.—Parker, Glos sury, s. v.

Vulg. Isob. fa. i, a basin to contain the water used by the priests in their ablutions during their sacred minis trations. This was of two sorts in different periods.

1. The original one was fabricated at the divine com mand (Exod. xxx, 18) of brass (copper, סערת, see Bähr, Symbolik, i, 484, 486; Michaelis, Soc. Gott. comend. iv; Umbrecht, in Studien und Kritiken, 1848, p.
157); out of the metal mirrors which the women brought from Egypt (Exod. xxxviii, 8). The notion held by some Jewish writers, and reproduced by Friesius, Bähr (Symb. i, 484), and others, founded on the omission of the word "women," that the brass vessel, being polis ished, served as a mirror to the Levites, is untenable.
(See the parallel passage, 1 Sam. ii, 22, where הָבָה, yuveinu, is inserted; Gesenius gives the prep. 2, p. 172; Keller, der Arch. p. 1, c. 1, § 19; Glassius, Phil. Sacr. i, 580, ed. Dathé; Lightfoot, Descr. Temp. c. 37, 1; Jen Exod. xxxviii; Philo, Vit. Moa, iii, 15; ii, 156, ed. Man gely). Its size and shape are not given, but it is thought that it was circular. It contained water wherewith the priests were to wash their hands and their feet whenever they entered the tabernacle, or came near to the altar to minister (Exod. xl, 32). It stood in the court between the altar and the door of the tabernacle, and, according to Jewish tradition, a little to the south (Exod. xxx, 19, 21; Behold, Ant. Heb. p. 1, ch. iv, 9; Clemens, De Labro Cenovo, iii, 9; ap. Ugozoli Thum. xix).
It rested on a basis (םפ, kem. Sept. βάσις), i. e. a foot, though by some explained to be a cover (Clemens, ibid.
c. iii, 9), of copper or brass, which was likewise made from the same mirrors of the women who assembled at the door of the tabernacle court (Exod. xxxviii, 8).
This "foot," seems, from the distinct mention constantly made of it, to have been something more than a mere stand or support. Probably it formed a lower basin to catch the water which flowed, through taps or other wise, from the laver. The priests could not have washed in the laver itself, as all the water would have been thereby defiled, and so would have had to be renewed for each ablution. The Orientals, in their washings, made use of a vessel with a lose long sponger, and washed the stream which issues from thence, the waste water being received in a basin which is placed underneath. See ABLUTION. It has therefore been suggested that they held their hands and feet under streams that flowed from the laver, and that the "foot" caught the water that fell. As no mention is made of a vessel whereby to wash the parts of the victims offered in sacrifice, it is presumed that the laver served this purpose also. The Jewish commentators state (perhaps referring, however, to the later vessels in the Temple) that any kind of water might be used for the laver, but that the water must be changed every day. They also mention that ablution before entering the tabernacle was in no case dispensed with. A man might be perfectly clean, might be quite free from any ceremonial impurity, and might even have washed his hands and feet before he left home, but still he could by no means enter the tabernacle without previous ablution at the laver. "In the account of the offering by the woman suspected of adultery there is mention made of 'holy water' mixed with dust from the floor of the tabernacle, which the woman was to drink according to certain rites (Num. v, 17)."

Most probably this was water taken from the laver. Perhaps the same 'water of purifying' (Num. viii, 7), which was sprinkled on the Levites on occasion of their consecration to the service of the Lord in the tabernacle. Like the other vessels belonging to the tabernacle, the laver was, together with its "foot," consecrated with oil (Lev. viii, 10, 11). No mention is found in the Hebrew text of the mode of transporting it, but in Num. iv, 14 a passage is added in the Sept., agreeing with the Samaritan Pent. and the Samaritan version, which prescribes the method of packing it, viz., in a purple cloth, protected by a skin covering. See TABERNACLE.

2. In the Temple of Solomon, when the number of both priests and victims had greatly increased, ten lavers were used for the sacrifices, and the molten sea for the personal ablutions of the priests (2 Chron. iv, 6). These lavers were two in number, minute descriptions of each of the tabernacle. Those likewise were of copper ("brass"), raised on bases (וֹבֶּן, from וֹבֵן, to 'stand upright,' Gen. xii, 665, 670, Sept. Greecizes μετακόμης, Vulg. basea) (1 Kings vii, 27, 89), five on the north and south sides respectively of the court of the priests. They were used for washing the animals to be offered in burnt-offerings (2 Chron. iv, 6). Josephus (Ant. viii, 5, 6) gives no distinct account of their form. Azaz mutilated the laver, and removed it from its base (2 Kings xvi, 17). Whether Hezeiah restored the parts cut off is not stated, but in the article of the articles taken by the Chaldeans from the Temple only the bases are mentioned (2 Kings xx, 16; Jer. iii, 17; Josephus omit even these, Ant. x, 8, 5).

"The dimensions of the bases, with the lavers, as given in the Hebrew text, are four cubits in length and breadth, and three in height. The Sept. gives 4 by 4, and 6 in height. Josephus, who appears to have followed a various reading of the Sept., makes them five in length, four in width, and six in height (1 Kings vii, 29; Thessius, ad loc.; Josephus, Ant. viii, 8, 3). There were to each four wheels of one and a half cubit in diameter, with spokes, etc., all cast in one piece. The principal parts requiring explanation may be thus enumerated:

(a) 'Borders' (יוֹבֶּן, Sept. χειλελιπάρα, Vulg. sculpüra), probably panels. Genesius (Theod. 386) supposed these to have been ornamental like square shields, with engraved work.

(b) 'Ledges' (יוֹבֶּנָה, לְדֵּקָה, לְדֵּקֶר), from לְדֵּקָה, 'to cut in notches,' Genesius, p. 1411), joints in corners of bases or fillets covering joints.

(c) 'Additions' (יוֹבֶּנוּ, from יוֹבֶּנָה, 'to twine,' Genesius, p. 746; χεις, lora, whence Thesius suggests λαφος or λαμβ (as the true reading), probably festoons; Lightfoot translates 'margines oblique descendentes.' (d) 'Plates' (יוֹבֶּנָה, προκόχυσα, ares, Genesius, p. 972; Lightfoot, musas arae tetragones), probably axles, cast in the same piece as the wheels. (e) 'Undercutters' (יוֹבֶּנָה, ψαῖν, humeri, Gen. p. 724), either the naves of the wheels, or a sort of handles for moving the whole machine; Lightfoot renders 'columnae fulcientes lavacrum.' (f) 'Naves' (יוֹבֶּנָה, νόμιδοι).

(g) 'Spoke's' (יוֹבֶּנָה, הַדָּרֶד, ἤφαντον, comthi, Gen. p. 256).

(h) 'Chapter' (יוֹבֶּנָה, εἴστατος, summatia, Gen. p. 725), perhaps the rim of the circular opening ('mouth,' 1 Kings vii, 81) in the convex top.

(i) 'Round compass' (יוֹבֶּנָה, בַּצֵּק, Genesius, p. 985, 989, στρόγγυλον κύκλῳ; rotunditas), perhaps the convex roof of the base. To these parts Josephus adds chains, which may perhaps be the festoons above mentioned (Ant. viii, 8, 6).

"Thenius, with whom Keil in the main agrees, both of them differing from Ewald, in a minute examination of the whole passage, but not without some transposition, chiefly of the greater part of ver. 31 to ver. 36, deduces a construction of the bases and lavers, which seems fairly to reconcile the very great difficulties of the subject. Following chiefly his description, we may suppose the base to have been a quadrangular hollow frame, connected at its corners by pilasters (ledges), and moved by four wheels or high castors, one at each corner, with handles (plates) for drawing the machine. The sides of this frame were divided into three vertical panels or compartments (borders), ornamented with base-reliefs of lions, oxen, and cherubim. The top of the base was convex, with a circular opening of one and a half cubit diameter. The top itself was covered with engraved cherubim, lions, and palm-trees or branches. The height of the convex top from the upper part of the base was one and a half cubit, and the space between this top and the lower surface of the laver one and a half cubits more. The laver rested on supports (under-sets) rising from the four corners of the base. Each laver contained 40 'baths' (Gr. χιλιοῦ), or about 300 gal-lons. Its dimensions, therefore, to be in proportion to seven feet (four cubits, ver. 38) in diameter, must have been about thirty inches in depth. The great height of the whole machine was doubtless in order to bring it near the height of the altar (2 Chron. iv. 1; Arias Montanus, De Templo Fabrici, in Cris. Sac. viii, 626; Lightfoot, Deer. Temp. c. xxviii, 3, vol. i, p. 646; Thenius, in Kæry, Exeg. Handb. on 1 Kings vii, and Append. p. 41; Ewald, Geschichte, iii. 318; Keil, Handb. der Bib. Arch. § 24, p. 128, 129)." Mr. Payne, in his work on Solomon's Temple (plate xii, fig. 5), gives the following conjectural view of one of these lavers, which is more compact, less likely to be overturned, and more closely analogous to the form of the great or molten sea.

Form of the "Laver" according to Payne.

Yet in neither of these figures does the "base," with its chest-like form and inconvenient height, seem at all adapted to the above purpose of catching the waste water, or of aiding in any way the ablutions, unless the laver itself were furnished with a spout, and the box below formed a tank with openings on the top for receiving the stream after it had served its ceremonial purpose. The portable form was doubtless for convenience of transportation and emptying.

3. In the second Temple there appears to have been only one laver of brass (Mishna, Middoth, iii. 6), with twelve instead of two stop-cocks, and a machine for raising water and filling it (Mishna, Tumid, iii. 3; compare i. 4, Zoma, iii. 10). Of its size or shape we have no information, but it was probably like those of Solomon's Temple. Josephus, in his description of Herod's Temple (War, v, 5), scarcely alludes to this laver. See H. G. Clemens, De labro aeneo (Utr. 1725; also in Ugo-lini Theur. xix), Lamy, De tabernac. foed. iii, 6, 7, p. 460 sq., and table 16; Vialandius in Ezek. ii, p. 492; L'Empereur in Surenhusius's Vinea, v, 366; Schneitz, Anima. ad lev. an. sq. 297 sq.; Zollig, Ceramion. wagons, p. 50 sq.; Grünstein, in the Stuttgart. Laverty, William W., an American Presbyterian minister, was born in Union County, Pa., June 15, 1828; was educated at Washington College, Pa. (class of 1849), and studied theology in Princeton Theological Seminary. In the fall of 1855 he was ordained and installed pastor of Big Spring and New Cumberland churches, Ohio. In connection with his ministerial duties he also filled the position of principal of Hagerstown Academy. In 1857 he accepted the pastorate of the Wellsville and East Liverpool churches, Ohio, and in the spring of 1864 he was elected principal of Morgantown Church, at Morgantown, West Va., where he died Oct. 28, 1865. Mr. Laverty was especially adapted to the training and instruction of youth, and he always devoted himself with utmost assiduity to whatever he undertook.—Wilson, Paule, Historical Discourse, 1866, p. 167.

Lavallee, Pierre Joseph, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Mauriac, France, in 1830, and received both a collegiate and theological education in the universities of his native city. In 1849 he came to the United States, and was ordained priest the following year. After a year's service in New York City he was made professor of theology in St. Mary's College, Lebanon, Ky., and in 1855 was appointed president of the same institution. In 1859 he declined the proffered bishopric of Savannah, but in 1866 accepted that of Louisville. He died May 11, 1867. Bishop Lavallee was a man of great zeal and energy. He founded several educational and benevolent institutions in his diocese. His character was such as to win him the esteem not only of his own people, but of the citizens generally.—American Annual Cyclop. 428.

Lavenston, George, an English prelate, noted for his antagonism to Wesley and Whitefield, was born in Wiltshire in 1683; became canon of St. Paul's, London, in 1732, and in 1747 was promoted to the bishopric of Exeter. Shortly after his elevation to the episcopal dignity, Lavestone, who had lived from the first not only unfavourably upon the Methodistic movement, found an opportunity to exert his episcopal jurisdiction upon one of the ministers of his diocese, the Rev. Mr. Thompson, "the tolerant and zealous rector of St. Gemini," who had dared to exhort himself in behalf of a more genuine and active religious spirit among the people of his own parish, and the community in its neighborhood. In this instance the bishop failed utterly of cutting short the evangelizing efforts of an earnest and zealous servant of God, and he gave vent to his feelings by a public attack on the originators of the whole movement.—Wesley and Whitefield,—in a pamphlet entitled The Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists compared (London, 1749, 8 parts, 8vo), in which he "exaggerated their real faults, and imputed to them many that were monstrous fictions." The attack was at once taken up by both the persons assailed in the pamphlet, and from the position assumed by Wesley in his answer many of the English Church divines have plucked an arrow in defence of their own Church in Wesley's day. Southey was the first to censure Wesley for the use of intemperate language in his reply to Lavestone, but there is really no good reason for any one, however anxious to shield Mr. Wesley from the odium of defending his harsh treatment of the bishop, when we consider that the provocation was great indeed. Mr. Tyerman, Wesley's latest biographer (London, 1871, 8 vols. 8vo; New York, Harper and Brothers, 3 vols. 8vo, 1872), certainly goes too far when he attempts to clear Wesley's skirts by saying that Lavestone "deserved all he got," and that he was a "baffooning bishop" and "a cowardly calumniator" (ii, 94, 156). But there is no justice in the attacks of modern English writers to praise bishop Lavestone so lavishly at the expense of Mr. Wesley. The bishop made a most unendurable assault on men who were engaged in a work approved and owned of God, and, as his later conduct towards lady Huntingdon and Wesley himself proves, retreated from the position he had taken, apologizing to her ladyship [Huntingdon] and the Messrs. Whitefield in order to avoid the harsh and unjust censures which he was led to pass on them," and even requested them to "accept his unfeigned regret at having unjustly wounded their feelings, and exposed them to the odium of the world!" (Lady Huntingdon's Life, p. 305, ch. viii). How in the face of this position, however hypocritical on the part of Lav- ington, any English writers can afford to defend bishop Lavington's position, as has been done lately in the North British Review (Jan. 1871), seems to us still more

The higher interests of his spiritual kingdom require. Viewed in this light, miracles not only become possible, but even probable for the furtherance of the divine economy of salvation. (See Bushnell, Nature and the Supernatural.) See MIRACLE.

III. Forms of the Divine Law.—The manner in which God governs rational creatures is by a law, as the rule of their obedience to him, and this is what we call the manifest and moral government of the world. At their very creation he placed all intelligences under such a system. Thus he gave a law to angels, which some of them have kept, and have been confirmed in a state of obedience to it; but which others broke, and thereby plunged themselves into destruction and misery. In like manner he also gave a law to Adam, which was written in that covenant, and in which Adam stood as a covenant head to all his posterity (Rom. v.). But our first parents soon violated that law, and fell from a state of innocence to a state of sin and misery (Hos. vi. 7). See FALL.

1. The Law of Nature is the will of God, relating to human actions, grounded in the moral difference of things, and, because discoverable by natural light, obligatory upon all mankind (Rom. i. 20; ii, 14, 15). This law is coeval with the human race, binding all over the globe, and at all times; yet, through the corruption of man, subject to secular reason, it is the judgment which intellectually determines the moral quality of an act, and this always by a comparison with some assumed standard. With those who have a revelation, this, of course, is the test; with others, education, tradition, or caprice. Hence the importance of a trained conscience, not only for the purpose of cultivating its susceptibility to a high degree of sensitiveness and authority, but also in order to correct the judgment and furnish it a just basis of decision. A perverted or misled conscience is scarcely less disastrous than a hard or blind one. History is full of the miseries and mischiefs occasioned by a misguided moral sense.

