ties with Gentile states, with the following exceptions: (1.) The Canaanites, including the Philistines; these nations with the Hebrews were not permitted to enter into any alliance whatever (Exod. xxi., 28; xxxiv. 12-16; Deut. vii. 1-11; xx. 1-19). The Phoenicians, although Canaanites, were not included in this deep hostility, as they dwelt on the northern shore of the country, were shut up within their own limits, and did not occupy the land promised to the patriarchs. (2.) The Amalekites, or Canaanites of Arabia, were also destined to hereditary enmity, unceasing war, and total extermination (Exod. xxi., 18; xxii. 19, 21; Deut. vii. 1-5; 1 Sam. xv. 1, 33; xxvii. 8, 9; xxx. 1, 17, 18). (3.) The Moabites and Ammonites were to be excluded forever from the right of treaty or citizenship with the Hebrews, but were not to be attacked in war, except when provoked by previous hostility (Deut. ii. 9-19; xxxii. 4-6; Judg. iii. 12-20; 1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 2; xii. 36). With the Midianitish nation at large there was no hereditary enmity, but those tribes who had conspired with the Moabites were ultimately crushed in a war of dreadful severity (Num. xxx. 17, 18; xxxi. 1-18). Yet those tribes which did not participate in the hostilities then partook of the evil weal of the Hebrews who were included among the nations with whom alliances might be formed, but in later times they acted in so hostile a manner that no permanent peace could be preserved with them (Judg. vi. 1-40; vii. 1-25; viii. 1-21). No war was enjoined against the Edomites (see Gen. xxv. 24); it was expressly enjoined that, in the tenth generation, they, as well as the Egyptians, might be admitted to citizenship (Num. xx. 14-21; Deut. ii. 4-9). The Edomites also, on their part, conducted themselves peaceably towards the Hebrews till the time of David, when their aggressions caused a war, in which they were overthrown. From that time they cherished a secret hatred against the Hebrews (2 Sam. viii. 13, 14). War had not been determined on against the Amorites on the east of the Jordan; but, as they only refused a free passage, but opposed the Hebrews with arms, they were attacked and beaten, and their country fell into the hands of the Hebrews (Num. xxx. 21-35; Deut. i. 4; ii. 24-37; iii. 1-18; iv. 46-49; Judg. xii. 13-23). Treaties were permitted with all other nations, provided they were such as would tend to the public welfare. David accordingly maintained a friendly national intercourse with the kings of Tyre and Hamath, and Solomon with the kings of Tyre and Egypt, and with the queen of Sheba. Even the Maccabees, those zealots for the law, did not hesitate to enter into compact with the Romans. When the prophets condemn the treaties which they made with the nations, they did so, not because they were contrary to the Mosaic laws, but because they were impolitic and ruinous measures, which betrayed a want of confidence in Jehovah their king. The event always showed in the most striking manner the propriety of their rebukes (2 Kings xvii. 4; xviii. 20, 21; xx. 12, 13; 2 Chron. xxvi. 13-17; xxvii. 21; Isa. vii. 2; xxx. 2-12; xxxi. 1-3; xxxvi. 4-7; xxxix. 1-8; Hos. v. 13; vii. 11; xii. 1; Jer. xxxvii. 5-10). See Alliances.

League of Cambrai is the name of the league entered into (A.D. 1506) between pope Julius II, the emperor Maximilian, and the kings of France and Navarre, to make war, by the aid of both spiritual and temporal arms, against the republic of Venice. See Julius II; Maximilian; Venice.

Le'ah (Heb. לאה, leah, weary; Sept. Asia, Vulg. Lai), the eldest daughter of the Aramean Laban, and sister of Rachel (Gen. xxv. 19). Instead of the latter, she was named for whom he had served seven years. Jacob took her by a decoit of her father, who was unwilling to give his younger daughter in marriage first, contrary to the usages of the East (Gen. xxix. 22 sq.; compare Rosenmuller, Marg, i. 198 sq.). B.C. 1929. She was less beautiful than her younger sister (comp. Josephus, Ant. i. 19, 7), having also weak eyes (טירש רעב יבש, Tare Sh. Reu, Vulg. lpsius oculis, Auth. Ver. "tender-eyed," Gen. xxix. 17; comp. the opposite quality as a recommendation, 1 Sam. xvi. 12), which probably accounts for the Jacob's preference of Leah before Rachel at first and ever afterwards, especially as he was not likely ever to love cordially one whom he did not voluntarily marry (comp. Gen. xxx. 20). See Rachel. Leah bore to Jacob, before her sister had any children, six sons, namely, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah (Gen. xxx. 24 sq.), Issachar, Zebulun (Gen. xxx. 22 sq.); compare xxxv. 23; also one daughter, Dinah (Gen. xxx. 21), besides the two sons borne by her maid Zilpah, and reckoned as hers, namely, Gad and Asher (Gen. xxx. 2), all within the space of seven years, B.C. 1919-1918. See Correspondence; Slavery. "Leah was conscious and resentful (chap. xxx) of the smaller share she possessed in her husband's affections; yet in Jacob's differences with his father-in-law his two wives appear to be attached to him with equal fidelity. In the critical moment when he expected an attack from Esau, his discrimination between the several members of his own family was shown by his placing Rachel and her children hindmost, in the least exposed situation. Leah and her children next, and the two handmaids with their children in the front. Leah probably lived to witness the disastrous fate of her father (chap. xxxv.), so early to be cut off by two of her sons, and the subsequent deaths of Jacob at Bethel, and of Rachel near Bethlehem." Leah appears to have died in Canaan, since she is not mentioned in the migration to Egypt (Gen. xlv. 5), and was buried in the family cemetery at Hebron (Gen. lix. 43).

Leesk, Leemir. FORDHAM, a minister of the Presbyterian (O. S.) Church, was born in Chester, Morris County, N. J., and was educated at Princeton College, class of 1814. After graduation he taught two years, then studied theology at Princeton Seminary, was licensed by the New York Presbytery Oct. 7, 1816, and became pastor of the churches of Oxford and Harmony in 1822. In 1825 he resigned this position, and labored for the missionary interests of the Church. In 1831 he was called to Chartriers Church, at Canonsburg, as successor to Dr. M'Millan, and there he labored until 1860, when he became president of Franklin College at Athens, Ohio. Later he removed to Zelienople, Pa.; thence to Waveland, Ind. He died Dec. 1, 1866.—Wilson, Presbyterian Historical Almanac, 1867, p. 168.

Leaming, JeHEMIAH, D.D., an Episcopalian clergyman, was born at Middletown, Conn., in 1717, graduated at Yale College in 1746, and, after entering the ministry, quickly rose to distinction. He was at one time spoken of for the office of first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America. He died at New Haven, Conn., in 1804. Among his publications are A Defence of Episcopal Government of the Church—Evidences of the Truth of Christianity; etc.—Allibone, Dict. British and American Authors, vol. ii. 9, v.

Leander, Sr., a Spanish prelate, flourished towards the close of the 6th世纪. He died March 13, 601 (according to some, Feb. 27, 596). He was a son of Severianus, governor of Carchage, and brother of Fulgentius, bishop of that city, and of St. Isidore of Seville, who succeeded him as bishop of Seville. He was totally distinguished himself by his zeal against the Arians. Among his converts was Hermengild, eldest son of Leovigil, king of the Goths. Upon the defeat of the former by the latter Leander was sent into exile, but he was recalled in the same year, and converted Recaredes, second of the kings. After the death of Leovigil he assembled at once the third Council of Toledo, and caused Arianism to be solemnly condemned. For his services in making Spain an adherent of the faith of Leaven was specially rewarded by Gregory I. The cathedral of Seville claims to possess his relics, and he is commemorated on the 19th of March. He wrote a number of works, of which there are yet extant De Institutione Virginum et contemptu mundi (to be found in the Codex Regulorum of St. Benedict of Amiens, published by Holsteinus, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xiii.). It is a great pity that the remains of admirers of the great monk's devotion and mysticism, such as the laudes Ecclesiae, etc. (Labbé, Concil. vol. v.), a discourse on the conversion of the Goths, pronounced on the third Council of Toledo. Leander is considered as the originator of the Mozarabic rite completed by St. Isidore. St. Gregory the Great dedicated to Leander his dissertation on Job, which he had undertaken by his advice. Lea-o-o-Tee, emperor of China, and founder of the Lea-o-o dynasty, usurped the throne about A.D. 542. Through devotion to the doctrines of Fo and mysticism, he destroyed the monasteries and monastics of China (priests killed, monks killed), and neglected the care of the empire. He was deposed by one of his officers, Hsiao-King, and died soon after (549).

Lea'n'oth (Heb. le-monoth, לְמֹנָּה, for usanering, i.e. singing; Sept. τὰ ιωάνεια, Vulg. ad respons.,) a musical direction occurring in the title of Ps. cxvii, 4, denoting that it was to be chanted in the manner indicated by the associated terms. See PALMS, BOOK OF.

Learning, skill in any science, or that improvement of the mind which we gain by study, instruction, observation, etc. An attentive examination of ecclesiastical history will lead us to see how greatly learning is indebted to Christianity, and that Christianity, in its turn, has been much strengthened by learning. "All the useful learning which is now to be found in the world is in a great measure owing to the Gospel. The Christians, who had a great veneration for the Old Testament, have contributed more than the Jews themselves to secure and explain the ancient inspired writings. The Christian churchmen, in ancient times, collected and preserved the Greek versions of the Scriptures, particularly the Septuagint, and translated the originals into Latin. To Christians were due the old Hexapla; and in later times Christians have published the Polyglots and the Samaritan Pentateuch. It was the Christians, in the Church, who preserved and transmitted the Christian works of the Latin Church, and the Latin Church, who preserved and transmitted the Christian works of the Latin Church, and the Latin Church, and the Latin Church, who preserved and transmitted the Christian works of the Christian churchmen of the 3rd and 4th centuries. The Christian Church has been a great benefactor to learning.

Leather ( timeZone, br, 2 Kings i, 6, properly skin, as elsewhere rendered, i.e. on a person or animal, also as taken off, hide, sometimes as prepared or tanned, Lev. xi, 32; xiii, 46 sq.; Numb. xxxi, 25; in the N.T. only in the adj. Ἱκτόρυπας, "leather," Matt. iii, 4; lit. of skin, as in the parallel passage, Mark i, 6). A girdle of leather is referred to in the above passage (2 Kings i, 6) as characteristic of Elias, which, with the mantle of hair, formed the humble attire that the prophets usually wore. In like manner John the Baptist had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leather girdle about his loins (Matt. iii, 4). Strong and broad girdles of leather are still much used by the nomad tribes of Western Asia (see Hackett's Illustr. of Scripture, p. 96). See Skin; DRESS.

Leaven. We learn from the monuments [see cut on page 808] that the ancient Egyptians were well acquainted with the various processes of tanning and working in leather, and from them the Hebrews undoubtedly derived their knowledge of the art of preparing leather for a variety of useful purposes. It appears that the Egyptian tan was prepared in earthen vessels, and that the workmen could preserve skins either with or without the hair. The preparation of leather was an important branch of Egyptian industry (see Wilkinson's Egyptians, ii, 98, 99, 105). Leather appears to have been used by the ancient Assyrians in some cases for recording documents (see Layard's Nineveh, i, 147). See TANNING.

Leaven. In the Hebrew we find two distinct words, both translated leaven in the common version of the Bible. This is unfortunate, for there is the same distinction between resh, seor, and עַשְּנָה, chamets, in the Hebrew, as between leaven and unleavened bread in the English. The Greek θύμα appears to be used only in the former sense, and it is doubtful if it applies to a liquid. Chemically speaking the "fermentation" of bread is the same substance in both cases; but "leaven" is more correctly applied to solids, "ferment" both to liquids and solids.

1. "resh, seor," occurs only five times in the Scriptures, in four of which (Exod. xii, 15, 19; xiii, 7; Lev. iii, 11) it is rendered "leaven," and in the fifth (Deut. xvi, 4) "leavened bread." It seems to have denoted originally the remnant of dough left on the preceding baking, which had fermented and turned acid; hence (accordchamets' occur together, and are evidently distinct: "Unleavened bread (matatwich) shall be eaten during the seven days, and there shall not be seen with these fermented bread (chamets), and there shall not be seen with thee unleavened dough (sevor) in all thy borders." See W. W. X.

The organic chemists define the process of fermentation, and the substance which excites it, as follows: "Fermentation is nothing else but the putrefaction of a substance containing no nitrogen. Ferment, or yeast, is a substance in a state of putrefaction, the atoms of which are in a continual motion" (Turner's Chemistry, by Liebig). This definition is in strict accordance with the views of the ancients, and gives point and force to many passages of sacred writ (Ps. lxix, 21; Matt. xvi, 6, 11, 12; Mark viii, 18; Luke xii, 11; xiii, 21; 1 Cor. v, 5-8; Gal. v, 9). Leaven, or fermented, or even some seemingly fermentible substances (as honey), were prohibited in many of the typical institutions both of the Jews and Gentiles. The Latin writers use corruptus as signifying fermented; Tactus applies the word to the fermentation of wine. Plutarch (Rom. Quest. cix, 6) assigns as the reason why the priests of Jupiter Caelestis were not allowed to touch leaven, "that it comes out of corruption, and corrupts that with which it is mingled." See also Julius Gallus, viii, 15. The use of leaven was strictly forbidden in all offerings made to the Lord by fire, as in the case of the peace-offering (Lev. ii, 11), the sin-offering (Lev. vii, 13), the consecration-offering (Exod. xxix, 2; Lev. viii, 2), the Nazarite-offering (Num. vi, 17), and in particular in regard to the feast of the Passover, when the Israelites were not only prohibited on pain of death from eating leavened bread, but even from having any leaven in their houses (Exod. xii, 15, xx, 1) or in their land (Exod. xiii, 7; Deut. xvi, 4) during seven days, commencing with the 14th of Nisan. The command was rigidly enforced by the zeal of the Jews in later times (compare Mishnah, Peah, ii, 1; Schüttgen, Hebr. Hebr. i, 368). It is in reference to these prohibitions that Amos (iv, 5) ironically bids the Jews of his day to "offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven." Hence, likewise, even honey was prohibited (Lev. ii, 11) on account of its occasionally producing fermentation. In other instances, where the offering was to be consumed by the priest and not on the altar, leaven might be used, as in the case of the peace-offering (Lev. vii, 13) and the Pentecostal leavens (Lev. xxiii, 17).

It is to be presumed also that the shew-bread was unleavened, both, a forciors, from the prohibition of leaven in the bread offered on the altar, and because, in the direction given for the making of the shew-bread it is not specified that leaven should be used (Lev. xxiv, 5-9); for, in all such cases, what is not enjoined is prohibited. Jewish tradition also asserts that the shew-bread was without leaven (Josephus, Ant. iii, 6, 6; Tal. Maimoth, v, 2, 8). On Lev. ii, 11, Dr. Andrew Willet observes, "They have a spiritual signification, because ferment signifies corruption, as St. Paul applieth (1 Cor. v, 8). The honey is also forbidden because it had a leavening force" (Junius, Inscript., 1631). On the same principle of symbolism, God prescribes that all shall always constitute a part of the offerings to the Lord (Lev. ii, 31) on account of its antiseptic properties. Thus St. Paul (comp. Col. iv, 6; Eph. iv, 29) uses "salt" as preservative from corruption, on the same principle which leads him to employ that which is unleavened (Nepheus) as an emblem of purity and incorruption. See Passover.

The Greek word ζύμων, rendered "leaven," is used with precisely the same latitude of meaning as the Hebrew sevor'. It signifies leaven, sour dough (Matt. xiii, 33; xvi, 12; Luke xii, 21). Another quality in leaven is noticed in the Bible, viz., its "secretly proceeding, its diffusive power; hence the proverbial saying, "a little leaven leavens the whole lump" (1 Cor. v, 6, Gal. v, 9). In this respect it was emblematic of moral influence generally, whether good or bad, and hence our Saviour accepts it as illustrating the growth of the kingdom of heaven in the individual heart and in the world at large (Matt. xiii. 33). Leaven, or ferment, is therefore used tropically for corruption, perverseness, of life, doctrine, heart, etc. (Matt. vi. 6, 11; Mark viii. 15; Luke xi. 1; 1 Cor. v. 7, 8; comp. Col. iv. 6; Eph. iv. 29). The idea has been familiar to the Jews; compare Otha, Lex. Rabin. Talm. p. 227. They even employed leaven as a figure of the inherent corruption of man: "R. Alexander, when he had finished his prayers, said, Led of the universe, it is clearly manifest before thee that it is our will to do thy will: what hinders that we do not thy will? The leaven which is in the mass (G.L. the evil desire which is in the heart)" (Babyl. Berachoth, xvii. 1; ap. Meusch. N.T. ex Talmude ill.). We find the same allusion in the Roman poet Persius (Sat. i. 24; compare Casaubon's note, Comment. p. 74). See Wernersdorff, De fermento Herodes (All. 1724). See unleavened bread.

The usual leaven in the East is dough kept till it becomes sour, and which is kept from one day to another for the purpose of preserving leaven in readiness. Thus, if there should be no leaven in all the country for any length of time, as much as a month, the leaven should easily be produced in twenty-four hours. Sour dough, however, is not exclusively used for leaven in the East; the use of wine being in some parts employed as yeast (Kitto, Fictorial Bible, i. 161). In the Talmudic mention is made of leaven fornem of the הבש הceptive הילעוס, leaven "dipped in water" (Pesekh. iii. 1). As the process of producing the leaven itself, or even of leavening bread, when the substance was at hand, required some time, unleavened cakes were more usually produced on sudden emergencies (Gen. xviii. 6; Judg. vi. 19). See Bake; Bread, etc.

Leban'a (Neh. vii. 48). See Lebanon.

Lebanah (Heb. Lebanon', בֵּית הָלָה, the moon as being white, Matt. x. 10, etc.; Sept. in Ezra ii. 44; Sos. 1. 24), Chaldaically written Lebanon, בֵּית הָלָה, in most MSS. in Neh. vii. 48, Sept. Ailunai, Auth. Ver. Lebanon; Vulg. in both passages Lebanon), one of the Nethinim whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. B.C. ante 536.

Leban'on, the loftiest and most celebrated mountain range in Syria, forming the northern boundary of Palestine, and running thence along the coast of the Mediterranean to the great pass which opens into the plain of Hamath. The range of Anti-Lebanon, usually included by geographers under the same general name, lies parallel to the other, commencing on the south at the mountains of the Jordan, and terminating in the plain of Hamath. The two are separated by the northern part of the great central ridge or back-bone of the entire country. See Palestine.

I. The Name.—In the O. Test. these mountain ranges are always called בֵּית הָלָה, Lebanon', to which, in prose, the art. is constantly prefixed, בֵּית הָלָה; in poetry the art. is sometimes prefixed and sometimes not, as in Isa. xiv. 8, and Psa. xxix. 6. The origin of the name has been variously explained. It is generally assigned to the root בֵּית הָלָה, to be white. בֵּית הָלָה יִהְיֶה is thus emphatically "The White Mountain" of Syria. It is a singular fact that almost uniformly the names of the highest mountains in all countries have a like meaning—Mont Blanc, Himalaya (in Sanscrit signifying "snowy"), Ben Nevis, Joworkem, perhaps also Alps (from aíu, "white," like the Latin albus, and as commonly thought, from aíp, "high"). Some suppose the name originated in the white snow by which the ridge is covered; others derive the name from the whitish color of the limestone rock of which the great body of the range is composed (Schinz, Leitungen des Hochkant, v. 471; Robinson, Biblical. Res. ii. 498). The former seems the more natural explanation, and is confirmed by several circumstances. Jeremiah mentions the "snow Lebanon" (xxvii. 14); in the Chald. paraphrase לְעַבֵּד "mountain," is the name given to it, and this is equivalent to a not uncommon modern Arabic appellation, Jebel ith-Thelj (Gesenius, Thesaurus, l. c.; Abulfeda, Tob. Syr. p. 184). Others derive the name Lebanon from Aīsārāw (aīsārāw, "frankincense," the gum of a tree called Aīsināw (Reland, Palest. p. 312; Herod. i. 183), which is mentioned among the gifts presented by the wise men to the infant Saviour (Matt. ii. 11). This, however, is in Hebrew לְעַבֵּד, Lebanon (Exod. xxx. 34; Isa. i. 6). The Greek name of Lebanon, both in the Septuagint and classic authors, is uniformly Aīsāroŭn (Strabo, xvi. 755; Ptol. v. 10). The Septuagint has sometimes Ἀϊσίνωψις instead of Aīsāroŭn (Deut. i. 7; l. c. 261; Josh. i. 4; ix. 1). The Latin name is Libanus (Vitry, v. 17), which is the reading of the Vulgate. It would appear that the Greek and Roman geographers regarded the name as derived from the snow. Tacitus speaks of it as a remarkable phenomenon that snow should lie where there is sapix in the heat (Hist. 5. 6). Thel, C. Antie., "Libanus λευκώσας — id est, conus interpretatur" (Adererus Jordanum, in Opera, ii. 286, ed. Migne); he also notes the identity of the name of this mountain and frankincense (in One, in Opera, vi. 100). Arab geographers call all the range Jibil il-Liban (Strabo, iv. 372; Hyginus, Strab. p. 168; Edrisi, p. 386, ed. Jaubert). This name, however, is now seldom heard among the people of Syria, and when used it is confined to the western range. Different parts of this range have distinct names—the northern section is called Jebel Akkar, the central Sunus, and the southern J. el-Druze. Other local names are also used.

The eastern range, as well as the western, is frequently included under the general name Lebanon in the Bible (Josh. i. 4; Judg. iii. 8); but in Josh. xiii. 5 it is correctly subdivided and named "Lehem ben edom" or "Lehem ben ir" (Beaufort, The Anti-Lebanon and its Sources, p. 110), and translated in the Vulg. Liban quoque regio contra orientem. The southern section of this range was well known to the sacred writers as Hermon, and had in ancient times several descriptive titles given to it—Sirion, Shenir, Sion; just as it has in modern days as Jebel Akkar (or Thel). See Anti-Lebanon. Greek writers called the whole range Ἀντίλιβανος (Strabo, xvi. p. 754; Pтол. v. 10), a word which is sometimes found in the Sept. as the rendering of the Hebrew Lebanon (ut supra). Latin authors also uniformly distinguish the eastern range by the name Anti-Libano (Pliney). The name is appropriately descriptive, its position, lying "opposite" or "over against" Lebanon (Strabo, l. c.). Yet this distinction does not seem to have been known to Josephus, who uniformly calls the eastern as well as the western range Aīsāroŭn; thus he speaks of the mountains of the Jordan as being near to Libanus (Ant. v. 8. 1), and of Abila as situated in Libanus (xix. 5. 1). The range of Anti-Lebanon is now called by all native geographers Jebel esh-Shurki, "East mountain," to distinguish it from Lebanon proper, which is sometimes termed Jebel el-Chourbi, "West mountain" (Brockmann, Biblical Res. ii. 487; Burchhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 4).

To insure greater definiteness, and to prevent repetition, the name Lebanon will be applied in this article to the western range, and Anti-Lebanon to the eastern.

II. Physical Geography.—1. Lebanon.—(1.) Limits. The mountain range which lies on the left of the valley which connects the Mediterranean with the plain of Hamath (anciently called "the entrance of Hamath," Numb. xxxiv. 8), in lat. 34° 41', and runs in a south-western direction along the coast, till it sinks into the plain of Acre and the low hills of Galilee, in lat. 33° 5', its extreme length is 110 geographical miles, and the average breadth of its base is about 20 miles. The highest peak, called Dahar el-Kudib, is about 25 miles from the northern extremity, and just over the little cedar grove; its elevation is 10,051 feet (Van de Veide, "Mouve", p. 170). From this point the range decreases in height towards the south. The massive rounded summit of Sunnir, 25 miles from the former, is 6500 feet high. Jebel Kenble, the next peak, is 6824 feet; and Tomat Nha, "the Twin-peaks," the highest tops of southern Lebanon, are about 6500 feet. From these the fall is rapid to the ravine of the river Litâni, the ancient Leontes.

The chain of Lebanon, or at least its higher ridges, may be said to terminate at the point where it is thus broken through by the Litâni. But a broad and lower mountainous tract continues towards the south, bordering the basin of the Huleh on the west. It rises to its greatest elevation about Safed (Jebel Safed), and at length ends abruptly in the mountains of Nazareth, as the northern wall of the plain of Esdraelon. This high tract may very properly be regarded as a prolongation of Lebanon.

Some writers regard the Litâni as marking the southern limit of Lebanon; and it would seem that the ancient classical geographers were of this opinion (Smith, "Diæt. of G. and R. Geog. s. v. Libanus; Kitto, "Physical Hist. of Pal.," p. 52). Diodorus Siculus describes Lebanon as extending along the coast of Tripolis, Byblus, and Sidon (Hist. xix, 59); and the Litâni falls into the sea a few miles south of Sidon. The notices of Ptolemy are somewhat indefinite, and represent the two chains of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon as commencing at the Mediterranean—the former on the north, the latter on the south (Geog. v, 15). Strabo is more definite and less accurate: "There are two mountains which include Cœle-Syrria lying parallel to each other. The commencement of both these mountains, Libanus and Anti-Libanus, is a little way above the sea. Libanus rises from the sea near Tripolis and Theopropos, and Anti-Libanus from the sea near Sidon. They terminate somewhere near the Arabian mountains, which are above the district of Damascus and the Trachones. . . . A hollow plain lies between them, whose breadth towards the sea is 200 stadia, and its length from the sea to the interior about twice as much. Rivers flow through it, the largest of which is the Jordan" (xvi, 754). According to Pliny the chains begin at the sea, but they run from south to north ("N. v, 17; compare Ammian. Marcel. xiv, 26). Cellarius merely repeats these ancient authors (Geog. ii, 439). Reland shows their errors and contradictions, but he cannot solve them, though he derived some important information from Maundrell ("Pilgr. p. 317 sq.; comp. Early Trav. in Pal. Bohn, p. 488"). Rosenmüller ("Bib. Geog. ii, 207, 263"); Wells (Geog. i, 229), and others, only repeat the old mistakes. The source of these errors may be seen by an examination of the physical geography of the district east of Tyre and Sidon. There can be no doubt that the range of Lebanon, viewed in its physical formation, extends from the entrance of Haemath to the plain of Acre; but between the parallels of Tyre and Sidon it is cut through by the chasm of the Litâni, which drains the valley of Cœle-Syrria. That river enters the range obliquely on the eastern side, turns gradually westward, and at length divides the main ridge at right angles. Here, therefore, it may be said, in one sense, that the chain terminates; and though on the south bank of the Litâni another chain rises, and runs in the line of the former, it is not so lofty; its greatest height scarcely exceeding 3000 feet. Ancient geographers thought Lebanon terminated on the north bank of the Litâni; and as that river drains the valley of Cœle-Syrria, which lies between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, they naturally supposed that the chain on the south bank of the Litâni was the commencement of the latter range. Here lies the error, which Dr. Porter was among the first to detect, by an examination of the general conformation of the mountain ranges from the summit of Hermon (see "Bibliotheca Sacra," xi, 52; Porter, "Damascus," 296). Anti-Lebanon is completely separated from this western range by a broad and deep valley. The great valley of the Jordan extends northward to the western base of Hermon, in the parallel of the chasm of the Litâni. From this point a narrower valley, called wady el-Teim, runs northward, till it meets an eastern branch of Cœle-Syrria. These three valleys, forming a continuous line, constitute the western boundary of Anti-Lebanon. No part of this chain crosses them (Robinson, ii, 438). The southern end of the plain of Cœle-Syrria is divided by a low ridge into two branches. Down the eastern branch runs wady el-Teim, conveying a tributary to the Jordan ("Bib. Sac. L. C.; Robinson, iii, 428-430"); down the western runs the Litâni. The latter branch soon contracts into a wild chasm, whose banks are in some places above a thousand feet high, of naked rock, and almost perpendicular. At one spot the ravine is only 60 feet wide, and is spanned by a natural bridge, at the height of about 100 feet above the stream. Over it rise jagged walls of naked limestone, pierced with numerous caves. The scenery is here magnificent; as one stands on this arch of nature's own building, he seems to see clearly repress feelings of alarm. The cliffs almost meet overhead; rugged masses of rock shoot out from dizzy heights, and appear as if about to plunge into the chasm; the mad river far below dashes along from rapid to rapid in sheets of foam. In wild grandeur this chasm has no equal in Syria, and few in the world. Yet, from a short distance on either side, it is not visible. The mountain chain appears to run on in its course, declining gradually, but without any interruption. The ridge, in fact, has been cleft asunder by some terrible convulsion, and through the rift the waters of Cœle-Syria have forced their way to the Mediterranean instead of the Jordan, which is the natural outlet. It will thus be seen that the ridge on the south bank of the Litani is the prolongation of that on the north, and is a part of Lebanon (Robinson, ii, 483); and that the chain of the Litani, though the drain of Cilicia-Syria, is no part of the Anti-Lebanon. Neither Cilicia-Syria, therefore, nor Anti-Lebanon, at any point, approaches within many miles of the Mediterranean (Handbook for S. and P. p. 571; Robinson, iii, 420 sq.; Van de Velde, Travels, i, 145 sq.).

(2.) Western Aspect.—The view of Lebanon from the Mediterranean is exceedingly grand. On approaching, it appears to rise from the basin of the deep like a vast wall, the wavy top densely covered with snow during winter and spring, and the two highest peaks capped with clouds of ice on the sultriest days of summer. The western slopes are long and gradual, fruited from top to bottom with deep rugged ravines, and broken everywhere by lofty cliffs of white rock, and ragged banks, and tens of thousands of terrace walls, rising like steps of stairs from the sea to the snow-wreaths. "The whole mass of the mountain consists of whitish limestone, or as it is called in modern times, the chalk, which lighthouse, each of its two western hills, is crowned with a lighthouse. The entire Eastern side of the island is a great level plain extending along its base, which is on an average about 3000 feet above the level of the sea (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 175). The ridge resembles a colossal wall, its sides precipitous, and thinly covered, in most places, with oak forests. There are very few—only some one or three—hills or promontories. The summit of the ridge, or backbone, is much nearer the eastern than the western side; and extending in gentle undulations, white with snow, far as the eye can see to the right and left, it forms a grand object from the ruins of Baalbek, and still more so the height of the ancient city of Phoenicia. When the eastern approach to the chain reveals a new feature. A side ridge runs along the base of the central chain from the town of Zahle to its northern extremity, and is thinly covered throughout with forests of oak intermixed with wild plum, hawthorn, juniper, and other trees. A little south of the parallel of Summit this ridge is low and narrow, and the Bukà is a there widest. Advancing northwards the ridge increases in height, and encroaches on the plain, until, at the summit of the mountain (Ain el-Assy), it attains its greatest elevation, and there the plain is narrowest. From this point southwards to where the road crosses from Baalbek to the Cedars, the central chain is steep, and destitute of vegetation, except here and there a solitary oak or blasted pine clinging to the rocks (Porter's Danaeua, ii, 305 sq.; Robinson, iii, 550 sq.).

The side ridge above described sinks down in graceful wooded slopes into wady Khâled, which drains a part of the plain of Hums, and falls into Nahr el-Kebr. The main chain also terminates abruptly a little farther west, and its base is swept by the waters of the Kebr, a river anciently celebrated (Robinson, iii, 561 sq.).

(4.) Rivers.—Lebanon is rich in rivers and fountains, fed by the eternal snows that crown its summit, and the vapoors which they condense. The "streams from Lebanon" were proverbial for their abundance and beauty in the days of the Hebraic prophets (Cant. iv, 15), and its "cold-flowing waters" were types of richness and luxury (Jer. xviii, 14). Some of them, too, have obtained a classic celebrity (see Relland, Palest. p. 209, 487). They are all small mountain torrents rather than rivers. The following are the more important: i. The Eleutherus (now Nahr el-Kebr), rising in the plain of Emesa (Robinson, iii, 550), and west of the plain of Hums, and, at a single spot, seizes the confluence of thousands of small streams and rivers from Lebanon, and falls into the Mediterranean midway between Tripolis and Araradus. Strabo states that it formed the northern border of Phoenicia and Cilicia-Syria (xvi, 755; Robinson, iii, 570). 2. The Kadisha, or "sacred river," now generally called Nabûr, rises in the mountains, and descends through a sublime ravine to the coast near Tripoli. At one spot its gales have perpendicular walls of rock on each side nearly 1000 feet high. Here, on opposite banks, are two villages, the people of which can converse across the chasm without using ropes or ladders, or making a walk of two hours. In a wild cleft of the ravine is the convent of Kanobin, the chief residence of the Maronite patriarch (Handbook for Syr. and Pal. p. 586). 3. The Adonis (Nahr Ibrahim), famous in ancient fable as the scene of the romantic story of Venus and Adonis. Killed by a boar on its banks, Adonis dyed with his blood the waters, which ever since, on the anniversary of his death, are said to run red to the sea (Lucian, De Syrigia Deo, 6; Strabo, xvi, 750). And so supposed to be identical with Tannum, for whom Ezekiel represents the Jewish women as weeping (xiv, 14). The source is a noble fountain beside the ruins of a temple of Venus, and near the site of Aphec, now marked by the little village of Afka (Eusebius, Vita Constantini, 55; Ptol. iii, 267; Ritter, Pol., 4, 201; and Syr. iv, 588). The Adonis falls into the sea a few miles south of the Biblical Gebal. 4. The Lyкус flumes, now Nahìr el-Kelb, or "Dog River," rises high up on the flank of Sunnu, and breaks down through a picturesque glen. At its mouth is that famous pass on whose sculptured rocks Assyrian, Egyptian, Persian, and French (1) generals have left records of their expeditions and victories (Robinson, iii, 618; Hammond, p. 407 sq.; Strabo, xvi, 755). 5. The Magara of Pliny (v, 17) is probably the modern Nahìr Beyrût. 6. The Tanýyas or Damûras (Strabo, xvi, 756; Polyaenus, v, 98) rises near Deir el-Kâm, the capital of Lebanon. It is now called Nahìr ed-Dammûr. 7. The Bos- trenus of ancient authors appears to be identical with Nahìr el-Awale, though some doubt this. 8. The Leontes has already been mentioned. The lower section of it is known as Khân Kastân, the upper section Liânât. Its chief sources are at Châlic and Ba'albek; but a large tributary flows down from the ravine of Zahleh, and is the only stream which descends the eastern slopes of Lebanon. See Leontes. 2. Anti-Lebanon.—(1.) Peaks.—The centre and culminating point of Anti-Lebanon is Hermon. From it a number of ranges radiate, like the ribs of a half-open fan. The first and loftiest runs north-east, parallel to Lebanon, and separated from it by the valley of Cæle-Syria, whose average breadth is about six miles. This ridge of Anti-Lebanon and that of Hermon it joins. Hermon is broad, irregular, intersected by numerous valleys and little fertile plains, and covered with thin forests of dwarf oak. Its elevation is not more than 4600 feet. Advancing northwards, its features become wilder and grander, oak-trees give place to juniper, and the elevation increases until, above the beautiful plain of Zebelánâ—where lies emboodomed in its very centre—it attains a height of about 7000 feet (Van de Velde, Mem. p. 175). From this point to the parallel of Ba'albek there is little change in the elevation or scenery. It begins to rise to fall, and gradually until at length it sinks down within the great plain of Hamath, eight miles east of Riblah, and sixteen south of Emesa. With the exception of the little upland plains, and a few of the deeper valleys, this ridge is incapable of cultivation. The sides are steep and rugged, in many places sheer precipices of naked, jagged rock, nearly 1000 feet high. They are not so bare or bleak, however, as the higher summits of Lebanon. Vegetation is abundant among the rocks; and though the inhabitants are few and far between, immense flocks of sheep and goats are pastured upon the mountains, and with their bleating and the chattering of their herders, their braying, their foxes—far more abundant than in any other part of Syria (Porter, Damascus, ii, 315). The lowest and last of the ridges that radiate from Hermon runs nearly due east along the magnificent plain of Damascus, and continues onward to Palmyra. Its average elevation is not more than 2000 feet, and it does not rise more than about 700 feet above the plain, though some of its peaks are much higher. Its rock is chalky, almost pure white, and entirely naked—not a tree, or shrub, or patch of verdure is anywhere seen upon it. It thus forms a remarkable contrast with the rich green of the plain of Damascus. From the central range to this ridge there is a descent, by a series of broad, bare terraces or plateaus, supported by long, continuous walls of bare, whitish limestone, varying from 100 to 1000 feet in height. Nothing could be more dreary and desolate than the scenery on these steppes. The gravelly soil, in many places thickly strewn with flints, is as bare as the cliffs that bound them. Yet they are intersected by several rich and fertile glens, so deep, however, that their verdure and foliage can not be seen from a distance. Towards the east these steppes gradually expand into broad upland plains, and portions of them are irrigated and tilled. On them stand the small but ancient towns of Yabrud, Nebk, Jerd, etc., around which is such a scene of wild grandeur as you can nowhere see. the rock near the ancient Gebal (Roland, Palest., p. 281).

These cretaceous deposits occur along the whole eastern flank of Lebanon, and the lower eastern ranges of Anti-Lebanon are wholly composed of them (D'Arvieux, Mémoires, ii, 393; Elliot, Travels, ii, 257; Volney, ii, 280).

Extensive beds of soft, friable sandstone are met with both in Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. According to Ando

German, those of vine or oak on the higher parts of the cretaceous strata. This change in the geological struc ture gives great variety to the scenery of Lebanon. The regular and graceful outlines of the sandstone ridges contrast well with the bold and more abrupt limestone cliffs and peaks, while the wavy line and sombre pine forests of the former relieve the intense whiteness of the latter.

Coal has been found in the district of Metn, east of Beyrut, but it is impure, and the veins are too thin to repay mining. Iron is found in the central and southern portions of Lebanon, and there is an extensive sand wash on one of the eastern steppes of Anti-Lebanon (Porter, Damacena, i, 161; Handbook, p. 563; Volney, i, 281; Burckhardt, p. 27).

2. The Botany of Lebanon, like the geology, is to a great extent unknown. It appears to be very rich in the Agaroidea, with vine or oak the largest, and the linden, hornbeam, willow, aspen, order of the tree shrubs, and flowers of these noble mountains. The great variety of climate, from the tropical heat of the Jordan valley at the base of Hermon, to the eternal snows on its summit, affords space and fitting home for the flora of the whole globe. The scene of Gilead begins, till about the 20th of September rain never falls, and clouds are rarely seen. At the latter date the autumn rains begin, generally accompanied with storms of thunder and vivid lightning. January and February are the coldest months. The hottest month begins, on the plain of Phoenicia, at the end of April, but in the upper altitudes it is not gathered in till the beginning of August. During the summer, in the village of Shum-lain, on the western declivity of Lebanon, at an elevation of 2000 feet, in the hottest part of the day, the thermometer does not rise above 85° and in the night it usually goes down to 70°. From June 20th to August 20th the barometer often does not vary a quarter of an inch; there are few cloudy days, and scarcely even a slight shower. At Sidon, in Anti-Lebanon, with an elevation of 4800 feet, the air is extremely dry, and the thermometer never rises in summer above 80° Fahr. in the shade. The nights are cool and pleasant. The sirocco wind is severely felt along the coast and on the western slopes of Lebanon, but not so much in Anti-Lebanon. It blows occasionally during March and April here, the day being almost unknown. The mountains rise to the height of 8500 feet, and in some parts of the mountain ridges, but in the low plains, and especially at the base of Hermon, it is very abundant (Ps. cx., xi, 8).

V. Historical Notices. — Lebanon is first mentioned as a boundary of the country given by the Lord in cove nant to promise to Israel (Deut. i, 7; xii, 24). To the dwellers in this, and to those of the surrounding coun tries bank of the Nile, the snows, and streams, and verdant forests of Lebanon must have seemed an earthly paradise. By such a contrast we can understand Mo ses' touching petition, "I pray thee let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that good mountain, and Lebanon" (Deut. iii, 22).

The mountains were originally inhabited by a number of warring, independent tribes, some of whom Joshua conquered on the banks of Lake Merom (xii, 2-18). They are said to have been of Phoenician stock (Flint, p. 17; Eusebius, Onom. s. v.; compare 1 Kings v.). Further north were the Hi vites (Judg. iii, 8), and the Giblites, and Arkites, whose names still cling to the ruins of their ancient strongholds. See Giblites, Arkites. The Israelites never completely subdued them, but the enterprising Phoeni rians appear to have had them under their power, or in their pay, for they got timber for their fleets from the mountains, and they were able to supply Solomon from the same forests when building the Temple (1 Kings v, 9-11; Ezek. xxvii, 9 sq.). At a later period we find the king of Assyria felling its timber for his military en gines (Isa. xii, 8 sq.; Ezek. xxvii, 24). The place is mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions (q. v.). Dio dorus Siculus relates that in like manner Antigonus, having collected from all quarters hewers of wood, and sawyers, and ship-builders, brought down an immense quantity of timber from Libanus to the sea to build himself a navy (xix, 59). The same fact that this mountain was the famous resort for timber, whether for architectural, naval, or military purposes, appears from the Egyptian monuments, where the name is found in the corrupted form of Le Monsen (Wilkinson, Egyptiâ, i. 403). It is there represented as a mountainous country, inaccessible to chariots, and abounding in lofty trees, which the affrighted mountaineers, having fled thither for refuge, are engaged in felling, in order to impede the advance of the invading Egyptian army.

During the conquests of David and the commercial prosperity of the nation under Solomon, the Jews became fully acquainted with the richness, the grandeur, and the luxuriant foliage of Lebanon, and ever after that mountain was regarded as the emblem of wealth and majesty. Thus the Psalmist says of the Messiah's kingdom, "The fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon" (lxxii, 16); and Solomon, praising the beauty of the Bridegroom, writes, "His countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars" (Cant. v. 15). Isaiah also predicts of the Church, "The glory of Lebanon shall be given to it" (xxxv, 2); compare ix, 13; Hos. xiv, 5, 6). Indeed, in Scripture, Lebanon is very generally mentioned in connection with the cedar-trees with which it abounded; but its wines are also noticed (Hos. xiv, 8); and in Cant. iv, 11; Hos. xiv, 7, it is celebrated for various kinds of fragrant plants. Lebanon is greatly celebrated both in sacred and classical writers, and much of the sublime imagery of the prophets of the Old Test. is borrowed from this mountain (e.g. Psa. xxix, 5, 6; cix, 16-18; Caut. iv, 8, 15; Isa. ii, 3; Zech. xi, 1, 2).

Anti-Lebanon seems to have been early brought under the sway of Damascus, though amid its southern strongholds were some fierce tribes who preserved their independence down to a late period (1 Chron. xi. 19-22; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 11; Strabo, xvi, p. 755, 756).

During the reign of the Seleucidæ several large cities were founded or rebuilt in these mountains, as Laodicea at the northern end of Anti-Lebanon, Chalcis at its eastern base, Abila in the wild glen of the Abana (Luke iii, 1). See ABILA. At the commencement of our era, Lebanon, with the rest of Syria, passed into the hands of Rome, and under its rule great cities were founded and beautiful temples erected. The heights on which Baal-fires had burned in primeval times, and the groves where the rude mountain tribes worshipped their idols, became the sites of noble buildings, whose ruins to this day excite the admiration of every traveller. Greece itself cannot surpass in the beauty of its temples of Baalbek and Chalcis. There are more than thirty temples in Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon (Porter, Handbook, p. 454, 457, 557, 411; comp. Robinson, iii, 488, 629).

During the wars of the Seleucidæ, the Romans, and the Saracens, the inhabitants of Lebanon probably remained in comparative security. When, under the Muslim rule, Christianity was almost extinguished from the rest of Syria, it retained its hold there; and the Maronites (q. v.), who still occupy the greater part of the range, are doubtless the lineal descendants of the old Syrians. They originated in the 7th century, and it is said that the monk Maron taught them the Monothelite heresy. In the 12th century they submitted to the pope, and have ever since remained devoted Papists. They number about 200,000. The Draues (q. v.), their hereditary foes, dwelt only in the southern section of the range, and number about 80,000. The jealousies and feuds of the rival sects, fanned by a cruel and corrupt government, often desolate "that godly mountain" with fire and sword. Anti-Lebanon has a considerable Christian population, but they are mixed with Mohammedans, and have no political status. The whole range is under the authority of the pasha of Damascus.

The American missionaries have established several schools among the people of Lebanon, and for some years past pleasing success has attended their efforts in the mountain, which, however, were almost wholly interrupted by the violent outbreak among the Druzes in 1860, ending in a wholesale massacre of the Christians. On the suppression of this, a Maronite governor was appointed over the district by the Turkish government, under the protectorate of the five great European powers. V. Leb'aath (Heb. Lebath; F₁ m, i.e. Lebanon; Sept. Aeleva), a city in the southern part of Judah, i.e. Simeon (Jos. xv. 32); elsewhere more fully Beth-Le baath (Josh. xix. 6); also Beth-ibri (1 Chron. iv. 31). The associated names in all these passages suggest a location in the wild south-western part of the tribe, possibly on the ruined site marked on van de Velde's Map of Syria, on wady Suniyet, not very far from Elara, towards Gaza.
Lebbeus (Ἀββαῖος), a surname of Judas or Jude (Matt. x, 3), one of the twelve apostles; a member, together with his namesake "Isacariot," James the son of Alphaeus whose surname was Thaddaeus; they are mentioned among the three secretions of the apostolic body. The name Judas only, without any distinguishing mark, occurs in the lists given in Luke vi, 16; Acts i, 13; and in John xiv, 22 (where we find "Judas not Iscariot" among the apostles), but the apostle has been generally identified with "Thaddæus" (ὁ Θαδδαίος, Ναζαρηνός) or τὸ Θαδδαίον alone, others introducing the name Ἰοβαίος, ᾿Οδαρικὼς, ᾿Οδαρικῶν, or ζωνοίχος, in Matt., where the Vulgate reads Thaddæus alone, which is adopted by Lachmann in his Berlin edition of 1832. This confusion is still further increased by the tradition preserved by Eusebius (H. E. i, 18) that the true name of Thomas (the twin was Judas) was Iōnās ὁ σαι ὁ θωάμας, and that Thaddæus was one of the "seventy" identified by Jerome in Matt. x with "Judas Jacobi," as well as by the theories of modern scholars, who regard the "Levi" (Αρίστης ὁ Ῥουμαίος) as Jesus of Tiberias, ii, 14: A. L. Hobs (The Date of "Levi") or by rays (Byz. Arch. ii, 438). Brocare mentions it as a very handsome village, by the name of Lebba, four leagues south of Nablus, on the right hand of the road to Jerusalem (chap. vii, p. 178). The identity of this place was again suggested by Maundrell, who regarded it as Lebba (The Dairy, p. 86). Judas Thaddæus is mentioned as being visited by Dr. Robinson on his way from Jerusalem to Nablus (Bib. Researches, iii, 90). He describes the khan el-Lubban as being now in ruins; but near by is a fine fountain of running water. From it a beautiful oval plain extends north about fifteen minutes, with perhaps half that breadth, lying here deep among the high rocky hills. About the middle of the western side, a narrow cleft through the mountain, called wady el-Lubban, carries off the waters of the plain and surrounding tract. The village of Lubban is situated on the north-west acclivity, considerably above the plain. It is inhabited; has the appearance of an old place; and in the rocks above it are excavated sepulchres (comp. De Saucy, Narrative, i, 94, 96; Schwarz, Palest., p. 180; Wilson, ii, 292 sq.; Bonar, p. 568; Mislin, iii, 819; Porter, Handbook, p. 580; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 380; Trever, Arab. i, 437). Lebria. Eulius Antonius of (or Lebricia, vulgarly Nibrasia, from Lebricia or Lebraxis, the old Nibrassia, on the Guadalquivir), "un humanista de prima nota," the Erasmus of Spain, was born at that place in 1442 according to Munoz (Nichol. Anton and Cavo say 1444). He studied in his native city, and afterwards went to the University of Salamanca. In 1461 he went to Italy to perfect himself in the classics. He visited the best schools, heard the most renowned teachers, and made great proficiency in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, etc., and even in theology, jurisprudence, and medicine. After ten years thus employed he returned to Spain, intending to effect a reformation, and with the special aim of promoting classical learning, in the universities of that country. He first labored in an unofficial way, and as teacher in the college of San Miguel at Seville; but Salamanca was the object of his ambition. His labors, with great success, and his vision became popular throughout Spain. He contributed very largely to the expulsion of barbarism from the seats of education, and to the diffusion of a taste for elegant and useful studies. He also published a large number of philological works, such as Aristotle, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew grammars, and especially a Latin lexicon, which was enthusiastically received by the universities of all countries. He likewise applied philology to theology, and by that means caused it to make a great progress: in order to correct the text of the Vulgate, he compared it with the older texts, the Hebrew and Greek originals, and was one of the chief...
Lebrun was permitted to depart unharmed. He now returned to Friesland, and rebuilt the church of Deventer, where he remained until his death. When Lüdger built a third time the church which had been again destroyed during an invasion of the Saxons in 776, the remains of Lebuin were discovered. Lebuin is not to be distinguished from Lebuin, the minister of the church, to whom his philological talents. The Inquisition interfered, and part of his Biblical works were prohibited. He, however, protested against this measure in his Apologia, addressed to his protector, cardinal Ximenes, and had it not been for the interference of the latter, and of other influyent friends at the court, he would no doubt have suffered severely (compare his Apologia, in Antonii Bibli. Hist. V. ii. 310 sq.) as it was, he was appointed, in 1518, professor of Latin literature at the newly established University of Alcalá de Henares (Complutum), and here he was suffered to end his days in peace. He died July 2, 1522, according to Munoz. Most of his works are still extant, among them a history of the reign of Ferdinand the Catholic, made by order of that prince, under the title Decades due, etc. (posthumously edited, 1645). Lebrun, Pierre, a French theologian, born at Brignollie in 1661, was professor in several colleges, and died June 6, 1727. He wrote, among other works, a Critical History of Superstitious Practices which have Seduced the People (1702).

Lebuin or Liawin, a noted colleague of Gregory in his mission among the inhabitants of Friesland. According to his painstaking biographer, Huncbald, a monk of the convent of Elnon in the 10th century (in Surius, vi, 277, and in Pertz, ii, 380), Lebuin was a native of Brittany, and joined Gregory at Utrecht, having been directed to do so in a dream. Gregory sent him on a mission to the neighboring people, and gave him the Anglo-Saxon Marchelin or Marcellin as assistant. They preached with great success, and soon established a church at Walpen, on the eastern shore of the Yssel, and another at Deventer. These churches afterwards closing by an invasion of the Saxons, Lebuin courageously stayed with his companions as a mission among that nation, and went to Marko, one of their principal cities; later he went further north, towards the Weser, and there was well received by an influential chief named Folkbert, who seems to have been a Christian. Folkbert advised him not to visit Marko during the reunion which was held there yearly to discuss the general interests of the nation, but to conceal himself in the house of one of his friends, Davo. Lebuin, however, did not abide by this counsel, and went to the assembly. Being aware how "omnia cononiam illius multitudin ex diversa parte, omnes superum praeclarumd instituta, numinosum videlicet suis vota solvens ac sacrificia," he appeared in the midst of the assembled warriors dressed in his priestly robes, the cross in one hand and the Gospel in the other, and announced himself as an envoy of the Most High, the one true God and creator of all things, to whom all must turn, forsaking our idols: "but," said he, at the close of his address, "if you wickedly persist in your errors, you will soon repent it bitterly, for in a short time there will come a courageous, prudent, and strong monarch of the neighborhood who will overthrow you like a torrent, destroying all with fire and sword, taking your wives and children to be his servants, and subjecting all who are left to his rule." This discourse greatly excited the Saxons against him; but one of them, Buto, took his part, and of the various church-services, are chanted or read in many churches. The lection (also called pulpitum, ambo, suggestum, pyx, tribunal, lect., lecturnum), or, most frequently, lectionarium, of very ancient use, is of various forms and of different materials, and is found both in Roman Catholic churches in the cathedrals and college-chaplés of the Church of England. Originally they were made of wood, but later they were frequently also made of stone or metal, and sometimes in the form of an eagle (the symbol of St. John the Evangelist) with the outspread wings of which form the frame supporting the volume.

In Scotland, during the last century, the preconicer’s desk was commonly called by that name, and pronounced letterum. See Chambers, Cyclopaedia, vol. vi. s. v.; Walcott, Sac. Archæol. p. 845. See EAGLE.

Lecticaifi, the same as the copiate. They were called lecticarii from the fact that they carried the corpse or bier at funerals. See Copiatæ.

Lectionarium, or Lessons. Of the many real and supposed meanings of the expression lectio (διαγωμα, διαγωγη), we have here only to consider the liturgical. In this sense it is used to designate the reading, which, together with singing, prayers, preaching, and the administration of the sacraments, constitutes public worship.

This part of worship is adopted from the Jews, and, like that of the synagogues, was at first restricted to the reading of their sacred books (O.T.). The first record we find of the reading of the N-Test. Scriptures in the churches is in Justin, Apol. i, cap. 67. But the fact of the reading of the Bible in general from the earliest times is clearly established by passages of Tertullian (Apolog. cap. 35; De anima, cap. 9); Cyprian (Ep. 34, 38, edit. Oebri. 84), Origen (Contr. Cel. iii. ch. 3), Tertul. (Ad her. 50), etc. It is self-evident that the canonical books and the homologomena were those most generally read. But that lessons were occasionally read also from the Apocrypha and Antilegomena is shown by the yet remaining lists of libri ecclesiastici and ἀνατεκμηκέντα, i.e. of such books as, although not recognised as authorities in matters of faith, are still permitted to be read in the churches. Other writings, especially acta martyrum, and sermons of some of the most distinguished fathers, came afterwards to be also read to the people. The number of pieces (lectiones) read in each service varied; the author of the Apostolic Constitutions (ii, c. 57) mentions four; two was the minimum—one from the Gospels, the other from the epistles or other books, including those of the O.T. See PROVIDÆ.

At first the portions to be read, at least on festal and ordinary Sunday, were taken in succession in the sacred books (lectio continua), but afterwards special portions were appointed to be read on certain Sundays, and the selection was made by the bishop, until at last a regular system of lessons was contrived, which is the base of the one still used at present in churches in which the strictly liturgical service is adhered to. For feast-days, at first, special lessons were appointed (for instance, the account of the resurrection on Easter: see Augustine, Serm.
Lectisternium (Lat. lectus, a couch, and sternere, to spread), a religious festival ceremony among the ancient Romans. It was celebrated during times of public calamity, when the gods were invited to the entertainments, and their statues taken from their pedestals and laid on couches. The lectisternium, according to Livy (v, 18), was first celebrated in the year 884 (on the occasion of a contagious disease which committed frightful ravages among the cattle), and lasted for eight successive days. On the celebration of this festival enemies were said to forget their animosities, and all prisoners were liberated. — Brande and Cox, Dictionary of Art and Sciences, vol. ii, s. v.

Lector (ἀναγιγμός) or Reader was the name of an officer in the ancient Church whose place it was to read the holy Scriptures and other letters (for instance, the letters of Paul) in public worship, and was also intrusted with the keeping of the sacred volumes. This reading of the Word of God formed an important part in the service of the Jewish synagogues (see Luke iv, 16; Acts xiii, 15, 27; 2 Cor. iii, 14), and was introduced into the Church from the Jews. But we do not know at what period the performance of it became a special office. Yet Tertullian, De praes. car. c. 41, expressly speaks of the lector as a special officer in the Church, and Cyprian (Ep. 38, and edit. Obrert. 34) mentions the ordination of two readers. The early Church councils (Council of Chalcedon, a. 451, c. 13, 14; Toledo, 7, 2; Vienne, ii, 2; Valentia, c. 1: A racasid, i, 18) give directions about the duties of readers. Still, although the most eminent fathers laid great stress on the reading of Scripture in the churches, and Cyprian declares their office one of great honor (Epist. 34), it was yet classes among the ordinis inferiores. This is easily accounted for from the fact that the simple reading, without any exegetical or homiletical explanations (which are not in the province of the reader), was a mere mechanical performance, and in after times often intrusted to children. After the form of the service of the mass was finally settled, the lectors were forbidden to read the pericopes occurring in the mass Missal. They were also thereby excluded from the altar, and suffered to read only at the pulpitum, and finally were obliged to leave to the people the exposition of the formula of absolution, probably because the reader was of lower degree in the hierarchy. Yet in some churches the ordination of readers was a very solemn affair, especially among the Greeks, where it was accompanied by imposition of hands. In the monasteries of the Western Church, the lector was the initials of the name of Jerome as the author of the ancient list of lessons known under the name of "comes," and as the originator of the system in the Western Church.

Such lists, indicating the portions of Scripture to be read in public assemblies on the different days of the year, are named lectionaria (see volumina) or lectionaries (libri); Greek, ἑαυτογγαμωτα, εαυτογγαμωτα, ειδογγαμωτα; they are also called evangeliarum et epistolae; evangelia cum epistulae; comes). In Latin the principal are the "Lecti. Romanum," in Malab., Lect. Gall., and the "comes" of Jerome; the "Calendarii Romanum," (edit. Fronto, Par. 1652); the "Tabula antiquarum lectionum," in Paulii, Ad missa, in Gerbert, Monum. literu, Alem. 1, 409. See Auguschi, Denkwiirdigk. vol. vi; Handb. der chr. Arch. ii, 6; Ranke, Das Kirch. Perspektomena; Palmer, Orig. Lit. i, 10; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. xiv, 8, § 2; Procter, History of Book of Common Prayer, p. 216 sq.; Martinie, De Ant. Eccles. Rit. iv, 5, 1 sqq.; Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, i, 125 sq. See Liturgy.

The reading of the lesson in the early ages of the Church was intrusted to the lector (q. v.). At present, in the English Church, when the number of officiating priests is complete, the epistle is read by the subdeacon and the Gospel by the deacon. See Herzog, Real-Enclop. viii, 206; Blunt, Dict. of Doctr. and Hist. Theol. p. 408 sq. See Lesson. (J. H. W.)

Lectorium. See LECTORS.

Lectors, an order of preachers in the Church of England, distinct from the incumbent or curate, usually chosen by the vestry or chief inhabitants of the parish, and supported either by voluntary contributions or legacies. They preach on the Sunday afternoon or evening, and in some instances on a stated day in the week. The lectors are generally appointed without any interposition of the incumbent, though his consent, as possessor of the freehold of the Church, is necessary before any lecturer can officiate; when such consent has been obtained (but not before), the bishop, if he approve of the nominee, licenses him to the lecture. Where there are lectures founded by the donations of pious persons, the lectors are appointed by the founders, without any interposition or consent of the rector of the church. This is usual with the leave and approbation of the bishop, and after the candidate's subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles and the Act of Uniformity, such as that of lady Moyer at St. Paul's, etc. When the office of lecturer first originated in the English Church it is difficult to determine. It is manifest from the statute (13 and 14 Car. II, c. 4, § 19), commonly known as the Act of Uniformity (1669), that the office was generally recognised in the second half of the 17th century. Even as early as 1689, however, an evening lecture on Fridays was endowed in the London parish of St. Michael Royal, and at about the same time three lecture-sermons were established in St. Michael's, Cornhill—two on Sundays after evening prayers, and a third at the same time on Christmas day. During the Great Rebellion lecturers used their influence and opportunities for the overthrow of the State Church and the monarchy.—Eden, Theol. Dict. s. v.; Back, Theol. Dict. s. v.; Edie, Eccles. Dict. p. 371.

Lectures, Merchants', a lecture set up in Pinne's Hall in the year 1672, by the Presbyterians and Independents, to show their agreement among themselves, as well as to support the doctrines of the Reformation against the prevailing errors of Popery, Socinianism, and infidelity. The principal ministers for learning and popularity were chosen as lecturers, such as Dr. Bates, Dr. Manton, Dr. Owen, Mr. Baxter, Messrs. Collins, Jenkins, Mead, and afterwards Messrs. Abop, Howe, Cole, and others who were encouraged and assisted by some of the principal merchants and tradesmen of the city. Some misunderstanding taking place, the Presbyterians removed to Salter's Hall and the Independents remained at Pinner's Hall, and each party filled up their numbers out of their respective denominations. The lecture is kept up to this day, and is now held at Broad Street meeting every Tuesday morning.

Lectures, Monthly. A lecture preached monthly by the Congregational ministers of London in their different chapels, taken in rotation. These lectures have of late been systematically arranged, so as to form a connected course of one or more years. A value-able volume on the evidences of Revelation, published in 1827, is one of the fruits of these monthly exercises.

Lectures, Morning, certain casuistical lectures, which were preached by some of the most able divines in London. The occasion of these lectures seems to be this: During the troublesome times of Charles I., most of the citizens having some near relation or friend in the army of the Earl of Essex, so many bills were sent up to the pulpit every Lord’s day for their preservation that the minister had neither time to read them nor to recommend their cases to God in prayer; several London divines agreed to set apart given times for this purpose, one half to be spent in prayer, and the other in a suitable exhortation to the people. When the heat of the war was over, it became a casuistical lecture, and was carried on till the restoration of Charles II.

These sermons were afterwards published in several volumes quarto, under the title of the Morning Exercises. The authors were the most eminent preachers of the day; among them was, e.g. archbishop Tillotson. It appears that these lectures were held every morning for one month only, and, from the preface to the volume, dated 1678, that the sermons were afterwards continued to an fortnight. Most of these were delivered at Cripplegate Church, some at St. Giles’s, and a volume against popery in Southwark. Mr. Neale observes that this lecture was afterwards revived in a different form, and continued in his day. It was kept up long after the service of the several places in the summer, a week at each place, but latterly the time was exchanged for the evening.

Lectures, Moyer’s, a course of eight sermons, preached annually, founded by the beneficence of lady Moyer about 1720, who left by will a rich legacy as a foundation for the same. A great number of English writers who were engaged in a variety of ways to validate the doctrine of the Trinity, this opulent and orthodox lady was influenced to think of an institution which should provide for posterity an ample collection of productions in defence of this branch of the Christian faith. The first course of these lectures was preached by Dr. Waterland, on the divinity of Christ. These lectures were discontinued about the middle of the last century.

Lectures, Religious, are discourses or sermons delivered by ministers on any subject in theology. Besides lectures on the Sabbath day, many think proper to preach on week-days; sometimes at five in the morning, before the people go to the daughter or son in the evening, after they have done. In London there is preaching almost every forenoon and evening in the week at some place or other.

Lectures, Warburtonian, a lecture founded by bishop Warburton to prove the truth of revealed religion in general, and the Christian in particular, from the comparison of the prophecies in the Old and New Testament which relate to the Christian Church, especially to the apostasy of papal Rome. To this foundation we owe the admirable discourses of Hurd, Halifax, Begot, Aphorp, and many others.

Lecturn. See Lectern.

Ledge (only in the plural דדנה, דדנא, skelabim), from דדנה, to mortisie together; Sept. ı‘דוייסיוו, Vulg. junctura), prop. joint, e. g. at the corners of a base or pedestal; hence perhaps an ornament overlaying these angles to hide the base time (1 Kings vii, 28, 29). In verses 35, 36, the term thus rendered is different, namely יָד, lit. a hand, i. e. a lateral projection, probably referring to side-borders to the same pedestals. The description is too brief and the terms too vague to allow a more definite idea of these appendages to the bases in question. See Laver.

Ledieu, François, abbé, a French ecclesiastic, noted as a writer, was born at Péronne about the middle of the 17th century. In 1684 he became private secretary of the celebrated French pulpit orator Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, and was by this prelate made canon of the church at Meaux. He died at Paris Oct. 7, 1718. He wrote MémOires et journaux de M. l’abbé Ledieu sur les événements et les ouvrages de Bossuet (Paris, 1856-57; 4 vol. 8vo.), upon which the late Saint-Beuve thus comments: "L’abbé Ledieu n’a pas le dessein de diminuer Bossuet, mais il soulève son illustre maître à une épreuve à laquelle pas une grande figure ne résiste; il note jour par jour à l’époque de la malédicé dernièr et du déclin tous les actes et toutes les paroles de faiblesse qui lui échappent, jusqu’aux plaintes et doléances aux quelles on se laisse aller la nuit quand on se croit seul, et dans cette observation il porte un esprit de petite qui se prononce de plus en plus en avancant, un esprit bas, qui n’est pas moins dangereux que ne le serait une malignité subile." (Moniteur, Mar. 31, 1856). Ledieu also left in MS. Mémoires sur l’Histoire et les Antiquités du diocèse de Meaux. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxx, 262.

Ledru, André Pierre, a French priest and naturalist, was born at Chantayen, Main, January 22, 1761. When quite young he entered the priesthood, and during the Revolution adopted its principles, and was appointed curate at Pré-au-Mans. Later he was employed as botanist in Baudin’s expedition to the Canaries and the Antilles (in 1796). He died July 11, 1825. Ledru wrote several books, for a list of which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxx, 267.

Legwric, Edward, D.D., an Irish antiquary, fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, subsequently vicar of Aghabo, Queens County, Ireland, was born in 1739, and died in 1823. He published The Antiquities of Ireland (1794), a very valuable work. He offended many of his countrymen by denying the truth of the legend of St. Patrick.

Lee, Andrew, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born May 7, 1745 (O. S.), at Lyme, Conn.; graduated at Yale College in 1766; entered the ministry in 1768; was ordained pastor at Lisbon, Conn., Oct. 26, 1768; and died Aug. 25, 1842. He was a member of Yale College corporation in 1807. Dr. Lee published An Inquiry whether it be the Duty of Man to be willing to suffer Damnation for the Divine Glory (1786):—Sermons on various important Subjects (8vo, 1803); and several occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, i. 688.

Lee, Ann, the founder of the sect of Shakers, was born in Manchester, England, Feb. 29, 1737. She was a blacksmith’s daughter, or was called blacksmith by trade, and a sister of general Charles Lee of Revolutionary fame. When yet a young girl she married Abraham Standley, of like trade as her father, and she became the mother of four children, all who died in infancy. When about twenty-two years of age Jane came under the influence of James Wardley, at this time the great exponent of the millenarian doctrines of the Coniamars and French Prophets. These religious fanatics, after enduring much persecution and great suffering in their native country, had sought a refuge in England in 1755. Gradually they spread their views—communicating inspiration, as they thought—finding ready followers, particularly among the Quakers, and one of this number—James Wardley—in 1747 actually formed a separate society, consisting mainly of Quakers, claiming to be led by the Spirit, and indulging in thesounds of religious excesses, similar to those of the Coniamars (q. v.) and French Prophets (q. v.). Wardley claimed to have supernatural visions and revelations, and as both he and his adherents were noted for their bodily agitations, they came to be known as Shaking Quakers. Of this sect Ann Lee, now Mrs. Standley, became one of the leading spirits. From the time of her admission she seems to have been particularly inspired for leadership and action. Naturally of an excitable temper, her experience in the performance of the peculiar religious duties of this society—by them termed "religious exercises"—was most singular and painful. Of a pious nature, she hesitated not to subject herself to all the torments of the flesh. Often in her fits or paroxysms, as she clinched her hands, it is said, the blood would flow from the veins. As a result of her skin's sympathetic perspiration, this her followers believed was a miraculous phenomenon, and they liken it to the "bloody sweat" of our Saviour in the garden. Her flesh wasted away under these exercises, and she became so weak that her friends were obliged to feed her like an infant. Then, again, according to the accounts given by her followers, she would have "intervals of releasement, in which her bodily strength and vigor were sometimes miraculously renewed, and her soul filled with heavenly visions and divine revelations.
All the mortificating exercises which she embraced by herself were accepted not only as evidences of great spiritual fervor, but as proofs of the indwelling of the divine spirit in Ann in an uncommon measure. She rose rapidly in the favor and confidence of her brethren, and we need not wonder that soon she came to have visions and revelations, and that they frequently and gladly "attested" them as manifestations of God to the believers. By the year 1770 she had grown so much in favor among her people that her revelations and visions were looked upon with more than ordinary interest; and when in this year she was set on trial for sedition, and her confession by the secular authorities, her followers claim that the Lord Jesus manifested himself to her in an especial manner, and from this time dates the beginning of that "latter day of glory" in which they are now rejoicing. Immediately after her release from prison she professed supernatural powers in the midst of the little society gathered about her, and she was acknowledged as their spiritual mother in Christ. Ann was thereafter accepted as the only true leader of the Church of Christ—not in the common acceptance of that term, but as the incarnation of infinite wisdom and the "second appearing of Christ," as she was fully as Jesus of Nazareth with the divination of infinite power, or Christ's first appearing, and she now hesitated not to style herself "Ann, the Word," signifying that in her dwelt the Word. Among other things revealed to her at this time was the displeasure of the Almighty against the matrimonial state, and she opened her testimony on the wickedness of marriage.
If nothing else could have provoked the secular powers to put a stop to her fanatic excesses in the garb of religion, her attack on one of the most sacred institutions of the civilized state demanded immediate action, and she was warned, this time in the name of the law. Set free once more, she began to spread her revelations more generally, and actually entered upon an open warfare against "the root of human depravity," as she called the matrimonial act, and the people of Manchecter were so enraged that she was shooed up in a wood house, and was kept there several weeks. Thus harassed and persecuted on English soil, she finally decided to seek quiet and peace on this side of the Atlantic, and in 1773 professed to have a "special revelation" to emigrate to America. Several of her congregation as-certed that this revelation was made to them by the Spirit of God, and she accordingly set out for this country.
She came to America in the ship Maria, Captain Smith, and arrived at New York in May, 1774, having as her com-pagnions her brother, William Lee, James Whitaker, John Hocknell, called elders, and others. In the spring of 1776 she went to Albany, and thence to Niskayuna, now Watervliet, eight miles from Albany. Here she successfully established a congregation, which she called "the Church of Christ's second appearing," formally dissolved her connection with the man to whom she had in her youth given her hand and heart, and became their recognised head. It was not, however, until 1780 that Ann Lee succeeded in gathering about her a very large flock. At the beginning of this year an unusually great religious revival occurred at New Lebanon, and, improving this opportunity, she went prominently before the people, taking an active part in the religious communion. This proved to her cause a fine harvest indeed, and the number of her deluded followers greatly increased, and resulted in the establishment of the new Church of New Lebanon, which she herself was looked upon as the maternal agency upon whose head was subjected, that affected the nerves suddenly and forcibly like the electric fluid, and was followed by tremblings and the complete deprivation of strength. When the good mother had somewhat established her authority with her converts, she was threatened with the gravest sin of following the vain customs of the world, and, having seized them of their ear-rings, necklaces, buckles, and everything which might nourish pride, and having cut off their hair close by their ears, she admitted them into her Church. Thus metamorphosed, they were shamed to be seen by their old acquaintances, and would be induced to continue Shakers to save themselves from further humiliation." But whether it was the success of their unworthy cause, or their religious excesses, or their unwillingness to take the oath of allegiance and allegiance, or the pressure of the state, the Church of Christ, having become obnoxious here also to the secular authorities, and, as in her native country, Ann Lee was subjected to imprisonment, and escaped trial and punishment only by the kind offices of the government of the United States, in the course of which societies were founded at Harvard, Mass., and sundry other places. She had always asserted that she was not liable to the assaults of death, and that, when she left this world, she should ascend in the twinkling of an eye to heaven; but, unluckily for her claim, the "light of God, the second heir of the covenant of promise" and the "Lamb's bride," or, as she styled herself, "the spiritual mother of the new creation, the queen of Mount Zion, the second appearing of Christ," died a natural death at Watervliet, September 8, 1784.

Strange as must ever appear the fanatical excesses of Ann Lee, and her willingness to lead men to acts of deprivacy, to blasphemous religious pretensions, it must be conceded that she was certainly a wonderful woman.
Deprived of all the advantages of education, she nevertheless possessed a remarkable perception of human mind of no common order, succeeded in establishing a religious sect, by which, at present consisting of more than four thousand people, some of them of marked intelligence and superior talents, possessing, in the aggregate, wealth to the amount of more than ten millions of dollars, she is considered as the very Christ—standing in the Church as God himself, and at whose tribunal the world is to be judged. Over this society her influence is spoken of as complete. Her word was a law from which there was no appeal. Obedience then, as of old, was the only lesson she taught, and she learn perfectly—an obedience unquestioned and entire, and all this when the very foundation upon which they rested their faith, namely, her divine mission, was notoriously antagonized by a life accused, and not without some show of truthfulness, as she grievously implore. See H. P. Andrews in the "Ladies' Repository, 1858, p. 646 sq.; Marden (Rev. J. B.), Hist. of Christian Churches and Sects., ii, 820 sq.; Galazy, 1872 (Jan. and April). See Shakers.

Lee, Charles, Presbyterian minister, was born near Paris, Kentucky, Ky., May 12, 1818; was converted while about twenty years of age, and, though hitherto a farmer by employment, he decided at once upon the ministry, entered the college at Hanover, Ind., and, after graduating in 1835, studied theology with the president of his alma mater. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Madison in 1855, and became pastor at Graham, Ind. He died May 27, 1863. "With fair talents, and yet amid many discouragements both in himself and from without, he was still not only a faithful, but a successful pastor. He not only won the respect of his flock, but he gave them the witness of approval in the conversion of many under his ministry." —Wilson, Prob. Hist. Alumnae, 1864, p. 169.

Lee, Chauncey, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Salisbury, Conn., 1783; graduated at Yale College in 1794; entered the ministry June 5, 1798; and was the second minister in Sunderland, Vt., March 15, 1798, where he remained a few years, and in Jan., 1800, became pastor in Colebrook, Conn. This connection he dissolved in 1827, to become pastor at Marlborough, Conn., Nov. 18, 1828, which place he held until Jan. 11, 1837. He died in Hartwick, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1849. Lee published the American Accomplished: an Arithmetic (1797) —The Trial of Virtue: a metrical Version of the Book of Job (1807) —Sermons especially designed for Relaxation (1820) —Letters from Aristarchus to Philemon (1835) and two or three occasional sermons. —Sprague, Amasa ii, 286.

Lee, Edward, an English prelate, was born in Kent in 1482; was educated at Oxford and Cambridge; became chaplain of Henry VIII, and was finally employed by him in several diplomatic missions. In 1529 he was sent to Rome to negotiate for the divorce of the king, and in 1531 was appointed archbishop of York. He opposed the Reform doctrines of Luther, but favored the innovations which Henry VIII made in the Church. Lee died in 1544. He wrote, Apologia adversus quos revocamus calumniae (Louvain, 1520) —Epistola nuncupatoria ad Des. Erasmum (Louvain, 1520) —Annotated Letters also in comitationes Novi Testamenti Erasmii (Bâle, 1520) —Epistola apologetica qua respondet D. Erasmii Epistolis. —Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Lee, Jason, a Methodist Episcopal minister, pioneer missionary to Oregon, was born at Stanstead, Lower Canada, in 1808; labored with the Wesleyan missionaries there until 1833; joined the New England Conference in that year, and was ordained missionary to Oregon. Here he labored nobly, buried two wives, and in 1844 returned to New York to raise funds for the Oregon Institute, for which he was made agent by the New England Conference, but he died at his birthplace, March 12, 1846. When Lee was a boy in New England, it is to his glorious monument for two worlds —Minutes of Conferences, iii, 617. (G. L. T.)

Lee, Jesse, one of the most eminent preachers in the early history of the American Methodist Church, and recognized as the founder of Methodism in New England, was born in Prince George's County, Virginia, March 12, 1758. He received a fair education, was diligently instructed in the Prayer-book and Catechism, and early acquired skill in vocal music, which served him in all his subsequent labors. His early life was moral. I believe I never did anything in my youth that the people generally call wicked, " is the record in his journal. His father was led to a more serious mode of life than prevailed generally in that community chiefly by the influence of Mr. Jarrett, an Episcopal clergyman. Jesse's parents, however, finally, in 1776, joined the church and then a state of grace which he was called "perfect love." " At length I could say, 'I have nothing but the love of Christ in my heart," is his record. In 1777 he removed from his home into the bounds of Boanoke Circuit, North Carolina, where the next year he was appointed a class-leader. He preached his first sermon November 17, 1779, and for a time supplied the preacher's place. In the summer of 1780 he was drafted into the militia to meet the approach of the British army in South Carolina. Excused from bearing arms on account of his religious scruples, he rendered various other services, especially foraging. Soon obtaining a discharge, he was earnestly solicited to enter the itinerant ministry, but shrank from the responsibility, "fearing lest he should injure the work of God. At the tenth Conference, held at Ellis Meeting-house, Sussex County, Virginia, April 17, 1782, Lee was deeply impressed with "the unmitigated, unquenchable love" prevalent among the preachers, notwithstanding the warm difference that had of late existed among the Methodist preachers on the subject of the administration of the sacraments, and at a quarterly meeting in November he was prevailed upon to take charge, together with Mr. Drongeole, of a circuit near Edenton, North Carolina —the Amelia Circuit. At the Ellis Meeting-house Conference, May 6, 1786, he was received on trial. This year he preached with marked success. He writes, "I preached at Mr. Spain's with great liberty. . . . the Spirit of the Lord came upon us, and we were banded in tears." "I preached at Howel's Chapel from Ezek. xxxiii, 11. . . . I saw so clearly that the Lord was willing to bless the people, even while I was speaking, that I began to feel distressed for them. . . . After stopping and weeping for a good time, I began again, but a little while before the crisis of the people overcame me, and I wept with them so that I could not speak. I found that love had tears as well as grief." Under appointment of the Conference, which began at Ellis Preaching-house, Virginia, April 20, 1786, and ended at Baltimore May 28 following (see minute for that year), he labored in different circuits with like success, and was now regarded as an important man in the connection. December 12 he was invited to meet Coke, Whatecoat, and Vasey at the celebrated Christmas Conference of 1784 at Baltimore, where, with the aid of these persons, ordained and sent out for the purpose by Mr. Wesley, the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized. Lee could not attend the Conference from his distant circuit on so short a notice and at that season of the year, but was immediately after requested by bishop Asbury to travel with him in a Southern tour. This was an important event for Lee. He preached with the bishop at Georgetown and Charleston. At Cheraw he met with a merchant who gave him such information of New England as awakened in him an eager desire to transfer his field of labor to that region. At the South Carolina Conference held in Charleston, Carolina April 20, 1785, Lee, in ardent controversy with Cooke, who was still in the country, sought the abrogation of certain stringent rules on slavery adopted in 1784, which required of each member of the society the gradual emancipation of his slaves. His views soon prevailed. He preached, 1786, in Kent Circuit, Maryland; 1787, in Baltimore; 1788, in Flanders Circuit, embracing a portion of New Jersey and New York. Previously to the General Conference of 1786 there were no prescribed limits to the several conferences, but they were held at the discretion of the bishop and at times a number of the preachers being sometimes appointed from different Conferences in the same year. At the Conference held in New York, May 28, 1789, Lee was appointed to Stamford Circuit, in Connecticut, and now began his career in New England, which continued for eleven years. By this time, the natural temperament of its inhabitants, and their previous theological education, was a hard field for the introduction of Methodism, into which —though spread into all the other Atlantic States, far into the West, to Canada and Nova Scotia—it had not a territorial basis, a sort of a mere temporary occupancy. The death of earnest religious interest which succeeded the revivals under Edwards, Whitefield, and Tennant, as well as the prevalent reactionary tendency to rationalism, furnished sufficient demand for the real-ous preaching of the Methodists. They felt themselves called to a mission in which their form of doctrine concerning entire sanctification in this life; but their views on the subject of free will were greatly misunderstood, the Methodist Arminianism being confounded with Pelagianism. "The argument," says John Edwards, "most constantly used against Arminianism in those days, was the tendency to popery or popery (as being a doctrine of salvation by good works). The dominant theology, therefore, gave the Methodist preachers but a cold reception. Lee preached at Norway first in the street, but was subsequently allowed, both in his hand books, the use of the court-house, and sometimes of the meeting-house. Thomas Ware, who heard Lee about this time, writes, "When he stood up in the open air and began to sing, I knew not what it meant. I drew near, however, to listen, and thought the prayer was the best I had ever heard... When he entered upon the subject-matter of his text, it was with such an easy, natural flow of expression, and in such a tone of voice, that I could not refrain from weeping, and many others were affected in the same way. When he was done, and we had an opportunity of expressing our sentiments on the other, we all agreed that such a man had not visited New England since the days of Whitefield." At Stratfield he formed the first class, consisting of three women, September 26, 1787. At Reading, December 28, he formed another class of two. Thus, at the end of seven months' labor, he had secured five classes in five towns, in which the religious labors appears in his journal as follows: "I love to break up new ground, and hunt the lost souls in New England, though it is hard work; but when Christ is with me, hard things are made easy, and rough ways made smooth." After preaching to a large congregation on one occasion, he was, as usual, left to find shelter where he could, and, as he recorded, rode through storm, "my soul transplanted with joy, the snow falling, the wind blowing, prayer ascending, faith increasing, grace descending, heaven smiling, and love abounding." In February, 1788, he received three helpers, Brush, Roberts, and Smith, and formed the New Haven Circuit. He passed through Rhode Island, and appeared in Boston July 9. Boardman and Garretson had been before there, but no permanent fruit remained of their labors. Lee, finding no house opened, preached on the Common to 3000 hearers. Though Lee often returned to the city, no society was formed there till July 13, 1792. He had better success elsewhere, and constantly labored throughout New England in supervision of the work, till the General Conference of 1796. Soon after this date, however, he was called to labors at large with a large work. In the latter part of 1798, he formed an assistant in preaching and in holding Conferences. Thus employed, he revisited the scenes of his former labors in the South, and travelled also through New England. The period of his labors in that section closed in 1800. It had continued for eleven years, amid great difficulties, frequent theological controversies, and no small degree of persecution. The statistical result at this date was 50 preachers and 6000 members. At the General Conference held May 6, 1800, at Baltimore, Lee was nearly elected a bishop, Whatchoat being chosen over him by four votes. The subsequent portion of his life was spent mostly in the South, in earnest and successful labor as pastor and presiding elder. He preferred, says his biographer, the former position. At the Virginia Conference of 1807 his influence defeated, from an opinion of its unconstitutionality, the proposition to call an extraordinary General Conference, in order to elect a bishop in place of bishop Whatchoat, deceased. He had, for like reason, opposed his own ordination as assistant bishop in 1796. In the Virginia Conference of 1808 he advocated a petition to the following General Conference of May, 1809, to establish a Synod of Virginia. Lee was not present at the Richmond Conference. This proposition had been urged by Lee as early as 1792. Such action was taken by the Conference of 1808, and the powers of the General Conference, as the supreme authority of the Church, were defined in a manner which formed the Rules of Order. In the same year Lee made a last visit and journey throughout New England, which was "an humble but exultant religious ovation." In the summer of 1807 he published at Baltimore his History of Methodism in America, which was the first work of the kind. During that year he served at the High School in New London with equal zeal the principle of advancing local preachers to elders' orders. He continued his faithful career as circuit preacher and as chaplain to Congress till 1816. He was present at the funeral services of his veteran collaborator, bishop Asbury, held by the General Conference of 1816 at Baltimore, and did not long survive himself, but died at the age of fifty-eight, Sept. 2, 1816. Dr. Stevens closes his history of the Methodist Episcopal Church with the following characterization of Jesse Lee: "A man of vigorous, though unpolished mind, of rare popular eloquence and tireless energy, he became one of the British Provinces to Florida for thirty-five years, a chief counselor of the Church in its annual and general conferences, the founder of Methodism in New England, . . . he lacked only the episcopal office to give him rank with Asbury and Coke. Asbury early chose him for the great order of bishop. Some other ministers were very likely that he would be elected to it, but his manly independence and firmness of opinion in times of party strife were made the occasion of his defeat." In public services he may fairly be ranked next to Asbury, and as founder and apostle of Methodism he is above any of his official rank. In this respect his historic honor is quite unique; for, though individual men have in several other sections initiated the denomination, no other founder has, so completely as he, introduced, conducted, and concluded his work, and from no other man's similar work have proceeded equal advantages to American Methodism" (ii, 501). The same author, in another place, thus presents his qualities as a preacher: "Pathos was natural to him. Humor seems, in some temperaments, to be the natural counterpart, or, at least, reaction of pathos. Lee became noted for his wit; we shall see it uniting him with a felicitous advantage in his encounters with opponents, especially in the North-eastern States. It flowed in a genial and permanent stream from his large heart, and played most vividly in his severest liturgical hardships; but he was full of tender and affectionate kindness, and far more susceptible of the finer emotional and intellectual pleasures, rather than any remarkable intellectual powers, made him one of the most eloquent and popular preachers of his day. One of his fellow-laborers, a man of excellent judgment, says that he possessed uncommon colloquial powers and a fascinating address; that his readiness at repartee was scarcely equaled, and by the skillful use of this talent he often taught those who were disposed to be witty at his expense that the safest way to deal with him was to be civil. He was fired with missionary zeal, and, moreover, was a man of great moral courage" (i, 418). "It was a kind of fixed principle with him," says his biographer Lee (p. 380), "never to let a congregation go from his preaching entirely unaffected. He would excite them in some way. He would make them weep if he could. If he failed in this, he would essay to alarm them, or to astonish them by the telling of words of great power; and, if all failed, he would shake their sides with some pertinent illustration or anecdote, and then, having moved them, seek, by all the appliances of truth, earnestness, and affection, to guide their stirred-up thoughts and sympathies to the fountains of living waters." Lee, Samuel (1). D.D., a distinguished English Orientalist and Biblical scholar, was born at Longnor, in Shropshire, May 14, 1788; was educated but moder-ately, and apprenticed to a carpenter. His aptitude for learning, however, led him to continue his studies pri- vately, and so, in 1810, he was admitted to the divinity course at Cambridge. He next mastered the Greek, and from that he advanced to Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Samaritan, all of which he acquired by his own unaided efforts before he was twenty-five years of age. By this time he had married, and exchanged his former occupation for that of a scholar. Interestingly, the notice of archdeacon Corbet and Dr. Jon. Scott, he was, by their aid, enabled to add to his other acquisitions a knowledge of Arabic, Persian, and Hindustanee, as well as some European and other tongues. In 1816 he accepted an engagement with the Church Missionary Society, and became a student of Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.A. in 1817. At this time he edited portions of the Scriptures, and of the Prayer-book, in several Ori-ental languages. In 1818 he took orders, and preached at Shrewsbury, still carrying on his Oriental studies; at this time he is said to have had the mastery over eighteen languages. In 1819 he was honored, as his talents certainly deserved, with the professorship of Arabic, and in 1834 he was made regius professor of Hebrew at Cambridge University, besides receiving some pieces of land in Church prebends. In 1840, he became Poet of the University of Halle, and then from that of Cambridge. Shortly before his death, Dec. 16, 1852, he was made rec- tor of Barley, in Somersetshire, where he died. Besides the editions of the Scriptures which he carried through the press, he published several valuable linguistic works, of which the following are the most important: A Grammar of the Hebrew Language, compiled from the best authorities, chiefly Oriental, which has passed through several editions:—A Lexicon, Heb., Chald., and Eng. (Lond. 1840): —The Book of the Patriarch Job translated, with Intro- duction and Commentary (Lond. 1837): —An Inquiry into the Nature, Progress, and End of Prophecy (Camb. 1849): —Propogomena in Bib. Polygl. Londin. Minor (Lond. 1828). He also published an edition of the controversy tracts of Martyr and his opponents; edited Sir Wil- liam Jones's Grammar of the Persian Language, with an addition of the Persian grammar and translated and annotated the travels of Ibn-Batuta from the Arabic. A minor work of his, Dissent Unscriptural and Unreasonable, led to a controver-sy with Dr. J. Pye Smith (in 1848; the pamphlet of the same title was published in 1850). Dr. Lee has been recognised not only as a great scholar, but also as the greatest British Orientalist of his day, and his writings bear evident traces of a vigorous, earnest, and independent mind, loving truth, and boldly pursuing it. See Lond. Genl. Magazine, 1835, pt. i. 400 sq.; Blackwood's Magazine, xlix. 89 sq.; Kitto, Cyclop. Bib., vol. ii. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii. s. v.

Lee, Samuel (2), a minister of the United Presbyteri-an Church, born at Jericho, Vt., July 20, 1805, was converted at the age of nineteen, and educated at Ver-mont University. He studied theology at Auburn Seminary, and was licensed, and ordained by Oneida Congregational Council Sept. 23, 1834. He spent one year of his ministry at Cazenovia, N. Y., and then went to Northern Ohio, and took charge of the Church in Me-dina, Ohio. Afterwards his labors were divided between the Church in Medina and Streetsburgh, Ohio, where he died Jan. 26, 1886. —Wilson, Proph. Hist. A.S., vol. ii., p. 810.

Lee, Wilson, an early Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Sussex County, Del., in 1761; entered the itinerancy in 1784; labored extensively in the West, mostly in Kentucky, until 1794, when he was appointed to New London, Conn.; to New York in 1795; to Phil-adelphia in 1796-7; in 1807, to Baltimore District in 1807-8; superannuated in 1804, and died in Arundel County, Md., Oct. 11 of the same year. Mr. Lee was one of the most laborious and successful Methodist preachers of his time. He was eminently shrewd and circumspect, and deeply pious. He was a witness of the perfect love of God for many years before he died. He was an excel-lent presiding elder, and an eloquent, argumentative, and often overpowering preacher. His labors in the West were very heroic, and contributed largely to the evan-gelization of Kentucky and Tennessee. —Minutes last session, 1827; St. Johns Memorial of Methodist, ch. xviii; Bangs, Hist. Leech. See HoAR-LEECH.

Leech ("chit", chaste''), from "khit", to enclose, also to grow green; occurs in several places in the Old Testament, where it is variously translated, as grass in 1 Kings xvii, 5; 2 Kings xxiv, 26; Job xii, 15; Psa. xxxix, 2, etc.; Isa. xxv, 10, etc.; Jer. Heb. xxiv, 12; Rom. in Prov. xxv, 25, and in Isa. xxxv, 15; but in Num. x, 5 it is translated "looc", Sept. tr. πίπιον, Vulg. porri. Hebrew scholars state that the word signifies "greens" or "grass" in general; and it is no doubt clear, from the context of most of the above The Romans employed it much as a seasoning to their dishes (Horace, Ep. i, 12, 21; Martial, iii, 47, 8), and it is an ingredient in a number of recipes in Apicius referred to by Celsius (Hierobot. ii, 263; comp. Pliny, Hist. Nat. xix, 6; Hiller, Hierophyl. pt. ii, p. 86; Dioscor. ii, 4; Athen. iv, 157, 170). The leek (Allium porrum) was introduced into England about the year 1562, and thence, in due time, into America; and, as is well known, it continues to be esteemed as a seasoning to soups and stews in most civilized countries.

There is, however, another and a very ingenious interpretation of chateir; first proposed by Hengstenberg, and received by Dr. Kitto (Pictorial Bible, Numbr. xi, 5), which adopts a more literal translation of the original word, for, says Kitto, "among the wonders in the natural history of Egypt, it is mentioned by travellers that the common people there eat with special relish a kind of gross similar to clover." Mayer (Risse nach Agrippa, p. 236) says of this plant (whose scientific name is Trigonella Pannum-gracum, belonging to the natural order Lepidumoa) that it is similar to clover, but its leaves more pointed, and that great quantities of it are eaten by the people. Forskål mentions the Trigonella as being grown in the gardens at Cairo; its native name is Halbeh (Flor. Aegypt. p. 81). Sonnini (Voyage, i, 879) says, "In this fertile country the Egyptians themselves eat the fenn-grce so largely that it may be propeties of succulent plants as food, in India zulaif, from sula, "green," as used as a general term for herbs cooked as kitchen vegetables. It is more than probable, therefore, that chateir is here similarly employed, though this does not prove that leeks are intended. Ludolphus, as quoted by Celsius (Hierobot. ii, 264), supposes that it may mean lettuce, or radishes in general, and other that the succory or endive may be the true plant. But Hoffmiller states, "The most ancient Greek and the Chaldean translators unanimously interpret the Hebrew by the Greek ψαρά, or leek." The name, moreover, seems to have been specially applied to leeks from the resemblance of their leaves to grass, and from their being conspicuous for their green color. This is evident from minerals even having been named from ψαραν on account of their color, as prasias, prasites, and chryspannum. The Arabs use the word kiraz, or kirath, as the translation of the ψαραν of the Greeks, and with them it signifies the leek, both at the present day and in their older works. It is curious that of the different kinds described, one is called kirazal-bukli, or leek used as a vegetable. That the leek is esteemed in Egypt we have the testimony of Hasekelquist, who says (Travels, p. 291). The kind called karrat by the Arabs must certainly have been one of those desired by the children of Israel, as it has been cultivated and esteemed from the earliest times to the present time in Egypt." By comparing Judg. iii. 15; xx. 16, with 1 Chron. xii. 2, we may gather that the persons mentioned in the two former texts as "left-handed" were really ambidextertera. In the latter text we learn that the Benjamites who joined David at Ziklag were "mighty men, helpers of the war. They were armed with bows, and could use both the right hand and the left in hurling [slinging] and in shooting arrows out of a bow. There was no part of them; and as they appear to have been all of one family, it might almost seem as if the greater commoness of this power among the Benjamites arose from its being a hereditary peculiarity of certain families in that tribe. It may also partly have been the result of cultivation of the bow, although the left hand is not naturally an equally strong and ready instrument as the right hand, it may doubtless be often rendered such by early and suitable training. See Hand.

Leg is the rendering of several words in the A. V. Usually the Heb. term is מסה, kara' (only in the dual מטה, the lower limb or shank of an animal (Exod. xii. 9; xxix. 17; Lev. i. 9, 18; iv. 11; viii. 21; ix. 14; Amos iii. 12) or a locust (Lev. xi. 21); the πόδιον of a man (John xix. 31, 92, 93), πόδι, πόδι (Chald. מנה, of a man Deut. x. 4), is properly the shin or lower part of the leg, but used of the whole limb, e.g. of a person (Deut. xxvii. 15; Psa. cxxvii. 10; Prov. xxvi. 7; "thigh," Isa. xxiv. 2; in the phrase "hip [q. v. and thigh," Judg. xv. 7; spoken also of the drawers or leggings, Cant. v. 15) also the "beaves shoulder" (q. v. of the sacrificial (Exod. xxix. 25, etc.; Sam. i. 9. 24). Once by an extension of מנה, re'gol (1 Sam. xvii. 6), properly a "foot (as usually rendered). Elsewhere improperly מנה for מנה, shol'el, the train or trailing dress of a female (Isa. xlvii. 2); and מנה, trud'ah, a step-chain for the feet, or perh. bracelet for the wrist (ornament of the leg, Isa. iii. 20). See THIGH.

Goliath's greaves for his legs doubled extended from the knee to the foot (1 Sam. xvii. 6). See GAVRAYS. The bones of the legs of persons crucified were broken to hasten their death (John xix. 31). See CRUCIFIXION.

LEGALISTS. Properly speaking, a legalist is one who "acts according to the law;" but in general the term is made use of to denote one who seeks salvation by works of law (not of the law, but of "law" generally, whether moral or ceremonial, ἡ ἐρωταίαν, Rom. v. 20) instead of the merits of Christ. They are alive to the truth that it is impossible to do anything that can purchase salvation, and who desire that this doctrine should be earnestly and constantly inculcated by Christian ministers in their teaching, conceive that there is a standard also in the opposite direction, that while plain Antinomian teaching would disgust most hearers, there is a kind of doctrine scarcely less mischievous in its consequences, that which only incidentally touches on good works. They think that whatever leads or leaves men, without distinctly rejecting Christian virtue, to feel little anxiety and take little pains about it; anything which, though perhaps not so meant, is liable to be so understood by those who have the wish as to leave them without any feeling of real shame, or mortification, or alarm on account of their own faults or failings, deficiencies, so as to make them anxiously watchful only against seeking salvation by good works, and not at all against seeking salvation without good works—all this (they consider) is likely to be much more acceptable to the corrupt disposition of the natural man than that which urges the necessity of being "saved out of the body, and the soul made perfect by the blood of Jesus, " and "to take such a view of the danger of the case think that Christian teachers should not shrink, through fear of incurring the wrongful imputation of "legalism," from earnestly inculcating the points which the apostles found it necessary to dwell on with withness and frequent repetition. But in general the term is made use of to denote one who expects salvation by... his own works. We may further consider a legalist as one who has no proper conviction of the evil of sin; who, although he pretends to abide by the law, yet has not a just idea of its spirituality and demands. He is ignorant of the great benefits of salvation. Grace is proud of his own fancied righteousness, he submits not to the righteousness of God; he derogates from the honor of Christ by mixing his own works with his; and, in fact, denies the necessity of the work of the Spirit by supposing that he has ability in himself to perform all things which God has required. Such is the character of the legalist, a character diametrically opposite to that of the true Christian, whose sentiment corresponds with that of the apostle, who justly observes, “By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast” (Eph. ii. 8, 9) — Eden, Theol. Dict. s. v.; Buck, Theol. Dict. s. v.; Buchanan, Doctrine of Jusification, Lect. vi, especially p. 158 sq.

Legates and Nuncios of the Roman Catholic Church. With reference to the endeavors of that Church to unite all the congregations into one vast system, and to rule over them successfully, prevailing all heresy and division, the Council of Sardica (343) expressly stated: “Quod si is, qui rogat casuam suam iterum audiri, deprecatione sua moventem episcopum Romanam, ut de laudio suo prepararetur (si est) in potestate ejus,” etc. (Conc. Sard. 7, can. ii. 80). In 367, G makes it plain that the Roman clergy was therefore sent abroad everywhere. In the African churches, however, they refused to admit into fellowship those “qui ad transmarina (concilia) putatevi ret apellantur” (Codex eccles. Afric. c. 125), and wrote to Celestine at Rome, “Ut aliqui tanganum tue sanctitatibus latere mittantur, nulla invenimus patrum synodum constitutum” (ibid. c. 136). Thoburn (Vetus ac nova ecclesiae disciplina, p. 1, lib. ii. cap. 117) has collected instances of delegations having been sent in various cases during the 4th and 5th centuries. But, as vicar of the bishops of Western Europe, the popes tried to bring the bishops of Thessalonica after Damascus (a. 867); in Gaul, the bishops of Arles after Zosimus (a. 417); in Spain, the bishops of Seville after Simplicius (a. 467) (Constant, De antiquis canonum collectionibus, No. 23—25; Gallande, De vetustis canonum collectionibus dissertationi, i. 23 sq.; Petrus de Marca, De concordia aecordiit ac usurpi, lib. v, cap. 19 sq., 30 sq.). Among the delegates of the bishop of Rome we must also put the Apostoliciarii [see APOCRHIALIUS] sent to the imperial court at Constantinople. Leo I, and particularly Gregory I, carefully considered and shaped by higher and greater, and created more, in order to improve the condition of the churches, and to increase the influence of Rome. Gregory appointed bishop Maximus of Syracuse over all the cities of Sicily (“super cunctas ecclesias Sicilies et... vicis ecclesiarum”) (Gregor. VII, Ep. lib. iv, ep. 26). The pope the title of Legatus, and the pope to whom the title was given the title of Legatus. The title became merely a nominal one, the metropolitan not being even entitled to have the cross borne before him where there was a legatus a latere (c. 28, X. De privilege legati, v. 89; Innocent III, in c. 5, Conc. Lateran. a. 1215).

Legati missi or dati. These are divided into, (1) Delegates, appointed for one specific object. It was already forbidden in the Middle Ages to appoint members of the clergy in their place. (2) Nuncio apostolici, who are empowered to receive the commands contained in their mandates. In order to effect this object they were given a right of jurisdiction until the 16th century. To enable them to legislate in reserved cases, they were invested with a mandatum specialis, making the reservations general for them. They could grant indulgences for any period not exceeding a year. All other legates were subject to them except such as had special privileges granted them by the pope. The insignia of the nuncio comprised a red dress, a white horse, and golden spurs. (3) Legati ab a latere. Special delegates of the papacy. They were appointed to the pope, and who possessed all the highest prerogatives. Their plenary power is thus expressed: “Nos nostra, corrigenda sunt corrigat, quae statuenda constituant” (Gregor. VII, Ep. lib. iv, ep. 26). The pope exercit at the jurisdic- diction ordinaria in the provinces, had power to suspend the bishops, and to dispose of all reserved cases. The manifold complaints which arose in the course of time led the popes to alter some points of the system. Leo X, in the Lateran Council of 1515, caused it to be ruled that the cardinal legate should have a settled residence; and he fixed the process by which the legates had prescribed the resolutions of the councils so as to make them very favorable to the bishops.

The Reformation gave occasion for the sending of a large number of legates, and also for the nomination of permanent nuncios. Leo X sent one to the Council of Pisa (1557); Clement VIII, to the Council of Villanova, 1582; Brussel, 1588: this, however, gave rise to fresh disturbances in the Church. The troubles caused by the nuncios were the cause of the adoption of a new article under the gramina nationis Germanicorum. In the mean time the French Revolution broke out, disturbing all preconceived plans. After the restoration of order in the hierarchy the system of legations was revived, but with many modifications, altering its Middle-Age features. The second article of the French Concordat of 1801 states expressly: “Aucun individu se diazanne legat, vicaire ou commissaire apostolique, ou se prévient de toute autre dénomination, ne pourra, sans l’autorisation du gouvernement, exercer sur le sol Français ni ailleurs, aucune fonction relative aux affaires de l’église Gallicane.” This clearly removed the original foundation of the intercourses formerly existing between the papacy and the courts. It has also been a practical aid to the various Roman Catholic governments, such as Austria, France, Spain, etc., reserved to themselves the right to point out the parties who should be accredited to their courts as nuncios (Kléber, Europäisches Völker. § 186, Anm. a.). The formula of the oath of obedience to the pope, which, since Gregory VII, is taken by bishops at their ordination, says: "Legati apostolici sedes. Prima, horti- rificis minister, ille missae scienti, adjuvauit" (c. 4, X. De jurisprud. ii. 24). This involves the duty of supporting the procurations. But the state is also enrolled on account of its power.

The usual envoys of the popes have now the titles of, 1. Legati apostolici, conferred with an inherent right to the management of ecclesiastical affairs. 2. Legati, missi, which are divided into (1) Legati a latere or de latere, who, it is stated, are entitled to be canonically designated as cardinals a latere or legati de latere. This is incorrect, for cardinals are now seldom sent as legati a latere, but, as the contrary, other members of the clergy, cum potestate legati a latere. (2) Nuncios apostolici, bearers of apostolic mandates. While the former are looked upon as ambassadors, it is a nice question whether the latter occupy the second position, that of envoys. They are either ordinary permanent legates, as in Germany, or extraordinary, sent for some special purpose. (3) Intermediarii (residentes), considered by some as forming a third class, by others as belonging to the second. At the Congress of Vienna, 1815, it was decided by the first article of the Règlement sur le rang ecclésiastique that "Ambassadeurs, Legats, Nuncios, and Legates a latere, in article fourth, that no change would be made in regard to papal representatives. See Klüber, Völkerrecht; Heff- ter, Völkerrecht; Mirus, Die Europäische Gesellschaftskriege; Ketteler, Kirchenrecht (Glessen, 1856); W. Walter, Kirchenrecht (11th ed., Bonn, 1894); Herron, Eccl.-Encyclop. viii. 269 sq.; Wetzer und Welte, Kirchen- Lexikon, iv. 409 sq. Legend (Lat. legenda, "things to be read," "lessons") was the name given in early times, in the Roman Cath- olic Church, to a book of the daily lessons which were wont to be read as part of divine service. This name, however, in process of time, was used to designate the lives of saints and martyrs, as well as the collection of such narratives, from the fact that these were read by the monks at matins, and after dinner in the refectories. Among numerous theses of the origin of the le- gendes, the following is the most probable. Before col- leges were established in the monasteries where the schools were held, the professors in rhetoric frequently gave their pupils the life of some saint for a trial of their talent as essayists. From this the popular legends of saints were written at the behest of the religious superiors, the simplicity was not inferior to their devotion, were so delighted with those florid stories that they were induced to make a collection of these miraculous compositions, not imagining that at some distant period they would become matters of faith. Yet, when Jacob de Vor- ragine, Peter de Natallibus, and Peter Ribadehenera wrote the lives of the saints, they sought for their materials in the libraries of the monasteries; and, awakening from the dust these manuscripts of amplification, imagined they made an invaluable present to the world by laying before them these voluminous abridgments. The people received these pious fictions with all imaginable sim- plicity, and, as few were able to read, the books containing them were amply illustrated with cuts which rendered the story intelligible. Many of these legends, the production of monastics, were invented, especially in the Middle Ages, with a view to serve the interests of monasticism, particularly to exalt the character of the monastic orders, and to represent their voluntary austerities as purchasing the peculiar favor of heaven. For this purpose they un- scrupulously ascribed to the patrons and founders of monasteries the power of working miracles on the most trying oc- casions. Many of these miracles are blaspheous paro- dies on those of our blessed Lord; not a few are bor- rowed from the pagan mythology; but some are so ex- quisitely suited that no one but a monarch could have dreamed of imposing such nonsense on the most besotted of mankind. "It would be easy to accumulate proofs of the ready belief which the lower orders of Irish Ro- mainists give to tales of miracles worked by their priests; but it is rendered more certain still that the earlier the earlier Christian ages, the more rarely find supernatural powers attributed to the secular ecclesiastics; the heroes of most of the tales are monks and hermits, whose voluntary poverty seemed to bring them down to a level of sympathy with the lower or- ders. Indignant alms, which have often been demon- strated to be a mere fiction, is, in fact, a prevalent as a secular, with the uninstructed, and hence we find that many of the heroes of the legends are celebrated for the prodigality of their benevolence. The miracles attributed to the Irish saints are even more extravagant than those of the Continental martyrologists. We find St. Patrick performing the miracle of raising the dead to life in less than seventeen times, and on one occasion he restores animation to thirty-four persons at once. Gerald, bish- op of Mayo, however, surpassed St. Patrick, for he not only resuscitated the dead daughter of the king of Con- ombhaire, but also made the dead king live, and it is said that he might inherit the crown of the province, in which the Salic law was then established. We find, also, in the ecclesiastical writers, many miracles specially worked to support individual doctrines, particularly the mystery of transubstantiation. Indeed, a miracle appears to have been without unusual resource of a puzzled controversialist. On one occasion the sanctity of the wafer is stated to have been proved by a mule's kneeling to worship it; at another time a pet lamb kneels down at the elevation of the host; a spider, which St. Francis d'Arienzo acci- dentally swallowed while reciting the sacrament, came out of his thighs; and when St. Elmo was pining at being too long excluded from a participation in the sacramental mysteries, the holy elements were brought to him by a pigeon. But the principal legends devised for the general exaltation of the Romish Church refer to the exercise of power over the devil. In the south of Ireland nothing is more common than to hear of Satan's appearance in proper person, his resistance to all the e- fforts of the Protestant minister, and his prompt obed- ience to the exorcisms of the parish priest. In general, the localities of the stories are not at some remote village; yet, easy as this renders refutation, it is won- derful to find how generally such a tale is credited. From the archives of the Sisilian Church, we find that some German Protestants seem to believe in the exor- cizing powers of the Romish priests. Next to the le- gends of medieval monastics, the stories of the contests of the saints, the most popular, such as that of St. Polyceroun always took up a huge tree on his shoulders when he went to pray; that St. Barnadatus shut himself up in a narrow iron cage; that St. Adhelm exposed himself to the most stimulating temptations, and then defied the devil to make him yield; and that St. Macarius undertook a penance for sin six months, because he had so far yielded to passion as to kill a flea. It is unnecessary to dwell upon these, because they are manifestly derived from the habits of the Oriental fanatics, and are evident exaggerations made without taste or judgment. See History of Pop- erty (Lond. 1888, 3vo).

The most celebrated of these popular medieval fic- tions is the Legenda Aurea, or Golden Legend, origi- nally written in Latin, in the 13th century, by Jacob de Voragine (ca. 1260-1316), a Dominican friar, who afterwards became bishop of Genoa, and died in 1298. This work was the great text-book of legendary lore of the Mid- dle Ages. It was translated into French in the 14th century by Jean de Vigny, and in the 15th into Eng- lish by William Caxton. It has lately been made more accessible to the present generation by the late Father Dore del, traduit de la Latin, par M. G. B. (Par. 1850). There is a copy of the original, with the Gestas Longobardorum appended, in the Harvard College Library, Cambridge, printed at Strasburg in 1496. Longfellow, in a note to his beautiful poem, says, "I have called this poem the Golden Legend, because the story upon which it is founded seems to me to surpass all other legends in beauty and truth. It is found in the Marienleben of the Middle Ages, the virtue of disinterestedness and self-sacrifice, and the power of Faith, Hope, and Charity sufficient for all the exigencies of life and death." The story is told, and perhaps invented, by Hartmann von der Aue, a Minnesinger of the 13th century. The original may be found in the Marhbach's Volksbücker, No. 32. We may mention also, among other productions, the Kaiserschronik (Imperial Chronicle), where the legendary element forms a very important part of the whole, and Werner's veridified Marienleben (Life of Mary), written in 1178, etc. The authors of these works were ecclesiastics, but in the following age, when the mediaval poetry of Germany was in its richest bloom, and the foysters of the poetic art were emperors and princes, the legend was employed by laymen on a grand scale, and formed the subject-matter of epic narratives. Thus Hartmann von der Aue worked up into a poem the religious legends about Gregory; Conrad von Fusselbrunn those concerning the childhood of Jesus; Rudolph von Ems those about Barlaam and Josaphat; and later von Dunzel those about Sir Peter and Sir George. Between the 14th and 16th centuries legends in prose began also to appear, such as Hermann von Frislar's Von dem Heiligen Leben (written about 1348), and gradually supplanted the others.

Much of this legendary rubbish was cleared away by Tillern, Fleury, Bailett, Launni, and Bollusand, but the faith in many of them still remains strong in the more ignorant minds of the Romish Church. The repeated and still continued editions of the Acta Sanctorum (q. v.) afford sufficient evidence of this.

The influence and value of this activity on the subject of the legends is that commenced by the Bollandists in the 17th century, Acta Sanctorum, and still in process of publication. Legends are found not only in the Roman Catholic, but also in the Greek Church. They also found an entrance into the national literature of Christian nations. Among the Germans especially was this the case, particularly in the 12th century, although specimens of legendary poems are not altogether wanting at an earlier period. In Great Britain, also, the legends of King Arthur and his Round Table have sprung anew, after centuries of comparative obscurity, and have once more become the treasure-house from which poet and painter draw subjects for their pictures, and in which essayists, weary of the old heathen classics, seek for illustrations and allusions. The first of the recent poets, however, who clearly apprehended the poetic and spiritual elements of the old Christian legend was Herder, and his example has been followed by other poets, for example, the romantic school in Germany, and Bulwer and Tennyson in England. The tendency to mythic embellishment showed itself more particularly in regard to the Virgin Mary, the object of the men and women. Of all these, the most captivating, as an amiable weakness, was the devotion to the Virgin. The denial of the title "The Mother of God" by Nestorius was that which sounded most offensive to the general ear; it was the intelligible, odious point in his heresy, and contributed, no doubt, to the passionate violence with which that controversy was agitated; and the favorable issue to those who might seem most zealous for the Virgin's glory gave a strong impulse to the worship; for, from that time, the worship of the Virgin became absolutely integral part of Christianity. Among Justinian's splendid edifices arose many churches dedicated to the Mother of God. The feast of the Annunciation was celebrated both under Justin and Justinian. Heraclius had images of the Virgin on his masts when he sailed to Constantinople to overthrow Phocas, and before the end of the century the Virgin is become the tutelar deity of that city, which is saved by her intercession from the Saracens. "The history of Christianity," says deane Milman, "cannot be understood without passing at stated periods to survey the progress and decay of the corruption which, since the birth of the Church, gradually growing up, and springing as it did from natural and universal instincts, took a more perfect and systematic form, and at length, at the height of the Middle Ages, was as much a part of Latin Christianity as the primal truths of the Gospel. This religion gradually moulded toward the Christian Church out of the natural instincts of man, the undying reminiscences of all the older religions—the Jewish, the Pagan, and the Platonist—with the few and indistinct glimpses of the invisible world, and the future state of being in the New Testament, into a vast system, more sublime, perhaps, for its indefiniteness, which, being necessary in that condition of mankind, could not but grow up out of the kindled imagination and religious faith of Christendom. The historian who should presume to condemn such a religion as a vast plan of fraud, or a phalanx which should venture to disintegrate it as a fabric of folly only serving to be forgotten, would be equally unjust, equally blind to its real uses, assuredly ignorant of its importance and its significance in the history of man; for this, the popular Christianity—popular, as comprehending but the first four chapters of the Bible; the real Christianity—the intellectual estimation—turns the whole history of man for many centuries. It is at once the cause and the consequence of the sacerdotal dominion over mankind, the groundwork of authority at which the world trembled, which founded and overthrew kingdoms, bound together or set in antagonistic array nations, classes, ranks, orders of society. Of this, the parent, when the time arrived, of poetry, of art, the Christian historian must watch the growth and mark the gradations by which it gathered into itself the whole activity of the human mind, and through that activity till at length the mind outgrew that which had been so long almost its sole occupation. It endured till faith, with the schoolmen, led into the fathomless depths of metaphysics, began to aspire after higher truths; with the Reformers, attempting to refine religion to its primary spiritual simplicity, this even yet prolific legend of Christianity, which had been the accessory and supplementary Bible, the authoritative and accepted, though often unwritten Gospel of centuries, was gradually dropped, or left but to the humblest and most ignorant, at least to the more imaginative and less practical part of mankind. "But the mind that these legends exerted on the medieval mind," says Harwick, "was deep and universal. While they fed almost every stream of superstition, and excited an unhealthy craving for the marvellous and the romantic, they were nearly always tending, in their moral, to enliven the affections of the reader on the side of gentleness and virtue, more especially by setting forth the necessity of patience, and extolling the heroic energy of faith. One class of these biographies deserve a high amount of credit; they are written by some friend or pupil of their subject; they are natural and holy pictures of the times, and an instructive portrait of the missionary, the reclusse, the bishop, or the man of business; yet most commonly the acts and sufferings of the mediaval saint have no claim to a place in the sphere of history, or at best they have been so wantonly embellished by the fancy of the author that not even a few of the particles of truth from an innumerable mass of fiction. As these 'Lives' were circulated freely in the language of the people, they would constitute important items in the fireside reading of the age; and so warm was the respect, they were felt by every great man, notwithstanding feeble efforts to reform them or at least to eliminate a few of the more monstrous and absurd, they kept their hold on Christendom at large, and are subsisting even now in the creations of the mediaval artists' (Ck. Hist. Middle Ages).
On the origin of these legends there is a great diversity of opinion among the learned. Some trace it to the northern Scyths, who, accompanying the army of Bello in his warlike migrations southward, carried with them the lays of their own mythology, but replaced their pagan heroes by Christian kings and warriors. Salmasius adopted the theory, which was indorsed by Warton, that the germ of romantic fiction originated with the Saracens and Arabianus, and ascribes its introduction into Europe to the effects of the Crusades, or, according to Warton himself, to the Arab conquests in Spain; that from thence they passed into France, and took deepest root in Britain. Others, again, have seen in the tales of chivalry only a new development of the classic legends of Greece and Italy. As Christianity unquestionably borrowed and modified to its own use many of the outward ceremonies of paganism, so they held that the Christian tramps only adopted and transmuted the heroes of classical poetry. The researches of Count Villemarque and lady Charlotte Schreiber, however, to which the attention of the learned world had been directed before by Leyden, Douce, and Sharvon Turner, conclusively prove that the true theory as to their origin is that they are Cymric or Armorican, or both. The wealth of the old Cymric literature in this particular respect was never even suspected until lady Charlotte Schreiber, with the aid of an eminent Welsh scholar, the Rev. Thomas Price, brought to light in their original form, accompanied by an English version, the collection of early Cymric tales known as the Mabinogion. M. de la Villemarque, for his own side of the Channel, not only confirms the evidence of lady Schreiber, but brings forward additional items of proof, from fragments of Breton songs and poems, that the roots of their renowned fiction lie deep in their literature also. Their very form—the eight-syllabled rhyme, in which the French metrical version is written—he claims, and apparently with justice, as Cymric. See Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.; Cyclop. Léger, Antoine (1), a French Protestant divine, was born in Savoy in 1584. He was professor of theology and Oriental languages at Geneva from 1645 until his death in 1661. He edited the Greek text of the New Testament (1658).

Léger, Antoine (2), son of the preceding, was born at Geneva in 1652. He also became a Protestant minister, and afterwards filled the chair of philosophy for twenty-four years at Geneva with eminent success. He died in 1719. He published several scientific treatises and many sermons.

Léger, Jean, a French Protestant minister, was born in Savoy in 1615. He was pastor of a Church of the Waldenses, but fortunately escaped from the massacre of 1655. He afterwards went to France, and solicited the intervention of the court for his countrymen. In 1688 he went to Holland, and became pastor of a Walloon Church in Leyden. He died in 1670. Léger wrote a History of the Churches of the Valleys of Piedmont (1669). See Waldenses.

Le'gion (Lexign, Graecized from the Latin legio), a main division of the Roman army, corresponding nearly to the modern regiment. It always comprised a large body of men, but the number varied so much at different times that there is considerable discrepancy in the statements with reference to it. The legion appears to have originally contained about 8000 men, and to have risen gradually to twice that number, or even more. In and about the time of Christ it seems to have consisted of 6000 men, and this was exclusive of horsemen, who usually formed an additional body amounting to one tenth of the infantry. As all the divisions of the Roman army are noticed in Scripture, we may add that each legion was divided into ten cohorts or battalions, each cohort into three maniples or bands, and each maniple into two centuries or companies of 100 each. This smaller division into centuries or hundreds, from the form in which it is exhibited as a constituent of the larger divisions, clearly shows that 6000 had become at least the formal number of a legion. See Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Army, Roman.

The word legion came to be used to express a great number or multitude (e. g. of angels, Matt. xxvi, 53). Thus the unclean spirit (Mark v, 19; compare 15), when asked his name, answers, "My name is Legion, for we are many." Many illustrations of this use of the word might be cited from the Rabbinical writers, who even apply it (אֶלֶף) to inanimate objects, as when they speak of "a legion of olives," etc. (see Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. et Talm.; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v.)—Kitto.

the remainder of his army. Another account, giving substantially the same version of this event, embellishes it by what seems to have taken place about the year 286, although it mentions a pope Marcellinus as having advised the emperor not to submit to the dictates of the heathen against the dictates of their conscience, while this Marcellinus only became pope ten years after the above time. This second version appears to be but a rearrangement of the legend of Eucherius, just as there have been others until the time of the Reformation (by Petrus Canisius and Gulielmus Baldeus). This legend was first treated as untrue in Magdeburg; then Jean Armand Dubourdieu, a French Reformed minister at London, undertook to prove that the number of the legion did not by any means amount to 6666 (the figures given in the second version). This led to a protracted controversy. The silence of the leading early ecclesiastical historians—Eusebius, Lactantius, Sulpicius Severus, and Orsoius—over the event some have advanced to prove that it is simply a fable, but their silence does not, in our mind, go far to disprove it Eusebius says little of the Western martyrs, yet mentions that an officer picked out the Christians in the Roman army before the beginning of the great persecution, and gave them the choice of renouncing their religion or of leaving the army, adding that many Christians were killed by his orders. The others either do not mention the martyrdom of the Christians or were of a different opinion from that of the Christians themselves, or were prevented from becoming acquainted with much of their history. On the other hand, Ambrose (+397) says, "Every city prides itself that it has had one martyr; how much more, then, can Milan pride herself, who had a whole army of divine soldiers?" Eucherius takes this as an allusion to the Theban legion. Another testimony to the same effect is contained in St. Victorius's work, De laudibus martyrum (380). The third is the discovery of a shield in the bed of the Arve, near Geneva, representing the Thebans, with the inscription "Largus D. M. Valentinianus Aequum," which is found in the life of St. Romanus (393), who mentions, among others, his journey to Aquamin (Cuatra martyrum), probably between the years 460 and 470. It also corroborates Eucherius's figures (6800). The fifth is that of Avitus, archbishop of Vienna, a breastplate originally belonging to whom is yet kept in the convent: this dates from the year 517. A sixth is given in the Vita of Victor of Marseilles. It is most probable, however, that while the legend rests on a foundation of facts, these facts have been generalized and amplified, so that a number of Christian soldiers in the Roman army became a legion first of 6600, then of 6666. Those who deny the truth of the legend take their stand on its similarity with that of a certain Simeon Metaphrastes, according to whom, also, one Mauritius, under the same emperor, is said to have had the same adventure with another Theoderus, Theophorus, Philippus, and sixty-seven others, all of the military order. But, aside from the name of Mauri tius, all the others have different names, while the details of the event also vary. Among the writers who have contested the worthlessness of the legend concerning the Theban legion, the most important are Dubourdieu, Hottinger, Mohynt, and Moshiem; it has been defended by George Hickes, M. Felix de Baltaslar (Defence de la Legion Thebaine, Lucerna, 1763, 8vo), Dom Joseph de Lisle (Defence de la Verite du Martyre de la Legion Thebaine, 1737, 8vo), Rosegnoli (Historia di Som Maurizio), and P. de Rivaz (Etat des Martres de la Legion Thebaine, Paris, 1779, 8vo). LEGION, Thundering (Legio fulminatrix), the title of a Roman legion in the time of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, which, after the expulsion of the Marcomanni and Quadi from Hungary, while the emperor Aurelius was pursuing these German tribes with a detachment of his forces (A.D. 174), was shut up in a valley surrounded on every side by high mountains, and both by the heat of the weather and the want of water was suffering more cruelly than from the attacks of the enemy, when suddenly, in this crisis, a shower of rain reanimated the Roman soldiers, while at the same time a storm of hail, the thunder, and the lightning, as it were, young the enemy, who were then easily repulsed and conquered. Both heathen and Christian authors agree in their relation of the principal circumstances of this event. The adherents of each religion saw it in the influence of the prayers of their brethren. According to Dio Cassius (Ecclesiastica Historia), Lucilius, cap. 8, the miracle was wrought by an Egyptian sorcerer in the train of the emperor; according to Capitolinus (Vita Marci Aurelii, cap. 24), it was the effect of the emperor's prayers; but according to Tertullian (Apologet. cap. 5; Ad Scopul. cap. 4) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. I, iv, cap. 9), it was brought about by the prayers of the Christians in his army; hence the legend to which these Christians belonged was denominated fulminatrix. The letter of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, commonly printed in Greek in the first Apology of Justin Martyr, gives the same account with the Christian writers, but it is spurious. The marble pillar erected at Rome in honor of Marcus Aurelius, and still standing, represents this deliverance of the Roman army—the Roman soldiers catching the falling rain, and a warrior praying for its descent. It is not, however, to be considered as a memorial of any influence exercised by the Christians that the Milan, History of Christians, ii, 145 sq.; Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. Legrand, Antoine, a French writer and monk, born at Douay, lived about 1650-80. He was professor of philosophy and theology in Douay, and was a disciple of the Cartesian philosophy, on which he wrote several treatises. He published A Sacred History from the Creation to the Foundation of the Great (1685), and other works. —Thomas, Biog. Dictionary, s. v.

Legrand, Joachim, a French historian and abbé, born at Saint-Lo in 1653, was a person of great erudition. He was secretary of legation in Spain about 1702, and was afterwards employed in his foreign office. He died in 1738. He published a History of the Decease of Henry VIII of England (1688), and a few other historical works.

Legrand, Louis, a French theologian, was born in Burgundy in 1711, became professor in the seminary of Saint-Sulpice, Paris, and died in 1780. He published, besides other works, a Treatise on the Incarnation of the Word (1711). He composed the censures which the faculty of theology published against Rousseau's Émile (1762) and Boffon's Époques de la Nature (Diedin, 1780). —Thomas, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Legris-Duval, René Michel, a French priest, who was born at Bretagne in 1705, and died in 1816, is noted as a zealous and efficient promoter of benevolent institutions.

Legros, Antoine, a French scholar and writer, who was born in Paris about 1680, and died in 1751, published, besides other works, The Works of the Fathers who lived in the Time of the Apostles, with Notes (1717).

Legros, Nicolas, a French Jansenist theologian, was born at Rheims in 1675. He passed the last twenty-five years of his life in Holland, to which he retired for refuge from persecution. He died in 1721. Among his works are a French translation of the Bible (1729), which is esteemed for fidelity; and a Manual for the Christian (1740).

Le'habim (Heb. Lehābīm, 'lehabim', pr. for lehabim, lubím; Sept. Arabis; F. in Chron. Arab. Volg. Lachm), a people reckoned among the Midianitic stock (Gen. x. 2; I Chron. xii. 11). See Ethnology.
The word is in the plural, and evidently signifies a tribe, doubtless taking the name of Lehi, Moroni's third son (Gen. x. 18). Bochart affirms that the Lehabim are not, as is generally supposed, identical with the Libyans. His reasons are, That Libya was much too large a country to have been peopled by one son of Mizram; and that in other parts of Scripture Libyans is either called Liby, Jer. xxxii. 19 (for Exe. xxx, 6), or Libym, 2 Chron. xxii. 3; Nahum iii. 9, and Phut was a brother, and not a son of Mizram (Gen. x. 6; Bochart, Opera, i. 579). These arguments do not stand the test of historical criticism. Phut and Lubim are not identical (Nahum iii. 9), and the Libyans may have been joined by other tribes in colonizing Libya. It is quite true that there is no direct evidence to identify the Lehabim with the Libyans; yet there seems a high probability that the words are only different forms of the same name—the former being the more ancient, the middle radical H being afterwards softened (as is not unusual in Hebrew, Gesenius, Thesar. p. 743, 360) into a quiescent. The Lehabim are not again mentioned in Scripture, but we find the Lubim connected with Mizram (2 Chron. xii. 8), and the tribes of Ethiopia and Somalia (3 Sam.) may therefore safely infer that the Lehabim were the ancient Lubim or Libyans, who perhaps first settled on the borders of the Nile, among or beside the Mizram; but, as they increased in number, migrated to the wide regions south-west, and occupied the vast territory known to classical geographers as Libya (Kaliouby, etc., see Journ. x. 18; see also Michaelis, Spicileg. Geogr.; Knobel Völkerkunde des Pents.). Dr. Beke maintains that the Lehabim, as well as the Mizram, were a people of north-western Arabia; but his views are opposed alike to the opinions of ancient and modern geographers, and his arguments do not appear of sufficient weight to command acceptance (Origines Biblicae, p. 167, 198 sq.). There can be no doubt that the Lubim are the same as the Reub or Lebû of the Egyptian inscriptions, and that from those Libyans and the Libyans derived their name. These primitive Libyans appear, in the period at which they are mentioned in these two historical sources, that is from the time of Memph, B.C. 1250, to that of Jeremiah's notice of them late in the 6th century B.C. and probably in the case of Daniel's, prophetically to the earlier part of the second century B.C. to have inhabited the northern part of Africa to the borders of Egypt, though latterly driven from the coast by the Greek colonists of the Cyrenaica, as is more fully shown under Libu. Geographically, the position of the Lehabim in the enumeration of the Mizrimates immediately before the Naphath-dairim suggests that they had retired to the westward of Egypt, and nearer to it, or not more distant from it than the tribes or peoples mentioned before them. See Mizram. Historically and ethnologically, the connection of the Reub and Libyans with Egypt and its peoples suggests their kindred origin with the Egyptians. See Liwa.

Lehi (Heb. Lechi, לְחֵि; in pause Lechi, לְכֵי; a dock or jaw-bone (usually with the art. יְרָה; Sept. Arx v. r. Arx), a place in the tribe of Judah where Samson achieved one of his single-handed victories over the Philistines (Judg. xv, 14, 19, in which last passages the Sept. translates σατυρος, Vulg. marrella). It contained an eminence—Ramath-lehi, and a spring of great and lasting repose (see Sir: 2, De fonte Scaronis, Lips. 1760)—en hak-kore (ver. 17). The name of the place before the conflict was evidently Lehi, as appears from verses 9 and 14; perhaps so called from the form of some hill or rock (Gesenius, Thesar. p. 782). After the slaughter of the Philistines, Samson, with a characteristic play upon the name, makes it descriptive of his signal and singular victory. Lehi is possibly mentioned in 2 Sam. xxxiii, 11—the relation of another encounter with the Philistines hardly less disastrous than that of Samson. The Heb. there has רָאָה, as if רָאָה, from the root רָאָה (Gesenius, Thesar. p. 470). In this sense the word very rarely occurs (see A. V. of Ps. lxxvii, 10, 30; lxxvii, 19). It else has the sense of "living, dwelling," the name of wild animals, which is adopted by the Sept. in this place, as remarked above. In ver. 18 it is again rendered "troop." In the parallel narrative of 1 Chron. (x, 13), the word דָּבָר, a "camp," is substituted. In the passage 2 Sam., it is rendered in the A. V. "a troop;" but in 1 Sam. xiii, 17, the root-definition becomes "to live;" which gives a new and certainly an appropriate sense. This reading first appears in Josephus (Ant. vii, 12, 4), who gives it "a place called Siagona"—the jaw—the word which he employs in the story of Samson (Ant. v, 6, 9). It is also given in the Complutensian Sept., and among modern interpreters by Bochart and Lubim; yet there seems a high probability that the words are only different forms of the same name—the former being the more ancient, the middle radical נ afterwards softened (as is not unusual in Hebrew, Gesenius, Thesar. p. 743, 360) into a quiescent. The Lehabim are again mentioned in Scripture, but we find the Lubim connected with Mizram (2 Chron. xii. 8), and the tribes of Ethiopia and Somalia (3 Sam.) may therefore safely infer that the Lehabim were the ancient Lubim or Libyans, who perhaps first settled on the borders of the Nile, among or beside the Mizram; but, as they increased in number, migrated to the wide regions south-west, and occupied the vast territory known to classical geographers as Libya (Kaliouby, etc., see Journ. x. 18; see also Michaelis, Spicileg. Geogr.; Knobel Völkerkunde des Pents.). Dr. Beke maintains that the Lehabim, as well as the Mizram, were a people of north-western Arabia; but his views are opposed alike to the opinions of ancient and modern geographers, and his arguments do not appear of sufficient weight to command acceptance (Origines Biblicae, p. 167, 198 sq.). There can be no doubt that the Lubim are the same as the Reub or Lebû of the Egyptian inscriptions, and that from those Libyans and the Libyans derived their name. These primitive Libyans appear, in the period at which they are mentioned in these two historical sources, that is from the time of Memph, B.C. 1250, to that of Jeremiah's notice of them late in the 6th century B.C. and probably in the case of Daniel's, prophetically to the earlier part of the second century B.C. to have inhabited the northern part of Africa to the borders of Egypt, though latterly driven from the coast by the Greek colonists of the Cyrenaica, as is more fully shown under Libu. Geographically, the position of the Lehabim in the enumeration of the Mizrimates immediately before the Naphath-dairim suggests that they had retired to the westward of Egypt, and nearer to it, or not more distant from it than the tribes or peoples mentioned before them. See Mizram. Historically and ethnologically, the connection of the Reub and Libyans with Egypt and its peoples suggests their kindred origin with the Egyptians. See Liwa.

Lehmann, Christian Abraham, a German theologian, was born at Tittenbock Jan. 4, 1735, and was educated at the University of Wittenberg (1754–98). In 1760 he became deacon, in 1764 pastor at Lockwitz, and in 1766 senior of the district of the Dresden diocese. He died Dec. 30, 1813. He spent his life in practical activity. He was remarkably successful in an attempt to hold prayer-meetings, connected with Bible instruction, thus influencing and affecting the heart in a time when the great majority of the pulpits of Germany were occupied by rationalism. Of the few books he composed, we mention Kunst Entwurf der Glaubenlehre für er- wachsene Kinder, etc. (1772, 8vo; new and enlarged edit., 1797, 8vo).—Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschl. vol. ii, s. v.

Lehnin, Hermann von, a monk of the convent of that name, who has discussed about the history of the 13th century, as the author of a prophetic poem, in 100 Latin hexameter verses, concerning his convent and the house of Brandenburg, entitled Vaticinium Lehni- num. According to the legend, the MS was discovered in an old wall in the 17th century, by the elector; on the latter intended to build a palace on the site of the convent. The poem is written in the interest of the hierarchy; it deploys the heresy of the former house of Brandenburg in the ascendant house of Hohenzollern (the latter family adhering to Protestantism), and prophesies the downfall of the now ruling family, to be followed by the restoration of the unity of Germany and the reestablishment of the Jesuits. (The context of this poem is not, however, to be traced with any certainty further back than the year 1693.) It was first published in Lillienthal (Konigseb. 1723, 1741), then at Berlin and Vienna, 1745; Berlin, 1758; Leipzig, 1807; also in France, in 1827 and 1860, by W. Meinhold, with a metrical translation by Klopstock, 1844; C. Riosch, Stuttgart, 1849; Giebel, Die Lehensweise Weisung (Erfl., 1849); Guhrauer, Die Weisungen u. Lehnen (Bresl., 1850); M. Hefter, Geschichte des Klosters Lehnin (Brandenburg, 1881). Those who consider this poem a mere mystical-ly shaped narrative of past events, namely its author M. F. Seidell, assessor of the privy council († at Berlin in 1689); or Andrew Fromm, counsellor of the consistory († at Prague in 1688); or Nicolas von Zitzewitz, abbott of Huyseburg, who, they say, composed it about 1692; or the Jesuit Frederick Wolf, chaplain to the Austrian embassy at Berlin in 1685-86 († 1708); or Oliven, captain of cavalry at Stettin († 1727). Leibnitz, Gottfried Wilhelm, Baron von—philosopher, theologian, jurist, historian, poet, mathematician, mechanician, naturalist, and votary of all arts and all sciences—was the most brilliant, profound, and versatile scholar of the century following the death of Des Cartes—perhaps of modern times. He is among the few who have earned the honors of all-embracing erudition—ultra progresi seftis est. As the opponent of Spinoza, Bayle, and Locke; as the conciliator of Plato and Aristotle; as the reverential follower of the discredited schoolmen; as the precursor of Kant, and as the vindicator of the "ways of God to man," Leibnitz occupies an equally eminent and important position in the history of philosophical opinion. His metaphysical speculations were, however, but a small portion of his labors. His greatest achievements in nearly all cases were the liberal recreations of his idle hours. He rendered all learning and nearly all knowledge tributary to his genius, and deserved the happy eulogy of Fontenelle, that "he drove all the sciences abreast." He reformed and enlarged old systems of doctrine, he added new parts, and considerably improved the old, he supplied them with keener instruments, he discovered new continents of study, and delineated them for future occupation and culture. Whatever region he visited in the wide circuit of his explorations was quickened into bloom and fruitage beneath his feet.

Life.—Leibnitz was the son of Frederick Leibnitz, professor of ethicus in the University of Leipsic, and was born there on May 14, 1646. He was early placed at school. At six years of age he lost his father from whom he inherited a small fortune and an extensive library. This library inspired, moulded, and furnished forth his career. He buried himself in his young years amidst its volumes, and delighted in the unaided perusal of the ancient classics. His attention was not confined to the great masters of style, nor to linguistic pursuits. He read with like diligence poets, orators, jurists, travellers—works of science, medicine, philosophy, and general information. Nothing came amiss to his inappetible appetite, and his industrious industry. At fifteen he entered the University of Leipsic, and was directed by Jacobus Thomasius to mathematical and philosophical studies. He applied himself assiduously to the writings of Plato and Aristotle, and already, at the age of eighteen, was endeavoring to harmonize and combine their antagonistic systems. One year he spent at the University of Jenus, but he returned to his own city to prosecute his professional studies. Applying for the degree of doctor of law when he had scarcely attained his twentieth year, he was refused the diploma on the pretext of his youth. From the Church of St. Peter, in the diocese of Altstadt, which tendered him a professorship; but this was declined. To this period belong his Ars Combinatoria—a curious adaptation of Raymond Lully's Art of Meditation and Logical Invention—and his Mathematical Demonstration of the Existence of God. His estimate in declining life of the greatness of the universe may be seen from his fourth letter to Remond de Montmort in 1714.

From Altstadt Leibnitz proceeded to Nuremberg, where, in consequence of an application filled with cabalistic terms, unmeaning to himself and to every one else, he was admitted into an association for the pursuit of the philosopher's stone, and was appointed its secretary. Half a century before, Des Cartes had been similarly seduced in the same regions. From these visionary occupations the young alchemist was soon withdrawn by the baron De Boineburg, chancellor of the elector of Mayence, who recommended him to prosecute history and jurisprudence, and invited him to Frankfort, with the promise of preferment. He illustrated his change of abode by publishing Nova methode discendi docenbre jurisprudentiae (1667), in which was appended a Catalogus Declaratorum. The uncomfortable treatment and lack of juridical knowledge led to needed reforms. Leibnitz continued his efforts in this direction by an essay, De Corporis Juris recognoscendo. He contemplated at this time a new and enlarged edition of Alstot's Encyclopaedia, and never abandoned, but never commenced his devotions to the vocation of a lawyer.

Leibnitz came to Boineburg, at whose instance he composed a diplomatic exposition of the claims of Philip William, duke palatine of Neuburg, to the vacant throne of Poland. He declined an invitation to the duke's court, remained at Frankfort, and brought out a new edition of the forgotten work of Marius Nitzius, De Veris Principis et Veras Rationes Philosophic平. He added notes, and prefixed two dissertations; one on The Philosophical Style of Composition, the other On Writing the History of Philosophy. In the latter he treated of Des Cartes, Aristotle, and the schoolmen, and on the mode of harmonizing the Peripatetic with later philosophy. All his writings exhibit pronounced Cartesianism. His first approaches to physical science were made in his Theorin Motus Absci. In 1677 the famous Academici Trinibus per nova argumentum defensae, directed against Wis- sowsatius, a Polish Unitarian. Thus, say the writers in the Biographie Universelle, "each year brought a new title of glory to Leibnitz, and gave him rank among the masters of the different sciences." He was already a counsellor of the chancery of Mayence. At length his desire of seeing Paris was gratified. Boineburg sent him thither as tutor to his sons, and in charge of some public affairs. He was at once admitted into the most brilliant circles of society. He became a favorite of the reign of Louis XIV. Here he made the acquaintance of Huysgens, and improved the calculating machine of Pascal. He was also induced to aid in preparing the Latin classics in usum Delphiini. On the death of Boineburg (1679) he passed to England, where he was received with distinction by Boyle, Oldenburg, and other members of the recent Royal Society. Intelligence of the demise of the elector of Mayence reached him in London. He was thus deprived of the means of support. Flattering proposals had been made to him to return to the Continent, but he had been diverted from them by his father's wishes. In his anxiety and distress, he was appointed by the duke of Brunswick a counsellor, with an adequate pension, and with the privilege of remaining abroad. He returned to Paris, and remained there fifteen months. In 1676 he revisited England, and thence proceeded to Hanover by way of Holland. Here he entered upon his duties as a councillor, and with a new confidence for a man of state!—employed himself in arranging and enlarging the library of his protector, and improving the drainage of his mines. His services were rewarded with a considerable salary, but the duke soon died (1679). He found other employment, for he was never idle, and composed a treatise on The Rights of Ambassadors, arguing the question of States' Rights, which has assumed such prominence in Germany in recent years. The new duke of Brunswick engaged Leibnitz to compose the History of the House of Brunswick. To prepare for the task, he went to Germany, and studied in the leading universities, learned, exploring monasteries, ransacking libraries, examining old charters, deciphering mouldy manuscripts, and transcribing worm-eaten documents. Whatever he undertook he projected on a scale proportionate to his own vast comprehension and various knowledge, with little regard to the legitimate magnitude of the subject, or to the brevity of human life. He brought back from his wanderings an abundant supply of diplomatic materials, which he arranged, and from which he extracted extensive works, sometimes having little direct connection with the theme, others, the close and intimate connections of the events and the men. These collections were the Codex Juris Gentium Diplomaticus, of which the first volume was issued in 1680, in folio; the second in 1700, with the title Missiones Codizæ. Valuable as were the documents, the most valuable part of the work was the Introduction. In the same year, the principium and principles of natural and international law, and sketching the reform of civil jurisprudence ultimately achieved by Napoleon. Other works of wide comprehension were due to these archaeological researches: the demonstration of the descent of the Guepach line from the Italian house of Este; the Annales Historiae (1688, 2 vols. 4to, containing a multitude of unpublished papers), and the Scriptores Rerum Brunensis. The first volume of this historical collection appeared in 1707, folio; the second in 1710; the third in 1711. These extensive accumulations were only materials to be employed for The History of the House of Brunswick. In the Introduction to the Corpus Scriptorum Leibnitz discussed everything connected with the family, the realm, and the country of the Guepach, investigating the traditions of the early tribes that dwelt on the Elbe and the Weser, traces of the migration of the Germanic peoples, the names of the ancient authors in which they were mentioned, and examining their language and the mixture of their dialects. It inaugurated ethnological science and comparative philology. His inquiries, however, stopped short in the Thracians, and mainly about the tribes that inhabited the primitive condition of the abode of the race. This preliminary outline is given in the Protogaea (1683), which founded the modern sciences of geology and physical geography. It is interesting to compare this fragmentary sketch with the Vulgar Errors of Sir Thomas Browne, and to note the immense stride which was made by Leibnitz. Of the main work, to which this essay was to be introductory—the History of the House of Brunswick—only a brief and imperfect outline was ever drawn by the accomplished author. It was published after his death by Ecard, in the Acta Eruditorum, in 1717.

These historical labors were the real task of the life of Leibnitz. But the long years of plodding industry were abundantly filled with other enterprises, and it is to them that his reputation is mainly due. For in his other enterprises—philosophical, mathematical, and scientific—he was a true and skilful discoverer. The Annales Scientiarum et Historiarum—a scientific and philosophical periodical—was established (vol. i, Leipzig, 1682). To this he contributed largely, and in its pages appeared many of his most luminous discoveries and suggestions. In it was published his Meditâtiones De Veritate et Ideâ (1684), proposing his modifications of the Cartesian concept of knowledge. In the same year, and in the same work, he appeared his rules for the Differential Calculus, the germ of which had been indicated in his Theoria Motus Astræi thirty years before. He gave no demonstrations: these were inferred directly. The formulae were promulgated by the Bernoulli brothers. In 1687 the world was enriched by Sir Isaac Newton's Principia Mathematica Philosophica Naturalia, which employed a mathematical device closely analogous to the Calculus of Leibnitz. A bitter controversy in regard to priority of discovery and originality of invention sprung up between the partisans of these great mathematicians. It is scarcely yet terminated. The rigorous and repeated examination of the question justifies the conclusion that both had independently discovered corresponding procedures.

The conception of dynamical science continually occupied the mind of Leibnitz, and was the natural tendency of his philosophical method. The Acta Eruditorum for 1683 contained his Specimen Dynamicum; and the following year, 1684, appeared his great essay—Principes et Principia of the Systema Naturæ, his Systema Naturæ et Communicatio Substantiarum, tenuique Unio inter Corpus et Animam intercedente. In the latter he propounded his celebrated dogma of Pre-established Harmony. The connection between mind and body, between force and matter, between the nature naturae and the nature naturata, is still an insoluble enigma, after all the speculations of transcendental philosophy, and all the researches of modern philosophy and modern chemistry. We still grope for life in the dust and ashes of death. The veil of Isis has not been raised. Spencer, and Huxley, and Tyndall, and à la genæ omne, are compelled to acknowledge their inability to penetrate the mystery of the connection. However untenable, however hazardous, however absurd, the Pre-established Harmony of Leibnitz may be, it was a beautiful dream, generated in some sort by the atmosphere of the time having the characteristics of an ingenious attempt to escape from the brutal mechanism of Des Cartes, the pantheism of Spinoza, the puppetry of Malebranche, and the materialism of the Sensationalists.

The doctrine was illustrated, explained, and expanded in the Theses Philosophicae, and in many other works. So much, indeed, of the philosophy of Leibnitz was communicated only by occasional papers and correspondence, so little by systematic works, that it is impossible to trace the course and development of his views in any brief notice. His two formal metaphysical works belong to the last period of his life. The Nouveau Esprit, in reply to Locke, answering the English philosopher chapter by chapter, and section by section, were completed in 1704, but were not published for more than half a century. They were withheld from the press in consequence of Locke's death in that year, and were first published by Rospé in 1763. The Théodicée, which was designed as a refutation of Bayle, and was undertaken at the request of the queen of Prussia, was completed two years after the death of that princess and of Bayle, but was not published till 1710, six years before Leibnitz's own death. Like the Nouveau Esprit, the Théodicée was composed in French, of which language Leibnitz was a perfect master. It is exquisitely written, and is the finest specimen of philosophical literature since the Dialogues of Plato. A very large portion of the metaphysical and physical writings of Leibnitz have been transmitted to us only by the voluminous correspondence of the philosopher.
treatises, his philosophical and scientific labors were multititudinous and multifarious. He was a diligent and laborious man in his mind ranged with equal rapidity and splendor over the whole domain of knowledge. Nothing was too vast for his comprehension, too dark for his penetration, too humble for his notice. He corresponded with Pelisson on the conciliation and union of the Protestant and Catholic Churches, and transferred the society he had formed in the court of Louis XIV, which had been established in Paris, to bringt in connection with Bossuet. With Burnet he discussed the project of uniting the Anglicans and the Continental Protestants. He expended much time over the invention of a universal language. He wrote extensively on etymology, and the improvement of ciphers and languages. He was moreover a prolific author, and his books were severely employed. Medicine, botany, and other branches of natural history attracted his earnest regards. He addressed a memoir to Louis XIV on the Conquest and Colonization of Egypt, with the view to establishing a Supremacy over Europe.
The age of chivalry and the Crusades was not over with him. He certainly pointed out the road to Napoleon.
He was deeply interested in the accounts of the Chinese, and in the Jesuit missions for their conversion.
He wrote much upon the philosophia sinensis, in accord-crance with the delusions of the age, he engaged in an arduous controversy with Samuel Clarke, in which the highest and most abstruse riddles of metaphysics were discussed. From his historical researches he drew the materials for an instructive essay, De Origine Francorum (1710); and so various was the range of to his mind that he was able to assume the attitude of attention to the political position and rights of English freeholders. His mind, like the sun, surveyed all things, and brightened all that it shone upon. This enumeration of his inquiries gives a very imperfect view of either the number or the variety of his productions. The cataologue of his writings fills thirty-three pages in the 4th dition of his works by Dutens.
The literary fecundity of Leibnitz was equalled by his activity in promoting the practical interests of intelligence. His correspondence linked together the scholars of all countries, furnished a bond of connection be-teen all learning and science, and created for the first time a universal republic of letters. He thus communicated an impulse to the dissemination of knowledge not less potent than that given by Bacon's New Atlantis, and by the institution of the Royal Society of England.
Of this society he was for many years the president, and the chief of the foreign associates of the Academy of Sciences of France. He suggested to the first king of Prussia the foundation of the Royal Academy of Berlin, aided in its establishment, and became its first president.
The society was at first very active, and Leibnitz was like institution, but the project was frustrated by the wars in Poland, for his zeal for liberal studies was contemporaneous with the conquering campaigns of Charles XII of Sweden. When the Berlin Academy was endangered by the death of its royal founder, Leibnitz thought to open a new home for learning by establishing a similar society at Vienna (1713). The design was not carried into effect. The exhaustion of the finances by the War of the Spanish Succession, which was scarcely cleared, was unfavorable to the scheme. Leibnitz was warmly received, was encouraged by prince Eugene, was created a baron of the empire, and was appointed aulic counsellor, with a salary of 2000 florins. Two years previously he had been consulted at Torgau, in regard to the civilization of Russia, by Peter the Great, who had made him a coun-seller of the Russian empire, and had conceded a handsome pension to him. All the while he retained his histoigrapher of Brunswick. It is reported that the elector of Brunswick was much dissatisfied with the slow progress of the history of his house. When the elector became king of England (1714), Leibnitz hastened from Vienna to pay his respects to the monarch, but his new majesty had departed for his new dominions. He met the sovereign, however, on his return to his paternal domain. The years of Leibnitz were now drawing to an end. He suffered from acute rheumatism and other painful disorners. Having much acquaintance with medicine, he tried novel remedies upon himself, with no good result.
He prolonged his studies almost to his last days, and died tranquilly, with scarcely a word, on Nov. 14, 1716, reaching the age of "three score and ten years."
His monument at the gates of Hanover, erected by king Georges, is celebrated. Leibnitz was then forty years old.

Leibnitz was of medium height, and slender. He had a large head, black hair, which soon left him bald, and small eyes. He was very short-sighted, but his vision was otherwise sound to the end of his days. His contribution was remarkable. He had reached old age without serious malady, notwithstanding the strain to which it was subjected. He drank moderately, but ate much, especially at supper, and immediately after this heavy meal retired to rest. He was wholly irregular in eating. He took his food wherever he was hungry, usually in his library, without abandoning his books. Frequently he took his only repose in his chair, and occasionally pursued his reflections or researches, without change of place, for weeks—Fontenelle says for months. He read everything—good books and bad books, masterpieces as well as trash. He tracted largely from the authors perused, and made copious annotations upon them. His memory was so tenacious that he rarely recurred to these Adversaria.
He sought intercourse with men of all occupations and of all grades of intelligence. Every work of God or to man was a little comment of Leibnitz. He деятельly stretched forth his hand to everything—the election of a king of Poland, the revival of the Crusades, the conversion of the heathen, the reunion of the churches, the codification of laws, the history of a dynasty and people, the constitution of the new sciences, the derivation of words, the invention of a calculating machine, the projection of a universal language, the construction of windmills, or the improvement of pleasure carriages. The extent of his correspondence was amazing, and may be conjectured from the list of distinguished correspondents called by Brucker from the simpler catalogues of Feller and Ludovici. The courtesy of his epistles was as notable as their multitude.
They were scattered over all civilized nations, and were on an endless diversity of topics, but they were uniformly marked by deference for the person and opinions of the addressee, as he was a man of an amiable and cheerful nature. It was cultivated and refined by intercourse with princes, and statesmen, and philosophers, and scholars, and also with the humblest classes of society. It was confirmed by his belief that no honor was to be procured without labor; and that no thing was easy and abundant—as full of charm as of instruction. It may be conceded to Gibbon that completeness was sacrificed by Leibnitz to universality of acquire-ment; but, when all his gifts and accomplishments are embraced in one view, he may be justly destined to merit the eulogy of his French editor, Jacques: "In point of speculative philosophy he is the greatest intellect of modern times; and had but two equals, but no superior, in antiquity."

Leibnitz was never married. He contemplated the experiment once, when he was fifty years of age ("de e quo semel tantum in vita, e Gate jam provecto, sed frusta cognitavit"). The lady asked time for reflection. The opportunity for reflection cooled the ardor of the philosopher—the match was not decreed by any pre-established harmony, and the suit was not presented.
The religious view of Leibnitz was orthodox, but he was negligent of the offices of religion. In his efforts to promote Christian unity, and to recognise only "one Lord, one faith, one baptism," he may have felt too keenly the defects of rival creeds, so as to accept from none the truth which he held as the only possible. His words were not always his thoughts.

Philosophy. — The mathematical and scientific, the historical and juridical, the linguistic and miscellaneous speculations of Leibnitz have been noticed very inadequately, but as fully as comports with the design of this Cyclopædia. His philosophy awaits and merits more precise critical censure. It cannot be praised that all his labors, however remote in appearance from philosophical speculation, were inspired and animated by his own peculiar scheme of doctrine, and were really fragmentary applications of his distinctive principles. Hence proceedings toward the organization of a mathematical science manifestly found in all the departments of knowledge handled by him, and which was rewarded by numerous great triumphs in so many and such dissimilar directions. When details are neglected, the whole body of his writings is found to be connected by many lines of interdependence, and indirectly, by many lines of interdependence, and is seen that the system in the general scheme of the Leibnitzian philosophy. Leibnitz nowhere presents a symmetrical exposition of his whole doctrine. His Monodology, or Principia Philosophiae, seu Theses in Gratiam Principiis Ergaestis, furnishes a clue to his system, but it is only a slender clew. Even if the Principia de la Nature et de la Grâce be added as a supplement, the great subject matter is still the very substance of the system, and must be painfully gathered from elaborate treatises, from occasional essays, from scientific papers, from passing hints, from explanations of controverted points, from elusions of obscure or misprinted statements, from implicit arguments in his particular writings. Here a principle is thrown out, there its applications are illustrated; in one place an erroneous conclusion or a mistaken inference is corrected, in another, or in many others, fresh limitations or further expansions of a hypothesis are proposed. These different members of the imperfect whole are scattered over months or years in the life of the author, or by hundreds of pages, or whole volumes in his collected works. It required the patient diligence of Christian Wolff to combine, complete, and organize in cumbrous quartos leaves scattered like the leaves of the Sibyl. Leibnitz had, indeed, no system to propound; he had no thought of promulgating a system or of establishing a sect. Yet his mind was thoroughly systematized. The system which resulted from perfect coherence of thought was latent in his own mind from the beginning, and was consistently evolved as the occasion demanded. The system was spread over the greater part of his several parts. The highest intellect attaches itself instinctively to a principle, and allows accident to determine how far and when its consequences shall be unraveled. Leibnitz only desired to reconcile the opinions of his various predecessors; to correct the errors and to supply the deficiencies which he saw to be in the theory of his chief leader, Des Cartes, and to redress the evils which had flowed logically from those errors. The main design of his profound investigations was to give precision, harmony, and veracity to the immense stock of his own acquisitions and meditations. Had he reached the years of Methuselah he might have proposed a system, but it would have been simply the reiteration of Cartesianism, or the conciliation of Plato and Aristotle, of Buenaventura and Aquinas. It must be remembered that, of his two systematic treatises, one was published towards the close of his life, the other not till half a century after his death. His natural disposition apparently inclined him to accumulate knowledge for its own sake, and to reflect upon his acquisitions for his own satisfaction. He seemed to be impelled to publication only by some accidental stimulus. His whole life was a discipline and preparation for what he never found time to execute—never, perhaps, seriously thought of executing—a vast encyclopedia embracing all that could be known by man. The hints thrown out in his long career, apt as they are for the instruction of a conscientious and contemplative mind, are scattered over the whole globe of speculative knowledge in an undeveloped system, which is revealed by glimmerings as the need or provocation of the moment inspired.

Leibnitz was essentially a Cartesian. He was Cartesian in his method, and Cartesian in his fundamental principles. He never revolted from his great teacher. He pursued the Cartesian mode of analysis and abstraction, he employed the Cartesian procedure by mathematical demonstration, he rejected from presumptive principles, he accepted the Cartesian invicuum of truth; but he rendered them more precise, and was not wholly negligent of experience. He also rehabilitated the Scholastic or Aristotelian logic. He endeavored to combine with the dominant doctrine all that seemed capable of elucidation, all that seemed not false in all the schemes that he rejected. His imagination was too bold and too active to permit him to be the servile follower of any master, and his perspicacity was too acute to overlook the fatal defects of the principles and conclusions of Des Cartes. The main errors to be corrected sprung from the distinction made by the French reformer between mind and matter. According to his theory, the one could not act upon the other. The intelligent and the material universe were thus hopelessly divorced. Mind was pure thought; matter was mere extension; the very substance of the two in the phenomena of existence was due to divine assistance. See Des Cartes. Beasts were machines galvanized into the semblance of voluntary action by the intervention of divine power. Every movement or act of the mind was a mental motion of the mind. All thought, all mental action must be an effusion, an effect, or a manifestation of the one sole Intelligence.

The distinction of minds was an impossibility. To Leibnitz the want of any principium individuationum—that old war-cry of the schoolmen—was apparent. He discussed this topic in a public thesis before he was seventeen (May 30, 1668, Opera, tom. ii, part i, p. 400, ed. Dutens). He ascribed entitativae activity to matter, and a distinct entity to each individual mind. He regarded the human mind as an assemblage of dormant capacities (naturalia), to be called into action by the stimulation of sensations from without, and of promptings from within. He departed so far from the teachings of Des Cartes that he ascribed soul and reason to brutes, and in some sort to all matter also (Leibnizianus, c. Opera, t. vi, part i, p. 315; comp. § clxxxii, p. 331; see Bayle, Dict. Hist. Crit. His own theory, though intended to correct the errors and improve the deficiencies which he found in the theory of his chief leader, Des Cartes, and to redress the evils which had flowed logically from those errors, was the result of the most profound investigations to give precision, harmony, and veracity to the immense stock of his own acquisitions and meditations. LEIBNITZ

The motion attributed to these primordial particles is due to an indwelling force. Thus, from his definition of matter as the union of motion with extension, Leibnitz was led to recognise as the primary units of the universe an infinity of simple elementary substances or forces, which he designated monads. These monads have some of the characteristics of Plato, of Democritus and Epicurus, and also to the Idea of Plato; but, unlike the Epicurean atoms, they are not solidus, though they are eterna. They are not material, but they are the souls of matter. This vaporous dematerialization of matter may be illustrated by Plotinus' definition of matter by the 'subtraction' of the aggregation of all the pro-properties of specific body. Is not the theory of Boesvich, that matter is only an assemblage of points of force, an adaptation of Leibnitz's conception? Has not the theory of Boesvich won admiration and hesitating approval from many distinguished men of science?
The consequences of the rectification of the Cartesian conception of matter do not end here. As the motions or manifestations of force constitute the difference between the several simple substances or monads, when there is no diversity of motion there is no difference of properties, and no distinction of nature. Hence follows another dogma of Leibnitz, the identity of indiscerni-bles. The monads are infinite in number, but they are unlike, and present an infinite diversity of forces. There is also an infinite variety of gradations, from the lowest atoms of matter up through human souls to the supreme monads. In fact, the image of the universe is the mirror of the universe of things; each possesses spontaneous energy or life within itself, and, in consequence of these characteristics, each has its own peculiar kind of reason, passive in matter unorganized, rudimentary in crystals and vegetable existence, unreflecting and instinctive in brutes, self-conscious and introspective in man, and ascending through numberless orders of angelic intelligences. As motion is the principle of quickness ("the ghosts of defunct" terms must be evoked), force is an escential quality of all existence, and is as imperishable as the monad is indestructible, unless both are annihilated by the same Power by which they were created.
Here is another anticipation of recent scientific deductions. As these forces are immutable, their separate spheres of action must be exempt from intrusion. There may be composition of motions, or equilibrium of au-tagomisms, but there can be no interaction or reciprocal influence.
Here presents itself the ancient insoluble enigma, How can bodies act upon other? How can matter be moulded or modified by vital action? How can it be made to bend or be the instrument of the will of God?
How can it be conjoined with spirit in any form of animate existence? Des Cartes so completely con-tradistinguished mind and matter that it was impossibile for mind to act upon matter or matter upon mind—"frustra fero dicere nemo, Leibnitz so completely assimilated material to spiritual existence, giving body to spirit, and spirit to body (Thkod. § 124), that they were indistinguishable except by their properties —the one possessing perception only, the other having operation alone. There could be no intercommunication, no reciprocal influence between them, or between any monads. To cut rather than to lose the intellectual knot, which was only rendered more intricate, Leibnitz proposed an explanation in his Systema Naturae (1688).
It is his celebrated doctrine of Pre-established Harmony.
The monads are forces, sometimes active, sometimes suspended, παθητικός and ἐνεργητικός, governed by their own inherent tendencies, and without power of acting upon each other; but their separate actions are so fore-known on one side, and predetermined on the other, in the moment of creation, that their concurrent evolutions reciprocally correspond, and effectuate all the phenomena of the universe. Mind, therefore, does not cohere matter, nor does one form of matter control another, but the inclination of the will and the disposition of the matter, or the diverse evolutions of different monads, conjoin independently and without connection in the production of one result, in consequence of the preadsaption of all the elementary forces to that particular change, at that particular moment, in that particular composition, and with that particular consequence. Dunavie, which is Leibnitz's name for the escape of one of two clocks so regulated and adjusted as to strike the hours in unison. It may be an illustration; it is scarcely an elucidation of the doctrine. The agreement is only in time and performance: there is no concordance of dissimilar processes. The machinery of Divine Assistance, which Des Cartes used to harmonize the explanation of the phenomena of animal life, was generalized by Leibnitz, applied to the whole order of things, and transferred to the original of all creation. There is thus much more than a poetic symbolism—there is a distinctive philosophical fact involved in his fine expression that "the universe is the knowledge of God." This coordination of concurrences, apt for each occasion, between monadic developments, each of which is determined by its own inherent force, which is will in intelligences and nature in material things, makes the whole machine of the universe self-contained, self-seen and prearranged correspondences. It is the continual evolution of the immeasurable plan entertained by the Creator before the beginning of the ages, and brought into act at the appointed time and in the appointed order, with mathematical precision, though be-Yond this, the task of science and the resource of Leibnitz. Certain fabrics are curiously woven with colors so arranged in the yarn that when the weaving is performed each colour falls with exact propriety into its due place, and contributes accurately to form, to tint, to perfect the completion of the whole. So this is the system of pre-established harmony, "the web of creation is woven in the loom of time," with threads prepared from the beginning to fall into the requisite connections, and to produce a fore-known design. Each concurrent movement arrives at the appropriate time and place in consequence of the whole antecedent series of changes in each case, for nowhere is there any solution of continuity, and he present is always the progeny of the past and the parent of the future. The innumerable lines of evolution contentinuous intercirculate with each other, but never are blended together. It will readily be perceived that the whole intricate phantasmagoria of these unconnected monads is only a grand and beautiful variation of the Cartesian hypothesis, and is neither more valid nor more satisfactory than the fantasy it was designed to supplant.
This doctrine of pre-established harmony is in perfect concert with the intimate intuition of man, how the will of God to man, if it did not necessitate his theological expositions. The Théodicée is the most exquisite, the most brilliant, the most profound, the most learned, and, in some respects, the most satisfactory of all treatises of philosophical theology. Many of its conclusions are either true, or as near the truth as the human intellect can attain in such inquiries. Others are merely conjectural, and are sometimes fantastic, as they lie beyond the domain of possible knowledge. Several of its positions have furnished pretexts for sweeping censures; but in such speculations error is inevitable, and the error opens the way for a host of pernicious and unde-signed heresies. The most notable and characteristic of Leibnitz's theological dogmas, which provoked the malicious wit of Voltaire's Candide, is intimately associated with the explanation of the constitution of monads. This is the theory known as Optimism. Without absolutely asserting that "Whatever is, is best," it alleges that the actual world is the best of all possible worlds, despite of acknowledged evils and defects. This is supposed to be proved, among other evidences, by the Leibnitzian principle of the best of all possible worlds, if any better world had been possible, it is reasonable to suppose that it would have been selected by God in preference to that which He actually created. The acute conceptions, the ingenious arguments, the various illustrations, the abundant analogies by which this thesis is maintained, elaborated, and adorned, can receive here only their merited tribute of admiration. When God looked upon the work of each of the six days of creation, "He saw that it was good." More than this it is not given man to know: "that which is wanting cannot be numbered." But, if all the conceptions, if all the actions occur by divine preadaptation, it must be presumed that this is the best of worlds. There is wonderful coherence in the views of Leibnitz, interrupted and fragmentary as they are their exposition. This dialectical consistency is so perfect, and in its evolution so splendid and imposing; that even the last and highest in the subsequent construction and in its structure, the charm of a dream of the imagination. Nothing approaches it in magnitude but the ideal universe of Plato.

Of course, if this is the best of possible worlds, and if its phenomena are determined by the divine preordination or preorganization, evil, too apparent everywhere, must be merely contingent—a negative characteristic, a monopoly in itself. Leibnitz accordingly regards evil simply as imperfection—the privation of good. God is perfect: anything less than God must be imperfect. All limits are within the God; imperfection is defect of the good—is evil. The evil increases in quality and in degree with each remove from the perfection of the Supreme Existence. Hence, in this best of worlds, the taint of evil is over the whole creation:

All this may be admitted, but it affords only an inadequate explanation. It does not justify the retribution which is merited by all evil: it does not recognize the positive character of evil as the violation of the divine law and order; it hardly permits the notion of such violation. Leibnitz denies the existence of physical evil except as a consequence of moral evil; and moral evil consists in voluntary increase of imperfection, in wilful estrangement from the Supreme Monad. Even thus, no sufficient reason can be assigned for ascribing sin, and for attaching a material or moral penalty to what is the result of a natural and inevitable imperfection. This defect in the system is clearly pointed out by Kant.

The unfathomable immensity of the creation can be but dimly apprehended by the finite and fallible mind of man. The mighty plan and purpose of God cannot be comprehended within the compass of human intelligence. "We see as through a glass darkly." Schemes of the universe framed from broken and darting glimpses become more delusive as they become more systematic. Leibnitz's intuitive principles, abstract analysis, and scholastic reduction were peculiarly apt to produce hallucinations.

Analysis for the discovery of ultimate abstractions; intuition for the acceptance of clear, distinct, and adequate ideas; the principle of contradiction as the test of verity; the principle of the sufficient reason as the canon of actuality—these are the metaphysical principles or postulates of Leibnitz. The resulting philosophy, both in conception and in construction, is exposed to "such tricks as hath strong imagination," and wants firm and assured foundation. It is a complex fantasy, a mathematical romance, a universe of shadows. Still, it is marked by wonderful acuteness, logical coherence, and purity of spirit. It preludes, if it does not anticipate, the main doctrines of Kant, and is the fruitful parent of all the subsequent philosophy of Germany.

This exposition presents the leading tenets, the ideas most celebrated in the philosophy of Leibnitz, but it affords no image of the splendid completeness of the entire theory, in which God is presented as the first beginning and the last end—the Alpha and Omega of the whole order of things in time and out of time. Nor does it do justice to the vigorous thought, the depth, the penetration, the comprehensive intelligence, the keen penetration, the exhaustless learning, the wealth of knowledge, the variety of illustration, the fervent and lofty morality, which give grace, and dignity, and grandeur to the whole and to all its parts. \textit{Edids. quae a me ita censurata retinui.} Fuller information must be sought from his own extensive works, and from the elucidations afforded by the numerous commentators on them.

\textbf{Leidradt}, a noted Roman Catholic prelate, probably a Bavarian, flourished in the 8th century. He was librarian to Charlemagne until 798, when he was made archbishop of Lyons. He was sent soon after by Charlemagne, together with the bishop of Orleans and other prelates, into the southern provinces of France, to suppress by moral means the spreading heresy of Adoptionism, and they succeeded in bringing the chief teacher of this doctrine, Felix, to acknowledge his error before the council held at Aix in 798. In 800 he was again successful with his co-laborers in restoring 20,000 Adoptionists. The zeal which he everywhere displayed appears in a letter written to Charlemagne not long before the latter's death. He writes: "I have done my best to increase the number of those who have established the Psalm service after the model of that observed in your palace, and have erected singing-schools by which the instruction may be continued. I have reading-schools where not only the appointed services are repeated, but where the holy Scriptures in general are studied and explained, and in which are those who understand the spiritual meaning not only of the Gospels, but also of the prophets, the books of Samuel, and the Psalms. I have also, as far as possible transcribed for the churches in Lyons, procured vestments and other necessary appointments for divine service, and have repaired the churches." After Charlemagne's death, in the subscription to whose will the name of Ledre flick appears, he resigned the bishopric and continued the character of Masterlandis, where he died. Neither the year of his death nor of his birth are known. He wrote in a clear and concise style some works which have since been edited. Of special value is a treatise of his on baptism, which was published by Malon (Amser, vol. ii). See Herzog, Real-Encyclop. art. Baluze; Wetzer u. Wetzer, Kirchen-Lex. vol. vi, s. v.

Leifchild, John, D.D., an eminent English Independent minister, was born in 1780 of Methodist parentage, and was brought up, and began to preach among the Methodists; but afterwards embracing Calvinistic opinions, it was impossible for him to continue preaching among them, so he was advising by John Bunting, then the junior preacher in the circuit, to seek other associations. Accordingly, in 1804, he entered Hoxton Academy, but he retained through life a friendly feeling for the friends of his youth, and profited largely by what he learned among them. He died in June, 1863. Without possessing any very extraordinary natural endowments, he attained by faithful, earnest, and diligent labor a most successful and honorable career, and his life is a noble example of what may be effected by the right cultivation of the powers a man possesses within himself. He was remarkable in character, which he cultivated with great fidelity in pastoral attention, powerful in the pulpit, he filled every chapel he occupied, built up every Church he was the pastor of, and, when enfeebled by age, retired from his work laden with honors, and not without very substantial love and gratitude of those whom he had served in the Gospel. One of the deacons of Caverham Chapel states that, during the twenty-three years of his ministry there, more than a hundred persons had been brought to decision and added to the church through his faithful ministry. The catholic spirit of Dr. Leifchild was almost as pronounced in his character as his intense and pervading earnestness. He was well known and well liked by Christians of various denominations, with whom he mingled freely, and whom he loved for his truth's sake. See J. B. Leifchild, John, D.D., Memorials (1878), 1876; Leifchild, Personal Characteristics (Lond, 1860); Leifchild, Metropolitan Pulpit (1839), ii, 152; Pen Pictures of Popular English Preachers (1852), p. 130; Allibone, Dict. of British and Amer. Leigh, Edward, a learned English layman, was born in 1602; and was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He was a member of the Long Parliament, but was expelled on account of his intercession in behalf of the life of King Charles. He was also a member of the Assembly of Divines, and held the office of parlimentary general. He died in 1671. Edward Leigh wrote largely. Of his Greek works, one of the best is Critic Sacra (1689, 4to, and often reprinted). His Latin works, which not only gives the literal sense of every word in the Old and New Testaments, but enriches the definitions with philological and theological notes. It was held in high esteem until supplanted by the more fundamental works of later Hebrew and exegiographers. He also wrote Annotations on the New Testament, in which sound and judicious, and other theological works of considerable value, See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, ii, 1079.

Leigh, Sir Egerton, an English nobleman, who flourished towards the close of the last century, is noted for his pietistic and charitable acts. He was a member of the "London Missionary Society" from its very infancy (1795), as he was, indeed, the friend of every cause connected with the glory of God and the good of souls. "He devoted," says Morison (Fathers and Founders of the London Miss. Soc. p. 584), "much of his time, property, and influence to the spread of evangelical religion both at home and abroad." He was so zealous in the cause of his divine Master as necessarily to merge the baronet in the humble preacher of the cross of Christ.

Leigh, Ezekiel, D.D., an eminient minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Perquimans County, N. C., Nov. 23, 1795, was converted in 1817, joined the Virginia Conference in 1818, was set off with the N. C. Conference in 1836, was a delegate to every conference from 1824 to 1855, and died in Mecklenburg Co., Va., Sept. 18, 1858. He was also a member of the Louisville Convention at the organization of the M. E. Church South, and as one of the founders and first agents of Randolph Macon College, and one of the organizing committee of Woman's Male College, N. C., he rendered long and very important service to the cause of education in the Church. He received a good academical education while young, and throughout his life was a diligent general student. Most of his ministry was spent in the office of presiding elder in Virginia and Carolina. His character was gentle and attractive, and his mind full of lofty ardor for the welfare of Christianity. His influence was wide and controlling for many years. He was an earnest and useful minister of the Gospel, and will long be remembered in Virginia, Kentucky, and Carolina.—Summer's Biograp. Sketches, p. 166. (G. L. T.) Leighlin, Synod of, was held in Campo-Lene, Ireland, near Old Leighlin, A.D. 683, with the purpose of settling the time as to the observance of Easter. A few years before (680), Honorius I addressed an envoiery, postal letter to the Irish clergy on the paschal question; and it is worthy of remark that this was the first notice taken by the bishops of Rome in regard to the Church founded by St. Patrick, and was about 300 years after its commencement. At this period the Irish were divided on the time of keeping Easter, some advoking the Roman practice, others the Irish way of observing the 14th day of the first vernal month (if a Sunday), instead of adopting its celebration on the Sunday following the 14th, and the matter even resulted in a controversy. Laurentius of Canterbury relates that Du-can, an Irish bishop, when in North Britain, declared that he would neither eat, drink, or sleep under the same roof with those who held to the Roman practice. Cummanus, who died in the year 688, is said to have written a treatise upon the subject of Easter, Iona, was greatly troubled about it, and in its investigation he said, "I turned over the holy Scriptures, studied history and all the cycles I could find. I inquired diligently what were the sentiments of the Hebrews, Greeks, Latins, and the Egyptians concerning this solemnity." A debate was sent from this synod, of which most probably Cummanus was one, to ascertain from personal inspection whether, as they had heard in Ireland, other nations kept Easter at the same time that the Romans did. The object of this debate has been greatly perverted by the interest of Romanism. It was not to get a decision from the pope, for this they had had for years, and had not obeyed it; but it was, as before stated, simply to determine for themselves. They remained at Rome or in the East about two years. On their return they reported that all they had seen in Ireland they had seen in Rome—even (cadle corri-ona) than they had heard. But even this report was not decisive, for the Venerable Bede says, "Though the south of Ireland partially conformed, the northern provinces and all Iona adhered to their former practices. This argument was of no consequence, and it was a long time pressed and resisted. In A.D. 664, when Theodore, the Italian archbishop of Canterbury, by order of the pope, came to establish the entire regime of Roman Catholicism in North Britain, the paroch and many other questions were again so fiercely urged that Col- man, during his stay for his health, returned to Ireland. Again, in 1670, when Malcolm Canmore brought Margaret, his Saxon wife, to Scotland, she was shocked to find the faith and public worship of her new subjects so different from the Catholic Church of England. After laboring long to induce her husband to adopt the rites and order of the Saxon Catholics, she had a three days' discussion with the existing clergy and the Culdees of Iona, speaking in Saxon and her husband interpreting in Irish. See Tod, Irish Church, chap. vi; Usber, Brit. Eccles. Antiq. cap. xvii (Works, vi, 492-510).

Leighton, Alexander, a Scottish divine, was born at Edinburgh in 1658. He was professor of moral philosophy in that city for several years prior to 1613, when he removed to London, and obtained a lectureship. For libellous or offensive expressions against the king, queen, and the bishops, in his book called Zion's Plea (1629), he was punished by the Star Chamber with mutilation, the pillory, and long imprisonment. He was released in 1640, and died in 1646. Archbishop Laud was no doubt responsible for the cruel and inhuman treatment of Leighton. See LAUD.

Leighton, Robert, a Scottish prelate, one of the most distinguished preachers and theologians of the 17th century, was born in Edinburgh, or, as others think, in London, in the year 1611. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, took the degree of M.A. in 1631, when he went to the Continent to study, especially in France. Here he resided with some relatives at Douay, and formed the acquaintance of several Roman Catholic students, whose Christian virtues made him a charitable Christian towards all who bore the name of his Master. "Noble, tender, and pious from his earliest years, he shrank from all violence and intolerance; but his intercourse with men whose opinions were so different from his own convinced his reason of the folly and sinfulness of 'thinking too rigidly of doctrine.'" He returned to Scotland in 1641, and was immediately appointed to the parish of Newbattle, near Edinburgh; but as Leighton identified himself with the cause of Charles I when the latter was confined, by the commissioners of the Parliament, in Holmby House, he brought upon his head the displeasure of the Presbyterian Church. Yet when Bishop Burnet, "he soon came to dislike their Covenant, particularly their imposing it, and their fury against all who differed from them. He found they were not capable of large thoughts; theirs were narrow as their tempers were sour; so he grew weary of mixing with them and his heart was pacified. For this change, however, there were serious obstacles in Leighton's case, and it has therefore been a matter of general disapprobation. Certainly the facility with which he fraternized with the party that had inflicted such horrid cruelties on his excellent father, Dr. Alexander Leighton, in 1630, for merely publishing a book in favor of Presbyterianism, cannot be altogether approved." (Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, iv, 463 ss.) In 1652 he resigned his charge, and in the following year was elected principal of the University of Edinburgh, a dignity which he retained for ten years. Earnest, spiritual, and utterly free from all selfish ambition, he labored without ceasing for the welfare of the students. He delivered lectures especially to the students of theology, and occasionally supplied the place of divinity professor. His theological acquirements were so learned that the Scotchmen have been translated into English. For pure Latin, sublime thought, and warm diction, they have never been surpassed, and seldom equalled. In that office Dr. Leighton was truly the ornament and delight of the university, and a blessing to studious youth. After the restoration of Charles II and the re-establishment of the episcopacy in Scotland, Leighton, after much reluctance, accepted the bishopric of Dunblane, a small and poor diocese, and was consecrated at Westminster Dec. 15, 1661. Unfortunately for his health, he was now allied were even more intolerant and unscrupulous than the Presbyterians. The despotism of Sharpe and Laudoulder sickened him. Twice he proceeded to London (in 1665 and 1669) to implore the king to adopt a milder course—on the former of these occasions declaring "that he could not concur in the planting of the Christian religion in such a manner, much less as a form of government." Nothing was really done, though much was promised, and Leighton had to endure the misery of seeing an ecclesiastical system which he believed to be intrinsically the best, perverted to the worst of purposes, and himself the sufferer of the worst of men. In 1670, on the resignation of Dr. Alexander Burnet, he was made, quite against his personal wishes, archbishop of Glasgow, and he finally accepted this great distinction only on the condition that he should be assisted in his attempts to carry out a liberal measure for "the comprehension of the Presbyterianists." But finding, after a time, that his efforts to unite the different parties were all in vain, and that he could not stay the high-handed tyranny of his colleagues, he finally determined to resign the ecclesiastical dignity (in 1678). After a short residence in Edinburgh, he went to live with his sister at Broadhurst, in Sussex, where he spent the rest of his days in a retired manner, devoted chiefly to works of religion. He died at London June 25, 1684. Leighton published nothing during his lifetime. His works include A Preface to the First General Epistle of St. Peter; not a learned exposition by any means, for the writer hardly notices questions of philology at all, but perhaps no more remarkable instance is extant of the power which sympathy with the writer gives in enabling an expositor to bring out and elucidate his meaning. Another able work of his is Prefaces to the Works, of which an edition was published a few years ago by the late professor Scholefield of Cambridge; also some sermons and charges. There is an edition of his work in 4 vols., 8vo, Lond. 1819; but the best edition is that of Pearson (Lond. 1828; N. Y. 1859, 8vo). Another good edition was published in 1871, in 6 vols. 8vo. All of Leighton's writings have received the highest commendations because of the lofty and evangelical spirit that pervades them. They present the truths of Christianity in the spirit of Plato, and it is generally recognized that Leighton's influence is due to Coleridge, whose Aids to Reflection are simply commentaries on the teachings of archbishop Leighton. "Few uninspired writings," says Dr. Doddridge, "are better adapted to mend the world: they continually overflow with the spirit of God. Leipsic, Colloquy of, in 1631. The disputes which occurred in the 16th century, when the two evangelical churches framed their confession of faith, had produced great bitterness between the Lutherans and Calvinists. Attempts at reconciliation had already been made by pious individuals in the 16th century, and still others in the 17th, as, for instance, by the indefatigable Zwingli and Calvin, but with little success. It was the trial which the evangelical churches of Germany underwent during the Thirty Years' War that really first made the two sister confessions forsake their former hostility. They saw that they were both standing on the brink of a precipice, and the ties which bound them to each other were strengthened. Both the authorities and the people now used their utmost efforts to secure, if not unity, yet at least peace and harmony between the two churches. In the early part of 1631, after Gustavus Adolphus, the champion of evangelical liberty, had already come to Germany, the landgrave William of Hesse and the elector Christian William of Brandenburg had decided that the elector General of Saxony at Leipzig, and they proceeded to oppose, by main force if necessary, the carrying out of the Edict of Restitution. The landgrave William had brought with him the professor of theology Crocius and the court preacher Theophilus Neuberger; the elector Christian William was accompanied by the court preacher John Bergius. The theologians of Hesse and Brandenburg invited those of Leipzig to a conference in order to attempt a reconciliation between the evangelical churches, or, at least, to promote a better understanding between them. It was intended that this conference should be of a private character, yet with the hope that the other parts of Germany would follow the example. The Reformed party demanded only that the court preacher Matthias Hoe, of Hohenegg, should, in the discussions abstain from the vehemence which distinguished his writings, and the theologians of Leipzig should not argue against this request, that Hoe was very gentle in conversations. The elector George having sanctioned the plan of a private conference, the meetings commenced, March 3, at the residence of the upper court preacher, and under his presidency, daily, and continued until March 23. On motion of the Reformed party the Conference of Augsburg was taken as a basis, they announcing their willingness to sign it, such as it then was in the Saxon form (published by order of the elector George, in 1629). They also thought that the princes of their different provinces were ready to do the same, without however, undertaking to vouch for it. They stated furthermore that they would neither reject the altered edition of the Colloquy of Worms (in 1650) nor that of Bingenburg (in 1541); they referred to the position taken at the convention of Naumburger in 1651, and by the Saxons in the preface to the Book of Concord. The Conference of Augsburg being thus adopted as a whole, every article was taken up separately and examined. They thus found that both parties fully coincided in the articles v-vii and xii-xviii, while their differences on the articles i and ii were comparatively unimportant. With regard to the iij article, they all agreed as to the interpretation of the words, but the Saxons theologians maintained that not only the divine, but also the human nature of Christ possessed omniscience, omnipotence, etc., in union of the two natures in his personality, and that all the glory which Christ received was only received by his human nature. The Reformed theologians, on the contrary, denied that Christ, as man, was omnipresent, or that in him the human nature had become omniscient and omnipotent. They agreed also in the iijx article, and the Reformed theologians affirmed that they did not believe Christ had come to save all men. They also agreed in the iijxith article, to which they made some addition on the necessity of baptism, and on infant baptism. The xiiith and thirteenth articles, concerning the Eucharist, caused great discussion. March 7. Here they could not agree, the Reformed theologians denying the physical participation in the body and blood of Christ, and asserting a spiritual participation through faith; of unworthy communicants, they asserted that these partook only of simple bread and wine. The Reformed theologians, however, maintained that if it was impossible to agree on this point, it was at least possible for the two parties to bear charitably with each other, and to unite in opposing Romanism. The Saxons, who did not wish to bind themselves by any promises in a private conference, said that this proposition would have to be further considered in the fear of the Lord. After all the remaining articles had been agreed to, they came to the question of election, although this doctrine is not expressly presented in the Confession of Augsburg. Both Lutherans and Reformed agreed in the doctrine that only a part of mankind will be saved, the Reformed theologians basing election on the absolute will of God, and reproduction on the unbelief of man. The Lutherans, on the other hand, considered election as the result of God's predestination of the elect of mankind. It was decided that the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, one to the landgrave of Hesse, and one to the theological faculty of Leipzig. A full account, however, was subsequently published in England, France, Switzerland, Holland, and Sweden. The suspicions of both parties made any decided advance impossible, and resulted finally in greater estrangement of both, and in renewed attacks by the able Lutheran polemic Hoe (q.v.), of which a new and brief account is given in the works of Oehler, see C. Leight, William, D.D., a Scotch divine, was born in 1814 in the town of Hothesay, a famous watering-place on the island of Bute, Scotland, and was educated at the University of Glasgow, which he entered at the age of eighteen, and graduated as master in 1836 with the highest honors in the departments of mathematical and physical science. While a student he also lectured in the University on astronomy and as a result of his studies in this department we have from him a work entitled God's Glory in the Heavens; or, Contributions to Astro-theology, which contains the most recent astronomical discoveries stated with special reference to theological questions. In 1839 he was appointed as a preacher in the Church of Scotland by the Presbytery of Dunbarton. In 1843 he received a presentation to the parish of Monimail. He continued minister of this parish until 1859, when he was selected as principal of Queen's University. He is well known to have been the author of certain articles in which he has most carefully and masterly manner, the views of the late Dr. Warlaw, of Glasgow, on the subject of miracles, are controverted. For several years he conducted a series of investigations on the subject of parthenogenesis and alternate generations, as illustrated by the phenomena of animal and vegetable development in hynemoptery. The results of these researches, which conflicts with that of the German physiologist Siebold in the same field, is given in the Transactions of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and in the Annals of the Botanical Society of Canada. Several separate publications of his also appeared on the subject of education. In 1860 he became principal of Queen's University, and this connection afforded him a seat in the Presbytery of Kingston, and, in consequence, in the synod also. His position also gave him a seat in the senate of the University. In 1866 he was appointed an examiner of that university. He died in 1862. See Appleyard's Amer. Ann. Cyclop. 1864, p. 625.

part of the 14th and the early years of the 15th century. He first comes under our notice as one of the two prelates—the archbishop of Prague being the other—before whom John Huss was to be cited for heresy. His position and influence in Bohemia were such that Stephen Palaet, writing against Huss, dedicated to him his Dialogus Volatarius. As the troubles at Prague increased, he was one of those to whom the archbishop of Prague applied for advice, and his response was in accordance with his notorious stern and unbecoming character. When the Council of Constance in 1414, he was present as a member, and took a leading part in its proceedings. He was the first to denounce the Council practice, recently introduced by Jacobel at Prague, and he was commissioned by the council to take measures for its suppression. His enmity to Huss was signalized by the language used by him in the council, and excited the deep indignation of the friends of the Reformer, who did not hesitate to reprehend his course publicly in severe terms. His persistent energy, however, merited the eulogiums of the council, and by them he was appointed to bear the onerous burden of the Bohemia, in which he attempted to terrify the followers of Huss into submission. The mission, however, proved a failure. The person of the bishop was no longer safe in his own country, and he returned to the council. The first reward of his diligence was his promotion, about A.D. 1416, to the see of Olmutz, in Moravia, the see of Conrad, archbishop of Prague, to the C că limines a short time afterwards, he was promoted to the vacant dignity. This, however, he was not destined to enjoy. The ascendancy of the Călimines must have excluded him from Prague, if not from Bohemia; and perhaps among all the enemies of the Hussites, during the period of their religious wars, there was no one who could have been sooner made the victim of their vengeance than the obnoxious bishop. But as no mention is made of him at a subsequent date, and as he does not appear to have fallen into the hands of the Hussites, we may presume that his life must have closed soon after the dissolution of the Council of Constance. He was eminently a martial prelate, and was known by the sobriquet of “John the Iron.” Notices of him will be found in many histories of his times. See Von der Hartz, Authorities on the Council of Constance; Lenfant, Council of Constance; Gillett, Life and Times of John Huss, vols. i and ii; F. Polacky, Mag. J. Hus Documenta.—Neander, Ch. Hist., v 296 sq. (E. H. G.)

Lejajy, Gui-Michel, a noted French scholar in exegetical theology, was born in Paris at 1588. While at the high school he paid particular attention to the Christology of the New Testament, and in 1615 published a treatise on the Divinity of the Saviour, entitled Le Divin Character of the Son of God. This work was highly esteemed by the Church, and Lejajy was appointed a professor in the Sorbonne. In 1632, and died Aug. 7, 1664. He published a descriptive work on Canada and its native tribes (7 vols., 1640).—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gen., xxx, 518.

Leland, Aaron, a Baptist minister, sixth in descent from Henry Leland, the Puritan ancestor of all the Lelands in America, but in a different line from his more noted contemporary, Rev. John Leland, was born in Hallow, Mass., May 28, 1761. Of a naturally vigorous and inquisitive mind, he grew up with a lively thirst for knowledge, which intelligence than his limited means of early culture would have indicated as probable. He united in 1785 with the Baptist Church in Bellingham, by which Church he was licensed to preach, and subsequently ordained. He was removed to Chester, Vt., where he gathered a small Church, which in thirteen years had become five—in Chester, Andover, Grafton, Wethersfield, and Cavendish. From Chester he visited Jamaica, in the same county, guided through the wilderness by marked trees: these visits resulted in the formation of several churches in that vicinity. He was not only an active and successful minister, but had important civil trusts committed to him by the suffrages of his fellow-citizens. He sat in the state legislature several years; three years he was speaker of the House; four years a member of the council; five years successively lieutenant governor, and nothing but his own conviction of its incompatibility with the duties of his higher calling prevented his election to the governorship of the state. He refused to permit any civil engagements to hinder his usefulness and success as a Christian minister, and he continued to fulfill his calling with great energy, zeal, and success, until worn out with toil. He died Aug. 25, 1838. He was a popular and effective preacher. His commanding form and countenance; his musical and sonorous voice; his ready and fervid, often impassioned utterance; his vigorous intellect and great tenderness of spirit, gave him unusual power over congregations. He was often sought as an orator on public occasions, and called to give counsel in ecclesiastical questions. His zeal was enlisted in the temperance cause, insisting on total abstinence from intoxicating beverages, and in promoting ministerial education and all liberal culture. He was the model of his fellow churchmen, and the leader of his church. He died in his house in Barnet, Vt., aged 84 years.
LELAND, John (2), a Baptist minister, distantly related to Aaron Leland (see above), was born in Grafton, Massachusetts, May 14, 1764, in an age of eighteen he had strong and painful religious impressions; he entered into light and peace gradually, and, after the lapse of several months, was baptized in June, 1774, in Bellingham, and was regularly licensed by the Church. He removed in 1776 to Virginia, where for above fourteen years he was exercised in an itinerant ministry, preaching over all the eastern section of the state, sometimes extending his tours southward into North Carolina, and northward as far as Philadelphia. He was ordained in Virginia, somewhat irregularly, in May, 1784; and again in 1788, with more regard to form and customary usage. His evangelical labors were attended with large success. He baptized seven hundred persons, and gathered churches at Orange and Louisa, one of three hundred and the other of two hundred members. He made the acquaintance of Mr. Madison, with whom he maintained a pleasant correspondence for many years, effectively co-operating with him to secure the ratification by Virginia of the Constitution of the United States. In 1791 he returned to New England, and the year following settled in Cheshire, where he resided till his death. Though acting for a limited period as pastor of the Church in Cheshire, he was always an itinerant, making extensive tours over western Massachusetts, often into the adjacent parts of New York, and into more distant sections of New England; twice visiting Virginia, and, wherever he went, preaching and baptizing—these two items of "the great commission" (Matt. xxvii, 19, 39) being all to which he felt himself called. His last record of baptism was Aug. 17, 1834, when he was over eighty years of age, which brought up the number of baptisms in his ministry to 1524. He still continued to preach, and died in the work at North Adams, Mass., Jan. 14, 1841. He recorded, when at the age of sixty-six, that he had then preached eight thousand sermons, and in order to do it had travelled distances which would tire girdle the globe. His Life and Remains, edited by his daughter, including an autobiography, additional memoirs, and eighty pieces—sermons, tracts, public addresses, and essays—on religious, moral, and political topics—most of which had been printed in pamphlet form during his life, were published not long after his decease, forming a work of great size. See Elders Leland, as he was commonly styled, was in theology a Calvinist of the old school. He was always popular as a preacher and writer, especially among the less-cultivated class. The elements of his success were a strikingly-original, often eccentric cast of thought; a terse, telling expression, abounding in compact, apothegmatic, easily-recallable sentences; a vigorous Saxon-English diction; slightly provincial ("Yankee"); homey illustration, often a spice of humor, and his sermons were never wanting in earnest appeal. These qualities were aided by his tall figure, the compass of his voice, and a peculiar business and effective action. His singular views as to the limits of his ministerial duty, leading him to baptize converts without gathering them into churches, caused his success as an evangelist to leave less durable traces than might otherwise have been looked for. The relations of Church and State in Virginia and in most of New England, during the earlier period of his ministry, led him into a habit of political activity which was sometimes censured by persons unable to appreciate a state of society which had passed away. Two hymns, published anonymously in most hymn-books—one the popular evening hymn, "The Saviour standeth pleading"—are ascribed to his pen, and not improbably the simple melodies in which they are oftenest sung. His productions, consisting of several sermons, essays, and addresses, were published after his death, with a memoir of the author by Miss L. F. Greene (1845, 8vo). See Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpite, vi, 174. (L. E. S.)

Leland, Thomas, D.D., an English divine, was born at Dublin in 1722, and was educated at Trinity College in that city. He became senior fellow of the college, and was made a professor of poetry there in 1763; after the death of Dr. Bray, and of the lord lieutenant of Ireland. He died in 1780. Leland was a profound scholar and a most eloquent preacher. He published the Orations of Demosthenes, Latin version and notes (London, 1754, 2 vols. 12mo), in conjunction with John Stokes—the Orations of John Stokoe,—Demosthenes, in English (1756-61-70, 3 vols. 4to; last ed. 1831, 12mo):—Hist. of the Life and Reign of Philip, King of Macedon (1758, 2 vols. 4to; last ed. 1820, 2 vols. 8vo):—Discertation on the Principles of Human Eloquence, etc. (1764, 4to), edited by bishop Warburton's Discourse on the Doctrine of Grace: answered (anonymously) by Hurd, on behalf of Warburton, in a very pertinent letter. Answer to a letter to him, etc., 1764, 4to. This is a reply to the Hurd. Leland answered for himself, and, in the opinion of all the world, completely demolished his antagonist. See Allibone, Dict. of Br. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

LELONG, Jacques, an eminent French bibliographer, was born at Paris April 19, 1665. In 1677 he was sent by his father to Malta, to be educated as a member of the order of Knights, but not liking the severity with which he was treated, he obtained permission to return to Paris. Here he continued his studies, and, as he had taken the vows of the Order of St. John of Malta, he entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1686. He became successively professor of mathematics in the College of Julii, and afterwards in the seminary of Notre Dame des Vertus, near Paris. Later he was appointed librarian of that institution, and in 1699 was transferred into the same capacity to the library of the Oratory St. Honore, at Paris, one of the richest in that city, especially in Oriental books and MSS. This position he occupied for twenty-two years, rendering the greatest services to the scientific world by his valuable bibliographical researches, and by a threefold catalogue. He died Aug. 17, 1721. His most important work, which is yet highly prized by students, is his Bibliotheca Sacra (Paris, 1709, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. 1723, 2 vols. fol.—this latter ed. is by far the best). Another augmented edition was published after his death by his son, Paul Lelong, a priest of the Oratory (Paris, 1728, 2 vols. fol.). A valuable supplement was afterwards added to it, and the whole work carefully revised, by Chr. Fr. Bomert (Lips. 1709); another enlarged and extended edition was published by A. G. Masch (Halle, 1778-1790, 5 vols. 4to). As a historian, Lelong distinguished himself by his Dictionnaire historique de la France, containing the catalogue of the ouvrages imprimés et manuscrits, qui traitent de l'histoire de ce royaume (Paris, 1719; 2d ed. by Fretout de Fontette, Paris, 1768, 5 vols. fol.). This was to have been followed by notices on the author of these works. Lelong wrote Discours historiques sur les principales editions des Biblia Polygolettes (Paris, 1713):—Supplement à l'histoire des dictionnaires Hébreux de Wolff (Paris, 1707):—Nouvelle méthode des langues Hébraique et Chaldéenne (Paris, 1708), etc. See Dictionnaire, Vol. VI. LEMAISTRE DE SACI (or Saci), Isaac Louis, a noted French Jansenist theologian, a nephew of Antoine Arnauld de Grand, was born in Paris March 29, 1618; was ordained a priest in 1656, and became confessor or principal of the College de la Croix in Paris, about 1657. He was in a controversy with the Jesuits, he was persecuted by the authorities, both civil and ecclesiastical, in 1661, and, after having vainly sought refuge among friends, was confined in the Bastile in 1666. During his imprisonment, which lasted two years, he made a French transla-iation of the Old Testament. He had previously been one of the translators of the New Testament of Mons (1667), which was often reprinted. In consequence of renewed persecution, he left Fort Royal in 1679, seeking peace and quiet at the country seat of a friend of his. The Genevan government, he published several works on several classical works, and of valuable theological treatises; also of Thomas à Kempis’s Imitation. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, xxx, 568; Ste. Beuve, Fort Royal, ii, 1, 2; Kittto, Bibl. Cyclop. s. v. Sacry, de.

Le Mercier, Jacques, a French architect, born at Pontoise about 1600, is noted as the builder of the Church of the Ursulines at Paris, the seat of Cardinal Richelieu about 1685. Le Mercier obtained the title of chief architect to the king. Among other admired works of his are the Church of the Annunziade at Tours, and that of Saint Roch in Paris. He died in 1690.—Thomas, Biog. Dict. p. 1401; Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, xxx, 568.

Lemoine, François, a celebrated French painter of the 18th century, was born at Paris in 1688. He was the pupil of Louis Galloche, early distinguished himself, and in 1718 was elected a member of the Royal Academy of Painting. His great reputation at this time is due mainly to his painting, in oil, of the Transfiguration of Christ on the ring of the Church of the very rich patrons of the chapel of the Virgin in St. Sulpice, in fresco, which he commenced in 1729—a work of three years labor. His masterpiece, however, is the Apotheosis of Hercules, painted in oil on canvas pasted on the ceiling of the Salon d’Hercule at Versailles, commenced in 1732, and finished in 1736. He committed suicide June 4, 1737. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, xxx, 617, English Cyclop. s. v.

L’Empereur, Constantine, a celebrated Dutch Orientalist, was born at Oppyck, in the Netherlands, about 1570. He was professor of Hebrew at Harlewyn until 1627, when he was called to the university of Leyden as professor of Hebrew, and some time after was made professor of theology in that high school. He died in 1648. L’Empereur edited the Commentaries of Aben-Ezra, etc. Aeschyn. on Isa. iii, 19, 20, with notes (Leyden, 1633), and the Paraphrase of Joseph ben-Jachja on Daniel, with translation and notes (Amsterdam, 1633), also the Mishna tract Bab Kama and Middoth (Leyden, 1637, 4to). He wrote himself De Dignitate et Utilitate Hebraeorum (1627, 8vo) —Clara Talmudicon, compeltae formularum, locis dialectico et logico praecordum Judaorum (Leyden, 1634, 4to).—De leg. Hebr. formae, (Leyden, 1637, 4to); and Disputationes theologicae (Leyden, 1648, 8vo). See Kittio, Cyclop. Bibl. Lat. s. v.; Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Gen. xxx, 642; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 245 sq.

Lemprére, John, a distinguished English biographer, was born in Jersey about 1760. He was educated at Winchester and at Pembroke College, Oxford, and subsequently became first head master of Abingdon Grammar-school, and later of the school at Exeter. In 1810 he resigned the latter, and the following year was presented to the living of Meeth and Newton Petrok, in Devonshire, which he retained until his death, Feb. 1, 1824. Lemprére was a man of extensive learning, and thoroughly acquainted with antiquity. His Bibliotheca Classica (1788, 8vo; subsequently reprinted, with additions by himself) is still in general use in the universities. He wrote also a translation of Herodotus, with notes (1792), of which the first volume only was published, and a Universal Biography (1808, 4to and 8vo).