2. Ceremonial Law is that which prescribes the rites of worship under the Old Testament. These rites were typical of Christ, and were obligatory only till Christ had finished his work, and began to erect his Gospel Church (Heb. vii. 9, 11; x; i; Eph. ii, 16; Col. ii, 14; Gal. v. 2, 3)."
imperfection. We are not under it, however, as a covenant of works (Gal. iii. 13), or as a source of terror (Rom. vii. 1), although we must abide by it, together with the whole perceptive word of God, as the rule of our conduct (Rom. iii. 31; vii.). See LAW OF MOSES.

IV. Scriptural Use of the Law.—The word "law" (תורה, תורָכָה, νόμος) is properly used, in Scripture as elsewhere, to express a definite commandment laid down by any recognised authority. The commandment may be general or (as in Lev. vi. 9, 14, etc., "the law of the burnt-offering," etc.) particular in its bearing, the authority either human or divine. It is extended to present, past, and future, to duties, sanitary or moral, arrangements ("the law of that has been in childhood," or of those that have had the leprosy, Lev. xiv. 2), or even to an architectural design ("the law of the house," Ezek. xxiii, 12): so in Rom. vii. 2, "the law of the husband," his authority over his wife. But when the word is used with the article, and without any words of limitation, it refers to the expressed will of God, and, in nine cases out of ten, to the Mosaic law, or to the Pentateuch, of which it forms the chief portion.

The Hebrew word (derived from the root יָרָה, "point out," and so "to direct and lead") lays more stress on its moral authority, as teaching the truth, and guiding in the right way; the Greek, from νόμος (assign or appoint) on its constraining power, as imposed and enforced by a recognized authority. But in either case it is a commandment proceeding from without, and distinguished from the free action of its subjects, although not necessarily opposed thereto.

The sense of the word, however, extends its scope, and assumes a more abstract character in the writings of the apostle Paul. νόμος, when used by him with the article, still refers in general to the law of Moses; but when used without the article, so as to embrace any manifestation of "law," it includes all powers which act on the will of man by compulsion, or by the pressure of external motives, whether their commands be or be not expressed in definite forms. This is seen in the constant opposition of ἐναντίων συνόμοι ("works done under the command of law," or "works of faith," that is, works done freely by the internal influence of faith. A still more remarkable use of the word is found in Rom. vii. 23, where the power of evil over the will, arising from the corruption of man, is spoken of as a "law of sin," that is, an unnatural tyranny proceeding from an enmity to God. The same word, in a different sense, is used in the term "law" to denote the Christian dispensation in contrast with that of Moses (James i. 25; ii. 12; iv. 11; comp. Rom. x. 4; Heb. vii. 12, 13; also for the law or precepts established by the Gospel (Rom. xiii. 8, 10).

The occasional use of the word "law" (as in Rom. iii. 27, "law of faith," in vii. 23, "law of my mind" [ῥόου κανόν] ; in viii. 2, "law of the spirit of life," and in James i. 25; ii. 12, "a perfect law, the law of liberty") to denote an internal principle of action does not really militate against the general rule. For in each case it will be seen that such principle is spoken of in contrast with some formal law, and the word "law" is consequently applied to it "improperly," in order to mark this opposition, the qualifying words which follow guarding against any danger of misapprehension of its real character.

It should be noticed that the title "the law" is occasionally used loosely to refer to the whole of the Old Testament (as in John x. 34, referring to Psa. lxxxii. 6; in John xv. 25, referring to Psa. xxxvii. 19; and in 1 Cor. xiv. 21, referring to Is. xxviii. 11, 12). This usage is probably due, not only to desire of brevity and to the natural prominence of the Pentateuch, but also to the predominance in the older covenant (when considered separately from the new, for which it was the preparation) of an external and legal character.—Smith, a. v.

It should be noted, however, that νόμος very often stands, even when without the article, for the Mosaic law, the term in that sense being so well known as not to be liable to be misunderstood. See ARTICLE, GREEK.

LAW OF MOSES (תּוֹרָתָה הָגֵרָה) signifies the whole body of Mosaic legislation (1 Kings ii. 6; 2 Kings xxiii. 20; Ezra iii, 2), the law given by Moses, which, in reference to its divine origin, is called הָגֵרָה הָיֵשָׂ, הַלָּוֶת הַיָּהָּוֶת, the law of Jehovah (Psa. xxx. 8; xxxvii. 31; Is. xlv. 24, xxx. 9). In the latter sense it is called, by way of eminence, הָגֵרָה הָיֵשָׂ, THE LAW (Deut. i. 5; iv. 8, 44; xvii. 18, 19, xxxiii, 3, 8). When not so much the substance of legislation, but rather the external writing made in which it is contained is meant, the following terms are employed: "Book of the Law of Moses" (2 Kings xiv. 6; Isa. xxxiii, viii. 31; xxix. 6); "Book of the Law of the Lord," or "Book of the Law of God" (Josh. xxiv. 26). "Judgments," "testimonies," etc., are the various precepts contained in the law. In the present article (which has been carefully compiled from the most recent codifications, compared with the sacred text, and which strenuously maintains the perpetual obligation of the ten commandments), we propose to give a brief analysis of its substance, without digressing into its main principles, and to explain the position which it occupies in the progress of divine revelation. For the history of its delivery, see Moses; EXODUS; for its authenticity, see PENTATEUCH; for its particular ordinances, see each in its alphabetical place.

The law is especially embodied in the last four books of the Pentateuch, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Leviticus, and Exodus. Formerly there was perceptible some arrangement of the various precepts, although they are not brought into a system. In Deuteronomy the law or legislation contained in the three preceding books is repeated with slight modifications. See each of these books.

The Jews assert that, besides the writings law, תּוֹרָתָה הָגֵרָה, νόμος תּוֹרָתָה הָגֵרָה, which may be translated into other languages, and which is contained in the Pentateuch, there was communicated to Moses on Mount Sinai an oral law, לֶטָנָה תּוֹרָתָה הָגֵרָה, νόμοס ἀνθρώπου, which was subsequently written down, together with many rabbinical observations, and is contained in the twelve folio volumes which now constitute the Talmud, and which the Jews assert cannot be, or at least ought not to be, translated. See TALMUD.

The Rabbins divide the whole Mosaic law into 618 precepts, of which 249 are affirmative and 369 negative. The number of the affirmative precepts corresponds to the 248 members of which, according to rabbinical anatomy, the whole human body consists. The number of the negative precepts corresponds to the 865 days of the solar year, which corresponded to the rabbins to spiegei (which has been published in Jewish German at Cracow and in other places), the negative precepts agree in number with the 865 veins which, they say, are found in the human body. Hence their logic concludes that if on each day each member of the human body keeps one affirmative precept and abstains from one thing forbidden, the whole law, and not the Decalogue alone, is kept. The whole law is sometimes called by Jewish writers Therieg, which word is formed from the Hebrew letters that are employed to express the number 618, viz. 400 + 200 = 600, 10 + 8 = 18. Hence 618 = 400 + 200 + 10 + 8 = 618. Hence 618 = 618. Therieg. Women are subject to the negative precepts or prohibitions only, and not to the affirmative precepts or injunctions. This exception arises partly from their nature, and partly from their being subject to the authority of husbands. According to some rabbinical statements women are subject to 100 precepts only, of which 36 are affirmative and 64 negative. The number 618 corresponds also to the number of letters in the Decalogue. Others are inclined to find that there are 620 precepts according to the numerical value of the word תּוֹרָתָה הָגֵרָה, viz. 400 + 200 = 400 + 20 = 2; and others, again, observe that the numerical value of the letter-
The Law with reference to the Past History of the People.—1. It is of the utmost importance, for the proper understanding of the law, to remember its entire dependence on the Abrahamic Covenant, and its adaptation thereto (see Gal. iii. 17-24). That covenant had a twofold character. It contained the "spiritual promise" of the Messiah, which was given to the Jews as representatives of the whole human race, and as guardians of a treasure in which "all families of the earth should be blessed." This would prepare the Jewish nation to be the centre of the unity of all mankind. But it contained also the temporal promises subsidiary to the former, and requisite in order to prepare for the latter. The promises, though which the race of man should be educated and prepared for the coming of the Redeemer. These promises were special, given distinction to the Jews as a nation, and calculated to separate them from other nations of the earth. It follows, then, that there should be a corresponding duality of nature. There would be much in it peculiar to the Jews, local, special, and transitory; but the fundamental principles on which it was based must be universal, because expressing the will of an unchanging God, and springing from relations to him inherent in human nature, and therefore perpetual and universal in their application.

2. The nature of this relation of the law to the promise is clearly pointed out. The belief in God as the Redeemer and the hope of his manifestation as such in the person of the Messiah, involved the belief that the Messiah, which power must be superior to all carnal obstructions, and that there was in man a spiritual element which could rule his life by communion with a Spirit from above. But it involved also the idea of an antagonistic power of evil, from which man was to be redeemed, existing in each individual, and existing also in the world at large. The promise of the one, the law was the declaration of the other. It was "added because of transgressions." In the individual it stood between his better and his worse self, in the world, between the Jewish nation as the witness of the promise, and the heathen races, which groaned under the power of the flesh. It was intended, by the gift of guidance and the presence of motives, to strengthen the weakness of good, while it curbed directly the power of evil. It followed inevitably that, in the individual, it assumed somewhat of a coercive, and, as between Israel and the world, somewhat of an antagonistic and isolating character; and hence that, viewed without reference to the promise (as was the case with the later Jews), it might actually become a hindrance to the true revelation of God, and to the mission for which the nation had been made a "chosen people." 3. Nor is it less essential to note the period of the history at which it was given. It marked and determined the transition of Israel from the condition of a tribe to that of a nation, and its definite assumption of a distinct position and office in the history of the world. It is on a natural metaphor that we have the well-known analogy between the stages of individual life and those of national or universal existence. In Israel the patriarchal time was that of childhood, ruled chiefly through the affections and the power of natural relationship, with rules few, simple, and unsystematic. The national period was that of youth, in which this indirect teaching and influence gives place to definite assertions of right and responsibility, and to a system of distinct commandments, needed to control its vigorous and impulsive action. The fifty days of their wandering alone with God in the silence of the wilderness represent that awakening to the difficulty, the responsibility, and the nobleness of life, which marks the "putting away of childish things." The law is the sign and the seal of such an awakening.

4. Yet, though new in its general conception, it was probably not wholly new in its materials. Neither in his physical nor his spiritual providence does God proceed per salutum. There must necessarily have been, before the law, commandments and revelations of a fragmentary character, under which Israel had hitherto grown up. Indications of such a growth are easily found, both in the moral and spiritual nature, as, for example, in the penalties against murder, adultery, and fornication (Gen. iv. 6; xxxviii, 24), in the existence of the Levirate law (Gen. xxxviii, 8), in the distinction of clean and unclean animals (Gen. viii, 20), and probably in the observance of the Sabbath (Exod. xxvi, 27-29). But whatever about such indications, our knowledge of the existence of Israel as a distinct community in Egypt would necessitate the conclusion that it must have been guided by some laws of its own, growing out of the old patriarchal customs, which had been preserved with Ontario purity, and gradually becoming methodized by the progress of circumstances. Nor would it be possible for the Israelites to be in contact with an elaborate system of ritual and law, such as that which existed in Egypt, without being influenced by its general principles, and, in less degree, by its minor details. As they approached nearer to the condition of a nation they would be more and more likely to modify their patriarchal customs by the adoption from Egypt of laws which were fitted for national existence. This being so, it is hardly conceivable that the Israelite legislation should have embodied none of these earlier materials. It is clear, even to human wisdom, that the only constitution which can be efficient and permanent is one which has grown up slowly, and so been assimilated to the character of a people. It is the peculiar mark of legislative genius to mould by fundamental principles, and animate by a higher inspiration, materials previously existing in a crude state. The necessity for this lies in the nature, not of the legislator, but of the subjects, and the argument, therefore, is but strengthened by the acknowledgment in the teachings of the wisdom of the Gentile nation. So far, therefore, as they were consistent with the objects of the Jewish law, the customs of Palestine and the laws of Egypt would doubtless be traceable in the Mosaic system.

5. In close connection with this, and almost in consequence of its reference to antiquity, we find an accommodation of the law to the temper and circumstances of the Israelites, to which our Lord refers in the case of the divorce (Matt. xix, 7, 8) as necessarily interfering with its absolute perfection. In many cases it rather should be said to guide and modify existing usages than actually to sanction them; and the ignorance of their existence may lead to a conception of its ordinances not only erroneous, but actually the reverse of the truth. Thus the punishment of filial disobedience appears severe (Deut. xxxi, 15, 21); yet when we refer to the extent of parental authority in a patriarchal system, or (as at Rome) in the earlier periods of national existence, it appears more like a limitation of absolute parental authority by an appeal to the judgment of the community. The Levirate law, again, appears (see Mich. Mts. Reht, bks. iii, ch. vi, art. 98) to have existed in a far more jeraphic form in the early Asiatic peoples, and to have been rather limited than favored by Moses. The law of the avenger of blood is a similar instance of merciful limitation and distinction in the exercise of an immemorial usage, probably not without its value and meaning, and certainly too deep-seated to admit of artificial distinction. Nor is it less noticeable that the degree of prominence given to each part of the Mosaic system once a moral, a ceremonial, and a political bearing; and in fact, although in particular cases one or other of these classes predominated, yet the whole principle of the Mosaic institutions is to obliterate any such supposed separation of laws and refer all to first principles, depending on the will of God and the nature of man.
In giving an analysis of the substance of the law, we will probably be better to treat it, as any other system of laws is usually treated, by dividing it into (1) Civil;
(2) Criminal; (3) Judicial and Constitutional; (4) Ec-cleratic; (5) Ceremonial.

I. LAWS CIVIL

1. Of Persons.

(a) Father and Son.
The power of a Father to be held sacred: cursing, or smiting (Exod. xx, 11, 15; Lev. xvi, 9), or stubborn and wilful disobedience to be considered capital crimes. But uncontrolled power of life and death was apparently refused to the father, and vested only in the congregation (Deut. xix, 18-21).

Right of the first-born to a double portion of the inheritance which fell by the death of a son (Exod. xix, 3). For an example of the authority of the first-born, see 1 Sam. x, 29 ("My brother, he hath commanded me to be there").

Inheritance by Daughters to be allowed in default of sons, provided (Numb. xxvi, 6-8; comp. xxvii) that henomists should not alienate their own tribe.

Daughters unmarried to be entirely dependent on their father (Deut. xxii, 15-17).

(b) Husband and Wife.
The power of a Husband to be so great that a wife could never be put to death, or enter independently into any en-agement, as regards God (Numb. xxv, 11); or, if she were divorced, or divorced wife became independent, and did not again fall under her father's power (ver. 9).

Dissolution of marriage allowed, but to be formal and irrevocable (Deut. xxxi, 1-4).

Marriage within certain degrees forbidden (Exod. xviii, etc.).

A Slave Wife, whether bought or captived, not to be actual property, nor to be sold; if ill treated, to be given free (Exod. xi, 1-9; Deut. xxi, 10-14).

Slander against a wife's virginity to be punished by fine, and by a hundred shekels of silver or divorce; on the other hand ante-nuptial unchastity in her to be punished by death (Deut. xxi, 20-21).

The right of a Widow (Leviticus) a formal right to be claimed by the widow, under pain of infamy, with a view to preservation of families (Deut. xxv, 5-10).

Power of Master so far limited that death under actual chastisement was punishable (Exod. xx, 20); and maiming was to give liberty (Exod. i, 26).

The Hebrew Slave to be freed at the sabbatical year, and provided with necessaries (his wife and children to go with him), and a just wage to be paid to his master out of his own formal act he consented to be perpetual slave (Exod. xxi, 1-8; Deut. xv, 12-15). In any case (it would seem) to be the Jubilee (Lev. xxv, 3, 10), and given to the children. (a) to a resident alien, to be always redeemable, at a price proportional to the distance of the jubilee (Lev. xxv, 37).

Foreign Slaves to be held and inherited as property forever (Lev. xxv, 39); and fugitive slaves from foreign nations not to be given up (Deut. xxiii, 13). See SLAV.

(c) Foreigners.

They seem never to have been put to death, or able to prospect themselves, and accordingly protected accordingly and are therefore also as a body so far as regards them as enjoined as a sacred duty (Exod. xxvii, 21; Lev. xix, 33, 34).

2. LAW OF THINGS

(a) Land and Land (and Property).

(1) All Land to be the property of God alone, and its holders to be deemed His tenants (Lev. xxv, 23).

(2) Aliens may hold, and therefore to return to its original owners at the jubilee, and the price of sale to be calculated accordingly; and redemption on equitable terms to be allowed on the principle of grace (Lev. xxv, 26).

A House sold to be redeemable within a year; and, if not redeemed, to pass away altogether (xxv, 39, 40).

But the land of the Levites, or those unvailed villages, to be redeemable at all times, in the same way as land; and the Levitical suburbs to be inalienable (xxv, 31-34).

(3) Land or Houses sanctified, or tithes, or unclean first-lings, to be the property of God, and of being redeemed at six-fifths value (calculated according to the distance from the jubilee year by the priest); if devoted by the owner and unredeemed, it to be held by the Jubilee forever, and given to the priests: if only by a possessor, to return to the owner at the jubilee (Lev. xxv, 16-34).

But this theocratic character of the law depends necessarily on the belief in God as not only the creator and sustainer of the world, but as, by special covenant, the head of the Jewish nation. It is not indeed doubted that he is the king of all the earth, and that all earthly authorities are derived from him; but here again, in the case of the Israelites, the intermediate steps are all but ignored, and the people are at once brought face to face with him as their ruler. It is to be especially noticed that God's claim (so to speak) on their allegiance is based, not on his power or wisdom, but on his especial mercy in being their saviour from Egyptian bondage. Because they were made free by him, therefore they became his servants (comp. Rom. vi. 19-22); and the declaration which stands at the opening of the law is, "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt." (Compare also the reason given for the observance of the Sabbath in Deut. v. 15; and the historical preface of the delivery of the second law [Deut. i. 11]; of the renewal of the covenant by Joshua [Josh. xxiv. 1-18]; and of the rebuke of Samuel at the establishment of the kingdom over the heathen and the sojourner (Lev. xxv. 39-46).)

From this theocratic nature of the law follow important deductions with regard to (a) the view which it takes of political society; (b) the extent of the scope of the law; (c) the people by which it is enforced; and (d) the character which it seeks to impress on the people.

(1) The basis of human society is ordinarily sought, by law or philosophy, either in the rights of the individual, and the partial delegation of them to political authorities; or in the mutual needs of men, and the relations which spring from them; or in the actual existence of power of man over man, whether arising from natural relationship, or from benefits conferred, or from physical or intellectual ascendancy. The maintenance of society is supposed to depend on a "social compact" between governors and subjects; a compact, true as an abstract idea, but untrue if supposed to have been a historical reality. The Mosaic law seeks the basis of its polity, first, in the absolute sovereignty of God; next, in the relationship of each individual to God, and through God to his community. It is clear that such a doctrine, while it contradicts none of the common theories, yet lies beneath them all, and shows why each of them, being only a secondary deduction from an ultimate truth, cannot be in itself sufficient; and, if it claim to be the whole truth, which it does, it shows how that doctrine which is insisted upon and developed in the whole series of prophecy, and which is brought to its perfection only when applied to that universal and spiritual kingdom for which the Mosaic system was a preparation. (2) The law, as proceeding directly from God, and

III. Distinctive Characteristics of the Mosaic Law.—

1. The leading principle of the whole is its theocratic character, its reference (that is) of all action and thoughts of men directly and immediately to the will of God. All law, indeed, must ultimately make this reference. But it is on the foundation of human authority, it must finally trace that authority to God's pointment; if on the rights of the individual and the need of protecting them, it must consider these rights as inherent and sacred, because implanted by the hand of the Creator. But it is characteristic of the Mosaic law, as also of all Biblical history, that it passes over all the intermediate steps, and refers at once to God's commandment as the foundation of all human duty. The key to it is found in the ever-recurring formula, "Ye shall observe all these statutes; I am Jehovah." It follows from this that it is to be regarded not merely as a law, that is, a rule of conduct, based on known truth and acknowledged authority, but also as a revelation of God's nature and his dispensations. In this view of it, more particularly, lies its connection with the rest of the Old Testament, with a law, it is definite and (generally speaking) final; as a revelation, it is the beginning of the great system of prophecy, and indeed bears within itself the marks of gradual development, from the first simple declaration ("I am the Lord thy God") in Exodus, to the full and solemn declaration of his nature and will in Deuteronomy. With this peculiar character of revelation stamped upon it, it naturally ascends from rule to principle, and regards all goodness in man as the shadow of the divine attributes, "Ye shall be holy: for I am the Lord your God am holy." (Lev. xix. 2, etc.; comp. Matt. v. 46.) referred directly to him, is necessarily absolute in its supremacy and unlimited in its scope.

It is supreme over the governors, as being only the delegate of God, and therefore it is incompatible with any despotic authority in them. This is seen in its limitation of the power of the master over the slave, in the restrictions laid on the priesthood, and the ordination of the "manner of the kingdom" (Deut. xxvii, 14-20; comp. 1 Sam. x, 25). By its word, it may bind and side by side with the authority of the heads of tribes ("the princes"), and the subsequent sovereignty of the king, it provides a balance of powers, all of which are regarded as subordinate. The absolute sovereignty of Jehovah was asserted in the earlier part of the book itself, and was more clearly under the kingdom by the spiritual commission of the prophet. By his rebukes of priests, princes, and kings for abuse of their power, he was not only defending religion and morality, but also maintaining the divinely-appointed constitution of Israel.

On the other hand, it is supreme over the governed, recognizing no inherent rights in the individual as pre- vailing against, or limiting the law. It is therefore unlimited in its scope. There is in it no recognition, such as is familiar to us, that there is one class of actions directed against the power of the lawgiver, and another against the acts of the lawgiver; a threat of the judgment of the lawgiver, who could promise or threaten retribution from the providence of God in this life, and submit his predictions to the test of actual experience. The truth seems to be that, in a law which appeals directly to God himself for its authority and its sanction, there cannot be that broad line of demarcation between this life and the next which is drawn for those whose power is limited by the grave. Our Lord has taught us (Matt. xxii, 31-32) that in the very revelation of God, as the "God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob," the promise of immortality and future retribution was implicitly contained. We may apply this declaration even more strongly to a law in which God was revealed as entering into covenant with Israel, and in them drawing mankind directly under his immediate government. His blessings and curses, by the very fact that they came from him, would be felt to be unlimited by time, and the plain and immediate fulfilment which they found in this life would be accepted as an earnest of a deeper, though more mysterious completion in the world to come. But the time for the clear revelation of this truth had not yet come, and the promises of eternal life and its retribution is implied, yet the rewards and penalties of the present life are those which are plainly held out and practically dwelt upon.

(b.) But perhaps the most important consequence of the theocratic nature of the law was the peculiar character of goodness which it is sung of love and peace. Goodness in its relation to man takes the forms of righteousness and love; in its independence of all relation, the form of purity; and in its relation to God, that of piety. Laws which contemplate men chiefly in their worldly relations, enforce by penalty the first two; the Mosaic law, beginning with piety as its first object, enforces most emphatically the purity essential to those who, by their union with God, have recovered the hope of intrinsic goodness, while it views righteousness and love rather as deductions from these than as independent objects. That it neglects these qualities; on the contrary, it is full of precepts which show a high conception and tender care of our relative duties to man (see, for example, Exod. xxi, 7-11, 28-88; xxiii, 1-9; Deut. xxii, 1-4; xxv, 10-22, etc.); but these can hardly be called its distinguishing feature. It is the Moses of Leviticus, referring to the bond of domestic peace (Lev. xix, 16), the contrary, the care for the purity of the people stands... out remarkably, not only in the enforcement of ceremonial "cleanliness," and the multitude of precautions or remedies against any breach of it, but also in the severity of the laws against self-pollution, a severity which distinguishes the Mosaic code before all others, ancient and modern. In its severity these sine, as committees against a man's own self, without reference to their effect on others, and in recognizing purity as having a substantive value and glory, it sets up a standard of individual morality such as, even in Greece and Rome, probably, in no age was even most exceptionally considered, which has ever anywhere been adopted or proposed. It precludes the possibility of attempting to extort from the people contributions beyond their power, and it renders the taxation of each individual proportionate to his possessions; and even this exceedingly mild taxation was apparently left to the conscience of each person. This we infer from there never occurring in the Bible the slightest vestige either of persons having been sued or goods distrained for tithes, and only an indication of curses resting upon the neglect of paying them. Tithes were paid in kind, and, as the laws prescribed, and, nevertheless they were not recovered by law during the period of the tabernacle and of the first Temple. It is only during the period of the second Temple, when a general demoralization had taken place, that tithes were farmed and sold, and levied by violent proceedings, in which refractory persons were thrown in prison for refusal to pay. There was no condemnation or example of such proceeding occurs in the Bible. This seems to indicate that the propriety of paying these lenient and beneficial taxes was generally felt, so much so that there were few, or perhaps no defaults, and that it was considered expedient on the part of the remissness to harass the neglected.

Besides the tithes there was a small poll-tax, amounting to half a shekel for each adult male. This was paid for the maintenance of the sanctuary. In addition to this, the first-fruits and the first-born of men and cattle were devoted to the revenue. The first-born of men and of unclean beasts were to be redeemed by money. To this may be added some fines paid in the shape of sin-offerings, and also the vows and free-will offerings.

3. In addition to these great moral and liturgical ends of the Mosaic institutes, we must not fail to notice their natural results. The whole plan of the Mosaic legislation was to be so distributed that each family should have a freehold, which was intended to remain permanently the inheritance of that family, and which, even if sold, was to return to the state to be distributed over to the whole community. To the whole community there were, strictly speaking, neither citizens, nor a profane or lay nobility, nor lords temporal. We do not overlook the fact that there were persons called heads, elders, princes, deacons, or leaders among the Israelites; that is, persons who by their intelligence, character, wealth, and other circumstances were leading men among them, and from whom even the seventy judges were chosen who assisted Moses in administering justice to the nation. But we have no proof that there was a nobility enjoying prerogatives similar to those which are connected with birth in several countries of Europe, sometimes in spite of mental and moral disqualifications. We do not find that, according to the Mosaic constitution, there were hereditary peers temporal. Even the inhabitants of towns were freeholders, and their exercise of trades seems to have been combined with, or subordinate to, agricultural pursuits. The only nobility was that of the tribe of Levi, and all the lords were lords spiritual, the descendants of Aaron. The priests and Levites were ministers of public worship, that is, ministers of Jehovah the King, and, as such, they were the most eligible, it seems, for the legislative as well as the judicial power was exercised. The poor were mercifully considered, but beggars are never mentioned. Hence it appears that, as, on the one hand, there was no lay nobility, so, on the other, there was no mendicity.
LAW OF MOSES

Owing to the rebellious spirit of the Israelites, the military injunctions of their law were so frequently transgressed that it could not procure for them that degree of prosperity which it was calculated to produce among a nation of faithful observers; but it is evident that the national legislation, if truly observed, was more fitted to promote universal happiness and tranquillity than any other constitution, either ancient or modern.

We close this part of our discussion by a few miscellaneous observations on minor peculiarities of the Mosaic code.

It has been deemed a defect that there were no laws against infanticide; but it may well be observed, as a proof of national prosperity, that there are no historical traces of this crime; and it would certainly have been preposterous to give laws against a crime which did not occur, except in the cases of general or accidental murder. "Thou shalt not kill," was applicable to this species also.

The words of Josephus (Contra Apionem, ii, 24) can only mean that the crime was against the spirit of the Mosaic law. An express verbal prohibition of this kind is not extant.

There occur also no laws and regulations about wills and testamentary dispositions, although there are sufficient historical facts to prove that the next of kin was considered the lawful heir, that primogeniture was deemed the highest importance, and that, if there were no male descendants, females inherited the freehold property.

We have quoted of the Epistle to the Hebrews, that the Jews disposed of property by wills; but it seems that in the time of Moses, and for some period after him, all Israelites died intestate. However, the word אביהם, as used in Matthew, Mark, Acts, Romans, Revelation, etc., and repeatedly in the Hebrews, implies rather a disposition, arrangement, agreement between parties, than a will in the legal acceptance of the term. See Testament.

There are no laws concerning guardians, and none against luxurious living. The inefficiency of sumptuary laws is now generally recognized, although renowned legislators in ancient times and in the Middle Ages displayed on this subject their wisdom, falsely so called.

Neither are there any laws against suicide. Hence we infer that suicide was rare, as we may well suppose in a nation of small freeholders, and that the inefficiency of such laws was understood.

The Mosaic legislation recognizes the human dignity of women and of slaves, and particularly enjoins not to slander the deaf nor mislead the blind.

Moses expressly enjoined not to reap the corners of fields, nor to appropriate the poor, orphans, widows, and strangers, and even of the beast of the field.

The laws of Moses against crimes are severe, but not cruel. The agony of the death of criminals was never artificially protracted, as in some instances was usual in various countries of Europe even in the present century; nor was torture employed in order to compel criminals to confess their crimes, as was usual in ancient times, and till a comparatively recent period. Forty was the maximum number of stripes to be inflicted. This maximum was adopted for the reason expressly stated that the person punished should not become horrible, or, as J. D. Michaelis renders it, "burnt," which expresses the appearance of a person unmercifully beaten. Punishments were inflicted in order specially to express the sacred indignation of the divine Lawgiver against wilful transgression of his commandments, and to satisfy the wrath of human vengeance, or for the sake of frightening other criminals. In some instances the people at large were appealed to in order to inflict summary punishment by stoning the criminal to death. This was, in fact, the most usual mode of execution. Other methods of capital punishment, as burning, were always public, and conducted with the cooperation of the people. Like every human proceeding, this was liable to abuse, but not to so much abuse as our present mode of conducting lawsuits, which, on account of their costliness, often afford but little protection to persons in narrow circumstances. In lawsuits very much was left to the discretion of the judges, his position greatly resembling that of a permanent jury, who had not merely to decide whether a person was guilty, but who frequently had also to award the amount of punishment to be inflicted.

In the Old Testament we do not hear of a learned profession of the law. Lawyers ( νομοκοι) are mentioned only after the decline of the Mosaic institutions had considerably progressed. As, however, certain laws concerning contract and punishment were administered by the priests, these might be called lawyers. They, nevertheless, did not derive their maintenance from the administration of these laws, but were supported by glebe-lands, titles, and portions of the sacrificial offerings.

It is, indeed, very remarkable that, in a nation so entirely governed by law, there were no lawyers forming a distinct profession, and that the νομοκοί of a later age were not so much remarkable for enforcing the spirit of the law as rather for ingeniously evading its injunctions, by leading the attention of the people from its spirit to a more minute literal fulfilment of its letter. See Law

IV. In considering the relation of the law to the future, it is important to be guided by the general principle laid down in Heb. vii, 19, "The law made nothing perfect" (τοῖς ἐκλεισμοις τοῦ νόμου). This principle will be applied in different degrees to its bearing (a) on the after-history of the Jewish commonwealth before the coming of Christ; (b) on the coming of our Lord himself; and (c) on the dispensation of the Gospel.