This last work, compiled with great care, has run through several editions. The name of Lemprére was once well known to every English-speaking classical student, but the rising generation is forgetting it, and it will soon become vox et praeterea nihil. A Classical Dictionary (Bibliotheca Classica, 1788) of his was for many years the English standard work of reference on all matters of ancient mythology, biography, and geography. See Davenport, Nour. Biog. Gen., xxx, 648; Chambers, Cyclopædia, s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Lem’uël (Hebrew Lemuel), יְמֻעֵל, Prov. xxxi, 1; Sept. v. Vulg. Lemuel, μειέλλον, Prov. xxxi, 4; Sept. πωλέτα πωλέτα, Vulg. Lemuel), an unknown prince, to whom the admonitory apothegms of Prov. xxxi, 2-9 were originally addressed by his mother. Most interpreters understand Solomon to be the actual author of the book (the name signifying to God, i. e. created by him) or by a pleasing epithet (see Rosenmüller, Scholia ad Prov. p. 746). The Rabbinical commentators identify Lemuel with Solomon, and tell a strange tale that when he married the daughter of Pharaoh, on the day of the dedication of the Temple, he assembled musicians of all kinds, and passed the night awake. On the morrow he slept till the fourth hour, with the keys of the Temple beneath his pillow, when his mother entered, and upbraided him in the words of Prov. xxxi, 2-9. Others (e. g. Grotius) refer it to Haggai, by a parallelism); and others (e. g. Gesenius) think that no Israelite is referred to, but some neighboring petty Arabian prince. On the other hand, according to Eichhorn (Einleitung, t. 1061), Lemuel is altogether an imaginary person (so Ewald; comp. Duhm, 2196 sq.). Prof. Stuart (Comment. on Prov. p. 400 sq.) renders the expression “Lemuel, king of Massa,” and regards him as the brother of Agur, whom he makes to have been likewise a son of the queen of Massa, in the neighborhood of Duham. See Agur; Ithiel. In the reign of Hezekiah, a roving band of Syrian or Arabian ghosts or spirits haunted the mountains of Mount Seir and settled in their stead (1 Chron, iv, 38-43), and from these exiles of Israelitic origin Hitzig conjectures that Lemuel and Agur were descended, the former having been born in the land of Israel; and that the name Lemuel is an older form of Nemuil, the firstborn of Simeon (Die Sprache Salomo’s, p. 810-314). But this interpretation is far-fetched; and none is more likely than that which fixes the epiphany upon Solomon. See Proverbs.

Lemures, the general designation given by the Romans to all spirits of departed persons, of whom the good were honored as Larves (q. v.), and the bad (Larves) were supposed to walk about in the forms of ghosts or spirits of those who had undergone superstitious. The common idea was that the Lemures and Larves were the same, and were said to wander about during the night, seeking for an opportunity of inflicting injury on the living (Horat. Epist. ii, 2, 209; Pers. v, 180). The festival called Lemures was held on the 9th, 11th, and 13th of May, and was accompanied with ceremonies of washing hands, throwing black beans over the head, etc., and the pronunciation nine times of these words: "Begone, you spectres of the house!" which deprived the Lemures of their power to harm. David describes the Larves as the Amalekites in the battle with Saul and the Israelites (1 Sam. 31:2-13). See De Do Doer, p. 237, ed. Bib.; Servius, ad Æn. iii, 63; Varro, op. Nat. p. 135; comp. Lend (represented by several Heb. words which in other forms likewise signify to borrow, e. g. עָלוּ, וָלַחַ, maschah; לֶפַח עַבָּר; Gr. ἔλοικος, χοιλός). Among the Israelites, in the time of Moses, it must have been very common to lend on pledge, in the strict sense, according to the meaning of the word in natural law, which allows the creditor, in case of non-payment, to appropriate the pledge to his own behalf, without any authoritative interference of a magistrate, and to keep it just as rightfully as if it had been bought with the sum which has been lent for it, and which remains unpaid. But while pledges are under no judicial regulation, much extortion and villainy may be practiced, when the poor man who wishes to borrow is in straits, and must of necessity yield a quarter of the principal to the lender. It will not be imputed to Moses as a fault that his statutes contain not those legal refinements, which probably were not then invented, and which even yet may be said rather to be on record in our statute-books than to be in our practice. They would have been dangerous to introduce into a spirit of commerce, and to impress let pledge remain in its proper sense, pledge, and thus facilitate the obtaining of loans, satisfying himself with making laws against some of the chief abuses of pledging (Michaelis, Mos. Recht.). See Pledge. These laws may be found in Exod. xxii, 22; Deut. xxiv, 6, 10-18. By the analogy of these laws, other sorts of pledges equally, if not more indispensable, such as the utensils necessary for agriculture, or the ox and ass used for the plough, must certainly, and with equal, and even greater reason, have been restored. The law in Deut. xxiv, 12, 13, is expressed in such general terms, that we cannot but see that the pledge under which the debtor must sleep is merely given as an example, and conclude, of course, that, in general, from the needy no pledge was to be exacted, the want of which might expose him to an injury. More especially, if, as we find in the lawyer here declaring that God would regard the restoration of such pledges as almsgiving, or righteousness. So it was in fact, and at the same time it was attended with no loss whatever to the creditor; for he had it in his power, at last, by the aid of summary justice, to lay hold of the whole property of the debtor, and if he had none of his person; and in the event of non-payment, to take him for a hired servant. The law gave him sufficient security; but with this single difference, that he durst not make good payment at his own hand, but must prosecute (Lev. xxv, 39-55; Neh. v, 9). See Dunn.

In the book of Job, the character of a lender upon pledge is thus depicted: "He extorts pledges without having lent, and makes his debtors go naked" (xxii, 6; xxiv, 7): "He takes the widow's ox for a pledge" (xxii, 3): "He takes the infant of the needy for a pledge" (xxiv, 9-11).

On this subject our Saviour exhorting his disciples to the most liberal and forbearing course towards all whom they could aid or who were indebted to them (Luke vi, 30-35). See Loan; Usury.

Lenfant, Alexandre-Charles-Anne, a French priest of note, was born at Lyons Sept. 6, 1726, and was educated by the Jesuits of his native place. In 1741 he entered the Order, and became professor of rhetoric at Paris. Endowed with great talent as a speaker, he became one of the most popular pulpit orators of his order. After its suppression Lenfant combated the doctrines of the philosophical antagonists of Christianity, particularly Diderot. In 1792 he was arrested by the Revolutionists, and subjected to capital punishment at Paris Sept. 3, 1793. His works are an Oraison funèbre on Belzunce, archbishop of Marseille (1756, 8vo), and another on the father of Louis XVI (Nancy, 1760): Sermon pour l'Avent et pour le Carné (Paris, 1818, 2 vols., 12mo). See Hoeft, Nouv. Biog. Gén., xxx, 656.

Lenfant, Jacques, a very noted French preacher and theologian, the son of Paul Lenfant, the Protestant minister of Châtillon-sur-Seine, was born at Beaune, in Beauce, a district of the ancient province of Orléanais, in France, April 13, 1601. Intended for the same profession as his father, he was sent to prosecute his studies at Saumur; and during his residence at that university he lived with the learned Jacques Cassel, the professor of Hebrew, with whom he formed a friendship which he continued during their lives. He completed his theological education at Geneva and Heidelberg, in which latter town he was admitted to the ministry of the Protestant Church in 1684. Soon after his ordination he obtained the appointment of minister of the French Church at Heidelberg, and chaplain to the dowager electress Palatine. The invasion of the Palatinate by the French troops, under marshal Turenne, compelled Lenfant to leave Heidelberg in 1688, and he settled at Berlin. The year after he had taken a vow not to marry until he had rendered himself obnoxious to the Jesuits by two letters which he had written against that society, and which are appended to his work, entitled A Préservative against a Reunion with the Church of Rome.

Though the Protestant French church of that city had already a sufficient number of pastors attached to it, the reigning elector of Brandenburg, Frederick, afterwards king of Prussia, who knew Lenfant by reputation, appointed him to that church, where for upwards of thirty-nine years he performed duty. In 1707, on a visit to England, his devotion to him was so illustrious that he said that he so pleased the queen that she desired him to enter the Church of England, and offered him the appointment as her chaplain. In 1710 he obtained the situation of chaplain to the king of Prussia, and counsellor of the High Consistory. Lenfant was suddenly attacked with paralysis, while in the apparent enjoyment of perfect health, July 29, 1728, and died on the 7th of August following. His disposition is represented as having been extremely amiable, and his manner simple and modest. Of a reflective turn of mind, he spoke but little, and smiled often; yet, when he wrote for himself, he was fond of society, and opened himself without reserve to the confidence of his friends. As a preacher, his manner was pleasing and persuasive; the matter of his discourse was chiefly of a practical nature, and his eloquence was rather chaste than energetic. The style of his writing is elegant, though never florid; it has less force than that of Jurieu, and less eloquence than that of Saurin, but the French is purer, and the diction more refined. It is not certain whether he was the first to form the design of the Bibliothèque Germanique, which was commenced in 1720, but he took a very active part in its publication, and the acknowledged author of the preface. Lenfant's first work, which appeared in 1683, was a review of one of Bruyés, who, though a celebrated French dramatist, has written several theological works in defence of the Roman Catholic faith. In 1688 he published a translation of a selection from the letters to St. Cyprian; in 1690, a defence of the Heidelberg Catechism, which is generally annexed to his Préservatif, etc., a work we have before alluded to; and in 1691, a Latin translation of the celebrated work of the père Malebranche, La Recherche de la Vérité. His history of the life of his countryman, Jean Appo, in which he employed himself, is a work which contains a complete account of the arguments in it are drawn from the Latin dissertation on that subject of Spanheim. It is said, however, that in after life Lenfant discovered and acknowledged the absurdity of this fiction. See Jean, Popes. In 1708 appeared his remarks on the Greek edition of the New Testament by Mill, which are in the Bibliothèque Choisie de Le Clere, vol. xvi.

The following works afterwards appeared in succession: 1. Réflexions et Marques sur la Depute du Père Martyon avec un Juff; 2. Mémoire Historique touchant la Comission sur les langues étrangères; 5. Critique des Remarques du Père Vissou; 7. Sur les Réflexions de Royin touchant la Poétique; 8. Réponse de Mons. Lenfant à Mons. D aur au sujet du Socianisme. The above short works are to be found in the Nouvelle de la République des Lettres, a review to which Lenfant was a frequent contributor. In 1714 was published his learned and interesting Histoire du Concile de Constance (Amsterdam, 1714, 2 vols. 4to; 1727, and an Engl. transl. Lond. 1780, 2 vols. 4to). Two years after he wrote an apology for this work, which had been severely attacked in the Journal de Trévoux, the year after, in 1716, in conjunction with Benich, he published a new translation of the New Testament, with explanatory notes, and a long and most learned introduction. It is by this work (Le Nouv. Text. traduit en Français sur l'original Grec, Amsterdam, 1718, 2 vols. 4to), perhaps, that he is best known to English-speaking students.
Among the most important of his other productions are Le Chrestien; or the 1St. Character, and Marina of the celebrated Florentine Writer Poggio (Amsterdam, 1728):—A Precaution against Reunion with the See of Rome, and Reasons for Separation from that See (Amsterdam, 1728), a work which continues to enjoy great popularity among Protestants:—Histoire du Concile de Pise (Amsterdam, 1728):—A volume containing sixteen Sermons on different Tracts of Scripture (1728):—A small volume of Remarks on the Treatise on Pulpit Eloquence, a work which has greatly added to his already high reputation:—Histoire de la Guerre des Hussites et du Concile de Bâle (Amsterdam, 1781, 2 vols. 4to), for which he had been many years collecting materials, and in the preparation of which, through the influence of the king of Prussia, he had access to the archives of the corporation of Bazel. *See English Cyclopaedia, a.; Hoefer, Nouv. Leng. John, an English prelate, was born in 1656, and, after having completed his studies at Cambridge, became chaplain to king George I. In 1723 his royal majesty made him bishop of Norwich. He published editions of the Plutus and Nubes of Ariophanes (1695):—an excellent edition of Terence (Cambridge, 1701):—Sermones de Boyle’s Lectures (1717-18), and twelve separate Sermones (1698-1727). *See Nichols’ *L. Lengerke, Caspar, a noted German theologian, was born at Hamburg March 30, 1606. He was educated at the University of Königsberg, and became a professor of theology and Oriental languages at that high school in 1629. He died Feb. 8, 1655. His most important works are, De Ephraimi Syri arte kermissement liber (1811);—De Dux Denuil (1852);—Kensaz, Volks und Religionsgesch. Israels, vol. i (1814).

Lencir, John, a French Jansenist priest, was born at Alençon in 1622. He became theological canon of Sees in 1652, and acquired great reputation as a preacher both in Normandy and at Paris. He was accused of Jansenism, and by his quarrelseome disposition was made the subject of persecution by the Marquis de Medavy, bishop of Sees, who had issued a charge for the publication of the Formulary, accused him of various errors, namely, of having permitted the publication of a work entitled Le Christen Charnière by a layman, who said expressly that "there are four divine persons," and who denounced the thought of a Jansenist character. He was tried by the bishop of Sees, St. Joseph, St. Anna, and St. Joachim; and that our Lord is present in the sacrament of the altar like a chicken in an egg-shell." Lenoir presented then a petition to Louis XIV, together with an attack on some propositions which he considered as heretical. His writings on these subjects were exceedingly violent: he attacked Rouxel de Medavy, who was then archbishop of Rouen, and even De Harlay, the archbishop of Paris. A commission was appointed to judge him, and he was condemned, April 24, 1694, to make a public apology in front of the cathedral at Paris, and to work for life on the galleys. The sentence was not fully carried out; but he remained a prisoner successively in the prisons of St. Malo, Brest, and Nantes until his death, April 22, 1692. He wrote, Aragones incalculables de l’Eglise sur les Confraternises (Paris, 1717, 12mo);—Nouvelles Lumières politiques, ou l’Evangile nouveau (1656 and 1697, 12mo): this work arrested the publication of a French translation of the History of the Council of Trent by Pallavicini, and went through a third edition under the title of Politique et Intrigues de la cour de Râme (1697, 12mo):—L’origine de cour opposé à Perrégue Apothéose (Lotte, 1692, 2 vols, 12mo);—Lettre à Mme. la duchesse de Guise sur la domination écopiale, etc. (1678, 12mo). *See Suppléments au Néerloog, de Port Royal, 1715; Dict. Lent. The forty days' fast, is the preparation for Easter in the Western, Eastern, and Lutheran churches, and in the Church of England, and was instituted at a very early age of Christianity. In most languages the name given to this fast signifies the so-called forty days—Forty, but our word Lent signifies the Spring Fast, for "Lenten-Tide" in the Anglo-Saxon language was the season of spring, in German Lent. (For another etymology, see LENTI.) It is observed in commemoration of our Lord's fast in the wilderness (Matt. iv), and although he did not impose it on his disciples as an express commandment, yet he showed plainly enough by his example that fasting, which God had so frequently ordered in the old covenant, was also to be practised by the children of the new. The observance of Lent was doubtless strongly confirmed by those words of the Redeemer in answer to the disciples of John the Baptist:—"Can the children of the Bridegroom mourn as long as the Bridegroom is with them? But the days will come when the Bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast" (Luke vii, 46, 50). Hence we find the Acts of the Apostles, according to The martyrdom of St. Peter, § 1, the disciples, after the foundation of the Church, applied themselves to fasting. In their epistles, also, they recommended it to the faithful. The primitive Christians seem to have considered Christ, in the above-mentioned passage, as the institution to the institution of the annual season of fasting and prayer in his future Church, and it was therefore only natural that they should have made this period of penitence to consist of forty days, seeing that our divine Master had consecrated that number by his own fast, and before him Moses and Elijah had done the same; it was even deduced from the forty years' stayings of the Israelites in the desert (Augustine, Ser. cxxvii, c. 5). See Fasting, vol. iii, p. 489 (11).

1. Practice of the Early Church.—In the age immediately succeeding that of the apostles, it does not appear that much value was attached to the practice of fasting. In the Shepherd of Hermas it is spoken of in disparaging terms. Very little notice was taken of fasting by the writers of the first centuries, which may be accounted for by the discouraging influence of the doctrines of Montanus, the tenets of the new Platonic school, and the progress of libertinism. It is only in the 200th year that the observance of fasting was introduced into the Church slowly and by degrees. We learn from Justin Martyr that fasting was joined with prayer at Ephesus in the administration of baptism, which is worthy of being noted as an early recognition of the original institution. In the 2nd century, in the times of Victor and Zephyrinus, the custom had become usual to fast before Easter, yet it consisted not in a single fast, but rather in a series of solemnities, which were deemed worthy of celebration. It was therefore the custom of several congregations to prepare themselves by mortification and fasting, inaugurated on the afternoon of the day on which they commemorated the crucifixion, and it was continued until the morning of the anniversary of the resurrection. The whole interval would thus be only about forty hours (Chrysostom, Orat. ad Evang. Silos, iii, 4, vol. i, p. 611: oi ιερα και πανελπιεια των τεσσαρεων πασχαλην. Her.; Luc.; I Tim. iv, p. 8; Irenæus, Epist. ad Victoriam. Pompæ; Eusebius, Hist. Eccle. iv, 24; Dionysis. Alex. Epist. Canen.; Beveridge, Symodo. Clement of Alexandria, however, speaks of weekly fasts. Tertullian, in his treatise De Jejunio, complains bitterly of the little attention paid by the Church to the practice of fasting; by which we may see that even orthodox Christians exercised in this matter that liberty of judgment which had been sanctioned by the apostles. Origen adverts to this subject only once, in his 10th Homily on Leviticus, where he speaks in accordance with the apostolic doctrine. Eusebius, however, from his observations, that at Alexandria Wednesday and Fridays were then observed as fast-days, on the ground that our Lord was betrayed on a Wednesday, and crucified on a Friday. The custom of the Church at the end of the 4th century may be seen from a passage of Epiphanius: “In the whole Christian Church the fasts observed throughout the year are regularly observed: On Wednesdays and Fridays we fast until the ninth hour,” etc.

But even at this comparatively late date there was no universal agreement in the practice of the Church in this matter, neither had fasts been established by law. Only later was the number of days (namely, forty) fixed according to the Greek and Latin names (resepsius, οὐσία = quadragesimae). But for a long time the Oriental and Occidental churches differed. As the former did not permit its members to fast on the Sabbath, their fasts began with the Lord's Supper on Monday. See: Euseb. H.I., 3, 23; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. v, 24; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vii, 19. The custom, so far as it existed, had been silently introduced into the Church, and its observance was altogether voluntary at first. This fasting consisted in abstinence from food until three o'clock in the afternoon, but at a later period a custom was introduced, probably by the Montanists, affecting the kind of food to be taken, which was limited to bread, salt, and water.

Some, however, who had become subject to the rules of the Church, were compelled to keep the fasts for their privation during the fasts by banqueting on the days preceding them (Chrysostom, De pomienite, hom. v, § 5, vol. ii, p. 315). Others adhered literally to the rules of fasting by avoiding strictly the prohibited food, but prepared from that which was permitted costly dainties (Augustine, Sacram., cii, § 1). The fathers and teachers of the Church of this period, as Chrysostom, Augustine, Maximus of Turin, Caesarius of Arles, etc., spoke often against this hypocritical fasting, and showed that abstinence would then only be of service when avoidance of the habitable, etc., as well as a contrition of heart, was connected with it. The general design, then, of the primitive Church in fasting forty days, we may give in the words of Chrysostom: “Many heretofore were used to come to the communion sedulously and incontinentely, especially at that time, when Christ first gave it to his disciples. Therefore our forefathers, considering the mischief arising from such careless approaches, met together, appointed forty days for fasting and prayer, and hearing sermons, and for holy assemblies; that all men in these days, being carefully purified by prayer, and alms, and fasting, and with fasting, and confession, and with all other exercises, might come, according to their capacity, with a pure conscience, to the holy table.”

“The rule of fasting for Lent varied greatly. It was usual to abstain from food altogether until evening, change of diet not being accounted sufficient. St. Ambrose exhorts men: ‘Differ aliquantulum, non longe fines est diei’ (Sermo. viii in Psalm. cxxvii). The food, when taken, was to be of the simplest and least delicate kind, animal food and wine being prohibited. St. Chrysostom (A.H. te on Statu) speaks of Christians who are two days accustomed to fast from food, and of others who refused not only wine and oil, but every other dish, and throughout Lent partook of bread and water only. The Eastern Church, at the present day, observes a most strict rule of fasting. Wine and oil are allowed on Saturdays and Sundays, but even these days are only partially excepted from the restrictions of Lent. The discipline of Holy Week is exceedingly rigorous. During Lent corporal punishment was forbidden by the laws of Theodosius the Great: ‘Nulla supplicia sint corporis quibus (diebus) absolutae expulsione animarum’ (Cod. Theod. vi, tit. xxi, leg. v.). Public games, and the celebration of the spring festivals, were also interdicted (Concil. Laodic. ii, iii). It was the special time for preparing catechumens for baptism, and most of St. Cyril's catechetical lectures were delivered during Lent. St. Chrysostom's celebrated Homilies on the Statutes were preached during this season. Daily instruction formed a part of the service, and holy communion was celebrated at least every Lord's day. The last week, the Holy or Great Week, was kept with still greater strictness and solemnity” (Blunt, Dict. of Doctrine and Church History, p. 285).

II. Practice of later Times. — Fasting, after a time, ceased to be a voluntary exercise. By the second canon of the Council of Orleans, A.D. 581, it was decreed that any one who should neglect to observe the stated times of abstinence should be treated as an offender against the laws of the Church. The eighth Council of Toledo, in the 7th century (canon 9), condemns any one who should eat flesh during the fast before Easter, and says that such offenders should be forbidden the use of it throughout the year. In the 8th century fasting began to be regarded as a religious duty in the Eastern Church. In the 13th century a cold collision in the evening of fast-days was permitted.

The following are the fasts which generally obtained in the Church: 1. The usual fast of forty days before Easter, or the Season of Lent. The duration of this fast at first was only forty hours (Tertull. De Jejun. c. 2, 18; Ireneaus, ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i, v, c. 34). By the time of Gregory the Great (in the 8th century) it had extended to thirty-six days, and it had been so accepted by the Council of Niæum; but by Gregory the Great, or by Gregory II, it was extended to forty days, the duration of the proper fasts of Moses, Elias, and the blessed Saviour (Exod. xxxiv. 28; 1 Kings xix. 8; Matt. iv, 2). Hence the term Quadragesimae (q. v.), which had already been used to denote this period, became strictly applicable. Socrates (Hist. Eccl. vii, c. 19), Basili the Great, Ambrose, and Leo the Great speak of this quadragesimal fast as a divine institution but this can mean no more than that the fast was observed in imitation of the example of the divine Redeemer (Concil. Genonienses, c. 7 — in canone apostolorum, 68: "Si quis Episcopos, aut Presbyteros, etc., quadragesimam in mortem Christi, aut in festa, aut in die natalis, aut in die laetiarii, etc.:" Concil. Colonienses, ii, pt. 9, can. 6). 2. Quarterly fasts, no traces of which occur before the 6th century, although Bellarmino (De bonis operibus, lib. ii, c. 19) says that the first three of these fasts were instituted in the times of the apostles, and the last by pope Calixtus, A.D. 294. "A fast of three days before the festival of the Ascension," introduced by Maimerius, bishop of Vienne, in the middle of the 8th century. In some places it was not celebrated until after Whitsun. It was called Jejunium Rogationis, or Jejunium Litanies, "a fast of arrangements or Litanies," on account of certain litanies sung on those days. The words Annunciation and lauda, "litanies," in Latin Suppllicationes et Rogationes, in their original signification, are but another name for prayers in general, of whatever kind, that either were made publicly in the church or by any private person. (See Euseb. Fl. Const. i, i, c. 14; i, v, c. 65; Chrysostom. Hom. antependiurn in eculum; Cod. Theod. lib. xi, tit. v, "De hereticus," 1, 30, 1.) 4. Monthly fasts, a fast-day in every month except July and August (Concil. Illebriz. 83, 29; 33, 29; 39, 39), the 5th, the 13th, and the 19th, in the place of the ancient vigils which were abolished in the 8th century. 6. Weekly fasts, on Wednesdays and Fridays, entitled stationes, from the practice of soldiers keeping guard, which was called stabio by the Romans ("Stationum dies," Tertullian, De Orat. 23; "Stationibus quattuor et sexitem Sattibi dicunt," Idem, De...
Lentile (only in the plural ἐνέπτειν, odakshim), prob. from an obsolete root signifying to fodder; see φακάς, Vulg. lena) is probably a correct rendering of the plant thus designated (Gen. xxxv, 84; 2 Sam. xxvii, 28; xxiii, 11; Ezek. iv, 9). In Syria lentiles are still called in Arabic addas (Russell, N. H. of Aleppo, i, 74). They appear to have been chiefly used for making a kind of pottage. The red pottage, for which Essau hurried his birthright, was of lentiles (Gen. xxx, 29-34). The term red was, as with us, extended to yellowish-brown, which must have been the true color of the pottage if derived from lentiles, being that of the seeds rather than that of the pods, which were sometimes cooked entire (Mishna, Shabb. vii, 4). The Greeks and Romans also called lentiles red (see authorities in Celsius, Hierobotanic, i, 165). Lentiles were among the provisions brought to David when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. xvii, 28), and a field of lentiles was the scene of an exploit of one of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii, 11). From Ezek. iv, 9, it would appear that lentiles were sometimes used as bread (comp. Athen. iv, 158). This was doubtless in times of scarcity, or by the poor (compare Aristoph. Plat. 1065). Sonini (Tertullian, p. 603) assures us that in southernmost Egypt, where the market is comparatively scarce, lentiles mixed with a little barley form almost the only food in use among the poorer classes. It is called betlim, is of a golden yellow color, and is not bad, although rather heavy. In that country, indeed, probably even more than in Palestine, lentiles anciently, as now, formed a chief article of food among the laboring classes. This is repeatedly noticed by ancient authors; and so much attention was paid to the culture of this useful pulse that certain varieties became remarkable for their excellence (comp. Dioscor. ii, 129). The lentiles of Pelusium, in the Nile nearest to Palestine, were esteemed both in Egypt and foreign countries (Virgil, Georg. i, 228), and this is probably the valued Egyptian variety which is mentioned in the Mishna (Ket. viii, 8) as neither large nor small. Large quantities of lentiles were exported from Alexandria (Augustine, Comm. in Pet. zvii). Plyn, in mentioning two Egyptian varieties, incidentally lets us know that one of them was red (compare Diog. Laertius, vii, 8), by remarking that they like a red soil, and by speculating whether the pulse may not have thence derived the reddish color which it imparted to the passage made with it (Histor. Natur. xvii, 12). This illustrates Jacob's red pottage. Dr. Shaw (i, 257) also states that these lentiles easily dissolve in boiling, and form a red or chocolate-colored pottage much esteemed in North Africa and Western Asia (see Thomson, Land and Book, i, 409). Dr. Kitto also says that he has often partaken of red pottage, prepared by seething the lentiles in water and then adding a little suet to give them a flavor, and that he found it better food than a stranger would imagine; "the mess," he adds, "had the richness which gained for it the name of adom" (Jub. iv, 80, 84). Putting these facts together, it is likely that the reddish lentile, which is now so common in Egypt (Descrip. de Egypte, xix, 65), is the sort to which all these statements refer. The tomb-paintings actually exhibit the operation of preparing pottage of lentiles, or, as Wilkinson (Anc. Egyptians, ii, 287) describes it, "a man engaged in cooking lentils."

Lentiles for a soup or porridge; his companion brings a bundle of fagots for the fire, and the lentiles themselves are seen standing near him in wicker baskets." The lentiles of Palestine have been little noticed by travelers (e.g. Burchardt, Arab. p. 51). Nau (Voyage Nouveau, p. 18) mentions lentiles along with corn and peas, as a principal article of traffic at Tertura; D'Arvieux (Mem. ii, 257) speaks of a mosque, originally a Christian church, over the patriarchal tomb at Hebron, connected with which was a large kitchen where lentile pottage was prepared every day, and distributed freely to strangers and poor people, in memory of the transaction between Esau and Jacob, which they (erroneously) believe to have taken place at this spot. When Dr. Robinson was at Akaba, he says: "The commissary in the castle had also a few stores for sale at enormous prices, but we bought little except a supply of lentiles, or small beans, which are common in Egypt and Syria under the name of addus (the name in Hebrew and Arabic being alike)—the same from which the pottage was made for which Esau sold his birthright. We found them very palatable, and could well conceive that, to a weary hunter faint with hunger, they might be quite a dainty" (Bib. Res. i, 146). Again, when at Hebron, on the 24th of May, he observes: "The wheat harvest here in the mountains had not yet arrived, but they were threshing barley, addus or lentiles, and also vetches, called by the Arabs kersuna, which are raised chiefly for camel feed" (Bib. Res. ii, 439).

The lentile (Ervum lena of Linnaeus, class xvii, 8) is an annual plant, and the smallest of all the leguminous which are cultivated. It rises with a weak stalk about eighteen inches high, having pinnate leaves at each joint composed of several pairs of narrow leaflets, and terminating in a tendril, which supports it by fastening on to some other plant. The small flowers, ripen in July. When ripe, the plants are rooted up if they have been sown along with other plants, as is sometimes done, but they are cut down when grown by themselves. They are threshed, winnowed, and cleaned like grain. There are three or four kinds of lentiles, all of which are still much esteemed in those countries where they are grown, viz., the south of Europe, Asia, and North Africa. The red lentile is a small kind, the seeds of which, after being decorticated, are commonly sold in the bazaars of India. To the present day a favorite dish among the Portuguese and Spaniards is lentiles, served with their unflinching oil and garlic, and flavored with the aromatic herb. The preservation of animal food, it is a great resource in Catholic countries during the season of Lent, and some say that from hence the season derives its name. It is occasionally cultivated in England, but only as fodder for cattle; it is also imported from Alexandria. From the quantity of gluten the ripe seeds contain, they must be highly nutritious, though they have the character of being heating if taken in large quantities. Under the high-sounding name "Revalenta Arabicae," we pay a high price for them, and in various culinary preparations are unawares repeating Jacob's mistake (Plut. Alexander; Hogg, Peg. Kingdom, p. 275). In Egypt the haulm is used for packing.

Lentulus, Epistle Of (Epistola Lentulii), is the well-known title of an epistolary work on the physical aspect of Christ, which the only extant Greek which receives as authentic, and as having been written by Publius Lentulus, a Roman of Palestine, and perhaps of Jerusalem, to Rome. Manuscript copies of it are to be found, according to Joh. Albert Fabricius (Cod. apocryph. No. 2 Testamenti, i. 302), in several libraries of England, France, and Italy (viz., in those of the Vatican and of Padua), Germany (at Augsburg and Jena, where two copies formerly existed, one of which was embellished with a fine image of Christ, and had been presented to the elector Frederick the Wise by pope Leo X). A librarian of Jena, Christopher Mylius (Memorab. librioth, academ. Jenensis, Jen. 1746, 8vo, p. 301 sq.), states that this copy was written in golden letters upon red paper, very richly bound, and beautifully illustrated. This copy, however, is lost. The work was first printed in the Magdeburg Centuries (q.v.) (Basil. 1559), i, 344; it was then reproduced in Mich. Neander, Apostrophia (Basil. 1567), p. 410 sq., afterwards in Joh. Jac. Grynaei Monumenta s. Patrum orthodoro-graphica (Basil. 1569, fol.). Joh. Reiske, in Ecerocrit. histor. de imaginibus Jes. Chr. ref. (Jen. 1685, 4to), gave a twofold version of it, one after the other, the latter a reproduction of the former ascribed by Mylius. This epistle was highly regarded in former times; the papal legate, Jerome Xavier, translated it into Portuguese (in his history of Christ, a work full of legends and fables), and from this language it was subsequently translated into Persian; Reiske and Fabricius translated it into German, and published it at Nuremberg and at Erfurt. It is also to be found in a condensed form in the introduction to the works of archbishop Aneslin of Canterbury, which, though without date or name of place, are, from internal evidence, supposed to have been published at Paris about the close of the 16th or the beginning of the 17th century; in this work it is accompanied by a description of the personal appearance of the Virgin Mary. In the earliest ages of the Church the question of the personal appearance of Christ while on earth had begun to attract considerable attention. Had there been anything positively known on the subject then, it would certainly have been eagerly received. Yet, although the Church fathers Justin, Tertullian, Hegesippus, and Eusebius mention a letter of Pilate to Tiberius, one of Abgarus to Christ, and one of Jesus to Abgarus, they make no mention of any letter of Lentulus concerning the point. On the contrary, during the first century, while the Christian Church was suffering persecution, the impression prevailed, derived from Is. lii, 2, 3, that the Lord's personal appearance was very unprepossessing. But as the Church grew in prosperity and power this idea underwent a complete change. Eusebius and Aegidius agree that Juba was a very handsome man, which opinion was only based on the passage Ps. xlv. 2. In the works of the Greek historian Nicophorus (surnamed Callistus Stathouphulus), who lived in the 14th century, and whom Weismann considers a credulous, uncritical writer, we find a description of Christ's personal appearance, for which, however, the writer gives no authority, saying only that it is derived from the ancients. As it greatly resembles that of Lentulus, and perhaps served as its basis, we give it here as a curiosity: "H. münno diapilase tis mophes tou eunou ous ous Christou, os ier árkhion paerelifimos, toiai di teis os wv tín paralhénin, ó ou thisi an ean wv ákra.

The very contents of the letter are sufficient evidence of its spuriousness. Had it really been written by a Romman, it would not have been addressed to the senate, but to the emperor, who was the immediate master of the Syrian provinces, and it seems to have been already noticed in former times, for in the Magdeburgh Centuries it is said to have been addressed to the emperor Tiberius. A fact of still greater importance is that Lentulus is designated as Hierosolymitana prose. No such office existed. There was a Praise Syria and a Procurator Judea but no Prose of the Roman inhabitants at Jerusalem. For this reason he is called in the Manucri. Jen. i, Proculion in partibus Judea, and in the Manucri. Vatic. and Jen. ii, in a thoroughly Roman Catholic manner, officialis in provincia Judea, which is repeated in the Ann. iuv. et leg. 37 of that period. But he is nowhere represented as a friend of Pilate, as Zimmermann attempts to make him in his Lebenge schichte d. Kirche Christi, p. 70. We know most of the procurators or presides of Syria, and all the procurators of Judea, but no such procurator as Lentu-lus. In the classics there are forty-three persons of that name mentioned, but four only belonged to the times of Tiberius. One of them only, Enneas Lentulus Getulicus, was, according to Tacitus (Ann. iv. 46), in the year 26, consul with Tiberius, and in 44 was the chief of the legions in upper Germany (Tacitus, Annal. vi. 90); he may, indeed, according to Suetonius (Calig. c. 8) and Pliny (Epist. v. 8), have been in Judea during the year 26 to 38, but there is no proof of it. On the other hand, the Lentulus who wrote the epistle is expressly called in the MS. Jen. i, Publics. Moreover, there is no mention at all made of the epistle by any of the ancient writers, whilst other epistles, even some of an apocryphal nature, are mentioned by them, and this one, if it had been known, would certainly have attracted the attention of the apologists at a time when the general impression was so strong in favor of the first epistles by the hand of the Lord. Nicophorus Xanthopoulos, whose description of Christ's personal appearance we gave above, states only that it is based on old traditions, while, if such a description as that given in the Epistle of Lentulus had been known in the Church, it is evident that such an author would certainly not have failed to quote it as an authority. Regarding the literary merits of the work, it must be confessed that it is written in old Latin; but as it is full of expressions which would not naturally be used by a Roman citizen—as the whole tenor of the work, moreover, is thoroughly unliterary and anachronistic, it is to be supposed that its writer aimed to imitate the style of the ancients, and pass it off as a work of their age. A Roman would never have used the expression propheti cerisitiae, fili hominum, at the beginning and at the end of the epistle. So also the appellation Christus Jesus is evidently taken from the New Testament, for the Redeemer was never thus designated during his lifetime. Jesus himself declined the name of Christ, forbade his disciples calling him thus, and he never was called so by his enemies. How then, could a heathen have come to call him Christ, and even to propose the appellation to the Jewish church?
A change which only took place after his claim to be considered as the Messiah had been established beyond cavil. If it is claimed that Christ was called by the heathen the prophet of truth, yet, as Christ's activity in Judea was not directed during his lifetime to the red the epistles are addressed to people of different names,

The same tendency prevailed also in the Western Church until the Reformation, when Luther took a more reasonable view of the question, saying, "It is very possible that some may have been handsome, physically, as Christ. Perhaps some were even handsome, for we do not see it mentioned that the Jews ever wondered about them. The more we see of the Roman Catholic writer (In libro de forma Christi, Paris, 1649), who said that the Redeemer was not either ill favored nor more handsome than other men. In other cases, however, the Roman Catholic Church has retained the somewhat fanciful description of Lentulus.
If we now look more closely into this episode of Lentu-lus, we find in the edition of Grynew (Monum. orthodoxographia) that it reads, "Lentulus, Hierosolymitana

igned as heathen, but as Romans; and they did not interest themselves enough in the wandering Rabbi to return in the style of the inhabitants. Now it was otherwise with the heathen residing on the frontiers of Palestine. "His disciples called him the Son of God." Though they gave him occasionally that name, it was so far from being a general custom that the governor himself knew nothing of it. So this like the following sentences on the raising of the dead and healing of the sick, is all taken from the Gospel. It also says that his hair was parted after the manner of the Nazarites: we find the substitution of Nazarene for Nazarite, which only took place afterwards. Now a Roman officer would know little or nothing about these; moreover, Christ could not properly be called a Nazarene, for he drank wine, touched the dead, and did many other things contrary to the customs of the Nazarites. The remark that he was never seen to laugh, but often to weep, proves him to have led a solitary life, such as we have no example of at the supposed time of the writing of this epistle, and is only an idea derived from the Gospel, and from the state of things in the Middle Ages. The last words also, "beautiful among the sons of men," are quite unsuited to the mouth of a Roman, who, when there was a need of use made of Hebrews, and it is clearly taken from the 11th Psalm, which is the basis of the whole description. This consequently could not apply to our Lentulus, but only to a monk of the Middle Ages.

Having thus seen how this epistle carries within itself the proofs of its spuriousness, the question arises, When was it written? If it was included in the works of Anselm, we would have to consider it as having been composed in the 11th century. Yet it is simply appended to the works of this author, and was never made use of until the 15th century, to give favor to an opinion which the monks had an interest to propagate. Laurentius Vallis, who lived in the 15th century, was the first who made any mention of it in his argument against the pseudo donation of Constantine. A postscript of great interest is appended to the 2d Jena MS, and it, in our estimation, tends to reveal the true character of the work: "Explicit epistola Jacobi de Columpano anno Domini 1421 reperit eam in annulaibus Romae, in libro antiquissimo in Capitolo ex dono Patriarchae Constantinopolitanorum." If this postscript is to be relied on, this epistle was sent to Rome in the 14th century by a patriarch of Constantinople, at a present time's worth, to the pope; and the text before us, as a very old one, it is most likely that this description is a Latin translation of that of Nicophorus, which we gave above, that the translator added the postscript with the intention of rendering his spurious work more credible, and that consequently both epistle and postscript are spurious. The imitator or translator of Nicophorus, who gives ample proofs in his work of the source whence he drew when he speaks of the stature of Christ (in a copy in Goldast we find, after statura procerus, "esticet ex palmarum et mediul"), gave the work the form of an epistle, and gave it the name of Lentulus, taken from some tradition, or which otherwise seemed suitable to him. It is now evident that the epistle could only have been written at some time after Nicophorus, and before the year 1500, consequently in the 14th century. Dr. Edward Robinson, after carefully examining all the evidence for and against the authenticity of this work, thus presents the results of his inquiry: "In favor of the authenticity of the letter we have only the purport of the inscription. There is no external evidence whatever. Against its authenticity we have the great discrepancy of the inscription; the fact that no such official person as Lentulus existed at the time and place specified, nor for many years before and after; the utter silence of history in respect to the existence of such a letter; the foreign and later idioms, and the manner of its style in the epistle as well; the absence of the epistle stand with established historical facts; and the probability of its having been produced at some time not earlier than the 11th century." LEO OF ACHRIUS OR ACHRIEDA (now Okhrida, in Albania), was so called because he held the archbishopric of Achria, in the Greek Church, among the Bulgarians. He joined about A.D. 1053, with Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople, in writing a very bitter letter against the pope, which they sent to John, archbishop of Trani, in Apulia, to be distributed among the members of the Latin Church—prelates, monks, laity. A translation of this letter is given by Baronius (Annales Ecclesiae ad ann. 1058, xxvi, etc.). Pope Leo IX replied in a long letter, which is given in the Concilia (vol. ix, col. 94, ed. Labbe; vol. x, col. 297, ed. Mansi; vol. xix, col. 635, ed. Mansi), and the following year both Cerularius and Leo of Achria were excommunicated by cardinal Humbert, the papal legate (Baronius, ad ann. 1054, xxv). Leo wrote many other letters, which are extant in MS. in various European libraries, and are cited by Athanasius, in his De Comnenis Eccles. Orient. et Occident.; by Beveridge, in his Codex Canonum; by Alexius Athenaeus, in his Synopsis Epistolarum Canonicae; and by Comnenus Popadopoli, in his Promotio Mystagogica. See Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. iv, 715; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 194, ed. Oxon. 1740; Ortolani, De Scripturis et Scriptis Eccles. ii, 600—Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog., ii, 741.

LEO EGYPTIUS, OR THE EGYPTIAN. The early Christian writers, in their controversy with the heathen, refer not unfrequently to a Leo or Leon as having admitted that the deities of the ancient Gentile nation had originally been men, agreeing in this respect with Ewe-merus, with whom he was contemporary, if not necessarily a pupil. This name was after一世, Leon, which stems from the Greek λιον (lion), and is most explicit in his notice of him, says he was an Egyptian priest of high rank, "magnum antiquus," and that he expounded the popular mythology to Alexander the Great in a manner, that with him it became a trifle to be written down in an epitome. The explanations received in Greece, accorded with them in making the gods (including even the major gentium to have originally been men. Augustine refers to an account of the statements of Leo contained in a letter of Alexander to his mother. It is to be observed, though Leo was high in his priestly rank at the time when Alexander was in Egypt (B.C. 882-881), his name is Greek; and Ammianus (adv. Gentes, iv, 29) calls him Leo Pelleus, or Leo of Pella, an epithet which Fabricius does not satisfactorily explain. Worth (Not. ad Timian. p. 56, ed. Oxford, 1700) would identify our Leo with Leon of Lampraceus, the husband of Themistia or Themistio, the female Epicurean (Diog. Laert. x, 5, 29); but the husband of Themistia was more correctly called Leontius, while the Egyptian is never called by any other name than Leo. Ammianus speaks in such a way as to lead us to think that Alexander had in mind the Egyptian priest in whose words the human origin of the gods were extant and accessible, but it is possible he refers, like Augustine, to Alexander's letter. The reference to Leo in Clemens Alexandrinus is not more explicit (Strat. Out, 1, 21, § 106, p. 189, Sylburg; p. 387, ed. Pott; ii, 76, p. 183, ed. Pott; 12mo). But Athanasius's distinct mention of the 'Yorwqil-ματα, or Commentaries of Leo, shows that this system had been committed to writing by himself; and Tertullian (De Coron., c. 7) directs his readers "to unroll the writings of the Egyptian Hyginus," (Pseudo-Selluvnicosmovos, c. 29) to refer to Leo as though he wrote a history of Egypt ("Qui res Egypticus scriptus?""). The scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iv, 262) gives a reference here to what Leon had said respecting the antiq-ity of the author of the "Hymn to the Sun." The copy of the Latin version and notes to the text of Leo, and illustrated it by engravings from ancient gems: this ed-tion is, however, scarce and dear, the greater part of the copies having been lost by shipwreck, but his text, preface, "version, and notes (not only the scholia) were reprinted in the Bonn ed. of the Corpus Histr. Byzantinae

Leo Diaconus, or the Dracoon, a Byzantine historian of the 10th century, of whose personal history but little is known, except the incidental notices in his principal works (collected by C. B. Hase in his Prospicio to his edition of Leo), was born at Caloût, a town of Asia, beautifully situated at the side or foot of Mount Timolus, near the sources of the Caystius, in Asia Minor, and was at Constantineople pursuing his studies A.D. 966, where he was an admiring spectator of the firmness of the emperor Nicephorus II, Phocas, in the midst of a popular tumult (iv, 7). Hase places his birth in or about A.D. 966. He was in Asia in or about the time of the depos-tion of Constantine I, patriarch of Constantinople, and the election of his successor, Antonius III, A.D. 978 or 974, and relates that at that time he frequently saw two Cappadocians, twins of thirty years' age, whose bodies were united from the umqua to the flanks (x, 5). Having once met the aged leon, he served as a secretary to the emperor Basilus II in his unfortunate expedition against the Bulgarians, A.D. 981, and when the emperor raised the siege of Trylitsa or Triaditsa (the ancient Sardica), Leo barely escaped death in the headlong flight of his countrymen (x, 6). Of his history after this nothing is known; but Hase observes he must have written his history after A.D. 998, as he adverts to the rebellion and death of Phocas Bardas (x, 9), which occurred in that year. He must have lived later than Hase has remarked, and at least till A.D. 998, as he notices (x, 10) that the emperor Basilus II restored "in six years the cuspola of the great church of St. Sophia's" at Constantinople, which had been overthrown by the earthquake (comp. Cedren, Compend. ii, 498, ed. Bonn) of A.D. 987. His works are, Τετρακία ήτοι ού, ou, Ηθοδωρια άδεκα, or Historia Libra decem:—Oratio ad Basilium Imperatorum:—and, unless it be the oratio imperator Leo, or the Ηθοδωρια of Nickelew Archeogaleon. The last two are extant only in MS.

The history of Leo includes the period from the Cretan expedition of Nicephorus Phocas, in the reign of Romanus II, A.D. 959, to the death of John I, Trismieces, A.D. 975. It relates the victories of the emperor Nicephorus Phocas, and Trismieces over the Moesians in Cilicia and Syria, and the recovery of those countries, or the greater part of them, to the Byzantine empire, and the wars of the same emperors with the Bulgarians and Russians. According to Hase, Leo employs unusual and unappropiate words (many of them borrowed from Homer, Agathias the historian, and the Septrosgiast) in the place of simple and common ones, and abounds in tautological phrases. His knowledge of geography and ancient history is slight, but with these defects his history is a valuable contemporary record of a stirring time, honestly written. His修vities and Cedrenus are much indebted to Leo, and Hase considers Zonaras also to have used his work. The Historia was first published at the cost of count Nicholas Romanoff, chancellor of Russia, by Car. Benedict Hase (Paris, 1816).—Combe had intended to publish it in the Paris ed. of the Corpus Histr. Byzantinae, with the Historia of Michael Psellus, but was prevented by death, A.D. 1679. The Latin version which he had prepared was communicated by Montfaucon to Pagi, who insered some portions in his Crítico in Burevus (at end, No. 149). No. 161 contains the Historia, with a facsimile of the Latin text, for many years after, committed to Michael le Quien, that he might publish an edition of Psellus and Leo, and part of the latter's work was actually printed. In the disorders of the French Revolution the papers of Combes were finally lost or destroyed. In 1828, a Latin version was added with notes to the text of Leo, and illus-

reprinted in the Bonn ed. of the Corpus Histr. Byzantinae

Leo the Great. See Leo the Thracian (emperor) and Leo I (pope).

Leo the Isaurian is the name which is commonly given in his Historia to Leo III or Flavius Leo Isaurianus, emperor of Constantinople from the year 718 to 741, a man remarkable on many accounts, but who, from his connection with the great contest about image-worship in the Christian Church, became one of the most prominent historical names among the emperors of the East.

1. Early History. —He was born in or on the borders of the rude province of Isauria, and his original name was Comos. He emigrated with his father, a wealthy farmer or graziar of that country, to Thrace. Young Comon obtained the place of saptarhan or broadwordsman, in the court of Justinian II, and soon, by his military talents, excited the jealousy of the emperor, as he drew the eyes of the people, and especially of the soldiers, towards him as one fitted to command, and competent even for the empire. He was sent forward, therefor, with a few troops against the Alani, and then abdoned by the emperor without success, in the hope that he would be cut off and destroyed, but from this critical position Leo extricated himself with consummate dextterity and courage. Anastasius II (A.D. 718–716) gave him the supreme command of the troops in Asia, which was exposed to the terrible onslaughts of the Arab or Saracen hordes, by whom it had already been half overrun and conquered. This command was still in his hands when Theodosius III, at the beginning of 716, rose against Anastasius, deposed him, and seated himself upon the throne. Leo, being summoned to acknowledge Theodosius, at once denounced him as a usurper, and attacked him under pretext of restoring the rightful sovereign to the throne, but probably with the design of seizing for himself the imperial dignity.

He secured the support of the principal leaders in the army, reached the imperial throne before he could be gathered in sufficient force to resist him, and slew them. At Nicomedia he met the son of Theodosius, whom he defeated and captured. He next marched direct upon Constantinople, and Theodosius, seeing no hope of resistance, quietly resigned his sceptre in March, 716, and retired into a convent, while the vacant throne was fort-with occupied by Leo himself, by the suffrages of the troops.

2. Imperial History. —No sooner was Leo arrayed in the purple than the caliph Soleiman, together with the noted Moelins, appeared before Constantinople with an immense and an insatiable army, supported by an cerful fleet, determined to retrieve their sulfamed fame.

The city was invested by sea and land, and its capture was considered certain; but the indefatigable energy, military skill, and fearless courage of Leo, aided by the new invention of the Greek fire, saved the capital from falling, five years in the siege, but cost the lives of the Moelins. The superstitions people ascribed their deliverance to the constant interposition of the Virgin, in which they gave the greatest possible praise to the genius of Leo. This third (Gibbon calls it the second) isegue of Combon was uniform to the Saracens last two years (Gibbon calls it thirteen months) from the 15th of August, 718. On the 15th of August, 720, the caliph (now Omar, who had succeeded Soleiman shortly after the commencement of the siege) was compelled to raise the siege, losing in a storm the greater part of the remnants of his third fleet before reaching the harbors of Syria and Egypt. So close had been the investment of the city, so enormous the preparations, and so loud the alarms, that in the opinion of Constantinople was given up as lost, notwithstanding all the splendid victories of Leo, for the very news of those victories had been intercepted by the vigilant blockade of the besieges. The whole empire was in consternation, and in the West the rumor was credited that the caliph had actually assaulted the throne of Byzantium. Accordingly, Sisigius, governor of Italy, took measures to make himself independent, and to secure the crown for himself in case of complete success; but Leo immediately dispatched a small force to Sicily, which soon crushed the rebellion. Meanwhile, Bishop Anastasius, also, was tempted to plot the recovery of the throne, and in the attempt lost his life. In spite of his defections before Constantinople, Omar continued the war for twenty years; and though, in 726, he captured Cesarea in Cappadocia, and Neo-Cesarea in Pontus, yet Leo maintained an acknowledged superiority. The great work of ecclesiastical reform occupied the attention of the empire, without any considerable interruption from the infidels, until the year 734. What belongs to this chapter of domestic history, though it includes elements and facts of military and political significance, is reserved for the next head. During the last twenty years of Leo's reign (from 724) falls the protracted life-struggle with the Saracens. The caliph Hisham instigated the Syrians to support an adventurer who pretended to be the son of Justinian II, and who, under the protection of the caliph, entered Jerusalem arrayed in the imperial purple. This proved a mere farce. But something more serious happened when, in 729, the Arab general Soleiman invaded the empire with an army of 90,000 men, distributed into three bodies. The first entered Cappadocia, and ravaged it with fire and sword; the second, commanded by Suleyman and Beni, penetrated into Libya; the third, under Soleiman, covered the rear. Leo was actually taken by surprise; but he soon assembled an army and defeated the second body, in Phrygia, in a pitched battle, and obliged Soleiman to withdraw hastily into Syria. The Saracens had, in the meantime, been routed in their invasion of Europe by Charles Martel in 726, and the progress of their conquests seemed now for some time to be checked both in the East and in the West. The remaining great event of Leo's reign was the terrible earthquake of October, 746, which caused great loss of life and property.

8. The Iconoclastic Controversy. In this business Leo would seem to have begun of his own motion, and almost single-handed. No party of any account against image-worship existed in the Church, but he believed that by taking the side of iconoclasts he could hasten the conversion of the Jews and Mohammedans, and though at first very cautious, he finally, after some nine or ten years of his reign, issued his edict prohibiting the worship of all images, whether statues or pictures, of Christ, the Virgin, or the saints. Christendom was astounded by such a revolution in the belief of images. See of this in the following usages. See ICONOCLASM. Leo, in fact, found arrayed against him not only the bigoted and exasperated monks, but the superstitious masses of the people of the East and West, and almost all the clergy, with all the bishops, excepting Claudius, bishop of Nocinaria in Phrygia, and Theodosius, metropolitan of Ephesus, and perhaps two or three more. Even Germansius, bishop of Constantinople, joined with Gregory II of Rome in the universal outcry against the emperor's attempt, and thus, almost for the first time, the bishops of the two Romes were (like Pius and Hesiod) united in the interest of a common cause. Whether provoked by the violence, and unreasonableness, and rebellious spirit of the opposition, or prompted by a growing zeal for the purity of religion, or by the obstinacy of personal pride and arbitrary power, or guided by considerations of presumed policy, or from whatever motives, the emperor soon after issued a second edict far more stringent and decisive. It commanded the total destruction of all images (or statues intended for worship) and the effacement of all pictures by the whitewash. The consequences were the same. The worshippers were maddened. The officer who attempted, in Constantinople, to execute the edict upon a statue of Christ renowned for its miracles, was assaulted by the women and beaten to death with clubs. The emperor sent an armed guard to suppress the tumult, and a frightful massacre was the consequence. Leo was regarded as no better than a Saracen. Even his successes against the common foe were ingeniously turned against him. A certain Cosmas was proclaimed emperor in Leo's stead, a fleet was armed, and Constantinople itself was made ready; but the news of the explosion in the fire, the insurrection was suppressed, the leaders either fell or were executed along with the usurper. A second revolt at Constantinople was not suppressed till after much bloodshed. Everywhere in the empire the monks were busy instigating and fomenting rebellion. Germansinus, bishop of Constantinople, already an octogenarian, as he could not conscientiously aid in the execution of the imperial decree, quietly retired, or suffered himself to be removed from his see. Quite so peaceful was the position pope Gregory II of Rome assumed. Following the example of his two predecessors, he seized the opportunity when the emperor had his hands full with seditious tumults and disturbances at home, and, confidently relying upon the support of the ignorant, and monk-ridden, and half-Christianized population of the West, dispatched to the emperor the two most arrogant and insolent letters, and condemned in unmeasured terms his war upon images as a war upon the Christian religion itself. The emperor ordered the execution of Ravnena to march upon Rome; but the pope, by the aid of the Lombards, compelled him to retire, and he had enough to do to maintain himself even at home. In fact, he was reduced to live in one quarter of Ravenna as a sort of captive; and finally Gregory III, the successor of Gregory II, in 731 held a council at Rome in which the Iconoclasts were anathematized. The emperor hereupon sent a formidable expedition against Italy, with special orders to reduce Ravenna. The expedition, however, failed, and Ravenna, with the Exarchate, fell into the hands of the Lombards, and thus Italy and the pope became practically independent of the Eastern empire. Leo now only sought the accomplishment of one object, viz., the detachment of Greece, Illyria, and Macedonia from the spiritual authority of Ravenna, and consequently annexed them to that of the patriarchs of Constantinople, and this created the real effective cause of the final schism of the Latin and Greek churches (784). The pope henceforth never submitted to the emperor, nor did he ever recover the lost portions of his patriarchate. Meantime, from the East, another voice joined in the fray—John of Damascus. He issued his fulminations against the emperor securely from under the protection of the caliphs, who were more pleased with the attacks upon Leo than scandalized by the defiance of the spiritual head. It was in the midst of this wild and protracted controversy that Leo died of dropsy in 741, and left to his son the accomplishment of a task which he had hoped he would himself effect.

As to the controversy itself, one of the strongest points ever made against the position of Leo is that he attacked the fine arts, and sought to destroy and abolish all the beauty and ornamentation of the Christian edifices. On this ground an earnest appeal has been made against him, and against all opponents of image worship, in the interests of a good cause. Even Neanthes, it is quite to take sides with Gregory against the barbarian emperor in this point of view. But, in the first place, it is by no means historically certain that Leo proceeded to any such lengths, or with such motives, in his iconoclast. He proposed simply to destroy objects of worship. He made no war upon beauty or art. If, in accordance with his plan, in the face of the furious opposition he met with, he was carried further, it was not for such, especially considering his education, the great difficulty of making nice distinctions in such cases and under such circumstances, and the known propensities of human nature and taste, by the enemies of the Church, to become, like the impious and discordant, especially the object of the Church, to become, like the impious and discordant, especially intolerant to the religious reverence for images. With the development of Grecian art Grecian idolatry lost its hold. It is a remarkable fact that the oldest and most important, and hideous ideals among the heathen are the widest and intense devotion; and among the Christian, it is the same, of the sacred, and the stained and bleeding figures, rudely imitating the human form, and not some Sistine Madonna, that has bent the knees of adoring multitudes. The image whose toe is now devoutly kissed by the faithful at St. Peter's, in Rome, is not remarkable for its artistic claims. If it was a barbarian, Gregory was hardly less so, as is evident from the letters of the latter to the emperor. The ignorance of the pope is almost as remarkable as his impudence. He expressly and repeatedly confounds the pious Hezekiah, who destroyed the brazen serpent, with his own apostate Arias, and under this card name pronounces him a self-willed violator of the priests of God. He apparently confounded them both with Ahasuerus, who was the grandson of the one and the father of the other. It is true, he prefers to quote the passage from the former's to ruin it than it should have been, so that the Pope, both of which he gave it, it could not have been in that edict; and if it had been, he did not know enough to correct the blunder. It is said that Leo was cruel in the execution of his decree. It may be so. He was a soldier, a Byantine emperor, and lived in the 6th century. "The history of the Ammonius, and the populace, which they controlled, had not violently resisted the imperial decree, there would have been no cruelty. It is said that Leo acted arbitrarily, as if he had been the master of the minds and con-science of men, to make and unmake their religion for them. This is too true, and this was his mistake; but all his predecessors, with Constantine the Great, had made the same mistake. It was a Byzantine tradition. It was the theory of the age. Protestantism, with the same creed in regard to images, has proceeded upon a different theory, and has succeeded. It is said that the Church, in her general councils, has decided against Leo. If so, it was not till after, in his son's reign, a council styling itself eccumenical, and regularly convoked as such, consisting of no less than 548 bishops, had unanimously decided in his favor. It is said that, at all events, there was no historical evidence of the iconoclasts in the succeeding history of the Church; that iconoclasts was crushed and brought to naught in the East and in the West, and images achieved a complete triumph. Iconoclasts was indeed crushed by the unnatural revolution of the Arian heresy. The Arian heresy was so baseless, that it could hardly be regarded as superior to that of Leo. In fact, the images are distinguished from pictures, Iconoclast has thus far triumphed in the East; and in the West it was not until after the earnest and manly resistance of Charlemagne and the Council of Frankfort that the image-worshiping pope and priestess finally, or rather for a time, carried their point.

4. Character of Leo. — Almost all we know of Leo comes to us through his enemies — his prejudiced, bigoted, unprincipled, enemies. So little of his most odious acts alleged against him, as the burning of the great library at Constantinople, are purely their malignant inventions. His motives are seen only through their jaundiced or infuriated eyes. His very words come to us for the most part, only through their garbled versions of his dados enemies, they have not been able so to distort, or blacken, or hide his true lineaments, but that he still stands out to an impartial observer one of the ablest, purest, manliest, and most respectable sovereigns that ever occupied the Constantinopolitan throne. His rapid rise from obscurity to the pinnacle of power, his firm and successful administration amid foreign assaults and domestic plots, and his resolute prosecution of the reformation of the Church, all indicate a wise and provident policy, grand vigor, and decision of will. His early military life may have rendered him cruel and obstinate; but the clueness and severity of his manners. He was in many respects, and particularly in a certain rugged and straightforward honesty and strength of purpose, just the man needed for the times. How much better and wiser he was than he appears we cannot say, but there is every reason to believe that a full and fair view of his history, if it could now be unearsted from the monkish rubbish, and rottenness, and filth that have overwhelmed it, would present him in a vastly more favorable light than that in which he has been left to stand. LEO THE MAGNENTUS (Μαγνήτου ή Μαγνητικός), a commentator on Aristotle, flourished during the first half of the 14th century. His name, Leo, is frequently omitted in the MSS. of his works. He was a monk, and after the death of Methodius of Morafa, the editor of Ammonius, he was elected to the See of Nicaea. His Commentary on Aristotle's "Posterior Analytics" has been preserved, and his Commentary on the "Prior Analytics" has been translated into Latin and published by Aldus, Venice, 1608, folio, with the commentary of Ammonius, from which Leo borrowed very largely, and the paraphrase of Paellus on the same book of Aristotle, and the commentary of Ammonius on Aristotle's Categoriae s. Prædicamentis. In the Latin title of this edition, by misprint, the author is called Margen-tinus. A Latin version of Leo's commentary, by J. B. Kasarius, has been repeatedly printed with the Latin version of Ammonius. Another Latin version by Jerome Leustrius has also been printed: — Ἐκλεξίας εἰς τὰ Πεπρομενα Ἀριστοτέλεα, Commentarius in Aristotelis De Interpretatione Librum (published by Aldus, Venice, 1608, folio, with the commentary of John Philopenus on the same work) by Trincavellus [Venice, 1586, fol.]; and a Latin version of the same commentary by Kasarius, has been repeatedly printed, either separately or with other commentaries on Aristotle. The following works in MS. are ascribed, but with doubtful correctness, to Leo Magnenetus: — "Commentarius in Categoriae Aristotelis (exstant in the King's library, Paris); — "Aequa Res (Mistriii, 1533, fol.); — Minuta Historia; — Prior Aristo-tes Aristotelis De Sophisticis Elenchis; and Aristo- teli de cænis epistomata. These two works are mentioned by Montfaucon (Bibl. Coelest., p. 235): the latter is perhaps not a distinct work, but a portion of the above. In the MS. the author is called Leonis Magentenus: — Commentarius in Isagogam quinque Voces Por-pagys. Buille doubts if this work, which is in the Me-dicane library at Florence (Bandini, Catalog. Codic. Lau.
Mons., p. 275), is properly to be considered Leonis Magn.
tenus: — Commentarius in Isagogam quinque Voces Por-Paghys. Buille conjectures, and with some reasons, that Isagoge is a corruption of Magnenatus or Magenatus: if so, and the works are assigned to their real author, we must add the commentaries on Topica and Analytica Posteri-oria to the works already mentioned. Nicolaus Commespopodi speaks of many other works of Leo, but his authority is of little value. See Fabricius, Bibl. Graeca, iii, 210, 218, 218, 428, vii, 717, viii, 143; xii, 208;

Leo of Mouza. See Leo da Modena.

Leo the Philosopher (Sapiens or Philosophus), a surname of Flavius Leo VI, emperor of Constantinople, named on the publication of the Basilica, was born A. D. 866. His father was the Magenatus, an uninterrupted series of wars and conquests. In 887 and 888 the Arabs invaded Asia Minor, landed in Italy and Sicily, plundered Samos and other islands in the Archipelag, and until 892 did away with imperial authority in the Italian dominions. By Cyril, his father-in-law and prime minister, Leo was subjected to a bloody war with the Byzantines; but, by involving them, through intrigues, in a war with the Hungarians, he succeeded in bringing the war with himself to a speedy termination. The following years were rendered remarkable by several conquests against the Arabs. That of 892 proved nearly fatal; it was fortunately discovered in time, and quelled by one Simons, who, in reward, was created patriarch, and enjoyed the emperor's favor until 910, when, suspected of treachery, and accused of abuse of his position, he was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. At the opening of the 10th century, the Arabs and northern neighbours of the empire made another at tack on the imperial possessions. The former once more invaded Sicily, and took Tarquinium, and in 904 appeared in the harbor of Tarsdolonicus with a numenious force; but they were repulsed by the inhabitants of the splendid city, destroyed a great portion of it, plundered the inhabitants generally, and left laden with booty and captives. Leo died in 911. He was married four times, in consequence of which he was excluded from the communion with the faithful by the patriarch Nicocas, as the Greek Church only tolerated a second marriage; it censured a third, and condemned a fourth as an atrocious sin.

How Leo came by the exalted name of Philosopher it is difficult to understand, except it be taken in an ironical sense. Gibbon, with a few striking words, gives the following character to this emperor: "His mind was tinged with the most puerile superstition; the infuence of the clergy and the efforts of the people were consacrated by his laws; and the oracles of Leo, which reveal in prophetic style the fates of the empire, are found in the arts of astrology and divination. Even still inquire the reason of his sage appellation, it can only be replied that the son of Basil was only less ignorant than the greater part of his contemporaries in Church and State; that his education had been directed in the learning of Roscinius, and that he was addicted to the fantastic and ecclesiastical science were composed by the pen or in the name of the imperial philosopher."

In speaking of Leo's literary merits, it is necessary to say a few words of his legislation. In his time the Latin language had long ceased to be the official language of The Eastern empire, and had gradually fallen into such disuse as only to be known to a few scholars, merchants, or navigators. The original laws, being written in Latin, opposed a serious obstacle to a fair and quick administration of justice; and the benefit of government.

The new Greek version is known under the title of Basilid Moriae, of which the chief works are: Basilid Lectorum, Basilid, and Basilid, the name of the editor, which means "Imperial Constitutions" or "Laws." It is divided into sixty books, subdivided into titles, and contains the whole of Justinian's legislation, viz. the Institutes, the Digest, the Code, and the Novellae: also such constitutions as were adduced by judges of Justinian down to Leo VI. There are, however, many laws of the Digest omitted in the Basilics, while they contain, on the other hand, a considerable number of laws, or extracts from ancient Jurists, not in the Digest.

The Basilics likewise give many early constitutions not in Justinian; and they were afterwards confirmed or made by the son of Leo, Constantine Porphyrogenitus. For the various editions published of the Basilics, see Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biogr., ii, 741.

The principal works written, or supposed to be written, by Leo VI or of special interest to him, were written in an verse, and accompanied by marginal drawings, on the fate of the future emperors and patriarchs of Constantinople, showing the super-

Lio if he believed in his divinity, and that of the people if they believed in the absurd predictions.

The seventeenth oracle on the restoration of Constantinople, was published in Greek and Latin by John Leuncchias (ad, clem. Const. Manasse, Basil. 1578, 8vo).
Janus Rutgerus edited the other sixteenth, with a Latin version by George Dousa (Leyden, 1618, 4to). Other editors, Epitome dell' Oraclio di Leoni imperatore, by T. Pacinius (Brixen, 1568), by Petrus Lycnus, with a revised text from an Amsterdam codex, also notes and new translation (Par. 1655, fol., ad clem. Codini).
A German and a Latin translation by John and Theodre de Dry appeared (Frankf. 1597, 4to). It is doubtful whether Leo is actually the author of the Oracle.
Fabricius gives a learned disquisition on the subject:

2. Orationes, mostly on theological subjects: one of them appeared in a Latin version by F. Metius, in Baronius' Annales: nine others by Garestius, in the 14th volume 4to); Oration of St. Chrysostomos, restored from the life of that father by Georgius Alexandrinus in the 8th volume of the Savilian ed. of Chrysostom (Antwerp, 1614,

LEO I

LEO I, emperor of Constantinople, was born in Thrace of obscure parents, entered the military service, and rose to high rank. At the death of the emperor Marcian in A.D. 457, he commanded a body of troops near Scyllyria, and was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers, at the instigation of Aspar, a Gothic chief, who commanded the auxiliaries. The senate of Constantinople confirmed the choice, and the patriarch Anatolius crowned him. This has been said to be the first instance of an emperor receiving the crown from the hands of a bishop, a ceremony which was afterwards adopted by all other Christian princes, and from which the clergy, as Gibbon justly observes, have derived the most formidable consequences. See Invevtiture. Leo followed the measures of Marcian against the Eutychians, who had been condemned at Chalcedon, and who had recently excited a tumult at Alexandria, had kept the peace, and placed one Amphilochius in his stead. Aspar, at a time screened Alaric; but Leo at last had him exiled, and an orthodox bishop put in his place. The Huns, having entered the province of Dacia, were defeated by the emperor at Tolbiac and a son of Attila was killed in the battle. Soon after, Leo, in concert with Anthemiuser, emperor of the West, prepared a numerous fleet, with a large body of troops on board, for the recovery of Africa, which was occupied by the Vandals. Part of the expedition attacked and took the island of Sardinia; the rest landed in Libya, and took Tripolis and other towns; but the delay and mismanagement of the commander, who was Leo's brother-in-law, gave time to Genseric to make his preparations. Coming out of the harbor of Carthage by night, with fire-ships impelled by a fair wind, he set fire to many of the imperial ships, dispersed the rest, and obliged the expedition to leave the coast of Africa. Leo died in January, 474.—Enl. Cyclopædia, a. v.; Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, i, 734.

LEO, saint and pope, surnamed the Great, noted as the real founder of the papacy, was born about the year 396, though the exact date is not ascertained. We have also no precise information as to his parentage, while the liber pontificum describes him as a Tuscan, and names Quintianus as his father. Quesnel, on the authority of an expression in one of Leo's own letters (xxxiii, 4), and an account of his election by a certain Pros- per, stated that he was born at Rome, and this opinion has been accepted without further inquiry by most subsequent ecclesiastical writers. While yet an acolyte, Leo was dispatched, in A.D. 418, to Carthage, for the purpose of conveying to Aurelius and the other African bishops the sentiments of Zosimus concerning the Pelagian doctrines of Celestius (C. v.). Under Celestine (C. v.) he discharged the duties of a deacon; and the reputation even then (481) enjoyed by him is clearly indicated by the terms of the epistle prefixed to the seven books De Incarnatione Chri- sti of Cassianus, who at his request had undertaken his work against the Mani- cies. About this time he was applied to by Cyril of Alexan- dria to settle a difficulty between Juval, bishop of Jerusalem, and the primate of the ecclesiastical prov- ince of Jerusalem. Having obtained a great reputation for his knowledge, energy, and untiring activity, he failed not to seize every opportunity for his noble purposes (c. 440), to whom he rendered valuable service, in several important offices intrusted to him. Attesting the notice of Valentine III, he undertook, by request of this emperor, a mission to Gaul, to soothe the formidable dissensions existing between the two generals Alboin and Albinus. While Leo was engaged in this delicate negotiation, which was conducted with singular prudence and perfect success, Sextius III died, Aug. 8, 440, and by the last will of the clergy the abbot of the descon Leo was chosen to fill the vacant seat. Envoyes were at once sent to Gaul to apprise him of his election, and having returned to Rome he was duly installed, Sept. 29, 440. Both the State and the Church were then in a critical position; the former in consequence of the frequent invasions of barbarians; the Church through its inner dissensions and quarrels. From the earliest ages until this epoch no man who combined lofty ambition with commanding intellect and political dexterity had presided over the Roman see; and although its influence had greatly increased, and many of its bishops had sought to extend and confirm that influence, yet they had merely availed themselves of accidental circumstances to augment their own personal authority, without acting upon any distinct and well-develo ped scheme. But Leo, while he zealously watched over his own peculiar flock, concentrated all the powers of his energetic mind upon one great design, which he seems to have formed at a very early period, and which he kept steadfastly in view during a long and eventful life, following it out with consummate boldness, perseverance, and success. This was nothing less than the establishment of the "apostolic chair" as a spiritual supremacy over every branch of the Catholic Church, and the exclusive appropriation for its occupant of the title of Papa, or father of the whole Christian world. Leo may therefore be regarded as the precursor of Gregory the Great, and in this respect certainly deserved the surname of Great, which was given him. The evil days amid which his lot was cast were not unfavorable, as might at first sight be supposed, to such a project. The contending parties among the orthodox clergy, terrified by the rapid progress of Arius, were disposed to refer their disputed disputes to arbitration. Leo, who well knew, from the example of his predecessor Innocent I, that the transition is easy from instruction to command, in the numerous and elaborate replies which he addressed to inquiries proceeding from various quarters, studiously adopted a tone of absolute infallibility, and assumed the right of enforcing obedience to his decisions as an unquestionable prerogative of his office, deriving authority for such a position from the relation of Peter to Christ and the apostles. He represented Peter as most intimately connected with Christ: "Petrum in unum cum Christo coniunctum, sed primum, qui proxime unitas assumit" (Sermo, viii, ii, 2). Here, finding dogmatical arguments unavailable for his purpose, Leo turns to history, which he arranges to suit himself. With regard now to the relation existing between the bishop of Rome and the other bishops, Leo says expressly, "All the bishops have not the same voice among his brethren. Again, those who occupy more important seats (the metropolitans of dioceses) have still greater power. But the direction of the Church must be indulgent, and no one can take anything away from him who is the head of all." Potent but unconscious instruments in forwarding Leo's ambitious schemes were found in the barbarian chiefs whose power was not yet consolidated, and who were eager to propitiate one who possessed such weight with the priesthood, and through them could either calm into submission or excite to rebellion an ignorant and fanatic multitude. But, though the minds of men were in some degree prepared and disposed to yield to such domination, it was scarcely to be expected that the effort should not provoke jealousy and resistance. A strong opposition was speedily organized both in the West and in the East, and soon assumed the attitude of open defiance. In the West the contest was brought to an issue by the controversy with Hilary of Arles (see HILARIUS ARLESIENSIS) concerning the deposition of Beneventi, bishop of Beneventum (Beaseno), who had married a widow, which was forbidden by the canons. Chelidonius appealed to Leo, who reinstated him in his see. Hilary was summoned to Rome upon several charges brought against him by other bishops of Gaul, and his see was intruded upon with their mission—in him they are all saved; and it is for this reason that the Lord takes special care of him, and that his faith is prayed for specially, "tanquam allo- rum status certior sit futuros, si mens principis victa non fuerit." After identifying the Church with the manifestation of Christ, Leo identifies Peter with Christ. This primacy of Peter continues, therefore, for while the faith of Peter is retained, all the privileges attached to this faith in Peter remain also. This primacy continues among the bishops, for they hold the same relation towards Peter that Peter held towards Christ; as Christ was in Peter, so is Peter in his successors; it is still Peter who, through them, fulfills the command of Christ, "Feed my sheep." - "Christus tantum potentiam dedit ei, quem totius ecclesiae principem fecit, ut si quid exemptum a statu principalis sibi disponeat, iulius operius, iulius sit gubernaculis depo- tantum, cui dictum est: Et tu conversa cursum fratern tuae" (Sermone, iv, 4). While affecting the utmost humility when speaking of himself personally as unworthy of his high office, he speaks of that office itself as the most exalted station. It was more difficult for Leo, however, to prove that the bishop of Rome is the successor of St. Peter. Rome, says Leo, has been glorified by the death of the two greatest apostles, Peter and Paul, who brought the Gospel to Italy. He introduced the idea of special Providence in this coming of Peter to Rome, so that that city should through him and in him become the centre of the Christian world. "Ut hujus eterna- bilis gratiae (incarnations) per totum mundum diffun- dereter effectus, hujus aeternum regnum divinitatis secundum ad eos limites incrementa perdu- centur, quibus cunctarum undique gentium vicina et con- tigua esse universitas." Disposito namque divinitas operi maxime congruenter, ut multa regna uno confoede- rarantur imperio et cito pervos habitares populos predictos - ut plurimum manus ad esse munera Christianarum (Sermone, lixxii, 2). Here, finding dogmatical arguments unavailable for his purpose, Leo turns to history, which he arranges to suit himself. With regard now to the relation existing between the bishop of Rome and the other bishops, Leo says expressly, "All the bishops have not the same voice among his brethren. Again, those who occupy more important seats (the metropolitans of dioceses) have still greater power. But the direction of the Church must be indulgent, and no one can take anything away from him who is the head of all." Potent but unconscious instruments in forwarding Leo's ambitious schemes were found in the barbarian chiefs whose power was not yet consolidated, and who were eager to propitiate one who possessed such weight with the priesthood, and through them could either calm into submission or excite to rebellion an ignorant and fanatic multitude. But, though the minds of men were in some degree prepared and disposed to yield to such domination, it was scarcely to be expected that the effort should not provoke jealousy and resistance. A strong opposition was speedily organized both in the West and in the East, and soon assumed the attitude of open defiance. In the West the contest was brought to an issue by the controversy with Hilary of Arles (see HILARIUS ARLESIENSIS) concerning the deposition of Beneventi, bishop of Beneventum (Beaseno), who had married a widow, which was forbidden by the canons. Chelidonius appealed to Leo, who reinstated him in his see. Hilary was summoned to Rome upon several charges brought against him by other bishops of Gaul, and his see was intruded upon with their mission—in him they are all saved; and it is for this reason that the Lord takes special care of him, and that his faith is prayed for specially, "tanquam allo- rum status certior sit futuros, si mens principis victa non fuerit." After identifying the Church with the manifestation of Christ, Leo identifies Peter with Christ. This primacy of Peter continues, therefore, for while the faith of Peter is retained, all the privileges attached to this faith in Peter remain also. This primacy continues among the bishops, for they hold the same relation towards Peter that Peter held towards Christ; as Christ was in Peter, so is Peter in his successors; it is still Peter who, through them, fulfills the command of Christ, "Feed my sheep." - "Christus tantum potentiam dedit ei, quem totius ecclesiae principem fecit, ut si quid exemptum a statu principalis sibi disponeat, iulius operius, iulius sit gubernaculis depo-pension, however, does not appear to have been lasting, although the fact has been taken hold of by controversial writers as a stretch of jurisdiction in the see of Rome. Quensted published a dissertation upon this controversy in his edition of the works of Leo (Paris, 1675).

The total defeat and severe punishment of the Gallican bishop filled his supporters with terror, and the edict of Valentinian served as a sort of charter, in virtue of which the Roman bishops retained for centuries undisputed jurisdiction over France, Spain, Germany, and Britain. In the East the struggle was much more complicated and the result much less satisfactory. The archimandrite Eutyches (q. v.), in his vehement denunciation of Nestorius, having been betrayed into errors, very disgracefully preserved his name to posterity. Eutyches was anathematized, deposed, and excommunicated, in A.D. 448, by the synod of Constantinople. Against this sentence he sought redress by soliciting the interference of the bishops of Alexandria and Rome. His cause was eagerly espoused by the former. As for Leo, he wrote to the patriarch Flavianus (q. v.), telling him that he had been informed of the disturbances which had taken place in the Church of Constantinople by the emperor, and was surprised that Flavianus had not at once written to him about it, and informed him thereof before the synod. In a letter preserved to us by Eutyches, Leo also informed Flavianus that he had received a letter from Eutyches complaining that his excommunication had been without just cause, and that his appeal to Rome had not been considered. Flavianus was sent to Rome as a competent envoy, with full information of all the particulars of the case, to render final judgment in the matter. In a case like the present, says Leo, in his conclusion, the first thing of all to be attended to is "ut sine strepitu concertantur et custodiat curiae et veritas defendatur." In a letter of the same date to the emperor, Leo reaffirms that Theodosius has not only been a royal, but also a priestly, heart, and carefully guarded against schism, for the state also is in the best condition when the holy Trinity is worshipped in unity." Meanwhile a general council was summoned to be held on the 1st of August, 449, at Ephesus, and thither the ambassadors of Leo repaired, for the purpose of reading publicly the above letter to Flavianus. But a great majority of the congregated fathers, acting under control of the president, Dioscurus of Alexandria, refused to listen to the document, passed tumultuously a series of anathemas, presuming that Leo had been influenced by the most zealous of his opponents, and not only treated the Roman envoys with indignity, but even offered violence to their persons. Hence this assembly, whose acts were all subsequently annulled, is known in ecclesiastical history as the Synodus Latrocinivialis. The vehement denunciation of Eutyches, and from posterity, have identified the men- chieves, and from posterity, have identified the men-chit for their own advantage. In the meantime, the orthodox leaders proved fruitless, and the triumph of their opponents was for a time complete, when the sudden death of the emperor, in 450, again awakened the hopes and called forth the exertions of Leo. In consequence of the pressing representations of his envoys, Anatolius, the successor of Flavianus, together with all the clergy of Constantinople, was induced to subscribe the Confession of Faith contained in the Epistle to Flavianus, and to transmit it for signature to all the dioceses of the East. Encouraged by this success, Leo solicited the new monarch, Marcellus, to summon a grand council for the final adjustment of the question concerning the nature of Christ, which still proved a source of discord, and strained every nerve to have it held in Italy, where his own adherents would necessarily have preponderated. In the end, the request was granted, and the council met at Chalcedon in October, 451. Although the Roman legates, whose language was of the most imperious description, did not fail broadly to assert the pretensions put forth by the representatives of St. Peter, at first all went smoothly. The Epistle to Flavianus was adopted, together with all the conclusions if the general council if the universal Church, and no protest was entered against the spirit of arrogant assumption in which it was conceived. But when the whole of the special business was concluded, at the very last sitting, a formal resolution was proposed and passed, to the effect that while the obscure see was, in virtue of its antiquity, entitled to take formal precedence of every other, the see of Constantineople was to stand next in rank, was to be regarded as independent from every other, and to exercise full jurisdiction over the churches of Africa.

The resistance of Leo was all in vain. The obvious canons were fully confirmed, and thus one half of the sovereignty at which he aimed was lost forever, at the very moment when victory seemed no longer doubtful. Leo made another and last effort on the 22d of May, 452, when the emperor, Marcellus, was at Constantinople, opening, but in vain, to excommunicate Anatolius. In 457, after the death of Marcellus, the party of Eutyches made a last effort, and besought the new emperor to assemble a council to condemn the decrees of that of Chalcedon, but the emperor refused to yield to this request.

In the mean time serious events were occurring place at Rome. In 452 the dreaded king of the Huns, Attila, invaded Italy, and, after sacking and plundering Aquileia, Pavia, and Milan, he marched against Rome. Valentinian, proving himself unfit for his high position, fled to Athens and leave Leo to manage the affairs of the state. In 452 Leo also secured the flight only. The Roman senate assembled to deliberate on what should be done in this emergency, and resistance being considered impossible, Leo was chosen as a mediator and sent to Attila. What the arguments employed by the eloquent suppliant may have been is history has failed to record; but the Huns spared Rome, and in consideration of a sum paid by the inhabitants, withdrew from Italy and retired beyond the Danube. This action of Attila appeared so strange that it was considered impossible to account for it except by a miracle. According to the legend, Attila confessed to his officers that during the address of Leo a venerable old man appeared to him, holding a sword with which he threatened to slay him if he resisted the voice of God. When again in 455 Rome lay at the mercy of the Vandals, who, taking advantage of the disturbance which followed the death of Valentinian, had invaded Italy, the senate had a second time recourse to Leo, and sent him to Genseric. But this time his eloquence did not prove so successful. Genseric consented only to promise not to burn the city, and to spare the life of the inhabitants, but to depart from the city and from the surrounding country. Of the disturbance the most zealous of his opponents, and not only treated the Roman envoys with indignity, but even offered violence to their persons. Hence this assembly, whose acts were all subsequently annulled, is known in ecclesiastical history as the Synodus Latrocinivialis. The vehement denunciation of Eutyches, and from posterity, have identified the men-chit for their own advantage. In the meantime, the orthodox leaders proved fruitless, and the triumph of their opponents was for a time complete, when the sudden death of the emperor, in 450, again awakened the hopes and called forth the exertions of Leo. The works of Leo consist of discourses delivered on the great festivals of the Church, or on other solemn occasions, and of letters. 1. Sermo 21, Of those, the first three, delivered while he was bowed down to posterity, we possess 96. There are 5 De Natali ipsius, preached on anniversaries of his ordination, 6 De Collecta, 9 De Jejurnali Decimi Mensis, 10 De Nativitate Domini, 8 In Epiphania Domini, 19 De Psalmone Domini, 8 De Reversione Domini, 3 De Ascensione Domini, 3 De Pentecoste, 4 De Jejurnali Pentecostes, 1 In Natali Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, 1 In Natali S. Petri Apostoli, 1 In Octavia Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, 1 In Natali S. Laurentii Martyris, 9 De Jejurnali Septimi Mensis, 1 De Gratia Anomolius ad Basiliadam, 1 Tractatus contra Herrenan Eutychis. Milman (Hist. Lat. Christianity, i, 258) thus comments on these productions of Leo: "His sermons singularly contrast with the florid, declamatory, and often imaginative and impassioned style of the Greek preachers. They are brief, simple, severe; without oratory, metaphysics, or enthusiasm; without passion; it is the Roman censor animadverting with nervous majesty on the vices of the people; the Roman prator dictating the law, and delivering with authority the doctrine of the faith. They are singularly Christian as dwelling almost exclusively on Christ, his life; his death, and his resurrection. They are so far as called upon by the prevailing controversies to assert with special emphasis the perfect deity and the perfect manhood of Christ." II. EPITOLA.—These, extending to the number of 178, are addressed to the reigning emperors and their families, to synods, to religious communities, to bishops and other dignitaries, and to sundry individual persons connected with the ecclesiastical history of the times. They afford an immense mass of most valuable information on the prevailing heresies, controversies, and doubts on matters of doctrine, discipline, and Church government. Besides the 96 Sermones and 178 Epitola mentioned above, a considerable number of tracts have from time to time been ascribed to this pope, but their authenticity is either so doubtful or their spuriousness so evident that they are now universally set aside. A list of these, and an investigation of their origin, will be found in the edition of the brothers Ballerini, more particularly described below. In consequence of the reputation deservedly gained by Leo, his writings have always been eagerly studied. But, although a vast number of MSS. are still in existence, the whole do not exhibit anything in a complete form, and no attempt seems to have been made to bring together any portion of them for many hundreds of years after his death. The Sermones were dispersed in the Lectionaria, or select discourses of distinguished divines, employed in places of public worship until the 11th century, when they first began to be picked out of these cumbrous handwritten and transcribed separately, while the Epitola were gradually gathered into imperfect groups, or remained embodied in the general collections of papal constitutions and canons. Of the numerous printed editions of Leo I's works, the first was published by Sweeneyhm and Pannartz (Rome, 1470, fol.), under the inspection of Andrew, bishop of Aloria, comprising 92 Sermones and 8 Epitola. The best two editions were published at Paris (1675, 2 vols. 4to) by Fasquier Quanuel and by the Ballerini (Verona, 1755-57, 8 vols. fol.). Of these last, it is due to say that, by the aid of a large number of MSS. preserved chiefly in the libraries of France, he was enabled to introduce such essential improvements into the text, and by his erudite industry illustrated so clearly the objections in which many of the dogmatists were involved, that the works of Leo now for the first time assumed an unintelligible, intelligible, and satisfactory aspect. But the admiration excited by the skill with which the arduous task had been executed soon received a check. Upon attentive perusal the notes and dissertations were found to contain such free remarks upon many of the opinions and usages of the primitive Church, and, above all, to manifest such unequivocal hostility to the despotism of the Roman see, that the volumes fell under the ban of the Inquisition very shortly after their publication, and were included in the Index Librorum Prohibitorum of 1682. Notwithstanding these denunciations, the book enjoyed great popularity, and was reprinted, without any suppression or modification of the onoxious passages, at Lyons, in 1700. Hence the heads of the Roman Church anxiously to supply an antidote to the poison so extensively circulated. This undertaking was first attempted by Peter Caccari, a Carmelite monk of the Propaganda, whose labors (S. Leontia Magi Opera omnia [Rome, 1786-1785, 2 vols. fol.]; Excursus in Universa S. Leontia Magi Opera [Rome, 1751, fol.] might have attracted attention and praise had they not been, at the very moment when they were brought to a close, entirely thrown into the shade by those of the brothers Peter and Jerome Balle- rini, presbyters of Verona. Their edition, indeed, is entitiled "first printed," and, by the careful accuracy of the text, corrected from a great number of MSS., chiefly Roman, not before collated, the arrangement of the different parts, and the notes and disquisitions. A full description of these volumes, as well as of those of Quonell and Caccari, is to be found in Schenmann (Bibl., 6, 3, p. 360). This edition is, however, still unequal to usual care upon this section. See Maimbourg, Histoire du Pontificat de Leon (Paris, 1876, 4to); Arndt, Leo d. Grosse (Mainz, 1885, 8vo); Gesch. d. Rom. Leo II, Pope, was born at Cedelle, in Sicily, in the early part of the 7th century. He became first canon regular, then cardinal priest, and finally pope, as successor of Agatho. Although his predecessor had died in January of the same year, he was installed as late as August, 682, by the emperor Constantine V, as the "most holy and blessed archbishop of old Rome, and universal pope." The reasons of this delay are unknown. Soon after his election Constantine requested him to send to Constantinople an ambassador, with full authority to decide at once on all questions of dogmas and canons, and other ecclesiastical interests. But Leo, perceiving the aim of the request, sent only a sub-deacon, who was not a Lat., but a native of Constantinople. The reasons for this were that it was the pope's first consulting with Rome. He also immediately assembled a synod to approve of the acts of the sixth ecumenical council held at Constantinople in 681, which had been brought to Rome by the legates of Agatho. On May 28, 683, the council met, and among other things, they anathematizing the heresy of the Monothelitians, and also pope Honorius (625-686), "who, instead of purifying the Apostolic Church by the doctrines of the apostles, has come near overthrowing the faith by his treason" (Labebe, Conc. vi. 1246). Leo sought to induce all the churches to accept the decisions of that council, and for that purpose translated them from Greek to Latin, sending a copy of them in the latter language to the Spanish bishops. He appears also to have given his ambassador four letters, somewhat similar as to their contents (see Mansi, xi. 1060-1068), addressed to the bishops of Ostrogorgia, count Simplicius, king Erwig, and the metropolitan bishop Quiricus of Toledo, expressing his wish that all the bishops of Spain would induct the acts of the Council of Constantinople. In these letters he says: "Honoriaus has falsified the inviolable rule of apostolic succession which he had received from his predecessor, Simplicius, and his son, the abbot of Lucena, denies the authenticity of these letters, while Pagi attempts to uphold it; Größer (Kirchenresep. vol. iii. pt. i. p. 397 sq.) also maintains their genuineness, and adds in proof of it their corresponding precisely with the decisions of the fourteenth Council of Toledo. Leo also obtained from Pope Gregory a promise that after the death of the titular archbishop of Ravenna his successors should, according to an old custom fall into disuse, come to Rome to be consecrated. In exchange for this concession, Leo relieved the see of Ravenna from the obligation of paying the taxes formerly levied on the see of Rome, according to an ancient privilege, as a great friend of Church music, and did much towards improving the Gregorian chant. He built a church to St. Paul, and is said to have originated the custom of sprinkling the people with holy water. He died in July, 668: the Emperor Maurice ordained that on every Sunday the Catholic Church commemorates him on the 29th of June. See Dupin, Biblioth. des Acta. Leo III., Pope, who brought about the elevation of the Frankish king to the position of emperor of the West, and thus relieved the Roman pontificate of further claims of the Lombards, was a native of the Eternal City, and was elected after the death of Adrian I., Dec. 26, 795. Immediately after his election he communicated the intelligence to Charlemagne, and, like his predecessor, acknowledged allegiance. Charlemagne then asked of Pope Leo who should be consecrated pope, in which he intrusted the abbot Angilbertus, whom he commissioned to confer with the new pontiff respecting the relations between the see of Rome and the "Patrician of the Romans," for this was the title which Charlemagne had assumed. In 796 Leo sent to Charlemagne the keys of St. Peter and the standard of the city of Rome, requesting the king to send some of his nobles to administer the oaths of allegiance to the people of Rome, and thus the dominion of Charlemagne was extended over the city and duchy of Rome. In the year 799, an atrocious assault, the motive of which is not clearlyascertained, was committed on the person of the pope. While Leo was riding on horseback, followed by the clergy, and chanting the liturgy, a canon by the name of Paschal and a sacerdote called Campus, accompanied by many armed ruffians, fell upon him, threw him from his horse, and dragged him into the convent of St. Sylvester, when they stabbed him in many places, endeavoring to put out his eyes and cut out his tongue. Leo, however, was delivered by his friends from the hands of the assassins, and taken to Spoleti under the protection of the duke. After some time he returned to Rome, and travelled as far as Paderborn in Germany, where Charlemagne then was, by whom the pope was received with the greatest honors. Charlemagne sent him back to Rome with a numerous escort of bishops and counts, and also of armed men. The pope was met outside the city gates by the clergy, senator, and people, and ac- companied in triumph to the Lateran palace. A court composed of the bishops and counts proceeded to the trial of the conspirators who had attempted the life of the pope, and the two chief, Paschal and Campus, were exiled to France. From this very event and other concomitant circumstances, it appears that Charlemagne had greatly at heart the conciliation of the Romans in general, in order to deter them from betaking themselves again to the protection of the Greek emperors. In 800 Charlemagne himself, as Leo vii., was met at Nomentum, outside of Rome, by the pope, and the next day he repaired to the Basilica of the Vatican, escorted by the soldiers and the people. After a few days Charlemagne convoked a numerous assembly of prelates, abbots, and other persons of distinction, Franks as well as Lombards. In this assembly the certain indulgence against the pope by the partisans of Paschal and Campus, but no proofs were elicited, and Leo himself, taking the book of gospels in his hand, declared himself innocent. On Christmas-day of that year the pontiff offered in the Basilica of the Vatican, in presence of Charlemagne and his numerous retinue. As Charlemagne was preparing to leave the church, the pontiff stopped him, and placed a rich crown upon his head, while the clergy and the people, at the same moment, cried out "Carolo piisimo," "Augusto magni imperator," with much enthusiasm. In many capitals, in both sides of the Alps, were worn in proclaiming Roman emperors. Three times the acclamations were repeated, after which the pope was the first to pay homage to the new emperor. From that time Charlemagne left off the titles of king and of himself Augustus and emperor of the Romans, and he addressed himself to Charlemagne by the title of Constantinople by the name of brother. Thus was the Western empire revived 825 years after Odoacer had deposed Romulus Augustus, the last nominal successor of the Cæsar on the throne of the West. From that time all claims to the title of emperor of the Romans on the side of the Eastern Empire were discarded, and the Roman emperors, from this time, bore the title of Roman patriarch. In the year 802 the dominion over the duchy of Rome was at an end, and the popes from the same date assumed the temporal authority over the city and duchy, in subordination, however, to Charlemagne and his successors; they began, also, to coin money, with the pontiff's name on one side and that of the emperor on the other side. The emperor, while visiting the pope's residence, during Christmas, visited Charlemagne at his court at Aquignara (Aix-la-Chapelle). In the division which Charlemagne made by will of his dominions among his sons, the city of Rome was declared to belong to him. After his death the title of Roman emperor was afterwards invested with that title by Charlemagne himself, and we find him accordingly, after the death of his father, assuming the supreme jurisdiction over that city on the occasion of a fresh conspiracy which broke out against Leo, the heads of which were convicted by the ordinary courts of Rome, and put to death. Louis found fault with the rigor of the sentence and the haste of its execution, and he ordered his nephew, Bernard, king of Italy, to proceed to Rome and investigate the whole affair. Leo, who seems to have been alarmed at this proceeding, sent messengers to the court of Louis to justify himself. Meanwhile he fell seriously ill, and the people of Rome broke out into insurrection, and pulled down some buildings he had begun to construct on the confiscated property of the conspirators. The duke of Spoleti was sent for with a body of troops to suppress the tumult, when Leo suddenly expired in 816, and Stephen IV was elected in his place. Leo is praised by Anastasius, a biographer of the same century, for the many structures, especially churches, which he raised or repaired, and the valuable gifts with which he enriched the churches. In his lifetime he was held to have been more moderate and prudent than his predecessor, Adrian I., who was perpetually soliciting Charlemagne in his letters for fresh grants of territory to his see. Thirteen letters of Leo are published in Labebe's Concilia, vii. 1111-1127. He is also considered the author of the Epistola ad Carolum Magnam imp., etc. edit.

Leo IV. Pope, was a native of Rome, and succeeded Sergius II in 847. He was hastily elected, and consecrated without waiting for the consent of the emperor Leo, because Rome was then threatened by the Saracens, who occupied part of the duchy of Benevento, and who a short time before had landed on the banks of the river, and plundered the basilica of St. Peter's on the Vatican, which was outside of the walls. Leo's consecration, however, was undertaken with the express reservation that the emperor's right was not interfered with, in order to prevent a recurrence of the violence of the Saracens. Leo undertook to surround the basilica and the suburb about it with walls, the emperor sent money to assist in the work. The building of this Roman suburb occupied four years, and it was named after its founder, Carthusia Leo. Leo also restored the town of Porta, on the Tibur, near its mouth, settling there some thousands of Coriscans, who had run away from their country on account of the Saracens. Towers were built on both banks of the river, and iron chains drawn across to prevent the vessels of the Saracens from ascending to Rome. The walls and the town of Centum Cellae being forsaken on account of the Saracens, Leo built a new town on the coast, about twelve miles distant from the other, which was called Leopolis; but no traces of it remain now, as the modern Civita Vecchia is built on or near the site of old Centum Cellae. Leo IV held a council at Rome in 853, in which Anastasius, cardinal of St. Marcelli, was deposed for having remained five years absent from Rome, notwithstanding the orders of the pope. Leo died in July, 855, and fifteen days after his death Benedict III was elected in his place, according to the most authentic text of Anastasius, who was a contemporary: but later writers introduce between Leo IV and Benedict III the fabulous pope Joan (q. v.). Leo has left us two entire epistles, as also fragments of several others, and a good homily, which are contained in Labbe's *Conc. Leo V. Pope, was born at Prispi, near Ardeia (according to some at Arezzo). He entered the order of Benedictines, became cardinal, and was finally elected to the papal chair Oct. 29, 903. A few days afterwards, Christopher, cardinal priest of St. Lorenzo, in Damaso, and chaplain of Leo, instigated an insurrection at Rome, and made the pope prisoner, under the plea that he was incapable of governing. Christopher himself did not remain long in the papal chair, as a new revolt of the Romans drove him from the usurped see, and put in place Sergius III, who was the favorite of the celebrated Marozia, a powerful but licentious woman, who disposed of everything in Rome. The 10th century may well be termed the era of the papacy. See Platina, History of Vitii Pontificum; Artaud de Montor, Hist. des souverains Pontifices Romains, ii, 62; Du Chène, Hist. des Popes; Baxmann, *Politik d. Leo VI. Pope, a native of Rome, succeeded John X July 6, 928, and died seven months afterwards; some say that he was put to death by Marozia, like his predecessor. He was succeeded by Stephan VII. See English Cyclopædia; Hoefer, Nova. Biogr. Générale, xxx, 712; Bower, History of the Popes, v, 95.

Leo VII. Pope, a Roman, sometimes called Leo VI, succeeded John XII, the son of Marozia, January 8, 956. He mediated peace between Alberic, duke of Rome, and Hugo, king of Italy, who had offered to marry Marozia, with the object of obtaining the possession of Rome, but was driven away by Alberic, also Marozia's son, Leo is said to have been a man of irreproachable conduct, but little is known of him. He died in 959, and was succeeded by Stephen VIII. We have of him an epitaphe to Hugo, abbot of St. Martin of Tours, published in D'achery's Epictogenium; two others to Gerard, archbishop of Lorch, and to the bishops of France and Germany. Leo VIII. Pope, a Roman, succeeded John XII, who was deposed for his misconduct by a council assembled at Rome, in presence of the emperor Otto I, in 964. But soon after Otto had left Rome, John XII came in again at the head of his partisans, obliged Leo to run away, and resumed the papal office. John, however, shortly after died or was murdered while committing adultery, and the Romans elected Benedict V. Otto, returning with an army, burned the city of Rome, deposed Benedict, and reinstated Leo, who died about 965, and was succeeded by John XIII. Leo IX. (Bruno), Pope, bishop of Toul, was born in Alsace in 1002, and was cousin-german of the emperor Conrad the Salic. He was noted for great scholarly attainments, and was elected in 1049 to succeed Damaso II, at the joint recommendation of the emperor Henry V and of the famous Hildebrand (afterwards Gregory VII), who became one of Leo IX's most trusted advisers and guides. Indeed, it has often been a matter of comment that the reign of Leo IX was rather Gregorian in tendency. Leo was continually in motion between Germany and Italy, holding councils and endeavoring to reform the monasteries and morals of the clergy. Hildebrand also tried to check the progress of the Normans in Southern Italy, against whom he led an army, but was defeated in Apulia and taken prisoner by the Normans, who treated him with great respect, but kept him for more than a year in Benevento. Having made peace with them by granting to them as a fief of the Roman see their conquests in Apulia and Calabria, he was allowed to return to Rome, where he died in 1054, and was succeeded by Victor II. Among the councils held by Leo IX, one was convened at Rome (1008) against Berengar (q. v.), who was in favor of the liberal theses of Hildebrand. The council held during his pontificate was that of Rheims in 1049, where many laws were enacted against simony, clerical matrimonial, and the conditions and relations of armed, made a last attempt to assert the Medici authority, and put down the insurrection by bold exercise of force. It soon, however, became but too apparrent to the young cardinal that his hope was all vanity.

"The people multiplied themselves against Pietro," as Guicciardini (Storia Fiorentina [Opere inedite], iii, 110) phrases it, and Giovanni, in the disguise of a friar, was glad enough to facilitate his escape. He was recon-vened on the open Bologna road, taking the same road as Pietro, followed by their younger brother Giuliano, still a mere lad. They went first to John Bentivoglio in Bologna, but, as they were not received here, went to Castello, and then, in the city of Vicenza. In any of other places, the Medici, the cardinal included, lived for some time, having frequent endeavors made for their restoration. But when Giovanni was finally persuaded that all such efforts were fruitless, he decided to quit his native country, now ravaged by foreign armies, and betrayed by the wretched policy of pope Alexander VI, and he set out on a journey to France, Germany, and the Netherlands. For the assertion that the cardinal undertook this journey for political ends there is not the slightest foundation. While abroad he sought literary associations only. He continued his expenditure of men of learning, and not unfrequently displayed his own taste for literature and the liberal arts. In 1508, upon the death of Alexander VI, against whom he cherished a bitter hatred, and on whose account only he had avoided Rome after the expulsion of his family from Florence, he returned to the latter city.

In 1508, finally, the youthful ecclesiastic, of but thirteen years of age, was by pope Innocent VIII (father-in-law of Gio-avanni's sister Maddalena) presented with the cardinal's cap, limited by the condition only that the insignia of this dignity might not be assumed until his studies had been completed at Pisa. Hitherto his education had been intrusted to tutors mainly, and among them were the famous Greek historian Chalcondylas, and the learned Angelo Poliziano, he now set out for Rome for Pisa, and having there completed his theological studies in 1492, was on March the 9th of that same year installed at Florence into the cardinal's position, and three days after set out for and took up his residence in the Eternal City. Scarse had a month passed his induction into the cardinal's dignity when intelligence reached Rome that Lorenzo the Magnificent was no more, and hastily Giovanni retraced his steps to Florence, and took support to his weak but elder brother Pietro, upon who now depended the continuance of the power of the Medici over Florence. In July of this year (1492) Innocent VIII died, and as Giovanni had opposed the election of Clement VII to the papal throne, he now no longer hoped for support from the papacy. Blindly and madly, amid all these disadvantages, Pietro, unsatisfied with absolute power unless he could display the pomp and exercise the cruelties of despotism, continued in the short space of two years, to secure, instead of the love and good will, the hatred of the Flor-entes. Their enthusiastic devotion to the house of the Medici hitherto alone prevented any attempt to subvert his authority. They remained quiet even in 1494, when Charles VIII of France came into Italy to enforce his claim to the throne of Naples, and when Pie-etro joined the house of Aragon, instead of becoming a confederate of the French, as his ancestors had always been. But when Pietro, equally presumptuous in security and timid in danger, terrified by the unexpected success of the French, fled to the camp of Charles, and, knowing at first to be gone for ever, and in 1495, to his mercy, the indignation of the Florentines could no longer be stayed, and, entering into a treaty with the French, they stipulated especially the exile of the Medici (Nov. 1494). After his capitulation to king Charles, Pietro had returned to Florence, but the faction at Paris had made his stay impossible, and he quickly fled the city. Giovanni, bolder and more courageous than his er elder brother, assisted by a few faithful friends, well-uliano soon after entered Florence, and, though they had asked only their restoration as private citizens, without any share in the government, they had hardly been re-admitted when they forced the signoria, or executive, to immediately call a "parlamento," or general assembly of the people, in the great square (September). This general assembly of the sovereign people had repeatedly been used by ambitious men as a ready instrument of their views, and it proved such on this occasion. All the laws enacted since the expulsion of the Medici in 1494 were abrogated. A "balla," or commission, was appointed, consisting of creatures of that party, with dictatorial powers to reform the state. No bloodshed, however, accompanied the reaction; but Soderini, having been deposed by the establishment of this new form of government, he and other citizens opposed to the Medici were banished, and "thus once again, after an exile of eighteen years, the fatal Medici were restored to Florence; once again fixed their fangs in the prey they had been scared away from, and 'the most democratical democracy in Europe' was once again muzzled and chained. A conspiracy of priest and soldier—that detestable and ominous combination, more baseful to human nature—and the poison of the pestilence was compounded out of its evil passions and blind stupidity—had as usual trampled out the hopes and possibilities of social civilization and progress" (Trollope, iv, 351), "to see whether mayhap Providence, in the utter inscrutableness of its wisdom, may consider him, Giovanni de' Medici, as the best and fittest person to be intrusted with heaven's vicegerency," accompanied in this excursion to the conclaves by Filippo Strozzi—son of the great banker, the founder of the still well-known Strozzi palace, possessor of one of the then largest fortunes in Florence, and "on whose young shoulders was one of the longest heads that day in Florence"—as his friend, companion, and, most likely, banker. "Especially in this last capacity was Filippo necessary to the aspiring cardinal, so soon to become pope by the grace of God and the capital of Strozzi." The younger members of the conclaves had previously decided to elect one of their own age as successor to Julius II, and upon cardinal de' Medici, only thirty-seven years of age, in whom Pius the Third had much importance, as we have seen by the quotation from Trollope, in a speech of the exercises of the banker Strozzi. One of the first acts of the new pontiff, who assumed the name of Leo X, was to appoint two men of learning, Bembo and Sadoleto, for his secretaries. He next sent a general amnesty to be published at Florence, where a conspiracy had been discovered against the Medici, for which two individuals had been executed, and others, with the celebrated Machiavelli among the rest, had been arrested and put to torture. Leo ordered Giuliano even to receive and recall those that were banished, Soderini among the rest. This act, however, did not remove Leo's hostility, and he was invited to Rome, where he was made gonfaloniere of the Holy Church. "All the rich and lucrative offices of the apostolic court were conferred on Florentines, not a little to the disgust of the Roman world" (Trollope, iv, 359). Of course, that Leo should do anything and everything to enhance the dignity and greatness of the Medici family no one could object to, and consequently, no one had aught to say when he appointed his nephew Lorenzo, the eldest son of Filippo, a profligate young scapegrace, but the only heir remaining to succeed in the grandeur of the Medici, and the reigning court of the republic and general in chief, with absolute and supreme authority over all the Tuscan forces contributed by the commonwealth to the armies of a new league formed in 1515 by the emperor, the king of Aragon, the duke of Milan, and the Florentines against France and Venice. To have made Lorenzo, as Leo would have liked to do, sovereign prince, under the title of duke or some other like distinction, would have been premature, but with the appointment as made no one found fault, and it passed generally approved. Any objection raised to Leo's further action in behalf of Florence, constituting it a dependency of Rome, which it continued during the remainder of his life. His cousin Giulio de' Medici, archbishop of Florence, on the decease of Julius II, Leo at once elevated to the cardinal's dignity, and, in addition, intrusted him with the legateship of Bologna. By these new positions the influence of the Medici had been greatly improved, but the ever-piloting Leo, far-seeing as he was, comprehended clearly that still more was needed to secure to his house the throne of Florence. Upon his accession to the pontificate he found the war renewed in Northern Italy. Louis XII had sent a fresh army, under La Trimmouille, to invade the duchy of Milan. The Swiss auxiliaries of duke Maximilian Sforza defeated La Trimmouille at Novara, and the French were driven back with great loss. This momentous event raised the Venetians themselves with Louis XII, and Leo sent Bembo to Venice to endeavor to break the alliance. Differences occurred between Leo and Alfonso d'Este, duke of Ferrara, who demanded the restoration of Reggio, taken from him by Julius II, which Leo promised, but never performed. The pope was now in his prime, and his emperor Maximilian, disregarding the rights of the house of Este to that town. The pope held likewise Parma and Piacenza, and it appears that he intended to form out of these a territory for his brother Giuliano, and he made attempts to surprise Ferrara also, with the same object. His successor, Marsilius of Pisa, acknowledged that of the Lateran. But in the following year Louis XII died, and his successor, Francis I, among other titles assumed that of duke of Milan. Under him a new Italian war opened. The Venetians joined Francis I, while the emperor Maximilian joined with the Swiss and the Swiss made a league to oppose the French. The pope did not openly join the league, but he negotiated with the Swiss by means of the cardinal of Sion, and paid them considerable sums to induce them to defend the north of Italy. The Swiss were posted near Susa, but Francis, led by old Ervino, passed the Alps by the Col de l'Argentier, entered the plains of Saluzzo, and marched upon Pavia, while the Swiss hastened back to defend Milan. The battle of Marignano was fought on the 14th of September, 1515. The Swiss made desperate efforts, and incurred probable destruction, but they were saved by Giulia Aliviano, with part of the Venetian troops, appeared suddenly with cries of "Viva San Marco," which dispirited the Swiss, who believed that the whole Venetian army was coming to the assistance of the French. The result was the retreat of the Swiss, and the emperor Maximilian, who took possession of the duchy. Leo now saw clearly that the salvation of his house lay in a union with France, and at once made proposals to Francis, who, in turn, eagerly embraced the proffered aid of the Church. It was on the 21st of October, 1515, that news reached Florence of this new alliance of the French monarch with the other and the French king Francis I for the mutual defense of their Italian states, the king obliging himself specially to protect the pontiff, Giuliano and Lorenzo de' Medici, and the Florentines, and that both Lorenzo and Giuliano should receive commissions in the French service. If the Medici were known as the protector and patron of art, and had well-nigh revived the High Gothic age of the Greeks, could he not break the thought that, while he was pontiff within the walls of the Eternal City, this great enterprise, likely to immortalize the name of its patron in the annals of art, should be passed over, and, finding the coffers of the papacy drained by his predecessor, saw only one way in which to secure the necessary funds for so stupendous an undertaking—the sale of indulgences (q.v.), securing to the contributor for this object forgiveness of sin in any form (comp. Mosheim, Eccles. Hist., ii, 66, note 6; Bower, Hist. of Stipecy, vii, 404 sq.; Robertson, Hist. of Reign of Charles I, ii, pp. 128, 129, especially the footnotes on p. 128). Such utter disregard of the essence of religion resulted in one of the boldest assaults on the Roman Church that it had ever sustained. The very thought that forgiveness of sin was to be offered on sale for money “must have been mortally offensive to men whose convictions on that head had been formed in contemplating the eternal relation between God and man, and who, moreover, had learned what the doctrine of Scripture itself was on the subject” (Banke, Hist. Pop., i, 66). In Saxony, especially, men of piety and thought generally condemned the practice, the great majority of the clergy gave to this subject. They all regretted the delusion of the people, who, being taught to rely for the pardon of their sins on the indulgences which they could secure by purchase, did not think it incumbent on themselves either to study the doctrine of the Church, or to practice the duties which it enjoins. Even the most unthink- ing were shocked at the scandalous behavior of the Dominicans—John Tetzel (q.v.) and his associates, who had the sale of indulgences intrusted to them—and at the manner in which they spent the funds accumulated from this traffic. These sums, which had been piously bestowed in hopes of obtaining eternal salvation and happiness, they saw squandered by the Dominican friars in drunkenness, gaming, and loud debauchery, and “all began to wish that some check were given to this commerce, no less detrimental to society than destructive to religion” (Robertson, p. 128). Indeed, even the princes and nobles objected to this traffic; they were irritated at seeing their vassals drained of so much wealth in order to replenish the treasury of a profuse pontiff, and when Luther’s warm and impetuous temper did not suffer him to remain longer among the forlorn of the Church, the Medicis was the house of Petrucci, headed by the cardin- ally of that name, who was led into a conspiracy to mur- der the pope by the latter’s expropriation of his brother from Sienna. Not satisfied with the acquisition of the duchy of Urbino, he purchased the free state of Sienna, lying between the territories of the Church and those of the republic of Florence, and to this end sent Borghesi, its governor, into exile. At first Borghesi’s brother, cardinal Petrucci, formed the mad design of stabling Leo on their first meeting, but he finally abandoned this enterprise as too daring, and a conspiracy was formed instead to cause the death of Leo X by poison. Fortunately for Leo, the plot to take his life was timely discovered, and the cardinal expiated the intended crime with his life by secret strangling, while many others of his social standing suffered abjection and other punishments. To secure himself against a second attempt of the kind, Leo now (1517) created a whole host of able and experienced Florentines cardinals—no less than thirty-one of them altogether. It was about this time also that the Lateran Council ap- proached its close, and that the decision was reached which resulted so unfavorably to the cause of the papacy and the Church of Rome, and have made the year 1517 forever memorable in the ecclesiastical annals for the foundation and commencement it gave to the revolution in the Church, commonly known by the name of the Reforma- tion (q.v.). One of the greatest desires of Leo X, as pope of Rome, was the continuation of the incomcularly sensitive on account of some recent humiliations, particularly by the case of Saxony (q.v.), the Events at Bern, and by the still surviving controversy with Beuchlin (q.v.), aside from the fact that the different mendiant orders cherished constant jealousy against each other. (The conjecture of some that the jealousy of the Augustinian monk was apparent in Luther's attack on the Dominicans is incorrect: he had intrusted the indulgence traffic is too ridiculous to need repetition here. Comp. however, Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. iv, 25, note 17; Mosheim, Eccl. Hist. bk. iv, cent. xvi, sec. i, ch. ii, note 18.) In opposition to Luther's theses, Tetzel himself came forward with a charter, which he published at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Prominent among others also were Eck (q.v.), the celebrated Augsburg divine, and Prierias (q.v.), the inquisitor general, who both replied to the Augustinian monk with all the virulence of scholastic disputants. But the manner in which they conducted the controversy did little service to their cause. Luther attempted to combat indulgences by arguments founded in reason or derived from the Scriptures; they produced nothing in support of them but the sentiments of the schoolmen, and the conclusions of the canon law, and the gentle words of the Pope. The edict of the judges, so partial and interested did not satisfy the people, who began to call into question even the authority of these venerable guides when they found them standing in direct opposition to the dictates of reason and the determination of the divine law" (Robertson, p. 128). At this juncture Reformation and Reformata were renewed with greater animosity than before. See CARLISLADT; ECK; LEPISIUS DISPUTATION. Luther was forced to reply; the primacy of the pope and other questions became involved, which may be studied in the additional references on the part of the reformers, and "in this way Luther gained so thorough an insight into the errors and corruption of the Roman Church that he gradually began to see the necessity of separating himself from it. He felt himself called as a soldier of God to fight against the Pope and the devil, by which the Church was corrupted" (Gieseler, iv, 49). In this he did hereafter, fearless of consequences, by both his pen and tongue. Luther's was a nature that recolled from no extremity. The result was "the bull of condemnation," issued June 15, 1520, which brought about the formal abjuration of the pope, on the part of Luther by the public burning of the bull, together with the papal law-books, Dec. 10 of this very year. January 8, 1521, came the bull of excommunication, and a demand for its execution by the Diet of Worms, the body to which Luther appeared. See REFORMATION.

With this direct condemnation on the part of the German reformers, Luther was received with great warmth in Germany, and threatened the very existence of Romanism, pope Leo was much more concerned with what occurred around him in Italy. A politician of the best sort in the affairs of his native country; very, extremely efficient in his business, calling for prompt action on the political horizon than any that had yet appeared, in his estimation, on that of ecclesiasticism. Leo, indeed, trembled for Florence at the prospect of beholding the imperial crown placed on the head of the king of Spain and of Naples, and the master of the New World; nor was he less afraid of seeing the king of France, who was the duke of Milan and lord of Genoa, exalted to that dignity. He even foretold that the election of either of them would be fatal to the independence of the holy see, to the peace of Italy, and perhaps to the liberties of Europe. But June 29, 1519, the king of Spain was elected successor to Maximilian. This was, indeed, an event calculated to cause a series of infinite perplexities to God's vicegerent on earth. So the important decision was taken, a secret league, offensive and defensive, signed by the new Caesar on July 8, 1521, by which it was stipulated that the duchy of Milan was to be taken from the French and given to Francesco Maria Sforza, and Parma and Piacenza to be restored to the pope. Leo subsidized a body of Swiss, and Prospero Colonna, with a body of others, and the Swibert de Nobili, the pope's own chamberlain, Charles of Miltitz (q.v.), was dispatched in December (1518) to give assurances to the electoral prince Frederick, by the valuable present of the consecrated golden rose (q.v.), of the good Intentions of the pope. Leo towards Saxony, and at the same time, if possible, to conciliate Luther, in whom was now seen the representative of Wittenberg University, and at whose back stood one to whom even his enemies confess but few men of any age can be compared, either for learning and knowledge of both human and divine things; and to rich endowment in both primary and facility of genius, or for industry as a scholar—Philip Melanchthon (q.v.). Unfortunately for the cause of the Dominicans, this very elector of Saxony, who had identified himself with and become the champion of the cause of the Wittenberg reform movement, was now, upon the death of Maximilian I, made regent of the empire in northern Germany (Jan. 12, 1519), and Miltitz saw the only way in which to settle the controversy—by appeasing the wrath of Luther. He accordingly flattered "the friar of Wittenberg," as he was contemptuously called, by the promise of kindness, assured him that his case had been misrepresented to Leo, and actually succeeded in inducing Luther to promise, not, indeed, recantation, as he desired, but a promise to be silent if his opponents were silent, and an open declaration of obedience to the see of Rome; thus the controversy was settled at Augsburg. The opponents, however, were not silent; the controversy was renewed with greater animosity than before. more clear of the French, and restored to the dominion of Sforza. Parma and Piacenza were again occupied by the papal troops, and John Leo I sent Alfonso d'Este a rebel to the holy sea for having sided with the French, while the duke, on his part, complained of the bad faith of the pope in keeping possession of Modena and Reggio. The news of the taking of Milan was celebrated at Rome with public rejoicings, but little comfort did this afford the minds of all this Leo fell ill on Nov. 26, and died Dec. 1, 1521, not without reasonable suspicion of poison, though some have maintained that he died a natural death. (See Trollope, Hist. of Florence, iv. 385 sq., who quotes strong proof in favor of the assertion that Leo died by poison.)

Personally Leo was generous, rather prodigal; he was fond of splendor, luxury, and magnificence, and therefore often in want of money, which he was obliged to raise by means not often creditable. He had a discerning taste, was a ready patron of real merit, was fond of wit and humor, not always refined, and at times degenerating into buffoonery: this was, indeed, one of his principal faults. His state policy was like that of his contemporaries in general, and not so bad as that of some of them. He contrived, however, to keep the territories of the papal states in Florence in profound peace during his reign—no trifling boon—while all the rest of Italy was ravaged by French, and Germans, and Spaniards, who committed all kinds of atrocities. He was by no means neglectful of his temporal duties, although he was fond of conviviality and ease, and many charges have been brought against his morals. He did not, and perhaps could not, enforce a strict discipline among the clergy or the people of Rome, where profanity and licentiousness had reigned almost uncontrolled ever since the pontificate of Alexander VI. It is to be regretted, however, that any one should have been able to say of so pious a distinguished man as a patron of learning as Leo X that in his splendid and luxurious papal Christianity had given place, both in its religious and moral influence, to the revived philosophy and the unregulated manners of Greece; that the Vatican was visited less for the purpose of worshiping the footprints of the apostles than to admire the great works of ancient art stored in the papal palace (comp. London Quart. Rev. 1886, p. 294 sq.; Taine, Italy [Rome and Naples], p. 185.). As a pontificate, that of Leo X, though it lasted only nine years, "forms one of the most eventful epochs in the modern Europe, whether we consider it in a political light as a period of transition for Italy, when the power of Charles V of Spain began to establish itself in that country, or whether we look upon it as that period in the history of the Western Church which was marked by the momentous event of Luther's Reformation. But there is a third and a more favorable aspect under which the reign of Leo ought to be viewed, as a flourishing epoch for learning and the arts, which were encouraged by that pontiff, as they had been by his father, and, indeed, as they had been by his family in general, and for which the glorious appellation of the age of Leo X has been given to the first part of the 16th century" (Engl. Cyclop.). The services which Leo rendered to literature are many. He encouraged the study of Greek, founded a Greek college at Rome, established a Greek press, and gave the direction of it to John Lascaris; he restored the Roman University, and filled its numerous chairs with professors; he directed the collecting of MSS. of the classics, and also of Oriental writers, as well as the searching after antiquities; and by his example encouraged the study of the merchant Chigi, to the same. He patronized men of talent, of whom a galaxy gathered round him. He corresponded with Erasmus, Machiavelli, Ariosto, and other great men of his time. He restored the celebrated library of his family, which, on the expulsion of the Medici, had been placed in the possession of the merchant Chigi, and which is known by the name of the Biblioteca Laurenziana at Florence. In short, Leo X, if not the most exemplary among popes, was certainly one of the most illustrious. Pulci, in his History of Italy, describes him as "Vita Leo X (1522);" Audio, Leo X (1644); Giovis, Vita Leo X (1651); Artaud de Montor, Histoire des Souverains Pontifes, vol. iv. Leo XI, Pope (Alexandro da Medici), a descendant of the house of the Medici, was born at Florence in 1535. After representing Tuscany for some years at the court of pope Pius V, he was made bishop of Pistoia in 1573, and archbishop of Florence in 1574. Made cardinal in 1588, he was sent by his predecessor, Clement VIII, to await a latera to France to receive Henry IV into the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church. He was very old when elected, on the 1st of April in the 2d year of most exertions of the French, against the wishes of the Spanish. He died on the 27th of the same month, it is said, from the fatigue attending the ceremony of taking possession of the patriarchal church of St. John the Lateran. See Artaud de Montor, Histoire des Souverains Pontifes; Bower, History of the Popes, vii, 476; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxx, 755; Engl. Cyclop. s. v.

Leo XII, Pope (cardinal Annibale della Graga), was born in the district of Spoleto in 1670, of a noble family of the Romagna; was made archbishop of Tyre in 1735, and was later employed as nuncio to Germany and France by Pius VII, who made him a cardinal in 1816. On the death of this pontiff he was elected pope, in September, 1823. He was well acquainted with diplomacy and foreign politics, and in the exercise of his authority, and in asserting the claims of his see, he assumed a more imperious tone than his meek and benevolent predecessor. He re-established the right of asylum for criminals in the churches, and enforced the strict observance of fast days. He was a declared enemy of the Carbonari and other secret societies. He proclaimed a jubilee for the year 1825; and in his circular letter accompanying the bull, addressed to the patriarchs, princes, archbishops, and bishops, he made a violent attack upon the Bible Societies, as acting in opposition to the decree of the Council of Trent (session iv) concerning the publication and use of the sacred books. Leo also entered into negotiations with the new states of South America for the sake of filling up the vacant seats. He gave a new organization to the university of the Sapienza at Rome, which consists of five colleges or faculties, viz., theology, law, medicine, philosophy, and pharmacy; and he increased the number of the professors, and raised their emoluments. He published in October, 1824, a Moto Proprio, forming the new system of the papal state, and also the administration of justice, or Procedura Civil, and he fixed the fees to be paid by the litigant parties. He corrected several abuses, and studied to maintain order and a good police in his territories. He died February 10, 1829, and was succeeded by Pius VIII. (Engl. Cyclop. s. v. Leodegar, a saint (in French St. Liger), was born about 616, and was educated by his uncle (some say his grandfather), the bishop of Poitiers, who made him archdeacon. Leodegar was afterwards called to the court as adviser of Bathilde, and tutor of her young son Chotaire. In 659 he was appointed bishop of Autun. That diocese was then in a rather dilapidated condition, and Leodegar applied himself at once to its restoration. He supported the poor, instructed the clergy and the people, decorated and enriched the churches, and reformed the monasteries. He introduced by imperial authority the rule of St. Benedict, for which purpose he held a synod at the end of 670. He was also instrumental in securing to Chilperic II, of Austrasia, the western part of France in 670; but the fickle monarch did not long consent to be ruled by a priest, and Leodegar was finally expelled by public execrations after Chilperic's death, being accused of complicity in his murder, in 678. He is now commemorated in the Roman Catholic Church Oct. 2.

Leon da Modena (Ben-Isaac Ben-Mohrdecai), also called Jehudah Arje Modena, one of the most celebrated Italian rabbis, the Jewish John Knox of the 16th century in Italy, was born in Venice April 23, 1571, of an ancient and literary family, originally from France. Leon displayed his talents and extraordinary intellectual endowments at a most tender age. The Sabbatic lesson (hahereth), it is said, he read before the whole congregation in the synagogue when he was only two and a half years old, and he began to preach (ハハレッハ) when he had scarcely reached the age of ten. At thirteen years of age and thereby before the public with his first work, a polemic work against gambling with dice and cards (entitled yehudah ruim, first published in 1596, and reprinted in French, Latin, and German), and thus active, and retaining all the vigor and elasticity of youth, he remained through life, though subject to great suffering by the great misfortune of passing his days by the side of an insane wife, and also by the disgrace and ruin of his promising sons to an early grave. With a genius so fertile, and a mind so well endowed, coupled with a thirst for learning and devotion to Biblical literature and exegesis, master of the Latin, Italian, and Hebrew, he surveyed the whole theological and philosophical field with ease, and became the author of numerous poetical, liturgical, ethical, doctrinal, polemical, and exegetical works. Unfortunately, however, for Leon Modena, he was fickle in mind, and left to adhere long to one opinion, in consequence of which we find him to-day the decided exponent of Mosaicism, to-morrow the staunch defender of Rabbinism, the next day in favor of a total abrogation of the whole ceremonial law, and perhaps on the day following an apologist for Christianity, because, as he expressed it, Judaism formed its base. Both the orthodox and liberal Jewish clergy, claim Leon as the exponent of their doctrines; but we think that justly he can be claimed as the master of the Reformed Jewish Church, for his masterpiece is, after all, the Kol Sanok (אמונת התורה), the existence of which was long known, but it was only in the present century that the MS. was discovered in the library of the duke of Parma. It was then drawn from its hiding-place, and was published under the supervision of the late rabbi Reggio in Kol sanok in lebenenu (Givat, 1869; an English translation appeared in The Jewish Times (New York) in the last numbers of 1871. This work contains a concise and terse exposition of the religious philosophy of Judaism, and of the ideas embodied in the various ceremonial practices, and is written from a most liberal standpoint. He also wrote הָרָעָם תְּנָה (The Captivity of Judah), or הָרָעָם וָאָמֵנָה ("Explanation of Words"), in which he explains in Italian all the difficult expressions in the Hebrew Bible, and which is preceded by grammatical rules (Venice, 1612; Padua, 1614); also printed in the margin of the Hebrew Bibles published for the use of the Italian Jews, following the order of the canonical books):—Rabbemahical and Italian Vocabular, called הָרָעָם וָאָמֵנָה ("The Lion's Mouth"), of which the Italian title is Raccolta delle loro Robbin, non Hebr. ne Chal. etc. (Padua, 1640), appended to the preceding work; afterwards printed separately in Venice, 1648. A polemical treatise against the Cabalists, whom he despised and derided, on the genuineness of their interpretation of the Pentateuch (Sohar), entitled הָרָעָם וָאָמֵנָה (edited by Dr. Furst, Leipzig, 1840):—Historia dei Riti Hebraici ed osservanza degli Hebrei di questi tempi, or the history of the rites, customs, and manner of life of the Jews, consisting of thirteen chapters, and written in Italian (Paris, 1637; in a revised form, Venice, 1638). This celebrated and most useful manual was translated into English by Edmund Chimed (London, 1650), and also edited by Simon Ockley, under the title History of the present Jews throughout the world (London, 1677), in Picard's Ceremonies and Religious Customs of the Various Nations of the known World, vol. I (London, 1733); into French by father Simon, who prefixed it with an elaborate account of the Karaites and Samaritans (Paris, 1674); into Dutch (Amsterd., 1685), and into Latin by Grossbauer, Historia rituum Judaeorum (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1693).—Commentary on the Books of Samuel:—Commentary on the five Megilloth, i.e. the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther: Commentary on the Psalms:—Commentary on Proverbs:—Commentary on the Book of the Apocalypse:—Jewish polemical works on Christianity, entitled הָרָעָם וָאָמֵנָה, but several of these works have not as yet been published. Leon or Leon, Jacob Jehudah, a Jewish writer of note, who was born, or Moorish descent, in 1614, in Holland, and flourished first at Middleburg and later at Amsterdam, is noted as a writer on the Temple model (compare Motte, Temple, Medb., 1648, or Hebrew יִשְׂרָאֵל יִשְׂרָאֵל (Amst., 1650), and as an illustrator of the Talmudical writings. He also figured prominently as a polemical writer, contending for the inspiration of the O.T. writings, while he ruthlessly attacked the Gospel doctrines. He is now generally supposed to have been the author of Colloquium Middelburgense (attributed by Fabricius to Manasseh ben-Israel), and of Colloquium theologorum de Christiamid. Leon died after 1671. Leon. Luis Ponce de, a Spanish ecclesiastic, was born at Belmonte, in the south of Spain, in 1527 (according to the Tesoro de los Procesos Españoles por Ochot [Paris, 1841], at Granada; and according to St. Antonio de Eckter). He was born at Belmonte in 1507, or shortly after, and was educated at Salamanca, entered in 1543 the order of the Augustines, and was thereafter known under the name of Luis de Leon. Having been received D.D., he was in 1561 appointed to a professorship at St. Thomas. His knowledge and success created him many enemies, at the head of whom were the Dominicans. He was accused of heresy and of having translated parts of the Bible into the vernacular, contrary to the orders of the Sanctor Officium, he was in 1572 imprisoned in the dungeon of the Inquisition at Valladolid, and appeared over fifty times before the Inquisition. His case, which is extant, contains 200 closely-written pages in the purest Castilian. Although unable to prove anything against him, his judges condemned him to the rack; but this sentence was reversed by the Inquisitionary high court of Madrid, and he was liberated with the advice of being more careful in future. In 1578 he returned to his convent and resumed his office. He thereafter devoted himself exclusively to theology and to the duties of his order; but his health never recovered from the severe attacks he had undergone. He lived in the prisons of the Inquisition. He became general and provincial vicar of his order in Salamanca, and died in 1591. His principal writings are poems in Latin and in Spanish; the latter are distinguished for beauty of language and purity of style. His original pieces have been published, with those of his collaborators, by L. B. Sonnleitner and W. Storck (Munster, 1653). His whole works, consisting of the above, together with translations from the classics, the Psalms, and parts of the book of Job, were collected and published (Madrid, 1804-16, 6 vols.). Leonard, Sr., a French nobleman who flourished in the first half of the 6th century, was a convert and pupil of Remigius. He retired at first into a convent near Orleans, and afterwards into a hermitage in the neighborhood of Limoges. Here he applied himself to the cultivation of the plow, and soon gathered around him, and he founded the convent of No bla. He took special interest in prisoners, and the legend relates that centuries after his death prisoners were released and captives brought back from distant countries through his intercession. His prayers are said to have saved the life of the queen of France in dangerous confinement, and he became also the protector of travellers. He died in 559, and is commemorated on the 6th of November. He is especially recognized in France and in England. Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, viii, 327; Migne, Nouv. Encycl. Théol., ii, 1066. (J. N. F.)

Leonard, Stephen, an American Congregational minister, was born at Plymouth, Mass., Nov. 5, 1740; graduated at Harvard College in 1759; and was ordained pastor of the original Church in Woodstock, Conn., in 1763. In 1775 he was appointed chaplain in the Revolutionary army, and was in the service of his country until 1778, when he went home on a furlough to see his sick child. Having remained longer than the appointed time, he found, upon his return, that he was superseded, which news so affected him that he put an end to his life in the western part of Connecticut, Aug. 14, 1787. See the LIFE of a minister, and an eloquent speech by Dr. Leonard. He published two sermons. See Cong. Quar. 1861, p. 350.

Leonard, George (1), a Congregational, and subsequently an Episcopal, minister, was born in Middleborough, Mass., April 6, 1838; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1860; studied with Dr. Perkins, of West Hartford; and was ordained over the Church in Canterbury, Conn., in 1868. After two years he was dismissed, and preached in various places in Massachusetts. In 1871 he was ordained a deacon in the Episcopal Church by bishop Griswold; admitted to priest's orders the following year at Marblehead; and was rector of Trinity Church, Cornish, N. H., and of Sts. Paul and St. Winoar, Va., until his death, which took place at the house of his sister in Salisbury, N. H., June 28, 1884. "Disinterested and judicious counselor, open-hearted and honest man, and a sincere Christian," Several of his sermons were published. See Cong. Quar. 1889, p. 394.

Leonard, George (2), a Baptist minister, was born in Barnham, Bristol Co., Mass., Aug. 17, 1802; entered Brown University in September, 1820; graduated in 1824; and after being for some time a subordinate instructor in the Columbia College at Washington, went to the Newton Theological Institution to study theology. In August, 1827, he was elected pastor of the Second Baptist Church of Salem, Mass., and subsequently filled also the office of secretary of the Salem Bible Translation and Foreign Mission Society; but his health compelled him to resign that position in 1829. Having somewhat recovered, he became pastor of the Church in Portland, Me., in October, 1830. Here he labored faithfully and successfully until his death, Aug. 11, 1831. He wrote a Dissertation on the Duty of Churches in reference to Temperance (published in the Christian Watchman, 1829). The year after his death (1832), a small volume containing twelve sermons he had delivered together with the sermon delivered on the occasion of his death, was issued. The Rev. Dr. Babcock, was published under the direction of his widow.—Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 729.

Leonard, Joseph, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Kingsbury, N. Y., Apr. 15, 1816. He graduated from Union College in 1837, and finished his theological course at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained to the ministry in 1840, and was pastor of the following churches successively: Mexicoville, N. Y., 1840-42; Oswego, 1842-46; Delli, 1845-48; Fulton, Ill., 1856-71. In 1862 he became state school supply at Clinton, 1a., where he died, Feb. 22, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Leonard, Levi Waishburn, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at S. Bridgewater, Mass., June 1, 1790, and was educated at Harvard University, where he graduated in 1805. He then studied theology at Cambridge, and Sept. 6, 1808, became pastor at Dublin, N. H., where he continued until 1815. He died Dec. 12, 1864. He published several school-books and other works of general interest only.—Drake, Dict. of American Biography, s. v.; Appleton, Amer. Annual Cyclopaedia, 1864, p. 628.

Leonard, Zenas Lockwood, a Baptist preacher, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., January 16, 1773. In June, 1779, he was converted, and shortly after joined the church in Middleborough. In May, 1779, he entered the sophomore class of Brown University, and graduated with honor in 1784. On leaving college he commenced a course of theological study with Rev. W. Williams, of Wrentham, Mass. In 1796 he was ordained pastor of the Baptist church in Sturbridge, Mass. The next year he opened a grammar-school, which he continued for several years. Mr. Leonard was active in procuring a division of the Warren, R. I., Baptist Association, Nov. 3, 1801, and the formation of the Sturbridge Association, Sept. 80, 1802. He was particularly active in promoting prominent benevolent objects, especially the Sabbath-school, the temperance cause, African colonization, and missions. On Oct. 18, 1827, he was, by his own request, dismissed from the charge of his congregation. For six terms he represented the town of Sturbridge, on the school committee, and was chairman for five of these terms. Mr. Leonard manifested supreme deference to the authority, truth, and spirit of the Gospel; stability of purpose; uncompromising advocacy of the cause of freedom, righteousness, and public virtue; and unwearying activity in performing the various duties of his profession. He was very steady in progress, ripening continually until his death. He died June 24, 1841. The only printed productions of his pen, with the exception of contributions to various periodicals, are the Circular Letters to the Association for the years 1800, 1810, 1822, and 1825.—Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 547 sq.

Leonardo da Porto Maurizio, a noted missionary priest and the founder of the Brotherhood of the Heart of Jesus, was born in Liguria in 1676. While yet a youth he became a pupil of the Jesuits, and a member of the Order of the Reformed Franciscans. He was especially active in promoting the doctrine of the immaculate conception. He died about Christmas-tide of the 18th century, and was sainted by Pius VI in 1796.

Leonardoni, Francesco, an Italian painter, was born at Venice in 1654; visited Spain and settled at Madrid; gained great eminence as a portrait-painter; in 1810 was appointed court painter. His historical works are characterized by a grand style of design; and died at Madrid in 1711. Among his principal works are a large altar-piece of the Incarnation, in the Church of San Gerónimo, el Real, at Madrid; and two subjects from the Life of
LEON BRUNO

Leonbruno, Lorenzzo, an Italian painter, was born at Mantua in 1489; studied under count Castiglione, the friend of Raphael; appointed painter to the duke of Mantua; gave offence to Giulio Romano, in consequence of which he was obliged to quit Mantua; settled at Milan, and then removed to Bologna, about 1537. The pictures at Mantua are highly praised, viz., St. Jerome — The Meatmors of Midas: — and The Body of Christ in the Arms of the Virgin. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of Fine Arts, a. v.

Leonidas, father of the celebrated Origen, was a Christian martyr of the 8th century. Previous to his execution, his son, in order to encourage him as follows: "Beware that your care for us does not make you change your resolution!" The father accepted the heroic exertion of the son, and yielded his neck joyfully to the stroke of the executioner. — Fox, Book of Martyrs, p. 23.

Leoniste is the name by which the Waldenses are sometimes referred to, and derived from Leonis (Lyonna). Leo'tis, an important river of northern Palestine, doubtless the present Litani, which bursts in a deep cleft through the Lebanon range (Robinson, Res. iii., 406 sq.); Ritter, Erdk. xvii, 48 sq.; Smith, Dict. of Class. Geog. a. v.). For a description, see LEBANON.

Leontius, a Christian martyr and saint, probably of Arabian origin, was born at Vicentia, in Venetia, in the 3d century. After his death, in 269, he was moved to Aquileia, in Venetia, where, in company with St. Carpophorus, who was either his brother or intimate friend, he distinguished himself by zeal in favor of Christianity. For this offence they were both brought before the governor Lyriae, and after being tortured in various modes, and, according to the legend, miraculously delivered, they were at last beheaded, probably A.D. 300. Their memory is celebrated by the Romish Church on Aug. 28. See the Acta Sanctorum (in Aug. 20), where several difficulties are critically discussed at length. — Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. vol. ii, a. v.

Leontius of Antioch, a learned Syrian theologian of the early Church, was born in Phrygia about the close of the 8d or the opening of the 4th century. He was a disciple of the martyr Lucianus, and, having entered the Church, was ordained a presbyter. In order to enjoy without scandal the society of a young female, Eustocius he willed to, whom he was closely attached, he mutilated himself, but, notwithstanding, did not escape suspicion, and was finally deposed from his office. On the deposition, however, of Stephanus, or Stephen, bishop of Antioch, he was, by the favor of the emperor Constantine, restored to his preeminent position; and was appointed to that see about 318 or 349. Leontius died about A.D. 358. Of his writings, which were numerous, nothing remains except a fragment of what Caece describes, we know not on what authority, as Oratio in Passionem S. Babylas (cited in the Paschal Chronicle in the notice of the Decian persecution). In this fragment it is distinctly asserted that both the emperor Philip and his wife were avowed Christians (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. ii., 26; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. iii., 20; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. ii., 10, 24; Philostorgius, Hist. Eccles. iii., 15, 17, 18; Athanasius, Apollinaris, de Fuga sua c. 26; Hist. Arm. c. 35; Monachos, c. 38; Chron. Paschal, i. 270, 289, ed. Biog. vol. ii, a. v.

Leontius of Aracina, in Capadocia, of which town he was bishop, flourished as an ecclesiastical writer. The period in which he lived, however, is quite uncertain. Photius has noticed two of his works: i. Εἰς τοὺς ἱεροὺς οἶκους (Sermo de Creatione), and 2. Εἰς τῷ ἀληθείᾳ ἀναφοράν (De Lanaro), and gives extracts from both these works (Photius, Cod. 279). Leontius of Arletta, or Arles, was bishop of that city about the middle of the 5th century. Several letters were written to him by pope Hilarius, A.D. 461-467, which are given in the Concilia, and a letter of Leontius to the pope, dated A.D. 462, is also given in the Concilia and in D'Anastaticus. See Faber, Concilia, vol. ii, 302 (in the edition of De la Barre, Paris, 1723, folio). Leontius presided in a council at Arles, held A.D. 475, to condemn an error into which some had fallen respecting the doctrine of predestination. He appears to have died in A.D. 486. He is mentioned in the works of Eusebius Apolinaris. See Concilia, iv. col. 1039, 1041, 1044 (1828, ed. Labbe): Caece, Hist. litt. i, 449; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. viii., 324; xii, 653; Bibl. Med. et infim. Latinitatis, v, 258 (ed. Mansi); Tilmont, Memoires, xvi, 38. — Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. vol. ii, a. v.

Leontius of Byzantium (1), an ecclesiastical writer of the latter part of the 4th century, and of the 7th century, is sometimes designated, from his original profession, Scholausticus, i.e. pleader. As there are several works of that period which bear the name of Leontius, distinguished by various surnames, it is sometimes doubtful to whom they should be assigned. According to Oudin, the work represented as an exposition of the Psalter, which had been founded by St. Saba near Jerusalem, and was for a time its abbot (De Scriptoribus. Eccles. i, col. 1462, etc.), Caece, confounding two different persons bearing this name, places Leontius in the reign of Justinian, but from the ordinary of the work with which he is credited it is evident that he flourished a half century later. The works which appear to bear by their Leontius are as follows: 1. Σχολία (Scholia), taken down from the lips of Theodorus (first published with Latin version by Leucianius, and commonly cited by the title De Societis in a volume containing several other pieces [Baele, 1578, 8vo], and reprinted in the Auctarium Bibliothecae Patrum of Du cus, vol. i [Paris, 1624, folio], in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xi [Paris, 1644, fol.], and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, xii, 625, etc. [Venice, 1726, folio]. The Latin version alone is given in several other editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, 2. Contra Eugychiacoce et Nestoriano Libri tre, s. comnutfatio utrique Fictionis inter se contraria. Some inaccurately speak of the three books into which this work is divided as distinct works. 3. Liber adversus eua eum qui pro dilecto uterque Apollinaris opra ostendit, s. exnomine Sanctorum Patrum, s. adversus Fraudes Apollinarisartarum. 4. Solutiones Argumentationum Sereri. 5. Dubitationes hypothetiche et definienfat contra eos qui negant in Christo post Unamem duos sive naturas. Those pieces have not been printed in the original, but in a Latin version from the papers of Philippus Turrianus (published by Canisius in his Lectiones Antiquae, vol. iv, or ii, 925, etc. ed. Basnage, and reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. ix [Lyons, 1677, folio], and in the above-mentioned volume of Galland). 6. Apologia Concilii Chalcedonenses (printed with a Latin version and notes, by Antonio Bongiovanni, in the Concilia, vii, 799, ed. Mansi [Florence, 1762, folio], and reprinted by Galland, L. c.). In the title of this work Leontius is called Monachus Hieronymiani, but the word Hieronymitanus is possibly an error of the transcriber. At any rate, Galland identifies the writer with our Leontius, and the subject of the work makes it probable that he is right. 7. Adversus Eugychiacoce et nestorianoe in octo libros distinctum (described by Canisius as being extant in MS. at Munich, and by Fabricius as occurring in the catalogue of the Palaeographus of Galland). 8. Liber de Duplci Naturae in Christo contra Harress Monophysitarum (Labbe and Caece speak of this as extant in MS. at Vienna, and they add to it Disputatio contra Philosophum Arianum: this, however, seems to be an extract from Gelasianus of Cyzicus), which probably is. one of the discussions between the "holy bishops" of the orthodox party and the "philosophers" who embraced the semi-monastic life. Bollandus was also a student of Leontius, who was a bishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, and contemporary of Athanasius.

3. According to Nicophorus Callistus (H. E. xviii, 48), our Leontius wrote also "an admissible work," in thirty books, unfortunately lost, in which he overflowed the tritheistic heresy of John the Baptist, the only bishop of the orthodox church. Cave also refers to our Leontius Oratio in media Pentecostae et in Cena eum Nativitatis secundum illud: Noli judicare secundum fuscum (published by Combefis, with a Latin version, in his Asteraei Novum, vol. i (Paris, 1648, 1661). The first edition of this last treatise appeared in the Collectanea Patrum, vol. ix (Lyons, 1671, fol.), but Fabricius (Bibl. Græca, viii, 321) ascribes the homily to Leontius of Neapolis, while Galland omits it altogether. A homily on the parable of the good Samaritan, printed among the homilies of Chrysostomos (Opera, viii, 568, ed. Sellier), seems also to be a production of our Leontius.

Leontius of Byzantium (2), the author of a part of the Χρωσύγια, lived in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. A second portion, bringing the work down to the second year of Romanus, son and successor of Porphyrogenitus, and the Leontius who took part in it, is also to be produced by our Leontius.

Leontius of Neapolis (or of Haepopolis, according to his own authority, in Cyprus, who was bishop of that city, which Le Quen (Ortis Christianorum, ii, 1061) identifies with the Nova Lemnisca, or Nemissia, or Nemissa, that rose out of the ruins of Anathasia, flourished in the latter part of the 6th and the latter half of the 7th century. Baronius, Posevino, and others call Leontius bishop of Salamis or Constantinople, but in the records of the second Nicene or seventh General Council, held A.D. 787, Actio iv (Concilii, vii, col. 386, ed. St. Pius X, ed. c. xiii, vol. 44, ed. Manili), he is expressly described as bishop of Neapolis, in Cyprus. His death is said to have occurred between 630 and 635. His principal works are Αδριανος νυμφης της Χριστιανοτητος ευχαριστηριακος και για την εμμονην της εκκλησίας της σαντίας. A long extract from the fifth of these sermons was read at the second Nicene Council (Concilii, l.c.) to support the use of images in worship, and several passages, most of them identical with those cited in the council, are given by John of Damascus in his third oration, and in De Imaginibus (Opera, i, 378, etc., ed. Le Quen). A Latin version of another portion of one of these discourses of Leontius is given in the Lectiones Antiquae of Canisius, i, 785, ed. Basnage:—Leontii ducis haec est de Imaginibus sermo cuiusdam discipuli aepigraphi της Εὐαγγελισμος Βίας Σαντιϊος Ιωαννίς Αρχιερεύου Αξιολογείει Ανδρειαν Κογνωστον Ελεομοσυνη, e. Ελεομοσυνη. See JOHN THE ALMSGIVER. This life by Leontius was mentioned in the second Nicene Council (Concilii, vol. cit., col. 246, ed. Hardouin, 866 Coleti, 868 Mansi), and is extant in Nos. 7 and 8 in the Imperiale Libri. An ancient Latin version by Anastasius Bibliothecarius is given by Rosweil (De Vita Patrum, par i), Surius (De Probabilis Santoriorum Vitae), and Bollandus (Acta Sanctorum, January, i, 498, etc.). The account of St. John the Baptist is given by Bollandus (Acta Sanctorum, January, i, 702, xvi, 498), and by the Latin version in the Novum Auctarium of Combefis, vol. i (Paris, 1648, fol.). As Leontius is recorded to have written many homilies in honor of saints (γερουσια) and for the festivals of the Church (παναγρογμή λαος), especially on the transfiguration of our Saviour, it is not unlikely that some of those extant under the name of Leontius of Constantinople may be by him. He wrote also Παραλληλικοις λαοις βις, Parallicere, s. Locorum sacramentorum Libri ii, the first book consists of τω εισεγειως, and the other η΄ εισεγειως. Turrianus possessed the second book; but whether that or the first is extant, we know not; neither has been published. It has been thought that John of Damascus, in his Parallale, made use of those of Leontius. Fabricius also inserts among the works of our Leontius the homily Ρε ηραβη, in Patrum (s. Rom. Patrum), generally ascribed to Chrysostom, and printed among his doubtful or spurious works (vii, 384, ed. Saull; vii, 767, ed. Montfaucon, or x, 916, and iii, 384, in the recent Parisian reprint of Montfaucon's edition). Malalas (ad Jom. vii) mentions some MS. Commentarii in Joannem by Leontius, and an Oration to leontius S. Epiphanius is mentioned by Theodore Studita in his Antihereticorum Secundus, spad Siamoni, Opp. v, 180. See Fabricius, Bibli. Graeca, viii, 820, etc.; Cave, Hist. Lat., i, 550; Oudin, De Scriptor. Ecclesiastici, i, col. 1757, etc.; von Fries, De Histor. Græc. lib. ii, c. 28; Le Quen, Oriens Christianus, ii, col. 1602; Acta Sanctorum, July, v, 816—Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography, ii, 768.

Leopard (Lüb. "吸," némér, so called being spotted, Cant. iv, 8; Lev. vi, 5; Jer. v, 8, xiii, 9; Hos. ii, 7; Hab. i, 8; Chald. "吸," nemur, Dan. vii, 6; Gr. ψόφας, Dan. vii, 6; Rev. xii, 2; Ecclus. xxviii, 28). Though zoologists differ in opinion respecting the identity of the leopard and the panther, and dispute, supposing them to be distinct, how these names should be respectively applied, and by what marks the animals should be distinguished from each other, it is not without doubt that the name of the Bible is that great spotted feline which anciently infested the Syrian mountains, and even now occurs in the wooded ranges of Lebanon, for the Arabs still use minar, the same word slightly modified, to denote that animal. The Abyssinian name differs scarcely from either; and in all these tongues it means spotted. Picturis, according to Kischers, is the Coptic name; and in English "leopard" has been adopted as the most appropriate to represent both the Hebrew word and the Greek λιοντάριον (which is imitated in the Talmudic לִיּוֹנְתָּרִי, Mishna, Bab. Mez. viii, 2), although the Latin leopardus is not found in any author anterior to the fourth century, and is derived from a gross mistake in natural history. Genusis (Thes. Heb. p. 443) contends that the scriptural animal was rather striped than spotted (רְסִילָה רְסִילָה, Jer. xiii, 23), and thinks that not improbably the tiger was also comprised under this name, as the Hebrews had no specific name for that animal (Meseur. p. 888). The panther (Felis pardus of Syrian Panther (Felis Pardus). Linn.) lives in Africa (Strabo, xvii, 828; Pliny, x, 94), Arabia (Strabo, xvi, 774, 777), as well as on Lebanon (Seetzen, xvii, 343; Burckhardt, Trav. i, 99), and the hills of middle Palestine (Schubert, iii, 119), not to mention more distant countries, as India, America, etc. The most graphic description of the (African and Arabian) panther is by Ehrenberg (Symbol. phys. Mammal., dec. 2, p. 17). The variety of leopard, or rather panther, of Syria is considerably below the stature of a lioness, but very heavy in proportion to its bulk. Its general form is so well known as to require no description beyond stating that the spots are rather more irregular, and the color more mixed with whitish than in the other pantherine felina, excepting the Felis uncia or Felis Irbis of High Asia, which is shaggy and almost white (Somntr, i, 895). It is a nocturnal, cat-like animal in habits, dangerous to all domestic cattle, and sometimes even to man (comp. Plin. x, 94; Hom. Hymns in Vett. 71; Oppian, Cyneget. iii, 76 sq.; Cyril. Alex. in Hos. l. c.; Taetz. Chil. i, 45; Poirier, Voy. i, 224). In the Scriptures it is constantly placed in juxtaposition with the lion (Isa. vi, 7; Jer. v, 6); Hos. xiii, 7; Exclus. xvi, 2; [27]; comp. Odian. V. H. xiii, 4; or the wolf (Gen. iii, 21). The swiftness of this animal, to which Habakkuk (i, 8) compares the Chaldaean horses, and to which Daniel (vii, 6) alludes in the winged leopard, is well known. So great is the flexibility of its body that it is able to take surprising leaps, to climb trees, or to crawl snake-like upon the ground. Jeremiah and Hosea (as above) allude to the insidious habit of this animal, which is abundantly confirmed by the observations of travellers: the leopard will take up its position in some spot near a village, and watch for some favorable opportunity for plunder. From the Cauticles (as above) we learn that the hilly ranges of Lebanon were in ancient times frequented by these animals, and it is now not uncommonly seen in and about Lebanon, and the southern maritime mountains of Syria (Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on Cant. iv, 8).

There is in Asia Minor a species or variety of panther, much larger than the Syrian, not unfrequent on the borders of the snowy tracts even of Mount Ida, above ancient Troy; and the group of these spotted animals is spread over the whole of Southern Asia to Africa. From several names of places (e. g. Beth-pardes) it is not improbable that in the earlier ages of Israelitish dominion, it was sufficiently numerous in Palestine, and recent travellers have encountered it there (see Bibliotheca Sacra, 1845, p. 669; Lynch's Expedition, p. 212). Leopards were known as a part of ceremonial costume by the superiors of the Egyptian priesthood, and by other personages in Nubia; and the animal itself is represented in the processions of tributary nations (Wilkinson, i, 285, 291, 319). In Dan. vii, 7, the third stage of the prophetical vision is symbolized under the form of a leopard with wings, representing the rapidly spreading Macedonian empire; its four heads corresponding to the division of Alexander's dominions among his four generals. In Rev. xiii, 2, the same animal is made a type of the spiritual power of the Roman hierarchy, supported by the secular power in maintaining Papism in opposition to Christianity. Leopold II of Germany (1750-1792) and I of Tuscany (1752-1790), the second son of Maria Theresa of Austria and her husband Francis of Lorraine, is noted in Church History for the part he took in the ecclesiastical affairs of Tuscany, which, after Maria Theresa had succeeded to the Austrian dominions, according to treaties, establishing the independence of Tuscany as a state separate from the hereditary states of Austria, was devolved upon Leopold, his elder brother Joseph being the presumptive heir of the Austrian dominions. His principal reforms in Tuscany concerned the administration of justice and the discipline of the clergy in his dominions. By his "Motu proprio" in 1786, he promulgated a new criminal code, abolished torture and the pain of death, and established penitentiaries to reclaim offenders. In the ecclesiastical department, after having instituted various reforms, he actually, in July, 1782, abolished the Inquisition in Tuscany, and placed the monks and nuns of his dominions under the jurisdiction of the respective bishops. The discovery of licentious practices carried on in certain nunneries in the towns of Pistoja and Prato with the connivance of their monkish directors induced Leopold to investigate and reform the whole system of monastic discipline, and he intrusted Ricci, bishop of Pistoja, with the office for that purpose. Ricci had caused a long and angry controversy with the court of Rome, which pretended to have the sole cognizance of matters affecting individuals of the clergy and monastic orders. Leopold, however, carried his point, and the pope consented that the bishops of Tuscany should have the jurisdiction over the convents of their respective dioceses. Ricci, who had high notions of religious purity, and was by his enemies accused of Jansenism, attempted other reforms; he endeavored to enlighten the people as to the proper limits of image-worship and the invocation of saints; he suppressed certain relics and, by occasional occasion to superstitious practices; he encouraged the spreading of religious works, and especially of the Gospel, among his flock; and, lastly, he assembled a diocesan council at Pistoja in September, 1786, in which he maintained the spiritual independence of the Tuscany bishops. He also endeavored to make one of the liturgy in the oral language of the country, he exposed the abuse of indulgences, approved of the four articles of the Gallican Council of 1682, and, lastly, appealed to a national council as a legitimate and canonical means for terminating controverted questions. Several of Ricci's new dispensations were condemned by the pope in a bull as scandalous, rash, and injurious to the Holy See. Leopold supported Ricci, but he could not prevent his being annoyed in many ways, and at last

He saw him forced to resign his charge. (For further details of this curious controversy, see Fosset, Vie de St. Augustin.) Leopold himself had resigned a council at Florence of the bishops of Tus- cany in 1577, and proposed to them fifty-seven articles concerning the reform of ecclesiastical discipline. He enforced residence of incumbents, and forbade plurali- ties, incompatible with the clergy's rights, and their revenues among the poor benefices—thus favoring a parochial clergy, and extending their jurisdiction, as he had supported and extended the jurisdiction of the bishops. He forbade the publication of the bull and cures of Rome without the approbation of the govern- ment, and the publication of his mandates could not interfere with laymen in temporal matters, and restrained their jurisdiction to spiritual affairs only; and he subjected clergymen to the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts in all criminal cases. All these were considered in that age as very bold innovations for a Roman Cath- olic prince to undertake. See Ricci.

Leopold IV, margrave of Austria, son of Leopold III, was born Sept. 29, 1578. He was educated by the priest Udaltfich, under the direction of Altmann, bishop of Passau, and succeeded his father in 1596. His chief object during his whole reign was to promote the hap- piness and increase and elevation of his people. He avoided all foreign wars which endangered the resources of his country with great care. He was about to accompany the emperor, Henry IV, in a crusade to Jerusalem, when the insurrection of the emper- or's son, Henry V, obliged him to change his plans. At first he went to assist the emperor (in 1590), but somewhat later he was influenced by his brother-in-law, Borsywy II, duke of Bohemia, and the promises of Henry V, to join the latter, to whose sister Agnes, widow of Frederick of Suabia, he was married in 1516. The remainder of his reign passed in peace and prosperity, although occasionally (especially in 1616) he was subjected to annoyance by the invades of the Hungarians. In 1612, after the death of Henry V, he was spoken for emperor, but declined in favor of Lothair, duke of Saxony. Leopold died Nov. 15, 1186, and was canonized by pope Innocent VIII in 1485. He founded a large number of convents, among which are those of Neuburg, of Marienzell, and of the Holy Cross, and built a number of churches. See A. Lepor (some form of lepor, to smile with a providential intiction; aeprocy). See Leprosoy.

Leporasis, a monastic who flourished in the second half of the 4th and the early part of the 5th century, a native of Gaul, embraced asceticism under the auspices of Cassianus about the opening of the 5th century, at Marseilles, where he enjoyed a high reputation for purity and holiness. Advancing the view that man did not stand in need of direct grace, he was excommunicated in consequence of these heretical doctrines. He be- came himself to Africa, and there became familiar with Aurelius and St. Augustine, by whose instructions he profited so much that he not only became convinced of his former errors, but drew up a solemn profession addressed to Proculus, bishop of Marseilles, and Cyriellius, the bishop of Aix (see below as to the title and value of this treatise), while four African prelates bore witness to the sincerity of his conversion, and made intercession on his behalf. Although now reinstated in his ecclesiastical privileges, Leporasis does not seem to have returned to his native country, but, laying aside the profession of a monk, was ordained a presbyter by St. Augustine, A.D. 425, and appears to be the same Leporasis so warmly praised in the discourse De Magistro, ascriptiones. We know nothing further regarding his career except that he was still alive in 430 (Cassianus, De Incar. i, 4). The treatise above alluded to is still extant, under the title Libellus emendationes quae satisfactions ad Episcopos Cassianus (ed. Migne). E. A. Janssen, Confessio- neum Fidei Catholicae continens de Mysticae Initiationis Christi, cum Erroris pristini Deletatione. It was held in very high estimation among ancient divines, and its author was regarded as one of the finest bul- worms of orthodoxy against the attacks of the Nesto- riants. Some fragments are preserved in modern times, especially Quen- nel, who has written an elaborate dissertation on the subject, have imagined that we ought to regard this as a tract composed and dictated by St. Augustine, founding their opinion partly on the style, and partly on the terms in which it is quoted in the acts of the second Council of Chalcedon and early documents, and partly on certain expressions in an epistle of Leo the Great (clxx, edit. Quenel); but their arguments are far from being conclusive, and the hypothesis is generally rejected.

Leprosy was first collected by St. Dunstan from various sources, and inserted in the Acta Sanctorum of Gaulish councils (xlii, 62). The entire work was soon discovered and published by the same editor in his Opuscula Dogmatica Veterum quingue Scriptorum (Par. 1680, 8vo), together with the letter of the African bish- ops in favor of Leporius. It will be found also in the collection of the demonsiac by Leblanc, translated by Garnier's edition of Marius Mercator (Paris, 1673, fol.), i, 244; in the Bibliotheca Patrum Max. (Lugd. 1677), vii, 14; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland (Ven. 1713), ix, 698. Consult the dissertation of Quenel in his edition of the works of Leo, ii, 908 (ed. Leprosy (lep'rosiy; lep'ros_are, lep'rosy, a smiling, because sup- posed to be a direct visitation of heaven; Gr. λέπρα, so called from its scalliness, hence English "leper," etc.), a name that was given by the Greek physicians to a scaly disease of the skin. During the Dark Ages it was indiscriminately applied to all chronic diseases of the skin, and more particularly to elephantiasis, to which latter it, however, it is now more restricted. Hence prevailed the greatest discrepancy and confusion in the descriptions that authors gave of the disease, un- til Dr. Willan restored to the term lepros its original signification. In the Scriptures it is applied to a foul cutaneous disease, the description of which, as well as the regulations connected therewith, are given in Lev. xliii, xlv (comp. also Exod. iv, 6; Num. xiii, 10-15; 2 Sam. iii, 29; 2 Kings v, 27; vii, vii, viii, 5; Matt. viii, 2; x, 8, etc.). In the discussion of this subject we base our article upon the most recent scientific and ar- chaeological distinctions, compared with the present Oriental usages.

I. Scriptural and Talmudical Statements.—(1) Leprosy in Human Beings.—1. Cases and Symptoms of Biblical Leprosy.—Lev. xiii, 2-44, which describes this distem- per as laying hold of man, gives six different circum- stances under which it may develop itself. They are as follows: (1.) The first circumstance mentioned in Lev. xiii, 2-6 is that it may develop itself without any apparent cause. Hence it is enjoined that if any one should ob- serve a rising or swelling (םָלָה, an emaciated, or scar- tened, or a boil; or עֵבֹשָׁה, or a glossy pimple (רֶפֶשׁ), or a scaly pimple (שָׁלֹשׁ); in the skin of his flesh, which shall terminate in leprosy (רָפֶשׁ), he is at once to be taken to the priest, who is to examine it and pronounce it leprosy, and the man unclean, if it exhibits these two symptoms, viz. a, the hair of the affected spot changed from its natural black color to white; and, as the spot decreases than the general level of the skin of the body (ver. 2, 3). But if these two symptoms do not appear in the bright pimple, the priest is to shut him up for seven days, examine him again on the seventh day, and if the disease appears to have made no progress during this time, he is to remand the patient for another seven days, if on the eighth, he finds that the bright spot has grown darker (הָעָרֶב), and that it has not spread on the skin, he is to pronounce it a simple scab (עַרְבָּה יָרָבָּה), and the person clean after washing his garments (ver. 6). If, however, the pustule spreads over the skin after it has been pronounced a simple scab and the individual clean, the priest is to declare it leprous, and the patient unclean (ver. 7, 8). It is thus evident that the symptoms which indicated scriptural leprosy, as the Mannaight remarks (Nega'im, iii, 3), are bright pimpls, a little depressed, turning the hair white, and spreading over the skin.

As the description of these symptoms is very concise, and requires to be specified more minutely for practical purposes, the spiritual guides of Israel defined them as follows: Both the bright pimple (עָרָבָּה) and the swelling spot (עַרְבָּה יָרָבָּה), when indicative of leprosy, assume respectively one of two colors, a principal or a subordinate one. The principal color of the bright pimple is as white as snow (בַּעֲרֹת הַמַּר), and the subordinate resembles plaster on the wall (בַּעֲרֹת רְעָת), and the secondary one resembles white wool (כַּעֲרֹת נַפְשָׁו, Nega'im, i, 1); so that if the affected spot in the skin is inferior to whiteness to the film of an egg, it is not leprous, but simply a gathering (עַרְבָּה יָרָבָּה, Nega'im, i, 1). An inquiry is made as to the state of the patient, except the patient himself or his relatives, but the priest alone can decide whether it is leprosy or not, and accordingly pronounce the patient unclean, because Deut. xxii, 5 declares that the priest must decide cases of litigation and disease. But though the priest only can pronounce the decision, even if he be a child or a fool, yet he must act upon the advice of a learned layman in those matters (Nega'im, iii, 1; Mai monides, l. c., ix, 1, 2). If the priest is blind of one eye, or is weak-sighted, he is disqualified for examining the disease (Nega'im, i, 3, ii, 8). The inspection must not take place on the Sabbath, nor early in the morning, nor in the middle of the day, nor in the evening, nor on cloudy days, because the color of the skin cannot properly be ascertained in these hours of the day; but in the third hour, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, twentieth, and sixtieth hour (קֵעָר), and the same priest who inspected it at first must examine it again at the end of the second seven days, as another one could not tell whether it has spread. If he should die in the interim, or be taken ill, another one may examine him, but not pronounce him unclean (Maimonides, On Leprospy, ix, 4). There must be at least two hairs white at the root and in the body of the bright spot before the patient can be declared unclean (Maimonides, l. c., ii, 1). If a bridegroom is seized with this distemper he must be left alone during the nuptial week (Nega'im, iii, 2). (2.) The second case is of leprosy reappearing after it has been cured (Lev. xiii, 9-17), where a somewhat different treatment is enjoined. If a person who has once been healed of this disease is brought again to the priest, and if the latter finds a white rising in the skin (עַרְבָּה יָרָבָּה), which has changed the hair into white and contains live flesh (עַרְבָּה יָרָבָּה), he is forthwith to recognize therein the reappearance of the old malady, and declare the patient unclean without any quarantine whatever, since the case (קֵעָר), requires no quarantine or seven days, when the priest is again to examine it, and if he finds that it has neither spread nor exhibits the required criteria, he is to order the patient to cut off all the hair of his head or chin, except that which grows on the affected part (קֵעָר). The inspection must be repeated for a second trial on the same day, and if it continues in the same state at the expiration of this period (ver. 81-84); and if it spreads after he has been pronounced clean, the priest is forthwith to declare him unclean without looking for any yellow hair (ver. 85, 86). The Jewish canonizes דִּרְפָּה by "an affection on the head or chin which causes the hair to grow white," and so that the place of the hair is quite bare" (Maimonides, On Leprospy, viii, 1). The condition of the hair, consti-
Leprosy

...one of the leprous symptoms, is described as follows: "If it is small or short, but if it be long, though it is yellow as gold, it is no sign of uncleanness. Two yellow and short hairs, whether close to one another or far from each other, whether in the centre of the nethek or on the edge thereof, no matter whether the nethek proceeds the yellow hair or the yellow hair the nethek, are symptoms of uncleanness" (Mishnah, Niddah 1:5). The manner of shaving is thus described: "The hair round the scall is all shaved off except two hairs which are close to it, so that it might be known thereby whether it is spread" (Nigdim, x, 9).

(5.) The fifth case is leprosy which shows itself in white spots where it is not regarded as uncleane (Lev. xiii, 38, 39). It is called kokh (כֹּכְחָה, from כְּכַח, to be white), or, as the Sept. has it, ἀσπίγα, viilegus albus, white scurf.

(6.) The sixth case is leprosy at either the back or in the front of the head (Lev. xiii, 40-44). When a man loses his hair either at the back or in the front of his head, it is a simple case of baldness, and he is clean (ver. 40-41). But if a whitish red spot forms itself on the bald place at the back or in the front of the head, then it is leprosy, which is to be recognised by the fact that the swelling or scab on the spot has the appearance of leprosy in the skin of the body; and the priest is to declare the man's head leprous and unclean (ver. 42-44). Though there is only one symptom of its presence, nevertheless the head leprosy is to be recognised, and nothing is said about remitting the patient if the distemper should appear doubtful, as in the other cases of leprosy, yet the ancient rabbins inferred from the remark, "It is like leprosy in the skin of the flesh," that all the criteria specified in the latter are implied in the former. Hence the Hebrew canons submit that "there are two symptoms which render baldness in the front or at the back of the head unclean, viz. live or sound flesh, and spreading; the patient is also shut up for them two weeks, because it is said of them that they are [and therefore must be treated] like leprosy in the skin of the flesh." (Lev. xiii, 43). Of course, the fact that the distemper in this instance develops itself on baldness, precludes white hair being among the criteria indicating uncleanness. The manner in which the patient in question is declared unclean by two synagogues and in two weeks is as follows: "If live or sound flesh is found in the bright spot on the baldness at the back or in the front of the head, he is pronounced unclean; if there is no live flesh he is shut up and examined at the end of the week, and if live flesh has developed itself, he is declared unclean, and if not he is shut up for another week. If it has spread during this time, or engendered live flesh, he is declared unclean, and if not he is pronounced clean. He is also pronounced unclean if it spreads or engenders sound flesh after he has been declared clean." (Nigdim, x, 10; Maimonides, On Leprosy, v, 9, 10).

2. Regulations about the Conduct and Purification of Leprous Men.—Lepers were to rend their garments, let the hair of their head hang down dishevelled, cover themselves up to the upper lip, like mourners, and warn off every one whom they met by meeting and saying "Unclean! unclean!" since they defiled every one and everything they touched. For this reason they were also obliged to live in exclusion outside the camp or city (Lev. xiv, 45, 46; Numb. v, 1-4; xii, 10-15; 2 Kings xiv, 22, etc.). They were also enjoined never to enter a house, "according to the Jewish canons, renders everything in it unclean" (Nigdim, xii, 11; Kelim, i, 4).

If he stands under a tree and a clean man passes by, he renders him unclean. In the synagogue which he wishes to attend they are obliged to make him a separate compartment, ten handbreadths high and four cubits long and broad; he has to be the first to go in, and the last to leave the synagogue" (Nigdim, xii, 12; Maimonides, On Leprosy, x, 12); and if he transgressed the prescribed boundaries he was to receive forty stripes (Psachkin, 67, a). All this only applies to those who had been pronounced lepers by the priest, but not to those who were on quarantine (Nigdim, i, 7). The rabbinic law also exempts women from the obligation to rend their garments and let the hair of their head fall down (Sota, iii, 8). It is therefore no wonder that the Jews regarded leprosy as a living death (comp. Josephus, Anti, iii, 11, 8, and the well-known rabbinic saying יָשִּׁבַּת בָּרָא יָשִּׁבַּת, and as an awful punishment from the Lord (2 Kings v, 7; 2 Chron. xxvi, 20), which they wished all their mortal enemies (2 Sam. iii, 29; 2 Kings v, 27).

The healed leper had to pass through two stages of purification before he could be received back into the community. As soon as the distemper disappeared he sent for the priest, who had to go outside the camp or town to convince himself of the fact. Thereupon the priest ordered two clean and live birds, a piece of cedar wood, cream wood, and hyssop; killed one bird over a vessel containing spring water, so that the blood might run into it, tied together the hyssop and the cedar wood with the crimson wool, put about them the tops of the wings and the middle part of the belly of the living fowl, and dipped all the four in the blood and water which were in the vessel, then sprinkled the hand of the healed leper seven times, let the bird loose, and pronounced the restored man clean (Lev. xiv, 1; 7; Nigdim, xiii, 1). The healed leper was then to wash his garments, cut off all his hair, be immersed in water, return to the camp, and remain outside his house seven days, which the Mishna (Nigdim, xiv, 2), the Chaldean Paraphrase, Maimonides (On Leprosy, x, 1), etc., rightly regard as a euphemism for exclusion from conubial intercourse during that time (ver. 6), in order that he might not contract impurity (comp. Lev. xv, 16). With this ended the first stage of purification. According to the Jewish canons, the birds are to be "free, and not caged," or sparrows; the piece of cedar wood is to be "a cubit long, and a quarter of the foot of the bed thick;" the crimson wool is to be a shekel's weight; i. e. 820 grains of barley; the hyssop must at least be a handbreadth in size, and is neither to be the so-called Greek, nor ornamental, nor Roman, nor wild hyssop, nor have any name whatever; the vessel must be an earthen one, and new: and the dead bird must be buried in a hole dug before their eyes (Nigdim, xiv, 1-6; Maimonides, On Leprosy, x, 1).

The second stage of purification began on the seventh day, when the leper had again to cut off the hair of his head, his beard, eyebrows, etc., wash his garments, and be immersed (Lev. xiv, 9). On the eighth day he had to bring two live he-lambs without blemish, and one lamb a year old, three tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with oil, and one log of oil; the one he-lamb is to be a trespass-offering, and the other, with the ewe-lamb, a burnt and a sin-offering; but if the man was poor he was to bring two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, for a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, instead of a he-lamb and a ewe-lamb (ver. 10, 11, 21). With these offerings the priest conducted the healed leper before the presence of the Lord. What the offerer had to do, and how the priest acted when going through these ceremonies, cannot be better described than in the following graphic language of the Jewish tradition. "The priest approaches the trespass-offering, lays both his hands on it, and kills it, when two priests catch its blood, one into a vessel, and the other in his hand; the one who caught it into the vessel sprinkles its blood upon the tip of his right ear; he next puts in his right hand, and the priest puts some blood upon the thumb thereof; and, lastly, puts in his right leg, and the priest puts some blood on the toe thereof. The priest then takes some of the log of oil and puts it into the left hand of his fellow-priest, or into his own left hand, dips the finger of his right hand in it, and sprinkles it seven times towards the holy of holies, dipping his finger every time he sprinkles it; when he goes to the laver, puts oil on those parts of his body on which he had previously put blood (i.e., the tip of the ear, the thumb, and the toe), as it is written, 'on the place of the blood of the trespass-offering' (Lev. xiv, 28), and what remains of the oil in the hand of the priest he puts on the head of the man who is to be cleansed, for an atonement' (Neguim, xiv, 8–10; Maimonides, Hilkhot Mechosar Keperos, iv). It is in accordance with this prerogative of the priest, who alone could pronounce the leper clean and readmit him into the congregation, that Christ commanded the leper whom he had healed to show himself to this functionary (Matt. viii, 2, etc.).

(II.) Leprosy Garments and Vessels.—Leprosy in garments and vessels is indicated by two symptoms, green or reddish spots, and spreading. If a green or reddish spot shows itself in a woolen or linen garment, or in a leather vessel, it is indicative of leprosy, and must be shown to the priest, who is to shut it up for a week. If, on inspecting it at the end of this time, he finds that the spot has spread, he is to pronounce it inveterate leprosy (ירחנן והجمهورية), and unclean, and burn it (Lev. xviii, 47–52); if it has not spread he is to have it washed, and shut it up for another week, and if its appearance has not changed, he is to pronounce it unclean and burn it, though it has not spread, since the distemper ranks in the front or at the back of the material (ver. 53–55). But if, after washing it, the priest sees that the spot has become weaker, he is to cut it out of the material; if it reappears in any part thereof then it is a developed distemper, and the whole of it must be burned; and if it vanishes after washing, it must be washed a second time, and is clean (ver. 56–59). The Jewish canons define the color green to be like that of herbs, and red like that of fair crimson, and take this enactment literally as referring strictly to wool of sheep and flax, but not to hemp and other materials. A material made of camel's hair and sheep's wool is not rendered unclean by leprosy if the camel's hair preponderates, but is unclean when the sheep's wool preponderates, or when it is mixed with unclean fibres, or when a mixture of flax and hemp. Dyed skins and garments are not rendered unclean by leprosy; nor are vessels so made if made of skins of aquatic animals exposed to leprosy uncleanliness (Neguim, xi, 2, 3; Maimonides, ed. supra, 1; xii, 10, 11, 1–3).

(III.) Leprosy Houses.—Leprosy in houses is indicated by two symptoms: it should be like that of a deep green or reddish hue, depressed beyond the general level, and spreading (Lev. xiv, 46–48). On its appearance the priest was at once to be sent for, and the house cleared of everything before his arrival. If, on inspecting it, he found the first two symptoms in the walls, viz. a green or red spot in the wall, and depressed, he shut the house up for seven days (ver. 48–58), inspected it again on the seventh day, and if the distemper spread in the wall he had affected stones taken out, the inside of the house scraped all round, the stones, dust, etc., cast into an unclean place without the city, and the stones and plaster put on the wall (ver. 39–42). If, after all this, the spot appeared and spread, he pronounced it inveterate leprosy, and unclean, had the house pulled down, and the stones, timber, plaster, etc., cast into an unclean place without the city, declared every one unclean, till every leper who had entered it, and ordered every one who had either slept or eaten in it to wash his garments (ver. 43–47).

As to the purification of the houses which have been cured of leprosy, the process is the same as that of healed men, and the priest enters the house with the customary sprinkles seven times upon his hand, while in that of the house he sprinkles seven times on the upper door-post without. Of course the sacrifices which the leper man had to bring in his second stage of purification are precluded in the case of the house (Maimonides, On Leprosy, xv, 8).

8. Prevalence, Contagion, and Curableness of Leprosy.—Though the malicious story of Manetho that the Egyptians expelled the Jews because they were afflicted with leprosy (Smith's, 'Athenaeus, Ap. iv, 26), which has been rejected by modern historians and critics as a fabrication, yet Michaelis (Laws of Moses, art. 209), Thomson ('The Land and the Book,' p. 652), and others still maintain that this disease was 'extremely prevalent among the Israelites.' Against this assertion and against the statement that such strict examination was enjoined, and that every one who had a pimple, spot, or boil was shut up, shows that leprosy could not have been so widespread, inasmuch as it would require the imprisonment of the great mass of the people. In cautioning the people against the evil of leprosy, and urging on them strictness to the directions of the priest, Moses adds, 'Remember what the Lord thy God did to Miriam on the way when you came out of Egypt' (Deut. xxv, 9). Now allusion to a single instance which occurred on the way from Egypt, and which, therefore, was an old case, naturally implies that leprosy was of rare occurrence among the Jews; else there would have been no necessity to adduce a by-gone case; and, 3. Wherever leprosy is spoken of in later books of the Bible, which does not often take place, it is only of isolated cases (2 Kings vii, 5; xv, 5), the only instances are strictly limited to the case where the men are shut up so that even the king himself formed no exception (2 Kings xv, 5).

That the disease was not contagious is evident from the regulations themselves. The priests had to be in constant and close contact with lepers, had to examine and handle them, and the priest himself was pronounced unclean and burnt (Lev. xiii, 12, 13); and the priest himself commanded that all things in a leprous house should be taken out before he entered it, in order that they might not be pronounced unclean, and that they might be used again (Lev. xiv, 86), which most unconventionally implies that there was no fear of contagion. This is, moreover, corroborated by the ancient Jewish canons, which were made by those very men who had personally dealt with this distemper, and according to which a leprous minor, a heathen, and a foreigner, as well as leprous garments, and houses of non-Jews, do not render the unclean; nor does even the leper, who is seized with this malady during the nuptial week, defile any one during the first seven days of his marriage (comp. Neguim, iii, 1, 2; vii, 1; xi, 1; xii, 1; Mai- monides, On Leprosy, vi, 1; vii, 1, etc.). These canons are to be understood as implying that a chapter of a house, or a garment with the distemper in question was contagious. The enactments, therefore, about the exclusion of the leper from society, and about defilement, were not dictated by sanitary caution, but had their root in the moral and ceremonial law, like the enactments about the separation and uncleanness of menstruous women, of those who had an issue or touched the dead, which are joined with leprosy. Being regarded as a punishment for sin, which God himself inflicted upon the disobedient (Exod. xv, 26; Lev. xiv, 55), this leprosy disease, with the peculiar regulations connected with it, was especially selected as the typical representation of the pollution of sin, in which light the Jews always viewed it. Thus we are told that 'leprosy comes upon man for seven, ten, or eleven things: for idolatry, profaning the name of God, unchastity, theft, slander, false witness, false judgment, for the profaning of the holy, for harboring of a neighbor devising malicious plans, or creating discord among brethren' (Ezech. 16, 17; Bab. Bathra, 164; Aboth de R. Nathan, ix; Midrash Rabba on Lev. xiv). 'Cedar wood and hyssop, the highest and the lowest, give the leper part and purify.' But the priest, who is the dispenser of the distemper, which cannot be cured till man becomes humble, and keeps himself as low as hyssop' (Midrash Rabba, Kokeleth, p. 104).
As to the curability of the disease, this is unquestionably implied in the minute regulations about the sacrifices and conduct of those who were restored to health. Besides, in the case of Miriam, we find that shaving her up for seven days cured her of leprosy (Num. xii, 1-10).

II. Identity of the Biblical Leprosy with the modern Disease bearing this Name.—It would be useless to discuss the different disorders which have been palmed upon the Mosaic description of leprosy. A careful classification and discrimination is necessary.

1. The Greeks distinguish three species of lepra: the skin-diseases of which are δαίχνης, awhē, and μίτακας, which may be rendered the vitiligo, the white and the black. Now, on turning to the Mosaic account, we also find three species mentioned, which were all included under the generic term of הָרִיקָה, bēkheth, or “bright spot” (Lev. xiii, 2-4, 18-29). The first is called הָרִיקָה, bokehit, which signifies “brightness,” but in a subordinate degree (Lev. xiii, 39). This species did not render a person unclean.

The second was called הָרִיקָה, bēkheth lebâdah, or a bright white bēkheth. The characteristic marks of the bēkheth lebâdah mentioned by Moses are a glistening white and spreading scale upon an elevated base, the depression in the middle, the hair on the patches participating in the whiteness, and the patches themselves perpetually increasing. This was evidently the true leprosy, probably corresponding to the dyschirea of the Greeks and the scrofula of the modern science. The third was הָרִיקָה, bēkheth kikāh, or dusky bēkheth, spreading in the skin. It has been thought to correspond with the black leprosy of the Greeks and the nigrocoma of Dr. Willan. These last two were also called הָרִיקָה, tattath (i.e. proper leprosy), and rendered a person unclean. There are some other slight affectations mentioned by name in Leviticus (chap. xiii), which the priest was required to distinguish from leprosy, such as יָצָה, sedah; בֵּית, shaphâdî; יָנָה, nēdâh; יָצָה, askentî, i.e. “elevation” “depressed,” etc.; and to each of these Dr. Good (Study of Med. v, 590) has assigned a modern systematic name. But, as it is useless to attempt to recognise a disease otherwise than by a description of its symptoms, we can have no object in discussing his interpretation of these terms.

We therefore distinguish two species of real leprosy.

(I) Proper Leprosy.—This is the kind specifically denominated הָרִיקָה, bēkheth, whether white or black, but usually called white leprosy, by the Arabs barraz; a disease not frequent among the Hebrews (2 Kings, v, 27; Exod. iv, 6; Numb. xii, 10), and often called lepra Mo- saicam. It was regarded by them as a divine infliction (hence its Hebrew name הָרִיקָה, tarzath, a stroke i.e. of God), and in several instances we find it such, as in the case of Miriam (Numb. xii, 10), Gehazi (2 Kings, v, 27), and Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi, 16-23), from which and other indications it appears to have been considered hereditary, and incurable by human means (comp. 2 Sam. iii, 25; 2 Kings, v, 7). From Deut. xxiv, 8, it appears to have been unknown among the Egyptians, as a disease (comp. Description of Egypte, iii, 159 sq). The distinctive marks given by Moses to indicate this disease (Lev. xiii) are, a depression of the surface and whiteness or palloriness of the hair in the spot (ver. 3, 20, 25, 26), or a spreading of the swelling (ver. 8, 22, 27, 36), or raw flesh in it (ver. 10, 14), or a shaley-redash sore (ver. 43). The disease, as it is known at the present day, commences by an eruption of small reddish spots slightly raised above the level of the skin, and grouped in a circle. These spots are soon covered by a very thin, semi-transparent scale or epidermis, of a whitish color, and very smooth, which in a little time falls off, and leaves the skin beneath red and uneven. As the circles increase in diameter, the skin recovers its healthy appearance towards the centre; fresh scales are formed, which are now thicker, and superimposed one above the other, especially at the edges, so that the centre of the scale appears to be depressed. The scales are of a grayish-white color, and have something of a micaeous or pearly lustre. The circles are generally of the size of a shilling or half crown, but they have been known to attain half a foot in diameter. The disease more commonly affects the knees and elbows, but sometimes it extends over the whole body, in which case the circles become confluent. It does not at all affect the general health, and the only inconvenience it causes the patient is a slight itching when the skin is rubbed; or, in persons inveterate cases, when the skin about the joints is much thickened, it may in some degree impede the free motion of the limbs. It is common to both sexes, at almost all ages, and all ranks of society. It is not in the least infectious, but it is always difficult to cure, and in old persons, when it is of long standing, may be pronounced incurable (Hlub. beurbbr. p. 136); so that we are probably to regard the statements of travellers respecting the utter exclusion of modern lepers in the East as relating to those affected with entirely a different disease, the elephantiasis.

In Lev. xiv are described particular ceremonies and offerings (comp. Ex. viii, 6) to be officially observed by the priest on behalf of a leper restored to health and purity. See D. C. Lutz, De duob. mech. purific. leprosorum destinatia urourdendae mysterio, Hal. 1787; Buth, Symbol. Symbol. 1782; Ahinger, Comment. i, 11, 170 sq.; Talmud, tract Neiphin, vi, 9; Otto, Lehrbuch der Medizin, p. 865 sq.; Rhenferd, in Meuschen, N. T. Talmud, p. 1057.

(II) Elephantiasis.—This more severe form of cutaneous, or, rather, scrofulous disease has been confounded with leprosy, from which it is essentially different. It is usually called tubercular leprosy (Lepra nodosa, Celus, Med. iii, 29), and has generally been thought to be the disease with which Job was afflicted (2 Sam. x, 4), Job ii, 7; comp. Deut. xxxviii, 35). See John's Disease. It has been thought to be alluded to by the term "botch of Egypt" (בְּרִיקָה, Deut. xxviii, 37), where it is said to have been endemic (Pliny, xxvi, 6; Lucret. vi, 1112 sq.; comp. Areteas, Cappad. morb. diut. ii, 13; see Alimia, in the Transactions of the Asiatic Society, i, 262 sq). The Greeks gave the name of elephantiasis to this disease because the skin of the persons affected with it was thought to resemble that of an elephant, in dark color, ruggedness, and insensibility, or, as some have thought, because the foot, after the loss of the toes, when the hollow of the sole is filled up and the ankle enlarged, resembles the foot of an elephant. The Arabic called it Judhâm, which means "mutilation," "amputation," in reference to the loss of the smaller members. They have, however, also described another disease, and a very different one from elephantiasis, to which they gave the name of Dal’fil], which means literally morbus elephas. The disease to which they applied this name is called by modern writers the tunas Barbardae leg, and consists in a thickening of the skin and subcuta-naneous tissues of the leg, but presents nothing resembling the tubercles of elephantiasis. Now the Latin translators from the Arabic, finding that the same name existed both in the Greek and Arabic, translated Dal’ fil by elephantiasis, and thus confused the Barbardae leg with the Arabian zul典, while this latter, which was in reality elephantiasis, they rendered by the Greek term lepra. See Kleyer, in Miscell. nat. curios. 1858, p.
8; Bartholin. Morb. Bibl. c. 7; Michaelis. Enuclei. ins A.
T. 1, 58 sq.; Reinhard. Bibelkranck. iii, 52.
Elephantiasis first of all makes its appearance by slow swelling of the leg, the breast, or limb, irregularly dissemintated over the skin and slightly raised above its surface. These spots are glossy, and appear oily, or as if they were covered with varnish. After they have remained in this way for a longer or shorter time, they are succeeded by an eruption of tubercles. These are soft, roundish tumors, varying in size from that of a pea to that of an olive, and are of a reddish or livid color.
They are principally developed on the face and ears, but in the course of years extend over the whole body.
The face becomes frightfully deformed; the forehead is thickened and covered with numerous tubercles; the eyebrows become bald, swelled, furrowed by oblique lines, and covered with nipple-like elevations; the eyelashes fall out, and the eyes assume a fixed and staring look; the lips are enormously thickened and swelling; the beard falls out; the chin and ears are enlarged and beaded with tubercles; the lobe and nose are frightfully enlarged and deformed; the nostrils irregularly dilated,internally constricted, and excoriatted; the voice is hoarse and nasal, and the breath intolerably fetid. After some time, generally after some years, many of the tubercles ulcerate, and the matter which exudes from them dries to crusts of a brownish or blackish color; but this process seldom terminates in cicatrisation. The extremities are affected in the same way as the face. The hollow of the foot is swelled out, so that the sole becomes flat; the sensibility of the skin is greatly impaired, and, in the hands and feet, often totally lost; the joints of the toes ulcerate and fall off one after the other; insupportable fester exudes from the whole body. The patient’s general health is not affected for a considerable time, and his sufferings are useless since the intensity of the disease remains unaltered. Often, however, his nights are sleepless or disturbed by frightful dreams; he becomes morose and melancholy; he shuns the sight of the healthy because he feels what an object of disgust he is to them, and life becomes a losomhere to him; he falls into a state of apathy, and, after many years of such an existence, he sinks either from exhaustion or from the supervision of internal disease.

About the period of the Crusades elephantiasis spread itself like an epidemic over all Europe, even as far north as the Faro and Venetian bight, owing to the above-mentioned mistakes, every one became familiar with leprosy under the form of the terrible disease that has just been described. Leper or leper-houses abounded everywhere: as many as 2000 are said to have existed in France alone. In the leper hospital in Edinburgh the inmates begged for the general community—sitting for the purpose at the door of the hospital. They were obliged to warn those approaching of them the presence of an infected fellow-mortal by using a wood rattle or clapper. The infected in European countries were often put to the leper hospitals, and were considered logally and politically deale. The Church, taking the same view of it, performed over them the solemn ceremonies for the burial of the dead—the priest closing the ceremony by throwing upon them a shovelful of earth. The disease was considered to be contagious possibly only on account of the belief that was entertained respecting its identity with Jewish leprosy, and the strictest regulations were enacted for excluding the disease from society. Towards the commencement of the 17th century the disease gradually disappeared from Europe, and is now mostly confined to intertropical countries. It existed in Faro as late as 1676, and in the Shetland Islands in 1786, long after it had ceased in the southern parts of Great Britain. This fearful discase made its appearance in the island of Guadaloupe in 1760, in the 1790, introduced to America from Africa, producing great consternation among the inhabitants.
In Europe it is now principally confined to Norway, where the last census gave 2000 cases. It visits occa-Sionally some of the sea-port localities of Spain. It has made its appearance in the most different climates, from the arctic regions of Lapland, or Labrador, to the interior regions of Asia—in moist and dry localities. It still exists in Palestine and Egypt—the latter its most familiar home, although Dr. Kitto thinks not in such numerous instances as in former ages. The physical causes of the disease are uncertain. The best authors of the present day who have had an opportunity of observing the discase do not consider it to be contagious. There seems, however, to be little doubt as to its being hereditary.

Elephantiasis, or the leprosy of the Middle Ages, is the disease from which most of the prevalent notions concerning lepra have been derived, and to which the notices of lepers contained in modern books of travels exclusively refer. It is doubtful whether any of the lepers cured by Christ (Matt. viii. 3; Mark i. 42; Luke v, 12, 18) were of this class. In nearly all Oriental towns persons of this description are met with, exclusively from intercourse with the rest of the community, and usually confined to a separate quarter of the town.
Dr. Robinson says, with reference to Jerusalem: "Within the Zion Gate, a little towards the right, are some miserable hovels, inhabited by persons called lepers.
Whether their disease is or is not the leprosy of Scripture I am unable to affirm; the symptoms described to us were exactly those of the internal deformity and suffering.
There are said to be leprous persons at Nabulins (Shechem) as well as at Jerusalem, but we did not here meet with them." (ib. iii, 118 note.) On the reputed site of the house of Naaman, at Damascus, stands at the present day a hospital filled with unfortunate patients, the victims affected like him with leprosy. See PLAGUE.
2. That the Mosaic cases of true leprosy were confined to the former of these two dreadful forms of disease is evident. The reason why this kind of cutaneous distemper alone was taken cognizance of by the law doubtless was because the other was too well marked and obvious to require any diagnostic particularization. With the scriptural symptoms before he deliver the solemn pronunciation of modern leprosy of the malignant type given by an eye-witness who examined this subject:
"The scar comes on by degrees, in different parts of the body; the hair falls from the head and eyebrows; the nails loosen, decay, and drop off; joints after joint of the fingers and toes shrivels up, and slowly fall
The page contains a passage from a text, discussing leprosy and its connection to the ancient Jewish practice of using garments and vessels to protect against evil. The text references historical and religious contexts, such as the leprosy of garments and vessels, the practice of covering holes in garments to prevent leprosy, and the use of these garments as a metaphor for spiritual protection. The passage also touches on the symbolic and literal uses of garments and vessels in religious practices and their significance in maintaining purity and health.

For example, the text states: "...the gowns are absorbed, and the teeth disappear; the nose, the eyes, the tongue, and the palate are slowly consumed; and, finally, the wretched victim shrinks into the earth and disappears, while medicine has no power to stay the ravages of this fell disease, or even to mitigate its tortures" (Thomson, "Land and Book," p. 655). This passage highlights the ancient belief in the contagious nature of leprosy and the serious consequences of the disease, both physical and social.

The text further explains that there is no known cure for leprosy, and as a result, it is often feared and isolated from society. The use of garments and vessels as a metaphor for protection against evil is also discussed, emphasizing the importance of purity and cleanliness in religious and daily life.

The passage concludes by noting the historical and religious significance of leprosy, relating it to broader themes of purity and contamination, and the ways in which these concepts were used to maintain social order and religious discipline.

sent thirty-six of the younger monks and forty children to Italy, while he and those who remained were murdered, with the exception of four, who were retained prisoner.
They escaped after a while, and, having returned to Saracen, formed the nucleus of a new convent. In 997, under the patronage of Odo, bishop of Grasse, they rose to eminence, and attained its greatest fame under Adalbert (1080-1066). Raymond, count of Barcelona, gave the monks a whole convent in Catalonia, and they had possessions in France, Italy, Corsica, and the islands belonging to Italy. A number at Tarsus, established by the seneschal of Provence, was also subject to their rule, together with a large number of canonicis regularis, to whom the abbots Giraud gave two churches in 1226, under the condition that they should always remain subject to the rule of Lerins. Their prosperity decreasing, the abbots, Augustin Grimoldi, afterwards bishop of Grasse, connected them with the Benedictines in 1565, and this fusion received in 1516 the sanction of pope Leo X and of Francis I. In 1605 the island was taken by the Spaniards, who retained it until 1677; and, although the convent continued to exist, it lost henceforth all its importance. See Vincentius Barralis, Chronologiae Benedictane, vol. ii, 146 sq.; also the monographs cited by Volbeding, Index, p. 42; and by Hase, Leben Jesu, p. 137. Le Quien, MICHAEL, a Dominican, who was born at Bursa, Asia Minor, in 1505, and died at Avignon in 1561, was remarkable for his learning in Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic, and in Oriental Church History. His Joannis Damasceni opera (Paris, 1712, in two folio volumes) is a superior edition of that father. His most important work is Oriens Christianus, inuper et Africen, an account of the churches, patriarchs, etc., of the East and Africa, and of the first persons of which appeared before, the second part after the author's death, which took place at the convent in St. Honoré March 13, 1733, Lerins, CONVENT OF, one of the oldest, and once one of the most important monastic establishments in France, is situated in the island of St. Honoré, on the coast of Provence, opposite Antibes. The legend concerning its origin is as follows: Honoratus, a man of noble birth and who had even been once consul, embraced the Christian faith, together with his brother, in spite of the remonstrances of his family. They first retired to an island near Marseilles, but Honoratius afterwards went back to Provence, where he settled at Lerins, under the protection of the bishop of Fyrus. His reputation for sanctity induced many to join him, and they lived, some in communities (carmelites), others as hermits in separate cells. It was the time when monachism was lately introduced into Europe from the East, and convents were arising along the shores of the Mediterranean. Thus the convents of Ierusalem (Jerusalem), Gerasa, Cyrene, Capernaum, of Dalmatia, and of France. Martinus had just established a convent at Tauronum, whose rules were adopted in those that were established by Cassian. The statement that the Cassian rules were first introduced at St. Honoré by Honoratus is incorrect. The convent was established by Honoratus, who was afterwards appointed bishop of Arles, the last-named convent made rapid progress. Lerins became one of the most important schools for the clergy of Southern Gaul, and furnished a large number of bishops, among whom we will mention Hilarius of Arles and Eucherius of Lyons: at that time monks were often made bishops. In the 5th century the convent became imbued with semi-Pelagian ideas, which thence spread into Southern France. In the 7th century the monks of Lerins seem to have relaxed in their obedience to their rules, for Gregory wrote to the abbott Conon inviting him to reform the monastics. This work was successfully accomplished by a Benedictine abbott, Aigufl, but only after a struggle which for a while threatened to destroy the convent, the opposition party going so far as to call in the assistance of neighboring lords, and murdering the abbott and some of his followers. Still, as the reform had been inaugurated, the convent resumed its former prosperity, and in the beginning of the 8th century its abbated 3780 monks under his command. Soon after, however, it was overrun by the Saracens from Spain; the abbott Forciarius, in preference of this event, LebounameX (AbouNME), a SABOTEUR OF Potamon of MYSTERY, a philosopher and seer, lived in the time of Augustus. He was a pupil of Timocrates, who was known as the teacher and friend of Tiberius. Suidas says that LebounameX wrote several philosophical works, but does not mention that he was an orator or rhetorician, although there can be no doubt that he is the same person as the LebounameX who wrote μητραν ρητορει και ιστορια ιστοριαί (see Photius, Bibl. cod. 74, p. 92).—Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography, ii, 772.

Leslie, JOHN, a very celebrated Scottish prelate, was born in 1527, and was educated in the University of Aberdeen. In 1547 he was made canon of the cathedral church at Aberdeen. Under Honoratus, who was afterwards appointed bishop of Arles, the last-named convent made rapid progress. Lerins became one of the most important schools for the clergy of Southern Gaul, and furnished a large number of bishops, among whom we will mention Hilarius of Arles and Eucherius of Lyons: at that time monks were often made bishops. In the 5th century the convent became imbued with semi-Pelagian ideas, which thence spread into Southern France. In the 7th century the monks of Lerins seem to have relaxed in their obedience to their rules, for Gregory wrote to the abbott Conon inviting him to reform the monastics. This work was successfully accomplished by a Benedictine abbott, Aigufl, but only after a struggle which for a while threatened to destroy the convent, the opposition party going so far as to call in the assistance of neighboring lords, and murdering the abbott and some of his followers. Still, as the reform had been inaugurated, the convent resumed its former prosperity, and in the beginning of the 8th century its abbated 3780 monks under his command. Soon after, however, it was overrun by the Saracens from Spain; the abbott Forciarius, in preference of this event, of Ross. While in this position he took a prominent part in the civil as well as ecclesiastical affairs of his country, and secured to the Scots what are commonly called "the black acts of Parliament" (1566). During the flight of queen Mary to England he defended her cause against the Covenanters. In 1579 he was made suffragan bishop and vicar general of Ross, in Normandy, and in 1582 he was consecrated to the episcopal see of Ross. His writings are not of particular interest to theological students. See Allibone, Dict. of British and American Authors, vol. ii. s. v.; Collier, Ecc. Hist. of England (see Index, vol. viii).