1. To that after-history the law was, to a great extent, the key; for in ceremonial and criminal law it was complete and final. In civil and constitutional law, it laid down clearly the general principles to be afterwards more fully developed. It was, indeed, often neglected, and even forgotten. Its fundamental assertion of the theocracy was violated by the constant lapses into idolatry, and its provisions for the good of man overwhelmed by the natural course of human selfishness (Jcr. xxxiv, 12-17); till at last, in the reign of Josiah, its very existence was unknown, and its discovery was to the king and the people as a second publication; yet it still formed the standard from which they knowingly departed, and to which the constantly returned, and to it, therefore, all which was peculiar in their national and individual character was due. Its direct influence was probably greatest in the periods before the establishment of the kingdom and after the Babylonian captivity. The last act of Joshua was to bind the Israelites together as a nation and to provide for the occupation of the conquered land (Josh. xxiv, 24-27); and, in the semi-anarchical period of the Judges, the law and the tabernacle were the only centres of anything like national unity. The establishment of the kingdom was due to an impatience of this position, and a desire for a visible and personal centre of authority, much the same in nature as that which plunged them so often into idolatry. The people were warned (1 Sam. xii, 6-25) that it involved great danger of their forgetting and rejecting the main principle of the law—that "Jehovah their God was their king." The truth of this, as it had been soon shown. Even under Solomon, as soon as the monarchy became one of great splendor and power, it assumed a heathenish and polytheistic character, breaking the law both by its dishonor towards God and its forbidden tyranny over man. Indeed, if the law was looked upon as the expression of an abstraction of abstractions, as a means of knowledge of a personal god, it was inevitable that it should be overthrown by the presence of a visible and personal authority.

Therefore it was that from the time of the establishment of the kingdom the people, without any apparent object, were always at war, and the object was to enforce and to perfect the law by bearing testimony to the great truths on which it was built, viz. the truth of God's government over all, kings, priests, and people alike, and the consequent certainty of a righteous retribution. It is plain that at the same time the covenant went far beyond the law as a definite code of institutions. It dwelt rather on its great principles, which were to transcend the special forms in which they were embodied. It frequently contrasted (as in Isa. i, etc.) the external observance of form with the spiritual homage of the heart. It tended therefore, at least ideally, at any rate in its anti-Knesa, according to the contrast drawn by Jeremiah, the law written on the tables of stone should give place to a new covenant, depending on a law written on the heart, and therefore coercive no longer (Jer. xxxi, 31-34). In this it did but carry out the predictions of the law itself (Deut. xxxii, 7-29), and prepare the way for the Prophet who was to come.

Still the law remained as the distinctive standard of the people. In the kingdom of Judah, the very division of the monarchy and consequent diminution of its splendor, and the need of a principle to assert against the superior materialism of the gentes, brought out the law once more in increased honor and influence. In the days of Jehoshaphat we find, for the first time, that it was taken by the Levites in their circuits through the land, and the people were taught by it (2 Chron. xvii, 9). We find it especially spoken of in the oath taken by the king "at his pillar" in the Temple, and made the standard of reference in the reformation of Hezekiah and Josiah (2 Kings xi, 14; xxii, 3; 2 Chron. xxx, 14-31).

Far more was this the case after the captivity. The revival of the existence of Israel was hailed by the new and solemn publication of the law by Ezra, and the institution of the synagoge, through which it became deeply and familiarly known. See Ezra. The loss of the independent monarchy, and the cessation of prophecy, both combined to throw the Jews back upon the law alone as their only distinctive pledge of nationality and sure guide to truth. The more they mingled with the other subject-nations under the Persian and Grecian empires, the more eagerly they clung to it as their distinction and safeguard; and opening the knowledge of it to the heathen by the translation of the Septuagint, they based on it their proverbial eagerness to proselytize. This love for the law, rather than any abstract patriotism, was the strength of the Maccabean struggle against the Syrians (note here the question as to the lawfulness of war on the Sabbath in this war [1 Macc. ii, 33-41]), and the success of that struggle, environing a Levitical polity, as the true reflection of the new spirit, from which the Jews were so entered into the heart of the people that open idolatry became impossible. The certainty and authority of the law's commandments amidst the perplexities of paganism, and the spirituality of its doctrine as contrasted with sensual and caroal idolatries, were the favorite boast of the Jews, and the secret of his influence among the heathen.

The law thus became the moulding influence of the Jewish character; and, instead of being looked upon as subsidiary to the promise, and a means to its fulfilment, it was exalted to supreme importance as at once a means and a pledge of national and individual sanctity.

This feeling laid hold of and satisfied the mass of the people, harmonizing as it did with their ever-increasing spirit of an almost fanatic nationalism, until the destruction of the city. The Pharisees, truly representing the chief strength of the people, systematized this feeling; they gave it fresh food, and assumed a predominant leadership over it by the floating mass of tradition which they gradually accumulated around the law as a nucleus. The popular use of the word "lawless" (ἀραγόν) as a term of contempt (Acts ii, 21; 1 Cor. xiv, 21) for the heathen, and even for the uneducated mass of their followers (John vii, 49), marked and stereotyped their principle.

Against this idolatry of the law (which, when imported into the Christian Church, is described and vehemently denounced by St. Paul) there were two reactions. The first was that of the Sadducees; one which had its basis, according to common tradition, in the idea of a higher love and service of God, independent of the law and its sanctions, but which degenerated into a speculative and abstract and anti-theocratic faith, and which probably had but little hold of the people. The other, that of the Essenes, was an attempt to burst the bonds of the formal law, and assert its ideas in all fullness, freedom, and purity. In its practical form it assumed the character of high and ascetic devotion to God; its speculative guise is seen in the school of Philo, as a tendency not merely to treat the commands and history of the law on a symbolical principle, but actually to allegorize them into mere abstractions. In neither form could it be permanent, because it had no sufficient relation to the needs and realities of human nature, or to the personal subject of all the Jewish promises; but it was still a declaration of the insufficiency of the law in itself, and a preparation for its absorption into a higher principle of unity. Such was the history of Judaism, the end of the age, the apogee of the effect and blessing when used as a means; it became hollow and insufficient when made an end.

2. The relation of the law to the advent of Christ is also laid down clearly by St. Paul. The law was the ἐνδοθήμων τοῦ Ἰσραήλ, the servant (that is) whose business it was to prepare the way for the King, as to the promise for him (Deut. xxi, 7-9; Isa. iv, 24); and Christ was "the end" or object of "the law" (Rom. x, 4). As being subsidiary to the promise, it had accomplished its purpose when the promise was fulfilled. In its national aspect it had existed to guard the faith in the theocracy; the unseen God had been the object. The law, as such, was the means to that faith which had been the difficulty of realizing the invisible presence of God, and of conceiving a communion with the infinite Godhead which should not crush or absorb the finite creature (compare Deut. v, 24-27; Num. xv, 12, 18; Josh. vii, 35-37; xiii, 21, 22; Isa. xiv, 15, 16, 17, etc.). From that had come in earlier times open idolatry, and a half-idolatrous longing for and trust in the kingdom; in after times the substitution of the law for the promise. The difficulty was now to pass away forever, in the incarnation of the Godhead in one truly and visibly man. The guardianship of the law was no longer needed, and the personal presence of the Messiah required no further testimony. Moreover, in the law itself there had always been a tendency of the fundamental idea to burst the formal bonds which confined it. In looking to God as especially their king, the Israelites thought of the patriarchs, and consequently of Abraham and father of the faithful. The law became "the father of all mankind, and destined to revert to them. Yet that element of the law which was local and national, now most prized of all by the Jews, tended to limit this gift to them, and place them in a position antagonistic to the rest of the world. It needed, therefore, to pass away before all men could be brought into a kingdom in which there was to be "neither Jew nor Gentile, barbarian, Scythian, bond, or free."

In its individual, or what is usually called its "moral" aspect, the law bore equally the stamp of transitoriness and insufficiency. It had, as we have seen, declared the authority of truth and goodness over man's will, and taken for granted in man the existence of a spirit which could recognise that authority; but it had done no more. Its presence had therefore detected the existence and the sinfulness of sin, as also alike its truth and man's true nature; but it had also brought out with more vehement and desperate antagonism the power of sin dwelling in man as fallen (Rom. vii, 7-25).

It only showed, therefore, the need of a Saviour from sin, and of an indwelling power which should enable the spirit of man to realize the rule of God. This the law declared in testimony to its own insufficiency, and led men to Christ. Already the prophets, speaking by a living and indwelling spirit, even fresh and powerful, had been passing beyond the dead letter of the law, and indirectly convicting it of insufficiency. But there was need of "the Prophet" which should go before, so far as its doctrine alone dwelt in him, but should have the power to give it to others, and so open the new dispensation already foretold. When he had come, and by the gift of the Spirit implanted in man a free internal power of action tending to God, the restraints of the law, needful to train the childhood of the world, became unnecessary, and even injurious to the free development of its manhood.

The relation of the law to Christ, in its sacrificial and ceremonial aspect, will be more fully considered elsewhere. See SACRIFICE. It is here only necessary to remember that it was essentially an externality, a mere externality of the whole system of sacrifices, upon which alone their virtue depended; and on the imperfect embodiment, in any body of mere men, of the great truth which was represented in the priesthood. By the former declaring the need of atonement, by the latter the possibility of mediation, and yet in itself doing nothing adequately to realize either, the law again led men to him who was at once the only mediator and the true sacrifice.

Thus the law had trained and guided man to the acceptance of the Messiah in his threefold character of king, prophet, and priest; and so prepared the way for the coming of the Saviour. And when he did come, it became, in the minds of those who trusted in it, not only an encumbrance, but a snare. To resist its claim to allegiance was therefore a matter of life and death in the days of St. Paul, and, in a less degree, in after ages of the Church.

It remains to consider how far it has any obligation or existence under the dispensation of the Gospel. As a means of justification or salvation, it ought never to have been regarded, even before Christ: it needs no proof to show that still less can this be so since he has come. But yet the question remains whether it is binding on Christians, even when they do not depend on it for salvation.

It seems clear enough, that its formal coercive authority as a whole ended with the close of the Jewish dispensation. We may indeed distinguish its various elements; yet he who offended "in one point against it was guilty of all" (James ii, 10). It referred throughout to the Jewish covenant, and in many points to the constitution, the customs, and even the local circumstances of the people. That covenant was preparatory to the Christian, in which it is now absorbed; those customs and local features have passed away. It followed, by the very nature of the case, that the former obligation to the law as such must have ceased with the basis on which it is grounded. This conclusion is stamped most unequivocally with the authority of St. Paul through the whole range of his letters, and more especially in Galatians and Romans. That we are "not under law" (Rom. vi, 14, 15; Gal. v, 18); "that we are dead to law" (Rom. vii, 4-6; Gal. ii, 19), "redeemed from under law" (Gal. iv, 5), etc., is not only stated without any limitation or exception, but in many places is made the prominent feature of the contrast between the early and later conditions. It is impossible, therefore, to avoid the conclusion that the formal code, promulgated by Moses, and sealed with the promise of the blessing and the curse, cannot, as a law, be binding on the Christian.

But what, then, becomes of the declaration of our Lord, that he came "not to destroy the law, but to perfect it," and that "not one jot or one tittle of it shall pass away?" what of the fact, consequent upon it, that the law has been reenforced in all Christian churches, and had an important influence on much Christian legislation? Here, as on other points, the apparent contradiction lies in several considerations.

(1.) The positive obligation of the law, as such, has passed away; but every revelation of God's will, and of the righteousness and love which are its elements, imposes a new and true explanation of the apparent contradic-

(2.) A plain distinction of this kind seems to lie on the face of the subject, as to the main question at issue. The ceremonial or ritual department of the Mosaic laws, which stood in meats, and drinks, and carnal ordinances (Heb. xi, 10); which were of a typical character, and a mere shadow of good things to come, was abolished by the introduction of the Gospel, for then they ceased to have any pertinence, the reality having come of which they were the figures. But the kernel of the law, properly speaking, the moral law, which is a transcript of the divine mind, has been reenforced in the Gospel; its obligations and sanctions. It was fulfilled rather than abrogated by the Gospel. It was confirmed by Christ, and explained in its infinite comprehension and spirituality by him and his apostles throughout the New Testament (Matt. v, 17, 18; Luke x, 26-28; Rom. v, 15-18, 9). Hence, its work being done, the law was given in Galatians (Gal. v, 18), the moral law is spoken of as not being the mere rule of life for persons who rely on the grace of God, and who are authorized to expect a salvation not to be purchased by their works, it is so depreciated simply because in that aspect it is regarded as a law according to which new covenant, or spiritual terms (Mark x, 19; Rom. xii, 9). It is true Jesus sums up the spirit of the whole ten commandments in the two of love to God and man (Matt. xxii, 37-40), and St. Paul (Rom. xiii, 10), as well as St. John (1 John iii, 11), substantially do the same. But this is not done with a view to destroy the precise form of the Mosaic commands, much less to abolish them; but rather with a view to re-enforce them by educing their permanent and universal principle of obligation. Christianity has therefore in all ages justly recognised the paramount and unvarying force of the moral law as preeminent on Mount Pisgah.

The only exception to the above remark of the direct renewal of all these commandments by Christ and his apostles is that relating to the Sabbath, which is never quoted among the rest, but is noticeably omitted, and has even been held to be intentionally discarded, by precept, inference, and example, by them. The exception, however, is only apparent, and is due to the peculiar nature of this observance. It really rests upon an earlier than the Mosaic institute, for it dates from the creation, and was therefore appropriately introduced at Sin. (Gen. 2:1-3.) It is justly called, "Remember the Sabbath day." Moreover, the Jews of our Lord's day were in no need of being reminded of this institution; they were slavishly and superstition observant of it. Finally, as the day of its observance was changed by the very first Christians, there would have been an obvious impropriety in their referring to the institution itself under that name. That the obligation to occupy in religious rest one day in seven was scrupulously recognised by them the historical fact of the "Lord's day" abundantly attests. See SATURDAY.

(4.) Indeed, the same remark as to primeval origin and validity applies to the whole Decalogue, although this cannot be so clearly proved in a historical argument as with regard to the Sabbath. Yet it has been shown above (§ 1, No. 4) that these moral enactments at least were not an assumption; indeed, as all must at once admit, they lie at the very foundation of civil law and social organization; and it could easily be shown that the Hebrews had substantially recognised their force for ages. They were therefore, in fact, but republished on Sinai, under new sanctions, and do not require for their authority the support of any special dispensation.

The argument of the apostle Paul, especially in the epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews, invariably is an appeal from the legal bondage of Judaism—not merely, be it observed, the intolerable ceremonial yoke (Acts xix. 10), but still more emphatically the law of "good works," including, of course, especially the moral code (see Rom. ii. 21, 22; vii. 7)—to the antemosaic dispensation, the faith which Abraham had when yet a Gentile (Rom. iv. 10; Gal. iii. 17, 18), and the primitive priesthood of Jesus (Heb. vii). Yet this law of the Ten Commandments from the first, is its one effectual support (comp. John vi. 29); and thus the solution of this question becomes likewise the reconciliation of the doctrine of the law of Moses with that of St. James. See JAMES, ENSIBLE OF.

Law. Edmund, D.D., a noted English prelate, was born in 1658, near Carenton, in Lancashire, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; he was elected fellow upon graduation, and in 1767 was, by the university, presented with the rectory of Graystock, in Cumberland. To this living was added in 1748 the arch-deaconry of Carlisle. These positions he held until 1748, when he returned to Cambridge as master of St. Peter's College. Later he was appointed librarian of the university and professor of casuistry, was made archdeacon of Stafford, was presented with a prebend in the church of Lincoln, and in 1767 with one of the rich prebends in the church of Durham, and in 1768, finally, his position with the bishopric of Carlisle. He died in 1782. While yet a student at Cambridge, Law published two works which show at once the peculiar turn of his own mind, and secured him a place among the best and wisest instructors of their species. The first of these was his translation of Bishop King's Essay on the Eternity of Evil, with copious notes, in which many of the difficult questions in metaphysical science are considered; the second was his Inquiry into the Ideas of Space and Time. In 1748, while a resident of Salkeld, on the pleasant banks of the Eden, a part of the living of Carlisle, which Law was then holding, he began his third work, Considerations on the Theory of Religion, etc. (Camb. 1745, 1749, 1753, 1765, 1780; London, 1774, 1780, 7th ed., Carlisle, 1784, 1784; new edit. by bishop George H. Law, of Chester, with Life of bishop Edmund Law by William Paley, by E. D. C., 1800, 3 vols., and shrewd observations on the Life and Character of Christ (Camb. 1749, 1780; often reprinted with the Considerations), "a work of singular beauty, not to be read by any person without edification and improvement." In 1777 he published an edition of the works of Locke, with a life of the author. Of this English philosopher bishop Law was ever an ardent follower and able interpreter. Indeed, "the peculiar character of Dr. Law's mind appears to have been acquired in a great measure by a devoted study of the writings of that philosopher. From him he seems to have derived that value which is placed on freedom of inquiry, in relation to theology as well as to every other subject. He took a prominent part in the great controversy respecting subscription, and acted accordingly himself. The most striking proof of this is afforded in the later edition of his Considerations, which contains many important alterations. From Locke also he seems to have derived his notions of the proper mode of studying the sacred Scriptures in order to come at their true sense. He was, in short, an eminent master in that school of rational and liberal divines which flourished in England in the last century, and is adorned by the names of Jortin, Blackburne, Powell, Tertullian, Watson, Paley, and many others." See English Cyclopaedia, a. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1065.

Law, Isaac, a minister of the United Presbyterian Church of Massachusetts, Sept. 5, 1815, at Salem, N. York, was educated at Union College (class of 1808), and became shortly after a student of theology at Canounburg, Pa. and was licensed March 26, 1840. In 1842 he was ordained missionary by the East Salem Presbytery, and labored in this capacity until 1847, when he was ordained pastor at Cambridge. He died Jan. 29, 1861. Law was a man of the people, a worker in the vineyard of the Lord. He was not a professor, but a worker in the vineyard; he was a man of the people, and he lived for the people.

Law, Joseph, a Methodist minister, was born in Washington County, N.Y., Oct. 10, 1798; was converted in 1815, and admitted to the New York Conference in 1820, after seven years' service as a local preacher. Although he had not enjoyed the advantages of early education, he soon, by unwarried perseverance, taught himself to read and write. He was a native of the city of New York, and quickly gained distinction among his ministerial brethren and among the people, and he was honored with some of the best appointments in the Conference. He was for many years confined in his labors to the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and New Haven (First and Second Church) and Hartford. In the city of Brooklyn he was instrumental in the building of five large churches. He was supernumerary in 1861, and died June 11, 1863. On his dying bed he frequently requested the sorrowing friends around him to sing; and a little before his spirit departed, they were singing one of his favorite hymns—"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand, etc."—his eye kindled with rapture, and he gave the whispered assurance, "All is well."—Smith, Sacred Memories, p. 243.

Law, Samuel Warren, a Methodist minister, the son of the Rev. Joseph Law (q. v.), was born at Marlborough, Ulster County, N.Y., November 2, 1821, was converted in his fourteenth year, and in 1841 entered the itinerancy. He had many excellences, and was an able and successful minister. His death, which occurred April 24, 1857, was such as his life had promised—calm, confiding, and peaceful.—Smith, Loc. Cit., p. 290.

Law, William, an eminent English nonjuror, divine and able religious writer of the mystic school of the last century, was born at Kingscliffe, Northamptonshire, in 1686, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1712, and became fellow in 1718. Shortly after this he began to preach, but was obliged to quit the ministry, and also to give up his fellowship, on the accession of George I, because of his refusal to take the required oath. He now became tutor to his relative and friend, Edward Gibbon, father of the historian, who speaks of his piety and talents with unusual warmth. Later, two of his friends, Miss Hester Gibbon, sister of his pupil, and Mrs. Hutchinson, daughter of a London barrister, having resolved to retire from the world, and devote themselves to works of charity and a religious life, selected Law for their almoner and instructor. He accepted the position, and the three parties retired to a house at Kingscliffe, where Law died, April 9, 1731. Law's writings are tinged with what is commonly called mysticism, as he became an ardent follower of the noted mystic, Jacob Bohme. His principal work, and, indeed, one of the best books of the kind, is his Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729), a treatise that first awakened the religious sensibilities of Dr. Samuel Johnson, who speaks of it in high terms, and from which the brothers Wesley also derived much advantage. Next to the Serious Call, his most important works are his answer to Mende-ville's Fable of the Bees (published in 1726); republished, with an introduction by the Rev. F. D. Maurice, in 1844), his letters to the heirs of Adam West, printed in 1776, and The Fable of the Bees. Of Love, and The Spirit of Love. A collective edition of his works was published at London in 9 vols. 8vo in 1782. It has fallen to the lot of but few English writers to elicit such general commendation and commendation as has been the fate of William Law. He was the friend of Gibbon, the liberal Macaulay, the pious John Wesley, and the m xbox Sam. Johnson, all were of one mind in their praise of William Law. See Richard Tichge, Life and Writings of William Law (1818, 8vo); Local. Gist. Mag., vol. xlii; Theol. Eclectic, Jan., 1868; Contemporary Review, Oct., 1867; Christian Examiner, 1869, p. 157; Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of British and American Authors, ii, 1065 sq.

Lawson, Andreas, a distinguished American philanthropist, was born at Groton, Mass., Dec. 16, 1792; was elected to Congress in 1824 and 1825 and appointed commissioner to settle the northeast boundary question with Great Britain; United States minister to England in 1849; and died Aug. 18, 1855. Among his numerous and munificent donations was that of $10,000 to Harvard University, to found the scientific school called for his name, which equated the sum of $50,000 towards erecting model lodging-houses.—Thomas, Biog. Dict. p. 1384.

Lawrence, Amos, a distinguished American philanthropist, was born at Groton, Mass., April 22, 1798. He spent a great part of his immense fortune in various charities and donations to public institutions. He died Dec. 9, 1852. His Life and Correspondence was published by his son in 1855.—Thomas, Biog. Dict. p. 1384.

Lawrence, Sir Henry Montgomery, brother of Sir Thomas Lawrence, the "Saviour of India," is noted for his philanthropy and Christian bearing as a soldier in the British army in India. He was born in Cey- lon in 1806, and after entering the army quickly rose to distinction. In 1857, when the Indian mutiny broke out, chief commissioner of Lucknow, and virtually governor of Oude. While in command of the handful of heroic men who defended the women and children in the residence of Lucknow, sir Henry was wounded by the explosion of a shell, and died July 4, 1857. He was the founder of the Lawrence Asylum for the reception of the children of European soldiers in India. A monument to his mem- ory has been placed in St. Paul's Cathedral. See J. W. Kaye, Lives of Indian Officers (London, 1867); Fraser's Magazine, Dec. 1857; North British Review, May, 1860; Butler, Land of the Vedas, p. 919 sq.

Lawrence, St. See Laurensius, St.

Lawrence, St. Regular Canons of, a religious order, said to have been founded by St. Benedict in the 6th century. When St. Lawrence, Bishop of Viterbo, was performed in the 11th century, under the patronage of Odo, count of Savoy. The bishop of Turin in 1066 conferred many gifts upon it, and several popes enriched it with benefactions.

Lawrence, Laurence, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1779; entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1810, and died April 4, 1829. He possessed a strong and generous mind, and deep piety. He was an excellent presiding elder, and preached with distinguished success the word of life.—Minutes of Confer- ence, ii, 58.

Lawyer (royci), relating to the law, as in Tit. iii, 9, "in its general sense, denotes one skilled in the law, as in Tit. iii, 9. When, therefore, one is called a law- yer, this is understood with reference to the laws of the land in which he lived, or to which he belonged. Hence among the Jews a lawyer was one versed in the laws of Moses, which he taught in the schools and synagogues (Matt. xxviii, 55; Luke x, 35). The same person who is called 'a lawyer' (Syl. 28) is in the New Testament (Mark iii, 28) called 'a scribe' (spectator), whence it has been inferred that the functions of the lawyers and the scribes were identical. The individual may have been both a lawyer and a scribe, but it does not thence follow that all lawyers were scribes. Some suppose, however, that the 'scribes' were the public expounders of the law, while the 'lawyers' were the private ex- pounders and teachers of it. But this is a mere conje-
LAWYERS 296 LAY PREACHING
ture, and nothing more is really known than that the ‘lawyers’ were exponents of the law, whether publicly or privately, or both’ (Kitto). Hence the term is equivalent to ‘teacher of the law’ (νομοδιδάσκαλος, Acts v, 56).
‘By the use of the word νομοδιδάσκαλος (in Tit. iii, 9) as a simple adjective, it seems more probable that the title 'scribe' was a legal and official designation, but that the name νομοδιδάσκαλος was properly a mere epithet signifying one ‘learned in the law’ (somewhat like the οἱ ἐκ νομοῦ in Rom. iv, 14)’ and only used as a title in common parlance (comp. the use of it in Tit. iii, 18, 'Zenos the lawyer'). This would account for the comparative unfrequency of the word, and the fact that it is always used in connection with ‘Pharisaee,’ never, as the word 'scribe' so often is, in connection with ‘chief priesta’ and ‘elders’ ('Smith'). See Lillenthal, De νομοδιδάσκαλοι juris utriusque apud Hebraeos (Mal. 1740). Consult SCRIBE.

Lawyers. In the Roman and Spanish churches, pleaders before the courts were not eligible to the cleric office. The rule, however, was not universal, for the Council of Sardica enacted that a lawyer might be ordained a bishop if he passed through the inferior grades of reader, deacon, and presbyter. On the other hand, clergymen were not allowed to act as lawyers, or to plead either their own cause or even an ecclesiastical one. Bribery and extortion were forbidden to lawyers under severe penalties.

Lay, Benjamin, an eccentric philanthropist, was born at Colchester, in England, in 1681, and settled in London in 1700, but became notorious to the people by his abolition principles, came to the United States, and settled at Abington, Pa. He was one of the ear-est and most zealous opponents of slavery in the United States, and the coadjutor of Franklin and Benezet.
He was originally a member of the Society of Friends, but so radically opposed was he to the practice of slaveholding then prevalent among them (e. g. he resolutely refused to partake of any food or wear any clothing which was wholly or in part produced by the labor of slaves) that he was obliged to leave the society in 1717.
Before his death (in 1760), however, he had the pleasure of seeing his society take a decided stand against this abominable abomination. His opposition to slavery was noticeable on every public occasion where he had any opportunity to manifest his disapproval. He always expressed himself in strong terms, and sometimes resorted to writing tracts for expressing sentiments that prevailed great eccentricity. Says Janney (iii, 246): ‘He came into the yearly meeting with a bladder filled with blood in one hand and a sword in the other. He ran the sword through the bladder, and sprinkled the blood on the dresses of the Friends, declaring that so the sword would be abstained in the bosoms of the nation if they did not leave off oppressing the negroes.’ In 1737 he wrote a treatise entitled All Slave-keepers that keep the Innocent in Bondage Apologize, which was published by Franklin. See Janney, Hist. of the Friends, iii, 245. (J. H. W.)

Lay Abbots or Abbacomites. Prior to the period of Charlemagne the court appointed its favorites to the office of abbot; rich abbots were given to the higher secular clergy in commendam, i.e. simply to enjoy its revenues, or else to counts and military chiefs in reward for their services. These lay abbots occupied the monasteries with their families, or with their friends and retainers, sometimes for months, converting them into banqueting halls, or using them for hunting expeditions or for military exercises. The wealthiest abbases the kings either retained for themselves or bestowed on their sons and daughters, their wives and ministers. Charlemagne corrected this abuse: he insisted on strict discipline, and made it a rule that schools should be planted in connection with the various monasteries, and that literary labors should be prosecuted within their walls. See also Abbots.

Layard, Charles Peter, D.D., an English theol-gian, grandfather of Austin Henry Layard, the celebrated traveller, and himself a descendant of an ancient French family, was born about 1748. He was educated at Westminster School and St. John’s College, Cambridge; was then appointed minister of Oxendon Chapel, and librarian to Tennyson’s Library, Westminster; and in 1804 a不必 promotes for his Shrewsbury wills, and to the royal chancellery. He died Apr. 11, 1805. Besides an essay on Charity and Dwelling (1774 and 1776), he published several of his Sermons. Layard was one of the most popular preachers of his day. See Allibone, Lay Baptism. See Baptism. Lay.

Lay Brothers, a name for a class of Roman illiterate persons who in convents devote themselves to the service of the monks. They wear a different habit from the monks, but never enter the choir, nor are present at the chapters. The only vow they make is of obedience and constancy. They were first employed in the 11th century. In the monasteries there are also lay sisters, or sisters converse, who hold a similar relation in the service of the nuns. See Farrar, Eccles. Dict. a. v.

Lay Chancellor. This office is found in the Church at an early period. Bishops were often appealed to in civil causes, especially when both parties agreed to refer any dispute to them; and in this case their sentence was executed by the executioner of the superior civil power. When civil causes began to multiply, the bishops were compelled to devolve some part of this service on others, in whose fidelity and integrity they could repose. Some bishops selected laymen for this purpose, and this office, according to Bingham, probably originated the office of lay chancellor.

Laymann, Paul, a German Jesuit, was born at Innsbruck in 1576, and died of the plague at Constance Nov. 13, 1635. He was distinguished in life for a remarkable knowledge of canonical law, so that he became an oracle in those matters. His Moralphilosophy, published first at Munich (1625, 4to), passed through many editions (one of the best at Mayence, 1723). His work, Justa defenso Simplicitati Romani Pontificis, etc., in causa Monasteriorum et bonorum ecclesiasticorum, etc. (Ley-burg, 1633), was approved by the Benedictine Roman Hay, in Aest ininclusae, and led to an answer by Laymann, entitled Censura Astrologiae, ecclesiastiae, et As-tri ininclusae. After his death appeared his Jus canonici (Dilling, 1643) and Repertorium (Dilling, 1644). See Lay Preaching. In order to form just views of this subject, it is well to consider that primary design of Christianity which contemplates world-wide diffusion. For the accomplishment of that design, preaching is the grand and divinely appointed agency. But the true idea of preaching, as instituted by the Lord Jesus Christ, is not narrow and exclusive. It is comprehensive and manifold. It demands adaptation to all men and all circumstances. Preaching warns, proclaims, invites, teaches. Although made the special work of certain representative disciples, it is, in fact, enjoyed upon the Church as a whole, and upon its members in particular. "As of the spirit which God giveth" (1 Pet. iv, 10, 11). There is no Christian so humble as to be beneath the application of the following and many kindred precepts: "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. ii, 16): "Herein is My Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples" (John xv, 8): "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God" (Luke xii,

8. These declarations of the Saviour have a special significance when viewed in comparison with various other passages which indicate that an important element of preaching consists in bearing witness of things seen, heard, and experienced in reference to Christ and his kingdom (see Luke xxiv, 48; Acts i, 21, 2; ii, 32; iv, 20; xxii, 15).

When considered in the plain light of Christian history as an obligation, the subject of lay preaching becomes relieved from both the difficulties and the technicalities with which it has sometimes been beset by a pretentious eclesiasticalism. None of our Lord's disciples were priests, and yet, from the moment of their call to his discipleship, he proceeded to instruct them in the manner of apostolic preaching. At an early stage of their instruction they were sent out to preach experimentally (see Matt. x, 5-42; Luke ix, 1-6). Not only were the twelve thus sent forth to preach, but “other seventy also.” The number seventy was symbolic both of multiplicity and completeness, and the act of sending out seventy (lay) disciples, “two by two, before his face, into every city and place whither he himself would come,” was in itself significant of our Lord's purpose to employ all his true disciples in spreading the truth and establishing his kingdom upon the earth.