Leslie, Charles, a prominent writer in the political and theological controversies of the 17th century, was the son of bishop John Leslie, of the Irish see of Raphoe and Clogher, and was born in Ireland about 1630, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. His course in life was very eccentric. In 1671 he went to England to study law, but in a few years turned himself to divinity, was admitted into orders, and, settling in Ireland, became chancellor of Connor. He was living in Ireland at the time of the Revolution, and distinguished himself in some disputations with the Roman Catholics. On the side of the Protestants, through a zealous Protestant, he scrupled to renounce his allegiance to king James, and to acknowledge king William as his rightful sovereign. There was thus an end to his prospects in the Church, and, leaving Ireland, he went to England, and there employed himself in writing many of his controversial works, especially in the political state of the country. When James II. was dead, Leslie transferred his allegiance to his son, the Pretender; and, as he made frequent visits to the courts of the exiled princes, he so far fell under suspicion at home that he thought proper to leave Britain, and join himself openly to the court of the Pretender, then at Bar-le-Duc. He was still a zealous Protestant, and had in that court a private chapel, in which he was accustomed to officiate as a minister of the Protestant Church of England. When the Pretender removed to Italy, Leslie accompanied him; but, becoming at length sensible of the strangeness of his position, a Protestant clergyman in the court of a zealous Roman Catholic, and age coming on, and with it the natural desire of dying in the land which had given him birth, he sought and obtained from the government of king George I. in 1721, permission to return. He died at Goguar, in the county of Monaghan, in 1722. Leslie's writings in the political controversies of the time were all in support of high monarchical principles. His theological writings were controversial; they have been distributed into the following classes:—those against Arminians, the Quakers; 2, the Presbyterian; 5, the Deists; 4, the Jews; 5, the Socinians; and, 6, the Papists. Some of them, especially the book entitled A short and easy Method with the Deists, are still read and held in esteem. Towards the close of his life he devoted himself to his theological writings, and published them in two folio volumes (1721). They were reprinted at Oxford (1832, 7 vols. 8vo). His other numerous works have not been published uniformly. Among them we notice A View of the Times, their Principles and Practices, etc. (3d ed. Lond. 1700, 6 vols. 12mo);—The Massacre of Glencoe (Anon., Lond. 1706, 4to);—The Aze laid to the Root of Christianity, etc. (Lond. 1640, 4to)—Querula temporum, or the Danger of the Church of England (Lond. 1685, 4to)—A Letter, etc., against the sacramental Test (Lond. 1708, 4to)—Ansuer to the Remarks on his First Dialogue against the Socinians. Bayle styles that work of great learning and adding, and says that he was the first who wrote in Great Britain against the fanaticism of Madame Bourignon; his books, he further says, are much esteemed, and especially his treatise The Snake in the Grass. Salmon observes that he was permitted to admit his name as a man thoroughly learned and truly pious. Dr. Hicks says that he made more converts to a sound faith and holy life than any man of the age in which he lived; that his consummate learning, attended by the lowest humility, the strictest piety without the least tincture of narrowness, a conversation to the last degree lively and spirited, yet to the last degree innocent, made him the delight of mankind. See Biog. Brit.; Encyc. Brit.; Jones, Hist. Biog.; Engl. Cyclop. s. v.; Darlington, Cyclop. Bibliog. ii., 1825; Allibone, Dictionary of British and American Authors, p. 924. Leslie, John, D.D., a noted prelate of the Irish Church, father of the celebrated Charles Leslie, was descended from an ancient family, and born in the north of Scotland about the beginning of the 17th century, and was educated at Aberdeen and at Oxford. Afterwards he travelled in Spain, Italy, Germany, and France. He came over to the French, Spanish, and Italian churches with the same propriety and fluency as the natives; and was so great a master of the Latin that it was said of him when in Spain, "Solus Lesleus Latinus loquitur." He continued twenty-two years abroad, and during that time was at the siege of Rochelle, and in the expedition to the isle of Lfe with the duke of Buckingham. He was all along conversant in courts, and at home was happy in that of Charles I., who admitted him into his privy council both in Scotland and Ireland, in which stations he was continued by Charles II after the Restoration. His chief refection in the Church of Scotland was the bishopric of the Orkneys, whence he was translated to Raphoe, in Ireland, in 1658, and the same year sworn a privy councillor in that kingdom. During the Rebellion he opened and valiantly espoused the cause of his royal master, and after the Restoration was translated to the see of Clogher. He died in 1671. Less, Gottfried, a noted German theologian of the Pietistic school, was born in 1736 at Coniza, in West Prussia. He was a pupil of Baumgarten, professor of theology at Göttingen. He studied at the universities of Halle and Leipsic, and in 1759 became court preacher at Hanover. He was rather a practical than scholastic theologian, and was inclined both to Mysticism and Pietism. Less was author of a work on the authenticity, uncorrupted preservation, and credibility of the New Testament, which has been translated from German into English, and highly recommended by Michaelis and Marsh. It is not so prolix as Lardner. The German title is Bezieh the Wahreit der christlichen Religion (1768). He also wrote Über die Religion (1786):—Versuch einer praktischen Dogmatik (1779):—Christliche Moral (1777).

Less, Isaac, Lord Hard, a Jesuit moralist, was born at Breot, in Brabant, Oct. 1, 1554, and was educated at the University of Leyden, to which, after a two years' stay at Rome, he was called as professor of philosophy and theology in 1585. The pope had just condemned seventy-six propositions of Bajus, whom the Jesuits, disciples of Scotus, had attacked; but soon Less and Hamel falling into the opposite extremes of Pelagianism, the faculty, after due remonstrance, solemnly condemned also fifty-four propositions contained in their lectures. Still, as several universities of note were inclined to judge moderately of Less's heretical tendency, he retained his position, and remained in high standing, especially with his order. He died Jan. 5, 1628. His numerous and well-written essays on morals partake of the sophistry so often employed in his order. Among the most important, we notice his Liber de justitia et jure, ceterisque virtutibus cordinalibus, which was first printed in 1606 (last edit. Lugd. 1658, folio), with an appendix by Theophil Raynau pro Leon Less, de licito usu aquacocorationum et mentalium reservationum. Also the first volume of his Opm. theol. (Paris, 1651, fol.; Against 1720); and his essays De libero arbitrio, De providentia, De auctoritate, De quotidiana sacra, De Pater nostro benedictione, De actibus scholasticorum systeme of the scholastic moralists, of whom Schrick (Kircn., sept. d. Reform, iv, 104) says: "They, in fact, continued the old method of their predecessors since the 18th century, in so far as that branch of theology was then advanced, i.e., treating it as a dependence of the dogmatic system; yet they differed from them inasmuch as they set forth their views in large works of the same nature, which are pointed out by them in their style, and are of a certain regard for the times in which they lived. Less acquired the Protestant Church in his Consultatio qua fides et religio sit capessenda (Amstelod. 1609; last edit. 1701). His chief argument was that the Church did not exist before the Reformation; he was triumphantly answered on this point by Belthasar Meiner, of Wittenberg (+1626), in his Consultatio catholica de fide Lutherana capessenda et Romano-papistice deservenda (1623). Still Less always retained the highest consideration in his Church, was even reputed to work miracles, and was finally canonized. See Herzen, Real-Encyclopddie, viii. 840; Geseler, *Kirchen Gesch. vol. iii.; Linnemann, Michael Biau (Tub. 1867).

Lesser, Friedrich Christian, a German theologian, was born May 29, 1692, at Nordhausen. In early life he manifested a desire for the knowledge of natural history, and in this department he afterwards distinguished himself greatly. In 1712 he entered the University of Heidelberg, but soon abandoned his medical plan, and entered on the study of theology, by the advice of the learned theological professor Franke. He finished his theological studies at the University of Leipzig, and became pastor of a Church in his native city in 1716; in addition to it, he assumed in 1724 the superintendency of the Orphan House. In 1739 he became pastor at the college church of St. Martin, and in 1743 of St. Jacob's Church. He died Sept. 17, 1754. Besides his works on natural history, in some of which he endeavored to combine natural history with theology, a Geologie of Stones (Leipzig, 1738, 8vo); Theology of Insects (De sapientie, omnispotentia et providentia ex partibus insectorum cognoscenda, etc., Nordh. 1738, 8vo), etc., he left productions of a theological character, of which a complete list is given by Doring in his Gebiete. Theol. Deutschlands, ii. 297 sq.

Lessay, Thomas, a distinguished English Wesleyan minister, was born in Cornwall Apr. 7, 1787; entered the regular ministry about 1808; and after laboring with great ability and success in most parts of the United Kingdom, was in 1839 made president of the Conference, and died June 10, 1841. Mr. Lessay was one of those of preachers, frequent platform speakers of his time, and was the familiar friend of James Montgomery, the poet, Richard Watson, and Robert Hall. Many instances of his remarkable eloquence are recorded, and many souls were saved by his preaching.—Wakeley, Heroes of Methodism, p. 396; Steevieson, Methodists (London, 1853; see Index, p. 172 T.).

Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim, the printer of modern German literature of the 18th century, both secular and ecclesiastic, declared by Macaulay to have been "beyond dispute the first critic in Europe," who "in the same breath conveyed powerfully both the dramatic and theological world, and by his critical acuteness has laid hands on both, and has produced polemics and called forth controversy in art as well as in religion, without having left behind him a finished system in either department, indeed without having been a professional poet in the strict sense of the word, or a professional theologian too."

Life.—Lessing was born at Kitzins (Camerin), in Upper Lusatia, Jan. 22, 1729. His father was the Protestant (Lutheran) "pastor primarius" of the place, and was widely noted for his learning, especially in the historical department. Designed for the ministry, young Lessing was trained by his pious parents "in the way he should go;" and he was not simply taught what he should believe, but how and why he should believe. Long before he was old enough to be sent to school the youth displayed an uncommon desire for books. After thorough preparation at an elementary school, he entered at the age of twelve the high-school at Meißen, and of his extraordinary diligence in study a sufficient idea may be formed when it is stated that while there he perused a number of classic authors besides those of which his pursuits had led him to the study of the law, and, in particular, designed that her Gotthold Ephraim "should be a real man of God."

Like an earnest and ardent student, which he always proved himself, Lessing now devoted his time to all she studies and pursuits. See Herzog, Real-Encyclopddie, viii. 840; Geseler, *Kirchen Gesch. vol. iii.; Linnemann, Michael Biau (Tub. 1867).

Lessing was now twenty years of age. He had no money, no recommendations, no friends, scarcely any acquisitions—nothing but his cheerful courage, his confidence in his own powers, and the discipline acquired through past privations. He was so poor that he was unable to buy the books with which he was eager to make a respectable appearance. He applied for aid to his parents, but they neither felt able nor willing to grant his request, and he had no other course open to him but to throw himself upon the influence and resources of his old schoolmate, Mylius, who was now editing a paper in Berlin, and who, through the help of the friends which Lessing assumed in after life than he had with other persons. Both were yet young men. The former had come to Berlin from Dessau in indigent circumstances, ignorant of the German language, but determined to master not only the German, Latin, and English, but also the intricate subject of philosophy; and in this attempt he had so well succeeded that at the first meeting of Lessing and Mendelssohn, in 1754, the latter was already acknowledged a man of superior ability and a scholar. They recognised in each other qualities that could be used unitedly for the good of humanity, and they soon were content only when in each other's society. For two hours every day regularly they met and discussed together literary and philosophical subjects. Lessing came to comprehend the truth that virtue, honor, and nobility of character could be found in the Jew also, which the people of his day, led by a narrow-minded clergy, were prone to disbelieve: and this gave rise first to his important play entitled Die Jüden, and later to his chief-œuvre, Narren der Weise (transl. by B. Foster, 1838, and by Marchand, 1847) with which storey the essays by Kuno Fischer [Mannheim, 1865] and David Strauss [Berlin, 1866, 8vo, 2d ed.], and Grititz, Gesch. der Juden, xi, 35 sq.; also the works on German literature at the end of this article). Near the close of 1751 Lessing despaired of ever reaching the university, and this time chose Wittenberg, to penetrate into "the innermost sanctuary of book-worm erudition." For nearly a year he was here given up to the study of philology and history, especially that of the Reformation and the Reformer's mediaeval reputation as a critic grew daily, and in five years after his first entry at Berlin he was counted among the most eminent literati of the Prussian capital.

Even at this early age Lessing had ventured into the whole circle of aesthetic and literary interests of the day, never failing to bring their essential points into notice, and subjecting them to an exhaustive treatment, not without the fragmentary form of the composition, while in point of style he had already attained an aptness and elegance of language, a facile grace and sportive humor of treatment, such as few writers of that day had ever dreamed of. "His manner lent enchantment to the dreariest subjects, and even the duldest books gained interest from his criticism." It was during his sojourn at Berlin that, with his and Mendelssohn's assistance, Nicolai (q.v.) started the Library of Polite Literature (1757) and the Universal German Library (1758). (See Hurst's Hazlitt, Ch. Hist. 18th and 19th Cent., i, 276, 297.)

In 1760 the Academy of Sciences of Berlin honored itself by conferring membership on Lessing, and shortly after a somewhat lucrative position fell to his lot in Breslau, whither he at once removed, and where he remained five years. It is in this, the chief city of Silesia, that most of Lessing's valuable contributions to the department of general literature were prepared. After a short visit to his parents, Lessing returned in 1765 to Berlin, then removed to Hamburg, and in 1770 finally started for Wolfenbüttel, to assume the duties of librarian to the Elector Frederick Wilhelm of Brunswick. As Lessing was not of the sterner sort, he left to Frederick Wilhelms of Brunswick the care of the Elector, who, on the death of his father, made him a position congenial to his taste, and here he remained until his death, Feb. 15, 1781.

Theological Position.—We here consider Lessing as a writer and thinker of the 18th century, but in so far only as the works which he published, both his own productions and the publications which were sent forth under his auspices, affected the theological world in his day and since, more especially in Germany. Originally intended for the pulpit, Lessing suddenly came to entertain the belief that morality, which to him was only a synonym of religion, should be taught not only from the pulpit, but also on the stage. Germany, in his day, was altogether Frenchified. "We are ever," said he himself, "the sworn imitators of everything foreign, and especially are we humble admirers of the never sufficiently admired French. Everything that comes to us on the Rhine is considered young, new, and divin." We rather doubt our senses than doubt this. Rather would we persuade ourselves that roughness was freedom; licence, elegance; grimace, expression; a jingle of rhymes, poetry; and shrieking, music, than entertain the slightest notion as to what an amiable people, that first people in the world (as they modestly term themselves), have the good fortune to possess in everything which is becoming, and beautiful, and noble." Such had been the doctrines taught by the great ruler Frederick II himself, and no wonder the people soon fell into the servility of the French; and as the literature is said to be the index of a people, we need feel no surprise at Lessing's great onslaught on Gottsched and his followers while yet a student of the university in which this leader of the school of French taste held a professorship. Nor must it be forgotten that the history of literature stands in unmistakable connection with the history of the thinking and struggling intellect generally, and consequently, also, with the history of religion and philosophy. One is reflected in the other. The influence of the vast, inspiring spirit of Fragonard, which seems to have been transferred to Germany ground, and soon the fruits became apparent in the general spread of French Illuminism (q.v.) and a sort of humanism. See ROUSSEAU. The great German philosopher Wolf, following closely in the footsteps of Leibnitz, had sought to check this rapid flow of ideas towards infidelity by importing into the system of philosophy that should lay securely the foundations for religion and morality, "fully persuaded that the so-called natural religion, which he . . . expected to be attained by the efforts of reason, and which related more to the belief in God and in immortality than to anything else, would become the very best stepping-stone to the temple of revealed religion" (Hagenbach, Ch. Hist. 18th and 19th Cent., i, 78). Indeed, the theologians themselves sought to prove, by the mathematical, demonstrative method, the truth of the doctrines of revelation, and the importance of divinity, forgetting altogether the great fact that "that sharp form of thought which bends itself to mathematical formulas is not for every man, least of all for the great mass," and had it not been for the influence which Pietism was exerting in the 18th century upon orthodox Christianity, the latter must have suffered beyond even the most ardent expectations of the most devoted German Voltaireans. As it was, even, there gradually arose a shallow theology, destitute of ideas, and limited to a few moral commonplaces, known under the name of neology (q.v.), which, as a result of Lessing's attacks upon it, was forced into the German mind. See SEMMLER. An active thinker like Lessing, who, when yet a youth, could write to his father that "the Christian religion is not a thing which one can accept upon the word and honor of a parent," but that the way to the possession of the truth is for him only "who has once warily doubted, and by the path of inquiry attained conviction, or at least striven to attain it," such a one was not likely to remain passive in this critical period of the history of the mind. For the honest effort he has made to arrive at the truth, for it is not the possession of truth, but the search for it, that enlarges those powers in which an ever-growing capacity consists. Possession satisfies, enervates, corrupts. "If God," he says, "held all truth in his right hand; and his left hand nothing but the ever-restless instinct for truth, though with the condition of forever and ever eriring, and should say to me, Choose, I would bow reverently to his left hand and say, Father, give; pure truth is for thee alone!"

Thus, forgetting altogether that Christianity is not a state, but a religion, that the possession of it is, Lessing became unconsciously one of the greatest promoters of Rationalism in its worst form (comp. Hurs, History of Rationalism, p. 147, 149). We say Lessing unconsciously became the promoter of Rationalism; for, with Dorner (Gesch. d. Protest. Theol. p. 781), we believe that his objective was to glorify human thought, and goodness; true, against Christianity, but only against the poor proofs that were advanced in its behalf. Indeed, his own words on Diderot's labors commend the charge so often brought against Lessing, that he was an outright opponent of Christianity, pure and simple. In reviewing one of Diderot's works, he says: "A short-sighted dogmatist, who avoids nothing so carefully as a doubt of the memorial maxims that make his system, will gather a host of errors from this work. Our author is one of those philosophers who give themselves more trouble in proving the fallacy of others' eyes fall, the pillars of the firmest truth totter, and that which we have seemed to see quite clearly loses itself in the dim, uncertain distance; instead of leading us by twilight colonnades to the luminous throne of truth, they lead us by the ways of fancied spirits, through the dark of the throne of ignorance, and then, such philosophers dare to attack opinions that are sacred. The danger is small. The injury which their dreams, or realities—the thing is one with them—inflict upon society is as small as is that great which they infiltrate themselves into, and bring among the consciences of all under the yoke of their own." While librarian of Wolfenbüttel, Lessing discovered there a MS copy of the long-forgotten work of Berengar (q.v.) of Tours against Lanfranc (q.v.), which proved that some of the views of the Lutheran Church concerning the doctrine of the Eucharist had already been advanced by one of the most eminent teachers of the 11th century. Here was an evident service to theology, and for it he was commended by the theological world. Not so, however, when, with the same intent to serve, he sent forth a work which for years he had been waiting for a printer and an editor. It is true the work was of de-decided infidel tendency, but Lessing never could hesitate on account of that to give the world what had been intended for its perusal and judgment, and he therefore sent forth "the Wolfenbüttel Fragments," as they are termed, in his Beiträge zur Gesch. der Literatur (1774-1778), which treat, 1, of the tolerance of the Deists; 2, of the accusations brought against human reason in the pulpit; 8, of the impossibility of a revelation which all men could believe in in the same manner; 4, of the pascistency of the Christian faith; 5, of the O. T.; 6, of the Test, not having been written with the intention of revealing a religion; 6, of the history of the resurrection.

The last essay, especially, called forth a storm of opposition, but this did not prevent Lessing's publishing in 1778 a final essay on the object of Jesus and of the apostties. With the views of these fragments, however, Lessing by no means himself coincided. See WOLFENbüttel Fragments. They were intended simply to induce deeper researches on the part of theologians, and to establish the character of Lessing the naturalist.
He desired to raise from a deep lethargy, and to purify from all uncritical elements, the orthodox whom he had so valiantly defended against neology, and proved that this was his intention by the manner in which he opposed the attempts of the Rationalists to substitute the intuitions of reason for those of the heart and for the promptings of faith. "What else," he asks, "is this modern theology when compared with orthodoxy than filthy water with clear water? With orthodoxy we had, thanks to God, pretty much settled; between it and philosophy [he is writing to his brother] that it is a patchwork got up by jugglers and semiphilosophers. I do not know of anything in the world in which human ingenuity has more shown and exercised itself than in it. A patchwork by jugglers and semiphilosophers is that remarkable a business as [it] could put in the hands of the old one, and, in doing so, would pretend to more rational philosophy than the old one claims." When assailed by Götze (q.v.) as attacking the faith of the Church by his publication of the Fragments, he replied that, even if the Fragments were right, the Church is not endangered. Lessing rejected the letter, but reserved the spirit of the Scriptures. With him the letter is not the spirit, and the Bible is not religion. "Consequently, objections against the letter, as well as against the Bible, are not precisely objections against the spirit and religion. For the Bible evidently contains more than belongs to religion, and it is a mere supposition that, in this additional matter which it contains, it must be equally inoffensive. Moreover, religion existed before there was a Bible. Christianity existed before evangelists and apostles had written. However much, therefore, may be found upon the surface of the Gospel, it is possible that the whole truth of the Christian religion should depend upon them. Since there existed a period in which it was so far spread, in which it had already taken hold of so many souls, and in which, none-the-less, none of that which was written of that period has down to us, it must be possible also that everything which evangelists and prophets have written might be lost again, and yet the religion taught by them stand.

The Christian religion is not true because the evangelists and apostles taught it, but they taught it because it is true. It is from their internal truth that all written documents cannot give it internal truth when it has none" (Lessing's Werke, ed. by Lachmann, x, 10, as cited by Kahnis, Hist. of German Protestantism, p. 152, 153).
Lessing also distinguished between the Christian religion and the religion of Christ; "the latter, being a life immediately implanted and maintained in our heart, manifests itself in love, and can neither stand nor fall with the [facts of the] Gospel. The truths of religion have nothing to do with the facts of history" (Hurs, Rationalism, p. 154). "Although I may not have the least objection to the facts of the Gospel, this is not of the slightest consequence for my religious convictions.
Although, historically, I may have nothing to object to Christ's having even risen from the dead, must I for that reason accept it as true that this very risen Christ was the Son of God?" Was this the question of God's more relation to the Church as the plan of a large building to the building itself. It would be ridiculous if, at a conflagration, people were first of all to save the plans; but just as ridiculous is it to fear any danger to Christianity from an attack upon Scripture. In his Doppels Messingmann he says all the more to the effect that the resurrection of Christ is a "discretion of the same kind as the resurrection of the earthly Jesus in the New Testament." He had been told also that it does not follow from this circumstance that the resurrection is unhistorical. "Who has ever ventured to draw the same inference in profane history? If Livy, Polybius, Dionysius, and Tacitus relate the very same event, it may be the very same battle, the very same siege, each one differing so much in the details that those of the one completely give the lie to those of the other, has any one, for that reason, ever denied the event itself in which they agree?"

On the other hand, Lessing advanced in his theological polemical writings, particularly in the controversy with pastor Götze after the publication of the so-called "Wolfsbittel Fragments," but to present from them a connected theological system strictly defining Lessing's stand-point has not yet been made possible. Indeed, we would say with Hagenbach (Church Hist of 18th and 19th Cnt. i, 298) that "he had none." But just as much difficulty we would find in assigning Lessing a place anywhere in any theological system of thought already in vogue. Really, we think all that can be done for Lessing is to consider in how far his writings indicate the dispositions of mind which made of him as a theological writer. There are at present three different classes of theologians who claim him as their ally and support. By some he has been judged to have held the position of a rather positive, though not exactly orthodox, system of thought, to be one, might judge himself from his views on the doctrine of the Trinity in his Erzierung des Menschengeistes. (He there says: "What if this doctrine [of the Trinity] should lead human reason to acknowledge that God cannot possibly be understood to be one, but in that sense in which all finite things are one? that his unity must be a transcendental unity, which does not exclude a kind of plurality," evidently explaining the Trinity as referring to the essence of the Deity.) By others, either in praise or condemnation, he has been adjudged a "freethinker," while still others have pronounced him guilty not only of a change of opinion—of a change from the camp of orthodoxy to heterodoxy—but have also given him up in despair, as incapable of having cherished any positive opinion, because he was so many-sided in his polemics; indeed, he had himself explicitly declared that he preferred the search for the possible and the probable to a mere dogmatic one and of all these classifications had been Dr. J. A. Dornert (Gesch. der protest. Theol. [Munich, 1857, 8vo], p. 722 sq.), who assigns Lessing a position similar to that generally credited to Jacobi, the so-called "philosophical," and of the Jacobi, whose name he has certainly much in favor of Lessing's own declarations; for, like Jacobi, he held that reason and faith have nothing in conflict with each other, but are one. He held fast, likewise, to a self-conscious personal God of providence, to a living relation of the divine spirit to the world, to whom a place belongs in the inner revelation, notwithstanding that he ascribes the outer revelation in its historical credibility, and assigns it simply a place in the faith of authority (Auctoritätgläuben). "It is true," says Dornert (p. 757), "Lessing has particularly aimed to secure for the purely human and moral a place right by the side of that rational to the history of the resurrection. But he is far from asserting that the understanding (Vernunft) of humanity was from the beginning perfect, or even in a normal development, but rather holds it to be developing in character, and in need of education; in the last analysis, to become part of the common sense of all men," he says, "as a passive holder of the active universe." (We have here a number of premises, which later writers, particularly Schleiermacher, have taken to secure for historical religion a more worthy position.) Indeed, right here lies the attempt to make humanity progressive, and this progress dependent upon revelation, central to the whole of Lessing's theological views. "To the reason," he said, "it must be much rather a proof of the truth of revelation than an objection to it when it meets with the resistance of the affairs of this own conception of his Nathan as a "revelation which reveals nothing."" (Comp. Hegel on this point as viewed by Hagenbach, Ch. Hist of 18th and 19th Cnt. ii, 864 sq.) Thus he acknowledged the truth of revelation, though he would not regard the idea of a revelation as settled for all time, but rather as God's subsequent act of training; and to elucidate this thought, he wrote, in 1786, Die Erziehung des Menschengeistes (the authorship of which has sometimes been denied him: comp. Zeitschr. f. d. hist. theol. 1888, No. 8; Gruhler, Erziehung des Menschengeistes kritisch und philosophisch erortert [Berlin, 1841] p. 274 sq.), concentrated in a hundred short paragraphs, is a system of religion and philosophy—the germ of Herder's and all later works on the education of the human race.

"Something there is of it," says a writer in the Westminster Rev. (Oct. 1871, p. 222, 223), "that reminds the reader of Plato. It has his tender melancholy and his undertone of inspired conviction, and a grandeur which recalls that moving of great figures and shifting of vast scenes which we behold in the myth of Er. There speaks in it a voice of one crying words not his own to times that it cannot come."

The English Deists, as Bolingbroke and Hobbes, had regarded religion only from the standpoint of politics. "Man," they held, "can know nothing except what his senses teach him and, to this the intelligent confine themselves; a revelation, or, rather, what pretends to be a good thing from without, is DUX. Lessing came forward, and, while seeking to make morality synonymous with religion, eye, with Christianity, taught that in revelation only lies man's strength for development. "Revelation," says Lessing, "is to the whole human race what education is to the individual man. Education is revelation which is imparted to the individual man, and revelation is education which has been and still is imparted to the human race. . . . Education no more presents everything to man at once than revelation does, but makes its communications in gradual development." First Judaism, then Christianity, first unity, then diversity; first happiness for this life, then immortality and never-ending bliss. (See the detailed review on these points in Hurst's Hagenbach, Ch. Hist of 18th and 19th Cnt. i, 291 sq.) The elementary work of education was the O.T. The material event of education is the Resurrection by the timely coming of Christ, "the reliable and practical teacher of immortality; . . . reliable through the prophecies which appeared to be fulfilled in him, through the miracles which he performed, and through his own return to life after the death by which he had sealed his doctrine." The second and better elementary book for the human race, expecting (according to Ritter [Lessing's philosophische u. religiöse Grundätze, p. 56 sq.]): the complete treatise itself in the fulfillment of the promises of Christianity. Lessing, because Christianity is spoken of as the second elementary work, in anticipating another religion, to be universally enjoyed, to supersede Christianity, but for this we can see no reason, and side with Ritter.

The position of Lessing has sometimes become equivocal by the popular interpretation of his Nathan and The Wise. In his Education of Humanity, Christianity unquestionably is the highest religion in the scale; in his "Nathan" it is not so. Hence it has been asserted by many, Christian writers especially, that in his later work he has become Spurious of his early opinions. Lessing and Jacobi even asserted that he had died a Spinozist. (Compare the article Jacobi, and the literature at the end of this article.) The former interpretation is due, however, to wrong premises. Lessing wrote Nathan the Wise simply for one object: not to aggrandize and ennoble his assertions, but to point to the danger of depriving Christianity of the best of its beauty, but only to teach humanity—ay, to the followers of the Christian faith, in the 19th century, the great lesson of tolerance. The great French inquisitor—philosopher Voltaire had sought to do this, but he had failed—had failed utterly—and only because his idea of tolerance was really without meaning. He meant only too much by tolerance, for he demanded of the party tolerating not only to esteem all religions alike, to be content with any and every belief, to have no rights in conflict with another in religious matters, but to be obliged to conform to the notions and inclinations of others out of mere politeness, and we wonder whether Froude (p. 29) says that “this is the toleration of shallowness, of cowardice, of religious indifference, of religious indifference—a toleration that finally and easily degenerates into intolerance, which is the hatred of everyone who wishes no harm to the enemy he cannot destroy.” Such persons must come at last to regard the tolerating party as unyielding and stiff-necked. Such was the toleration of the Romans, which was so much praised by Voltaire. It soon came to an end with the Christians, because they neither could nor would submit to a religion which was so opposed to their own. But in that the things themselves were not, but that the world itself was in the Roman empire, and that the effort is forced to the desire to separate truth from error, or, at all events, from non-essentials. Not even the modest charge that Lessing in his latest years, by reason of his affiliation with Nicolai and Mendelssohn, inclined towards organicism, cannot, on examination, be substantiated. His own words from Vienna, whither he had go on a call from Joseph II, who in 1789 invited all the great and learned men of the times to his capital for a general assemblage, addressed to Nicolai, who had taken this occasion to ridicule Vienna, and praise his own town, even for its unimportant affairs; he might with some exsertion: “Say nothing, I pray you, about your Berlin freedom of thinking and writing. It is reduced simply and solely to the freedom of bringing to market as many gives and jeers against religion as you choose, and a decent man must speedily be ashamed to avail himself of it.” If this was not the case in the Liberal age, then the Rationalists, we should first distinguish between the higher Rationalism of humanity and its double-sighted compeer, trivial and vulgar Rationalism, and then assign Lessing a place in that of the former, for it alone can be claimed to have rendered intentional aid.

Of his service to German literature generally, it may be truly said “he found Germany without a national literature; when he died it had one. He pointed out the ways in poetry, philosophy, and religion by which the national mind should go, and it has gone in them” (Westm. Rev. trans. by C. C. Felton, Bost. 1840, 8 vols. 12mo, ii. 405), “was the principle of Lessing’s whole life. He composed in the same spirit that he lived. He had to contend with obstacles his whole life long, but he never bowed down his head. He struggled not for posts of honor, but for his own ideas, and did not gain any by such extraordinary ability, have rioted in the favor of the great, like Goethe, but he scorned and hated this favor as unworthy a free man. His long continuance in private life, his services as secretary of the brave general Tauenzien, his service in Seven Years’ War, his service as Curator in the University, as librarian at Wolfenbuttel, proved that he did not sacrifice his principles to high places. . . .” He ridiculed Gellert, Klopstock, and all who bowed their laurel-crowned heads to heads encircled with golden crowns; and he himself shunned call association with the great, animated by that stainless spirit of pride which acts instinctively upon the motto Noles taniare.

Leithe (ληθή, oblivion), in the Grecian mythology, the stream of forgetfulness in the lower world, to which the departed spirits go, before passing into the Elysian fields, to be cleansed from all recollection of earthly sorrows. See Hades.

Leithe (λήθη, Septuag., vii, 56), a Hebrew word which occurs in the margin of Hosea iii, 2; it signifies a measure for grain, so called from emptying or pouring out. It is rendered a 'half homer' in the A.V. (after the Vulg.), which is probably correct. See HOMER.

Leitl, Gregory, a historian, born at Milan in 1650, who travelled in various countries, became Protestant at Lausanne, for a time well received at the court of Charles II. in England, and died at Amsterdam in 1704. He wrote, among other things, Life of St. Titus V.;—Life of Philip II. :—Monarchy of Louis XIV. :—Life of Cromwell:—Life of Queen Elizabeth:—Life of Charles V. Letters. See LITERA ENCYCLOP.".

Letters of Orders, a document usually of parchement, and signed by the bishop, with his seal appended, in which he certifies that at the specified time and place he ordained to the office of deacon or priest the clergyman whose name is therein mentioned.

Lettice, John, D.D., an English clergyman and poet, was born in Northamptonshire in 1750, and was educated at Cambridge, where he took his first degree in 1761. He soon obtained eminence as a pulpit orator. In 1768 he was presented to the living of Peasemarsh, and later with a prebend in the cathedral of Chichester. He died in 1823. Among his works are The Conversion of St. Paul, a Lyric essay, which secured the friendship of Richard Farmer, from his alma mater in 1764:—The Antiquities of Herculaneum, a translation from the Italian (1773):—The Immortality of the Soul, translated from the French (1795). Let'tus (Λατοκ, v. r. Αρτοκ; Vulg. Accusus), a "son of Sechienas," one of the Levites who returned from Babylon (1 Esd. viii, 29), evidently the Hatturim (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Exra viii, 22).

Let'ushim (Heb. Lewushim, דועשימ, hampered, plur.; Sept. Arowwasm), the second named of the three sons of Dedan (grandson of Abraham by Keturah), and head of an Arabian tribe descended from him (Gen. xxx, 3; and Vulg. at 1 Chron. i, 92). B.C. considerably later 2044. See ARABIA. "Fremel (Journ. Arch. iii, serie, vi, 217) identifies it with Tamm, one of the ancient and extinct tribes of Arabia, just as he compares Leumium with Uemiyim. The names may perhaps be regarded as conceptions of the article—Leumium, the tribe without limits, the identification in each case seems to be quite untenable. It is noteworthy that the three sons of the Keturahite Dedan are named in the plural form, evidently as tribes descended from him" (Smith). "Forer supports (Unigot. of Arabia, i, 384) that the Letusim were absorbed in the generic appellation of Dedanim (Jer. xxv, 3; Ezek. xxv, 18; Isa. xxi, 13), and that they dwelt in the desert eastward of Edom." See LEEMM.

Leucippus, the founder of the atomistic school of Greek philosophy, and forerunner of Democritus (q. v.). Nothing is known concerning him, neither the time nor the place of his birth, nor the circumstances of his life.

Leucopetrians, the name of a fanatical sect which sprang up in the Greek and Eastern churches towards the close of the 12th century; they professed to believe in a double trinity, a rejeted and wedlock, abstained from flesh, treated with the utmost contempt the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and all the various branches of external worship; placed the essence of religion in internal prayer alone; and maintained, as it is said, that an evil being or goblin dwelt in the breast of every mortal, and could be expelled from thence by no other method than by perpetual supplication to the Supreme Being. The founder of this sect is said to have been a person called Leospetrus, and his chief disciple Tychicus, who corrupted by fanatical interpretations several books of Scripture, and particularly the Gospel of Matthew. This account is not undoubted.

Lettimin (Heb. Leittinion, לֶטִיתִי, peoples, as often; Sept. *Anasai*i, the last named of the three sons of Abraham by Keturah, and head of an Arabian tribe descended from him (Gen. xxvii. 5; and Vulgate at 1 Chron. i. 82). R.C. considerably post 2024. See Arabia. They are supposed to be the same with the Aleumosae (Aλευμοσαίοι), named by Ptol.-

emny (v.7, 24) as near the Gerasim, which appears to be a correct rendering of the Hebrew word with the m prefixed.

He also enumerates Luna among the towns of Arabia Deserta (v, 19), and Forster (Geogr. of Arabia, i, 385) suggests that this may have been an ancient settlement of the same tribe (Kitto). They are identified by Forsell (in the Journ. Asiat. iii ser. vii, 217) with an Arab tribe called Umeqim, one of the very ancient tribes of Arabia of which no genealogy is given by the Arabs, and who appear to have been Anat-Arabian, and possibly aboriginal inhabitants of the country.

Leusden, Johann, a very celebrated Dutch Orientalist and theologian, was born at Utrecht in 1624, and was educated at the then recently founded university of his native place and at Amsterdam, paying particular regard to the Oriental languages, especially the Hebrew. In 1649 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at Utrecht, and for nearly fifty years he most creditably discharged the duties of this office, for which he had fitted himself, not simply at the universities already mentioned, but also by private study with several learned Jewish rabbis. He died in 1699, regarded by all as one of the most learned scholars of his day, the Dutch Buxtorf, only taking precedence in rank. Of his works we may say that the writings of but few biblical scholars of that day have descended to us which can be said to be of more solid utility than Leusden's. "If they are defective in originality of genius (the amount of which quality, however, it is impossible rightly to determine in works like our author's), they undoubtedly afford evidence of their author's varied resources of learning, adorn'd by clearness of method and an easy style, characteristics which made Leusden one of the most renowned and successful teachers of his age." His numerous works, which were all Biblical, may be classed as follows: (1) Critical, (2) Introductory, and (3) Exegetical. Under the first head we have his valuable Biblia Hebraea accuratissima notis Hebraicis et lemmatisibus illustrata: typos Josephi Athias (Amstel. 1617 [2d ed. 1667], the first critical edition by a Christian editor ("Estimatisima primum numeratis versibus, primaque Christiano adhibitis MSS. facta."); Steinschneider, Cat. Bodl.). In 1684 he joined Eismenenger in publishing a Hebrew Bible without points. The Greek Scriptures are not barren of profitable instruction, which is proved by his additions to his editions of the Greek Text. In 1675, 1688, 1693, 1698, 1701, and by his edition of the Septuagint (Amsterdam, 1688). After his death, Schaaf completed a valuable edition of the Syriac New Test. (with Tremelius's version) which Leusden had begun. Under this first head we may also place his Hebrew Lexicon (1698); Elementary Heb. Gram., which was translated into English, French, and German (1668); his Compendia of the O.T. and the N. Test. (comprising selections of the originals, with translations and grammatical notes in Latin), frequently reprinted by his (and his son-in-law, H. Hübner) and his still useful Clavis Hebr. Vet. Test. (containing the Masoretic notes, etc., besides much grammatical and philological information), first published in 1688, and his Clavis Graec. N. T. (1672). His contributions to the second head of his work (E inclusive) and sacred archeology were not less valuable than the works we have already commended. Of these we mention three (sometimes to be met with in one volume) as very useful to the Biblical student: Philologiae Hebr. continens Questions Hebr. qua circa V. Test. Hebr. fere moveri sunt (Utrecht, 1626, 1672, 1655, Amst. 1686, are the best editions, and contain his edition and translation of Mai- monides's Precepta de Moses, p. 66); *Philologiae Hebre- wicae, sua cum *Spicileg. Philol. (Utr. 1686, etc., con- tains treatises on several interesting points of Hebrew antiquities and Talmudical science); Philologiae Hebræo- Graecæ generalis (Utr. 1670, etc.) treat questions relating to the sacred Greek of the Christian Scriptures, its Hebraisms, the Syriac and other translations, its inspired authors, etc., well and succinctly handled (with this work occurs Leusden's translation into Hebrew of all the Chapters of the Gospels, with the O.T. text and Exegetical head, we have less to record. In 1656 (re- printed in 1692) Leusden published in a Latin translation David Kimchi's Commentary on the prophet Jonah (Jonas illustratus), and in the following year a similar work (again after David Kimchi) on Joel and Obadiah (Joel explicatus, adjunctus Obadias illustratus). Well worthy of mention are also his editions (prepared with the help of Villenamb and Morinus) of Bochart's works, and the works of Lightfoot (which he published in Latin, in 8 vols. folio, in the last year of his life) and Poule (whose Syntagma sacrum occurs in its very best form in Leusden's edition, 1684, 5 vols. folio). Leutard or Leutard, a French fanatic, flourished among the peasants of Chalons-sur-Marne, in 1698 and 1000. He claimed the enjoyment of spiritual visions, and authority from on high for separation from his family and his iconoclastic idiosyncrasies. He also, by like inspirations, became the opponent of many practices of the Church which had their authority in the sacred Scriptures of both the O. and N. T., and supported his position likewise by the inspired word of God. The bishop of the diocese in which Leutard flourished— Gebuin by name—treated him with perfect contempt, believing him insane, and, for want of opposition, few followed him. He was finally put down by Leutard, who in despair destroyed himself by drowning.

Levellers or Radicals, a political and religious sect of fanatics, which arose in the army of Cromwell at the time of the difficulty between the Independent and the Long Parliament (1647), advocating entire civil and religious liberty. They were not only treated as traitors by the king, but persecuted also by Cromwell as similar heretics. This dangerous party is proved by the notes and editorials of the Leveller or the Principles and Maxims concerning Government and Religion of those commonly called Levellers (Lond. 1658). We see there that their fundamental principles included, in politics, 1, the impartial, sovereign authority of the law; 2, the legislative power of Parliament; 8, absolute equality before the law; and, 4, the raising of the people in order to enable all to secure the enforcement of the laws, and also to protect their liberties. In religion they claimed, 1, absolute liberty of conscience, and for guilt makes them, contented in inward concurrence with revealed religion; 2, freedom for everyone to act according to the best of his knowledge, even if this knowledge should be false—the government acting on the knowledge and conscience of the people through the ministers is appoints; 8, religion to be considered under two aspects: one as the correct understanding of revelation, and this is quite a private affair, in regard to which every one must stand or fall by himself; the other is its effects as manifested in actions, and these are subject to the judgment of others, and especially of the authorities; 4, they condemned all strife on matters of faith and forms of worship, considering these as only outward signs of different degrees of spiritual enlightenment. This sect, like many others, disappeared at the time of the Restoration. See Weigarten, "Revolutionary Kirchen England (Lp. 1608); Neale, Hist. of the Shakers (see Index, vol. ii. Harper's edition).

LEVY, THOMAS, an eminent English divine, was born in Lancashire in the early part of the 16th century. He was ordained a Protestant minister in 1550. On the accession of Mary (1553) he retired to the Continent. He afterwards dissented from the Anglican Church from a partiality to Calvinism. He died in 1577. Thomas Levy was more vehement in his denunciations against the waste of Church revenues, and other prevailing corruptions of the court, which occasioned Bishop Ridley to rank him with Latimer and Knox. Besides a number of sermons, he published a "Mediation on the Lord's Prayer" (1551)—"Certayne Godly Exercises"—"The Danger of False Spirits" (1551-1575). See Allibone, "Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors," vol. ii. s. v.; Thomas, "Bibl. Dictionary," s. v.

Le'vi (Heb. Levi), "wreathed [see below], being the same Heb. word also signifying "Levite," Sept. and R. V. and A. V., the name of several men.

1. The third son of Jacob by his wife Leah. This like most other names in the patriarchal history, was connected with the thoughts and feelings that gathered round the child's birth. As derived from הָלָה, to twine, and hence to adher, it gave utterance to the hope of the mother that the affections of her husband, who had hitherto rested on the favored Rachel, would at last be drawn to her. "This time will my husband be joined (מְנַעְדֶה) unto me, because I have borne him three sons" (Gen. xxix, 34). B.C. 1317. The new-born child was to be a "foundling" (Josephus, Ant. xii, 19; 8), a new link binding the parents to each other more closely than before. The same etymology is recognized, though with a higher significance, in Numb. xviii, 2 (רִמְעֵה). One fact only is recorded in which he appears prominent. The sons of Jacob had come from Padan-Aram to Canaan with their father, and were with him "at Shechem." Their sister Dinah went out "to see the daughters of the land" (Gen. xxxiv, 1), i.e., as the words probably indicate, and as Josephus distinctly states (Ant. xii, 21), to be present at one of their great annual gatherings for some festival of nature-worship, analogous to that which we meet with afterwards among the Midianites (Numb. xxv, 2). The license of the time or the absence of her natural guardians exposed her, though yet in earliest youth, to lust and outrage. A stain was left, not only on her, but on the honor of her kindred, which, according to the rough justice of the times, must come out. The story of extorting that revenge fell, in the case of Ammon and Tamar (2 Sam. xiii, 22), and in most other states of society in which polygamy has prevailed (compare, for the customs of modern Arabs, J. D. Michaelis, quoted by Kurtz, "Hist. of Old Covenant," i, § 82, p. 340.), on the brothers rather than the father, just as, in the case of Rebekah, it belonged to the brother to conduct the negotiations for the marriage. We are left to conjecture why Reuben, as the first-born, was not foremost in the work, but the sin of which he was afterwards guilty makes it possible that Reuel for his want of purity was not so sensitive as theirs. The same explanation may perhaps apply to the non-appearance of Judah in the history. Simeon and Levi, as the next in succession to the first-born, take the task upon themselves. Though not named in the Hebrew text of the O.T. till xiii 15, it is possible that Ishmael for his want of purity was so sensitive towards them. The sons of Jacob who heard from their father the wrong over which he had brooded in silence, and who planned their revenge accordingly. The Sept. does introduce their names in ver. 14. The history that follows is that of a quarrel and regulative crime. The two brothers exhibit, in its broadest contrasts, that union of the noble and the base, of characteristics above and below the level of the heathen tribes around them, which marks much of the history of Israel. They have learned to loathe and scorn the impurity in the midst of which they lived, to regard themselves as a peculiar people, to glory in the sign of the covenant. They have learned only too well from Jacob and from Laban the lessons of treachery and falsehood. They lie to the men of Shechem as the Druses and the Moronites lie to each other in the prosecution of their blood-Feuds. They have the blood of one man they destroy and plunder a whole city. They cover their murderous schemes with fair words and professions of friendship. They make the very token of their religion the instrument of their purity and revenge. (Josephus [Ant. i. c.] characteristiclly glories over all that connects the attack with the circumcision of the Shechemites, and represents it as made in a time of feasting and rejoicing.) Their father, timid and anxious as ever, utters a feeble lamentation (Blunt, "Script. Coincidence, pt. i, § 8), "Ye have made me an astonishment among the inhabitants of the land: few in number, they shall gather themselves against me." With a zeal that, though mixed with baser elements, foreshadows the zeal of Phinehas, they glory in their deed, and meet all remonstrance with the question, "Should he deal with our sister as with a harlot?" Of other facts in the life of Levi, there are none in which he takes, as in this, a prominent and distinct part. He shares in the hatred which his brothers bear to Joseph, and joins in the plots against him (Gen. xxxvii, 4). Reuben and Judah interfere seriously to prevent the consummation of the crime (Gen. xxxviii, 21, 26). Simeon appears, as being made afterward the representative of a sharper discipline than the others, to have been foremost—as his position among the sons of Leah made it likely that he would be—in this attack on the favored son of Rachel; and it is at least probable that in this, as in their former guilt, Simeon and Levi were brethren. The rivalry of the mothers was perpetuated in the jealousies of their children; and the two who had shown themselves so keenly sensitive when their sister had been wronged, make themselves the instruments and accomplices of the hatred which originated in treachery, with the lasciviousness of the sons of Canaan (Gen. xxxviii, 2). Then comes for him, as for the others, the discipline of suffering and danger, the special education by which the brother whom they had wronged leads them back to faithfulness and natural affection. The detention of Simeon in Egypt may have been intended once to be the punishment for the large share which he had taken in the common crime, and to separate the two brothers who had hitherto been such close companions in evil. The discipline did its work. Those who have been so relentless toward Joseph became self-sacrificing for Benjamin.

After this we trace Levi as joining in the migration of the tribe that owned Jacob as its patriarch. He, with his three sons, Gershon, Kohath, Merari, went down into Egypt (Gen. xlvii, 11). As one of the four eldest sons we may think of him as among the five (Gen. xlvii, 2)

that were splendidly presented before Pharaoh. (The Jewish tradition [Tola'ot ha-Pardesim] states that first to have been presented to Pharaoh was, Dan, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher.) Then comes the last scene in which his name appears. When his father’s death draws near, and the sons are gathered round him, he hears the old crime brought up again to receive its sentence from the lips that are no longer capable of bestowing it. Thus, even as the inconstant first-born, had forfeited the privileges of their birthright.

The history of Leviathan has been dealt with here in what seems the only true and natural way of treating it, as a history of an individual person. Of the theory that sees in the sons of Jacob the mythical Eponymi of the tribes that claimed descent from them—which finds in the fuller representation of their lives in the poems of national or tribal chronicle—which refuses to recognise that Jacob had twelve sons, and insists that the history of Dinah records an attempt on the part of the Canaanites to enslave and degrade a Hebrew tribe (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:46), it is of course only necessary to say, as the author says of other hypotheses hardly more extravagant, “Die Wissenschaft versuchet alle solche Geseplente” (ibid., i, 406). The book of Genesis tells us of the lives of men and women, not of ethnological phantoms. A yet wilder conjecture has been hazarded by another German critic, P. Redelshof (Die alttestamentl. Namen, Hamburg, 1846, p. 24, 25), recognising the meaning of the name of Levi as given above, finds in it evidence of the existence of a confederacy or symph of the priests that had been connected with the several local worships of Canaan, and who, in the time of Samuel and David, were gathered together, joined the “central Pantheon in Jerusalem.” Here, also, we may borrow the terms of our judgment from the language of the writer himself. If there are “abgeschreckten etymologischen Mehrheiten” (Redelshof, p. 82) connected with the name of Levi, they are hardly those we meet with in the narrative of the text of Genesis, see Jacob.

2. The father of Matath and son of Simeon (Massaiah), of the ancestors of Christ, in the private maternal line between David and Zebediah (Luke iii, 29). B.C. post 876. Lord Hervey thinks that the name of Levi represented a shopkeeper (Lobel, Les origines du Christ, p. 100), see Genealogy of Jesus Christ.

4. (Arv.) One of the apostles, the son of Alpheus (Mark xi, 14; Luke vi, 15; 16, 29); elsewhere called Matthew (Matt. ix, 9). Levi’athan (Heb. יְרֵאשָׁת, usually derived from יְרֵא, a screech, with adj. ending; but perhaps compounded of יְרָא, scream, and יָת, a sea-monster; occurs Job iii, 8; xii, 1 [Hebrew xi, 25]; Ps. lxxiv, 14; civ, 26; Isa. xxvii, 1; Sept. spireus, but τὸ μῦκα εἰκον ἐν Ἰοβ 3, 8; Vulg. Leviathan, but dextra in Ps.; Auth. Vers. “Leviathan,” but “their mourning” in Job iii, 8) probably has different significations, c. g.: (1) A serpent, especially a large one (Job iii, 8), hence as the symbol of the hostile kingdom of Babylon (Isa. xxxviii, 1). (2) Specificaly, the crocodile (Job xii, 1). (8) A sea-monster (Ps. civ, 26); tropically, for a cruel enemy (Ps. lxxiv, 14; compare Isa. ii, 9; Ezek. xxviii, 3). This Hebrew word suggests any twisted animal, is especially applicable to every great tenant of the waters, such as the great marine serpents and crocodiles, and, it may be added, the colossal serpents and great monitors of the desert and desolate regions. In general, it points to the crocodile, and Job xii is a more specifically descriptive of that saurian. But in Isaiah and the Psalms foreign kings are evidently apostrophised under the name of Leviathan, though other texts more naturally apply to the whale, notwithstanding the objections that have been raised to this view (cf. Job iii, 8). “It is quite an error to assert, as Dr. Harris [Dict. Nat. Hist. Bibl.], Mason Good (Book of Job translated), Michaelis (Supp. 1297), and Rosenmüller (quoting Michaelis in note ad Bochart Hieroz. iii, 780) have done, that the whale is not found in the Mediterranean. The Orca gladiator (Gray) and the Leviathan (Leuckart, Physalus antiquorum (Gray), or the Bœque de la Méditerranée (Cuvier), are not uncommon in the Mediterranean (Fischer, Synops. Mamm. p. 625, and Lacépède, H. N. des Cétac. p. 115), and in ancient times the species may have been more numerous.” See Whale.

The word crocodile does not occur in the Auth. Vera, although its Greek form ὄρκωδος is found in the Sept. But in Isaiah and the Psalms foreign kings are evidently apostrophised under the name of Leviathan, though other texts more naturally apply to the whale, notwithstanding the objections that have been raised to this view (cf. Job iii, 8). “It is quite an error to assert, as Dr. Harris [Dict. Nat. Hist. The Orca gladiator (Gray) and the Leviathan (Leuckart, Physalus antiquorum (Gray), or the Bœque de la Méditerranée (Cuvier), are not uncommon in the Mediterranean (Fischer, Synops. Levi ben-Gerson. A noted English Jewish writer, was born in London in 1740. He was a hatter by profession, but ardently devoted himself to the study of Jewish literature, and gained great reputation by several learned publications, of which the principal is his Lingua Sacra, a dictionary and grammar of the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Talmudic dialects (London, 1785-89, 3 vols. 8vo). He wrote also Dissertations on the Prophecies of the Old Testament (1780, 2 vols. 8vo)-a Defence of the Old Testament, in reply to Thomas M. on the Prophecies of Jesus (1787, 8vo). Levi died in 1789. Levings, Noah, D.D., an eminent Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Cheshire County, N. H., Sept. 29, 1796, and early removed to Troy, N. Y.; was converted about 1812; entered the New York Conference in 1818; was stationed at New York in 1827-8; at Brooklyn in 1829-30; at New Haven in 1831-2; at Albany in 1833; on Troy District in 1838, in 1843 at Vestry Street, New York; in 1844 was finally elected financial secretary of the American Bible Society. He died at Cincinnati Jan. 9, 1849. In early life he advantage was secured in his education, but limited by the tenor of his mind and unmeasured effort bore him above all obstacles, and he became one of the most popular and useful ministers of his time. He was a learned, honest, and accomplished man, and many souls were converted under his labors; and as a platform speaker he had few equals amongst the ministry of his age.—Conf. Min. iv. 327; Meth. Qu. Rev. 1849, p. 515.

Levirate (from the law-Latin term levir, a husband's brother), the name applied to an ancient usage of the Hebrews (Gen. xxxviii, 8 sq.), retranslated by Moses (Deut. xxxii, 5-10; comp. Joseph, ii. 23; Matt. xxii, 24 sq.), that when an Israelite died without leaving male issue, his brother (נַעֲבָם, yebam), which was the specific term applied to this relation, resident with him, was compelled to marry the widow, and continue his deceased brother's family through the first-born son issuing from such union as the heir of the former husband (comp. Joseph, ii. 23; Lev. xxi, 17). If he was unwilling to do so, he could only be released from the obligation by undergoing a species of insult (Deut. xxv, 9). This is illustrated in the story of the Moabite prince Rachmon (ch. iii, iv), where, however, as an estate was involved, Boaz is styled by a different term (יַעֲבָן, an eremot). The Talmud contains a very subtle exposition of this statute (see Mishna, Yebamoth, iii, 1; comp. Eduy. iv, 8, on Deut. xxv, 9; see also Jebam. xii, 6; comp. Selden, Uxor Hebr. i, 12; Gans, Ehekeret, i, 167 sq.). The high-priest appears to have been exempt from this law (Lev. xxii, 18), and there must doubtless have been other exceptions, especially in the case of aged persons and prostrates (Mishna, Jebam. xi, 2). A similar law prevails among the natives of Central Asia (Bernay, p. 84 sq.; Niebuhr, Besch. p. 70; Berger, Vorgesch. i, 28) and Abyssinia (Drake, Geogr. ii, 225, and 280 sq.; comp. also, among the ancient Italians (Diod. Sic. xii, 18). This law now originated in the love of offspring, proverbially strong in the Eastern bosom, which sought this method at one of perpetuating a deceased person's name and of procuring progeny for the widow (John's Archael. § 157). See Kinsman. The law, however, was unquestionably attended with great inconveniences, for a man cannot but think it the most unpleasant of all necessities if he must marry a woman whom he has not himself chosen. Thus we find that the brother in some instances has not been satisfied with any such marriage (Gen. xxxviii; Ruth iv), and stumbled at this, that the first son produced from it could not belong to him. Whether a second son might follow and continue in life was very uncertain; and among a people who so highly prized genealogical immortality of the name, it was an important relationship for a man to be obliged to procure it for a person already dead, and to run the risk meanwhile of losing it himself. Nor was this law very much in favor of the morals of the other sex; for, not to speak of Tamar, who, in reference to it, conceived herself justified in having recourse to such a proceeding, it may be observed that what Ruth did (iii, 6-9), in order to obtain for a husband the person whom she accounted as the nearest kinsman of her deceased husband, is, to say the least, by no means conformable to those modesty and delicacy which we look for in the other sex. A wise and good legislator could scarcely have been inclined to patronize any such law; but then it is not advisable directly to attack an inveterate point of honor, because, in such a case, for the most part nothing is gained; and in the present instance, as the point of honor placed immortality of the name entirely in a man's hands, and the descendants behind him, it was so favorable to the increase of population that it merited some degree of forbearance and tenderness. Moses therefore left the Israelites still in possession of their established right. But, at the same time, he studied as much as possible to guard against its rigor and abuses, by limiting and qualifying it, and providing for its operation in various respects. In the first place, he expressly prohibited the marriage of a brother's widow if there were children of his own alive. Before this time, brothers were probably in the practice of considering a brother's widow as part of the inheritance, and of appropriating her to themselves, if unable to buy a wife, as the Mongols do, so that this was a very necessary prohibition. For a successor, presumpatius in thor, whom a wife can regard as her future husband, is rather a dangerous neighbor for her present one's honor, and if she happens to conceive any predilection for the younger brother, he, her husband, particularly in a southern climate, will hardly be secure from the risk of poison. In the second place, Moses allowed, and, indeed, enjoined the brother to marry the widow of his childless brother; but if he was not disposed to do so, he did not thereby compel him, but left him an easy means of rescission, for he had only to declare in court that he had no inclination to marry her, and then he was at liberty. This, it is true, subjected him to a punishment, which at first appears sufficiently severe—the slighted widow had a right to divide his clothes as much as she pleased, and to have his pulling off his shoe and delivering it to the widow.
he received the appellation of Barsose, which anybody might apply to him without being liable to a prosecution. But this infraction was, after all, merely nominal, and we find that it did not prevent the rejection of the widow when there was a decided aversion to it on the part of the surviving relative (Ruth iv, 8). The law, however, was not so rigidly intended to be the same for the whole city or country, not to one residing at a greater distance. Nor did it affect a brother having already a wife of his own. At least, if it had its origin in this, that by reason of the price required for a wife, often only one brother could marry, and the others also wished to do the same, it could only affect such as were unmarried; and in the two instances that occur in Genesis (ch. xxxviii) and Ruth (ch. iv) we find the brother-in-law, whose duty it was to marry, apprehensive of its proving hurtful to himself and his inheritance, which could hardly have been the case if he had previously had another wife, or (but that was at least expensive) could have taken one of his own choice. When there was no brother alive, or when he declined the duty, the levirate law, as we see from the case of Ruth, extended to the nearest relative of the deceased husband as, for instance, to his paternal uncle or cousin; so that at last even quite remote kinsmen, in default of nearer ones, might be obliged to undertake it. Boaz does not appear to have been very nearly related to Ruth, as he did not so much know who she was when he met her giving her names (ib. v, 11). Nor did she think it likely that he was in any relation to her until aspired of it by her mother-in-law. Among the Jews of the present day levirate marriages have entirely ceased, so much so that in the marriage contracts of the very poorest people among them it is generally stipulated that the bridegroom's brother shall abandon all those rights to the bride to which he could lay claim by the law in question (Michaelis, Moa. Reich, ii, 197 sq.). See Perizon. De constitutions dir. super defuncti fratris uxoris decedunt (Halon. 1742); F. Bernay, De Hebræor. levi retro (Berlin, 1835); J. M. Levita (Levi), given (1 Esdr. i, 14) as a proper name, but meaning simply a Levi, as correctly read in the Hebrew passages (xv. 15).

Levites, MORDECAI GUMPFL, a learned Jewish physician and commentator, was born and educated at Berlin, where he was a fellow-student of the celebrated philosopher Moses Mendelssohn. He afterwards removed to London, and was physician in one of the hospitals (1790); was then nominated by Gustavus III., of Sweden, to the professorship in Upsala. In 1781 he returned to his native place, but lived again three years later for Hamburg, where he died February 10, 1797. His works illustrate the Bible are A Commentary on Ecclesiastes, called בֵּית הַכֹּלֶסֹתִיק, dedicated to Gustavus III (Hamburg, 1784). This elaborate work is preceded by five introductions, which respectively treat on the name, the Hebrew pronunciation, the meaning, the etymology, the appropriate sense of its name, the Hebrew synonyms, roots, the verb and its inflexions, the names of the Deity, on the design of the Bible, etc.; whereupon follows the Hebrew text with a double commentary: one explains the words and their connection, and the other gives an exposition of the argument of the book:—A Treatise on Holy Scripture, published at the request of the king of Sweden (London, 1770):—A Treatise on the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Talmud, entitled מִנַּה גָּלֶלֶת כֹּל (Hamb. 1797):—A Hebrae Lexicon, called מִנַּה דֶלֶסָר, dedicated to the sons of Israel (1795);—A Work on Hebrew Synonyms, entitled מִנַּה דֶלֶסָר יִרְאוֹת and a Hebrew Grammar, called מִנַּה דֶלֶסָר יְדִיעָה. The last three works have not as yet been published. See Fürst, Bibliotheca Judæica, ii, 238 sq.; Kittto, Cyclop. Bibl. Lit. vol. ii, n. v.

Levites (לֶבְיָתֵים), son of Levi, or simply הַלֶּבְיָה, Levi, for לֶבְיָה, Deut. xii, 18; Judg. xvii, 5, 11, xviii, 3; usually in the plural, and with the art. בֵּיתֵהֶם; Sept. Are. (LXX), a patronymic of Levi, which, besides including all the descendants of the tribe of Levi (Exod. vi, 25, 30, 31, 32, etc.); Num. xxxv, 2; Josh. xxi, 3, 41), is the distinctive title of that portion of it which was set apart for the subordinate offices of the sanctuary, to assist the other and smaller portion of their own tribe, invested with the superintendence of the house of God (1 Kings viii, 4; Ezra ii, 70, John i, 19, etc.), and this is the meaning which has perpetuated itself. Sometimes, again, it is added as an epithet of the smaller portion of the tribe, and we read of "the priests the Levites" (Josh. iii, 3; Exek. xlii, 15). See Priest. In describing the institution and development of the Levitical order, we shall treat of it in chronological order, availing ourselves of the best systematizations hitherto produced.

I. From the Exode till the Monarchy.—This is the most interesting and important period in the history of the Levitical order, and in describing it we must first of all place amongst the chief tribes eunuchs from the wives of Jacob, and share with them a recognised superiority over those that bore the names of the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah. Within the tribe itself there are some slight tokens that the Kohathites were gaining the first place; the first class of Ephod of Exod. vi, 18-25 gives to that section of the tribe four clans, whereas the first order of Levi had five. To this belonged the house of Amram, and "Aaron the Levite" (Exod. iv, 14) is spoken of as one to whom the people would be sure to listen. He married the daughter of the chief of the tribe of Judah (Exod. vi, 28). The work accomplished by him, and by his yet greater brother, would naturally tend to give prominence to the family and the tribe to which they belonged, but as yet there are no traces of a caste-character, no signs of any intention to form a separate sect. This book, therefore, belongs to that time the Israelites had worshipped the God of their fathers after their fathers' manner. The first-born of the people were the priests of the people. The eldest son of each house inherited the priestly office. His youth made him, in his father's lifetime, the representative of the purity which was connected from the beginning with the thought of worship (Ewald, Alterthum, p. 373, and comp. Priest). It was apparently with this as their ancestral worship that the Israelites came up out of Egypt. The "young men" of the sons of Israel offer sacrifices (Exod. xxiv, 6). They, we may infer, are the priests to whom reference is made when the people while encamped at the heights of Sinai (xx. 22-24). They represented the truth that the whole people were a "kingdom of priests" (xxi, 6). Neither they, nor the "officers and judges" appointed to assist Moses in administering justice (xxviii, 25), are connected in any special manner with the tribe of Levi. The first mention of this tribe is in the institution of a hereditary priesthood in the family of Aaron during the first withdrawal of Moses to the solitude of Sinai (xxviii, 1). This, however, was one thing: it was quite another to set apart a whole tribe of Israel as a priestly family. The directions given for the construction of the tabernacle imply no pre-eminentsence of the Levites. The chief workers in it are from the tribes of Judah and Dan (Exod. xxxi, 2-6). The next extension of the idea of the priesthood grew out of the terrible crisis of Exod. xxxii. If the Levites had been shakers in the sin of the golden calf, at any rate, the foremost to rally round their leader when he called on them to help him in stemming the progress of the evil. Then came that terrible consecration of themselves, when every man was against his son and against his brother, and the offering with which they filled their hands (Exod. xxxi, 1-4, Exod. xxxii, 29; comp. Exod. xxviii, 41) was the blood of their nearest of kin. The tribe stood forth separate and apart, recognizing even in this stern work the spiritual as higher than the natural, and therefore counted worthy to be the repre- sentative of the ideal life of the people, "an Israel with- in an Israel" (Ewald, Alterthum, p. 279), chosen in its highest representatives to offer incessant holiness-sac- rifices before the Lord (Dent. xxxiii, 9, 10), not without a share in the glory of the Urim and Thummim that were worn by the prince and chief of the tribe. From this time, accordingly, they occupied a distinct position. Experience had shown how easily the people might fall back into idolatry—how necessary it was that there should be a body of men, an order, numerically large, and, when the people were in their promised home, equally diffused throughout the country, as attestators and guardians of the truth. Without this the individualism of the worship would have had its chance in an ever-multitudinous idolatry. The tribe of Levi was therefore to take the place of that earlier priesthood of the first-born as representatives of the holiness of the people.
LEVITE 391 LEVITE

The tabernacle, with its extensive and regular sacrificial service, which required a special priestly order regularly to perform the higher functions of the sanctuary, was the special occasion which also called into being the Levitical staff to aid the priests in their arduous task, just as the primitive and patriarchal mode of worship which prevailed till the erection of the tabernacle, and according to which the first-born of all Israelites performed the priestly offices (comp. Exod. xxiv, 4, and see First-born), could not be perpetuated under the newly-organized congregational service without the constant intervention of the priests. It was for this reason, as well as to secure greater effi- ciency in the sacred offices, that the religious primogeniture was conferred upon the tribe of Levi, which were henceforth to give their undivided attention to the re- quirements of the sanctuary (Num. iii, 11-19). The tribe of Levi were selected because they had manifested a very extraordinary zeal for the glory of God (Exod. xxxii, 26, etc.), had already obtained a part of this religious primogeniture by the institution of the hered- itary priesthood in the family of Aaron (Exod. xxviii, 1), and because, as the tribe to which Moses and Aaron belonged, they would most naturally support and pro- motie the institutions of the lawgiver. To effect this transfer of office, the first-born males of all the other tribes and all the Levites were ordered to be numbered, from the age of one month and upwards; and when it was found that the former were 22,073, and the latter 22,000 (see below), it was arranged that 22,000 of the first-born should be replaced by the 22,000 Levites, that the 273 first-born who were in excess of the Levites should be redeemed at the rate of five shekels each, bei- ing the legal sum for the redemption of the first-born child (Num. xviii, 16), and that the 186 shekels be given to Aaron and his sons as a compensation for the odd persons who, as first-born, belonged to Jehovah. As to the difference as to the title which the first-born should be redeemed by paying this money, and which should be exchanged for the Levites, since it was natural for every one to wish to escape this expense, the Midrash (On Num. iii, 17) and the Talmud relate that Moses wrote on 22,000 tickets Levi (יְיַעַקז), and on 273 Fire Shekhels (לְפִנָּיָּהֲשָךְ), mixed them all up, put them into a vessel, and then bid every Israelite to draw one. He who took out one with Levi it was redeemed by a Levite, and he who drew one with Fire Shekels it had to be redeemed by payment of this sum (תבשדה, 17, a). There is no reason to doubt this ancient tradition. It was further ordained that the cattle which the Levites then happened to possess should be considered as equivalent to all the first-born cattle which all the Israelites had, without their being num- bered and exchanged one for one, as in the case of the human beings (Num. iii, 41-51), so that the firstlings should not now be given to the priest, or be redeemed, which the Israelites therefore suggests they a had to do (Num. xviii, 15). In this way the Levites obtained a sacrificial as well as a priestly character. They for the first-born of men, and their cattle for the firstlings of beasts, fulfilled the idea that had been asserted at the time of the destruction of the first-born of Egypt (Exod. xiii, 12, 13).

There is a discrepancy between the total number of the Levites, which is given in Num. iii, 39 as 22,000, and the separate number of the three divisions which is given in verses 22, 28, and 44, as follows: Gershoni- tes, 7500—Kohathites, 8000—Merarites, 22,300. Compare also verse 45, where it is said that the 22,273 first-born exceeded the total number of Levites by 273. The Talmud (Bechotch, 5, a) and the Jewish commen- tators, who are followed by most Christian expositors, submit that the 220 surplus Levites were the first-born of this tribe, which, (1) could not be substituted for the first-born of the other tribes, and therefore were omitted from the total. To this, however, it is objected that if such an exemption of first-born had been intend- ed, the text would have contained some intimation of it, whereas there is nothing whatever in the context to indi- cate it. Houbigant therefore suggests that שפ is a del- ped out of the word שפ in verse 28, making it שפ, and that by retaining the former word we obtain 2200 instead of 8000, which removes all the difficulty. Philippson, Keil, and others adopt this explanation. The number of the first-born appears disproportionately small as com- pared with the population. It must be remembered, however, that the conditions to be fulfilled were that they should be at once (1) the first child of the father, (2) the first child of the mother, and (3) males. (Comp. on this question, and on that of the difference of numbers, Kurtz, History of the Old Covenant, iii, 201.)

2. Division of the Tribe of Levi.—As different functions were assigned to the separate branches of the Levitical branch of the tribe, to which frequent references are made, we subjoin the following table from Exod. vi, 16-25, italicizing the Aaronic or priestly branch in order to facilitate these references.

N.B.—Those mentioned in the above list are by no means the only descendants of Levi in their respective generations, as is evident from the fact that, though no sons of Libni, Shimei, Hebron, etc., are here given, yet mention is made in Numb. iii, 26, of "the family of the Libnites"; and in Numb. iii, 27; xxvi, 68, of "the family of the Hebronites"; whilst in 1 Chron. xxvii, 19 and elsewhere, as it is commonly supposed, these sons of Mahli and Mushi are mentioned by name. Again, no sons of Mahli and Mushi are given, and yet they appear in Numb. iii as fathers of families of the Levites. The design of the passage is simply to give the pedigrees of Moses and Aaron, and some other principal heads of the families as is expressly stated. 1 Chron. vi, 25: "These are the heads of the fathers of the Levites according to their families." In this connection, it is customary to mention other members of the family of Moses and Aaron. The observations afford an answer to a considerable extent to the conclusions of bishop Colenso upon the number of the Levites (The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua critically examined, i, 107-113).

It will thus be seen that the Levitical order comprises the whole of the descendants of Gershom and Merari, and those of Kohath through Izhar and Uzzziel, as well as through Amram's second son, Moses, whilst Aaron, Amram's first son, and his issue, constitute the priestly order. It is well known that there has been marked throughout the history of Israel in the second point of age and order, yet his family will be found to occupy the first position, because they are the nearest of kin to the priests.

3. Age and Qualifications for Levitical Service.—The order of the Levites for active service in the Mosaic law is mature age, which in Numb. iv, v, 33, 30, 39, 43, 47 is said to be from thirty to fifty, whilst in Numb. viii, 24, 35 it is said to commence at twenty-five. Various attempts have been made to reconcile these two apparently contradictory injunctions. The Talmud (Chol. 24, a), Rashbi (Comment. ad loc.), and Maimonides (Jed Ha-Chezaka, iii, 7, 3), who are followed by some Christian commentators, affirm that from twenty-five to thirty the Levites attended in order to be instructed in their duties, but did not enter upon actual duties until they were full thirty years of age. But this explanation, as Abrahanel rightly remarks, "is at variance with the plain declaration of the text, that the Levites were called at twenty-five years of age to wait upon the service of the tabernacle, which clearly denotes not instruction for their ministry, but the ministry itself" (Commentator. on Numb. viii, 24). Besides, the text itself does not give the slightest intimation that any period of the Levitical life was devoted to instruction. Hence Rashbam, Aben Ezra, and Abrahanel, who are followed by most modern expositors, submit that the twenty-five years of age refers to the Levites entering upon the lighter part of their duties, as preparing water as the Levites did of the holy things in the tabernacle, whilst the thirty years of age refers to their entering upon the more onerous duties, such as carrying heavy weights, when the tabernacle was moved about from place to place, which required the full strength of a man, maintaining that this distinction is indicated in the text by the words הַנְּכַשָּׁה, נְכַשָּׁה, נְכַשָּׁה, for labor and burdens, when the thirty years' work is spoken of (Numb. iv, 30, 31), and by the omission of the word הָיַבִּים, burden, when the twenty-five years' work is spoken of (Numb. viii, 24, etc.). But it may fairly be questioned whether man is more fitted for arduous work from thirty to thirty-five than from twenty-five to thirty. Besides, the Gereshonites and the Merarites, who had the charge of the heavier burdens, did not carry them at all (comp. Numb. viii, 3-9, and sec. 4 below). According to another ancient Jewish interpretation adopted by Bähr (Symbol. ii, 41) and others, Numb. iv, iv, 35-18, 22 of the necessary age of the Levites for the immediate performance of their duties is thirty, and twenty-five years of age gives their age for the promised land, when they shall be divided among the tribes and a larger number shall be wanted (Siphri on Numb. viii). Somewhat similar is Phillipon's explanation, who affirms that at the first election of the Levitical order the required age for service was from thirty to fifty, but that all future Levites had to commence service at twenty-five. The Sept., solves the difficulty by uniformly reading twenty-five instead of thirty.

4. Duties and Classification of the Levites.—The commencement of the service of the Levites from Sinai gave prominence to their new character. As the tabernacle was the symbol of the presence among the people of their unseen King, so the Levites were, among the other tribes of Israel, as the royal guard that waited exclusively on him. The title of "host" is specially applied to them (comp. gen. 14, 18, in Numb. iv, 8, 90; and of עָרָיִם, in 1 Chron. ii, 6, 16). The number of the Levites (Numb. i, 47; ii, 38; xxvi, 62), but were reckoned separately by themselves. When the people were at rest they encamped as guardians around the sacred tent; no one else might come near it under pain of death (Numb. i, 51; xvii, 22). The differences pitched their tents around it in the following manner: the Gershonites behind it on the west (Numb. iii, 29), the Kohathites on the south (iii, 29), the Merarites on the north (iii, 45), and the priests on the east (iii, 38). See CAMP. They were to occupy a middle position in that ascending scale of consecration which, starting from the idea of the whole nation as a priestly people, reached its culminating point in the high-priest, who alone of all the people might enter "within the veil." The Levites might come nearer than the other tribes, but they might not sacrifice, nor burn incense for the Lord, and were called to "the holy things" of the sanctuary till they were covered (Numb. iv, 15). When on the march, no hands but theirs might strike the tent at the commencement of the day's journey, or carry the parts of its structure during it, or pitch the tent again when they halted (Numb. i, 51). It was obviously essential for the people that there should be a fixed and unchangeable arrangement of duties, and now, accordingly, we meet with the first outlines of the organization which afterwards became permanent. The division of the tribe into the three sections that traced their descent from the sons of Levi formed the groundwork of it. The Levites were given as a gift (קֵרֵם, יִנְחָמִים) to Aaron and his sons, the priests, to wait upon them, and to do the subordinate work for them at the service of the sanctuary (Numb. vii, 19; xvii, 2-6). They also had to guard the tabernacle and take charge of certain vessels, whilst the priests had the watch over the altar and the interior of the sanctuary (Numb. ii, 30; vii, 19; xvii, 1-7). To carry this out effectually, the charge of certain vessels and portions of the tabernacle, as well as the guarding of its several sides, was assigned to each of the three sections into which the tribe was divided by their respective descent from the three sons of Levi, i.e. Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, as follows: (1) The Kohathites, who out of 8600 persons yielded 2750 qualified for active service according to the prescribed age, who were under the leadership of Elizaphan, had to occupy the south side of the tabernacle, and, as the family to which Aaron the high-priest and his sons belonged, had to take charge of the holy things (כֹּל הַנְּכַשָּׁה, viz., the ark, the table of shew-bread, the candlestick, the two altars of incense and burnt-offering, as well as of the sacred vessels used at the service of these holy things, and the curtains of the holy of holies. All these things they had to carry on their own shoulders when the camp was broken up (Numb. iii, 27-32; iv, 5-15; vii, 8; Deut. xxxi, 25), after the priests had covered them with the dark blue cloth which was to hide them from all profane gaze; and thus they became also the guardians of all the sacred treasures which the tribe had to carry about with them. Elazar, the head of the priests, who belonged to the Kohathites, and who was the chief commander of the three Levitical divisions, had the charge of the oil for the candlestick, the incense, the daily meat-offering, and the anointing oil (Numb. iii, 51, 52; iv, 16).
(3.) The Gershonites, who out of 7500 men yielded 2500 for active service, and who were under the leadership of Eliasaph, had to occupy the west side of the tabernacle, and to take charge of the tapestry of the tabernacle, all its curtains, hangings, and coverings, the pillars of the tapestry hangings, the implements used in connection therewith, and to perform all the work connected with the making down, setting up, and putting up of the viti- cles over which they had the charge (Numb. iii. 21-26; iv. 22-28).

(3.) The Merarites, who out of 2000 yielded 2800 active men, and who were under the leadership of Zuriel, had to occupy the north side of the tabernacle, and take charge of the boards, cypress poles, sockets, tent-nails, etc. (Numb. iii. 33-37; iv. 39, 40). The two latter companies, however, were allowed to use the six covered wagons and the twelve oxen which were offered as an offering to Jehovah; the Gershonites, having the less heavy portion, got two of the wagons and ten of the oxen, while the Merarites, who had the heavier portions, got four of the wagons and eight of the oxen (Numb. vii. 3-9).

Thus the total number of active men which the three divisions of the Levites yielded was 3850. When en- camped in the wilderness they were, according to the ancient Hebrew canon, even a priest was not allowed to do the service assigned to the Levites, nor was one Levite permitted to perform the duties which were incumbent upon his fellow Levite under penalty of death (Maimon- ides, Hhekikot Ha-Ha-Midash, i, 10).

The book of Deuteronomy is interesting as indicating more clearly than had been done before the other functions, over and above their ministrations in the tabernacle, which were to be allotted to the tribe of Levi. Through the whole land they were to take the place of the old household priests (subject, of course, to the special rights of the Aaronic priesthood), and at the religious festivals, feasts and rejoicings (Deut. xii. 19; xiv, 26, 27; xxvi. 11). Every third year they were to have an additional share in the produce of the land (Deut. xiv. 28; xxvi. 12). The people were charged never to forsake them. To “offer the Levites” was to entrust to the office of preserving, transcribing, and interpreting the law (Deut. xvii. 9-12; xxvi. 26). They were solemnly to read it every seventh year at the Feast of Tabernacles (Deut. xxxi. 9-13). They were to pronounce the curses from Mount Ebal (Deut. xxvi. 14). Such, if may be said, was the ideal of the religious organization which was present to the mind of the lawgiver. Details were left to be developed as the altered circumstances of the people might require. The great principle was, that the warrior-caste who had guarded the tents of the captain of the hosts of Israel, and that people should be throughout the land as witnesses and light, and that people still owed allegiance to him. It deserves notice that, as yet, with the exception of the few passages that refer to the priests, no traces appear of their character as a learned caste, and of the work which afterwards be- longed to them as hymn-writers and musicians. The hymns of this period were probably occasional, not re- curring (comp. Exod. xv; Numb. xxvi. 17; Deut. xxiii.).

Women bore a large share in singing them (Exod. xv, 21; Psa. lxxvii. 22). It is not unlikely that the wives and daughters of the Levites, who must have been with them in all their encampments, in their battles, took the foremost part among the "damsels play- ing with their timbrels," or among the “wise-hearted," who wave hangings for the decoration of the tabernacle. There are, at any rate, signs of their presence there in the mention of the "women that assembled" at its door (Exod. xxxviii. 8, and comp. Ewald, Abergithum, p. 297).

5. Consecration of the Levites.—The first act in the consecration of the Levites was to sprinkle them with the water of purification (Exod. xxi. 22), putting on them the ephod, vestments, etc., as was the custom at the anointing of kings and priests (Lev. vi. 31). They had, in the next place, as an emblem of further purification, to shave the hair of their head from their body, "to teach thereby," as Balbag says, "that they must renounce, as much as was in their power, all worldly things, and devote themselves to the service of the most high God," and then wash their garments. After this triple form of purification, they were brought before the door of the tabernacle, along with two bullocks and fine flour mingled with oil, when the whole congregation, through the elders who represented them, laid their hands upon the heads of the Levites, and set them apart for the service of the sanctuary, to occupy the first-born of the children of Israel; instead of the first-born of the children of Israel. The part which the whole congregation took in this consecration is a very important feature in the Hebrew constitution, inasmuch as it most distinctly shows that the Levitical order proceeded from the midst of the people (Exod. xxvii. 1), was to be regarded as essentially identical with it, and not as a sacred caste standing in proud eminence above the rest of the nation. This principle of equality, which, according to the Mosaic law, was not to be infringed by the introduction of a priesthood or monarchy (Deut. xviii. 14-20), was recognized throughout the existence of the Hebrew commonwealth, as is evident from the fact that the representatives of the people took part in the coronation of kings and the installment of high-priests (I Kings ii. 35; with I Chron. xxix, 32), and even in the days of the Maccabees we see that it is the people who are installed as the high-priests of the Lord (I Macc. i. 80).

6. Rewards of the Levites.—Thus consecrated to the service of the Lord, it was necessary that the tribe of Levi should be relieved from the temporal pursuits of the rest of the people, to enable them to give themselves wholly to their spiritual functions, and to the cultivation of the arts and sciences, as well as to preserve them from contracting a desire to amass earthly possessions. For this reason they were to have no territorial possessions, but Jehovah was to be their inheritance (Numb. xviii. 20; xxvi. 62; Deut. x. 9; xviii. 1, 2; Josh. xviii. 7). To reward their labor, which they had henceforth to perform instead of the first-born of the whole people, as well as to compensate the loss of their share in the material wealth of the nation, it was ordained that they should receive from the other tribes the tithes of the produce of the land, from which the non-priestly portion of the Levites, in their turn had to offer a tithe to the priests as a recognition of their higher consecration (Numb. xviii. 21-24, 26-32; Neh. x. 37). If they had had, like other tribes, a distinct territory assigned to them, their influence over the people at large would have been diminished. The Levites, however, were not to forget, in labors common to them with others, their own peculiar calling (Neh. x. 37). As if to provide for the contingency of falling crops or the like, and the consequent inadequacy of the tithes thus assigned to them, the Levite, not less than the widow and the orphan, was commanded to enjoy the special kindness of the people (Deut. xii. 19; xiv, 27, 29).
But, though they were to have no territorial possessions, still they required a place of abode. To secure this, and at the same time to enable the Levites to disseminate a knowledge of the law and exercise a refined and intellectual influence among the people at large, upon whose conscientious payment of the tithes they were dependent for subsistence, forty-eight cities were assigned to them, six of which were to be cities of refuge for those who had inadvertently killed any one (Num. xxxv, 1–8). From these forty-eight cities, which they obtained immediately after the conquest of Canaan, and which were made up by taking four cities from the district of each tribe, thirteen were allotted to the priestly portion of the Levitical tribe. Which cities belonged to the priestly portion of the tribe, and which to the non-priestly portion, and how they were distributed among the other tribes, as recorded in Josh. xxi, will be seen from the following table:

Each of these cities was required to have an outlying suburb (עֵרֶב, נְדָרָה) of meadow land for the pasture of the flocks and herds belonging to the Levites, the dimensions of which are thus described in Num. xxxv, 4, 5: "And the suburbs [or pasture-ground] of the cities which ye shall give unto the Levites are from the wall of the city to the outside a thousand cubits round about; and ye shall measure from without the city the east corner two thousand cubits, and the south corner two thousand cubits, and the west corner two thousand cubits, and the north corner two thousand cubits, and the city in the centre." These dimensions have occasioned great difficulty, because of the apparent contradiction in the two verses, as specifying first 1000 cubits and then 2000. The Sept. and Josephus (Ann. iv, 4, 3), and Philo (De auct. hon. 247) get over the difficulty by reading 2000 in both verses, as exhibited in diagram I, a, while ancient and modern commentators, who rightly adhere to the text, have endeavored to reconcile the two verses by advancing different theories, of which the following are the most noticeable: i. According to the Talmud (Erezem, 51, a), the space "measured from the wall 1000 cubits round about" was used as a common or suburb, and the space measured "from without the city on the east side," etc., was a further tract of land of 2000 cubits, used for fields and vineyards, the former being "the suburbs" properly so called, and the latter the "fields of the suburbs," as represented in diagram I, b. Against this view, however, which is the most simple and rational, and which is adopted by Maimonides (Hilchot Shehita Ve-Jobel, xii, 2); bishop Patrick, and most English expositors, it is urged that it is not said that the 2000 cubits are to be measured in all directions, but only in the east, south, etc., direction, or, as the Hebrew has it, east, south, etc., corner (תִּמְרָא). 2. It means that a circle of 1000 cubits radius was to be measured from the centre of the city, and then a square circumscribed about that circle, each of whose sides was 2000 cubits long, as exhibited in diagram II. But the objection to this is that the 1000 cubits were to be measured "from the wall of the city," and not from the centre. 3. The 1000 cubits were measured perpendicularly to the wall of the city, and then perpendicularly to these distances, i. e. parallel to the walls of the city, the 2000 cubits were measured on the north, south, east, and west sides, as shown in diagram III. This, however, is obviously incorrect, because the sides would not be 2000 cubits long if the city were of finite dimensions, but plainly longer. 4. It is assumed that the city was built in a circular form, with a radius of 1500 cubits, that a circle was then described with a radius of 2500 cubits from the centre of the city, i. e. at a distance of 1000 cubits from the walls of the city, and that the suburbs were inclosed between the circumferences of the two circles, and that the corner of the circumscribed square was 1000 cubits from the circumference of the outer circle. Compare diagram IV. But the objection to this is that by Euclid, i, 47, the square of the diagonal equals the sum of the square of the sides, whereas in this figure 3500² does not equal 2500² + 2500². The assigned length of the diagonal varies about 85 cubits from its actual value. The city is supposed to be of a circular form; round it a circle is described at a distance of 1000 cubits from its walls; then from the walls 2000 cubits are measured to the north, south, east, and west corners — the whole forming a starlike figure, as exhibited in diagram V. This view, which is somewhat fanciful, strictly meets the requirements of the Hebrew text. 6. The 1000 cubits are measured from the centre in four directions at right angles to one another, and perpendicular to each of these a side of 2000 cubits long is drawn, the whole forming a square. But in this case the condition of 1000 cubits round about is not fulfilled, the distance of the centre from the corners of the square being plainly more than 1000 cubits. 7. The "1000 cubits round about" is equivalent to 1000 cubits square, or 305 English acres. 8. The city is supposed to be square, each side measuring 1000 or 500 cubits, and then, at a distance of 1000 cubits in all directions from the square, another square is described, as represented in diagrams VI, a, and VI, b. But this incurs the objection urged against it, that the 1000 cubits cannot be said to be measured "round about," the distance from the corner of the city to the corner of the precincts being plainly more than 1000 cubits. Upon a review of all these theories, we incline to the ancient Jewish view, which is stated first, and against which nothing can be said, if we take "on the south, east," etc., simply to mean, as it often does, in all directions, instead of four distinct points. It presupposes that the cities were built in a circular form, which was usual in the cities of antiquity, both because the circle of all figures comprises the largest area within the smallest periphery, and because the inhabitants could reach every part of the walls in the shortest time from all directions, if necessary, for purposes of defence. These revenues have been thought exorbitant beyond all bounds; for, discounting the unjustifiable conclusion of bishop Colenso, that "forty-four people [Levites], with the two priests, and the two Levites, had both the cities assigned to them" (The Pentateuch, etc., i, 112), and adhering to the scriptural numbers, we still have a tribe which, at the second census, numbered 23,000 males, with no more than 12,000 arrived at man's estate, receiving the tithes of 800,000 people; "consequently," it is thought, "that each Levite, without having to tend seed and charges of husbandry, had as much as five Israelites reaped from their fields or gained on their cattle" (Michaelis, Lives of Moses, i, 252). To add to this that, though so small in number, the Levites received for eight cities, while other cities which consisted of more than double the number of men received less cities, and some did not get more than twelve cities. But in all these calculations the following facts are ignored: 1. The tithes were not a regular tax, but a religious duty, which was greatly neglected by the people; 2. Even from these irregular tithes the Levites had to give a tithe to the priests; 3. The tithes never increased, whereas the Levites did increase. 4. Thirteen of the forty-eight cities were assigned to the priests, and six were cities of refuge; and, 5. Of the remaining twenty-nine cities, the Levites worked by no means the whole year, the greater part being devoted to business or to travel. Hence it is evident that the Levites were not compelled to sell their houses, and that a special clause bearing on this subject was inserted in the Jubilee law (see NIV); inasmuch as Lev. xxv, 32-34, would have no meaning unless it is presumed that other Israelites lived together with the Levites. These provisions for abode, of course, did not apply to the Levites in the time of Moses. When wandering in the wilderness, they were supported like the other Israelites, with but slight emoluments or perquisites, and at first with comparatively little honor, amid their considerable burdens in caring for the religious cultus. But how rapidly the feeling of reverence gained strength we may judge from the share assigned to them out of the flocks, and herds, and women of the conquered Midianites (Numb. xxxi, 27, etc.). The same victory led to the dedication of gold and silver vessels of great value, and thus increased the importance of the tribe as guards of the national treasures (Numb. xxxi, 50-54). C. Modifications under Joshua and the Judges. — The submission of the Gibeonites, after they had obtained a promise that their lives should be spared, enabled Joshua to retain the tribe-divisions of Gershon and Merari of the most burdensome of their duties. The conquered Hivites became "house-servants" and ","dwellers outside" for the house of Jehovah and for the congregation (Josh. ix, 27). The Nethinim (Deo dato) of 1 Chron. ix, 2; Ezra ii, 43, were probably sprung from captives taken by David in later wars, who were assigned to the service of the tabernacle, replacing possibly the Gibeonites who had been slain by Saul (2 Sam. xxii, 1). See NETHINIM. The scanty memorials that are left us in the book of Judges are rather unfavorable to the inference that for any length of time the reality answered to the Mosaic idea of the Levitical institution. The ravages of invasion, and the pressure of an alien rule, marred the working of the organization which seemed so perfect. Levitical cities, such as Aijalon (Josh. xxxi, 24; Judg. i, 35), and Gezer (Josh. xxxi, 21; 1 Chron. iv, 67), fell into the hands of their enemies. Sometimes, as in the case of Nob, others apparently took their place. The wandering, unsettled habit of such Levites as are mentioned in the later chapters of Judges are probably to be traced to this loss of a fixed abode, and the consequent necessity of taking refuge in other cities, even though their tribe as such had no portion in them. The tendency of the people to fall into the idolatry of the neighboring nations showed either that the Levites failed to bear their witness to the truth or had no power to enforce it.

Levitical City.—Diagram I, b.

Even in the lifetime of Phinehas, when the high-priest was still consulted as an oracle, the very reverence which the people felt for the tribe of Levi becomes the occasion of a rival worship (Judg. xvii). The old household priesthood renews (see Kalisch, On Genesis xiv, 7), and there is the risk of the national worship breaking up into individualism. Micaiah first consecrates of his own soul the tribe of Levi to the Lord, while the officers of the temple call him as "a father and a priest" for little more than his food and raiment. The Levite, though probably the grandson of Moses himself, repeats the sin of Korah. See JONATHAN. First in the house of Micaiah, and then for the emigrants of his time, he exercises the office of a priest with "an ephod, and a teraphim, and a graven image." With this exception the whole tribe appears to have fallen into a condition analogous to that of the clergy in the darkest period and in the most outlying districts of the medieval Church, going through a ritual routine, but exercising no influence for good, at once corrupted and corrupting. The shameless license of the sons of Eli may be looked upon as the result of a long period of decay, affecting the whole order. When the priests were such as Hophni and Phinehas, we may fairly suppose that the Levites were not doing much to sustain the moral life of the people.

The work of Samuel was the starting-point of a better time. Himself a Levite, and, though not a priest, belonging to that section of the Levites which was nearest to the priesthood (1 Chron. vi, 38), adopted, as it were, by the Levite type of profession, he exerted himself for the welfare of the Israelites, and trained for its offices (1 Sam. ii, 18), he appears as infusing a fresh life, the author of a new organization. There is no reason to think, indeed, that the companies or schools of the sons of the prophets which appear in this time (1 Sam. x, 1), and are traditionally said to have been founded by him, consisted exclusively of Levites; but there are many signs that the members of that tribe formed a large element in the new order, and received new strength from it. It exhibited, indeed, the ideal of the Levitical life as one of praise, devotion, teaching; standing in the same relation to the priests and Levites generally as the monastic institutions of the 5th century, or the mendicant orders of the 18th did to the secular clergy of Western Europe. The fact that the Levites were thus brought under the influence of a system which addressed itself to the mind and heart in a greater degree than was the case with the priests, who were the main sustaining force of the Levite world, possibly have led them on to apprehend the higher truths as to the nature of worship which begin to be asserted from this period, and which are nowhere proclaimed more clearly than in the great hymn that bears the name of Samuel (I Sam. vii, 19). The calling of the name of prophet to a new significance is itself a Levite (1 Sam. ix, 9). It is among the prophets that we find the first signs of the musical skill which is afterwards so conspicuous in the Levites (1 Sam. x, 5). The order in which the Temple services were arranged is ascribed to two of the prophets, Nathan and Gad (2 Chron. xxix, 25), who must have grown up under Samuel's supervision, and in part to Samuel himself (1 Chron. ix, 22). Asaph and Heman, the psalmists, bear the same title as Samuel the seer (1 Chron. xxv, 5; 2 Chron. xxix, 30).

The very word "prophesying" is applied not only to sudden bursts of song, but to the organized psalmody of the Temple (1 Chron. xxxii, 2, 8). Even of those who bore the name of a prophet in a higher sense a large number are traceably of this tribe.

The capture of the ark by the Philistines did not entirely interrupt the worship of the Israelites, and the ministrations of the Levites went on, first at Shiloh (1 Sam. xiv, 3), then for a time at Nob (1 Sam. xxii, 11), afterwards at Gibeon (1 Kings iii, 2; 1 Chron. xvi, 89). The history of the return of the ark to Beth-shemesh and to Jerusalem is very well characterized by the Philistines' removal to Kirjath-jearim, points apparently to some strange complications rising out of the anomalies of this period, and affecting, in some measure, the position of the tribe of Levi. Beth-shemesh was, by the original assignment of the conquered country, one of the cities of the priests (Josh. xxiii, 16). They, however, do not appear in the narrative, unless we assume, against all probability, that the men of Beth-shemesh who were guilty of the act of profanation were themselves of the priestly order. Levites, indeed, are mentioned as doing their separation from the heathen (1 Sam. iv, 3). But the heathen sacrifices and burnt-offerings are offered by the men of the city, as though the special function of the priesthood had been usurped by others, and on this supposition it is easier to understand how those who had set aside the law of Moses by one offering also, by another, by a third, by every other. The singular reading of the Sept. in 1 Sam. vi, 19 (και ὁ θείων οἱ πατέρες την ιδην εἰνάνθιν Κυνοτροφός της εἴδου εἰσαγότος) indicates, if we assume that it rests upon some corresponding Hebrew text, a struggle between two opposed parties, one guilty of the profanation, the other—possibly the Levites who had been before mentioned—zealous in their remonstrances against it. Then comes, either as the result of this collision, or by direct supernatural influence, the great slaughter of the Beth-shemites, and they shrink back in terror from the ark, and keep it any longer among them. The great Eben (stone) becomes, by a slight personistic change in its form, the great Abel (lamentation), and the name remains as a memorial of the sin and of its punishment. See BETH-SHEMESH. We are left entirely in the dark as to the reasons which led them, after the ark had been brought into their city, to place it in some other priestly city, but to Kirjath-jearim, round which, so far as we know, there gathered legitimately no sacred associations. It has been commonly assumed, indeed, that Abinadab, under whose guardianship it remained until the time of David, was the founder of some priestly family, and the keeper and guardian of the ark, and had been of the tribe of Levi. See ABINADAB. Of this, however, there is not the slightest direct evidence, and against it is the language of David in 1 Chron. xv, 2, "None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites, for them hath Jehovah chosen," which would lose half its force if it were not meant as a protest against a recent innovation, and the ground of a return to the more ancient order. So far as one can see one way through these perplexities of a dark period, the most probable explanation—already suggested under KIRJATH-JEARIM—seems to be the following: The old names of Baaleh (Josh. xv, 8) and of Beth-shemesh (1 Chron. xix, 13) are survivals of old some special sanctity attached to the place as the centre of a Canaanite local worship. The fact that the ark was taken to the house of Abinadab in the hill (1 Sam. vii, 1), the Gibeah of 2 Sam. vi, 8, connects itself with the same idea, with this difference, that the ark, which, through the whole history of the Israelites, continued to have such strong attractions for them. These may have seemed to the panic-stricken inhabitants of that district, mingling old things and new, the worship of Jehovah with the lingering superstitions of the conquering people, sufficient grounds to determine their choice of a locality. The consecration (the word used is the special sacerdotal term) of Eleazar as the guardian of the ark is, on this hypothesis, analogous in its way to the other irregular assumptions which characterize this period, though here the offence was less flagrant, and did not involve, apparently, the performance of any sacrificial acts. While, however, this aspect of the religious condition of the people brings the Levitical and priestly orders before us as having lost the position they had previously occupied, there were other influential and authoritative things to reestablish them.

II. During the Monarchy.—The deplorably disorganized condition of the Levitical order was not much improved in the reign of the first Hebrew monarch. The rule of Samuel and his sons, and the prophetic character of the Philistines, doubtless the tribe of Levi, was to give them the position of a ruling caste. In the strong desire of the people for a king we may perhaps trace a protest against the assumption by the Levites of a higher position than that originally assigned them. The reign of Saul, in its later period, was at any rate the assertion of the Levite and the Gibeonites, who were attached to their service, were parts of the same policy, and the narrative of the condemnation of Saul for the latter (2 Sam. xxvii), shows by what strong measures the truth, of which that policy was a subversion, had to be impressed on the minds of the Israelites. The reign of David, however, brought the change from persecution to honor. The Levites were ready to welcome a king who, though not of their tribe, had brought up the temple and temple service, was able and skilled in their arts, prepared to share even in some of their ministrations, and to array himself in their apparel (2 Sam. vi, 14); and 4600 of their number, with 3700 priests, waited upon David at Hebron—himself, it should be remembered, one of the priestly cities—to tender their allegiance (1 Chron. xii, 25). When his kingdom was established, there came a fuller organization of the whole tribe. Its position in relation to the priesthood was once again definitely recognized. When the ark was carried up to its new resting-place in Jerusalem, their claim to be the bearers of it was acknowledged (1 Chron. xvi, 7). When the sin of Uzza stopped the procession, it was placed for a time under the care of Obad-edom of Gath—probably Gath-rimmon—as one of the chiefs of the Kohathites (1 Chron. xiii, 18; Josh. xxiv, 24; 1 Chron. xv, 18). In the processional order which attended the alternate conveyance of the ark to its new resting-place the Levites were conspicuous, wearing their linen ephod, and appearing in their new character as minstrels (1 Chron. xv, 27, 29). The Levites engaged in conveying the ark to Jerusalem were divided into six father's houses, headed by six chief priests belonging to Kohath, one to Gershon, and one to Merari (1 Chron. xv, 5, etc.). The most remarkable feature in the Levitical duties of this period is their being employed for the first time in choral service (1 Chron. xvi, 16-24; xvi, 4-36); others, again, were appointed as door-keepers (xx, 23, 24). Still the thorough reorganization of the whole tribe was effected by the shepherd-king in the last days of his eventful life, that the Levites might be able at the erection of the Temple "to wait on the sons of Aaron for the service of the house of Jehovah, in the courts and the chambers, and the king's house in all the work of the service of the house of God" (1 Chron. xxiii, 28). This reorganization may be described as follows:

1. Number of Levites and Age for Service.—The Levites from thirty years of age and upwards were first of all enrolled. It was found that they were 38,000 (1 Chron. xxiii, 2), this being about 29,500 more than at the first Mosaic census. It will be seen that, according to this statement, the Levites were to commence service at thirty years of age, in harmony with the Mosaic institution (Num. iv, 3, 23, 30); while in ver. 27 of the same chapter (i. e. 1 Chron. xxiii, 27) it is said that they were to take their share of duty at twenty years of age. Kimchi, who is followed by bishop Patrick, Michaelis, and others, tries to reconcile this apparent contradiction by submitting that the former refers to a census which David made at an earlier period, which was according to the Mosaic law (Num. iv, 3), while the latter speaks of a second census which he made at the close of his life, when he found that the duties of the fixed sanctuary were much lighter and more numerous, and could easily be performed at the age of twenty. But the tribe has always had the same time as the priests as the qualification of the staff of men. Against this, however, Bertheau rightly urges that, 1. The 38,000 Levites of thirty years of age given in the census of ver. 3 are the only persons appointed for the different Levitical offices, and that it is nowhere stated that this number was insufficient, or that the arrangements based thereupon, as recorded in vers. 4 and 5, were not carried out; and, 2. The chronicler plainly indicates, in ver. 25, etc., that he is about to impart a different statement from that communicated in ver. 5; and, 3. He mentions herein the reason why David was not abid by the Mosaic institution, which prescribes the age of service to commence at thirty, and in ver. 27 expressly points out the source from which he derived this deviating account. The two accounts are, therefore, entirely different; the one records that the Levites, whose service in David's time, were numbered from their thirtieth year, while the other, which applies to the chronicler more trustworthy, states that David introduced the practice which afterwards obtained (2 Chron. xxxi, 17; Extra iii, 8) of appointing Levites to office at the age of twenty.

2. Division of the Levites according to the three great Families.—Having ascertained their number, David, following the example of the Mosaic institution, divided the Levitical fathers' houses, according to their descent from the three sons of Levi, when it was ascertained that these three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, were represented by twenty-four heads of fathers' houses (1 Chron. xxiii, 26-28; xxxiv, 20-31), as follows:

3. Classification and Duties of the Levites.—These twenty-four fathers' houses, numbering 88,000 men qualified for active service, were then divided into four classes, to each of which different duties were assigned.

(1.) The first class consisted of 24,000 Levites. These were appointed to assist the priests in the work of the sanctuary (αναδιπλωματεις). They had the custody of the official garments and sacred vessels, had to deliver them when wanted, and collect and lock them up again after they had been used; to replenish the sacrificial storehouse with cattle, four, wheat, wine, oil, incense, and other articles used as sacrifices, and mete out each time the required quantity; to provide the different spiceries from which the priests compounded the incense (1 Chron. ix, 90); to prepare the shewbread and the other baked things used as sacrifices; to assist the priests in slaughtering the victims, and to attend to the cleaning of the Temple, etc. (1 Chron. xxiii, 28-32; ix, 29). They had most probably, also, the charge of the sacred treasury (1 Chron. xxvi, 20-28). Like the priests, they were subdivided into twenty-four courses or companies, according to the above-named twenty-four Levitical fathers' houses, and were headed respectively by one of the twenty-four representatives of these houses. Each of these courses was a week on duty, and was relieved on the Sabbath (2 Kings xi) by the company whose turn it was to serve next, so that there were always a thousand men of each class on duty, and so that they had served two weeks during the year. The menial work was done by the Nethinim, who were appointed to assist the Levites in these matters. See NETHINIM.

(2.) The second class consisted of 4000, who were the musicians (μουσικοι, μουσικοῖ). They were subdivided into twenty-four companies or corps, each headed by a chief (1 Chron. xxv, 2) and are to be traced back to the three great families of Levi, inasmuch as four of the chiefs were sons of Asaph, a descendant of Gershom (1 Chron. vi, 24–28); six were sons of Jeduthun, also called Ethan (1 Chron. xxv, 17), a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. vi, 28); and fourteen were sons of Heman, a descendant of Kohath (1 Chron. vi, 18). Each of these chiefs had eleven assistant masters from his own sons and family. Every twenty-four of them, when they had relieved each other in the solemn service, were known by the name of one of the three great families of Levi: seven were sons of Meacheliah, a descendant of Kohath; thirteen were from Obad-edom, a descendant of Gershom; and four were sons of Hoash, a descendant of Merari. These families, including the twenty-four leaders, consisted of ninety-three members, who, together with the three heads of the families, viz. Meacheliah, Obad-edom, and Hoash, made ninety-six, thus yielding four chief leaders for each course. We thus obtain a watch-course every week of 162 or 168 persons, under the command of four superintendents, one of whom was the commander-in-chief. As 24 sentinel posts are assigned to these guards, thus making 168 a week, it appears that each person only served one day in the week (1 Chron. xxvi).

The Levites lived for the greater part of the year in their own cities, and came up at fixed periods to take their turn of work (1 Chron. xxv, xxvi). The predominance of the number twelve as the basis of classification might seem to indicate monthly periods, and the festivals of the new moon would naturally suggest such an arrangement. The analogous order in the civil and military administration (1 Chron. xxvii, 1) would tend to the same conclusion. It appears, indeed, that there was a change of some kind every week (1 Chron. ix, 25; 2 Chron. xxiv, 4, 6); but this is, of course, compatible with a system of rotation, which would give to each a longer period of residence, or with the permanent residence of the leader of each division within the precincts of the sanctuary. Whatever may have been the system, we must bear in mind that the duties now imposed upon the Levites were such as to require almost continuous practice. They would need, when their turn came, to be able to bear their parts in the great choral hymns of the Temple, and to take each his appointed share in the complex structure of a sacrificial liturgy, and for this a special study would be required.

The education which the Levites received for their peculiar duties, no less than their connection, more or less intimate, with the schools of the prophets (see above), would tend to make them, so far as there was any education at all, the teachers of the others (there is, however, a curious Jewish tradition that the Nazirites of Israel were of the tribe of Simeon [Solomon. Jarchi on Gen. xlix, 7, in Godwyn's Moses and Aaron], the transcribers and interpreters of the law, the chroniclers of the times in which they lived. We have some striking instances of their appearance in this new character. One of them, Ethan who Ezrathai, takes his title from the old Hebrew sages who were worthy to be compared with Solomon, and (Ps. lxxix, title) he name appears as the writer of the 39th Psalm (1 Kings iv, 31; 1 Chron. xv, 17). One of the first to bear the title of "scribe" is a Levite (1 Chron. xxiv, 6), and this is mentioned as one of their special offices under Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv, 13). They are described as "officers and judges" under David (1 Chron. xxvi, 29), and, as such, are employed "in all the business of Jehovah, and in the service of the king." They are the agents of Je-roboam's successors in their work of civilizing their people and are sent forth to proclaim and enforce the law (2 Chron. xvii, 8; xxxi, 22). Under Josiah the function has passed into a title, and they are "the Levites that taught all Israel" (2 Chron. xxxv, 5). The two books of Chronicles contain remarkable marks of distinction written by men whose interests were all gathered round the services of the Temple, and who were familiar with its records. The materials from which they compiled their narratives, and to which they refer as the works of seers and prophets, were written by men who were probably Levites themselves, or, if not, were associated with them.

This reorganization effected by David, we are told, was adopted by his son Solomon when the Temple was completed (2 Chron. viii, 14, etc.). The revolt of the ten tribes, and the policy pursued by Jeroboam, led to a great change in the position of the Levites. They were the witnesses of an appointed order and of a central worship. Jeroboam wished to make the priests the creatures and instruments of the king, and to establish a provincial and divided worship. The natural result was that they left the cities assigned to them in the territory of Israel and gathered round the metropolis of Judah (2 Chron. xi, 13, 14). Their influence over the people at large was thus diminished, and the design of the Mosaic polity so far frustrated; but their power as a religious class continued, and was enjoyed in narrow limits. In the kingdom of Judah they were from this time forward a powerful body, politically as well as ecclesiastically. They brought with them the prophetic element of influence, in the wider as well as in the higher meaning of the word. We accordingly find them prominent in the war of Abijah against Jeroboam (2 Chron. xiii, 10–12). They are, as before noticed, sent out by Je Rohoashap to instruct and judge the people (2 Chron. xix, 8–10). Prophets of their order encourage the king in his war against Moab and Ammon, and go before his army with their loud baleful vociferations (2 Chron. xx, 21). And join in the triumphant exultation of his return. The apostasy that followed on the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah exposed them for a time to the dominion of a hostile system; but the services of the Temple appear to have gone on, and the Levites were again conspicuous in the restoration efected by Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiii), and in restoring the Temple to its former stateliness under Jehoash (2 Chron. xxiv, 5). They shared in the disasters of the reign of Amaziah (2 Chron. xxv, 24) and in the prosperity of Uzziah, and were ready, we may believe, to support the priests, who were able to withstand the opposition of the latter king (2 Chron. xxvi, 17). The closing of the Temple under Ahaz involved the cessation at once of their work and... of their privileges (2 Chron. xxxviii, 24). Under Hesekiah they again became prominent, as consecrating themselves to the special work of cleaning and repairing the Temple (2 Chron. xxix, 12-15); and the hymns of David and of Asaph were again renewed. In this instance it was thought worthy of special record that there were simply Levites who were more "upright in heart" and zealous in the performance of their priestly functions (2 Chron. xxix, 34); and thus, in that great Passover, they took the place of the unwilling or unprepared members of the priesthood. Their old privileges were restored, they were put forward as teachers (2 Chron. xxx, 22), and the payment of tithes probably had been discontinued under Ahaz, was renewed (2 Chron. xxxi, 4). The genealogies of the tribe were revised (ver. 17), and the old classification kept its ground. The reign of Manasseh was for them, during the greater part of it, a period of depression. That Josiah witnessed a fresh revival and reorganization (2 Chron. xxxiv, 8-18). In the great Passover of his eighteenth year they took their place as teachers of the people, as well as leaders of their worship (2 Chron. xxxiv, 3, 15). Then came the Egyptian and Chaldaean invasions, and the rule of foreign oppressors. The sanctity of the sacred order and the character of its functions showed itself unsatisfactory. The repeated protests of the priest Ezeekielle indicated that they had shared in the idolatry of the people. The prominence into which they had been brought in the reigns of the two reforming kings had apparently tempted them to think that they might enjoy the same prosperity on the special occasions of the priesthood, and the sin of Korah was renewed (Ezek. xlix, 10-14; xlvi, 11). They had, as a penalty of their sin, to witness the destruction of the Temple and to taste the bitterness of exile.

III. After the Captivity.—The position taken by the Levites in the first movements of the return from Babylon indicates that they had cherished the traditions and maintained the practices of their tribe. They, we may believe, were those who were specially called on to sing to their conquerors one of the songs of Zion (De Wette on Ps. cxvii). It is noticeable, however, that in the first body of returning exiles they were present in a disproportionately small number (Ezra ii, 36-42). Those who did come took their old parts at the foundation and dedication of the second Temple (Ezra iii, 10; iv, 18). In the next movement under Ezra their reluctance (whatever may have been its origin) was even more strongly marked. None of them presented themselves at the first great gathering (Ezra viii, 15). The special efforts of Ezra did not succeed in bringing together more than 38, and their place had to be filled by 229 of the Nehemians (v. 20). There was a tradition (Surenhusius, Mishna, Sota, ix, 10) to the effect that, as a punishment for this backwardness, Ezra deprived them of their tithes, and transferred the right to the priests. Those who returned with him resumed their functions (Neh. vii, 7), and those who were most active in that work were foremost also in chanting the hymn-like prayer which appears in Neh. ix as the last great effort of Jewish psalmody. They were recognised in the great national covenant, and the offerings and tithes which were their due were once more solemnly secured to them (Neh. x, 37-39). They took their old places in the Temple and in the villages near Jerusalem (Neh. xii, 29), and are present in full array at the great feast of the Dedication of the Wall. The two prophets who were active in the time of the return, Haggai and Zechariah, if they did not belong to the tribe, helped it forward in the work of restoration. The strongest measures were adopted by Nehemiah, as before by Ezra, to guard the purity of their blood from the contamination of mixed marriages (Ezra x, 25), and they were made the special guardians of the holiness of the Sabbath (Neh. xii, 22). The last prophet of the O.T. sees, as part of his vision of the latter days, the time when the Lord "shall purify the sons of Levi" (Mal. iii, 9).

The guidance of the O.T. fails us at this point, and the history of the Levites in relation to the national life becomes consequently a matter of inference and conjecture. The synagogue worship, then originated, or receiving a new development, was organized irrespectively of them [see SYNAGOGUE]; and thus throughout the whole of Palestine the methods of instruction in the law which they were not connected with. This would tend materially to diminish their peculiar claim on the reverence of the people; but where priests or Levites were present in the synagogue they were still entitled to some kind of precedence, and special sections in the lectionary of the day were assigned to them (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. on Matt. iv, 26). During the period that followed the captivity they contributed to the formation of the so-called Great Synagogue. The Levites, with the priests, theoretically constituted and practically formed the majority of the permanent Sanhedrin (Maimonides in Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. on Matt. xxvi, 3), and as such had a large share in the administration of justice even in capital cases. In the characteristic feature of this period, as an age of scribes succeeding to an age of prophets, they, too, were likely to be shakers. The constant nature of their historical and religious functions disposed them to attach themselves to the new system as they had done to the old. They accordingly may have been among the scribes and elders who accumulated traditions. They may have attached themselves to the sects of Pharisees and Sadducees. But it is not unlikely as they thus acquired fame and reputation individually, their functions as Levites became subordinate, and they were known simply as the inferior ministers of the Temple. They take no prominent part in the Maccabean struggles, though they must have been present at the great purifications of the Temple.

How strictly during this post-exilic period the Levitical duties were enforced, and how severely any neglect in performing them was punished, may be gathered from the following description in the Mishna: "The Levites had to guard twenty-four places: five were stationed at the five gates of the Mountain of the House (יִירָעָה יִירָעָה), four at the four corners inside, five at the five gates of the outer court, four at its four corners inside, one at the sacrificial storehouse, one at the curtain depository, and one behind the holy of holies. The inspector of the Mountain of the House went round through all the guards [every night] with burning torches before him. If the guard did not immediately stand up, the inspector of the Mountain of the House called out to him, 'Peace be with thee'; but if he perceived that he was asleep, he struck him with his stick, and even had the liberty of setting his garments on fire; and when it was asked, 'What is that noise in the court?' they were told, 'It is the noise of a Levite who is beaten, or whose clothes have been burnt, because he slept when on duty' (Middoth, i, 1, 2). It is thought that allusion is made to the fact in the Apocalypse when it is said "Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments" (Rev. xvi, 15). As for the Levites who were the singers, they were summoned by the blast of the trumpet after the incense was kindled upon the altar, when they assembled from all parts of the spacious Temple at the orchestra which was joined to the fifteen steps at the entrance from the women's outer court to the men's outer court. They sung psalms of thanksgiving and songs, accompanied by three musical instruments—the harp, the cithern, and cymbals—while the priests were pouring out on the altar the libation of wine. On Sunday they sang Ps. xxiv, on Monday Ps. xxviii, on Tuesday Ps. lxx, on Wednesday Ps. civ, on Thursday Ps. lxx, on Friday Ps. xcvii, and on Saturday Ps. sabath Ps. xcvii. Each of these psalms was sung in nine sections, with eight pauses (יִרָעָה יִרָעָה), and at each pause the priests blew trombones, when the whole congregation fell down every time worshipping on their faces (Talmud, vii, 3, 4).
The Levites had no prescribed canonical dress like the priests, as may be seen from the fact which Josephus narrates, that the singers requested Agrippa "to assemble the Sanhedrim in order to obtain leave for them to wear linen garments like the priests... contrary to the law" (Ant. xx. 6). Though they wore no official garments at the service, yet the Talmud says that they ordinarily wore a linen outer-garment with sleeves, and a head-dress; and on journeys were provided with a staff, a pocket, and a copy of the Pentateuch (Joma, 122, a). Some modifications were at this period introduced in what was considered the necessary qualification for service. The Mosaic law, it will be remembered, regarded age as the only qualification, and freed the Levite from his duties when he was fifty years old; now that singing constituted so essential a part of the Levitical duties, any Levite who had not a good voice was regarded as disqualified, and if he continued good and melodious, he was retained in service all his lifetime, irrespective of age, but if he failed he was removed from that class which constituted the choristers to the gate-keepers (Maimonides, Hilchot Kele Ha-Mikdash, iii, 8). During the period of mourning a Levite was exempt from his duties in the Temple. The Levites appear but seldom in the history of the N.T. Where we meet with their names it is as the type of a formal, heartless worship, without sympathy and without love (Luke x, 29). The same parable in its moral aspect could only become a reality when it had been transferred to a new setting (see Josh. xxii 1 Chron. vii—one of the great stations at which they and the priests resided (Lightfoot, Cent. Chorographe, c. 47). In John i, 19 they appear as delegates of the Jews—that is, of the Sanhedrim—coming to inquire into the credentials of the Baptist, and giving utterance to their own Messianic expectations. The mention of a Levite of Cyprus in Acts iv, 36, shows that the changes of the previous century had carried that tribe also into "the dispersed among the Gentiles." The conversion of Barnabas and Mark was probably no solitary instance of the reception by them of the new faith, which was the fulfilment of the old. If "a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith" (Acts vi, 7), it is not too bold to believe that their influence may have led Levites to follow their example; and thus the old psalms, and possibly also the old chants of the Temple service, might be transmitted through the agency of those who had been specially trained in them to be the inheritance of the Christian Church. Later on, in the history of the first century, when the Temple had received its final completion under the younger Agrippa, we find a great development of the engagement and new movement with that strange unconsciousness of a coming doom which so often marks the last stage of a decaying system, the singers of the Temple thought it a fitting time to apply for the right of wearing the same linen garment as the priests, and persuaded the king that the concession of this privilege would be the glory of his reign (Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, 6). The other Levites at the same time asked for and obtained the privilege of joining in the Temple choruses, from which hitherto they had been excluded. The destruction of the Temple so soon after had deprived the object of their desires came as with a grim irony to sweep away their occupation, and so to deprive them of every vestige of that which had distinguished them from other Israelites. They were merged in the crowd of captives that were scattered over the Roman world, and disappear from the stage of history. The rabbinc schools, that rose out of the ruins of the Jewish polity, fostered a studied and habitual depreciation of the Levitical order as compared with their own teachers (M'Caul, Old Paths, p. 450). Individual families, it may be, cherished the tradition that their fathers, as priests or Levites, had taken part in the services of the Temple. If their claims were recognised, they received the old marks of reverence in the worship of the synagogue (comp., the Regulations of the Great Synagogue of London, in Margoliouth's Hist. of the Jews in Great Britain, iii, 270), took precedence in reading the lessons of the day (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Matt. iv, 23), and pronounced the blessing at the close (Barang, Hist. des Juifs, vi, 790). Their existence was acknowledged in some of the laws of the Christian emperors (Constantine, Juv. l.c.). The repeated mise en scène of these recollections is shown in the prevalence of the names (Cohen, and Levita or Levy) which imply that those who bear them are the sons of Aaron or the tribe of Levi, and in the custom which exempted the first-born of priestly or Levitical families from the payments which he was required, in the case of others, as the redemption of the first-born (Leo of Modena, in Piscin. Cerimoniae Religiosae, i, 26; Allen's Modern Judaism, p. 297). In the mean time, the old name had acquired a new significatio. The early writers of the Christian Church applied to the later hierarchy the language of the elder, and gave to the bishops and presbyters the title (ipote) that had belonged to the sons of Aaron, while the deacons were habitually spoken of as Levites (Suicer, Thes. s. v. Alevr). Though the destruction of the Temple and the dispersion of the Jews have necessarily done away with the Levitical duties which were strictly local, yet the Levites, like the priests, still exist, have to this day certain functions to perform, and continue to enjoy certain privileges and immunities. On such festivals whereon the priests pronounce the benediction on the congregation of Israel, which may be done by the man of God in Numb. vi, 22–27, the Levites have "to wait on the priests," and wash their hands prior to the giving of the said blessing. At the reading of the law in the synagogue, the Levite is called to the second section, the first being assigned to the priest. See Haphtarah. Moreover, like the priests, the Leviites are exempt from redeeming their first-born, and this exception even extends to women of the tribe of Levi who marry Israelites, i. e. Jews of any other tribe. Levites, Military, a name given to such ministers in the time of the Commonwealth as filled the office of chaplain in the regiments of the Parliamentary army. Levit'ious, so called in the Vulgate from treating chiefly of the Levitical service; in the Heb. levit'is, and he called, being the word with which it begins; in the Sept. Artavüeáv; the third book of the Pentateuch, called also by the later Jews levat'is, "law of the priests," and ἱεραδική ἀρχή, "law of offerings." In our treatment of it we have especial regard to the various sacrifices enumerated.
1. Contents.—Leviticus contains the further statement and development of the Mosaic legislation, the beginnings of which are described in Exodus. It exhibits the historical progress of this legislation; consequently, we must not expect to find the laws detailed in it in a systematic form. There is, nevertheless, a certain order observed, which arose from the nature of the subject, and of which the plan may easily be perceived. The whole is intimately connected with the contents of

Exodus, at the conclusion of which book that sanctuary is described with which all external worship was connected (Exod. xxxv-xl).

Leviticus begins by describing the worship itself (ch. i—vii). It concludes with pastoral legislation and exhortations as to the worshippers (ch. xviii—xxvii). More specifically the book may be divided into seven leading sections.

(I.) The Laws directly relating to Sacrifices (ch. i—vii).

At first God spoke to the people out of the thunder and lightning of Sinai, and gave them his holy commandments by the hand of a mediator; but henceforth his presence is to dwell not on the secret top of Sinai, but in the midst of his people, both in their wanderings through the wilderness and afterwards in the Land of Promise. Henceforward, therefore, the sacrificial worship of the people is conducted under Moses. The offerings which Moses receives after the work is finished have reference to the offerings which were to be brought to the door of the tabernacle, As Jehovah draws near to the people in the tabernacle, so the people draw near to Jehovah in the offering. Without offerings none may approach him. The offering is the act of presentation and of dedication. It is the sacrifices and the priests, the people and the sanctuary, which are for Jehovah's altar; the sacrifices and the priests, the people (ch. iv—vii). Last of all, when a man lies and swears falsely concerning which he was intrusted to him, etc. (verses 20—26). This decalogue, like the preceding one, has its characteristic words and expressions. The prominent word which introduces so many of the enactments is "therefore," "as Jehovah," etc. (verses 1—27; v. 1, 2, 4, 15, 17, 19, 20, and the phrase, "If a soul shall hear," iv. 2), is, in almost all verses 20—26). This decalogue, like the preceding one, has its characteristic words and expressions. The prominent word which introduces so many of the enactments is "therefore," "as Jehovah," etc. (verses 1—27; v. 1, 2, 4, 15, 17, 19, 20, and the phrase, "If a soul shall hear," iv. 2), is, in almost all variations having an equivalent meaning, the distinctive phrase of the section. As in the former decalogue the nature of the offerings, so in this the person and the nature of the offering are the chief features in the several statutes.

3. Naturally upon the law of sacrifices follows the law of the priests' duties when they offer the sacrifices (ch. vii, viii). Hence we find Moses directed to address himself immediately to Aaron and his sons (vi. 2, 18 = vi. 9, 28, A.V.). In this group the various kinds of offerings are to be offered in nearly the same order as in the first two preceding decalogues, except that the offering at the consecration of a priest follows, instead of the thank-offering, immediately after the meat-offering, which it resembles, and the thank-offering now appears after the trespass-offering. There are, therefore, in all, six kinds of offering, and in the case of each of these the priest has his distinct duties. Bertheau has very ingeniously so distributed the enactments in which these duties are prescribed as to arrange them all in five decalogues. We will briefly indicate his arrangement.

(1.) The first decalogue. (a.) "This is the law of the burnt-offering" (vi. 9, A.V.), in five enactments, each verse (vers. 9-18) containing a separate enactment. (b.) "And this is the law of the meat-offering" (verse 14), again in five enactments, each of which is, as before, contained in a single verse (verse 14—18).

(2.) The second decalogue is contained in verses 19—20, (a.) Ver. 19 is merely introductory; then follow, in five verses, five distinct directions with regard to the offering at the time of the consecration of the priests, the first in verse 20, the next two in verse 21, the fourth in the former part of verse 22, and the last part of it in verse 22 and ver. 23. (b.) "This is the law of the sin-offerning" (verse 25). Then the five enactments, each in one verse, except that two verses (27, 28) are given to the third.

(3.) The third decalogue is contained in ch. vii, 1—10, the laws of the trespass-offering. But it is impossible to avoid a miscasting as to the soundness of Bertheau's system when we find him making the words "It is most holy," in verse 1, the first of the ten enactments. This he is obliged to do, as verses 2 and 4 evidently form but one.

(4.) The fourth decalogue, after an introductory verse (verse 11), is contained in ten verses (verses 12-21).

(5.) The last decalogue consists of certain general laws about the fat, the blood, the wave-bread, etc., and is comprised again in ten verses (verses 23-30), the verses, as before, marking the divisions.

The chapter closes with a brief historical notice of the fact that these several commands were given to Moses on Mount Sinai (verse 38-39).

(II.) An entirely historical section (chap. viii-x), in three parts. 1. In chap. viii we have the account of the consecration of Aaron and his sons by Moses before the world. The order of the high-priestly vestments and anointed with the holy oil; his sons also are arrayed in their garments, and the various offerings appointed are offered. 2. In chap. ix Aaron offers, eight days after his consecration, his first offering for himself and the people: this comprises for himself a sin- and burnt-offering, and a peace-offering. He blesses the people, and fire comes down from heaven and consumes the burnt-offering. 3. Ch. x tells how Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, eager to enjoy the privileges of their new office, and perhaps too anxious for its dignity, forgot or despised the restrictions by which it was surrounded (Exod. xxix, 7, etc.), and, daring to "offer strange fire before Jehovah," perished because of their presumption.

With the house of Aaron began this wickedness in the sanctuary; with them, therefore, began also the divine punishment. Very touching is the story which follows. Aaron, though forbidden to mourn his loss (ver. 6, 7), will not eat the sin-offering in the holy place; and when rebuked by Moses, pleads in his defence, "Such things have befallen me: and if I had eaten the sin-offering to-day, should it have been accepted in the sight of Jehovah?" Moses, the lawgiver; he arranges the plea, and honors the natural feelings of the father's heart, even when it leads to a violation of the letter of the divine commandment.

(III.) The laws concerning purity and impurity, and the appropriate sacrifices and ordinances for putting away impurity (chap. xii-xvi). The first seven decalogues were but an outline to the present section. By the appointed sacrifices the separation between man and God was healed. The next seven concern themselves with the putting away of impurity. That chap. xii-xv hang together so as to form one series of laws there can be no doubt. Besides that they treat of kindred subjects, they have their characteristic words, נמוד, "unclean," "uncleanness," נזוד, נזוד, "clean," which occur in almost every verse. The only question is about ch. xvi, which by its opening is connected immediately with the occurrence related in ch. x. Historically it would seem, therefore, that ch. xvi ought to have followed ch. x. As this order is neglected, it would lead to all the other historical arrangement than that of historical sequence has been adopted. This we find in the solemn significance of the great day of atonement. The high-priest on that day made atonement "because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins" (xvi, 16), and he "reconciled the holy place and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar" (ver. 20). Delivered from their guilt and cleansed from their pollutions, from that day forward the children of Israel entered upon a new and holy life. This was typified both by the ordinance that the bullock and the goat for the sin-offerings should be burnt without the camp (ver. 27), and also by the sending away of the goat laden with the iniquities of the people into the wilderness. Hence ch. xvi seems to stand most fitting at the end of this second group of seven decalogues. It has reference, we believe, not only (as Bertheau supposes) to the putting away, as by one solemn act, of all those uncleannesses mentioned in ch. xi-xv, and for which the various expiations and cleansings there appointed were temporary and insufficient, but also to the making of atonement, in the sense of hiding sin or putting away its guilt. For not only do we find the idea of cleansing as from defilement, but far more prominently the idea of reconciliation. The often-repeated word "be, to cover, to stone," is the great word of the section.

1. The first decalogue in this group refers to clean and unclean (chap. xi). Five classes of animals are pronounced unclean. The first four enactments determine what animals may or may not be eaten, whether (1) beasts of the earth (ver. 2-8), or (2) fishes (ver. 9-12), or (3) birds (verse 18-20), or (4) creeping things with wings. The next four are intended to guard against pollution by contact with the carcass of any of these animals: (5) ver. 24-26; (6) ver. 27, 28; (7) ver. 29-38; (8) verse 39-40. The ninth and tenth specify the last class of animals which are unclean for food, (9) ver. 41, 42, and forbid any other kind of pollution by means of them, (10) ver. 43-44. Verse 45 and 46 are merely a concluding sentence.

2. (a.) Women's purification in childbed (chap. xii). The whole of this chapter, according to Bertheau, constitutes (1) the first law of this decalogue. (b.) The remaining nine are to be found in the next chapter (xiii), which treats of the various leprosements: (1) ver. 1-8; (2) ver. 9-17; (4) ver. 18-23; (5) ver. 24-28; (6) ver. 29-37; (7) ver. 38, 39; (8) ver. 40, 41; (9) ver. 42-46; (10) ver. 47-55. This arrangement of the several sections is not altogether free from objection, but it is certainly supported by the characteristic mode in which each section opens. Thus, for instance, ch. xii, 2 begins with לָּנִּים "to wash"; ch. xiii, 2 with לָּנִּים לָּנִּים לָּנִּים, ver. 9 with לָּנִּים לָּנִּים לָּנִּים, and so on, the same order being always observed, the substantive being placed first, then יַעֲם, and then the verb, except only in ver. 42, where the substantive is placed after the verb.

3. The law of the leper in the day of his cleansing, i.e. the law which the priest is to observe in purifying the leper (xiv-152). The priest is mentioned in ten verses, each of which begins one of the ten sections of this law: ver. 8, 4, 5, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 19, 20. In each instance the word יְבַטְחָה is preceded by 1 consecut. with the perf. It is true that in verse 8, and also in verse 14, the word יְבַטְחָה occurs twice; but in both verses there is MS. authority, as well as that of the Vulg. and Arab. versions, for the absence of the second. Verses 21-215 may be regarded as a supplemental provision in cases where the leper is too poor to bring the required offering.

4. The leprosy in a house (xiv, 16-37). It is not so easy here to trace the arrangement noticed in so many other laws. There are no characteristic words or phrases to guide us. Bertheau's division is as follows: (1) ver. 84, 85; (2) ver. 86, 87; (3) ver. 88; (4) ver. 89; (5) ver. 40; (6) ver. 41; (7) ver. 42-45. Then, as usual, follows a short summary which closes the statute concerning leprosy, ver. 54-57.

5. The law of uncleanness by issue, etc., in two decalogues (xv, 1-15; xv, 16-31). The division is clearly marked, as Bertheau observes, by the form of the law: "the law of cleansing, which is so exactly similar in the principal cases, and which closes each series: (1) ver. 13-15; (2) ver. 28-30. We again give his arrangement, though we do not profess to regard it as in all respects satisfactory.

(a.) (ver. 2, 3, 8; (2) ver. 4; (3) ver. 5; (4) ver. 6; (5) ver. 7; (6) ver. 81; (7) ver. 9; (8) ver. 10; (9) ver. 11, 12 [these Bertheau considers as one enactment, because it is another way of saying that either the unclean or thing which the unclean person touches is unclean; but, on the same principle, verses 4 and 5 might just as well form one ensmnt: [10] ver. 13-15.

(1) ver. 5; (2) ver. 7; (3) ver. 18; (4) ver. 19; (5) ver. 20; (6) ver. 21; (7) ver. 22; (8) ver. 23; (9) ver. 24; (10) ver. 28-30. In order to complete this arrangement, he considers ver. 25-27 as a kind of supplementary enactment provided for an irregular uncleanness, leaving it as quite uncertain, however, whether it was a later addition or not. Verses 32 and 33 form merely the same general conclusion which we have had in vix. 54-57.

7. The last decalogue of the second group of seven decalogues is to be found in chap. xvi, which treats of the good day of atonement. The law itself is contained in verses 1-30 of the preceding version. The law is an exhortation to its careful observance. In the act of atonement three persons are concerned: the high-priest, in this instance Aaron; the man who leads away the goat for Azazel into the wilderness; and he who burns the skin, flesh, and dung of the bullock and goat of the sin-offering without the camp. The last two have special purification assigned them—the second because he has touched the goat laden with the guilt of Israel, the third because he has come in contact with the sin-offering. The ninth and tenth enactments prescribe what purificatory sacrifices each of them concerning themselves shall make; formula, נבך נבך הירש ירוח נבך נבך, and hence distinguished from each other. The duties of Aaron, consequently, ought, if the division into decades is correct, to be comprised in eight enactments. Now the name of Aaron is repeated eight times, and in six of these it is preceded by the prep. ולconc., as we observed was the case before when "the priest" was the prominent figure. According to this, then, the decalogue will stand thus: (1) Verse 2, Aaron not to enter the holy place at all times; (2) verses 3-5, with what sacrifices and in what dress Aaron is to enter the holy place; (3) verses 6, 7, Aaron to offer the bullock for himself, and to net the two goats before Jehovah; (4) Aaron to cast lots on the two goats; (5) verses 9, 10, Aaron to offer the goat on which the lot falls for Jehovah, and to send away the goat for Azazel into the wilderness; (6) verses 11-19, Aaron to sprinkle the blood both of the bullock and of the goat to make atonement for himself, for his house, and for the whole congregation, as also to purify the altar of incense with the blood; (7) verses 20-22, Aaron to lay his hands on the living goat, and confess over all it the sins of the children of Israel; (8) verses 23-25, Aaron after this to take off his linen garments, bathe himself, and put on his priestly garments, and then offer his burnt-offering and sin-offering in -one (9) by which the goat is sent into the wilderness to purify himself; (10) verses 27-28, what is to be done by him who burns the sin-offering without the camp.

(IV.) Laws chiefly intended to mark the separation between Israel and the Heathen Nations (chap. xvii.-xx).—We here reach the great central point of the book. All going before was but a preparation for this. Two great truths have been established: first, that God can only be approached by means of appointed sacrifices; next, that man in nature and life is full of pollution, which must be cleansed. Now a third is taught, viz., that not by several cleansing, for several sins and pollutions can guilt be put away. The several acts of sin are but so many manifestations of the sinful nature. For this, therefore, also must atonement be made by one solem act, which shall cover all transgressions, and turn away God's righteous displeasure from Israel. Israel is now removed from the idolatry of the Canaanites, and in all that shall be the sin-offering offered, it is to enter upon a new life. It is a separate nation, sanctified and set apart for the service of God. It may not, therefore, do after the abominations of the heathen by whom it is surrounded. Here, consequently, we find those laws and ordinances which especially distinguish the nation of Israel from all other nations of the earth.

Here again we may trace, as before, a group of seven decalogues; but the several decalogues are not so clearly marked, nor are the characteristic phrases and the introductions and conclusions so common. In ch. xviii there are twenty enactments, and in chap. xix thirty. In ch. xvi, on the other hand, there are only six, and in ch. xx there are fourteen. As it is quite manifest that the enactments in ch. xvi are entirely separate, and have no introduction from those in ch. xvii, Bertheau, in order to preserve the usual arrangement of the laws in decalogues, would transpose this chapter, and place it after ch. xix. He observes that the laws in ch. xvii, and those in chap. xvi, i-9, are plain to one another, and may very well constitute a single decalogue, and, what is of more importance, that the words in xvi, i-5 form the natural introduction to this whole group of laws: "And Jehovah spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, I am Jehovah your God. After the doings of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt, shall ye not do; and after the doings of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, shall ye not do; neither shall ye walk in their ordinances." etc. There is, however, a point of connection between chapters xvii and xviii which must not be overlooked. It seems to indicate that their position in our present text is the right one. All the six enactments in chap. xvii (vers. 8-5, vers. 6, 7, vers. 8, 9, vers. 10-12, vers. 13, 14, vers. 15) bear upon the nature and meaning of the sacrifice to Jehovah as compared with the sacrifices offered to false gods. It would be wise, therefore, to think that it was necessary to guard against any license to idolatrous practices which might possibly be drawn from the sending of the goat for Azazel into the wilderness [see Atonement, Day of], especially, perhaps, against the Egyptian custom of appeasing the evil spirit of the wilderness and averting his malice (Hengstenberg, Mose u. Jüd. u. Jüd., p. 179; Moors, J. H. Müller, i, 389). To this there may be an allusion in vers. 7. Perhaps, however, it is better and more simple to regard the enactments in these two chapters (with Bunsen, ci. 2.6, ii, i, 245) as directed against two prevalent heathen practices, the eating of blood and fornication. It is remarkable, as showing how intimately moral and ritual observances were blended together in the Jewish mind, that abstinance "from blood and things strangled, and fornication," was laid down by the apostles as the only condition of communion to be required of Gentiles converted to Christianity. But the rendering of the A.V. in vers. 11, "for it is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul," should be, "for it is the blood that maketh atonement by means of the life." This is all-important. It is not blood merely as such, but blood as having in it the principle of life that God accepts in sacrifice; for, by thus giving vicariously the life of the dumb animal, the sinner confesses that his own life is forfeit.

In ch. xvi, after the introduction to which we have already alluded, vers. 1-5, and in which God claims obedience on the double ground that he is Israel's God, and that to keep his commandments is life (ver. 5)—there follow twenty enactments concerning unlawful marriages and unnatural lusts. The first ten are contained in one in each verse (vers. 6-15). The next ten range themselves in like manner with the verses, except that verses 17 and 23 contain each two. Of the twenty the first fourteen are alike in form, as well as in the repeated פָּרָשָׁה נָשַׁ֫עְבֹּר. In chap. xix are three decalogues, introduced by the words, "Ye shall be holy, for I Jehovah your God am holy," and each of them contains, in addition, the statutes, and all my judgments, and do them. I am Jehovah." The laws here are of a very mixed character, and many of them a repetition merely of previous laws. Of the three decalogues, the first is comprised in verses 8-14, and may be thus distributed: (1) verse 8, to be holy; (2) vers. 9-11, to be pure in heart and father and mother; (3) vers. 12-14, to keep the Sabbath; (4) ver. 4, not to turn to idols; (4) ver. 4, not to make mol-

a. Chapter xxvi, ten laws, as follows: (1) ver. 1-3; (2) ver. 4; (3) ver. 5-6; (4) ver. 7-8; (5) ver. 9; (6) ver. 10, 11; (7) ver. 12, (8) ver. 13-14; (9) ver. 17-21; (10) ver. 22, 23. The five first laws concern all the priests; the sixth to the high-priest; the ninth and tenth, the effects of bodily blemish in particular; the eleventh to the is hired, etc.

b. Chap. xxvi, 1-16. (1) ver. 2; (2) ver. 8; (3) ver. 4; (4) ver. 4-7; (5) ver. 8, 9; (6) ver. 10; (7) ver. 11; (8) ver. 12; (9) ver. 13; (10) ver. 14-16.

c. Chap. xxvi, 17-38. (1) ver. 18-20; (2) ver. 21; (3) ver. 22; (4) ver. 24; (5) ver. 25; (6) ver. 27; (8) ver. 29; (9) ver. 30; (10) ver. 30; and a general conclusion in verse 31-38.

d. Chap. xxvii. (1) verse 3; (2) verse 5-7; (3) verse 8; (4) verse 9-14; (5) verse 15-21; (6) verse 22; (7) verse 24, 25; (8) verse 27-52; (9) verse 54, 55; (10) verse 56; verses 37, 38 contain the conclusion, or general summarizing, of the Decalogue. On the remainder of the chapter, as well as chapter xxiv, see below.

e. Chap. xxvii, 1-22. (1) verse 2; (2) verse 3-4; (3) verse 5; (4) verse 6; (5) verse 8-10; (6) verse 11, 12; (7) verse 18; (8) verse 19-22; (9) verse 23; (10) verse 16; with a concluding formula in verse 18-22.

f. Chap. xxvii, 23-38. (1) verse 23, 24; (2) verse 25; (3) verse 26, 27; (4) verse 28; (5) verse 29; (6) verse 30; (7) verse 31; (8) verse 32, 33; (9) verse 34; (10) verse 35-57; the conclusion to the whole in verse 38.

g. Chap. xxviii, 1. (1) verse 39; (2) verse 40-42; (3) verse 43; (4) verse 44, 45; (5) verse 46; (6) verse 47-49; (7) verse 50; (8) verse 51, 52; (9) verse 53; (10) verse 54.

It will be observed that the above arrangement is only completed by omitting the latter part of chapter xxiii and the whole of chapter xxiv. But it is clear that chapter xxiii, 39-44 is an addition, containing further instructions respecting the Feast of Tabernacles. Verse 39, as compared with verse 34, shows that the same feast is referred to; while verse 37, 38 are no less manifestly the original conclusion of the laws respecting the feasts which are enumerated in the previous part of the chapter. Chapter xxiv, again, has a peculiar character of its own. First, we have a command concerning the oil to be used in the lamps belonging to the tabernacle, but this is only a repetition of an enactment already given in Exod. xxvi, 20, 21, which seems to be its natural place. Then follow directions respecting the feasts which have occurred previously. In Exod. the shebaverde is spoken of always as a matter of course, concerning which no regulations are necessary (comp. Exod. xxv, 30; xxxv, 15; xxxix, 30). Lastly come certain enactments arising out of a historical occurrence. The son of an Egyptian father by an Israelitish mother, who, according to chapter xxiii, 39, 40, took the name of Jehovah, and Moses is commanded to stone him in consequence; and this circumstance is the occasion of the following laws being given: (1) That a blasphemer, whether Israelite or stranger, is to be stoned (comp. Exod. xxv, 39); (2) That he that kills any man shall surely be put to death (comp. Exod. xxi, 12-27); (3) That he that kills a beast shall make it good (not found where we might have expected it, in the series of laws Exod. xxi, 28-xxii, 16); (4) That if a man cause a blemish in his neighbor he shall be required in like manner (comp. Exod. xxii, 22-26). (5) We have then a repetition in an inverse order of verses 17, 18; and (6) the injunction that there shall be one law for the stranger and the Israelite; (7) lastly, a brief notice of the infliction of the punishment in the case of the son of Shelomith, who blasphemed. Not another instance is to be found in the whole collection in which any historical circumstance is made the occasion of enacting a law. Then, again, the laws (2), (3), (4), (5), are mostly repetitions of existing laws, and seem here to have no connection with the event to which they are referred. Either, therefore, in other circumstances there is no place at the same time with which we are not acquainted, or these isolated laws, detached from their proper connection, were grouped together here, in obedience perhaps to some traditional association.

(VII) These decalogues are now fitly closed by words of promise and threat—promise of largest, richest blessing to those that hearken unto and do these commandments; threats of utter destruction to those that break the covenant of their God. Thus the second great division of the Pentateuch closes like the first part, or Book of the Covenant, ends (Exod. xxiii, 20-33) with promises of blessing only. There is nothing said of the judgments which are to follow transgression, because as yet the covenant had not been made. But when once the nation had freely entered into that covenant, they bound themselves to accept its sanctions, its penalties, as well as its rewards. Nor can we wonder if in these sanctions the punishment of transgression holds a larger place than the rewards of obedience; for already it was but too plain that "Israel would not obey." From the first they were a stiff-necked and rebellious race, and from the first the doom of disobedience hung like a fiery sword over their heads.

(VII) On Vows.—The legislation is evidently completed in the last words of the preceding chapter: "These are the statutes, and judgments, and laws which Jehovah made between him and the children of Israel in Mount Sinai by the hand of Moses." Chap. xxvii is an appendix, again closed, however, by a similar formula, which at least shows that the transcriber considered it as an integral part of the original Mosaic legislation. This ought to be kept in view when we come to apply the law to a case in which he undertakes to grant them a fellowship in Christ, and to the end of the book. Bertheau classes it with the other less regularly grouped laws at the beginning of the book of Numbers. He treats the section Lev. xxvii—Num. x, 10 as a series of supplements to the Sinaitic legislation.

II. Integrity.—This is very generally admitted. These critics even who are in favor of different documents in the Pentateuch assign nearly the whole of this book to one writer, the Elohist, or author of the original document. According to Knobel, the only portions which are not to be referred to the Elohist are—Moses's rebuke of Aaron because the goat of the sin-offering had been burned (xv, 16-20); the group of laws in chap. xvii—xx; certain additional enactments respecting the Sabbath and the feasts of Weeks and of Tabernacles (xxiii, part of ver. 2, from לול י וליאנ וליאנ, and ver. 3, ver. 18, 19, 22, 29, 44); the punishments ordained for blasphemy, murder, etc. (xxiv, 10-23), the directions respecting the sabbatical year (xxv, 18-22), and the promises of prosperity in ch. xxvi. With regard to the section ch. xvii—xx, Knobel does not consider the whole of it to have been borrowed from the same sources. Ch. xvii he believes was introduced here by the Jehovahist from some ancient document, while he admits, nevertheless, that it contains certain Elohistic forms of expression, as מזא 32, "all flesh," ver. 14, מזא, "soul" (in the sense of "person), ver. 10-12, מזא, "beast," ver. 18, מזא, "offering," ver. 4, מזא, "a sweet savor," verse 6, "a statute forever, same after your generations," ver. 7. But it cannot be said from this that he argues, but he would have placed it after ch. vii, or at least after ch. xv; (b) he would not have repeated the prohibition of blood, etc., which he had already given; (c) he would have taken a more favorable view of his nation than that implied in ver. 7: and, lastly, (d) the phraseology has something of the coloring of ch. xviii—xx and xxvi, which are certainly not Elohistic. Such reasons are too transparently unsatisfactory to need serious discussion. He observes further that the chapter is not altogether Mosaic. The first enactment (ver. 1-7) does indeed apply only to Israelites, but it is not comparable to the chapter of Moses which the author has before him. (a) He would have placed it after ch. vii, or at least after ch. xv; (b) he would not have repeated the prohibition of blood, etc., which he had already given; (c) he would have taken a more favorable view of his nation than that implied in ver. 7: and, lastly, (d) the phraseology has something of the coloring of ch. xviii—xx and xxvi, which are certainly not Elohistic. Such reasons are too transparently unsatisfactory to need serious discussion. He observes further that the chapter is not altogether Mosaic. The first enactment (ver. 1-7) does indeed apply only to Israelites, but it is not comparable to the chapter of Moses which the author has before him. But the remaining three contemplate the case of strangers living among the people, and have a reference to all time. Ch. xvii—xx, though they have a Jehovahistic coloring, cannot have been originally from the Jehovahist. The following peculiarities of language, which are worthy of notice, according to Knobel (Exod. und Leviticus erläutert, in the "Kurzg. Eexg. HLbuch." 1857), forbid such a supposition, the more so as they occur nowhere else in the O.T.: לול, "lie down to" and "gender," xviii, 28; xix, 19, xx, 16, מזא, "confusion," xviii, 23, xx, 12, מזא; מזא, "gather," xix, 9, xxiii, 22, מזא, "grapes," xix, 10, מזא, "near kinswomen," xviii, 17, מזא; מזא, "scourged," xix, 20, מזא, "free," מזא, "print marks," xix, 28, מזא, "who intend to be circumcised," and מזא, "uncircumcised," as applied to fruit-trees, xix, 29; and מזא, "born," xviii, 9, 11; as well as the Egyptian word (for such it probably is מזא) "garment of divers sorts," which, however, does occur once beside in Deut. xxii, 11.

According to Bunsen, chap. xix is a genuine part of the Mosaic legislation, given, however, in its original form, not on Sinai, but on the east side of the Jordan; while the general arrangement of the Mosaic laws may perhaps be as late as the time of the judges. He regards it as a very ancient document, based on the Two Tables, of which, and especially of the first, it is, in fact, an extension, consisting of two decalogues and one peninsula of laws. The composition in it is he concludes from the supposing that the people were already settled in the land (ver. 9, 10, 13, 15), while, on the other hand, ver. 23 supposes a future occupation of the land. Hence he concludes that the revision of this document by the transcribers was incomplete, whereas all the passages may fairly be interpreted as looking forward to a future settlement in Canaan. The great simplicity and lofty moral character of this section compel us, says Bunsen, to refer it at least to the earlier time of the judges, if not to that of Joshua himself.

III. Authorship etc.—Some critics, however, such as De Wette, Gramberg, Vatke, and others, have strenuously endeavored to prove that the laws contained in Leviticus originated in a period much later than is usually supposed; but the following observations sufficiently support their Mosaic origin, and show that the whole of Leviticus is historically genuine, and that it contains not only a real L or Levitical part, but an even earlier L or Levitical part. The L or Levitical part contains manifest vestiges of the Mosaic period. Here, as well as in Exodus, when the priests are mentioned, Aaron and his sons are named; as, for instance, in chap. i, 4, 7, 8, 11, etc. The tabernacle is the sanctuary, and the other promises of worship are made to come anywhere (i, 3; iii, 8, 13, etc.). The Israelites are always described as a congregation (iv, 13 sq.), under the command of the elders of the congregation (iv, 16), or of a ruler (iv, 22). Everything has reference to life in a camp, and that camp commanded by Moses (iv, 15, 21; vi, 11; xiv, 8; xv, 26, 28). A later writer could scarcely have placed himself so entirely in the times, and so completely adopted the modes of thinking of the time of Moses; especially if, as has been asserted, these laws gradually sprung from the usages of the people, and were written down at a later period with the object of sanctioning them by the authority of Moses. They so entirely befit the Mosaic age that, in order to adapt them to the requirements of any later period, they must have undergone some modification, accommodation, and a peculiar mode of interpretation. This inconvenience could have been avoided by a person who intended to forge laws in favor of the later modes of Levitical worship. A forger would have endeavored to identify the past as much as possible with the present.

The section in chap. vii—x is said to have a mythical coloring. This assertion is grounded on the miracle narrated in ch. ix, 24. But what could have been the inducement to forge this section? It is said that the priests invented it in order to support the authority of the sacerdotal caste by the solemn ceremony of Aaron's consecration. But to such an intention the narration levy (D2, must, tribute, as usually rendered), a tax or requirement of service imposed by Eastern kings for public works, hence a gang or company of men impressed into such service (1 Kings 9, 18, 14; ix, 10). In two passages other terms (תְּנֵנָה, 1 Kings ix. 21; רָעָה, Num. xxxi. 28) are employed in connection with this, to denote the parts of tribute. See Tributes.

Lewin, Hirsch, a Jewish rabbi who was born in 1721 in Poland, and died at Berlin in 1800, is noted for his attitude towards Moses Mendelssohn. Lewin was chief rabbi of Prussia in the days of the great Jewish philosopher. He was severely censured and Mendelssohn for rationalistic views expressed in his correspondence with La- vater [see Mendelssohn], and in his translation of the Pentateuch into German. To the credit of Lewin, however, it must be stated that he by no means condemned, or permitted the condemnation of Mendelssohn as a heretic, as Landau and other Polish rabbis were inclined to do. See Gritz. Gesch. der Juden, xi, 45 sq.

Lewis, Isaac, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born Jan. 21, 1746 (O.S.), in Stratford (now Huntington), Conn.; graduated at Yale College in 1765; entered the ministry in March, 1768; and was ordained pastor at P Coventry. He resigned his charge in June, 1786, and was installed October 18, 1786, pastor in Greenwich, and there he labored until Dec. 1, 1818, when he gave up the work on account of the infirmities of age. He died Aug. 27, 1818. In 1816 he was made a member of Yale College Corporation, but resigned in 1818. He published a few occasional sermons. Sprague, A mouth of the American Puritans, i, 662.

Lewis, John Mitchie, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Westchester Co., N. Y., in 1806. He graduated at Yale College in 1828, and studied theology both at Andover and Princeton, and was licensed at Goshen, N. Y., in 1832. He preached for a number of years, principally in the State of New York, and was then chosen secretary of the Central American Education Society in New York. He was for some time editor of the Seaman's Magazine, and wrote a Manual for the Presbyterian Church. He died in 1861. — Wilson, Presbyterian Historical Almanac, 1865.

Lewis, Moses, a Methodist minister, was born in Roxbury, Va., May 19, 1797, and early decided upon the ministry as his work of life. He entered the travelling connection in 1831 in the New Hampshire Conference. After five years of faithful and successful labors as an itinerant, failing health compelled him to retire from the effective work, with the hope of remaining in his present place as a pastor at no distant day with recuperated physical strength, which, however, he never realized. During thirty-four years he sustained either a superannuatory or superannuated relation to his Conference. In 1844 the New Hampshire Conference was divided, and the Vermont Conference constituted, and of it Lewis, living within the limits of the new Conference, became a member. He died Sept. 26, 1859. He in the domestic circle brother Lewis was beloved and honored; in the community, active and reliable; and in the Church, a pillar of faith, a safe counselor, and a liberal contributor to all the interests of the Church of his choice.”—Minutes of Conf. 1870 (see Index).

Lewis, Thomas, an Independent minister, was born in 1777. He was pastor of an Independent congregation at Islington, England, from 1804 till 1852, the year of his death. He published works are 1. Christian Duties in the various Relations of Life (1839); 2. Religious State of Islington for the last Forty Years (1842); 3. Christian Privileges (1847).— Allibone, Dictionary of British and American Authors, vol. ii. s. v.

Lewis, Zechariah, a Presbyterian minister, studied theology at Philadelphia, and was licensed by the Fairfield West Association in 1796. In the autumn of that year he became tutor in Yale College, and held that office until 1799. He was elected a trustee of Princeton Seminary in 1812. For six years he acted as corresponding secretary of the Religious Tract Society, afterwards the American Tract Society. Having resigned that position in 1818, he was elected one of the secretaries of the United Foreign Missionary Society. He died in 1822. — Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, s. v.

LEYCISON Nobla is the name of a poem which was extensively circulated among the Waldenses in the 15th century. It exalts to reverence and to Christian life, and treats of the temptations to which the wicked subject the pious and the good, and of the punishments for sin. Some, among them Dickhoff, contend that the poem originated with the Bohemian Brethren, but Edward and Herzog incline to the general opinion that the "LEYCISON" belongs to the Waldensian literature. The name it bears is derived from the first words of the poem, which are "LEYCISON nobla" (letheo, sermon). See Zeit- schrift f. hist. theol. 1864, 1865; Herzog, Die romanischen Waldenser, etc. (Ital., 1850).

LEYDDEcker, MELCHIOR, a Calvinistic theologian, was born at Middelburg in 1642. He became pastor in the province of Zealand in 1662, was appointed professor at Utrecht in 1678, and died in 1721. He was an ardent exponent of the doctrines of the Reformed Church, and wrote a number of systematic works, including the works of Drusius, Spener's book De Legibus Hæbraorum, and the Lutheran tendencies of Witsius. Very learned in theological, rabbinical, and ecclesiastical literature, he distinguished himself by wielding a strong pen in favor of the Reformed theological system. Among his apologetical works are De eresia fidei Reformatae ejusdemque sanctitate, s. Commentarius ad Catech. Psalm. (Ultragracis, 1679, 4to):— De aeternum trium personarum in negotio salutis hum. libri iv, quibus universa Reformatae fidei principiis concursus nec expositione (Trag., ad hon. 1683, 12mo.)— Veritas evangelica tria phansae de errores quorvmus seculorum opus, quae principiis fidei Reformatae demonstratur (Trag., 1688, 4to);— also, Historia ecclesiae Africanae illustrata pro ecclesiae Reformatae veritate et libertate (Ultrajac., 1690, 4to). His controversial works against Cocceians met with great success, because they discussed the question with great clearness. Among them we notice his Synopsis controversiarum de fide et testamento Dei, quae hodie in Belg. momentum (Trag., 1690, 8vo):— Vix veritaetatis disquisitionum ad nonnullas controversias, quae hodie in Belg. momentum normalis ecclesiasticarum, De legibus Hebræorum prope 1679, 4to)— Fax veritate (Leide, 1677, 4to). When yet a youthful student at the university Leyden he had paid special attention to Biblical studies, and, guided by a learned rabbi, made rapid strides in the explication of Biblical lore. In after life, when tired of polemical and clerical pursuits, he looked about for a field on which he might profitably venture, this department of theological study allured him anew. Attempting to fit the works of Godwin (Moses and Aaron) and Cunesus (De Republica Hebraeor) to his academical purposes, he soon discovered their insufficiency, and set about to prepare himself for the controversial treatise, which is everywhere marked by a vigorous and independent judgment. While he conceals not his aversion to the "fulfillments" of the Talmud, he quotes the great rabbins with respect. He, moreover, keeps a sharp eye on the extravagances of Christian writers, and his work contains a well-handled justice the well-known rabbinism of the Buxtorfs and the Egyptians of Spencer (De Legibus Hebr.). It is only characteristic of this unsparring criticism of the orthodox author that he adds an appendix of severe an- inadversion against the cosmogony of Thomas Burnet, to whose Thesaurum he prefixes the pedantic preface. The six dissertations of this appendix, whatever may be thought of the author's views, are valuable for their learning, and interesting as closely bearing on the questions now raised on the Mosaic cosmogony.
Especially mention among his Biblical works is due to his archeological treatise entitled De Repubblica Hebraeorum (Amst. 1704, thick fol. vol.), which is one of the largest repertoires ever written on the wide subject of Hebrew antiquities, and exhibits in an eminent degree vast stores of historical, ethnographical, and historical learning. Added to the interest of the subject are dissertations on the Hebrew laws and customs, both political and religious, interwoven in a historical narrative, in which the sacred history is developed, by epochs, from the earliest period to the last. The author, in his progress, learnfully investigates the history, parti politici, of the leading Gentile nations, very much after the manner of Shuckford and Russell in their Connections. This valuable work, on which Leyden's fame deserves mainly to depend, is singularly enough ignored in Schweizer's sketch of the author in Herzog (see below). A complete list of his works is to be found in the Univeritalsche Kirchen-Hist. A. u. N. Test., etc., ii, 625.—Herzog, Real-Encykl., viii, 380; Gase, Daggengeschichte, vol. iii; Kittro, Cyclop. Bibl. Leyden, Lucas van. One of the most celebrated painters of the early Dutch school, noted for his success in history pictures. He was born in Leyden in 1594. His talents were early developed in the school of Cornelius Engelbrecht, an artist of repute in his day. He commenced engraving when scarcely nine years of age. His picture of St. Hubert, painted when he was only twelve, brought him very high commendation; and the celebrated publisher, van der Werff, well known to connoisseurs by the name of "Mohammed and the Monk Sergius," was published in 1598, when he was only fourteen. He practiced successfully almost every branch of painting, was one of the ablest of those early painters who engraved their own works, and he succeeded, like Albert Dürer, in imparting certain qualities of delicacy and finish to his engravings that no mere engraver ever attained. His pictures are noted for clearness and delicacy in color, variety of character, and expression; but his drawing is hard and Gothic in form. His range of subjects was very wide, and embraced events in sacred history, incidents illustrative of the manners of his own period, and portraits. He died in 1633.

In his younger days Scholten belonged to the orthodox school, and at one time (1643) well known to connoisseurs by the name of "Mohammed and the Monk Sergius," was published in 1598, when he was only fourteen. LEYDT, Henri. As a prominent minister of the Reformed Dutch Church, was born in Holland in 1718, and came early to America. He studied theology under the Rev. John Freylinghuyzen and J. H. Goettchius, was licensed in 1748, and became pastor of the united churches of New Brunswick and Six-mile Run, New Jersey. In his great Cato and Conferentie conflict he was actively identified with the former, which insisted upon the education of ministers in this country, and upon an independent Church organization separate from the Reformed Church of the mother country. In this "liberal and progressive" movement Mr. Leydt was a powerful leader. He published several pamphlets in its favor, and was one of the most prominent men in the establishment of Queen's College (now Rutgers) in 1770. He was one of its first trustees. He was president of the General Synod in 1778. An ardent patriot of the Revolutionary War, he preached boldly on the great questions of the time, arousing much enthusiasm among the people, "and counselling the young men to join the army of freedom." His active and useful ministry closed only with his life in 1783. He is represented to have been an instructive, laborious, and faithful minister, an impressive preacher, a favorite in installations of pastors, an organization of churches, and other public services. He was a healer of the breach of Zion, as well as an intrepid leader in an important crisis of the Church and of the country. — Historical Sermon by R. H. Steele, D.D.; Libanius, a celebrated sophist of the 4th century, named as a friend of the emperor Julian, was born about A.D. 314 at Antioch, where he studied in early youth, devoting his attention to the purest classic models. Affer a stay of four years at Athens, where he attracted much attention, he pursued his studies at Constantinople, and here entered upon a brilliant career as teacher, which excited the envy of others, especially of the sophiast Demarchius, his former instructor. The latter falsely charged him with the practice of sorcery, and many victims so that the prefect was persuaded to expel him from the city, A.D. 346. He went to Nice, and shortly after to Nicomedia, and there pleasantly passed five years with great success as an instructor, and returned, by invitation of emperor Julian, who had frequently attended his lectures, to Constantinople, only to leave it, however, shortly after, on account of the opposition still existing. He retired, by permission of Caesar Gallus, to his native city. Here he continued to reside till his death, which is supposed to have occurred after the accession of Arcadius, A.D. 408, under the death of Julian, Libanius lost much of his hope for the restoration of paganism. He complains to the gods that they had granted so long a life to Constantinus, and only so brief a career to Julian.

He interchanged many letters with Julian. Under Va-less he defended himself successfully against a charge of treason, and seems to have obtained the emperor's favor. He besought from him a law, in which Libanius himself, on account of his own natural offspring by a mistress, was personally interested, granting to natural children a share in their father's property at his death. Libanius was the precursor of Basil and Chrysostom; and although himself a pagan to the very end, he maintained friendly relations with these Christian fathers.
He was a warm advocate for tolerance, and sought to defend the Manicheans of the East from the violent measures directed against them. He addressed Theodoulos in one of his Discourses in defence of the heathen temples, which the monks were eager to despoil. He lived long enough to see Christianity everywhere triumphant, and his personal efforts no longer applauded.
Separate works of Libanius have from time to time been discovered and edited, but many yet lie in MS. only in different libraries. His style was rhetorically correct, but, in accordance with the spirit of his times, highly arti-ificial. Gibbon's criticism may be considered too severe (Decline and Fall, ch. xxiv). Among the writings of Libanius are his Prologomena, or Examples of Rheto-critical Exercises, divided into thirteen sections; and Discourses, many of which were never pronounced, nor designed for that purpose. Some of the latter are moral dissertations, after the fashion of the times, on such subjects as Friendship, Riches, Poverty. One is entitled Monopolia, a lament on the death of Julian. Another, the most interesting of all his writings, is his autobiography, which he first wrote at the age of sixty years, titled Μη διδάσκων παρα της η εικονος τυχης. A fragment of his Discourses, addressed to Theodosius in defense of the heathen temples, was discovered by Mai in 1822 in the Biblioteca Estense. The Declamationes, comprising forty in number, are exercises on imaginary subjects.
There are not less than 2000 Letters addressed to over 500 persons, among whom are Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, and Chrysostom. He wrote also a Life of Demosthenes, and Arguments to the Opinion of Demonthes. He is no complete edition of Libanius.
His Discourses and Declamations were edited by Reiske (Lips. 1791-97, 4 vols. 8vo). The most copious edition of his Letters (1655 in the Greek, and 1522 translated into Latin) is that by J. C. Wolf (Amsterd. 1738, fol.). See Lib' annus (Libanu), the Graecized form of the name of Mount Lebanon (q. v.), used in the Apocrypha (1 Esdr. iv, 48; v, 55; 2 Esdr. xvi, 20; Judith, 7, 1; Eccclus. xxiv, 13, 12) and by classical writers. See also Antilibanus.

Libation (Lat. libation, "to pour out," literally any thing poured out) is used, in the sacrificial language of the ancients, to express an effusion of liquors poured upon victims to be sacrificed to a deity. The quantity of wine for a libation among the Hebrews was the fourth part of a hin, rather more than two pints.
Libations were poured on the victim after it was killed, with the several parts of it; or it might be consumed by the flames (Lev. vi, 20; viii, 25, 26; ix, 4; xvi, 12, 20).
These libations usually consisted of unmixed wine (συμφυλιον, μεριν), but sometimes also of milk, honey, and other fluids, either pure or diluted with water. The libations offered to the Furies were always without wine. The Greeks and Latins offered libations with the sacrifices, but they were poured on the victim's head while it was living. So Simon, relating the manner in which he was to be sacrificed, says, he was in the priest's hands ready to be slain, was folded and garlands: that they were preparing to pour upon him the libations of grain and salted meal (A. E. ii, 180, 131). Likewise Dido, beginning to sacrifice, pours wine between the horns of the victim (A. E. iv). The wine was usually poured out in three separate streams.
Libations always accompanied the sacrifice; those of were offered in concluding a treaty with a foreign nation, and that here they formed a prominent part of the solemnity is clear from the fact that the treaty itself was called συμφυλιον. But libations were also made independent of any other sacrifice, as in solemn prayers, and on many other occasions of public and private life, as in drinking meals, and the like. St. Paul describes himself, as it were, a victim about to be sacrificed, and that the accustomed libations of meal and wine were already, in a measure, poured upon him: “For I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand” (2 Tim. iv, 6). The same expressive sacrificial term occurs in Phil. ii, 17, where the apostle represents the faith of the Philippians as a sacrifice, and his own blood as a libation poured forth to hollow and consecrate it: “Ye, and if I be offered, even as a sacrifice upon a holy altar, accept the shadow of his death, and the life of his grace upon your faith, in [the] name of Jesus Christ, and rejoice with you all.” The word libation was frequent-ly extended in its signification, however, to the whole offering of unbloody sacrifices of which this formed a part, and which consisted not only in the pouring of a little wine upon the altar, but were accompanied by the presentation of fruit and cakes. Cakes in particular were peculiar to the worship of certain deities, as to that of Apollo. They were either simple cakes of flour, sometimes also of wax, or they were made in the shape of some animal, and were then offered as symbolical sacri-fices in the place of real animals, either because they could not easily be procured, or were too expensive for the sacrificer. This custom prevailed even in the houses of the Romans, who at their meals made an offering to the Lares in the fire which burned upon the hearth. The libation was thus a sort of heathen “grace before meat.” See Watson, Bibl. and Theol. Dict. s. v.; Chambers, Cyclopa. s. v.

Libel is the technical name of the document which contains the accusation framed against a minister before ecclesiastical courts. See Faxon, Clerical. In England, libel, in the ecclesiastical courts, is the name given to the formal written statement of the complainant’s ground of complaint against the defendant. It is the first stage in the pleadings after the defendant has been cited to appear. The defendant is entitled to a copy of it, and must answer the allegations contained in it upon oath. In Scotland, the libel is a document drawn up, as usual, in the form of a sylllogism, the major proposition stating the name and nature of the crime, as condemned by the Word of God and the laws of the Church; the minor proposition averring that the party accused is guilty, specifying facts, dates, and places; and then follows the conclusion deducing the justice of the sentence, if the accusation should be proven. By the term relevancy is meant whether the charge is one really deserving censure, or whether the facts alleged, if proved, would afford sufficient evidence of the charge. A list of witnesses is appended to the copy of the libel served in due time and form on the person accused. One of the forms is as follows: “Unto the Rev. the Moderator and Remonant Members of the —— Presbytery of ——; and to the Clergy resident in the same; ——, a member of said Church; Swesheth, That the Rev. C. D., minister of the —— Congregation of ——, has been guilty of the sin of (here state the denomination of the offence, such as drunkenness, formalization, or such like). In so far as, upon the —— day of ——, 1800, or about that time, and within the house of ——, situated in —— street, ——, he, the said C. D. (here the circumstances attending the offence charged are described), drank (or some other spirituous liquor to excess, whereby he became intoxicated), to the great scandal of religion and disgrace of his sacred profession; may it therefore please your reverent court to appoint service of this libel to be made on the said Rev. C. D., and him to appear before you to answer to the same; and on his admitting the charge, or on the same being proved against him, to visit him with such censure as the Word of God and the rules and discipline of the Church in such cases prescribe, in order that he and all others may be deterred from committing the like offences in the time to come, or to do otherwise in the premises as to you may appear expedient and proper. According to justice, etc. List of witnesses.” — Ediac, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Libellatici is the name of that class of the lai ped who received from the heathen magistrate a writ ten certificate (libellum) as a warrant for their security; either testifying that they were not Christians, or containing a dispensation from the necessity of sacrificing to the gods in confirmation of their adherence to heathenism. Another class of the lai ped were the sacrifici-arii —— that is, who had offered the libation and libated the gods in testimony of their renunciation of the faith; another the traditores, because they had delivered up into the hands of the heathen either copies of the sacred writings, baptismal registers, or any other property of the Church. See Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Schaff, Ch. Hist. i (see Index); Moench, Commentary (see Index). See Lapidary.

Libellii Pacis, or LETTERS OF PEACE. In Egypt and Africa many of those who had fallen away in time of persecution, in order the more readily to obtain pardon for their offences, resorted to the intercession of persons destined to suffer martyrdom by securing from them libellii pacis, letters of peace; papers in which these returning apostates were commended as worthy of communion and Church membership. In this way they were again taken into communion sooner than the rules of the Church otherwise allowed. From this practice the pope derived a pretext for the exercise of his plenipotent power to grant spiritual indulgences, which seems to have been used first about the middle of the second century. See Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Moench, Commentary (see Index). See INDECIU tIONS; LAPI DARY.

Liberalism. See RATIONALISM.

Liberality is a term denoting a generous disposition of mind, exerting itself in giving largely. It is thus distinguished from its opposite, liberality denotes freedom of spirit; generosity, greatness of soul; bounty, openness of heart.

LIBERALITY OF SENTIMENT. A generous disposition a man feels towards another who is of a different opinion from himself; or, as one defines it, “that generous expansion of mind which enables it to look beyond all petty distinctions of party and system, and, in the estimate of men and things, to rise superior to narrow prejudices.” Unfortunately, liberalism of sentiment is often a cover for error and scepticism on the one hand, and is most generally too little attended to, or by the Ignatii, to be called liberaliments, says an eminent English writer, “must be distinguished from him who has no religious sentiments at all. He is one who has seriously and effectually investigated, both in his Bible and on his knees, in public assemblies and in private conversations, the important articles of religion. He has laid down principles, he has inferred consequences; in a word, he has adopted sentiments of his own. He must be distinguished also from that tame, undiscerning domestic among good people, who, though he has sentiments of his own, yet has not judgment to estimate their worth and value of one sentiment beyond another. Now a generous believer of the Christian religion is one who will not allow himself to try to propagate his sentiments by the commission of sin. No collusion, no bitterness, no wrath, no undue influence of any kind, will he apply to make his sentiments receivable; and the best course which he will be less happy for his being a Christian. He will exercise his liberality by allowing to those who differ from him as much virtue and integrity as he possibly can.”

There are, among a multitude of arguments to convince, a force such as is given the attention of the public: “1. We should exercise liberality in union with sentiment because of the different capacities, advantages, and tasks of mankind. Religion employs the capacities of mankind just as the air employs their lungs.

and their organs of speech. The fancy of one is lively, at another dull. The imagination of one, poetic; of another, feeble; a discuss spring. The memory of one is retentive, that of another treacherous as the wind. The passions of this man are lofty, vigorous, rapid; those of that man, mild, hum, and buzz, and, when on wing, sail only round the circumference of a tulip. Is it by the quality of reasoning; is it then both together? If he argues something else, should be all alike in religion? The advantages of mankind differ. How should he who has no parents, no books, no tutor, no companions, equal him whom Providence has graced with them all; who, when he looks over the treasure of his knowledge, can say I had a good mark, that I learned of a Roman; this information I acquired of my tutor, that was a present of my father? A friend gave me this branch of knowledge, an acquaintance bequeathed me that? The tasks of mankind differ; so I call the employments and exercises of life. In my opinion, circumstances make great men; and if we have not Caesars in the State, and Pauls in the Church, it is because neither Church nor State are in the circumstances in which they were in the days of those great men. Push a dull man into a river, and endanger his life, and suddenly he will improve. As in life, in speech. So, in a formal lecture. The world is a fine school of instruction. Poverty, sickness, pain, loss of children, treachery of friends, malice of enemies, and a thousand other things, drive the man of sentiment to his Bible, and, to speak, brings him to his sentiment. Do not despise the sentiment of the whole church, for it is conceivable that he whose young and tender heart is yet unpracticed in trials of this kind has an ascen- tion, and tasted so many religious truths as the sufferer has. 2. We should believe the Christian religion with liberalism, because every part of the Christian religion inculcates the love of God, and establishes a character of God; but what a character does it give! God loves. Christianity teaches the doctrine of Providence; but what a Providence! Upon whom does not its light arise? Is there an animal so little, or a wretch so forlorn, as to be forsaken and forgotten of his God? Christianity teaches the doctrine of redemption; but the redemption of whom?—of all tongues, kindred, nations, and people; of the infant of a span, and the sinner of a hundred years old; a redemption generous in its principle, generous in its price, generous in the effect, fixed in the Bible; it is not want sar- ronc, and revealed with a liberality for which we have no name. In a word, the illiberal Christian always acts contrary to the spirit of his religion; the liberal man alone thoroughly understands it. 3. We should be lib- eral in our dealings, have a liberal spirit. Let us be liberal guides whom we profess to follow. I set one Paul against a whole army of uninspired men: 'Some preach Christ of good-will, and some of envy and strife. What then? 'Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice. One eateth all things, another eateth herbs; but why dost thou judge thy brother? We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ.' We often inquire, What was the doctrine of Christ, and what was the practice of Christ? Suppose we were to insti- tute a third question, Of what temper was Christ? 4. We should be liberal as well as orthodox; because truths, especially the truths of Christianity, want support from our illiberalism. Let the little bee guard its little honey with its little sting; perhaps its little life may depend a little while on that little nourishment. Let the fierce bull shake his head, and nod his horn, and threaten his enemy, who seeks to eat his flesh, and wear his coat, and live by his death: poor fellow! his life is in danger; I forgive his bellowing and his rage. But the Christian religion—is that in danger? And what human efforts can render that false which is true, that odious which is lovely? Christianity is in danger, because it is a religion of life and breath, and all things except a power of injuring others.

& Liberality in the profession of religion is a wise and innocent policy. The bigot lives at home; a reptile he crawled into existence, and there breathes. A general Christian goes out of his own party, associates with others, and gains improvement by all. It is a Persian proverb, 'A liberal hand is better than a strong arm.' The dignity of Christianity is better supported by acts of liberality than by accuracy of reasoning; by its diffusion both join together. The sentiment of Christianity can clearly state and ably defend his religious principles, and when his heart is as generous as his principles are inflexible, he possesses strength and beauty in an eminent degree. abolished in that year; but, on the other hand, it must be posterior to 685, for in caput ii, tit. ix, the emperor Constantine (Pogonatus) is spoken of as being already dead. It must also have been written under some successor of Agatho († 682), as this Roman bishop is also mentioned in death. It is likely that the Liber Diurnus was composed in the time of Gregory II, somewhat after 714, on the ground that in the second professio fidei pontificis, given in the Liber Diurnus, there are expressions and views which correspond exactly to those we find in the letters of that pope to the emperor Leo. It is likely, though, that the Liber Diurnus existed originally in a more elementary form before it assumed that under which it is known at present, for the different MS. copies of it differ somewhat from each other. The Liber Diurnus was frequently consulted by all writers on canon law, such as Lino of Chartres, Asselin of Lucua, Deusdedit, Gratian (c. 8, dist. xvi). As the ritual and various points of law underwent modifications in the course of time, it was less used, and its existence even came to be concealed by the popes for fear lest it might recall their former sentence to the emperors and arapchi. Still there were copies of it in existence, and a codex contained in the library of the Vatican was published in 1660 by the care of Lucas Holsteinus; it was, however, once suppressed by the Roman see. Hoffmann (Novo collectio scriptorium ac monumentorum, Lipsiae, 1788, p. 76) has published the whole text, and adds the remarks on Petrus de Marca, De concordia aecorditac (ac imperii, lib. i, cap. ix, No. viii) the statement that at the time of Holsteinus the Vatican library possessed no codex of the Liber Diurnus, and that his publication was based upon a MS. that is divided into the 15th century monk Hilarianus Rancatus. But as both editions of the works of P. de Marca, published at Paris by Baluze, state only (lib. ii, cap. vi, No. viii) that Holsteinus's publication of the Liber Diurnus was suppressed, and Baluze again, in his notes appended to Anton. Augustinus, Litterae epistolae, Lipsiae, 1828, p. 50, and in the ed. (Par. 1760, p. 483), says that there were various copies of the Liber Diurnus in existence, from one of which, that in the Vatican library, Holsteinus published his edition, it seems reasonable to suppose that Hoffmann's statement lacks support. As for Rancatus, Mabillon names Leo Alsatius, and not Holsteinus, the partaker whom he imparted the MS. (see also Cave, Scriptorium ecc., hist. literaria, Basle, 1741, i, 621). The MS. of the Vatican has actually been described by Pertz (Italienische Reise, in Archiv, f. altere deutsche Geschichtskunde, v. 23, p. 21) and is an 8vo single sheet. And, that, according to the statement found on its first pages, it dates from the 8th century. The Jesuit Joannes Garncius, with the aid of a similar codex and a MS, found in Paris, published in 1680 another edition of the Liber Diurnus cum privilegio regis Christiani simul. Mabillon, in the Museum Italicum (folio ii, li, 32 sq.), published additions to it by means of the MS. which had been used by Leo Alsatius. With the aid of all these works, Hoffmann published a new edition of it in the Nova collectio cit. (vol. ii), which was subsequently done also by Rieger (Vienna, 1762, 8vo). All this gave rise afterwards to collections of formulas to replace the obsolete Liber Diurnus. There are several such collections still extant in MS. Among them the Formularium et stylius scriptorium curae Romane, from John XXII to Gregory XII and John XXIII, in Summa constitutionum Summa X V. W. We may also consider as belonging to this class of works the Ritual ecclesiasticorum sacrum pontificum et clericorum, printed by Hoffmann (i, 269 sq.), and containing a description of the rites accomplished in the Canons and Decretals in the 13th century. Collections of formulas similar to the Liber Diurnus were also made for the use of bishops, abbots, etc. See Rockinger, Nachweisungen liber Formelbuche v. xi11---xii Jahrhund. (Munich, 1855, p. 94, 126, 173, 183, etc.); Paclacky, Liber Formelbucher (Prague, 1841); Herzog, Realvented, some 20 years ago, an alphabet for writing their own language, and, next to the Mandingoos, they are regarded as the most promising of the tribes. As they hold constant intercourse with the Mandingoos and other Mohammedan tribes in the far interior, Mohammedanism is making rapid progress among them. The Anglican missionary, bishop Payne, has recently suggested a plan of occupying the country of the Veys with an extensive and vigorous mission, and the mission-school opened by the Episcopalians at Totoncorch, which is nearer to Cape Mount than to Monrovia, is regarded as the first outpost towards the vast interior. 2. The Pesches, who are located about seventy miles from the coast, had 24,000 population, of whom about half the population of their capital, Palaka, consisted of Mohammedans who had come from the Mani country, but the latest explorer, W. Spencer Anderson, states that there are at present no Mohammedans in the Barline country. 3. The Bassas occupy a coast-line of over sixty miles, and extend about the same distance inland. They are the great producers of palm-oil and canewood, which are sold to foreigners by thousands of tons annually. In 1835 a mission was begun among these people by the American Baptist Missionary Union, whose missionaries studied the language, organized three schools, embracing in all nearly a hundred pupils, maintained preaching statedly at three places, and occasionally at a great many more, and translated large portions of the New Testament into the Bassa language. Notwithstanding this promising commencement, the mission has been now (1872) for seven years suspended. But the Southern Baptist Convention has lately resumed missionary operations among the Bassas. Great results for the spreading of Christianity are expected from the missionary labors of Mr. Jacob V. Vonbrum, a son of a well-known king of the Grebo people. 4. The Kroo, who occupy the region south of the Bassa, extend about seventy miles along the coast, and only a few miles inland. They are the sailors of West Africa, and never enslave or sell each other. About thirty years ago a mission was established among them by the Presbytery of Liberia, but it has long since ceased operations. 5. The Greboes, who border upon the southern boundary of the Kroo, extend from Grand Sistors to the Cavalla River, a distance of about seventy miles. In 1864 a mission was established among them by the American Missionary Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which continued in operation for seven years. A Church was organized, the language reduced to writing, and parts of the New Testament and other religious books translated into it; but in 1864 the mission was transferred to Gaboon. A mission established by the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States among the same tribe a few years previously still continues in operation, and has recently established at Bohlen a missionary station, about seventy miles from the coast. 6. The Mandingoos, who are found on the west coast frontier of the republic, and extend back to the height of Sordan, are a pagan tribes under the influence of the slave traders. One of the greatest obstacles to the progress of Christian missions among the aboriginal tribes is the climate, and the difficulty of acculturization. Thus the Basile Missionary Society, which in 1827 established a mission at Zudur, was in 1831 compelled to abandon it when four of the eight missionaries had succumbed to the climate. At the close of the year 1871 the churches among the Americo-Liberians and the missions among the natives were all merged or less connected with the Protestant churches of the United States. The Methodist Episcopal Church, which sent her first missionary to Liberia in 1832, has subsequently organized the Liberia Mission into an Annual Conference, with a missionary bishop (since 1864 William Taylor) at its head. In 1868 the mission churches, which had 24 Sunday-school scholars, 96 local preachers, 292 Sunday-school scholars, 38 churches of an aggregate value of $11,014. There were 127 baptisms and 60 deaths. In 1869 the number of members was 2755, preachers 244, local preachers 54. The intense interest which has been aroused among civilized nations by the explorations of Livingstone, and the later of Stanley, in the heart of Africa, has been heroically followed up by Bishop Taylor and the missionary band led by him, especially along the Congo River; and the native chiefs have granted lands and subsidies for the purpose of establishing settlements and building churches at the prominent points. The impetus thus given to commerce and improvements in Africa, has, to some degree, extended to Liberia likewise, and the country is gradually advancing to an independent position, both politically and ecclesiastically, especially as the evangelistic labors of Bishop Taylor and his coadjutors are conducted on the plan of "self support," by means of agricultural pursuits on the part of the missionaries, whose first expenses in outfit and travel only are met by direct contributions. A new era may therefore be now said to have dawned upon the "dark continent," a period of religious as well as secular point of view, and Liberia, with the oldest of the modern mission fields there, will doubtless still continue to be the centre of missionary action, at least for the immense and densely populated middle region of that quarter of the globe. The Protestant Episcopal Church likewise has a bishop there, and its mission in 1889 had 60 stations, 17 clergymen, 17 candidates for orders (8 Liberians), 6 postulants (3 Liberian and 3 native), confirmations 106, communicants 612, marriages 12, burials 52, Sunday-school scholars 908, boarding and day-schools 877, total contributions $1,416.56. There are 22 day-schools, 11 boarding schools, and 29 Sunday-schools in all connected with the mission. The Baptist churches in Liberia have mostly been organized by the Southern Board of American Baptists. Their work was suspended during the war, and the American Baptist Missionaries continued it, but the Mission Board of Liberia with the understanding that the Southern Board would not resume the work; but in 1870 the Southern Baptists sent an agent to Africa with a view of renewing their labors there. The Missionary Union continued, however, to give a partial support to the work of Stanleys. In March, 1868, the Baptist churches of Liberia organized the "Liberian Baptist Missionary Union" for "the evangelization of the heathen" within the borders of the Republic of Liberia, "and contiguous thereto." At this first meeting of the union ten Baptist churches were represented, and twelve fields of missionary labor were designated and committed to the care of the nearest churches. The Baptist churches have a training-school for preachers and teachers at Virginia. The Presbytery of the United States has congregations at Monrovia, Kentucky, Harrisonville, or Sinon, and Fitts. In Maryland and a few other places, with an aggregate membership of about 280. The Liberian churches in union with those of Gaboon and Corisco form the presbytery of Western Africa. The Alexander High-school is intended to be an academy and preparatory school under the government of the Presbytery, and designed especially to aid young men preparing for the ministry. It is situated on a farm of LIBERIUS, Sr., pope of Rome, was a native of the Eternal City. He succeeded Julius I May 22, 538. The Semi-Arians, countenanced by the emperor Constantius, had then the ascendency; and both the Council of Arles (358) and that of Milan (355) condemned Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria. As Liberius, together with some other Western bishops, refused to subscribe to this condemnation, he was arrested by order of the emperor, and taken to Milan, where he held a conference with Constantius, which terminated in a sentence from the emperor on the bishops from his side. He succeeded in obtaining the carrying of his son Felix to the pope's court at Beroea, in Thrace. Felix, a deacon at Rome, was consecrated bishop. A petition was presented to the emperor by the principal ladies of Rome in favor of Liberius, but it was not till 538 that Liberius was restored to his see. He was the last of the Christian emperors, during whose reign theodosius of Beroea, approved in several letters of the deposition of Athanasius, and subscribed to the confession of faith drawn up by the court party at the Council of Sirmium, is a matter of great improbability, and depends chiefly upon the genuineness of his correspondence with Athanasius. The dependence of Liberius on the emperor had a disadvantageous influence upon many of the Italian bishops, and we need not wonder that at the Council of Rimini Arianism was openly countenanced. It is not true, as asserted by some, that Liberius subscribed the Rimini confession of faith. He ended his career in orthodoxy, and died in 566. He was succeeded by Damasus I. Liberius is said to have built the basilica on the Esquiline Mount, which has been called Liberiana, from his name, and is now known by the name of Santa Maria Maggiore. He is commemorated in the Romish Church Aug. 17, and in the Greek Church Sept. 29. See Grév. Kirchengesch. ii, 1, 254-283; Hefele, P. Liber. in the Thub. theol. Quartalschr. (1888), ii, 261 sq.; and Concilegesch. i, 626-714; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. viii, 872.

Liber Pontificalis de vita Romanorum Pontificum, Gesta Romanorum Pontificum, Liber Gesta Romanorum Pontificum, Liber Pontificalium, are the names of a history of the bishops of Rome from the apostle Peter down to Nicolas I († 867), to which those of Adrian II and of Stephen VIII († 892) were subsequently added. On the authority of Onuphrius Pavius, the first editor of this Liber Pontificalis considered as its author Anastasius, abbot of a convent at Rome, and librarian of the church under Nicolas I; but more thorough researches have proved this Liber to vary greatly in style, and even in views manifestly the martynological biographies of the 8th century, since the so-called Liber Pontificalis extant which can with certainty be ascribed to the close of the 7th or the beginning of the 8th century, and which contain extracts from the Liber Pontificalis. In the early part of the 17th century, several writers put forth arguments in favor of the last-mentioned views. Among them are Emanuel of Schel- statte, librarian of the Vatican (Dissertatio de antiqua Romanorum Pontificum catalogo, ex quibus Liber Pontificalis concinnatus est, et de Libri Pontificii auctore ac præstantia [Rome, 1692, fol.; reprinted in Muratori, Rerum italicarum scriptores, iii, 1 sq.]), Joannes Ciam- pinii (magistri brevium gratiae: Examen Libri Pontificalis sive viarum Romanorum Pontificum, qua sub nomine Anastasi bibliothecarii circumstantur [Rom. 1688, 4to; reprinted in Muratori, p. 83 sq.]), and others. The supposition that the codex was compiled by pope Damasus, the successor of Liberius, as maintained by the authors before cited, is not maintained by those who have reference between Damasus and Jerome which is adduced in support of this view is evidently spurious (see Schelstatte, Dissertatio, etc.). The author or authors are unknown, but the information it contains is valuable. It is now generally thought to have been written about the 4th century.

The oldest source known at present of the Liber is generally considered to have been a list of the popes down to Liberius, and probably written during his life (552-586), as it makes no mention of his death (see Schelstatte, Dissertatio, etc., ch. ii, iii; Hefele, Tübinger theolog. Quartalschr., 1844, p. 812 sq.). The original MS. of this so-called Codex Liberis is now lost. In 1684 a copy was made of it from an Antwerp MS. by Bucher, the Bollandists give one in the Acta Sanctorum, April, vol. i, 1675, and Schelstatte another from a Vienna copy of the Codex Lideris, which was sold by order of the Inquisitio of the Empire, Rome, 1826, vol. i.

Another list of the popes extends down to Felix IV († 483). It was first published in a codex of the Vatican Library, called Liber Pontificalis, or Liber Pontificalis (continuatus), in the Annals of Henricus and Papebroch, and is also found in the introduction of the first volume of the Acta Sanctorum for April, in Schelstatte, and in the above-mentioned Origines, p. 212. There are transcripts of French origin, and the original MS. of this so-called Catalogus Felicis IV is lost, but the two at present in existence are evidently copies of the same original, as results from a careful comparison of them by Schelstatte. That the author of it must have consulted the Catalogus Liberi is evident from the fact that its errors are repeated in it. They both omit the names of the consuls and emperors between Liberius and John I († 528), and commence again at the reign of the latter, and of his successor, Felix IV (al. III). Schelstatte already correctly surmised from this fact that the author lived in the time of these two popes, which view is also supported by the completeness and thoroughness with which their history, in particular, is treated. Still, as to the author, there is no definite information. The numerous references to the archives of the Roman Church, in which, moreover, the first MS. was discovered, would make it probable that the author himself was a librarian, and consulted the archives, if the confusion and even incorrectness of some parts did not militate against this view. Aside from the similarity of this collection with the Catalogus Liberis, which extends so far that whole passages are copied literally, or nearly so, from the one into the other, the Catalogus Felicis IV differs from the Liberi principally by its particular care on the order in which the names are arranged, by the names of the bishop of the popes, and their funerals, which the author may have derived from tradition and other similar sources, pseudo-decreets and canons, or MSS. extant. The author of the Catalogus Felicis IV before been considered worthy of full confidence are those which coincide with the Catalogus Liberi, and those which refer to the times of John and Felix, when the author would be better acquainted with the facts than with those of preceding periods.

Both lists were subsequently continued, and this is what produced the Liber Pontificalis. This filiation, however, can only be traced by the aid of MSS. The oldest copy known belongs to the close of the 7th or the beginning of the 8th century. It ends at the death of Conon (696-697). A rather incomplete Codex rescriptus, discovered by Peretz (Arcbe, p. 50 sq.) at Naples, gives the list of the popes down to Conon; it must have been written, at the latest, in the early part of the 8th century. Another is found in a codex of the cathedral chapter of Verona, ending also with Conon, but to it was added afterwards all the names of the popes down to Paul I († 767). This MS. was published in the fourth volume of Bianchini's collection, but, unfortunately, we have no description of this codex; it was to have been given in the fifth volume, which never appeared (see Rostel, Beschreibung der Stadt Rom, 1, 208, 210), so that it is impossible to establish the correct order of the Neapolitan MS. A continuation of this first work goes down to Gregory II (from 714), and is to be found in the Codex of the Vatican, No. 5299, which must be a copy of an older MS. (Scheelestar, c. v, § 8). Then there is another continuation from the end of the first part of the book (Gregory II) to the end of the 8th century. The other MS. was published by Francis Bianchini (Rom. 1718, folio), and this served as a basis for Muratori's, contained in the 3d volume of his Scriptores rerum italicarum (1728); Bianchini's work was continued by his nephew, Joseph Bianchini (vols. ii-iv, Rom. 1785; there was to have been a 5th volume, but it never appeared). There also appeared at Rome an edition by John and Peter Joseph Vignoli (1724, 1752, 1758, 5 vols. 4to). Rottel recently undertook another for the Monumenta Germaniae, while Giesbrecht announced for the same work a continuation of the Liber Pontificalis to the years 799-803. The Quellen der früheren Papstgesch., art. in der Kieler Al- lgem. Monatschrift f. Wissenschaft u. Literatur, April 1862, p. 357-374.

The investigations made on this subject permit us to distinguish several continuations of the Liber Pontificalis.

1. From an unknown source have been composed three histories of the popes: (a) one is contained in the Vatican Codex, 3764, extending from Laudo (912) to Gregory VII, and belonging to the end of the 11th century. It is reproduced in the first volume of Vignoli's edition of the Liber Pontificalis, and the second, in the codex of the library of Eate, 5, and extending as far down, was written during Gregory's lifetime. (b) The third, dating from the time of Paschal II, in the early part of the 12th century (in the library of Santa Sofia in Rome). This, the most important continuation of the Liber Pontificalis, composed in the 12th century, extends from Gregory VII to Innocent III (1124-1129). Onuphrius Panvini and Baronius name it as its author either the subdeacon Pendulph of Pisa or a Roman li- brarian named Peter Constant. Gaetani published in 1638 a biography of Gelasio II, and from this edition was ori- ginated in the inscription in the Vatican Codex (5762, fol. 90 b-96), which, however, states only that a certain Peter Guillermus of Genoa, librarian of the convent of S. Zegidius, wrote this Vatican Codex in the year 1142 (see, in the Libri Pontificales, ed. by De счита, etc., April, 1862, p. 266, 267; Monumenta Germaniae, xi, 318).

2. The sources of the Liber Pontificalis, besides those above mentioned, consist partly in traditions, partly in MSS. documents, and remaining monuments, such as buildings, inscriptions, etc. The collection of canon law of the 7th or 8th century, published by Zachary from a codex of Modena, stands in close connection with the Liber Pontificalis (see Zaccaria, Dizionario caric. italiano a storia ecclesiastica appartente, Rom. 1790, vol. ii, diss. i; reproduced by Galland, De cetatis com- monium collectionibus dissertationum sylloge, Mogunt. 1770, 4to, ii, 679 sq.); yet it is not to be considered as one of its sources, but rather appears to have been based on it.