Before the Apostles' time, the Christian Church employed not only the apostles, but its lay members in the preaching of the Word. “At that time (after the death of Stephen) there was a great persecution against the Church which was at Jerusalem, and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles. And so they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the Word” (Acts viii, 1, 4). The same fact is illustrated by the course of Paul, of whom, immediately after his conversion, and long prior to his ordination, it is recorded, “For so straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues” (Acts ix, 20). In this act the regenerated preacher showed that Christian obligations precede ministerial, and that whosoever is born of God not only hath the witness in himself, but is prompted by the Holy Spirit to utter his testimony in the ears and to the hearts of his fellow-men, and the act of sending out seventy (lay) disciples, “two by two, before his face, into every city and place whither he himself would come,” was in itself significant of our Lord's purpose to employ all his true disciples in spreading the truth and establishing his kingdom upon the earth.

But it is unnecessary to dwell upon the lingering evidences of a custom that was destined to be crushed out by increasing perversion of the original spirit of the Gospel. When ritual ceremonies came to supersede not only the very acts, but the very ideas of the Gospels, it is not surprising that preaching itself became a ceremony, and at length a rare and infrequent ceremony. Not merely laymen, but even presbyters of the Church, were inhibited from preaching, except by special permission of bishops; while many of the bishops, who had arrogated to themselves the exclusive right of preaching, either through ignorance or indolence practically abandoned the custom.

“Ther was a time when the bishops of Rome were not known to preach for five hundred years together!—insomuch that, when Pius Quintus was a cardinal, he looked upon it as prodigy, and, indeed, was a greater rarity than the Sacellum Ludh were in old Rome” (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. book ii, ch. iii, § 4). This general abandonment of the great and peculiar work of the Christian ministry had its counterpart of error in monasticism, which, by an equal perversion, sent myriads of the best men in the Church during successive centuries to waste their lives and religious zeal in fruitless prances in desert places and gloomy cloisters. Had the lives and talents which were thus thrown away in monastic idleness been wisely employed in various forms of evangelization, whether by military or by civil means, who can tell how much better the world would have been to-day! In fact, nearly all the real progress made by Christianity during several of the medieval centuries was by exceptional missionary effort among various aboriginal nations of Europe. The general abandonment of preaching had alluded to formed a pretext for the establishment, in the 18th or 14th centuries, of several preaching orders of monks, specially the Franciscans and Dominicans. These monks, in an ecclesiastical point of view, were laymen, and by profession they were also mendicants. Nevertheless, they acquired great influence and great wealth for their several orders. But such results did not relieve the evangelical barrenness of the period, nor render less necessary the great Reformation of the 16th century. In the Reformed churches there was a general breaking away from the trammels of eclesiasticalism, together with an energy of purpose which did not scruple to employ any agencies at its command for the dissemination of truth. Still, under the influence of long-prevailing custom, that great element of Christian power to be derived from the personal activity of devoted laymen was to a large degree suffered to lie dormant and in some cases to disappear. The first formal and greatly effective organization of lay preaching as a system, and as a recognised branch of Church effort, took place under John Wesley at an early period of that great religious movement known as the revival of the 18th century. See Stevens, History of Methodism, l, 178, 174.

Not only was great good accomplished by the Wesleyan lay preachers in England, but by persons of this class Methodism was introduced into America. See EMBURY, PHILIP; STRAWBIDGE, ROBERT; WEBB, Capt. In all parts of the world, wherever Methodism has extended its activities, its lay organization has been a leading feature of its evangelical movements. See EXHORTERS; LOCAL PREACHERS; READERS. During the current century other evangelical churches have adopted analogous measures in various forms, and employed lay leaders under such nomenclature as lay preachers, prayer-leaders, colporteurs, etc. In some churches in which official sanction has not been given to lay preaching—e.g. the national churches of England and Scotland, many earnest Christian laymen, including some noblemen, have gone forth independently, under their personal convictions of duty, preaching wherever they could assemble congregations.

The vast Sunday-school enterprises of modern times are themselves at once a grand result and agency of lay teaching in perfect harmony with the design of the Christian ministry, and powerfully auxiliary to its most effective administration by regularly ordained ministers of the Word. The Christian Associations of the present day are chiefly composed of laymen, and the whole weight of their influence is given to encourage the evangelization of the neglected classes of society by all available means, as lay preaching, or under such auxiliary forms of Christian work. By these numerous and multiplying means of Christian teaching and influence the modern Church is approximating the intense activity of the apostolic Church, and at the same time adapting itself to the moral necessities and special conditions of the present age. In this manner the primary design of Christianity is answered, and great good is accomplished among classes of people that would scarcely be reached by the regular clergy of any of the churches. Nor are the just prerogatives of ordained preaching in any way prejudiced by the co-operative action of pious and judicious laymen. On the other hand, all ministers of a truly apostolic type cannot fail to see that their own success is greatly promoted by their imitation of the apostle to the Gentiles in enlisting and encouraging as extensively as possible all worthy helpers in Christ. See YOUNG MEN’S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS. (D. K.)

Lay Representation. The participation of the laity, by their representatives, in the government of the Church, is one of the fruits of the Protestant Reformation, and of their claim to representation in the ecclesiastical government is found, however, in the nature of the Christian priesthood, and the constitution of the Church itself. Christ having satisfied, by his offering of himself, that sense of need which leads men to seek for mediators, there remains to the Christian community the offering of themselves, as a priestly body, in sacrifice and service to their Redeemer. Towards God, all are spiritually equal, and the Church, therefore, as originally constituted, was without an external priestly caste. "As all believers," says Neander, in his Planting and Extension of the Church, "were conscious of an equal relation to Christ as their Redeemer, and of a common participation of communion with God through him, so on this consciousness an equal relation of believers to one another was grounded, which utterly precluded any relation like that found in other forms of religious subjection between a priestly caste and a people of whom they were mediators and spiritual guides. The apostles themselves were very far from placing themselves in a relation to believers which bore any relation to a mediating priesthood; in this respect they always placed the people in a footing of equality." Yet apostolic churches were by means without a distinct method of government. Following the example of the synagogue, elders very soon appear in the Christian community; and the choosing of deacons by the people, with the approval of the apostles, is one of the earliest facts recorded in the New Testament history of the organizing Church. The charisms, or gifts of the Spirit, included that of government (1 Cor. xii); yet this gift was used, not as of exclusive right, but in co-operation with other gifts for the common welfare. The gift of the spiritual gifts was given to the Christian community of the persons fitted for the exercise of this function. The Gentile churches adopted substantially the form of government in use among their Jewish fellow-Christians; "but their government," says Neander, "by the chosen leaders responsible to the Church in the management of their common concerns, as may be inferred from what we have already remarked respecting the nature of the Christian communion, and is also evident from many individual examples in the apostolic Church. The whole Church at Jerusalem took part in the deliberation respecting the relation of the Jewish and Gentile Christians to each other, and the epistle drawn up after these deliberations was likewise in the name of the whole Church. The epistles of the apostle Paul, which treat of various controverted points, address themselves to churches, and he assumes that the decision belonged to the whole body. Had it been otherwise, he would have addressed his instructions and advice principally, at least, to the overseers of the Church."

In the post-apostolic age, with the growth of the ecclesiastical body, the laity gradually disappeared from participation in the government of the Church. As religion became more external, the minister became more a mediating priest, until finally the churches were represented in the provincial and other councils solely by their bishops. See LITY. The hardening process went on till the fabric of medieval Christianity was complete. The laity were held in a state of pupillage, their capability of self-guidance in matters of faith and practice was denied, and the powers of the Church were wholly absorbed by the hierarchy. This continued till the spirit of liberalism began to assert itself in the Church.

The doctrine of justification by faith alone abolished human mediation between man and God. Luther fully recognized the New Testament idea of the priesthood of all believers, and proclaimed it with all the force of his eloquence. His language on this subject is very explicit; "Every Christian man is a priest in the sight of God, every Christian woman a priestess, whether they be young or old, master or servant, mistress or maid servant, scholar or illiterate. All Christians are, properly speaking, members of the ecclesiastical order, and there is no difference in their consecration except in the offices" (see citations in Hagenbuch, Hist. of Doctrines, ii, 24). By the inculcation of this fundamental principle the laity recovered their position in the Church of Christ, and lay representation again became possible. "The restoration," says Latton, in his work on the Church, "in theory at least, of the laity to their proper place in the Church, was an immediate consequence of the Reformation. By reasserting the two great scriptural doctrines of the universal priesthood of Christians, and of the indwelling of the Spirit, not in a priestly caste, but in the whole body of the faithful, Luther and his contemporaries shook the whole fabric of sacramental usurpation to its base, and recovered for the Christian laity the rights of which they had been deprived. The lay members of the body of Christ emerged from the spiritual imbecility which they had been taught to regard as their natural state, and were restored from the yoke of Christ, but from that of the priest." The right of the laity to representation has ever since remained one of the points of difference between Protestantism and Romanism. The Council of Trent reaffirmed the medieval doctrine in the strongest terms, by its decree of "obedience" to the "priest," "And if any one affirm that all Christians indiscriminately are priests of the New Testament, or that they are mutually endowed with an equal spiritual power, he clearly does nothing but confound the ecclesiastical hierarchy, which is as an army set in array; as if, contrary to the doctrine of the blessed Paul, all were apostles, all prophets, all evangelists, all pastors, all doctors." In the development of Protestantism the lay power was unfortunately absorbed by the state. The State-Church system has hindered the free growth of the Christian community; but wherever Protestantism has had the opportunity of free development its cooperation within a certain district; a synod is a similarly constituted body from a larger district, embracing several presbyteries; and a general assembly consists of an equal delegation of ministers and elders from each presbytery, in a certain fixed proportion. In the General Assembly of the State Church of Scotland, the crown is also represented by a lord high commissioner. The Lutheran Church adheres to the doctrine of the universal priesthood of believers, as taught by Luther: "The ultimate source of power in the congregation, and synods possess such powers as the Constitution has assigned," and to them in the United States most of the synods are connected with a more general body (the General Synod, the General Council, or the Southern General Synod). Among the Friends, or Quakers, the legislative power is exercised by a yearly meeting, almost the whole church within a certain district. In this the proceedings of the quarterly and monthly meetings are reviewed. There are also "district meetings" for the supervision and care of the ministry, which are composed of ministers and elders. The Congregationalists hold the entire independence of each congregation; the neighboring churches, and, when assembled, are composed of a pastor and a delegate from each church invited. They have, however, no authoritative power. In the United States all the congregational bodies (Baptists, Orthodox Congregationalists, Unitarians, and Universalists) hold general conventions, in which the laity are always represented.

The Established Church of England the lay power has been jealously retained and guarded by the crown and Parliament, but the Disestablished Church of Ireland has reorganized with lay representation. In the councils of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States the laity have an important place. In each diocese the "laymen" (the term is not at present understood to mean the bishop, the clergy, and a lay delegate from each church. This is the governing body of the diocese. The legislative authority of the entire Church resides in a general convention, which meets once in three years, and is composed of the bishops and clerical and four clerical and four lay delegates from each diocese, elected by the diocesan convention. The bishops form one house, and the clerical and lay delegates another. The concurrence of both houses is necessary for the passage of any law, and, if asked for, the concurrence of the three orders becomes necessary. Direct representation of the laity is not established among the Wesleyan Methodists of England. There are, however, preparatory committees appointed by the conference, and composed of ministers and laity, who revise the connectional business in advance of the annual assembling of the conference. These committees shape the measures adopted subsequently by the conference, their recommendations being usually concurred in. Direct lay representation has been proposed by the Rev. William Arthur and Mr. Percival Buntings, and the idea of giving the laity of each diocese a voice in the discussion. The Irish Wesleyans are making steady progress towards lay delegation. The minor Wesleyan bodies in England (the Primitive Methodists, New Connexion Methodists, etc.) have adopted lay representation. Lay representation first went into effect in the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1869. It also exists in the Methodist Protestant, the Methodist, the African Methodist, and the African Methodist Episcopal Zion churches.

The history of lay representation in the Methodist Episcopal Church resembles that of the Episcopalian, though it is a unique eventful. Originally and for many years the Church was governed by the travelling ministers, through annual conferences and a delegated general conference. Early in this century symptoms of a desire for a change in the form of government appeared. About 1822 the Wesleyan Repository, a paper printed in Philadelphia, was established in Philadelphia. This was followed by a convention of "reformers" in Baltimore in 1824, who established as their periodical organ in that city The Mutual Rights. The objects of attack were the episcopacy and the clerical government of the Church. In 1827 Dr. Thomas E. Bond issued an appeal to Methodists against lay delegation which exerted a great influence in determining the maintenance of the existing system. At the General Conference of 1828 the subject was discussed in the celebrated "Report on Petitions and Methods," a paper addressed to the petitioners. This report was unanimously adopted. By this time Church proceedings had been instituted against some of the "reform party" in Baltimore, which resulted in expulsion. Others withdrew, and in 1830 the Constitution of the Church was changed to meet the new "Methodist Protestant Church" was formed. The controversy continued, and followed with great bitterness on both sides. Looked at from this distance of time, it is apparent that both parties numbered among their leaders good and strong men, who unfortunately stood on extreme and irreconcilable propositions. The controversy was referred to the General Conference on the ground of the right of the people to share in ecclesiastical legislation; this claim was denied by the conservative side chiefly on the ground that the General Conference possessed "no strictly legislative power."

The discussion rested, after the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church, for more than twenty years. Shortly before the General Conference of 1852, a convention of laymen was held in Philadelphia to take measures for bringing the subject before the Church once more. A new convention, however, disclaimed all connection with the principles of the reform of 1828, and asked for lay representation on the grounds of expediency solely. Dr. Thomas E. Bond, the great antagonist of the "radicals," met the members of the convention in the most friendly spirit, and conceded to them that lay delegates could not be put into the composition of the bishop, the clergy, and a lay delegate from each church. This was an open question. While still denying the claim of right, he went so far as to suggest a plan of lay cooperation in the annual conferences. The petition of the convention to the General Conference was denied. In the General Conference of 1854 an appeal for lay delegation was presented again, but received very little attention. By 1860 such progress had been made that the General Conference, assembled in that year, referred the measure to a popular and ministerial vote, to be taken in 1861 and 1862. Both votes were adverse to lay representation, but the vote, though adverse, developed the fact of a growing favor for this important measure. The Methodist, which was established in 1860, devoted itself to the advocacy of it; other papers, especially the Zion's Herald and the North-Western Advocate, urged it upon the Church. A largely-attended convention of laymen was held in New York in the spring of 1863. At this meeting it was resolved to hold another convention, consequently with the session of the General Conference at Philadelphia, in 1864. The convention was so held, and presented through a deputation of its delegates a bill before the Assembly, although without immediate result. A third convention was held, concurrently with the session of the General Conference at Chicago, in 1868. At this conference a popular and ministerial vote was ordered for a second time. The vote of the lay members, which was large, showed a majority of two to one for lay delegation, and the necessary three fourths of the ministry were secured. At the session of General Conference which assembled in May, 1872, the new order was fully inaugurated, and the lay delegates already elected were admitted to equal powers. The plan thus adopted provides for two lay delegates for every Annual Conference, with separate votes of the lay and clerical members on any question in case one third of either order demands it.
LAYRITZ

Layritz, Johann Georg, a German theologian, was born July 15, 1641, at Hof, in Bavaria. In 1667 he entered the Jesuits, in 1672 he graduated M. A., and became in 1678 professor of Church and profane history at the gymnasium of Baireuth; in 1675, librarian and instructor of the margraves Erdmann, Philipp, and Georg Albrecht; in 1683, dean of the court Church; in 1688, superintendent at Neustadt. In 1686 he accepted the call of the duke Wilhelm Ernst of Weimar, and he then became superintendent in general, counsellor of the consistory, first preacher of the Petri-Paul Church, and director of the gymnasium. He died April 4, 1716. He left numerous productions, e. g. Diss de simplici et complexo (Jena, 1668, 4to);—Auszug der Kirchengeschichte des Neuen Testament (Baireuth and Nuremberg, 1678, 12mo);—Synopsis historiae ecclesiasticae Novi Testament. (Ibid, 1678, 12mo)—Der römische Papat-Thron, d. i. gründliche und ausführliche Beschreibung des päpstlichen Ehr- und Macht- und Wachthaus (Ibid, 1680, 4to).