The Liber Pontificalis has become particularly valuable for the correctness of the information since the latter part of the 7th century, when the Roman archives were regularly organized, and the continuation of the Liber Pontificalis could only be in- trusted to the librarians or other members of the clergy having free access to the archives. The Liber Pontificalis is especially useful for the history of those secular churches, ecclesiastical institutions, the discipline, etc. Scheelestar names as its first edition Peter Crabb's Concilium (Cologne, 1588); but this is neither complete nor well connected. It only contains extracts on each pope, like Ammianus' Anima and subsequent collections of canons, and as the "editio princeps" the edition of J. Buissius (Mayence, 1602, 4to) is generally ac- cepted, which is based on a MS. of Marcus Weber, of Augsburg. It was followed by the edition of Hannibal Fahrotti (Par. 1640), for which several codices were con- sulted. Luscinia pins the text to the edition of Buissius with a number of MSS., and, although never published, it was greatly used by Scheelestar and others (see Scheelestar, cap. v, No. 3 sq.). From the hands of the Scheelestar the MS. of Holsteinius passed into the library of the Vatican in the 17th century (see Dulich, Iter Romanum, pt. i [Vienna, 1825, p. 41]). The work was finally published by Francia Bianchini (Rom. 1718, folio), and this served as a basis for Muratori's, contained in the 3d volume of his Scriptores rerum italicarum (1728); Bianchini's work was continued by his nephew, Joseph Bianchini (vols. ii-iv, Rom. 1785; there was to have been a 5th volume, but it never appeared). the Acta Vaticana, but Muratori published it under the name of the cardinal of Aragon. Nicolás Roselli (a Dominican, made cardinal in 1851, in 1859) caused a collection of old historical documents to be prepared, which contained the lives of the popes from Leo IX to Alexander II, and also the biography of Gregory IX. Porta (Archivo, p. 97) says that these biographies are borrowed from the Liber censuum camera apostolicæ of Cencius Camerarius, who in 1216 became pope under the name of Honorius III. But these also are not the work of Cencius himself, but of another nameless writer. The life of Alexander IV was written by his relative, cardinal Bosco, from materials furnished by himself, during the reign of Alexander III. The life of Alexander III was written at the same time, and most likely also by Bosco, who probably wrote most of the whole collection. The introduction is taken from Bonizo's collection of canons, the biographies of John XII, and from Leo IX down to Gregory VII are adapted from the ad Amicitiam of the same writer; subsequent ones down to Eugenius III are based on the records, but after that they become more complete, resting on Isao's own experience, as he then lived at Rome. For subsequent biographies the sources are much more numerous. We might also mention, as a compendium of the whole, the Actus Pontificum Romanorum of the Augustinian monk Amalricus Angleri, written in 1232. It embraces the lives of the popes from John XII (1212), which is to be found in Eead, Corpus hist. medii ævi, ii, 164 sq., and in Muratori, vol. iii, pt. ii. Herzog, Real-Enzyklop., viii, 867 sq. See Baxmann, Politik der Päpste (Elberfeld, 1865), vol. i (see Index); Wachter, Vita Romanorum Pontificum (Lips., 1862); Pi- pet, Einleit., in die monumentale Theologie (Ueberh., 1867); De Rossi, Rom. Liber Sextus and Septimus. See Canons and Decretals, Collections of. Libertine (Aíasiprov). The Latin libertina, a frequent occurrence in the N.T., "Certain of the synagogue, which is called (the synagogue) of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians," etc. (Acts vi, 9). There has been much diversity in the interpretation of this word. The structure of the passage leaves it doubtful how many synagogues are implied in it. Some (Calvin, Beza, Bengel) have taken it as if there were but one synagogue, including men from all the different cities that are named. Winer (N. T. Gramm., p. 179), on grammatical grounds, takes the repetition of the article as indicating a fresh group, and finds accordingly two synagogues, one including the ordinary Synag-

1. The other names being local, this also has been referred to a town called Libertinum, in the prosconsular province of Africa. This, it is said, would explain the close juxtaposition with Cyrene. Siduas recognises Aíasiprov as Sómrus Sómar, and in the Council of Carthage in 411 (Mansi, iv, 256-274, quoted in Wiltich, Handbuch der Kirchik. Geogr., § 96) we find an Episcopos Libertinensis (Simon, Onomasticon N. Text. p. 99). Against this hypothesis it has been urged (1) that the existence of a Libertinum in the south of Italy is not established; and (2) that if it existed, it can hardly have been important enough either to have a synagogue at Jerusalem for the Jews belonging to it, or to take precedence of Cyrene and Alexandria in a synagogue common to the three.
Libertines, True, or, as they called themselves, Spiritualists, were a Pantheistic and Antinomian sect of the Reformation days. They appeared first in the Netherlands, under the name of "Deists ad infinitum et Secundum Animam Spiritum." They spread into France, and, by the interest they manifested in political affairs, gained considerable influence also in Switzerland, especially in Geneva. The impulse given to thought by the Reformation gave rise also to many errors, which flourished by the side of evangelical truth, and, though they were not without a little Realism, but to Protestants as well, the influence of the Libertines must be baneful, and he took an early opportunity to warn the Christians of those countries against them (Gieseler, Kirchengesch. iii [1], 557). Calvin also had to fight against this gain of influence of the libertine sect, and, in speaking of the mention of a certain Coppin, of Lille, as the first who attempted to introduce, as early as 1529, the doctrines of the Free Spirit in his native city. This Coppin was soon eclipsed by his disciple Quintin, of Hennequin, who, with his companion Bertrand, became the leader of the sect in France in 1534, and with whom a priest called Poquet (Pocque) connected himself. These two, for Bertrand soon died, are represented as uneducated but shrewd men, who made religion a means of securing earthly goods, and who were very successful in the attempt. They openly professed to have found the principle of "moral falsehood" (or moral reservation) inculcated in the Scriptures, and, in consequence, thought it but right to profess Roman Catholicism when among Roman Catholics, and Protestantism when with Protestants. They are said to have made 400,000 converts in 2 years (1534-1536). They, however, confine their attempts at deceit to the lower classes; but, on the contrary, endeavored to gain proceleys among the learned and in the higher walks of society; they succeeded even in gaining the ear of the queen Margaret of Navarre, sister of Francis I, who received them in a friendly manner not to Rome, but to her court, and daily consulted with them. They made great use of allegory, figures of speech, etc., taking their authority from the precept, "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." We have said above that the system of the Libertines was pantheistic; it was, in fact, pure pantheism. They held that there is one universal spirit, which is found in every creature, and is the Spirit of God. This one spirit and God is distinguished from itself according as it is considered in heaven or on earth. "Deum a se ipso diversum esse et alius esse in hoc mundo et alius esse in caelo" (Calvin, Instr. adv. l bert. c. 11). All creatures, angels, etc., are nothing in themselves, and have no real existence aside from God. Man is preserved only by the Spirit of God, which is in him, and exists only until that spirit again departs from him; instead of a soul, it is God himself who dwells in man, and all his actions, all that takes place in the world, is direct from him, is the immediate work of God ("Quidquid in mundo fit, opus ipius [Dei] directo censendum esse," c. 18). Everything else, the world, the flesh, the devil, souls, etc., are by this system mere projections, mere superfluities (opinatio). Even sin is not a mere negation of right, but, since God is the active agent of all actions, it can be but an illusion also, and will disappear as soon as this principle is recognized ("Peccatum—non solum alienum bontatis peccationem esse, sed illa opinatio, quae evanescit et absurdam, cum nulla habetur ejus ratio," c. 12. Poquet says, in regard to that, "Et quia omnia quae sunt extra Deum, nihil sunt quam vanitas," c. 23). There is, therefore, but one evil, and that evil is this illusion of a distinction between the spirit of God and the spirit of man. To secure the idea of a certain relation between it and the right. Thus the original fall or sin was nothing else than a separation of man from God, or rather the result of man's desire to be something by himself, separating himself from union and identity with God. Thus unintentionally man subjected himself to the world and its ideas. And we, in our position, are like a smoke which passes away and leaves nothing behind. So Poquet says, "Ideo scriptum est (7), "Qui videt peccatum, peccatum ei manet et veritas in ipso non est" (in Calvin, c. 29). From the Libertine point of view the nature of Christ did not materially differ from ours; he consisted, like other human beings, in divine spirit, such as dwells in us all, and in the sacrifice only the illusionary, or worldly part, was lost. However considered, the whole history of Christ, and especially his crucifixion, death, and resurrection, had for them but a symbolic significance, as the incarnation of this idea of evil. Calvin's strong expression, only "une facce ou moralité fouée pour nous figurer le mystère de notre salut"—only a type of the idea that sin was effaced and atoned for, while in reality, and in God's view, it was no account in itself ("Christ surnomme, et tant est puissant et glorifique par le..." quae ad salutem nostri requiri scriptura; e. g. cum siunt, Christum abolevisse peccatum, sensum eorum est, Christum abolutionem illam in persona suam representasse, c. 17). But in so far as we are one in spirit with Christ, all that he underwent is as if we had undergone it; his example and His passion, "Est ille finitionis," is true as well for us as for himself; sin has lost all significance so far as we are concerned, and the fight against sin, repentance, mortification of the flesh, etc., are no longer necessary. Neither can nor should the spiritualist be any longer subject to suffering, since Christ has suffered all. Here the idea and the reality, however, are in conflict ("Nam scriptum est: Factus sum totus homo. Cum factus sit totus homo [tous hommes, in a twofold sense], accipiens naturam hominum, ac mortuos sit, potestin..." aduin in his inferiorius locuri mori? Magni esset error hoc creaturarum, etc., destruitur etc., c. 29). Of course men should be born anew, but this new birth is secured when he regains the state of innocence of Adam before the fall; when in absolute filial unity with God, he neither sees nor knows sin, or, in other words, when he is no longer able to distinguish it from righteousness (moeo...quae amplius opus est); and when he can find no tacts of God's Spirit by virtue of natural impulse ("Sed si adue committamus delictum et ingendiaram hortum voluptatis, qui adue nobis prohibet..." quae adue vel..." sed siimus nos duci a voluntate Dei. Aliquâ non esse anima potius etc., qui est pars prima nostrae Adam, etc. videmus peccatum, sicut ipse et utior ejus, etc. Nunc vivificati sumus cum secundo Adamo; qui est Christus, non cernendo amplius peccatum, quia est mortuum," etc.: ibidem ; compare c. 18). Such a twice-born one is Christ, is God himself, to whom the Libertine returns after death, to be absorbed in him ("Hoc enim imaginatur, animam hominam, quae est Deus, ad seipsum redire, cum ad mortem ventum est, non ut tanguam anima humana, sed tanguam Deus ipse vitav, sicut ab initio," c. 19 and 22). The consequences of such principles are obvious: they lead naturally to sensuality, to the emancipation of the flesh and the laying aside of all restrictions; make men look upon propriety or ownership as a wrong, as opposed to the principles of love, and, in fact, a theft, though this principle was not carried into practice. Calvin called its principal actor the "Ordo...doctoris" (c. 19). Ordinary or legal marriage comes to be looked upon as a mere carnal bond, and therefore dissoluble; true marriage, such as satisfies both body and mind, being a union of each to each; communion of saints extended not merely to the worldly possessions, but also to the very bodies of the saints. In short, spiritualism soon degenerated into open and avowed sensualism and materialism. But this is the very feature which gave it its influence with some classes in Geneva. The example of their bishops and of the cathedral canons had excited their imagination by inclining them to self-indulgence and licentiousness, and political circumstances operated in favor of the result. Soon, however, the real principles of the Libertines appeared in their full light, and created a reaction, some women having gone so far as to quote Scripture to authorize their excesses, insisting especially on the fact of God's first command to our first parents having been "to increase and multiply" ("Crescere et multiplicare super terram. En prima lex, quan ordinavit Deus, quae vocabatur lex natura," c. 23). See Communism; "Free Love" in the article Marriage.

As Calvin had favored political libertinism, those who considered themselves aggrieved by the practice of the church acted against him, and this political-religious reaction went as far as irreligion and atheism, as in the case of Jacob Gruet, whose ultra-radical principles in politics and rationalism in religion led to his trial before the courts of Geneva July 27, 1547. Yet no one really did more to counteract the principles of the Libertines than Calvin himself. First, in 1544, he brought all their secret principles to light in one of his works (see Institut. iii, § 14). Afterwards, in 1547, he warned the faithful of Rouen against an ex-Franciscan monk who was incalculating libertinizing doctrines, and who had both some success, especially among women of the higher classes. Under Calvin, influence of Parel also took the pen against the Libertines (Le glaise de la parole véritable, tiré contre le bouclier de défense, dans quel un cordelier s'est voulu servir pour approuver ses fausses et daumantes opinions [Geneva, 1550]; see Kirchhofer, Theological History of Switzerland, 1861). The Church of Navarre was highly offended at Calvin for denouncing the leaders of the Libertines who were then at her court; he therefore wrote to her a letter which is a remarkable specimen of reasonable remonstrance (Aug. 28, 1546; in French, see J. Bonnet, Lettres de J. Calvin, i, 111 sq.; Latin, Epist. et Rem. ed. Amsterdam, p. 80). It is in fact due to his efforts that this sect, this baneful curse, left France to take refuge in its native country, Belgium, and that it finally disappeared altogether. Against the Libertines of Geneva the attacks were for a long time unanswerable, could not be contained, and were successfully ended until after the insurrection of May 15, 1555, when the principal leaders were either exiled or imprisoned. Liberty. The idea of liberty," says Locke, "is the idea of a power in any agent to do or forbear any particular action, according to the determination or thought of the mind, whereby either of them is preferred to the other. When either of them is not in the power of the agent, to be produced by him according to his volition, then he is not at liberty, but under necessity." From this abstract definition, it cannot be inferred that Locke's ideas of liberty and of power are very nearly the same. "Every one," he observes, "finds in himself a power to begin or forbear, continue or put an end to, several actions in himself. From the consideration of the extent of this power of the mind over the actions of the man, which every one finds in himself, arise the ideas of liberty and necessity." These definitions, however, merely extend to the ability of the individual to execute his own purposes without obstruction; whereas as Locke, in order to do justice to his own decided opinion on the subject, gave it also included also in his idea of liberty a power over the determinations of the will. "By the liberty of a moral agent," says Dr. Reid, "I understand a power over the determinations of his own will. If, in any action, he had power to will what he did not want to do, he would not have the liberty. But if, in every voluntary action, the determination of his will be the necessary consequence of something involuntary in the state of his mind, or of something in his external circumstances, he is not free; he has not what I call the liberty of a moral agent, but is subject to necessity." On the other hand, some affirm that necessity is perfectly consistent with human liberty; that is, that the most strict and inviolable connection of cause and effect does not prevent the full, free, and unrestricted development of certain powers in the agent, or take away the distinction between the nature of virtue and vice, praise and blame, reward and punishment, but is the foundation of all moral reasoning. "I conceive," says Hobbes, "that nothing taketh beginning from itself, but from the action of some other immediate agent without itself; and that therefore, when first a man had no will, he would not be free; but he would have been immediately before he had no appetite nor will, the cause of his will is not the will itself, but something else not in his own disposing; so that whereas it is out of controversy that of voluntary action the will is the necessary cause, and by this which is said the will is also caused by other things wherein it disposes not, it followeth that voluntary actions have all of them necessary causes, and therefore are necessitated. I hold that to be a sufficient cause to which nothing is wanting that is needful to the producing of the effect. The same is true of the action of nature, and also of innate instinct. If a sufficient cause shall not bring forth the effect, then there wanteth somewhat which was needful to the producing of it, and so the cause was not sufficient; but if it be impossible that a sufficient cause should not produce the effect, then is a sufficient cause a necessary cause (for that is said to produce the effect in an effect necessarily that cannot but produce it). Hence it is manifest that whatsoever is produced hath a sufficient cause to produce it, or else it had not been, and therefore also voluntary actions are necessitated." "I conceive liberty," he observes, "to be, 'to have power to do or forbear, a power not necessarily that cannot but produce it.' In the absence of all impediments to action that are not contained in the nature and intrinsic quality of the agent: as, for example, the water is said to descend freely, or to have liberty to descend by the channel of the river, because there is no impediment that way, but not across, because the banks are impediments; and, though the water cannot ascend, yet men never say it wants the liberty to ascend, but the faculty or power, because the impediment is in the nature of the water, and intrinsic. So also we say, he that is tied wants the liberty to go, but not to move, and it is not necessary that he cannot move. We say, he wants not the liberty to move in his bands; whereas we say not so of him that is sick or lame, because the impediment is in himself. I hold that the ordinary definition of a free agent—namely, that a free agent is that which, when all things are present that are needful to produce the effect, can nevertheless not produce it—implies a contradiction, and is nonsensical; being as much as to say the cause may be sufficient, that is to say, necessary, and yet the effect shall not follow." He afterwards defines a moral agent to be one that acts from deliberation, or will, or not at all. As no great amount of the difficulty will be seen in the insensibility between choice and necessity, he adds: "Commonly, when we see and know the strength that moves us, we acknowledge necessity; but when we do not, or mark not the force that moves us, we then think there is none, and thus conclude that it is not cause, but libeity, that produces the action. Hence it is that we are apt to think that one does not choose this or that when necessity chooses for us; but we might as well say fire does not burn because it burns of necessity." The general question is thus stated by Hobbes in the beginning of his treatise: the point is not, he says, "whether a man can be a free agent; that is to say, whether he can do a thing contrary to his will, but whether the will to write or the will to forbear come upon him according to his will, or according to anything else in his power. I acknowledge this liberty, that I can do if I will; but say I can will if I will, I take to be an absurd speech. In fine, that freedom from external constraint, is a subject of consideration purely to liberty of action. This latter is simply a physical question, and applies to all agents, whether human, animal, or even material; that liberty which concerns, and indeed constitutes, a being as a moral agent, is quite a different thing: Hobbes as a materialist, and therefore a necessitarian, of course finds no room for this kind of moral or self-determining power.

It is unquestionable that the source of most of the confusion on the subject is in the ambiguity lurking under the term necessity, which includes both kinds of necessity, moral and physical. If double meaning of the word has been the chief reason why persons who were guided more by their own feelings and the customary associations of language than by formal definitions have altogether rejected the doctrine, while persons of a more logical turn, who could not deny the truth of the abstract principle, have yet, in their explanation of it and inference from it, fallen into the same error as their opponents. The partisans of necessity have given up their common sense, as they supposed, to their reason, while the advocates of liberty rejected a demonstrable truth from fear of a real consequence, which may have been the dupe of a word. The obscurity of the term has doubtless been the cause of nearly all the difficulty and repugnance which many who really hold the doctrine find in admitting it. It was to remove this prejudice that Dr. Jonathan Edwards was induced to write his dissertation, calling it "The History of Sin written expressly to vindicate himself from the charge of having, in his great work, confounded moral with physical necessity, he says: "On the contrary, I have largely declared that the connection between antecedent things and consequent ones, which take place with regard to the acts of men's wills, which is called moral necessity, is called by the name of necessity improperly, and that all such terms as must, cannot, impossible, unable, irresistible, unavoidable, inexcusable, etc., when applied here, are not employed in their proper signification, and are either used nonsensically and with perfect insignificance, or in a sense quite diverse from their original and proper meaning and their use in common speech, and that such a necessity as attends the acts of men's wills is more properly called certainty than necessity." The well-known definition of Edwards on this subject is in the following words: "The plain and obvious meaning of the words freedom and liberty, in common speech, is power, opportunity, or advantage that any one has to do as he pleases, or, in other words, his being free from hindrance or impediment in the way of doing or conducting in any respect whatsoever. A determination by motives cannot, to our understanding, escape from necessity—nay, were we even to admit as true what we cannot think as possible, still the doctrine of a motiveless volition would be only casualistic, and the free acts of an indifferent are morally and rationally as worthless as the fore-ordained passions of the necessitarian. If, therefore, we admit that liberty is possible in man or God we are utterly unable speculatively to understand. But practically the fact..." that we are free is given to us in the consciousness of our moral accountability; and this fact of liberty cannot be reargued on the ground that it is incomprehensible, for the philosophy of the conditions proves, against the necessitarian, that things there which may, may must be true, of which the understanding is wholly unacquainted. But this philosophy is not only competent to defend the fact of our moral liberty, possible, though inconceivable, against the assault of the fatalist; it retorts against himself the very objection of inconceivability by which the fatalist had thought to triumph over the libertarian. It shows that the scheme of freedom is not more inconceivable than the scheme of necessity; for, whilst fatality is a recoil from the more obscure inconceivability of an absolute commencement, on the fact of which commencement the doctrine of liberty proceeds, the fatalist is shown to overlook the equal or less obscure inconceivability of an infinite non-commencement, on the assertion of which non-commencement his own doctrine of necessity must ultimately rest. As equally unthinkable, the two counter, the two one-sided schemes, are thus theoretically balanced. 10

Sir William, however, asks, as we, in this extract, do not closely adhere to the conditions of the problem. According to his own admission, it is not the fact of a self-determining power in the will that is 'inconceivable', but only the mode (the how) of its exercise. This, like many other open problems, is a mystery. Again, it is not claimed that the will acts without motive, but only that it is not controlled by external motive; that it has the power of itself choosing what motive shall be strongest with it, irrespective of the intrinsic force of that motive. It is a distinction that preserves-as no other can-the truly moral character of the agent. Those theologians, on the other hand, who deny that the divine predestination extends to the individual acts of men in general, think that they thus more effectually obviate the whole difficulty. In the divine foreknowledge of all human actions they admit the certainty of their occurrence, but find no conclusive power, such as seems to enter essentially into the predestinations of an Almighty will. As to the argument that such foreknowledge rests upon, and therefore implies fore-ordination, they contend that this is a reversal of the true order (comp. Rom. viii., 29), and that God's presence is a simple knowing beforehand by his peculiar power of intention, not any conclusion or inference from what he may or may not determine. See PRESENCE.

Libnah (Heb. Libnah, לִבְנַה, transparency, as in Exod. xxiv., 10), the name of two places. See also SHISHOR-LIBNATH.

1. (Sept. Ἄσωμα ου καὶ Ἄσωμα.) The twenty-first station of the Israelites in the desert, between Rimon-pares and Rissah (Num. xxxiii., 20, 21); probably identical with Laban (Deut. i., i), and perhaps situated near wady el-Ain, west of Kedesh-Barnea. See EXOD.

2. (Sept. Ἄσωμα, sometimes Ασωμα, occasionally Ασιωμα or Ασιωματος.) A town of the Canaanites (Josh. xii., 15), taken and destroyed by Joshua immediately after Makkedah and before Lachish (Josh. x., 29-32, 89). It lay in the plain within the territory assigned to Judah (Josh. xv., 42), and became one of the Levitical towns in that tribe, as well as an asylum (Josh. xxi., 18; 1 Chron. vi., 57). In the reign of king Jehoram, Libnah is said to have revolted from him (2 Kings viii., 22; 2 Chron. xxi., 10). From the circumstance of this revolt having happened at the same time with that of the Edomites, it has been supposed by some to have reference to another town of the same name situated in that country. But such a conjecture is unnecessary and improbable, for it appears that the Philistines and Arabsians revolted at the same time (2 Chron. xxi., 10). Libnah of Judah rebelled because it refused to admit the idolatries of Jehoram; and it is not said in either of the passages in which this act is recorded, as of Edom, that it continued in revolt "unto this day." It may be inferred either that it was speedily reduced to obedience, or, that, on the re-establishment of the true worship, it spontaneously returned to its allegiance. Libnah is said to have been the father of two of the last kings of Judah (2 Kings xxiii., 81; xxiv, 18; Jer. lii., 1). It appears to have been a strongly fortified place, for the Assyrian king Sennacherib was detained some time before it when he invaded Judaea in the time of Hezekiah. See Hezekiah. On completing or relinquishing the siege of Lachish—which of the two is not quite certain—Sennacherib laid siege to Libnah (2 Kings xix., 8; Isa. xxxvii., 8). While there he was joined by Rabshakeh and the part of the army which had visited Jerusalem (2 Kings xix., 6; Isa. xxxvii., 8), and received the intelligence of Tarchah's approach; and it would appear that at Libnah the destruction of the Assyrian army took place, though the statements of Herodotus (i., 141) and of Josephus (Ant. x., 1, 4) place it at Pelusium (see Rawlinson, Herod., 4, 400). Libnah was the native place of Haman, chief of the eunuchs, to his king, Darius the Mede (2 Kings xxiii., 81) and Zedekiah (xxiv., 18; Jer. lli., 1). It is in this connection that its name appears for the last time in the Bible. It existed as a village in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, and is placed by them in the district of Eleutheropolis. See ELEUTHEROPOLIS (compare Josephus, Ant. x., 5, 3). Dr. Robinson was unable to discover the least trace of its site (Bib. Res., ii, 388). Stanley inclines to find the site at Tell er-Safajeh (Sinai) and Pat., p. 207, 238); but this is probably Gath. Van de Velde suggests Arak el-Mehriyeh, a hill about four miles west of Beitol-Jobriah (Armen., p. 380), which seems to answer to the requirements of location. It stood near Lachish, west of Makkedah, and probably also west of Eleutheropolis (Kelly, Comment. on Jos., x., 29), and was situated in the district immediately west of the hill region, in the vicinity of Eber, Ashan, etc. (Jos. xvi., 46).

Libni (Heb. Libni, לִבְנִי, white; Sept. Αὐστρείον Αὐστρείον), the first-born of the two sons of Gershon, the son of Levi (Exod. vi., 17; Num. iii., 18, 21; 1 Chron. vi., 17; comp. Num. xxxvi., 58); elsewhere called Laadan (1 Chron. xxiii., 7; xxxvi., 21), B.C. post 1856. His son is called Jailath (1 Chron. vi., 20, 46), and his descendants were named Limmrites (Num. iii., 21; xxxvi., 58). In 1 Chron. vi., 26, by some error he is called the son of Mahli and the father of Shimei.

Libnite (Heb. Libni, לִבְנִי, being a patronymic of the same form from Libni; Sept. Αὐστρείον), a descendant of Libni the Levite (Num. iii., 21; xxxvi., 58).

Liboris, Sr., fourth bishop of Manna, a disciple of St. Pauvncius, flourished from the middle to the close of the 4th century. The existing documents on his life are quite untrustworthy, and relate only that he was a pious man, and a great friend of St. Martin of Tours. See the Bollandists for July 23; Tilmont, Mémoires, x., 307; Mabillon, De Pontif. Consecratis, 1. His body was transferred in the 9th century from Manna to Paderborn, by order of Biso, bishop of the latter place. See Pertz, Script. iv. (vi.), 149 sqq.; Herzig, Real-Encyklopädie, viii., 388.

Libra (pound), the name sometimes given to the seventy suffragans of the bishop of Rome, from the circumstance that there were seventy solidi or parts in the Roman libra.

Libraries. In the early Church, as soon as churches began to be erected, it was customary to attach libraries to them. In these were included not only the liturgical and other Church books, and MS. copies of the holy Scriptures in the original languages, but also homilies and other theological works. That they were of some importance is evident from the manner in which they are referred to by Eusebius and Jerome, who mention having made use of the libraries at Jerusalem and Constantinople, and the prominence held by them as principal part of the materials for his Ecclesiastical History in the library at Jerusalem. One of the most famous was that attached to the church of St. Sophia, which is supposed to have been commenced by Constantine, but was afterwards greatly augmented by Theodosius the Younger, in whose time there were not fewer than one hundred thousand books in it, and a hundred and twenty thousand in the time of Basilius and Zeno. No doubt a particular reason for thus collecting books was their great expense and rarity before the art of printing enabled men to possess themselves the works they needed for thorough research. In churches where the itinerant system prevailed libraries possessed by churches would even in our very day prove a source of pleasure, and time-saving indeed. As a consequence of this arrange- ment there are already advocating this plan.

Libya (Λιβύη or Αιβύη), a name which, in its largest acceptance, was used by the Greeks to denote the whole of Africa (Strabo, ii., 131); but Libya Proper, which is the Libya of the New Testament (Acts ii., 10), and the country of the Libyans in the Old, was a large tract along the Mediterranean coast of Egypt (Strabo, xvii., 824). It is called Pentopolitana Regio by Pliny (Hist. Nat. v., 6), from its five cities, Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, Apollonia, and Cyrene; and Libya Cyrenaica by Ptolomy (Geog. iv., 5), from Cyrene, its capital. The name of Libya occurs in Acts ii., 10, where "the dwellers in the parts of Libya about Cyrene" are mentioned among the other Jews who came up to Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost. This obviously means the Cyrenaics. Similar expressions are used by Dion Cassius (A.D. 156-237), ii., 12, and Josephus (ς εἰς Κυρηνακας Αιτίαν, Anti xvi., 6, 1). See Cyrene.

In the Old Testament, it is the rendering sometimes adopted of שֲנֵה (Jer. xvi., 9; Ezek. xxx., 5; xxxviii., 8, 9) elsewhere rendered פַּרְעֹע (Gen. x., 6; Ezek. xxvii., 10).

Libya is supposed to have been first peopled by, and to have derived its name from, the Lebebos or Libsins (Gen. x., 18; Nah. iii., 9; see Geniius, Monum. Pharn. p. 211; comp. Michaelis, Spicil. i., 362 sqq.; Vater, Comment. i., 182). These, its earliest inhabitants, appear, in the time of the Old Testament, to have consisted of wandering tribes, who were sometimes in alliance with Egypt (compare Herod. iv., 159), and at others with the Ethiopians, as they are said to have assisted both Shishak, king of Egypt, and Zerah the Ethiopian in their expeditions against Judah (2 Chron. xii., 4; xiv., 8; xvi., 9). In the time of Cambyses they appear to have formed part of the Persian empire (Herod. iii., 10), and the Libyans formed part of the immense army of Xerxes (Herod. vii., 71, 86). They are mentioned by Daniel (xii., 43) in connection with the Ethiopians and Cushites. They were eventually subdued by the Carthaginians; and it was the policy of that people to bring the nomadic tribes of Northern Africa which they mastered under the condition of cultivators, that by the produce of their industry they might be able to raise and maintain the numerous armies with which they made their foreign conquests. But Herodotus assures us that none of the Libyans beyond the Carthaginian territory were tillers of the ground (Herod. iv., 196, 187, compare Polybius, i., 161, 167, 168, 177, ed. Schwingeauser). Since the time of the Carthaginian supremacy, the country, with the rest of the East, has successively passed into the hands of the Greeks, Romans, Saracens, and Turks. See Africa.

Libyan (only in the pl.), the rendering adopted in the A.V. of two Heb. names, לִבְיוֹן (Libbim, Sept. Λιββίων), Dan. xi., 48 (where otherwise written Λιββίων); 2 Chron. vii., 8; viii., 9; Nah. iii., 9; prob. i. q. לִבְיוֹן, "Libbim." Gen. x., 18; 1 Chron. i., 11) and פָּרְעֹע (Put, Jer. xvi., 9; Sept. Αὐστρείον; elsewhere rendered "Libya," Ezek. xxx., 5, xxxviii., 8; Phut, or "Put"). See Libya.

Lice (ζόο, perh. from δζο, to sip; only once in the sing., used collectively, Isa. li., 6, and there doubtful, where the Sept., Vulg., and Engl. Ver. confound with ζο, and render ὀνοσκο, "in like manner;" elsewhere plural, פַּרְעֹע, Exod. viii., 16, 17, 18; Psa. cv., 81; Sept. κυπρίκες, ver. 17 κυπρίκες; r. κυπρίκες; Vulg. antipodes, in Psa. canibus; also the cognate sing. collective Πυπο, κυριον, Exod. viii., 17, 18, Sept. and Vulg. κυπρίκες, cypriques), the name of the creature employed in the third plague upon Egypt, miraculously produced from the dust of the land. Its exact nature has been much disputed. Dr. A. Clarke has inferred, from the words "in man and in beast," that it was the acarus suspensus, or "tick" (Comment. on Exod. viii., 15). Michaelis remarks (Suppl. ad Lex. 1174) that if it be a Hebrew for "lice," it is strange that it should have disappeared from the cognate tongues, the Aramaic, Samaritan, and Ethiopic. The rendering of the Sept. seems highly valuable when it is considered that it was given by learned Jews resident in Egypt, that it occurs in the most ancient and best executed version of that version, and that it can be elucidated by the writings of ancient Greek naturalists, etc. Thus Aristotle, who was nearly contemporary with the Sept. translators of Exodus, mentions the οἰκότεις (the οἰκότεις of the Sept.) among insects able to distinguish between a herb (οἰκότεις) and a fruit (οἰκότεις), and refers to species of birds which he calls οἰκοτείονα, that live by hunting οἰκότεις (vi., 6). His pupil Theophrastus says, "The οἰκότεις are born in certain trees, as the oak, the fig-tree, and they seem to subsist upon the sweet moisture which is collected under the bark. They are also produced on some vegetables" (Hist. Plant. i, 17, and ii., ul.). This description applies to ὀξίδες, or rather to the various species of "call-flies" (Cymipsa, Linn.). Hesychius, in the beginning of the third century, explains οἰκότεις as "a green four-winged creature," and quotes Theophrastus as saying that these are "damsels to a wondrous wretch, and adds, "From the little creature among trees, which speedily devour them." Philo (A.D. 40) and Origen, in the second century, who both lived in Egypt, describe it in terms suitable to the gnat or mosquito (Philo, Vita Moses, i, 57, ed. Mangely; Origen, Homilia tertia in Exod., as does also Augustine in the third or fourth century (De Conveniuntis, etc.). But Theodoret, in the same age, distinguishes between οἰκότεις and οἰκότεις (Vita Jacob). Suidas (A.D. 1100) says χιφύς, "resembling gnats," and adds, "a little creature that eats the flesh of the Christian fathers," but gives no authority for their explanations, and Bochart remarks that they seem to be speaking of gnats under the name οἰκότεις, which word, he conjectures, bisected them from its resemblance to the Hebrew. Schleusener adds (Gloss. s.n. in Testament) οἰκότεις, "less than gnats," and (Lec. Cyril., M. Br.汉堡), "very small creatures like gnats." From this concurrence of testimony it would appear that not lice, but some species of gnats, is the proper rendering, though the ancients, no doubt, included other species of insects under the name. Mr. Bryant, however, gives a curious turn to the evidence derived from ancient naturalists. He quotes Theophrastus, and admits that a Greek must be the best judge of the meaning of the Greek word, but urges that the Sept. translators concealed the meaning of the Hebrew word, which he labors to prove is ιέρικες, for fear of offending the Ptolemies, under whose inspection they translated, and the Egyptians in general, whose detestation of lice was as ancient as the time of Herodotus (ii., 37) (but who includes "any other foul creature"), and whose disgust, he thinks, would have been too much excited by reading that their nation once swarmed with those creatures through the instrumentality of the servants of the God of the Jews (Plague of Egypt, Lond. 1794, p. 56, etc.). This suspicion, if admitted, upsets all the previous reasoning. But a plague of lice, upon Bryant's own principles, could not have been more offensive to the Egyptians than the plague of locusts that sapped the Nile, the former of which the Sept. translators have not mitigated. Might it not be suggested with equal probability that the Jews in later ages had been led to interpret the word lice as being peculiarly humiliating to the Egyptians, (see Josephus, ii., 14, 5, who, however, makes the Egyptians to be afflicted with phthisis). The rendering of the Vulg. affords us no assistance, being evidently formed from that of the Sept., and not being illustrated by any Roman naturalist, but found only in Christian Latin writers (see Facchini, a. v.). The other ancient versions, etc., are of no value in this inquiry. They adopt the popular notion of the times, and Bochart's reasonings upon them involve, as Rosenmüller (apud Bochart) justly complains, many unsafe permutations of letters. If, then, the Sept. be discarded, we are deprived of the highest source of information. Bochart's reasonings upon the form of the word (Hieroz. iii., 518) is unsound, as, indeed, that of all others who have relied upon etymology to furnish a clue to the insect intended. It is strange that it did not occur to Bochart that if the plague had been lice it would have been easily imitated by the magicians, which was attempted them, etc., but in vain (i., iii., 18). Nor is the objection valid that if this plague were gnats, etc., the plague of flies would be anticipated, since the latter most likely consisted of one particular species having a different destination (see Fly), whereas this may have consisted not only of mosquitoes or gnats, but of some other species which also attack domestic cattle, as the astrus, or tabanum, or simr (Bruce, Travels, i, 315, 8vo), on which supposition these two plagues would be sufficiently distinct. See PLAGUES OF EGYPT. But, since mosquitoes, gnats, etc., have ever been one of the evils of Egypt, there must have been some peculiarity attending them on this occasion which proved the plague to be "the lunger of God." From the next chapter, ver. 81, it appears that the fly and the barley were smitten by the hail; that the former was beginning to grow, and that the latter was in the ear, which, according to Shaw, takes place in Egypt in March. Hence the κινόμων would be sent about February, i.e. before the increase of the Nile, which takes place at the end of May or beginning of June. Since, then, the innumerable swarms of mosquitoes, gnats, etc., which every year affect the Egyptians, come, according to Hasselquist, at the increase of the Nile, the appearance of them in February would be as much a variation of the course of nature as the appearance of the astrus in January would be in England. They were also probably numerous and fierce beyond example on this occasion, and, as the Egyptians would be utterly unprepared for them, (for it seems that this plague was not announced), the effects would be signal distress. Bochart adduces instances in which both mankind and cattle, and even wild beasts, have been driven by gnats from their localities. It may be added that the proper Greek name for the gnat is ἰμιρίς, and that probably the word χιφύς, which much resembles χιφύς, is appropriate to the mosquito. Har- douin observes that the χιφύς of Aristotle are not the ἰμιρίς, which latter is by Pliny always rendered κυλικος, a word which he employs with great latitude. See GNAT. For a description of the evils inflicted by these insects upon man, see Kirby and Spence, Introduction to Entomology, Lond. 1828, i, 115, etc.; and for the annoyance they cause in Egypt, Maillet, Descrip. de l'Egypte par l'Abbé Mascerier (Paris, 1756), x, 57; Forskal, Descr. Animal. p. 85. Michaelis proposed an inquiry into the meaning of the word οἰκότεις to the Société des Savants, with a full description of the qualities ascribed to them by Philo, Origen, and Augustine (Recueil, etc, Amst. 1744). Niebuhr inquired after it of the Greek patriarch, and also of the metropolitan at Cairo, who thought it to be a species of gnat found in great quantities in the gardens there, and whose bite was extremely painful. A merchant who was present at the inquiry called it ὅδυγ- βρότον, or the dog-fly (Descrip. de l'Arabe, Pref. p. 39, 40). Besides the references already made, see Romanelli, Schol. ad Hesych. LIE

The advocates of the other theory, that lice are the animals meant by kinsiam, and not gnats, base their arguments upon these facts: (1) Because the kinsiam sprang from the dust, whereas gnats come from the waters; (2) Because it is said though they may greatly irritate men and beasts, cannot properly be said to be 'in' them; (3) Because their name is derived from a root (סח) which signifies to 'establish,' or to 'fix,' which cannot be said of gnats; (4) Because, if gnats are intended, then the fourth plague of flies would be unduly anticipated; (5) Because the Talmudists use the word kinsiam in the singular number to mean a louse; as it is said (Shabb. xiv, 107, b), "As is the man who slays a camel on the Sabbath, so is he who slays a louse on the Sabbath." (Smith). "The entomologists, Kirby and Spence, place these minute but disgusting insects in the very front rank of those which inflict direct injury upon man. A teratologist, for example, lists them among the ravages of this and closely allied parasitic pests. They remark that, for the quelling of human pride, and to pull down the high conceits of mortal man, this most loathsome of all maladies, or one equally disgusting, has been introduced into the earth from the east, the west, and the mighty; and in the list of those that have fallen victims to it, you will find poets, philosophers, prelates, princes, kings, and emperors. It seems more particularly to have been a judgment of God upon oppression and tyranny, whether civil or religious. Thus the inhuman Pharaoh mentioned by Herodotus, Antiochus Epiphanes, the dictator Sylla, the two Herods, the emperor Maximin, and, not to mention more, the persecutor of the Protestants, Philip the Second, were carried off by it." (Introd. to Entomol. vol. iv). The Egyptian plague might also have been somewhat like that dreadful disease common in Poland, and known as plica Polonica, in which the hair becomes matted together in the most disgusting manner, and is infested with swarms of vermin. Each hair is highly sensitive, bleeds at the root on the least violence, and if but slightly pulled feels exquisite pain. Lafontaine, whom Herrmann calls a very exact describer, affirms that millions of lice appear on the wretched patient on the third day of this disease (Mem. Aperon. p. 78). These insects form the order Anoplaria of Leach, and Parasitina of Latreille. Most mammals are infested by them, and probably all, and probably all, are infested by them; each beast and bird, as is stated, having its own proper species of louse, and sometimes two or more. Three distinct species make the human body their abode." See Lice.

Licean, the name given to the liberty and warrant to preach.

(1.) In the Presbyterian Church it is regularly conferred by the Presbytery on those who have passed satisfactorily through the prescribed curriculum of study. When a student has fully completed his course of study at the theological hall, he is taken on trial for the licence by the Presbytery to which he belongs. These trials consist of an examination on the different subjects taught in the theological hall, his personal religion, and his motives for seeking to enter the ministerial office. He also delivers a lecture on a passage of Scripture, a homily, an exercise and additions, a popular sermon, and an exegesis; and, lastly, he is examined on Church History, Hebrew and Greek, and on divinity generally. It is the duty of the Presbytery to criticise each of these by itself, and sustain or reject it separately, as a part of the series of trials, and then, when the trials are completed, to pass a judgment on the whole by a regular vote. If the trials are sustained, the candidate is required to answer the questions in the formula, and, after prayer, is licensed and authorized to preach the Gospel of Christ, and exercise his gifts as a probationer for the holy ministry, of which license a regular certificate is given if required. He is simply a layman or lay candidate for the clerical office, preaching, but not dispensing the sacraments. See Oath.

(2.) In the Methodist churches it is conferred on laymen who are believed to be competent for this office, and it is from persons thus brought into the ministry [see Lay Preaching] that the Church is supplied with ministers. See Local Preachers; Licentiate.

Lichteneberg, Johann Conrad, a German theologian, was born at Darmstadt Dec. 9, 1669. In 1707 he entered the University of Giessen, and then attended successively those of Jena, Leipsic, and Halle; in the latter he finished his academic course in 1711. Soon after he accepted a call as vicar to Neun-Kirchen, in the grand-duchy of Hesse; in 1716 he became pastor of the same place; in 1719, pastor of Upper Hamstadt; in 1738, metropolitan of the diocese of the balinvelt Lichteneberg; in 1745, tutor at Daniel's College, and examiner of teachers; and in 1749, superintendent. He died July 17, 1751. His knowledge was extensive, embracing not only theology, but also mathematics and physics. Astronomical studies, especially, had a lasting interest for him; the latter he knew skilfully how to weave into his sermons in a simple and popular manner, thus captivating the attention of the audience. He contributed largely to Church music. The various books which he composed are all of an ascetical character; we only mention Texte zur Kirchenuuskii (Darmst. 1719, 1720, 8vo); Ermuternde Stimmen aus Zion (Ibid. 1722, 8vo); Gesehliche Betrachtungen über gewisse in den Evangelien enthaltene Materien (Ibid. 1721, 8vo). — Döring, Geschichte Theol. Lie (Yād, Ḥādāq), an intentional violation of truth. In Scripture we find the word used to designate all the ways in which mankind denotes or alters truth in word or deed, as also evil in general. In general the term is used as the evil in deed, evil in action, or lie, and consequently the devil (being the contrary to God) as the father of lies, and liars or impious persons as children of the devil. Hence the Scriptures most expressly condemn lies (John viii, 44; 1 Tim. i, 9; Rom. xiii, 8; Heb. iv, 10; Rev. xx, 6), and Christ's comment on the lie said that all men are liars, it is synonymous with saying that all are bad. The Bible nowhere admits of praising, praiseworthy, or pious lies, yet it recommends not to proclaim the truth when its proclamation might prove injurious. Hence Christ commands (Matt. vii, 6)
The evil and injustice of lying appear, 1. From its being a breach of the natural and universal right of mankind to truth in the intercourse of speech. 2. From its being a violation of God's sacred law (Phil. iv., 8; Lev. xix., 11; Col. iii., 9). 3. The faculty of speech was bestowed as an instrument of knowledge, not of deceit; to communicate our thoughts, not to hide them. 4. It is esteemed a mark of nobility to speak the truth in levity, or to do others good, or to glorify God, Christ ever spoken an uncle. Truth, on the contrary, denied both Christ by word in the moment of danger (Matt. xxvi., 69 sq.; Mark xiv., 66 sq.; Luke xxii., 56 sq.; John xviii., 17 sq.) and his apostles, e.g. by his very Body in Acts xii., 15. But Paul, in Acts xxviii., 5, made use of an implication to clear himself, or, at any rate, concealed part of the truth in order to create dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees, and thus save himself. Strict truthfulness requires that we should never alter the truth, either in words or actions, so as to deceive others, whether it be for pleasure, or to benefit others or ourselves, or even for the best cause. Yet, although there can, absolutely considered, be no injurious truth, it is not expedient to tell all truth to those who are not able to receive or comprehend it. Then evil might result from the attempt to communicate the truth to children, to persons full of error and prejudice, to counterfeiters, spies, etc. But this does not imply that we may tell them that which is not true, only that we are to remain silent when we perceive that the truth would be useless, or might result in inflicting injury on ourselves or others. Of course, it is utterly impossible to adjudge, as this is positive lying, and indeed, by its calling on God, becomes diabolical lying, the Father of truth being invoked to confirm a lie, and the highest attribute of man, his consciousness of God, is made use of to deceive others, and to gain an advantage. See Oaths. But there are varieties of untruthfulness which do not belong to the domain of ethics, but to aesthetics. Such are parables, jests in word or deed, tales and fables, the usual formulas of politeness, mimicry (εἰσώροπος), etc., which are not calculated to deceive. But the aesthetic untruthfulness or suppression of the truth can also be abused. In morals, however, all depends on the improvement of conscience, and a correct, firm consciousness of God's presence and knowledge. These cannot be obtained by mere commandments or moral formulas, but by strengthening the moral sense, fortifying the will, by justifying and sanctifying the moral power. Morality is an inner life; those only can be called liars who willfully oppose the truth by word or deed, or by conscious untruthfulness seek to lead others into error or sin; in short, to injure them physically, or, as regards a sacred matter, "necessity". Lies, they also are condemned by the God of all truth; nor even in this world of imperfection, where there are so many ingenious illusions, is there any just occasion for their use. That truthfulness is a limited duty must necessarily be conceded, since the non-expression of the truth is in itself a limitation of it. The Bible mentions instances of lies in good men, but without approving them, as that of Abraham (Gen. xii., 12; xx, 2), Isaac (Gen. xxvi.), Jacob (Gen. xxvi.), the Hebrew midwives (Exod. i., 15–19), Michael (1 Sam. xix., 14 sq.), David (1 Sam. xx., etc.)—Kehrl, Neust. Wörterbuch.

There are various kinds of lies. 1. The pernicious lie, uttered for the hurt or disadvantage of our neighbor. 2. The officious lie, uttered for our own or our neighbor's advantage. 3. The ludicrous and jocose lie, uttered by word of jest, and only for mirth's sake in common conversation. 4. Pious frauds, as they are improperly called, pretended inspirations, forged books, counterfeit miracles, are species of lies. 5. Lies of the conduct, for a lie may be told in gestures as well as in words; as when a tradesman shuts up his windows to induce his creditors to believe that he is abroad. 6. Lies of omission, as when an author willfully omits what ought to be related; and may we not add, 7. That all equivocation and mental reservation come under the guilt of lying?
existence, as opposed to death and non-existence (Gen. ii, 7; xxvii, 7; Luke xvi, 26; Acts xvi, 25; 1 Cor. iii, 19; 2 Cor. v, 17; James i, 21; Rev. iii, 11; xi, 16; xvii, 3). See LONGEVITY. The ancients generally entertained the idea that the vital principle (which they appear to have denoted by the term spirit, in distinction from the soul itself, comp. 1 Thess. v, 26) resided particularly in the blood, which, on that account, the Jews were wont to use as food (Lev. xix, 11). See BLOOD. Other terms occasionally rendered "life" in the Scriptures are:

(1) nepheh, a living creature,

(2) *psinn, a day, i.e. a lifetime, biouc (lifetime), xwirima (breath, i.e. spirit), psqri (soul, or animating principle).

The term life is also used more or less figuratively in the Scriptures for the spiritual life (i.e. existence, life, absolutely and without end, immortality (Heb. vii, 16). So also "tree of life," or of immortality, which preserves from death (Rev. ii, 7; xii, 2, 14; Gen. ii, 9; iii, 22); "bread of life" (John vi, 35, 51); "way of life" (Psa. xxi, 11; Acts ii, 29); "water of life," i.e. living fountains of water, perennial (Rev. vii, 17); crown of life, the reward of eternal life (James i, 12; Rev. ii, 10). See BOOK; BREAD; CROWN; FOUNTAIN; TREES, etc. (2) The manner of life, conduct, in a moral respect; "rightness of living" (Rom. vi, 4); "the life of God," i.e. the life which God enjoins a goodly soul (Eph. iv, 18; 2 Pet. i, 9). (3) The concept of "life" as the opposite of death, or the holiness and happiness of salvation procured by the Saviour's death. In this sense, life or eternal life is the antithesis of death or condemnation. Life is the image of all good, and is therefore employed to express it (Deut. xxv, 15; John iii, 16, 17, 18, 36; v, 24, 38, 40; vi, 47; viii, 51; xi, 26; Rom. v, 12, 18; 1 John v, 11); death is the consummation of evil, and so it is frequently used as a strong expression in order to designate every kind of evil, whether temporal or spiritual (Jer. xxxi, 8; Ezek. xviii, 26; xxxiii, 11; Rom. i, 28; vi, 21; vii, 5, 10, 13, 24; John vi, 50, viii, 31). (4) Life is also used for eternal life, i.e. the life of bliss and glory in the kingdom of God which awaits the true disciples of Christ (Matt. xix, 16, 17; John iii, 15; 1 Tim. iv, 8; Acts v, 29; Rom. vi, 17; 1 Pet. iii, 7; 2 Tim. i, 1). (5) The term life is also used of God and Christ or the Word, as the absolute source and cause of all life (John i, 4, 5; v, 26, 39; xi, 23; xii, 50; xiv, 6; xviii, 8, Col. iii, 4; 1 John i, 1, 2; 20). See DEATH.

LIFE EVERLASTING. See ETERNAL LIFE; FUTURE LIFE.

Lift (prop. N.T., diph) besides having the general sense of raising, is used in several peculiar phrases in Scripture. To lift up the hands is, among the Orientals, a part of the ceremony of greeting an oath: "I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord," says Abraham (Gen. xxiv, 22): "I will bring you into the land concerning which I lift up my hand" (Exod. vi, 8), which I promised with an oath. To lift up one's hand against any one to attack him to fight him (2 Sam. xviii, 25; 2 Kings xi, 9). To lift up one's feet in the presence of any one to appear boldly in his presence (2 Sam. ii, 22; Ezra ix, 6. (See also Job x, 15; xi, 15). To lift up one's hands, eyes, soul, or heart unto the Lord are expressions describing the sentiments and emotions of one who prays earnestly or desires a thing with ardor.

Lifters and ANTILIFTERS, a name given to the opening of the 18th century to the congregations at Killermossack, in the west of Scotland, who, according to Sir John Sinclair, differed on the patrimonial question whether the manor for the military and other purposes, the patent of his hand the plate of bread before its distribution in the Lord's Supper, the Lifters holding this to be essential, the others regarding it as of no moment. They were also called New Lights, and the others Old Lights, terms that have been applied in other cases somewhat analogously. [See SINCLAIR, Henry, 161; quoted from Sinclair, Words, ix, 375-6; Williams, Religious Encyclopedia, s. v., v. 14*.

Light (properly 'vin, br, `aw, from its shining) is represented in the Scriptures as the immediate result and offspring of a divine command (Gen. i, 3), where doubtless we have a reference to the celestial luminaries, still partially obscured by the haze that settled as a pall over the grave of nature at some tremendous cataclysm which well-nigh reduced the globe to its pristine chaos, rather than their actual formation, although they are subsequently introduced (Gen. ii, 14 sq.). In consequence of the intense brilliance and beneficial influence of light in an Eastern climate, it easily and naturally became, with Orientals, a representative of the highest human good. From this idea the transition was an easy one, in corrupt and superstitious minds, to the granting of the great light of the external, i.e. natural, world (Job xxxi, 26, 27). See ADORATION. This 'illuminity' the Hebrews not only avoided, but when they considered the heavens they recognised the work of God's fingers, and learnt a lesson of humility as well as of reverence (Psa. viii, 3 sq.). On the contrary, the entire residue of the East, with scarcely any exception, worshipped the sun and the light, primarily, perhaps, as symbols of divine power and divine brightness in the material state, as themselves divine; whence, in conjunction with darkness, the negation of light, arose the doctrine of dualism, two principles, the one of light, the good power, the other of darkness, the evil power, a corruption which rose and spread the more easily because the whole of human life, being a checkered scene, seems divided as between two conflicting agencies, the bright and the dark, the joyous and the sorrowful, what is called prosperous and what is called adverse. But in the Scriptures the purer symbolism is everywhere maintained (see Memphite, Symbol, Decal., s. v.). "All the more joyous emotions of the mind, all the pleasing sensations of the frame, all the happy hours of domestic intercourse, were habitually described among the Hebrews under imagery derived from light (1 Kings xi, 36; Isa. liviii, 8, 9; Ezek. viii, 16; Psa. xcvii, 11). The transition was natural from earth to heavenly, from corporeal to spiritual things, and so light came to typify true religion and the felicity which it imparts. But as light not only came from God, but also makes man's way clear before him, so it was employed to signify moral truth, and pre-eminently to symbolize the system of truth which the light of the Gentiles is brought to the Gentiles, from its earliest gleanings onward to the perfect day of the great sun of righteousness. The application of the term to religious topics had the greater propriety because the light in the world, being accompanied by hostile confederacies, enriching the world's darkness, is the peculiar province of true religion to produce in the human soul (Isa. xlii, 20, Matt. xvi, 16; Psa. cxix, 105; 2 Pet. i, 19; Eph. vi, 8; 2 Tim. i, 10; 1 Pet. ii, 9)."

Besides its physical sense (Matt. xii, 2; Acts ix, 8, xii, 7; 2 Cor. iv, 6), the term light is used by metonymy for a fire giving light (Mark xiv, 54; Luke xxii, 56); for a torch, candle, or lamp (Acts xvi, 29); for the material light of heaven, as the sun, moon, or stars (Psa. cxxvii, 7; James i, 17). In figurative language it signifies a manifest or open state of things (Matt. x, 25; Luke xiii, 3), and in a higher sense the eternal source of truth, purity, and joy (1 John i, 5). God is said to dwell in light inaccessible (1 Tim. vi, 16), which seems to contain a reference to the glory and splendor that shone in the holy of holies, where Jehovah appeared in the luminosity of the shekinah, or cloud of glory, which was none but the high-priest, and he only once a year, was permitted to approach (Lev. xvi, 2; Ezek. i, 22, 26, 28). This light was typical of the glory of the celestial world. See SHEKHINAH. Light itself is employed to signify the celestia laws, rules, or directions that proceeds from the ruling powers for the good of their subjects. Thus of the great king of all the earth the Psalmist says, "Thy word is a light unto my path" (Ps. cxix. 105), and "Thy judgments are as the light" (Hos. vi. 5). Agreeably to the notion of lights being the symbols of good government, light also signifies protection, deliverance, and joy. Light not only signifies illumination and knowledge, but of spiritual life, health, and joy to the souls of men (Isa. lx. 1). "Among the personifications on this point which Scripture presents we may specify, (1.) God. The apostle James (i. 17) declares that "every good and perfect gift cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variability, neither shadow of turning;" obviously referring to the faithfulness of God and the constancy of his goodness, which shine on undimmed and unshadowed. So Paul (1 Tim. vi. 16), "God who dwelleth in the light which no man can approach unto." Here the idea involved in the imagery is the incomprehensibleness of the self-existent and eternal God. (2.) Light is also applied to Christ: "The people that sat in darkness have seen a great light" (Matt. iv. 16; Luke ii. 32; John i, 46 sq.). "He was the true light;" I John i, 5, 6 sq.) He is the "Light of the world," by pointing the way to his followers (John viii. 12). (3.) It is further used of angels, as in 2 Cor. xi. 14; "Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light." (4.) Light is moreover employed of men: John the Baptist "was a burning and a shining light" (John v. 35); also Acts xiii. 47; Eph. vi. 5." See LIGHT.

Light, George C., a Methodist episcopal minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Va., Feb. 28, 1785. In 1792 his father removed to Kentucky, and in 1799 to Ohio, where in 1806 he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1804 the son was converted at a camp-meeting; in 1806 he entered the itinerant ministry in the Western Conference, and in 1807 he was ordained deacon. Locating after his marriage in 1808, he was employed as a surveyor till 1822, when he entered the Kentucky Conference. From this time until 1859 he labored actively as an itinerant preacher, filling the most important appointments in Kentucky, Illinois, and Mississippi. He died Feb. 27, 1859. Mr. Light was held to be one of the most eloquent and useful ministers in the West during many years. No man of his day, it is thought, had greater control over the popular mind.—Camp, Sketch of the Rev. G. C. Light (Nashville, 1860).

Lightfoot, John (1), D.D., a noted English divine and hebrast, was born at Stoke-upon-Trent in 1602. He was educated first at a grammar-school at Morton Green, in Cheshire, and afterwards at Cambridge. He was remarkable, at Cambridge and afterwards, for his eloquence and his proficiency in Latin and Greek. Quitting the university, he became assistant at the well-known school of Repton, in Derbyshire. A year or two after he entered into orders, and settled at Norton-under-Hales, in Shropshire, where he began the study of the Hebrew, which ripened into the most familiar and consummate knowledge of the whole range of Biblical and Rabbinical literature. In 1627 he accepted the cure of Stone, in Staffordshire. Two years later he removed to Horsley, in order to be near the library of Sion College, and later accepted the rectory of Ashford, in Staffordshire. Here he remained during the turbulent years which led to the death of Charles I, the establishment of the Commonwealth, and the temporary subversion of the Church of England. During the civil war he was identified with the Presbyterians, and became a member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, where he displayed great courage and ability in all the learning in opposition to the doctrines of the divines were endeavoring to establish. While in London he was minister of St. Bartholomew's. In 1658 he was presented by Parliament with the living of Great Munden, in Hertfordshire. In 1653 he entered upon the office of vice-chancellor of Cambridge, to which he was chosen that year, having taken the degree of doctor in divinity in 1652. The living of Great Munden was given to Dr. Lightfoot by Parliament, and upon the restoration of Charles II it was bestowed upon another person. Through the influence of Sheldon, then bishop of London, Lightfoot was, however, reinstated in his living, as well as confirmed in the mastership of Catharine Hall, which he had offered to resign, having previously complied with the terms of the Act of Uniformity. Through the influence of Sir Orlando Bridgeman he was appointed to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Ely, where he died peaceably, Dec. 6, 1675. Lightfoot was a very learned Hebraist for his time, but he was not free from the unscientific crotchets of the period, holding, for example, the inspiration of the vowel-points, etc. He has done good service to theologians, by pointing out the connection between the Talmudical and Midrashic writings and the New Testament, which, to a certain extent, is only to be understood by illustrations from the anterior and contemporaneous religious literature (Chambers). His object at first was "to produce one great and perfect work—a harmony of the four evangelists, with apparatus critical and chronological," (Kittto). Lightfoot's works are: Erubin, or Miscellanies, Christian and Judicial (1629);—A few and new Observations upon the Book of Genesis (1642).—A Hundred of Gleanings out of the Book of Exodus (1643):—The Harmony of the four Gospels, by comparing and explaining them with each other (1644):—A Commentary upon the Acts of the Apostles (1645):—The Temple Service in the Days of our Saviour (1649).—The Harmony, 3d part (1649):—The Temple (1650):—Horn Hebræorum et Talmudica Expositio. 2 vols. (1656), etc., upon the Gospel of St. Mark (1661; new ed. by Rev. R. Gadwell, Oxf. 1859, 4 vols. 8vo):—Jerush and Talmudical Expositions upon St. Luke:—Jerush, etc., upon St. John:—Horn Hébræorum, etc., Acts of the Apostles:—Horn, etc.; upon the first Epistle to the Corinthians: During the latter years of his life he contributed valuable assistance to the authors of Walton's Polyglott Bible, Calvin's Heptaglot Lexicon, and Pool's Synopsis Criticorum. His works were published entirely, (1) with a preface by Dr. Bright and a life by the editor, John Strype, at London in 1864 (2 vols. fol.); (2) at Amsterdam in 1866 (2 vols. fol.); (3) at Utrecht, by John Le floch, and Amsterdam (vols. fol.); and (4) by Pitman, at London, in 1822-25 (13 vols. 8vo), which is the best edition, and contains a very elaborate biography of Lightfoot. Dr. Adam Clarke says in Biblical criticism I consider Lightfoot the first of all English writers; and in his works he includes his learning, his judgment, and his usefulness." Lightfoot, John (2), an English divine and botanist, was born in Gloucestershire in 1785. He was educated for the Church, became chaplain to the Duke of Devonshire, and attained the livings of Sheldon and Gotham. He also devoted himself specially to the study of botany, and, in company with Pennant, explored the Hebrides about 1772, and published in 1777 a valuable "Flora of Scotland" ("Flora Scotica," 2 vols.), with excellent figures. He died in 1789. — Thomas, "Biographical Dictionary," p. 1482.

Job xxxvi, 26; xxxviii, 25. Travellers state that in Syria lightnings are frequent in the autumnal months. Seldom a night passes without a great deal of thunder, which is sometimes accompanied by thunder and sometimes not. A squall of wind and clouds of dust are the usual accompaniments of the first, rain of the latter. To these natural phenomena the sacred writers frequently allude. In directing their energies, "the Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet; the mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence; his fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him" (Nah. i, 3-4). The terrors of the divine wrath are often represented by thunder and lightning; and thunders, on account of its awful impression on the minds of mortals, is also spoken of in the "Song of the Lord" (Ps. cxxvii, 7; cxvii, 6; 2 Sam. xxi, 15; Job xxxvi, 26; xxxvi, 4; 5; xxxviii, 25; xl, 9; Zech. ix, 14; Rev. iv, 5; xvi, 18-21). On account of the fire attending their light, they are the symbols of edicts enforced with destruction to those who oppose them, or who hinder others from giving obedience to them (Ps. cxvii, 6; Zech. ix, 14; Ps. xcvii, 14; Rev. iv, 5; xvi, 18). Thunders and lightnings, when they proceed from the throne of God (as in Rev. iv, 5), are fit representations of God's glorious and awful majesty; but when fire comes down from heaven upon the earth, it expresses some past or present action of God in the world (as in Rev. xx, 9). The voices, thunders, lightnings, and great hail, in Rev. xvi, 18-21, are interpreted expressly of an exceeding great plague, so that men blasphemed on account of it (see Wemenes, "Symb. Dict."

Lights. 1. The use of artificial light in baptism was practiced in the Church at an early day, although it was opposed in this instance as its use for communion service, etc. But where it was used it was the practice, in addition to the ceremony of putting on white garments at baptism, to place lighted tapers in the hands of the baptized. Gregory Nazianzen says: "The station where, immediately after baptism, thou shalt be placed before the altar, is an emblem of the glory of the life to come; the pomegranate with which thou shalt be received is a foretaste of the hymns and praises of a better life; and the oil in which thou shalt bathe, a figure of those lamps of faith wherewith bright and virgin souls shall go forth to meet the Bridegroom." Others say that the lamp was designed to be a symbol of their own illumination, and to remind the candidates of the works of Christ, which, however fine that thought may be, may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." In some baptisms the attendants were clothed in white, and carried tapers. At the baptism of the younger Theodosius, the leaders of the people were all clothed in white, and all the senators and men of quality carried lamps. Lighted candles were, according to St. Jerome (Epist. cont. Vigintil. cap. 3; comp. also Cave, Prin. Christ. lib. i, c. 7, p. 208), sometimes used in the Eastern churches before the advent of the Gospel was received to design the show of those who received the glad tidings, and also to be a symbol of the light of truth. The lighting of candles on the communion table is observed only in the Romish Church. See Farrar, "Eccles. Dictionary," s. v.; Bingham, "Antiquities of the Christ. Church," bk. xii, ch. iv, sect. 2; Horsley, "Chaldee, Vulg." (1831), p. 85; Herzog, "Real-Encyklop. vili, 517 sq.; Asbach, "Kirchen-Lexikon," iii, 769 (Kerzen). See Candles.

2. Lights were employed by the Apostolic Church, but for no other purpose than to obviate the inconvenience of work in the church, and to prevent the temple from use as a matter of religion, or, rather, of superstition, is of far less ancient date, although it has been defended as a primitive custom, and might, of course, be traced even to Jewish antiquity, if such a precedent were esteemed of any value. In all probability, artificial light was used during the daytime, and for a symbolical purpose, about the 4th century, if we accept the statement of St. Paulinus, bishop of Sola (A.D. 385-431), who, speaking of the great numbers of wax-lights which burned about the altar, makes the statement more splendid than the day itself was made more glorious by the same means: "Nocte dieque micuet. Sic nos splendore dicit Fulget: et ipsa diece celasti illustri horae. Plus minus luminaria lacerum gentium lumen est." (Paulin., Nat. iii, 3. Pollic."

(Come also Isidore, "Orig., viii, 12.") But this custom was severely condemned by many. Comp. Lamps.

III. The practice of lighting candles on the altar, which prevailed, and still prevails in the Romish Church, was abolished in England at the Reformation. Those candles which (according to one of the Injunctions of Edward VI, set forth in 1547) have been suffered to remain upon the Lord's table are sometimes designated with the coldcock (Greek colda), or coldcock (Elda). But it is to be noticed that no lights are ever used in the English churches, only candles, which are never lighted, the lighting of any such candles at an evening service being merely for a necessary purpose. Ligu-alo (only in the plur. pl. alui, kalui, Numh. xxiv, 6. Sept. acapi, Vulg. tabernaculam; Prov. vii, 17. Sept. alou, Vulg. ater, A. V. "aloe"; or fem. alouha, alouha, Ps. xiv, 8. Sept. acapi, Vulg. gutta, A. V. "aloe;"); Cant. iv, 4, dawo, alu, "aloes," a kind of perfume which interpreters have by common consent regarded as derived from some Oriental tree, and compared with the coldcock (Gk. colda, L. Elda), described by Dioscorides (i, 21) in the following terms: "It is a wood brought from India and Arabia, resembling thyme-wood, compact, fragrant, astrigent to the taste, with great bitterness; having a skin-like bark. . . . It is burned for frankincense." Pliny likewise speaks of it as being derived from the same region (Nat, Hist. xxvii, 5). Later writers, as Orobiasus, etius, and P. Regineta, mention it, but give no further description. Arabic authors, however, as Rhases, Narsier, and others, were well acquainted with the substance of which they describe several varieties, and the Latin translator of Avicenna (llii, 132) gives "agalochoom," "xyloch," and "lixgium aloe," as equivalent to the aghlajum, aghulakib, and si of the text. Royle ("Illustr. of Talm. Bot. p. 171") has traced the same substance in the "aggar," a famous aromatic wood obtained in the island of Socotra, or Somber, in India under three names: 1, aod-i-kima; 2, a variety procured from Surat, but not differing essentially from 3, aod-i-kimari, said to come from China, doubtless the olearium of Avicenna. Garcia las Hosto (Clusiis, Zoot. Nat, viii, 1790), writing on this subject near Surat, says that "it is called in Malacca garo, but the choicest sort lobocano." Paul a Bartholin (in Vossaraca, p. 205) likewise distinguishes three sorts, "one common, very odoruous, and of great price, called agkili; the black, which is termed kar-agkili or kal-agam; the third, producing a flower, named marami, properly menagaliyun or malagandiyugil."

There is considerable confusion among naturalists in their attempts to identify the exact species from which each which yields the far-scented wood. "Dr. Roxburgh states that agur or agur is the Sanscrit name of the incense or aloë-wood, which in Hindostan is called agur, and in Persian ad-khud, and that there is little doubt that the real calumbre, or agullochum, is the same. It is yielded by an immense tree, a native of the mountainous tracts east of and southeast from Silhet, in about 24° N. latitude. This plant, he says, cannot be distinguished from Thriving plants, exactly of the same age, of the Gara de Malacca, received from that place, and growing in the garden of Calcutta. He further states that small quantities of agullochum are sometimes imported into Calcutta by sea from the eastward, but that such is always deemed inferior to that of Silhet (Flora Ind. ii, 423). The Gara de Malacca was first described by Lamarck (Encyclopédie Méthodique, 47 sep), from a specimen presented to him by Somar, as that of the tree which yielded the bois d'âne of commerce. Lamarck named this tree Aquilaria Malaccensis, which Cavanilles afterwards changed unnecessarily to Aquilaria ovata. As Dr. Roxburgh found that his plant belonged to the same genus, he named it Agullochum, but it is a cinnamomum Agullock in his Flora India, probably by an oversight. He is of opinion that the Agullochum secundarium of Rumphius (Herb. Amb. ii, 34, t. 10), which that author received under the name of Agullochum Malaccensis, also belongs to the same genus, as well as the Styrax of Kempfer (Am. Ecol. p. 303), and the Oxypermum sinense of Loureiro. This last-named missionary describes a third plant, which he names Abeyzium agullochum, representing it as a tall tree growing in the lofty mountains of Champa, belonging to Cochini China, about 13° of N. lat., near the great river Lavum, and producing calumbre (Flora Cochii Cinensis, edit. Wildenow, i, 327). This tree, belonging to the class and order Decandria monogynia of Linneus, and the natural family of Leguminosae, has always been admitted as one of the trees yielding agullochum. But as Loureiro himself confesses that he had only once seen a cutiated branch of the tree in flower, which, by long carriage, had the petals, anthers, and stigmas much bruised and torn, it is not impossible that this may also belong to the genus Aquilaria, especially as his tree agrees in so many points with that described by Dr. Roxburgh. Rumphius has described and figured a third plant, which he named Arbor excorces, from 'Blindhout,' in consequence of its acrid juice destroying sight, whence the generic name of Excexaria; the specific one of agullochum he applied because its wood is similar to, and often substituted for, agullochum, and he states that it was sometimes exported as such to Europe, and even to China. This tree, the Excexaria agullochum, of the Linnean class and order Dicotyti triandra, and the natural family of Euphorbiaceae, is also very common in the deep of the forest, where it is called Aglia; 'but the wood-cutter of the Sunderbundes,' Dr. Roxburgh says, 'who are the people best acquainted with the nature of this tree, report the pale, white, milky juice thereof to be highly acrid and very dangerous.' The only use made of the tree, as far as Dr. Roxburgh could learn, was for charcoal and firewood. Agolla is part of any sort is, he believed, never found in this tree, which is often the only one quoted as that yielding agila-wood; but, notwithstanding the negative testimony of Dr. Roxburgh, it may, in particular circumstances, as stated by Rumphius, yield a substitute for that fruit and long-famed wood.

In Arabic authors numerous varieties of agullochum are mentioned (Celsus, Hierobot, p. 143). Persian authors mention only three: 1. Aod-i-kind; that is, the Indian; 2. Aod-i-chini, or Chinese kind (probably that from Cochini China); 3. Suvandari, a term generally applied to things brought from sea, which may have reference to the inferior variety from the Indian islands. In old works, such as those of Balmus and Ray, three kinds are also mentioned: 1. Agullochum praesiantissimum, also called Calumbre; 2. A. Officinalis, or Polo de Agula or Linschoten; 3. A. Nyctare, or Agula braua. But, besides these varieties, obtained from different localities, perhaps from different plants, there are also distinct varieties, obtainable from the same plant. Thus, in a MS. account by Dr. Roxburgh, to which Dr. Hope had access, is stated, in a letter from R. K. Dick, at Silhet, that four different qualities may be obtained from the same tree: 1st, Ghurki, which sinks in water, and sells from 12 to 16 rupees per seer of 2 lbs; 2d, Doin, 6 to 8 rupees per seer; 3d, Simile, which floats in water, 3 to 4 rupees; and, 4th, Cheryn, which is in small pieces, and also floats in water, from 1 to 12 rupees per seer, and that sometimes 80 lbs. of these four kinds may be obtained from one tree. All these turgyn-trees, as they are called, do not produce theogur, nor does every part of even the most productive tree. The natives cut into the wood until they observe dark-colored veins yielding the perfume; these guide them to the place containing the ogur, which generally extends but a short way through the centre of the trunk or branch. An essence, or attar, is obtained by bruising the wood in a mortar, and then infusing it in boiling water, when the perfume floats on the surface. Early decay does not seem incident to all kinds of agullochum, for we possess specimens of the wood gorped with fragrant resin (Illustr. Hym. Bot. p. 173) which show no symptoms of it, but still it is stated that the wood is sometimes buried in the earth. This may be for the purpose of increasing its specific gravity. A large specimen in the museum of the East-India House displays a cancelled structure in which the resonous parts remain, the rest of the wood having been removed, apparently by decay. Notwithstanding the uncertainty respecting the identity of some of the above-described varieties, we have, at all events, two trees ascertained as yielding this fragrant wood—one, Aquilaria agullochum, a native of Silhet, and the other A. ovata or Malaccestis, a native of Malacca, although it is still not clear that they are anything more than local variations of the same species. The former is described as a magnificent tree, growing to the height of 120 feet, being 12 feet in girth. 'The bark of the trunk is smooth and sub-colored, that of the branches gray and lightly striped with brown. The wood is white, and very light and soft. It is totally without smell, and the leaves, bark, and flowers are equally inodorous' (Script. Herb. p. 298). The fragrance appears to reside wholly in the resin deposited in the pores, and is developed by heat. Both plants belong to the liana class and to the genus Agallochum, and the natural family of Aquilariae.

"It is extremely interesting to find that the Malay name of the substance in question, which is agala, is so little different from the akhalim of the Hebrew; not more, indeed, than may be observed in many well-known words, where the meaning of one language is turned into the aspirate in another. It is therefore probable that it was by the name agala (aghl in Rosenmüller, Biblical. Bot. p. 224) that this wood was first known in commerce, being conveyed across the bay of Bengal to the island of Ceylon or the peninsula of India, which the Arab traders regarded as the most remote periods, and where they obtained the early-known spices and precious stones of India. It is not a little curious that captain Hamilton (Account of the East Indies, i, 68) mentions it by the name of agala, an odoriferous wood at Muscat. We know that the Portuguese, when they reached the eastern coast from the peninsula, obtained it under this name, whence they called it pau d'agala, or eagle-wood, which is the origin of the generic name Agaliarix.

"It must be confessed, however, that, notwithstanding all that has been written to prove the identity of the akhalim-trees with the aloe-wood of commerce, and notwithstanding the apparent connection of the Hebrew word with the Arabic aghalajin and the Greek agallochon, the opinion is not clear of difficulties. In the first place, in the passage for which the analogy, 'as the akhalim which Jehovah hath planted,' is an argument against the identification with the Aquilaria agallochum. The Sept. seem to have read בַּשָּׂדֵת, kalaim, tent; and they are followed by the Vulg., the Syriac, the Arabic, and some other versions. If this is not the true reading—and the context is against it—then if akhalim be the word here, we must make it a synonym. But Balsam is speaking of trees concerning which, in their growing state, he could have known nothing at all. Rosenmüller (Schol. in T. T. ad Numb. xxiv, 6) allows that this tree is not found in Arabia, but thinks that Balsam might have become acquainted with it from the merchants. Perhaps the prophet might have seen the wood. But the passage in Numbers manifestly implies that he had seen the akhalim growing, and that in all probability they were some kind of trees sufficiently known to the Israelites to enable them to understand the allusion in its full force. But if the akhalim be the agallochum, then much of the illustration would have been lost to the people who were the subject of the prophecy; for the Ag. agallochum is found neither on the banks of the Euphrates, where Balsam lived, nor in Mesopotamia. The word was an equivocal one (Scape p. 34, 85) believes the Sept. reading to be the correct one, though he sees no difficulty, but rather a beauty, in supposing that Balsam was drawing a similitude from a tree of foreign growth. He confesses that the parallelism of the verse is more in favor of the tree than the tent; but he objects that the liana-aloes should be mentioned before the cedars, the parallelism requiring, he thinks, the inverse order. But this is hardly a valid objection, for what tree was held in greater estimation than the cedar? And even if akhalim be the Ag. agallochum, yet the latter clause of the verse does no violence to the law of parallelism, for of the two trees the cedar 'is greater and more august.' Again, the passage in Psa. xlv, 8 would perhaps be more correctly translated thus: 'The myrrh, aloes, and cassia, perfuming all thy garments, brought from the ivory palaces of Lebanon, shall be thy crown.' The Minei, or Minei, were inhabitants of spicy Arabia, and carried on a great trade in the exportation of spices and perfumes (Plny, xii, 14, 16; Bochart, Phaleg, ii, 22, 136). As the myrrh and cassia are mentioned as coming from the Minei, and were doubtless natural productions of the country, the inference is that aloes, being named with them, were also a production of the same region."

Liguori, Alfonso Maria da, a Roman Catholic bishop, and founder of the Order of Redemptorists, was born Sept. 27, 1695, at Naples. He was descended from a noble family, and the son of a royal officer; from his mother, who was a fervid Catholic, he imbued in early childhood a glowing devotedness to the Church of Rome. Educated at an institution of the princely and ecclesiastical registry, he made such rapid progress that he obtained in the sixteenth year of his life the degree of LLD. In accordance with the wish of his parents he became a lawyer, but the loss of an important lawsuit so mortified him that he resolved to enter a priesthood. He overcame the violent opposition of his father, and took orders in 1725. Soon after he entered the Congregation of the Propaganda at Naples, and began to labor with great zeal for the religious awakening of the lower classes in Naples and the neighboring provinces. In order to enlargethis field of operations he concluded with the civil authorities a new religious congregation. The first house of the new congregation was established with the assistance of twelve companions at Scala; the chief task of the members was declared to be to devote themselves to the service of the poorest and most abandoned souls. Three years later another house was established at Cioniano, in the diocese of Salerno. The rule of the new congregation, which Liguori had drawn up with the assistance of several prominent men, was confirmed by a brief of pope Benedict XIV, dated Feb. 22, 1746, and Liguori was consecrated bishop of the new diocese of the same name. He was appointed assistant archbishop of Palermo, and his efforts in behalf of the suffering of his countrymen were rewarded by being made bishop of Cosenza. He was at this time a prelate of the first rank, and possessed an influence amounting to real power; but Liguori declared that all the superiors of the order should be elected in place of Liguori, but that the latter should appoint a vicar general to preside over the congregation in his place. The feeble state of his health repeatedly induced him to ask the pope to accept his resignation, but his wish was not granted until 1775. He retired to the house of his congregation at Noce'a de Pagani, where he spent the remainder of his life in composing theological and, in particular, ascetical works. In consequence of the intrigues of several prominent members of his order, and the government's inclination to official ecclesiastical matters, Michaelis, his biographer, says that Liguori, in order to save the rules of his order to be changed, was compelled to resign its supreme management. He died August 1, 1787.

In 1796 he received from Pius VI the title "Venerable," in 1816 he was beatified, and on May 28, 1839, was canonized by pope Gregory XVI. In 1871 Pius IX conferred upon him the title and rank of "Doctor Ecclesiae." Liguori was a very prolific writer, the best known among his works being the Theologia Morali (Naples, 3 vols.); — Homo Apostolicus (Venice, 1782, 3 vols.); — Instructio Catechetica (Bassano, 1768); — Praxis Confessarii. Complete editions of his works have been published at Paris (1856 sq., in 16 vols.), at Monza (70 vols.), and other places. His works have been translated into French and German, and, in great part, into English, Spanish, Polish, and other European languages. The principles of casuistry explained by Liguori have been rejected by the Church of Rome in favor of the school of the Roman Catholic theologians, and his moral theology, which is a modification of the so-called "probabilistic system" of the age immediately before his own, is largely used in the direction of consciences. Few writers in modern times have gone so far in the defence of the extreme ultra-papal theories and practices as Liguori, and, while his honesty and zeal are undoubted, he stands forth in the recent history of the Roman Church as a representative of the very worst tendencies of casuists. In the ordinary concerns of life, where there is no particular quarrel between bodies in the Church, he never elaborately teaches how falsehood and trickery between man and man may be most advantageously practiced, and how far cheating and stealing on the part of tradesmen and servants may be venially carried on, and without incurring mortal sin. See Connelly, Reasons for abjuring Allelopiance to the See of Rome (Lond. 1852). Tour. Qu. Rec. 1856, p. 396; Christian Remembr. 1854 (Jan.), p. 88; 1855 (Oct.), p. 407. Biographies of Liguori have been written by Giatanni (Vita del Beato A. J. Liguori, Rome, 1815), Jeanardi (Vie du C. A. Liguori, Louvain, 1829), Kieper (1845), Stahl (Stettin, 1853), and others. In English we have a very good biographical Life of St. A. M. de Liguori (London, 1848, 2 vols. 8vo). For an account of the religious order founded by Liguori, see Redemptorists. (A. J. S.) Lig'gure (לגיירה), le'shem, supposed to be from an old root preserved in the Arab., and signifying to taste) occurs but twice (Exod. xxviii, 19; xxxii, 12) as the name of the first stone in the third row on the high-priest's breastplate, where the Sacred Ark is (in general alluding to the above derivation), and is followed by the Vulg. liguria, as well as the A.V. So also Josephus (War, v, 57). "The word ligurie is unknown in modern mineralogy. Phillips (Mineralogy, p. 87) mentions ligurite, a mineral of which a number of species have been described. But the name is not now used, and is left to commemorate a tribe of Corsicans who are noted for their commerce with the ancients, and for their fertility. It occurs in a sort of talcose rock in the banks of a river in the Apennines." (Smith.)

The classical ligur (or λεγωρός) was thought to be a species of amber (see Moore, Anc. Min., p. 106), although ancient authors speak uncertainly respecting it. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxi, 11, 18; xxii, 11, 19; De lapid. c. 50), and assign a false derivation to the name (see Gesius, Theaur. Heb, p. 763). The Hebrew word has been thought to designate the same stone as the Jacinth (Braunius, De rebus sacris, ii, 14), although others adhere to the opal as corresponding better with the ancient ligure (Rosenmüller, Sekt, in Exod. xxviii, 19). "Dr. Woodward and some old commentators have supposed that it was some kind of balsam ite, because, as these fossils contain bituminous particles, they have thought that they have been able to detect, upon heating or rubbing, a smell resembling that of the amber. From the absurd origin of the name, the word Theophrastus (Frag. ii, 28, 81; xv, 2, edit. Schneider) and Pliny (H. N. xxviii, iii) ascribe to the ignemur. As to the belief that amber is denoted by this word, Theophrastus, in the passage cited above, has given a detailed description of the stone, and clearly distinguished it from the electric, or amber. Amber, moreover, is too soft for engraving upon, while the ignemur was a hard stone, out of which seals were made." See Gem. Beckmann (Hist. Inserat. i, 87, Bohn) believes, with Braun, Epiphanius, and J. de Laet, that the description of the ignemur agrees well with the jacinthus of modern mineralogists, especially that species which is described as being of an orange-yellow color, passing on into a redish-brown (see Rosenmüller, Bibl. Albert. iv, i, 28). The hyacinth is a variety of crystalline zircon, containing also iron, which usually gives it a reddish or brown color. It generally occurs in four-sided prisms terminated by four rhombic planes. It is diaphanous, glossy, and hard. It occurs in the beds of rivers, the best being brought from the West Indies, but is now little esteemed as a gem, although the ancients used it for engraving. "It is also observed in the position (that is, the same place) identical with the jacinth or hyacinth) Hill (Notes on Theophrastus on Stones, § 50, p. 166) and Rosenmüller (Mineral. of Bible, p. 36; Bib. Cod. agree. It must be confessed, however, that this opinion is far from satisfactory; for Theophrastus, speaking of the properties of the jacynth, says that it attracts not only light particles of wood, but fragments of iron and brass. Now there is no peculiar attractive power in the hyacinth; nor is Beckmann's explanation of this point sufficient. He says: 'If we consider its (the ignemur's) attracting of small bodies in the manner above described, we shall, I think, find no difficulty in explaining the name, for the Greek name ligurion appears to be derived from ληγωρον, 'to lick,' 'to attract,' and doubtless was selected by the Sept. for this reason to express the Hebrew word, which has a similar derivation. Hence Dr. Watson (Philos. Trans.) says that the Greek intrepidus, with the tourmaline, or, more definitely, with the red variety known as rubellite, which is a hard stone, and used as a gem, and sometimes sold for red sapphire. Tourmaline becomes, as is well known, electrically polar when heated. Beckmann's objection, that had Theophrastus been acquainted with the tourmaline, he would have remarked that it did not acquire its attractive power till it was heated," is answered by his own admission on the passage, quoted from the Hist. de l'Academie for 1717, p. 7 (see Beckmann, i, 91). Tourmaline is a mineral found in the alluvial deposits of the Allegheny and other rivers, and the beautiful crystals were sent to Europe by the Noya purchased two of these stones in Holland, which are there called ochsenstriker. Linneus, in his preface to the Flora Zeylandica, mentions the stone under the name of lapis electricus from Ceylon. The natives call it tourmalan (Phid. Trans. i. c.). Many of the precious stones which were in the possession of the Israelites during their wanderings were no doubt obtained from the Egyptians, who might have procured from the Tyrian merchants specimens from even India and Ceylon, etc. The fine specimens of rubellite now in the British Museum belonged formerly to the king of Arav. (Lith. H. Lich. 'נפל, learned, wise counsellor; Sept. Annael v. v. Anehi, Vulg. Leo), the third named of the four sons of Shemeshid or Shemida, son of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 19; comp. Josh. xvii, 2). He does not appear to have had a number of any progeny, as his name does not occur in the account of the Manasite families (Num. xxvii, 17). B.C. post 1806.

Lillburne, John, a Quaker preacher, noted for his republican views, born on an old farm called Lillers, in Leicestershire, in 1618. In his early youth he was a clothier. He entered the ministry after he had suffered greatly by prosecution for his opposition to the government. His intrepid defence of his rights as a free-born Englishman became the admiration of the nations of the world, and such party gained for him the familiar appellation of "free-born John." He was condemned to receive five hundred lashes at the cart-tail, and to stand in the pillory; but his spirit was only aroused by this disgraceful punishment. His name became the watchword of the party known as Levellers. During the Revolution he fought bravely against the king at Edge Hill and Marston Moor, where he led a regiment. Lillburne's chief fault was the want of a more statesmanlike spirit, so that he was continually sinking from the leading position he might have held, in virtue of his integrity and intrepidity, to that of a demagogue. He blindly accused Cromwell and Ireton of treason, and the former tried in vain to make him comprehend the real situation of affairs, and seems at last to have given him up in despair, and to have prosecuted him from necessity, while he valued his steady qualities and incorruptible nature. Reduced to quiescence under the iron hand of the protector, his political enthusiasm subsided into the religious, and the famous John Lillburne became a preacher among the Quakers. He died Aug. 29, 1657.—Appleton's Cyclopaedia of Biography, p. 497.

Lillenthal, Michael, a German theologian, was born at Lielstadt, in Prussia, Sept. 6, 1856. He studied theology at Königsberg and Jena, and became professor in the University of Utrecht. He afterwards visited Holland, Aethiopia, and studied philology and archaeology, and after his return was for some years professor at Königsberg. In 1714 he became assistant librarian of that university, and in 1719 was appointed deacon of one of the churches at Heidelberg. He was made member of the Académie des Sciences in 1717, and member of the Academy in 1738. He died at Königsberg Jan. 29, 1750. His principal works are Bibel-Azetische Bibliothek (Kögigsberg, 1740-1744, 8 vols. 8vo) — Biblischer Archæarius d. Heiligen Schrifft (Königsberg, 1746-1746, 2 vols. 4to : it contains a list of Biblical commentators, arranged in the chronological order of their times); and Archæarius (Königsberg, 1749, 4to). Lilienthal, Theodor Christopher, an eminent German theologian and writer, was born at Königsberg Oct. 8, 1711. He studied at the university of his native place, and afterwards at Jena and Tübingen, and, after making a journey through Holland and England, spent some time in the University of Halle. He was soon after appointed adjunct professor at Königsberg, and in 1744 became extraordinary professor and doctor of theology. In 1746 he was made pastor of the community of Neu-Rossgärten, and subsequently became ordinary professor of theology, and church and school counsellor. He died March 17, 1782. Among his works we notice: Die gute Sache der göttlichen Offenbarung seider die Freunde derselben erwiesen u. gerettet (Königsberg, 1740-92, 16 vols. 4to: it contains various editions of the first four parts appeared in 1778, and also an augmented adtion in the same year). It gives a full collection of the divers objections that have been urged against Christianity, and answers every one. It is consequently useful as a book of reference on this subject, like Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel History, although, on account of its bulk and its antiquated apologetic stand-point, it is less fit to be in itself used as a weapon against incredulity. He wrote also De Comme Missae Gregorianae (Leyden, 1739, 8vo) — Historia benta Dorotheae, Prasiae patronae, fabula variis metaulis (Dantzig, 1743, 4to) — Commentatio crctica duorum codic. Biblia Hebraica continentium (Dantzig, 1769, 4to), and a large number of sermons, dissertations, etc. See Schröck, K. Gesch. u. d. Reformation, vi, 291; Herzog, Real-Encyclop-

Lillie, John, D.D., a minister originally of the Reformed (Dutch), but afterwards of the Presbyterian Church, was born in Kelso, Scotland, Dec. 16, 1812; graduated with the highest honors at the University of Edinburgh at the age of twenty-one years, prosecuted his theological studies for two years at Edinburgh, then came to America, and completed his course at the Theological Seminary of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, New Brunswick, N. J. In 1835 he was installed pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in Kingston, N. Y. In 1841 he took charge of the grammar-school of the New York University, and in 1848 of a congregation which had gathered about him in the University Chapel, and afterwards (1846) occupied their new church in Stanton Street. From 1844 until 1848 he was the editor of the Journal. He emigrated to the American (Baptist) Bible Union as one of its translators from 1851 to 1857. In 1855 he received the degree of D.D. from the University of Edinburgh. In 1858 he accepted the call offered to him by the Presbyterian Church, Kingston, N. Y., and he there labored until his death, Feb. 23, 1867. Dr. Lillie's published productions are not numerous, but highly valuable. His revision and translation of the Epistles to the Thessalonians, the Epistles of John and Jude, and the Revelation, for the Anglo-American edition of "Lange's Commentary," have won the highest ecomiums. He was also the author of a small work on The Perpetuity of the Earth, in which he developed his pre-Darwinian views. Dr. Lillie was an earnest Christian, a wise scholar, and a faithful pastor. See Lilly (לוֹלִית, shoshan), from its shibboleth, 1 Kings vii, 19; also לוֹלִית, shoshan, 1 Kings vii, 22, 26; Cant. ii, 16; iv, 5; v, 18; vi, 3, 5; vi, 22; andliv, shoshanamah,

2 Chron. iv, 5; Cant. i, 2, 15; Hos. xiv, 5 [see Shushan (SHOSHANIM)]; Sept. and N. T. epivov, Matt vii, 28; Luke xvi, 22; there is a reference of this word, indigenous in Syria which might come under the denomination of lilly, when that name is used in a general sense, as it often is by travellers and others. The term shoshan or soosan seems also to have been employed in this sense. It was known to the Greeks (Callinicus, for Dioecetes (iii, 116) describes the mode of preparing an ointment called suasun, which others, he says, call eparivos, that is, illinum. So Athenaeus (xiv, 513) identifies the Persian suasun with the Greek krión. The Ar-Aric authors also use the word in a general sense, several countries being surrounded under the heading of lilia. The t name is applied even to kinds of Iris, of which several species, with various colored flowers, are distinguished.

But it appears to us that none but a plant which was well known and highly esteemed would be found occurring in so many different passages. Thus, in 1 Kings vii, 19-26, and 2 Chron. iv, 5, it is mentioned as forming the ornamental work of the pillars and of the brazen sea, made of molten brass, for the house of Solomon, by Hiram of Tyre. In Canticles the word is frequently mentioned; and it is curious that in five passages, Cant.

ii, 2 and 16; iv, 5; vi, 2; and 3, there is a reference to feeding among lilies, which appears unaccountable when we consider that the allusion is made simply to an ornamental or sweet-smelling plant; and thus the shoshan appears to have been from the other passages in which it is mentioned. Thus, in Cant. ii, 1, 'I am the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys;' verse 2, 'as the lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughters;' v, 13, 'his lips like lilies, dropping sweet-smelling myrrh;' vii, 2, 'thy belly is like an heap of wheat set about with lilies.' If we consider that the book of Canticles supposed to have been written on the occasion of the marriage of Solomon with a princess of Egypt, it is natural to suppose that some of the imagery may have been derived from her native country, and that the above lily may be a plant of Egypt rather than of Palestine. Especially does the water-lily, or lotus of the Egyptians, seem the most suitable to most of the passages. Thus Herodotus (ii, 92) says, 'When the waters have risen to their extremest height, and all the fields are overflowed, there appears above the surface an immense quantity of plants of the lily species, which the Egyptians call the lotus; having cut down these, they dry them in the sun. The seed of the flowers, which resembles that of the poppy, they bake, and make into a kind of bread: they also eat the root of this plant, which is round, of an agreeable flavor, and about the t size of an apple. There is a second species of the lotus, which grows in the Nile, and which is not unlike a rose.

The fruit, which grows from the bottom of the root, resembles a wisp's nest; it is found to contain a number of kernels of the size of an olive-stone, which are very grateful either fresh or dried.' All this exists even to the present day. Both the roots and the stalks form articles of diet in Eastern countries, and the large far-naceous seeds of both the nymphaea and nelumbium are roasted and eaten. Hence possibly the reference to feeding among lilies in the above-quoted passages.

This flower (the Nymphula Lotus of the Greeks, and the behais of the Hebrews) grows plentifully in the Lower Egypt, flowering during the period of the annual inundation. There can be little doubt the "Illy-work" spoken of in 1 Kings vii, 19, 22, was an ornament in the form of the Egyptian lotus. There were formerly three descriptions of water-lily in Egypt, but one (the red-flowered lotus) has disappeared. "The flower," says Burckhardt, speaking of the white variety, or Nymphaea lotus, "generally stands on the stalk from one to two feet above the surface of the water. When the flowers open completely, the leaves form a horizontal disk, with the isolated seed-vessel in the midst, which bends down the stalk by its weight, and swells upon the surface of the water for several days until it is inspired. This plant grows at Cairo, in a tank called Birket el-Rotoli, near one of the northern suburbs where I happen to reside. It is not found in Upper Egypt, I believe, but abounds in the Delta, and attains maturity at the time when the Nile reaches its full height. I saw it in great abundance and in full flower, covering the whole inundated plain, on October 12, 1815, near the ruins of Tiney, about twelve miles south-east from Mansura, on the Damietta branch. It dies when the water retires." Among the ancient Egyptians the lotus was introduced into all subjects as an ornament, and as the favorite flower of the country, but not with the holy character usually attributed to it, though adopted as an emblem of the god Nophre-Atmû (Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, i, 57, 256). As the Hebrew architecture was of the Phœnician-Egyptian style, nothing was more natural than the introduction of this ornament by Solomon into the Temple. It was in like manner borrowed by the Assyrians in their later structures (Layard's Nineve, ii, 336). Mr. Bardwell, the architect, in his work entitled Temples, Ancient and Modern (1887), says, "The two great columns of the pronaoi in Solomon's Temple were of the usual proportions of Egyptian columns, being five and a half diameters high; and as these gave the great characteristic feature to the building, Solomon sent an embassy to fetch the architect from Tyre to superintend the moulding and casting of these columns, which were intended to be of brass. Observe how conspicuous is the idea of the vase (the 'bowl' of our translation), rising from a cylinder ornamented with lotus-flowers; the bottom of the vase was partly hidden by the flowers, the belly of it was overlaid with net-work, ornamented by seven wreaths, the Hebrew number of happiness, and beneath the lip of the vase were two rows of pomegranates, one hundred each row. These superb pillars were eight feet in diameter and forty-four feet high, supporting a noble entablature fourteen feet high. See JACHIN and BOAZ. "In confirmation of the above, I have been informed by the head of the Ministry with the lotus-flower, we may adduce also the remarks of Dr. W. C. Taylor in his Bible Illustrated by Egyptian Monuments, where he says that the lilies of the 45th and 59th Psalms have puzzled all Biblical critics. The title, 'To the chief musician upon Shoshannim,' has been supposed to be the name of some unknown tune to which the psalm was to be sung. But Dr. Taylor says 'the word Shoshannim is universally acknowledged to signify lilies, and lilies have nothing to do with the subject of the ode. But this hymeinal ode was intended to be sung by the female attendants of the Egyptian princess, and they are called 'the lilies,' not only by a poetical reference to the lotus lilies of the Nile, but by a direct allusion to their custom of making the lotus lily a conspicuous ornament of their hair-dress.' Thus, there are passages of O. T. Scripture in which shoshan occurs appear to be explained by considering it to refer to the lotus lily of the Nile" (Kitto). "Lynch enumerates the 'lily' as among the plants seen by him on the shores of the Dead Sea, but gives no details which could lead to its identification (Travels, p. 299). He had previously observed the water-lily on the Jordan (p. 173), but omits to mention whether it was the yellow (Nuphar lutea) or the white (Nymphaea alba). 'The only 'lilies' which I saw in Palestine,' says Prof. Stanley, 'I observed in March and April, were large yellow water-lilies, in the clear spring of 'Ain Melahah, near the lake of Meron' (S. and Pal. p. 429). He suggests that the name 'lily' may include the numerous flowers of the tulip or amaryllis kind which appear in the early summer or the autumn of Palestine. The following mention of the Hûleh-lily from The Land and the Book, i, 394, were it more precise, would perhaps have enabled botanists to identify it: 'This Hûleh-lily is very large, and the three inner petals meet above and form a gorgeous canopy, such as art never approximated, and king never essayed, even in his most Remove glory. . . . We call it Hûleh-lily because it was here that it was first discovered. Its botanical name, if it have one, I am unacquainted with. . . . Our flower delights most in the valleys, but is also found on the mountains. It grows among thorns, and I have sadly lacerated my hands in extricating it from them. Nothing can be in higher contrast than the luxuriant velvety softness of this lily, and the crabbed, tangled hedge of thorns about it. Gazelles still delight to feed among them; and you can scarcely ride through the woods north of Tabor, where these lilies abound, without frightening them from their flowery pastures.' On the other hand, some of the passages in which shoshan occurs evidently refer to a field variety, as Cant, ii, 1, 2, and the tubular shape of the trumpet is sufficient to explain the transfer of the word to that musical instrument. See SHOSHANIM. "The Hebrew word is rendered 'tosis' in the Chaldee Targum, and by Maimonides and other Rabbinical writers, with the exception of Kimchi and Ben-Melech, who in 1 Kings vii, 19, translated it by 'violet.' In the Judeo-Spanish version of the Old Testament the Hebrew and shoshannim and 'shoshan' are translated by rosa, but in Hos. xiv, 5 the latter is rendered lirio. But spivov, or 'lily,' is the uniform rendering of the Sept., and is, in all probability, the true one, as it is supported by the analogy of the Arabic and Persian sasan, which has the same meaning to this day, and by the existence of the same word in Syriac and Coptic. The Spanish azahen, 'a white lily,' is merely a modification of the Arabic; but, although there is little doubt that the word denotes some plant of the lily species, it is by no means certain what individual of this class it especially designates. Father Soutey (Reverend of doct. Cord, 1715) laboured to prove that the lily used in the crown imperial, the Persian tust, the spivo vao-stovion of the Greeks, and the Frullaria imperialis of Linnaeus. So common was this plant in Persia that it is supposed to have given its name to Susa, the capital (Athen. xii, 1; Bochart, Phæleg, ii, 14); but it is no proof that it was at any time common in Palestine, and 'the lily' par excellence of Persia would not of necessity be 'the lily' of the Holy Land. Dioscorides (i, 62) bears witness to the beauty of the lilies of Syria and Palaestina, from which the best perfume was made. He says (iii, 106 [1183] of the spivo Bambaci, that the Persian call it spit (= shoshan), and the Africans digibambar, which Bochart renders in Hebrew characters בּ הַ לְיָ, 'white shoot.' Kuhn, in his note on the passage, iden-

LILY

The plant in question with the Lilium candidum of Linnaeus. It is probably the same as that called in the Missal 'king's lily' (Kulaea, v. 8). Pliny (xxi, 5) describes epipon as 'rubens lilium,' and Dioscorides, in another passage, mentions the fact that there are lilies with purple flowers, but whether by this he intended the Lilium martagon or Chalcedoniacum, {Kühn} leaves undecided. Now in the passage of Pliny where quoted it is said, Σωκράτης γὰρ ἔρισε τὰ Ἐλάχιστα φωνήν τῷ εὐπον. But in the Etymologiam Magna (s. v. Sokrates) we find τῷ ἐλάσθον τῶν Φωτισμῶν σύνεισις λιγυρία. As the shukran is thus identified both with epipon, the red or purple lily, and with liripos, the white lily, it is evidently impossible for itself to ascertain exactly the kind of lily which is referred to. If the shukran or shoshannah of the O.T. and the epipon of the Sermon on the Mount be identical, which there seems no reason to doubt, the plant designated by these terms must have been a conspicuous object on the shores of the Lake of Genesaret (Matt. vi, 26; Luke xii, 27); it must have flourished in the deep, broad valleys of Palestine (Cant. ii, 1), among the thorny shrubs (ib. ii, 16; iv, 5; vi, 3), and must have been remarkable for its rapid and luxuriant growth (Hos. xiv, 6; Ezek. xxxix, 14). The purple flowers of the skoh, or wild artichoke, which abounds in the plain north of Tabor and in the valley of Esraelon, have been thought by some to be the 'lilies of the field' alluded to in Matt. vi, 26 (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii, 110). A recent traveller mentions a plant, with lilac flowers like the hyacinth, and called by the Arabs woshech, which he considered to be of the species designated lily in Scripture (Borner, Desert of Sinai, p. 329)." Tristram strongly inclines to identify the scarlet anemone (Anemone coronaria) with the Scripture "lily" (Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 443).

In the N. T. the word "lily" occurs "in the well-known and beautiful passage (Matt. vi, 26), 'Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; yet I say unto you, Even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these:' so also in Luke xii, 27. Here it is evident that the plant alluded to must have been indigenous or grown wild in the vicinity of the Sea of Galilee, must have been of an ornamental character, and, from the Greek term epipon being applied to it, of a lillacous nature. The name epipon occurs in all the old Greek writers (see Dioscor. iii, 116; compare Claudian. *Epithalam. ser. 126; Marcial, v, 37, sq.; Calpurn. vi, 83; Athen. x, 677, 690; Virgil, Ec. x, 25; Pliny, xvi, 7; xxi, 11). The proboscis first uses it, and is supposed by Sprengel to apply it to species of Narcissus and to Lilium candidum. But the writers into whose hands it came used it imperfectly: one of them is supposed to be the Lilium candidum and the other, with a reddish flower, may be L. martagon or L. Chalcedoniacum. He alludes more particularly to the lilies of Syria and of Pamphylia being "well suited for making the ornament of lilies." Pliny enumerates three kinds, a white, a red, and a purple-colored lily. Travellers in Palestine mention that in the month of January the fields and groves everywhere abound in various species of lily, tulip, and narcissus. Benard noticed, near Acre, on Jan. 18th, and about Jaffa on the 23d, tulips, white, red, blue, etc. Gumpenberg saw the meadows of Galilee covered with the same flowers on the 31st. Tulips figure conspicuously among the flowers of Palestine, varieties probably of Tulipa Graeciana (Kitto's Palestine, p. 229). So Poeckoe says, 'I saw many tulips growing wild in the fields (in March), and any one who considers how beautiful those flowers are to the eye would be apt to conjecture that these are the lilies to which Solomon in all his glory was not to be compared.' This is much more likely to be the plant intended than some others which have been added, as, for instance, V. kerchii, amarillys, having white flowers with bright purple streaks, found by Salt at Adua. Others have preferred the Crown imperial, which is a native of Persia and Cashmere. Most authors have united in considering the white lily, Lilium candidum, to be the plant to which our Saviour referred; but it is doubtful whether it has ever been found in a wild state in Palestine. Some, indeed, have thought it to be a native of the New World. Dr. Lindley, however, in the Gardener's Chronicle (ii, 744), says, 'This notion cannot be sustained, because the white lily occurs in an engraving of the annunciation, executed somewhere about 1480 by Martin Schongauer; and the first voyage of Columbus did not take place till 1492. In this very rare print the lily is represented as growing in an ornamental vase, as if it were cultivated as a curious object.' This opinion is confirmed by a correspondent at Aleppo (Gardener's Chronicle, iii, 429), who has resided long in Syria, but is acquainted only with the box any of Aleppo and Antioc: 'I never saw the white lily in a wild state, nor have I heard of its being so in Syria. It is cultivated here on the roofs of the houses in pots as an exotic bulb, like the daffodil.' In consequence of this difficulty, the late Sir J. E. Smith was of opinion that the plant alluded to under the name of lily was the Amaryllis lutea (now Opornastus luteus, ) whose golden lilaceous flowers in autumn afford one of the most brilliant and gorgeous objects in nature, as the fields of the Levant are overrun with them; to them the expression of Solomon, in all his glory, not being arrayed like one of them, is peculiarly appropriate." Dr. Lindley conceives 'it to be much more probable that the plant intended by our Saviour was the Isolirion montanum, a plant allied to the amarillys, of very great beauty, with a slender stem, and clusters of the most delicate violet flowers, abounding in Palestine, where colored Chenney found it in the most brilliant perfection' (l.c. p. 744). In reply to this, a correspondent furnishes an extract of a letter from Dr. Bowring, which throws a new light upon the subject: 'I cannot describe to you with botanical accuracy the lily of Palestine. I heard it called by the title of Lilae Smyraceni, and I imagine under this title its botanical characteristics may be hunted out. Its color is a brilliant red; its size about half that of the common tiger lily. The white lily I do not remember to have seen in any part of Syria. It was in April and May that I observed my flower, and it was most abundant in the district of Galilee, where it and the Rhododendron (which grew in rich abundance round the paths) most strongly excited my attention.' On this Dr. Lindley observes, 'It is clear that neither the white lily, nor the Opoponax luteus, nor Ixolitum, will answer to Dr. Bowring's description, which seems to point to the Chalcedonian or scarlet Martagon lily, formerly called the lily of Byzantium, found from the Adriatic to the Levant, and which, with its scarlet tubular-like flowers, is indeed a most stately and striking object' (Gardeneri's Chronicle, ii, 854) (Kitto). As this lily (the Lilium Chalcedonicum of botanists) is in flower at the season of of Christ. According to the Roman Catholic view, until Christ's death and resurrection, which constituted the decisive moments of the work of redemption, the doors of heaven were closed to all (Catech. Rom. i, 2, 7); since then they have been permanently open to all perfect saints. This doctrine was first advanced by pope Benedict XI, and afterwards sanctioned by the Council of Florence (Peronne, v, 218). According to the Roman view, until the coming of Christ, the souls of all departed were, without exception, sent into the place of punishment, or infernum, as is (according to Romish views) still the case with those who die without having arrived at perfection, or some penance still to be performed for sin. At present they use the word infernum to convey the idea that all sinners are in some place outside of heaven, and that, on account of their different personal qualities, they are divided into different classes, which have nothing in common except their exclusion from the happiness of heaven, and therefore divide these ob-dita receptacula (Augustine, Enchiridion ad Laurent. § 109), of which the place of punishment consists, into, 1, hell, in its fullest sense, that terrible, immense prison in which the damned, who died in a state of mortal sin, are to remain forever (Cis. Rom. i, 6, 5, 6); 2, purgatory, in which the souls of believers, and above all those who are justified, suffer until they are entirely free from sin; 3, the bosom of Abraham, where the saints who died before the coming of Christ were received, and where, while free from torments, they were nevertheless, on account of original sin, prevented by the habitus of their bodies from beholding the glory of God until the coming of the Redeemer, whose merits freed them from these bonds, and opened to them the doors of heaven. Compare here the statement of the early English reformers in "the invita-tion of a Christian Mon." on the fifth article of their creed: 'Our Saviour Jesus Christ, at his entry into hell, first conquered and oppressed both the devil and hell, and also death itself... afterwards he spoiled hell, and delivered and brought with him from thence all the souls of those righteous and good men which, from the fall of Adam, died in the favor of God, and in the faith and belief of this our Saviour, which was then to come.' The doctrine of the Church, as expressed in the sym-bols, names no other divisions. The third place which, in ecclesiastical phraseology, is usually called Limbus patrum, is even represented sometimes as a quiet habi-tation of the saints as an unpleasing name (sinistra illius custodia molestan), which two views, being difficult to conciliate, gave rise to many intricate questions unavoidable as soon as an attempt is made to establish a detailed topography of the places of futurity. The Limbo of Dante is placed in the region most of the nine circles of his Inferno. No weeping is heard within it, but perpetual sighs tremble on the air, breathed by an infinite crowd of women, men, and children, afflicted, but not tormented. These inhabitants are not condemned on account of sin, but solely because it was their fortune to live before the birth of Christ, or to die unbaptized. The poet was grieved at heart, as well he might be, when he recognised in this sad company many persons of great worth (comp. Milman, Latin Christianity, b. xiv, chap. ii).

from the authorities of the Church, we find that the admission of the belief in a purgatory had in the West great influence on the ideas concerning the future. The scholastics, in the course of time, erected these "views" into a system. Besides the above-mentioned three places of abode for departed spirits deprived of heavenly fulness recognised in the Roman Catholic Church, two others existed, the existence of a fourth, intended for children who died previous to baptism. Bellarmine (Purg., ii, 7) considers it a very difficult question to decide whether there may not be a fifth, in which the purified souls remain until their final admittance into the kingdom of heaven, and which must consequently be situated somewhere between purgatory and heaven (Bedas, Hist. v, 13; Dionysius Carthusianus, Dial. de jud. particular. 81; Lud. Blo-
THE necessity of asceticism to each of the last penalties is its special positive accident sufficiently for the fact that the word limbus is made to answer both for the place where the saints who lived before Christ remain, and for the abode of children who died without baptism. It appears to have been first set forth by Thomas Aquinas, and to have been once adopted by the Council of Trent. It is consequently found in the centre of the earth; next comes purgatory, which surrounds hell; then the limbus infantum, or purgatorium; and finally, as the central point between hell and heaven, the limbus patrum, or Siclus Abraham. Of course each of the last groups in its turn had special duties: in hell it pons eternus damni et senae in purgatory, pons temporalis damni et senae in the limbus infantum, pons damni eternae in the limbus patrum, pons damni temporalis (Thom. Aqu. iii, d. 22, q. 2, a. 1, q. 2, 3, 4; d. 21, q. 1, a. 1, q. 2; d. 45, q. 1, a. 1, q. 2, 3, 9, 32, 2, 4, 4; d. 45, q. 1, a. 1, q. 2, etc., Eiusdem, 64; Dante, Inf., c. 38 sq.; Burckhardt, De S. P. Sent., t. d. 22, q. 4; Sonnini, Demonstr. rel. Chr., ii, 15, and ii, 4; Belleairnue, Purif. ii, 6; Andraeius, Def. Trid. Sacr. mod., iii, 229).

The limbus patrum is exclusively reserved to the saints of the Mosaic dispensation. They suffer only by the consciousness that they are deprived, in consequence of original sin, from beholding God, and by an ardent longing for the coming of their Messiah. Since Christ has atoned for original sin, and freed them from imputation, they enjoy the stages i, ii, and iii, and are accorded an important in a religious sense. It is called limbus infersi, quia erat penam carentis, Siculus Abraham propert requiem, quia erat expectatio gloriae (Belleairnue, De Christo, iv, 10; Bécansus, Append. purif. Cult.). This view is defended partly by means of some passages in Scripture, (such as Gen. xxvii, 35; i Sam. xxvii; Exod. xix, 11; Luke xxvi, 23; xx, 37; xxiii, 48; John viii, 56; Heb. xi, 5; 1 Peter iii, 19); but especially by oral tradition. This last is the more available because, with the exception of the later attempts at locating the different places, the Western Church has always taught the same things on this point, at least since St. Augustine (De civ. Dei, xx, 15), that the limbus in general was only the caput mortuum which the doctrine of the purgatory had yet left to the old Church. The Greek Church, on the other hand, holds such views (Smith, Dict. gr. Theol.), e hliados d. alen u. neuen greek Kirkoe, 1711, ii, 103).

The doctrine of the limbus infantum, or, rather, of the fate of unbaptized children, is insisted on with much greater force. On this point, however, the consequences of the limbus as such assert themselves. It is impossible to come into conflict, and therefore the Church has never officially proclaimed its views as to the exact nature of it, so that a certain latitude is given for different opinions concerning it. The fathers early held different opinions on this point. Ambrosius (Orat. 40) does not venture to give any view concerning unbaptized children. Gregory of Nazianzum (Orat. in a. Bapt. xi, 21) claims that *non etiam diezatvi&sigma;ta, &eta; &kappa;k&sigma;tau; et &sigma;tau; &tau;&sigma;tau; &tau;&sigma;tau; &tau; &tau; et &kappa;k&sigma;tau; &tau;&sigma;tau; et &sigma;tau; &tau; &tau; &sigma;tau; &tau; et &sigma;tau; &tau; erit (Sermo 294, n. 9 sq.; Enchirid. c. 98; De pecc. meriti, i, c. 16, n. 2; Contra Julianum, v, 44; Epist. ad Hieronymum, 128). This is the view most generally held in the Roman Catholic Church. General councils held at Lyons and at Florence decided that both those who died in mortal sin and those who were only tainted by original sin went down to the infernum, but that their punishment was different. The respect the damnation of unbaptized children because de fide, so it had to be in some way distinguished from that of adults. Carrying out this view, the most distinguished scholastics, such as Peter Lombard (Sent. 2, d. 35), Thomas Bonaventure, and Scotus, assign to them only pons damni infantum, in contradistinction to pons damni temporalis. The limbus infantum of Petavius (De Deo, ix, 10, 10) is based on an error, Storia di Rimini, t. ii, Fleury, Hist. Eccles. i, 142, n. 128).

Now, although the essential nature of the pons damni consists in the deprivation of the happiness of seeing God, there exists a difference in the manner of applying the idea to children and their inheritance of original sin. In the fifth session of the Council of Trent the Dominicans advocated the stricter view, making it in the limbus infantum a dark, underground prison, while the Franciscans placed it above in a region of light. Others made the condition of these children still better: they supposed them occupied with studying nature, philosophizing on it, and receiving occasional visits from angels and saints. As the council thought it too difficult to decide this point, theologians have since been free to embrace either view. Belleairnue (De amius, grat. vi, 6) considers their state, like Lombard, as one of sorrow. On the contrary, cardinal Stendracht (Notae praeed. Gent. 2, 16), and Bivio, ii, 103, 104, and Thomas, Quest. de male, a. 2) consider them as enjoying all the natural happiness of which they are capable. They do not even know that supernatural nature consists in the visio clara Dei, and can feel no pain from this, to them unknown, exclusion. Finally, Perrone (v, 275), who takes Concil. Tr., c. 4, as including in de fide only the want of the supernaturalis beatitudin, says: Si spectetur relative ad supernaturalem beatitudinem habet talis status rationem ponens et damnationis; si vero spectetur ideam status in se esse absolute, cum per peccatum de naturalibus nihil amissit, talis est ipsum conditioni, qualsuis fuisse, ad Adam neque pecespect neque elevatus ad supernaturalem statum fuisse, i. e. in conditione purae nature. This attempt at conciliation agrees so well with the Roman Catholic view of original sin, that on this account it has been admitted (Concil. Tr., v, 2, 3, 15, 16; Bivio, ii, 103, 104; Hom. v). Moreover, it is well known that Roman Catholic principles are of great elasticity in their application, so that there is always some way for the Church of getting out of difficulties. Thus, while the Catechism (ii, 128) continues to assert the limbus infantum, it is nulla alia salutis comparans ratio, we learn from the theologians from Duns Scotus down to Kies (Dogm. iii, 119), that the mere desiderium baptismi can be considered as valid for the children while yet in the mothers' womb, and is equivalent to the actual performance of the rite of baptism on the child. What becomes of the children who, though baptized, die soon after baptism, and who thus lose the merito e congruo necessary for justification, cannot here be taken into consideration. Protestantism has taken but little notice of all these views. It was considered by many that these theories were too unimportant. The old Protestant Church, on the contrary, tried to prove the untenability on Biblical or philosophical grounds of this changeable doctrine, its late original, and its inner contradictions. Neither did it forget the impossibility of separating the pons damni and pons sensus (Calvin, iii, 10, 9; Arelio, *Loc. 17; Rysa- senium, Summa, xvii, 8, 3; B. Pictet, ii, 265; Gerard, xxvii, 8, 3; S. Nienm, De Distinct. Pontif. in intern. clausis, 1689). The old Protestant theologians considered it as an undeniable truth that there exist no other infinities of divisions than heaven, hell, and Purgatory in this world; also that there can be no further distinction between the souls of the departed than that based on belief and unbelief, causing the former to be blessed and the latter to be damned. Still there arose questions which it was difficult for them to settle: the Reformers theologians disposed of them in a comparatively easy manner, for, as they admitted only of a gradual difference between the two dispensations, and upheld the identity of the action of grace and faith possible to both, they found no difficulty in ascribing likewise to the former dispensation a great deal also as well known that Zwingle went even further. Thus they also disposed of the doctrine of predestination, at least in regard to elect children, in which the idea seminulista was presupposed, and no one could deny, in view of Matth. xix, 14, that a mere natural distinction or infant baptism was not sufficient to justify, as was also among the earliest Commentarius in Acta Apost. et in Epistolas ad Romano et ad Hebraeos (Rotterdam, 1711, fol.). "This commentary, though written in the interest of the author's theological views, is deserving of attention for the good sense, clear thought, and unclouded reasoning by which it is pervaded" (Kitto). In addition, he edited many of the works of the principal Armenian theologians. See Nicccius, Hist. des Hommes illustres, xi, 89-88; Abrar. des armoric van der Hoven, De Jo. Lime (Lime) s. i. pers. from its boiling or effervescing when slaked: Isa. xxxiii, 12, Amos ii, 1; rendered "plaster" in Deut. ii, 2, 4; the same word is used for lime in Arab. and Syriac., a well-known mineral substance, which is a very prevalent ingredient in rocks, and, combined with carbonic acid, forms marble, chalk, and limestone, the latter being the principal raw material of the building art. Limestone is the prevailing constituent of the mountains of Syria; it occurs under various modifications of texture, color, form, and intermixture in different parts of the country. The purest carbonate of lime is found in the mountains of Galilee, whose crystalline character shows the variety of forms, all, however, resulting from a primary rhomboid. Under the action of fire, carbonate of lime loses its carbonic acid and becomes caustic lime, which has a hot, pungent taste. See "chalk." Lime is subjected to an intense heat, it fuses into transparent glass. When heated under great pressure, it melts, but retains its carbonic acid. The modern mode of manufacturing common or "quick" lime was known in ancient times. Lime is obtained by calcining or burning marble, limestones, chalk, shells, bones, and other substances to drive off the carbonic acid. From Isa. xxxii, 12 it appears that lime was made in a kiln lighted with fire. Dr. Thomson Remarks, "It is a curious fidelity to real life that, when the thorns are merely to be destroyed, they are never cut up, but are set on fire where they grow. They are only cut up for the lime-kiln." (Land and Buildings, iv. 11). See "flint." Limestone, tolerably hard, is the basis of the views of others, learned, methodical, of a retentive memory, and, above all, had a love for truth, and engaged in the search of it by reading the Scriptures with the best commentators. Next to Arminius himself, and Simon Episcopius, Limborch was one of the most distinguished of the Armenian theologians, who exerted a beneficial reaction upon Protestantism by their thorough scientific attainments, no less than by the mildness of their sentiments" (Hagenbach's History of Doctrines, ii, 214). In 1690, having found among the papers of Episcopius, his maternal uncle, several letters relating to ecclesiastical affairs, he arranged a collection with Hartocker, Epistolas praestantium et eruditorum Vitorum (8vo). Limborch was specially noted for his doctrinal works. His principal work is Theologia Christiana (1688; 4th ed. Amst. 1715, 4to), translated, with improvements from Wilkins, Pilkington, and others, by William Jones, under the title, A Complete System or Body of Divinity, both speculative and practical, founded on Scripture and Reason (London, 1702, 2 vols, 8vo). This was the first and most complete exposition of the Armenian doctrine, displaying great originality of arrangement, and admirable perspicuity and judicious selection of material. The preparation of the work was undertaken at the request of the Remonstrants (q. v.). His other works are, De errante religionis Christiana, (1687), the result of a conference with the learned Jew, Dr. Orosius: — Historia Inquisitionis (1692, fol.); translated by Samuel Chandler, under the title The History of the Inquisition, to which is prefixed a large introduction concerning the rise and progress of persecution, and the real and pretended causes of it, London, 1781, 2 vols. (4to). The second ed. of the latter work is A Commentarium in Acta Apost. et in Epistolas ad Romanos et ad Hebraeos (Rotterdam, 1711, fol.). aid does not here mean a "pilaster," but indicates that the stones, after they had been engraved, were covered with a coat of tenacious lime-white-wash, employed for similar purposes by the Egyptians, who, when the face of a rock had been sculptured in relief, covered the whole with a coat of this wash, and then painted their sculptured figures (Kittel's Fict. Limina Martyrum (the houses of the martyrs), a phrase sometimes used in ancient writers to designate churches.

Limiter (limi'tor), the name given to an itinerant and beggar employed by a convent to collect its dues and promote its temporal interests within certain limits, though under the direction of the brotherhood who employed him. Occasionally he is represented as a person of considerable importance. See Russell's Notes: Works of the English and Scottish Reformers, ii. 580, 542.

Lincoln, Ensign, a noted philanthropist and lay minister in the Baptist Church, was born at Hingham, Mass., Jan. 8, 1779. He was brought into the Church when about nineteen years old, under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Baldwin. He had been apprenticed to a printer, and in 1800 he commenced business on his own account. He also advanced the interests of Christian truth by preaching, for which he was licensed about 1801, and though he was not ordained and therefore never relinquished his secular profession, he preached and prayed, and performed the ordinary offices of a minister of the Gospel with all the holy fervor of an apostle. He won the unaffected respect of all men, as a generous neighbor, an honest friend, and a virtuous citizen. He died Dec. 2, 1832. "If I should live to the age of Methuselah," he remarked, "I could find no better time to die." Mr. Lincoln was prominent in the organization of the Evangelical Tract Society, the Howard Benevolent Society, the Baptist Foreign Mission Society, the Massachusetts Baptist Education Society, and other institutions of a similar character. He edited Winchell's Watts, the Pronouncing Bible, and the series of beautiful volumes styled The Christian Library. His own Scriptural Questions and Sabbath-school Class-book are well known. See Dr. Sharp's Funeral Sermon; American Baptist Magazine, April, 1833. (J. H. W.)

Linda or Lindana, William Damars Van, a Roman Catholic prelate, noted as a controversialist, born at Dordrecht, Holland, in 1525, was professor of Roman theology at Louvain and Dillingen; later, dean in the Hague, and then bishop of Ghent. He is remarkable for the accuracy and grace with which he drove the inquisitor. In 1562 he was appointed by Philip II bishop of Rouenmond. He died in 1568 or 1568. His most popular work was Panoplia Evangelica (1563). See A. Haversius, Vita G. Lindani (1609).—Thomas, Biogr. Dict. p. 1483; Wetter und Weise, Kirchen-Lexikon, vol. xii. s. v.

Lindblom, Jacob Axel, a Swedish prelate, was born in Ostrogodish in 1747. He was professor of bellows in Upsala, and later became bishop of Upsala and Linköping in 1789, and was afterwards chosen archbishop of Upsala. He died in 1819. —Thomas, Biographical Dictionary, p. 1483.

Linde, Christoph Ludwigo, a German theologian, was born at Schmalkalden June 5, 1676. In 1698 he attended the University of Erfurt, and the following year, and also the next year, he was a private student, and became tutor, first at Leipzic, in order to develop his knowledge more fully, and in 1705 at his native place. In 1706 he accepted a call as preacher to Farnbach, in 1725 he returned to Schmalkalden as subdean, and in 1746 he was granted the position of pastor. He died Aug. 27, 1758. His publications are mostly dedicated to the youth and school-teachers of the Lutheran Church; we mention only his Theologia in Hymnis (Schmalkalden, 1712, 5vo.), —Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, vol. ii. s. v.

Lindgerius (Lindgerius), Sr., a noted theologian, was born about the year 743 in Friesland. He became a disciple of St. Boniface, who admitted him to holy orders, and afterwards he went for four years and a half to England to perfect himself under the renowned Alcuin, then living at the school of York. He was returned in 778, and in 776 was ordained priest by Alberic, successor of St. Gregory. He preached the Gospel with great success in Friesland, converted large numbers, and founded several convents, but was obliged to quit the country in consequence of the invasion of the Saxons. He then went to Rome to consult with the pope, Adrian II, and withdrew for three years to the monastery of Mount Cassin. Charlemagne having repulsed the Saxons and liberated Friesland, Lindgerius returned, preached the Gospel to the Saxons with great success, as also in Westphalia, and ultimately died the convent of Wenden. In 892 he was, against his wishes, appointed bishop of Mimiagarfoerd, which was afterwards called Munster. He always enjoyed the favor of Charlemagne, notwithstanding the intrigues of enemies jealous of his usefulness. He died in A.D. 899. —Hersorg, Best-Encyklop. vol. xix, s. v.

Lindsay, John (1), a learned English divine, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century, was educated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, and for many years officiated as a minister of the nonjuring society in Trinity Chapel, Aldersgate Street, and is said to have been their last survivor. He was also for many years a priest of the church in the Deanery, and was the inspector of the press for Mr. Bowyer, the printer. He finished a long and useful life June 21, 1768. Mr. Lindsay published a Short History of the Regular Succession, etc., with Remarks on Whiston's Scripture Politics, etc. (1729, 2vo); a translation of Mansfield's Life of the Earl of Sandwich (1738, 4to); and the Select Works of the Arminians (1738, 2nd ed. 1739), which has a large and elaborate preface, containing "a full and particular series of the succession of our bishops, through the several reigns since the Reformation," etc. In 1747 he published Mason's Two Sermons preached at Court in 1720. See Gen. Encyclop. vol. xix. s. v.

Lindsay, John (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Lynn, Mass., July 18, 1788; was converted in 1807; entered the New England Conference in 1809; was agent for the Wesleyan University in 1855-6; in 1857 was transferred to the New York Conference, and made presiding elder on New Haven District; next he filled two stations in New York City; in 1849 he was agent for the American Bible Society; was transferred in 1845 to the Troy Conference; was appointed to the Albany District in 1846; and died at Schenectady Feb. 10, 1850. Mr. Lindsay was an impressive and successful preacher, and a man of noble benevolence. He was very active in the founding of the Wesleyan Academy at Wilburham, and the Wesleyan University.—Minutes of Conf. 1V, 440; Stevens, Memorials of Methodism, vol. ii. ch. xli. (G. L. T.)

Lindsey, Theophilus, an eminent Greek Unitarian minister, was born at Middleton, in Cheshire, June 20, 1728 (O. S.). He entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1741, and, after taking his degrees, was elected fellow in 1747. About this time he commenced his clerical duties at an Episcopal chapel in Spital Square, London. Later he became domestic chaplain to Algermon, duke of Somerset, after whose death he traveled for two years on the Continent with Algermon's son. On his return, about 1758, he was presented to the living of Kirkby Wiske, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, and in 1756 he removed to that of Piddington, in Dor-

Letters. In 1769 he married a step-daughter of his intimate friend architect Blackburne, and in 1768, chiefly for the sake of enjoying his society, took the living of Catterick. Lindsey, who had felt some scruples respecting subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles even while at Cambridge, began now to entertain serious doubts concerning the Unitarian doctrine, and by 1769 his association with the Rev. William Turner, a Presbyterian minister at Wakefield, and Dr. Priestley, then a Unitarian minister at Leeds, gave a more decided coloring to his Antitrinitarian views, and he actually began to contemplate the step of resigning his holy office. This step was induced to defer that step by an attempt which was made in 1771, by several clergymen and gentlemen of the learned professions, to obtain relief from Parliament in the matter of subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles, and in which he joined heartily, travelling upwards of 2000 miles in the winter of that year to obtain signatures to the petition which was prepared. The petition was presented on the 6th of February, 1772, with nearly 250 signatures, but, after a spirited debate, its reception was negatived by 217 to 71. It being intended to renew the application to Parliament at the session of 1774, he still delayed his resignation, but when the intention was abandoned he began to prepare for that important step. He drew up, in July, 1773, a copious and learned "Apology," and, notwithstanding the attempts of his diocesan and others to dissuade him, he formally resigned his connexion with the Established Church, and, selling the greatest part of his library to meet his pecuniary exigencies, he proceeded to London, and on the 17th of April, 1774, began to officiate in a room in Essex Street, Strand, which, by the help of friends, he had been enabled to convert into a temporary chapel. His desire being to deviate as little as possible from the mode of worship adopted in the Church of England, he used a liturgy very slightly altered from that modification of the national church-service which had been previously published by Dr. Samuel Clarke. This modified liturgy, as his opening sermon, Lindsey published. His efforts to raise a Unitarian congregation proving unsuccessful, he commenced shortly afterwards the erection of a more permanent chapel in Essex Street, which was opened in 1776. His published "Apology" having been attacked in print by Mr. Burgh, an Irish M.P., by Mr. Bingham, and by Dr. Randolph, Lindsey published a "Sequel" to it in 1776, in which he answered those writers. In 1781 he published The Catechist, or an Inquiry into the Doctrine of the Scriptures concerning the only True God, and the Sacrament of Baptism. In 1783, A Historical View of the State of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship, from the Reformation to our own Times, an elaborate work, which had been several years in preparation; and in 1786, anonymously, An Examination of Mr. Robinson's Cambridge's Plan for the Dechristianization of our Lord Jesus Christ, by a late Member of the University. In 1788 he published The Christian Prelates, a defence of his friend Dr. Priestley, in the form of an address to the students of Oxford and Cambridge; and this was followed, in 1790, by a Second Address to the Students of Oxford and Cambridge relating to the Origin of the great Errors concerning him. In 1792 he invited Dr. Disney, who then left the Established Church for the same reasons as himself, to become his colleague in the ministry at Essex Street; and in 1798, on account of age and growing infirmities, he resigned the pastorate entirely into his hands, publishing on the occasion a farewell discourse (which he felt himself unable to preach) and a revised edition, being the fourth, of his liturgy. In 1795 he reprinted, with an original preface, the Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever which Dr. Priestley had recently published in answer to Dr. Hume's Exposition of Reason; and in 1800 he republished in like manner another of Priestley's works, on the knowledge which the Hebrews had of a future state. Lindsey's last work was published in 1802, entitled Conversations on the Divine Government, showing that everything is from God and for good to all. He died on the 3d of November, 1808. Besides copious biographical notices of Lindsey, which were published in the Monthly Repository and Monthly Magazine of Dec., 1806, the Rev. Thomas Belsham published, in 1812, a thick octavo, volume titled Memoirs, in which he gave a full analysis of Lindsey's works and extracts from his correspondence, together with a complete list of his publications. Two volumes of his sermons were printed shortly after his death. See Engl. Cyclop. s. v.; Robert Hall, A Discourse on the Death of a Religious Man (11th ed., 1858), iv. 188 sq.; London Quarterly Review, viii. 422 sq.

Lindsey, James Harvey, a Baptist preacher, was born in North Branford, Connecticut, May 5, 1787. Brought to consider his spiritual condition through a severe illness, he sought and found pardon in December, 1810. Shortly after he began a course of study, with the view of entering the ministry, and graduated at Yale College in 1817. For a number of years his health was so poor as to forbid his preaching, and he was engaged in teaching. He introduced into the Baptist denomination the religious meetings styled "Conference of the Church," and was the first to adopt the name of the first two. His first regular preaching was in Stratford, in a store hired by himself in 1831, and in the same year he received a regular license to preach. For five years he had charge of the churches in Milford and Stratford. In 1832 he began his work in Springfield, and for a part of the year assisted in the compilation of the Baptist Select Hymns. He died Dec. 29, 1843. Mr. Lindsey was a ready writer, and a large contributor to several of the periodicals of the day. His articles took a wide range, including politics, religion, moral reform, literature, and especially natural science.—Sprague, Ammals of the American Pulpit, vol. vi.

Lindale, Philip, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Morristown, N. J., Dec. 21, 1716, and graduated in the College of New Jersey (Princeton) in 1744. After teaching for some time, and completing his theological studies, he was licensed to preach in 1749, and settled in Newtown, L. I., where he preached as a stated supply. In 1812 he became senior tutor in Princeton College, and in 1818 was appointed to the professorship of languages, and chosen secretary of the board of trustees. To these offices were added those of librarian and inspector of the college, and in 1817, when he was ordained, that of vice-president. In 1824 he agreed to go to Nashville, solely induced thereto by the new and wide field of exertion which lay before him there. He continued more than a quarter of a century at Nashville, and his reputation was so high in the South and West that it was said that every university in those regions had solicited him to accept its headship. He was twice invited to preside over Dickinson College, in Pennsylvania, and was actually elected provost of the University of Pennsylvania in 1884. From this period he was successively moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, member of the Royal Society of Northern Antiquaries at Copenhagen, professor of ecclesiastical policy and Biblical archeology in the New Albany Seminary (Indiana), 1850. He removed from New Albany in April, 1853, and returned to Nashville, where he died May 28, 1855. Dr. Lindale's works have been published entirely, with an introductory notice of his life and labors by Leroy J. Halsey. (Philadelphia, 1865, 3 vols. 8vo). Their contents are as follows: vol. i. Ecclesiastical History, Ecclesiastical and Religious Discourses; vol. ii, Miscellaneous Discourses and Essays.—Sprague, Ammals, iv. 465.

Line (represented by the following terms in the original: Debet, car, measuring-line, 2 Sam. viii. 2; Amos xvi. 7; hence a portion as divided out by a line, Psa. xvi. 6; elsewhere "cord," "portion," etc. or or or, a measuring-line, Isa. xxiv. 17; Ezek. xxiv. 28).
LINEAGE

2; either for construction, Job xxxviii, 5; Isa. xiv, 18; Jer. xxxi, 39; Zech. i, 16, or for destruction, 2 Kings xxi, 13; Lam. ii, 8; Isa. xxxiv, 11; metaph., a rule or norm, Isa. xxvii, 10, 13; like the Gr. κανών, 2 Cor. x, 13, 15, 16; Gal. vi, 16; Phil. iii, 16; also the rim, e.g. of a laver, 1 Kings vii, 23; 2 Chron. iv, 2; or string of a musical instrument, Ps. xlii, 8, but not q. d., Ezek. xix, 4; where Sept. θέματος, γένους, and so Rom. x, 18, Vulg. supersedes, once; strength, Isa. xxviii, 2, where "a nation met out" should be rendered a most mighty nation: in three of the above passages, 1 Kings vii, 23; Jer. xxxi, 39; Zech. i, 16, the text reads τάκτον, τάκτος, of the same import; and in Josh. ii, 18, 21, occurs μέτρον, μέτροκ, a cord, from the same root. Other terms less proper are: δαὐδι, a thread, for measuring a circumference, 1 Kings vii, 15; "fillets," Jer. iii, 21; elsewhere generally a "thread." λινος, a cord for measuring length, Ezek. vi, 18, elsewhere a "thread," "lace," etc., especially the string for suspending the signet-ring in the bosom, rendered "bracelet" in Gen. xxxviii, 18, 25. αὐτός, the aor. or stylus with which an artist graver the sketch of a figure in outline, to be afterwards sculptured in full, Isa. xiv, 18. There can be little doubt that the Hebrews acquired the art of measuring land from the Egyptians, as who had it whom it was early prevalent (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. ii, 256). In Josh. xviii, 9 we read, "And the men went out and passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book, and came again to Joshua to the host at Shiloh." Thence on the northern side not less clearly indicates a survey of the whole country was made, and the results entered carefully in a book (see Kitt's Daily Bible Illustr. ad loc.). This appears to be the earliest example of a topographical survey on record, and it proves that there must have been some knowledge of mensuration among the Hebrews, as is moreover evinced by the other topographical details in the book of Joshua.

Linen has been made in the A. Version or elsewhere the representative of a considerable number of Heb. and Greek terms, to most of which it more or less nearly corresponds. The material designated by them in general is no doubt principally, and perhaps by some of them exclusively, the product of the flax-plant; but there is another plant which, as being a probable rival to it, may be most conveniently considered here, namely, hemp. See also Silk: Wool.

Linen was extensively cultivated in Egypt. In the present day, the cultivation of hemp is almost entirely confined to the Thracians for making garments. These were so like linen that none but a very experienced person could tell whether they were of hemp or flax; one who had never seen hemp would certainly suppose them to be linen. Hemp is used in the present day for school frocks and caps, and horse and medical enough. hemp are well known. Canna was mentioned in the works of Hippocrates on account of its medical properties. Dioscorides describes it as being employed for making ropes, and it was a good deal cultivated by the Greeks for this purpose. Though we are unable at present to prove that it was cultivated in Egypt at an early period, and used for making garments, yet there is nothing improbable in its having been so. Indeed, as it was known to various Asiatic nations, it could hardly have been unknown to the Egyptians, and the similarity of the word ἄκαρκτος to the Arabic ʿ ಶಃ to heark to the Arabic šesw would lead to a belief that they were acquainted with it, especially as in a language like the Hebrew it is more probable that different names were applied to totally different things, than that the same thing had two quite different names. Hemp might thus have been used at an early period, along with flax and wool, for making cloth for garments and for hangings, and would be much valued until cotton and the finer kinds of linen came to be known.

1. Phiset (φίστης, or, rather, according to Gessner, πιθηκ, from πίθους, to card) is rendered "linen" in Lev. xiii, 47, 48, 52, 59; Deut. xxxii, 11; Jer. xii, 1; Ezek. xii, 3; "staples of flax," i.e. woody flax, Josh. vii, 6 (where the Sept. has λινόκαμην, Vulg. stipula lini, but the Arabic Vers. stalks of cotton); and (2) wrought flax, i.e. "linen cloth, as made into garments, e.g. generally, Lev. xiv, 47, 48, 52, 59; Deut. xxxii, 11; Ezek. xiv, 17; a girdle, Jer. xiii, 1, a mitre, a pair of drawers, Lev. xii, 43, 44; a priest's ephod, Ezek. xvi, 18. A cognate term is πιθηκοσ, pitaχος, the plant "flax" as growing, Exod. ix, 31; spec. a stick, made of linen, i.e. of "flax," Isa. xiii, 3, or "tow" Isa. xiii, 17. To this exactly corresponds the Greek λινος (whence English linen), which, indeed, stands for pithikos or pishthik in the Sept. (at Exod. ix, 31; Isa. xiii, 9, xiii, 9; xii). It signifies properly the flax-plant (Xenophon, Hell. vi, 12), but in the N. T. is only used of linen raiment (Rev. xv, 6; comp. Homer, II. ix, 661; Od. xiii, 78), also the stick of a lamp, as being composed of a strip or ravellings of linen (Matt. xii, 20), where the half-expiring flame is made the subject of the story, and will be cheered instead of having its religious hopes extinguished by the Redeemer. In John xiii, 5 occurs the Latin term linteum, in its Greek form λινος, literally a linen cloth, hence a "towel" or apron (comp. Galen, Comp. Med. 9; Sueottonius, Calig. xxi, 2).

This well-known plant was early cultivated in Egypt. (Exod. i, 27; Isa. xiv, 19; comp. Pinya, x, 2; Hesiod, ii, 155; Hazael, Tetr. p. 500), namely, in the Delta around Pelusium ("linum Pelusiacum," Sil. Itali. iii, 25, 375; "linum Pelusiacum," Phedr. ii, 6, 12); but also in Palestine (Josh. ii, 6, Hos. ii, 7; compare Pococke, East. i, 380), the region which was the country of the Philistines, according to Josh. ii, 6; compare Hartmann, Hebr. i, 116). Linen or tow was employed by the Hebrews, especially as a branch of female domestic manufacture (Prov. xxxi, 18), for garments (2 Sam. vi, 14; Ezek. xiv, 17; Lev. xiii, 47; Rev. xv, 6; comp. Philo, ii, 230), girdles (Jer. xxxvi, 1) thread and ropes (Ezek. xii, 8; Judges xvi, 18), napkins (Luke xxiv, 12; John xix, 40), turbans (Ezek. xiv, 18), and lamp-wick (Isa. xi, 8; xiii, 17; Matt. xii, 20). For clothing they used the "fine linen" (τεχνης, 1 Chron. xxv, 27, where the Sept. has βασανοντος: see Hartmann, iii, 38; compare Lev. xvi, 4, 23; Ezek. xiv, 17), perhaps the Pelusiac linen of Egypt (see Mishna, Joma, iii, 7), of remarkable whiteness (comp. Dan. xii, 1; Rev. xv, 6; see Plutarch, Isis, c. 4), with which the fine Babylon linen manufactured at Borsippa doubtless corresponded (Strabo, xvi, 793), being the material of the splendid robes of the Perisan monarchs (Strabo, xiv, 719; Curt. viii, 9), doubtless the karpos, O.D., of Esth. i, 6 (see Gessner, Theor. Hebr. p. 715). Very poor persons wore garments of unbleshed flax (παθουρους, xii, 12); "costume, cloths. (Eccles. xii, 4). The refuse of flax or tow is called in Heb. ה. sooth (Judg. xvii, 9; Isa. 81). (See, generally, Celsius, Hierobol. ii, 285 sq.) See Flax.
2. Bcca (ἠχός, from a root signifying εὐχείνεσα) occurs in 1 Chron. iv. 21; xvi. 27; 2 Chron. ii. 14; iii. 14; v. 12; Esth. i. 6; viii. 15, Ezek. xxxvii. 16, in all which passages the A.V. renders it "fine linen," except in 2 Chron. v. 12, where it translates "white linen." The word is of Aramaean origin, being found in substantially the same form in Phœnician. It is the Hebrew word שֵׁש (šēš), and the Persian šeš or šesh. The word, however, is of the finest and most precious stuff, as worn by kings (1 Chron. xiv. 27), by priests (2 Chron. v. 12), and by other persons of high rank or honor (Esth. i. 6, 8, 15). It is used of the Syrian byzan (Ezek. xxvi. 17), which seems there to be distinguished from the Egyptian byzas or בְּרִנָה, shek (ver. 7). Elsewhere it seems not to differ from this Syrian stuff, or at any rate for put for it in late Hebrew (e.g. 1 Chron. iv. 21; v. 12; 2 Chron. iii. 14). Comp. Ezek. xxvi. 31; so the Syr. and Chald. equivalents of buts occur in the O. and N.T. for the Heb. ברִנָה and Gr. βίσιος.

That the Heb. garments made of this material were white may not only be certainly concluded from the etymology (which of ברִנָה confirms), but from the express language of Rev. xix. 4, where the white and shining raiment of the saints is emblematical of their purity. Yet we should not rashly reject the testimony of Pausanias (v. 5), who states that the Hebrew byzas was yellow, for cotton of this color is found as well in Guinea and India (Gospiotianum religiosum) as in Greece at this day (comp. Vossius, ed. Virg. Geo. ii. 220), although white was doubtless the prevailing color, as of linen with us. J. E. Faber (in Harmar, Oebr. ii. 382 sq.) suspects that the buts was a cotton-plant common in Syria, and different from the shek or tree-cotton. It has long been disputed whether the cloth of byzas were of linen or cotton (see Celsius, Hierobolii ii. 197 sq.; Forster, De byzas, London, 1776), and recent microscopic experiments upon the mummy-cloths brought to London from Egypt have been claimed as determining the controversy by discovering that the threads of these are linen (Wilkinson, Ant. Egypt. iii, 115). But this is not decisive, as there may have existed religious reasons for employing linen for this particular purpose, and the cloths used for bandaging the bodies are not clearly stated to have been of byzas. On the contrary, the characteristics ascribed to this latter are such as much better agree with the qualities of cotton (see Forster, De byzas, ut sup.).

The corresponding Greek word βίσιος occurs in Luke xvi. 19, where the rich man is described as being clothed in purple and fine linen, and also in Rev. xvii. 10, 12, and xiv. 12, 16, and xix. 14, among the merchandise the loss of which would be mourned by the merchants trading with the mystical Babylon. But it is by many authors still considered uncertain whether this byzas was of flax or cotton; for, as Rosenmuller says, "The Heb. word shek, which occurs thirty times in the two first books of the Pentateuch (see Celsius, ii. 259), is in these places, as well as in Prov. xxxi. 22, by the Greek Alexandrian translators, interpreted byzas, which denotes Egyptian cotton, and also the cotton cloth made from it. In the later writings of the O. T., as, for example, in the Chronicles, the book of Esther, and Ezekiel, buts is commonly used instead of shek as an expression for cotton cloth." The same ambiguity seems to be inferred by Statoon, and it is just as likely that improved civilization may have introduced a substance, such as cotton, which was unknown at the times when shek was spoken of and employed, in the same manner as we know that in Europe woolen, hempen, linen, and cotton clothes have at one period of society been more extensively worn than at another. Cotton is the product of a plant apparently cultivated in the earliest ages not only in India, Cyprus, and other well-known localities, but also in Egypt (Plyn. xix. 12; comp. Dacier, Diction. des Anciens, 104 and 110, and even in Syria (Ezek. xxxvii. 16) and Palestine (1 Chron. iv. 21; Pausan. v. 5, 2; Pococke, East, ii. 88; Arriuex, i. 306).

Two kinds of cotton are usually distinguished, the plant (Gospiotian herbaceum) and the tree (Gospiot. arboreum), although the latest investigations appear to make them essentially one. The former, which in Western Asia is found growing in fields (Olearius, Travels, p. 297; Korte, Reis. p. 457), is an annual shrub two or three feet high, but well cultivated, as Olivier, Truew. i. 461, it becomes a bush from three to five feet in height. The flowers are reddish at the bottom, the branches short, furry, and speckled with black spots; the leaves are dark green, large, five-lobed, and weak. The flowers spring from the junction of the leaves with the stem; they are bell-shaped, purplish white, and are succeeded by oval capsules of the size of a hazel-nut, which swell to the size of a walnut, and (in October) burst spontaneously. They contain a little ball of white filaments, which in warm situations attains the size of an apple. Imbedded in this are seven little egg-shaped, woolly seeds, of a brown or black-gray color, which contain an oily kernels. The Gospiotian arboreum (Gospiotianus) of Theophrastus was anciently (see Theop. Plant. iv. 9, p. 144, ed. Schneider), and still is indigenous in Asia (i.e. India), and attains a height of about twelve feet, but differs very little as to the leaves, blossoms, or fruit from the herbaceous cotton. See generally Belon, in Paulus's Stammil. i. 214 sq.; Kurrer, in the Holl. Encycl. viii. 209 sq.; Oken, Lehrb. d. Naturgesch. ii. 11, 1262 sq.; Ainslie, Metr. Ind. p. 292 sq.; Ritter, Erdk. vii. 1058 sq.

Cotton (ברינא, shek), according to Rosenmuller, Akert. i. 175; comp. Tuch, Gew. p. 300 sq.; later *P?ת, buts, see Faber, in Harman, ii. 388, comp. Geissen, Thesisar. p. 190 sq.; comp. Forster, De byzas, London, 1776) is manufactured in Fustat, the old Egyptian capital (tenu. xil. 42; comp. Plyn. xix. 12, and in Persia into cords (Esth. i. 6), but the primitive cotton cloth was probably made of byzas cloth (Exod. xxvi. 1, xxvii. 9), and clothing (Exod. xxvii. 9), and the Hebrew women were accustomed to similar false-silk (Olivier, Truew. i. 461) has also been regarded as the sumptuous appearance which the rich were able to afford (Luke xvi. 19, on the byzas of the Greeks and Romans, see Celsius, ii. 170, 177, and Wetstein, ii. 767). Nevertheless, the Hebrew shek does not designate exclusively cotton, but also stands sometimes, like the Gr. byzas often (as the material of the tree, Philost. Apoll. ii. 29; comp. Pollux, Onom. vii. 17; Strabo, xvi. 688; Arrian, Indic. vii), for the finest (Gospiotian) white linen (certainly in Exod. xxxii. 28, comp. xxxviii. 42; Lev. xvi. 4; see Plyn. xix. 2, 3), which in softness compared with cotton (Hartmann, Erdk. iii. 87 sq.). Indeed, the present material consists of the cotton plant (Bahr, Symbol. i. 254) is based altogether upon the custom of the Egyptians, whose priests were exclusively clothed in linen (Plyn. xix. 1, 2; comp. Philost. Apoll. ii. 20), which has likewise been contested was the ancient form of the cotton cloth (Kurtz, Mos. cir. 1. 341; Strabo, xvi. 688; Koch, Charkel. 333 sq.). In fine, the Orientals often employed a single term to designate both cotton and linen, but the word σιτος was incorrect, and is found in Homer (Herodot. ii. 259 sq., 167 sq.) that shek stands only for (fine) linen (see Faber, in Harman, ii. 380 sq.; Hartmann, Erdk. iii. 84 sq.). The same ambiguity that thus applies to shek is also found in the use of "shek (Esth. i. 6, viii. 15, Sept. βίσιος), by which perhaps cotton is meant, and is, after all, intended to signifies cotton. See generally J. R. Forster, De byzas antiquor. (Lond. 1776); Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Byzas; Egypt. Antiq. In the Lib. of Entertainings Knowl. ii. 182-192; Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Cotton. Gossypium. See Cotton.
... but in 1 Chron. 25:10. It is well known that the official garments of the Egyptians (as of the Brahmin priests) were of linen (Rutshuler, Bot. of the Bible, p. 175), and hence the custom among the Hebrews (compare Ezek. xiv. 17, where the sacred apparel is expressly described as the product of flax, עָלָם). Celsius, however, is of opinion (Hierobol. ii. 89) that bad does not signify the common linen, as some have imagined, but the finest and best Egyptian linen (mod. Greek βαδις). After this, we may well agree that bad is the same as buts, namely, a species of linen in Egypt. With this view sees Gessinian concurs (Theo- rishk. Hebr. p. 179). The Talmudists appear to have been of the same opinion, from their fanciful etymology of the term bad as of a plant with a single stem springing upright from one seed (Brachia, De pot. art. p. 101). This interpretation is finally confirmed by the Arabic versions, which have a term equivalent to byseus. See No. 1 above. Perhaps, however, the requirement of the material in question for priestly garments may only signify that no stock should be employed in them, and they may therefore have consisted indifferently of either linen or cotton, provided it was entirely pure, and thus be represented by the equal term byseus. See No. 2 above.

4. Sheesh (šēš), prob. from the Egyptian skesh, in ancient Egyptian *cexh, i. e. linen, Bunsen, Äg. i. 606, which appears to have been applied to the most coarse flax, šēš, to be white; Sept. everywhere βωσονα occurs Gen. xl. 42; Exod. xxv. 5; xxi. 5, 8, 16; xxxvi. 9, 12, 15, 18; xxxvii. 2, 6, 8, 15, 39; xxxix. 6, 23, 25, 35; xxxvi. 8, 35, 37; xxxvii. 9, 16, 18, 28; xxxix. 2, 3, 5, 8, 27, 28, 29; Prov. xxxii. 22; Ezek. xvi. 10, 18; xxxvii. 7; in all which passages it is rendered "fine linen" in the Author. Ver. (except Prov. xxxii. 22, where it is rendered "white silk"). In Esth. i. 6; Cant. v. 15, the same term occurs, but is rendered, as it there signifies, "marble"; once šēšruti (šēš, from the same), Ezek. xvi. 13, text, "fine linen." This word appears to designate Egyptian linen of peculiar whiteness and fineness, and as such it is stated to have been imported from Egypt by way of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 7), in distinction from the Syrian linen or baka (בַּקָּה, verse 16). In the Pentateuch it is several times applied to byseus, of which, both as material spontaneously offered (Exod. xxv. 4; xxxix. 6, 23) and as woven fabrics (Exod. xxv. 25, 30; xxxvii. 23), were made both the curtains and veils of the sacred tabernacle (Exod. xxv. 1, 31, 36; xxvii. 5, 16, 18; xxxvi. 8, 35, 37; xxxix. 3, 5, 8, 27, 28, 29). Ezek. xvi. 10, 18, and the prayer of the high priest's ephod or shoulder-piece (Ezek. xxvii. 8, 6, 15, 39; xxix. 2, 5, 8, 27, 28, 29). Though it is unexpressed in the usual phrase, the distinction is stated to have been worn by noble persons alone, e.g. by Joseph as prefect of Egypt (Gen. xl. 46), and women of eminence (Prov. xxxii. 22). But that skesh is also spoken of linen articles is apparent from Exod. xxxix. 28, where the "linen breeches" (ין בְּרֵית) are said to have been made of "fine-twined linen" (יַעַנָּן בְּרֵית), as well as from the fact that בָּשָׂה, pishkim, linen garments, are sometimes (e.g. Isa. xxvii. 17; Ezek. xiv. 18) rendered by the Chaldee interpreter by בַּשָּׂי, buts. It thus appears that skesh is equivalent in general to byseus. See No. 2 above. See generally Celsius, Hierobol. ii. 259; J. R. Forster, Liber singularis de byseus antiquorum (London, 1776); J. F. Faber, *Observ. i. 399 sq.; Hartmann, Synec- bräerius, iii, 34 sq.; Rosenmüller, *Bibl. Altert. IV, i, 175 sq.

6. ERTU (אֶרְתֻ, from an obsolete root perhaps signifying to bind, referring to the use of the material for ropes) occurs only in Prov. vii. 16, as a product of Egypt, "I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt." As Egypt was from very early times celebrated for its cultivation of flax and manufacture of linen, there can be little doubt that ertu is correctly rendered, though somewhat doubtful that it may signify rope or string of Egypt, "finaς Egyptiæ, "finaς salignus v. intubecas;" a sense that it bears in Chaldee, for the Targums employ וָזָא in the sense of rope for the Heb. ובַּר and ובו (Josh. ii. 15, Num. iv. 32; I Kings xx. 32; Esth. i. 6, etc.). But, following the suggestion of Alb. Schultens, Celsius (Hierobol. ii. p. 89) observes that erts designates not a rope, but flax and linen, even as the Greek διόσυνω and διόσδων, derived from it, sufficiently demonstrate. "So Mr. Yates, in his Textitum Antiqurorum, p. 265, says of διόσω that it was in all probability an Egyptian word, adopted by the Greeks to denote the commodity to which the Egyptians themselves applied it." For διόσω, Greek translators put into Greek text references to become διόσω and διόσδων. Hesychius states, no doubt, correctly, 'that διόσω was applied by the Greeks to any fine and thin cloth, though not of linen.' Mr. Yates further adduces from ancient scholia that διόσω were made both of flax and of wool, and also that the siles of India are called διόσω emporion by the author of the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea. It also appears that the name διόσω was applied to cloths exported from Cutch, Ougine, and Barach, and which must have been made of cotton. Mr. Yates moreover observes that, though διόσω, like σιλκων, originally denoted linen, yet we find they both applied to cotton cloth. As the manufacture of linen extended itself into other countries, and as the exports of India became added to those of Egypt, all varieties, either of linen or cotton cloth, wherever woven, came to be designated by the originally Egyptian names διόσω and διόσδων. Forester (De byseus antiquorum, p. 75) endeavors to trace the Egyptian form of the word, and Ludolf (Comment. ad hist. Ethiop. p. 204) renders it by the Ethiopic term for frankincense. But these efforts, as Gessinian remarks (Theo- rishk. Hebr. p. 77), are wide of the mark. Among the Hebrews the term is rendered "byseus of Egypt" (נָבָם byseus), and they properly have designated a linen material, similar to silk or *byseus in fineness, such as we know was manufactured in Egypt (Isa. xix. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 7; Barhebr. p. 218), q. d. Egyptian yarn, not less famous among the ancients than "Turkish yarn" has been among moderns. Kimchi, the Venetian Greek, and others understand frankincense, and apply it to goods hanging from the side of a bed, or something of that sort; rabbi Parchon, a girdle woven in Egypt—evidently more conjectures.

"In the N. T. the word διόσω occurs in John xix. 40: 'Then took they the body of Jesus and wound it in linen clothes* (διόσων); in the parallel passage (Matt. xxvii. 59) the term used is διόσδων, as also in Mark xv. 46, and in Luke xxii. 53. We meet with it again in John xx. 5, 'and he, stooping down, saw the linen clothes lying.' It is generally used in the plural to denote "linen hangings." διόσω is its primary sense. At Acta x. 11, and (Peter) saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending upon him, as it had been a great shek* knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth;' and also in xii, 5, where this passage is repeated. In Homer it is a matter of course (I. ii. 397, or wrought veils and under-garments for women (U. iii. 141; xvi. 193); in later writers linen cloths (Lucilius, Dial. Mort. iii. 2), especially for sails (Mel. 80; Anth. x. 5; Luc. Jup. Troj. 45). From the preceding observations it is evident that διόσω, whether answering to the Heb. "stems," may signify cloth made either of linen or cotton, but most probably the former, as it was more common than cotton in Syria and Egypt. In classical writers the word signifies linen bandages (Luc. Phila., 34), specif. lint for wounds (Hipp. p. 772, etc.; At. Ach. 1170); also sail-cloth (Polybius, v. 88, Deum. 114). From these passages it appears to have been an ample garment, probably linen, worn under the other clothing in the manner of a skirt by men (Judg. xiv. 12, 13, 14), but a thin chitin by women (Is. 31:26). The Talmud describes it as made of the finest linen ("the sindon is suitable for summer," Menuch, xii, 1). The Targums similarly explain Psa. civ. 2; Lam. ii, 20. The corresponding Syriac is employed in the Peshito for soudgog, Luke xix. 20; Na'or, John xviii. 4. The Sept. has σώδες, Vulgate saindo; but in Is. iii, 28 the Sept. appears to have a paraphrase ῥυθονροσον σου φρασαυ και βασιλεως και βασιλευμι και βασιλευμιν. The passage in Prov. seems to refer to the manufacture of the cloth or material, probably linen, but possibly sometimes of cotton, that is, "linen skirts or raiment made of linen." These are evidently referred to; and in Isaiah we may infer that female under-clothing is in like manner alluded to.

From this Heb. term many have thought is derived the Greek word σωδες, which occurs of linen or muslin cloth, in 40 passages. It is a garment that had the appearance of a day-clothes, q. d. night-gown (Mark xiv. 51, 52, "linen cloth"); used also for wrapping around dead bodies, q. d. grave-clothes, ceremonies ("fine linen," Mark xv. 46; "linen cloth," Matt. xxvii. 59, "linen," Mark xv. 46; Luke xziii. 35). This appears to have been a fine fabric (probably usually, but not necessarily of linen), either the Egyptian (Pollux, vii, 16, 72) or Indian; called in Egypt ander (Peyron, p. 299), the Samarcit sindus (Jahronski, Oscar, i, 297 sq.). Others trace a connection with 'ερές, Sindus (Pavon, Lex. v. s. v.); some (as Eusyl. Meg.) from the city Sodom, etc. It appears to have specially denoted a fine cotton cloth from India (Herod. i. 200; ii. 95; iii. 86; vi. 181); also generally a linen cloth, used as a signal (Polyb. ii, 66, 10), for sargena's bandages (Herod. vii, 181), for mummy-cloth (Herod. ii, 86, or other purposes (Sophocles, Ant. 1222; Thuc. ii. 89); this word is therefore proper as descriptive to the material. See Schroder, De Vet. Mult. p. 289; Michaelis, Suppl. 1720; Wettstein, N. T. i. 681—Gesenius, Thes. Heb. s. v.

8. Karpas (Karpas, Sept. καρπασσω, Vulg. cardinums) occurs in the book of Esther (i, 6), in the description of the hangings 'in the court of the garden of the king's palace,' at the time of the greatest feast given in the city Shushan, or Susana, by Ahasuerus, who 'reigned from India even unto Ethiopia.' We are told that there were white, green, and blue hangings fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble. Karpas is translated green in our version, on the authority, it is said, 'of the Chaldean paraphrase,' in which it is interpreted by-green. Hanmer's and others derive the Hebrew word from the Arabic καρπος, which signifies 'garner, parley.' Apium petroselinum, as if it alluded to the green color of this plant; at the same time arguing that as the word karpas is placed before two other words which undoubtedly denote colors, viz. the white and the purple-blue, it probably also does the same. But if two of the words denote colors, it would appear a good reason why the third should refer to the substance which was colored. This, there is little doubt, is what was intended. If we consider the circumstances related took place at the Persian court at a time when it held sway as far as India, and that the account is by some supposed to have been originally written in the ancient language of Persia, we may suppose that some foreign words may have been introduced to indicate even an already well-known substance; but more especially so if the substance itself was then first made known to the Hebrews. The Hebrew karpas is very similar to the Samarcit karpasum, karpas, or karpase, signifying the cotton-plant, whence also the Armen, karser, and the Turkish kars, karsam, etc. (Amst. Researches, iv, 281, Calculata). Celsius (Hy- erotob. i, 159) states that the Arabs and Persians have karpas and kirbas as names for cotton. These must no doubt be derived from the Samarcit, while the word karpas is employed throughout India, while to cotton with the need, and may even be seen in English present-day current. Karpas was occurs in the Periplus of Arrian, who states (p. 165) that the region about the Gulf of Bary- gaza, in India, was productive of carpusus, and of the fine Indian muslins made of it. The word is no doubt derived from the Samarcit karpase, and, though it has been translated fine musslin by Dr. Vincent, it may mean cotton cloths, or calico in general. Mr. Yates, in his recently published and valuable work, Tretrixion Anti- quorum, states that the earliest notice of this Oriental line in any classical author which he has met with is the line "Orsino, molochina, amplexus Sinus,

9. Shaatnez (שָׁתָנֶז, Sept. καρπισσων, Vulg. cardinum) was a kind of garments woven of two sorts of threads, linen and wool, like the Greek sparpas and tarsus. In Josephus, Ant. xiii. 4, 11, it is mentioned by name, with which the Hebrews were forbidden to use, as appears from the two passages in the Mosaic law where the word occurs: Lev. xix. 19, "Neither shall a garment mingled of linens and woollen come upon thee;" Deut. xxii. 11, "Thou shall not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of the female girt together." In the former of these passages the term Shaatnes is interpreted by פָּטָנֵה רַעַץ, a garment of two different kinds, i.e. of heterogeneous materials; and in the latter by the explicit definition, פּוֹלַשׁ רַעַץ, i.e. of wool and flax threads together. The Sept. renders εἰδεμα, i.e. adulterated; Aquila, avrōta-

Other ancient interpreters have either retained the original word, as Onkelos, or have entirely neglected it, as the Vulg., usually introducing the interpretation from Deut. into Levit., as the Venetian Greek (apokathw), Sandias, the Armenian, Erenpiaus, and the Persian. The derivation is uncertain. The early etymologists have sought in vain a Samar. origin for the word, as Bochart (Hieros, i, 545). The Talmud gives only fanciful derivations (Mishna, Kilain, ix, 5; comp. Nidda, 61 b; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm, s. v.). Abr. Geiger, Cogn. d. Mekheth, ii, 75), and the Targums are little better (see Pesh. in Deut. ad loc.). Ernest Meyer proposes the significance gradually formed, from a transposition of the letters and comparison with the Arabic and Ethiopic (Lee rad. Heb. p. 886). The word is prob. of Egyptian origin, although Festor (De Myst. antiemissorum, p. 95) and Jablonski (Opusc. i, 294 sq.) have not fully succeeded in tracing its original in the Coptic, which language, however, furnishes the nearest etymon (see Peyron, Lexicon, s. v., et alii). See Woolley.

10. Mixvet (Mixyát, a collection, as often) occurs only in connection with this subject in 1 Kings ii, 28, "And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn;" the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price;" also 2 Chron. i, 16, where the same language occurs. In these passages it evidently signifies a company of horses, i. e., a drove or string, as brought from Egypt at a fixed valuation. The passage in most copies renders in  oluş or in  őlosch, otherwise  őlosch, as in 2 Chron.; the Vulg. has Coa in both places, as a proper name, referring, as some have thought, to Mischol (Pliny, v, 29), the country of the Trogodytes (see Calmet, Dict. s. v. Coa). Others have sought less direct elucidations (see Bochart, Hieros. i, 171, 172; Lud. de Dieu, ad loc.; Clericus and Dathe On Kings, ad loc.; Becke, Paraphr. Child. ad Chron., ad loc., p. 7; Michaelis, Suppil., 1741, and In Jure Mosonic, lii, 332; Bottecher, Specim. of these far-fetched explanations there is no occasion; the passages simply refer to a caravan of horse-merchants carrying on the commerce of Solomon with Egypt (see Taylor, Fragments, No. 190).

LINGA (a Sanscrit word which literally means a sign or symbol) denotes, in the sectarian worship of the Hindus, the phallus as an emblem of the generative or generative power of nature. The Linga-worship practise with the Saivas, or adorers of Siva. See HINDUISM. Originally of an ideal and mystical nature, it has degenerated into practices of the grossest description, thus taking the same course as the similar worship of the Chaldeans, Grecians, and other nations of the East. The accounts how Linga became a representative of Siva vary greatly, but coincide in the main in that Siva, having scandalized the penitent saints by his amour with Parwati, was cursed by them to be changed into what occupied so much his being, and to lose his genitals, by which he had given offence; later, when finding the punishment not in proportion to the result, they resolved to hold that very sign in reverence. It is most probable that the organ of generation was here considered in the same light as Phallos and Priapus in Egypt and Greece. The manner in which the Linga is represented is generally inoffensive—the phallic flower, a pillar of stone, or other erect and cylindrical objects being held as appropriate symbols of the generative power of Siva. Its counterpart is Tami, or the symbol of female nature as fructified and productive. The Siva-Purana names twelve Lingas which seem to have been the chief objects of this worship in India. LINGARD, John, D.D., LL.D., a Roman Catholic priest, and one of the most eminent of modern historians, was born at Winchester, England, Feb. 5, 1771. He studied at the Roman Catholic College of Douai, France, and remained there until obliged by the horrors of the French Revolution to return to England. The college was finally settled at Ushaw, near the city of Durham; and Mr. Lingard there performed the duties of some of its offices. He revisited France for a short time during the dangers period of the Revolution and on one occasion barely escaped being mobbed as a priest. In 1806 he wrote for the Newcastle Courant a series of letters, which were collected and published under the title of Catholic Loyalty vindicated (12mo). He afterwards wrote several controversial pamphlets, which in 1818 were published in a volume having the title of Tracts on several Subjects connected with the Civil and Religious Principles of the Catholics (reprinted by F. Lucas, Jr., at Baltimore, 1823, 12mo, and often). Dr. Lingard's great work, however, is his History of England, from the accession of William and Mary to 1807 (London, 1819—21, 5 vols.; 2d edit. 1823—31, 14 vols.; 3d edit. 1837, 18 vols.; 4th ed. 1849—50, 10 vols.; 5th ed. 1854—55, 10 vols.; American edit. published at New York by Dunigan, N.Y., vol. 1, ed. 1823—24; by Sampson & Co., of Boston, 1855—54, 13 vols.; of which the last is the best). It is a work of great research, founded on ancient writers and original documents, displaying much erudition and acuteness, and opening fields of inquiry previously unexplored. The narrative is clear, the dates are accurately given, and the style is adapted to its subject. The style is perspicuous, terse, and unostentatious. The work, perhaps, exhibits too exclusively the great facts and circumstances, military, civil, and ecclesiastical, and enter less than might be desirable into the lives of persons, arts, and institutions of the people. In all matters connected with the Roman Church the work is, as might have been expected, colored by the very decided religious opinions of the author, but those are not offensive set forth. Dr. Lingard, after the completion of his History of England, in 1824, wrote and published a work, the Great Days of England, in which he endeavored to make him cardinal, but he refused the dignity, partly because he did not feel qualified for the office, and partly because it would have interfered with his favorite studies. He spent the last forty years of his life in the small preceptory belonging to the Roman School-church at the village of Horpcs Hall, near Lancaster, enjoying the esteem and friendship of all, both Protestants and Roman Catholics. He died July 13, 1851, and was buried in the cemetery of St. Cuthbert's College, at Ushaw, to which institution he bequeathed his library. Lingard was also the author of a Catechism of the Doctrine and Worship of the Catholic Church (2d edit. Lond. 1840, 12mo; 3d edit. 1844, 18mo)—A Review of certain Anti-Catholic Publications (Lond. 1819, 8vo)—Examination of certain Opinions advanced by Bishop Burgess (anon.) (Manchester, 1819, 8vo)—Characters on Dr. Marsh's Comparative View of the Churches of England and Rome (Lond. 1815, 8vo)—Observations on the Laws and Ordinances which exist in Foreign States relative to the Religious concerns of their Roman Catholic Subjects (anon.) (Lond. 1817, 8vo)—Documents to ascertain the Sentiments of British Catholics in former Ages respecting the Power of the Pope (Lond. 1819, 8vo)—The History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church (Lond. 1819, 1854, 2 vols.; Phil. 1841, 12mo). In 1856 he published anonymously an English translation of the N. T., which is said to be accurate and faithful in several passages where the Douai translation is faulty. See Engl. Cyclo. s. v.; the London Times (July 25, 1851); Gentleman's Magazine (Sept. 1851, p. 323 sq.); Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vol. viii, s. v.; Lowndes, Brit. Lib. p. 1856 sq.; Brit. and For. LINGENDES, Claude de, a noted French pupil orator of the Jesuits, was born at Mölins in 1591. He entered the order, and soon rose to high distinction. He was intrusted with several important missions. He died at Paris, where he was superior of his order, April Lingendes, Jean de, a French pulpit orator, a relative of the preceding, was born at Moulins in 1695. As chaplain to Louis XIII, he became quite eminent for his great talents in the pulpit. He was made bishop of Macon in 1630. He died in 1665. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxi, 259.

Linck, Johann Wolfgang Conrad, a German theologian, was born at Pirmasens April 28, 1758. In 1771 he entered the University of Giessen, and in 1774 was graduated A.M. In 1775 he obtained the chair of philosophy at that university as professor extraordinary, and in 1776 he became pastor at Bischofsheim, near Darmstadt. He died suddenly Dec. 4, 1788. In addition to his theological researches, his extensive knowledge of modern languages enabled him to translate English works into German and German productions into English, the latter for the "universal English Library." Of his own compositions we mention Uber das hebräische Sprachstudium (Gießen, 1777, 8vo); Diss. de Schicklo a Jacobo predicto Genes. 49, 10 (ibid, 1774, 4to). See Düring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschl. vol. ii, s. v.

Link, Wenceslaus, a German theologian, noted for his efforts in behalf of Martin Luther and the cause of the reformational movement, was born at Colditz, near Markkleeberg, Saxony, about 1498. He was an Augustinian monk of the convent Waldeck when he went to the Wittenberg University to pursue theological studies, and, after attaining to the distinction of doctor of theology, became successively prior of the convents at Wittenberg, Munich, Nuremberg, etc. He enjoyed great notoriety and popularity when the reformation was first assuming shape, but his leaning towards it made him unpopular with Romanists, and he gradually went over to the new cause. In 1529 he married, and two years later appeared as Protestant preacher at Nuremberg. He died there March 11, 1547. His works are not of any special merit. A list of them is given in Jöcher, Gelehrten Lexikon, ii, 2442 sq.

Linn, John Blair, D.D., son of the succeeding, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Shippensburg, Pa., March 14, 1777, and graduated in 1796 at Columbia College, where he distinguished himself by his proficiency in polite literature. Having avoided the study of law, he removed to Schenectady, where he studied theology, and was licensed in 1798. He was ordained in 1799, and installed in the First Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, where he continued until his sudden death, August 26, 1827. Linn was quite a poet, and most of his publications are of a poetical nature. His best works are, Pieces in Prose and Poetry:—A Sermon on the Death of Dr. Erving (1802) —A Poem on the Influence of Christianity:—a narrative poem, entitled Felixian, with a sketch of his life by Charles Brockden Brown (1805, 8vo); and two tracts against the doctrine of Dr. Priestley. See Sprague, Ammals, iv, 210; Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Linn, William, D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born near Shippensburg, Pa., Feb. 27, 1752. He graduated from Princeton College in 1772 with honor, studied divinity with Rev. Dr. Robert Coffer, of Middle Spring, Pa., and in 1775 was licensed to preach by Donegal Presbytery. Fired with the patriotism of the Revolution, he became a chaplain in Gen. Thompson's regiment, and was ordained to the ministry at this period. His regiment being soon ordered to Canada, for domestic service, he was ordered his chaplainship at Big Spring, he taught an academy in Somerset County, Md., with success, until in 1786 he became pastor of a Presbyterian church at Elizabethtown, N. J., from whence he removed to New York in the same year as one of the pastors of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church. He was full of genius and power. His sermons were written, and committed to memory. His delivery was graceful, natural, animated, and accompanied by that electric power which thrills and sways an audience. His imagination was vivid, his language choice and classical, and his pictorial ability remarkable. He was celebrated for his missionary and charitable discourses. "Earnest, pathetic, persuasive, and alarming in his addresses, he peculiarly excelled in awakening sinners and urging them to the refuge of the Gospel. On special occasions he showed, with impassioned lure, and regret, the feeling of his own self." In consequence of the failure of his health, he retired from the active ministry in 1805, and died at Albany Jan. 8, 1808. Among his published addresses are some of his celebrated missionary and charity sermons, historical discourses, controversial theologies, sermons on Washington, delivered before the New York State Society of the Cincinnati, and a sermon preached in 1776 to a regiment of soldiers who were about to join the army.—Sprague, Ammals, vol. ix; Dr. De Witt's History of the Diverse; Dr. Bradford's Funeral Sermon, etc. (W. Linus (usually Aivo, but prop. Aivo, the name originally of a mythical and musical personage, perhaps from Aios, Aio, one of the Christians at Rome whose Paschal feast went to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21), A.D. 64. He is said to have been the first bishop of Rome after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul (Irenæus, Adv. Haer. iii. 8; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iii. 2, 4, 13, 14, 81; v. 6; comp. Jerome, De Viris Illust. 15; Augustine, Epist. liii. 3; Theodoret, ad 2 Tim. iv. 21, but there is some discrepancy in the early statement respecting his date (see Heinichen ad Euseb. iii. 187; Burton, Hist. of the Christ. Church; Lardner, Works, ii, 81, 32, 176, 187). "Eusebius and Theodoret, followed by Baronius and Tillemont (Hist. Eccles. ii. 165, 591), state that he became bishop of Rome after the death of St. Peter. On the other hand, the words of Irenæus, "Peter and Paul, when they founded and built up the Church of Rome," committed the office of its episcopate to Linus," certainly admit, or rather imply the meaning that he held that office before the death of St. Peter; as if the two great apostles were the dischargers of that office. The church of Rome, after the death of Irenæus, "Peter and Paul," when they built and completed the church of Rome, committed the office of its episcopate to Linus," certainly admit, or rather imply the meaning that he held that office before the death of St. Peter; as if the two great apostles were the dischargers of that office. The church of Rome, after the death of Irenæus, "Peter and Paul," when they built and completed the church of Rome, left it under the government of Linus, and passed on to teach in some new region. This proceeding would be in accordance with the practice of the apostles in other places. The earlier appointment of Linus is asserted as a fact by Ruffinus (Proph. in Clem. Romig.), and by the author of ch. xlvii, bk. vii. of the Apostolic Constitutions. It is accepted as the true statement of the case by bishop Pearson (De Servis et Successionibus Priorum Romae Episcoporum, ii, 5, § 1) and by Fleury (Hist. Ecc. ii. 26). Some persons have objected that the undistinguishable mention of the name of Linus between the names of two other Roman Christians in 2 Tim. iv. 21 is a proof that he was not at that time bishop of Rome. But even Tilmont admits that such a way of introducing the bishop's name is in accordance with the simplicity of that age. According to tradition, he went to Rome when 22 years of age, made there the acquaintance of Peter, and was sent by him to Besançon, in France, to preach the Gospel. After his return to Rome Peter ap-painted him his coadjutor; but, according to the Breviary, he was the one who \textit{praeux post Petrum gubernavi ecclesiam}. He is said to have enacted, on his accession to the bishopric, that, in accordance with 1 Cor. xi, 5, women should never enter the church with their heads uncovered.

The question of his episcopate is given by Eusebius \cite{EusebiusChron}, \textit{Church History}, as 66-76; by Baronius as 67-78; and by Pearson as 53-57. Pearson, in the preface already quoted (i, 10), gives his reasons for disturbing the chronology of Eusebius as regards the year of the early bishops of Rome, and he derives his own opinion from certain very ancient (but interpolated) lists of those bishops (see i, 13, and ii, 5). This point has been subsequently considered by Baratierus (De Successionibus Antiquissimis Episc. Rom., 1740), who gives A.D. 56-57 as the date of the episcopate of Linus.

"The statement of Ruffinus, that Linus and Cletus were bishops in Rome while St. Peter was alive, has been quoted in support of a theory which sprung up in the latter part of the 4th century and remained current until the decline of the authority of the Emperor at the hands of the Christian clergy. The statement is found in the works of Tertullian, who says (De Spiritu, cap. 31): "Christ, when he ascended to heaven, left two bishops behind him, Peter and Paul." Tertullian's statement took place immediately before he became bishop of Rome; and the statement of Ruffinus, so far as it lends any support to the above-named theory, is shown to be without foundation by Pearson (ii, 3, 4). Tillemon's observations (p. 590) in reply to Pearson only show that the establishment of two bishops in the Roman Church was not supposed to be continued beyond the lifetime of the Roman Church, since only the first bishop was recognized as such. In the case of the bishopric of Rome, the see was divided into two equal parts, and it was in one of these parts, and not in both, that the bishopric was first established. The latter part of the 4th century, when Ruffinus lived, is the time when the controversy over the authority of the Roman Church began. The controversy over the authority of the Roman Church was not decided by the Church, and it was not decided until the 2nd century, when the authority of the Roman Church was finally established. The authority of the Roman Church was established by the see of Rome, and not by the see of Lyons, which was established at a later date. The see of Rome was established by the see of Lyons, and not by the see of Rome.

the protection of the old pair to hunt independently (Ezek. xix, 2, 3, 5, 6; xii, 19; Psa. xci, 12; Prov. xix, 12; xxvi, 1; Isa. xxxiv, 1, Jer. vi, 38; Hos. vii, 4; Nah. ii, 11; Zech. xi, 2), old enough to roar (Judg. xiv, 5; Psa. civ, 12; Jer. ii, 15; Amos iii, 4); beginning to seek prey for itself (Job iv, 10; xxxviii, 39; Isa. ix, 29; Jer. xxvi, 38; Ezek. xiii, 5; Mic. v, 8), and ferocious and blood-thirsty in his youthful strength (Psa. xvii, 12; xci, 13; Isa. xi, 6). This term is also used tropically for cruel and blood-thirsty enemies (Ezek. xiv, 10; xxvi, 17; Jer. ix, 15; Pharaoh, king of Egypt, is called a "young lion of the nations," i.e., an enemy prowling among them (Ezek. xxxii, 2); it is also used of the young princes or warriors of a state (Ezek. xxxviii, 13; Nah. ii, 15). 3. "ny arī" (the puler in pieces, plur. masc. in 1 Kings x, 20, elsewhere fem.), or "my arēh" (the same with 17 paragogic, also Chald.), an adult and vigorous lion, a lion having paired, vigilant and enterprising in search of prey (Nah. ii, 12; 2 Sam. xvii, 10; Num. xxiii, 24, etc.). This is the common name of the animal. 4. בֵּית שָׁכַח (the roarer), a mature lion in full strength (Job iv, 10; x, 16; xxviii, 8; Psa. xci, 13; Prov. xxvi, 13; Hos. v, 14; xii, 7). Bochart (Hieroz. i, 717) understands the meek lion of Syria (Pliney, H. N. viii, 17), deriving the name from "ārēh, black, by an interchange of liquids. This denomination may very possibly refer to a distinct variety of lion, and not to a black species or race, because neither black nor white lions are recorded, excepting in Oppian (De Venat. iii, 45); but the term may be safely referred to the color of the skin, not of the fur; for some lions have the former fair, and even rosy, while in others, the color is perfectly black. An Asiatic lioness, formerly at Exeter Change, had the naked part of the nose, the roof of the mouth, and the bare soles of all the feet pure black, though the fur itself was very pale buff. Yet albism and melanism are not uncommon in the feline: the former occurs in tigers, and the latter is frequent in leopards, panthers, and jaguars. 5. שָׂכָה (the strong), a fierce lion, one in a state of fury, or rather, perhaps, a poetical term for a lion that has reached the utmost growth and effectiveness (Job iv, 11; Prov. xxx, 30; Isa. xxx, 6). 6. לֵבִישׁ, "levis," or "lebē, levis" (lounging, roaring), hence a lion, lioness (Numb. xxiv, 9; Hos. xiii, 7; Joel i, 6; Deut. xxxiii, 30; Psa. lxxi, 4; Isa. x, 29). Bochart (Hieroz. i, 719) supposes this word not to denote the male lion, but the lioness; and Genesisius (Theod. p. 788) says this rests on good grounds, as it is coupled with other words denoting a lion, where it can hardly be a mere synonym (Gen. xlix, 9; Numb. xxiv, 9; Isa. xxx, 6; Nah. ii, 11); and in the paschal ordinance (Job iv, 11; xxxviii, 39; Ezek. xii, 2; accord much better with a lioness than with a lion. 7. In Job xxxviii, 8, the Heb. words שָׂכָה, שָׂכִים, beney sha'achats, are rendered "the whale's whelps." The terms properly signify "sons of pride," and are applied to the larger beasts of prey, as the lion, leviathan, so called from their proud gait, boldness, and courage. The lion is often spoken of as "the king of the forest," or "the king of beasts," and in a similar sense, in Job xlii, 34, the leviathan or crocodile is called "the king over all the children of pride," that is, the head of the animal creation (see Bochart, Hieroz. i, 719). So Wunni. 8. As "king of beasts," "the lion is the largest and most formidable armed of all carnassier animals, the Indian tiger alone claiming to be his equal. One full grown, of Asiatic race, weighs above 450 pounds, and those of Africa often above 500 pounds. The fall of a force-paw in striking has been estimated to be equal to twenty-five pounds weight, and this, with the grasp of the claws, cutting four inches in depth, is sufficiently powerful to break the vertebrae of an ox. The huge laminate teeth and jagged molars, worked by powerful jaws, and the tongue entirely covered with horny papil-Lions are monogamous, the male living constantly with the lioness, both hunting together, or for each other when there is a litter of whelps, and the mutual affection and care for their offspring which they display are remarkable in animals doomed by nature to live by blood and slaughter. It is while seeking prey for their young that they are most dangerous; at other times they bear abstinence, and when pressed by hunger will sometimes feed on carcases found dead. They live more than fifty years; consequently, having annual litters of from three to five cubs, they multiply rapidly when not seriously opposed. Zoologists consider Africa the primitive abode of lions, their progress towards the north and west having at one time extended to the forests of Macedonia and Greece, but in Asia never to the south of the Nerbudda nor east of the Lower Ganges. Since the invention of gunpowder, and even since the havoc which the ostentatious barbarism of Roman grandees made among them, they have diminished in number exceedingly, although at the present day individuals are not infrequently seen in Barbary, within a short distance of Ceuta” (Kitto).

“Naturalists are disposed to consider the lion as a genus, consisting of some three or four species. Two of these are found in Asia, the one called, from the scantiness of its mane, the maneless lion (Leo Goozeratensis), found only in Western India, and the other furnished with that appendage in its ordinary profession (L. Astatique), which is spread over Bengal, Persia, the Euphrates Valley, and some parts of Arabia. This is smaller, and more slightly built than the African lions, with a fur of a lighter yellow. It is doubtless, however, whether it is really more than variety.”

“The lion of Palestine was in all probability the Asiatic variety, described by Aristotle (H. A. ix, 44) and Pliny (viii, 18) as distinguished by its short curly mane, and by being shorter and rounder in shape, like the sculptured lion found at Aruban (Layard, Niniveh and Babylon, p. 278). It was less daring than the longer-haired species, but when driven by hunger it not only ventured to attack the flocks in the desert in presence of the shepherd (Isa. xxxiii, 4; 1 Sam. xvii, 54), but laid waste towns and villages (2 Kings xvii, 25, 26; Prov. xxii, 13; xxxvi, 13), and devoured men (1 Kings xii, 24; xx, 36; 2 Kings xvii, 26; Ezek. xix, 8, 9). The shepherds sometimes ventured to encounter the lion single-handed (1 Sam. xvii, 34), and the vivid figure employed by Amos (iii, 12), the herdsman of Tekoa, was but the transcript of a scene which he must have often witnessed. At other times they pursued the animal in large bands, raising loud shouts to intimidate him (Isa. xxxi, 4) and drive him into the net or pit they had prepared to catch him (Ezek. xix, 4, 8). This method of capturing wild beasts is described by Xenophon (De Vasal. xi) and by Shaw, who says, ‘The Arabs dig a pit where they are observed to enter, and, covering it over tightly with reeds or small branches of trees, they frequently decoy and catch them’ (Travels, 2d ed. p. 172).

Lion at Aruban.

Benaiash, one of David’s heroic body-guard, had distinguished himself by slaying a lion in his den (2 Sam. xxiii, 20). The kings of Persia had a menagerie of lions (25, 568, Dan. vi, 7, etc.). When captured alive they were put in a cage (Ezek. xix, 9), but it does not appear that they were tamed. In the hunting scenes at Beni-Hassan tame lions are represented as used in hunting (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, iii, 17). On the bas-reliefs at Kouyunjik a lion led by a chain is among the presents brought by the conquerors to their victors (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 189). Wilkinson says: "The worship of the lion was particularly regarded in the city of Leontopolis, and other cities adored this animal as the emblem of more than one deity." It was the symbol of strength, and therefore typical of the Egyptian Hercules (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, v, 169). In Babylon it appears to have been the custom to throw offenders to be devoured by lions kept in dens for that purpose (Dan. vi, 7-29). This is thought to be confirmed by the evidence of several ancient monuments, brought to light by the researches of recent travellers, on the sites of Babylon and Susa, which represent lions destroying and preying upon human beings. See Den. The Assyrian monuments abound in illustrations of lion-hunting, which appears to have been a favorite pastime, especially with royalty (Layard, Nineveh, i, 180). See Hunting.

"The terrible roar of the lion is expressed in Hebrew by four different words, between which the following distinction appears to be maintained: לְבַרָא, šēdōq (Judg. xiv, 6; Psa. xxii, 13; civ, 21; Amos iii, 4), also used of the thunder (Job xxxvii, 4), denotes the roar of the lion while seeking his prey; נָזָהמ (Isa. v, 29), expresses the cry which he utters when he seizes his victim; נָזָה, הַדְּגָה (Isa. xxxi, 4), the growl with which he defies any attempt to snatch the prey from his teeth; while נָזָה, נַעֲר (Jer. ii, 38), which in Syriac is applied to the braying of the ass and camel, is descriptive of the cry of the young lions. If this distinction be correct, the meaning attached to נָזָה will give force to Prov. xix, 12. The terms which describe the movements of the animal are equally distinct: יַדְבַּר, rābēs (Gen. xlix, 9; Ezek. xix, 2), is applied to the crouching of the lion, as well as of any wild beast, in his lair; יַדְבַּר, šēdēhā (נָזָה, יַדְבַּר, Job xxxviii, 40), and וְיִשְׁתַּב, ṣūḇ (Psa. xxx, 9), to his lying in wait in his den; the two former denoting the position of the animal, and the latter the secrecy of the act; וְיִשְׁתַּב, rāmēs (Psa. civ, 20), is used of the stealthy creeping of the lion after his prey; and רַפְיָא, אֵיתָר (Deut. xxxiii, 22), of the leap with which he hurls himself upon it" (Smith). "The Scriptures present many striking pictures of lions, touched with wonderful force and fidelity; even where the animal is a direct instrument of the Almighty, while true to his mission, he still remains so to his nature. Thus nothing can be more graphic than the record of the man of God (1 Kings xiii, 28), disobedient to his charge, struck down from his ass, and lying dead, while the lion stands by him, without touching him. In the stainless body of the living animal, usually a favorite prey. (See also Gen. xlix, 9; Job iv, 10, 11; Nah. ii, 11, 12). Sambon's adventure also with the young lion (Judg. xiv, 6, 8), and the picture of the young lion coming up from the underwood cover on the banks of the Jordan, all attest a perfect knowledge of the animal and its habits. Finally, the lions in the den with Daniel, miraculously leaving him un molested, still retain, in all other respects, the real characteristics of their nature."

"The strength (Judg. xiv, 18, Prov. xxx, 30; 2 Sam. i, 29), courage (2 Sam. xvii, 10; Prov. xxvii, 1; Isa. xxxi, 4; Nah. ii, 11), and ferocity (Gen. xliv, 9; Num. xxix, 9) of the lion were proverbial. The 'lion-faced' warriors of God were among David's most valiant troops (1 Chron. xii, 8), and the hero Judas Maccabæus is described as 'like a lion, and like a lion's whelp roaring for his prey' (1 Macc. iii, 43)." Hence the lion, as an emblem of power, was symbolical of the tribe of Judah (Gen. xlix, 9). Grotius thinks the passage in Ezek. xix, 2, 8, alludes to this fact that Judas was among the nations like a lioness among the beasts of the forest; she had strength and sovereignty. The same type of sovereignty recurs in the prophetic visions, and the figure of this animal was among the few which the Hebrews admitted in sculpture or in cast metal, as exemplified in the throne of Solomon (1 Kings x, 19, 20) and the brazen sea (1 Kings vii, 29, 36). The heathen assumed the lion as an emblem of the sun, of the great war, of Area, Ariel, Arioth, Re, the Indian Siva, of dominion in general, of valor, etc.; and it occurs in the names and standards of many nations. This illustrates Dan. vii, 4, "The first was like a lion, and had eagle's wings. The Chaldean or Babylonian empire is here represented (see Jer. xv, 7). Its progress, indeed, was rapid; but it had then deemed universal empire was rapid, and therefore it has the wings of an eagle (see Jer. xlviii, 40, and Ezek. xviii, 8). It is said by Megasthenes and Strabo that this power advanced as far as Spain. When its wings were plucked or torn out, that is, when it was checked in its progress by frequent defeats, it became more peaceable and humane, agreeably to that idea of Psa. ix, 20. A remarkable coincidence between the symbolic figure of Daniel's vision and the creations of ancient Assyrian art has lately been brought to light by the researches of Layard and Botta on the sites of Babylon and Nineveh. See Churb. In Isa. xxix, 1, 'Wo to the lion of God, the city where David dwelt!' Jerusalem is denoted, and the terms used appear to signify the strength of the place, by which it was enabled to resist and withstand the enemies. So of the great sea monster. The apostle Paul says (2 Tim. iv, 17), 'I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.' The general opinion is that Nero is here meant, or, rather, his prefect Elius Cesarianus, to whom Nero committed the government of the city of Rome during his absence, with power to put to death whomever he pleased. See Paul. So when Tiberius died, Maryus said to Agrippa, 'The lion is dead.' So likewise speaks Esther of Artaurus, in the apocryphal chapters of that book (ch. xiv, 13), 'Put a word into my mouth before the lion.' There are some commentators who regard the apostle's expression as a proverbial one for a deliverance from any great or imminent danger, but others conclude that he had been actually delivered from a lion let loose against him in the amphitheatre. That the same symbol should sometimes be applied to opposite characters is not at all surprising or inconsistent, since different qualities may be combined in one symbol, of which the good may be referred to the one, the bad to another. Thus in the lion reside courage and victory over antagonists. In these respects it may be and is employed as a symbol of Christ, called the Lion of the tribe of Judah (Rev. v, 5), as being the..."

In the ancient Jewish war, as in the image of Satan:

LIONESS. See LION.

Lip (לוב, laphak), usually in the dual; Gr. χίλιοι, besides its literal sense (e.g. Isa. xxxvi. 29; Cant. iv. 3, 11; Prov. xxxiv. 28), and in the original metaphorically for an edge or border, as of a cup (1 Kings vii. 26), of a garment (Exod. xxv. 32), of a curtain (Exod. xxvi. 4; xxxvi. 11), of the sea (Gen. xxxii. 17; Exod. ii. 8; Heb. xii. 12), of the Jordan (2 Kings ii. 13; Judg. vii. 22), is often used as an organ of speech, e.g. to "open the lips," i.e. to begin to speak (Job xi. 5; xxxvi. 20), also to "open the lips" of another, i.e. to cause him to speak (Ps. li. 17), and to "refrain the lips," i.e. to keep silent (Ps. xi. 10; Prov. x. 19). So speech or discourse is said to be "upon the lips" (Prov. xvii. 10; Ps. xvi. 4), once "under the lips" (Ps. cxxi. 4; Rom. iii. 13; comp. Ezek. xxxvi. 5), and likewise "singing with lips" (Job iii. 10; xii. 20; Ps. xvi. 3), and "uncircumcised of lips," i.e. not of ready speech (Exod. vi. 13), and "bald of the lips" (Job xii. 15; 1 Pet. iii. 5), and, by a bolder figure, "the calves of the lips," i.e. the face-offering ( Hos. vi. 2), finally, the motion of the lips in speaking (Matt. xv. 8; Mark vii. 6; from Isa. xxii. 13). By metonymy, "lip" stands in Scripture for a manner of speech, e.g. in a nation, a dis- sect (Gen. xi. 6, 7, 9; Isa. xix. 18; Ezek. iii. 5, 6; 1 Cor. xiv. 21, alluding to Isa. xxxvii. 11), or, in individuals, the moral quality of language, as "lying lips," etc., i.e. falsehood (Prov. xvi. 18; comp. xviii. 4, 7) or wickedness (Ps. cxxx. 2, 3), trust (Prov. xii. 19); "burning lips," i.e. ardent professions (Prov. xxvi. 23); "sweetness of lips," i.e. pleasant discourse (Prov. xxvi. 21; so Zeph. iii. 9; isa. vi. 5; Ps. xvi. 8, 9). To "shoot out the lip" at any one. i. e. to make mouths, has always been an expression of the utmost scorn and defance (Ps. xxii. 6). In like manner, "unclean lips" are put as a repre- sentation of unfitness to impart or receive the divine communications (Isa. vi. 5, 7). Also the "word of one's lips," i.e. communication, e.g. Jehovah's precepts (Ps. xvi. 4), comp. xxxvi. 16; spoken of something before unknown, Ps. lxxii. 6), elsewhere in a bad sense, i.e. vain words, and many such words (Isa. xxxvi. 5; Prov. xiv. 23), and so of the person uttering them, e.g. a man of talk, i.e. an idle talker (Job xii. 2), a prating fool (Prov. x. 8; comp. Lev. iv. 4; Ps. cxi. 32), See MOUTH.

The "upper lip" (לוע, slopham), a derivative of the above), which the leper was required to cover (Lev. xiv. 49), refers to the lip-beard or moustachios, as the Venet. Greek (μύκης) there and the Sept. in 2 Sam. xii. 24, render it, being the beard (in the latter passage), which Mephibosheth neglected to trim during David's absence in token of grief. The same practice of "cov- ering the lip" is seen in the "unclean lips" (comp. "unclean face"), as a sign of mourning, is alluded to in Ezek. xxiv. 17, 22; Mic. iii. 7, where the Sept. has στομα, χιλια. See MOUTH.

LIPPMANN, JOXOES (of Mithuhausen), also called Tob-Jomi (תוב-יום), a Jewish writer and rabbi of the Middle Ages, was born, according to some, at Cracow, Poland, but most authorities are now agreed that he was educated at Prague about the middle of the 14th century. While a resident of the Bohemian capital he brought forward his Nitschach (נתשהך, Victory), an important polemical work. It consists of seven parts, divided, he tells us himself in his preface, "according to the seven days of the week," and of 584 sections, "according to the number of days in the lunar year, in which is the mutual bound of every Jew to make every day his life, and to remove every obstruction from the boundaries of his faith." In his treatment of the subject, the denial of the authenticity of the Christian religion, Lipmann does not adopt any systematic plan, but discusses and explains every passage of the Hebrew Bible which is either adduced by Christians as a Messianic prophecy referring to Christ, or is used by sceptics and blasphemers to support their scepticism and contempt for revelations, or is appealed to by rational- istic Jews to elaborate their rejection of Christianity, or to create out of nothing, the resurrection of the body, etc., beginning with Genesis and ending with Chronicles, according to the order of the books in the Hebrew Bible, so that any passage in dispute might easily be found. The work, which, as we have seen from its dis- visions, partook both of the character of a Jewish pole- mic and an O.-T. apologetic, was, until near the middle of the 16th century, entirely controlled by Jews. They largely transcribed and circulated it in MS. form among their people throughout the world; and in the numerous attacks which they had to sustain by both rationalists and rationalists during the time of the Reformation, this book constituted their chief arsenal, supplying them with weapons to defend themselves. About 1642 the learned Haespan, then professor in the Bavarian University at Altdorf, was engaged in a controversy on the question of the Jewish character of Judges and Christian- ity with a neighboring rabbi residing in Schnei- tach, who in his dissertations frequently referred to this Nitschach (a MS. copy made in 1589), which Haes- pan asked the privilege to examine. Refused again and again, he at last called with three of his students to the rabbi, when he pressed in such a manner to produce the MS. that he could not refuse. He pretended to examine it, and when the students had fairly surrounded the rabbi, the professor made way to the door, got into a conveyance which was waiting for him, had the MS. speedily transcribed, and only returned it to the rabbi after much earnest solicitation. The professor enriched it by valuable notes and an index, and then presented the work procured in such a dastardly manner to the Christian world (Altdorf, 1644). It was rapidly reprinted, translated into Latin, correc- ted and refuted by Blumenau, and others as regards the Christian, etc., Latin concordem (Altdorf, 1645); Wag- genseil, Tela ignus Satanae (Altdorf, 1681); Sota, Liber Miscellaneus de Ueore Adullerae Suspecta (Altdorf, 1674), Appendix, and others (see Wolf, Bibl. Jud. i. 447 sq.). Lipmann's work was a true key to our understanding of the sub- sequent. Jewish historians represent him as having been among the prisoners arrested at Prague (Aug. 8, 1839) for irreverent mention, etc., of the name of Jesus. What punishment he suffered is not known; certain it is that he was not one of the seventy-seven Jews who were exe- cuted on the day of the character of King Wenceslas (Aug. 22, 1400), for he mentions the fact himself in the Nitschach. Lippe, sometimes also (but less properly) Lippe- Detmold, a small principality of Northern Germany, surrounded to the north and west by Westphalia, to the south and E. and N. by Hanover, Brunswick, Waldeck, and a detached portion of Hesse-Cassel, extends over an area of 488 square miles, and has a population (1895) of 228,250, mainly belonging to the Reformed Church. The earli- est inhabitants were the Cherusci; subsequently it was a part of the country of the Saxons. The first estab- lishment of Christianity in that province dates back to Charlemagne. In the very beginning of his war against the Saxons, in 772, he took the castrum Areburgum (probably Radtberg, on the Diemel, near the southern frontier of the principality), and there destroyed the statue of the idol Irmannaei. In 776 he went to Lippeschützen, a new church on the edge of Paderborn, both on the southern frontier of the province, obliging whole tribes of the conquered Saxons to receive baptism. In 783 Charlemagne again vanquished the Saxons in the great battle of Theutoburg (Detmold), in the very heart of the present principality. The Saxony army was entirely destroyed, and Charlemagne, in commemoration of this event, erected a church which is still in existence. The next Christmas he spent at Skidroben-supra-Ambram, now Schieder, on the Emmen, where it is said he also erected a church. But his most important measure for Christianizing the country was his establishment of the bishopric of Paderborn, embracing the district of Lippe within its diocese, for which the house of the princes of Lippe furnished many a bishop.

The Reformation early found strong supporters in Lippe. The first city of the province to adopt it was Lemgo, moved to such a course by Luther's theses against indulgences. By 1524 the Reformation was further advanced in this part of Germany by the adherents it had gained in the town of Herford, adjoining Lippe to the south. The doctrine of Melanchthon had been circulated freely. Foremost among Luther's supporters there were his colleagues the Augustine monks. One of them, Dr. John Dreyer, a native of Lemgo and a personal friend of Luther, distinguished for his learning and eloquence, was the first to preach the Gospel in Herford. In spite of the priests, the people introduced the singing of the German hymns of Luther into their churches, and all attempts to put an end to this by violence gave way before the unanimous will of the people. The first to take the decisive step of separation was Moritz Fidelis, a priest, and former student of the more orthodox evangelical doctrines, and by his influence the city was carried for Luther's doctrines. Lippestadt embraced them nearly at the same time. The monks of the Augustine convent in that city, who had sent two of their number to Wittenberg to be instructed by Luther, on their return preached the Gospel with great success to the people of Lippe and of neighboring places; and they so quickly advanced the cause of the Reformers, that when an inquisitor was sent to Lippe from Cologne in 1526 to stay the heresy, he found the evangelical party so strong that he gave up the struggle without the attempt to control it, and retired to his home. In 1528 the town was besieged by the dukes of Cleves and Juliers, and the count of Lippe forced to surrender. The evangelical ministers were of course driven away, but it was not long before permission was granted for the preaching by Lutheran ministers again. After the death of the zealous Roman Catholic count Simon V, in 1536, the Reformation made more rapid progress in the province. The landgrave Philip of Hesse and count Jobst von Hoya, two determined partisans of the Reformation, became guardians of the children of the deceased count and caused them to be diligently instructed in the Protestant doctrines; and when, in 1538, both the nobility and the people loudly demanded a reform in the Church of the count de Hoya, John Timann, surmounted Amstelredamus, and Adrian Buxschoten, both of Bremen, were called and sent to Lippe to frame a plan of evangelical organization, which was submitted to the States and to Luther, and, upon approval (1538), it was promulgated throughout the principality, and Protestant ministers were everywhere appointed. Under John von Eyeter, of Wittenberg, then general superintendent of the new church organization, a church was drawn up and printed in 1571, with the authorization of the authorities, and it is still in our day in force among the Lutheran communities of the country.

In 1600, during the reign of count Simon VI (ruled 1583–1618), who had imbibed Calvinistic views at the court of Casel, Calvinism found an entrance in Lippe. It commenced by the appointment of a Calvinistic minister to preach at Horn in 1602. This preacher at once forbade the use of the Lutheran Catechism in the schools, administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in strict Calvinistic form, and established the Reformed mode of worship in spite of the local authorities and of the people. In 1605 the same step was taken at Detmold, and was supported by the government, notwithstanding the opposition of the people and city authorities. In this manner Calvinism was established throughout the country, the nobility alone and the city of Lemgo remaining Lutheran. It was not, however, until 1684 that Calvinism was sanctioned as the state religion. In that year count Simon Henrich promulgated the Reformed ecclesiastical organization, which recognizes as its foundation the confession of the Catechism of Heidelberg, and is in force in our day. The city of Lemgo resisted these measures, and succeeded in obtaining in 1717 an edict assuring its inhabitants the fullest religious liberty, the right of appointing their own ministers, etc. But as rationalism had obtained full control of the Reformed Church of Lippe in the 18th century, upon reaction towards the middle of the 19th century the whole country, including Lemgo, was subjected to the Reformed consistory, which, however, by the admission of one Lutheran member, was not theocratic, and the synodal council of doctrine, the Heidelberg Catechism was introduced.

In 1883 the principality numbered about 2700 Roman Catholics, 6500 Lutherans, 1150 Israelites; the remainder belonged to the Reformed Church. The latter is divided into three classes, at the head of which is a superintendent; at the head of the whole clergy is a superintendent general at Detmold. The supreme ecclesiastical board for both Reformed and Lutherans is the consistory at Detmold. The principality has 48 Reformed, 5 Lutheran, and 6 Catholic parishes: the Catholics having been legally declared a foreign church (ulterius extraecclesiam). Lippomani, ALOYSIUS (or Ludovicus), born in Venice in 1510, was like renowned for his historical and linguistic learning and for the purity of his style. He was in turn bishop of Modena, Verona, and Bergamo. He was active in securing the pope's assent to the transfer of the Tridentine Council to Bologna; was for two years after the interruption of the council papal nuncio in Germany, and in 1549 one of the three presidents of the council in Poland. He made in Poland the Reformation; he had made great advances through the influence of the Hussites and of the Bohemian Brethren, as also through the Socinian movement. At the national Diet of Petrikau in 1550, 1551, and especially 1556, the prerogatives of the Catholic bishops were, through special influence of the king, Sigismund II, greatly diminished, and the Protestant theologians—such as Calvin, Melanchthon, Beza—were recognized as important authorities in matters of faith. The Confession of Hoiust, adopted in a provincial synod at Petrikau, obtained great acceptance with the people. Lippomani was specially commissioned by pope Paul IV, in 1556, as nuncio in Poland, to exert himself against this rapid progress of reform. His efforts made him peculiarly obnoxious to the adherents of Protestantism, but were without marked success. He died as bishop of Bergamo in August, 1559. He wrote commentaries on the Book of Exodus, and the Psalms, but they are of no special value to the exegete of to-day. See Wezet u. Wele, Kirchen Lexikon, s. v.; Krasinski, Hist. Sketch of the Reformation in Poland, vol. i, chap. vi. (E. B. O.)

Lipscomb, PHILIP D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Georgetown, D. C., in October, 1798.
LIPSIIUS

He was converted probably in early life, and joined the Baltimore Conference in 1852. Among his brethren in Conference assembled he was pleasant, attentive to business, safe in council. He was many years one of the stewards of the Conference. He was also for a time treasurer of the Preachers' Fund Society. A number of the years of his ministry were given to the service of the Roman Catholic Society, and was appointed to that work he retired in 1863 to a place on the superannuated list.

A minister of this Conference, who knew him long and intimately, says, "His life was beautiful in its consistency." He died in January, 1870.—Conf. Minutes, 1871.

LIPSIUS, Justus, a Roman Catholic, renowned as a scholar in the 16th century, was born near Brussels in 1557. He was precocious, and he read his Via- ria lectiones at the age of 19. He was secretary to cardinal Granville about this time (1572-74). Later, as professor of history at Jena, he became a Protestant, and remained such for 15 years while professor of ancient languages at Leyden, but subsequently he returned to the Roman Catholic Church, and was made professor at Louvain (1602). He died March 20, 1606, holding at that time the appointment of historiographer to the king of Spain. His scholarship was honored by the pope and at several European courts. He distinguished himself especially by his commentary upon Tacitus, whose works he could repeat word for word, and by his enthusiastic regard for the stoical philosophy. He wrote De Cons- tantia mea ad philosophiam Stoicam:—Physiologi Stoicorum libri tres (new ed. Antv. 1605, fol.):—also De una religione, etc. His works were collected under the title Opera Omnia (Antv. 1663; 2d edit. 1677). See Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, vol. ii, s. v.; Theol. Uni- ver. Liptines or Lestines, Synonym of (Concilia Lip- tinae). This synod was held at Liptinæ or Lestines, near the convent of Laubes, in Henegau, in 743, by order of Carloman, Bouilacius prelging. Four canons were published. The bishops, earls, and governors were promised in this council to observe the decrees of the Coun- cil of Germany (A.D. 742). All the clergy, moreover, promised obedience to the ancient canons; the abbots and monks received the order of St. Benedict, and a part of the Canons Regular of the Church, as well as a decree for a time to the prince, to enable him to carry on the wars then raging. Lismanini, Francis, a Socinian theologian, was born at Corfu in the beginning of the 16th century. He studied in Italy, joined the Franciscans, and a few years after became doctor of theology; removed to Pol- land, and was appointed by queen Bona, wife of Sigis- mund I, her preacher and confessor. He became also superior of the Franciscans of Poland, director of all the convents of the nuns of St. Clara, etc. The society of Andrew Friciasco and the reading of Ochin's works led him to the inquiry of the mystery of the Church, yet he was not displaced on account of it, but continued in favor with the queen, and was sent by her to Rome, in 1549, to congratulate Julius III on his election as pope. On his return to Poland in 1551, Lismanini be- came acquainted with Socinian, and it is this association that no doubt gave rise to the mission with which he was intrusted by the king of Poland, ostensibly for the purpose of collecting works for the royal library, but in reality to study the position of the Reformation, and to report concerning it. Lismanini accordingly visited Padua, Milan, and Switzerland, where, forming his order, embraced the Helvetic confessional, and married. The king, fearing to be compromised by this overt act, broke all connection with him, ceased to supply him with funds, and Calvin, Ballinger, and Geemper in vain sought to obtain for Lismanini leave to return to Pol- land. It was not until 1556 that he was permitted to return, but the king's favor he never regained, notwithstanding the efforts of a large number of the Polish nobility in his behalf. His Socinian views on the doc- trine of the Trinity served still more to bring him into the discredit. He was again employed upon all sorts of work he retired in 1663 to a place on the superannuated list. A minister of this Conference, who knew him long and intimately, says, "His life was beautiful in its consistency." He died in January, 1870.—Conf. Minutes, 1871.

LITANY

List, Carl, Benignus, a German theologian, was born at Mannheim, in the grand-duchy of Baden, Feb. 5, 1755. He attended the universities of Jena and Straus- burg, and afterwards spent some time in Neuchatel to acquire French. About 1749 he was appointed court dean, in 1753 third pastor of his native city, and in 1758 was appointed an assistant-rector in the Evangelical­Lutheran Church. His productions, mostly of a corrective character in liturgy and hymns, were of great service to the Church to which he belonged. We mention Die Geschichte der Evangelisch­Lutherischen Gemeinde zu Mannheim (Mannheim, 1767, 8vo);—Neue Liturgie für die Evangelisch­Lutherische Kirche in der Churfürstl. (ibid. 1780, 8vo);—Die Doctrina in Theol. Deutschl. ('ibid. 1794, 8vo, s. v.)

Litany (λιτανεία, entertain), a word the specific meaning of which has varied considerably at different times, is used in the liturgical services of some churches to designate a solemn act of supplication addressed with the object of averting the divine anger, and especially on occasions of public calamity. Hooker, in his Ecclesiastical Polity (book v, p. 260), has the following: "As things invented for one use are by us converted to more, it grew that supplications with this solemnity for the appeasing of God's wrath and the averting of public evils were of the Greek Church termed litanies; rogamiones, of the Latins." The term litanies for a supplicatory form of worship among the pagans was early adopted by Christian writers.

In the fourth century we find such occasions as litanies connected with processions, the clergy and people in solemn procession using certain forms of supplication and making special entreaty for deliverance. Whether anything of this kind would have been ven- tured before Christianity became a "religio licita" (A.D. 270) may be doubted. The predominance of a Chris- tian population, however, in certain localities, and the intervals of respite between persecutions, admitted of their possibility at an earlier period. In these earliest de- velopments, moreover, of the processional litany, whether before or during the fourth century, they rested, doubtless, upon an earlier Christian habit and custom —that of special seasons of prayer and supplication. These, in some cases, would be by the assembled body of believers in a church house or place of assembly in others, for purposes of safety from the fury of their en-emies, in their individual homes and places of abode. Certainly the Church was not wanting in such occas- ions during the first centuries of her existence, when the course pursued by the disciples was "in secret" (Acts xii, 5), and for similar reasons, would need to be repeat- ed. Occasions of this particular kind would of course pass away with the passing away of persecution. But others of a different character would take their place. As early, indeed, as the times of Tertullian and Cyprian we find allusions to Christian prayers, and fasting, and supplications for the removal of drought, the repelling of enemies, the moderation of calamities; and later, in the fourth and fifth centuries, we find the same thing, on a larger scale and in a more formal manner. These votive, preliminary to a battle, spent the whole night in fasting and prayer, and in sackcloth went with the priests and people to make supplication in all the churches. So, again, in the reign of one of his successors, the Empress Constantia, we find a prayer for a great earthquake made at Constantinople. In these last cases, the element, to which allusion has been made, that of the procession, was undoubtedly present, and so continued until the time of the Reformation; the name litany, indeed, being sometimes used simply to describe this part of it, as where seven litanies are directed by Gregory the Great to proceed from seven different churches (see below). The processions of the Arians in the times of Chrysostom, and the counter movement, on his part, by more splendid and imposing ones, to detract from any popularity which they may have at that time, is described by Socrates. It is said at all improbable that in somewhat the same manner the hymns of Arius became circulated in Alexandria in the early part of the fourth century, and found lodgment in the minds of the populace.

One division of litanies in the Western Church may be recognized after the beginning of the fifth century; and during the time of Charlemagne we find allusion to large numbers of them, to be attended to as a matter of special appointment. The Council of Orleans, A.D. 511, expressly recognizes litanies as peculiarly solemn supplications, and enjoins their use preparatory to the celebration of a high festival. In the Spanish Church, in like manner, they were observed in the week after Pentecost.
Other councils subsequently appointed them at a variety of other seasons, till, in the seventeenth Council of Toledo, A.D. 694, it was decreed that they should be used once in each month. By degrees they were extended two days in each week, and Wednesday and Friday, being the ancient station days, were set apart for the purpose. Gregory the Great instituted a service at Rome for the 25th of April, which was named Litanim Septiformis, because a form of it was formed in it of seven different classes. This service is distinguished as Litaniae Major, from its extraordinary solemnity.
The Litaniae Minores, on the other hand, are sup-bposed by Bingham to consist only of a repetition of Kpntes Kporeos, the customary response in the larger supplications, and the tri-week form of the first acts of the English Church, A.D. 747, confirming the identity of litania and rospato, but showing that originally there was a distinction between litania and exomologesis. Johannes de Janus terms litany, properly, a service for the dead. But Du Canje, by the authorities he cites for the early litanies, hazards the assertion that they differ but little from those in modern usage. In the Western litanies two features are to be found not prevalent in the Eastern—the invocation of saints, and the appointment of stated annual seasons for their use, as the rogation days of the Roman Church, and the tri-week form of the English Church.
There is, indeed, mention made of an annual litany in commemoration of the great earthquake in the reign of Justinian. But the general and present habit of the patriarchate of Constantinople has been and is to confine such services to their original purpose—extraordinary occasions.

Freeman (Principles of Divine Service, ii, 825) insists that in its origin the litany is distinctively a "eucharistic feature," and not in the least connected with the eucharistic sacrifice. So we find in the East, and so it was originally in the West also, one most notable feature being the pleading of the work of Christ in behalf of his Church. In a Syrian form given by Renadot, the priest, taking the paten and cup in his right and left hand, begins to recite a series of prayers closely associated with the eucharistic sacrifice. So we find in the East, and

The three different forms now in use in the Roman churches are called the "litanies of the saints" (which is the litany of Our Lady, the "litany of Jesus," and the "litany of Our Lady of Loreto." Of these the first alone has a place in the public service-books of the Church, on the rogation days, in the ordination service, the service for the consecration of churches, the consecration of cemeteries, and many other offices. The one called by the name of litany of the saints bears its name from the prayers it contains to the saints for their help and intercession in behalf of the worshippers. Almost every saint in the calendar of the Roman Church has his particular form in the litany. The people's response in this case is said thus: "Pax, rex, et salus." The litany of Jesus consists of a number of addresses to Christ under his various relations to men, in connection with the several details of his passion, and of adjurations of him through the memory of what he has done and suffered for the salvation of mankind. The date of this form of prayer is uncertain, but it is referred, with much probability, to the time of St. Bernardino of Siena, in the 15th century. The litany of Loreto [see Loreto] resembles both the above-named litanies in its opening addresses to the Holy Trinity and in its closing petitions to "God the Father, who art the same in all ages, in all the world;" but the main body of the petitions are addressed to the Virgin Mary under various titles, some taken from the Scriptures, some from the language of the fathers, some from the mystical writers of the medieval Church. Neither this litany nor that of Jesus has ever formed part of any of the ritual or liturgical offices of the Catholic Church, but there can be no doubt that both have in various ways received the sanction of the highest authorities of the Roman Church. Those of the Lutheran and English churches, which are very much alike, are derived from the same sources, being shorter in that these invocations are expunged.
In the Church of England it was originally a distinct service, and seems to have been used at a different time of day from the ordinary morning service, and only on certain occasions. In 1644 it was given to the people in a revised form by Henry VIII. Upon its insertion in the Prayer-book published by Edward VI. A.D. 1549, the litany was placed between the communion office and the office of baptism, under the title "The Litany and Suffrages," without any rubric for its use; but at the end of the same office (Prayer-book of 1549) the following rubric: "Upon Wednesdays and Fridays the Eng-ish litany shall be said or sung in all places, after such form as is appointed by his majesty's injunctions, or as it shall be otherwise appointed by his highness." In the revision of the Common Prayer in 1549, the litany was struck out and regulations were made that the rubric should be added to "be used on Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and at other times when it shall be commanded by the ordinary." So late as the last revision in 1661, the litany continued a distinct service by itself, used in Stations and in the morning prayer (then read at a very early hour) was concluded, the people returning home between them. The rubric which inserts the litany after the third collect in morning prayer is formed from a similar rubric in the Scotch Common Prayer-book, with this difference, that the English rubric en-joints the omission of certain of the ordinary interces-sional prayers; the Scotch rubric, on the other hand, states expressly, "without the omission of any part of the other daily service of the Church on those days." The litany of the German and Danish Lutherans closely resembles that of the Church of England and that of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, and needs, therefore, no special mention here.
The processional feature is still retained in the Greek and Roman litanies on special occasions, but is not their special accompaniment. Efforts towards its restoration in the English Church occurred in the eighteenth century, but it has not been usual since. Most of the supplications have been abandoned, and in some instances, use has been made of new supplications, depending entirely on the discretion of the ordinary.

In the following year he went to the University of Altdorf to continue his studies; in 1697 he studied at the University of Halle, and in 1698 he was admitted to the philosophical faculty of that university. His health failed, and he was obliged to leave for the native city. In 1707 he became dean at Wartburgtasting. In 1710 he accepted a call to his native city as preacher of a foun

Lithuania, a grand-duchy in Eastern Europe, which formerly constituted a part of the kingdom of Poland, and which at the partition of the kingdom was partly united with Russia (the government of Vilna, Grodno, Mohilev, Minsk, and Vitebsk), partly with Prus sia (the administrative district of Gomblinen). The area of Lithuania is about 105,000 square miles. In the earliest historic times the country of the Lithua nians was subject to the neighboring tribes, in particu lar to the Polock, and its name is that of the chiefl state it appears for the first time about 1217 under Ercaiwi, who threw off the yoke of Polock, and con quered Podlesia, Grodno, and Brezak. Eberward, about duke. His son Mindaugas, who had to cede Podlesia, Samogitia, and Courland to the prince of Halicz Note gorod and to the Teutonic Order, was in 1265 baptized by the archbishop of Riga and crowned as king; but in 1290 he was deposed. In 1268 a treaty was made by the Lithuanian and Polish nobles with the Teutonic Order, and in 1268 was slain by Svitinorto, the governor of Samogitia, who in 1268 obtained control of the country. In 1291 Pod lesia was reunited with Lithuania. In 1282 Witen became ruler of Lithuania, after murdering his predeces or. His son Gedimin (1281-1323) conquered Samo gitia and a portion of Livonia, and in 1307 he founded the towns of Vilna and Troki. The son of Gedimin, Olgerd, wholly expelled the Tartars from Po dolia, and conquered the prince Demetrius of Russia at Moscow, in 1380 at Moskau. His son Jagello was bap tized on Feb. 14, 1386, at Cracow, and on this occasion received the name of Vasiliev. The marriage of Ja gello with the princess Hedwig of Poland led to the un ion of Lithuania with Poland, and made the latter the greatest power of Eastern Europe. In 1401, and again in 1412, it was stipulated that the princes of Poland and Lithuania should be crowned jointly, and that the

See Krause, Lithauen u. dessen Bewohner (Halle, 1884); Giagarr, Lithauen und Litauer, gesammelte Skizzen (Tilsit, 1869). (A. J. S.)

Litter occurs in the Auth. Vers. as a translation of עַלָּלָל (taab, from עַלָּלָל, to more slowly), in Isa. lxvi, 20, (Sept. לֵעֶמְרָמָא), where a sedan or palauquin for the conveyance of a princely personage, borne by hand or upon the shoulders, or perhaps on the backs of animals, is evidently referred to. The original term occurs elsewhere only in Num. vi, 8, in the phrase בַּלָּלָל (egloth 'taab, carts of the litter kind, A. V., "covered waggons"), where it is used of the large and commodious vehicles employed for the transportation of the materials and furniture of the tabernacle, being drawn by oxen. The term therefore signifies properly a hand-litter, and secondarily a wagon. Litters or palauquins were, as we know, in use among the ancient Egyptians. They were borne upon the shoulders of men, and appear to have been used for carrying persons of consideration short distances on visits, like the sedan chairs of a former day in England (see Wilkinson, A. Egy. i, 78). In Cant. iii, 9, we find the word עַלָּלָל, oppannin (perhaps a foreign [Egyptian] word), Sept. ἀπαρς, Vulg. ferculum, which occurs nowhere else in Scripture, and is applied to a vehicle used by king Solomon. In the immediate context it is described as consisting of a framework of cedar-wood, in which were set silver stanchions supporting a gold railing, with a purple-covered seat, and an embroidered rug, the last a present from the Jewish ladies. This word is rendered "chariot" in our Authorized Version, although unlike any other word so rendered in that version. It literally means a moving couch, and is usually conceived to denote a kind of sedan, litter, or rather palauquin, in which great personages and women were borne from place to place. "The name as well as the object immediately suggests that it may have been nearly the same thing as the takht-ravan, the moving throne or seat of the Persians. It consists of a light frame fixed on two strong poles, like those of our sedan chair. This frame is generally covered with cloth, and has a door, sometimes of lattice-work, at each side. It is carried by two mules, one between the poles before, the other behind. These conveyances are used by great persons when disposed for retirement or ease during a journey, or when sick or feeble through age; but they are chiefly used by ladies of consideration in their journeys" (Kitto).

Some readers may remember the "litter of red cloth, adorned with pearls and jewels," together with ten mules (to bear it by turns), which king Zahr-Shah prepared for the journey of his daughter (Lane's Arabic Nights, i, 528). This was doubtless of the kind which is borne by four mules, two behind and two before. In Arabia, or in countries where Arabian usages prevail, two camels are usually employed to bear the takht-ravan, and sometimes two horses. When borne by camels, the head of the hindmost of the animals is bent painfully down under the vehicle. This is the most comfortable kind of litter, and two light persons may travel in it. "The akhširìch is another kind of camel-litter, resembling the Indian hóodzh, by which name (or rather kóddj) it is sometimes called. It is comso-Greek Church at Atakars, in the province of Sar-atoft, and diocese of the bishop of Tarzitin. The se-ceders from the orthodox Church, or founders of this neww, sect, were about two hundred and fifty in number. "They set up a new religion, and began to preach a gospel of their own devising." They condemned saints and altarpieces as idolatrour, and abandoned the use of bread and wine in the sacrament. Before they founded the new Church, which, they claim, Christ commanded them to do, it was merely recommmended, and also changed in their names. "They have no priests, and hardly any form of prayer. They keep no images, use no wafers, and make no sacred oil. Instead of the consecrated bread, they bake a cake, which they afterwards worship, as a special gift from God." This cake is like a penny bun in shape and size, but in the minds of these Little Christians it possesses a potent virtue and a mystic charm" (Dixon, Free Russia, p. 148, 144). The name they bear they gave themselves. Persecuted by the government, they have increased and are daily increasing in numbers. See RUSIA. (J. H. W.)

Littlejohn, John, an early Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Penrith, Cumberland Co., Eng.
Dec. 7, 1756; emigrated to Maryland about 1757; recelived his religious education in 1760; entered the Baltimore Conference in 1776; located on ac-cont of poor health in 1778; removed to Kentucky in 1818; re-entered the Baltimore Conference in 1831, and was the same year transferred to the Kentucky Conference as a superannuate, and died May 13, 1896. He possessed considerable mental power and energy. His piety was deep and fruitful, and hisministrations were weighty and very useful.—Minutes of Conferences, Littleston, Adam, D.D., a learned English divine, was born Nov. 8, 1627, at Hales Owen, Shropshire, and was educated first at Westminster School, and later (1647) at Christ-church, Oxford, where he was ejected by the Parliamentary visitors in 1648. He was afterward usher, and taught as second master at Westminster School (1653). He became rector of Chelsea in 1674, and the same year was made prebendary of Westminster, and received a grant to succeed Dr. Bushby in the mastership of that school. He had for some years been the king's chaplain, and in 1670 received his degree in divinity, which was conferred upon him without taking any in arts, on account of his extraordinary merit. He was for some time subdean of Westminster, and in 1687 was transferred to the church of St. Botolph, Aldersgate, London, which he held four years. He died June 30, 1694. He was an excellent philologist and grammarian, learned in the Oriental languages and Rabbbinical lore. He was the author of a Latin Dictionarv, long popular, but finally superseded by Ainaworth's. He also published many sermons and other works.—Thomas, Littleton, Edward, LL.D., an English divine, was born about the opening of the last century, and was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, entering the latter in 1716. He early turned his attention to poesy, and also studied philosophy in 1720 Mr. L.

Littleton was recalled to Eton as an assistant in the school, and in 1727 was elected a fellow, and presented to the living of Maple Derham in Oxfordshire. He was appointed June 9, 1750, chaplain in ordinary to the king, and died in 1754. He published poems and severe works as an admiring and excellent scholar.—General Biogr. Dict. s. v.

Liturgy (Greek λiturγία), a function, service, or -duty of a public character. These public services or duties among the Greeks were frequently, if not always, connected with religious ideas or ceremonies of some kind, even when the duties themselves were of a secular character—those, for instance, which had refer-ce to the supervision of theatrical exhibitions or the presiding in the public assemblies. The religious meaning of the word in each case was necessarily involved. In Isa. xiii, 8 (Sept.), the idea of religious servvice predominates; in Rom. xiii, 6, that of the secular, as under God; and again, in Luke i, 28, and in Heb. x, 11, it refers to the priestly function. At a later period we find it used by Eusebius (Life of Constantine, iv, 47) in connection with the taking of the work of the Christians by the liturgy, or the way in which the Church, in a natural process, the word which thus designated the public function or service performed by the ministry, became restricted in its meaning to the form it self—the form of words in which such service was rendered, and thus, certainly before the middle of the fifth century, we find in the Church a sense of the word liturgies, forms for the conducting of public worship and the administration of sacraments.

1. Jewish Liturgies.—This subject has, of course, its connection with the question of a similar state of things under the Jewish dispensation. Were there liturgical forms among the Jews, and, if so, to what extent? We find among the Greeks and Romans certain set forms in connection with their sacrifices, passing, it would seem, from mouth to mouth of successive priestly generations, and a usual form of prayer for the civil magistrate (Dillingham and Jedamus, it is said; among the sacred books of India, hymns and prayers to be used on stated occasions (Miller's Chips from a German Workshopp, i, 297); and in the Roman and in the Mohammedan worship, formule of a similar character (Lamé's History of Egypt, 193). How was this, in some sense, a matter with the Jews? There was, of course, a ritual of form; but was there with it also a form of words? The reading of the law, although enjoined, could hardly be said to meet this demand. There are, however, special forms in the Pentateuch which are liturgical in the strictest sense of that expression. Some of these have reference to possible contingencies, and would therefore be only occasional in their employment. Instances of this class may be found in the formula (Deut. xxii, 19), where complaint should be made to the elders by parties against a rebellious and incorrigible son. Of similar character is the formula (Deut. xxxix, 8-9) rejected with the refusal to take the widow of a deceased brother or nearest kinsman, and so perpetuate his name in Israel. Another, again, of the same class, was that appointed to be used by the elders and priests (Deut. xxii, 1-9) of cases in which the body of a murdered person should be found; and still another, and more of the nature of a stated religious service, was the prescribed declaration and mode of proceeding connected with the going out to battle (Deut. xx, 1-8). These were occasional and contingent. For some of them there might never be the actual usage, though there was the case with the first—that of the complaint against and the execution of a rebellious son. But there were others of a more stated character, having reference to regularly occurring seasons and ceremonies when they were required to be used. The priestly benediction, repeated, it would seem, upon every special gathering of the people (Numb. vi, 23-27), is an instance of this class. The form of offering of the first-fruits (Deut. xxvi, 1-15) is another: in this latter the person making the offering uses the formula, the priest receiving the offering (which is the approbation of the sacrifice and confession by the high-priest of the sins of the people over the head of the scape-goat is one of these; in any such case, a set form, passing from priestly father to son, not improbably came into use. The liturgical use of the Psalms in the Temple worship was, of course, a matter of much later arrangement. The fifteenth chapter of Ecclesiastical describes an exceptional service, and is, moreover, too indefinite in its language to justify any conclusion as to its liturgical character. During this period, however, between the captivity and the times of the New Testament, there comes to view another ecclesiastical development of Judaism which has its connection with this subject—that of the worship of the synagogue. This, which in all probability originated during the Maccabean period, in the effort to supply the want occasioned by the loss of the worship of the Temple, would in many respects be like that Temple worship; in others, and from the necessity of the case, it would be very different. The greatest of these diversities would be in the fact of the necessary presence of the sacrificial and ceremonial order, the service and priestly, their complete absence in that of the synagogue. In the Temple the Levites sang psalms of praise before the altar, and the priests blessed the people. In the synagogue there were prayers connected with the reading of certain specific passages of Scripture, of which are distinctly discernible two chief groups, around which, as time wore on, an enormous mass of liturgical poetry clustered—the one, the Shema ('Hear, Israel,' etc.), being a collection of the three Biblical pieces (Deut. vii, 4-9; xi, 13-21; Num. xv, 37-41), expressive of the unity of God and the unchangeableness of his rule, strange together without any extraneous addition; the second, the Tephillah, or Prayer, by way of eminence (adopted in the Koran as Suraat, Sur. ii, 40; comp. v. 15), consisting of a certain number of supplications, with a hymnal introduction and conclusion, and following the form of the priestly blessing. The single portions of this prayer gradually increased to eighteen, and the prayer itself received the name Shemoneh Ezech (eighteen; afterwards, however, increased to nineteen: the additional one is now twelfth in the prayer, and is against apostates [to Christianity] and heathen [all who refused the Talmud, including consequently the Karaites]. The first addition to the Shema formed the introductory thanksgiving for the renewed day (in accordance with the ordinance that every supplication must be preceded by a prayer of thanks) called Joser (Creator of Light, etc.), to which were joined the three Holies (Yaphrah), and the sup- plication for spiritual enlightening in the divine law (Ahabah). Between the Shema and the Tephillah was inserted the Geruth (Liberation), or praise for the miraculous deliverance from Egypt and the constant watchfulness of God (see Kaddish, Sabbath and Ben- ediction) and certain psalms seem to have concluded the service of that period. This was the order of the Shakaroth, or morning prayer, and very similar to this was the Maturah, or evening prayer; while in the Minckah, or afternoon prayer, the Shema was omitted. On many days of the week, especially the fast days, the order for the day was the same as on week days; but since the festive joy was to overrule all individual sorrow and supplication, the intermediate portion of the Tephillah was changed according to the special significance and the memories of the day of the solemnity, and additional prayers were introduced for these extraordinary occasions, corresponding to the additional sacrifice in the Temple, and varying according to the special solemnity of the day (Massephal, Netilah, etc.) (Chambers). Compare Etheridge, Introduction to Hebrew Literature, p. 567 sq.; Prideaux, ii, 160-170. It is likewise to be noted that in the Temple worship there were occasions and opportunities in which the individual worshipper might confess the plague of his own heart, make individual supplication, or offer individual thanksgiving. Thus it was possible to go beyond the binding of Christ for the Jewish liturgies since then, under the influence of Rabbinism, and in view of the fact that the synagogue, so far as possible, supplies the absence of the Temple, have been very much enlarged, and extend to numberless particulars. It may, in fact, be said that the whole life of the most moderate Rabbinical is dependent upon the liturgies, and that there is a rubric for every moment and movement of social as of individual existence. "The first compilation of a liturgy is recorded of Amram Gaon (A.D. 570-800); the work that has survived is that of Saadja Gaon (d. A.D. 942). These early collections of prayers generally contained also compositions from the hand of the compiler, and minor additions, such as ethical tracts, almanacs, etc., and were called Siddurim (Orders, Ritu- als), embracing the whole calendar year, week-days and the new moons, fasts and festivals. Later, the term was restricted to the week-day ritual, that for the festivals being called Mahzor (Cycle). Besides these, we find the Selichoth, or Penitential Prayers; Kinnot, or Elegies; Hosannah, or Hosannahs (for the seventh day of the Feast of Tabernacles); and Bakashoth, or Special Sup- plication, for the remission of the temple tax, their presence justifying the absence in that of the synagogue. In the Temple the Levites sang psalms of praise before the altar, and the priests blessed the people. In the synagogue there were prayers connected with the reading of certain specific passages of Scripture, of which are distinctly discernible two chief groups, around which, as time wore on, an enormous mass of liturgical poetry clustered—the one, the Shema ('Hear, Israel,' etc.), being a collection of the three Biblical pieces (Deut. vii, 4-9; xi, 13-21; Num. xv, 37-41), expressive of the unity of God and the unchangeableness of his rule, strange together without any extraneous addition; the second, the Tephillah, or Prayer, by way of eminence (adopted in the Koran as Suraat, Sur. ii, 40; comp. v. 15), consisting of a certain number of supplications, with a hymnal introduction and conclusion, and following the form of the priestly blessing. proud” (Prideaux). “Let slanderers have no hope, and all presumptuous apostates perish as in a moment; and may thine enemies, and those who hate thee, be suddenly cut off, and all those who act wickedly be suddenly broken, consumed, and rooted out; and humble thou them speedily in our days. Blessed art thou, O Lord, with thine own people, and thy house in the midst of them.” These forms of prayer, whether for the worship of the synagogue or for domestic and private use, are all appointed to be said in Hebrew. One of the best moves in this direction is the effort within the last century to remedy this evil by parallel translation. In the country the services in the synagogues are usually of this kind: either the Hebrew on one page and the English on the other, or both in parallel columns on the same page.

II. Early Christian Liturgies.—I. Their Origin. —So far as regards the primitive or apostolic age, the only testimony we have is of the kind that is contained in the Amen alled to in 1 Cor. xiv. 16; this latter an undoubted importation from the synagogue. As, moreover, we find the Master, with the twelve, singing a hymn, one of the psalms probably, on the night of the last supper, it is not at all improbable that such psalmody of the Old Testament Scripture, with which the early believers had been already familiar in the synagogue, should have still found favor in the Church. Even in free prayer fragments and sentences of old devotional forms, almost spontaneous through earlier use and sacred association, would naturally find utterance. This, however, would be the exception. Christian prayer, for its own full and peculiar utterance, must find its own peculiar modes of expression; and it would baptize into a new life and meaning any of those familiar expressions, the fragments of an earlier devotion. That men, however, who had been accustomed to liturgical worship under the old system should gradually go into it under the new, is not at all surprising; and to this special improvements before very long were presented. The demand for some form of profession of faith, of a definition of the faith, as dissensions and heresies arose, would be one of these occasions. The form of the Lord’s Supper, even by the Master, in its present usage, would become the nucleus of others. The fact, again, that the most solemn act of Christian communion, the Lord’s Supper, involved in the distribution of the elements a form of action, and that this action, in its original intenet, accompanied by a distinct formula, would have a like influence. That every thing in this respect, if not purely extemporaneous, was exceedingly simple in the time of Justin Martyr, is very manifest from his own writings. The same remark is applicable to the statement of Pliny (Ep. ad Trajan. in Ep. x. 97).

2. Primitive Type.—The earliest form in which liturgical arrangement, to any extent, is found, is that which presents itself in the Apostolic Constitutions. The following is the order of daily service, as given in these Constitutions: After the morning psalm (the sixty-third of our enumeration), prayers were offered for the several classes of catechumens, of persons possessed by evil spirits, and candidates for baptism, for penitents, and for the faithful or communicants, for the peace of the world, and for the whole state of Christ’s Church. This was followed by a short bidding prayer for preservation in the ensuing day, and by the benediction, and the whole closed with a benediction, and by his imposition of hands or benediction. The morning service was much frequented by people of all sorts. The evening service was much the same with that of the morning, except that Psalm cxii (Psalm xi. in the Liturgy of the Church) was added, and that a special collection seems to have been used sometimes at the setting up of the lights. See Service. This work, a fabrication by an unknown author, and taking its present form about the close of the third century, contains internal evidence (see Schaff, Church History, iv. 441) that much of its material belongs to an earlier date. It may be regarded as affording a type of the liturgical worship in use during the latter part of the ante-Nicene period. Bunsen (Christianity and Mankind, vol. ii) has attributed its composition, or large fragments of this and other liturgies, the probable form of which is prevailing. Krabbé, in his prize essay on this subject, regards the eighth book as of later date than the others. Kurtz, agreeing with Bunsen, substantially finds in this work the earliest extant form of liturgical arrangement, and the type of that of a later period. While, therefore, apocryphal as to its name and claims, yet in the character of its material, in its peculiarity of structure, in the estimation which it enjoyed, and in its influence upon later forms of devotion, it is of great historical significance. Taking it as it comes to our day, the eighth book contains an order of prayer, praise, reading, and sermon, followed by the dismissal successively of the catechumens, the penitents, and the possessed. After this comes the order of the Lord’s Supper for the faithful, beginning with intercessory prayer, this followed by collection of the penitents, and, last, the Amen alled to in 1 Cor. xiv. 16; this latter an undoubted importation from the synagogue. As, moreover, we find the Master, with the twelve, singing a hymn, one of the psalms probably, on the night of the last supper, it is not at all improbable that such psalmody of the Old Testament Scripture, with which the early believers had been already familiar in the synagogue, should have still found favor in the Church. Even in free prayer fragments and sentences of old devotional forms, almost spontaneous through earlier use and sacred association, would naturally find utterance. This, however, would be the exception. Christian prayer, for its own full and peculiar utterance, must find its own peculiar modes of expression; and it would baptize into a new life and meaning any of those familiar expressions, the fragments of an earlier devotion. That men, however, who had been accustomed to liturgical worship under the old system should gradually go into it under the new, is not at all surprising; and to this special improvements before very long were presented. The demand for some form of profession of faith, of a definition of the faith, as dissensions and heresies arose, would be one of these occasions. The form of the Lord’s Supper, even by the Master, in its present usage, would become the nucleus of others. The fact, again, that the most solemn act of Christian communion, the Lord’s Supper, involved in the distribution of the elements a form of action, and that this action, in its original intenet, accompanied by a distinct formula, would have a like influence. That every thing in this respect, if not purely extemporaneous, was exceedingly simple in the time of Justin Martyr, is very manifest from his own writings. The same remark is applicable to the statement of Pliny (Ep. ad Trajan. in Ep. x. 97).

3. Classical Type.—This bridge of liturgical forms which found acceptance and usage in particular communities. One remark in connection with these needs to be made. Whatever may have been the liturgical influences of the synagogue in shaping the worship of the early Church, they had, by this time, been superseded by another of a much more objectionable character, that of the Temple. In other words, the sacrificial idea of the Christian ministry, and the sacrificial idea of the Lord’s Supper, were making themselves felt, not only in the substance, but in the ministrature of form which the liturgies were assuming. Of these liturgies there is to be made the general division of Eastern and Western.

Liturgies of the Eastern Churches.—Chronologically those of the Oriental Church first demand examination. 1. The earliest, perhaps, is that of Jerusalem or Antioch, and this is the liturgy of St. James, written down in 670. The latter of the canon of the Church of St. James, the author of this form, it is to be observed, is still in use, and in both are portions of the material to be found in that of the Apostolic Constitutions. 2. The second of these liturgies is that of the Alexan drian Church, called the Coptic Liturgy. It is clearly that of St. James, betraying its later origin. In this, as in the other two, there are materials previously existing; but the probabilities indicate Cyril of Alexandria as the author of it in its present shape. The effort has been made to separate in it the apostolic from the later elements, as is also attempted by Neale with that of St. James. As the object of this effort seems to be to prove the sacerdotal character of apostolic Christianity, so all sacerdotal elements become proof of apostolic authorship. The conclusion is as false as the premise. The special historical interest of this liturgy of St. Mark is its relation to those of the Coptic and Ethiopic churches, of which it forms the main constituent. That of Coptic origin, as to its claim to inspired authorship, is well worthy of attention. "In my opinion," says he, "this appellation of St. Mark's liturgy began about the end of the fourth or beginning of the fifth century, after Basil had composed his liturgy, which was the first that bore the name of any man. Other churches then gave their liturgies the names of their founders, and so the Alexandrians and Egyptians gave theirs the name of Mark, while they of Jerusalem and Antioch called theirs St. James's, and early in the fifth century it appears that Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, perfected and improved the liturgy of St. Mark, from whence this improved and definitive form of it is called by the Byzantine, St. Cyril's, and by the orthodox St. Mark's." The peculiarity of this last, in Neale's estimation, is the difference from other liturgies in the position of the great intercession for quick and dead. That such intercession found place in the liturgy of the Orthodox Church, in the form of a sacerdotal origin, is not surprising in a church (3.) The third and last of these liturgies is that of Cæsarea or Byzantium, composed probably by Basil of Cæsarea, and held to have been recast and enlarged by Chrysostom; but more properly, perhaps, both those are to be regarded as elaborations of that of St. James. They, moreover, have historical and moral significance in the fact that, through the Byzantine Church, they have been received into that of Russia, and are used in its patriarchates, each for special occasions, at the present time. Such additions, of course, have been made as have been rendered necessary, through peculiarities of Greek worship, and accumulation of liturgical minutiae coming into use since these liturgies in their original forms were introduced. They now contain expressions not to be found in the writings of Chrysostom: e. g. the appellation of Mother of God, given to the Virgin Mary, which was not heard of until after the third General Council at Ephesus [A. D. 431]—the body which condemned the doctrines of Nestorius—held 24 years after the death of Chrysostom.

From these Oriental liturgies have sprung others, variously modified to meet doctrinal or other exigencies. The largest number is from that of Jerusalem. During the 5th century, from that of Basil. The most important is that of the Armenians, Monophysite, those of the Nestorians, and that of Malabar. For discussion as to the special origin of these subordinate forms, and the principles of classification, see Palmer's Original Liturgies, vol. 1; Neale's Primitive Liturgies; Riddle, Christian Antiquities, bk. iv, ch. i, sec. 6.

(6.) Liturgies of the Western Church. In the West liturgical development went on with less rapidity. (1.) That of the Roman Church, under the influence of the number of feeling zeal to come to above in the 4th century, as to Tiberius, and the alienation from Palmer, after it came into use, received the name of Peter, and was traced to his authorship. In point of fact, it probably first assumed definite shape under Leo the Great during the first half of the fifth century, was added to by Gelasius during the latter half of the same century, elaborated again by Gregory the Great not very long after, and through his influence secured its reputation and position. "His Ordo et Canon Missae, making allowance for the unavoidable changes taking place in it during the centuries intervening, was settled under Pope Vitalian, and in the 5th century. It was revised under Clement VII and Urban VIII, and forms at the present time the liturgical text of 'Roman worship'" (Palmer, in Herzog). The Liturgy of Milan seems to have been very much the same as that of Rome prior to the alterations of the latter under Gregory. These differences, at the greatest, were not of an essential character. The question of the independence of the Milanese and the supremacy of the Romans was probably the great issue upon which these differences turned. As nothing less than apostolic could enable the liturgy of Milan to sustain itself in such a conflict, its origin was traced to Barnabas; and miracles, it was believed, had been wrought for its preservation against the efforts of Gregory and Hadrian to bring it to the see of Rome. Nothing can decide in what form of this conflict was doubtless when Charlemagne abolished the Ambrosian Chant throughout the West by the establishment of singing-schools under Roman instructors to teach the Gregorian. The attachment of the people and clergy of Milan, however, to their liturgy could not be overcome, and it is still in their possession. Alexander VI established it expressly as the Ritus Ambrosianus.

Of even greater interest than the Roman liturgy are the Gallican and the Mozarabic.

(2.) The former is Gallican, claims, and it would seem justly, an antiquity greater than that of Rome. The connection of Gallican Christianity with that of Asia, whether through the person of Ireneus or by earlier missionaries, would lead to a liturgical development of an independent character. It was displaced by the liturgy of the Western church for a long time was almost lost sight of and forgotten. It does not seem to have been used or appealed to in the various conflicts of prerogative between the French monarchs and the pope, and no allusion to its existence is made in the Pragmatic Sanction. Public attention was again called to it during the controversy of the 16th century. Interest both of a literary and doctrinal character has been exhibited in connection with this liturgy. But there seems to be but little probability of its restoration to use. While unlike in certain specific features from the Roman Liturgy, it is otherwise in essentials. Like the others preceding, it has been traced to the hand of an apostle—to the Church at Lyons, through that of Ephesus, from the apostle John! The apex upon which this inverted historical pyramid rests is the single fact, which has been questioned, that Christianity was introduced into Gaul by missionaries from the Church at Ephesus.

(3.) The Mozarabic, that of the Spanish churches under Arabic dominion, has so many resemblances to the Gallican liturgy that it would seem probable they proceeded from the same source. It is described by Isaac von Romanesque, the 12th century, as the liturgy of the Moors, and in the time of the cardinal Ximenes, it received an addition of several rites. As Spanish territory was reconquered from the Moors, and came more fully under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the papacy in other respects, the effort was made, and eventually succeeded, although at times warmly resisted by the people, to displace the Mozarabic, and introduce the Roman liturgy. In the beginning of the 16th century cardinal Ximenes endowed a college and chapel at Toledo for the celebration of the ancient rites, and this is now, perhaps, the only place where this Mozarabic liturgy of that country and of Gaul is in some degree observed. The old British liturgy, which was displaced by the Gregorian after the decision of Osnabrig in 664, seems, like the Mozarabic, to have been essentially the same with the Gallican, and to have displaced it.

(4.) One other liturgical composition of some interest, dating from the close of the 4th century, is that of the Cathari, published by E. Kunitz (Jena, 1852). It is of interest as giving a more favorable view of the community for which it was composed than had been previously entertained. It is the liturgy with all these liturgies of the West, as already remarked of those of the East, that they are the names of many subordinate offices in use and prevalence in different portions of the Church. The discretionary power of the bishops, both at this and at earlier periods, to modify and adapt prevalent liturgies to peculiar exigencies of time and place, naturally produced after a time this kind of diversity. The ecclesiastical confusion of medieval times, and clerical ignorance and carelessness, would of course increase it. The traces, however, of the parent stock in any such case would not be difficult of recognition.

4. Structure of Liturgies.—The variations of detail which are found in the parent liturgies of the Christian world are all ingrained on a structural arrangement, which they possess in common, much as four buildings might differ in the style and form of their decorations, and yet agree in their plans and elevation, in the position of their several chambers, and in the number of their principal columns.

i. There is invariably a division of the liturgy into three portions—the office of the Prothesis, the Pro-Anaphora, and the Anaphora, the latter being the "Canon" of the Western Church, and the office of the Prothesis being a preparatory part of the service corresponding to the "Preparation" of the Western Liturgy, and not used at the altar itself. In the Pro-Anaphora the central features are two, viz.: (1) the reading of holy Scripture, and (2) the recitation of the Creed. In the Anaphora they are four, viz.: (1) the Triumphant Hymn or Threnosion; (2) the formula of Consecration; (3) the Lord's Prayer; and (4) the Communion. These four great acts of praise, benediction, intercession, and communion gather around our Lord's words of institution and his pattern prayer, which form, in reality, the integral germ of the Christian liturgies. They are also associated with other prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings, by which each is expanded and developed, the whole blending into a comprehensive service, by means of which the worship of the Church ascends on the wings of the eucharistic service, and her strength descends in eucharistic grace.

ii. In the second place, a substantial agreement among all the four great parent liturgies as to the formula of consecration (see Consecration; and comp. Blunt, Dict. of Doct. and Hist. Theol. p. 425–426). Another point in which the four parent liturgies of the Church uniformly agree is in the well-defined sacerdotal character of their language. This is sufficiently illustrated by the preceding comparative view.

iii. There is also, in the second place, a substantial agreement among all the four great parent liturgies as to the formula of consecration (see Consecration; and comp. Blunt, Dict. of Doct. and Hist. Theol. p. 425–426).

iv. The intercessory character of the primitive liturgies is also a very conspicuous feature common to them all. The holy Eucharist is uniformly set forth and used in them as a service offered up to God for the benefit of all classes of Christians, living and departed. Then," says St. Cyril of Jerusalem, "after the spiritual sacrifice is perfected, the bloodless service upon that altar of propitiation, we entreat God for the common peace of. the Church; for the tranquillity of the world; for kings; for soldiers and allies; for the sick; for the afflicted, and, in a word, for all who stand in need of succor we all supplicate and offer this sacrifice. Then we commemorate also those who have fallen asleep before us, first, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, that at their places a sweet and holy sacrifice is offered in the Church of God. Afterward also on behalf of the holy fathers and bishops who have fallen asleep before us, and, in a word, of all who in past years have fallen asleep among us, believing that it will be a very great advantage to the souls for whom the supplication is put up while that holy and most sweet sacrifice is offered, the sentence is pronounced: A similar intercession is to be found in the other liturgies, and it is evident that its use was one of the first principles of the Church of that day.

III. Modern Greek and Eastern Liturgies.—Three liturgies are in use in the modern Greek or Constantinopolitan Church, namely, that of the Giraud, that of the Bench, and that of the liturgy of the Presanctified. The liturgy bearing the name of Basil is used by the Constantinopolitan Church ten times in the year, viz., on the eve of Christmas Day; on the festival of St. Basil; on the eve of the Feast of Lights, also known as Epiphany (Greek, Lent, 1564); also on Easter Sunday, except the Sunday before Easter, on the festival of the Virgin Mary; and on Good Friday, and the following day, which is sometimes termed the great Sabbath. The liturgy ascribed to Chrysostom is read on all those days in the year on which the liturgies of Basil and of the Presanctified are not used. The liturgy of the Presanctified is an office for the celebration of the Lord's Supper on Wednesdays and Fridays during Lent, with the elements which had been consecrated on the preceding Sunday. The date of this liturgy is not known, some authors ascribing it to Gregory Thaumaturgus in the third century, while others ascribe it to Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, in the eighth century. These liturgies are used in all those Greek churches which are subject to the patriarchate of Constantinople, and in those countries which were originally converted by Greeks, as in Russia, Georgia, Mingrelia, and by the Melchite patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem (King's Rules of the Greek Church, p. 131-134; Richard et Giraud's Bibliothèque Sacrée, xvi, 222-224). The Coptic Jacobites, or Christians in Egypt, make use of the Liturgy of Alexandria, which formerly was called indifferent, or Symeon the Forerunner's, now the liturgy of the fraternity of the Christian Church at Alexandria, or the liturgy of St. Cyril, which caused it to be committed to writing. The Egyptians had twelve liturgies, which are still preserved among the Abyssinians; but the patri-archs commanded that the Egyptian churches should use only three, viz., those of Basil, of Gregory the Theologian, and of Cyril. The earliest liturgies of the Church of Alexandria were written in Greek, which was the vernacular language, until the fourth and fifth centuries: since that time they have been translated into the Coptic and Arabic languages. The Abyssinians or Ethiopians receive the twelve liturgies which were formerly in use among the Coptic Jacobites; they are commonly found in the following order, viz.: 1. The liturgy of St. John the Evangelist. 2. That of the three hundred and eighteen fathers present at the Council of Nice. 3. That of Epiphanius. 4. That of St. James of Serug or Syrug. 5. That of St. John Chrysostom. 6. That of Jesus Christ. 7. That of the Apostles. 8. That of St. Cyril. 9. That of St. Gregory. 10. That of their patriarch Dionysius. 11. That of St. Basil. 12. That of St. Cyril. The Armenians who were converted to Christianity by Gregory, summoned the Illuminators, have only one liturgy, which is supposed to be that of the Church of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, in which city Gregory recieved his instruction. This liturgy is used on every occasion, even at funerals. The Syrian Catholics and Jacobites have numerous liturgies, bearing the names of St. James, St. Peter, St. John the Evangelist, St. Mark, St. Dionysius, bishop of Athens, St. Xystus, bishop of Rome, of the Twelve Apostles, of St. Ignatius, of St. Julius, bishop of Rome, of St. Eustathius, bishop of St. Maruthas, etc. Of these, the liturgy of St. James is most highly esteemed, and is the standard to which are referred all the others, which are chiefly used on the festivals of the saints whose names they bear. The Maronites, who inhabit Mount Lebanon, make use of a missal printed at Rome in 1564, in the Arabic language; it contains thirteen liturgies under the names of St. Xystus, St. John Chrysostom, St. John the Evangelist, St. Peter, St. Dionysius, St. Cyril, St. Matthew, St. John the Patriarch, St. Eustathius, St. Maruthas, St. James, and the second liturgy of St. Peter. The Nestorians have three liturgies—that of the Twelve Apostles, that of Theodorus, sur-ammed the Interpreter, and a third under the name of Nestorius. The Indian Christians of St. Thomas are said to make use of the Nestorian liturgies (Richard et Giraud, Rules of the Greek Church, p. 156). A similar liturgy was used also among the Armenians, and the Chrysostomite liturgy of the second century at Rome.

IV. Liturgies of the Church of Rome.—There are various liturgical books in use in the modern Church of Rome, the greater part of which are common and general to all the members in communion with that Church, while others are permitted to be used in particular places or by particular monastic orders.

1. The Breivaria (Latin breviarium) is the book containing the daily service of the Church of Rome. It is frequently, but erroneously, confounded with Missal and Breviary. The Breviary contains the matins, lauds, etc., with the several variations to be made therein, according to the several days, canonical hours, and the like. It is general, and may be used in every place; but on the model of this have been formed various others, specially appropriated to different religious orders, such as those of the Benedictines, Carthusians, Dominicans, Franciscans, Jesuits, and other monastic orders. The difference between these books and that which is by way of eminence designated the Roman Breviary, consists chiefly in the number and order of the psalms, hymns, ave-marias, pater-nosters, misereors, etc., etc. Originally the Breviary contained only the Lord's Prayer and the Psalms which were used in the divine offices. To these were subsequently added lessons out of the Scriptures, according to the institutes of the monks, in order to diversify the service of the Church. In the progress of time the legendary lives of the saints, replete with many superstitious facts, were inserted into the service, in accordance with the opinions and superstition of the ages. This gave occasion to many revisions and reformations of the Roman Breviary by the councils, particularly of Trent and Cologne, and also by several popes, as Gregory IX, Nicholas III, Pius V, Clement VIII, and Urban VIII; as likewise by some cardinals, especially cardinal Quignon, by whom various extravagances were removed, and the work was brought nearer to the simplicity of the primitive offices. In its present state the Breviary of the Church of Rome consists of the services of matins, lauds, prime, tierce, sext, none, vesper, compline, and the post-communion, that is of seven hours, on account of the saying of David, Septies in die laudem dixi.—"Seven times a day do I praise thee" (Psalm cxix, 164). The obligation of reading this service-book every day, which at first was universal, was by the Benedictines confined to the beneficiary clergy alone, who are bound to do it on pain of being guilty of mortal sin, and of refunding their rev-ences in proportion to their delinquencies in discharging this duty. The Roman Breviary is recited in the Latin language throughout the Roman Church, except among the Maronites in Syria, the Armenians, and some other Oriental Christians in communion with that Church, who rehearse it in their vernacular dialects.

2. The Missal, or volume employed in celebrating mass. According to a tradition generally believed by members of the Romish Church, this liturgy owes its origin to St. Peter. The canon of the mass was committed to writing about the middle of the fifth century. Various additions were subsequently made, especially by Gregory the Great, who reduced the whole into better order. This Missal is in general use throughout the Romish Church. See Mass.

3. The Ceremoniala contains the various offices peculiar to the pope. It is divided into three books, the first of which contains the administration of the holy sacraments and the consecration and coronation of the pope, the canonization of saints, the creation of cardinals, the form and manner of holding a council, and the funeral ceremonies on the death of a pope or of a cardinal, besides various public ceremonies to be performed by the pope as a sovereign prince. The second book prescribes what divine offices are to be celebrated by the pope, and on what days; and the third discusses the reverence which is to be shown to popes, cardinals, bishops, and other persons performing sacred duties; the vestments and ornaments of the popes and cardinals when celebrating divine service; the order in which they are severally to be seated in the papal chapel; incensing the altar, etc. The compiler of this liturgical work is not known.

4. The Pontifical describes the various functions which are peculiar to bishops in the Romish Church, and especially the consecration of ecclesiastical dignities; the pronouncement of benedictions on abbots, abbesses, and nuns; the coronation of sovereigns; the form and manner of consecrating churches, burial-grounds, and the various vessels used in divine service; the public expulsion of penitents from the Church, and reconciling them; the mode of holding a synod; suspending, reconciling, dispensing, deposing, and degrading priests, and of restoring them again to orders; the manner of excommunicating and absolving, etc., etc.

5. The Ritual treats of all those functions which are to be performed by the priest of the lower classes, both in the public service of the Church, and also in the exercise of their private pastoral duties. The Pastoral corresponds with the Ritual, and seems to be only another name for the same book.

V. Contemplative Reformed or Protestant Liturgies.—At the time of the Reformation there were, of necessity, great changes in the matter of public worship. The liturgies in use at its commencement included the prevalent doctrinal system, especially as connected with the Lord's Supper; and very soon changes were made having in view the restoration of Roman church forms; and the adaptation of reformed worship to the restored system of scriptural doctrine. The old forms, moreover, had there been no objection to them doctrinally, were liable to the practical objection that they were locked up from popular use in a dead language. The Reformation, to a very great degree, had opened the ears of the people to the intelligent hearing and reception of Christian doctrine. Its task was to open their mouths to the intelligent utterance of supplication—in other words, to provide forms of worship in the vernacular. This was done very largely by selection and translation from old forms, and, as was necessary, by the preparation of new material. With the English and Lutheran Reformers, the object seems to have been to make as few changes in existing forms as possible. Doubtful expressions, which admitted of a Protestant interpretation, but which, for their own merits, would never have been selected, were thus retained. It is to be said for the Reformers that they seem to have acted in view of the existing circumstances of the communities by which they were surrounded, and from one of them, the most eminent of all, John Calvin, who, in a sense, disproved all wish and expectation that his work, in this respect, should be imposed upon other churches or continued in his own any longer than it was found for edification.

a. Lutheran Liturgies.—As first among the Reformers we notice these liturgical works of Luther. Different offices were prepared by him, as needed by the churches under his influence, the earliest in 1529, the latest in 1534. These were afterwards collected in a volume, and became a model for others. In his "Order of Service" provision is made for daily worship in a variety of services for morning and evening, and a third might be held if desirable. These services consist of reading the Scriptures, preaching or expounding, with psalms and responsoria, with the addition, for Sundays, of mass or communion. He dwells earnestly, however, upon the idea, also mentioned above, that they are not to be considered binding otherwise than in the appropriate times and localities. These views and this action of Luther were responded to by similar action on the part of the churches which through him had received the doctrines of the Reformation. These drew up liturgies for themselves, some of them bearing a close resemblance to that of Wittenberg, others differing from it widely; the differences, in one direction, being conditioned by the Zwinglian or Calvinistic element, in the opposite by the Romish. These, in particular localities, have been changed at different times as circumstances seemed to require. No one Lutheran form has ever been accepted as obligatory upon all Lutheran churches, as is the case with the liturgy of the Church of England in all its dependencies; although it is claimed that there is essential unity—an essential unity of life and spirit, a general principle of order and form of particular states and churches. The tendency of the Rationalism of the last century was to neglect, to depreciate, and to mutilate the old liturgies, and then to procure changes which would substitute others in their stead. From this, and in connection with another movement, has followed a helpful reaction. This reaction may be seen in its effects upon the two great classes into which Lutheran Germany is now divided. It has controlled to a very great extent the efforts of the Unionists, who have given form to the Union liturgy, and this, while it is less rigid and formal than the older, tends to a more careful study and diligent use of the older liturgies. The object of this new liturgy, that of the king of Prussia, first published in 1822, revised once or twice since then, is to unite the worship of the members of the Lutheran and Reformed churches in the Prussian dominions. This excitement connected with this movement, in the way of attack and defense, has given a deeper and wider interest to all liturgical questions—an interest deeply felt by the Lutheran churches of this country. Here, where the use of such forms is optional, over a greater number of people than is the case to such use is on the increase. See LUTHERANISM.

In Sweden, which, although Lutheran, retains the episcopate, and may seem to demand a more special notice, there was published in 1811 a new, revised edition of the Liturgy, prepared at the time of the Reformation. This is divided into chapters, and contains the usual parts of a Church service, with forms for baptism, marriage, etc. In Denmark there is also a regularly constituted liturgy, of Bugenhagen's, which, besides morning and evening service for Sundays, contains three services for Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost.

b. Moravian Liturgy.—The liturgy of the Moravians, as recipients, through their great leader, of the Augsburg Confession, is not without its interest in this connection. It was first published in 1832. That which has been adopted by the renewal of the Church is mainly the work of Count Zinzendorf, who compiled it chiefly from the services of the Greek and Latin churches, but who also availed himself of the valuable labors of Luther and of the English Reformers. The United Brethren, in matter of a Church liturgy, has introduced into the morning service of every Sunday a Litany for the morning of Easter-day, containing a short but comprehensive confession of faith; two offices for the baptism of adults, and two for the baptism of children; two litanies at burials; and offices for confirmation.
tion, the holy communion, and for ordination; the Te Deum, and doxologies adapted to various occasions. All these liturgical forms in use in England are comprised in the new and revised edition of the Liturgy and Hymns for the Use of the Protestant Church of the United Brethren (London, 1849). Other services peculiar to this Church, which is in a sense a church of Manualists, may be observed, with musical responsoria as a litany. This litany is for Sundays. There is a short prayer of betrothal, a baptismal service, also a form on Easter, used in the church-yards, of expressing their confidence in regard to the brethren departed of the year preceding. The daily service, which is in a sense a service for the whole congregation, is a simple prayer-meeting. In this, as in the Sunday service, the prayers and exhortations are extemporaneous.

c. Calvinistic Liturgies.—The liturgy of Calvin, which, like that of Luther, constitutes the type of a class, differs from this latter in two important respects: the absence of responsive portions, and the discretion conferred upon the officiant in the performance of public worship. This discretion seems to have been limited, however, to the use of one form of prayer rather than another, given in the Directory. These prayers were begun by a general confession, followed by a psalm, a prayer again, a sermon, a prayer, and benediction. Two additional prayers were provided for occasions of communion, one coming before, the other after communion. That of communion was in use in time of war, calamity, etc. For the administration of the Lord's Supper there is an exhortation as to its intent—'fencing the tables,' as it is called in Scotland. This is followed by the distribution of the elements, with psalms and passages of Scripture appropriate to the occasion. The offices of baptism and marriage are simple, but not discretionary as to their form. In accordance with what seems to be the peculiar Genevan characteristic, they are not wanting in length. The present liturgy of Geneva is a development of that of Calvin, with certain modifications. It has no responses. Several additional prayers have been added. A distinct service for each day in the week is provided, also for the principal festivals, and for certain special occasions. So also as to the churches in sympathy with the system of Calvin. They have liturgies similar to that of Geneva, although not identical. Such is the case with the churches of Holland and Neuchatel, and the Reformed churches of France. A new edition of the old French Liturgy of 1562 was published in 1828, with additional forms for special occasions. The liturgy of the displaced church is in some parts of Scotland. It was drawn up at Frankfort by Knox and others, after the model of Calvin's, and was first used by Knox in a congregation of English exiles at Geneva. It was afterwards introduced by him into Scotland; its use enjoined in 1564, and such usage was continued until after his death. An edition of this liturgy was published in 1841 by Dr. Cumming. It differs from that of Calvin in that it more clearly leaves to the minister officiating to decide whether he shall use any form of prayer given or one of his own compositions extemporaneously or otherwise. It is in the style of Calvin's, and with the same form. This is followed by a psalm, by prayer, the sermon, prayer, psalm, and benediction. The book contains various offices and alternate forms; among other things, an order of excommunion, and a treatise on fasting, with a form of prayer for private houses, and grace before and after meals. The new book of Scotland of 1844 may be regarded as a modification of those of Knox and Calvin. In the Directory of the Westminster Assembly the discretionary power is greatly enlarged. Scriptural lessons are to be read in regular course, at the discretion of the minister, with liberty, if so desired, of expounding. Heads of prayer in that before the sermon are prescribed, and rules for the arrangement of the sermon. The Lord's Prayer is recommended as the most perfect form of devotion. Private and lay baptism are forbidden. The arrangement of the Lord's table is to be such that communicants may sit about it, and the dead are to be buried without prayer or religious ceremony.

d. Intermediate between these two great families of liturgies, the Lutheran and Calvinistic, are those of the other Reformed churches on the Continent, of which it may be said, in general, that the German-speaking portion of these churches approach and partake of the Lutheran spirit and forms, and the Swiss of the Calvinistic, though there are individual exceptions. In 1523, the same year with Luther's work already mentioned, Zwingle and Leo Judah published in Zurich certain services, a Supper, marriage, common prayer, and burial. This was followed by a more complete work in 1525, and subsequently by others. Similar works were published at Berne, Schaffhausen, and Basle at a later period. The peculiarity of these, according to Ebral, quoted in Herzog, is the liturgical character in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, in which they compare favorably with the Calvinistic liturgies; also the custom of announcing the dead, and the special prayers for the festivals. The liturgical issues which during this century had arisen from the Lutherans, had been by the Reformed rejected or modified according to those of the Reformed, not, however, to the same extent, nor with results of such decided character.

VI. Liturgies in the English Language.—Previous to the introduction of the Reformations on English ground, there were some in the public worship which were in Latin, that is, that of other Western churches, performed in the Latin language. But, though the language was universally Latin, the liturgy itself varied greatly in the different parts of the kingdom. The dioceses of Bangor, Hereford, Lincoln, Sarum, York, and other churches, used liturgies which were commonly designated by the "Uses," and of these the most celebrated were the Breviary and Missal, etc., secondum usum Sarum, compiled by Osmund, bishop of Salisbury, about the year 1080, and reputed to be executed with such exactness according to the rules of the Romish Church that they were also employed in divine service in many churches on the Continent. They consisted of prayers and offices, some of which had been transmitted from very ancient times, and others were of later origin, accommodated to the Romish religion. Compare Maskell, The Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, according to the Uses of Sarum, Bangor, York, Hereford, and the Modern Roman Liturgy (London, 1844, 8vo). Also by the same, Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesiae Anglicanae: or, Occasional Offices of the Church of England, according to the Ancient Use of Sarum: the Psalter in English, and other Prayers and Forms (London, 1846, 3 vols. 8vo).

The first attempt in England to introduce the vernacular was made in 1586, when, in pursuance of Henry VIII's injunctions, the Bible, Psalter,Creed, and Decalogue were set forth and placed in churches, to be read in English. In 1545 the King's Primer was published, containing a form of morning and evening prayer in English, besides the Lord's Prayer, Creed, and Ten Commandments, the Seven Penitential Psalms, Litany, and other devotions, and in 1547 the Edward VI, according to Cranmer, bishop Ridley, and eleven other eminent divines, martyrs, and confessors, were commissioned to draw up a liturgy in the English language "free from those unfounded doctrines and superstitious ceremonies which had disgraced the Latin liturgies." This was ratified by new acts of Edward VI, in 1548, and published in 1549. This liturgy is commonly known and cited as the First Prayer-Book of Edward VI. In the great body of their work Cranmer and his associates derived their materials from the earlier services which had been in use in England; but in the regular offices they were indebted to the liturgies of Melancthon and Bucer, and through them to the older liturgy of Nuremberg, which those reformers were instructed to follow (Dr. Cardew's Two Books of Common Prayer, set Forth... in the reign of King Edward the Sixth, compared, p. xiv, Oxford, 1880). In consequence, however, of exceptions being taken at some things in this book, which were thought to be too much of superstition, it was altered and further altered in 1551, when it was again confirmed by Parliament. This edition is usually cited as the Second Prayer-book of Edward VI.: it is very nearly the same with that which is at present in use. The two Liturgies, A.D. 1549 and A.D. 1552, with other Documents, set forth by Authority in the Reign of King Edward VI., were very carefully edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. Joseph Ketley, M.A., at the Cambridge University Press, in 1944, in octavo. The two acts of Parliament (2 and 3 Edward VI., c. 1, and 5 and 6 Edward VI., c. 1) which laid down the basis of all subsequent Anglican worship were in the first year of Queen Mary, who restored the Latin liturgies according to the popish forms of worship. On the accession of Elizabeth, however, the Prayer-book was restored, and has been in use ever since. For the subject, including liturgical books in England, Scotland, and America, see Common Prayer.

Among the curiosities of the subject we notice the following:

(a.) Liturgy of the Primitive Episcopal Church.—The Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the Use of the Primitive Episcopal Church, revived in England in the Year of our Redemption One thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, together with the Offices for the Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, authorised by the Government of the United States of America, was printed at Livorno, but was never published. It was edited by the Rev. George Montgomery West, M.A., a presbyter of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the state and diocese of Ohio, in North America. This volume is of great rarity, not more than five or six copies being found in the libraries of the curios in ecclesiastical matters. The liturgy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America is the basis of this edition, excepting two or three alterations in the office for the ministration of baptism, and a few verbal alterations to fit it for use in England and in America. The Primitive Episcopal Church, revived in England in 1881, had a short existence of little more than twelve months.

(b.) Deutecial Liturgy.—In 1792 a liturgy was published in Liverpool by some of the Presbyterians, as A Liturgy framed and published in the Church of Christ whose name is hardly mentioned in it, and the third part of the Godhead is not at all recognised in it. It is known also by the name of "Liverpool Liturgy." In 1776 it was published: "A Liturgy on the universal Principles of Religion and Morality." It was compiled by David Williams, with the chimerical design of uniting all parties and persuading in one comprehensive form. This liturgy is composed in imitation of the Book of Common Prayer, with responses celebrating the divine perfections and works, with thanksgivings, confessions, and supplications. The principal part of three of the hymns from morning and evening service is selected from the works of Milton and Thomson, though considerable use is made of the language of the Scriptures (see Orton, Letters, i. 60 sq.; Bogue and Bennett, Hist. of the Dissenters, iii. 94). Lever (לו'ר, käbbel, so called as being the heaviest of the viscera) occurs in Exod. xxix, 13, 22; Lev. iii, 4, 10, 15, iv, 9, v, 7, vii, 4, viii, 16, 25; ix, 16, 10; Prov. vii, 20, Lam. iv, 11; Ezek. xxi, 21. In the Pentateuch it forms part of the phrase translated in the Authorized Version "the caul that is above the liver," which Genesius (Theaur. Hebr. p. 645, 464), reasoning from the root, understands to be the greatlobe of the liver itself rather than the caul which, latterly he, describes in a different part of the text. Jahn thinks the smallerlobe to be meant. The phrase is also rendered in the Sept. "the liver or lower lobe of the liver," the chief object of attention in the art of hepatoscopy, or divination by the liver, among the ancients. Jerome gives "the net of the liver," "the net," and "the fat," see Bochard, Hiera., i, 498.) See CAUL. It appears from the same passages that it was burnt upon the altar, and not eaten as sacrificial food (Jahh, Bibl. Arch.-

col. § 378, n. 7). The liver was supposed by the ancient Greeks and Romans to be the seat of the passions -pride, love, etc. (see Anacreon, Ode iii., fin.; Theocritus, Idyl. ii., 10; Virgil, Aen., ii., 407; Propertius, i., ii., 11; and the Notes of the Delphic edition. Comp. also Persia, Sat. v., 12; Juvenal, Sat. v., 647.) Some have argued that the same symbol prevailed among the Jews rendering נַשָּׁה, in Gen. xxix., 6, "my liver," instead of "my honor," Sept. וַדִּקְרַא; compare the Hebrew of Prov. xvi., 9; iv. 9; vii., 22; but Geuenius (Hebr. Lex. a. y. נַשָּׁה) denies this signification in those passages.

Wounds in the liver were supposed to be mortal; thus the expression in Prov. vii., 22, "a dart through his liver," and Lam. iii., 11, "my liver is poured out upon the earth," are each of them a preparation for death itself. Achabhus uses a similar phrase to describe a mortal wound (A. gusemmon., I, 442). See HEART.

The liver is largely used in Ezekiel (xxi., 21) as an interesting reference to the most ancient of all modes of divination, by the inspection of the viscera of animals, and even of mankind, sacrificially slaughtered for the purpose. It is there said that the king of Babylon, among other modes of divination referred to in the same verse, "looked upon the liver of the ram." The spleen is considered the most important organ in the ancient art of extripicium, or divination by the entrails. Phialo-stratus felicitously describes it as "the prophesying tripod of all divination" (Lile of Apollonius, viii., 7, 5). The rules by which the Greeks and Romans judged of it are ample detailed in Adam's Roman Antiquities, p. 261 sq.

(Lond. 1834), and in Potter's Archæologia Classica, i, 316

(Lond. 1775). Vitruvius suggests a plausible theory of the first rise of heptacopdy. He says the ancients inspected the livers of those animals which frequented the places where they wished to settle, or who were found in the liver, to which they chiefly ascribed the process of sanctification, was injured, they concluded that the water and nourishment collected in such localities were ushohome (4. 4). But divination is coeval and co-extensive with a belief in the divinity. Cicero ascribes divination by this and other means to what he calls "the heroic ages," by which term we know he means a period antecedent to all historical documents (De Divi-natione). Promethesus, in the play of that title (i, 474 sq.), lays claim to having taught mankind the different kinds of divination, and that of divining the rest; and Prometheus, according to Servius (ad Virg. Edid, vi, 42), instructed the Aryanis; and we know from sacred record that Asia was one of the countries first peopled. It is further important to remark that the first recorded instance of divination is that of the teraphim of Jupiter, a native of Padan-Aram, a district bordering on that country (1 Sam. xix., 16, 10), by which term both the Sept. and Josephus understood "the liver of goats" (Ant. vii., 11, 4). See TERAPHIM. See generally Whiston's Josephus, p. 108, note (Edinb. 1828); Bo-

Living Creatures. These, as presented in Ezek. i., 10, are identical with the cherubim. Besides the general resemblance in form, position, and service, we have, Ezek. x, 20: "I knew that they were the cherubim." Ezekiel, being a priest, was familiar with these symbolical forms. The living ones present some variation from the cherubim, but not greater than appear in the other figures of olive-tree, and the cherubim. We should not be surprised if their forms and probable uses had already given rise, and is not here resumed. See CHERUB. They are taken up here to give a more careful attention to their symbolic utility. The importance of these symbols is manifested, 1, in the very minute description of them; 2, in the fact that they do in some way pervade the entire period of grace, from the expulsion of Adam till, in the apocalyptic vision, we arrive at the gates of the city, having a right to the tree of life in the midst of the paradise, and the promise of its fruit, if right as God shall attained. They were placed first at the front of the garden of Eden; renewed in the tabernacle; extended in the Temple; resumed in the visions of Ezekiel; incorporated in the book of Psalms; and in the prospective history of Revelation they are left with us till the end of the world. The significance of these figures appear in all respects to be the same; though differing in name and in position, they perform the same service. Even the idolatrous images, the teraphim, were probably an unwarranted and superstitious imitation of the figures at the test of Eden. True, there are no periods when they are under a cloud, e.g., from the Deluge till the erecting of the tabernacle; still, we dare not say they were extinct, for before the tabernacle was built in the wilderness we read of another, called the tabernacle of the congregation (Exod. xxxiiii., 7-11). There is much mystery and many events among expositors in relation to them. 1. They are not angels, nor do they represent the peculiar ministry of angels. (a) The Scriptures know no such orders as angels, archangels, cherubim, and seraphim; the orders of angels are described as three, or thrones, dominions, principalities, powers (Col. i., 16). (b) Angelic power would have been a very ineffectual agency for officiating the sword of flame, and was not needed to wield that sword which turns on its own axis. (c) The living ones are distinguished from angels in Rev. xi., 7. (d) They join the elders in the new song, "Hast redeemed us to God by thy blood," etc. (Rev. v., 9). (e) Angels take but a small part in the direct administration of grace; they rather point the inquirer, and furnish assistance to the administrator (Acts x., 3; Rev. i, 1; Chron. xxix., 18; Acts xii., 7). Nothing vindictive or judi-crional belongs to them. (f) There is no need of such power; the sword and the fire imbody the whole power of justice. (b) We never find them executing judgment, though they concur in it when executed. (c) They warn of danger from divine justice (Isa. vii., 3-5). (d) They call attention to justice (Rev. vi., 1, 5, 7, 8). (e) They deliver the commission to those who execute it (Ezek. iv., 7, 27; Rev. xiv., 7). (f) They join in celebrating the triumph over the victims of judgment (Rev. xix., 4). Very different is their function in the administration of grace; there they make application of the remedy to the sinner (Isa. lv., 5, 7). Almost all are devoid of human sympathy. (a) They have the face of a man. (b) They have the hands of a man under their wings (Ezek. i., 8). (c) When the prophet was alarmed ("undeone"), one of them brought him instant relief—just such relief as he felt in need of. (d) The throne which they bear has a man above it (Ezek. i., 26). (e) In Rev. iv., 6, we find them in the midst of the same throne, and round about it. (f) They associate with the elders in sympathy with the one hundred and forty-four thousand who sing the new song (Rev.

xv., 8), and who at the Church in celebrating the overthrow of her enemies (Rev. xiv., 4). They thus abound in the sympathies of a redeemed humanity.

(L) In general terms they represent mercy, as con-distinguished from justice. 1. They are distinct from the sword, as already shown. They are mercy, but seem to be evolved out of the fire, this is no more than we have already in the first promise, where death of death is our life; and in Psa. xxxxi., 10 sq. They were united to the נַשָּׁה, the mercy-seat itself. 3. They belonged to the holy of holies, both the larger room of the tabernacle, and the inner rooms of the temple; but this chamber was a type of heaven (Heb. ix., 24). 4. Other cherubic emblems were wrought on the inner curtains of the tabernacle, and inner walls of the Temple, both Solomon's and Ezekiel's (1 Kings vii, 29; Ezek. xli, 18-20). All is mercy inside of the Temple. 5. The like figures were made on the weshanats of the Temple, interspersed with lions and oxen (1 Kings vii, 29; "lions and palm-trees," ver. 36; comp. Eph. v, 26; Titus iii, 5). 6. The firmament over their heads, with its throne and man upon it (1 Kings vii, 27, comp. Ezek. xxi, 24-27, with Rev. i, 13). 7. The iring surrounding all this glory of the Lord puts on the finish to that institution where mercy rejoices against judgment (Ezek. i, 29).

(II.) They seem to represent mercy in its dispensation, so to speak—in its instrumentality, with all their inward and outward glorifications. While the whole power of justice, deters man from entering the earthly paradise; drives men away in their wickedness; awakes against the Shepherd; torments enmity in the second death; on the contrary, the living ones represent the entire administration of mercy (Ezek. i, 12: "Whither the spirit was to go, they went;"); ver. 20: "Thither was their spirit to go"). Whether an organized Church, an open Bible, an altar, or a temple; whether patriarchs or prophets, priests or presbyters; apostles, John the Baptist, or Christ himself; evangelists, pastors, or teachers; whether Gospel messages, or the children, be the instrumentality in dispensing the grace of God, the qualities of cherubim are, and ought to be, the characteristics with which they are imbued: the courage and power of the lion; the patience and perseverance of the ox; the uprightness, rapidity, and imitation of the eagle; with the sympathetic love and prudent forecast of our own humanity; each one full of eyes, within and without (Eph. iv, 16). In this view they do, as it were, bring God near to men.

(III.) The cherubim, in this dispensation of mercy, bring out prominently the idea of the throne of God—the throne of grace (Ezek. i, 25: "Likeness of a throne"). In Psalm xxvii, 1, "The Lord reigneth" is parallel with "inhabiting the cherubim." Both in the tabernacle and Temple the Shekinah was between the cherubim, which seemed to constitute, with the lid of the ark, the very throne itself, according to Exod. xxv, 22, and Ezek. xliii, 7. In the versions of Ezekiel, the cherubim seem to support the throne; in Isa. vi, 2, and Rev. iv, 6-9, they appear as attendants. To the English reader the seraphim might seem to be above the throne, but the original places them above the Temple, in which position they may still be below the throne, for the skirts of his robe flow down and fill the holy house.

(IV.) The idea of carrying the throne, or bearing royalty in his throne from one place to another, brings us to the idea of the whole cherubim system—"the chariot of the Lord." The key-note of this is given in 1 Chron. xxviii, 18: "Gold for the pattern of the chariot... the cherubim that spread out their wings and covered the ark of the covenant of the Lord." compare Psa. xlvii, 10: "He rode upon a cherub;" and Hab. iii, 8, 13, 15. These figures constituted a "moving throne.

Livingston, Gilbert Robert, D.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, a descendant of the celebrated Rev. John Livingston (q. v.), was born at Stannom, Conn., Oct. 8, 1786, and graduated at Union College in 1805. He studied law under Rev. David Hartley, Conn., and Rev. Dr. John Henry Livingston (q. v.). In 1811 he became pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in Cossacksey, N.Y., where about six hundred persons were the fruits of his ministry of fifteen years. In 1826 he removed to Philadelphia as pastor of the First (Dutch) Reformed (or Crown Street) Church. Here again his ministry was greatly blessed, three hundred and twenty persons being added to the Church, and over one hundred in a single year. He died March 9, 1834. He was a man of large physical frame, benevolent countenance, and amiable temper. His preaching was practical, and addressed more to the understanding and conscience of the people than to their feelings. His pastoral labors were incessant and successful. At one period of his life he embraced what were generally known as "New Measures," but he lived to abandon them in his later ministry. A single sermon and a tract are all that is known to have published.—Sprague, Annals; Cornin's Manual Ref. Church; Funeral Sermon by C. C. Cuyler, D.D.; Historical Discourse by W. H. Channing, D.D. (p. 278, Volume xiv, 1847). Livingston, Henry Gilbert, son of the preceding, was born at Columbus, N.Y., Feb. 3, 1821, graduated at Williams College in 1840, was principal of Clinton Academy (now Hamilton College) for two years, studied theology in Union Theological Seminary, N.Y., where he graduated in 1844, and was licensed to preach by the Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. In 1845 he became pastor of the Presbyterian church of Carmel, N.Y., in 1844, but removed in 1849 as pastor of the Third Reformed Dutch Church of Philadelphia. Resigning in 1854 on account of feeble health, he returned to Carmel, and became principal of the Raymond Institute, and also supplied the vacant church of which he was formerly pastor. He died suddenly, Jan., 25, 1855. "No doubts, no fears, no darkness" sealed his dying hours. Mr. Livingston was a man of noble mould, tall, massive, intellectual, modest, amiable, dignified in manners, somewhat reserved, diffident, and self-distrustful. His character was finely balanced. True manliness, transparent simplicity, moral purity, generosity, and the most delicate sensibility, were blended with deep piety and beautiful consistency of life, with a holy ministry and a few divine talents. Only his few courses were published. See Memorial Sermon by W. J. Taylor, D.D., and Sprague's Annals, vol. ixx.

Livingston, John, a noted Scottish Presbyterian divine, was born in 1608, and was educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of A.M. in 1621. He entered the ministry, and soon distinguished himself as an able preacher and powerful orator. As a zealous champion of the Reformed principles, he was a correct ascendant of the ecclesiastical government of the Church after the Restoration, and on this account suffered many inconveniences. Very remarkable in his life was the result which followed his preaching on a special fast-day appointed by the Kirk of Scotland, June 21, 1630. He was at this time domestic chaplain to the countess of Wigtown. Later he became minister at Ancram. He was twice suspended from his pastoral office, but, his opposition to the government continuing, he was banished the kingdom in 1662. He retired to Holland, and became minister of the church at Rotterdam, and in 1667, received the municipal government of the city in 1672. He wrote his autobiography (Glasgow, 1754, 12mo): also Lives of eminent Scottish Divines (1754, 8vo). See Chambers, Biog. Dict. of eminent Scotmen, s. v.; A. Gunn, Memoirs of John Livingston (N. Y. 1829); Gorton, Biog. Dict. vol. ii, s. v.

Livingston, John Henry, D.D., S.T.P., the "father of the Reformed Dutch Church in his country," and in many respects its most celebrated representative, was born at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., May 80, 1746, son of Henry Livingston, and a lineal descendant in the fourth generation from the Rev. John Livingston, of Scotland. He graduated at Yale College in 1762, and then studied law for two years, when his health gave way under his close application, and he was obliged to discontinue it. About this time he was converted, and then directed his attention to the Christian ministry. By advice of Dr. Laddie, of New York, he went to Europe to complete his theological studies, and entered the University of Utrecht, in Holland, where he remained four years, and was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Classics of Amsterdam. Having received a call to become pastor and second preacher in English of the Church of New York, he passed examination at the university for the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 4 years, and was licensed to the ministry on April 3, 1770, and at once began his labors as pastor of the Church. Here he soon established his great reputation as a pulpiter orator and as a learned theologian; but his grand ecclesiastical achievement was the settlement of the old and bitter controversy between the "Coetus" and "Conferentia" parties of the Reformed Dutch Church, and the consummation in about two years of the union, which has never since been broken. His pastoral relation to the Church in New York continued forty years—1770 to 1810—although during the Revolutionary War he was obliged to leave the city, and upon his return in 1783 he was again solely pastor, to remain in the ministry for three years. The next year he was appointed professor of theology, and retained this office, with his pastorate, until 1810, when he removed to New Brunswick, N. J., at the request of the synod, and opened the theological seminary in that city, occupying, in connection with the independent academy of Rutgers, in 1826 made the college of Rutgers University. These two offices he held until his death in 1825. It is difficult, in this brief notice, even to sum up the services and character of this eminent man. More than four hundred souls were received into the Church on profession of their faith during the three years of his sole pastorate after the war. Nearly two hundred young men were trained by him for the ministry of the Church. To him, more than to any other man, is due the credit of the separate organization of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in this country. He proposed the first organization of the church in 1791. Among his most characteristic productions were the first psalm and hymn book. His theological lectures still form the basis of didactic and polemic instruction in the theological seminary of which he was the founder and father. The whole denomination is reaping to-day the fruits of the sacrifices which he made for it. His influence in the Church was like that of Washington in the nation. His grand and eloquent sermon, preached before the New York Missionary Society in 1804, from Rev. xiv. 6, 7, was one of the leading influences in that revival of the missionary spirit which gave Samuel J. Mills and his young friends to the work, and which resulted in the subsequent organization of the "American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions" in 1813. Several of Dr. Livingston's occasional productions were published by himself, and in a posthumous volume, containing a syllabus of his theological lectures, was issued by the Rev. Jesse Fonda, one of his pupils. His death, at his residence in New Brunswick, January 19, 1825, was like a translation, without pain or complaint, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." His wife, Sarah Livingston, whom he married in October, 1776, was one of the original signers of the Declaration of Independence. Like him, Dr. Livingston was an ardent and fearless patriot, and during all of the Revolutionary struggle he earnestly sustained the cause of freedom. In person Dr. Livingston was tall, commanding, dignified, and imposing. His features were good and manly, and his manner was refined and studiously polite. He was the model of the Christian gentleman. In his later years his appearance was truly patriarchal. His piety was all-pervading. As a preacher, he possessed eminent abilities. His oratory was powerful, his manner effective. It was full of action, variety, and power. As a theological teacher, he was clear, concise, learned, systematic, and practical. His influence over his students was wonderful. His great aim was to make them experimental ministers of Christ, and they loved and revered him almost as an apostle. Whatever faults he had were more than covered, to the eyes of his friends, by his majestic bearing, his admirable character, his pious life, and fruitful ministry, and by his services to the Church of Christ. See Dr. Gunn's Life, etc., abridged by Dr. T. W. Chambers; also Sprague, A. Sauls, vol. ix, an admirable sketch; also several funeral discourses, etc. (W. J. R. T.)

LIVONIA, the largest of the Baltic provinces of Russia; area 18,188 sq. m.; pop. in 1887, 1,173,951. The Germans, who chiefly live in the towns, number about 64,000 inhabitant of the province; the Latins and other Latins (a branch of the Slavik, kindred to the Lithuanians, or Estonians, who are of Finnish descent. Christianity was first introduced at Riga about 1180 by merchants from Bremen. The great missionary was the Augustinian monk Meinard, who 1180 built the first church at Wexkull, on the Duna, and in 1191 was consecrated bishop of Livonia. His successor, abbott Berthold, of Loccum, endeavored to accelerate the conversion of the Livonians by force of arms, and in 1198 fell in a victory of the German army over the bishop and army of the Order of the Sword, and gradually overcame the persistent opposition of the Livonians to the enforcement of Christianity. After his death (1229) the see of Riga was separated from the ecclesiastical province of Bremen, and, in 1246, made an archbishopric. The bishops of the Order of the Sword with the Teutonic Knight secured the submission and Christianization of Livonia, but involved the bishops in long-protracted conflicts with the order, which hastened the decay of the Church. The army-master, Walter of Plettenberg (1494-1531), adopted the doctrines of the Reformation. It then became the practice in the secular church. The centre of the reformation movement was in Riga, where the Huseite Nicolaus Russ, of Rostock, had, from 1511 to 1516, prepared the way for a religious reform. The first prominent reformer was Andreas Koppen, a Lutheran schoolteacher from Trepow, in Pomerania, who arrived in Riga in 1521, and Sylvester Tagtmeier, from Hamburg, who arrived in the following year. Both were appointed preachers by the town council, in spite of the remonstrances of the archbishop. In Wolmer and Dorpat, Melchior Hoffmann labored so violently in behalf of the Reformation that he created dissatisfaction even among the friends of the movement, and had to leave Livonia. Luther's epistle of congratulation and exhortation (1528) referred to the congregations of Riga, Revel, and Dorpat shows that at that time the Reformation had made considerable progress. In 1524, the archbishop, Caspar Linde, died, died, deeply mortified at the utter failure of his zealous efforts for saving the Catholic Church. His successor, John VII Blankenfeld, previously bishop of Dorpat and Revel, was no longer recognized by the town council of Riga as sovereign, and in 1525 he was even made a prisoner. Under the archbishop Wilhelm, margrave of Brandenburg, who in 1589 succeeded Thomas Schonning, the Reformation spread throughout Livonia; and the archbishop himself became a favorer of the doctrine, and at the time of his death the Catholic Church in Livonia had almost ceased to exist. Johann Briesmann (1597-91), who was called from Königsberg to Riga, drew up in 1580 the first agenda. The liturgy for Revel appeared in 1561, but in 1672 to yield to the Reformed Church. That of fourteen common languages. The Estonian hymn-book of Mathias Knöpken were likewise published in 1661. In the same year the army-master Ketteler concluded a treaty with Poland, by virtue of which Livonia was placed under the sovereignty of Poland; it was stipulated, however, that the Eastern Church of Livonia should not be interfered with. In violation of this treaty, the Jesuits at once began their agitation for the restoration of the Catholic Church, but the Swedish rule again secured the predominance of Protestants, and greatly strengthened it by establishing the University of Dorpat. A new liturgy was introduced in 1652, a new agenda in 1633; at the same time, a Lettish and Estonian translation of the Bible was published. In the 18th century the religious life of the province suffered greatly from the fact that most of the churches, being called from Germany, were unable to preach in the native languages. The partial destitution of many country districts attracted the Moravians, who continued their zealous labors even when, in 1748, their meetings had been forbidden. For a long time they confined themselves to the Lutheran Church, but the large attendance at these meetings droned on (since 1817) to separate from the Lutheran Church.
LIZARD

The latter therefore began, in 1848, to engage in a vigorous contest with the Moravians, invoking the stipulations of the peace of Nystad (1721), in which Sweden had ceded Livonia to Russia, while the latter confirmed the privileges of the Lutheran Church. The Russian government supported the Lutherans against the Moravians, and in 1849, the Greek Church was required to make great efforts to prevail upon the Lettish peasants to join the Greek Church. Several thousands of Letts and Livonians succumbed to the pressure brought upon them by the government, and, after having once joined the orthodox Greek Church, they were forbidden (as many had done soon desire) to return to the Lutheran Church. All the children born of mixed marriages (Lutheran and Greek) must be educated in the Greek religion. In 1853, the Lutheran bishop Walter, who vigorously stood up for the defence of the rights of his Church, had to yield to an intrigue, and not until 1868 was the rigor of the Russian government against the Lutheran Church somewhat relaxed. These conflicts have awakened a general interest in the religious community, to which the re-establishment of the University of Dorpat (1802) has been greatly instrumental. The number of Roman Catholics is about 5,000, that of Greek Catholics is estimated at 145,000; the remainder are Lutherans. (A.J.S.)

Lizard appears in the Auth. Ver. in but one passage (Lev. xvi, 30) as the rendering of ἑρμῆς, ἑρμαία; but different species of the animal seem to be designated by several Hebrew terms, variously rendered in the English translation. In the East numerous varieties of Lizards are met with in abundance, several of which are regarded as venomous (Hassall, Trav. p. 241, 344 sq.). Others, again, are used by the modern Arabs for food (comp. also Arrian, Mar. Eryth. p. 17, ed. Hudson), whereas the Mosaic Law (Lev. xi) classifies them among unclean animals.

(1) ko'ocur (ṣ2, strength, Lev. xvi, 30; Sept. yannai, 7.3, xain, xain-shelem, X. 11) prob., the Lacerta stel- ko, an olive-brown lizard, with black and white spots, and a tail so long that the whole body itself is scarcely of this length (Hassall, Trav. p. 352; figure in Rupell, Atlas, tab. 2). Bochart (Hieroz. ii, 498 sq.) understands this term to refer to the species called El-sa'ar, which exhibits its great strength (hence its name) in combat with the crocodile and serpents, is digesting in appearance, and said to be poisonous (Leon. Afric. Descrip. Afric. ix, 53). But Michaelis (Suppl. 2221) and Rumphius have long since remarked that the description of the name seeking is borrowed from a different root. According to the Arabic interpreters, it is the land crocodile, or a species of it, perhaps the Waran el-had or iskik (Lacerta scincus), which sometimes attains a length of six feet or more. See CHAMELEON.

(2) lelaih (םַלְאָה, perch. so called from its hiding; Lev. xvi, 30; Sept. yannai-shelem, Vulg. stelko, Auth. Ver. "lizard"), perhaps the species called in Egyptian Shekal-ḥêt, described by Forskal (Descrip. p. 18) as a delicate little animal, about a span in length and of the thickness of the thumb, found in the neighborhood of houses. Bochart (Hieroz. ii, 497 sq.) maintains that it is the se'rat of the Arabs, a kind of lizard that clings close to the ground (hence its derivation from an Arabic root, signifying to stick to the earth), to which also the Sept. alludes (comp. Oken, Naturgesch. III, ii, 288). Geddes regards it as identical with the Lacerta gecko.

(3) cho'mer (כֶּם, so called from lying close to the ground; Lev. xvi, 30; Sept. anaipa, Auth. Ver. "small") has been supposed by Bochart (ii, 500 sq.) to mean the Geckos (also Linn.) that burrow under sand (see the precursory interpretation of the Talmud). The interpretation seem rests on no better foundation. Both the Arabic interpreters understand the chameleon. The species intended is uncertain. (See Fuller, Miscell. vi, 9.)

(4) anakah (אֲנָאָכָה, a shrike; Lev. xvi, 30; Sept. and Vulg. stremmeus, Auth. Ver. "ferret") is regarded by the Arab. Erpem. as the Waral, considered by some as identical with the Lacerta nilotica (Hassall, Trav. p. 361 sq.), but which last Forskal (Descrip. Animal. p. 18) calls Waran (comp. Robinson, ii, 253). The Waral is described by those who have personally seen it (see Leo Africae, cix, 61) as having a length of three or four feet, a very strong, grayish-yellow skin, and is regarded as poisonous in every part. (See Rosenmüller, Alterh. IV, ii, 256 sq.; Gesen. Thesaur. p. 128.)

(5) Trans (חָסַפ, prob. from its sluggishness; Lev. xi, 29; Sept. and Vulg. the crocodile, Auth. Ver. "tortoise") is doubtless the species of lizard still called by the Arabs el-Dhuba or Dhuba (Hieroz. ii, 483 sq.), called by the Arabs Lekara (τραπέζους), a species of lizard, probably the Gecko (Hassall, Trav. p. 356 sq.), a kind described as having a round tail of moderate length, and tufted feet, lamellated lengthwise on the bottom, said to be peculiar for excluding poison from the division of its toes, superably seeking to remain on the rocky waters. According to Leo Afric. (ix, 52), it is about a yard long, without poisonous qualities, and incapable of drinking. They are caught and eaten in the desert. Forskal (Descrip. Animal. p. 13) and Hasselquist (Trav. p. 356 sq.) appear to have described it under the name of Lacerta Erythræa (comp. Paulus, Samuil, ii, 268). According to Burkhardt (ii, 863 sq.), it has a scaly skin of a yellow color, and sometimes attains a length of eighteen inches.

(6) Tinshe'meth (תינשנ) the hard breather; Sept., Vulg., and Auth. Ver. mole; Lev. xvi, 30; being the same Heb. word used in Lev. xi, 18; Deut. xiv, 16, to describe a "swan" (אֶשֶּנִי) and also the "swan" (אַשֶּנִי) a species of lizard, probably the Gecko (Hassall, Trav. p. 356 sq.), a kind described as having a round tail of moderate length, and tufted feet, lamellated lengthwise on the bottom, said to be peculiar for excluding poison from the division of its toes, superably seeking to remain on the rocky waters. According to Leo Afric., (ix, 52), it is about a yard long, without poisonous qualities, and incapable of drinking. They are caught and eaten in the desert. Forskal (Descrip. Animal. p. 13) and Hasselquist (Trav. p. 356 sq.) appear to have described it under the name of Lacerta Erythræa (comp. Paulus, Samuil, ii, 268). According to Burkhardt (ii, 863 sq.), it has a scaly skin of a yellow color, and sometimes attains a length of eighteen inches.

(7) Shemaimith (שםאמית, the hard breather; Sept., Vulg., and Auth. Ver. "mole" (8) Tannim (תננים) or Tannim (תננים) otherwise Tann (תנ), seems occasionally to signify a huge land serpent or saurian. See Dracon.

(9) Livyathan (ליביתאנה) sometimes stands for the largest of the lizard tribe, the crocodile. See Livia- than.

Under the denomination of lizard the modern zoologist places all the cold-blooded animals that have the conformation of serpents with the addition of four feet. Thus viewed as one great family, they constitute the Saurians, Lacertina, and Lacertides of authors, embracing numerous generic divisions, which commence with the largest, that is, the crocodile group, and pass through the smaller species, from the most sluggish, digesting, or pleasing in appearance—some equally frequenting the land and water, others absolutely confined to the earth and to the most arid deserts; and, though in general harmless, there are a few with disputed properties, some being held to poison or corrode the limbs of men by the exudation of an ichor, and others extolled as aphrodisiacs, or of medicinal use in pharmacy; but these properties in most, if not in all, are undefined or illusory. One of the best known of these is the common chameleon (Chamaeleo calyptratus). See CHAMELEON. When it is considered that there are no species of Syria, Arabia, and Egypt are overrun with animals of this family, there is every reason to expect aullusion to more than one genus in the Scriptures, where so many observations and similes are derived from the natural objects which were familiar.

to the various writers. Among the names enumerated above, Bochart refers ταῦτα (Lev. xi, 30), to one of the group of Monitors or Varanus, the Nilotic lizard, Lacerta Niloticus, Varanus Niloticus, or Waron of the Arabs. Like the others of this form, it is possessed of a tail double the length of the body, but is not so well known in Palestine, where there is only one real river (Jordan), and that not tenanted by this species. It appears that the true crocodile frequented the shores and marshes of the coast down to a comparatively late period, and therefore it may well have had a more specific name than leviathan—a word apparently best suited to the dignified and lofty diety of the prophets, and clearly of more general signification than the more colloquial designation. Jerome was of this opinion; and it is thus likely that ta'h was applied to both, as Waron is now considered only a variety of, or a young, crocodile.

There is a second of the same group, Lacerta scincus of Merrem (Varanus armariae), Waron el-bard, also reaching to six feet in length; and a third, not as yet clearly described, which appears to be larger than either, growing to nine feet, and covered with bright cupreous scales. This last prefers rocky and stony situations. One of the last mentioned pursues its prey on land with a rapid bounding action, feeds on the larger insects, and is said to attack game in a body, sometimes destroying even sheep. The Arabs, in agreement with the ancients, assert that this species will do fierce and victorious battle with serpents. Considerations like these induce us to assign the Hebrew name תָּאָשׁ, ta'ash (a designation of strength) to the species of the desert; and if the Nilotic varron be the ta'ash, then the Arabian dhaib, as Bruce asserts, will be Varanus armariae, or varcon el-bard of the present familiar language, and chamaeleon the larger copper-colored species above noticed. But it is evident from the Arabic authorities quoted by Bochart, and from his own conclusions, that there is not only confusion among the species of lizard, but that the ichneumon of Egypt (Harpesites Pharaonis) is mixed up with the history of these saurians.

We come next to the group of lizards more properly so called, which Hebrew commentators take to be the תָּאָשׁ, letash, a name having some allusion to poison and venom. The word occurs only once (Lev. xi, 30), where saurians alone appear to be indicated. If the Heb. root were to guide the decision, letash would be another name for the gecko or elomakh, for there is but one species which can be deemed venomous; and with regard to the quality of venomess, though the geckos possess it most, numerous common lizards run up and down perpendicular walls with great facility. We therefore take תָּאָשׁ, chamaeleon, or the sand lizard of Bochart, to be the true lizard, several (probably many) species existing in myriads on the rocks in sandy places, and in ruins in every part of Palestine and the adjacent countries. There is one species particularly abundant and small, well known in Arabia by the name of Sauraudhi. We now come to Stellomions, which have been confounded with the noxious geckos and others from the time of Al-drovanus, and thence have been a source of inextricable trouble to commentators. They are best known by the lenticles of star-like spangles on the body. Among these Lacerta stellio, Stellio Orientalis, the κροκείδας of the Greeks, and hardun of the Arabs, is abundant in the East, and a great frequenter of ruinous walls. The genus Uromastix offers Stellio spinipes of Daudin or Or-spinipes, two or three feet long, of a greyish green, and is the species which is believed to strike with the tail; hence formerly denominated Cauda verbera. It is frequent in the deserts around Egypt, and is probably the Qasir of the Arabs. Another subgenus, named Trupheus by Cuvier, is exemplified in the Tr. Aspygopus of Geoffr., with a spi-nous swelled body, but remarkable for the faculty of changing color more rapidly than the chameleon. Next we place the Gelkotians, among which comes פַּעְעַף, amalk, in our versions denominated ferret, but which is with more propriety transferred to the noisy and venomous abu-dars of the Arabs. There is no reason for admitting the verb פַּעְעַף, to groan, to cry out, as radical for the name of the ferret, an animal totally unconnected with the preceding species, but a species of mustela or ָא, and originally found, so far as we know, only in Western Africa, and thence conveyed to Spain, prowling noiselessly, and beaten to death without a groan, though capable of a feeble, short shrill when at play, or when suddenly wounded. Taking it as the interpreted name, פַּעְעַף, to cry out, so little applicable to ferrets, in conjunction with the whole verse, we find the gecko, like all the species of this group of lizards, remarkable for the loud grating noise which it is apt to utter in the roofs and walls of houses all the night through; one, indeed, is sufficient to dispel the sleep of a whole family. The particular species most probably meant is the Lacerta gecko of Hasselquist, the Gecko lobatus of Geoffroy, distinguished by having the soles of the feet dilated and striated like open fans, from which a poisonous ichor is said to exude, inflaming the human skin, and infecting food that may have been bitten upon by the animal, or coming in contact with it. Hence the Arabic name of abu-dars, or "father of leprosy," at Cairo. The species extends northwards in Syria, but it may be doubted whether the Gecko fascicularis, or tarentola of South-eastern Europe, be not also an inhabitant of Palestine; and in that case the פַּעְעַף, sema-mak, of Bochart, would find an appropriate location. To these we add the Chameleon proper; and then follows the Scincus (in antiquity the name of Varanus armariae), among which Lacerta scincus, Linn., or Scincus officinalis, is the Et-odda of the Arabs, figured by Bruce, and well known in the old pharmacy of Europe. S. Cypris, or Lacerta Cypris scincoides, a large greenish species, marked with a pale line on each flank, occurs also; and a small Scincus variegatus or varicus, often noticed on account of its round black spots, each marked with a pale streak, and commonly having likewise a stripe on each flank, of a pale color. Of the species of Sepia, that is, viviparous serpent-lizards, having the body of snakes, with four weak limbs, a species with only three toes on each foot, the Lacerta chalcites of Linn., appears to extend to Syria. See further details in the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Varanid; Wood, Biblical Animals, p. 534 sq.

From this examination, it appears probable that the generic name for the lizard among the Hebrews (being the only one thus rendered in the Authorized Version) is the פַּעְעַף, letash, which, although an unclean animal, does not usually designate a poisonous species. Among the various kinds with which the East abounds, the Laocerta stellata, or starry lizard, may be selected as probably affording the best type of the scriptural serpents, or at least of leviats in general, as it is the most common in Egypt and Palestine. It is covered with tubercles, and is of a gray color. It lives in the holes of walls, and under stones, and covers itself with dirt. Belon states that it sometimes attains the size of a weasel. This is said to be the lizard which intests the Pyramid, and in other countries where it is found, harbors in the crevices and between the stones of old walls, feeding on flies and other winged insects. This may be the species intended by Bruce when he says, "The number I saw one day, in the great court of the Temple of the Sun at Baalbek, amounted to many thousand; the ground, the walls, the stones of the ruined buildings, were covered with them; and the various colors of which they consisted made a very extraordinary appearance, glittering under the sun, in which they lay sleeping and basking." Lord Lindsay also describes the ruins at Jerash (the ancient Gerasa) as "absolutely alive with lizards." Near Suez, he speaks of a species of gray lizard; and on the scent towards Mount Sinai, "hundreds of little lizards of the color of the sand, and called by the natives sarai&andi, were darting about." In the Syrian desert, Major Skinner says, "The ground is teeming with lizards; the sun seems to draw them from the earth, for sometimes, when I have fixed my eye upon one spot, I have fancied that the sands were getting into life, so many of these creatures at once crept from their holes." Wilkinson says, "In Egypt, of the lizard tribe, none but the crocodile seems to have been sacred. Those which occurred in the hieroglyphics are not emblematical of the gods, nor connected with religion." See SNAIL.

LIZEL, GEORG, a German theologian, was born at Uluit, in Wurttemberg, Nov. 23, 1691; attended success-ively the universities of Strasburg, Leipsic, Jena, Halle, Wittemberg, Aldorf, and Tubingen, and in 1735 became vicar at Weidenstetten, and soon after pastor at Steinm Kirch; but in 1736, on account of false charges against his character, he lost his situation. In 1737 he was appointed subrector at the Gymnasium of Ulm, afterwards inspector of the alumni and imperial poet laureate. The Prussian Royal Society of Duisburg, and the German Society of Jena, elected him a member of their respective bodies. He died Mar. 22, 1761. His life was spent in the investigation of science, and in the cause of religion and education. While at the universities he explored not only the ancient libraries, and the results he gave to the public in more than twenty volumes. As a thological Lizel was faithful to his Church, and confronted and challenged Romanism. For a list of his works, see Daring, ciehtere Theol. Deutsch., vol. ii, s. v.

LIOUERTE, DON JUAN ANTONIO, the noted author of a history of the Inspiration, etc., was born at Rincon del Soto, near Calahorra, Spain, March 80, 1756.
He studied at Tarascone with great success, and received the tonsure when but fourteen years of age. In 1779 he was ordained priest, and took his degree in canon law. At this time the liberal ideas prevailing in France were beginning to make their way into Spain, and Llorente became interested in them. In 1781 he was named advocate of the Council of Castile, and in the year following was made general vicar of the bishopric of Calahorra. While in this position he appears to have concluded himself with the Freemasons, and, although although they seem to have been generally credited, he was nevertheless appointed commissary of the Inquisition in 1785, and general secretary in 1789. After the downfall of the grand inquisitor he attached himself to the liberal minister Jovellanos, who contemplated a religious and civil reformation of Spain. The project increased and he was further fall, and Llorente was involved in his fall, the more surely as he openly expressed his sympathy for him.
Suspected by his superiors, he was closely watched. He was subjected to innumerable petty annoyances, his letters were opened, and, without any reason being given for the measure, was deposed from his situation and imprisoned in a convent for one month. In 1805 he was again received into favor as the reward of a literary service of a very questionable character which he rendered to the minister Godoy. The latter purposed abolishing the "noble privileges of the Inquisition," the confiscations, and carrying out in Spain a thorough system of centralization; to accomplish this, he deemed it advantageous to prepare the way by means of a historical essay, disproving the ancient liberties of those provinces.
The mission was given to Llorente, who wrote No-structoria hispánica sobre las tres provincias Biscayenses (Madrid, 1806-8, 8 vol. v800), a work not in any way remarkable for historical truthfulness. Llorente was now again favored with several high offices. His tendency towards the French ideas, centralization among others, angered him perhaps a reformer master rather than a religious and political slavery. In 1809 the Spanish Inquisition was abolished in Spain, and Llorente was commissioned to search its records for the purpose of writing a history of that tribunal. He had already, as early as 1789, be-egan to collect materials for this purpose, yet two more years were necessary to the aid of several assistants in complying the voluminous records. When the conven-ents were abolished he was given the direction of the proceedings, and the charge of the sequestered goods, as also the administration of the national properties, an ungrateful and not very creditable task, for these properties were the result of sequestration; yet he claimed awardedly to have introduced many favorable changes in the administration, such, for instance, as that of leaving the management of the property belonging to parties put under the ban to the members of their family, and the many distinguished persons to whom he appointed in corroboration of his assertion have never denied its truth. He was, however, accused of embezzlement to the amount of 11,000,000 reals, and lost his position; but the accusation not being substanci-ated, he was indemnified by another situation. In the mean time he continued to advocate the cause of Joseph Bonaparte both by his pen and in public addresses, and when the celebrated Constitution of the Cortes of Castil was proclaimed he was one of its most zealous oppositives. When Joseph lost the Spanish throne (1814) Llorente was obliged to quit the country. After his flight, banishment was pronounced against him, and his property, and his library of 8000 volumes, some of which were rare and costly manuscripts, were consecrated. After a short time in London, Llorente settled in Paris, where he completed the work of which he had published a sketch in Spain: Histoire critique de l'Inquisition d'Espagne (4 vols. 8vo). It was written in Spanish, but was immediately translated into French by Alexis Pelletier, under Llorente's own supervision (Par. 1812). It has been translated into most of the languages of Europe and made shortly afterwards. One of the best English editions was published in London in 1826. (For a review, see British Critic, i, 119.) Llorente was now the outspoken enemy of the Church, and he was forbidden to officiate as priest in Paris, and thus deprived of his support. He had therefore to seek means to earn a living by teaching Spanish, but the University of Paris forbade him to teach in public, and he became altogether dependent on his literary labors and the assistance of his masonic brethren for a support. To what straits he found himself reduced is seen in the fact that he translated Faublas into Spanish. In 1822 he published his Portraits politiques des Popes, which still increased the animosity of the clergy against him, and in this instance it must be granted that he recklessly provoked this enmity by accepting as unapproved facts the statements of contemporary historians, etc., while his friends were obliged to admit that the nature, tendencies, and even the tone of the work were not becoming the character of a priest. In December of the same year (1822) he received orders to leave France within 24 hours. Exiled from France by the refusal of his adoption, he returned to that of his birth, but died shortly after (Feb. 5, 1823) at Madrid, in consequence of the hardships he had undergone during his journey.

Llorente's character and writings have been the object of as extravagant praise by some as of extravagant cen.sure by others. He lived in a time of great fermentation, and in a country where the struggle between progress and conservatism gave rise to innumerable parties; under these circumstances he remained true to progress, and if he did not remain true also to any of the divers political parties, it was because he could not maintain his fidelity to both. When writing the history of the Inquisition, he was yet a fervent Roman Catholic; and in attacking an institution which he considered and proved to have been more political than religious, he undeservedly received the censure of a large proportion of the Roman Catholic press. His ideas did not mean to attack the Romish Church, but, on the contrary, to vindicate it from the imputation of having been solidly concerned in the transaction of that fell tribunal. If in his subsequent works he went further, and attacked the Church itself, it is because he was to be found in the persecutions he endured at the hands of that Church. Llorente is not to be considered as a historian; neither his literary talents, nor his historical knowledge, nor the gift of correctly combining and connecting events, gave him any title to that appellation. His greatest production, the Critical History of the Inquisition, such Protestant historians as Prescott and Ranke judge to be of but little value, because of its partisan character, and the exaggerations in which it abounds, and, as the readers of this Cyclopaedia must have noticed, in the article Inquisitores (see especially p. 603, col. 1), he has rarely been quoted. His only credit in the work is that he brought together much material before inaccessible. We might say Llorente was a good and diligent compiler, but too ardent a partisan to be said a historian. See his autobiography entitled, Notice biographique et épitaphique sur Don J. H. Llorente (1823); Prescott, Hist. of Ferdinand and Isabella, i, pt. ii; Ranke, Hist. of the Popes, i, 142, 272; ii, 293; Monthly Review, xci (1820), Appen; Review Eugénique (1823).

Lloyd, Charles Hooker, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Haven, Conn, Feb. 21, 1833. His early life was spent in mercantile pursuits in New York City. In 1856, however, pursuing to become a missionary to the heathen, he entered New York University; later he studied divinity in the theological seminary at Princeton, N.J., and graduated in 1862. He was licensed and ordained as an evangelist by the New York Presbytery April 29, 1862, and appointed (June 21, 1862) by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to go to the coast of Africa. His labors there were of much effective mission work, as he died Feb. 10, 1865. Mr. Lloyd, as a preacher, was eminently wise to win souls. He was gifted with a strong passion for music, and wrote and arranged many chants and hymns for the African converts. See Wilson, Pred. Hist. Amacon, 1868, p. 167.

Lloyd, Thomas, a noted Quaker preacher, was born in North Wales in 1649. While a student at Oxford University, he visited, during a vacation, his brother Charles, who had been imprisoned for Quakerism at Welch-Pool, and by the latter's influence became himself a convert to the religion of the Friends. He immediately left Oxford, suffered with the Quakers in their persecutions, and became an "instructor" on their "First-days." On account of persecution, reproach, and loss of property for his religion's sake, he emigrated to Pennsylvania soon after the first settlement of that province. He died July 10, 1894. As president of the council, and subsequently as deputy governor of Pennsylvania, he exercised a substantial influence upon the interests and progress of the colony. See Janney's History of Friends, i, ch. xvi; iii, ch. ii.

Lloyd, William, a noted English prelate, was born in Berkshire in 1627, and was educated at Oriel College, Oxford. In 1640 he removed to Jesus College, where he became fellow in 1646. He took deacon's orders from Dr. Skinner at the time of Charles's execution. He was ordained priest in 1656, and acted as tutor of John Backhouse, son of Sir Wm. Backhouse, at Wadham College, Oxford. In 1660 he became master of arts at Cambridge, and was also made a prebendary of Ripon, in Yorkshire. In 1666 he was appointed king's chaplain, and in 1667 was collated to a prebend of Salisbury, and proceeded doctor of divinity at Oxford. In 1668 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Mary's, in Reading, and also installed archdeacon of Merioneth, in the church of Bangor, of which he became deacon in 1672, besides being made prebend in St. Paul's Church, London. In 1674 he was chosen a canon of St. Paul's, and in 1676 promoted to the see of Exeter, the vicarage of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Westminster. In 1680 he was appointed bishop of St. Asaph, was translated to Lichfield in 1692, and to Worcester in 1689-1700. He took an active part in all the transactions between the Romanists and Protestants in 1678. He preached the funeral sermon of Sir Edmund Godfrey, believed to have been murdered in carrying out what is known as the popish plot for overthrowing Protestantism in England. In 1688, with six other bishops, he signed, and, as spokesman, presented to the king, a memorial against the publication of his declaration of indulgence to Romanists and Dissenters. He was one of the six bishops who, together with archbishop Sancroft, composing the illustrious seven bishops, for their refusal to publish the king's declaration, were shortly after imprisoned by James II in the Tower, and after trial, acquitted, to the great joy of all England. He became almoner to William III, and later also to queen Anne. He died at Hertford Castle Aug. 30, 1717. Lloyd furnished valuable materials to Burnet's History of his Own Times, and wrote Considerations on the Press Popery in this Kingdom, etc. (Lond. 1684, 8vo, 3d edit.) [a work which was attacked by MacKenzie (Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Line of Scotland, etc.), and was defended by bishop Stillingfleet (Origines Brit., 1717; 2 vols.), who reprinted it, with Notes by T. P. Panton (Oxford, 1842, 2 vols. 8vo).—History of the Church of Great Britain.—A Dissertation on Demotic's Seventy Weeks;—A System of Chronology (1712).—Harmony of the Gospels, etc., etc. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, vol. ii; Stoughton, Eccles. Hist. (Restoration), i, 600, ii, 5, 28, 141 sqq., 146; Strickland, Lives of the Seven Bishops.

Loaf (properly אֲרוֹם, kikkar'), a circle, in the phrase בָּלֶד אֲרוֹם, a round of bread, i.e. circular cake, being the form of Oriental bread, or rather biscuit, Exod. xxix, 23, Judg. viii, 5, 1 Sam. x, 8; 1 Chron. xvi, 3; rendered "piece" or "morsel" of bread in Prov. vi, 36; Jer. xxxvii, 21, 1 Sam. ii, 26; sometimes simply בָּלֶד, lechem, bread, Lev. xxiii, 17; 1 Sam. xvii, 17; xxxv, 18; 1 Kings xiv, 3; 2 Kings iv, 42; and so likewise the Greek ἄρος, bread, espec. in the plural, Matt. xiv, 17, 19, xv, 34, 36; xvi, 9, 10; Mark vi, 38, 41, 44, 45; Mark vii, 5, 6, 14, 19; Luke ix, 16, 17; xi, 5; John vi, 11, 13, 25), a round cake, the usual form of bread among the ancients. See Shew-Bread. The bread of the Jews was either in small loaves, or else in broad and thick cakes, as is the present custom in the East. Bread was always broken into such portions as were required, and distributed by the master of the family. See Bread.

Ancient Roman Bread (from a painting on the walls of the Parhe- non).

Ancient Egyptian Bread. (The first two figures are from the Monuments, the others from specimens in the British Museum.)

The word אֲרוֹם, chollah', "cake" (2 Sam. vi, 19), often refers to a cake of oblation (Exod. xxix, 23; Lev. viii, 26, Numb. vi, 15, etc.), from the root אָרָם, chollah, to pierce through, because they were pricked, as among the Arabsians and Jews of the present day. We also find, on the paintings in the monuments of Egypt, representations of offerings of cakes pricked. See Cake.

The two wave loaves mentioned in Lev. xxviii, 17 are called in Hebrew אֲרוֹם כּוֹנְכָּה, lechem temephah, signifying the act of waving or moving to and fro before Jehovah, a ceremony observed in the consecration of offerings; hence applied as a name to anything consecrated in this manner. See Offering.

Lo-am-mi (Heb. Lo-ammi, not my people, as it is explained in the context, Hosea i, 9; Sept. Os λόγος μου, Vulg. Nos populus meus; in the parallel passage, Hosea ii, 25, διὸ, the Sept. Os λόγος μου, Vulg. Nos populus meus). See Note on 2 Kings xvi, 9, 10. Ye shall not now henceforward call me, My people, neither shalt thou call the land, My land. Ye shall scarce call me your Father, and you will not mind me, says Jehovah to the people of Israel, signifying their unbelief (Hosea i, 9; ii, 28; comp. ii, 1). B.C. cir. 725. See Hosea.

Loans (properly, skotot'; 1 Sam. ii, 20, a petition or request, as elsewhere rendered). The law of Moses did not contemplate any raising of loans for the purpose of obtaining capital, a condition perhaps alluded to in the parables of the "pearl" and "hidden treasure" (Matt. xiii, 44, 46; Matthew, Comm. on Laces of Mo- ses, art. 147, ii, 297, edit. Smith). See Com- m. on Laces of Moses. Such persons as bankers and money-lenders, in the commercial sense (Prov. xxvi, 26, Neh. vi, 8), were unknown to the earlier ages of the Hebrew commonwealth. The Mosaic laws which relate to the subject of borrowing, lending, and repaying are in substance as follows: If an Israelite became poor, what he desired to borrow was to be freely lent to him, and no interest, either of money or produce, could be exacted from him; interest might be taken of a foreigner, but not of an Israelite by another Israelite (Exod. xxii, 25; Deut. xxi, 19, 20; Lev. xxv, 35-38). At the end of every seven years a remission of debts was ordered; every creditor was to remit what he had lent: of a foreigner the loan might be ex- tended, not of a brother. If an Israelite wished to borrow, he was not to be refused because the year of remission was at hand (Deut. xv, 1-11). Pledges might be taken, but not as such the mill or the upper millstone, for that would be to take a man's life in pledge. If the pledge was raiment, it was to be given back before summer, as being needful for a covering at night. The widow's garment could not be taken in pledge (Exod. xxi, 26, 27; Deut. xxxiv, 6, 17). The law thus strictly forbids any interest to be taken for a loan to any poor person, either in the shape of money or of produce, and at first, at all events, even in the case of a foreigner; but this prohibition was afterwards limited to Hebrews only, from whom, of whatever rank, not only was no usury on any pretence to be exacted, but relief to the poor by way of loan was enjoined, and excuses for evading this duty were forbidden (Exod. xxii, 25; Lev. xxv, 35, 37, Deut. xv, 5, 7-10; xxiii, 19, 20). The instances of ex- tortionate conduct mentioned with disapprobation in the book of Job probably represent a state of things previous to the law, and such as the law was intended to remedy (Job xxii, 6, xxx, 7, 3). As commerce increased, the practice of usury, and so also of suretyship, grew up, but the execution of it from a Hebrew appears to have been regarded to a late period as discreetable (Prov. vi, 14; xi, 13; xvii, 18; xx, 16; xxii, 26; Ps. xv, 5; xxvii, 13; Jer. xv, 10; Ezek. xviii, 13; xxii, 12). Systematic breach of the law in this respect was corrected by Nehemiah after the return from captivity (Neh. v, 1, 13; see Michaelis, ibid. art. 148, 151). In later times the practice of borrowing money appears to have prevailed without limitation of race, and to have been carried on upon systematic principles, though the original spirit of the law was approved by our Lord (Matt. v, 24; xxv, 27; Luke i, 5, 10). The money-changers (συμπετρικοὶ καὶ σαλαμπορίων), who had seats and tables in the Temple, were traders whose premia arose chiefly from the exchange of money with those who came to pay their annual half shekel (Pulant, xxi, 27; Deut. xxii, 42; 13; comp. Exod. xxiii, 36; Prov. xxii, 27; Wahl, Z. A. M. p. 224; Burckhardt, Notes on Bed. i, 47, 231; Niebuhr, Deor. de l'Ar. p. 56; Lane, Mod. Eg. i, 57; 58; Gesen. Theur. p. 408; Michaelis, Laws of Moses, arts. 145 and 150). 2. The prohibition was absolute in the case of (a) the widow's garments (Deut. xxv, 17, 20) and (b) a millstone of either kind (Deut. xxv, 6). Michaelis (art. 150, ii, 321) supposes also all indispensable animals and utensils of agriculture; see also Mishna, Maaser Sheni, i. 3. A creditor was forbidden to enter a house to reclaim a pledge, but was to stand outside till the borrower brought the money or the property (Lev. xix, 7-11). 4. The original Roman law of debt permitted the debtor to be enslaved by his creditor until the debt was discharged (Livy, ii, 23; Appian, Ital. p. 40); and he might even be put to death by him, though this extreme does not appear to have been ever practised (Cicero, De Leg. ii, 1, 10; Smith, Dictionary of Classics, a. v. topon. Censorio, Nuxem). In Athens also the creditor had a claim to the person of the debtor (Plutarch, Vit. Sol. 15). The Jewish law, as it did not forbid temporary bondage in the case of debtors, yet forbade a Hebrew to treat a foreigner as a bondman longer than the seventh year, or at utmost the year of jubilee (Exod. xxii, 2; Lev. xxv, 39, 42; Deut. xv, 9). If a Hebrew was sold in this way to a foreign sojourner, he might be redeemed at a valuation at any time previous to the jubilee year, and in that year was, under any circumcumstances, to be released. Foreign sojourners, however, were not entitled to release at that time (Lev. xxv, 44, 46, 47, 54; 2 Kings iv, 2; Isa. i, 1; iii, 9). Land sold on account of debt was redeemable either by the seller himself, or by a kinman in case of his inability to repurchase. Houses in walled towns, except such as were sold to Lot without redemption, were not one year after sale, alienated forever. Michaelis doubts whether all debt was extinguished by the jubilee; but Josephus's account is very precise (Ant. iii, 12, 3; comp. Lev. xxv, 25, 34; Ruth iv, 10; see Michaelis, § 195, ii, 565, § 192, 296). A law on personal property first introduced by Moses was superseded by a law, probably introduced by the Romans, by which the debtor was liable to be detained in prison until the full discharge of his debt (Matt. v, 26). Michaelis thinks this doubtful. The case illustrated in the parable of the unmerciful servant belongs rather to despotic Oriental than to Jewish manners (Matt. xvii, 9, 34; Michaelis, Ææ. art. 149; Trench, Parables, p. 141). Subsequent Jewish opinions on loans and usury may be seen in the Mishna, Baha Meisah, c. iii, x. See Cuban.

These laws relating to loans may wear a strange and somewhat unreasonable aspect to the mere modern reader, and cannot be understood, either in their bearing or their sanctions, unless considered from the Biblical point of view. The land of Canaan (as the entire world) belonged to its Creator, but was given of God to the descent of Abraham under certain conditions, of which this liberality to the needy was one. The power of getting loans, therefore, was a part of the poor man's inheritance. It was a lien on the land (the source of all property with agricultural people), which was as valid as the title of the government by which the family to whose lot it had fallen. This is the light in which the Mosaic polity represents the matter, and in this light, so long as that polity retained its force, would it, as a matter of course, be regarded by the owners of the property. The execution of the right of redeeming was secured by the entire force with which the constitution itself was recommended and sustained. But as human selfishness might in time endanger this particular set of laws, so Moses applied special support to the possibly weak part. Hence the emphasis with which he enjoins the duty of lending to the needy. Of this emphasis the real essence is the sanction supplied by that special providence which lay at the very basis of the Mosaic commonwealth, so that lending to the destitute came to be enforced with all the power derivable from the express will of God. Nor was an aversion wanting, arguments sufficient to vindicate these enactments in the light of sound political economy, at least in the case of the Jewish people. Had the Hebrews enjoyed a free intercourse with other nations, the permission to take usury of foreigners might have had the effect of impoverishing Palestine by affording a strong inducement for employing capital abroad; but, under the actual restrictions of the Mosaic law, this evil was impossible. Some not incon siderable advantages must have ensued from the observance of these laws. The entire alienation of the land to the lent property, and the continuance of that peculiar institution which restored to every man his property at the great year of release. In the intrval between the jubilees the system under consideration would tend to prevent those inequalities of social condition which always arise rapidly, and which have not seldom brought about destruction and ruin. The affluent were required to part with a portion of their affluence to supply the wants of the needy, without exacting that recompense which would only make the rich more wealthy and the poor more needy, thus superin-tening at least the state of things so far as the system of one than to the other of these two parties. There was also in this system a strongly conservative influence. Agriculture was the foundation of the constitution. Had money-lending been a trade, money-making would also have been eagerly pursued. Capital would be withdrawn from the land; the agriculturalist would pass into the usurer; huge inequalities would arise; commerce would assume predominance, and the entire commonwealth be overthrown—changes and evils which were prevented, or, if not so, certainly retarded and abated by the code of laws regarding loans. The gradual increase in wealth of the country was in the main laid out on the soil, so as to augment its productiveness and distribute its bounties. The same regulations, moreover, prevented those undue expansions of credit and those sudden fluctuations in the relative value of money and goods which were so common in modern times and brought on financial collapses and prostration in modern communities. While, however, the benign tendency of the laws in question is admitted, and special objects may be adduced as attainable by them, may it not be questioned whether they were strictly just? Such a doubt could arise only in a mind which viewed the subject from the position of our actual society. A modern might plead that he had a right to do what he pleased with his own; that his property of every kind—land, food, money—was his own; and that he was justified to turn all and each part to account for his own benefit. Apart from religious considerations, this position is impregnable. But such a view of property finds no support in the Mosaic institutions. In them property has a divine origin, and its use is intrusted to man on certain conditions, which conditions are as valid as the tenure of the property itself—whence it may be asked, indeed, the entire land—all property—was a great loan, a loan lent of God to the people of Israel, who might well, therefore, acquiesce in any arrangement which required a portion—a small portion—of this loan to be under certain circumstances accessible to the family to whose therefore lay beyond the sphere embraced by this special arrangement. It would open to a wide field did we proceed to consider how far the Mosaic system might be applicable in the world at large; but this is very clear to our mind, that the theory of property on which it rests—that is, making property to be divine in its origin, and therefore tenable only on the fulfillment of such conditions as the external laws of religious or civil morality enforce—is more true and more philosophical (except in a college of atheists) than the narrow and baneful ideas which ordinarily prevail. These views may prepare the reader for considering the doctrine of property. To return to the subject of law and politics. It is found forcibly expressed in Luke's Gospel (vii, 39, 35): "If ye send to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also send to sinners, to receive as much again; but love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil." The meaning of the passage is distinct and full, unmistakable, and not to be evaded. He commanded men to lend, not as Jews to Jews, but even to enemies, without asking or receiving any re- turn. It is the banishment of the Greed of the Universal world, who sends down his rains and bids his sun to shine on the fields of the unjust as well as of the just. To attempt to view this command in the light of reason and experience would require space which cannot here be given. In the meantime, he must add, that as a precept to explain the injunction away is most unworthy on the part of professors of the Christian religion; and that, not impossi- bly at least, fidelity to the behest of his whom we call Lord and Master would of itself answer all doubts and remove all misgivings by patriotically showing that this, as every other doctrine that fell from his lips, is indeed of God (John xii, 17). Yet, while we must maintain the paramount obligation of our Sav- iour's precept, corroborative—and, indeed, explicable— as it is, of the essential principle of the Mosaic economy; namely, the inoculation of universal brotherly love, nev- ertheless common sense, no less than sound morality, dictates at least the following co-ordinate considerations, which should likewise be taken into the account in the exercise of Christian liberality, in loans as well as in gifts: 1. Due inquiry should be instituted, so as to satisfy the lender of the moral worthiness of the credi- tor, lest the loan, instead of being a benefaction, should really be but a stimulus to vice, or, at least, an encour- agement to idleness. 2. The wants of one's own family and nearer dependents must not be sacrificed by il- lusory liberality. 3. A kindly generosity, which is held in trust should be carefully discriminated from one's own personal property, and a greater degree of caution exer- cised in their administration. 4. We have no right to loan what is already due for our own debts—"we must be just before we are generous." In fine, the great fact that we are but stewards of God's bounty should be the ruling thought in all our benefactions, whether in the form of loans or gifts, and we should therefore dispense funds so as to contribute most to the divine glory and the highest good of the recipients. This principle alone is the true corrective of all selfishness, whether parsimony on the one hand, or prodigality on the other. See BORROW; LEND, etc.

LOAYSA, GRACIA DE, an eloquent Dominican preach- er and Spanish cardinal, was born in 1479 at Talavera, Castile; entered the Dominican Order at St. Paul de Penmary; was made doctor of philosophy, next of theology, director of studies, re- ctor at St. Gregory, prior of the convent of Avila and of Valladolid, provincial of Spain (1518), and finally gen- eral of his order. In 1532 he was chosen confessor to Charles V, of whom he had previously been a teacher. In the following year Charles V made him bishop of Ossa. He admitted him into his private council, and very soon made him president of the Royal Council of the Indies, and president of the Crusade. Loayza strongly opposed the release, without ransom or condition, of Francis I, king of France, made prisoner by Charles at Pavia. Succeeding events proved his coun- sel good. In 1580 Charles V obtained a cardinalship for him from pope Clement VII, and also the title St. Suzanne. In the same year he named him bishop of Burgos and of Aragon. In the great controversy on the history of the Inquisition, it is said to have been in- fluenced by its grand inquisitor of Spain. He was fre- quently ambassador for Charles V, and kept up a private correspondence with him, some of the letters of which (from 1580 to 1592), embracing Charles's stay in Ger- many, are among the most important in the history of the Inquisition, are published by G. Heine from the archives of Simancas. These letters prove Loayza very bitter against the "heretics." Loayza died April 21, 1546, at Madrid. See Antonio, Biblioth. LOBBE, a celebrated convert in Hennegouw, near Liege, in Belgium, founded by St. Laudemel, is noted peculiarly for his holiness and austerity. At the age of 27, as it is said, he sold his sacred vestments, bought a horse, and set up his abbot, the celebrated monk Heriger, who flourished towards the close of the 10th century. His whole history is so thoroughly entangled in mythical narratives that it is well-nigh impossible to tell when Heriger first came to Hennegouw, and when he was elected abbot (Reg. Benedict. iv, 157, v, 753), it thinks probable that Heriger entered Lobbes in 960, and that he could not, because of the low condition of the inmates of that monastery previous to this date, have been educated there. Heriger wrote Vita St. Uramari:—Orta episcoporum Tournensium et Ledecian- sium (after Aug. 978)—Vita St. Landwardi (about 980), etc. He died Oct. 51, 1007.

LOBER, GOTTHILF FRIEDMANN, a German theologian, was born at Bonnebec, in the duchy of Sachsen-Altenburg, Oct. 22, 1722. In 1743 he entered the Uni- versity of Jena, where, in 1741, he lectured on linguistics of the Old and New Test., and later on philosophy. Notwithstanding his splendidly prosperous life in this sphere, he gave up academical life in 1748, and removed to Al- tenburg as assistant court preacher (his aged father was then chief court preacher). In 1745 he became assessor of the Consistory; in 1747, archdeacon; in 1751, preach- er of a foundation and councillor of the Consistory; in 1756, superintendent of a principal; in 1792, year of his death, of the Consistory; in the following year he celebrated his jubilee of fifty years of office. He died August 22, 1799. By reason of his extensive learning, profound linguistic attainments, accurate knowledge of all the branches of theology, and great piety, he is considered one of the greatest Lutheran theologians of the 18th century. Of his productions, we mention Observationes ad historiam eis et mortis Jesu Christi in ipso estatis floro obvia spectante (Altenburg, 1787, 8vo).—Döring, Celebrit. Theol. Deutschlands, s. v.

LOBETAN, JOHANN KONRAD, a German theologian, was born at Habel, near Homburg, Sept. 29, 1668. In 1705 he entered the University of Marburg; later, he spent three years in Cassel, and in 1717 went to Bremen to continue his studies. In 1714 he accepted a call to Weimar as court preacher of the duchess dowager Charlotte Dorothea Sophie; in 1730, to Cöthen, as chief minis- ter and superintendent, with the dignity of a counsellor of the Consistory. Subsequently he was, for several years, the first minister and councillor of the Consistory of the German Reformed Church at Magdeburg. The latter portion of his life he spent at Cöthen, where he died Nov. 22, 1755. Lobethan was a most eminent preacher; the earnest and warm mode of his delivery always captivated the attention of his audience. Of his productions, mostly of a ascetical character, we

In 1790 he again returned to Strasburg as professor and preacher, and there died, June 29, 1794. Lobstein's above-mentioned stay in Paris not only offered him the opportunity of hearing some of the best Orientalists of the day (a fact which chiefly contributed to his extensive and accurate knowledge of the Oriental languages), but also made him acquainted with many great men of that city. Of his scholarly productions we only mention Diss. de Arina emini pace, sermo consili Argenaretatis, 1766, 4to—Commentatio historico-philologica de monibus Ebal et Garizim (ibid. 1770, 4to) ;—Observaciones críticas en loca Pentateuchí illustria (Gessi et Fran. col.1797, 8vo). He published also the Samaritan Codex, after the Copy in the Royal Library at Paris—Düring, Gelíchte Th. Deutsch, s. v.

LobWASSER, AMBROSE, a German Protestant poet, was born at Schwerin, in Saxony, April 4, 1615. He studied law, and became chancellor of Misnia, which position he resigned in 1658, to assume the duties of a professorship at the University of Königsberg. He died Nov. 26, 1685. Lobwasser exerted great influence over the religious concerns of the duchy of Prussia, which, being at first exclusively Lutheran, had to be about equally divided among Lutherans and Calvinists. His reputation chiefly rests, however, on his German version of the Psalms (based upon the French translation of Clement Marot and Theodore Beza), published under the title Die Psalmen und Propheten in deutschen Reimen (Lpz. 1573, 8vo; Heidelberg, 1574; Lpz. 1579; Strasb. 1597, Amsterd. 174(4). The translation was so symmetrical that the music made for the French by Claude Gondimel was exactly adapted to the German. At the same time, it must be acknowledged that it is entirely devoid of poetical merit, as might naturally be expected, for a translation from a translation can seldom have any of the original spirit. These Psalms were nevertheless used in the German Reformed churches until the middle of the 18th century, on account of the people's aversion against singing any but sacred productions. Lobwasser wrote also Sammern aller Kopfelt d. heiligen Schrift, in deutschen Reimen (Lpz. 1584, 8vo). See Jicher, Gelehrten Lexik. Kon.; Koch, Gesch. d. Kirche; Herzog, Real-Encyclopäd. x, 447; Hoefez, Neues. Dic. Gen. xxxi, 429. (J. N. F.)

Local Preachers. The term "local," as applied to preachers in Methodist churches, is used in contradistinction to the term "itinerant" or "travelling," which designates members of Annual Conferences. Local preachers are lay preachers. They are not subject to appointment by bishops or stationing committees, as are itinerant ministers. Nevertheless, they are formally licensed, and subject to the direction and exhortations of the pastoral authority in the charge in which they reside. By special arrangement, and by authority of the presiding elder, a local preacher is sometimes appointed preacher in charge or pastor for a longer or shorter period.

In the Methodist Episcopal Church the following is the process of the appointment of any person as a local preacher. 1. He must be recommended by the leadings meeting of the Church to which he belongs. He must be elected by a Quarterly Conference before which he has been examined on the subject of doctrines and discipline. 2. An election by the Quarterly Conference at this stage appoints a candidate to the office of a local preacher. In proof of his appointment, he is furnished with a license signed by the president of the Conference. The license is given for one year only, and, in order to be re-elected, must be re-signed by the next Quarterly Conference. 3. Subject to the following prerequisites, a local preacher may be ordained: (1) He must have held a local preacher's license for a four consecutive years before his ordination. (2) He must have been examined in the Quarterly Conference on the subject of doctrines and discipline. (3) He must have received a "testimonial" from the Quarterly Conference, signed by the president and countersigned by the secretary. This testimonial must recommend the applicant as a suitable person to receive ministerial orders. (4) He must pass an examination as to character and qualifications before the Annual Conference, and obtain its approbation and appointment to orders.

Local preachers are amenable to the Quarterly Conferences of which they are members. An ordained local preacher is not required to have his credentials renewed annually, although his character must be approved each year by the Quarterly Conference. No person is entitled to admission on examination to an Annual Conference who is not a local preacher, and specially recommended by the Quarterly Conference as a suitable candidate for the "travelling connection." Thus the local or lay preacher's office is made preparatory to the itinerant or fully-constituted ministry. Local preachers are subject to all the moral and religious obligations of the regular ministry. Although expected to devise and execute plans for doing good to the extent of their individual ability, they are nevertheless required to act under the direction of their pastors or preachers, when so requested by the Discipline of the Church to give local preachers regular and systematic employment on the Sabbath.

On large circuits, and on stations embracing missionary work, and where the number of local preachers is considerable, it has been customary to print a Plan covering all the appointments of a quarter, and designating the time and place of each individual's services. In the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Great Britain the insertion of a local preacher's name on the current plan of the charge is deemed a sufficient license and public authentication for his office. In his measures for training and employing lay workers in the Congregational Church, Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, has adopted the system of mapping out the work of his lay preachers in a printed plan, after the manner above alluded to.

According to official statistics, the number of local preachers in the Methodist Episcopal Church at the close of 1889 was 18,558, a number less by but 1387 than that of the itinerant ministers of the same Church. The number of local preachers in the eight other Methodist bodies of the United States is supposed to be about 10,000. In all but a few exceptional cases, the individuals forming this great body of evangelical workers render their services to churches and people without fee or reward. Many of them faithfully and zealously obey the command of the great Teacher, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel," quicken into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in bitter the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind;" also, "Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled." While preaching laboriously on the Sabbath, they support themselves by diligence in business during the week.

Within a few years past a spirited effort has been made among the local preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church for mutual improvement, and the general increase of their intellectual and spiritual power of the body. A National Local Preachers' Association has been formed, which has held public sessions in various parts of the United States. "At these annual gatherings representatives from all parts of the world come together for counsel, and for the comparison of personal experience, and observations, and methods of labor; also to discuss questions bearing upon their work generally." This association also encourages the organization of branch associations in different sections of the country. The National Association referred to memorialized the General Conference of 1872, requesting the following legislation, viz.:

(1) To organize in each presiding elder's district a District Conference, to be composed of all the travelling and local preachers in the district, and to be presided over by the presiding elder, and meet semi-annually.

(2) To give this District Conference authority to receive, license, try, and expel local preachers, and also to recommend suitable persons to the Annual Conference to be received into the travelling connection, and for ordination as local deacons and elders.

(3) To authorize the District Conference to assign each local preacher his field of labor for the next session, and hold him strictly responsible for an efficient performance of his duties.

This scheme of District Conferences being analogous to that long practiced by the Wesleyans of Great Britain, was, with sundry additions and modifications, adopted, but, nevertheless, made subject to the opinion of a majority of the Quarterly Conferences in any given district. The local preacher's office may be considered a feature in the Church's work in all the lands of the world, and in all parts of the world. By means of its lay preaching it is not only sanctioned, but regulated and made auxiliary to regular Church and missionary movements. In England a monthly magazine is published, entitled The Local Preacher's Magazine, to furnish lay preachers material for study, etc., since 1851. See also, The Establishment of Probation, The Local Ministry, its Character, Vocation, and Position (1851); G. Smith, Wesleyan Local Preacher's Manual (1851); Mills, Local or Lay Ministry (1851).

Lochman, John George, D.D., a Lutheran minister, widely and favorably known, was born in Philadelphia, June 18, 1769. He entered the University of Pennsylvania, at which he was graduated in 1789, and from which institution he subsequently received the doctorate. He studied theology under the direction of Dr. Helmuth, and was licensed to preach the Gospel in 1794. Soon after, he accepted a call to Lebanon, in Pennsylvania, where he remained twenty-one years, laboring with great fidelity and the most satisfactory results. In 1815 he was elected pastor of the Lutheran Church at Harrisburg, Penn. His successful labors here were terminated by death July 10, 1826. Dr. Lochman was a typo of those clerical and popular preachers who were held in high estimation by the Church, and exercised an unbounded influence. See Sprague, Ammula A. M. Pulpi, ix, 110 sq. (M. Loci Communes Theologici is the name given to expositions of evangelical dogmatics in the early times of the Reformation. It originated with Melanchthon, and was retained by many as late as the 17th century. Melanchthon was led to adopt it in consequence of its classical signification, the word loci being then used to denote the fundamental principles of any system or science, and he considered it desirable that the loci of theology should also be regularly established and defined. "Sic etiam in summo pendet omne rerum sordidum et rigenda sint studia intelligatur" (Loci communes a. hypothyses theologian, 1521); "Prodest in doctrina Christ. ordine colligere praecipue luct us intelligi posse; quid in summa profetiarum doctrina Christiania, quid a d omnem partem, quid non pertinent" (Loci communes, 1583, init.). But, as the very first principle of the R. E. Form Universalis, the Bible was as a source of saving truth, it is evident that the Loci communes theologice could be nothing else than the Scriptures themselves. In the first edition of his Loci Melanchthon confined himself almost exclusively to the Epistle to the Romans, in the exposition of which he collected the Communiantiorem rerum theologico- rum loci; in his second work (1583) he extended his field, following the historical order, and this plan has been generally adopted since. The most striking progress accomplished by this method, compared with the former systematic treatment of dogmatics, is, as Melanchthon himself pointed out, a return to the Bible on all points, instead of to the sentences of Peter Lombard, "Quia ine recitare dogmata ut nec muniat lectorem Scripturae testimonii nee de summa Scripturae disputatum." As the loci were restored to the Bible, it was natural that the Loci theol. also should be less scientific and learned works than such as could help the people to a clearer understanding of the Scriptures. Hence they were published in German by Spalatin (1521), afterward by J. Jonas (1586), and finally by Melanthon himself (1587), and designated by them as the chief articles and principal point of Scripture (Hauptartikel u. fremdlinge Punkte d. gottes kraft, Schrift), or of Christian doctrine (Hauptartikel christlicher Lehre). Melanthon, however, in the third part of his Locii (1548–59), gradually withdrew from this position, and adopted a manner of treating the subject more akin to scholasticism. This was subsequently the case with the Locii theologici of Abdius Prætorius (Schulze) (Wittsemburg, 1689) and Strigel (ed. Pezel, Neust, 1681), who held the same views, as well as those of Martin Chemnitius (ed. P. Lërter, Franc. a. M. 1611) and Hafenreifer (Tub. 1690), who differed from him; also of Leonard Hutter (Wittsemburg, 1619), who went on an entirely different principle, which John Gerhard tried to soften down in his renowned Locii theol. (Jena, 1610), while A. Calov, in his Systema locorum theol. (Wittsemburg, 1658), carried it to its full extreme. After this time the expression Locii theologici ceased to be used in Lutheran dogmatics.

In the Reformed Church it was used by Hyperius (Basle, 1566), W. Musculus (Berne, 1661), Peter Martyr (Basle, 1590), J. Macer (Franeker, 1693), and D. Chemnitz (Gera, 1658). See Gass, Greek, d. prot. Locke (𝕃וק, nøl), to bar up a door, Judg. iii, 23, 24; rendered “bolt.” 2 Sam. xiii, 17, 18, “inclose,” “shut up,” in Cant. iv, 12; hence לָמַשׁ, lamash, “the bolt;” or fastening of a door, Neh. iii, 8, 16, 18, 14, 16; Cant. v, 6. The doors of the ancient Hebrews were secured by bars of wood or iron, though the latter were almost entirely appropriated to the entrance of fortresses, prisons, and towns (comp. Isa. xiv, 2). Thus we find it mentioned in 1 Kings iv, 13 as something remarkable concerning Bashan that “there were trescore great cities, having walls and brazen bars.” These were almost the only locks known in early times, and they were furnished with a key and a keyhole, which was applied to the bar through an orifice on the outside, by means of which the bolt or bar was slipped forward as in modern locks (Judg. iii, 24). There were smaller contrivances for inner doors, and probably projecting pieces by which to move the bolt with the hand (Cant. v, 6). See Bar. Numerous modern locks. 2. Every door is furnished with a wooden lock, called a lock cylinder, the mechanism of which is shown by a sketch here inserted. No. 1 is a front view of the lock, with the bolt drawn back; Nos. 2, 3, and 4 are back views of the separate parts and the key. A number of small iron pins (four, five, or more) drop into corresponding holes in the sliding bolt as soon as the latter is pushed into the hole or staple of the door-post. The key also has small pins, made to correspond with the holes, into which they are introduced to open the lock, the former pin being driven up, the latter down, by the key. The wooden lock of a street door commonly has a sliding bolt about fourteen inches long; those of the doors of apartments, cupboards, etc., are about seven, eight, or nine inches. The locks of the gates of quarters, public buildings, etc., are made of the same kind as those of the above dimensions; in small buildings, two feet in length, or more. It is not difficult to pick this kind of lock.” (Mod. Egyptians, i, 25). Hence they were sometimes, as an additional security, covered with clay (q. v.), and on this a seal (q. v.) impressed (comp. Job xxvii, 14). (See Rauwolf, Prév. in Ray, t. 17; Russell, Synopsis Volney, p. 498; V. C. Hughes, iv. 129; Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., abridgment, i, 15, 16.)

See Door.

The other terms rendered “lock” in the Auth. Ver. refer to the hair of the head, etc.: they are the following: מַעַלְיָה, maaleh, “macklophoth,” braids or plaits, e. g. of the long hair of Samson (Judg. xvi, 19, 19), מַעַלְיָה, maaleh, "macklophoth," the forelock on the head (Ex. xiii, 9); also a "fringe" or tassel, Numb. xx, 88, 39; comp. Matt. xxiii, 5; מַעַלְיָה, maaleh, "macklophoth," the forelock of a man’s or woman’s hair (Cant. vii, 4, 12; comp. Schultens, Op. min. p. 246); but מַעַלָה, maalah, "macklophoth," the veil or face covering for the head and face, usual in the East (Cant. iv, 1, 6; vi, 7; Isa, xliii, 2). See Hair.

Locke, George, a Methodist preacher, was born in Cannontown, Pa., June 8, 1797, and reared in Kentucky. His early educational advantages were few, but he improved all opportunities to secure knowledge. His parents were Presbyterians, but George was made a Methodist through the preaching of Edward Talbot when a saddler’s apprentice. In 1817 he was licensed to exhort, and to supply the vacant church. In 1818 he entered the Tennessee Conference, and was successively appointed to Little River Circuit, to Powell’s Valley, and to Bowling Green Circuit, Ky. In 1822 he located in Shelbyville, and engaged in secular business. His conscience forced him to re-enter the ministry, and he successively preached on Jefferson Circuit and Hartford Circuit (Kentucky Conference). In 1826 he was transferred to Corydon Circuit, Illinois Conference. In 1828 he labored on Charleston Circuit, and was the means of one of the greatest revivals that Southern Indiana has ever witnessed; while he was making thesame name, he was appointed presiding elder of Wabash District, which comprised an area of territory in Indiana and Illinois of at least 100 miles from east to west, by 200 miles from north to south, on either side of the Wabash River. While on this district he contracted the consumption, and was obliged to become supernumerary. He died in Albany, Ind., in July, 1834. See Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, vii, 608.

Locke, John, the most notable of modern English philosophers, who has exercised the greatest influence on all subsequent speculation, in both psychology and politics, and whose doctrines, under various modifications or exaggerations, will contribute largely to mould the opinions of the civilized world. He has in great measure determined the complexion of British psychology. As the most strenuous antagonist of Cartesianism; as the precursor and teacher alike of the French encyclopedia and of the Scotch school; as the oracle of the freethinkers, the target of Leibnitz, and the stimulator of Hartley, Berkeley, and Hume, Locke must always attract the earnest consideration of the student of metaphysics. For nearly two centuries his name has been a battle-cry, and his dogmas have been fought over by the shadowy host of warring ideologues with the zeal and the fury with which the Greeks and the Tro-Locke was acquainted with the body of Patroclus. His labors in the department of mental philosophy constitute only a part of his claims to enduring regard. His inquiries have been scarcely less fruitful in political philosophy and political economy. In the former he is the arantiacus of Rousseau; in the latter science, of Adam Smith. In each he has laid the foundations on which later theorists and later statesmen have been content to build.

Life.—John Locke was born Aug. 29, 1632, at Wrington, Somersetshire, and was educated first at Westminster School, and later at Christ Church College, Oxford. Here he prosecuted the prescribed studies with diligence and success, but deviated from the beaten path by devoting himself to the disconcerted writings of Des Cartes, who had died a few years before. He obtained the baccalaureate in 1655, and the master's degree in 1658, and then applied himself to the study of medicine, rather for the sake of knowledge and of his sickly frame than with the purpose of practicing his profession.

In 1664 Locke accompanied the embassy to the elector of Brandenburg as secretary of legation, but he returned to Oxford within the year, and applied himself to experimental philosophy, then rising into favor. An accident now decided his course of life, and occasioned his acquaintance with Lord Ashley—the celebrated Earl of Shaftesbury—whom with he was persuaded to accompany to England in the next year. By his skill and good luck he relieved his patron of a disease which endangered his life, and was induced to confine his medical practice to a small circle of the lord's friends, and to give his chief attention to political speculations and questions of state. He thus became a man of the world before he became a philosopher. In 1666 Locke accompanied the earl and countess of Northumberland to France. The earl proceeded towards Rome, and died on the way. Locke returned with the countess to England, and again found a home with Ashley—chancellor of the exchequer. The frequent absence of the earl's court was employed to superintend the education of Ashley's heir, a feeble boy of sixteen. He was afterwards commissioned to select a wife for him, and did so satisfactorily. In due course of time he took charge of the education of the eldest son of this marriage, the author of "The Characteristics." "To such strange uses may we come at last?"

Though residing with Lord Ashley, Locke retained his connection with Oxford, which he frequently visited. On one of these visits, in 1670, the conversation of Dr. Thomas Sprat was turned to the difficulties of making a living. "A mind, he was told, as capable as his was, was not considered among the difficulties, still unsettled, and perhaps insoluble question of the nature and limits of human knowledge. This supplied the germ of the Essay on the Human Understanding, though nearly twenty years elapsed before the completion and publication of the work. In 1672, Ashley, the master-spirit in Charles II's Cabinet, was created earl of Shaftesbury, and soon after he was made lord high chancellor. Locke was appointed secretary of the board. Next summer Shaftesbury surrendered the great seal, and became president of the board of trade. Locke was made secretary to the board. It was at this time that he produced for his noble friend and the other proprietors the Constitution of the Carolinas. In another year the commission of trade was dissolved, Locke lost his post, and he dreamt of making a livelihood by his profession. But his health was feeble, and he travelled in France, acquiring at Montpellier the intimacy of the earl of Pembroke, to whom he afterwards dedicated his "Essay." On Shaftesbury's restoration to office as lord president of the council, 1679, he sent for Locke, but the minister in October of that same year. In two years more he was brought to trial for treason, but the grand jury ignored the indictment. Shaftesbury, however, was compelled to escape secretly to Holland, where he died, June 21, 1683. Locke had followed him, and wrote an affectionate tribute to his memory.

The hostile testimony of bishop Fell proves that Locke had held himself aloof from the intrigues in which Shaftesbury was involved. He did not avoid the malice which such an intimacy invited. He was deprived of his studentship at Christ Church, and vainly attempted to regain it at the Toleration. He was accused of January 11, his successor was demanded from the state's general on the charge of complicity in Monk's insurrection. He was concealed by his Dutch friends. William Penn offered to procure his pardon, but the office was nobly declined. During this exile Locke composed his first essay on Toleration, and produced his plan of "A Commonplace Book"—if it be a—cumbrous and inadequate device, which admits of easy improvement. During this period—towards the close of 1687—he finished the Essay concerning the Human Understanding. The mode of its composition has left painful traces on the completed work, as was apprehended and acknowledged by its author.

The Revolution of 1688 restored Locke to his native land. He signalized his return by the publication of his great philosophical work. An attempt was made to prohibit its introduction into the University of Oxford. In 1690 he issued his two treatises On Government. They controverted the doctrine of the divine right of kings, and referred the origin of government to a social compact, which is equally disproved by theory and by history. They were a greater service by recognizing labor as the foundation of property, though the idea was pressed too far.

Locke continued to decline diplomatic honors, but accepted the place of Commissioner of Appeals, with the modest salary of £200. He directed his regards in these years to the coinage of the realm, which was much debased; and published in 1691 his Considerations on the Lowering of Interest and Raising the Value of Money, which was followed in 1696 by Further Considerations on Raising the Value of Money. He was in frequent correspondence with Clarendon, who brooked on the subject of that restoration of the British coinage which was brought about by the concurrent action of Lord Somers and Sir Isaac Newton.

In 1695 Locke withdrew from the dull, heavy atmosphere of London, and accepted a pleasant retreat for his increasing asthma and advancing age at Oates, in Essex, the seat of Sir Francis Masham, who had married the accomplished daughter of Dr. Cudworth. It had been the fortune of Locke through life to live "quadrus ulenia." His last quarters were at Oates. This was his first home, upon his return home in the great rage, where he waited in cold abstraction's apathy for a miracle to reanimate his spirit, according to the dogma of The Reasonableness of Christianity (produced in 1685). This work sought the union of all Christian believers by advancing the doctrine that the only necessary article of Christian belief is comprised in the acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah, making all the requirements beyond this to consist of practical duties, of repentance for sin, and obedience to the moral precepts of the Gospel. It will be remembered that king William III, of England, entertained the design of uniting Catholics, Presbyterians, and Dissenters upon common ground, and to further this scheme Locke wrote The Reasonableness of Christianity (comp. Quarterly Review, Lond, 1841, July). About the time of his retirement from the city Locke published his third Letter on Toleration, and in the first year of his seclusion wrote his little tract on the Education of Children. The same year which brought out his exceedingly heterodox essay on Christianity was marked by his philosophical controversy with Dr. Stillingfleet, bishop of Worcester.

Locke's circumstances were now rendered perfectly easy by his appointment as commissioner of Trade and Plantations, with emoluments amounting to £1000 per annum. Locke, however, had an aptitude for losing or dropping the gifts of the fairies. Increasing debility made him resign his comfortable sinecure in 1706, and four years later, he died calmly at Oates, Oct. 28, 1704. He was buried at the neighboring church of High Lavenborough, according to the wishes of those who, like Christina of Sweden or Euler's predecessor, followed with her sympathies the studies she could not understand, placed Locke's bust with those of Bacon, Newton, and Clarke, in the mausoleum erected by her at Richmond Park to commemorate the glories of English philosophy.

Locke's health was always exceedingly feeble, and his existence was prolonged only by constant vigilance and care. This doubtless contributed to his absence from any energetic vocations, and probably influenced his theories as well as his character and conduct. It rendered his existence a career of tranquil and learned leisure, except so far as it was interrupted by the suspicions and malice which civil discord directs against every man of note. The self-regarding habits of a valeudinarian may have impelled the thoughts of the philosopher to that continual introspection and that exaggeration of personal impressions which so strongly mark his philosophy. His love of ease and security showed itself in his general demeanor. He was cautious and retiring, affable and genial in his intercourse, kindly and affable in his nature, free from personal animosities, notwithstanding his transitory difference with Newton and his controversy with bishop Stillingfleet. He avoided the incumbrances of maternity; and the deficient experiences of an old bachelor—the want of that most suggestive knowledge, the dawn of intelligence in infancy—may be noted in his whole psychology. His life was, however, worthy of his eminence, and was such as to make him a suitable compere of those fortunato minim—those happy philosophic dispositions which are represented by Malebranche, Spinoza, Leibnitz, Berkeley, and Hume.

Philosophy. The philosophy of Locke is very simple, if not very coherent, and very unsystematic in its treatment by himself. It consists rather of one prolife principle and its explanations than of any complete and orderly scheme. That principle furnishes a foundation for a distinctive method, which was only imperfectly and inconsistently developed by him. That method is psychological, and Locke has been too hastily regarded as its inventor, whereas he only applied it too exclusively and within too narrow limits. Locke's controversial works are naturally directed to the removal of the objections and refutations of those with which his fundamental tenet and its applications are obnoxious: but even the Essay itself is mainly employed in the discussion of topics which illustrate the dogma rather than establish a formal body of doctrine, and with the determination of the boundaries of philosophy much more than to philosophy proper.

An examination of the analysis usually prefixed to the "Essay" will show how small a portion of the work really belongs to the regular exposition of a metaphysical system; how much is occupied with the anticipation of objections, or the simplification of apprehensions of difficulties. The treatise is divided into four books. The first repudiates the Cartesian doctrine of innate ideas, and is therefore controversial and negative. It does not seem to have been very highly regarded by Locke himself. The second is an inquiry into the origin and limits of human knowledge, and is the characteristic portion of Locke's philosophy. The third is given to the consideration of words, and is in many respects the most valuable part of the book, affording useful suggestions for guarding against the multidimensional structure of the "Idola Rasa." It is dialectical rather than philosophical, though it affords frequent opportunities of confirming or expounding his cardinal tenet, and of exhibiting its inadequacy. The fourth book is on the nature of knowledge in general, and does little more than the others, having already reached to the determination of the degree, extent, and quality of human knowledge, which is reduced by him not merely to relativity, but to a beggarly and unsatisfactory relativity.

The circumstances which provoked the composition of Locke's celebrated treatise account in a most instructive manner for the character of his doctrine. His addiction to the writings of Des Cartes in his college days—his rejection of his postulates and conclusions—his fondness for the physical and natural sciences—his utter defect of poetic sensibility—his association with great and with the beau monde—his political and practical proclivities, confined his attention to observed phenomena, cramped and discouraged the criticism of those phenomena, and withdrew his thoughts from what lay beyond, and as it was required for the intelligent observation and interpretation of the phenomena supposed to be observed. Hence he was led to ignore the spirit of human thought—to exaggerate the importance of the words which served for the counters of metaphysical speculation—to make much of his philosophy turn upon the precision and determinateness of terms, and to consider that a scrupulous recognition of their import in their acceptance and employment constituted the main part of philosophy. Hence, when he undertook to examine our own abilities, and see what objects our understandings were or were not fitted to deal with, the examination of the senses, to which he prefixed an account of the experimental method of metaphysics, but revolved tediously and with needless prolixity around the limits of the meanings of words. He thus necessarily arrived at an excessive, though far from rigorous nominalism.

In the impotence of the nominalists, and in the philosophers of the latter part of the 17th and the first quarter of the 18th century—Cartesianism. The influence of the suspected doctrine was manifested at the outset of his labors by his proposition to substitute the phrase determinate ideas for clear and distinct ideas—though a mere change of name, and such a change, could effect little in producing a complete reform of system. It is a startling commentary on the insufficiency of this substitution that no writer has been more capricious and vacillating in his employment of terms than Locke himself, and that the very term idea, which he elaborately defines, is used by him without determinate meaning, and in almost every possible sense except its true one. He, however, furnished neither the first nor the solitary example of the abuse of this fine Platonic invention. Locke's popularity may be due to the ease, and vigor, and the vivacity of his teaching. The materialism of which his fundamental tenet and its applications are obnoxious is rugged, ambiguous, conversational, and as far removed from philosophical propriety as it is from literary elegance.

The influence of Des Cartes, edging antagonism, tempted Locke to commence his investigation by an assault on the hypothesis of innate ideas, which unquestionably formed the latent substratum of the Cartesian delusions. Certainly the clear and distinct ideas of Des Cartes had no title to be accepted as innate. Locke had thus an easy task in refuting the Cartesian positions. He failed to recognize that the incorporated doctrine was not thereby refuted. The "tabula rasa" of Locke was just as much an assumption and as much a fallacy as the innate truths of his opponent—unless by the tabula rasa is understood, what Locke would not have understood, the sensitive and sympathetic tablet ready to restore in the sunlight of life all images presented to it. It is perfectly true that distinct conceptions and formulated maxims are not innate, or anterior to all excitation. This admission does not disprove the reality of congenital and constitutional preadaptations of the intellect, such as are the peculiarities of the particular conceptions and propositions when suitably presented to the mind and apprehended by it. Locke's doctrine on this point has consequently been surrendered, and the doctrine opposed by him has been accepted, under jester limitations, by many who do not entertain the profoundest reverence for his general procedure. The Cartesian postulate compelled the assertion of a divine in-fluct to explain the operations of the mind, and suggested Malherbe's celebrated thesis of "seeing all things in God." Locke, who had assailed the heresiah, felt the necessity of controverting the hazardous modification proposed by the fervent acolyte. But the tenet to which Locke was himself driven by the compulsion of his own erroneous principles was equally hazardous and still more seditious to his idea of God is obtained by sensation and reflection.

Having got rid of innate ideas—tenues sine corpore vitae—the English philosopher proceeded to investigate the origin of human knowledge—the averted object of his main inquiry. Locke was an inversion of logical order, as Morell has observed, in seeking the ratio essendi of the phenomena before ascertaining the containing phenomena themselves; but the accidental connection between the first and second pages of the Essay is very intimate. If knowledge be not deduced ab intra, it might naturally appear to be derived ab extra. Hence Locke concluded that all knowledge is obtained from sensation and reflection. This is his principle, and his principle is his philosophy—the curtain is the picture. The distinction between the sensation and its intellectual apprehension is not by him; it is observed that if sensation and reflection upon sensation are the exclusive sources of knowledge, the knowledge of reflection is derivative from and dependent upon sensation, and all knowledge springs from sensation alone. This oversight occurred his very inadequate explanations of our sense, our language, our God; it furnished Hume with his cardinal positions in regard to impressions and ideas; it rendered Locke a suitable patron for the French encyclopedists and the materialists, and created the belief that he espoused the tenet "We have no innate Ideas in us at our birth."

This tenet was held by neither Aristotle nor Locke, but Locke's development of his own principle often seems to assert and to rest upon that tenet, and both provoked and justified the celebrated response and refutation offered by Leibnitz in the proposed addition to the maxim of the words "nisi intellectus ipse." Locke might have accepted that addition, but it was not declared by his language, nor clearly indicated by his teachings; and its frank acceptance would have been fatal to his philosophical expositions; for, if reflection be considered as a source of knowledge distinct from sensation, it must be external, and rational deduction the foundation of the mind itself to the intellectual product. Locke's original attitude was that of a polemic engaged in the refutation of Des Cartes; this attitude he never altogether abandoned; it determined his habits of speculation and organized his manner of writing in still further misled by the looseness, awkwardness, obscurity, and prolixity of his style, by its colloquial negligence of phrase, by that wavering of expression, and imparlability of figurative illustration which have been noted by Sir William Hamilton, Maurice, and nearly every other student of his works. The equivocation of the terms employed by him escaped his recognition, while it perplexed his readers, and produced much the same effect upon his reasoning as was produced upon Hume's by a similar agency. With Locke there might be delusion; there was no sophistry; there was an open, manifest spirit, a candor and honesty of investigation which often spirited or ignored consistency in the determined apprehension of what was felt instinctively to be right. His book accordingly exercises a most wholesome influence even when the developments of his doctrine are most aberrant, and its perverted errors most perilous. The practical character of his own disposition, the predilection for the studies of observation, and the innocence and simplicity of his own nature, guarded him from the effects as well as from the perception of his errors, but at the same time made him even more seductive to others. They preserved his own piet, while his system became a tempulum impietatis.

This practical appetency of Locke's mind was so en grossing as to leave him utterly without imagination or poetic sensibility. Poetry be disconsolented from want of taste, but professedly for the more ignoble reason that "no gold was found at the roots of Parnassus." The absence of imagination was a very serious defect. It was not true in his case that ome ignorant pro mirabil. On the contrary, the wondrous that he knew was "undeemed of in his philosophy." These intellectual peculiarities became very manifest in his religious and political treatises—sometimes inducing point, perspicuity, and popularity; sometimes generating prosaic assumptions for want of penetrating vision. Theologically occasioned the denial of the immortality of the soul in the Reasonableness of Christianity—the ascertainment of all value to labor originated expounded in his economical speculations—the allegation of a social contract and of a state of nature—pure and unadulterated hypotheses—in his treatises On Government, and other less prominent vagaries. These points merit careful consideration, but they can be only noted here. We should not, however, omit to mention that Locke's amiable and tolerant disposition, the associations of his life, the tenor of his philosophy, his love for the extension of civil, political, and religious liberty at home and abroad, and entitle him to reverential regard as one of the chief benefactors of humanity.

Literature.—The literature illustrative of Locke's philosophy is endless. It includes the greater part of the philosophical treatises written since the close of the 17th century. It must suffice, therefore, to mention here only the works of most direct importance, and most readily accessible. Of such is the following list composed.

Locke, Nathaniel Clarke, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born June 1, 1816, at Salem, N. J., graduated from Middlebury College, Vt., in 1839; from Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1844; was immediately licensed by the New York Presbytery, and soon after entered upon the duties of his charge at Eastville, Northampton County, Va.; accepted a call to the Central Church, Brooklyn, in 1847; three years later took charge of the Church at Hempstead, L. I., N. Y., and there labored until 1850, when failing health compelled him to seek for a dismission. Dr. Locke was a member of the General Assembly of 1860, which met in Rochester, N. Y. A number of his discourses were published, and he was also a large contributor to religious press. He died July 21, 1862. He was gifted with a well-trained and well-stored mind, and was eminently genial and social as a pastor and friend, and earnest and eloquent as a preacher. See Wilson, Presbyterian Historical Almanac, 1863, p. 188. (J. L. S.)

Locke, William, a divine and educator, was born at Woburn, Mass., Nov. 28, 1782, and was educated at Harvard University (class of 1756). He was ordained minister of the Gospel at these words denote merely the different states through which the locust passes after leaving the egg, viz. the larva, the pupa, and the perfect insect—all which much resemble each other, except that the larva has no wings, and that the pupa possesses only the rudiments of those members which are fully developed only in the adult locust (Bubalius). But this supposition is manifestly wrong with regard to several of these terms, because, in Lev. xi, 22, the word וְכָלָּם, “after his kind,” or species, is added after each of them (compare ver. 14, 15, 16). It is most probable, therefore, that all the rest are also the names of species. But the problem is to ascertain the particular species intended, and here we are at a loss.

In every passage where arabs occurs, reference is made to its terribily destructive powers. It is the locust of the Egyptian plagues described in Exod. x, where, as indeed everywhere else, it occurs in the singular number only, though it is there associated with verbs both in the singular and plural (ver. 5, 6), as are the corresponding words in the Sept. and Vulgate. This is a want of uniformity, which will be rendered probable that four species were employed in the plague on Egypt, of which this is named first (Ps. lxviii, 40, 46; cv, 34). These may all have been brought into Egypt from Ethiopia (which has ever been the cradle of all kinds of locusts), by which is called in Exodus “the east wind,” since Bochart proves that the word which properly signifies “east” often means “south” also. The word arabs may be used in Lev. xi, 22 as the collective name for the locust, and be put first there as denoting also the most numerous species; but in Joel 1, 4, and Ps. lxviii, 46, it is distinguished from the other names of locusts, and is mentioned second, as if of a different species; just, perhaps, as we use the word fly, sometimes as a collective name, and at others for a particular species of insect, when speaking of the horse, the turnip, the fly, etc. When the Hebrew word is used in reference to a particular species, it has been supposed, for reasons which will be given, to denote the Gryllus gregarius or migratorius. Moses, therefore, in Exodus, refers Pharaoh to the visitation of the locusts, as well known in Egypt; but the plague would seem to have consisted in bringing them into that country in unexampled numbers, consisting of various species never previously seen there (comp. Exod. x, 5, 6, 15).

It is one of the flying creeping creatures that were allowed as food by the law of Moses (Lev. xi, 21). In this passage it is clearly the representative of some species of winged salutatorial orthoptera, which must have possessed a number of features sufficient to distinguish the insect from the three other names which belong to the same division of orthoptera, and are mentioned in the same context. The opinion of Michaelis (Suppl. 667, 510), that the four words mentioned in Lev. xi, 22 denote the same insect in four different ages or stages of its growth, is quite untenable, for, whatever particular species are intended by these words, it is quite clear from verse 21 that they must all be winged orthoptera. The Septuagint word βραχύς there clearly shows that in a room, while aware that from fifty to one hundred different species annually visit our apartments. The Scriptures use popular language; hence "the multitude," the devourers, or the darker men, may have been the familiar appellations for families of locusts. The common Greek words for locusts and grasshoppers, etc., are of themselves equally indefinite, yet they also served for the names of species, as ἀκρός, the locust generally, from the tops of vegetables, on which the locust feeds; but it is also used as the proper name of a particular species, as the grasshopper ōρατος ἐφύθη, then winged, is applied sometimes to the grasshopper; τροφημιούσα, from τροφή, to chew, sometimes to the caterpillar. Yet the Greeks had also distinct names restricted to particular species, as ἄρός, κορυφία, επιμέλεια, etc. The Hebrew names may also have served similar purposes.

(2) Gen (23, 1xxiii, 4; Sept. ἄρυθρος, Vulgate omits, Engl. "locusts"), or Gss (213, Amos vii, 1, ἄρυθρος ἐφύθη; Aquila, ἄροδον [voratrices], locustus, "grasshoppers, 3, 3, 17, ἄρηλαβος, locustus, "grasshoppers"). Here the lexicographers, finding no Hebrew root, resort to the Arabic, دَحَّلِ, to creep out (of the ground), as the locusts do in spring. But this applies to the yearlings, not the species of locusts, and the expressions from Aristotle and Pliny occur unfortunately in general descriptions of the locust. Castell gives another Arab root, جنح, to cut or tear, but this is open to a similar objection. Parkhurst proposes 23, anything gibbous, curved, or arched, and gravely adds, "The locust in the caterpillar state, so called from its shape in general, or from its continually hatching out its back in motion." The Sept. word in Nahum, ἄρηλαβος, has already been shown to mean a perfect insect and species. Aristotle speaks of its parturition and eggs (Hist. Anim. v, 29; so also Plutarch, De Isid. et Orig.), It seems, however, not unlikely that it means a wingless species, and Podisma of the Ægyptiaca of the grasshoppers, which are of this kind, he includes under the genus Tettix. He says, this defines the ἄρηλαβος as a small locust, and Pliny mentions it as the smallest of locusts, without wings (Histo. Nat. xxix, 5). Accordingly, the Sept. omits only leaping to it. In Nahum we have the construction ἄρηλαβος, locust of the locusts, which the lexicons explain as a vast multitude of locusts. Archbishop Newcome suggests that the phrase is either a double reading where the scribes had a doubt which was the true reading, or a mistaken repetition not expunged. He adds, that we may suppose 23, the contracted plural for 22 (Improved Version of the Minor Prophets, Pontefr. 1809, p. 188). Henderson understands the reduplication to express "the largest and most formidable of that kind of insect" (Comment, on the Minor Prophets, ad loc). Some writers, led by this passage, have believed that the 20 represents the larva state of some of the large locusts; the habit of halting at night, however, and encamping under the hedges, as described by the prophet, in all probability belongs to the winged locust as well as to the larva; see Exod. x, 13: "The Lord brought an east wind upon the land all that day and all that night; and when it was morning, the east wind brought the locusts." Mr. Barrow (I, 257-8), speaking of some species of South African locusts, says that when the larva, which are still more voracious than the parent insect, are on the march, it is impossible to make them turn out of the way, which is usually that of the wind. At sunset the troop halts and divides into separate groups, each occupying in bee-like clusters the neighboring eminences for the night. It is quite possible that the 20 may represent the larva or nymphal state of the insect; nor is the passage from Nahum, "When the sun arieth they flee away," any objection to this supposition, for the last stages of the larva differ but slightly from the nympha, both which states may therefore be comprehended under one name; the 20 of Nah.
iii. 17 may easily have been the nympha (which in all the A. metabolus continue to feed as in their larva condition) encamping at night under the hedges, and, obtaining their wings as the sun arose, are then represented as a flash of light by the rays of the rising sun (Nath. iii. 17). It certainly is improbable that the Jews should have had no name for the locust in its larva or nymphal state, for they must have been quite familiar with the sight of such devourers of every green thing, the larve being even more destructive than the imago; perhaps some one of the salvages, all the names of species, admit to the names of so many species, denote the insect in one or other of these conditions. tena, under the scarabaei (Hist. Nat. vi. 8). The Jews inter- crickets that does so. Tychsen suggests the G. striolus of Linn. The song of the Gryllus tarsipes is sweet and loud. On similar principles we might conjecture, although with perhaps somewhat less certainty, a derivation from the Chald. ῥῆξ, to pray, and thence infer the Manda religious, or Priester, Deu, so called from its singular atti- tude, and which is found in Palestine (Kitto's Physical History, p. 418). The words in the Sept. and Vulg. properly mean the mildew or corn, etc., and are there applied metaphorically to the ravages of locusts. This mildew was anciently believed by the heathens to be a divine chastisement; hence their religious ceremony called Rubigilia (Pliny, Nat. Nat. xxvi. 29). The word is evident, and is here perhaps a synonyme for some one of the other names for locust. Michae[11] (Supplem. 1894) believes the word is identical with chasi, which he says denotes perhaps the mole- cricket, Gryllus talpiformis, from the stridulous sound it produces. Tychsen (p. 73, 80) identifies it with the Gryllus stridulus, Linnæus (= Epidota stridula, Aud. Serv.). The notion conveyed by the Hebrew word will, however, apply to almost any kind of locust, and, in- deed, to many kinds of insects; a similar word, translacina, was applied by the Ethiopians to a fly which the Arabs called zand, apparently identical with the tache fly of Dr. Livingstone and other African travellers. In the pas- sage in Deuteronomy, if an insect be meant at all, it may be assigned to some destructive species of grass- hopper or locust.

(11.) The Greek term for the locust is ἀπίχ, which occurs in Rev. ix, 8, 7, with undoubted allusion to the Oriental devastating insect, which is represented as ascen- ding from the smoke of the infernal pit, as a type of the judgments of God upon the enemies of Christianity. They are also mentioned as forming part of the food of John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 4; Mark i. 6), where it is is, as some have supposed, any plant that is intended, but the insect, which is still universally eaten by the poorer classes in the East, both in a cooked and raw state (Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 97).

II. Locusts belong to that order of insects known by the term Orthoptera (or straight-winged). This order is divided into two large groups or divisions, viz. Car- soria and Solitarioria. The first, as the name imports, includes only those families of Orthoptera which have legs formed for creeping, and which are considered unclean by the Jewish law. Under the second are com- prised those whose two posterior legs, by their peculiar structure, enable them to move on the ground by leaping.

This group contains, according to Serville's arrange- ment, three families, the Gryllidae, Locustariæ, and the Acridiæ, distinguished one from the other by some peculiar modifications of structure. The common house cricket (Gryllus domesticus, Linn.) may be taken as an illustration of the Gryllidae; the green grasshopper (Locusta viridissima, Fabr.), which the French call Sauterelle verte, will represent the family Locustariæ; and the Acridiæ may be typified by the common migratory locust (Epicota migratoria, Aud. Serv.), which is an occasional visitor to Europe (see the Gentlemen's Magazine July, 1748, p. 381, 414; also The Times, Oct. 4, 1845). Of the Gryllidae, G. cerisyi has been found in Egypt, and G. domenicus, on the authority of Dr. Kitto, in Palestine but no other species have occurred in the countries. Of the Locustariæ, Phanomopera falcata, Serv. (G. falco, Scopoli), has also, according to Kitto, been found in Palestine, Bradyporus dubius in Asia Minor, Turkey, etc., Sago Nistaha near Smyr-which is a species commonly sold for food in the markets of Bagdad (Serv. Orthop. 657). A. semifasciatus, A. peregrinum, one of the most destructive of the species, and A. morbium, occur either in Egypt or Arabia. Calliptamus seropis and Chorogogus lybraeus are found in Egypt, and in the cultivated lands about Cairo; Ere mobius carinato, in the rocky places around Sinai. Exciakes, E. pulchripes, E. edipsis octofasciata, and E. migratoria (= G. migrat. Linn.), complete the list of the Suborder Orthoptera of the Bible lands. Of one species M. Olivier (Voyage dans l'Empire Othoman, ii, 424) thus writes: "With the burning south winds (of Syria) there come from the interior of Arabia and from the most southern parts of Persia clouds of locusts (Aedusoa peregrinum), whose ravages to these coun- tries are as grievous and nearly as sudden as those of the heaviest hail in Europe. We witnessed them twice. It is difficult to express the effect produced on us by the sight of the whole atmosphere filled on all sides and to a great height by an innumerable quantity of these insects, whose flight was slow and uniform, and whose noise resembled that of rain: the sky was darkened, and the light of the sun considerably weakened. In a moment the terraces of the houses, the streets, and all the fields were covered by these insects, and in two days they had nearly devoured all the leaves of the plants. Happily they lived but a short time, and seemed to have migrated only to reproduce themselves and die; in fact, nearly all those we saw the next day had paired, and the day following the fields were covered with their dead bodies." This species is found in Arabia, Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Persia. The ordinary Syrian locust greatly resembles the common grasshopper, but is larger and more destructive. It is usually about two inches and a half in length, and is chiefly of a green color, with dark spots. It is provided with a pair of antennae or "feelers" about an inch in length, projecting from the head. The mandibles or jaws are black, and the wing-coverets are of a bright brown, spotted with black. It has an elevated ridge or crest upon the thorax, or that portion of the body to which the legs and wings are at- tached. The legs and thighs of these insects are so powerful that they can leap to a height of two hundred times the length of their bodies; when so raised they spread their wings, and fly so close together as to appear like one compact moving mass.

Locusts, like many other of the general provisions of nature, may occasion incidental and partial evil, but, upon the whole, they are an immense benefit to those portions of the world which they inhabit; and so con- nected is the chain of being that we may safely believe that the advantage is far confined to those regions. "They clear the way for the renovation of vegetable productions which are in danger of being destroyed by the exuberance of some particular species, and are thus fulfilling the law of the Creator, that of all which he has made should nothing be lost. A region which has been choked up by shrubs, and perennial plants, and hard, half-withered, impalatable grasses, after having been laid bare by these scourges, soon appears in a far more beautiful dress, with new herbs, superb lilies, fresh annual grasses, and young and juicy shrubs of perennial kinds, affording delicious herbage for the wild cattle and game" (Sparman's Voyages, i, 367). Meanwhile their excessive multiplication is repressed by numerous causes. Contrary to the order of nature with all other insects, the males are far more numerous than the females. It is believed that if they were equal in number they would in ten years annihilate the vegetable system. Besides all the creatures that feed upon them, rains are very destructive to their eggs, to the larvae, pupae, and perfect insect. When perfect they always fly with the winds, and are therefore constantly carried out to sea, and often ignorantly descend upon it as if upon land. (See below, III.) Myriads are thus lost in the ocean every year, and become the food of fish. On land they afford in all their several states sustenance to countless tribes of birds, beasts, reptiles, etc.; and if their offices as the scavengers of nature, commissioned to remove all superuous productions from the face of the earth, sometimes incidentally and as the operation of a general law, interferes with the labors of man, as do storms, tempests, etc., they have, from all antiquity to the present hour, afforded him an excellent supply till the land acquires the benefit of their visitations, by yielding him in the mean time an agreeable, wholesome, and nutritive aliment.

There are different ways of preparing locusts for food: sometimes they are ground and pounded, and then mixed with flour and water and made into cakes, or they are salted and then eaten; sometimes cooked; boiled or roasted; stewed, or fried in butter. Dr. Kitto (Pict. Bible, note on Lev. xi, 21), who tasted locusts, says they are more like shrimps than anything else; and an English clergyman, some years ago, cooked some of the green grasshoppers, Locusta orcadianon, boiling them in water half an hour, throwing away the head, wings, and legs, and then sprinkling them with pepper and salt, and adding latter; he found them excellent. How strange, then, say, "how idle," to quote the words of Kirby and Spence (Endem. i, 305), was the controversy concerning the locusts which formed part of the sustenance of John the Baptist, ... and how apt even learned men are to perplex a plain question from ignorance of the customs of other countries! They are even an extensive article of commerce (Sparmann's Voyage, i, 567, etc.).

III. The general references to locusts in the Scriptures are well collected by Jahn (Bibl. Arch. vol. viii, 1889, iii, 76), and Dr. Harris speaks of their having a leader whose motions they invariably followed (The History of the Bible, London, 1825). See this notion refuted by Kirby and Spence (ii, 16), and even by Moufett (Theat. Insct. p. 122, Lond. 1694). It is also worthy of remark that no Hebrew root has ever been offered favoring this idea. Our translation (Nah. iii, 17) represents locusts, "great grasshoppers," as "camping in the hedges in the cold day, but when the sun ariseth as fleeing away." Here the locust, gōb, is undoubtedly spoken of as a perfect insect, able to fly, and as it is well known that at evening the locusts descend from their flights and form camps for the night, may not the cold day mean the cold portion of the day, i.e. the night, so remarkable for its coldness in the East, the word הַמְּלֵא being used here, as it often is, in a comprehensive sense, like the Gr. ἡμέρα and Lat. dies? Geesiatus suggests that הַמְּלֵא, "hedges," should here be understood like the Gr. αἰγαῖα, shrubs, brushwood, etc. (See above, i, 2.) With regard to the description in Joel (chap. ii), it is considered by many learned writers as a figurative representation of the ravages of an invading host of human beings, as in Rev. ix, 2, 12, rather than a literal account, since such a devastation would hardly, they think, have escaped notice in the books of Kings and Chronicles. Some have abandoned all attempt at a literal interpretation of Lev. xi, 22, and understand by the four species of locusts there mentioned, Shalmanezer, Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus, and the Roman. Theodoret explains them as the four Assyrian kings, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmanezer, Sennacherib, and Nebuchadnezzar; and Abarbanel, of the four kingdoms inimical to the Jews, viz. the Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans (Pococke's Works, i, 214, etc., Lond. 1740; Rosenmuller, Scholia in Joel c. i). From the Scriptures it appears that Egypt, Palestine, and the adjacent countries were frequently laid waste by vast bodies of migrating locusts, which are especially represented as a scourge of God's providence for the punishment of national sins; and the brief notices of the inspired writers as to the habits of the insects, their numbers, and the devastation they cause, are amply borne out by the more laborious details of modern travelers in the East, who have often seen the hordes, and sometimes obscured the sun (Exod. x, 3; Jer. xlv, 23; Judges vi, 5; vii, 12; Joel ii, 10; Nah. iii, 15; compare Livy, xii, 2; Ellen, N. A. iii, 12; Pliny, N. H. xi, 29; Shaw, Travels, p. 187 [fol. 2d ed.]; Ludolf, Hist.)

Salted locusts on rods borne in procession. (On sculpture from Roses, in the British Museum.)

That they were eaten in a preserved state by the ancient Assyrians is evident from the monuments (Layard, Bab. and Assy. p. 289).

The locust-bird referred to by travelers, and which the Arabs call smurrur, is no doubt, from Dr. Kitto's description, the "rose-colored starling," Pastor roseus. The Rev. H. B. Tristram saw one specimen in the orange-graves at Jaffa in the spring of 1858.

The smurrur, or locust-eating bird.

But makes no allusion to its devouring locusts. Dr. Kitto in one place (p. 410) says the locust-bird is about the size of a starling; in another place (p. 420) he compares it in size to a swallow. The bird is about eight inches and a half in length. Larveel (British Birds, ii, 51, 2d ed.) says "it is held sacred at Aleppo because it feeds on the locust;" and Col. Sykes bears testimony to the immense flocks in which they fly. He says (Catalogue of the Birds of Dakhma) "they darken the air by their numbers ... forty or fifty have been killed at a shot." But he says "they prove a calamity to the husbandman, as they are as destructive as locusts, and not much less numerous." The great flights of locusts occur only every fourth or fifth season. Those locusts which come in the first instance only fly on trees, and do not destroy grain: it is the young, before they are able to fly, which are chiefly injurious to the crops. Nor do all the species feed upon vegetables; one, comprehending many varieties, the truxalis, according to some authorities, feeds upon insects. Laterelle says the house-cricket will do so. "Locusts," remarks a very sensible tourist, "seem to devour not so much from a ravenous appetite as from a rage for destroying." Destruction, therefore, and not food, is the chief impulse of their devastations, and in this consists their utility: they are, in fact, omnivorous. The most poisonous plants are indifferent to them; they will prey even upon the crowfoot, whose causticity burns the very hides of beasts. They simply consume everything without predilection, vegetable matter, linen, woolen, silk, leather, etc.; and Pliny does not exaggerate when he says "forbes quote them even on the doors of houses," and even the doors of houses (xi, 29), for they have been known to consume the very varnish of furniture. They reduce everything indiscriminately to shreds, which become manure. It might serve to mitigate popular misapprehensions on the subject to consider what would be the consequence if locusts had been carnivorous like wasps. All terrestrial beings, in such a case, not excluding man himself, would have become their victims. There are, no doubt, many things respecting them yet unknown to us which would still further justify the belief that this, like "every other "work of God, is good"—benevolent upon the whole (see Dillon's Travels in Spain, p. 256, etc., London, 1789, 4to).
Mendenaen, Jodocus vus, a noted Dutch theologian, was born at Delft in 1628. He studied under Van Rossum at Leyden, and under Leuwenaeus, Franeker, and became preacher at Zoorzem in 1644; at Sluis, in Flanders, in 1650, and at Utrecht in 1652—in all of which places he used every exertion to revive the spirit of practical piety among his countrymen, whom great prosperity had rendered worldly-minded and indifferent. When, in 1672, the country was threatened by the invasion of the French under Louis XIV, he proclaimed it a judgment of the Lord, and called on them to repent. He found many followers. In 1665 he ceased to administer the Lord's Supper, from conscientious scruples. Laying great stress on purity of life and of heart, he feared lest he might administer it to some unworthy to receive this sacred ordinance. The number of his adherents gradually increased, and they spread over the whole Netherlands, but they never separated from the Reformed Church like the Labadists. The effect of Lo- mendenaen's labors may be traced in the history of Spener's labors afterwards in Germany. He died pastor of Utrecht in 1677. He wrote Verfallenes Christentum (published after his death by J. Hofmann), Reformationspiegel (to be found also in Arnold's Kirchen u. Kircherhistorie), and a number of hymns, etc.—Hertzog, Reali.

Lodge (properly some form of the verb "lodge, bin, or sin, to stay over night, a-dorme, etc., etc.) See Ins. In Isa. i., 8, the "lodge in a garden" (יוֹלָד, melamä), a lodging-place, rendered "cottage" in Isa. xxiv., 20 signifies a shed or lodge for the watchmen in a garden; it also refers to a sort of hanging bed or hammock, which travellers in hot climates, or the watchmen of gardens or vineyards, hang on high trees to sleep in at night, probably from the fear of wild beasts (Isa. xxiv., 20). The lodge here referred to was a little temporary hut consisting of a low framework of poles, covered with boughs, straw, turf, or similar materials, for a shelter from the heat of the day and the cold of the night, for the watchmen that kept the garden, or vineyard, during the short season while the fruit was ripening (Job xxxviii., 18), and speedily removed when it had served that purpose. It is usually erected on a slight artificial mound of earth, with just space sufficient for one person, who, in this confined solitude, remains con- stantly watching the ripening crop, as the jackals during the vintage often destroy whole vineyards, and likewise commit great ravages in the gardens of cucum- bers and melons. This protection is also necessary to prevent the depredations of thieves. To see one of these miserable sheds standing alone in the midst of a field or on the margin of it, occupied by its solitary watcher, often a decrepit or aged person, presents a striking image of dreariness and loneliness (Hackett's Illustr. of Scripture, p. 163). See Cottage.

Lodge, Nathanael, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Graves County, Va., August 20, 1768; was converted in 1804, entered the Conference at Baltimore in 1810, and died Nov. 27, 1815. He was a very zealous and useful minister, and many souls were converted through his preaching. He was greatly lamented by his people, as on the day on which he was suddenly cut down.—Minutes of Conferences, i., 378.

Lodge, Robert, a member of the Society of Friends, was born at Masham, Yorkshire, about 1665. He was a religious youth, and became a Friend about 1660. He preached and suffered for the Quaker cause in Ireland. On July 15, 1690, he died, assuring his

Loëfler, Friedrich Simon, a German Protestant theologian, a member of the celebrated philosopher Leibnitz, was born at Leipzig Aug. 9, 1669, and was educated at the university of his native place. In 1689 he became magister of philosophy and bachelor of divinity. In 1695 he was appointed professor at Probstheida, and served there until 1743, when, at the age of 48, he was made emeritus preacher. He died in 1748. He wrote Specimen exegese, s. de operarum in vitæ: Dist. de litteris Bellerophonita: etc.

Loëfler, Josias Friedrich Christian, a noted German Protestant theologian, was born at Stassfeld January 18, 1752. Having lost his father in 1765, he was educated in the orphan asylum and at the University of Halle. In 1774 he went to Berlin, where he made the acquaintance of Teller, and in 1777 became minister of one of the churches of that city. He now made himself known as a writer by translating Souvénain's renowned work on the Platonism of the fathers. In 1778 he was appointed chaplain in the Prussian regiment, but returned at the end of a year to Berlin, where he resumed his office, devoting also part of his time to educational pursuits. In 1783 he became professor of theology at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and minister of the principal church of that city. Here his rationalistic views made him many enemies. In 1787 he was appointed general superintendent at Gota, but entered on this office only in the following year. The University of Copenhagen conferred on him the degree of D.D. in 1792. He died February 4, 1816. Loëfler published three volumes of separate communications, and acts, and was after 1808 the editor of the continuation of Teller's Magazin für Prediger. See Döring, Die deutscbe, Kanzelredner des 18. und 19. Jahrhunderts, p. 223; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, viii, 451.

Loft (oriously, upper chamber, e.g. of a private house (1 Kings xvii, 19; Acts xx, 9). Such rooms were either over the gate (2 Sam. xix, 1) or built on the flat roof (2 Kings xxiii, 12), and were especially used for prayer, conference, or public meetings. See CHAMBER; HOUSE; ROOF.

Loftus, Dudley Field, an Irish lawyer, noted as a learned Orientalist, was born at Rathfarnham, near Dublin, in 1618. He rose to the position of master in Chancery and a judge of the Prerogative Court. He translated the Ethiopic New Testament into Latin for Walton's Polyglot; also published translations from the Syriac into Latin and English. He died in 1695. See Wood, Athen. Oxon.; Harris's edition of Ware's Ireland; Lodge's Peerage of Ireland.

Loftus, William Kenneth, an English archeologist, was born at Rye in 1820. He was a zealous traveller and discoverer, and explored the sites of several ancient cities on the Euphrates and Tigris. In 1857 he published a work entitled Travel and Researches in Chaldeas and Susiana; also an account of Some Excavations at Warka, the Erech of Ninurta, and Zikakia, the Palace of Esther, in 1849-52. He died in 1858. To the biblical student Loftus's work is of special importance. See Thomas's Dict. Bibl. and Mythol..

Log (στοιχεῖον, a deep carry, basin; Sept. σορύλαν, Vulg. sectarius), the smallest liquid measure (e.g. of oil) among the Hebrews (Lev. xiv, 10, 12, 15, 21, 24), containing, according to the rabbinis (see Carphon, Apocrypha, p. 262), a twelfth part of a "hill", or six eggs, i.e. nearly a pint. See MEASURE.

Logan, David Swift, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1834. His literary education was commenced in the academy of Beaver, and was continued in Jefferson College (class of 1854). In 1857 he became the Western Theological Seminary, and, after completing the regular theological course, was licensed by the Presbytery of Alleghany City, and afterwards ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Steubenville, and for two years preached in the churches of New Philadelphia and Uhrichville, Ohio. He next labored in the Presbyterian Church of Tiffin, Ohio, until ill health obliged his return to his home in Bridgewater, Pa., where he died, Sept. 15, 1864. Mr. Logan was endowed with a well-balanced nature; no single faculty was cultivated at the expense of the rest. He had method, a happy, sound, thought, sound, a profuse, earnest preacher and a faithful pastor. See Wilson, Presbyterian Historical Almanac, 1865, p. 97. (J. L. S.)

Logan, John, a noted Scottish divine, was born at Fala, in the county of Edinburgh, in 1748. Though the son of a farmer, he was early destined to the clerical profession, and was educated in the University of Edinburgh. Upon graduation he became tutor to Sir John Sinclair. In 1773 he was licensed as a preacher in the Established Church of Scotland, and was shortly after appointed minister at Leith, where he remained until 1785, when he removed to London, retaining by agreement a part of his clerical income, for the purpose of devoting himself altogether to literary labors. He improved his reputation as a sacred poet. Logan, if not a learned divinity or a very profound thinker, was a man of much eloquence, and a highly popular preacher. But his poetic endowments, strongly lyrical in their tendency, were the highest he possessed; and, unfortunately, he was tempted to apply these in a path where he was ill calculated to shine, and the adoption of which proved fatal not only to his professional usefulness, but to his happiness. In 1780 he printed and caused to be acted in Edinburgh a tragedy called Flammace, which had been rehearsed at Covent Garden, but refused a license by the lord chamberlain. This publication brought on the anger of his Presbyterian associates; and these and other annoyances, aggravated by a hereditary tendency to hypochondria, drove him to intoxication for relief. He died in London Dec. 28, 1788. His friends, Drs. J. R. Hutton, and Hardy, published a volume of his sermons in 1790, and a second in 1791. These sermons long enjoyed very great popularity, and have been several times reprinted. They are among the most eloquent that the Scottish Church has produced. A third edition of his poems, with a new preface, and a life, appeared in 1790; but the poems are included in Dr. Anderson's collection. Some of his hymns are annexed to the psalmody of the Scotch Church.

Logic, this term, derived from the Greek λόγος, λογος, has been the subject of numerous definitions. By different authors and schools it has been defined as the art of convincing, the art of thinking, the art of discovering truth, the right use of reason, the science and art of reasoning, the science of deductive thinking, the science of the laws of thought as thought, and the science of the laws of discursive thought. These specimen definitions indicate in some degree the diverse conceptions of the subject which have prevailed at different periods and in different circles. Aristotle, whom Sir William Hamilton extravagantly calls the author and finisher of the general science under consideration, had no single name for it. He treated of its principal parts as analytikè, apodeiktikè, and tropi, in the latter included the doctrines of Plato and the ethical doctrine of the Sophists. Notwithstanding the honor credited to Aristotle, he himself says that Zeno the Eleatic was the inventor of dialectics.

Thus we are taken back to the early Greek philosophers and their formal discussions of what is now universally denominated Logic. They, in successive generations, developed with more or less clearness its prin-
The 18th century is counted as the second period of scholasticism, during which the leading dialecticians were Bonaventura, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus. During this period scholasticism reached its climax. The 14th and 15th periods of scholasticism witnessed its sensible decline under the protracted but bitter wranglings of the Thomists (Realists) and Scotists (Nominalists).

Notwithstanding an attempt by the Medici of Florence to revitalize the Platonic philosophy in opposition to that of Aristotle, the latter prevailed in the Universities of Europe, and the corruptions of it which had been countenanced by scholasticism began to pass away under the influence of more intelligent discussion. In the 16th century, after the invention of printing, the logical and systematical works of the Stagirite were issued in a purer text and more accurate versions, and largely engaged public criticism.

The authority of Aristotle had been so long supreme in the continental universities, and the union between what passed for his philosophy and the errors of the Church of Rome had been so long established, that it was only natural for Luther and Melancthon, at the beginning of the Reformation, to inveigh strongly against the Aristotelian logic and metaphysics. At time passed over, however, it became apparent that the work of the reformers could not be done through a change in that of the same Aristotelian logic. Melancthon was not slow to perceive this, and subsequently became an acknowledged follower of Aristotle as to dialectics, and even influenced Luther to retract some of his severer utterances. He introduced into the University of Wittenberg, to which Protestant Germany looked up, a scheme of dialectics and physics founded upon the Aristotelian theory. He also imitated the Stagirite philosopher by teaching logic with constant reference to rhetoric. The advocacy and influence of Melancthon secured the prestige of Aristotelian studies in Protestant schools of Germany for more than a century.

About the middle of the 16th century a formidable opposition to the authority of Aristotle sprang up at the University of Paris, under the leadership of Peter Ramus, a scholar of great natural acuteness, and of an irrepressible spirit. He published his Institutiones Dialecticae in 1548. His system, founded with much ingenuity on the writings of Plato, notwithstanding violent opposition, prevailed so far as to greatly weaken the influence of the Aristotelian philosophy. The king of France, weary of the innovation, made complaint against Ramus to Parliament. The king himself interfered, and appointed a public trial of the rival systems of logic. As might have been expected, a majority of the judges favored the established system. Ramus was consequently ordered to desist from teaching, and an order passed for the suppression of his book. That order was subsequently removed, and Ramus again became popular as a teacher. He treated logic as merely the art of arguing, and was very severe on the dry and tedious formalities of the schoolmen. His system embraccd inferences and proofs, and thus blended with rhetoric. In 1551, through the influence of the cardinal of Lorraine, Ramus became royal professor of rhetoric and philosophy, in which capacity he made many proselytes. Having adhered to the Huguenot party, he was killed in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. But he had already translated into German, where his system found no little favor. In Italy it secured a few disciples, but many more in France, England, and Scotland. Andrew Melville introduced the logic of Ramus at Glasgow, and it ultimately became known in all the Scottish universities. The logical writings of the remainder of the 16th century, and somewhat later, were filled with the Ramist and anti-Ramist controversy, which, though of little permanent importance, doubtless prepared the way for a better comprehension of the true principles and processes of logic in later periods.

In the 17th century the writings of lord Bacon formed another epoch in the history of logic. See BACON, Logic, according to lord Bacon, comprised the sciences of invention, judging, retaining, and delivering the conceptions of the mind. We invent or discover new arts and arguments. We judge by induction or syllogism, and we make inferences by analogies and similes. The first book of the Norm Organum developed his celebrated and peculiar division of fallacies, viz. idola trubi, idola specia, idola fori, and idola theatr. The second book sought to apply the principles of induction to the interpretation of nature. Although, from a defective knowledge of natural phenomena incident to his time, the author's illustrations were far from perfect, and although many logicians have disputed the correctness of his principles, it cannot be questioned that the Baconian logic and method of study exerted a powerful influence upon his own and after times in stimulating thought and discovery. The remaining authors of the 17th century whose writings influenced the study and methods of logic were Des Cartes, Arnauld, author of L'Art de Penser, and Locke, of England. Probably the most influential treatise on the direct subject was Arnauld's Analysis which consisted of the Port-Royal Logic. It attacked the Aristotelian system, and, being written in a modern language, had the advantage over the heavy Latinity of previous books. In this respect it became an example to subsequent writers, who, from the beginning of the 18th century, were numerous if not influential. It was written in all the logic as was its study of logic failed to command general attention. It had few attractions for the popular mind, and its special devotees were seldom able to place it in successful competition with philosophy, natural science, and general literature. Although prescribed in every system of academic study, and at once the agency and topic of ceaseless wrangling among the worshipers, yet its influence upon human life and public opinion was infinitesimally small.