Layritz, Paul Eugen, a general German theologian and Moravian bishop, was born Nov. 18, 1707, at Wunsiedel, in Bavaria; was educated at the university of Leipsic, where, besides theology, he studied philosophy and mathematics. In 1731 he became subrector, and in 1735 rector of the town-school of Neustadt. Through an early acquaintance with the count Zinzendorf, however, he was in 1749 intrusted with the directorship of the Moravian seminary and grammar-school at Marienborn, and henceforth with different capacities on the affairs of the denomination; in 1749 he was sent by them to England; in 1768 to St. Petersburg, to procure permission for the Moravians to settle in the Russian empire; in 1773 to Labrador, to inquire into the progress of their missions there. In 1775, at the Synod of Har- by, he was appointed a bishop, and intrusted with the supervision of the Moravian communities throughout Silesia. In 1782 he undertook also the supervision of the communities in upper Lusatia, especially that of Herrnhut. He died Aug. 8, 1788. Besides his practical activity, of great importance to his denomination, and his extended knowledge of the Oriental languages, and of those of the modern tongues, his productions have earned him a hearty welcome by his contemporaries, and are by no means useless to us, a few of which are here mentioned: Erste Anfangsgründe der Vernunftlehre (Züllichau, 1748, 4to); 2d ed., ibid., 1748, 8vo; 3d ed., ibid., 1755, 8vo; 4th ed., ibid., 1764, 8vo, dedicated to Leibnitz with the title "Elementa Logicæ, Stuttgart, 1766, 8vo."—Betrachtungen über eine vollständige und christliche Erziehung der Kinder (Barby, 1776, 8vo). Lazarist, or Priest of the Mission, a society of missionary priests in the Roman Catholic Church. It was founded in 1624 by St. Vincent of Paul, who, while living as tutor and chaplain in the house of count Gondi, general of the royal galleys, was induced by the general confession of sick men to give a mission for the people of the demesne of Montauban. The results of the mission so well pleased the count that he offered a sum of money to any religious congregation which would be willing to give a mission in his dominions. Vincent in vain offered this sum to the members of his own order, the Jesuits, and to the Jesuits. Both were so overwhelmed with business that they could not accept the offer. This refusal, and the wish of the family of count Gondi, as well as that of the brother of the count, the archbishop of Paris, induced Vincent to form a special religious body of the missionary priests, who were chiefly to devote themselves to the religious care of the country people and the lower classes. The new institution soon received the royal sanction, and pope Urban VIII made it a special religious body of the clergy of the mission. In 1692 they received the college of St. Lazarus in Paris, whence their usual name Lazarists is derived. Their more spacious establishment and the increase of their income now enabled the congregation-to extend their sphere of action. In addition to the revival of religious among the masses of the people, the church continued, as a key part of the Ministry, the reformation of the clergy by means of conferences, and the establishment of seminaries in accordance with the decree of the Council of Trent. Even during the lifetime of St. Vincent nearly all the dioceses of France had been visited by his disciples; and, besides, also Italy, Cornice, Poland, Ireland, Scotland, Algeria, Tunis, and Madлага- nesia, received the missionaries, who, on the coast of Af- rica, vied with the Order of Mercy in the redemption of slaves. To Poland they were called by the queen, Maria, Louisa, wife of King John Casimir II. They established missionary institutions, under the direction of Lambert, while the plague and famine were raging, in particular in Warsaw. Lambert, and his successor, Ozenne, fell victims to the epidemic, but the mission became very prosperous. The first successors of Vin- cent as superiors general were René Almener (1672), Edmund Jolly (1673), and Nicolas Herron; at the time of the first revolution abbe Cayla de la Garde was the head of the congregation. At this time the congregation had reached its zenith; and as in France no less than forty-nine theological seminaries were conducted by them, it was a great influence in the theological views of the French clergy. During the Revolution, the Lazarists, in common with all the other religious denominations, perished; but they were restored as early as 1804, and even received from the public exchequer a support of 15,000 francs. At Paris a hospital belonging to the public domain was given to them for the establishment of a central institution and a novitiate; they also received several houses in the departments beyond the Alps, and the right to accept legacies. But when Napoleon fell from power, in 1815, and all their houses, except four in the atlas, were cancelled, the direction, and confiscated the property which had been given to them or acquired by them. They were legally restored in 1816; but, though they could not recover their original house, St. Lazare, they acquired another house in the Rue St. Pierre, where they also transferred their seminary. They now resided in their former labors, but remained for some time without a regular superior general. After the death of Cayla de la Garde two vicars general had been appointed, but in 1829 the pope appointed a new superior general (Pierre Dewaillie), as the convocation of a chapter general proceeded. While this appointment was anticipated, the board of the committee of the hospital of St. Lazare, in 1828 vom. bell, Aloys, Statisches Jahrbuch der Kirche, Ratisbon, 1862) the Lazarists had 18 houses in France, 27 in Italy, 4 in the British Isles, 6 in Germany, 3 in the Pyrenean peninsula, 10 in Poland (with 145 members). In Asia they had establishments in Asiatic Turkey, in Persia, in Manilla, and in five provinces of China; in Africa, at Alexandria, in Egypt, at Algiers and Mustapha, in Algeria, and at Adowa, in Abyssinia. In America they had 17 establishments. In all, there were in 1862 about 100 establishments, with 2000 members. See Weitser u. Weite, Kirche der Jesuiten, ii, 798; Febr, Grach der Monarchen, (A. S.)

Lazarus (A. S.), an abridged form of the Heb. name Eleazar, with a Greek termination, which in the Talmud is written ילעזר [see Beneus, De morte Chr. i, 180; comp. Josephus, War, v, 13, 7; Simonius, Onomast. N.T. p. 96; Fuller, Miscell. i, 10; Suicer, Theaur. ii, 205]. It is object of much discussion whether the expression which describes Lazarus in Abraham's bosom has been supposed to contain a latent allusion to the name of Eleizer, whom, before the birth of Ismael and Isaac, Abraham regarded as his heir [see Geiger, in the Jüd. Zeitschr. 1866, p. 196 sq.], the name of two persons in the N. T.

1. An inhabitant of Bethany, brother of Mary and Martha, honored with the friendship of Jesus, by whom he was raised from the dead after he had been four days in the tomb (John i. 17-19). This great miracle is minutely described in John xi (see Ro- mit, Daily Bible Illust. ad loc.). The credit which Christ obtained among the people by this illustrious act, of which the life and presence of Lazarus afforded a standing evidence, induced the Sanhedrim, in plotting against Jesus, to excommunicate the man (John xi, 48); but this was forty years after his restoration to life, and thirty years afterwards. Later legends recount that his bones were discovered A.D. 890 in Cyprus (Suicer, Theaur. ii, 208), which discrepancies with another story that Lazarus, accompanied by Martha and Mary, traveled to Provence, in France, and preached the Gospel in Marseilles (Fabricius, Codex Apocr. N. Test. iii, 475, and Luz et cop., p. 888; Thilo, Apocryph. p. 711; see Lumiñol Dissert. de Lazaroi oppulso in Provinciam, in his Opero, ii, 1).

"The raising of Lazarus from the dead was a work of Christ beyond measure great, and of all the miracles he had hitherto performed was not so doubtfully and so no- dously. "If it can be incontrovertibly shown that Christ performed one such miraculous act as this," says Tho- luck (in his Comment. zum Evang. Joh., 284), "much will thereby be gained to the cause of Christianity. One point so peculiar in its character, if irreparably established, may serve to develop a belief in the entire evangelical record." The sceptical Spinoza was fully conscious of this, as is related by Bayle (Dict. s.v. Spino- za). It is not surprising, therefore, that the enemies of Christianity have used their utmost exertions to destroy the credibility of the narrative. The accounts of Woodworth, and his followers were, however, satisfactorily answered by Larmer and others, and the more recent efforts of the German neologists have been at last and successfully refuted by Oertelius, Langius, and Reinhard, and by H. L. Heubner in a work entitled Miraculorum ab Evangelico eruditionem disputat, Commentatione criticalis (Wittenb. 1807), as well as by others of still more recent date, whose answers, with the objections to which they apply, may be seen in Kruhnb. See also Platt, in Mag. für Dogmat. und Moral. xiv, 91; Schott, Opus. i, 210; Kreik, Lazarus für Gebildete Christenw. (Berlin 1790); and the older monograph of J. B. Volbeding, Index Programmat. p. 49; Hase, Leben Jesu, p. 169. The rationalistic views of Paulus (Krit. Kommentar) and Gabel (Journal f. ausser. Theol. III, 256) have been successfully refuted by Strauss (Leben Jesu), and the theological streams of criticism have been entirely dispossessed by a host of later German writers, and the reality of the story triumphantly established (see especially Neander, Das Leben Jesu Christi; Stier and Olshausen, ed loc.). The last modification of Strauss's theory (Die Heiligen und die Gnosis, p. 78 sqq., Berl. 1863) has been demolished by Heusinger (Zeitschr. f. Prot. exist. u. Kirche, p. 79 sqq., 1860); comp. Späth (Zeitschr. f. wissensch. Theol. p. 359, 1868) and Holzmann (ibid. p. 71 sqq., 1889). The views of Paulus have just been revived in the lively romance of M. E. Renan, entitled Vie de Jesus; and the latter's theory of a pious fraud has been completely demolished by Ehrard, Pressense, and Eliott, in their works on our Lord's life. 2. A beggar named in the parable of Dives (Luke xvi, 20-25). The parable is founded upon the story of a beggar who describes Lazarus in Abraham's bosom has been supposed to contain a latent allusion to the name of Eleizer, whom, before the birth of Ismael and Isaac, Abraham regarded as his heir [see Geiger, in the Jüd. Zeitschr. 1866, p. 196 sq.], the name of two persons in the N. T.
LAZARUS

announced; by others, however, he has been considered a real personage, with which accord the old tradition that even gives the name of the rich man as being De-bruque (see F. Fabri, Evag rat. i, 35 sq.). Some interpreters think he was some well-known mendicant of Jerusalem (see Seb. Schmid, Fiscus, chapelet, p. 876 sq.), and his death is only a metaphor to define his disease, Exeera, Med. cent. ii, dec. ii, No. 2; Bartoloni, Memb. Boll. cént. xxi) with the success that might be expected (S. G. Feige, De morte Luz. [Hal. 1733]).

The history of Lazarus made a deep impression upon the Church, a fact illustrated by the circumstance to which Fleming's 'callia' allusion in London (see West term in law) should have passed into so many languages, losing altogether its signification as a proper name' (On Parables, p. 459, note). Early in the history of the Church Lazarus was regarded as the patron saint of the sick, and es-specially of those suffering from the terrible scourge of leprosy. "Among the orders, half military and half

LEACH. See HORSE-LEACH.

LEACH, JAMES, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Stafford County, Va., July 15, 1791. He was educated in Hampden Sidney College, Va., studied divinity in the Union Theological Seminary, Va., and was licensed by the Winchester Presbytery Oct. 10, 1818. He was a proponentist of the order of Augustine and Calvin.
His oration in addition to his presentation took place soon after his call, Sept. 27, 1819, and in 1824 he was transferred from Berkeley to Hanover by the Presbytery. At the disruption of the Church he took sides with those opposed to the Old-School party, believing the action of the Assembly of 1867 unconstitutional as well as injudicious.
He died Sept. 4, 1866.—Wilson, Presbyterian Historical Almanac, 1869, p. 442.

LEACOX, HAMBLE, a missionary of the Church of England, was born at Cluff's Bay, Barbados, Feb. 14, 1795. His family was descended from a noble English ancestry. Slaves were an element of respectability in Barbados, and in 1820, when he was 25, Leacox received his early education at Codrington College, Barbados. Through Dr. Coleridge, bishop of Barbadoes and Leeward Islands, he became reader in his native parish, and in connection studied with his pastor, Rev. W. M. Hartt, and obtained deacon's orders in January, 1819. He was received to order by the Presbytery of St. John's Church he became very decided in his religious views, and extended the privileges of the Church to all the parish's slaves, at the same time liberating all his own slaves. The hatred and open reproach of the whites even the bishop could not calm. Leacox was transferred to the island of St. Vincent, and then to Ne-via, where he became rural deacon and pastor of St. Paul's Church, Charlestown. He there fought polygamy with success. But soon reverses came—difficulty with the bishop, insurrections of the slaves, and fall of property.
He left for the United States, and settled in Lexington, Ky., in 1835. His confirmation, neglected in his youth, here took place on arrival. He fell into the society of such men as Dr. Coit, Dr. Cooke, Amos Cleaver, and found many friends in Transylvania University. He attained a livelihood by teaching until 1836, when he became pastor of a new congregation, St. Paul's. Difficulty soon arose here also, and led to his removal. His friends scattered to different parts of the Union. Bishop Otey stationed him in Franklin parish, Tenn. Soon after, urged by friends, he preached six months to a new congregation in western Kentucky, at the head of an old parish. He bought a small farm in New Jersey, near the city of New Brunswick, and settled on it in 1840. He now preached in different places—for a few Sundays in and about Bridgeport, Conn.; then he supplied the winter service of the absent pastor of Christ Church, New Brunswick. In 1841 his personal appearance in the West Indies recovered for him some of his property there. He returned to the States, and was appointed to two small stations near his farm. In 1848 he became rector of St. Paul's Church, Perth Amoboy. In 1850 he moved to the West Indies again. By a letter from bishop Doane, bishop Parry's reception was such that he decided to remain, and in 1848 his Perth Amboy congregation accepted his resignation. He revisited the island of Ne-via, and, at the peril of his life, contended against some of the immoral practices prevalent there. In 1852 he preached again for one year in St. Peter's Church, Speightstown, Barbadoes. In 1854 he preached in St. Leonard's Chapel, Bridgetown. On July 13, 1855, he became the first volunteer to the West Indian Church Association of New York, and was consecrated by Africa (recently formed by bishop Parry), sailed for England, visited and prepared there, reached Africa, and landed at Freetown, Sierra Leone, Nov. 10. Aided by the bishop of Sierra Leone and colonel Hill, its governor, he founded at length a station, the Rio Pongas. At Timizim village he gained over one out of the five hostile negro chiefs. An educated black coming with him from Barbadoes, John H. A. Duport, and a converted negro chief, Mr. Wilkinson, aided him greatly; the latter gave him a site for his dwelling and cultivated the wealth which drove him to Freetown as a recruit. Returning, he opened a school for boys, with an attendance which increased to forty. He was aided with money, books, and clothing from England, and his congregations in Perh Amboy, Kentucky, and Tennessee. His territory soon widened, the natives became favorable, and the school increased. Again sickness drove him to his friends in Sierra Leone. Against their advice, and that of the bishop of Barbadoes, he returned to his post. He seemed to recover, and laid plans for future efforts; but died August 20, 1866. As a result of his labors, a large missionary field was opened. His biography is written by Rev. Henry Caswall, D.D. (London, 1867, 12mo), a friend, and English secretary of the society under which he acted.