The limits of this article do not admit of a detailed notice of all the logicians and logical systems of modern times, but only of allusion to a few of the most influential. In Germany, more than in any other countries, the study of logic has within the last hundred years assumed new phases and developed new doctrines, more especially in connection with the various systems of idealistic philosophy. Of that philosophy Immanuel Kant [see KANT] may be considered the inaugurateur, and his first philosophical production commenced with the study of logic. As early as 1762 he published a treatise on the "False Subtlety of the Four Syllogistic Figures," in which he denied the syllogism, as only as that it contained the others ratiocinia hybridia. From this point he went on developing his system, till in 1781 he published his Kritik of Pure Reason, to which in 1790 he added his Kritik of the Judgment. Kant claimed to have subjected the human mind to a new analysis, from which he determined the three comprehensive functions of sense, understanding, and reason. His general scheme is summed up as follows:

I. Doctrine of the transcendental elements of knowledge.
   A. Transcendental aesthetics.
   B. Transcendental logic.
   a. Transcendental analytices.
   b. Transcendental dialectics.
   II. The transcendental method.

Not to mention the numerous defenders and modifiers of the Kantian system, we pass to G. W. F. Hegel [see HEGEL], the publication of whose Wissenschaft der Logik in 1812 marks another epoch in German metaphysics. Hegel employed the term logic in a very extended sense. Not confining it to abstract forms of thought and the laws of ideas, he considered it the science of the self-sufficient and self-determining idea—the science of truth and reality. From his fundamental principle that thought and substance are identical, it followed that what is true of one is true also of the other, and that the laws of logic are ontological. His system claimed to develop the idea of the absolute by antagonism through all its successive stadia. With him the primary element of logic consisted in the oneness of the subjective and objective. Innisitc knowledge only regards the object without considering itself. But consciousness, besides the former, contains a perception of itself, of the stages of perception, consciousness, self-consciousness, and reason. Pure logic, according to Hegel, is divided into, 1. The logic of being; 2. The logic of qualified nature; 3. The logic of the idea.

In 1829, Richard Whately, afterwards archbishop of Dublin, published an article in the Encyclopaedia Metropolitana, which, having been expanded and printed as his Elements of Logic, was soon after extensively adopted as a text-book both in England and America. This publication has justly been considered as constituting an era in the study of logic in Britain and America. The principles of Kant's Kritik of Pure Reason were not extensively introduced into Great Britain until after 1856, when Sir William Hamilton began his lectures in the University of Edinburgh. See HAMILTON. Although Hamilton took opposite ground to Whately in his references to the Port-Royal Logic, he was a adherent to the Analystic of Aristotle. Thus the reawakened taste for logical studies during the present century arose from a restoration, by different methods, of the old logic which had come down from the early ages, and survived all the opposition and ridicule which it met. All of the systems under consideration, that none of the systems put forth by Ramus, Descartes, Locke, or Condillac, and their several modifiers, has been able to stand the test of time like that of the old philosophers and schoolmen. This fact may be accepted as proving that the system indicates substantially the process which takes place in all minds in the act of reasoning. Notwithstanding this small demonstration, and a few other points of general concurrence, the science of logic, which has been the subject of human study for more than two thousand years, remains still incomplete. Many of its principles and processes are yet in continued and active dispute. Since Whately and Hamilton, Mr. John Stuart Mill has written an elaborate work in which he depreciates the syllogism and magnifies induction. But his theories in reference to both bear the stamp of Comte's empirical positivism.

The chief logical discussion of the present day revolves around the "New Analytic of Logical Forms," or the quantification of the predicate introduced by Sir William Hamilton. This new analytic, which is chiefly valuable for its enlargement of the hitherto narrow sphere of syllogism, and for its translation of the metaphysics of Kant, being grounded upon certain principles of the Kritik of Pure Reason. Its theory, although illustrated by an ingenious system of notation, was left in a somewhat crude state by Hamilton, but has been gradually elaborated by Mansel and Thompson, of England, and Bowen and Mahan, of America. While these writers appear to think that they have attained the end of all logical perfection, Dr. McCoth, of Princeton, charges their whole system with fundamental error in presupposing "that there are forms in the mind which it imposes on objects as it contemplates them." To explode this error is the avowed object of Dr. McCoth's recent treatise, in which, while he falls back for confirmation upon the old logic, he claims to unfold laws which were not noticed by the old logicians. The characteristic of his work is a more elaborate and systematic form than has taken place since the publication of the Port-Royal Logic. Thus logic seems destined to pass down to coming centuries as it has descended from the past, a subject of endless debate, but one from which each successive generation derives its advantage in the very process of debate. LOGOS

(1) In the apocryphal books of Sirach (chap. i and xxiv) and Baruch (iii, and iv, i–4), this view of Wisdom is developed yet more clearly and fully. The book of Wisdom (vers. 1–180) presents Wisdom as the highest good, the essence of right knowledge and virtue, and as given by God to the sages who pray for it (chap. vii and viii); see especially vii, 22 sq., where Wisdom has divine dignity and honors, as a holy spirit of light, proceeding from God, and penetrating all things. But this book seems rather to have hidden, invisible; and we have viewed it as another name for the whole divine nature as a person distinct from God. And nowhere does it connect this Wisdom with the idea of Messiah. It shows, however, the influence of both Greek and Oriental philosophy on Jewish theology, and marks a transition from the Old-Test. view to that of Philo, etc. See WISDOM, BOOK OF.

(4) In Egypt, from the time of Ptolomy I (B.C. 300), there were Jews in great numbers, their head-quarters being at Alexandria (Philo estimates them at a million in his time). A.D. 50), and there they gradually came under the influence of the Hellenic civilization. There, in the age, a strange mixture of Greek and Oriental customs and doctrines. See ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOLS. Aristobulus, about 150 B.C., seems to have endeavored to unite the ancient doctrines of Wisdom and the Word of God with a form of Greek philosophy. This effort, the leading feature of which was the attempt to harmonize the two elements, is reflected in Philo, a contemporary of Christ, who strives to make Judaism, combined with and interpreted by the Platonic philosophy, do the work of the idea of Messiah, affording by the power of thought a complete substitute for the Torah. This attempt to harmonize the two elements, while it is led in him to a sort of anticipation of certain parts of Christian doctrine, explains how he himself vacillates between opposite and irreconcilable views. See PLATONISM.

(5) Philo represents the absolute God as hidden and unknown, but surrounded by his powers as a king by his servants, and, through these, as present and ruling in the world. (These powers, ἐνεργείαι, are, in Platonic language, ideas; in Jewish, angels.) These are different and innumerable; the original principles of things; the immaterial world, the type of which the material is an image. The two chief of these in dignity are the Θεός, God, the creative power, and the Κύριος, Lord, or governing power of the Scriptures. But all these powers are essentially one, as God is one; and their unity, both as they exist in God and as they emanate from him, is called the Logos. Hence the Logos is the mediator between the two powers; as the reason of God, lying in him—the divine thought; and as the outspoke word, proceeding from him, and manifest in the world. The former is, in reality, one with God's hidden being; the latter comprehends all the workings and revelations of God in the world, affords from itself the ideas and energies by which the world was framed and is upheld, and fills all things with divine light and life, rules them in wisdom, love, and righteousness. It is the beginning of creation; not unoriginate, like God, nor made, like the world; but the eldest son of the eternal Father (the world being the younger); God's image; the creator of the world; the mediator between God and it; the highest angel; the second God; the high-priest and reconciler.

(6) Etschke concludes that, such being the development of the doctrine of the Logos when John wrote, although there is no evidence that he borrowed his views from Philo, yet it is impossible to doubt the direct historical connection of his doctrine with the Alexandrian. Meyer thinks that if we suppose John's doctrine entirely unconnected with the Jewish and Greek philosophy, we destroy its historic meaning, and its intelligibility for its readers. It must be admitted that the term Logos seems to be chosen as already associated in many minds with a class of ideas in some degree akin to the writer's, and as furnishing a common point of thought and interest with those speculative idealists who constantly used it while presenting them with new truths.

(7.) But any connection amounting to doctrinal dependence of John upon Philo is utterly contrary to the tenor of Philo's own teaching; for he even loses the crowning feature of Hebrew religion, the moral energy expressed in its view of Jehovah's holiness, and with it the moral necessity of the divine teacher and Saviour. He becomes entangled in the physical notions of the heathen, forgets the wide distinction between God and the world, and even denies the independent, absolute being of God, declaring that, were the universe to end, God would die of loneliness and inactivity. The very universality of the conception, its immediate working on all things, would have excluded to Philo the belief that the whole Logos, not a mere part or effusion of his power, became incarnate in Christ. "Heaven and earth cannot contain me," cries his Logos, "how much less a human being." On the whole, it is extremely doubtful whether Philo ever meant formally to represent the Logos as a person distinct from God. All the titles he gives it may be explained by supposing it to mean the ideal world, on which the actual is modelled. At most, we can say that he goes beyond a mere poetic personification of the idea, and marks a distinction of persons in the Godhead. See Philo.

(8.) John's connection with the doctrines of the later Jews, though less noticed, is at least as important as that with Philo. In the apocryphal books, as we have seen, the idea of the Logos was overshadowed by that of the divine Wisdom; but it reappears, prominently and definitely, in the Targums, especially that of Onkelos. These were written, indeed, after John's Gospel (Onkelos, the earliest, wrote not later than the 2d century A.D.), but their distinguishing doctrines certainly rest upon ancient tradition. They represent, and even mechanically inculcate, a doctrine of God, the Memra, דיבר, or Dibur, דיבור, as the personal self-revealed God, and one with the Shekinah, שיקין, which was to be manifested in Messiah. But it would be absurd to claim that John borrowed his idea of Messiah from the Jews, who in him looked for, not a spiritual revelation of God in clearer light, to save men from sin by suffering and love, but a national deliverer, to gather their worldly and carnal desires of power, not even for the divine Word become flesh, and dwelling among men, but for an appearance, a vision, a mere display, or, at most, an unreal, doctet human.

(9.) The contrast between John's Logos and Philo's appears in several further particulars. The Logos here is an abstract, as the Word was. It did not begin to be when Christ came, but was originally, before the creation, "with God, and was God." He made all things (ver. 3). Philo held to the original independent existence of matter, the stuff, ὁνόμα, of the world, before it was framed. John's Logos is light, which shines in moral darkness, though rejected by it. Philo has no such height of mournful insight as this. Logos became man in the person of Christ, the Son of God, Philo conceives of no incarnation. Thus John's lofty doctrine of the Messiah is not in any way derived from Jewish or Gnostic speculations, but rests purely on the Old-Testament doctrine, and chiefly on what he learned from Christ himself. His testimony to this forms the historical part of his Gospel. See MEMRA.

3. THEOLOGICAL BEARING OF THE TERM.—The word "Logos" is therefore evidently employed by the evangelist John to represent the redemptive doctrine of our Redeemer, with special reference to his revelation of the character and will of the Father. It appears to be used as an abstract for the concrete, just as we find the same writer employing light for enlighten, life for life-giver, etc.; so that it properly signifies the speaker or interpreter, than which nothing can more exactly accord with the statement made (John i, 18), 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, hath declared him,' i.e. communicated to us the true knowledge of his mind and character. That the term is merely expressive of a divine attribute, a position which has been long and variously maintained by Socinians, though abandoned as untenable by some of their best authorities, is in total repugnance to all the circumstances of the context, which distinctively and expressly require personal subsistence in the subject which it describes. He whom John styles the Logos has the creation of all things ascribed to him; is set forth as possessing the country and people of the Jews; as the only-begotten (Son) of the Father; as assuming the human nature, and displaying in it the attributes of grace and truth, etc. Such things could never, with the least degree of propriety, be said of any mere attribute or quality. Nor is the hypothesis of a personification to be reconciled with the universally admitted fact that the style of John is the most simply historical, and the furthest removed from that species of composition to which such a figure of speech properly belongs. To the Logos the apostle attributes eternal existence, distinct personality, and strict and proper Deity—characters which he also ascribes to him in his first epistle besides the possession and exercise of perfections which absolutely exclude the idea of derived or creaturely being. See CHRISTOLOGY.

LITERATURE.—The following are the principal monographs on this subject: Sanidius, De Aión (in his Interpretationes, Amsterdam, 1670); Saubert, De rerum Aión (Altdorf, 1687); Carpzov, De Deo Aiónia Philonis (Helmstäd, 1749); Bryant, Philo's Aión (1797); Upham, On the Logos (Boston, 1828); Bucher, Johann. Logos is, in the mythology of the Caribbeans, the name of the first man, who descended from his celestial abode to the soft, shapeless mass of which the earth was formed by his creative power. He first imparted to it shape and motion; the sun rendered it dry and hard. Logos, after his death, reascended to heaven. See Vollmer, Mythology, sect. 6. v. E. v. A. B.]

Lohdlius, CARL FRIEDRICH, a German theologian, was born at Grünberg, near Waldheim, Dec. 13, 1748, and was educated at the University of Leipzig, where, in 1774, he obtained the degree of A.M. and the privilege of lecturing on theology. He became soon after morning preacher at the university. In 1780 he accepted a call to Grimsa as dean, and in 1792 to Dresden. He died there August 4, 1809. Of his scholarly productions we only mention Delineator imago divinitatis de condicione animis post mortem ev, quo Christus et Apostoli rizerunt, sive col. i et ii (Lipsian, 1790, 4to). See During, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschland, s. v. Letters Zealously devoted to the cause of his Master, he studied the ways and means of promoting the Christian religion among the masses of the German people, and in 1849 founded to this end a society for Inner Missions (q. v.), and in 1864, following the example of the immortal Fliedner (q. v.), of Kaiserswerth, established a Deacon-LOHES 493  LOLLARDS

Die Sagen v. Loki in Haupt, Zeitschrift für deutsches Alterth. vol. vii.; Thorpe, North. Mythol. vol. i (see Index); and the excellent article in Thomas, Biogr. and Mythol. Dict. (Phil., 1872), s. v.

Lokmán is represented in the Koran and by later Arab tradition as a celebrated philosopher, contemporary with Moses and Solomon, with whom he is said to have frequently conversed. He was, we are told, an Arabian of the ancient tribe of Ad, or, according to another account, the king or chief of that tribe; and, when his tribe perished by the Sei el-Arim, he was preserved on account of his piety and piety. Other accounts, drawn mostly from Persian authorities, say that Lokmán was an Abyssinian slave, and noted for his personal deformity and ugliness, as for his wit and a peculiar talent for composing moral fictions and short apologetics. He was considered to be the author of the well-known collection of fables, in Arabic, which still exist under his name. There is some reason to suppose that Lokmán and Eosop were the same individual, and this view is of late gaining ground. See the excellent articles in the English Cyclop. s. v.; Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.; and Hammer-Purgstall, Literaturgesch. der Araber, i, 51 sq.

Lollards or Lollhards, originally the name of a monastic society which arose at Antwerp about 1300, and the movement of which was centered about the care of the sick and dying with pestilential disorders (see Cellites), was afterwards applied to those who, during the closing part of the 14th and a large part of the succeeding century, were credited with adhering to the religious views maintained by Wiclif (q. v.).

Origin of the Name.—Great diversity of existence exists among scholars on the origin of the name Lollard. Some have supposed that there existed a person of a name in Germany, who, differing in many points from the Church of Rome, made converts to his peculiar doctrines, and was the originator of the movement (see Thomas, Biogr. Dict. art. Lollard, Walter), and for this heretical step was burned alive at Cologne in 1822. It is more than probable, however, that this leader received his name from the sect than gave a name to it, just as in the Prognostic of Johannes Lyttenbeger (a work very popular in Germany towards the close of the 15th century) great weight is attached to the predictions of one Reynard Lollard (Reynhardus Lollhardus), who was, no doubt, so called from the sect to which he belonged. Others believe that it was applied to the Cellites because of their pretense of being digressors at funerals—the Low-German word follem or follem signifying to sing softly or slowly. Another derivation of the word is that which makes it an epithet of reproach. In papal bulls and other documents it is used as synonymous with the term, the tares commingled with the wheat of the Church. In this sense we meet with it (A.D. 1382) even before Wickliffe's death. Still another suggestion comes from a correspondent of "Notes and Queries" (March 27, 1862), who, quoting from a passage of Hede's history, cites a statement to the effect that bishop Florentius de Weelickoven "caused the bones of a certain Matthew Lollert to be burned, and his ashes to be dispersed," etc. The correspondent remarks that from a note on this passage, where reference is made to Prateolus and Walsingham, it is evident that Hede is speaking of the founder of the sect of the Lollards. This same Lollart is the subject of another passage where it is stated that the name of the English sect was derived from a Dutch heretic, buried at Utrecht, and well known in the neighboring region. With much more reason the original of the word Lollard has been traced of late to the Latin word lollardus, by a comparison of the late English Lollard with the old English follem, used by Chaucer and Langeard. Says Whitaker (in his edition of Peters Florence, p. 154 sq.) "Any reader of early English knows that Lollard is the late English spelling of the Latin lollardus. But what is lollard? It is a Latin spelling of the old English follem, used by Chaucer and Lollards. The real meaning of loller is one who lolls about, a vagabond; and it was equally applied, at first, to the Lollards, next to the beggars. [- Beg-h nuis (q. v.)]. But, before long, loller was purposely confused with the Latin lobillum, by a kind of pun. The derivation of loller from to loll rests on no slight authority. It is most distinctly discussed and explained, and its etymology declared by no less a person than Landau himself, who lived at the time it came into use.

English Lollards. Whatever be the derivation of the word Lollard, certain it is that by this name alone the followers of John Wycliffe (q. v.) were always designated, who, in the early stage of the great religious movements of the bold English churchman (about A.D.1360), consisted of the “Poor Priests” (q. v.), a class called together by Wycliffe to carry the glad tidings of the Gospel into the remotest hamlets, and to counteract the influence of the beggins friars (see Beohards), who were then striding over the country, preaching instead of the Word the legends of the saints and the history of the Trojan War (compare D'Aubigné, Hist. of the Ref. ormination, v. 91 sq.). For some time the mendicant orders, which had first entered England in the early part of the 13th century, had been the objects of attack, both by the people and the clergy, for their rapacious and shameless conduct. Indeed, so much was the country disturbed by the violence and vices of swarms of these sanctimonious vagabonds that the ancient records often speak of their arrest. Wycliffe's opposition to such a class of persons could not but have assured him the general respect and commendation of the people. Not so, however, when, to counteract the influence of the mendicants, he instituted the “Poor Priests,” who, not content with mere polemics, preached the great mystery of grace. His name became as great a terror to the people that the clergy were threatened to be left without any attendants at their churches, preference being shown to the poor priests, preaching in the fields, in some church-yard, or in the market-places. It was not, however, until after Wycliffe's appointment to the University of Oxford that any of the doctrines which the Lollards as a sect afterwards maintained, and which caused his prosecution by the papists, were advocated and propagated. It is true, even as early as 1357, Wycliffe had published a work against the covetousness of Rome (The Last Age of the Church), and in 1365 he vindicated Edward III's resistance to the claim of Urban V of the arrears of the tribute granted to the papacy by king John (see Urban V: England); but it was not until (in 1372) he had taken the degree of D.D., and entered upon his work at Oxford University by able and instructive discourses, that he began to gain the favor of the papacy, that he drew upon himself the enmity of the English Prelates, and, in consequence, came to stand forth as the advocate of reform and the leader of a movement for this purpose. Nor did the success of his course slacken in the least after his withdrawal from the university and his residence at the small parish of Lutterworth. Everywhere those persons who had come under his influence or been converted by his writings were busily engaged in disseminating the doctrines which he taught. His followers were to be found among all classes of the population. Some, like the duke of Lancaster, lord Percy, and Clifford, may have been attached to Wycliffe's views mainly by their political sympathies, but the great mass of his adherents were such upon religious grounds. The examinations of those who, during the generation that followed his death (1384), were excommunicated, and who were called the common doctrinal position which they almost uniformly maintained. It was substantially identical with that taken by Wycliffe in his writings. The supreme authority of the Scriptures in religious matters, the extreme simplicity, and the general nature of his doctrine of pilgrimages, auricular confession, etc., the impiety of image-worship, the identification of the papal hierarchy with Antichrist, the entire sufficiency of Christ as a Saviour, without the need of priestly offices in the mass, and any elaborate ceremonial—such were the points upon which they were pronounced heretical, and, as such, persecuted and condemned.

Up to 1382, through the events of the time, the great schism of the papacy, the indignation excited in England by papal decrees, the scandal of many among the prelates and clergy, Wycliffe, as well as his followers, had been left comparatively unmolested, and he himself even escaped altogether. But not so, however, his followers, who were, near the time of his death, rapidly augmenting all over England. The tem- porary obscurity of Wycliffe's name and the spread of Wickliffe's opinions, though there may be some exaggeration in the remark of the former to the effect that "nearly every other man in England was a Lollard," in 1382, however, more decided action was taken on the part of the ecclesiastics, and resulted in the convoking of a council by archbishop Courtney. By it ten of Wycliffe's articles were condemned as heretical, and twenty-four as erroneous. The archbishop issued his mandate, forbidding any man, of what state or condition soever, "to hold, teach, preach, or defend the aforesaid heresies, or any other contrary opinions," which were to be preached or favored, publicly or privately. Each bishop and priest was exhorted to become an "inquisitor of heretical pravity," and the neglect of the mandate was threatened with the severest censures of ex-communication. This measure took effect, for it was observed, where the archbishop, Robert Rygge, was inclined to fa- vor Wycliffe's opinions, and the proctors, John Hunt- man and Walter Diah, were in sympathy with him. A sermon by Philip Reppynson, which they had allowed, and in which Wycliffe's views were defended, subjected them to the excommunication of the archbishop, and with some difficulty escaped on sub- mission. The chancellor was required to put Wycliffe's adherents to a purgation or cause them to abjure, publishing before the university the condemnation of his conclusions. His reply was that he durst not do it for fear of the "What," exclaimed the archbishop, "is Oxford such a nestler and favorer of heresies that the catholic truth cannot be published?" At the same time, by the archbishop's authority, Nicholas Hereford, Philip Reppynson, John Ashton, and Lawrence Bedemen, whose names were associated with Wycliffe's views, de- nied the privilege of preaching before the university, and suspended from every scholastic act. The chancel- lor himself was addressed as "somewhat inclined and still inclining to the aforesaid conclusions so condemned," and, under pain of the greater excommunication, he was enjoined to spare the people the trouble of the chancel- lor or defend the obnoxious doctrines. The injunction of the archbishop was enforced by the command of the royal council. In the early months of 1389 the king had favored the persecution of heretics. On the petition of the arch- bishop, he had allowed him and his suffragans to arrest and imprison, either in their own prisons, or any other if they please, all and every such person and person as shall either privily or openly preach or main- tain the condemned conclusions. The persons thus ar- rested might, moreover, be detained "till such time as they shall repent them and amend them of such errone- ous and heretical pravities." The officers and subjects of the king were also required to obey and humbly at- tend the archbishop and his suffragans in the execution of their process. But the king declined to intercede. Even the council of Peers, the last, insti- tuted the common doctrinal position which they almost uniformly maintained. It was substantially identical with that taken by Wycliffe in his writings. The supreme authority of the Scriptures in religious matters, they of the scripture, and the nature of his doctrine of pilgrimages, auricular confession, etc., the impiety of image-worship, the identification of the papal hierarchy with Antichrist, the entire sufficiency of Christ as a Saviour, without the need of priestly offices in the mass, and any elaborate ceremonial—such were the points upon which they were pronounced heretical, and, as such, persecuted and condemned.

Ashton's trial in London, the citizens broke open the doors of the con- clave, for suspicion of sacrilege, and the pope was not elsewhere. But popular sympathy was weak to resist the organized efforts of a powerful hierarchy, largely oc-carrying the most responsible posts of government, and die boldly (Hannay's Rep. Gorn.) to forge or intero-lated by any man, except the control Some of the accused, like Huyppongton and Hereford, recanted, and became the most virulent persecutors of their former sympathizers. Others, according to Walden, who mentions William Swinderby, Walter Brute, William Thorpe, and others, whose names figure in Foxe's "Martyrs," deserted the realm. If Swinderby was one of the refugees, he soon returned. It is doubtful whether he or his associates went farther than to Wales or Scotland. In 1589 he was arraigned before the bishop of Lincoln, and charged with heresy. Forced to recant, he was compelled to renounce the base of the dioc-es where he had previously been. He was again arrested as a "truly execrable offender of the new sect vulgarly called Lollards." The issue, so far as as episcopal authority was concerned, could not remain doubtful. Swinderby was found guilty, pronounced a heretic, and to be shunned by all. From this sentence he appealed to the king and council.

We have no subsequent record of Swinderby. Foxe supposes him to have been burned in 1599. In 1599, Walter Brute, another Lollard, a layman, was arrested, and, after a tedious trial, was forced to recant. In 1595 the accused man was again summoned before a court, and an apprehension that Parliament would take some action in behalf of the persecuted Lollards. A bull of Boniface IX was issued, inciting the bishop of Hereford against the obnoxious sect, and urging him to stimulate the orthodox zeal of the king. The king was at the head of the persecution when the bull itself was published, and in the presence of the bishops. He could not have known what had transpired was sent him, and his immediate return, with a view to repress the boldness of the Lollards, was sternly urged. Nor was the king backward in responding to the petitions of the archbishop and the exhortations of the pope. Reciting his former commission to the bishops and their suffergings, giving them authority to arrest and imprison, he extended this authority, by which the bishop of Hereford was allowed to arrest William Swinderby and Stephen Bell, who had fled to the borders of Wales; while several of the leading members of Parliament were directed to have it proclaimed, wherever they thought meet, that no man of any condition within the said diocese should, under pain of forfeiture of all he had, "make or levy any conventicles, assemblies, or confederacies by any color," and that, if any one should transgress this rule, his own house should be burned, and his slaves still surrendered to the order of the king and council.

During this time, while special attention was drawn to the danger apprehended from Parliament, the Loll-ards were spreading their doctrines in other parts of the realm, and they had made such progress that several of their leaders, eight of whom are mentioned by Foxe by name, were denounced to the archbishop on his visitation as hereti-cles. They were summoned the next day to appear before him and answer to the charge. But they "hid themselves away and appeared not." They were therefore publicly denounced as excommunicate in several of the parish churches. Nor was this all. The whole town of Leicester, and all the churches in the same, were interdicted so long as any of the excommunicated should remain within the same. and "till all the Loll-ards of the town should return and amend from such heresies and errors, obtaining at the said archbishop's hands the benefit of absolution."

The compact between the leading representatives of the ecclesiastical and civil power which marked the accommodation of Henry VIII was soon reflected in paramount legislation. To prevent the spread of the Lollards, and to suppress their meetings, which were described as confederacies to stir up sedition and insurrection (Crabb's History of English Law, p. 384), it was proclaimed to all persons, sententiously convicted, to refer their opinions, such persons were to be left to the severiac arm. In such cases evidence was to be given to the diocesan or his commissary, and the sheriff, mayor, or bailiff were, after sentence pronounced, to retrieve them to the diocesan and cause them to be burnt.
The law did not remain a dead letter. It was not long before a victim was found. The ecclesiastics were only too zealous for an example that might strike terror among the people, and especially the Londoners, who were "not right believers in God, nor in the traditions of their forefathers; such delers of the Lollards, depravers of religious men, with-holders of tythes," etc. The victim selected was "one William Sautre, a good man and a faithful priest, inflamed with zeal for true religion," who in the Parliament of 1548 was deputed to inquire that he might be heard for the commodity of the whole realm. The spies of the bishops were excited, and he was summoned before the ecclesiastical court. His views were in substance those of the Lollards. He was at first induced to recant, but after his previous trial before the bishop of Norwich was known, as well as his submission and subsequent re-lapse, there was no disposition to show him mercy.
By the king's order, "in some public and open place within the liberties of the city of London," he was "committed to the fire." So bold a measure, not frequent in English history, naturally terrified the Lollards. They kept the bishop's spies, and the king's" spies, and the sheriffs, the king's spies, and the sheriffs, up to the eyes of the thousand before they could no longer look with confidence or the hope of relief. The son of Wickliffe's patron had become the tool of the bishops. His usurped power was sustained by their alliance. As the hopes of relief from the King were dashed, the burden of the persecution at a critical period of his career. He refused to make promises made at his accession began to die out, his popularity waned. Complaints were heard from various quarters. The old parliaments of Richard II began to murmur, and, to retain his throne in security, Henry IV was compelled to throw himself more and more into the arms of the Church, and concede everything which the prelates might demand. The "cruel constitution" of archbishop Arundel was the fitting ecclesiastical counterpart of the civil statute that legalized the burning of the Lollards. It forbade any one to preach, "whether within the Church or without, in English," except by ecclesiastical sanction. Schoolmasters and teachers were to intermingle with their instructions nothing contrary to the determination of the Church. No book or trea-sise of Wickliffe was to be read in schools, halls, hospitals, or other places whatsoever. No man hereafter, by his own authority, should be able to have his books published by the University of Oxford, was, at least once ev-every month, to inquire diligently in the college with which he was connected whether any scholar or inhabitant thereof had proposed or defended anything contary to the determinations of the Church, and the failure of duty in this respect was to be punished by deprivation, expulsion, and the greater excommunication.

But all the precautions of the bishops and the severity of persecuting laws were ineffectual to suppress the hated opinions. Fox narrates the examination of William Thorpe (1407) and the burning of John Badly (1409). The monks should return and amend from such heresies as were" known. This petition, however, did not secure the royal approval. The influence and support of the Church would doubtless have been lost to the king if he had yielded to the wishes of the Commons. Other measures which they proposed, designed to set limits to ecclesiastical usurpation, while they gave unequivocal assent to the unchanged spirit of the nation, met with little more success In 1413 Henry IV was succeeded by his son, Henry V. The change, however, did not open any brighter prospect to the persecuted Lollards. The beginning of this reign was signalized by a new triumph of the Church. The king surrendered his friend, Sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham, to the machinations of his persecutors. He was arrested, imprisoned, arraigned before the archbishop and his assessors, pronounced a heretic, and excommunicated. His offence was regarded as of the most aggravated character. He was not only himself heretically inclined, but he had employed his wealth and influence to support Lollard preachers, and transcribe and disseize heretical books. So powerful and bold was the organized conspiracy of the priesthood against him that the king did not venture to interfere in his case. The archbishop was charged by the chancellor to the sheriffs of cities and towns, were required, on entering office, to take an oath that they would use their whole power and diligence to destroy all heresies and errors, commonly called Lollardies, and assist the other magistrates and consuls as were required by them. It was moreover enacted that whoever were they that should read the Scriptures in the mother tongue (which was then called Wickliffe's learning) should forfeit land, cattle, body, life, and goods from their heirs forever, and so be condemned for heretics to God, enemies to the crown, and most acute traitors to the land. No sanctuary or privileged ground within the realm, though permitted to thieves and murderers, should shelter them. In case of relapse after pardon they should be hanged as traitors against the king, and then burned as heretics against God. The terror inspired by such executions and enactments drove many into exile. They fled, says Fox, "into Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, and into the wilds of Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, working there many marvels against their false kingdom too long to be enumerated," the most notable of whom were members of the sect who had most to apprehend, and who were the first to flee. Those who remained behind belonged very largely to the middle or the lower class. From time to time we meet with the name of some more eminent offender, and, from the precautions taken by their persecutors, we may form some idea of the continued energy as well as existence of the Lollards. Lechler, in the Zeitschrift für Hist. Theol. (1858, vol. iv.), has traced the evidences of their presence and influence in England down to the date of the Lutheran Reformation. The precious legacy of the Lollard faith was transmitted, along with MS. translations of the Scriptures and Lollard books, from generation to generation; and among the English martyrs, just before as well as after the commencement of the Reformation, there were several who might most appropriately be denominated Lollards. The prevalence of these views as late as the middle of the 16th century is attested by the elaborate effort which Reginald Peacock, successively bishop of St. Asaph and of Chichester, made to refute them. His earlier years had been spent in London, in the work of inquiring into the Lollard sect; his latter had become familiar with the work of the Lollards, and the arguments by which they were maintained. With great ingenuity, and with a commendable patience, he undertook their refutation, giving to this method the decided preference over chains, prison, and the stake. Convicted at length himself of holding heretical opinions, and removed from the episcopal office, he spent the last three years of his life in prison, and by some, although unwillingly, was regarded as a Lollard. On some points his views, indeed, approximated to those of the hated sect, but his writings derive their historical value from the exhibits of which they make of the doctrines maintained by the Lollards, or "Bible-men," as he sometimes calls them, and the evidence which they afford of their extensive acceptance. Here we see that for nearly two full generations the same doctrinal views which had been, or supposed to be, repressed by the immediate followers of Wickliffe were still retained by their successors, and during the two generations which followed they underwent no material change. Thus, when the English Reformation of the 16th century commenced, it derived a new impulse from the same source, i.e., the early English Lollards, and the Lollard party absorbed itself. Nor is it a mere fancy which has led writers like Lechler to assert an important and vital connection between the Lollardism of the 15th and the Puritanism of the 16th century. (E. H. G.)

The Scottish Lollards, who were not in any means confined to the southern portion of the British Islands. It penetrated also into Scotland, and in the real home of the Colclers (q. v.)—the land where a simple and primitive form of Christianity had been established, while among her southern neighbors Rome presented a vast and accumulated mass of superstition—threw nothing but well-known pumm received the countenance of those whose position and influence were well calculated to aid in its dissemination among a people that had freely imbued the spirit of religious reformation so prevalent among the inhabitants of the 14th century. After the death of King Richard II, at the time of the passage of the statute of præsumulis (A.D. 1389). More particularly rapid was the spread of the reformatory spirit in Scotland in the western districts, those of Kyle, Carrick, and Cunningham, and hence the surname for the Scotch Lollards, Lollards of Kyle, as they were frequently called. The clergy, aware of the danger that threatened their state of profanity and ease, at last, in the beginning of the 16th century, made open war upon these seditious antagonists. The first to suffer from the persecution which they inaugurated was a certain John Resby, an English priest who had fled northwards from persecution, and in the land of refuge also was fast making converts to his cause. The leading authority and influence in the land was at this time the see of St. Andrews (compare Dean Stanley's Lectures on the Eccles. History of Scotland, Maitland Society, 1846). The preacher, Robert, Duke of Albany, was known to be opposed to the Lollards; and though King James I was by no means blind to prevailing abuses in the Church, an act of Parliament was passed during his reign, in 1425, by which bishops were required to make inquisition in their dioceses for heretics, in order that they might undergo confinn punishment. This act was soon to be put in force. In 1433 another victim for the stake was secured in the person of Paul Craw or Crowar, a physician of Prague, who had sought refuge from persecution in Scotland. As he made no secret of his Lollard sentiments, he was arrested by order of Lord Lindsay, and the Lollard party was quite a long period. With the closing years of the century, however, to judge from the energy of the papists, it must have been apparent again in a more prominent manner, and from this period dates one of the severest of religious perse-Lombardus. See Longobardi.

Lombardy is the name given to that part of Northern Italy which formed the "nucleus" of the kingdom of the Longobardi (q. v.). Incorporated in 774 into the Carolingian possessions, it became an independent kingdom again in 848, though it was not entirely severed from the Frankish monarchy until 888. It now consisted of the whole of Italy north of the Peninsula, with the exception of Savoy and Venice. In 961 it was annexed to the German empire, and its territory there-after gradually lessened by the formation of several small but independent duchies and republics. Throughout the Middle Ages the Lombards were compelled to"league together with their neighbors to retain their independence from the German emperors. The assumptions of Frederick Barbarossa they successfully defeated in 1176, and so also those of Frederick II. But by internal dissensions they were gradually weakened; and in 1540 Spain finally took possession of Lombardy, and held it until about 1700, when it fell to Austria, and was designated "Austrian Lombardy." In 1796 it became part of the Cisalpine republic, but in 1815 it was restored to Austria, and annexed politically to the newly-augmented Austrian territory under the name of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. This union was dissolved in 1859 in the Italian War, Lombardy, with the exception of the Venetian territory (finally also given to Italy in 1866), falling to the new kingdom of Italy. The region called Lombardy, the country having been parcelled out into the provinces of Bergamo, Brescia, Como, Cremona, Milan, Pavia, and Sondrio. Its total area was 9086 English square miles, with a population in 1865, of 2,490,924 souls, mostly Roman Catholics. See ITALY.

Lombaro, Jacob, a noted Jewish writer and rabbi of Spanish descent, flourished in Venice, Italy, in the first half of the 17th century. He published in 1639 a beautiful edition of the Old Test. In Hebrew, with valuable comments, and a Spanish translation of the most difficult passages, entitled mão בשכם (a Handful of Quiet). He also wrote a polemic against Christianity. Loménie de Brienne, Étienne Charles de, a very celebrated French prelate, was born at Paris in which he attempted to conciliate the apparent contradictions, somewhat in the manner in which Grattan attempted it in his Discourses. He may be considered as the first author who collected their reasons, and formed a complete system, and, whatever the faults of his work, it is the foundation of scholastic theology, and shows much care and system. It became the text-book in the schools of philosophy, obtained for him the title of "Master of Sentences" (Magister Sententiarum), and placed him at the head of the scholastic divines. The work was first published at Venice (1477, fol.) in four parts, each divided into different headings. After his death, one of the propositions contained in it ("Christus, secundum quod est homo, non est aliquid") was condemned by pope Alexander III. Thomas Aquinas and others have written commentaries on the book. He also wrote Commentaire sur les Papes (Paris, 1641, fol.—Commentaire sur les Étapes de St. Paul (1687, fol.). His complete works were published at Nuremberg in 1478, and at Basle in 1486. An able editor was found in Alema, who published Petrus Lombardi's works at Louvain in 1546. The best edition of the Sentences is by Antoine Ghenart (Louvain, 1554). See Herzog, Real-Encyclopedia, s. v. 1727. He denounced his proroginature and the rigour of military glory for the easy honors of the Church, and became a great and powerful opponent of the Protentasts. Promoted in 1708 to the archbishopric of Toulouse, he aspired, it would seem, to the part of a Mazarin or a Richelieu in the state, without possessing either the ability or the unscrupulous daring necessary to it. Upon the death of Louis XV in 1774, he took particular pains to strike against the Protentasts, but it was not until 1787 that he gained prominence in state affairs. In this year, after figures in a commission for the reform of the clergy, and coquetting with the philosophy of D'Alembert and the encyclopedists, he became a member of the Assembly of Notables, and, having headed the party by whom the administration of Calonne was overthrown, he succeeded that unfortunate minister, adopted his plans, and proved himself just as incapable of executing them. An excited contest arose between the king and Parliament, and resulted in the dismissal of the latter by force of arms. In 1788 he was made prime minister, and was also promoted to the rich archbishopric of Sena. In 1791 he was offered a cardinal's hat, but, knowing the opposition of the people against the clergy, he declined this distinction. In July, 1792, the people were compelled by the dissatisfaction of the people to proceed to the Convocation of the state general for the month of May following; and on the 24th of August he retired to private life. He resided for a time at Nice, but the cardinal's hat which Pius VI bestowed on him several years before now graced the fountain of life. He was one of those who took the oath as a constitutional bishop, on account of which he was deprived of the cardinal's hat. He was nevertheless arrested February 15, 1794, and died of apoplexy the same night. Loimus, in Hindi mythology, is the first created being, formed by Brahmane when he commenced to exist. He immediately concluded to devote himself only to the contemplation of divine things and, in order to be undisturbed, buried himself in the ground. This pleased the gods so much that they loaded him with favors, increased and fixed his power and piety, and assured him a duration of life surpassing even that of Brahmane (q.v.). Loimus, being a long time bereft of hair, and covered with hair all over, draws out a hair after the lapse of each cycle Brahe has gone through, and dies only after the last hair is drawn. Lübn, Johann Michael, a German Protestant jurist and theologian, was born at Frankfurt-on-the-Main. He studied jurisprudence at Marburg, became soon known as an essayist on questions of morals, philosophy, and theology, which he treated with great ease and brilliancy, although occasionally inaccurate in his statements, and was finally appointed president of the Council of Lingen and Tüxleben. He died in 1776. He is especially known for his efforts to bring about a union of the different Christian churches, or, at least, of the evangelical denominations. He sought to unite them all into one, to carry out indifferentism towards denominations to the full extent in view. In this view, he wrote, under the name of Gottlob von Frieden, Evangelischer Friedenstempel nach d. Art d. ersten Kirche (1724):—Von Vereinigung d. Protestanten (1748):—Die einzige wahre Religion (1730). These works brought him into a long controversy with Hoffmann, Weichmann, Brenner, etc., and his attempts at establishing a union proved fruitless.—Hertzog, Rerum-knobilopoeia, viii, 452; Pierer, Universal-Lexicon, x. 463. Long, Roger, D.D., an English divine, noted as an astronomer, was born in Norfolkshire in 1690, and was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge University, and became M.A. in 1728. He was honored with the chair of astronomy by his alma mater in 1749, and shortly after secured the rectory of Bradwell. He died December 16, 1767. Since his Memoir (1729 sq.), he published and is best known as the author of A Treatise on Astronomy (2 vols. 4to; vol. i, 1742; vol. ii, 1764). Long, Thomas, an English Nonconformist, was born in Exeter, 1621. He was educated at Exeter College, and about 1660 became prebendary of Exeter cathedral, from which he was ejected in 1688 for refusing to take the oath to William and Mary. He died in 1700. Mr. Long published a Vindication of the Primitive Christians in Point of Obedience to their Prince (1683); Aメーカー to Locke's Letter on Toleration (1689); and Vox Cleri on Alterations in the Liturgy (1689): and a Review of Dr. Walker's Account of the Author of Eikon Basilissi. Long Brothers, The Four. Among the leading men of the Arthurian tales, the four "Long Brothers" cannot be overlooked: Diocres, Ammonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius, who were as distinguished by their influence as they were eminent in stature. The secret of their power was in their inflexible honesty, combined with hearty and unfinching faith in the system of their choice. See Eucharist.

Longevity. The Biblical narrative plainly ascribes to many individuals in the earlier history of the race lives far longer than what is held to be the present extreme limit, and we must therefore carefully consider the evidence upon which the general correctness of the numbers rests, and any independent evidence as to the length of life at this time. The statements in the Bible regarding longevity may be separated into two classes—those given in genealogical lists, and those interspersed with the relation of events.

1. To the former class visually belong all the statements relating to the longevity of the patriarchs before Abraham. These, as given by Moses in the Hebrew text, are as follows:

Indelibility has not failed, in various ages, to attack revealing on the score of the supposed absurdity of assigning to any class of men this lengthened term of existence. In reference to this, Josephus (Ant. i. 3, 3) remarks: "Let no one, upon comparing the lives of the ancients with our lives, and with the few years which we now live, think that what we say of them is false, or that the number of our lives at present is an argument that neither did they attain to so long a duration of life." When we consider the compensating process which is going on, the marvel is that the human frame should not last longer than it does. Some, however, have supposed that the years above named are lunar, consisting of about 7273 years; but the opinion, with a view to reduce the lives of the antelthiuvians to our standard, is replete with difficulties. At this rate, the whole time from the creation of man to the flood would not be more than about 140 years; and Methuselah himself would not have attained to the age which many even of the early inhabitants of the world must have had when mere infants! Moses must therefore have meant solar, not lunar years—averaging as long as ours, although the ancients generally reckoned twelve months, of thirty days each, to the year. "Nor is there," observes St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xvi, 12), "any care to be given unto those who think that one of the seven years of the life of man make up a year of these times, being so short; and therefore, say they, 900 years of theirs are 90 of ours—their 10 is our 1, and their 100 our 10. Thus think they that Adam was but 20 years old when he begat Seth, and he but 20 when he begat Enos, whom the Scriptures call (the Sept. ver.) 203 years. For, as these men hold, the Scripture divided one year into ten parts, calling each part a year; and each part had a sixfold quarter, because in six days God made the world. Now 6 times 6 is 36, which, multiplied by 10, makes 360—i.e. twelve lunar months. The first of this depth, or of this year, states that some, professing Christianity, had fallen into the same mistake, viz. that Moses meant lunars, and not solar years. Ecclesiastical history does not inform us of this fact, except it be to it that Lactantius refers (i, 12) when he speaks of one Varro: "The life of man, though temporary, was yet extended to 1000 years; of this Varro is so ignorant that, though known to all from the sacred writings, he would argue that the 1000 years of Moses were, according to the Egyptian mode of calculation, only 1000 months!"

This shows how the inscrutable purpose of Inscriti differs deeply we learn from Pliny (Hist. Nat. vii), and also from Scaliger (De Emend. Temporum, i); still this does not alter the case as stated above (see Heidegger, De Annio Patriarcha-, in his Hist. Patr. Amst. 1688, Zür. 1729).

But it is asked, if Moses meant solar years, how came it to pass that the patriarchs did not begin to beget children at an earlier period than they are reported to have done? Seth was 105 years old, on the lowest calculation, when he begat Enos, and Methuselah 187 when Lamech was born! St. Augustine (i, 15) explains this difficulty in a twofold manner by supposing, 1. Either that the age of Seth was later than the age of the lives of the antediluvians were longer than ours, or, 2. That Moses does not record the first-born sons but as the order of the genealogy required, his object being to trace the succession from Adam, through Seth, to Abraham.

While the Jews have never questioned the longevity assigned by Moses to the patriarchs, they have yet disputed, in many instances, as to whether it was common to all men who lived up to the period when human life was contracted. Maimonides (More Nebokhim, ii, 47) takes this view. With this opinion Abarbanel, on Gen. 17:1 and 3, says, "The season of four months so far at 600 years is about 240, and now it may be that this number might then have been far more densely populated than it is now. Supposing, moreover, that the earth was no more productive antecedently than it was subsequently to the flood, and that the antediluvian fathers were ignorant of any mechanical care which might have saved human labor now, we can easily understand how difficult they must have found it to secure for themselves the common necessary of life, and this the more so if animal food was not allowed them. The prolonged life, then, of the generations before the flood would seem to have been rather an evil than a blessing, leading as it did to the too rapid peopling of the earth. We can readily conceive how this might conduct to that awful state of things expressed in the words, "And the whole earth was filled with violence." In the absence of any well-regulated system of government, we can imagine what evil might result from the uncontrolled mobs of strong men who might oppress the weak, the crafty would outwit the unsuspecting, and, not having the fear of God before their eyes, destruction and misery would be in their ways. Still we must admire the providence of God in the long duration of life, and also in the most calamitous of all the calamities, the flood. After the creation, when the world was to be peopled by one man and one woman, the age of the greatest part of those on record was 900 and upwards. But after the flood, when there were three couples to repopulate the earth, none of the patriarchs except Shem reached the age of 500, and only the first three of hi-line, viz. Araphaxad, Salah, and Eber, came near that age, which was in the first century after the flood. In the latter part of the present age (the age of 240); and in the third century (about the latter end of which Abraham was born), none, except Terah, arrived at 200, by which time the world was so well people that they had built cities, and were formed into distinct nations under their respective kings (see Gen. xxi. see also Luther and Petavius on the increase of mankind in the first three centuries after the flood).

2. The statements as to the length of the lives of Abraham and his nearer descendants, and some of his later, are so closely interwoven with the historical narrar., and not always thoroughly to its general truth and its cannot be separated. Abraham's age at the birth of Isaac is a great fact in his history, equally attested in the Old Testament and in the New. Again, the longevity ascribed to Jacob is confirmed by the question of Pharaoh and the patriarch's remarkable answer, in which he makes his then age of 130 years less than the years of his ancestors (Gen. xlviii. 9), a minute point of agreement with the other chronological statements to be especially noted. At a later time, the age of Moses is attested by various statements in the Pentateuch, and in the New Testament, on St. Stephen's testimony, it is not to be observed that the mention of his having retained his strength to the end of his 120 years (Deut. xxxiv. 7) is, perhaps, indicative of an unusual longevity. In the earlier part of the period following we notice similar instances in the case of Joshua, and, in general, in that of Othniel. Nor does the Bible contain any instances to the contrary against this evidence, except it be the common explanation of Ps. xc (esp. ver. 10), combined with its ascription to Moses (see title).

That the common age of man has been the same in all times since the world was generally populated is manifest from profane as well as sacred history. Plato lived to the age of 81, and was accounted an old man; and those whom Pliny reckons up (vii. 48) as rare examples of long life may for the most part be equalled in modern times. It must be observed, however, that all the supposed famous modern instances of very great longevity, as those of Perr, Jackson, and the old countess of Desmond, have utterly broken down on examination, and that the registers of countries where records of such statistics have been kept prove no greater extremity than about 110 years. We may fortunately appeal to all the extant hieratic papyri in the Bibliotheque at Paris bearing a moral discourse by one Ptahot-hotep, apparently eldest son of Aas (B.C. cir. 1910-1860), the fifth king of the fifteenth dynasty, which was of shepherds. See Egypt, Viz. the Egyptians, Ptahot-hotep. He speaks of himself: "I have become an elder on the earth (or in the land); I have traversed a hundred and ten years of life by the gift of the king and the approval of the elders, fulfilling my duty towards the king in the place of favor (or blessing)" (Facsimile d'un Papyrus Egyptien, par L. Prisse d'Avennes, pl. xix, lines 7, 8). The natural inferences from this passage are, that Ptahot-hotep wrote in the full possession of his mental faculties at the age of 110 years, and that his father was still reigning at the time, and therefore had attained the age of about 130 years, or more. The reigns assigned by Manetho to the shepherd-kings of this dynasty do not seem indicative of a greater age than that of the Egyptian sovereigns (Cory, Ancient Fragments, 2d ed., p. 114, 1856).

See Chronology.

LONGINUS, DIONYSIUS CASSIUS, a noted Greek philosopher, of Phrygian descent, was born probably in Syria, and flourished in the 3d century of our era. He was educated at Alexandria under Ammonios and Origen, and became an earnest disciple of Platonism. To expound this system and to teach rhetoric, he opened a school at Alexandria, and soon acquired a great reputation. His knowledge was immense, and to him was first applied the phrase, often repeated since, "a living library" and "a walking museum." His taste and critical acuteness also were no less wonderful. He was probably the first who attempted in an age when Platonism was giving place to the semi-Oriental mysticism and dreams of Neo-Platonism, Longinus stands out conspicuously as a genuine disciple of the great master. Clear, calm, rational, yet lofty, he despised the fantastic speculations of Plotinus (q. v.). In the latter years of his life he accepted the invitation of Zenobia to undertake the education of her children at Palmyra; but, becoming also her prime political adviser, he was beheaded as a traitor, by command of the emperor Aurelian, A.D. 273. Longinus was a heathen, but generally referred his general and other extant (in part only) is a treatise, Περὶ Βιολογίαν (On the Sublime). There are many editions of it; those by Morus (Leips. 1679), Toupier (Oxford, 1778; 2d edition, 1789; 3d edit., 1806), Weishe (Leipzig, 1809), and Egger (Paris, 1872) being among the best. Translations have been made of it into French by Boileau, into German by Schlesner, and into English by W. Smith. See Ruheken, Dissertation de Vita et Scriptis Longini (1776); Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v.; Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.

LONGLEY, CHARLES THOMAS, D.D., the last private of all England, was born in Westmeathshire in 1794, and was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, where he distinguished himself as a first-class scholar in classics. After graduating, he remained for some time connected with the university as a college examiner, and was a professor of the Bible and perpetual rector of Cowley in 1823, and rector of West Tytherley in 1827, and head master of Harrow School in 1829. In 1836 he was appointed bishop of Ripon, and in 1856 was translated to Durham, in 1860 to the archbishopric of York, and in 1862 to that of Canterbury. Over this see, by virtue of which he was private of the Church of England, and first of all the Anglican bishops of the world, he presided until his death, October 27, 1868. "Archibishop Longley belonged ecclesiastically to the old school of 'moderate' Establishment divines, but in the last three years of his administration his amiable temper, co-operating with his instinctive hyper-conservatism, led him to temperize with the reckless and audacious policy of bishop Wilberforce and the High-Anglicans, and he became a most inadequate standard-bearer for the English Church in her supreme hour. Incapable of the indulgent pacifism of an Egyptian, he felt that the function of his primacy was marked by a series of disastrous vacillations and blunders. He first gave his countenance to the bishop of Capetown in his revolutionary action in South Africa, and then withdrew that countenance. In the great anti-episcopal movement to introduce his anti-episcopal resolutions, and then he shrewdly withdrew his approval when they came up for action." The most important event during his administration was the so-called "Pan-Anglican" Synod, a meeting of all the bishops of the Church of England, which was brought into being in the churches in communities with her, convened in 1867, a measure instigated, it is said, by bishop Wilberforce (q. v.), to stop the tide of ritualism, and to bring about, if possible, a union with the Greek Church (see Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1867, p. 42 sq.). In this synod the archbishop of Canterbury proved singularly untrustworthy. Himself inclined towards ritualism, he moderately rebuked the Ritualists in public, while privately he favored their promotion, and was instrumental in their appointment to colonial bishoprics. He was decided a High-Churchman, and, though his influence was great, his spirit was not notorious, he showed, in his dispassionate, how unfitted are mere moderation, and a desire simply for compromise and peace, to guide the Church in times when her foundations are assailed. We will only add that archbishop Longley died, and they who had lived, and sensible feeling, he fell a little too much into formula. He referred to words of Hooker's some three or four days before his death as containing the faith in which he ' wished to die'—words expressive of his sense of guilt. It was believed that he bled himself from that guilt. See London Spectator, 1858, Oct. 31, p. 1272; N. Y. Tribune, Oct. 29, 1868. (J. H. W.)

Longobardi (otherwise called Lombards), a Teutonic people of the Suevic race, who maintained a dominion in Italy from A.D. 566 to 774.

The Lombardic people were derived from the Latin Longobardi or Longobarders, a form in use since the 12th century, and generally supposed to have been given in reference to the long beards of this people; although some derive it rather from a word porta or barbe, which signifies battle or battle-axe.

The first historical notices present them as a people small in number, having their original seat on the west side of the Lower Elbe, in a territory extending some sixty miles southward from Hamburg. They advanced into Moravia and Hungary, the abode of the Rugi, before 560, and conquered the Heruli, and were invited by Justinian to the neighborhood of the Danube in the year 526. They afterwards crossed into Pannonia, where, though at first in alliance with the Goths, they subsequently (A.D. 566 or 567) subdued the people, yielding in turn to the Avars, and in 569 crossed the Danube in the reign of Justin I, and ravaged Thuringia, thither by Narses, as it is said, out of revenge against the province and the emperor. This was fourteen years after the overthrow of the Gothic kingdom, and the exhausted state of the country left Northern Italy an easy prey to the conquerors, and called on differences with both the Roman and Greek churches went far to prevent the acceptance of their rule, and the establishment at that time of a united government in Italy, for the want of which the country has so many centuries suffered. The Lombards succeeded no better in securing entire dominion. They, however, extended their power, establishing the duchies of Frioul, Spoleto, and Benevento, until only the districts of Rome and Naples, the southern extremity of the peninsula, Venice, and the east coast from the Po to Ancona, with Ravenna as the city of the exarchs, remained under the power of the Greek emperor. The conduct of the Lombards as conquerors has been severely characterized on the authority of early writers of the Romish Church. Gregory the Great, in his epistles and dialogues, draws a frightful picture of their oppressions, as does Paulus Diaconus in his Chronicle. The heinous cruelty of the five dukes, who were the only rulers in the interregnum after the death of Cleph, till, by the threatening approach of the Franks, they were compelled to elect a king in the person of Autharius. Now for the first time (584-600) an orderly constitution was established. Paulus Diaconus speaks with great praise of the new state of things. "Wonderful was the state of the Lombard kingdom: violence and treachery were alike unknown; no one was oppressed, no one plundered another; thefts and robberies were unheard of; the traveller went wherever he would in perfect security" (Paul. Diaec. iii. 16).

A general idea of their political constitution may be found in the edict of king Rothari (586-592), a kind of Bill of Rights, which was promulgated Nov. 22, 643, and is memorable as having become the foundation of constitutional law in the Germanic kingdoms of the Middle Ages. This law was revised and enlarged by subsequent Lombard kings, but subsisted in force for several centuries after the Lombard kingdom had passed away. The edict recognizes, as among all German nations, three classes—the free, the semi-free, and slave or serf. It proclaimed the equality of the sexes, and secured the national unity, civil officers being regarded as rendering military service. The king was elective, and among the dukes he represented the nation. He was commander of the army, head of all police power, chief judge, and general war. There were countiers of various ranks, who spoke with great power and dignity. Under these were many local, judicial, police, and military authorities. The cities chosen by the dukes severally as their residences were centres of government. There would seem to be but little room for the old Roman municipal constitutions. Concerning the relation of the Lombard rule to the continuance of the Roman law and the rights of the conquered people there are differences of opinion. Under the Goths the former laws and customs remained largely unaltered; but it has been maintained (as by Leo) that under the Lombards the personal liberty, right of property, and municipal constitutions of the conquered people were abolished. The subject was much discussed by the Italians in the last century; and in this century the historians Savigny, Leo, Bandi di Vesme, Fossati, Treves, Bemmann-Holzner, etc., have professed conflicting or somewhat varied views. The Lombard laws themselves give but little precise information on this point. The Romans at least lost all united nationality. Roman law seems to have been first distinctively brought into use under Luitprand. The feeling of enmity which, for a long time at least, existed between the people and their conquerors, was increased by religious differences, and on this account the new power was specially obnoxious to the authorities of the Roman Church. A state of war generally prevailed between the two powers. The Church appeals are under these circumstances the most plaintive complaints of Lombard impiety and oppressions—at least during the earlier period of their dominion—in the wasting of churches and monasteries, and the treatment of ecclesiastics. The Lombard clergy themselves, however, never did seem to be the objects of especial vengeance in these deeds. Gregory the Great discerns in the times signs of the approaching judgment. "What is happening in other parts of the world," he says, "we know not; but in this the end of all things not merely announces itself as approaching, but shows itself as actually begun" (Diotl. iii.). Such representations of the spirit and course of the conquerors must be taken with considerable qualification. Still more untrustworthy are the accounts given, especially by Gregory, of numerous miraculous interferences in behalf of the true faith.

The Lombards were Ariani. Unlike the Franks, who became by religious sympathy the natural defenders of the pope, they, with the Goths, Vandals, Burgundians, and Suevians, had been converted to Christiopathy, about the end of the 5th century, by Arián missionaries. Such was the case with the German tribes generally. The power of the Lombard kingdom over them many, some of whom entered Italy, who were still heathens, and worshipped their gods Odin and Freia south of the Alps. There were probably also some Catholic Pannonians and Noricans who, with their bishops, had joined the heresy. Theodolinda of Bavaria also exerted a like influence upon her husband and their children, and under his reign the Catholic faith made considerable progress. On the death of Autharius (590), Theodolinda married Agilulf, and under his government also she continued to labor for the advancement of the Catholic Church, hoping somewhat to refine the manners of her own people. Theodolinda persuaded Agilulf to restore a portion of their property and dignities to the Catholic clergy, and to have his own son baptized according to the Catholic rites—an example which was followed by multitudes. Her brother Gunwald, duke of Asti, she influenced to build the magnificent basilica of Saint John at Asti, near Milan, in which in subsequent times was kept the Lombard crown, called the Iron Crown; indeed, she improved any and every opportunity to advance the interests of the Catholics, and thus hastened the successful establishment of their religion among the Lombards. Gregory the Great (690-694), founder of the papacy, maintained frequent correspondence with the queen in a friendly relation, similar to that existing between Gregory VII and the countess Matilda. On the occasion of the baptism of her children she received a present from Gregory. Earlier he had sent her four Books of Dialogues, "because he knew that she was true to the faith in Christ, and strong in good works" (Paul. Disc. iv, 5).

If the Roman Church had met with material losses by the Lombard invasion, it now gained much for the power of the papacy in the more complete dependence with which all parts of Italy began to look to Rome for a common defence of their faith. Rome became a certain centre of national life; through the dukes of the nobility, power was now in the hands of the bishops, and what the Roman Empire had lost by arms the Roman Church was to regain by peaceful means. After Gregory's death Agileulf received the monk Columban with great favor, and allowed him to settle where he would. At Milan he wrote against Ariusism. He founded the powerful monastery of Bobbio, which was subsequently very influential in the conversion of the Lombards. Grundeberg, daughter of Theodorlinda, married successively the kings Ariowald and Rothariis. Under the latter there was a Catholic and Arius bishop in Aosta (658-661), the successor of Duke Gunduald, was the first Catholic king. Dullinger says of him, "Rex Horibertus, pius et catholicus, Arrianorum abolevit heresem et Christianam fidelem fecit crescere." The Lombards became now enthusiastic churchmen; many monasteries and churches were founded and richly endowed. There was always, however, a certain degree of independence manifest among them. At the Lateran Council of 649, summoned by Martin I, Milan and Aquileia were not represented. A certain patriarchal and metropolitan prerogative was allowed the popes, with the reservation of the right of residence in Rome. In the latter half of the 7th century internal contests for the Lombard crown secured a greater degree of attachment to the Church, while the disputes of Rome with Constantinople brought the Lombards to the defence of the former. In the 8th century the powerful king Lothair (713-85), who raised the Lombard kingdom to its highest prosperity, sought anxiously to complete the conquest of all Italy, and before 800 it may be said that the national unity of Italy was complete. Each subject was called a Lombard. See LUIZPALD. The Church was subject to the state. Though its clergy and bishops obtained increasing power, it was not of a political character as in France. The bishops were subject to the king, and the inferior clergy to the subordinate judges. The bishops were chosen by the people. The clerics were subject to magisterial power. But the prospect looked bright for the people and the church when they subjected to the rule of the barbaric Lombards, they now entered upon that Machiavelian policy which they long incessantly pursued, of laboring to prevent a union of all Italy under one government, in order to secure for themselves a greater power in the midst of contending parties. This, with the disputes which arose concerning the succession to the Lombard throne, led to the downfall of the Lombard kingdom within no long time after it had reached its utmost greatness. Gregory III, in his distress, fixed his gaze on the youthful greatness of a transalpine nation, the Franks, to afford him the necessary assistance in the struggle now ensuing. The movement against the Lombards was initiated at the election of Zachary, by discarding the customary form of obtaining the consent of the exarchate's authority, at this time vested in the Lombard king; and Stephen II of Pepin, after he had been taken from the patriciate, i.e. the governorship of Rome, to make war upon Aistulf, the successor of Liutprand. Naturally enough, Pepin's military successes were all turned to the advantage of the pope in securing to him the exarchate of Aquitaine. New causes of hostility between the Frank and Lombard monarchs arose when Charlemagne sent back to her father his wife, the daughter of the Lombard king Desiderius (754-774). In the autumn of 778 Charlemagne invaded Italy, and in May of the following year Pavia was conquered, and the Lombard kingdom was overthrown. In 808 a treaty between Charlemagne, the western, and Nicephorus, the eastern emperor, confirmed the right of the former to the Lombard territory, with Rome, the Exarchate, Ravenna, Istria, and part of Dalmatia, while the remaining islands of Venice and the maritime towns of Dalmatia, with Naples, Sicily, and part of Calabria.

Longobardi, Nicholas, a Jesuit missionary, was born in Switzerland in 1655. He went to China as missionary in 1656, and died in 1655 at Pekin. He wrote De Conciofio jurequ Domino Tractusatis. See Leibritz's notes to a recent edition. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Longere, Louis de Four, abbé de, an eminent, learned French ecclesiastic, born at Charleville Jan. 6, 1632, and son of a Norman nobleman. When but four years old he was generally known as a learned prodigy. At fourteen he understood several Oriental languages, and undertook to get a complete knowledge of the holy Scriptures by making diligent study of the fathers and of the Jewish and Christian commentators. The Sorbonne, which he sometimes visited, only gave him a distaste for scholastic theology; he preferred to reconstruct positive theology from the original, after the manner of P. Petrus, where he found more exactness and stability. In 1674 he was provided with the abbotship of St. Jean-du-Jard, near Meli, and in 1684 with that of Sept-Fontaines, in the diocese of Rheims. After receiving orders he entered the Seminary of St. Maguire, and shut himself up there in complete solitude for fifteen years. When he re-entered the world he opened his house to learned men, and kept up with them a regular correspondence, and manifested a great eagerness to instruct those who consulted him. Longere consecrated his whole life to labor; he knew no other rest except that of change of occupation. No part of the domain of learning was strange to him, but he much preferred history. His constitution and memory were excellent; his conversation he was lively, critical, historical, humorous, and cynical. He took no part in religious controversy. He died in 1782. Among his works of interest to us are Tractat d'un auteur de la connection Romaine touchant la transsubstantiation, où il se fait voir que les principes de non Ephes ce dogme ne peut être un article de foi (London, 1686); — Discours touchant les Antiquités des Chaldèes et des Egyptiènes (in the Lettres choisies of Richard Simon) — Dissertation sur le passage de Flavius Joseph de Jour de Jésus-Christ (in the Bibl. ancienne et moderne de Le Cerf, vols. 297-100); Discours sur la vie du cardinal Weisstein contraires à ceux qui ont écrit contre sa réputation (in the Memoire de Littératur, of P. Desmotel). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Thomas, Dict. de Biog. et Mythol. s. v.; General Biographical Dictionary, s. v.

Longueval, Jacques, a learned French Jesuit, was born in the suburbs of Pernone March 11, 1618. The age of nineteen he entered the Society of Jesus, and afterwards taught rhetoric and theology in different colleges of his order. On account of a violent work published upon the religious quarrels of the period, he was first exiled, but later received permission to reside at the house of the provincial Jesuits in Lille, where he died January 11, 1785. Among his published works are Traité du Schisme (Brussels, 1718) [a Refutation of this work was published in the same year by Megange]. — Dissertation

Lonsdale, John, D.D., a distinguished English prelate, was born at Newmillerdeg, near Wakefield, Jan. 17, 1788, and was the son of the Rev. John Lonsdale, vicar of Darfield and incumbent of Chapeltorp. Young Lonsdale entered Eton College at the age of 11, and completed his studies finally at King's College, Cambridge, where he got nearly all the prizes, and took the B.A. in 1811. He then studied law for a time, but changing for theology, he was ordained priest in 1815. Shortly after he was made examining chaplain to archbishop Sutton and paid assistant at the same place.

In 1821 he was appointed to the office of Christian advocate to Cambridge University, and in the following year domestic chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury. From 1831 to 1843 he was prebendary of St. Paul's; from 1839 to 1843, principal of King's College, London. In 1844 he was made master of Southwell Minster; he was also archdeacon of Middlesex during 1842 and 1843, and was for some time chaplain at Lincoln's Inn. In 1844, finally, he was appointed, by Sir Robert Peel, bishop of Lichfield. He died at Erdeshall Castle, Staffordshire, Oct. 19, 1867. Bishop Lonsdale was greatly celebrated in the English pulpit; while yet in the infancy of his ministry, two courses of his university sermons, as well as several occasional discourses, were asked for and received by the public (London, 1820, 1821). In 1849 he published, with archbishop Hale, a volume of Annotations on the Gospel (see Hale). He is spoken of as "a man of remarkable humility, averse to controversy, and never willing to enter into a public discussion of great questions in theology, from the belief that others were better qualified than he to handle them; but, withal, he was unflinching in his adherence to what he believed to be right." He was greatly beloved, not only by his own Church, but by the Diocesans also. See Appleton's A. M. Cyclop. 1867, p. 451; A. M. Ch. Rec. 1868, p. 675.

LOOP (only in the plural τιάπλοα, tialath, windsings; Sept. ἄξετα, Vulg. ansula), an attachment or knotted "eye," probably of cord, corresponding to the knobs or "taches" (ταχῆς) in the edges of the curtains of the tabernacle for joining them into a continuous circle, fifty to a curtain, and formed of blue material (Exod. xxv, 4, 5, 10, 11; xxxvi, 11, 12, 17). See TABERNACLE.

Loos (Collinias), Cornelius, a German Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Gonda, Holland, in 1546, and was educated at Louvain. He entered the priesthood, and was made doctor of theology at Mentz, where, in a sojourn of several years, he composed most of his works. He afterwards became archbishop of Trever; but, on account of his opinions upon magic, published in a book styled De vera et falsa magia (1592), he was forced to remove from his diocese, though he retracted his heretical views. He went to Brussels, and there exercised the humble functions of vicar of the parish. He was soon accused of falling back into his old opinions, was arrested and imprisoned. He was about to be accused a third time, when he died at Brussels, Feb. 8, 1593. Loos was very zealous against Protestants. Among his works the following are of theological and general interest: Defensio adversus Chr. Franciscus; and several sentences are still quoted against inquisitors (Mayence, 1581) — Thesaurus aenam sanctarum precationum (ibidem, 1581) — *Illustrissimum Germ exhibits a plural termination without the affix is that of Gesenius (Thesaur. a. v. 177.), and seems just, though rather disapproved by professor Lee (Lex. in 7777.) The latter adds that "our English Bibles generally translate אָדָם by LORD, in capitals; when preceded by יִתְנֶה, they translate it God: when יִתְנֶה, flesh, follows, however, by LORD, as in Isa. iii, 1, The Lord, the Lord of Hosts: The context alone, then, is not a sufficient reason for this respect" (Kitto). "In some instances it is difficult, on account of the passum accent, to say whether אָדָם is the title of the Deity, or merely one of respect addressed to men. These have been noticed by the Maso- rites, who distinguish the former in their notes as 'holy'; and the latter as 'profane'." (See Gen. xviii, 3; xix, 2, 18; and compare the Masoretic notes on Gen. xx, 18; Isa. ix, 4)." See Adonal.

3. Κυρίος, the general Greek term for supreme mastery, whether royal or private; and thus, in classical Greek, distinguished from βασιλεύς, which is exclusively applied to God. The "Greek Κυρίος, indeed, is used in much the same way and in the same sense as Lord. It is from κυρίος, authority, and signifies 'master' or 'possessor'. In the Septuagint, this, like Lord in our version, is invariably used for 'Jehovah' and 'Adonai'; while the Greek βασιλεύς, or King, or God in our translation, is generally reserved to represent the Hebrew 'Elohim'. Κυρίος in the original of the Greek Testament, and Lord in our version of it, are used in much the same manner as in the Septuagint; and so, also, is the corresponding title, Domes, in the Latin versions. As the Hebrew name Jehovah is one never used without reference, in any but the Almighty, it is to be regretted that the Septuagint, imitated by our own and other versions, has represented it by a word which is also used for the Hebrew 'Adonai', which is applied not only to God, but, like our Lord, to every other person of rank and dignity, in the translation of the New Testament, and to the Hebrew Master, in our versions. The title, however, has never been used with the same propriety, as it is apt to be applied to persons of no distinction, or to men of rank and dignity.

4. דֶּרֶךְ, דֶּרֶךְ, master in the sense of domination, applied to only heathen deities, or else to human relations, as husband, etc., and especially to a person skilled or chief in a trade or profession (like the vulgar boss). To this corresponds the Greek διακονεῖ, whence our Deacon.

The only real and important words in the original, thus rendered in the common Bible (usually without a capital initial, are: יִתְנֶה, gehir., prop. denoting physical strength or martial prowess; יִתְנֶה, sar, a title of nobility; יִתְנֶה, sheihah, a military officer (see Cap¬tains); and יִתְנֶה, se’ren, a Philistine term; also the Child. יִתְנֶה, maris, an official title (hence the Syriac mar, or bishop); and יִתְנֶה, rab, a general name = prefect, with its reduplicate יִתְנֶה, rabrens, and its Greek equivalent ἱππότιμος, "Rabboni." Lordly occurs in the A. V. only in the expression יִתְנֶה דֶּרֶךְ, se’phel additum, in the title, nobles, I. e. a large vessel fit to be used for persons of quality (Judg. v, 25). See Disit.

Lord, Benjamin, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in 1800 at Saybrook, Conn., graduated at Yale College in 1821; was then tutor in 1819, was licensed to preach pastor Nov. 20, 1717, in Norwich, and there preached until his death, March 31, 1844. He was made a member of Yale College corporation in 1740, and remained such till 1773. Dr. Lord published True Christianity explained and defended, wherein are some Observations respecting Conversion (1737) :— Two Sermons on the Necessity of Regeneration (1738) :—Believers in Christ only the true Children of God, and born of him alone, a sermon (1747) :—God glorified in the Works of Providence and Grace: a remarkable Instance of it in the various and signal Deliverances that evidently appear to be wrought for Mercy Wheeler, lately restored from extreme Impotence and Confusion (1748); and several occasional sermons.—Sprague, Ainslie, 2, 297.

Lord, Daniel Minor, a Presbyterian minister, was born April 9, 1800, at Lyme, Conn., and was educated at Amherst College and at the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., and in April, 1834, was licensed to preach by the Second Presbytery of Long Island, and subsequently ordained at Southampton. In 1835 the Presbyterian dismissed him to the Suffolk South Association. Soon after he became pastor of the Boston Mariners' Church. In August, 1836, he became the first pastor of the Shelter Island Church, where he remained until his death, Aug. 26, 1861. Mr. Lord published The History of Pitcairn's Island; also Various Articles on The Moral Claims of Savages stated and enforced, and for several years was editor and almost sole writer and publisher of a review, in which he ably, logically, and clearly discussed numerous theological questions. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 805. (J. L. S.)

Lord, Eleazer, an American theological writer, was born in 1738. With an excellent preparatory education, improved by close study to such a degree that in 1821 Dartmouth College, and in 1827 Williams, conferred on him the honorary degree of A.M., he devoted a portion of his time during an active business life as a merchant, president of an insurance company, and for some years of the Erie Railway Company, to the study of theological science. In 1866 he received from the University of Pennsylvania, the degree of D.D. Blind¬ness saddened his latter years, but his treasured learning comforted him. He died at Piermont, N. Y., June 8, 1871.

Lord, Isaiiah, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Pharsalia, Chenango County, N. Y., July 16, 1844, was converted at the age of sixteen, and, joining the Methodist Episcopal Church in May, 1860, was licensed to preach. In 1854, while employed as a teacher, his gentle bearing and godly admonitions led many to the cross and salvation. In 1855 he joined the Oneida Conference, and labored in the following places with accept¬ ability and success: Summit Hill, Hartford, Brooklyn, Smyrna, Union Valley, Amber, Freeville, East Homer, and Georgetown, where he died Aug. 21, 1870. "He was a man of stern integrity and sterling worth, fully com¬ mitted to all the great moral enterprises of the day. . . . His mission was lovingly and fearlessly executed. His piety was profound and real, and his death was but the begin¬ ning of everlasting life."—Conf. Minutes, 1871.

Lord, James Cooper, a philanthropic New York merchant and iron manufacturer of our day, deserves a place here for his great efforts to advance the interests of his fellow-men. He founded in 1860 "The First Ward Industrial School," a latter, a free public library, and erected two churches for the benefit of his workingmen and their neighbors. He died Feb. 9, 1869.

Lord, Jeremiah S., D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister of note, was born at Brooklyn, N. Y., about 1817, and was educated at Union College, class of 1866.

He entered the ministry in 1848 at Montville, N. J., where he labored until 1847, when he assumed the charge of the Reformed Church of Griggstown, N. Jersey. In the year following, however, he accepted a call from the First Reformed Church in Flemington, N. J., where he labored until his death, April 2, 1889. "Few ministers of our denomination," says the Intelligencer (April 8, 1889), "were more highly esteemed by their brethren, or enjoyed in a higher measure the confidence and affection of their people, than did this most excellent brother. The love he bore in his works, and gave him many souls as seals to his ministry. . . . His preaching was characterized by great earnestness and solemnity. The love of Christ in the gift of himself was the central theme of his discourses. His style was clear, compact, and persuasive. His was indeed a most useful life, and his example of faithfulness, earnest zeal, and self-sacrificing devotion to the duties of his high and holy calling is a rich legacy to all his surviving brethren in the ministry."

LORD, John King, a Congregational minister, was born March 22, 1819, at Amherst, N. H. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1843, entered the ministry in 1841, and was ordained pastor in Hartland, Vt., November, 1841, where he remained three years. October 21, 1848, he was installed pastor in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he died, July 13, 1849. A volume of his sermons was published in 1850.—Sprague, Am., ii, 781.

LORD, Nathan, D.D., LL.D., an eminent American divine and educator, was born at South Berwick, Me., Nov. 28, 1792; was educated at Bowdoin College (class of 1810), and studied theology at Andover Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1816. After quitting the college he acted as assistant in Phillips Exeter Academy. Now a theologian, he at once entered the active work of the ministry as pastor of the Congregationalists at Amherst, N. H., the only church he ever served. He remained with his people until 1829, when he was called to the responsible position of president of Dartmouth College, where he remained until his death, Sept. 9, 1870. Possessed of the highest attainments of scholarship, great executive ability, a winning address, an equanimity of temper, remarkable "firmness of character and devotion to principle, and unwearied application to labor, Dr. Lord made Dartmouth College one of the most popular of our higher educational institutions: 1824 students were graduated from its halls during his presidency. As a theologian he was, like Edwards and Bel- lamy, of the school advocating a strictly literal interpretation of prophecy, but he has left us few remains in print. He occasionally contributed to our theological quarterlies, and published several sermons and essays.

The following review notice: Letters, David Dana, D.D., on Prof. Park's Theology of New England (New Eng., 1852); On the Millennium (1854); and Letters to Ministers of the Gospel of all Denominations on Slavery (1854–5), in which he defended the institution of slavery as sanctioned by the Bible, thereby greatly provoking opposition and criticism from Northern divines. See Drake, Dict., Amer. Biog., s. v.; New Amer. Cyclop. s. v.; also the Annual for 1870.

LORD, Nathan Le., a Baptist missionary and physician, was born in Norwich, Conn., in December, 1821, was educated at the Western Reserve College (class of 1847), and, after completing a theological course, was employed for a time as agent and financial secretary of the college. Having decided to devote himself to the missionary work, he was ordained in October, 1852, and sailed with his wife for Ceylon. After six years of faithful labor, the failure of his health compelled him to return to this country, where he remained nearly four years, during a portion of which time he performed with great acceptence the duties of a district secretary of the Board of Missions in the southern districts of the West. He also attended several courses of medical lectures, receiving the degree of M.D. at Cleveland, Ohio. In 1868 he sailed with his wife and children for the Madura Mission of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, but the climate of India proving unfavorable to his health, he returned in June, 1867. He died Jan. 24, 1868.

Lord's Day. The expression so rendered in the Authorized English Version (in τῷ Κυρίῳ ὕμπαρ occurs only once in the New Testament, viz. in Rev. i, 10, and is there unaccompanied by any other words tending to explain its meaning. It is, however, well known that the same phrase was, in after ages of the Christian Church, used to signify the first day of the week, on which the resurrection of Christ was commemorated. Hence it has been inferred that the same name was given to that day during the time of the apostles, and was in the present instance used by St. John in this sense, as referring to an institution well known, and therefore requiring no explanation. This interpretation, however, has of late been somewhat questioned. It will be proper here, therefore, to discuss this point, as well as the early notices of this Christian observance, leaving the general subject to be treated under SABBATH. The broader topic of the hebdomadal division of time will be discussed under the head of WOR.
LORD'S DAY

tors of this view seem to have put out of sight the following considerations. In the preceding sentence St.
John had mentioned the place in which he was writing — Ephesus—where the day of the Lord, which he had tal-er. It is but natural that he should further particularize the circumstances under which his mysterious work was composed, by stating the exact day on which the revelations were communicated to him, and the employment, spiritual musings, in which he was then engaged.
To suppose a mixture of the metaphorical and the theeral would be strangely out of keeping. Though it be conceded that the day of judgment is in the New Test. spoken of as η τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμίκην, the employment of the adjectival form constitutes a remarkable difference, which speaks of a continuous and maintained effort of (Comp. 1 Cor. i, 8, 14; v. 5: 1 Thess. v, 2; 2 Thess. ii, 1; Luke xvii, 24; 2 Pet. iii, 10). There is also a critical objection to this interpretation, for ἀνεσκέιν ἐν ἡμίκῃ is not δίδῳ οὐγερ (Comp. Rev. iv, 2). This third theory, then, which is sanctioned by the name of Augusti, must be abandoned.

4. As a less definite modification of this last view we may mention, finally, that others have regarded the phrase in question as meaning simply “the day of the Lord,” the substantive being merely exchanged for the article, as in 20: 13; 1 Cor. xvi, 7; “the Lord’s Supper,” which would make it merely synonymous with the generally expected temporal appearance of Christ on earth: η ἡμίκη τοῦ Κυρίου, “the day of the Lord” (1 Thess. v, 2). Such a use of the adjective became extremely common in the following ages, as we have repeatedly in the fathers the corresponding expressions Dominica crucis, “the Lord’s cross”; Domin-icae nativitatis, “the Lord’s nativity” (Tertullian, De Idol.
p. 5); κυριακῶν κυριακῶν (Eusebius, Histor. Eccles. iii, 9).
According to their view, the passage would mean, “In the spirit I was present at the day of the Lord,” the word “day” being used for any event marked forth (possibly in allusion to Joel ii, 81), as in John viii, 56: “Abraham rejoiced to see my day.” The peculiar use of the word ἡμίκη as referring to a period of ascendency, appears remarkably in 1 Cor. iv, 8, where de σποριῳ ἡμίκης ἡμίκης is rendered “man’s judgment.” Nevertheless, this interpretation, besides the objection of its vagueness as a date, is clogged with all the difficulties that attach to the preceding one.

All other conjectures upon this point may be permitted without comment, but themselves, but the following cause is too

In Scripture the day of the week is called η μαυ σάββατου, in post-scriptural writers it is called η Κυριακῆ ἡμίκης as well; therefore the book of Revelation is not to be ascribed to an apostle, or, in other words, is not part of Scripture. The logical effort and the effort of its holiness.
It says, in effect, because post-scriptural writers have these two designations for the first day of the week, therefore scriptural writers must be confined to one of them. It were surely more reasonable to suppose that the adoption by post-scriptural writers of a phrase so pre-eminently Christian as η Κυριακῆ ἡμίκης to denote the first day of the week, and a day so especially marked, can be traceable to nothing else than an apostle’s use of that phrase in the same meaning.

11. Early Notices of this Christian Observance.—Supposing, then, that η Κυριακῆ ἡμίκης of St. John is the Lord’s day, as now applied to the first day of the modern week, we have to inquire here, what do St. John gather from holy Scripture concerning that institution? How is it spoken of by early writers up to the time of Constantine? What change, if any, was brought upon it by the celebrated edict of that emperor, which has already declared to have been its originator?

1. Scripture says very little concerning it, but that little seems to indicate that the divinely-inspired apoestes, by their practice and by their precepts, marked the first day of the week as a day for meeting together to break bread, for communicating and receiving instruction, for laying up offerings in store for charitable purposes, for occupation in holy thought and prayer. The first day of the week so devoted seems also to have been sanctified by the example of the apostles of the day, which would have been especially likely to be chosen for such purposes by those who “prayed Jesus and the resurrection.”
The Lord rose on the first day of the week (τὴν μαυ σάββατου), and appeared, on the very day of his rising, to his followers on five distinct occasions—to Mary Mag-dalenae, to the other women, to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus, to St. Peter separately, to ten apostles collected together. After eight days (μοῦ ἡμίκη ἐκεῖνον), that is, according to the ordinary reckoning, on the first day of the next week, he appeared to the eleven (John xx, 26), and the two disciples (20: 19). Something like something like a settled form, St. Luke records the following circumstances: St. Paul and his companions arived there, and “abode seven days, and upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them.” From the statement that “Paul continued his speech till midnight,” it has been inferred by some that the assembly commenced after sunset on the Sabbath, at which hour the first day of the week had commenced, according to the Jewish reckoning (John’s ἤκοι Αρκαλ., § 390), which would hardly agree with the idea of a commemoration of the resurrection of the Lord on the first day of the week. But it is to be observed that none of the writers of the New Testament have supposed to have a reference to the tenets of the Jewish converts, who considered it unlawful to touch money on the Sabbath (Vitringa, De Synagog., transl. by Bernard, p. 75-167). In consideration for them, therefore, the apostle directs the collection to be made on the following day, on which secular business was lawful; or, as Coccineus observes, they regarded the day “non ut festum, sed ut irpaouiov” (not as a feast, but as a working day; Vitringa, p. 77). Again, the phrase μαυ τῶν σαββάτων is generally understood to be, according to the Jewish mode of naming the days of the week, the common expression for the first day. Yet it has been differently construed by some, who render it “upon one of the days of the week” (Tractes for the Times, ii, 1, 16).
In Heb. x, 25, the correspondents of the writer are desired “not to forsake the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is, but in every place, one other,” an injunction which seems to imply that a regular day for such assembling existed, and was well known; for otherwise no rebuke would lie. Lastly, in the passage given above, St. John describes himself as being in the Spirit on the Lord’s day.

Taken separately, perhaps, and even all together, these passages seem scarcely adequate to prove that the dedication of the first day of the week to the purposes above mentioned was a matter of apostolic institution, or even of apostolic practice. But, it may be observed, that it is, at any rate, an extraordinary coincidence, that almost as soon as we emerge from Scripture we find the same day mentioned in a similar manner, and directly associated with the Lord's resurrection; and it is an extraordinary fact that we never find its dedication questioned, or at least forsworn as apostolic by any apostle or shepherd of the church, with the Papacy, baptism, with ordination, or at least spoken of in the same way. As to direct support from holy Scripture, it is noticeable that those other ordinances which are usually considered scriptural, and in support of which Scripture is usually cited, are dependent, so far as more quotation is concerned, upon fewer texts than the Lord's day is. Stating the case at the very lowest, the Lord's day has at least "probable institutions in Scripture" (Bp. Sanderson), and so is superior to any other holy day, whether of hebrew or greek origin, in memory of the crucifixion, or of annual celebration, as Easter day in memory of the resurrection itself. These other days may be, and are, defensible on other grounds, but they do not possess anything like a scriptural authority for their observance. If we are inclined still to press for mention of the Lord's day, opposed to other days, as the institution of the church, for such we suppose it to be, in the writings of the apostles, we must recollect how little is said of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and how vast a difference is naturally to be expected to exist between a sketch of the manners and habits of their age, which the authors of the holy Scriptures did not write, and the hints as to life and conduct, and regulation of known practices, which they did write.

On quitting the canonical writings we turn naturally to Clement of Rome. He does not, however, differentiate "the Lord's day" but in 1 Cor. 1:26 he says, "νῦν ταύτα τοῖς υἱοῖς τῆς ἐλευθερίας, and he speaks of συμφέρουσας καραίαι καὶ ὑπάρχουσαι, at which the Christian προσωποί and λεγέντες should be made.

Ignatius, the disciple of St. John (ad. Magn. c. 9), contrasts Judaism and Christianity, and, as an exemplification of the contrast, opposes a special day in memory according to the Lord's life (κατὰ τὴν Κυριακὴν τῇ Ζωῇ τοῦ Κυρίου).

The epistle ascribed to St. Barnabas, which, though certainly not written by that apostle, was in existence in the first century (c. 19), contains the following words: "We celebrate the eighth day with joy, on which, too, Jesus rose from the dead." A pagan document now comes into view. It is the well-known letter of Pliny to Trajan, written (about A.D. 100) while he presided over Pontus and Bithynia. "The Christians (says he) affirm the whole of their guilt or error to be that they were accustomed to meet together on a stated day (stato die), before it was light, and to sing hymns to Christ as a god, and to bind themselves by a sacramentum, not for any wicked purpose, but never to commit fraud, theft, or adultery; never to break their word, or to refuse, when called upon to deliver up any trust; after which it was their custom to separate, and to assemble again to take a meal, but a general one, and without guilty purpose" (Epist. x. 97).

A thoroughly Christian authority, Justin Martyr, who flourished A.D. 140, stands next on the list. He writes thus: "On the day called Sunday (τής Σαββάτου λατρευόμενη αὔριον) is an assembly of all who live either in the cities or in the rural districts, and the memorials of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read. Then he goes on to relate the celebration of the religious duties which are entered upon at this assembly. They consist of prayer, of the celebration of the holy Eucharist, and of collection of alms. He afterwards assigns the reasons which Christians had for meeting on Sunday. These are, "because it is the First Day, on which God dispelled the darkness (τοῖς ἐκώροις) and the original state of things (τὴν ἔλαφον), and formed the world, and because Jesus Christ our Saviour rose from the dead upon it" (Apod. i. 67). In another work ( Dial. c. Tryph. ) he makes circumcision furnish a type of Sunday. "The circumcision of a Jew was done on the eighth day was a type of the true circumcision by which we are circumcised from error and wickedness through our Lord Jesus Christ, who rose from the dead on the first day of the week (τῷ μὲν σαββάτῳ); therefore it remains as chief and chief of days." As for σαββάτον, he uses that with exclusive reference to the Jewish law. He carefully distinguishes Saturday (ἡ κυριακή), the day after which our Lord was crucified, from Sunday (ἡ μὲν σαββάτῳ ἐξείλθε ἐκ τοῦ Ἰσραήλ ἡμᾶς), upon which he rose from the dead. If any surprise is felt at Justin's employment of the heathen designations for the seventh and first days of the week, it may be accounted for thus. Before the death of Hadrian, A.D. 138, the hebrew national division (which Dion Cassius, writing in the 8th century, derives, together with its nomenclature, from Egypt) had, in matters of common life, almost universally superseded in Greece, and even in Italy, the national divisions of the lunar month. Justin Martyr, writing to and for heathen, as well as to and for Jews, employs it, therefore, with a certainty of being understood.

The strangest of all is the pagan Tacitus. He, however, delighted to consider himself a sort of Christian, has the following words in his book on "Fate," or on "the Laws of the Countries," which he addressed to the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus: "What, then, shall we say respecting the new race of ourselves who are Christians, whom in every country and in every region the Messiah established at his coming; for, lo! wherever we be, all of us are called by the one name of the Messiah, Christians; and upon one day, which is the first of the week, we assemble ourselves together, and on the appointed and holy day (Tacitus, Hist. 5. 8)."

Two very short notices stand next on our list, but they are important from their casual and unstudied character. Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, A.D. 170, in a letter to the Church of Rome, a fragment of which is preserved by Eusebius (Eccles. Hist. iv. 23), says, τὴν τεῖχος διάνοιαν ἐκ τῆς Κυριακῆς τούτης ἐπιστολήν. And Melito, bishop of Sardis, his contemporary, is stated to have composed, among other works, a treatise on the Lord's day (ἐν τῇ τῆς Κυριακῆς λόγῳ).

The next writer who may be quoted is Ireneus, bishop of Lyons, A.D. 178. He asserts that the Sabbath is abolished; but his evidence to the existence of the Lord's day is clear and distinct (De Orat. 28; De Idol. 14). It is spoken of in one of the best-known of his Fragments (see Beaven's Ireneus, p. 205). But a record in Eusebius (v. 29, 2) of the part which he took in the Quarta-Decimy controversy shows that in his time it was an institution beyond dispute. The point in question was this: Should Easter be celebrated in connection with the Jewish Passover, on whatever day of the week that might happen to fall, with the churches of Asia Minor, Syria, and Mesopotamia, or on the Lord's day, with the rest of the Christian world? The churches of Gaul, then under the superintendence of Ireneus, agreed upon a synodical epistle to Victor, bishop of Rome, in which occurred words somewhat to this effect: "The mystery of the Lord's resurrection may not be celebrated on any other day than the Lord's day, and on this alone should we observe the breaking off of the Paschal fast." This confirms what was said above, that while, even towards the end of the 2nd century, traditions varied, the word celebrated for Christ's resurrection, the weekly celebration of it was universal, which no diversity existed, or was even hinted at.

Clement of Alexandria, A.D. 194, comes next. One does not expect anything very definite from a writer of so mystical a tendency, but he has some things quite to our purpose. In his Strom. (iv. 9) he speaks of τῆς διποχίλιον ἡμέραν, τὴν τῷ ὅστις ἀνίκητος ἔγινε, τὴν δὲ καὶ πρὸν ὁ ἄνω φωτός γίνεται, ε.τ.λ., words which bishop Kaye interprets as contrasting the seventh day of the Law with the eighth day of the same incarnated and more important event. "When Clement says that the (Gnostic, or transcendential Christian), does not pray in any fixed place, or on any stated days, but through-out his whole life, he gives us to understand that Christians in general did meet together in fixed places and at appointed times for prayer." But we are not left to mere inference on this important point, for Clement speaks of the Lord's day as a well-known and customary festival (Strom. vii.), and in one place gives a mystical interpretation of the name (Strom. v.).

Tertullian, whose date is assignable to the close of the second century, may, in spite of his conversion to Montanism, be quoted as a witness to facts. He terms the first day of the week sometimes Sunday (Dies Solis), sometimes Dies Dominicus. He speaks of it as a day of joy ("Dies Solis lestia fulgentem," Apol. c. 18), and asserts that it is wrong to fast upon it, or to pray standing during its continuance ("Die Dominico jejunium nefas dicimus, vel de geniculata adorare," De Cor. c. 8). Even business is to be put off, lest we give place to the devil ("Differentes etiam negotia, ne quem Diabolam locum demus," De Orat. c. 18).

The evidence that the Lord's day had its superiority to the Sabbath indicated by manna having been given on it to the Israelites, while it was withheld on the Sabbath. It is one of the marks of the perfect Christian to keep the Lord's day.

L. D. 210) speaks of the heathen interlocutor, in his dialogue called Octavius, as asserting that the Christians come together to a festival "on a solemn day" (solemn diei).

Cyprian and his colleagues, in a synodal letter (A.D. 258), make the Jewish circumcision on the eighth day peculiarly the "law of life of the Christian, to which Christ's resurrection introduces him, and point to the Lord's day, which is at once the eighth and the first.

Commodian (c. A.D. 290) mentions the Lord's day. Victorinus (A.D. 290) contrasts it, in a very remarkable passage, with the Paraclete and the Sabbath.

Lastly, Peter, bishop of Alexandria (A.D. 300), says of it, "We keep the Lord's day as a day of joy, because of him who rose thereon."

The results of our examination of the principal writers of the two centuries after the death of St. John may be the more striking, if we consider that the Lord's day (a name which has now come out more prominently, and is connected more explicitly with our Lord's resurrection than before) existed during these two centuries as a part and parcel of apostolical, and so of scriptural Christianity. It was never defended, for it was never impugned, or, at least, only impugned as other things received from the apostles were. It was never confounded with the Sabbath, but carefully distinguished from it (though we have not quoted nearly all the passages by which this point might be proved). It was not an institution of severe sabbathial character, but a day of joy (μεταχωρία) and cheerfulness (μουσική), rather encouraging than forbidding relaxation. Religiously regarded, it was a day of solemn meeting for the holy Eucharist, for united prayer, for instruction, for almsgiving; and though, being an institution under the law of liberty, was not supposed to have been enjoined, it was commonly enjoined, Tertullian seems to indicate that the character of the day was opposed to worldly business. Finally, whatever analogy may be supposed to exist between the Lord's day and the Sabbath, in no passages have they been brought down to us in such a commandment as to give the obligation to observe the Lord's day. Ecclesiastical writers reiterate again and again, in the strictest sense of the words, "Let no man, therefore, judge you in respect of an holiday, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days" (Col. ii, 16). Nor, again, is it referred to any sabbatical foundation anterior to the promulgation of the Mosaic economy. On the contrary, those before the Mosaic era are constantly presumed to have had neither knowledge nor observance of the Sabbath. As the text asserts, the fourth day, it is, in spite of the attempt to show that the Lord's day is merely an ecclesiastical institution, dependent on the post-apostolic Church for its origin, and by consequence capable of being done away, should a time ever arrive when it appears to be no longer needed.

If these facts be allowed to speak for themselves, they indicate that the Lord's day is a purely Christian institution, sanctioned by apostolic practice, mentioned in apostolic writings, and so possessed of whatever divine authority all apostolic ordinances and doctrines (which were not obviously temporary, or were not abrogated by the new, or better order) can be supposed to possess.

3. But, on whatever grounds of "the Lord's day" may be supposed to rest, it is a great and indisputable fact that four years before the (Eccumenical Council of Nicaea, it was recognised by Constantine, in his celebrated edict, as "the venerable day of the Sun." The terms of the document are these: "Imperatore Constantiniano Aug. Heliopolit." "Ommnes judices urbanaeque plebes et ecclares officia veneranda Dio Solis crescentiae. Rutur tamen postea in imperio librum licentiae inseratur librique frequenter event ut non aliquis alio die frumentum suile sui vinum scrobulus mandetur. non omne munus nepotem quae seu civitatis celestis provisione concessa."—Det. Non. Mart. Cruspo II et Constantino II Cons. Some have endeavored to explain away this document by alleging, 1st. That "Solis Dies" is not the Christian Seventh Day, but the first day of the week. 2d. That, before his conversion, Constantine had professed himself to be especially under the guardianship of the Sun, and that, at the very best, he intended to make a religious compromise between existing religions, thereby weakening the Christian faith. 3d. That Constantine's edict was purely a calendarial one, and intended to reduce the number of public holidays, "Dies Nefasti" or "Feriati," which had, so long ago as the date of the "Actiones Verrucinae," become serious impediments to the transaction of business; and that this was to be effected by choosing a day which, while it would be accepted by the paganism then in fashion, would, of course, be agreeable to the Christians. 4thly. That Constantine then instituted Sunday for the first time as a legal day of rest. All these statements are absolutely refuted, both by the quotations made above from writers of the 2d and 3d centuries, and by the terms of the edict itself. It is evident that Constantine, accepting as facts the existence of the "Solis Dies," and the reverence paid to it by some one or other, does nothing more than make that reverence practically universal. It is "venerabilis" already. It is probable that this most natural interpretation would never have been disturbed had not Sozomen asserted, without warrant from either the Justinian or the Theodorian Code, that Constantine did for the sixth day of the week what the codes assert that he did for the first (Eccles. Hist., i, 8; comp. Eusebius, Vit. Const., iv, 18). The three other statements concern themselves rather with what Constantine means than with what he did. But with such considerations we have little or nothing to do, if we suppose the edict was only selected an ambiguous appellation. He may have been only half a Christian, wavering between allegiance to Christ and allegiance to Mithras. He may have affected a religious syncretism. He may have wished his people to adopt such syncretism. But in the fourth century a great change occurred, and he may have hesitated to avow too openly his inward leanings to Christianity. He may have considered that community of religious days might lead by-and-by to community of religious thought and feeling. He may have had in view the rectification of the calendar. But all this is nothing to the purpose. It is a fact, that in The year A.D. 321, in a public edict, which was to apply to Christians as well as to pagans, he put especial honor upon a day already honored by the former—judiciously calling it by a name which Christians had long employed without scruple, and to which, as it was in ordinary use, the pagans could scarcely object. What he did for it was to insist that worldly business, whether by the friendly consent of the administrators of private citizens, should be intermitted during its continuance. An exception, indeed, was made in favor of the rural districts, awkwardly from the necessity of the case, covertly, perhaps, to prevent those districts where paganism (as the word pagus would intimate) still prevailed extensively from feeling its loss from a sudden and stringent change. It need only be added here that the readiness with which Christians acquiesced in the interdiction of business on the Lord's day affords no small presumption that they had long considered it to be a day of rest, and that, so far as circumstances admitted, they had made it so long before.

Were any other testimony wanting to the existence of Sunday as a day of Christian worship at this period, it might be supplied by the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. The fathers there and then assembled make no doubt of the Lord's Day and the public services connected with it, but do not define it. They assume it as an existing fact, and only notice it incidentally in order to regulate an indifferent matter—the posture of Christian worshippers upon it (Conc. Nic. canon 20).

Cyriacus (A.P. 360) concludes one of his Homilies by dismissing his audience to their respective ordinary occupations. The Council of Laodicea (A.D. 364), however, enjoined Christians to rest (συγκακλησις) on the Lord's day. To the same effect is an injunction in the forsyery called the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 24), and various other enactments from A.D. 600 to A.D. 1100, though by no means extending to the prohibition of all secular occupations.

Lord's Prayer, the common title of the only form given by Jesus Christ to his disciples. Matthew imports it as part of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v, 1-12); not in the form we now confine by it, but the general topic of that part of the discourse is prayer. Luke, however, explicitly assigns the occasion for its delivery as being at the request of the disciples (Luke xi, 2-4); and we cannot reasonably suppose either that they had forgotten it, if previously given, or that our own Lord never made such an exercise as is here described, but had not referred to it as already pre-arranged. The following analysis exhibits its comprehensive structure:

![Diagram of Lord's Prayer structure]

The closing doxology is omitted by Luke, and is probably spurious in Matthew, as it is not found there in any of the early MSS. The prayer is doubtless based upon expressions and sentiments already familiar to the Jews; indeed, parallel phrases to nearly all its contents have been discovered in the Talmud (see Schöttgen and Lightfoot, s. v.). This, however, does not detract from its beauty and force, but is only another indication of its origin, which is to be considered as a whole. The earliest reference found to it, as a liturgical formula in actual use, is in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions (q. v.), which give the form entire, and enjoin its stated use (vii. 44), but solely by baptized persons, a rule which was afterwards altered by higher authorities. The Christian fathers, especially Tertullian, Cyprian, and Origen, are loud in its praise, and several of them wrote special expositions or homilies upon it. Cyril of Jerusalem is the first writer who expressly mentions the use of the Lord's Prayer at the consecration of the altar (Ep. 28, § 5). St. Augustine has also alluded to its use on this solemn occasion (Hom. lxxxiiii). The Ordo Romani prefixes a preface to the Lord's Prayer, the date of which is uncertain. It contains a brief exposition of the prayer. All the Roman breviaries insist upon beginning divine service with the Lord's Prayer. The Church, it would appear, regularly proved that this custom was introduced as late as the 18th century by the Cistercian monks, and that it passed from the monastery to the Church. The ancient homiletical writings do not afford any trace of the use of the Lord's Prayer before sermons (see Riddle, Manual of Christian Antiquities). Its absurd repetition as a Pater Noster (q. v.) by the Romanists has perhaps led to an undue avoidance of it by some Protestants. In all liturgies (q. v.) of course it occupies a prominent place, and it is usual in many denominations to recite it in the presence of the minister; and in public services, as in the Mass: although Jerome (Ep. Peleg. iii, 3) and Gregory (Ep. vili, xlix) affirm that it was used by apostolical example in the consecration of the Eucharist. The literature of the subject is very copious (see the Chrest. Remembrancer, Jan. 1862). Early monographs are cited by Vollheding, Index Programmatum, p. 38, ed. 1811. Among special recent comments on it we may mention those of Bocker (Lond. 1835), Anderson (ib. 1840), Manton (ib. 1841), Rowseal (ib. 1841), Duncan (ib. 1845), Kennaway (ib. 1845), Pritchard (ib. 1850), Edwards (ib. 1860), and Denton (ib. 1864; N. Y. 1865). See Prayer.

Lord's Supper, the common English name of an ordinance instituted by our Saviour in commemoration of his death and sufferings, being one of the two sacraments universally observed by the Christian Church.

I. Name. It is called "the Lord's Supper" (εὐχαριστία τοῦ Κυρίου) in 1 Cor. x. 25. Matthew, however, has "memorials of the Lord's Supper" in 1 Cor. x. 23, but here it is a general name, for what is often called the "memorials of the Lord's Supper" in the early church are only those which happen at the Communion (συνοικνομία, a festival in common), a term borrowed from 1 Cor. x. 16, and Eucharist (Εὐχαριστία and ἐκχορία), "a giving of thanks," because of the hymns and psalms which accompanied it. Among the many other Greek and Latin names applied to the Lord's Supper, but for which we have no exact equivalent, we mention Ζωνέλιον, "a collection" (for celebrating the Lord's Supper), Λυτριγία (Liturgy, q. v.), Μεσσίας (Sacrament, q. v.), Μεσία (Mass, q. v.), etc. See Eucharist.

II. Biblical Notice. — Original Account. — The institution of this sacrament is recorded by Matthew (xxvi, 26-29), Mark (xiv, 22-25), Luke (xxii, 19 sq.), and by the apostle Paul (1 Cor. xii, 24-25), whose words differ very little from those of his companion, Luke; and the only difference between Matthew and Mark is, that the latter omits the words "for the remission of sins." There is so general an agreement among them all that it will only be necessary to recite the words of one of them: "Now, when the even was come, he sat down with the twelve" to eat the Passover which had been prepared by his direction, "and as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it, for this is my..." blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins” (Matt. xxvi, 20, 25-28). Its institution “in remembrance of Christ” is recorded only by Luke and Paul. John does not mention the institution at all, but the discourse of Jesus in chap. vi, 51-59 is referred by many interpreters to the Lord’s Supper. Paul was familiar with it, as C. N. T. shows, and they cannot partake of the Lord’s table and at the same time eat of the pagan sacrifices, because (verse 19) “the things which the Gentiles sacrifice they sacrifice to devils, and not to God;” and in another part of his first epistle (xi, 27-29), that “whosoever shall eat this bread and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord; but let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup; for he that eateth and drinketh unworthily eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord’s body.” Other passages of the New Testament are referred by many exegetical writers to the Lord’s Supper, but they establish no new point concerning the Biblical doctrine. They will be examined, however, in detail in this connection, leaving the ecclesiastical relations of the subject for the title Communion.

2. Paschal Analogies.—This is an important inquiry in the history of the institution of the Lord’s Supper. When Jesus and his disciples met together to eat the Passover (Matt. xxvi, 19; Mark xiv, 16; Luke xxi, 18), the manner in which the paschal feast was kept by the Jews of that period differed in many details from that originally prescribed by the rules of Exod. xii. The multitude that came up to Jerusalem met, as they could find accommodation, family by family, or in groups of friends, with one of their number as the celebrant, or “proclaimer” of the feast. The ceremonies of the feast took place in the following order (Lightfoot, Temple Servit, xiii; Meyer, Comm., in Matt. xxvi, 26). (1) The members of the company that were joined for this purpose met in the evening and reclined on couches, this position being then as much a matter of rule as standing had been originally (comp. Matt. xxvi, 20, διστορε; Luke xxi, 14; and John xiii, 23, 25). (2) The head of the household, or celebrant, began by a form of blessing “for the day and for the wine,” pronounced over a cup of which he and the others then drank. The wine was, according to rabbinic traditions, to be mixed with water; for not any mysterious reason, but because that was regarded as the best manner of drinking the best wine (comp. Matt. xxv, 30). (2) All who were present then washed their hands; they also having a special benediction. (3) The table was then set out with the paschal lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and the dish known as Charoseth (חרושת), a sauce made of dates, figs, raisins, and vinegar, and designed to commemorate the mortar of their bondage in Egypt (Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. col. 881). (4) The celebrant first, and then the others, dipped a portion of the bitter herbs into the Charoseth and ate them. (5) The dishes were then removed, and a cup of wine again brought. Then followed an interval which was allowed theoretically for the questions that might be asked by children or prosectyes, who were astonished at such a strange form of mourning of a feast, and the cup was passed round and drunk at the close of it. (6) The dishes being brought on again, the celebrant repeated the commemorative words which opened what was strictly the paschal supper, and pronounced a solemn thanksgiving, followed by Psa. cxiii and cxiv. (7) Then came a second washing of the hands, with a short form of blessing as before, and the celebrant broke one of the two loaves or cakes of unleavened bread, and gave thanks over it. All then took portions of the bread and dipped them, together with the bitter herbs, into the Charoseth, and so ate it as they ate the flesh of the paschal lamb, with bread, etc., as they liked: and, after another blessing, a third cup, known especially as the “cup of blessing,” was handed round. (9) This was succeeded by a fourth cup, and the recital of Psa. cxvii, followed by a prayer, and this was accordingly known as the cup of the Hallel, or of the Song. (10) There might be, in conclusion, a fifth cup, provided that the “great Hallel” (possibly Psa. cxv-cxvii) was sung over it. See Passover.

Comparing the ritual thus gathered from rabbinic writers with the early Christian usage, and considering the common principle that it represents substantially the common practice of our Lord’s time, and (8) that the meal of which he and his disciples partook was really the Passover itself, conducted according to the same rules, we are able to point, though not with absolute certainty, to the points of departure which the latter event presented for the novelty of the new. To (1) or (3), or even to (8), we may refer the first words and the first distribution of the cup (Luke xxi, 17, 18); to (2) or (7), the dipping of the sop (ψιλός) of John xiii, 26; to (7), or to an interval during (after) the distribution of the bread (Matt. xxvi, 26; Mark xiv, 22; Luke xxii, 19; 1 Cor. xi, 23, 24); to (9) or (10) (“after supper,” Luke xxi, 20), the thanksgiving, and distribution of the cup, and the hymn with which the whole was ended. It will be noticed that, according to this order of succession, the question whether the cup of the Last Supper was of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, or of a later age, as some writers have thought, of which those which has thus been transferred to the Christian Church and perpetuated in it. Old things were passing away, and all things becoming new. They had looked on the bread and the wine as memorials of the deliverance from Egypt. They were now told to partake of them in remembrance of their Master and Lord. The festival had been annual. No rule was given as to the time and frequency of the new feast that thus superseded the old, but the command, “Do this as oft as ye drink it” (1 Cor. x, 25), suggested the more continuous recollection of that which was to be their memorial of one whom they would wish never to forget. The words, “This is my body,” gave to the unleavened bread a new character. They had been prepared for language that would otherwise have been so startling by the teaching of John (vi, 52-58), and they were thus taught to see in the bread that was broken the witness of the closest possible union and incorporation with their Lord. The cup, which was “the new testament” (Νέαν συμμαρτύρειν) in his blood,” would remind them, in like manner, of the wonderful presence of which that new covenant had been spoken (Jer. xxxi, 31-34), of which the crowning glory was in the promise, “I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more.” His blood shed, as he told them, “for them and for many,” for that remission of sins which he had been proclaiming throughout his whole ministry, was to be to the new covenant what the blood of sprinkling had been to that of Moses (Exod. xxxiv, 8). It is possible that there may have been yet another thought connected with these symbolic acts. The funeral customs of the Jews involved, at or after the time when was passed the mourning bread (comp. Jer. xvi, 7, “shall neither they break bread for them in mourning,” in marginal reading of A. V.; Ewald and Hitzig, ad loc.; Ezek. xxiv, 17; Hosea ix, 14; Tob. iv, 17), and of wine, known when thus given, as “the cup of consolation.” May not the bread and the wine of the Lord’s Supper have been a repetition of that character, preparing the minds of Christ’s disciples for his departure by treating it as already accomplished? They were to think of his body as already anointed for the burial (Matt. xxvi, 12; Mark xiv, 8; John xii, 7), of his body as already given up in death, of his body as already shed. The passion itself was also, little as they might dream of it, a funeral feast. The bread and the wine were to be pledges of consolation for their sorrow, analogous to the verbal promises. of John xiv. 1, 27: xvi. 20. The word διαθήκη might even have the twofold meaning which is connected with it in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

May we not conjecture, without leaving the region of history for that of controversy, that the thoughts, desires, emotions of that hour of divine sorrow and communion would be such as to lead the disciples to crave earnestly for the promise which they had understood they should seek that renewal in the way which their Master had pointed out to them? From this time, accordingly, the words "to break bread" appear to have had for the disciples a new significance. It may not have assumed the form of a cup and of a historic or liturgical act; but when they met to break bread, it was with new thoughts and hopes, and with the memories of that evening fresh on them. It would be natural that the Twelve should transmit the command to others who had not been present, and seek to lead them to the same obedience and the same blessings. The narrative of the two disciples to whom their Lord made himself known "in breaking of bread" at Emmaus (Luke xxii. 30-35) would strengthen the belief that this was the way to an abiding fellowship with him.

3. The literal use. — It is always interesting to note, as has been pointed out by the writer of the Acts of the life of the first disciples at Jerusalem, a prominent place is given to this act, and to the phrase which indicated it. Writing, we must remember, with the definite associations that had gathered round the words during the thirty years that followed, we are apt to hear and to think of the members of the Church as continuing steadfast in or to the teaching of the apostles, in fellowship with them and with each other, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers (Acts ii. 42). A few verses further on, their daily life is described in terms ringing itself undesigned (1) of that of public devotion, which still belonged to them as Jews ("continuing daily with one accord in the Temple"); (2) of that of their distinctive acts of fellowship; "breaking bread from house to house (or 'privately,' Meyer), they did eat their meat in gladness and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favor with all the people.") Taken in connection with the account given in the preceding verses of the love which made them live as having all things common, we can scarcely doubt that this implies that the chief actual meal of each day was one in which they met as brothers, and which, beyond the very act of sharing the same food, was the eminently commemorative acts of the breaking of the bread and the drinking of the cup. It will be convenient to anticipate the language and the thoughts of a somewhat later date, and to say that apparently they thus united ever afterwards in the act of the Lord's Supper. The element of the eucharist (from the Greek eucharistia) is passing by degrees into the special signification of 'communion.' The apostle refers to his own office as breaking the bread and blessing the cup (1 Cor. x. 16). The table on which the bread was placed was the Lord's table, and that title was to the Jew, not, as later controversies have made it, the antithesis of altar (3ωριανος), but as nearly as possible a synonyme (Mal. i. 7, 12; Ezek. xii. 22). But the practice of the Agape, as well as the observance of the commemorative feast, had been transferred to Corinth, and this called for a special notice. Evil had sprung up which had to be checked at once. The meeting of friends for a social meal, to which all contributed, was a sufficiently familiar practice in the common life of Greeks of this period, and these club-feasts were associated with plans of mutual relief or charity to the poor (comp. Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq. x. v. Erinó), The Agape of the new society would seem to them to be such a feast, and hence came a disorder that altogether frustrated the object of the Church in instituting it. Richer members came, bringing their supper with them, or appropriating what belonged to the common stock and consumed it without waiting till others were assembled and the presiding elder had taken his place. The poor were put to shame, and dejected of their share in the... feast. Each was thinking of his own supper, not of that to which we now find attached the distinguishing title of "the Lord's Supper." When the time for that came, one was hungry enough to be looking to it with physical, not spiritual craving; another, so overpowered with wine as to be incapable of receiving it with any reverence. It is quite conceivable that a life of excess and excitement, of overworked emotion and unrestrained indulgence, such as this epistle brings before us, may have been a contributory cause to the physical as well as to the moral health of those who were affected by it, and so the sickness and the deaths of which Paul speaks (1 Cor. xi, 30), as the consequences of this disorder, may have been so, not by supernatural infliction, but by the working of those general laws of the divine government which we are accustomed to consider as the consequences of the sin. In any case, what the Corinthians needed was to be taught to come to the Lord's table with greater reverence, to distinguish ἐνεργεῖα (energeia) the Lord's body from their common food. Unless they did so, they would bring to the table πεπλωμένος in the morning, which was yet dark" (Tertullian, ad Uxor. ii, c. 4).

The recurrence of the same liturgical words in Acts xxvii, 35 makes it probable, though not certain, that the food of which Paul thus partook was intended to have, for himself and his Christian companions, the character of a consecration, analogous to that of the heathen soldiers and sailors, may be noticed, are said to have followed his example, not to have partaken of the bread which he had broken. If we adopt this explanation, we have in this narrative another example of a celebration in the early hours between midnight and daybreak. It was done at the time, i.e. as we have met with in the meeting at Troas.

All the distinct references to the Lord's Supper which occur within the limits of the N. T. have, it is believed, been noticed. To find, as a recent writer has done (Christian Remembrancer, April, 1860), that there is no allusion to it in the Liturgy of the Eastern Church in the Pauline Epistles involves (ingeniously as the hypothesis is supported) assumptions too many and bold to justify our acceptance of it. Extending the inquiry, however, to the times as well as to the writings of the N. T., we find reason to believe that we can trace in the early history of the Church some fragments of that which belonged to it from the beginning. The agreement of the four great families of liturgies implies the substratum of a common order. To that order may well belong the Hebraic: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which hath given rest unto his people Israel, according to the word of his servant David." The sacrifice "To thee"; the "Triumphant Corda" (ἰματία τοίχων τοῖς τίμησις), the Tri- sagogia, the Kyrie Eleison. We are justified in looking at these as having been portions of a liturgy that was really primitive; guarded from change with the tenacity with which the Christians of the 2d century clung to the traditions (the παραδόσεις of 2 Thess. ii, 15; iii, 6) of the first, forming part of the great deposit (παραδόσεις) of faith and worship which they had received from the apostles and have transmitted to later ages (comp. Bingham, Eccles. Antiq. bk. xv, ch. vii; Augusti, Christ. Arch. b. viii; Stanley on 1 Cor. x. x)."

III. Ecclesiastical Representations. — The Christian Church attached from the first great and mysterious importance to the Lord's Supper. In accordance with the original institution, all Christians used wine and bread, with the exception of the Hydroparastics (Aquar- rii), who used water instead of wine, and the Anergy- rite, who are said to have used cheese along with bread. The wine was generally mixed with water (εὐρώσα), and an allegorical signification was given to the mixture of these two elements. In the writings of the fathers (the fifth), at the same time, we meet with some passages which speak distinctly of symbols, and, at the same time, with others which indicate belief in a real participation of the body and blood of Christ. Ignatius, Justin, and Irenæus laid great stress on the mysterious connection subsisting between the Logos and the elements. Tertullian and Cyprian are representatives of the symbolical aspect, though both occasionally call the cup the body or the blood of Christ. The symbolical interpretation prevails in particular among the Alexandrine school. Clement called it a mystic symbol which produces an effect only upon the mind, and Origen decidedly opposed those who took the external sign for the thing itself. The idea of a sacrifice, though not yet of a daily or periodic sacrifice, appears in the writings of Justin and Irenæus. Cyprian says that the sacrifice is made by the priest, who acts instead of Christ, and imitates what Christ did. It is not quite certain, but probable, that the Eustonites celebrated the Lord’s Supper as a commemorative feast; the mystical meals of some Gnostics, on the contrary, bear but little resemblance to the Lord’s Supper. The development of liturgies in and after the third century, and the introduction of many mystical ceremonies, showed that the fathers generally regarded the Lord’s Supper, with Chrysostom, as a “dreadful sacrifice.” They clearly speak of a real union of the communicants with Christ; some, also, of a real change from the visible elements into the body and blood of Christ, though most of their expressions can be understood both of consubstantial and corporeal union. Augustine drew a clear distinction between the sign and the thing signified, while Augustine sought to unite its more profound mystical significance with the symbolical. Gelasius, bishop of Rome, very decidedly denied “the ceasing of the substance and nature of bread and wine.” The notion of a daily repetition of the sacrifice is distinctly set forth in the writings of Gregory the Great. A violent controversy concerning the Lord’s Supper arose in the 9th century. Paschasius Radbertus, a monk of Corvey, clearly propounded the doctrine of transubstantiation in his Liber de corpore et sanguine Domini, addressed to the emperor Charles the Bald, between 880 and 882. He was opposed by Ratramnus in his treatise De corpore et sanguine Domini, which was written at the request of the emperor, who drew a distinction between the sign and the thing represented by it, between the internal and the external. The most eminent theologians of the age, as Rabanus Maurus and Scotus Erigena, took an active part in the controversy. Gerbert (afterwards pope Sylvester II) endeavored to illustrate the doctrine of transubstantiation by the aid of geometrical diagrams. Toward the middle of the 11th century the doctrine of the real presence was sanctioned by the Second Lateran council (1136), canon of Tours (q. v.), who principally condemned the doctrine of an entire change in such a manner as to make the bread cease to be bread. Several synods in succession, between 1066 and 1079, condemned his views, but he was not entirely refuted. He adopted the words of Bede and imposed upon Berengar an oath that he believed “corpus et sanguinem Domini non solu sacramentum sed in veritate manibus sacerdotum trassist, frangi et dividere dimituis atteri.” Among the scholastics, Lanfranc developed the distinction between the subject and the accidents. The doctrine of transsubstantiation, first used by Hildebert of Tours, though similar phrases, as transnostio, had previously been employed (by Hugo of St. Victor and others). Most of the earlier scholastics, and, in particular, the followers of Lanfranc, defended both the change of the bread into the body of Christ and that of the “accidentia sine subiecto,” both of which were inserted in the Decretum Gratiani (about 1150), and declared an article of faith by the fourth Council of Lateran. Later, the Scholastics discussed a great many subtle questions, such as: Do animals partake of the body of Christ when they happen to swallow a consecrated host? By the institution of the Corpus-Christi day by pope Urban IV (1264), the doctrine of transubstantiation received a liturgical expression. However, a considerable time before, it had become a custom in the Latin Church the faithful to consume the host in the form of the host. Alexander Hales, Bonaventure, and Thomas Aquinas expressly demanded that only the priests should partake of the cup. The Hussites demanded the admission of the leity also to a partaking of the cup, on the basis of the Council of Constance was one of the causes of the Hussite War. The doctrine that Christ existed wholly in either of the elements (for which doctrine the theologians used the expression communio) was expressly confirmed by the Council of Basle. The number of those who during the Middle Ages expressed their dissent from the doctrine of transubstantiation is limited.

The doctrine of impanation, or a coexistence of Christ's body with the bread, was first advanced by John of Paris, who was followed by William Ockham and Durandus de Saint-Porocondo. Both transubstantiation, or the consummation of the sacrifice were combated by Wickliffe, who, with Berengar of Tours, believed it a change from the inferior to the superior. His views were probably shared by Jerome of Prague, while Hus seems to have believed in transubstantiation. The Reformers of the 16th century agreed in rejecting transubstantiation as unscriptural, but they differed among themselves in several points. Carlstadt believed that the words of institution were to be understood εκεῖνος, i.e. that Christ, while speaking to them, had pointed at his own body. Zwingli took the word "Ιστος" in the sense of "to be food," and viewed the Lord's Supper merely as an act of commemoration, not as a visible sign of the body and blood of Christ. Zécolampadius differed from Zwingli only grammatically, retaining the literal meaning of "ἐστι," but taking the predicate, "my body," (τὸ σῶμα μοῦ), in a figurative sense, of Christ in the bread; Luther believed it impossible to put any of these connotations on the letter of the Scripture, and adhered to the doctrine of the real presence of Christ's body and blood in, with, and under the bread and wine (consubstantiation). Together with this view he professed a belief in the body of Christ. Calvin rejected the doctrine of the real presence; but, after the precedence of Bucer, Myronius, and others, spoke of a real, though spiritual participation of the body of Christ which exists in heaven. This participation, however, he restricted to the believer, while Luther agreed with the Roman Church in maintaining that also infidels partake of Christ's body, though to their own hurt. Attempts at mediating between the views of Luther and Calvin were early made, and there were crypto-Calvinists in the Lutheran, and crypto-Lutherans in the Calvinistic churches. But the Lutheran view received a decisive blow in 1610, when the Augsburg Confession was adopted, which shut out any further influence of Calvinism. The decline of Lutheran orthodoxy in general caused also the Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's Supper to grow into disuse, and the Protestant theologians generally adhered with Luther in the doctrine of the real presence. There are many differences in the latter, at length, prevailed. (See the Brit. and For. Rev. Oct. 1860; Müller, De Lutheri et Calviniani sentinentia de Sacro Canto, Hali. 1853.) It was, in particular, adopted by the Armenian churches, as also by the Socinians. In the Church of England there was from the beginning a real-presence and a spirit of communion, and by the controversy between them frequently became very hot. The real-presence party generally agreed with the doctrine of the Lutheran Church, but some of its writers advanced views more resembling those of the Roman Church. In the 19th century the High-Church parties of the German Lutheran Church, and of the Episcopal Church of England, Scotland, and America, revived and emphasized again the doctrine of the real presence. The reality theology of the United Evangelical Church of Germany in the 19th century fell back on the doctrine of Calvin, and emphasized the real and objective communication of the whole God-man Christ to the believer, and the real body and blood in the German Reformed Church of America. Very different from the doctrine of all the larger Christian denomin-institutions were the views which some mystic writers of the ancient and medieval Church intimated, and which were fully developed in the 16th century by Paracelsus, and afterwards adopted by the Society of Friends. They regardcommunion as something essentially internal and mystical, and deny the Lord’s Supper to be an ordinance which Christ the Last Supper had perpetrated. — Lutheran., Historia controversy Sacramenticus (Tig. 1673); Hoe- pelianus, Hist. IV. Forms of Celebration. — 1. The Elements. — (a) At the institution of the Lord’s Supper Christ used unleavened bread. The primitive Christians carried with them the bread and wine for the Lord’s Supper, and took the bread which was used at common meals, which was unleavened bread. When this custom ceased, together with the Agapé, the Greeks retained the leavened bread, while in the Latin Church the unleavened bread became common since the 8th century. Out of this difference a dogmatic controversy in the 11th century arose, the Greek Church reproaching the Latin Church with the omission of the leavened bread, and making it heresy. At the Council of Florence, in 1439, which attempted to unite both churches, it was agreed that either might be used; but the Greeks soon rejected, with the council also, the tole ration of the unleavened bread, and still maintain the ancient custom.

We see, from 1 Cor. xi, 24, that in the apostolic Church the bread was broken. This custom was discontinued in the Roman Church when, in the 12th and 18th centuries, the host or holy wafer was cut in a peculiar way, so as to represent upon it a crucified Saviour. Luther retained the wafer, but the Reformed churches reintroduced the use of common bread and the breaking of it. The same was the case with the Socinians and the United Evangelical Church of Germany. In the Episcopal Church of England, and the churches derived from it, cuts pieces of common wheaten bread are given into the hands of the communicants. See J. G. Hermann, Hist. concertationum de pomo ovo (Lips. 1787); Marburgin, Das Brod im Abendmahl (Berlin, 1817).

(b) The second element used by Christ was wine. It is not certain of what color the wine was, nor whether it was pure or mixed with water, and both points were always regarded as indifferent by the Christian Church. The use of mixed wine is said to have been introduced by pope Alexander I; it was expressly enacted in the 12th century by Clement III, and divers allegorical signs are given to the mingling of these two elements. Also the Greek Church mingled the wine with water, while the Armenian and the Protestant churches use pure wine.

The question as to whether the wine originally used in the Lord’s Supper was fermented or not, would seem to be a futile one in view of the fact, 1. that the unfermented juice of the grape can hardly, with propriety, be called wine at all; 2. that fermented wine is of almost universal use in the East; and, 3. that it has invariably been employed for this purpose in the Church of all ages. For the end of the 7th and in the 4th of the Eastern modern well-meaning reformers, the idea that our Lord used any other would hardly have gained the least currency. See Wink.

In accordance with the original institution, both elements were used separately during the first centuries, but it became the custom that the persons present, bread merely dipped in wine. The Manicheans, who abstained wholly from wine, were strongly opposed by teachers of all other parties, and pope Gelasius I, of the 5th, called their practice grande sacrilegiosa. In the 10th century it became frequent in the West to use only consecrated bread dipped in wine, it was not before the end of the 18th century that, in accordance with the doctrine, then developed by the Scholastics, that Christ was wholly present in both bread and wine, and that the partaking of the bread was sufficient, the Church began to withhold the wine from the laity altogether. The Waldenses, Wickliffe, Huss, and Savonarola, protested against this withdrawal of the cup, and all the Protestant denominations agreed in restoring the use of both elements. The Greek Church has always used the wine under both species, and Scholia des Keiches im Abendmahl (Leogra, 1780); Schmidt, De fustis calicis eucharisticis (Heilsmiit, 1708).

2. Consecration and Distribution of the Elements. — To “consecrate” meant in the ancient Church only to set apart from common and devote to a sacred use. But, by degrees, a magical effect was attributed to consecration, as was already done by Augustine, and when the doctrine of transubstantiation became prevalent in the Roman Church, it was supposed that the pronunciation of the words “This is my body” changed the elements into the body and blood of Christ. The formulae which were used at the consecration were at first free, but afterwards fixed by written liturgies. All liturgies contain the words of institution and a prayer; the liturgy of the Greek Church, moreover, a prayer to the Holy Holy and Holy bread and wine into the hearts and blood of Christ. In the ancient Church both elements were distributed by the deacons, afterwards only the wine; at a later period of the Church, again, both elements. According to the Protestant theologians, the administration belongs properly to the ministers of the Church; but many theol. have maintained that where no regular teachers can be obtained, this sacrament may be administered by other Christians to whom this duty is committed by the Church.

3. Time and Place. — In the apostolic Church, as we have seen, the Lord’s Supper was regularly celebrated in the public assemblies, hence in private dwellings, at common tables, during the persecutions in hidden places, at the sepulchres of the martyrs, and, later, in the churches at special tables or altars. In imitation of its first cerebration by Christ, it was at first celebrated at night; later, it became almost universally connected with the morning service. In the primitive Church, Christians partook of it almost daily; and when this was made impossible by the persecutions, at least several times a week, or certainly on Sundays. In the 10th century, many of the theological questions of the laxity of Christians in the participation of the Lord’s Supper, and afterwards several synods had to prescribe that all Christians ought to partake of it at least a certain number of times. The fourth Synod of Lateran, in 1415, restricted it to once a year. The Catholic Church, in an effort to secure a uniform participation, without, however, making any definite prescriptions as to the number of times. Many of the Protestant states punished those who withdrew altogether from it with exile, excommunication, and the refusal of a Christian burial.

4. Persons by whom, and the Manner in which the Lord’s Supper is received. — In the primitive Church all baptized persons were admitted to the Lord’s Supper; afterwards the catechumens and the lopes were excluded from it. Communion of infants is found in an early period, and is marked in the acts of the Council of Trent, Hist. eucharist. infant. (Ber. 1742). To those who were prevented from being present at the public service the consecrated elements were carried by deacons. Thus it was especially carried to the dying as a Viaticum, and until the 5th or 6th century it was even placed in the mouth of the dead, or in their coffin (see Schmidt, De eucharistia mortuorum, Jena, 1645).

The apostles received the Lord’s Supper reclining, according to Eastern custom. Since the 4th century the communicants used to stand, afterwards to kneel, then the men with uncovered head, the women covered with a long white cloth. Since the 4th century a certain order was introduced in approaching the communion table, so that first the higher and lower clergy, and afterwards the laity came.

The self-communion of the laity is prohibited by all Christian denominations. The self-communion of officiating clergymen is generally strenuously resisted in the Roman Church, but also permitted and customary in the Episcopalian Church, among the Moravians, and with other denominations.

5. Ceremonies in Celebration.—In the Roman Church the communicants, after having confessed and received absolution, approach the altar, and stand at some distance from the altar, and receive kneeling a host from the priest, who passes round, taking the host out of a chalice which he holds in his left hand, repeating, for each communicant the words "Corpus Domini nostrui Jesu Christi custodiat animam tuam in vitam saevis et in aeternam. Amen." In the Episcopal Church the service is nearly the same as that of the ancient Church.

In the Lutheran Church the communion is preceded by a preparatory service, confession (q. v.). After the sermon the clergyman consecrates the host and the wine at the altar. Amid the singing of the congregation, the communicants, first the men, then the women, step, either singly or two at a time, to the altar, where the clergymen place the host in their mouth, and reach to them the cup, using the following or a similar formula: "Take, eat, this is the body of our Lord, and drink, this is the blood of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and remember always His death till He come again. Amen. Take, drink, this is the blood," etc. The service is concluded with a prayer of thanks, and with the blessing. During the service frequently candles burn on the altar.

In the Reformed, Freezbyterian, Congregational, Armistic, etc., churches, the service begins communiating with a formula containing the passage 1 Cor. xii. The communicants step, in most places singly, to the communion table, and the broken bread and the cup are given into their own hands. In some places they remain sitting in the pews, where the elders carry to them bread and wine; in others, twelve at a time sit around a table. Private communion of the sick is an exception.

In the Episcopal Church of England the service of the Lord's Supper is immediately preceded by a general confession of sins, which is followed by a prayer of consecration and the words of institution. The communicants first commune themselves, then the communicants, who approach without observing any distinction, and kneel down at the communion table, receiving the bread (which is cut) and the cup into their hands. The service is conducted by the sacerdotal Episcopalian Church, and substantially in the Methodist churches.

The Socinians, on the day before they celebrate the Lord's Supper, a preparation ("discipline") with closed doors, when the preacher exhorts the Church members, rebukes their faults, reconciles enemies, and sometimes excludes them for gross or grave offenses. The Church. On the following day, at public service, the altar tables are spread and furnished with bread and wine. The communicants sit down round the table, and take with their hands the bread, which is broken by the preacher, and the cup.

The service of the Moravians makes that of the primitive Church. It is celebrated every fourth Sunday at the evening service, and was formerly connected with the Agape (love feasts), washing of feet, and the kissing of peace.

Lorenz, Johann Michael, a German theologian, was born at Torgau, July 16, 1692, and died at the university of that city. In 1713 he obtained the degree of A.M.; in 1714 he was appointed preacher in his native place; in 1722, professor ordinary of divinity at his alma mater. In addition to this, he was appointed in 1724 visitor of Williams College; in 1726, morning preacher, and regent of the school of St. Thomas; in 1734, pastor of the Thomas Church; in 1741, vice-president of the ecclesiastical conference. The doctorate in divinity he obtained in 1722. He died Aug. 16, 1752. By more than fifty Latin dissertations on dogmatic and exegetic theology Lorenz gained a high honorable name in theological literature. We only mention Dissertatio de unitate Spirituali, ad 1 Joh. ii, 27 (Argentorat, 1728, 4to). See Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutscbrlands, vol. ii, s. v.

Lorenzo or Lorenzetto, Ambrogio and Pietro, two celebrated Italian painters of the 14th century, were born at Siena about 1300. They were brothers, as we learn from an inscription which was attached to their pictures of the "Presentation" and of the "Marriage of the Virgin," destroyed in 1720. The principal of their works, the beautiful Madonna in the Museum at Siena, and represented the fatal adventures of some missionary monks, has been destroyed. In the first compartment a youth was represented putting on the monastic costume, in another, the same youth was represented with several of his brother monks about to set out for Asia, and in the third, several of the monks, in crowds, are already at their place of destinattion, and are being chastised in the sultan's presence, and are surrounded and mocked by a crowd of scoffing infideles; the sultan judged them to be hanged; in a fourth the young monk is already hanged to a tree; yet he notwithstanding continues to preach the Gospel to the astonished multitude, upon which the sultan orders their hanging to be stopped; the next morning is their ceremonious execution by the sword, and the scaffold is surrounded by a great crowd on foot and on horseback; after the execution follows a great storm, which is represented in all the detail of wind, hail, lightning, and earthquake, from all of which the crowd are praying to be delivered; the next day they are buried in the Campo Santo at Pisa. In 1355 Pietro was invited to Arezzo to paint the cathedral, in which he painted in fresco twelve stories from the life of the Virgin, with figures as large as life and larger, but they have long since perished; they were, however, in good preservation during the time of Vasari, and completely are stored them. He speaks of parts of them as superior in style and vigor to anything that had been done up to that time.—English Cyclop. s. v. See also Vasari, Vite dei Pittori, etc.; Della Valle, Lettere Scelte; Lanzi, Storia Pictoria, etc.; and especially Rumohr, Italianische Forschungen, in which the two Lorenzetti are treated of at considerable length.

Loretto, properly Loreto (Lauretum), an Italian city of some 8000 inhabitants, several miles south of Ancona, is renowned simply as a place of pilgrimage. It is the site of the celebrated sanctuary of the Virgin Mary called the Santa Casa, or Holy House. The church of Santa Casa was built in 1461-1518. The first mention of this sancta casa is to be found in Flavius Blondus's († 1468) Italia illustrata, where he says of it, "Celeberrimus sanctus Italia saeculum beate Virginiae in Laureto." He mentions the many rich presents which were made to the shrine as a proof that "at this place the prayers for the intercession of the mother of God are granted," but he says nothing of the origin of the place. Pope Paul II († 1471) granted indulgences to those who visit this shrine, and the building was followed by his successors. Baptist Mantuanus, in his Redemptoris mundi matrix ecclesia Lausivana historia (Antwerp, 1576), relates, quoting a history found at the shrine itself (and probably written about 1450-80), that the house of the Virgin Mary, in which Christ was brought up, was known and was said to have been discovered by St. Helena, was, after the total downfall of the country, and the destruction of its Christian churches by the Turks in May, 1291, brought by the angels to Loreto and a half later years later to Italy, in the neighborhood of Recanati, and was thence finally transferred to its present site. This story is contradicted by the Church historians of the 14th century themselves, who say that in their day Mary's house at Nazareth was still visited by pilgrims. The houses of Recanati resembled each other very much, and the selection of the original habituation of the Virgin proved very difficult, as private interests became mixed up with it. But now as to the church of the Santa Casa itself. It stands near the centre of the town, in a piazza which possesses other architectural attractions, the chief of which are the governor's palace, built from the designs of Bramante, and a fine bronze statue of pope Sixtus V. The great central door of the church is surmounted by a splendid bronze statue of the Madonna; and in the interior are three magnificent bronze doors filled with bas-reliefs, representing the principal events of scriptural and ecclesiastical history. The celebrated Holy House stands within. It is a small brick house, with one door and one window, originally of rude material and construction, but now, from the devotion of successive generations, the most renowned and best-known of all the Marian shrines. It is entirely cased with white marble, exquisitely sculptured, after Bramante's design, by Sansovino, Bandinelli, Giovanni Bolognese, and other eminent artists. The subjects of the bas-reliefs are all taken from the history of the Virgin Mary in relation to the mystery of incarnation, as the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Nativity, the Magi, the exception of three on the eastern side, which are mainly devoted to the legend of the Holy House itself and of its translation. The rest of the interior of the church is rich with bas-reliefs, mosaics, frescoes, paintings, and carvings in bocca, one of the finest works is the font, which is a master-piece of art. The Holy House having been at all times an object of devout veneration, its treasury of votive offerings is one of the richest in the Western world. It suffered severely in the French occupation of 1786, but it has since received numerous and most valuable restorations. With the innumerable and silver lamps kept burning at the shrine is endowed to the amount of several thousand dollars to secure their being always kept burning. The remainder of the wax candles and oil (of which some 14,000 pounds are burned annually) is sold as possessing miraculous virtues, and companies the use or even the handling of household vessels belonging to the shrine. As many as 40,000 masses have been said there in one year, which also adds greatly to the income. Popes Julius II, Sixtus V, and Innocent XII attached indulgences to the pilgrimages and prayers offered here, but nevertheless the number of pilgrims, which was said in 1600 to have reached 200,000 per annum, fell in the last century to 40,000, and in our own day remains at this number. The frescoes of the church are among the finest to be found in the world. The name it took from Laurenza, a lady on whose estate the Santa Casa remained for a while.

The history of this shrine has been critically examined by P. P. Bergerius, and in 1619 by Prof. Verneger, of Strasbourg. Its principal champions were Jesuits; among them we would mention Turrianus, Caniani, and Barone. In 1637 there was published a history of the Santa Casa in six volumes, and in some places, as at Prague, near Augsburg, etc., and, in turn, became shrines.—Herzog, Real-Encyklop. viii, 469.

Loria (or Loria) Isaac (by the Jews ליאו), the initials of ליאו (ליאו), a noted rabbi and great exponent of the Cabala (q. v.), was born at Jerusalem in 1354, of a German-Jewish family. His father having died when he was a child, he was cared for by a rich uncle, and was dedicated to the study of the Talmud at Cairo. When twenty-four years of age he was considered one of the greatest Talmudists of that place. Unfortunately, however, Loria became an ardent adherent of the mystical writings of the Jews, and especially enraptured with the Sphak (q. v.), one of the Cabalistic works. The heretical views did not bring the upright and confused system of the Sphak into order, unity, and congruity; he also made many valuable additions. A most remarkable feature of his views are the numerous divisions of his psychology, with its two sexes. Still, all these theories were, with him, only premises to lead to the so-called or practical branch in the Cabala, which he called the "world of perfection" (Olam ha-Tikkun). He also held peculiar views on the fall of man. By reason of Adam's original sin, he held, the higher and the inferior souls, the good and the evil, came into confusion, and became intermixed with each other, and a separation of souls was thus a necessity. In addition to this he teaches the Superfattoio. He pretended to have a full knowledge concerning the origin, relation, and ramification of souls; further, to possess the power and faculty to compel the spirits of the upper world to take their abode in the bodies of living men, in order to reveal to them what is going on in the upper world; further, to be able to read on every man's brow in which relation his soul stands to the higher worlds. In Cairo nobody interested himself in his mystic, and he therefore emigrated in 1590 to Safet, the capital of Thesalonica, where the Cabalists were esteemed as high as the Bible. His superior knowledge, faculties, and gifts gradually secured him the favor of the Cabalists, and Loria was soon surrounded by troops of young and old Cabalists, who came to listen to his new revelations. He subse-sequently became a cabalistic community, and lived to-ger apart from the non-Cabalists, and according to his prescriptions. After Loria's death (August, 1572), Vital Calabrese became his successor and gathered his productions, while another of his disciples, the Italian Israel Saruk, propagated his teachings in Europe. Indeed, it may be said that the influence of this Cabalistic extended more or less over all the Jews of the globe, and many of them to this very day follow this great Jewish mystic in assigning to the Sohar equal value as to the Bible. It must be confessed, however, that by his ascription to the Sohar he also called forth a whole race of Jewish communities everywhere, and a reaction in the phar-sisic, lifeless prayers, while even upon the Christian the-osophy, mysticism, and exegetical studies his influence was considerable. See Gritz, Gesch. der Juden, ix, 487 sq.; x, 120; Jost, Gesch. d. Juden, iii, 100, 145; Fürst, Bibl. Jud., ii, 197 sq.

Loria, Salomo, a noted rabbi, was born at Posen in 1510. Gifted with great talents, he devoted himself to a thorough research of Jewish literature. On account of his onslaughts on Jewish tradition he became involved in manifold controversies with his colleagues, and was persecuted; but, though personally disliked on account of his inclination to polemics, and not spared even the private characteristics of living authorities, his just merits concerning the Talmud were recognised af-after all, and his commentaries on six volumes of the Tal-mu are held in high reputation among the Talmudic Jews to this very day. He died in 1553. See Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, ix, 487 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud., ii, 290 sq.

Lorin (or), JEAN, a Jewish commentator on the Scripture, distinguished in his day as an exegetical scholar, was born at Avignon in 1609; taught theology at Paris, Rome, and Milan, and died March 26, 1634, at Dôle. For a list of his works, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxvi, 662.

Lorsch, GEROB WILLIAM, a German theologian, was born at Dillingen, in the duchy of Nassau, Feb. 29, 1759. In 1768 he entered the University of Hildesheim; in 1771 he removed to that of Göttingen, and became there an enthusiastic student of the Oriental languages under Michaelis. After having finished the academic course, he spent four years in private study in his father's house, preparing himself for the ministry. In 1778 he became rector at Siegen; in 1786, at the grammar-school of his native place, and obtained, at the same time, the dignity of professor; in 1791, rector at the grammar-school of Herzberg, and, at the same time, professor of Oriental languages at the academy there, and in the following year was appointed to lecture at the university of that place on history and exegesis. In 1798 he became the third professor ordinary of divinity; in 1794, the second counsel of the Conventual. Having become famous, by reason of his literary contributions, as an eminent Orientalist, he was, in 1812, called to the University of Jena as professor of Oriental literature. The theological faculty of Marburg bestowed on him the degree of doctor of divinity. He died March 30, 1816. He belongs to the few and rare scholars of the ancient languages who combined acuteness with extensive learning. De Sacy places him among the first German Orientalists, first to publish an Archiv für orientalische Literatur (Mar-Lorsch, CONVENT of (otherwise Laureham, Laureichen, monasterium Laureosseni, Laurissene, Laurisna), situated four miles from Heidelberg, was established about A.D. 764 by countess Wibillswinda (widow of count Rupert, who, by order of Pepin, conduct pope Stephen back to Rome) and her son Canem. Its first aho-bis is said to have been a near relative of the founders, Chrodeng of Metz. The first establishment was on an island of the Weschnitz, dedicated to St. Peter; a second was soon erected on a hill in the neighborhood. CHARLEMAGNE greatly interested himself in this monastery, and added to it as endowment Heppenheim (in January, 778) and Oppenheim (in September, 774), and personally attended the consecration. Louis the Pious, Lothaire, Louis the German, and Louis III all confirmed successively the donations of Charlemagne. But one of the greatest sources of prosperity for the convent was its having received from Rome the relics of St. Nazarius, which brought it numerous presents and donations, and soon made it one of the most prosperous convents at the time. Lorsch also enjoys great literary fame. Its monks by distinguishing themselves by their literary pursuits, to which the Annaleis Laurensenses bear witness. The early part of these annals (708-768) is evidently derived from those of the convent of Murbach, which were very popular; but after that time they are clearly original, and continue down to 908. Aside from the less important Annals Laurensenses minores, we must mention the Annals Laurensenses, formerly called plebei or Losiertam, which are the most important annals of the time. Ranke has lately discovered in them the official work of a Carolingian court historian, and they are used by those who to the present day interpret the annals bearing his name. Until the 11th century the convent enjoyed great prosperity. Then its reverses commenced, and, after various struggles, it fell in the 12th century, till "a planta pedis usque ad verticem non fult in eo sanitas." The moral condition of the Lorenz monastery had greatly deteriorated even since the 11th century, and it became necessary to inaugurate a reform. This task was intrusted to archbishop Sifrid II of Mentz, A.D. 1229. His successor, Sifrido III, however, was really the man who completed this task by subjecting the monks to the Cistercian rule, "ut ordo," says Gregory of Hildesheim, "in unius ordinis per se, et pulchrum et virtutum augeatur." By him also were successively installed into Lorsch some Preamon-trian canons of the conven of All Saints (diocese of Strasbourg), and the pope approved it as a new organization Jan. 8, 1248. In the second half of the 14th century Lorsch was subjected to the rule of the electoral administration. Vainly did the Premonstrants appeal to pope Alexander VII: the convent retained only the original foundation at Mentz and its dependencies. Not until after the completion of the treaty of Westphalia (1648) was a part of its other possessions restored to it. In 1651 the Palatinate renewed its claims to the lands of the convent, and questioned the propriety of the independence of Lorsch as a separate duchy, with representation in the Diet. The quarrel lasted nearly through the whole of the 18th century, but was determined in 1808, when the convent became the possession of the house of Hesse-Darmstadt. Lo-ruhmah (Heb. Lo-Ruhamáh, לְוֹ רֻחָמָה, not pitied, as it is explained in both contexts, Hosea, i, 6, Sept. Ov. Ḥeiṣálmay, Vulg. Abaque misericordia, and as it is rendered in the Author, vers. Hosea, i, 23, 'not obtained mercy,' the name divinely appointed for the first daughter of the prophet Hosea. Later on his wife Gomer, the whore of the city, is so called, by Hosea's father, Jotham, the type of Jehovah's temporary rejection of his people by the Babylonian captivity in consequence of their idolatry (Hosea, i, 6; ii, 23; comp. ii. 1). Losada, Christopher, a martyr to the cause of Protestantism in Spain in the 16th century, was, at the time of his conversion under the preaching of Dr. Egidius [see Gil-Juan], an eminent physician and learned philosopher. He was chosen pastor of a Protestant Church in Seville, which met ordinarily in the house of Isabella de Baenas, 'a lady not less distinguished for her piety than for her rank and opulence.' Among the subscriptions of his correspondence were Don Juan Ponce de Leon and Domingo de Guzman, and others equally well celebrated. Arrested by the Inquisition in consequence of his zeal in diffusing Protestant principles among his countrymen, neither the prison nor the rack could make him renounce his convictions, and he was consequently condemned to the stake. He suffered death at an "auto-da-fe," solemnized at Seville Sept. 24, 1556, in the square of St. Francis, and attended by four bishops, the members of the royal court of justice, the chapter of the cathedral, and a great assemblage of nobility and gentry, the causes of the death penalty on twenty-one apostates from the Roman belief. The most distinguished individual aside from Dr. Losada was one of his members, Don Juan Ponce de Leon, whom we have mentioned above. They both bore their trial with admirable Christian patience, committing their souls to a faithful Creator. See Fox, Book of Martyrs, p. 186; M'Crie, Reformation in Spain, p. 217, 300, 807. (J. H. Löschner, Johann Kaspar, a German theologian, was born at Werden May 8, 1686, and was educated at the University of Wittenberg. He flourished successively as professor of exegesis at the universities of Hildesheimen, Erfurt, and Zwicbach (1668), pastor at Erfurt (1676), superintendent at Zwickau (1679), and then as senior preacher in the west Prussian city of Danzig. In 1667 he was made doctor and professor of theology at his alma mater, and he remained there until his death, July 11, 1718. He wrote many theological dissertations, of but little value in our day.

Löschner, Valentin Ernst, a distinguished German theologian, was born at Sondershausen in 1763. He studied at the universities of Wittenberg (where his father, Caspar Löschner, was a professor) and Jena, and then went on a peripatetic career. After traveling through the Netherlands and Denmark, and the cities Hamburg and Rostock, in the last-named place he connected himself with the anti-Vietist party, but after his return he devoted himself to historical studies, and the publication of his works on theology and exegesis, morals, etc. In 1698 he was appointed superintendent by the duke of Weissenfels, and, some time after, began, in connection with some friends, the publication of the first theological periodical in Germany, the Unschuldige Nachrichten von allem u. neuem theolog. Sachen (20 vols. to 1720) founded by Henry Busch and continued until 1781. This became the organ of the orthodox party in Saxony, as opposed to the Pietists and indifferentists prevailing at the time. His sphere of influence was afterwards enlarged, first as superintendent of Delitzsch, and, later (1792), as professor in the University of Witteberg. In 1704 he was appointed superintendent of Dresden and member of the supreme consistorial court. In this position his activity was soon manifested in the improved facilities for religious and secular instruction. Besides establishing several parishes and churches, he laid the foundation of a seminary for ministers; at the same time he zealously instructed candidates for the ministry, preached both on Sundays and week-days, besides carrying on an extensive correspondence with the princes, states, and pastors who held fast to the orthodox faith, and opposing the innovators of doctrine and indifferentism. He died Feb. 12, 1741. Löschner left a collection of his letters forming five volumes folio, which are preserved in the library in Hamburgh. His principal works are Historia mortuorum (part 1, 1707; pt. iii, 1725); — Die Reformationsente, — Timgoths Verisme (1718). Loshtiel, George Horatio, a bishop of the Moravian Church, was born at New London, Ct., as a teacher, but ordinated as a deacon in 1822, and as an elder in 1825. He was born Nov. 7, 1740, at Angermünde, in Courland, where his father had charge of a Lutheran parish. In early life he joined the Moravians, and studied both theology and medicine at their college at Barby, in Germany. After practicing medicine for some time, he devoted himself wholly to the ministry, in Holland, Germany, and Livonia. In 1802 he was consecrated a bishop, and came to the United States in order to fill the office of president of the provincial board which governs the Moravian churches in this country. Failing health and other circumstances constrained him to retire from this position in 1810. Two years later he was elected into the general board of the Church at Berthelsdorf, in Saxony; but the war with Great Britain and the state of his health prevented him from leaving America. He died Feb. 28, 1814, at Bethlehem, Pa. His two principal works are Geschichte d. Mission der Evang. Brüder unter den Indianern in N. A. (1789), translated into English by La Trobe, and published in London (1794), a standard on the Moravian missions among the Indians, with a full account of their manners and customs, based upon the reports of the missionaries, and Ensay de Haar auf dem Wege zur Erleuchtung (Religious Meditations for Every Day in the Year), a book which passed through eight editions (the last in 1848), and is still read with great profit by thousands of Christians in Germany. See De Schweinitz, Life and Times of David Zeisberger (Philadelphia, 1871, 8vo), p. 892 sqq. (E. de S.) Lössner, Christopher Friedrich, a German theologian, noted in the department of exegesis, was born at Leipzig in 1784, and was educated at the university of that place. He afterwards held a professorship in his alma mater. He died there in 1808. His chief work is Observations ad Novum Testamentum, et Philoem Alexandrinum (Leipzig, 1777, 8vo). In this work the force and meaning of words are particularly illustrated, together with points of antiquity, and the readings of Philo's text. Mönig has thrown much light upon these subjects, and the writings of Philo is admirably elucidated by Lössner. (Horne). Another valuable production of his is Observaciones in religiosas versiones Proverborum Salomonis Græce Aquila, Symmachii et Theodotii.

Loss (prop. some form of the verb לְשׁון, leshôn, but likewise a frequent rendering of several other Heb. and Gr. terms which usually imply an idea of dexterity). According to Moses Hess, whoever first brought up this verb, there could have been found any lost article (לְשׁון) was required to take it to his home, and then endeavor to discover the proper owner (Deut. xxii, 1-8). This would, of course, particularly apply to stray animals, and Josephus gives some special details with respect to money so found (see Irvine, 8, 29; compare the Mishna, Shekal. viii, 2). In case of the abstraction of property while in the possession of the finder, the latter had not only to make it good, but also to add one fifth of its value, and even to make a sin-offering likewise (Lev. vi, 3 sq.).

The Mishna makes many casuistic distinctions on this subject (Shab. 11, 1), especially with regard to property (Ve'edot, i. e. expiratia) the disinterested property.

LOOS, LEOVIN HOMRI, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Augusta, N. Y., July 1, 1808, and was educated at Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y. (class of 1828). In 1829 he was licensed and ordained by Onedia Presbytery, and installed pastor of the Church in Camden, Orange County, N. Y. Afterward served in Elyria, Ohio; in Rockford and Chicago, Ill.; and in Joliet and Marshalltown, Iowa. He was a syndical missionary three years to the synod of Peoria, Ill.; also prominent in bringing into existence institutions of learning, as Beloit College and Rockford Female Seminary, Ill. He died July 10, 1865. Mr. Loss was an eminently successful preacher, erecting many churches, and especially prominent in the Sabbath-school cause. He always had the fullest confidence of the men of the world; they recognised his worth as a man and a Christian. See Wilson, Prep. Hist. Amer. 1866, p. 217. (J. L. S.)

LÖSCH, CASPAR FRIEDRICH, a German theologian, was born at Erfurt Jan. 5, 1753, and was educated at the university of that place, which he entered in 1770. Dissatisfied with the innovations which Bharat undertook in theology, he removed in 1778 to the University of Jena, and again, not quite satisfied with the rationalistic innovations of the day, he was obliged to acquire the greater part of his learning by private study, in 1774 he became school-teacher at his native place; in 1781 dean of Andreas Church, and in 1785 dean to the Prediger Church of the same place. He died March 50, 1817. Lossius was a man of great learning; the literature of the Reformation was almost his daily study. Having seen the danger which threatened his country, both religiously and morally, from the rationalistic innovations, and from the consequences of the French Revolution, he dedicated most of his works to the cause of the fathers of the Reformation. Some of his productions passed through several editions in a short time. Some were even translated into French, and rescued thousands from moral degradation and spiritual destruction. A complete list of his works is given by Döring, Geschichte Theol. Deutschl. vol. ii, s. v.

Lost Tribes. See Captivity; Israel.

Lot (properly בֵּית meaning בַּיִת, goral, eliphig, literally a pebble, used anciently for balloting; other terms occasionally thus rendered are בַּיִת, a portion, Deut. xxxiii, 9; 1 Chron. xvii, 18; Psalm cvi, 11, referring to an inheritance; and לָוֹד, לָוָד, by lot, Luke i, 9; John xii, 24, strictly a small stone, as used in casting lots (Lev. xi, 8; Num. xxxiii, 54; Josh. xiv, 1; Ezek. xxix, 6; Josh. i, 7), hence also a method used to determine chances or preferences, or decide to make a decision. The decision by lot was often resorted to among the Hebrews, but always with the strictest reference to the interposition of God. As to the precise manner of casting lots, we have no certain information; but several modes were probably in use. In Prov. xvi, 33 we read that "the lot, i.e. a pebble, is cast into the lap," properly into the bosom of an urn or vase. It does not appear that the lap or bosom of a garment worn by a person was ever used to receive lots.

The ancient nation of Israel was very general (see Dake, Orac. ed. c. 14; Potter, Greek and Hebr. 1, 780; Adams, Rom. Ant. 1, 540 sq.; Smith, Dict. of Class. Ant. a. v. Sors) and highly esteemed (Xenoph. Cyrop. i, 6, 46), as is natural in simple stages of society (Tact. Germ. 19), recommending itself as a sort of appeal to the Almighty secure from all influence of passion or bias, and a sort of divination employed even by the gods themselves (Homer, Iliad, xxii, 309; Cicero, De Div. i, 34; ii, 41). The word sortes is thus used for an oracular response (Cicero, De Divina, ii, 56). So there was a mode of divination among the ancients by means of arrows poisoned but and one without mark, πάντομοι (Herr. iv, 12; Ezek. xxii, 21; Mauritius, De Sortitio, c. 14, § 4; see also Esth. iii, 7; ix, 24-32; Mishna, Taanith, ii, 10). See DIVINATION. Among heathen instances the following additional may be cited: 1. Choice of a champion, or of priority in combat (II. Ill. vii, 171; Herod. vii, 171; ib. ii, 15); 2. Decision of fate in battle (I. xx, 209); 3. Appointment of magistrates, jurymen, or other functionaries (Aristot. Pol. iv, 16; Schol. On Aristot. Phys. 277; Herod. vii, 190; Xenoph. Cyrop. iv, 5, 56; Demosth. c. Aristog. i, 778, 1; comp. Smith, Dict. of Class. Ant. a. v. Diosc.)

4. Priests (Koch. in Tim. p. 188, Bkck.). 5. A German practice of deciding by marks on twigs, mentioned by Tacitus (Germ. 10); 6. Division of conquered or colonized land (Thucydides, iii, 50; Plutarch, Pericles, 94; Bück, Public Econ. of Ath. ii, 170).

The Israelites sometimes had recourse to lots as a method of assembling the divine will (Prov. xxvi, 5), and generally in cases of doubt for which God reserved no other remedy (Esth. iii, 7; compare Rosenmüller, Morgenl. 801), especially the following: (a) In matters of partition or distribution, e. g., the location of the several tribes in Palestine (Num. xxvi, 56 sq.; xxxiii, 54; xxxiv, 18; xxxv, 21; Josh. xvii, 5 sq.; xxx, 6 sq.; xix, 5), the assignment of the Levitical cities (Josh. xxii, 4 sq.), and, after the return from the exile, the settlement in the homesteads at the capital (Neh. xii, 1; compare 1 Macc. iii, 36). Prisoners of war were also disposed of by lot (Joel iii, 5; Nah. iii, 10; Obad. 11; compare Matt. xxvii, 35; John xiv, 24; compare Xenoph. Cyrop. iv, 5, 55). (b) In criminal investigations where doubt existed as to the real culprit (Josh. vii, 14; 1 Sam. xiv, 42). A notion prevailed among the Jews that this detection was performed by observing the shining of the stones in the high-priest's breastplate (Mauritius, c. 21, § 4). The instance of the mariners casting lots to ascertain by the surrendering of what the opponent the sea could be appealed (Jonah i, 7), is analogous; but it is not clear, from Prov. xviii, 18, that lots were resorted to for the determination of civil disputes. (c) In the election to an important office or an undertaking for which several persons might be supposed to have claims (1 Sam. x, 19; Acts i, 26; comp. Herod. iii, 128; Justin. xiii, 4; Cicero, Ferr. i, 2, 51; Aristot. Pol. i, 14, 16) as well as in the assignment of official duties among associates having a common right ( Neh. x, 54), as of the priests in the Temple. Among the sixteen of the family of Eleazar and the eight of that of Ithamar (1 Chron. xxvii, 3, 5, 19; Luke i, 9), also of the Levites for similar purposes (1 Chron. xxiii, 28; xxiv, 20-31; xxv, 6; xxxv, 17; Mishna, Tumid. 1, 2; iii, 1; iv, 2; Joma, i, 5, 6; Shabbat, xxxii, 2; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebbr. in Luke i, 8, 9, vol. ii, p. 489). (2) In military enterprises (Judg. xx, 10; compare Val. Max. i, 5, 3). In the sacred ritual of the Hebrews we find the use of lots but once prescribed, namely, in the selection of the scapegoat (Lev. xvi, 8 sq.). The two inscribed tablets of boxwood, afterwards of gold, were put into an urn, which was shaken, and the lots drawn out (Joma, iii, 9, 4, 1). See Aaron, David, Dav. ov. Eventually came into frequent usage (comp. the Mishna, Shabbat, xxxii, 2). In later times they even degenerated into a game of hazard, of which human life was the stake (Josephus, Wars, iii, 7). Dice appear to have usually been employed for the lot (רַעַשׁ כְּלָו, to throw the die), Josh. xvi, 8; so מַעַסִּים, to cast, Josh. xviii, 6; Êdymon, to give, Acts i, 26; 42, Êdymon, to fall, John i, 7; Ezek. xxiv, 7; Acts i, 20), and were sometimes drawn from a vessel (יַעַשׁ כְּלָו, the lot come forth), Num. xxxii, 19.

54:1 so ⼒y, to "come up," Lev. vii, 9; comp. the Mishna, Joma, iv. 1). A different kind of lot is elsewhere indicated in the Mishna (Joma, ii, 1; comp. Lightfoot, Hor.
Hebr., p. 714). A sacred species of lot was by means of the URIM and THUMMIM (q. v.) of the high-priest (Numb. xxvii, 21: 1 Sam. xxviii, 6), which appears to have had some connection with the divination by means of the sacred vessel EPHOD (1 Sam. xxiii, 6, 9). Stones were occasionally employed in prophetic or emblematic lots (Numb. xvii, 6 sq.; Zech. xi, 10, 14). See also Purim. Election by lot appears to have prevailed in the Christian Church as late as the 7th century (Bingham, Eccles. Antiq. iv, 1, 1, vol. i, p. 428; Bruns, Conc. ii, 66). Here also we may notice the use of words heard, or passages chosen at random from Scripture. Sortes Biblici, like the Sortes Virgiliane, prevailed among Jews, as they have also among Christians, though denounced by several councils (Johnson, "Life of Cowley, Works, ix, 8; Bingham, Ecc. Antiq. xvi, 6, 5; id., vi, 33 sq.; Bruns, Conc. ii, 145-154, 166; Mauritianus, c.15; Hofmann, Lex. s. v. Sortes).

The term "lot" is also used for that which falls to one by lot, especially a portion or inheritance (Josh. xv; 1 Judg. 3; Psa. cxxxv, 8; Is. xxvii, 14; lvi, 6; Acts, xii, 21). Lot is also used metaphorically for portion, or destiny, as assigned to men from God (Psa. xvi, 5): "And arise to thy lot in the end of days" in the Messiah's kingdom (Dan. xii, 18; comp. Rev. xx, 6). See Heritage.

of Abraham (Gen. xi, 27). His sisters were Milcah, the wife of Nahor, and Iscach, by some identified with Sarah.

In the genealogy of the covenant people, we find the word itself occurs in the following several instances:

By the early death of his father (Gen. xi, 29), he was left in charge of his grandfather Terah, with whom he migrated to Haran, B.C. 2089 (Gen. xi, 31), and the latter dying there, he had already come into possession of his property when he accompanied Abraham into the land of Canaan, B.C. 2086 (Gen. xii, 5), and thence into Egypt, B.C. 2087 (Gen. xii, 10), and back again, by the way of the Philistines, B.C. 2086 (Gen. xx, 1), to the southern part of Canaan again, B.C. 2085 (Gen. xiii, 1).
Their united substance, consisting chiefly in cattle, was not too large to prevent them living together in one encampment.
Eventually, however, their possessions were so greatly increased that they were obliged to separate, and Abraham, with rare generosity, conceded the choice of pasture-grounds to his nephew. Lot availed himself of this liberality of his uncle, as he deemed most for his own advantage, by fixing his abode at Sodom, that his flocks might pasture in and around that fertile and well-watered neighborhood (Gen. xiii, 5-18).
He had soon very great reason to regret this choice; for, although his flocks fed well, his soul was starved in that waste place, the inhabitants of which were sinners before the Lord exceedingly. There he vexed his righteous soul from day to day with the filthy conversation of the wicked (2 Pet. ii, 7).

Not many years after his separation from Abraham (B.C. 2085), he had carried away a number of persons by Chedorlamor, along with the other inhabitants of Sodom, and was rescued and brought back by Abraham (Gen. xiv.), as related under other heads. See ABRAHAM; CHEDORlamor. This exploit procured for Abraham much cebrity in Canaan; and it ought to have procured for Lot respect and gratitude from the people of Sodom, who had been delivered from hard slavery and restored to their homes on account. But this does not appear to have been the result.

At length (B.C. 2064) the guilt of the "cities of the plain" brought down the signal judgments of heaven (Gen. xix, 1-29). Lot is still living in Sodom (Gen. xix), a well-known resident, with wife, sons, and daughters—married and marriageable. The rabbinical tradition is that he was actually "judge" of Sodom, and sat in the gate in that capacity. (See quotations in Otho, Lex. Rabbin, s. v. Lot and Sodomah.) But in the midst of the licentious corruption of Sodom—the eating and drinking, the buying and selling, the planting and building (Luke xvii, 28), and of the darker evils exposed in the ancient narrative—he still preserves some of the delightful characteristics of his wandering life, his fervent and chivalrous hospitality (xix, 2, 8), the unleavened bread of the tent of the wilderness (ver. 8), the water for the feet of the wayfarers (ver. 2), affording his guests a reception identical with that with which they had experienced that very morning in Abraham's tent on the heights of Hebron (comp. xvii, 8, 6). It is this hospitality which receives the commendation of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews in words that have passed into a familiar proverb, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares" (Heb. xiii, 2). On the other hand, it is his deliverance from the guilty and condemned city—the one just man in that mob of sensual, lawless wretches—which points the allusion of St. Peter, to "the godly delivered out of temptations, the unjust reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished, an example to those that afterwards should live ungodly" (2 Pet. ii, 6-9).

The avenging angels, after having been entertained by Abraham, repaired to Sodom, where they were received and entertained by Lot, who was sitting in the gate of the town when they arrived. While they were at sup-der the sumptuous banquet, a number of angels were demanded that the strangers should be upfolded to them, for the unnatural purposes which have given a name of infamy to Sodom in all generations. Lot resisted this demand, and was loaded with abuse by the vile fellows outside on that account. They had nearly forced the door, when the angels, thus awfully by their own experince convinced of the righteousness of the doom they came to execute, smote them with instant blindness, by which their attempts were rendered abortive, and they were constrained to disperse. Towards morning the angels apprised Lot of the doom which hung over the place, and urged him to hasten thence with his family.
He was afraid to extend the b)00k to the salvation of the families of his daughters who had married in Sodom; but the warning was received by those families with incredulity and insulL and he therefore left Sodom accompanied only by his wife and two daughters. As they went, being hastened by the angels, the wife, anxious for those who had been left behind, or reluctant to remove from the place which had long been her home, and where much valuable property was nec-cessarily left behind, lingered behind the rest, and was suddenly involved in the destruction by which—sham-med and stifled as she stood by sable incrustations—she became "a pillar of salt" (Gen. xix. 1, 20). This narrative has often been regarded as one of the "difficulties" of the Bible. But it surely need not be so. Even under the above extreme view of the suddenness of the event, the circumstances appear to be all sufficiently accounted for. In the sacred record the words are simply these: "His wife looked back from behind him, and became a pillar of salt;" words which neither in themsoever in their position in the narrative afford any serious difficulty, even without the supposition of a miracle. It is not taken with the same one of the fleeting forms which the perishable rock of the south end of the Dead Sea is constantly assuming in its process of de-The first allusion of this kind is perhaps that in Wis. x, 7, where "a standing pillar of salt, the monument (pietatis) of an unbelieving soul," is mentioned with the "waste land that smotheth," and the "plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness," as remaining to that day, a testimony to the wickedness of Sodom.
This notion was regarded by the Roman Catholics as scripturally authentic that might not be dispelled. See the quotations from the fathers and others in Hofmann's Lexicon (s. v. Lot); and in Mislain, Lieux Saints (iii. 224).
Josephus also (Ant. i. 11, 4) says that he had seen it, and that it was then remaining. So, too, do Clemens Romanus (Adv. Haer. i. 11) and Ireneaus (iv. 51, 64). So does Benjamin of Tudela (there is a reference to a usual usualliter (ed. Asher, i. 72). Rabbi Petachia, the other hand, looked for it, "but did not see it; it no longer exists" (ed. Benisch, p. 61). The same statement is to be found in travellers of every age, certainly of our own times (see Maundrell, March 30). The origin of these traditions relative to this pillar has lately been satisfactorily explained by the discovery by the American party under Liest Lynch of an actual column standing still on the south-western shore of the Dead Sea, at a place retained with that of the name of Sodom in the form of Usdom, of which he gives a pictorial sketch, describing it as a round pillar, about forty feet high, on a lofty pedestal, standing detached from the general mass of the mountain, of solid salt, slightly decreasingsizeupwards, and capped with carbonate of lime; but, although himself a Catholic, he admits, with scientific caution, that it is merely the result of the ac-ction of the winter rains upon the rock-salt hills, which the cap of limestone has here protected, leaving the sur-rrounding parts to wash away, till a column has thus gradually been carved out. (Nurritur fit Bj regionem, p.
307, 308.) Prof. Palmer also visited this singular object, called by the Arabs Bint Shelit Lot, or "Lot's [daughter] wife." He describes and gives a view of it as "a tall isolated needle of rock, which really does bear a curious resemblance to an Arab woman with a child upon her shoulder. The Arab legend of Lot's wife differs from the Bible account only in the addition of a few frivolous details. They say that there were seven cities of the plain, and that they were all miraculously overwhelmed by the Dead Sea as a punishment for their crimes. The prophecy Lot and his family alone escaped the general destruction. He was divided among to take all that he had and fee estate, a strict injunction being given that they should not look behind them. Lot's wife, who had on previous occasions ridiculed her husband's prophetic office, disobeyed the command, and, turning to gaze upon the scene of the disaster, was changed into this pillar of rock." (Desert of the Exodus. [Harper's], p.

396 sq.) The expression of our Lord, "Remember Lot's wife" (Luke xvii, 28), appears from the context to be solely intended as an illustration of the danger of going back or delaying in the day of God's judgments. From this text, indeed, it would appear as if Lot's wife had gone back or had tarried so long behind in the desire of saving some of their property. Then, as it would seem, she was struck dead, and became a stiffened corpse, fixed for the time to the soil by saline or bituminous incrustations. The particle of similitude must here, as in many other passages of Scripture, be understood, "like a pillar of salt." See Nagel, Der culpa uzoriz Lotis (Albdorf, 1755); Distel, Die salute zeoriz Lotihi (Ald. 1721);

Lot and his daughters meanwhile had hastened on to Zoar (q. v.), the smallest of the five cities of the plain, which had been spared on purpose to afford him a refuuge; but, being fearful, after what had passed, to remain among a people so corrupted, he soon retired to a cavern in the neighboring mountains, and there abode (Gen. xii, 21). After some stay in this place, the daughters of Lot became apprehensive lest the family of their father should be lost for want of descendants, which than no greater calamity was known or approhended in those times; and in the belief that, after what had passed in Sodom, there was no hope of their obtaining suitable husbands, they, by a contrivance which has in it the taint of Sodom, in which they were brought up, made their father drunk with wine, and in that state seduced him into an act which, as they well knew, was a hopeless business, because he had been most abhorrent to him. They thus became the mothers, and he the father, of two sons, named Moab and Ammon, from whom sprung the Moabites and Ammonites, so often mentioned in the Hebrew history (Gen. xxii. 31-88). With respect to Lot's daughters, whom it is impossible to say anything intentionally in them. He admits that the incest was a horrid crime, except under the unavoidable necessity which apparently rendered it the only means of preserving the human race; and this justifying necessity he holds to have existed in their minds, as they appear to have believed that all the inhabitants of the land had been destroyed except their father and themselves. But it is incredible that they could have entertained any such belief. The city of Zoar had been spared, and they had been there. The wine also with which they made their father drunk must have been procured from men, as we cannot suppose they had brought it with them from Sodom. The fact would therefore seem to be that, after the fate of their sisters, who had married men of Sodom and perished with them, they became alive to the danger and improavity of marriage; and, as the only remains of the nation of the land, and of the importance of preserving the family connection. The force of this consideration was afterwards seen in Abraham's sending to the seat of his family in Mesopotamia for a wife to Isaac. But Lot's daughters could not go there to seek husbands; and the only branch of their own family within many hundred miles was that of Abraham, whose only son, Ishmael, was then a child. This, therefore, must have appeared to them the only practicable mode in which the house of their father could be preserved. Their making their father drunk, and their solicitous concealment of what they did from him, show that they despised of persuading him to an act which, under any circumstances, and with every possible extenuation, must have been very distressing to so good a man. That he was a good man is evinced by his de-leverance from among the guilty, and is affirmed by an apostle (2 Pet. ii. 7); his preservation alluded to by our Saviour (Luke xvii. 18, etc.); and in Deut. ii. 9, 19, and Psa. lxxxiii, 9, his name is honorably used to designate the Moabites and Ammonites, his descendants. This account of the origin of the nations of Moab and Ammonites is certainly true. It has been treated as a Hebrew legend which owed its origin to the bitter hatred existing from the earliest to the latest times between the "children of Lot" and the children of Israel. The horrible nature of the transaction—not the result of impulse or passion, but a plan calculated and carried out, and that not once, but twice, would prompt the wish that the legendary theory were true. But even the most destructive critics (as, for instance, Tuch) allow that the narrative is a continuation without a break of that which proceeds it, while they fail to point out any marked change in the language in the transition; and it cannot be questioned that the writer records it as a historical fact. Even if the legendary theory were admissible, there is no doubt of the fact that Amnon and Moab sprang from Lot. It is affirmed in the statements of Deut. ii. 9 and 19, as well as in the later document of Psa. lxxxiii. 8, which Ezekiel in the prophetic word when Nehemiah and his newly-returned colony were suffering from the attacks and obstructions of Tobiah the Amonite and Sanballat the Horonite (Ewald, Dichter, Psa. lxxxiii). The circumstances are the last which the Scripture records of the history of Lot, and the time and place of his death are unknown. A traditional respect has been shown to his memory (also that of his wife, who is called Edith, המגש [one of his daughters being called Santa Cruz of Granada. In 1529 he was, on account of his great reputation, transferred to the convent of St. Gregory at Valledeld, where he attracted much attention by his preaching. He was afterwards recalled to Granada, to reform the convent of Scala Celli, in the Sierra de Cordova. In the solitude of this convent he composed a number of religious works. He next went to Cordova as preacher, and became acquainted with John of Avila (q.v.), who acquired great influence over him. After spending eight years in Cordova, Louis went to Badajoz, where he founded a convent, of which he was the first abbot. Cardinal Henry, infant of Spain and archbishop of Eborac, desiring to avail himself of Louis' charity, invited him to his native city. The crown of Portugal vainly offered to make him bishop of Viseu, and afterwards metropolitan of Braga; he accepted no office whatever, except that of provincial of his order in Portugal, which he held for some years. He finally retired into the convent of Santa Domingo of Lisbon, and devoted the remainder of his life to pastoral duties and to writing religious works. He died Dec. 81, 1588. His works, a large number of which were translated into French, Italian, and German, are very numerous; among them the most important are: Memoria de la vida Christiense (Lisbon, 1586, 2 vols. 8vo); Sacrificia, 1584, fol.; — Simbolo de la Fe (Salamanca, 1892, 2 vols. 8vo, printed and translated); — Guida de Pescadores (Salamanca, 1570, 8vo); — Diccionario de la doctrina Christiana (Lisbon, 1864, Madrid 1586, 4to); — Institucio y regla de bien vivir para los que empecepor a servir a Dios (Barcelona, 1602, 2 vols. 8vo); — Louis (feel the necessity of the imperial possessions. Bernard's ambition soared higher. He was not content with Italy; he desired the mastery over the whole of the imperial lands, and ungratefully conspired against his uncle. He was unsuccessful; however, was seduced by the imperial troops, and condemned to death. Louis was very much inclined to marry and have posterity, but state interests compelled him to inflict the severe punishment of depriving his nephew of eyesight, which was the cause shortly after, no doubt, of his death. This conspiracy, as well as sundry other occurrences, made the despotism of the emperor more absolute, and, finally deciding in favor of the principle of primogeniture, his son Lothaire was appointed successor. Besides Lothaire, Louis had two sons, Pepin and Louis. To the former of these two he gave Aquitania; to the latter Bavaria, Bohemia, and Carinthia. Unfortunately, however, for the peace of the family, Louis lost his faithful companion, the mother of these children, shortly after this partition of his possessions, and, marrying a second wife, became the father of a fourth son, Charles, whose mother, Judith, conspired in his behalf for a portion of the imperial crown. This resulted in 830 in a revolt of Lothaire against his father, on the plea of the bad conduct of the step-mother. At a diet, however, which was held at Aix-la-Chapelle, the father and son were reconciled. Not so happily ended a second revolt in 833, when Louis, forsaken by his followers, was condemned to death. He was obliged to make a treaty by which he committed himself up to the age of 30 to marry him as prisoner to Soissons, sent the empress Judith to Torgo, and confined her infant son Charles, afterwards Charles the Bald, the object of the jealousy of his half-brothers, in a monastery. A meeting of bishops was held at Cuesnet, at which the archbishop of Rheims presided, and the unfortunate Louis being arraigned before it, was found guilty of the murder of his nephew Bernard, and of sundry other offences. He was deposed, condemned to do public penance in sackcloth, and was kept in confinement. This misusage of the emperor enraged the youngest of the sons of Bavaria (840–576), an enigmatic prince, of lofty stature and noble figure, with a fiery eye and a penetrating mind, and, after securing the assistance of his other brother, Pepin, in the following year, he obliged Lothaire to deliver up their father, who, after having been formally absolved by the bishop, regained his throne. Not made wiser by past experience, Louis, listening to the selfish counsel of his wife, Judith, now assigned to his fourth son, Charles, the kingdom of Neustria, or Eastern France, including Paris, and, after Pepin's death, Aquitania also. Charles was a man of courage. The emperor Louis marched against him, and quelled the rebellion in a diet at Worms to judge his rebellious son. Mean-father in his train, he halted at Complagne, and summoned a council of his prelates to accomplish the work from which he dared not proceed. With unbounded willingness they undertook the onerous task, declaring their competency through the power to bind and to loose conferred upon their order as the vicars of Christ and the turnkeys of heaven. They held the wretched young prisoner, who was held for ransom (415), in a dungeon, and榜&neander (Ch. Hist. iii. 851), "gave many opportunities for the Church to interfere in the political strifes," and for it the Church had been anxiously but patiently in waiting. With the coronation of Charlemagne the pope of Rome, and his bishops, had to the East toward the West, and thus, by his action, had not only conferred a most doubtful title on Charlemagne, but secured, at the same time a political ascendency of the papacy. Under Charlemagne, however, the thunders of the Church were controlled by the emperor; but in Louis the Plout was found a willing slave, and with rapid strides the Romish Church marched onward to establish its superiority over the Empire. See PAPACY.

What Louis would do for the Church was clearly seen in his submissive acts—the master of Europe in 822 a penitent before the prelates assembled at the Council of Attigny. Here the triumphs of the spiritual power, under the spices of a rapid progress toward domination, were plainly foreshadowed. The hierarchy failed not to discover the hour of Louis' weakness, and day by day new laws were proposed and enacted, the ecclesiastical fabric undermined, the power of the secular authority enfeebled and abrogated. Prominent among the ecclesiastics who influenced the king to favor the Church and her institutions was Walz, abbot of Corbie. What Walz (q.v.) advised was worthy of adoption, and he had no sooner made his proposals than they became law. Thus the growing power of the Church over the kingdom, the decay of royal power, and the separation of Church and State, were accelerated by the policy which the king, and the bishops concerning themselves only about the affairs which belonged to their respective callings." Unfortunately, however, the concessions which the king was daily making to the clergy gave to them a spirit of much of the business strictly belonging to the secular authority, and "the scope and the danger of the authority thus successively conferred upon the Church were most impressively manifested when Louis was deposed by his sons (in 833), . . . and Lothaire determined to remove the restoration of his father to the throne. . . . The people had been invited by Louis himself, eleven years before, at Attigny, to see the bishops sit in judgment on their monarch; and the decretales (q. v.) of Siricus and Leo I, forbidding secular employment and the bearing of arms by any one who had undertaken ecclesiastical functions, were forgotten but that they might be revived. Accordingly, when Lothaire returned to France, dragging his captive Louis VI, of France, called "Le Jeune," son of Louis le Gros, was born in 1119, and succeeded his father in 1137. By nature of a cruel disposition, he had been especially harsh towards disobedient subjects, and, under the pretense that he must aid the Church to atone for a sin, he was admitted to be a German abbott of Clairvaux, to go on a crusade. Accordingly, the king set out, at the head of a large army, in 1147. Sieger and Raoul, count of Vermandois, Louis's brother-in-law, were left regents of the kingdom. This second crusade proved unsuccessful: the Christians were defeated near Damascus, and Louis, after several narrow escapes, returned to France in 1149. The repudiation of his first wife, Eleanor of Aquitaine, and his marriage with Constance of Castile, brought on a war with Henry II of England, who had taken Eleanor for his wife. The war was, however, unimportant in its consequences. In Henry's controversy with Thomas à Becket, Louis VII greatly furthered the cause of Becket (comp. Roberton, Becket [London, 1859, sm. 8vo], p. 211 sq., 295). He died at Paris in September, 1180. Louis IX (of St. Louis) of France (1226-1270), was born in Poissy April 23, 1215, and succeeded his father, Louis VIII, when but twelve years of age, his mother, Blanche de Castile, acting as regent. During the minority of the king there was a constant struggle between the crown and the feudal lords, headed by Thibaut, count of Champagne, and the count of Brittany. Amid these troubles queen Blanche displayed great firmness and ability, and Louis, as soon as he was old enough, by the assistance of those who had remained faithful to the crown, made war against Henry III, king of England, who had supported the French prelates, and beat the English in 1242 at Taillebourg, at Saintes, and at Blaye, but finally made a truce of five years with the English sovereigns, at the same time par- doning also his rebellious nobles. During an illness Louis had made a vow to visit the Holy Land, and in June, 1248, after having appointed his mother to go for him out for the East with an army of 40,000 men, to conquer the Holy Sepulchre. He landed first in Egypt and took Damietta, but was made prisoner at the battle of Mansoura, and compelled to pay a heavy ransom. He then sailed, with his remaining army, and landed at Acre, 600 strong, to Acre, and carried on the war in Palestine, but without success. After the death of his mother (Nov., 1252), he made preparations for his return to France. At home in 1254, he now applied himself with great diligence to the interests of his realm. It was Louis IX of France that first gave life to Gallicism by his "Pragmatic Sanction," which he enacted in 1268. See GALLICAN CHURCH. He also published several useful statutes, known as the Etatements de St. Louis; established a police in Paris, under the orders of a prévôt; organized the various truces into companies called contraintes; founded the theological college of La Sorbonne, so called after his confessor; created a French navy, and made an advantageous treaty with the king of Aragon, by which the respective limits and jurisdictions of the two states were defined. The chief and almost the only fault of Louis, which was, however, of his age, was his religious intolerance; he issued oppressive ordinances against the Jews, had a horror of heretics, and used to say "that a layman ought not to dispute with the unbelievers, but strike them with a good sword in the body." By an edict of 1263, he excluded from his Christian subjects the third of the debts they owed to Jews, and this "for the good of his soul." This same spirit of fanaticism led him (in July, 1270) to undertake, against the wishes of his best friends, another crusade—a crusade the most ignoble, and not the least calamitous of all the crusades (q. v.). He was sent for Africa, laid siege to Tunis, and, while there, died in his camp of the plague, Aug. 25, 1270. Pope Boniface VIII canonized him in 1297. Louis XIV of France, grandson of Henry IV, and third son of Louis XIII, was born in February 1638, the regency of his mother, Anne of Austria, controlled by cardinal Mazarin (q. v.), continued during the minority of the sovereign. So far, indeed, as the policy of Mazarin was concerned, it prevailed until his death in 1661, when Louis first really assumed for himself the reins of government, and indicated the principles of his administration. During the minority of its youthful sovereign the country had been distracted by civil wars, those of the Fronde, partly through Spanish influences, partly through an unsatisfied and fractious element of the French nobility. Perplexing difficulties, moreover, and even actual conflicts of the regent and her minister with the Parliament and States General, had more than once arisen, usually terminating, however, in the triumph of the former. Louis himself, in his eighteen years, disposing of these bodies, and forbidding any future exercise of some of its most important functions. The internal difficulties, so far as due to the hostile policy of the Spanish court, were disposed of by the marriage of Louis with the infanta Maria Theresa in 1660, through the skilful management of Mazarrin. The effect of these troubles, however, was to shape, to some degree, the policy of Louis, and to enable him to carry it out successfully. That policy was to avoid all conflict of authority by centring all power in the person of the sovereign. The administration, extending over a period of great significance in the secular history and history of Europe, concerns us here in view of its principles and results religiously and ecclesiastically; for, while it may be said that one of the grand objects of this administration was to supersede Austria as the paramount power of Europe, it is not so much in the means, as in the end, in connection with the destruction and diminution of Protestantism, not only in France, but elsewhere. To enable us to consider his policy as it affected the religious condition of France and Europe, the cause of his civil and military administration must, however, be first examined.

Louis's civil policy—the consolidation of all power in the hands of the sovereign, detaching the crown from its alliance with all the legislative, judicial, and municipal institutions—he himself has best interpreted for us. By the rights which can befall any one of our rank, is his language to the dauphin, is to be reduced to that subject in which the monarch is obliged to receive the law from his people. . . . It is the will of God that every subject should yield to his sovereign implicit obedience. . . . I am the state! These assertions of supreme prerogative are put forth, indeed, in a connection with a recognition of accountability to the divine Source from which such powers are derived; but below him there was no accountability, no limitation to the action of his royal vicereign. Consistently with this throne and with the interests of his imperial administration, the first and most effective instrument for the carrying out of such policy was a thorough military organization. This was perfected to a degree hitherto unknown, among its new features the most effective to the end proposed being the emanation of all commissions, promotions, and distinctions from the king; doing away altogether with the possibility of the existence of such a balance of power as had previously been maintained, and rendering impossible all limitation of prerogative. The States General—the great central legislative representation of the clergy, nobles, and commons—was reduced almost to a provincial state, having a more limited function of the same nature, shared the same fate. The Parlement, from registering, protecting, and partly legislative bodies, became simply judicial tribunals to execute, under the forms of law, the decrees of a royal master. That in the thorough working out of this system Louis exhibited rare administrative ability cannot be denied. That he possessed the peculiar capacity of selecting efficient subordinates is no less manifest. That, moreover, under his rule there was a great evolution of administrative machinery, and literary capacity, is equally undisputed. Not so salutary or favorable were the results, however. Louis's policy eventually broke down the resources of the country; and it set in operation certain tendencies, which only worked themselves out in the crash of the French Revolution.

But this concentration of all power in the person of the sovereign had in view the carrying out of an external as well as an internal policy. "Self-aggrandizement," to use his own words, is "at once the noblest and most agreeable occupation of kings," and this he did not always pursue under the restraints of truth and right. "In dispensing with the strict observance of treaties, we do not," said he, "violate them; for the language of such instruments is not understood literally; it is conventional phraseology, just as we use complicated expressions in society." These two sentences are the text, of which the internal policy of Louis may be regarded as constituting the commentary. His reign, counting from the death of Mazarin, was characterized by four great wars, occupying altogether forty-two years, or seven ninths of its continuance. The first of these was his attack upon Spanish Flanders, and this in violation of the treaty of the Pyrenees, made at his marriage, by which all claim of inheritance, in right of his wife, to Spanish territory was solemnly renounced. Out of this contest, at first opposed, but afterwards (1670) by England, conducted for a long time varying in success, but, in the end, to the advantage of France, Louis, by the treaty of Nimeguen, 1678, came forth with the possession of a large addition of territory, a part of which was the duchy of Lorraine, and to which he afterwards added Strasburg, then a free German city—possessions of the sovereignty of Emperor Leopold which he stored to Germany by the war of 1670. Next, to provoke a war of nine or ten years' duration was his claim for his sister, the duchess of Orleans, to a portion of the Palatinate, enforced by an invasion of the territory in question. To repel this movement the emperor Leopold was for a time embarrassed, his people impoverished, and many of them suffering from actual starvation. But by far the greatest contest was provoked by Louis's claim for his family to the succession of the crown of Spain, for which there were three competitors—Louis, the emperor Leopold, and the elector of Bavaria. Through the interest of the pope and of the Spanish nobility, Louis had succeeded in procuring the succession for his grandson, the duke of Anjou. To this Holland, under threat of invasion, had been forced to accede; and William of England, unable to secure the interests of his administration, was forced to take the first and most effective instrument for the carrying out of such policy was a thorough military organization. This was perfected to a degree hitherto unknown, among its new features the most effective to the end proposed being the emanation of all commissions, promotions, and distinctions from the king; doing away altogether with the possibility of the existence of such a balance of power as had previously been maintained, and rendering impossible all limitation of prerogative. The States General—the great central legislative representation of the clergy, nobles, and commons—was reduced almost to a provincial state, having a more limited function of the same nature, shared the same fate. The Parlement, from registering, protecting, and partly legislative bodies, became simply judicial tribunals to execute, under the forms of law, the decrees of a royal master. That in the thorough working out of this system Louis exhibited rare administrative ability cannot be denied. That he possessed the peculiar capacity of selecting efficient subordinates is no less manifest. That, moreover, under his rule there was a great evolution of administrative machinery, and literary capacity, is equally undisputed. Not so salutary or favorable were the results, however. Louis's policy eventually broke down the resources of the country; and it set in operation certain tendencies, which only worked themselves out in the crash of the French Revolution.
trol all temporalities, and to fleece all classes of the benedict clergy without dividing the wool with the pope, was considered a great sin during the pontificate of Louis. His effort was to free the national Church from the control of the papacy; through his appointments, to make it subservient to his general policy. His treatment of the pope, especially in connection with the question of the privilege of the French ambassadors at Rome, was harsh and overbearing; and although compensated, in 1691, to yield in certain assertions of prerogative, it but slightly affected the exercise of his ecclesiastical supremacy. His bishops were, many of them, learned, able, and eloquent. There was a higher standard, both of literary talent and of the well-understood theory, than in regim preceding. Their writings constitute this period, in some respects, one of the most brilliant in the history of the Church of France. But these writings contain no vigorous protest against the vices and cruelties of their royal master, and many of them are implicated in the support of his most flagrant cruelties and acts of oppression. It was perfectly understood that no other course would be tolerated. His own account to Massillon of the effect produced upon him by his court preachers will enable us to understand the character of their presence in every equal capacity, than in the regim preceding. Their writings constitute this period, one of the most striking illustrations of this despotic policy in ecclesiastical and religious matters. In this context between Jesuitism and a purer form of Romanism, the pope, and, through the pope and the Jesuits, Louis, became a part. See J. Arnaud.

It is, however, in the course pursued towards his Protestant subjects that the policy of Louis may be recognized; that the ecclesiastical and religious history of his reign has an interest altogether unique and peculiar, namely, the position of the Huguenots and Dissenters, holding, under the law, certain legal privileges—among others, the exercise of freedom, not only of religious opinion, but of worship. The old-fashioned orthodox practice of extermination by fire and sword had been already tried, more than once, without success. At the close of the Thirty Years' War, France was at peace, and was more favorable to the Huguenots than any preceding arrangement; and, although containing in it some objectionable features, became to the Protestants the charter of their existence. They and the Catholics, under different codes of civil and religious laws, were alike under the law of the land—enjoyed its sanction, lived under its protection. Louis, whose great doctrine was uniformity and submission in all things, therefore proposed for himself the task, not of violating this great compact with his Protestant subjects, but of doing away with the necessity of its existence by bringing them all within the national Church. Urged forward in this attempt by his mistress, Madame de Maintenon, wholly under the control of the Jesuits, and by the latter themselves, on the plea that by such a course he would merit the forgiveness of heaven for the evil sins of his youth, especially his illicit connection with Madame de Montespan, two great agencies were immediately set in operation to the attainment of this result—those of bribery and intimidation. Conversions were sought by purchase, or by appeals to the interests or ambition of the parties concerned. The object was made for the purchase of such conversions by a fund collected of one third of the profits of all ecclesiastical benefices, and placed in the hands of a Huguenot renegade, to be used for this purpose. The matter went so far that there was a regular pool of priests in this service of denominations. Measures of this kind were not unaccompanied with success; grades, and large successions were published as the result of this mode of operation. To cut off the temptation of release, so as to insure the price of a second conversion, an edict was issued condemning all relapsed persons to banishment for life and confiscation of their property. With these efforts, moreover, which only reached the weak and worthless, was combined the other element of harassment and intimidation. Commissions of Romanish clergy were instituted, sometimes upon their own motion, sometimes upon popular complaints, and with the view of the king, in order to banish them. The object of these inquiries, in some cases, was to collect evidence and thus to increase the number of cases where the Holy Inquisition had to proceed. Detractors and the agents of the king, such as the bishops, were instructed to investigate the legal titles of churches of the Huguenots, which for the purpose had been called in question. One infelicitous in the position of the Protestants, even under the Edict of Nantes, was that which was connected with what may be called the Church territorial system. They were territorially the dependents of Romanish bishops, in the parishes limits of Romanish priests, in some indefinite manner regarded as in their pastoral charge, and these annoying questions of Church property could thus be easily started. The result, in many cases, was that titles were wrested away from the churches in my chapel, and I have been very well pleased with them; when I hear you, I am displeased with myself." But the unfavorable testimony of this one faithful witness, of at least one other not less faithful, Feneon, could not counteract the sluttery of so many others. The difficulty with the Jansenists constitutes, perhaps, one of the most striking illustrations of this despotic policy in ecclesiastical and religious matters. In this context between Jesuitism and a purer form of Romanism, the pope, and, through the pope and the Jesuits, Louis, became a part. See J. Arnaud.

As, however, these proved insufficient to the attainment of the desired end, and the law still guaranteed the legal existence of the as yet unconquered Protestants, more vigorous steps were taken prior to the final one in the direction of annoyance and severity. Without, therefore, revoking the existing law, it was subverted by new edicts of the most vexatious and harassing character. Many of these may be found detailed under the article HUGUENOTS.

There was, however, another form of operation in this effort of exterminating Protestantism by conversion. Human wickedness, in this effort, found out the way to commit a new crime. This new crime, unique and preeminent in the achievements of malicious ingenuity, had to be described by a new name, and the world thus heard for the first time of the Dragoman. Without, therefore, revoking the existing law, it was subverted by new edicts of the most vexatious and harassing character. Many of these may be found detailed under the article HUGUENOTS. The process was that of quartering soldiers—Romanists, of course, the bigotry of the Romanist being combined with the brutality of the soldier—in the families and houses of Protestants. The commanders were instructed to quarter as many Protestant families as possible in them there until the families were brought over to the Catholic faith, and then to transfer them to others of the same character and for the same object. As the army employed for this purpose was a large one, so whole districts at once were subjected to this intolerable annoyance and oppression. Multitudes, of course, yielded; and where they subsequently recanted their act of weakness, they became subject to banishment and confiscation. The suffering involved may be more easily imagined than described. The "dragoons," says one who passed through it, "fixed their cross to their musketeers, so as the more readily to compel their hosts to kiss them; and if the kiss was not given, they drove the crosses against their stomachs and faces. They had as little mercy for the children as for the adults, beating them with these crosses or with the flats of their swords, so violently as not seldom to maim them. The wretches also subjected the women to their barbarities: they whipped them, they disfigured them, they dragged them by the hair through the mud or along the stones. Sometimes they would seize the laborers on the highways, or who were returning home at night, and drive them to the Romanish churches, pricking them like oxen with their own goads to quicken their pace."

LOUVARD

If, in any case, these outrages were resisted, and there was anything like a Protestant gathering, the result was a massacre. The mere collection of such population, to indicate that they were not all carried over to the national Church, was thus treated. Upon the assumption, therefore, that these agencies, after having operated for four years, and accomplished the pretended pious purpose; that Protestantism, to any calculable degree, had ceased to exist, in 1685 the Edict of Nantes, as no longer of any use or necessity, was abrogated. To proclaim the falsehood and cruelty of this pretense, and the proceedings based upon it, they were followed by enactments of a character most mischievous. Louvard, see Lick.

Louvard, Francisc, a French Jansenistic theologian of the Benedictine order, was born in Champagne in 1661. In 1679, he was transferred to the convenut of St. Denis, near Paris, to devote himself to the study of the text of St. Gregory Nazianzen. In 1713 pope Clement XI published the memorable bull "Unigeniti a nobis concessa," in which he condemned a heretic, if such a one emigrated in 1665 as a Protestant, he was condemned to the galleys. If he did not, he was regarded as a Catholic, and at any subsequent period could be proceeded against for his Protestantism as a relapsed Catholic.

Within five months after his ordinance against Prot- estants just mentioned the career of Louis terminated. To use the language of another, "He was an infirm and aged man. He had survived his children and his grandchildren. He had been overwhelmed by the victories of Eugene and Marlborough. He was oppressed with debt. He was hated by the people who had idol- ized him, and was compelled to listen to the indig- nant invectives which the whole civilized world poured forth against his blind and inhuman persecutions. He died declaring to his spiritual advisers that, being him- self ignorant of ecclesiastical questions, he had relied upon their guidance and as their agent in all that he had done against either the Jansenists or the Protestant heretics, and on those his spiritual advisers he devolved the responsibility to the Supreme Judge." There can be no question that in many cases the persecuting policy of Louis was quickened by the influence of Madame de Maintenon and her ecclesiastical advisers; that in many cases his subordinate agents pursued courses of outrage and cruelty exceeding his intentions; that such men as Bossuet, Arnauld, Flechier, and the whole Gallican Church, in approving this policy, were actuated by it in its guilt and in its consequences; but, after all, it was essentially his policy. It was the carrying out in ecclesiastical the autocratic principle enunciated with reference to civil matters. The concentration of all power in the hands of the sovereign required that he should be not only the State, but the Church.