Lead (πέλατος), aptē' rēth, from its dusty color, in pause Πέλατος, Exod. xv, 10; Numb. xxxii, 22; Job xix, 24; Jer. vii, 29; Ezek. xxxii, 18, 20; xxvii, 12; Zech. v, 7, 8; Sept. πολύς (πολύς), a well-known metal, generally found in veins of rocks, used as a metal in a state of purity, and most commonly in combination with sulphur. Although the metal itself was well known to the ancients and to the Hebrews, yet the early uses of lead in the East seem to have been comparatively few, nor are they now numerous. One may travel far in Western Asia without discovering the trace of this metal in any of the numerous useful applications which it is made to serve in European countries. We are not aware that any native lead has been yet found within the limits of Palestine. But ancient lead mines, in some of which the ore has been exhausted by working, have been discovered by Mr. Burton in the mountains between the Red Sea and the Nile; and lead is also said to exist at a place called Sheff, near Mount Sinai (Kitto, Phys. Hist. Pal. p. 1332). The ancient Egyptians employed lead for a variety of purposes, but chiefly as an alloy with more precious metals. On the breasts of mummies that have been unrolled there is frequently found in soft lead, thin and quite flexible, the figure of a hawk, with extended wings, emblematical of Re, or Phra, the sun. Specimens of lead have also been discovered among the Assyrian ruins (Layard's X. i. and Bab. p. 357); and a bronze lion is said to have been found attached to its stone base by means of this metal (Bonomi, Nineveh, p. 325).

The first scriptural notice of this metal occurs in the triumphal song in which Moses celebrates the overthrow of Pharaoh, whose host is said to have "sunk like lead" in the waters of the Red Sea (Exod. xv, 10). That it was common in Palestine is shown by the expression in Exclus. xxii, 18, where it is said, in apostrophizing Solomon, "Thou didst multiply silver as lead," the writer having in view the hyperbolic description of Solomon's wealth in 1 Kings x, 27: "The king made the silver to be in Jerusalem as stones." It was among the spoils of the Midianites which the children of Israel brought with them to the plains of Moab, after their return from the slaughter of the tribe (Numb. xxxii, 22). The ships of Tarshish supplied the market of Tyre with lead, as with other metals (Ezek. xxvii, 12). Its heaviness, to which allusion is made in Exod. xv, 10, and Exclus. xiii, 14, caused it to be used for weights, which were either in the form of a round flat cake (Zech. v, 7), or a rough unfinished lump or "stone" (ver. 8); stones having in ancient times served the purpose of weights (comp. 1 Kings x, 27). This fact may explain the substitution of "lead" for "stones" in the passage of Ecclesiasticus above quoted; the commonest use of the cheapest metal being present to the mind of the writer. If Gesenius is correct in rendering τὸ κανέκ, by "lead," in Amos vii, 8, 9, we have another instance of the purpose to which this metal was applied in forming the ball or bob of the plumb-line. See PLUMB-LINE. Its use for weighting fishing-lines was known in the time of Homer (II. xxiv, 80). In Acts xxvii, 29, a plummet (Διάνυκ, in the form Διανυκεῖν, to heave the lead) for taking soundings at sea is mentioned, and this was, of course, of lead.

But, in addition to these more obvious uses of this metal, the Hebrews were acquainted with another method of employing it, which indicates some advance in the arts at an early period. Job (xix, 24) utters a wish that his words, "with a pen of lead and lead, were grave in the rock forever." The allusion is supposed to be to the practice of carving inscriptions upon stone, and pouring molten lead into the cavities of the letters, to render them legible, and at the same time preserve them from the action of the air. Frequent references to the use of leaden tablets for inscriptions are found in ancient writers. Pausanias (ix, 81) saw Heriod's Works and Days graven on lead, but almost illegible with age. Public proclamations, according to Pliny (xiii, 21), were written on lead, and the name of Germanicus was carved on leaden tablets (Suetonius, Augustus, vii, 69). This account of the Roman practice (Dio Cassius, lx, 39) relates that the history of the Seven Sleepers was engraved on lead by the cadi. The translator of Rosenmiiller (in Bib. Cath. xxvii, 64) thinks, however, that the poetical force of the scriptural passage has been overlooked by interpreters. "Job seems not to have drawn his thought from any thing he had actually seen executed: he only wishes to express in the strongest possible language the durability due to his words; and accordingly he says, 'May the pen be iron, and the ink of lead, with which they are written on an everlasting rock,' i.e. 'Let them not be written with a pen of inscribed materials.' The above usual explanation seems to be suggested by that of the Septuagint, 'that they were sculpured by an iron pen and lead, or hewn into rocks.' See Πέλατος.

Oxide of lead is employed largely in modern pottery for the formation of glazes, and its presence has been discovered in analyzing the articles of earthen-ware found in Egypt and Nineveh, proving that the ancients were acquainted with its use for the same purpose. The A. V. of Exclus. xxviii, 30 assumes that the usage was known to the Hebrews, though the original is not explicit upon the point. Speaking of the potter's art of finishing off his work, "he applieth himself to lead it over," the rendering of what in the Greek is simply "he giveth his heart to complete the smearing," the material employed for the purpose not being indicated. See PORTRA.
An allusion to this use of lead is to be found in Theognis (Gnom. 1127 sqq., ed. Welcker), and it is mentioned by I'iny (xxxiii, 81) as indispensable to the purification of silver from alloy. Comp. also Mal. iii. 2, 3. See Metal.

By modern artificers lead is used with tin in the composition of the solder; and in the manufacture of metal objects. Thus the ancient Hebrews were acquainted with the use of tin by the use of solder is evidently from the description given by the prophet Isaiah of the processes which accompanied the formation of an image for idolatrous worship. The method by which two pieces of metal were joined together was identical with that employed in modern times; the substances to be united being first clamped before being soldered. No hint is given as to the composition of the solder, but in all probability lead was one of the materials employed, its usage for such a purpose being of great antiquity. The ancient Egyptians used it for fastening stones together in the rough parts of a building. Mr. Napier (Metalurgy of the Bible, p. 130) conjectures that 'the solder used in early times for lead, and termed lead, was the same as is now used—a mixture of lead and tin.' See Solder.

Leade or Leaddley, Jane, an English mystic, foundress of the Philadelphia, was born in the county of Norfolk in 1623. According to her own accounts she was convicted of sin in her sixteenth year by a mysterious voice whispering in her ear, and found peace in the grace of God three years after. Her parents, whose names are not recorded, were opposed to her remaining in her true faith, and, having decided to withdraw from the parochial roof, she removed in 1643 to London to join a brother of hers living there. She had spent a year in the English metropolis, constantly growing in grace and in the knowledge of Christian truth, when a monastic came to her from her parents to return home, which request was at once obeyed. Shortly afterwards she was married to William Leade, a pious, noble-hearted man, with whom she lived happily, blessed with a family of four daughters, until 1670, when William was suddenly removed at the age of forty-nine. From the time of her earliest conversion she had shown signs of a mystical tendency; she found the greatest delight in seeking private communion with God; now the loss of her husband drew her still further away from the world, and she became a confirmed mystic. As early as 1653 Dr. Pordage (q. v.) and his wife, together with Dr. Thomas Bromley (q. v.), had succeeded in gathering a congregation of mystics of the Jacob Böhme (q. v.) type, but the pestilence of 1655 had necessitated separation, and they were just gathering anew at London when they were deprieved of their leader by the death of their husband. She joined them readily, and soon became one of the leading spirits of this new mystical movement, and rose until she finally became the founder of a distinct mystical school known as the Philadelphia (q. v.). As her motive for joining Pordage, she assigned certain secret divine revelations and visions which she claimed to have had in the spring of 1670, and shortly after she actually brought before the society a set of laws which she professed to have received of the Lord. In the same manner as Moses had been instructed with the Ten Commandments (Exod. 24), she received a complete copy, see Zeitschrift f. hist. Theol. 1865, p. 187 sqq.)—A still stronger hold she gained upon the society and upon the people at large by the publication of some of her writings in 1658, when she was enabled to send them forth by the pecuniary aid of a pious lady who believed in Jane Leade's divine mission. Her great object in publishing her writings (consisting of eight large octavo volumes—very scarce at present—like those of Jacob Böhme, though less original, abounding in emblematic and figurative language, and very obscure in style) was evidently spread her peculiarity, and by the means thereof to form a society of all truly regenerated Christians, from all denominations, which should be the visible Church of Christ upon earth, and be thus awaiting the second coming of the Lord, which she claimed to have been in- formed by revelation was near at hand (for 1700). She did not seek to establish the denomination of a distinct organization by the movements of the German Pietists and Chiliasm at this period. In 1690, Kilner, of Moscow, agitated this subject still further by an effort to establish a paternal organization of English Methodists, and in 1698 Mrs. Petersen, in her Anleitung z. Verständigung d. Offenb. and again in 1698 in De geistliche Kämpf (Halle, Svo), called upon the regenerate Christians to separate from the world and to form a new Jerusalem. In 1695, Jane Leade, together with her friends John, Hind, and Nordley, removed to London to carry out these projects in London, and proposed a new society, to consist only of Christians, who, without separating from the different churches to which they belonged, should form a pure and undisturbed Church of true Christians, to be governed only by the Holy Spirit, and who should hasten the second coming of Christ and the beginning of the millennium. So successful was this effort that by 1702 the Philadelphia, as they now called themselves, were able to send missionaries to Germany and Holland with a view to making proselytes; and, although they failed to accomplish their object immediately, the idea which constituted it took ground and spread, especially in Germany. Conrad Brüseke of Offenbach, a disciple of Beverley, Dr. Horch of Marburg, and Dr. Kaiser of Stuttgart, labored to propagate it; the latter was the author of a book on the subject of the history and progress of the sect, and of a pamphlet on the history of Timothaeus Philadelphia, and established a Philadelphian community at Stuttgart. An approximate estimate of the extent of Jane Leade's influence on Germany and Holland may be obtained by a reference to the extensive list of her correspondents in those countries comp. Zeitschrift f. hist. Theol. 1865, p. 222, note 58). Many, without being outwardly members of this and similar societies, were evidently favorable to them. LEADERS' MEETINGS. As an essential part of the Wesleyan system of episcopal superintendency by means of class-leaders, an organized meeting was appointed to be held weekly under the above title. A leaders' meeting is composed of the itinerant ministers of any circuit or station, and all persons residing in the circuit or station. In England, the powers of leaders' meetings have been considerably enlarged since such meetings were instituted by Mr. Wesley. "They have now a veto upon the admittance of members into the society, when appealed to in such cases by any parties concerned; they possess the power of a jury in the trial of accused members: without their consent, no leader or steward can be appointed to office, or removed from it, excepting when the crime proved merits exclusion from membership, in which case the superintendent can at once depose the offender from office, and expel him from the society. Leaders' are charged with the stewardship of the trust attached to the trustees of the chapel in which their meeting is attached, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper cannot be administered in the said chapel; and the fund for the relief of poor and afflicted members of the society is distributed under their direction and management. Regular leaders' meetings have from the beginning been found essential to the pastoral care and spiritual prosperity of our societies, as well as to the orderly transaction of their financial concerns. The ministers are directed attentively to examine, at each meeting, the entries made in the class-books in reference to the attendance of members, in order that prompt and timely measures may be adopted in cases which, on inquiry, shall appear to demand the exercise of discipline, or the interposition of pastoral exhortation and admonition" (G. R. and W. M. of Wesleyan Methodists). In the Methodist Episcopal Church leaders' meetings have no judicial or veto powers as described above. They are held monthly, or at the call of the pastor. Their usual business embraces the following items: a. That the leaders have an opportunity "to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly and will not be reproofed." b. That the pastor may examine the several class-books, and ascertain the Christian walk and character of each member of the Church, and learn what members of the flock especially need his watchcare and counsel. c. To inquire into the religious state of the members of the trial, and ascertain who can be recommended by the leader for admission into full connection, and who should be discontinued. d. To examine the several leaders respecting their "method of leading their classes." e. To recommend to the quarterly conference ministers called to office, or other persons acquainted with the duties of the office. The leaders' meeting also becomes to pastors a convenient and appropriate body of men with whom they can take counsel from time to time respecting many minor matters of Church interest in reference to which advice or co-operation may seem desirable. See Class-Meetings. (D. P. K.) Leaf, a term occurring in the Bible, both in the singular and plural, in three senses. 1. Leaf of a Tree (prop. γλυκεῖς, αλήθη, so called from springing up; Gr. γλυκόν, also γλύκον, όψις, foliage [Ps. civ, 12], or in Chald. the top of a tree [Dan. iv, 11, 18], and τοῖς, τερέμα, a fresh leaf [Ezek. xxvii, 9] "plucked off" [Gen. xii, 11]). The olive-leaf is mentioned in Gen. viii, 11. Fig-leaves formed the first covering of our parents in Eden. The barren fig-tree (Matt. xxii, 19; Mark xi, 12) on the road between Bethany and Jeru- salem "had on it nothing but leaves." The fig-leaf is alluded to by our Lord (Matt. xxiii, 22; Mark xiii, 28): "When his branch is yet tender, and puttheth forth leaves, yet sheweth not that it is a wine- grape." It is mentioned in Isa. v, 8, and vi, 13. Leaves, the organs of perspiration and inhalation in plants, are used symbolically in the Scriptures in a variety of senses; sometimes they are taken as an evidence of grace (Ps. i, 8), while at others they represent the mere outward form of religion without the spirit (Matt. xxii, 18). Their flourishing and their decay, their restoration and their fragility, furnish the symbols of numerous allegories of great force and beauty (Lev. xvi, 36; Isa. i, 30; xxxiv, 4; Jer. viii, 18; Dan. iv, 14, 21; Mark xi, 12, 13; Rev. xi, 9). The bright, fresh color of a leaf of a tree is a symbol of its rich nourishment from a good soil, hence it is the symbol of prosperity (Ps. i, 8; Jer. xvi, 8). A faded leaf, on the contrary, shows the lack of moisture and nourishment, and becomes a fit emblem of adversity and decay (Job xiii, 25; Isa. lxi, 6). Similar figures have prevailed in all ages (see Webster, Symol. Dictionary, s. v.). In Ezekiel's vision of the holy waters, the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom are spoken of under the image of trees growing on a river's bank; there "shall grow all trees for food, whose leaf shall not fade" (Ezek. xxxiv, 12). In this passage it is said that "the fruit of these trees shall be for food, and the leaf thereof for medicine" (margin, for bruises and sores). With this compare John's vision of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. xxi, 2, 12): "In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, ... the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." There is probably here an allusion to some tree whose leaves were used by the Jews as a medicine or ointment; indeed, it is very likely that many plants and leaves were thus made use of by them, as by the old English herbalists. See Tree of Life. 2. Leaf of a Door (πτερόν, a side, in 1 Kings vi, 34 [where the latter clause has, prob. by error, πτέρα, κέρ- μα, a curtain], means the vail of a folding door; so αναπόπτερόν, a door-vail [2 Macc. vii, 13, 14]). As above, hence perhaps a fold of a roll (Jer. xxxvi, 23), like our column of a volume). See Book. League, the plural of a root שד, to contract or covenant; also שׁד, chabad' [Dan. xiii, 23], to join in alliance; פּוּע, karath', to cut, i.e., "make a league," a political confederacy or treaty. That the Hebrews, surrounded on every side by idolatrous nations, might not be seduced to a defection from Jehovah their king, it was necessary that they should be kept from too great an intercourse with these nations by the establishment of various singular rites; but, lest this seclusion from them should be the source of hatred to other nations, Moses constantly taught them that they should love their neighbors, i.e. every one with whom they had intercourse, including foreigners (Exod. xxxi, 21; xxix, 9; Lev. xix, 34; Deut. x, 19; 17, 9; 23, 4; Jer. xxxi, 34). To this end, he showed them that the benefits which God had conferred upon them in preference to other nations were undeserved (Deut. vii, 6; 8; ix, 4-24). But, although the Hebrews individually were debarmed from any close intimacy with idolatrous nations by various rites, yet as a nation they were permitted to form trea-