Louis dying Sept. 1, 1715, was succeeded by his great- grandson, Louis XV. His son the dauphin and his eldest grandson died at an earlier period. Some of his children, the fruit of adulterous connection with Madame de Montespan, were legally adopted during his lifetime, but the act was annulled after his death. In regard to other children from similar connections no such action was taken. After the death of his first wife he privately married Madame de Maintenon. The works of Louis are contained in six volumes. They are occupied with instructions for his sons, and with correspondence bearing upon the history of his times. His reign may be regarded as one of the most brilliant in the annals of French literature. In the department of theological and controversial literature this was peculiarly the case, while in that of public eloquence there was an array of talent and genius beyond parallel.

version, as this consequence of sin leads man to recognize the restoration of this disturbed relation to God as the one thing needful and indispensable. The love of God consequently proceeds in both cases on the assumption of the worth of man in the eye of God, and is a proof of it. Hence the anger of God, as manifested by these punishments, is but another form of his love. It is a reaction of rejected love, which manifests itself only in imparting suffering and pain on the one who rejects it, proving thereby that its rejection is not a matter of indifference to it. This love may not appear at first sight, but it is clearly revealed in God's conduct towards all mankind, as well towards the heathen as towards the chosen people, of God and the heart of man. In one way (Acts xiv, 17) he allows them to fall into all manner of evil (Rom. i, 21 sq.) in order to bring them to a sense of their misery and helplessness as well as of their guilt. But at the bottom of this anger there is still love, and this is clearly shown in the fact that he manifested himself to them in their conscience, and also took care of them (Acts xiv, 17; xvii, 25 sq.). But, if this love is thus evinced towards the heathen, it is still more clearly manifested towards the chosen people, the fact of their choice being itself a manifestation of that love which is the unchanging inconstancy of God, the blessings and punishments, the anger and the mercy, of which they were the objects. Holiness and mercy are the chief characteristics of the divine love as manifested towards Israel; the one raising them above their weaknesses, their evils, and their sins, the other understanding these failings and seeking to deliver and restore them. But in both also is manifested the constancy of that love, its faithfulness; and the exactitude with which it adheres to the covenant it had itself made evinces its righteousness by saving those who fear God and obey him. Holiness and mercy are, for the moral, religious consciousness, harmonized in the expiatory sacrifice, in a figurative, typical manner in the O. T., and in a real, absolute manner in the N. T. The divine right in regard to fallen humanity is maintained, the death penalty is paid, but in such a manner that the chief of all, the divine Son of man, who is also Son of God, suffers it for all, of his own free will, and out of love to man, in accordance with the wishes of his Father. Thus the curse of sin and death is removed from humanity, and the possibility of a new existence of righteousness and felicity restored. The New Testament is therefore the full revelation of the spirit and object of the divine love. The incarnation of the Son of God is the revelation of God himself, and leads to his self-impartation by the Holy Spirit. Hence the eternal love discloses itself as being, in its inner nature, the love of the Father for the Father, the love of the Son for the Father by the Holy Ghost, which proceeds from both, and is the fulness of the love that unites them, whence we can say that God is love; as also, in its manifestation, it is the divine love towards fallen creatures, which is the will to restore their perfect communion with God by means of the all-sufficient expiatory sacrifice of the God-man, and the communication of the Holy Spirit, by which both the Father and the Son come to dwell in the hearts of men, thus forming a people of God's own, as was postulated, but not yet realized in the O. T. The love of God in man, therefore, is the destiny of being loved by the Father (1 John v, 0), resulting in a powerful impulse of love towards the God who has loved us first in Christ (1 John iv, 19), and an inward and strong affection towards all who are loved by God in Christ (1 John iv, 11); for the divine love, in its true essential being, love, even when it loves the wicked, is a loving of the loveless. This love takes the form of a duty (1 John iv, 11), but at the same time becomes a gradually strengthening inclination. And this is the completion or the ripening of the divine love in man (in τοῖς πάντις ἐνδιωκόμενοι), that it manifests itself in positive results for the advantage of others.

We find the beginning and examples of this love in... der the old dispensation where mention is made of desire after God, joy in him, eagerness to serve him, zeal in doing everything to please and honor him. The inclination towards those who belong to God, the holy communion of love in God, that characteristic feature of the N. T., is also foreshadowed in the O. T. by the people of God, who are regarded as one in respect to him, and whose close communion with God is represented by the image of marriage. This image is still repeated in the N. T., nevertheless in such a manner that the union is represented as not yet accomplished; for, though Christ is designated as the bridegroom and the Church as the bride, the wedding is made to coincide with the establishment of the kingdom. Thus, when the apostle considered, the love of God and the furtherance of the love of God are still a figurative expression. God wants the whole heart of his people: one love, one sacrifice, exclusively directed towards him, so that none other should exist beside it, and that all inclinations of love towards any creature should be comprised in it, derived from it, and return to it. On this account his love is called jealous, and he is said to be a jealous God. This jealousy of God, however, this decided requiring of an exclusive submission on the part of his people, is, on the other hand, considered as having for their welfare, their honor, and their restoration. The close connection, indeed the unity of both, is evident. The effect of this jealousy of God is to kindle zeal in those who serve him, and consequently opposition against all that opposes, or is adverse to his cause. This is a manifestation of love towards God, which love is essentially a return of his own love, and consequently gratitude, accompanied by the highest appreciation, and an earnest desire for communion with him. It includes joy in all that serves God, absolute submission to him, and a desire to do everything for his glory. The joy is, in God, i.e. the love of those who feel themselves bound together by that common bond, is essentially of the same character; but, from the fact of its being directed towards creatures who are afflicted with many failings and infirmities, must also include—as distinguished from the love towards God—a willingness to forgive, which makes away with all hindrances to full communion, a continual friendliness under all circumstances, consequently patience and gentleness, zeal for their improvement, and sympathy for their failings and misfortunes. But as the love of the creative, creative, and sanctifying God, extending further than merely those who have attained to that communion with him, embraces all, so should also the love of those who love him. Yet in the divine love itself there is a distinction made, inasmuch as God’s love towards those who love him bears a much more tolerant character, his commandments are strengthening, sustaining pleasure in them (John xiv, 21, 23), while his love towards the others is benevolence and patience, which, according to their conduct, the disposition of their hearts, and their receptivity, is either not felt at all by them, or only produces pain, fear, or, again, hope, desire, etc., but not a feeling of compunction, alighting joy. So in the love of the children of God towards the human race we find the distinction between brotherly and universal love (Rom. xii, 10; Heb. xiii, 1; 1 Pet. i, 22; 2 Pet. i, 7). In both we find the characteristics of kindness and benevolence, sympathy, willingness to help, gentleness, and patience: but in the universal love there is wanting the feeling of delight, of an equal aim, a complete reciprocity, of conscious unity in the one highest good.

Love also derives a special determination from the personality, the spiritual and essential organization of the one who loves, and also his particular position. It manifests itself in friendship as a powerful attraction, a hearty sympathy of feelings, a strong desire for being together and enjoying a communion of thoughts and feelings. It is the mutual love in a tenacious personal attraction, a satisfaction in each other as the mutual complement of life, and a desire for absolute and lasting community of existence. Parental, filial, and brotherly love can be considered as a branch of this affection. Both, parental and brotherly love, are characteristic of the Christian morals when based on the love of God. As wedded love is an image of the relation between the Lord and his people, or the Church (Eph. v. 25 sq.), so, paternal, filial, and brotherly love are respectively images of the love of God towards those who love him, and towards him, and of their love towards each other. All these relations may want this higher consecration, and yet be well regulated; they have then a moral character. But they may also be disorderly: friendship can be sensual, selfish, and even degenerate into unnatural lust and impurity. Sexual love may become selfish, having no other object but the gratification of lust; parental love may change to self-love, producing over-indulgence, and fostering the vices of the children; brotherly love can degenerate into flattery and spoiling. Thus this feeling, which is in principle and in its best, the highest and noblest, can become the most common, the worst, and the most unworthy. Both kinds of love are mentioned in Scripture. The highest and purest tendency of the heart is in the Bible designated by the same name as the more natural, immoral, or disorderly kind, as a tendency of the heart away from God and Romans: 'Eroto, Amor, and Aaggellry, Venus, had both significations, the noble and the common; but Christianity has in Christ and in his Church the perfect illustration and example of true love, whose absolute type is in the same life of God himself. This divine love, as it exists in God, and through the divine Spirit in the heart of man, together with the connection of both, is represented to us in Scripture as infinitely deep and pure. We find it thus represented in the Old Testament (see Deut. xxxiii, 8; Is. xlix, 18 sq.; xlvii, 17 sq.; Jer. xxxii, 30; xxxiii, 37 sq.; Ezek. xxxiv, 11 sq.; Hose. iii, 2 sq.; Mic. vii, 18 sq.). Then in the whole mission of Christ, and in what he stated of his own love and of the Father's, see Matt. xx, 28; Luke xxv; John iv, 10, 14; vi, 37 sq.; vii, 37 sq.; ix, 4; x, 12 sq.; xii, 36; xiii, 1; xv, 15, 19; xvii; and, for the testimony of the apostles, Rom. v, 8 sq.; viii, 35 sq.; 1 Cor. xiii; Eph. i, 17 sq.; v, 1 sq.; 1 John iii, 4, etc. These statements are corroborated by the testimony of Christians in all ages, who have all been witness to this love, however much their views may have differed on the other points of the doctrine. The subject of the object have thrown great light on the nature and modes of manifestation of this love; see among them, Danb, Syst. d. chrest. Moral. ii, 1, p. 310; Marheineke, Syst. d. theol. Moral, p. 470; Rothc, Theol. Ethik, ii, 350.—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. viii, 889 sq. See Wesleyan, p. 94.

Love, Christopher, a Presbyterian divine, was born at Carlif, Wales, in 1618; entered the active work of the ministry in 1644, in London, after which he became a member of the Assembly of Divines. After the death of Charles I, to whom he had previously been opposed, he entered into a plot against Cromwell, for which cause he was executed in August, 1651. Mr. Love was the author of a number of sermons and theological tracts published in 1645–54. As a writer, he was plain, impressive, evangelical. Love, John M. D.D., an eminent Scotch divine, was born at Paisley, Scotland, in 1757. He was one of the founders of the London Missionary Society. He died in 1825. Dr. Love published in 1796 Adivization to the People of Otaheite, republished after his death; also 2 vols. of Sermons and Lectures in 1829; a vol. of Letters in 1836; 94 Sermons, preached 1784-5 to 1828. LOVE-FEAST LOVE-feast. In the article Aparé (q. v.) the subject has been treated so far as it relates to an institution in the early Church. It remains for us here only to speak of the love-feast as observed in some Protestant churches, especially the Methodist connection. In a strictly primitive form, the love-feast is observed by the Moravian Brethren. They celebrate it on various occasions, generally in connexion with the annual festival or preparatory to the holy communion. Printedodes are often used, prepared expressly for the occasion. In the course of the service a simple meal of biscuit and coffee or tea is served, of which the congregation partakes. In some churches the question is decided with an address by the minister (E. de Schweinitz, Moravians Manual [Philad. 1859, 12mo], p. 161).

From the Moravians Wesley borrowed the practice for his own followers, assigning for its introduction into the Methodist economy the following reasons: "In order to increase in them [persons in bonds (q. v.)] a grateful sense of all his [God's] mercies, I desired that one evening in a quarter all the men in band, on a second all the women, would meet, and on a third both men and women together, that we might together 'eat bread with God,' and the sentiment Christians are not 'of the works of the flesh, but of the word of life'" (Wesley, Works, v., 1833). In the Wesleyan Church only members are attendants at love-feasts, and they are appointed by or with the consent of the superintendent (Minutes, 1806). Admission itself is gained only by a ticket; and as it frequently happened that members would lend their tickets to strangers, it was enacted in 1808 that "no person who is unwilling to join our society is allowed to attend a love-feast more than once, nor then without a note from the travelling preacher; .... and that any person who is proved to have lent a society ticket to another who is not in society, for the purpose of deceiving the door-keepers, shall be suspended for three months" (comp. Grindrod, Laws and Regulations of West. Methodists [Lond. 1842], p. 180). In the Methodist Episcopal Church the rule also exists that admission to love-feasts is to be had by tickets only (comp. Discipline, 1835, ch. ii., § 17 [2]), but the rule is rarely, if ever observed, and they are frequently attended by members of the congregation as well as by the members of the Church. By established usage, the presiding elder (and in his absence only the minister in charge) is entitled to preside over the love-feasts, and they are therefore held at the time of the Church conference. See Conference, Methodist. The manner in which they are now generally observed among Methodists is as follows: They are opened by the reading of the Scriptures followed by the singing of a hymn, and then by prayer. During and after the dealing out of the bread and water, the different members of the congregation dispose themselves in a manner that is to be regarded. See Ritualism. The manner in which they are now generally observed among Methodists is as follows: They are opened by the reading of the Scriptures, followed by the singing of a hymn, and then by prayer. During and after the dealing out of the bread and water, the different members of the congregation dispose themselves in a manner that is to be disregarded. See Latitudinarianism. The term was primarily applied to those who disapproved of the schism made by the Non-jurors, and who distinguished themselves by their moderation towards Dissenters. See Ritualism.

Lowe, ben-Besalel, a rabbi and Jewish teacher of note, was born probably in Posen about 1525. Of his early history but little is authenticated. We find him first occupying a position of influence and prominence at Prague, where he was known as "the learned Rabbi Lowe," toward the close of the 16th century (1575). Previous to his coming to Prague he had been rabbis over a congregation in Moravia for some twenty years. In 1811 he was elected chief rabbi of the Jews in the Bohemian capital. In 1852 he became chief rabbi of Pozsony and Poland; he returned, however, in 1858 to Prague, and there died in 1869. He left nineteen different works, of which several are yet in manuscript in the library of the University of Oxford, England. Besides his technical astronomical knowledge, he made him one of the first authorities of his time, he also enjoyed a great reputation as mathematician and philosopher. He seems to have also possessed great knowledge of astronomy and astrology, the favorite studies of the age. He was befriended by the renowned Tycho Brahe, astro- nomer to the court of the emperor Frederick II; and the latter also, it is said, honored the rabbi, and at one time admitted him to a prolonged audience; indeed, it was a well-established fact that his extended knowledge and unblemished character secured for himself and the Jews of his time happier days, and, like a sunbeam in the midst of dark clouds, appears the abort period in which he officiated as rabbi in the sad history of the Jewish congregation of Prague. He was opposed to the unscientific manner in which the Talmud was studied, by hunting after imaginary contradictions and difficulties (Filium), and he called into existence the various societies for a more scientific study of the same. In connection with his son-in-law, Rabbi Chayim Wahle, he founded a seminary for Talmudic studies. The rabbi's knowledge of natural philosophy caused him frequently to make predictions, which gave birth to several agend, as the ignorant saw in them the supernatural power of the Cabalist. A Christian Bohemian historian claims for the rabbi the honor of inventing the camera-obscura. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, ix. 496 sq.; Sekelos, Some Jewish Rabbis (v.), in the Jewish Messenger (N.Y. 1871); First, Biblioth. Judaica, ii. 396 sq. (J. H. W.)

LOWE, JOEL, BEN-JEHUDAH LOM (also called Brul, או ברול, from the initials ב.י.ל. בֵּנְ-רֵי הָגְדָה לֹאֶב), a Jewish writer of note, born about 1740, was a distinguished disciple of Moses Mendelssohn, and afterwards, although a Jew, held a professorship in the William's school at Breslau. He died in that city, February 11, 1802. Besides many valuable contributions to Biblical exegesis and literature in the Berlin Magazine for the Advancement of Jewish Scholarship, entitled Measef or Sammelzer (Collector), of which he was at one time also editor, he published (1788) a translation of the Song of Songs, an elaborate Introduction, written conjointly with Wolfsohn, to Mendelssohn's German translation of this book (Berlin, 1788; republished in Prague, 1808; Lemberg, 1817); — (2) Annotations on Ecclesiastes, also conjointly with Wolfsohn, published with Mendelssohn's commentary on this book, and Friedländer's German translation (Berlin, 1788); — (3) Commentary on Jonah, with a German translation (Berl. 1788); — (4) Commentary on the Psalms, with an extensive introduction (آثار מח traf סלמי), containing an elaborate treatise on the musical instruments of the ancient Hebrews, as well as on Hebrew Poetry; published with Mendelssohn's German translation of this book (Berlin, 1785-91); — (5) German Translation and Heb. Commentary of the Commemorative and Festival Lessons from the Pentateuch and the Prophets [see Haphtarah] (Berlin, 1790-91); — (6) German Translation of the Pentateuch for beginners, preparatory to Mendelssohn's version (Breslau, 1818); — (7) Elementary Hebrew Grammar, entitled עִנְיָנִי הָבְרִית, according to logical principles, for the use of teachers (Berlin, 1794; republished in Prague, 1803). Of his articles published in quarterlies, the following are the most important: 1. Notes on Joshua and the Song of Songs, in Elchhorn's Allgemeine Bibliothek (Leips, 1789), ii. 183 sq.; — 2. Treatise on Personification of the Deity and the Sephiroth, ibid. (1800), v. 378 sq. — See Figures, Bibl. Hebr., ii. 268; Steinschneider, Catalogu Libr. Heb. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, col. 1297 sq.; Kitto, Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature, s. v.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, xl, 101 sq.

LOWE, CHARLES, D.D., a Unitarian Congregational minister of note, son of judge John Lowell, to whom Massachusetts is indebted for the clause in her Constitution which abolished slavery, was born in Boston Aug. 15, 1782, and was educated first at Andover Academy, and later at Harvard College, class of 1800. After graduation he went abroad, and travelled extensively in the Old World. At Edinburgh he entered the divinity school of the university, and spent there three semesters. On his return home he studied theology with Rev. Dr. Zeedekiah Sanger, of South Bridgewater, and Rev. David Tappan, professor of divinity at Cambridge, and was ordained pastor over the West Parish, Mel- ton, Jan. 1, 1806. In 1837 his feeble health demanded relief, and the Rev. Cyrus A. Bartol was ordained as his colleague. Dr. Lowell continued his pastoral connection until his death (at Cambridge, January 29, 1861), although he officiated but occasionally. He was remarkable for kindness, integrity, directness and simplicity of character, and was a most zealous and consistent opponent of slavery. As a preacher his popularity was eminent, and he was almost adored by his parishioners. Graceful as an orator, with a voice of unusual common sweetness, he preached with such sincerity that he seemed to his hearers to be almost divinely inspired. He published some twenty different discourses, a volume of Occasional Sermons (Boz. 1856, 12mo), and a volume of Practical Sermons (1856): Meditations for the Afflicted, Sick, and Dying; and Devotional Exercises for Communicants. He also contributed largely to the periodical literature of his day. Among his surviving children are Prof. Lowell, the poet; the Rev. Robert Lowell, author of "The New Priest in Concepcion Bay," a novel of Newfoundland life; and Mrs. Pappenheim, well-known writer on Hungarian history. See Ch.it, Expositor, 1870, xxxiii, 13; Thomas, Dict. of Biog. and Mythol. s. v.; Drake, Dict. Am. Biog. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, s. v.

LOWELL, JOHN, an American philanthropist, deserves our notice as the founder (in 1809) of "the Lowell Institute," at an expense of $250,000, to maintain forever in Boston, his native place, annual courses of free lectures on natural and revealed religion, the natural sciences, philology, belles-lettres, and art. Mr. Lowell was born May 11, 1799, and was entered student at Harvard in 1813; but was compelled already, in 1815, by poor health, to seek relief by residence in the East. He died at Bombay March 4, 1866. He was a superior scholar, and one of the best of the English libraries in America. See New American Cyclop. s. v.

LOWER PARTS OF THE EARTH (डेल्फी-क्रेन), properly valleya (Isa. xliv. 23); hence, by extension, Sheol, or the under-world, as the place of departed spirits (Psa. lxxiii, 9; Eph. iv, 9), and by meton. any hidden place, as the womb (Psa. xxxiv., 13). In the original of Ezek. xxvi. 30; xxxii. 18, 24, the words are transposed, and used in the second sense.

LÖWISOHN, SALOMON, a Jewish writer of note, and really the first Jew who chronicled the history of his people in the German tongue, was born at Moor, Hungary, in 1789, and was truly a self-made man. Amid the greatest difficulties he acquired an education, and particularly a thorough knowledge of the Hebrew. Possessed of great poetical talent, he wrote בִּסְדָּאֵל הַנֶּבֶץ (Vienna, 1818). The first work in which a Jew applied himself to the history of the chosen people of God, in a German version, was Löwischen's Vorlesungen über die neuesten Geschichten der Juden (Vienna, 1820, 8vo), which starts with their dispersion, and dwells at length on the Talmud and its authors. Unfortunately, however, the young man so well endowed with this work, so suspiciously begun, was brought to an early grave by disappointment.

LOWTH

He died of broken heart, in his native place, in 1822. See Gratz, Gesch. d. Juden, xi, 458 sq. ; Oriental. Literature, vol. i, 1855. For his notes, see p. 72 sqq. (J. H. W.)

Lowman, Abraham. A Presbyterian minister, was born in Indiana County, Pa., in 1833; made an early profession of faith, and joined the Associate Reformed Congregation at Jacksonville, Pa.; entered the Theological Seminary of the First Associate Reformed Synod (class of 1857); was licensed by the Presbytery of Wissahickon, and in 1858 received and accepted a call from the Associate Reformed congregation at Brookville, Pa., but while preparing to enter upon the active duties of this charge he suddenly died, Nov. 27, 1858. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Alm. 1860, p. 159.

Lowman, Moses. A learned English dissenting divine, was born in London in 1690, and was educated at Trinity College, and subsequently at Leyden and Utrecht. In 1710 he became minister of a Presbyterian congregation at Clapham, Surrey, where he labored until his death in 1752. He was eminently skilled in Jewish antiquities, and is the author of a learned work on the Civil Government of the Hebrews (London, 1740, 1745, 1816, 18vo); of a Paraphrase and Notes of Revelations (1737, 1745, 4to; 1791, 1807, 8vo), of which work Doddridge remarked that he had "received more satisfaction from it, in regard to many difficulties in that book, than he ever found elsewhere, or expected to have found at all."—A specimen from his Paraphrase on the 6th Psal. in proof that Jesus is the Messiah (London, 1738, 8vo), which Dr. Landal calls "a valuable book;" and Rationale of the Ritual of Hebrew Worship (1748, 1816, 8vo). See Proc. Dis. Mag., vol. i and ii; Allibone, Dict. of British and American Authors, s. v.

Lowrie, John Marshall, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Pittsburg, Pa., July 16, 1817, and was educated for two years in Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., and afterwards at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa. (class of 1840); and then at the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J. (class of 1842). In April, 1842, he was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, and soon after accepted a call to the churches of Blairstown and Knowlton, in Warren County, N. J., where he ordained and installed by Newton Presbytery Oct. 18, 1843. In 1846 he accepted a call to Wellsville, Ohio; subsequently to Fort Wayne, Ind., where he labored faithfully until his death, Sept. 26, 1867. Dr. Lowrie contributed largely to the press, and wrote many precious gems in poetry and prose; he was a man of more than ordinary gifts, a clear, vigorous intellect, and sound judgment; he excelled in systematic arrangement, clear statement, clear argument, and forcible argument. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Alm. 1868, p. 115 sq.

Lowrie, Reuben, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Butler, Pa., Nov. 24, 1827, and was educated at the University of the New York City, where for one year he served as tutor; studied theology at Princeton, N. J.; afterwards became principal of a presbyterian academy in Luzerne County, Pa.; was licensed by the Luzerne Presbytery in 1851, at which time he engaged in the work of foreign missions among the Chocot Indians; in 1856 he was ordained, and April 22 sailed as missionary into the Sea Girt, China. Here he was fully to himself to the study of the Chinese language, translated the Shorter Catechism, and a Catechism on the Old Testament History, into this dialect; devoted much time to the compilation of a Dictionary of the Four Books, commenced by his brother; he had also written a Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew in Chinese when he died, April 26, 1860. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Alm. 1861, p. 96.

Lowrie, Walter Macon, a Presbyterian missionary to China, was born in Butler, Pa., in 1819 (?), graduated from Jefferson College in 1837, passed a theological course at Princeton, was ordained by the Second Presbytery of New York, and entered on his ministerial labors. While passing from Shanghai to Ningpo, Aug. 19, 1847, he was thrown overboard by pirates, and drowned at 7 a.m. from the 72 sq. (J. H. W.)

The date of his embarkation from America is not known, but he was in China some time prior to 1842. He was a young man of fine powers and large culture, and promised much for the Church and the world. His piety was of a lofty, self-denying stamp, which made it equal to all obstacles, and his career was opening grandly when thus suddenly called to his reward. He wrote Letters to Sabbath-school Children:—Land of Sinim, or Exposition of Isaiah xlix (Philadelphia, 1846, 18mo). A volume of his Sermons preached in China was also published (1818, 8vo). See Lowrie, Memoirs of Missionaries in New York Observer, Jan. 8, 1848; Memoirs of W. M. Lowrie (New York, Carter and Brothers, 1849); Princeton Review, xxii, 280.

Low Sunday, the first Sunday after Easter, so called because it was customary to repeat on this day some part of the solemnity which was used on Easter day, whence it took the name of Low Sunday, being celebrated as a feast, but of a lower degree than Easter day itself.

Lowth, Robert, D.D., a distinguished English prelate, and son of William Lowth (q. v.), was born at Burton Nov. 27, 1710. In 1737 he graduated master of arts at Oxford University, and in 1741 was elected professor of poetry in his alma mater. Entering the ecclesiastical order, he was presented with the rectory of Stevenage and Walsingham, in 1744. After a four-year's residence on the Continent, he was, on his return in 1750, appointed by bishop Hoadley archdeacon of Winchester, and three years after to the rectory of East Woodhay in Hampshire. It was in this year that Lowth published his valuable work De Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum, Prolocutiones Academicae (Oxonia, 1753, 4to; 2d edit. with annot. by Michaelis, Göttingen, 1758; Oxon. 1763; Göttingen, 1768; Oxford, 1775, 1810; with notes by Rosenmüller, Leips, 1815; and last and best, Oxford, 1821, 8vo). An English translation of the first 18 lectures was prepared by Dr. Dodd for the Christian Magazine (1766-67), and of all by Dr. Gregory (Lond. 1767, 1816, 1885, 1839, 1847); a still more desirable English translation was prepared by Prof. Stowe (Andover, 1829, 8vo). "In these masterly and classical dissertations," says Ginsburg (in Kütto, Cyclog Bibl. lit. ii, s. v.), "Lowth not only evinced a deep knowledge of the Hebrew language, but showed that he actually exhibits the true spirit and characteristics of that poetry in which the prophets of the O. T. clothed the lovely oracles of God. It does not at all detract from Lowth's merits that both Abarbanel and Azariah de Rosai had pointed out the characteristics before him the same features of Hebrew poetry [see Rosai] upon which he expatiates, inasmuch as the enlarged views and the invincible arguments displayed in his handling of the subject are peculiarly his own; and his work is therefore justly regarded as marking a new epoch in the treatment of the Hebrew poetry. The greatest testimony to the extra-ordinary merits of these lectures is the thorough analysis which the celebrated [Jewish] philosopher Mendelssohn, to whom the Hebrew was almost vernacular, gives of them in the Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaftern und der freien Künste, vol. i, 1756." In 1751 Lowth received the degree of doctor in divinity from the University of Oxford by diploma. In 1755 he went to Ireland as chaplain to the marquis of Hartington, then appointed lord lieutenant, who nominated him bishop of Limerick, a preferment which he exchanged for a prebend of Downpatrick, the bishopric of Down being vacant. In 1766 Dr. Lowth was appointed bishop of St. David's, whence a few months later he was translated to the see of Oxford, and thence, in 1777, he succeeded Dr. Terrick in the diocese of London. In 1778, only one year after his appointment at London, he gave the public his last and greatest work, Isaiah: a Translation, with a preliminary Dissertation, and Notes (18th edit. 1849, 8vo). This elegant and beautiful version of the evangelical prophet, of which learned men in every part of Europe have been unanimous in their eulogiums, and which is alone sufficient to transmit his name to posterity, aimed "not only to give an exact and faithful representation of the words and sense of the prophet by adhering to the letter of the text" and treading as nearly as may be in his footsteps, but, moreover, to imitate the air and manner of the author, to express the form and fashion of the composition, and to give the English reader some notion of the peculiar turn and cast of the original." In the elaborate and valuable Preliminary Remarks, he states this, he enters more minutely than in his former production into the form and construction of the poetical compositions of the O.T., lays down principles of criticism for the improvement of all subsequent translations, and frankly alludes to De Rossi's view of Hebrew poetry, which is similar to his own. See Ross. This masterly work soon obtained a European fame, and was not only rapidly reprinted in England, but was translated into German by professor Koppe, who added some valuable notes to it (Gottingen, 1737-91, 4 vols. 8vo.). It must not, however, be supposed that the work did not meet with opposition, so far as the views of the author could lead to difference in opinion; and we incline with Dr. G. B. Cheever to the belief that Lowth's "only fault as a sacred critic was a degree of what architect Decker denomes "the spirit of Tassawuf," or rags for textual and conjectural emendations. The importance of this spirit in his work on Isaiah was the only obstacle that prevented its attaining the name and rank, as classic in sacred literature, which has been accorded to the Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews" (North American Review, xxxvi, 376.) compiled by Horne, Bibl. Bibl. 1820, 287). On the death of archbishop Cornwallis, the primate was offered to Dr. Lowth, a dignity which he declined on account of his advanced age and family afflictions. In 1788 he lost his eldest daughter, and in 1788 his second daughter suddenly expired while presiding at the tea-table; his eldest son was also suddenly cut off in the prime of life. Bishop Lowth himself died Nov. 8, 1787. The other and minor writings of bishop Lowth, consisting of (1) Tracts, belonging to his controversy with bishop Warburton (q. v.), to which a trifling difference of opinion on the book of Job gave rise; (2) Life of William of Wykeham (1758)—(3) Short Introduction to English Grammar (1762). The Sermons and other Remains of Bishop Lowth were published with an Introductory Memoir by the Rev. Peter Hall, A.M. (London, 1814), pp. 120; and his Letters and Writings of the late R. H. Lowth, Simon, D.D., an English non-jurist divine, was born in Northamptonshire about 1630. In 1679 we find him vicar of St. Cosmus, a position of which he was deprived in 1688. He died in 1720. Dr. Simon Lowth published Historical Collections concerning Ch. Affairs (Lond. 1694, 4to), besides several theological treatises (1672-1704). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Lowth, William, D.D., a distinguished English divine, father of bishop Robert Lowth, was born in London Sept. 11, 1661. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, whence he was elected to a scholarship at St. John's College, Oxford, in 1675, when not yet 14 years old; became M.A. in 1680, and B.D. in 1686. His Vindication of the Divine Authority of the Old and New Testament (Lond. 1682; 3d edit. with two sermons, Lond. 1821, 12mo.) in answer to Le Clerc's attacks on the inspiration of Scripture, brought him prominently into notice; and the first to favor him was bishop Mew, of Winchester, who had been president of St. John's College, and well knew Lowth's great attainments. He made him his chaplain, and presented him with a prebendal stall in his cathedral at Winchester in 1696, and with the living of Burton and Petersfield in 1699. Dr. Lowth died May 17, 1792. Though less celebrated as a writer than his son, he has added considerably to the character of a profounder scholar, and might, and no doubt would, have attained to as great distinction in the Church as his son had he lived as much in the public eye, and, instead of serving others in the preparation of their works, gone directly before the people himself. So great, indeed, was the recommendation of Lowth, that in all his bishopric, we can be just only after a careful inquiry of the amount and extent of the assistance he furnished to the works of his contemporaries, upon whom Dr. Lowth, having carefully read and annotated almost every Greek and Latin author, whether scholastic or scholastic, especially the latter, dispensed his stores with a most liberal hand. The edition of Clemens Alexandrinus, by Dr. (afterwards archbishop) Potter; that of Josephus, by Hudson; the Ecclesiastical Historians, by Reading (Cambridge); the Bibliotheca Biblica, were all enriched by his notices. His treatment of the Book of Psalms of Durham, during the preparation of his Defence of Christianity from the prophecies of the Old Testament, against the discourse of the "Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion," and in his vindication of the "Defence of Christianity," is considered, held a constant correspondence with him, and consulted him upon many difficulties that occurred in the course of that work. Many other English scholars were also indebted to Dr. William Lowth's labors for important aid. But the most valuable part of his character was that which least appeared in the eyes of the world. His piety, diligence, hospitality, and beneficence rendered his life highly exemplary, and greatly enforced his public exhortations. Besides the Vindication already mentioned above, Dr. Lowth wrote Directions for the profitable Reading of the Holy Scriptures, etc. (1708, 12mo; 7th edit. Lond. 1739, 12mo), an excellent little work, which has gone through many editions; and last, but chiefly, A Commentary on the prophetic Books of the Old Testament, originally published in separate portions (1714-1725), and afterwards collected in a folio volume as a continuation of bishop Patrick's commentary, and generally accompanying the commentary collected severally from Patrick, Whitby, Arnald, and Lowman (best editions of the whole commentary, Lond. 1822, 6 vols. royal 4to; Philad. 1860, 4 vols. imp. 8vo.). See also "Lowth," says Orme (Bibl. Bibl., "is one of the most judicious and accurate commentators; he propounds himself, adheres strictly to the meaning of the inspired writer, and is yet generally evangelical in his interpretations. There is not much appearance of criticism; but the original text and other critical aids were doubtless closely studied by the respectable author. It is often quoted by Scott, and . . . . is pronounced by bishop Cattson the best commentary in the English language." See Life of Dr. William Lowth, by his son, Biol. LOYOLA, IGNATIUS OF, ST., or, with his full Spanish name, Don Inigo Lopez de Recale, the founder of the Jesuits, was born in 1491, in the province of Toleti, which was situated not far from Aspeyta, in the Spanish province of Guipuzcoa. He was the youngest of the eleven children of Don Bertand, Señor d'Aguex y de Loyola, and Martina Saez de Balce. His family pride itself on belonging to the ancient, pure nobility of the country, and to families distinguished (1481, 12mo.) which was the origin of the Jesuits. After receiving his first instruction in religion from his aunt, Doña Maria de Guevara, a fervid Catholic, he became a page at the court of Ferdinand the Catholic Loyola had too great a desire for glory to be satisfied with court life, and, following the example of his brothers, who served in the army, he resolved to become a soldier.

During the first campaign in which he took part he distinguished himself at the siege of Najara, a small town situated on the frontier of Blacaya, the capture of which was partly attributed to his bravery. The siege was not completed when the princes of the order received permission to lay down their arms; but Loyola remained, and the attack was renewed. He was severely wounded in the leg by a cannon ball in both legs. The French, after taking the place, honored his courage, and had him transported on a litter to his native castle of Loyola, which is not far from Pampeluna. As the first operation had not been successful, the leg had to be broken again and to be reset anew. The extreme painfulness of this operation brought on a fever on the eve of the festival of the apostles Peter and Paul, which was thought would prove fatal; but on Tuesday of the following week he described his unexpected recovery to the miraculous aid of the prince of the apostles, who, as he states, appeared to him in a dream, touched him with his hand, and cured him from his fever. But, notwithstanding this belief in his conqueror of the soul, he had the determination not to let the outward world absorb him, to remain a worldly spirit. The recovery proved, however, not to be complete, and Ignatius, in order to get fully restored, had to submit to several other painful operations, in spite of all of which his right leg remained considerably shorter than the other. While his recovery was slowly proceeding, he dictated novels for pastime; but as no books of this class were to be found in the castle, he received in their stead a Life of Jesus Christ and of the Saints. He read this at first without the least interest in the subject, and only because no other book could be found; but gradually his fiery imagination learned how to derive food from this reading, and a determination sprang up to imitate the spiritual combats which he found described in this book, and to excel the saints in heroic deeds. For a time the reviving thirst of glory, and a strong attachment to a lady of the royal court, made him fairly unhappy; but Loyola learned to control these feelings, and soon his ardor for the spiritual combat had so well overcome them, and began the new career upon which he had resolved to enter with a pilgrimage to the convent of Montserrat, famous for the immense concourse of pilgrims from all parts of the world to a miraculous picture of the Virgin Mary. There he received the sign of the cross, and determined to visit his old friend the duke of Najara, and immediately after making the visit dismissed his two servants, and took along the road to Montserrat. There, during three successive days, he made a general confession of all the sins of his life, and took the vow of chastity. Before the picture of the Virgin Mary he held a vigil, hung up his sword and dagger on the altar, and then repaired to Manresa, a small town situated about three leagues from Montserrat, and containing a convent of the Dominican order and a hospital chiefly for pilgrims. Here he desired to live unattached; but the presence of the devil caused him insomnia and doubts concerning the evil spirits, and to be gladdened by visions of the Saviour and the holy Virgin. Gradually he began to settle in his mind, and resolved to labor for the conversion and sanctification of souls. He began to speak in public on religion, and made the first draft of the famous book of the Spiritual Exercises (Exercitia Spiritualia), in the composition of which he claims to have had divine aid. This book has contributed more than any other to the erection of the new papal theocracy which has recently been established, and to the revolution in papal infallibility. It consists of meditations, which are grouped in four divisions or weeks. The first week, after an introductory meditation on the destiny of man and of all created things, occupies itself with sin, its hideousness, and its terrible consequences. The second week has for its object the meditation on the mysteries of the life of Christ, who is represented as being in the highest sense of the word the king by the grace of God, whose call to the spiritual campaign all men have to obey, and in whose service every noble heart will feel itself inspired to noble deeds. In a life-picture of Christ it is shown how man must prove himself in the war for and with Christ. The meditation then turns to the mysteries of incarnation, to the childhood of Jesus, and his retired life in Nazareth. Here the contemplation of the life of Christ is interrupted by the meditation on the two last events: the death and resurrection of Christ. The whole is concluded with a meditation on the love of God. The book was for the first time printed in Rome in 1548, and on July 31 of the same year approved by pope Paul III, and urgently recommended to the faithful. In the hands of the Jesuits this book subsequently became one of the chief instruments which secured the thoroughly military discipline of their order, as well as of their devoted adherents.

After passing ten months in Manresa, Ignatius, in January, 1523, embarked at Barcelona for the Holy Land. He spent a few days in Rome, then went to Venice, where he embarked for Jerusalem on July 14, and arrived there on September 4. It was his wish to remain here, in order to labor for the conversion of the people of the East; but the provincial of the Franciscan monks, who had been authorized by the pope either to retain or to release the pilgrims, did not allow him to stay. Accordingly, he had to return to Europe, and arrived in Venice in January, 1524. In March he was again on Spanish soil, and having become convinced during his voyage of the importance of a literary education for the accomplishment of his plans, he entered, although 33 years old, a grammar-school at Barcelona, where he studied, in particular, the elements of Latin. Two years later he went, with three disciples whom he had gained at Barcelona, to the University of Alcala, which a short time before had been founded by cardinal Ximenes. Here he was, with his companions, imprisoned for six weeks, by order of the Inquisition, for giving religious instruction without special authorization. After being released, he went, at the advice of the archbishop of Toledo, to the University of Salamanca to continue his studies. But, when there, he had new difficulties with the Inquisition; he resolved to leave Spain, and, not accompanied by any of his disciples, went to the University of Paris, where he studied from February, 1528, to the end of March, 1558, and on March 14, 1558, obtained the title of master of arts. Here his plan was fully matured to establish a society of men who might aid him in carrying on his devotional ideas. The first who was gained for the plan was Pierre de Vertre (Petron Faber), who for some time had been his tutor in his phil-Omphal. studies. The second was Francis Xavier, a young nobleman of Novara. Soon after they were joined by the Spaniards Jacob Lainez, Alphonse Salmeron, and Nicholas Alphonse Bobadilla, and the Portuguese Simon Rodriguez d’Azoa. For the first time they were called together by Ignatius in July, 1554. On August 15, on the festival of the assumption of the Virgin Mary, he took the title of the Order of the Spiritual perpetuity of the Name of Jesus, of the Church of the Apostles. He also residing near Paris, where, having received the communion from the hands of Lefévre, the only priest in their midst, they all, with a loud voice, took the solemn vow to make a voyage to Jerusalem, in order to labor for the conversion of the infidels of that Holy Land; to quit all they had in the world besides what they indispensably needed for the voyage; and in case they should find it impossible either to reach Palestine or remain there, to throw themselves at the feet of the pope, offer him their services, and go wherever he might send them. As several members of the company had not yet finished their theological studies, it was agreed that they should remain at the university until January 25, 1557. Ignatius in the meanwhile undertook to labor against the further progress of the Reformation in France; his ascetic practices soon bore fruit in his health. On the advice of his physician, he had to return to his native land, where he soon recovered. On Jan. 6, 1557, he was met at Venice by all his companions, who, after his departure from Paris, had been joined by Claude le Jay, Jean Codure, and Pasquier Brunet. Two months later all the members of the society were sent by Ignatius to Rome, he himself remaining at Venice, as he believed the influential cardinal Caraffa (subsequently pope Paul IV) to be unfriendly to him. The pope, Paul III, received the companions of Ignatius favorably, and gave them permission to be ordained priests by any bishop of the Catholic Church. As the war between Venice and the sultan made it impossible for Ignatius to go with his companions to Palestine, Ignatius, who had again united all the members of the society at Venice, resolved to go with Lefèvre and Lainez to Rome, in order to place the services of his society at the disposal of the pope. Before separating, Ignatius instructed all his companions, in case they were asked who they were, and to what society they belonged, to reply that they belonged to the Society of Jesus, as they had united for a combat against heresy and vice under the banner of Jesus Christ. On his journey to Rome, Ignatius claimed to have had another vision in the lonely, decayed sanctuary of Storia, about six miles from Rome, and to have received a direct promise of divine aid and protection. At Rome Ignatius succeeded in gaining the entire confidence of the pope. A charge of heresy and sorcery, which a personal enemy brought against him, was easily refuted, but it was found more difficult to overcome the opposition to his projected order from three cardinals, by whose advice the pope was chiefly guided. But, undaunted by this great obstacle, as he continued his fruitful and reverend to the Church of God, he was finally received and received a unanimous vote. He at first declined to accept; but when, at a second election, he was again found to be the unanimous choice of his brethren, and when his confessor, the Franciscan monk father Theodore, urged him not to resist the call of God, he yielded to the voice of the same; but the Hamburg magistracy neglected to institute the investigation usual in cases of sudden death. His theological works are numerous, and many be found in Sandius, Bibil. Antitrin. (Freist. 1864), with the exception of the Historiae Reformatoriae Poloniæ, published in 1860 at Freist. In the course of his secular works, his Theatr um Comœticum has a worldwide celebrity. See Engl. Cyclop. a. v.; Krasański, Hist. Ref. in Poland, ii, chap. xiv; Fock, Der Socinianismus (Kiel, 1847).

Lu'bitim (Heb. Lubim, לבקה, from the Arab., signifying inhabitants of a thirty land, Nab. iii, 9; "Lubim," b2 chron. xi, 8; xvii, 8; also "Lubim," לבק, "Libyans," Dan. xi, 43; Sept. everywhere Aββmocε, the Libyans, always joined with the Egyptians and Ethiopians, being the principal of the countries, contributing, together with Damascus and Sakkout to Shishak's hay; Gen. xix, 13; Jer. viii, 9; and apparently as forming with Cushites the bulk of Zerzâb's army (xvi, 8); spoken of by Nahum (iii, 9) with Put or Phut, as helping No-Amon (Thebes), of which Cush and Egypt were the strength; and by Daniel (xi, 43) as paying court with the Cushites to a conqueror of Egypt or the Egyptians. These particular indications are African nations under tribute to Egypt, if not under Egyptian rule, contributing, in the 10th century B.C., valuable aid in mercenaries or auxiliaries to the Egyptian armies, and down to Nahum's time, and a period with Damascus and Sakkout to Shishak's hay. See Antiochus Epiphanes [see Antiochus IV], adding, either politically or commercially, to sustain the Egyptian power, or, in the last case, dependent on it. These indications do not fix the geographical position of the Lubim. The location of the Cushites and the Egyptians shows that the territory was near Egypt, either to the west or south. For more precise information we look to the Egyptian monuments, upon which we find representations of a people called Rebu or Learu [Rah and Lintu being the same in hieroglyphics], who cannot be doubted to correspond to the Libyans. These Rebu were a warlike people, with whom Memphith (the son and successor of Ramesses II) and Ramesses III, who both ruled in the 18th century B.C., waged successful wars. The latter king routed them with much slaughter. The sculptures of the great temple he raised at Thebes, now called that of Medinet Habû, gave us representations of the Rebu, showing that they were fair, and of what is called a Semitic type, like the Berbers and Kabyles. They are distinguished as northern, that is, as parallel to, or north of, Lower Egypt. Of their being African there can be no reasonable doubt, although they may assign to the Berber in the Mediterranean, commencing not far to the westward of Egypt. We do not find them to have been mercenaries of Egypt from the monuments, but we know that the kindred Mashawasha-u were employed by the Bubastite family, to which Shishak and probably Zerah also belong; and it is not unlikely that the warlike races intended by the Libim, used in a more generic sense than Rebu, in the Biblical mention of the armies of these kings (Brugsch, Geogr. Inschr. ii, 79 sq.). We have already shown that the Luubim are probably the Mizraite Lehabim; if so, their so-called Semitic physical characteristics, as represented on the Egyptian monuments, afford evidence of great importance for the inquirer into primeval history. The mention in Mancheo's Dynasties that, under Necherophes, or Nechrochis, the first philosopher, and head of the third dynasty (B.C. c. 2600), the Libyans revolted from the Egyptians, but returned to their allegiance through fear, on a wonderful increase of the moon, may refer to the Lubim, but may as well relate to some other African people, perhaps the Naphthuim, or Phut (Put). The historian Heliodorus, in his description of the world, thus led us to place the seat of the Lubim, or primitive Libyans, on the African coast to the westward of Egypt, perhaps extending far beyond Cyrenaica. From the earliest ages of which we have any record, a stream of colonization has flowed from the East along the coast of Africa, extending to the rainy zone, and the fertile plains of the Mediterranean, where the Libim have a common name of Libyans from the Lubim. They seem to have been first reduced by the Egyptians about B.C. 1250, and to have afterwards been driven inland by the Phoenicians and Greek colonists. Now, they still remain on the northern confines of the Great Desert, and even within it, and in the mountains, while their later Semitic rivals pasture their flocks in the rich plains. Many are as the Arab tribes of Africa, one great tribe, that of the Beni 'All, extends from Egypt to Morocco, illustrating the probable extent of the territory of the Libim and their cognates. It is possible that in Ezek. xxxvii, 14, the Libim should be understood for Cushites. Finally, there is no other instance of the use of this form: as, however, לבק and לבק are used for one people, apparently the Mizraite Lubim, most probably kindred to the Lubim, this objection is not conclusive. See Curs; Ludim. In Jer. xiv, 9, the A.V. renders Phut 'the Libyans;' and in Ezek. xxxvii, 5, 'Lubya.' See Libya.

Lubin, Augustin, a French monk, was born in Paris Jan. 29, 1564; was early admitted to the Order of Malines; Reformed Augustinians; and died at Bourges, and assistant general at Rome. He died at Paris March 7, 1656. Lubin had a special knowledge of all the benefits of France and the abbey of Italy. He published many learned works on ancient geography; among which the most distinguished are: L'Abbé Saccus Geographicus (Paris, 1670)—Martyrology Romanum, cum tabulis geographicas et notis historicis (Paris, 1660)—Tabulae geographicae pour les Vies des hommes illustres de Plutarque, dressées sur la tradition de l'Abbé Tolemon (Paris, 1761)—Clé de l'ordre de St. Desiré, etc. See Dupin, Auteurs ecclésiast. de l'église et secr. siècle; Journal des Savants, 1695, p. 220.

Lubin, Billard, one of the most learned Protetants of his time, was born at Westersted, in Oldenburg, March 24, 1556, of which place his father was minister. He was educated first at Leipzig, where he prosecuted his studies with great success, and for further improvement went thence to Cologne. After this he visited the several universities of Helmstedt, Strasburg, Jena, Marburg, and, last of all, Rostock, where he was made professor of poetry in 1580, and ten years later was advanced to the dignity of quillor, containing all the names of the abbey, of their founders, their situation, etc. (Paris, 1671); etc. See Dupin, Auteurs ecclésiast. du dix-septième siècle; Journal des Savants, 1695, p. 220.

Lubin, Giovanni Battista, an Italian prelate, was born at Venetia, and became a Franciscan, but was driven hence by poverty to the highest stations in the Church. He became referendary of the two signatures, and auditor of pope Innocent XI, who appointed him cardinal Sept. 1, 1681. Before entering the Church Luca had been a lawyer, and treaties on jurisprudence form the greater part of his works. He died at Rome Feb. 3, 1688. His Theàtrum Veritatis et Justinis (1697, 7 vols.) treats of canon and civil law, and was very highly es terated. Among his remaining works are the follow

Lucanus or Lucullus, a disciple of Marcius and the Gnostic, flourished in the latter part of the second century. He denied the reality of the body of Christ, as well as the immateriality and immortality of the soul. He regarded the souls of animals as of the same kind with those of men, and allowed the resurrection of the former. He is known to have been the author of numerous forgeries. Among his works, the History of the Virgin Mary, the Protevangelium, or History of James, the Gospel of Nicodemus. He seems to have been the same heretic who is sometimes called Lucius, Leucius, Lucius, Leutius, Leonius, Leutius, Seleucus, Charinus, Neocharinus, Neocharus, and Leonidas. — Faber, Ec/. Diss. Lucas (Anaxius, Vulg. Lucas), a friend and companion of Justin. He is mentioned in his impartial epitome (Philem. 24). A.D. 57. He is doublets the same as Luke, the beloved physician, who is associated with Demas in Col. iv. 14, and who remained faithful to the apostle when others forsook him (2 Tim. iv. 11), on his first examination before the emperor. For the grounds of his identification with the evangelist Luke, see the article Luke.

Lucas de Tuy (ot Tudens), a Spanish theologian and writer, was born at Leon, where he became cano of St. Isidore, and was afterwards appointed deacon of Tuy, in Galicia. In 1277 he made a journey to Jeru salern, saw pope Gregory IX in Italy, and also the gen eral council of Rhodes. In 1279 he was appointed bishop of Tuy in 1299, and died in 1320. He wrote a Chronicle of Spain, extending from 670 to 1236 (pub lished by Schott in his Spec. Ill., Francia, 1663, fol., vol. iv), and a Vita et historia translationis S. Isidori, which is reproduced in the article on that saint in the Acta Sanctorum, April 4. The second part of this work, which does not at all relate to St. Isidore, is a passionate and superstitious attack on the Cathari (q. v.); valu able, however, for its information concerning some cus toms of that sect in the south of France and in Spain. This part of Lucas's work was published separately by the Mariana, under the inappropriate title of Libri tres de altera vita sibi et dilecti contra Albigenianos erros (Inglot. 1613, 4to; reprinted in the Biblioth. Patr. Mariana, xxxv, 188, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Collogani, xiii, 282). Lucas also rejected as heretical the view which afterwards obtained of the three persons of the Trinity being of different ages, and asserted, contrariety to the then prevailing notion, that Christ ought not to be represented as crucified with the feet crossed, but with the feet side by side, each pierced with a separate nail—Hering, Diet.-Encycl. iv, 555. (J.N.P.)

Lucas, Francis (Brukensia), one of the ablest of the Roman Catholic theologians of the 6th century, was born at Bruges in 549. He studied theology at Louvain, and became at once celebrated for his knowl edge of the sacred languages and their cognate dialects. In 606 he was appointed archdeacon and dean of the cathedral of St. Omer, and there he remained until his death, Feb. 13, 616. As the fruits of his great scholar ship he has left us mainly works of value in Biblical theology. The following deserve special mention: (1) the edition of the Biblia Regia (brought out by Plantin, the famous printer of Antwerp, under the auspices of Philip the Fair, in 1512), which Lucas supervised. But the work by which he is principally known is (2) his Commentarius de Quatuor Evangelia (Antw. 1606), which was completed by Suppleimentum Comment. in Luc. et Lucius (Antw. 1612, 1616), a commentary of no ordinary mer it. " Entirely passing by, or alluding in the briefest manner to the mystical sense, and omitting all doctr inal discussions, he explains clearly and concisely the literal meaning, illustrating it frequently from the Greek and Latin fathers, as well as from later writers of au thority, though never burdening his pages with any confirmatory citations. His plan is a systematic one, and judiciously carried out. He chooses one sense, and that the one which the sacred writer appeared to have had in view, and briefly expounds and illustrates that, never distracting his readers with varying interpretations only mentioned. Lucas had not mean critical ability, and his knowledge of Greek, Hebrew, and Syrian was exact and trustworthy. A truly devotional spirit breathes through the whole." (3) Notitiae in Sacr. Bibl. (Antw. 1605-83), with a careful summary of the various readings, which were also appended to the edi tion of the Vulgate that appeared from the press of Plantin with Emmanuel Sa's notes (Antw. 1624), under the title Fr. Luca, Roman, correct. in Bibl. Latina. loc. imagin.

Lucius, Richard, an English clergyman and mora list, was born in 1646 in Radnorshire, Wales, entered Jesus College, Oxford, in 1664, and, after taking his degree, was for some time engaged in teaching. He finally entered the ministry, and became vicar of St. Stephen's, Coleman Street, London, in 1688. In 1696 he became prebend of Westminster. Blindness afflicted him in his later years. He died in June, 1715, at Lon don. He published a number of occasional works (1669-1704; 3d ed. 1710, 2 vols.; 1712-16, 17, 3 vols.; and 2d ed. 1722, 8 vols.). Among his devotional tracts the following are highly recommended by such critics as Knox, dean Stanhope, bishop Jebb, Sir Rich ard Steele, and Dr. Daniel Dodgson; because he was a lucius. (1865, 2 vols.): —Practical Christianilty, or an Account of the Holiness which the Gospel enjoins, with the Motives to it, etc. (5th ed. 1700; last ed. 1888). See Wood, Ath. Oozon.; Allibone, Diet. of Authors, a v.

Lucas, Abraham, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Northville, Long Island, N. Y., March 13, 1791; studied at Union College, and at Edinburgh. He took a de gree in theology with the Rev. Jonathan Hunting, of Southold, and Rev. Dr. Aaron Woolworth, of Bridgehampton, L. L., and also with Prof. Porter, of Andover, Mass. In 1812 he was licensed by the Long Island Presbytery, and in 1813 was ordained pastor of the church at Weshamption. He was chosen for three consecutive years to represent Pres bytery in the General Assembly, and was a great many times elected moderator. He died Oct. 23, 1865. Mr. Lucas was a man of fine abilities, and superior as an ex ecutive officer. He held a high place in the esteem and confidence of his ministerial brethren, and was always placed first on responsible commissions and committees. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Alm. 1867, p. 311.

Lucia, Sr., a Roman Catholic saint of the 8th or the beginning of the 4th century, is said to have been of a noble Sicilian family. Her legendary history is as fol ows. Having gone on a pilgrimage with her mother to the grave of St. Agatha for the restoration of the last er's health, she was to be resolved to become a nun. Her mother assured, but she was engaged to marry, angry at her resolution, denounced her as a Christian. She acknowledged the truth of the charge when brought before the judges, and was condemned to ear a brothel; but when Pascasius gave the order to take her thence it was found impossible to move her from the spot, even though yokes of oxen were employed to draw her. Pascasius now attempted to burn her, and had boiling pitch and oil poured on her, but in vain; he then ran her through with a sword, when she prophesied the downfall of Diocletian, the death of Maximian, and the arrest and death of Pascasius. She died after partaking of the body of the Lord, and on the spot a church was afterwards erected. Her life is contained in Laurentius Servius's De probatis Sanctorum historia, Dec. 13, and in a number of martyrologies, but it has often been a subject of debate whether her death was during the reign of Diocletian or of Galerius. She is therefore not found in the Acta Sanctorum. She is commemorated on Dec. 13.—Hertzog, Real Encyclop. viii, 496; Wetzer und Welte, Kirchen Lexikon, a. v.

Lucian (Ανεωνίας), a celebrated Greek rhetorician, the Voltaire of Greek literature, was born at Samosata, a city on the west bank of the Euphrates, in the Syrian province of Commagene. We possess no particulars regarding his life on which any reliance can be placed except a few scattered notices in his own writings. From these it appears that he was born about the later part of the 2nd century (A.D. 167). He lived under both the Antonines and died about the end of the 2nd century. His parents, who were in humble circumstances, placed him with his maternal uncle, a sculptor, in order to learn statuary; but he soon quitted this trade, and applied himself to the study of the law. However, he afterwards abandoned law and devoted himself to letters, but, not meeting with much success in this profession, he resolved to settle in Gaul as a teacher of rhetoric, where he soon obtained great celebrity and numerous scholars. He appears to have remained in Gaul till he was about forty, when he gave up the profession of rhetoric, after having acquired considerable wealth. During the remainder of his life we find him travelling about from place to place, and visiting successively Macedonia, Cappadocia, PaphLAGoria, and Bithynia. The greater part of his time, however, was passed in Athens, where he lived on terms of the greatest intimacy with Demosthenes, a philosopher of great celebrity, and where he probably wrote most of his works, which principally consist of attacks upon the religion and philosophy of his age. Towards the latter part of his life he held a lucrative public office in Egypt, which was bestowed upon him by Emperor Probus. Lucian tells us, "the government gave me ten to death by dogs for his attack on the Christian religion rests on no credible authority, and was probably invented by Suidas, who appears to have been the earliest to relate it. The writings of Lucian, in the form of dialogue, are in a remarkably pure and elegant Greek style, free from the false ornaments and artificial rhetoric which characterize most of the writings of his contemporaries. Modern critics have usually given him his full meed of praise for these excellences, and have also deservedly admired the keenness of his wit, his great talent as a writer, and the inimitable ease and flow of his dialogue; but they have seldom done him the justice he deserves. They have either represented him as merely a witty and amusing writer, but without any further merit, or else they have attacked him as an immoral and indelicate satirist, or as a contemptible person of mean qualities and manners. We are endeavor to expose all kinds of delusion, fanaticism, and imposture; the quackery and imposition of the priests, the folly and absurdity of the superstitious, and especially the solemn nonsense, the prating insouciance, and the immoral lives of the philosophical charlatans of his day (see his Deaceron). Lucian may, in fact, be regarded as the Aristophanes of his age, and, like the great comic poet, he had recourse to raillery and satire to accomplish the great objects he had in view. His study was human nature in all its phases, and he at all times in which he lived furnished ample materials for his observation. Many of his pictures, though drawn from the circumstances of his own days, are true for every age and country. As an instance of this, we mention the essay entitled On those who serve the Great for Hire. If he sometimes discloses the follies and vices of mankind too freely, and occasionally uses expressions which are revolting to our ideas of morality, it should be recollected that every author ought to be judged by his standard of religion and morality. The character of Lucian's mode of life was entirely practical; he was not disposed to believe anything without sufficient evidence of its truth, and nothing that was ridiculous or absurd escaped his raillery and sarcasm. The tales of the poets respecting the attributes and exploits of the gods, which were still firmly believed by the common people of his age, were especially the objects of his satire and ridicule in his dialogues and in many other of his works. That he should have attacked the Christians in common with the false systems of the pagan religions will not appear surprising to any one who considers the tenets that Lucian probably never took the trouble to inquire into the nature of the religion which he so constantly and universally despised in his time by the higher orders of society, who did, indeed, visit with ridicule all religious beliefs. Says Gibbon (Harper's "ed", i, 86), "We may be well assured that a writer conversant with the history and character of his country to public ridicule had they not already been the objects of secret contempt among the polished and enlightened orders of society." Volterraus, indeed, affirmed, without stating his authority, that Lucian apostatized from Christianity, and was accustomed to say he had gained nothing by it but the corruption of his name from Lucius to Lucianus. So also the scholiast on the Perigrinus calls him παραλογιαρχη, while the scholiasts on the Vera Historia and other pieces frequently apostrophize him in the blisteriest terms, and make the most facetious and absurd charges against him of ridiculing the Scriptures. These accusations of blasphemy, however, could be made only against an apostate, and such, it is now well established, Lucian was not. Born of pagan parents, he led the life of a pagan philosopher of the 2nd century, when, as Gibbon says, "A famous youth of extraordinary and grave manners, who, from ignorance of the Christian religion, has been led to venerate and misrepresent it. The charge might be urged with some color against Lucian if it could be shown that he was the author of the dialogue entitled Philopatris. A meering tone pervades the whole piece, which betrays so intimate a knowledge of Christianity that it could hardly have been written but by one who had been at some time within the pale of the Church. Some eminent critics, and among them Fabricius (Bibl. Gracca, v, S04 [ed. Harles]), have held Lucian accountable for this production, but it is now pretty generally admitted not from him, but from some lost work of the same author, Descriptio versus de Animae in De Atalante et Auctore Philopatride, in which it is shown that the piece could not have been Lucian's; and many considerations are brought forward which render it very probable that the work was composed in the reign of Julian the Apostate. Compare Neander, Church History, ii, 89, note 5.)

The works of Lucian may be divided into, I, RHEITORICAL.—Πείρα τον μυεας, Somnium seu Vita Luci-Ani: Προδοτος, Herodotus surre Actionis; Ζευς, ζευς ιτε Λιοκλής; Αρμονία, Harmonia; Σεβασμος ι Προδοτος, Ουπάτος, Ουπάτος ι Διάνσος, Bacchus; Προδοτος.

Contemplation, is a very elegant dialogue, but of a graver turn than the preceding; it is a picture of the smallness of mankind when viewed in proportion to the universe. A philosophical essay on the nature of Contemplative thought. The Epistle to Dr. JOHN STUART, 1737, which by many was considered a masterpiece of the philosophical age. The Katalogus Tres Tyrannus, is, in fact, a dialogue of the dead. "Omnium hoc Athenis, Somnium seu Gallus, justly reckoned among the best of Lucian's. Die Caryophyllaceae, as Aesop in America, so called from Lucian's being admired by Rhetoric and Dialogue, is chiefly valuable for the information it contains of the author's life and literary pursuits. We may here also mention the Knoteon, Cronos-Solon, and the Empylius Knoyunc, which turn on the institution and custody of the Saturnalia. Among the dialogues which may be regarded as mere pieces of burlesque or satire, no polychemical tendency, may be reckoned Erastus, Eunomoi Dieiologos, Dialogi Meretrici, and Poetae et Educi, Navigium seu Vota. Among the dialogues which cannot be placed in any of the above three classes are the Eileis, Imagines, which some suppose to have been addressed to a concubine of Verus, and which Wieland conjectures to have been intended for the wife of Marcus Antoninus; Tyger Wov Bivcat, Pro Imaginibus, a defence of the preceding, with the flattery of which the lady who was the subject of it pretended to be pleased. True Taros, True Athenians, An Answer to the Ideas of the Egyptians, an attack upon the Greek gymnasia; Piri Erevsius, De Salvatone: this is hardly worthy of Lucian, but contains some curious particulars of the art of dancing among the ancients. Miliarus proo Eunio, Dionysus in Athens, with a long and curious history, is not doubted. VI. MISCELLANEOUS PIECES.—These bear in their form some analogy to the modern essay: Piro tov eikontos Prumastas, In Lyno, and Ad eaxi qui subs Seyrat Promeneutheus and E Verba; Piri Sow, De Sacrificiis, against the absurdities of the heathen worship, and especially of the Egyptian. Piri tov uvmv svon, De Areopag Conduictis; Apollon proo Tov wos, De Merc Com. Cond; Tyger eir eirh prapapirgma naiomatos, Pro Lyra in Salutando, a playful little piece, though containing some curious learning. Piri vpsos, De Lucu, in opposition to the received opinions of the infernal regions. Piro avgisthotev, Adereus Isolocot, is a bitter attack upon a rich man who thought to acquire a character for learning by collecting a large library. Piri tov mpv eirevna denvvov, Non temere credimus, a piece of the most decided nature. In 1679 Charles published the first edition of the collection, with some additions. In 1685 he published the second edition, with some of the dialogues: it was reprinted in 1686 and 1751. The best German translation of Lucian has been furnished by Wieland (Leips. 1786, 6 vols. 8vo). The notes accompanying it are also valuable; but the translator left out one piece which held an interest of a minor nature. Another good translation is by Park (Stoughton, 1828-1831, 15 vols. 12mo). Lucian, St., presbyter of Antioch, and a martyr, is said by some to have been born at Samosata, in the Syrian province of Commagene, about the middle of the 2d century. His parents died while he was yet a boy, and, left to depend upon his own resources, the twelve-year-old lad removed to Edessa, where he remained and became a pupil of Macarius, an eminent Biblical schol-Lucian was a prolific writer of religious, philosophical, and political satires, often using the guise of a commentator or a historian to critique his contemporaries. In his work, he frequently employed the persona of a travelling and itinerant sage, a type of character that was popular in the Hellenistic world. This allowed him to comment on the social and political issues of his time without being directly associated with any particular faction. Lucian was also known for his innovative use of the novel form, which he developed for the first time in his work "On the Precepts of the Gourmets" ("De Consuetudine Gourmetorum"). His works reflect a deep understanding of the cultures of his time and his ability to weave together elements of mythology, philosophy, and contemporary issues in a way that was both entertaining and thought-provoking. Lucian's writings have been influential in the development of humor and satire in literature and have continued to be a source of inspiration for modern authors. His legacy as a master of comic writing End.

Lucifer, bishop of Caecilis, in Sardinia, surnamed Caloricus, a noted character in ecclesiastical history, the founder of an independent sect known as Luciferians, flourished about the middle of the 4th century. At the Council of Milan, held in 344, he appeared as joint legate with Eusebius of Vercelli from pope Liberus, and here he displayed great opposition to the Arian beliefs. He refused to hold any communion with the clergy who had, during the reign of Constantius, con formed to the Arian doctrines, although it had been determined in a synod at Alexandria, in 362, to receive again into the Church all the Arian clergy who openly acknowledged their errors, and was, in consequence, imprisoned for a time, and finally banished. He took up his residence in Syria, but here also became involved in disputes, and greatly increased the disorders which agitated the Church at Antioch by his ordination of Paulinus as bishop in opposition to Meletius. Disapproved of by his former friends, he retired in disgust to his native island, and there founded an independent sect, whose distinguishing tenet was that of Arian bishop, and no bishop who had in any measure yielded to the Arians, even although he repented and confessed his errors, could enter the bosom of the Church without the participation of the protector of Rome (B.C. 387; all 190, 15, 10--24). The whole form of the letter—the mention of the consuls, the description of the consuls by the praenomen, the omission of the senate and of the date (comp. Wernsdorff, DeindeMoor. §caul.)—shows that it cannot be an accurate copy of the original document; but there is nothing in the substance of the letter which is open to just suspicion. Josephus adds this information in the letter of "Lucius" in his account of Simon, but gives one very similar in contents (Ant.xiv.8,5), as written on the motion of Lucius Valerius in the ninth (nineteenth) year of Hyrcanus II; and unless the two letters and the two missions which led to them were purposely assimilated, which is not wholly improbable, it must be supposed that he has been guilty of a strange oversight in removing the incident from its proper place.

The imperfect transcription of the name has led to some confusion. Luciukleida of a male name, is the three consequences:--

1. (Lucius) FuriusPhilus(therista,Clouta,FustiHoll. iii,114,givesP.FuriusPhilus,whowasnotconsultill B.C.186,andisthereforeatonceexcluded.(2.)Lucius CæciliusMetellusCalvus,whowasconsultillB.C.142, and immediately after to Judah and the Hebrews. See supposition it might seem not unlikely that the answer which Simon received to an application for proco tion, which he made to Rome directly on his assumption of power (comp. 1 Macc. xiv. 17, 18) in the consularship of Metellus, has been combined with the answer to the later embassy of Numenius (1 Macc. xiv. 24; xv. 18). But the third identification with Lucius Calpurnius Piso, who was consul B.C. 159, is most probably correct. The date exactly corresponds, and, though the province of Lucius Calpurnius Piso is not easily determined beyond all question, the balance of evidence is decidedly against the common lists. The Fasti Capitolini are defective for this year, and only give a fragment of the name of Popillius, the fellow-consul of Calpurnius. Cassiodorus (Chron., as edited, p. 106 ed. Conp. Calpurnius, but the eye of the scribe (if the reading is correct) was probably misled by the names in the years immediately before. On the other hand, Valerius Maximus (i. 8) is wrongly quoted from the printed text as giving the same prenomen. The passage in which the name occurs is in reality no part of Valerius Maximus, but a piece of the abstract of Julius Parius inserted in the text. Of eleven MSS. of Valerius which have been examined, it occurs only in one (Mus. Brit. Burn. 209), and there the name is given Lucius Calpurnius, as it is given by Mal. In a collection of Fasti Capitolini (Soc. j. F. Vind. Comenius, 7). Significantly rightly (Fasti Capitolini, p. 207): "Cassiodorus prodit consuls Cn. Plonium...epictoma L. Calpurnium." The chance of an error of transcription in Julius Parius is obviously less than in the Fasti of Cassiodorus; and even if the evidence were equal, the author of the Fasti of Cassiodorus might rightly be urged as decisive in such a case.

Lucius of Adrianople (or Hadrianople), an Eastern prelate of note, flourished as bishop of Adrianople in the 4th century. Decisively orthodox in his opinions, the predominant and powerful Arians deposèd him from his see, and in 340 or 341 we meet him at Rome before pope Julius I pleading for his restoration. Although he was soon back with a deacon in the Roman pontiff to reseat the deposed orthodox bishop, the Oriental prelates refused to recognise the papal authority, and he did not recover his see until the emperor Constantius, constrained by the threats of his brother Constanta, then emperor of the West, restored Lucius (about 347). Upon the death of Constans (350), Lucius was again deposèd by the infuriated Arians, and banished. He died in exile. He is commemorated in the Roman Church February 11. See Athanasius, A po l o g y, de Pugia sua, c. 8; Arianor. ad Monach. c. 19; Socrates, Histor. eccles. c. 21, 26; Euseb. Hist. eccl., lib. ii, cap. 519; Smith, Dict. Grk. and Rom. Biog. and Myth, ii, 825.

Lucius of Alexandria, an Arian prelate, flourished about the middle of the 4th century. He was elected patriarch by the Arians, when, upon the death of the emperor Constantius (361) and the murder of the Arian patriarch, George of Cappadocia, Athanasius had recovered the patriarchate of Alexandria, and expelled the Arians from the churches. Even in the lifetime of Athanasius the two patriarchates wrangled much for authority, but the contest became fierce between Arian and Orthodox after the deathe of Athanasius (378). The latter had nominated his successor without any regard to Lucius, and it was only after the deposition and imprisonment of Peter, the nominee, who had in the mean while been ordained, that Lucius regained the patriarchate, to hold it only until Peter, who had made his escape to Rome, returned with letters confirming his ordination (A.D. 377 or 378). Lucius was, in all probability, never again restored. In 380 he is found in company with Demophilus, Arian patriarch of Constantinople, just as he was withdrawing from the city by order of expulsion. Nothing more is known of Lucius. According to Jerome, he wrote Sollemnes de Paschate (which is mentioned in a later list of his works). See also Hiero. Ep. Eccl. cit., liii, 4; iv, 21 sqq., 24, 37; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 471; Fabricius, Bibl. Graeca, ix, 247; Labbe, Concilii, vol. vi, col. 818; Smith, Dict. Grk. and Rom. Biog., ii, 928.

Lucius (Labeo, for Latin Lucius, a common Roman name), surname the Cyrenian (i.e., Kypriakos, "of Cyrene"), thus distinguished by the name of his city—the capital of a Greek colony in Northern Africa, and remarkable for the number of its Jewish inhabitants—is first mentioned in the N.T. in company with Barnabas, Simeon called Niger, Manaen, and Saul, who were with Paul at Antioch (Acts xiii, 1). A.D. 44. These honored disciples having, while engaged in the office of common worship, received commandment from the Holy Ghost to set apart Barnabas and Saul for the special service of the Gentiles, Paul, proceeding from this, to be called to their hands upon them. This is the first recorded instance of a formal ordination to the office of evangelist, but it cannot be supposed that so solemn a commission would have been given to any but such as had themselves been ordained to the ministry of the Word, and we may therefore assume that Lucius and his companions were already of that number. Whether Lucius was one of the seventy disciples, as stated by Pseudo-Hippolytus, is quite a matter of conjecture, but it is highly probable that he formed one of the congregation to whom Peter preached in the house of the woman at Joppa (Acts, i. 12, 21), though there can hardly be a doubt that he was one of "the men of Cyrene" who, being "scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen," went to Antioch preaching the Lord Jesus (Acts xii, 19, 20).

In the Apostolical Constitutions, vii, 46, it is stated that Paul made Lucius bishop of Hierapolis, which is probably a mere inference from the supposition that the epistle to the Romans was written from that Corinthian port. Different traditions make Lucius the first bishop of Cyrene and of Laodicea, in Syria.—Smith, a.v.

It is commonly supposed that Lucius is the kinsman of Paul mentioned by that apostle as joining with him in his salutation to the Roman brethren (Rom. xvi, 21). A.D. 55. There is, however, no sufficient reason for regarding him as identical with Luke the Evangelist, though this opinion was apparently held by Origen (ad loc.), and is supported by Calmet, as well as by Wetstein, who adds in confirmation of it the fact reported by Herodotus (iii, 121), that the Cyrenienses had throughout Greece a great reputation as physicians. But it must be observed that the names are clearly distinct. The missionary companion of Paul was not Lucius, but Luke; the former is described by Paul as "a beloved physician," a name by which he was known in three different epistles (Col. iv. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 11; Phil. 214), is never referred to as a relation. Again, it is hardly probable that Luke, who suppresses his own name as the companion of Paul, would have mentioned it among the names of the "seven bishops and prophets and teachers at Antioch." Olshausen, indeed, asserts confidently that the notion of Luke and Lucius being the same person has nothing whatever to support it (Clark's Theol. Lib. iv, 515). See Luke.

Lucius I, pope, succeeded Cornelius as bishop of Rome, after the death of the latter, in Sept. 253. He was soon after banished from Rome, but returned, and is spoken of as a martyr as early as March, 258. There seems, however, to be no precise information as to the length of his pontificate. Nicetopaurus (H. Ev. vii. 7) states that he held the office six months; Eusebius (H. Ev. vii. 2) says eight; and the Liber Pontificalis about eight months, which must certainly be an error. The latter work ascribes to him the ordinances forbidding any but persons of the purest morals and the best conduct to officiate at the altar, and all priests from entering alone the residence of the pope, without directing that the pope and the bishops were always to be attended by two priests and three deacons, who should bear witness of their conduct. A pseudo-decretal letter is also ascribed to him. According to Cyprian, Lucius I must have suffered a short exile from Rome during his pontificate, for Cyprian wrote Letters of congratulation on the occasion of his return from exile (Ep. 61 ad Luc.). According to this author (Ep. 65), Lucius wrote several letters on the treatment of backsliders, but they are not known at present. See Bower, Hist. of the Popes, I, 61; Tillemont, Memoriae, iv, 118 sq.

Lucius II, pope, of Bologna, properly GERARD CUSINUS, or CUSINELLO, was elected pope on August 22, 1078, at the instance of St. John of Lateran. He was made cardinal priest of Santa Croce in Jerusalem by Honorius II, and vice-chancellor and librarian of the Church of Rome by Innocent II. He was finally elected pope after the death of Celestine II, and his election was confirmed by the Romans, under the guidance of Arnold of Braccio, rose against the papal authority, determined, by an Arnould spirit [see ARNOLO D'BRACCIO], to re-establish the old republic, and to this end appointed a patrician in the capitol to govern them, and chose Jordan, son of Peter Leo, as such, giving him all the revenues of the city, and restricting the pope to the tithes and voluntary offerings. "Cesar should have the things that are Cesar's, the priest the things that are the priest's, as Christ ordained when Peter paid the tribute-money" (cited from Cyprian, Hist. I, iv, 101). The pope attempted to seize this revenue by force, and at the head of a band of armed followers, went forth to attack the capitol, but was wounded by a stone, and died of this wound, Feb. 25, 1145. See Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Rom. Empire, vi, 428 sq.; Reidel, See of Rome in the Middle Ages, p. 226 sq.; Bower, History of the Popes, vi, 52 sq. See also TEMPORAL POWER OF THE POPE.

Lucius III, properly Uraldo Alcucinigoli, belonged to a distinguished family of Lucca. He was made cardinal priest of St. Praxedes by Innocent II in 1146, and cardinal bishop of Ostia and Velletri by Adrian IV in 1153. Having distinguished himself in some negotiations with France, and allied the emperor Frederick, he became a prominent member of the "holy college," and was finally elected pope Sept. 2, 1181. Soon after his arrival at Rome, however, he got into difficulties with the Romans, and was finally obliged to flee the city. Christian, archbishop of Mentz and chancellor of the emperor, started to assist him with a large army, but died on the way. In 1183 Lewis returned to Rome, but his conduct and that of his followers having created fresh troubles, he soon left that city forever and retired to Verona, where he was nearer his imperial protector. The emperor himself arrived at Verona soon after, and the two princes held a consultation on the state of the Church. In this council the Romans were denounced as enemies of the Church, and the Waldenses also were put under the ban, and a crusade was advised to help the persecuted Christians in the East. While engaged in demanding assistance for the crusaders from the kings of England and France, Lucius fell sick and died, Nov. 24, 1183. His letters are in Maucci, Coll. Conciliarum, xxii. LUCKE, JOHANN PHILIPP, a German theologian, was born at Erbach, Sept. 28, 1728. In 1745 he entered the University of Jena. In 1750 he became preacher at Göttingen; two years later, town-pastor at Michelstadt; in 1757, assessor of the Consistory; two years after, professor of divinity, and four years later, appointed court preacher. He died Nov. 8, 1781. Well posted in all branches of theology, especially in Church history, familiar with the French, and furnished with the gift of eloquence, he was a most active and efficient worker for the preservation of the moral and religious principles of the Reformation. As a commentator, he was an opponent of the innovations of Bahrdt. The best of his works in these lines are his Erläuterungen des Briefes Pauli an die Gemeinen zu Galaten (Jena, 1758, 4to)—Erläuterungen des Briefes Pauli an die Römer (ibid, 1758, 4to). See Döring, Geschichte Theol. Deutschland's, vol. ii, 8, v.

LUCKE, GOTTFREID CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, an eminent German theologian, was born at Egelin, near Magdeburg, August 23, 1781. He studied theology at the universities of Halle and Göttingen. In 1818 he became lecturer in the latter university, and in 1816 went to Berlin University, and there lectured on the exegesis of the N. T. Here he became intimate with De Wette and Schleiermacher, whose views greatly influenced the remainder of his career as a theologian. In 1818 he was, at the same time as Gieseler, appointed professor at the newly-founded University of Bonn, and in 1827 became professor of theology at Halle. He died in that city Feb. 14, 1855. He wrote Commentatio de Ecclesia Christianorum apostolicae (Göttingen, 1818, 4to):

—Über den neutestament. Kanon des Eusebius von Cäsarea (Berlin, 1816, 8vo)—Grundriß d. neutestam. Hermeneut. u. ihrer Geschichte (Berlin, 1817, 8vo)—Comment. de S. D. Schriften d. Evangelisten Johannes (Bonn, 1820—24, 8 vols. 8vo; 8d ed. 1845—56; transl. into English under the title Commentary on the Epistles of St. John, Edinb. 1837, 12mo)—Questions ad eundem Didymum (Göttingen, 1829, 4 parts, 4to). He also took part with De Wette and Schleiermacher in the publication of the Theologische Zeitschrift (Berlin, 1819—22, 8 vols. parts, 4to), and with Gieseler in that of the Zeitschrift für gebildete Christen (Elberfeld, 1823 and 1824, 4 parts 8vo). He also contributed some valuable articles to the Theol. Studien u. Kriften—Hefte, Nour. Blog. Genér. xxxi, 1561; Pierer, Universal-Lexicon, x, 569; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. viii, 525 sq.; Darling, Cyclop. Bibl. ii, 1879; Kitto, Cyclop. of Bibl. Lit. ii, 460.

Luckingbach, Abraham, a Moravian missionary among the Delaware tribe of the North American Indians, was born in Lehigh County, Pa., May 5, 1777; entered Nazareth Hall, by invitation, in 1815; was, by appointment, at the mission station of the Delaware Indian Hymn-book, and published in the Delaware language Select O.T. Scripture Narratives. See De Schweinitz, Life and Times of David Zeisberger, p. 659.

Luckey, Samuel D.D., a noted minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Rensselaer-ville, Albany County, N. Y., April 4, 1791; entered the ministry in 1816; removed to Canada in 1833; was appointed in 1816, inclusive, labored at Dutchess, Montgomery, Saratoga, and Pittstown, and in 1817—18 in the city of Troy. In 1819 he was at Rhinebeck; and in 1820—21 at Schenectady, where he received from Union College the degree of master of arts and of doctor of divinity. The next ten years of his life were spent at New Haven, Brooklyn, Albany, and as presiding elder on the New Haven District. In 1822 he became principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary at Lima, N. Y., where he remained four years. At the General Conference of 1836 he was a delegate, and was elected to the editorship of the Christian Advocate and Journal at New York. At that time the office involved the senior editorship of the Book Room. After an honorable service of four years he returned to the itinerancy, first for a time at Duane Street, New York, and in 1842 was again transferred to the Genesee Conference. From this time to the day of his death (Oct. 11, 1860) he remained in Western New York, residing mostly in Rochester City, but filling the offices of presiding elder, pastor, and chaplain of the Monroe County Penitentiary, in which latter position he served for nine years, beholding great crowds of the poor and the fallen. Dr. Luckey had also the honor to be appointed in 1847 one of the regents of the State University. He wrote an excellent treatise on the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, a work on the Trinity (a respectable 12mo volume, which gained for him a wide repute for theological acumen and polemical tact), and a small volume of Ethic Hymns and Scriptural Lessons for Children. The hymns, which are original and not without merit, are rhetorical paraphrases of Scripture, mostly of the Psalms. The Lyceum was a school for the education of the younger power of intellect. For depth of penetration and soundness of judgment he had few superiors. His knowledge of the forms and principles of law, both civil and ecclesiastical, was quite extensive. He was a thorough Methodist and an admirer of the genius and historical development of his Church he was as familiar with as the alphabet. He long stood among the magnates of his people, and his history is woven in the history of his Church." See Conf. Minutes, 1670, p. 290 sq.

Lucopertrians is the name given to a sect offanatics and ascetics who believed in a double Trinity, rejected marriage, scorned all external forms of worship, and adopted absurdly allegorical interpretations of Scripture. They were believed to have had as their founder an ecclesiastic by the name of Lucopertrus, but the probability is that Lucopertrus is a nickname, and it is said to have been given to a person called Peter, who promised to die on the third day after he was birth, and who was called Wolf-Peter or Lucopertrus afterwards, because the devil on that day appeared to his followers in the shape of a wolf. See BOOMGAARD, MESSALIA.

Lucretius, Titus Carus, a noted Roman poet, deserves a place here as the exponent of Epicureanism. He wrote some time towards the opening of the 1st century, but of his life we know almost nothing with certainty, as he is mentioned merely in a cursory manner in contemporary literature. St. Jerome, in his translation of the Chronicle of Eusebius, gives the date of his birth as B.C. 38 (according to others, 89), but he does not specify the source from which his statement is derived. It is alleged, further, that he died by his own hand, in the 44th year of his age, having been driven frantic by a love-poison which had been administered to him; that he composed his works in the intervals of his madness, and that these works were revised by Cicero; but all these statements rest on very insufficient authority, and must be received with extreme caution. His peculiar opinions rendered him specially obnoxious to the early Christians, and it is possible that the latter may have been too easily led to attribute to him a fate which in his own nature and curious literary and intellectual termination, was deemed but a due reward for the bold and impious character of his teachings. The great work on which his fame rests is De Rerum Natura, a philosophical didactic poem in six books (edióto princeps, Brescia, abridged in the 1st edition by Wakefield [London, 1796, 3 vols. 4to.] and [Glasgow, 1812, 4 vols. 8vo.]), by Forbiger [Leips. 1829, 12mo.], and by Lachmann [Berlin, 1850, 2 vols.]. English translations in verse by Creek [London, 1714, 2 vols. 8vo.], Good [London, 1803-7, 2 vols. 4to.]; in prose by the Rev. J. S. Watson, M.A. [London, Bohn's Classical Library, 1851, post 8vo.]. In these measure an exposition of the physical, moral, and religious tenets of Epicurus. See Epicurean Philosophy. "Regarded merely as a literary composition, the work of Lucretius stands unrivalled among didactic poems. The clearness and fulness with which the most minute facts of physical science, and the most subtle philosophical speculations are unfolded and explained; the life and interest which are thrown into discussions, in themselves repulsive to the bulk of mankind; the beauty, richness, and variety of the episodes which are interwoven with the main thread of the poem, combined with the majestic verse in which the whole is clothed, render the De Rerum Natura, as a work of art, one of the most perfect which antiquity has bequeathed to us" (Chambers, Cyclopaedia, s. v.). Lud (Heb. לוד, derivation unknown; Sept. Ἀθῆ, but in Ezek. Ἀθης; Auth. Vera. "Lydia," in Ezek. xxx. 5), the name apparently of two nations. See Ethnic.

1. The fourth son of Shem (B.C. post 5058), and founder of a tribe near the Assyrians and Aramaens (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chron. 1, 17). According to Josephus (Antiq. i. 6, 4), they were the Lydians; in which opinion agree Eusebius, Jerome, and other fathers. Later authorities (Bochart, Phaleg, and Geigenius) express a contrary opinion. On the contrary, Michaelis (Spegiol. ii. 114 sq.) reads θιλυσ, and understands the Indians (see also his Supplement, No. 1146, comp. Vater, Comment. i. 180). Lud would thus be represented by the Lydus of the mythical period (Herod. i. 7). "The Semitic character of the manners of the Litt. ... and by the Persians for the consolidation of the Persian kingdom during its latest period and after the Persian conquest, but before the predominance of Greek art in Asia Minor, favor this idea; but, on the other hand, the Egyptian monuments show us in the 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries B.C. a powerful people called Tyrrows or Ludens, probably seated near Mesopotamia, and apparently north of Palestine, whom some, however, make the Assyrians. We may perhaps conjecture that the Lydians first established themselves near Palestine, and afterwards spread into Asia Minor; the occupiers of the inland seat of the race being over-ridden or removed by the Assyrians." With the latter supposition, compare the apocryphal statement in Judith ii. 23. See Lyd.

2. One of the Hamitic tribes descended from Mizram (Lud, Gen. x. 18), apparently a people of Africa (perhaps of Ethiopia), sprung from the Egyptians, and so accustomed to fight with bows and arrows (Ezek. xxvii. 10, 11, 12; Is. liv. 19, where they are associated with Cush and Phut; comp. the Ludim, Jer. xi. 9, and the Phud and Lud of Judith ii. 23). Some have referred the name to the people of Ludigia, on the western coast of Africa, south of Morocco (see Michaelis, Spegioi. ii. 114 sq.; also Suppl. No. 1147); and combined with this the mention of a river Lud in Tangitania (Pliny, v. 2). Others, as Bochart (Phaleg, iv. 56) and Geigenius (Comment. ad loc. Isa.), regard them as one of theEthiopians. Hitzig (Comment. ad loc. Is. and Jer.) thinks that the Libyans are intended (by an interchange of letters), but Nubia appears to be rather indicated by the scriptural notices. Still more improbable is the supposition of Forster (Op. ad Michael, p. 13 sq.), that the inhabitants of the oasis are intended, designated in Coptic by a term having some resemblance to Lud. The Arabic interpreters have Tunites; the Targum of Jonathan renders inhabitants of the nome of Neit. The opinion of Michaelis (Suppl. No. 1148), that by the Ludim the Libyans are meant, and the Lydians and Libyans, has lately been rejected by Geigenius (Thes. Heb. p. 746) with the remark that the Egyptians and Tyrians employed soldiers from Asia Minor in their armies (Herod. ii. 152, 154, 156; iii. 1). But the Egyptians, at least, had also mercenary troops from Africa, and the Asians referred to were only from Ionis and Caria. Rosellini (Monument. stor. iii. i. 281 sq.) speaks of a province of Ludim, but the locality is uncertain. See Ludim.

Ludmilla, Elisabeth von Schwarberg RE-DOLFRSTADT, a noted female hymnist of Germany, was born April 7, 1640, and died March 12, 1672. She wrote 215 hymns, many of which are the pearls of German sacred song and historic devie were published en masse under the title Die Stimme der Frauen (new ed. 1880). See her biography by Thiilo (1856).

Luddeke, Christoph Wilhlem, a German theologian, was born at Schonberg, Prussia, Mar. 8, 1737. In 1758 he went to the Levant as a preacher of the Danish mission, and afterwards became pastor of the Lutheran Church at Thessalonica. In 1768 he accepted a call to Magdeburg as pastor; in 1773 to Stockholm, as German preacher and inspector of the German Lyceum. He died June 18, 1803. He was an excellent scholar in many branches of theology, and done much for mission and education, and by his contributions to the literature on the Orient contributed largely to Biblical geography. His Expositio brevis locorum Sacrae Scripturae ad Orientem esse referentium, etc., deserves special mention (Halle, 1777, 1802).—Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, vol. ii., s.v.

Lüderwald, Johann Balthasar, D.D., a German theologian, was born at Fahrland, Prussia, Sept. 27, 1722. He entered the University of Halle, and, having finished the academical course, became in 1742 tutor; in 1747, pastor at Glentorf, near Holmstäd, afterwards superintendent and first pastor at Forsfelde, where he died, Aug. 25, 1796. He is noted as a defender of the true doctrine of the inerrancy of the Holy Scriptures, and of the Protestant church. He published the Werke in 13 folio volumes.

Ludwibergi, (Ludwigeri, or Lutgardis), a celebrated thuramuchtasker of the 12th century, was born about 1182. At the early age of twelve she entered the Benedictine convent of St. Trudo, and soon gave evidence of mystical tendencies. She claimed to have visions in which she held familiar converse with the Virgin Mary, the angels, John the Baptist and the apostles, St. Catherine, and a number of other saints. Once she stated she had seen St. John the evangelist in the form of a shining eagle, who, opening her mouth with his beak, filled her with divine wisdom. But Christ himself was generally the object of her ecstatic visions. After taking the veil in 1200, she was in 1205 appointed abbess of the convent. In 1206, by advice of John de Liro and of St. Christine, she entered the convent of the Cistercians of Aquin, near Brussels. Here her visions became still more striking and numerous; in her meditations on the sufferings of Christ her body became covered with blood, etc. She was also said to have worked a great number of miracles. She died June 16, 1246. Her biography was written by the Dominican Thomas Cantpirantius. See Johan Stol, Legenden (Freib. 1856), vol. ii., l.c. Herzog, Real-Encyklop., viii. 511.

Lüdcke, Johann August, a German theologian, was born at Cotten Sept. 15, 1727, and was educated at the Universities of Halle and Frankfort-on-the-Oder. In 1759 he became tutor; in 1762, subrector of the German Reformed town-school of his native place; in 1776, pastor at Gneschach, where he remained until 1813. He died at Glogau, Jan. 28, 1821. For a list of his works see Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, vol. ii., s.v.

Lu'uddin (Heb. 'Uuddin; "fear of God").""Awâ'iziy; in Jer. Awâeësà; in A.V. "Ludins,") a Mizzrahitian or Egyptian people or tribe (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chron. i. 11; Jer. xvi. 9), probably the same with Lùd, No. 2. From their position at the head of the list of the Mizzraities, it is probable that the Ludim were settled to the west of Egypt more than forty years before any other race of the same stock. In Islamic narratives—"Tarshish, Pue, and Lud, that draw the bow (_xlabel, _xlabel, ) Tubal, and Javan, the isles afar off (lxvi. 19). Here the expression in the plural, "that draw the bow" (Vulg. tendere sagittam), may refer only to Lud, and therefore not connect it with one or both of the names preceding it, and its comparison with the other three passages, in all which Phut is mentioned immediately before or after Lud or the Ludim, goes to confirm the Sept. reading, Phut, _sûbûn_ for Pue, a word not occurring in any other passage, as the true one; and we also notice coincident the extraordinary change from _xlabel_ to _xlabel_. See Pue; _Menôch_. Jeremiah, in speaking of Phut and Shem's army, makes mention of "Cush and Phut that handle the buckler, and the Ludim that handle [and] bend the bow" (xlvii. 9). Here the Ludim are associated with African nations as mercenaries or auxiliaries of the king of Egypt, and it therefore seems probable, _prima facie_, that the Mizzraithian Ludim are intended. Ezekiel, in the description of Tyre, speaks thus of Lud: "Pue, Lud, and Phut were in thine army, thy men of war: buckler (_xlabel_ and helmet hung they up in thee; they set thine adorning" (xxvii. 10). In this place Lud might seem to mean the Semitic nation of Lud, especially noted in Asia Minor and Lydia; but the association with Phut renders it as likely that the nation or country is that of the African Ludim. In the prophecies against Gog a similar passage occurs. "Pue, Cush, and Phut (A.V. "Libya") with them [the army of Gog]; all of them [with buckler (_xlabel_) and helmet" (xviii. 8, 9). It seems from this that there were Pan-African mercenaries at this time, the prophet probably, if speaking of a remote future period, using their name and that of other well-known mercenaries in a general sense. The association of Pue, Cush, and Phut in the former passage therefore loses somewhat of its weight. In one of the prophecies against Egypt Lud is thus mentioned among the supports of that country: "And the sword shall come upon Mizrain, and great pain shall be in Cush, at the falling of the slain in Mizram, and they shall take away her multitude (_xlabel_ and her foundations shall be broken down. Cush, Phut, and Lud, and all the mingled people (_xlabel_ and Chub, and the children of the land of the covenant, shall fall by the sword with them" (xxx. 4, 5). Here Lud is associated with Cush and Phut, and forms an African nation. The Ereb, whom we have called "mingled people" rather than "strangers," appear to have been an Arab population of the Sinaitic peninsula, perhaps including Arab or half-Arab tribes of the Egyptian desert to the east of the Nile. Chub is a name nowhere else occurring in the text, which perhaps should be suspended for the country or nation of the Lubim. See Chur; Ludim. The "children of the land of the covenant," may be some league of tribes, as probably were the Nine Bows of the Egyptian inscriptions; or the expression may mean nations or tribes allied to Egypt, as though a general designation for the rest of its supporters besides those specified. It is noticeable that in this passage, although Lud is placed among the close allies or supporters of Egypt, it yet follows African nations, and is followed by a nation or tribe at least partly inhabiting Asia. This would possibly also partly inhabiting Africa. See Egypt.

There can be no doubt that but one nation is intended in these passages, and it seems that thus far the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the Mizzraithian Ludim. There are several instances in the Bible both of Egyptian and Greek mercenaries or auxiliary forces of the Egyptian army. Egyptian mercenaries or troops, besides of African, and perhaps of those bordering Egypt on the east. We have still to inquire how the evidence of the Egyptian monuments and of profane history may affect our supposition. From the former we learn that several foreign nations contributed allies or mercenaries to the Egyptian armies. Among them we identify the Reni with the Lubim, and the Shary-anatana with the Cherethim, who also served in David's army. The latter were probably from the coast of Pales tine, and, as such, may have been drawn into the service of the Egyptian army from an insular portion of the same people. The rest of these foreign troops seem to have been of African nations, but this is not certain. The evidence of the monuments reaches no lower than the time of the Belostite line. There is a single foreign contemporary inscription recorded on one of the colossi of the temple of Abu-Simbel in Nubia, noting the passage of Greek mercenaries of a Pammechites, probably the first (Wilkinson, Modern Egypt and Thebes, ii, 329). From the Greek writers, who give us information from the time of Pammechites I downwards, we learn that "数十 mediocris, 50,000 and the like," was the number of an important element in the Egyptian army in all times when the country was independent, from the reign of that king until the final conquest by Ochus. These mercenaries were even settled in Egypt by Psammethichus. There does not seem to be any mention of them in the Bible; they are included by Lud and the Ludim in the passages that have been considered. It must be recollected that it is reasonable to connect the Shemitic Lud with the Lydians, and that at the time of the prophets by whom Lud and the Ludim are mentioned the Lydian kingdom generally or always included a more western part of Asia Minor, so that the Lud and Ludim might well apply to the Ionian and Carian mercenaries drawn from this territory. See LUD.

The manner in which these foreign troops in the Egyptian army are characterized is perfectly in accordance with the account of the mercenaries of the monarchical period of the Bible, which, although about six centuries earlier than the prophet's time, no doubt represent the same condition of military matters. The only people of Africa beyond Egypt portrayed on the monuments whom we can consider as most probably of the same stock as the Egyptians are the ReBU, who are the Libyim of the Bible, almost certainly the same as the Mizrahit Lehabin (q. v.); therefore we may take the ReBU as probably illustrating the Ludim, supposing the latter to be Mizraites, in which case they may indeed be included under the same name as the Libyim, if the appellative BeU be wider than that of the Ludim of the Bible, and also as illustrating Cush and Phut. The last two are spoken of as handling the buckler. The Egyptians are generally represented with small shields, frequently round; the ReBU with small round shields, for which the term here used, קַרְנָה, the small shield, and the expression "that handle," are perfectly appropriate. The Ludim should have been archers, and apparently armed with a long bow that was strong with the aid of the foot by treading (יוּחַּק וּכּוֹד), is noteworthy, since the Africans were always famous for their archery. The ReBU, and one other of the foreign nations that served in the Egyptian army—the monuments show the former only as enemies—were bowmen, being armed with a bow of moderate length; the other mercenaries—of whom we can only identify the Philistine Cherethim, though they probably include certain of the mercenaries or auxiliaries mentioned in the Bible—carrying swords and javelins, but not bows. These facts of agreement, founded on our examination of the monuments, are of no little weight, as showing the accuracy of the Bible. See SHIELD.

Ludke, Friedrich Germainus, a German theologian, was born at Stendal, Prussia, April 10, 1730. He began his academical course very young, and, upon its completion, became a sub-deacon of the Nicolai Church at Berlin, which office he held until his death, March 8, 1792. He was looked upon by his contemporaries as a man of an independent, decided, and philosophical mind, and ably defended the Christian truths. He was also an earnest advocate of tolerance, and wrote "About Toleranee and Freedom of Conscience."—Dörffer, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, vol. ii, s. v.

Ludlow, John, D.D., L.L.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born at Aquacacanonock, now Passaic, N. J., Dec. 13, 1793; graduated at Union College, Rensselaer, in 1813, and at the Theological Seminary, New Brunswick, N. J., 1817. His first settlement was in the First Reformed (Dutch) Church of New Brunswick, 1817; in 1819 he was elected professor in the theological seminary at that place: in 1823 he became pastor of the First Reformed (Dutch) Church in Albany, where he sustained himself with great power as a preacher, pastor, and public man. In 1834 he was installed as the 62nd bishop of the synod of the Netherlands, and retained that position with distinguished ability until 1852, when he returned to New Brunswick as professor of ecclesiastical history and Church government in the theological seminary, and also as professor of political philosophy in Rutgers College. He died in 1857, in the full assurance of hope and of faith. In every respect Dr. Ludlow was "a mighty man, physically, mentally, spiritually; as a theologian, a preacher, and a leader of men. He was full of power. His intelligence was as his body, compact, and vigorous. His will and his emotional nature were equally strong. His spirit and labors in the pulpit, in the professor's chair, at the head of the university, and in public bodies, were always direct, well ordered, and indomitable. He adored every relation that he sustained, and was one of the very finest specimens of intellectual and moral nobility."—Sprague, Ammiad: Memorial Sermons by Drs. George W. Bethune, Isaac Ferris, and W. J. R. Taylor; Corwin, Manual of the Reformed Church; N. Y. Observer (1860); American College Presidents, etc. (Long, 1864). Ludlow, Peter, a Baptist minister, was born in Enfield, Conn., Aug. 8, 1797, of Presbyterian parentage. He was for a time a member of Princeton College, N. J.; then began the study of law, but his religious convictions became so deep that he decided to become a minister. The distinguished Summerfield aided him in his theological studies. He joined the Baptist Church, received license, and was ordained Sept. 2, 1823 pastor of the Second Baptist Church in Providence, R. I. His continued ill-health necessitated his acceptance of a call to the Baptist Church in Georgetown, S. C. He died in New York, in 1857. Sprague says of him: "His talents were of a high order, and he was not less distinguished for his evangelical views than for his attractive and effective eloquence." See Sprague, Ammiad: The American Pulpit, vi, 727 sq.

Ludolf, Jon, a noted Ethiope scholar, also a lawyer and statesman of distinguished merit, was born at Erfurt, in Thuringia, in 1694. After finishing his education, he spent several years in travelling, and subsequently filled important stations in his native city, and under the elector palatine at Frankfurt. He then devoted himself to the completion of his works, of which his Ethiope History, and his commentaries on it, his Amharic and Ethiopic Grammar, and Ethiopic Lexicon, are the most valuable, and have universally met with the highest esteem from the learned.

Ludolph de Saxonia was distinguished among the Dominican mystics of the 14th century. He entered the Order about A.D. 1300, and in further pursuance of his pious devotion became a Carmelitan at Strasburg. His Vita Jesu Christi has often been edited and translated into various languages. He flourished in Saxony, but the date both of his birth and death are unknown.

Lüders, John H., an American Roman Catholic priest of great ability and note, was born at Litten, in the Diocese of Newark, New Jersey, in 1827; entered St. Mary's Theological Seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio, and was consecrated priest in 1846, and bishop of Fort Wayne in 1856. He desires the commendation of all Christian people for his great zeal in behalf of educational facilities for the negro classes under his charge. He was especially active during his presidency over the diocese of Northern Indiana, where he built many churches and established schools. He died in Cleveland, Ohio, June 29, 1871.

Luf, Friedrich Matthias, a German theologian, was born at Kirch-Russelbach, Aug. 8, 1706. In 1728 he entered the University of Aldorf, where his uncle, G. G. Zelter, was then professor of theology and of the Oriental languages. In 1730, when Prof. Zelter resigned his professorship and became pastor at Poppersbusen, Luf accompanied him, and was made a curate in 1728. He became a chaplain at Flirth, where he unexpectedly died, May 24, 1740. His death caused great grief, since his knowledge and unwearied diligence gave promise of future usefulness and eminence. He rendered great service in issuing the Bible-works of Zelter. He committed all the German productions to print, but among his works valuable MSS. were found, intended as preparations for quite extensive labor. See Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschl. vol. ii. s. v.

LuGo, Juan de, a learned Spanish Jesuit and cardinal, was born at Madrid, Nov. 25, 1588, and for twenty years was theological professor at Rome; was made cardinal in 1648, and died Aug. 20, 1660. In his office as cardinal he was distinguished for his plain manner of life, and the sympathy of the poor, and the Jesu- natei Dominica (Lyons, 1633, fol.): —De Sacramentis in genere (1658, fol.): —Responsorum Moralis lib. vi (1651, fol), etc. All his works were collected in seven large folios (Venice, 1751). Pallavicini boasted of having been his pupil. Liguori names him as a theologian of the school of Thomas Aquinas.

Lugo's brother Francisco was also a Jesuit, and a sort of several theological works. They are of minor value, however. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Génér. xxxii, 212.

Lüthiith (Heb. Luchîth, לְעֵיחה; always with the art. prefixed, prob. tabellad, see below); Sept. Aowía; but in Jer. [לְעֵיחָה] Aowía v. r. Aowía, a Moabith place (but whether a town or not is uncertain, as it is one of the names of the "ascent of Luhith"), always apparently situated on an eminence between Zoar and Horma- nain, on the track of the invading Babyliotians (Isa. xvi, 5; Jer. xxlii, 5). According to Eusebius, it lay between Aroplis and Zoar. M. de Saucley thinks it may have been situated on the hill Nukheh, about half way up on the south side of the ravine leading north-easterly from the northern opening of the penin- sula of the Dead Sea (Narrative, i, 386, 267, and map). The position is probably not far from correct (although not between Az and Zoar), but no such name appears on Robinson's or Zimmermann's map: it does, however, on Vans de Velde's.

Lahith, "as a Hebrew word, signifies 'made of boards or posts' (Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 748); but why assume that a Moabish spot should have a Hebrew name? By the Syriac interpreters it is rendered 'paved with flag- stones' (Eichhorn, Alg. Bibliothek, i, 845, 872). In the Targums (Pseudojon. and Jerus. on Numb. xxi, 16, and Jonathan on Isa. xvi, 1) Lechaith is given as the equiva- lent of Ar-Moab. This may contain an allusion to Luchith, or it may point to the use of a term meaning 'as for our own convenience, namely, the Moabites and St. John with the Lamb, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan; the Elthrough Madame, painted in 1521, the Drunkeness of Noah, and other works in the gallery of the Brera at Milan; the frescoes of the Monastero Maggiore, or San Maurizio, in the same city, from which, however, the ultramarine and gold have been scraped off; several at Sarzana, among them his chef-d'œuvre, Christ disputing with the Doctors; and other extensive and equally good works in the Franciscan convent Dégli Angeli at Lugano, on the lake of that name. The date of his death is not exactly known, but he was alive in 1500.

He had a brother, Ambrogio, who imitated his style, and several sons who also were painters. See English Cyclop. s. v.; Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.

Luitprand, or Liudprand, king of Lombardy (A.D. 712-744), was born towards the close of the 7th century. In 702 his father, Ansprand, a powerful Lombard lord, and an adherent of king Liutprand, having been defeated by the usurper Aribert II, retired to the Bavarian court. He was joined there by Luitprand, but the other members of his family, having fallen into the hands of Aribert, were put to death. In 712 Luitprand and his father succumbed to the same fate, owing Aribert having been a learned dying shortly after, Luitprand succeeded to the throne. His first care was to restore peace to his kingdom, suffering from internal dissensions. He enacted a series of laws in the years 712, 717, 720, 721, 725, 724, which, with the Edict of the Lombard law as it remained in force in Northern Italy until the 14th, and in the kingdom of Naples until the 16th century. Peace and prosperity once restored to his people, Luitprand eagerly sought for an opportunity for the ascertainment of his dominions. He had his eye especially on Rome and the exarchate, and when the quarrel broke out between the pope and the emperor of Constantinople concerning image worship, Luitprand suddenly announced himself and his Lombards devout worshippers of images, and, under pretence of taking the pope's part, he undertook the reestablishment of Ravenna and several cities. But pope Gregory II, eager at once to strengthen the power of Lombardy, and the prospect that hereafter the papacy might be dependent on the rule of a people looked upon as vile barbarians [see Lombards], preferred to seek aid in other quarters not only for himself, but also for the exarch, about as little as to be numbered. He therefore enjoined upon the duke of Venetia to aid the exarch in retaking the provinces seized by Luitprand. Gregory at the same time persuaded the inhabitants of the dukies of Spoleto and Benevento to throw off the Lombard yoke. Luitprand, however, marched the pope in cunning, for he no sooner learned the position of the pontiff than he turned to the side of the exarch, and, after having aided him in subduing his insurgent provinces, marched himself against Rome, with the intention of taking his revenue on the pope. The latter, however, succeeded in pacifying Luitprand, and the Lombard returned into his kingdom. In 736, being dangerously ill, he surrendered for a while his power to his nephew Hildebrand, whom the Lombards had elected his successor, but when he recovered his health he found himself obliged to divide his authority between Hildebrand and with Hildebrand, as the latter was the more naturally formed against him by pope Gregory III, and the dukes of Spoleto and Benevento and the exarch of Ravenna, and, to punish the incumbency of the apostolic see, he appeared before the gates of Rome. The pope, in his distress, called in the Charles Martel for assistance. Gregory's appeal is truly touching: "His tears are falling night and day for the destitute state of the Church. The Lombard king and his son are ravaging the last remains of the property of the Church, which no longer suffices for the daily service; they have invaded the territory of Rome, and seized all his farms. His only hope is in the timely succor of the Frankish king." Valuable pres- ents accompanied this appeal—among them the mystic keys of the sepulchre of St. Peter, and fillets of his chains, which no Christian could resist—also a proffer of the title of Emperor and Consul of the Romans, which the deliverer of the Eternal City was to become even the patron of the Romish Church. Of course Martel an- swered favorably to such an invitation. Unfortunately, however, for the Romish cause, he died shortly after. But, even before Martel could have taken the field against Luitprand, the latter had been induced to withdraw his troops from Rome. A state of hostility, how- ever, continued between the Lombards and the Romans until the death of Gregory III. The next pontiff (Zachary) finally succeeded, by a personal visit to Luitprand, in securing a treaty with the Lombards, on the terms that the latter restored to the Church all the possessions taken from it during the war. Luitprand thereafter seems to have been favorably inclined towards Zachary and the Church. He died in January, 744. See Paul Diacre.
LUTPRAND, or LUTPRAND, a distinguished Italian historian, who accompanied the Franks to Pavia; or, (as Bleek supposed, from the address of the papal legation, to have accompanied the Franks to Ravenna) to Pavia. Col. A.D. 920, of a noble family very high in favor at the court of king Hughes. Lutprand received a very good education, and was at an early age appointed deacon of the cathedral of Pavia. He soon after became chancellor of king Berengar, by whom he was, about 946, sent on a mission to Byzantium, but by the year 960, he fell under the displeasure of the king and queen Willa, and retired to the court of Otho I of Germany. He remained there eleven years, learned the language of the country, and became acquainted with all the most distinguished chancellors. In 958 he began, at the request of the bishop of Elyra, to write a history of his own age, and he continued this task until 962, when he returned to Otho in Italy. He was now at once appointed bishop of Cremona, and was in 963 sent by Otho to pope John XII, ostensibly for the purpose of assuring the pope that it was good policy to incite the Roman aristocracy against the emperor. Shortly after, when the pope was accused before the Synod of Rome, Lutprand spoke against him in the name of the emperor. Two years afterwards Otho sent him again to Rome, to be present with the bishop of Spala, to direct the pontifical election, a duty which he excelled in, to the emperor's entire satisfaction. In 968 Lutprand went to Constantinople to negotiate a marriage between princess Theophania and the son of Otho, but he failed in it. In 971 he was sent, with some others, to renew negotiations for the same object, Nicholas being dead; but he died himself soon after, in the early part of 972. His works, which are of great value for the history of those times, are Antapodosis, begun at Frankfort-on-the-Maine in 958, concluded in Italy in 962, a historical work, in which he seeks to revenge himself for the wrongs he had suffered, especially from Berengar and Willa; Libri de rebus gestis Ottomae Magni imperatoris, an account of events from 950 to 964, which is the more valuable from the fact that Lutprand was an eyewitness and often an actor in all the occurrences he relates.—Relatio de legatione Constantino-poli- tana, 968, very important for the information it contains on events and customs, and the best written of Lutprand's works. The Antapodosis and Historia Ottomis, of which the original MS., partly in Lutprand's own handwriting, is preserved in the library of Munich, were published at Antwerp (1640, fol.), and in 1749, a modern critical work which still belongs to the great classics of ages, as those of Reuber and Du Chesne, and in the Scriptores of Muratori, vol. ii. The best edition of Lutprand's works is contained in Pertz, Monumenta, vol. iii, who has also published them separately. A German translation of the Antapodosis was published by the baron of Osten-Sacken (Berlin, 1838.), with an Introduction by Wattenbach. Lukan, the evangelist, and author of the Acts of the Apostles. Although himself not an apostle, he has admirably supplemented their labors, he has thus laid the literary world under lasting honor. I. His Name. This, in the Greek form, Λούκας, is abbreviated from Λουκάνας, the Greek equivalent of the Latin Lucanus, or Λουκάς, Lucullus (comp. Silvanus; Aedes for Aenamass; Zenas for Zenodorus; Winer, Gr. Text. p. 115). The contraction of οὗτος into ὁ is said to be characteristic of the names of slaves (see Lebeck, De Substantiva, in ὁ εὐαγγελιστής, in Wolf, Ancit. iii, 49), and it has been inferred from this that Luke was of Greek extraction (which may also be gathered from the implied contrast between his characters, mentioned Col. iv, 12, and the ὁ εὐαγγελιστής, ver. 11), and a libertus, or freedman. This latter idea has found confirmation in his profession of a physician (Col. iv, 14), the practice of medicine among the Romans having been in great measure confined to persons of servile rank (Midd. De Medicorum apud Roman. degent. Conditione; col. iv, 6). However, there were many exceptions (see Smith, Dict. of Classical Antig. s. v. Medicus, and it is altogether an insufficient basis on which to erect a theory as to the evangelist's social rank. So much, however, we probably may safely infer from his profession, that he was a man of superior education and mental culture to the generality of the apostles, the fishermen and tax-gatherers of the Sea of Galilee.

II. Scripture History. All that can be with certainty known of Luke is gathered from the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of Paul. This does not, however, make his sanctity. He was not born a Jew, for he is not reckoned among them "of the circumcision" by Paul (comp. Col. iv, 11 with ver. 14). This be not thought conclusive, nothing can be argued from the Greek idiom in his style, for Luke can be a Hellenistic Jew, nor from the Gentile tendency of his Gospel, for this it would share with the inspired writings of Paul, a Pharisaei brought up at the feet of Gamaliel. The date of his conversion is uncertain. He was not, indeed, "an eyewitness and minister of the word of God from the beginning" (Luke i, 2), or he would have rested his claim as an evangelist upon that ground. His name does not once occur in the Acts, and we can only infer his presence or absence from the sudden changes from the third to the first person, and vice versa, of which phenomenon, notwithstanding all that has been argued against it, this, which has been accepted since the time of Ireneus (Contr. Hær. iii, 14), is the only satisfactory explanation. Rejecting the reading εὐαγγελιστής ὁ ἱησοῦς, Acts xi, 28 (which only rests on D. and Augustine, De Serm. Dom. ii, 17), which would bring Luke into connection with Paul at a much earlier period, as well as the identification of the evangelist with Lucius of Cyrene (Acts xiii, 1; Rom. xvi, 21), which was current in Origen's time (adv. Rom. xxvi, 39; see Lardner, Credibility, vi, 124; Marsh, Michaelis, c. 294), and would make him a kinsman of Paul, we first assume that Paul is companying with Luke, traveling with him to Macedonia (Acts xvi, 10, 11). A.D. 48. Of his previous history, and the time and manner of his conversion, we know nothing, but Ewalt's supposition (Gr. d. V. Farr. vi, 35, 448) is not at all improbable, that he was a physician residing in Troas, converted by Paul, and attaching himself to the apostle with all the ardor of a young convert. He may also, as Ewalt thinks, have been one of the first uncircumcised Christians. His conversion had taken place before, since he silently assumes his place among the great apostle's followers without anything being said of it. Luke has not the same knowledge and ministry of Christ. He may have found his way to Troas to preach the Gospel, sent possibly by Paul himself. There are some who maintain that Luke had already joined Paul at Antioch (Acts xi, 27-30; see Journal of Sacred Literature, October, 1861, p. 170, and Conybeare and Howson's Life of Paul, ed. London, 1861). He accompanied Paul as far as Philippi, but did not share in the imprisonment of his master and his companion Silas, nor, as the third person is resumed (Acts xvii, 1), did he, it would seem, take any further part in the apostle's missionary journey. The first person appears again on Paul's third visit to Philippi. A.D. 54 (Acts xx, 5, 6), from which it has been gathered that Luke had spent the whole intervening time—a period of seven or eight years—in Philippi or its neighborhood. If any credit is to be given to the ancient opin ion that Luke is referred to in 2 Cor. viii. 18 as "the brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the churches" (a view adopted by the Church of England in the collect for Luke's day), as well as the early tradition embodied in the subscription to that epistle, that it was sent from Philippa "by Titius and Lucas," we shall have evidence of the evangelist's missionary zeal during this long space of time. If this be so, or if it be limited to the "three months" of Paul's sojourn at Philippa (Acts xx, 8) Luke was sent from that place to Corinth on this errand, the word "gospel" being, of course, to be understood, not, as Jerome and others erroneously interpret it, of Luke's written gospel, but of his missionary activity. The mistaken interpretation of the word "gospel" in this place has thus led some to assign the composition of the Gospel of Luke to this period, a view which derives some support from the Arabic version published by Erpenius, in which its writing is placed "in a city of Macedonia twenty-two years after the Ascension," A.D. 51. From their reunion at Philippa, Luke remained in constant attendance on Paul during his journey to Jerusalem (Acts xx, 6-xxi, 18), and, disappearing from the narrative during the apostle's imprisonment at Jerusalem and Caesarea, reappears at Caesarea, plain, and most unexpectedly. If this be so, as he has written the Hebrew, at the close of the Second Epistle to Timothy (iv, 11) gives us the latest glimpse of the "beloved physician," and our authentic information regarding him beautifully closes with a testimony from the apostle's pen to his faithfulness amidst general defection, A.D. 64.

III. Traditionary Notice. The above sums up all we really know about Luke; but, as is often the case, in proportion to the scantiness of authentic information is the copiousness of tradition, increasing in definiteness, be it remarked, as it advances. His Gentile descent being taken for granted, his birthplace was appropriately enough placed at Antioch in "the centre of the Gentile Church, and the birthplace of the Christian name" (Euselius, H. E. iii, 4; comp. Jerome, De Vir. Illust. 7; In Matt. Pseudo.), though it is to be observed that Chrysostom, when dwelling on the historical associations of the city, speaks of it, "as the birthplace of that which he is the first to call the Gospel of Luke (Epiph. Har. ii, 11); one of the Greeks who desired "to see Jesus" (Luke xii, 20, 21), and the companion of Cleopas on the journey to Emmaus (Theophil. Proem in Luc.). An idle legend of Greek origin, which first appears in the late and credulous historian Niphephorus Callinus (died 1450), Hist. Eccl. ii, 43, and was universally accepted in the Middle Ages, represents Luke as well acquainted with the art of painting (διότι τὴν Σωγράφου τιγγυς Ιεωσαιφον), and assigns to his hand the first portraits of our Lord, his mother, and his chief apostles (see the monograph of Mami [Florid. 1794] and Schlichter [Hal. 1784]).

Nothing is known of the place or manner of his death, and the traditions are inconsistent with one another. Gregory Naz reckons him among the martyrs, and the untrustworthy Nicephorus gives us several details of the time, place, and mode of his martyrdom, viz., that he was crucified to a live olive-tree in Greece, in his eighteenth year. According to others, he died a natural death after preaching (according to Epiphanius, Contra Har. ii, 11) in Dalmatia, Gallia, Italy, and Macedonia; was beheaded in Egypt, whence his bones were translated by Constantius to Constantinople (Isid. Hspal. c. 82; Phileostorgius, vol. iii, chap. xxix). See generally Köhler, Dissert. de Luca Ev. (Lipsia, 1680); Credner, Einleit. in N. T. i, 124.

LUKE, GOSPEL according to the third in order of the canonical books of the New Testament.

I. Author—Genuineness.—The universal tradition of Christendom, reaching up at least to the latter part of the 3rd century, has assigned the third member of our Gospels to Luke, the Evangelist. Contra Har. ii, 11 I, who alone continued in attendance on his beloved master in his last imprisonment (Col. iv, 14; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. iv, 11). Its authorship has never been questioned until comparatively recent times, in the process of suppressing criticism of Germany—the main object of which appears to be to set up some new hypothesis in its stead—has been brought to bear upon it, without, however, effectually disturbing the old traditional statement. The investigations of Semler, Hilgenfeld, Ritche, Baer, Schleiermacher, Ewald, and others, who failed to overthrow the harmonious assertion of the early Church that the third Gospel, as we have it, is the genuine work of Luke. It is well known that, though the "Gospels" are referred to by Justin Martyr as a collection already used and accepted by the Church (Apol. 106, sect. 12; Apol. 203, sect. 10; 1 Apol. 2), there are a very considerable number of quotations, enabling us to identify, beyond all reasonable doubt, these ιατρική δέδωκαν; to the first three Gospels, we do not find them mentioned by the names of their authors till the end of the 2nd century. In the Muratorian Fragment, Luke can hardly be placed later than A.D. 170, we read, "Tertullian Evangelium librum secundum Lucam Lucas late medicus post ascensionem Christi cum eum Paulus quasi ut juris (τοι δι' αυτον) studiorem ['hiericus socius, Ruman] se cum ad summis nomine su ex ordine ['opinione,' Credner] concipienti (Dominium tamen nec i pie in carce), et idem prout assequi potuit, ita et nativitate Johannis inepti dicere" (Westcott, Hist. of Cont. G. p. 550). The testimony of Irenaeus, A.D. cir. 180, is equally definite, Λούκαι δὲ καὶ τῶν συνεργῶν τοῦ τῶν ἐκκλησίας ἐν τῇ καθόλω ἐν μιᾷ κατά τὸν αὐτό (Contra Her. iii, 1, 1), while from his enumeration of the many particular, primitiva evangeli (ib. iii, 14, 3), recorded by Luke alone, it is evident that the Gospel he had was the same we now possess. Tertullian's Diatessaron is an unimpeachable evidence of the existence of four Gospels, and that of Luke at an early period in the same century. The writings of Tertullian against Marcion, cir. 207, abound with references to our Gospel, which, with Irenaeus, he asserts to have been written under the immediate guidance of Paul (Adv. Marc. iv, 2; iv, 5). In Euselius we find both the Gos- pel and Acts. Eusebius, in this latter work, professes to secure for the early period of Luke's knowledge of the sacred narrative is ascribed to information received from Paul, aided by his intercourse with the other apostles (τας τῶν ἄλλων ἑπολομένων ἐμφανείς φρασμοίς, H. E. iii, 4 and 24). Eusebius, indeed, tells us that in his day the erroneous view which interpreted ιατρικήν (Rom. ii, 16; comp. 2 Cor. vii, 18) of a written document was generally received, and that, in the words "according to my Gospel," Paul was supposed to refer to the work of the evangelist. This is also mentioned by Jerome (De Vir. Illust., 7) and accepted by Origen (Eusebii, H. E. vi, 25)—one among many proofs of the want of the critical faculty among the fathers of that age.

Additional evidence of the early acceptance of Luke's Gospel may be derived from the quarto recension of its relation to the Gospel of Mark. This is not the place to discuss this subject, which has led critics to the most opposite conclusions, for a full account of which the reader may be referred to De Wette, Einleit. in N. T. p. 119-137, as well as to the treatises of Ritschi, Baur, Hilgenfeld, Hahn, and Volkmar. It will be enough for our purpose to mention that an attempt was made in pursuit of his professed object of restoring the purity of the Gospel, which had been corrupted by Judaizing teachers, rejected all the books of the canon with the exception of ten epistles of Paul and a gospel, which he called simply a gospel of Christ. We have the express testimony of Irenaeus (Contr. Haer. ii, 27, 2: iii, 12, 12, etc.), Tertullian (Cont. Marc. iv, 1, 2, 6), Origen (Cont. Cels. ii, 27), and Epiphanius (Hær. xiii, 11) that the basis of Marcion's Gospels was Luke. He contra-restated and argued against him by suit to his peculiar tenets (for the alterations and omissions, the chief being its curtailing by the first two chapters, see De Wette, p. 128-132), though we cannot assert, as was done by his enemies among the orthodox, that all the variations are due to Marcion himself, many of them having gone too far to be in agreement with his heretical views and being, rather, various readings of great antiquity and high importance. Of late years, however, the op-posite view, which was first broached by Semler, Grass- bach, and Eichhorn, has been vigorously maintained, among others, by Kitälch and Baur, who have endeav-ored to prove that the Gospel of Luke, as we have it, is interpolated, and that the portions of Marcion is charged with having omitted were really unauthorized additions to the original document. See Bleeke, Einl. in das N. T. § 62. Voelckan, in his exhaustive treatise Das Evangelium, Akroasis, and especially pp. 185 seq., has satisfactorily disposed of this question, and has demonstrated that the Gospel of Luke, as we now have it, was the material on which Marcion worked, and, therefore, that before he began to teach, the date of which may be fixed about A.D. 139, it was already accepted by the general church. Zeller (Das Evangelium, 1860, § 158) and Ritshch have since abandoned their position (Theol. Jahrb. 1851, p. 387, 388, and Baur has greatly modified his (Markusevangel. 1851. p. 191). See also Hahn, Das Evangelium Marcionis (Königsb. 1823); Olahassen, Echt- heit der vier Kanon. Evangelien (Königsb. 1823); Ritshch, Das Evangelium Marcius (Tübingen, 1846); Baur, Krit. Sources.—The authorities from which Luke de- rived his Gospel are clearly indicated by him in the in- troduction (i, 1-4). He does not claim to have been an eye-witness of our Lord's ministry, or to have any per- sonal knowledge of the facts he records, but, as an honest compiler, to have gone to the best sources of information then accessible, and, having accurately traced the whole course of the apostolic tradition from the very first, in its every detail (σαρκολοσθετούς ἀνώνυμον πάσιν αὐτοίς), to have written an orderly narrative of the facts (σαρπαλοσθετούς ἀνώνυμον πάσιν αὐτοίς), and chapters 1-11. Luke uses the Christian Church, and which Theophylact has already learned, not from books, but from oral teaching (σαρπαλοσθετούς ἀνώνυμον πάσιν αὐτοίς); comp. Acts xviii, 25; Gal. vi, 5). These sources were partly the "oral tradition" (σαρπαλοσθετούς) of those "who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and minis- ters of the Word," and partly the written records (to which Ewald, vi, 40, on unexplained grounds, dogmat- ically assigns a non-Judaic origin) which even then "many" (σαρπαλοσθετούς) had attempted to draw up, of which, though the evangelist's words do not necessarily bear the mark, Luke has preserved a copy, and which he himself used. Though we thankfully believe that, as well in the selection of his materials as in the employment of them, Luke was acting under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, it will be remarked that he lays claim to no such supernatural guidance, but simply to the care and accuracy of an honest, painstaking, and well-in- formed editor, not so consciously under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit as to supersede the use of his own mental powers. His use of his authorities is not me- chanical; though often incorporating, apparently with little alteration, large portions of the oral tradition, es- pecially in the case of words of our Lord, or relating to him by whom he conversed, and adopting narratives already current (of which the first two chapters, with their harsh Hebraistic phraseology, immediately succeeding the comparatively pure Greek of the dedication, are an example), the free handling of his pen is everywhere to be recognised. The connecting links and the passages of transition evidence the hand of the author, which may again be recognised in the greater variety of his style, the more complex character of his sentences, and the care he bestows in smooth and aligned transitions, imparting a more classical air to the synoptical portions.

Notwithstanding the almost unanimous consent of the fathers as to the Pauline origin of Luke's Gospel (Tertull. adv. Marc. iv, 5, "Lucem digestum Paulus as- sertive solent:" Irenaeus, Cont. Haer. iii, 1; Origen, in Euseb. Praep. ev. iv, 21; Eus. H.E., iii, 25; Euseb. Hist. E., iv, 7; Jerome, De Vir. Illust. 7), there is little or nothing in the gospel itself to favor such a view, and very much to contradict it. It is true that the account of the in- surrection of the Lord's Supper, 1 Cor. xi, 23-25, displays an almost verbal identity with Luke xxii, 19, 20; and, as Paul affirms that he received his "from the Lord," it is highly probable that the evangelist has in this in- stance incorporated a fragment of the direct teaching of his master. But this is a solitary exception (Luke xxvii, 44, comp. 1 Cor. xvi, 5), is too trifling to de- serve notice, and unless the gospel were understood as it should have expressed himself as he has done in his preface if he had derived the facts of his narrative from one who was neither "an eye-witness" nor "a minister of the Word from the beginning." Nor again in the argument by which he traces the origin of the gospel, or generally viewed, there is much that can fairly be consid- ered as bearing out the hypothesis of a Pauline origin. Those who have sifted the gospel with this object have, it is true, gathered a number of passages which are sup- posed to have a Pauline tendency (see Hilgenfeld, Evangel., and the ingenious essay prefixed to this gospel in Dr. Wordsworth's Greek Testament, e. g. Luke iv, 25 sq.; v, 52 sq.; x, 80 sq.; xvii, 16-18; and the parables of the prodigal son, the unprofitable servant, and the Pharisee and publican, which have been instanced by De Wette as bringing out the apostle's teaching on jus- tification by faith alone; but, as Dean Alford has ably shown (Greek Test. i, 44, note b), such a list may easily be collected from the other gospels, while the entire ab- sence of any definite statement of the doctrinal truths which come forward with the greatest prominence in the apostle's writings, and, with very scanty exceptions, of his peculiar theological phraseology, is of itself suffi- cient to prove how undue has been the weight assigned to Pauline influence in the composition of the gospel. It is certainly true that, in the words of bishop Thi- riliwe's Introduction to St. Luke, Introd. p. cxxiv, "Luke's Gospel contains the ideas of that enlarged view of Christianity which gave to the gospel, as preached by Paul, a form and an extent very differ- ent from the original tradition of the Jews," but no more can be legitimately inferred than that Luke was Paul's disciple, instructed by the apostle of the Gentiles, and naturally sharing in his view of the gospel as a message of salvation for all nations; not that his gospel was in any sense derived from him, or rested on the apostolic basis of Paul.

The question that naturally arises whether the gospels of Matthew and Mark were among the ἐγχριστικα ἦμνα ὑπὸ τοῦ Λουκα to which Luke refers. The answers to this have been various and contradictory, the same data leading critics to the most opposite conclusions. Meyer (Comment. ii, 217) is of opinion that Luke availed himself both of Matthew and Mark, though chiefly of Mark's "commis- sive gospel;" while De Wette, on the other hand (Ein- lei. sec. 94, p. 185), considers Mark's Gospel the latest of the three, and based upon them as authorities. In the face of these and other discordant theories, of which a list may be seen (De Wette, Einlei. § 86, p. 192-186), it will be wise to note here the careful and unprejudiced review of the evidence will, however, lead most unbiased readers to the conclusion that all three wrote in perfect independence of one another; each, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, giving a distinct view of the great complex whole, if this is the rule of the writer's own individual impressions, and that least of all is Luke to be considered as a mere rédacteur of the prior writings of his brother synoptists—a theory, the improbabilities and absurdities of which have been well pointed out by de la Angel in the Prolegomena to his Greek Testament, i., 5-11.

III. Relation to Matthew and Mark.—Believing that no one of the three synoptical gospels is dependent on the others, and that the true explanation of this striking correspondence, not only in the broad outlines of our Lord's life, but in the details, must be found either in the original outline filled up, but also, to a considerable extent, in the parables and addresses recorded, and even in the language and forms of expression, is to be sought in the same apocalyptic oral tradition having formed the original basis of each, we have presented a very interesting point of inquiry in tracing the correspondence and divergence of the several narratives. In particular, a comparison of Luke with the other synoptists furnishes many striking and important results. With the general identity of the body of the history, we at once notice that there are two large portions peculiar to this evangelist, one of which is an important remainder made by Mark and Luke alone. These are the first two chapters, narrating the conception, birth, infancy, and early development of our Lord and his forerunner, and the long section (ix, 31-vii, 14) devoted to our Lord's final journey to Jerusalem and his crucifixion and resurrection.

We have also other smaller sections supplying incidents passed over by Matthew and Mark—the questions of the people and the Baptist's replies (iii, 10-14); Simon and the woman that was a sinner (vii, 36-50); the raising of the widow's son (viii, 11-17); the story of Zacchaeus (xix, 1-10); our Lord's weeping over Jerusalem (xix, 38-44); the journey to Emmaus (xxiv, 13-35). In other parts he follows a tradition at once so much fuller and so widely at variance with that of the others as almost to suggest the idea that a different event is recorded (ch. iv, 16-20; comp. Matt. xiii, 54-56; Mark vi, 1-6; ch. v, 1-11; comp. Matt. iv, 18-22; Mark i, 16-20). Even where the language employed so closely corresponds as to remove all question of the identity of the events, fresh details are given, often of the greatest interest, e. g. προσφηνέμονος (iii, 21); σωτηρίας εξ αὐτούς (iv, 1); ἡμῶν παρακλήσεως, κ. τ. λ. (iv, 6); ἀρχαίοι καίροι (iv, 13); ἡμῶν Κυρίου ἡμῶν, κ. τ. λ. (v, 17); καταλαμβάνειν ἄμαντον καὶ ὧδε μαζί (v, 28, 29); the comparison of old and new wine (v, 29); ἕναλλάσσειν ἑνὸς (vi, 11); ἡμῶν εἰς τὸ δικαίωμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας τῶν Ἰουδαίων (vii, 50); the collection for the poor (vii, 5). In the case of John's disciples (vii, 21), and the incidental remarks (ver. 29, 30); many additional touches in the narratives of the Gadarene demoniac (viii, 26-39), and the transfiguration, especially the fact of his praying (Luke records at least six instances of our Lord having prayed omitted by the other evangelists), and the subject of the conversation with Moses and Elijah (ix, 28-36); notices supplied (xx, 19; xxxi, 37, 38), all tending to convince us that we are in the presence not of a mere copyist, but of a trustworthy and independent witness. Luke's account of the ἀμαρτίας ἔλθεν and resurrection is to a great extent his own, adding much of the deepest significance to the synoptical narrative, particularly the warning to Simon in the name of the twelve (xxii, 31, 32); the bloody sweat (ver. 44); the sending to Herod (xxiii, 1-27); the words to the women (ver. 27-31); the prayers for forgiveness (ver. 34); the penitent thief (ver. 38-43); the walk to Emmaus (xxiv, 13-35); and the ascension (ver. 50-53).

It has been remarked that there is nothing in which Luke is more characteristically distinguished from both the evangelists than in the selection of our Lord's parables. There are no less than eleven quite peculiar to him: (1) The two debtors; (2) Good Samaritan; (3) Friend at midnight; (4) Rich fool; (5) Barren fig-tree; (6) Lost silver; (7) Prodigal son; (8) Unjust steward; (9) Rich man and Lazarus; (10) Unjust judge; (11) Pharisees and publicans; and two others, the Great Supper, and the Pounds, which, with many points of similarity, differ considerably from those found in Matthew.

Of our Lord's miracles, six omitted by Matthew and Mark are recorded by Luke: (1) Miraculous draught; (2) The son of the widow of Nain; (3) The woman with a spirit of infirmity; (4) The man with a droplep; (5) The ten lepers; (6) The healing of Malchus's ear. Of the seven not related by him, the most remarkable is the Syrophoenician woman, for which a priori reasoning would have claimed a special place in the so-called Gospel of the Gentiles. We miss also the walking on the sea, the feeding of the four thousand, the cure of the blind men, and of the deaf and dumb, the stater in the fish's mouth, and the curising of the fig-tree.

The chief omissions in narrative are the whole section, Matt. xiv-xvi, 12; Mark vi, 45-viii, 26; Mark xix, 2-12; xx, 1-16, 20-28; comp. Mark x, 35-45; the amnointing, Matt. xxvi, 6-13; Mark xiv, 3-9.

With regard to coincidence of language, a most important and important remainder made by Mark (Michaelis, v, 317), that when Matthew and Luke agree verbally in the common synoptical sections, Mark always agrees with them also; and that there is not a single instance in these sections of verbal agreement between Matthew and Luke alone. A careful examination will discover that the verbal agreement between Luke and Mark is greater than that between Luke and Matthew, while the mutual dependence of the second and third evangelists on the same source is rendered still more probable by the observation of Reuss, that they agree both in excess and defect when compared with Matthew: that when Mark has elements wanting in Matthew, Luke usually has them also; while, when Matthew supplies more than Mark, Luke follows the latter; and that where Mark fails altogether, Luke's narrative often represents a different wapélloias from that of Matthew.

IV. Character and general Purpose.—We must admit, but with great caution, on account of the abuses to which the notion has led, that there are traces in the gospel of a leaning towards Gentile rather than Jewish converts. The genealogy of Jesus is traced to Adam, not from Abraham, as in the synoptists, so as to humanize the savior, or make it the picture of the human race, and not merely with the Jews. Luke describes the messiah of the Seventy, which number has usually been supposed to be typical of all nations; as twelve, the number of the apostles, represents the Jews and their twelve tribes.

On the supposed "doctrinal tendency" of the gospel, however, much has been written which it is painful to dwell on, but easy to refute. Some have endeavored to see in this divine book an attempt to ingraft the teaching of Paul on the Jewish representations of the Messiah, and to elevate the doctrine of universal salvation, of which Paul was the most prominent preacher, over the Judaizing tendencies, and to put Paul higher than the twelve apostles! (See Zeller, Apostel; Baur, Kieron, Evang.; and Hilgenfeld.) How to interpret the mysterious and representative in the synoptists, the Gospel and the Acts, could have been taken for two tracts written for polemical and personal ends, is to an English mind hardly conceivable. Even its supporters found that the inspired author had carried out his purpose so badly that they were forced to assume that a second author or editor had altered the work with a view to work together Jewish and Pauline elements into harmony (Baur, Kieron, Evang. p. 502). Of this editing and re-editing there is no trace whatever; and the invention of the second editor is a gross device to cover the failure of the first hypothesis. By such a machinery it will be possible to preserve in after ages that Gibson's History was originally a plea for Christianity, or any similar paradox.

The passages which are supposed to bear out this “Pauline tendency” are brought together by Hilgenfeld with great care (Evangelien, p. 250); but Heus has shown, by passages from Matthew which have the same “tendency” against the Jews, how brittle such an argument is, and has left no room for doubt that the two evangelists wrote facts and not theories, and dealt with their history as mere facts, for the benefit of a church, or de la Théologie, vol. ii, b. vi, ch. vi). Writing to a Gentile convert, and through him addressing other Gentiles, Luke has adapted the form of his narrative to their needs, but not a trace of a subjective bias, not a vestige of a personal motive, has been suffered to sully the inspired page. Had the influence of Paul been the leading and principal source of this gospel, we should have found it in more resemblance to the Epistle to the Ephesians, which contains (so to speak) the Gospel of Paul.

The chief characteristic of Luke's Gospel which distinguishes it from those of the other synoptists, especially Matthew, is its universality. The message he delivers is not, as it has sometimes been mistakenly described, for the Gentiles as such, as distinguished from the Jews, but for men. As we read his record, we seem to be looking at the world in the same light as the apostles who heard the Gospel message, when all distinctions of race or class should be done away, and all claims based on a fancied self-righteousness annulled, and the glad tidings should be heard and received by all who were united in the bonds of a common humanity, and felt their need of the Gospel. Luke presents the light to women, the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel. It is this character which has given it a right to the title of the Pauline Gospel, and enables us to understand why Marcion selected it as the only true exponent of Christ's Gospel. This universality, however, is rather interwoven with the Gospel than to be specified in definite instances; and yet we cannot but feel how completely it is in accordance with it that Luke records the enrolment of the Saviour of the world as a citizen of the world-embracing Roman empire—that he traces his genealogy back to the head of the human race—that his first recorded sermon (iv. 10-27) gives proof of God's wide-reaching mercy, as displayed in the widow of Sarepta and Naaman—that in the mission of the twelve, the limitation to the “cities of Israel” should have no place, while he alone records the mission of the seventy (a number symbolical of the Gentile world)—that in the sermon on the mount all references to the law should be omitted, while all claims to superior holiness or national prerogatives are cut away by his gracious dealings with, and kindly mention of, the despised Samaritans (ix. 52 sqq.); and so on.

As with the race in general, so with its individual members. Luke delights to bear witness that none are shut out from God's mercy—nay, that the outcast and the lost are the special objects of his care and search. As proofs of this, we may refer to the narratives of the woman who was a sinner, the Samaritan leper, Zachaeus, and the penitent thief; and the parables of the lost sheep and lost silver, the Pharisee and publican, the rich man and Lazarus, and, above all, to that “which has probably exercised most influence on the mind of Christendom in all periods” (Maurice, Unity of the Gospel, p. 274), the prodigal son.

Most naturally also in Luke we find the most frequent allusions to that which has been one of the most striking distinctions between the old and modern world—the position of woman as a fellow-heir of the kingdom of heaven, sharing in the same responsibilities and hopes, and that woman comes forward most prominently (the Syrophoenician, as already noticed, is a single marked exception) as the object of our Lord's sympathy and love. Commencing with the Virgin Mary as a type of the purity and sublimity which is the true glory of womanhood, we meet in succession with Anna the prophetess, the pattern of holy womanhood (comp. 1 Tim. v, 5); the woman that was a sinner; the widow of Nain; the ministering women (vii. 3, 5); Mary and Martha; the “daughter of Abraham” (xiii. 11); and close the list with the words of exquisitely tender and sympathy to the “daughters of Jerusalem” (xxiii. 28).

This universal character is one, the roots of which lie deep in the soil of human nature, and which is among the attributes of the Messiah as the Saviour of the world. With him, more than in the other gospels, Jesus is “the second man, the Lord from heaven” (Lange); and if in his pages we see more of his divine nature, and have in the more detailed reports of his conception and ascension clearer proofs that he was indeed the Son of God, yet it is here that we find the living sympathy and intercourse with the inner man, in the human fellowship grounded on not denying the divine condescension and compassion” (Maurice, u. c.), that we recognize the perfect ideal man.

Luke, it has been truly remarked, is the gospel of contrasts. Starting with the contrast between the doct of Zacharias and the trustful obedience of Mary, we find in almost every page proofs of the twofold power of Christ's word and work foretold by Simeon (ii. 34). To select a few of the more striking examples: He also shows the gulf between Simeon and the doctors of the law; between Joseph and Mary, the thankful and thankless lepers, the tears and hosannas on the brow of Olivet; he alone adds the “woes” to the “blessings” in the sermon on the mount, and carries on in the parables of the rich man and Lazarus, the Pharisees and publicans; and the good and the bad of contrasts which finds so appropriate a close in the penitent and blaspheming malefactors.

Once more, Luke is the hymn-writer of the New Testament. Taught by the church, the Gospel prolongs her hymns of praise to the glory of Christ (Christ's Year). But for his record the Magnificat, Benedictus, and Nunc Dimittis would have been lost to us; and it is he who has preserved to us the Ave Maria, identified with the religious life of so large a part of Christendom, and the Gloria in Excelsis, which forms the culminating point of its most solemn ritual.

To turn from the internal to the external characteristics of Luke's Gospel, these we shall find no less marked and distinct. His narrative is, as he promised it should be, an orderly one (eswΣΩLXII, i, 3); but the order is one rather of subject than of time. As to the other synoptists, though maintaining the principle of chronological succession in the main outline of his narrative, "he is ever ready to sacrifice mere chronology to that order of events which was the fittest to develop his purpose according to the object proposed by the inspiring Spirit; and its incidents according to the grander and deeper order than that of mere time" (Maurice, u. c.). It is true that he furnishes us with the three most precise dates in the whole Gospel narrative (i, 2; iii, 1, 28—each one, be it remarked, the subject of vehement controversy), but, in spite of the attempts made by Wieseler and others to force a strict chronological character upon his gospel, an unprejudiced perusal will convince us that his narrative is loose and fragmentary, especially in the section ix, 49-xvii, 14, and his notes of time vague and destitute of precision, even where the other synoptists are more definite (ch. v; 13; comp. Matt. viii, 1; ch. viii, 4; comp. Matt. xii, 1; ch. viii, 22; comp. Mark iv, 35, etc.).

"The accuracy with which Luke has drawn up his Gospel appears in many instances. Thus, he is particularly in telling us the dates of his more important events. The birth of Christ is referred to the reign of Herod, and the preparation of the way of the Lord, of John the Baptist, are decided by the facts given in Mark or Matthew (comp. ch. viii, 23 with parallel Gospels, and with Josephus, War, iii, x; Irby and Mangles, Travels, ch. vi). In ch. xx, 1, we read a gesture on

Amid this uncertainty, it will be well to see if there is any internal evidence which will help us in determining these points. We are here met at the outset by those who are determined to see in every clear prophecy a vilification post eventum, and who find in the predictions of the overthrow of Jerusalem (xiii, 34, 50; xix, 44, 46; xxi, 51; xxii, 20), and the persecutions of our Lord's followers (xvii, 22, 25; xxii, 13), and the massacres of the swappens (xxii, 23–25), a clear proof that the Gospel was composed after A.D. 70. This has come to be regarded as a settled point by a certain school of criticism (Ew ald, v, 148; De Weer, Eisdei; p. 298; Credner, Eisdei; p. 186; Meyer: Rev. xvi, 13; Nicolas, Estudes, N. T., etc.), though there is no small diversity among its representatives as to the time and place of its publication of the Gospel and the sources from which it was derived. Those, on the other hand, who, brought up in a sounder and more reverent school, see no a priori impossibility in a future event being foretold by the Son of God, will be led by the same data to a very different conclusion, and will discover sufficient grounds for dating the Gospel not later than A.D. 58. It is certain that the Gospel was written before the Acts. The Apostles (Acts i, 15) could not have been composed before A.D. 58, when the writer leaves Paul "in his own hired house" at Rome; nor probably long after, since otherwise the issue of the apostle's imprisonment and appeal to Caesar must have found its natural home in the next six or eight years in the other—when compared with their abundance in Matthew. Only eight out of the whole number are peculiar to our evangelist (marked with an asterisk in the annexed list), which occur in the portions where he appears to have followed more or less completely a synopsis of his own; the history of the birth and childhood of our Lord, the visit to Nazareth (ch. iv), and that of the passion. The rest are found in the common synoptic sections. We may also remark that, with the most trifling exceptions, Luke never quotes the O. T. himself, nor speaks on his own authority of events occurring in fulfilment of prophecy, and that his citations are only found in the sayings of our Lord and others. The following list is tolerably complete, exclusive of the hymns, which are little more than a cento of phrases from the O. T.

I. verse 2. Gen. xxx. 29. Lev. x. 18. xiv. 7. xxii. 13. xxiv. 15. xlvii. 27. xxv. 6. xlviii. 28. xxvi. 1. xlix. 6. "Vv. Quotations from the O. T.—It is a striking confirmation of the view propounded above of the character of Luke's Gospel, and the object of its composition, that the references to the O. T., the authority of which with any except the Jews would be but small, are so few—three-four in one place at sixty-five in the other—when compared with their abundance in Matthew. Only eight out of the whole number are peculiar to our evangelist (marked with an asterisk in the annexed list), which occur in the portions where he appears to have followed more or less completely a synopsis of his own; the history of the birth and childhood of our Lord, the visit to Nazareth (ch. iv), and that of the passion. The rest are found in the common synoptic sections. We may also remark that, with the most trifling exceptions, Luke never quotes the O. T. himself, nor speaks on his own authority of events occurring in fulfilment of prophecy, and that his citations are only found in the sayings of our Lord and others. The following list is tolerably complete, exclusive of the hymns, which are little more than a cento of phrases from the O. T.

VII. Time and Place of Composition.—In the complete silence of Scripture, our only means for determining the above points are tradition and internal evidence. The statements of the former, though sufficiently definite, are inconsistent and untrustworthy. Jerome (Pref. in Matthew) asserts that it was composed "in Asia, the western islands of the Euphrates and regions of Bactria," an opinion which appears to have been generally received in the 4th century (Gregory Nazianzen, Ec. 'Aya'ta, and has been accepted by Lardner (Credibility), who fixes its date A.D. 63 or 64, after the release of Paul. An Arabic version, published by Eraspini, places its composition in a city of Macedonia, twenty-two years after the ascension, A.D. 51; a view which Hilgenfeld and Wettstein (Gr. Text, i, 170) give in their adherence. A still earlier date, thirteen years after the ascension, is assigned by the signature in some ancient MSS. Other statements as to the place are Alexandria Trias, Alexandria in Egypt (the Peshito and Persian versions, Abufeda, accepted by Mill, Grabe, and Wetstein), Rome (Ewald, vi, 40; Olhausen), and Csesarea (Bertholdt, Schott, Thierncr, Aolf, Abp. Thomson).

VIII. For whom written.—On this point we have certain evidence. Luke himself tells us that the object he had in view in compiling his gospel was that a certain number among the Jews might believe in Christ. "The scripture of the Prophets in the east whereon he had been (orally) instructed." Nothing more is known of this Theophilus, and it is idle to repeat the vague conjectures in which critics have indulged, some even denying his personal existence altogether, and arguing, from the meaning of the name, that it stands merely as a title of honor (Acts xxiii, 28; xxiv, 3; xxvi, 25), indicates that he was a person of official dignity. He was not an inhabitant of Palestine, for the evangelist minutely describes the position of places to which such a see would be well known. It is so with Capernaum (v. 51), Nazareth (v. 20), Arimathea (xxiii. 51), the country of the Gadarees (viii. 26), the distance of Mount Olivet and Emmaus from Jerusalem (Acts i. 12; Luke xxiv. 13). By the same test he probably was not a Macedonian (Acts xvi, 12), nor an Athenian (Acts xxii, 21), nor a Cretan (Acts xxxvii, 12). But that he who wrote the second part of the book of Acts, perhaps the most important part of the New Testament, is probably from similar data. In tracing Paul’s journey to Rome, places which an Italian might be supposed not to know are described minutely (Acts xvii, 6, 12, 16); but when he comes to Sicily and Italy this is neglected. Syracuse and Megara, even the more obvious, are not once mentioned, and Apollonia and Ariminum (rimo), are mentioned as to one likely to know them. (For other theories, see Marsh’s “Michaelis,” vol. iii, part i, p. 236; and Kuinöö’s “Prolegomena.”) All that emerges from this argument is that the person for whom Luke wrote in the first instance was a Gentile reader. But, though the Gospel is inscribed to him, we must not consider that it was written for him alone, but that theophilus stands rather as the representative of the whole Christian world; not, as we have already seen, of the Gentiles, as such, to the exclusion of the Jews, but the whole body of Christians. Luke had his own interests, and for whom, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the work was adapted “as the Gospel of the nations (τοιο ὅ γε τῶν ἔθνων, Origin, apud Euseb. vi, 25), full of mercy and hope assured to the whole world by the Lord’s suffering Saviour” (Westcott, “Study of Gospels,” p. 218).

IX. Contents of the Gospel.—After the brief preface—the value of which it is difficult to overestimate as throwing light on the history of the composition of the gospels in general, and the true theory of scriptural inspiration—the narrative of the Gospel may be divided into four portions: 1. The time preceding our Lord’s public life, including the conception and birth of John the Baptist, and of Christ, his circumcision, presentation in the Temple, and the single incident recorded of his childhood (ii. 41-51), comprised in the first two chapters. The whole of this portion is in form, and to a considerable extent in substance, peculiar to our evangelist. See § X. 2. A large number of originally detached and independent narratives, comprising our Lord’s baptism, temptation, and Galilean ministry, almost the whole being confined to this volume in an interrupted state (iii. 1-ix, 49). 3. A large section, sometimes, but improperly, termed the “gnomon,” containing narratives of events and reports of discourses belonging to the period from the close of our Lord’s direct Galilean ministry to his ascension at Jerusalem, a few days prior to the formal entrance into Jerusalem, and mostly occurring during the actual journey (ix, 50-xviii, 14). The whole of this, in its present form, is peculiar to Luke. 4. The last days of Christ: his entry into Jerusalem, discourses in the Temple, his sufferings and death, his resurrection and ascension, common to Luke and the other evangelists in substance, though there are considerable differences in detail in the narratives of the passion and resurrection (especially the journey to Emmaus), and that of the ascension is entirely Luke’s own (xviii, 15-xvii, 54).

3. X. Integrity of the Gospel—the first Two Chapters. The Gospel was compiled by Luke, and by the author of the Clementine Homilies. The silence of the apostolic fathers only indicates that it was admitted into the canon somewhat late, which was probably the case. The evidence of the Marcionite controversy is, as we have seen, that our gospel was in use before A.D. 120. A special question, however, has been raised about the first two chapters. The critical history of these is best drawn out perhaps in Meyer’s note. The chief objection against them is founded on the garbled opening of Marcion’s Gospel, who omits the first two chapters, and combines them with other passages. (So Theodoret.) The question is, “Anno quintodecimo principatus Tiberian proponeit Deum descendisse in civitatem Galileam Cepharum?” But any objection founded on this must apply to the whole third chapter as well; and the historic character of our Lord’s childhood could not be known to and quoted by Justin Martyr (see “Apologetic,” i, § 88, and an allusion, “Dial. cum Tryphon” 109) about the time of Marcion. There is therefore no real ground for distinguishing between the first two chapters and the rest; and for the argument for the composition of Luke’s Gospel apply to the whole inspired narrative as we now possess it (see Meyer’s note; also Völekmann, p. 180).

XI. Commentaries.—The following are the special exegetical helps on Luke’s Gospel: Origin, Fragmenta (in Opp. iii, 97); also Scholia (in Bibl. Patr. Gallandii, xiv); Athanasius, Commentationes (Rima, iii, 81); Ambrose, Expositio (in Opp. i, 1257); Augustine, Questions (in Opp. iii, 111); Jerome, Homiliae (from Origin, in Opp. vii, 245); also Expositio (in Opp. Suppl., xi, 764); Cyril Alex., Allocutionem (in Mai, Script., Vet. i, 741); Commentaria (ed. Smith, Lond. 1858, 4to; Commentary, tr. by same, ibid. 1859, 2 vols. 8vo); Eusebius, Excerpta (Ibid. 1807, 6); Titus Bostrensis, Commentarius (in Bibl. Max. Patr., iv, 415); Apollinaris Loedicensis, Fragmenta (in Mai, Class. Auct. x, 490); Bode, in Lucam (op. vii, 276, Works); Photius, Bibliothek, 92, 93; ed. Luke of Fragace, one of the most celebrated bishops and writers of the Unitas Fratrum, or the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren, was born about 1460, in Bohe-mita, and studied at the University of Prague, where he tained to the degree of A.B. A member of the Uttraquast, or National Church, he quitted Prague in consequence of difficulties with the Roman Catholics, sought out the Brethren, whose simple faith and stanch confusion of it attracted him, and joined their communion about 1500. At the time they were the object of vaerious dissensions, owing to the gradual separation of two parties among them, the one extreme, the other moderate in its views of the discipline. The former represented the illiterate, and the latter the educated portion of the membership. Luke, being a thoroughly learned man, at once perceived the great advantage of the executive ability and distinctive position. He held to the moderate party, but enjoyed the confidence of many on the other side. In 1541 he was sent, with three associates, on a visit to the East, in order to find, if possible, a body of Christians free from the corruptions of the age, with whom the Union Fratrum might establish a fellowship. Returning from this journey without having accomplished its object, he devoted himself to literary labors, and wrote a number of works treating of the points in dispute among the Brethren. One of these publications, a Latin treatise not a little to the ascendency of the moderate party, and to the final pacification of the Church in 1549, after the most violent of the extremists had seceded, and organized a sect of their own, called the Amalites, which soon degenerated into a licentious sect. Thirty years later, Luke undertook a mission to the Waldenses of Italy and France, and on his return in 1570 was elected bishop. His sound judgment and unflinching courage sustained the Brethren in times of persecution; his sense of the dignity and propriety of public worship served to develop their ritual; his enthusiastic conviction of the scriptural character of their faith opened the way for their rapid increase among the higher classes; and his wonderful diligence gave them a literature far superior to that of the Utraquists and of the Bohemian Roman Catholics. In 1560 he published a Catechism and a Hymn-book, the first evangelical works of this kind in the Middle Ages. Having, in 1518, become the senior bishop of the Church and president of its ecclesiastical council, he began to watch the progress of Luther's Reformation with close attention, and in 1522 sent a deputation to Wittenberg in order to present the good wishes of the Brethren. The result, however, was not satisfactory. Luke disagreed with Luther in regard to the doctrines both of the Lord's Supper and of justification by faith. On the one hand, he upheld the spiritual priesthood of all believers, he gave the scriptural interpretation of the Sacraments in opposition to all the errors of infidels. His first work was his Ars major or generalis, which has so severely tested the acuteness of commentators. This work is the development of the method of teaching known subsequently as the " Lu-lian method," and afforded a kind of mechanical aid to the mind in the acquisition and retention of knowledge by a systematic arrangement of subjects and ideas.

Like all such methods, however, it gave little more than a superficial knowledge of any subject, though it was of use in leading men to perceive the necessity for an investigation of the truths it involved, and for bringing about a reform not merely of Christian doctrine, but also of Christian life. But again the negotiations failed. Indeed, they produced a personal estrangement between Luke and Luther, and for a time all intercourse with Wittenberg was broken off. The real cause of this disagreement is not clear. In part it was owing to the grave offence which the deputies took at the loose morals of the Wittenberg students, and to the freedom with which they denounced their manner of life.
Luther, on his side, attacked the rigorism of the Brethren in his Zuckreden. In the following years the Brethren suffered a severe persecution in Bohemia. Luke himself was seized, loaded with chains, and imprisoned, and escaped execution only through the intervention of a powerful noble belonging to the Unitas Fratrum. After his liberation he was active for a few years longer, although suffering from a most painful disease, and died at Zungzunblau Dec. 11, 1528. His literary labors were astonishing. He was the author of more than eighty different works, written partly in Latin and partly in Bohemian, and consisting of doctrinal, exegetical, and confessional works. The number of them is not unknown. For a further account of his life, see Gindely, Geschichte der Brethren, Brüder, vol. i, bk. i, ch. iii, and bk. ii; Creuzer, Lullianus of Mayence, a noted German prelate of the Romish Church, flourished in the 8th century as successor of Boniface, in the archiepiscopal of Mayence.

He was a native of England, and was educated in the cloister of Meldun, but went to Germany on invitation of Boniface, and was his ambassador to pope Zachary about 754. He founded the Council of Attigny, and died at Rome in 769. In 785 he baptized Wittikind, leader of the Saxons. He founded the cloister of Hersfeld, and on his death in 786 was buried there. See Hoefer, Ver.

Lully (LLULL or LULLE), Raymond, sumamed the Doctor Illuminatus, an eminent Spanish philosopher and theologian, was born at Paris, and died on the island of Ma-Jorca, about 1294. In early life he followed his paternal profession of arms, and abandoned himself to all the license of a soldier's life. Even when married he continued to pursue pleasures inconsistent with conjugal fidelity, and the theme of his poetical compositions was sexual love. About the year 1296, sick and tired of debauchery, he retired to a desert to lead a life of solitude and rigorous asceticism. Here he pretended to have visions, and, among others, a manifestation of Christ on the cross, who called him to his service, and to the conversion of the Mohammedans. He therefore at once engaged in diligent study to prepare for the labors and duties of a missionary. Having mastered the Arabic, and thoroughly entered into the spirit of Arabi-ian philosophical writings, he took to the use of his pen for the conversion of the Saracens, seeking to dem-strate the truth of the Christian religion to Mohammedans in opposition to all the errors of infidels. His first work was his Ars major or generalis, which has so severely tested the acuteness of commentators. This work is the development of the method of teaching known subsequently as the " Lu-lian method," and afforded a kind of mechanical aid to

of which he said, "I see many knights going to the Holy Land in the expectation of conquering it by force of arms; but, instead of accomplishing their object, they are in the end all swept off themselves. Therefore it is my belief that the conquest of the Holy Land should be attempted in no other way than the Christian and his apostles undertook to accomplish it—by love, by prayer, by tears, and the offering up of our own lives." Meeting, however, with but little success, he returned to Tunis in 1291, and commenced labors as a missionary by holding conferences with the most learned Mahomedan scholars and theologians. In proclaiming to them the truth of the Christian religion, he insisted especially on the necessary adaptation which a perfect Being could not fail to establish between the primary cause and its effect, and attempted to explain the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation by purely metaphysical arguments. He was, however, expelled by the king of Tunis, and owed his life only to the intervention of a learned and liberal Mahomedan. Lully now went back to Paris, resumed his teaching there, and wrote his Tabula generalis and As exposita, which are a continuation of his former works, and present the same ideas under a different form. In 1298 he succeeded in establishing at Paris, under the protection of king Louis Philippe le Bel, a college where his method was taught. France was at that time in great ferment, and le Bel was anxious to establish the order of Knight Templars, and Boniface VIII, in re-vindicating the right previously claimed by Gregory VII, had aroused the greatest opposition in France. Lully himself, after having again in vain applied to Rome for help, had long out his plans, withdrew to labor wherever an opportunity offered itself. He sought by arguments to convince the Saracens and Jews on the island of Majorca. In 1301 he went to Cyprus, and thence to Armenia, exerting himself to bring back the different schismatic parties of the Ori- ent. He then turned to the Moors of Africa, Algeria, and other cities on the coast of Africa, and finally Bugia, then the seat of the Mahomedan empire. Here he publicly lectured in Arabic, proclaiming "that Christianity is the only true religion; the doctrine of Mohammed, on the contrary, false; and this he was ready to prove to every one." He was again imprisoned, but made his escape by the aid of some Genoese merchants, enduring many hardships on his journey to Europe by shipwreck. He finally reached Paris, and there resumed his lectures with great success. In 1311 the king of France, Charles le Bel, was anxious to give Italy a great exalt that pious monks retired into solitude, instead of giving up their lives for their brethren, and preaching the Gospel among the infidels. Concerning pilgrimages, he contrasted the gorgious processions of the pilgrims with the entry of Christ into Jerusalem; what he did to seek men, and what they do to seek him, and exclaimed, "We see the pilgrims travelling away into distant lands to seek thee, while thou art so near that every man, if he would, might find thee in his own house and chamber. . . . The pilgrims are so deceived by false men, whom they must leave to wait with them, that many of them, when they return home, show themselves to be far worse than they were when they set out on their pilgrimage." As a theologian, Lully, as we have seen from his history, was a self-taught man, not having been trained in the school of any of the great teachers of his time. The speculative and the practical were intimate-ly blended in his mind, and so they are also in his system. "His speculative turn entered even into his enthu-siasm for the cause of missions, and his zeal as an apologist. His contests, growing out of this latter in-terest, with the school of Averroes, with the next proceeding from that school which affirmed the irrefragable opposition between faith and knowledge, would naturally lead him to make the relation subsisting between these two a matter of special investigation. It is true, the enthusiasm for truth which filled his mind, the un-ion of a fervid imagination with logical formalism, led him to form extravagant hopes of a fancied absolute method adapted to all science—applicable, also, to the truths of Christianity, and by which these truths could be demonstrated in a convincing manner to every man. Yet his writings, generally ascetic—far removed from any formal system of science, his Ars magna—in deep apol-ogistic ideas. The enthusiasm of a most fervent love to God, a zeal equally intense for the cause of faith and the interests of reason and science, expressed themselves everywhere in his works" (Neander, CA. Hift. iv, 426).

One of his biographers states that the works of Lully numbered four thousand. Most of them are con-tained in an edition published at Mayence (10 vols. fol.), under title "Lulli Opera omnia, per Baccholium collecta, curante electore Palatino, et edita per Saltzingarium." They may be divided into two classes: one comprising the books of the "Ars magna:" Ars generalis; Ars demonstrativa; Ars invenieta; Ars expositoria; Ars brevia; Tabula generalis; Ars magna generalis ultima (this latter was published separately; Majorca, 1647); Arbor Scien-tiae (Barcelona, 1582); Liber Questionum super quatuor libris sententiarum (Lyons, 1451); Questions magistri Thoma Alabatrinus soluta secundum Artem (Lyons, 1451). II. Religious works: De articulis fidei Christianae demonstrativa probatia (Majorca, 1575); Controver-siae cum Homero Sorroceno (Valencia, 1610); De Demonstratione fidei Christianae, non contra Gentiles, no contra Barbaros, 1610; Liber natalis pueris Jesu. III. Against the Aver-roists: Libri duodecim Principiorum Philosophiam, con-tra Averroistas (Strassb, 1617); Philosophiae, in Aver-roistas, Expositio (Paris, 1616). IV. The works in which he speaks of the P china, De scienza et temporibus, (Urbino, 1649), and a very curious biography of R. Lully pre-served in MS. in the college of Sapientia, at Rome, and which appears to have been written by himself. To these must be added his numerous unpublished works, preserved in the Imperial Library, the libraries of the Arsenal and Ste. Genevieve, at Paris, and those of An-giers, Amiens, the Escorial, etc. We might also men- tion a number of works on alchemy generally attributed to him, but distinguished critics incline to the opinion that they are due to another person of the same name. Indeed, it appears certain that under the name of R. Lully several dis in this person have been confused together.

Lump (λύμφ, debich), a round mass of any substance pressed together, specially of dried figs (2 Kings xx, 7; Isa. xxxii, 21; c) cakes, 1 Sam. xxxv, 18; xxx 12; I Chron. xii, 40). The Greeks adopted the Heb.

term in a softened form, ψαλίθυ, which the Sept. uses.

This was the usual shape in which figs were preserved for sale or use among the ancients, and is still found in the modern package called a "drum of figs." (See Celsii Hierobot. ii, 377-379; J. E. Faber on Harmar's Obs. i, 889 sq. See Fig.

The term rendered "lump" in the New Test. is φόραμα, a knotted mass, e. g. of pottery's clap, prepared for moistening (Rom. ix, 21), or a dough (proverbially 1 Cor. v, 6; Gal. v, 9; tropically, Rom. xi, 16; 1 Cor. v, 7). See POTTERY.

Lumpe, Gottfried, a noted Benedictine, was born in 1477, and entered in his youth the Benedictine cloister of St. George at Villingen, in the Black Forest of Baden, where he remained a recluse, and as a teological teacher, till his death in 1801, and distinguished himself by his works on Church History, the chief of which is Historia theologico-crítica de vita, scripta utique doctrina S. Patrum, aliasque scripto-ram ecclesiasticorum trium primorum aevi (Augsburg, 1753-1759, 13 vols. 8vo). See Wetzer und Wielis, Lumden, William O., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Alexandria, Va., about 1805. He was converted in the fifteenth year of his age, was received into the Baltimore Annual Conference in 1824, and held the following appointments in the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia: 1824, Prince George's; 1825, Harford; 1826, Bedford Circuit; 1827, Phillipsburg; 1828, Gettysburg; 1829, Fairfax; 1830, Stafford; 1831, Prince George and St. Mary's; 1832-3, Montgomery; 1834, Severn; 1835, Springfield; 1836, Westmoreland Circuit; 1838-9, Fairfax; 1840, Westmoreland; 1841-2, Winchester Circuit; 1842-4, Calvert; 1845-5, William Street, Baltimore; 1847, Whatcoat, Baltimore; 1848, Baltimore Circuit; 1849, Summerfield. In 1850 falling health obliged him to take a supernumerary retirement. He died May 15, 1868. He was an active and efficient laborer in the vineyard of the Lord to the last. Though he was a superannuated for eight years, he ceased not to preach of "the things pertaining to the kingdom of God." See Conf. Minutes, 1868, p. 18.

Luna, Pedro de. See Benedict XIII (A).

Lunatic (σεληνίας, to be moon-struck, as the Latin testum lunaticus also signifies, a term the origin of which is to be founded in the belief that diseases of a par-oxysmal character were affected by the light, or by the changes of the moon), in Greek usage is i. e. epileptic, the symptoms of which disease were supposed to become more aggravated with the increasing moon (comp. Lu-can. Tox. 24); in the N. Test. (and elsewhere) the same malady is ascribed to the influence of demons or malignants. In Matt. iv, 15; xvi, 15; Luke, iv, 37; 44; Lucan. Philips. 16; Isidore, Orig. iv, 7; Manetho, iv, 81, 216). In the enumeration of Matt. iv, 24, the "lunatics" are distinguished from the demoniacs; in Matt. xiv, 15, the term is applied to a boy who is expressly declared to have been possessed. It is evident, therefore, that the word itself refers to some disease affecting both the body and the mind, which might or might not be a sign of possession. Perhaps the distinction in the one case was that of periodicity or lucid intervals, in contrast with the continuity of possession in the other.

MAC. Persons of this description are highly venerated in the East as saints, or individuals highly favored of heaven. In Egypt, according to Lane (Modern Egyptians, i, 545 sq.), "Lunatics who are dangerous to society are kept in confinement, but those who are not are generally regarded as saints. Most of the reputed saints of Egypt are either lunatics, or idiots, or impositors. Some of them go about perfectly naked, and are so highly venerated that even women do not shun them.

Men of this class are supported by alms, which they often receive without asking for them. An idiot or a fool is vulgarly regarded by them as a being whose mind is in heaven, while his grosser part mingles among ordinary mortals; consequently he is regarded as an especially favorite of heaven. This opinion entertained of lunatics by the Orientals serves to illustrate what is said of David when he fled to Achish, king of the Philistines, and feigned himself mad, and thus saved his life (1 Sam. xxxi, 10-16). Also the words of the apostle are thought to be illustrated from the same superstitious custom: "For ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves to be wiser than they."" And soon after joined Charles Osborne, Esq., in publishing The Emancipator, at Mount Pleasant, O. In 1821 he successfully started a monthly entitled The Genius of Universal Emancipa-tion, into which he afterwards merged The Emancipator.

In 1824 he delivered his first anti-slavery address at Deep Creek, North Carolina, and lecturing and journeying about on foot from place to place, organized about fourteen abolition societies in that state, besides some in Virginia. In the same year he removed The Genius to Baltimore, and issued it weekly. In 1825 he visited Hartiy, and made provisions there for emancipated slaves.

In 1826 he visited the anti-slavery advocates of the East, and lectured in their principal cities. In 1828-9 he was assaulted for alleged libel, censured by the court, and compelled to remove his paper to Washington, and finally to Philadelphia, where he gave it the name of The Independent and National Emancipator, and finally merged into The anti-slavery Freeman. In 1836 his property was burnt up by the proslavery mob which fired Pennsylvania Hall.

Undaunted, he began anew by issuing The Genius at Lowell, La Salle Co., Ill., and there continued until his death, August 22, 1856. See Earle, Life, Travels, etc., of Benj. Luney; Greeney, American Conflict, i, 111; Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s. v.

Lunsford, Lewis, a Baptist preacher, born in Stratford Co., Va., in 1758, began to preach when seventeen at the Potomac (now Hartwood) Church. Later be travelled in Westmoreland, Northumberland, Lancaster, and all the counties of the northern Virginia region, and several churches sprang up as the fruit of his toil; among others, Nomini and Wicomico. On the establishment of Moratico Church in 1778, he became its pastor for life. His sect was much persecuted at the time he was preaching in Richmond Co., and Lunsford was arrested, and thereafter tried in vain to continue to behave to the Church's call was sufficient. Faithful study in and out of his profession made up for a limited schooling. He died in Essex Co., Va., Oct. 26, 1793. See Sprague, Anatica of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 125 sq.

Lunt, William Parsons, D.D., an eloquent and popular divine, born at Newport, R. I., April 21, 1805, was ordained pastor of the Second Unite-LUPETINO 561

LUPETINO, Fra BALDO, one of the first martyrs to the Protestant cause in Italy in the 16th century, was born of ancient and noble parents in Albano, and actively propagated the reformed opinions in Venice. On becoming provincial within the Venetian territories of the Franciscan monks (to whose order he had been previously admitted) he urged the young men not to assume monastic orders. One of his contemporaries gives the following account of his further career. "After having long preached the Word of God in both the vulgar tongue of the Italian and Slavonic languages, the cities, and defended it by public disputations in several places of celebrity with great applause, he was at last thrown into close prison at Venice by the inquisitor and papal legate. In this condition he continued during nearly twenty years to bear an undaunted testimony to the Gospel of Christ, so that his bonds and doctrine were made known not only to that city, but to the whole of Italy, and even to Europe at large, by which means evangelical truth was more widely spread. . . . At last this pious man, whom neither threatenings nor promises could move, was released by his doctrine being bought and exchanged the fill and protracted tortures of a prison for a watery grave." See M'Crie's History of the Reformation in Italy (Philadelphia, 1842), p. 105, 221.

LUPSET, THOMAS, an English scholar and theologian, was born in London in 1498; was educated at English schools, but took the degree of B.A. in Paris. In 1518 he obtained the chair of rhetoric at Oxford University. Later he was secretary to the Italian ambassador. On his return he took charge of the education of the natural son of Wolsey in Paris. In 1530 he was appointed prebend of Salisbury. He died Dec. 27, 1532. Among his works we notice Epistola Vitirae, in the Epistola aliquot emult. Vitirae (Bale, 1520) — Treatise touching to die well (1584) — An Exhortation to young Men (1540, 8vo) — Treatise of Charity (1546, 8vo) — Rules for a godly Life (London, 1660). LUPUS, SR. The Roman Catholic Church commemorates this name by the same. The most important of them was born at Toul about the beginning of the 6th century. He was of a good family, and received a good education. He was afterwards married to Pimeida, sister of Hilarius, bishop of Arles. Seven years after his marriage he abandoned his wife and children and joined the disciples of St. Honoratus, who were there laying the foundations of the afterwards renowned convent of Lerins. In 426 he returned to Macon, and was elected to the see of Troyes, and greatly distinguished himself by his learning, both classical and theological. In 429 a council of the bishops of Gaul sent him, together with Germain of Auxerre, to Brittany, to oppose the Pelagian heresy, which was making great progress in that country. In 451, when Attila conquered Troyes, we find the barbarian king in intimate association with the bishop, and in his presence Attila was accompanied by two guards as far as the shores of the Rhine. Lupus died, according to tradition, July 29, 479. His most distinguished contemporaries called him "episcopus episcoporum," the Jacob of his age, and praised him particularly for his experience and his knowledge in all ecclesiastical matters. We possess two works of his. One of them is an answer to some canonical questions propounded by Talsassius, bishop of Angers, and to be found among the Instrumenta of the Gallia Christiana (vol. iv, col. 89). It contains some interesting information concerning marriage among the clergy. There is, it seems, no general rule on this point: in the churches of Antun and Troyes married deacons are ordained without difficulty; but those who were single when ordained are not permitted to marry, and a married priest, on losing his wife cannot marry again. (Comp. Lex. Historia Sacrorum Cebolae, p. 84.) His other work is a letter to Apollinaris, published in Achery, Speculum, v, 579. See Hist. LUPUS, CHRISTIAN. See WOLF.

LUPUS, SERVATUS, or LOUP DE FERRIÈRES, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born in the neighborhood of Sens about the year 850; studied at the abbey of Ferrières, and afterwards at Fulda, under the celebrated Rabanus Maurus. Eginhard instructed him in the classics. In 836 he returned to Sens, where he soon acquired a great reputation for learning. He was called to the court of Louis the EMPEROR, and became a favorite both with Louis le Débonnaire and his successor, Charles the Bald. In 841, the latter prince, having resolved to remove Odon, abbot of Ferrières, appointed Lupus in his stead. This intervention of the royal power in the affairs of the Church displeased the ecclesiastical authorities, and Lupus failed to secure their sanction until he had obtained from King Charles a charter granting to the monks of Ferrières the right of appointing in future their own abbots. This charter is to be found in the Gallia Christiana, among the Instrumenta of vol. xii, column 8. Lupus had great influence both with the clergy and with the people, and was present at all the councils held in France from 844 to 859, taking an active part in their proceedings. When the Normans landed in France in 860 he sought refuge in the diocese of Troyes. Still in the same year we find him present at the Council of Pistoie, and in 862 at that of Soissons. There is no mention made of him afterwards; whether he died then, or whether, as would appear from the chronicle of Robert of Avesnois, he was exiled from Ferrières, and his rival Guenelon appointed in his stead, does not appear. His works, so far as they were then extant, were collected by Eustache Baluze, and published first in 1644, then, with notes and corrections, in 1710, 1 vol. 8vo. His treatise De tribus Questionibus discusses free-will, the twofold predestination, and the question whether Christ died for all men, or only for the elect. Gottschalk had mooted these three questions, strongly maintaining the necessity of grace; John Scottus Erigena, Rabanus Maurus, and Hincmar had more or less defended the doctrine of free-will. Lupus here attempts to conciliate these two opposite views, without, however, concealing his preference for that of Gottschalk. He does not think that, in the fall of man, the necessity, free-will does indeed, to some extent, participate in our good impulses, yet is of no effect compared with grace. These impulses themselves originate in grace, and can only avail through grace; but, at the same time, grace enlightens the will, which becomes then a voluntary agent in continuing the work thus begun by grace alone. The Jansenists often quoted these views of Lupus. See Gallia Christiana, xii, col. 159; Hist. Litt. de la France, v, 250; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii, 19; Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, viii, 562; Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 459, 482.

LUPUS, HERNANDO DE, the first Spanish bishop of Peru, was born in Darien, Isthmus of Panama, towards the close of the 16th century. After teaching a short time, he became priest and vicar of Panama. In 1525, as appears from subsequent events, he represented the licentiate Gaspar de Espinosa, principal alcalde in Darien, who was at that time a nominee in a compromised contract between himself, Pizarro, and Almagro, by which he was to furnish the money for the outfit and expenses of an expedition for the conquest of Peru, the success of which depended mainly upon his exertions. His services were rewarded by the king of Spain, and joined with the king and he was, besides, declared Protector of the Indians of Peru. He died suddenly in 1582. LUST

Lust (usually τὰ ἡμερῶν, ἐνίανία, in the ethical sense, is used to express longings—sinful either in being directed towards an object not of the body, or in being so violent as to overcome self-control, and to engross the mind with earthly, carnal, and perishable things. Lust, therefore, is itself sinful, since it is an estrangement from God, destroys the true spiritual life, leads to take pleasure in what dishonors God and violates his laws. The flesh is subjected to the dominion of the flesh, and makes man a slave of sin and godlessness. Lust, therefore, is the inward sin; it leads to the falling away from God; but the real ground of this falling away is in the will. It took place in the earliest days of mankind (Rom. i. 21), and is natural to all in the unregenerate state; it can only be abolished by Christ. The nature of man is not changed, only his empirically moral mode and place of existence. Lust, the origin of sin, has its place in the heart, not of a necessity, but because it is the centre of all moral forces and impulses, and of spiritual activity. The law does not therefore destroy sin, nay, it rather increases it, yet not in an active manner, but by the sinner's own fault. The psychological reason of this is, that the law does not destroy the lust, even while accompanied by punishment; on the contrary, the man who is bound by the law is cancelled by regeneration. This takes place in the reconciliation with God through Christ, because, in giving his Son as a ransom for sinners, God has manifested his love in such a manner as to awaken man, and give him the strength to love God again. This love of God forms the substance of regeneration, and of the operations of the Holy Spirit, and destroys sinful lust by bringing man into union with God, or by the reception of the Spirit of Christ through faith. According to Matt. v. 28, 'It is useless to look on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in her heart.' This forcible expression is correct, for he who is regenerated, and whose heart is filled with true love of God, and who is possessed of the Spirit of Christ, cannot have such worldly lusts. He, therefore, who looks on a woman to lust after her, or, in other words, he in whom her sight will awaken the lust of carnal pleasure, has already committed adultery in his heart. In Mark iv, 19 (Matt. xiii, 22; Luke viii, 14): 'And the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it become unfruitful.' This word is the objects of desire, for lust does not enter the heart, but, on the contrary, proceeds from it, as appears from Matt. xv, 19: 'For out of the heart proceed (through lust) evil thoughts [sin], murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies.' In Rom. i, 24: 'Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts,' and ver. 26, it is not God who awakened the lusts, but man, who had withdrawn from God, and made gods unto himself to worship. In view of its final object, this estrangement from God is a matter of free volition. Rom. vi. 12: 'Let not sin, therefore, reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof;' it can be understood how one could be good so far as intentions are concerned, while yet sin would reign in the lower part—he who is the perishable body (compare with vii, 16. Gal. v. 17). But the apostle considers man, spiritually and bodily, as a whole. He who lives in God through Christ, and is dead unto sin (Rom. vi. 11), must not let lust govern his perishable body, or listen to his desire, but, on the contrary, these ought no longer to exist in him; the body is to be made as subservient to righteousness as the spirit, for it is the temple of the spirit, and therefore is the instrument wherewith the human mind, animated by the Holy Spirit, is to act. Accordingly it is stated in Rom. vii, 8: 'For when we were in the flesh [before being regenerated], the motions [acts] of sin, which were by the law [which were shown by the law as such], did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death.' So in Rom. vii, 8: "What shall we say, then? Is the law sin [the original source of sin]? God forbid. Nay, I had not known sin [the fact of sin] but by the law; for I had not known lust [that it was evil] except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But [my natural] sin [the principle of sin, or lust], taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me in all manner of concupiscence [sinful desires resulting from the general lusts of the flesh]. For without the law sin was dead [i.e. not absent, but partly in the sense of not being recognised as sin or lust, and partly because the knowledge of the restrictions imposed by the law served but to increase the desire for what it forbade]. Xepi yap éxvse épamprá epírwp is a general and popularly expressed aphorism, which is not received in theory. In Gal. v, 17, 24, we are directed, 'Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfill the lust of the flesh. For the flesh [sin] lusteth against [in contradiction with] the [Holy] Spirit, and the Spirit against [against the] flesh; and these are contrary to the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the thing that ye [simply] would: but they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh (in the regeneration), with the affections and lusts.' The effect of the struggle between the flesh and the Spirit is to prevent the evil which would have sprang from man's estrangement from God only to be cancelled by regeneration. The image of God is never entirely obliterated, but the lusts of the flesh can lead into enormous sins, and have done so. In like manner, in Rom. i, 24, etc.; Eph. iv, 22 (Col. iii, 5 comp. with Eph. ii, 2; Tit. iii, 8): 'That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; lust (estrangement, from God), as an impulse of free volition, is the original source of error which obscures both the mind and the heart. Further, Rom. i, 21, 22: 1 Tim. vi, 9 (But they that walk otherwise fall in; and many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition): 2 Tim. ii, 22 ('Flee also youthful lusts'); Tit. ii, 12 ('Teaching us that, denying ungodliness [devianóma] and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world'); Tit. iii, 8: 'That the aged women should likewise be reverent, not to suffer the head of the family to fall into the lust of youth'; Tit. iii, 9: 'That the aged women should be reverent, not to suffer the head of the family to fall into lusts.' Christians can and must be in the world, but not of the world, and must hold themselves aloof from its contamination. So, again, James i, 27; 1 Pet. ii, 11 ('Dearly beloved, I beseech you, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul'); 1 Pet. iv, 1-3 ('He that hath suffered the flesh ['lust'] lately, is dead unto the flesh ['lust'] he hath crucified from sin; that he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God. For the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in successors, lust, excess of wine, revellings, banquets, and abominable idolatries"; compare 1 Pet. i, 4; 2 Pet. ii, 10, 18; iii, 8; Jude 16. Once more, 1 John ii, 15-17: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. For if a man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof." Finally, James i, 14, 15: "But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then, when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death (or misery)."

The N. T. teaches us that man should eagerly avoid himself of the power of sanctification proffered through grace. But the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life is a sin, and he that committeth sin is of the devil (1 John iii, 19). The law and general lustration of the whole Roman people took place after the completion of every lustrum, when the censor had finished his census, and before he laid down his office. This lustrum (also called iustrum) was conducted by one of the censors, and held with sacrifices called suovetaurilia, because the sacrifices consisted of a pig (or ram), a sheep, and an ox. It took place in the Campus Martius, where the people assembled for the purpose. The sacrifices were carried three times around the assembled multitude. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Antiquities, s. v. Lustration.

Something of the nature of lustration prevails in the use of "holy water" (q. v.) by the Roman Catholics.

Lutši, earthy, one of the terms of reproach with which the first Christians were assailed by their persecutors.

Luther, Martin, the greatest of the Reformers of the Christian Church, whose name is the watchword of Protestantism, and marks a new era in the history of Europe.

I. Youth.-He sprang from an old and widely-extended German family, of which there are documentary traces as early as 1137. He was born at Eisleben, a village of Lower Saxony, Nov. 10, 1483 (see, however, an argument for a later date, 1484, Studien u. Kritiken, 1872), fifteen years before the martyrdom of Savonarola. As one of the heralding stars destined toManifield, this young man became a man of property and town senator. Luther grew up under pious but rigorous discipline. His father was characterized by severity, tempered with great honesty and clearness of judgment. Luther's mother was a woman of earnest piety, which, however, had also a tinge of harshness. Luther went to school at Magdeburg in 1497, in 1498 to Eisleben, and in 1501 he entered the University of Erfurt. Here he took the Bachelor's degree in 1508, and the degree of Master of Arts, which entitled him to teach in the university, in 1505. He was designed for the profession of the law, but a prevailing discomfort and occasional anguish of mind, under a sense of sin and the dread of the wrath of God, heightened first by the sudden, violent death of a friend, and later by a stroke of lightning which fell near his feet, determined Luther quite otherwise. He vowed to St. Ann that he would become a monk. The evening before his entrance to the cloister of the Augustinians he spent in lively conversation and song with his university friends, and the first announcement to them of his purpose was made at the close of the festal houn. "To-day you will see me a monk," he said. "To-morrow I will be no more," said Luther. When night was passing into morning, July 17, 1505, he presented himself for admission at the convent—soon to become the birthplace of Lutheran Protestantism and of the evangelical doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law.

II. Cloister Life (1505-1517).—He passed through his revived his earliest theological lectures, were the Psalms and the Epistle to the Romans. The lectures rested upon a study of the Vulgate and of the fathers. Philosophy he still prized, but most of all as a handmaid to true theology, which, he says, "searches for the kernel of the nut, the marrow of the fruit."

A Journey to Rome was made by Luther in 1510, on foot. He was cashiered from the University; he did not get the degree of his order, and yet more as a pilgrim. As the Eternal City rose before his eyes, he fell on his knees, and fervently exclaimed, "Hail, sacred Rome! thrice hallowed with the blood of martyrs!" St. Peter's was half finished. The man now looked upon with horror was the man who had been so recently the arch-enemy of the Roman Church, though Rome held the world's offers in her hands. New Rome stood on the heaped graves of the dead, old pagan city. Luther was not insensible to the historical and antiquarian interest which clustered around every site, but every other feeling was subordinate to the religious one. He was full of honest fervor, full of pious credulity. He went up the stairs of Pilate on his knees, yet with his heart protesting as he crept: Not thus do the "just live by faith." He looked upon the handkerchief of Veronica; he gazed on the chains of Paul and Peter, and his strong sight was too much for his strong credence—he could not see in his heads carvings in wood, and bad carvings. Luther saw the poms and the corruptions of Rome, but his heart remained fixed still in its strong love to the Roman Church, honored of God above all others" (1519).

The first light of the Gospel as Luther sheds it, beams forth in his lectures on the Psalms and Romans. Among his earliest works are his series of sermons on the Ten Commandments, his exposition of the penitential psalms, his catechism, and his instruction to the clergy. From the medievals to the moderns, Bernard was recognized as the highest place in Luther's regard. If ever there was a holy monk, Bernard was that monk. He is golden when he teaches and preaches—then he surpasses all the doctors in the Church (Weller, xii, 1502, xiii, 2000). Augustine and Bernard became increasingly precious to him as his continued studies of the holy Scriptures brought him to a profounder acquaintance with the truth. In 1508 his scholarship received acknowledgment by a call to the chair of philosophy in the newly-founded University of Wittenberg, the capital of the old electorate. The university was under the protection of the elector (Frederick)—not of an ecclesiastic—which was a happy circumstance for its part in the future. Its patron saints were Paul and Augustine. Luther went thither, and lectured on dialectics and physics according to Aristotle. In 1509 he became Doctor of Philosophy and Bishop. 1511, Sentiamiarus (Sentences of Lombard, first two books), Formatus (Sentences, last two books); October 4, 1512, Licentiatas (to teach theology in general); and October 19, 1512, Doctor of Theology, a degree which involved not a mere honor, but an office, in receiving which Luther swore "to teach purely and sincerely according to the Scriptures." He now transferred his labors from philosophy to theology. His favorite books, on which he de-toward this traffic, his design was not to array himself against the Church, but to vindicate her against what he believed to be an abuse of her sacred name. As the \textit{confessional notice} in the pulpit, and the heavenly body was possible. He wrote earnest letters of remonstrance to the bishops of Brandenburg and Mayence, holding in regard to repentance that a distinction is to be made between the internal repentance, which is of the heart, and the external thing of confession and satisfaction. Receiving unfavorable comments on his position from the prelates, he determined to make his opposition public.

III. \textit{First Movements as a Reformer} (Oct. 81, 1517–May 4, 1521).—On the 31st of October, 1517, at midday. Luther affixed to the castle church at Wittenberg ninety-five theses. It was a blunder to his own advantage, to his own destruction, completely denying the position on which Tetz\textsuperscript{el} rested the merits of indulgences. He declared, in substance, that the command of Jesus to repent implies that the whole life is to be a repentance, not to be confounded with the confession and satisfaction made to a priest. Repentance, indeed, demands with that which is internal an external mortification of the flesh. The power of the papal indulgence can go no further than the penances imposed by the pope himself. The papal indulgence, consequently, can produce no reconciliation with God, no true grace, no true salvation; it can only cover the smallest daily sin. The pope can only announce and confirm the forgiveness imparted by God. This, indeed, is not to be despised, yet it can be found without the pope's indulgence where there is true compunction and faith. The true Church is not bound by these indulgences intrusted to the pope, but is the Gospel of the grace of God. He distinctly held the obtaining of grace to be a thing of immediate relation between the soul and God. In these theses Luther believed that he expressed throughout the mind of the pope, who he supposed was ignorant of the abuses that had been practiced in his name. It seems at first remarkable that Luther gives so little prominence to faith in the theses, and in the sermons on indulgence and grace which appeared simultaneously with the theses, and were meant for the people, Nov. 1517. But a careful study will show that his conception of repentance is that larger Biblical one in which it embraces both penitence and faith. Repentance is sometimes used as synonymous with penitence, and we then speak of repenting and believing, repentance and faith. Sometimes repentance covers both, and the penitent demand and repent. Thus, in the 12th art. of the \textit{Augsburg Confession}, it is said: "Repentance properly consists of these two parts: The first is contrition, or the terror of a conscience smitten with acknowledged sin. The other part is a confession, to the faith which believes, and believes that for Christ's sake sins are remitted." This first act of Luther's evangelical life, says Gieseler, "has been hastily ascribed by at least three eminent writers of very different character—Bossuet, Hume, and Voltaire—to the narrow monastic motive, the jealousy of a rival order. It is asserted that the Augustinian friars had usually been invested in Saxony with this profitable commission, and that it only became offensive to Luther when transferred to the Dominicans. There is no ground for this assertion. The Dominicans had been for nearly three centuries the peculiar favorites of the holy see, and objects of all its partialities; and it is particularly remarkable that, after the middle of the fifteenth century, during a period scandalously fruitful in the abuse in question, we very rarely meet with the name of any Augustinian as employed in that service. Moreover, it is through all the three great pontificates of the religious and contemporary adversaries of Luther ever advanced this charge against him, even at the moment in which the controversy was carried on with the most unscrupulous wrath. The influence of the theses was instantly felt far and wide. The theses," says Luther himself, "ran clear through all the northern states and many of the southern states, and all the empire was complaining about the indulgences; and because all the bishops and doctors were silent, and nobody was willing to bell the cat, Luther became a renowned doctor, because at last somebody had come who took hold of the pulse of Luther, in his frame, unless confide that the pope would be his most enthusiastic patron, was soon undeceived, but his higher trust was strengthened by the course of events. "Ill," he said, "the work of God, who can overthrow it?" (Compare here the article Lazo X in this volume, especially p. 868 sq.) A careful reprint of the theses, after the original, is given in Ranke's \textit{Reformation's Geschicht.})

In 1518 the Augustinian Order held a convention at Heidelberg. All of Luther's friends counselled him against going thither, as his life was threatened. Luther, faithfully and strongly adhering to his own convictions, went, and attended the convention. In Heidelberg he disputed on theses in theology and philosophy; on free-will and the fall; grace, faith, justification, and good works. He took ground against Aristotle. An immense audience, not only of students, but of citizens and courtiers, attended the disputation. Among the auditors were Bucer, Brenz, and others, destined to play a memorable part in the scenes of the coming Reformation. Meanwhile the principles maintained in the ninety-five theses had provoked the assuaults of a number of stanch adherents to the papal authority. Among these was Melancthon, who stoutly defended himself against all of them in his \textit{Resolutions}, that is, solution of points in dispute concerning the virtue of indulgences; and, still hoping for redress from Rome, sent these to Leo X. His appeal was first of all to the holy Scripture, and, next to this, to Augustine, as the profoundest expositor of Scripture among the fathers.

While the elector, in the interest of the university, protected Luther, Rome avoided coming to the last extremity. As early as Feb., 1518, the pope had instructed the general of the Augustinian Order, Gabriel Venetus, to turn Luther from the path he was following. As this measure failed of success, Luther had been called forward for trial to Rome. By the intercession of the elector, in place of appearing at Rome to answer the citation, the appointment was made that cardinal Cajetan should give him a hearing at Augsburg. Urban, the court of the marquis of Montferrat, tried his arts of persuasion previous to Luther's meeting Cajetan. To him Luther said, "If I can be convinced that I have said anything in conflict with the understanding of the holy Roman Church, I will recant it in the presence of the said pope and all his court. "Do you think the elector is going to hazard his land for you?" Luther replied, "I would in no wise have it so." "Where, then, will you abide?" Luther answered, "Under the cope of heaven." The Italian replied, "Had you said thus to the pope, he would have given you what would you ask for?" "I would," said Luther, "give them all due honor and reverence." At this the messenger, after the Italian manner, biting his thumb, went away (Fuller, \textit{Abel Rodervicus} [Nicholas], 1867, i, 44).

The cardinal himself attempted, Oct. 1518, to bring "little brother Martin" to submission, but without success. "I don't wish to talk more with this beast; he has a deep eye, and marvellous speculations in his head." The good offices of Staupitz, the head of the Augustinians, and a firm friend of Luther, were also called in to move Luther, but the service was not one after his heart. When Luther asked Staupitz for some other interpretation of the Scripture than that on which his faith rested, Staupitz acknowledged that he could not give it, and showed where his heart was when he said to Luther, "Remember, dear brother, that thou hast begun in the name of Martin Luther, and not in the name of Leo X." But Luther, being hampered, Staupitz had absolved him from the vow of obedience to the order. Luther finally appealed from "our most holy master Leo X, ill informed, to Leo X, to be better informed." Having reason to fear violence, he made his escape in the night of Oct. 20. He was furnished with a vesture of all and unerring grace. Luther, disguised in a long mantle, barefooted, and unarmed, tude until the evening of the day following, and when dismounted, could not stand, but lay helpless on the straw. At Gräfenthal he was overtaken by count Albert of Mansfeld, who laughed heartily at Luther's style of herneship, and insisted on having him as his guest. Two days after Luther's departure the appeal was fastened to the door of the cathedral at Augsburg.

The use of all the month failed to make the attacks upon indulgences, and claimed for the pope the power of delivering sinners from all punishments due to every sort of transgression. Luther, now despairing of any reasonable accommodation with the pontiff, finding that nothing else of the six letters "r v o e a v" would answer, appealed on Nov. 25, 1518, from the pope to a general council. Leo, however, by this time aware of the greatness of the schism likely to occur in the German Church, seeing around Luther fast gathering the great, and the strong, and the learned, hastily dispatched Militiz, the papal chamberlain and legate, whose moderation and skill adapted him for the mission of conciliation. Though he utterly failed to procure any reconciliation, he yet succeeded in obtaining from Luther (1519) an expression of submission, and induced him to promise the publication of a tract on indulgences, which promising silence if it were also imposed on his adversaries. See Loo X.

IV. Leipzig Disputation.—But the vanity and eagerness of his opponents were too great to allow the stipulation any practical force. They saw spurs to be won, and see the advantage from the chances from whom. In the previous year (1518) had challenged Carlstadt to a disputation, but his whole course proved that Luther was to be the main object of his attack, and Luther hesitated not to appear in defence. The disputation took place at Leipzig in the Pleissenson Castle, from June 26 to July 16, 1519. Carlstadt was no match for Eck, who was incomparably the best debater on the side of Rome in the century. The discussion was so tedious at times that the hall was emptied. The debate itself, and the part Luther himself took during its progress, have already been spoken of in the article Eck, in vol. li, especially at p. 47 sq.

The breach with Rome was decided at these disputations by Luther's declaration that among the articles of Huss there were also some condemned by the Council of Constance completely Christian and evangelical, thus clearly denying, de farto, the authority of the Church to decide in matters of faith. In August, 1520, appeared the reformatory writing, "To the Christian Nobles of the German Nation, of the bettering of the Christian State." In this work Luther unsparingly exposed what the Church had done to convert the noble, loyal race, to treacherous perjurers, and showed with what forbearance Germany had borne these indignities.

The German knighthood had offered to draw sword in Luther's defence, but he declined the aid of all earthly power, was out of keeping with the holy interests of the kingdom. This great book showed to the knights that Luther's armies were mightier than theirs. In his book, "Of the Babylonian Captivity of the Church," Oct. 6, 1520, Luther presented the doctrinal aspects of the Reformation, as in his book to the nobles he had looked at it in its political relations. He demanded the total abrogation of indulgences as "devilish institutions," the restoration of the cup to the laity, the limitation of the number of the sacraments: "If we wish to speak rigidly, there are in the Church two sacraments only." He declared transubstantiation to be no article of faith, and set forth the view that "true bread and true wine," not their mere accidents, remain in the Supper. He urges the cessation of external ecclesiastical satisfactions.

Through the whole he urges the sufficiency of the faith by which alone man is justified. It might have seemed strange that so intimate a collaborator with the Church of Rome was no longer possible; yet, as the result of a second conference with Militiz at Lichtenberg, Oct. 12, 1520, Luther expressed himself willing once more to test the question. If reconciliation were to be had at all, the sermon "Of the Freedom of a Christian Man" (Wittenb. 1520) breathed the very spirit in which alone it was possible. It is "pleasant, without pomelics, full of devoutness, and of the overwhelming might of love to God and love to man. In it the reformatory principle is deep and broad, its rich devotion, its rich religious freshness. Its life-breath is the spirit of the higher peace; it contains a treasure of new impulses for the intellectual, and, indeed, the speculative life of the Christian soul. The evangelical principle, as it involves faith and love, has perhaps never been unfolded with such clearness, fullness, and depth. It is noble and full of significance that Luther appended this golden little book to his last letter to the pope (Sept. 6, 1520), as if with a petition for a peaceful separation and a more kindly construction. But it is a happy thing besides to note the profound, the pious, the deep, and the clear ness of soul with which Luther stood as the strife grew more threatening, and the bull of excommunication was impending. This undoubted mirror of a childlike heart, reflecting the peace of heaven, is in amazing contrast with the thunder-storm which gathered about it, and which still the pope's excommunication, which is by faith had what he confessed, and was what he taught" (Dornier, Gesch. der Prot. Thol. p.
101, 108). Rome had meanwhile been getting ready to settle the whole matter by a coup de main. In September, 1520, Eck appeared in Germany with the papal bull, containing the excommunication. But one proposition extracted from Luther's writings, orered his works to be burnt wherever they were found, and summoned him, on pain of excommunication, to confess and retract his errors within sixty days, and to throw himself upon the mercy of the pope. This bull brought Luther to a step decisive beyond recall.
Susceptible to gentleness, he met violence and threatening with unshakable courage. Like a great general, promptly accepting the warfare forced upon him, he carried the war instantly into the heart of the enemy's territory.

Before the gate which open, towards the river Elster, at Wittenberg, in the presence of a vast multitude of all ranks and orders, he burned the papal bull, and with it the decree, the decretals, the Clementines, the Extrava-gantas, the entire code of Roman canon law, as the root of all the evil, Dec. 10, 1520. Archdeacon Manning, whose testimony here will carry peculiar weight, says:
"The just causes of complaint which made Luther first address the bishops, his steady appeals through every graduation of ecclesiastical order to the award of a general council; and, on the other, the violent and corrupt administration of Leo X., enabled the Emperor, to the exclusion of all personal considerations, to call against a man whose cause was still unheard, seem effuctually to clear both him and those who, for his sake, were driven from the unity of the Church from the guile of schism" (Unity of the Church [London, 1842], p. 328, 1829). Thus Luther broke openly, as he had already broken virtually, with Rome, forever. This final rupture gave a character of sharpest decision to his appeal to a general council, with which he prefixed the burning of the bull, and to his writings Against the Bull of Awi-chirri, against Emser, and others. He still continued a faithful member of the Catholic Church of the West, holding its old faith, which knew nothing of a pope with unlimited despotic authority. He stood then in many respects in the same general position which is occupied by Döllinger now. The bull of excommunication promptly followed, Jan. 6, 1521. The same sequence of Luther's daring act, the papal legate, Alexander, dem-manded of the Diet sitting at Worms that he should be put under the ban of the empire. But it was the wish of the estates of the empire that, in advance of giving effect to the papal bull, Luther should be summoned to appear and have a hearing before the Diet at Worms.

Luther wrote, saying, "Though there were as many devils in Worms as there are tiles on its roofs, still would I enter." In the memorable transaction at Worms, "the most splendid scene in history," as it has been called, Luther, in the presence of the emperor, the archduke Ferdinand, six electors, twenty-four dukes, eight margraves, thirty bishops, and other princes and prelates of the realm, April 17, 18, 1521. It was the most remarkable assembly ever convened on earth—an empire against a heretic! Large numbers of the people were present, and the whole city of Worms was surcharged with the spirit of Luther as he stood there, so lone and strong, with his great full heart—a second Prometheus, confronting the Jove of the 16th century and the German Olympus. "His friends were yet few, and of no great influence; his enemies were numerous and powerful, and eager for his destruction: the church, from the hope of religious regeneration, appeared to be placed at that moment in the discretion and constancy of one man. The faithful trembled." But Luther was victorious in his good confession. Having examined the looks laid before him, April 17, he acknowledged them as his own. After deep reflection, for which he had solicited time, he defended himself on the following day in an address of two hours in length. He upheld freedom of conscience, and denied the right of the priest to control by force the religious convictions of men. His religion, as a rule, was neither open nor secret, and his politics was modest, gentle, and humble; "but in the matter of his public apology he declined in no one particular from the fainess of his convictions. Of the numerous opinions which he had by this time adopted at variance with the traditions of Rome, there was not one which in the hour of danger he consented to compromise." At the close of his speech, which was in German, he commenced with the request to repeat it in Latin, for the sake of the emperor and of others. When urged with the direct question whether he would recant, he replied in Latin, "Unless I shall be convinced by the testimonies of the Scriptures or by evident reason (for I believe neither pope nor councils alone, since it is manifest they have often erred and contradicted themselves), I am bound by the Scriptures I have quoted, and my conscience is held captive by the word of God; and as it is neither safe nor right to set against conscience, I cannot and will not retract anything." He added in German, "Here I stand; I cannot otherwise; God help me. Amen." (Acta Wormske hubel, in Opera [Jena], ii, 414. The historical character of these last [German] words has been overestimated. Luther did not sacrifice either his hope but without good grounds. Luther's enemies now made violent efforts to effect his ruin. They counselled the violation of the imperial safe-conduct. They appealed to the crime of Constance as a precedent. Charles replied, "If it was established that Luther had not come home, it ought to find refuge in the heart of kings. The ban of the empire was published May 25, 1521. It made Luther an outlaw.

VI. The Wartburg Exile and the Return (May 5, 1521—1524).—On Luther's return from Worms the imperial herald accompanied him to the border of Hesse. At this point Luther, with no companion but Amsdorf, turned his face towards Möhra, to visit his grandmother. At Altenstein, May 4, in the Thuringian Forest, he was seized by masked horsemen, and was taken for protection by his friend the elector to the Wartburg, the Patmos of the opening apocalypse of history (see Leo and Luther), by Eugene Lawrence, in Harper's Monthly, xxxix, 91—106). Here, in the apparel of a knight, he was known as Jungkner George. His enemies accounted for his sudden disappearance by asserting that he had been carried away in a fit and died. A careful observer, however, with a point of view, does not give to that august person the due generally conceded to his sagacity—if Rome was right, there was no one whom the devil had so much reason to wish to keep on earth as Luther. The leisure enjoyed by Luther in the Wartburg was employed by him in preparing the draught of the translation of the New Testament. After an exile of ten months he was called back to Wittenberg, March 6, 1522, by the disorders which had broken out. The Augustinian monks had abrogated the mass; in the transactions which took place between them, the university, and the elector, Carlsbad had intermeddled. Carlsbad had gone on at once to introduce what, in his judgment, were manifest consequences of Luther's principles. The communion was administered in both kinds; the alteration of the elements and of the mass, and without confession. A great number of the usual ceremonies also were set aside, and the marriage of the priests, and of others under ecclesiastical vows, was introduced. The radical violence of the whole tendency and of its modes gave evidence that Carlsbad was availing himself of Luther's absence to attempt what he would not have dared to do when Luther was present. The passionate violence of Carlsbad was fanned by the Zwickau Prophets, who at this time made their appearance at Wittenberg. The wild storm of iconoclasm was met by Luther with discussion for the scholar, with sermons for the people. The personal character and force of Luther, the solid truth of his position, and his irresistible popular eloquence gained a complete victory over Carlsbad (q.v.). The two men were in heart sundered from this hour, though they met into open discourse. Previous to the struggle with Carlsbad the life of Luther in every element and trait had made an ineffaceable impress of grandeur on the hearts of the whole German nation. Every independent heart, and all the nobler Roman Catholics, acknowledged him in the highest sense a man of the people, and, in a sense not quite high, a man of God. He had "opened the sanctuary of a pure faith, and in heroic struggle had kept it open" (Dorner, Historie der Theol., trans. by Robinson and Sophia Taylor [Edinb. 1871], i, 97, 98). At this time took place his change from monasticism and asceticism to evangelical life: the former in 1524, when he dropped the monastic dress; the latter in 1525, when he married. Here also belong the part he took in 1529 at the colloquy in Marburg (q.v.), where an effort was made to harmonize the peculiar views of Luther and Zwinglei on the Lord's Supper; and his work for the Augsburg Confession (q.v.).

LUTHER

(Lutheran) princes declined to participate in the council. Melanthon in 1545 prepared the Wittenberg Reform, the sketch of a plan of union. To this Luther gave his subscription, but shortly afterwards published his book Against the Popery at Rome, founded by the Devil, one of the very fercest of his controversial works.-

VII. Luthe and the Bohemians.—On the other hand, Luther sought to perpetuate the fellowship formed with the Bohemians, who in 1536 had again sent their representatives to him. He wrote prefaces to their Apology of the Faith in 1533 and 1538. The dissatisfaction he had felt in 1534 with some things in their doctrine of justification, which appeared to him suspicious, was dispelled in 1534.

VIII. Luther's last days.—The Protestant princes had drawn the sword in the feud. Luther did all in his power to preserve the peace between the princes and the emperor; but the future looked threatening, and his soul was as full of solicitude as a soul could be whose trust in God was so implicit. The council and the congregation in Wittenberg gave Luther very serious trouble. The great renown and prosperity of Wittenberg, given to it by Luther and his coworkers, had brought with it such natural anxieties as the inflowing of wealth and the attainment of position. Frivolity and fashion corrupted the people. Luther fought with all his energies against the evil. In 1580, after a powerful sermon of rebuke, he withdrew, disheartened, for a long time from the pulpit. He at length left Wittenberg, as if he were selling his soul to save the principle there. The elector himself was obliged to interpose, to restore the old relations. From the time of his return Luther continued to preach, but discontinued his lectures.

Luther's last work was one of love and conciliation. Under the pressure of many cares, he started, in February, 1546, on a journey to Eisleben, to attempt a conciliation between the counts of Mansfeld, a work in which they had solicited his good offices. For fourteen years Luther had been a sufferer from severe and complicated diseases. He was not well when he reached the inn at Eisleben, and from the beginning of his sickness he had a presentiment that he would die in the place where he was born. He was able, however, to preach once. The day before his death he expressed a strong assurance that we shall know our loved ones in heaven. February 17 he lay in his bed. When Auriol came, he found him so much worse that he summoned medical aid at once. Rubbing and bathing afforded him temporary relief, and about nine o'clock Luther lay down upon a couch, and after gathering a little strength by an hour's rest, proposed to his attendants that he should lie in his bed. January 18, Martin, Paul, Luther's sons, and two servants, watched by his side. His pains, however, became so great that he could not remain in his bed. Count Albert and the countless sent in haste for their own physicians. Luther used everything prescribed, but spoke of nothing but his death, which he felt sure was at hand. He poured forth his soul in fervent prayer, and, after commending his soul into the hands of God, lay silent and waiting. Among the stimulants used was shaving of the horn of the natural, or so-called, a remedy then greatly prized. None of the stimulants had any effect. A little before his last breath Jonas and Celius asked him whether he died in firm assurance of the truth of the doctrine he had taught. With a distinct voice, he replied, "Yes. He expired about four o'clock in the morning, Feb. 18, 1546 (C. E. Stearns, Last Days and Death of Luther, in the Biblical Repository, 1845, p. 195, 212)."

His body was taken to Wittenberg, followed along the whole route by thousands of mourners, the tolling of the bells, and the dirges which gave expression to a universal sorrow. It was interred in a vault of the pulpit in the Castle Church. The funeral discourses were given by Bunkenhagen and Melanchthon. Six weeks after Luther's death his wife wrote: "My dear husband was not the minister of a city, or of a land, but of the whole world. To have lost a prince, to have lost an emperor, it is not such a loss as I deplore" (Brocke's De Wette, Leidemann, vi. 650).

Luther's situation in reference to earthly possessions would have been that of very moderate competence (his greatest income was about three hundred guineas), but not his penury which kept him perpetually poor. The large or older cloister of the Austin monks in Wittenberg was given to him by John the Constant. It was purchased from Luther's heirs for the academy at the price of 3700 guineas. Luther purchased the Little Cloister for 450 guineas; it was sold by his heirs for 4700 the same year. He also owned an orchard valued at 500 guineas, the manor of Wachendorf, a malefie valued at 1500 guineas, and the Zeilsdorf property, which sold for 956 guineas. For his books, which enriched his publishers, he would take nothing.

IX. Domestic and Social Life.—In the midst of the warfare which conscience compelled him to carry on with Erasmus, Carlstadt, and others, who professed to take in whole or in part the general ground against Rome, Luther entered on that domestic life, the charm of which still wins the heart of men, whose sympathies extend over the whole range of the human and natural side, the charm of which, in the spirit of the age, was spent in reformation. June 18, 1525, he married Catharina von Bora, who had fled from the Cistercian nunnery of Nimpfach. "This was the event of his life which gave most triumph to his enemies and perplexity to his friends. It was in perfect conformity with his maso- line and daring mind, that, having satisfied himself of the nullity of his monastic vows, he should take the boldest method of displaying to the world how utterly he rejected them." Luther's intercourse with his wife and children, his letters to them, the touching story of the death of Margaret and of Magdalena, present him as the model of the head of a Christian family (Krauth, Conservative Reform, p. 38-39; Stork, Luther at Home [1872]).

Luther had six children: 1. John, born June 7, 1528, was a jurist in Königsberg, and died there October 29, 1575. 2. Of his descendants were found in Böheim in 1880 in a state of poverty. 2. Elizabeth, born Dec. 10, 1527; died Aug. 3, 1582. 3. Madeleine (Magdalena), born May 4, 1529; died Oct. 20, 1542. 4. Martin, born Nov. 7, 1531, studied theology, but had not the intellectual capacities necessary for the work of writing and the memory; he laid down his office, and died as a private citizen, March 8, 1565. 5. Paul, born Jan. 28, 1538, was physician in ordinary at various courts, and died March 8, 1588. 6. Margaret, born in 1534, was married to George von Kunheim, Prussian counselor, and died in 1578. See Nobbe, Stammbaum der Familie von Bora, ed. (Grinnin, 1840). 6. Catharina von Bora, oder Luther als Gatte u. Vater (Leipzig, 1845); C. Becker, Luther's Familienleben (Königsb. 1858).

The direct line of male descent from Luther terminated with Martin Gottsch L, who was an advocate in Dresden, and died in 1728. The family to carry on Luther's brother, and of Catharina von Bora, have living representatives.

The great coworkers with Luther were also his dearest personal friends. First among them were Melan- thon, Amelot, Justus Jonas, and Bungenhagen. The Table-talk (Table-talk), which appeared twenty years after Luther's death, professes to be a record of his conversations, made immediately after them. It is not strictly authentic, and where it conflicts with well known and carefully avowed opinions of Luther, is of no value as testimony. It often prevents the true construction of the poetry of Luther's mind, and the fullest matter-of-fact perversion of his most brilliant thoughts. It confounds Luther himself with the character he dramatizes, in order to vivify his avatars to it, and the liveliest sallies of his wit and humor are given with the grace and spirit which the situation seems. Luther's annalst had the idiocy of a Bowery, but lit- tle of his skill. Nevertheless, the Table-talk is a record, thoughtless boy, one of many of Luther's best sayings. Luther and Erasmus. In their negotiations Luther and Erasmus had many points of contact and sympathy. Luther admired the polished scholarship of Erasmus; Erasmus acknowledged the power of Luther, the purity of his motives, and the necessity for his earlier work. He wrote to Luther and of him as a friend (1519).

When the diversity of their positions, the difference of their characters, and the pressure of circumstances made a conflict between them growingly probable, each dreaded the other as an antagonist as he dreaded no other man. (Compare here Luther's letter to Erasmus, cited in the article Erasmus.) Erasmus was forced into the controversy and in the end, with his voice of the nation. He had perhaps never entered the lists against Luther, and he would never have written his Defence of freewill. The will of Erasmus was under bondage to the will of Henry VIII. Luther, with more solicitude than the presence of princes and prelates had ever given him, was obliged to take up the gage of battle. To the years 1524, 1535 belongs this controversy. It began with an attack on the part of Erasmus in his book De libero Arbitrio. Luther wrote De servo Arbitrio. Erasmus wrote in reply his Hyperaspistes. Luther felt that the fire of his own heart was the hotter, that his own had been sufficiently put, and the controversy ceased. As regards the vital point in this discussion, the mass of earnest Christian thinkers from Luther's time to this have been a unit in their estimate. Erasmus simply made a development of a refined pagan naturalism (for humanism is no true philosophy) under the pressure of Christianity. Luther's main point is the common ground of evangelical Christianity, though many of his particular phrases might not meet with universal approval. "Erasmus makes man at first richer than Luther does, but yet how far is Luther's conception of freedom ultimately superior to that of Erasmus, who views the highest and best element of freedom as reached in freedom of choice, and who accordingly must logically teach an everlasting possibility of falling, and make perfection eternally insecure! Luther's conception of freedom leads to godlike, real freedom by grace; for this it could seem to be no advantage, but only a defect, to be involved in choice and hesitation" (Dornob Hess, Hist. of Prot. Theol., transl., i, 217).

In justifying the clash of this controversy with Luther's war against Rome, Eichhorn, "Erasmus was not only a political economist but he was a statesman of the utmost pressure brought to bear on him by the papal opponents of Luther, but Luther, in his reply, shows that he recognizes the same interest as involved here, as that which had so far conditioned his whole struggle with Rome. He writes under the consciousness that in Erasmus he has a rival who is not "a great dab in the Pelagianism of Rome" (ii, 36)." (Comp. here a review of M. Durand du Lau's Erasme in The Academy, September 15, 1872.)

XI. The character of Luther lies so open in his life that it is impossible not to view it in its light. He was so ingenuous that if all the world had conspired to cover up his faults, his own hand would have uncovered them. His violence was that of a mighty nature, strong in conviction, waging the battle of truth against imincible foes. The expressions which jar upon the refined ear of the modern world were natural in a rough age, and from the lips of one who was too pure to be prudish. The coarseness of the mendicant life can hardly fall to leave their traces on any man who has been subjected to them—the taint of a system in which filthiness is next to godliness, or, rather, is a part of it. The inconsistence of Luther is that of the man of a great intuition, who grows perpetually, and who will not stop for the hopeless and useless task of harmonizing with the crudities of yesterday the ripeness of to-day. His widest diversities, after the sap of Reformation began to swell in its veins, were like those of the tree which bends with the mellow fruit of autumn, careless of consistency with its first buds in the cold rains of March. That Luther was unselfish, earnest, honest, inflexibly brave in danger, full of tenacity and benevolence, the ideal of Old Testament strength and of Germanic goodness; that he was one of the greatest creative spirits of the race, mighty in word and deed, matchless as a popular orator, one of the very people, yet a prince among princes, a child of faith, a child of God—this is admitted by all (see Erasm's "Conservative Reformation," p. 187).

There is scarcely another instance in history in which an individual, without secular authority or military achievement, has so stamped himself upon a people, and made himself so great an extent the leader, the representative, the voice of the nation. He has been to Germany what Homer was to Greece. "He was the only Protestant reformer," says Bayard Taylor, "whose heart was as large as his brain." (See "An Interview with Martin Luther," in Harper's Monthly, xxii, 281.) Luther was well-set, not tall, was handsome, with a "clear, brave countenance," and "earnest soul." His eyes were remarkable for their keenness, "dark and deep-set, shining and sparkling like a star, so that they could not well be looked upon," as old Kessler describes them. The fulness of face given him in his later pictures, is not of recent origin; the roundness of forehead, the tendency, resulting from his early austerities. His physical life was largely one of suffering. His habits were abstemious, and his enjoyments at the table were social, not Epicurean. His voice was not loud nor strong. Melanchthon's happy phrase touching Luther's words is, that they were "fulminant," not "tumultuous"—it was their lightning, not their thunder, by which their mighty effects were produced. The papal system, the ups of the ages, which they struck, is not dead, but it is riven and blasted from its crown to its root.

Luther as a Conservator. The culmination of Luther's epic for the world at large is undoubtedly the defence at Worms. An obvious source of the diminution of interest in the later years of Luther's life is that the carrying through of what had been so grandly begun presents, in the nature of the case, less that bringing before the mind, in all the magic of its unparalleled power, the personal character of Luther. When the warfare is ended, the life of the greatest soldier becomes as tame as that of the ordinary man. But, beyond this, a diminished interest and a divided sympathy are due alike to the discord between the movement of the constitution of the Church Luther took a position on which the Protestant world has divided. The occasion for the exhibition of Luther's conservatism was given by his conflict with the Zwickau Prophets (1822) and Carlistard, and by the dreadful excesses of the peasant insurrection. In the Holy Roman Empire, the Germanic enthusiasm led to be results of the German mystical thinking—a mysticism which he himself had cherished; he found that these wild fanatics put their own construction upon his views of Christian liberty and the rights of the congregation, and applied those views of their own invention. These results and the construction Luther looked upon with abhorrence. Luther brought to a fuller exhibition what was the real difference in principle between the position of these fanatics and his own. He saw that they consciously ignored and rejected a principle without which reformation would be transformed into a radical and violent revolution, foreign to its own nature to the whole genius and history of Christianity. This principle is that of the unbroken historical life and development of the Church. Not as a something isolated from the Church, but as a divine tradition which had the truth of God reached the soul of Luther. The power which opened to Luther the true nature of repentance, justification, and grace, had not simply lingered in the Church, but had ripened in it, and the Reformation could no more have been, nor Luther have been Luther, but for the Church's history, than without the Word. Men are begotten of God through the Word, but the Church is the mother who bears them. The Word of God is the all-sufficient rule of faith, but it must be seen or heard in order to be applied; and the rule of faith is to be neither written, private, nor that which stands for itself, or speak itself, and all the ordinary organs of its perpetuation, circulation, and application are within the Church. The divinity of the Word and the divinity of the Church are doctrines not only in harmony with each other, but necessary to each other's existence. The first, without the second, is fanaticism and antichristianism, and hopeless individualism; the second without the first is popery. The movement of Luther, from the hour of his riper self-perception, was so completely churchly and historical that the fanatics hated Luther more than they hated the pope, and the only indication that Luther needed in the need of building the sound, as well as of thinning down and removing the rotten, may be mentioned the Wittenberg Order of the Congregations, 1522; the Leis- ning Order of the General Fund, 1523; letter to the land-grave of Hesse in regard to the Hambach Church-Or- der, 1527; the Visitation, 1527-1529; the part he took in the arrangement of the consistory and for the govern- ment of the Church.

Those who do not sympathize with his conservatism yet admit that Luther's personal religious character was deep and intense, and that in the point of conscience, and where he stands on the verities of his own internal experience, he is the unshakable reformer. But it is said by these objectors that where his own immediate religious consciousness ceases he shows himself under the influence of other views. If the unknown, unknown himself, he stands forth with the "inexceaseable traces of the monk, the priest, and the scholastic theologian." By this supposition is solved the fact that, while he rejected the mass as it embodied the idea that the Lord's Supper is a proper sacrifice, and rejected transubstantiation, he yet found it impossible to abandon the thought that the Lord's Supper veils the mystery of redemption, and is "more than an act in which a congregation unites in a pious and believing memorial." This it was, they think, which led him to "a conception of the sacrament obscure and indeterminate, and to a doctrine which maintains on a scholastic basis the presence of Christ, and the ubiquity, the omnipresence of his body." From the same direction comes the charge that, "blinded by the halo which to the eyes of the people invests the head of the imperial majesty, he overlooked the fact that the supposed Christian for a time, forgot that he had to go cheerfully to the scaffold, but that it is also Christian and manly for inalienable rights to resist imperial op- pression with the sword." Luther's holding back, and Luther's scruples, are charged as the main cause that the Reformation made so little. This is the favorite- able opportunity which were so often presented in the political relations of the times; opportunities which, rightly used, would have enabled them to seize and to maintain the pre-eminence.

To these objections it may be answered that all that is of real importance in the judgment of Luther's posti- tion as to the Lord's Supper hinges upon the question, Is his doctrine the Biblical one? If it be Biblical, the main objections vanish. They could at the worst fix no more than the charge of doing a right thing in a wrong way. If we were to concede for Luther in these cases that he was what he confessed for himself at Worms, that he had fallen into personal expressions which did not become his character as a Christian, nor as a minis- ter of Christ, yet we could say for him, as he said for himself at the same great era, the question is not con- cerning it as a doctrine, but whether it is unbiblical, the proof of that fact swallows up all minor questions. But those who prize the thing will at least forgive the mode. Loving him for the "re" in which he was "fortier," they will absolve him for its sake for having carried the "fortier" also into the "modo." Here they were, they properly made from the position of those who harmonize with his views, not of those who differ from him, for the practical difference between the construction of frimmess and obstinacy usually is, that firmness stands fast to its object, and obstinacy holds stiffly what was reject, or care nothing about. To the Romanist Luther was obstinate at Worms, firm at Marburg; to the Zwing- lian portion of Protestants he was obstinate at Mar- burg, firm at Worms. As regards Luther's political position, it may be said that it received the Reformation in its infancy: and when evil counsels of the friends of Protestantism harmonised with the efforts of the Romanists to drag the question of the era into the arena of state-struggle, the Reforma- tion was brought to the verge of ruin. Had Luther shared the political views of the Zwinglian side of the Reformation, the appeal to arms made in the Thirty Years' War might have come a century earlier, and might have ended in the overthrow of the Reformation. But once in his career did Luther yield to the pressure of political considerations (the bigness of the landgrave of Hesse), and in that yielding the Reformation received its severest blow, and the name of Luther its solitary blot. His simple trust in God was the highest prin- ciple. It was, though Luther did not think of it as such, the highest policy.

A clear, comprehensive, and systematic statement of his doctrines was never given by Luther, not even in his confessional writings. Others have endeavored to arrange his views in systematic order: Kirchner, Theo- sumus (in Latin,1668); in German, 1566, 1576, 1598); Luther, Latin, 1574, 1631; Latin, and in German, 1597); Maltz, M. L. Theology of Pura (1709; with a Supplement, 1710); Beste, M. L.'s Glaubenslehre (Halle, 1845). In this general class may also be mentioned And. Musculus, Schacta (1577), and Salzburg, Singularka Lutheri (1684, fol.). It was La- ther's work to restore doctrine, he left to others the ar- rangement of it. He made history, others might write it. Luther's great aim constantly was to give promi- nence and strength to those doctrines which were denied, ignored, or corrupted. His plan of warfare was that of attack rather than of defence. He fought many battles, but underwent and conducted few sieges. "The wealth of his theological knowledge and teaching rests essen- tionally upon his direct mighty grasp, intuition, and um- vising view of truth. As the result of this, it is the peculiarity of his mind that there is a relative throwing of ideas into a shape that tends to give them greater intelligence which are directed to calm reflection upon the diverse individual elements and parts of the object, to notional formulating, to logical or dialectical syste- matising" (Köstlin, The Theology of Luther [1893]).

XIII. Polenics and Iremics.—Inflexible in his opposi- tion to Rome, he yet showed himself solicitous to pre- serve peace while peace was possible. Very gradually and very cautiously he declared himself for the right of armed resistance, when, in the conscientious judgment of men learned in the law, the nature of the violation of rights is such as to demand war as the sole possible mode of self-defence.

1. The doctrine of the Lord's Supper grew to a sub- ject of extended conflict, and of far-reaching doctrinal and practical power in Luther's life and in the Reforma- tion. It became, indeed, a touchstone. The laws of interpretation which determined the doctrine of the Supper formed the principle more or less of the distinctive characteristics of both tendencies in the Re- formation. While he was engaged in the controversy with Carlsstadt, he heard, Nov. 12, 1524, that Zwing- li, and Jan. 13, 1525, that Zcelomacius held the same view the poison widely creeping." There- in fact, if these views were of the character previously interpreted; and, as the three intervened the other two, and was overthrown by them; but as they concurred in the one result, the denial of the true presence, Luther regarded them from the beginning as essentially one view.

2. Luther's course in the sacramental controversy exercised an immense influence on the internal and external history of the Reformation, and on things in his history has Protestant sentiment been so completely and so passionately divided. In his sermon on the venerable sacrament (1519), in which he for the first time presented with comparative fulness the evangelical view of this subject, Luther stood unquestioned. His own doctrine of the true presence of the body and blood of Christ without a change in the elements ("true bread and wine remains") he first brought clearly forth in his work on the adoration of the holy sacrament (1523), addressed to the Bohemian Brethren, who had directed their inquiries in him. They claimed that they held an objective gift of God in the sacrament; and, although their doctrine has been asserted by some to be that of a purely spiritual presence, they gave it such an approximation to the doctrine maintained by Luther that he was entirely satisfied with the instrumentality of the Bohemians. He stood diametrically opposed to their views, and further in a letter to the preacher at Strasbourg (1525), and in a preface to the Swiss Synghramma (1528), with which he declared himself in harmony. He fought earnestly against the doctrine of the Lord's Supper proposed by his opponents, and commented with such a feature that it regarded the Lord's Supper not so much as a divine institution as a movement of man towards God. Over against these views Luther designates the forgiveness of sins as the special, distinctive grace of this sacrament, as is in that forgiveness Christ has laid the efficacy of his passion. That bread remains bread, and is yet, in the sacramental complex, the body of Christ, involves to faith no contradiction. He defended his views in the Sermon of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ (1520); that the Words "This is my Body" still stand at the Consecration in the Supper (1529); The colloquy at Marburg (1529) and in part removed his suspicions of Zwingle: "You have another spirit than we." The Schwaebach Articles gave renewed expression to the doctrine of the true presence, even stronger than that in the articles which were drawn up at Marburg to express the consent and dissent of the two parties. A more hopeful turn of mind was called forth by the visit of Bucer to Colberg in 1530. As a result of this visit, Luther, in letters to Albert of Prussia and to the people of Frankfurt, expressed himself more gently towards Zwingle. The Wittenberg Concord of 1536, the Marburg Articles and the Zurich Confession (1536) sought to accommodate a temporary friendly recognition of the Swiss, and a correspondence with them; but all the old distrust showed itself again in the Short Confession touching the Holy Sacrament (1544). Luther had set himself with unshakable decision against every league of the Evangelical (Lutheran) States with the Swiss. He had not been able, however, to deter the landgrave Philip from forming a league with them. In the conflict with Zwingle there had been a special development of Luther's Christological views, and an expansion and distinctness in his entire theology.

3. The controversies which most deeply distressed Luther were those which took place within the Evangelical Church itself. The Osnabriick controversy in Nuremberg, 1536, in regard to the general form of public administration, to which Andrew Osiander (q. v.), who was constitutionally self-opposed, had been opposed, was decided by Luther with that thorough moderation which never failed him when he believed that principle was not compromised. He thought the form objectionable, but said that it was leached and made a rule. In the controversy about the Peace of Augsburg (1555), Luther had in mind the real and hardly less than if he had been there in person. The great hymn "Ziehe fest Burs" is generally supposed to have been written at this time, but there are strong grounds for believing that it appeared in 1529. In 1557 he prepared the Schmalkald Articles, to be laid before the Diet of Speyer, which was convoked for the last time in 1556. At the formation of the Torgau alliance (1526) and of the Schmalkald League (1530) he had sent his opinion and advice, and, with his counsel to his elector, the protestation was made at Spires (1529).

friends. Agricola completely retracted his erroneous views, but the tenderness of the old confidence and love was never restored.

XIV. Literary Activity.—The activity of Luther in the period which followed his return to Wittenberg was largely directed to the internal shaping of the Evangelical (Lutheran) Church. Among its richest results may be mentioned, 1. his German hymns in the first German Hymn-book (1524), and the Wittenberg Hymn-book (1528). He stands forth in these as the father and founder of the German hymnology and Church music. See Hymnology. He was the author of thirty-six hymns, and of several original melodies adapted to them.

2. His Order of Divine Service and of the Congregation (Wittenberg, 1528); his Formulae Messe et Communio (1524); German Mass and Order of Divine Service (1529) (all of these are given in Sunday Service of Churches of the Reformation, by C. P. Krauth), with which he connected his Ritual of Baptism and Marriage, and a form of Confession. The great visitation in the states of the elector of Saxony (1527-1529) led to Melancthon's writing the Book of Visitation. This was revised by the latter and issued in 1530.

Among Luther's greatest labors are to be mentioned the two Catechisms (1529), and his Translation of the Bible. This he commenced with the New Testament in 1522; the Old was sent out in parts, commencing in 1525, and completed in 1535. The final revision was made in 1541, and the latest edition of this final revision, which Luther himself helped to correct, typographically, appeared in 1545. The Bible of Luther is an acknowledged masterpiece—one of the wonders of the intellectual world. The modern German attained its full development and perfect finish in Luther's version. By means of that book it obtained a currency which nothing else could have given it. It became fixed; it became universal; it became the organ of a literature which, more than any other since the Greek, has been a literature of popular science. It became the vehicle of the modern philosophy, the cradle of those thoughts which at the moment act most intensely on the human mind" (Hedge). "He created the German language," says Heine.

XV. Activity in Church Constitution.—He took an active interest in the constitution of the Consistories: Rehhem—Considerations of the Theologians touching Consistories (1538). An important part was borne by Luther in the preparation of the confessional writings of the renewed Church. He was, in conjunction with other divines, the author of the Marburg Articles and the Zurich Confession (1529). The Centenary Articles (1550) were founded on, and, to a large extent, the material, both doctrinal and verbal, of the Augsburg Confession (1530), during the direct preparation and presentation of which Luther was at Colberg. As he was under the ban of the empire, to have appeared at Augsburg would have almost certainly cost him his life, and would have made all negotiation impossible, as it would have been regarded as an open act of aggression on the part of the Protestant princes. He was brought, therefore, to the nearest point at which he could be safe, and where he could be consulted in the business. At this point, and which had been summoned at Mantua. In aiding in giving to the Church her proper external relations, Luther exercised his influence by letters, and by his writings in connection with the Diet of Nuremberg and of Ratibson, the religious peace of which he had been a prominent factor (1555). At the formation of the Torgau alliance (1526) and of the Schmalkald League (1530) he had sent his opinion and advice, and, with his counsel to his elector, the protestation was made at Spires (1529).
Luther's Letters have been edited, 1. by G. Th. Strobel (1780–88) and by De Wette (1825–29); supplement by Seidenmann (1866). 2. Correspondence edited by Burchardt (1866). See Veesemeyer, Literaturgeschichte ("Literature History of the Collections of Luther's Letters," Berlin, 1821).

The "Table-Talk" (Tischreden, Aurifaber, 1656; Stangwald, 1571, 1591) has been critically edited by Fürstemann and Bindseil (1844–48). The most complete translation into English is by Cap. Henry Bell (Lond, 1832; folio; 3d ed., 1871; new ed. Budehurtz, 1840 [garrified]; transl. by Wm. Hazlitt, London, 1848; new ed., with additions, London [Bohn], 1857, Philad. 1868).

The writers on the life of Luther are numerous (Fabrici Casteliotham [Hamb, 1728, 1730, 2 vols.; Uker, 1754; E. G. Vogel, Bibel, 1841; new ed., Budehurtz, 1851], give the literature), namely, Melanchthon, Historia de acta et acta Lutheri (Wittenberg, 1546; edited by Augustus, Breslaw, 1817; with Preface by Neander, Berl. 1841; transl. by Zimmermann, Göttinigen, 1816; in English, London, 1861, 1861; Crusiger (1558); Mathesius, Geschichte Luther's in Stresemann's Jornal (Nurnberg, 1863), and frequently since; edited with observations by Rust, Berl. 1841; by Schubert, Stuttg, 1852; Selnecker (1557); Dresser (1858); Walch, in his edition of Luther's Werke, xxiv, 1–875; Keth (3d ed. Leipzig, 1764, 4 vols.); Schrock (Leipz, 1779); Tischer (Leipz, 1798; new ed. 1803); Uker (1807); Uker (1817, 2 vols.); K. H. The biographical dictionaries and the encyclopedias all have articles on Luther. Among the former may be mentioned the American Dictionary of Biography, the Baye, the Colman, the Duden, the Eberhard (1870) and Herrzog (by Kästlin). Many of the most important works which treat of Luther's life, as, for example, Seidel, Scoltetus, Seckendorf, Tenzel, Spalatine, Myconius, among the older writers, and Marheineke, Ranke, D' Aubigne, Waddington, among recent ones, present it in its connections with the history of the Reformation (q.v.).

The most noticeable lives of Luther from Roman Catholic hands are by Cochlaeus (1549; tr. into German by Huyer, 1858), Ueberg (1822; trans., into German, Mainz, 1858), Michelet (1823–36, trans., by Lawson, 1856; 2d ed., by W. G. H. [John C.], Hemmert, 1861); Herzog (by Kaestlin). The best known by English hands are by Bower (1819), Riddle (1837), and John Scott (London, 1831; New York, Harper, 1851). The Scott-Coxey Family (1863) is the best picture of Luther from an English pen; little more than the frame is fiction.

From the hands of American authors we have the Sears (1850), Weiser (1848, 1866), Loy (tr. of Frick, 2d ed. 1869). J. G. Morris (Quasi Sayings and Doings concerning Luther, 1859), and A. Carlson, The Life and Times of Luther (1888, 1885; transl. Philad, 1841; by Trumpbell, London, 1854).

I. Origin and Development.—The rise of the Lutheran Church was due to the confluence of the Reformers' ideas and the religious ferment of the time. The preaching of a simple and direct way to salvation, the establishment of a new Church, the separation from the Roman Church, and the establishment of a new Church, were the main ideas that animated the Reformers. The Lutheran Church was founded in Germany in 1522, when Martin Luther, a German monk, began to preach reforms in the Church. The Reformation spread rapidly, and by 1524, the Lutheran Church had become established in Germany. The Reformation spread rapidly, and by 1524, the Lutheran Church had become established in Germany. The Reformation spread rapidly, and by 1524, the Lutheran Church had become established in Germany.

The Lutheran Church is the ecclesiastical communion which adheres to the rule and articles of faith restored in the Reformation, of which Luther was the chief instrument. The acceptance of this rule (God's Word) and the confession of this faith are set forth in the Augsburg Confession of 1530, which is the common confession of the entire Lutheran Church. The major part of the Lutheran Church formally and in terms acknowledges, and the rest of it, almost without exception, voluntarily acknowledges the Apology of the Augsburg Confession of 1530, the Schmalkald Articles of 1537, the Two Cathechisms of 1529, and the Formula of Concord of 1579, as according to the rule of faith with and with the Augsburg Confession. These confessions, together with the eccumenical creeds, form the Book of Concord of 1580, and are often styled The Symbolical Books of the Lutheran Church. The system of faith and life involved in the doctrine of the Lutheran Church is Lutheran, the Church which officially receives it is the Lutheran Church, and the members of that Church are Lutheran. The faith of the Lutheran Church is thus summarily presented by Dr. Cha. F. Krauth (Conservative Reformation, p. 127): "We are justified by God, not through any merits of our own, but by his tender mercy, through faith in his Son. The depravity of man is total in its extent, and his will has no positive ability in the work of salvation, but has the negative ability (under the operation of grace) of ceasing to resist. Jesus Christ offered a proper, vicarious, propitiatory sacrifice. Faith in Christ presupposes a true repentance. The renewed man co-works with the Spirit of God. Sanctification is progressive, and never reaches absolute perfection in this life. The Holy Spirit works through the word and sacraments, which only in the proper sense are means of grace. Both the Word and the Sacraments bring a positive grace, which is offered to all who receive them outwardly, and which is actually imparted to all who in faith embrace it." The chief peculiarities of Lutheran doctrine, which have to any considerable degree become subjects of controversy outside of the body itself, relate to (1) Original Sin, (2) the Person of Christ, (3) Baptism, and (4) the Lord's Supper. These will be found specially treated under these heads. Luther's own views on the last point will be detailed under the art. Transubstantiation. For a more complete view of the doctrines of Lutheranism, see Krauth, Conservative Reformation (Phila, 1871), and Prof. Jacoby in the Mercersburg Review, Jan. 1872, p. 77 sq.; Zöckler, Augsburgerische Confession (1870).
LUTHERAN

In Württemberg it was introduced under duke Ulrich in 1534; in the bishoprics of Magdeburg and Halberstadt in 1541; in Brunswick about 1545. The views which Luther had expressed at an early period in regard to a congregation were thereby brought into the background by the disturbances of the Anabaptists and the insurrections of the peasants. The leagues of the evangelical princes were one of the earliest forms in which there was an expression of the unity of the different parts of the Lutheran Church. The conventions of the theologians for the adjustment of doctrinal controversies tended to the same end. In the political relations of the Church the unity found expression in the "Corpus Evangelicorum" (q.v.) at the Diets.

The rapid, and, for a time, resistless growth of the Lutheran Church received its first check in the "ecclesiastical reservations" of the religious peace of Augsburg. By the terms of this peace the transition of an ecclesiastical prince was attended by a loss of his secular power. The miscarriage of the attempt at reformation by Gebhard Truchsess in the archbishopric of Cologne in 1539 was a serious disaster to the Lutheran Church. The larger part of Germany was inclined to the Lutheran faith. The apostasy of several of the princes, as, for example, Pfalz-Neuburg, on political grounds, and the influence of the counter reformation conducted by the Jesuits in Bavaria and Austria, preserved a part of Germany for the Roman Catholic faith. Yet the constitutionally fixed the boundaries of the Lutheran Church in Europe, and they remain, very much as they then were, to the present day. The transition of the elector of Saxony, of the duke of Brunswick, and of other princes to the Church of Rome exercised no very marked influence upon their people.

A large part of the higher nobility, which in the earlier movements of the Reformation had manifested, almost without exception, a drawing towards it, gradually lapsed again into Romanism. (On these perversions, and other losses to the Lutheran Church, see Löbel's Hist. Briefe. Hamburg, Grosse Geschichte, vol. vii [1868].) At an earlier period than that of these changes, the Philippist and Reformed churches of the Palatinate, and in Hesse, in Anhalt, and on the Lower Rhine, in East Friesland and Bremen, Lippe, Nassau, and Tecklenburg, had surrendered themselves from the Lutheran Church. In the present century these churches have come together in the "Union." Beyond the bounds of Germany the Lutheran Church was firmly established in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, and in the German Baltic provinces of Russia. In Poland it was suppressed (comp. Krasinski, *Index Historiae Poloniae, vol. i. [1865].) In the United States of America the Lutheran Church has won a new territory. (See below, LUTHERANS IN AMERICA.) In Hungary and Transylvania the German (Saxon) nationality accepted the Lutheran confession. The Magyars became converted to the Evangelical church. The pupils of Luther, preached the purified faith. Gustavus Vasa, king of Sweden, greatly promoted the interests of the Lutheran Church; and at the Diet of Westerlitz, in 1544, the last remnants of the papal system were removed. In Denmark, as early as 1527, Christian II had favored the Reformation. Frederick I was also a decided Lutheran. Christian III called in Bugenhagen to prepare and introduce a Church discipline and ritual. Riga and Courland entered into the League of Schmalkald in 1538. Apart from the vast Lutheran element within the "Union" in Prussia, the Lutheran Church was thrown into the hands of the German lands: Baden, Brunswick, Mecklenburg, Oldenburg, the principality of Reuss in Hesse, the Saxon lands, Schwarzburg, and Württemburg; also in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden; in Russia, in the departments of Livonia, Estonia, and Courland. In the Baltic and Baltic Gulf, the Lutherans constitute a large body in Hungary, France, the British empire, and North America. They are, in fact, found the world over. There are not less, probably, than forty millions of them altogether. (Comp. Krauth, p. 124, 125.)

III. Organisation and Constitution.—The first fresh impulses of the evangelical life of faith was not allowed to shape a complete congregational life in entire accordance with the pure principles which had been restored. With the early Lutherans the Church was a body, men of devoted piety, yet the interest of the Church in the particular state territories was subjected to political policy. The tendencies of the Roman ideas, which in every department had struck their roots too deeply into European life to be easily eradicated, put forth new vigor in the reactionary after-time. The Lutheran Church was repressed in one part of her development, and stimulated to the highest degree by her liberty in another, and by the doctrinal necessities which taxed all her resources. The result was that she matured abnormally—the strength of her policy bore no proportion to the perfection of her doctrinal system. In the organization of the Church an important part was borne by the Church visitation in Saxony in 1529, and resulted in assigning the oversight of the churches and schools to superintendents (q.v.). A Saxon Church Order of Discipline and Worship was prepared, which became, to a very large extent, the model in the organization of the state churches throughout Germany. The Lutheran Church held herself in principle remote from the two extremes of hierarchy, which absorbed the State into the Church, and Cessopapacy, which absorbed the Church into the State. In the series of official acts, the Church, in the time of the Church's need, took the position of provisional bishop. They were the supreme officers in the Church, its highest representatives. In the execution of the duties thus assumed they called to their aid Consistories (q.v.), as the official board composed of clergy and laymen. A condition of things which had been justified by the immediate necessity of the Church gradually became normal in the "Episcopal system." The provisional became legalized into the fixed, and the head of the State was in effect the chief bishop of the Church. The distinction as Bishop of Spirit and of laymen had made between clergy and laity, which neglected the great New-Testament doctrine of the universal priesthood of believers, was no longer recognized. The ministry ceased to be a self-perpetuating, independent order, and was regarded as a divine office, with a divine vocation, given by Christ's command, through the Church. A hierarchical division of the clergy, as of divine right, was rejected as at war with the Christianity of the New Testament and of the early Church; but the propriety and usefulness of grades in the ministry (bishops, superintendents, professors) in the Church at large is generally acknowledged, and they are retained in some countries. Thus, in Denmark, in the very infancy of Lutheranism, evangelical bishops took the place of the deposed Roman Catholic prelates; while in Sweden the privilege of naming the Royal bishops was retained in office, and thus secured to that country "a sacerdotal succession" in the High-Church sense. Very generally the rule of the Church is by consistories, but as these depend upon the instructions of the congregations, the ultimate power lies with the latter. See ConsISTORIES; SYNODS and CHURCHES.

IV. Progress.—The internal history of the Church became largely a process of the development of doctrine (see Hundsbaehausen, Breit, u. Kirch-politik); and in this progress, naturally enough, opposition was encountered, and gave rise to controversies with parties both from within and without the Church. Thus, the minor God of the history of the Lutheran Church, her chief struggles were with Popery, the Anabaptists, and the Sacramentarians. These controversies drew the boundary-lines of her own territory, as biblical over against Rome, historical and conservative over against the early Lutherans, and limited the degree of Protestantism. To the fixing of the bounds of her territory succeeded a longer series of efforts to bring that territory under complete and harmonious cultivation. To be consistent in general over against systems which, as systems, were indefeasible, was not enough. The Lutheran system was to bring all its own parts into working harmony, and hence the various dimensions and difficulties when it was yet in its infancy. The most important of the internal controversies which arose during this effort are: 1. The Antinomianism, from 1587 to 1589, on the relation between the Gospel and the law, the use of the law, and the necessity of the church law. 2. The Agricola Controversy, from 1589 to 1591. 3. The Oecumenical Controversy, from 1591 to 1594, on the doctrine of justification, sanctification, and election. See Osiander, Andrew. 4. The Reformation, from 1561 to 1562: Are good works necessary to salvation? And in what sense? See Major, G. 5. The Stoeic Controversy, from 1563: According to what principle of reason should a Christian's redemptory word be interpreted? See Major, G. 6. The Antinomianism, from 1556 to 1557, on the question whether there is an active co-operation on the part of man before and on his conversion. 7. The Flaccias, 1561: Is original sin substantial or accidental? See Flaccas, Ilex. All these controversies had a common aim—they wished to define more perfectly the fundamental doctrine of justification by faith, to show what it presupposed and what it involved, to exhibit its objective and subjective aspects. All doctrines were viewed in their relation to the nature of God, and the great aim was to adjust them to it (see Denk, Geschichte der Politiken. 1867; in English dress, Edinb. 1872, 2 vols. 8vo). A deeper impression was made upon the life of the people by the controversies which grew out of the interims in 1548, involving the individual persons of the princes and the great powers, which appealed to the senses as well as to the convictions of the worshippers. Out of it arose the A dialektische controversy (q.v.) (1550-1555): Whether the Church could permit certain usages, in themselves indifferent, to be imposed upon her by force of civil power. ('See Rechlin, Geschichte der A. K. (1862).) This vehement opposition of the Flaccias to the Philippists also had a great influence upon the shaping of the Lutheran Church. Unfortunately, however, these divisions among the Protestants gave the Romanists many advantages: they tended at the Diet of Augsburg (1566) to change the political situation greatly in favor of the Roman Catholics, and prostrated the strife for years (Ranke, Deutsche Geschichte, vii, 63). See Interim. Against Calvinism, the controversy turned especially upon the doctrine of the Lord's Supper and the associated doctrine of the Person of Christ, and the doctrine of predestination. It involved the whole essential diversity between Lutheranism and Calvinism; also the Philippist tendency, so far as it approximated to Calvinism in some features (Calvinismus). To compose these differences and close up these questions within the limits of the scope of the controversy seems which, after various ineffectual efforts in the same general direction at the Assembly of the Electors in Frankfurt (1558), at the Assembly of the Princes in Naumburg (1561), and at the Altenburg Colloquy (1568), was finally carried out in the Peace of Passau. The Peace of Passau, which was the most successful compromise at Winterberg, near Magdeburg, in 1577. See Concord, Formula of. The preparation of the Formula of Concord is the last act in the series of events which gave full confessional shape to the doctrines of the Lutheran Church. During Luther's lifetime the Lutheran Church had taken a firm and final position over against the Roman Catholic. The Augsburg Confession was the rallying point of the friends of the revised faith. The Apology defended the Confession in Melanchthon's incomparable manner; the Schmalkald Articles gave forth Luther's trumpet note of a battle in which no quarter could now be expected from the papal band of destroyers. See Apology, as a they had their Manual in the Shorter Catechism, and the pastors, in using it, had the Larger Catechism, the best commentary on the lesser. Yet these immortal documents did not exhaust the development of the faith. Even theuggy faith was alarmed, and the 'Consensus' of 1559, on the Meditations of Melanchthon there were impulses to conflicting tendencies. After Luther's death the Lutheran Church was threatened with a schism, which might have been followed by the complete triumph of Rome over the whole reformation work. On the one side was the gentle, unionistic tendency of Melancthon and his party (the Philippists), yearning for union, and temporizing sometimes with Calvinism, and yet more frequently with Romanism. On the other side stood the stricter party, headed by Amsdorf, Flacius, and Wigand. Over against the Church of Rome on the one side, and the Lutheran Church on the other, the Lutheran Church inclined earnestly on the doctrines which distinguished and separated her from both. She was unwilling that open questions should be perpetuated, and desired that the points of controversy should be adjusted and the controversy closed. Shall theology be simply a mode of thinking, or shall it be a system of faith? was the question involved. Shall it be a ball for the play of theologians, or a world for the firm footing of believers? The controversies which now arose took their root in questions which involved the relations of the two parties, on the one side to Romanism, on the other to Calvinism. Toward the Church of Rome the question in controversy had reference to the doctrines of redemption and justification. The intellectual centres of these struggles were the universitates (q.v.). In the 16th century Wittenberg was one of the most important. A strong party was in the, Calvinism. Its great antagonist in the interests of the conservative Lutheranism was Jena, which for various causes—some of the subordinate ones, no doubt, being of a political character—had been founded in 1568 by the older Saxen line. It was the citadel of conservative Lutheranism, and the host in conflict with it for conscience sake. Their refuge proved to be Magdeburg. This period reaches its culmination in the preparation of the Formula Concordis, in which the Swiss church, whose great representatives were Breitinger, and Zwingli, and whose political and cultural center was Schmid, Geschichte der A. (1862). The orthodoxy thus fixed was dominant from this time to the beginning of the 18th century. Its elaborate polemics were built up on almost imprecivable doctrinal authority. The scholastic acuteness and dryness more and more supplanted the freer and more vital faith of the Reformation. The religion of the heart was too much absorbed into the elaborate system of theology. The temple was solid and grand, but the heartlessness of the people were too often cold. George Calixtus (1566-1656) revived in Helmstadt the humanism of Melanchthon. His school became involved with orthodoxy in the Syncretistic controversy (q.v.). It sought, in the interests of Church peace, to soften the asperities of dogmatic disputes and the exclusiveness of the doctrinal systems. The plan on which it proposed to accomplish this result was to distinguish between fundamentals and non-fundamentals, and to return to the yet largely vague and general expressions of the first five centuries, which, while they regarded a pure faith as necessary to salvation, endured, without deciding the conflicting opinions on various points. The most unsparring and one of the most opposition of this tendency was Abraham Calixtus (q.v.) Spener. In piety, piety was needed in opposition to the one-sided scholasticism which had grown up in the Church. So far it revived the true spirit of the Church. It is evident from the passages in the Church, it brought in its better forms a more earnest spirit in theology. Its object was to reestablish the, the literature, the life, the renewal of the best type of piety, was Aug. Hermann Francke (q.v.). Its most distinguished opponents were Johann Benedict Carpoz (q.v.) and Valentine Ernest Loscher (q.v.). The inflexible narrowness of the Church life was changed by the action of a small band of reformers, most of them by the mystical fellowships which attached themselves to J. Boehme, Gichtel, and Dippel, and by the Church of the Brethren. By these movements, and by Bengal and the theology of Oetinger, the dominion of the mediavalism of the seventeenth century was broken.

Under the influence of rationalism, at the end of the eighteenth century, the points of distinction between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches, both in Church history and in theology, lost more of their significance. Efforts at union, which were vigorous without being in any high sense earnest, were made, especially in Westphalia and on the Rhine. These efforts resulted in very little until after the Wars of Liberation. From that great series of struggles went forth an intense religious feeling through all Germany. It was felt alike in both the Protestant churches. It stood in strong opposition to the shallow spirit of ranionalism, but was, in the nature of the case, more interested at the beginning in the great common principles of the religious life of the whole Protestant movement than with particular, and still more than with specific distinctive doctrines. Prussia now took steps for what is called an "union" of all the Protestants. By the Lutheran conservatives this new movement was looked upon with distrust. The union, they held, depended for its moral power upon a depreciation in part of the confession.
It had been made possible by rationalism; but its perplexity was that, if it remained true to what was in theology, the changes in the liturgy, the hymn-books, and in the church usages of various kinds, were regarded with suspicion as an attempt to undermine Unio of the fathers. Under the leadership of Scheibl, in Breslau, Huchse, the distinguished jurist, and Steffens, the natural philosopher, separated itself from connection with the State Church and formed an independent communion. See Ola Lotism. The religious life of the Church continued to suffer from the evils which in the course of her history had been fixed upon German Lutheran Protoc-It was prominent among them were the hampering of the congregational life—a life which was demanded by the principles of Lutheranism—and the repression of the spirit of criticism which characterized the nineteenth century. The newly awakened religious life withdrew itself, in consequence, very largely into the smaller religious circles, and derived from them more or less of a Pietistic hue. See Pietism. These circles themselves drew more and more toward the an-iscent orthodoxy. To this they were impelled by the unionistic efforts, and the havoc created by indelibility and rationalism. The new theological tendencies were met by the system set forth in the Confessions. The feeling grew that without a restoration of the old relations of the bishop and the ministers to the Church, the Church, as it were, would break up, and in the middle of the century in which the sharpness of the antithesis is lost.
This method of union may be applicable to a certain set of doctrines, but it goes to pieces of necessity on the dis-sective doctrines which can allow of no modification without loss of their essential character. The principle on which the theology of the consensus rests is that that alone is essential in Protestantism in which the two confessions agree. Schleiermacher was the first to maintain this, but his object was by it to neutralize and render indifferent both systems, in order to set thus a limit to, and to clear the ground of view in connonc with modern culture. With all the care which Schleiermacher takes to give himself the appearance of complete harmony with the ancient system, it is easy to see that the new form of consciousness breaks through the old, and that old and new are simply to introduce the new, and to smooth the way for it.
In the case of these doctrinaries of the union, however, the dogmatics of the consensus is a mere illusion, which has no ground except in their lack of mental freedom.
They find the particularism of the confessional systems too narrow for them; they are urged by their weight within them to sustain a free relation to those systems; and there is no ignoring the fact that they take a position which has gone beyond them. But they are not willing to confess this to themselves; instead of looking LUTHERAN 577  LUTHERAN forward where their proper goal lies, they turn back-wards. They are constantly recurring to the point on which the old system is based. They desire to establish by the Church confessions what they hold to be the real substance of the evangelical faith. Yet they must themselves confess that they cannot be satisfied that they are throughout in harmony with either the Lutheran or the Reformed doctrine, and that on this ground they are wishing for what cannot be found in neither. The more the two systems are compared, the more do they show that the one excludes the other. This is the contradiction out of which there is no escape, the code in which there is a perpetual revolution of brotherly confusion. The old system is lost, and yet there is lack of force and courage to rise to a new one. Men know in their hearts that they are no longer at one with the Church, and yet they are afraid to break with it outwardly. They hold fast to the union, and yet cannot let go of the confessional. Is it a matter of wonder that all the dogmatic products of this school of theologians have an air of feebleness, superficiality, and lifelessness? From the dogmatic position it is impossible to deny that the opponents of the theology of the union are right; from it it is impossible to condemn the whole system, with all the offensiveness of its particularism, has at least the advantages of character, decision, and logical consistency” (Kirchengeschichte des Neuen Jahrh. (Tübingen. 1862). p. 409-411).

Mecklenburg isolated itself by its exclusive state-churchism. Even in the overzealous Catechisms, with which the earliest agitations in North Germany had been connected, did not secure the unmixed approval of the portion of the Church with whose views it was in sympathy. New Lutheranism has been accused of making the same tendency toward Romanizing, especially in the doctrine of the ministry, of the sacraments, and of the Church. To the ministerial office it is charged with imputing a hierarchical priestly character. It is charged with holding that ordination confers a divine authority for the ministration of the Word and sacraments, and for the discipline and government of the Church. With this tendency has been connected a desire to restore private confession, which its opponents say is almost equivalent to auricular confession. With it has arisen a strong opposition to the presbytery-al constitution. It is said to maintain that the sacraments derive their efficacy from the church, not from the means of grace.” In connection with this view, an exalted importance is attached to the sacraments. The Lord’s Supper is made the proper centre of the public service. The whole artistic sense has been developed in the Lenten season. Its meaning is not found in the proper performance of the ritual, and, indeed, of the whole liturgical service of the Church. The intoning and the whole musical element in worship has been assigned its old place of esteem. This school has been charged with maintaining that, in order to preserve the pure doctrine of the Church, it is necessary that of Rome is to be held. Subjection to the authority of the Church is to be substituted for individual faith. The most important literary organ of this tendency has been Hengstenberg’s Evangelische Kirchen-Rellese, established in 1827, which maintains within the Prussian union, with immense force and success, the po-ition of distinctive Lutheranism. This tendency separated itself from the orthodoxy which bore the tinge of pitiable, and from the mediating theology, especially in the work of inner missions (z. v.), with which it reundisputed. It is on the ground that it is not churchly. In the Prussian Church it opposed itself to the regulations of the congregations, and to the constitution of the State Church. In the department of missions to the heathen (the term foreign missions has ceased to have a meaning), it was necessary for the one set of Christians to establish missions for the conversion of another set), the revised New Lutheranism has pursued an independent course. Against this Dorper expressed himself, in a memorial of the Prussian High Constable, in 1866, which denounced new state churvent the newly-acquired state churches (such as Hanover, etc.) from being placed under the care of the minister of cultus. The Lutherans outside of Prussia, the Mackenburgers, Bavarians, and others, at the conference at Hanover in 1866, with the Hanoverians, and others in Church fellowship with them, made use of the seventh article of the Augsburg Confession (of the Church and its true unity) to keep up the agitation against all union with the rest of the State Church of Prussia. See Neue Evangel. Kirchenzeitung (1866); Boelsch, in Domus Zeitschrift für das Kirchenleben (1869); Matthaei, Allgemeine Kirchliche Chronik (1871).

V. Ritual and Worship (cultus) of the Lutheran Church.—The foundation for these was laid by Luther in his Formula Missae (1523) and his German Mass (1546). In these he proceeded upon the principle, which he expressed and defended, that the Church service was not to be abrogated as a whole; that the vital parts of it had a noble origin; that the great thing was to purge off its excesses and defilements, and to restore to its true place in it the Word of God, which had been more and more neglected. In conformity with these fundamental principles, the ritual was purified, the neglected elements replaced, and the more necessary parts developed still further. It was brought back to the standard of the Bible, and of early pure Catholic antiquity.

The Lord’s Supper, restored to its true position, became the grand point of culmination in all the chief services. The office of the Word was renewed. Preaching became a great indispensable element of the chief public services. The congregation took a direct part in the service in response and singing. The services were held either in the vernacular or the popular language. A portion of the familiar old Latin part of the services was in many cases continued, mainly, however, in order to retain the noble Church-music, until time had been given to fit it to a vernacular service complete in all its parts. Luther insisted simply on an organization of worship which should preserve its rich treasures and resources. Services for the morning and evening, and for the days of the week, were retained or arranged. More than all, congregational singing was developed. In conformity with these views, there arose the service of the Lutheran type which we find in the agenda (q. v.) of the 16th and 17th centuries in the eastern parts of Prussia, in the whole of Germany the Wittenberg order was followed, and is maintained to this day. The service is of moderate length, and is rich liturgically.

The forms established in the era of the Reformation were more or less broken through, or altered in a very wretched manner, in consequence of the theological revolution which marked the 18th century. With the religious life, whose reviving power was felt towards the close of the first quarter of the 19th century, came a strong desire for relief from these mischievous changes. To this desire, and of its greatest motives, the Prussian agenda owes its origin; yet, alike in the mode of its introduction and in elements which pervaded it throughout, it involved a breach with the original Lutheran type, to which it claimed in large measures to conform. As this fact became more and more manifest, the effort was made to bring the forms of the agenda into harmony with the better elements which still survived in the congregations; yet, after all that could be done in this way, the result was imperfect and unsatisfactory. In consequence of this, in the most recent period, a still closer approximation has been made in Prussia to the original Lutheran ritual. One set of influential thinkers, as Höfling and Kliefoth, contended for an unconditional retribution of the worship of the Reformation time. Others held that various changes were necessary to adjust the new forms for a new and more fully developed Church worship with the well-grounded views of the present and the actual needs of the congregations.

The "agendas" became a source of special trouble in the controversy between the Unionists and the "Old Lutherans." The contest on the agenda raged particularly severe in Silesia. Among the most active participants in this struggle were the pastors Scheibe, Berger, Wehrhahn, and Kellner, at Hönigern. A pacific royal order of Feb. 28, 1834, in regard to the continued forms of union, accorded the Hönigern to leave the conflict aslyed by the rescry of the Consistory of Breslau, May 16, 1834, which demanded that the clergy who had not acceded to the Union should use the revised agenda of 1829, and forbade any public attacks upon the Union as a course of instruction of instruction. The consequence of these was that the offending clergymen were suspended (1834). In Hönigern the military were called in to force open the Church for the introduction of the State-Union service (Dec. 24, 1834). Similar disturbances arose in Halle in connection with Guericke, professor in the university, who was removed by the government in 1836. But this opposition element was not to be seduced by flattery nor terrified by force. In a synod held at Breslau in 1835 they had resolved to exhaust all legal measures to secure for themselves purity, independence, and integrity in doctrine, worship, and constitution. The Missionary Synod travelled from place to place, administering baptism and the Lord's Supper. In Berlin and Erfurt new congregations were formed. In the Mark and in Silesia a special apostolic Church constitution was adopted. Among the decided Lutherans, however, there was a minority. The synod demanded a complete separation from the State Church. The relatively more moderate party, with which Guericke stood, desired to carry out their Lutheran convictions within the State Church as far as the legal concessions allowed them to do so. These troubles matured a purpose in thousands of the opposed confessions of the faith to leave their native land for conscience sake. In spite of various concessions on the part of the government, a great emigration to Australia took place under the leadership of Kavel. To these "pilgrim fathers" of our day were added many from Saxony, led by Stephan, and from Wittenberg and the Wupperthal. From 1888, and especially after the advent of Frederick William IV to the throne of Prussia (1840), the tone of the government towards the Lutherans became milder.

VI. "Separate Lutherans."—A royal general concession was granted to the bulk of the population in Saxony, on condition that the Lutherans who held themselves aloof from the State "Evang" Church. They were granted the right to form congregations of their own, and to have them united under a common direction, which was not to be subject to any control or supervision of the State Church; having obtained the consent of the state to its formation, could call pastors, whose vocation was to be confirmed by the Direction, and who were to be ordained by ordained ministers. The baptisms, confirmations, proclamation of the banns, and marriages of these clergy were acknowledged in law, and their church registers were to be received in evidence. Their obligation was regarded as the taxes and burdens of the parochial connection to be determined by the common law. Under these provisions the Lutherans constituted a High Consistory in 1841 under the presidency of Professor Huchke. This official board is the supreme ecclesiastical authority for the Lutherans in Prussia. It consists of four regular members; it is controlled by the Synod, and has charge of the purity of the Church in doctrine and life, of the reception of new congregations, the regulation of fiscial relations, and the appointments of clergy; to it is committed the decision in complaints made by the officials of the churches and of the higher schools. It has oversight of the ritual, of the decisions in ecclesiastical cases, and of censures against the clergy, and similar matters. The clergy are supported by a fixed salary, and by perquisites. The processes of Church discipline areimonition, temporary exclusion from the communion, the making of apologies in various degrees, and final excommunication. The Church service is conducted according to the agenda which have been in use; the preaching or free texts requires the permission of the Board of the High Consistory; the Lord's Supper is an essential part of the chief service. The Lutherans are not obliged to send their children to the United schools. Thus the Lutheran Church in Prussia, an Church, has an independent foundation. In 1847 the High Consistory had in its care twenty-one congregations recognized by the state, and numbering about nineteen thousand souls. Of these the largest proportion was in Silesia—ten congregations, numbering about six thousand, and about the same proportion was in Westphalia and in the Rhine Provinces. In addition to these Separate Lutherans there was an immense number of Lutherans who, in consequence of concessions guaranteed by the government, remained in the State Church. Outside of Prussia, a Lutheran movement was felt in Nassau in 1846, in which Brunn of Steeten, near Runkel, was leader. The government and the deputies declined to authorize the formation of a separate Lutheran commission. The connection between the Lutherans was strengthened by the press and the means of instruction. The "Zeitschrift für Luthersche Theologie," edited by Eitelbach and Guericke; the "Zeitschrift für Protestantismus und Kirche," edited by Harless and others; and various popular periodicals, such as the "Pilger aus Sachsen," the "Sonntagsschriften," and others. Conventions were held at Berlin and Gittern in 1835, the Strasbourg Synod in 1842, and a Sanhedrin in Leipsie held its first session in 1848. With the great political movement of 1848 the interests of the Positive Lutherans entered on a new era. Of the urgent demands made at that time for the separation of Church and State, they took advantage especially in their struggle against the Alliance established by the State Church. Meanwhile the difference of conviction between the Lutherans within the Union and those separated from it was not completely removed. The Separate Lutherans urged the impossibility of a Lutheran clergyman's remaining with good conscience in the Union. The Lutherans who did not withdraw from the government Church nevertheless began to come into closer association under the leadership of Göschel, Stahl, Heubner, and Schmiedier. Their views and claims were supported by Hengstenberg's Kirchenrat und Kirchenfreunde; and by the religious periodicals of Saxia, and Posen. They agreed, at a meeting in Wittenberg, in September, 1849, on the following principles: "We stand upon the Confession of the Evangelical Lutheran Church; our congregations have never justly accepted the political incapacity for congregations; we have never sought recognition and adherence to the Lutheran Confession in worship, the order of the congregation, and Church government; first of all is to be insisted on the freeing of the altar service from everything that is dubious, and the giving of the stamp of the Confession to the entire service; furthermore, there should be in the government of the Church a management which would give security to confessional independence; finally, there should be a guarantee of Lutheran principles in the constitution of the congregations." These aims they did not, however, propose to secure by separation, but by contending within the State Church for the rights of the Lutheran Church in the districts belonging to it. This decision rendered more bitter the feeling of alienation between the Lutherans who remained in the State Church and those who separated from it. In addition to these internal controversies, there arose also differences with the civil government of the Church, especially on the part of Lutherans within the State Church. These differences were caused partly by the establishment of the High Consistory in 1830, and partly by the proposed Erklärung before the other churches, which was opposed on the ground that the Confession was not sufficiently secured. The High Consistory attempted to meet the opposition, and to harmonize fed-LUTHERANS IN AMERICA 579 LUTHERANS IN AMERICA

ings by various concessions; but, with a growing conscious-ness of need and of right, the Lutherans constantly rose in their demands. They asked for the abolition of the mixed boards, the institution of exclusively Lutheran faculties, the return of the Church property, and for other changes looking in the same general direction. The result finally was the issue of a cabinet order of July 12, 1833, which showed that the king, Frederick William IV, was determined to make no further concessions. The stricter Lutherans had shown that they were prepared to use unceasing energy in various movements of the time. Thus had they declined to co-operate in the plan of the Innen Missions (1849), and opposed the confederation of churches proposed at the Church Diet at Wittenberg in 1849. In other lands the struggles of the Lutheran Church for truth and rights continued. The University of Erlangen was the centre of the struggle in Bavaria, and Harlesia, the president of the High Consistory, one of its great supporter. But as the General Synod at Anspach, in consequence of opposition on the part of the congregations, the stricter Lutheran views could not be carried out in regard to creed, Church government, changes in the liturgy, confession, and Church discipline. Here also arose the stricter party, with the pastors Löhe and Wachern, which took ground against fellowship at the Lord's Supper with the reformed Lutherans. Immediately after their acrimonious debate in 1836, the party was resisted by the High Consistory. In Nassau, the two Hess, Hanover, and the Saxon duchies, the stricter Lutheranism had adherents. As a rule, the mission festivals were their centres of union. In Baden, under pastor Eichhorn as leader, the conflict with the government resulted in a legal separation from the State Church in 1856. In Saxony, especially about Schönburg, the stricter Lutheran clergy were numerous. The emigration of Stephan injured the cause very much in the general estimation. During these public movements, the most longed after and consistently insisted on was the union of Lutherans in the United States. The doctrine of theDownloader errors were deleted.

LUTHERANS IN AMERICA. I. Early History.-The celebrated German divine, Dr. Henry Melchior Mühlenberg (q. v.), is generally and justly recognised as the founder of the Lutheran Church in America. He arrived in this country in 1742. Long previous to his coming, however, the Lutherans had gained a footing here. Adherents of the Church of the great German reformer first came to these shores of the West from Holland in 1621. In consequence of the severe measures adopted by the Synod of Dort (1618-19), the stay of non-conformists was uncomfortable in the mother country, and with the first Dutch migration the province of New Amsterdam (now New York) came several Lutheran immigrants, seeking here a home, and a place to worship God agreeably to the dictates of their conscience. They had come, however, without a shepherd, and for years were dependent upon lay supervision and instruction. The first Lutheran communicants who brought thither one to minister unto them came from Sweden in 1688, and settled on the banks of Delaware Bay, where now stands the thriving city of Wilmington. For a number of years the Swedish Lutherans only were favored with ministry, and for years were dependent upon lay supervision and instruction. epoch in which it assumed organic form. No man could have been more eminently fitted than was H. M. Muhlenberg for the mission to be accomplished. "He possessed faith, the experience of perseverance." He was, moreover, "deeply interested in the work to which he had devoted himself, as is apparent from the manner in which he discharged his duties, and the condition in which he left the Church at the time of his decease." When he came there was an absence of all organization. It is true the Swedish brethren gave assistance to their German brethren freely and cheerfully, but this was by no means sufficient to advance the interests of Lutheranism. Muhlenberg saw this clearly, and he at once applied himself to the task of effecting the organization of the German Lutherans at least. The greatest obstacle he found in the want of preachers and of houses of worship; but he was not in the least daunted by this jejuneness of his beloved Church. His influence at home was that of a piouis and devoted servant of the Lord, and he soon drew a number of his former associates and friends to this side of the Atlantic, so that by 1748, only six years after his landing on these shores, he was enabled to call around him the strongest and ablest representatives of the Lutheran ministry in America, to counsel together and form a synod. They met in 1748 and recommended the election of one of their own number as provost (q.v.), to preside over them and act as their representative before the country. Muhlenberg, however, desired stricter conformity to the rules and regulations of the mother Church, and in 1750 the Swedish Lutheran Church afterwards showed, his course proved to be the only safe way towards a perpetuation of the Lutheran Church in America.

The men who joined Muhlenberg in the convention at Philadelphia, Aug. 14, 1748, for the purpose of organizing the first Lutheran synod in America, were Brunnholz, Handschuh, and Hartwig, of the German, and Sandin and Næssen, of the Swedish Lutheran Church. It was by this body that the first German Lutheran was regularly set apart in this country to the work of the ministry. His name was John Nicholas Kurtz. He was not, however, the first Lutheran minister ordained here. As early as 1701, Falkner, a student of divinity, was ordained by the Swedish ministers Rudman, Björk, and Auren, to labor in the Swedish Lutheran Church; quite an eventful act, also, because it set aside forever the supposition that the Swedish Lutherans received the doctrine and the ministers in the synod which it taught in the Anglican Church. After 1748 the synod met regularly each year, and these meetings "were attended with the most beneficial results. They not only advanced the prosperity of the Church, but the hands of the ministers were strengthened, and their hearts encouraged. They promoted kind feeling, and formed a bond of union among the churches." In 1765 a private theological seminary was started, under the care of Dr. Helmuth and Schmidt, and in 1767 the Legislature of Pennsylvania established Franklin College, "for the special benefit of the Germans of the commonwealth, as an acknowledgment of services by them rendered to the state, and in consideration of their industry, economy, and public virtues." There were, in the year of Muhlenberg's arrival in this country, in Pennsylvania alone, 110,000 Germans, and of these about two thirds were of the Lutheran Church. One of the sons of Dr. H. M. Muhlenberg—Henry Ernest—at this time pastor of the Lutheran Church in Lancaster, Pa., was honored with the distinction of first president of this now widely celebrated institution of learning. In 1781 the Lutheran Church in this country received the recognition of the state to education by the Pennsylvania Legislature in the gift of 5000 acres of land "to the free-schools of the Lutheran Church in Philadelphia," the charter of the Dr. Henry Mechilor Muhlenberg's labor. During the Revolutionary days the Lutherans acted the part of patriots and Christians; many of their number came forward in defence of the country of their adoption. Dr. Muhlenberg, among others, had two sons in the army; one of them exchanged the gown for the colonel's uniform. In consequence of this identification of the Church with the Revolution, and the struggle of the English to dislike them greatly, and many were the sufferings and deprivations to which they were subjected; several of their churches were burned or desecrated, and all manner of oppression was visited upon them. The close of the War of Independence, however, left them, if anything, gainers in the struggle. Aside from the liberal donations which they received in Pennsylvania, as we have seen above, they received large accessions from the very ranks of their enemies. Many of the German soldiers who, by the ignominious treaty of 1783 with the English, were sent to this country to exterminate the love of freedom, at the close of hostilities concluded to remain this side the Atlantic, and became valuable members of the Lutheran Church in America. Out of 5728 soldiers that had come here from Brunswick, 1800, with seven officers and their chaplains, at one time entered the fold of American Lutheranism. Of the Hessians, also, some 7000 remained to swell the number of adherents to the Church of the great German reformer.

Not so auspicious was the outlook at the close of the eighteenth century. On October 7, 1787, the patriarch and founder of the Lutheran Church in America departed this life, and the Church was bereft of its great strongbould. There had been slowly growing, ever since the establishment of American independence, a decided and strengthening tendency among the German Lutherans into the exercises of public worship. The older and more conservative portion of the Church contended for the use of the language which the great reformer had so much embellished and invigorated, and of which he was really the second father. Some of the Germans eran believed that their language might actually be made the language of the country, and thus the proposition of the younger and Americanized portion for the use of the English proved an occasion of discord and alienation, "resulted in serious injury to the Church, and almost caused its total ruin. . . . Thousands abandoned their parental communion, and sought a home among other denominations, because their children did not understand the German, while many who remained, because of their limited acquaintance with the language, lost all interest in the services, and became careless in observance of their sevices; the Church of the United States, when Dr. Muhlenberg had counselled due consideration of the wants of this young and growing element, and frequenty himself preached in English; but, his tongue once silent, the conservative element impolitically gloried in its wearisome ignorance..."

Ch. [5th ed. Philad. 1852, 12mo], p. 27-29. The first Lutheran Church in which the English was exclusively used was not built until 1809, and it remained for many years the only one to represent the English-speaking element in the Lutheran Church. Efforts for more complete and effective organization may be traced in New York State in 1785 by the establishment of the New York Synod; hitherto the Pennsylvania Synod was the only minsterium (q.v.) in existence. In 1808 a synod was organized in North Carolina; in 1819, in Ohio; in 1828, both in Maryland and Virginia. In 1816 the educational advantages of the Church also received new strength by the founding of a theological seminary at Hartwig, N. Y.—the first public training-school of the American Lutherans for young men prospecting the holy office of the ministry. An asylum for orphans the Lutheran Church has been organized there to service early training and education in the midst of the thriving colonies at Ebenezer, in Georgia. It was widely known as the "Salzburger Waisenhaus," and is said to have received no little encouragement from Whitefield.

II. The Development of the General Synod of American Lutherans.—The need of a central bond of union for the different synods extending over a territory so vast as... that of the United States gave rise in 1820 to the formation of a "general synod"—a starting-place and a central radiating point of improvement in the Church.

There were at this time 170 ministers connected with the Lutherans, and 35,000 communicants in the Lutheran connection. Of these, 155 preachers and 35,000 communicants, at the meeting of the synod held at New York, Oct. 22, 1820, formed the General Synod. The constantly increasing influx of Ixfopean Lutherans frequently gave rise to the manifestation of the most diverse opinions on ecclesiastical matters, and, in consequence, to many controversies. The general council, and gradually and more decisively, until a schism became inevitable. Even previous to the outbreak of our civil war there had been frequent secessions of several of the synods from the general body, but the strife of 1861–65 gave a more decided influence in favor of the establishment of rival bodies by the side of the "General Synod." The first to establish themselves independently were the Southern Lutherans, who instituted a "Southern General Synod," later known as the "General Synod of North America," and now (1872) embracing 5 synods, 92 ministers, 175 churches, and 18,250 members. The division was, however, preparing, on doctrinal grounds, in the Northern synods. The constitution of the General Synod did not make membership dependent upon an adherence to the letter of the "Augsburg Confession" of 1530, the great standard of faith in the Lutheran Church, but by inserting in the Augsburg Confession as the most important historical document as regards the doctrines of the Church, the constitution aimed to secure to all Lutherans the liberty of rejecting some utterances of that confession which had early been discarded by a considerable number of the followers of Luther as unscriptural and semi-papal. This feature was obnoxious to the strict Lutheran party, which regarded Lutheranism to remain for all time to come as defined by the Augsburg Confession of 1530, and which desired to bring back the whole Lutheran Church of the United States to this point.

III. Organization of the "General Council."—The party differences, after creating frequent disturbances at the meetings of the General Synod, led to an open rupture in 1864, when the Franciscan Synod, a New York State body, which was regarded by the Confessional Lutherans as positively unchurchly and heretical, was admitted to the General Synod. In consequence of this act, the oldest synod, that of Pennsylvania, withdrew from the Convention. At the next meeting of the General Synod of 1865, the "General Council," a body of five—synods, 8; ministers, 910; churches, 1559; communicants, 259,801. The Southern General Synod embraced—synods, 9; ministers, 201; churches, 885; communicants, 37,528. The grand total is—synods, 58; ministers, 4692: churches, 7948; communicants, 1,099,868. The statistics are:—English, 48; German, 54; Norwegian, 16; Swedish, 26.

Lütkenmann, Joachim, a German theologian, was born at Dammn, in Fomerania, Dec. 15, 1608; studied at Tostett, and afterwards at the University of Gris- wald and Strasburg; then travelled through France and Italy; and was magister legenti of the philosophical fac- ulty of Rostock in 1638, and appointed professor of meta- physics in 1648. He published at this time several philosophical works, such as his Laucenita corporis physici (Rostock, 1647). He also preached at the same time, and soon acquired great reputation by his elo- quence and Christian earnestness. He became involved, however, in a quarrel with the strict orthodox party of Neickenburg, upheld by the duke, on the question of the humanity of Christ in his death. Lütkenmann de- fended his views in his Dissertatio physico-theologica de erro homine, maintaining that the human nature of Christ ended in his death. He was expelled for these views, but immediately called to Brunswick as general superin- tendent and court preacher. Here he lived in 1651 a School Discipline, and in 1652 a Church Discipline, which were adopted in Brunswick. He died in 1655. His most important works were devotional, and in this line he may be ranked next to Arndt and Müller. The princi- pal are: Vorschau d. göttlichen Güte (Wolfenb. 1648); — Vom trieblichen Paradies — Hafte auf sehn sollen. See P. Rehmeyer, Schicksal, Striften u. Gaben Lütken- manns (Brunswick); Tholuck, Akad. Leben, part ii, p. 109; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. viii, 566; Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, vol. ii, § 217.

Lutz, Johann Ludwig Samuel, a distinc- guished German theologian, historian, and biographer, was born at Darmstadt in 1750; studied in his native city, then at the universities of Tubingen and Göttingen; was in 1812 appointed professor of the gymnas- ium, and rector of the literary school of Bern; in 1824 became pastor of Wynau, and afterwards of Bern; and was in 1844 appointed professor of theology. He died Sep. 21, 1844. Among his works the most note- worthy is Grach, der Reformations in Basel (Basle, 1814, 8vo). His theological publications were published by Rüt- schi and A. Lutz, under the title Bibliotheca Dogmatik et Hermetica (1847 and 1849). See Hummelschon, Lutz, Johann Ludwig; Characterbild, 1844; Neuer Nomenclator Deutscher, vol. xxii: Pierer, Universals-Lexikon, x, 631; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gen. xxxii, 914. (J. N. P.)

Lutz (or Lucius), Samuel, one of the most import- ant representatives of early Pietism in Switzerland, was born in 1674. His father, the pious and learned pastor of Biglen, was his first teacher. Lutz at first turned his attention especially to mathematics, the classics, and Hebrew, then to Church discipline, and finally left all these to devote himself exclusively to the study of Scripture, and the works of the fathers and reformers, especially Luther's. German Pietism was then beginning to strike root in Switzerland, in spite of all the ef- forts of the orthodox party, headed by the theologians of Berne. To oppose it, a committee was appointed to take charge of all things pertaining to religion, and in 1699, by its influence, several prominent and influential preachers, tainted with pietism, were exiled or deprived of their livings, and a number of adherents of the pietist parti- fied or otherwise punished, and several stringent laws passed to secure the "uniformity of faith, doctrine, and worship." Finally both the citizens and clergy were obliged to take the so-called oath of association—a sort of Test Act. Lutz's first and rather insignificant appoint- ment as pastor was at Yverdon in 1705. Here he labored faithfully for twenty-three years, winning the respect and affection not only of the German, among whom he labored, but also of the French inhabitants. As he was accused of pietism, all attempts to secure more impor- tant appointments, even of the city, in which increasing his sphere of usefulness, were defeated, in spite of his reputation for learning and eloquence, until about 1726, when he was appointed pastor of Amdingfingen. In 1738 he moved to Diesbach, where he died, May 28, 1750. His col- lected works were published under the title Wirkungen, der Strauss u. schönen u. gesunden Himmelslebense (Basle, 1738 and 1756, 2 vols.). See Leu, Schweis. Lexikon, xii; Haller, Böd. d. Schweizerges. ii, 390; Hurn's Hagen- bach, Ch. Hist. of the 18th and 19th Centuries, i, 191 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. viii, 621.

Lux Mundi (the light of the mind), another name for baptism, so called on account of the instruction in the Christian religion which was given to the candidates for baptism before they were admitted to the ac- corded ordinance.—Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Luxury, a disposition of mind addicted to pleasure, riot, and superfluities. Luxury implies giving a one's self up to pleasure; voluptuousness, an indulgence in the same to excess. Luxury may be further considered as consisting in: 1. Vain and useless expenses; 2. In a parade beyond what people can afford; 3. In affecting to be above our own rank; 4. In living in a splendor that does not agree with the public good. In order to avoid it, it is necessary to consider that it is considered to be some, sinful, and ruinous. See Robinson's Claude, i, 385; Ferguson, On Society, part vi, sec. 2; Buck, Theological Dictionary, s. v.

Lux (Heb. id. 112, a nut-bearing tree, either the al- mond or hazel, as in Gen. xxx. 37 [but according to Fürst, after Millar, medin, as of a valley]; Sept. Ace- re, but in Gen. xxvii. 12, 19 unites with the preceding word θετακλησις, the name of two places.

1. The ancient name of the Canaanish city on or near the site of Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 19; xxx. 6; xlviii, 8), on the border of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 13); taken and destroyed, with all its inhabitants (except one family that had acted as spies), by the descendants of Joseph (Judg. i. 22). The spot to which the name of Bethel was given appears, however, to have been at a little distance in the environs of Luz, and they are ac- cordingly distinguished in Josh. xvi. 2, although the Heb. text of Ps. lxxii. 3 shows that they were continually sup- plied by one Luz; or rather, perhaps, Luz was the name of a locality near which Bethel was afterwards built. The form of the name in the Sept., Eusebius, and the Vulg. seems to have been derived from Joel. xiii. 16, where the words כבש ומכ ה are supposed to correspond to ordinary usage, the modern word כבש, "the shoulder of Luz," or the skin, which is the particle of motion in Hebrew, not being re- quired here, as it is in the former part of the same verse. Other names are found both with and without a similar termination, as Jobab, Jobbabah, Timmuth, Timmutha- thah; Riblah, Riblatbah. Laish and Laishah are proba- bly distinct places. Yehudah is confident that he has recovered the site of Luz in the modern ruins called Khurbet el-Losch, one hour and a half west of Bethel (Notes to the 22 ed. of his Map, p. 16). See Berthelot.

2. A small place in the district of the Hittites, found by an inhabitant of the former Luz, who was spared on the destruction of this place by the tribe of Benja- min (Judg. i. 26); and this seems to dispose of the identi- fication with the ruins still found on Mt. Gerizim (Sta- ley, p. 251 sq.), bearing the name of Luzo (Seetzen, Reis. i, 174; Wilson, ii, 68), about ten minutes beyond the trench near the village of the same name (Mountain of Gerizim, p. 881). Schwarzk thinks the site may be identified with that of wady Luzun, in the interior of the desert of et- Tih, north-west of Jebel el-Arati, on the strength of the Talmudic statement that this place lay without the bounds of Palestine (Pueis, p. 218). This is doubted by the wady Luzun described by Dr. Robinson as a broad plain swept over by torrents from the mountains on the right, destitute of any fountain or water, and containing only a few remains of rude walls and foundations, which he regards as the traces of the Roman station Lyua along this route (Researches, i, 276, 277). Rosenmüller (Al-terk, ii, 189) refers the name to Laza, a city, according to Onomast. (Onomast., v. v.) or Eunomus from Socheem; but this could not have been Hittite territory. Studer (Buch d. Richter, p. 45) adopts a suggestion of D. Kimchi, that it was a city of the Phcenicians (Kitim, so Euseb. Hr. epist., Onomast., s. v. 2) is meant. Probably it was some place near Hermon or in Southern Palestine, where the Hittites settled. See Hit-3.

Luzzatto, Mosse Chayim, ben Jacob, the great modern Jewish mystic of Italy, was born at Padua in 1708, and enjoyed the highest educational advantages the country of his birth could afford. When a youth of only twenty, his extensive studies in Hebrew literature, especially the cabalistical writings, secured for him a universal reputation. Had he known how to avoid mysticism, he might have proved one of the greatest ornaments of Judaism, but the Cabala (q. v.) led him astray. Of his first work, a second Zohar (q. v.), but actually came to believe himself the predicted Messiah of his people. He was excommunicated, and obliged to quit Italy. For a time he flourished in Amsterdam, and about 1744 he removed to the Holy Land. He died shortly after, at Safed, in May, 1747, and was buried at Tiberias. Of the remainder of his writings, only a few have been published, comprising treatises in theology, dogmatic and cabalistical, philosophy, morals, and rhetoric, and a body of poetry, devotional, lyrical, and dramatic. His most important writings besides Eshet ha-Ever, are his "Eshet ir, an Eshet ha-Ever," and his "Eshet ha-Ever," 1835, 388; and his biography in Kerem Chemed (1838), iii, 113 sq. (J. H. W.)

Luzzatto, Samuel David, one of the most noted Jewish writers of our day, the Jehovah ha-Leri (q. v.) of the 19th century, was born at Trieste (Italy) in 1800, the son of one of the most eminent Rabbis in that city. He received a thorough academic training, and early displayed great ability as a writer. Greatly interested in the study of the history and literature of his people, he became one of the most prominent writers in this field. Says Sasso (vi, 609): "Luzzatto, indeed, learned, wrote, Rappaport were the fathers of Jewish history, Luzzatto must be acknowledged as her mother." He brought to light the most beautiful pages of Jewish history of the Franco-Spanish epoch—the tragic fate of the Jews in the persecutions of the Middle Ages and the reformatory psalms—which had been given up as lost; and thereby prepared the way for the labors of Kuyserling, Sacha, Zana, and others. Luzzatto also labored creditably in the department of O.-T. exegesis, and when the collegio rabbinico was opened at Padua in 1829, he became one of its professors, continuing in this service until his death in 1865. He wrote Hebrew, Italian, French, and German. His diction is graceful and exceedingly pleasant. His essays and treatises in this field appeared first in the "Bikkure Itinim," and afterwards (1841, etc.) in the "Kerem Chemed," published in Vienna and then in Prague by a man of great learning in Jewish literature, Samuel L. Goldenberg, of Tarnopol. One of his best books is his Dialogues, etc., on the Cabala, the Zohar, the antiquity of the voxel-points and accents of the Bible (1862), which shows the folly of the Cabala, the origin of the Zohar in the 18th century, and the vowel-points in the 5th, and the accents probably in the 6th. Luzzatto also published on Hebrew grammar, Prolegomena ad una gram. Heb.; and later a complete Hebrew grammar, Okeb guer ( "ו" גות הער); a work on the Arabic version of Onkelos (Vienna, 1880); an Italian version of Job (Livorno, 1844); French Notes on Isaiah (in Rosenmüller's version, Leips., 1884); Heb. Notes on the Pentateuch (Vienna, 1850); and finally Isaiah, an Italian translation with an extensive Hebrew commentary (Vienna, 1850). See Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, xi, 499 sqq.; Jose, Geschichtliche d. Judenthums, iii, 345 sqq.; Magold, 1864-1865; The Israelite (Cincinnati, O.), Jan. 19, 1872. (J. H. W.)

Luzzatto, Simone (Heb. Simuel), a noted rabbi, who flourished in Venice about 1590, exerted considerable influence on the Italian Jews of the 17th century. He was an associate of Leo da Modena (q. v.), and aided the latter greatly by his superior abilities. He died in 1683. He wrote Vodi della Fede, in which he teaches that the prophecies of Daniel refer rather to the millennium age than to a future Messiah. This peculiar view has given rise to the belief that he accepted Jesus as the Messiah (see Wolf, Bibl. Jud., iii, 1128). His most valuable work, however, is his Discorso circa il stato degli Hebrei (Venice, 1688), in which he ably defends Judaism and the Jews. The excesses of the Cabalists he deplored, and stoutly opposed all relation with them. See Gritz, Geschichte der Juden, x, 162 sqq. (J. H. W.)

Lybon or Libo, a city mentioned in the Antonine Itinerary as being situated thirty-two Roman miles from Heliopolis (Baalbek), and the same distance from Damascus (Damasus). There has only compiled, there is no trace of the same itinerary by that of Conna. The modern village of Lebanon is doubtless the same (Bibl. Sacra, 1848, p. 699), although the distances have become corrupted (Porter, Damascus, ii, 322 sqq.). It is a poor village, in the middle of a basin, on a low tell among the streams on the eastern slope of Lebanon, with some remains of antiquity, and a considerable Arabian history (Robinson, Later Res. p. 582 sqq.).

Lybrand, Joseph, an eminent Methodist Episcopal minister, was born of Lutheran parentage in Philadelphia, Oct. 3, 1738; was converted at about ten; entered the Philadelphia Conference in April, 1811; was presiding elder on Philadelphia District in 1824-8; 1834-8 was on stations in Philadelphia; desisted from labor in 1843 at Harrisburg, and died April 24, 1845. Mr. Lybrand was a man of deep fidelity to God, and immovable fidelity to man. As an eloquent preacher he had few equals in the American pulpit. His style was eloquent and weighty, full of masterly argument and powerful exhortation, and many souls were added to the Church by his long and blessed ministry. So strong was his conviction in his duty to preach only that he refused God rest from the first to the last; he desired none of the drift of his denomination. Thus he declined in 1832 to assume the responsibilities of the publishing house taken from Dr. Emory, who had been elected bishop. - Minutes of Conferences, iii, 595.

Lyceos'ia (Λυκεισία, either from the mythologi- cal name Lykos, or from λυκός, a wolf), a province of Asia Minor, having Cappadocia on the east, Galatia on the north, Phrygia on the west, and Isauria and Cilicia on the south. These boundaries, however, are differently described by ancient authors (Ptolemy, vi, 16; 6; Pliny, v, 29; Strabo, xiv, 688; Livy, xxxviii, 89). It extends in length about twenty geographical miles from east to west, and about thirteen in breadth. It was an undulating plain, involved among mountains, which were noted for the concourse of wild asses. The soil was so strongly impregnated with salt that few of the Brooks supplied drinkable water, so that good water was sold for money; but when threw 17th century, and were reared with great advantage (Strabo, xii, 688; Pliny, Hist. Nat. viii, 69). Lyceos'ia first appears in history in connection with the expedition of Cyrus the younger (Xenophon, Anab. i, 2, 19; iii, 2, 28; Cypres, vi, 2, 20). The inhabitants were a hardy race, not subject to the climes, and led by Philip of Macedon to foray (Dionysius, Per. 857; Prisc. 806; Avien. 1020). With these descriptions modern authors agree (Leake's Journal, p. 67 sqq.; Renan, Geog. de l'Ouest Asia, ii, 93; Cramer, Am. Min. ii, 50; Mannert, Geog. V, ii, 190 sqq.). It was a Roman province when visited by Pau. (Acta xiv, 6), and its chief towns were Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, of which the first was the capital (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.). "The speech of Lyconia" (Acta xiv, 11) is supposed by some to have been the ancient Lycaonice, also spoken by the Cappadocians (Jablonsky, Disquis. de Lingua Lyconica, Berlin, 1714; also in his Opusc. iii, 3 sq.); but it is more usually conceived to have been a corrupt Greek, intermingled with many Syriac words (Guhlmg.; Dissert. de Lingua Lyconica, Vithe, 1726), since the people appear to have come from the account in the Acts, to have adopted the Grecian mythology as the basis of their religion (see Sommel, De Lingua Lycon. Lond. 1787). "It is deeply interesting to see these rude country people, when Paul and Barnabas worked miracles among them, rushing to the conclusion that the strangers were Mercury and Jupiter, whose visit to this very neighborhood forms the subject of one of Ovid's most charming stories (Ovid, Metam. viii, 626).

Nor can we fail to notice how admirably Paul's address on the occasion was adapted to a simple and imperfectly civilized race (Acts xiv, 15 sq.). See Homer, De Paulo in Lyconia (Lips. 1708). See Asia Minor; Paul.

Lyco'sa (Alexia, from λόκος, a wolf; according to some, from its earliest king, Lycaus; for a Shemitic origin of the name, see Simonis, Onomast. N. T. p. 101; Sichler, Homiliae, p. 566.), a province in the south-west of Asia Minor, opposite the island of Rhodes, having Pamphylia on the east, Phrygia on the north, Caria on the west, and the Mediterranean on the south. The last eminences of the range of Taurus come down here in majestic masses to the sea, forming the heights of Cragus and Antacragus, with the river Xanthus winding between them, and ending in the long series of promontories called by modern sailors the "Seven Capes," among which are deep inlets favorable to seafaring and piracy. It forms part of the region now called Tekke. It was fertile in corn and wine, and its cedars, firs, and other trees were celebrated (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xii, 6). Its inhabitants were believed to be descendants of Cretans, who came thither under Sarpedon, brother of Minos. One of their kings was Bellerophon, celebrated in mythology. Lycia is often mentioned by Homer (Il. vi, 171; x, 430; xii, 312; Odys. v, 282, etc.), according to whom it was an ally of Troy. Herodotus assigns several ancient names to the country (i, 178). The Lycians were a warlike people, powerful on the sea, and attached to their independence, which they successfully maintained against Croesus, king of Lydia, and were afterwards allowed by the Persians to retain their own kings as satraps, and their ships were conspicuous in the great war against the Greeks (Herod. vii, 91, 92). After the death of Alexander the Great, Lycia was included in the Greek Seleucid kingdom, and was a part of the territory which the Romans forced Antiochus to cede (Livy, xxxvii, 55). It was made, in the first place, one of the continental possessions of Rhodes [see Caria]; but before long it was politically separated from that island, and allowed to be an independent state. This has been called the golden period of the history of Lycia (see further in Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.). It is at this time that it is named in 1 Mac. xvi, 23, as one of the countries to which the Roman senate sent its missives in favor of the Jews. The victory of the Romans over Antiochus (B.C. 189) gave Lycia rank as a free state, and preserved it till the time of Constantius, when it was made a province of the Roman empire (Sueton. Claud. 25; Vespas. 8). At first it was combined with Pamphylia, and the governor bore the title of "Proconsul Lyciae et Pamphyliae" (Gruner, Thees. p. 458). Such seems to have been the condition of the district when Paul visited it (Acts xxii, 1, 2; xxvii, 5). At a later period of the Roman empire it was a separate province, with Myra for its capital. Lycia contained many towns, two of which are mentioned in the New Testament: Patara (Acts xxii, 1, 2) and Myra (Acts xxvii, 5); and one, Phaselis, in the Apocalypse (1 Mac. xvi, 23). This region, abounding in ancient remains and inscriptions (the last copiously illustrated by Schmidt, Jena, 1868, fol.), was first visited in modern times by Sir Charles Fellows. See his Journal (London, 1839, 1841); Forbes, Travels (London, 1843); Teisseret, L., 1 Mac., ii (Paris, 1888); Encycl. of Useful Knowledge, xiv, 210 sq.; Cramer's Asia Minor, ii, 282 sq.; Mannert, Geogr. Lychnos (Lychnos), a river of Palestine, mentioned by ancient geographers as situated between ancient Bibus and Berytus (Strabo, xvi, p. 755; Pliny, v, 20). This is evidently the modern Naher el-Keb (Dog River), at the mouth of which, about 2 hours N.E. of Beirut, are found the remarkable rock-tablets of ancient victorious kings (Wilson, ii, 406; Robinson, Later Res. p. 619 sq.).

Lychnoscope (an opening for watching the light), a name assigned by the ancients to an unplugged window or opening, which is frequently found near the west end of the chancel, and usually on the south side, below the range of the other windows, and near the ground. What purpose these low side windows served in churches is not now known.

Lycurgus (Wulf), a river of Palestine, mentioned by ancient geographers as situated between ancient Bibus and Berytus (Strabo, xvi, p. 755; Pliny, v, 20). This is evidently the modern Naher el-Keb (Dog River), at the mouth of which, about 2 hours N.E. of Beirut, are found the remarkable rock-tablets of ancient victorious kings (Wilson, ii, 406; Robinson, Later Res. p. 619 sq.).

Lydda (Lydia), Acts ix, 22, 32, 38; from the Heb. עֲלָלָה, 37th and 36th Heb. letters. In Chron. viii, 12.

Lydda v. v. Ladei, by union with the following name, Ezra ii, 38; Neh. vii, 87; Aida, Heb. xi, 35; 1 Mac. xi, 34; so also Josephus), a town within the limits of the tribe of Ephraim; according to Eusebius and Jerome, nine miles east of Joppa, on the road between that port and Jerusalem; according to the Antonine Itinerary, thirty-two miles from Jerusalem and ten from Antipatris. It bore in Hebrew the name of Loy, and appears to have been first built by the Benjamites, although it lay beyond the limits of their territory (1 Chron. viii, 12); and we find it again inhabited by Benjamites after the exile (Ezra ii, 33; Neh. vii, 35). In all these notices it is mentioned in connection with Ono. It likewise occurs in the Apocrypha (1 Mac. xi, 34) as having been taken from Samaria and annexed to Judea by Demetrius Nicator; and at a later date its inhabitants are named among those who were sold into slavery.
ly by Caesar when he inflicted the calamity of his presence upon Palestine after the death of Julius Caesar (Josephus, Ant. xiv. 11, 2; xii. 6). In the New Testament the place is only noticed under the name of Lydda, as the scene of Peter's miracle in healing Eneas (Acts ix. 32, 40). Some years later the town was reduced to ashes by Cassius Gallus, in his march against Jerusalem (Josephus, Wars, iii. 5, 5; iv. 8). At that time it is described (Josephus, xiv. 2, 3) as having 700 houses, and situated 23 miles from Jerusalem, as a village equal to a city; and the Rabbins have much to say of it as a seat of Jewish learning, of which it was the most eminent in Judaea after Jabneh and Bether (Lightfoot, Parchon, § 8; Hors Horab. p. 35 sqq.; Othon, Let. Rabb. p. 899 sqq.). About the time of the siege it was petitioned over by rabbi (Hamdall) of the name of the Lightfoot, Chronicles, xxvi. Some curious anecdotes and short notices from the Talmuds concerning it are preserved by Lightfoot. One of these states that "queen Helen celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles there!" In the general change of names which has taken place the town of Ludd in the Bible has been changed into Lydda. Lydda became Diasporia (Ptol. v. 16, 6; Pliny, v. 13; see Reland, Palast., p. 677), and under this name it occurs in coins of Severus and Caracalla, and is often mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome. It was early the seat of a bishopric, and at the difficult times of the fourth century four bishops, not subscribed their names variously, as of Lydda or Diasporia; but in the later ecclesiastical records the name of Lydda predominates. Traditions report that the first bishop was "Zenas the lawyer" (Tit. iii. 13), originally one of the seventy disciples (Domingo, in Reland, p. 679); but the first bishop concludes the list in the signature of "Arius Lydensis" to the acts of the Council of Nicea (A.D. 325; Reland, p. 676). The bishop of Lydda, originally subject to Caesarea, became at a later date suffragan to Jerusalem (see the two lists in Von Raumer, p. 401); and this is still the case. In the latter part of 415 a council of fourteen bishops was held here, before which Prigias appeared, and by whom, after much tumultuous debate, and in the absence of his two accusers, he was acquitted of heresy, and received as a Christian brother (Milner, Hist. of Ch. of Christ, cent. vi, chap. iii.). The last known bishop in this connection is Michael, d. A.D. 518. Lydda early became connected with the housepaid to the celebrated saint and martyr St. George, who was not less renowned in the East than afterwards in the West. He is said to have been born at Lydda, and to have lived at Nazareth; he was among the earliest persecution under Diocletian and Maximian, at the end of the 3rd century. His remains were transferred to his native place, and a church erected in honor of him by the emperor Justinian. This church, which stood outside the town, had just been levelled to the ground by the Moslems when the Crusaders arrived at Lydda; but it was soon rebuilt by them, and they established a bishopric of Lydda and Ramleh. Great honors were paid them by St. George, and they invested him with the dignity of their patron: from this time his renown spread rapidly throughout Europe, and he became the patron saint of England and of several other states and kingdoms. The church was destroyed by Saladin in 1191, and there is no evidence that it was ever rebuilt, although there was in later centuries an impression that the church of the Muslims of which they were supposed to have existed, had been built by the English king Richard. From that time there has been little notice of Lydda by travellers. It now exists, in a fruitful plain, one mile north of Rama, and three east of Jaffa, under its ancient name of Lud or Ludda (Jold in Tobler's Die Weltatlas, p. 69, 456). Within a circle of four miles still stand Ono (Kefr Auna), Hadid (el-Hadith), and Neballat (Beit-neballah), three places constantly associated with Lyd in the ancient records. The water-course outside the town is said still to bear the name of Ali-Shatrus (Peter, in memory of the apostle (Tobler, p. 471). The town is, for a Mohammedan place, busy and prosperous (see Van de Welde, Syr. and Palest., i, 244). Buried in palms, and with a large well close to the entrance, it looks from a distance inviting enough, but its interior is very repulsive on account of the extraordinary number of its old and young, whom one encounters at every step, either totally blind, or afflicted with loathsome diseases of the eyes. It is a considerable village of small houses, with nothing to distinguish it from ordinary Moslem villages that are barren and overgrown with thorns; the church, the celebation of St. George, which are situated in the eastern part of the town. The building must have been very large. The walls of the eastern end are standing only in the parts near the altar, including the arch over the latter; but the western end remains more perfect, and has been built into a large mosque, the lofty minaret of which forms the landmark of Lud. As the city of St. George, who is one with the famous personage El-Khudi, Lydda is held in much honor by the Moslems. In their traditions the gate of the city will be the scene of the final combat between Christ and Antichrist (Selim's Kehf-i, 487; and Prel. Disc. iv. § 4; also Jalal ad-Din, Temple of Jerusale, p. 484). See Rauner, Palatinus, p. 208; Robinson, Bib. Researches, iii, 55; Sandy, Travels; Cotovicius, Itiner. p. 137, 188; D'Arvieux, Memoires, ii, 28; Poocke, Description, ii, 59; Volney, Voyage, i, 278; Thomson, Land and People of the Holy Land, p. 294.

Lydgate, John, an ancient English theologian, celebrated particularly as a poet, one of the successors of Chaucer, was a monk of the Benedictine abbey of Bury St. Edmunds, in Suffolk. The dates of only a few of the events of his life are known. He was ordained a subdeacon in 1389, a deacon in 1388, and a priest in 1387, whence it has been conjectured that he was born about 1375. He seems to have arrived at his greatest eminence about 1450. After a short education at Oxford he travelled in France and Italy, and returned a complete master of the language and literature of both countries. He chiefly studied Dante, Boccaccio, and Alain Chartier, and became so distinguished a proficient in polite learning that he opened a school in his monastery for teaching the sons of the nobility verification and composition. Although philology was his subject, he wrote on his favorite topic in harmony with the philosophy of the day: he was not only a poet and a rhetorician, but a geometrician, an astronomer, a theologian, and a disputant. He died about 1467.—English Cyclop. s. v.; Warton, Hist. Engl. Poetry; Chambers, Cyclop. Eng. Lit. i, 45 sqq. 2. Lyd'a (Aed'ion), the name of a country, and also of a woman in the New Testament.

1. The Hebrew Ladin ("Lydia" in Ezek. xxx. 5; see also Ludim), a province in the west of Asia Minor, supposed to have derived its name from Lod, the foundation of Shem (Gen. x. 22). Thus Josephus states "those who are now called Lydians (Aediones), but anciently Ludim (Aediones), sprung from Lud" (Aediones, Anti. ii, 6, 4; compare Bochart, Opera, i, 83, and the authorities cited there). See ETHNOLOGY. Lydia was bounded on the east by Greater Phrygia, on the north by Cossia or My- sia, on the west by Ionia and the Aegean Sea, and on the south it was separated from Caria by the Manander (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.). The country is for the most part level (Schubert, stabt. 1, 369 sqq.). Among the mountains, that of Cithaeron is remarkable for its saffron and its wine (Xen. Cyp. vi. 2, 21). Lydia, however, lay on the west coast of Asia Minor, and thus was far removed from the other possessions of the Shemitic nations. Greek writers inform us that Lydia was originally peopled by a Pelasgic race called Lycians (Herod. Hist. ii, 431, xxxi, 1, 481, who derived their name from Mecon, an ancient king (Bochart, l. c.). They also state that the name Lydians was derived from a king who ruled them at a later period (Herod. i. 7).
About eight centuries B.C. a tribe of another race migrated from the east, and subdued the Maccabees. These were the Lydians. For some time after this conquest both nations are mentioned promiscuously, but the Lydians gradually obtained power, and gave their name to the country (Kalisch, On Gen. xiv; Dionysius, i. 30; Pliny, v. 29. 205). They were the proud of the seven nations, and were described by Herodotus (vii. 79) as being distinguished in horsemanship (fē), and accustomed to serve as mercenaries under foreign princes (vii. 71). Now, in Isa. lxvi. 19, a warlike people called Lud is mentioned in connection with Tarshish and Pul; and again in Ezek. xxvii. 10, the prophet says of Tyre, "Thy of Persia, and of Lud, and of Duh, were in thine army, thy men of war."

There can scarcely be a doubt that this is the Semitic nation mentioned in Genesis, and which migrated to Western Asia, and gave the province of Lydia its name. The identity has recently been called in question by professor and Sir Henry Rawlinson, and the arguments do not seem sufficient to set aside the great mass of circumstantial evidence in its favor (Rawlinson’s Herodoto, i. 160, 659, 667; comp. Kalisch, ad loc. Gen. xiv; Frichard, Physical History of Mankind, iv. 562 sq.; Niebuhr, Lecturae in Ancient History, 167; Gesenius, Theoseus, p. 353). Of the days of Lydia’s kings rulers from the shores of the Aegean to the river Halysa; and Croesus, who was its king in the time of Solon and of Cyrus, was reputed the richest monarch in the world (Strabo, xv, 735). He was able to bring into the field an army of 420,000 foot and 60,000 horse against Cyrus, by which however, he was defeated and his kingdom annexed to the Persian empire (Herod. i, 6). Lydia afterwards formed part of the kingdom of the Seleucids; and it is related in 1 Macc. vii. 8, that Antiochus the Great was compelled by the Romans to cede Lydia to king Eumenes (comp. Apian. Syc. 88). Some difficulty arises in the passage referred to from the names “India and Media” found in connection with it; but if we regard these as incorrectly given by the writer or by a copyist for “Ionia and Myasia,” the agreement with Livy’s account of the same transaction (xxxvii. 56) will be sufficiently established, the notion of the maritime provinces alone in the book of Maccabees being explicable on the ground of their being best known to the inhabitants of Palestine. In the time of the travels of the apostles it was a province of the Roman empire (Pebius, H. J., viii. 301). The most powerful towns were Sardis (the capital), Thyatira, and Philadelphia, all of which are mentioned in the New Testament, although the name of the province itself does not occur. Its connection with Judea, under the Seleucids, is referred to by Josephus (Ant. xiii. 3, 4). The manner of the Lydians were corrupt even to a proverb (Herod. i, 89). See Th. Menke, Lydias (Berlin, 1844); Cramer, Asia Minor, i. 413; Fortugier, Handb. der Alten Geogr. ii. 107; Clinton, Fasti Hell. Appendix, p. 361; Niebuhr, Lecturae in Anc. 2. A woman of Thyatira, “a seller of purple,” who dwelt in the city of Philippi, in Macedonia (Acts xvi. 14, 15). A.D. 47. The commentators are not agreed whether “Lydus” should be regarded as an appellative, or a derivative from the country to which the woman belonged, Thyatira, her native place, being in Lydia. There are examples of this latter sense; but the preceding word ὀμορίασι serves here to support the former, and the name was a common one. (See Briel and L. Hase in the Bibl. Bren. ii, 411; iii. 275; v. 670; vi. 1041; Symb. Bren. ii. 124; compare Ugolini Theosea, xiiij., xxix.) Lydia was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte, as the phrase “who worshipped God” imports. It was at the Jewish Sabbath-worship by the side of a stream (Acts xvi. 18) that the preaching of the Gospel by Paul reached her heart. She was converted, being the first person in Europe who embraced Christianity there, and after she and her household had been baptized she pressed the use of her house so earnestly upon the apostle and his associates that they were constrained to preach it (Acts xvi. 6). We infer that she was a person of considerable wealth partly from the fact that she gave a home to Paul and his companions, partly from the mention of the conversion of her “household,” under which term, whether children are included or not, slaves are no doubt comprehended. Of Lydia’s character we are led to form a high estimate from her candid reception of the Gospel, her urgent hospitality, and her continued friendship to Paul and Silas when they were persecuted. Whether she was one of “those women who labored with Paul in the Gospel” at Philippi, as mentioned afterwards in the epistle to that place (Phil. iv. 3), is impossible to say. The Lydians were famous for the art of dyeing purple vested (Pliny, viii. 57; Max. Tyr. xi. 2; Valer. Flacc. iv. 358; Claud. Rapt. Proserp. i, 273; Elian, Anm. iv. 46), and Lydia, as “a seller of purple,” is supposed to have been one of those who were trusted rather than in the dye itself (see Kuinol on Acts xiv. 14).

Lydius, Balthasar, a Dutch theologian of German origin, was born at Utrecht, near Darmstadt, about 1577; studied at Leyden; became pastor at Streefkerk in 1602, and in 1608 at Dordrecht. He was present at the Synod of Dort. He died in 1628. Lydius was a violent opponent of the Remonstrants. Of his literary labors, one deserves special mention, Waldenia (now very rare, Rotterdam, 1616-17; 2d ed. Amsterdam, 1625, 2 vols. 8vo), in which he seeks to show an intimate connection between the Moravians and Waldensians. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. xx, 63, 64.

Lydius, Jacob, a Dutch theologian, son of the preceding, flourished about the middle of the 17th century at Dordrecht, and took a prominent part in the synod held there. He died in 1688. Some of his works deserve special mention: Agonistica Sacra, sive Synagma regum maximos sive Iugum Corporis Christi a temporibus occurrunt (Rot. 1657, 12mo)—Florius Spirana ad historiam passionis Jesu Christi (ibid, 1672, 8vo). See Brandt, Hist. of the Reformation in the Low Countries; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxii, 388.

Lydius, Johannes (1), a German theologian, brother of Balthasar, was born at Frankfurt about 1577, and became pastor at Gudewarker (the birthplace of Arnim) in 1602. He died in 1643. Like his brother Balthasar, he is noted for his opposition to Arminianism. He was the editor of the works of Clamens, Wessels, etc. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. xx, 64.

Lydius, Johannes (2), one of the early Dutch ministers of the Reformed Church in America, was educated in Holland, and settled at Schenectady and Albany, N.Y., in 1702. Like his predecessors in the same Church, he labored successfully for the instruction and salvation of the Mohawk Indians. He ministered amongst the tribes of the “Five Nations,” and rendered to the governor and council suitable compensation for his services. He died March 1, 1710. About thirty Indian communicants were in connection with his Church at his decease. He is represented by his contemporary, Rev. Thomas Barclay, of the Church of England, in a just and impartial report. He also was a most judicious and sagacious character of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, as “a good, pious man,” who “lived in entire friendship with him,” and “sent his own children to be catechized.”—Documentary Hist. of N. York, iv, 897; Dr. Rogers’ Hist. Discourses. (W. J. R.T.) LYDIUS, Martin, a noted Dutch theologian, father of Baithasar and Jacob, was born at Lubeck, Germany, in 1539 or 1540, of Dutch parentage, and was educated at the universities of Tbingen and Heidelberg, where in 1566 he was employed at the Collegium Sopranum as teacher. On account of persecution, in 1565, he fled to Flanders, and he went to Holland, and became in 1579 pastor of a Church at Amsterdam. Upon the founding of the university at Franeker in 1585, he was called thither as professor. He died in 1601. He is noted for the part he took in the Arminian controversy. It is he who forwarded to Arminius the works of Oornest and Arnold Cornelius for refutation, which resulted instead in the conversion of Arminius. See Herzog, Real-Enzyk. xx, 61 sq.; Bayle, Hist. Dict. iii, 970, 971. See ARMINIANISM.

Lyke, Edward, an English philologist and clergyman, was born at Tolness, Devonshire, and was educated at Hertford College, Oxford; took holy orders in 1719; was presented to the living of Haughton Parva, Northamptonshire; in 1750 became vicar of Yardley Hastings, and died in 1787. He acquired distinction by his researches in the Saxon language and literature. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, vol. ii, s. v. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.; Stoughton, Eccles. Hist. of Engl. (Church Restoration), i, 278.

Lyell, Thomas, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Richmond County, Va., May 13, 1775. Though educated in the Protestant Episcopal Church, he became in early life a Methodist, and officiated on the Frederick Circuit, Va., also in Providence, R. I., and was chaplain to Congress. In 1804, however, he became rector of Christ's Church, N. Y., and remained ever after in that connection. In 1833 he was made A.M. by Brown University, and in 1822 D.D. by Columbia College. Through a long ministry he held on the even tenor of his way, and was an active member of almost every institution connected with the diocese of New York. He died March 4, 1848. Sprague, Annals, v, 495.

Lyford, William, an English theologian and zealous Calvinist, was born in 1598 at Perpeme (Berkshire); graduated at Oxh-vid; became a fellow of Magdalen College; entered the Church; became vicar of Sherborne, Dorsetshire, and spent the remainder of his life there. He died in 1558. Among other sermons and treatises are published, Cases of Conscience proposed in the Time of Rebellion (which pretences toleration to all parties)—Principles of Faith and of a good Conscience (Lond. 1642; Oxford, 1622. 8vo) A New Apology for our Public Ministry and Infant Baptism (Lond. 1652, 1658, 4to).—The plain Man's Senses exercised to discern both good and evil (ibid. 1655, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vol. xxxii, s. v.; Thomas, Dict. of Biog. and Mythol. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, s. v.

Lyman, John, A.M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., October 20, 1769, and graduated at Liberty Hall in 1794. Soon after he was employed in teaching, pursued his theological studies, and was licensed in 1797. He was ordained in 1799, and in 1800 took charge of the churches of Salem and Sugar Ridge, in Rockbridge County, Va. In 1805 he was appointed missionary within the bounds of the Cumberland Presbytery, and subsequently a commissioner of the General Assembly. He removed to Paris, Bourbon Co., Ky., in 1807, established an academy, and at the same time preached to the churches of Cave Ridge and Concord. He next supplied the church of Mount Pleasant, in Cynthiana, Harrison County, and passed the summer of 1814 in the counties of Bourbon, Harrison, Nicholas, and Fayette, preaching chiefly to the colored people. Having been elected his church at 1815, and in 1816, president of ministers on the field of his own labors, he devoted the rest of his life to missionary service, in which he was successfully engaged till his death in Paris, Ky., July 22, 1825. He published Contributions to Periodicals:—A New American English Grammar (1804):—A Sermon on the Qualifications of the Gospel Ministers (1821).—Sprague, Annals, i, 178.

Lyman, Henry, an American missionary, was born at Northampton, Mass., Nov. 23, 1809, and graduated at Amherst College in 1829. He went as a missionary to Sumatra, and was killed there by the Batahs, with Mr. Munson, Jan. 28, 1834. He published Condition of Females in Pagan Countries.

Lynn, Joseph, L., a Congregational minister, was born April 14, 1749, at Lebanon, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1767, was chosen tutor in 1770, in which position he remained two years, and was installed pastor in Hatfield, Mass, March 4, 1772, where he died March 27, 1828. He was elected president of the Hampshire Missionary Society in 1791, and vice-president of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1819, and president in 1823. Dr. Lyman published several occasional Sermons (1787-1821).—Sprague, Annals, ii, 10.

Lyman, William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born about 1765, and was educated at Yale College, where he graduated in 1784. He was pastor at Haddam, Conn., and China, N.Y., and died in 1834. The College of New Jersey honored him with the doctorate in divinity in 1806. Dr. Lyman published four Occasional Sermons (1806, 1807, 1810). See Drake, Dict. Amer. Biog. p. 570; Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Am. Authors, ii, s. v.

Lynch, Thomas M., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Wilkeson County, Miss, August 1, 1826, was converted at Oxford, Ga., while a student at the university, at once joined the Church, and was licensed to preach in 1847, and shortly after was admitted to the Alabama Conference. His cultivated mind, his rare gifts in oratory, and his deep piety at once commended him to the love and confidence of the Conference. The Enon Circuit was his birthplace, and Marianna and Appalachian his second appointment, when, in 1849, his health failed, and it became necessary for him to locate. By 1858 he had sufficiently recovered to re-enter upon his life-work, and he now consecutively served in the Circuits of New Madrid, Pine Bluff, and the Sopacoty Circuit. In the last-named place his health was again affected by the extent of the work and arduousness of its duties, and he retired from active work. He died in Coweta County, Ala., April 16, 1867. In all the relations of life he sustained the character of a gentleman of the highest type. Possessing a rich fund of knowledge, and gifted with conversational powers that statesmen and courtiers might envy, he ever drew around him, by the affability of his manners and sweetness of his spirit, a large circle of friends, and held them by an indissoluble cord. As a preacher his word had power and unction. See Minutes of Conference of M. E. Church South, iii, 128.

Lynde, Sir Humphrey, an English writer of note, was born in 1579, and was educated first at Westminster School, and then at Christ Church, Oxford; was made bachelor of arts in 1600. He was a member of several Parliaments, and wrote other national histories, but he preserves a place here only on account of his works, among which are Via tuta (Lond. 1628, 8vo, and often) and Ancient Characters of the Visible Church, etc. He died June 14, 1686. See Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Lyon, A.A., a Congregational minister, was born at Pomfret, Conn., Dec. 31, 1864, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1790. He was pastor of the Congregational Church at Sunderland, Mass., from Oct. 4, 1795, to Sep. 23, 1798, at South Haddam, Vt., from Dec. 21, 1892, to March 15, 1840; and was a member of Congress from Vermont from 1815 to 1817. He was appointed chief judge of Grand Isle County in 1805, 1806, 1808, and 1815; and was during nine years a state representative. He was a able preacher. His published sermons and patriotic addresses show a high order of talent and scholarship.

Lyons, Horsey, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Walden, N.Y., Jan. 18, 1800, and was educated at Union College, pursued a course of theology at Princeton, N.J., and soon after removed to Ohio. Here, in 1820, he was ordained as preacher of the Presbyterian Church of Huron, and ordained pastor of the Church in Vermilion. In 1830 he removed to Brownhelm, Ohio, and engaged in the occupation of teaching at the academy in Richfield, Ohio. He died March 7, 1863. Mr. Lyon was a superior teacher, and much beloved by his pupils; as a Christian, he enjoyed an unmerited remarkable for depth and intensity. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 309. (J. L. S.)

Lyons, John C., a noted German minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Leobsberg, in the kingdom of Wuerttemberg, Germany, Feb. 11, 1802. In 1827, he was licensed by the Lutheran church, and John received a Christian training. In 1817 he emigrated to this country, and some nine years later was brought nearer the cross, at once joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, after due preparation, entered the ministry, in which he continued for thirty-four years, preaching both in English and German congregations with great acceptance. He received consecutively the following appointments: 1828, Baltimore Conference, Huntington; 1829, Gettysburgh; 1830, Carlisle Circuit; 1831, Baltimore; 1832-33, Baltimore, Sharp Street, and Asbury; 1834, he was licensed to preach; 1835, Lexington; 1836, Lewish Circuits; 1837-38, Rockingham; 1839-40, Augusta; 1841, York; 1842-45, New York Conference, Second Street German Church; 1846-48, Philadelphia; 1849-52, presiding elder of New York German District; 1853-54, East Baltimore; 1855-56, New York, Second Street; 1857, Fortieth Street; 1858-59, Philadelphia; 1860, Frederick City; 1861, East Baltimore. In 1862 he was superannuated, and died May 16, 1868. "Brother Lyon was an earnest, faithful worker in the Gospel, never tiring, esteeming all labor which served to advance his Master's glory... He was a devout and holy man in life, a pleasant companion, a kind husband, a good father, a sweet singer in Zion, a useful laborer, turning many to righteousness."—Conf. Minutes, 1869, p. 108.

Lyons, Mary, a teacher and female philanthropist, born in Buckland, Mass., Feb. 28, 1797, is noted as the founder of the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary in South Hadley, over which she presided until her death, March 5, 1849. A feature of her plan (at first much opposed) was the performance of the institution's domestic labor by teachers and pupils, intending to give them independence of servants, self-denial, health, and interest in domestic duties. She set forth her views in Tendencies of the Principles embraced and the System adopted in the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (1840), and in the Missionary Offering (1845). See Hitchcock, Life and Labors of Mary Lyon (1861); Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biography, 12 v.

Lyons, a city of France, situated on the Rhone, 316 miles by railway south-east of Paris, is noted in ecclesiastical history for two ecumenical councils which were held there:

1. In 1245, consisting of 140 bishops, and convened for the purpose of promoting the Crusades, restoring ecclesiastical discipline, and determining the question of the II. emperors of Germany. It was also decreed at this council that cardinals should wear red hats.

2. In 1274. There were 500 bishops and about 1000 inferior clergy present. Its principal object was the reunion of the Greek and Latin churches.—Hook, History of the Later Roman Church; Smith, Tables of Church History; Landon, Manual of Councils, A.D.

Lyons, Israel, a noted English scholar of Jewish parentage, was born at Cambridge in 1709; and after the completion of his studies, mainly dependent upon his own efforts, he became instructor of Hebrew at the University in Cambridge. He died in 1776. Besides valuable contributions to mathematical science, he wrote The Scholar's Instructor, or Hebrew Grammar (1735, 9vo; 2d ed., greatly enlarged, 1757); Observations and Inquiries relating to various Parts of Scripture History (1761). His entire life's work has, however, been written, however, by his father. See General Biographical Dictionary, A.D.

Lyons, James Gilbourne, D.D., LL.D., an episcopal clergyman and educator, a native of England, emigrated to America in 1844, and began his clerical labors at St. Mary's Church, Burlington, N.J. In 1846 he removed to Philadelphia, and established himself as a teacher of the classics. His educational success secured him the position of principal of Haverford Classical School, which he held until his death, Feb. 5, 1868.

Lyra (also Lyrunmus), Nicholas DE, so called from Lyra, in Normandy, the place of his nativity, was born about 1150. He was entered in the Order of the Preachers at Verneuil in 1219, and completed his studies in Paris. Here he studied successfully, was admitted to the degree of doctor, and became a distinguished lecturer on the Bible. Besides his studies at the university, he privately devoted himself to the acquisition of a thorough knowledge of Hebrew, and his association with converts of Jewish faith at this time has probably given rise to the opinion, even now held by some, that Nicholas de Lyra was born of Jewish parents, and was himself a convert to Christianity. His own writings, however, flatly contradict this report, as has been shown by Wolf (Bibliotheca, i and iii, s. v.); and Nicholas himself tells us, in one of his works (the polemical treatise), that he had but little association with Jews, and depended mainly upon the experience of other Christians for his delineation of Jewish characters of the period (Paris, GrRch. d. Juden, vii, 513). His great learning, refined taste, and eminent worth, raised him to the principal offices of his order, and secured him the friendship of the most illustrious persons of his age. He died at Paris October 29, 1401. It is especially as a writer that Lyra is justly celebrated, and, as has been frequently asserted, he became, by his thorough expositions of the Scriptures, one of the greatest aids of the reformers of the 16th century, whence the couplet on Luther's exegetical labors by the enemies of the great German reformer: "Si Lyra non lyricet Luthernam non saltasset." Nicholas de Lyra's chef d'œuvre is his Postilla perpetua in usseribus Biblic (Rome, 1471-72, 5 vols. fol.; best edit. Antw. 1634, 6 vols. fol.), which brought him the title of "doctor planus et utilissimus"—or, better which immortalized the name of Lyra. The great merit of this commentary consists in the embodiment of the sober-minded and ingenious explanations of Rashi, whose mode of interpretation Lyra regarded as his model, as he frankly states, "Similiter intendere non solum dictum corollarium Sarcorum, sed etiam Hebraeorum maxime raui, frequenter requele Lyra, qui inter docbros Hebraeos locutus est rationalibus, ad declarationem sensus literalis inducere." De Lyra even adopts the well-known Jewish four modes of interpretation denominated דַּאֲרָם יָדָא, mystical, יָדָא, allegorical; יָדָא, spiritual; יָדָא, literal, which he thus expresses in verses in the same prologue (i. e. the first), from which the former quotation is made:

"Liber Lyri Doctoris; Lyrae, fidei, et scholas Moralis quid agas, quo tendas anaqogia." He gives, however, the preference to the literal sense.

LYSIANAS

tory to the restless critics of Germany. Strauss and others (whose names are mentioned by Bleek, Synopt.
Erkl. i, 156, and Meyer, Komment. ii, 289) charge the evangelist with "a gross chronological error;" a charge which they found on the assumption that the Lysianas of Chalcis mentioned by Josephus is identical with the Lyssias of Ephesus, whom Luke mentions. This mistaken assumption is supported by a hypothesis which is incapable of proof, namely, that Abilene, being contiguous to Chalcis, was united to the latter under the rule of Lysiadas, the son of Ptolemy. It must, however, be borne in mind that Josephus nowhere speaks of Abilene in connection with this Lysianas; nor, indeed, does he mention it at all until many years after the notice by Luke.
He calls Antony's victim simply ruler of Chalcis. Moreover, it is of importance to observe that the tetrarchal division of Palestine and neighboring districts was not made until after the death of Herod the Great; and, in his haste to inculcate the evangelist, Strauss, in effect, attributes to the historian, whom he invidiously opposes to Luke as a better authority, an amount of incorect and inaccurate statement which, if true, would destroy all reliance on his history; for we have already seen that Josephus mentions a "tetrarchy of Lysiadas, Lyssias, or Lysianas," whereas there were no "tetrarchies" until some thirty years after the death of Ptolemy's son Lysianas.
It is, therefore, a juster criticism to conclude (against Strauss, and with the earlier commentators) that in such passages as the one quoted above, while the evangelist speaks of "Abila of Lysianas" and the "tetrarchy of Lysianas," that a later Lysianas is certainly meant; and that Josephus is not only accurate himself, but a voucher also for the veracity of Luke. But there is yet stronger evidence to be found in Josephus of the untenability of Strauss's objection and theory. In his Josephus War (ii, 12, 8) the historian tells us that the emperor Claudius "removed Agrippa [the second] from Chal-cis [the kingdom, be it remembered, of Strauss's Lysiadas] to a greater kingdom, giving him in addition the kingdom of Lysianas" (in έτι της Χαλκηδος Ἀργίππου της μεταλλαχημείας. Αὐτόν ἔδωκεν δὲ Καίσαρ την την της Λυσιάνας βασιλείαν). Ebrard exposes the absurdity of Strauss's argument by drawing from these words of Josephus the following conclusion—incredible, indeed, on the terms of Strauss—that Agrippa was deprived of Chalcis, receiving in exchange a larger king-80 dom, and also Chalcis! (See Ebrard's Gospel Hist.
[Clark], p. 145, 146) The effect of this redaction ad absurdum is well put by Dr. Lee (Inspiration [1st ed.], p.
894, note), "Hence, therefore, Josephus does make mention of a later Lysianas [on the denial of which Strauss has found fault against Luke], and on Luke [1], and the name is corroborated or supports the theory of the evan-gelist's intimate acquaintance with the tanged details of Jewish history in his day." Many eminent writers have expressly accepted Ebrard’s conclusion, including Meyer (loc. cit.) and Bleek (loc. cit.). Patruilius concludes an elaborate examination of the entire case with the discovery that the "later Lysianas, whom Luke mentions, was known to Josephus also, and that, so far from any difficulty accruing out of Josephus to the evangelist's chronology, as alleged by objectors to his veracity, the historian's statement rather confirms and strengthens it" (De Evang. elica, iii, 42, 25). It is interesting, also, to remark that, if the sacred writer in this matter made use of the Jewish historian in this matter, he also repays him the favor, by helping to clear up what would otherwise be untelligible in his statement; for instance, see Josephus (Ant. xvii, 17, 4) mentions "Batanea, with Tra-conitias and Auranitis, and a certain part of what was called the 'house of Zenodorus,' as paying a certain tribute to Philip" (σὲ της Ζένωδου λαούς καὶ τον Ζενοδότον λαούς). And when it is remembered that "the 'house of Zenodorus' included other territory besides that of Auranitis (comp. Ant. xv, 10, 8, with War, i, 20, 4), we cannot but admit the force of the objection advanced by Grotius (as quoted by Dr. Hudson, On the Antiq. xvii, 11, 4), that

1. According to Eusebius (whom others have followed, such as Bede and Adrachmius; see Corn. l. Lapid. in Luc. iii, 1), Lysianas was a son of Herod the Great.
This opinion (the tenability of which is shown by Valexis, on Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i, 5, and by Scaliger, Ammader, on Euseb. Chron. p. 178) has no other foundation than the fact that the evangelist mentions Lysiadas with Herod Antipas and Philip.

2. To the other commentators, such as Casaubon (On Borrom. Ann. xxxiv, Num. 4), Scaliger (loc. cit.), and others (see Corn. l. Lap. and Grotius, ad loc.), the diffERENCE OF dates presented no difficulty.

3. This reasonable solution, however, was unsatisfac-when Josephus says some part of the house or possession of Zemodorus was allotted to Philip, he thereby declares that the larger part of it belonged to another. The other - sentence when Luke mentions (see also Krebsius, Obererat. p. 112).

4. It is not irrelevant to state that other writers besides Strauss and his party have held the identity of Luke's Lyssias with Josephus's son of Ptolemy, and have also believed that Josephus mentioned but one Lyssias. But (unlike Strauss) they resorted to a great shift rather than assail the veracity of the evangelist. Valesius (on Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i, 10), and, more recently, Paulus (Comment. ad loc.) supposed an alteration of Luke's text, either by an erasure of ετερωργονος after Αβλινας, or retaining the participle and making the word Αβλινας a genitive with the article, in the Greek. As in the case of Lukan ιεράι, the name of God is used to denote the house in which he wrote his works should be torn down. The sentence was afterwards altered, and he was beheaded before being burned, March 31, 168. See C. F. Ammon, C. Lyseias, en Beitrags z. Gesch. d. ideenle Athesmens (Göttingen, 1802); Herzog, Real-Encyclop. viii, 628. (J. N. P.)

Lyser (also Leiber or Lyster), an eminent Lutheran theologian, was born at Winnenden, in Wittenberg, March 18, 1552, and was educated at the University of Tübingen. In 1578 he became pastor at Gellersdorf, in Austria, which office he retained till 1586, when he left it to become bishop of Wiener. He often preached also in Vienna, and thus became acquainted with the emperor Maximilian II. He was made D.D. by the University of Tübingen July 16, 1576, being then under 25 years old. After remaining for two years at the court of the elector August of Saxony, he became pastor and professor at Wittenberg. After the adoption of the "Formula Concordiae," he and J. Andrea devised a new organization for the university; he was also commissioned to revise the text of the Lutheran translation of the Bible, etc. After the death of the Elector August (1586), Charles of Lorraine was elected August of Saxony, and Lyser, at the ascendency in Saxony, left Wittenberg, generally regretted by the university and the community, to accept a call to Brunswick as coadjutor or vice-superintendent. He, however, returned to Wittenberg in 1592, and this time became prior of the celebrated Monastery of Dresden. Here he continued in the faithful discharge of his arduous duties, honored not only by the prince, but also by the emperor Rudolph. He died February 22, 1610. His principal works are a continuation of Chemnitz's Harmonia IV. Evangelistarum (which was completed by John Gerard), Erklärungen u. Worte Predigt (1598), and a number of Predigten, particularly Vier Landt- predigten (1605). See Polyc. Lyster III, Officiwm pietatis, quod C. D. Polyc. Lyssias (Athen, a common Greek name), the name of two men, mentioned one in the Apocalypse, and the other in the New Testament.

1. A Syrian "nobleman of the blood royal" whom Antiochus the Great, when setting out for Persia, appointed guardian of his son, and regent of that part of his kingdom which extended from the Euphrates to the borders of Egypt (1 Macc. iii, 82; 2 Macc. x, 11; compare Josephus, Ant. xii, 7, 2; Appian, De rebus Scy. 46). In the following year, Antiochus, Acting under the influence of the Greek Dionysius, selected a large force for the purpose of carrying on a war of extermination against the Jews. This army, under the command of the generals Ptolemy, Nicander, and Gorgias, was surprised and put to flight by Judas Maccabeus near Emmaus (1 Macc. iii, 38-41; Josephus, Ant. xii, 7, 3, 4). In the following years, B.C. 165, Lyssias himself invaded Judea with a still larger army, and joined battle with Judas in the neighborhood of Bethura. The Syrians were again defeated, and so decisively that Judas was able to accomplish his great purpose, the purification of the temple, and the re-establishment of divine worship at Jerusalem (1 Macc. iv, 28-61; Josephus, Ant. xii, 7, 5-7). Lyssias retired to Antioch, and, while preparing for a fresh campaign, the death of Epiphanes left him in virtual possession of the supreme power. Shortly afterwards (probably B.C. 163), with an army equal in number to the two thousand war-chariots and two-and-thirty elephants, and accompanied by the young king Antiochus Eupator, he again entered Judea from the side of Idumea. Having taken the fortified city of Bethaura, he advanced to Jerusalem and laid siege to the Temple. Meeting here with a stouter resistance than he had anticipated, and perishing that Philip, a rival claimant to the guardianship of the king, was returning from Persia, he hastily concluded a peace with the Jews, and set out for Antioch. On reaching this city he found in it the possession of his rival, in the engagement which followed Philip was defeated and slain. Another and more formidable opponent, however, soon appeared, in the person of a certain young king, the first cousin of the king, who, escaping from Rome, landed at Tripolis, and laid claim to the throne. The people rose in his favor, and Antiochus and Lydia were seized and put to death (1 Macc. vii. 20, 22; 2 Macc. xiii. 20, 21; Joseph. Ant. xii. 9, 10: Apian. De rebus tyr. 47).

In the severe contest between the Greeks and Romans, the latter was given at some length an invasion of Judaea by Lydias, made before the final invasion, but after the death of Ephiphanes (2 Macc. xi). It is scarcely possible to reconcile this view with the more trustworthy narratives of the first book, and it is clear from 2 Macc. ix. 28-30, 52, that the writer is not following a strictly chronological order in this part of his history. Internal evidence seems to favor the opinion that this narrative has been compiled from separate and partial accounts of the two invasions referred to in 1 Macc. iv-vi, the writer too hastily inferring that the event was of the date of the second invasion, and consequently offering it as the more authentic (ver. 18). The apocrypha rejects this worship with horror (ver. 14), and Paul addressed a speech to them, turning their minds to the true Source of all the blessings of nature. The distinct proclamation of Christ's doctrine is mentioned, but it is implied, in General terms, and the Church was founded at Judea as a Church with wisdom. In post-apostolic times it was important as a Church to seed its bishops to the ecclesiastical councils (Hierocles, Synecd. p. 675). The adoration of the Lydians was rapidly followed by a change of feeling. The persecuting Jews who came from Antioch in Pisidia, and had such influence that Paul was stoned and left for dead (Acts xiv. 19). On his recovery, he withdrew, with Barnabas, to Derbe (ver. 20), but before long reentered his steps through Lystra (ver. 21), encouraging the new disciples to be steadfast. It is not absolutely stated that Paul was in Lystra, but, from the general description of the route of the third missionary journey (xviii, 23), it is almost certain that he was. See Paul.

It is evident from 2 Tim. iii. 10, 11, that Timothy was one of those who witnessed Paul's sufferings and courage on the above occasion; and it can hardly be doubted that his conversion to Christianity resulted partly from these circumstances, combined with the teaching of his Jewish mother and grandmother, Eu­nice and Lois (2 Tim. i. 5). Thus, when the apostle, accompanied by Silas, came on his second missionary journey, to the Gentile world (there we should notice how accurately Derbe and Lystra are here mentioned in the inverse order), Timothy was already a Christian (Acts xvi. 1). Here he received circumcision, "because of the Jews in those parts" (ver. 3); and from this point his connection with Paul's travels.

We are doubly reminded here of Jewish residents in and near Lystra. Their first settlement, and the ancestors of Timothy among them, may very probably be traced to the establishment of Babylonian Jews in Phrygia by Antiochus three centuries before (Josephus, Ant. xii. 3, 4). Still it is evident that there was no influential Jewish population at Lystra: no mention is made of any synagogue, and the whole aspect of the scene described by Luke (Acts xiv) is thoroughly heathen. As to its condition in heathen times, it is worth while to notice that the words in Acts xiv. 13 (τοις Δαυ­δος εν αυτη τη ερμηνευς την αμφιβολο­σπη) would lead us to think that it was under the tutelage of Jupiter. Walch, in his Spicilegium Antiquitatum Lystraeorum (Dissert. in Acta Apostolorum, Jena, 1766, vol. iii), thinks that in this passage a statue, not a temple, of the god is intended. Pliny (v. 4, 8) states that St. Lystra in Lycaonia, and St. Timothy (v. 4, 12) in Issaure; but these statements are quite consistent with their being placed in Lycaonia by Luke, as it is by Hierocles (Synecd. p. 675). This city was south of Ioucon, but its precise site is uncertain, as well as that of Derbe, which is mentioned along with it. Col. Leake remarks that the sacred text appears to place it nearer to Derbe than to Ioucon; for Paul, on leaving that city, proceeded first to Lystra, and thence to Derbe; and in like manner to Lystra, Isauria, and to Antioch of Pisidia. He therefore remarks in the Acts (xv. 29, 32; xx. 4, 12), who places Lystra in Isauria, and near Isaura, which seems evidently to have occupied some part of the valley of Idas Shebhr, or Bey Sheh. Under the Greek empire, Honomada, Isaura, and Lystra, as well as Derbe and Laranda, were all included in the consular province of Lycocia, and were bishops of the metropolitan see of Ioucon. Considering all the circumstances, Col. Leake inclines to think that the vestiges of Lystra may be sought with the greatest probability of success at or near Wirron Khatun, or Khutun Serai, about thirty miles to the south of Ioucon. "Nothing," says this able geographer, "can more strongly show the little progress that has hitherto been made in a knowledge of the ancient geography of Asia Minor than that of the cities which the journey of St. Paul has made so interesting to us, the site of one only (Ioucon) is yet certainly known" (Tour and Geogr. of Asia Minor, p. 102).

Mr. Arundell supposes that, should the ruins of Lystra not be found at the place indicated by Col. Leake, they may possibly be found in the remains at Karamisher, near the lake Bey-ahsheh (Discoveries in Asia Minor.) Still more lately, Mr. Hamilton (Researches in Asia Minor, ii. 319) identifies its site with the ruins called Biur-bir-Kilisek ("one thousand and one churches"), at the base of a conical mound of volcanic structure named the Karadagh (generally thought to be those of Derbe, but which, according to his arguments, must be sought elsewhere, perhaps at Divle), as being more considerable (a bishop of Lystra sat in the Council of Chalcedon, according to Eusebius, Synec., p. 675), and on the direct road from Ioucon to Derbe. Another traveller ascended the mountain, and says, "On looking down I perceived churches on all sides of the mountain, scattered about in various positions. . . . Including those in the plain, there are about two dozen in tolerable preservation, and the remains of perhaps forty may be traced altogether" (Falikner in Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, i, 292).

Lyttelton, Charles, LL.D., an English divine, born at Hagley, Worcestershire, in 1714, was educated at Eton and at University College, Oxford; rector of Aivelochurch, Worcesters, in 1742; dean of Exeter in 1748; bishop of Carlisle in 1762, and president of the Society of Antiquaries in 1765. He died Dec. 22, 1768. He published one sermon (Lond. 1765, 4to), and left various interesting scientific works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, s. v.

Lyttelton, George, Sir, an English peer and celebrated politician, who was born in Worcestershire in 1708-9, and educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford; entered Parliament in 1738, held several high political offices, was raised to the peerage in 1759, and died in 1778, is noted also as the author of Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul (1747, 8to, and often; last edit. 1804, 12mo), a work which elicited much praise for the able defence it furnishes for the truths of Christianity, or, as Leland (Deiatic Writers, p. 156 sq.) says, constitutes of itself "a demonstration sufficient to prove Christianity to be a divine revelation." Another work of Lord George Lyttelton of interest to us is his Dialogues of the Dead (1760). He had a son, Thomas, who died young, and who was as conspicuous for profligacy as his father for virtue. See Johnson, Lives of the Poets, iii, 281-400; Phillimore, Life of Lord Lyttelton (1843); Lond. Quart. Rev. 1848 (June); Monthly Review, 1772 (April and May); 1774 (December): Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1150.

Ma'achah (Heb. Middah, מִדָּה, oppression, Sept. Mea'ui, but in Gen. xxii, 24, Mu'ay; in 1 Chron. i, 48; ii, 3; Ma'ui, in 1 Chron. vii, 15, 16, Ma'ay; in 1 Chron. ix, 55, Muy'ah; in 1 Chron. xi, 48, Mu'ay'; Vulg. Macc'h; Auth. Vers. "Ma'achah" only 2 Sam. iii, 3; x, 6, 8), the name of a place and also of nine persons. See also Beth-Ma'achah.

2. A city and region at the foot of Mount Hermon, now in Syria. It was a district of Syria (Josh. xiii, 13; 2 Sam. x, 6, 8; 1 Chron. xix, 7). Hence the adjacent portion of Syria is called Aram-Ma'achah, or Syria of Ma'achah ("Syria-Ma'achah," 1 Chron. xix, 6). It appears to have been situated at the southern juncture of Cœle-Syria and Damascus-Syria, being bounded by the kingdom of Rehob on the north, by the kingdom of Geshur on the south, and by the mountains on either side of the Upper Jordan, on the east and west. See GISHER. The little kingdom thus embraced the southern and eastern dependencies of Hermon, and a portion of the rocky plateau above it, which was separated from the plain by the river, as seen, of Stat. Is. July, 1854, p. 310). The Israelites seem to have considered this territory as included in their grant, but were never able to get possession of it (Josh. xiii, 13). In the time of David this petty principality had written in the original Macaath (Hebrew Mebaalhah'), מֶבַלְחָה, Sept. Mo'agun, Vulg. Macaath, Auth. Vers. "Macaathâtes"). The identification of the Chaldee version with the district of Epicles (Ezra 7:27), mentioned by Polemy (v, 16, 9) as lying between Callichrioi and Lirias, as also that of the Syriac (on 1 Chron.) with Charan, according to Rosenmuller (Alberth. I, ii a tract in the district of the Ledja (Burckhardt, i, 580), is merely traditional (Hendel, Palesit, p. 110).

2. The last named of the four children of Nahor by his concubine Reumah, probably a son, although the sex is uncertain (Gen. xxii, 24). B.C. cir. 2040. Ew. add arbitrarily connects the name with the district of Macaath in the Hermon range (Gene. i, 414, note 1).

3. The sister of Hupham (Heb. Hupham, Hupham or Shuppim,) and consequently granddaughter of Benja-imis; she married Machir, by whom she had two sons (1 Chron. vii, 15, 16). B.C. post. 1656. See Gilead.

4. The second named of the concubines of Caleb (son of Hezon), by whom he had several children (1 Chron. ii, 9). B.C. ante 1658.

6. A daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur: she became the wife of David, and mother of Absalom (2 Sam. iii, 8). B.C. ante 1010. In 1 Sam. xviii, 8, we read of David's invading the land of the Geshurites, and the Jewish commentators (in Jerome, ad Rog.) allege that he then took the daughter of the king captives, and, in consequence of her great beauty, married her, after she had been married previously to the king of Geshur. But this is a gross mistake, for the Geshur invaded by David was to the south of Judah, whereas the Geshur over which Talmai ruled was to the north, and was regard as part of Syria (2 Sam. xv, 8). See Geshur.

The fact appears to be that David, having married the daughter of this king, contracted an alliance with him in order to strengthen his interest against Ishbosheth in those parts. Josephus gives her name Moaqoum (Ant. vii, 1, 4).

7. See David.

8. The father of Hanan, which latter was one of David's famous body-guard (1 Chron. xi, 48). B.C. ante 1046.

9. The father of Shephatiah, which latter was the military chief of the tribe of Simeon under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 16). B.C. ante 1014.

10. The father of Achish, which latter was the king of the Philistines, who, it seems, returned to Shimei in the time of Absalom's rebellion when the latter was out of his way, and not in pursuit of David, and thus forfeited his life by transcending the bounds prescribed by Solomon (1 Kings ii, 89). B.C. ante 1010. He appears to have been different from the Mach 1 Sam. xxvii, 2. See Achish.

11. A daughter of Absalom, the son of Rehoboam and mother of Abijam (1 Kings xv, 2). B.C. 975-955.

In verse 10 we read that Asa's mother's name was Macaath, the daughter of Absalom. It is evident that here "mother" is used in a loose sense, and means "grandmother," which the Macaath named in verse 2 must have been to the Asa of verse 10. It therefore appears to be a great error to make two persons of them, as is done by Calmet and others. The Abishalom who was the father of this Macaath is called Absalom in 2 Chron. xi, 20-22, and is generally supposed to be the same as the Shimei of the N.T., who was the son of David; which seems not improbable, seeing that Rehoboam's two other wives were of his father's family (2 Chron. xi, 18). In 2 Chron. xii, 2, she is called "Michaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah." But Josephus says that she was the daughter of Tamar, the daughter of Absalom (Ant. vii, 10, 1) who was the son of Shimei (2 SAM. 13:31), which is not unlikely, and in that case this Tamar must have been the wife of Uriel. See ABISHA. It would appear that Asa's mother was dead before he began to reign; for Macaath bore the rank and state of queen-mother (resembling that of the mahanissi Valide among the Turks), the persons of which she was the mother, her encouragement of idolatry, that Asa commenced his reforms by "removing her from being queen, because she had made an idol (lil. a 'frigah) in a grove" (1 Kings xv, 10-18; 2 Chron. xvi, 16).

Macaath. See MACAATH, 1.

Ma'íchchah (Gen. xxii, 24; 1 Kings ii, 89; xv, 2, 10, 13; 1 Chron. ii, 48; iii, 2; vii, 15, 16; viii, 29; ix, 35; xi, 48; xii, 6, 7; xxvii, 16; 2 Chron. xi, 20, 21, 22, xv, 16). See MACAATH.

Maach'ath (Deut. iii, 14). Maich'athites (Josh. xii, 5; xili, 15, 18) in the second occurrence it should be Macaath; 2 Sam. xxiii, 34; 2 Kings xviii, 23; 1 Chron. iv, 19; Jer. xi, 8). See MACAATH.

Ma'īdāl (Heb. Medad, מֶדָד, ornamental; Sept. Mediōn), one of the "sons of Bani who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra x, 34). B.C. 459.

Mal'dāi'ah (Heb. Medadah, מֶדָדָה, ornament of Jehoreph; Sept. Medida, Vulg. Medidahu), one of the priests who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii, 5); evidently the same with the Moaddah (Heb. Medadah, מֶדָדָה, feticular of Jehoreph; Sept. Maddai, Vulg. Medida), whose son Pitali is mentioned in verse 17 (where some connection with one Miemini is obscurely noted); the true pointing being perhaps מֵעָדָה, Medadah, which will make both forms coincide. B.C. 556.

Ma'ā' (Heb. Maay,' מָע, perhaps conquesteate; Sept. has two names, 'l̄uyq, 'Aen, the first syllable of the former being apparently taken from the last of the preceding name Gidah; Vulg. Maai), one of the priests appointed to the music at the celebration of the completion of the walls of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. xii, 36). B.C. 446.

Ma'le'h-acrab'ām (Heb. Meqbalh'-A'krab'im, מַכְּלֶה-אָכְרֹבִּים, the ascent of the scorpians, i.e. scorp-ion-hill; in Numb. xxxiv, 4, Septus. anibamis A'robind, Auth. Vers. "the ascent of Akrabim") in Jos. xv, 5, ἀνιβασίας Ἀσκόρβιος, in Judg. i, 36, ἀνιβασίας Aσκόρβιος, on the going up to Akrabim; Vulg. every-where ascensio scorpiones, a pass on the southeaster border of Palestine. See ACRABIM.

Ma'le'h-adum'mim (Heb. Meqbalh'-A'dum'mim, מַכְּלֶה-אפִּדָמִים, ascens of Adummin; Sept. ἀνιβασίας Αφαδομίμ, [also ἀφαδομίς and ἀφανομίδαις] Adum'im, Vulg. ascens Adummin, Auth. Vers. "the going up of Adummin", a dangerous pass near Gildad (Jos. xv, 7; xviii, 17). See Adummin.

Ma'an, John, a French historian and theologian, was born at Mâa-k near the opening of the 17th century; was prebend of Tours in 1648; official and grand-vicar to the archbishop of Tours in 1651, and died about 1667. His works are Antiquis Casibus reserati in diecis Tu-ronaenis (1648, 4to), written by order of the bishop of Tours: Sancta et Metropolitana Ecclesia Turonensis, nucleum pontificum suorum ornatn virtutibus, etc. (1667). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, n. v.

Ma'ani (Maasv v. r. Bous), the ancestor of several who had married Gentile wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 34); evidently the Bashi (q. v.) of the Heb. list (Ezra x, 39).

Ma'arakh (Heb. Maarakh, מָרַּך, desolation; Sept. Maroņņ̄s, Vulg. Mararch), a place in the mountains of Judah, mentioned between Gedor and Beth-anath (Jos. xv, 59). De Sauley suggests a place which he calls Kharetel-Merassas, south-east of Jerusalem (Narrati-tes, ii, 17); and Schwarz declares it is a village called 'Marur, west of Jerusalem (Polem, p. 107); both far from the indications of the text, which require a locality north of Hebron (Keil's Comment., ad loc.). It may be represented by the ruins marked as Mrsa'is on Van de Velde's Map (1658), on the road from Hebron to Bethlehem, about half way between Bethany and Solomon's Pool at Urtas; but on the second edition of his Map (1665) this place disappears, and we have in the required region unappropriated only the ruins Misiron, on a little stream just north of Kutin, evidently the "ruined tower called Merrina, seen by him on the high ground south of wady Arabu" (Memoriam, p. 247).

Maaseiah (Heb. Moseyjush, מְזוֹשְׁעָה, or [1 Chron. xv, 18, 20; xxi, 1; 2 Chron. xxvii, 7; xxxiv, 8; Jer. xxv, 4], Moseyjush'ka, מְזוֹשְׁעָה'ק, the work of Je- koreah; Sept. Manass, with many slight various readings), the name of several men.

2. One of the Levites of the second class, appointed porters of the Temple under David (1 Chron. xxv, 18), and also musicians "with psalteries upon Alamoth" (ver. 20).
B.C. 1043.

3. A chieftain in the time of Uzziah, who had charge of the military in a subordinate rank (2 Chron. xxvii, 11).
B.C. 806.

4. The "king's son," killed by Zichri, the Ephraim- itiah hero, in the invasion of Judah by Pekah, king of Israel, during the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii, 7). The personage thus designated is twice mentioned in connection with the "governor of the city" (1 Kings xxii, 26; 2 Chron. xxviii, 29), and appears to have held an office of importance at the Jewish court (perhaps acting as an aide-de-camp during the kingship), just as the queen dowager was honored with the title of "king's mother" (compare 2 Kings xxiv, 12 with Jer. xxxix, 2), or gebirâ, i.e. "mistress," or "powerful lady." See MAACHAI. For the conjecture of Geiger, see JOASH, 4. Perhaps, however, the individual here referred to was literally one of the sons of Ahaz. B.C. c. 778.

5. The "governor of the city," one of those sent by king Josiah to repair the Temple (2 Chron. xxxix, 8).
B.C. 623. The date and rank render it not improbable that he was the Maaseiah (Heb. Meshchechok, מֶשְׁכֵּהוֹק, whose name is Jehdorek, Sept. Manosan, v. r. Manos, etc.), the father of Neriah, and grandfather of Baruch and Seraijah, which latter were two persons of note to whom Jeremiah had recourse in his divine communications (Jer. xxxii, 12; li, 59); and in that case he is likewise probably identical with MAALCHI, the son of Azzai, father of Ner, in Christ's maternal genealogy (Luke iii, 28).

6. The son of Shallum, apparently a priest, since he had a chamber in the Temple, and was one of its custodians (Jer. xxxiv, 4).
B.C. 606.

7. The father of the priest Zephaniah or Zebediah, which latter was twice sent by the king with a message of inquiry to Jeremiah, and was denounced by the prophet for falsely encouraging the people (Jer. xxxii. 12; li, 59): and in that case he is likewise probably identical with MAALCHI, the son of Azzai, father of Ner, in Christ's maternal genealogy (Luke iii, 28).

8. Son of Ithiel and father of Kolaijah, a Benjamite, one of whose descendants resided at Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. xi, 7).
B.C. long ante 586.

One of the descendants of Judah who resided at Jerusalem after the captivity: he was the son of Baruch, and his genealogy is traced back to one Shilioni (Neh. xi, 5).
B.C. 586. In the corresponding narrative of 1 Chron. ix, 5, apparently the same person is called MAALCHI.

9. One of the priests of the kindred of Jeshua, who agreed to divorce their Gentile wives after the captivity (Ezra x, 18).
B.C. 459.

10. Another priest, one of the "sons" of Harim, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra x, 21). B.C. 586. The name is that of a priest (apparently a Levite) who formed one of the chorus that celebrated the completion of the new city walls (Neh. xii, 42).
B.C. 446.

11. Still another priest, of the "sons" of Pashur, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 22).
B.C. 459. Perhaps the same with one of the priests who celebrated with trumpets the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii, 41).
B.C. 446.

12. An Israelite, of the "sons" of Pashath-woah, who divorced his Gentile wife after the Babylonian captivity (Ezra x, 30).
B.C. 459.

13. The son of Ananiah, and father of Azariah, which last name is not found among the usual names of the priests resident at Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. iii, 28).
B.C. ante 446.

14. One of the principal Israelites who stood on Ezra's right hand while he read and expounded the law to the people (Neh. viii, 4). B.C. cir. 410. He is perhaps identical with one of the popular priests who joined in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. xii, 25).
B.C. 410.

15. One of the priests who assisted the Levites in expounding the law to the people as it was read by Ezra (Neh. viii, 7).
B.C. cir. 410.

Mallela'el (Heb. Masse, מַשֶּה, or, as it probably should be pointed, Masse'el, מַסֶּה, worker, or perhaps contracted for Masseiah; Sept. Manas v. r. Manesia; Vulg. Massore), the son of Adiel, a descendant of Immer, and one of the priests resident at Jerusalem at or after the captivity (1 Chron. ix, 12).
B.C. prob. 586.

Mal'chias (Manasse, the son of Sedeck and father of Baruch (Bar. i, 1); evidently the same as MAASEIAH (Jer. lii, 59), i.e. q. v.)

Mal'ath (Mola'd, of unknown, but prob. Heb. origin), a person named as the son of Mattathias and father of Naggai (Nagai, Mattathias' brother-in-law, Luke iii, 26); but, as no such name occurs in the pedigree in the O. T., and as it would here unduly extend the time of the lineage, we may reasonably conjecture this name has been accidentially interpolated from the Mattath of ver. 24. (See Dr. Barrett, in Clarke's Commentary, ad loc.)

Mal'che (Heb. Mele, מֶלֶךְ, westph; Sept. Mas, the first named of the three sons of Ram, the son of Jerahmeel, of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 5).
B.C. post 658.

Mal'chus (Heb. Mosesj, מְזוֹשְׁעָה, Neh. x, 8, or Moseyjush, מְזוֹשְׁעָה, 1 Chron. xxiv, 18, strength [or perch. rather consolation], from the Arabic] of Jekoreh; Sept. respectively Maaazin and Mazzaâk [v. r. Massan; Vulg. respectively Massius and Massius], the name of two priests.

1. The head of the last of the twenty-four sacerdotal "courses" as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxiv, 18).
B.C. 1014.

2. One of the priests who signed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. vi, 8). B.C. cir. 410. "From the coincidence between many of the names of the priests in this as in the earlier twenty-four courses established by David, of those who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. xii), it would seem either that these names were hereditary in families, or that they were applied to the families themselves. This is evidently the case with the names of the 'heads of the people' enumerated in Neh. x, 14-27."

Mab'dal' (Muff deviations), one of the "sons of Mazon" who divorced their Gentile wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 34); evidently the BESALAH (q. v.) of the hew list (Ezra x, 35).

Mabillon, Jean, a celebrated Benedictine prebendary, and one of the most distinguished men of the 17th century, was born at St. Pierre-mont, in the diocese of Rheims, Nov. 28, 1602, studied at the college of Rheims, and joined the congregation of St. Maur in 1651. He began his literary career by assisting D'Achery in his labors upon his vast historic recueil entitled Spicilegium, and by an edition of the works of St. Bernard, "which attracted the notice of ecclesiastical scholars, and furnished a sure pledge of the value of his future labors" (Dowling). In 1668 he came forward with a part of his original production, Acta Scriptorum Ordinis S. Franchii (completed in 1702), one of the greatest historical works.

extent. He now became the general favorite of ecclesiastic students, and soon was brought to the notice also of his sovereign, Louis XIV, who sent him on literary missions, as the result of which we have from him Museum Italicum (1689), a kind of antiquarian itinerary of Italy. Besides descriptions of the towns and their attractions, it contains a detailed account of the ecclesiastical history and paleography; also a very explicit commentary on the ritual of the various services, or liturgy, and rites of the Roman Church. (He had previously published De Liberis Gallorum Libri tres [1685], in which he compares the Gallican with the Mozarabic liturgy). Another work of great importance from the pen of Mabillon is the Lettres et Écrits sur les Études Monas-tiques, containing a curious controversy between the abbe De Rancé, the founder of the order of the Trappists (p. v.) and the Benedictines. De Rancé, in his ascetic enthusiasm, had forbidden his monks all monastic studies, and, indeed, all reading except the Breviary and a few monastic tracts. The rest of the clergy, both secular and regular, took the alarm, and Mabillon was requested to defend monastic studies and learning as perfectedly compatible with piety and religious discipline, as the Benedictine order had fully proved. Mabillon promptly complied with the request, and published his Traité in 1691. It was received with great applause, and was at once translated into Latin and other languages.
See Rancé for the reply. His fame spread rapidly, and he was made a canon of the royal church in 1691, and a member of the French Academy in 1701. He was chosen member of the Academy of Inscriptions. In 1703 he came before the public with the first volume of his chef-d'oeuvre, Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti. Henceforth, until the day of his death (Dec. 27, 1707), Mabillon faithfully applied himself to the completion of this work, which all critics are agreed is "among the most important works which have been written on the history of the Church" (Dowling). It should certainly be found on the shelves of every real student of Church History. It commences with the year 490—that of the birth of St. Benedict—and goes down to 1157 (covering in all 6 vols. folio. Mabillon himself completed vols. i.-iv., extending to 1066; Mas-set completed vol. v [published in 1718], and Martene vol. vi [published in 1789]; for the different editions, see Cellerier, Histoire des Actaures sacrees, iv, 498). It contains an account of St. Benedict, discusses his rules, and everything in any way pertaining to the order.
The work, besides including a somewhat complete history of the secular affairs of the times, contains a minute account of the doctrines, the ceremonies, the controversies of the Church, the liturgy, the writings of each individual whose life is depicted. Of the manner in which the work is done we will let Dowling (introd. to the Curs. Study of Eccles. History, p. 144 sq.) speak. "His (Mabillon's) unbounded learning, and his perspicacity and comprehensive mind, enabled him to discover new truths, and detect and expose inveterate errors. His amiable moderation and unaffected candor introduced into the discussion of ecclesiastical subjects a better tone and spirit. But this was not the full extent of the services which he rendered to Church History.
The monastic spirit could not rest on the imitation of independence, nor his religious peculiarities make him feel as a vulgar controversialist. He was the most prominent of a new race of scholars, who communicated to the whole subject a different character; who separated it from polemical theology, and assumed as a first principle that its subject-matter was not controversy, but facts.
It was a new thing to see a congregation of monks taking a lead in a literary movement; but such was the case. The genius of Mabillon did much to purify and enable Church History. Excited by his example and precepts, the French Benedictines devoted themselves in an admirable spirit to the cultivation of ecclesiastical learning, and distinguished themselves in the republic of letters by the publication of a number of critical, philological, and antiquarian works connected with such studies, not more remarkable for their erudition than for their moderation and candor."

Mabillon, by the intended publication of a treatise, De Cultu Sanctorum ignotorum, came near being involved in a hot controversy with the authorities of his Church.
The book, which aimed to point out some abuses contrary to the worship of relics, was to have been published imminently, and when it was secured by the Congregation of the Index, and placed among the forbidden ones.
He quietly submitted to the exceptions of the authorities, and prepared a new edition purged from the objectionable passages. It is said that his new publisher, whose editio non temere nec proprio arbitrio a me facta est, sed ad Eius nutum et imperium, penes quem residet summa principendi auctoritas", in return for his ready submission was he to be rewarded by the cardinal's hat, but the intended honor due to too long a term of any service in Mabillon's terrestrial course. Mabillon wrote also De Re Diplomatica libri sex, accedunt Commentarium de critiquis Regum Francorum Palatii: Veterum Scripturum varia Specimina, etc., a work much esteemed.

These and other later works were collected under the Christians of the early centuries. Among them the most important are:

1. MACARIUS EGYPTIUS, or, as he is sometimes surnamed, the Great, or the Elder, was born, according to Eusebius, in Upper Egypt, about the year 300. He was a disciple of St. Antonius (some say of St. Ephrem), and while yet a youth, in accordance with his asceticism, which won for him the surname of ἄγιοςγύρως.
At the age of thirty he entered upon a life of asceticism, in the wilderness of Scete or Scetis, a part of the great Libyan desert, and there he remained until about 340, when he was called to Syria. He died about 390. Pallladius relates several extraordinary miracles said to have been performed by this saint; among others, a resurrection which he accomplished for the purpose of confounding a heretic. During the persecution of the Egyptian monks by the Arian bishop Lucas of Alexandria, in the reign of Valens, Macarius was banished to an island of the Nile, but allowed to return afterwards. There is yet in Libya, according to Tischendorf (Reise in d. Orilent), a convent which bears his name. He left 50 homilies (Greek ed. Morel, Paris, 1539; J. G. Frutius, Leipzig, historum, collecta a rectori Benedicto Aseniiis, quatuor Hactenus (Rome, 1661, 2 vols. 4to); and a homily, ἡμnums οἰλοκρίνειας εὐαγγελίων καὶ ἀποκρίνων (J. Tottius, Literar. Ital. Traj. 1696; Cave, Hist. Lit. i.; Gallandii, vii), which latter, however, is by some ascribed to a monk entitled Monseme (Federic. Monseme, De ecclesia. II, cent. vit, p. 2, chap. iii.) says of him and his work: “Perhaps,
before all others who wrote on practical piety, the preference is due to Macarius, the Egyptian monk; from what, after deducting some superstitious notions, and what savors too much of Origenism, we may collect a beautiful picture of real piety.” He is commemorated by the Romish Church Jan. 12, and by the Greek Jan.

2. MACARIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, also called ὁ πρωτοτι-θητος, was a contemporary of the preceding, was by trade a baker, but became subsequently a disciple of St.
Antonius, having been baptized when about forty years of age. He also embraced an ascetic life, and became the spiritual adviser of over 5000 monks. Palladius relates a number of miracles said to have been wrought by him. He was likewise one of the victims of the persecution instituted by Valens, and died, according to Ti-lemont (Mémoires, viii, 626), in 894, but according to Fabriacus (Bibluth. Graec. viii, 865), in 404, aged nearly a hundred years. He is said to have been the author of some regulations for monks contained in the Codex regulorum ecclesiae, or rule of the Egyptian monks (Rome, 1661, 2 vols. 4to); and a homily, ἡμνοὺς ὀιλοκρίνειας eὐαγγελίων καὶ ἀποκρίνων (J. Tottius, Histor. erar. Ital. Traj. 1696; Cave, Hist. Lit. i.; Gallandii, vii), which latter, however, is by some ascribed to a monk entitled Monseme (Federic. Monseme, De ecclesia. II, cent. vit, p. 2, chap. iii.) says of him and his work: “Perhaps,
before all others who wrote on practical piety, the preference is due to Macarius, the Egyptian monk; from beautiful picture of real piety.” He is commemorated by the Romish Church Jan. 12, and by the Greek Jan.

3. MACARIUS OF ANTIOCH, a patriarch in the Church of Antioch in the 7th century, is noted for his aposthema at the third Constantinopolitan Council (A.D. 680-81).
Of his belief in the doctrine “that Christ’s will was that of a God-man (οἱδαντικρύπτης).” See Monothelites.
He and his followers (known as Macariani) were banished on this account. His travels were written down by his attendant archdeacon, Paul of Apello, in Arabic, and were published in an English dress in 1829-37, in 2 vols.
4to. See Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. and Myth.- oloi, ii, 875 (4); Milman’s Gobion, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, iv, 555.

4. MACARIUS OF IRELAND flourished about the close of the 9th century. He is said to have propagated in France the tenet, afterwards maintained by Averroes, that one individual intelligence or soul performed the spiritual and rational functions in all the human race.

5. MACARIUS OF JERUSALEM, There were two bishops by this name; one flourished in the 4th century, the other in the 6th. The former became bishop A.D. 313 or 314, and died in or before A.D. 333. He was present at the Council of Nice, and is said to have taken part in the disputations against the Arians. The latter was elected bishop A.D. 544, and was appointed by the emperor Justinian I, because he was accused of avowing the obnoxious opinions of Origen, and Eutychianus was appointed instead. Macarius was, however, after a time, reinstated (about A.D. 564), and died about 574. In his De incarnatione Corpus Praevelia, he extant in Ms. See Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. i, 876.

Macasar, the most southern portion of Cebes, situated in lat. 4° 35′—5° 50′ S., and long. 119° 25′— 120° 30′ E., and traversed by a lofty chain of mountains, formerly the greatest naval power among the Malya states, is divided into the Dutch possessions and Malya proper; the latter, of little importance, is governed by a native king, who pays tribute to the Netherlands.
The Portuguese were the first Europeans to form a settlement in Macasar, but they were supplanted by the Dutch in 1641. There are many cotton factories there; their industry attained to supreme power. In 1811 it fell into the hands of the British, who in 1814 defeated the king of Boni, and compelled him to give up the regalia of Macasar. In 1816 it was restored to the Dutch, and continues to enjoy a fair share of the mercantile prosperity of the East Indies, the distinguished Dutch missions in the East Asia, and Christian missions, have been largely sustained. The natives are among the most civilized and enterprising, but also the most greedy of the Malay race.
See Malay. They carry on a considerable trade in tortoise-shell and edible nuts, grow abundance of rice, and raise a great number of horses, cattle, sheep, and goats; fishing is also one of the principal employments.
They are chiefly adherents to Mohammedanism, which secured its hold in the Malay Archipelago in the 18th century, and to this day continues to proselyte the Maccasars for the religion of the Crescent. For the difficulties in the way towards Christianizing the Malay race, see Malay Archipelago.

Macaulay, Aulay, an English divinity, was born near the opening of the 18th century, and was educated at the University of Glasgow. He was minister of the church and parish of Carroz, Dunbartonshire, and died May 28, 1689. He published a sermon on the Perpetu-Advantages of Sunday Schools (1792, 8vo); also other

Macaulay, Zachary, F.R.S., an English philosophysicist, of Scottish descent, born in 1758, father of the historian, a merchant, fought forty years with William Wilberforce in the promotion of the British Emancipa-tion movement. He died May 13, 1838. See Lond. Gent.
Mag. (March, 1838, p. 825; Dec. 1838, p. 478); Thomas,

Macaulay, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister of note, was born in 1771, and was educated at Union College, where he afterwards filled a professor’s chair. He subsequently entered the ministry, and died May 11, 1852, while pastor of the Murray Street Church in New York City.

Macbride, John David, D.C.L., F.S.A., an emitent English Oriental scholar and author, was born in Norfolk, England, in 1786, and was educated at Ex-er College, Oxford, where he became a fellow. He was in 1818 appointed principal of Magdalen Hall, and nominated to the readership in Arabic, and kept these positions until his death in 1868. His principal works are, Pistachëm, or Harmony of the Gospel (used in Oxford University): Oriental Meditations.—Lectures on the Articles of the United Church of England and Ireland (1853): Annual for 1868, p. 443.

Mac’Cabeae (MacCabeae), a title (usually in the plural οἱ διαφόροι, “the MacCabees”), which was originally the surname of Judas, one of the sons of Matthias (see below, § iii), but was afterwards extended to the heroic family of which he was one of the noblest representatives, and in a still wider sense to the Palestinian martyrs in the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes [see 4 Maccabees], and even to the Alexandrine Jews who suffered for their faith at an earlier time. See 3 Maccabees. In the following account of the Maccabean family and revolution we shall endeavor to fill up this interesting interval of inspiration.

I. The Name.—The original term Maccabœus (Μακκαβαῖος) has been variously derived. Some have maintained that it was derived from the banner of the tribe of Dan, which contained the last letters of the names of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Others imagine that it was formed from the combination of the initial letters of the Hebrew sentence, "Who among the gods is like unto thee, Jehovah?" (Exod. xv, 11; Hebrew יְהֹוָה, יְהֹוָה, יְהֹוָה), which is supposed to have been inscribed upon the banner of the patriots; or, again, of the initials of the simply descriptive title, "Matthathias, a priest, the son of Johanan." But, even if the custom of forming such words was in use among the Jews at this early time, it is obvious that such a title would not be an individual title in the first instance, as Maccabee undoubtedly was (1 Macc. ii, 3), and still remains among the Jews (Raphail, Hist. of the Jews, i, 249). Moreover, the orthography of the word in Greek and Syriac (Ewald, Geschicht. iv, 852, note) points to the form מַכַּבָּא, and not מַכַּבָּא. Another derivation has been proposed, which, although direct evidence of wanting, seems satisfactory. According to this, the word is formed from מִלְכָּה, "a hammer" (like Malachi, Ewald, iv, 853, n.), giving a sense not altogether unlike that in which Charles Martel derived a surname from his favorite weapon, and still more like the Mallois Scotorum and Mallois Hereticorum of the Middle Ages.

Although the name Maccabee has gained the widest currency, that of Amonomaun, or Amonomus, is the proper name of the family. The origin of this name also has been disputed; but the obvious derivation from Chasmon, (Amonomaus; comp. Genenius, Theol. p. 554 c), great-grandfather of Matthias, seems certainly correct. How it came to pass that a man, otherwise obscure, gave his name to the family, cannot now be discovered; but no stress can be laid upon this difficulty, nor upon the fact that in Jewish prayers (Hersfeld, Geschicht. J u d. i, 264) Matthias himself is called Hasmoneus. In Psa. lxxv, 29 we meet with a word מַכַּבָּא, to the supposed singular of which, מָכַבָּא, the name in question is commonly referred. In this case it might have been given to the priest of the course of Joarib to signify that he was a wealthy or a powerful person. In Josh. xv, 27 we find a town in the tribe of Judah called מַכַּבָּא, from which this name might equally be derived. Hersfeld's proposed derivation from מַכַּבָּא, "to temper steel," is fanciful and groundless. The word in the first instance appears more like a family than a personal name. The later Hebrew form is מַכַּבָּא, See Zipper, Benennung der Makkabäer (in the Rom-Chananiah, 1860). See Amonomaun.

of the individuals of the Family.—1. The first of this family who attained distinction was the aged priest Matthathias, who dwelt at Modin, a city west of Jerusalem and near the sea, of which the site has yet been but partly identified by modern research. He was the son of John, the son of the family of Asmonæus, as Josephus tells us, and was himself the father of five sons—John, otherwise called Gadiss; Simon, called Thasi; Judas, called Maccabæus; Eleazar, called Avram; and Jonathan, surnamed Apphus. Ewald remarks that Simon and John were the heads of the family. After the expulsion of Antiochus Epiphanes from Egypt, the Romans, that monarch proceeded to vent his rage and indignation on the Jews. B.C. 168. See Antiochus. He massacred vast numbers of them in Jerusalem on the Sabbath, took the women captives, and built a fortress on Mount Zion, which he used as a central position for harassing the people around. He ordered one Athenæus to instruct the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Samaria in the rites of the Grecian religion, with a view to abolishing all vestiges of the Jewish worship. Having succeeded in bringing the Samaritans to renounce their religion, he further went to Jerusalem, where he compelled the observance of all Jewish ceremonies. He obliged the people to eat swine's flesh and wear the Sabbath, and forbad circumcision. The Temple was dedicated to Olympian Jove, and his altar erected upon the altar of burnt-offering, which the first book of Maccabees mentions, setting up of the abomination of desolation. When, therefore, Apelles, the king's officer (Josephus, Ant. xii, 6, 2), came to Modin to put in force the royal edict against the national religion, he made splendid offers to Mattathias if he would comply. The old man, however, not only refused, but publicly declared his determination to live and die in the religion of his fathers; and when a certain Jew came forward openly to sacrifice in obedience to the edict, he slew him upon the altar. He slew, moreover, the king's commissioner, and destroyed the altar. Then, officers intrusted with the task of securing peace with a view to recruiting his exhausted finances (1 Mac. iii, 27-31). He therefore left Lyasias, one of his highest lieutenants, to take charge of his kingdom, from the River Euphrates to the confines of Egypt, and having intrusted Antiochus with the task of securing peace with Lyasias to conquer Judea and destroy the nation of the Jews, he went into Persia. The successes of Judas called for immediate attention. The governor of Jerusalem was urgent in his entreaties for assistance; Lyasias therefore sent an army of 20,000 men, under the command of Nicanaus and Gorgias, into Judea. It was followed by another of the same number, with an addition of 700 horses, under Ptolemy Macron, the son of Dorymenes, as commander-in-chief. The united forces encamped in the plains of Emmaus. To oppose this formidable host, only a thing was done by the Jews. Judas, as Samuel had done a thousand years before at a like period of national calamity, hastened and prayed, and, in compliance with the Mosaic injunction, advised those who were newly married, or had built houses, and the like, to return to their homes. This reduced his number to one half. The heroic spirit of Judas, however, rose against every difficulty, and he marched towards Emmaus. B.C. 166. Having heard that Gorgias had been dispatched with a force of 6000 men to surprise him in the passes by night, he instantly resolved to attack the encampment with all his forces, and expected, not unexpectedly, and completely routed them; so that when Gorgias returned, baffled and weary, he was dismayed at finding his camp in flames. In the brief struggle which ensued the Jews were victorious, and took much spoil. The year following, Lyasias gathered together an army of 60,000 chosen men, with 5000 horses, went up in person to the hill-country of Judea, and pitched his camp at a place called Bethsura, the Bethzeu of the Old Test. Here Judas met him with 10,000 men, attacked his vanguard, and slew 6000 of them, whereupon Lyasias retreated with the remainder of his to the city of Jerusalem. After this series of triumphs Judas proceeded to Jerusalem. There he found the sanctuary desolate, shrubs growing in the courts of it, and the chambers of the priests thrown down; so he set to work at once to purify the holy place and restore the worship of God (1 Mac. iv, 36, 41-38). The Jews were now in a position to express their national independence (1 Mac. ii, 66). The energy and skill of "The Maccabees" (6 Macc.36,706), as Judas is often called in 2 Mac. fully justified his father's preference. It appears that he had already taken a prominent part in the first revolution against the mountains (2 Mac. v, 37), where Mattathias is not mentioned at all, and receiving the chief command he devoted himself to the task of combining for common action those who were still faithful to the religion of their fathers (2 Mac. viii, 1). His first enterprises were night-attacks and sudden surprises, which were best suited to the troops at his disposal (2 Mac. viii, 6, 7), and, when his men were encouraged by these means, he ventured on more important operations, and met Apollonius (1 Mac. iii, 10-12), the king's general, who had gathered a large army at Samaria, of which place he had been governor, in the open field. He totally defeated him and slew him. He then divided the spoils, and took the sword of Apollonius for a trophy, which he used all his life afterwards in battle. Exasperated at the defeat of Apollonius, Seron (1 Mac. iii, 13-24) who was general of the army of Cote-Syria, got together a large army, composed partly of mercenaries against the Jews as far as Bethoron, where he pitched his camp. This place, which had been rendered memorable many centuries before as the site of Joshua's great victory over the allied forces of the Canaanites, was destined to become the seat of the war, when, by the intervention of a small band of Jews, spent and hungry, against the disciplined troops of Syria. Seron was completely overthrown, and his army scattered. Antiochus, though greatly enraged at this dishonor to his arms, was nevertheless compelled, by the condition of his treasury, to undertake an expedition to Armenia and Persia with a view to recruiting his exhausted finances (1 Mac. iii, 27-31). He therefore left Lyasias, one of his highest lieutenants, to take charge of his kingdom, from the River Euphrates to the confines of Egypt, and having intrusted Antiochus with the task of securing peace with Lyasias to conquer Judea and destroy the nation of the Jews, he went into Persia. The successes of Judas called for immediate attention. The year following, Lyasias gathered together an army of 60,000 chosen men, with 5000 horses, went up in person to the hill-country of Judea, and pitched his camp at a place called Bethsura, the Bethzair of the Old Test. Here Judas met him with 10,000 men, attacked his vanguard, and slew 6000 of them, whereupon Lyasias retreated with the remainder of his to the city of Jerusalem. After this series of triumphs Judas proceeded to Jerusalem. There he found the sanctuary desolate, shrubs growing in the courts of it, and the chambers of the priests thrown down; so he set to work at once to purify the holy place and restore the worship of God (1 Mac. iv, 36, 41-38). The Jews were now in a position to express their national independence (1 Mac. i, 59; Grimm on 1 Mac. iv, 59). In commemoration of this cleansing of the Temple, the Jews afterwards kept for eight days annually a festival which was called Lights, and was known as the Feast of Dedication (John x, 22, 23). Settled, therefore, Judas, in the year of the jubilee; having fortified the city of Mount Zion, and placed a garrison at Xuthrasa, made an expedition into Idumea. The Syrians meanwhile, frustrated in their efforts against Judas, turned their attention to Galilee and the provinces beyond Jordan. A large army from Tyre and Ptolemais attacked the north, and Timotheus laid waste Gilgal, whereupon Judas determined to divide his army into three. He himself, with Jonathan, led 8000 men across the Jordan into Gilgal; his brother Simon he sent with 8000 into Galilee; and the rest he left behind under the command of Joseph, the son of Zacharias, and Azarias, for the protection of Judea, with strict injunctions to act only on the defensive. These orders, however, they improvidently violated by an attack upon the sea-port Jamnia, where they met with a signal repulse. But the Maccabees in Gilgal and Galilee with difficulty put out the flame, and saved the cities. Antiochus Epiphanes, meanwhile, had died in his Persian expedition, B.C. 164, and Lyasias immediately pro-called his son, Antiochus Eupator, king, the true heir, Demetrius, the son of Seleucus, being a hostage at Rome. One afternoon, in the middle of the siege, a messenger from the Jews. He assembled an enormous army of 100,000 men and 82 elephants, and proceeded to invest Bethsura. The city defended itself gallantly. Judas marched from Jerusalem to relieve it, and slew about 6000 of the Syrac- sian army. He was joined by Jonathan and Simon, sons of his father, who sacrificed himself by rushing under an elephant which he supposed carried the young king, and stabbing it in the belly, so that it fell upon him. The Jews, however, were compelled to retreat to Jerusalem, whereupon Bethsura surrendered, and the royal army advanced. The hero, however, the siege was re-စိန့်း with vigor, but the defenders of the city suffered from strictness of provisions, because of its being the sabbatical year. They would therefore have had to surrender; but Lysias was recalled to Antioch by reports of an insurrection under Philip, who, at the death of Antiochus, had been appointed guardian of the young king. He was consequently glad to make proposals of peace, which were readily accepted by the Jews. He had no sooner, however, effected an entrance into the city than he violated his engagements by destroying the fortifications and immediately set out a great army for the north. There Demetrius Soter, the lawful heir to the Syrian throne, encountered him, and, after a struggle, Antiochus and Lysias were slain, leaving Demetrius in undisputed possession of the kingdom.

Meneaus, the high-priest at this time, had purchased his elevation to that rank by selling the sacred vessels of the Temple. Hoping to escape with his own life, he joined himself to the army of Lysias, but was slain by com- mander of Antiochus. Onias, the son of the high-priest whom Meneaus had supplanted, fled into Egypt, and Alexius or Jacinthus, not of the high-priestly family, was raised to the dignity. Shortly after, by taking this man under his protection, Demetrius hoped to weaken the power of the Jew. He dispatched Bacchides with Alexius to Jerusalem, with orders to slay the Mac- cabees and their followers. Jerusalem yielded to one who came with the authority of the high-priest, but Alexius murdered sixty of the elders as soon as he got them into his power. Bacchides also committed sundry atrocities in other parts. No sooner, however, had he left Judas than Maccabeus again rose against Alexius, and drove him to Antioch, where he endeavored as far as possible to secure the city for the king. When Demetrius sent Nicanor with a large army to reinstate Al- cimus, and when he came to Jerusalem, which was still held by the Syrians, he endeavored to get Judas into his power by stratagem, but the plot being discovered, he was compelled to meet him in the field. They join- ed battle, Nicanor was overthrown, and the multitude of men; the rest fled to the stronghold of Zion. Here he revenged himself with great cruelty, and threatened yet further barbarities unless Judas was delivered up. As the people refused to betray their champion, Nicanor was again compelled to flight. He pitched his camp ominously enough in Bethhoron; his troops were com- pletely routed, and he himself slain. The next act of Judas was to make an alliance with the Romans, who entered into it eagerly; but no sooner was it contracted than the king made one more determined effort for the subjection of Palestine. He withdrew the Maccabees, with all the flower of his army, to a place called Berea or Bethzetho, apparently near Jerusalem. The Roman alliance seems to have alienated many of the extreme Jewish party from Judas (Midr. Hahamah, quoted by Raphall, Hist. of Jews, 1, 325). Moreover, the terror inspired by the defeat at Bethhoron deserted all but 800 followers, who would fare had dismayed him from encountering the enemy. His reply was worthy of him: "If our time be come, let us die manfully for our brethren, and let us not stain our hon- our." He fought with such valor that the right wing, commanded by Bacchides, was repulsed and driven to a hill called Azotus or Azur, but the left wing doubled upon the pursuers from behind, so that they were shot down as they fought. The battle lasted from morning till night. Judas was killed, and his fol- lowers, overborne by numbers, were dispersed. His brothers Jonathan and Simon received his body by a treaty from the enemy, and buried it in the sepulchre of their father at Hebron. B.C. 161.

The history of the Maccabees, a hero worthy of being ranked with the noblest of his country, and conspicuous among all, in any age or clime, who have drawn the sword of liberty in defence of their dearest and most sacred rights.

After the death of Judas the patriotic party seems to have been in a state of confusion. A short time after this it was only by the pressure of unparalleled sufferings that they were driven to renew the conflict. For this purpose they offered the command to Jonathan, su- named Apphbus, or the weary, the youngest son of Mattathias. The policy of Jonathan shows the great- ness of the loss involved in his brother's death. He was glad to seek safety from Bacchides among the pools and marshes of the Jordan (1 Macc. ix, 42), whither he was pursued by him. At the same time, also, his brother John was killed by a neighboring Arab tribe. Jon- athan took occasion to revenge his brother's death upon a marriage-party to which he may in waiting while he pulsed an attack of Bacchides, and slew a thousand of his men. At this point Alcimus died, and Bacchides, after fortifying the strong towns of Judaea, returned to Antioch; but upon Jonathan again emerging from his hiding-place, Bacchides came back with a formidable army, and was for some time exposed to the double attacks of Jonathan, till weary of this mode of fighting, or for other reasons, he thought it fit to conclude a peace with him, and returned to his master. B.C. 158. The Maccabees was thus left in possession of Judaea (1 Macc. ix, 58), and had long enjoyed the hard-earned opportunity of consolidating his position; for there sprang up one Alexander Balas, who was believed to be a son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and laid claim to the throne of Syria. Demetrius and Alexander mutually competed for the alliance of Jonathan, but Alexander was successful, having offered him the high-priesthood, and sent him a purple robe and a golden crown—the insignia of royalty—and promised him exemption from tribute as well as other advantages. Jonathan thereupon assumed the high-priesthood, and became the friend of Alexander, with whom he met in Egypt, where, usurping his crown and allied himself (B.C. 150) in marriage with Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy Philomet- or, king of Egypt. Jonathan was invited to the wed- ding, and was made much of at court. In return, he at- tacked and defeated Appionius, the general of Demet- rius Nicator, and restored Nicanor. Alexander then asked Joppa, captured Azotus, and destroyed the temple of Dagon. The prosperity, however, of Alexander was of short duration, for Ptolemy, being jealous of his power, marched with a large army against him, and after putting him to flight, seized his crown, and gave his wife to Demetrius. On the other hand, the overthrow of Alexander was speedily followed by the death of Ptole- emy, and Demetrius was left in possession of the throne of Syria. Jonathan, meanwhile, besieged Jerusalem, and, leaving it invested, repaired to Antioch. Demetrius not only welcomed, but entered into a treaty with him, upon terms that greatly augmented the power of the Maccabees. After this Demetrius disbanded the greater part of his army and lessened their pay, which being a course contrary to that pursued by former kings of Syria, who kept up large standing armies in time of peace, created great dissatisfaction. This dissatisfaction of Jonathan writing to him to withdraw his soldiers from the strongholds of Judaea, he not only complied, but was glad to ask for the assistance of 8000 men, who were forthwith sent to Antioch. Here they rendered him signal service in resisting him, and of his own citizens which his behavior to them had arouned. His friendship for Jonathan, however, was soon at an end, and, contrary to his promises, he threatened to make war upon him unless he paid the tribute which previous kings had exacted. This menace might have been carried out had not a formidable antagonist at home arisen in the person of Trypho, who had formerly been a wealthy captain and had espoused the cause of his young son Antiochus Theos. This man attacked Demetrius, defeated him in battle, captured his city, drove him into exile, and placed his crown on the head of Antiochus, B.C. 144. One of the first acts of the new king was to ingratiate himself with Judas, and confirm him in the high priestly office, and appointed him governor over Judea and its provinces, besides showing him other marks of favor. His brother Simon he appointed to be general over the king's forces from what was called the Ladder of Tyre, a mountain lying between the sea-coast between Tyre and Ptolemais, even to the borders of Egypt. Jonathan, in return, rendered good service to Antiochus, and twice defeated the armies of Demetrius. He then proceeded to establish his own power by renewing the treaty with Rome, entering into one also with Lacedaemon, and strengthening the fortifications in Judea. He was destined, however, to fall by treachery, for Trypho, having persuaded him to dismiss a large army he had assembled to support Antiochus, decoyed him into the city of Ptolemais, and then took him prisoner. The Jews immediately accused Simon to the council, and paid a large sum to ransom Jonathan. Trypho, however, took the money, but, instead of releasing Jonathan, put him to death, and then, thinking that the main hindrance to his own ambitious designs was removed, caused Antiochus to be treated in the same manner. Thus fell the third of the illustrious Maccabean race, who distinguished himself nobly in the defence of his country. B.C. 143. When Simon heard of his brother's death he fetched his bones from Baccama, where he had been buried, and had them interred at Modin. Here he erected to his memory a famous monument of a great height, built of white marble, elegantly wrought, near which he placed seven pyramids, for his father and mother and their five sons, the whole being surrounded with a stately portico. For many years afterwards this monument served the purpose of a beacon for sailors, and it was standing in the time of Eusebius. See MOUNT.

4. The last remaining brother of the Maccabae family was thus SIMON, surnamed "Thassi" (Θασσι, Thassic; the meaning of the title is uncertain. Michaelis [Grimm, on 1 Macc. ii.] thinks that it represents the Chaldean θασσω [Thassow], The meaning of the title is uncertain. Michaelis [Grimm, on 1 Macc. ii.] thinks that it represents the Chaldean θασσω [Thassow], Thassos, a city of Thessaly; The meaning of the title is uncertain. Michaelis [Grimm, on 1 Macc. ii.] thinks that it represents the Chaldean θασσω [Thassow], Thassos, a city of Thessaly; as above related, when he heard of the detention of Jonathan in Ptolemais by Trypho, he proceeded hastily to the head of the patriot party who were already beginning to despond, and effectually opposed the progress of the Syracus. His skill in war had been proved in the lifetime of Judas (1 Macc. x. 17-28), and he had taken an active share in the campaigns of Jonathan, when he was intrusted with a distinct command (1 Macc. xi. 59). He was soon enabled to consummate the object for which his family had fought gloriously, but in vain. When Trypho, after having put Jonathan to death, murdered Antiochus, and seized the throne, Simon made overtures to Demetrius II (B.C. 143) against Trypho. He was consequently confirmed in his position of sovereign high-priest. He then turned his attention to establishing the internal peace and security of his kingdom. He fortified Bethsura, Jannia, Joppa, and Gaza, and garrisoned them with Jewish soldiers. The Lacedaemonians sent him a flattering embassage to renew their treaty with him, and sent him a shield of gold of immense value, and ratified his league with that nation. See SPARTAN. He moreover took the citadel of Jerusalem by siege, which up to this time had always been occupied by the Syrian faction; and he had it down, even to the hill on which it was built, with immense labor, that so the Temple might not be exposed to attacks from it. Under the wise government of this member of the Ammesean family Judaea seems to have attained the greatest height of prosperity and freedom she had known for centuries, or even knew afterwards. The writer of the first book of the Maccabees evidently rejoices to remember and record it. "The ancient men," he says, "sat all in the streets, the young woman and the young men put on gorgeous and warlike apparel. He made peace in the land, and Israel rejoiced with great joy. For every man sat under his vine and his fig-tree, and there was none to make them afraid." (xxix, 9, 11, 12). This time of quiet repose Simon employed in administering the government more perfectly, in the high priestly office, and in the judicial law. He also beautified the sanctuary, and refurbished it with sacred vessels.

In the mean time Demetrius had been taken prisoner in an expedition against the Parthians, whereupon his brother Antiochus Sidetes immediately endeavored to overthrow the usurper Trypho. Availing himself of a defection in his troops, he besieged him in Dora, a town upon the sea-coast a little south of Mount Carmel. Simon sent him 2000 chosen men, with arms and money, but Antiochus was not satisfied with this assistance which he remembered the independence of Palestine. He therefore refused to receive them, and dispatched Athenobius to demand the restoration of Joppa, Gaza, and the fortress of Jerusalem, or else the payment of a thousand talents of silver; but when the legate saw the magnificence of the high-priest's palace at Jerusalem, and the Dora, a town upon the sea-coast a little south of Mount Carmel. Simon sent him 2000 chosen men, with arms and money, but Antiochus was not satisfied with this assistance which he remembered the independence of Palestine. He therefore refused to receive them, and dispatched Athenobius to demand the restoration of Joppa, Gaza, and the fortress of Jerusalem, or else the payment of a thousand talents of silver; but when the legate saw the magnificence of the high-priest's palace at Jerusalem, and the rich treasures in his temples, and the cupboards full of gold and silver, he was deeply impressed with the power of Palestine, and as Simon refused to comply with the terms of the king's message, and offered by way of compensation only a hundred talents for the places in dispute, Athenobius was obliged to return disappointed and enraged. Trypho meanwhile escaped from Dora by ship to Othorina, a maritime town in Phoenicia, and Antiochus, having sent a detachment to invade Judea, pursued him in person. The king's armies proceeded to Jannia, and, having seized Cedron and fortified it, Cendebeus made use of that place as a centre from which to annoy the surrounding country. Simon at this time was too old to engage actively in the defence of his native land, and therefore appointed his two eldest sons, Judas and John Hycranus, to succeed him in the command of the forces. They forthwith set themselves at the head of 20,000 men, and marched from Modin to meet the king's general; they utterly discomfited and scattered his host, drove him to Othorina, and thence to Azotus, which they set on fire, and afterwards returned in triumph to Jerusalem. But destruction threatened their house from nearer home; for Pтолемей, the son of Abubus, who had married a daughter of Simon, had obtained the governorship in the district of Samaria, and had plenty of money at his command, aspired to reduce the country under his dominion, and took occasion, upon a visit that Simon paid to that neighborhood, to invite him and two of his sons, with their followers, to a banquet, and then slew them (1 Macc. xvi. 11-18). John alone, whose forces were at Gaza, now survived to carry on the line of the Maccabees, and sustain their glory, B.C. 135. He likewise had been included in the treacherous designs of Ptolomey, but found means to elude them. With the death of Simon the narrative of the first book of the Maccabees concludes.

5. We trace now the fortunes of the next member of the family, JOHN HYCRAUSUS. Having been unanimously proclaimed high-priest and ruler at Jerusalem, his first step was to march against Jericho, and avenge the death of his father and brothers. Ptolomey held there in his power the mother of Hycranus and her sons, the latter of whom he had received in a fortress near Jericho—which Josephus calls Dagon, and Ewald Dokk—he exposed them upon the wall, scourged and tortured them, and threatened to throw them down headlong unless Hycranus would desist from the siege. This had the effect of paralyzing the efforts of Hycranus, and in spite of his heroic mother's entreaties to prosecute it with vigor, and disregard her sufferings, caused him to protest till the approach of the sabbatical year obliged him to raise the siege. Ptolemy, after killing the mother and brethren of Hyrcanus, fled to Philadelphia ("Rabbath, of the children of Ammon"), which is the last we hear of him. It is not easy to see why Miltimans calls this reason of the sabbatical year, which is far within the forty years of the Temple, impossible. Ewald assigns the approach of that year as a reason for the flight of Ptolemy to Zeno, the tyrant of Philadelphia, because it had already raised the price of provisions, so that it became impossible for him to remain. Antiochus meanwhile, alarmed at the energy displayed by the Jews, concluded his operations, took the city of David, and took out of it 3000 talents, which he used for his present needs and the payment of foreign mercenaries. This story is utterly discredited by Prideaux, passed over in silence by Milman, but apparently believed by a later historian. Antiochus then opened a war of autumn and winter against Judea, and marched against Jerusalem, as he had already done the preceding year, and succeeded in taking the city. Here the prince of his line held their court. It was identical with what Herod afterwards called Antonia. There is some confusion as to the length of his reign. It probably lasted about thirty years. He left five sons. With him terminates the upper house of the Asmoneans or Maccabees, B.C. 107.

6. Aristobulus succeeded his father as high-priest and supreme governor. He was the first, also, after the captivity, who openly assumed the title of king. He threw his mother, who claimed the throne, into prison, and starved her to death. He afterwards disposed of his brothers, who showed signs of ambition, he slew, the other one he left alone. His first military act was the siege of Ptolemais, which was in the hands of the Syrians. The inhabitants sought help from Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Egypt, but he turned Cyzicus, Phrygia, and brought with him 30,000 men he brought with him, declined to open their gates to him, whereupon he attacked Gaza and Dora. Alexander pretended to treat with him for the surrender of those places, and at the same time sent to Cleopatra, the widow of Ptolemy, for a large army to drive him from Palestine. He defeated the duplicity of this conduct, and took ample vengeance on Alexander by ravaging the country. He also defeated him with the loss of 80,000 men. Judas was saved by a large army from Cleopatra, commanded by Chelicias and Ananias, two Jews of Alexandria. They pursued Ptolemy into Coele-Syria, and besieged Ptolemais, which was reduced. Alexander next invaded the country beyond Jordan. Here, also, he was defeated, but not thereby discouraged from attacking Gaza, which, after some fruitless attempts, he captured and totally destroyed. His worst enemies, however, were the Pharisees, who had great influence with the people, and a sedition arose during the Feast of Tabernacles, in which the troops slew 6000 of the mob. He again invaded the trans-Jordanic country, and was again defeated. The Jews rose in rebellion, and for some years the land suffered great confusion. He was afterwards sent against Demetrius Eucharus, brother of Ptolemy Lathyrus, and king of Damascus, who completely routed Alexander. A sudden change of fortune, however, put him at the head of 60,000 men, and he marched in triumph to Jerusalem, where he took signal vengeance on his subjects. The rest of his life was peaceful. After a reign of twenty-seven years he died, B.C. 79, solemnly charging his wife Alexandra to espoise the Pharisian party if she wished to retain her kingdom. His eldest son, Hyrcanus II, became high-priest. Aristobulus, the younger son, espoused the Pharisian party to his mother, in order to employ his active mind, the queen sent him northwards to check the operations of Ptolemy, king of Chaldea. He got possession of Damascus, and won the affections of the army. After a reign of nine years his mother died, B.C. 79, and Aristobulus entered Jerusalem and besieged his brother in the tower of Bethania. To that height he agreed that Hyrcanus should retire to a private estate, and Aristobulus should be king. This was a fatal blow to the Pharisees. But there was a worse enemy waiting for the conqueror. This was none other than Antipater, the Idumean, who had been made general of all Idumaea by Alexander Jannaeus. He was wealthy, active, and sedulous, and posessed, moreover, of great influence with the deposed Hyrcanus. Suspicious of the power, successes, and pos-signs of Aristobulus, he persuaded his brother Hyrcanus to fly to Petra, to Arabas, King of Arabia, and with his help an army of 50,000 men was marched against Ariatobulus. The Jews were defeated, and the usurper fled to Jerusalem, where he was closely besieged by Aretas, Antipater, and Hyrcanus. Here, however, deliverance was delayed by Sceclus, the general of Pompey, who, having come to Damascus, and finding that the city had been taken by Metellus and Lollius, himself proceeded hastily into Judea. His assistance was eagerly sought by both parties. Aristobulus offered him 400 talents, and Hyrcanus the same; but as the former was in possession of the treasure, Sceclus thought that his promises were the most likely to be fulfilled, and consequently made an agreement with Aristobulus,
